PREFACE

Because there are almost two thousand pages of great writing in this book, I hesitate to detain the reader here. Yet a few prefatory words must be said.

First, I confess my surprise that so large a book is so readable. The publisher has given the speech prefixes in full (not Cae. and Cass., but Caesar and Cassius); has signaled footnotes by placing a bubble after each word or phrase being glossed and has put the footnotes where they belong, at the bottom of the column in which the word or phrase appears; has minimized the number of turned-over lines of poetry; and has used high-quality paper and readable type.

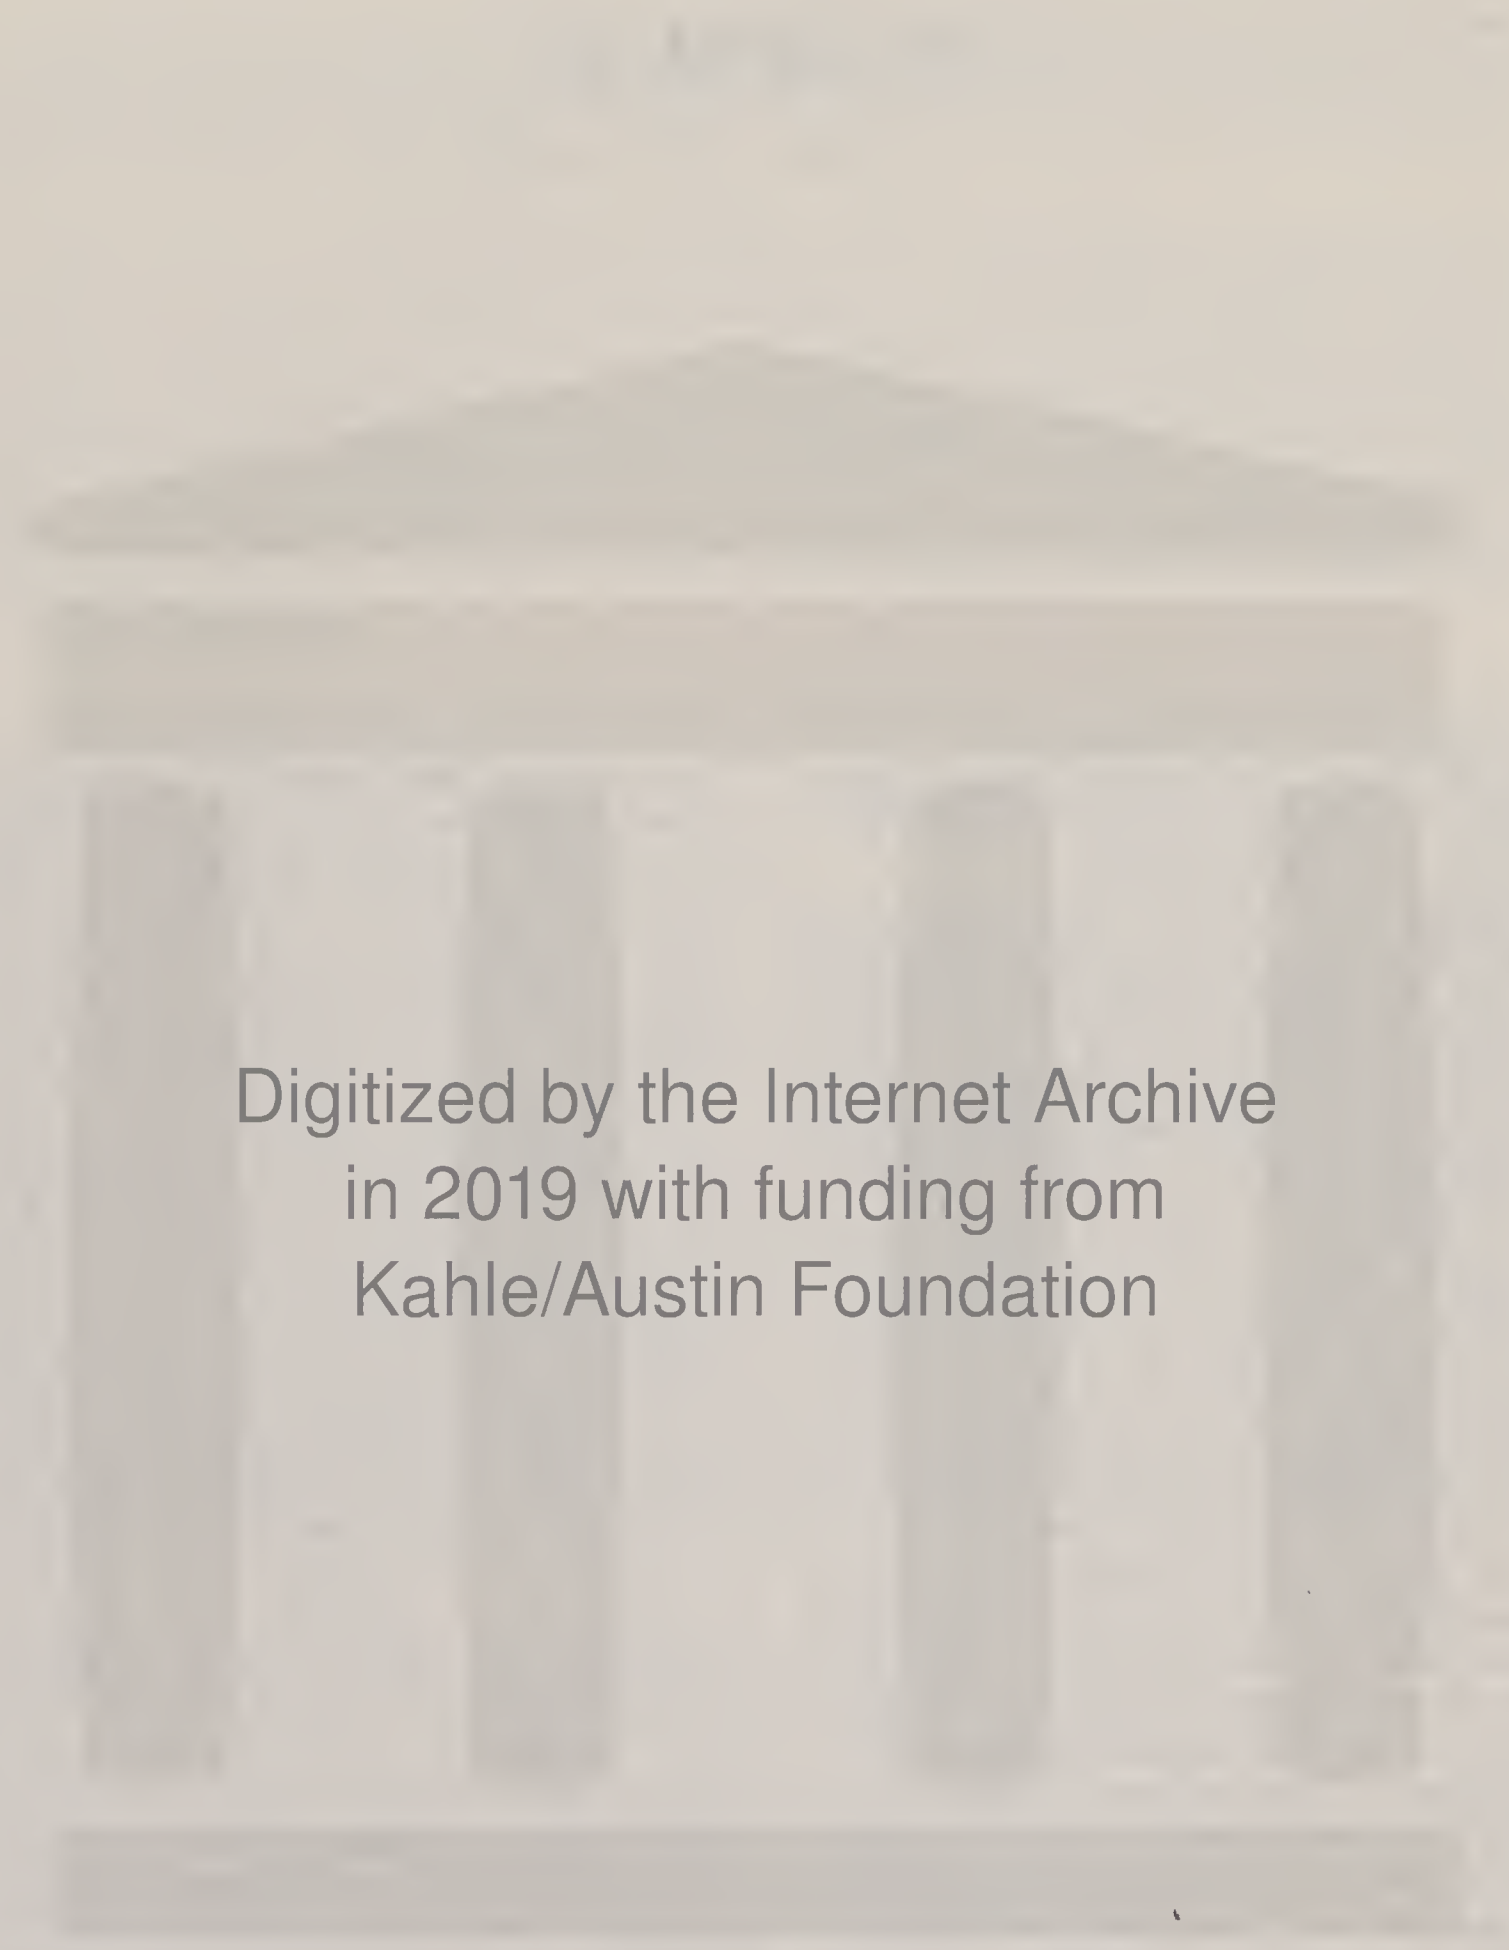

Second, a comment on the arrangement of the contents is called for. There are really only two possible arrangements: the plays can be arranged by genres (comedies, histories, tragedies, nondramatic works), or they can be arranged chronologically (with the nondramatic works either interspersed or grouped at the end). Although the chronology has never been exactly determined, the arrangement of this edition is chronological, partly because even if an organization by genres is used, the chronological problems must be faced in ordering the plays within each genre. Moreover, the three genres established by the editors of the first collected edition of Shakespeare's plays no longer seem entirely satisfactory. There has been a tendency to remove some of the "Comedies" and one of the "Tragedies" of the First Folio to make a fourth category, "Romances," and to treat some of the "Tragedies" as "Histories" and some of the "Histories" as "Tragedies." The day had to come when the author of an otherwise useful book on comedy would announce that of the fourteen plays called comedies in the First Folio, only five can properly be so called. And so the genres multiply. Yet another reason for using a chronological arrangement is simply that most readers find it helpful to study Shakespeare's plays, or a selection of them, in the approximate order in which they were written. The earliest plays, to be sure, are on the whole inferior to the later ones, but they are full of good things, and the reader will not be bored at the outset even if he begins with such early works as The Comedy of Errors,

Titus Andronicus, and Richard III. Moreover, although the chronology has not been exactly determined, the main lines are clear, and today we run no such danger as that which in the eighteenth century beset James Hurdis, who argued that Shakespeare progressed from the rather free verse of The Winter's Tale (now established as one of Shakespeare's last plays) to the more regular verse of The Comedy of Errors (now established as one of the first plays).

Two pleasant tasks remain: to call attention to new features and to old debts. First, this collected edition of the Signet Classic Shakespeare contains a General Introduction that seeks to describe in some detail not only the background to Shakespeare's achievements but also something of the achievements themselves; and this edition contains a newly revised (and greatly amplified) list of Suggested References. Second, I wish to express my gratitude to the editors of the individual plays and poems, both for their original work and for the revisions which they contributed to this new edition. I wish also to thank Victor Weybright, who initiated the paperback series; Ronald Campbell, who initiated this collected edition; Richard Hosley, who provided valuable information about the Elizabethan playhouse; Frederick C. Nelson, who interpreted some statistical data; Morton Berman, Michael Bliss, and William Burto, who improved the General Introduction; Wallace MacCaffrey, who suggested some books on the Elizabethan historical background; Edward Owens, who checked the list of Suggested References; Mrs. Bernice Nunley and Mrs. Ann Parker, who typed (and at times improved) the General Introduction; and Cele Gardner, Louise Marinis, and Linda Reiman, of Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, who presided over the metamorphosis of forty paperback books into this book. The list of Suggested References is, of course, an acknowledgment of further debts.

The chief debt is to Shakespeare. But—in the words of his fellow actors who first collected his plays—"It is not our province, who only gather his works, and give them to you, to praise him. It is yours that read him."

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

BY SYLVAN BARNET

Shakespeare's Life

Perhaps it is well to say at the outset that there is a good deal of evidence supporting the idea that William Shakespeare of Stratford and London wrote Shakespeare's plays. Several dozen other names have been put forward, the most notable of which are Bacon, Raleigh, Marlowe, and Queen Elizabeth; perhaps the most amusing candidates are a nun named Anne Whately and an alleged illegitimate son of Queen Elizabeth. But there is no evidence to support any of these claims, all of which begin with the assumption that "the Stratford poacher" or "the Stratford butcher-boy" simply could not have written great plays and poems. A suitably learned or aristocratic candidate must then be found, and if the candidate has written under his own name, verbal echoes between the plays and the candidate's undisputed works must be collected. Sometimes ciphers are detected; for example, in the comically long word honorificabilitudinitatibus in Love's Labor's Lost (V.i.42), Bacon is said to have planted a Latin anagram, Hi ludi F. Bacon nati tuiti orbi ("These plays, offspring of F. Bacon, are preserved for the world"). It is true that a similar long word, honorificabilitudine, appears in a manuscript that contains some of Bacon's essays, but slight variations of this word appear elsewhere too; indeed, the word in the exact form in which it is found in Love's Labor's Lost had appeared in print a century before the birth of either Shakespeare or Bacon. Moreover, other anagrams can be extracted from it—for example, Ubi Italicus ibi Danti honor fit ("Where there is an Italian, there honor is paid to Dante").

Against all anti-Stratfordian theories stands the fact that scores of Elizabethans spoke of Shakespeare as a playwright, and no Elizabethan is on record as having believed that Shakespeare did not write the plays. If the actor William Shakespeare was a mere front for another author, how was the secret kept so well? Why, for example, was it never detected by Ben Jonson, who both in print and in conversation spoke of William Shakespeare's plays? (One answer which has been offered is that Jonson called Shakespeare the playwright because Jonson himself was the author of the plays but wished to hide his identity.) In short, if Shakespeare did not write the plays, a great many people were fooled during the thirty-five or so years between the date of the earliest plays and the publication in 1623 of the collected plays. Did the actors—some of whom worked with Shakespeare for about twenty years—never suspect that their dull colleague could not have written the plays he was passing off as his own? Or if, as another approach holds, so many people were not fooled but rather were in on the secret, how is it possible that in its own day this widely shared secret never leaked out? According to another desperate theory, which recognizes that the plays were regularly attributed to William Shakespeare but refuses to tolerate the idea of the Stratford poacher as an author, the plays were written not by William Shakespeare of Stratford but by another man of the same name. But to the charge that William Shakespeare of Stratford-upon-Avon was not William Shakespeare the actor and playwright there are many replies, at least two of which are simple and compelling: Jonson and others speak of the playwright as the "swan of Avon"; and in the Stratford man's will bequests are made to some actors in the London theatrical company who acted Shakespeare's plays, thus indisputably linking the Stratford man with the London theater. Not until 1769 was any doubt expressed about the authorship of the body of work ascribed to Shakespeare, and this doubt was founded on the a priori assumption that the plays must have been written by a learned man.

It seems reasonable, then, to believe what so many Elizabethans believed, that William Shakespeare of Stratford and London wrote the works of William Shakespeare.

Between the record of his baptism in Stratford on April 26, 1564, and the record of his burial in Stratford on April 25, 1616, many documents name Shakespeare, and many others name his parents, his children, and his grandchildren. On the whole these documents are official records of baptism, marriage, real-estate transactions, lawsuits, taxation, and death. Had Shakespeare, like Marlowe, been accused of atheism and been killed in a tavern brawl, or had he, like Jonson, killed a man, we would probably know more about him. Nonetheless, more facts are known about William Shakespeare than about any other playwright of the period except Ben Jonson. The facts should, however, be distinguished from the legends. The latter, inevitably more engaging and better known, tell us that the Stratford boy killed a calf in high style, poached deer and rabbits, and was forced to flee to London, where he held horses outside a playhouse. These legends are simply that; they may be true, but no evidence supports them, and it is well to stick to the facts—though inevitably the following account will include probabilities and conjectures as well.

Mary Arden, the dramatist's mother, was the daughter of a substantial landowner; about 1557 she married John Shakespeare, a glovemaker and trader in various farm commodities in the prosperous town of Stratford, which served as one of the market centers for farmers of the nearby villages in the county of Warwickshire. In 1557 John Shakespeare was a member of the Council (the governing body of Stratford), in 1558 a constable of the borough, in 1561 one of the two town chamberlains, in 1565 an alderman (entitling him to the appellation "Mr."), and in 1568 a high bailiff—the town's highest political office, equivalent to mayor. After 1577 John Shakespeare dropped out of local politics, perhaps because—as records of lawsuits and of property transactions suggest—he was in financial difficulties.

The birthday of William Shakespeare, the eldest son of this locally prominent man, is unrecorded; but the Stratford parish register indicates that the infant was baptized on April 26, 1564. (It is quite possible that he was born on April 23, as tradition holds, but this date has probably been assigned for three reasons: some infants were baptized when they were three days old; fifty-two years later Shakespeare died on April 23; and April 23 is the day of England's patron saint, Saint George.)

In Elizabethan England when a child was four or five years old he attended a petty (elementary) school, where he learned to memorize some prayers and passages from the Scripture and learned to write English; in the third year he began Latin. Most girls completed their formal education at seven or eight, but boys, unless their families were very poor and needed the child's labor, generally went on to the grammar school, where they remained until they were fourteen or fifteen. The school year was longer than it is today: the school week was six days long, and the school day about eight or ten hours. The Elizabethan curriculum did not include mathematics, the natural sciences, and modern languages, but it taught a good deal of Latin grammar, rhetoric, logic, and literature. The basic text was William Lily's A Short Introduction of Grammar, which is written largely in Latin and which Shakespeare alludes to in Titus Andronicus. Among the authors studied in the Elizabethan grammar school were Cicero, Plautus, Terence, Virgil, and Ovid, all of whom seem to have left their marks on Shakespeare's plays. Recitation in Latin was important, and the schoolboys performed scenes from Plautus and Terence. Outside of school they were able to see English plays performed by the professional companies of actors who occasionally played in the guildhall at Stratford.

The attendance records of the Stratford grammar school of the period are not extant, but it is reasonable to assume that the son of a local official attended the school and received substantial training in Latin. The comic scene in The Merry Wives of Windsor (IV.i), in which a schoolmaster asks a pupil named William to exhibit his competence in Latin, should not lead us to think that the masters were ill-trained; the two masters of the Stratford grammar school from Shakespeare's seventh to fifteenth years held Oxford degrees. Thus the late seventeenth-century report that Shakespeare "understood Latin pretty well" is entirely credible. It is not irreconcilable with Ben Jonson's statement that Shakespeare had "small Latin and less Greek," for Jonson was an immensely learned poet who would inevitably have regarded anything less than expertness as "small." Whether Shakespeare knew any foreign language other than Latin—Jonson's reference to his Greek is probably as generous as his reference to his Latin is niggardly—is uncertain. A few of the sources for Shakespeare's plays exist today only in Italian, but possibly there were lost English versions; in any case, Shakespeare's knowledge of Latin would have enabled him to get the gist of an Italian story. Of his knowledge of French, a little more can be said: in Henry V there is an entire scene (an English lesson) in French, so it seems reasonable to assume that Shakespeare had at least a working knowledge of the language.

During Shakespeare's childhood there are several records of his father's dealings but none of the boy's doings. After the registration of his baptism, the next record that names Shakespeare are documents of November 27 and 28, 1582, recording the issuance of a marriage license to "William Shagspere . . . and Anne Hathwey." Anne Hathaway, who was eight years her husband's senior, bore a child in May 1583. Perhaps the marriage was necessary, but perhaps the couple had earlier engaged in a formal "troth plight," which would have rendered their children legitimate even if no further ceremony had been performed. In 1585 Anne Hathaway bore Shakespeare twins.

That Shakespeare was born is excellent; that he married and had children is pleasant; but that we know nothing about his departure from Stratford to London, or about the beginning of his theatrical career, is lamentable and must be admitted. We would gladly sacrifice details about his children's baptism for details about his earliest days on the stage. Perhaps the poaching episode is true (but it is first reported almost a century after Shakespeare's death), or perhaps he first left Stratford to be a schoolteacher, as another theory holds. Perhaps he was moved by

Such wind as scatters young men through the world,
To seek their fortunes farther than at home,
Where small experience grows.

(The Taming of the Shrew, I.ii.49–51)

There are no existing records of Shakespeare's activities between 1585 and 1592. One can with safety say only that at some time prior to 1592 he went to London and commenced his theatrical career. In 1592, thanks to the cantankerousness of Robert Greene, a rival playwright and a pamphleteer, the first reference—a snarling one—to Shakespeare as an actor and playwright appears. Greene warns those of his own educated friends who wrote for the theater against actors—"puppets . . . that spake from our mouths"—and particularly against one actor who had presumed to turn playwright:

There is an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his tiger's heart wrapped in a player's hide supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you, and being an absolute Johannes-factotum is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a country.

The reference to the player, as well as the allusion to a crow (which in a fable strutted in borrowed plumage, as an actor struts in fine words not his own), makes it clear that by this date Shakespeare had both acted and written. Possibly there is a charge of plagiarism here too, for the crow was sometimes used to symbolize a writer who pilfered from others. That Shakespeare is meant is indicated not only by "Shake-scene" but by the parody of a line from one of Shakespeare's plays, 3 Henry VI: "O, tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide." If Shakespeare was prominent enough by 1592 to be attacked by an envious dramatist, he probably had served an apprenticeship in the theater for at least a few years. If Greene's allusion to the crow does imply plagiarism, quite possibly Shakespeare began his career as a dramatist by revising earlier plays. Certainly he was to do this later on a grand scale, in Hamlet and King Lear, for instance.

Numerous subsequent references to Shakespeare indicate that as early as 1594 he was not only an actor but also a partner in a new theatrical company, the Lord Chamberlain's Men, which soon became one of London's two chief companies. Acting was not considered a suitable profession for a gentleman, and it occasionally drew the scorn of university men, who resented writing speeches for persons less educated than themselves. But acting was respectable enough: prosperous players were in effect members of the bourgeoisie, and there is nothing to suggest that Stratford considered William Shakespeare less than a solid citizen. In 1596 the Shakespeares were granted a coat of arms. The draft of the grant, a copy, and a draft of another grant authorizing additions are preserved in the archives of the College of Heralds in London. The Shakespeares' shield is gold with a black band crossing it diagonally; on the band is a gold spear with a silver tip. Above the shield is a silver wreath on which perches a silver falcon holding a gold spear with a silver tip. The grant was made to Shakespeare's father, who as bailiff had been (in the words of an appended note) "the queen's officer," but one can conjecture that William Shakespeare—who the next year bought the second-largest house in town—had arranged the matter on his own behalf. In subsequent transactions he is usually styled a gentleman. The house he bought in 1597 was built by a man who later became Lord Mayor of London; in 1643 it was still fine enough for Queen Henrietta Maria to spend two nights there as the guest of Shakespeare's daughter and granddaughter. Records of purchases and investments in later years demonstrate both Shakespeare's prosperity and his involvement with Stratford even during his theatrical career in London.

In 1593 and 1594 Shakespeare published Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, two narrative poems dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and he may well have written most or all of his sonnets in the nineties. But Shakespeare's major literary activity during this time was devoted to the theater. (It may be significant that the two narrative poems were written between the summer of 1592 and the spring of 1594, in years when the plague closed the theaters.) In 1594, as has been mentioned, he was a member of a theatrical company called the Lord Chamberlain's Men (which in 1603 changed its name to the King's Men); until he retired to Stratford (about 1611, apparently), he was with this remarkably stable company. From 1599 the company acted

The falcon and the tip of the spear are marked "Ar" for argent, silver; the shield "O" for or, gold; the diagonal band "S" for sable, black. "Garter" refers to Garter King-of-Arms, the official who issued the Grant of Arms.

(Bottom) All of Shakespeare's six undisputed signatures are in the native English angular hand rather than in the newer Italian cursive hand. Of the six, only this signature, at the end of his will, is preceded by other words in his writing, here, "By me." Possibly the writing is that of a dying man, but possibly Shakespeare, like the young Hamlet, "did hold it, as our statists do, / A baseness to write fair."

primarily at the Globe Theatre, in which Shakespeare held a one-tenth interest. Of the more than three hundred known Renaissance English playwrights, some of whom acted as well as wrote, only Shakespeare is known to have been entitled to a share in the profits of the playhouse.

Shakespeare's first eight published plays did not bear his name, but this is not remarkable; the most popular play of the sixteenth century, Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, went through many editions without naming Kyd, and Kyd's authorship is known only because a book on the profession of acting happened to quote (and attribute to Kyd) some lines on the interest of Roman emperors in the drama. What is remarkable is the fact that after 1598 Shakespeare's name commonly appears on printed plays—some of which are not his. Another indication of his popularity comes from Francis Meres' Palladis Tamia: Wit's Treasury (1598): in this commonplace book of anecdotes, quotations, and allusions, there is also "A Comparative Discourse of Our English Poets with the Greek, Latin, and Italian Poets," which mentions many playwrights, but Shakespeare is the only playwright whose plays are listed. Here is Meres' comment on Shakespeare:

As the soul of Euphorbus was thought to live in Pythagoras: so the sweet witty soul of Ovid lives in mellifluous and honey-tongued Shakespeare, witness his Venus and Adonis, his Lucrece, his sugared Sonnets among his private friends, etc.

As Plautus and Seneca are accounted the best for Comedy and Tragedy among the Latins, so Shakespeare among the English is the most excellent in both kinds for the stage; for Comedy, witness his Gentlemen of Verona, his Errors, his Love Labor's Lost, his Love Labor's Won, his Midsummer's Night Dream and his Merchant of Venice: for Tragedy his Richard the 2, Richard the 3, Henry the 4, King John, Titus Andronicus and his Romeo and Juliet.

As Epius Stolo said that the Muses would speak with Plautus' tongue if they would speak Latin, so I say that the Muses would speak with Shakespeare's fine filed phrase, if they would speak English.

There is no extant play by Shakespeare titled Love Labor's Won. Perhaps Meres was referring to a play now known under another name, such as The Taming of the Shrew, which is the only Shakespearean comedy surely written before 1598 that Meres does not mention. Meres also includes Shakespeare's name in his somewhat indiscriminating lists of the best lyric poets, tragic and comic playwrights, and love poets.

As Pindarus, Anacreon and Callimachus among the Greeks, and Horace and Catullus among the Latins are the best lyric poets, so in this faculty the best among our poets are Spenser (who excelleth in all kinds), Daniel, Drayton, Shakespeare, Breton. . . .

These are our best for tragedy, the Lord Buckhurst, Doctor Leg of Cambridge, Doctor Edes of Oxford, Master Edward Ferris, the author of the Mirror for Magistrates, Marlowe, Peele, Watson, Kyd, Shakespeare, Drayton, Chapman, Dekker, and Benjamin Jonson. . . .

The best for comedy amongst us be Edward Earl of Oxford, Doctor Gager of Oxford, Master Rowley once a rare scholar of learned Pembroke Hall in Cambridge, Master Edwards one of her Majesty's Chapel, eloquent and witty John Lily, Lodge, Gascoine, Greene, Shakespeare, Thomas Nashe, Thomas Heywood, Anthony Mundie our best plotter, Chapman, Porter, Wilson, Hathway, and Henry Chettle. . . .

These are the most passionate among us to bewail and bemoan the perplexities of love, Henry Howard Earl of Surrey, Sir Thomas Wyatt the elder, Sir Francis Brian, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Edward Dyer, Spenser, Daniel, Drayton, Shakespeare. . . .

Shakespeare probably completed his first sixteen plays by the end of 1598—in a decade or less. In the next ten years he was almost as prolific, writing perhaps thirteen or fourteen plays, including many that are his greatest. In the remaining years of his career Shakespeare seems to have slowed down a bit, writing about a play a year. Some evidence suggests that he gradually withdrew from the theater to live in Stratford. From his acting and playwriting and his share in the Globe Theatre, Shakespeare made a considerable amount of money. He put it to work, making substantial investments in Stratford real estate, although during his career he lived in London. By 1612, when a document of a London court identifies him as "William Shakespeare of Stratford-upon-Avon," he was apparently again living in Stratford. When he revised his will in 1616 (less than a month before he died), he sought to leave most of his property intact to his descendants: first to his daughter, Susanna, then to her eldest surviving son, and so on. But all four of his grandchildren died without lineal heirs, and the estate was eventually broken up. Of the small bequests made to relatives and friends (including three actors, Richard Burbage, John Heminges, and Henry Condell), the bequest to his wife of the second-best bed has provoked the most comment; perhaps it was the bed the couple had slept in, the best bed having been reserved for visitors. In any case, had Shakespeare not excepted it, the bed would have gone along with the rest of his household possessions to his daughter and her husband. Nor need we fret that Shakespeare's wife was left with only a bed. The laws of the period assured a widow of one third of the income from her husband's estate during her lifetime.

The cause of Shakespeare's death is not known, but a clergyman who settled in Stratford in 1662—almost fifty years after Shakespeare's death—recorded in his diary that "Shakespeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and it seems drank too hard, for Shakespeare died of a fever there contracted." This may or may not be true. In any case, on April 25, 1616, Shakespeare was buried under the floor of the chancel in the church at Stratford. An unattractive monument to his memory, placed on a wall near the grave, says he died on April 23. The monument consists of a bust flanked by columns; above the bust are Shakespeare's arms, helm, and crest, and two small figures representing Rest and Labor; the whole statue is topped by a skull. The monument was painted realistically, but the present colors are not the original ones. Carved on the slab over the grave itself are the lines, perhaps written by Shakespeare himself, that (more than his literary fame) have kept his bones undisturbed in the crowded burial ground beneath the church floor, where old bones were often dislodged to make way for new:

Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here.
Blessed be the man that spares these stones
And cursed be he that moves my bones.

Shakespeare's wife died on August 6, 1623; when his last descendant, a granddaughter, died in 1670, Shakespeare's large house was bequeathed outside the family.

The Shakespeare Canon

Thirty-seven plays, one hundred fifty-four sonnets, two nondramatic poems, and one elegy constitute the Shakespeare canon, or list of accepted works. A thirty-eighth play, The Two Noble Kinsmen, has increasingly gained acceptance as having been written at least in part by Shakespeare. One other play in the apocrypha, or body of writing sometimes attributed to Shakespeare but not widely accepted as authentic, deserves mention. This is Sir Thomas More, which survives in manuscript and which includes three pages that some experts believe are in Shakespeare's handwriting. Possibly, too, some of Shakespeare's plays are lost, but probably the canon preserves all or almost all of his work.

The dates of composition of most of the works are highly uncertain, but there is often evidence of a terminus a quo (starting point) and/or a terminus ad quem (ending point) that provides a framework for intelligent guessing. For example, Richard II cannot have been written earlier than 1595, the publication date of some material to which it is indebted; The Merchant of Venice cannot have been written later than 1598, the year Francis Meres mentioned it. Sometimes arguments for a date hang on an alleged topical allusion, such as the lines about the unseasonable weather in A Midsummer Night's Dream (II.i.81-117); but such an allusion (if indeed it is an allusion) can be variously interpreted, and there is always the possibility that a topical allusion was inserted during a revision, years after the composition of a play. Dates are often attributed to plays on the basis of style, and although conjectures about style usually rest on other conjectures, sooner or later one must rely on one's literary sense. There is no real proof, for example, that Othello was not written as early as Julius Caesar, but one feels that Othello is a later play, and because the first record of its performance is 1604, one is glad enough to set its composition at that date or a little earlier and not push it back into Shakespeare's early years. The following chronology, then, is as much indebted to informed guesswork and literary sensitivity as it is to fact. The dates, necessarily imprecise, indicate what is essentially a scholarly consensus. The dates of the earliest plays are especially uncertain because it is not known when Shakespeare began writing for the stage (that his first plays were not written earlier than 1588 is only a conjecture) and because some of them show signs of having been revised several years after they were written. Love's Labor's Lost especially suggests an early date, perhaps 1588, and a revision in 1595 or so.

Shakespeare's Theaters and Actors

A good deal of theatrical activity took place in England during Shakespeare's youth, but much of it was not performed by professionals in a theater. There was play-acting in the schools and universities; there was pageantry in the streets; there were masques at court. This section, however, is concerned only with the professional theater. (For a discussion of some of the amateur traditions behind Elizabethan drama, see pp. 12-14.)

THE THEATERS

In Shakespeare's infancy, Elizabethan actors performed wherever they could—possibly in bearbaiting and bull-baiting arenas, and certainly in the courtyards of inns, in great halls, and at court. The innyards probably made rather unsatisfactory theaters; on some days they were unavailable because carters bringing goods to London used them as depots; when available, they had to be rented from the innkeeper. Perhaps most important, London inns were under the jurisdiction of the Common Council of London, which was not well disposed toward theatricals. In 1574 the Common Council required that plays and playing places in London be licensed. It asserted that sundry great disorders and inconveniences have been found to ensue to this city by the inordinate haunting of great multitudes of people, specially youth, to plays, interludes, and shows, namely occasion of frays and quarrels, evil practices of incontineny in great inns having chambers and secret places adjoining to their open stages and galleries, and ordered that innkeepers who wished licenses to hold performances put up a bond and make contributions to the poor.

The requirement that plays and innyard theaters be licensed, along with the other drawbacks of playing at inns, probably drove James Burbage, a carpenter turned actor, to rent in 1576 a plot of land northeast of the city walls and to build there, on property outside the jurisdiction of the city, England's first permanent construction designed for plays. He called it simply the Theatre. About all that is known of its construction is that it was made of wood and was in the shape of an "amphitheatrum," that is, round or approximately so, like a bearbaiting arena. Presumably Burbage erected a stage in the yard, and behind the stage a dressing room or "tiring house" from which actors could enter the stage through doorways that were perhaps fitted with hanging cloths. Such an arrangement probably resembled the curtained booths at the rear of the temporary stages that players used in the market theaters or the hall-screen in a great house that masked the doors to the pantry, kitchen, and buttery from the hall itself but allowed entrance to the hall through doorways in the hall-screen. The Theatre was probably three stories high, and the yard was partly sheltered with a roof topped by a hut, which housed suspension gear for flying effects. Burbage's Theatre soon had imitators, the most famous of which was the Globe (1599), built by Shakespeare and his fellow sharers in the Lord Chamberlain's company. The Globe was built on the Bankside, south of the Thames (again outside the city's jurisdiction), and was made from timbers of the Theatre, which had been dismantled and transported across London when Burbage's lease ran out.

There are three important sources of information about the structure of Elizabethan playhouses: drawings, a contract, and stage directions in plays. Of drawings, only the so-called De Witt drawing (about 1596) of the Swan—actually a friend's copy of De Witt's drawing—is of much significance. Although the De Witt drawing raises several questions, it gives us a good deal of information about the Elizabethan theater. It shows a circular building of three galleries, with a stage jutting from a wall into the yard formed by the surrounding galleries. The galleries are roofed, and part of the stage is covered by a roof that projects from the rear and is supported at its front by two posts. The groundlings, who paid a penny to stand in front of the stage or at its sides, were exposed to the sky. (Performances in such a playhouse were held only in the daytime; artificial illumination was not used.) At the rear of the stage are two doors in the tiring-house wall; above the stage is a gallery. That actors entered the stage through these doors seems obvious, but what is not obvious is the identity of De Witt's figures in the gallery above the stage. Probably they are spectators, but why are all the other galleries empty? (The neatest answer is that it would be difficult and tedious for the artist to populate all of the galleries.) As will be seen below, actors could use this upper area in plays that required them to be "above," but when plays did not require such action, the area was devoted entirely to spectators.

The second major source of information, the contract for the Fortune, specifies that although the Globe was to be its model, the Fortune was to be square, eighty feet outside and fifty-five inside. (The polygonal or circular theaters seem to have been larger: perhaps the interior diameter was eighty or eighty-five feet, the exterior diameter ninety-five or a hundred feet.) The stage was to be forty-three feet broad and was to extend into the middle of the yard (the platform was thus twenty-seven and a half feet deep). For patrons willing to pay more than the general admission charged the groundlings, there were to be three galleries provided with seats.

From the third chief source, stage directions, it is known that actors entered the stage by doors, presumably spaced widely apart at the rear ("Enter one citizen at one door, and another at the other"), and that in addition to the platform stage there was occasionally a curtained space (whether booth or alcove) that allowed for "discovery" scenes and a playing space "aloft" or "above" used to represent such areas as the top of a city's walls or the window of a room above the street. Doubtless each theater had its own peculiarities; but it is possible to talk about a "typical" Elizabethan theater if we bear in mind that no theater need exactly have fitted the description, just as no father is a typical father with 3.7 children. This hypothetical Elizabethan theater is wooden, round or polygonal (in Henry V Shakespeare calls it a "wooden O"), and capable of holding about three thousand spectators—perhaps two thousand standing in the yard around the projecting elevated stage and one thousand seated in the three roofed galleries. Because the spectators stood rather than sat in chairs on the ground level, and because the three galleries circled the auditorium rather than being confined to the rear (as in most proscenium-arch theaters), a large number of people could be squeezed into a relatively small building. The stage, protected by a roof, called the "cover" or "heavens," was entered by two doors. These doors may have been curtained (although curtains are not shown in the De Witt drawing of the Swan) and thus may have served as the area for "discoveries" mentioned above. Or there may have been a third opening, a curtained booth or alcove against the rear wall between these two doors. In The Merchant of Venice, for example, "the curtain" is opened three times to reveal Portia's three caskets. In 1 Henry IV Falstaff hides and is later discovered "behind the arras." But a door itself, without a curtain, would presumably have served as an entrance to Juliet's tomb. When Romeo "opens the tomb," he probably opened a pair of double-hung doors, like those in the De Witt drawing, to reveal Juliet lying on a coffin. Surprisingly, such discovery scenes are very rare in Elizabethan drama. It is worth mentioning that usually no more than two persons are discovered at once, which suggests that the area was too small to be considered (as it sometimes is in the twentieth century) an "inner stage." After being discovered, the character or characters did not move about in the discovery space; they walked out onto the stage. Behind the stage was the "tiring house" (attiring house, or dressing room), and above the doors was a gallery that sometimes held spectators but that was also used, for example, as the bedroom window from which Romeo—according to a stage direction in one text—"goeth down" or as the castle wall from which young Arthur in King John leaps down. Some evidence suggests that a throne was lowered onto the platform stage, perhaps from the stage cover; certainly characters descended from the stage through a trap or traps into the cellar, or "hell." Sometimes this space beneath the platform was used to accommodate a sound-effects man or musician (in Antony and Cleopatra "music of the hautboys is under the stage") or an actor (in Hamlet the "Ghost cries under the stage"). Most characters simply walked on and off, but because there was no curtain at the front of the stage, corpses had to be carried off—thus an Elizabethan Hamlet had to lug Polonius' body into the adjoining room.

Such may have been the so-called public theater. There was also another kind of theater, called the "private theater" because its much greater admission charge limited its audience to the wealthy or the prodigal. This type of theater was basically a large room, entirely roofed and therefore artificially illuminated, with a stage at one end and a tiring house behind the stage. In 1576, a year before the first permanent public theater was built, such a theater was established in Blackfriars, a Dominican priory in London that had been suppressed in 1538 and confiscated by the crown and thus was not under the city's jurisdiction. All the actors in the Blackfriars theater were boys about eight to thirteen years old. This private theater had a precarious existence and ceased operations in 1584. In 1596 James Burbage, who had already made theatrical history by building the Theatre, began to construct a second Blackfriars theater. He died in 1597, and for several years this second Blackfriars theater was used by a troupe of boys. In 1608 two of Burbage's sons and five other actors (including Shakespeare) became joint operators of the theater, using it in the winter, when the open-air Globe was unsuitable. Perhaps such a smaller theater (its capacity was about seven hundred), roofed, artificially illuminated, and patronized by a fashionable audience, exerted an influence on Shakespeare's later plays, but it would be a mistake to think either that these later plays have fundamentally different staging needs or that they are essentially different in spirit from Shakespeare's earlier work. It should be noted, too, that Elizabethan theatrical companies were occasionally called upon to give a performance at court, on a temporary stage in a room illuminated by candles and torches. But since a play thus staged was commonly selected from the company's repertory by the queen's Master of the Revels, a performance at court was probably not vastly different from a performance in a theater.

Performances in the private theaters may well have had intermissions, during which music was played, but in the public theaters the action was probably uninterrupted, flowing from scene to scene almost without a break.

Detail of a drawing (circa 1640) by Wenceslaus Hollar showing the second Globe Theatre and the Beergarden. The first Globe had burned in 1613; the second was promptly built on the site.

Hollar (1607–77), a native of Prague, lived in England from 1637 to 1645. In 1647 his engraving of a panoramic map of London was published in Antwerp, probably based on sketches he had made while in England. The labels “Beere bayting” and “The [Second] Globe” almost surely are reversed.

Actors entered, spoke, and exited, and other actors immediately entered and established a new locale (if necessary) by a few properties and by words and gestures. Here are some samples of how Shakespeare set the place or the time of his plays:

JULIET

Wilt thou be gone? It is not yet near day.
It was the nightingale, and not the lark,
That pierced the fearful hollow of thine ear.

ROMEO

It was the lark, the herald of the morn;
No nightingale. Look, love, what envious streaks
Do lace the severing clouds in yonder East.
(Romeo and Juliet, III.v.1-3,6-8)

Sometimes the setting of locale is more direct:

TITUS

The hunt is up, the morn is bright and gray,
The fields are fragrant, and the woods are green.
(Titus Andronicus, II.ii.1-2)

DUNCAN

This castle hath a pleasant seat; the air
Nimbly and sweetly recommends itself
Unto our gentle senses. (Macbeth, I.vi.1-3)

CAPTAIN

This is Illyria, lady. (Twelfth Night, I.ii.2)

ROSALIND

Well, this is the Forest of Arden.
(As You Like It, II.iv.14)

But it is a mistake to conceive of the Elizabethan stage as bare. Although the Chorus in Henry V calls the stage an "unworthy scaffold" and urges the spectators to "eke out our performance with your mind," the stage façade itself was apparently richly decorated, and the underside of the cover was adorned with stars. Moreover, considerable spectacle took place on the platform stage itself. In the last act of Macbeth, for example, five stage directions call for "drum and colors," and another sort of appeal to the eye is made by the stage direction "Enter Macduff, with Macbeth's head." Some scenery and properties may have been substantial: thrones, altars, and chariots were used, as well as mossy banks and trees. One play of the period includes this stage direction: "Hector takes up a great piece of rock and casts at Ajax, who tears up a young tree by the roots and assails Hector." (See p. 69 for a further discussion of stage directions.)

THE ACTORS

In the late Middle Ages religious plays were performed by members of various craft guilds: bakers, butchers, goldsmiths, and so forth acted in plays on biblical subjects. Amateur theatrical activity flourished (we should also keep in mind Robin Hood plays, Saint George plays, May games, and other amateur seasonal theatricals of a folkloric nature), creating a climate in which professionalism could develop. By the middle of the fifteenth century traveling troupes were staging plays throughout England. These troupes were small—usually consisting of four actors—but they must have been highly skilled, for their livelihood depended on doing better what innumerable amateurs were also doing. By the middle of the sixteenth century some traveling troupes included as many as a dozen actors, with boys playing the female roles. In their social origins these actors were generally men like Bottom the weaver and his fellows who in A Midsummer Night's Dream perform a play before the duke. But the ineptitude of Bottom's amateur company should not be confused with the skill of the professionals; the craftsmen who left their looms or cobbler's benches to become professional actors had to be expert in their new craft if they were to survive.

For various reasons, including the break-up of feudal households during the Wars of the Roses and the dissolution of the monasteries, Tudor England had a large number of unemployed wanderers, and laws were devised to restrain them. Because a "masterless man" was considered unnatural—the more so because there was a labor shortage—traveling actors were nominally considered the "servants" of a nobleman; but from this patron they usually got only a license or patent and payment for an occasional performance in his household on a festive day. The actors depended for their livelihood on the patronage of the general public, and the license was necessary if they were to reach that public, as is indicated by the following letter from the Duke of Lennox, addressed "to all mayors, justices of peace, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and all other his Highness' officers . . . to whom it shall or may in any wise appertain":

I am given to understand that you have forbidden the company of players that call themselves mine the exercise of their plays. I pray you to forebear any such course against them, and, seeing they have my license, to suffer them to continue the use of their plays; and until you receive other signification from me of them, to afford them your favor and assistance. And so I bid you heartily farewell.

When Shakespeare's company received the patronage of King James I in 1603, its license read as follows:

Know ye that We of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion have licensed and authorized and by these presents do license and authorize these our servants Lawrence Fletcher, William Shakespeare, Richard Burbage, Augustine Phillips, John Heminges, Henry Condell, William Sly, Robert Armin, Richard Cowley, and the rest of their associates freely to use and exercise the art and faculty of playing comedies, tragedies, histories, interludes, moralities, pastorals, stage plays, and such others like as they have already studied or hereafter shall use or study, as well for the recreation of our loving subjects as for our solace and pleasure when we shall think good to see them, during our pleasure. And the said comedies, tragedies, histories, interludes, moralities, pastorals, stage plays, and such like to show and exercise publicly to their best commodity, when the infection of the plague shall decrease, as well within their now usual house called the Globe within our county of Surrey, as also within any town halls or moot halls or other convenient places within the liberties and freedom of any other city, university, town, or borough whatsoever within our said realms and dominions. Willing and commanding you and every of you, as you tender our pleasure, not only to permit and suffer them herein without any your hindrances or molestations during our said pleasure, but also to be aiding and assisting to them, if any wrong be to them offered. And to allow them such former courtesies as hath been given to men of their place and quality, and also that further favor you shall show to these our servants for our sake we shall take kindly at your hands.

This was doubtless a most useful document for an acting company.

By the end of the sixteenth century, despite harassment by puritanical forces, the status of actors was fairly secure: acting was recognized as a "trade" or "profession," subject not to local authorities but to the crown through the Master of the Revels and his superior, the Lord Chamberlain. Therefore, although the Revels Office censored plays and could be a powerful enemy when it suspected that a play harbored seditious ideas, it was for the most part (like the lords who lent acting companies their nominal patronage) an important ally of the players: it arranged for occasional remunerative performances at court, and more important, it stood between the players and the local bourgeois officials, who often regarded theatrical performances as a waste of time, or as indecent shows, or worst of all as vestiges of Roman Catholic activities. (It should be remembered that the old religious drama survived in some parts of England past the middle of the sixteenth century.) There is a large body of anti-theatrical writing, much of it amusing in its abusiveness, but one example, from a sermon written in 1578 by John Stockwood, should suffice:

Will not a filthy play, with the blast of a trumpet, sooner call thither a thousand than an hour's tolling of a bell bring to the sermon a hundred? . . . If you resort to the Theatre, the Curtain, and other places of plays in the city, you shall on the Lord's day have these places, with many other that I cannot reckon, so full as possibly they can throng.

Even allowing for the exaggeration of an indignant competitor, Stockwood's comments help to indicate the magnitude of theatrical activity that took place in the period of Shakespeare's youth.

A theatrical company such as the Lord Chamberlain's Men was a substantial business enterprise. The company was formed in the summer of 1594; if Shakespeare was not a charter member, he joined the company soon after its formation, for he is specified as a member in March 1595, and he stayed with it for the remainder of his professional life. As has been mentioned, with the accession of James I in 1603, the company became the King's Men, and it endured until the Puritans closed the theaters in 1642. The company's organization was rather medieval, consisting of three groups which resembled the craft-guild hierarchy of master craftsmen, journeymen, and apprentices: (1) senior actors, such as Shakespeare, called "fellows" or "sharers" because each owned a share in the plays and the properties, and therefore shared in the profits; (2) hired men, who performed minor roles or served as musicians, prompters, doorkeepers, and so on, and did not share in the profits; and (3) boys, who were in effect apprenticed to the sharers and played most or all of the female roles. (Possibly the garrulous old Nurse in Romeo and Juliet was played by a man rather than by a boy.) A boy entered the company when he was about ten, trained for a while, and then acted female roles until his voice changed or he grew too tall for the part. That all the performers were male should not seem strange; all the performers in classical Greek, Chinese, and Japanese drama also were male, as were the performers in the folk plays (see p. 12). It would seem that drama, when it is still close to ceremony and not yet fully dedicated to realism, prefers men to represent women. (E. K. Chambers, in The English Folk-Play, quotes a man who had performed in a folk play: "Oh, you wouldn't have women in that; it's more like being in church.") Shakespeare's company expanded over the years, beginning with five sharers and ending with twelve, but it probably never had more than about two dozen actors. Even Henry VIII, which has forty-one speaking parts, can be performed by about a dozen actors by doubling and tripling.

Doubtless the composition of Shakespeare's company left its mark on his plays; Shakespeare knew what it could do, and he knew for whom he had to write parts. For example, because there were probably only two or three boys at any given time who could play important roles, and another two or three in training, Shakespeare's plays rarely have more than four significant female roles, though of course a larger number can be handled by doubling. The fact that so many of Shakespeare's heroines are motherless—for example, Rosalind and Celia in As You Like It—is probably due to the restrictions imposed by the company rather than to anything in Shakespeare's psychology. Probably, too, the availability of a good clown encouraged Shakespeare to write in a clown's part, and so on. (It might be argued with equal validity, of course, that the audience wanted a clown, and so the company made it its business to have one.) Viewed one way, Shakespeare was in bondage to his company; viewed another way, Shakespeare had the advantage of knowing what his actors could and could not do before he put pen to paper.

Actors in Shakespeare's day worked hard, and they probably worked hardest of all during those months when the plague closed the London theaters and forced the actors to tour the remote provinces. But even when they were in London, playing was not all fun. A company performed five or six times a week, giving in a season twenty-five or thirty different plays, about half of which were new in the repertory and the remainder either recent favorites or revivals of older plays. Occasionally a play was given two or three consecutive performances, but commonly the program changed every day, and the same play was rarely acted twice in one week. Thus in a month a company might perform a dozen different plays. Although no annual records for the Lord Chamberlain's Men are extant, it is possible to get an idea of its activities from the records of its rival, the Admiral's Men. Between 1594 and 1597 the Admiral's Men gave 728 performances of fifty-five plays; or to take a more microscopic view, between August 1595 and February 1596 it gave 150 performances of thirty different plays, fourteen of which were new.

Existing evidence on the style of Elizabethan acting is open to various interpretations. There are essentially two schools of thought: one sees Elizabethan acting as realistic (or natural); the other sees it as conventional (or formal). Advocates of the realistic theory point to various Elizabethan passages that praise actors as lifelike: Hamlet, for example, warns the players against ranting, and this is taken as evidence that the actors in Hamlet did not rant. But this very statement can also be taken as evidence that actors normally ranted, and that Shakespeare was trying to restrain his actors. Moreover, even if we agree that the actors in Hamlet did not rant, we need not conclude that they acted realistically. Another piece of evidence usually taken as indicating that acting was realistic is John Webster's comment on the ability of a good actor: "What we see him personate, we think truly done before us." But one can reply that every age insists that its good actors are natural. The acting in the motion pictures of the thirties, for example, seems quaint to us today, though it struck its contemporaries as thoroughly lifelike.

On the other hand, those who argue that Elizabethan acting was formal rather than natural discount Elizabethan statements about holding the mirror up to nature; they regard such statements as being of no more value than those Elizabethan testimonials that describe a tapestry—necessarily unrealistic—as the very image of life. They argue that the conditions of the stage required formal acting: performances were given in daylight, even though some scenes occurred at night; boys performed female parts; the language of the play was commonly poetry rather than daily speech. In addition, characters sometimes addressed the audience directly, breaking (it is argued) any illusion of the reality of the world on the stage. (There are comic monologues in Shakespeare that unquestionably are direct addresses to the audience. And Iago, for example, appeals to the audience when he says, "And what's he then that says I play the villain?") Such arguments in behalf of formal acting have much merit, yet they cannot be taken as proof that Elizabethan acting was highly stylized and devoid of naturalism. The dialogue in the plays themselves, for example, provides evidence that characters did not silently walk across the stage, take up a position, and then declaim; they spoke while they walked, while they dressed, and so on. Probably, then, it is safest to conclude that although natural acting was highly praised and unnatural acting ridiculed, the acting of Shakespeare's day was a combination of both styles, and it was probably somewhat more naturalistic than the acting of his youth, which had come to seem bombastic. In A Midsummer Night's Dream Bottom is perhaps old-fashioned when he says he "will move storms" and when he yearns for "a part to tear a cat in, to make all split." A few years later Hamlet deplores actors who split the ears of the groundlings.

Not a great deal is known about the costumes that Elizabethan actors wore, but at least three points are clear: (1) many of the costumes were sumptuous versions of contemporary Elizabethan dress; (2) some attempts were made to approximate the dress of certain occupations and of antique or exotic characters such as Romans, Turks, and Jews; (3) some costumes indicated that the wearer was supernatural. Evidence for elaborate contemporary dress can be found in the many references to Elizabethan clothing (doublets, hose, and so on) in the plays themselves and in contemporary comments about the "sumptuous" players who wore the discarded clothing of noblemen, as well as in various account books which itemize such things as "a scarlet cloak with two broad gold laces, with gold buttons of the same down the sides." The attempt at approximating the dress of certain occupations and nationalities also can be documented from the plays themselves, and it derives additional confirmation from a drawing—the only extant picture of an identifiable Elizabethan stage production—of a scene from Titus Andronicus. The drawing, probably done in 1594 or 1595, shows Queen Tamora pleading for mercy. She wears a robe and a crown; Titus wears a toga and a wreath, but two soldiers behind him wear costumes fairly close to Elizabethan dress. There is, however, some conflicting evidence: in Julius Caesar a reference is made to Caesar's doublet, which, if taken literally, suggests that even the protagonist did not wear Roman clothing; and certainly the lesser characters, who are said to wear hats, did not wear Roman garb. But perhaps in its context the word doublet merely denotes a garment for the upper part of the body, not the specifically Elizabethan garment. The use of symbolic costumes for supernatural creatures is nicely illustrated by a property listed in the journal of an Elizabethan theatrical entrepreneur: "a robe for to go invisible." In The Tempest this stage direction appears:

"Enter Ariel, invisible" (III.ii). Possibly this symbolic robe was worn; possibly the stage direction is merely an instruction to the actors, but certainly in III.iii, "Enter Ariel, like a harpy," a symbolic costume was used. Finally, it should be mentioned that even ordinary clothing can be symbolic: Hamlet's "inky cloak," for example, sets him aside from the brightly dressed members of Claudius' court and symbolizes his mourning; the fresh clothes that are put on King Lear partly symbolize his return to sanity. This device, of course, is not confined to the tragedies. Near the end of Much Ado About Nothing, just before Claudio's bride is restored to him—giving him, in effect, a new life—Don Pedro says to Claudio, "Come, let us hence and put on other weeds." Claudio's reappearance, presumably in a new splendid costume, is a visual representation of his renewal.

The Dramatic Background

As has been mentioned, a good deal of theatrical and quasi-theatrical activity took place in England in Shakespeare's youth. This activity ranged from professional productions to amateur productions in Latin and the performances of trained animals. It is not possible to discuss here such activities as jousts and tournaments, which were highly ritualized and spectacular encounters with conflict at their heart, and public executions, in which the condemned man was allowed to make a speech to the assembled crowd, but there is no doubt that such activities influenced Shakespeare's plays, as can be seen from the interrupted joust in Richard II (I.iii) and the report of the Thane of Cawdor's words just before he is executed in Macbeth (I.iv.1-11) or Othello's words just before he kills himself (V.ii.337-55). Rather, this section will be concerned with five sorts of drama, and the subsequent discussions of Shakespeare's comedies, histories, and tragedies will occasionally amplify some of the points raised here.

First, an enduring drama existed among the folk, the peasants and artisans who enacted annual playlets celebrating the renewal of the year, which had "died" in the winter and been "reborn" in the spring. Often these festive plays were transferred from the spring or summer to the Christmas festivities, for Christmas symbolized the possibility of the renewal or rebirth of fallen man. Commonly the players would visit their lord's manor house and perform their rudimentary playlet, thus in a way bringing into the household the spirit of rebirth and joy that was being enacted. The most famous of such traditional entertainments was the Saint George play, which deals with a combat, a death, and a resurrection and concludes with a blessing, or wish for prosperity. Here is the end of a version that was performed at Christmas:

I am Father Christmas! Hold, men, hold!
Be there loaf in your locker, and sheep in your fold,
A fire on the hearth, and good luck for your lot,
Money in your pocket, and a pudding in the pot!

As the discussion of Shakespeare's comedies will indicate, the overall movement is from a troubled or deathlike state (for example, at the beginning of A Midsummer Night's Dream if Egeus' daughter will not obey her father the law may sentence her "to death, or to a vow of single life") to a state of prosperity, fertility, and joy, symbolized by a feast, a dance, or especially, a marriage. Other common folk rituals, such as midsummer festivities, in which revelers ignited torches at a "blessing fire" and then carried them home to bring good luck to the household, also left their mark on Shakespeare's plays. Again A Midsummer Night's Dream affords an example: in celebrating a marriage the King and Queen of Fairies "through the house give glimmering light." Other festivities included May games, especially the Whitsun pastorals, which Shakespeare alludes to in A Winter's Tale (IV.iv). May Day activities involved the choice of a Queen of the May or of a Maid Marian; the Queen was given a garland and then entertained by songs, dances, and a procession, sometimes of persons disguised as the Nine Worthies, whom Shakespeare introduces in a show in Love's Labor's Lost. May Day invariably attracted more formal plays, such as two anonymous plays on Robin Hood, printed about 1560 and said by the publisher to be "very proper to be played in May games."

A second dramatic form, related to the folk rituals and plays because it too was probably derived from primitive celebrations of a life-giving power, was an aristocratic entertainment which the Middle Ages called a "disguising" and the Renaissance called a "masque." In these entertainments courtiers amused themselves and sought to express in allegory a high ideal—in Ben Jonson's words, to "lay hold on more removed mysteries"—by dressing up, for example, as shepherds or Moors or Russians, entering a great household, performing a dance which was sometimes interpreted by a narrator, or Presenter, and then (in a part known as "the revels") dancing with the ladies. Here too, in the movement from surprise or uncertainty to the celebration of the life-giving force of the powerful person in whose honor the masque was held, is an implication of fertility, or at least of a united society. Shakespeare never wrote a court masque, but some of his plays include scenes in which characters engage in a masque. In Love's Labor's Lost the king and three courtiers, intending "to parle, to court and dance," disguise themselves as Russians when they visit the ladies. Henry VIII includes an episode that occurred in 1530 when Henry and some of his courtiers, dressed as shepherds (but splendidly), visited Anne Bullen at Cardinal Wolsey's palace: "Hautboys. Enter king and others, as masquers, habited like shepherds. . . . They pass directly before the cardinal, and gracefully salute him." The chamberlain, acting as the Presenter, explains:

Because they speak no English, thus they prayed
To tell your grace: that having heard by fame
Of this so noble and so fair assembly
This night to meet here, they could do no less
(Out of the great respect they bear to beauty)
But leave their flocks and, under your fair conduct,
Crave leave to view these ladies and entreat
An hour of revels with 'em. (I.iv.65-72)

After the cardinal grants them their wish, the revels begin: "Choose ladies; King and Anne Bullen," and then "Music. Dance." Similarly, in Much Ado About Nothing Don Pedro and his nobles enter masked and dance with the ladies. In Timon of Athens Timon, a monarch and spirit of generosity who sustains the city, presides over a masque of Amazons. After a trumpet call announces Cupid, the Presenter, who explains that Timon is much beloved, there is a "Masque of ladies as Amazons, with lutes in their hands, dancing and playing." Then "The lords rise from the table, with much adoring of Timon, and to show their love, each singles out an Amazon, and all dance, men with women, a lofty strain or two to the hautboys, and cease" (I.ii). Closely related to these courtly disguisings were spectacular entertainments in great houses, celebrating an event such as a noble wedding. In The Tempest Prospero conjures up a masque of goddesses to celebrate an impending marriage. But the dissolution of this show—when Prospero remembers the plot against him and the masque abruptly vanishes—is different from the dissolution of a masque. When a court masque dissolves, the aristocratic performers join the audience, and the virtues represented in the masque are thus symbolically bestowed upon the audience; but Prospero's show abruptly dissolves, occasioning his remarks on the transience or insubstantiality of all substance (IV.i.148 ff.).

A third kind of dramatic activity that survived from the Middle Ages into Shakespeare's youth was the miracle play. (Some scholars distinguish between plays based on saints' lives and plays based on biblical episodes, calling the former miracle plays and the latter mystery plays. However, no medieval English play was in its own time called a mystery play.) By the end of the fourteenth century vast cycles of plays, performed in the streets and sponsored by the craft guilds, had developed. In a sense, a cycle is one great play, consisting of as many as forty-eight small plays performed consecutively and covering the history of the world from the Creation through the Fall of the Angels, the Creation and Fall of Man, the Incarnation, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, and Judgment Day. These cycles were performed early in June on the feast of Corpus Christi. Because the cycle aims at celebrating the entire story of Christ, from his incarnation to his redemption of fallen man, it presents on the stage a remote past which is also an eternal present. In one play, for example, Christ instructs John the Baptist to preach to sinners, and so John turns to the spectators in front of him, establishing a bond between the world on the stage and the world of the spectators. This is not very different from, say, the moment in As You Like It when Duke Senior says—as much to the spectators as to the characters on the stage—"This wide and universal theater/Presents more woeful pageants than the scene/Wherein we play in" (II.vii.136-38).

This tendency to see the stage as intimately related to the daily world of the audience is not the only characteristic that binds the miracle plays to the Elizabethan drama. Although the overall plot of a cycle is "comic," in that it has a happy ending, it includes apparently "tragic" material, such as the murder of Abel and the Slaughter of the Innocents. Such episodes—especially those depicting savage tyranny destroying innocence and ultimately destroying itself or being destroyed by a higher power—probably helped to establish the context of such a scene as Macbeth's slaughter of Macduff's children. Moreover, the comprehensiveness of a miracle cycle's scheme, which required it to mix comedy and tragedy, bequeathed to the Renaissance stage a tradition of mixing the genres. This tradition of mixed dramatic forms distressed those who knew something of classical drama: shortly before Shakespeare began to write for the theater, Sir Philip Sidney lamented that the playwrights of his age wrote "neither right tragedies nor right comedies" but, "mingling kings and clowns," wrote "mongrel tragic-comedy." Shakespeare's comedies continued this tradition; they often include threats of death and occasionally (in some of his last plays) death itself. Similarly, his tragedies include comic bits: there are clownish rebels in 2 Henry VI, a serious history play dealing with violent times, a comic murderer in Richard III, a comic gravedigger in Hamlet, a fool in King Lear, a drunken porter in Macbeth, and a comic rural fellow in Antony and Cleopatra. The murder scene in Richard III, I.iv, is very much in the seriocomic tradition of medieval drama. In the following speech, the Second Murderer has just told the First Murderer that he is determined to let their intended victim live:

FIRST MURDERER I'll back to the Duke of Gloucester and tell him so.

SECOND MURDERER Nay, I prithee stay a little. I hope this passionate humor [compassionate mood] of mine will change; it was wont to hold me but while one tells [counts to] twenty.

FIRST MURDERER How dost thou feel thyself now?

SECOND MURDERER Faith, some certain dregs of conscience are yet within me.

FIRST MURDERER Remember our reward when the deed's done.

SECOND MURDERER Zounds, he dies! I had forgot the reward.

FIRST MURDERER Where's thy conscience now?

SECOND MURDERER O, in the Duke of Gloucester's purse.

FIRST MURDERER When he opens his purse to give us our reward, thy conscience flies out.

SECOND MURDERER 'Tis no matter, let it go. There's few or none will entertain it.

FIRST MURDERER What if it come to thee again?

SECOND MURDERER I'll not meddle with it; it makes a man a coward. A man cannot steal, but it accuseth him; a man cannot swear, but it checks him; a man cannot lie with his neighbor's wife, but it detects him. 'Tis a blushing shamefaced spirit that mutinies in a man's bosom. It fills a man full of obstacles. It made me once restore a purse of gold that, by chance, I found. It beggars any man that keeps it. It is turned out of towns and cities for a dangerous thing, and every man that means to live well endeavors to trust to himself and live without it.

And so on, until they finally murder their victim.

As a child, Shakespeare could easily have seen a cycle of miracle plays. There were plays done at nearby Coventry, for instance, until 1581, when they were suppressed by ecclesiastical authorities who feared popery. But interest in the plays was probably waning by that date, for professional troupes offered better dramatic fare than the amateur companies of guildsmen offered.

A fourth kind of drama that survived into Shakespeare's youth was the morality play, in effect a dramatized sermon, which can be traced to the late fourteenth century. The miracle-play cycles are historical, dramatizing what happened; the morality plays use allegorical figures to dramatize man's chief moral dilemmas as he struggles in a world of deceitful appearances. In The Castle of Perseverance (early fifteenth century), for example, a character called Mankind is guided by such figures as Good Angel and Conscience in a struggle against the World, the Flesh, the Devil, the Seven Deadly Sins, and so on. Mankind yields to sin, repents, then relapses; Death enters, but dying Mankind calls for God's mercy, and (as we are told in an epilogue) he is forgiven and allowed to go to heaven. Despite its happy ending, then, the play dramatizes suffering and death in this world and thus approaches tragedy. Like The Castle of Perseverance, most of the extant morality plays are concerned with the battle for a man's soul (the psychomachia), and it is not far-fetched to see their influence in Shakespeare's plays. For instance, despite the example of the saintly King Duncan, Macbeth yields to forces of evil; Othello faces on one side "the divine Desdemona" and on the other the villainous Iago, who is often associated with diabolic images: late in the play, when Othello realizes that he has been tricked by Iago into murdering Desdemona, he seeks to learn of "that demi-devil/Why he hath thus ensnared my soul and body" (V.ii.300-01). Because the morality play dramatizes God's grace, its plot is not tragic; but in its depiction of men making moral decisions and becoming aware of the possible consequences of their mistakes, it approaches tragedy. The Second Murderer's speeches in Richard III, quoted earlier, evoke the morality play in the Murderer's wavering between repentance and evil-doing, and in his allegorical conception of "conscience." A thoroughly comic version of such a conflict is found in The Merchant of Venice in Gobbo's monologue:

The fiend is at mine elbow and tempts me, saying to me, "Gobbo, Launcelot Gobbo, good Launcelot," or "good Gobbo," or "good Launcelot Gobbo—use your legs, take the start, run away." My conscience says, "No. Take heed, honest Launcelot; take heed, honest Gobbo," or as aforesaid, "honest Launcelot Gobbo, do not run. . . ." Well, my conscience hanging about the neck of my heart says very wisely to me, "My honest friend Launcelot, being an honest man's son"—or rather an honest woman's son, for indeed my father did something smack, something grow to, he had a kind of taste—Well, my conscience says, "Launcelot, budge not." "Budge," says the fiend. "Budge not," says my conscience. "Conscience," say I, "you counsel well." "Fiend," say I, "you counsel well." . . . The fiend gives the more friendly counsel. I will run, fiend; my heels are at your commandment, I will run.

(II.ii.2-30)

Although most morality plays show such an inner battle, some are concerned primarily with the coming of death (notably, Everyman); others are concerned with political controversy and thus bear some resemblance to Shakespeare's history plays. All the extant moralities except Everyman include a good deal of comedy, ranging from physical buffoonery and coarse puns to witty satire, thus continuing the miracle-play tradition of "mongrel tragic-comedy." The chief trickster is the Vice, and if Iago is a tragic descendant of that seducer of mankind, the mischievous fools and clowns in Shakespeare's comedies are at least to some degree his comic descendants. In Twelfth Night Feste explicitly refers to the Vice:

I am gone, sir.
And anon, sir,
I'll be with you again,
In a trice,
Like to the old Vice,
Your need to sustain.
Who with dagger of lath,
In his rage and his wrath,
Cries "Ah ha" to the devil.
Like a mad lad,
"Pare thy nails, dad."
Adieu, goodman devil.

(IV.ii.122-33)

A quotation from one Ralph Willis, who was born the same year as Shakespeare, gives us a good idea of the morality plays and their impact:

In the City of Gloucester the manner is (as I think it is in other like corporations) that when players of interludes come to town, they first attend the Mayor to inform him what nobleman's servants they are, and so to get license for their public playing; and if the Mayor like the actors, or would show respect to their lord and master, he appoints them to play their first play before himself and the Aldermen and Common Council of the City; and that is called the Mayor's Play, where everyone that will comes in without money, the Mayor giving the players a reward as he thinks fit to show respect unto them. At such a play, my father took me with him, and made me stand between his legs, as he sat upon one of the benches where we saw and heard very well. The play was called The Cradle of Security, wherein was personated a king or some other great prince with his courtiers of several kinds, amongst which three ladies were in special grace with him; and they keeping him in delights and pleasures, drew him from his graver counsellors, hearing of sermons, and listening to good counsel, and admonitions, that in the end they got him to lie down in a cradle upon the stage, where these three ladies joining in a sweet song rocked him asleep, that he snorted again, and in the meantime closely conveyed under the cloths where withall he was covered, a vizard like a swine's snout upon his face, with three wire chains fastened thereunto, the other end whereof being held severally by those three ladies, who fall to singing again, and then discovered his face, that the spectators might see how they had transformed him, going on with their singing. While all this was acting, there came forth of another door at the farthest end of the stage two old men, the one in blue with a sergeant-at-arms his mace on his shoulder, the other in red with a drawn sword in his hand, and leaning with the other hand upon the other's shoulder, and so these two went along in a soft pace round about by the skirt of the stage till at last they came to the cradle, when all the court was in greatest jollity, and then the foremost old man with his mace struck a fearful blow upon the cradle; whereat all the courtiers with the three ladies and the vizard all vanished; and the desolate Prince starting up barefaced, and finding himself thus sent for to judgment, made a lamentable complaint of his miserable case, and so was carried away by wicked spirits. This Prince did personate in the moral the wicked of the world; the three ladies pride, covetousness, and luxury; the two old men, the end of the world and the last judgment. This sight took such impression in me that when I came towards man's estate, it was fresh in my memory as if I had seen it newly acted.

Three things of special interest should be noted here. First are Willis' opening remarks, which give us an idea of the procedures governing a theatrical company in the provinces. Second is the fact that in the punishment of a wicked "desolate Prince" the play anticipates some of the stuff of Elizabethan histories and tragedies. Third, and most important, is Willis' view of the play: today we tend to think of allegorical drama as lifeless, but it made a lasting impression on Willis, who saw it chiefly as a play about people—a king, ladies, counselors, and so on—and only in his final summary as allegory.

As Willis' account indicates, in the sixteenth century the morality play was performed by professionals. The morality play was closely related to a type called the "interlude," a short play, often with the structure, characters, and comedy of a morality play, that was performed in a great house, especially during a holiday season. Possibly the chief difference is that an interlude is usually shorter and requires fewer characters than a morality play. (The name interlude seems to suggest that the play was performed between two parts of a banquet.) The morality play abounds in vigorous men of this world, and it is not surprising that in the sixteenth century there were many short plays in which exuberant worldly characters are the center of interest: these plays, performed as entertainments in a banquet-hall, sometimes became essentially a dramatized joke rather than a dramatized sermon, and then of course the distinction between interlude and morality play becomes clear.

A fifth kind of theatrical activity that exerted an influence on Shakespeare was the drama of the schools and universities. In the sixteenth century students read Roman drama and occasionally performed it. Schoolmasters, with Roman plays in mind, wrote plays to help their students improve their enunciation, poise, and skill in disputation. Neo-Latin as well as English plays were written, and though no academic drama has much literary or theatrical excellence, the fact that in Shakespeare's day some university graduates wrote for the popular stage indicates that the academic drama exerted at least some influence on the popular drama. (The specific influences of Plautus and Terence on comedy, and of Seneca on tragedy, are discussed on pp. 33-34, 55-56.)

Brief mention should be made here of the professional drama of Shakespeare's immediate predecessors and contemporaries, notably John Lyly, Thomas Kyd, and Christopher Marlowe. Lyly's rather precious comedies, performed by a children's company chiefly in the 1580's, with their formal groupings and elegant witty debates and with their contrasts between scenes of delightfully absurd romantic lovers and scenes of low comedy, must have helped Shakespeare—and yet Shakespeare's comedy is distinctively his own, more humane, less allegorical, less satirical, less stiff than Lyly's, and more thoughtful and better articulated than anything on the earlier popular stage. Similarly, through about 1589 Kyd apparently gave English popular tragedy a strong sense of a coherent plot (for example, ironically juxtaposed scenes instead of more loosely connected episodes), and Marlowe from about 1589 until his death in 1593 gave English tragedy heroes who speak a splendid blank verse worthy of heroes. These two writers themselves were deeply indebted to earlier dramatic traditions, Kyd to Senecan drama and Marlowe to the morality play. Shakespeare's achievement soon became distinctive, indebted to but far outstripping his early contemporaries. The drama of Shakespeare's age is discussed in the sections on Shakespeare's comedies, tragedies, and histories, but for the moment it may be amusing to hear Stephen Gosson's puritanical attack on these genres as they existed six or eight years before Shakespeare set to work, when romances, continental short fiction (novelle), and chronicles provided much of the stuff of popular drama. The passages are all from Gosson's Plays Confuted in Five Actions (1582). First, Gosson on comedy, which he sees as immoral. Judging from the plays that survive, it may be said that Gosson grossly overstates the immorality, but he gives us a fair sense of the chief theme of much comedy:

The groundwork of comedies is love, cozenage, flattery, bawdry, sly conveyance of whoredom; the persons, cooks, queans, knaves, bawds, parasites, courtezans, lecherous old men, amorous young men. . . . Comedies so tickle our senses . . . that they make us lovers of laughter and pleasure without any mean. . . . What schooling is this?

Next, Gosson on tragedy, which he sees not as valuable but as debilitating. Again he gives us a sense of the chief action:

The beholding of troubles and miserable slaughters that are in tragedies drive us to immoderate sorrow, heaviness, womanish weeping and mourning, whereby we become lovers of dumps, and lamentation, both enemies to fortitude.

Finally, Gosson on history plays, which he sees as distortions of history and therefore vicious. His observations are surely right, though his implications are surely wrong:

If a true history be taken in hand, it is made like our shadows, longest at the rising and falling of the sun, shortest of all at high noon. For the poets drive it most commonly unto such points as may best show the majesty of their pen in tragical speeches, or set the hearers agog with discourses of love, or paint a few antics to fit their own humors with scoffs and taunts, or wring in a show to furnish the stage when it is too bare. When the matter of itself comes short of this, they follow the practice of the cobbler, and set their teeth to the leather to pull it out. So was the history of Caesar and Pompey, and the play of the Fabii at the Theater, both amplified there, where the drums might walk or the pen ruffle. When the history swelled and ran too high for the number of the persons that should play it, the poet with Proteus [that is, Procrustes] cut the same fit to his own measure; when it afforded no pomp at all, he brought it to the rack to make it serve.

Had Gosson written again some thirty years later, when Shakespeare had completed his career, he probably would have seen no reason to alter his words. To a hostile eye, Shakespeare would only seem to be doing better what his predecessors had done (and therefore he was the more dangerous). Subsequent pages will try to call attention to his distinction.

Style and Structure

Perhaps "style" would be enough because, if broadly and deeply conceived, it takes in everything: the choice of words and their arrangement in lines, metrics, prose rhythms, and even the choice of plots and of characters. Though style is often contrasted with content, as though it were a decorative treatment of meaning, it can be argued that style (for example, Latinate versus Anglo-Saxon diction, or the inclusion versus the exclusion of comic material in a tragic plot) is inherently part of the meaning. Cardinal Newman put it thus: "Thought and meaning are inseparable from each other. Matter and expression are parts of one: style is a thinking out into language."

Because Shakespeare was a dramatist, his style is a thinking out not only into language (which includes diction, grammar, images, meter, and rhythm) but also into costumes, sound effects, gestures, and even silences. The use of costumes as a part of the dramatist's language has already been discussed (pp. 11-12). To the examples of Hamlet's "inky cloak," which separates him from the opulently dressed courtiers, and the fresh clothing in which Lear is garbed after his madness, can be added the broader matter of disguises—for example, the monk's robe worn by Duke Vincentio in Measure for Measure and Rosalind's and Viola's male attire in As You Like It and Twelfth Night—which are removed at the ends of the plays, when the truth is at last revealed and the characters can again be fully themselves. In short, the removal of disguises says something.

Sound effects too communicate meaning. Perhaps the most obvious example is the sound of the storm in King Lear, which is a reflection of Lear's disordered kingdom, disordered family, and disordered mind. A little less obvious is the noise of cannon in Hamlet. Early in the play cannon are fired when Claudius drinks deeply, and the reverberation of the noise to the heavens suggests Claudius' power, vulgarity, and arrogance; later in the play Claudius again orders the cannon to sound, this time when he hypocritically drinks to Hamlet before the fencing match; at the end of the play the cannon are once again ordered to be fired, not by Claudius but by Fortinbras, and now in tribute to Hamlet, who has earned "the soldiers' music."

Gestures are also an important part of the dramatist's language. For example, King Lear kneels before his daughter Cordelia for a benediction (IV.vii.57-59), an act of humility that contrasts with his earlier speeches banishing her and that contrasts also with a comparable gesture, his ironic kneeling before Regan (II.iv.152). In the first act of Coriolanus Volumnia hopes that her son will defeat Aufidius "and tread upon his neck," but in the last act it is Aufidius who, according to the stage direction, "stands on" Coriolanus. Coriolanus also affords an example of the importance of dramatic silence; before the protagonist yields to his mother's entreaties (V.iii.182), there is this stage direction: "Holds her by the hand, silent." In Macbeth, when Macduff learns that his wife and children have been murdered, he is silent at first, as Malcolm's speech indicates: "What, man! Ne'er pull your hat upon your brows./Give sorrow words" (IV.iii.208 ff.). In the abdication scene of Richard II (IV.i), Richard speaks 132 lines against Bolingbroke's fourteen, and Bolingbroke's forbidding silence—which Richard comments on when he addresses the "silent king"—is part of Bolingbroke's character and part of the meaning of the play. A playwright's language, clearly, is not simply verbal language. Even an actor's position on the stage may have meaning. In Romeo and Juliet (III.v) the lovers share a scene "aloft," suggesting their exaltation. Romeo then "goeth down," and Juliet, looking down on him, prophetically says, "Methinks I see thee, now thou art so low,/As one dead in the bottom of a tomb."

Of course, when we think of Shakespeare's style we think primarily of his language, both the poetry and the prose. Although two of the plays (Richard II and King John) have no prose at all, about half the others have at least one fourth of the dialogue in prose, and some have notably more: Troilus and Cressida, one third; 1 Henry IV and 2 Henry IV, about half; As You Like It and Twelfth Night, a little more than half; Much Ado About Nothing, about three fourths; and The Merry Wives of Windsor, about nine tenths. All these plays were probably written between 1597 and 1602, what might be called (with exaggeration, of course) Shakespeare's "prose period." During this time Shakespeare was perhaps developing as a poet, learning how to make significant rather than unvarying use of poetry, and learning how to bring his language closer to an approximation of speech.

Today we perhaps think of prose as "natural" for comedies, but Greek, Roman, and early English comedies were written in verse. In fact, prose was not generally considered a literary medium in England until the late fifteenth century; Chaucer tells even his bawdy stories in verse. By the end of the 1580's, however, prose had established itself on the English comic stage with the plays of John Lyly, comedies that used an extremely patterned and figurative prose and that were designed for a courtly rather than a popular audience. In tragedy, Marlowe had made some use of prose, not simply in the speeches of clownish servants but even in the speech of a tragic hero, Doctor Faustus. With the notable exceptions of Lyly and Marlowe, however, dramatic prose before Shakespeare is scarcely memorable. It was normally used only for special circumstances: (1) letters and proclamations, to set them off from the poetic dialogue; (2) mad characters, to indicate that normal thinking has become disordered; and (3) low comedy, or speeches uttered by clowns even when they are not being comic. Shakespeare made use of these conventions (to the second group—mad characters such as Lear, Ophelia, and Lady Macbeth—can be added Lepidus when he is drunk in Antony and Cleopatra), but he also went far beyond them. He sometimes used prose for (4) cynical commentary, such as Thersites' remarks in Troilus and Cressida or Casca's report in Julius Caesar of Caesar's reluctant refusal of the crown (I.ii); (5) scenes of ordinary life, such as those of Prince Hal at his ease in the tavern in 1 Henry IV; (6) scenes of courtship, such as those between Beatrice and Benedick in Much Ado About Nothing, and Rosalind and Orlando (though Orlando does not realize that courtship is going on) in As You Like It, and even between King Henry and Katherine of France in Henry V. Moreover, sometimes a scene begins in prose and then shifts into verse as the emotion is heightened; or conversely, a scene shifts from verse to prose when a speaker is lowering the emotional level (as when Brutus speaks in the forum). Thus it is not enough to say that low characters speak prose, high characters speak verse; in Richard II, for example, the gardeners (III.iv) and the groom (V.v) speak verse, and in other plays monarchs often speak prose.

Nor is Shakespeare's prose prosaic, used only to represent ordinary conversation or to communicate necessary information. Hamlet's prose includes not only small talk with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern but princely reflections on "What a piece of work is a man" (II.ii). In conversation with Ophelia Hamlet shifts from light talk in verse to a passionate prose denunciation of women (III.ii), though the shift to prose here is perhaps intended to suggest the possibility of madness—at least Ophelia immediately concludes that Hamlet's "noble mind is here o'erthrown."

Below are examples of Shakespeare's prose, showing something of its structure and its range. The first is from Brutus' funeral oration in Julius Caesar:

Romans, countrymen, and lovers, hear me for my cause, and be silent, that you may hear. Believe me for mine honor, and have respect to mine honor, that you may believe. Censure me in your wisdom, and awake your senses, that you may the better judge. (III.ii.13-17)

Despite its apparent simplicity, this prose speech is elaborately constructed. Notice Brutus' use of isocolon (successive phrases or clauses of approximately equal length) in three successive sentences, each approximately equal in length and each with three clauses:

hear me for my cause,/and be silent,/that you may hear.
Believe me for mine honor,/and have respect to mine honor,/that you may believe.
Censure me in your wisdom,/and awake your senses,/that you may the better judge.

Notice, too, the rather complacent repetitions: "hear . . . hear," "mine honor . . . mine honor," "Censure . . . senses." Later in the speech there are alliterative lines: "base . . . be . . . bondman," "rude . . . Roman." The speech is fully in accord with Brutus' conception of himself as a man who balances things thoughtfully in his mind. But there is something repelling in the sixfold repetition (in forty-two words) of "me," "my," "me," "mine," "mine," "me."

Brutus' speech can be contrasted with a second passage, from Hamlet V.ii. When Horatio offers to make excuses if Hamlet wishes to avoid the duel with Laertes, Hamlet replies:

Not a whit, we defy augury. There is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come. The readiness is all. Since no man of aught he leaves knows, what is't to leave betimes? Let be. (V.ii.221-26)

Of the sixty-two words in the speech, only seven are of more than one syllable. On the whole the diction is colloquial (note especially "Not a whit"), but there is the solemn echo of the Bible ("special providence in the fall of a sparrow"), and the clauses are balanced. The speech is simple and meditative, yet strong-willed in the final "Let be."

There is no need here to quote examples of what are in effect comic prose monologues, such as Touchstone's speech on lying (As You Like It, V.iv.69-82) or Falstaff's discourse on honor (1 Henry IV, V.i.127-41). (A comic speech of this type—Gobbo's debate with his conscience—is quoted on p. 14.) What is especially worth noting is that although Shakespeare's characters occasionally utter the garbled chaos that is our daily talk—such as the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet, "Well, sir, my mistress is the sweetest lady. Lord, Lord! When 'twas a little prating thing—O, there is a nobleman in town" (II.iv.203-05)—for the most part even his lowest characters speak coherently, and each seems to speak his appropriate idiom. Here is the simple country fellow who tells Cleopatra that he has brought the asp with which she will commit suicide:

Truly I have him; but I would not be the party that should desire you to touch him, for his biting is immortal: those that do die of it do seldom or never recover.

(V.ii.245-48)

The clown has an odd idea of death, and he says "immortal" for "mortal"; yet Cleopatra does become immortal, and though the entire speech has an impressive coherence, it somehow conveys the clown's simplicity.

As has been mentioned, verse drama in England goes back to the Middle Ages, but truly poetic drama is probably no older than George Peele's The Arraignement of Paris (about 1580). For the most part the drama of the seventies presented such harrowing stuff as this passage from Cambises (about 1569), written in fourteeners, or pairs of rhyming lines of fourteen syllables each:

I feel myself a-dying now, of life bereft am I,
And death hath caught me with his dart, for want of blood
I die.

Thus gasping here on ground I lie; for nothing do I care;
A just reward for my misdeeds my death doth plain declare.

This passage is not meant to be comic, though it sounds rather like Bottom's words when he impersonates the dying Pyramus in A Midsummer Night's Dream (V.i).

By Shakespeare's day, however, rhyme no longer dominated poetic drama; a finer medium, blank verse, had been adopted. But before looking at Elizabethan unrhymed verse, a few things should be said about the chief uses of rhyme in Shakespeare's plays. (1) Emotional heightening at the end of a blank-verse speech is often indicated by a couplet (a pair of rhyming lines). (2) Characters sometimes speak a couplet as they leave the stage. (3) Except in the latest plays, scenes or acts fairly often conclude with a couplet, and sometimes, as in Richard II, I.i.18-19, the entrance of a new character within a scene is preceded by a couplet, which wraps up the earlier portion of that scene. (4) Speeches of two characters occasionally are linked by rhyme, most notably in Romeo and Juliet, I.v.95-108, where the lovers speak a sonnet between them; elsewhere a taunting reply occasionally rhymes with the previous speaker's last line. (5) Speeches with sententious or gnomic remarks are sometimes in rhyme, as in the duke's speech in Othello (I.iii.199-206) and the king's speech in All's Well That Ends Well (II.iii.126-45). (6) Speeches with sardonic mockery are sometimes in rhyme—for example, Iago's speech on women in Othello (II.i.146-58)—and sometimes conclude with an emphatic couplet, as in Bolingbroke's speech on comforting words in Richard II (I.iii.301-02). (7) Some characters are associated with rhyme—for example, the fairies in A Midsummer Night's Dream and to a lesser degree Faulconbridge in King John and Apemantus in Timon of Athens, though because Faulconbridge and Apemantus are given to mockery their rhymes perhaps properly belong in the previous category. (8) In the early plays, especially The Comedy of Errors and The Taming of the Shrew, comic scenes which in later plays would be in prose are in jingling rhymes. (9) Prologues, choruses, plays-within-the-play, inscriptions, vows, epilogues, and so on, are often in rhyme, and of course the songs in plays are rhymed. The play-within-the-play in Hamlet, for example, is written in an older style to set it off from the language of the play itself:

Full thirty times hath Phoebus' cart gone round
Neptune's salt wash and Tellus' orbèd ground,
And thirty dozen moons with borrowed sheen
About the world have times twelve thirties been,
Since love our hearts, and Hymen did our hands,
Unite commutual in most sacred bands. (III.ii.158-63)

The plays with the highest percentage of rhymed dialogue are (in decreasing order) Love's Labor's Lost, A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Comedy of Errors, Richard II, and Romeo and Juliet. Of these five, all but The Comedy of Errors were written about 1594-96, which is probably also the period during which Shakespeare wrote many of his sonnets. Most of the rhyme in Shakespeare's last plays (with the exception of Pericles) is not in dialogue properly speaking but in songs, choruses, or a masque (The Tempest). Broadly speaking, then, after the "prose period" of about 1597-1602 Shakespeare tended to use less and less rhyme in dialogue.

But it is neither prose nor rhyme that comes to mind when we first think of Shakespeare's medium: it is blank verse, unrhymed iambic pentameter (in a mechanically exact line, five feet, each foot with two syllables, every second syllable accented). The first speech in A Midsummer Night's Dream is an example of blank verse:

Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour
Draws on apace. Four happy days bring in Another moon; but, O, methinks, how slow
This old moon wanes! She lingers my desires,
Like to a stepdame, or a dowager,
Long withering out a young man's revenue. (I.i.1-6)

As this passage shows, Shakespeare's blank verse is not mechanically unvarying. Though the predominant foot is the iamb (customarily indicated by ~ /), there are numerous variations. In the first line the stress can be placed on "fair," as the regular metrical pattern suggests, but it is likely that "Now" gets almost as much emphasis; probably in the second line "Draws" is more heavily emphasized than "on," giving us a trochee (indicated by / ~); and in the fourth line each word in the phrase "This old moon wanes" is probably stressed fairly heavily, conveying by two spondees (each indicated by / /) the oppressive tedium that Theseus feels.

Blank verse, first printed in England in 1557 in Surrey's posthumously published translation of parts of Virgil's Aeneid, was first used in a play in 1561, in Thomas Sackville and Thomas Norton's Gorboduc. But if Gorboduc thus looks forward to Marlowe and Shakespeare, it also looks backward in its heavy alliteration, its tendency to use paired lines (much of it seems to be couplets without rhymes), and its formal balance, as the first speech of the play indicates:

The silent night, that brings the quiet pause
From painful travails of the weary day,

Prolongs my careful thoughts, and makes me blame
The slow Aurore, that so for love or shame
Doth long delay to show her blushing face.
And now the day renews my grievful plaint.

The first line introduces a favorite Renaissance device, a disyllabic adjective followed by a monosyllabic noun ("silent night," "quiet pause"); this device reappears in the next line ("weary day") and yet again in all but one of the following lines ("careful thoughts," "blushing face," "grievful plaint"). Elsewhere lines are often end-stopped (that is, there is a distinct syntactical pause at the end of the line), as the second speech in Gorboduc reveals:

My gracious lady and my mother dear,
Pardon my grief for your so grievèd mind,
To ask what cause tormenteth so your heart.

Alliteration is abundant: in the first speech "pause," "painful," "Prolongs," "slow," "so," "Doth," "delay," "day," "plaint"; in the second speech "gracious," "grief," "grievèd." In the late 1580's Marlowe changed all this, partly by somewhat reducing the amount of alliteration and partly by joining phrases and clauses with and so that a sentence ran to a dozen or so lines. Most important, Marlowe was a poet, not a versifier, and he gave to blank verse a richness that inevitably drew later poets to the form.

In Shakespeare's early plays much of the poetry is end-stopped, but he later developed the ability to write iambic-pentameter verse paragraphs (rather than lines) that give the illusion of speech. His chief techniques are (1) running the thought beyond the single line; (2) occasionally substituting another foot for an iambic foot; (3) varying the position of the chief pause within a line; (4) adding an occasional unstressed syllable at the end of a line, a so-called feminine ending; (5) and beginning or ending a speech with a half-line. In addition, Shakespeare's speeches often suggest the nature of the speaker, whereas in Gorboduc all the speeches sound alike, as though they issued from a single undefined mouth. In Hamlet the king ceremoniously—that is, rather formally—addresses his court in a long sentence whose meaning is suspended until near the end:

Though yet of Hamlet our dear brother's death
The memory be green, and that it us befitted
To bear our hearts in grief, and our whole kingdom
To be contracted in one brow of woe,
Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature
That we with wisest sorrow think on him
Together with remembrance of ourselves. (I.ii.1-7)

Later in the scene Claudius speaks more intimately:

And now, Laertes, what's the news with you?
You told us of some suit. What is't, Laertes?
You cannot speak of reason to the Dane
And lose your voice. What wouldst thou beg, Laertes,
That shall not be my offer, not thy asking? (I.ii.42-46)

Notice the short sentences and the ingratiating repetition of the name "Laertes," to whom the speech is addressed.

Notice, too, the shift from the royal "us" in the second line to the more intimate "my" in the last line, and from "you" in the first line to the more intimate "thou" and "thy" in the last two lines.

Guildestern's sycophantic speech to Claudius in III.iii is marked by windy repetitions ("holy and religious," "many many," "live and feed"):

Most holy and religious fear it is
To keep those many many bodies safe
That live and feed upon your majesty. (III.iii.8-10)

Hamlet, who has several styles in the play, uses a simple style in rejecting his friends' entreaties not to follow the Ghost:

I do not set my life at a pin's fee,
And for my soul, what can it do to that,
Being a thing immortal as itself?
It waves me forth again. I'll follow it. (I.iv.65-68)

Macbeth, distressed by the doctor's inability to cure Lady Macbeth and by the imminent battle, addresses some of his remarks to the doctor and others to the servant who is arming him. The entire speech, with its pauses, interruptions, and irresolution (in "Pull't off, I say," Macbeth orders the servant to remove the armor he has been putting on him), catches Macbeth's disintegration:

Throw physic to the dogs, I'll none of it.
Come, put mine armor on. Give me my staff.
Seyton, send out.—Doctor, the thanes fly from me.—
Come, sir, dispatch. If thou couldst, doctor, cast
The water of my land, find her disease
And purge it to a sound and pristine health,
I would applaud thee to the very echo,
That should applaud again.—Pull't off, I say.—
What rhubarb, senna, or what purgative drug,
Would scour these English hence? Hear'st thou of them?
(V.iii.47-56)

Duke Frederick in As You Like It is disappointed to find that a young man who has performed nobly is the son of an enemy:

I would thou hadst been son to some man else.
The world esteemed thy father honorable,
But I did find him still mine enemy.
Thou shouldst have better pleased me with this deed
Hadst thou descended from another house.
But fare thee well; thou art a gallant youth;
I would thou hadst told me of another father.
(I.ii.220-26)

Duke Frederick's lines are end-stopped, but the effect is not one of monotony. Rather, the regular pauses and the repetition of part of the first line in the last ("I would thou hadst") and the continual turning back ("But," "But") convey the tension of conflicting emotions and the speaker's unwillingness to let his spirit generously expand.

For the most part, the figures in the table are translations into percentages of the numbers given in E. K. Chambers, William Shakespeare, II, Appendix H.

Column 1 gives the total number of lines in the play, an inexact measure, of course, because the number of prose lines differs from edition to edition, depending on the width of the page and on the editor's decision as to whether a given passage should be printed as prose or as verse. For example, certain passages printed as prose in 1 Henry IV (such as III.i.3-11) are so rhythmic that they might be considered verse, and if printed as verse they would constitute a larger number of lines.

Column 2 gives the percentage of the play that is in prose, excluding those parts of the play that are not "normal" dramatic dialogue—such as prologues, epilogues, choruses, the plays-within-the-plays in A Midsummer Night's Dream and Hamlet, and the masque in The Tempest. As the table shows, the percentage of prose is relatively low for the early comedies—except for Love's Labor's Lost, which was probably revised six or seven years after it was written—and for the early histories. The percentage increases markedly in the later histories, written about 1597-99 (1 and 2 Henry IV and Henry V), and in the comedies written about 1598-1604. Most of the tragedies and the last plays make considerable use of prose, but not to the same extent as the later histories and comedies.

Column 3 gives the percentage of blank-verse dialogue in the play, again excluding prologues, epilogues, and so on.

Column 4 gives the percentage of rhymed dialogue in the play. Again, prologues, epilogues, and so on, are excluded (if such material were not excluded, many of the figures in this column would be higher). As has been mentioned (p. 18), with the exception of The Comedy of Errors the five plays with the highest percentage of rhymed dialogue were written in the middle nineties, which was probably also the period of the sonnets.

Finally the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet babbles in blank verse that Juliet will soon be fourteen years old:

Come Lammas Eve at night shall she be fourteen.
Susan and she (God rest all Christian souls!)
Were of an age. Well, Susan is with God;
She was too good for me. But, as I said,
On Lammas Eve at night shall she be fourteen;
That shall she, marry; I remember it well.
'Tis since the earthquake now eleven years;
And she was weaned (I never shall forget it),
Of all the days of the year, upon that day;
For I had then laid wormwood to my dug,
Sitting in the sun under the dovehouse wall.
My lord and you were then at Mantua.
Nay, I do bear a brain. (I.iii.17-29)

Blank verse, then, can be much more than unrhymed iambic pentameter, and even within a single play Shakespeare's blank verse often consists of several styles, depending on the speaker and on the speaker's emotion at the moment. Of course, much depends on the length of the speech: a speech of a single line has a different tone from a long speech, even though the metrical pattern in both is iambic.

One particular kind of dialogue, which Shakespeare used sparingly, deserves special notice. From the Roman dramatist Seneca the Elizabethans borrowed a device called stichomythia, the exchange of single lines (sometimes pairs of lines) in which the words of one speaker are picked up and tossed back by another, giving the effect of a duel with words. Stichomythia commonly makes use of figures of thought, or artful arrangements of words, such as repetition and antithesis. Here is a famous example from Hamlet:

QUEEN
Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended.
HAMLET
Mother, you have my father much offended.
QUEEN
Come, come, you answer with an idle tongue.
HAMLET
Go, go, you question with a wicked tongue. (III.iv.10-13)

Another departure from logical or literal usage common in Shakespeare (and in almost all poets) is the use of tropes, or figurative language. When Iago urges Roderigo to "poison [Othello's] delight" he is not advocating the literal use of poison, and when he urges Roderigo to "plague him with flies" he is suggesting not that Roderigo open a bag of flies in Othello's presence but that he somehow distress Othello with trivial, irritating things. The words are clearly not used in their literal or normal sense.

Shakespeare's early figurative language is sometimes ostentatious. The figures often seem to be tacked on, elaborate embellishments of an idea rather than the inevitable presentation of the idea itself. For example, Queen Tamora's lover in Titus Andronicus, an early play, describes the queen's good fortune thus:

Now climbeth Tamora Olympus' top,
Safe out of fortune's shot, and sits aloft,
Secure of thunder's crack or lightning flash,
Advanced above pale envy's threat'ning reach.
As when the golden sun salutes the morn,
And having gilt the ocean with his beams,
Gallops the zodiac in his glistening coach,
And overlooks the highest-peering hills;
So Tamora. (II.i.1-9)

The last five lines seem tacked on to the first four, an embellishment rather than an integral part of the speech.

Shakespeare's later figurative language appears more natural, less decorative, and more integral—though of course there are exceptions. The speech from Titus Andronicus quoted above is utterly different from Iago's "plague him with flies," where the figure is integral. This difference is not simply one of a short figure versus a long figure. When Othello in the last act describes himself as "one whose hand,/Like the base Judean, threw a pearl away/Richer than all his tribe" (V.ii.345-47), again the figure contains its own meaning rather than merely embellishing an earlier meaning. Othello is alluding either to Judas or to Herod, both enemies of Christ, and thereby indicates his appraisal of himself as a foe to goodness; he emphasizes the comparison a few lines later when he identifies himself with a pagan Turk. (Another text of Othello has "Indian" instead of "Judean," but either word implies separation from Christianity.)

Shakespeare's progress was something like Berowne's in Love's Labor's Lost. Near the end of the play Berowne says that he will forswear "taffeta phrases" and "Three-pile

Column 5 gives the percentage of run-on lines found in all pentameter lines (not total lines) in the play. In contrast to an end-stopped line, a run-on line does not have a natural or grammatical pause at the end. In the following passage from The Tempest only the second line is run-on:

Our revels now are ended. These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits and
Are melted into air, into thin air. (IV.i.148-50)

Because readers may disagree about which lines do not reasonably call for a pause at the end, the figures are somewhat subjective. Generally speaking, the later plays have a higher percentage of run-on lines than the earlier plays, in which each line tends to be a clause or a sentence.

Column 6 gives the percentage of verse lines with feminine endings, that is, lines concluding with an extra unstressed syllable, as in the first, fourth, and fifth lines of the following passage from The Tempest:

Was Milan thrust from Milan that his issue
Should become kings of Naples? O, rejoice
Beyond a common joy, and set it down
With gold on lasting pillars. In one voyage
Did Claribel her husband find at Tunis. (V.i.205-09)

Roughly speaking, the plays written during the second half of Shakespeare's career have a notably higher percentage of feminine endings than do the earlier plays. As in the preceding column, the figures in this column show a significant increase in the later plays. This increasing freedom with the blank-verse line is demonstrated in yet another way, not indicated in the table: speeches in the early plays relatively rarely end in mid-line, but in the later plays speeches that end in this way are very common.

hyperboles, spruce affectation, / Figures pedantical" and will substitute for them "russet yeas and honest kersey noes" (homespun woolen cloth). The expression "russet yeas and honest kersey noes" of course is itself as figurative as "taffeta phrases," and Shakespeare never abandoned figures, though he curbed his exuberance.

Figures commonly add sensory content—compare "plague him with flies" with "bother him with trivialities"—but of course not all sensory words are figurative. When Othello commands the Venetians to "Keep up your bright swords," the phrase "bright swords" refers literally (rather than figuratively) to the swords they are flourishing. All such sensory words, whether figurative or literal, can be called images, though there is a tendency in criticism to concentrate on figurative rather than literal images, neglecting, for example, the abundant literal talk about blood in Julius Caesar while dwelling on metaphors. One can deplore the neglect of the literal, especially in the study of drama, which involves people carrying swords, holding up bloody hands, and so forth, but one can understand why critics have tended to dwell on those images involving metaphors, similes, and the host of other figurative uses of language that are enumerated in handbooks of rhetoric.

There are at least three important uses of imagery: First, it can afford delight in itself, giving a sense of the nature of things. By saying "Keep up your bright swords" rather than "Calm yourselves" or "Do not fight," Othello gives us a rich sense of the concrete world—both its singularity and its multiplicity. As Coleridge said, Shakespeare "by metaphors and figures involves in the thing considered a universe of past and possible experiences." At the end of the first scene in Hamlet Horatio talks of the coming of the dawn:

But look, the morn in russet mantle clad
Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastward hill.

(I.i.166-67)

Horatio's lines tell us of the time of day, but the images serve a further dramatic purpose. The scene begins at midnight, and is full of uncertainties, including two harrowing encounters with a ghost; then it becomes early morning, and the suggestion of light implies the coming of order and harmony. But the image of "in russet mantle clad" precisely qualifies this light: dawn is personified not as the bright and sunny Aurora but as a peasant in his workaday mantle of coarse grayish-brown material. The morning and the daily business of living dispel the darkness, but full light has not yet come to the shadowy tragic world. There is, then, something sharp and precisely right (and therefore delightful) about the description of this particular kind of morning. We may never have noticed such a morning, and the image serves to enrich our sense of the world.

Second, imagery can help to characterize the speaker. Not every line and image in Shakespeare does this, of course. The passage just quoted from Hamlet is not especially typical of Horatio's manner. If we were to look for lines that characterize Horatio, we would probably choose less "poetic" or lyrical and more ironic lines, such as his dry "a truant disposition," when Hamlet asks him why he is not at the university. Horatio's speech about the dawn exists not to reveal anything about Horatio but to tell us about the time of the day and the particular quality of the morning, and to balance the appearance of the Ghost with a sense of nature's divinity. But innumerable images in Shakespeare do help to define character. The tragic heroes, for example, often speak in hyperbole, a figure appropriate to their greatness. Othello says that were it not for the love of Desdemona he would not confine himself "for the sea's worth"; nine months gone by are "nine moons wasted"; caves are "anters vast"; waves are "hills of seas Olympus-high." Iago says that Othello brags and tells "fantastical lies," but this is a villain's cynical view, unsupported by anything else in the play. Against Othello's hyperbolic and exotic language are Iago's figures that diminish men. Iago's allusion to flies has already been noted; other animals are commonly in his mind: a faithful servant is an "ass," Othello is "an old black ram," Desdemona is a "white ewe," their offspring will "neigh," and the lovers "are making the beast with two backs." All these words occur in the first 115 lines of the first scene. In later scenes Iago alludes to women as wildcats, to Cassio and Desdemona as "goats, . . . monkeys, . . . wolves," and to a married man as "yoked" (that is, an ox). In contrast to Othello, Iago is the sort of man who sees people chiefly as sexual or stupid beasts. Interestingly, however, once Iago has succeeded in infecting Othello's mind, Othello too begins to use such images, speaking of "goats and monkeys," "toads," "aspics' tongues," "crocodile," and "flies."

Finally, images often help to define the theme of the play. (A few words about this third use of imagery are included in the discussion of images of rising and falling in Richard II on pp. 50-51 and in the discussion of images of light, dark, and speed in Romeo and Juliet on p. 57.) In Othello, diabolic images ("hell," "devil," "perdition") are at first associated with Iago and then, as Othello comes under Iago's power, with Othello. As S. L. Bethell points out in Shakespeare Survey 5, there are sixty-four such images in Othello. Of course, not all the occurrences are of equal significance—for example, the first diabolic image, Iago's assertion that Cassio is "almost damned in a fair wife," is trivial when compared with Iago's

I have't! It is engendered! Hell and night
Must bring this monstrous birth to the world's light.

But though the statistics must be interpreted with caution, they do add up to something. Here are Bethell's calculations. First, the diabolic images steadily increase from the first act to the last: the figures for the five acts are 10, 11, 13, 14, and 16, respectively. Furthermore, the disposition of these images according to speaker is interesting. As Bethell explains,

Iago has only his fair proportion of diabolic imagery, yet we undoubtedly gain the impression that in this play the theme of hell, as it were, originates with him and is passed to Othello later as Iago succeeds in dominating his mind. Statistics show this impression to be well-founded. In Act I Iago has eight diabolic images and Othello none; in Act II he has six and Othello one. The change comes in Act III, where Iago drops to three and Othello rises to nine. In Act IV Iago has only one while Othello has ten, and in Act V Iago has none and Othello six. It all begins, then, with Iago.

These images, of course, help to define the speakers: Iago is a nasty figure given (like the devil) to destructiveness; Othello is a man who at least for a while becomes his instrument. But the images also go beyond character and help to define the theme: on one level Othello is a domestic tragedy, a play about a man who kills his wife; on another level it is about the mysterious power of evil, of the sort associated with the devil—an evil that hates what is good (Coleridge aptly speaks of Iago's "motiveless malignity") and sometimes brings it to material and spiritual destruction. (One need not, however, argue that Othello is damned. When at the end of the play Othello reaffirms his love for Desdemona and executes justice on himself, he shows that Iago has not corrupted him. The play does not have a sixth act, set in the next world. But the images do help to suggest that the conflict has a spiritual dimension.)

Another example of imagery that goes beyond characterization and helps to establish theme is the storm imagery in King Lear. A storm literally takes place in the middle of the play, but the storm also has symbolic implications. As early as I.ii Gloucester speaks of disturbances in nature and of "all ruinous disorder"; Lear calls down "Blasts and fogs" (I.iv.301) and the "nimble lightnings" (II.iv.162) upon Goneril. As the break with his only remaining daughter, Regan, is widened and Lear is almost driven to madness, the stage direction "Storm and tempest" appears (II.iv.280), followed in three lines by Lear's explicit fear that he "shall go mad." Thus, as has already been mentioned, the chaos in Lear's family, the chaos in nature, and the chaos in Lear's mind are all linked. A few lines later Cornwall says that it is "a wild night," and still later we see the deranged Lear in a stormy, deranged world. Lear himself equates the macrocosm and the microcosm, the great world and the little world of man, when he speaks of "the tempest in my mind." Only a few of the storm images have been commented on here; but the more one studies the play the more one sees that the images are not decorative but integral; if they were removed from the play, and if the storm itself were removed, King Lear would say something entirely different.

Of course, no spectator can be fully aware of all the implications of all Shakespeare's images; nor can a reader be, unless he takes notes line by line. Shakespeare himself probably was not conscious of the patterns of images he created, and he would have been surprised by Bethell's statistics on Othello or by a list of the storm images in King Lear. But if these statistics would have surprised him, it is probably only because he did not put the images in one by one; rather, he imagined his characters and his plots and his themes so fully that the images inevitably came in the speeches. Though we may be unaware of them, the images, both figurative and literal (as for instance the blood in Julius Caesar), have a profound effect; they work along with the nonverbal imagery of visible stage properties, gestures, and costumes (see pp. 11-12 and 16 for a discussion of such imagery).

When we think of a play, however—unless we have been corrupted by education—we first think not of images or themes but of characters and plot. Shakespeare's powers of characterization are so great that we may sometimes feel, like Alexander Pope, that "had all the speeches been printed without the names of the persons, I believe one might have applied them with certainty to every speaker."

Of course, as we have seen, this is not always true, partly because Shakespeare was sometimes concerned not with characterization but with establishing (for example) time or locale and partly because a good many First and Second Gentlemen have no character. Moreover, sometimes part of the point is that the characters are not distinct. The lovers in A Midsummer Night's Dream, all of whom quite naturally think that their experiences are unique, often sound very much alike, and this similarity—this uniformity of which the lovers are comically unaware—is surely part of Shakespeare's meaning. On the whole, however, Shakespeare's characters do have a roundness, an identity.

What a character is depends on at least two things: what he says and does, and what other characters say about him and what they do. We have already seen how prose and verse reveal character. Relationships between characters also perform this function, as can be seen by an illustration from Hamlet. Like Hamlet, Laertes has lost his father. Hamlet has a chance to avenge his father's death when Claudius is praying (III.iii), but he passes it by; Laertes says that if his father's killer were within reach, he would "cut his throat i' th' church" (IV.vii); Hamlet feels "the dread of something after death" (III.i); Laertes says "Conscience and grace to the profoundest pit! I dare damnation" (IV.v); and so on. Laertes is prone to action—but he is less scrupulous than Hamlet and he easily becomes a cat's-paw for Claudius. As he is dying Laertes confesses, "I am justly killed with mine own treachery." If Hamlet is slow to act, it is at least partly because he is more imaginative than Laertes. What Hamlet is, then, is partly clarified by his contrast to Laertes, a young man who is also concerned about avenging his father's death. Fortinbras, another man with whom Hamlet is contrasted, is also fatherless; indeed, his father died at the hands of Hamlet's father. Fortinbras, of course, is not an avenger, but he can fight for a worthless patch of ground, while Hamlet, with an urgent cause, delays. But Fortinbras' very willingness to sacrifice thousands of lives "even for an eggshell" undermines the importance of action. A third character, the stoical Horatio, also helps to define Hamlet. Hamlet admires Horatio's dispassionateness (III.ii); yet this very dispassionateness makes Horatio a lesser figure, a man who presumably even in Hamlet's circumstances would not feel the heroic urge to see that justice is done. In short, what Laertes, Fortinbras, and Horatio are and what they say or do help to define what Hamlet is: he is first of all someone different from them. Of course the remaining characters—most notably Polonius, Gertrude, and especially Claudius, with whom Hamlet in effect is at war—also play a part in defining Hamlet's character.

Similarly, Shakespeare's plots are commonly organized so that scenes modify one another; thus the events, to apply Bottom's words, "grow to a point." For the Elizabethans, the "plot" was the groundplan of a play, a list of scenes posted backstage so that the actors could know when they would next be needed. In this sense, "plot" is to be distinguished from "story," which is simply the gist of the narrative; thus all plays about, say, the death of Julius Caesar tell pretty much the same story, as do the history books. But a plot is the choice and arrangement of episodes. The first scene of Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, showing the tribunes rebuking the citizens, is not a necessary part of the story of Caesar's fall, but it is a part of Shakespeare's plot, for it introduces the motif of the mob's fickleness. Thus the oft-repeated notion that Shakespeare borrowed all his plots is false. He borrowed his stories, and arranged them into his own plots, selecting episodes and linking them into meaningful relationships. For example, like the first scene of Julius Caesar, the first scene of Hamlet is not essential to the story. Indeed, the talk about a possible war between Denmark and Norway proves to be a red herring, for no such war develops; and the Ghost reappears in Hamlet's presence, so it need not appear now. What function, then, does this scene have in the plot? Quite practically, of course, it gets the audience quiet before the main characters appear. In addition, the talk about the possibility of a war between Denmark and Norway introduces the web of doubt that stretches throughout the play, giving a sense of the difficulty of meaningful action in a world of uncertainty. Finally, the first appearance of the Ghost (I.i) makes us see everything in the following scene with a double vision. We listen to the assembled court, but we listen to it with a knowledge that none of the courtiers has. Thus, for example, we not only sense Hamlet's numbness when he speaks of the "weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable" world; we also know, as he does not, that a spiritual principle is active in it.

In short, each scene adds an increment to the story, but each scene also modifies all that has come before it, developing our understanding of what is happening and our understanding of the characters. As the example from Hamlet shows, a scene that appears to be unnecessary may contribute to the point; one is almost tempted to say that in Shakespeare when something seems to be unnecessary and therefore unimportant it must be very important indeed. Macbeth provides another example. When Macduff and Malcolm are at the English court (IV.iii), the action seems to stop. But this scene has several important functions: (1) Malcolm's suspicion of Macduff shows the enormous suspicion that Macbeth's tyranny has engendered; (2) Malcolm's dissembling is for a good purpose, in contrast to Macbeth's, which is for a wicked purpose; (3) Malcolm's enumeration of "the king-becoming graces," such as "justice, verity, temp'rance, stableness," tells us what Macbeth lacks; (4) the English king's miraculous healing of the sick suggests that a rightful king has a divine power that makes his country wholesome, whereas Macbeth, a usurper, has brought "disease" to Scotland (V.iii.50-52); (5) the setting in England adds breadth to the play and suggests the infusion of new forces, which are

The interrelationships between stories can also be seen in A Midsummer Night's Dream, which is much more complicated in plot than Macbeth. There is the story of Theseus and Hippolyta, who will be married in four days; the story of the four young lovers; the story of Bottom and his fellow craftsmen, who are rehearsing a play; and the story of the quarreling fairies. All these stories are related, and eventually come together: the lovers marry on the same day as Theseus and Hippolyta; the craftsmen perform their play at the wedding; the fairies come to witness the wedding and bless it. One of the play's themes, of course, is love, as shown in the contrasts between the stately love of Theseus and Hippolyta, the changeable romantic love of the four young Athenians, the love of Pyramus and Thisby in the play that the craftsmen are rehearsing, the quarrel between the fairy king and queen, and even Titania's infatuation with Bottom. All these stories play against one another, sometimes very subtly, and sometimes explicitly, as when Lysander, having shifted his affection from Hermia to Helena, says, "Reason says you are the worthier maid" (II.ii), and Bottom in the next scene accepts Titania's love, saying, "Reason and love keep little company together nowadays." The nature of reason is also implicitly discussed in the play, in the numerous references to "fantasy" and "fancy," or imagination. There is scarcely a scene that does not touch on the matter of the power of the imagination. In the opening scene, for example, Egeus says that Lysander has corrupted Hermia's fantasy (I.i.32), and Duke Theseus tells Hermia that she must perceive her suitors as her father perceives them. The most famous of these references is Theseus' speech on "the lunatic, the lover, and the poet" (V.i). In addition to setting the time and place, the images help to define the nature of fantasy: there is an emphasis on night and moonlight during the period of confusion, and then references to the "morning lark," "day," and so on, when Theseus (the spokesman for reason) enters the woods and the lovers are properly paired (IV.i.104 ff.). The last scene reintroduces night, and the lovers have moved from the dark wood back to the civilized world of Athens, and the night will bring them to bed. The plot of A Midsummer Night's Dream, then, juxtaposes speech against speech, image against image, and scene against scene, telling not simply a story but a story that "grows to something of great constancy, . . . strange and admirable."

A Note on Shakespeare's English

PRONUNCIATION, ACCENTS, PUNS

From the philologist's point of view at least, Shakespeare's English is Modern English. It requires footnotes, but the inexperienced reader can often comprehend a substantial passage with very little help; on the other hand, for the same reader Middle English is a foreign language.

By the beginning of the fifteenth century the chief grammatical changes in English had taken place, and the final unaccented -e of Middle English had been lost (though it survives even today in spelling, as in name); during the fifteenth century the dialect of London, the commercial and political center, gradually displaced the provincial dialects, at least in writing; by the end of the century, printing helped to regularize and stabilize the language, especially spelling. Elizabethan spelling may seem erratic to us (there were dozens of spellings of Shakespeare, and a simple word like been was also spelled beene or bin), but it had much in common with our own spelling. Elizabethan spelling was conservative in that for the most part it reflected an older pronunciation (Middle English) rather than the sound of the language as it was then spoken, just as our spelling continues to reflect medieval pronunciation—most obviously in the now-silent letters in a word such as knight. Elizabethan pronunciation was closer to ours than to that of the Middle Ages, but it was not identical with ours.

There are two instances in which an awareness of the difference between our pronunciation and Shakespeare's is crucial: in accent, or number of syllables (many metrically regular lines may look irregular to us), and in puns (which may not look like puns to us). Explanations of puns and of syllabification are given in the glosses to the plays, but examples of both may be useful here. Some words that were at least on occasion stressed differently from today are aspéct, cómplete, revénue, and sepúlcher. Words that had an additional syllable are emp[e]ress, mon[e]th, and villain; words that had one less syllable than now are needle (pronounced "neel") and violet. An example of a pun that has become obliterated by a change in pronunciation is Falstaff's reply to Prince Hal's "Come, tell us your reason" in 1 Henry IV: "Give you a reason on compulsion? If reasons were as plentiful as blackberries, I would give no man a reason upon compulsion, I" (II.iv. 239-42). The ea in reason was pronounced rather like a long a, like the ai in raisin; hence the comparison with blackberries.

Puns, of course, are not merely attempts to be funny; like metaphors, they often involve bringing into a meaningful relationship areas of experience normally seen as remote. In 2 Henry IV, III.ii.239-40, when Feeble is conscripted, he stoically says, "I care not. A man can die but once. We owe God a death," punning on debt, which was the way death was pronounced. Here an enormously significant fact of life is put into simple commercial imagery, suggesting its commonplace quality. Shakespeare used the same pun earlier in 1 Henry IV, V.i.126, when Prince Hal says to Falstaff, "Why, thou owest God a death," and Falstaff wittily replies, "'Tis not due yet: I would be loath to pay him before his day. What need I be so forward with him that calls not on me?" Sometimes the puns reveal a delightful playfulness; sometimes they reveal aggressiveness, as when Hamlet replies to Claudius' "But now, my cousin Hamlet, and my son" with "A little more than kin, and less than kind!" (I.ii.65). These are Hamlet's first words in the play, and we already hear him warring against Claudius. Hamlet's "less than kind" probably means (1) Hamlet is not of Claudius' family or nature; (2) Hamlet is not kindly (affectionately) disposed toward Claudius; (3) Claudius is not naturally (but rather unnaturally, incestuously) Hamlet's father. The puns, evidently, were not put in as sops to the groundlings; they are an important part of Shakespeare's way of writing.

VOCABULARY

A chief difficulty in reading Shakespeare is the fact that some of his words are no longer in common use—for example, words concerned with armor, astrology, clothing, coinage, hawking, horsemanship, law, medicine, sailing, and war. (This technical vocabulary is also glossed in the plays.) Shakespeare had an immense vocabulary—something like 17,000 words—but it was not so much a vocabulary of "big" or learned words as a vocabulary drawn from a wide range of life, and it is partly his ability to call upon a great body of concrete language that gives his plays the sense of being in close contact with life.

Less overtly troublesome than the technical words but more treacherous are the words that seem readily intelligible to us but whose Elizabethan meanings are not identical with their modern meanings. When Horatio describes the Ghost as an "erring spirit," he is saying not that the ghost has sinned or made an error but that it is wandering. Here is a short list of some of the most common words in Shakespeare's plays which often (but not always) have a meaning other than their most usual modern meaning:

'a he; an, and if; accident occurrence; advertise inform; brave fine, splendid; censure opinion; cheer (1) face (2) frame of mind; chorus a single person who comments on the events; closet small private room; competitor partner; conceit idea, imagination; cousin kinsman; disaster evil astrological influence; doom judgment; entertain receive into service; envy malice; event outcome; excrement outgrowth (of hair); fact evil deed; fancy (1) love (2) imagination; fell cruel; fellow (1) companion (2) low person (often an insulting term if addressed to someone of approximately equal rank); fond foolish; free (1) innocent (2) liberal, generous; hap, haply chance, by chance; head army; humor (1) mood (2) bodily fluid (see p. 31); intelligence news; kind natural, acting according to nature; let hinder; lewd base; mere(ly) utter(ly); modern commonplace; natural a fool or an idiot; naughty (1) wicked (2) worthless; next nearest; nice (1) trivial (2) fussy; noise music; presently immediately; prevent anticipate; prove test; quick alive; sad serious; secure without care, incautious; silly innocent; sensible capable of being perceived by the senses; shrewd sharp; so provided that; starve die; still always; success that which follows; tall brave; tell count; tonight last night; wanton playful, careless; watch keep awake; will lust; wink close both eyes; wit mind, intelligence.

All glosses, of course, are mere approximations; sometimes one of Shakespeare's words may hover between an older meaning and a modern one, and as has been seen, his words often have multiple meanings.

ELLIPSIS, TRANSFERRED EPITHETS, HENDIADYS

Ellipsis, or the omission of words that are assumed to be understood, also causes difficulty occasionally, but most often it does not, as in "And he to England shall along with you," where "go" is understood. When read aloud an elliptical line often becomes clear. Other sources of slight difficulty are transferred epithets, as in "idle bed" for "bed of idleness," where "idle" is transferred from the person to the bed, and hendiadys, or the use of two nouns joined by a conjunction instead of a noun and a modifier, as in "with every gale and vary" for "with every varying gale" and "this . . . gentleness and course" for "this . . . gentle course."

GRAMMAR

A few matters of grammar may be surveyed, though it should be noted at the outset that because Shakespeare was a poet he sometimes made up his own grammar. As E. A. Abbott says in A Shakespearian Grammar, almost any part of speech can be used as any other part of speech: a noun as a verb ("He childed as I fathered"); a verb as a noun ("She hath made compare"); or an adverb as an adjective ("a seldom pleasure"). There are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of such instances in Shakespeare's plays, many of which at first glance would not seem at all irregular and would trouble only a pedant. But here are a few broad matters. The Elizabethans thought that the -s genitive ending for nouns (as in man's) derived from his; thus the line "Gainst the count his galleys I did some service" for "the count's galleys." By Shakespeare's time adjectives had lost the endings that once indicated gender, number, and case. About the only difference between Shakespeare's adjectives and ours is the use of the now-redundant more or most with the comparative or superlative: "This was the most unkindest cut of all." The greatest change was in pronouns. In Middle English the singular forms thou, thy, and thee were used among familiars and in speaking to children and inferiors; the plural forms ye, your, and you were used in speaking to a superior or to an equal with whom one was not familiar. Increasingly the "polite" forms were used in all direct address, regardless of rank, and the accusative you displaced the nominative ye. Shakespeare sometimes uses ye instead of you, but even in Shakespeare's day ye was archaic, and it occurs mostly in rhetorical appeals. Thou, thy, and thee were not completely displaced, however, and Shakespeare occasionally makes significant use of them, sometimes to connote familiarity or intimacy and sometimes to connote contempt. In Twelfth Night Sir Toby advises Sir Andrew to insult Cesario by addressing him as thou: "If thou thou'st him some thrice, it shall not be amiss" (III.ii.44). In Othello when Brabantio is addressing an unidentified voice in the dark he says, "What are you?" (I.i.91), but when the voice identifies itself as the foolish suitor Roderigo, Brabantio uses the contemptuous form, saying in line 93, "I have charged thee not to haunt about my doors." He uses this form for a while, but later in the scene, when he comes to regard Roderigo as an ally, he shifts again to the polite you, beginning in line 163: "What said she to you?" and so on to the end of the scene. Perhaps the most unusual use of pronouns, from our point of view, is the neuter singular. His was often used in place of our its, as in "How far that little candle throws his beams." But the use of a masculine pronoun for a neuter noun came to seem unnatural, and so it was used for the possessive as well as the nominative: "The hedge-sparrow fed the cuckoo so long/That it had it head bit off by it young." (In the late sixteenth century the possessive form its apparently developed by analogy with the -s ending used to indicate a genitive noun, as in book's. But its was not yet common usage in Shakespeare's day. It has been said that Shakespeare uses its only ten times, mostly in his later plays.) Other usages, such as "You have seen Cassio and she together" or the substitution of who for whom, cause no difficulty even when noticed. Verbs too cause almost no difficulty: the third person singular present form commonly ends in -s, as in Modern English, but sometimes it ends in -eth (Portia explains to Shylock that mercy "blesseth him that gives and him that takes"). Broadly speaking, -eth was old-fashioned or "literary" rather than colloquial, except for the words doth, hath, and saith. The -eth ending is very rare in Shakespeare's dramatic prose, though not surprisingly it occurs twice in the rather formal prose summary of the narrative poem Lucrece. Sometimes a plural subject, especially if it has collective force, takes a verb ending in -s, as in "My old bones aches." Some of our strong or irregular preterites (such as broke) have a different form in Shakespeare (brake); some verbs that now have a weak or regular preterite (such as helped) in Shakespeare have a strong or irregular preterite (holp). Some adverbs that today end in -ly were not inflected: "grievous sick," "wondrous strange." Finally, prepositions often are not the ones we expect: "We are such stuff as dreams are made on"; "I have a king here to my flatterer."

Again, none of these differences (except meanings that have substantially changed or been lost) causes much difficulty. But it must be confessed that for some elliptical passages there is no widespread agreement on meaning. The editors of the Signet Shakespeare have tried to resist saying more than they know, and when they are uncertain they have added a question mark to their gloss, inviting the reader to think of a better interpretation.

A Note on the Intellectual Background

In A Treatise on Money John Maynard Keynes discusses the inflation that continued throughout Shakespeare's lifetime and gave to all but the poorest Elizabethans a sense of "buoyancy" and "exhilaration." Keynes suggests that England was "just in a financial situation to afford Shakespeare at the moment he presented himself." Like all types of historical studies, economic studies of the Renaissance have their own value and interest, but one may question whether they shed much light on Shakespeare. That Shakespeare is of the Renaissance is undisputed, but that a study of the economic, political, or religious background of the Renaissance greatly illuminates Shakespeare is arguable. A good example is the matter of the discovery of the New World and the subsequent voyages which brought great wealth to England. Although The Tempest is derived in part from some writings on Bermuda, the play itself is set on an island in the Mediterranean, and its real roots are in the comic traditions of Roman drama, not in contemporary pamphlets. In Twelfth Night a casual reference is made to "the new map with the augmentation of the Indies," and that is about it. The shipwrecks in The Comedy of Errors, Twelfth Night, and other plays owe more to the late Greek romances and to Roman comedies than to Elizabethan exploration. Similarly it is dangerous to relate Shakespeare closely to the religious conflicts of his age. The Puritans are spoofed in a few plays, chiefly in Falstaff's parodies of them (for example, 1 Henry IV, I.ii.83 ff.), and the Jesuit infiltrators are briefly noted in a comic speech in Macbeth (II.iii.8 ff.). But we would scarcely know from Shakespeare's works how tense the religious situation actually was in his time. After the Act of Supremacy of 1534, which made the monarch the supreme head of the Church of England, the fear of Catholicism was so great that merely to harbor a priest was held to be an act of high treason; in Shakespeare's plays, however, Italy, the home of popery, is on the whole attractively presented, and a fair number of plays have benevolent friars. (People who do not understand that literature and life are not identical have tried to reconcile the apparent paradox by arguing that Shakespeare may have been a Roman Catholic.)

The attempts to relate Shakespeare closely to his age have caused difficulty on both sides. On the one hand, the allegedly typical ideas of the age, usually gathered from sermons, books on household management, and so on, are sometimes brought forth to interpret the plays, on the assumption that they help us to understand Shakespeare's attitude toward, say, Moors or Jews. But such a procedure fails to account for the possibility that Shakespeare's ideas were not commonplace. In addition, it fails to recognize that a play is not a sermon or a book on household management but an imaginative work that draws on literary conventions as well as on personal vision; that is, a play is designed to afford pleasure rather than to record facts or to move to action. Of course, an historical sense can shed some light on Shakespeare's age and can assist us in reading the plays intelligently, but our familiarity with Elizabethan treatises must ultimately be subordinated to our experience of literature as literature.

On the other hand, the plays have often been taken too seriously as historical documents. Juliet is fourteen years old, and so books on the Elizabethan period sometimes tell us that "girls often married at fourteen," but in fact Elizabethan marriage records lend almost no support to such a statement. There are some instances of betrothals between infants, but Elizabethan child marriages apparently were very rare.

Still, a few large ideas of the period do recur—with a good many modifications—in Shakespeare's works. One of these is the idea of order or degree. According to this view, everything except God has a superior. Beneath God the hierarchy is as follows: angelic creatures (pure intelligence), man (intelligence and "sense," or instinct, or feeling), animals (sense), plants (growth but no sense), inorganic matter (mere existence), and finally chaos. Within a given rank there are subhierarchies: just as God is the highest spiritual being, so the sun is the chief planet, the king is the chief human being, man is the superior of woman, the lion is the king of beasts, gold is the best metal. This idea of a hierarchical cosmos is older than Christianity, of course, but Christianity gave it additional support by sanctioning the idea of order: for example, Paul in Romans 13:1 said, "Let every soul be subject to the higher power," and in 13:7, "Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor." On a more humble level, the English rules of succession, by which even a distant cousin could succeed to a title, helped to give a sense of an enduring aristocracy.

It is evident that Elizabethan authorities were obsessed with inculcating the idea of order: sermons on the topic were officially prepared and appointed to be read in the churches, where attendance was supposed to be compulsory. Some of these sermons were very beautiful, tracing God's creation of order in the natural world ("The water above is kept and raineth down in due time and season"), in man ("Soul, heart, mind, memory, understanding, reason, speech, with all singular corporal members of his body [are] in a profitable, necessary, and pleasant order"), and in society ("Some are in high degree, some in low, . . . fathers and children, husbands and wives, rich and poor, every one have need of other, so that in all things is to be lauded and praised the goodly order of God"). When catechized, an Englishman affirmed his duty "to submit myself to all my governors, teachers, spiritual pastors and masters." Among Shakespeare's speeches on order are Luciana in The Comedy of Errors (II.i.16–25), Kate in The Taming of the Shrew (V.ii.148–81), the Gardener (III.iv.29–66) and Carlisle (IV.i.115–38) in Richard II, Canterbury in Henry V (I.ii.183–204), Ulysses in Troilus and Cressida (I.iii.78–136), and Menenius in Coriolanus (I.i.97–156). These speeches of course exist in dramatic contexts: a character preaches the doctrine of order because it suits his purpose at the moment, not necessarily because Shakespeare wished to propagandize for the status quo. Still, the idea of order appears so often in the plays that it is reasonable to say that it was much in Shakespeare's mind.

It is not really surprising that Shakespeare's plays include a good number of speeches on order. Drama is concerned with conflict, with the disruption of order—whether by tragic heroes, villains, ambitious politicians, or young people who fall in love—and its ultimate restoration. It is thus quite natural that the subject is discussed, as when the Duke of York urges Richard II not to confiscate Gaunt's estate but to let it descend in orderly fashion to Gaunt's son and heir, Harry Hereford:

Seek you to seize and gripe into your hands
The royalties and rights of banished Hereford?
Is not Gaunt dead? and doth not Hereford live?
Was not Gaunt just? and is not Harry true?
Did not the one deserve to have an heir?
Is not his heir a well-deserving son?
Take Hereford's rights away, and take from Time
His charters and his customary rights,
Let not tomorrow then ensue today;
Be not thyself. For how art thou a king
But by fair sequence and succession? (II.i.189–99)

Richard persists, and indeed disorder overcomes him. Hereford returns to claim his inheritance, and ultimately he forces Richard to abdicate the throne. But in the abdication scene the Bishop of Carlisle points out that Hereford's action too will engender consequences:

My Lord of Hereford here, whom you call king,
Is a foul traitor to proud Hereford's king;
And if you crown him, let me prophesy
The blood of English shall manure the ground,
And future ages groan for this foul act;
Peace shall go sleep with Turks and infidels,
And, in this seat of peace, tumultuous wars
Shall kin with kin, and kind with kind, confound;
Disorder, horror, fear, and mutiny
Shall here inhabit, and this land be called
The field of Golgotha and dead men's skulls.
O, if you raise this house against this house,
It will the woefullest division prove
That ever fell upon this cursèd earth!
Prevent it, resist it, let it not be so,
Lest child, child's children, cry against you woe.

(IV.i.134-49)

It is important to note, however, that conventional ideas of order are not always validated in the plays. Richard II is at times confident that the heavens will come to his aid because he is a divinely anointed king, and that such is the nature of things, but he is mistaken. Egeus in A Midsummer Night's Dream feels that he has the right to expect his daughter Hermia to submit to his choice of husband for her, and Duke Theseus supports Egeus. (Did not the Elizabethan catechism require a man to promise to "honor . . . my father . . . [and] to submit myself to all governors"?) Students of the Elizabethan background find support for this view from Robert Cleaver, who in A Goodly Form of Household Governance (1598) said that god-fearing children, having "considered what honor and obedience they do owe unto their parents and what power and authority He hath in His word sanctified unto them over their children," should "willingly submit themselves unto their [parents'] choice." But in the world of romantic comedy our sympathies are with young lovers, and the conventional idea of order here can only lead us astray if we insist that Hermia is morally culpable. To judge Hermia in A Midsummer Night's Dream or Jessica in The Merchant of Venice by Cleaver's doctrine is to value his treatise above the play, and to read the play as a treatise.

But though Duke Theseus' argument that Hermia must learn to see things as her father sees them is ultimately rejected by the play, the notion of authority and order in other forms has its truth. In large part a man's identity depends upon others: his ties to others make him what he is. A husband is not the same man that he was before he incurred the obligations and privileges of being a husband. So much is obvious. In the Renaissance, however, and in Shakespeare's plays, the idea had greater weight than we are likely to give it today. Every subject owed his allegiance to the monarch, who was also the supreme head of the Church of England, officially above statutory law, and by divine sanction the maker of law. The monarch demanded obedience; the subject confessed that obedience was his duty, and in large measure he derived his identity from this relationship. When the rebellious Essex heard the sentence of death pronounced upon him—hanging, castration, drawing, and quartering—he said that it was fitting that his "poor quarters, which have done Her Majesty true service in diverse parts of the world, should now at the last be sacrificed and disposed of at Her Majesty's pleasure." (Essex was given a more dignified death, on the block, when he confessed his faults and died in "humility and obedience.") Along these lines too is the oft-told story of John Stubbs, who had published a book arguing against the advisability of a marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou. For his impertinent opinions Stubbs had his right hand chopped off by a cleaver struck with a mallet. William Camden, who witnessed the punishment, reports that "after his right hand was cut off, [Stubbs] put off his hat with his left; and said with a loud voice, 'God save the Queen.'" Such was the power of identifying the self with the monarch and with the principle of order. Shakespeare makes almost no use of Queen Elizabeth in connection with this idea, except at the end of Henry VIII, where it is suggested that the birth of Elizabeth will bestow good on everyone around her, but over and over he suggests that a man's identity depends on a figure of authority. For example, in Henry V the three traitors confess their crimes to the king and seem immensely relieved to identify themselves with the system that condemns them to death. In Antony and Cleopatra after Woodcut from John Case's Sphaera civitatis (1588), showing Queen Elizabeth governing the spheres of state by divine right. This image of a well-ordered state is derived from pre-Copernican astronomy, in which a vast sphere, the primum mobile, held a series of concentric rotating crystalline spheres, in each of which was embedded a heavenly body. The primum mobile imparted motion to these heavens; in the center was the earth, unmoving.

Enobarbus deserts Antony and finds to his dismay that he no longer has any reason for living, he dies. Macbeth finds that by killing his king he had made life a horror. In the comedies, lovers gladly give themselves to their beloved, finding an identity in this new relationship by losing themselves. The idea, again, is not particularly Elizabethan, but it is perhaps more often expressed in Elizabethan than in later thought.

One particularly Elizabethan idea about man's nature—or rather, an ancient idea that lasted into the Elizabethan period but has not survived—is the doctrine of the four humors, or bodily fluids whose combination was believed to regulate a man's temperament (Latin temperamentum = mixture). There were four of these bodily fluids: blood, choler, phlegm, and melancholy. The Elizabethans believed that sudden changes in the mixture of fluids made a man moody, or “humorous,” like Duke Frederick in As You Like It (I.ii.262). A person with an abundance of blood had a sanguine disposition (Latin sanguis = blood) and a ruddy complexion and was probably plump and cheerful. A person with an abundance of choler, or yellow bile, was choleric or bilious (irritable) and probably tall and lean. Abundant phlegm, or mucus, found in fat people, made a man phlegmatic or sluggish. Melancholy, or black bile, found in lean people, made a man introverted and gloomy. Shakespeare often alludes to this system of psychology, as, for example, when Hamlet speaks of “some complexion/Oft breaking down the pales and forts of reason” (I.iv). Similarly, Hamlet and Guildenstern discuss the king's condition in these terms after Hamlet has caught Claudius' conscience with the play-within-the-play:

GUILDENSTERN The king, sir—
HAMLET Ay, sir, what of him?

GUILDENSTERN Is in his retirement marvelous distemp' red.

HAMLET With drink, sir?

GUILDENSTERN No, my lord, with choler.

HAMLET Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to the doctor, for for me to put him to his purgation would perhaps plunge him into more choler.
(III.ii.303-12)

The glosses to the plays provide all necessary explanations of such matters, as well as explanations of the astrological influences that were also thought to govern personality. (It is worth mentioning too that skepticism concerning astrological influences is most often voiced in the plays by cynics or villains, such as Cassius in Julius Caesar, Iago in Othello, and Edmund in King Lear.) Shakespeare drew upon this body of ideas, but we do not turn to Shakespeare for medical learning, or even for the medical learning of his age. We turn to him for something larger: in Ben Jonson's words, “He was not of an age, but for all time,” and in Samuel Johnson's words, his plays are works

. . . exhibiting the real state of sublunary nature, which partakes of good and evil, joy and sorrow, mingled with endless variety of proportion and innumerable modes of combination; and expressing the course of the world, in which the loss of one is the gain of another; in which, at the same time, the reveller is hasting to his wine, and the mourner burying his friend; in which the malignity of one is sometimes defeated by the frolic of another; and many mischiefs and many benefits are done and hindered without design.

THE BACKGROUND

The First Folio edition of Shakespeare's plays prints fourteen works under the heading “Comedies”; to these we can add Cymbeline, printed with the tragedies, and two plays absent from the Folio, Pericles and The Two Noble Kinsmen. Some editors add an eighteenth play, Troilus and Cressida (here discussed with the tragedies), printed in the Folio in unnamed territory between the histories and the tragedies.

If we look at Shakespearean comedy as a whole (and overlook a good deal) we see that generally speaking it is a comedy of young lovers who encounter difficulties but who are ultimately united; the plays follow the Renaissance formula for comedy, according to which, in the words of Shakespeare's fellow playwright Thomas Heywood, “comedies begin in trouble and end in peace.” Thus, in the first act of A Midsummer Night's Dream, Egeus appears:

Full of vexation come I, with complaint
Against my child, my daughter Hermia. (I.i.22-23)

Egeus wants Hermia to marry Demetrius, but she is in love with Lysander, and so Egeus calls upon the law, which holds that she must follow her father's will or suffer either death or life in a cloister. The play ends with Hermia marrying her beloved Lysander, Demetrius marrying a girl who dotes upon him, and a few other happy bits. In the words of Puck, who quotes “the country proverb”:

Jack shall have Jill;
Nought shall go ill;
The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.
(III.ii.461-63)

Similarly, at the start of The Merchant of Venice Antonio is mysteriously troubled, Bassanio is in financial difficulties, and Portia is unpleasantly confined by the terms of her father's will. At the end of the play all these problems are solved. The heroines of the comedies are liberated, and the plays regularly end with marriage:

Wedding is great Juno's crown,
O blessed bond of board and bed!
'Tis Hymen peoples every town;
High wedlock then be honorèd.
Honor, high honor, and renown
To Hymen, god of every town!

(As You Like It, V.iv.141-46)

As Northrop Frye has pointed out, Shakespeare often contrasts two worlds, not merely a world of age against a world of youth but an urban, troubled world against a more pastoral world, which Frye calls "the green world." In this world characters undergo a renewal and find what they are seeking: A Midsummer Night's Dream begins in Athens, the place of the quarrel between Egeus and his daughter, then moves into the moonlit forest, where wonderful transformations occur, and finally returns to Athens, which is no longer a place "full of vexation" but a "blessed" place full of "jollity." In The Merchant of Venice too there is a contrast (not in all details, but a contrast nevertheless) between Venice, the home of the unpleasant Shylock, and Belmont, Portia's estate, a place of music, beauty, and wooing. Like the woods outside Athens, Belmont is sometimes said to be moonlit. In The Merchant of Venice there is no final return to the urban world; but in those plays where there is such a return, the urban world seems to be transformed by the infusion from the green world. Corresponding to the renewal of society is the renewal of the individual; the individual usually finds what he wants and in doing so sometimes finds that he is freed from a misapprehension or constricting view. Thus at the end of The Taming of the Shrew Katherine discovers that she does not really wish to dominate men; at the end of As You Like It Duke Frederick and Oliver, finding that they do not wish to tyrannize good men, reform.

Broadly speaking, Shakespeare's comedies are romantic: they tell of the trials and the ultimate successes in love of aristocratic young people. Behind them are earlier Renaissance plays of courtship, adventure, wandering, and reunion, and behind these in turn is the medieval idea of the power of love to conquer and transform. In 1582 Stephen Gosson, a hostile critic of drama, irritably characterized the romantic plays of his age: "Sometime you shall see nothing but the adventures of an amorous knight, passing from country to country for the love of his lady, encountering many a terrible monster of brown paper. . . . What learn you by that? When the soul of your plays is either mere trifles, or Italian bawdry, or wooing of gentlewomen, what are we taught?" In A Midsummer Night's Dream Shakespeare himself affectionately alludes to the taste that wanted "the adventures of an amorous knight" when Francis Flute, a bellows mender, wonders if his part in the amateur theatrical will be "a wand'ring knight."

If we divide comedy into two sorts, romantic comedy (showing a dreamlike world of delightful lovers) and satiric comedy (showing a world of people who behave as we ought not to behave), Shakespeare's comedies, despite some satire of romance, belong to the former group. Even Prince Hamlet, when he hears that the players have arrived at Elsinore, thinks of the romantic type of play:

He that plays the king shall be welcome; his majesty shall have tribute of me; the adventurous knight shall use his foil and target [shield]; the lover shall not sign gratis; the humorous [eccentric] man shall end his part in peace; the clown shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o' th' sere [on hair trigger]; and the lady shall say her mind freely. (II.ii.327-33)

By Shakespeare's time, romantic plots—at least when handled by the better dramatists—were no longer the mere episodic adventures they had been in the seventies: daring fights against monsters of brown paper had been eliminated, but wooing continued, and the spirit of fun, surprise, and adventure remained. Shakespeare's slightly later contemporary, Ben Jonson, who preferred satiric comedy, compared romantic to satiric comedy in Every Man Out of His Humor. Jonson's first speaker prefers romantic comedy and rejects comedy that is "near and familiarly allied to the time," but the second speaker puts him in his place, rejecting the stuff of the popular stage and citing an ancient authority:

MITIS The argument of his comedy might have been of some other nature, as of a duke to be in love with a countess, and that countess to be in love with the duke's son, and the son to love the lady's waiting-maid: some such cross-wooing, with a clown to their serving man, better than to be thus near and familiarly allied to the time.

CORDATUS You say well, but I would fain hear one of these autumn-judgments define once, Quid sit comoedia [what is comedy]? If he cannot, let him content himself with Cicero's definition (till he have strength to propose to himself a better) who would have a comedy to be Imitatio vitae, speculum consuetudinis, imago veritatis [an imitation of life, a mirror of customs, the image of truth]; a thing throughout pleasant and ridiculous, and accommodated to the correction of manners.

Jonson is one with Gosson here, in the assumption that comedy teaches. His hostile description of what seemed to him a pointless chain of lovers is almost a description of Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, in which Orsino is in love with Olivia, Olivia is in love with Cesario (really Viola disguised as a boy), and Cesario-Viola is in love with Orsino. (There is no serving man who is a clown, but there is a clown.) Of course, within the romance there is occasional satire—satire not only of crabby impediments to love but even of love itself; yet curiously we do not think the less of the lovers for seeing their faults. When the heroine of As You Like It, Rosalind, disguised as a boy, learns that her beloved Orlando is nearby, she says:

Alas the day! What shall I do with my doublet and hose? What did he when thou saw'st him? What said he? How looked he? Wherein went he? What makes he here? Did he ask for me? Where remains he? How parted he with thee? And when shalt thou see him again? Answer me in one word. (III.ii.220-25)

But if we laugh at her, we also laugh with her, delighting in her wit, her gaiety, and her resourcefulness, all of which (clearly in evidence in other parts of the play when she herself mocks at love) suggest a golden world in contrast to the brazen world of satiric comedy.

When Rosalind leaves the court for the Forest of Arden, she goes to a place where "merry men . . . live like the old Robin Hood of England. They say many young gentlemen . . . fleet the time carelessly as they did in the golden world." The evocation of Robin Hood, the emphasis upon a joyous ("care-less") existence, and the reference to a golden world (Northrop Frye's "green world") suggest a life of play and a spirit of fun. Indeed, something of a holiday spirit is suggested by the very names of some of the comedies: A Midsummer Night's Dream, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night, or What You Will. The festive spirit is present everywhere, even in moments of strain. When Rosalind says, "How full of briers is this working-day world," Celia replies, "They are but burrs, cousin, thrown upon thee in holiday foolery." Festivity is of course especially evident at the end of a comedy, when all has been set right, and it sometimes extends even to the spoilsport who represents a threat to happiness in the earlier parts of the play. At the end of The Merry Wives of Windsor, for example, Sir John Falstaff, who has been humiliated by the two women he had sought to seduce, is invited to join in the fun, and even the jealous husband Ford agrees:

let us every one go home,
And laugh this sport o'er by a country fire;
Sir John and all.

FORD Let it be so. (V.v.240-42)

Like the characters in the play, the members of the audience richly enjoy themselves and return, vivified, from the world of "holiday foolery" to the "working-day world." In its spirit, Shakespearean comedy is thus close to the medieval folk plays performed at holiday time that concluded with a sense of renewal (see p. 12).

If Shakespearean comedy is indebted for much of its spirit to festive rites, it is indebted for some of its shape to the Roman comedy of Plautus (254?-184 B.C.) and Terence (190?-159? B.C.), which itself was indebted to the New Comedy of Greece. Old Comedy, represented by Aristophanes, though phallic and ending in a komos, or celebration of sexual union, is primarily satirical and political. New Comedy, represented by Menander (343?-291? B.C.) is of the boy-meets-girl sort, though it is not romantic by our standards because it deals more with sex and seduction than with love. In this type of comedy a young man wants a girl—often a slave girl—and with the aid of a clever slave outwits the pander who owns her and who sometimes plans to sell her to someone less attractive than the hero. In The Taming of the Shrew Grumio sums it up: "See, to beguile the old folks, how the young folks lay their heads together." Terence especially was much studied in Elizabethan schools, and he gave the Elizabethan dramatists—often at second or third hand—a sense of how to organize a plot. The late medieval cycle plays, which spanned time from the Creation through the Fall to the Last Judgment, established an episodic tradition, and this tradition, along with the medieval chivalric romances that were the sources of much romantic drama, makes most of the plays before the 1580's seem shapeless. But as the sixteenth century wore on, the professional drama became better established and came under the influence of men with considerable secular education. Had they had their way, some of these men would have turned the drama into lifeless imitations of ancient drama, and we can rejoice that the academic influence was never very great. But Roman and Italian plots helped to show dramatists how a plot might be organized. Theoreticians studying Terence developed the idea that a play has a five-act structure: in the first act there is a situation with tensions; in the second the conflict that is implicit in the first is developed; in the third the conflict is open, reaches a height, and seems to arrive at an impasse; in the fourth act things begin to clear up, and in the fifth act all knots are untied. Few if any of the English popular playwrights felt obliged to follow this formula, but the best playwrights probably did think in terms of an overall plot rather than a series of episodes. There is little that is obviously Plautine or Terentian about Shakespeare's best comedies, but this is not to say that he learned nothing from these Roman playwrights. It is quite evident from The Comedy of Errors, which may have been Shakespeare's first play, that he learned a good deal, though he was later to transform what he learned into something quite his own.

THE THREE EARLIEST COMEDIES:
THE COMEDY OF ERRORS,
THE TAMING OF THE SHREW,
THE TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA

It seems likely enough that Shakespeare began his career as a playwright—perhaps even before he went to London—by writing a play that closely resembles the Latin dramas that he would have read and perhaps acted in while in grammar school. The Comedy of Errors, though certainly more than an adaptation of Plautus, remains greatly indebted to Plautus' Menaechmi, a play about twins separated for most of their lives who after several episodes of mistaken identity at last meet and are reunited. Although the setting is bourgeois (an unusual setting for Shakespeare), there are elements in the play that foreshadow the later comedies. For example, the meter varies to suit the characters and the mood: about half the play is written in end-stopped blank verse (not surprising for a beginner); in addition there are prose, doggerel for the low comedy, and a few rhymed stanzaic passages, notably a lyrical (un-Plautine) passage in which Antipholus of Syracuse woos Luciana:

Sweet mistress, what your name is else, I know not;
Nor by what wonder you do hit of mine;
Less in your knowledge and your grace you show not
Than our earth's wonder, more than earth divine.
Teach me, dear creature, how to think and speak:
Lay open to my earthy-gross conceit,
Smoth' red in errors, feeble, shallow, weak,
The folded meaning of your words' deceit.
Against my soul's pure truth why labor you
To make it wander in an unknown field?
Are you a god? Would you create me new?
Transform me, then, and to your pow'r I'll yield.

(III.ii.29-40)

The notion that a woman is godlike and can transform a man is nothing that Plautus or any Roman comic dramatist would have thought of. Indeed, Luciana is Shakespeare's addition to Plautus' plot, an addition that enabled Shakespeare to end his play not merely with a family reunion but with the promise of a wedding.

Another important addition to Plautus is found in the first and last scenes concerning Egeon, the father of the twins. In The Menaechmi the father is dead; and when fathers do appear in classical comedy, it is to be outwitted, or at least to be laughed at. Drawing on the pseudo-Greek romance Apollonius of Tyre, which he was to use again late in his career in Pericles, Shakespeare began the play with a serious treatment of a despairing father sentenced to death, and concluded with the restoration of the father to his wife and children. The unanticipated appearance of the wife, who during the long separation has been an abbess, adds a hint of the miraculous or providential that is so evident in the later comedies, where it is often associated with rebirth or renewal. The motif of renewal is prepared for early in the play, when Antipholus of Syracuse says that as a lonely wanderer searching for his brother and mother he has lost his identity:

I to the world am like a drop of water
That in the ocean seeks another drop,
Who, falling there to find his fellow forth,
Unseen, inquisitive, confounds [loses] himself.
So I, to find a mother and a brother,
In quest of them, unhappy, lose myself. (I.ii.35-40)

The abundant subsequent references to witchcraft, which was believed to rob a man of his identity, continue the idea. In the fifth act the members of the family find each other and renew themselves, gaining a new life and a new sense of identity; this renewal is heightened for Antipholus of Syracuse, who is not only reunited with his family but also finds a woman who will become his wife. The sense of new identity appears also (as in Plautus) in the freeing of the slave, Dromio of Ephesus. (At the end of his career Shakespeare again uses this classical convention in The Tempest when Prospero frees Ariel.)

If there are great differences between The Menaechmi and Shakespeare's play, then, there are also numerous similarities. But even the similarities are with a difference. Dr. Pinch, for example, is derived from the stock classical character of the medicus, but he is thoroughly Elizabethan: "a mountebank, a threadbare juggler and a fortuneteller." It is characteristic of Shakespeare to make his borrowings his own, and if some of his plays have such stock figures as the senex, or old father—Egeus in A Midsummer Night's Dream or Shylock in The Merchant of Venice—the adulescens, or young lover, the servus, or servant, and so on, the characters are nevertheless transformed almost beyond recognition.

Finally, there is a pervasive difference in moral tone between the two plays. Shakespeare's play has bawdry, but the moral tone is notably higher than that of The Menaechmi. For example, Antipholus of Ephesus visits the Courtesan only after his wife bars him from his home, and Antipholus of Syracuse offers to pay for the gold chain that the Merchant gives to him. In short, although The Comedy of Errors is in obvious ways close to its source, it is indisputably a very different play from its source, and with hindsight we can see in it some of the directions that Shakespeare was to take in later and greater plays.

There is a good deal of uncertainty about whether Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew is based on an earlier comedy, but it is clear that the chief plot of the play—"the taming of the shrew"—is derived ultimately from a widespread bit of folklore. To this Shakespeare added the story of Bianca and her suitors, derived from Italian Renaissance comedy, with its intriguing servant (here Tranio), its outwitted old men, and its trio of suitors. The setting is bourgeois, as in only two of Shakespeare's other comedies, The Comedy of Errors and The Merry Wives of Windsor; Petruchio sees marriage chiefly as an economic institution ("I come to wive it wealthily in Padua"), and although we may at first think that the Lucentio-Bianca plot is more romantic (the two young people fall in love at first sight), the play is not yet the sort of romantic comedy which Shakespeare was to write at the turn of the century in The Merchant of Venice, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night. But this is not to say The Taming of the Shrew is a failure because it is not romantic; one of its chief delights is the fact that the romantic marriage of Bianca and Lucentio at the end dwindles into bickering, while the marriage of Petruchio and Katherine turns out to be (at least in sixteenth-century terms) mutually satisfactory. There is, after all, much to be said for—and much to delight in—the realistic view uttered by Petruchio's servant: "Winter tames man, woman, and beast; for it hath tamed my old master, and my new mistress, and myself." Seen thus, the taming of the shrew is not brutality but a schooling in humanity. Although Petruchio tames Katherine by humiliating her, in one important motif the play looks forward to the later comedies: he tames her by pretending that she is not shrewish but "pleasant, gamesome, passing courteous." Indeed, such is the power of the lover's imagination that the beloved is subsequently freed from the "mad and headstrong" tantrums that possess her and is transformed into Petruchio's image. She is, one can say, cured of her crippling, self-indulgent personality. Early in the play (II.i), during the course of her schooling, Katherine becomes sufficiently sensitized to protest against Petruchio's treatment of the Tailor and the Haberdasher, and finally she becomes an ideal wife. Having shaken off a constricting personality, she at last assumes her proper role in society. This theme of a change in personality, the formation of a new identity—already treated in The Comedy of Errors—has a comic parallel in the Induction, where Christopher Sly, a drunken tinker, is persuaded when he awakens from his stupor that he is a lord who for fifteen years has been mentally ill. Sly even changes his language for a while from prose to blank verse. This part of the play ends inconclusively with a few lines between I.i. and I.ii in which Sly continues to play the lord. His transformation cannot have the permanence of Katherine's, since romantic comedy shows moral rather than social or economic change. Perhaps there was originally an Epilogue, now lost, in which Sly resumes his workaday character (in A Midsummer Night's Dream Bottom is similarly transformed and "translated" back again without difficulty).

The Two Gentlemen of Verona approaches what was to become Shakespeare's characteristic comedy: the heart of the plot, derived from a chivalric and pastoral tale, is the story of courtly lovers who, in a romantic environment, engage in what has been called an obstacle race to the altar. The relationship between love and friendship is explored, and although the lovers are not yet very interesting, the appearance of a heroine disguised as a boy suggests the world of the romantic comedies, which (in words from Twelfth Night) "give a very echo to the seat/Where love is throned." Of particular interest is the spoofing of love, which in the later comedies (and in Romeo and Juliet) helps to define love:

VALENTINE Why, how know you that I am in love?
SPEED Marry, by these special marks: first, you have learned, like Sir Proteus, to wreath your arms, like a malcontent; to relish a love song, like a robin redbreast; to walk alone, like one that had the pestilence; to sigh, like a schoolboy that had lost his ABC; to weep, like a young wench that had buried her grandam. . . . When you fasted, it was presently [immediately] after dinner; when you looked sadly, it was for want of money. And now you are metamorphized with a mistress, that, when I look on you, I can hardly think you my master.
(II.i.18-33)

After listening to a conversation between Valentine and Silvia, Speed comments: "Though the chameleon love can feed on the air, I am one that am nourished by my victuals, and would fain have meat." To help show both the folly of love and the difference between courtly love and clownish love, there is a clown in love. Thinking of his beloved's virtues, the clown Launce says, "She can fetch and carry. Why, a horse can do no more: nay, a horse cannot fetch, but only carry; therefore is she better than a jade" (III.i.274-76).

Moreover, although there is an evident delight in word-play, especially in the puns of the clownish servants, speech in Two Gentlemen is more closely related to character than in the earlier comedies. There are very few ornate set pieces that are almost detachable from the speakers—though we are grateful for the exquisite song "Who Is Silvia" and for Launce's comic monologue on his dog's indifference (II.iii), both of which indeed are virtually independent bits. The play also includes a host of motifs and devices that appear in later plays: a woman disguises herself as a boy, a man mistakenly trusts a false companion, the heroine and her lady-in-waiting discuss suitors (compare I.ii with The Merchant of Venice, I.ii), a lover is anatomized (compare II.i.19-33 with As You Like It, III.ii.371-81), and characters gather in a forest or wood and are converted, thus forming a better society at the end. This last point has been touched on earlier (see p. 32), but it is worth repeating that at the heart of some of Shakespeare's comedies is a "green world" where people reach a clarification and form a regenerated society. This regenerated society is presumed to be stable, unlike the capricious, whimsical, and sometimes arbitrary and tyrannical society at the outset of the play, when lovers are inconstant or thwarted. In The Two Gentlemen of Verona the fickle Proteus, rightly characterized by his best friend as a "treacherous man," is presumably converted to constancy, and the play ends with "one feast, one house, one mutual happiness."

THE ACHIEVEMENT OF POETIC COMEDY: LOVE'S LABOR'S LOST

The date of Love's Labor's Lost is uncertain, and it is entirely possible that the only existing text is a revision, possibly as late as 1597, of a play that Shakespeare wrote as early as 1588. In its present form the play has a splendid poetry of a sort not found in Shakespeare's earlier plays; probably the writing of his two long narrative poems, Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594), and of some sonnets greatly assisted his development as a poet. There are type-characters—Berowne speaks of "the pedant, the braggart, the hedge-priest, the fool, and the boy"—and Holofernes the pedant especially is infatuated with words and with the "odoriferous flowers of fancy." But Shakespeare vitalizes the type-characters of the commedia dell'arte and he masters the "taffeta phrases, silken terms precise," and the "golden cadence," giving us so fine a dramatic speech as this:

KING
Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives,
Live regist'ed upon our brazen tombs
And then grace us in the disgrace of death,
When, spite of cormorant devouring Time,
Th' endeavor of this present breath may buy
That honor which shall bate his scythe's keen edge
And make us heirs of all eternity.
Therefore, brave conquerors—for so you are
That war against your own affections
And the huge army of the world's desires—
Our late edict shall strongly stand in force:
Navarre shall be the wonder of the world;
Our court shall be a little academe,
Still and contemplative in living art.
You three, Berowne, Dumaine, and Longaville,
Have sworn for three years' term to live with me,
My fellow scholars, and to keep those statutes
That are recorded in this schedule here.
Your oaths are passed; and now subscribe your names,
That his own hand may strike his honor down
That violates the smallest branch herein.
If you are armed to do as sworn to do,
Subscribe to your deep oaths, and keep it too. (I.i.1-23)

One might call attention to this speech as an expression of the Renaissance awareness of the tragic brevity of life, and of the Renaissance habit of trying to win glory by a great achievement so that at least one's reputation will survive devouring Time. But the point to be made here is that the earlier Elizabethan stage had rarely heard such excellent dramatic poetry. No less excellent is the prose. A few minutes after the courtiers sign a bond to study for three years and not "to see a woman in that term," the clown Costard is brought in by Constable Dull for having been caught with a wench. Costard explains: "It is the manner of a man to speak to a woman. . . . Such is the simplicity of man to hearken after the flesh." Thus the king's fine speech is clownishly put into its proper perspective. Costard can be generous as well as exact. Later in the play he comes to the defense of Nathaniel, who like a good Elizabethan has performed in an amateur theatrical to entertain his betters but has not been able to sustain his role of Alexander in the show of the Nine Worthies:

There, an't shall please you, a foolish mild man; an honest man, look you, and soon dashed. He is a marvelous good neighbor, faith, and a very good bowler; but for Alisander—alas! you see how 'tis—a little o'erparted. (V.ii.576–80)

One can regret the abundance of topical allusions in the play—more properly, one can regret that the allusions are now baffling—and perhaps the wit occasionally overwhelms the action, but the play is certainly not without action in the sense of a motive or theme, for it dramatizes the infirmity of idealism. Berowne early perceives the limits of idealism, remarking that “every man with his affects [passions] is born,/Not by might mastered, but by special grace,” and the truth of his perception becomes apparent, as we have seen, when Constable Dull brings in Costard. In mocking the high-minded courtiers who make war against “their own affections/And the huge army of the world's desires,” Shakespeare comes near to writing a satirical play, but there is something so noble in the courtiers' aspiration and something so delightful (and beautiful) in their absurdity that we do not view them with contempt. Satire diminishes the object of its attack; as Ezra Pound has said in Literary Essays, “Satire reminds one that certain things are not worthwhile. It draws one to consider time wasted.” But in Love's Labor's Lost although we laugh at the courtiers, first for their efforts to forswear women and then for their efforts to win women, we also gain a glimpse of a world of delightful and high-minded rather than worthless people. We are pleased that when they finally are reconciled to the fact that “it is the manner of a man to speak to a woman” they are not crushed by their enlightenment; indeed, if we value life, we can scarcely regret that their idealism is displaced by a recognition of man's physical nature. Costard, after all, is on the side of life, as the courtiers come to see. But at the end of the play—and this is most unusual in Shakespeare's comedies—the young men are not allowed to marry the women they court. Berowne complains, “Our wooing doth not end like an old play;/Jack hath not Jill,” and remarkably the last words are not about union or reunion but about separation: “You that way, we this way.” The later comedies conclude more harmoniously, with the journey ending in lovers meeting, but these comedies also sometimes include a touch of melancholy or disharmony. For example, Jaques in As You Like It and Malvolio in Twelfth Night stand apart from the happiness that dominates the final scenes, complicating the vision of the play. In Love's Labor's Lost, the happiness that the courtiers project in their dream of an academe is dispelled, and later the happiness that they project in their roles as lovers is also dispelled by the announcement that the princess' father has died. The weddings must be postponed for a year, during which time the men must do penance. But the ending is not merely melancholy, for the implications are that the recognition of the reality of death and the performance of a year of penance will lead to marriages that are based on the fullest possible awareness of the facts of life.

THE EARLY FESTIVE COMEDIES: A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM, THE MERCHANT OF VENICE

With A Midsummer Night's Dream (written about 1594–96) Shakespeare indisputably established himself as a great writer of romantic comedy. The confusions in The Comedy of Errors are amusing, and they are not totally devoid of implications concerning the complexities of life and man's blindness, but the implications are sporadic, and the play is content to amuse. A Midsummer Night's Dream, no less amusing, goes further and deeper by adding to the story of lovers' mistaken identities the actions of the royal classical lovers, Theseus and Hippolyta; the fairy lovers of folklore, Oberon and Titania; and the lovers in the craftsmen's play, Pyramus and Thisby. This rich collaboration makes A Midsummer Night's Dream an unexcelled comedy, a finely plotted and beautifully lyrical exploration of the nature of love, the nature of imagination (“fantasy”), the nature of reality or truth, almost, in short, the nature of life.

Much of the play is derived from books: the story of Theseus and Hippolyta is taken from Chaucer's The Knight's Tale, perhaps reinforced with some details from Plutarch's Lives; Puck (or Robin Goodfellow) probably owes something to Reginald Scot's Discovery of Witchcraft as well as to old wives' tales that Shakespeare may have heard as a child in Stratford; Ovid's story of Pyramus and Thisby was studied in Elizabethan grammar schools; and the ass-headed Bottom probably owes something to an Elizabethan translation of Lucius Apuleius' The Golden Ass. But the play does not smell of the lamp. Rather, it appears as effortless and as richly suggestive as a dream, and no less complex, beautiful, profound, or mysterious; and not least important, it is much more funny. A Midsummer Night's Dream was probably written at about the same time as Romeo and Juliet. There are some resemblances between the two plays, most obviously in Lysander's speech ending with “quick bright things come to confusion” (I.i.141–49), which parallels abundant images in Romeo and Juliet of beauty quickly yielding to darkness (especially II.ii.119–20), and in the play-within-the-play concerning Pyramus and Thisby, who are in effect an ancient Romeo and Juliet. Aldous Huxley has complained that tragedy, in portraying only the single-minded, heroic strain in man, does not tell “the whole truth.” No work of art tells the whole truth, of course, and it is unreasonable to judge a tragedy by such a standard. But one understands Huxley's comment: fine though Romeo and Juliet is, it seems a more mechanical, thinner, and less substantial exploration of life than A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Theseus feels that the lovers' story is “more strange than true,” and at the end of the play Puck suggests that the audience can dismiss the entire play easily:

If we shadows have offended,
Think but this, and all is mended:
That you have but slumb'ed here,
While these visions did appear.
And this weak and idle theme,
No more yielding but a dream. (V.i.422–27)

But the dreams in the play are perceptions of reality: Hermia dreams (II.ii) that Lysander does not come to her aid while a serpent eats her heart, and when she awakens she finds that Lysander is gone, his love now fastened on another woman. Bottom dreams that he is an ass. Thus it may be an error to dismiss this dreamlike play and fail to see that the comedy is a profound treatment of love as a force, sometimes creative, sometimes destructive, sometimes wonderful, and sometimes laughable, but powerful and transfiguring.

In The Merchant of Venice (probably written in 1596) Shakespeare broadens his presentation of human personality. Shylock and Portia, the opposed proponents of legalism and mercy, are much more fully realized characters than those in A Midsummer Night's Dream. But Bassanio, the male lover, is still not of very great interest. It is worth noting that Shakespeare's comic heroes are usually less witty and less resourceful, and therefore less interesting, than his heroines.

For many readers and spectators, Shylock is too interesting a character: the comic villain becomes a sympathetic and almost tragic figure, the wronged Jew towers above the petty Venetians. But such an interpretation is perhaps a misreading of the play, for it places too much weight on a few speeches in which the Venetians taunt Shylock and on other speeches in which Shylock quite rightly insists on his sufferings. The most famous instance of the latter is in III.i, when Shylock asks,

Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions?—fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge? (III.i.56–64)

One cannot easily dismiss this powerful speech by saying that it is only a justification for revenge, not a plea for tolerance. But to argue that Shylock's speech is what The Merchant of Venice is about is to turn away from much of the rest of the play; it is to overlook, for example, Portia's no less wonderful speech about mercy (IV.i.183–204), in which she points out that no one's deeds are so just that he does not require mercy, and to overlook the superb unconscious irony of Shylock's reply to that speech, "My deeds upon my head! I crave the law." Law is in fact what he gets, and only mercy saves him from the death penalty that the law imposes. What the play as a whole dramatizes is not the problem of a minority group suffering at the hands of a hostile society but the conflict of two ways of life, one concerned with hoarding (Shylock's "Fast bind, fast find,/A proverb never stale in thrifty mind"), the other with generous giving (Antonio's "My purse, my person, my extremest means/Lie all unlocked to your occasions," and Portia's "What is mine, to you and yours/Is now converted"). Almost every element in the play is arranged to set forth some such fundamental opposition, but again the characters are not pale abstractions, and Shylock is no straw man. Shakespeare gives him powerful utterances and lets us see him fully, from the inside, as in the long speech quoted above. Probably no earlier character in Shakespeare so fully evokes from the hearer the response, "I understand exactly how that man feels." But the play is not about Shylock; rather, Shylock is an important character in a play about the triumph of generosity (love is a kind of giving), which transforms society into something more than a group of men who buy and sell and lend. The final scene is rich in intimations of a spiritually renewed society: "Let me give light," "riveted with faith unto your flesh," "my soul upon the forfeit," "you drop manna." In short, a new day is dawning ("it is almost morning")—which is not to say that sex and bawdry do not have their place, but only that this play about very human people is also a play with a great theme.

A BOURGEOIS COMEDY: THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR

The date of The Merry Wives of Windsor is uncertain, but as the editor's Introduction to the play suggests, a good case can be made for the spring of 1597. If that date is right, Shakespeare interrupted his work on the cycle of history plays concerning the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V to write a comedy centering on Falstaff, who appears in an earlier play, 1 Henry IV. According to legend, Shakespeare wrote the comedy in two weeks in response to Queen Elizabeth's desire to see Falstaff in love. The legend gains some support from the fact that the play is not in the romantic-comic vein that Shakespeare had been working in, perhaps because it was written quickly. In the play a character named Falstaff—who only sporadically has the wit of the Falstaff of 1 Henry IV—attempts to seduce two married women and is ignominiously defeated. Possibly Shakespeare refurbished an old play, but if he did so, readers have not forgiven him for raising their expectations by calling one of the characters Falstaff and then failing to deliver the real Falstaff. (As Dr. Johnson said, "Falstaff could not love, but by ceasing to be Falstaff.") There is a romantic plot involving a young man named Fenton, who is said to "speak holiday" and "smell April and May," but romance has only a small role in the play, which has strong affinities with Roman and Italian comedy: a braggart is humiliated, and a young man and a girl outwit the girl's parents and marry.

Whatever the source, Shakespeare's handling of the plot is uncertain: for example, at the start Falstaff's old crew, Bardolph, Pistol, and Nym, appear; but after the first act they do nothing; the first scene introduces the idea of a quarrel between Falstaff and Justice Shallow, but nothing comes of it. Curiously this play, which seems so thin, is effective on the stage, and it is of special interest to those readers who see beneath the surface to the pattern of the ritual expulsion of Misrule or Riot, for Falstaff, an embodiment of Misrule, is dumped into the river and later is pinched and singed with candles by people disguised as fairies. The locale is contemporary Windsor, but there seem to be echoes of ancient rites of purification, such as survived in the Saint George plays (see p. 12).

THE LATER FESTIVE COMEDIES: MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING, AS YOU LIKE IT, TWELFTH NIGHT

Near the turn of the century—just after he had finished his second tetralogy of history plays and was nearing the great tragedies—Shakespeare wrote three comedies that for many readers and spectators are the essence of Shakespearean romantic comedy: Much Ado About Nothing (1598–1600), As You Like It (1599–1600), and Twelfth Night (1600–02). These plays, like The Merchant of Venice and to a lesser degree A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Two Gentlemen of Verona, are plays of courtship. The assumption behind them is that despite momentary absurdities and pains, love liberates, enriches, and fulfills the lovers. But each play is unique, and it is perhaps best not to insist too loudly on their resemblances.

The main plot of Much Ado About Nothing concerns the love of Claudio and Hero, the interruption of that love (caused by the malicious Don John, a descendant of the medieval Vice), and the restoration and completion of their love in marriage, when Hero is cleared from slander and reunited with Claudio. To this pair of lovers Shakespeare adds another, Beatrice and Benedick. They begin as witty foes, are deceived into thinking that each is loved by the other, and then find that they do indeed love each other. Thus in this parallel plot (it cannot be called a subplot because it is no less important than the plot of Claudio and Hero), lovers undergo a conversion, and the somewhat self-righteous society of the early part of the play is disabused of its illusions, thereby acquiring a new life. For example, at the start Beatrice is characterized thus:

But Nature never framed a woman's heart
Of prouder stuff than that of Beatrice.
Disdain and Scorn ride sparkling in her eyes,
Misprizing what they look on; and her wit
Values itself so highly that to her
All matter else seems weak. She cannot love,
Nor take no shape nor project of affection,
She is so self-endear'd. (III.i.49–56)

Both Beatrice and Benedick are liberated from this bondage to the self, just as Claudio is liberated from his mistaken view of Hero and from his subsequent grief for Hero's supposed death. The prelude to this renewal is announced in verse, a medium that the earlier parts of the play are not rich in:

Good morrow, masters; put your torches out.
The wolves have preyed, and look, the gentle day,
Before the wheels of Phoebus, round about
Dapples the drowsy east with spots of gray. (V.iii.24–27)

Appropriately enough, the play ends with the marriage of Claudio and Hero, the promise of a marriage between Benedick and Beatrice, and finally a dance giving visual representation to the transformed and now harmonious society. Thoughts of the villainous Don John, now a prisoner, are not allowed to intrude seriously upon the new-found joy: "Think not on him till tomorrow. I'll devise thee brave punishments for him. Strike up, pipers!" The play ends with music and dancing: "All . . . sounds of woe," to quote from a song in Act II, have been converted into "hey nonny, nonny."

Finally, a point should be made concerning Dogberry and his fellows, the delightfully ignorant watchmen who through a series of blunders apprehend the malefactors. The actions of Dogberry and his fellows are one variant of the theme—recurrent in the comedies—that mistaken beliefs or errors have fortunate consequences. Benedick and Beatrice are deceived, and the outcome is good; Claudio is deceived, and the outcome is good (presumably his love for Hero at the end is greater because he has learned that his earlier mistrust was totally without foundation). Dogberry's errors too have a happy result; moreover, his sublime self-confidence is a comic imitation of the less amiable self-confidence of others in Messina. This is not to say that we value him only because he plays an important role in the plot and because he contributes to the theme. A richly comic figure, he affords us delight, and we would value him for this even if he were irrelevant. In one of his bumbling speeches he comes closest to stating the theme of this comedy in which events happily conspire to give people more than they deserve. The play shows us a world of people, as Dogberry says, "condemned into everlasting redemption."

Like A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Merchant of Venice, As You Like It presents two worlds. A Midsummer Night's Dream moves from Athens, with its harsh law and its harsh father, to the moonlit woods outside of Athens, where lovers are transformed into their better selves; The Merchant of Venice moves from the commercial world of Venice to the moonlit world of Portia's Belmont. In As You Like It the movement is from the court of the usurper, Duke Frederick, to the Forest of Arden, where lovers find what they seek and where the wicked are converted. Charles the wrestler puts it quite clearly:

There's no news at the court, sir, but the old news. That is, the old duke is banished by his younger brother the new duke, and three or four loving lords have put themselves into voluntary exile with him, whose lands and revenues enrich the new duke. . . . They say [the old duke] is already in the Forest of Arden, and a many merry men with him; and there they live like the old Robin Hood of England. They say many young gentlemen flock to him every day, and fleet the time carelessly as they did in the golden world. (I.i.97–101, 112–17)

The play is full of "holiday foolery," but the foolery is not devoid of meaning, for it embodies an enduring vision of love and of the triumph of the gifts of nature over those of fortune. Various kinds of lovers are juxtaposed: the romantic young lovers, Rosalind and Orlando and Celia and the reformed Oliver; the prettified artificial pastoral figures, hard-hearted Phebe and her mooning Silvius, who thinks no man has ever loved as he loves; the low pastoral figures, old Corin, who has forgotten the ridiculous actions that love moved him to in his youth, and the young bumpkins William and Audrey; and finally the clown Touchstone, who remembers that when he was in love he kissed "the cow's dugs that her pretty chopt [chapped] hands had milked." Love is wonderfully displayed in the "strange capers" of these figures, and it is treasured even when it is mocked—as when Rosalind realistically warns Phebe against scorning Silvius' offers, saying, "Sell when you can, you are not for all markets" or when Rosalind, concealing her love for Orlando, offers to cure him of the madness of loving Rosalind, and he replies, "I would not be cured." Nor, of course, would Rosalind or the audience want him cured. The love poems that Orlando writes are wretched (Touchstone drily offers to produce such rhymes

"eight years together, dinners and suppers and sleeping hours excepted"), yet we would not have Orlando's rhymes improved; we value them for their delightful ineptitude. Rosalind herself is delightfully mocked, as in this bit of dialogue in which Celia (Aliena) prosaically reminds us that people in love can be very boring:

ROSALIND I'll tell thee, Aliena, I cannot be out of the sight of Orlando. I'll go find a shadow, and sigh till he come.

CELIA And I'll sleep. (IV.i.213-16)

In short everything in the play, including the folly, is in Celia's words "O wonderful, wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful, and yet again wonderful." Not least wonderful are the improbable conversions of Oliver and the wicked Duke Frederick; again we are grateful for these improbabilities because we would not deny to anyone the possibility of finding joy by shedding self-centeredness. These two men come late to self-knowledge and its concomitant generosity of spirit, but better late than never. The play ends with "a wedlock hymn" and other strong hints of a transfigured world. Thus the return of the exiles to the court is not a bit of cynicism discrediting their experience in the forest; rather, it brings the vitality and harmony of the forest into the court, which earlier in the play is a place of tyranny.

It is no derogation of Twelfth Night (probably written about 1600) to say that in it Shakespeare again uses several motifs from his earlier plays. Like The Comedy of Errors, it involves twins—this time a brother and sister—who have been separated by a shipwreck and who are now (unknown to each other) in the same city. As in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, there is a girl disguised as a boy who serves the man she loves as a page, even to the extent of courting on his behalf a woman whom he woos. Like Benedick and Beatrice, who in Much Ado About Nothing are tricked into thinking that they love each other, Malvolio is tricked into thinking that Olivia loves him. Other similarities include a resourceful young woman (here Viola, in The Merchant of Venice Portia, in As You Like It Rosalind); deep affection between friends (here Antonio and Sebastian, in The Merchant of Venice Antonio and Bassanio); a fool (here Feste, in As You Like It Touchstone); and a somewhat Falstaffian character, Sir Toby Belch. And in its festive spirit—for example, in its songs and mistaken identities—the play reminds us of episodes in A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Merchant of Venice, and As You Like It. But despite such similarities, there are important differences. For example, in The Comedy of Errors the mistakes which cause bewilderment are largely physical—that is, they are literal cases of mistaken identity caused by the presence of twins; but in Twelfth Night there are more profound mistakes as well in the failure of some of the characters to understand themselves. Thus Malvolio not only misunderstands Olivia; he misunderstands his own nature and his role in society. Similarly, in pining for Olivia Orsino does not see the egoism in his love, and so, for example, the love song that he calls for (II.iv) is really a song of self-love in which the lover calls attention to his pathetic fidelity. At the end of the play Orsino is freed from the torments of his own desires, which at the start pursue him "like fell and cruel hounds." Olivia, too, grieving for her dead brother, finds that she has mistaken the depth of her grief, and she is liberated from her own "eye-offending brine." Thus despite the shipwreck and despite the trick played on Malvolio, much of the trouble is not external but is rooted in self-deception. Against egoism and self-deception—neatly summed up in Olivia's words to Malvolio, "O, you are sick of self-love"—is a liberating generosity, not only in small details, as when Antonio freely gives money to Sebastian (III.iii), but notably in Viola, who gives herself to Orsino's effort to woo Olivia even though Viola herself "would be his wife."

In Twelfth Night, then, although Shakespeare uses earlier plots and characters, he is saying new things, especially about the development of insight. One small index is provided by the clown Feste, who, though by profession resembling Touchstone in As You Like It, is very different from Touchstone in his wit and actions. Touchstone, however cynically, joins in the procession to the altar, but Feste remains unwed, and after the unregenerated Malvolio leaves and the lovers depart, Feste is left alone on the stage to sing the Epilogue, with its melancholy refrain, "For the rain it raineth every day." In As You Like It the melancholy Jaques stands apart from the comic resolution, but he too looks forward to a new life, perhaps to be gained through conversation with the regenerated Duke Frederick. But in Twelfth Night Feste—whose name suggests that he is the very incarnation of festivity—stands apart, calling attention to the hardships of life. He does not thereby deflate the romantic vision, but he does complicate it.

THE DARK COMEDIES: ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL, MEASURE FOR MEASURE

Two comedies, All's Well That Ends Well (1602-04?) and Measure for Measure (1604), are often called "dark comedies" or "problem plays." When the latter term is used, Hamlet (1600-01) and Troilus and Cressida (1601-02) are sometimes included as well. The term problem play, first used in the late nineteenth century to characterize some of Ibsen's work, denotes a play that examines a social problem rather than an unchanging fact of life, such as death. Thus it has been argued that Measure for Measure is about such problems as: Can a judge condemn a criminal for a crime that the judge himself is guilty of? May a person sin to save a life? But clearly All's Well and Measure for Measure are not primarily debates on such problems; if they are, they contain enormous amounts of irrelevant material.

The term dark comedies, then, is perhaps more useful: All's Well and Measure for Measure do not have the festive spirit that dominates A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Merchant of Venice, Much Ado, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night, and that is plentiful in some of the other comedies. Put most briefly, the lovers simply do not show as much delight as the lovers in the earlier comedies, where a spirit of playfulness abounds. All's Well has some close resemblances to the great romantic comedies—a resourceful heroine, disguise, coincidences, and finally a reunion between young people—but there is little of the joy of love in it. The play has the conventions but not the spirit of comedy. The nominal hero is not a young man in love; the closest he comes to being a suitor is when he resorts to bribery in an effort to seduce a woman.

The plots of both All's Well and Measure for Measure include actions that critics, especially those in the late nineteenth century, have found unpleasant. In both plays, for example, a man thinks he is seducing a woman but is tricked into sleeping with another woman whom he has rejected. The heroines in each play have struck some readers as unamiable, the nominal heroes as detestable. (In Troilus and Cressida too there is a faithless woman who by virtue of her faithlessness diminishes not only herself but her lover.) Here is Dr. Johnson on the hero of All's Well:

I cannot reconcile my heart to Bertram; a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who marries Helen as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate: when she is dead by his unkindness, sneaks home to a second marriage, is accused by a woman whom he has wronged, defends himself by falsehood, and is dismissed to happiness.

In both plays there is clowning, but for some readers there is too much joking about syphilis, too much comic cowardice, too much disillusionment, and too much unpleasant behavior that reveals not merely folly but vice. As You Like It has a usurping duke and a wicked elder brother, but we see little of them and they reform; during most of the play we are diverted by the lovers in the Forest of Arden. Twelfth Night has a shipwreck and the unregenerated Malvolio, but the shipwreck takes place off stage with no real harm done, and Malvolio is funny rather than criminally vicious. Of the earlier comedies, perhaps Much Ado comes closest to—though it is still far away from—All's Well and Measure for Measure. In Much Ado Don John is villainous, the hero Claudio is churlish, the witty lovers Benedick and Beatrice are on the whole satiric rather than romantic, and the setting is never varied by an excursion into a green world. But in Much Ado there is the sublimely bumbling Constable Dogberry, who by his ineptitude saves the situation. As one of the villains says to the wiser folk in Much Ado, "What your wisdoms could not discover, these shallow fools have brought to light." But in the two dark comedies evil is fended off only by vigorous effort. In As You Like It the characters do little more than disport themselves in the woods until the two wicked characters repent, and in Twelfth Night Viola relies on time to solve the problem: "O time, thou must untangle this, not I; It is too hard a knot for me t' untie." But in All's Well the heroine (like a good counselor in a morality play) must energetically pursue her wayward husband, saving him from fornication by a trick in which she interposes her own body, and in Measure for Measure the good duke must keep bustling if the lecherous Angelo is not to have his way. Time, of course, has a role in these plays too, but in both plays the central characters must energetically make use of it, rather than, as in Twelfth Night, await it.

That the plays have less festivity or playfulness, and that they have potent sources of evil, is indisputable. On the other hand, if we are repelled by the "bed trick," and if we resent the fact that Bertram is "dismissed to happiness," perhaps we are deficient in a sense of playfulness. That these comedies are not festive comedies is perhaps no more significant than that they are not tragedies or histories: they are what they are, and we can be thankful for them. Nor should we characterize the plays as cynical: All's Well especially has honorable characters who not only utter noble sentiments but who act virtuously and effectively; Measure for Measure is ultimately based on the generous view that evil intentions, if unacted and repented of, do not deserve punishment, and the play concludes with contrition and forgiveness.

Finally, a point about the origin of these dark comedies should be made: readers have tended to date them near to each other (though All's Well often has the abundant rhyme of the earlier plays) and have assumed that around 1600 Shakespeare became pessimistic, perhaps because a mistress was unfaithful or because Essex' revolt was abortive. But Shakespeare's plays need not reflect his mental ups and downs. Rather, some elements in the plays may represent a literary fad, perhaps stimulated by Ben Jonson, whose satiric comedies regularly scourge folly: in All's Well Bertram and Parolles are revealed as fools; in Measure for Measure the ascetic Angelo betrays his ideals and is exposed. (Troilus and Cressida too is a thoroughly ironic play: the heroine is false, her noble lover is gulled, and Thersites and Pandarus are at least as gross as the world they comment on.) Yet even the dark comedies finally are charitable: no one is everlastingly cast out, Bertram and Angelo (like Mankind in a morality play) are redeemed, and if there are not the joyous feasts that conclude some of the earlier comedies, there is nevertheless, as the braggart Parolles in All's Well says, "place and means for every man alive." Parolles, in fact, is at last welcomed to Lafew's table, although Lafew was the first to see through his deceptions: "Though you are a fool and a knave," he tells Parolles, "you shall eat."

THE ROMANCES:

PERICLES, CYMBELINE, THE WINTER'S TALE, THE TEMPEST, THE TWO NOBLE KINSMEN

If the conjectured dates of the dark comedies are right (about 1602–04), during the next few years Shakespeare wrote only tragedies: King Lear (1605–06), Macbeth (1605–06), Antony and Cleopatra (1606–07), Timon of Athens (1604–09), and Coriolanus (1607–09). But he ended his career with a return to comedy, that is, with plays that end happily: Pericles (1608–09), Cymbeline (1609–10), The Winter's Tale (1610–11), and The Tempest (1611). To these can be added two plays on which he may have collaborated with John Fletcher, Henry VIII (1612–13) and The Two Noble Kinsmen (1613). Henry VIII, an historical play, is discussed with the histories (see p. 53), but in a broad sense it is "comic," like Dante's Divine Comedy, for it moves from trouble to joy, ending with the christening of the infant Elizabeth I and the promise of a joyous future.

Shakespeare's last plays are in various ways fairly closely related, and critics usually call Pericles, Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, and The Tempest "the romances." Except for The Tempest, like nondramatic romances the plays are concerned with wonderful actions that cover a long period. The title page of Pericles calls attention to this aspect of the play: "the true relation of the whole history, adventures, and fortunes of the said prince, as also the no less strange and worthy accidents in the birth and life of his daughter Marina." A dominant motif in these four plays is the restoration of losses: Pericles regains his wife Thaisa, who had been thought dead, and his daughter Marina, who had been abducted by pirates; King Cymbeline regains his two sons, abducted in infancy; in The Winter's Tale friends who had quarreled are after many years reunited, and the king regains his lost daughter; in The Tempest an exiled duke regains his dukedom, and the King of Naples regains his son. Of course, the earlier comedies too have such restorations: in The Comedy of Errors a long-separated family is at last reunited; in As You Like It a duke regains his dukedom. But The Comedy of Errors is mostly about comic errors in identity, and As You Like It is mostly about love. In contrast, the last plays in large measure are about restoration; moreover, the restoration of losses is closely related to a sense of renewal consequent upon suffering and repentance. It is rather as though King Lear were given a happy ending, with Lear and Cordelia reunited. In the romances the stuff of tragedy—exile, jealousy, even death—usually takes place early (in The Tempest the exile of Prospero takes place before the play begins), and the plays focus on the post-tragic regeneration and reunion. In The Winter's Tale the first three acts are ominous, including mad and destructive jealousy, a storm, death, and the exposure of an infant to the elements, but then the scene changes to springtime and a pastoral world, and the last two acts work toward a resolution. One cannot conceive of a happy ending added to the first three acts of King Lear (the pre-Shakespearean play King Leir did restore Leir to his throne, but Leir had not gone mad on the heath). As Charles Lamb said of such a possibility,

A happy ending—as if the living martyrdoms that Lear had gone through—the flaying of his feelings alive, did not make a fair dismissal from the stage of life the only decorous thing for him. If he is to live and be happy after, if he could sustain this world's burden after, why all this pudder and preparation—why torment us with all this unnecessary sympathy? As if the childish pleasure of getting his gilt robes and scepter again could tempt him to act over again his misused station—as if at his years, and with his experience, anything was left but to die.

This is finely put; and yet the romances are concerned with a stage of life that puts great suffering into a new perspective. Pericles says to the gods, as Lear could not, "Your present kindness/Makes my past miseries sports."

Although there are deaths in Pericles, Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, and The Two Noble Kinsmen, the plays have a serenity that separates them from the festivity of the early comedies, the stress of the dark comedies, and the agony of the tragedies. Consider the idealized and somewhat etherealized heroines in the last plays: Marina in Pericles, who miraculously remains unspotted though she is sold into a brothel; Imogen in Cymbeline; Perdita in The Winter's Tale; Miranda in The Tempest, who has seen no man other than her father and a bestial servant; and Emilia in The Two Noble Kinsmen. For the most part the heroines of the earlier comedies are witty and resourceful, but the later heroines, notable for their innocence, have a sort of Snow White quality.

Coupled with this emphasis on innocence and the restoration of losses is a strong sense of providence, made obvious by visible manifestations of the deity: Diana appears in Pericles and Jupiter appears in Cymbeline, Apollo's oracle is quoted in The Winter's Tale, and Duke Prospero has magical powers in The Tempest. In The Two Noble Kinsmen prayers are made before the altars of Mars, Venus, and Diana, and the deities respond. In these plays, to quote from Pericles, we strongly feel that we see "virtue preserved from fell destruction's blast,/Led on by heaven and crowned at last."

The note of innocence and the sense of providence are strengthened by the pastoral settings of some of these plays and by the images of the sea and storms, which contrast with the pastoral settings. Shakespeare used a shipwreck as early as The Comedy of Errors, but in the last plays the sea and the storms are under the control of providence. In Pericles the lovely Marina is born during a storm at sea, and when she is finally reunited with her father a "great sea of joys" rushes upon him and he says, "Though the seas threaten, they are merciful." The emphasis on innocence and providence makes the plays hover at the edge of allegory. The characters seem a bit flatter or thinner, and if we prefer the earlier more complex characters we may find in the last plays too much freedom or casualness not only in the characterization but in the plotting and the versification. The commonest reply to this is that Shakespeare deliberately used thin characters, improbable situations, unidiomatic speech, and relatively free versification in order to move beyond these elements to the transcendent post-tragic vision behind the happenings. Having written festive comedies, darker comedies that treat romantic love somewhat skeptically, and tragedies, Shakespeare ended his career with a sort of play that has elements of all the earlier types but contains a new vision. Other explanations have been offered: Shakespeare was bored with the theater and was now interested only in making experiments in poetry itself; or Shakespeare, especially after the acquisition of the indoor theater at Blackfriars in 1608, was trying to attract a more courtly audience, one that preferred spectacular, allegorical masques and plays remote from common life; or for some unknown reason at the end of his career Shakespeare was returning to the loose romantic dramas of his youth; or Shakespeare was losing his grip. In any case, these plays are related, but it is time to look at them singly.

The earliest of the romances, Pericles, is of uncertain date and even uncertain authorship; it was not included in the First Folio, perhaps because the compilers of the Folio believed it to be written in large part by a hand other than Shakespeare's. In any case, most critics hesitate to attribute the first two acts to Shakespeare, chiefly because the poetry in these acts is very weak. (It is hard to tell exactly how weak, because the text is badly corrupted in places.) The plot is derived from a narrative which Shakespeare used as early as The Comedy of Errors, when he attached to Plautus' Menaechmi the old tale of a family dispersed by a storm at sea and reunited after much wandering. In Pericles a king is reunited with his wife and daughter after abundant grief, and the story deals with "this great miracle." There are storms in Pericles as in King Lear, but in Pericles the storms are ultimately seen to be providential. Thaisa, thought dead, is confined and dropped into the sea, but she is miraculously restored to Pericles; his daughter, abducted and sold to a brothel, remains a virgin and converts her potential customers; Pericles, almost dead from sorrow, is miraculously restored to life by his long-lost daughter. If we wished to find an emblem for the play's theme, we would perhaps find it in the device on the hero's shield, "a withered branch that's only green at top" (II.ii.42). The world seems a barren, deathly, tempestuous place, but for the innocent and the patient there is, at the top, the possibility of new life.

The editors of the First Folio put Cymbeline among the tragedies, perhaps because they felt that a play in part concerned with a Roman invasion of Britain could not with propriety be put among the comedies; nor could it be put among the histories, since it includes romance material and deals with a legendary pre-Christian Britain, whereas all the history plays deal with medieval or early Renaissance England.

Like Pericles, Cymbeline is concerned with exile and restoration; like Pericles too it is set in a pagan world, but with markedly Christian overtones. For example, when Jupiter says, "Whom best I love I cross; to make my gift,/The more delayed, delighted," it is not merely the word cross (here a verb, meaning "to thwart") that evokes a Christian framework but the whole idea that the heavenly powers chasten those whom they love (compare the Bible's "Whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth"). Suffering is transcended, and all losses are restored: "The fingers of the pow'rs above do tune/The harmony of this peace" (V.v.466-67). But viewers and readers have found that the harmony is achieved only after a bewildering diffusion of interest. The dialogue is often obscure; characterization in general counts for less than striking theatrical situations, and because there is no central character the focus is in doubt. The play mingles three motifs: pastoral matter of princes brought up close to nature, political-historical matter of Rome's conquest of Britain, and a story of love, which includes a disguised princess who apparently dies and comes back to life. In some degree, the play is Shakespeare's fusion of the histories (there is something about England's role in the world), the tragedies (exile, war, and death), and the comedies (courtship and marriage).

Like Pericles, The Winter's Tale is derived from a prose narrative that includes much of the stuff of the Hellenistic romances: an exotic pagan setting, an abandoned infant, an oracle, a storm, a long separation, love, and ultimately a reunion between those separated. In some matters Shakespeare lessens the operations of chance; for example, in the source the young lovers by the accident of shipwreck find themselves in Sicily, where the girl is reunited with her father, but in The Winter's Tale they deliberately set out for Sicily. But the play as a whole has an air of the wonderful or, as in King Leontes' sudden fit of jealousy (I.ii), of the unpredictable and the irrational. Against this are elements that on a casual view can be called realistic—notably the roguish peddler Autolycus and the sheep-shearing festival in Act IV, where comedy and English character-types and customs appear in remote Bohemia. More precisely, however, this pastoral "realism" is not realism at all but another variety of romance; it is the romance no longer of the exotic but of the simple or "natural," for Perdita at the shepherds' festival gives us a picture of the vitality of innocence, in a setting of fertile nature. But the play as a whole presents a very different world from that of As You Like It, with its delightful Forest of Arden. The seriousness of the issues is insisted on: Leontes' jealousy at the start causes the death of his little son and of others, and it initiates sixteen years of separation from his wife and his daughter. The first three acts, in short, are a winter's tale, tragic in tone. But in III.ii, when the infant Perdita is abandoned on a stormy coast and found by shepherds, there is a turn: "Now bless thyself," one shepherd says to another, "thou met'st with things dying, I with things newborn." Act IV begins with Time, who tells us that sixteen years have passed, and soon Autolycus appears and introduces a note of spring in a song about daffodils. Ultimately, Perdita is restored to her repentant father Leontes; her mother Hermione—thought dead not only by Leontes but by the audience—is also restored. The restoration to Hermione of the lost Perdita, who is associated with the spring, is a sort of analogue to the Greek myth of the seasons, in which Proserpina is rescued from the lower world and restored to her mother Ceres in the spring. It resembles, too, the Christian pattern of redemption. At the reunion—the resurrection, we might almost say—Hermione's first words are a prayer to the gods to pour their graces upon her daughter's head, and there is the implication here, as in The Tempest, that the innocent love of the children redeems the errors and sins of their fathers. Like Pericles, the play ends happily with expressions of joy, but it cannot be grouped with the festive comedies, not only because its first half has the violence of tragedy but also because its ending is suffused with solemnity. If we must classify the play, we might take a hint from Polonius and call it tragical-comical-pastoral.

Like some of the early comedies, which are ultimately indebted in varying degrees to late Greek and Roman comedy, The Tempest has a shipwreck (compare The Comedy of Errors and Twelfth Night), an irritable father (compare Egeus in A Midsummer Night's Dream), and a character who more or less manipulates the plot (compare Rosalind in As You Like It). Like The Comedy of Errors, possibly Shakespeare's earliest comedy, it obeys the ancient traditions of unity of time and place: the play spans only a few hours and occurs in one locale. But despite these and other resemblances, the unusual amount of spectacle in The Tempest—and, more important, the serious tone—ties the play to Shakespeare's other last plays. The old conventions are here, but with new meanings: The Tempest is concerned with guilt and forgiveness, royal children, wonderful quasi-resurrections, and finally reunions. "These are not natural events, they strengthen/From strange, to stranger." The pastoral setting, implying the freshness and vitality of nature, prominent in parts of Cymbeline under the thin disguise of the Welsh countryside and in The Winter's Tale in the Bohemian shepherds' feast, is presented in The Tempest in the mysterious island—though this island means different things to different people: to one observer the grass looks "lush and lusty," but to another the grass is "indeed tawny." Pastoralism appears too in the masque of Ceres and Juno and the dance of nymphs and harvesters. Again there is a shipwreck, and again the results prove beneficent. Those who are cast upon the island find, strangely, that their "garments, being, as they were, drenched in the sea, hold, notwithstanding, their freshness and glosses, being rather new-dyed than stained with salt water" (II.i.64-67). This note of renewal or regeneration is variously sounded throughout the play. Suffering brings renewal: "Some kinds of baseness/Are nobly undergone, and most poor matters/Point to rich ends."

In one voyage
Did Claribel her husband find at Tunis,
And Ferdinand her brother found a wife
Where he himself was lost; Prospero his dukedom
In a poor isle; and all of us ourselves
When no man was his own. (V.i.208-13)

The sense of providence, strong in the last plays, is embodied in The Tempest chiefly by the magician Prospero, who raises and allays the storm that helps to regenerate and reconcile. (But Prospero, though in some ways godlike, is not God; he himself must learn to pity and to forgive the wrongdoer.)

Because The Tempest is probably the last play that is entirely Shakespeare's (he seems to have had a collaborator for Henry VIII and The Two Noble Kinsmen), there is a tendency to see in Prospero, the magician who can call up visions but who at the end breaks his staff and abjures his "potent art," a picture of Shakespeare putting down his pen and contemplating retirement to Stratford. There is no great harm in such a reading as long as it does not reduce the play to an autobiographical scrap. It would be a pity to see in The Tempest only a farewell to the theater and to fail to notice that Prospero goes not to retirement but to the active role of ruling in Milan as the duke. The meaning of this play, like the meanings of Shakespeare's other plays, finally is complex. But this is not to say that the play is obscure or cryptic, although the Baconians find a cryptogram in the two lines at the end:

As you from crimes would pardoned be,
Let your indulgence set me free.

What was Shakespeare really saying at the end of his last play? The Baconian answer is that the letters in these lines can be rearranged into this message: "Tempest of Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam; do ye ne'er divulge me, ye words." Such, for some, is Shakespeare's final message; no matter that this message has three a's in it and Prospero's lines only two.

There remains a postscript. The Two Noble Kinsmen was first published in 1634 and the title page ascribes it to John Fletcher and William Shakespeare. Readers have often disagreed with the ascription, but there is no uniformity in their disagreement; some attribute the entire play to Fletcher, some to Shakespeare. The ascription of the title page seems more reasonable than either of these extreme positions. Like the other late romances The Two Noble Kinsmen is rich in spectacle, which is perhaps related to the fact that Shakespeare's company was at the time using the Blackfriars theater, playing to audiences with courtly tastes. The play opens with a nuptial procession (described in some detail in the first stage direction) before the Temple of Hymen, and it contains processions to the altars of Mars, Venus, and Diana, as well as a country dance. Like Pericles, Cymbeline, and The Winter's Tale, The Two Noble Kinsmen is based on what Ben Jonson called a "mouldy tale"—in this case, the narrative romance that Chaucer's Knight tells in The Canterbury Tales. And like Shakespeare's other late plays, and unlike many of his earlier plays, characterization is flatter, resulting sometimes in sharp contrasts. It is occasionally so thin in this play that the effect is of characterlessness. Unlike Shakespeare's other romances, however, The Two Noble Kinsmen is not concerned with the regeneration of men who have sinned or erred or with the restoration of old losses, although at the end of the fifth act there are passages which strongly remind us of the other last plays:

O cousin,
That we should things desire which do cost us
The loss of our desire! That nought could buy
Dear love but loss of dear love! (V.iv.108-11)

And:

O you heavenly charmers,
What things you make of us! For what we lack,
We laugh; for what we have, are sorry; still
Are children in some kind. Let us be thankful
For that which is, and with you leave dispute
That are above our question. (V.iv.130-35)

But these passages are only passages, and the bulk of the dramatic action does not greatly support them. Much of The Two Noble Kinsmen is more mannered, more prettified, and more ceremonious but also more hollow than the romances. It has a politeness and a pointlessness that we associate with Fletcher. Possibly it is best to see The Two Noble Kinsmen as largely Fletcher's, with Shakespeare—not always at top form—writing perhaps Acts I and V and adding passages here and there.

Shakespeare's History Plays

There are some two hundred Elizabethan history plays, most of them written within a fairly short period, between 1588 or so and 1600. Before the defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588 there seems not to have been a single play on English history written for the public stage, though there were dramas on biblical, classical, and legendary heroes and villains, popular entertainments dramatizing Saint George of England and Robin Hood, and, for a limited audience, some academic dramas on English history with a very heavy infusion of political morality, notably Gorboduc (1561). For about a decade after the defeat of the Armada, the English history play was in vogue in the public theater. Of the eighteen plays that Shakespeare wrote up to the end of 1599 nine were on English history. But he then abandoned the genre, returning to it only once, at the end of his career, about 1613.

If we include plays on classical history (Julius Caesar, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus) and on legendary British history (King Lear, Macbeth, Cymbeline), almost half of Shakespeare's plays can be called historical, but the editors of the First Folio, in separating the histories from the comedies and tragedies, classified as history only those ten plays that dealt with relatively recent British history. These plays they arranged chronologically by date of subject matter (not of composition), beginning with King John and ending with Henry VIII. Three of these plays had been published earlier in individual volumes as tragedies: 3 Henry VI as The True Tragedy of Richard, Duke of York, Richard III as The Tragedy of King Richard III, and Richard II as The Tragedy of King Richard the Second. Conversely, King Lear, included in the Folio among the tragedies, was first published as The True Chronicle History of the Life and Death of King Lear, and The Merchant of Venice, a comedy, was first published as The Most Excellent History of the Merchant of Venice. The history play evidently was not (and is not) a clearly defined genre; but it is still useful to consider the ten history plays of the Folio as a group. The subject matter—political events in England—relates these plays to one another in a way that the Roman plays, for example, are not related. Though it is not quite true to say that the sole concern of the plays is politics and that the real protagonist is England (people keep breaking in). Even those plays that have a tragic shape, Richard II and Richard III, stand apart from such tragedies as King Lear and Macbeth by their primary emphasis on several characters engaged in political actions. Although political actions do occur in the tragedies, the primary emphasis is on what might be called the private matters of a central figure—for example, Lear's relations with his daughters and movement toward self-knowledge and Macbeth's relations with his conscience.

The first four plays—three on Henry VI and one on Richard III—cover a continuous period from 1422 to 1485 and so may be considered a tetralogy; four later plays—Richard II, 1 Henry IV, 2 Henry IV, and Henry V—cover an earlier continuous period from 1398 to 1422 and so may be considered a second tetralogy. The two tetralogies thus run from 1398 to 1485, when Henry VII, the first Tudor monarch and the grandfather of Queen Elizabeth, ascended the throne. These plays were presented singly, not as tetralogies, but insofar as each play looks both backward and forward and tells only a piece of a larger story, the tetralogies bear some resemblance to the great medieval cycles of miracle plays, which spanned time from the Creation to the Day of Judgment and which also allegedly presented history, showing such events as Herod's Slaughter of the Innocents and the subsequent punishment visited upon him. For example, in the first play of Shakespeare's second tetralogy, Richard II, Bolingbroke takes the throne from Richard, the next two plays reveal the suffering and turmoil consequent upon this act of usurpation and the working out of evil, and the last of the four plays, Henry V, reveals the restoration of peace and unity in England under a monarch said to be "the mirror of all Christian kings." Like the medieval cycles, Renaissance history plays were presumably not only entertaining but also instructive, for Elizabethans assumed that one learns from history how to behave. For the Elizabethans history, properly understood, was morality, as an Elizabethan schoolboy found when he read his Caesar and Sallust and Livy, for he saw that rebellion is inevitably punished. In the dedication to A Mirror for Magistrates (1559), a collection of narrative poems on the fall of rulers, the editor addresses "the nobility and all other in office" and informs them that "here, as in a looking glass, you shall see (if any vice be in you) how the like hath been punished in other heretofore, whereby admonished, I trust it will be a good occasion to move you to the sooner amendment." (Another aspect of this influential book is discussed in connection with Shakespeare's tragedies, pp. 54–55.) In 1592 Thomas Nashe defended the stage against puritanical attacks, by seizing on the moral implications of history plays. First, he held, they revive "our forefathers' valiant acts," serving as a "reproof to these degenerate effeminate days of ours"; second, "in plays, all cozenage, all cunning drifts over-gilded with outward holiness, all stratagems of war, all the cankerworms that breed on the rust of peace, are most lively anatomized: they show the ill success of treason, the fall of hasty climbers, the wretched end of usurpers, the misery of civil dissension, and how just God is evermore in punishing of murder."

This emphasis on history as morality serves also to link the history play to certain late morality plays which had concerned themselves with politics. Sometimes Shakespeare's plays strongly remind us of the abstractions of the old moralities, as when in 2 Henry VI a character says,

Ah, gracious lord, these days are dangerous:
Virtue is choked with foul ambition,

And charity chased hence by rancor's hand;
 Foul subornation is predominant,
 And equity exiled your highness' land. (III.i.142-46)

The political moralities, in turn, helped to give rise to a type that can be called the moral history. For example, John Bale's King John (1539, revised between 1558 and 1563) is indebted to the morality play for such characters as Nobility, Civil Order, Sedition, and Dissimulation, but it approaches the history play when Sedition becomes Stephen Langton, Private Wealth becomes Pandulphus, Usurper Power becomes the Pope, and so on. Moreover, King John is not deceived by evil counselors, as he would be in a morality play; rather, he is an ideal Christian and the defender of the widow England, though he is finally poisoned by Dissimulation, who has become the monk Simon of Swinstead. In some sense, then, Bale's King John is concerned not with the trial of a soul but with an historical failure. Only after John's death is England rescued from the wicked. In this respect Bale's play is closer to the miracle play than to the morality play; indeed, the Interpreter in the play compares John to Moses, who sought to withstand "proud Pharaoh for his poor Israel."

The Tudor history play, then, is not a period piece evoking the atmosphere of a particular age; rather, though it dramatizes the past, it is supposed to be timeless, for the sins and the political machinations of one age are very like those of another, and man (so the theory held) should learn from the past how to behave in the present. Contemporary problems of government are seen not through allegory but through episodes from the past. This idea is still with us, in such expressions as "History repeats itself" and "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." For the Elizabethans, parallels between reigns and between rulers readily suggested themselves. Queen Elizabeth, when reading some documents concerning Richard II (who had been deposed) is said to have angrily exclaimed, "I am Richard II." And in 1601 Essex arranged for a performance of Shakespeare's Richard II the day before his rebellion against Elizabeth, presumably to show the populace that a monarch might be deposed.

But though Shakespeare's history plays show the painful consequences of usurpation and tyranny, they are not sermons; a central character, representative of mankind, no longer dominates the plays, and they are filled with personalities who color or overshadow the political lessons. If the plays sometimes seem to illustrate a text in the first book of homilies, An Exhortation Concerning Good Order and Obedience to Rulers and Magistrates (1547)—"Take away kings . . . and such estates of God's order, no man shall sleep in his house or bed unkilld; . . . there must needs follow all mischief"—they do so not simply from a desire to urge subjects to be dutiful but from an understanding of the ways people act and react. To take a simple example: with the aid of Worcester and others Bolingbroke deposes Richard II; in the next play, 1 Henry IV, Bolingbroke (now Henry IV) finds that he cannot trust his former allies, and Worcester finds that he cannot trust the new king, for he knows that Henry will always suspect him of feeling that he has not been sufficiently rewarded; moreover, Henry will always suspect Worcester of contemplating yet a second overthrow of a king. If there is a moral here, it is not obtrusive; the play is chiefly about people, rather than about providence's government of the realm, though it is true that as in medieval drama there is a sense of retribution: crimes are punished.

That the plays are not overtly didactic is perhaps the more remarkable in view of their relation to the moral histories and their immediate derivation for the most part from Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1577); second edition, used by Shakespeare, 1587). About 1501 Henry VIII, the first Tudor, brought Polydore Virgil from Italy to rewrite English history from the Tudor point of view, and Virgil's work, along with that of several successors (notably Edward Hall), was more or less incorporated into Holinshed's enormous history book. (Strictly speaking, Holinshed's own work also became incorporated into the book bearing his name because the second edition was not really his; it was produced by collaborators after his death.) As part of this rewriting of history, Richard III, for example, who was pushed from the throne by Henry VII, was made into a monster, first by Sir Thomas More and Polydore Virgil, then by Hall, who borrowed from them, and then by Holinshed, who used their material. Holinshed borrowed not only many of the details of his predecessors but also the overall view that the history of England showed the workings of God: Henry IV's usurpation of the throne led to a century of war, but God watched over England, punished the wicked, and at last placed the Tudors on the throne. Occasionally this note is heard in Shakespeare's history plays, especially in the last history, Henry VIII, which celebrates the birth of Queen Elizabeth and which suggests that England is again Eden. But for the most part the plays give us a picture of men forging their own destinies, though of course such a picture is not incompatible with the idea that God works in mysterious ways, leaving man's will free but finally seeing that His will is done.

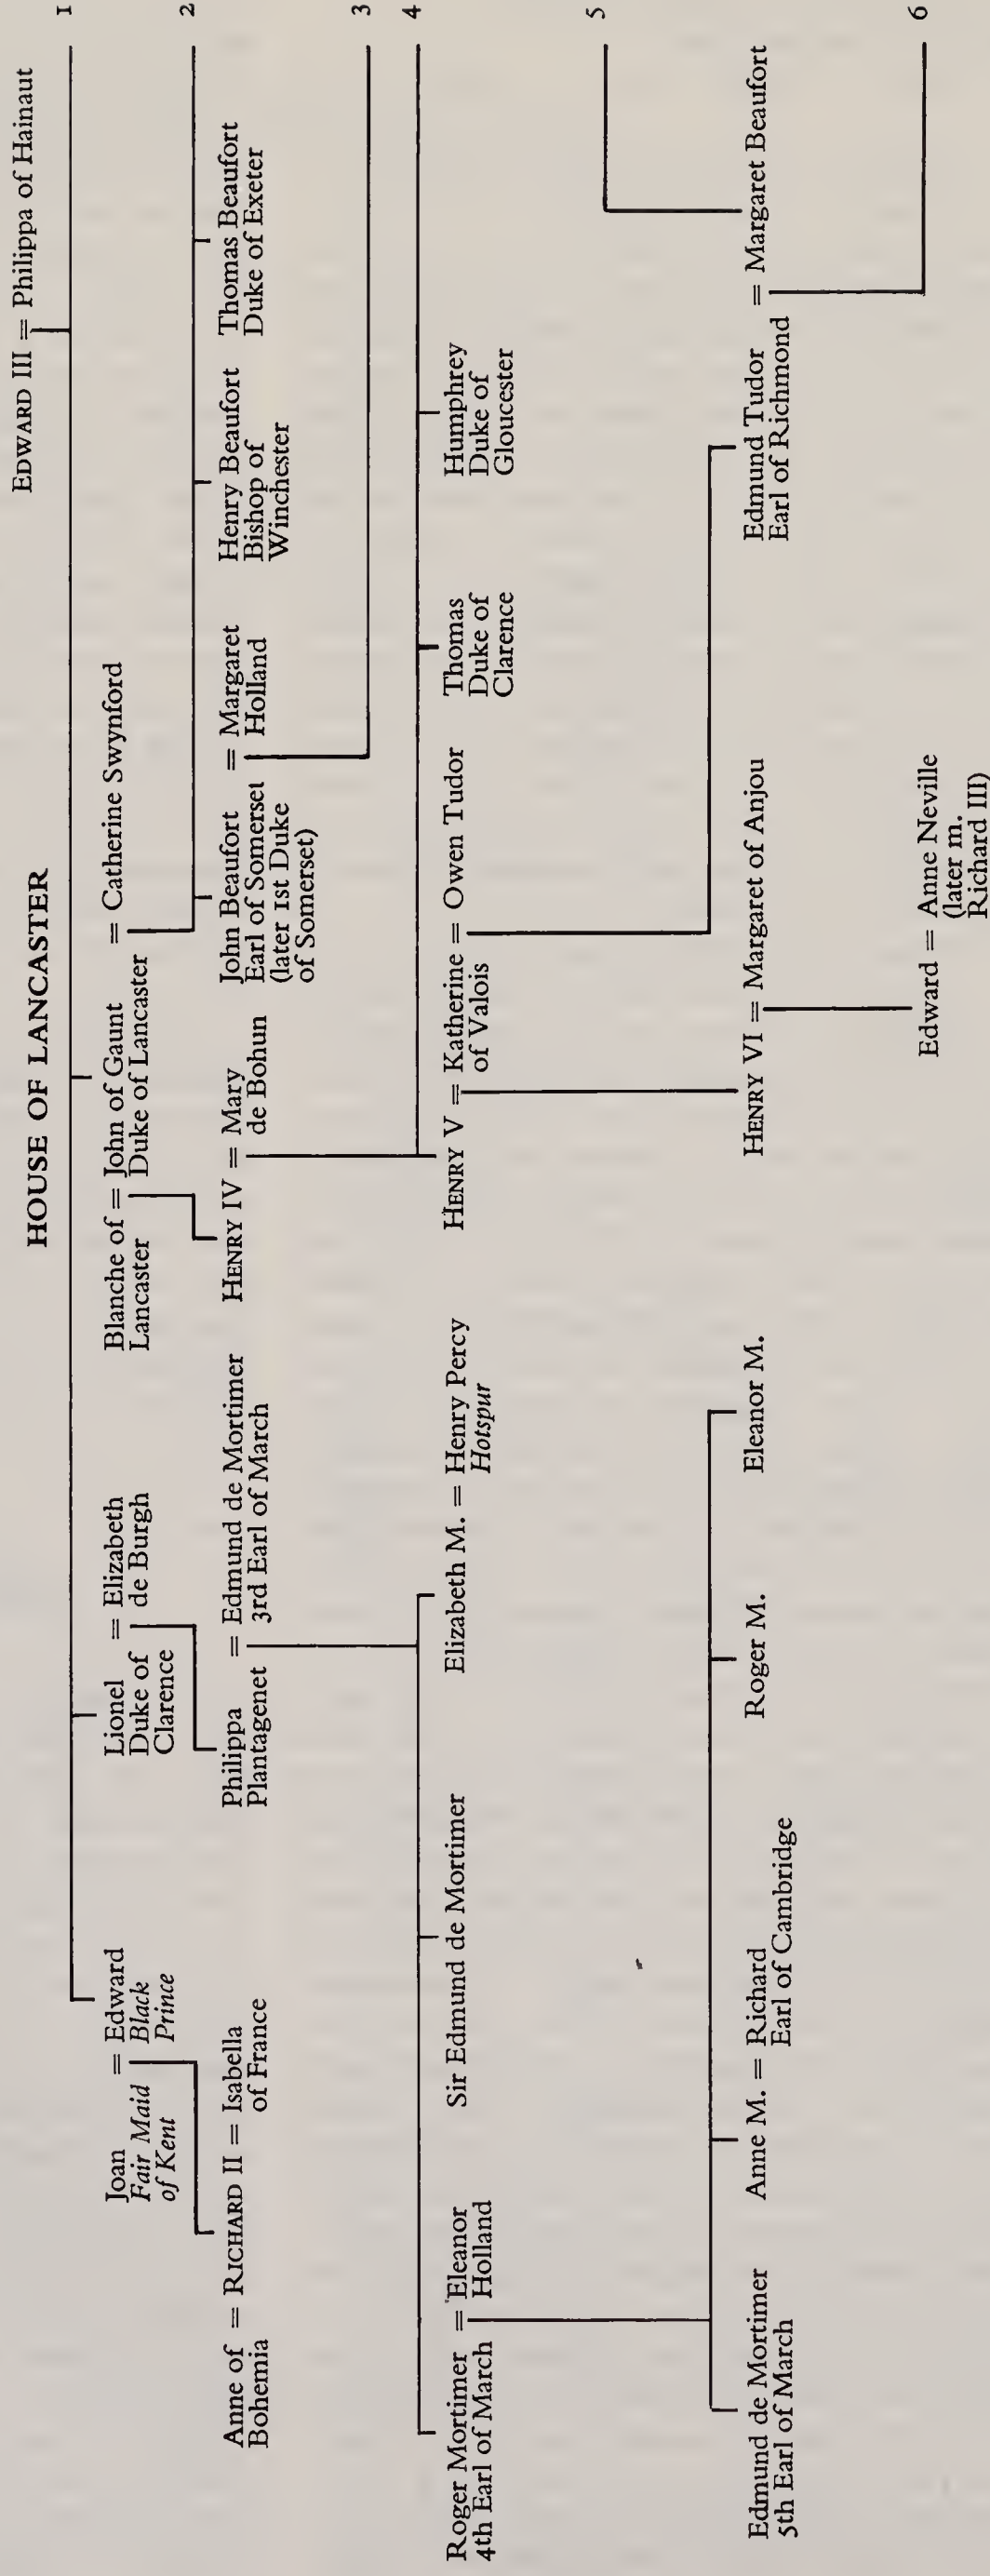

THE FIRST TETRALOGY: HENRY VI AND RICHARD III

The three plays on Henry VI, covering about fifty years from the death of Henry V (1422) to the murder of Henry VI (1471), are troublesome, and some critics claim that much in these plays was written by a hand other than Shakespeare's. (If the plays are entirely by Shakespeare, it may well be that he originated the English history play, for it is not certain that any plays of this type preceded them on the public stage, the moral histories being closer to the morality plays than to these chronicle plays.) Probably the most widely accepted view today is that the three plays are chiefly Shakespeare's, written between 1588 and 1592, and that 1 Henry VI was written after 2 and 3 Henry VI; possibly 1 Henry VI is Shakespeare's revision of an older play. Of the three, 1 Henry VI is notably the most episodic; it more or less chronicles a period, but it does not always pull the events into a unity (though of course it can be said that the play is united by its theme of the weakness of England under a vacillating king). There is some attempt to appeal to patriotism—the "brave" Talbot is an English paragon who has captured fifty French fortresses—and some attempt to warn Englishmen against disunity—Talbot is "entrapped" by "the fraud of England, not the

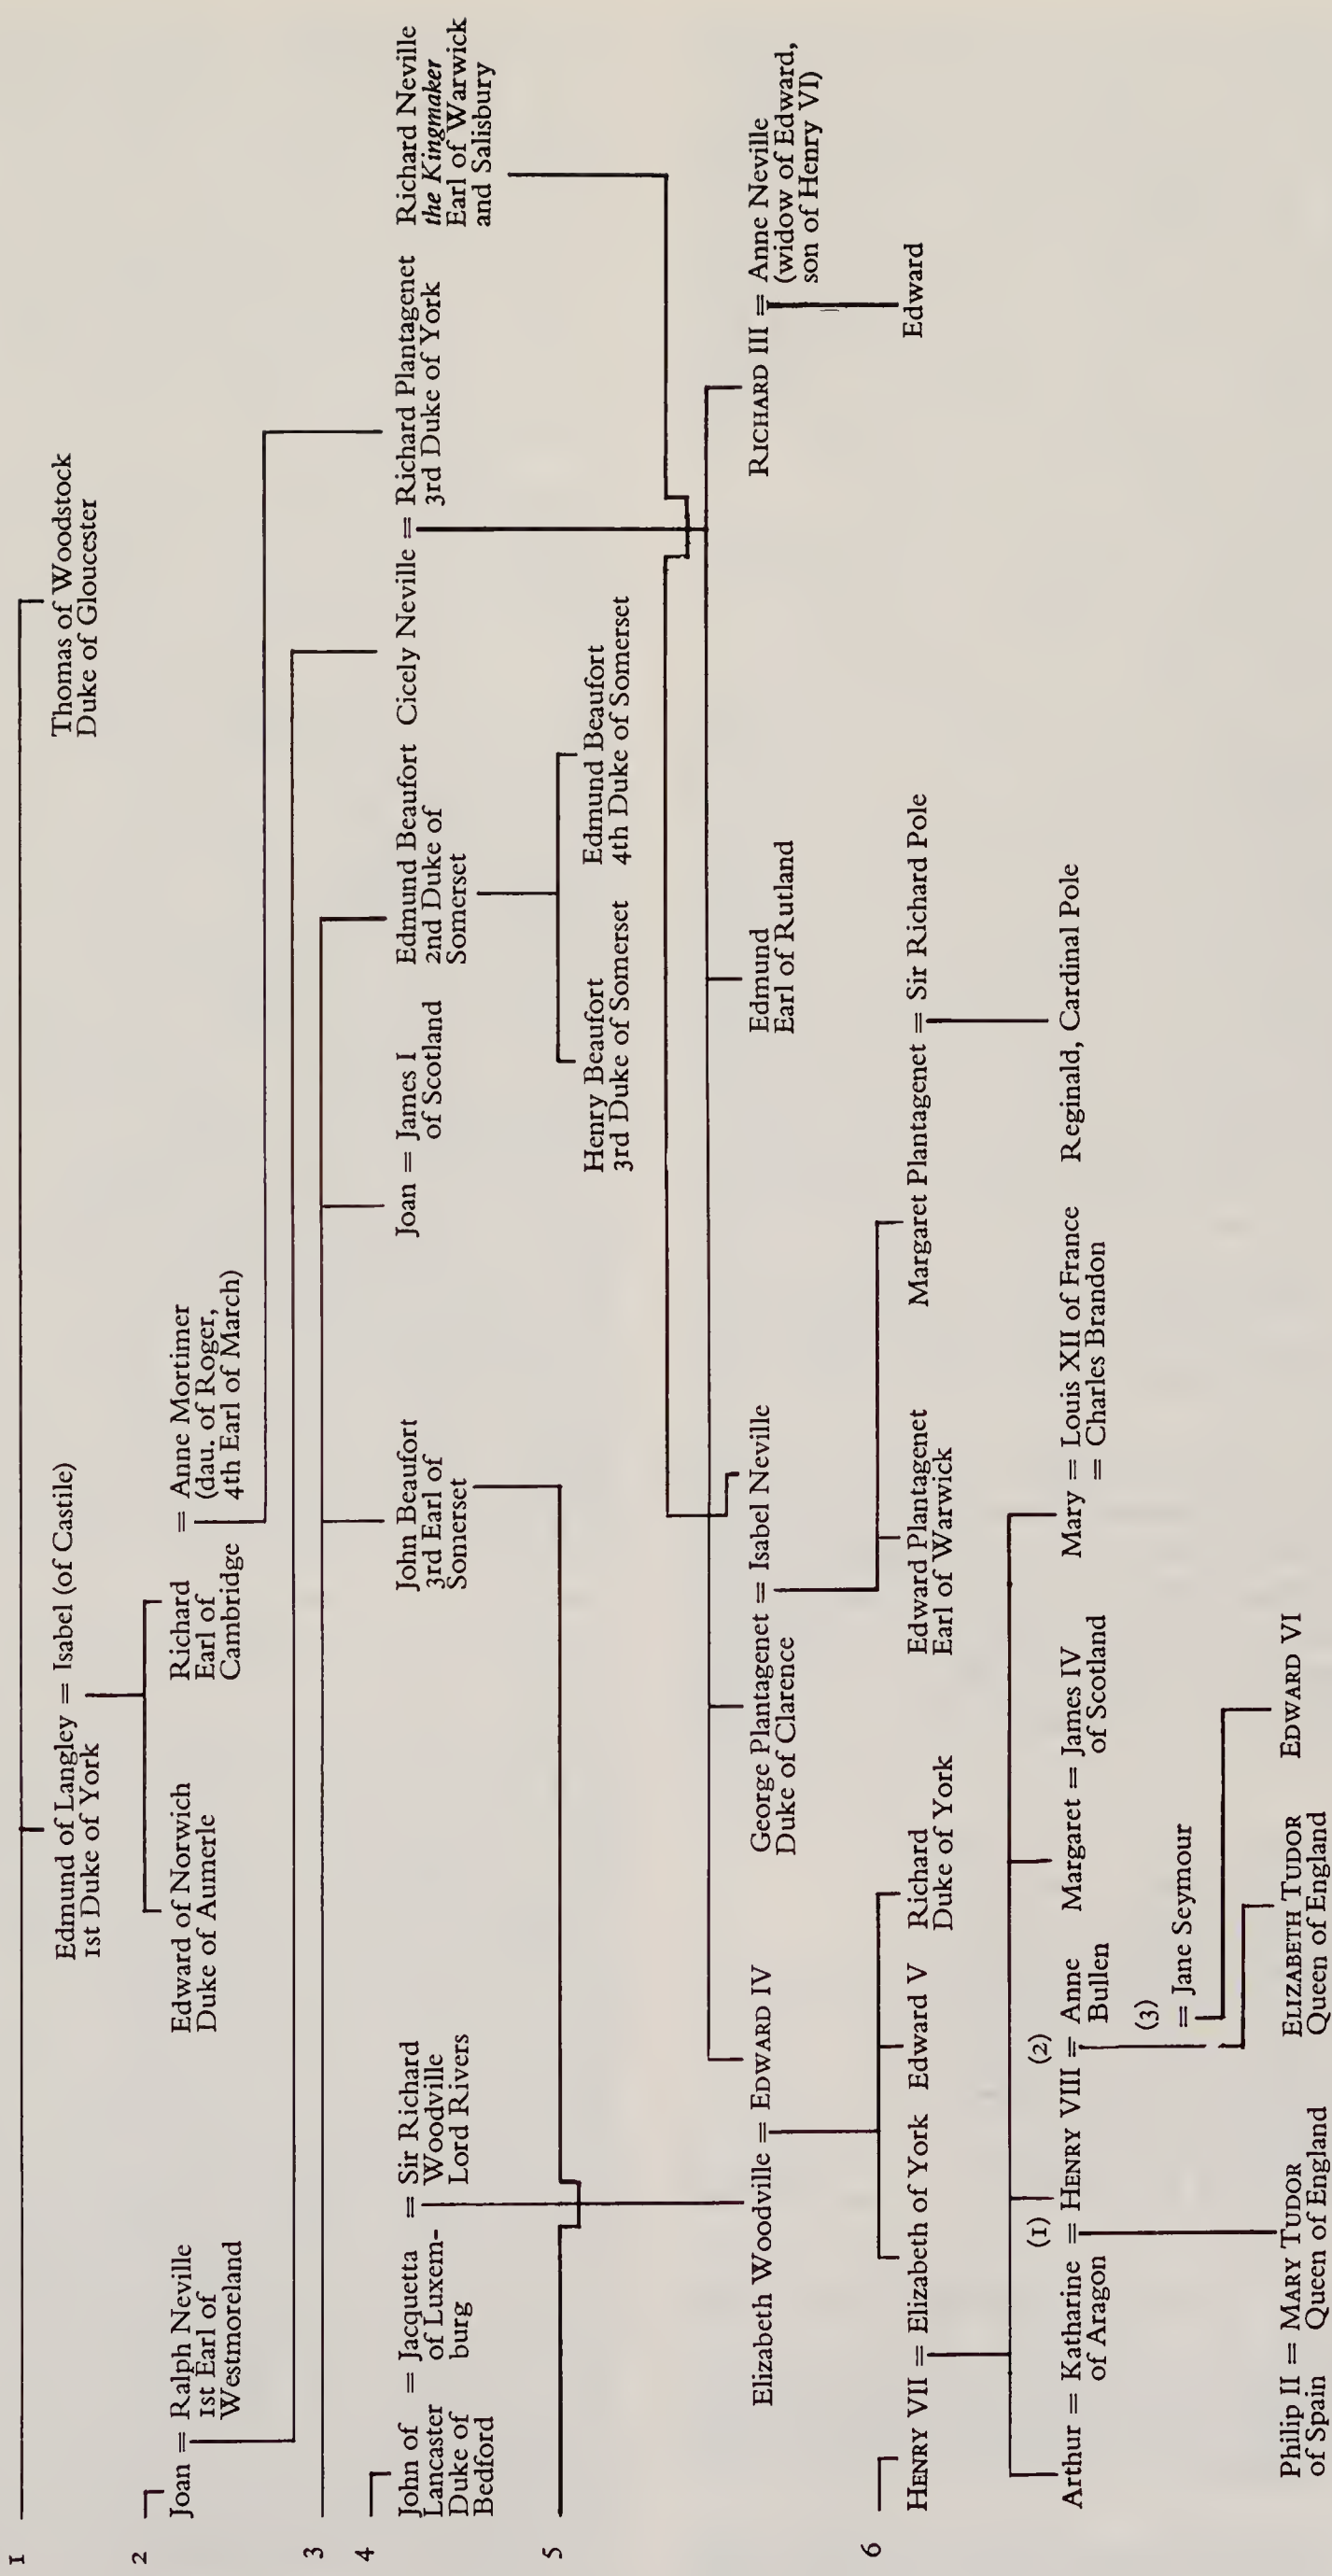

Genealogical Table of the Houses of York and Lancaster

The table below traces the history of the English crown for 277 years: from 1327 when Edward III was crowned to 1603 when Elizabeth I died. The period began with the Hundred Years War (1337–1453), which saw the English gain then lose a vast French empire. Even before the French wars were concluded civil strife erupted at home. From 1455 to 1485 the bitter Wars of the Roses raged, and the crown became the plaything of the great noble families. One hundred and fifty years of fighting abroad and on their own soil had decimated the ranks of the important feudal houses of Plantagenet, York, Lancaster, and others. A new English dynasty was founded at Bosworth where Henry Tudor, Elizabeth's grandfather, was given the crown. Nine of Shakespeare's plays (Richard II; 1 and 2 Henry IV; Henry V; 1, 2, and 3 Henry VI; Richard III; and Henry VIII) chronicle the events of these years. The table includes many of the characters who people the plays. The names of reigning monarchs are written in small capitals. HOUSE OF YORK force of France" (IV.iv.36-37). On the whole, the play is a series of scenes, some of which are effective, especially in establishing antitheses (as between the heroic Talbot and the wicked Joan and between honest Humphrey Duke of Gloucester and the corrupt Bishop of Winchester), but some of which lead nowhere, chiefly, it seems, because Shakespeare did not yet have that insight into human nature that he was to achieve in his later historical plays. Something too must be forgiven a dramatist who sets out to dramatize material whose shapelessness Holinshed (Shakespeare's source) explained in this manner: "Thus oftentimes varied the chance of doubtful war."

That Shakespeare saw in the history play something other than a mere exhortation of patriotism, or a mere illustration of providence's concern for England, is revealed also in 2 and 3 Henry VI. In 2 Henry VI the king evokes pity but little respect; Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, evokes horror; and Cade and his low followers evoke laughter. Only Duke Humphrey is much of a credit to England, and he is murdered halfway through the play. Like 1 Henry VI, 2 Henry VI contains scenes that do not lead to further action and that at first glance perhaps seem extraneous—such as Duke Humphrey's exposure of Simcox, who claims to have been miraculously cured of blindness (II.i), and the death of Thomas the armorer at the hands of his apprentice (II.iii). But these scenes are in fact relevant to the whole: the first episode helps to demonstrate the good sense that Humphrey has and that the king lacks; the second helps to demonstrate the disorder that pervades the realm, showing on a low level the chaos that exists also among the nobility. The material concerning Jack Cade's rebellion provides York with the excuse that he must bring back his army from Ireland to put down the lowly Cade, and in Cade's ignorance and cruelty there is yet another image of the horrors of civil strife engendered by the nobles. The brutality that is present throughout the play is neatly illustrated in a single sentence when Cade replies to Lord Say's self-defense: "He shall die, an it be but for pleading so well for his life." That brutality engenders further brutality is well dramatized throughout the play but perhaps nowhere more effectively than in V.ii, when young Clifford finds that his father has been slain by York:

York not our old men spares;
No more will I their babes: tears virginal
Shall be to me even as the dew to fire,
And beauty, that the tyrant oft reclaims,
Shall to my flaming wrath be oil and flax.
Henceforth I will not have to do with pity:
Meet I an infant of the house of York,
Into as many gobbets will I cut it
As wild Medea young Absyrtus did. (V.ii.51-59)

The mythological reference in the last line—a simile occupying exactly one end-stopped line—is a bit of gratuitously and obtrusively displayed learning, but on the whole the speech is a fine one, especially in the powerful simplicity of "Henceforth I will not have to do with pity."

3 Henry VI continues the dramatization of chaos from about 1455 to 1471. In the first act young Clifford fulfills the promise he made in 2 Henry VI not to spare "babes" when he kills York's youngest son, the Earl of Rutland. Other deaths follow in this highly episodic play, but the episodes are thematically united in their emphasis on the breadth of the destruction, as in the scene balancing a son who has killed his father against a father who has killed his son and in the death of the young Prince Edward, which is a variation on the death of young Rutland. 3 Henry VI ends with Richard murdering Henry VI, and with the accession of Edward IV; but despite Edward's concluding line—"For here, I hope, begins our lasting joy"—the ending is not an ending, because (as Edward's feeble "I hope" almost implies) bloodshed is to continue in Richard III. Richard's distinctive blend of irony and cruelty is already present in the first scene of 3 Henry VI, when instead of recounting his exploits in battle, as his brothers do, he throws down the severed head of the Duke of Somerset and says, "Speak thou for me, and tell them what I did." Richard continues this tone to the end of the play, when he holds up his bloody sword and says, "See how my sword weeps for the poor king's death." Between these speeches he vows "to catch the English crown . . . / Or hew [his] way out with a bloody ax." Richard's subsequent bloody deeds are the substance of the fourth play of the tetralogy, Richard III.

The Tudor chroniclers had reported Richard's enormities, and Shakespeare followed them in describing a man capable of every inhumanity. In the three plays in which Richard appears, he is compared to (in alphabetical order) a bear, a boar, a dog, a hedgehog, a lizard, a spider, a tiger, a toad, and a wolf, as well as to three mythical beasts, a basilisk, a cockatrice, and a hellhound. But why is he capable of every sort of villainy? And why is he not simply repellent to us? The answer to the first question briefly is that Richard (like Aaron in Titus Andronicus and Iago in Othello) is descended from the medieval Vice, the diabolic trickster who delighted in villainy. The answer to the second question is probably that Richard's energy and enthusiasm in his villainy offer esthetic pleasure; he continually sees himself as an actor performing the most outrageous roles, and though we deplore his atrocities we delight in his verve. We can attribute Richard's own delight in activity and power to the fact that as a hunchback he cannot know the normal satisfactions that come from respect and love, and in a long speech in 3 Henry VI (III.ii.146-71) Richard suggests that since he is barred from normal delights he will dedicate himself to the conquest of "such as are of better person than myself." But Shakespeare sees Richard too as the unmotivated Vice; indeed, Richard sees himself as the Vice: "Thus, like the formal Vice, Iniquity, / I moralize [interpret] two meanings in one word" (III.i.82-83). (The Vice regularly deceived people by double meanings.) This aside to the audience, inviting an appreciation of Richard's theatrical skill as well as of his theatrical origin, helps us to see him as an expert performer rather than as a moral monster. (In an aside at the very end of 3 Henry VI he invites the audience to see him as no less skilled in deception than Judas.) Thus Richard is sometimes the passionate man, defrauded by the accident of his misshapen body; but at other times (and most often) he is a spirit of deceit, given to witty asides and soliloquies, entertaining in his very mischief, and inviting the audience to delight in his resourcefulness even though his energy is misdirected:

I do the wrong, and first begin to brawl.
The secret mischiefs that I set abroad
I lay unto the grievous charge of others.

But then I sigh, and with a piece of Scripture
Tell them that God bids us do good for evil;
And thus I clothe my naked villainy
With odd old ends stol'n forth of holy writ,
And seem a saint when most I play the devil.
(I.iii.323-25, 333-37)

The most notable of Richard's successes, the winning of Lady Anne (whose husband and father he had killed), is accomplished, as he says, with no aid other than "the plain devil and dissembling looks." We deplore his immorality but we admire his theatrical skill.

Another theatrical tradition put to work in this play should be mentioned: historically Margaret played no part in the action, for she had gone to France and died there, but Shakespeare seems to use her as a Senecan Fury, a creature who moves others to vengeance and whose curses embody destiny, specifically in the form of retributive justice—though the idea of retribution is found in some miracle plays too, where such tyrants as Pharaoh and Herod come to a bad end, and also in much of A Mirror for Magistrates. In short, Richard III draws the gist of its plot from the chronicles, but it draws its understanding of the plot, and its methods, from earlier drama. (For a discussion of the medieval origins of the comic murderers in I.iv, who discuss the power of conscience, see pp. 13-14.) Superimposed on these theatrical traditions is the Tudor chronicler's view that God expressed His will in English history; England is providentially united by the victory of the rather colorless Richmond, who defeats "one that hath ever been God's enemy." The marriage of Richmond (Lancastrian) to Princess Elizabeth (Yorkist) will unite the factions of England and thus end the Wars of the Roses.

KING JOHN

There is a good deal of uncertainty about the date of King John (conjectures range from 1590 to 1597) and some uncertainty about that of Richard II (conjectures range from 1595 to 1597). Whichever play was earlier, it is clear that having written an historical tetralogy Shakespeare decided to continue writing history plays but not to carry the story beyond where he had left it, with the accession of Henry VII in 1485. To have carried it forward would have brought him up to the sixteenth century—dangerously close to his own times. Instead he went backward, to King John (1167?-1216) and to Richard II (1367-1400). But parallels with contemporary politics were not thereby excluded: King John's rejection of the Papal Legate's authority (III.i) was often seen as an anticipation of Henry VIII's break with the Roman Catholic Church and of Elizabeth's position after the pope excommunicated her in 1569; the deposition of Richard II, as Shakespeare's company found out, was for a while taken as a comment to the effect that Elizabeth might appropriately be deposed.

King John was a figure of considerable interest to the Elizabethans, but not because he signed the Magna Carta, which Shakespeare does not even mention. Because he defied papal authority medieval chroniclers saw in John a wicked king; for the same reason, most Tudor chroniclers saw in John a Protestant martyr. When about 1536 the militant Protestant John Bale wrote an anti-Catholic political morality play, he sought to avoid anything reminiscent of the old religious drama and so went to English history and chose King John as his central figure. But unlike Bale's play, Shakespeare's King John is not vehemently anti-Catholic, despite the king's rebuff to the Papal Legate; nor is the play calculated to appeal throughout to an Englishman's patriotism, for John is a usurper and he is responsible for the death of his nephew Arthur, the legitimate heir. In fact, Shakespeare's King John is a mixture of the two historical traditions; he owes something to the Catholic tradition of the lawless king and something to the Protestant tradition of the nationalistic martyr. This blend of traditions is pretty far from Richard III, where good and evil are clearly separated; and it is also pretty far from any simple view of English history. In King John the historical material is used as the stuff of moral decisions, and with hindsight we can see John as an anticipation of Shakespeare's Brutus, a man whose political motives are honorable (John seeks to strengthen England) but who becomes involved in moral guilt (complicity in Arthur's death). And so John degenerates after III.ii (though he is unaccountably called "our great King John" in V.iv) and dies unheroically, while Faulconbridge, the engaging satiric commentator, rises. Faulconbridge's final speech is a patriotic address:

This England never did, nor never shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror
But when it first did help to wound itself. (V.vii.112-14)

Perhaps more interesting than this dubious assertion (which seems to have little to do with the shifting allegiances of international politics throughout the play) is the fact that Faulconbridge is a serious yet at times comic character who wittily and shrewdly comments on the passing scene. None of the earlier histories has so complex a figure; indeed, it is partly the characterization of Faulconbridge that makes the date of 1590 seem too early for this play. But Shakespeare is full of surprises.

THE SECOND TETRALOGY:

RICHARD II, 1 AND 2 HENRY IV, HENRY V

Richard II (1595), the first play of Shakespeare's second tetralogy, is very different from King John, partly because it is given a tragic shape. Its antecedents include those narrative poems in A Mirror for Magistrates and its predecessors that set forth the fall of kings, and Richard sees himself as a fit subject for such a story:

Let's talk of graves, of worms, and epitaphs,
Make dust our paper, and with rainy eyes
Write sorrow on the bosom of the earth.
Let's choose executors and talk of wills.

For God's sake let us sit upon the ground
And tell sad stories of the death of kings:

How some have been deposed, some slain in war,
 Some haunted by the ghosts they have deposed,
 Some poisoned by their wives, some sleeping killed,
 All murdered—for within the hollow crown
 That rounds the mortal temples of a king
 Keeps Death his court, and there the antic sits,
 Scoffing his state and grinning at his pomp,
 Allowing him a breath, a little scene,
 To monarchize, be feared, and kill with looks,
 Infusing him with self and vain conceit,
 As if this flesh which walls about our life
 Were brass impregnable; and, humored thus,
 Comes at the last, and with a little pin
 Bores thorough his castle wall, and farewell king!
 (III.ii.145-48, 155-70)

Later in the play he urges his queen to "tell . . . the lamentable tale of me,/And send the hearers weeping to their beds."

With Richard's fall comes Bolingbroke's rise, giving us the first extant English play in which two characters are pitted against each other. (In Marlowe's Edward II the weakling protagonist, who must have influenced Shakespeare's conception of Richard, is opposed not by an individual but by a group.) Viewed one way, as the Duke of York explains to Richard (II.i.195-99), the play is the tragedy of an irresponsible king who makes the mistake of confiscating John of Gaunt's estate, thus bringing Gaunt's son Bolingbroke back to England to claim his inheritance and finally to depose and indirectly murder Richard. Viewed another way, the play is a political play exploring the nature of kingship, the duties of subjects, and the realities of political struggles. Twentieth-century critics have tended to stress the second view, but for the general reader—who is not likely to be familiar with Tudor historical writing or to have in mind the three subsequent histories (1 Henry IV, 2 Henry IV, and Henry V) that deal with the results of the deposition—the play probably remains a tragedy; its protagonist anticipates Hamlet in his neurotic sensibility, his changeableness, and his grief—which is not to say that there are not enormous differences between Richard and Hamlet.

If Richard II is a tragedy, or even if it is a political play, what sort of king is Richard? Critics divide into the soft-hearted and the hardhearted. The first group sees Richard as a poet, a delicate and tender prince too fine for this gross world (according to W. B. Yeats, he belongs to that group of people who lack a commonplace "rough energy" but have something more precious, such as "contemplative virtue, . . . lyrical phantasy, . . . sweetness of temper"). The hardhearted group turns this view inside out and says that if Richard is a poet, he is a very bad poet, a man in love with words but indifferent to people other than himself, and ignorant of himself because he swathes his actions in such abundant metaphors that he loses sight of the actions themselves. This second view is now dominant, and much stress has been put on Richard's tendency to use highly figurative language. It should be mentioned, however, that Richard is not the only one in this play to use elaborate figures. The truth is that the play is highly figurative throughout; even the Gardener speaks metaphoric verse; and Bolingbroke, widely regarded as businesslike, describes his exile thus:

Must I not serve a long apprenticeship
 To foreign passages, and in the end,
 Having my freedom, boast of nothing else
 But that I was a journeyman to grief? (I.iii.270-73)

The figure of an exile as an apprentice, heightened by the pun on "journeyman," cautions us against speaking too easily of Richard as a man whose fault is that he plays on words, or whose strength is a sensitivity to language. Probably the truth is that Shakespeare had only recently—perhaps because he had been writing two narrative poems and dozens of sonnets—developed as a poet and was now writing not merely drama in somewhat mechanical verse but drama in highly lyrical poetry. Like Romeo and Juliet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, Richard II is among Shakespeare's first plays to employ iterative imagery—that is, recurring images that help to give unity to the play. The dates of these three plays are uncertain (probably all were written between 1594 and 1596); Richard II may indeed be Shakespeare's first play to use such imagery. There are many images, for example, comparing England to a garden. These are most obvious in III.iv, when the Gardener and his man compare their commonwealth, the garden itself, to Richard's garden, England. The man asks his master why they should in the compass of a pale,

 Keep law and form and due proportion,
 Showing, as in a model, our firm estate,
 When our sea-walled garden, the whole land,
 Is full of weeds, her fairest flowers choked up,
 Her fruit trees all unpruned, her hedges ruined,
 Her knots disordered, and her wholesome herbs
 Swarming with caterpillars? (III.iv.40-47)

The Gardener replies, now varying the figure by seeing Richard himself as a plant:

He that hath suffered this disordered spring
 Hath now himself met with the fall of leaf:
 The weeds which his broad spreading leaves did shelter,
 That seemed in eating him to hold him up,
 Are plucked up root and all by Bolingbroke—
 I mean the Earl of Wiltshire, Bushy, Green.
 (III.iv.48-53)

And so on. But such imagery is not confined to this scene, where it is almost inevitable. John of Gaunt earlier compares England to the Garden of Eden, and goes on to say that Richard has degraded it to a wretched farm; Bolingbroke characterizes Bushy and others as "the caterpillars of the commonwealth,/Which I have sworn to weed and pluck away"; Richard later is said to be a rightful king "planted many years," and if Bolingbroke usurps the crown "the blood of England shall manure the ground"; in his final speech Bolingbroke regrets that "blood should sprinkle me to make me grow."

Although there are manifest dangers in reading a play as though it were a short lyric poem (the spectator, after all, cannot hold each image in his mind and then relate it to the next occurrence of the image), it is clear that Richard II lends itself to this sort of reading. It should be noted too that some of the imagery is reinforced by the action. There are, for example, images and gestures of rising and falling (the play shows Bolingbroke's rise and Richard's fall), as in Richard's invitation to "sit upon the ground/And tell sad stories of the death of kings" and in Richard's address to Bolingbroke, who is kneeling before him: "Up, cousin, up, your heart is up, I know." In short, actions as well as images have their effect. If in Richard II Shakespeare was writing a poetic play, he was also writing a poetic play.

In the two plays on the reign of Henry IV and the play on the reign of Henry V Shakespeare abandoned the tragic structure that he had used to give shape to Richard II and returned to a looser, chronicle arrangement. He returned also to the occasional use of prose and of comedy, both of which are absent from Richard II. These plays, however, do not merely plod through the happenings of the reigns as Shakespeare encountered them in history books, though the titles of the plays sometimes lead a reader to think they are shapeless. 1 Henry IV (1597), for instance, was first published under this title page (which includes the earliest extant use of the word history as a theatrical designation): The History of Henry the Fourth; with the battle at Shrewsbury between the King and Lord Henry Percy, surnamed Henry Hotspur of the north. With the humorous conceits of Sir John Falstaff. But the play is not merely a history or chronicle with a big battle and some "humorous conceits"; rather, it is largely organized by showing Henry IV visited by retribution, by juxtapositions of related characters, and by the story of the reformation of Prince Hal. (More precisely, the play is organized around the apparent reformation of Hal, since Hal even in his rakish days is never really sullied and therefore does not need to reform, though he does need to put off pleasure and to accept duty.) If one must come up with a single unifying formula, perhaps it will do to say that the play is about the revelation of Hal's political virtue. 1 Henry IV, then, bears some resemblance to the morality plays on the motif of the Prodigal Son. To put it perhaps too simply, Hal is a figure of Mankind, tempted toward a riotous life by Falstaff; but at length he recognizes his duty and returns to help his father conquer the rebellious lords. A bit more precisely, Hal allows Falstaff to entertain him with images of riotous behavior but does his duty when required. The nature of honor is wonderfully explored, sometimes in explicit speeches about honor, as in Hotspur's rather huffing lines about plucking "bright honor from the palefaced moon" (I.iii.192-206) and in Falstaff's pragmatic catechism to the effect that honor is a mere "word, . . . air" (V.i.127-41) and again in his later comments on the "grinning honor" that the dead Sir Walter Blount has won (V.iii.32-33, 58-63). Sometimes the nature of honor is explored in actions, as when Hal defeats Hotspur and (by way of contrast) when Falstaff shams death. And of course the explicit discussions fuse with the actions: for example, a moment after Falstaff concludes that honor is only a word, Worcester dishonorably fails to tell Hotspur of "the liberal and kind offer of the king." While exploring honor, specifically in the political world, Shakespeare also explores the nature of kingship, partly by arranging his scenes so that they illuminate his themes. In the beginning of the play the king is weak and shaken, but he looks forward to a time of security when he can make a crusade to Jerusalem. News soon comes to the effect that a rebellion (recall that Henry himself had been a rebel against Richard II) prevents this journey. This first scene alludes to Northumberland's son Hotspur, and the king, commenting on his own scapegrace son, expresses his envy of Northumberland, who has "so blest a son." The next scene shows the scapegrace with Falstaff, and in the course of the scene it becomes clear that Hal is not quite what his father thinks. The third scene, showing the king dealing with his potentially rebellious allies, brings Hotspur on the stage, and the disloyalty of the young man who a bit earlier had been praised by the king is now explicit. Such juxtapositions are the work of a dramatist, not a chronicler. Lest there be any doubt, it is worth mentioning (to take only the most obvious example) that Shakespeare made Hotspur—who in fact was thirty-nine at the Battle of Shrewsbury—much younger, pairing him off with Hal, who in fact was sixteen at Shrewsbury.

The play, then, is carefully constructed. However, it seems likely that at the start Shakespeare did not know just where he was going. Judging from the early part of the play, with its talk of rejecting Falstaff, it rather looks as though Shakespeare planned to end the play with the death of Henry IV, the coronation of Hal, and the rejection of Falstaff; but midway through the play he perhaps found that too much material remained to be fitted into the little space remaining, and so he ended with the victory at Shrewsbury and saved the additional material for another play, 2 Henry IV, which he probably wrote shortly after.

A spectator watching 2 Henry IV (1597-98) must start with the assumption that Hal is still unreformed and unreconciled with the king, although reformation and reconciliation take place in 1 Henry IV. That is, this sequel again removes Hal from the tavern and reconciles him with the king. But despite this resemblance in plot, the plays are very different, for 2 Henry IV is a darker play, and if its theme can be summed up in a word, that word is not honor or valor but justice. But it is not only that the theme is different; the world of the play is different. In 2 Henry IV there are numerous images of diseases: Northumberland is sick (or crafty-sick); the king is sick and during the play dies; the kingdom is sick ("You perceive the body of our kingdom/How foul it is, what rank diseases grow"), and perhaps most important for our present purpose, Falstaff is sick. When we first meet him he is inquiring about the doctor's opinion of his urine (I.ii); later he says, "I am old, I am old," and the Chief Justice describes him so incisively that even Falstaff's witty retort does not obliterate the image of decrepit age:

Have you not a moist eye, a dry hand, a yellow cheek, a white beard, a decreasing leg, an increasing belly? Is not your voice broken, your wind short, your chin double, your wit single, and every part about you blasted with antiquity . . . ?

Moreover, in 2 Henry IV Falstaff is associated with darker companions, the doddering and corrupt Justice Shallow, the craven braggart Pistol, and the whore Doll Tearsheet, the last two of whom have beaten a man to death. There is humor in the play, but on the whole the humor is of a different sort, tinged with darkness. In 1 Henry IV there are delightful bouts in which Hal and Falstaff heap abundant entertaining abuse on each other, but in 2 Henry IV Hal and Falstaff have only two scenes together: in the first of these scenes (II.iv) there is some of the old fooling, but the scene ends with Hal's brusque "Give me my sword and cloak. Falstaff, good night"; in the second scene (V.v.47 ff.) Hal rejects Falstaff, in a famous speech beginning "I know thee not, old man." The speech is justly famous, but for some critics it is notorious because Hal (in their view) callously turns off an old companion, revealing that accession to the throne has narrowed his sympathies to those of only another politic man who knows how to get ahead in the world. Against this view it can be argued that at his coronation Hal can scarcely embrace the man who represents disorder, and that in this play—as opposed to 1 Henry IV, where he is more genial—Falstaff represents not an engaging comprehensiveness but disorder or anarchy. At least at a crucial moment, when he learns that Hal has become king, he utters a joyous yet dangerous bullying cry:

Let us take any man's horses; the laws of England are at my commandment. Blessed are they that have been my friends, and woe to my Lord Chief Justice!

Falstaff's joy is undercut even more by the fact that the audience, having already seen Hal take the Lord Chief Justice as his new guide, knows that Falstaff must be rejected. In a sense, the end of the play brings us back to the beginning, when in the Prologue Rumor talks about "smooth comforts false" that help to destroy men. (Another aspect of this motif is the deceptive words by which Prince John destroys the rebels; in 1 Henry IV heroism plays a part in putting down rebellion, but not in 2 Henry IV.) However we take the rejection of Falstaff, whether as an indication of Hal's maturity or of his diminution, 2 Henry IV remains a very different play from 1 Henry IV. But to say that 2 Henry IV is the darker of the two is not to say that it is black; despite the emphasis on sickness, corruption, and death, there is some mirth and some nobility, not least when the wretched Feeble, a conscripted recruit, says, "I will do my good will, sir. You can have no more" and, with a pun on debt/death, "A man can die but once. We owe God a death. I'll ne'er bear a base mind. And't be my destiny, so. And't be not, so. No man's too good to serve's prince" (III.ii.239–42).

Possibly before Shakespeare wrote Henry V (1598–99) he wrote The Merry Wives of Windsor, a comedy with Falstaff, but that play does not concern us here; for despite Falstaff's presence, The Merry Wives makes no use of historical materials. In Henry V Shakespeare finished the tetralogy that he began with Richard II and then developed in two plays on the reign of Henry IV. In Henry V he returned to the rather episodic technique of his earliest history plays, in which the chief principle of arrangement is chronology, though of course he was highly selective in what he presented. The play is usually regarded as a dramatic epic, a kind of narrative of the heroic doings of "the mirror of all Christian kings," a king who, because he is not weak like Richard or tainted like the usurper Henry IV, can lead his country to glory in a just war against France. This interpretation may be right, but it is too simple for some readers, especially readers living in an age when war is inglorious. As a result, a counterinterpretation has developed: Henry is less an ideal king than an adept politician, a man of narrow sensibilities (had he not narrowed himself when he rejected Falstaff, saying he "despised" the life that Falstaff stood for?), at ease uttering hypocrisies and playing upon men. Yeats, whose praise of Richard II was quoted earlier, put it thus: "Having made the vessel of porcelain Richard II, Shakespeare had to make the vessel of clay Henry V. He makes him the reverse of all that Richard was. He has the gross vices, the coarse nerves, of one who is to rule among violent people." Thus Henry's lament on the treachery of Scroop, Cambridge, and Grey (II.ii.127–42), which moves him to say "I will weep for thee;/For this revolt of thine, methinks, is like/Another fall of man," has led critics to comment sourly that Henry had betrayed Falstaff and goes on to betray his other early friends. One sympathizes with critics who find complexity here, and one cannot brush off the complexity simply by saying that it exists only in the minds of the critics, for as Robert Frost once remarked, a poet is entitled to the credit for everything that a reader finds in his work. Still, the three traitors themselves confess their treachery; nowhere is there an explicit statement that lends support to the idea that we are not to take Henry's words at face value. Similarly, though it can be said that the cowardly Pistol is a parody of Hal, deflating Hal's heroic speeches, it can be replied that Hal is Hal and that Pistol does not refute him but rather sets him off more clearly. And yet these replies do not finally convince; the impression remains that despite Henry's public virtues, the private man has something unattractive about him. He is a hero, but (we somehow feel) he is also an astute politician.

Even if there is such an ambiguity in Henry V, the play remains simpler than the two parts of Henry IV. Yet it does not lack variety: Henry V is not written in a single idiom, say that of "Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more;/Or close the wall up with our English dead." There is also admirable prose, some of it in dialect, some of it bawdy, some of it so deceptively near to common speech that we must remind ourselves that its "naturalness" is no less artful than the more conspicuous "big" speeches. For example, on the eve of the Battle of Agincourt a common soldier describes Henry's show of courage thus:

He may show what outward courage he will; but I believe, as cold a night as 'tis, he could wish himself in Thames up to the neck; and so I would he were, and I by him, at all adventures, so we were quit here.
(IV.i.113–17)

Possibly we can accept Henry V a bit more easily if we think of it as the happy final act in a four-act play (Richard II, 1 Henry IV, 2 Henry IV, Henry V) on the history of England from 1398 to 1415, working its way through weakness, deceit, and violence to a harmonious conclusion, "Congreeing in a full and natural close,/Like music." In fact, like a comedy the play ends with a betrothal. But the end of a comedy is assumed to be permanent, with the implication that the lovers live happily ever after. Shakespeare saw history as an unending series of ups and downs, and so at the very end of the play the Chorus reminds us that although Henry won a bride and France, "the world's best garden," Eden was again lost during the reign of Henry VI.

THE LAST HISTORY: HENRY VIII

At the end of his career, probably around 1613, Shakespeare returned to English historical drama, which he had put aside about 1599 with the completion of Henry V. Possibly he felt in 1599 that he could come no closer to the present than he had already come, for in Richard III he had reached the Tudor period. He turned to Roman history, writing the tragedy of Julius Caesar, and then to a variety of comic and tragic subjects. But about the time of his retirement from the theater he returned to English history for some reason, and wrote (perhaps in collaboration with John Fletcher) another play drawn largely from his old sourcebook, Holinshed's Chronicles. Henry VIII is a curious play; it is not at all like Shakespeare's earlier histories, which (although varied) give a sense of England engaged in military conflict, working out from one reign to the next the sins and errors of previous years. But the Prologue to Henry VIII announces that we will not get the usual battle scenes, and we do not. Henry VIII relates the falls of three eminent people, Buckingham, Katherine, and Wolsey, and the near-fall of Cranmer, sometimes accompanied by declamations and interspersed with elaborate pageants.

To the extent that Henry VIII has more visual splendor than Shakespeare's earlier histories it has affinities with Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, and The Tempest—that is, with the other plays Shakespeare wrote at the end of his career. This affinity is strengthened by the presence in Henry VIII of some of the themes found in the other last plays, notably the themes of patience in adversity and the innocence and vitality of a new generation. But for some readers and spectators, in Henry VIII these themes do not succeed in uniting the splendid episodes, which are not tightly connected by causal relationships. Henry VIII looks back to A Mirror for Magistrates in its account of the falls of illustrious people (the predominantly good Buckingham, the totally innocent Katherine, and the ambitious and scheming Wolsey), and it concludes with a burst of religiously tinged patriotism celebrating the birth and christening of the infant Elizabeth, who will introduce a new golden age. The three falls taken together involve the stuff of tragedy—innocence and guilt, intrigue, and bad luck; but these motifs are separated in the play and the effect is that of oversimplification, except insofar as we can pull the episodes together by seeing in the play a providential hand governing England. For example, in the punishment of Wolsey we can see, with a little effort, the king as dispenser of divine justice. Perhaps, too, there is a contrary ironic view, for although the play ends with Cranmer, Cromwell, and Anne Bullen high on Fortune's wheel and with the prophecy of greatness for England under Elizabeth and her successor, Shakespeare's audience knew that the first three had in turn been brought low, and it may have felt that Elizabethan glory started to fade even as Elizabeth did.

For three centuries stage history has proved that Henry VIII is effective in the theater, though never more so than at what probably was its premiere in 1613 when (quite literally) it brought the house down: cannon shot off in accordance with a stage direction (I.iv.49) ignited the thatched roof, and the Globe Theatre burned to the ground. England's greatest age of drama was over.

Shakespeare's Tragedies

A Renaissance dictionary defines tragedy as "a lofty kind of poetry and representing personages of great state and matter of much trouble, a great broil or stir: it beginneth prosperously, it endeth unfortunately or doubtfully, contrary to a comedy." (A comedy "beginneth sorrowfully, and endeth merrily, contrary to a tragedy.") Broadly speaking, Shakespeare's tragedies follow this pattern, except for Hamlet, where the hero is not "prosperous" at the beginning. For instance, at the start of the play Othello is newly married to Desdemona; Lear is almost a demigod giving away kingdoms; Macbeth has conquered on the battlefield and been elevated in rank. Moreover, all of Shakespeare's tragic heroes, with the possible exception of Romeo and Juliet, are "personages of great state," but even Romeo and Juliet are the children of important families. And each of these people "endeth unfortunately."

The idea that tragedy involves a fall from a height was commonplace in the Middle Ages, though at that time "tragedy" denoted a story rather than a play. Before reciting some narrative tragedies Chaucer's Monk defined his subject in this way:

Tragedie is to seyn a certeyn storie,
As olde bookes maken us memorie,
Of hym that stood in greet prosperitee,
And is yfallen out of heigh degree
Into myserie, and endeth wrecchedly.

I wol biwaille, in manere of tragedie,
The harm of hem that stode in heigh degree,
And fillen so that ther nas no remedie
To brynge hem out of hir adversitee.
For certein, whan that Fortune list to flee,
Ther may no man the cours of hire withholde.
Lat no man truste on blynd prosperitee;
Be war by thise ensamples trewe and olde.

The blame for adversity is placed on Fortune, and though this goddess is sometimes conceived of as the executor of God's will, she is commonly considered capricious, turning her wheel to elevate some men and to cast down others who are aloft. Chaucer's tragic figures include men who are totally innocent, such as the noble King Peter of Cyprus, who is slain merely out of envy, the moral being that Fortune can "out of joye bring men to sorwe." But the Monk's tragic figures include Lucifer, who "fel . . . for his synne," and Adam, who for his "mysgovernance/ Was dryven out of hys hye prosperitee." This sort of ambiguity concerning the cause of the Fall (capricious Fortune or man's vice?) continues in later medieval thinking about tragedy, and it survives into the Renaissance. The title page of A Mirror for Magistrates (1559) says that the book shows "with how grievous plagues vices are punished; and how frail and unstable worldly prosperity is found, even of those whom Fortune seemeth to favor." The dedication says that the book shows "the slippery deceits of the wavering lady [Fortune] and the due reward for all kinds of vice." Sir Philip Sidney, author of the most important critical treatise of the English Renaissance, similarly observed that tragedy shows both the punishment of vice and "the uncertainty of this world, and upon how weak foundations gilden roofs are builded."

Shakespeare was familiar with the idea of Fortune as arbitrarily casting down those whom she had elevated. A poet in Timon of Athens says that his poem tells how "Fortune in her shift and change of mood/Spurns down her late beloved"; Richard II sees himself as a character in a book of "sad stories of the death of kings." Similarly, Wolsey in Henry VIII sees himself as an epitome of mankind, flourishing and then suddenly cut down, and though he goes on to attribute his fall to pride and to equate himself with Lucifer, he implies at the beginning and the end of the speech that the fault is not his:

Farewell! A long farewell to all my greatness!
This is the state of man: today he puts forth
The tender leaves of hopes; tomorrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him.
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost,
And, when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is aripening, nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do. I have ventured,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
This many summers in a sea of glory,
But far beyond my depth. My high-blown pride
At length broke under me and now has left me,
Weary and old with service, to the mercy
Of a rude stream that must forever hide me.
Vain pomp and glory of this world, I hate ye.
I feel my heart new opened. O, how wretched
Is that poor man that hangs on princes' favors!
There is betwixt that smile we would aspire to,
That sweet aspect of princes, and their ruin,
More pangs and fears than wars or women have.
And when he falls, he falls like Lucifer,
Never to hope again. (III.ii.351-72)

What attitude is the spectator to have toward the fall of Shakespeare's tragic heroes? J. V. Cunningham in Woe or Wonder convincingly suggests that our response to the tragic action should be guided by Horatio's words in Hamlet when he tells Fortinbras and other late arrivals what to make of the sight of the corpses on the stage:

What is it you would see?
If aught of woe or wonder, cease your search.
(V.ii.364-65)

"Woe," or pity and fear; "wonder," or astonishment and admiration. The spectacle is all of these, as it would not be if the hero were merely the victim of Fortune or, on the other hand, the victim of his own vice. Shakespeare's tragic heroes are not, of course, all of a kind; at one extreme are Romeo and Juliet, who are chiefly presented as victims ("star-crossed lovers"); in the middle perhaps are Lear ("more sinned against than sinning") and, somewhat more guilty, Mark Antony ("his taints and honors/Waged equal with him"); at the other extreme is Macbeth, who is unequivocally an assassin. But there is always some ambiguity: a number of passages in Romeo and Juliet suggest that the lovers are undone by their own haste, or to put it more negatively, by their rashness; at the opposite extreme there is at least the hint that Macbeth is beguiled into evil by the witches and is thus himself a victim of mysterious cosmic forces.

Thus the old idea that Shakespeare's heroes suffer because of a tragic "flaw" is grossly inadequate. In fact, the heroes are sometimes undone by their eminence rather than by their weakness. They have a greatness of spirit that propels them to act, and action increases a man's vulnerability, for it sets up reactions. For example, Hamlet, unable to accept the death of his father and the remarriage of his mother, which the rest of the court (including his mother) accepts easily, stands apart from the court by virtue of his heightened moral sense, and he comes to feel that "The time is out of joint" and that he must set it right. Moreover, Hamlet's death is most immediately brought about not by any fault (such as the procrastination he is often accused of) but by his noblemindedness, which does not allow him to suspect that Laertes will behave treacherously in the duel. Claudius knows that Hamlet's excellence makes him vulnerable, and he explains this to Laertes: because he is "Most generous and free from all contriving," Hamlet "Will not peruse the foils." Similarly, Othello is brought to murder Desdemona not simply because he is jealous but because he is (as Iago knows) "of a free and open nature/That thinks men honest that but seem to be so." Iago knows, too, that he can turn Desdemona's "virtue into pitch,/And out of her own goodness make the net/That shall enmesh them all." Excellence, paradoxically, plays its role in destroying the heroes, for it impels them (as ordinary men are not impelled) to perform daring actions that have woeful consequences, or it allows lesser men to prey upon them. Those puritanical critics who denounced tragedies because they were full of "killing, hewing, stabbing, dagger-drawing, fighting, butchery, treachery, villainy, etc., and all kinds of heroic evils whatever" (the words are John Greene's, in 1615) were not unfair in their descriptions of the tragic plots, and their indignation suggests not that they failed to see the moral implications of tragedy but that they clearly saw them and did not like them. It is, after all, subversive of established morality to suggest that goodness may involve one in evil-doing.

As has been mentioned, in the tragic world actions have consequences that are irreversible. (In the comic world, wicked plots fail, and mistakes, such as Puck's anointing of the wrong lover's eyes, can be reversed.) Iago knows that a hero can be snared in a web of circumstances, and Rosencrantz knows that "the cess of majesty" (the death of a king) is more than the death of an individual:

The cress of majesty
 Dies not alone, but like a gulf doth draw
 What's near it with it; or it is a massy wheel
 Fixed on the summit of the highest mount,
 To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
 Are mortised and adjoined, which when it falls,
 Each small annexment, petty consequence,
 Attends the boist'rous ruin. Never alone
 Did the king sigh, but with a general groan.
 (Hamlet, III.iii.15-23)

But this tragic vision of a world in which all events are enmeshed is complemented by another vision, that of the hero as becoming progressively isolated. Before they die, Shakespeare's tragic heroes usually move away from society. Even at the start, of course, their eminence separates them in some degree from the rest of mankind, but by and large (except for Hamlet) they are attached to society: Titus, Othello, Macbeth, and Coriolanus are indispensable military leaders, and Lear is a reigning monarch. Their actions, however, propel them into a private world; thus Lear is led to "abjure all roofs" and to move to the stormy heath, and Macbeth finds that he can confide in no one, not even in his wife. Juliet, isolated from Romeo, from her parents, and from her Nurse, knows that "My dismal scene I needs must act alone." Hamlet even at the outset is estranged, and his isolation is increased by the breach between himself and Ophelia and is then made physical by the sea voyage he is sent on. This isolation normally produces in the tragic hero a new sense of identity; thrown back upon himself, he comes to see more clearly what he is. Before his journey to the heath, Lear feels his identity crumbling when, astounded by his daughters' ingratitude, he asks,

Does any here know me? This is not Lear.
 Does Lear walk thus? Speak thus? Where are his eyes?

Who is it that can tell me who I am? (I.iv.227-28, 231)

On the heath Lear gets to know who he is; he is one who has "ta'en/Too little care."

Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
 That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
 How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
 Your looped and windowed raggedness, defend you
 From seasons such as these? O, I have ta'en
 Too little care of this! Take physic, pomp;
 Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel. (III.iv.28-34)

Similarly, Macbeth comes to the recognition (Aristotle's term is anagnorisis) that his earlier actions have had a result opposite from that which he intended. He aimed at the crown, thinking it would bring him happiness, but his hopes deceived him:

I have lived long enough. My way of life
 Is fall'n into the sear, the yellow leaf,
 And that which should accompany old age,
 As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
 I must not look to have; but, in their stead,
 Curses not loud but deep, mouth-honor, breath,
 Which the poor heart would fain deny, and dare not.
 (V.iii.22-28)

Othello too has his moment of recognition, and though it is monstrously painful, for it tells him that he is a murderer, it also restores his identity, for it tells him that Desdemona was innocent and that he was right to love her:

Speak of me as I am. Nothing extenuate,
 Nor set down aught in malice. Then must you speak
 Of one that loved not wisely, but too well;
 Of one not easily jealous, but, being wrought,
 Perplexed in the extreme; of one whose hand,
 Like the base Judean, threw a pearl away
 Richer than all his tribe. (V.ii.341-47)

Behind this speech—and very far behind it in quality though not in date—are the confessions or addresses to the world made by characters in A Mirror for Magistrates.

But of course there are also dramatic traditions behind Shakespeare's tragedies. Though neither the miracle play nor the morality play (see pp. 12-15) is tragic, both forms contributed to Elizabethan tragedy. The miracle play sometimes deals with tyrants such as Pharaoh and Herod, showing their cruelty and the punishment subsequently visited upon them, and in its later development it deals also with the tribulations of saints. The morality play regularly dramatizes the conflict of vice and virtue, and it often dramatizes the coming of death, sometimes conceiving of death as retribution for sin. The villains in these plays contributed to the making of the Elizabethan villain. Biblical tyrants of the miracle plays doubtless exerted an influence on the secular tyrants of mid-sixteenth-century "conqueror" plays, and so did such a figure as the wicked prince in The Cradle of Security (see pp. 14-15); the innocent sufferers of the miracle plays and the representatives of fallible mankind in the morality plays also exerted an influence on the Elizabethan tragic hero, but none of these characters are Shakespearean tragic heroes.

Another dramatic tradition, derived from the Roman dramatist Seneca, helped to give Elizabethan tragedy its characteristic "woe," though as we have already seen, woe was the keynote of medieval nondramatic tragic writing. Greek tragedy was little known, but in university circles at least Seneca (4 B.C.?-65 A.D.) was widely known, though perhaps more for his moral philosophy than for his plays. Nonetheless, from about the middle of the sixteenth century onward Seneca's plays were translated; the first English translation was published in 1559, the year of the first edition of A Mirror for Magistrates. Academic authors sometimes imitated Seneca's plays, and these imitations exerted an influence on the popular dramatists, some of whom were university graduates and all of whom could at least read Seneca in translation. That he was read in translation is indicated by Thomas Nashe's assertion in 1589 that "English Seneca read by candlelight yields many good sentences, as 'Blood is a beggar.'" Seneca's two chief themes are tyranny and revenge (both of which appear in Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus, Richard III, Julius Caesar, and Hamlet); his characters are fiercely passionate and given to alternating between furious denunciations and stoic meditations (one thinks of Hamlet); and the prevailing atmosphere is one of horror, rather like Hamlet's "the very witching time of night,/When churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out/Contagion to this world." Certainly an Elizabethan playwright did not have to go to Seneca's plays for any of these themes, but the very fact that they were already a part of the English tradition perhaps made Seneca the more accessible and the more welcome: here was a classical playwright whose use of such material gave it an added dignity. Seneca helped the playwrights of the decades before Shakespeare to draw upon history and legendary history, showing the fall of tyrants and the suffering visited upon passionate heroes rather than upon the character abstractions of the morality play. Moreover, when in the 1580's—and perhaps even in the 1570's—the playwrights turned to continental stories (novelle) for material, they could by a somewhat Senecan treatment elevate to a tragic status these tales, which for the most part dealt either with the pathetic deaths of innocent lovers in a world of intrigue or with crime and vengeance. Again, this is not to say that Seneca was responsible for the character of Elizabethan tragedy; without the help of Seneca John Bale had already adapted the political morality play into a play showing the fall of an historical figure, King John, though Bale retained some abstractions. Even Sackville and Norton's Gorboduc (1561), the first English historical play with no moral abstractions, praised by Sir Philip Sidney for “climbing to the height of Seneca's his style,” is deeply indebted to the morality play in its treatment of the good and wicked counselors who flank the king and its heavy emphasis on the moral implications of action. Seneca, however, did not merely provide aphorisms of the sort Nashe alluded to; he also gave a classical sanction to the depictions of great falls due not simply to Fortune but to passionate natures which in some measure destroy themselves, and to the revenge plot urged by a ghost. Of course, the Elizabethans regularly complicated this plot far more than Seneca did (his plots begin just before the catastrophe), and they often added to the revenge plot other matter—for example, comic scenes—that was un-Senecan but thoroughly in the medieval dramatic tradition. Hamlet tells us that for the players who come to Elsinore “Seneca cannot be too heavy.” Seneca was, in fact, too heavy for the English popular theater, which preferred “mongrel tragicomedy,” but he provided the dramatists with moral tags and motifs, and indeed with a respectable model if they cared to look for one. What they saw in Seneca, of course, was what they wanted to see. Titus Andronicus does not closely resemble any play by Seneca (though it quotes from him), but Shakespeare probably felt that in it he had written an appropriately classical play.

THREE EARLY TRAGEDIES:

TITUS ANDRONICUS, ROMEO AND JULIET, JULIUS CAESAR

Like The Comedy of Errors (probably Shakespeare's first comedy), Titus Andronicus is very much an academic play. In Ovid, the Roman nondramatic poet whom he had read in school, Shakespeare found the prettified violent story of Philomela, which is explicitly referred to in the play (IV.i.42 ff.) and which resembles parts of Shakespeare's plot. From Seneca (or from English Senecan plays such as Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy) Shakespeare derived the motif of revenge, and of a hero driven to madness and to feigning madness. The author of Titus Andronicus advertises his bookishness not only by the numerous mythological references and declamatory passages but by an explicit reference to William Lily's Latin grammar, the text used in grammar schools throughout Elizabethan England. One of Titus' enemies says of a Latin message attached to a bundle of weapons:

O, 'tis a verse in Horace; I know it well:

I read it in the grammar long ago.

(IV.ii.22-23)

The rather symmetrical arrangements of the characters in Titus—loving brothers and quarreling brothers, a virgin and a mistress, and so on—also suggest a playwright who is anxious to do things properly. But if the characters are sometimes too neatly paired, a heritage from the morality play, and if they often seem to recite rather than to talk to each other, there is still a good deal of subtlety in the play. For example, Titus, the inflexibly honorable and somewhat simple general, is contrasted not only with Aaron, the cunning villain, but with Marcus, Titus' humane brother. There is scarcely a scene or a character that does not in some way echo or contrast with another scene or character, and although these echoes and contrasts are often a bit obvious, they are nonetheless the very stuff of tragedy, where every action has its consequences—where, as Alfred North Whitehead said, we see “the remorseless working of things.” Titus believes that honor requires him to sacrifice to his dead sons a son of his enemy; he acts on this belief, and thus he inevitably evokes the enmity of the victim's mother, who retaliates with outrages upon Titus' children, thereby goading Titus into counterretaliation. The elaborate parallelisms in Titus, then, are not very different from those in the later and greater tragedies; they are simply more obvious. In Hamlet, for example, the protagonist is flanked by Laertes and Fortinbras, each of whom (like Hamlet) has lost a father; in King Lear the protagonist is flanked by wicked daughters and a good daughter, and Gloucester has a wicked son and a good son. But the symmetry of Titus, though obvious, is by no means naive, and Shakespeare never discarded the technique. Moreover, it is not wholly illegitimate to read back into Titus characters and scenes from Othello (the Machiavellian Aaron anticipates Iago in his scheming, and the honest soldier Titus anticipates Othello), from Hamlet (driven to revenge, Titus is both mad and playing at madness), and from King Lear (Titus is driven beyond the bounds of sanity). Moreover, in IV.iii the first of the clowns in Shakespeare's tragedies appears; his role is minute, but he would have been unthinkable in one of Seneca's plays, and we are grateful for this simple voice that sounds across the rhetoric of the heroic (and villainous) world. Finally, like most of Shakespeare's other tragedies, Titus had affinities with political concerns. It begins with matters of political succession and concludes with the suggestion that the state, which has undergone a convulsion more or less parallel to the anguish of the tragic hero, will be reunited. What does not appear in Titus, however, is the achievement of self-understanding characteristic of the later tragic heroes. Titus sees Rome (aptly enough) as a “wilderness of tigers,” but he does not see the barbarity of his own inflexible code of honor, which Tamora accurately enough characterizes as a “cruel, irreligious piety.” Titus sees only the enemy outside himself; he never enters upon the sort of prolonged examination of his own actions that leads King Lear to say, "I have ta'en/Too little care of this."

Romeo and Juliet (1594-96) was preceded not only by Titus but by some history plays with tragic aspects and, no less important for the present purpose, by at least two comedies about lovers, one of which is set in Verona. Probably, too, Shakespeare was writing his sonnets at this time. Thus he was developing as a poet of love, and it is not surprising that he then turned to a tragedy of love. More exactly, it is not surprising to us; but an Elizabethan audience was probably surprised to find lovers—rather than heroic figures—the subject of a tragedy. Love was the stuff of comedies, and only a few earlier tragedies deal with love, though continental fiction offered many tales of young lovers destroyed by a cruel world. Romeo and Juliet was written at about the time of Richard II and A Midsummer Night's Dream (the exact dates are unknown); like these two other plays, Romeo and Juliet is conspicuously lyrical. For example, there is a sonnet in the dialogue between Romeo and Juliet, and the sonnet uses the conventional poetic figure of the lover as a pilgrim:

ROMEO

If I profane with my unworthing hand
This holy shrine, the gentle sin is this:
My lips, two blushing pilgrims, ready stand
To smooth that rough touch with a tender kiss.

JULIET

Good pilgrim, you do wrong your hand too much,
Which mannerly devotion shows in this;
For saints have hands that pilgrims' hands do touch,
And palm to palm is holy palmers' kiss.

ROMEO

Have not saints lips, and holy palmers too?

JULIET

Ay, pilgrim, lips that they must use in prayer.

ROMEO

O, then, dear saint, let lips do what hands do!
They pray; grant thou, lest faith turn to despair.

JULIET

Saints do not move, though grant for prayers' sake.

ROMEO

Then move not while my prayer's effect I take.

[Kisses her.] (I.v.95-108)

Moreover, like its near-contemporary Richard II, the play is rich in iterative imagery, recurrent images that help to define its meaning. In Romeo and Juliet there are abundant images of a speed that soon exhausts itself and of light yielding to darkness, both of which are appropriate in a play about the early death of two ardent lovers surrounded by enmity. For example:

Although I joy in thee,
I have no joy of this contract tonight.
It is too rash, too unadvised, too sudden;
Too like the lightning, which doth cease to be Ere one can say it lightens. (II.ii.116-20)

Wisely and slow. They stumble that run fast. (II.iii.94)

These violent delights have violent ends
And in their triumph die, like fire and powder,
Which, as they kiss, consume. (II.vi.9-11)

Such imagery helps to suggest the naturalness or inevitability of the lovers' deaths. The inevitability is also directly asserted by the Chorus, which speaks of the "star-crossed lovers," and this motif is periodically repeated, as when Romeo says,

My mind misgives
Some consequence yet hanging in the stars
Shall bitterly begin his fearful date
With this night's revels. (I.iv.106-09)

The emphasis on the feud between the families also suggests that overpowering forces surround the lovers. Thus if we can look at the tragedy as proceeding in part from the passion of the lovers, we can also look at it as proceeding in part from the forces of destiny. That is, we can see the characters as contributing to their downfall, and we can also see them as victims. Juliet's father, in the play's penultimate speech, remembering the feud that has forced the lovers to a fatal secrecy, calls them "poor sacrifices of our enmity," thus emphasizing the suggestion that Romeo and Juliet are martyred victims. Shakespeare probably saw the play as appropriately classical in spirit: Seneca's emphasis on the blows of fortune (Romeo sees himself as "fortune's fool") is translated into both dire astrological influence and chance (Romeo does not receive the letter sent to inform him that Juliet has taken a potion); and like a Senecan hero Romeo is occasionally stoical ("I defy you, stars"). Some of the hyperboles ("chain me with roaring bears") have a Senecan ring; and the long final scene, set in a tomb, with its talk of worms as Juliet's chambermaids, and with the bloody corpse of Paris lying nearby, would probably have brought approving nods from university men. On the other hand, the play is distinctly un-Senecan in its hero, in its bustle, and in its comedy. The quarreling servants at the outset give a comic treatment of the feud, suggesting its tragic possibilities; the bawdy comments of Mercutio and the Nurse are delightful in themselves (or would be, if we did not need explanatory footnotes), yet they are also integral in this play about love.

When he turned to his third tragedy, Julius Caesar (1599-1600), Shakespeare had already written nine plays on English history and about half a dozen comedies. In the histories Shakespeare explores the unending political developments that press on from one play to the next; on the whole the concern is with man as a political rather than moral creature, with what happened rather than (as in tragedy) with what happens. After completing Henry V Shakespeare may have felt that he had reached a dead end, for he had already written on the reign of Henry VI, and to continue beyond the reign of Henry VI would have brought him, in effect, to the origins of contemporary politics—in short, too close to present matters. In any case, around 1599 Shakespeare turned to Roman history, writing a play that, like those on English history, concerns political machinations; but in Brutus he explores more fully a man making a moral decision and then suffering its consequences. Julius Caesar owes something to the earlier history plays, which were at least occasionally concerned with the idea of retributive justice, and it of course owes something to earlier tragedies, which showed a downfall, but it differs from those tragedies in an important way: in Brutus, Shakespeare presents the fall neither of a tyrant nor of a weakling but of a noble yet flawed hero, a man who seeks to act for his country's good. The English histories are not greatly concerned with moral crises; nor do the two earlier tragedies indicate much concern of this sort. In Romeo and Juliet the lovers do not greatly ponder their course of action; they are overwhelmingly in love, and they are "star-crossed," but in Julius Caesar at least to a large degree "the fault . . . is not in our stars,/But in ourselves." Brutus tries to live according to a moral code, pondering a course of action, coming to a conclusion, acting, and then suffering the unexpected yet (to our view) inevitable consequences of the action. Ironically, too, Brutus falls into evil and ultimately into destruction largely because of his nobility: had he been less high-minded and more worldly minded, Cassius could not have manipulated him so easily. Cassius makes this point clear in a soliloquy:

Well, Brutus, thou art noble; yet I see
Thy honorable mettle may be wrought
From that it is disposed; therefore it is meet
That noble minds keep ever with their likes. (I.ii.306-09)

Cassius himself, however, is not the cunning, successful man-of-the-world that he thinks he is, for he too is destroyed, and by his own hand, when he commits suicide in the mistaken belief that the battle is lost. The successful man in the play is Antony, who is adept at manipulating people, most notably in his funeral oration in III.ii. He is not a villain, but insofar as he works on others he is an ancestor of such arch-villains as Edmund in King Lear and Iago in Othello. These later voices are anticipated in Antony's wry self-satisfied comment in the middle of the play, when he sees that he has moved the plebeians to fury:

Now let it work: Mischief, thou art afoot,
Take thou what course thou wilt. (III.ii.261-62)

Of course, like Brutus, Caesar too is a tragic figure. It seems clear that Shakespeare saw him as fitting the tragic formula of a man who falls from a great height. He has been blamed for his arrogance, and indeed he is unlovely, though we may wonder if we would prefer just before his assassination a less supremely confident figure, a man who (for example) eagerly clutched at Artemidorus' warning message instead of brushing it off with "What touches us ourself shall be last served." As a comparison with Plutarch's life of Caesar indicates, Shakespeare was careful to omit some of Caesar's most ignoble actions. Moreover, he gave Caesar an added dignity just prior to the assassination by virtue of his cordiality to the conspirators ("Good friends, go in and taste some wine with me"), and especially by virtue of the lies and the fawning which the conspirators engage in when they surround Caesar. Finally, there is the pathos of "Et tu, Bruté? Then fall Caesar," when the wounded leader perceives that his trust in Brutus was misplaced. The play, then, is concerned with two tragic figures (a third, if we wish to add Cassius); moreover, though it is concerned with political problems to a much greater degree than the later tragedies are, it shows Shakespeare moving toward the complexities of the later tragedies, in which the tragic characters act and then must face the ironic consequences of their actions.

THE LATER TRAGEDIES:

HAMLET, OTHELLO, KING LEAR, MACBETH, ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA, CORIOLANUS

As usual, the dates of the later tragedies are uncertain, but apparently between 1600 and 1608 Shakespeare wrote Hamlet, Othello, King Lear, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus. In these years, too, he probably wrote his two "dark" comedies, All's Well That Ends Well and Measure for Measure, a markedly ironic tragedy, Troilus and Cressida, and a play about a notorious misanthrope, Timon of Athens. The conjunction of these plays has sometimes caused readers to assume that Shakespeare entered a "tragic" period, a period of despair during which he poured out his heart in tragic, dark, and bitter plays while he underwent a mental crisis. The crisis has been variously identified as the failure of Essex' revolution in 1601; Shakespeare's father's death in 1601; and an unsuccessful love affair, described in the sonnets concerning the Dark Lady, on whom Shakespeare had his revenge in his portraits of Cressida and Cleopatra. (But, we might ask, how do we account for Cordelia and "the divine Desdemona"?) Such views, however, assume that an author writes tragedy when he is depressed, and they do not give adequate weight to the fact that tragedy was an established literary genre at which Shakespeare had earlier tried his hand in Titus, Romeo and Juliet, and Julius Caesar. Perhaps, then, it is best to see the great tragedies as the achievement of mastery in a genre rather than as veiled autobiography.

Hamlet is the most widely quoted, most often alluded to, and most often written about of Shakespeare's plays. The abundance of commentary, however, stems in part from uncertainties that are found in the play, and T. S. Eliot was not alone in suggesting that Hamlet is an artistic failure. Why does Hamlet delay? Because he must confirm the report of the Ghost, who may be a devil? Because he is a coward? Because his moral code disapproves of killing? Because he cannot kill the man who fulfilled Hamlet's unconscious Oedipal wish to kill his own father? Inevitably another question arises: Does Hamlet delay? He says he does, but some critics have argued that he merely chastises himself needlessly or, alternatively, that Shakespeare was merely creating a spurious suspense by reminding us of what still had to be done. Yet another question: Is Hamlet mad or only pretending to be? (Oscar Wilde varied the question: Are the commentators on Hamlet mad or only pretending to be?)

In the 1580's playwrights had linked Senecan motifs of passion and revenge with continental stories of intrigue, notably in Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy. Almost surely there was a play about Hamlet before Shakespeare's, perhaps by Kyd, and this Hamlet was apparently conspicuous for his cunning, his madness, and his savagery. Shakespeare's Hamlet in some degree shares these traits—enough so that George Bernard Shaw complained that Hamlet kills three people and is forever apologizing that he hasn't killed a fourth. There is something to this view. Hamlet mistakenly kills Polonius, and his chief reaction is regret that his victim was not Claudius. He forges orders so that Rosencrantz and Guildenstern will be "put to sudden death,/Not shriving time allowed," though Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are merely serving the man who they have every reason to suppose is their lawful king.

Hamlet has no regrets about dispatching these two men: "They are not near my conscience." Consider, too, his rough treatment of Ophelia and of his mother, and his desire not only to kill Claudius but to damn his soul (III.iii.73-96). But this, of course, is not the whole story, and Hamlet has not lacked for sympathizers. According to Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, Hamlet, "a lovely, pure, noble and most moral nature, without the strength of nerve which forms a hero, sinks beneath a burden which it cannot bear and must not cast away."

Perhaps both of these views, and others, have some merit; perhaps too Hamlet changes as the play goes on, from (to put it crudely) a revenger full of anguish, self-hatred, and fury to an avenger who comes to see that his job is not to set the world right or to devise a trap wherein he can catch Claudius' soul but to be an instrument of God's will. In III.ii he praises Horatio for his dispassionateness, saying that Horatio "is not passion's slave." But in III.iii, when Hamlet announces that he will delay until he can catch Claudius in a sinful act, we see clearly how hideous a dispassionate revenge would be. Here, if anywhere, Hamlet repels us. But late in the play, after his return from the sea voyage, he seems to have changed: he is courteous to the gravediggers, and in V.ii he apologizes to Laertes. Most important, he has ceased to be an intriguer and is content to be an instrument: "We defy augury. There is special providence in the fall of a sparrow. . . . The readiness is all." Of course there are complications here too, and critics have sometimes wondered whether Hamlet, who at first has such trouble bringing himself to act, does not ultimately lapse into a sluggish fatalism. Possibly this is true, but even so we probably prefer a sluggish Hamlet to a scheming one, and the rest of the play—his manly duel with Laertes, his execution of justice on Claudius, Laertes' tribute to "noble Hamlet," and Fortinbras' testimonial and the military funeral—suggests that Hamlet's course is noble.

Despite the variety of interpretations, it must be agreed that Shakespeare's dramaturgy is unerring: those who want patterns of imagery (notably concerning war, sickness, the nature of action, and appearance versus reality) can find them; those who want rounded characters (sometimes established by contrasts with other characters, as Hamlet is contrasted with Laertes and Fortinbras, both of whom seek to avenge their fathers' deaths) can find them; those who want philosophic poetic speeches and earthy prose speeches can find them; and those who want suspense, and then the fulfillment of expectations, can find it: the opening scene, for example, begins—appropriately for a play that has puzzled so many—with a question, "Who's there?" The suspense is then skillfully built up, slackened, and built up again with "this thing," "this dreaded sight," and "this apparition," and finally (still only at line 39) the Ghost appears, even as a previous appearance is being described. It disappears and is discussed, and during a long speech about the uncertain military situation (which introduces a reference to Caesar's ghost) it reappears, and again vanishes as the cock crows, evoking lyrical speeches from Marcellus and Horatio that help to diminish the uncertainty by introducing thoughts of purification, partly explicitly Christian (I.i.158-61) and partly natural (I.i.166-67). And so in 170 lines the scene changes from midnight to dawn (in the first forty lines we are told eleven times that it is night), and the play moves from a sense of fear and mysterious anguish (beginning with Francisco's "I am sick at heart") to hope. The meaning of the play may baffle us, but the artistry of the play can only convince us that Shakespeare had perfected his skill, and it is not at all surprising that he went on to write other tragedies.

Hamlet has a complicated plot (there is intrigue and counterintrigue, and a subplot concerning Fortinbras) and a philosophically minded protagonist who calls into doubt the nature of action. Othello, Shakespeare's next tragedy, is simpler on both accounts: the plot is derived from an Italian short story and can be summarized in a couple of sentences, and the nature of the events is never called into doubt. A. C. Bradley put it thus: "Othello has not . . . the power of dilating the imagination by vague suggestions of huge universal powers working in the world of individual fate and passion." Possibly if we are attentive to the hero's hyperboles, and to the villain's diabolical malice (see p. 14), we do hear suggestions of "universal powers," but in the main Bradley is right.

Perhaps because the play is at least superficially rather simple and its hero is said to be "noble," much twentieth-century criticism, unhappy with simplicity and nobility, has found the play wanting, or has complicated it by suggesting (for example) that Othello is not what he seems to be. The critical tendency to diminish Othello—to see him as immature and theatrical if not corrupt—is perhaps best known in T. S. Eliot's comment on Othello's penultimate speech, which Eliot characterizes as an "exposure of human weakness." Eliot's point is that the speech is not to be taken at face value; rather, Othello should be viewed as "cheering himself up. He is endeavoring to escape reality, he has ceased to think about Desdemona and is thinking about himself. . . . Othello . . . [is] adopting an aesthetic rather than a moral attitude." Here is the speech:

Soft you, a word or two before you go.
I have done the state some service, and they know't.
No more of that. I pray you, in your letters,
When you shall these unlucky deeds relate,
Speak of me as I am. Nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice. Then must you speak
Of one that loved not wisely, but too well;
Of one not easily jealous, but, being wrought,
Perplexed in the extreme; of one whose hand,
Like the base Judean, threw a pearl away
Richer than all his tribe; of one whose subdued eyes,
Albeit unused to the melting mood,
Drops tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their med'cinable gum. Set you down this.
And say besides that in Aleppo once,
Where a malignant and a turbaned Turk
Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,
I took by th' throat the circumcised dog
And smote him—thus.

[He stabs himself.]

(V.ii.337-55)

Against Eliot's view it can be argued that Othello judges himself accurately and severely: he compares himself to a Turk (in this play, the enemy of Christian civilization), and he inflicts upon himself the same punishment that he inflicts on the Turkish enemy. Having fully recognized his responsibility for Desdemona's death, and having condemned and executed himself, like Romeo and Mark Antony he pays his beloved a last tribute of a kiss, affirming his faith in her value and demonstrating that Iago has not, finally, corrupted him.

It seems appropriate to move from Hamlet and Othello directly to King Lear (though possibly Timon of Athens was written between these two plays), for Lear seems to be displacing Hamlet as the play that speaks to our time. Hamlet was especially popular with nineteenth-century critics, who often found in the uncertain prince an image of their own doubts in a world in which belief in a benevolent divine order was collapsing under the influence of scientific materialism and bourgeois aggressiveness. Many critics in our age find in Lear—where “for many miles about/There's scarce a bush”—a play thoroughly in the spirit of Waiting for Godot, where the scenery consists of a single tree. Lear has the amplitude that Bradley found lacking in Othello, and it is terrifying. Moreover, does not Lear denounce the hypocrisy of the power structure and expose the powerlessness of the disenfranchised? “Robes and furred gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,/And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks;/Arm it in rags, a pygmy's straw does pierce it” (IV.vi.165–67). And so Lear strips off his clothing (III.iv) and reduces himself to “a poor, bare, forked animal,” to find the essential man, “the thing itself.” Is there no more? What of the gods? The characters in the play offer various comments on the government of the universe, ranging from “As flies to wanton boys, are we to th' gods,/They kill us for their sport” to “The gods are just.” But perhaps the most memorable reference to the gods is not a mere comment but a comment followed by an action: learning that Cordelia is in danger, Albany cries out, “The gods defend her!” and immediately his words are mocked by Lear's entrance on the stage, with the dead Cordelia in his arms.

For Kent, a moment later, “all's cheerless, dark, and deadly,” and it almost seems true. But only almost, for the interpretation of Lear as a revelation of the emptiness of life fails to consider at least two things. First, there is an affirmation in those passages in which Lear comes to see that he is not what he thought he was. For example:

They flattered me When the rain came to wet me once and the wind to make me chatter; when the thunder would not peace at my bidding; there I found 'em, there I smelt 'em out. Go to, they are not men o' their words: they told me I was everything; 'tis a lie, I am not ague-proof [secure against fever]. (IV.vi.96–105)

Second, this anagnorisis (or recognition) is several times associated with love or charity, as when Lear with unexpected tenderness invites the Fool to enter the hovel first and then confesses his guilt in having cared too little for humanity (III.iv.26–36). And this care for humanity is seen in Cordelia, who comes—though ineffectually in the long run—to the aid of her father; it is seen too in the nameless servant who at the end of III.vii promises to apply medicine to Gloucester's eyeless sockets; it is seen even in the villainous Edmund, who in dying repents and says, “Some good I mean to do,/Despite of mine own nature” (V.iii.245–46), and who thereupon seeks, unsuccessfully, to save Cordelia. Only a Dr. Pangloss would say that these actions turn King Lear into a happy vision, but it is perverse to ignore them, and to refuse to see that in this play love humanizes as surely as egoism dehumanizes.

Finally, then, King Lear is a profound morality play; like Everyman, Lear is called to account and finds that those he unthinkingly trusted—Goneril and Regan—offer him no help and that those he used most harshly—Kent and Cordelia—minister to him in his trial and present him patterns of love. This is not to say that Lear becomes a saint at the end—he can still rage—but it does suggest that if the play dramatizes man's desolation it also dramatizes the love that, while providing no protection against pain or death, makes man's life something different from the life of “a dog, a horse, a rat.”

In Macbeth, Shakespeare forsook the double plot that he used in King Lear (the story of Lear and his daughters and the parallel story of Gloucester and his sons) and concentrated, as he had in Othello, on a single and simple plot. Like King Lear, however, Macbeth has its most immediate origin not in a short tale but in Holinshed's Chronicles. Like King Lear, too, it is reasonably classified as a tragedy rather than as a history (even though it is a descendant of the mid-sixteenth-century moral history plays) because it is a play more about people than about politics, more about what happens than about what happened. The play is chiefly concerned with Macbeth, much less so with Scottish history. Yet politics are a part of the play: it was written during the reign of James I of England, who was James VI of Scotland; perhaps it was written for James, who was regarded as a descendant of Banquo and who therefore is implicitly complimented in the procession of kings and Banquo in IV.i.

The political nature of the play appears too in the strong emphasis at the end on a Scotland purged of evil and guided by a rightful hand. The tragedies regularly end with the suggestion that after the tragic hero's death order is restored, though this order which the survivors form is pale when compared with the hero's greatness. Thus in Titus Andronicus Lucius is acclaimed “Rome's gracious governor,” and he makes plans to inter the dead and to punish the villain; in Romeo and Juliet the feud that divides the city is concluded, though the death of the lovers may well make us feel that the vibrancy has gone out of Verona; in Julius Caesar Octavius pays tribute to Brutus and holds the reins of government; in Hamlet Fortinbras pays tribute to Hamlet and acquires the Danish throne; in King Lear Albany (Lear's son-in-law) invites Edgar to “Rule in this realm and the gor'd state sustain.” Edgar accepts the responsibility, but with a backward glance at vanished greatness:

The weight of this sad time we must obey,
Speak what we feel, not what we ought to say.
The oldest hath borne most: we that are young
Shall never see so much, nor live so long. (V.iii.325–28)

Thus it is no surprise that at the end of Macbeth Malcolm is placed on the throne, promising justice. But because Macbeth is a villain-hero (and because the play was probably designed in part to celebrate King James) the protagonist is unusually diminished—he is “this dead butcher”—and the happy future of the new reign is emphasized. Scotland had suffered great disorder for a while because its murderous ruler was disordered, but now its rightful monarch will order the realm:

this, and what needful else
That calls upon us, by the grace of Grace
We will perform in measure, time, and place:
So thanks to all at once and to each one,
Whom we invite to see us crowned at Scone.
(V.viii.71-75)

The choice of a villain-hero probably does not indicate that Shakespeare's sense of human guilt had deepened, and it should be noted that Macbeth is given a measure of sympathy and humanity denied to an earlier villain-hero, Richard III. Richard only briefly, at the end, suffers doubts and fears, and in doing so he becomes less of a medieval Vice figure and more of an Everyman, or simply a terrified realistic king; but Macbeth's conscience regularly reminds him of his guilt, and he is punished not only at the end by death but throughout by anxiety and sleeplessness. Even before he kills Duncan he is afflicted, and though he achieves his ambition of ascending the throne (Act III opens with "Thou hast it now: king"), he finds the prize a torment:

Upon my head they placed a fruitless crown
And put a barren scepter in my gripe. (III.i.61-62)

If King Lear is a morality play in which Lear ultimately moves toward the good counselors Cordelia and Kent and away from the savage Goneril and Regan, Macbeth too is a morality play in which the tragic protagonist chooses the forces of evil rather than of good (Lady Macbeth and the witches rather than Duncan and Banquo), but he is always aware of what he has done, and this self-awareness and the guilt it engenders gain him some sympathy.

Like Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra has political implications, but it too is very different from Shakespeare's history plays. And it is very different from Macbeth, not only in its much wider geographical spread and in its diffusion of interest over two central figures, but in its conception of the tragic figure. There is no moral ambiguity about Macbeth; however we may view his early heroism and his continued sufferings from his conscience, we know—as he knows—that he is a murderer, not "an honorable murderer" (Othello's description of himself) but simply a murderer. Nothing extenuates his guilt. But in Antony and Cleopatra the case is not so clear, and it is not easy to decide whether the two lovers are, to put it simply, mostly good or mostly bad. Shaw summed it up thus: "After giving a faithful picture of the soldier broken down by debauchery, and the typical wanton in whose arms such men perish, Shakespeare finally strains all his huge command of rhetoric and stage pathos to give a theatrical sublimity to the wretched end of the business, and to persuade foolish spectators that the world was well lost by the twain." Certainly Shakespeare does not minimize Antony's debauchery or Cleopatra's wantonness. The first line of the play speaks of Antony's "dotage," and the speech goes on to contrast the present debauched Antony—a mere heavy-breathing sensualist—with the glorious Antony who was once a military hero. Cleopatra is a gypsy—that is, not merely an Egyptian but a lecherous trickster.

Antony himself later says that Cleopatra "like a right gypsy hath at fast and loose/Beguiled me" (IV.xii.28-29). It is easy to find additional evidence for this view: Antony's military wisdom disappears, and he is foolish enough to think that Octavius Caesar may fight him in single combat (Enobarbus knows better, in III.xiii, when he says of this belief, "Caesar, thou hast subdued/His judgment too"); Antony foolishly fights at sea, though he knows Caesar has the advantage there; he lapses into hysterical sadism when he orders Thidias to be whipped; and (to cut short what could be a long list) he bungles his suicide.

But this is not the whole story. Although the Romans in the play—and Antony himself, at times—judge the new Antony by the Roman standards of duty and military valor and find a sad falling off, there is another way, a non-Roman way, of looking at Antony. The new Antony, transformed by Cleopatra, can say,

Let Rome in Tiber melt, and the wide arch
Of the ranged empire fall! Here is my space,
Kingdoms are clay: our dungy earth alike
Feeds beast as man. The nobleness of life
Is to do thus;¹ when such a mutual pair
And such a twain can do't. (I.i.33-38)

In short the Roman code—especially as embodied in the cold, triumphant Caesar—itself seems unattractive when compared with some of the activities of Antony and Cleopatra. Caesar sees Antony as a reveler engaged in "lascivious wassails" and eating epicurean foods, and he contrasts him to the former Antony, who on his campaigns ate "the roughest berry on the rudest hedge." But Caesar's asceticism and hard-dealing leave no room for warm friendships or even for the kind of courteous sympathy that Antony can offer the simple Lepidus, the third but negligible triumvir. When Caesar invites Antony to visit Caesar's sister, with a view toward a political marriage, Antony says,

Let us, Lepidus,
Not lack your company.

And Lepidus warmly responds,

Noble Antony,
Not sickness should detain me. (II.ii.170-71)

Later, Antony warns Lepidus that he is in danger:

These quicksands, Lepidus,
Keep off them, for you sink. (II.vii.60-61)

Early in the play Lepidus himself gives us a vision of Antony that is an alternative to the narrow Roman view. To Caesar's assertion that Antony is "th' abstract of all faults/That all men follow" (that is, the symbol of universal weakness), Lepidus counters:

¹ Many editors explain "thus" by adding a stage direction, "They kiss," or "They embrace," but possibly "thus" alludes not to any specific gesture but to Antony's present way of life with Cleopatra.

I must not think there are
 Evils enow to darken all his goodness;
 His faults, in him, seem as the spots of heaven,
 More fiery by night's blackness, hereditary
 Rather than purchased [acquired], what he cannot change
 Than what he chooses. (I.iv.10-15)

It is interesting to note that although Lepidus sees Antony's faults and describes them as darkness, he later reverses the dark-light symbolism and describes the "faults" as "the spots of heaven,/More fiery by night's blackness." Even Antony's faults, Lepidus argues, have a kind of heavenly luminosity, a shining virtue in them. For example, Antony is politically irresponsible and a sensualist, but these traits are not simply flaws in a basically good man; paradoxically, they are the qualities that help to make him glorious. (We will see something of the same paradox in Coriolanus.) Something along the same lines can be said of Cleopatra, and indeed Enobarbus says it. To Maecenas' statement that Antony must leave Cleopatra, Enobarbus replies:

Never; he will not:
 Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
 Her infinite variety: other women cloy
 The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry
 Where most she satisfies; for vilest things
 Become themselves [are becoming] in her, that the holy priests
 Bless her when she is riggish [wanton]. (II.ii.236-42)

This sort of ambiguity runs throughout the play. Even at the end, for example, Cleopatra's suicide has its noble aspect ("Husband, I come:/Now to that name my courage prove my title"), its sensuous aspect ("The stroke of death is as a lover's pinch,/Which hurts, and is desired"), and perhaps its cowardly aspect, for she knows that Caesar plans to humiliate her publicly, and thus her death is as much an escape from Caesar as a reunion with Antony. But it has its glory—the lines persuade us of that—and this glory is only dimmed, not dispelled, by Caesar's comment:

Her physician tells me
 She hath pursued conclusions infinite
 Of easy ways to die. (V.ii.353-55)

Despite such information, the final impression must be one of grandeur, of what Horatio in Hamlet calls "wonder." Though it draws upon history, Antony and Cleopatra has only a superficial resemblance to Shakespeare's chronicle histories. With a hero who is related to Hercules and described as a "grand sea," a man "past the size of dreaming," with a heroine who is "a lass unparalleled," and with a geographical sweep and abundant cosmic imagery, Antony and Cleopatra anticipates Shakespeare's last plays, the "romances," in which tragic woe yields to a sense of wonder attendant upon the revelation of a world in which love, forgiveness, and the imagination dissolve faults and take us beyond the world of time.

Like Antony and Cleopatra, Coriolanus, Shakespeare's last tragedy, is chiefly drawn from Plutarch, but the world it depicts is utterly different. In Antony and Cleopatra Shakespeare conveys the expansiveness of the late Roman Republic, partly by the setting in Egypt but more significantly by the imperial hero whose story transcends the political motif. Coriolanus, however, depicts a much earlier and narrower world, the days of the early Republic, and there is a continual insistence on the abrasive class conflict between the plebeians and the patricians. Coriolanus is a hero, but his heroism is unattractive, for it is exclusively military; thus we tend to judge him rather than feel for him. Despite the glorification of Coriolanus in the first part of the play, we find it difficult to be warmed by his virtue, and even Coriolanus' mother, from whom he learned his valor, tells him he is "too absolute." It is a valor that is inhuman (Coriolanus is compared to an engine, and he compares himself to a dragon), a valor that is an end in itself, unconnected with mankind, and finally an enemy of mankind: "I will fight/Against my cank'ered country with the spleen/Of all the under fiends" (IV.v.94-96). It is this valor, and not any sense of justice, that is almost the whole of Coriolanus, as he tells us in the first act, when he conveys his eagerness to fight against Tullus Aufidius, his only worthy opponent:

Were half to half the world by th' ears, and he Upon my party, I'd revolt, to make
 Only my wars with him. He is a lion
 That I am proud to hunt. (I.i.235-38)

This sense of joyous energy is briefly catching, but in the end Coriolanus remains unattractive, despite such tributes as "His nature is too noble for the world" and "He shall have a noble memory." Part of the trouble is his abundant railing, which is never quite redeemed by a noble vision, for it is too rooted in contempt of the lesser people around him. Coriolanus' rebuke of the cowardly soldiers (I.iv.30-34), for instance, is perilously close to the invective spewed by the misanthropic Thersites in Troilus and Cressida or by Timon in the latter part of Timon of Athens. Even when Coriolanus proudly rejects Rome, "Thus I turn my back;/There is a world elsewhere," we find that the world elsewhere is not a nobler vision but only Coriolanus' insistence that he will not be other than himself. And he never perceives that what he is is not everything that is worthwhile. The idea that each of Shakespeare's heroes suffers from a tragic "flaw" was briefly discussed and rejected earlier (see p. 54), but if the idea truly applies to any of them it applies to Coriolanus. In IV.vii.35-48 Aufidius suggests that Coriolanus' fault may be "pride" or "defect of judgment." In the first act, before Coriolanus appears, two Citizens discuss him. The First Citizen says Coriolanus is "proud," to which the Second Citizen replies, "What he cannot help in his nature you account a vice in him." Perhaps it is not exactly "pride" that characterizes Coriolanus, for he is unwilling—indeed, in most of the play unable—to boast of his exploits. But this insistence on isolation, which is his nature, is almost the whole of him: "He is himself alone," "one thing," and this self or thing serves him wonderfully in war but incapacitates him in peace. When he puts off his valor there is nothing left of him:

O my mother, mother! O!
 You have won a happy victory to Rome;
 But, for your son—believe it, O, believe it!—
 Most dangerously you have with him prevailed,
 If not most mortal to him. (V.iii.185-89)

"Mercy" has drained his "honor," and Aufidius knows that he can at last defeat Coriolanus. Coriolanus regains his identity when, stung by Aufidius' rebuke, he reminds his Volscian enemies of his earlier conquest over them; yet this outburst of pride is what destroys him, for it stirs the Volscians to murder him. Thus though his heroism is never in doubt, Shakespeare's last tragic hero has less of the complex humanity of the earlier heroes. His code, which involves abundant contempt, not only keeps us at a distance; it also blinds him—though not us—to what is going on. He sees himself as his own master, but we see, ironically, that lesser people can manipulate him.

TWO SATIRIC TRAGEDIES: TROILUS AND CRESSIDA, TIMON OF ATHENS

Probably the term "satiric" is a little too strong to describe these two plays, for they do not really hoot at their characters. Still, the characters are seen in such an ironic light and from such a detached point of view—even in comparison with Coriolanus—that "satiric tragedy" may be a useful starting place.

For the Renaissance, satire and tragedy were not far apart; satire was sometimes thought to have developed from tragedy. Here is John Milton's comment on the relationship: "A Satire, as it was born out of a Tragedy, so ought to resemble his parentage, to strike high, and adventure dangerously at the most eminent vices among the greatest persons." Although Troilus and Cressida and Timon of Athens are far apart in quality and can only be crudely linked together, "eminent vices" of great men in the ancient world are found in both of them. (Renaissance admiration of the classics did not always extend to Greek legendary figures. The Elizabethans held Virgil's Aeneid, which is unfriendly toward the Greeks, in too high esteem to see the Greeks as shining heroes.)

Troilus and Cressida, incomparably the better play, is probably the earlier of the two. The difficulty of classifying it was apparent in its own day: the title page of the quarto calls it a history, the preface to the quarto says it is "comical," and the editors of the First Folio planned to put it with the tragedies, but they finally put it in unnamed territory between the histories and the tragedies, though they added the word "tragedy" to its title. It is a very strange play, and the preface's statement that it was "never staled with the stage, never clapper-clawed with the palms of the vulgar," leads us to think that it may have been written for a select audience rather than for the public theater, or that if it was written for the public theater it was found unsuitable. Troilus has two stories, one of politics and war concerning the Greeks who besiege Troy and who finally kill Hector, and another of love concerning Cressida's infidelity to Troilus. But despite the Prologue, which leads us to expect high military exploits, there is no heroic battle, and despite the lovers there is no joyous marriage; both stories deal with treachery and the destruction of merit by baseness. Moreover, much of the play is marked by disappointment, anticlimax, and frustration. For example, Hector argues that Helen should be returned to Menelaus, but then he withdraws his argument; Ulysses constructs an elaborate plot to get Achilles to fight, but when Achilles fights it is for a different reason;

Pandarus' plot comes to nothing; Troilus is painfully disillusioned, but he does not seem to arrive at self-knowledge; and Thersites regularly gives scathing denunciations of all activity. This is the world of tragedy, but also of satire; as Ezra Pound said, satire "draws one to consider time wasted."

Thersites, who sees only "Lechery, lechery, still wars and lechery," has a parallel in Pandarus, the commentator on the love story, but their low view of life is not the only one, and though the higher views come to nothing, their presence makes the play something other than a denunciation of mankind. Troilus has an air of the romantic lover of the comedies. If we recall Bassanio's description in The Merchant of Venice of Portia as a treasure to be adventured for (I.i.161-76), we can see the resemblance in these lines of Troilus':

Her bed is India; there she lies, a pearl.
Between our Ilium and where she resides
Let it be called the wild and wand'ring flood,
Ourself the merchant, and this sailing Pandar
Our doubtful hope, our convoy and our bark.

(I.i.103-07)

Still, there is something more frenetic here, as there is in Troilus' apprehensiveness that love may be some joy too fine,

Too subtle, potent, tuned too sharp in sweetness
For the capacity of my ruder powers.
I fear it much; and I do fear besides
That I shall lose distinction [ability to distinguish] in my joys.

And none of the romantic heroes in the comedies is so sensual as to explain to his beloved that "the monstrosity in love" is "that the will is infinite and the execution confined; that the desire is boundless and the act a slave to limit" (III.ii.80-82). Troilus nevertheless is a lover, and Thersites' "lechery" is not quite apt. What sharply separates this play from the comedies is not the lover's attitude but the beloved's deeds: Cressida is false, and thus Troilus' love for her is put into an ironic light as Othello's (another warrior-lover) is not. Similarly, Hector, who had nobly refused to fight the disarmed Achilles, is himself slain by Achilles' henchmen when he is unarmed. It is not quite true, then, that (as Thersites says of the war) "all the argument is a whore and a cuckold," but it is true that the noble alternatives are powerless.

Timon of Athens has affinities with Troilus and Cressida, most notably in its images of disease (especially sexual) and in the railings of Apemantus, which resemble those of Thersites, and more pervasively in the ironic view we are invited to take. But it has affinities with both Antony and Cleopatra and Coriolanus (the three plays are indebted to Plutarch) in its concern with a hero who becomes an exile from society. This concern also relates Timon to King Lear, and it has been suggested that before Shakespeare thoroughly revised Timon he set to work on King Lear and then, having made what use he wanted to make of a man driven to distraction by ingratitude, he found no reason to return to Timon.

In his Introduction to Timon (see p. 1367) Maurice

Charney points out that it is better to see the uniqueness of Timon than to compare it unfavorably to plays that it resembles; but here perhaps it is appropriate to see Timon in the context of Shakespeare's other tragedies. The chief problem is this: What are we to make of Timon's initial generosity and of his later misanthropy? Is the play the tragedy of a magnanimous man who is undone by his virtue—that is, by his high view of men, which men do not fulfill and which therefore drives him to misanthropy? Or is the play a satire of both his generosity and his misanthropy? In support of the first view, one can quote lines that praise Timon—lines that are not flattery because they are not spoken in his presence—such as the reference to “his good and gracious nature” and the assertion that “The noblest mind he carries/That ever governed man.” His steward Flavius testifies on his behalf, at first in words but later in deeds when he seeks out his former master. Flavius, a follower of a fallen master, thus resembles Kent in King Lear. Late in the play Flavius sees Timon as a man brought low by his own heart,

Undone by goodness. Strange, unusual blood,
When man's worst sin is, he does too much good.
Who then dares to be half so kind again?
For bounty, that makes gods, do still mar men.
(IV.ii.37–41)

Against this high view of Timon it can be argued that two technicalities suggest that the play is not a tragedy

(although the Folio puts it with the tragedies): first, though Timon is said to be “brought low by his own heart,” his death does not result from action (indeed, his death seems curiously irrelevant), and second, the Folio denies to Timon alone the word “tragedy” in the title, calling the play The Life of Timon of Athens. Moreover, even in the first scene Timon is not merely generous; he is also responsive to flattery, and his gifts are ostentatious and apparently a means of self-aggrandizement. When he cannot bolster himself in this way, he falls into misanthropy, seeing mankind's faults but not his own. Here a comparison with Lear may be useful. Timon and Lear are both outcasts, and both rail against society, but Timon has little of interest to say about society and nothing of interest to say about himself, whereas Lear's denunciation of society—though mad—is touched with sympathy for those who suffer injustice and with an awareness of his own faults. Lear arrives at a vision larger than the one he first held; Timon merely exchanges an exalted view of man for a base one. Alcibiades puts it thus: “The middle of humanity thou never knewest, but the extremity of both ends” (IV.iii.299–300). (This polarization, incidentally, relates Timon to Shakespeare's last plays, the romances, in which characters tend to be either good or bad rather than “of a mingled yarn, good and ill together.”) The heroes of the great tragedies are no less extreme in their unwillingness to accept the way of the world; that is why they are heroes. But they also knew the middle of humanity; that is why we feel their sufferings as our own.

Shakespeare's Nondramatic Works

Shakespeare's first work to appear in print was not a play but a narrative poem. Because the status of poet was higher than that of playwright in Elizabethan times—professional poets were dependent on courtly patronage, whereas most playwrights were dependent on the pennies of the general public—it is likely that Shakespeare thought, at least for a while, that his poetry rather than his plays would bring him lasting fame. This hypothesis receives some support from the fact that his two long narrative poems were published in remarkably accurate texts, with dedications by the author. Shakespeare thus apparently had a hand in the publication of these poems, but he never concerned himself with the publication of the plays, and he wrote no further dedications.

Leisure time to write the two narratives was probably afforded by the plague, which closed the London theaters from the summer of 1592 to the spring of 1594. Shakespeare's first poem, Venus and Adonis (1593), is an artful, erotic piece of 1194 lines that was calculated to please a noble patron, the youthful Earl of Southampton, whose taste presumably had been developed by ornate and erotic mythological pieces such as Lodge's Scylla's Metamorphosis (1589). Marlowe's Hero and Leander (1593 or earlier, although not published until 1598) belongs to the same school. Venus and Adonis has been much praised for its realistic passages about horses, birds, the doe, and especially the hare (lines 679–708); but however we may value these passages, which seem derived from Warwickshire memories, the poem as a whole produces the effect not of realism but of most cunning artifice. It is less a photograph than a tapestry, less a description of creatures moving in external nature than a presentation of abstract types set in a hothouse; or we can vary the figure and see the poem as Hazlitt did, when, calling attention to the frigidity of this poem about passion, he characterized it as an icehouse. But Venus and Adonis apparently worked for its contemporary readers: there were at least ten editions of the poem in Shakespeare's lifetime; a contemporary writer noted that “the younger sort takes much delight in Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis”; and in a satiric play of 1601, a foolish courtier refers to the poem, saying, “I'll worship sweet master Shakespeare, and to honor him will lay his Venus and Adonis under my pillow.”

In 1594 Shakespeare followed this bid for noble patronage with the publication of a second poem dedicated to Southampton, The Rape of Lucrece (thus goes the running head; the title page simply calls the poem Lucrece). Again the central narrative is drawn from Ovid. In its depiction of Tarquin, who, overcome by passion, sacrifices honor and gains only self-loathing and enmity, Shakespeare touches on a tragic theme, and indeed in Macbeth he was later to mention Tarquin. Here is the passage from Macbeth, followed by a passage from Lucrece:

Now o'er the one half-world
Nature seems dead, and wicked dreams abuse
The curtained sleep; witchcraft celebrates
Pale Hecate's offerings; and withered murder,
Alarumed by his sentinel, the wolf,
Whose howl's his watch, thus with his stealthy pace,
With Tarquin's ravishing strides, towards his design
Moves like a ghost. (Macbeth, II.i.49-56)

Now stole upon the time the dead of night,
When heavy sleep had closed up mortal eyes.
No comfortable star did lend his light,
No noise but owls, and wolves' death-boding cries;
Now serves the season that they may surprise
The silly lambs: pure thoughts are dead and still,
While lust and murder wakes to stain and kill.
(Lucrece, lines 162-68)

In Lucrece's lamentations, and especially in Tarquin's internal debates, the stuff of tragedy is set forth in a narrative form, yet the final effect is far from tragic, for like Venus and Adonis the poem is so obviously ornate, so richly heraldic, so formal in its contrasts, that the manner overcomes the matter. It is a web of decorative (and sometimes very beautiful) passages; it is longer than Venus and Adonis, but the greater length is due not to additional action but to even greater elaboration of the little there is.

Among the nondramatic poems the sonnets have won widespread praise. They belong to a genre made famous in Italy by Petrarch (1304-74); Petrarch was imitated in England by Wyatt and by Surrey, some of whose poems were published in 1557 in a book that is usually called Tottel's Miscellany. But sonneteering did not become a national pastime in England until 1591, when the posthumous publication of Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophel and Stella started the vogue. The Italian or Petrarchan sonnet is basically a two-part poem, consisting of an octave rhyming abbaabba and a sestet, normally in a somewhat different tone of voice, rhyming cdecde or cdcdcd, or another variant. The English sonnet (sometimes called Shakespearean, though Shakespeare did not invent the form) is a four-part poem, consisting of three quatrains and a couplet: abab cdcd efef gg. The couplet normally provides a syntactically independent aphoristic summary. But the thought of the sonnet does not always follow the rhyme scheme, that is, it does not always break after each quatrain. In a good number of Shakespeare's sonnets the chief turn comes, as in an Italian sonnet, after the eighth line.

Shakespeare's Sonnets was not published until 1609, but surely most and possibly all of the 154 sonnets that make up the book had been written at least a decade earlier. The exact date of composition is unknown, but the early and middle nineties seems reasonable. (There are also sonnets in Love's Labor's Lost and Romeo and Juliet, plays of the middle nineties.) In 1598 Francis Meres alluded to Shakespeare's "sugared sonnets." "Sugared" is appropriate for at least some of them: there are poems that show a delight in ingenious conceits of the kind we associate with the earlier plays. But other sonnets are masterful in their apparent simplicity of utterance which, coupled with a depth of view, makes the poems among the world's greatest. If the best sonnets were written before 1598 (rather than shortly before publication in 1609), Shakespeare achieved maturity in the sonnet more quickly than in the drama. The 154 poems do not narrate a continuous story, but there are groups of related sonnets; for example, Sonnets 1-17 are all written to a young man, urging him to marry. Although the Sonnets may be indebted to some contact that Shakespeare had with members of the aristocracy, they cannot be read as sheer autobiography (though of course they often ring true). The usual motifs of Elizabethan sonnets can be found—the poet eternizes his patron; the eye and the heart are at war—but there is also a new range of feeling which has affinities with Lucrece and therefore approaches a tragic view. For instance, in Lucrece Shakespeare gives us this insight into one kind of tragic experience:

Those that much covet are with gain so fond
That what they have not, that which they possess
They scatter and unloose it from their bond,
And so by hoping more they have but less;
Or, gaining more, the profit of excess
Is but to surfeit, and such griefs sustain
That they prove bankrout in this poor rich gain.
(lines 134-40)

After he rapes Lucrece, Tarquin is compared to a "full-fed hound or gorged hawk," now loathing what he had before pursued:

His taste delicious, in digestion souring,
Devours his will, that lived by foul devouring.
(lines 699-700)

Every poem is complete in itself and ought not to be reduced or expanded to coincide with any other poem, but we can see in these passages from Lucrece something akin to Sonnet 129, a description of lust before, during, and after consummation.

Th' expense of spirit² in a waste of shame
Is lust in action; and, till action, lust
Is perjured, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust;
Enjoyed no sooner but despised straight;
Past reason hunted, and no sooner had,
Past reason hated as a swallowed bait
On purpose laid to make the taker mad;
Made³ in pursuit, and in possession so;
Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
A bliss in proof, and proved, a very woe,
Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.

All this the world well knows, yet none knows well
To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

Not all Shakespeare's sonnets, of course, are like this, and our interest in the tragedies ought not to lead us to concentrate on poems about lust or the destructive will to the exclusion of, say, those celebrations of beauty that are equally impressive. In short, the sonnets are remarkably varied—disordered, some readers who cherish a consistent story would say. If we were to look for a dominant subject we would perhaps find it in time, which destroys beauty but which also engenders anew; and the poet's words re-create his subject, conferring on beauty a new existence that may at least seem to arrest the triumph of time. If this inadequate description has any truth in it, the world of the sonnets is very near to that of the great plays.

² "Th' expense of spirit" = the expenditure of vital power, and more specifically, of semen.

³ "Made" is often emended to "mad," but can be taken as equivalent to "Made mad."

The sonnets have been much esteemed for a long while, but a short poem called The Phoenix and the Turtle (1601) has only relatively recently gained universal praise, probably because in the 1920's admirers of John Donne and the other "metaphysical" poets helped to educate subsequent taste to appreciate this strange funeral poem about the transcendence of human love. Venus and Adonis can be coupled with Lucrece, and each sonnet can be coupled with the remaining 153, but The Phoenix and the Turtle stands alone—and yet in its faith in the power of love it earns its place in a story that includes the sonnets, Romeo and Juliet, and Antony and Cleopatra.

The Texts of Shakespeare

The printed versions of Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594) were each prefaced by the author's dedication and were relatively free of printer's errors, circumstances which suggest that Shakespeare read the proofs of these two works. But Shakespeare seems never to have supervised the publication of any of his plays, although eighteen were printed during his lifetime. There is nothing unusual in this fact; when an Elizabethan playwright sold a play to a theatrical company he surrendered ownership of it. Normally a company would not publish a play because to do so meant to allow competitors to acquire the piece. Some plays, however, did get published. For example, disloyal actors sometimes relied on their memories and pieced together a play for a publisher. The result was a so-called bad quarto, which is often grossly inaccurate but which is sometimes interesting because in its stage directions it may preserve bits of stage business and may even preserve some authentic dialogue that was added when the play was in rehearsal. Such elements can perhaps be considered as part of the final version of the play, especially since Shakespeare must have been involved in its staging. (We tend to think of the last draft of a play as the author's final version, but when the author is an actor, perhaps the play as he acted in it, with cuts and last-minute additions, is his final version.) Nevertheless, the bad quartos are bad; they offer mangled versions of the plays, as can be seen by comparing Hamlet's "To be or not to be" soliloquy (III.i.56 ff.) with the bad quarto's version (see p. 67).

Not all of the quartos are bad quartos, however. Sometimes a company that was in need of money sold its manuscripts; sometimes a company sold a manuscript of a play that no longer drew audiences; and sometimes an author sold a manuscript to a company and then again to a publisher. In 1608 Thomas Heywood, Shakespeare's contemporary and an actor and playwright, insisted that such a double sale was unethical: "For though some have used a double sale of their labors, first to the stage, and after to the press, for my own part I here proclaim myself ever faithful in the first, and never guilty of the last." That Shakespeare did not publish his plays, then, is scarcely remarkable; among his contemporaries only Ben Jonson carefully supervised the publication of his own plays. Those of Shakespeare's plays that were printed during his lifetime have no dedication by the author (his name was not even on the title page of the first eight to appear in print), and they offer few aids to the reader: stage directions are irregular, and there is no list of characters. The eighteen plays published during Shakespeare's lifetime were issued one play per volume in small books called quartos. (Each sheet in a quarto is folded twice, making four leaves, or eight pages, each about 7 inches wide and 9 inches high.) The quartos, with their first dates of publication (most were reprinted), are Titus Andronicus (1594), 2 Henry VI (1594), 3 Henry VI (1595—actually an octavo rather than a quarto), Richard II (1597), Richard III (1597), Romeo and Juliet (1597), 1 Henry IV (1598), Love's Labor's Lost (1598), Henry V (1600), 2 Henry IV (1600), Much Ado About Nothing (1600), A Midsummer Night's Dream (1600), The Merchant of Venice (1600), The Merry Wives of Windsor (1602), Hamlet (1603), King Lear (1608), Troilus and Cressida (1609), Pericles (1609). A quarto of a nineteenth play, Othello, was published in 1622, six years after Shakespeare's death. (To this list of quartos some scholars add King John [1591] and The Taming of a Shrew [1594], but most scholars hold that these two quartos are not bad quartos of Shakespeare's plays but rather plays by other men.) The quartos of 2 Henry VI, 3 Henry VI, Romeo and Juliet, Henry V, The Merry Wives of Windsor, and Hamlet were bad quartos, but for two of these plays good quartos were soon published, Romeo and Juliet in 1599 and Hamlet in 1604.

In 1623, seven years after Shakespeare's death, in an effort "to keep the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive, as was our Shakespeare," John Heminges and Henry Condell (two senior members of Shakespeare's company who had performed with him for about twenty years) collected his plays—published and unpublished—in a large volume, commonly called the First Folio. The poems were not included. (A folio is a volume consisting of sheets that are folded once, each sheet thus making two leaves, or four pages about 8½ inches wide and 13 inches high.)

The First Folio contains thirty-six plays, consisting of all the titles listed above (except Pericles) and eighteen additional titles, which in approximate order of composition are The Comedy of Errors, 1 Henry VI, The Taming of the

 Whol'd beare the scornes and flattery of the world,
 Scorned by the right rich, the rich curst of the poore?
 The widow being oppressed, the orphan wrongd,
 The taste of hunger, or a tirants raigne,
 And thousand more calamities besides,
 To grunt and sweate vnder this weary life,
 When that he may his full Quietus make,
 With a bare bodkin, who would this indure,
 But for a hope of something after death?
 Which pusses the braine, and doth confound the sence,
 Which makes vs rather beare those euilles we haue,
 Than flie to others that we know not of.
 I that, O this conscience makes cowardes of vs all,
 Lady in thy orizons, be all my sinnes remembred.

Ham. To be, or not to be, that is the question,
 Whether tis nobler in the minde to suffer
 The slings and arrowes of outragious fortune,
 Or to take Armes against a sea of troubles,
 And by opposing, end them, to die to sleepe
 No more, and by a sleepe, to say we end
 The hart-ake, and the thousand naturall shocks
 That flesh is heire to; tis a consumation
 Deuoutly to be wisht to die to sleepe,
 To sleepe, perchance to dreame, I there's the rub,
 For in that sleepe of death what dreames may come
 When we haue shuffled off this mortall coyle
 Must giue vs pause, there's the respect
 That makes calamitie of so long life:
 For who would beare the whips and scornes of time,
 Th'oppressors wrong, the proude mans contumely,
 The pangs of despiz'd loue, the lawes delay,
 The insolence of office, and the spurnes
 That patient merri of th'vnworthy takes,
 When he himselfe might his quietas make
 With a bare bodkin; who would fardels beare,
 To grunt and sweat vnder a wearie life,
 But that the dread of something after death,
 The vndiscouer'd country, from whose borne
 No trauiler returnes, puzzels the will,
 And makes vs rather beare those ills we haue,
 Than flie to others that we know not of.
 Thus conscience dooes make cowardes,
 And thus the natiue hiew of resolution
 Is sickled ore with the pale cast of thought,
 And enterprises of great pitch and moment,
 With this regard theyr currents turne awry,
 And loose the name of action. Soft you now,
 The faire Ophelia, Nymph in thy orizons
 Be all my sinnes remembred.

Shrew, The Two Gentlemen of Verona, King John, Julius Caesar, As You Like It, Twelfth Night, All's Well That Ends Well, Measure for Measure, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, Timon of Athens, Coriolanus, Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale, The Tempest, and Henry VIII. The thirty-six plays in the Folio, and Pericles, are widely regarded as canonical, and a thirty-eighth play, The Two Noble Kinsmen, first published in 1634, is somewhat less widely held to be Shakespeare's at least in part. The plays in the Folio are arranged in three groups, comedies (fourteen), histories (ten), and tragedies (eleven, but Cymbeline belongs among the comedies); between the histories and the tragedies is Troilus and Cressida, unpaginated and omitted from the table of contents. In an address "To the great variety of readers" Heminges and Condell suggest that the republished plays are presented in better form than in the quartos: "Before you were abused with diverse stolen and surreptitious copies, maimed and deformed by the frauds and stealths of injurious impostors that exposed them; even those are now offered to your view cured and perfect of their limbs, and all the rest absolute in their numbers, as he [Shakespeare] conceived them." Some, but not all, of the quartos deserve these harsh words.

The editor assigned to prepare the texts for publication in the First Folio seems to have taken his job seriously, yet he did not perform it with uniform care. In general, the sources of the texts seem to have been good unpublished copies or good published copies. Often, it is true, the editors of the Folio did not use the first edition of a quarto, which presumably was set from a manuscript that had been close to Shakespeare (such as a final draft, or a scribe's clean copy of a final draft); rather, they used a later reprint which, having been set from an earlier quarto, introduced additional printer's errors. But on the whole the editors of the Folio avoided those quartos that printed badly garbled texts. The first play in the collection, The Tempest, is divided into acts and scenes, has unusually full stage directions and descriptions of spectacle, and concludes with a list of characters; but the editor was not able (or willing) to present the succeeding texts so fully dressed. Later texts occasionally show signs of carelessness: in one scene of Much Ado About Nothing the names of actors, instead of characters, appear as speech prefixes, as they had in the quarto, which the Folio reprints; proofreading throughout the Folio is very spotty and was apparently done without reference to the printer's copy; the pagination of Hamlet jumps from 156 to 257.

The first decision a modern editor of Shakespeare must make is to select his copy. This is no problem if the play exists only in the Folio, but it is a considerable problem if the relationship between a quarto and the Folio—or an early quarto and a later one—is unclear. When an editor has chosen what seems to him to be the most authoritative text or texts for his copy, he is not done with making decisions. Next, he must reckon with Elizabethan spelling. If he is not producing a facsimile he will probably modernize it, but should he preserve the old forms of words that were apparently pronounced quite unlike their modern forms—for example, lanthorn and alablaster? And if he does preserve these forms, is he really preserving Shakespeare's forms or those of a compositor in the printing house? What is an editor to do when he finds "lanthorn" and "lantern" in adjacent lines? (The editors of the Signet Shakespeare have assumed that in general words should be spelled in their modern form, but some exceptions have been made—for example, to preserve rhymes or puns.) Sometimes there is even doubt as to what word the original text is spelling. In Richard II, III.iii.98–99, Richard says that Bolingbroke's attempt to seize the crown will bring to England war that will "bedew/Her pastors grasse with faithfull English bloud." "Pastors" is usually modernized to "pastures," but why not to "pastor's," which would convey the idea of the monarch as the shepherd of the kingdom? If Elizabethan printers had used the apostrophe to indicate the possessive, its position on one side or the other of the final -s in "pastors" would have been decisive (except to a quarrelsome editor).

Another problem involving an omitted apostrophe occurs in King Lear, V.iii.16–17. Lear tells Cordelia that they will take vpon's the mystery of things,

As if we were Gods spies.

In a modernized text, should the second line be printed "As if we were God's spies," giving (to put it mildly) a Christian coloring to the line, or should it be printed "gods' spies"? In favor of "God's spies" one can argue that (1) if the plural were intended, probably the Folio's "Gods" would be preceded by "the," because "gods' spies" sounds unidiomatic, and (2) though the play is nominally set in a pagan world and the characters at various times invoke pagan deities, there are some undoubted Christian overtones, such as "a soul in bliss" (IV.vii.46). But against "God's" and for "gods'" it can be argued that except in this doubtful instance every one of the two dozen other occurrences of the word indisputably is a plural—for example, "As Flies to wanton Boyes, are we to th' Gods." Of course an audience cannot hear the difference between "God's" and "gods'," and finally the meaning of the play does not hang on the position of this apostrophe; but its position is not totally insignificant if one is concerned about the world—pagan or Christian? or pagan almost imperceptibly becoming Christian?—in King Lear.

Commas too can be troubling. Macbeth rejects his wife's idea that he can wash the blood from his hand:

no: this my Hand will rather
The multitudinous Seas incarnardine,
Making the Greene one, Red. (II.ii.60–62)

Obviously an editor will remove the superfluous capitals, and he will probably alter the spelling to "incarnadine," but will he leave the comma before "red," letting Macbeth speak of the sea as "the green one," or will he (like most modern editors) remove the comma and thus have Macbeth say that his hand will make the ocean uniformly red?

Finally, an editor sometimes has to change more than spelling or punctuation. Macbeth says to his wife:

I dare do all that may become a man,
Who dares no more, is none. (I.vii.46–47)

For two centuries editors have agreed that the second line is unsatisfactory, and have emended "no" to "do": "Who dares do more is none." It seems clear that the emendation corrects an obvious misprint.

A brief discussion of one of the most famous cruxes may give further insight into this aspect of editing Shakespeare. In the Folio text of Henry V Mistress Quickly, describing the death of Falstaff, says, "his Nose was as sharpe as a Pen, and a Table of greene fields" (II.iii.16–17). This seems to make no sense, and in 1726 Lewis Theobald suggested emending "Table" to "babbled," with "a babbled" meaning "he babbled," so that Falstaff goes to his death babbling of green fields, perhaps recalling the green pastures of Psalm 23. This reading has struck most subsequent editors as right and even inspired, though Theobald himself mentioned that emendation of "Table" to "talked" rather than to "babbled" was a possibility. Indeed, "talked"

Hostesse. Nay sure, hee's not in Hell: hee's in Arthurs Bosome, if euer man went to Arthurs Bosome: a made a finer end, and went away and it had beene any Christome Child: a parted eu'n iust betweene Twelue and One, eu'n at the turning o'th Tyde: for after I saw him fumble with the Sheets, and play with Flowers, and smile vpon his fingers end, I knew there was but one way: for his Nose was as sharpe as a Pen, and a Table of greene fields. How now Sir Iohn (quoth I?) what man? be a good cheare: so a cryed out, God, God, God, three or foure times: now I, to comfort him, bid him a should not thinke of God; I hop'd there was no neede to trouble himselfe with any such thoughts yet: so a bad me lay more Clothes on his feet: I put my hand into the Bed, and felt them, and they were as cold as any stone: then I felt to his knees, and so vp-peer'd, and vpward, and all was as cold as any stone.

The Folio text (1623) of the Hostess' speech, Henry V, II.iii.9–26.

(presumably written "talkd" in the manuscript) could more easily than "babld" have been misread as "Table," but most editors have (perhaps sentimentally) preferred "babbled." Additional emendations of this line have been proposed, one of the most comic of which was Alexander Pope's. Pope suggested that "a Table of greene fields" was not part of the speech but an instruction to a property man named Greenfield to have a table in readiness. No less ingenious—or ingenuous—is the suggestion that the passage alludes to the Elizabethan hero Sir Richard Grenville, who died in the Azores. In this view, "Table" means "picture" or "image" (it can have that meaning), and for some reason Falstaff at his death is said to be the very picture of Grenville. Yet one more reading—this one requiring no emendation—may be mentioned. It holds that the "and" in "and a Table of greene fields" is elliptical for "and it was." Thus Mistress Quickly says that Falstaff's nose was as sharp as a pen and was an image, in its sickly greenness, of a pasture. This last interpretation requires no alteration of the text, but is painfully thin beside Theobald's conjecture, which the Signet editor has adopted. Still, the editors of the Signet Shakespeare have restrained themselves from making abundant emendations. In their minds they hear Dr. Johnson's words on the dangers of emending: "I have adopted the Roman sentiment, that it is more honorable to save a citizen than to kill an enemy." Some departures (in addition to spelling, punctuation, and lineation) from the copy text have of course been made, but the original readings, such as "Table" in Henry V, are listed in the Note on the Text preceding each play, so that the reader can evaluate them for himself.

The editors of the Signet Shakespeare, following tradition, have added line numbers and in many cases act and scene divisions. The Folio divides most of the plays into acts and some plays into scenes. Early eighteenth-century editors increased the divisions. These divisions, which provide a convenient way of referring to passages in the plays, have been retained in the Signet texts, but any division that did not appear in the text chosen as the basis for the Signet text has been enclosed in square brackets [] to indicate that it is an editorial addition. Similarly, although no play of Shakespeare's published during his lifetime was equipped with indications of locale at the heads of scene divisions, the Signet editors have added locales in square brackets for the convenience of the reader, who lacks the information afforded to spectators by costumes, properties, and gestures. The spectator can tell at a glance that he is in the throne room, but without an editorial indication the reader may be puzzled for a while. It should be mentioned too that there are a few authentic stage directions—perhaps Shakespeare's, perhaps a prompter's—that suggest locales, giving us a sense of the way the stage is envisioned: for example, "Enter Brutus in his orchard," and "They go up into the senate house." It is hoped that the bracketed additions will provide the reader with the sort of help given by these two authentic directions, but it is also hoped that the reader will remember that the Elizabethan stage was not loaded with scenery and that the action flowed continuously.

During the course of his work no editor can fail to recollect some words Heminges and Condell prefixed to the Folio:

It had been a thing, we confess, worthy to have been wished, that the author himself had lived to have set forth and overseen his own writings. But since it hath been ordained otherwise, and he by death departed from that right, we pray you do not envy his friends the office of their care and pain to have collected and published them.

Nor can an editor, after he has done his best, forget Heminges and Condell's final words: "And so we leave you to other of his friends, whom if you need can be your guides. If you need them not, you can lead yourselves, and others. And such readers we wish him."

THE COMEDY OF ERRORS

EDITED BY HARRY LEVIN

Introduction

The Comedy of Errors has come down to us solely through the First Folio, in a good text which seems not far removed from the author's manuscript, and which is particularly interesting for the explicitness of its stage directions. The play itself is the shortest, and may indeed be the earliest, of Shakespeare's dramatic works. As such, it is more explicitly linked to classical tradition than any of the others. In spite of a notorious gibe by Ben Jonson, it is quite evident that Shakespeare was acquainted with certain standard Latin authors. There is even an accredited rumor that, before entering the theater, he had taught in a country school, where the curriculum would have consisted of very little else. If he was to assay the range of the repertory, Seneca could not be "too heavy," in the phrase of Polonius, "nor Plautus too light." Titus Andronicus was Shakespeare's early experiment in the mode of Senecan tragedy; The Comedy of Errors marks, rather more happily, his assimilation and extension of Plautine comedy. In that case there was a specific model, the archetypal comedy of twins, the Menaechmi or Two Menaechmuses. A lively translation into Elizabethan prose by one W. W. (who is commonly identified as the minor poet William Warner) was published in 1595, some 1800 years after the appearance of Plautus' play on the Roman stage.

Whether Shakespeare could have seen an unpublished draft of this version, or whether W. W. was indebted to Shakespeare's free adaptation, has been argued back and forth by scholars. Certainly Shakespeare could have known the original at first hand, and the similar phrases used by both writers may be coincidences rather than echoes. At all events, the English Menaechmi offers a helpful basis of comparison whereby readers may observe for themselves how Shakespeare adapted and amplified Plautus. Such observations might well begin with W. W.'s title page: "A pleasant and fine Conceited Comedy taken out of the most excellent witty Poet Plautus, chosen purposely from out the rest as least harmful and yet delightful. . . ." In other words, both the translator and the playwright chose to work from an untypical play—untypical in its all but complete reliance on chance and not on contrivance, not on malice or mischief but sheer luck. Not that fortune, often in the most commercial sense, was ever slow to intervene in the world of Greco-Roman comedy. But it was commonly sought through the profit motive on the part of the old, or sexual appetite on the part of the young, and the resultant conflicts were perennially exploited by parasites and abetted by slaves. Whereas tragedy took place in temples and palaces, the comic sphere was a round of urban shops and middle-class domiciles.

In the ancient theater the proscenium was not a picture frame but an architectural façade, whose practical doors and upper windows gave a stylized impression of a street scene in some Mediterranean seaport. By convention the side exits led to the marketplace in one direction (Shakespeare's mart) and to the harbor in the other ("from the bay"). Between them flowed the continual traffic of characters, pausing at one doorway or another to transact their business, and incidentally to inform the audience of the goings-on within. What Shakespeare calls "the stirring passage of the day" moved all the faster because it did not look beyond external appearances. Drama becomes more serious when it stresses characterization; farce, at the other extreme, tends to subordinate character to plot. Hence the donnée of Plautus was the very essence of the farcical: two characters sufficiently alike, so that each might fit interchangeably into the other's situation, could not afford to possess distinguishing characteristics. They are, by definition, altogether exceptional. In general, the dramatis personae of New Comedy—the kind of comedy that was new with Menander, yet was by no means exhausted with Molière—are stock types rather than fully characterized individuals. With many changes of costume and scenery, they continue to present object lessons in avarice, flattery, braggadocio, and other continuing deviations from sound morality.

Comedy, as Sir Philip Sidney defined it for Shakespeare's age, is "an imitation of the common errors of our life," which are represented "in the most ridiculous and scornful sort that may be, so as it is impossible that any beholder can be content to be such a one." Sidney, who was involved in the defense of poetry, may bear down too heavily for our taste upon the posture of dramatist as moralist; yet, in emphasizing the correction of error, he shifts to the enlightenment of the spectator and to that civilized overview which—through a process of confusion and clarification—we finally attain: “There, but for the grace of God, go we!” To err is proverbially human; and our tragic heroes go astray grandly by committing some single and fatal mistake. Comic figures, on the other hand, run through a whole train of petty errors, and somehow manage to extricate themselves from the final consequences. Hence it is not surprising that Shakespeare’s generic title had its lost forerunners, notably a History of Error performed in 1577. It is recorded, too, that a gala performance of the Shakespearean Comedy of Errors was played by the legal gentlemen of Gray’s Inn during the Christmas season of 1594 (probably two or three years after it was first publicly produced), with such crowds and attendant confusions that the festive occasion “was ever afterwards called The Night of Errors.”

In his massive studies of Shakespeare’s modest Latinity, T. W. Baldwin has shown that the poet may well have studied Plautus in the contemporaneous edition of Lambinus. There the text of the Menaechmi was flanked by a commentary in which each successive twist or turn of the plot is signaled by the Latin verb errare or the noun error. Thus the key word utilized by Shakespeare would seem to have had the force of a technical term. Along with it we may consider another term, introduced by that versatile literary innovator, George Gascoigne, through his English rendering of Ariosto’s prose comedy, The Supposes. Now a “suppose,” as Gascoigne defined it and applied it through a series of marginal comments on the action of the play, is “a mistaking or imagination of one thing for another,” generally one person supposed to be someone else because of deception, disguise, or impersonation. It requires no plotting or counterplotting in a Machiavellian sense; the only plotter is Shakespeare or Plautus himself; and what he hatches is fobbed off upon us as a trick of fate, a freak of nature, a practical joke conceived and executed by providence. The misapprehensions that gave rise to it are not poses nor supposes nor impostures; they are, plainly and simply, errors. We are at the roulette table, not the chessboard, here.

Where tragedy individualizes its protagonists, comedy underscores those broad resemblances which make it difficult to tell people apart. The closer the similarity between them, the easier it becomes for us to confound them. Blunders are most easily committed when two differing alternatives closely resemble one another, though the resemblance be no more than skin-deep. “Two faces that are alike,” Pascal remarked, “though neither of them excites laughter in itself, make me laugh when together on account of the likeness.” It was this sentence of Pascal’s that Bergson developed into his theory of laughter as a protest of the natural and the humane against all attempts at mechanization and regimentation. Duplication, in particular, seems an affront to human dignity (one is almost tempted to call it a loss of face)—to be always mistaken for, to be almost indistinguishable from, somebody else. A set of identical twins, leading different lives, is a possibility but not a probability; and Coleridge would invoke that classic distinction to draw a line between comedy and farce. Upon his recommendation we entertain the initial hypothesis; we verily believe it because it is absurd; for, after all, absurdity is man’s lot as the Existentialists have redefined it. Plautus offered Shakespeare a basic theme for the unforced interplay of cross-purposes. Shakespeare’s variations, widely echoed in their turn, would be blithely syncopated by Rodgers and Hart in their appealing musical comedy The Boys from Syracuse.

The improbable assumption of Plautus was complicated to the very limits of the possible when Shakespeare dared to redouble the twins, and thereby to provide his pair of protagonists with a brace of retainers. Here he was acting on a hint from another Plautine source, a play so frequently imitated that Jean Giraudoux could number his treatment Amphitryon 38. Its myth is that of Alcmena, wooed by Jupiter in the shape of her absent husband Amphitryon, while Jupiter’s companion, Mercury, assumes the person of Sosia, the household slave. Two of Shakespeare’s most effective scenes, where the homecoming master and man are turned away from their own threshold, are directly inspired by Plautus’ Amphitryon. Consequently, since each of Shakespeare’s masters has a bondservant, he does not need to attach an officious parasite to the local Menaechmus as Plautus does. Messenio, the clever servant who accompanies the Syracusan Menaechmus, warns him with a pun against Epidamnum, where no one escapes “sine damno (without damage)”; but the Epidamnian pitfalls turn out to be unsolicited favors, which the visitor accepts with increasing insouciance. As for the citizen-twin, he is a solid man of affairs; but, having had a falling-out with his wife (and Plautus wastes no sympathy whatsoever upon the shrewish Uxor or Roman matron), he sets aside the day’s business for a night’s pleasure. In the true holiday spirit, both brothers are on the town.

Shakespeare, in amplifying the wife’s role, reduced the part assigned to the Courtesan. The pivotal banquet is served not at her hangout, the Porpentine, but at the home of Antipholus above his shop, the Phoenix; while he, a normally faithful husband, seeks out her company only after he has reason to suspect his wife. The latter, Adriana, inherits the Uxor’s misunderstanding with her husband; but Shakespeare sublimates it to a plane of genuine, if too possessive, conjugal love. Moreover, he endows her with a sister, to be courted by the bachelor Antipholus; and Luciana proves to be a raisonneuse, a mouthpiece of moderation, so that the twins occupy a place in the great Shakespearean debate on marriage, along with Kate and Petruchio or Rosaline and Berowne or Beatrice and Benedick. Shakespeare’s characters live, as usual, in a Christian ethos. The perplexed traveler swears, “as I am a Christian,” and—approached by the Courtesan—echoes Christ bidding Satan avaunt. The change in the ethical climate may be noted by the shift from Epidamnum, which is nonetheless mentioned along the way, to Ephesus. Plautus’ Syracusans fear Epidamnum because it is an emporium of sharp practice, peopled by rogues and harlots and the usual comic types. Shakespeare’s Syracusans are cautious too. “They say this town is full of cozenage,” the traveling Antipholus warns himself.

Notwithstanding, the Ephesians he meets are not “disguised cheaters.” They are, as the traveling Dromio puts it, “a gentle nation,” who “speak us fair, give us gold.” Shakespeare is more in his milieu where the setting is a room in the palace—or, better still, another part of the forest—than in the mercantile zones of New Comedy. It is not coney-catching but witchcraft and sorcery that envelop Ephesus in its mysterious aura. “Here we wander in illusions." This is a place of strangers and sojourners, given to curious arts, to echo the patron saint of travelers in partibus infidelium, the apostle Paul. Not without pertinence, it has been suggested that Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, with its injunctions for husbands and wives, and for servants and masters, may have been in the background of Shakespeare's mind. His far-flung romance of Pericles, based on the folk tale of Apollonius of Tyre as retold by John Gower, reaches its resolution in the famous Temple of Diana at Ephesus. Some of the elements of the late play are present in the early one, notably the vicissitudes of a family progressing through misadventure by sea to recognition under religious auspices. The pagan temple has its counterpart in the priory, where—instead of a goddess in the machine—the flesh-and-blood Abbess is revealed to be the long-lost wife and mother.

The framing figure of Egeon contributes an emotional tension, at the very outset, to what would otherwise have remained a two-dimensional drama. His protracted expository narration is enlivened by the awareness that it is a plea, and probably a vain one, for his life. Rightly he blames his misfortunes on hap; for nowhere else in Shakespeare can a whole pattern of incidents be so directly traceable to sheer unmitigated contingency. Egeon is hopeless and helpless because he is hapless. But this is not to be a novel by Thomas Hardy; it is a knockabout farce, where bad fortune will change soon enough into good. The next scene not only offers a hint that the new arrival is one of Egeon's sons—through the mixup of the Dromios—and that the other son is just around the corner, but virtually guarantees the ransom, since the sum mentioned in both scenes is exactly a thousand marks. Coincidence has already done its best, as well as its worst, and a happy ending has been implicit from the beginning. Meanwhile the sequence of farcical episodes has been framed by the tragicomic overplot; and Shakespeare, by enlisting our sympathies for the fate of Egeon, has charged the air with a suspense which cannot be resolved until the appointed hour of execution, five o'clock in the afternoon.

Both of the Antipholuses have appointments at that hour, one of them with the Merchant and the other with Angelo the goldsmith; and since it is noon when the Syracusan arrives, and since the Ephesian Dromio gets into his troubles over the question of dinnertime, the time scheme is firmly fixed within the course of the afternoon. There are frequent reminders of time passing, to reinforce the structure of occurrences: when Komisarjevsky produced the play at Stratford-on-Avon, his setting was dominated by a gigantic clock. Adhering to the classical unities as Shakespeare does just once again in The Tempest, he takes the traditional city street as his horizon, moving his characters back and forth from port to mart and in and out of the various doorways between. The play would seem to lend itself very conveniently to the simultaneous stage of a great hall, such as that of Gray's Inn, where three or four free-standing houses or so-called mansions would have corresponded to the labeled locations: the Phoenix, the Porpentine for the Courtesan, the Centaur Inn, and the ultimate abbey near the place of execution. On the other hand, the recent production at Stratford, Ontario, demonstrated how well the play could adapt to the multilevel mobility of an Elizabethan playhouse.

The problem of staging ought not to be unduly strained

by the presupposition that calls for identical twins. To be sure, the difficulty raised by the twins of two sexes in Twelfth Night, which would have been solved in Shakespeare's day when both parts were acted by young men, is virtually insoluble in the modern theater. But, granted an approximate equivalence of stature, plus the same costuming and make-up, the Antipholuses and Dromios ought to look enough alike to confuse the other characters without confusing the audience. Is it not our premise, in viewing a comedy, that we are brighter than those who are on the stage? In the Roman theater, where the employment of masks eliminated the facial disparities, Plautus had to give a tassel to Mercury and a feather to Jupiter so that they would not be confused with Sosia and Amphitryon. At Stratford, Connecticut, in 1963, the same actor was cast as both twins, thereby combining histrionic virtuosity with artistic economy. This directorial tactic must create a bigger dilemma than the one it endeavors to solve, since the audience can never know the moment of catharsis, the visual illumination of seeing the two confusing elements discriminated from one another and exhibited side by side.

That way schizophrenia lies—which does not mean that it would be unproduceable in the Theater of the Absurd. It might turn out to be something in the vein of Pirandello, if not a dramatization of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. But the actual predicament is that of two personalities forced into the same role, rather than that of one personality playing two roles, since the resident twin has the contacts and continuities, and the roving twin intercepts them, as it were. Tweedledum has got to match Tweedledee, more or less, in order to be taken for him; and yet, the less he feels like him, the more the dramatic irony. Plautus did not discriminate between his two very sharply; the discrepancies that emerged largely took the concrete form of objects which fell into the wrong hands; otherwise the interconnecting characters did not seem to notice much difference. The married Menaechnus was angry from the first, so that each new chagrin could be rationalized to his mood. The interloping Menaechnus, though considerably bewildered, had no cause for being dissatisfied with his reception. Neither of them was above the temptation to profit from the contretemps; and the interloper finally engaged in a stratagem of his own, when he joined the game and pretended to be a lunatic.

That sort of conduct is what we have agreed to label a suppose, a deception which is cultivated rather than casual. The most notable fact about Shakespeare's comedy is that it has no supposes, only errors: only mischances, and no contrivances by anybody except Shakespeare himself. There is no parallel scene of pretended madness; Shakespeare must have been saving the theme for Hamlet. Here the suspected madman, like Malvolio in Twelfth Night, protests his sanity. He does not act; he is acted upon; and Shakespeare, ever the psychologist, makes a good deal more out of the attempted diagnosis of demonic possession. He makes the exorcism so very painful, and goes so far out of his way to substitute the grim-visaged schoolmaster, Dr. Pinch, for the Plautine Medicus, that we sense a virtual obsession, possibly connected with Holofernes, the pedant of Love's Labor's Lost, or with some other reminiscence from Shakespeare's own teaching days. It is as if the nightmare came so close that the misunderstood hero dare not pretend to be hallucinated. Again there is a precedent in Saint Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, where the exorcist is exorcised. The customary rhetorical questions of comedy, in these mouths, become questions of existential bewilderment or expressions of cosmic vertigo: Do I dream or wake? Do we see double? Is he drunk or sober? Is she a liar or a fool? Who is crazy? Who is sane?

Contrasted with this constant inner questioning, the caricature of Dr. Pinch seems externalized. He is the one humorous personage of the play, in the Jonsonian usage, a man of obvious quirks and eccentric aspect, the crazy psychiatrist. If the others are funny, it is because of the plights they find themselves in. No, there is one other exception, though she is peripheral, and has a greater impact in her absence than in her presence onstage. This heroine, invoked indifferently as Luce or Nell, is generically a Dowsabel or, for that matter, a Dulcinea—a kitchen maid whose formidable proportions are vividly verbalized by the wrong Dromio, her brother-in-law, who is still quaking from the shock of having been claimed by her as a husband. This is the vulgar parallel to Adriana's claim upon her brother-in-law. Dromio's description of his brother's Nell, elicited by his master's queries as straight man, is a set-piece in the manner of Launce or Launcelot Gobbo, and may well have been assigned to the same comedian. With its geographical conceits, comparing the parts of her person to foreign countries (and containing, incidentally, the sole direct allusion that Shakespeare makes to America), it might almost be a ribald reversal of Othello's traveler's tales when wooing Desdemona.

But it is by no means a far-fetched gag, since it embodies—on a more than miniature scale—the principal contrast of the play: on the one hand, extensive voyaging; on the other, intensive domesticity. In using an underplot which burlesques the main plot, Shakespeare employs a device as old as Medwall's pioneer interlude of Fulgens and Lucres, where the rival suitors have servants who court the mistress' maid under the diagrammatic designations of A and B. With Nell, as with the demanding Adriana, the normal approaches of courtship are reversed. The closest we come to romantic love is the sketchy relationship between her brother-in-law and her husband's sister-in-law. Yet that is a good deal closer than Plautus brings us; and though both masters are suitably mated in the end, the concluding dialogue of the servants emphasizes the pairing of twins, not spouses. Parents and children are reunited, family ties are reasserted; but Dromio of Syracuse remains a free agent. His greatest moment has been the midpoint of the play, when he acted as doorkeeper and kept out his fellow Dromio, as well as that Dromio's master, the master of the house. This is the one point before the denouement when Shakespeare permits his twins to meet and talk, and the door between them seems to keep the mutual visibility fairly obscure.

It is worth noting that their brief colloquy reverts to the doggerel style of Ralph Roister Doister, the oldest English imitation of Plautus, in its stichomythic interchanges of rhyming fourteeners. This is the main scene (the first of Act III) that Shakespeare borrowed from the Amphitryon (the first of Act I), eking out the comedy of the Menaechmi with the underplot of the two Sosias to complete—with a vengeance—the Elizabethan requirements for a double plot. He develops it to the very pitch of the dramatic subversion that he has been exploiting, with the outsider inside and the insider excluded, the stranger in possession of the house and the householder cast into outer darkness. Both parties are translated, as Quince will affirm of Bottom; and they could not have been so completely translated, had they not been fac-similes to begin with. The most fundamental alteration that Shakespeare made in his Plautine material was to shift the focus from the homekeeping twin to his errant brother, whose sobriquet, Antipholus Erotes, may be a variation on Erratus or Errans. The Menaechmi starts out with the other twin, and with the reassurance of familiar surroundings, into which the disturbing factor will be injected. The Comedy of Errors starts with the newcomer, and his impressions of strangeness: the witchery of Ephesus, not the bustle of Epidamnum.

Having a head start, and having to alternate scenes with Antipholus of Ephesus, who does not appear until the third act, Antipholus of Syracuse has a much larger part: roughly 272 lines to the other's 207. The disproportion is even clearer between the parts of the two Dromios: there the score is Syracuse 233, Ephesus 162. The Menaechmi, though it is the shorter play, has fewer characters and longer speeches; accordingly, its Syracusan twin has 251 lines, whereas the Epidamnian twin has 300. We therefore tend to visualize what goes on in the Latin play from the denizen's standpoint, and what goes on in the English play from the alien's. Epidamnum could be any old town, where everything should be in its place, in situ: where everyone expects his fellow citizen, Menaechmus, to go through the round of his habitual day. No one could suspect that there was another Menaechmus, whose chance encounters would lead to incongruities and discontinuities, except for his one follower, who shares and compounds his perplexities. Ephesus is another story, however. We are put off at once by the hostile reception of Egeon; and when the two other foreigners enter, Antipholus and Dromio, they are the first of those names whom we have met.

We share their misgivings all the more readily because they too have been risking their lives, and because the object of their travels has so far eluded them. When this Antipholus gets caught up in his brother's existence, it is as new to us as it is to him. We participate in an adventure; what might be matter of fact to an Ephesian is, for him and ourselves, a fantasy out of the Arabian Nights. "What error drives our eyes and ears amiss?" he wonders, after Adriana accosts him, reprimands him, and invites him to dinner. And tentatively he resolves,

Until I know this sure uncertainty,
I'll entertain the offered fallacy. (II.ii.186-87)

Then, after dinner, smitten with Luciana, he asks her to unfold the mystery:

Teach me, dear creature, how to think and speak:
Lay open to my earthy-gross conceit,
Smoth'red in errors, feeble, shallow, weak,
The folded meaning of your words' deceit. (III.ii.33-36)

But the undeception does not come about until all the participants in this "sympathized one day's error"—for so the Abbess sums it up—have sought the illumination of sanctuary within her abbey. In that cloistered serenity, far from urban corruption, the deferred recognition scenes can coincide at long last. The confessions and counter-accusations piece together a step-by-step recapitulation of how "these errors are arose." The maternal figure of the Abbess is something of a surprise, as Bertrand Evans points out in his recent study, Shakespeare's Comedies. Running through all of them, Mr. Evans finds their common structural principle in what he calls a "discrepant awareness." Characteristically, the humor springs from "the exploitable gulf spread between the participants' understanding and ours."

In Shakespeare's development of this resource, The Comedy of Errors is primordial, since it is his single comedy where the audience knows all and all the characters are in the dark. Mr. Evans' suggestive analysis can be perfectly fitted to the Menaechmi. Plautus, in effect, is always saying, "I told you so." But Shakespeare is always asking, "Can such things be?" The exceptional position of the Abbess not only rounds out the recognitions; it lays the spell of wonderment again upon the concluding scene; and it reminds us, as other touches do, of Shakespeare's romances. Even within the venal and angular precincts of Latinate comedy, he can make us aware of unpathed waters, undreamed shores, and things in heaven and earth that philosophy has not fathomed. Yet philosophers can tell us much, particularly about the processes of learning; and Bergson tells us much about The Comedy of Errors when, in his essay on laughter, he borrows a concept from optics and writes of "the reciprocal interference of series." At length we can put our supposes or errors down in scientific terminology. "A situation is invariably comic," Bergson explains, "when it belongs simultaneously to two independent series of events, and is capable of being interpreted in two entirely different meanings at the same time."

It would be hard to conceive of a better illustration than the two different series of events in the respective days of the two Antipholuses, and the ways in which they are imperceptibly crisscrossed. Antipholus of Syracuse has no particular expectations or plans. He derives a gratuitous enjoyment from the inexplicable services rendered and favors due his brother. This interference or substitution induces a certain amnesia on the brother's part, when the bills come in and the witnesses testify; naturally, he cannot remember the items attested. As one error engenders another, suspicion is bound to mount and disgruntlement spread, rising to their climax in hot pursuit toward the madhouse or the jail, and ending at the priory. Now the brunt of these displacements is borne by Antipholus of Ephesus. Of all those discomfited, he comes nearest to being a victim of the situation, since it is his situation, in the last analysis. It is his routine which is broken up, his standing in the community undermined; his normal expectations are interfered with, and—to add insult to injury—he is expected to pay for what he has been deprived of. In short, the rug has been pulled out from under the very preconditions of his existence.

Other people's bafflement can be fun, and Plautus makes the most of it. From the heights of our spectatorial vantage point, we need not worry too much about what befalls whom. We are not playing blind man's buff, we are watching the game. But Shakespeare makes us feel what it is like to be this or that Antipholus—all the difference in the world, if we happened to start by being the other one—and the interaction of opposite numbers ends by demonstrating a fortiori the uniqueness of the individual. When Adriana and her husband appeal to the duke, the stories they tell of their day's experience are mutually contradictory; but the discrepancies would disappear if the shadow of the interfering Antipholus were retraced through their reciprocal patterns. (Latter-day readers or viewers may be reminded of the Japanese story or film Rashomon.) It has been a lesson for Adriana, brought home by the gentle rebuke of the Abbess, and penitently acknowledged. For Antipholus of Ephesus, it has been an eye-opening misadventure. Apparently, he has never felt the impetus that has incited his brother and his father to sally forth in search of him. Unconcerned with his founding origin, he rejoices in the good graces of the duke and takes for granted the stable comforts of his Ephesian citizenship.

What greater shock for him, then, than to bring a party of fellow citizens home to his well-established household for lunch and to discover that household preempted by roistering strangers, to be shut out in the street, to have one's own door slammed in one's own face? Or is it one's own? The sense of alienation, that Verfremdungseffekt so characteristic of Brecht and of the twentieth-century theater, is all the greater when our image of ourselves depends for its corroboration upon a settled context, and when we come to realize—what tragedy teaches us—that it is our destiny to be displaced. When Messenio saw the two Menaechmuses together, he declared that water was not more like water. After Shakespeare has adapted the metaphor, it stands not for an easy correspondence but for an unending quest.

I to the world am like a drop of water

That in the ocean seeks another drop, (I.ii.35-36)

Antipholus of Syracuse confesses sadly, realizing that he is less likely to find a mother and a brother than to be irretrievably lost himself. Later, Adriana, addressing him as if he were Antipholus of Ephesus, likens their imperiled love to a drop of water into the sea; and he has a similar exchange with Luciana. The Syracusan twin is conscious that he must lose his identity in order to find it; the Ephesian twin is not; but he must, and he does. And Dromio too—both Dromios, whichever is which—must undergo their crises of identity: "Am I Dromio? Am I your man? Am I myself?"

Modern psychological fiction is haunted by doubles, sometimes as overtly as in the tales of Hoffmann, Poe, and Dostoevsky, or in "The Jolly Corner" of Henry James, where the Black Stranger is recognized as the self that might have been. The other self—best friend, worst enemy—stares back at the poets from Heine's pallid ghost ("Du! Doppelgänger, du bleicher Geselle!") or Baudelaire's hypocritical reader ("mon semblable! mon frère!"). That alter ego may be demon or devil, good angel or evil genius. It may be the retribution of conscience—Philip Drunk reprehended by Philip Sober—or, at the other extreme, the vicarious pleasure the artist enjoys through the playboy, the envy of Shem for Shaun. All this may well be a far cry from Plautine or even Shakespearean farce, to which we should be glad that we can escape from our more introspective dilemmas. There all aberrations come home to roost, and are sorted out by the happy ending; we acknowledge the error of our ways, and false suppositions are replaced by truths. No one really gets damaged in Epidamnum, and everyone enjoys a new lease of life when Egeon is ransomed and reprieved. Everything will be explained at a feast, after the conventional manner of comedy. Debts will be paid, relationships renewed, and daily routine taken up where it broke off. Having been restored once more to our familiar world, we laugh away the shudder of estrangement.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCE

Titus Maccius Plautus, who was born during the third century B.C. and died during the second, was the most popular of the Roman playwrights. Freely adapted into the Latin vernacular from the New Comedy of the Greeks, his plays were distinguished by their broad humor, fast movement, vivid language, and nimble versification. Among the twenty-one Plautine comedies that have come down to us, the Menaechmi is one of the best known and the most influential, doubtless because it reduces the dilemmas of mistaken identity to an archetypal pattern. A rough but vigorous translation into Elizabethan prose, which Shakespeare may or may not have known in manuscript form, was published in 1595, presumably a few years after the first production of The Comedy of Errors. The initials of the translator, W. W., are generally thought to stand for William Warner, a man of letters who is sometimes remembered for his historical poem, Albion's England. For the underplot of the twin servants, Shakespeare is indebted to the Amphitruo of Plautus, particularly the opening scene and the fourth act.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

The Comedy of Errors was first published in the Folio of 1623, which provides the only authoritative text. It is possible that the copy for the Folio was Shakespeare's manuscript; the ambiguity of some names in stage directions and in speech prefixes would have been confusing in a promptbook. For example, Egeon is Mer(chant) in I.i., but other merchants appear in other scenes without distinctive titles. More important, E. Dro(mio) is, as might be expected, Dromio of Ephesus; but E. Ant. is Antipholus of Syracuse, an abbreviation of his earlier designation, Ant. Erotis—which is perhaps an approximation of erraticus, wandering. A promptbook doubtless would have clarified the nomenclature.

The Folio's text is a good one, presenting the editor with relatively few problems. In the present edition the speech prefixes and names in stage directions have been regularized, spelling and punctuation have been modernized, and obvious typographical errors have been corrected. A few passages that the Folio prints as prose are given in verse, and the positions of a few stage directions have been slightly altered. Act division (translated from the Latin) is that of the Folio; scene division is that of the Globe text. Other departures from the Folio are listed below, with the adopted reading first, in boldface, and the original reading next, in roman.

Scene: Ephesus]

A C T I

Scene I. [A public place.]

Enter the DUKE of Ephesus, with [EGEON] the merchant of Syracuse,° JAILER, and other ATTENDANTS.

EGEON

Proceed, Solinus, to procure my fall,
And by the doom° of death end woes and all.

DUKE

Merchant of Syracuse, plead no more;
I am not partial° to infringe our laws.
The enmity and discord which of late
Sprung from the rancorous outrage of your duke
To merchants, our well-dealing countrymen,
Who, wanting guilders° to redeem their lives,
Have sealed his rigorous statutes with their bloods,
Excludes all pity from our threat'ning looks.
For, since the mortal and intestine jars°
'Twixt thy seditious countrymen and us,

It hath in solemn synods been decreed,
Both by the Syracusians and ourselves,
To admit no traffic to our adverse° towns.

15

Nay more; if any born at Ephesus°
Be seen at Syracusian marts and fairs;
Again, if any Syracusian born
Come to the bay of Ephesus, he dies,
His goods confiscate to the duke's dispose,° Unless a thousand marks° be levied
To quit° the penalty and to ransom him.

20

Thy substance, valued at the highest rate,
Cannot amount unto a hundred marks;
Therefore by law thou art condemned to die.

EGEON

Yet this my comfort: when your words are done,
My woes end likewise with the evening sun.

DUKE

Well, Syracusian, say, in brief, the cause
Why thou departed'st from thy native home,
And for what cause thou cam'st to Ephesus.

EGEON

A heavier task could not have been imposed
Than I to speak my griefs unspeakable;

The decorative border above appeared on the first page of The Comedy of Errors in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's plays, 1623.

I.i.s.d. Syracusa Syracuse, ancient capital of Sicily 2 doom sentence 4 partial predisposed 8 guilders Dutch coins worth about forty cents 11 intestine jars internal conflicts

15 adverse hostile 16 Ephesus rich city on the coast of Asia Minor 20 dispose disposal 21 marks valued at somewhat more than three dollars 22 quit acquit

Yet, that the world may witness that my end
 Was wrought by nature, not by vile offense,
 I'll utter what my sorrow gives me leave.
 In Syracuse was I born, and wed
 Unto a woman happy but for me,
 And by me, had not our hap been bad.
 With her I lived in joy, our wealth increased
 By prosperous voyages I often made
 To Epidamnum,⁴¹ till my factor's⁴² death
 And the great care of goods at random left
 Drew me from kind embracements of my spouse;
 From whom my absence was not six months old,
 Before herself—almost at fainting under
 The pleasing punishment that women bear—
 Had made provision for her following me,
 And soon and safe arrivèd where I was.
 There had she not been long, but she became
 A joyful mother of two goodly sons;
 And, which was strange, the one so like the other,
 As could not be distinguished but by names.
 That very hour, and in the selfsame inn,
 A mean⁴³ woman was deliverèd
 Of such a burden male, twins both alike.
 Those, for⁴⁴ their parents were exceeding poor,
 I bought, and brought up to attend my sons.
 My wife, not meanly⁴⁵ proud of two such boys,
 Made daily motions⁴⁶ for our home return.
 Unwilling I agreed; alas, too soon
 We came aboard.
 A league from Epidamnum had we sailed
 Before the always wind-obeying deep
 Gave any tragic instance⁴⁷ of our harm.
 But longer did we not retain much hope;
 For what obscurèd light the heavens did grant
 Did but convey unto our fearful minds
 A doubtful warrant⁴⁸ of immediate death,
 Which, though myself would gladly have embraced,
 Yet the incessant weepings of my wife,
 Weeping before for what she saw must come,
 And piteous plainings⁴⁹ of the pretty babes,
 That mourned for fashion,⁵⁰ ignorant what to fear,
 Forced me to seek delays for them and me.
 And this it was—for other means was none:
 The sailors sought for safety by our boat,
 And left the ship, then sinking-ripe,⁵¹ to us.
 My wife, more careful for the latter-born,⁵²
 Had fast'ned him unto a small spare mast,
 Such as seafaring men provide for storms;
 To him one of the other twins was bound,
 Whilst I had been like heedful of the other.
 The children thus disposed, my wife and I,
 Fixing our eyes on whom our care was fixed,
 Fast'ned ourselves at either end the mast;
 And floating straight, obedient to the stream,
 Was carried towards Corinth,⁵³ as we thought.
 At length the sun, gazing upon the earth,
 Dispersed those vapors that offended us,

41 Epidamnum Adriatic seaport; factor's agent's 54 mean poor 56 for because 58 not meanly more than a little 59 motions proposals 64 instance token 68 doubtful warrant ominous sign 72 plainings wails 73 fashion custom 77 sinking-ripe ready to sink 78 latter-born but see line 124 87 Corinth major Greek seaport

And, by the benefit of his wishèd⁵⁴ light,
 The seas waxed calm, and we discoverèd
 Two ships from far, making amain⁵⁵ to us:
 Of Corinth that, of Epidaurus⁵⁶ this.
 But ere they came—O, let me say no more!
 Gather the sequel by that went before.

DUKE

40 Nay, forward, old man; do not break off so,
 For we may pity, though not pardon thee.

EGEON

O, had the gods done so, I had not now
 Worthily⁵⁷ termed them merciless to us.
 For, ere the ships could meet by twice five leagues,
 We were encount'ed by a mighty rock,
 Which being violently borne upon,
 Our helpful ship⁵⁸ was splitted in the midst;
 So that, in this unjust divorce of us,
 Fortune had left to both of us alike
 What to delight in, what to sorrow for.
 Her part, poor soul, seeming as burdenèd
 With lesser weight, but not with lesser woe,
 Was carried with more speed before the wind;
 And in our sight they three were taken up
 By fishermen of Corinth, as we thought.
 At length another ship had seized on us,
 And, knowing whom it was their hap to save,
 Gave healthful welcome to their shipwrecked guests,
 And would have reft⁵⁹ the fishers of their prey,
 Had not their bark been very slow of sail;
 And therefore homeward did they bend their course.
 Thus have you heard me severed from my bliss,
 That by misfortunes was my life prolonged
 To tell sad stories of my own mishaps.

DUKE

And, for the sake of them thou sorrowest for,
 Do me the favor to dilate⁶⁰ at full
 What have befall'n of them and thee till now.

EGEON

My youngest boy, and yet my eldest care,
 At eighteen years became inquisitive
 After his brother, and importuned me
 That his attendant—so his case was like,
 Reft of his brother, but retained his name—
 Might bear him company in the quest of him;
 Whom whilst I labored of a love⁶¹ to see,
 I hazarded the loss of whom I loved.
 Five summers have I spent in farthest Greece,
 Roaming clean through the bounds of Asia,
 And coasting homeward, came to Ephesus,
 Hopeless to find,⁶² yet loath to leave unsought
 Or⁶³ that or any place that harbors men.
 But here must end the story of my life;
 And happy were I in my timely death,
 Could all my travels⁶⁴ warrant me they live.

DUKE

Hapless Egeon, whom the fates have marked
 To bear the extremity of dire mishap!

90 his wishèd its wished-for 92 amain with full speed 93 Epidaurus ancient name for both a Greek and an Adriatic town 99 Worthily deservedly 103 ship the mast 115 reft robbed 122 dilate relate 130 of a love out of love 135 Hopeless to find without hope of finding 136 Or either 139 travels with the further implication of "travails"

Now trust me, were it not against our laws,
 Against my crown, my oath, my dignity,^o
 Which princes, would they, may not disannul,^o
 My soul should sue as advocate for thee. 145
 But though thou art adjudgèd^o to the death,
 And passèd sentence may not be recalled
 But to our honor's great disparagement,^o
 Yet will I favor thee in what I can;
 Therefore, merchant, I'll limit thee this day 150
 To seek thy health by beneficial help.
 Try all the friends thou hast in Ephesus—
 Beg thou, or borrow, to make up the sum,
 And live; if no, then thou art doomed to die.
 Jailer, take him to thy custody. 155

JAILER

I will, my lord.

EGEON

Hopeless and helpless doth Egeon wend,
 But to procrastinate^o his lifeless end. Exeunt.

[Scene II. The mart.^o]

Enter ANTIPHOLUS [OF SYRACUSE], a MERCHANT, and DROMIO [OF SYRACUSE].

MERCHANT

Therefore, give out you are of Epidamnum,
 Lest that your goods too soon be confiscate.
 This very day a Syracusian merchant
 Is apprehended for arrival here,
 And not being able to buy out^o his life, 5
 According to the statute of the town,
 Dies ere the weary sun set in the west.
 There is your money that I had to keep.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Go bear it to the Centaur,^o where we host,^o
 And stay there, Dromio, till I come to thee;
 Within this hour it will be dinnertime;
 Till that, I'll view the manners of the town,
 Peruse the traders, gaze upon the buildings,
 And then return and sleep within mine inn;
 For with long travel I am stiff and weary. 15
 Get thee away.

S. DROMIO

Many a man would take you at your word,
 And go indeed, having so good a mean.^o

Exit DROMIO.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

A trusty villain,^o sir, that very oft,
 When I am dull with care and melancholy, 20
 Lightens my humor^o with his merry jests.
 What, will you walk with me about the town,
 And then go to my inn and dine with me?

MERCHANT

I am invited, sir, to certain merchants,
 Of whom I hope to make much benefit. 25

I crave your pardon; soon at five o'clock,
 Please you, I'll meet with you upon the mart,
 And afterward consort^o you till bedtime.
 My present business calls me from you now.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Farewell till then. I will go lose myself, 30
 And wander up and down to view the city.

MERCHANT

Sir, I commend you to your own content. Exit.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

He that commends me to mine own content
 Commends me to the thing I cannot get.
 I to the world am like a drop of water 35
 That in the ocean seeks another drop,
 Who, falling there to find his fellow forth,^o
 Unseen, inquisitive, confounds^o himself.
 So I, to find a mother and a brother,
 In quest of them, unhappy,^o lose myself. 40

Enter DROMIO OF EPHEBUS.

Here comes the almanac^o of my true date.
 What now? How chance thou art returned so soon?

E. DROMIO

Returned so soon! Rather approached too late.
 The capon burns, the pig falls from the spit;
 The clock hath stricken twelve^o upon the bell; 45
 My mistress made it one upon my cheek.
 She is so hot because the meat is cold;
 The meat is cold because you come not home;
 You come not home because you have no stomach;^o
 You have no stomach, having broke your fast. 50
 But we, that know what 'tis to fast and pray,
 Are penitent for your default^o today.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Stop in your wind,^o sir; tell me this, I pray:
 Where have you left the money that I gave you?

E. DROMIO

O, sixpence, that I had o' Wednesday last, 55
 To pay the saddler for my mistress' crupper?^o
 The saddler had it, sir, I kept it not.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

I am not in a sportive humor now.
 Tell me, and dally not, where is the money?
 We being strangers here, how dar'st thou trust 60
 So great a charge from thine own custody?

E. DROMIO

I pray you, jest, sir, as you sit at dinner.
 I from my mistress come to you in post;^o
 If I return, I shall be post^o indeed, 65
 For she will score^o your fault upon my pate.
 Methinks your maw,^o like mine, should be your clock,
 And strike you home without a messenger.

Where is the gold I gave in charge to thee? 70

E. DROMIO

To me, Sir? Why, you gave no gold to me.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Come on, sir knave, have done your foolishness,
And tell me how thou hast disposed thy charge.

E. DROMIO

My charge was but to fetch you from the mart
Home to your house, the Phoenix,^o sir, to dinner. 75
My mistress and her sister stays for you.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Now, as I am a Christian, answer me,
In what safe place you have bestowed^o my money;
Or I shall break that merry sconce^o of yours
That stands on^o tricks when I am undisposed. 80
Where is the thousand marks thou hadst of me?

E. DROMIO

I have some marks of yours upon my pate,
Some of my mistress' marks upon my shoulders,
But not a thousand marks between you both.
If I should pay^o your worship those again, 85
Perchance you will not bear them patiently.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Thy mistress' marks? What mistress, slave, hast thou?

E. DROMIO

Your worship's wife, my mistress at the Phoenix;
She that doth fast till you come home to dinner,
And prays that you will hie you home to dinner. 90

S. ANTIPHOLUS

What, wilt thou flout me thus unto my face,
Being forbid? There, take you that, sir knave.

[Beats him.]

E. DROMIO

What mean you, sir? For God's sake, hold your hands!
Nay, and^o you will not, sir, I'll take my heels.

Exit DROMIO.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Upon my life, by some device or other, 95
The villain is o'erraught^o of all my money.
They say this town is full of cozenage:^o
As^o nimble jugglers that deceive the eye,
Dark-working sorcerers that change the mind,
Soul-killing witches that deform the body, 100
Disguisèd cheaters, prating mountebanks,^o
And many suchlike liberties^o of sin.
If it prove so, I will be gone the sooner.
I'll to the Centaur, to go seek this slave.
I greatly fear my money is not safe. Exit. 105

A C T I I

[Scene I. The Phoenix.]

*Enter ADRIANA, wife to Antipholus [of Ephesus], with

ADRIANA

Neither my husband nor the slave returned,
That in such haste I sent to seek his master.
Sure, Luciana, it is two o'clock.

LUCIANA

Perhaps some merchant hath invited him,
And from the mart he's somewhere gone to dinner. 5
Good sister, let us dine, and never fret;
A man is master of his liberty.
Time is their master, and when they see time,
They'll go or come; if so, be patient, sister.

ADRIANA

Why should their liberty than ours be more? 10

LUCIANA

Because their business still^o lies out o' door.

ADRIANA

Look when^o I serve him so, he takes it ill.

LUCIANA

O, know he is the bridle of your will.

ADRIANA

There's none but asses will be bridled so.

LUCIANA

Why, headstrong liberty is lashed^o with woe. 15
There's nothing situate under heaven's eye
But hath his bound, in earth, in sea, in sky.
The beasts, the fishes, and the wingèd fowls
Are their males' subjects, and at their controls;^o
Man, more divine, the master of all these, 20
Lord of the wide world and wild wat'ry seas,
Indued with intellectual sense^o and souls,
Of more preeminence than fish and fowls,
Are masters to their females, and their lords;
Then let your will attend on their accords. 25

ADRIANA

This servitude makes you to keep unwed.

LUCIANA

Not this, but troubles of the marriage bed.

ADRIANA

But, were you wedded, you would bear some sway.^o

LUCIANA

Ere I learn love, I'll practice to obey.

ADRIANA

How if your husband start some other where?^o 30

LUCIANA

Till he come home again, I would forbear.

ADRIANA

Patience unmoved! no marvel though she pause;^o
They can be meek that have no other cause.^o

We bid be quiet when we hear it cry; 35

LUCIANA

Well, I will marry one day, but to try.
 Here comes your man, now is your husband nigh.

Enter DROMIO OF EPHESUS.

ADRIANA

Say, is your tardy master now at hand?

E. DROMIO Nay, he's at two hands with me, and that 45 my two ears can witness.

ADRIANA

Say, didst thou speak with him? Know'st thou his mind?

E. DROMIO Ay, ay, he told° his mind upon mine ear.
 Beshrew his hand, I scarce could understand it.

LUCIANA Spake he so doubtfully,° thou couldst not 50 feel his meaning?

E. DROMIO Nay, he struck so plainly, I could too well feel his blows; and withal so doubtfully, that I could scarce understand° them.

ADRIANA

But say, I prithee, is he coming home? 55
 It seems he hath great care to please his wife.

E. DROMIO Why, mistress, sure my master is horn-mad.

ADRIANA

Horn-mad,° thou villain!

E. DROMIO I mean not cuckold-mad, 60
 But sure he is stark mad.

When I desired him to come home to dinner,
 He asked me for a thousand marks in gold.
 "'Tis dinnertime," quoth I. "My gold!" quoth he.
 "Your meat doth burn," quoth I. "My gold!" quoth he.
 "Will you come?" quoth I. "My gold!" quoth he. 65
 "Where is the thousand marks I gave thee, villain?"
 "The pig," quoth I, "is burned." "My gold!" quoth he.
 "My mistress, sir—" quoth I. "Hang up° thy mistress!
 I know not thy mistress, out on° thy mistress!"

LUCIANA Quoth who? 70

E. DROMIO

Quoth my master.
 "I know," quoth he, "no house, no wife, no mistress."
 So that my errand due unto° my tongue,
 I thank him, I bare° home upon my shoulders;
 For, in conclusion, he did beat me there. 75

ADRIANA

Go back again, thou slave, and fetch him home.

E. DROMIO

Go back again, and be new beaten home?
 For God's sake, send some other messenger.

ADRIANA

Back, slave, or I will break thy pate across.°

E. DROMIO

And he will bless that cross with other beating; 80
 Between you, I shall have a holy° head.

ADRIANA

Hence, prating peasant! Fetch thy master home.

E. DROMIO

Am I so round° with you, as you with me,
 That like a football you do spurn me thus?
 You spurn me hence, and he will spurn me hither; 85
 If I last in this service, you must case me in leather.

[Exit.]

LUCIANA

Fie, how impatience lowereth° in your face!

ADRIANA

His company must do his minions° grace,
 Whilst I at home starve° for a merry look:
 Hath homely age th' alluring beauty took
 From my poor cheek? Then he hath wasted it.
 Are my discourses° dull? Barren my wit?
 If voluble and sharp discourse be marred,
 Unkindness blunts it more than marble hard.
 Do their gay vestments his affections bait?° 95
 That's not my fault; he's master of my state.
 What ruins are in me that can be found,
 By him not ruined? Then is he the ground
 Of my defeatures.° My decayèd fair°
 A sunny look of his would soon repair. 100
 But, too unruly deer,° he breaks the pale,°
 And feeds from° home; poor I am but his stale.°

LUCIANA

Self-harming jealousy! fie, beat it hence.

ADRIANA

Unfeeling fools can with such wrongs dispense.°
 I know his eye doth homage elsewhere,° 105
 Or else what lets° it but he would be here?
 Sister, you know he promised me a chain.
 Would that alone, alone he would detain,°
 So he would keep fair quarter° with his bed!
 I see the jewel best enamellèd 110
 Will lose his° beauty; yet the gold bides still
 That others touch, and often touching will Wear gold, and no man that hath a name
 But falsehood and corruption doth it shame.°
 Since that my beauty cannot please his eye, 115
 I'll weep what's left away, and weeping die.

[Scene II. The mart.]

Enter ANTIPHOLUS [OF SYRACUSE].

S. ANTIPHOLUS

The gold I gave to Dromio is laid up
Safe at the Centaur, and the heedful slave
Is wand' red forth, in care to seek me out,
By computation° and mine host's report.
I could not speak with Dromio since at first
I sent him from the mart! See, here he comes.

Enter DROMIO OF SYRACUSE.

How now, sir, is your merry humor altered?
As you love strokes, so jest with me again.
You know no Centaur? You received no gold?
Your mistress sent to have me home to dinner?
My house was at the Phoenix? Wast thou mad,
That thus so madly thou didst answer me?

S. DROMIO

What answer, sir? When spake I such a word?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Even now, even here, not half an hour since.

S. DROMIO

I did not see you since you sent me hence,
Home to the Centaur, with the gold you gave me.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Villain, thou didst deny the gold's receipt,
And told'st me of a mistress, and a dinner;
For which, I hope, thou felt'st I was displeased.

S. DROMIO

I am glad to see you in this merry vein.
What means this jest? I pray you, master, tell me.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Yea, dost thou jeer, and flout me in the teeth?
Think'st thou, I jest? Hold, take thou that! And that!

Beats DROMIO.

S. DROMIO

Hold, sir, for God's sake! Now your jest is earnest.
Upon what bargain do you give it me?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Because that I familiarly sometimes
Do use you for my fool and chat with you,
Your sauciness will jest upon my love,
And make a common° of my serious hours.
When the sun shines, let foolish gnats make sport;
But creep in crannies, when he hides his beams.
If you will jest with me, know my aspect,
And fashion your demeanor to my looks,
Or I will beat this method in your sconce.
S. DROMIO Sconce, call you it? So you would leave battering, I had rather have it a head. And you use these blows long, I must get a sconce for my head, and ensconce° it too, or else I shall seek my wit° in my shoulders. But, I pray, sir, why am I beaten?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Dost thou not know?

S. DROMIO Nothing, sir, but that I am beaten.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Shall I tell you why?

S. DROMIO Ay, sir, and wherefore; for they say every why hath a wherefore.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Why, first for flouting me, and then wherefore,
For urging it the second time to me.

S. DROMIO

Was there ever any man thus beaten out of season,
When in the why and the wherefore is neither rhyme nor reason?

Well, sir, I thank you.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Thank me, sir, for what?

S. DROMIO Marry,° sir, for this something that you gave me for nothing.

S. ANTIPHOLUS I'll make you amends next, to give you nothing for something. But say, sir, is it dinnertime?

S. DROMIO No, sir. I think the meat wants that° I have.

S. ANTIPHOLUS In good time,° sir. What's that?

S. DROMIO Basting.
S. ANTIPHOLUS Well, sir, then 'twill be dry.

S. DROMIO If it be, sir, I pray you eat none of it.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Your reason?

S. DROMIO Lest it make you choleric° and purchase me another dry° basting.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Well, sir, learn to jest in good time;
there's a time for all things.

S. DROMIO I durst have denied that, before you were so choleric.

S. ANTIPHOLUS By what rule, sir?

S. DROMIO Marry, sir, by a rule as plain as the plain bald pate of Father Time himself.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Let's hear it.

S. DROMIO There's no time for a man to recover his hair that grows bald by nature.

S. ANTIPHOLUS May he not do it by fine and recovery?°

S. DROMIO Yes, to pay a fine for a periwig and recover the lost hair of another man.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Why is Time such a niggard of hair, being, as it is, so plentiful an excrement?°

S. DROMIO Because it is a blessing that he bestows on beasts: and what he hath scanted men in hair, he hath given them in wit.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Why, but there's many a man hath more hair than wit.

S. DROMIO Not a man of those but he hath the wit to lose his hair.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Why, thou didst conclude hairy men plain dealers without wit.

S. DROMIO The plainer dealer, the sooner lost; yet he loseth it in a kind of jollity.
S. ANTIPHOLUS For what reason?

S. DROMIO For two; and sound° ones too.

 S. ANTIPHOLUS Nay, not sure, in a thing falsing.^o
 S. DROMIO Certain ones, then. 95
 S. ANTIPHOLUS Name them.
 S. DROMIO The one, to save the money that he spends in tiring;^o the other, that at dinner they should not drop in his porridge.
 S. ANTIPHOLUS You would all this time have proved 100 there is no time for all things.
 S. DROMIO Marry, and did, sir: namely, e'en no time to recover hair lost by nature.
 S. ANTIPHOLUS But your reason was not substantial why there is no time to recover. 105
 S. DROMIO Thus I mend it: Time himself is bald, and therefore, to the world's end, will have bald followers.
 S. ANTIPHOLUS I knew 'twould be a bald^o conclusion.

Enter ADRIANA and LUCIANA.

But soft, who wafts^o us yonder? 110

ADRIANA

Ay, ay, Antipholus, look strange^o and frown;
 Some other mistress hath thy sweet aspects.
 I am not Adriana, nor thy wife.
 The time was once when thou unurged wouldst vow
 That never words were music to thine ear, 115
 That never object pleasing in thine eye,
 That never touch well welcome to thy hand,
 That never meat sweet-savored in thy taste,
 Unless I spake or looked or touched or carved^o to thee.
 How comes it now, my husband, O how comes it, 120
 That thou art then estrangèd from thyself?
 Thyself I call it, being strange to me,
 That, undividable, incorporate,
 Am better than thy dear self's better part.^o
 Ah, do not tear away thyself from me;
 For know, my love, as easy mayst thou fall^o
 A drop of water in the breaking gulf,
 And take unmingled thence that drop again
 Without addition or diminishing
 As take from me thyself, and not me too. 130
 How dearly^o would it touch thee to the quick,
 Shouldst thou but hear I were licentious,
 And that this body, consecrate to thee,
 By ruffian lust should be contaminate!
 Wouldst thou not spit at me, and spurn at me, 135
 And hurl the name of husband in my face,
 And tear the stained skin off my harlot brow,
 And from my false hand cut the wedding ring,
 And break it with a deep-divorcing vow?
 I know thou canst, and therefore see thou do it. 140
 I am possessed with an adulterate blot.
 My blood is mingled with the crime^o of lust;
 For, if we two be one, and thou play false,
 I do digest the poison of thy flesh,
 Being strumpeted by thy contagion. 145

Keep then fair league and truce with thy true bed,^o
 I live distained,^o thou undishonorèd.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Plead you to me, fair dame? I know you not.
 In Ephesus I am but two hours old,
 As strange unto your town as to your talk; 150
 Who,^o every word by all my wit being scanned,
 Wants wit in all one word to understand.

LUCIANA

Fie, brother, how the world is changed with you.
 When were you wont to use my sister thus?
 She sent for you by Dromio home to dinner. 155

S. ANTIPHOLUS

By Dromio?

S. DROMIO By me?

ADRIANA

By thee, and this thou didst return from him:
 That he did buffet thee, and in his blows
 Denied my house for his, me for his wife. 160

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Did you converse, sir, with this gentlewoman?
 What is the course and drift^o of your compact?^o

S. DROMIO

I, sir? I never saw her till this time.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Villain, thou liest; for even her very words
 Didst thou deliver to me on the mart. 165

S. DROMIO

I never spake with her in all my life.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

How can she thus then call us by our names,
 Unless it be by inspiration?

ADRIANA

How ill agrees it with your gravity
 To counterfeit thus grossly^o with your slave, 170
 Abetting him to thwart me in my mood!
 Be it my wrong you are from me exempt,^o
 But wrong not that wrong with a more contempt.^o
 Come, I will fasten on^o this sleeve of thine:
 Thou art an elm, my husband, I a vine, 175
 Whose weakness, married to thy stronger state,
 Makes me with thy strength to communicate.^o
 If aught possess thee^o from me, it is dross,
 Usurping ivy, briar, or idle^o moss,
 Who, all for want of pruning, with intrusion 180
 Infect thy sap and live on thy confusion.^o

S. ANTIPHOLUS [Aside.]

To me she speaks, she moves me for her theme;^o
 What, was I married to her in my dream?
 Or sleep I now, and think I hear all this?
 What error drives our eyes and ears amiss? 185
 Until I know this sure uncertainty,
 I'll entertain the offered fallacy.^o

S. DROMIO

O, for my beads!° I cross me for a sinner.
 This is the fairyland. O spite of spites! 190
 We talk with goblins, owls, and sprites;
 If we obey them not, this will ensue:
 They'll suck our breath, or pinch us black and blue.

LUCIANA

Why prat'st thou to thyself and answer'st not?
 Dromio, thou drone, thou snail, thou slug, thou sot.° 195

S. DROMIO

I am transformèd, master, am not I?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

I think thou art in mind, and so am I.

S. DROMIO

Nay, master, both in mind and in my shape.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Thou has thine own form.

S. DROMIO

No, I am an ape.°

LUCIANA

If thou art changed to aught, 'tis to an ass. 200

S. DROMIO

'Tis true, she rides° me and I long for grass.
 'Tis so, I am an ass; else it could never be
 But I should know her as well as she knows me.

ADRIANA

Come, come, no longer will I be a fool,
 To put the finger in the eye and weep, 205
 Whilst man and master laughs my woes to scorn.
 Come, sir, to dinner. Dromio, keep the gate.
 Husband, I'll dine above° with you today,
 And shrive° you of a thousand idle pranks.
 Sirrah,° if any ask you for your māster,
 Say he dines forth,° and let no creature enter. 210
 Come, sister. Dromio, play the porter well.

S. ANTIPHOLUS [Aside.]

Am I in earth, in heaven, or in hell?
 Sleeping or waking, mad or well-advised?°
 Known unto these, and to myself disguised?
 I'll say as they say, and persevere so,
 And in this mist at all adventures° go.

S. DROMIO

Master, shall I be porter at the gate?

ADRIANA

Ay, and let none enter, lest I break your pate.

LUCIANA

Come, come, Antipholus, we dine too late. [Exeunt.] 220

Enter ANTIPHOLUS OF EPHESUS, his man DROMIO,
 ANGELO the goldsmith, and BALTHASAR the merchant.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Good Signor° Angelo, you must excuse us all;
 My wife is shrewish when I keep not hours.
 Say that I lingered with you at your shop
 To see the making of her carcanet,°
 And that tomorrow you will bring it home. 5
 But here's a villain that would face me down°
 He met me on the mart, and that I beat him,
 And charged him with a thousand marks in gold,
 And that I did deny° my wife and house.
 Thou drunkard, thou, what didst thou mean by this? 10

E. DROMIO

Say what you will, sir, but I know what I know—
 That you beat me at the mart, I have your hand° to show;
 If the skin were parchment and the blows you gave were ink,
 Your own handwriting would tell you what I think.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I think thou art an ass. 205

E. DROMIO

Marry, so it doth appear 15

By the wrongs I suffer and the blows I bear.
 I should kick, being kicked, and being at that pass,°
 You would keep from my heels and beware of an ass.

210 E. ANTIPHOLUS

You're sad,° Signor Balthasar; pray God, our cheer°
 May answer° my good will and your good welcome here. 20

BALTHASAR

I hold your dainties cheap, sir, and your welcome dear.

215 E. ANTIPHOLUS

O, Signor Balthasar, either at flesh or fish,
 A tableful of welcome makes scarce one dainty dish.

BALTHASAR

Good meat, sir, is common; that every churl° affords.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

And welcome more common, for that's nothing but words. 25

BALTHASAR

Small cheer and great welcome makes a merry feast.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Ay, to a niggardly host and more sparing guest.
 But though mycates° be mean, take them in good part;
 Better cheer may you have, but not with better heart.
 But soft, my door is locked; go, bid them let us in. 30

O villain, thou hast stol'n both mine office and my name.

The one ne'er got me credit, the other mickle^o blame. 45

If thou hadst been Dromio today in my place,

Thou wouldst have changed thy face for a name, or thy name for an ass.^o

Enter LUCE [above].

LUCE

What a coil^o is there, Dromio? Who are those at the gate?

E. DROMIO

Let my master in, Luce.

LUCE

Faith, no, he comes too late.

And so tell your master.

E. DROMIO

O Lord, I must laugh! 50

Have at you with a proverb:^o "Shall I set in my staff?"^o

LUCE

Have at you with another: that's "When? Can you tell?"^o

S. DROMIO

If thy name be called Luce—Luce, thou hast answered him well.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Do you hear, you minion?^o You'll let us in, I trow?

LUCE

I thought to have asked you.

S. DROMIO

And you said no. 55

E. DROMIO

So, come help! Well struck! There was blow for blow.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Thou baggage, let me in.

LUCE

Can you tell for whose sake?

E. DROMIO

Master, knock the door hard.

LUCE

Let him knock till it ache.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

You'll cry for this, minion, if I beat the door down.

LUCE

What needs all that, and a pair of stocks^o in the town? 60

Enter ADRIANA [above].

ADRIANA

Who is that at the door that keeps all this noise?

S. DROMIO

By my troth, your town is troubled with unruly boys.^o

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Are you there, wife? You might have come before.

ADRIANA

Your wife, sir knave! Go, get you from the door.

[Exit with LUCE.]

E. DROMIO

If you went in pain, master, this knave would go sore. 65

ANGELO

Here is neither cheer, sir, nor welcome; we would fain have either.

BALTHASAR

In debating which was best, we shall part^o with neither.

E. DROMIO

They stand at the door, master. Bid them welcome hither.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

There is something in the wind, that we cannot get in.

E. DROMIO

You would say so, master, if your garments were thin. 70

Your cake here is warm within; you stand here in the cold.

It would make a man mad as a buck^o to be so bought and sold.^o

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Go, fetch me something. I'll break ope the gate.

S. DROMIO

Break any breaking here, and I'll break your knave's pate.

E. DROMIO

A man may break^o a word with you, sir, and words are but wind;^o

Ay, and break it in your face, so he break it not behind. 75

S. DROMIO

It seems thou want'st breaking.^o Out upon thee,^o hind!^o

E. DROMIO

Here's too much "out upon thee." I pray thee, let me in.

S. DROMIO

Ay, when fowls have no feathers, and fish have no fin.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Well, I'll break in. Go borrow me a crow.^o

E. DROMIO

A crow without feather? Master, mean you so?
For a fish without a fin, there's a fowl without a feather.
If a crow help us in, sirrah, we'll pluck a crow^o together.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Go, get thee gone, fetch me an iron crow.

BALTHASAR

Have patience, sir, O, let it not be so! 85
Herein you war against your reputation,
And draw within the compass of suspect^o
Th' unviolated honor of your wife.
Once this^o—your long experience of her wisdom,
Her sober virtue, years, and modesty, 90
Plead on her part some cause to you unknown;
And doubt not, sir, but she will well excuse^o
Why at this time the doors are made^o against you.
Be ruled by me, depart in patience,
And let us to the Tiger^o all to dinner. 95
And, about evening, come yourself alone,
To know the reason of this strange restraint.
If by strong hand you offer^o to break in,
Now in the stirring passage^o of the day,
A vulgar^o comment will be made of it; 100
And that supposed by the common rout^o
Against your yet ungallèd estimation,^o
That may with foul intrusion enter in
And dwell upon your grave when you are dead;
For slander lives upon succession,^o 105
For ever housed where it gets possession.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

You have prevailed. I will depart in quiet,
And, in despite of mirth,^o mean to be merry.
I know a wench of excellent discourse, 110
Pretty and witty; wild and yet, too, gentle;
There will we dine: this woman that I mean,
My wife—but, I protest, without desert—
Hath oftentimes upbraided me withal.
To her will we to dinner. [To ANGELO.] Get you home,
And fetch the chain; by this,^o I know, 'tis made; 115
Bring it, I pray you, to the Porpentine,^o
For there's the house. That chain will I bestow—
Be it for nothing but to spite my wife—
Upon mine hostess there. Good sir, make haste.
Since mine own doors refuse to entertain me, 120
I'll knock elsewhere, to see if they'll disdain me.

ANGELO

I'll meet you at that place some hour hence.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Do so. This jest shall cost me some expense. Exeunt.

[Scene II. Above.]

Enter LUCIANA, with ANTIPHOLUS OF SYRACUSE.

LUCIANA

And may it be that you have quite forgot
A husband's office? Shall, Antipholus, hate
Even in the spring of love thy love-springs^o rot?
Shall love, in building, grow so ruinate?^o
If you did wed my sister for her wealth, 5
Then for her wealth's sake use her with more kindness;
Or, if you like elsewhere,^o do it by stealth,
Muffle your false love with some show of blindness.
Let not my sister read it in your eye;
Be not thy tongue thy own shame's orator; 10
Look sweet, speak fair, become disloyalty;^o
Apparel vice like virtue's harbinger.
Bear a fair presence, though your heart be tainted,
Teach sin the carriage^o of a holy saint,
Be secret-false: what need she be acquainted? 15
What simple thief brags of his own attainment?^o
'Tis double wrong to truant^o with your bed
And let her read it in thy looks at board.^o
Shame hath a bastard fame,^o well managed;
Ill deeds is doubled with an evil word. 20
Alas, poor women! Make us but believe,
Being compact of credit,^o that you love us;
Though others have the arm, show us the sleeve;
We in your motion^o turn, and you may move us.
Then, gentle brother, get you in again; 25
Comfort my sister, cheer her, call her wife;
'Tis holy sport, to be a little vain,^o
When the sweet breath of flattery conquers strife.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Sweet mistress, what your name is else, I know not;
Nor by what wonder you do hit of^o mine; 30
Less in your knowledge and your grace you show^o not
Than our earth's wonder,^o more than earth divine.
Teach me, dear creature, how to think and speak:
Lay open to my earthy-gross conceit,^o
Smoth' red in errors, feeble, shallow, weak, 35
The folded^o meaning of your words' deceit.
Against my soul's pure truth why labor you
To make it wander in an unknown field?
Are you a god? Would you create me new?
Transform me, then, and to your pow'r I'll yield. 40
But if that I am I, then well I know
Your weeping sister is no wife of mine,
Nor to her bed no homage do I owe;
Far more, far more, to you do I decline.^o
O, train^o me not, sweet mermaid, with thy note, 45
To drown me in thy sister's flood of tears.
Sing, siren, for thyself, and I will dote;
Spread o'er the silver waves thy golden hairs;

LUCIANA

What, are you mad, that you do reason so?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Not mad, but mated⁵³—how, I do not know.

LUCIANA

It is a fault that springeth from your eye.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

For gazing on your beams, fair sun, being by.

LUCIANA

Gaze where you should, and that will clear your sight.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

As good to wink,⁵⁴ sweet love, as look on night.

LUCIANA

Why call you me love? Call my sister so.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Thy sister's sister.

LUCIANA

That's my sister.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

No,
It is thyself, mine own self's better part,
Mine eye's clear eye, my dear heart's dearer heart;
My food, my fortune, and my sweet hope's aim;
My sole earth's heaven, and my heaven's claim.⁵⁵

LUCIANA

All this my sister is, or else should be.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Call thyself sister, sweet, for I am thee;
Thee will I love, and with thee lead my life;
Thou hast no husband yet, nor I no wife.
Give me thy hand.

LUCIANA

O, soft, sir, hold you still
I'll fetch my sister, to get her good will.

Exit. 70

Enter DROMIO OF SYRACUSE.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Why, how now, Dromio! Where run'st thou so fast?

S. DROMIO Do you know me, sir? Am I Dromio?
Am I your man? Am I myself?

S. ANTIPHOLUS Thou art Dromio, thou art my man, 75 thou art thyself.

S. DROMIO I am an ass; I am a woman's man, and besides myself.

S. ANTIPHOLUS What woman's man? And how be- 80 sides thyself?

S. DROMIO Marry, sir, besides myself,⁵⁶ I am due⁵⁷ to a woman: one that claims me, one that haunts me, one that will have me.

S. ANTIPHOLUS What claim lays she to thee?

S. DROMIO Marry, sir, such claim as you would lay 85 to your horse; and she would have me as a beast⁵⁸—not that, I being a beast, she would have me, but that she, being a very beastly creature, lays claim to me.

S. ANTIPHOLUS What is she?

S. DROMIO A very reverend body; ay, such a one as 90 a man may not speak of without he say "sir-reverence."⁵⁹ I have but lean luck in the match, and yet is she a wondrous fat marriage.

S. ANTIPHOLUS How dost thou mean a fat marriage?

S. DROMIO Marry, sir, she's the kitchen wench, and 95 all grease;⁶⁰ and I know not what use to put her to, but to make a lamp of her, and run from her by her own light. I warrant her rags and the tallow in them will burn a Poland winter. If she lives till doomsday, she'll burn a week⁶¹ longer than the whole world. 100

S. ANTIPHOLUS What complexion is she of?

S. DROMIO Swart,⁶² like my shoe, but her face nothing like so clean kept; for why? She sweats; a man may go over shoes⁶³ in the grime of it.

S. ANTIPHOLUS That's a fault that water will mend. 105

S. DROMIO No, sir, 'tis in grain;⁶⁴ Noah's flood could not do it.

S. ANTIPHOLUS What's her name?

S. DROMIO Nell,⁶⁵ sir; but her name and three quarters—that's an ell⁶⁶ and three quarters—will not 110 measure her from hip to hip.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Then she bears some breadth?

S. DROMIO No longer from head to foot than from hip to hip. She is spherical, like a globe. I could find out countries in her. 115

S. ANTIPHOLUS In what part of her body stands Ireland?

S. DROMIO Marry, sir, in her buttocks; I found it out by the bogs.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Where Scotland? 120

S. DROMIO I found it by the barrenness, hard in the palm of the hand.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Where France?

S. DROMIO In her forehead, armed and reverted,⁶⁷ making war against her heir.⁶⁸ 125

S. ANTIPHOLUS Where England?

S. DROMIO I looked for the chalky cliffs,⁶⁹ but I could find no whiteness in them. But I guess, it stood in her chin, by the salt rheum⁷⁰ that ran between France and it.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Where Spain? 130

S. DROMIO Faith, I saw it not; but I felt it hot in her breath.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Where America, the Indies?

S. DROMIO O, sir, upon her nose, all o'er embellished with rubies, carbuncles, sapphires, declining⁷¹ their 135 rich aspect to the hot breath of Spain, who sent whole armadoes of carracks⁷² to be ballast⁷³ at her nose.

S. ANTIPHOLUS Where stood Belgia, the Netherlands?⁷⁴

S. DROMIO O, sir, I did not look so low. To conclude, 140

 Dromio, swore I was assured^o to her, told me what privy marks I had about me, as the mark of my shoulder, the mole in my neck, the great wart on my left arm, that I, amazed, ran from her as a witch. 145
 And, I think, if my breast had not been made of faith,
 and my heart of steel,
 She had transformed me to a curtal dog,^o and made me turn i' th' wheel.^o

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Go, hie thee presently,^o post to the road,^o
 And if^o the wind blow any way from shore,
 I will not harbor^o in this town tonight.
 If any bark put forth, come to the mart,
 Where I will walk till thou return to me.
 If everyone knows us, and we know none,
 'Tis time, I think, to trudge, pack, and begone.^o

S. DROMIO

As from a bear a man would run for life,
 So fly I from her that would be my wife. 155 Exit.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

There's none but witches do inhabit here,
 And therefore 'tis high time that I were hence.
 She that doth call me husband, even my soul
 Doth for a wife abhor. But her fair sister,
 Possessed with such a gentle sovereign grace,
 Of such enchanting presence and discourse,
 Hath almost made me traitor to myself.
 But, lest myself be guilty to^o self-wrong,
 I'll stop mine ears against the mermaid's song. 165

Enter ANGELO with the chain.

ANGELO

Master Antipholus—

S. ANTIPHOLUS Ay, that's my name.

ANGELO

I know it well, sir. Lo, here is the chain.
 I thought to have ta'en you at the Porpentine.
 The chain unfinished made me stay thus long.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

What is your will that I shall do with this? 170

ANGELO

What please yourself, sir; I have made it for you.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Made it for me, sir? I bespoke^o it not.

ANGELO

Not once, nor twice, but twenty times you have.
 Go home with it and please your wife withal,
 And soon at suppertime I'll visit you,
 And then receive my money for the chain. 175

S. ANTIPHOLUS

I pray you, sir, receive the money now,
 For fear you ne'er see chain nor money more.

ANGELO

You are a merry man, sir. Fare you well. Exit.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

What I should think of this, I cannot tell:
 But this I think, there's no man is so vain^o 180

That would refuse so fair an offered chain.
 I see a man here needs not live by shifts,^o
 When in the streets he meets such golden gifts.
 I'll to the mart, and there for Dromio stay; 185
 If any ship put out, then straight^o away. Exit.

ACT IV

Scene I. [The mart.]

150 Enter a MERCHANT, [ANGELO the] goldsmith, and an OFFICER.

MERCHANT

You know since Pentecost^o the sum is due,
 And since I have not much importuned you,
 Nor now I had not, but that I am bound
 To Persia, and want guilders for my voyage;
 Therefore make present^o satisfaction, 5
 Or I'll attach^o you by this officer.

ANGELO

Even just the sum that I do owe to you
 Is growing^o to me by Antipholus,
 And in the instant that I met with you
 He had of me a chain. At five o'clock 10
 I shall receive the money for the same.
 Pleaseth^o you, walk with me down to his house;
 I will discharge my bond, and thank you too.

165 Enter ANTIPHOLUS OF EPHEBUS, [and] DROMIO [OF EPHEBUS] from the Courtesan's.

OFFICER

That labor may you save. See where he comes.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

While I go to the goldsmith's house, go thou 15
 And buy a rope's end;^o that will I bestow
 Among my wife and her confederates,
 For locking me out of my doors by day.
 But soft, I see the goldsmith; get thee gone,
 Buy thou a rope and bring it home to me. 20

E. DROMIO

I buy a thousand pound a year! I buy a rope!^o

Exit DROMIO.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

A man is well holp^o up that trusts to you!
 I promised your presence and the chain,
 But neither chain nor goldsmith came to me.
 Belike you thought our love would last too long, 25
 If it were chained together, and therefore came not.

ANGELO

Saving your merry humor, here's the note
 How much your chain weighs to the utmost carat,
 The fineness of the gold and chargeful^o fashion—
 Which doth amount to three odd ducats^o more 30

Than I stand debted to this gentleman.
I pray you, see him presently^o discharged,
For he is bound to sea, and stays but for it.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I am not furnished with the present money.
Besides, I have some business in the town.
Good signor, take the stranger to my house,
And with you take the chain, and bid my wife
Disburse the sum on the receipt thereof.
Perchance I will be there as soon as you.

ANGELO

Then you will bring the chain to her yourself?

E. ANTIPHOLUS

No, bear it with you, lest I come not time enough.^o

ANGELO

Well, sir, I will. Have you the chain about you?

E. ANTIPHOLUS

And if I have not, sir, I hope you have,
Or else you may return without your money.

ANGELO

Nay, come, I pray you, sir, give me the chain:
Both wind and tide stays for this gentleman,
And I, to blame,^o have held him here too long.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Good Lord, you use this dalliance^o to excuse
Your breach of promise to the Porpentine.
I should have chid you for not bringing it,
But, like a shrew,^o you first begin to brawl.

MERCHANT

The hour steals on; I pray you, sir, dispatch.

ANGELO

You hear how he importunes me—the chain!

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Why, give it to my wife, and fetch your money.

ANGELO

Come, come, you know, I gave it you even now;
Either send the chain or send me by some token.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Fie, now you run this humor out of breath.
Come, where's the chain? I pray you, let me see it.

MERCHANT

My business cannot brook this dalliance.
Good sir, say whe'er^o you'll answer^o me or no:
If not, I'll leave him to the officer.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I answer you! What should I answer you?

ANGELO

The money that you owe me for the chain.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I owe you none till I receive the chain.

ANGELO

You know I gave it you half an hour since.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

You gave me none; you wrong me much to say so.

ANGELO

You wrong me more, sir, in denying it.
Consider how it stands upon^o my credit.

MERCHANT

Well, officer, arrest him at my suit.

OFFICER

I do,
And charge you in the duke's name to obey me.

70

ANGELO

This touches me in reputation.
Either consent to pay this sum for me,
Or I attach you by this officer.

35

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Consent to pay thee that I never had!
Arrest me, foolish fellow, if thou dar'st.

ANGELO

Here is thy fee; arrest him, officer.
I would not spare my brother in this case,
If he should scorn me so apparently.^o

40

OFFICER

I do arrest you, sir; you hear the suit.

80

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I do obey thee, till I give thee bail.
But, sirrah, you shall buy this sport as dear
As all the metal in your shop will answer.

ANGELO

Sir, sir, I shall have law in Ephesus,
To your notorious shame, I doubt it not.

85

Enter DROMIO OF SYRACUSE from the bay.

S. DROMIO

Master, there's a bark of Epidamnum,
That stays but till her owner comes aboard,
And then she bears away. Our fraughtage,^o sir,
I have conveyed aboard, and I have bought
The oil, the balsamum,^o and aqua vitae.^o
The ship is in her trim,^o the merry wind
Blows fair from land; they stay for nought at all
But for their owner, master,^o and yourself.

90

E. ANTIPHOLUS

How now! a madman? Why, thou peevish^o sheep,^o
What ship of Epidamnum stays for me?

95

S. DROMIO

A ship you sent me to, to hire waftage.^o

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Thou drunken slave, I sent thee for a rope,
And told thee to what purpose and what end.

60

S. DROMIO

You sent me for a rope's end^o as soon.
You sent me to the bay, sir, for a bark.

100

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I will debate this matter at more leisure,
And teach your ears to list^o me with more heed.
To Adriana, villain, hie thee straight;
Give her this key, and tell her, in the desk
That's covered o'er with Turkish tapestry
There is a purse of ducats; let her send it.
Tell her I am arrested in the street,
And that shall bail me. Hie thee, slave, begone.
On, officer, to prison till it come.

Exeunt [all but DROMIO].

Where Dowsabel° did claim me for her husband.
She is too big, I hope, for me to compass.
Thither I must, although against my will;
For servants must their masters' minds fulfill. Exit.

[Scene II. Before the Phoenix.]

Enter ADRIANA and LUCIANA.

ADRIANA

Ah, Luciana, did he tempt thee so?
Mightst thou perceive austere^{ly}° in his eye,
That he did plead in earnest, yea or no?
Looked he or red or pale, or sad or merrily?
What observation mad'st thou in this case
Of his heart's meteors tilting° in his face?

LUCIANA

First, he denied you had in him no right.^o

ADRIANA

He meant he did me none; the more my spite.^o

LUCIANA

Then swore he that he was a stranger here.

ADRIANA

And true he swore, though yet forsworn he were.

LUCIANA

Then pleaded I for you.

ADRIANA

And what said he?

LUCIANA

That love I begged for you he begged of me.

ADRIANA

With what persuasion did he tempt thy love?

LUCIANA

With words that in an honest° suit might move.
First he did praise my beauty, then my speech.

ADRIANA

Didst speak him fair?^o

LUCIANA

Have patience, I beseech.

ADRIANA

I cannot, nor I will not, hold me still.
My tongue, though not my heart, shall have his° will.
He is deformèd, crookèd, old and sere,
Ill-faced, worse bodied, shapeless° everywhere:
Vicious, ungentle, foolish, blunt, unkind,
Stigmatical in making,° worse in mind.

LUCIANA

Who would be jealous then of such a one?
No evil lost is wailed when it is gone.

ADRIANA

Ah, but I think him better than I say;
And yet would herein others' eyes were worse.
Far from her nest the lapwing° cries away;

My heart prays for him, though my tongue do curse.

Enter DROMIO OF SYRACUSE.

S. DROMIO

Here, go—the desk, the purse! Sweet, now, make haste.

LUCIANA

How hast thou lost thy breath?

S. DROMIO

By running fast.

ADRIANA

Where is thy master, Dromio? Is he well?

S. DROMIO

No, he's in Tartar limbo,° worse than hell:

A devil in an everlasting garment° hath him;

One whose hard heart is buttoned up with steel:

A fiend, a fairy,° pitiless and rough:

A wolf, nay worse, a fellow all in buff:°

A back-friend,° a shoulder-clapper,° one that countermands°

The passages of alleys, creeks,° and narrow lands;

A hound that runs counter,° and yet draws dry-foot°
well;

One that, before the Judgment, carries poor souls to hell.

ADRIANA

Why, man, what is the matter?

S. DROMIO

I do not know the matter, he is 'rested° on the case.^o

ADRIANA

What, is he arrested? Tell me, at whose suit.

S. DROMIO

I know not at whose suit he is arrested well,

But is in a suit of buff which 'rested him, that can I tell.

Will you send him, Mistress Redemption, the money in his desk?

ADRIANA

Go fetch it, sister. This I wonder at, Exit LUCIANA.

Thus he, unknown to me, should be in debt.

Tell me, was he arrested on a band?^o

S. DROMIO

Not on a band, but on a stronger thing:

A chain, a chain! Do you not hear it ring?

ADRIANA

What, the chain?

S. DROMIO

No, no, the bell; 'tis time that I were gone.

It was two ere I left him, and now the clock strikes one.^o

ADRIANA

The hours come back! That did I never hear.

S. DROMIO

O yes. If any hour° meet a sergeant, 'a° turns back for very fear.

ADRIANA

As if time were in debt! How fondly° dost thou reason!

S. DROMIO

Time is a very bankrupt, and owes more than he's worth to season.^o

Nay, he's a thief too: have you not heard men say,
That time comes stealing on by night and day? 60
If 'a be in debt and theft, and a sergeant in the way,
Hath he not reason to turn back an hour in a day?

Enter LUCIANA.

ADRIANA

Go, Dromio. There's the money, bear it straight,
And bring thy master home immediately.
Come, sister. I am pressed down with conceit:^o 65
Conceit, my comfort and my injury.
Exit [with LUCIANA and DROMIO].

[Scene III. The mart.]

Enter ANTIPHOLUS OF SYRACUSE.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

There's not a man I meet but doth salute me
As if I were their well-acquainted friend;
And everyone doth call me by my name.
Some tender money to me, some invite me;
Some other^o give me thanks for kindnesses; 5
Some offer me commodities to buy.
Even now a tailor called me in his shop
And showed me silks that he had bought for me,
And therewithal took measure of my body.
Sure, these are but imaginary wiles,^o 10
And Lapland^o sorcerers inhabit here.

Enter DROMIO OF SYRACUSE.

S. DROMIO Master, here's the gold you sent me for.
What, have you got the picture of old Adam^o new-appareled?

S. ANTIPHOLUS What gold is this? What Adam dost 15 thou mean?

S. DROMIO Not that Adam that kept the paradise, but that Adam that keeps the prison; he that goes in the calf's skin^o that was killed for the Prodigal; he that came behind you, sir, like an evil angel, and bid you 20 forsake your liberty.

S. ANTIPHOLUS I understand thee not.

S. DROMIO No? Why, 'tis a plain case:^o he that went, like a bass-viol, in a case of leather; the man, sir, that, when gentlemen are tired gives them a sob^o and 'rests 25 them; he, sir, that takes pity on decayed men, and gives them suits of durance;^o he that sets up his rest^o to do more exploits with his mace^o than a morris-pike.^o

S. ANTIPHOLUS What, thou mean'st an officer?

S. DROMIO Ay, sir, the sergeant of the band: he that 30 brings any man to answer it that breaks his band;^o
one that thinks a man always going to bed, and says,
"God give you good rest!"^o

S. ANTIPHOLUS Well, sir, there rest in your foolery.
Is there any ships puts forth tonight? May we be gone? 35

S. DROMIO Why, sir, I brought you word an hour since that the bark^o Expedition put forth tonight, and then were you hind'ed by the sergeant to tarry for the hoy^o Delay. Here are the angels^o that you sent for to deliver you. 40

S. ANTIPHOLUS

The fellow is distract, and so am I,
And here we wander in illusions.
Some blessed power deliver us from hence!

Enter a COURTESAN.

COURTESAN

Well met, well met, Master Antipholus.
I see, sir, you have found the goldsmith now. 45
Is that the chain you promised me today?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Satan, avoid!^o I charge thee, tempt me not!

S. DROMIO Master, is this Mistress Satan?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

It is the devil.

S. DROMIO Nay, she is worse, she is the devil's dam;^o 50 and here she comes in the habit^o of a light^o wench, and thereof comes that the wenches say, "God damn me." That's as much to say, "God make me a light wench." It is written, they appear to men like angels of light. Light is an effect of fire, and fire will burn: 55 ergo,^o light wenches will burn.^o Come not near her.

COURTESAN

Your man and you are marvelous merry, sir.

Will you go with me? We'll mend^o our dinner here.

S. DROMIO Master, if you do, expect spoon-meat,^o or 60 bespeak a long spoon.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Why, Dromio?

S. DROMIO Marry, he must have a long spoon that must eat with the devil.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Avoid, then, fiend! What tell'st thou me of supping?
Thou art, as you are all, a sorceress. 65
I conjure^o thee to leave me and be gone.

COURTESAN

Give me the ring of mine you had at dinner,
Or, for my diamond, the chain you promised,
And I'll be gone, sir, and not trouble you.

 I hope you do not mean to cheat me so!

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Avaunt,^o thou witch! Come, Dromio, let us go.

S. DROMIO

Fly pride, says the peacock.^o Mistress, that you know.

Exit [with ANTIPHOLUS].

COURTESAN

Now, out of doubt, Antipholus is mad, 80
 Else would he never so demean^o himself.
 A ring he hath of mine worth forty ducats,
 And for the same he promised me a chain;
 Both one and other he denies me now.
 The reason that I gather he is mad, 85
 Besides this present instance of his rage,^o
 Is a mad tale he told today at dinner,
 Of his own doors being shut against his entrance.
 Belike his wife, acquainted with his fits,
 On purpose shut the doors against his way. 90
 My way is now to hie home to his house,
 And tell his wife that, being lunatic,
 He rushed into my house and took perforce^o
 My ring away. This course I fittest choose,
 For forty ducats is too much to lose. [Exit.] 95

[Scene IV. The same.]

Enter ANTIPHOLUS OF EPHESUS, with a JAILER.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Fear me not, man, I will not break away.
 I'll give thee, ere I leave thee, so much money,
 To warrant^o thee, as I am 'rested for.
 My wife is in a wayward mood today,
 And will not lightly trust the messenger 5
 That I should be attached^o in Ephesus;
 I tell you, 'twill sound harshly in her ears.

Enter DROMIO OF EPHESUS, with a rope's end.

Here comes my man, I think he brings the money.
 How now, sir! Have you that I sent you for?

E. DROMIO

Here's that, I warrant you, will pay^o them all. 10

E. ANTIPHOLUS

But where's the money?

E. DROMIO

Why, sir, I gave the money for the rope.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Five hundred ducats, villain, for a rope?

E. DROMIO

I'll serve you,^o sir, five hundred at the rate.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

To what end^o did I bid thee hie thee home? 15

E. DROMIO

To a rope's end, sir, and to that end am I returned.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

And to that end, sir, I will welcome you.

[Beats DROMIO.]

OFFICER

Good sir, be patient.

E. DROMIO

Nay, 'tis for me to be patient; I am in adversity.

OFFICER

Good^o now, hold thy tongue. 20

E. DROMIO Nay, rather persuade him to hold his hands.

E. ANTIPHOLUS Thou whoreson,^o senseless villain!

E. DROMIO I would I were senseless, sir, that I might 25 not feel your blows.

E. ANTIPHOLUS Thou art sensible^o in nothing but blows, and so is an ass.

E. DROMIO I am an ass, indeed; you may prove it by my long ears.^o I have served him from the hour of my nativity to this instant, and have nothing at his hands 30 for my service but blows. When I am cold, he heats me with beating; when I am warm, he cools me with beating. I am waked with it when I sleep, raised with it when I sit, driven out of doors with it when I go from home, welcomed home with it when I return; 35 nay, I bear it on my shoulders, as a begger wont^o her brat; and, I think, when he hath lamed me, I shall beg with it from door to door.

Enter ADRIANA, LUCIANA, COURTESAN, and a schoolmaster called PINCH.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Come, go along; my wife is coming yonder.

E. DROMIO Mistress, "respice finem,"^o respect your 40 end; or rather, the prophecy like the parrot,^o "beware the rope's end."

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Wilt thou still talk?

Beats DROMIO.

COURTESAN

How say you now? Is not your husband mad?

ADRIANA

His incivility confirms no less. 45

Good Doctor Pinch, you are a conjurer;^o

Establish him in his true sense again,

And I will please^o you what you will demand.

LUCIANA

Alas, how fiery and how sharp he looks!

To yield possession to my holy prayers,
And to thy state of darkness hie thee straight;
I conjure thee by all the saints in heaven.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Peace, doting wizard, peace; I am not mad.

ADRIANA

O, that thou wert not, poor distressed soul!

E. ANTIPHOLUS

You minion,^o you, are these your customers?
Did this companion^o with the saffron^o face
Revel and feast it at my house today,
Whilst upon me the guilty doors were shut,
And I denied^o to enter in my house?

ADRIANA

O, husband, God doth know you dined at home,
Where would you had remained until this time,
Free from these slanders and this open shame!

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Dined at home! Thou villain, what sayest thou?

E. DROMIO

Sir, sooth to say, you did not dine at home.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Were not my doors locked up, and I shut out?

E. DROMIO

Perdie,^o your doors were locked, and you shut out.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

And did not she herself revile me there?

E. DROMIO

Sans fable,^o she herself reviled you there.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Did not her kitchen maid rail, taunt, and scorn me?

E. DROMIO

Certes,^o she did; the kitchen vestal^o scorned you.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

And did not I in rage depart from thence?

E. DROMIO

In verity, you did; my bones bears witness,
That since have felt the vigor of his rage.

ADRIANA

Is't good to soothe^o him in these contraries?

PINCH

It is no shame; the fellow finds his vein,
And yielding to him humors well his frenzy.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Thou hast suborned^o the goldsmith to arrest me.

ADRIANA

Alas, I sent you money to redeem you,
By Dromio here, who came in haste for it.

E. DROMIO

Money by me? Heart and goodwill you might,
But, surely, master, not a rag^o of money.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Went'st not thou to her for a purse of ducats?

ADRIANA

He came to me, and I delivered it.

LUCIANA

And I am witness with her that she did.

E. DROMIO

God and the ropemaker bear me witness
That I was sent for nothing but a rope.

PINCH

Mistress, both man and master is possessed;
I know it by their pale and deadly looks.
They must be bound, and laid in some dark room.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Say, wherefore didst thou lock me forth^o today,
And why dost thou deny the bag of gold?

ADRIANA

I did not, gentle husband, lock thee forth.

E. DROMIO

And, gentle master, I received no gold;
But I confess, sir, that we were locked out.

ADRIANA

Dissembling villain, thou speak'st false in both.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Dissembling harlot, thou art false in all,
And art confederate^o with a damnèd pack^o
To make a loathsome abject scorn of me;
But with these nails I'll pluck out these false eyes
That would behold in me this shameful sport.

Enter three or four, and offer to bind him. He strives.

ADRIANA

O, bind him, bind him, let him not come near me!

PINCH

More company! The fiend is strong within him.

LUCIANA

Ay me,^o poor man, how pale and wan he looks.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

What, will you murder me? Thou jailer, thou,
I am thy prisoner; wilt thou suffer them
To make a rescue?^o

OFFICER

Masters, let him go.

He is my prisoner, and you shall not have him.

PINCH

Go, bind this man, for he is frantic too.

ADRIANA

What wilt thou do, thou peevish^o officer?

Hast thou delight to see a wretched man

Do outrage and displeasure^o to himself?

OFFICER

He is my prisoner; if I let him go,
The debt he owes will be required of me.

E. DROMIO

Master, I am here ent' red in bond for you.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Out on thee, villain! Wherefore dost thou mad° me? 125

E. DROMIO

Will you be bound for nothing? Be mad, good master;
 Cry, "The devil!"

LUCIANA

God help, poor souls, how idly° do they talk!

ADRIANA

Go bear him hence. Sister, go you with me.

Exeunt [PINCH and others with ANTIPHOLUS OF EPHEBUS and DROMIO OF EPHEBUS]. Manet° OFFICER, ADRIANA, LUCIANA, COURTESAN.

Say now, whose suit is he arrested at? 130

OFFICER

One Angelo, a goldsmith, do you know him?

ADRIANA

I know the man. What is the sum he owes?

OFFICER

Two hundred ducats.

ADRIANA

Say, how grows° it due?

OFFICER

Due for a chain your husband had of him.

ADRIANA

He did bespeak a chain for me, but had it not. 135

COURTESAN

Whenas your husband, all in rage, today
 Came to my house, and took away my ring—
 The ring I saw upon his finger now—
 Straight after did I meet him with a chain.

ADRIANA

It may be so, but I did never see it. 140
 Come, jailer, bring me where the goldsmith is;
 I long to know the truth hereof at large.

Enter ANTIPHOLUS OF SYRACUSE, with his rapier drawn, and DROMIO OF SYRACUSE.

LUCIANA

God for thy mercy, they are loose again.

ADRIANA

And come with naked° swords. Let's call more help
 To have them bound again.

OFFICER

Away, they'll kill us! 145

Run all out. Exeunt omnes as fast as may be, frightened.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

I see these witches are afraid of swords.

S. DROMIO

She that would be your wife now ran from you.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Come to the Centaur; fetch our stuff° from thence.

I long that we were safe and sound aboard.

S. DROMIO Faith, stay here this night; they will surely 150 do us no harm. You saw they speak us fair, give us gold. Methinks they are such a gentle nation that, but for the mountain of mad flesh that claims marriage of me, I could find in my heart to stay here still,° and turn witch. 155

S. ANTIPHOLUS

I will not stay tonight for all the town:

Therefore away, to get our stuff aboard. Exeunt.

A C T V

Scene I. [Before the Phoenix.]

Enter [another] MERCHANT and [ANGELO] the goldsmith.

ANGELO

I am sorry, sir, that I have hind' red you;
 But I protest he had the chain of me.
 Though most dishonestly he doth deny it.

MERCHANT

How is the man esteemed here in the city?

ANGELO

Of very reverend reputation, sir, 5
 Of credit infinite, highly beloved,
 Second to none that lives here in the city.
 His word might bear° my wealth at any time.

MERCHANT

Speak softly; yonder, as I think, he walks.

135

Enter ANTIPHOLUS and DROMIO OF SYRACUSE again.

ANGELO

'Tis so; and that self° chain about his neck, 10
 Which he forswore° most monstrously to have.
 Good sir, draw near to me; I'll speak to him.
 Signor Antipholus, I wonder much
 That you would put me to this shame and trouble, 15
 And not without some scandal to yourself,
 With circumstance° and oaths so to deny
 This chain which now you wear so openly.
 Beside the charge,° the shame, imprisonment,
 You have done wrong to this my honest friend, 20
 Who, but for staying on our controversy,
 Had hoisted sail and put to sea today.
 This chain you had of me, can you deny it?

S. ANTIPHOLUS

I think I had; I never did deny it.

MERCHANT

Yes, that you did, sir, and forswore it too.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Who heard me to deny it or forswear it? 25

MERCHANT

 To walk where any honest men resort.

Against thee presently,° if thou dar'st stand.° 30
MERCHANT
I dare, and do defy thee for a villain!

They draw. Enter ADRIANA, LUCIANA, COURTESAN, and others.

ADRIANA
Hold, hurt him not, for God's sake! He is mad.
Some get within him,° take his sword away.
Bind Dromio too, and bear them to my house.
35
S. DROMIO
Run, master, run; for God's sake, take a house!°
This is some priory. In, or we are spoiled.
Exeunt to the priory.

Enter Lady ABBESS.

ABBESS
Be quiet, people. Wherefore throng you hither?
ADRIANA
To fetch my poor distracted husband hence.
Let us come in, that we may bind him fast,
And bear him home for his recovery.
40
ANGELO
I knew he was not in his perfect wits.
MERCHANT
I am sorry now that I did draw on him.
ABBESS
How long hath this possession° held the man?
ADRIANA
This week he hath been heavy, sour, sad,
And much different from the man he was;
But till this afternoon his passion
Ne'er brake into extremity of rage.
ABBESS
Hath he not lost much wealth by wrack of sea?°
Buried some dear friend? Hath not else his eye
Strayed° his affection in unlawful love—
A sin prevailing much in youthful men,
Who give their eyes the liberty of gazing?
Which of these sorrows is he subject to?
ADRIANA
To none of these, except it be the last,
Namely, some love that drew him oft from home.
ABBESS
You should for that have reprehended him.
ADRIANA
Why, so I did.
ABBESS
Ay, but not rough enough.
ADRIANA
As roughly as my modesty would let me.
ABBESS
Haply, in private.
ADRIANA
And in assemblies too.
60
ABBESS

ADRIANA
It was the copy° of our conference.
In bed he slept not for° my urging it;
At board he fed not for my urging it;
Alone, it was the subject of my theme: 65
In company I often glanced° it;
Still° did I tell him it was vile and bad.
ABBESS
And thereof came it that the man was mad.
The venom° clamors of a jealous woman
Poisons more deadly than a mad dog's tooth. 70
It seems his sleeps were hind'red by thy railing,
And thereof comes it that his head is light.
Thou say'st his meat was sauced with thy upbraidings;
Unquiet meals make ill digestions;
Thercof the raging fire of fever bred— 75
And what's a fever but a fit of madness?
Thou sayest his sports were hind'red by thy brawls;
Sweet recreation barred, what doth ensue
But moody and dull melancholy,
Kinsman to grim and comfortless despair, 80
And at her heels a huge infectious troop
Of pale distemperatures° and foes to life?
In food, in sport, and life-preserving rest
To be disturbed, would mad° or man or beast.
The consequence is, then, thy jealous fits 85
Hath scared thy husband from the use of wits.
LUCIANA
She never reprehended him but mildly,
When he demeaned° himself rough, rude, and wildly.
Why bear you these rebukes and answer not?
ADRIANA
She did betray me to my own reproof.° 90
Good people, enter and lay hold on him.
ABBESS
No, not a creature enters in my house.
ADRIANA
Then, let your servants bring my husband forth.
50
ABBESS
Neither. He took this place for sanctuary,°
And it shall privilege him° from your hands 95
Till I have brought him to his wits again,
Or lose my labor in assaying° it.
ADRIANA
I will attend my husband, be his nurse,
Diet his sickness, for it is my office,
And will have no attorney° but myself; 100
And therefore let me have him home with me.
ABBESS
Be patient, for I will not let him stir

ADRIANA

I will not hence, and leave my husband here;
And ill it doth beseem your holiness
To separate the husband and the wife.

ABBESS

Be quiet and depart, thou shalt not have him. [Exit.]

LUCIANA

Complain unto the duke of this indignity.

ADRIANA

Come, go. I will fall prostrate at his feet,
And never rise until my tears and prayers
Have won his grace to come in person hither,
And take perforce my husband from the abbess.

MERCHANT

By this, I think, the dial points at five:
Anon, I'm sure, the duke himself in person
Comes this way to the melancholy vale,
The place of death and sorry^o execution,
Behind the ditches of the abbey here.

ANGELO

Upon what cause?

MERCHANT

To see a reverend Syracusian merchant,
Who put unluckily into this bay
Against the laws and statutes of this town,
Beheaded publicly for his offense.

ANGELO

See, where they come. We will behold his death.

LUCIANA

Kneel to the duke before he pass the abbey.

Enter the DUKE of Ephesus and [EGEON] the merchant of Syracuse, barehead, with the HEADSMAN and other OFFICERS.

DUKE

Yet once again proclaim it publicly,
If any friend will pay the sum for him,
He shall not die; so much we tender^o him.

ADRIANA

Justice, most sacred duke, against the abbess!

DUKE

She is a virtuous and a reverend lady.
It cannot be that she hath done thee wrong.

ADRIANA

May it please your grace, Antipholus, my husband,
Who I made lord of me and all I had
At your important^o letters, this ill day
A most outrageous fit of madness took him:
That^o desp'rately he hurried through the street,
With him his bondman^o all as mad as he,
Doing displeasure^o to the citizens
By rushing in their houses, bearing thence Rings, jewels, anything his rage did like.
Once did I get him bound, and sent him home,
Whilst to take order^o for the wrongs I went,
That here and there his fury had committed.
Anon, I wot^o not by what strong^o escape,
He broke from those that had the guard of him,
And with his mad attendant and himself,

Each one with ireful passion, with drawn swords,
Met us again and, madly bent on us,
Chased us away, till, raising of more aid,
We came again to bind them. Then they fled
Into this abbey, whither we pursued them;
And here the abbess shuts the gates on us,
And will not suffer us to fetch him out,
Nor send him forth that we may bear him hence.
Therefore, most gracious duke, with thy command,
Let him be brought forth and borne hence for help.

DUKE

Long since thy husband served me in my wars;
And I to thee engaged a prince's word,
When thou didst make him master of thy bed,
To do him all the grace and good I could.
Go, some of you, knock at the abbey gate,
And bid the Lady Abbess come to me.
I will determine this before I stir.

165

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

O mistress, mistress, shift and save yourself.
My master and his man are both broke loose,
Beaten the maids arow,^o and bound the doctor,
Whose beard they have singed off with brands of fire,
And ever as it blazed, they threw on him
Great pails of puddled^o mire to quench the hair.
My master preaches patience to him, and the while
His man with scissors nicks him like a fool;^o
And, sure, unless you send some present help,
Between them they will kill the conjurer.

170

175

ADRIANA

Peace, fool, thy master and his man are here,
And that is false thou dost report to us.

MESSENGER

Mistress, upon my life, I tell you true;
I have not breathed almost^o since I did see it.
He cries for you and vows, if he can take you,
To scorch your face and to disfigure you.

180

Cry within.

Hark, hark! I hear him, mistress. Fly, begone.

DUKE

Come, stand by me; fear nothing. Guard with halberds!^o

185

ADRIANA

Ay me, it is my husband! Witness you,
That he is borne about invisible.
Even now we housed him^o in the abbey here,
And now he's there, past thought of human reason.

Enter ANTIPHOLUS and DROMIO OF EPHEBUS.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Justice, most gracious duke! O, grant me justice,
Even for the service that long since I did thee,
When I bestrid^o thee in the wars, and took Deep scars to save thy life; even for the blood
That then I lost for thee, now grant me justice.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

Justice, sweet prince, against that woman there!
She whom thou gav'st to me to be my wife;
That hath abusèd and dishonored me,
Even in the strength and height° of injury:
Beyond imagination is the wrong
That she this day hath shameless thrown on me.

DUKE

Discover° how, and thou shalt find me just.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

This day, great duke, she shut the doors upon me,
While she with harlots° feasted in my house.

DUKE

A grievous fault. Say, woman, didst thou so?

ADRIANA

No, my good lord. Myself, he, and my sister
Today did dine together; so befall my soul
As this is false he burdens me withal.°

LUCIANA

Ne'er may I look on day, nor sleep on night,°
But she tells to your highness simple truth.

ANGELO

O perjured woman! They are both forsworn.
In this the madman justly chargest them.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

My liege, I am advisèd° what I say,
Neither disturbed with the effect of wine,
Nor heady-rash, provoked with raging ire,
Albeit my wrongs might make one wiser mad.
This woman locked me out this day from dinner.
That goldsmith there, were he not packed° with her,
Could witness it; for he was with me then,
Who parted with me to go fetch a chain,
Promising to bring it to the Porpentine,
Where Balthasar and I did dine together.
Our dinner done, and he not coming thither,
I went to seek him. In the street I met him,
And in his company that gentleman.
There did this perjured goldsmith swear me down
That I this day of him received the chain,
Which, God he knows, I saw not; for the which,
He did arrest me with an officer.
I did obey, and sent my peasant° home
For certain ducats; he with none returned.
Then fairly I bespoke° the officer
To go in person with me to my house.
By th' way we met
My wife, her sister, and a rabble more
Of vile confederates. Along with them
They brought one Pinch, a hungry lean-faced villain;
A mere anatomy,° a mountebank,
A threadbare juggler° and a fortuneteller,
A needy, hollow-eyed, sharp-looking wretch;

Forsooth, took on him as° a conjurer;
And, gazing in mine eyes, feeling my pulse,
And with no face, as 'twere, out-facing me,
Cries out, I was possessed. Then all together
They fell upon me, bound me, bore me thence,
And in a dark and dankish vault at home
There left me and my man, both bound together,
Till gnawing with my teeth my bonds in sunder,°
I gained my freedom; and immediately
Ran hither to your grace, whom I beseech
To give me ample satisfaction
For these deep shames and great indignities.

205

ANGELO

My lord, in truth, thus far I witness with him:
That he dined not at home, but was locked out.

255

DUKE

But had he such a chain of thee, or no?

ANGELO

He had, my lord, and when he ran in here
These people saw the chain about his neck.

MERCHANT

210

Besides, I will be sworn these ears of mine
Heard you confess you had the chain of him,
After you first forswore it on the mart;
And, thereupon, I drew my sword on you;
And then you fled into this abbey here,
From whence, I think, you are come by miracle.

265

215

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I never came within these abbey walls,
Nor ever didst thou draw thy sword on me.
I never saw the chain, so help me heaven!
And this is false you burden me withal.

220

DUKE

Why, what an intricate impeach° is this!
I think you all have drunk of Circe's cup.°
If here you housed him, here he would have been;
If he were mad, he would not plead so coldly.°
You say he dined at home, the goldsmith here
Denies that saying. Sirrah, what say you?

270

275

225

E. DROMIO

Sir, he dined with her there at the Porpentine.

COURTESAN

He did, and from my finger snatched that ring.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

'Tis true, my liege, this ring I had of her.

DUKE

Saw'st thou him enter at the abbey here?

COURTESAN

Why, this is strange. Go call the abbess hither.
I think you are all mated,° or stark mad.

But he, I thank him, gnawed in two my cords.

Now am I Dromio, and his man, unbound.

EGEON

I am sure you both of you remember me.

E. DROMIO

Ourselves we do remember, sir, by you;

For lately we were bound° as you are now.

You are not Pinch's patient, are you, sir?

EGEON

Why look you strange on me? You know me well.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I never saw you in my life till now.

EGEON

O, grief hath changed me since you saw me last,

And careful° hours with time's deformèd hand

Have written strange defeatures° in my face.

But tell me yet, dost thou not know my voice?

E. ANTIPHOLUS Neither.

EGEON

Dromio, nor thou?

E. DROMIO

No, trust me, sir, nor I.

EGEON

I am sure thou dost!

E. DROMIO Ay, sir, but I am sure I do not; and whatsoever a man denies, you are now bound° to believe him.

EGEON

Not know my voice! O, time's extremity,

Hast thou so cracked and splitted my poor tongue

In seven short years, that here my only son

Knows not my feeble key of untuned cares?°

Though now this grainèd° face of mine be hid

In sap-consuming winter's drizzled snow,

And all the conduits of my blood froze up,

Yet hath my night of life some memory;

My wasting lamps° some fading glimmer left;

My dull deaf ears a little use to hear.

All these old witnesses—I cannot err—

Tell me thou art my son Antipholus.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

I never saw my father in my life.

EGEON

But seven years since, in Syracuse, boy,

Thou know'st we parted; but perhaps, my son,

Thou sham'st to acknowledge me in misery.

E. ANTIPHOLUS

The duke and all that know me in the city

Can witness with me that it is not so.

I ne'er saw Syracuse in my life.

DUKE

I tell thee, Syracusian, twenty years

Have I been patron to Antipholus,

During which time he ne'er saw Syracuse.

I see thy age and dangers make thee dote.

and DROMIO OF SYRACUSE.*

ABBESS

290 Most mighty duke, behold a man much wronged.

All gather to see them.

ADRIANA

I see two husbands, or mine eyes deceive me.

DUKE

One of these men is genius° to the other;

295 And so of these, which is the natural man,

And which the spirit? Who deciphers them?

335

S. DROMIO

I, sir, am Dromio; command him away.

E. DROMIO

I, sir, am Dromio; pray let me stay.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

Egeon art thou not, or else his ghost?

300 S. DROMIO

O, my old master! Who hath bound him here?

ABBESS

Whoever bound him, I will loose his bonds,

340

And gain a husband by his liberty.

Speak, old Egeon, if thou beest the man

That hadst a wife once called Emilia,

That bore thee at a burden° two fair sons!

O, if thou beest the same Egeon, speak;

345

And speak unto the same Emilia.

DUKE [Aside.]

Why, here begins his morning story right:

These two Antipholus', these two so like,

And these two Dromios, one in semblance,°

310 Besides her urging° of her wrack at sea;

350

These are the parents to these children,

Which accidentally are met together.

EGEON

If I dream not, thou art Emilia.

315 If thou art she, tell me where is that son

That floated with thee on the fatal raft?

355

ABBESS

By men of Epidamnum, he and I

And the twin Dromio, all were taken up;

But by and by rude fishermen of Corinth

320 By force took Dromio and my son from them,

And me they left with those of Epidamnum.

360

What then became of them I cannot tell;

I to° this fortune that you see me in.

DUKE

Antipholus, thou cam'st from Corinth first.

S. ANTIPHOLUS

325 No, sir, not I; I came from Syracuse.

Stay, stand apart; I know not which is which.

THE FIRST PART OF HENRY THE SIXTH

EDITED BY LAWRENCE V. RYAN

Introduction

Henry VI, Part One is a play with many imperfections, so many, indeed, that editors and critics have often been reluctant to attribute the greater part of it to Shakespeare. "That Drum-and-Trumpet Thing," the eighteenth-century critic Maurice Morgann called it in his essay on Sir John Falstaff, "written doubtless, or rather exhibited, long before Shakespeare was born, tho' afterwards repaired, I think, and furbished up by him with here and there a little sentiment and diction."

Such reluctance of ascription has led to the expenditure of much scholarly energy on attempts to isolate as undeniably Shakespearean a few scenes, in particular the finely managed quarrel of the Yorkists and Lancastrians in the Temple garden (II.iv), and to assign the bulk of the work to various teams of collaborators, among them Christopher Marlowe, George Peele, Thomas Nashe, and Robert Greene. Another consequence has been an exceptional tentativeness in much of the critical speculation about 1 Henry VI, though several fine studies have been made of its significance in Shakespeare's evolution from apprentice playwright to master dramatist.

Arguments against Shakespeare's authorship, or primacy within a group of collaborators, have focused mainly upon resemblances in the text to patterns of diction and versification characteristic of other Elizabethan playwrights. The evidence amassed has been considerable, though sometimes contradictory; at times impressive, but never conclusive. For it is likely enough that a Shakespeare who was just setting out on his literary career would have tended to imitate the stylistic mannerisms of already established dramatists. Even Allison Gaw, among the champions of multiple authorship one of the most sensitive to the potential and actual virtues of the play, failed to associate the unusual effort to integrate historical theme and dramatic structure in a theatrically meaningful way with the designing hand of Shakespeare.

Against the collaborationist theory, however, have stood a number of commentators, among them Charles Knight and Hermann Ulrici in the nineteenth century and Peter Alexander, J. P. Brockbank, Leo Kirschbaum, Hereward Price, and E. M. W. Tillyard in our own time. These critics perceive the three dramas on the reign of Henry VI as of one piece, and regard the case for denying the Shakespearean authorship of any part as not proved. It would be rash to assert categorically that 1 Henry VI as printed in the Folio of 1623 is entirely by Shakespeare, or that no version involving extensive collaboration with others ever did exist. But an approach to the play through the relationship between theme and dramatic design, rather than through its stylistic echoes of various contemporary writers, does considerably strengthen the argument that Shakespeare played the major, if not an exclusive, role in its composition.

Any reader or spectator coming to 1 Henry VI after exposure to the chronicle plays of other Elizabethan authors is suddenly aware that here he is being asked not simply to observe the pageant of history but to ponder the meaning of man's role in history. Most other works of the period in this dramatic kind are, even more evidently than the civic and national chronicles upon which they are based, mere strings of episodes in sequence of time, governed, if by any sense of theme at all, by the notion of the capriciousness of the goddess Fortune. Very few are concerned with seeking any other guiding principle in history or with the dramatic interaction of personalities within the pattern of historical events. Very few are concerned with the meaning of history at all, their authors often preferring instead, like a certain kind of modern historical novelist, to invent romantic situations involving historical personages within a bare framework of actual events.

The theme that runs throughout the tetralogy of plays composed by Shakespeare on the reigns of Henry VI and Richard III, and in fact throughout all of his dramatizations of English history, is the individual's, and a people's, response to the continuing alternations of order and disorder allowed by divine providence in the political life of a nation. A strong and heroic king whose regime brings glory and harmony to the commonwealth is succeeded by a monarch lacking, through extreme youth or defect of character, in the virtues necessary for unifying all the diverse constituents of society. The ineptitude or negligence of the sovereign looses the restraints on ambitious and unscrupulous subjects, whose schemes and counter-schemes for self-aggrandizement promote faction, public disorder, and eventually civil war. As E. M. W. Tillyard has noted in his Shakespeare's History Plays, in the struggle for domination degree, or acknowledgment of one's proper place in the hierarchically constituted political, and even cosmic, order, is forgotten. "Vaulting ambition" causes men to o'erleap themselves and drag the rest of society with them to the brink of chaos. Finally, when a ruler appears who is powerful and virtuous enough to triumph over the contending parties and restore degree and order, the hallmarks to the Elizabethan mind of good political economy, the wheel comes full circle.

Like the sixteenth-century chronicler Edward Hall, Shakespeare seems, officially at least, to have regarded the larger cycle of order emerging from disorder as having come round fully with the rise of the Tudor dynasty. Hall, whose book is entitled The Union of the Two Noble and Illustre Families of Lancaster and York, believed that the cause of the civil warfare which plagued England intermittently throughout the fifteenth century had been removed by the coronation of Henry VIII, whose father was connected with the Lancastrian, or Red Rose, branch of the royal family, and whose mother was the daughter and heir of the Yorkist, or White Rose, King Edward IV. For Shakespeare and his contemporaries, the full benefit of this restoration of harmony and degree after the near-anarchy of the Wars of the Roses was manifest in the long and prosperous reign of their virgin queen. "This royal infant," prophesies Archbishop Cranmer of the just-christened Elizabeth in the final scene of Henry the Eighth,

Though in her cradle, yet now promises
Upon this land a thousand thousand blessings
Which time shall bring to ripeness. (V.v.18-21)

Nor will the maiden queen's death, continues Cranmer (how unprophetic the playwright here becomes of later Stuart history!), set the old cycle in motion again, because phoenix-like her "blessedness" will be reborn in her successor.

But Shakespeare was more concerned with presenting the ill effects of disrupted order than with depicting the glories of successful monarchs. Of all his plays on British historical or pseudohistorical subjects, only one, Henry V, concentrates on the personality of an all-prosperous ruler and an undeniably glorious moment in England's past. Despite the good fortune of the kingdom during most of Elizabeth's reign, he apparently brooded about the possibility that the cycle might recur, especially if men should ignore the lessons taught by history. Within the larger cycle described by Hall and accepted as complete by many writers of his age, Shakespeare saw smaller cycles or undulations of order and chaos that should have reminded men how precarious any state of equilibrium is in their moral and political lives.

This is not to suggest that in his earliest years as a playwright he had already blocked out in his mind a whole series of dramas to illustrate the pattern and point the historical lessons for his audiences. The order of composition of his various "chronicle histories" should dispel any such assumption. The later-written tetralogy on the troubled history of England toward the end of the Middle Ages—Richard II, Henry IV, Parts I and II, and Henry V— deals with events that antedate those of the three Henry VI plays and Richard III. There also exists some possibility that the second and third parts of Henry VI were composed before and provided suggestions for the first. Even the earlier tetralogy, therefore, hints at a gradually emerging and changing conception in Shakespeare's mind of what his subject signified and how that significance might be rendered in dramatic terms.

The breakdown of good order, manifest in the undermining of ancient chivalric ideals that had earlier held society together, has its origins for Shakespeare in the events leading to the deposition of King Richard II at the close of the fourteenth century. Richard, a minor at his accession and as an adult deficient in the private and public virtues requisite in a king, is forced to abdicate by his cousin Henry Bolingbroke, whom he has wronged. Bolingbroke, reigning as King Henry IV, is haunted by the rebellions consequent upon Richard's death; his own success in violating degree has ironically given rise to ambition in others. His son Henry V, however, brings to the throne a clearer conscience and the qualities needed for effective rule. His triumphant kingship marks the close of one of the smaller historical cycles, and is epitomized in his ability to control the anarchical forces in society and weld its different elements into the efficient little army that defeats the French at Agincourt (1415).

Yet this brief period of glory is only an interval in the larger pattern. The hero-king has scotched, not killed, "civil dissension," the "viperous worm/That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth" (1 Henry VI, III.i.72-73). The opening scene of 1 Henry VI is shrewdly designed to give warning of the impending disorder. At the funeral of Henry V the four speeches by the king's brothers and uncles convey an awesome sense of cosmic upheaval and heavy finality. Their foreboding is immediately justified, for within less than three dozen lines the lamentations dissolve into a quarrel between the Duke of Gloucester and the Bishop of Winchester. This altercation symbolizes the release of disruptive forces within a society deprived of its main source of unity. Bedford, the new king's uncle, in fact responds to the quarrel with a desperate invocation, asking Henry V's spirit, as his living presence had done, to

Prosper this realm, keep it from civil broils,
Combat with adverse planets in the heavens! (I.i.53-54)

Nor does the playwright waste any further time before showing how disastrous has been the untimely death of this "king of so much worth." Bedford's prayer is interrupted by the entrance of a courier, who rushes in unceremoniously with news of English reversals in France. He is succeeded by two others, each arriving with worse tidings, worst of all being the account of Lord Talbot's capture. The remarkable economy of the scene is evident from the impact made by this trio of messengers. Their accounts project to the audience the importance for England's success in France of the efforts of such leaders as Salisbury, Talbot, and Bedford, who reacts to the news by preparing to go immediately to the aid of the others. Through this sequence of speeches the dramatist focuses attention on the three warriors, who stand for the ideals that have caused English arms until now to prosper. Yet all three worthy nobles are represented as advanced in years and fated to die later in the play. They carry with them to their graves not only the hopes of England's monarchs for possessing the crown of France, but also the chivalric ideals of a more innocent and masculine era. Their kind will be displaced, at least temporarily, by a self-seeking breed of new "risers," the Winchesters, the Suffolks, and the Yorks.

In spite of Bedford's resolve, there can be no doubt as the scene concludes that all coherence is already gone, that the downturn in England's fortunes has begun. With a real instinct for symmetrical design, the author concludes the scene by repeating the pattern of its opening. The royal brothers and uncles take their leave in precisely the order in which they have been introduced as speakers. As each goes his way to carry out his separate function in governing the realm, there is a momentary feeling that if they can work to one end, all may yet be well. Lest the audience presume, however, that shared grief and determination to act will lead to an effective coalition, the sense of division, of a pilotless ship of state, is emphasized by the words and pageantry of the departures. When all the rest are gone, there remains the unscrupulous politician Winchester, whose earlier altercation with Gloucester has already struck the note of discord, and who regards his nephew's death as an opportunity for him to seize control "And sit at chiefest stern of public weal."

The masterful construction of this introductory scene is more evident in theatrical performance than from silent reading. For it wants, as does the play on the whole, that poetic fire one is accustomed to look for in the work of Shakespeare. But as has often been remarked about his career, he seems to have developed a keen feeling for construction and for what is theatrically right before he evolved a poetic style that can thrill the auditor with its justness for the occasion or discriminate for the sensitive ear subtle differences of mood and character.

Symmetry and purposefulness of design, unlike the formlessness of most Elizabethan chronicle plays, are indeed the keynotes of this work, and of the Lancaster-York tetralogy as a whole. If later—beginning with Richard II and Henry IV and at length most impressively in King Lear and Macbeth—Shakespeare learned to portray characters helping to shape as well as enduring history or growing in perception and self-knowledge from their interaction with events, in 1 Henry VI he is not yet ready for such an achievement. Here the problem of man's role in history is reduced to simpler terms: a dramatic personage responds in a particular way to events and to other persons involved in the action because he has a fixed character, rather than the possibility of an evolving one. This simple consistency is, in a way, true even of the heroicomic portrayal of Joan of Arc. Although she gives an impression at the outset of being admirably eloquent, efficient, and patriotic, and then of degenerating into wantonness and diabolism, the unsavory side of her character is hinted at in her very first scene. If we are disturbed by the seemingly inconsistent and finally unchivalrous treatment of the Maid of Orleans, we should remind ourselves that in Shakespeare's day she had not yet been canonized or become the subject of more sympathetic characterizations by dramatists like Schiller, Shaw, and Anouilh. Character in Shakespeare's play is conceived broadly, flatly; the peculiar quality of every personage is unequivocally represented.

The solution for him, consequently, was to develop his dramatic theme mainly through formal structure; that is, through symbolically parallel and contrasting episodes, and through confrontations between characters representing sharply defined ethical and political values.

The first clue to this intention is the extremely cavalier handling of chronology, a disruption of time-sequence far beyond that in any of Shakespeare's other plays based on chronicles. Rather than demonstrating an ignorance of history or indifference to order, the rearrangement of events indicates a sense on the author's part that dramatic logic and the historical lesson are better served by recreating than by retelling what happened in the past. Thus, while 1 Henry VI is grounded upon chronicle materials, it employs them so freely that one is not always certain how much indebted to the sources a given scene may be, or even, except in manifest instances, whether the principal inspiration is the work of Edward Hall or that of Raphael Holinshed.

The play also includes totally fictional scenes, among them the dispute in the Temple garden and Talbot's encounter with the Countess of Auvergne. Unlike the arbitrarily invented episodes common in other history plays of the age, those in 1 Henry VI serve to clarify the meaning of actual events, far more effectively than anything available to the author in his historical sources. The disjointing of time, moreover, enables him to achieve striking dramatic and didactic effects. The episodes cover a period of more than thirty years, from the beginning of Henry VI's reign in 1422 to the death of the Talbots near Bordeaux in 1453, but from the opening lines incidents are juxtaposed—that were in actuality separated by a number of years. Thus, the siege of Orleans (1428–29) is already taking place during the funeral of Henry V seven years earlier. The dramaturgical reason is evident: to introduce immediately the main conflict, between Joan of France and Talbot of England. In Act V, the capture of Joan (1430) is succeeded directly and without even a scene division by Suffolk's fictitious capture and wooing of Margaret of Anjou, though the negotiations for the king's marriage did not actually take place until 1444. Finally, the death of the Talbots, chronologically the last in the long series of events here dramatized, precedes these other carefully paired episodes. Apparently this dislocation was made in order to maintain as long as possible the symbolical conflict between the mirror of English chivalry and the diabolically assisted Joan, and also to imply that Margaret is about to arise from Joan's ashes to carry on the scourging of England in the remainder of the trilogy.

Divine providence allows England to be plagued by infernal as well as political enemies because her people have sinned. How the nation might have remained true to itself is signified by the words and deeds of Talbot. What she is in danger of becoming is signified in the shortcomings of the French, failings that crop up increasingly among Englishmen as the action of the play proceeds. The dissension that breaks out at home in the opening lines begins immediately to sap the English strength abroad, for it is accompanied by the decay of feudal loyalties and forgetfulness of degree. Also manifest are an English decline toward French effeminacy and the beginning of reliance on fraud and cunning rather than manly courage and straightforward knightly virtue.

In the second scene, which shifts to Orleans, the playwright quickly sketches in the defective moral character of Frenchmen, as epitomized in the behavior of the Dauphin. A braggart like his counterpart in Shakespeare's Henry V, he begins a sortie against the English with the cry to his followers,

Him I forgive my death that killeth me
When he sees me go back one foot or fly. (I.ii.20-21)

Some moments later, his forces are beaten back, and he excuses his retreat in words a Talbot or a Salisbury would have died rather than utter:

I would ne'er have fled,
But that they left me 'midst my enemies. (I.ii.23-24)

Nothing they can do as men, it is apparent from the ensuing conversation among the French leaders, can overcome these dogged Englishmen.

At this point Joan comes on stage, and the Dauphin's conversation with her brings out two grave defects of Frenchmen that also begin gradually to taint the characters of Englishmen in the play. After bowing to her in single combat, Charles woos Joan in the language not of her royal prince but of the fashionable courtly lover, asking to be her "servant and not sovereign," and imploring her "mercy" (that is, the favor of her love) as her "prostrate thrall." Such domination by the female is obviously scorned by an audience of Tudor Englishmen; it confirms their prejudices against Gallic dandyism and effeminacy. For in spite of Joan's high-sounding claims and self-assertive dash, one's admiration of her must stop far short of the Dauphin's; she is, after all, no more than a shepherd's daughter from Lorraine. The comedy of the scene is also obvious. From the number of double entendres in the Ovidian tradition of lovemaking as armed combat, the audience can scarcely be expected to take seriously Joan's claims to divine inspiration and vow to maintain her virginity while Englishmen remain on her country's soil.

All doubt about the tenor of the scene is dispelled by Charles' final ecstatic response to her messianic claims:

Was Mahomet inspired with a dove?
Thou with an eagle art inspired then.
Helen, the mother of great Constantine,
Nor yet Saint Philip's daughters, were like thee.
Bright star of Venus, fall'n down on the earth,
How may I reverently worship thee enough?
(I.ii.140-45)

Not only are the allusions to other lofty examples of divine inspiration too characteristic of the Dauphin's lack of moderation to be taken seriously, but their very extravagance is a strong hint that Joan's pretensions are false. When Charles climaxes his apostrophe with the words "Bright star of Venus," the imagery of courtly wooing and the bawdy overtones of the earlier part of the scene intrude themselves again. Besides, "star of Venus, fall'n down on the earth," calls to mind not only the goddess of profane love, but also Lucifer, that brightest of angelic stars tumbled out of the heavens for his aspiration to divinity. Feminine wiles are thus linked by the epithet with diabolical fraud and deception. Charles is blameworthy for allowing himself to be dominated by a woman—a peasant girl at that!—and for resorting to preternatural aid in his efforts to rid his country of the English. "Coward of France!" exclaims Bedford, how much he wrongs his fame,

Despairing of his own arm's fortitude,
To join with witches and the help of hell. (II.i.16-18)

The rest of the scenes in France are fashioned to contrast the reprehensible behavior of Joan and the Dauphin, as well as of Englishmen whose characters become similarly stained as the moral fiber of their leaderless country weakens, with that of the upright Talbot. These contrasts are effectively brought out through patterns, as Ernest Talbert calls them, of "intensified repetition." One such pattern is the strategic paralleling of episodes either to heighten the opposition between worthy and reprehensible forms of behavior or to point up symbolical relationships between apparently unconnected incidents. The playwright is also fond of grouping characters and episodes in climactic triads to underscore several of the main themes of the play.

Thus, since Talbot is the standard by which the measure of the other characters is taken, his first meeting with Henry VI is presented as an idealized interview between an unselfishly devoted vassal and his sovereign. For his loyal service and recovery in France of fifty fortresses,

Twelve cities, and seven walled towns of strength,
Beside five hundred prisoners of esteem, (III.iv.6-8)

Talbot is created Earl of Shrewsbury. But the episode distinctly recalls the first scene of the same act, where the already scheming Richard Plantagenet is made Duke of York without having done anything to merit his elevation and pledges his fealty to the king with a hollow heart. Again, in the opening scene of Act IV Talbot tears the garter from Sir John Falstaff's¹ leg for cowardice in battle and delivers a speech on what it means to bear "the sacred name of knight." His action is a clear example of how noblemen, in helping the monarch to maintain true order and degree, should deal with the presumptions of their subordinates.

As soon as Talbot departs, however, Vernon and Basset disrupt the coronation scene with their demands for trial by combat in behalf of their respective masters, York and Somerset. In order to further their own ambitions, Henry's nobles are obviously willing to let faction breed rather than suppress their contentious retainers. Toward the end of the scene York even appears to be on the point of exclaiming to Warwick (IV.i.180) that he would prefer to have the king himself take sides against him since he might then turn it to his own advantage. This is but one of several scenes in which Talbot's conduct is sharply contrasted with that of other characters. The dramatist's intentions are unmistakable: Talbot is the ideal, the centripetal force of order that gradually gives way to the centrifugal forces of chaos represented by York and others of the rising new breed.

Dramatic triads appear in many places in 1 Henry VI from the opening scene onward: the sense of climactic urgency in the arrival of the three messengers hot on one another's heels; the trio of ambitious nobles—Winchester, York, Suffolk; the focusing on the three stout but aging generals—Salisbury, Bedford, and Talbot—each of whose deaths is a more discouraging blow, the last the final blow, to English dynastic ambitions in France. Talbot opposes the French and their sorceress champion on all three of these occasions: at Orleans, where Salisbury is shot; at Rouen, where Bedford dies; and finally near Bordeaux, where he and his son meet their heroic end.

In each incident, fraud at first succeeds, not force of arms, and the placing of blame in each indicates progressive deterioration on the English side. At Orleans, Salisbury is killed by chance and Talbot is temporarily set back, to his complete bewilderment, by Joan's "art and baleful sorcery." His martial enterprise and trust in God, however, in contrast with the Frenchmen's lax discipline and reliance on "the help of hell," win the day for him when he returns to the attack. At Rouen (III.ii) Joan gains entrance by means of a stratagem historically employed by the English on another occasion, according to Holinshed, and transferred in the play to the French as an instance of their treachery. Eventually, Talbot overcomes again, while Bedford watches the struggle from "his litter sick." But now it is not only the French who are cowardly, who, as Talbot complains,

keep the walls
And dare not take up arms like gentlemen. (III.ii.69-70)

Just before the victory is assured and Bedford dies content, Falstaff again shows the white feather, this time on stage instead of in a messenger's report, and runs like a Frenchman from the battle scene. It is this defection that provides the occasion for Talbot later to tear the badge of the Order of the Garter from his leg at Henry's coronation in Paris.

At Bordeaux, where the audience might expect a final confrontation between Talbot and Joan, none is provided, nor does Joan make use of any cunning device to gain advantage over the English. The dramatist's reasons are clear enough. They are placed in the mouth of Sir William Lucy as he vainly begs York and Somerset to come to Talbot's relief. It is "the vulture of sedition" and "Sleeping neglection" that are causing the loss of Henry V's conquests:

The fraud of England, not the force of France,
Hath now entrapped the noble-minded Talbot.
(IV.iv.36-37)

Malice and cunning deceit are beginning to corrupt even the highest English nobility, and Talbot is the sacrifice to their dissension. Yet even against the forces of hell and the wily allurements of womankind, England might have stood fast, if only all her noblemen had been like her stoutest champion. But when men place their self-interest ahead of the common good, the old ideals are readily forgotten. Joan's cunning becomes no longer necessary; the English are now their own worst enemies, having succumbed to the vices of the French.

This eroding of English virtue is nowhere more skillfully depicted than in the triad of scenes involving the first appearances of each of the three evil-designing Frenchwomen (interestingly enough, the only feminine characters in the play!). The scenes in question are Joan's introduction to the Dauphin, Talbot's reception by the Countess of Auvergne (II.iii), and Suffolk's wooing of Margaret of Anjou (V.iii). All three women represent a threat to English fortunes; the manner in which the three men respond to them neatly dramatizes the lesson.

Earlier it was pointed out that not only the Dauphin's accepting the demoniacally inspired assistance of Joan but also his self-debasement to servant-lover of a peasant girl, is conduct inexcusable in a prince. And even if his behavior were not a burlesque of courtly traditions, it runs counter to the ruggedly heroic ideal represented by Talbot. Not that Talbot is a boor: he does know how to treat a lady as becomes a worthy English chevalier. The Dauphin's involvement with Joan is a breaking of degree and serves, moreover, to unhinge her judgment of herself even beyond what traffic with fiends has done. When she is finally on her way to the stake, this peasant maiden who has been graced with sovereignty over her infatuated monarch pretends to "noble birth" and "gentler blood" than that of her shepherd father. Even the phrase with which she rejects the old man—"Decrepit miser!"—accentuates her disdain for her lowly origins; miser is the worst term of opprobrium in the vocabulary of the courtly tradition.

But the true measure of the Dauphin's folly is the scene between Talbot and the fictional countess. This lady too plots evil to the English through her ruse for capturing "the terror of the French." There is even a suggestion that she, like Joan, may have resorted to witchcraft by practicing sympathetic magic on her guest's portrait:

Long time thy shadow hath been thrall to me,
For in my gallery thy picture hangs.
But now the substance shall endure the like. (II.iii.36-38)

The resourceful Talbot, however, outwits her by a simple counterstratagem and, refusing like a true and valiant gentleman to avenge himself on so weak an adversary, asks only honest entertainment for himself and his men before they take their leave.

Obviously if all of Talbot's compatriots had been thus immune to the allure of scheming Frenchwomen, all might have remained well enough for England. But the third encounter of this kind, that between Suffolk and Reignier's daughter Margaret, shows that Englishmen no longer are men of true honor, who, in contrast with the French, place their country's interests above their own selfish desires. Suffolk is dazzled, almost bewitched, by Margaret's beauty when he first gazes on her. And while he is the active, she almost entirely the passive, agent in this scene, from the course taken by the remaining action there can be little doubt that this woman will supplant Joan as the punishment for the sins of faction and ambition among Englishmen. Having Joan's and Margaret's captures occur in the same scene, in another of those symbolically meaningful parallelings of seemingly unconnected episodes, is theatrically most effective. And even though Joan's final scenes are far different in tone from Margaret's entry into the action, they serve a twofold function in helping to knit up the events of 1 Henry VI and to anticipate the subsequent development of the trilogy.

In defiance of historical fact, but with excellent dramatic sense, York is made to be Joan's captor and judge. But even as he is mercilessly taunting his prisoner about her past affairs with the Dauphin and his nobles, another game of man and woman is being played that will prove his undoing. The parting curses of Joan are not the impotent ragings of a "fell banning hag"; they are prophecies of ambitious York's own downfall and of the miserable years for England that are being engendered in the dalliance of Suffolk with Margaret of Anjou.

Suffolk would enjoy this lady's love and use her to further his own ends at the sacrifice of English interests in France. Worse still, his "wondrous rare description" of Margaret's beauty serves to corrupt King Henry's mind and causes him to break his pre-contract of marriage with the daughter of the Earl of Armagnac. That the choice is both impolitic and immoral is clear from the king's own inner turmoil in the last moments of the play: the "sharp dissension" that he feels within makes him "sick with working of my thoughts," and he finally departs in a state of "grief" rather than expectant elation at "This sudden execution of my will."

The threat latent in Henry's impending marriage to Margaret, with whose arrival in England the second part of the trilogy opens, is brilliantly suggested by a pair of images in the last scene of 1 Henry VI. The king compares his infatuation to a tempest, driving his soul against its more settled inclinations like a ship against the tide:

So am I driven by breath of her renown
Either to suffer shipwreck or arrive
Where I may have fruition of her love. (V.v.7-9)

The sudden intrusion here of the conventional figure of the lover as a vessel in danger of shipwreck on the stormy seas of passion calls to mind the dangers that Petrarch (Passa la nave mia colma d'oblio) and his imitator Sir Thomas Wyatt ("My galley charged with forgetfulness") lamented as besetting the soul of the man tossed by sexual desire. For a king to make such an admission, and then to overrule good counsel and follow the inclination of his will rather than reasons of state, is a most unregal kind of behavior.

Most disturbing of all, however, are the verses with which the drama concludes. If restoration of order were implied at the end of the action, according to the usual Shakespearean closing formula there would be a speech explicitly saying so. But here the final words, coming after the king's confused withdrawal, are left for Suffolk, who exults in his success and departs for Anjou

As did the youthful Paris once to Greece,
With hope to find the like event in love,
But prosper better than the Trojan did. (V.v.104-06)

The image could hardly be lost on an Elizabethan audience, whose own mythmaking historians traced the ancestry of the British race to Troy. French Margaret will bring disaster to England as certainly as Spartan Helen brought ruin to "the topless towers of Ilium."

The remainder of the trilogy portrays Margaret, though she is in neither play the solely dominating figure, as an evil influence in England's domestic affairs. In 2 Henry VI it is she and her lover Suffolk, along with the malevolent Winchester, who engineer the downfall of the Duke of Gloucester. In 3 Henry VI, her monstrous treatment of her archrival York is the climax of her role as England's scourge. Eventually, in Richard III, this figure of nemesis who for long has borne a "tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide," becomes inactive though not silent, an unheeded Cassandra warning the now-dominant House of York of its own impending doom.

Though not a great poetic drama, 1 Henry VI is by no means a failure as a play for theatrical performance. It exhibits a thoughtful design through which important themes are vigorously, if somewhat crudely, realized in the completed action. Nor is the affair of Margaret and Suffolk, as some critics would have it, only an afterthought. Strange as the final act and scene divisions in the Folio may be, the matter of these last episodes is not something inexpertly tacked onto what was originally conceived as an independent tragedy of Talbot simply because the author, or reviser, needed a way to patch together a trilogy. All that previously transpires is too carefully articulated with the concluding scenes for that. Act V is the logical conclusion to the events set in motion at the play's beginning, and at the same time an effective opening-out to the even greater disorder and calamities of 2 and 3 Henry VI. The close is nearly symmetrical with the opening, and far more ominous though more restrained and economical in its language. A nation that is leaderless because its king is an infant as the play begins, is still leaderless, or subject to dangerous misguidance, as the action ends because its now-grown king has succumbed to a destructive passion. And the unscrupulous new risers have now found an instrument for gaining the illicit power to which they aspire.

The bad news from Orleans that marked the downturn of England's fortunes in France is superseded by bad news from Angiers that will lead to misery on England's soil itself. All this the maker of 1 Henry VI was capable of rendering theatrically effective. By 1592 Shakespeare may not yet have been a supreme dramatic craftsman, but neither was he a mere botcher of other men's work, a snapper-up of other playwrights' unconsidered trifles.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCES

For the plot of Henry VI, Part One Shakespeare drew upon at least four English chronicle histories. His chief sources were Edward Hall's The Union of the Two Noble and Illustre Families of Lancaster and York (1548) and the second edition of Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1587). For a few details not found in Hall or Holinshed he also consulted the Chronicles of Robert Fabyan (1516) and Richard Grafton (1569), the latter substantially a reprint of Hall. Some of the best scenes in the play, however, such as the quarrel of the roses in the Temple garden, appear to have been invented by the playwright himself.

Although Geoffrey Bullough in his Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare inclines to Hall as the principal source, in many scenes 1 Henry VI appears to follow more closely Holinshed's account, which is largely derived from Hall without the latter's invented orations, amplification of detail, and attempts at an eloquence commensurate with the grandeur of his theme. But since Shakespeare improvised so freely upon his source materials, in most episodes of the play it is not possible to determine whether his immediate inspiration is Hall or Holinshed.

In view of this uncertainty, the reader interested in consulting the sources would be well advised to compare the two chronicles. He should definitely refer to Hall, however, for the account of Talbot's death in order to gain some idea of the elevated style of the source upon which Shakespeare obviously relied for this heroically pitched and moving episode.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

Henry VI, Part One is preserved only in the Folio of 1623, the basis of the present edition. Though acted infrequently after Shakespeare's lifetime, apparently the drama was originally well received. In the Epilogue to Shakespeare's Henry V, the Chorus asks the spectators to applaud this more recent work by reminding them of the company's earlier dramatizations of the reign of Henry VI:

Which oft our stage hath shown; and for their sake,
In your fair minds let this acceptance take. (Epi.13-14)

It is even likely that in its earliest production 1 Henry VI was the theatrical hit of the year. On March 3, 1592, the producer Philip Henslowe recorded in his diary that the first performance of a new (or refurbished) play called "harey the vj." had grossed £3.16s.8d., a sum indicating an exceptionally profitable opening. Over the next ten months this work was acted at least fourteen, perhaps fifteen, additional times. It may be that the patriotic theme appealed strongly to a London audience still exulting over the debacle of the Spanish Armada; for the heroic death of Lord Talbot in the fourth act, as Thomas Nashe wrote during the same year in Pierce Penniless, had been found deeply moving by "ten thousand spectators at least (at several times), who, in the tragedian that represents his person, imagine they behold him fresh bleeding."

The entry in Henslowe's diary and Nashe's allusion in his pamphlet to "Talbot (the terror of the French)" suggest that the play in question may have been 1 Henry VI. Still, some doubt must remain whether this particular version was the same as that printed in the Folio, and whether Shakespeare had participated in its composition. With few exceptions, however, modern Shakespearean critics have assumed that 1 Henry VI as we know it does come, along with the second and third parts of the trilogy, from Shakespeare's apprentice years as a playwright. In the absence of any positive evidence to the contrary, it thus seems reasonable to declare for late 1591 or early 1592 as the likeliest date of original composition for the play printed in the Folio and to presume that it is substantially, perhaps entirely, from the hand of Shakespeare.

The Folio is the only authority and affords a remarkably clear text, apart from a few baffling words and some apparently mangled lines of verse. In the present edition, therefore, the temptation to amend the original has been resisted as much as possible. Only two words to fill apparent lacunae have been supplied from consultation with the later Folios. These are "Nero" (I.iv.95) and "sir" (II.iv.132). Both of these are bracketed in the text and their sources given in the notes below. Without editorial comment, punctuation and spelling have been modernized (though "Dolphin" is retained in the dialogue), names prefixed to speeches and appearing in stage directions expanded and regularized, act and scene divisions translated where the Folio gives them in Latin, and obvious typographical errors corrected.

In the few instances where lines of verse are improperly divided in the Folio, they have been rearranged; all such corrections are noted in the table below. Occasionally when the printers of the Folio may seem to have divided a single line into two verses, it is quite clear that the line was too long for the space available, and was simply broken at a clause, rather than at the end of the column. Because the stage directions in the original are on the whole clear and amply descriptive, they have been reproduced with a minimum of emendations and additions; wherever changes have been made, they are enclosed in square brackets. In dividing acts and scenes the Folio is deficient: no scene divisions are given for Acts I and II; Act III is correctly divided into four scenes; Act IV is not only too long—since nothing but the final scene is left for Act V—but within it the scenes are also inaccurately divided. The act and scene divisions of the present edition are therefore those of the Globe text; wherever they differ from those of the Folio, they are enclosed in square brackets. The table that follows includes emendations and corrections of the Folio text. The altered reading appears first in boldface; the original follows, in roman. Where a Folio reading is retained, but seems extremely dubious, the word is given in roman, and commentary or suggested emendation is placed within square brackets.

THE FIRST PART OF HENRY THE SIXTH

[Dramatis Personae

KING HENRY THE SIXTH
 HUMPHREY Duke of Gloucester, uncle to the king, and Protector

Scene: England; France]

A C T I

Scene I. [Westminster Abbey.]

Dead march.° Enter the funeral of King Henry the Fifth, attended on by the Duke of BEDFORD, Regent of France; the Duke of GLOUCESTER, Protector; the Duke of EXETER, WARWICK, the Bishop of WINCHESTER, and the Duke of SOMERSET, [with ATTENDANTS].

BEDFORD

Hung be the heavens with black,° yield day to night!
Comets, importing change of times and states,°
Brandish your crystal° tresses in the sky,
And with them scourge the bad revolting stars
That have consented unto° Henry's death!
King Henry the Fifth, too famous to live long!
England ne'er lost a king of so much worth.

GLOUCESTER

England ne'er had a king until his time.
Virtue he had, deserving to command;
His brandished sword did blind men with his° beams;

His arms spread wider than a dragon's wings;
His sparkling eyes, replete with wrathful fire,
More dazzled and drove back his enemies
Than midday sun fierce bent against their faces.
What should I say? His deeds exceed all speech:
He ne'er lift° up his hand but conquerèd.

EXETER

We mourn in black; why mourn we not in blood?°
Henry is dead and never shall revive.
Upon a wooden° coffin we attend,
And death's dishonorable victory
We with our stately presence glorify,
Like captives bound to a triumphant car.°
What! shall we curse the planets of mishap°
That plotted thus our glory's overthrow?
Or shall we think the subtle-witted French
Conjurers and sorcerers that, afraid of him,
By magic verses have contrived his end?

WINCHESTER

He was a king blessed of the King of Kings.
Unto the French the dreadful Judgment Day
So dreadful will not be as was his sight.
The battles of the Lord of Hosts he fought;
The church's prayers made him so prosperous.

GLOUCESTER

The church! Where is it? Had not churchmen prayed,
His thread of life had not so soon decayed.
None do you like but an effeminate prince,
Whom, like a schoolboy, you may overawe.

The decorative border on page 110 appeared on the first page of 3 Henry VI in The Whole Contention between the Two Famous Houses, Lancaster and Yorke, 1619.

WINCHESTER

Gloucester, whate'er we like, thou art protector°
And lookest° to command the prince and realm.
Thy wife is proud; she holdeth thee in awe
More than God or religious churchmen may.

GLOUCESTER

Name not religion, for thou lov'st the flesh,
And ne'er throughout the year to church thou go'st
Except it be to pray against thy foes.

BEDFORD

Cease, cease these jars° and rest your minds in peace;
Let's to the altar. Heralds, wait on us.
Instead of gold, we'll offer up our arms,°
Since arms avail not now that Henry's dead.
Posterity, await for wretched years,
When at their mothers' moistened eyes babes shall suck,
Our isle be made a nourish° of salt tears,
And none but women left to wail the dead.
Henry the Fifth, thy ghost I invoke:
Prosper this realm, keep it from civil broils,°
Combat with adverse planets in the heavens!
A far more glorious star thy soul will make
Than Julius Caesar° or bright—

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

My honorable lords, health to you all!
Sad tidings bring I to you out of France,
Of loss, of slaughter, and discomfiture:
Guienne, Champagne, Rheims, Orleans,
Paris, Guysors, Poitiers, are all quite lost.

BEDFORD

What say'st thou, man, before dead Henry's corse?°
Speak softly, or the loss of those great towns
Will make him burst his lead° and rise from death.

GLOUCESTER

Is Paris lost? Is Rouen yielded up?
If Henry were recalled to life again,
These° news would cause him once more yield the ghost.

EXETER

How were they lost? What treachery was used?

MESSENGER

No treachery, but want of men and money.
Amongst the soldiers this is muttered,
That here you maintain several factions,°
And whilst a field should be dispatched and fought,
You are disputing of your generals:
One would have ling'ring wars with little cost;
Another would fly swift, but wanteth wings;
A third thinks, without expense at all,
By guileful fair words peace may be obtained.
Awake, awake, English nobility!
Let not sloth dim your honors new begot;°

Cropped are the flower-de-luces° in your arms;
Of England's coat° one half is cut away.

EXETER

Were our tears wanting° to this funeral,
These tidings would call forth her° flowing tides.

BEDFORD

Me they concern; regent° I am of France.
Give me my steelèd coat; I'll fight for France.
Away with these disgraceful wailing robes!
Wounds will I lend the French, instead of eyes,
To weep their intermissive° miseries.

Enter to them another MESSENGER.

SECOND MESSENGER

Lords, view these letters full of bad mischance.
France is revolted from the English quite,
Except some petty towns of no import.°
The Dolphin° Charles is crownèd king in Rheims;
The Bastard of Orleans with him is joined;
Reignier, Duke of Anjou, doth take his part;
The Duke of Alençon flieth to his side.

Exit. 95

EXETER

The Dolphin crownèd king? All fly to him?
O, whither shall we fly from this reproach?°

GLOUCESTER

We will not fly, but to our enemies' throats.
Bedford, if thou be slack, I'll fight it out.

BEDFORD

Gloucester, why doubt'st thou of my forwardness?
An army have I mustered in my thoughts,
Wherewith already France is overrun.

100

Enter another MESSENGER.

THIRD MESSENGER

My gracious lords, to add to your laments,
Wherewith you now bedew° King Henry's hearse,
I must inform you of a dismal fight
Betwixt the stout Lord Talbot and the French.

105

WINCHESTER

What? Wherein Talbot overcame, is't so?

THIRD MESSENGER

O no, wherein Lord Talbot was o'erthrown.
The circumstance I'll tell you more at large.°
The tenth of August last, this dreadful lord,
Retiring from the siege of Orleans,
Having full° scarce six thousand in his troop,
By three and twenty thousand of the French
Was round encompassèd and set upon.
No leisure had he to enrank° his men;
He wanted pikes° to set before his archers;

110

115

Instead whereof, sharp stakes plucked out of hedges
They pitchèd in the ground confusedly,
To keep the horsemen off° from breaking in.
More than three hours the fight continuèd;
Where valiant Talbot, above human thought,
Enacted wonders with his sword and lance.
Hundreds he sent to hell, and none durst stand him;
Here, there, and everywhere, enraged he slew.
The French exclaimed the devil was in arms;
All the whole army stood agazed° on him.
His soldiers, spying his undaunted spirit,
"A Talbot! a Talbot!" cried out amain,°
And rushed into the bowels of the battle.
Here had the conquest fully been sealed up,
If Sir John Falstaff had not played the coward.
He, being in the vanward,° placed behind
With purpose to relieve and follow them,
Cowardly fled, not having struck one stroke.
Hence grew the general wrack and massacre:
Enclosèd were they with their enemies.
A base Walloon,° to win the Dolphin's grace,
Thrust Talbot with a spear into the back,
Whom all France, with their chief assembled strength,
Durst not presume to look once in the face.

120

125

130

135

140

BEDFORD

Is Talbot slain then? I will slay myself
For living idly here in pomp and ease
Whilst such a worthy leader, wanting aid,
Unto his dastard foemen is betrayed.

THIRD MESSENGER

O no, he lives, but is took prisoner,
And Lord Scales with him and Lord Hungerford;
Most of the rest slaughtered or took likewise.

145

BEDFORD

His ransom there is none but I shall pay.
I'll hale the Dolphin headlong from his throne;
His crown shall be the ransom of my friend;
Four of their lords I'll change for one of ours.
Farewell, my masters, to my task will I;
Bonfires in France forthwith I am to make
To keep our great Saint George's feast° withal.°
Ten thousand soldiers with me I will take,
Whose bloody deeds shall make all Europe quake.

155

THIRD MESSENGER

So you had need, for Orleans is besieged;
The English army is grown weak and faint;
The Earl of Salisbury craveth supply
And hardly keeps his men from mutiny
Since they, so few, watch such a multitude.

160

EXETER

Remember, lords, your oaths to Henry sworn:
Either to quell° the Dolphin utterly
Or bring him in obedience to your yoke.

BEDFORD

I do remember it and here take my leave
To go about my preparation.° Exit BEDFORD.

GLOUCESTER

I'll to the Tower^o with all the haste I can
To view th' artillery and munition,
And then I will proclaim young Henry king.

Exit GLOUCESTER.

EXETER

To Eltham will I, where the young king is, 170
Being ordained his special governor,
And for his safety there I'll best devise. Exit.

WINCHESTER

Each hath his place and function to attend;
I am left out; for me nothing remains.
But long I will not be Jack out of office.^o 175
The king from Eltham I intend to send
And sit at chiefest stern of public weal.^o
Exit [with ATTENDANTS].

[Scene II. France. Before Orleans.]

Sound a flourish.^o Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], ALENÇON, and REIGNIER, marching with drum and SOLDIERS.

DAUPHIN

Mars his^o true moving, even as in the heavens,
So in the earth, to this day is not known.
Late did he shine upon the English side;
Now we are victors; upon us he smiles.
What towns of any moment^o but we have? 5
At pleasure here we lie near Orleans;
Otherwhiles^o the famished English, like pale ghosts,
Faintly besiege us one hour in a month.

ALENÇON

They want their porridge and their fat bull-beeves:^o
Either they must be dieted^o like mules 10
And have their provender^o tied to their mouths,
Or piteous they will look, like drownèd mice.

REIGNIER

Let's raise the siege; why live we idly here?
Talbot is taken, whom we wont^o to fear;
Remaineth none but mad-brained Salisbury, 15
And he may well in fretting spend his gall;^o
Nor^o men nor money hath he to make war.

DAUPHIN

Sound, sound alarum!^o we will rush on them.
Now for the honor of the forlorn French!
Him I forgive my death that killeth me 20
When he sees me go back one foot or fly. Exeunt.

Here alarum; they are beaten back by the ENGLISH with great loss. Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], ALENÇON, and REIGNIER.

DAUPHIN

Who ever saw the like? What men have I?
Dogs! cowards! dastards! I would ne'er have fled,
But that they left me 'midst my enemies.

REIGNIER

Salisbury is a desperate homicide; 25
He fighteth as one weary of his life.
The other lords, like lions wanting food,
Do rush upon us as their hungry prey.^o

ALENÇON

Froissart,^o a countryman of ours, records 30
England all Olivers and Rowlands^o bred
During the time Edward the Third did reign.
More truly now may this be verified,
For none but Samsons and Goliases^o
It sendeth forth to skirmish. One to ten!
Lean raw-boned rascals!^o who would e'er suppose 35
They had such courage and audacity?

DAUPHIN

Let's leave this town, for they are harebrained slaves,
And hunger will enforce^o them to be more eager.^o
Of old I know them; rather with their teeth
The walls they'll tear down than forsake the siege. 40

REIGNIER

I think, by some odd gimmors^o or device
Their arms are set, like clocks, still to strike on;
Else ne'er could they hold out so as they do.
By my consent, we'll even let them alone.

ALENÇON Be it so.

45

Enter the BASTARD of Orleans.

BASTARD

Where's the Prince Dolphin? I have news for him.

DAUPHIN

Bastard of Orleans, thrice welcome to us.

BASTARD

Methinks your looks are sad, your cheer appaled.^o
Hath the late overthrow wrought this offense? 10
Be not dismayed, for succor is at hand:
A holy maid hither with me I bring,
Which by a vision sent to her from heaven
Ordained is to raise this tedious siege
And drive the English forth^o the bounds of France.
The spirit of deep prophecy she hath, 15
Exceeding the nine sibyls^o of old Rome: 55
What's past and what's to come she can descry.
Speak, shall I call her in? Believe my words,
For they are certain and unfallible.^o

DAUPHIN

Go, call her in. [Exit BASTARD.] But first, to try her skill, 60
Reignier, stand thou as Dolphin in my place;
Question her proudly; let thy looks be stern:
By this means shall we sound^o what skill she hath.

PUCELLE

Reignier, is't thou that thinkest to beguile me?
Where is the Dolphin? Come, come from behind;
I know thee well, though never seen before.
Be not amazed, there's nothing hid from me;
In private will I talk with thee apart.
Stand back, you lords, and give us leave awhile.

REIGNIER

She takes upon her bravely at first dash.°

PUCELLE

Dolphin, I am by birth a shepherd's daughter,
My wit° untrained in any kind of art.
Heaven and our Lady° gracious hath it pleased
To shine on my contemptible estate.
Lo, whilst I waited on my tender lambs,
And to sun's parching heat displayed my cheeks,
God's mother deigned to appear to me
And in a vision full of majesty
Willed me to leave my base vocation°
And free my country from calamity.
Her aid she promised and assured success;
In complete glory she revealed herself;
And, whereas I was black and swart° before,
With those clear rays which she infused° on me
That beauty am I blessed with which you may see.
Ask me what question thou canst possible,
And I will answer unpremeditated;
My courage try by combat, if thou dar'st,
And thou shalt find that I exceed my sex.
Resolve on this,° thou shalt be fortunate
If thou receive me for thy warlike mate.°

DAUPHIN

Thou hast astonished me with thy high terms;°
Only this proof I'll of thy valor make,
In single combat thou shalt buckle° with me,
And if thou vanquishest, thy words are true;
Otherwise I renounce all confidence.

PUCELLE

I am prepared: here is my keen-edged sword,
Decked with fine flower-de-luces on each side,
The which at Touraine, in Saint Katherine's churchyard,
Out of a great deal of old iron I chose forth.

DAUPHIN

Then come, a° God's name, I fear no woman.

PUCELLE

And while I live, I'll ne'er fly from a man.

Here they fight, and Joan la PUCELLE overcomes.

DAUPHIN

Stay, stay thy hands! thou art an Amazon
And fightest with the sword of Deborah.°

DAUPHIN

Whoe'er helps thee, 'tis thou that must help me:
Impatiently I burn with thy desire;
My heart and hands thou hast at once subdued.
Excellent Pucelle, if thy name be so,°
Let me thy servant° and not sovereign be;
'Tis the French Dolphin sueth to° thee thus.

PUCELLE

I must not yield to any rites of love,
For my profession's sacred from above;
When I have chased all thy foes from hence,
Then will I think upon a recompense.

DAUPHIN

Meantime look gracious on thy prostrate thrall.°

REIGNIER

My lord, methinks, is very long in talk.

ALENÇON

Doubtless he shrives this woman to her smock;°
Else ne'er could he so long protract his speech.

REIGNIER

Shall we disturb him, since he keeps no mean?°

ALENÇON

He may mean more than we poor men do know:
These women are shrewd tempters with their tongues.

REIGNIER

My lord, where are you? What devise you on?°
Shall we give o'er Orleans, or no?

PUCELLE

Why, no, I say, distrustful recreants!°
Fight till the last gasp; I'll be your guard.

DAUPHIN

What she says I'll confirm: we'll fight it out.

PUCELLE

Assigned am I to be the English scourge.
This night the siege assuredly I'll raise;
Expect Saint Martin's summer,° halcyon's days,°
Since I have entered into these wars.
Glory is like a circle in the water,
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself
Till by broad spreading it disperse to nought.
With Henry's death the English circle ends;
Dispersed are the glories it included.
Now am I like that proud insulting° ship
Which Caesar and his fortune bare° at once.

REIGNIER

Drive them from Orleans and be immortalized.

DAUPHIN

Presently° we'll try. Come, let's away about it;
No prophet will I trust, if she prove false. Exeunt. 150

[Scene III. London. Before the Tower.]

Enter GLOUCESTER, with his SERVINGMEN [in blue coats°].

GLOUCESTER

I am come to survey° the Tower this day:
Since Henry's death, I fear, there is conveyance.°
Where be these warders,° that they wait not here?
Open the gates; 'tis Gloucester° that calls.

FIRST WARDER [Within.]

Who's there that knocks so imperiously?

GLOUCESTER'S FIRST [SERVING]MAN

It is the noble Duke of Gloucester.

SECOND WARDER [Within.]

Whoe'er he be, you may not be let in.

GLOUCESTER'S FIRST [SERVING]MAN

Villains, answer you so the Lord Protector?

FIRST WARDER [Within.]

The Lord protect him! so we answer him;

We do no otherwise than we are willed.

GLOUCESTER

Who willèd you? Or whose will stands but mine?
There's none protector of the realm but I.
Break up the gates, I'll be your warrantize;°
Shall I be flouted thus by dunghill grooms?°

Gloucester's MEN rush at the Tower gates, and WOODVILLE the lieutenant speaks within.

WOODVILLE

What noise is this? What traitors have we here?

GLOUCESTER

Lieutenant, is it you whose voice I hear?

Open the gates; here's Gloucester that would enter.

WOODVILLE

Have patience, noble duke, I may not open;

The Cardinal of Winchester forbids:

From him I have express commandment°

That thou nor none of thine shall be let in.

GLOUCESTER

Faint-hearted Woodville, prizest him 'fore me?°
Arrogant Winchester, that haughty prelate,
Whom Henry, our late sovereign, ne'er could brook?°
Thou art no friend to God or to the king;
Open the gates, or I'll shut thee out shortly.

Or we'll burst them open, if that° you come not

Enter to the PROTECTOR at the Tower gates WINCHESTER and his MEN in tawny coats.°

WINCHESTER

How now, ambitious Humphrey, what means this?

GLOUCESTER

Peeled° priest, dost thou command me to be shut out? 30

WINCHESTER

I do, thou most usurping proditor,°
And not protector, of the king or realm.

GLOUCESTER

Stand back, thou manifest conspirator,
Thou that contriv'dst to murder our dead lord,
Thou that giv'st whores indulgences° to sin; 35
I'll canvas thee in thy broad cardinal's hat,°
If thou proceed in this thy insolence.

WINCHESTER

Nay, stand thou back, I will not budge a foot;

This be Damascus,° be thou cursèd Cain,

To slay thy brother° Abel, if thou wilt. 40

GLOUCESTER

I will not slay thee, but I'll drive thee back;

Thy scarlet robes as a child's bearing cloth°

I'll use to carry thee out of this place.

WINCHESTER

Do what thou dar'st, I beard° thee to thy face.

10

GLOUCESTER

What! am I dared and bearded to my face? 45

Draw, men, for all this privileged place,°

Blue coats to tawny coats. Priest, beware your beard;

I mean to tug it, and to cuff you soundly.

Under my feet I stamp thy cardinal's hat;

In spite of pope or dignities of church,° 50

Here by the cheeks I'll drag thee up and down.

WINCHESTER

Gloucester, thou wilt answer this before the pope.

15

GLOUCESTER

Winchester goose,° I cry, a rope!° a rope!

Now beat them hence; why do you let them stay?

Thee I'll chase hence, thou wolf in sheep's array. 55

MAYOR

Fie, lords! that you, being supreme magistrates,^o
Thus contumeliously^o should break the peace!

GLOUCESTER

Peace, mayor! thou know'st little of my wrongs:
Here's Beaufort, that regards nor God nor king, 60
Hath here distrained^o the Tower to his use.

WINCHESTER

Here's Gloucester, a foe to citizens,
One that still motions^o war and never peace,
O'ercharging your free purses with large fines,^o 65
That seeks to overthrow religion
Because he is protector of the realm,
And would have armor here out of the Tower
To crown himself king and suppress^o the prince.

GLOUCESTER

I will not answer thee with words, but blows.

Here they skirmish again.

MAYOR

Nought rests for me in this tumultuous strife 70
But to make open proclamation.
Come, officer, as loud as e'er thou canst,
Cry.

[OFFICER] All manner of men assembled here in arms this day against God's peace and the king's, we charge 75 and command you, in his highness' name, to repair^o
to your several^o dwelling places; and not to wear, handle, or use any sword, weapon, or dagger henceforward, upon pain^o of death.

GLOUCESTER

Cardinal, I'll be no breaker of the law, 80
But we shall meet, and break our minds at large.^o

WINCHESTER

Gloucester, we'll meet to thy cost, be sure:
Thy heart-blood I will have for this day's work.

MAYOR

I'll call for clubs,^o if you will not away.
This cardinal's more haughty than the devil. 85

GLOUCESTER

Mayor, farewell; thou dost but what thou mayst.

WINCHESTER

Abominable Gloucester, guard thy head,
For I intend to have it ere long. Exeunt.

MAYOR

See the coast cleared, and then we will depart.
Good God, these nobles should such stomachs bear!^o 90
I myself fight not once in forty year. Exeunt.

[Scene IV. Orleans.]

Enter the MASTER GUNNER of Orleans and his BOY.

MASTER GUNNER

Sirrah,^o thou know'st how Orleans is besieged,
And how the English have the suburbs won.

BOY

Father, I know, and oft have shot at them,
Howe'er, unfortunate, I missed my aim.

MASTER GUNNER

But now thou shalt not. Be thou ruled by me: 5
Chief master gunner am I of this town;
Something I must do to procure me grace.^o
The prince's espials^o have informèd me
How the English, in the suburbs close intrenched,
Went through a secret grate of iron bars 10
In yonder tower to overpeer^o the city
And thence discover how with most advantage
They may vex us with shot or with assault.
To intercept^o this inconvenience,
A piece of ordnance^o 'gainst it I have placed, 15
And even these three days have I watched
If I could see them. Now do thou watch,
For I can stay no longer.
If thou spy'st any, run and bring me word,
And thou shalt find me at the governor's. Exit. 20

BOY

Father, I warrant you, take you no care;
I'll never trouble you, if I may spy them. Exit.

Enter SALISBURY and TALBOT on the turrets, with [Sir William GLANSDALE, Sir Thomas GARGRAVE, and] others.

SALISBURY

Talbot, my life, my joy, again returned!
How wert thou handled, being prisoner?
Or by what means got's thou^o to be released? 25
Discourse,^o I prithee,^o on this turret's top.

TALBOT

The Earl of Bedford had a prisoner
Called the brave Lord Ponton de Santrailles;
For him was I exchanged and ransomèd.
But with a baser^o man of arms by far 30
Once in contempt they would have bartered me;
Which I disdainingly scorned and cravèd death
Rather than I would be so pilled-esteemed.^o
In fine,^o redeemed I was as I desired.
But O! the treacherous Falstaff wounds my heart, 35
Whom with my bare fists I would execute,
If I now had him brought into my power.

SALISBURY

Yet tell'st thou not how thou wert entertained.

TALBOT

With scoffs and scorns and contumelious taunts,
In open marketplace produced they me, 40
To be a public spectacle to all:
Here, said they, is the terror of the French,

 Then broke I from the officers that led me,
 And with my nails digged stones out of the ground 45
 To hurl at the beholders of my shame.
 My grisly° countenance made others fly;
 None durst come near for fear of sudden death.
 In iron walls they deemed me not secure;
 So great fear of my name 'mongst them were spread 50
 That they supposed I could rend bars of steel
 And spurn in pieces posts of adamant.°
 Wherefore a guard of chosen shot° I had
 That walked about me every minute while,°
 And if I did but stir out of my bed, 55
 Ready they were to shoot me to the heart.
Enter the BOY with a linstock.°

SALISBURY

I grieve to hear what torments you endured,
 But we will be revenged sufficiently.
 Now it is suppertime in Orleans;
 Here, through this grate, I count each one 60
 And view the Frenchmen how they fortify;
 Let us look in; the sight will much delight thee.
 Sir Thomas Gargrave, and Sir William Glansdale,
 Let me have your express° opinions
 Where is best place to make our batt'ry° next. 65

GARGRAVE

I think at the north gate, for there stands lords.

GLANSDALE

And I, here, at the bulwark° of the bridge.

TALBOT

For aught I see, this city must be famished,
 Or with light skirmishes enfeebled.°

Here they shoot, and SALISBURY [and GARGRAVE] fall down.

SALISBURY

O Lord, have mercy on us, wretched sinners! 70

GARGRAVE

O Lord, have mercy on me, woeful man!

TALBOT

What chance is this that suddenly hath crossed° us?
 Speak, Salisbury; at least, if thou canst speak,
 How far'st thou, mirror of° all martial men?
 One of thy eyes and thy cheek's side struck off! 75
 Accursèd tower! accursèd fatal hand°
 That hath contrived this woeful tragedy!
 In thirteen battles Salisbury o'ercame;
 Henry the Fifth he first trained to the wars;
 Whilst any trump° did sound, or drum struck up, 80
 His sword did ne'er leave striking in the field.
 Yet liv'st thou, Salisbury? Though thy speech doth fail,
 One eye thou hast, to look to heaven for grace.
 The sun with one eye vieweth all the world.
 Heaven, be thou gracious to none alive 85
 If Salisbury wants° mercy at thy hands!

Bear hence his body; I will help to bury it.
 Sir Thomas Gargrave, hast thou any life?
 Speak unto Talbot; nay, look up to him.
 Salisbury, cheer thy spirit with this comfort: 90
 Thou shalt not die whiles°—
 He beckons with his hand and smiles on me,
 As who° should say, "When I am dead and gone,
 Remember to avenge me on the French."
 Plantagenet,° I will; and like thee, [Nero,] 95
 Play on the lute, beholding the towns burn.
 Wretched shall France be only in° my name.

Here an alarum, and it thunders and lightens.

What stir° is this? What tumult's in the heavens?
 Whence cometh this alarum, and the noise?

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

My lord, my lord, the French have gathered head:° 100
 The Dolphin, with one Joan la Pucelle joined,
 A holy prophetess new risen up,
 Is come with a great power to raise the siege.

Here SALISBURY lifteth himself up and groans.

TALBOT

Hear, hear how dying Salisbury doth groan!
 It irks his heart he cannot be revenged. 105
 Frenchmen, I'll be a Salisbury to you.
 Pucelle or pussel,° Dolphin or dogfish,
 Your hearts I'll stamp out with my horse's heels,
 And make a quagmire of your mingled brains.
 Convey me° Salisbury into his tent, 110
 And then we'll try what these dastard Frenchmen dare.
Alarum. Exeunt.

[Scene V. Orleans.]

Here an alarum again, and TALBOT pursueth the DAUPHIN, and driveth him. Then enter Joan la PUCELLE, driving ENGLISHMEN before her [and exit after them]. Then [re-]enter TALBOT.

TALBOT

Where is my strength, my valor, and my force?
 Our English troops retire, I cannot stay them;
 A woman clad in armor chaseth them.

Enter [la] PUCELLE.

Here, here she comes. I'll have a bout with thee;
 Devil or devil's dam,° I'll conjure thee:° 5
 Blood will I draw on thee,° thou art a witch,
 And straightway give thy soul to him thou serv'st.

PUCELLE

Come, come, 'tis only° I that must disgrace thee.

TALBOT

Heavens, can you suffer hell so to prevail?
My breast I'll burst with straining of my courage
And from my shoulders crack my arms asunder,
But I will chastise this high-minded° strumpet.

They fight again.

PUCELLE

Talbot, farewell; thy hour is not yet come;
I must go victual° Orleans forthwith.°

A short alarum. Then enter the town with SOLDIERS.

O'ertake me if thou canst; I scorn thy strength.
Go, go, cheer up thy hungry-starvèd men;
Help Salisbury to make his testament;
This day is ours, as many more shall be.

Exit.

TALBOT

My thoughts are whirled like a potter's wheel;
I know not where I am, nor what I do.
A witch, by fear, not force, like Hannibal,°
Drives back our troops and conquers as she lists;°
So bees with smoke and doves with noisome stench
Are from their hives and houses driven away.
They called us for our fierceness English dogs;
Now, like to whelps,° we crying run away.

A short alarum.

Hark, countrymen! either renew the fight,
Or tear the lions° out of England's coat;
Renounce your soil,° give sheep in lions' stead:
Sheep run not half so treacherous° from the wolf,
Or horse or oxen from the leopard,
As you fly from your oft-subduèd slaves.

Alarum. Here another skirmish.

It will not be. Retire into your trenches.
You all consented unto Salisbury's death,
For none would strike a stroke in his revenge.
Pucelle is entered into Orleans
In spite of us or aught that we could do.
O, would I were to die with Salisbury!
The shame hereof will make me hide my head.

Exit TALBOT. Alarum. Retreat.°

[Scene VI. Orleans.]

Flourish. Enter on the walls [la] PUCELLE, DAUPHIN, REIGNIER, ALENÇON, and SOLDIERS.

PUCELLE

Advance° our waving colors on the walls;
Rescued is Orleans from the English.
Thus Joan la Pucelle hath performed her word.

DAUPHIN

Divinest creature, Astraea's daughter,°
How shall I honor thee for this success?
Thy promises are like Adonis'° garden
That one day bloomed and fruitful were the next.
France, triumph in thy glorious prophets!
Recovered is the town of Orleans;
More blessed hap° did ne'er befall our state.

REIGNIER

Why ring not out the bells aloud throughout the town?
Dolphin, command the citizens make bonfires
And feast and banquet in the open streets
To celebrate the joy that God hath given us.

ALENÇON

All France will be replete with mirth and joy
When they shall hear how we have played the men.°

DAUPHIN

'Tis Joan, not we, by whom the day is won;
For which I will divide my crown with her,
And all the priests and friars in my realm
Shall in procession sing her endless praise.
A statelier pyramis° to her I'll rear
Than Rhodope's° or Memphis' ever was.
In memory of her when she is dead,
Her ashes, in an urn more precious
Than the rich-jeweled coffer of Darius,°
Transported shall be at high festivals
Before the kings and queens of France.
No longer on Saint Denis° will we cry,
But Joan la Pucelle shall be France's saint.
Come in, and let us banquet royally,
After this golden day of victory.

Flourish. Exeunt.

ACT II

Scene I. [Orleans.]

Enter a [French] SERGEANT of a band, with two SEN-TINELS.

SERGEANT

Sirs, take your places and be vigilant;
If any noise or soldier you perceive
Near to the walls, by some apparent sign
Let us have knowledge at the court of guard.°

SENTINEL

Enter TALBOT, BEDFORD, and BURGUNDY, [and FORCES,] with scaling ladders, their drums beating a dead march.

TALBOT
Lord Regent, and redoubted° Burgundy,
By whose approach° the regions of Artois,
Wallon, and Picardy° are friends to us,
This happy night the Frenchmen are secure,°
Having all day caroused and banqueted;
Embrace we° then this opportunity
As fitting best to quittance° their deceit
Contrived by art° and baleful° sorcery.

BEDFORD
Coward of France! how much he wrongs his fame,
Despairing of his own arm's fortitude,
To join with witches and the help of hell.

BURGUNDY
Traitors have never other company.
But what's that Pucelle whom they term so pure?

TALBOT
A maid, they say.

BEDFORD A maid? And be so martial?

BURGUNDY
Pray God she prove not masculine° ere long,
If underneath the standard of the French
She carry armor as she hath begun.

TALBOT
Well, let them practice° and converse with spirits.
God is our fortress, in whose conquering name
Let us resolve to scale their flinty° bulwarks.

BEDFORD
Ascend, brave Talbot; we will follow thee.

TALBOT
Not all together: better far, I guess,
That we do make our entrance several° ways;
That, if it chance the one of us do fail,
The other yet may rise against their force.

BEDFORD
Agreed; I'll to yond° corner.

BURGUNDY And I to this.

TALBOT
And here will Talbot mount, or make his grave.
Now, Salisbury, for thee, and for the right
Of English Henry, shall this night appear
How much in duty I am bound to both.

SENTINEL
Arm! arm! the enemy doth make assault!

[The ENGLISH, scaling the walls,] cry, "St. George! a Talbot!" [and enter the town].

The FRENCH leap o'er the walls in their shirts. Enter several ways BASTARD, ALENÇON, REIGNIER, half ready,° and half unready.

ALENÇON
How now, my lords! what, all unready so?

BASTARD
Unready? Ay, and glad we 'scaped so well.

REIGNIER
'Twas time, I trow,° to wake and leave our beds,
Hearing alarums at our chamber doors.

ALENÇON
Of all exploits since first I followed arms,
Ne'er heard I of a warlike enterprise
More venturous or desperate than this.

BASTARD
I think this Talbot be a fiend of hell.

REIGNIER
If not of hell, the heavens, sure, favor him.

ALENÇON
Here cometh Charles; I marvel how he sped.°

Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN] and Joan [la PUCELLE].

BASTARD
Tut, holy Joan was his defensive guard.

DAUPHIN
Is this thy cunning,° thou deceitful dame?
Didst thou at first, to flatter us withal,°
Make us partakers of a little gain,
That now our loss might be ten times so much?

PUCELLE
Wherefore is Charles impatient with his friend?
At all times will you have my power alike?
Sleeping or waking must I still° prevail,
Or will you blame and lay the fault on me?
Improvident° soldiers! had your watch been good,
This sudden mischief never could have fall'n.

DAUPHIN
Duke of Alençon, this was your default,°
That, being captain of the watch tonight,
Did look no better to that weighty charge.°

ALENÇON
Had all your quarters been as safely kept
As that whereof I had the government,°
We had not been thus shamefully surprised.

BASTARD
Mine was secure.

REIGNIER And so was mine, my lord.

DAUPHIN
And, for myself, most part of all this night,
Within her quarter° and mine own precinct°
I was employed in passing to and fro,
About relieving of the sentinels.
Then how or which way should they first break in?

PUCELLE
Question, my lords, no further of the case,
How or which way; 'tis sure they found some place
But weakly guarded, where the breach was made.
And now there rests no other shift° but this,

8 redoubted distinguished 9 approach presence 9-10 Artios . . . Alarum. Enter an [English] SOLDIER, crying, "A Talbot! a Talbot!" They fly, leaving their clothes behind.

SOLDIER

I'll be so bold to take what they have left.
The cry of Talbot serves me for a sword,
For I have loaden me° with many spoils, 80
Using no other weapon but his name. Exit.

[Scene II. Orleans. Within the town.]

Enter TALBOT, BEDFORD, BURGUNDY, [a CAPTAIN, and others].

BEDFORD

The day begins to break, and night is fled,
Whose pitchy° mantle overveiled the earth.
Here sound retreat, and cease our hot pursuit. Retreat.

TALBOT

Bring forth the body of old Salisbury,
And here advance it° in the marketplace, 5
The middle center of this cursèd town.
Now have I paid my vow unto his soul;
For every drop of blood was drawn from him
There hath at least five Frenchmen died tonight.
And that hereafter ages may behold 10
What ruin happened in revenge of him,
Within their chiefest temple° I'll erect
A tomb, wherein his corpse shall be interred;
Upon the which, that everyone may read,
Shall be engraved the sack° of Orleans, 15
The treacherous manner of his mournful death,
And what a terror he had been to France.
But, lords, in all our bloody massacre,
I muse° we met not with the Dolphin's grace,°
His new-come champion, virtuous Joan of Arc, 20
Nor any of his false confederates.°

BEDFORD

'Tis thought, Lord Talbot, when the fight began,
Roused on the sudden from their drowsy beds,
They did amongst the troops of armèd men
Leap o'er the walls for refuge in the field. 25

BURGUNDY

Myself, as far as I could well discern
For° smoke and dusky vapors of the night,
Am sure I scared the Dolphin and his trull,°
When arm in arm they both came swiftly running, 30
Like to a pair of loving turtledoves
That could not live asunder day or night.
After that things are set in order here,
We'll follow them with all the power we have.

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

All hail, my lords! Which of this princely train°
Call ye the warlike Talbot, for his acts 35
So much applauded through the realm of France?

TALBOT

Here is the° Talbot; who would speak with him?

MESSENGER

The virtuous lady, Countess of Auvergne,
With modesty admiring thy renown, 40
By me entreats, great lord, thou wouldst vouchsafe°
To visit her poor castle where she lies,°
That she may boast she hath beheld the man
Whose glory fills the world with loud report.

BURGUNDY

Is it even so? Nay, then, I see our wars
Will turn unto a peaceful comic sport, 45
When ladies crave to be encountered° with.
You may not, my lord, despise her gentle suit.°

TALBOT

Ne'er trust me then; for when a world of men
Could not prevail with all their oratory,
Yet hath a woman's kindness overruled;° 50
And therefore tell her I return great thanks
And in submission° will attend on her.
Will not your honors bear me company?

BEDFORD

No, truly, 'tis more than manners will,°
And I have heard it said, unbidden° guests 55
Are often welcomest when they are gone.

TALBOT

Well then, alone, since there's no remedy,
I mean to prove this lady's courtesy.°
Come hither, captain. (Whispers.) You perceive my 15 mind?°

CAPTAIN

I do, my lord, and mean accordingly. Exeunt. 60

[Scene III. Auvergne. The countess' castle.]

Enter COUNTESS [and her PORTER].

COUNTESS

Porter, remember what I gave in charge,°
And when you have done so, bring the keys to me. 25

PORTER

Madam, I will. Exit.

COUNTESS

The plot is laid; if all things fall out right,
I shall as famous be by this exploit 30
As Scythian Tomyris° by Cyrus' death.

Enter MESSENGER and TALBOT.

MESSENGER

Madam,
According as your ladyship desired,
By message craved,° so is Lord Talbot come.

COUNTESS

And he is welcome. What! is this the man?

MESSENGER

Madam, it is.

COUNTESS Is this the scourge of France? 15

Is this the Talbot, so much feared abroad
That with his name the mothers still° their babes?

I see report is fabulous° and false.

I thought I should have seen some Hercules,

A second Hector, for his grim aspect° 20

And large proportion of his strong-knit° limbs.

Alas, this is a child, a silly° dwarf!

It cannot be this weak and writhled° shrimp

Should strike such terror to his enemies.

TALBOT

Madam, I have been bold to trouble you, 25

But since your ladyship is not at leisure,

I'll sort° some other time to visit you.

COUNTESS

What means he now? Go ask him whither he goes.

MESSENGER

Stay, my Lord Talbot, for my lady craves
To know the cause of your abrupt departure. 30

TALBOT

Marry,° for that° she's in a wrong belief,

I go to certify° her Talbot's here.

Enter PORTER with keys.

COUNTESS

If thou be he, then art thou prisoner.

TALBOT

Prisoner! to whom?

COUNTESS

To me, bloodthirsty lord;
And for that cause I trained° thee to my house. 35

Long time thy shadow hath been thrall to me,

For in my gallery thy picture° hangs.

But now the substance shall endure the like,

And I will chain these legs and arms of thine

That hast by tyranny these many years 40

Wasted our country, slain our citizens,

And sent our sons and husbands captivate.°

TALBOT Ha, ha, ha!

COUNTESS

Laughest thou, wretch? Thy mirth shall turn to moan.

TALBOT

I laugh to see your ladyship so fond° 45

To think that you have aught but Talbot's shadow

Whereon to practice your severity.°

COUNTESS

Why, art not thou the man?

TALBOT

I am indeed.

COUNTESS

Then have I substance too.

TALBOT

No, no, I am but shadow of myself: 50

You are deceived, my substance is not here,

For what you see is but the smallest part

And least proportion of humanity.

I tell you, madam, were the whole frame° here,

It is of such a spacious lofty pitch,° 55

Your roof were not sufficient to contain't.

COUNTESS

This is a riddling merchant° for the nonce;°

He will be here, and yet he is not here.

How can these contrarieties° agree?

TALBOT

That will I show you presently. 60

*Winds° his horn; drums strike up; a peal of ordnance;°
enter SOLDIERS.*

How say you, madam? Are you now persuaded

That Talbot is but shadow of himself? 25

These are his substance, sinews, arms, and strength,

With which he yoketh° your rebellious necks,

Razeth your cities and subverts° your towns, 65

And in a moment makes them desolate.

COUNTESS

Victorious Talbot, pardon my abuse;

I find thou art no less than fame hath bruited°

And more than may be gathered by thy shape.

Let my presumption not provoke thy wrath, 70

For I am sorry that with reverence°

I did not entertain thee as thou art.

TALBOT

Be not dismayed, fair lady, nor misconster°

The mind of Talbot, as you did mistake

The outward composition° of his body. 75

What you have done hath not offended me,

Nor other satisfaction do I crave,

But only, with your patience, that we may

[Scene IV. London. The Temple garden.°]

Enter Richard PLANTAGENET, WARWICK, SOMERSET, [William de la] Pole [Earl of SUFFOLK, VERNON, and another LAWYER].

PLANTAGENET

Great lords and gentlemen, what means this silence?
Dare no man answer in a case of truth?

SUFFOLK

Within the Temple hall we were too loud;
The garden here is more convenient.

PLANTAGENET

Then say at once if I maintained the truth;
Or else was wrangling° Somerset in th' error?

SUFFOLK

Faith,° I have been a truant° in the law,
And never yet could frame° my will to it,
And therefore frame° the law unto my will.

SOMERSET

Judge you, my Lord of Warwick, then, between us. 10

WARWICK

Between two hawks, which flies the higher pitch;
Between two dogs, which hath the deeper mouth;°
Between two blades, which bears the better temper;
Between two horses, which doth bear him° best;
Between two girls, which hath the merriest eye— 15
I have perhaps some shallow spirit° of judgment;
But in these nice sharp quilllets° of the law,
Good faith, I am no wiser than a daw.°

PLANTAGENET

Tut, tut, here is a mannerly forbearance.
The truth appears so naked on my side 20
That any purblind° eye may find it out.

SOMERSET

And on my side it is so well appareled,°
So clear, so shining, and so evident,
That it will glimmer through a blind man's eye.

PLANTAGENET

Since you are tongue-tied and so loath to speak, 25
In dumb significant° proclaim your thoughts:
Let him that is a true-born gentleman
And stands upon° the honor of his birth,
If he suppose that I have pleaded truth,
From off this brier pluck a white rose with me. 30

SOMERSET

Let him that is no coward nor no flatterer,
But dare maintain the party of the truth,
Pluck a red rose from off this thorn with me.

WARWICK

I love no colors;° and without all color
Of base insinuating flattery 35
I pluck this white rose with Plantagenet.

SUFFOLK

I pluck this red rose with young Somerset
And say withal° I think he held the right.

VERNON

Stay, lords and gentlemen, and pluck no more
Till you conclude that he upon whose side 40
The fewest roses are cropped° from the tree
Shall yield the other in the right opinion.

SOMERSET

Good Master Vernon, it is well objected;°
If I have fewest, I subscribe in silence.

PLANTAGENET And I. 45

VERNON

Then for the truth and plainness of the case,
I pluck this pale and maiden° blossom here,
Giving my verdict on the white rose side.

SOMERSET

Prick not your finger as you pluck it off,
Lest bleeding you do paint the white rose red 50
And fall on my side so against your will.

VERNON

If I, my lord, for my opinion bleed,
Opinion shall be surgeon to my hurt
And keep me on the side where still I am.

SOMERSET

Well, well, come on, who else? 55

LAWYER

Unless my study and my books be false,
The argument you held was wrong in you;
In sign whereof I pluck a white rose too.

PLANTAGENET

Now, Somerset, where is your argument? 20

SOMERSET

Here is my scabbard, meditating° that 60
Shall dye your white rose in a bloody red.

PLANTAGENET

Meantime your cheeks do counterfeit° our roses,
For pale they look with fear, as witnessing
The truth on our side.

SOMERSET

No, Plantagenet, 65
'Tis not for fear, but anger that thy cheeks
Blush for pure shame to counterfeit our roses,
And yet thy tongue will not confess thy error.

PLANTAGENET

Hath not thy rose a canker,° Somerset? 30

SOMERSET

Hath not thy rose a thorn, Plantagenet?

PLANTAGENET

Ay, sharp and piercing, to maintain his truth 70
Whiles thy consuming canker eats his falsehood.

SOMERSET

Well, I'll find friends to wear my bleeding roses,
That shall maintain what I have said is true
Where false Plantagenet dare not be seen.

PLANTAGENET

Now, by this maiden blossom in my hand, 75
I scorn thee and thy fashion,° peevish boy.

SUFFOLK
Turn not thy scorns this way, Plantagenet.

PLANTAGENET
Proud Pole, I will, and scorn both him and thee.

SUFFOLK
I'll turn my part thereof into thy throat.

SOMERSET
Away, away, good William de la Pole! 80
We grace the yeoman° by conversing with him.

WARWICK
Now, by God's will, thou wrong'st him, Somerset;
His grandfather° was Lionel Duke of Clarence,
Third son to the third Edward King of England:
Spring crestless° yeomen from so deep a root? 85

PLANTAGENET
He bears him on the place's privilege,°
Or durst not, for his craven heart, say thus.

SOMERSET
By him that made me, I'll maintain my words
On any plot of ground in Christendom.
Was not thy father, Richard Earl of Cambridge, 90
For treason executed in our late king's days?
And, by his treason, stand'st not thou attainted,
Corrupted, and exempt from ancient gentry?°
His trespass° yet lives guilty in thy blood,
And, till thou be restored, thou art a yeoman.° 95

PLANTAGENET
My father was attachèd,° not attainted,
Condemned to die for treason, but no traitor;
And that I'll prove° on better men than Somerset,
Were growing time once ripened to my will.°
For your partaker° Pole and you yourself, 100
I'll note you in my book of memory
To scourge you for this apprehension.°
Look to it well and say you are well warned.

SOMERSET
Ah, thou shalt find us ready for thee still,
And know us by these colors for thy foes, 105
For these my friends in spite of thee shall wear.

PLANTAGENET
And, by my soul, this pale and angry rose,
As cognizance° of my blood-drinking° hate,
Will I forever and my faction wear
Until it wither with me to my grave 110
Or flourish to the height of my degree.°

SUFFOLK
Go forward and be choked with thy ambition!
And so farewell until I meet thee next. Exit.

SOMERSET
Have with thee,° Pole. Farewell, ambitious Richard. Exit.

Shall be whipped° out in the next parliament
Called for the truce of Winchester and Gloucester,
And if thou be not then created York,°
I will not live to be accounted° Warwick. 120
Meantime, in signal of my love to thee,
Against proud Somerset and William Pole,
Will I upon thy party° wear this rose.
And here I prophesy: this brawl° today,
Grown to this faction in the Temple garden, 125
Shall send, between the red rose and the white,
A thousand souls to death and deadly night.

PLANTAGENET
Good Master Vernon, I am bound to you
That you on my behalf would pluck a flower.

VERNON
In your behalf still will I wear the same. 130

LAWYER
And so will I.

PLANTAGENET
Thanks, gentle [sir].
Come, let us four to dinner: I dare say
This quarrel will drink blood° another day. Exeunt.

[Scene V. The Tower of London.]

Enter MORTIMER, brought in a chair, and JAILERS.

100 MORTIMER
Kind keepers of my weak decaying age,
Let dying Mortimer here rest himself.
Even like a man new halèd from the rack,°
So fare my limbs with long imprisonment,
And these gray locks, the pursuivants° of death, 5
Nestor-like° agèd in an age of care,
Argue° the end of Edmund Mortimer.
These eyes, like lamps whose wasting° oil is spent,
Wax° dim, as drawing to their exigent;°
Weak shoulders, overborne with burthening° grief, 10
And pithless° arms, like to a withered vine
That droops his sapless branches to the ground. 110
Yet are these feet, whose strengthless stay° is numb,
Unable to support this lump of clay,
Swift-wingèd with desire to get a grave, 15
As witting I no other comfort have.
But tell me, keeper, will my nephew come?

FIRST JAILER
Richard Plantagenet, my lord, will come:
We sent unto the Temple, unto his chamber,
And answer was returned that he will come. 20

MORTIMER

Enough; my soul shall then be satisfied.
 Poor gentleman! his wrong doth equal mine.
 Since Henry Monmouth^o first began to reign,
 Before whose glory I was great in arms,
 This loathsome sequestration^o have I had;
 And even since then hath Richard been obscured,^o
 Deprived of honor and inheritance.
 But now the arbitrator of despairs,
 Just death, kind umpire^o of men's miseries,
 With sweet enlargement^o doth dismiss me hence.
 I would his^o troubles likewise were expired,
 That so he might recover what was lost.

Enter Richard [PLANTAGENET].

FIRST JAILER

My lord, your loving nephew now is come.

MORTIMER

Richard Plantagenet, my friend, is he come?

PLANTAGENET

Ay, noble uncle, thus ignobly used,
 Your nephew, late despised^o Richard, comes.

MORTIMER

Direct mine arms I may^o embrace his neck
 And in his bosom spend my latter gasp.^o
 O, tell me when my lips do touch his cheeks,
 That I may kindly give one fainting kiss.
 And now declare, sweet stem from York's great stock,^o
 Why didst thou say, of late thou wert despised?

PLANTAGENET

First, lean thine agèd back against mine arm,
 And, in that ease, I'll tell thee my disease.^o
 This day, in argument upon a case,
 Some words there grew 'twixt Somerset and me;
 Among which terms he used his lavish^o tongue
 And did upbraid^o me with my father's death:
 Which obloquy^o set bars before my tongue,
 Else with the like I had requited^o him.
 Therefore, good uncle, for my father's sake,
 In honor of a true Plantagenet,
 And for alliance' sake, declare the cause^o
 My father, Earl of Cambridge, lost his head.

MORTIMER

That cause, fair nephew, that imprisoned me
 And hath detained me all my flow'ring^o youth
 Within a loathsome dungeon, there to pine,
 Was cursèd instrument of his decease.

PLANTAGENET

Discover^o more at large what cause that was,
 For I am ignorant and cannot guess.

MORTIMER

I will, if that my fading breath permit
 And death approach not ere my tale be done.
 Henry the Fourth, grandfather to this king,

Deposed his nephew^o Richard, Edward's son,
 The first-begotten and the lawful heir
 Of Edward king, the third of that descent:^o
 During whose reign the Percies^o of the north,
 Finding his usurpation most unjust,
 Endeavored my advancement to the throne.
 The reason moved^o these warlike lords to this
 Was, for that—young^o Richard thus removed,
 Leaving no heir begotten of his body—
 I was the next by birth and parentage:
 For by my mother^o I derivèd^o am
 From Lionel Duke of Clarence, third son
 To King Edward the Third; whereas he
 From John of Gaunt doth bring his pedigree,
 Being but fourth of that heroic line.
 But mark:^o as in this haughty^o great attempt
 They laborèd to plant the rightful heir,
 I lost my liberty and they their lives.
 Long after this, when Henry the Fifth,
 Succeeding his father Bolingbroke, did reign,
 Thy father, Earl of Cambridge, then derived
 From famous Edmund Langley, Duke of York,
 Marrying my sister that thy mother was,
 Again, in pity of my hard distress,
 Levied an army, weening to redeem
 And have installed me in the diadem;^o
 But, as the rest, so fell that noble earl
 And was beheaded. Thus the Mortimers,
 In whom the title rested, were suppressed.

PLANTAGENET

Of which, my lord, your honor is the last.

MORTIMER

True; and thou see'st that I no issue have
 And that my fainting words do warrant^o death.
 Thou art my heir; the rest I wish thee gather,^o
 But yet be wary in thy studious care.^o

PLANTAGENET

Thy grave admonishments prevail with me,
 But yet, methinks, my father's execution
 Was nothing less than bloody tyranny.

MORTIMER

With silence, nephew, be thou politic:
 Strong-fixèd is the house of Lancaster,
 And like a mountain, not to be removed.
 But now thy uncle is removing hence,
 As princes do their courts, when they are cloyed^o
 With long continuance in a settled place.

PLANTAGENET

O, uncle, would some part of my young years
 Might but redeem the passage^o of your age!

MORTIMER

Thou dost then wrong me, as that slaughterer doth
Which giveth many wounds when one will kill. 110
Mourn not, except thou sorrow for my good;
Only give order° for my funeral.
And so farewell, and fair be all thy hopes,
And prosperous be thy life in peace and war! Dies.

PLANTAGENET

And peace, no war, befall thy parting soul! 115
In prison hast thou spent a pilgrimage°
And like a hermit overpassed° thy days.
Well, I will lock his counsel in my breast,
And what I do imagine, let that rest.
Keepers, convey him hence, and I myself 120
Will see his burial better than his life.°

[Exeunt JAILERS with the body of Mortimer.]

Here dies the dusky° torch of Mortimer,
Choked with ambition of the meaner sort.°
And for those wrongs, those bitter injuries
Which Somerset hath offered to my house, 125
I doubt not but with honor to redress.°
And therefore haste I to the parliament,
Either to be restored to my blood,
Or make my will th' advantage of my good.° Exit.

Scene I. [London. The parliament house.]

*Flourish. Enter KING, EXETER, GLOUCESTER, WINCHESTER, WARWICK, SOMERSET, SUFFOLK,
Richard PLANTAGENET. GLOUCESTER offers to put up a bill;° WINCHESTER snatches it, tears it.*

WINCHESTER

Com'st thou with deep premeditated lines,°
With written pamphlets studiously devised?
Humphrey of Gloucester, if thou canst accuse
Or aught intend'st to lay unto my charge,
Do it without invention,° suddenly, 5
As I with sudden and extemporal° speech
Purpose to answer what thou canst object.

GLOUCESTER

Presumptuous priest! this place commands my patience,
Or thou shouldst find thou hast dishonored me.
Think not, although in writing I preferred° 10
The manner of thy vile outrageous crimes,

That therefore I have forged,° or am not able Verbatim to rehearse the method of my pen.°
No, prelate, such is thy audacious wickedness,
Thy lewd, pestiferous, and dissentious pranks,° 15
As very° infants prattle of thy pride.
Thou art a most pernicious usurer,°
Froward° by nature, enemy to peace,
Lascivious, wanton, more than well beseems°
A man of thy profession and degree. 20
And for thy treachery, what's more manifest?
In that thou laid'st a trap to take my life,
As well at London Bridge as at the Tower.
Beside, I fear me, if thy thoughts were sifted,°
The king, thy sovereign, is not quite exempt 25
From envious malice of thy swelling° heart.

WINCHESTER

Gloucester, I do defy thee. Lords, vouchsafe
To give me hearing what I shall reply.
If I were covetous, ambitious, or perverse,
As he will have me,° how am I so poor? 30
Or how haps it° I seek not to advance
Or raise myself, but keep my wonted calling?°
And for dissension, who preferreth peace
More than I do?—except I be provoked.
No, my good lords, it is not that offends; 35
It is not that that hath incensed° the duke:
It is, because no one should sway° but he,
No one but he should be about the king,
And that engenders thunder in his breast
And makes him roar these accusations forth. 40
But he shall know I am as good—

GLOUCESTER

As good?

Thou bastard° of my grandfather!

WINCHESTER

Ay, lordly° sir; for what are you, I pray,
But one imperious° in another's throne?

GLOUCESTER

Am I not protector, saucy priest? 45

WINCHESTER

And am not I a prelate of the church?

GLOUCESTER

Yes, as an outlaw in a castle keeps
And useth it to patronage° his theft.

WINCHESTER

Unreverent Gloucester!

GLOUCESTER

Thou art reverent 50
Touching thy spiritual function,° not thy life.

WINCHESTER

Rome shall remedy this.

 Methinks my lord^o should be religious
 And know the office^o that belongs to such.

55

WARWICK

Methinks his lordship^o should be humbler;
 It fitteth not a prelate so to plead.

SOMERSET

Yes, when his holy state is touched so near.^o

WARWICK

State holy or unhallowed,^o what of that?
 Is not his grace^o protector to the king?

60

PLANTAGENET [Aside.]

Plantagenet, I see, must hold his tongue,
 Lest it be said, "Speak, sirrah, when you should;
 Must your bold verdict^o enter talk with lords?"
 Else would I have a fling at^o Winchester.

KING

Uncles of Gloucester and of Winchester,
 The special watchmen^o of our English weal,^o
 I would prevail, if prayers might prevail,
 To join your hearts in love and amity.
 O, what a scandal is it to our crown,
 That two such noble peers as ye should jar!
 Believe me, lords, my tender years can tell
 Civil dissension is a viperous worm^o
 That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth.

65

A noise within, "Down with the tawny coats!"

What tumult's this?

WARWICK

An uproar, I dare warrant,^o
 Begun through malice of the bishop's men.

75

A noise again, "Stones! stones!" Enter MAYOR.

MAYOR

O my good lords, and virtuous Henry,
 Pity the city of London, pity us!
 The bishop^o and the Duke of Gloucester's men,
 Forbidden late^o to carry any weapon,
 Have filled their pockets full of pebble stones
 And banding themselves in contrary parts^o
 Do pelt so fast at one another's pate^o
 That many have their giddy^o brains knocked out.
 Our windows are broke down in every street,
 And we for fear compelled to shut our shops.

80

85

Enter [SERVINGMEN of Gloucester and Winchester] in skirmish, with bloody pates.

KING

We charge you, on allegiance to ourself,
 To hold your slaught'ring hands and keep the peace.
 Pray, uncle Gloucester, mitigate^o this strife.

FIRST SERVINGMAN Nay, if we be forbidden stones, we'll fall to it with our teeth.

90

SECOND SERVINGMAN Do what ye dare, we are as resolute.

Skirmish again.

GLOUCESTER

You of my household, leave this peevish broil
 And set this unaccustomed^o fight aside.

THIRD SERVINGMAN

My lord, we know your grace to be a man
 Just and upright; and, for your royal birth,
 Inferior to none but to his majesty,
 And ere that we will suffer^o such a prince,
 So kind a father of the commonweal,
 To be disgracèd by an inkhorn mate,^o
 We and our wives and children all will fight
 And have our bodies slaughtered by thy foes.

100

FIRST SERVINGMAN

Ay, and the very parings of our nails
 Shall pitch a field^o when we are dead. Begin again.

GLOUCESTER

Stay, stay, I say!

And if you love me, as you say you do,
 Let me persuade you to forbear awhile.

105

KING

O, how this discord doth afflict my soul!
 Can you, my Lord of Winchester, behold
 My sighs and tears and will not once relent?
 Who should be pitiful, if you be not?
 Or who should study^o to prefer a peace,
 If holy churchmen take delight in broils?

110

WARWICK

Yield, my Lord Protector; yield, Winchester,
 Except^o you mean with obstinate repulse^o
 To slay your sovereign and destroy the realm.
 You see what mischief and what murder too
 Hath been enacted through your enmity;
 Then be at peace, except ye thirst for blood.

115

WINCHESTER

He shall submit, or I will never yield.

GLOUCESTER

Compassion on the king commands me stoop;
 Or I would see his heart out ere the priest
 Should ever get that privilege^o of me.

120

WARWICK

Behold, my Lord of Winchester, the duke
 Hath banished moody discontented fury,
 As by his smoothèd brows it doth appear:
 Why look you still so stern and tragical?^o

125

GLOUCESTER

Here, Winchester, I offer thee my hand.

KING

Fie, uncle Beaufort! I have heard you preach
 That malice was a great and grievous sin,
 And will not you maintain the thing you teach,
 But prove a chief offender in the same?

See here, my friends and loving countrymen;

Betwixt ourselves and all our followers.

WINCHESTER [Aside.]

Which in the right of Richard Plantagenet
We do exhibit to your majesty.

GLOUCESTER

Well urged, my Lord of Warwick: for, sweet prince,
And if° your grace mark° every circumstance,
You have great reason to do Richard right,
Especially for those occasions°
At Eltham Place I told your majesty.

KING

And those occasions, uncle, were of force.
Therefore, my loving lords, our pleasure is
That Richard be restored to his blood.°

WARWICK

Let Richard be restored to his blood;
So shall his father's wrongs be recompensed.

WINCHESTER

As will the rest, so willeth Winchester.

KING

If Richard will be true, not that all alone
But all the whole inheritance I give
That doth belong unto the house of York,
From whence you spring by lineal descent.

PLANTAGENET

Thy humble servant vows obedience
And humble service till the point of death.

KING

Stoop then and set your knee against my foot,
And in reguerdon° of that duty done,
I girt° thee with the valiant sword of York.
Rise, Richard, like a true Plantagenet,
And rise created princely Duke of York.

PLANTAGENET

And so thrive Richard as thy foes may fall! 175
And as my duty springs, so perish they
That grudge one thought° against your majesty!

ALL

Welcome, high prince, the mighty Duke of York!

SOMERSET [Aside.]

Perish, base prince, ignoble Duke of York!

GLOUCESTER

Now will it best avail your majesty 180
To cross the seas and to be crowned in France:
The presence of a king engenders love
Amongst his subjects and his loyal friends,
As it disanimates° his enemies.

KING

When Gloucester says the word, King Henry goes, 185
For friendly counsel cuts off many foes.

GLOUCESTER

Your ships already are in readiness. 145
Sennet.° Flourish. Exeunt. Manet° EXETER.

EXETER

Ay, we may march in England or in France,
Not seeing what is likely to ensue.
This late dissension grown betwixt the peers 190
Burns under feignèd ashes of forged° love
And will at last break out into a flame;
As festered members° rot but by degree°
Till bones and flesh and sinews fall away,
So will this base and envious discord breed. 195
And now I fear that fatal prophecy
Which in the time of Henry named the Fifth
Was in the mouth of every sucking° babe,
That Henry born at Monmouth should win all 200
And Henry born at Windsor lose all:
Which is so plain that Exeter doth wish
His days may finish ere that hapless time. Exit.

[Scene II. France. Before Rouen.]

Enter [la] PUCELLE, disguised, with four SOLDIERS with sacks upon their backs.

PUCELLE

These are the city gates, the gates of Rouen,
Through which our policy° must make a breach.
Take heed, be wary how you place your words; 165
Talk like the vulgar° sort of market men°
That come to gather money for their corn.° 5
If we have entrance, as I hope we shall,
And that we find the slothful watch but weak,
I'll by a sign give notice to our friends
That Charles the Dolphin may encounter° them.

WATCHMAN [Within.] Qui est là?°

PUCELLE

Paysans là, pauvres gens de France:°
Poor market folks that come to sell their corn. 15

WATCHMAN

Enter, go in, the market bell is rung.

PUCELLE

Now, Rouen, I'll shake thy bulwarks to the ground.
Exeunt.

Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], BASTARD, ALENÇON, [REIGNIER, and FORCES].

DAUPHIN

Saint Denis bless this happy stratagem,
And once again we'll sleep secure in Rouen!

BASTARD

Here entered Pucelle and her practisants.° 20
Now she is there, how will she specify:
Here is the best and safest passage in?

REIGNIER

By thrusting out a torch from yonder tower,
Which, once discerned, shows that her meaning is:
No way to° that, for weakness, which she entered. 25

Enter [la] PUCELLE on the top, thrusting out a torch burning.

PUCELLE

Behold, this is the happy wedding torch
That joineth Rouen unto her countrymen,
But burning fatal to the Talbonites!° [Exit.]

BASTARD

See, noble Charles, the beacon of our friend,
The burning torch, in yonder turret stands. 30

DAUPHIN

Now shine it° like a comet of revenge,
A prophet to the fall of all our foes!

REIGNIER

Defer° no time, delays have dangerous ends;
Enter and cry, "The Dolphin!" presently,
And then do execution on the watch. 35

Alarum. [Exeunt.]

An alarum. TALBOT in an excursion.°

TALBOT

France, thou shalt rue this treason with thy tears,
If Talbot but survive thy treachery.
Pucelle, that witch, that damnèd sorceress,
Hath wrought this hellish mischief unawares,
That hardly we escaped the pride° of France. Exit. 40

*An alarum: excursions. BEDFORD, brought in sick in a chair. Enter TALBOT and BURGUNDY without: within

Good morrow, gallants!° Want ye corn for bread?
I think the Duke of Burgundy will fast
Before he'll buy again at such a rate.
'Twas full of darnel;° do you like the taste?

BURGUNDY

Scoff on, vile fiend and shameless courtesan!° 45
I trust ere long to choke thee with thine own
And make thee curse the harvest of that corn.

DAUPHIN

Your grace may starve perhaps before that time.

BEDFORD

O, let no words, but deeds, revenge this treason!

PUCELLE

What will you do, good graybeard? Break a lance, 50
And run atilt at° death within a chair?

TALBOT

Foul fiend of France, and hag of all despite,° Encompassed° with thy lustful paramours!°
Becomes it thee to taunt his valiant age
And twit° with cowardice a man half dead? 55
Damsel,° I'll have a bout with you again,
Or else let Talbot perish with this shame.

PUCELLE

Are ye so hot,° sir? Yet, Pucelle, hold thy peace;
If Talbot do but thunder, rain will follow.

God speed the parliament! who shall be the speaker?° 60

TALBOT

Dare ye come forth and meet us in the field?

PUCELLE

Belike° your lordship takes us then for fools,
To try if that our own be ours or no.

TALBOT

I speak not to that railing Hecate,°
But unto thee, Alençon, and the rest. 65
Will ye, like soldiers, come and fight it out?

ALENÇON Signior,° no.

TALBOT

Signior, hang! base muleters° of France!
Like peasant footboys° do they keep the walls
And dare not take up arms like gentlemen. 70

PUCELLE

Away, captains! let's get us from the walls;
For Talbot means no goodness by his looks.
Good-by, my lord! we came but to tell you
That we are here. Exeunt from the walls.

TALBOT

And there will we be too, ere it be long, 75
Or else reproach be Talbot's greatest fame.

 So sure I swear to get° the town or die.

BURGUNDY

My vows are equal partners with thy vows.

TALBOT

But, ere we go, regard° this dying prince,
 The valiant Duke of Bedford. Come, my lord,
 We will bestow you in some better place,
 Fitter for sickness and for crazy° age.

BEDFORD

Lord Talbot, do not so dishonor me;
 Here will I sit before the walls of Rouen
 And will be partner of your weal or woe.°

BURGUNDY

Courageous Bedford, let us now persuade you.

BEDFORD

Not to be gone from hence, for once I read
 That stout Pendragon° in his litter° sick
 Came to the field and vanquishèd his foes.
 Methinks I should revive the soldiers' hearts,
 Because I ever found them as myself.

TALBOT

Undaunted spirit in a dying breast!
 Then be it so: heavens keep old Bedford safe!
 And now no more ado, brave Burgundy,
 But gather we our forces out of hand
 And set upon our boasting enemy.

[Exeunt all but BEDFORD and his ATTENDANTS.]

An alarum: excursions.° Enter Sir John FALSTAFF and a CAPTAIN.

CAPTAIN

Whither away, Sir John Falstaff, in such haste?

FALSTAFF

Whither away? To save myself by flight;
 We are like to have the overthrow° again.

CAPTAIN

What! Will you fly, and leave Lord Talbot?

FALSTAFF

All the Talbots in the world, to save my life. Exit.

CAPTAIN

Cowardly knight, ill fortune follow thee! Exit.

Retreat. Excursions. [La] PUCELLE, ALENÇON, and Charles [the DAUPHIN enter and] fly.

BEDFORD

Now, quiet soul, depart when heaven please,
 For I have seen our enemies' overthrow.
 What is the trust or strength of foolish man?
 They that of late were daring with their scoffs
 Are glad and fain° by flight to save themselves.

BEDFORD dies and is carried in by two in his chair.

80 TALBOT

Lost, and recovered in a day again!
 This is a double honor, Burgundy;
 Yet heavens have glory for this victory!

BURGUNDY

Warlike and martial Talbot, Burgundy
 Enshrines thee in his heart and there erects
 Thy noble deeds as valor's monuments.

TALBOT

Thanks, gentle duke. But where is Pucelle now?
 I think her old familiar° is asleep.
 Now where's the Bastard's braves,° and Charles his gleeks?°

90

What, all amort?° Rouen hangs her head for grief
 That such a valiant company are fled.

Now will we take some order° in the town,
 Placing therein some expert° officers,
 And then depart to Paris to the king,
 For there young Henry with his nobles lie.°

BURGUNDY

95

What wills Lord Talbot pleaseth Burgundy.

TALBOT

But yet, before we go, let's not forget
 The noble Duke of Bedford, late deceased,
 But see his exequies° fulfilled in Rouen.
 A braver soldier never couchèd° lance,
 A gentler° heart did never sway° in court.
 But kings and mightiest potentates must die,
 For that's the end of human misery. Exeunt.

135

Scene III. [The plains near Rouen.]

Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], BASTARD, ALENÇON, [la] PUCELLE, [and FORCES].

PUCELLE

105

Dismay not, princes, at this accident,
 Nor grieve that Rouen is so recoverèd.
 Care is no cure, but rather corrosive,°
 For things that are not to be remedied.
 Let frantic° Talbot triumph for a while
 And like a peacock sweep along his tail;
 We'll pull° his plumes and take away his train,°
 If Dolphin and the rest will be but ruled.°

5

DAUPHIN

We have been guided by thee hitherto
 And of thy cunning had no diffidence;°
 One sudden foil° shall never breed distrust.

10

 And we will make thee famous through the world.

And have thee reverenced like a blessed saint.
Employ thee° then, sweet virgin, for our good.

PUCELLE

Then thus it must be; this doth Joan devise:°
By fair persuasions mixed with sugared° words
We will entice the Duke of Burgundy
To leave the Talbot and to follow us.

DAUPHIN

Ay, marry, sweeting,° if we could do that,
France were no place for Henry's warriors,
Nor should that nation boast it so with° us,
But be extirpèd° from our provinces.

ALENÇON

Forever should they be expelled° from France
And not have title of° an earldom here.

PUCELLE

Your honors shall perceive how I will work
To bring this matter to the wishèd end.

Drum sounds afar off.

Hark! by the sound of drum you may perceive
Their powers are marching unto Paris-ward.°

Here sound an English march.

There goes the Talbot, with his colors spread,°
And all the troops of English after him.

French march. [Enter the Duke of BURGUNDY and FORCES.]

Now in the rearward comes the duke and his;
Fortune in favor° makes him lag behind.
Summon a parley; we will talk with him.

Trumpets sound a parley.

DAUPHIN

A parley with the Duke of Burgundy!

BURGUNDY

Who craves a parley with the Burgundy?

PUCELLE

The princely Charles of France, thy countryman.

BURGUNDY

What say'st thou, Charles? For I am marching hence.

DAUPHIN

Speak, Pucelle, and enchant him with thy words.

PUCELLE

Brave Burgundy, undoubted hope of France!
Stay, let thy humble handmaid speak to thee.

BURGUNDY

Speak on, but be not overtedious.

PUCELLE

Look on thy country, look on fertile France,
And see the cities and the towns defaced
By wasting ruin of the cruel foe,
As looks the mother on her lowly babe
When death doth close his tender-dying° eyes.
See, see the pining° malady of France;

15

Behold the wounds, the most unnatural wounds,
Which thou thyself has given her woeful breast.
O, turn thy edged° sword another way;
Strike those that hurt, and hurt not those that help.
One drop of blood drawn from thy country's bosom
Should grieve thee more than streams of foreign gore.
Return thee therefore with a flood of tears,
And wash away thy country's stained° spots.

50

BURGUNDY

Either she hath bewitched me with her words,
Or nature makes me suddenly relent.

PUCELLE

Besides, all French and France exclaims on° thee,
Doubting thy birth and lawful progeny.°
Who join'st thou with, but with a lordly° nation
That will not trust thee but for profit's sake?
When Talbot hath set footing° once in France
And fashioned thee° that instrument of ill,
Who then but English Henry will be lord,
And thou be thrust out like a fugitive?
Call we to mind, and mark but this for proof:
Was not the Duke of Orleans thy foe?
And was he not in England prisoner?
But when they heard he was thine enemy,
They set him free without his ransom paid,
In spite of Burgundy and all his friends.
See then, thou fight'st against thy countrymen
And join'st with them will be thy slaughtermen.°
Come, come, return; return, thou wandering lord;
Charles and the rest will take thee in their arms.

60

65

70

75

BURGUNDY

I am vanquishèd; these haughty° words of hers
Have battered me like roaring cannon-shot,
And made me almost yield upon my knees.
Forgive me, country, and sweet countrymen,
And, lords, accept this hearty kind° embrace.
My forces and my power of men° are yours.
So farewell, Talbot; I'll no longer trust thee.

80

PUCELLE [Aside.]

Done like a Frenchman: turn and turn again!°

85

DAUPHIN

Welcome, brave duke! thy friendship makes us fresh.°

BASTARD

And doth beget new courage in our breasts.

ALENÇON

Pucelle hath bravely played her part in this,
And doth deserve a coronet° of gold.

DAUPHIN

Now let us on, my lords, and join our powers,
And seek how we may prejudice° the foe. Exeunt.

Scene IV. [Paris. The palace.]

Enter the KING, GLOUCESTER, WINCHESTER, YORK, SUFFOLK, SOMERSET, WARWICK, EXETER, [VERNON, BASSET, and others]. To them, with his SOLDIERS, TALBOT.

TALBOT

My gracious prince, and honorable peers,
Hearing of your arrival in this realm,
I have awhile given truce unto my wars
To do my duty to my sovereign.
In sign whereof, this arm, that hath reclaimed^o 5
To your obedience fifty fortresses,
Twelve cities, and seven walled towns of strength,
Beside five hundred prisoners of esteem,^o
Lets fall his sword before your highness' feet,
And with submissive loyalty of heart 10
Ascribes the glory of his conquest got
First to my God and next unto your grace.

KING

Is this the Lord Talbot, uncle Gloucester,
That hath so long been resident in France?

GLOUCESTER

Yes, if it please your majesty, my liege.^o 15

KING

Welcome, brave captain and victorious lord!
When I was young (as yet I am not old)
I do remember^o how my father said
A stouter champion never handled sword.
Long since we were resolvèd of your truth,^o 20
Your faithful service, and your toil in war;
Yet never have you tasted our reward
Or been reguerdoned^o with so much as thanks,
Because till now we never saw your face.
Therefore, stand up, and for these good deserts 25
We here create you Earl of Shrewsbury,
And in our coronation take your place.
Sennet. Flourish. Exeunt. Manet^o VERNON and BASSET.

VERNON

Now, sir, to you, that were so hot^o at sea,
Disgracing of^o these colors that I wear
In honor of my noble Lord of York— 30
Dar'st thou maintain the former words thou spak'st?

BASSET

Yes, sir, as well as you dare patronage^o
The envious barking of your saucy tongue
Against my lord the Duke of Somerset.

VERNON

Sirrah, thy lord I honor as he is. 35

BASSET

Why, what is he? As good a man as York.

VERNON

Hark ye, not so: in witness,^o take ye that.

Strikes him.

BASSET

Villain, thou knowest the law of arms is such
That whoso draws a sword,^o 'tis present^o death,
Or else this blow should broach^o thy dearest blood. 40
But I'll unto his majesty and crave^o
I may have liberty to venge^o this wrong,
When thou shalt see I'll meet thee to thy cost.

VERNON

Well, miscreant,^o I'll be there as soon as you,
And, after, meet you sooner than you would. Exeunt. 45

ACT IV

Scene I. [Paris. A hall of state.]

Enter KING, GLOUCESTER, WINCHESTER, YORK, SUFFOLK, SOMERSET, WARWICK, TALBOT, EXETER, GOVERNOR [of Paris, and others].

GLOUCESTER

Lord Bishop, set the crown upon his head.

WINCHESTER

God save King Henry, of that name the sixth! 10

GLOUCESTER

Now, Governor of Paris, take your oath,
That you elect no other king but him;
Esteem none friends but such as are his friends, 5
And none your foes but such as shall pretend^o
Malicious practices^o against his state: 20
This shall ye do, so help you righteous God!

Enter FALSTAFF.

FALSTAFF

My gracious sovereign, as I rode from Calais
To haste unto your coronation, 10
A letter was delivered to my hands,
Writ to your grace from th' Duke of Burgundy.

TALBOT

Shame to the Duke of Burgundy and thee!
I vowed, base knight, when I did meet thee next,
To tear the garter^o from thy craven's^o leg, 15
[Plucking it off.]

Which I have done, because unworthily
Thou wast installed in that high degree.^o
Pardon me, princely Henry, and the rest:
This dastard, at the battle of Poitiers,^o
When but in all I was six thousand strong 20
And that the French were almost ten to one,
Before we met or that a stroke was given,
Like to a trusty squire^o did run away.
In which assault we lost twelve hundred men;
Myself and divers gentlemen beside 25
Were there surprised and taken prisoners.

III.iv.5 reclaimed subdued 8 esteem good reputation in battle and high birth (thus likely to command a profitable ransom) 15 liege sovereign lord 18 remember but Henry VI was only nine months old when his father died 20 resolvèd . . . truth convinced of your loyalty 23 reguerdoned repaid 27 s.d. Manet remains (the Latin singular with a plural subject is common in Elizabethan stage directions) 28 hot passionate 29 Disgracing of disparaging 32 patronage (1) maintain (2) defend 37 in witness as proof

Then judge, great lords, if I have done amiss,
Or whether that such cowards ought to wear
This ornament of knighthood, yea or no.

GLOUCESTER

To say the truth, this fact° was infamous
And ill beseeeming any common man,
Much more a knight, a captain, and a leader.

TALBOT

When first this order was ordained, my lords,
Knights of the Garter were of noble birth,
Valiant and virtuous, full of haughty° courage,
Such as were grown to credit° by the wars;
Not fearing death, nor shrinking for distress,°
But always resolute in most extremes.°
He then that is not furnished in this sort°
Doth but usurp the sacred name of knight,
Profaning this most honorable order,
And should (if I were worthy to be judge)
Be quite degraded, like a hedge-born swain°
That doth presume to boast of gentle blood.

KING

Stain to thy countrymen, thou hear'st thy doom!°
Be packing,° therefore, thou that wast a knight:
Henceforth we banish thee on pain of death.

[Exit FALSTAFF.]

And now, Lord Protector, view the letter
Sent from our uncle Duke of Burgundy.

GLOUCESTER

What means his grace, that he hath changed his style?° 50
No more but plain and bluntly, "To the king!"
Hath he forgot he is his sovereign?
Or doth this churlish superscription
Pretend° some alteration in good will?
What's here? "I have, upon especial cause, 55
Moved with compassion of my country's wrack,°
Together with the pitiful complaints
Of such as your oppression feeds upon,
Forsaken your pernicious faction
And joined with Charles, the rightful King of France." 60
O monstrous treachery! can this be so,
That in alliance, amity, and oaths,
There should be found such false dissembling guile?

KING

What! doth my uncle Burgundy revolt?

GLOUCESTER

He doth, my lord, and is become your foe.

KING

Is that the worst this letter doth contain?

GLOUCESTER

It is the worst, and all, my lord, he writes.

KING

Why, then, Lord Talbot there shall talk with him
And give him chastisement for this abuse.
How say you, my lord; are you not content?

TALBOT

Content, my liege? Yes, but that I am prevented,°
I should have begged I might have been employed.

KING

Then gather strength, and march unto him straight;
Let him perceive how ill we brook° his treason
And what offense it is to flout his friends.

75

30 TALBOT

I go, my lord, in heart desiring still
You may behold confusion of your foes. [Exit.]

Enter VERNON and BASSET.

VERNON

35 Grant me the combat,° gracious sovereign.

BASSET

And me, my lord, grant me the combat too.

YORK

This is my servant; hear him, noble prince.

80

40 SOMERSET

And this is mine; sweet Henry, favor him.

KING

Be patient, lords, and give them leave to speak.
Say, gentlemen, what makes you thus exclaim,
And wherefore crave you combat? Or with whom?

VERNON

With him, my lord, for he hath done me wrong.

85

BASSET

And I with him, for he hath done me wrong.

KING

What is that wrong whereof you both complain?
First let me know, and then I'll answer you.

BASSET

Crossing the sea from England into France,
This fellow here, with envious carping° tongue, 90
Upbraided° me about the rose I wear,
Saying, the sanguine° color of the leaves
Did represent my master's blushing cheeks,
When stubbornly he did repugn° the truth
About a certain question in the law 95
Argued betwixt the Duke of York and him;
With other vile and ignominious terms;
In confutation of which rude reproach
And in defense of my lord's worthiness,
I crave the benefit of law of arms.° 100

VERNON

And that is my petition, noble lord:
For though he seem with forgèd quaint conceit°
To set a gloss upon° his bold intent,
Yet know, my lord, I was provoked by him, 105
And he first took exceptions at° this badge
Pronouncing that the paleness of this flower

Such factious emulations° shall arise!
 Good cousins both, of York and Somerset,
 Quiet yourselves, I pray, and be at peace.

115

YORK

Let this dissension first be tried by fight,
 And then your highness shall command a peace.

SOMERSET

The quarrel toucheth° none but us alone;
 Betwixt ourselves let us decide it, then.

YORK

There is my pledge;° accept it, Somerset.

120

VERNON

Nay, let it rest where it began at first.

BASSET

Confirm it so, mine honorable lord.

GLOUCESTER

Confirm it so? Confounded be your strife!
 And perish ye with your audacious prate!°
 Presumptuous vassals, are you not ashamed
 With this immodest° clamorous outrage
 To trouble and disturb the king and us?
 And you, my lords, methinks you do not well
 To bear with their perverse objections,
 Much less to take occasion from their mouths
 To raise a mutiny betwixt yourselves.
 Let me persuade you take a better course.

EXETER

It grieves his highness. Good my lords, be friends.

KING

Come hither, you that would be combatants:
 Henceforth I charge you, as you love our favor,
 Quite to forget this quarrel and the cause.
 And you, my lords, remember where we are:
 In France, amongst a fickle wavering nation;
 If they perceive dissension in our looks
 And that within ourselves we disagree,
 How will their grudging stomachs° be provoked
 To willful disobedience, and rebel!
 Beside, what infamy will there arise,
 When foreign princes shall be certified°
 That for a toy,° a thing of no regard,
 King Henry's peers and chief nobility
 Destroyed themselves and lost the realm of France!
 O, think upon the conquest of my father,
 My tender years, and let us not forgo
 That for a trifle that was bought with blood!
 Let me be umpire in this doubtful strife.
 I see no reason, if I wear this rose,

That anyone should therefore be suspicious
 I more incline to Somerset than York;
 Both are my kinsmen, and I love them both.
 As well they may upbraid me with my crown
 Because, forsooth,° the King of Scots is crowned.
 But your discretions° better can persuade
 Than I am able to instruct or teach,

And therefore, as we hither came in peace,
 So let us still continue peace and love.

160

Cousin of York, we institute your grace
 To be our regent in these parts of France;
 And, good my Lord of Somerset, unite
 Your troops of horsemen with his bands of foot,
 And, like true subjects, sons of your progenitors,
 Go cheerfully together and digest
 Your angry choler° on your enemies.
 Ourself, my Lord Protector, and the rest
 After some respite will return to Calais;
 From thence to England, where I hope ere long
 To be presented, by your victories,
 With Charles, Alençon, and that traitorous rout.°

 In that he wears the badge of Somerset.

 I dare presume, sweet prince, he thought no harm.

130

YORK

And if—I wish—he did. But let it rest;
 Other affairs must now be managed.

EXETER

Well didst thou, Richard, to suppress thy voice;
 For, had the passions of thy heart burst out,
 I fear we should have seen deciphered° there
 More rancorous spite, more furious raging broils,
 Than yet can be imagined or supposed.
 But howsoe'er, no simple man that sees
 This jarring discord of nobility,
 This shouldering° of each other in the court,
 This factious bandying° of their favorites,
 But that it doth presage some ill event.°
 'Tis much° when scepters are in children's hands,
 But more when envy breeds unkind division;°
 There comes the ruin, there begins confusion. Exit.

 If you forsake the offer of their love.

GENERAL

Thou ominous and fearful owl of death,
 Our nation's terror and their bloody scourge!
 The period° of thy tyranny approacheth.
 On us thou canst not enter but by death,
 For, I protest, we are well fortified
 And strong enough to issue out and fight.
 If thou retire, the Dolphin, well appointed,
 Stands with the snares of war to tangle thee.
 On either hand° thee there are squadrons pitched
 To wall thee from the liberty of flight,
 And no way canst thou turn thee for redress,
 But death doth front° thee with apparent spoil,
 And pale destruction meets thee in the face.
 Ten thousand French have ta'en the sacrament°
 To rive° their dangerous artillery
 Upon no Christian soul but English Talbot.
 Lo, there thou stand'st, a breathing valiant man,
 Of an invincible unconquered spirit!
 This is the latest° glory of thy praise
 That I, thy enemy, due° thee withal,
 For ere the glass that now begins to run
 Finish the process of his sandy hour,
 These eyes, that see thee now well colorèd,
 Shall see thee withered, bloody, pale, and dead.

Drum afar off.

Hark! hark! The Dolphin's drum, a warning bell,
 Sings heavy° music to thy timorous soul,
 And mine shall ring thy dire departure out.

 Mazed with° a yelping kennel of French curs!
 If we be English deer, be then in blood,

[Scene III. Plains in Gascony.]

Enter a MESSENGER that meets York. Enter YORK with trumpet and many SOLDIERS.

YORK

Are not the speedy scouts returned again
 That dogged° the mighty army of the Dolphin?

MESSENGER

They are returned, my lord, and give it out°
 That he is marched to Bordeaux with his power
 To fight with Talbot. As he marched along,
 By your espials° were discoverèd
 Two mightier troops than that the Dolphin led,
 Which joined with him and made their march for Bordeaux. 5

YORK

A plague upon that villain Somerset,
 That thus delays my promised supply
 Of horsemen that were levied for this siege!
 Renownèd Talbot doth expect° my aid,
 And I am louted° by a traitor villain
 And cannot help the noble chevalier.
 God comfort him in this necessity!
 If he miscarry,° farewell wars in France. 15

Enter another messenger [Sir William LUCY].

LUCY

Thou princely leader of our English strength,
 Never so needful on the earth of France,
 Spur to the rescue of the noble Talbot,
 Who now is girdled with a waist of iron
 And hemmed about with grim destruction.
 To Bordeaux, warlike duke! to Bordeaux, York!
 Else, farewell Talbot, France, and England's honor. 20

YORK

O God, that Somerset, who in proud heart
 Doth stop my cornets,° were in Talbot's place!
 So should we save a valiant gentleman
 By forfeiting a traitor and a coward.
 Mad ire and wrathful fury makes me weep,
 That thus we die, while remiss traitors sleep. 25

LUCY

O, send some succor to the distressed lord! 30

YORK

He dies, we lose; I break my warlike word;
 We mourn, France smiles; we lose, they daily get;
 All long° of this vile traitor Somerset.

 And on his son young John, who two hours since
 I met in travel toward his warlike father! 35

And now they meet where both their lives are done.

YORK

Alas, what joy shall noble Talbot have
To bid his young son welcome to his grave? 40
Away! vexation almost stops my breath,
That sundered° friends greet in the hour of death.
Lucy, farewell, no more my fortune can°
But curse the cause° I cannot aid the man.
Maine, Blois, Poitiers, and Tours are won away, 45
Long all° of Somerset and his delay.

Exit [with his SOLDIERS].

LUCY

Thus, while the vulture of sedition
Feeds in the bosom of such great commanders,
Sleeping neglection° doth betray to loss
The conquest of our scarce-cold° conqueror, 50
That ever living man of memory,
Henry the Fifth. Whiles they each other cross,
Lives, honors, lands, and all hurry to loss.

[Scene IV. Other plains in Gascony.]

Enter SOMERSET with his ARMY, [a CAPTAIN of Talbot's with him].

SOMERSET

It is too late, I cannot send them now;
This expedition was by York and Talbot
Too rashly plotted. All our general° force
Might with a sally° of the very° town
Be buckled with. The overdaring Talbot 5
Hath sullied all his gloss° of former honor
By this unheedful, desperate, wild adventure;
York set him on to fight and die in shame,
That, Talbot dead, great York might bear the name.

CAPTAIN

Here is Sir William Lucy, who with me 10
Set from our o'ermatched° forces forth for aid.

SOMERSET

How now, Sir William! whither were you sent?

LUCY

Whither, my lord? from bought and sold Lord Talbot;
Who, ringed about with bold adversity°,
Cries out for noble York and Somerset 15
To beat assailing death from his weak regions;°
And whiles the honorable captain there
Drops bloody sweat from his war-wearied limbs,
And in advantage ling'ring° looks for rescue,
You, his false hopes, the trust of England's honor, 20
Keep off aloof with worthless emulation.°
Let not your private discord keep away
The levied succors° that should lend him aid
While he, renownèd noble gentleman,
Yield up his life unto a world of odds; 25

Orleans the Bastard, Charles, Burgundy,
Alençon, Reignier compass him about,
And Talbot perisheth by your default.

SOMERSET

York set him on, York should have sent him aid.

LUCY

And York as fast upon your grace exclaims, 30
Swearing that you withhold his levied host,
Collected for this expedition.

SOMERSET

York lies; he might have sent and had the horse!
I owe him little duty, and less love,
And take° foul scorn to fawn on him by sending. 35

LUCY

The fraud of England, not the force of France,
Hath now entrapped the noble-minded Talbot;
Never to England shall he bear his life,
But dies betrayed to fortune by your strife.

SOMERSET

Come, go; I will dispatch the horsemen straight; 40
Within six hours they will be at his aid.

LUCY

Too late comes rescue, he is ta'en or slain,
For fly he could not, if he would have fled,
And fly would Talbot never though he might.

SOMERSET

If he be dead, brave Talbot, then adieu! 45

LUCY

His fame lives in the world, his shame in you.

Exeunt.

[Scene V. The English camp near Bordeaux.]

Enter TALBOT and his son [JOHN].

TALBOT

O young John Talbot! I did send for thee
To tutor thee in stratagems of war,
That Talbot's name might be in thee revived
When sapless° age and weak unable° limbs 5
Should bring thy father to his drooping chair.°
But, O malignant and ill-boding stars!
Now thou art come unto a feast of death,
A terrible and unavoiided° danger:
Therefore, dear boy, mount on my swiftest horse, 10
And I'll direct thee how thou shalt escape
By sudden flight. Come, dally not, be gone.

JOHN

Is my name Talbot? And am I your son?
And shall I fly? O, if you love my mother,
Dishonor not her honorable name,
To make a bastard and a slave of me. 15
The world will say, he is not Talbot's blood,
That basely fled when noble Talbot stood.

TALBOT

Fly, to revenge my death, if I be slain.

TALBOT

If we both stay, we both are sure to die.

JOHN

Then let me stay, and, father, do you fly:
Your loss is great, so your regard should be;
My worth unknown, no loss is known in me.
Upon my death the French can little boast;
In yours they will, in you all hopes are lost.
Flight cannot stain the honor you have won,
But mine it will, that no exploit have done;
You fled for vantage,^o everyone will swear,
But, if I bow,^o they'll say it was for fear.
There is no hope that ever I will stay
If the first hour I shrink and run away.
Here on my knee I beg mortality,^o
Rather than life preserved with infamy.

TALBOT

Shall all thy mother's hopes lie in one tomb?

JOHN

Ay, rather than I'll shame my mother's womb.

TALBOT

Upon my blessing, I command thee go.

JOHN

To fight I will, but not to fly the foe.

TALBOT

Part of thy father may be saved in thee.

JOHN

No part of him but will be shame to me.

TALBOT

Thou never hadst renown, nor canst not lose it.

JOHN

Yes, your renownèd name: shall flight abuse it?

TALBOT

Thy father's charge^o shall clear thee from that stain.

JOHN

You cannot witness for me, being slain.

If death be so apparent, then both fly.

TALBOT

And leave my followers here to fight and die?

My age was never tainted with such shame.

JOHN

And shall my youth be guilty of such blame?

No more can I be severed from your side

Than can yourself yourself in twain^o divide.

Stay, go, do what you will, the like do I;

For live I will not, if my father die.

TALBOT

Then here I take my leave of thee, fair son,

Born to eclipse^o thy life this afternoon.

Come, side by side together live and die;

And soul with soul from France to heaven fly.

Exit [with JOHN].

[Scene VI. A field of battle.]

20

Alarum: excursions, wherein Talbot's son [JOHN] is hemmed about, and TALBOT rescues him.

TALBOT

Saint George and victory! fight, soldiers, fight!

The regent hath with Talbot broke his word

25

And left us to the rage of France his sword.

Where is John Talbot? Pause, and take thy breath;

I gave thee life and rescued thee from death.

JOHN

O, twice my father, twice am I thy son!

30

The life thou gav'st me first was lost and done,

Till with thy warlike sword, despite of^o fate,

To my determinèd^o time thou gav'st new date.

TALBOT

When from the Dolphin's crest thy sword struck fire,

10

It warmed thy father's heart with proud desire

Of bold-faced victory. Then leaden^o age,

35

Quickened^o with youthful spleen^o and warlike rage,

Beat down Alençon, Orleans, Burgundy,

And from the pride of Gallia^o rescued thee.

15

The ireful Bastard Orleans, that drew blood

From thee, my boy, and had the maidenhood

Of thy first fight, I soon encounterèd,

And interchanging blows I quickly shed

Some of his bastard blood; and in disgrace

20

Bespoke him thus: "Contaminated, base,

And misbegotten blood I spill of thine,

Mean and right poor, for that pure blood of mine

Which thou didst force from Talbot, my brave boy."

Here,^o purposing the Bastard to destroy,

25

Came in strong rescue. Speak, thy father's care,

Art thou not weary, John? How dost thou fare?

Wilt thou yet leave the battle, boy, and fly,

Now thou art sealed^o the son of chivalry?

Fly, to revenge my death when I am dead;

30

The help of one stands me in little stead.

45

O, too much folly is it, well I wot,^o

To hazard^o all our lives in one small boat!

If I today die not with Frenchmen's rage,

Tomorrow I shall die with mickle^o age.

35

By me they nothing gain and if I stay;

'Tis but the short'ning of my life one day.

50

In thee thy mother dies, our household's name,

My death's revenge, thy youth, and England's fame:

All these and more we hazard by thy stay;

40

All these are saved if thou wilt fly away.

JOHN

The sword of Orleans hath not made me smart;

These words of yours draw lifeblood from my heart.

On that advantage, bought with such a shame,

To save a paltry life and slay bright fame,

45

Before young Talbot from old Talbot fly,

Exit [with JOHN].

[Scene VII. Another part of the field.]

Alarum: excursions. Enter old TALBOT, led [by a SERVANT].

TALBOT

Where is my other life? Mine own is gone.
O, where's young Talbot? Where is valiant John?
Triumphant death, smeared with captivity,°
Young Talbot's valor makes me smile at thee.
When he perceived me shrink° and on my knee, 5
His bloody sword he brandished over me,
And like a hungry lion did commence
Rough deeds of rage and stern impatience,
But when my angry guardant° stood alone,
Tend'ring° my ruin and assailed of° none, 10
Dizzy-eyed° fury and great rage of heart
Suddenly made him from my side to start
Into the clust'ring battle° of the French,
And in that sea of blood my boy did drench
His overmounting° spirit and there died, 15
My Icarus, my blossom, in his pride.

Enter [SOLDIERS,] with JOHN Talbot, borne.

SERVANT

O my dear lord, lo, where your son is borne!

TALBOT

Thou antic° death, which laugh'st us here to scorn,
Anon,° from thy insulting tyranny,
Coupled in bonds of perpetuity,° 20
Two Talbots, wingèd through the lither° sky,
In thy despite shall 'scape mortality.
O thou, whose wounds become hard-favored° death,
Speak to thy father ere thou yield thy breath!
Brave death by speaking, whether he will or no; 25
Imagine him a Frenchman and thy foe.
Poor boy! he smiles, methinks, as who should say,°
"Had death been French, then death had died today."
Come, come and lay him in his father's arms;
My spirit can no longer bear these harms. 30

Soldiers, adieu! I have what I would have,
Now my old arms are young John Talbot's grave.
Dies.

Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], ALENÇON, BURGUNDY, BASTARD, and [la] PUCELLE, [with FORCES].

DAUPHIN

Had York and Somerset brought rescue in,
We should have found a bloody day of this.

BASTARD

How the young whelp of Talbot's, raging wood,° 35
Did flesh his puny-sword° in Frenchmen's blood!

PUCELLE

Once I encountered him and thus I said:
"Thou maiden youth, be vanquished by a maid."
But, with a proud majestical high scorn,
He answered thus: "Young Talbot was not born 40
To be the pillage° of a giglot° wench."
So, rushing in the bowels° of the French,
He left me proudly, as unworthy fight.°

BURGUNDY

Doubtless he would have made a noble knight.
See, where he lies inhearsèd° in the arms 45
Of the most bloody nurser° of his harms!

BASTARD

Hew them to pieces, hack their bones asunder,
Whose life was England's glory, Gallia's wonder.

DAUPHIN

O no, forbear! for that which we have fled
During the life, let us not wrong it dead. 50

Enter LUCY, [attended by a French HERALD].

LUCY

Herald, conduct me to the Dolphin's tent,
To know who hath obtained the glory of the day.

DAUPHIN

On what submissive message art thou sent?

LUCY

Submission, Dolphin! 'Tis a mere French word;
We English warriors wot not° what it means. 55
I come to know what prisoners thou hast ta'en
And to survey the bodies of the dead.

DAUPHIN

For prisoners ask'st thou? Hell our prison is.°
But tell me whom thou seek'st.

LUCY

But where's the great Alcides° of the field, 60
Valiant Lord Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury,
Created, for his rare success in arms,
Great Earl of Washford, Waterford, and Valence,
Lord Talbot of Goodrig and Urchinfield,

The Turk,^o that two and fifty kingdoms hath,
Writes not so tedious a style as this.
Him that thou magnifi'st with all these titles 75
Stinking and fly-blown lies here at our feet.

LUCY

Is Talbot slain, the Frenchmen's only scourge,
Your kingdom's terror and black Nemesis?
O, were mine eyeballs into bullets turned,
That I in rage might shoot them at your faces! 80
O, that I could but call these dead to life,
It were enough to fright the realm of France!
Were but his picture left amongst you here,
It would amaze^o the proudest of you all.
Give me their bodies, that I may bear them hence 85
And give them burial as beseems their worth.

PUCELLE

I think this upstart is old Talbot's ghost,
He speaks with such a proud commanding spirit.
For God's sake, let him have him; to keep them
here,
They would but stink and putrefy the air. 90

DAUPHIN

Go, take their bodies hence.

LUCY

I'll bear them hence, but from their ashes shall be reared
A phoenix^o that shall make all France afeard.^o

DAUPHIN

So we be rid of them, do with him what thou wilt.
And now to Paris, in this conquering vein:^o 95
All will be ours, now bloody Talbot's slain. Exeunt.

ACT V

[Scene I. London. The palace.]

Sennet. Enter KING, GLOUCESTER, and EXETER.

KING

Have you perused the letters from the pope,
The emperor, and the Earl of Armagnac?

GLOUCESTER

I have, my lord, and their intent is this:
They humbly sue unto your excellence
To have a godly peace concluded of 5
Between the realms of England and of France.

KING

How doth your grace affect^o their motion?

GLOUCESTER

Well, my good lord, and as the only means
To stop effusion of our Christian blood
And stablish^o quietness on every side. 10

KING

Ay, marry, uncle, for I always thought
It was both impious and unnatural
That such immanity^o and bloody strife
Should reign among professors of^o one faith. 15

GLOUCESTER

Beside, my lord, the sooner to effect
And surer bind this knot of amity,
The Earl of Armagnac, near knit^o to Charles,
A man of great authority in France,
Proffers his only daughter to your grace
In marriage, with a large and sumptuous dowry. 20

KING

Marriage, uncle! alas, my years are young,
And fitter is my study and my books
Than wanton dalliance with a paramour.^o
Yet call th' ambassadors, and, as you please,
So let them have their answers every one: 25
I shall be well content with any choice
Tends to God's glory and my country's weal.

Enter WINCHESTER [in cardinal's habit], and three AMBASSADORS, [one of them a LEGATE^o].

EXETER

What! is my Lord of Winchester installed,
And called unto a cardinal's degree?
Then I perceive that will be verified 30
Henry the Fifth did sometime^o prophesy:
"If once he come to be a cardinal,
He'll make his cap^o co-equal with the crown."

KING

My lords ambassadors, your several suits^o
Have been considered and debated on. 35
Your purpose is both good and reasonable,
And therefore are we certainly resolved,
To draw conditions of a friendly peace,
Which by my Lord of Winchester we mean
Shall be transported presently to France. 40

GLOUCESTER

And for the proffer of my lord your master,^o
I have informed his highness so at large
As,^o liking of the lady's virtuous gifts,
Her beauty and the value of her dower,^o
He doth intend she shall be England's queen. 45

KING

In argument and proof of which contract,
Bear her this jewel, pledge of my affection.
And so, my Lord Protector, see them guarded
And safely brought to Dover, wherein shipped,^o
Commit them to the fortune of the sea. 50

Exeunt [all but WINCHESTER and the LEGATE].

Stay, my Lord Legate; you shall first receive
The sum of money which I promised
Should be delivered to his holiness
For clothing me in these grave ornaments.°

LEGATE

I will attend upon your lordship's leisure.

WINCHESTER [Aside.]

Now Winchester will not submit, I trow,
Or be inferior to the proudest peer.
Humphrey of Gloucester, thou shalt well perceive
That, neither in birth or for authority,
The bishop will be overborne by thee.
I'll either make thee stoop and bend thy knee,
Or sack this country with a mutiny.° Exeunt.

[Scene II. France. Plains in Anjou.]

Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], BURGUNDY, ALIN-ÇON, BASTARD, REIGNIER, and Joan [la PUCELLE, with FORCES].

DAUPHIN

These news, my lords, may cheer our drooping spirits:
'Tis said the stout Parisians do revolt
And turn again unto the warlike French.

ALENÇON

Then march to Paris, royal Charles of France.
And keep not back your powers in dalliance.°

PUCELLE

Peace be amongst them, if they turn to us;
Else, ruin combat with their palaces!

Enter SCOUT.

SCOUT

Success unto our valiant general,
And happiness to his accomplices!

DAUPHIN

What tidings send our scouts? I prithee, speak.

SCOUT

The English army, that divided was
Into two parties, is now conjoined° in one,
And means to give you battle presently.

DAUPHIN

Somewhat too sudden, sirs, the warning is,
But we will presently provide for them.

BURGUNDY

I trust the ghost of Talbot is not there;
Now he is gone, my lord, you need not fear.

PUCELLE

Of all base passions, fear is most accursed.
Command the conquest, Charles, it shall be thine;
Let Henry fret and all the world repine.°

DAUPHIN

Then on, my lords, and France be fortunate! Exeunt.

[Scene III. Before Angiers.]

Alarum. Excursions. Enter Joan la PUCELLE.

PUCELLE

The regent° conquers, and the Frenchmen fly.
Now help, ye charming° spells and periapts,°
And ye choice° spirits that admonish° me
And give me signs of future accidents.°

Thunder.

You speedy helpers, that are substitutes
Under the lordly monarch of the north,°
Appear and aid me in this enterprise.

Enter FIENDS.

This speedy and quick appearance argues proof
Of your accustomed diligence to me.
Now, ye familiar spirits, that are culled°
Out of the powerful regions under earth,
Help me this once, that France may get° the field.

They walk, and speak not.

O, hold me not with silence overlong!
Where I was wont to feed you with my blood,
I'll lop a member° off and give it you
In earnest° of a further benefit,
So you do condescend to help me now.

They hang their heads.

No hope to have redress? My body shall Pay recompense, if you will grant my suit.

They shake their heads.

Cannot my body nor blood-sacrifice
Entreat you to your wonted furtherance?°
Then take my soul; my body, soul, and all,
Before that England give the French the foil.°

They depart.

See, they forsake me! Now the time is come
That France must vail° her lofty plumèd crest
And let her head fall into England's lap.
My ancient° incantations are too weak,
And hell too strong for me to buckle with.
Now, France, thy glory droopeth to the dust. Exit.

*Excursions. BURGUNDY and YORK fight hand to hand.
FRENCH fly, [pursued. YORK returns with la PUCELLE captive].*

No shape but his can please your dainty^o eye.

PUCELLE

And may ye both be suddenly surprised 40
By bloody hands, in sleeping on your beds!

YORK

PUCELLE

I prithee, give me leave to curse awhile.

YORK

Curse, miscreant, when thou comest to the stake.
Exeunt.

Alarum. Enter SUFFOLK, with MARGARET in his hand.

SUFFOLK

Be what thou wilt, thou art my prisoner. 45
Gazes on her.

O fairest beauty, do not fear nor fly!
For I will touch thee but with reverent^o hands;
I kiss these fingers for eternal peace
And lay them gently on thy tender side.
Who art thou? Say, that I may honor thee. 50

MARGARET

Margaret my name, and daughter to a king,
The King of Naples, whosoe'er thou art.

SUFFOLK

An earl I am, and Suffolk am I called.
Be not offended, nature's miracle,
Thou art allotted^o to be ta'en by me: 55
So doth the swan her downy cygnets save,
Keeping them prisoner underneath her wings.
Yet if this servile usage^o once offend,
Go and be free again as Suffolk's friend.

She is going.

O, stay! [Aside.] I have no power to let her pass;
My hand would free her, but my heart says no.
As plays the sun upon the glassy^o streams,
Twinkling another counterfeited^o beam,
So seems this gorgeous beauty to mine eyes.
Fain would I woo her, yet I dare not speak;
I'll call for pen and ink, and write my mind.
Fie, de la Pole! disable^o not thyself.
Hast not a tongue? Is she not here?
Wilt thou be daunted by a woman's sight?
Ay, beauty's princely majesty is such, 70
Confounds the tongue and makes the senses rough.^o

MARGARET

Say, Earl of Suffolk, if thy name be so,

What ransom must I pay before I pass?

For I perceive I am thy prisoner.

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

How canst thou tell she will deny thy suit, 75
Before thou make a trial of her love?

MARGARET

Why speak'st thou not? What ransom must I pay?

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

She's beautiful and therefore to be wooed;
She is a woman, therefore to be won.

MARGARET

Wilt thou accept of ransom, yea or no? 80

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

Fond man, remember that thou hast a wife;
Then how can Margaret be thy paramour?

MARGARET

I were best to leave him, for he will not hear.

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

There all is marred; there lies a cooling card.^o

MARGARET

He talks at random; sure, the man is mad. 85

SUFFOLK [Still aside, but more loudly.]

And yet a dispensation^o may be had.

MARGARET

And yet I would that you would answer me.

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

I'll win this Lady Margaret. For whom?
Why, for my king. [Somewhat more loudly.] Tush,
that's a wooden^o thing! 90

MARGARET

He talks of wood: it^o is some carpenter. 90

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

Yet so my fancy may be satisfied
And peace established between these realms.
But there remains a scruple^o in that too:
For though her father be the King of Naples, 95
Duke of Anjou and Maine, yet is he poor,
And our nobility will scorn the match.

MARGARET

Hear ye, captain, are you not at leisure?

SUFFOLK [Aside.]

It shall be so, disdain they ne'er so much:
Henry is youthful and will quickly yield.

[Aloud.]

Madam, I have a secret to reveal. 100

MARGARET [Aside.]

What though I be enthralled?^o he seems a knight,
And will not any way dishonor me.

SUFFOLK

Lady, vouchsafe to listen what I say.

MARGARET [Aside.]

Perhaps I shall be rescued by the French,
And then I need not crave his courtesy. 105

SUFFOLK

Sweet madam, give me hearing in a cause.

MARGARET [Aside.]

Tush, women have been captivate ere now.

SUFFOLK
Lady, wherefore talk you so?

MARGARET
I cry you mercy,° 'tis but quid for quo.°

SUFFOLK
Say, gentle princess, would you not suppose
Your bondage happy, to be made a queen?

MARGARET
To be a queen in bondage is more vile
Than is a slave in base servility,
For princes should be free.

SUFFOLK
And so shall you,
If happy England's royal king be free.

MARGARET
Why, what concerns his freedom unto me?

SUFFOLK
I'll undertake to make thee Henry's queen,
To put a golden scepter in thy hand
And set a precious crown upon thy head,
If thou wilt condescend to be my—

MARGARET
What?

SUFFOLK
His love.

MARGARET
I am unworthy to be Henry's wife.

SUFFOLK
No, gentle madam, I unworthy am
To woo so fair a dame to be his wife,
And have no portion in° the choice myself.
How say you, madam, are ye so content?

MARGARET
And if my father please, I am content.

SUFFOLK
Then call our captains and our colors forth.
And, madam, at your father's castle walls
We'll crave a parley, to confer with him.

Sound [a parley]. Enter REIGNIER on the walls.

See, Reignier, see, thy daughter prisoner!

REIGNIER
To whom?

SUFFOLK
To me.

REIGNIER
Suffolk, what remedy?
I am a soldier and unapt° to weep
Or to exclaim on fortune's fickleness.

SUFFOLK
Yes, there is remedy enough, my lord:
Consent, and for thy honor give consent,
Thy daughter shall be wedded to my king,
Whom° I with pain° have wooed and won thereto,
And this her easy-held imprisonment
Hath gained thy daughter princely liberty.

REIGNIER
Speaks Suffolk as he thinks?

SUFFOLK
Fair Margaret knows
That Suffolk doth not flatter, face,° or feign.

REIGNIER
Upon thy princely warrant, I descend
To give thee answer to thy just demand. [Exit.]

SUFFOLK
And here I will expect° thy coming. 145
Trumpets sound. Enter REIGNIER.

REIGNIER
110 Welcome, brave earl, into our territories;
Command in Anjou what your honor pleases.

SUFFOLK
Thanks, Reignier, happy for° so sweet a child,
Fit to be made companion with a king.
What answer makes your grace unto my suit? 150

REIGNIER
115 Since thou dost deign to woo her little worth°
To be the princely bride of such a lord,
Upon condition I may quietly
Enjoy mine own, the country Maine and Anjou,
Free from oppression or the stroke of war, 155
My daughter shall be Henry's, if he please.

SUFFOLK
That is her ransom; I deliver her,
120 And those two countries I will undertake
Your grace shall well and quietly enjoy.

REIGNIER
And I again, in Henry's royal name, 160
As deputy° unto that gracious king,
Give thee her hand, for sign of plighted faith.°

SUFFOLK
125 Reignier of France, I give thee kingly thanks
Because this is in traffic° of a king.
[Aside.]
And yet, methinks, I could be well content 165
To be mine own attorney° in this case.
[Aloud.]
130 I'll over then to England with this news,
And make this marriage to be solemnized.
So farewell, Reignier; set this diamond safe
In golden palaces, as it becomes. 170

REIGNIER
I do embrace thee, as I would embrace
The Christian prince, King Henry, were he here.

MARGARET
Farewell, my lord; good wishes, praise, and prayers
Shall Suffolk ever have of Margaret.

135 She is going.

SUFFOLK
Farewell, sweet madam; but hark you, Margaret: 175
No princely commendations to my king?

140 MARGARET
Such commendations as becomes a maid,
A virgin, and his servant, say to him.

SUFFOLK
Words sweetly placed and modestly directed.°
But, madam, I must trouble you again: 180
No loving token to his majesty?

109 cry you mercy beg your pardon; quid for quo even exchange, tit for tat 125 no portion in (1) no share in (2) nothing to gain by 133 unapt not ready 138 Whom Margaret; pain much effort 142 face deceive

MARGARET

Yes, my good lord, a pure unspotted heart,
Never yet taint with love,° I send the king.

SUFFOLK

And this withal.

Kisses her.

MARGARET

That for thyself; I will not so presume
To send such peevish tokens° to a king.

[Exeunt REIGNIER and MARGARET.]

SUFFOLK

O, wert thou for myself! But, Suffolk, stay;
Thou mayst not wander in that labyrinth;
There minotaurs° and ugly treasons lurk.
Solicit° Henry with her wondrous praise;
Bethink thee on her virtues that surmount,
And natural graces that extinguish° art;
Repeat their semblance° often on the seas,
That, when thou com'st to kneel at Henry's feet,
Thou mayst bereave° him of his wits with wonder. 195
Exit.

[Scene IV. Camp of the Duke of York in Anjou.]

Enter YORK, WARWICK, [and others].

YORK

Bring forth that sorceress condemned to burn.

[Enter la PUCELLE, guarded, and a SHEPHERD.]

SHEPHERD

Ah, Joan, this kills thy father's heart outright!
Have I sought° every country far and near,
And now° it is my chance to find thee out,
Must I behold thy timeless° cruel death?
Ah, Joan, sweet daughter Joan, I'll die with thee!

PUCELLE

Decrepit miser!° base ignoble wretch!
I am descended of a gentler blood.
Thou art no father nor no friend of mine.

SHEPHERD

Out, out!° My lords, and° please you, 'tis not so.
I did beget her, all the parish knows;
Her mother liveth yet, can testify
She was the first fruit of my bachelorship.°

WARWICK

Graceless! wilt thou deny thy parentage?

YORK

This argues what her kind of life hath been,
Wicked and vile, and so her death concludes.

SHEPHERD

Fie, Joan, that thou wilt be so obstacle!°
God knows thou art a collop° of my flesh,
And for thy sake have I shed many a tear.
Deny me not, I prithee, gentle Joan. 20

PUCELLE

Peasant, avaunt!° You have suborned° this man
Of purpose to obscure° my noble birth.

SHEPHERD

'Tis true, I gave a noble° to the priest
The morn that I was wedded to her mother.
Kneel down and take my blessing, good my girl. 25
Wilt thou not stoop? Now cursèd be the time
Of thy nativity! I would the milk
Thy mother gave thee when thou suck'dst her breast
Had been a little ratsbane° for thy sake!
Or else, when thou didst keep my lambs afield, 30
I wish some ravenous wolf had eaten thee!
Dost thou deny thy father, cursèd drab?°
O, burn her, burn her! hanging is too good. Exit.

YORK

Take her away, for she hath lived too long,
To fill the world with vicious qualities. 35

PUCELLE

First, let me tell you whom you have condemned:
Not me begotten of a shepherd swain
But issued from the progeny of kings;
Virtuous and holy, chosen from above, 40
By inspiration of celestial grace,
To work exceeding miracles on earth.
I never had to do with wicked spirits,
But you, that are polluted with your lusts,
Stained with the guiltless blood of innocents,
Corrupt and tainted with a thousand vices, 45
Because you want the grace that others have,
You judge it straight a thing impossible
To compass° wonders but by help of devils.
No, misconceivèd!° Joan of Arc hath been
A virgin from her tender infancy, 50
Chaste and immaculate in very thought,
Whose maiden blood, thus rigorously effused,°
Will cry for vengeance at the gates of heaven.

YORK

Ay, ay; away with her to execution!

WARWICK

And hark ye, sirs: because she is a maid, 55
Spare for no° faggots, let there be enow;°
Place barrels of pitch upon the fatal stake,
That so her torture may be shortenèd.

PUCELLE

Will nothing turn your unrelenting hearts?
Then, Joan, discover thine infirmity,° 60
That warranteth by law to be thy privilege.

YORK

Now heaven forbend!° the holy maid with child! 65

WARWICK

The greatest miracle that e'er ye wrought.
Is all your strict preciseness° come to this?

YORK

She and the Dolphin have been juggling;°
I did imagine° what would be her refuge.°

WARWICK

Well, go to;° we'll have no bastards live, 70
Espécially since Charles must father it.

PUCELLE

You are deceived, my child is none of his,
It was Alençon that enjoyed my love.

YORK

Alençon! that notorious Machiavel!°
It dies, and if it had a thousand lives. 75

PUCELLE

O, give me leave, I have deluded you:
'Twas neither Charles nor yet the duke I named,
But Reignier, King of Naples, that prevailed.°

WARWICK

A married man! that's most intolerable.

YORK

Why, here's a girl!° I think she knows not well, 80
There were so many, whom she may accuse.

WARWICK

It's sign she hath been liberal and free.°

YORK

And yet, forsooth,° she is a virgin pure.
Strumpet, thy words condemn thy brat and thee.
Use no entreaty, for it is in vain. 85

PUCELLE

Then lead me hence; with whom I leave my curse:
May never glorious sun reflex° his beams
Upon the country where you make abode,
But darkness and the gloomy shade of death
Environ you, till mischief and despair 90
Drive you to break your necks or hang yourselves!
Exit [guarded].

YORK

Break thou in pieces and consume to ashes,
Thou foul accursèd minister° of hell.

Enter Cardinal [Beaufort, Bishop of WINCHESTER].

WINCHESTER

Lord Regent, I do greet your excellence
With letters of commission from the king. 95
For know, my lords, the states of Christendom,
Moved with remorse of° these outrageous broils,
Have earnestly implored a general peace
Betwixt our nation and the aspiring French,

And here at hand the Dolphin and his train° 100
Approacheth, to confer about some matter.

YORK

Is all our travail° turned to this effect?
After the slaughter of so many peers,
So many captains, gentlemen, and soldiers,
That in this quarrel have been overthrown 105
And sold their bodies for their country's benefit,
Shall we at last conclude effeminate peace?
Have we not lost most part of all the towns,
By treason, falsehood, and by treachery,
Our great progenitors had conquerèd? 110
O, Warwick, Warwick! I foresee with grief
The utter loss of all the realm of France.

WARWICK

Be patient, York; if we conclude a peace,
It shall be with such strict and severe covenants°
As little shall the Frenchmen gain thereby. 115

Enter Charles [the DAUPHIN], ALENÇON, BASTARD, REIGNIER, [and others].

DAUPHIN

Since, Lord of England, it is thus agreed
That peaceful truce shall be proclaimed in France,
We come to be informèd by yourselves
What the conditions of that league must be.

YORK

Speak, Winchester, for boiling choler chokes 120
The hollow passage of my poisoned° voice
By sight of these our baleful enemies.

WINCHESTER

Charles, and the rest, it is enacted thus:
That, in regard King Henry gives consent,
Of° mere compassion and of lenity, 125
To ease your country of distressful war
And suffer you to breathe in fruitful peace,
You shall become true liegemen° to his crown.
And, Charles, upon condition thou wilt swear
To pay him tribute, and submit thyself, 130
Thou shalt be placed as viceroy under him,
And still enjoy thy regal dignity.

ALENÇON

Must he be then as shadow of himself?
Adorn his temples with a coronet,
And yet, in substance and authority, 135
Retain but privilege of a private man?
This proffer is absurd and reasonless.

DAUPHIN

'Tis known already that I am possessed
With more than half the Gallian territories,
And therein revered for° their lawful king: 140
Shall I, for lucre° of the rest unvanquished,
Detract so much from that prerogative°
As to be called but viceroy of the whole?
No, Lord Ambassador, I'll rather keep
That which I have than, coveting for more, 145
Be cast° from possibility of all.

YORK

Insulting Charles! hast thou by secret means
Used intercession to obtain a league,^o
And, now the matter grows to compromise,
Stand'st thou aloof upon comparison?^o
Either accept the title thou usurp'st,
Of^o benefit proceeding from our king
And not of any challenge of desert,^o
Or we will plague thee with incessant wars.

REIGNIER

My lord, you do not well in obstinacy
To cavil^o in the course of this contract:
If once it be neglected, ten to one
We shall not find like opportunity.

ALENÇON

To say the truth, it is your policy
To save your subjects from such massacre
And ruthless slaughters as are daily seen
By our proceeding in hostility;
And therefore take this compact of^o a truce—

[Aside.]

Although you break it when your pleasure serves.

WARWICK

How say'st thou, Charles? Shall our condition stand? 165

DAUPHIN

It shall;
Only reserved, you claim no interest
In any of our towns of garrison.

YORK

Then swear allegiance to his majesty,
As thou art knight, never to disobey
Nor be rebellious to the crown of England,
Thou, nor thy nobles, to the crown of England.

[The DAUPHIN and French NOBLES give signs of fealty.]

So, now dismiss your army when ye please;
Hang up your ensigns,^o let your drums be still,
For here we entertain^o a solemn peace. Exeunt. 175

[Scene V. London. The royal palace.]

Enter SUFFOLK in conference with the KING, GLOUCESTER, and EXETER.

KING

Your wondrous rare description, noble earl,
Of beauteous Margaret hath astonished me.
Her virtues, gracèd with external gifts,
Do breed love's settled passions in my heart,
And like as rigor^o of tempestuous gusts
Provokes^o the mightiest hulk^o against the tide,
So am I driven by breath^o of her renown
Either to suffer shipwreck or arrive
Where I may have fruition of her love.

SUFFOLK

Tush, my good lord, this superficial^o tale
Is but a preface of her worthy praise.
The chief perfections of that lovely dame,
Had I sufficient skill to utter them,
Would make a volume of enticing lines,
Able to ravish any dull conceit;^o
And, which is more, she is not so divine,
So full replete with choice of all delights,
But with as humble lowliness of mind
She is content to be at your command;
Command, I mean, of virtuous chaste intents,^o
To love and honor Henry as her lord.

KING

And otherwise will Henry ne'er presume.
Therefore, my Lord Protector, give consent

THE SECOND PART OF HENRY THE SIXTH

EDITED BY ARTHUR FREEMAN

Introduction

Shakespeare's Henry VI, Part Two may be his earliest surviving work; it may be the first adaptation by anyone of English history for the Elizabethan stage; and if it is neither, it still certainly remains among the three or four earliest both of the career and the genre, and as such the object of curious examination for centuries. But has the play value beyond curiosity and "importance," or virtues beyond nuggets of promise and flashes of the characteristic "easiness of expression and fluency of numbers" we identify in the body of Shakespeare's work? Rarely, we observe, does Henry VI—singly, doubly, or triply—come on the stage, and scarcely more often does a single part recommend itself to the modern reader who is not simply covering or re-covering all of Shakespeare, like an obstacle course. How good is the play? And more pointedly, perhaps, from what particular strengths does its excellence, if any, arise?

Unquestionably the poetry of 2 Henry VI is no strong point. It ranges from inflated extreme:

The gaudy, blabbing, and remorseful day
Is crept into the bosom of the sea,
And now loud-howling wolves arouse the jades
That drag the tragic melancholy night (IV.i.1-4)

to slack plateau:

And had I twenty times so many foes,
And each of them had twenty times their power,
All these could not procure me any scathe,
So long as I am loyal, true, and crimeless (II.iv.60-63)

embracing along the way all sorts of weakness appropriate to the neophyte versifier: flatness, extravagance, redundancy, and unassimilated imitation. When Margaret lamely laments her enforced parting from the Duke of Suffolk, and the imminent death of Cardinal Beaufort,

Ay me! What is this world! What news are these!
But wherefore grieve I at an hour's poor loss,
Omitting Suffolk's exile, my soul's treasure?
Why only, Suffolk, mourn I not for thee,
And with the southern clouds contend in tears
(III.ii.380-84)

her rhetoric is heavily indebted to Thomas Kyd's; likewise the "jades" are Marlowe's, and the "twenty . . . twenty" hyperbole a well-worn piece of stock from the Kyd-Marlowe-Greene warehouse of formulaic clichés. Often, indeed, 2 Henry VI sounds so unlike the later Shakespeare and so much like his predecessors and mentors that scholars have sought another's hand in the text—either as collaborator, or as the unwitting source of Shakespeare's flagrant plagiarism. Yet few would deny to Shakespeare the fine intensity of Young Clifford's battlefield imprecations (V.ii.31-65), the emotional accuracy of the bulk of III.ii, Margaret's farewell to Suffolk, or the wily and succinct logic of Warwick's apology for the commons, and the warning to King Henry (III.ii.242-69); and what seems less than the best in the play may as easily be explained in terms of uncertainty and inexperience as of fragmentary authorship. We cannot demand of Shakespeare in his twenties the consistency, control, and ease of the seasoned professional he was rapidly to become.

But what emerges preeminently from the play is the sure sense of theater, dramatic design, and skill in characterization which are such inalienable hallmarks of Shakespeare's genius that even bardolatrous theatergoers of 1796 could without hesitation hiss a travesty like Vortigern (forged by W. H. Ireland) from the stage—not for its mawkish language and already tainted reputation, but for the lack of those attributes absolutely characteristic of the Genuine Remains. Ragged and faltering though its verse may occasionally be, Henry VI exemplifies the dramatic virtues of construction—continuity, tension, proportion, pace—which no playwright before Shakespeare had succeeded in uniting with a good sense of what interests an audience. Thinking of 2 Henry VI as a playwright's play—an embryonic, germinal type—we can single out from it virtues of dramaturgy, aspects of craftsmanship which may illuminate for us what Shakespeare the playwright "began with" at the outset of a career in Elizabethan theater.

The peculiar problem facing a playwright who attempts a play based on chronicle history is that no very extravagant changes in plot may be introduced. All the more pressing are the demands on the playwright's skill as a shaper of story, selector of detail, imputer of motives; all the more difficult his task of making an arbitrary tract of historical time appear complete and self-sufficient, artistically independent from the events-leading-up and the sequel. Given the limitations of the source, the exigencies of factual history, as well as the prescribed slants Tudor chroniclers imposed on their material (King John a victim of papal interference, Richard III—the last Plantagenet—an ignominious tyrant, Richard II's overthrow fundamentally unjustified) and the necessity for treading lightly where political or social issues come into question, how does Shakespeare's artistry shape, structure, and implement the twenty-year history his play intends to convey? Most obviously, and first, by a compression of time, and a conflation of events. Facts remain facts, but their order may justifiably be varied: Eleanor's attainure may be laid to Queen Margaret's influence, although in fact it took place four years before the royal marriage; Peter's combat with his master Thomas the armorer may be relocated at the time of York's displacement as regent of France, and associated—as in the chronicles it is not—with York's treason. Likewise, the long and repetitious subversion of Salisbury and Warwick, among other members of the nobility, which drags over years in Hall and Holinshed, may be reduced to a single scene (II.ii) and left firmly settled rather than tentative; and the long-smoldering hostilities between King Henry and York, all their intermittent battles, truces, accords, and new outbreaks, may be altered to a single continuing action in Act V, with a conclusion more "final" than history suggests. Thus twenty years of fits and starts in the Lancaster-York troubles appear all part of one rational sequence of events, impelled forward by the force of hindsight, the implied teleology of history itself, stripped of "irrelevant" excursions, like York's in and out of Ireland, and framed artificially by emphasis on fulfilled prophecy and culminatory violence. Like any dramatist restricted to a small repertory cast, Shakespeare dwells on individual confrontations rather than spectacular, massive, and realistic encounters to embody the historical action. Chosen pairs of antagonists, like chosen events, stand for the struggle at large: York duels anachronistically with old Clifford as a representative of all the loyal nobility, and the company of factious schemers of I.i dwindles from eight to a soliloquizing York, as if to symbolize the disintegration of English union into rival, baronial interests. Another dramatic device ensuring the illusion of continuity is Shakespeare's imputation of motives in certain matters the chroniclers agree to leave haphazard: only a hint in Hall provides the suggestion, fully implemented by Shakespeare, of an intrigue between Suffolk and the queen; and the ensuing suggestion that Somerset fills the same office is merely extrapolated from the first: there is no source for this in written history. Nor do the chroniclers provide any connection between Cade's uprising and the policy of York, whereas the play quite plausibly links Cade to the main action specifically as York's factor in Kent.

The illusion that history, in 2 Henry VI, is self-contained and independent, that a "just period" has been imposed on the events described, once more is a function of dramatic management. We watch the Duke of York alter from a silent, politic, and guarded rival claimant, whose primary mode of self-expression is the ironic "aside" and the soliloquy (I.i., III.i), to an outspoken enemy of the crown who dares fling his defiance in the face of the Presence: the play thus provides a kind of emotional catharsis for York not wholly warranted by the chronicles, one which gives the impression of a retaliatory anger coming full circle from the implied past outrage and house-curse of Richard II's deposition. Paired against York's rise to action is King Henry's degeneration into helpless passivity: never martial, nor even authoritative in his office, he does flare up once in righteous fury against Suffolk, following the murder of Duke Humphrey—even if Warwick's unsubtle pressure must goad him to a firm stand—but by IV.ix, in the face of Yorkist defiance, he has reached a nadir of despair and incompetence:

Come, wife, let's in, and learn to govern better;
For yet may England curse my wretched reign.

(IV.ix.48-49)

By the end of Act V he remains scarcely a man, let alone king (QUEEN What are you made of? You'll nor fight nor fly), and his death in the play's sequel seems a foregone conclusion. While York's forces, around Salisbury and Warwick, have snowballed into an irresistible front, King Henry's counselors, like the provinces of France, have fallen from him one by one; until like Lear alone on the heath with his fool, stripped of his entourage, king and queen must flee the lost battle at the prompting of no more than the young Clifford, last of the loyalists, bitter, pitiless, and a little mad. A more deliberate device, perhaps, for setting the just period on events in the play, is the satisfaction of a second of three prophecies made late in Act I: Somerset's death under the sign of the Castle, an alehouse in Saint Albans, seems to even up the score between Gloucester's family and their assailants—Suffolk for Gloucester (IV.i), and now Somerset for Eleanor.

Within the measure of the play, the period of the whole action, lodges a rhythmic pattern of interlocked impugments—fortuitous falls, medieval "tragedies," if we wish, or inevitable consequences of one fatal, preliminary mistake. "The three Henry VI plays, and Richard III," writes Irving Ribner, "may be viewed as virtually a series of successive waves, in each of which one hero falls and another rises to replace him. The most significant of the falls are displayed as divine retribution for sin, but there are some also which seem to illustrate only an arbitrary and capricious fortune." Within 2 Henry VI a parallel series may be distinguished: first Eleanor, then Humphrey, then Suffolk, then Lord Say, and finally Somerset are impugned, attainted, and done away with, as the barriers between King Henry and the raw malice of York one by one come down. Successive objects of blame for the loss of France—Humphrey by the peers, York by Somerset and Suffolk, Suffolk by Warwick, Salisbury, and the commons, Say by Jack Cade and his rebels, and Salisbury by York—suggest the harried administration of a losing enterprise firing manager after manager. And all comes about through the "fatal marriage" of Henry with Margaret, the "haught-stomached" mannish queen of the chronicles, the amorous impatient designer of 2 Henry VI is the bloody avenger of 3 Henry VI, and the hideous, Cassandra of Richard III. As France forms the unseen background for the historical tragedy, in Elizabethan terms, of Henry VI's reign, so France in the person of Margaret and the responsibility for mismanaging the wars forms the pretext of all the succeeding failures of the play. For the want of Anjou and Maine, Normandy is lost, for the want of Normandy, Gascony, for the want of all France, English popular solidarity and loyalty; and by all these interlocked disasters falls King Henry. France and its "blood-bespotted Neapolitan" queen lurk like a Senecan curse behind the action of 2 Henry VI, 3 Henry VI, and Richard III, a trilogy linked by themes of retribution and revenge, by generations of guilt accumulated by Lancastrians and Yorkists, until Henry Tudor can wipe clean the slate at Bosworth Field. But the triggering event of the chain, in 2 Henry VI, is the unsuitable, expensive marriage of French Margaret with English Henry, and the hateful articles thereby concluded.

A play lives in its characters. Samuel Johnson selected from 2 Henry VI King Henry, Queen Margaret, Warwick, and Gloucester; but there are bits as well—Peter, Eleanor, Walter Whitmore, Cade—which an actor can render memorable. At the outset of the action, a triangle of major figures—Henry, Margaret, and Humphrey—dominates our attention, Margaret and the protector vying for control of the pietistic, unworldly figurehead of a king. Now Humphrey, by sixteenth-century convention, is portrayed as charitable to a fault ("to dine at Duke Humphrey's table," an Elizabethan expression for "to go hungry," reflects the supposed self-impoverishment Gloucester's generosity drew upon himself), high-minded, confident, as Hall has it, in "his strong truth," and in "indifferent justice"—a victimized heifer or partridge, in Warwick's image, an unweaned calf, in Henry's, and a shepherd in Gloucester's own, to the lamblike king. Queen Margaret, again at Hall's suggestion, is equal in vehement ambition to the calm majesty and accustomed authority of her rival; and the traditional character of King Henry as a man "of a meek spirit, and a simple wit, preferring peace before war, rest before business, honesty before profit, and quietness before labor," is implemented by Shakespeare in scriptural terms, by larding the king's discourse with holy aphorisms, and revealing him ever more willing to comment helplessly upon an event—with eyes upraised, and hands clasped, as the adult portrait in the National Portrait Gallery depicts him—than to demand action. The interrelationship of these three main figures is never better exposed than in II.i, at the spurious miracle of cured blindness in Saint Albans. To a townsman's announcement of "A miracle!" Henry reacts immediately with full credulity: "Now God be praised," etc., and with a homely and pious caveat:

Great is his comfort in this earthly vale,
Although by sight his sin be multiplied. (II.i.70-71)

Gloucester, meanwhile, seasons his admiration with the skepticism of a good judge. Interrogation confirms his suspicions, and with a bit of low comedy he administers an unmasking. Now that Simpcox is revealed an impostor, the king speaks again: "O God, see'st thou this, and bearest so long?" (II.i.153). Whereas Queen Margaret, in a reflection superbly revealing of her hardening nature, comments: "It made me laugh to see the villain run" (II.i.154). Given the king's ineffectuality, it of course falls to Gloucester to prescribe punishment; and as the case does not warrant mercy (Simpcox's wife's plea, "Alas, sir, we did it for pure need," appeals merely for pity, in a stoical sense) Gloucester's sentence is not unsevere. "By this may be seen," says Foxe, "how Duke Humphrey had not only an head to discern and diserver truth from forged and feigned hypocrisy, but study also and diligence likewise was in him to reform that which was amiss." Shakespeare has retained the main point of the exemplum, but simultaneously seized upon the occasion to underscore his portraits of Henry and Margaret as well.

After the elimination of Gloucester, the "crutch" of the king, our attention is shifted to those auguries of disintegration, the wrangling peers, the scheming Yorkists, pirates, and the anarchic rebels of Jack Cade. From the decorum of the first scene, a courtly reception of the new queen, to the bloody holocaust of Act V, culminating in the emergence of a new order of violent young men—York's savage sons, the "foul, indigested lump" Richard, and furious Clifford Junior—we are led by way of dissident nobles and lawless commoners to an end no better than what precedes it, but certainly less weak. After Gloucester's death the focus of characterization moves freely among the representative types of imperial decay, pausing once for a curiously affecting last interview between Margaret and the Duke of Suffolk (III.ii.300 ff.). Prior to this parting we have had little or no sympathy for either party, but in the space of a hundred lines our antagonism is severely shaken. It is a crude and unprepared reversal, perhaps, but there are few examples in the English drama before 1590 of anything at all like Shakespeare's "shading" of characterization, or of his insistence on keeping our judgment on the ultimate worth of a man suspended until the tension of the action involving him has relaxed. We have been encouraged to dislike Suffolk, but with III.ii we are not permitted to despise him; we are asked to reconsider our earlier censure of both queen and lover, and to imagine, for a moment, the action of the play, favorable and unfavorable to them, through their own eyes, as it affects them, rather than as they affect it. This is a remarkable achievement, in a somewhat primitive form, for a short unexpected exchange. Analogous to it perhaps is the pity evoked in us by the sight of Eleanor humbled—we may think of Kent in the stocks or the dead Hotspur—or our grudging admiration for the impolitic and noble arrogance with which Suffolk meets his end; but these are simpler dramatic formulas.

In its own time, and possibly in ours, the main attraction of the play as staged may well have been the comical prose scenes of Cade's rebellion. Action is not lacking in 2 Henry VI, nor spectacle, what with witchcraft, trial by combat, a false miracle, alarums and excursions, and the excitement generated by York's open defiance and Gloucester's bristling temper against Beaufort's; but the Cade scenes bring to the stage as well an element, especially trenchant for Elizabethans, of sociopolitical commentary. Shakespeare's audiences were accustomed to read into plays on past history lessons for the present, and indeed contemporary playwrights were not blind to the implications their histories raised. Gorboduc warned of the evils of dividing a kingdom; Richard II of the hazards of weak kingship (after Essex' rebellion in 1601, and the ill-advised performance of Richard II on the eve of the uprising, the queen angrily remarked to William Lambarde, "I am Richard II, know ye not that?"); and 2 Henry VI contains an action if anything more provocative than either of those. Presupposing a popular audience to watch a play dealing with popular revolt—one in particular in which the rabble bears all before it for some time—and considering that London in the early 1590's was racked by insubordination and riot, one may imagine how determined the authorities might be to assure themselves that no matter or opinion expressed in such a scene of such a play be "dangerous," and to be certain that any moral extrapolated from the conclusion be perfectly in accord with law, order, and the present regime. Thus episodes like Cade's rebellion and the rising of the masses in Sir Thomas More, putatively revised by Shakespeare himself, were composed under strict scrutiny, and carefully reviewed by the Master of the Revels or his staff before production could be permitted. Change a scene, omit a scene, and shorten an address, "and not otherwise, at your own perils," warns Edmund Tilney in his holograph comment extant on the manuscript of Sir Thomas More: the recommendations of the authorities are specific, censorious, and peremptory.

Nothing in Shakespeare's career or works suggests that he might find conscientious compliance with such strictures difficult. In fact the implicit conservatism of his political attitudes, so far as we can isolate them (a dangerous attempt, when speech and character must sometimes be separated), made him ideal for the job of rewriting a questioned passage of More, and evidently quite at ease in the matter of Cade. In line either with official policy, or his own predilections, or both, Shakespeare's Cade scarcely resembles the "youngman of goodly stature and pregnant wit," the "subtle captain," and audacious field-general Hall portrays; rather he stands for rampant ignorance, executing a clerk for his ability to read and write, and Lord Say, as much as for anything, for his cultural accomplishment—whereas Hall's Cade took advantage of sophisticated doctrine, "teachers," and "privy school-masters" to suborn the men of Kent to his side in the struggle, and was witty enough to perceive the "dilatatory plea" of Lord Say, to be tried by his peers—rather than anxious to kill him before his words might win away followers. True, in his curious fashion Hall does give a conflicting impression of Cade—as "covetous," a "mischievous head," and "a cruel tyrant"—almost in counterpoint with his more respectful estimate, but Shakespeare unquestionably was in command of information about Cade's nature which he chose not to use. Likewise, the character of Lord Say, which in Hall is made shifty and not a little cowardly, in Shakespeare is held up as maligned virtue and honesty personified, a very test case of Cade's anarchic administration, urging us to particular repugnance toward civil disobedience. And for reasons, at last, of leaving no loophole in the morality of rebellion, Shakespeare has also introduced the otherwise gratuitous episode of Iden's garden, a scene which well may bear cutting in a modern production. Iden himself remains an annoyingly loose end among disparate new faces in the last act: the man who pronounces himself loath to "live turmoiled in the court" when he "may enjoy such quiet walks as these" in Kent (IV.x.17–18) seems within a few lines overjoyed to attend henceforth on King Henry at court: "May Iden live to merit such a bounty!"

"As narratives in verse," sums up Dr. Johnson, the Henry VI plays "are more happily conceived and more accurately finished than those of King John, Richard II, or the tragic scenes of Henry IV and V"—this "without regard to characters and incidents," in which they presumably are deficient; and of the three, adds Johnson, "I think the second the best." Taste since 1765 has perhaps downgraded the Henry VI plays, and scholarship has fastened so firmly on the bibliographical labyrinths they offer to explore that seldom are they spoken of as literature, hence seldom staged, and hence seldom read. But it is almost fair to assert that the least of Shakespeare is better than all but the best of his early theatrical contemporaries, and 2 Henry VI—a little clumsy and uneven, but fresh, and at times brilliant—deserves nowadays more than its canonical or compulsive moiety of readership.

A NOTE ON THE DATE AND SOURCES

The Date. Despite the consecutive titles provided by the Folio editors for Henry VI, Parts One, Two, and Three, it is probable that 2 and 3 Henry VI originally constituted a two-part play, and that 1 Henry VI had an independent conception and existence in the contemporary repertory. Early quartos (see A Note on the Text, below) designated 2 Henry VI as The First Part of the Contention between the Two Famous Houses of York and Lancaster, and 3 Henry VI as The True Tragedy of Richard, Duke of York; and subsequently a piratical quarto of 1619 combined the two (still ignoring 1 Henry VI) as The Whole Contention.

Scholarly opinion, however, is divided on the question of precedence: did the composition proceed chronologically, with 1 Henry VI first, followed by a double play on subsequent events, or was 1 Henry VI, with its emphasis on action and adventure, worked up after 2 and 3 Henry VI, to capitalize upon their evident popularity? Certain inconsistencies of plot and characterization suggest, if anything, the latter alternative—much as The First Part of Jeronimo, or "Spain's Comedy," evidently postdated the immensely popular Spanish Tragedy of Thomas Kyd—but all we can be moderately sure of is that the three parts do not constitute an intentional trilogy. And as it is not certain that 1 Henry VI preceded the two-part play, we can accept as established that 2 Henry VI is the earliest definitely datable play of Shakespeare and, as such, a monument of precocious accomplishment.

Because of Robert Greene's attack (September, 1592) on the new actor-playwright Shakespeare (see the General Introduction, pp. 2–3), playing on a phrase of 3 Henry VI, and our knowledge of a plague inhibition during the summer, we can date the composition and performance of 2 and 3 Henry VI earlier than June 23, 1592. The publication of the second edition of Holinshed's Chronicles (1587) may provide an early limit of date; but apparent echoes of 3 Henry VI in an especially allusive history play, The Troublesome Reign of King John (published 1591), tend to set back the date of 2 and 3 Henry VI to 1591 or 1590 or even earlier. Hence, whether 1 Henry VI or 2 and 3 Henry VI are what Henslowe terms "harey the vi" in March, 1592, has little effect on our dating estimate of 2 and 3 Henry VI; 1590–91 is a good enough guess, and possibly thus renders 2 Henry VI the earliest known “modern” play concerned primarily with English history.

The Sources. Shakespeare’s main source appears to have been either the York-Lancaster chronicle of Edward Hall (1542; 1548; 1550), or of Hall’s publisher Richard Grafton (A Chronicle at Large, 1569), which are often indistinguishable, due to Grafton’s cheerful and extensive plagiarism of his predecessors. Raphael Holinshed’s Chronicles (second edition, 1587), which Shakespeare certainly knew, may also have contributed some supplementary matter, or transmitted portions of Hall’s text (for like Grafton, Holinshed borrowed liberally and literally). The story of Simpcox appears first in Sir Thomas More’s Dialogue . . . of the Veneration and Worship of Images (1529), subsequently in Grafton, but is also to be found in the extremely popular Acts and Monuments of the martyrologist John Foxe (1563; 1570; 1576; 1583; quoted here from the 1583 edition). Traces of Robert Fabyan’s Chronicle (1516 et seq.), the versified Mirror for Magistrates (1559 edition, for the death of Suffolk), and John Hardyng’s verse Chronicle (1543, another of Grafton’s “sources”) may or may not be identifiable in Shakespeare’s text; but the primary original, in one form or another, remains Hall (see Lucille King, “The Use of Hall’s Chronicles in the Folio and Quarto Texts of Henry VI,” Philological Quarterly, XIII [1934], 321–32).

A most interesting analogue to the Cade scenes is found in the supposedly Shakespearean revision of Anthony Munday’s Sir Thomas More (?1593–?1601), a play surviving only in manuscript, crabbed and partially defective, and unpublished until 1844. A passage involving rebellious commoners and a paternalistic, “reasonable” More has frequently been ascribed to Shakespeare on stylistic and paleographic grounds, many scholars considering this scrap of manuscript to be holograph, and the only extant specimen, thus, save signatures, of Shakespeare’s own handwriting. (For a summary of the controversy, see R. C. Bald, “The Booke of Sir Thomas More and Its Problems,” Shakespeare Survey 2 [1949], pp. 44–61.) Only in the Cade sequence of 2 Henry VI and in Sir Thomas More, if indeed both are his work, did Shakespeare treat at large the issues raised by popular insurrection—a most ticklish subject for any playwright to explore (as the heavy censorship of More testifies), and one most topical in the disturbed early 1590’s. The political point of view, at once conservative and considerate, inherent in More’s pacification of the unruly mob and in the Cade episodes of Henry VI seems suggestively consistent.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

In 1594 appeared an anonymous quarto (Q) entitled “THE/First part of the Con-/tention betwixt the two famous Houses of Yorke/and Lancaster, with the death of the good/Duke Humphrey:/And the banishment and death of the Duke of/Suffolke, and the Tragickall end of the proud Cardinall/of Winchester, with the notable Rebellion/of Iacke Cade:/And the Duke of Yorkes first claime unto the/Crowne,” consisting of some 2200 lines which parallel closely and occasionally match the 1623 Folio (F) text of 2 Henry VI. Considered as an independent play, Q is shorter, cruder, and vastly inferior in language and characterization to F, but its relationship to the “finished” work offers an interesting problem. As early as 1734 it was theorized, by Lewis Theobald, that Q represents a primitive version of the play later revised by Shakespeare and published. In 1787 Edmond Malone, taking Greene’s famous slur on the “upstart crow” (see the General Introduction, pp. 2–3) to imply plagiarism on Shakespeare’s part, suggested that Greene, and Peele, or possibly (1821) Marlowe, were the original authors of The Contention and its companion piece, The True Tragedie of Richard Duke of Yorke (1595), which bears a similar relation to 3 Henry VI.

In the late 1920’s, however, with the studies of Peter Alexander (Shakespeare’s Henry VI and Richard III, 1929) and Madeleine Doran (Henry VI, 1928), a different explanation was advanced: that Q is actually a mutilated and wholly derivative “bad” version of the “good” text preserved in the Folio; that it derives, like many other unauthorized Elizabethan quartos, from a memorial reconstruction of the acted play—possibly by the bit-player who took the parts of the Armorer, the Spirit, the Mayor, Vaux, and Scales. In support of this explanation it has been shown that Q contains frequent echoes of unrelated contemporary plays such as Marlowe’s Edward II, and Arden of Feversham, as if the “reporter” who furnished the copy to the typesetter were fleshing out what he had memorized imperfectly with scraps of the rest of his reportory. The F text is relatively free of such contaminations.

Some modern scholars (Feuillerat, Prouty, J. D. Wilson) argue for a return to the “revision” theory, but the consensus opposes them. Good summaries of the conflicting evidence, and a discussion of the complications compounded by the third quarto (1619) of The Contention, may be found in G. B. Evans’ review of Prouty’s “The Contention” and Shakespeare’s “2 Henry VI” (JEGP, LIII [1954], 628–37) and J. G. McManaway, “The Contention and 2 Henry VI,” Wiener Beiträge zur Englischen Philologie, LXV (1957), 143–54.

As a “bad” quarto, the textual utility of Q is slight, except in its stage directions, which are frequently fuller than those of F (for example, I.i.51 s.d., which occurs only in Q). In some passages, however (for example, II.i.124 ff., II.iii.58 s.d. ff.), the F editors appear to have used slices of Q as printer’s copy, possibly when the holograph script they employed primarily was defective or illegible; and in such instances the F text is likely to be mediocre, or misaligned (I.i.62–63), and Q readings may be preferable. Basically the copy for F seems to have been an author’s manuscript or “foul papers,” but there is evidence as well of a theatrical bookkeeper’s interpolations and cuts.

This edition follows F except where indicated in the following; stage directions derived from Q are so designated. Editorial additions are set off in square brackets; spelling, punctuation, and capitalization have been modernized; and names in speech prefixes and stage directions (for example, Duke Humphrey alias Gloucester, Winchester alias Beaufort alias Cardinal) regularized. In a few instances verse has been slightly rearranged. The following list of significant departures from F gives the reading of the present text in boldface, followed by a bracketed [Q] if the quarto provides the reading, and the F text, literatim, in roman.

And then enter the Duke of Suffolke to them." But the F stage directions here, and at III.ii.148 below, appear to intend eliminating this use of the inner stage: thus "Bed put forth" rather than "Warwicke drawes the curtaines and shoves Duke Humphrey in his bed," and the lines of explanatory dialogue (III.ii.1-4) not found in Q. The Q staging, however, seems more efficient and theatrical, and has been partially retained in this text 14 s.d. Scene I. [London. The palace.]

Flourish° of trumpets: then hautboys.° Enter at one door KING Henry the Sixth, and Humphrey, Duke of GLOUCESTER, the Duke of SOMERSET, the Duke of BUCKINGHAM, CARDINAL Beaufort, and others. Enter at the other door the Duke of YORK, and the Marquess of SUFFOLK, and QUEEN Margaret, and the Earls of SALISBURY and WARWICK.

SUFFOLK

As by your high imperial majesty
I had in charge at my depart for France,
As procurator° to your excellence,
To marry Princess Margaret for your grace,
So in the famous ancient city, Tours, 5
In presence of the Kings of France and Sicil,
The Dukes of Orleans, Calaber,° Bretagne and Alençon, Seven earls, twelve barons, and twenty reverend bishops,
I have performed my task and was espoused,
And humbly now upon my bended knee, 10
In sight of England and her lordly peers,
Deliver up my title in the queen
To your most gracious hands, that are the substance
Of that great shadow I did represent—
The happiest° gift that ever the marquess gave, 15
The fairest queen that ever king received.

KING

Suffolk, arise. Welcome, Queen Margaret:
I can express no kinder sign of love
Than this kind° kiss. O Lord, that lends me life,
Lend me a heart replete with thankfulness! 20
For thou hast given me in this beauteous face
A world of earthly blessings to my soul,
If sympathy of love unite our thoughts.

QUEEN

Great King of England and my gracious lord,
The mutual conference° that my mind hath had, 25
By day, by night, waking, and in my dreams,
In courtly company or at my beads,
With you mine alderliest° sovereign,
Makes me the bolder to salute my king
With ruder terms, such as my wit° affords 30
And overjoy of heart doth minister.°

KING

Her sight did ravish, but her grace in speech,
Her words yclad° with wisdom's majesty,
Makes me from wond'ring fall to weeping joys,
Such is the fullness of my heart's content. 35
Lords, with one cheerful voice welcome my love.

ALL (Kneel.)

Long live Queen Margaret, England's happiness!

QUEEN

We thank you all.

Flourish.

SUFFOLK

My Lord Protector, so it please your grace,
Here are the articles of contracted peace 40
Between our sovereign and the French king Charles,
For eighteen months concluded by consent.

GLOUCESTER (Reads.)

"Imprimis,° It is agreed between the French king
Charles, and William de la Pole, Marquess of Suffolk, ambassador for Henry King of England, that the said 45
Henry shall espouse the Lady Margaret, daughter unto Reignier King of Naples, Sicilia, and Jerusalem, and crown her Queen of England ere the thirtieth of May next ensuing. Item, That the duchy of Anjou and the county of Maine shall be released and delivered to 50
the king her father"—

GLOUCESTER lets it fall.

10 KING

Uncle, how now?

GLOUCESTER Pardon me, gracious lord;
Some sudden qualm hath struck me at the heart,
And dimmed mine eyes, that I can read no further.

15 KING

Uncle of Winchester, I pray read on. 55

CARDINAL [Reads.]

"Item, It is further agreed between them, that the duchies of Anjou and Maine shall be released and delivered over to the king her father, and she sent over of the King of England's own proper° cost and charges, without having any dowry." 60

KING

They please us well.
Lord Marquess, kneel down: we here create thee
First Duke of Suffolk, and girt thee with the sword.
Cousin of York, we here discharge your grace 65
From being regent i' th' parts of France,
Till term of eighteen months be full expired.
Thanks, uncle Winchester, Gloucester, York,
Buckingham, Somerset, Salisbury, and Warwick;
We thank you all for this great favor done, 70
In entertainment° to my princely queen.
Come, let us in, and with all speed provide
To see her coronation be performed.

Exit KING, QUEEN, and SUFFOLK; and GLOUCESTER stays all the rest.

35 GLOUCESTER

Brave peers of England, pillars of the state,
To you Duke Humphrey must unload his grief—
Your grief, the common grief of all the land. 75
What! Did my brother Henry spend his youth,
His valor, coin, and people, in the wars?
Did he so often lodge in open field,
In winter's cold, and summer's parching heat,
To conquer France, his true inheritance?° 80

43 Imprimis in the first place 59 proper personal 70 entertainment welcome 80 inheritance by his marriage with Katherine of Valois (see Henry V, V.ii.333)

And did my brother Bedford^o toil his wits,
 To keep by policy^o what Henry got?
 Have you yourselves, Somerset, Buckingham,
 Brave York, Salisbury, and victorious Warwick,
 Received deep scars in France and Normandy?
 Or hath mine uncle Beaufort and myself,
 With all the learnèd council^o of the realm,
 Studied so long, sat in the council house
 Early and late, debating to and fro
 How France and Frenchmen might be kept in awe,
 And had his highness in his infancy
 Crownèd in Paris in despite of foes?
 And shall these labors and these honors die?
 Shall Henry's conquest, Bedford's vigilance,
 Your deeds of war, and all our counsel die?
 O peers of England, shameful is this league!
 Fatal this marriage, canceling your fame,
 Blotting your names from books of memory,
 Razing the characters^o of your renown,
 Defacing monuments of conquered France,
 Undoing all, as all had never been.

CARDINAL

Nephew, what means this passionate discourse,
 This peroration with such circumstance?^o
 For France, 'tis ours; and we will keep it still.

GLOUCESTER

Ay, uncle, we will keep it, if we can;
 But now it is impossible we should.
 Suffolk, the new-made duke that rules the roast,^o
 Hath given the duchy of Anjou and Maine
 Unto the poor Reignier, whose large style
 Agrees^o not with the leanness of his purse.

SALISBURY

Now, by the death of Him that died for all,
 These counties were the keys of Normandy!
 But wherefore weeps Warwick, my valiant son?

WARWICK

For grief that they are past recovery:
 For, were there hope to conquer them again,
 My sword should shed hot blood, mine eyes no tears.
 Anjou and Maine! myself did win them both;
 Those provinces these arms of mine did conquer:
 And are the cities that I got with wounds
 Delivered up again with peaceful words?
 Mort Dieu!^o

YORK

For Suffolk's duke, may he be suffocate
 That dims the honor of this warlike isle!
 France should have torn and rent my very heart
 Before I would have yielded to this league.
 I never read but England's kings have had Large sums of gold and dowries with their wives;
 And our King Henry gives away his own,
 To match with her that brings no vantages.^o

GLOUCESTER

 For costs and charges in transporting her!
 She should have stayed in France, and sterved^o in France,
 Before—

CARDINAL

My Lord of Gloucester, now ye grow too hot: 135
 It was the pleasure of my lord the king.

GLOUCESTER

My Lord of Winchester, I know your mind;
 'Tis not my speeches that you do mislike,
 But 'tis my presence that doth trouble ye.
 Rancor will out: proud prelate, in thy face 140
 I see thy fury. If I longer stay,
 We shall begin our ancient bickerings.
 Lordings, farewell, and say, when I am gone,
 I prophesied France will be lost ere long.

Exit GLOUCESTER.

CARDINAL

So, there goes our protector in a rage. 145
 'Tis known to you he is mine enemy—
 Nay more, an enemy unto you all,
 And no great friend, I fear me, to the king.
 Consider, lords, he is the next of blood,
 And heir apparent to the English crown: 150
 Had Henry got an empire by his marriage,
 And all the wealthy kingdoms of the west,
 There's reason he should be displeased at it.
 Look to it, lords: let not his smoothing words
 Bewitch your hearts, be wise and circumspect. 155
 What though the common people favor him,
 Calling him "Humphrey, the good Duke of Gloucester," Clapping their hands, and crying with loud voice,
 "Jesu maintain your royal excellence!"
 With "God preserve the good Duke Humphrey!" 160
 I fear me, lords, for all this flattering gloss,
 He will be found a dangerous protector.

BUCKINGHAM

Why should he then protect our sovereign,
 He being of age to govern of himself?
 Cousin of Somerset, join you with me, 165
 And altogether with the Duke of Suffolk,
 We'll quickly hoise^o Duke Humphrey from his seat.

CARDINAL

This weighty business will not brook^o delay;
 I'll to the Duke of Suffolk presently.^o

Exit CARDINAL.

SOMERSET

Cousin of Buckingham, though Humphrey's pride 170
 And greatness of his place^o be grief to us,
 Yet let us watch the haughty cardinal.
 His insolence is more intolerable
 Than all the princes' in the land beside.
 If Gloucester be displaced, he'll be protector. 175

BUCKINGHAM

Or thou or^o I, Somerset, will be protector,
 Despite Duke Humphrey or the cardinal.

Exit BUCKINGHAM and SOMERSET.

SALISBURY

Pride went before, ambition follows him.
 While these do labor for their own preferment,
 Behoves° it us to labor for the realm. 180
 I never saw but Humphrey Duke of Gloucester
 Did bear him like a noble gentleman.
 Oft have I seen the haughty cardinal,
 More like a soldier than a man o' th' church,
 As stout° and proud as he were lord of all, 185
 Swear like a ruffian and demean himself
 Unlike the ruler of a commonweal.
 Warwick, my son, the comfort of my age,
 Thy deeds, thy plainness, and thy housekeeping,°
 Hath won the greatest favor of the commons, 190
 Excepting none but good Duke Humphrey:
 And, brother York, thy acts in Ireland,
 In bringing them to civil discipline,
 Thy late exploits done in the heart of France,
 When thou wert regent for our sovereign, 195
 Have made thee feared and honored of the people:
 Join we together for the public good,
 In what we can, to bridle and suppress
 The pride of Suffolk and the cardinal,
 With Somerset's and Buckingham's ambition; 200
 And, as we may, cherish Duke Humphrey's deeds,
 While they do tend° the profit of the land.

WARWICK

So God help Warwick, as he loves the land,
 And common profit of his country!

YORK

And so says York—[aside] for he hath greatest cause. 205

SALISBURY

Then let's make haste away, and look unto the main.°

WARWICK

Unto the main! O father, Maine is lost,
 That Maine which by main force Warwick did win,
 And would have kept so long as breath did last!
 Main chance, father, you meant, but I meant Maine, 210
 Which I will win from France, or else be slain.

Exit WARWICK and SALISBURY; manet° YORK.

YORK

Anjou and Maine are given to the French;
 Paris is lost; the state of Normandy
 Stands on a tickle point° now° they are gone:
 Suffolk concluded on the articles, 215
 The peers agreed, and Henry was well pleased
 To change two dukedoms for a duke's fair daughter.
 I cannot blame them all—what is't to them?
 'Tis thine they give away, and not their own.
 Pirates may make cheap pennyworths of their pillage,° 220
 And purchase friends, and give to courtesans,
 Still reveling like lords till all be gone;
 While as the silly° owner of the goods
 Weeps over them and wrings his hapless hands,
 And shakes his head and trembling stands aloof, 225
 While all is shared and all is borne away,
 Ready to sterve and dare not touch his own:

So York must sit, and fret, and bite his tongue,
 While his own lands are bargained for and sold.
 Methinks the realms of England, France, and Ireland 230
 Bear that proportion to my flesh and blood
 As did the fatal brand Althaea° burned
 Unto the prince's heart of Calydon.°
 Anjou and Maine both given unto the French?
 Cold news for me, for I had hope of France, 235
 Even as I have of fertile England's soil.
 A day will come when York shall claim his own;
 And therefore I will take the Nevils' parts
 And make a show of love to proud Duke Humphrey,
 And, when I spy advantage, claim the crown, 240
 For that's the golden mark I seek to hit.
 Nor shall proud Lancaster° usurp my right,
 Nor hold the scepter in his childish fist,
 Nor wear the diadem upon his head,
 Whose churchlike humors° fits not for a crown. 245
 Then, York, be still awhile, till time do serve:
 Watch thou and wake, when others be asleep,
 To pry into the secrets of the state;
 Till Henry surfeit in the joys of love
 With his new bride and England's dear-bought queen, 250
 And Humphrey with the peers be fall'n at jars:°
 Then will I raise aloft the milk-white rose,
 With whose sweet smell the air shall be perfumed,
 And in my standard bear the arms of York,
 To grapple with the house of Lancaster; 255
 And, force perforce,° I'll make him yield the crown,
 Whose bookish° rule hath pulled fair England down.

Exit YORK.

[Scene II. The Duke of Gloucester's house.]

Enter GLOUCESTER and his wife [DUCHESS] Eleanor.

DUCHESS

Why droops my lord, like overripened corn
 Hanging the head at Ceres'° plenteous load?
 Why doth the great Duke Humphrey knit his brows,
 As frowning at the favors of the world?
 Why are thine eyes fixed to the sullen° earth, 5
 Gazing on that which seems to dim thy sight?
 What sec'st thou there? King Henry's diadem,
 Enchased° with all the honors of the world?
 If so, gaze on, and grovel on thy face,
 Until thy head be circled with the same. 10
 Put forth thy hand, reach at the glorious gold.
 What, is't too short? I'll lengthen it with mine;
 And, having both together heaved it up,
 We'll both together lift our heads to heaven,
 And never more abase our sight so low 15
 As to vouchsafe one glance unto the ground.

GLOUCESTER

O Nell, sweet Nell, if thou dost love thy lord,
Banish the canker of ambitious thoughts:
And may that thought, when I imagine ill
Against my king and nephew, virtuous Henry,
Be my last breathing in this mortal world!
My troublous dreams this night^o doth make me sad.

DUCHESS

What dreamed my lord? Tell me, and I'll requite it
With sweet rehearsal of my morning's dream.^o

GLOUCESTER

Methought this staff, mine office badge in court,
Was broke in twain: by whom, I have forgot,
But as I think, it was by th' cardinal;
And on the pieces of the broken wand
Were placed the heads of Edmund Duke of Somerset,
And William de la Pole, first Duke of Suffolk.
This was my dream: what it doth bode, God knows.

DUCHESS

Tut, this was nothing but an argument
That he that breaks a stick of Gloucester's grove
Shall lose his head for his presumption.
But list to me, my Humphrey, my sweet duke:
Methought I sat in seat of majesty
In the cathedral church of Westminster,
And in that chair where kings and queens were crowned;
Where Henry and Dame Margaret kneeled to me,
And on my head did set the diadem.

GLOUCESTER

Nay, Eleanor, then must I chide outright:
Presumptuous dame, ill-nurtured Eleanor,
Art thou not second woman in the realm,
And the protector's wife, beloved of him?
Hast thou not worldly pleasure at command
Above the reach or compass of thy thought?
And wilt thou still be hammering^o treachery,
To tumble down thy husband and thyself
From top of honor to disgrace's feet?
Away from me, and let me hear no more!

DUCHESS

What, what, my lord! Are you so choleric^o
With Eleanor, for telling but her dream?
Next time I'll keep my dreams unto myself,
And not be checked.

GLOUCESTER

Nay, be not angry; I am pleased again.

Enter MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

My Lord Protector, 'tis his highness' pleasure
You do prepare to ride unto Saint Albans,
Where as^o the king and queen do mean to hawk.^o

GLOUCESTER

I go. Come, Nell, thou wilt ride with us?

DUCHESS

Yes, my good lord, I'll follow presently.^o

Exit GLOUCESTER [and MESSENGER].

Follow I must; I cannot go before,
While Gloucester bears this base and humble mind.
Were I a man, a duke, and next of blood,^o
I would remove these tedious stumbling blocks
And smooth my way upon their headless necks;
And, being a woman, I will not be slack
To play my part in fortune's pageant.
Where are you there, Sir John? Nay, fear not, man,
We are alone; here's none but thee and I.

Enter HUM.

HUM

Jesus preserve your royal majesty!

DUCHESS

What say'st thou, "majesty"? I am but grace.

HUM

But, by the grace of God, and Hum's advice,
Your grace's title shall be multiplied.^o

DUCHESS

What say'st thou, man? Hast thou as yet conferred
With Margery Jourdain, the cunning witch,
With Roger Bolingbroke, the conjuror?
And will they undertake to do me good?

HUM

This they have promised, to show your highness
A spirit raised from depth of underground,
That shall make answer to such questions
As by your grace shall be propounded him.

DUCHESS

It is enough: I'll think upon the questions.
When from Saint Albans we do make return,
We'll see these things effected to the full.
Here, Hum, take this reward; make merry, man,
With thy confederates in this weighty cause.

Exit [DUCHESS] Eleanor.

HUM

Hum must make merry with the duchess' gold;
Marry,^o and shall. But how now, Sir John Hum!
Seal up your lips, and give no words but mum:
The business asketh^o silent secrecy.
Dame Eleanor gives gold to bring the witch:
Gold cannot come amiss, were she a devil.
Yet have I gold flies from another coast^o—
I dare not say, from the rich cardinal
And from the great and new-made Duke of Suffolk.
Yet I do find it so—for, to be plain,
They, knowing Dame Eleanor's aspiring humor,^o
Have hired me to undermine the duchess
And buzz these conjurations^o in her brain.
They say, "A crafty knave does need no broker";
Yet am I Suffolk and the cardinal's broker.^o
Hum, if you take not heed, you shall go near
To call them both a pair of crafty knaves.
Well, so it stands; and thus, I fear, at last
Hum's knavery will be the duchess' wrack,^o
And her attainure^o will be Humphrey's fall.
Sort how it will, I shall have gold for all. Exit.

[Scene III. The palace.]

Enter three or four PETITIONERS; [PETER] the armorer's man, being one.

FIRST PETITIONER My masters, let's stand close: my Lord Protector will come this way by and by, and then we may deliver our supplications in the quill.^o

SECOND PETITIONER Marry, the Lord protect him, for he's a good man, Jesu bless him! 5

Enter SUFFOLK and QUEEN.

PETER Here 'a^o comes, methinks, and the queen with him. I'll be the first, sure.

SECOND PETITIONER Come back, fool! this is the Duke of Suffolk, and not my Lord Protector.

SUFFOLK How now, fellow! wouldst anything with 10 me?

FIRST PETITIONER I pray, my lord, pardon me: I took ye for my Lord Protector.

QUEEN For my Lord Protector! Are your supplications to his lordship? Let me see them: what is thine? 15

FIRST PETITIONER Mine is, and't please your grace, against John Goodman, my Lord Cardinal's man,^o for keeping my house, and lands, and wife and all, from me.

SUFFOLK Thy wife too! that's some wrong, indeed. 20 What's yours? What's here? [Reads.] "Against the Duke of Suffolk, for enclosing the commons^o of Melford." How now, sir knave!

SECOND PETITIONER Alas, sir, I am but a poor petitioner of our whole township. 25

PETER [Giving his petition.] Against my master, Thomas Horner, for saying that the Duke of York was rightful heir to the crown.

QUEEN What say'st thou? did the Duke of York say he was rightful heir to the crown? 30

PETER That my master was? No, forsooth: my master said that he was, and that the king was an usurper.

QUEEN An usurper, thou wouldst say.

PETER Ay, forsooth, an usurper.

SUFFOLK Who is there? (Enter SERVANT.) Take this 35 fellow in, and send for his master with a pursuivant^o presently. We'll hear more of your matter before the king. Exit [SERVANT, with PETER].

QUEEN And as for you, that love to be protected Under the wings of our protector's grace, 40 Begin your suits anew, and sue to him.

Tear[s] the supplication.

Away, base cullions!^o Suffolk, let them go.

ALL Come, let's be gone. Exit.

QUEEN My Lord of Suffolk, say, is this the guise,^o 45 Is this the fashions in the court of England? Is this the government of Britain's isle, And this the royalty of Albion's^o king?

What! Shall King Henry be a pupil still Under the surly Gloucester's governance? Am I a queen in title and in style,^o 50 And must be made a subject to a duke? I tell thee, Pole, when in the city Tours Thou ran'st atilt^o in honor of my love And stol'st away the ladies' hearts of France, I thought King Henry had resembled thee 55 In courage, courtship, and proportion:^o But all his mind is bent to holiness, To number Ave-Maries on his beads;^o His champions^o are the prophets and apostles, His weapons holy saws^o of sacred writ, 60 His study is his tilt yard, and his loves Are brazen images of canonized saints. I would the college of the cardinals Would choose him pope and carry him to Rome, And set the triple crown^o upon his head: 65 That were a state fit for his holiness.

SUFFOLK

Madam, be patient: as I was cause Your highness came to England, so will I In England work your grace's full content.

QUEEN

Beside the haughty protector, have we Beaufort 70 The imperious churchman, Somerset, Buckingham, And grumbling York; and not the least of these But can do more in England than the king.

SUFFOLK

And he of these that can do most of all Cannot do more in England than the Nevils: 75 Salisbury and Warwick are no simple peers.

QUEEN

Not all these lords do vex me half so much As that proud dame, the Lord Protector's wife: She sweeps it through the court with troops of ladies, 80 More like an empress than Duke Humphrey's wife. Strangers^o in court do take her for the queen: She bears a duke's revenues on her back, And in her heart she scorns our poverty. Shall I not live to be avenged on her? Contemptuous^o base-born callet^o as she is, 85 She vaunted 'mongst her minions^o t' other day, The very train of her worst wearing gown Was better worth than all my father's lands, Till Suffolk gave two dukedoms for his daughter.

SUFFOLK

Madam, myself have limed a bush^o for her, 90 And placed a quire^o of such enticing birds That she will light to listen to the lays,^o And never mount to trouble you again. So let her rest: and, madam, list to me, For I am bold to counsel you in this: 95

Although we fancy not the cardinal,
 Yet must we join with him and with the lords,
 Till we have brought Duke Humphrey in disgrace.
 As for the Duke of York, this late complaint^o
 Will make but little for his benefit.
 So, one by one, we'll weed them all at last,
 And you yourself shall steer the happy^o helm.

Sound a sennet.^o Enter KING Henry, and the Duke of YORK and the Duke of SOMERSET on both sides of the KING, whispering with him; and enter GLOUCESTER, Dame [DUCHESS] Eleanor, the Duke of BUCKINGHAM, SALISBURY, the Earl of WARWICK, and the CARDINAL of Winchester.

KING

For my part, noble lords, I care not which:
 Or Somerset or York, all's one to me.

YORK

If York have ill demeaned himself in France,
 Then let him be denayed^o the regentship.

SOMERSET

If Somerset be unworthy of the place,
 Let York be regent; I will yield to him.

WARWICK

Whether your grace be worthy, yea or no,
 Dispute not that: York is the worthier.

CARDINAL

Ambitious Warwick, let thy betters speak.

WARWICK

The cardinal's not my better in the field.

BUCKINGHAM

All in this presence are thy betters,^o Warwick.

WARWICK

Warwick may live to be the best of all.

SALISBURY

Peace, son; and show some reason, Buckingham,
 Why Somerset should be preferred in this.^o

QUEEN

Because the king, forsooth, will have it so.

GLOUCESTER

Madam, the king is old enough himself
 To give his censure.^o These are no women's matters.

QUEEN

If he be old enough, what needs your grace
 To be protector of his excellence?

GLOUCESTER

Madam, I am protector of the realm,
 And at his pleasure will resign my place.

SUFFOLK

Resign it then and leave thine insolence.
 Since thou wert king—as who is king but thou?—
 The commonwealth hath daily run to wrack,
 The Dolphin^o hath prevailed beyond the seas,
 And all the peers and nobles of the realm
 Have been as bondmen^o to thy sovereignty.

CARDINAL

The commons hast thou racked; the clergy's bags
 Are lank and lean with thy extortions.

SOMERSET

Thy sumptuous buildings and thy wife's attire
 Have cost a mass of public treasury.

BUCKINGHAM

100 Thy cruelty in execution
 Upon offenders hath exceeded law, 135
 And left thee to the mercy of the law.

QUEEN

Thy sale of offices and towns in France,
 If they were known, as the suspect^o is great,
 Would make thee quickly hop without thy head.

Exit GLOUCESTER.

[The QUEEN drops her fan.]

Give me my fan! What, minion, can ye not? 140

She gives the DUCHESS a box on the ear.

I cry you mercy,^o madam; was it you?

105

DUCHESS

Was't I! Yea, I it was, proud Frenchwoman:
 Could I come near your beauty with my nails,
 I'd set my ten commandments in your face.^o

KING

Sweet aunt, be quiet;^o 'twas against her will.^o 145

DUCHESS

110

Against her will, good king? Look to't, in time
 She'll hamper thee, and dandle thee like a baby.
 Though in this place most master^o wear no breeches,
 She shall not strike Dame Eleanor unrevenged.

Exit [DUCHESS] Eleanor.

BUCKINGHAM

Lord Cardinal, I will follow Eleanor, 150
 And listen after Humphrey, how he proceeds.
 She's tickled^o now; her fury needs no spurs,
 She'll gallop far enough to her destruction.

Exit BUCKINGHAM.

Enter GLOUCESTER.

GLOUCESTER

Now, lords, my choler being overblown
 With walking once about the quadrangle, 155
 I come to talk of commonwealth affairs.
 As for your spiteful false objections,^o
 Prove them, and I lie open to the law:
 But God in mercy so deal with my soul,
 As I in duty love my king and country! 160
 But to the matter that we have in hand:
 I say, my sovereign, York is meetest^o man
 To be your regent in the realm of France.

SUFFOLK

125

Before we make election, give me leave
 To show some reason, of no little force, 165
 That York is most unmeet of any man.

YORK

I'll tell thee, Suffolk, why I am unmeet:
 First, for I cannot flatter thee in pride;^o

138 suspect suspicion 141 cry you mercy beg your pardon 144 set . . . face mark with fingernails 145 quiet calm; against her will unwittingly 148 most master the greatest master (i.e., here the wife rules the house) 152 tickled provoked, touched 157 objections accusations 162 meetest most suitable 168 for . . . pride because I cannot entertain you sumptuously

Next, if I be appointed for the place,
My Lord of Somerset will keep me here,
Without discharge,^o money, or furniture,^o
Till France be won into the Dolphin's hands.
Last time, I danced attendance on his will Till Paris was besieged, famished, and lost.

WARWICK
That can I witness; and a fouler fact^o
Did never traitor in the land commit.

SUFFOLK
Peace, headstrong Warwick!

WARWICK
Image^o of pride, why should I hold my peace?

Enter [HORNER the] armorer and [PETER] his man [both guarded].

SUFFOLK
Because here is a man accused of treason.
Pray God the Duke of York excuse himself!

YORK
Doth anyone accuse York for^o a traitor?

KING
What mean'st thou, Suffolk? Tell me, what are these?

SUFFOLK
Please it your majesty, this is the man
That doth accuse his master of high treason.
His words were these: that Richard Duke of York
Was rightful heir unto the English crown,
And that your majesty was an usurper.

KING
Say, man, were these thy words?

HORNER And't shall please your majesty, I never said nor thought any such matter! God is my witness, 190
I am falsely accused by the villain.

PETER By these ten bones,^o my lords, he did speak them to me in the garret one night, as we were scouring my Lord of York's armor.

YORK
Base dunghill villain and mechanical,^o 195
I'll have thy head for this thy traitor's speech!
I do beseech your royal majesty,
Let him have all the rigor of the law.

HORNER Alas, my lord, hang me if ever I spake the words! My accuser is my prentice,^o and when I did 200 correct him for his fault^o the other day, he did vow upon his knees he would be even with me: I have good witness of this; therefore I beseech your majesty, do not cast away an honest man for a villain's accusation. 205

KING
Uncle, what shall we say to this in law?

GLOUCESTER
This doom,^o my lord, if I may judge:
Let Somerset be regent o'er the French,
Because in York this breeds suspicion.^o
And let these have a day appointed them 210

For single combat,^o in convenient^o place,
For he hath witness of his servant's malice.
This is the law, and this Duke Humphrey's doom.

SOMERSET
I humbly thank your royal majesty.

HORNER
And I accept the combat willingly. 215

175 PETER Alas, my lord, I cannot fight; for God's sake, pity my case! The spite of man prevaileth against me. O Lord, have mercy upon me! I shall never be able to fight a blow. O Lord, my heart!

GLOUCESTER
Sirrah,^o or you must fight, or else be hanged. 220

KING Away with them to prison; and the day of combat shall be the last of the next month. Come,
Somerset, we'll see thee sent away. Flourish; exeunt.

[Scene IV. A garden outside Gloucester's house.
Before a tower.]

*Enter the witch [MARGERY JOURDAIN], the two priests [HUM and SOUTHWELL], and BOLINGBROKE
[the conjuror].*

HUM Come, my masters; the duchess, I tell you, expects performance of your promises.

BOLINGBROKE Master Hum, we are therefore provided:^o will her ladyship behold and hear our exorcisms?^o 5

HUM Ay, what else? Fear^o you not her courage.

BOLINGBROKE I have heard her reported to be a woman of an invincible spirit: but it shall be convenient, Master Hum, that you be by her aloft, while we be busy below; and so, I pray you, go, 10
in God's name, and leave us. (Exit HUM.) Mother
Jourdain, be you prostrate and grovel on the earth;
John Southwell, read you; and let us to our work.

Enter DUCHESS aloft, [HUM following].

DUCHESS Well said, my masters; and welcome all.
To this gear,^o the sooner the better. 15

BOLINGBROKE
Patience, good lady; wizards know their times.
Deep night, dark night, the silent^o of the night,
The time of night when Troy was set on fire,
The time when screech owls cry, and ban-dogs^o howl,
And spirits walk, and ghosts break up their graves— 20
That time best fits the work we have in hand.
Madam, sit you, and fear not: whom we raise
We will make fast within a hallowed verge.^o

*Here [they] do the ceremonies belonging, and make the circle; BOLINGBROKE or SOUTHWELL reads, "Conjuro

MARGERY JOURDAIN

Asnath,^o

By the eternal God, whose name and power
Thou tremblest at, answer that I shall ask:
For till thou speak, thou shalt not pass from hence.

SPIRIT

Ask what thou wilt. That I had said and done!

BOLINGBROKE [Consulting a paper.]

First of the king: what shall of him become?

SPIRIT

The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose,
But him outlive, and die a violent death.^o

[SOUTHWELL writes out the questions and answers.]

BOLINGBROKE

What fates await the Duke of Suffolk?

SPIRIT

By water shall he die, and take his end.

BOLINGBROKE

What shall befall the Duke of Somerset?

SPIRIT

Let him shun castles:
Safer shall he be upon the sandy plains
Than where castles mounted stand.
Have done, for more I hardly can endure.

BOLINGBROKE

Descend to darkness and the burning lake!
False fiend, avoid!^o

Thunder and lightning; he sinks down again.Enter the Duke of YORK and the Duke of BUCKINGHAM with their GUARD and break in.

YORK

Lay hands upon these traitors and their trash.
Beldam, I think we watched you at an inch.^o
What, madam, are you there? The king and commonweal
Are deeply indebted for this piece of pains.^o
My Lord Protector will, I doubt it not,
See you well guerdoned^o for these good deserts.

DUCHESS

Not half so bad as thine to England's king,
Injurious^o duke, that threatest where's no cause.

BUCKINGHAM

True, madam, none at all: what call you this?
Away with them! Let them be clapped up close,
And kept asunder. You, madam, shall with us.
Stafford, take her to thee.

*Exit DUCHESS above [and HUM, guarded].*We'll see your trinkets^o here all forthcoming.

All, away!

Exit [MARGERY JOURDAIN, SOUTHWELL, and BOLINGBROKE, with the rest of the GUARD].

24 Adsum here I am 25 Asnath obscure; possibly an anagram for Sathan 31-32 The . . . death a typically cryptic and ambiguous prophecy: either "The duke who will depose Henry is now living" or "The duke Henry will depose is now living" (see lines 62-63) 41 avoid go hence 43 at an inch closely (enough) 45 piece of pains masterpiece of service (ironic) 47 guerdoned rewarded 49 Injurious abusive 54 trinkets the conjuring apparatus, including Southwell's written record

YORK

Lord Buckingham, methinks you watched her well:
A pretty plot, well chosen to build upon!
Now, pray, my lord, let's see the devil's writ.
What have we here?

Reads.

"The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose;
But him outlive, and die a violent death."

Why, this is just "Aio te Acacida, Romanos vincere posse."^o Well, to the rest:

"Tell me what fate awaits the Duke of Suffolk?"

By water shall he die, and take his end.

What shall betide the Duke of Somerset?

Let him shun castles;

Safer shall he be upon the sandy plains

Than where castles mounted stand."

Come, come, my lords, these oracles are hard,

Hardly attained, and hardly^o understood.

The king is now in progress towards Saint Albans;

With him, the husband of this lovely^o lady.

Thither goes these news, as fast as horse can carry them—

A sorry breakfast for my Lord Protector.

BUCKINGHAM

Your grace shall give me leave, my Lord of York,
To be the post,^o in hope of his reward.

YORK

At your pleasure, my good lord. Who's within there, ho!

Enter a SERVINGMAN.

Invite my Lords of Salisbury and Warwick

To sup with me tomorrow night. Away! Exeunt. 80

[A C T I I]

[Scene I. Saint Albans.]

Enter the KING, QUEEN, with a hawk on her fist, GLOUCESTER, CARDINAL, and SUFFOLK, with FALCONERS hallooing.

QUEEN

Believe me, lords, for flying at the brook,^o
I saw not better sport these seven years' day:
Yet, by your leave, the wind was very high;
And, ten to one, old Joan had not gone out.^o

KING

But what a point,^o my lord, your falcon made,
And what a pitch^o she flew above the rest!

62-63 Aio . . . posse from Ennius, the ambiguous response of the Pythian oracle Apollo to King Pyrrhus, when Pyrrhus asked if he would conquer Rome: either "I affirm that you, descendant of Aeacus, can conquer the Romans" or "I affirm that the Romans can conquer you, etc." 70-71 hard . . . To see how God in all his creatures works!
Yea, man and birds are fain of climbing high.

SUFFOLK

No marvel, and it like your majesty,
My Lord Protector's hawks do tow'r so well:
They know their master loves to be aloft,
And bears his thoughts above his falcon's pitch.

GLOUCESTER

My lord, 'tis but a base ignoble mind
That mounts no higher than a bird can soar.

CARDINAL

I thought as much: he would be above the clouds.

GLOUCESTER

Ay, my Lord Cardinal, how think you by that?
Were it not good your grace could fly to heaven?

KING

The treasury of everlasting joy.

CARDINAL

Thy heaven is on earth; thine eyes and thoughts
Beat on° a crown, the treasure of thy heart.
Pernicious protector, dangerous peer,
That smooth'st it° so with king and commonweal!

GLOUCESTER

What, cardinal, is your priesthood grown peremp-tory?°
Tantaene animis coelestibus irae!°
Churchmen so hot? Good uncle, can you dote,°
To hide such malice with such holiness?

SUFFOLK

No malice, sir; no more than well becomes
So good a quarrel and so bad a peer.

GLOUCESTER

As who, my lord?

SUFFOLK

Why, as you, my lord,
An't like your lordly lord protectorship.

GLOUCESTER

Why, Suffolk, England knows thine insolence.

QUEEN

And thy ambition, Gloucester.

KING

I prithee peace,
Good queen, and whet not on these furious peers,
For blessèd are the peacemakers on earth.

CARDINAL

Let me be blessèd for the peace I make,
Against this proud protector, with my sword!

GLOUCESTER [Aside.]

Faith, holy uncle, would 'twere come to that!

CARDINAL [Aside.]

Marry, when thou dar'st.

GLOUCESTER [Aside.]

Make up no factious numbers for the matter;°
In thine own person answer thy abuse.

CARDINAL [Aside.]

Ay, where thou dar'st not peep: and if° thou dar'st,

This evening, on the east side of the grove.

KING

How now, my lords!

CARDINAL

Believe me, cousin Gloucester,

Had not your man° put up the fowl° so suddenly, 45
We had had more sport. [Aside.] Come with thy two-hand sword.

GLOUCESTER True, uncle.

CARDINAL [Aside.]

Are ye advised?° The east side of the grove?

GLOUCESTER [Aside.]

Cardinal, I am with you.

15 KING Why, how now, uncle Gloucester!

GLOUCESTER

Talking of hawking; nothing else, my lord.

[Aside.]

50

Now, by God's mother, priest, I'll shave your crown for this.

Or all my fence° shall fail.

20 CARDINAL [Aside.]

Medice, teipsum°—

Protector, see to't well, protect yourself.

KING

The winds grow high, so do your stomachs,° lords.

How irksome is this music to my heart!

55

When such strings jar, what hope of harmony?

25 I pray, my lords, let me compound° this strife.

Enter one [TOWNSMAN] crying, "A miracle!"

GLOUCESTER

What means this noise?

Fellow, what miracle dost thou proclaim?

[TOWNSMAN]

60

A miracle! a miracle!

30 SUFFOLK

Come to the king and tell him what miracle.

[TOWNSMAN]

Forsooth, a blind man at Saint Alban's shrine,

Within this half hour hath received his sight—

A man that ne'er saw in his life before.

65

Now, God be praised, that to believing souls
Gives light in darkness, comfort in despair!

35

Enter the MAYOR of Saint Albans and his BRETHREN, bearing the man [Saunders SIMPCOX] between two in a chair, [Simpcox' WIFE following].

CARDINAL

Here comes the townsmen, on° procession,
To present your highness with the man.

KING

Great is his comfort in this earthly vale,
Although by sight his sin be multiplied.°

40

70

GLOUCESTER

Stand by, my masters: bring him near the king:
His highness' pleasure is to talk with him.

KING

Good fellow, tell us here the circumstance,
That we for thee may glorify the Lord.
What, hast thou been long blind, and now restored?

75

SIMPCOX

Born blind, and't please your grace.

WIFE

Ay, indeed, was he.

SUFFOLK

What woman is this?

WIFE

His wife, and't like your worship.

80

GLOUCESTER

Hadst thou been his mother, thou couldst have better told.

KING

Where wert thou born?

SIMPCOX

At Berwick in the north, and't like your grace.

KING

Poor soul, God's goodness hath been great to thee:
Let never day nor night unhallowed pass,
But still° remember what the Lord hath done.

85

QUEEN

Tell me, good fellow, cam'st thou here by chance,
Or of devotion, to this holy shrine?

SIMPCOX

God knows, of pure devotion, being called
A hundred times and oftener, in my sleep,
By good Saint Alban; who said, "Simpcox, come,
Come, offer at my shrine, and I will help thee."

90

WIFE

Most true, forsooth; and many time and oft
Myself have heard a voice to call him so.

CARDINAL

What, art thou lame?

SIMPCOX

Ay, God Almighty help me.

95

SUFFOLK

How cam'st thou so?

SIMPCOX

A fall off of a tree.

WIFE

A plum tree, master.

GLOUCESTER

How long hast thou been blind?

SIMPCOX

O, born so, master.

GLOUCESTER

What, and wouldst climb a tree?

SIMPCOX

But that° in all my life, when I was a youth.

WIFE

Too true, and bought his climbing very dear.

100

GLOUCESTER

'Mass,° thou lov'dst plums well, that wouldst venture
so.

SIMPCOX

Alas, good master, my wife desired some damsons,
And made me climb, with danger of my life.

GLOUCESTER [Aside.]

A subtle knave! But yet it shall not serve.

Let me see thine eyes: wink° now, now open them.

105

In my opinion yet thou see'st not well.

SIMPCOX

Yes, master, clear as day, I thank God and Saint Alban.

GLOUCESTER

Say'st thou me so? What color is this cloak of?

SIMPCOX

Red, master; red as blood.

GLOUCESTER

Why, that's well said. What color is my gown of?

110

SIMPCOX

Black, forsooth, coal black, as jet.

KING

Why, then, thou know'st what color jet is of?

SUFFOLK

And yet, I think, jet did he never see.

GLOUCESTER

But cloaks and gowns, before this day, a many.

WIFE

Never, before this day, in all his life!

115

GLOUCESTER

Tell me, sirrah, what's my name?

SIMPCOX

Alas, master, I know not.

85

GLOUCESTER What's his name?

SIMPCOX I know not.

GLOUCESTER Nor his?

120

SIMPCOX

No, indeed, master.

GLOUCESTER

What's thine own name?

90

SIMPCOX

Saunder Simpcox, and if it please you, master.

GLOUCESTER Then, Saunder, sit there, the lying'st knave in Christendom. If thou hadst been born blind, thou mightst as well have known all our names as thus to name the several colors we do wear. Sight may distinguish of colors, but suddenly to nominate° them all, it is impossible. My lords, Saint Alban here hath done a miracle—and would ye not think his 130 cunning to be great that could restore this cripple

125

to his legs again?

SIMPCOX

O master, that you could!

GLOUCESTER

My masters of Saint Albans,

Have you not beadles° in your town,

135

And things called whips?

MAYOR

Yes, my lord, if it please your grace.

GLOUCESTER

Then send for one presently.

MAYOR

Sirrah, go fetch the beadle hither straight.

Exit [an ATTENDANT].

GLOUCESTER Now fetch me a stool hither by and by.

140

[They bring one.] Now, sirrah, if you mean to save yourself from whipping, leap me° over this stool and run away.

SIMPCOX

Alas, master, I am not able to stand alone:

86 still always 99 But that only once 101 'Mass by the

You go about to torture me in vain.

Enter a BEADLE with whips.

GLOUCESTER Well, sir, we must have you find your legs. Sirrah beadle, whip him till he leap over that same stool.

BEADLE I will, my lord. Come on, sirrah: off with your doublet quickly.

SIMPCOX Alas, master, what shall I do? I am not able to stand.

After the BEADLE hath hit him once, he leaps over the stool and runs away; and they follow and cry, "A miracle!"

KING

O God, see'st thou this, and bearest so long?

QUEEN

It made me laugh to see the villain run.

GLOUCESTER

Follow the knave, and take this drab^o away.

WIFE

Alas, sir, we did it for pure need.

GLOUCESTER

Let them be whipped through every market town
Till they come to Berwick, from whence they came.

Exit [MAYOR, BEADLE, WIFE, etc.].

CARDINAL

Duke Humphrey has done a miracle today.

SUFFOLK

True—made the lame to leap and fly away.

GLOUCESTER

But you have done more miracles than I:
You made in a day, my lord, whole towns to fly.^o

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

KING

What tidings with our cousin Buckingham?

BUCKINGHAM

Such as my heart doth tremble to unfold:
A sort of naughty persons, lewdly bent,^o
Under the countenance and confederacy^o
Of Lady Eleanor, the protector's wife,
The ringleader and head of all this rout,
Have practiced dangerously against your state,
Dealing with witches and with conjurors,
Whom we have apprehended in the fact,^o
Raising up wicked spirits from under ground,
Demanding of^o King Henry's life and death,
And other of your highness' privy council,
As more at large your grace shall understand.

CARDINAL [Aside.]

And so, my Lord Protector, by this means
Your lady is forthcoming^o yet at London.
This news, I think, hath turned your weapon's edge;
'Tis like, my lord, you will not keep your hour.^o

GLOUCESTER [Aside.]

Ambitious churchman, leave to afflict my heart:
Sorrow and grief have vanquished all my powers;

145

And, vanquished as I am, I yield to thee,
Or to the meanest groom.

KING

O God, what mischiefs work the wicked ones,
Heaping confusion on their own heads thereby!

185

QUEEN

Gloucester, see here the tainture^o of thy nest.
And look thyself be faultless, thou wert best.

GLOUCESTER

Madam, for myself, to heaven I do appeal,
How I have loved my king and commonweal!
And for my wife, I know not how it stands.
Sorry I am to hear what I have heard;
Noble she is; but if she have forgot
Honor and virtue and conversed with such
As, like to pitch, defile nobility,
I banish her my bed and company,
And give her as a prey to law and shame,
That hath dishonored Gloucester's honest name.

190

195

KING

Well, for this night we will repose us here:
Tomorrow toward London back again,
To look into this business thoroughly,
And call these foul offenders to their answers;
And poise the cause in justice' equal scales,
Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails.^o
Flourish. Exeunt.

200

[Scene II. London. The Duke of York's garden.]

Enter YORK, SALISBURY, and WARWICK.

YORK

Now, my good Lords of Salisbury and Warwick,
Our simple supper ended, give me leave,
In this close walk,^o to satisfy myself
In craving your opinion of my title,
Which is infallible, to England's crown.

165

SALISBURY

My lord, I long to hear it at full.

WARWICK

Sweet York, begin: and if thy claim be good,
The Nevils are thy subjects to command.

170

YORK

Then thus:
Edward the Third, my lords, had seven sons:
The first, Edward the Black Prince, Prince of Wales;
The second, William of Hatfield; and the third,
Lionel Duke of Clarence; next to whom
Was John of Gaunt, the Duke of Lancaster;
The fifth was Edmund Langley, Duke of York;
The sixth was Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of
Gloucester;
William of Windsor was the seventh and last.
Edward the Black Prince died before his father,
And left behind him Richard, his only son,
Who after Edward the Third's death reigned as king;
Till Henry Bolingbroke, Duke of Lancaster,
The eldest son and heir of John of Gaunt,

Crowned by the name of Henry the Fourth,
Seized on the realm, deposed the rightful king,
Sent his poor queen to France, from whence she came, 25
And him to Pomfret; where, as all you know,
Harmless Richard was murdered traitorously.

WARWICK

Father, the duke hath told the truth;
Thus got the house of Lancaster the crown.

YORK

Which now they hold by force and not by right: 30
For Richard, the first son's heir, being dead,
The issue of the next son should have reigned.

SALISBURY

But William of Hatfield died without an heir.

YORK

The third son, Duke of Clarence, from whose line
I claim the crown, had issue, Philippa, a daughter, 35
Who married Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March;
Edmund had issue, Roger Earl of March;
Roger had issue, Edmund, Anne, and Eleanor.

SALISBURY

This Edmund, in the reign of Bolingbroke,
As I have read, laid claim unto the crown; 40
And, but for Owen Glendower, had been king,
Who kept him in captivity till he died.
But to the rest.

YORK

His eldest sister, Anne,
My mother, being heir unto the crown,
Married Richard Earl of Cambridge, 45
Who was to Edmund Langley,
Edward the Third's fifth son, the son.
By her I claim the kingdom: she was heir
To Roger of March, who was the son
Of Edmund Mortimer, who married Philippa, 50
Sole daughter unto Lionel Duke of Clarence:
So, if the issue of the elder son
Succeed before the younger, I am king.

WARWICK

What plain proceedings^o is more plain than this?
Henry doth claim the crown from John of Gaunt, 55
The fourth son; York claims it from the third.
Till Lionel's issue fails, his should not reign:
It fails not yet, but flourishes in thee,
And in thy sons, fair slips^o of such a stock.
Then, father Salisbury, kneel we together,
And in this private plot be we the first
That shall salute our rightful sovereign
With honor of his birthright to the crown.

BOTH [Kneeling.]

Long live our sovereign Richard, England's king!

YORK

We thank you, lords. But I am not your king 65
Till I be crowned and that my sword be stained
With heart-blood of the house of Lancaster;
And that's not suddenly to be performed,
But with advice^o and silent secrecy.
Do you as I do in these dangerous days: 70
Wink at^o the Duke of Suffolk's insolence,

At Beaufort's pride, at Somerset's ambition,
At Buckingham and all the crew of them,
Till they have snared the shepherd of the flock,
That virtuous prince, the good Duke Humphrey: 75
'Tis that they seek, and they in seeking that Shall find their deaths, if York can prophesy.

SALISBURY

My lord, break we off; we know your mind at full.

WARWICK

My heart assures me that the Earl of Warwick 80
Shall one day make the Duke of York a king.

YORK

And, Nevil, this I do assure myself:
Richard shall live to make the Earl of Warwick
The greatest man in England but the king. Exeunt.

[Scene III. A hall of justice.]

Sound trumpets. Enter KING Henry, and the QUEEN, GLOUCESTER, the Duke of SUFFOLK, and the Duke of BUCKINGHAM, the CARDINAL, and the DUCHESS of Gloucester, [MARGERY JOURDAIN, HUM, SOUTH-
WELL, and BOLINGBROKE,] led with the OFFICERS; and then enter to them the Duke of YORK and the Earls of SALISBURY and WARWICK.

KING

Stand forth, Dame Eleanor Cobham, Gloucester's wife.

45

In sight of God and us, your guilt is great:
Receive the sentence of the law for sins
Such as by God's book are adjudged to death.^o
You four, from hence to prison back again; 5
From thence unto the place of execution:
The witch in Smithfield^o shall be burnt to ashes, 50
And you three shall be strangled on the gallows.
You, madam, for you are more nobly born,
Despoiled of your honor in your life, 10
Shall, after three days' open penance done,
Live in your country here in banishment,
With Sir John Stanley, in the Isle of Man.

DUCHESS

Welcome is banishment, welcome were my death.

GLOUCESTER

60

Eleanor, the law thou see'st hath judgèd thee: 15
I cannot justify whom the law condemns.
[Exeunt the DUCHESS and the other PRISONERS, guarded.]

Mine eyes are full of tears, my heart of grief.
Ah, Humphrey, this dishonor in thine age
Will bring thy head with sorrow to the ground!
I beseech your majesty, give me leave to go; 20
Sorrow would^o solace, and mine age would ease.

KING

65

Stay, Humphrey Duke of Gloucester: ere thou go,
Give up thy staff: Henry will to himself
Protector be; and God shall be my hope,
My stay, my guide, and lanthorn^o to my feet. 25

And go in peace, Humphrey, no less beloved
Than when thou wert protector to thy king.

QUEEN

I see no reason why a king of years
Should be° to be protected like a child.
God and King Henry govern England's realm!
Give up your staff, sir, and the king his realm.

GLOUCESTER

My staff? Here, noble Henry, is my staff:
As willingly do I the same resign
As e'er thy father Henry made it mine;
And even as willingly at thy feet I leave it
As others would ambitiously receive it.
Farewell, good king: when I am dead and gone,
May honorable peace attend thy throne.

Exit GLOUCESTER.

QUEEN

Why, now is Henry king, and Margaret queen;
And Humphrey Duke of Gloucester scarce himself,
That bears so shrewd a maim:° two pulls° at once:
His lady banished, and a limb lopped off.
This staff of honor raught,° there let it stand
Where it best fits to be, in Henry's hand.

SUFFOLK

Thus droops this lofty pine and hangs his sprays;
Thus Eleanor's pride dies in her youngest days.

YORK

Lords, let him go. Please it your majesty,
This is the day appointed for the combat,
And ready are the appellant and defendant,
The armorer and his man, to enter the lists,
So please your highness to behold the fight.

QUEEN

Ay, good my lord: for purposely therefore
Left I the court, to see this quarrel tried.

KING

A° God's name, see the lists and all things fit:
Here let them end it; and God defend the right!

YORK

I never saw a fellow worse bested,°
Or more afraid to fight, than is the appellant,
The servant of this armorer, my lords.

Enter at one door [HORNER] the armorer, and his NEIGHBORS, drinking to him so much that he is drunk; and he enters with a drum before him and his staff with a sandbag fastened to it;° and at the other door his man [PETER], with a drum and sandbag, and PRENTICES drinking to him.

FIRST NEIGHBOR Here, neighbor Horner, I drink to you in° a cup of sack:° and fear not, neighbor, you shall do well enough.

SECOND NEIGHBOR And here, neighbor, here's a cup of charneco.°

THIRD NEIGHBOR And here's a pot of good double° beer, neighbor: drink, and fear not your man.

HORNER Let it come; i' faith I'll pledge you all, and a fig for Peter!

FIRST PRENTICE Here, Peter, I drink to thee: and be not afeared.

SECOND PRENTICE Here, Peter, here's a pint of claret wine for thee.

THIRD PRENTICE And here's a quart for me; be merry, Peter, and fear not thy master: fight for credit of the prentices.

PETER I thank you all, but I'll drink no more. Here,
Robin, and if I die, here I give thee my hammer;
and Will, thou shalt have my apron; and here,
Tom, take all the money that I have. O Lord bless me, I pray God, for I am never able to deal with my master, he hath learnt so much fence already.

SALISBURY Come, leave your drinking, and fall to blows. Sirrah, what's thy name?

PETER Peter, forsooth.

SALISBURY Peter? What more?

PETER Thump.

SALISBURY Thump! then see thou thump thy master
well.

HORNER Here's to thee, neighbor; fill all the pots again, for before we fight, look you, I will tell you my mind: for I am come hither, as it were, of my man's instigation, to prove myself an honest man, and Peter a knave: and so have at you, Peter, with downright blows, as Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascapart.°

YORK

Dispatch; this knave's tongue begins to double.°
Sound trumpets; alarum to the combatants!°

They fight, and PETER strikes him down.

HORNER Hold, Peter, hold! I confess, I confess treason.
He dies.

YORK Take away his weapon. Fellow, thank God, and the good wine in thy master's way.

PETER O God, have I overcome mine enemies in this presence?° O Peter, thou hast prevailed in right!

KING

Go, take hence that traitor from our sight;
For by his death we do perceive his guilt:
And God in justice hath revealed to us
The truth and innocence of this poor fellow,
Which he had thought to have murdered wrongfully.
Come, fellow, follow us for thy reward.

Sound a flourish; exeunt.

[Scene IV. A street.]

Enter GLOUCESTER and his [SERVING]MEN, in mourning cloaks.

GLOUCESTER

Thus sometimes hath the brightest day a cloud;
And after summer evermore succeeds
Barren winter with his wrathful nipping cold:

So cares and joys abound, as seasons fleet.
Sirs, what's o'clock?

SERVANT Ten, my lord.

GLOUCESTER

Ten is the hour that was appointed me
To watch the coming of my punished duchess:
Uneath° may she endure the flinty streets,
To tread them with her tender-feeling feet.
Sweet Nell, ill can thy noble mind abrook°
The abject° people gazing on thy face
With envious° looks, laughing at thy shame,
That erst° did follow thy proud chariot wheels
When thou didst ride in triumph through the streets.
But, soft!° I think she comes, and I'll prepare
My tear-stained eyes to see her miseries.

Enter DUCHESS of Gloucester barefoot, and a white sheet about her, with a wax candle in her hand, and verses written on her back and pinned on; and accompanied with the SHERIFF of London and Sir John STANLEY, and OFFICERS, with bills and halberds.

SERVANT

So please your grace, we'll take her from the sheriff.

GLOUCESTER

No, stir not, for your lives; let her pass by.

DUCHESS

Come you, my lord, to see my open shame?
Now thou dost penance too. Look how they gaze!
See how the giddy multitude do point,
And nod their heads, and throw their eyes on thee!
Ah, Gloucester, hide thee from their hateful looks,
And, in thy closet pent up, rue my shame,
And ban° thine enemies, both mine and thine.

GLOUCESTER

Be patient, gentle Nell; forget this grief.

DUCHESS

Ah, Gloucester, teach me to forget myself!
For whilst I think I am thy married wife
And thou a prince, protector of this land,
Methinks I should not thus be led along,
Mailed° up in shame, with papers on my back,
And followed with a rabble that rejoice
To see my tears and hear my deep-fet° groans.
The ruthless flint doth cut my tender feet,
And when I start, the envious° people laugh
And bid me be advisèd how I tread.
Ah, Humphrey, can I bear this shameful yoke?
Trowest thou that e'er I'll look upon the world
Or count them happy that enjoys the sun?
No; dark shall be my light and night my day;
To think upon my pomp shall be my hell.
Sometime I'll say, I am Duke Humphrey's wife,
And he a prince, and ruler of the land:
Yet so he ruled and such a prince he was
As he stood by whilst I, his forlorn duchess,
Was made a wonder and a pointing-stock
To every idle rascal follower.

But be thou mild and blush not at my shame,
Nor stir at nothing, till the ax of death
Hang over thee, as, sure, it shortly will;
For Suffolk—he that can do all in all
With her that hateth thee and hates us all—
And York, and impious Beaufort, that false priest,
Have all limed bushes° to betray thy wings;
And fly thou how thou canst, they'll tangle thee.
But fear not thou, until thy foot be snared,
Nor never seek prevention° of thy foes.

GLOUCESTER

Ah, Nell, forbear! Thou aimest all awry.
I must offend before I be attainted;°
And had I twenty times so many foes,
And each of them had twenty times their power,
All these could not procure me any scathe,°
So long as I am loyal, true, and crimeless.
Wouldst have me rescue thee from this reproach?
Why, yet thy scandal were not wiped away,
But I in danger for the breach of law.
Thy greatest help is quiet, gentle Nell:
I pray thee, sort° thy heart to patience;
These few days' wonder° will be quickly worn.

Enter a HERALD.

HERALD

I summon your grace to his majesty's parliament,
Holden at Bury the first of this next month.

GLOUCESTER

And my consent ne'er asked herein before?
This is close° dealing. Well, I will be there.

Exit HERALD.

My Nell, I take my leave: and, master sheriff,
Let not her penance exceed the king's commission.

SHERIFF

And't please your grace, here my commission stays,
And Sir John Stanley is appointed now
To take her with him to the Isle of Man.

GLOUCESTER

Must you, Sir John, protect my lady here?

STANLEY

So am I given in charge, may't please your grace.

GLOUCESTER

Entreat her not the worse in that I pray
You use her well. The world may laugh again;
And I may live to do you kindness if
You do it her: and so, Sir John, farewell.

DUCHESS

What, gone, my lord, and bid me not farewell?

GLOUCESTER

Witness my tears, I cannot stay to speak.

Exit GLOUCESTER [and SERVINGMEN].

DUCHESS

Art thou gone too? All comfort go with thee!
For none abides with me: my joy is death—
Death, at whose name I oft have been afeared,
Because I wished this world's eternity.
Stanley, I prithee go, and take me hence;

Why, madam, that is to the Isle of Man,
There to be used according to your state.

DUCHESS

That's bad enough, for I am but reproach:
And shall I then be used reproachfully?

STANLEY

Like to a duchess, and Duke Humphrey's lady:
According to that state^o you shall be used.

DUCHESS

Sheriff, farewell, and better than I fare,^o
Although thou hast been conduct^o of my shame.

SHERIFF

It is my office; and madam, pardon me.

DUCHESS

Ay, ay, farewell; thy office is discharged.
Come, Stanley, shall we go?

STANLEY

Madam, your penance done, throw off this sheet,
And go we to attire you for our journey.

DUCHESS

My shame will not be shifted^o with my sheet:

No, it will hang upon my richest robes,
And show itself, attire me how I can.

Go, lead the way; I long to see my prison. Exeunt. 110

[A C T I I I]

[Scene I. The abbey at Bury Saint Edmunds.]

Sound a sennet. Enter KING, QUEEN, CARDINAL, SUFFOLK, YORK, BUCKINGHAM, SALISBURY, and WARWICK [and ATTENDANTS] to the parliament.

KING

I muse my Lord of Gloucester is not come:
'Tis not his wont to be the hindmost man,
Whate'er occasion keeps him from us now.

QUEEN

Can you not see? Or will ye not observe
The strangeness of his altered countenance?
With what a majesty he bears himself,
How insolent of late he is become,
How proud, how peremptory, and unlike himself?
We know the time since he was mild and affable,
And if we did but glance a far-off look,
Immediately he was upon his knee,
That all the court admired him for submission.
But meet him now, and, be it in the morn,
When everyone will give the time of day,
He knits his brow and shows an angry eye
And passeth by with stiff unbowed knee,
Disdaining duty that to us belongs.
Small curs are not regarded when they grin,^o

But great men tremble when the lion roars;
And Humphrey is no little man in England.
First note that he is near you in descent,
And should you fall, he is the next will mount.

20

Me seemeth then it is no policy,
Respecting^o what a rancorous mind he bears,
And his advantage following your decease,
That he should come about your royal person
Or be admitted to your highness' council.

25

By flattery hath he won the commons' hearts,
And when he please to make commotion,
'Tis to be feared they all will follow him.

30

Now 'tis the spring, and weeds are shallow-rooted;
Suffer them now, and they'll o'ergrow the garden,
And choke the herbs for want of husbandry.

The reverent care I bear unto my lord
Made me collect^o these dangers in the duke.

35

If it be fond,^o call it a woman's fear—
Which fear if better reasons can supplant,
I will subscribe,^o and say I wronged the duke.
My Lord of Suffolk, Buckingham, and York,
Reprove^o my allegation, if you can,
Or else conclude my words effectual.^o

40

SUFFOLK

Well hath your highness seen into this duke;
And had I first been put to speak my mind,
I think I should have told your grace's tale.

The duchess by his subornation,
Upon my life, began her devilish practices:

45

Or if he were not privy to^o those faults,
Yet, by reputing of his high descent,

As next the king he was successive heir,
And such high vaunts of his nobility,

50

Did instigate the bedlam^o brainsick duchess
By wicked means to frame our sovereign's fall.

Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep,
And in his simple show he harbors treason.

The fox barks not when he would steal the lamb.
No, no, my sovereign; Gloucester is a man
Unsound yet, and full of deep deceit.

55

CARDINAL

Did he not, contrary to form of law,
Devise strange deaths for small offenses done?

YORK

And did he not, in his protectorship,
Levy great sums of money through the realm
For soldiers' pay in France, and never sent it?
By means whereof the towns each day revolted.

60

BUCKINGHAM

Tut, these are petty faults to faults unknown,
Which time will bring to light in smooth Duke
Humphrey.

65

KING

My lords, at once: the care you have of us,
To mow down thorns that would annoy our foot,
Is worthy praise: but, shall I speak my conscience,
Our kinsman Gloucester is as innocent
From meaning treason to our royal person
As is the sucking lamb or harmless dove.

QUEEN

Ah, what's more dangerous than this fond affiance!^o
Seems he a dove? His feathers are but borrowed,
For he's disposèd as the hateful raven.
Is he a lamb? His skin is surely lent him,
For he's inclined as is the ravenous wolves.
Who cannot steal a shape, that means deceit?
Take heed, my lord: the welfare of us all
Hangs on the cutting short that fraudulent man.

Enter SOMERSET.

SOMERSET

All health unto my gracious sovereign!

KING

Welcome, Lord Somerset. What news from France?

SOMERSET

That all your interest in those territories
Is utterly bereft you: all is lost.

KING

Cold news, Lord Somerset: but God's will be done!

YORK [Aside.]

Cold news for me; for I had hope of France
As firmly as I hope for fertile England.^o
Thus are my blossoms blasted in the bud,
And caterpillars eat my leaves away;
But I will remedy this gear^o ere long,
Or sell my title for a glorious grave.

Enter GLOUCESTER.

GLOUCESTER

All happiness unto my lord the king!
Pardon, my liege, that I have stayed^o so long.

SUFFOLK

Nay, Gloucester, know that thou come too soon,
Unless thou wert more loyal than thou art:
I do arrest thee of high treason here.

GLOUCESTER

Well, Suffolk, thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest:
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted.
The purest spring is not so free from mud
As I am clear from treason to my sovereign.
Who can accuse me? Wherein am I guilty?

YORK

'Tis thought, my lord, that you took bribes of France,^o
And, being protector, stayed the soldiers' pay;
By means whereof his highness hath lost France.

GLOUCESTER

Is it but thought so? What are they that think it?
I never robbed the soldiers of their pay,
Nor ever had one penny bribe from France.
So help me God, as I have watched the night,
Ay, night by night, in studying good for England!
That doit^o that e'er I wrested from the king,
Or any groat I hoarded to my use,
Be brought against me at my trial day!

No; many a pound of mine own proper store,^o
Because I would not tax the needy commons,
Have I dispursèd^o to the garrisons,
And never asked for restitution.

CARDINAL

It serves you well, my lord, to say so much.

GLOUCESTER

I say no more than truth, so help me God!

YORK

In your protectorship you did devise
Strange tortures for offenders, never heard of,
That^o England was defamed by tyranny.

GLOUCESTER

Why, 'tis well known that whiles I was protector
Pity was all the fault that was in me:
For I should melt at an offender's tears,
And lowly words were ransom for their fault.
Unless it were a bloody murderer,
Or foul felonious thief that fleeced poor passengers,^o
I never gave them condign^o punishment.
Murder indeed, that bloody sin, I tortured
Above the felon or what^o trespass else.

SUFFOLK

My lord, these faults are easy, quickly answered;
But mightier crimes are laid unto your charge,
Whereof you cannot easily purge yourself.
I do arrest you in his highness' name,
And here commit you to my Lord Cardinal
To keep, until your further time of trial.

KING

My Lord of Gloucester, 'tis my special hope
That you will clear yourself from all suspense.^o
My conscience tells me you are innocent.

GLOUCESTER

Ah, gracious lord, these days are dangerous:
Virtue is choked with foul ambition,
And charity chased hence by rancor's hand;
Foul subornation is predominant,
And equity exiled your highness' land.
I know their complot^o is to have my life,
And if my death might make this island happy,
And prove the period^o of their tyranny,
I would expend it with all willingness.
But mine is made the prologue to their play:
For thousands more, that yet suspect no peril,
Will not conclude their plotted tragedy.
Beaufort's red sparkling eyes blab his heart's malice,
And Suffolk's cloudy brow his stormy hate;
Sharp Buckingham unburthens with his tongue
The envious load that lies upon his heart;
And doggèd York, that reaches at the moon,
Whose overweening arm I have plucked back,
By false accuse doth level at^o my life.
And you, my sovereign lady, with the rest,
Causeless have laid disgraces on my head,
And with your best endeavor have stirred up
My liefest^o liege to be mine enemy.
Ay, all of you have laid your heads together—

74 fond affiance foolish trust 87–88 Cold . . . England almost a literal repetition of I.i.235–36 91 gear business 94 stayed delayed 104 France the King of France 112 doit Dutch coin of minimal value

Myself had notice of your conventicles^o—
 And all to make away my guiltless life.
 I shall not want^o false witness to condemn me,
 Nor store of treasons to augment my guilt;
 The ancient proverb will be well effected:
 “A staff is quickly found to beat a dog.” 170

CARDINAL

My liege, his railing is intolerable.
 If those that care to keep your royal person
 From treason's secret knife and traitors' rage
 Be thus upbraided, chid, and rated at,^o 175
 And the offender granted scope of speech,
 'Twill make them cool in zeal unto your grace.

SUFFOLK

Hath he not twit our sovereign lady here
 With ignominious words, though clerkly couched,^o
 As if she had subornèd some to swear 180
 False allegations to o'erthrow his state?

QUEEN

But I can give the loser leave to chide.

GLOUCESTER

Far truer spoke than meant: I lose indeed;
 Beshrew the winners, for they played me false!
 And well such losers may have leave to speak. 185

BUCKINGHAM

He'll wrest the sense^o and hold us here all day.
 Lord Cardinal, he is your prisoner.

CARDINAL

Sirs, take away the duke, and guard him sure.

GLOUCESTER

Ah, thus King Henry throws away his crutch
 Before his legs be firm to bear his body. 190
 Thus is the shepherd beaten from thy side,
 And wolves are gnarling^o who shall gnaw thee first.
 Ah, that my fear were false! Ah, that it were!
 For, good King Henry, thy decay^o I fear.
Exit GLOUCESTER [guarded].

KING

My lords, what to your wisdoms seemeth best,
 Do or undo, as if ourself were here. 195

QUEEN

What, will your highness leave the parliament?

KING

Ay, Margaret; my heart is drowned with grief,
 Whose flood begins to flow within mine eyes,
 My body round engirt with misery: 200
 For what's more miserable than discontent?
 Ah, uncle Humphrey, in thy face I see
 The map of honor, truth, and loyalty;
 And yet, good Humphrey, is the hour to come
 That e'er I proved thee false or feared thy faith? 205
 What luring star now envies thy estate,
 That these great lords, and Margaret our queen
 Do seek subversion^o of thy harmless life?
 Thou never didst them wrong, nor no man wrong:
 And as the butcher takes away the calf, 210
 And binds the wretch, and beats it when it strays,
 Bearing it to the bloody slaughterhouse,

Even so remorseless have they borne him hence;
 And as the dam runs lowing up and down,
 Looking the way her harmless young one went, 215
 And can do nought but wail her darling's loss,
 Even so myself bewails good Gloucester's case
 With sad unhelpful tears, and with dimmed eyes
 Look after him and cannot do him good,
 So mighty are his vowèd enemies. 220
 His fortunes I will weep, and 'twixt each groan
 Say, “Who's a traitor? Gloucester he is none.”

Exit KING, SALISBURY, and WARWICK.

QUEEN

Free^o lords, cold snow melts with the sun's hot beams.
 Henry my lord is cold in great affairs,
 Too full of foolish pity; and Gloucester's show^o 225
 Beguiles him as the mournful crocodile
 With sorrow snares relenting passengers,^o
 Or as the snake, rolled in a flow'ring bank,
 With shining checkered slough, doth sting a child
 That for the beauty thinks it excellent. 230
 Believe me, lords, were none more wise than I—
 And yet herein I judge mine own wit good—
 This Gloucester should be quickly rid the world,
 To rid us from the fear we have of him.

CARDINAL

That he should die is worthy policy,^o 235
 But yet we want a color^o for his death:
 'Tis meet^o he be condemned by course of law.

SUFFOLK

But in my mind that were no policy:
 The king will labor still to save his life,
 The commons haply rise, to save his life; 240
 And yet we have but trivial argument,
 More than mistrust, that shows him worthy death.

YORK

So that, by this, you would not have him die.

SUFFOLK

Ah, York, no man alive so fain^o as I!

YORK [Aside.]

'Tis York that hath more reason for his death. 245

[Aloud.]

But my Lord Cardinal, and you, my Lord of Suffolk,
 Say as you think, and speak it from your souls:
 Were't not all one, an empty eagle were set
 To guard the chicken from a hungry kite,^o 250
 As place Duke Humphrey for the king's protector?

QUEEN

So,^o the poor chicken should be sure of death.

SUFFOLK

Madam, 'tis true; and were't not madness, then,
 To make the fox surveyor^o of the fold?
 Who being^o accused a crafty murderer,
 His guilt should be but idly posted over,^o 255
 Because his purpose is not executed.^o

Not resolute, except so much° were done;
 For things are often spoke and seldom meant:
 But that my heart accordeth with my tongue,
 Seeing the deed is meritorious,°
 And to preserve my sovereign from his foe,
 Say but the word, and I will be his priest.°

CARDINAL

But I would have him dead, my Lord of Suffolk,
 Ere you can take due orders for a priest:
 Say you consent and censure well° the deed,
 And I'll provide his executioner;
 I tender so° the safety of my liege.

SUFFOLK

Here is my hand, the deed is worthy doing.

QUEEN

And so say I.

 It skills not greatly who impugns our doom.°

CARDINAL

A breach that craves a quick expedient stop!
 What counsel give you in this weighty cause?

YORK

That Somerset be sent as regent thither.
 'Tis meet that lucky ruler be employed;
 Witness the fortune he hath had in France.

SOMERSET

If York, with all his far-fet° policy,
 Had been the regent there instead of me,
 He never would have stayed in France so long.

Nay then, this spark will prove a raging fire,
 If wind and fuel be brought to feed it with!
 No more, good York; sweet Somerset, be still:
 Thy fortune, York, hadst thou been regent there,
 Might happily° have proved far worse than his.

305

YORK

What, worse than nought? Nay, then a shame take all!

SOMERSET

And in the number thee, that wishest shame!

CARDINAL

My Lord of York, try what your fortune is.
 Th' uncivil kerns° of Ireland are in arms
 And temper° clay with blood of Englishmen.
 To Ireland will you lead a band of men,
 Collected choicely, from each county some,
 And try your hap against the Irishmen?

310

270 YORK

I will, my lord, so please his majesty.

315

SUFFOLK

Why, our authority is his consent,
 And what we do establish he confirms:
 Then, noble York, take thou this task in hand.

YORK

I am content: provide me soldiers, lords,
 Whiles I take order for mine own affairs.

320

280

SUFFOLK

A charge, Lord York, that I will see performed.
 But now return we to the false Duke Humphrey.

CARDINAL

No more of him; for I will deal with him
 That henceforth he shall trouble us no more.
 And so break off: the day is almost spent;
 Lord Suffolk, you and I must talk of that event.

325

285

YORK

My Lord of Suffolk, within fourteen days
 At Bristow° I expect my soldiers;
 For there I'll ship them all for Ireland.

SUFFOLK

I'll see it truly done, my Lord of York.

330

290

Exeunt. Manet YORK [alone].

YORK

Now, York, or never, steel thy fearful thoughts,
 And change misdoubt to resolution:
 Be that thou hop'st to be, or what thou art
 Resign to death; it is not worth th' enjoying.
 Let palefaced fear keep with the mean-born man,
 And find no harbor in a royal heart.
 Faster than springtime show'rs comes thought on

 And not a thought but thinks on dignity.°

I fear me you but warm the starvèd snake,
 Who, cherished in your breasts, will sting your hearts.
 'Twas men I lacked, and you will give them me:
 I take it kindly; yet be well assured
 You put sharp weapons in a madman's hands.
 Whiles I in Ireland nourish a mighty band,
 I will stir up in England some black storm
 Shall blow ten thousand souls to heaven or hell;
 And this fell° tempest shall not cease to rage
 Until the golden circuit° on my head,
 Like to the glorious sun's transparent beams,
 Do calm the fury of this mad-bred flaw.°
 And, for a minister of my intent,
 I have seduced a headstrong Kentishman,
 John Cade of Ashford,
 To make commotion, as full well he can,
 Under the title of John Mortimer.
 In Ireland have I seen this stubborn Cade
 Oppose himself against a troop of kerns,
 And fought so long, till that his thighs with darts
 Were almost like a sharp-quilled porpentine;°
 And, in the end being rescued, I have seen
 Him caper upright like a wild Morisco,°
 Shaking the bloody darts as he° his bells.
 Full often, like a shag-haired crafty kern,
 Hath he conversèd with the enemy,
 And undiscovered come to me again
 And given me notice of their villainies.
 This devil here shall be my substitute;
 For that John Mortimer, which now is dead,
 In face, in gait, in speech, he doth resemble:
 By this I shall perceive the commons' mind,
 How they affect° the house and claim of York.
 Say he be taken, racked, and tortured:
 I know no pain they can inflict upon him
 Will make him say I moved him to those arms.
 Say that he thrive, as 'tis great like he will:
 Why, then from Ireland come I with my strength
 And reap the harvest which that rascal sowed.
 For Humphrey being dead, as he shall be,
 And Henry put apart, the next for me. Exit.

[Scene II. Bury Saint Edmunds. A room of state.]

Enter two or three [MURDERERS] running over the stage, from the murder of Gloucester.

FIRST MURDERER

Run to my Lord of Suffolk; let him know
 We have dispatched the duke, as he commanded.

SECOND MURDERER

O that it were to do! What have we done?
 Didst ever hear a man so penitent?

Enter SUFFOLK.

FIRST MURDERER

Here comes my lord.

SUFFOLK
 Now, sirs, have you dispatched this thing?

345 FIRST MURDERER

Ay, my good lord, he's dead.

SUFFOLK

Why, that's well said. Go, get you to my house;
 I will reward you for this venturous deed.

350 The king and all the peers are here at hand.

10

Have you laid fair the bed? Is all things well,
 According as I gave directions?

FIRST MURDERER

'Tis, my good lord.

355 SUFFOLK

Away, be gone.

Exeunt [MURDERERS].

Sound trumpets. Enter the KING, the QUEEN, CARDINAL, BUCKINGHAM, SOMERSET, with ATTENDANTS.

360 KING

Go, call our uncle to our presence straight;
 Say we intend to try his grace today,
 If he be guilty, as 'tis published.

15

SUFFOLK

365 I'll call him presently, my noble lord.

Exit.

KING

Lords, take your places; and I pray you all,
 Proceed no straiter° 'gainst our uncle Gloucester
 Than from true evidence of good esteem,
 He be approved° in practice culpable.

20

370 QUEEN

God forbid any malice should prevail,
 That faultless may condemn a nobleman!
 Pray God he may acquit him of suspicion!

25

375 KING

I thank thee, Meg; these words content me much.

Enter SUFFOLK.

380 How now! Why look'st thou pale? Why tremblest thou?

Where is our uncle? What's the matter, Suffolk?

SUFFOLK

Dead in his bed, my lord; Gloucester is dead.

QUEEN

Marry, God forbend!°

30

CARDINAL

God's secret judgment: I did dream tonight
 The duke was dumb and could not speak a word.

KING sounds.°

QUEEN

How fares my lord? Help, lords, the king is dead!

SOMERSET

Rear up his body; wring° him by the nose.

QUEEN

Run, go, help, help! O Henry, ope thine eyes!

35

SUFFOLK

He doth revive again; madam, be patient.

SUFFOLK

Comfort, my sovereign; gracious Henry, comfort.

KING

What, doth my Lord of Suffolk comfort me?
 Came he right now to sing a raven's note,
 Whose dismal tune bereft my vital pow'rs,
 And thinks he that the chirping of a wren,
 By crying comfort from a hollow breast,
 Can chase away the first-conceivèd sound?
 Hide not thy poison with such sugared words;
 Lay not thy hands on me; forbear, I say!
 Their touch affrights me as a serpent's sting.
 Thou baleful messenger, out of my sight!
 Upon thy eyeballs murderous tyranny
 Sits in grim majesty to fright the world.
 Look not upon me, for thine eyes are wounding.
 Yet do not go away; come, basilisk,^o
 And kill the innocent gazer with thy sight:
 For in the shade of death I shall find joy,
 In life but double death, now Gloucester's dead.

QUEEN

Why do you rate^o my Lord of Suffolk thus?
 Although the duke was enemy to him,
 Yet he most Christian-like laments his death:
 And for myself, foe as he was to me,
 Might liquid tears or heart-offending groans
 Or blood-consuming sighs recall his life,
 I would be blind with weeping, sick with groans,
 Look pale as primrose with blood-drinking sighs,
 And all to have the noble duke alive.
 What know I how the world may deem of me?
 For it is known we were but hollow friends:
 It may be judged I made the duke away;
 So shall my name with slander's tongue be wounded,
 And princes' courts be filled with my reproach.
 This get I by his death; ay me, unhappy!
 To be a queen, and crowned with infamy!

KING

Ah, woe is me for Gloucester, wretched man!

QUEEN

Be woe for me, more wretched than he is.
 What, dost thou turn away and hide thy face?
 I am no loathsome leper; look on me.
 What! Art thou, like the adder, waxen^o deaf?
 Be poisonous too, and kill thy forlorn queen.
 Is all thy comfort shut in Gloucester's tomb?
 Why, then, Dame Margaret was ne'er thy joy.
 Erect his statuë and worship it,
 And make my image but an alehouse sign.
 Was I for this nigh wracked upon the sea
 And twice by awkward^o wind from England's bank
 Drove back again unto my native clime?
 What boded this, but well forewarning wind
 Did seem to say, "Seek not a scorpion's nest,
 Nor set no footing on this unkind shore"?
 What did I then, but cursed the gentle gusts
 And he that loosed them forth their brazen^o caves,
 And bid them blow towards England's blessèd shore,
 Or turn our stern upon a dreadful rock?
 Yet Aeolus^o would not be a murderer,

But left that hateful office unto thee.
 The pretty vaulting^o sea refused to drown me,
 Knowing that thou wouldst have me drowned on shore

With tears as salt as sea, through thy unkindness;
 The splitting rocks cow'rd in the sinking sands,
 And would not dash me with their ragged sides,
 Because thy flinty heart, more hard than they,
 Might in thy palace perish Margaret.
 As far as I could ken^o thy chalky cliffs,
 When from thy shore the tempest beat us back,
 I stood upon the hatches in the storm,
 And when the dusky sky began to rob
 My earnest-gaping sight of thy land's view,
 I took a costly jewel from my neck—
 A heart^o it was, bound in with diamonds—
 And threw it towards thy land: the sea received it,
 And so I wished thy body might my heart:
 And even with this I lost fair England's view,
 And bid mine eyes be packing with my heart,
 And called them blind and dusky spectacles,^o
 For losing ken of Albion's wishèd coast.
 How often have I tempted Suffolk's tongue,
 The agent of thy foul inconstancy,
 To sit and witch^o me, as Ascanius did
 When he to madding^o Dido would unfold
 His father's acts, commenced in burning Troy!
 Am I not witchèd like her? Or thou not false like him?
 Ay me, I can^o no more! Die, Margaret,
 For Henry weeps that thou dost live so long.

Noise within. Enter WARWICK, SALISBURY, and many COMMONS.

WARWICK

It is reported, mighty sovereign,
 That good Duke Humphrey traitorously is murdered
 By Suffolk and the Cardinal Beaufort's means.
 The commons, like an angry hive of bees
 That want their leader, scatter up and down,
 And care not who they sting in his revenge.
 Myself have calmed their spleenful^o mutiny,
 Until they hear the order of his death.

KING

That he is dead, good Warwick, 'tis too true;
 But how he died God knows, not Henry.
 Enter his chamber, view his breathless corpse,
 And comment then upon his sudden death.

WARWICK

That shall I do, my liege. Stay, Salisbury,
 With the rude multitude till I return.
[Exeunt WARWICK to the inner chamber,^o and SALISBURY with the COMMONS.]

KING

O Thou that judgest all things, stay my thoughts,

 Some-violent hands were laid on Humphrey's life!

 With twenty thousand kisses, and to drain

 To tell my love unto his dumb deaf trunk,
 And with my fingers feel his hand unfeeling:
 But all in vain are these mean obsequies;
 And to survey his dead and earthy image,
 What were it but to make my sorrow greater?

WARWICK [from within] draws the curtains and shows Gloucester in his bed.

WARWICK
 Come hither, gracious sovereign, view this body.

KING
 That is to see how deep my grave is made;
 For with his soul fled all my worldly solace,
 For, seeing him, I see my life in death.

WARWICK
 As surely as my soul intends to live
 With that dread King that took our state upon him
 To free us from His Father's wrathful curse,
 I do believe that violent hands were laid
 Upon the life of this thrice-famèd duke.

SUFFOLK
 A dreadful oath, sworn with a solemn tongue!
 What instance gives Lord Warwick for his vow?

WARWICK
 See how the blood is settled in his face.
 Oft have I seen a timely parted ghost,°
 Of ashy semblance, meager,° pale, and bloodless,
 Being° all descended to the laboring heart,
 Who,° in the conflict that it holds with death,
 Attracts the same° for aidance 'gainst the enemy;
 Which° with the heart there cools, and ne'er returneth
 To blush and beautify the cheek again.
 But sec, his face is black and full of blood,
 His eyeballs further out than when he lived,
 Staring full ghastly like a strangled man;
 His hair upreared, his nostrils stretched with struggling;
 His hands abroad displayed, as one that grasped
 And tugged for life, and was by strength subdued.
 Look, on the sheets his hair, you see, is sticking;
 His well-proportioned beard made rough and rugged,
 Like to the summer's corn by tempest lodged.°
 It cannot be but he was murdered here:
 The least of all these signs were probable.°

SUFFOLK
 Why, Warwick, who should do the duke to death?
 Myself and Beaufort had him in protection;
 And we, I hope, sir, are no murderers.

WARWICK
 But both of you were vowed Duke Humphrey's focs.
 And you, forsooth, had the good duke to keep:
 'Tis like you would not feast him like a friend,
 And 'tis well seen he found an enemy.

140 QUEEN
 Then you, belike, suspect these noblemen
 As guilty of Duke Humphrey's timeless° death?

WARWICK
 Who finds the heifer dead, and bleeding fresh,
 145 And sees fast by a butcher with an ax,
 But will suspect 'twas he that made the slaughter? 190
 Who finds the partridge in the puttock's° nest,
 But may imagine how the bird was dead,
 Although the kite soar with unbloodied beak?
 Even so suspicious is this tragedy.

QUEEN
 Are you the butcher, Suffolk? Where's your knife? 195
 Is Beaufort termed a kite? Where are his talons?

SUFFOLK
 I wear no knife to slaughter sleeping men;
 But here's a vengeful sword, rusted with ease,
 That shall be scourèd in his rancorous heart
 That slanders me with murder's crimson badge. 200
 Say, if thou dar'st, proud Lord of Warwickshire,
 That I am faulty in Duke Humphrey's death.
 155 Exit CARDINAL [and others].

WARWICK
 What dares Warwick, if false Suffolk dare him?

QUEEN
 He dares not calm his contumelious° spirit
 Nor cease to be an arrogant controller,° 205
 Though Suffolk dare him twenty thousand times.

160 WARWICK
 Madam, be still—with reverence may I say—
 For every word you speak in his behalf
 Is slander to your royal dignity.

SUFFOLK
 Blunt-witted lord, ignoble in demeanor! 210
 If ever lady wronged her lord so much,
 Thy mother took her into her blameful bed
 Some stern° untutored churl; and noble stock
 Was graft with crabtree slip, whose fruit thou art,
 170 And never of the Nevils' noble race. 215

WARWICK
 But that the guilt of murder bucklers° thee,
 And I should rob the deathsman of his fee,
 Quitting thee thereby of ten thousand shames,
 And that my sovereign's presence makes me mild,
 175 I would, false murd'rous coward, on thy knee 220
 Make thee beg pardon for thy passèd speech,
 And say it was thy mother that thou meant'st,
 That thou thyself wast born in bastardy;
 And after all this fearful homage done,
 Give thee thy hire and send thy soul to hell, 225
 Pernicious bloodsucker of sleeping men!

SUFFOLK
 Thou shalt be waking while I shed thy blood,
 If from this presence thou dar'st go with me.

WARWICK
 Away even now, or I will drag thee hence:
 185 Unworthy though thou art, I'll cope with thee, 230
 And do some service to Duke Humphrey's ghost.
Exeunt [SUFFOLK and WARWICK].

KING

What stronger breastplate than a heart untainted!
Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just,
And he but naked, though locked up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.

A noise within.

QUEEN

What noise is this?

Enter SUFFOLK and WARWICK, with their weapons drawn.

KING

Why, how now, lords! Your wrathful weapons drawn

Here in our presence? Dare you be so bold?

Why, what tumultuous clamor have we here?

SUFFOLK

The trait'rous Warwick, with the men of Bury,
Set all upon me, mighty sovereign.

Enter SALISBURY.

SALISBURY [To the COMMONS without.]

Sirs, stand apart: the king shall know your mind.
Dread lord, the commons send you word by me,
Unless Lord Suffolk straight be done to death,
Or banishèd fair England's territories,
They will by violence tear him from your palace,
And torture him with grievous ling'ring death.
They say, by him the good Duke Humphrey died;
They say, in him they fear your highness' death;
And mere° instinct of love and loyalty,
Free from a stubborn opposite° intent,
As being thought to contradict your liking,
Makes them thus forward in his banishment.
They say, in care of your most royal person,
That if your highness should intend to sleep,
And charge that no man should disturb your rest
In pain of your dislike, or pain of death,
Yet, notwithstanding such a strait° edict,
Were there a serpent seen, with forkèd tongue,
That slyly glided towards your majesty,
It were but necessary you were waked;
Lest, being suffered° in that harmful slumber,
The mortal worm° might make the sleep eternal.
And therefore do they cry, though you forbid,
That they will guard you, whe'r° you will or no,
From such fell° serpents as false Suffolk is;
With whose envenomèd and fatal sting
Your loving uncle, twenty times his worth,
They say, is shamefully bereft of life.

COMMONS Within.

An answer from the king, my Lord of Salisbury!

SUFFOLK

'Tis like° the commons, rude unpolished hinds,°
Could send such message to their sovereign:
But you, my lord, were glad to be employed,
To show how quaint° an orator you are.
But all the honor Salisbury hath won

Is, that he was the Lord Ambassador
Sent from a sort° of tinkers to the king.

An answer from the king, or we will all break in!

235

KING

Go, Salisbury, and tell them all from me,
I thank them for their tender loving care;
And had I not been cited° so by them,
Yet did I purpose as they do entreat;
For sure, my thoughts do hourly prophesy
Mischance unto my state by Suffolk's means.
And therefore, by His majesty I swear,
Whose far unworthy deputy I am,
He shall not breathe infection in this air
But three days longer, on the pain of death.

Exit SALISBURY.

QUEEN

O Henry, let me plead for gentle° Suffolk!

240

KING

Ungentle° queen, to call him gentle Suffolk!
No more, I say: if thou dost plead for him,
Thou wilt but add increase unto my wrath.
Had I but said, I would have kept my word;
But when I swear, it is irrevocable.

[To SUFFOLK.]

245

If after three days' space thou here be'st found
On any ground that I am ruler of,
The world shall not be ransom for thy life.
Come, Warwick, come, good Warwick, go with me;
I have great matters to impart to thee.

250

*Exit KING and WARWICK.
Manet QUEEN and SUFFOLK.*

QUEEN

Mischance and sorrow go along with you!
Heart's discontent and sour affliction
Be playfellows to keep you company!
There's two of you; the devil make a third!
And threefold vengeance tend upon your steps!

255

SUFFOLK

Cease, gentle queen, these execrations,
And let thy Suffolk take his heavy leave.

260

QUEEN

Fie, coward woman and softhearted wretch!
Hast thou not spirit to curse thine enemy?

SUFFOLK

A plague upon them! Wherefore should I curse them?
Would curses kill, as doth the mandrake's groan,°
I would invent as bitter searching° terms,
As curst, as harsh, and horrible to hear,
Delivered strongly through my fixèd teeth,
With full as many signs of deadly hate,
As lean-faced envy in her loathsome cave.
My tongue should stumble in mine earnest words;
Mine eyes should sparkle like the beaten flint;
Mine hair be fixed an° end, as one distract;°

QUEEN

Enough, sweet Suffolk; thou torment'st thyself;
 And these dread curses, like the sun 'gainst glass,
 Or like an overchargèd gun, recoil,
 And turn the force of them upon thyself.

SUFFOLK

You bade me ban, and will you bid me leave?
 Now, by the ground that I am banished from,
 Well could I curse away a winter's night,
 Though standing naked on a mountain top,
 Where biting cold would never let grass grow,
 And think it but a minute spent in sport.

QUEEN

O, let me entreat thee cease. Give me thy hand,
 That I may dew it with my mournful tears;
 Nor let the rain of heaven wet this place,
 To wash away my woeful monuments.
 O, could this kiss be printed in thy hand,
 That thou mightst think upon these^o by the seal,
 Through whom a thousand sighs are breathed for thee!

So, get thee gone, that I may know my grief;
 'Tis but surmised whiles thou art standing by,
 As one that surfeits thinking on a want.
 I will repeal thee, or, be well assured,
 Adventure^o to be banishèd myself:
 And banishèd I am, if but from thee.
 Go, speak not to me; even now be gone.
 O, go not yet! Even thus two friends condemned
 Embrace and kiss and take ten thousand leaves,
 Loather a hundred times to part than die.
 Yet now farewell, and farewell life with thee!

SUFFOLK

Thus is poor Suffolk ten times banishèd;
 Once by the king, and three times thrice by thee.
 'Tis not the land I care for, wert thou thence;
 A wilderness is populous enough,
 So Suffolk had thy heavenly company:
 For where thou art, there is the world itself,
 With every several^o pleasure in the world,
 And where thou art not, desolation.
 I can no more: live thou to joy thy life;
 Myself to joy in nought but that thou liv'st.

Enter VAUX.

QUEEN

Whither goes Vaux so fast? What news, I prithee?

VAUX

To signify unto his majesty
 That Cardinal Beaufort is at point of death;
 For suddenly a grievous sickness took him,
 That makes him gasp, and stare, and catch the air,
 Blaspheming God, and cursing men on earth.
 Sometime he talks as if Duke Humphrey's ghost
 Were by his side; sometime he calls the king,
 And whispers to his pillow, as to him,
 The secrets of his overchargèd soul:
 And I am sent to tell his majesty
 That even now he cries aloud for him.

QUEEN

Go tell this heavy message to the king. Exit [VAUX].
 Ay me! What is this world! What news are these!
 But wherefore grieve I at an hour's poor loss,
 Omitting Suffolk's exile, my soul's treasure?
 Why only, Suffolk, mourn I not for thee,
 And with the southern clouds contend in tears,
 Theirs for the earth's increase,^o mine for my sorrows?
 Now get thee hence: the king, thou know'st, is coming;
 If thou be found by me, thou art but dead.

SUFFOLK

If I depart from thee I cannot live;
 And in thy sight to die, what were it else
 But like a pleasant slumber in thy lap?
 Here could I breathe my soul into the air,
 As mild and gentle as the cradle babe
 Dying with mother's dug between its lips;
 Where, from thy sight, I should be raging mad,
 And cry out for thee to close up mine eyes,
 To have thee with thy lips to stop my mouth:
 So shouldst thou either turn my flying soul,
 Or I should breathe it so into thy body,
 And then it lived in sweet Elysium.
 To die by thee were but to die in jest;
 From thee to die were torture more than death:
 O, let me stay, befall what may befall!

QUEEN

Away! Though parting be a fretful corrosive,^o
 It is applièd to a deathful wound.
 To France, sweet Suffolk: let me hear from thee;
 For wheresoe'er thou art in this world's globe,
 I'll have an Iris^o that shall find thee out.

SUFFOLK I go.

QUEEN

And take my heart with thee.
She kisseth him.

SUFFOLK

 That ever did contain a thing of worth.
 Even as a splitted bark, so sunder we:
 This way fall I to death. Exit SUFFOLK.

Enter the KING, SALISBURY, and WARWICK; and then the curtains be drawn, and the CARDINAL is discovered in his bed, raving and staring as if he were mad.

KING

How fares my lord? Speak, Beaufort, to thy sovereign.

CARDINAL

If thou be'st death, I'll give thee England's treasure,
Enough to purchase such another island,
So thou wilt let me live, and feel no pain.

KING

Ah, what a sign it is of evil life,
Where death's approach is seen so terrible!

WARWICK

Beaufort, it is thy sovereign speaks to thee.

CARDINAL

Bring me unto my trial when you will.
Died he not in his bed? Where should he die?
Can I make men live, wh'er they will or no?
O, torture me no more! I will confess.
Alive again? Then show me where he is:
I'll give a thousand pound to look upon him.
He hath no eyes, the dust hath blinded them.
Comb down his hair; look, look! It stands upright,
Like lime twigs° set to catch my wingèd soul.
Give me some drink, and bid the apothecary
Bring the strong poison that I bought of him.

KING

O thou Eternal Mover of the heavens,
Look with a gentle eye upon this wretch!
O, beat away the busy meddling fiend
That lays strong siege unto this wretch's soul,
And from his bosom purge this black despair!

WARWICK

See how the pangs of death do make him grin.°

SALISBURY

Disturb him not, let him pass peaceably.

KING

Peace to his soul, if God's good pleasure be.
Lord Cardinal, if thou think'st on heaven's bliss,
Hold up thy hand, make signal of thy hope.

The CARDINAL dies.

He dies, and makes no sign. O God, forgive him!

WARWICK

So bad a death argues° a monstrous life.

KING

Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all.
Close up his eyes and draw the curtain close;
And let us all to meditation.

Exeunt.

[ACT IV]

[Scene I. The coast of Kent.]

Alarum. Fight at sea. Ordnance goes off. And then enter the LIEUTENANT of the ship, and the MASTER, and the master's MATE, and the Duke of SUFFOLK, disguised, and others [GENTLEMEN] with him, and Walter WHITMORE.

LIEUTENANT°

The gaudy, blabbing, and remorseful day
Is crept into the bosom of the sea,
And now loud-howling wolves arouse the jades°
That drag the tragic melancholy night;
Who, with their drowsy, slow, and flagging wings
Clip° dead men's graves, and from their misty jaws
Breathe foul contagious darkness in the air.
Therefore bring forth the soldiers of our prize,
For whilst our pinnace anchors in the Downs°
Here shall they make their ransom on the sand,
Or with their blood stain this discolored shore.
Master, this prisoner freely give I thee;
And thou that art his mate, make boot of° this;
The other, Walter Whitmore, is thy share.

FIRST GENTLEMAN

What is my ransom, master? Let me know.

MASTER

A thousand crowns, or else lay down your head.

MATE

And so much shall you give, or off goes yours.

[The PRISONERS react adversely.]

LIEUTENANT

What! Think you much to pay two thousand crowns,
And bear the name and port° of gentlemen?
Cut both the villains' throats; for die you shall:
The lives of those which we have lost in fight
Be counterpoised with such a petty sum!

FIRST GENTLEMAN

I'll give it, sir; and therefore spare my life.

SECOND GENTLEMAN

And so will I, and write home for it straight.

WHITMORE [To SUFFOLK.]

I lost mine eye in laying the prize aboard,
And therefore to revenge it shalt thou die;
And so should these, if I might have my will.

LIEUTENANT

Be not so rash: take ransom, let him live.

SUFFOLK

Look on my George;° I am a gentleman.
Rate me at what thou wilt, thou shalt be paid.

WHITMORE

And so am I: my name is Walter Whitmore.
How now! Why starts thou? What, doth death affright?

SUFFOLK

Thy name affrights me, in whose sound is death.

WHITMORE

Gaultier or Walter, which it is I care not.
 Never yet did base dishonor blur our name,
 But with our sword we wiped away the blot.
 Therefore, when merchantlike I sell revenge,
 Broke be my sword, my arms torn and defaced,
 And I proclaimed a coward through the world!

SUFFOLK

Stay, Whitmore, for thy prisoner is a prince,
 The Duke of Suffolk, William de la Pole.

WHITMORE

The Duke of Suffolk, muffled up in rags?

SUFFOLK

Ay, but these rags are no part of the duke:
 Jove sometime went disguised, and why not I?

LIEUTENANT

But Jove was never slain, as thou shalt be.

SUFFOLK

Obscure and lousy swain, King Henry's blood,
 The honorable blood of Lancaster,
 Must not be shed by such a jaded groom.^o
 Hast thou not kissed thy hand and held my stirrup?
 Bareheaded plodded by my footcloth^o mule,
 And thought thee happy when I shook my head?
 How often hast thou waited at my cup,
 Fed from my trencher, kneeled down at the board,
 When I have feasted with Queen Margaret?
 Remember it, and let it make thee crestfall'n,
 Ay, and allay this thy abortive^o pride:
 How in our voiding lobby^o hast thou stood
 And duly waited for my coming forth.
 This hand of mine hath writ in thy behalf,
 And therefore shall it charm thy riotous tongue.

WHITMORE

Speak, captain, shall I stab the forlorn swain?^o

LIEUTENANT

First let my words stab him, as he hath me.

SUFFOLK

Base slave, thy words are blunt, and so art thou.

LIEUTENANT

Convey him hence and on our long-boat's side
 Strike off his head.

SUFFOLK

Thou dar'st not, for thy own.

LIEUTENANT

Yes, Poole!

SUFFOLK

Poole?^o

LIEUTENANT

Ay, kennel,^o puddle, sink, whose filth and dirt
 Troubles the silver spring where England drinks.
 Now will I dam up this thy yawning mouth
 For swallowing the treasure of the realm;

35

Thy lips, that kissed the queen, shall sweep the ground;
 And thou that smil'dst at good Duke Humphrey's death

Against the senseless winds shalt grin in vain,
 Who in contempt shall hiss at thee again.

And wedded be thou to the hags of hell,

For daring to affy^o a mighty lord

40

Unto the daughter of a worthless king,
 Having neither subject, wealth, nor diadem.

By devilish policy art thou grown great

And like ambitious Sylla^o overgorged

With gobbets of thy mother's bleeding heart.

By thee Anjou and Maine were sold to France,

45

The false revolting Normans thorough^o thee

Disdain to call us lord, and Picardy

Hath slain their governors, surprised our forts,

And sent the ragged soldiers wounded home.

The princely Warwick, and the Nevils all,

Whose dreadful swords were never drawn in vain,

As hating thee, are rising up in arms;

And now the house of York, thrust from the crown

By shameful murder of a guiltless king

50

And lofty proud encroaching tyranny,

Burns with revenging fire, whose hopeful colors

Advance our half-faced sun,^o striving to shine,

Under the which is writ "Invitis nubibus."^o

The commons here in Kent are up in arms;

55

And, to conclude, reproach and beggary

Is crept into the palace of our king,

And all by thee. Away! Convey him hence.

SUFFOLK

O that I were a god, to shoot forth thunder

60

Upon these paltry, servile, abject drudges!

Small things make base men proud: this villain here,

Being captain of a pinnacle, threatens more

Than Bargulus the strong Illyrian pirate.^o

Drones suck not eagles' blood, but rob beehives:

It is impossible that I should die

65

By such a lowly vassal as thyself.

Thy words move rage and not remorse in me.

LIEUTENANT

Ay, but my deeds shall stay thy fury soon.

SUFFOLK

I go of message from the queen to France;^o

I charge thee waft me safely 'cross the Channel.

And as for these whose ransom we have set,

It is our pleasure one of them depart:

140

Therefore come you with us and let him go.

WHITMORE

There let his head and lifeless body lie,

Until the queen his mistress bury it.

Exit Walter [WHITMORE].

FIRST GENTLEMAN

O barbarous and bloody spectacle!

His body will I bear unto the king:

145

If he revenge it not, yet will his friends;

So will the queen, that living held him dear.

DICK [Aside.] Ay, by my faith, the field is honorable;
and there was he° born, under a hedge: for his father had never a house but the cage.°

CADE Valiant I am.

55

SMITH [Aside.] 'A must needs, for beggary is valiant.

CADE I am able to endure much.

DICK [Aside.] No question of that; for I have seen him whipped three market days together.

CADE I fear neither sword nor fire.

SMITH [Aside.] He need not fear the sword, for his coat is of proof.^o

DICK [Aside.] But methinks he should stand in fear of fire, being burnt i' th' hand^o for stealing of sheep.

CADE Be brave, then; for your captain is brave, and 65 vows reformation. There shall be in England seven halfpenny loaves sold for a penny; the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops;^o and I will make it felony to drink small beer. All the realm shall be in common,^o and in Cheapside^o shall my palfry go to grass; 70 and when I am king, as king I will be—

ALL God save your majesty!

CADE I thank you, good people—there shall be no money; all shall eat and drink on my score;^o and I will apparel them all in one livery, that they may 75 agree like brothers, and worship me their lord.

DICK The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers.

CADE Nay, that I mean to do. Is not this a lamentable thing, that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment? That parchment, being scrib- 80 bled o'er, should undo a man? Some say the bee stings; but I say, 'tis the bee's wax: for I did but seal once to a thing, and I was never mine own man^o since. How now! who's there?

Enter a CLERK [led by others.]

SMITH The clerk of Chatham: he can write and read, 85 and cast accompt.^o

CADE O monstrous!

SMITH We took him setting of boys' copies.^o

CADE Here's a villain!

SMITH H' as a book in his pocket with red letters in't. 90

CADE Nay, then, he is a conjuror.

DICK Nay, he can make obligations,^o and write court hand.^o

CADE I am sorry for't: the man is a proper man, of mine honor; unless I find him guilty, he shall not 95 die. Come hither, sirrah, I must examine thee: what is thy name?

CLERK Emmanuel.

DICK They use to write it on the top of letters:^o
'twill go hard with you. 100

CADE Let me alone. Dost thou use to write thy name? Or hast thou a mark^o to thyself, like an honest plain-dealing man?

CLERK Sir, I thank God, I have been so well brought up that I can write my name. 105

ALL He hath confessed: away with him! He's a villain and a traitor.

CADE Away with him, I say! Hang him with his pen and inkhorn about his neck. Exit one with the CLERK.

MICHAEL Fly, fly, fly! Sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother are hard by, with the king's forces.

CADE Stand, villain, stand, or I'll fell thee down. He shall be encountered with a man as good as himself: 115
he is but a knight, is 'a?

MICHAEL No.

CADE To equal him, I will make myself a knight presently. [Kneels.] Rise up Sir John Mortimer. [Rises.] 120
Now have at him!

Enter Sir Humphrey STAFFORD and his BROTHER, with [a HERALD,] drum, and SOLDIERS.

STAFFORD

Rebellious hinds, the filth and scum of Kent,
Marked for the gallows: lay your weapons down.
Home to your cottages, forsake this groom!
The king is merciful, if you revolt.^o

BROTHER

But angry, wrathful, and inclined to blood, 125
If you go forward: therefore yield, or die.

CADE

As for these silken-coated slaves, I pass^o not.
It is to you, good people, that I speak,
Over whom, in time to come, I hope to reign:
For I am rightful heir unto the crown. 130

STAFFORD

Villain, thy father was a plasterer,
And thou thyself a shearman,^o art thou not?

CADE

And Adam was a gardener.

BROTHER

And what of that?

CADE

Marry, this: Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, 135
Married the Duke of Clarence' daughter, did he not?

STAFFORD Ay, sir.

CADE

By her he had two children at one birth.

BROTHER That's false.

CADE

Ay, there's the question; but I say, 'tis true: 140
The elder of them, being put to nurse,
Was by a beggar woman stol'n away,
And, ignorant of his birth and parentage,
Became a bricklayer when he came to age:
His son am I; deny it, if you can. 145

DICK

Nay, 'tis too true; therefore he shall be king.

SMITH Sir, he made a chimney in my father's house, and the bricks are alive at this day to testify it; therefore deny it not.

STAFFORD

And will you credit this base drudge's words, 150
That speaks he knows not what?

ALL

Ay, marry, will we; therefore get ye gone.

BROTHER

Jack Cade, the Duke of York hath taught you this.

CADE [Aside.]

He lies, for I invented it myself.—Go to, sirrah, tell the king from me, that, for his father's sake, Henry the Fifth, in whose time boys went to span-counter° for French crowns, I am content he shall reign; but I'll be protector over him.

DICK And furthermore, we'll have the Lord Say's head for selling the dukedom of Maine.

CADE And good reason: for thereby is England mained,° and fain to go with a staff, but that my puissance holds it up. Fellow kings, I tell you that that Lord Say hath gelded the commonwealth, and made it an eunuch: and more than that, he can speak French; and therefore he is a traitor.

STAFFORD

O gross and miserable ignorance!

CADE Nay, answer, if you can: the Frenchmen are our enemies; go to, then, I ask but this: can he that speaks with the tongue of an enemy be a good counselor, or no?

ALL No, no, and therefore we'll have his head.

BROTHER

Well, seeing gentle words will not prevail,
Assail them with the army of the king.

STAFFORD

Herald, away; and throughout every town
Proclaim them traitors that are up with Cade;
That those which fly before the battle ends
May, even in their wives' and children's sight,
Be hanged up for example at their doors:
And you that be the king's friends, follow me.

Exit [STAFFORDS and their FORCES].

CADE

And you that love the commons, follow me.
Now show yourselves men; 'tis for liberty.
We will not leave one lord, one gentleman:
Spare none but such as go in clouted shoon;°
For they are thrifty honest men and such
As would, but that they dare not, take our parts.

DICK They are all in order and march toward us.

CADE But then are we in order when we are most out of order. Come, march forward. [Exeunt.]

[Scene III. Another part of Blackheath.]

Alarums to the fight, wherein both the STAFFORDS are slain. Enter CADE and the rest.

CADE Where's Dick, the butcher of Ashford?

DICK Here, sir.

CADE They fell before thee like sheep and oxen, and thou behav'dst thyself as if thou hadst been in thine own slaughterhouse: therefore thus will I reward thee, the Lent shall be as long again as it is; and thou shalt have a license to kill° for a hundred lacking one.°

CADE And, to speak truth, thou deserv'st no less. [He puts on Sir Humphrey's armor.] This monument of the victory will I bear; and the bodies shall be dragged at my horse heels till I do come to London, where we will have the mayor's sword borne before us.

DICK If we mean to thrive and do good, break open the jails and let out the prisoners.

CADE Fear not that, I warrant thee. Come, let's march towards London. Exeunt.

[Scene IV. London. The palace.]

Enter the KING with a supplication, and the QUEEN with Suffolk's head, the Duke of BUCKINGHAM, and the Lord SAY.

QUEEN [Aside.]

Oft have I heard that grief softens the mind
And makes it fearful and degenerate:
Think therefore on revenge, and cease to weep.
But who can cease to weep and look on this?
Here may his head lie on my throbbing breast;
But where's the body that I should embrace?

BUCKINGHAM What answer makes your grace to the rebels' supplication?

KING

I'll send some holy bishop to entreat;
For God forbid so many simple souls
Should perish by the sword! And I myself,
Rather than bloody war shall cut them short,
Will parley with Jack Cade their general.
But stay, I'll read it over once again.

QUEEN [Aside.]

Ah, barbarous villains! Hath this lovely face
Ruled like a wandering planet° over me,
And could it not enforce them to relent,
That were unworthy to behold the same?

KING

Lord Say, Jack Cade hath sworn to have thy head.

SAY

Ay, but I hope your highness shall have his.

KING

How now, madam!
Still lamenting and mourning for Suffolk's death?
I fear me, love, if that I had been dead,
Thou wouldest not have mourned so much for me.

QUEEN

No, my love, I should not mourn, but die for thee.

Enter a MESSENGER.

KING

How now! What news? Why com'st thou in such haste?

MESSENGER

The rebels are in Southwark: fly, my lord!
Jack Cade proclaims himself Lord Mortimer,
Descended from the Duke of Clarence' house,
And calls your grace usurper openly,

IV.iv.16 wandering planet the star under which one is born, astrologically

And vows to crown himself in Westminster.
His army is a ragged multitude
Of hinds and peasants, rude and merciless:
Sir Humphrey Stafford and his brother's death
Hath given them heart and courage to proceed.
All scholars, lawyers, courtiers, gentlemen,
They call false caterpillars° and intend their death.

KING

O graceless men! They know not what they do.

BUCKINGHAM

My gracious lord, retire to Killingworth,^o
Until a power be raised to put them down.

QUEEN

Ah, were the Duke of Suffolk now alive,
These Kentish rebels would soon be appeased!

KING

Lord Say, the traitors hateth thee;
Therefore away with us to Killingworth.

SAY

So might your grace's person be in danger.
The sight of me is odious in their eyes:
And therefore in this city will I stay,
And live alone as secret as I may.

Enter another MESSENGER.

SECOND MESSENGER

Jack Cade hath gotten London Bridge!
The citizens fly and forsake their houses;
The rascal people, thirsting after prey,
Join with the traitor, and they jointly swear
To spoil° the city and your royal court.

BUCKINGHAM

Then linger not, my lord; away, take horse.

KING

Come, Margaret: God, our hope, will succor us.

QUEEN

My hope is gone, now Suffolk is deceased.^o

KING

Farewell, my lord: trust not the Kentish rebels.

BUCKINGHAM

Trust nobody, for fear you be betrayed.

SAY

The trust I have is in mine innocence,
And therefore am I bold and resolute.

Exeunt. 60

[Scene V. London. The Tower.]

Enter Lord SCALES upon the Tower, walking. Then enters two or three CITIZENS below.

SCALES

How now! Is Jack Cade slain?

FIRST CITIZEN No, my lord, nor likely to be slain;
for they have won the Bridge, killing all those that withstand them: the Lord Mayor craves aid of your honor from the Tower to defend the city from the rebels.

SCALES

Such aid as I can spare you shall command,

But I am troubled here with them myself:
The rebels have assayed to win the Tower.
But get you to Smithfield, and gather head,
And thither I will send you Matthew Goffe.
Fight for your king, your country, and your lives;
And so farewell, for I must hence again. Exeunt. 10

[Scene VI. London. Cannon Street.]

Enter Jack CADE and the rest, and strikes his sword on London Stone.

40

CADE Now is Mortimer lord of this city. And here, sitting upon London Stone, I charge and command that, of the city's cost, the pissing conduit° run nothing but claret wine this first year of our reign.
And now henceforward it shall be treason for any that calls me other than Lord Mortimer. 5

Enter a SOLDIER, running.

45

SOLDIER Jack Cade! Jack Cade!

CADE Knock him down there.

They kill him.

SMITH If this fellow be wise, he'll never call ye Jack
Cade more: I think he hath a very fair warning. 10

DICK My lord, there's an army gathered together in Smithfield.

50

CADE Come, then, let's go fight with them: but first, go and set London Bridge on fire; and if you can, burn down the Tower too. Come, let's away. 15
Exeunt omnes.

[Scene VII. London. Smithfield.]

Alarums. Matthew GOFFE is slain, and all the rest. Then enter Jack CADE, with his COMPANY.

CADE So, sirs: now go some and pull down the Savoy; others to th' Inns of Court; down with them
all.

DICK I have a suit unto your lordship.

CADE Be it a lordship, thou shalt have it for that word. 5

DICK Only that the laws of England may come out of your mouth.

HOLLAND [Aside.] 'Mass, 'twill be sore law, then; for he was thrust in the mouth with a spear, and 'tis not whole yet. 10

SMITH [Aside.] Nay, John, it will be stinking law; for his breath stinks with eating toasted cheese.

CADE I have thought upon it; it shall be so. Away, burn all the records of the realm: my mouth shall be the parliament of England. 15

HOLLAND [Aside.] Then we are like to have biting° statutes, unless his teeth be pulled out.

CADE And henceforward all things shall be in common. 20

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSANGER My lord, a prize, a prize! Here's the Lord Say, which sold the towns in France; he that made us pay one and twenty fifteens,^o and one shilling to the pound, the last subsidy.

Enter GEORGE, with the Lord SAY.

CADE Well, he shall be beheaded for it ten times. Ah, ²⁵ thou say, thou serge, nay, thou buckram^o lord, now art thou within point blank of our jurisdiction regal! What canst thou answer to my majesty for giving up of Normandy unto Mounsieur Basimecu,^o the Dolphin of France? Be it known unto thee by these ³⁰ presence,^o even the presence of Lord Mortimer, that I am the besom^o that must sweep the court clean of such filth as thou art. Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm in erecting a grammar school: and whereas before, our forefathers had no ³⁵ other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used, and contrary to the king, his crown and dignity, thou hast built a paper mill.^o It will be proved to thy face that thou hast men about thee that usually talk of a noun and a verb, and such ⁴⁰ abominable^o words as no Christian ear can endure to hear. Thou hast appointed justices of peace, to call poor men before them about matters they were not able to answer. Moreover, thou hast put them in prison, and because they could not read^o thou hast ⁴⁵ hanged them, when, indeed, only for that cause they have been most worthy to live. Thou dost ride on a footcloth,^o dost thou not?

SAY What of that?

CADE Marry, thou ought'st not to let thy horse wear ⁵⁰ a cloak, when honester men than thou go in their hose and doublets.

DICK And work in their shirt too as myself, for example, that am a butcher.

SAY You men of Kent—

DICK What say you of Kent? ⁵⁵

SAY Nothing but this: 'tis bona terra, mala gens.^o

CADE Away with him, away with him! He speaks Latin.

SAY

Hear me but speak, and bear me where you will. ⁶⁰ Kent, in the Commentaries Caesar writ, Is termed the civil'st place of all this isle: Sweet is the country, because full of riches; The people liberal, valiant, active, wealthy; Which makes me hope you are not void of pity. ⁶⁵ I sold not Maine, I lost not Normandy, Yet to recover them would lose my life.

23 one . . . fifteens taxes (a gross exaggeration) 26 say . . . serge . . . buckram puns on Lord Say's name: say is a silk cloth, resembling serge; serge a serviceable but less elegant material; and buckram a coarse linen stiffened with glue, commonly used in making theatrical properties 29 Basimecu pseudo-French pun on baise mon cul = kiss my backside 30-31 Be . . . presence play on the formal beginning of documents, Noverint universi per praesentes (Be it known unto all by these presents) 32 besom broom 37-38 printing . . . mill flagrant anachronisms, perhaps intentionally humorous 41 abominable possibly a pun on ad hominem 45 because . . . read refers to the legal exemption from hanging and other penalties ("benefit of clergy") which Latin-reading offenders could claim 48 footcloth horse or mule decorated for a procession 57 bona . . . gens good land, bad inhabitants

Justice with favor have I always done;
Prayers and tears have moved me, gifts could never.
When have I aught exacted at your hands, ⁷⁰
But to maintain the king, the realm, and you?
Large gifts have I bestowed on learned clerks,^o
Because my book^o preferred me to the king,
And seeing ignorance is the curse of God,
Knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heaven, ⁷⁵
Unless you be possessed with devilish spirits,
You cannot but forbear to murder me:
This tongue hath parleyed unto foreign kings
For your behoof^o—

CADE Tut, when struck'st thou one blow in the ⁸⁰ field?

SAY

Great men have reaching hands: oft have I struck
Those that I never saw, and struck them dead.

GEORGE O monstrous coward! What, to come ⁸⁵ behind folks?

SAY

These cheeks are pale for watching for your good.

CADE Give him a box o' th' ear and that will make ⁹⁰ 'em red again.

SAY

Long sitting to determine poor men's causes
Hath made me full of sickness and diseases. ⁹⁵

CADE Ye shall have a hempen caudle then and the ¹⁰⁰ help of hatchet.^o

DICK Why dost thou quiver, man?

SAY

The palsy, and not fear, provokes me.

CADE Nay, he nods at us, as who should say, "I'll be ⁹⁵ even with you." I'll see if his head will stand steadier on a pole, or no: take him away, and behead him.

SAY

Tell me: wherein have I offended most?

Have I affected wealth or honor? Speak!

Are my chests filled up with extorted gold? ¹⁰⁰

Is my apparel sumptuous to behold?

Whom have I injured, that ye seek my death?

These hands are free from guiltless bloodshedding,^o

This breast from harboring foul deceitful thoughts.

O, let me live! ¹⁰⁵

CADE [Aside.] I feel remorse in myself with his words; but I'll bridle it: he shall die, and it be but for pleading so well for his life.—Away with him! He has a familiar^o under his tongue; he speaks not ¹¹⁰ a^o God's name. Go, take him away, I say, and strike off his head presently; and then break into his son-in-law's house, Sir James Cromer, and strike off his head, and bring them both upon two poles hither.

ALL It shall be done.

SAY

Ah, countrymen! If when you make your prayers, ¹¹⁵ God should be so obdurate as yourselves, How would it fare with your departed souls? And therefore yet relent, and save my life.

CADE Away with him! And do as I command ye.

[SAY is led away.]

The proudest peer in the realm shall not wear a head on his shoulders, unless he pay me tribute;
there shall not a maid be married, but she shall pay to me her maidenhead ere they have it; men shall hold me in capite;^o and we charge and command that their wives be as free as heart can wish or tongue can tell. 125

DICK My lord, when shall we go to Cheapside and take up commodities upon our bills?^o

CADE Marry, presently.

ALL O, brave! 130

Enter one with the heads.

CADE But is not this braver? Let them kiss one another, for they loved well when they were alive.
Now part them again, lest they consult about the giving up of some more towns in France. Soldiers, defer the spoil of the city until night: for with these 135 borne before us, instead of maces, will we ride through the streets; and at every corner have them kiss. Away! Exit [All].

[Scene VIII. Southwark.]

Alarum and retreat. Enter again CADE and all his rabble-ment.

CADE Up Fish Street! Down Saint Magnus' Corner!
Kill and knock down! Throw them into Thames!
(Sound a parley.) What noise is this I hear? Dare any be so bold to sound retreat or parley, when I command them kill? 5

Enter BUCKINGHAM and old CLIFFORD.

BUCKINGHAM

Ay, here they be that dare and will disturb thee:
Know, Cade, we come ambassadors from the king
Unto the commons whom thou hast misled,
And here pronounce free pardon to them all
That will forsake thee and go home in peace. 10

CLIFFORD

What say ye, countrymen? Will ye relent,
And yield to mercy whilst 'tis offered you,
Or let a rebel lead you to your deaths?
Who loves the king and will embrace his pardon,
Fling up his cap, and say, "God save his majesty!" 15
Who hateth him and honors not his father,
Henry the Fifth, that made all France to quake,
Shake he his weapon at us and pass by.

ALL God save the king! God save the king!

CADE What, Buckingham and Clifford, are ye so brave? And you, base peasants, do ye believe him?
Will you needs be hanged with your pardons about your necks? Hath my sword therefore broke through London gates, that you should leave me at the White
Hart^o in Southwark? I thought ye would never 25 have given out these arms till you had recovered your ancient freedom: but you are all recreants and dastards, and delight to live in slavery to the nobility. Let them break your backs with burdens, take your houses over your heads, ravish your wives and daughters 30 before your faces. For me, I will make shift for one;

and so, God's curse light upon you all!

ALL We'll follow Cade, we'll follow Cade!

CLIFFORD

Is Cade the son of Henry the Fifth,
That thus you do exclaim you'll go with him? 35
Will he conduct you through the heart of France,
And make the meanest of you earls and dukes?
Alas, he hath no home, no place to fly to;
Nor knows he how to live but by the spoil,
Unless by robbing of your friends and us. 40
Were't not a shame, that whilst you live at jar,^o
The fearful French, whom you late vanquishèd,
Should make a start o'er seas and vanquish you?
Methinks already in this civil broil
I see them lording it in London streets, 45
Crying "Villiago!"^o unto all they meet.
Better ten thousand base-born Cades miscarry
Than you should stoop unto a Frenchman's mercy.
To France, to France! and get what you have lost:
Spare England, for it is your native coast. 50
Henry hath money, you are strong and manly;
God on our side, doubt not of victory.

ALL A Clifford! A Clifford! We'll follow the king and Clifford.

CADE Was ever feather so lightly blown to and fro as this multitude? The name of Henry the Fifth hailes 55 them to an hundred mischiefs and makes them leave me desolate. I see them lay their heads together to surprise me. My sword make way for me, for here is no staying: in despite of the devils and hell, have through the very midst of you! And heavens and honor be witness that no want of resolution in me, but only my followers' base and ignominious treasons, makes me betake me to my heels. 65

He runs through them with his staff, and flies away.

BUCKINGHAM

What, is he fled? Go some, and follow him;
And he that brings his head unto the king
Shall have a thousand crowns for his reward.

Exeunt some of them.

Follow me, soldiers: we'll devise a mean
To reconcile you all unto the king. Exeunt omnes. 70

[Scene IX. Kenilworth Castle.]

Sound trumpets. Enter KING, QUEEN, and SOMERSET, on the terrace.

But I was made a king, at nine months old.

BUCKINGHAM

Health and glad tidings to your majesty!

KING

Why, Buckingham, is the traitor Cade surprised?
Or is he but retired to make him strong?

Enter multitudes, with halters about their necks.

CLIFFORD

He is fled, my lord, and all his powers do yield,
And humbly thus, with halters^o on their necks,
Expect your highness' doom, of life or death.

KING

Then, heaven, set ope thy everlasting gates,
To entertain^o my vows of thanks and praise!
Soldiers, this day have you redeemed your lives
And showed how well you love your prince and country:

Continue still in this so good a mind,
And Henry, though he be unfortunate,
Assure yourselves, will never be unkind:
And so, with thanks and pardon to you all,
I do dismiss you to your several countries.^o

ALL

God save the king! God save the king!

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

Please it your grace to be advertised^o
The Duke of York is newly come from Ireland,
And with a puissant and a mighty power
Of gallowglasses^o and stout kerns^o
Is marching hitherward in proud array,
And still proclaimeth, as he comes along,
His arms are only to remove from thee
The Duke of Somerset, whom he terms a traitor.

KING

Thus stands my state, 'twixt Cade and York distressed,
Like to a ship, that having 'scaped a tempest,
Is straightway calmed, and boarded with^o a pirate.
But now is Cade driven back, his men dispersed;
And now is York in arms to second him.
I pray thee, Buckingham, go and meet him,
And ask him what's the reason of these arms.
Tell him I'll send Duke Edmund to the Tower,
And, Somerset, we will commit thee thither,
Until his army be dismissed from him.

SOMERSET

My lord,
I'll yield myself to prison willingly,
Or unto death, to do my country good.

KING

In any case, be not too rough in terms,
For he is fierce, and cannot brook hard language.

5

BUCKINGHAM

I will, my lord; and doubt not so to deal
As all things shall redound unto your good.

KING

Come, wife, let's in, and learn to govern better;
For yet may England curse my wretched reign.
Flourish. Exeunt.

[Scene X. Kent. Iden's garden.]

Enter CADE.

10

CADE Fie on ambitions! Fie on myself, that have a sword, and yet am ready to famish! These five days have I hid me in these woods and durst not peep out, for all the country is laid^o for me; but now am I so hungry that if I might have a lease of my life for a thousand years I could stay no longer.
Wherefore, on a brick wall have I climbed into this garden, to see if I can eat grass, or pick a sallet^o another while, which is not amiss to cool a man's stomach^o this hot weather. And I think this word^o 10
"sallet" was born to do me good: for many a time, but for a sallet, my brainpan had been cleft with a brown bill;^o and many a time, when I have been dry and bravely marching, it hath served me instead of a quart pot to drink in; and now the word 15
"sallet" must serve me to feed on.

Enter [Alexander] IDEN.

IDEN

Lord, who would live turmoiled in the court,
And may enjoy such quiet walks as these?
This small inheritance my father left me 25
Contenteth me, and worth^o a monarchy. 20
I seek not to wax great by others' waning,
Or gather wealth, I care not with what envy:
Sufficeth that I have maintains my state,
And sends the poor well pleasèd from my gate.

30

CADE Here's the lord of the soil come to seize me for 25
a stray, for entering his fee-simple without leave.^o
Ah, villain, thou wilt betray me, and get a thousand crowns of the king by carrying my head to him:
but I'll make thee eat iron like an ostrich, and swallow my sword like a great pin, ere thou and I part. 30

IDEN

Why, rude companion,^o whatsoe'er thou be,
I know thee not; why then should I betray thee?
Is't not enough to break into my garden,
And like a thief to come to rob my grounds,
Climbing my walls in spite of me the owner, 35
But thou wilt brave^o me with these saucy terms?

40

CADE Brave thee! Ay, by the best blood that ever was broached, and beard thee^o too. Look on me

IDEN

Nay, it shall ne'er be said, while England stands,
That Alexander Iden, an esquire of Kent,
Took odds° to combat a poor famished man. 45
Oppose thy steadfast-gazing eyes to mine,
See if thou canst outface me with thy looks;
Set limb to limb, and thou art far the lesser:
Thy hand is but a finger to my fist,
Thy leg a stick comparèd with this truncheon; 50
My foot shall fight with all the strength thou hast;
And if mine arm be heavèd in the air,
Thy grave is digged already in the earth.
As for words, whose greatness answers words,
Let this my sword report what speech forbears. 55

CADE By my valor, the most complete champion that ever I heard! Steel, if thou turn the edge, or cut not out the burly-boned clown in chines° of beef ere thou sleep in thy sheath, I beseech God on my knees thou mayst be turned to hobnails. They fight, 60 and CADE falls down. O, I am slain! Famine and no other hath slain me: let ten thousand devils come against me, and give me but the ten meals I have lost, and I'd defy them all. Wither, garden, and be henceforth a burying place to all that do dwell in this 65 house, because the unconquered soul of Cade is fled.

IDEN

Is't Cade that I have slain, that monstrous traitor?
Sword, I will hallow thee for this thy deed,
And hang thee o'er my tomb when I am dead:
Ne'er shall this blood be wipèd from thy point, 70
But thou shalt wear it as a herald's coat,
To emblaze° the honor that thy master got.

CADE Iden, farewell, and be proud of thy victory.
Tell Kent from me, she hath lost her best man, and exhort all the world to be cowards: for I, that 75 never feared any, am vanquished by famine, not by valor. Dies.

IDEN

How much thou wrong'st me, heaven be my judge.
Die, damnèd wretch, the curse of her that bare thee:
And as I thrust thy body in with my sword, 80
So wish I I might thrust thy soul to hell.
Hence will I drag thee headlong° by the heels
Unto a dunghill which shall be thy grave,
And there cut off thy most ungracious head,
Which I will bear in triumph to the king, 85
Leaving thy trunk for crows to feed upon. Exit.

[A C T V]

[Scene I. Fields between London and Saint Albans.]

Enter YORK, and his ARMY of Irish, with drum and colors.

YORK

From Ireland thus comes York to claim his right,
And pluck the crown from feeble Henry's head.
Ring, bells, aloud; burn, bonfires, clear and bright,
To entertain great England's lawful king.
Ah, sancta majestas!° Who would not buy thee dear? 5
Let them obey that knows not how to rule;
This hand was made to handle nought but gold.
I cannot give due action to my words,
Except a sword or scepter balance it:
A scepter shall it have, have I a soul, 10
On which I'll toss the fleur-de-luce° of France.

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

Whom have we here? Buckingham, to disturb me?
The king hath sent him, sure: I must dissemble.

BUCKINGHAM

York, if thou meanest well, I greet thee well.

YORK

Humphrey of Buckingham, I accept thy greeting. 15
Art thou a messenger, or come of pleasure?

BUCKINGHAM

A messenger from Henry, our dread liege,
To know the reason of these arms in peace;
Or why thou, being a subject as I am,
Against thy oath and true allegiance sworn, 20
Should raise so great a power without his leave,
Or dare to bring thy force so near the court.

YORK [Aside.]

Scarce can I speak, my choler is so great.
O, I could hew-up rocks and fight with flint,
I am so angry at these abject° terms; 25
And now, like Ajax Telamonius,
On sheep or oxen could I spend my fury.°
I am far better born than is the king,
More like a king, more kingly in my thoughts:
But I must make fair weather yet awhile, 30
Till Henry be more weak and I more strong.

[Aloud.]

Buckingham, I prithee, pardon me,
That I have given no answer all this while;
My mind was troubled with deep melancholy.
The cause why I have brought this army hither 35
Is to remove proud Somerset from the king,
Seditious to his grace, and to the state.

BUCKINGHAM

That is too much presumption on thy part:
But if thy arms be to no other end,
The king hath yielded unto thy demand: 40
The Duke of Somerset is in the Tower.

YORK

Upon thine honor, is he prisoner?

BUCKINGHAM

Upon mine honor, he is prisoner.

YORK

Then, Buckingham, I do dismiss my pow'rs.
Soldiers, I thank you all; disperse yourselves;
Meet me tomorrow in Saint George's Field,
You shall have pay and everything you wish.
And let my sovereign, virtuous Henry,
Command my eldest son, nay, all my sons,
As pledges of my fealty and love;
I'll send them all as willing as I live:
Lands, goods, horse, armor, anything I have,
Is his to use, so° Somerset may die.

BUCKINGHAM

York, I commend this kind° submission:
We twain will go into his highness' tent.

Enter KING and ATTENDANTS.

KING

Buckingham, doth York intend no harm to us,
That thus he marcheth with thee arm in arm?

YORK

In all submission and humility
York doth present himself unto your highness.

KING

Then what intends these forces thou dost bring?

YORK

To heave the traitor Somerset from hence,
And fight against that monstrous rebel Cade,
Who since I heard to be discomfited.

Enter IDEN, with Cade's head.

IDEN

If one so rude and of so mean condition
May pass into the presence of a king,
Lo, I present your grace a traitor's head,
The head of Cade, whom I in combat slew.

KING

The head of Cade! Great God, how just art thou!
O, let me view his visage, being dead,
That living wrought me such exceeding trouble.
Tell me, my friend, art thou the man that slew him?

IDEN

I was, an't like your majesty.

KING

How art thou called? And what is thy degree?

IDEN

Alexander Iden, that's my name;
A poor esquire of Kent, that loves his king.

BUCKINGHAM

So please it you, my lord, 'twere not amiss
He were created knight for his good service.

KING

Iden, kneel down. [He kneels.] Rise up a knight.
We give thee for reward a thousand marks,
And will that thou henceforth attend on us.

IDEN

May Iden live to merit such a bounty,
And never live but true unto his liege!

Enter QUEEN and SOMERSET.

KING

See, Buckingham, Somerset comes with th' queen:
Go, bid her hide him quickly from the duke.

QUEEN

45 For thousand Yorks he shall not hide his head, 85
But boldly stand and front° him to his face.

YORK

How now! Is Somerset at liberty?
Then, York, unloose thy long-imprisoned thoughts,
And let thy tongue be equal with thy heart.
50 Shall I endure the sight of Somerset? 90

False king, why hast thou broken faith with me,
Knowing how hardly° I can brook abuse?
King did I call thee? No, thou art not king,
Not fit to govern and rule multitudes,
Which dar'st not, no, nor canst not rule a traitor. 95
That head of thine doth not become° a crown;
Thy hand is made to grasp a palmer's staff,°
And not to grace an awful princely scepter.
That gold must round engirt these brows of mine, 100
Whose smile and frown, like to Achilles' spear,
Is able with the change to kill and cure.°

Here is a hand to hold a scepter up
And with the same to act controlling laws.
Give place: by heaven, thou shalt rule no more
O'er him whom heaven created for thy ruler. 105

60 SOMERSET

O monstrous traitor! I arrest thee, York,
Of capital treason 'gainst the king and crown:
Obey, audacious traitor; kneel for grace.

YORK

Wouldst have me kneel? First let me ask of these,°
If they can brook I bow a knee to man. 110
Sirrah, call in my sons to be my bail:

[Exit ATTENDANT.]
65 I know ere they will have me go to ward,°
They'll pawn their swords for my enfranchisement.

QUEEN

Call hither Clifford; bid him come amain,
To say if that the bastard boys of York 115
Shall be the surety for their traitor father.
[Exit ATTENDANT.]

70 YORK

O blood-bespotted Neapolitan,°
Outcast of Naples, England's bloody scourge!
The sons of York, thy betters in their birth,
Shall be their father's bail; and bane to those 120
That for my surety will refuse the boys!

75 Enter EDWARD and RICHARD.

See where they come: I'll warrant they'll make it good.

Enter CLIFFORD and [YOUNG CLIFFORD] his son.

And here comes Clifford to deny their bail.

CLIFFORD [Kneels to KING.]

Health and all happiness to my lord the king!

YORK

I thank thee, Clifford: say, what news with thee?

Nay, do not fright us with an angry look:

We are thy sovereign, Clifford, kneel again;

For thy mistaking so, we pardon thee.

CLIFFORD

This is my king, York, I do not mistake;

But thou mistakes me much to think I do.

To Bedlam° with him! Is the man grown mad?

KING

Ay, Clifford; a bedlam° and ambitious humor

Makes him oppose himself against his king.

CLIFFORD

He is a traitor; let him to the Tower,

And chop away that factious pate of his.

QUEEN

He is arrested, but will not obey;

His sons, he says, shall give their words for him.

YORK

Will you not, sons?

EDWARD

Ay, noble father, if our words will serve.

RICHARD

And if words will not, then our weapons shall.

CLIFFORD

Why, what a brood of traitors have we here!

YORK

Look in a glass, and call thy image so.

I am thy king, and thou a false-heart traitor.

Call hither to the stake my two brave bears,

That with the very shaking of their chains

They may astonish° these fell-lurking° curs:

Bid Salisbury and Warwick come to me.

Enter the Earls of WARWICK and SALISBURY.

CLIFFORD

Are these thy bears? We'll bait thy bears to death,

And manacle the bear'ard° in their chains,

If thou dar'st bring them to the baiting place.

RICHARD

Oft have I seen a hot o'erweening cur

Run back and bite, because he was withheld;

Who, being suffered°, with° the bear's fell paw

Hath clapped his tail between his legs and cried:

And such a piece of service will you do,

If you oppose yourselves to match Lord Warwick.

CLIFFORD

Hence, heap of wrath, foul indigested° lump,

As crooked in thy manners as thy shape!

YORK

Nay, we shall heat you thoroughly anon.

CLIFFORD

Take heed, lest by your heat you burn yourselves.

KING

Why, Warwick, hath thy knee forgot to bow?

Old Salisbury, shame to thy silver hair,

Thou mad misleader of thy brainsick son!

What, wilt thou on thy deathbed play the ruffian,

And seek for sorrow with thy spectacles?°

O, where is faith? O, where is loyalty?

If it be banished from the frosty head,

Where shall it find a harbor in the earth?

Wilt thou go dig a grave to find out war,

And shame thine honorable age with blood?

Why art thou old, and want'st° experience?

Or wherefore dost abuse° it, if thou hast it?

For shame! In duty bend thy knee to me,

That bows unto the grave with mickle° age.

SALISBURY

My lord, I have considered with myself

The title of this most renownèd duke,

And in my conscience do repute his grace

The rightful heir to England's royal seat.

KING

Hast thou not sworn allegiance unto me?

SALISBURY I have.

KING

Canst thou dispense with° heaven for such an oath?

SALISBURY

It is great sin to swear unto a sin,

But greater sin to keep a sinful oath.

Who can be bound by any solemn vow

To do a murd'rous deed, to rob a man,

To force a spotless virgin's chastity,

To reave° the orphan of his patrimony,

To wring the widow from her customèd right,°

And have no other reason for this wrong

But that he was bound by a solemn oath?

QUEEN

A subtle traitor needs no sophister.°

KING

Call Buckingham, and bid him arm himself.

YORK

Call Buckingham, and all the friends thou hast,

I am resolved for death or dignity.

CLIFFORD

The first I warrant thee, if dreams prove true.

WARWICK

You were best to go to bed and dream again,

To keep thee from the tempest of the field.

CLIFFORD

I am resolved to bear a greater storm

Than any thou canst conjure up today;

And that I'll write upon thy burgonet,°

Might I but know thee by thy housèd badge.°

WARWICK

Now, by my father's badge, old Nevil's crest,

The rampant bear chained to the ragged staff,

This day I'll wear aloft my burgonet,

As on a mountain top the cedar shows

And tread it under foot with all contempt,
Despite the bear'ard that protects the bear.

YOUNG CLIFFORD

And so to arms, victorious father,
To quell the rebels and their complices.

RICHARD

Fie! Charity, for shame! Speak not in spite,
For you shall sup with Jesu Christ tonight.

YOUNG CLIFFORD

RICHARD

If not in heaven, you'll surely sup in hell. Exeunt.

WARWICK

Clifford of Cumberland, 'tis Warwick calls:
And if thou dost not hide thee from the bear,
Now, when the angry trumpet sounds alarum,
And dead men's cries do fill the empty air,
Clifford, I say, come forth and fight with me!
Proud northern lord, Clifford of Cumberland,
Warwick is hoarse with calling thee to arms.

Enter YORK.

How now, my noble lord! What, all afoot?

YORK

The deadly handed Clifford slew my steed,
But match to match I have encountered him,
And made a prey for carrion kites and crows
Even of the bonny beast he loved so well.

Enter CLIFFORD.

WARWICK

Of one or both of us the time is come.

YORK

Hold, Warwick, seek thee out some other chase,^o
For I myself must hunt this deer to death.

WARWICK

Then, nobly, York; 'tis for a crown thou fight'st.
As I intend, Clifford, to thrive today,
It grieves my soul to leave thee unassailed.

Exit WARWICK.

CLIFFORD

What see'st thou in me, York? Why dost thou pause?

YORK

With thy brave bearing should I be in love,
But that thou art so fast mine enemy.

CLIFFORD

Nor should thy prowess want praise and esteem,
But that 'tis shown ignobly, and in treason.

YORK

So let it help me now against thy sword,
As I in justice and true right express it.

Thus war hath given thee peace, for thou art still.

Exit YORK.

Enter YOUNG CLIFFORD.

YOUNG CLIFFORD

Shame and confusion! All is on the rout;
Fear frames disorder, and disorder wounds
Where it should guard. O war, thou son of hell,
Whom angry heavens do make their minister,
Throw in the frozen bosoms of our part
Hot coals of vengeance! Let no soldier fly.
He that is truly dedicate to war
Hath no self-love; nor he that loves himself
Hath not essentially, but by circumstance,^o
The name of valor. [Sees his dead father.] O, let the vile world end,

And the premised^o flames of the last day

Knit earth and heaven together!

Now let the general trumpet blow his blast,

Particularities^o and petty sounds

To cease! Wast thou ordained, dear father,

To lose thy youth in peace, and to achieve

The silver livery of advised age,

And, in thy reverence and thy chair days, thus

To die in ruffian battle? Even at this sight

My heart is turned to stone: and while 'tis mine,

It shall be stony. York not our old men spares;

No more will I their babes: tears virginal
Shall be to me even as the dew to fire,

And beauty, that the tyrant oft reclaims,

Shall to my flaming wrath be oil and flax.

Henceforth I will not have to do with pity:

Meet I an infant of the house of York,

Into as many gobbets will I cut it

As wild Medea young Absyrtus did:^o

In cruelty will I seek out my fame.

Come, thou new ruin of old Clifford's house:

As did Aeneas old Anchises bear,

So bear I thee upon my manly shoulders;

But then Aeneas bare a living load,

Nothing so heavy as these woes of mine.

Exit YOUNG CLIFFORD with his father.

QUEEN

KING

QUEEN

What are you made of? You'll nor fight nor fly:
 Now is it manhood, wisdom, and defense, 75
 To give the enemy way, and to secure us
 By what we can, which can no more but fly.

If you be ta'en, we then should see the bottom
 Of all our fortunes: but if we haply 'scape—
 As well we may, if not through your neglect— 80
 We shall to London get, where you are loved
 And where this breach now in our fortunes made
 May readily be stopped.

Enter [YOUNG] CLIFFORD.

YOUNG CLIFFORD

But that my heart's on future mischief set,
 I would speak blasphemy ere bid you fly: 85
 But fly you must; uncurable discomfit°
 Reigns in the hearts of all our present parts.
 Away, for your relief, and we will live
 To see their day and them our fortune give.
 Away, my lord, away! Exeunt. 90

Three times today I holp° him to his horse,
 Three times bestrid° him; thrice I led him off, 10
 Persuaded him from any further act:
 But still, where danger was, still there I met him;
 And like rich hangings in a homely house,
 So was his will in his old feeble body.
 But, noble as he is, look where he comes.

Enter SALISBURY.

Now, by my sword, well hast thou fought today. 15

SALISBURY

By th' mass, so did we all. I thank you, Richard:
 God knows how long it is I have to live,
 And it hath pleased him that three times today
 You have defended me from imminent death. 20
 Well, lords, we have not got that which we have:°

 Being opposites of such repairing nature.°

YORK

I know our safety is to follow them;
 For, as I hear, the king is fled to London,
 To call a present court of parliament. 25
 Let us pursue him ere the writs go forth.
 What says Lord Warwick? Shall we after them?

WARWICK

After them! Nay, before them, if we can.
 Now, by my hand, lords, 'twas a glorious day:
 Saint Albans battle won by famous York 30
 Shall be eternized in all age to come.
 Sound drum and trumpets, and to London all:
 And more such days as these to us befall! Exeunt.

THE THIRD PART OF HENRY THE SIXTH

EDITED BY MILTON CRANE

Introduction

From 1642 until late in the nineteenth century no performances of the uncontaminated Shakespearean dramas [2 and 3 Henry VI] seem to have taken place; and then only in one revival in London of Part Two and one at Stratford of both parts. In the present century they met with similar neglect. In America the plays have suffered even more nearly total oblivion.¹

Thus wrote C. B. Young, as recently as 1952. But the whirligig of Time, as Malvolio among others discovered, brings in his revenges. In the past several years more persons have seen the three parts of Henry VI than had ever seen any one of the plays in all the centuries of their existence. The British Broadcasting Corporation has twice filmed and exhibited these plays (once in a cycle with Richard II, Richard III, 1–2 Henry IV, and Henry V, under the general title An Age of Kings; and once with Richard III alone). Both these cycles have been shown widely in Great Britain, Canada, and the United States. In addition, Henry VI, in parts or as a trilogy, has been performed at Stratford-upon-Avon, at Stratford, Ontario, and at Stratford, Connecticut, and was performed at the two latter festivals as recently as the summer of 1966.

How is one to explain so striking a revival of interest? Or, more strictly speaking, how is one to explain this unprecedented wave of enthusiasm for plays that historically have had many more detractors than admirers—for plays, indeed, that have only in recent years been generally accepted as Shakespeare's? The Henry VI cycle has been roundly criticized, over the centuries, as 'prentice work, a primitive and violent chronicle of blood, of interest only to scholars. Not that anything like a critical consensus can be said to exist—Richard III, which has often been deplored by the judicious for its bloody melodrama, has even more often run a close second in popularity to Hamlet. Nor should this be a cause for astonishment; Richard III, like 3 Henry VI, shares many of the most notorious (and popular) qualities of television drama.

For, though the framework of Henry VI is serious, moral, and didactic—a history, on the one hand, of France's efforts to free herself from English domination and, on the other, of the hideous social and political convulsions that we call the Wars of the Roses—these annals of an age of anarchy are full of thrilling and gruesome details calculated to delight the heart of a groundling: the rise and fall of the witch Joan of Arc; the rebellion and death of Jack Cade; the sorcery of the Duchess of Gloucester; the baiting and murder of the Duke of York, the young Earl of Rutland, the Prince of Wales, and the unfortunate King Henry himself. And, of course, the whole bloody feud of York and Lancaster is Shakespeare's inspired anticipation of the Western movie. One must not, therefore, be astonished that Shakespeare's Grand Guignol has retained its power to charm, particularly younger spectators.

Obviously the history plays are by no means alone in appealing to the audience's appetite for violence and excitement. 3 Henry VI is hardly more gratifying in this respect than Macbeth or King Lear, not to speak of the matchless Titus Andronicus, in many respects Shakespeare's most shocking creation. Shakespeare pays a high price, however, for the monstrous effects that he lovingly devises for the latter play: it is the danger that the audience's frisson may dissolve into helpless laughter, as when Titus enjoins the mutilated Lavinia, "Bear thou my hand, sweet wench, between thy teeth."

Titus Andronicus and 3 Henry VI are alike in another important respect: until recent years, they were little known to either the common reader or the common playgoer. Granted that neither is a great monument of Shakespeare's art, both are nevertheless consistently interesting and lively works by a gifted professional playwright; their structure is clear and straightforward, and they provide gratifying roles for leading actors and actresses. For the more sophisticated, 3 Henry VI reserves yet another reward—that of watching the early development of a major character, Richard III, from his beginnings as a strong, courageous, admittedly brutal, but not yet frankly villainous figure to the monster who will meet deserved destruction on Bosworth Field.

Civil war is, as it were, the expression in political terms of the anarchic, heedless, and all but suicidal rage that consumes, at one time or another, most of the leading characters of these plays. The scene in which Henry overhears the monologues of the son who has killed his father and of the father who has killed his son, ending in their formal but deeply moving lament, has been often and justly praised; in its terrible anonymity, this masque of death seems to come straight out of a morality play. The fact that these miserable men have unwittingly murdered and robbed their own kin is but another manifestation of the infernal forces that the Yorkists and Lancastrians have ignorantly loosed upon an appalled and helpless populace.²

Willard Farnham has brilliantly summarized the cumulative impact of the three parts of Henry VI:

Throughout the trilogy we follow the ill-fated kingship of Henry, but the most constant theme is England torn by civil war. Coming and going upon the scene are men and women who hope to profit by the bitter animosities of the struggle, who have their little day of rising ambition and success, and who quickly fall. The civil war is a forced draft fanning all those fires of worldly aspiration which the ascetic tragedy of the Middle Ages sought to quench. It favors all the criminal propensities in ambitious humanity. England as pictured under its influence is very much like the world pictured by medieval Contempt, a trackless forest filled with wild beasts and robbers, where the struggle for place is merely madness with horrible

² This celebrated scene merits our attention for other reasons as well. It seems clear that it bears a significant relation to Sackville and Norton's Gorboduc (1561), one of the most explicit warnings directed to Elizabeth and designed to persuade her to take steps to avoid the danger of civil war. Miss Joan Rees has with justice pointed out (in "A Passage in Henry VI, Part 3," Notes and Queries, 199 [May, 1954], 195-96) that the traditional attribution to Hall's Chronicle of the major influence on Shakespeare in the composition of this scene ("This conflict was in maner vnnaturall, for in it the sonne fought against the father, the brother against the brother, the nephew against the vncl, and the tenaūt against his lord . . ." [Hall, p. 256]) probably requires drastic modification. In the concluding and summarizing speech of Eubulus in Gorboduc, the following passage appears:

All right and lawe shall cease . . .
The wiues shall suffer rape, the maides defloured,
And children fatherlesse shall weepe and waile.
With fire and sworde thy natiue folke shall perishe.
One kinsman shall bereaue an-others life;
The father shall vnwitting slay the sonne;
The sonne shall slay the sire and know it not.

(V.ii.204, 209-14)

Miss Rees goes on to say:

Amongst the touches which give to the last two acts of Gorboduc a greater vitality than is to be found in the first three, is a passage in Eubulus' speech in Act V scene 2 l. 180 to the end . . . in which he describes, with an almost lyrical intensity, the horrors of civil war. This passage . . . stands out even today and it is obvious that, because of its passionate realisation of its subject, it would be even more potent to an audience for whom the danger of civil war loomed large. . . . It may be that Hall's chronicle is at the back of this speech but the treatment of the theme in Gorboduc because it is so vividly realised is perhaps more likely to have stirred an imaginative response in Shakespeare than the cooler record of the chronicle. More elements of Shakespeare's scene are present in the Gorboduc lines than in the Hall passage: the double episode of father killing son and son father; the idea that they acted in ignorance (Shakespeare's line 69, the son's words, "Pardon me, God, I knew not what I did!") echo "The sonne shall slay the sire and accompaniments. Sometimes the good man falls (Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester); sometimes the evil (Suffolk, destroyer of Gloucester). Henry himself is in it all, yet not of it all. He is a spiritual opposite to those around him who have lusts for power and domination; he loves peace and he has manly pity for suffering. He is hardly drawn as a weak man, and he is certainly not drawn as basely or miserably weak. He is simply a king who cannot use the strong hand of domination because brutality repels him. The ironical result is that cruel things happen in his realm which might never have happened if he had been willing to use cruelty on his own account in taking the reins of government—Duke Humphrey's murder, for example.³

Although, to be sure, mankind throughout its history has denounced all war as a plague, civil war has by common consent been the form most deeply dreaded—as 3 Henry VI makes clear—for setting fathers, brothers, and sons against one another. Moreover, not only does all semblance of reason vanish when every man sets his face against every other man, but the fear persists (and experience seems to bear it out) that whatever peace may be concluded will be at best illusory and of short duration.

A kind of war that violates all normal expectations may well lead, not illogically, to the destruction of the very fabric of society. Even among warlords—perhaps one should say, especially among warlords—the one virtue that is most greatly honored is loyalty. It is the supreme political virtue. But in the world of Henry VI loyalty is the exception, not the rule. 3 Henry VI begins with Henry's pusillanimous acceptance of the Duke of York as his heir apparent (provided that Henry is permitted to occupy the throne in peace as long as he lives) in place of his legitimate son and heir, the Prince of Wales. Here the theme of betrayal is sounded, and most disgracefully, with a father's cowardly disinheritance of his blameless son. Shakespeare is skillfully preparing us for the ever-increasing violence of Margaret's mood and her determination to wreak a terrible revenge on the Yorkists.

know it not"); the emphasis on the personal tragedy in the lives affected which the Gorboduc speech goes on to stress further and which Hall subordinates to consideration of "the puyssance of thys realme". In addition, the whole context of the passage in Gorboduc, with its bitter recognition that:

These are the plagies, when murder is the meane
To make new heires unto the royall crowne is close to the theme of the Henry VI trilogy and might therefore be of especial interest to Shakespeare.

It might also be noted that the situation described in Eubulus' lines and in Shakespeare's scene has no parallel in Gorboduc as a whole. The moralizing and generalizing message of this raisonneur's speech, directed at Elizabeth, is a warning against civil war, not a definition of the dangerous consequences of failing to name an heir in time.

Finally, despite the admitted importance of Hall's influence on Shakespeare's history plays, is it not highly probable that Shakespeare, in his early days as a tragic dramatist and a writer of history plays, should have looked back three decades to the honorable ancestor of all English tragedies and history plays? From this time forth, Gorboduc will be restricted to academic interest, at best; but for a moment it provided the young Shakespeare with a valuable suggestion.

³ The Medieval Heritage of Elizabethan Tragedy (1936), pp. 385-86.

Betrayal is soon heaped on betrayal. In I.ii, a few short speeches by Richard suffice to persuade his father, the Duke of York, to break his oath to Henry and to prepare a conspiracy to unseat him. But before the duke can begin to organize his plot, he learns that Margaret with twenty thousand men intends to besiege him in his castle; and so he is relieved of any moral dilemma that may have troubled him. In due course, the captured duke is murdered by Margaret and Young Clifford, after they have tormented him with a paper crown and a handkerchief dipped in his son Rutland's blood. "Vae victis!" is the only principle of war that these ferocious antagonists recognize. York's death, strictly speaking, proceeds immediately from unspeakable brutality, though ultimately from treachery; but the distinction can interest only a logician. The savagery with which each party uses the other is such as to call in question the pretensions to chivalric ideals of all these gently born butchers.

The baiting and slaughter of York is paralleled in II.vi by that of Clifford, who falls into the hands of the Yorkists moments before he dies of the wounds he has received at Towton. But his enemies, not yet aware that he is dead, play out a grisly comedy in which they threaten the dead man with torture, mockingly call on him to repent, and at last cut off his head to fix on York gates in place of their father's.

Meanwhile the problem of loyalty is elaborated in III.i. Henry is recognized and taken prisoner by two keepers, who pride themselves on their loyalty to Edward:

You are the king King Edward hath deposed;
And we his subjects sworn in all allegiance
Will apprehend you as his enemy. (III.i.69-71)

Henry attempts, unsuccessfully, to argue himself free:

I was anointed king at nine months old;
My father and my grandfather were kings,
And you were sworn true subjects unto me:
And tell me, then, have you not broke your oaths?
(III.i.76-79)

The First Keeper knows an argument worth two of Henry's:

No;
For we were subjects but while you were king.
(III.i.80-81)

The futility and absurdity of this disputation are expressed in Henry's rueful conclusion: "Such is the lightness of you common men" (III.i.89), though the unspoken point is clear enough: the keepers attempt to find ways to rationalize their yielding to the rule of might, whereas their betters (with rare exceptions) feel no compunctions whatever.

Richard's great set piece (III.ii.124-95) announces his grand design to win the crown for himself once he has seen "the lustful Edward's titles buried" and has disposed of

Clarence, Henry, and his son young Edward,
And all the unlooked-for issue of their bodies.

He concludes with a self-revelation for which nothing thus far in the trilogy has prepared us:

Why, I can smile, and murder whiles I smile,
And cry, "Content" to that which grieves my heart,
And wet my cheeks with artificial tears,
And frame my face to all occasions.
I'll drown more sailors than the mermaid shall;
I'll slay more gazers than the basilisk;
I'll play the orator as well as Nestor,
Deceive more slyly than Ulysses could,
And, like a Sinon, take another Troy.
I can add colors to the chameleon,
Change shapes with Proteus for advantages,
And set the murderous Machiavel to school.
Can I do this, and cannot get a crown?
Tut, were it farther off, I'll pluck it down. (III.ii.182-95)

Richard is the incomparable symbol of treachery and deceit in all forms: cant, hypocrisy, corruption, secret murder, usurpation. His last act in 3 Henry VI, after murdering Henry in the Tower, is to give his brother Edward's infant son what he himself calls a Judas kiss.

In this world of traitors Richard is supreme but by no means unique. In III.iii Warwick arrives at the French court to negotiate the marriage of Edward with Bona, King Lewis' sister. But Warwick has been betrayed by the womanizer Edward, whose passions have triumphed over his sense of realpolitik and have led him to marry Lady Elizabeth Grey; furious at his loss of face, Warwick promptly changes sides, and Lewis avenges the slight to his sister by according Margaret the aid she has so far sought in vain.

As the play approaches its climax, the Lancastrian forces move up under their leaders: Oxford, Montague, Somerset, and Clarence. "Wind-changing Warwick" confidently awaits Clarence's formal greeting, but now the most dramatic moment of treachery arrives: Warwick's son-in-law, subverted by Richard, contemptuously takes the red rose from his hat and throws it at Warwick, proclaiming his return to the Yorkist party. But worse lies ahead. Edward, in his triumph, proclaims an amnesty for Prince Edward, and there seems to be no reason to doubt the sincerity of this chivalrous offer. The young prince, however, tactlessly speaks his mind to his enemies, and, before the eyes of Margaret, is stabbed to death by Edward, Richard, and Clarence, precisely as young Rutland was stabbed by Clifford, and York by Clifford and Margaret. Each step in this blood feud proceeds inexorably from the preceding one. The anguished Margaret, witnessing her son's death, entreats Richard: "O, kill me too!" and Richard seems of a mind to grant her request. But Edward, belatedly aware of what he has done, stays him: "Hold, Richard, hold; for we have done too much" (V.v.43).

Meanwhile Richard, who has left the scene of carnage with a berserker's cry: "The Tower! The Tower!", is ensuring that Henry, who has of course long since ceased to play any but a choric role in the descending action of the tragedy, will not live to see his prophecies fulfilled. Richard, in the full exercise of his powers as king-maker and king-destroyer, affords us a foretaste of his masterworks of villainy in Richard III. What the audience does not yet know is that the demidevil Richard—whose great speeches of self-revelation in 3 Henry VI are stylistically and dramatically of a piece with the fantastic unmasking speech of Aaron the Moor in Titus Andronicus—will presently reveal himself to be one of Shakespeare's most remarkable and most accomplished humorists. Indeed, one can hardly account for the popularity of Richard III, and particularly for the allure of Richard himself, except by invoking the hero-villain's devastating charm, which is compounded of enchanting audacity and a disarming and cynical refusal to take himself altogether seriously. In this, as in all else, he is a master dissembler and actor, and as such fittingly inherits not only the crown but the play itself.

Perhaps inevitably, one is inclined to think of the three parts of Henry VI as forming a whole, unified by themes, characters, and structural devices. The degree of unity in these plays is, however, dangerously easy to exaggerate. The characters whose lives and fortunes link the three parts—King Henry, Margaret, and Richard, Duke of Gloucester—play significant roles in each of the parts, but their personalities change and develop. Thus Henry begins as an immature, saintly, love-besotted figure; becomes more saintly and more ineffectual; and dies a victim of the fiendlike Richard after making some abortive efforts to regain command of the Lancastrian forces. He is a consistent character, whose life and death set a standard of Christian charity and idealism that permits us to judge the savagery and brutality of the world into which he has been unfortunate enough to be born. On the other hand, the fact that the reign of Henry was an unmitigated disaster was perfectly clear to every Tudor historian and moralist, and men who lived in the last decade—or, indeed, any decade—of Elizabeth's reign had no difficulty in applying the meaning of this disaster to their own situation. (The queen herself was by no means the last to draw such historical parallels. "Know ye not that I am Richard the Second?" she demanded, after Essex' followers had caused Shakespeare's Richard II to be revived on the eve of their leader's ill-fated rebellion.)

Henry's pitiful efforts to exculpate himself in 3 Henry VI (I.i) when his enemies the Yorkists taunt him for having lost the lands won by his heroic father, the great Henry V, recall that terrible piece of folk wisdom from Ecclesiastes: "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child!" Admittedly it was not the infant Henry but his protector, the "good Duke" Humphrey of Gloucester, who bore the responsibility for the loss of France. But the judgment of history, however unfairly, inevitably seeks the nearest scapegoat; and the judgment is found against Henry, in whose name the follies were committed. (Henry passes in silence, of course, over his wedding gift of Anjou and Maine to his father-in-law Reignier [René], King of Naples. These provinces, much more than the lands lost by war, were fresh affronts in the minds of the Yorkists and the chief subject of their reproaches to Henry.)

Henry's queen, Margaret, likewise undergoes transformation in the course of the trilogy. She appears first in 1 Henry VI, in one of the concluding scenes of the play, as the prisoner of Suffolk, whom she has already bewitched. She is a little too practical and matter-of-fact to be entirely believable as the demure and lovely maid that she seems to her infatuated captor; she already suggests something of the judgment that Hall was to pass on her:

This woman excelled all others as well in beautie and fauor, as in wit and pollicie, and was of stomack and corage, more like to a man, then a woman.⁴

And she finds little difficulty in accommodating herself to her situation as the captive of the apologetic Suffolk: "Tush, women have been captivate ere now" (V.iii.107). In fact, the entire interview between Margaret and Suffolk often seems to hesitate on the edge of comedy.

The Margaret of 2 Henry VI, on the other hand, is a virago and a meddler in matters of state, who shamelessly takes Suffolk as her lover and contrives the downfall of the Duchess of Gloucester and the murder of the duke. In 3 Henry VI she becomes the infernal Ate in good apparel, a murderess who with her own hand plunges the sword into the captive York. The order of nature being so violently disturbed, it follows that Margaret's punishment must be equally terrible. This is the measure of what has happened to England in the course of Shakespeare's trilogy: the weakness, uncertainty, and confusion of 1 Henry VI give way to the deep social disorders signaled by the peasant rebellion of 2 Henry VI and ultimately to the total anarchy of 3 Henry VI. Now the time is near for the inferno over which Richard III will reign until he is overthrown by Richmond, who will rule as Henry VII. Hall thus sums up the restoration of order by the first Tudor:

Although by this eleccion of wyse and graue councellers all thinges semed to be brought to a good & perfight conclusion, yet there lacked a wrest to the harpe to set all the strynges in a monacorde and tune which was the matrimony to be fineshed betwene the kyng and the lady Elizabeth daughter to kyng Edward, which lyke a good prynce accordyng to his othe and promes, he did both solempnise and cōsummate in brief tyme after, that is to saye on the xvij daye of Ianuary. By reason of whiche mariage peace was thought to discende oute of heauē into England, consideryng that the lynes of Lancastre & Yorke, being both noble families equivalēt in ryches, fame and honour, were now brought into one knot and connexed together, of whose two bodyes one heyre might succede, which after their tyme should peaceably rule and enioye the whole monarchy and realme of England.⁵

Such, then, was the fragile peace and unity that emerged from the "long jars" (Ben Jonson's words) of York and Lancaster. Small wonder that Shakespeare, like many another Elizabethan, was far more deeply impressed and dismayed, in retrospect, by the holocaust of the Wars of the Roses than by its resolution. Small wonder, too, that Elizabeth thought nothing more important than the avoidance, by policy, trimming, or coercion, of such civil wars as Shakespeare has memorably re-created in this trilogy of Henry VI.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCES

Shakespeare drew on two principal sources for Henry VI, Part Three, as he had done earlier for Henry VI, Parts One and Two. These were two of the major historical works of sixteenth-century England: Edward Hall's chronicle The Union of the Two Noble and Illustre Families of Lancaster & Yorke . . . (1548); modern edition, H. Ellis (1809); and the second edition (1587) of Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotlande, and Irelande; modern edition, H. Ellis (six volumes, 1807-08), and several abridged editions, notably W. G. Boswell-Stone, Shakespeare's Holinshed (1896) and Allardyce and Josephine Nicoll, eds., Holinshed's Chronicle as Used in Shakespeare's Plays (1927). Shakespeare's indebtedness to Holinshed has of course long been recognized, but modern scholarship has tended to emphasize ever more strongly the importance of Hall's work, both as a direct influence on Shakespeare and as an indirect influence through Holinshed.

All the chroniclers are, to say the least, exceedingly casual about borrowing from one another's work; and when they copy hastily or carelessly, as they not infrequently do, the modern reader's best hope of recovering his author's original meaning is to compare the text with that of an earlier chronicle. Students of Shakespeare are likely to find most interesting and helpful, among the earlier chronicles, The Brut or the Chronicles of England, ed. Friedrich W. D. Brie, Part I, Early English Text Society, Original Series 131 (1906; reprinted 1960), and Part II, Original Series 136 (1908); Polydore Vergil's English History (Henry VI, Edward IV, and Richard III), ed. Sir Henry Ellis, The Camden Society, Volume 21 (1844); and Ranulph Higden's Polychronicon, translated by John Trevisa (the chronicle completed to 1461 by William Caxton, who published the Polychronicon in 1482); modern edition, Churchill Babington and Reverend J. R. Lumby (nine volumes; 1865-86).

"Hall's chief importance," E. M. W. Tillyard has well observed, "is that he is the first English chronicle writer to show in all its completeness that new moralising of history which came in with the waning of the Middle Ages, the weakening of the Church, and the rise of nationalism. And the special literary importance of this feat is to have introduced a sense of drama into his manner of expression . . . the sense of the moral concatenation of great events: moral as against psychological drama."⁶ The subject of Hall's chronicle was the union of the houses of Lancaster and York, a union which was achieved only after England had suffered the convulsions of civil war, the memory and fear of which haunt Shakespeare's plays as they haunted Elizabethan Englishmen. Disunion came in with Henry Bolingbroke; union was restored by Henry VII and Henry VIII (Hall calls the latter "the vndubitate flower and very heire of both the sayd linages"). The history of the intervening years, as Tillyard and others have noted, may be read in the titles of Hall's chapters:

- i. The vnquiet tyme of kyng Hēry the Fowerth.
- ii. The victorious actes of kyng Henry the v.
- iii. The troubleous season of kyng Henry the vi.
- iiii. The prosperous reigne of kyng Edward the iiij.

- v. The pitifull life of kyng Edward the v.
- vi. The tragicall doynges of kyng Richard the iij.
- vii. The politike gouernaunce of kyng Henry the vij.
- viii. The triumphant reigne of king Henry the viij.⁷

Throughout his history plays Shakespeare repeatedly expounded these few essential ideas: that evil must be punished and expiated, that goodness will be rewarded, that piety cannot prevail unless conjoined with strength (thus the ineffectual saintliness of Henry VI is sharply contrasted with the more muscular Christianity of Henry V). Both Hall and Holinshed provided Shakespeare with clear and vivid portraits of his principal characters; and Shakespeare, as usual, missed no significant hint, no illuminating detail, in the chronicles. At the same time, he adroitly combined and abridged his materials so as to heighten dramatic effect. Thus, both Hall and Holinshed describe how Clifford caused a paper crown to be set on the severed head of Richard, Duke of York. Shakespeare, in contrast, makes the scene in which Queen Margaret, Clifford, and the other Lancastrians actually torment and kill York (I.iv) one of the most powerful episodes of this harrowing play.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

Henry VI, Part Three has come down to us in two major texts: the so-called "bad quarto" (actually a "bad octavo"), called Q—The true Tragedie of Richard/Duke of Yorke, and the death of/good King Henrie the Sixt,/with the whole contention betweene/the two Houses Lancaster/and Yorke, as it was sundrie times/acted by the Right Honourable the Earle of Pem-/brooke his seruants—and the First Folio of 1623 (called F). Q, which is about two thirds the length of F and imperfect in numerous respects, was published in 1595 by P[eter] S[horth] for Thomas Millington. The copy was not entered in the Stationers' Register. Q was long considered (principally on the authority of the noted eighteenth-century editor Edmond Malone) to be the source of Shakespeare's play; but in the past four decades there has come into fairly general acceptance the view that Q represents a reported version (perhaps by the actors who played Warwick and Clifford) of the text of an early production of the play that was later printed as F. Such, at any rate, is the opinion of the most important modern editors of the play (A. S. Cairncross, John Dover Wilson, George Lyman Kittredge, and Peter Alexander, among others). The technical studies that were largely responsible for tipping the balance in favor of this view include J. S. Smart, Shakespeare: Truth and Tradition (1928); Madeleine Doran, Henry VI, Parts II and III (1928); and Peter Alexander, Shakespeare's Henry VI and Richard III (1929). A. S. Cairncross' introductions to his Arden editions of Henry VI, Part Two and Henry VI, Part Three summarize much useful information bearing on the relation between Henry VI, Part Two and The First Part of the Contention betwixt the two famous Houses of Yorke and Lancaster . . . and between Henry VI, Part Three and The true Tragedie of Richard Duke of Yorke.

no act or scene divisions appear in F, and none at all appear in Q. The act and scene divisions in the present edition are those of the Globe edition. All divisions and stage directions that have been added are enclosed in square brackets.

A number of the stage directions in Q, like stage directions in other Shakespeare quartos, reflect stage business in actual performance, for example:

Enter Richard Duke of Yorke, The Earle of Warwicke, The Duke of Norffolke, Marquis Montague, Edward Earle of March, Crookeback Richard, and the yong Earle of Rutland, with Drumme and Souldiers, with white Roses in their hats.⁸

Sound a Parlie, and Richard and Clarence whispers together, and then Clarence takes his red Rose out of his hat, and throws it at Warwike.⁹

Alarimes to the battell, Yorke flies, then the chambers be discharged. Then enter the king, Cla. & Glo. & the rest, & make a great shout, and crie, for Yorke, for Yorke, and then the Queene is taken, & the prince, & Oxf. & Sum. and then found and enter all againe.¹⁰

In the second direction quoted above, some effort has obviously been made to motivate Clarence's betrayal of Warwick—for which F does nothing to prepare us—and the stage business here echoes the accounts in the chronicles. Another stage direction of interest is at III.i, which reads: "Enter Sinklo, and Humfrey, with Crosse-bowes in their hands." (The quarto reads: "Enter two keepers with bow and arrowes.") The names Sinklo and Humfrey appear to be those of actors in Shakespeare's company—John Sincler, and Humphrey Jeffes—incorporated into the text by error. Possibly Shakespeare wrote the names as he composed, possibly a prompter added them to the company's copy. "Gabriel" in the stage direction at I.ii.47 is probably a similar error, naming the actor Gabriel Spencer.

Speech prefixes have been silently regularized, and the position of a few stage directions slightly altered. The following list includes emendations and corrections of F. In each case, the altered reading appears first, in boldface; the original reading follows, in roman. When the alteration is derived from Q, that fact is indicated.

A C T I

Scene I. [London. The parliament house.]

Alarum.° Enter Plantagenet [the Duke of YORK],
EDWARD, RICHARD, NORFOLK, MONTAGUE,
WARWICK, and SOLDIERS.

WARWICK

I wonder how the king escaped our hands?

YORK

While we pursued the horsemen of the north,
He slily stole away, and left his men;
Whereat the great Lord of Northumberland
Whose warlike ears could never brook° retreat,
Cheered up the drooping army; and himself,
Lord Clifford, and Lord Stafford all abreast
Charged our main battle's° front, and, breaking in,
Were by the swords of common soldiers slain.

EDWARD

Lord Stafford's father, Duke of Buckingham,
Is either slain or wounded dangerous.°
I cleft his beaver° with a downright blow;
That this is true, father, behold his blood.

[Shows his bloody sword.]

MONTAGUE

And, brother, here's the Earl of Wiltshire's blood,
Whom I encountered as the battles joined.

RICHARD

Speak thou for me, and tell them what I did:
[Throws down the Duke of Somerset's head.]

YORK

Richard hath best deserved of all my sons.
But is your grace dead, my Lord of Somerset?

NORFOLK

Such hope have all the line of John of Gaunt!°

RICHARD

Thus do I hope to shake King Henry's head.

WARWICK

And so do I, victorious Prince of York.
Before I see thee seated in that throne
Which now the house of Lancaster usurps,
I vow by heaven these eyes shall never close.
This is the palace of the fearful° king,
And this the regal seat. Possess it, York;
For this is thine and not King Henry's heirs'.

YORK

Assist me, then, sweet Warwick, and I will;
For hither we have broken in by force.

NORFOLK

We'll all assist you. He that flies shall die.

YORK

Thanks, gentle Norfolk; stay by me, my lords;
And, soldiers, stay and lodge by me this night.
They go up.°

WARWICK

And when the king comes, offer him no violence,
Unless he seek to thrust you out perforce.

YORK

The queen this day here holds her parliament,
But little thinks we shall be of her council.
By words or blows here let us win our right.

RICHARD

Armed as we are, let's stay within this house.

WARWICK

The bloody parliament shall this be called,
Unless Plantagenet, Duke of York, be king,
And bashful Henry deposed, whose cowardice
Hath made us bywords to our enemies.

YORK

Then leave me not, my lords. Be resolute;
I mean to take possession of my right.

WARWICK

Neither the king, nor he that loves him best,
The proudest he that holds up° Lancaster,
Dares stir a wing, if Warwick shake his bells.°
I'll plant Plantagenet, root him up who dares.
Resolve thee, Richard; claim the English crown.

[YORK seats himself in the throne.]

Flourish.° Enter KING HENRY, CLIFFORD, NORTHUMBERLAND, WESTMORELAND, EXETER, and the rest.

KING HENRY

My lords, look where the sturdy rebel sits,
Even in the chair of state. Belike° he means,
Backed by the power of Warwick, that false peer,
To aspire unto the crown and reign as king.
Earl of Northumberland, he slew thy father,
And thine, Lord Clifford; and you both have vowed revenge
On him, his sons, his favorites, and his friends.

NORTHUMBERLAND

If I be not, heavens be revenged on me!

CLIFFORD

The hope thereof makes Clifford mourn in steel.°

WESTMORELAND

What, shall we suffer° this? let's pluck him down.
My heart for anger burns; I cannot brook° it.

KING HENRY

Be patient, gentle° Earl of Westmoreland.

CLIFFORD

Patience is for poltroons,° such as he.
He durst not sit there, had your father lived.
My gracious lord, here in the parliament
Let us assail the family of York.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Well hast thou spoken, cousin.° Be it so.

KING HENRY

Ah, know you not the city favors them,
And they have troops of soldiers at their beck?

EXETER

But when the duke is slain, they'll quickly fly.

To make a shambles^o of the parliament house!
 Cousin of Exeter, frowns, words, and threats
 Shall be the war that Henry means to use.
 Thou factious^o Duke of York, descend my throne,
 And kneel for grace and mercy at my feet.
 I am thy sovereign.

YORK I am thine.

EXETER
 For shame, come down; he made thee Duke of York.

YORK
 It was my inheritance, as the earldom was.

EXETER
 Thy father was a traitor to the crown.

WARWICK
 Exeter, thou art a traitor to the crown
 In following this usurping Henry.

CLIFFORD
 Whom should he follow but his natural king?

WARWICK
 True, Clifford; that's Richard Duke of York.

KING HENRY
 And shall I stand, and thou sit in my throne?

YORK
 It must and shall be so: content thyself.

WARWICK
 Be Duke of Lancaster; let him be king.

WESTMORELAND
 He is both king and Duke of Lancaster;
 And that the Lord of Westmoreland shall maintain.

WARWICK
 And Warwick shall disprove it. You forget
 That we are those which chased you from the field
 And slew your fathers, and with colors^o spread
 Marched through the city to the palace gates.

NORTHUMBERLAND
 Yes, Warwick, I remember it to my grief,
 And, by his soul, thou and thy house shall rue it.

WESTMORELAND
 Plantagenet, of thee and these thy sons,
 Thy kinsmen and thy friends, I'll have more lives
 Than drops of blood were in my father's veins.

CLIFFORD
 Urge it no more, lest that, instead of words,
 I send thee, Warwick, such a messenger
 As shall revenge his^o death before I stir.

WARWICK
 Poor Clifford; how I scorn his worthless threats!

YORK
 Will you we show our title^o to the crown?
 If not, our swords shall plead^o it in the field.

KING HENRY
 What title hast thou, traitor, to the crown?
 Thy father was, as thou art, Duke of York;
 Thy grandfather, Roger Mortimer, Earl of March.
 I am the son of Henry the Fifth,
 Who made the Dolphin^o and the French to stoop^o
 And seized upon their towns and provinces.

WARWICK

 When I was crowned I was but nine months old.

RICHARD
 You are old enough now, and yet^o methinks you lose.
 Father, tear the crown from the usurper's head.

EDWARD
 Sweet father, do so; set it on your head. 115

MONTAGUE
 Good brother, as thou lov'st and honorest arms,
 Let's fight it out and not stand^o caviling thus.

RICHARD
 Sound drums and trumpets, and the king will fly.

YORK
 Sons, peace! 80

KING HENRY
 Peace, thou! and give King Henry leave to speak. 120

WARWICK
 Plantagenet shall speak first. Hear him, lords;
 And be you silent and attentive too,
 For he that interrupts him shall not live.

KING HENRY
 Think'st thou that I will leave my kingly throne,
 Wherein my grandsire and my father sat? 125
 No: first shall war unpeople this my realm;
 Ay, and their colors, often borne in France,
 And now in England to our heart's great sorrow,
 Shall be my winding-sheet. Why faint^o you, lords?
 My title's good, and better far than his. 130

WARWICK
 Prove it, Henry, and thou shalt be king.

KING HENRY
 Henry the Fourth by conquest got the crown.

YORK
 'Twas by rebellion against his king.

KING HENRY [Aside.]
 I know not what to say; my title's weak—
 Tell me, may not a king adopt an heir? 135

95 YORK
 What then?

KING HENRY
 And if^o he may, then am I lawful king;
 For Richard, in the view of many lords,
 Resigned the crown to Henry the Fourth,
 Whose heir my father was, and I am his. 140

YORK
 He rose against him, being his sovereign,
 And made him to resign his crown perforce.

WARWICK
 Suppose, my lords, he did it unconstrained,
 Think you 'twere prejudicial to his crown?

EXETER
 No; for he could not so resign his crown 145
 But that the next heir should succeed and reign.

KING HENRY
 Art thou against us, Duke of Exeter?

EXETER
 His is the right, and therefore pardon me.

110 YORK
 Why whisper you, my lords, and answer not?

EXETER

My conscience tells me he is lawful king.

KING HENRY [Aside.]

All will revolt from me, and turn to him.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Plantagenet, for all the claim thou lay'st,
Think not that Henry shall be so deposed.

WARWICK

Deposed he shall be, in despite of all.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Thou art deceived. 'Tis not thy southern power,^o
Of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, nor of Kent,
Which makes thee thus presumptuous and proud,
Can set the duke up in despite of me.

CLIFFORD

King Henry, be thy title right or wrong,
Lord Clifford vows to fight in thy defense:
May that ground gape and swallow me alive,
Where I shall kneel to him that slew my father!

KING HENRY

O Clifford, how thy words revive my heart!

YORK

Henry of Lancaster, resign thy crown.
What mutter you, or what conspire you, lords?

WARWICK

Do right unto this princely Duke of York,
Or I will fill the house with armed men,
And over the chair of state, where now he sits,
Write up his title with usurping blood.

He stamps with his foot, and the SOLDIERS show themselves.

KING HENRY

My Lord of Warwick, hear but one word:
Let me for this my lifetime reign as king.

YORK

Confirm the crown to me and to mine heirs,
And thou shalt reign in quiet while thou liv'st.

KING HENRY

I am content. Richard Plantagenet,
Enjoy the kingdom after my decease.

CLIFFORD

What wrong is this unto the prince your son?

WARWICK

What good is this to England and himself!

WESTMORELAND

Base, fearful, and despairing Henry!

CLIFFORD

How hast thou injured both thyself and us!

WESTMORELAND

I cannot stay to hear these articles.^o

NORTHUMBERLAND

Nor I.

CLIFFORD

Come, cousin, let us tell the queen these news.

WESTMORELAND

In whose cold blood no spark of honor bides.

WESTMORELAND.]

WARWICK

Turn this way, Henry, and regard them not.

EXETER

They seek revenge, and therefore will not yield.

190

KING HENRY

155 Ah, Exeter!

WARWICK Why should you sigh, my lord?

KING HENRY

Not for myself, Lord Warwick, but my son,
Whom I unnaturally shall disinherit.
But be it as it may. [To YORK.] I here entail^o
160 The crown to thee and to thine heirs for ever;
Conditionally, that here thou take an oath
To cease this civil war; and, whilst I live,
To honor me as thy king and sovereign;
And neither by treason nor hostility
To seek to put me down and reign thyself.

195

200

YORK

165 This oath I willingly take and will perform.

[Comes from the throne.]

WARWICK

Long live King Henry! Plantagenet, embrace him.

KING HENRY

And long live thou and these thy forward^o sons!

YORK

Now York and Lancaster are reconciled.

EXETER

170 Accursed be he that seeks to make them foes!

205

Sennet.^o Here they come down.

YORK

Farewell, my gracious lord; I'll to my castle.

WARWICK

And I'll keep London with my soldiers.

175 NORFOLK

And I to Norfolk with my followers.

MONTAGUE

And I unto the sea from whence I came.

[Exeunt YORK and his SONS, WARWICK, NORFOLK, and MONTAGUE, with their SOLDIERS, and ATTENDANTS.]

KING HENRY

And I with grief and sorrow to the court.

210

Enter the QUEEN [MARGARET and Edward PRINCE of Wales].

180

EXETER

Here comes the queen, whose looks bewray^o her anger.

I'll steal away.

KING HENRY Exeter, so will I.

QUEEN MARGARET

Nay, go not from me. I will follow thee.

KING HENRY

185 Be patient, gentle queen, and I will stay.

QUEEN MARGARET

Who can be patient in such extremes?
 Ah, wretched man! Would I had died a maid,
 And never seen thee, never borne thee son,
 Seeing thou hast proved so unnatural a father!
 Hath he deserved to lose his birthright thus?
 Hadst thou but loved him half so well as I,
 Or felt that pain which I did for him once,
 Or nourished him as I did with my blood,
 Thou wouldst have left thy dearest heart-blood there,
 Rather than have made that savage duke thine heir
 And disinherited thine only son.

PRINCE

Father, you cannot disinherit me.
 If you be king, why should not I succeed?

KING HENRY

Pardon me, Margaret. Pardon me, sweet son.
 The Earl of Warwick and the duke enforced me.

QUEEN MARGARET

Enforced thee? Art thou king, and wilt be forced?
 I shame to hear thee speak. Ah, timorous wretch!
 Thou hast undone thyself, thy son, and me;
 And giv'n unto the house of York such head^o
 As thou shalt reign but by their sufferance.^o
 To entail him and his heirs unto the crown,
 What is it, but to make thy sepulcher,
 And creep into it far before thy time?
 Warwick is chancellor and the Lord of Calais;
 Stern Falconbridge commands the Narrow Seas;^o
 The duke is made protector of the realm;
 And yet shalt thou be safe? Such safety finds
 The trembling lamb environèd with wolves.
 Had I been there, which am a silly^o woman,
 The soldiers should have tossed me on their pikes
 Before I would have granted^o to that act.
 But thou prefer'st thy life before thine honor:
 And seeing thou dost, I here divorce myself
 Both from thy table, Henry, and thy bed,
 Until that act of parliament be repealed
 Whereby my son is disinherited.
 The northern lords, that have forsworn thy colors,
 Will follow mine, if once they see them spread;
 And spread they shall be, to thy foul disgrace
 And utter ruin of the house of York.
 Thus do I leave thee. Come, son, let's away.
 Our army is ready; come, we'll after them.

KING HENRY

Stay, gentle Margaret, and hear me speak.

QUEEN MARGARET

Thou hast spoke too much already; get thee gone.

KING HENRY

Gentle son Edward, thou wilt stay with me?

QUEEN MARGARET

Ay, to be murdered by his enemies.

PRINCE

When I return with victory from the field,
 I'll see your grace: till then I'll follow her.

QUEEN MARGARET

Come, son, away; we may not linger thus.

215 Poor queen! how love to me and to her son
 Hath made her break out into terms of rage! 265

 Whose haughty spirit, wingèd with desire,
 Will cost^o my crown, and like an empty eagle
 220 Tire^o on the flesh of me and of my son!
 The loss of those three lords torments my heart. 270
 I'll write unto them and entreat them fair.^o
 Come, cousin, you shall be the messenger.

EXETER

225 And I, I hope, shall reconcile them all. Exeunt.

[Scene II. Sandal Castle, near Wakefield, in Yorkshire.]

Flourish. Enter RICHARD, EDWARD, and MONTAGUE.

RICHARD

Brother, though I be youngest, give me leave.

230 EDWARD

No, I can better play the orator.

MONTAGUE

But I have reasons strong and forcible.

235 Enter the Duke of YORK.

YORK

Why, how now, sons and brother! at a strife?
 What is your quarrel? How began it first? 5

EDWARD

240 No quarrel, but a slight contention.^o

YORK

About what?

RICHARD

245 About that which concerns your grace and us—
 The crown of England, father, which is yours.

YORK

Mine, boy? Not till King Henry be dead. 10

RICHARD

250 Your right depends not on his life or death.

EDWARD

Now you are heir; therefore enjoy it now.
 By giving the house of Lancaster leave to breathe,
 It will outrun you, father, in the end.

YORK

255 I took an oath that he should quietly reign. 15

EDWARD

But for a kingdom any oath may be broken.
 I would break a thousand oaths to reign one year.

RICHARD

No; God forbid your grace should be forsworn.^o

YORK

I shall be, if I claim by open war.

RICHARD

260 I'll prove the contrary, if you'll hear me speak. 20

YORK

Thou canst not, son; it is impossible.

 Therefore, to arms! And, father, do but think
 How sweet a thing it is to wear a crown,
 Within whose circuit is Elysium
 And all that poets feign^o of bliss and joy.
 Why do we linger thus? I cannot rest
 Until the White Rose that I wear be dyed
 Even in the lukewarm blood of Henry's heart.

YORK

Richard, enough; I will be king, or die.
 Brother, thou shalt to London presently,^o
 And whet on Warwick to this enterprise.
 Thou, Richard, shalt to the Duke of Norfolk,
 And tell him privily of our intent.
 You, Edward, shall unto my Lord Cobham,
 With whom the Kentishmen will willingly rise.
 In them I trust; for they are soldiers,
 Witty,^o courteous, liberal,^o full of spirit.
 While you are thus employed, what resteth^o more,
 But that I seek occasion how to rise,
 And yet the king not privy to my drift,^o
 Nor any of the house of Lancaster?

Enter [a MESSENGER] Gabriel.^o

But stay! What news? Why com'st thou in such post?^o

MESSENGER

The queen with all the northern earls and lords
 Intend here to besiege you in your castle:
 She is hard by with twenty thousand men;
 And therefore fortify your hold,^o my lord.

YORK

Ay, with my sword. What! think'st thou that we fear them?
 Edward and Richard, you shall stay with me;
 My brother Montague shall post to London.
 Let noble Warwick, Cobham, and the rest,
 Whom we have left protectors of the king,
 With pow'rful policy^o strengthen themselves,
 And trust not simple Henry nor his oaths.

MONTAGUE

Brother, I go. I'll win them, fear^o it not:
 And thus most humbly I do take my leave.

Exit MONTAGUE.

Enter [SIR JOHN] Mortimer and [SIR HUGH] his brother.

YORK

Sir John and Sir Hugh Mortimer, mine uncles,
 You are come to Sandal in a happy^o hour;
 The army of the queen mean to besiege us.

SIR JOHN

She shall not need, we'll meet her in the field.

YORK

What, with five thousand men?

RICHARD

25 Ay, with five hundred, father, for a need.^o
 A woman's general. What should we fear?
A march afar off.

EDWARD

30 I hear their drums: let's set our men in order,
 And issue forth and bid them battle straight.^o

70

YORK

Five men to twenty! Though the odds be great,
 I doubt not, uncle, of our victory.
 Many a battle have I won in France,
 35 When as the enemy hath been ten to one.
 Why should I not now have the like success?

75

Alarum. Exeunt.

40

[Scene III. Field of battle between Sandal Castle and Wakefield.]

Enter RUTLAND and his TUTOR.

45

RUTLAND

Ah, whither shall I fly to 'scape their hands?
 Ah, tutor, look where bloody Clifford comes!

Enter CLIFFORD [and SOLDIERS].

CLIFFORD

Chaplain, away! thy priesthood saves thy life.
 As for the brat of this accursèd duke,
 Whose father slew my father, he shall die.

50

TUTOR

And I, my lord, will bear him company.

CLIFFORD

Soldiers, away with him!

TUTOR

Ah, Clifford, murder not this innocent child,
 Lest thou be hated both of God and man!

Exit [dragged off by SOLDIERS].

55

CLIFFORD

How now! Is he dead already? Or is it fear
 That makes him close his eyes? I'll open them.

10

RUTLAND

So looks the pent-up lion o'er the wretch
 That trembles under his devouring paws;
 And so he walks, insulting^o o'er his prey,
 And so he comes, to rend his limbs asunder.
 Ah, gentle Clifford, kill me with thy sword
 And not with such a cruel threat'ning look.
 Sweet Clifford, hear me speak before I die.
 I am too mean^o a subject for thy wrath;
 Be thou revenged on men, and let me live.

15

20

65

In vain thou speak'st, poor boy; my father's blood
 Hath stopped the passage where thy words should enter.

RUTLAND

Then let my father's blood open it again.
 He is a man, and, Clifford, cope with him.

[Scene IV. Another part of the field.]

Alarum. Enter Richard, Duke of YORK.

YORK

The army of the queen hath got° the field:
 My uncles both are slain in rescuing me;
 And all my followers to the eager foe
 Turn back° and fly, like ships before the wind
 Or lambs pursued by hunger-starvèd wolves.
 My sons, God knows what hath bechancèd° them:
 But this I know, they have demeaned° themselves
 Like men born to renown by life or death.
 Three times did Richard make a lane to me,
 And thrice cried, "Courage, father! fight it out!"
 And full as oft came Edward to my side,

 A scepter, or an earthly sepulcher!"

With this, we charged again: but out,° alas!

We budged° again, as I have seen a swan

 And I am faint, and cannot fly their fury.
 And were I° strong, I would not shun their fury.
 The sands are numbered that makes° up my life. 25
 Here must I stay, and here my life must end.

Enter the QUEEN [MARGARET], CLIFFORD, NORTHUM-
 BERLAND, the young PRINCE [of Wales], and SOLDIERS.

Come, bloody Clifford, rough Northumberland,
 I dare your quenchless fury to more rage.
 I am your butt,° and I abide° your shot.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Yield to our mercy, proud Plantagenet. 30

CLIFFORD

Ay, to such mercy as his ruthless arm
 With downright payment showed unto my father.
 Now Phaëthon hath tumbled from his car,°
 And made an evening at the noontide prick.°

YORK

 A bird that will revenge upon you all;
 And in that hope I throw mine eyes to heaven,
 Scorning whate'er you can afflict me with.
 Why come you not? what? multitudes, and fear?

CLIFFORD

So cowards fight when they can fly no further; 40
 So doves do peck the falcon's piercing talons;
 So desperate thieves, all hopeless of their lives,
 Breathe out invectives 'gainst the officers.

I would prolong awhile the traitor's life.
Wrath makes him deaf: speak thou, Northumberland.

NORTHUMBERLAND

Hold, Clifford! Do not honor him so much
To prick thy finger, though to wound his heart. 55
What valor were it, when a cur doth grin,^o
For one to thrust his hand between his teeth,
When he might spurn^o him with his foot away?
It is war's prize to take all vantages;^o
And ten to one is no impeach of^o valor. 60

[They lay hands on YORK, who struggles.]

CLIFFORD

Ay, ay, so strives the woodcock with the gin.^o

NORTHUMBERLAND

So doth the cony^o struggle in the net.

YORK

So triumph^o thieves upon their conquered booty;
So true men yield, with robbers so o'ermatched.

NORTHUMBERLAND

What would your grace have done unto him now? 65

QUEEN MARGARET

Brave warriors, Clifford and Northumberland,
Come, make him stand upon this molehill here
That raught^o at mountains with outstretchèd arms,
Yet parted but the shadow with his hand.
What, was it you that would be England's king? 70
Was't you that reveled in our parliament,
And made a preachment of your high descent?
Where are your mess^o of sons to back you now?
The wanton Edward, and the lusty George?
And where's that valiant crookback prodigy,^o 75
Dicky your boy, that with his grumbling voice
Was wont to cheer his dad in mutinies?
Or, with the rest, where is your darling, Rutland?
Look, York, I stained this napkin^o with the blood
That valiant Clifford, with his rapier's point, 80
Made issue from the bosom of the boy;
And if thine eyes can water for his death,
I give thee this to dry thy cheeks withal.
Alas, poor York! but that I hate thee deadly,
I should lament thy miserable state. 85
I prithee grieve, to make me merry, York.
What, hath thy fiery heart so parched thine entrails^o
That not a tear can fall for Rutland's death?
Why art thou patient, man? Thou shouldst be mad;
And I, to make thee mad, do mock thee thus. 90
Stamp, rave, and fret, that I may sing and dance.
Thou wouldst be fee'd,^o I see, to make me sport.
York cannot speak, unless he wears a crown.
A crown for York! and, lords, bow low to him.
Hold you his hands whilst I do set it on. 95

[Puts a paper crown on his head.]

Ay, marry,^o sir, now looks he like a king!
Ay, this is he that took King Henry's chair

And this is he was his adopted heir.
But how is it that great Plantagenet
Is crowned so soon, and broke his solemn oath? 100
As I bethink me, you should not be king
Till our King Henry had shook hands with death.
And will you pale^o your head in Henry's glory,
And rob his temples of the diadem,
Now in his life, against your holy oath? 105
O, 'tis a fault too too unpardonable!
Off with the crown, and with the crown his head!
And whilst we breathe, take time to do him dead.

CLIFFORD

That is my office, for my father's sake.

QUEEN MARGARET

Nay, stay. Let's hear the orisons he makes. 110

YORK

She-wolf of France, but worse than wolves of France,
Whose tongue more poisons than the adder's tooth!
How ill-beseeming is it in thy sex
To triumph like an Amazonian trull^o
Upon their woes whom fortune captivates! 115
But that thy face is vizardlike,^o unchanging,
Made impudent with use of evil deeds,
I would assay, proud queen, to make thee blush.
To tell thee whence thou cam'st, of whom derived,
Were shame enough to shame thee, wert thou not shameless. 120
Thy father bears the type^o of King of Naples,
Of both the Sicils^o and Jerusalem,
Yet not so wealthy as an English yeoman.
Hath that poor monarch taught thee to insult?
It needs not, nor it boots^o thee not, proud queen, 125
Unless the adage must be verified,
That beggars mounted run their horse to death.
'Tis beauty that doth oft make women proud;
But God he knows thy share thereof is small.
'Tis virtue that doth make them most admired; 130
The contrary doth make thee wondered at.
'Tis government^o that makes them seem divine;
The want thereof makes thee abominable.
Thou art as opposite to every good
As the Antipodes are unto us, 135
Or as the South to the Septentrion.^o
O tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide!^o
How couldst thou drain the lifeblood of the child,
To bid the father wipe his eyes withal,
And yet be seen to bear a woman's face? 140
Women are soft, mild, pitiful, and flexible;
Thou stern, obdurate, flinty, rough, remorseless.
Bid'st thou me rage? Why, now thou hast thy wish.
Wouldst have me weep? Why, now thou hast thy will. 145
For raging wind blows up incessant showers,
And when the rage allays the rain begins.
These tears are my sweet Rutland's obsequies,
And every drop cries vengeance for his death,
'Gainst thee, fell^o Clifford, and thee, false French-woman.

150

YORK

That face of his the hungry cannibals
Would not have touched, would not have stained with blood;

But you are more inhuman, more inexorable,
O, ten times more, than tigers of Hyrcania.°
See, ruthless queen, a hapless father's tears:
This cloth thou dipp'dst in blood of my sweet boy,
And I with tears do wash the blood away.
Keep thou the napkin, and go boast of this;
And if thou tell'st the heavy story right,
Upon my soul, the hearers will shed tears;
Yea, even my foes will shed fast-falling tears
And say, "Alas, it was a piteous deed!"

155

160

There, take the crown, and, with the crown, my curse;

And in thy need such comfort come to thee
As now I reap at thy too cruel hand!
Hardhearted Clifford, take me from the world.
My soul to heaven, my blood upon your heads!

165

NORTHUMBERLAND

Had he been slaughterman to all my kin,
I should not for my life but weep with him
To see how inly° sorrow gripes° his soul.

170

QUEEN MARGARET

What! weeping-ripe,° my Lord Northumberland?
Think but upon the wrong he did us all,
And that will quickly dry thy melting tears.

CLIFFORD

Here's for my oath! here's for my father's death!

175

[Stabs him.]

And here's to right our gentlehearted king!

[Stabs him.]

YORK

Open thy gate of mercy, gracious God!
My soul flies through these wounds to seek out thee.
[Dies.]

QUEEN MARGARET

Off with his head, and set it on York gates,
So York may overlook the town of York.
Flourish. Exeunt.

[A C T I I]

[Scene I. A plain near Mortimer's Cross in Herefordshire.]

A march. Enter EDWARD, RICHARD, and their POWER.°

EDWARD

I wonder how our princely father 'scaped,
Or whether he be 'scaped away or no
From Clifford's and Northumberland's pursuit.
Had he been ta'en, we should have heard the news;
Had he been slain, we should have heard the news;
Or had he 'scaped, methinks we should have heard
The happy tidings of his good escape.
How fares my brother? Why is he so sad?°

5

RICHARD

I cannot joy, until I be resolved°
Where our right valiant father is become.°
I saw him in the battle range about
And watched him how he singled Clifford forth.°
Methought° he bore him in the thickest troop
As doth a lion in a herd of neat,°
Or as a bear, encompassed round with dogs,
Who having pinched° a few and made them cry,
The rest stand all aloof, and bark at him.
So fared our father with his enemies;
So fled his enemies my warlike father:
Methinks 'tis prize enough to be his son.
See how the morning opes her golden gates,
And takes her farewell of the glorious sun!
How well resembles it the prime of youth,
Trimmed like a younker° prancing to his love!

10

15

20

EDWARD

Dazzle mine eyes,° or do I see three suns?

25

RICHARD

Three glorious suns, each one a perfect sun;
Not separated with the racking° clouds,
But severed in a pale clear-shining sky.
See, see! they join, embrace, and seem to kiss,
As if they vowed some league inviolable:
Now are they but one lamp, one light, one sun.
In this the heaven figures° some event.

30

EDWARD

'Twas wondrous strange, the like yet never heard of.
I think it cites° us, brother, to the field,
That we, the sons of brave Plantagenet,
Each one already blazing by our meeds,°
Should notwithstanding join our lights together
And overshine the earth as this the world.
Whate'er it bodes, henceforward will I bear
Upon my target° three fair-shining suns.°

35

40

RICHARD

Nay, bear three daughters. By your leave I speak it,
You love the breeder° better than the male.

MESSENGER

Ah, one that was a woeful looker-on Whenas the noble Duke of York was slain,
Your princely father and my loving lord!

EDWARD

O, speak no more, for I have heard too much.

RICHARD

Say how he died, for I will hear it all.

MESSENGER

Environèd he was with many foes,
And stood against them, as the hope of Troy°
Against the Greeks that would have entered Troy.
But Hercules himself must yield to odds;
And many strokes, though with a little ax,
Hews down and fells the hardest-timbered oak.
By many hands your father was subdued;
But only slaughtered by the ireful arm
Of unrelenting Clifford and the queen,
Who crowned the gracious duke in high despite,° Laughed in his face, and when with grief he wept,
The ruthless queen gave him, to dry his cheeks,
A napkin steepèd in the harmless blood
Of sweet young Rutland, by rough Clifford slain;
And after many scorns, many foul taunts,
They took his head, and on the gates of York
They set the same; and there it doth remain,
The saddest spectacle that e'er I viewed.

EDWARD

Sweet Duke of York, our prop to lean upon,
Now thou art gone, we have no staff, no stay.°
O Clifford, boist'rous° Clifford! thou hast slain
The flow'r of Europe for his chivalry;
And treacherously hast thou vanquished him,
For hand to hand he would have vanquished thee.
Now my soul's palace is become a prison.
Ah, would she break from hence, that this my body
Might in the ground be closèd up in rest!
For never henceforth shall I joy again;
Never, O never, shall I see more joy.

RICHARD

I cannot weep; for all my body's moisture
Scarce serves to quench my furnace-burning heart;
Nor can my tongue unload my heart's great burden,
For selfsame wind° that I should speak withal
Is kindling coals that fires all my breast,
And burns me up with flames that tears would quench.
To weep is to make less the depth of grief.
Tears, then, for babes; blows and revenge for me!
Richard, I bear thy name; I'll venge thy death,
Or die renownèd by attempting it.

EDWARD

His name that valiant duke hath left with thee;
His dukedom and his chair with me is left.

RICHARD

Nay, if thou be that princely eagle's bird,°
Show thy descent by gazing 'gainst the sun:

For chair and dukedom, throne and kingdom say;
Either that is thine, or else thou wert not his.

45 March. Enter WARWICK, Marquess MONTAGUE, and their ARMY.

WARWICK

How now, fair lords! What fare?° What news abroad?° 95

RICHARD

Great Lord of Warwick, if we should recompt°
Our baleful news, and at each word's deliverance
Stab poniards in our flesh till all were told,
The words would add more anguish than the wounds.
O valiant lord, the Duke of York is slain! 100

EDWARD

O Warwick, Warwick! that Plantagenet
Which held thee dearly as his soul's redemption,
Is by the stern Lord Clifford done to death.

WARWICK

Ten days ago I drowned these news in tears,
And now, to add more measure° to your woes, 105
I come to tell you things sith° then befall'n.
After the bloody fray at Wakefield fought,
Where your brave father breathed his latest gasp,
Tidings, as swiftly as the posts° could run,
Were brought me of your loss and his depart. 110
I, then in London, keeper of the king,
Mustered my soldiers, gathered flocks of friends,
And very well appointed,° as I thought,
Marched toward Saint Albans to intercept the queen,
Bearing the king in my behalf° along;° 115
For by my scouts I was advertised°
That she was coming with a full intent
To dash° our late decree in parliament
Touching King Henry's oath and your succession.
Short tale to make, we at Saint Albans met, 120
Our battles° joined, and both sides fiercely fought:
But whether 'twas the coldness of the king,
Who looked full gently on his warlike queen,
That robbed my soldiers of their heated spleen;°
Or whether 'twas report of her success; 125
Or more than common fear of Clifford's rigor,°
Who thunders to his captives blood and death,
I cannot judge: but, to conclude with truth,
Their weapons like to lightning came and went;
Our soldiers', like the night owl's lazy flight, 130
Or like an idle thresher with a flail,
Fell gently down, as if they struck their friends.
I cheered them up with justice of our cause,
With promise of high pay and great rewards;
But all in vain; they had no heart to fight, 135
And we in them no hope to win the day;
So that we fled; the king unto the queen;
Lord George your brother, Norfolk, and myself,
In haste, posthaste, are come to join with you;
For in the marches° here we heard you were, 140
Making another head° to fight again.

Where is the Duke of Norfolk, gentle Warwick?
And when came George from Burgundy to England?

WARWICK

Some six miles off the duke is with the soldiers;
And for your brother, he was lately sent
From your kind aunt, Duchess of Burgundy,
With aid of soldiers to this needful war.

RICHARD

'Twas odds,^o belike, when valiant Warwick fled.
Oft have I heard his praises in pursuit,
But ne'er till now his scandal of retire.^o

WARWICK

Nor now my scandal, Richard, dost thou hear;
For thou shalt know this strong right hand of mine
Can pluck the diadem from faint Henry's head,
And wring the awful^o scepter from his fist,
Were he as famous and as bold in war
As he is famed for mildness, peace, and prayer.

RICHARD

I know it well, Lord Warwick. Blame me not.
'Tis love I bear thy glories makes me speak.
But in this troublous time what's to be done?
Shall we go throw away our coats of steel,
And wrap our bodies in black mourning gowns,
Numb'ring our Ave-Maries^o with our beads?
Or shall we on the helmets of our foes
Tell^o our devotion with revengeful arms?
If for the last, say ay, and to it, lords.

WARWICK

Why, therefore Warwick came to seek you out,
And therefore comes my brother Montague.
Attend^o me, lords. The proud insulting queen,
With Clifford and the haught^o Northumberland,
And of their feather many moe^o proud birds,
Have wrought the easy-melting king like wax.
He swore consent to your succession,
His oath enrollèd^o in the parliament;
And now to London all the crew are gone,
To frustrate both his oath and what beside
May make against the house of Lancaster.
Their power, I think, is thirty thousand strong.
Now, if the help of Norfolk and myself,
With all the friends that thou, brave Earl of March,
Amongst the loving Welshmen canst procure,
Will but amount to five and twenty thousand,
Why, via!^o to London will we march amain,
And once again bestride our foaming steeds,
And once again cry, "Charge!" upon our foes,
But never once again turn back and fly.

RICHARD

Ay, now methinks I hear great Warwick speak.
Ne'er may he live to see a sunshine day
That cries, "Retire," if Warwick bid him stay.

EDWARD

Lord Warwick, on thy shoulder will I lean,
And when thou fail'st—as God forbid the hour!—
Must Edward fall, which peril heaven forbend!^o

WARWICK

No longer Earl of March, but Duke of York.
The next degree^o is England's royal throne;
For King of England shalt thou be proclaimed
In every borough as we pass along;
And he that throws not up his cap for joy
Shall for the fault^o make forfeit of his head.
King Edward, valiant Richard, Montague,
Stay we no longer, dreaming of renown,
But sound the trumpets, and about our task.

RICHARD

Then, Clifford, were thy heart as hard as steel,
As thou hast shown it flinty by thy deeds,
I come to pierce it, or to give thee mine.

EDWARD

Then strike up, drums! God and Saint George for us!

Enter a MESSENGER.

WARWICK

How now? What news?

MESSENGER

The Duke of Norfolk sends you word by me,
The queen is coming with a puissant^o host;
And craves your company for speedy counsel.

WARWICK

Why then it sorts.^o Brave warriors, let's away.
Exeunt omnes.^o

[Scene II. Before York.]

Flourish. Enter the KING [HENRY], the QUEEN [MARGARET], CLIFFORD, NORTHUMBERLAND, and [the] young PRINCE [of Wales], with drum and trumpets.

170 QUEEN MARGARET

Welcome, my lord, to this brave^o town of York.
Yonder's the head of that archenemy
That sought to be encompassed with your crown.
Doth not the object^o cheer your heart, my lord?

175 KING HENRY

Ay, as the rocks cheer them that fear their wrack.^o
To see this sight, it irks my very soul.
Withhold revenge, dear God! 'Tis not my fault,
Nor wittingly have I infringed my vow.

180 CLIFFORD

My gracious liege, this too much lenity
And harmful pity must be laid aside.
To whom do lions cast their gentle looks?
Not to the beast that would usurp their den.
Whose hand is that the forest bear doth lick?
Not his that spoils^o her young before her face.
Who 'scapes the lurking serpent's mortal sting?
Not he that sets his foot upon her back.
The smallest worm will turn, being trodden on.
And doves will peck in safeguard of their brood.

 Yet, in protection of their tender° ones,
 Who hath not seen them, even with those wings
 Which sometime they have used with fearful flight,
 Make war with him that climbed unto their nest,
 Offering their own lives in their young's defense?
 For shame, my liege! Make them your precedent!
 Were it not pity that this goodly boy
 Should lose his birthright by his father's fault,
 And long hereafter say unto his child,
 "What my great-grandfather and grandsire got

 Ah, what a shame were this! Look on the boy;
 And let his manly face, which promiseth
 Successful fortune, steel thy melting heart
 To hold thine own and leave thine own with him.

KING HENRY

Full well hath Clifford played the orator,
 Inferring° arguments of mighty force.
 But, Clifford, tell me, didst thou never hear
 That things ill got had ever bad success?°
 And happy always was it for that son
 Whose father for his hoarding went to hell?
 I'll leave my son my virtuous deeds behind;
 And would my father had left me no more!
 For all the rest is held at such a rate
 As brings a thousandfold more care to keep
 Than in possession any jot of pleasure.
 Ah, cousin York, would thy best friends did know
 How it doth grieve me that thy head is here!

QUEEN MARGARET

My lord, cheer up your spirits; our foes are nigh,
 And this soft courage° makes your followers faint.
 You promised knighthood to our forward son.
 Unsheathe your sword, and dub him presently.°
 Edward, kneel down.

KING HENRY

Edward Plantagenet, arise a knight;
 And learn this lesson: Draw thy sword in right.

PRINCE

My gracious father, by your kingly leave,
 I'll draw it as apparent° to the crown,
 And in that quarrel use it to the death.

CLIFFORD

Why, that is spoken like a toward° prince.

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

Royal commanders, be in readiness;
 For with a band of thirty thousand men
 Comes Warwick, backing of the Duke of York,
 And in the towns, as they do march along,
 Proclaims him king, and many fly to him.

KING HENRY

Why, that's my fortune too; therefore I'll stay.

30 NORTHUMBERLAND

Be it with resolution, then, to fight.

PRINCE

My royal father, cheer these noble lords
 And hearten those that fight in your defense:
 Unsheathe your sword, good father; cry, "Saint George!" 80

*March. Enter EDWARD, WARWICK, RICHARD,
 CLARENCE,° NORFOLK, MONTAGUE, and SOLDIERS.*

40 EDWARD

Now, perjured Henry, wilt thou kneel for grace,
 And set thy diadem upon my head,
 Or bide the mortal fortune of the field?

QUEEN MARGARET

Go rate° thy minions, proud insulting boy!
 Becomes it thee to be thus bold in terms 85
 Before thy sovereign and thy lawful king?

EDWARD

I am his king, and he should bow his knee.
 I was adopted heir by his consent;
 Since when, his oath is broke; for, as I hear,
 You, that are king, though he do wear the crown, 90
 Have caused him, by new act of parliament,
 To blot out me, and put his own son in.

CLIFFORD

And reason too!
 Who should succeed the father but the son?

RICHARD

Are you there, butcher? O, I cannot speak! 95

CLIFFORD

Ay, crookback, here I stand to answer thee,
 Or any he the proudest of thy sort.

60

RICHARD

'Twas you that killed young Rutland, was it not?

CLIFFORD

Ay, and old York, and yet not satisfied.

RICHARD

For God's sake, lords, give signal to the fight. 100

65

WARWICK

What say'st thou, Henry? Wilt thou yield the crown?

QUEEN MARGARET

Why, how now, long-tongued Warwick! Dare you speak?

When you and I met at Saint Albans last,
 Your legs did better service than your hands.

WARWICK

Then 'twas my turn to fly, and now 'tis thine. 105

CLIFFORD

You said so much before, and yet you fled.

NORTHUMBERLAND

RICHARD

Northumberland, I hold thee reverently.

Break off the parley; for scarce I can refrain

The execution of my big-swol'n heart

Upon that Clifford, that cruel child-killer.

CLIFFORD

I slew thy father. Call'st thou him a child?

RICHARD

Ay, like a dastard and a treacherous coward,

As thou didst kill our tender brother Rutland;

But ere sun set I'll make thee curse the deed.

KING HENRY

Have done with words, my lords, and hear me speak.

QUEEN MARGARET

Defy them then, or else hold close thy lips.

KING HENRY

I prithee, give no limits to my tongue:

I am a king, and privileged to speak.

CLIFFORD

My liege, the wound that bred this meeting here

Cannot be cured by words. Therefore be still.

RICHARD

Then, executioner, unsheathe thy sword.

By Him that made us all, I am resolved°

That Clifford's manhood lies upon his tongue.

EDWARD

Say, Henry, shall I have my right, or no?

A thousand men have broke their fasts today

That ne'er shall dine unless thou yield the crown.

WARWICK

If thou deny, their blood upon thy head!

For York in justice puts his armor on.

PRINCE

If that be right which Warwick says is right,

There is no wrong, but everything is right.

RICHARD

Whoever got° thee, there thy mother stands;

For well I wot thou hast thy mother's tongue.

QUEEN MARGARET

But thou art neither like thy sire nor dam,

But like a foul misshapen stigmatic,°

Marked by the destinies to be avoided,

As venom toads, or lizards' dreadful stings.

RICHARD

Iron of Naples, hid with English guilt,

Whose father bears the title of a king—

As if a channel° should be called the sea—

Sham'st thou not, knowing whence thou art ex-traught,°

To let thy tongue detect° thy base-born heart?

EDWARD

A wisp of straw were worth a thousand crowns,

To make this shameless callet° know herself.

Helen of Greece was fairer far than thou,

Although thy husband may be Menelaus;

And ne'er was Agamemnon's brother wronged

By that false woman as this king by thee.

His father reveled in the heart of France,

And tamed the king, and made the Dolphin° stoop;°

And had he matched according to his state,

He might have kept that glory to this day;

But when he took a beggar to his bed,

And graced thy poor sire with his bridal day,

Even then that sunshine brewed a show'r for him,

That washed his father's fortunes forth of° France,

And heaped sedition on his crown at home.

For what hath broached° this tumult but thy pride?

Hadst thou been meek, our title still° had slept;

And we, in pity of the gentle king,

Had slipped° our claim until another age.

CLARENCE

But when we saw our sunshine made thy spring,

And that thy summer bred us no increase,

We set the ax to thy usurping root;

And though the edge hath something hit ourselves,

Yet, know thou, since we have begun to strike,

We'll never leave till we have hewn thee down,

Or bathed thy growing with our heated bloods.

EDWARD

And, in this resolution, I defy thee;

Not willing any longer conference,°

Since thou deniest the gentle king to speak.

Sound trumpets! Let our bloody colors wave!

And either victory, or else a grave.

QUEEN MARGARET

Stay, Edward.

EDWARD

No, wrangling woman, we'll no longer stay.

These words will cost ten thousand lives this day.

Exeunt omnes.

[Scene III. A field of battle between Towton and Saxton in Yorkshire.]

Alarum. Excursions. Enter WARWICK.

WARWICK

Forspent° with toil, as runners with a race,

I lay me down a little while to breathe;°

For strokes received, and many blows repaid,

Have robbed my strong-knit sinews of their strength,

And spite of spite° needs must I rest awhile.

Enter EDWARD, running.

EDWARD

Smile, gentle heaven! or strike, ungentle° death!

For this world frowns, and Edward's sun is clouded.

WARWICK

How now, my lord! What hap? What hope of good?

Enter CLARENCE.

CLARENCE

Our hap° is loss, our hope but sad despair;

Our ranks are broke, and ruin follows us.

What counsel give you? Whither shall we fly?

EDWARD

Bootless° is flight. They follow us with wings,
And weak we are and cannot shun pursuit.

Enter RICHARD.

RICHARD

Ah, Warwick, why hast thou withdrawn thyself?
Thy brother's blood the thirsty earth hath drunk,
Broached° with the steely point of Clifford's lance;
And in the very pangs of death he cried,
Like to a dismal° clangor heard from far,
"Warwick, revenge! Brother, revenge my death!"
So, underneath the belly of their steeds,
That stained their fetlocks in his smoking° blood,
The noble gentleman gave up the ghost.

WARWICK

Then let the earth be drunken with our blood!
I'll kill my horse, because I will not fly.
Why stand we like softhearted women here,
Wailing our losses, whiles the foe doth rage,
And look upon,° as if the tragedy
Were played in jest by counterfeiting actors?
Here on my knee I vow to God above,
I'll never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine
Or fortune given me measure of revenge.

EDWARD

O Warwick, I do bend my knee with thine
And in this vow do chain my soul to thine!
And ere my knee rise from the earth's cold face,
I throw my hands, mine eyes, my heart to thee,
Thou setter-up and plucker-down of kings,
Beseeching thee (if with thy will it stands°)
That to my foes this body must be prey,
Yet that thy brazen gates of heaven may ope,
And give sweet passage to my sinful soul!
Now, lords, take leave until we meet again,
Where'er it be, in heaven or in earth.

RICHARD

Brother, give me thy hand; and, gentle Warwick,
Let me embrace thee in my weary arms.
I, that did never weep, now melt with woe
That winter should cut off our springtime so.

WARWICK

Away, away! Once more, sweet lords, farewell.

CLARENCE

Yet let us all together to our troops,
And give them leave to fly that will not stay,
And call them pillars that will stand to us;
And, if we thrive, promise them such rewards
As victors wear at the Olympian games:
This may plant courage in their quailing breasts;
For yet is hope of life and victory.
Forslow° no longer! Make we hence amain! Exeunt.

[Scene IV. Another part of the field.]

Excursions. Enter RICHARD and CLIFFORD.

RICHARD

Now, Clifford, I have singled thee alone.
Suppose this arm is for the Duke of York,
And this for Rutland, both bound to revenge
Wert thou environed with a brazen wall.

CLIFFORD

Now, Richard, I am with thee here alone.
This is the hand that stabbed thy father York,
And this the hand that slew thy brother Rutland;
And here's the heart that triumphs° in their death
And cheers these hands that slew thy sire and brother
To execute the like upon thyself;
And so have at thee!°

They fight. WARWICK comes. CLIFFORD flies.

25

RICHARD

Nay, Warwick, single out some other chase.
For I myself will hunt this wolf to death. Exeunt.

[Scene V. Another part of the field.]

Alarum. Enter KING HENRY alone.

KING HENRY

This battle fares like to the morning's war,
When dying clouds contend with growing light,
What time the shepherd, blowing of his nails,°
Can neither call it perfect day nor night.
Now sways it this way, like a mighty sea
Forced by the tide to combat with the wind.
Now sways it that way, like the selfsame sea
Forced to retire by fury of the wind.
Sometime the flood prevails, and then the wind;
Now one the better, then another best;
Both tugging to be victors, breast to breast,
Yet neither conqueror nor conquerèd:
So is the equal poise° of this fell war.
Here on this molehill will I sit me down.
To whom God will, there be the victory!
For Margaret my queen, and Clifford too,
Have chid me from the battle, swearing both
They prosper best of all when I am thence.
Would I were dead, if God's good will were so!
For what is in this world but grief and woe?
O God! methinks it were a happy life,
To be no better than a homely swain;°
To sit upon a hill, as I do now,
To carve out dials quaintly,° point by point,
Thereby to see the minutes how they run—
How many makes the hour full complete,
How many hours brings about° the day,
How many days will finish up the year,
How many years a mortal man may live;
When this is known, then to divide the times—
So many hours must I tend my flock,

So many hours must I take my rest,
 So many hours must I contemplate,
 So many hours must I sport myself,
 So many days my ewes have been with young,
 So many weeks ere the poor fools will ean,^o
 So many years ere I shall shear the fleece.
 So minutes, hours, days, months, and years,
 Passed over to the end they were created,
 Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave.
 Ah, what a life were this! how sweet! how lovely!
 Gives not the hawthorn bush a sweeter shade
 To shepherds looking on their silly^o sheep,
 Than doth a rich embroidered canopy
 To kings that fear their subjects' treachery?
 O, yes, it doth! a thousandfold it doth!
 And to conclude, the shepherd's homely curds,
 His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,
 His wonted sleep under a fresh tree's shade,
 All which secure^o and sweetly he enjoys,
 Is far beyond a prince's delicates,^o
 His viands sparkling in a golden cup,
 His body couchèd in a curious^o bed,
 When care, mistrust, and treason waits on him.

Alarum. Enter a SON that hath killed his father, at one door; and [later] a FATHER that hath killed his son at another door.

SON
 Ill blows the wind that profits nobody.
 This man, whom hand to hand I slew in fight,
 May be possessèd with some store of crowns;
 And I, that haply^o take them from him now,
 May yet, ere night, yield both my life and them
 To some man else, as this dead man doth me.
 Who's this? O God! it is my father's face,
 Whom in this conflict I, unwares,^o have killed.
 O heavy times, begetting such events!
 From London by the king was I pressed forth;
 My father, being the Earl of Warwick's man,
 Came on the part^o of York, pressed by his master;
 And I, who at his hands received my life,
 Have by my hands of life bereavèd him.
 Pardon me, God! I knew not what I did.
 And pardon, father, for I knew not thee!
 My tears shall wipe away these bloody marks;
 And no more words till they have flowèd their fill.

KING HENRY
 O piteous spectacle! O bloody times!
 Whiles lions war and battle for their dens,
 Poor harmless lambs abide their enmity.
 Weep, wretched man! I'll aid thee tear for tear;
 And let our hearts and eyes, like civil war,
 Be blind with tears, and break o'ercharged with grief.

Enter FATHER, bearing of his son.

FATHER
 Thou that so stoutly hath resisted me,
 Give me thy gold, if thou hast any gold;
 For I have bought it with an hundred blows.

But let me see: is this our foeman's face?
 Ah, no, no, no! It is mine only son!
 Ah, boy, if any life be left in thee,
 Throw up thine eye! See, see what show'rs arise,
 Blown with the windy tempest of my heart
 Upon thy wounds, that kills mine eye and heart!
 O, pity, God, this miserable age!
 What stratagems,^o how fell, how butcherly,
 Erroneous,^o mutinous, and unnatural,
 This deadly quarrel doth beget!
 O boy, thy father gave thee life too soon,
 And hath bereft thee of thy life too late!^o

KING HENRY

Woe above woe! grief more than common grief!
 O that my death would stay these ruthful^o deeds!
 O, pity, pity, gentle heaven, pity!
 The red rose and the white are on his face,
 The fatal colors of our striving houses:
 The one his purple blood right well resembles;
 The other his pale cheeks, methinks, presenteth:
 Wither one rose, and let the other flourish!
 If you contend, a thousand lives must wither.

SON

How will my mother for a father's death
 Take on with me and ne'er be satisfied!

FATHER

How will my wife for slaughter of my son
 Shed seas of tears and ne'er be satisfied!

55 KING HENRY

How will the country for these woeful chances
 Misthink^o the king and not be satisfied!

SON

Was ever son so rued a father's death?

60 FATHER

Was ever father so bemoaned his son?

KING HENRY

Was ever king so grieved for subject's woe?
 Much is your sorrow; mine ten times so much.

65 SON

I'll bear thee hence, where I may weep my fill.
[Exit with the body.]

FATHER

These arms of mine shall be thy winding-sheet;
 My heart, sweet boy, shall be thy sepulcher,
 For from my heart thine image ne'er shall go;
 My sighing breast shall be thy funeral bell;
 And so obsequious^o will thy father be,
 Even for the loss of thee, having no more,
 As Priam was for all his valiant sons.
 I'll bear thee hence; and let them fight that will,
 For I have murdered where I should not kill.
Exit [with the body].

KING HENRY

Sad-hearted men, much overgone^o with care,
 Here sits a king more woeful than you are.

QUEEN MARGARET

Having the fearful flying hare in sight,
With fiery eyes sparkling for very wrath,
And bloody steel grasped in their ireful hands,

Away! for vengeance comes along with them:
Nay, stay not to expostulate; make speed!
Or else come after. I'll away before.

KING HENRY

Nay, take me with thee, good sweet Exeter.
Not that I fear to stay, but love to go
Whither the queen intends. Forward, away! Exeunt.

[Scene VI. Another part of the field.]

A loud alarum. Enter CLIFFORD, wounded.

CLIFFORD

Here burns my candle out; ay, here it dies,
Which, whiles it lasted, gave King Henry light.
O Lancaster! I fear thy overthrow
More than my body's parting with my soul.
My love and fear glued^o many friends to thee,
And now I fall, thy tough commixtures^o melts,
Impairing Henry, strength'ning misproud^o York.
And whither fly the gnats but to the sun?
And who shines now but Henry's enemies?
O Phoebus, hadst thou never given consent
That Phaëthon should check thy fiery steeds,
Thy burning car never had scorched the earth!
And, Henry, hadst thou swayed^o as kings should do,
Or as thy father and his father did,
Giving no ground unto the house of York,
They never then had sprung like summer flies;
I and ten thousand in this luckless realm
Had left no mourning widows for our death;
And thou this day hadst kept thy chair in peace.
For what doth cherish weeds but gentle air?
And what makes robbers bold but too much lenity?
Bootless are plaints, and cureless are my wounds;
No way to fly, nor strengthen to hold out flight;
The foe is merciless, and will not pity;
For at their hands I have deserved no pity.
The air hath got into my deadly wounds,
And much effuse^o of blood doth make me faint.
Come, York and Richard, Warwick and the rest;
I stabbed your fathers' bosoms; split my breast.

[Faints.]

*Alarum and retreat. Enter EDWARD, WARWICK,
RICHARD, and SOLDIERS; MONTAGUE and CLAR-ENCE.*

EDWARD

125 Now breathe we,^o lords: good fortune bids us pause, 30
And smooth the frowns of war with peaceful looks.
Some troops pursue the bloody-minded queen,
That led calm Henry, though he were a king,
As doth a sail, filled with a fretting gust,
Command^o an argosy^o to stem the waves. 35
130 But think you, lords, that Clifford fled with them?

WARWICK

No, 'tis impossible he should escape;
For, though before his face I speak the words,
Your brother Richard marked him for the grave:
And whereso'er he is, he's surely dead. 40

CLIFFORD groans [and dies].

EDWARD

Whose soul is that which takes her heavy leave?

RICHARD

A deadly groan, like life and death's departing.^o

EDWARD

See who it is: and, now the battle's ended,
If friend or foe, let him be gently used.

RICHARD

Revoke that doom^o of mercy, for 'tis Clifford; 45
Who not contented that he lopped the branch
In hewing Rutland when his leaves put forth,
But set his murdering knife unto the root
From whence that tender spray did sweetly spring:
I mean our princely father, Duke of York. 50

WARWICK

5 From off the gates of York fetch down the head,
Your father's head, which Clifford placèd there;
Instead whereof let this supply the room:^o
Measure for measure must be answerèd.

EDWARD

10 Bring forth that fatal screech owl to our house, 55
That nothing sung but death to us and ours.
Now death shall stop his dismal threat'ning sound
And his ill-boding tongue no more shall speak.

WARWICK

15 I think his understanding is bereft.^o
Speak, Clifford, dost thou know who speaks to thee? 60
Dark cloudy death o'ershades his beams of life,
And he nor sees nor hears us what we say.

RICHARD

20 O, would he did! and so perhaps he doth:
'Tis but his policy to counterfeit,
Because he would avoid such bitter taunts 65
Which in the time of death he gave our father.

CLARENCE

25 If so thou think'st, vex^o him with eager^o words.

RICHARD

Clifford, ask mercy and obtain no grace.

EDWARD

Clifford, repent in bootless penitence.

Clifford, devise excuses for thy faults. 70

CLARENCE

Where's Captain Margaret, to fence° you now?

WARWICK

They mock thee, Clifford. Swear as thou wast wont. 75

RICHARD

What! not an oath? Nay, then the world goes hard

When Clifford cannot spare his friends an oath.

I know by that he's dead; and, by my soul,

If this right hand would buy two hours' life,

That I in all despite might rail at him, 80

This hand should chop it off, and with the issuing blood

Stifle the villain whose unstanched thirst

York and young Rutland could not satisfy.

WARWICK

Ay, but he's dead. Off with the traitor's head,

And rear° it in the place your father's stands. 85

And now to London with triumphant march,

There to be crownèd England's royal king:

From whence shall Warwick cut the sea to France,

And ask the Lady Bona for thy queen.

So shalt thou sinew both these lands together; 90

And, having France thy friend, thou shalt not dread

The scattered foe that hopes to rise again;

For though they cannot greatly sting to hurt,

Yet look to have them buzz to offend thine ears.

First will I see the coronation.

95

And then to Brittany I'll cross the sea,

To effect this marriage, so it please my lord.

EDWARD

Even as thou wilt, sweet Warwick, let it be;

For in thy shoulder do I build my seat,

And never will I undertake the thing

100

Wherein thy counsel and consent is wanting.

Richard, I will create thee Duke of Gloucester;

And George, of Clarence: Warwick, as ourself,°

Shall do and undo as him pleaseth best.

RICHARD

Let me be Duke of Clarence, George of Gloucester; 105

For Gloucester's dukedom is too ominous.°

WARWICK

Tut, that's a foolish observation.

Richard, be Duke of Gloucester. Now to London,

To see these honors in possession. Exeunt.

[A C T I I I]

[Scene I. A forest in the north of England.]

Enter [two KEEPERS] with crossbows in their hands.

FIRST KEEPER

Under this thick-grown brake° we'll shroud° ourselves;

For through this laund° anon the deer will come,

And in this covert° will we make our stand,°

Culling° the principal of all the deer.

SECOND KEEPER

I'll stay above the hill, so both may shoot. 5

FIRST KEEPER

That cannot be; the noise of thy crossbow

Will scare the herd, and so my shoot is lost.

Here stand we both, and aim at the best;°

And, for° the time shall not seem tedious,

I'll tell thee what befell me on a day 10

In this self° place where now we mean to stand.

SECOND KEEPER

Here comes a man, let's stay till he be past.

Enter the KING [HENRY, disguised], with a prayerbook.

KING HENRY

From Scotland am I stol'n, even of pure love,

To greet mine own land with my wishful sight.

No, Harry, Harry, 'tis no land of thine; 15

Thy place is filled, thy scepter wrung from thee,

Thy balm washed off wherewith thou wast anointed:

95

No bending knee will call thee Caesar now,

No humble suitors press to speak for right,

No, not a man comes for redress of° thee; 20

For how can I help them, and not myself?

FIRST KEEPER

Ay, here's a deer whose skin's a keeper's fee!

100

This is the quondam° king; let's seize upon him.

KING HENRY

Let me embrace thee, sour adversity,

For wise men say it is the wisest course. 25

SECOND KEEPER

Why linger we? let us lay hands upon him.

FIRST KEEPER

Forbear awhile; we'll hear a little more.

KING HENRY

My queen and son are gone to France for aid;

And, as I hear, the great commanding Warwick

Is thither gone, to crave the French king's sister 30

To wife for Edward. If this news be true,

Poor queen and son, your labor is but lost;

For Warwick is a subtle orator,

And Lewis a prince soon won with moving words.

By this account, then, Margaret may win him; 35

For she's a woman to be pitied much.

Her sighs will make a batt'ry° in his breast;

Her tears will pierce into a marble heart;

The tiger will be mild whiles she doth mourn;

And Nero will be tainted with remorse 40

 She on his left side, craving aid for Henry,
 He on his right, asking a wife for Edward.
 She weeps, and says her Henry is deposed;
 He smiles, and says his Edward is installed;
 That she (poor wretch) for grief can speak no more;
 Whiles Warwick tells his title, smooths the wrong,
 Inferreth arguments of mighty strength,
 And in conclusion wins the king from her,
 With promise of his sister, and what else,
 To strengthen and support King Edward's place.
 O Margaret, thus 'twill be; and thou (poor soul)
 Art then forsaken, as thou went'st forlorn!

SECOND KEEPER

Say, what art thou that talk'st of kings and queens? 55

KING HENRY

More than I seem, and less than I was born to:
 A man at least, for less I should not be;
 And men may talk of kings, and why not I?

SECOND KEEPER

Ay, but thou talk'st as if thou wert a king.

KING HENRY

Why, so I am (in mind) and that's enough.

SECOND KEEPER

But, if thou be a king, where is thy crown?

KING HENRY

My crown is in my heart, not on my head;
 Not decked with diamonds and Indian stones,
 Nor to be seen. My crown is called content:
 A crown it is that seldom kings enjoy.

SECOND KEEPER

Well, if you be a king crowned with content,
 Your crown content and you must be contented
 To go along with us; for (as we think)
 You are the king King Edward hath deposed;
 And we his subjects sworn in all allegiance
 Will apprehend you as his enemy.

KING HENRY

But did you never swear, and break an oath?

SECOND KEEPER

No, never such an oath; nor will not now.

KING HENRY

Where did you dwell when I was King of England?

SECOND KEEPER

Here in this country, where we now remain.

KING HENRY

I was anointed king at nine months old;
 My father and my grandfather were kings,
 And you were sworn true subjects unto me:
 And tell me, then, have you not broke your oaths?

FIRST KEEPER

No;

For we were subjects but while you were king.

KING HENRY

Why, am I dead? Do I not breathe a man?
 Ah, simple men, you know not what you swear!
 Look, as I blow this feather from my face,
 And as the air blows it to me again,
 Obeying with my wind when I do blow,
 And yielding to another when it blows,
 Commanded always by the greater gust—
 Such is the lightness of you common men.

But do not break your oaths; for of that sin 90
 My mild entreaty shall not make you guilty.
 Go where you will, the king shall be commanded;
 And be you kings, command, and I'll obey.

45 FIRST KEEPER

We are true subjects to the king, King Edward.

KING HENRY

So would you be again to Henry, 95
 If he were seated as King Edward is.

50 FIRST KEEPER

We charge you, in God's name, and the king's,
 To go with us unto the officers.

KING HENRY

In God's name, lead. Your king's name be obeyed:
 And what God will, that let your king perform; 100
 And what he will, I humbly yield unto. Exeunt.

[Scene II. London. The palace.]

Enter KING EDWARD, [RICHARD, Duke of] Gloucester, [George, Duke of] CLARENCE, LADY GREY.

KING EDWARD

Brother of Gloucester, at Saint Albans Field
 60 This lady's husband, Sir Richard Grey, was slain,
 His land then seized on by the conqueror.
 Her suit is now to repossess those lands;
 Which we in justice cannot well deny,^o
 Because in quarrel of the house of York 5
 The worthy gentleman did lose his life.

RICHARD

65 Your highness shall do well to grant her suit;
 It were dishonor to deny it her.

KING EDWARD

It were no less; but yet I'll make a pause.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.] 10

Yea, is it so?

70 I see the lady hath a thing to grant,
 Before the king will grant her humble suit.

CLARENCE [Aside to RICHARD.]

He knows the game: how true he keeps the wind!^o

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

Silence! 15

KING EDWARD

Widow, we will consider of your suit;
 And come some other time to know our mind.

75 LADY GREY

Right gracious lord, I cannot brook^o delay:
 May it please your highness to resolve me now,
 And what your pleasure is shall satisfy me. 20

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

Ay, widow? then I'll warrant^o you all your lands,
 And if what pleases him shall pleasure you.

80 Fight closer, or, good faith, you'll catch a blow.

CLARENCE [Aside to RICHARD.]

I fear her not, unless she chance to fall.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

God forbid that! for he'll take vantages.^o 25

CLARENCE [Aside to RICHARD.]

I think he means to beg a child of her.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

Nay then, whip me: he'll rather give her two.

LADY GREY

Three, my most gracious lord.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

You shall have four, if you'll be ruled by him.

KING EDWARD

'Twere pity they should lose their father's lands.

LADY GREY

Be pitiful, dread lord, and grant it then.

KING EDWARD

Lords, give us leave: I'll try this widow's wit.^o

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

Ay, good leave have you; for you will have leave,

Till youth take leave and leave you to the crutch.^o

[RICHARD and CLARENCE withdraw.]

KING EDWARD

Now tell me, madam, do you love your children?

LADY GREY

Ay, full as dearly as I love myself.

KING EDWARD

And would you not do much to do them good?

LADY GREY

To do them good, I would sustain some harm.

KING EDWARD

Then get your husband's lands, to do them good.

LADY GREY

Therefore I came unto your majesty.

KING EDWARD

I'll tell you how these lands are to be got.

LADY GREY

So shall you bind me to your highness' service.

KING EDWARD

What service wilt thou do me, if I give them?

LADY GREY

What you command, that rests in me^o to do.

KING EDWARD

But you will take exceptions to my boon.^o

LADY GREY

No, gracious lord, except I cannot do it.

KING EDWARD

Ay, but thou canst do what I mean to ask.

LADY GREY

Why, then I will do what your grace commands.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

He plies her hard; and much rain wears the marble.

CLARENCE [Aside to RICHARD.]

As red as fire! Nay, then her wax must melt.

LADY GREY

Why stops my lord? shall I not hear my task?

KING EDWARD

An easy task; 'tis but to love a king.

LADY GREY

That's soon performed, because I am a subject.

KING EDWARD

Why, then, thy husband's lands I freely give thee.

LADY GREY

I take my leave with many thousand thanks.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

The match is made; she seals it with a curtsy.

KING EDWARD

But stay thee, 'tis the fruits of love I mean.

LADY GREY

The fruits of love I mean, my loving liege.

KING EDWARD

Ay, but, I fear me, in another sense.

What love, think'st thou, I sue so much to get?

LADY GREY

My love till death, my humble thanks, my prayers;

That love which virtue begs and virtue grants.

KING EDWARD

No, by my troth, I did not mean such love.

LADY GREY

Why, then you mean not as I thought you did.

KING EDWARD

But now you partly may perceive my mind.

LADY GREY

My mind will never grant what I perceive

Your highness aims at, if I aim aright.

KING EDWARD

To tell thee plain, I aim to lie with thee.

LADY GREY

To tell you plain, I had rather lie in prison.

KING EDWARD

Why, then thou shalt not have thy husband's lands.

LADY GREY

Why, then mine honesty^o shall be my dower;

For by that loss I will not purchase them.

KING EDWARD

Therein thou wrong'st thy children mightily.

LADY GREY

Herein your highness wrongs both them and me.

But, mighty lord, this merry inclination

Accords not with the sadness of my suit.^o

Please you dismiss me, either with "ay" or "no."

KING EDWARD

Ay, if thou wilt say "ay" to my request;

No, if thou dost say "no" to my demand.

LADY GREY

Then, no, my lord. My suit is at an end.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]

The widow likes him not, she knits her brows.

CLARENCE [Aside to RICHARD.]

He is the bluntest wooer in Christendom.

KING EDWARD [Aside.]

Her looks doth argue her replete with modesty;

Her words doth show her wit incomparable;

All her perfections challenge^o sovereignty:

One way or other, she is for a king;

And she shall be my love, or else my queen—

[Aloud.]

Say that King Edward take thee for his queen?

LADY GREY

'Tis better said than done, my gracious lord:

I am a subject fit to jest withal,

But far unfit to be a sovereign.

KING EDWARD

Sweet widow, by my state I swear to thee

33 wit intelligence 34-35 for . . . crutch for you will take liberties until youth departs and leaves you infirm 45 rests in me is in my power 46 boon favor

72 honesty chastity 77 sadness of my suit seriousness of my request 86 challenge lay claim to

I speak no more than what my soul intends;
And that is, to enjoy thee for my love. 95

LADY GREY
And that is more than I will yield unto.
I know I am too mean^o to be your queen,
And yet too good to be your concubine.

KING EDWARD
You cavil, widow: I did mean, my queen.

LADY GREY
'Twill grieve your grace my sons should call you
father. 100

KING EDWARD
No more than when my daughters call thee mother.
Thou art a widow, and thou hast some children;
And, by God's mother, I, being but a bachelor,
Have other some:^o why, 'tis a happy^o thing
To be the father unto many sons. 105

Answer no more, for thou shalt be my queen.

RICHARD [Aside to CLARENCE.]
The ghostly^o father now hath done his shrift.

CLARENCE [Aside to RICHARD.]
When he was made a shriver, 'twas for shift.^o

KING EDWARD
Brothers, you muse what chat we two have had.

RICHARD
The widow likes it not, for she looks very sad. 110

KING EDWARD
You'd think it strange if I should marry her.

CLARENCE
To who, my lord?

KING EDWARD Why, Clarence, to myself.

RICHARD
That would be ten days' wonder at the least.

CLARENCE
That's a day longer than a wonder lasts.^o

RICHARD
By so much is the wonder in extremes. 115

KING EDWARD
Well, jest on, brothers. I can tell you both
Her suit is granted for her husband's lands.

Enter a NOBLEMAN.

NOBLEMAN
My gracious lord, Henry your foe is taken,
And brought your prisoner to your palace gate.

KING EDWARD
See that he be conveyed unto the Tower: 120
And go we, brothers, to the man that took him,
To question of his apprehension.^o
Widow, go you along. Lords, use her honorably.

Exeunt. Manet^o RICHARD.

RICHARD
Ay, Edward will use women honorably.
Would he were wasted, marrow, bones, and all, 125
That from his loins no hopeful branch may spring,
To cross me from the golden time I look for!
And yet, between my soul's desire and me—
The lustful Edward's title burièd—

Is Clarence, Henry, and his son young Edward, 130
And all the unlooked-for^o issue of their bodies,
To take their rooms, ere I can place myself:
A cold premeditation for my purpose!
Why then, I do but dream on sovereignty;
Like one that stands upon a promontory, 135
And spies a far-off shore where he would tread,
Wishing his foot were equal with his eye,
And chides the sea that sunders him from thence,
Saying, he'll lade^o it dry to have his way:
So do I wish the crown, being so far off; 140
And so I chide the means that keeps me from it;
And so (I say) I'll cut the causes off,
Flattering me with impossibilities.
My eye's too quick, my heart o'erweens too much,^o
Unless my hand and strength could equal them. 145
Well, say there is no kingdom then for Richard:
What other pleasure can the world afford?
I'll make my heaven in a lady's lap,
And deck my body in gay ornaments
And witch^o sweet ladies with my words and looks. 150
O miserable thought! and more unlikely
Than to accomplish^o twenty golden crowns!
Why, love forswore^o me in my mother's womb:
And, for^o I should not deal in her soft laws,
She did corrupt frail nature with some bribe, 155
To shrink mine arm up like a withered shrub;
To make an envious^o mountain on my back,
Where sits deformity to mock my body;
To shape my legs of an unequal size;
To disproportion me in every part, 160
Like to a chaos,^o or an unlicked bear whelp
That carries no impression like the dam.
And am I then a man to be beloved?
O monstrous fault,^o to harbor such a thought!
Then, since this earth affords no joy to me, 165
But to command, to check, to o'erbear such
As are of better person^o than myself,
I'll make my heaven to dream upon the crown,
And, whiles I live, t' account this world but hell,
Until my misshaped trunk that bears this head 170
Be round impalèd with a glorious crown.
And yet I know not how to get the crown,
For many lives stand between me and home:^o
And I—like one lost in a thorny wood,
That rends the thorns and is rent with the thorns, 175
Seeking a way and straying from the way,
Not knowing how to find the open air,
But toiling desperately to find it out—
Torment myself to catch the English crown:
And from that torment I will free myself, 180
Or hew my way out with a bloody ax.
Why, I can smile, and murder whiles I smile,
And cry, "Content" to that which grieves my heart,
And wet my cheeks with artificial tears,
And frame my face to all occasions. 185
I'll drown more sailors than the mermaid shall;

97 mean low in rank 104 other some others; happy fortunate 107 ghostly spiritual 108 for shift (1) to serve a purpose (2) for a woman's undergarment 114 That's . . . lasts proverbially a wonder lasts only nine days 122 apprehension arrest 123 s.d. Manet remains (Latin)

I'll slay more gazers than the basilisk;^o
 I'll play the orator as well as Nestor,
 Deceive more slyly than Ulysses could,
 And, like a Sinon,^o take another Troy. 190
 I can add colors to the chameleon,
 Change shapes with Proteus^o for advantages,
 And set the murderous Machiavel^o to school.
 Can I do this, and cannot get a crown?
 Tut, were it farther off, I'll pluck it down. Exit. 195

[Scene III. France. The king's palace.]

Flourish. Enter LEWIS the French king, his sister BONA, his ADMIRAL, called Bourbon; PRINCE Edward, QUEEN MARGARET, and the Earl of OXFORD. LEWIS sits, and riseth up again.

KING LEWIS

Fair Queen of England, worthy Margaret,
 Sit down with us: it ill befits thy state
 And birth, that thou shouldst stand while Lewis doth sit.

QUEEN MARGARET

No, mighty King of France: now Margaret
 Must strike her sail^o and learn awhile to serve
 Where kings command. I was (I must confess)
 Great Albion's^o queen in former golden days;
 But now mischance hath trod my title down,
 And with dishonor laid me on the ground;
 Where I must take like seat unto my fortune,
 And to my humble seat conform myself. 10

KING LEWIS

Why, say, fair queen, whence springs this deep despair?

QUEEN MARGARET

From such a cause as fills mine eyes with tears
 And stops my tongue, while heart is drowned in cares.

KING LEWIS

Whate'er it be, be thou still like thyself, 15
 And sit thee by our side. (Seats her by him.) Yield not thy neck
 To fortune's yoke, but let thy dauntless mind
 Still ride in triumph over all mischance.
 Be plain, Queen Margaret, and tell thy grief;
 It shall be eased, if France can yield relief. 20

QUEEN MARGARET

Those gracious words revive my drooping thoughts
 And give my tongue-tied sorrows leave to speak.
 Now, therefore, be it known to noble Lewis,
 That Henry, sole possessor of my love,
 Is of a king become a banished man, 25
 And forced to live in Scotland a forlorn;^o
 While proud ambitious Edward, Duke of York,
 Usurps the regal title and the seat
 Of England's true-anointed lawful king.

 and destroyed Troy 192 Proteus sea deity who assumed

This is the cause that I, poor Margaret, 30
 With this my son, Prince Edward, Henry's heir,
 Am come to crave thy just and lawful aid;
 And if thou fail us, all our hope is done.
 Scotland hath will to help, but cannot help;
 Our people and our peers are both misled, 35
 Our treasure seized, our soldiers put to flight,
 And, as thou see'st, ourselves in heavy^o plight.

KING LEWIS

Renowned queen, with patience calm the storm,
 While we bethink a means to break it off.^o

QUEEN MARGARET

The more we stay, the stronger grows our foe. 40

KING LEWIS

The more I stay,^o the more I'll succor thee.

QUEEN MARGARET

O, but impatience waiteth on^o true sorrow.
 And see where comes the breeder of my sorrow!

Enter WARWICK.

KING LEWIS

What's he approacheth boldly to our presence?

QUEEN MARGARET

Our Earl of Warwick, Edward's greatest friend. 45

KING LEWIS

Welcome, brave Warwick! What brings thee to France?

He descends. She ariseth.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

Ay, now begins a second storm to rise,
 For this is he that moves both wind and tide.

WARWICK

From worthy Edward, King of Albion,
 My lord and sovereign, and thy vowèd friend, 50
 I come, in kindness and unfeignèd love,
 First, to do greetings to thy royal person;
 And then to crave a league of amity;
 And lastly, to confirm that amity
 With nuptial knot, if thou vouchsafe to grant 55
 That virtuous Lady Bona, thy fair sister,
 To England's king in lawful marriage.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

If that go forward, Henry's hope is done.

WARWICK (Speaking to BONA.)

And, gracious madam, in our king's behalf,
 I am commanded, with your leave and favor,^o 60
 Humbly to kiss yqur hand, and with my tongue
 To tell the passion^o of my sovereign's heart;
 Where fame,^o late ent'ring at his heedful ears,
 Hath placed thy beauty's image and thy virtue. 25

QUEEN MARGARET

King Lewis and Lady Bona, hear me speak, 65
 Before you answer Warwick. His demand
 Springs not from Edward's well-meant honest love,
 But from deceit, bred by necessity;
 For how can tyrants^o safely govern home,
 Unless abroad they purchase^o great alliance? 70

To prove him tyrant this reason may suffice,
That Henry liveth still; but were he dead,
Yet here Prince Edward stands, King Henry's son.
Look, therefore, Lewis, that by this league and marriage

Thou draw not on thy danger and dishonor;
For though usurpers sway the rule awhile,
Yet heavens are just, and time suppresseth wrongs.

WARWICK

Injurious Margaret!

PRINCE And why not queen?

WARWICK

Because thy father Henry did usurp;
And thou no more art prince than she is queen.

OXFORD

Then Warwick disannuls^o great John of Gaunt,
Which did subdue the greatest part of Spain;
And, after John of Gaunt, Henry the Fourth,
Whose wisdom was a mirror^o to the wisest;
And, after that wise prince, Henry the Fifth,
Who by his prowess conquerèd all France:
From these our Henry lineally descends.

WARWICK

Oxford, how haps it, in this smooth discourse,
You told not how Henry the Sixth hath lost
All that which Henry the Fifth had gotten?
Methinks these peers of France should smile at that.
But for the rest: you tell^o a pedigree
Of threescore and two years—a silly^o time
To make prescription^o for a kingdom's worth.

OXFORD

Why, Warwick, canst thou speak against thy liege,
Whom thou obeyèd'st thirty and six years,
And not bewray^o thy treason with a blush?

WARWICK

Can Oxford, that did ever fence^o the right,
Now buckler^o falsehood with a pedigree?
For shame! leave Henry, and call Edward king.

OXFORD

Call him my king by whose injurious doom^o
My elder brother, the Lord Aubrey Vere,
Was done to death? and more than so, my father,
Even in the downfall of his mellowed years,
When nature brought him to the door of death?
No, Warwick, no; while life upholds this arm,
This arm upholds the house of Lancaster.

WARWICK

And I the house of York.

KING LEWIS

Queen Margaret, Prince Edward, and Oxford,
Vouchsafe, at our request, to stand aside,
While I use further conference with Warwick.

They stand aloof.

QUEEN MARGARET

Heavens grant that Warwick's words bewitch him not!

To link with him that were not lawful chosen. 115

WARWICK

Thereon I pawn my credit and mine honor.

KING LEWIS

75 But is he gracious^o in the people's eye?

WARWICK

The more that Henry was unfortunate.

KING LEWIS

Then, further, all dissembling set aside,
Tell me for truth the measure of his love 120
Unto our sister Bona.

WARWICK

80 Such it seems
As may beseem a monarch like himself.

Myself have often heard him say and swear

That this his love was an eternal plant,
Whereof the root was fixed in virtue's ground, 125
The leaves and fruit maintained with beauty's sun,
Exempt from envy, but not from disdain,
Unless the Lady Bona quit^o his pain.

KING LEWIS

Now, sister, let us hear your firm resolve.

BONA

Your grant, or your denial, shall be mine: 130
Yet I confess that often ere this day

(Speaks to WARWICK.)

When I have heard your king's desert recounted,
Mine ear hath tempted judgment to desire.

KING LEWIS

Then, Warwick, thus: our sister shall be Edward's;
And now forthwith shall articles be drawn 135
Touching the jointure^o that your king must make,
Which with her dowry shall be counterpoised.
Draw near, Queen Margaret, and be a witness
That Bona shall be wife to the English king.

PRINCE

100 To Edward, but not to the English king. 140

QUEEN MARGARET

Deceitful Warwick! it was thy device
By this alliance to make void my suit:
Before thy coming Lewis was Henry's friend.

KING LEWIS

105 And still is friend to him and Margaret:
But if your title to the crown be weak, 145
As may appear by Edward's good success,
Then 'tis but reason that I be released
From giving aid which late I promisèd.
Yet shall you have all kindness at my hand
That your estate requires and mine can yield. 150

110 WARWICK

Henry now lives in Scotland at his ease,
Where having nothing, nothing can he lose.
And as for you yourself, our quondam^o queen,
You have a father able to maintain you,
And better 'twere you troubled him than France. 155

QUEEN MARGARET

I will not hence, till with my talk and tears

(Both full of truth) I make King Lewis behold
Thy sly conveyance° and thy lord's false love;
For both of you are birds of selfsame feather.

POST blowing a horn within.

KING LEWIS

Warwick, this is some post to us or thee.

Enter the POST.

POST (Speaks to WARWICK.)

My Lord Ambassador, these letters are for you,
Sent from your brother, Marquess Montague;

(To LEWIS.)

These from our king unto your majesty;

(To MARGARET.)

And, madam, these for you; from whom I know not.

They all read their letters.

OXFORD

I like it well that our fair queen and mistress
Smiles at her news, while Warwick frowns at his.

PRINCE

Nay, mark how Lewis stamps, as he were nettled.
I hope all's for the best.

KING LEWIS

Warwick, what are thy news? and yours, fair queen?

QUEEN MARGARET

Mine, such as fill my heart with unhopèd joys.

WARWICK

Mine, full of sorrow and heart's discontent.

KING LEWIS

What! has your king married the Lady Grey?
And now, to soothe your forgery and his,
Sends me a paper to persuade me patience?
Is this th' alliance that he seeks with France?
Dare he presume to scorn us in this manner?

QUEEN MARGARET

I told your majesty as much before:

This proveth Edward's love and Warwick's honesty! 180

WARWICK

King Lewis, I here protest, in sight of heaven,
And by the hope I have of heavenly bliss,
That I am clear from this misdeed of Edward's,
No more my king, for he dishonors me,
But most himself, if he could see his shame.
Did I forget that by the house of York
My father came untimely to his death?
Did I let pass th' abuse done to my niece?
Did I impale° him with the regal crown?
Did I put Henry from his native right?
And am I guerdoned° at the last with shame?
Shame on himself! for my desert is honor:
And to repair my honor lost for him,
I here renounce him and return to Henry.
My noble queen, let former grudges pass,
And henceforth I am thy true servitor:
I will revenge his wrong to Lady Bona
And replant Henry in his former state.

160 conveyance (1) transfer of property (here, Lewis' promise of aid) (2) trickery 189 impale encircle 191 guerdoned rewarded

QUEEN MARGARET

160 Warwick, these words have turned my hate to love;
And I forgive and quite forget old faults, 200
And joy that thou becom'st King Henry's friend.

WARWICK

So much his friend, ay, his unfeignèd friend,
That, if King Lewis vouchsafe to furnish us
With some few bands of chosen soldiers,
I'll undertake to land them on our coast 205
And force the tyrant from his seat by war.
'Tis not his new-made bride shall succor him:
And as for Clarence, as my letters tell me,
He's very likely now to fall from him,
For matching° more for wanton lust than honor, 210
Or than for strength and safety of our country.

BONA

Dear brother, how shall Bona be revenged
But by thy help to this distressèd queen?

QUEEN MARGARET

Renownèd prince, how shall poor Henry live,
Unless thou rescue him from foul despair? 215

BONA

My quarrel and this English queen's are one.

WARWICK

And mine, fair Lady Bona, joins with yours.

170 KING LEWIS

And mine with hers, and thine, and Margaret's.
Therefore at last I firmly am resolved
You shall have aid. 220

QUEEN MARGARET

Let me give humble thanks for all at once.

KING LEWIS

Then, England's messenger, return in post,°
And tell false Edward, thy supposed king,
175 That Lewis of France is sending over masquers°
To revel it with him and his new bride: 225
Thou see'st what's passed, go fear° thy king withal.

BONA

Tell him, in hope he'll prove a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland° for his sake.

180 QUEEN MARGARET

Tell him, my mourning weeds° are laid aside,
And I am ready to put armor on. 230

WARWICK

Tell him from me that he hath done me wrong,
And therefore I'll uncrown him ere't be long.
185 There's thy reward. Be gone. Exit POST.

KING LEWIS

But, Warwick,
Thou and Oxford, with five thousand men,
Shall cross the seas, and bid false Edward battle; 235
And, as occasion serves,° this noble queen
And prince shall follow with a fresh supply.
Yet, ere thou go, but answer me one doubt,
What pledge have we of thy firm loyalty?

WARWICK

This shall assure my constant loyalty, 240
That if our queen and this young prince agree,
I'll join mine eldest daughter and my joy
To him forthwith in holy wedlock bands.

210 matching marrying 222 post haste 224 masquers performers 226 fear frighten 228 willow garland sign of disappointed love 229 weeds garments 236 serves is opportune

QUEEN MARGARET

Yes, I agree, and thank you for your motion.^o
 Son Edward, she is fair and virtuous,
 Therefore delay not, give thy hand to Warwick;
 And, with thy hand, thy faith irrevocable,
 That only Warwick's daughter shall be thine.

PRINCE

Yes, I accept her, for she well deserves it;
 And here, to pledge my vow, I give my hand.

He gives his hand to WARWICK.

KING LEWIS

Why stay we now? These soldiers shall be levied,
 And thou, Lord Bourbon, our high admiral,
 Shall waft them over with our royal fleet.
 I long till Edward fall^o by war's mischance,
 For mocking marriage with a dame of France. 255
Exeunt. Manet^o WARWICK.

WARWICK

I came from Edward as ambassador,
 But I return his sworn and mortal foe:
 Matter of marriage was the charge he gave me,
 But dreadful war shall answer his demand.^o
 Had he none else to make a stale^o but me? 260
 Then none but I shall turn his jest to sorrow.
 I was the chief that raised him to the crown,
 And I'll be chief to bring him down again;
 Not that I pity Henry's misery,
 But seek revenge on Edward's mockery. Exit. 265

[A C T I V]

[Scene I. London. The palace.]

Enter RICHARD, CLARENCE, SOMERSET, and MONTAGUE.

RICHARD

Now tell me, brother Clarence, what think you
 Of this new marriage with the Lady Grey?
 Hath not our brother made a worthy choice?

CLARENCE

Alas, you know 'tis far from hence to France!
 How could he stay till Warwick made return? 5

SOMERSET

My lords, forbear this talk; here comes the king.

RICHARD

And his well-chosen bride.

CLARENCE

I mind to tell him plainly what I think.

Flourish. Enter KING EDWARD, Lady Grey [as QUEEN],
 PEMBROKE, STAFFORD, HASTINGS, [and others].
Four stand on one side and four on the other.

KING EDWARD

Now, brother of Clarence, how like you our choice,
 That you stand pensive, as half malcontent?^o 10

244 motion offer 254 long . . . fall am impatient for Edward to fall 255 s.d. Manet remains 259 demand request
 260 stale (1) dupe (2) tool
 IV.i.10 malcontent discontented, dissatisfied

CLARENCE

As well as Lewis of France, or the Earl of Warwick,
 Which are so weak of courage and in judgment
 That they'll take no offense at our abuse.^o 245

KING EDWARD

Suppose they take offense without a cause:
 They are but Lewis and Warwick; I am Edward, 15
 Your king and Warwick's, and must have my will.

250 RICHARD

And shall have your will, because our king.
 Yet hasty marriage seldom proveth well.

KING EDWARD

Yea, brother Richard, are you offended too?

RICHARD

Not I. 20
 No, God forbid that I should wish them severed
 Whom God hath joined together; ay, and 'twere pity
 To sunder them that yoke so well together.

KING EDWARD

Setting your scorns and your mislike aside,
 Tell me some reason why the Lady Grey 25
 Should not become my wife and England's queen.
 And you too, Somerset and Montague,
 Speak freely what you think.

CLARENCE

Then this is mine opinion, that King Lewis
 Becomes your enemy for mocking him 30
 About the marriage of the Lady Bona.

RICHARD

And Warwick, doing what you gave in charge,
 Is now dishonorèd by this new marriage.

KING EDWARD

What if both Lewis and Warwick be appeased
 By such invention as I can devise? 35

MONTAGUE

Yet, to have joined with France in such alliance
 Would more have strengthened this our commonwealth
 'Gainst foreign storms than any homebred marriage.

HASTINGS

Why, knows not Montague that of itself
 England is safe, if true within itself? 40

MONTAGUE

But the safer when 'tis backed with France.

HASTINGS

'Tis better using France than trusting France:
 Let us be backed with God and with the seas
 Which He hath given for fence impregnable,
 And with their helps only^o defend ourselves; 45
 In them and in ourselves our safety lies.

CLARENCE

For this one speech Lord Hastings well deserves
 To have the heir of the Lord Hungerford.

KING EDWARD

Ay, what of that? It was my will and grant;
 And for this once my will shall stand for law. 50

RICHARD

And yet methinks your grace hath done not well,
 To give the heir and daughter of Lord Scales
 Unto the brother of your loving bride.
 She better would have fitted me or Clarence;
 But in your bride you bury brotherhood. 55

13 abuse deceit 45 only alone

CLARENCE

Or else you would not have bestowed the heir
Of the Lord Bonville on your new wife's son,
And leave your brothers to go speed^o elsewhere.

KING EDWARD

Alas, poor Clarence! Is it for a wife
That thou art malcontent? I will provide thee.

60

CLARENCE

In choosing for yourself, you showed your judgment,
Which being shallow, you shall give me leave
To play the broker^o in mine own behalf;
And to that end I shortly mind to leave you.

KING EDWARD

Leave me or tarry, Edward will be king,
And not be tied unto his brother's will.

65

QUEEN ELIZABETH

My lords, before it pleased his majesty
To raise my state to title of a queen,
Do me but right, and you must all confess
That I was not ignoble of descent;
And meaner^o than myself have had like fortune.
But as this title honors me and mine,
So your dislikes, to whom I would be pleasing,
Doth cloud my joys with danger and with sorrow.

70

KING EDWARD

My love, forbear to fawn upon their frowns.
What danger or what sorrow can befall thee,
So long as Edward is thy constant friend
And their true sovereign, whom they must obey?
Nay, whom they shall obey, and love thee too,
Unless they seek for hatred at my hands;
Which if they do, yet will I keep thee safe,
And they shall feel the vengeance of my wrath.

75

RICHARD [Aside.]

I hear, yet say not much, but think the more.

Enter a POST.

KING EDWARD

Now, messenger, what letters or what news
From France?

POST

My sovereign liege, no letters; and few words,
But such as I, without your special pardon,^o
Dare not relate.

KING EDWARD

Go to,^o we pardon thee. Therefore, in brief,
Tell me their words as near as thou canst guess them.
What answer makes King Lewis unto our letters?

POST

At my depart, these were his very words:
"Go tell false Edward, thy supposed king,
That Lewis of France is sending over masquers
To revel it with him and his new bride."

95

KING EDWARD

Is Lewis so brave?^o Belike he thinks me Henry.
But what said Lady Bona to my marriage?

POST

These were her words, uttered with mild disdain:
"Tell him, in hope he'll prove a widower shortly,
I'll wear the willow garland for his sake."

100

KING EDWARD

I blame not her, she could say little less;
She had the wrong. But what said Henry's queen?
For I have heard that she was there in place.

POST

"Tell him," quoth she, "my mourning weeds are done,
And I am ready to put armor on."

105

KING EDWARD

Belike she minds to play the Amazon.
But what said Warwick to these injuries?^o

POST

He, more incensed against your majesty
Than all the rest, discharged me with these words:
"Tell him from me that he hath done me wrong,
And therefore I'll uncrown him ere't be long."

110

KING EDWARD

Ha! durst the traitor breathe out so proud words?
Well, I will arm me, being thus forewarned.
They shall have wars and pay for their presumption.
But say, is Warwick friends with Margaret?

POST

Ay, gracious sovereign. They are so linked in friendship
That young Prince Edward marries Warwick's daughter.

CLARENCE

Belike^o the elder; Clarence will have the younger.
Now, brother king, farewell, and sit you fast,
For I will hence to Warwick's other daughter,
That, though I want^o a kingdom, yet in marriage
I may not prove inferior to yourself.
You that love me and Warwick, follow me.

120

Exit CLARENCE, and SOMERSET follows.

RICHARD [Aside.]

Not I:
My thoughts aim at a further matter. I
Stay not for the love of Edward, but the crown.

125

KING EDWARD

Clarence and Somerset both gone to Warwick!
Yet am I armed against the worst can happen;
And haste is needful in this desp'rate case.
Pembroke and Stafford, you in our behalf
Go levy men, and make prepare for war.
They are already, or quickly will be, landed.
Myself in person will straight follow you.

130

Exeunt PEMBROKE and STAFFORD.

But, ere I go, Hastings and Montague,
Resolve my doubt. You twain, of all the rest,
Are near to Warwick by blood and by alliance.
Tell me if you love Warwick more than me.
If it be so, then both depart to him;
I rather wish you foes than hollow friends.
But if you mind to hold your true obedience,
Give me assurance with some friendly vow,
That I may never have you in suspect.

135

140

MONTAGUE

So God help Montague as he proves true!

HASTINGS

And Hastings as he favors Edward's cause!

KING EDWARD

Now, brother Richard, will you stand by us?

145

71 meaner persons of lower rank 87 pardon permission 89
Go to exclamation of impatience 96 brave defiant

107 injuries insults 118 Belike probably 121 want lack

RICHARD

Ay, in despite of all that shall withstand you.

KING EDWARD

Why, so! then am I sure of victory.

Now therefore let us hence, and lose no hour,
Till we meet Warwick with his foreign pow'r.

Exeunt.

[Scene II. A plain in Warwickshire.]

Enter WARWICK and OXFORD in England, with French SOLDIERS.

WARWICK

Trust me, my lord, all hitherto° goes well;
The common people by numbers swarm to us.

Enter CLARENCE and SOMERSET.

But see where Somerset and Clarence comes!
Speak suddenly,° my lords, are we all friends?

CLARENCE

Fear not that,° my lord.

WARWICK

Then, gentle Clarence, welcome unto Warwick;
And welcome, Somerset: I hold it cowardice
To rest° mistrustful where a noble heart
Hath pawned° an open hand in sign of love.
Else might I think that Clarence, Edward's brother, 10
Were but a feignèd friend to our proceedings:
But welcome, sweet Clarence; my daughter shall be thine.

And now what rests but, in night's coverture,°
Thy brother being carelessly encamped,
His soldiers lurking in the towns about, 15
And but attended by a simple guard,
We may surprise and take him at our pleasure?
Our scouts have found the adventure very easy:
That as Ulysses and stout° Diomedes
With sleight° and manhood stole to Rhesus' tents, 20
And brought from thence the Thracian fatal steeds,°
So we, well covered with the night's black mantle,
At unawares may beat down Edward's guard
And seize himself. I say not, slaughter him,
For I intend but only to surprise him. 25
You that will follow me to this attempt,
Applaud the name of Henry with your leader.

They all cry, "Henry!"

Why, then, let's on our way in silent sort.°
For Warwick and his friends, God and Saint George!
Exeunt.

[Scene III. Edward's camp, near Warwick.]

Enter three WATCHMEN, to guard the king's tent.

FIRST WATCHMAN

Come on, my masters, each man take his stand.
The king by this° is set him down to sleep.

SECOND WATCHMAN

What, will he not to bed?

FIRST WATCHMAN

Why, no; for he hath made a solemn vow
Never to lie and take his natural rest 5
Till Warwick or himself be quite suppressed.

SECOND WATCHMAN

Tomorrow then belike shall be the day,
If Warwick be so near as men report.

THIRD WATCHMAN

But say, I pray, what nobleman is that
That with the king here resteth in his tent? 10

FIRST WATCHMAN

'Tis the Lord Hastings, the king's chiefest friend.

THIRD WATCHMAN

O, is it so? But why commands the king
That his chief followers lodge in towns about him,
While he himself keeps° in the cold field?

SECOND WATCHMAN

'Tis the more honor, because more dangerous. 15

THIRD WATCHMAN

Ay, but give me worship° and quietness;
I like it better than a dangerous honor.
If Warwick knew in what estate he° stands,
'Tis to be doubted° he would waken him.

FIRST WATCHMAN

Unless our halberds° did shut up his passage. 20

SECOND WATCHMAN

Ay, wherefore else guard we his royal tent,
But to defend his person from night foes?

Enter WARWICK, CLARENCE, OXFORD, SOMERSET, and French SOLDIERS, silent all.

WARWICK

This is his tent; and see where stand his guard.
Courage, my masters! honor now or never!
But follow me, and Edward shall be ours. 25

FIRST WATCHMAN

Who goes there?

SECOND WATCHMAN

Stay, or thou diest!

WARWICK and the rest cry all, "Warwick! Warwick!"
and set upon the GUARD, who fly, crying, "Arm! arm!",
WARWICK and the rest following them.

The drum playing and trumpet sounding, enter WARWICK, SOMERSET, and the rest, bringing the KING out in his gown, sitting in a chair. RICHARD and HASTINGS flies over the stage.

SOMERSET

What are they that fly there?

WARWICK

Richard and Hastings. Let them go. Here is the duke.

KING EDWARD

The duke! Why, Warwick, when we parted,
Thou call'dst me king.

WARWICK

Ay, but the case is altered:

When you disgraced me in my embassy,^o
Then I degraded you from being king,
And come now to create you Duke of York.
Alas, how should you govern any kingdom,
That know not how to use ambassadors,
Nor how to be contented with one wife,
Nor how to use your brothers brotherly,
Nor how to study for the people's welfare,
Nor how to shroud yourself from enemies?

KING EDWARD

Yea, brother of Clarence, art thou here too?
Nay, then I see that Edward needs must down.
Yet, Warwick, in despite of all mischance,
Of thee thyself and all thy complices,
Edward will always bear himself as king:
Though Fortune's malice overthrow my state,^o
My mind exceeds the compass^o of her wheel.

WARWICK

Then, for his mind,^o be Edward England's king:Takes off his crown.

But Henry now shall wear the English crown,
And be true king indeed, thou but the shadow.
My Lord of Somerset, at my request,
See that forthwith Duke Edward be conveyed Unto my brother, Archbishop of York.
When I have fought with Pembroke and his fellows,
I'll follow you, and tell what answer
Lewis and the Lady Bona send to him.
Now, for a while farewell, good Duke of York.
They lead him out forcibly.

KING EDWARD

What fates impose, that men must needs abide;
It boots not to resist both wind and tide. Exeunt.

OXFORD

What now remains, my lords, for us to do
But march to London with our soldiers?

WARWICK

Ay, that's the first thing that we have to do,
To free King Henry from imprisonment
And see him seated in the regal throne. Exeunt.

RIVERS

Madam, what makes you in this sudden change?^o

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Why, brother Rivers, are you yet to learn
What late misfortune is befall'n King Edward?

RIVERS

What, loss of some pitched battle against Warwick?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

No, but the loss of his own royal person.

RIVERS

Then is my sovereign slain?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ay, almost slain, for he is taken prisoner,
Either betrayed by falsehood^o of his guard
Or by his foe surprised at^o unawares;
And, as I further have to understand,
Is new committed to the Bishop of York,
Fell Warwick's brother and by that our foe.

RIVERS

These news, I must confess, are full of grief;
Yet, gracious madam, bear it as you may:
Warwick may lose, that now hath won the day.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Till then fair hope must hinder life's decay.
And I the rather wean me from despair
For love of Edward's offspring in my womb.
This is it that makes me bridle passion
And bear with mildness my misfortune's cross.
Ay, ay, for this I draw in many a tear
And stop the rising of bloodsucking sighs,
Lest with my sighs or tears I blast or drown
King Edward's fruit, true heir to th' English crown.

RIVERS

But, madam, where is Warwick then become?^o

QUEEN ELIZABETH

I am informèd that he comes towards London,
To set the crown once more on Henry's head.
Guess thou the rest; King Edward's friends must down.
But, to prevent^o the tyrant's violence—
For trust not him that hath once broken faith—
I'll hence forthwith unto the sanctuary,
To save at least the heir of Edward's right.
There shall I rest secure from force and fraud.
Come, therefore, let us fly while we may fly.
If Warwick take us we are sure to die. Exeunt.

[Scene V. A park near Middleham Castle in Yorkshire.]Enter RICHARD, Lord HASTINGS, and Sir William STANLEY.

RICHARD

Now, my Lord Hastings and Sir William Stanley,
Leave off to wonder why I drew you hither,
Into this chiefest thicket of the park.
Thus stands the case: you know our king, my brother,
Is prisoner to the bishop here, at whose hands
He hath good usage and great liberty,
And often but attended with weak guard,
Comes hunting this way to disport himself.
I have advertised^o him by secret means
That if about this hour he make this way
Under the color^o of his usual game,
He shall here find his friends with horse and men
To set him free from his captivity.

Enter KING EDWARD and a HUNTSMAN with him.

KING EDWARD

Nay, this way, man! See where the huntsmen stand. 15

Now, brother of Gloucester, Lord Hastings, and the rest,

Stand you thus close,° to steal the bishop's deer?

RICHARD

Brother, the time and case requireth haste:

Your horse stands ready at the park corner.

KING EDWARD

But whither shall we then?

HASTINGS

To Lynn, my lord,

20

And ship from thence to Flanders.

RICHARD

Well guessed, believe me; for that was my meaning.

KING EDWARD

Stanley, I will requite thy forwardness.°

RICHARD

But wherefore stay° we? 'tis no time to talk.

KING EDWARD

Huntsman, what say'st thou? wilt thou go along? 25

HUNTSMAN

Better do so than tarry and be hanged.

RICHARD

Come then, away; let's ha' no more ado.

KING EDWARD

Bishop, farewell. Shield thee from Warwick's frown

And pray that I may repossess the crown. Exeunt.

[Scene VI. London. The Tower.]

Flourish. Enter KING HENRY the Sixth, CLARENCE, WARWICK, SOMERSET, young Henry [Earl of RICHMOND], OXFORD, MONTAGUE, and LIEUTENANT [of the Tower].

KING HENRY

Master Lieutenant, now that God and friends

Have shaken Edward from the regal seat

And turned my captive state to liberty,

My fear to hope, my sorrows unto joys,

At our enlargement° what are thy due fees? 5

LIEUTENANT

Subjects may challenge° nothing of their sovereigns;

But, if an humble prayer may prevail,

I then crave pardon of your majesty.

KING HENRY

For what, lieutenant? for well using me?

Nay, be thou sure I'll well requite thy kindness 10

For that it made my imprisonment a pleasure;

Ay, such a pleasure as incaged birds

Conceive when after many moody thoughts

At last by notes of household harmony

They quite forget their loss of liberty. 15

But, Warwick, after God, thou set'st me free,

And chiefly therefore I thank God and thee;

He was the author, thou the instrument.

Therefore, that I may conquer fortune's spite

By living low,° where fortune cannot hurt me, 20

And that the people of this blessed land

May not be punished with my thwarting stars,°

Warwick, although my head still wear the crown,

I here resign my government to thee,

For thou art fortunate in all thy deeds. 25

WARWICK

Your grace hath still° been famed for° virtuous;

And now may seem as wise as virtuous,

By spying and avoiding fortune's malice,

For few men rightly temper° with the stars:

Yet in this one thing let me blame your grace, 30

For choosing me when Clarence is in place.°

CLARENCE

No, Warwick, thou art worthy of the sway,°

To whom the heavens in thy nativity°

Adjudged an olive branch and laurel crown,

As likely to be blest in peace and war; 35

And therefore I yield thee my free consent.

WARWICK

And I choose Clarence only for protector.

KING HENRY

Warwick and Clarence, give me both your hands:

Now join your hands, and with your hands your hearts,

That no dissension hinder government: 40

I make you both protectors of this land,

While I myself will lead a private life,

And in devotion spend my latter days,

To sin's rebuke and my Creator's praise.

WARWICK

What answers Clarence to his sovereign's will? 45

CLARENCE

That he consents, if Warwick yield consent,

For on thy fortune I repose myself.°

WARWICK

Why, then, though loath, yet must I be content:

We'll yoke together, like a double shadow 50

To Henry's body, and supply his place;

I mean, in bearing weight of government,

While he enjoys the honor and his ease.

And, Clarence, now then it is more than needful

Forthwith that Edward be pronounced a traitor,

And all his lands and goods be confiscate. 55

CLARENCE

What else? And that succession be determined.

WARWICK

Ay, therein Clarence shall not want his part.°

KING HENRY

But, with the first of all your chief affairs,

Let me entreat (for I command no more)

That Margaret your queen and my son Edward 60

Be sent for, to return from France with speed;

For, till I see them here, by doubtful fear

My joy of liberty is half eclipsed. 15

It shall be done, my sovereign, with all speed.

KING HENRY

My Lord of Somerset, what youth is that, 65
Of whom you seem to have so tender care?

SOMERSET

My liege, it is young Henry, Earl of Richmond.

KING HENRY

Come hither, England's hope. (Lays his hand on his head.) If secret powers

Suggest but truth to my divining thoughts, 70
This pretty lad will prove our country's bliss.
His looks are full of peaceful majesty,
His head by nature framed to wear a crown,
His hand to wield a scepter, and himself
Likely in time to bless a regal throne.
Make much of him, my lords, for this is he 75
Must help you more than you are hurt by me.

Enter a POST.

WARWICK

What news, my friend?

POST

That Edward is escapèd from your brother,
And fled, as he hears since, to Burgundy.

WARWICK

Unsavory news! but how made he escape? 80

POST

He was conveyed° by Richard Duke of Gloucester
And the Lord Hastings, who attendèd° him
In secret ambush on the forest side
And from the bishop's huntsmen rescued him;
For hunting was his daily exercise. 85

WARWICK

My brother was too careless of his charge.
But let us hence, my sovereign, to provide
A salve for any sore that may betide.

Exeunt. Manet° SOMERSET, RICHMOND, and OXFORD.

SOMERSET

My lord, I like not of this flight of Edward's, 90
For doubtless Burgundy will yield him help,
And we shall have more wars before't be long.
As Henry's late presaging prophecy
Did glad my heart with hope of this young Richmond,
So doth my heart misgive me, in these conflicts
What may befall him, to his harm and ours: 95
Therefore, Lord Oxford, to prevent the worst,
Forthwith we'll send him hence to Brittany,
Till storms be past of civil enmity.

OXFORD

Ay, for if Edward repossess the crown, 100
'Tis like that Richmond with the rest shall down.

SOMERSET

It shall be so; he shall to Brittany.
Come, therefore, let's about it speedily. Exeunt.

[Scene VII. Before York.]

Flourish. Enter [KING] EDWARD, RICHARD, HASTINGS, and SOLDIERS.

KING EDWARD

Now, brother Richard, Lord Hastings, and the rest,
Yet thus far Fortune maketh us amends,
And says that once more I shall interchange
My wanèd state for Henry's regal crown. 5
Well have we passèd and now repassèd the seas
And brought desirèd help from Burgundy.
What then remains, we being thus arrived
From Ravenspurgh haven before the gates of York,
But that we enter, as into our dukedom?

RICHARD

The gates made fast! Brother, I like not this. 10
For many men that stumble at the threshold
Are well foretold that danger lurks within.

KING EDWARD

Tush, man, abodements° must not now affright us:
By fair or foul means we must enter in,
For hither will our friends repair° to us. 15

HASTINGS

My liege, I'll knock once more to summon them.

Enter, on the walls, the MAYOR of York and his BRETHREN.

MAYOR

My lords, we were forewarnèd of your coming,
And shut the gates for safety of ourselves;
For now we owe allegiance unto Henry. 85

KING EDWARD

But, Master Mayor, if Henry be your king, 20
Yet Edward at the least is Duke of York.

MAYOR

True, my good lord; I know you for no less.

KING EDWARD

Why, and I challenge nothing but my dukedom,
As being well content with that alone.

RICHARD

But when the fox hath once got in his nose, 25
He'll soon find means to make the body follow.

HASTINGS

Why, Master Mayor, why stand you in a doubt?
Open the gates; we are King Henry's friends. 95

MAYOR

Ay, say you so? the gates shall then be opened.
He descends [with the ALDERMEN].

RICHARD

A wise stout° captain, and soon persuaded! 30

HASTINGS

The good old man would fain that all were well,
So 'twere not long of° him; but being entered,
I doubt not, I, but we shall soon persuade
Both him and all his brothers unto reason.

Enter the MAYOR and two ALDERMEN [below].

KING EDWARD

So, Master Mayor: these gates must not be shut 35
But in the night or in the time of war.

And all those friends that deign to follow me.

March. Enter MONTGOMERY, with DRUM[MER] and SOLDIERS.

RICHARD

Brother, this is Sir John Montgomery,
Our trusty friend, unless I be deceived.

KING EDWARD

Welcome, Sir John! But why come you in arms?

MONTGOMERY

To help King Edward in his time of storm,
As every loyal subject ought to do.

KING EDWARD

Thanks, good Montgomery. But we now forget
Our title to the crown and only claim
Our dukedom till God please to send the rest.

MONTGOMERY

Then fare you well, for I will hence again:
I came to serve a king and not a duke.

Drummer, strike up, and let us march away.

The DRUM[MER] begins to march.

KING EDWARD

Nay, stay, Sir John, awhile, and we'll debate
By what safe means the crown may be recovered.

MONTGOMERY

What talk you of debating? in few words,
If you'll not here proclaim yourself our king,
I'll leave you to your fortune and be gone
To keep them back that come to succor you.
Why shall we fight, if you pretend° no title?

RICHARD

Why, brother, wherefore stand you on nice points?°

KING EDWARD

When we grow stronger, then we'll make our claim;
Till then, 'tis wisdom to conceal our meaning.

HASTINGS

Away with scrupulous wit! Now arms must rule.

RICHARD

And fearless minds climb soonest unto crowns.
Brother, we will proclaim you out of hand;
The bruit° thereof will bring you many friends.

KING EDWARD

Then be it as you will; for 'tis my right,
And Henry but usurps the diadem.

MONTGOMERY

Ay, now my sovereign speaketh like himself;
And now will I be Edward's champion.

HASTINGS

Sound trumpet; Edward shall be here proclaimed.
Come, fellow-soldier, make thou proclamation.

Flourish. Sound.

SOLDIER Edward the Fourth, by the grace of God,
King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, etc.°

MONTGOMERY

And whosoe'er gainsays King Edward's right,
By this I challenge him to single fight.

Throws down his gauntlet.

ALL

Long live Edward the Fourth!

KING EDWARD

Thanks, brave Montgomery; and thanks unto you
all:

If fortune serves me, I'll requite this kindness.
Now, for this night, let's harbor here in York;
And when the morning sun shall raise his car°
Above the border of this horizon,

We'll forward towards Warwick and his mates;
For well I wot° that Henry is no soldier.

Ah, froward° Clarence! how evil it beseems thee,
To flatter Henry and forsake thy brother!

Yet, as we may, we'll meet both thee and Warwick.
Come on, brave soldiers. Doubt not of the day,

And, that once gotten, doubt not of large pay.

Exeunt.

[Scene VIII. London.

The Bishop of London's palace.]

Flourish. Enter the KING [HENRY], WARWICK, MONTAGUE, CLARENCE, OXFORD, and EXETER.

WARWICK

What counsel, lords? Edward from Belgia,
With hasty Germans and blunt° Hollanders,
Hath passed in safety through the Narrow Seas,
And with his troops doth march amain° to London;
And many giddy people flock to him.

KING HENRY

Let's levy men, and beat him back again.

CLARENCE

A little fire is quickly trodden out;
Which, being suffered,° rivers cannot quench.

WARWICK

In Warwickshire I have true-hearted friends,
Not mutinous in peace, yet bold in war;
Those will I muster up: and thou, son Clarence,
Shalt stir up in Suffolk, Norfolk and in Kent,
The knights and gentlemen to come with thee.
Thou, brother Montague, in Buckingham,
Northampton, and in Leicestershire shalt find
Men well inclined to hear what thou command'st.
And thou, brave Oxford, wondrous well beloved,
In Oxfordshire shalt muster up thy friends.
My sovereign, with the loving citizens,
Like to his island girt in with the ocean,
Or modest Dian° circled with her nymphs,
Shall rest in London till we come to him.
Fair lords, take leave and stand not to reply.
Farewell, my sovereign.

KING HENRY

And all at once, once more a happy farewell.

WARWICK

Farewell, sweet lords; let's meet at Coventry.
Exeunt [all but KING HENRY and EXETER].

KING HENRY

Here at the palace will I rest awhile.
Cousin of Exeter, what thinks your lordship?
Methinks the power that Edward hath in field
Should not be able to encounter mine.

EXETER

The doubt° is that he will seduce the rest.

KING HENRY

That's not my fear. My meed° hath got me fame.
I have not stopped mine ears to their demands,
Nor posted off° their suits with slow delays.
My pity hath been balm to heal their wounds,
My mildness hath allayed their swelling griefs,
My mercy dried their water-flowing tears.
I have not been desirous of their wealth

And once again proclaim us King of England.

*Enter WARWICK, the MAYOR of Coventry, two

WARWICK

Where is the post that came from valiant Oxford?
How far hence is thy lord, mine honest fellow?

FIRST MESSENGER

By this° at Dunsmore, marching hitherward.

WARWICK

Where is the post that came from Montague?

SECOND MESSENGER

By this° at Daintry, with a puissant troop.

Enter [Sir John] SOMERVILLE.

WARWICK

Say, Somerville, what says my loving son?
And, by thy guess, how nigh is Clarence now?

SOMERVILLE

At Southam I did leave him with his forces,
And do expect him here some two hours hence.[Drum heard.]

WARWICK

Then Clarence is at hand; I hear his drum.

SOMERVILLE

It is not his, my lord. Here Southam lies.
The drum your honor hears marcheth from Warwick.

WARWICK

Who should that be? Belike, unlooked-for friends.

SOMERVILLE

They are at hand, and you shall quickly know.

March. Flourish. Enter [KING] EDWARD, RICHARD, and SOLDIERS.

KING EDWARD

Go, trumpet,° to the walls, and sound a parle.

RICHARD

See how the surly Warwick mans the wall!

WARWICK

O unbid spite! Is sportful° Edward come?
Where slept our scouts, or how are they seduced,
That we could hear no news of his repair?

KING EDWARD

Now, Warwick, wilt thou ope the city gates,
Speak gentle words, and humbly bend thy knee,
Call Edward king, and at his hands beg mercy?
And he shall pardon thee these outrages.

WARWICK

Nay, rather, wilt thou draw thy forces hence,
Confess who set thee up and plucked thee down,
Call Warwick patron, and be penitent?
And thou shalt still remain the Duke of York.

RICHARD

I thought, at least, he would have said "the king";
Or did he make the jest against his will?

V.i.3,6 By this by this time 16 trumpet trumpeter 18

WARWICK

Is not a dukedom, sir, a goodly gift?

RICHARD

Ay, by my faith, for a poor earl to give!
I'll do thee service for so good a gift.

WARWICK

'Twas I that gave the kingdom to thy brother.

KING EDWARD

Why then 'tis mine, if but by Warwick's gift.

WARWICK

Thou art no Atlas for so great a weight;
And, weakling, Warwick takes his gift again,
And Henry is my king, Warwick his subject.

KING EDWARD

But Warwick's king is Edward's prisoner;
And, gallant Warwick, do but answer this:
What is the body when the head is off?

RICHARD

Alas, that Warwick had no more forecast,^o
But, whiles he thought to steal the single ten,^o
The king was slyly fingered from the deck!
You left poor Henry at the bishop's palace,
And ten to one you'll meet him in the Tower.

KING EDWARD

'Tis even so. Yet you are Warwick still.

RICHARD

Come, Warwick, take the time.^o Kneel down, kneel down!Nay, when?^o Strike^o now, or else the iron cools.

WARWICK

I had rather chop this hand off at a blow,
And with the other fling it at thy face,
Than bear so low a sail to strike to thee.^o

KING EDWARD

Sail how thou canst, have wind and tide thy friend,
This hand, fast wound about thy coal black hair,
Shall, whiles thy head is warm and new cut off,
Write in the dust this sentence with thy blood,
"Wind-changing Warwick now can change no more."Enter OXFORD, with drum and colors.

WARWICK

O cheerful colors! see where Oxford comes!

OXFORD

Oxford, Oxford, for Lancaster!

[He and his FORCES enter the city.]

RICHARD

The gates are open, let us enter too.

KING EDWARD

So other foes may set upon our backs.
Stand we in good array, for they no doubt
Will issue out again and bid us battle.
If not, the city being but of small defense,
We'll quickly rouse^o the traitors in the same.

WARWICK

O, welcome, Oxford! for we want thy help.

Enter MONTAGUE, with drum and colors.

MONTAGUE

Montague, Montague, for Lancaster!

[He and his FORCES enter the city.]

35

RICHARD

Thou and thy brother both shall buy this treason
Even with the dearest blood your bodies bear.

KING EDWARD

The harder matched, the greater victory:
My mind presageth happy gain and conquest.

70

Enter SOMERSET, with drum and colors.

40

SOMERSET

Somerset, Somerset, for Lancaster!

[He and his FORCES enter the city.]

RICHARD

45

Two of thy name, both Dukes of Somerset,
Have sold their lives unto the house of York;
And thou shalt be the third, if this sword hold.

75

Enter CLARENCE, with drum and colors.^o

WARWICK

And lo, where George of Clarence sweeps along,
Of force enough to bid his brother battle;
With whom an upright zeal to right prevails
More than the nature of a brother's love!
Come, Clarence, come! Thou wilt, if Warwick call.

80

CLARENCE

Father of Warwick, know you what this means?

[Takes his red rose out of his hat.^o

55

Look here, I throw my infamy at thee.
I will not ruin my father's house,
Who gave his blood to lime^o the stones together,
And set up Lancaster. Why, trowest thou,^o Warwick,
That Clarence is so harsh, so blunt, unnatural,
To bend the fatal instruments of war
Against his brother and his lawful king?
Perhaps thou wilt object^o my holy oath.
To keep that oath were more impiety

90

75 s.d. at this point Q introduces the following dialogue and business:

60

WARWICK

And loe where George of Clarence sweeps
Along, of power enough to bid his brother battell.

CLARENCE

Clarence, Clarence, for Lancaster.

EDWARD

Et tu Brute, wilt thou stab Caesar too?
A parlie sirra to George of Clarence.

65

*Sound a Parlie, and RICHARD and CLARENCE whispers together, and then CLARENCE takes his red Rose out of his hat and throwes it at WARWICK.*This passage, and especially the stage direction, follows closely

 I am so sorry for my trespass made
 That, to deserve well at my brother's hands,
 I here proclaim myself thy mortal foe,
 With resolution, wheresoe'er I meet thee
 (As I will meet thee, if thou stir abroad)
 To plague thee for thy foul misleading me.
 And so, proud-hearted Warwick, I defy thee,
 And to my brother turn my blushing cheeks.
 Pardon me, Edward! I will make amends;
 And, Richard, do not frown upon my faults,
 For I will henceforth be no more unconstant.

KING EDWARD

Now welcome more, and ten times more beloved,
 Than if thou never hadst deserved our hate.

RICHARD

Welcome, good Clarence! This is brotherlike.

WARWICK

O passing^o traitor, perjured and unjust!

KING EDWARD

What, Warwick, wilt thou leave the town, and fight?
 Or shall we beat the stones about thine ears?

WARWICK

Alas, I am not coop^od here for defense!
 I will away towards Barnet presently,^o
 And bid thee battle, Edward, if thou dar'st.

KING EDWARD

Yes, Warwick, Edward dares, and leads the way.
 Lords, to the field. Saint George and victory!

Exeunt [KING EDWARD and his COMPANY].

March. WARWICK and his COMPANY follows.

[Scene II. A field of battle near Barnet.]

Alarum and excursions. Enter [KING] EDWARD, bringing forth WARWICK wounded.

KING EDWARD

So, lie thou there! Die thou, and die our fear!
 For Warwick was a bug^o that feared^o us all.
 Now, Montague, sit fast!^o I seek for thee,
 That Warwick's bones may keep thine company.

WARWICK

Ah, who is nigh? Come to me, friend or foe,
 And tell me who is victor, York or Warwick.
 Why ask I that? My mangled body shows,
 My blood, my want of strength, my sick heart shows,
 That I must yield my body to the earth
 And, by my fall, the conquest to my foe.
 Thus yields the cedar to the ax's edge,
 Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle,
 Under whose shade the ramping^o lion slept,
 Whose top branch overpeered Jove's spreading tree^o
 And kept low shrubs from winter's pow'rful wind.
 These eyes, that now are dimmed with death's black veil,
 Have been as piercing as the midday sun
 To search the secret treasons of the world.

 And who durst smile when Warwick bent his brow?
 Lo, now my glory smeared in dust and blood!
 My parks, my walks, my manors that I had,
 Even now forsake me, and of all my lands
 Is nothing left me but my body's length.
 Why, what is pomp, rule, reign, but earth and dust?
 And, live we how we can, yet die we must.

95

100

Enter OXFORD and SOMERSET.

SOMERSET

Ah, Warwick, Warwick, wert thou as we are,
 We might recover all our loss again!
 The queen from France hath brought a puissant power.
 Even now we heard the news. Ah, couldst thou fly!

105

WARWICK

Why, then I would not fly. Ah, Montague,
 If thou be there, sweet brother, take my hand,
 And with thy lips keep in my soul awhile!
 Thou lov'st me not; for, brother, if thou didst,
 Thy tears would wash this cold congealèd blood
 That glues my lips and will not let me speak.
 Come quickly, Montague, or I am dead.

110

SOMERSET

Ah, Warwick! Montague hath breathed his last,
 And to the latest gasp cried out for Warwick
 And said, "Commend me to my valiant brother."
 And more he would have said, and more he spoke,
 Which sounded like a cannon in a vault,
 That mought^o not be distinguished; but at last
 I well might hear, delivered with a groan,
 "O, farewell, Warwick!"

WARWICK

Sweet rest his soul! Fly, lords, and save yourselves;
 For Warwick bids you all farewell, to meet in heaven.
 [Dies.]

OXFORD

Away, away, to meet the queen's great power!
 Here they bear away his body. Exeunt.

[Scene III. Another part of the field.]

Flourish. Enter KING EDWARD in triumph, with
 RICHARD, CLARENCE, and the rest.

KING EDWARD

Thus far our fortune keeps an upward course
 And we are graced with wreaths of victory.
 But, in the midst of this bright-shining day
 I spy a black, suspicious, threat'ning cloud
 That will encounter with our glorious sun^o
 Ere he attain his easeful western bed.
 I mean, my lords, those powers that the queen
 Hath raised in Gallia have arrivèd^o our coast,
 And, as we hear, march on to fight with us.

10

15

CLARENCE

A little gale will soon disperse that cloud
 And blow it to the source from whence it came.
 Thy very beams will dry those vapors up,
 For every cloud engenders not a storm.

RICHARD

The queen is valued° thirty thousand strong,
 And Somerset, with Oxford, fled to her: 15
 If she have time to breathe, be well assured
 Her faction will be full as strong as ours.

KING EDWARD

We are advertised° by our loving friends
 That they do hold their course toward Tewksbury.
 We, having now the best at Barnet field, 20
 Will thither straight,° for willingness rids way;°
 And, as we march, our strength will be augmented
 In every county as we go along.
 Strike up the drum. Cry, "Courage!" and away.

Exeunt.

[Scene IV. Plains near Tewksbury.]

Flourish. March. Enter the QUEEN [MARGARET], young [PRINCE] Edward, SOMERSET, OXFORD, and SOLDIERS.

QUEEN MARGARET

Great lords, wise men ne'er sit and wail their loss,
 But cheerly seek how to redress their harms.
 What though the mast be now blown overboard,
 The cable broke, the holding-anchor° lost,
 And half our sailors swallowed in the flood? 5
 Yet lives our pilot still. Is't meet° that he Should leave the helm, and like a fearful lad
 With tearful eyes add water to the sea,
 And give more strength to that which hath too much, 10
 Whiles, in his moan, the ship splits on the rock,
 Which industry° and courage might have saved?
 Ah, what a shame! ah, what a fault were this!
 Say Warwick was our anchor. What of that?
 And Montague our topmast. What of him?
 Our slaughtered friends the tackles; what of these? 15
 Why, is not Oxford here another anchor?
 And Somerset another goodly mast?
 The friends of France our shrouds and tacklings?
 And, though unskillful, why not Ned and I
 For once allowed the skillful pilot's charge?° 20
 We will not from the helm to sit and weep,
 But keep our course (though the rough wind say no)
 From shelves and rocks that threaten us with wrack.
 As good to chide the waves as speak them fair.
 And what is Edward but a ruthless sea? 25
 What Clarence but a quicksand of deceit?
 And Richard but a ragged fatal rock?
 All these the enemies to our poor bark.
 Say you can swim—alas, 'tis but a while!
 Tread on the sand—why, there you quickly sink! 30
 Bestride the rock—the tide will wash you off,
 Or else you famish: that's a threefold death.
 This speak I, lords, to let you understand,
 If case some one of you would fly from us,
 That there's no hoped-for mercy with the brothers 35
 More than with ruthless waves, with sands and rocks.
 Why, courage then! What cannot be avoided
 'Twere childish weakness to lament or fear.

PRINCE

Methinks a woman of this valiant spirit
 Should, if a coward heard her speak these words, 40
 Infuse his breast with magnanimity,
 And make him, naked,° foil a man at arms.
 I speak not this as doubting any here;
 For did I but suspect a fearful man,
 He should have leave to go away betimes, 45
 Lest in our need he might infect another
 And make him of like spirit to himself.
 If any such be here (as God forbid!)
 Let him depart before we need his help.

OXFORD

Women and children of so high a courage, 50
 And warriors faint! why, 'twere perpetual shame.
 O brave young prince! thy famous grandfather°
 Doth live again in thee: long mayst thou live
 To bear his image° and renew his glories!

SOMERSET

And he that will not fight for such a hope, 55
 Go home to bed, and, like the owl by day,
 If he arise, be mocked and wondered at.

QUEEN MARGARET

Thanks, gentle Somerset. Sweet Oxford, thanks.

PRINCE

And take his thanks that yet hath nothing else.
Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

Prepare you, lords, for Edward is at hand, 60
 Ready to fight; therefore be resolute.

OXFORD

I thought no less: it is his policy°
 To haste thus fast, to find us unprovided.

SOMERSET

But he's deceived; we are in readiness.

QUEEN MARGARET

This cheers my heart, to see your forwardness. 65

OXFORD

Here pitch our battle; hence we will not budge.
Flourish and march. Enter [KING] EDWARD, RICHARD, 70
CLARENCE, and SOLDIERS.

KING EDWARD

Brave followers, yonder stands the thorny wood,
 Which, by the heavens' assistance and your strength,
 Must by the roots be hewn up yet ere night.
 I need not add more fuel to your fire, 70
 For well I wot ye blaze to burn them out.
 Give signal to the fight, and to it, lords!

QUEEN MARGARET

Lords, knights, and gentlemen, what I should say
 My tears gainsay; for every word I speak, 75
 Ye see I drink the water of my eye.
 Therefore, no more but this: Henry, your sovereign,
 Is prisoner to the foe; his state usurped,
 His realm a slaughterhouse, his subjects slain,
 His statutes canceled, and his treasure spent;
 And yonder is the wolf that makes this spoil.° 80
 You fight in justice. Then, in God's name, lords,
 Be valiant, and give signal to the fight.

Flourish. Enter [KING] EDWARD, RICHARD, CLARENCE, [and SOLDIERS, with] QUEEN [MARGARET], OXFORD, SOMERSET [as prisoners].

KING EDWARD

Now here a period of° tumultuous broils.
Away with Oxford to Hames Castle straight.°
For Somerset, off with his guilty head.
Go bear them hence. I will not hear them speak.

OXFORD

For my part, I'll not trouble thee with words.

SOMERSET

Nor I, but stoop with patience to my fortune.
Exeunt [OXFORD and SOMERSET, guarded].

QUEEN MARGARET

So part we sadly in this troublous world,
To meet with joy in sweet Jerusalem.

KING EDWARD

Is proclamation made, that who finds Edward
Shall have a high reward, and he his life?

RICHARD

It is: and lo, where youthful Edward comes!

KING EDWARD

Bring forth the gallant, let us hear him speak.

Enter the PRINCE [Edward].

What! Can so young a thorn begin to prick?
Edward, what satisfaction° canst thou make
For bearing arms, for stirring up my subjects,
And all the trouble thou hast turned me to?

PRINCE

Speak like a subject, proud ambitious York!
Suppose that I am now my father's mouth;
Resign thy chair, and where I stand kneel thou,
Whilst I propose the selfsame words to thee,
Which, traitor, thou wouldst have me answer to.

QUEEN MARGARET

Ah, that thy father had been so resolved!

RICHARD

That you might still have worn the petticoat,
And ne'er have stol'n the breech° from Lancaster.

PRINCE

Let Aesop fable in a winter's night;
His currish° riddles sorts not with this place.

RICHARD

By heaven, brat, I'll plague ye for that word.

QUEEN MARGARET

Ay, thou wast born to be a plague to men.

RICHARD

For God's sake, take away this captive scold.

PRINCE

Nay, take away this scolding crookback rather.

KING EDWARD

Peace, willful boy, or I will charm° your tongue.

CLARENCE

Untutored lad, thou art too malapert.°

I know my duty; you are all undutiful:
Lascivious Edward, and thou perjured George,
And thou misshapen Dick, I tell ye all
I am your better, traitors as ye are:
And thou usurp'st my father's right and mine.

KING EDWARD

Take that, the likeness of this railer here.

Stabs him.

RICHARD

Sprawl'st thou? Take that, to end thy agony.

Richard stabs him.

CLARENCE

And there's for twitting me with perjury.

Clarence stabs him.

QUEEN MARGARET

O, kill me too!

RICHARD

Marry,° and shall.

Offers to kill her.

KING EDWARD

Hold, Richard, hold; for we have done too much.

RICHARD

Why should she live, to fill the world with words?

KING EDWARD

What! doth she swoon? use means for her recovery.

RICHARD

Clarence, excuse me to the king my brother;
I'll hence to London on a serious matter:
Ere ye come there, be sure to hear some news.

CLARENCE

What? what?

The Tower, the Tower! Exit.

QUEEN MARGARET

O Ned, sweet Ned! speak to thy mother, boy!
Canst thou not speak? O traitors! murderers!
They that stabbed Caesar shed no blood at all,
Did not offend, nor were not worthy blame,
If this foul deed were by to equal it.

RICHARD

He was a man; this (in respect°) a child,
And men ne'er spend their fury on a child.
What's worse than murderer, that I may name it?

No, no, my heart will burst, and if I speak!

And I will speak, that so my heart may burst.

Butchers and villains! bloody cannibals!

How sweet a plant have you untimely cropped!

You have no children, butchers! If you had,

The thought of them would have stirred up remorse:

But if you ever chance to have a child,

Look in his youth to have him so cut off

As, deathsmen, you have rid this sweet young prince!

KING EDWARD

Away with her! Go bear her hence perforce.

QUEEN MARGARET

Nay, never bear me hence! Dispatch me here.

Here sheathe thy sword, I'll pardon thee my death:

What, wilt thou not? Then, Clarence, do it thou.

42 Marry indeed (light oath, from "By Mary") 56 in respect in comparison

CLARENCE

By heaven, I will not do thee so much ease.

QUEEN MARGARET

Good Clarence, do! Sweet Clarence, do thou do it!

CLARENCE

Didst thou not hear me swear I would not do it?

QUEEN MARGARET

Ay, but thou usest to forswear thyself. 75

'Twas sin before, but now 'tis charity.

What wilt thou not? Where is that devil's butcher,

Hard-favored° Richard? Richard, where art thou?

Thou art not here. Murder is thy alms-deed.

Petitioners for blood thou ne'er put'st back.° 80

KING EDWARD

Away, I say. I charge ye bear her hence.

QUEEN MARGARET

So come to you and yours, as to this prince!

Exit QUEEN.

KING EDWARD

Where's Richard gone?

CLARENCE

To London, all in post;° and, as I guess,

To make a bloody supper in the Tower. 85

KING EDWARD

He's sudden° if a thing comes in his head.

Now march we hence, discharge the common sort

With pay and thanks, and let's away to London,

And see our gentle queen how well she fares:

By this,° I hope, she hath a son for me. Exeunt. 90

[Scene VI. London. The Tower.]

Enter [KING] HENRY the Sixth and RICHARD, with the LIEUTENANT [of the Tower], on the walls.

RICHARD

Good day, my lord. What, at your book so hard?

KING HENRY

Ay, my good lord—"my lord," I should say rather.

'Tis sin to flatter. "Good" was little better.

"Good Gloucester" and "good devil" were alike,
And both preposterous;° therefore, not "good lord." 5

RICHARD

Sirrah,° leave us to ourselves: we must confer.

[Exit LIEUTENANT.]

KING HENRY

So flies the reckless shepherd from the wolf;

So first the harmless sheep doth yield his fleece,

And next his throat unto the butcher's knife.

What scene of death hath Roscius° now to act? 10

RICHARD

Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind;

The thief doth fear each bush an officer.

KING HENRY

The bird that hath been limed° in a bush,

With trembling wings misdoubteth° every bush;

And I, the hapless male to one sweet bird, 15

Have now the fatal object in my eye.

Where my poor young was limed, was caught and killed.°

RICHARD

Why, what a peevish fool was that of Crete,

That taught his son the office° of a fowl!

And yet, for all his wings, the fool was drowned. 20

KING HENRY

I, Daedalus; my poor boy, Icarus;

Thy father, Minos, that denied our course;°

The sun that seared the wings of my sweet boy

Thy brother Edward, and thyself the sea

Whose envious gulf° did swallow up his life. 25

Ah, kill me with thy weapon, not with words!

My breast can better brook thy dagger's point

Than can my ears that tragic history.

But wherefore dost thou come? Is't for my life?

RICHARD

Think'st thou I am an executioner? 30

KING HENRY

A persecutor, I am sure, thou art:

If murdering innocents be executing,

Why, then thou art an executioner.

RICHARD

Thy son I killed for his presumption.

KING HENRY

Hadst thou been killed when first thou didst presume, 35

Thou hadst not lived to kill a son of mine.

And thus I prophesy, that many a thousand,

Which now mistrust no parcel of my fear,

And many an old man's sigh and many a widow's,

And many an orphan's water-standing° eye— 40

Men for their sons, wives for their husbands,

Orphans for their parents' timeless° death—

Shall rue the hour that ever thou wast born.

The owl shrieked at thy birth—an evil sign;

The night-crow cried, aboding° luckless time; 45

Dogs howled, and hideous tempest shook down trees;

The raven rooked her° on the chimney's top,

And chatt'ring pies° in dismal discords sung.

Thy mother felt more than a mother's pain,

And yet brought forth less than a mother's hope, 50

To wit, an indigested and deformed lump,

Not like the fruit of such a goodly tree.

Teeth hadst thou in thy head when thou wast born,

To signify thou cam'st to bite the world;

And, if the rest be true which I have heard, 55

Thou cam'st—

RICHARD

I'll hear no more. Die, prophet, in thy speech.

Stabs him.

For this, amongst the rest, was I ordained.

RICHARD

What? Will the aspiring blood of Lancaster
Sink in the ground? I thought it would have mounted.
See how my sword weeps for the poor king's death!
O may such purple tears be always shed
From those that wish the downfall of our house!
If any spark of life be yet remaining,
Down, down to hell; and say I sent thee thither—

Stabs him again.

I, that have neither pity, love, nor fear.
Indeed, 'tis true that Henry told me of;
For I have often heard my mother say
I came into the world with my legs forward.
Had I not reason, think ye, to make haste
And seek their ruin that usurped our right?
The midwife wondered, and the women cried,
"O Jesus bless us, he is born with teeth!"
And so I was, which plainly signified
That I should snarl and bite and play the dog.
Then, since the heavens have shaped my body so,
Let hell make crook'd my mind to answer° it.
I have no brother, I am like no brother;
And this word "love," which graybeards call divine,
Be resident in men like one another
And not in me: I am myself alone.
Clarence, beware. Thou keep'st me from the light;
But I will sort a pitchy day for thee;°
For I will buzz abroad° such prophecies
That Edward shall be fearful of his life,
And then, to purge his fear, I'll be thy death.
King Henry and the prince his son are gone:
Clarence, thy turn is next, and then the rest,
Counting myself but bad till I be best.
I'll throw thy body in another room
And triumph, Henry, in thy day of doom.

Exit [with the body].

[Scene VII. London. The palace.]

Flourish. Enter KING [EDWARD], QUEEN [ELIZABETH], CLARENCE, RICHARD, HASTINGS, [a] NURSE [with the young PRINCE], and ATTENDANTS.

KING EDWARD

Once more we sit in England's royal throne,
Repurchased with the blood of enemies.
What valiant foemen, like to autumn's corn,
Have we mowed down in tops of all their pride!
Three Dukes of Somerset, threefold renowned
For hardy and undoubted champions;
Two Cliffords, as° the father and the son,

And two Northumberlands—two braver men
Ne'er spurred their coursers° at the trumpet's sound;
With them, the two brave bears,° Warwick and
Montague,

That in their chains fettered the kingly lion
And made the forest tremble when they roared.
Thus have we swept suspicion° from our seat
And made our footstool of security.

Come hither, Bess, and let me kiss my boy.
Young Ned, for thee, thine uncles and myself
Have in our armors watched° the winter's night,
Went all afoot in summer's scalding heat,
That thou mightst repossess the crown in peace.
And of our labors thou shalt reap the gain.

RICHARD [Aside.]

I'll blast his harvest, if your head were laid,°
For yet I am not looked on in the world.
This shoulder was ordained so thick to heave,
And heave it shall some weight, or break my back.
Work thou the way, and that shalt execute.

KING EDWARD

Clarence and Gloucester, love my lovely queen;
And kiss your princely nephew, brothers both.

CLARENCE

The duty that I owe unto your majesty
I seal upon the lips of this sweet babe.

KING EDWARD

Thanks, noble Clarence; worthy brother, thanks.

RICHARD

And, that I love the tree from whence thou sprang'st,
Witness the loving kiss I give the fruit.

[Aside.]

To say the truth, so Judas kissed his master,
And cried, "All hail!" whenas he meant all harm.

KING EDWARD

Now am I seated as my soul delights,
Having my country's peace and brothers' loves.

CLARENCE

What will your grace have done with Margaret?
Reignier, her father, to the King of France
Hath pawned the Sicils and Jerusalem,
And hither have they sent it for her ransom.

KING EDWARD

Away with her, and waft her hence to France!
And now what rests° but that we spend the time
With stately triumphs,° mirthful comic shows,
Such as befits the pleasure of the court?
Sound drums and trumpets! Farewell sour annoy!
For here, I hope, begins our lasting joy.

Exeunt omnes.

THE TRAGEDY OF RICHARD THE THIRD

EDITED BY MARK ECCLES

Introduction

Richard III is above all a play for the stage. It was Shakespeare's first great success, a sudden leap up from his three plays on the reign of Henry VI. Richard Burbage made his reputation by playing Richard III; so did David Garrick when he conquered London in the eighteenth century. Richard III was the first Shakespeare play acted professionally in America, in 1750; it was a favorite of Lincoln, who knew by heart "Now is the winter of our discontent"; and the Shakespeare Festival of Canada opened with a brilliant production. Sir Laurence Olivier has brought Richard to life again on the stage and on the screen.

When Shakespeare wrote this play, about 1592 or 1593, his audiences were eager for plays on English history. Such plays were like mirrors in which they could see what had happened to England in past crises and what might happen to themselves in the near future after the death of Queen Elizabeth. Would their next ruler be one who could unite his people, like Henry V or Henry VII, or one who would bring on civil war, like Henry VI or Richard III? The most popular plays on English history had dramatized wars and struggles for power: The Famous Victories of Henry V, The Troublesome Reign of King John, and the one great historical tragedy before Shakespeare's, Marlowe's The Troublesome Reign and Lamentable Death of Edward II, King of England, with the Tragical Fall of Proud Mortimer. Shakespeare emphasized as leading ideas of his English history plays the danger of division and the necessity of union: "United we stand, divided we fall."

Richard III is a tragedy of crimes punished by divine justice. Both branches of the royal Plantagenets, Lancaster and York, had committed cruel murders. Queen Margaret, the "she-wolf of France," had beheaded Richard, Duke of York; in revenge York's sons murdered her son, Prince Edward, and her husband, Henry VI. The murderers of Clarence tell him that he deserves God's vengeance for stabbing Prince Edward and for breaking his oath to God to fight for King Henry. Richard III must pay with his life for causing the deaths of his brother, his nephews, his wife, and his best friends. The demands for vengeance made by Queen Margaret are fulfilled; for, as Holinshed expressed the traditional religious view of history, "such is God's justice, to leave no unrepentant wickedness unpunished." God used Richard as a scourge to punish the sins of others; the "high All-seer" then raised up Richmond to cancel Richard, "One that hath ever been God's enemy."

Yet it is one of Shakespeare's paradoxes that God's enemy is so much more fascinating than the puppet Richmond, who speaks with no voice of his own. Richard is alive; he is himself alone; he is what part of ourselves would like to be, free from the censor conscience. He can win women; he can win power; he can enjoy using his power to destroy, to do whatever he wants to do. We know he will not get away with it in the end; but meanwhile, what fun he is having! His gay soliloquies make us share his enjoyment:

Was ever woman in this humor wooed?
Was ever woman in this humor won?
I'll have her, but I will not keep her long. (I.ii.227-29)

Richard is the actor making up his part as he goes along, and making sure that it is the leading part.

How did Shakespeare create an acting role which has held so many audiences spellbound? For one thing, he made Richard a devil masked as a man: able to put on in turn the masks of the loyal brother, the impassioned lover, the kindly uncle, the self-sacrificing king. The masks are both tragic and comic; they hide death, and they mock at human folly. We pity Richard's victims, but we feel superior to them; we, of course, would never be taken in. For another thing, Richard is the underdog who fights his way to the top, one man against the world, with everything against him. The climb to power is a treacherous one, dangerous to Richard, deadly to anyone who blocks his path; he climbs over their bodies till he stands, though not for long, where he had determined to stand. This triumph of will is exciting theater; at the same time it is sharply ironic—so many years to rise, to fall in one day.

Richard dominates the play; he appears in fourteen out of twenty-five scenes, and his shadow hangs over the rest. It is the longest of Shakespeare's history plays, and longer than any other of Shakespeare's except Hamlet. Richard himself speaks more than a fourth of the lines, and five of his ten soliloquies come in the first three scenes, so that we see him at once take the center of the stage. His opening speech is masterly. Winter is now summer, the killing is over, it is time to live and love, but not for Richard; his keenest pleasures are to come, and the first will be to destroy his brother. Shakespeare had shown Richard's will to power in Henry VI, Part Three:

How sweet a thing it is to wear a crown,
Within whose circuit is Elysium
And all that poets feign of bliss and joy. (I.ii.29-31)

In III.ii of the same play Richard had planned his strategy for winning the crown:

Why, I can smile, and murder whiles I smile,
And cry, "Content" to that which grieves my heart,
And wet my cheeks with artificial tears,
And frame my face to all occasions.

I can add colors to the chameleon,
Change shapes with Proteus for advantages,
And set the murderous Machiavel to school.
Can I do this, and cannot get a crown?
(III.ii.182-85, 191-94)

And in V.vi, after stabbing King Henry in the Tower, he had promised that Clarence would be next:

I have no brother, I am like no brother;
And this word "love," which graybeards call divine,
Be resident in men like one another
And not in me: I am myself alone. (V.vi.80-83)

In the first scene of Richard III he is in high spirits as he speaks with and without the mask: "your imprisonment shall not be long," to Clarence, and then, to himself, "I do love thee so/That I will shortly send thy soul to heaven." Richard Crookback has a crooked but original sense of humor.

Why did Shakespeare invent the famous scene of Richard's wooing of Lady Anne? The soliloquy which ends the scene provides, I think, the key to Shakespeare's purpose. Richard took up the challenge of a task that seemed impossible; if he could succeed against such odds, for him nothing would be impossible:

What! I that killed her husband and his father
To take her in her heart's extremest hate

And yet to win her, all the world to nothing!
(I.ii.230-31, 237)

He chose a time which presented the greatest obstacles, so that he could overcome them: a time when she was calling for vengeance upon him as the murderer of King Henry and of her husband. He provoked her to attack him with words and then gave her a chance to act, to kill him with his own sword. His will proved stronger than hers. Her change is sudden, but Shakespeare means it to be. Theatrically, he achieves the shock of surprise; dramatically, he convinces us that Richard will find hardly any difficulty too great for him to master.

Shakespeare created most of the first act from his own imagination; and such history as he used he rearranged for dramatic effect. He read in Holinshed that Richard, in 1471, murdered Henry VI, whose body was brought to Saint Paul's and then buried at Chertsey; Shakespeare imagined the scene between Richard and Anne. In 1478 Edward IV had Clarence condemned to death by parliament and drowned in wine at the Tower; Shakespeare made Richard plot his brother's death, and he invented the whole vivid scene of Clarence's dream and murder. Queen Margaret had left England to live in France; Shakespeare brought her into the third scene to prophesy retribution for the house of York and especially for Richard. Margaret, Clarence, Edward IV, and Hastings were omitted from the acting version by Colley Cibber which held the stage from 1700 to 1877, a travesty of the play which contained more Cibber than Shakespeare. All are essential to Shakespeare's drama. Margaret, for example, invokes the justice of God to punish the crimes of her enemies. Recalling the bloody past, she calls for the future to pay blood for blood. As York's dread curse had prevailed with heaven to make her suffer the loss of her husband, her son, and her kingdom, so she prays that her rival Elizabeth may "Die neither mother, wife, nor England's queen." Richard deserves to suffer the worst plagues of all: the worm of conscience, suspicion and betrayal, and the terror of tormenting dreams. Shakespeare makes Margaret no ghost crying for revenge, but a bitter, passionate woman. Yet he gives her a major function in the play: to thunder with the power of a prophetess, sent to warn that no sinner can escape his doom.

The first doom fell upon Clarence. Nothing in his life became him like the dream of his death, for while he slept, his conscience was awake. If he escaped the Tower, he feared he would find himself in hell, facing the father-in-law he had betrayed and the king's son he had stabbed to death. His repentance was genuine, but it came too late to save his life; when he warned his murderers of God's vengeance, they reminded him that he himself was a murderer. Shakespeare packs the scene with tragic irony: Clarence supposing that Richard caused his death in the dream by chance, not by design, and assuring the murderers that Richard would reward them for saving his life. The reluctant Second Murderer might still have saved him by listening to the dregs of conscience; he tried, perhaps, to warn him by crying "Look behind you, my lord!" and immediately afterward he wished he could wash his hands of the murder. Shakespeare ends the first act with Richard one step closer to the crown.

After Act I Shakespeare dramatizes the history of only two years, from the death of Edward IV in 1483 to the battle of Bosworth Field in 1485. Again and again he heightens the dramatic effect of events already full of drama. He brings Richard to the deathbed of Edward in II.i to play-act the lover of peace and then to explode the news of Clarence's death and blame "the guilty kindred of the queen," when he alone is guilty. No sooner does Richard mount the throne in IV.ii than Shakespeare shows him trying to incite Buckingham to murder the princes, with the result that he drives his strongest supporter into rebellion. Above all, in V.iii Shakespeare changes Richard's dream of "images like terrible devils," as Holinshed calls them, into a vision of the souls of all whom he has murdered, crying out "Despair and die!" Here Shakespeare makes Richard look into himself with fear and horror and see how he has cut himself off from mankind:

I shall despair. There is no creature loves me;
And if I die, no soul will pity me. (V.iii.201-02)

Though no one pities Richard, Shakespeare builds up recurring scenes of pity for those who suffer during this reign of terror. In II.ii he shows three generations—mother, wife, and children—left desolate by the loss of Edward and of Clarence. In IV.i the old Duchess of York longs for peace in the grave; Anne, who has had no rest with Richard, wishes that her crown were red-hot steel; and Queen Elizabeth, thinking only of her children, seeks pity for them from the stones of the Tower. The murderers of the two boys tell their death's sad story (IV.iii); and the next scene rises to a chorus of grief in the laments of their mother, of their grandmother, and of Queen Margaret. Each of these scenes intensifies emotion by a three-fold pattern, as though the sorrow were too great to be expressed by only one person, and even Tyrrel shares the remorse of Dighton and Forrest. The killing of the princes is a massacre of the innocents, and their mother is like Rachel weeping for her children.

Shakespeare secures a more complex response in scenes which present characters of mixed good and evil, persons who suffer for their sins and yet who call forth pity for their suffering. Hastings and Buckingham, together with Clarence and the shadowy Rivers, Grey, and Vaughan, are neither ruthless tyrants nor innocent children. Hastings is shown hoping for revenge upon his enemies, the queen's kinsmen (I.i), hiding his hate under a vow of love for Rivers and Dorset (II.i), and then rejoicing at the execution of Rivers and the rest (III.ii). When he is condemned to die the same day (III.iv), he repents his too triumphant joy that his enemies were butchered and admits that Margaret's curse, for standing by when her son was murdered, has lighted on his head. On the other hand, he dies for loyalty to the true king, for refusing to help Richard usurp the throne. Shakespeare brings out the drama of his sudden fall when he least expects it, and the irony of his overconfident belief that Richard loves him well and that the boar will use him kindly. His last words, "They smile at me who shortly shall be dead," foretell a parallel fall for Buckingham, who mocked at Hastings and yet still trusts Richard. Blinded by infatuation, Buckingham has already disregarded Margaret's warning to beware of Richard (I.iii). He digs a pit for himself when he prays in II.i. that if ever he harms Queen Elizabeth or her family God may punish him with hate where he most expects love, and yet becomes Richard's right-hand man to plot against her and her sons. Hesitating only at murder, he gains a crown for Richard and death for himself, and in V.i he acknowledges the justice of his death. As with Hastings, he is both sinning and sinned against, and his tragic recognition of his errors leads in the end to pity for his fall.

The blank verse in Richard III marches to a strong, emphatic rhythm. The pause at the end of the line, or sometimes of two lines (as in I.i.1-4, 10-13), lets the actor dwell on the meaning with clarity and force. Shakespeare, who constructs his sonnets with three quatrains and a couplet, likes to build dramatic monologues also in groups of four lines. Richard's first speech is composed in quatrains, expanded twice to five lines and once to six. The second scene begins and ends with monologues which contain many quatrains, as well as groups of three or five lines. The dialogues show more variety, but Shakespeare makes striking use of stichomythia, which sets single line against single line, in Richard's duels of words with Anne in I.ii, York in III.i, and Queen Elizabeth in IV.iv. The verse of Richard III is far from subtle, but its careful design contributes to its power.

Shakespeare heightens the dramatic effect of speech by an extraordinary range of rhetoric. The opening scene is rich in antitheses, between war and peace, the lover and the villain, true Edward and treacherous Richard and simple, plain Clarence. Anne expresses the intensity of her grief by figures of repetition and parallelism: "Set down, set down," "bloodless . . . blood," "O cursèd . . . Cursèd," "If ever he have child . . . If ever he have wife." Queen Margaret gives force to her prophetic curse in I.iii.187 ff. by pouring forth questions and exclamations, by reiterating key words like "curse," "heaven," and "death," and by emphasizing parallel constructions: "Edward thy son, that now is Prince of Wales,/For Edward our son, that was Prince of Wales," or "Thyself a queen, for me that was a queen." All these and more appear in IV.iv: paradoxical antithesis in "Dead life, blind sight, poor mortal living ghost," repeated questions like "Where is thy husband now? Where be thy brothers?" and emphatic parallels, as in lines 20-21, 40-46, and 98-104. The conscious eloquence of the orations in V.iii contrasts with the more intense rhetoric which expresses fear and despair in Richard's soliloquy. Richard III shows Shakespeare rejoicing in his mastery over language, though he has not yet learned the art of concealing his art.

The play is not merely a melodrama, although it tends toward melodrama in its exaggeration of Richard's villainy. It is the tragedy of a man, of a family, and of a nation. The tragedy is ironic in that Richard, by destroying others, brings destruction upon himself. Right does not triumph without probability, as in melodrama, but as a probable result of human actions. Richard rises steadily until he orders the murder of his nephews (IV.ii); from that moment he turns friends into enemies, till "He hath no friends but what are friends for fear" (V.ii). But he does not have the inner conflict of Macbeth, who inspires pity as well as fear. Retributive justice strikes down not only Richard but the whole family of Plantagenet. The sons of York pay for the murder of Henry VI and his son by their own deaths and the murder of Edward's sons. Finally, Shakespeare shows how the people of England suffered from tyranny and civil war, when "The brother blindly shed the brother's blood." He ends the play with a heartfelt prayer that his country, united, may now live in peace.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCES

Shakespeare found the fullest account of Richard in Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles (second edition, 1587). Holinshed reprinted most of Sir Thomas More's History of King Richard the Third (written about 1514, printed in 1557) and wove in further information from Polydore Vergil's Anglica Historia (1534), Edward Hall's The Union of the Two Noble and Illustre Families of Lancaster and York (1548), and Richard Grafton's Chronicles of 1543 and 1569. Shakespeare added a few points from his own reading of Hall or Grafton, and a few from "The Tragedy of Clarence" in The Mirror for Magistrates (1559). The rest he drew from Holinshed or invented for himself.

The historical Richard was not so black as he was painted; it is still an unsolved question whether he committed any of the murders charged against him by his enemies. But Shakespeare was dramatizing the Richard of the Tudor historians, and they had no doubt that Richard was a murderer and a tyrant. More wrote that he "spared no man's death whose life withstood his purpose"; Hall declared that if he had not usurped the throne, he would have been "much praised and beloved, as he is now abhorred and vilipended." By the time Shakespeare wrote, Richard had already been staged as a Senecan villain in Richardus Tertius, a Latin play acted at Cambridge, and in The True Tragedy of Richard the Third, which Shakespeare quotes in Hamlet. More's vivid history, however, furnished the chief stimulus to Shakespeare's imagination.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

Richard III, one of Shakespeare's most popular plays, appeared in eight quarto editions, more than any other Shakespeare play except Henry IV, Part One. The first quarto (Q1) was entered for publication on October 20, 1597, as The tragedie of kinge Richard the Third with the death of the Duke of Clarence. The actors of Shakespeare's company who reconstructed this text from memory left out over two hundred lines and made many changes, but they preserved some lines omitted in the Folio, especially IV.ii.98-115. Printers added errors in each of the later quartos, dated 1598, 1602 (Q3), 1605, 1612, 1622 (Q6), 1629, and 1634.

The best text of the play appeared in 1623 in the First Folio (F). The printer, William Jaggard, had his compositors set up Richard III from a quarto marked with many corrections from an authentic manuscript. It used to be believed that this quarto was Q6, supplemented by an uncorrected quarto, Q3. In 1955, however, J. K. Walton, in The Copy for the Folio Text of Richard III, concluded that Q3, corrected, was the only quarto used for F. My collation of all variants in the first six quartos supports this conclusion. It is possible that both Q3 and Q6 were used, but that remains to be proved.

The present edition follows the readings of the First Folio except for the changes listed below. These changes have been made for definite reasons. First, the part of the Folio text containing III.i.1-168 seems to have been printed from Q3 without any correction from a manuscript, and the Folio text from V.iii.49 to the end of the play makes very few corrections. These few corrections have been accepted, but the rest of the text in these passages is based on Q1, from which Q3 and F are here derived. For example, the right reading "as" in III.i.123 appears in Q1, while "as, as," in F derives from the misprint "as, as," in Q3. Second, the reading of Q1 is also preferred, in any part of the play, to a different reading which F merely reprints from Q3. Third, the present text accepts thirty lines from Q1 which are not in F. Finally, I have corrected errors and have made a few emendations.

The divisions into acts and scenes include all those in the Folio, translated from Latin, and these further scenes as marked in modern editions: III.v-vii, IV.iii, and V.iii-v. Brackets set off these and other editorial additions. Spelling, punctuation, and capitalization are modernized, and speech prefixes are regularized. In the following list of significant changes from the Folio, and from Q1, where it is the basic text, the reading of the present text is given in boldface and the alternative reading of the Folio, or of Q1 or Q3, in roman.

Scene: England]

A C T I

Scene I. [London. A street.]Enter RICHARD, Duke of Gloucester, solus.

RICHARD

Now is the winter of our discontent
 Made glorious summer by this sun° of York;
 And all the clouds that loured upon our house
 In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
 Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths, 5
 Our bruised arms hung up for monuments,
 Our stern alarums° changed to merry meetings,
 Our dreadful marches to delightful measures.
 Grim-visaged war hath smoothed his wrinkled front,
 And now, instead of mounting barbèd° steeds 10
 To fright the souls of fearful adversaries,
 He capers nimbly in a lady's chamber
 To the lascivious pleasing of a lute.
 But I, that am not shaped for sportive tricks
 Nor made to court an amorous looking glass;
 I, that am rudely stamped, and want° love's majesty
 To strut before a wanton ambling nymph;
 I, that am curtailed of this fair proportion,
 Cheated of feature° by dissembling Nature,
 Deformed, unfinished, sent before my time 20
 Into this breathing world scarce half made up,
 And that so lamely and unfashionable
 That dogs bark at me as I halt° by them;
 Why, I, in this weak piping time° of peace,
 Have no delight to pass away the time,
 Unless to spy my shadow in the sun
 And descant° on mine own deformity.
 And therefore, since I cannot prove a lover
 To entertain° these fair well-spoken days,
 I am determinèd to prove a villain 30
 And hate the idle pleasures of these days.
 Plots have I laid, inductions° dangerous,
 By drunken prophecies, libels, and dreams,
 To set my brother Clarence and the king
 In deadly hate the one against the other;
 And if King Edward be as true and just
 As I am subtle, false, and treacherous,
 This day should Clarence closely be mewed up°
 About a prophecy which says that G
 Of Edward's heirs the murderer shall be. 40
 Dive, thoughts, down to my soul. Here Clarence comes.

Enter CLARENCE, guarded, and BRAKENBURY [Lieutenant of the Tower].

Brother, good day. What means this armèd guard
 That waits upon your grace?

CLARENCE

His majesty,

Tend'ring° my person's safety, hath appointed
 This conduct° to convey me to the Tower. 45

RICHARD

Upon what cause?

CLARENCE

Because my name is George.

RICHARD

Alack, my lord, that fault is none of yours;
 He should for that commit your godfathers.
 O, belike° his majesty hath some intent
 That you should be new christ'ned in the Tower. 50
 But what's the matter, Clarence? May I know?

CLARENCE

Yea, Richard, when I know; for I protest
 As yet I do not. But, as I can learn,
 He harkens after prophecies and dreams,
 And from the crossrow° plucks the letter G, 55
 And says a wizard told him that by G
 His issue disinherited should be;
 And, for° my name of George begins with G,
 It follows in his thought that I am he.
 These (as I learn) and suchlike toys° as these 60
 Hath moved his highness to commit me now.

RICHARD

Why, this it is when men are ruled by women.
 'Tis not the king that sends you to the Tower.
 My Lady Grey his wife, Clarence, 'tis she
 That tempers° him to this extremity.° 65
 Was it not she, and that good man of worship,
 Anthony Woodeville° her brother there,
 That made him send Lord Hastings to the Tower,
 From whence this present day he is deliverèd?
 We are not safe, Clarence, we are not safe. 70

CLARENCE

By heaven, I think there is no man secure
 But the queen's kindred, and nightwalking heralds°
 That trudge betwixt the king and Mistress Shore.°
 Heard you not what an humble suppliant
 Lord Hastings was to her for his delivery? 75

RICHARD

Humbly complaining to her deity
 Got my Lord Chamberlain his liberty.
 I'll tell you what, I think it is our way,
 If we will keep in favor with the king,
 To be her men and wear her livery. 80
 The jealous o'erworn widow° and herself,
 Since that our brother dubbed them gentlewomen,
 Are mighty gossips° in our monarchy.

BRAKENBURY

I beseech your graces both to pardon me.
 His majesty hath straitly° given in charge 85
 That no man shall have private conference,
 Of what degree° soever, with your brother.

RICHARD

Even so? And° please your worship, Brakenbury,
You may partake of anything we say.

We speak no treason, man; we say the king 90
Is wise and virtuous, and his noble queen
Well struck° in years, fair, and not jealous;
We say that Shore's wife hath a pretty foot,
A cherry lip, a bonny eye, a passing pleasing tongue;
And that the queen's kindred are made gentlefolks. 95
How say you, sir? Can you deny all this?

BRAKENBURY

With this, my lord, myself have nought to do.

RICHARD

Naught° to do with Mistress Shore! I tell thee, fellow,

He that doth naught with her, excepting one,
Were best to do it secretly alone. 100

BRAKENBURY

What one, my lord?

RICHARD

Her husband, knave. Wouldst thou betray me?

BRAKENBURY

I beseech your grace to pardon me, and withal°
Forbear your conference with the noble duke.

CLARENCE

We know thy charge, Brakenbury, and will obey. 105

RICHARD

We are the queen's abjects,° and must obey.

Brother, farewell. I will unto the king;

And whatsoe'er you will employ me in,

Were it to call King Edward's widow sister,

I will perform it to enfranchise° you. 110

Meantime, this deep disgrace in brotherhood

Touches me deeper than you can imagine.

CLARENCE

I know it pleaseth neither of us well.

RICHARD

Well, your imprisonment shall not be long;

I will deliver you, or else lie for° you. 115

Meantime, have patience.

CLARENCE

I must perforce. Farewell.

Exit CLARENCE, [with BRAKENBURY and GUARD].

RICHARD

Go tread the path that thou shalt ne'er return.

Simple plain Clarence, I do love thee so

That I will shortly send thy soul to heaven,

If heaven will take the present at our hands. 120

But who comes here? The new-deliverèd Hastings!

Enter Lord HASTINGS.

HASTINGS

Good time of day unto my gracious lord.

RICHARD

As much unto my good Lord Chamberlain.

Well are you welcome to the open air.

How hath your lordship brooked° imprisonment? 125

HASTINGS

With patience, noble lord, as prisoners must.

But I shall live, my lord, to give them thanks
That were the cause of my imprisonment.

RICHARD

No doubt, no doubt; and so shall Clarence too,
For they that were your enemies are his 130
And have prevailed as much on him as you.

HASTINGS

More pity that the eagles should be mewed
Whiles kites° and buzzards prey at liberty.

RICHARD

What news abroad?

HASTINGS

No news so bad abroad as this at home: 135

The king is sickly, weak, and melancholy,

And his physicians fear° him mightily.

RICHARD

Now, by Saint John, that news is bad indeed.

O, he hath kept an evil diet° long

And overmuch consumed his royal person. 140

'Tis very grievous to be thought upon.

What, is he in his bed?

HASTINGS He is.

RICHARD

Go you before, and I will follow you.

Exit HASTINGS.

He cannot live, I hope, and must not die 145

Till George be packed with post horse° up to heaven.

I'll in to urge his hatred more to Clarence

With lies well steeled° with weighty arguments;

And, if I fail not in my deep intent,

Clarence hath not another day to live. 150

Which done, God take King Edward to his mercy

And leave the world for me to bustle in!

For then I'll marry Warwick's youngest daughter.°

What though I killed her husband and her father?°

The readiest way to make the wench amends 155

Is to become her husband and her father.

The which will I, not all so much for love

As for another secret close intent

By marrying her which I must reach unto.

But yet I run before my horse to market. 160

Clarence still breathes, Edward still lives and reigns;

When they are gone, then must I count my gains.

Exit.

Poor key-cold figure of a holy king,
 Pale ashes of the house of Lancaster,
 Thou bloodless remnant of that royal blood,
 Be it lawful that I invoke thy ghost
 To hear the lamentations of poor Anne,
 Wife to thy Edward, to thy slaught' red son,
 Stabbed by the selfsame hand that made these wounds!
 Lo, in these windows that let forth thy life
 I pour the helpless° balm of my poor eyes.
 O, cursèd be the hand that made these holes!
 Cursèd the heart that had the heart to do it!
 Cursèd the blood that let this blood from hence!
 More direful hap betide° that hated wretch
 That makes us wretched by the death of thee
 Than I can wish to wolves, to spiders, toads,
 Or any creeping venomèd thing that lives!
 If ever he have child, abortive be it,
 Prodigious,° and untimely brought to light,
 Whose ugly and unnatural aspect
 May fright the hopeful mother at the view,
 And that be heir to his unhappiness!°
 If ever he have wife, let her be made
 More miserable by the life of him
 Than I am made by my young lord and thee!
 Come, now towards Chertsey with your holy load,
 Taken from Paul's° to be interrèd there;

[The BEARERS take up the hearse.]

And still as° you are weary of this weight,
 Rest you, whiles I lament King Henry's corse.

Enter RICHARD, Duke of Gloucester.

RICHARD
 Stay, you that bear the corse, and set it down.

ANNE
 What black magician conjures up this fiend
 To stop devoted charitable deeds?

RICHARD
 Villains, set down the corse, or, by Saint Paul,
 I'll make a corse of him that disobeys.

GENTLEMAN
 My lord, stand back and let the coffin pass.

RICHARD
 Unmannered dog, stand° thou when I command!
 Advance thy halberd higher than my breast,
 Or, by Saint Paul, I'll strike thee to my foot
 And spurn° upon thee, beggar, for thy boldness.

[The BEARERS set down the hearse.]

ANNE
 What, do you tremble? Are you all afraid?
 Alas, I blame you not, for you are mortal,
 And mortal eyes cannot endure the devil.
 Avaunt,° thou dreadful minister of hell!
 Thou hadst but power over his mortal body,
 His soul thou canst not have; therefore, begone.

RICHARD
 Sweet saint, for charity, be not so curst.°

5 ANNE
 Foul devil, for God's sake hence, and trouble us not, 50
 For thou hast made the happy earth thy hell,
 Filled it with cursing cries and deep exclaims.
 If thou delight to view thy heinous deeds,
 10 Behold this pattern° of thy butcheries.
 O gentlemen, see, see dead Henry's wounds 55
 Open their congealed mouths and bleed afresh!
 Blush, blush, thou lump of foul deformity,
 For 'tis thy presence that exhales° this blood
 15 From cold and empty veins where no blood dwells.
 Thy deed inhuman and unnatural 60
 Provokes this deluge most unnatural.
 O God, which this blood mad'st, revenge his death!
 O earth, which this blood drink'st, revenge his death!
 20 Either heav'n, with lightning strike the murd' rer dead,
 Or earth, gape open wide and eat him quick,° 65
 As thou dost swallow up this good king's blood
 Which his hell-governed arm hath butcherèd!

RICHARD
 25 Lady, you know no rules of charity,
 Which renders good for bad, blessings for curses.

ANNE
 Villain, thou know'st nor law of God nor man. 70
 No beast so fierce but knows some touch of pity.

30 RICHARD
 But I know none, and therefore am no beast.

ANNE
 O wonderful, when devils tell the truth!
 RICHARD
 More wonderful, when angels are so angry.
 Vouchsafe, divine perfection of a woman, 75
 Of these supposed crimes to give me leave
 By circumstance° but to acquit myself.

ANNE
 Vouchsafe, diffused° infection of a man,
 35 Of these known evils but to give me leave
 By circumstance to accuse thy cursèd self. 80

RICHARD
 Fairer than tongue can name thee, let me have
 Some patient leisure to excuse myself.

ANNE
 Fouler than heart can think thee, thou canst make
 No excuse current° but to hang thyself.

40 RICHARD
 By such despair I should accuse myself. 85

ANNE
 And by despairing shalt thou stand excusèd
 For doing worthy vengeance on thyself
 That didst unworthy slaughter upon others.

RICHARD
 Say that I slew them not?
 45 ANNE Then say they were not slain.
 But dead they are, and, devilish slave, by thee. 90

RICHARD
 I did not kill your husband.
 ANNE Why, then he is alive.

RICHARD
 Nay, he is dead, and slain by Edward's hands.

In thy foul throat thou li'st! Queen Margaret saw
Thy murd'rous falchion^o smoking in his blood;
The which thou once didst bend against her breast, 95
But that thy brothers beat aside the point.

RICHARD

I was provokèd by her sland'rous tongue,
That laid their guilt upon my guiltless shoulders.

ANNE

Thou wast provokèd by thy bloody mind,
That never dream'st on aught but butcheries. 100
Didst thou not kill this king?

RICHARD

I grant ye.

ANNE

Dost grant me, hedgehog? Then God grant me too
Thou mayst be damnèd for that wicked deed!
O, he was gentle, mild, and virtuous!

RICHARD

The better for the King of Heaven that hath him. 105

ANNE

He is in heaven, where thou shalt never come.

RICHARD

Let him thank me that holp^o to send him thither;
For he was fitter for that place than earth.

ANNE

And thou unfit for any place but hell.

RICHARD

Yes, one place else, if you will hear me name it. 110

ANNE

Some dungeon.

RICHARD

Your bedchamber.

ANNE

Ill rest betide the chamber where thou liest!

RICHARD

So will it, madam, till I lie with you.

ANNE

I hope so.

RICHARD I know so. But, gentle Lady Anne,

To leave this keen encounter of our wits
And fall something into a slower method,
Is not the causer of the timeless^o deaths
Of these Plantagenets, Henry and Edward,
As blameful as the executioner?

ANNE

Thou wast the cause and most accursed effect.^o 120

RICHARD

Your beauty was the cause of that effect;
Your beauty, that did haunt me in my sleep
To undertake the death of all the world,
So I might live one hour in your sweet bosom.

ANNE

If I thought that, I tell thee, homicide, 125
These nails should rend that beauty from my cheeks.

RICHARD

These eyes could not endure that beauty's wrack.^o
You should not blemish it if I stood by.
As all the world is cheerèd by the sun,
So I by that; it is my day, my life. 130

ANNE

Black night o'ershade thy day, and death thy life!

RICHARD

Curse not thyself, fair creature; thou art both.

ANNE

I would I were, to be revenged on thee.

RICHARD

It is a quarrel most unnatural
To be revenged on him that loveth thee. 135

ANNE

It is a quarrel just and reasonable
To be revenged on him that killed my husband.

100 RICHARD

He that bereft thee, lady, of thy husband,
Did it to help thee to a better husband.

ANNE

His better doth not breathe upon the earth. 140

RICHARD

He lives that loves thee better than he could.

ANNE

Name him.

RICHARD Plantagenet.

ANNE

Why, that was he.

RICHARD

The selfsame name, but one of better nature.

ANNE

Where is he?

RICHARD Here. [She] spits at him.

Why dost thou spit at me?

110 ANNE

Would it were mortal poison for thy sake! 145

RICHARD

Never came poison from so sweet a place.

ANNE

Never hung poison on a fouler toad.

Out of my sight! Thou dost infect mine eyes.

RICHARD

Thine eyes, sweet lady, have infected mine.

ANNE

Would they were basilisks^o to strike thee dead! 150

115 RICHARD

I would they were, that I might die at once;^o
For now they kill me with a living death.
Those eyes of thine from mine have drawn salt tears,
Shamed their aspect^o with store of childish drops,
These eyes which never shed remorseful^o tear, 155
No, when my father York and Edward wept
To hear the piteous moan that Rutland^o made
When black-faced^o Clifford shook his sword at him,
Nor when thy warlike father, like a child,
Told the sad story of my father's death 160
And twenty times made pause to sob and weep,
That all the standers-by had wet their cheeks
Like trees bedashed with rain. In that sad time
My manly eyes did scorn an humble tear;
And what these sorrows could not thence exhale 165
Thy beauty hath, and made them blind with weeping.
I never sued to friend nor enemy;
My tongue could never learn sweet smoothing^o word;
But now thy beauty is proposed my fee, 130

My proud heart sues, and prompts my tongue to speak. 170

She looks scornfully at him.

Teach not thy lip such scorn, for it was made
For kissing, lady, not for such contempt.
If thy revengeful heart cannot forgive,
Lo, here I lend thee this sharp-pointed sword;
Which if thou please to hide in this true breast 175
And let the soul forth that adareth thee,
I lay it naked to the deadly stroke
And humbly beg the death upon my knee.

He lays his breast open. She offers at [it] with his sword.

Nay, do not pause, for I did kill King Henry,
But 'twas thy beauty that provokèd me. 180
Nay, now dispatch; 'twas I that stabbed young Edward,
But 'twas thy heavenly face that set me on.

She falls° the sword.

Take up the sword again, or take up me.

ANNE

Arise, dissembler; though I wish thy death,
I will not be thy executioner.

RICHARD

Then bid me kill myself, and I will do it.

ANNE

I have already.

RICHARD

That was in thy rage.
Speak it again, and even with the word
This hand, which for thy love did kill thy love,
Shall for thy love kill a far truer love. 190
To both their deaths shalt thou be accessory.°

ANNE

I would I knew thy heart.

RICHARD

'Tis figured° in my tongue.

ANNE

I fear me both are false.

RICHARD

Then never was man true. 195

ANNE

Well, well, put up your sword.

RICHARD

Say, then, my peace is made.

ANNE

That shalt thou know hereafter.

RICHARD

But shall I live in hope?

ANNE

All men, I hope, live so. 200

RICHARD

Vouchsafe° to wear this ring.

ANNE

To take is not to give.

[RICHARD puts the ring on her finger.]

RICHARD

Look how° my ring encompasseth thy finger,

Even so thy breast encloseth my poor heart.
Wear both of them, for both of them are thine. 205
And if thy poor devoted servant may
But beg one favor at thy gracious hand,
Thou dost confirm his happiness forever.

ANNE What is it?

RICHARD

That it may please you leave these sad designs 210
To him that hath most cause to be a mourner,
And presently° repair to Crosby House,
Where, after I have solemnly interred
At Chertsey monast'ry this noble king
And wet his grave with my repentant tears, 215
I will with all expedient° duty see you.
For divers unknown° reasons, I beseech you,
Grant me this boon.

ANNE

With all my heart; and much it joys me too
To see you are become so penitent. 220
Tressel and Barkley, go along with me.

RICHARD

Bid me farewell.

ANNE

'Tis more than you deserve;
But since you teach me how to flatter you,
Imagine I have said farewell already.

Exit two with ANNE.

RICHARD

Sirs, take up the corse.

GENTLEMEN

Towards Chertsey, noble lord? 225

RICHARD

No, to Whitefriars; there attend° my coming.
Exit [BEARERS and GENTLEMEN, with] corse.

Scene III. [The palace.]

Enter QUEEN [ELIZABETH,] LORD RIVERS, [DORSET,] and Lord GREY.

RIVERS

Have patience, madam; there's no doubt his majesty
 Will soon recover his accustomed health.

GREY

In that you brook^o it ill, it makes him worse.
 Therefore for God's sake entertain good comfort
 And cheer his grace with quick and merry eyes.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

If he were dead, what would betide on^o me?

GREY

No other harm but loss of such a lord.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

The loss of such a lord includes all harms.

GREY

The heavens have blessed you with a goodly son
 To be your comforter when he is gone.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ah, he is young, and his minority
 Is put unto the trust of Richard Gloucester,
 A man that loves not me, nor none of you.

RIVERS

Is it concluded he shall be protector?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

It is determined, not concluded^o yet;
 But so it must be if the king miscarry.^o

Enter BUCKINGHAM and [STANLEY Earl of] Derby.

GREY

Here come the Lords of Buckingham and Derby.

BUCKINGHAM

Good time of day unto your royal grace!

STANLEY

God make your majesty joyful as you have been!

QUEEN ELIZABETH

The Countess Richmond,^o good my Lord of Derby, 20
 To your good prayer will scarcely say, "Amen."

 And loves not me, be you, good lord, assured
 I hate not you for her proud arrogance.

STANLEY

255 I do beseech you, either not believe 25
 The envious slanders of her false accusers,
 Or, if she be accused on true report,
 Bear with her weakness, which I think proceeds
 From wayward sickness and no grounded malice.

260 QUEEN ELIZABETH

Saw you the king today, my Lord of Derby? 30

STANLEY

But now^o the Duke of Buckingham and I
 Are come from visiting his majesty.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

What likelihood of his amendment, lords?

BUCKINGHAM

Madam, good hope; his grace speaks cheerfully.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

God grant him health! Did you confer with him? 35

BUCKINGHAM

Ay, madam; he desires to make atonement^o
 Between the Duke of Gloucester and your brothers,
 And between them and my Lord Chamberlain,^o
 And sent to warn^o them to his royal presence.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Would all were well! But that will never be. 40
 I fear our happiness is at the height.

Enter RICHARD [and HASTINGS].

RICHARD

They do me wrong, and I will not endure it!
 Who is it that complains unto the king
 That I, forsooth, am stern, and love them not?
 10 By holy Paul, they love his grace but lightly 45
 That fill his ears with such dissentious rumors.
 Because I cannot flatter and look fair,
 Smile in men's faces, smooth, deceive, and cog,^o
 Duck with French nods and apish courtesy,
 I must be held a rancorous enemy. 50
 Cannot a plain man live and think no harm
 But thus his simple truth must be abused
 15 With silken, sly, insinuating Jacks?^o

GREY

To who in all this presence speaks your grace?

RICHARD

To thee, that hast nor honesty nor grace.^o 55
 When have I injured thee? When done thee wrong?
 Or thee? Or thee? Or any of your faction?
 A plague upon you all! His royal grace—
 Whom God preserve better than you would wish!—
 Cannot be quiet scarce a breathing while^o 60
 But you must trouble him with lewd^o complaints.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Brother of Gloucester, you mistake the matter.

 And not provoked by any suitor else,

RICHARD

I cannot tell; the world is grown so bad
That wrens make prey where eagles dare not perch. 70
Since every Jack became a gentleman,
There's many a gentle° person made a Jack.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Come, come, we know your meaning, brother
Gloucester.

You envy my advancement and my friends'.
God grant we never may have need of you! 75

RICHARD

Meantime, God grants that I have need of you.
Our brother is imprisoned by your means,
Myself disgraced, and the nobility
Held in contempt, while great promotions
Are daily given to ennoble those 80
That scarce, some two days since, were worth a noble.°

QUEEN ELIZABETH

By Him that raised me to this careful° height
From that contented hap° which I enjoyed,
I never did incense his majesty
Against the Duke of Clarence, but have been 85
An earnest advocate to plead for him.
My lord, you do me shameful injury
Falsely to draw me in° these vile suspects.°

RICHARD

You may deny that you were not the mean
Of my Lord Hastings' late imprisonment. 90

RIVERS

She may, my lord, for—

RICHARD

She may, Lord Rivers! Why, who knows not so?
She may do more, sir, than denying that:
She may help you to many fair preferments,°
And then deny her aiding hand therein 95
And lay those honors on your high desert.
What may she not? She may, ay, marry,° may she!

RIVERS

What, marry, may she?

RICHARD

What, marry, may she! Marry with a king,
A bachelor and a handsome stripling too. 100
Iwis° your grandam had a worser match.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

My Lord of Gloucester, I have too long borne
Your blunt upbraidings and your bitter scoffs.
By heaven, I will acquaint his majesty
Of those gross taunts that oft I have endured. 105
I had rather be a country servant maid
Than a great queen with this condition,
To be so baited,° scorned, and stormèd at.

Enter old QUEEN MARGARET, [behind].

Small joy have I in being England's queen.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

And less'ned be that small, God I beseech him! 110
Thy honor, state, and seat is due to me.

RICHARD

What! Threat you me with telling of the king?
Tell him and spare not. Look what° I have said
I will avouch in presence of the king.

I dare adventure to be sent to th' Tow'r. 115

'Tis time to speak; my pains° are quite forgot.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

Out, devil! I do remember them too well.
Thou kill'dst my husband Henry in the Tower
And Edward, my poor son, at Tewkesbury.

RICHARD

Ere you were queen, ay, or your husband king, 120
I was a packhorse in his great affairs,
A weeder-out of his proud adversaries,
A liberal rewarder of his friends;
To royalize his blood I spent mine own.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

Ay, and much better blood than his or thine. 125

RICHARD

In all which time you and your husband Grey
Were factious for the house of Lancaster;
And, Rivers, so were you. Was not your husband
In Margaret's battle° at Saint Albans slain? 130
Let me put in your minds, if you forget,
What you have been ere this, and what you are;
Withal, what I have been, and what I am.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

A murd'rous villain, and so still thou art.

RICHARD

Poor Clarence did forsake his father° Warwick;
Ay, and forswore himself—which Jesu pardon!— 135

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

Which God revenge!

RICHARD

To fight on Edward's party for the crown;
And for his meed,° poor lord, he is mewèd up.
I would to God my heart were flint like Edward's,
Or Edward's soft and pitiful like mine. 140
I am too childish-foolish for this world.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

Hie thee to hell for shame and leave this world,
Thou cacodemon!° There thy kingdom is. 100

RIVERS

My Lord of Gloucester, in those busy days
Which here you urge to prove us enemies, 145
We followed then our lord, our sovereign king.
So should we you, if you should be our king.

RICHARD

If I should be! I had rather be a peddler.
Far be it from my heart, the thought thereof!

QUEEN ELIZABETH

As little joy, my lord, as you suppose 150
You should enjoy were you this country's king,
As little joy you may suppose in me
That I enjoy, being the queen thereof.

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

A little joy enjoys the queen thereof;
For I am she, and altogether joyless.
I can no longer hold me patient.

[Comes forward.]

Hear me, you wrangling pirates, that fall out
In sharing that which you have pill'd^o from me!
Which of you trembles not that looks on me?
If not, that I am queen, you bow like subjects,
Yet that,^o by you deposed, you quake like rebels.
Ah, gentle^o villain, do not turn away!

RICHARD

Foul wrinkled witch, what mak'st thou^o in my sight?

QUEEN MARGARET

But repetition of what thou hast marred;
That will I make before I let thee go.

RICHARD

Wert thou not banish'd on pain of death?

QUEEN MARGARET

I was; but I do find more pain in banishment
Than death can yield me here by my abode.
A husband and a son thou ow'st to me;
And thou a kingdom; all of you allegiance.
This sorrow that I have, by right is yours,
And all the pleasures you usurp are mine.

RICHARD

The curse my noble father laid on thee
When thou didst crown his warlike brows with paper
And with thy scorns drew'st rivers from his eyes
And then to dry them gav'st the duke a clout^o
Steeped in the faultless blood of pretty Rutland,
His curses then from bitterness of soul
Denounced against thee are all fall'n upon thee;
And God, not we, hath plagued thy bloody deed.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

So just is God to right the innocent.

HASTINGS

O, 'twas the foulest deed to slay that babe
And the most merciless that e'er was heard of!

RIVERS

Tyrants themselves wept when it was reported.

DORSET

No man but prophesied revenge for it.

BUCKINGHAM

Northumberland, then present, wept to see it.

QUEEN MARGARET

What! Were you snarling all before I came,
Ready to catch each other by the throat,
And turn you all your hatred now on me?
Did York's dread curse prevail so much with heaven
That Henry's death, my lovely Edward's death,
Their kingdom's loss, my woeful banishment,
Should all but answer^o for that peevish^o brat?
Can curses pierce the clouds and enter heaven?
Why then, give way, dull clouds, to my quick^o curses!

For Edward our son, that was Prince of Wales,
Die in his youth by like untimely violence!
Thyself a queen, for me that was a queen,
Outlive thy glory like my wretched self!
Long mayst thou live to wail thy children's death
And see another, as I see thee now,
Decked in thy rights as thou art stalled^o in mine!
Long die thy happy days before thy death,
And, after many length'ned hours of grief,
Die neither mother, wife, nor England's queen!
Rivers and Dorset, you were standers-by,
And so wast thou, Lord Hastings, when my son
Was stabbed with bloody daggers. God I pray him
That none of you may live his natural age,
But by some unlooked accident cut off!

RICHARD

Have done thy charm,^o thou hateful withered hag!

QUEEN MARGARET

And leave out thee? Stay, dog, for thou shalt hear me.
If heaven have any grievous plague in store
Exceeding those that I can wish upon thee,
O, let them keep it till thy sins be ripe
And then hurl down their indignation
On thee, the troubler of the poor world's peace!
The worm of conscience still begnaw thy soul!
Thy friends suspect for traitors while thou liv'st,
And take deep traitors for thy dearest friends!
No sleep close up that deadly eye of thine,
Unless it be while some tormenting dream
Affrights thee with a hell of ugly devils!
Thou elvish-marked,^o abortive, rooting hog!^o
Thou that wast sealed^o in thy nativity
The slave of nature and the son of hell!

RICHARD

Margaret.

QUEEN MARGARET Richard!

RICHARD Ha?

QUEEN MARGARET I call thee not.

RICHARD

I cry thee mercy^o then, for I did think
That thou hadst called me all these bitter names.

QUEEN MARGARET

Why, so I did, but looked for no reply.
O, let me make the period^o to my curse!

RICHARD

'Tis done by me, and ends in "Margaret."

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Thus have you breathed your curse against yourself.

245

HASTINGS

False-boding woman, end thy frantic curse,
Lest to thy harm thou move our patience.

QUEEN MARGARET

Foul shame upon you! You have all moved mine.

RIVERS

Were you well served, you would be taught your duty.

QUEEN MARGARET

To serve me well, you all should do me duty,
Teach me to be your queen and you my subjects.
O, serve me well and teach yourselves that duty!

250

DORSET

Dispute not with her; she is lunatic.

QUEEN MARGARET

Peace, Master Marquis, you are malapert.^o
Your fire-new stamp^o of honor is scarce current.
O, that your young nobility could judge
What 'twere to lose it and be miserable!
They that stand high have many blasts to shake them,
And if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces.

255

RICHARD

Good counsel, marry! Learn it, learn it, marquis.

260

DORSET

It touches you, my lord, as much as me.

RICHARD

Ay, and much more; but I was born so high.
Our aerie^o buildeth in the cedar's top
And dallies with the wind and scorns the sun.

QUEEN MARGARET

And turns the sun to shade, alas! alas!
Witness my son, now in the shade of death,
Whose bright outshining beams thy cloudy wrath
Hath in eternal darkness folded up.
Your aerie buildeth in our aerie's nest.
O God, that see'st it, do not suffer it!
As it is won with blood, lost be it so!

265

BUCKINGHAM

Peace, peace, for shame, if not for charity.

QUEEN MARGARET

Urge neither charity nor shame to me.
Uncharitably with me have you dealt,
And shamefully my hopes by you are butchered.
My charity is outrage, life my shame,
And in that shame still live my sorrow's rage!

275

BUCKINGHAM

Have done, have done.

QUEEN MARGARET

O princely Buckingham, I'll kiss thy hand
In sign of league and amity with thee.
Now fair befall thee and thy noble house!
Thy garments are not spotted with our blood,
Nor thou within the compass of my curse.

280

BUCKINGHAM

Nor no one here; for curses never pass
The lips of those that breathe them in the air.

285

QUEEN MARGARET

I will not think but they ascend the sky
And there awake God's gentle-sleeping peace.
O Buckingham, take heed of yonder dog!
Look when^o he fawns he bites; and when he bites
His venom tooth will rankle to the death.
Have not to do with him, beware of him.
Sin, death, and hell have set their marks on him
And all their ministers attend on him.

290

RICHARD

What doth she say, my Lord of Buckingham?

BUCKINGHAM

Nothing that I respect,^o my gracious lord.

295

QUEEN MARGARET

What, dost thou scorn me for my gentle counsel
And soothe the devil that I warn thee from?
O, but remember this another day,
When he shall split thy very heart with sorrow,
And say poor Margaret was a prophetess.
Live each of you the subjects to his hate,
And he to yours, and all of you to God's!

300

Exit.

BUCKINGHAM

My hair doth stand on end to hear her curses.

RIVERS

And so doth mine. I muse^o why she's at liberty.

RICHARD

I cannot blame her. By God's holy mother,
She hath had too much wrong, and I repent
My part thereof that I have done to her.

305

QUEEN ELIZABETH

I never did her any to my knowledge.

RICHARD

Yet you have all the vantage of her wrong:
I was too hot to do somebody good
That is too cold in thinking of it now.
Marry, as for Clarence, he is well repaid;
He is franked up^o to fattening for his pains.
God pardon them that are the cause thereof!

310

RIVERS

A virtuous and a Christianlike conclusion,
To pray for them that have done scathe^o to us.

315

RICHARD

So do I ever—[speaks to himself] being well advised;
For had I cursed now, I had cursed myself.

Enter CATESBY.

CATESBY

Madam, his majesty doth call for you;
And for your grace; and yours, my gracious lord.

320

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Catesby, I come. Lords, will you go with me?

RIVERS

We wait upon your grace.

Exeunt all but [RICHARD Duke of] Gloucester.

RICHARD

I do the wrong, and first begin to brawl.
The secret mischiefs that I set abroad^o
I lay unto the grievous charge of others.
Clarence, who I indeed have cast in darkness,

325

 Namely to Derby, Hastings, Buckingham,
 And tell them 'tis the queen and her allies^o
 That stir the king against the duke my brother. 330
 Now they believe it, and withal whet me
 To be revenged on Rivers, Dorset, Grey.
 But then I sigh, and with a piece of Scripture
 Tell them that God bids us do good for evil;
 And thus I clothe my naked villainy 335
 With odd old ends stol'n forth of holy writ,
 And seem a saint when most I play the devil.

Enter two MURDERERS.

But soft! Here come my executioners.
 How now, my hardy, stout-resolvèd mates!
 Are you now going to dispatch this thing? 340

FIRST MURDERER

We are, my lord, and come to have the warrant
 That we may be admitted where he is.

RICHARD

Well thought upon; I have it here about me.

[Gives the warrant.]

When you have done, repair to Crosby Place.
 But, sirs, be sudden in the execution, 345
 Withal obdurate, do not hear him plead;
 For Clarence is well-spoken, and perhaps
 May move your hearts to pity if you mark him.

FIRST MURDERER

Tut, tut, my lord, we will not stand to prate.
 Talkers are no good doers; be assured 350
 We go to use our hands and not our tongues.

RICHARD

Your eyes drop millstones when fools' eyes fall^o tears.
 I like you, lads; about your business straight.^o
 Go, go, dispatch.

FIRST MURDERER We will, my noble lord. Exeunt.

Scene IV. [The Tower.]

Enter CLARENCE and KEEPER.

KEEPER

Why looks your grace so heavily^o today?

CLARENCE

O, I have passed a miserable night,
 So full of fearful dreams, of ugly sights,
 That, as I am a Christian faithful man,
 I would not spend another such a night 5
 Though 'twere to buy a world of happy days,
 So full of dismal terror was the time.

KEEPER

What was your dream, my lord? I pray you tell me.

CLARENCE

Methoughts^o that I had broken from the Tower
 And was embarked to cross to Burgundy, 10
 And in my company my brother Gloucester,
 Who from my cabin tempted me to walk
 Upon the hatches. Thence we looked toward England
 And cited up a thousand heavy times,

During the wars of York and Lancaster, 15
 That had befall'n us. As we paced along
 Upon the giddy footing of the hatches,
 Methought that Gloucester stumbled, and in falling
 Struck me (that thought to stay^o him) overboard 20
 Into the tumbling billows of the main.^o

O Lord, methought what pain it was to drown!
 What dreadful noise of water in mine ears!

What sights of ugly death within mine eyes! 335
 Methoughts I saw a thousand fearful wracks;
 A thousand men that fishes gnawed upon;
 Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
 Inestimable stones, unvaluèd^o jewels,
 All scatt'rd in the bottom of the sea.
 Some lay in dead men's skulls, and in the holes 30
 Where eyes did once inhabit there were crept,
 As 'twere in scorn of eyes, reflecting gems
 That wooed the slimy bottom of the deep
 And mocked the dead bones that lay scatt'rd by.

KEEPER

Had you such leisure in the time of death
 To gaze upon these secrets of the deep? 35

CLARENCE

Methought I had; and often did I strive 345
 To yield the ghost, but still the envious flood
 Stopped in my soul and would not let it forth
 To find the empty, vast, and wand'ring air,
 But smothered it within my panting bulk,^o 40
 Who almost burst to belch it in the sea.

KEEPER

Awaked you not in this sore agony? 350

CLARENCE

No, no, my dream was lengthened after life.
 O, then began the tempest to my soul!
 I passed, methought, the melancholy flood, 45
 With that sour ferryman^o which poets write of,
 Unto the kingdom of perpetual night.
 The first that there did greet my stranger soul
 Was my great father-in-law, renownèd Warwick,
 Who spake aloud, "What scourge for perjury 50
 Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?"
 And so he vanished. Then came wand'ring by
 A shadow like an angel, with bright hair
 Dabbled in blood, and he shrieked out aloud,
 "Clarence is come, false, fleeting,^o perjured Clarence, 55
 That stabbed me in the field by Tewkesbury.
 Seize on him, Furies, take him unto torment!"
 With that, methought, a legion of foul fiends
 Environed me and howlèd in mine ears 5
 Such hideous cries that with the very noise 60
 I, trembling, waked, and for a season after
 Could not believe but that I was in hell,
 Such terrible impression made my dream.

KEEPER

No marvel, lord, though it affrighted you. 10
 I am afraid, methinks, to hear you tell it. 65

CLARENCE

Ah, keeper, keeper, I have done these things
 That now give evidence against my soul
 For Edward's sake, and see how he requites me!

But thou wilt be avenged on my misdeeds,
Yet execute thy wrath in me alone.
O, spare my guiltless wife and my poor children!
Keeper, I prithee sit by me awhile.
My soul is heavy, and I fain would sleep.

KEEPER

I will, my lord. God give your grace good rest!

[CLARENCE sleeps.]

Enter BRAKENBURY, the lieutenant.

BRAKENBURY

Sorrow breaks seasons and reposing hours,
Makes the night morning and the noontide night.
Princes have but their titles for their glories,
An outward honor for an inward toil,
And for unfelt imaginations°
They often feel a world of restless cares;
So that between their titles and low name
There's nothing differs but the outward fame.

Enter two MURDERERS.

FIRST MURDERER Ho! Who's here?

BRAKENBURY

What wouldst thou, fellow? And how can'st thou hither?

FIRST MURDERER I would speak with Clarence, and
I came hither on my legs.

BRAKENBURY What, so brief?

SECOND MURDERER 'Tis better, sir, than to be tedious. Let him see our commission, and talk no more.

[BRAKENBURY] reads [it].

BRAKENBURY

I am in this commanded to deliver
The noble Duke of Clarence to your hands.
I will not reason what is meant hereby,
Because I will be guiltless from the meaning.
There lies the duke asleep, and there the keys.
I'll to the king and signify to him
That thus I have resigned to you my charge.

FIRST MURDERER You may, sir, 'tis a point of wisdom. Fare you well.

Exit [BRAKENBURY, with KEEPER].

SECOND MURDERER What, shall we stab him as he sleeps?

FIRST MURDERER No, he'll say 'twas done cowardly
when he wakes.

SECOND MURDERER Why, he shall never wake until the great Judgment Day.

FIRST MURDERER Why, then he'll say we stabbed him sleeping.

SECOND MURDERER The urging of that word
"judgment" hath bred a kind of remorse in me.

FIRST MURDERER What, art thou afraid?

SECOND MURDERER Not to kill him, having a warrant; but to be damned for killing him, from the which no warrant can defend me.

FIRST MURDERER I thought thou hadst been resolute.

SECOND MURDERER So I am—to let him live.

FIRST MURDERER I'll back to the Duke of Gloucester and tell him so.

SECOND MURDERER Nay, I prithee stay a little. I hope this passionate humor° of mine will change; it was wont to hold me but while one tells° twenty.

FIRST MURDERER How dost thou feel thyself now?

SECOND MURDERER Faith, some certain dregs of conscience are yet within me.

FIRST MURDERER Remember our reward when the deed's done.

SECOND MURDERER Zounds,° he dies! I had forgot the reward.

FIRST MURDERER Where's thy conscience now?

SECOND MURDERER O, in the Duke of Gloucester's purse.

FIRST MURDERER When he opens his purse to give us our reward, thy conscience flies out.

SECOND MURDERER 'Tis no matter, let it go. There's few or none will entertain it.

FIRST MURDERER What if it come to thee again?

SECOND MURDERER I'll not meddle with it; it makes a man a coward. A man cannot steal, but it accuseth him; a man cannot swear, but it checks him; a man cannot lie with his neighbor's wife, but it detects him. 'Tis a blushing shamefaced spirit that mutinies in a man's bosom. It fills a man full of obstacles.
It made me once restore a purse of gold that, by chance, I found. It beggars any man that keeps it.
It is turned out of towns and cities for a dangerous thing, and every man that means to live well endeavors to trust to himself and live without it.

FIRST MURDERER Zounds, 'tis even now at my elbow, persuading me not to kill the duke.

SECOND MURDERER Take the devil in thy mind, and believe him° not. He would insinuate with thee but to make thee sigh.

FIRST MURDERER I am strong-framed; he cannot prevail with me.

SECOND MURDERER Spoke like a tall° man that respects thy reputation. Come, shall we fall to work?

FIRST MURDERER Take him on the costard° with the hilts of thy sword, and then throw him into the malmsey butt° in the next room.

SECOND MURDERER O excellent device! And make a sop° of him.

FIRST MURDERER Soft, he wakes.

SECOND MURDERER Strike!

FIRST MURDERER No, we'll reason° with him.

CLARENCE

Where art thou, keeper? Give me a cup of wine.

SECOND MURDERER

You shall have wine enough, my lord, anon.

CLARENCE

In God's name, what art thou?

FIRST MURDERER

A man, as you are.

CLARENCE

But not as I am, royal.

FIRST MURDERER

Nor you as we are, loyal.

FIRST MURDERER

My voice is now the king's, my looks mine own.

CLARENCE

How darkly and how deadly dost thou speak!

Your eyes do menace me. Why look you pale?

Who sent you hither? Wherefore do you come?

SECOND MURDERER To, to, to—

CLARENCE

To murder me?

BOTH Ay, ay.

CLARENCE

You scarcely have the hearts to tell me so,

And therefore cannot have the hearts to do it.

Wherein, my friends, have I offended you?

FIRST MURDERER

Offended us you have not, but the king.

CLARENCE

I shall be reconciled to him again.

SECOND MURDERER

Never, my lord; therefore prepare to die.

CLARENCE

Are you drawn forth among a world of men

To slay the innocent? What is my offense?

Where is the evidence that doth accuse me?

What lawful quest^o have given their verdict up

Unto the frowning judge? Or who pronounced

The bitter sentence of poor Clarence' death?

Before I be convict by course of law,

To threaten me with death is most unlawful.

I charge you, as you hope to have redemption

By Christ's dear blood shed for our grievous sins,

That you depart, and lay no hands on me.

The deed you undertake is damnable.^o

FIRST MURDERER

What we will do, we do upon command.

SECOND MURDERER

And he that hath commanded is our king.

CLARENCE

Erroneous vassals! The great King of Kings

Hath in the table of his law commanded

That thou shalt do no murder. Will you then

Spurn at his edict and fulfill a man's?

Take heed; for he holds vengeance in his hand

To hurl upon their heads that break his law.

SECOND MURDERER

And that same vengeance doth he hurl on thee

For false forswearing and for murder too.

Thou didst receive the sacrament to fight

In quarrel of the house of Lancaster.

FIRST MURDERER

And like a traitor to the name of God

Didst break that vow, and with thy treacherous blade

Unrip'st the bowels of thy sov'reign's son.

SECOND MURDERER

Whom thou wast sworn to cherish and defend.

FIRST MURDERER

How canst thou urge God's dreadful law to us

When thou hast broke it in such dear^o degree?

CLARENCE

170 Alas! For whose sake did I that ill deed?

For Edward, for my brother, for his sake. 215

He sends you not to murder me for this,

For in that sin he is as deep as I.

If God will be avengèd for the deed,

O, know you yet he doth it publicly.

Take not the quarrel from his pow'rful arm. 220

175 He needs no indirect or lawless course

To cut off those that have offended him.

FIRST MURDERER

Who made thee then a bloody minister

When gallant-springing brave Plantagenet,

That princely novice,^o was struck dead by thee? 225

CLARENCE

180 My brother's love, the devil, and my rage.

FIRST MURDERER

Thy brother's love, our duty, and thy faults

Provoke us hither now to slaughter thee.

CLARENCE

If you do love my brother, hate not me.

I am his brother, and I love him well. 230

If you are hired for meed,^o go back again,

And I will send you to my brother Gloucester,

185 Who shall reward you better for my life

Than Edward will for tidings of my death.

SECOND MURDERER

You are deceived; your brother Gloucester hates you. 235

CLARENCE

190 O, no, he loves me and he holds me dear.

Go you to him from me.

FIRST MURDERER

Ay, so we will.

CLARENCE

Tell him, when that our princely father York

195 Blessed his three sons with his victorious arm

And charged us from his soul to love each other, 240

He little thought of this divided friendship.

Bid Gloucester think on this, and he will weep.

FIRST MURDERER

Ay, millstones, as he lessoned^o us to weep.

CLARENCE

O, do not slander him, for he is kind.

200 FIRST MURDERER

Right as^o snow in harvest. Come, you deceive yourself. 245

'Tis he that sends us to destroy you here.

CLARENCE

It cannot be, for he bewept my fortune

205 And hugged me in his arms and swore with sobs

That he would labor^o my delivery.

FIRST MURDERER

Why so he doth, when he delivers you 250

From this earth's thralldom to the joys of heaven.

SECOND MURDERER

210 Make peace with God, for you must die, my lord.

CLARENCE

Have you that holy feeling in your souls

To counsel me to make my peace with God,

And are you yet to your own souls so blind 255

CLARENCE Relent, and save your souls.

FIRST MURDERER

Relent! No. 'Tis cowardly and womanish.

CLARENCE

Not to relent is beastly, savage, devilish.

[To SECOND MURDERER.]

My friend, I spy some pity in thy looks.

O, if thine eye be not a flatterer,

Come thou on my side and entreat for me.

A begging prince what beggar pities not?

Which of you, if you were a prince's son,

Being pent from liberty as I am now,

If two such murderers as yourselves came to you,

Would not entreat for life? As you would beg,

Were you in my distress—

SECOND MURDERER

Look behind you, my lord!

FIRST MURDERER

Take that! And that! (Stabs him.) If all this will not do,
I'll drown you in the malmsey butt within.

Exit [with the body].

SECOND MURDERER

A bloody deed and desperately dispatched!

How fain, like Pilate, would I wash my hands

Of this most grievous murder!

Enter FIRST MURDERER.

FIRST MURDERER

How now? What mean'st thou that thou help'st me not?

By heaven, the duke shall know how slack you have been.

SECOND MURDERER

I would he knew that I had saved his brother!

Take thou the fee, and tell him what I say,

For I repent me that the duke is slain.

Exit.

FIRST MURDERER

So do not I. Go, coward as thou art.

Well, I'll go hide the body in some hole

Till that the duke give order for his burial;

And when I have my meed, I will away,

For this will out, and then I must not stay.

Exit.

ACT II

Scene I. [The palace.]

Flourish.^o Enter the KING [EDWARD], sick, the QUEEN [ELIZABETH], Lord Marquis DORSET, [GREY,] RIVERS, HASTINGS, CATESBY, BUCKINGHAM, WOODVILLE, [and SCALES].

KING EDWARD

Why, so. Now have I done a good day's work.

You peers, continue this united league.

I every day expect an embassy

From my Redeemer to redeem me hence;

And more in peace my soul shall part to heaven,

Since I have made my friends at peace on earth.

Rivers and Hastings, take each other's hand;

Dissemble^o not your hatred, swear your love.

RIVERS

By heaven, my soul is purged from grudging hate,

And with my hand I seal my true heart's love.

HASTINGS

So thrive I as I truly swear the like!

KING EDWARD

Take heed you dally^o not before your king,

Lest he that is the supreme King of Kings

Confound your hidden falsehood and award

Either of you to be the other's end.

HASTINGS

So prosper I as I swear perfect love!

RIVERS

And I as I love Hastings with my heart!

KING EDWARD

Madam, yourself is not exempt from this;

Nor you, son Dorset; Buckingham, nor you;

You have been factious one against the other.

Wife, love Lord Hastings, let him kiss your hand,

And what you do, do it unfeignedly.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

There, Hastings. I will never more remember

Our former hatred, so thrive I and mine!

KING EDWARD

Dorset, embrace him; Hastings, love Lord Marquis.

DORSET

This interchange of love, I here protest,

Upon my part shall be inviolable.

HASTINGS

And so swear I.

KING EDWARD

Now, princely Buckingham, seal thou this league

With thy embracements to my wife's allies,

And make me happy in your unity.

BUCKINGHAM [To the QUEEN.]

Whenever Buckingham doth turn his hate

Upon your grace, but^o with all duteous love

Doth cherish you and yours, God punish me

With hate in those where I expect most love!

When I have most need to employ a friend,

And most assurèd that he is a friend,

Deep, hollow, treacherous, and full of guile

KING EDWARD

A pleasing cordial, princely Buckingham,
Is this thy vow unto my sickly heart.
There wanteth now our brother Gloucester here
To make the blessed period° of this peace.

BUCKINGHAM

And in good time,
Here comes Sir Richard Ratcliffe and the duke.

Enter RATCLIFFE and [RICHARD Duke of] Gloucester.

RICHARD

Good morrow to my sovereign king and queen;
And, princely peers, a happy time of day!

KING EDWARD

Happy indeed, as we have spent the day.
Gloucester, we have done deeds of charity,
Made peace of enmity, fair love of hate,
Between these swelling wrong-incensed peers.

RICHARD

A blessed labor, my most sovereign lord.
Among this princely heap° if any here
By false intelligence or wrong surmise
Hold me a foe;
If I unwittingly, or in my rage,
Have aught committed that is hardly borne°
By any in this presence, I desire
To reconcile me to his friendly peace.
'Tis death to me to be at enmity;
I hate it, and desire all good men's love.
First, madam, I entreat true peace of you,
Which I will purchase with my duteous service;
Of you, my noble cousin Buckingham,
If ever any grudge were lodged between us;
Of you and you, Lord Rivers and of Dorset,
That all without desert° have frowned on me;
Of you, Lord Woodville, and, Lord Scales,° of you;
Dukes, earls, lords, gentlemen; indeed, of all.
I do not know that Englishman alive
With whom my soul is any jot at odds
More than the infant that is born tonight.
I thank my God for my humility.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

A holy day shall this be kept hereafter.
I would to God all strifes were well compounded.°
My sovereign lord, I do beseech your highness
To take our brother Clarence to your grace.

RICHARD

Why, madam, have I off'ered love for this,
To be so flouted in this royal presence?
Who knows not that the gentle duke is dead?

They all start.

You do him injury to scorn his corse.

KING EDWARD

40 Who knows not he is dead! Who knows he is?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

All-seeing heaven, what a world is this!

BUCKINGHAM

Look I so pale, Lord Dorset, as the rest?

85

DORSET

Ay, my good lord; and no man in the presence
But his red color hath forsook his cheeks.

KING EDWARD

45 Is Clarence dead? The order was reversed.

RICHARD

But he, poor man, by your first order died,
And that a wingèd Mercury did bear;

90

Some tardy cripple bare the countermand,
That came too lag° to see him buried.

God grant that some, less noble and less loyal,
Nearer in bloody thoughts, and° not in blood,
Deserve not worse than wretched Clarence did,

95

50 And yet go current from° suspicion!

Enter [Lord STANLEY] Earl of Derby.

STANLEY

A boon, my sovereign, for my service done!

KING EDWARD

55 I prithee peace. My soul is full of sorrow.

STANLEY

I will not rise unless your highness hear me.

KING EDWARD

Then say at once what is it thou requests.

100

STANLEY

60 The forfeit, sovereign, of my servant's life,°
Who slew today a riotous gentleman
Lately attendant on the Duke of Norfolk.

KING EDWARD

65 Have I a tongue to doom my brother's death,
And shall that tongue give pardon to a slave?
My brother killed no man, his fault was thought,
And yet his punishment was bitter death.

105

70 Who sued to me for him? Who, in my wrath,
Kneeled at my feet and bid me be advised?°
Who spoke of brotherhood? Who spoke of love?

110

Who told me how the poor soul did forsake
The mighty Warwick and did fight for me?
Who told me, in the field at Tewkesbury
When Oxford had me down, he rescued me
And said, "Dear brother, live, and be a king"?

115

75 Who told me, when we both lay in the field
Frozen almost to death, how he did lap° me
Even in his garments, and did give himself
All thin and naked, to the numb-cold night?

80 All this from my remembrance brutish wrath
Sinfully plucked, and not a man of you
Had so much grace to put it in my mind.

120

But when your carters or your waiting vassals
Have done a drunken slaughter and defaced
The precious image of our dear Redeemer,
You straight are on your knees for "Pardon, pardon!"
And I, unjustly too, must grant it you.

 Yet none of you would once beg for his life.
 O God, I fear thy justice will take hold
 On me and you, and mine and yours, for this!
 Come, Hastings, help me to my closet.^o Ah, poor
 Clarence! Exeunt some with KING and QUEEN. 135

RICHARD
 This is the fruits of rashness. Marked you not
 How that the guilty kindred of the queen
 Looked pale when they did hear of Clarence' death?
 O, they did urge it still unto the king!
 God will revenge it. Come, lords, will you go 140
 To comfort Edward with our company?

BUCKINGHAM
 We wait upon your grace. Exeunt.

Scene II. [The palace.]

Enter the old DUCHESS OF YORK, with the two CHILDREN of Clarence.

BOY
 Good grandam, tell us, is our father dead?

DUCHESS OF YORK No, boy.

DAUGHTER
 Why do you weep so oft, and beat your breast,
 And cry, "O Clarence, my unhappy son"?

BOY
 Why do you look on us, and shake your head, 5
 And call us orphans, wretches, castaways,
 If that our noble father were alive?

DUCHESS OF YORK
 My pretty cousins,^o you mistake me both.
 I do lament the sickness of the king,
 As loath to lose him, not your father's death. 10
 It were lost sorrow to wail one that's lost.

BOY
 Then you conclude, my grandam, he is dead.
 The king mine uncle is too blame^o for it.
 God will revenge it, whom I will importune
 With earnest prayers all to that effect. 15

DAUGHTER
 And so will I.

DUCHESS OF YORK
 Peace, children, peace! The king doth love you well.
 Incapable^o and shallow innocents,
 You cannot guess who caused your father's death.

BOY
 Grandam, we can; for my good uncle Gloucester 20
 Told me the king, provoked to it by the queen,
 Devised impeachments^o to imprison him;
 And when my uncle told me so, he wept,
 And pitied me, and kindly kissed my cheek;
 Bade me rely on him as on my father, 25
 And he would love me dearly as a child.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Ah, that deceit should steal such gentle shape^o
 And with a virtuous visor^o hide deep vice!
 He is my son, ay, and therein my shame;
 Yet from my dugs he drew not this deceit. 30

BOY

Think you my uncle did dissemble, grandam?

DUCHESS OF YORK Ay, boy.

BOY

I cannot think it. Hark! What noise is this?

Enter the QUEEN [ELIZABETH], with her hair about her ears, RIVERS and DORSET after her.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ah, who shall hinder me to wail and weep,
 To chide my fortune, and torment myself? 35
 I'll join with black despair against my soul
 And to myself become an enemy.

DUCHESS OF YORK

What means this scene of rude impatience?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

To make an act of tragic violence.
 Edward, my lord, thy son, our king, is dead! 40
 Why grow the branches when the root is gone?
 Why wither not the leaves that want their sap?
 If you will live, lament; if die, be brief,
 That our swift-wingèd souls may catch the king's,
 Or like obedient subjects follow him 45
 To his new kingdom of ne'er-changing night.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Ah, so much interest^o have I in thy sorrow
 As I had title^o in thy noble husband!
 I have bewept a worthy husband's death,
 And lived with looking on his images;^o 50
 But now two mirrors of his princely semblance^o
 Are cracked in pieces by malignant death,
 And I for comfort have but one false glass
 That grieves me when I see my shame in him.
 Thou art a widow, yet thou art a mother 55
 And hast the comfort of thy children left;
 But death hath snatched my husband from mine arms
 And plucked two crutches from my feeble hands,
 Clarence and Edward. O, what^o cause have I,
 Thine being but a moi'ty of my moan,^o 60
 To overgo thy woes and drown thy cries!

BOY

Ah, aunt, you wept not for our father's death.
 How can we aid you with our kindred tears?

Our fatherless distress was left unmoaned;
 Your widow-dolor likewise be unwept! 65

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Give me no help in lamentation;
 I am not barren to bring forth complaints.
 All springs reduce^o their currents to mine eyes,
 That I, being governed by the watery moon,
 May send forth plenteous tears to drown the world. 70

DUCHESS OF YORK

Was never mother had so dear a loss.

Alas, I am the mother of these griefs! 80

Their woes are parceled,^o mine is general.

She for an Edward weeps, and so do I;

I for a Clarence weep, so doth not she.

These babes for Clarence weep, and so do I;

I for an Edward weep, so do not they. 85

Alas, you three on me, threefold distressed,

Pour all your tears! I am your sorrow's nurse,

And I will pamper it with lamentation.

DORSET

Comfort, dear mother; God is much displeased

That you take with unthankfulness his doing. 90

In common worldly things 'tis called ungrateful

With dull unwillingness to repay a debt

Which with a bounteous hand was kindly lent;

Much more to be thus opposite with^o heavenFor^o it requires the royal debt it lent you. 95

RIVERS

Madam, bethink you like a careful mother

Of the young prince your son. Send straight for him;

Let him be crowned; in him your comfort lives.

Drown desperate sorrow in dead Edward's grave

And plant your joys in living Edward's throne. 100

Enter RICHARD, BUCKINGHAM, [STANLEY Earl of]
Derby, HASTINGS, and RATCLIFFE.

RICHARD

Sister, have comfort. All of us have cause

To wail the dimming of our shining star;

But none can help our harms by wailing them.

Madam, my mother, I do cry you mercy;

I did not see your grace. Humbly on my knee 105

I crave your blessing.

DUCHESS OF YORK

God bless thee, and put meekness in thy breast,

Love, charity, obedience, and true duty!

RICHARD

Amen! [Aside.] And make me die a good old man!

That is the butt-end of a mother's blessing; 110

I marvel that her grace did leave it out.

But lately splintered,^o knit, and joined together,Must gently be preserved, cherished, and kept.^oMe seemeth^o good that with some little train 120Forthwith from Ludlow the young prince be fet^o

Hither to London, to be crowned our king.

RIVERS

Why with some little train, my Lord of Buckingham?

BUCKINGHAM

Marry, my lord, lest by a multitude

The new-healed wound of malice should break out, 125

Which would be so much the more dangerous

By how much the estate is green^o and yet ungoverned.

Where every horse bears his commanding rein

And may direct his course as please himself,

As well the fear of harm as harm apparent,^o 130

In my opinion, ought to be prevented.

RICHARD

I hope the king made peace with all of us;

And the compact is firm and true in me. 85

RIVERS

And so in me; and so (I think) in all.

Yet, since it is but green, it should be put 135

To no apparent likelihood of breach,

Which haply^o by much company might be urged.

Therefore I say with noble Buckingham

That it is meet^o so few should fetch the prince.

HASTINGS

And so say I. 140

RICHARD

Then be it so; and go we to determine

Who they shall be that straight shall post to Ludlow.

Madam, and you, my sister, will you go

To give your censures^o in this business?

QUEEN AND DUCHESS OF YORK

With all our hearts. 145

Exeunt. Manet^o BUCKINGHAM and RICHARD.

BUCKINGHAM

My lord, whoever journeys to the prince,

For God sake let not us two stay at home;

For by the way I'll sort occasion,^oAs index^o to the story we late talked of,

To part the queen's proud kindred from the prince. 150

RICHARD

My other self, my counsel's consistory,^o

My oracle, my prophet, my dear cousin,

I, as a child, will go by thy direction.

Toward Ludlow then, for we'll not stay behind.

Enter one CITIZEN at one door and another at the other.

FIRST CITIZEN

Good morrow, neighbor. Whither away so fast?

SECOND CITIZEN

I promise you, I scarcely know myself.

Hear you the news abroad?

FIRST CITIZEN

Yes, that the king is dead.

SECOND CITIZEN

Ill news, by'r Lady; seldom comes the better.°

I fear, I fear 'twill prove a giddy world. 5

Enter another CITIZEN.

THIRD CITIZEN

Neighbors, Godspeed!

FIRST CITIZEN

Give you good morrow, sir.

THIRD CITIZEN

Doth the news hold of good King Edward's death?

SECOND CITIZEN

Ay, sir, it is too true, God help the while!

THIRD CITIZEN

Then, masters, look to see a troublous world.

FIRST CITIZEN

No, no; by God's good grace his son shall reign. 10

THIRD CITIZEN

Woe to that land that's governed by a child!

SECOND CITIZEN

In him there is a hope of government,
Which in his nonage counsel° under him,
And, in his full and ripened years, himself,
No doubt shall then and till then govern well. 15

FIRST CITIZEN

So stood the state when Henry the Sixth
Was crowned in Paris but at nine months old.

THIRD CITIZEN

Stood the state so? No, no, good friends, God wot!°
For then this land was famously enriched
With politic grave counsel; then the king
Had virtuous uncles to protect his grace. 20

FIRST CITIZEN

Why, so hath this, both by his father and mother.

THIRD CITIZEN

Better it were they all came by his father,
Or by his father there were none at all;
For emulation° who shall now be nearest
Will touch us all too near, if God prevent not. 25
O, full of danger is the Duke of Gloucester,
And the queen's sons and brothers haught° and proud!

And were they to be ruled,° and not to rule,
This sickly land might solace° as before. 30

FIRST CITIZEN

Come, come, we fear the worst. All will be well.

THIRD CITIZEN

When clouds are seen, wise men put on their cloaks;
When great leaves fall, then winter is at hand;
When the sun sets, who doth not look for night?

All may be well; but if God sort° it so,

'Tis more than we deserve or I expect.

SECOND CITIZEN

Truly, the hearts of men are full of fear.

You cannot reason,° almost, with a man

That looks not heavily and full of dread. 40

THIRD CITIZEN

Before the days of change, still is it so.

By a divine instinct men's minds mistrust

Ensuing danger, as by proof° we see

The water swell before a boist'rous storm.

But leave it all to God. Whither away? 45

SECOND CITIZEN

Marry, we were sent for to the justices.

THIRD CITIZEN

And so was I. I'll bear you company. Exeunt.

Scene IV. [The palace.]

Enter [the] ARCHBISHOP [of York], [the] young [Duke of] YORK, the QUEEN [ELIZABETH], and the DUCHESS [OF YORK].

10 ARCHBISHOP

Last night, I hear, they lay at Stony Stratford;

And at Northampton they do rest tonight;

Tomorrow or next day they will be here.

DUCHESS OF YORK

I long with all my heart to see the prince.

I hope he is much grown since last I saw him. 5

15 QUEEN ELIZABETH

But I hear no; they say my son of York

Has almost overta'en him in his growth.

YORK

Ay, mother, but I would not have it so.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Why, my good cousin? It is good to grow.

20 YORK

Grandam, one night as we did sit at supper, 10

My uncle Rivers talked how I did grow

More than my brother. "Ay," quoth my uncle

Gloucester,

"Small herbs have grace,° great weeds do grow apace."°

25

And since, methinks, I would not grow so fast,

Because sweet flow'rs are slow and weeds make haste. 15

DUCHESS OF YORK

Good faith, good faith, the saying did not hold

In him that did object° the same to thee.

He was the wretched'st thing when he was young,

So long a-growing and so leisurely,

That, if his rule were true, he should be gracious.° 20

ARCHBISHOP

And so no doubt he is, my gracious madam.

DUCHESS OF YORK

I hope he is; but yet let mothers doubt.

To touch his growth nearer than he touched mine. 25

DUCHESS OF YORK

How, my young York? I prithee let me hear it.

YORK

Marry, they say, my uncle grew so fast
That he could gnaw a crust at two hours old.
'Twas full two years ere I could get a tooth.
Grandam, this would have been a biting jest. 30

DUCHESS OF YORK

I prithee, pretty York, who told thee this?

YORK

Grandam, his nurse.

DUCHESS OF YORK

His nurse! Why, she was dead ere thou wast born.

YORK

If 'twere not she, I cannot tell who told me.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

A parlous^o boy! Go to, you are too shrewd.^o 35

DUCHESS OF YORK

Good madam, be not angry with the child.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Pitchers have ears.^o

Enter a MESSENGER.

ARCHBISHOP

Here comes a messenger. What news?

MESSENGER

Such news, my lord, as grieves me to report.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

How doth the prince?

MESSENGER

Well, madam, and in health. 40

DUCHESS OF YORK

What is thy news?

MESSENGER

Lord Rivers and Lord Grey are sent to Pomfret,
And with them Sir Thomas Vaughan, prisoners.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Who hath committed them?

MESSENGER

The mighty dukes,

Gloucester and Buckingham.

ARCHBISHOP

For what offense? 45

MESSENGER

The sum of all I can I have disclosed.
Why or for what the nobles were committed
Is all unknown to me, my gracious lord.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ay me! I see the ruin of my house.

The tiger now hath seized the gentle hind;^o 50

Insulting tyranny begins to jut^o

Upon the innocent and aweless^o throne.

Welcome destruction, blood, and massacre!

I see, as in a map, the end of all.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Accursèd and unquiet wrangling days, 55

How many of you have mine eyes beheld!

My husband lost his life to get the crown,

And often up and down my sons were tossed

For me to joy and weep their gain and loss;
And being seated, and domestic broils^o 60
Clean overblown, themselves, the conquerors,
Make war upon themselves, brother to brother,
Blood to blood, self against self. O preposterous^o
And frantic outrage, end thy damnèd spleen,^o
Or let me die, to look on death no more! 65

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Come, come, my boy; we will to sanctuary.^o

Madam, farewell.

DUCHESS OF YORK Stay, I will go with you.

QUEEN ELIZABETH 70

You have no cause.

ARCHBISHOP [To the QUEEN.] My gracious lady, go,

And thither bear your treasure and your goods.

For my part, I'll resign unto your grace

The seal I keep; and so betide to me

As well I tender^o you and all of yours!

Go, I'll conduct you to the sanctuary. Exeunt.

ACT III

Scene I. [A street.]

*The trumpets sound. Enter [the] young PRINCE [EDWARD], the Dukes of GLOUCESTER and BUCKINGHAM, Lord
CARDINAL, [and CATESBY,] with others.*

BUCKINGHAM

Welcome, sweet prince, to London, to your chamber.^o

RICHARD

Welcome, dear cousin, my thoughts' sovereign.

The weary way hath made you melancholy.

PRINCE EDWARD

No, uncle, but our crosses^o on the way

Have made it tedious, wearisome, and heavy. 5

I want^o more uncles here to welcome me.

RICHARD

Sweet prince, the untainted virtue of your years

Hath not yet dived into the world's deceit;

Nor more can you distinguish of a man

Than of his outward show, which, God he knows, 10

Seldom or never jumpeth^o with the heart.

Those uncles which you want were dangerous;

Your grace attended to their sug'red words

But looked not on the poison of their hearts. 15

God keep you from them, and from such false friends!

PRINCE EDWARD

God keep me from false friends! But they were none.

RICHARD

My lord, the Mayor of London comes to greet you.

55 Enter LORD MAYOR [and CITIZENS].

LORD MAYOR

God bless your grace with health and happy days!

24 flout taunt 35 parlous terribly quick-witted; shrewd sharp-tongued 37 Pitchers have ears Small pitchers have great ears (a proverb) 50 hind doe 51 jut encroach 52 aweless inspiring no awe

PRINCE EDWARD

I thank you, good my lord, and thank you all.

[MAYOR and CITIZENS stand aside.]

I thought my mother and my brother York
Would long ere this have met us on the way.
Fie, what a slug^o is Hastings that he comes not
To tell us whether they will come or no!

Enter Lord HASTINGS.

BUCKINGHAM

And in good time here comes the sweating lord.

PRINCE EDWARD

Welcome, my lord. What, will our mother come? 25

HASTINGS

On what occasion^o God he knows, not I,
The queen your mother and your brother York
Have taken sanctuary. The tender prince
Would fain have come with me to meet your grace,
But by his mother was perforce^o withheld. 30

BUCKINGHAM

Fie, what an indirect and peevish^o course
Is this of hers! Lord Cardinal, will your grace
Persuade the queen to send the Duke of York
Unto his princely brother presently?^o
If she deny, Lord Hastings, go with him
And from her jealous^o arms pluck him perforce. 35

CARDINAL

My Lord of Buckingham, if my weak oratory
Can from his mother win the Duke of York,
Anon expect him here; but if she be obdurate
To mild entreaties, God in heaven forbid
We should infringe the holy privilege
Of blessèd sanctuary! Not for all this land
Would I be guilty of so deep a sin.

BUCKINGHAM

You are too senseless-obstinate, my lord,
Too ceremonious^o and traditional.
Weigh it but with the grossness^o of this age,
You break not sanctuary in seizing him.
The benefit thereof is always granted
To those whose dealings have deserved the place
And those who have the wit to claim the place.
This prince hath neither claimed it nor deserved it,
And therefore, in mine opinion, cannot have it.
Then, taking him from thence that is not there,
You break no privilege nor charter there.
Oft have I heard of sanctuary men,
But sanctuary children ne'er till now.

CARDINAL

My lord, you shall o'errule my mind for once.
Come on, Lord Hastings, will you go with me?

HASTINGS

I go, my lord.

PRINCE EDWARD

Good lords, make all the speedy haste you may. 60
Exit CARDINAL and HASTINGS.

Say, uncle Gloucester, if our brother come,
Where shall we sojourn till our coronation?

RICHARD

Where it seems best unto your royal self.
If I may counsel you, some day or two
Your highness shall repose you at the Tower; 65
Then where you please, and shall be thought most fit
For your best health and recreation.

PRINCE EDWARD

I do not like the Tower, of any place.^o
Did Julius Caesar build that place, my lord?

BUCKINGHAM

He did, my gracious lord, begin that place, 70
Which since succeeding ages have re-edified.^o

PRINCE EDWARD

Is it upon record, or else reported
Successively from age to age, he built it?

BUCKINGHAM

Upon record, my gracious lord.

PRINCE EDWARD

But say, my lord, it were not regist'red, 75
Methinks the truth should live from age to age,
As 'twere retailed^o to all posterity,
Even to the general all-ending day.

RICHARD [Aside.]

So wise so young, they say do ne'er live long.

PRINCE EDWARD

What say you, uncle? 80

RICHARD

I say, without characters^o fame lives long.
[Aside.]

Thus, like the formal^o Vice,^o Iniquity,
I moralize^o two meanings in one word. 40

PRINCE EDWARD

That Julius Caesar was a famous man.
With what^o his valor did enrich his wit, 85
His wit set down to make his valor live.
Death makes no conquest of this conqueror,
For now he lives in fame, though not in life.
I'll tell you what, my cousin Buckingham—

BUCKINGHAM

What, my gracious lord? 90

PRINCE EDWARD

And if I live until I be a man,
I'll win our ancient right in France again
Or die a soldier as I lived a king.

RICHARD [Aside.]

Short summers lightly have a forward spring.^o

Enter [the] young [Duke of] YORK, HASTINGS, and
CARDINAL. 55

BUCKINGHAM

Now in good time here comes the Duke of York. 95

PRINCE EDWARD

Richard of York, how fares our loving brother?

YORK

Well, my dread^o lord—so must I call you now.

22 slug sluggard 26 On what occasion for what cause 30 perforce by force 31 indirect and peevish devious and obstinate 34 presently at once 36 jealous suspicious 45 maker in a morality play 83 moralize interpret 85 With

PRINCE EDWARD

Ay, brother, to our grief, as it is yours.
Too late^o he died that might have kept that title,
Which by his death hath lost much majesty.

RICHARD

How fares our cousin, noble Lord of York?

YORK

I thank you, gentle uncle. O, my lord,
You said that idle^o weeds are fast in growth.
The prince my brother hath outgrown me far.

RICHARD

He hath, my lord.

YORK

And therefore is he idle?

RICHARD

O my fair cousin, I must not say so.

YORK

Then he is more beholding to you than I.

RICHARD

He may command me as my sovereign,
But you have power in me as in a kinsman.

YORK

I pray you, uncle, give me this dagger.

RICHARD

My dagger, little cousin? With all my heart.

PRINCE EDWARD

A beggar, brother?

YORK

Of my kind uncle, that I know will give,
And being but a toy,^o which is no grief to give.

RICHARD

A greater gift than that I'll give my cousin.

YORK

A greater gift? O, that's the sword to it.

RICHARD

Ay, gentle cousin, were it light enough.

YORK

O, then I see you will part but with light^o gifts!
In weightier things you'll say a beggar nay.

RICHARD

It is too heavy for your grace to wear.

YORK

I weigh^o it lightly, were it heavier.

RICHARD

What, would you have my weapon, little lord?

YORK

I would, that I might thank you as you call me.

RICHARD How?

YORK Little.

PRINCE EDWARD

My Lord of York will still be cross^o in talk.
Uncle, your grace knows how to bear with him.

YORK

You mean, to bear me, not to bear with me.
Uncle, my brother mocks both you and me;
Because that I am little, like an ape,
He thinks that you should bear me on your shoulders.^o

BUCKINGHAM [Aside.]

With what a sharp, provided^o wit he reasons!
To mitigate the scorn he gives his uncle

He prettily and aptly taunts himself.
So cunning and so young is wonderful.

135

RICHARD

100 My lord, will't please you pass along?
Myself and my good cousin Buckingham
Will to your mother, to entreat of her
To meet you at the Tower and welcome you.

YORK

What, will you go unto the Tower, my lord?

140

PRINCE EDWARD

My Lord Protector needs will have it so.

YORK

105 I shall not sleep in quiet at the Tower.

RICHARD

Why, what should you fear?

YORK

Marry, my uncle Clarence' angry ghost.
My grandam told me he was murd'red there.

145

PRINCE EDWARD

I fear no uncles dead.

RICHARD

110 Nor none that live, I hope.

PRINCE EDWARD

And if they live, I hope I need not fear.
But come, my lord; with a heavy heart,
Thinking on them, go I unto the Tower.

150

*A sennet.^o Exeunt PRINCE [EDWARD], YORK,
HASTINGS, [CARDINAL, and others]. Manet
RICHARD, BUCKINGHAM, and CATESBY.*

BUCKINGHAM

115 Think you, my lord, this little prating York
Was not incensèd^o by his subtle mother
To taunt and scorn you thus opprobriously?

RICHARD

No doubt, no doubt. O, 'tis a parlous boy,
Bold, quick, ingenious, forward, capable:
He is all the mother's, from the top to toe.

155

BUCKINGHAM

120 Well, let them rest. Come hither, Catesby.
Thou art sworn as deeply to effect^o what we intend
As closely to conceal what we impart.
Thou knowest our reasons urged upon the way.
What thinkest thou? Is it not an easy matter
To make William Lord Hastings of our mind
For the installment^o of this noble duke
In the seat royal of this famous isle?

160

CATESBY

125 He for his father's sake so loves the prince
That he will not be won to aught against him.

165

BUCKINGHAM

What thinkest thou then of Stanley? What will he?

CATESBY

He will do all in all as Hastings doth.

BUCKINGHAM

130 Well then, no more but this: go, gentle Catesby,
And, as it were far off, sound thou Lord Hastings
How he doth stand affected^o to our purpose,
And summon him tomorrow to the Tower
To sit^o about the coronation.

And give us notice of his inclination;
For we tomorrow hold divided councils,^o
Wherein thyself shalt highly be employed.

RICHARD

Commend me to Lord William. Tell him, Catesby,
His ancient knot^o of dangerous adversaries
Tomorrow are let blood at Pomfret Castle,
And bid my lord, for joy of this good news,
Give Mistress Shore one gentle kiss the more.

BUCKINGHAM

Good Catesby, go effect this business soundly.

CATESBY

My good lords both, with all the heed I can.

RICHARD

Shall we hear from you, Catesby, ere we sleep?

CATESBY

You shall, my lord.

RICHARD

At Crosby House, there shall you find us both. 190

Exit CATESBY.

BUCKINGHAM

Now, my lord, what shall we do if we perceive
Lord Hastings will not yield to our complots?^o

RICHARD

Chop off his head. Something we will determine.
And look when^o I am king, claim thou of me
The earldom of Hereford and all the movables^o 195
Whereof the king my brother was possessed.

BUCKINGHAM

I'll claim that promise at your grace's hand.

RICHARD

And look^o to have it yielded with all kindness.
Come, let us sup betimes,^o that afterwards
We may digest^o our complots in some form. Exeunt. 200

Scene II. [Before Lord Hastings' house.]

Enter a MESSENGER to the door of Hastings.

MESSENGER

My lord! My lord!

HASTINGS [Within.]

Who knocks?

MESSENGER

One from the Lord Stanley.

HASTINGS [Within.]

What is't o'clock?

MESSENGER

Upon the stroke of four. 5

Enter Lord HASTINGS.

HASTINGS

Cannot my Lord Stanley sleep these tedious nights?

MESSENGER

175 So it appears by that I have to say:
First, he commends him to your noble self.

HASTINGS

What then?

MESSENGER

180 Then certifies your lordship that this'night
He dreamt the boar had rasèd off his helm.^o 10
Besides, he says there are two councils kept,
And that may be determined at the one
Which may make you and him to rue at th' other.
Therefore he sends to know your lordship's pleasure, 15
If you will presently take horse with him
And with all speed post with him toward the north
To shun the danger that his soul divines.

HASTINGS

Go, fellow, go return unto thy lord;
Bid him not fear the separated council. 20

His honor and myself are at the one,
And at the other is my good friend Catesby;
Where nothing can proceed that toucheth us
Whereof I shall not have intelligence.

190 Tell him his fears are shallow, without instance;^o 25
And for his dreams, I wonder he's so simple
To trust the mock'ry of unquiet slumbers.

To fly the boar before the boar pursues
Were to incense the boar to follow us
And make pursuit where he did mean no chase. 30

195 Go bid thy master rise and come to me,
And we will both together to the Tower,
Where he shall see the boar will use us kindly.

MESSENGER

I'll go, my lord, and tell him what you say. Exit.

Enter CATESBY.

CATESBY

Many good morrows to my noble lord! 35

HASTINGS

Good morrow, Catesby; you are early stirring.
What news, what news, in this our tott'ring state?

CATESBY

It is a reeling world indeed, my lord,
And I believe will never stand upright
Till Richard wear the garland of the realm. 40

HASTINGS

How! Wear the garland! Dost thou mean the crown?

CATESBY

Ay, my good lord.

HASTINGS

I'll have this crown of mine cut from my shoulders
Before I'll see the crown so foul misplaced.
But canst thou guess that he doth aim at it? 45

CATESBY

5 Ay, on my life, and hopes to find you forward
Upon his party^o for the gain thereof;
And thereupon he sends you this good news,
That this same very day your enemies,
The kindred of the queen, must die at Pomfret. 50

HASTINGS

Indeed I am no mourner for that news,

179 divided councils meetings of the council in two separate groups 182 ancient knot long-standing clique 192 com-

Because they have been still my adversaries;
But that I'll give my voice on Richard's side
To bar my master's heirs in true descent,
God knows I will not do it, to the death!

CATESBY

God keep your lordship in that gracious^o mind!

HASTINGS

But I shall laugh at this a twelvemonth hence,
That they which brought me in my master's hate,
I live to look upon their tragedy.
Well, Catesby, ere a fortnight make me older,
I'll send some packing^o that yet think not on't.

CATESBY

'Tis a vile thing to die, my gracious lord,
When men are unprepared and look not for it.

HASTINGS

O monstrous, monstrous! And so falls it out
With Rivers, Vaughan, Grey; and so 'twill do
With some men else that think themselves as safe
As thou and I, who, as thou know'st, are dear
To princely Richard and to Buckingham.

CATESBY

The princes both make high account of you—

[Aside.]

For they account his head upon the Bridge.^o

HASTINGS

I know they do, and I have well deserved it.

Enter Lord STANLEY.

Come on, come on! Where is your boarspear, man?
Fear you the boar, and go so unprovided?

STANLEY

My lord, good morrow; good morrow, Catesby.
You may jest on, but, by the holy rood,^o
I do not like these several^o councils, I.

HASTINGS

My lord, I hold my life as dear as yours,^o
And never in my days, I do protest,
Was it so precious to me as 'tis now.
Think you, but that I know our state^o secure,
I would be so triumphant as I am?

STANLEY

The lords at Pomfret, when they rode from London,
Were jocund and supposed their states were sure,
And they indeed had no cause to mistrust;
But yet you see how soon the day o'ercast.
This sudden stab of rancor I misdoubt.^o
Pray God, I say, I prove a needless coward!
What, shall we toward the Tower? The day is spent.^o

HASTINGS

Come, come, have with you. Wot^o you what, my lord?

Today the lords you talk of are beheaded.

STANLEY

They, for their truth,^o might better wear their heads

Than some that have accused them wear their hats.
But come, my lord, let's away.

Enter a PURSUIVANT.^o

HASTINGS

Go on before. I'll talk with this good fellow.

Exit Lord STANLEY, and CATESBY.

How now, sirrah?^o How goes the world with thee? 95

PURSUIVANT

The better that your lordship please to ask.

60

HASTINGS

I tell thee, man, 'tis better with me now
Than when thou met'st me last where now we meet.
Then was I going prisoner to the Tower
By the suggestion^o of the queen's allies;
But now I tell thee—keep it to thyself—
This day those enemies are put to death,
And I in better state than e'er I was.

100

PURSUIVANT

God hold it, to your honor's good content!

HASTINGS

Gramercy,^o fellow; there, drink that for me.

105

Throws him his purse.

PURSUIVANT

I thank your honor.

Exit PURSUIVANT.

70

Enter a PRIEST.

PRIEST

Well met, my lord; I am glad to see your honor.

HASTINGS

I thank thee, good Sir^o John, with all my heart.
I am in your debt for your last exercise;^o
Come the next Sabbath, and I will content^o you.

110

75

He whispers in his ear.

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

BUCKINGHAM

What, talking with a priest, Lord Chamberlain?
Your friends at Pomfret, they do need the priest;
Your honor hath no shriving^o work in hand.

80

HASTINGS

Good faith, and when I met this holy man
The men you talk of came into my mind.
What, go you toward the Tower?

115

BUCKINGHAM

I do, my lord, but long I cannot stay there.
I shall return before your lordship thence.

85

HASTINGS

Nay, like enough, for I stay dinner there.

BUCKINGHAM [Aside.]

And supper too, although thou know'st it not.

120

Come, will you go?

HASTINGS

I'll wait upon your lordship.

Exeunt.

Scene III. [Pomfret Castle.]

Enter Sir Richard RATCLIFFE, with HALBERDS, carrying the nobles [RIVERS, GREY, and VAUGHAN] to death at Pomfret.

RIVERS

Sir Richard Ratcliffe, let me tell thee this:
Today shalt thou behold a subject die
For truth, for duty, and for loyalty.

GREY

God bless the prince from all the pack of you!
A knot you are of damnèd bloodsuckers.

VAUGHAN

You live that shall cry woe for this hereafter.

RATCLIFFE

Dispatch; the limit of your lives is out.

RIVERS

O Pomfret, Pomfret! O thou bloody prison,
Fatal and ominous to noble peers!
Within the guilty closure^o of thy walls
Richard the Second here was hacked to death;
And, for more slander^o to thy dismal seat,
We give to thee our guiltless blood to drink.

GREY

Now Margaret's curse is fall'n upon our heads,
When she exclaimed on Hastings, you, and I,
For standing by when Richard stabbed her son.

RIVERS

Then cursed she Richard, then cursed she Buckingham,
Then cursed she Hastings. O, remember, God,
To hear her prayer for them, as now for us!
And for my sister and her princely sons,
Be satisfied, dear God, with our true blood,
Which, as thou know'st, unjustly must be spilt.

RATCLIFFE

Make haste; the hour of death is expiate.^o

RIVERS

Come, Grey, come, Vaughan, let us here embrace.
Farewell, until we meet again in heaven. Exeunt.

Scene IV. [The Tower.]

Enter BUCKINGHAM, [Lord STANLEY Earl of] Derby, HASTINGS, BISHOP OF ELY, NORFOLK, RATCLIFFE, LOVELL, with others, at a table.

HASTINGS

Now, noble peers, the cause why we are met
Is to determine of the coronation.
In God's name, speak, when is the royal day?

BUCKINGHAM

Is all things ready for the royal time?

STANLEY

It is, and wants but nomination.^o

BISHOP OF ELY

Tomorrow then I judge a happy day.

BUCKINGHAM

Who knows the Lord Protector's mind herein?
Who is most inward^o with the noble duke?

BISHOP OF ELY

Your grace, we think, should soonest know his mind.

BUCKINGHAM

We know each other's faces; for our hearts,
He knows no more of mine than I of yours;
Or I of his, my lord, than you of mine.
Lord Hastings, you and he are near in love.

HASTINGS

I thank his grace, I know he loves me well;
But for his purpose in the coronation
I have not sounded him, nor he delivered
His gracious pleasure any way therein.
But you, my honorable lords, may name the time,
And in the duke's behalf I'll give my voice,
Which I presume he'll take in gentle part.

Enter [RICHARD Duke of] Gloucester.

BISHOP OF ELY

In happy time here comes the duke himself.

RICHARD

My noble lords and cousins all, good morrow.
I have been long a sleeper, but I trust
My absence doth neglect^o no great design
Which by my presence might have been concluded.

BUCKINGHAM

Had you not come upon your cue, my lord,
William Lord Hastings had pronounced your part,
I mean your voice for crowning of the king.

RICHARD

Than my Lord Hastings no man might be bolder.
His lordship knows me well and loves me well.
My Lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn
I saw good strawberries in your garden there.
I do beseech you send for some of them.

BISHOP OF ELY

Marry, and will, my lord, with all my heart.

Exit BISHOP.

RICHARD

Cousin of Buckingham, a word with you.

[Takes him aside.]

Catesby hath sounded Hastings in our business
And finds the testy gentleman so hot
That he will lose his head ere give consent
His master's child, as worshipfully^o he terms it,
Shall lose the royalty of England's throne.

BUCKINGHAM

Withdraw yourself awhile. I'll go with you.

Exeunt [RICHARD and BUCKINGHAM].

STANLEY

We have not yet set down this day of triumph.
Tomorrow, in my judgment, is too sudden;
For I myself am not so well provided
As else I would be, were the day prolonged.^o

Enter the BISHOP OF ELY.

BISHOP OF ELY

Where is my lord the Duke of Gloucester?
I have sent for these strawberries.

HASTINGS

His grace looks cheerfully and smooth this morning;
There's some conceit^o or other likes^o him well
When that he bids good morrow with such spirit. 50
I think there's never a man in Christendom
Can lesser hide his love or hate than he,
For by his face straight shall you know his heart.

STANLEY

What of his heart perceive you in his face
By any livelihood^o he showed today? 55

HASTINGS

Marry, that with no man here he is offended;
For were he, he had shown it in his looks.

Enter RICHARD and BUCKINGHAM.

RICHARD

I pray you all, tell me what they deserve
That do conspire my death with devilish plots
Of damnèd witchcraft, and that have prevailed 60
Upon my body with their hellish charms.

HASTINGS

The tender love I bear your grace, my lord,
Makes me most forward in this princely presence
To doom th' offenders, whosoe'er they be.
I say, my lord, they have deservèd death. 65

RICHARD

Then be your eyes the witness of their evil.
Look how I am bewitched. Behold, mine arm
Is like a blasted sapling withered up;
And this is Edward's wife, that monstrous witch,
Consorted with that harlot strumpet Shore, 70
That by their witchcraft thus have markèd me.

HASTINGS

If they have done this deed, my noble lord—

RICHARD

If! Thou protector of this damnèd strumpet,
Talk'st thou to me of ifs? Thou art a traitor.
Off with his head! Now by Saint Paul I swear 75
I will not dine until I see the same.
Lovell and Ratcliffe, look that it be done.
The rest that love me, rise and follow me.

Exeunt. Manet LOVELL and RATCLIFFE, with the Lord HASTINGS.

HASTINGS

Woe, woe for England, not a whit for me!
For I, too fond,^o might have prevented this. 80
Stanley did dream the boar did rase our helms,
And I did scorn it and disdain to fly.
Three times today my footcloth horse^o did stumble,
And started when he looked upon the Tower,
As loath to bear me to the slaughterhouse.
O, now I need the priest that spake to me!
I now repent I told the pursuivant,
As too triumphing, how mine enemies
Today at Pomfret bloodily were butchered,

And I myself secure in grace and favor. 90

O Margaret, Margaret, now thy heavy curse
Is lighted on poor Hastings' wretched head!

RATCLIFFE

Come, come, dispatch; the duke would be at dinner.
Make a short shrift;^o he longs to see your head.

HASTINGS

O momentary grace^o of mortal men, 95
Which we more hunt for than the grace of God!
Who builds his hope in air of your good looks
Lives like a drunken sailor on a mast,
Ready with every nod to tumble down
Into the fatal bowels of the deep. 100

LOVELL

Come, come, dispatch; 'tis bootless^o to exclaim.

HASTINGS

O bloody Richard! Miserable England!
I prophesy the fearful'st time to thee
That ever wretched age hath looked upon.
Come, lead me to the block; bear him my head. 105
They smile at me who shortly shall be dead. Exeunt.

[Scene V. The Tower walls.]

Enter RICHARD [Duke of Gloucester] and BUCK-INGHAM, in rotten^o armor, marvelous ill-favored.^o

RICHARD

Come, cousin, canst thou quake and change thy color,
Murder thy breath in middle of a word,
And then again begin, and stop again,
As if thou wert distraught and mad with terror?

BUCKINGHAM

Tut, I can counterfeit the deep tragedian;
Speak and look back, and pry on every side,
Tremble and start at wagging of a straw,
Intending^o deep suspicion. Ghastly looks
Are at my service, like enforced smiles;
And both are ready in their offices^o 10
At any time to grace my stratagems.
But what, is Catesby gone?

RICHARD

He is; and see, he brings the mayor along.

Enter the MAYOR and CATESBY.

BUCKINGHAM

Lord Mayor—

RICHARD

Look to the drawbridge there! 15

BUCKINGHAM

Hark! A drum.

RICHARD

Catesby, o'erlook^o the walls.

BUCKINGHAM

Enter LOVELL and RATCLIFFE, with Hastings' head.

RICHARD

Be patient, they are friends, Ratcliffe and Lovell.

LOVELL

Here is the head of that ignoble traitor,
The dangerous and unsuspected Hastings.

RICHARD

So dear I loved the man that I must weep:
I took him for the plainest harmless creature
That breathed upon the earth a Christian;
Made him my book,^o wherein my soul recorded
The history of all her secret thoughts.
So smooth he daubed^o his vice with show of virtue
That, his apparent open guilt omitted,
I mean his conversation^o with Shore's wife,
He lived from all attainder of suspects.^o

BUCKINGHAM

Well, well, he was the covert'st^o shelt'red traitor
That ever lived.
Would you imagine, or almost believe,
Were't not that by great preservation
We live to tell it, that the subtle traitor
This day had plotted, in the council house,
To murder me and my good Lord of Gloucester?

MAYOR

Had he done so?

RICHARD

What! Think you we are Turks or infidels?
Or that we would, against the form of law,
Proceed thus rashly in the villain's death
But that the extreme peril of the case,
The peace of England, and our persons' safety
Enforced us to this execution?

MAYOR

Now fair befall you! He deserved his death,
And your good graces both have well proceeded
To warn false traitors from the like attempts.

BUCKINGHAM

I never looked for better at his hands
After he once fell in with Mistress Shore.
Yet had we not determined he should die
Until your lordship came to see his end,
Which now the loving haste of these our friends,
Something against our meanings, have prevented;^o
Because, my lord, I would have had you heard
The traitor speak, and timorously confess
The manner and the purpose of his treasons,
That you might well have signified the same
Unto the citizens, who haply may
Misconster^o us in him and wail his death.

MAYOR

But, my great lord, your grace's words shall serve
As well as I had seen and heard him speak;
And do not doubt, right noble princes both,

But I'll acquaint our duteous citizens 65
With all your just proceedings in this case.

RICHARD

And to that end we wished your lordship here,
T' avoid the censures of the carping world.

BUCKINGHAM

Which,^o since you come too late of^o our intent,
Yet witness what you hear we did intend. 70
And so, my good Lord Mayor, we bid farewell.

Exit MAYOR.

RICHARD

Go after, after, cousin Buckingham. 25
The mayor towards Guildhall^o hies him in all post.^o
There, at your meetest^o vantage of the time,
Infer^o the bastardy of Edward's children. 75
Tell them how Edward put to death a citizen
Only for saying he would make his son
Heir to the crown, meaning indeed his house,
Which by the sign thereof was termèd so.
Moreover, urge his hateful luxury^o 80
And bestial appetite in change of lust,
Which stretched unto their servants, daughters, wives,
Even where his raging eye or savage heart,
Without control, lusted to make a prey. 35
Nay, for a need, thus far come near my person: 85
Tell them, when that my mother went with child
Of that insatiate Edward, noble York
My princely father then had wars in France,
And by true computation of the time 40
Found that the issue was not his begot; 90
Which well appeared in his lineaments,
Being nothing like the noble duke my father.
Yet touch this sparingly, as 'twere far off,
Because, my lord, you know my mother lives.

BUCKINGHAM

Doubt not, my lord, I'll play the orator 95
As if the golden fee for which I plead
Were for myself; and so, my lord, adieu.

RICHARD

If you thrive well, bring them to Baynard's Castle,
Where you shall find me well accompanied 100
With reverend fathers and well-learnèd bishops.

BUCKINGHAM

I go; and towards three or four o'clock
Look for the news that the Guildhall affords.

Exit BUCKINGHAM.

RICHARD

Go, Lovell, with all speed to Doctor Shaw.

[To Catesby.]

Go thou to Friar Penker. Bid them both 60
Meet me within this hour at Baynard's Castle. 105
Exeunt [LOVELL, CATESBY, and RATCLIFFE].

Now will I go to take some privy order^o
To draw the brats of Clarence out of sight,
And to give order that no manner^o person
Have any time recourse unto the princes. Exit.

Enter a SCRIVENER [with a paper in his hand].

SCRIVENER

Here is the indictment of the good Lord Hastings,
Which in a set^o hand fairly is engrossed^o
That it may be today read o'er in Paul's.^o
And mark how well the sequel hangs together:
Eleven hours I have spent to write it over, 5
For yesternight by Catesby was it sent me;
The precedent^o was full as long a-doing;
And yet within these five hours Hastings lived,
Untainted,^o unexamined, free, at liberty.
Here's a good world the while! Who is so gross^o 10
That cannot see this palpable device?^o
Yet who so bold but says he sees it not?
Bad is the world, and all will come to nought
When such ill dealing must be seen in thought.^o Exit.

[Scene VII. Baynard's Castle.]

Enter RICHARD [Duke of Gloucester] and BUCKINGHAM at several^o doors.

RICHARD

How now, how now? What say the citizens?

BUCKINGHAM

Now, by the holy Mother of our Lord,
The citizens are mum, say not a word.

RICHARD

Touched you the bastardy of Edward's children?

BUCKINGHAM

I did, with his contract with Lady Lucy^o 5
And his contract by deputy^o in France;
Th' unsatiate greediness of his desire
And his enforcement of the city wives;
His tyranny for trifles; his own bastardy,
As being got,^o your father then in France, 10
And his resemblance,^o being not like the duke.
Withal I did infer your lineaments,
Being the right idea^o of your father
Both in your form and nobleness of mind;
Laid open all your victories in Scotland, 15
Your discipline in war, wisdom in peace,
Your bounty, virtue, fair humility;
Indeed, left nothing fitting for your purpose
Untouched or slightly handlèd in discourse;
And when my oratory drew toward end, 20
I bid them that did love their country's good
Cry, "God save Richard, England's royal king!"

RICHARD

And did they so?

BUCKINGHAM

No, so God help me, they spake not a word,

But like dumb statues^o or breathing stones 25
Stared each on other and looked deadly pale.
Which when I saw, I reprehended them
And asked the mayor what meant this willful silence.
His answer was, the people were not used 30
To be spoke to but by the recorder.^o
Then he was urged to tell my tale again:
"Thus saith the duke, thus hath the duke inferred";
But nothing spoke in warrant from himself.
When he had done, some followers of mine own 35
At lower end of the hall hurled up their caps,
And some ten voices cried, "God save King Richard!"
And thus I took the vantage of those few:
"Thanks, gentle citizens and friends," quoth I.
"This general applause and cheerful shout 40 Argues your wisdom and your love to Richard";
And even here brake off and came away.

RICHARD

What tongueless blocks were they! Would they not speak?

Will not the mayor then and his brethren come?

BUCKINGHAM

The mayor is here at hand. Intend^o some fear;
Be not you spoke with but by mighty suit;^o 45
And look you get a prayer book in your hand
And stand between two churchmen, good my lord,
For on that ground^o I'll make a holy descant;^o
And be not easily won to our requests.
Play the maid's part: still answer nay,^o and take it. 50

RICHARD

I go; and if you plead as well for them
As I can say nay to thee for myself,
No doubt we bring it to a happy issue.

BUCKINGHAM

Go, go up to the leads.^o The Lord Mayor knocks.
[Exit RICHARD.]

Enter the MAYOR, and CITIZENS.

10 Welcome, my lord. I dance attendance here. 55
I think the duke will not be spoke withal.^o

Enter CATESBY.

Now, Catesby, what says your lord to my request?

15 CATESBY
He doth entreat your grace, my noble lord,
To visit him tomorrow or next day.
He is within, with two right reverend fathers, 60
Divinely bent to meditation,
And in no worldly suits would he be moved
To draw him from his holy exercise.^o 20

BUCKINGHAM

Return, good Catesby, to the gracious duke.
Tell him, myself, the mayor and aldermen, 65
In deep designs, in matter of great moment,
No less importing than our general good,
Are come to have some conference with his grace.

CATESBY

I'll signify so much unto him straight. Exit.

Ah ha, my lord, this prince is not an Edward! 70
 He is not lulling° on a lewd love-bed,
 But on his knees at meditation;
 Not dallying with a brace of courtesans,
 But meditating with two deep divines;
 Not sleeping, to engross° his idle body, 75
 But praying, to enrich his watchful soul.
 Happy were England, would this virtuous prince
 Take on his grace the sovereignty thereof;
 But sure I fear we shall not win him to it.

MAYOR

Marry, God defend° his grace should say us nay! 80

BUCKINGHAM

I fear he will. Here Catesby comes again.

Enter CATESBY.

Now, Catesby, what says his grace?

CATESBY

He wonders to what end you have assembled
 Such troops of citizens to come to him,
 His grace not being warned thereof before. 85
 He fears, my lord, you mean no good to him.

BUCKINGHAM

Sorry I am my noble cousin should Suspect me that I mean no good to him.
 By heaven, we come to him in perfect love;
 And so once more return and tell his grace. 90

Exit [CATESBY].

When holy and devout religious men
 Are at their beads, 'tis much° to draw them thence,
 So sweet is zealous contemplation.

Enter RICHARD aloft, between two BISHOPS. [CATESBY returns.]

MAYOR

See where his grace stands 'tween two clergymen!

BUCKINGHAM

Two props of virtue for a Christian prince, 95
 To stay him from the fall° of vanity;
 And see, a book of prayer in his hand—
 True ornaments to know a holy man.
 Famous Plantagenet, most gracious prince,
 Lend favorable ear to our requests, 100
 And pardon us the interruption
 Of thy devotion and right Christian zeal.

RICHARD

My lord, there needs no such apology.
 I do beseech your grace to pardon me,
 Who, earnest in the service of my God, 105
 Deferred the visitation of my friends.
 But, leaving this, what is your grace's pleasure?

BUCKINGHAM

Even that, I hope, which pleaseth God above
 And all good men of this ungoverned isle.

RICHARD

I do suspect I have done some offense 110
 That seems disgracious° in the city's eye,
 And that you come to reprehend my ignorance.

BUCKINGHAM

You have, my lord. Would it might please your grace,
 On our entreaties, to amend your fault!

RICHARD

Else wherefore breathe I in a Christian land? 115

BUCKINGHAM

Know then it is your fault that you resign
 The supreme seat, the throne majestical,
 The scept' red office of your ancestors,
 Your state° of fortune and your due of birth, 120
 The lineal glory of your royal house,
 To the corruption of a blemished stock;
 Whiles, in the mildness of your sleepy thoughts,
 Which here we waken to our country's good,
 The noble isle doth want his proper limbs; 125
 His face defaced with scars of infamy,
 His royal stock graft° with ignoble plants,
 And almost should' red in° the swallowing gulf
 Of dark forgetfulness and deep oblivion.
 Which to recure,° we heartily solicit
 Your gracious self to take on you the charge 130
 And kingly government of this your land;
 Not as protector, steward, substitute,
 Or lowly factor° for another's gain,
 But as successively,° from blood to blood,
 Your right of birth, your empery,° your own. 135
 For this, consorted with the citizens,
 Your very worshipful and loving friends,
 And by their vehement instigation,
 In this just cause come I to move your grace.

RICHARD

I cannot tell if to depart in silence 140
 Or bitterly to speak in your reproof
 Best fitteth my degree° or your condition.
 If not to answer, you might haply think
 Tongue-tied ambition, not replying, yielded
 To bear the golden yoke of sovereignty 145
 Which fondly you would here impose on me.
 If to reprove you for this suit of yours,
 So seasoned° with your faithful love to me,
 Then, on the other side, I checked° my friends.
 Therefore, to speak, and to avoid the first, 150
 And then, in speaking, not to incur the last,
 Definitively° thus I answer you.
 Your love deserves my thanks, but my desert
 Unmeritable shuns your high request.
 First, if all obstacles were cut away 155
 And that my path were even° to the crown
 As the ripe revenue and due of birth,
 Yet so much is my poverty of spirit,°
 So mighty and so many my defects,
 That I would rather hide me from my greatness, 160
 Being a bark to brook° no mighty sea,
 Than in my greatness covet to be hid
 And in the vapor of my glory smothered.

Will well become the seat of majesty
And make, no doubt, us happy by his reign.
On him I lay that you would lay on me,
The right and fortune of his happy stars,
Which God defend° that I should wring from him!

BUCKINGHAM

My lord, this argues conscience in your grace,
But the respects thereof are nice° and trivial,
All circumstances well considerèd.
You say that Edward is your brother's son.
So say we too, but not by Edward's wife;
For first was he contract to Lady Lucy—
Your mother lives a witness to his vow—
And afterward by substitute betrothed
To Bona, sister to the King of France.
These both put off, a poor petitioner,
A care-crazed mother to a many sons,
A beauty-waning and distressèd widow,
Even in the afternoon of her best days,
Made prize and purchase° of his wanton eye,
Seduced the pitch° and height of his degree
To base declension° and loathed bigamy.
By her, in his unlawful bed, he got
This Edward, whom our manners call the prince.
More bitterly could I expostulate,
Save that for reverence to some alive
I give a sparing limit to my tongue.
Then, good my lord, take to your royal self
This proffered benefit of dignity;°
If not to bless us and the land withal,
Yet to draw forth your noble ancestry
From the corruption of abusing times
Unto a lineal true-derivèd course.

MAYOR

Do, good my lord; your citizens entreat you.

BUCKINGHAM

Refuse not, mighty lord, this proffered love.

CATESBY

O, make them joyful, grant their lawful suit!

RICHARD

Alas, why would you heap this care on me?
I am unfit for state and majesty.
I do beseech you take it not amiss,
I cannot nor I will not yield to you.

BUCKINGHAM

If you refuse it, as in love and zeal
Loath to depose the child, your brother's son—
As well we know your tenderness of heart
And gentle, kind, effeminate remorse,°
Which we have noted in you to your kindred
And egally° indeed to all estates—

Exeunt [BUCKINGHAM, MAYOR, and CITIZENS].

CATESBY

Call him again, sweet prince, accept their suit.
If you deny them, all the land will rue it.

220

RICHARD

Will you enforce me to a world of cares?
Call them again. I am not made of stone,
But penetrable to your kind entreaties,
Albeit against my conscience and my soul.

225

Enter BUCKINGHAM and the rest.

Cousin of Buckingham, and sage grave men,
Since you will buckle Fortune on my back,
To bear her burden, whe'r I will or no,
I must have patience to endure the load;
But if black scandal or foul-faced reproach
Attend the sequel of your imposition,°
Your mere enforcement° shall acquittance° me
From all the impure blots and stains thereof;
For God doth know, and you may partly see,
How far I am from the desire of this.

230

235

MAYOR

God bless your grace! We see it and will say it.

RICHARD

In saying so you shall but say the truth.

BUCKINGHAM

Then I salute you with this royal title:
Long live King Richard, England's worthy king!

ALL

Amen.

240

BUCKINGHAM

Tomorrow may it please you to be crowned?

RICHARD

Even when you please, for you will have it so.

BUCKINGHAM

Tomorrow then we will attend your grace,
And so most joyfully we take our leave.

RICHARD [To the BISHOPS.]

Come, let us to our holy work again.
Farewell, my cousin; farewell, gentle friends. Exeunt.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Who meets us here? My niece° Plantagenet,
Led in the hand of her kind aunt of Gloucester!
Now, for my life, she's wand'ring to the Tower
On pure heart's love to greet the tender prince.
Daughter, well met.

ANNE God give your graces both 5
A happy and a joyful time of day!

QUEEN ELIZABETH

As much to you, good sister! Whither away?

ANNE

No farther than the Tower, and, as I guess,
Upon the like devotion° as yourselves,
To gratulate° the gentle princes there. 10

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Kind sister, thanks. We'll enter all together.

Enter the LIEUTENANT [Brakenbury].

And in good time here the lieutenant comes.
Master Lieutenant, pray you, by your leave,
How doth the prince, and my young son of York?

LIEUTENANT

Right well, dear madam. By your patience, 15
I may not suffer you to visit them;
The king hath strictly charged the contrary.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

The king? Who's that?

LIEUTENANT

I mean the Lord Protector.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

The Lord protect him from that kingly title!
Hath he set bounds between their love and me? 20
I am their mother; who shall bar me from them?

DUCHESS OF YORK

I am their father's mother; I will see them.

ANNE

Their aunt I am in law, in love their mother.
Then bring me to their sights; I'll bear thy blame
And take thy office° from thee on my peril. 25

LIEUTENANT

No, madam, no; I may not leave° it so.
I am bound by oath, and therefore pardon me.
Exit LIEUTENANT.

Enter STANLEY [Earl of Derby].

STANLEY

Let me but meet you, ladies, one hour hence,
And I'll salute your grace of York as mother
And reverend looker-on of two fair queens. 30

[To ANNE.]

Come, madam, you must straight to Westminster,
There to be crownèd Richard's royal queen.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ah, cut my lace° asunder,
That my pent heart may have some scope to beat,
Or else I swoon with this dead-killing news! 35

ANNE

Despiteful° tidings! O unpleasing news!

DORSET

Be of good cheer; mother, how fares your grace?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

O Dorset, speak not to me, get thee gone!
Death and destruction dogs thee at thy heels;
Thy mother's name is ominous to children. 40

If thou wilt outstrip death, go cross the seas
And live with Richmond, from° the reach of hell.
Go hie thee, hie thee from this slaughterhouse,
Lest thou increase the number of the dead
And make me die the thrall° of Margaret's curse, 45
Nor mother, wife, nor England's counted queen.°

STANLEY

Full of wise care is this your counsel, madam.
Take all the swift advantage of the hours.
You shall have letters from me to my son°
In your behalf, to meet you on the way. 50
Be not ta'en tardy° by unwise delay.

DUCHESS OF YORK

O ill-dispersing° wind of misery!
O my accursèd womb, the bed of death!
A cockatrice° hast thou hatched to the world,
Whose unavowed eye is murderous. 55

STANLEY

Come, madam, come; I in all haste was sent.

ANNE

And I with all unwillingness will go.
O, would to God that the inclusive verge°
Of golden metal that must round° my brow 60
Were red-hot steel to sear me to the brains!
Anointed let me be with deadly venom
And die ere men can say, "God save the queen!"

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Go, go, poor soul! I envy not thy glory.
To feed my humor° wish thyself no harm.

ANNE

No? Why, when he that is my husband now 65
Came to me as I followed Henry's corse,
When scarce the blood was well washed from his hands

Which issuèd from my other angel husband
And that dear saint which then I weeping followed—
O, when, I say, I looked on Richard's face, 70

This was my wish: "Be thou," quoth I, "accursed
For making me, so young, so old a widow!°
And when thou wed'st, let sorrow haunt thy bed;
And be thy wife, if any be so mad,
More miserable by the life of thee 75

Than thou hast made me by my dear lord's death!"
Lo, ere I can repeat this curse again,
Within so small a time, my woman's heart
Grossly grew captive to his honey words
And proved the subject of mine own soul's curse, 80
Which hitherto hath held mine eyes from rest;
For never yet one hour in his bed
Did I enjoy the golden dew of sleep,

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Poor heart, adieu! I pity thy complaining.

ANNE

No more than with my soul I mourn for yours.

DORSET

Farewell, thou woeful welcomer of glory!

ANNE

Adieu, poor soul that tak'st thy leave of it!

DUCHESS OF YORK [To DORSET.]

Go thou to Richmond, and good fortune guide thee!

[To ANNE.]

Go thou to Richard, and good angels tend thee!

[To QUEEN ELIZABETH.]

Go thou to sanctuary, and good thoughts possess thee!

I to my grave, where peace and rest lie with me!

Eighty odd years of sorrow have I seen,

And each hour's joy wracked^o with a week of teen.^o

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Stay, yet look back with me unto the Tower.

Pity, you ancient stones, those tender babes

Whom envy hath immured within your walls,

Rough cradle for such little pretty ones!

Rude ragged nurse, old sullen playfellow

For tender princes, use my babies well!

So foolish sorrow bids your stones farewell. Exeunt.

Scene II. [The palace.]

Sound a sennet. Enter RICHARD, in pomp, BUCKINGHAM, CATESBY, RATCLIFFE, LOVELL, [a PAGE, and others].

KING RICHARD

Stand all apart. Cousin of Buckingham!

BUCKINGHAM

My gracious sovereign?

KING RICHARD

Give me thy hand. Sound. [He ascends the throne.]

Thus high, by thy advice

And thy assistance, is King Richard seated.

But shall we wear these glories for a day?

Or shall they last, and we rejoice in them?

BUCKINGHAM

Still live they, and forever let them last!

KING RICHARD

Ah, Buckingham, now do I play the touch^o

To try if thou be current gold indeed.

Young Edward lives—think now what I would speak. 10

BUCKINGHAM

Say on, my loving lord.

KING RICHARD

Why, Buckingham, I say I would be king.

BUCKINGHAM

Why, so you are, my thrice-renowned lord.

84 still continually 96 wracked ruined; teen grief
IV.ii.8 touch touchstone (used to test gold)

KING RICHARD

85 Ha! Am I king? 'Tis so; but Edward lives.

BUCKINGHAM

True, noble prince.

KING RICHARD O bitter consequence,^o 15

That Edward still should live true noble prince!

Cousin, thou wast not wont to be so dull.

Shall I be plain? I wish the bastards dead,

And I would have it suddenly performed.

What say'st thou now? Speak suddenly, be brief. 20

BUCKINGHAM

Your grace may do your pleasure.

KING RICHARD

Tut, tut, thou art all ice, thy kindness freezes.

Say, have I thy consent that they shall die?

BUCKINGHAM

Give me some little breath, some pause, dear lord,

Before I positively speak in this. 25

I will resolve^o you herein presently.

Exit BUCKINGHAM.

CATESBY [Aside to another.]

The king is angry. See, he gnaws his lip.

KING RICHARD

I will converse^o with iron-witted^o fools

And unrespective^o boys. None are for me

That look into me with considerate^o eyes. 30

100 High-reaching Buckingham grows circumspect.

Boy!

PAGE

My lord?

KING RICHARD

Know'st thou not any whom corrupting gold

Will tempt unto a close exploit^o of death? 35

PAGE

I know a discontented gentleman

Whose humble means match not his haughty spirit.

Gold were as good as twenty orators

And will, no doubt, tempt him to anything.

KING RICHARD

What is his name?

PAGE

His name, my lord, is Tyrrel. 40

KING RICHARD

I partly know the man. Go call him hither, boy.

Exit [PAGE].

The deep-revolving witty^o Buckingham

No more shall be the neighbor to my counsels.

5 Hath he so long held out^o with me, untired,

And stops he now for breath? Well, be it so. 45

Enter STANLEY [Earl of Derby].

How now, Lord Stanley? What's the news?

STANLEY Know, my loving lord,

The Marquis Dorset, as I hear, is fled

To Richmond in the parts where he abides.

KING RICHARD

Come hither, Catesby. Rumor it abroad
That Anne my wife is very grievous sick;
I will take order for her keeping close.
Inquire me out some mean poor gentleman,
Whom I will marry straight to Clarence' daughter.
The boy is foolish,^o and I fear not him.
Look how thou dream'st! I say again, give out
That Anne my queen is sick and like to die.
About it; for it stands me much upon^o
To stop all hopes whose growth may damage me.

[Exit CATESBY.]

I must be married to my brother's daughter,
Or else my kingdom stands on brittle glass.
Murder her brothers and then marry her!
Uncertain way of gain! But I am in
So far in blood that sin will pluck on sin.
Tear-falling pity dwells not in this eye.

Enter TYRREL.

Is thy name Tyrrel?

TYRREL

James Tyrrel, and your most obedient subject.

KING RICHARD

Art thou indeed?

TYRREL Prove me, my gracious lord.

KING RICHARD

Dar'st thou resolve to kill a friend of mine?

TYRREL

Please^o you;

But I had rather kill two enemies.

KING RICHARD

Why, there thou hast it! Two deep enemies,
Foes to my rest and my sweet sleep's disturbers,
Are they that I would have thee deal upon.
Tyrrel, I mean those bastards in the Tower.

TYRREL

Let me have open means to come to them,
And soon I'll rid you from the fear of them.

KING RICHARD

Thou sing'st sweet music. Hark, come hither, Tyrrel.
Go, by this token. Rise, and lend thine ear.

Whispers.

There is no more but so. Say it is done,
And I will love thee and prefer^o thee for it.

TYRREL

I will dispatch it straight.

Exit.

Enter BUCKINGHAM.

BUCKINGHAM

My lord, I have considered in my mind
The late request that you did sound me in.

KING RICHARD

Well, let that rest. Dorset is fled to Richmond.

BUCKINGHAM

I hear the news, my lord.

KING RICHARD

Stanley, he is your wife's son. Well, look unto it.

BUCKINGHAM

My lord, I claim the gift, my due by promise,
For which your honor and your faith is pawned:^o
Th' earldom of Hereford and the movables
Which you have promised I shall possess.

90

KING RICHARD

Stanley, look to your wife; if she convey
Letters to Richmond, you shall answer it.

BUCKINGHAM

What says your highness to my just request?

KING RICHARD

I do remember me, Henry the Sixth
Did prophesy that Richmond should be king
When Richmond was a little peevish^o boy.
A king! Perhaps, perhaps.

95

BUCKINGHAM

My lord!

KING RICHARD

How chance the prophet could not at that time
Have told me, I being by, that I should kill him?

100

BUCKINGHAM

My lord, your promise for the earldom!

KING RICHARD

Richmond! When last I was at Exeter,
The mayor in courtesy showed me the castle,
And called in Rugemont; at which name I started,
Because a bard of Ireland told me once
I should not live long after I saw Richmond.

105

BUCKINGHAM

My lord!

KING RICHARD

Ay, what's o'clock?

BUCKINGHAM

I am thus bold to put your grace in mind
Of what you promised me.

KING RICHARD

Well, but what's o'clock? 110

BUCKINGHAM

Upon the stroke of ten.

KING RICHARD

Well, let it strike.

BUCKINGHAM

Why let it strike?

KING RICHARD

Because that like a Jack^o thou keep'st the stroke^o
Betwixt thy begging and my meditation.
I am not in the giving vein today.

115

BUCKINGHAM

May it please you to resolve me in my suit.

KING RICHARD

Thou troublest me; I am not in the vein.

Exit [KING RICHARD, and all but BUCKINGHAM].

BUCKINGHAM

And is it thus? Repays he my deep service
With such contempt? Made I him king for this?
O, let me think on Hastings, and be gone
To Brecknock while my fearful head is on!

Enter TYRREL.

TYRREL

The tyrannous and bloody act is done,
The most arch^o deed of piteous massacre
That ever yet this land was guilty of.
Dighton and Forrest, who I did suborn
To do this piece^o of ruthless^o butchery, 5
Albeit they were fleshed^o villains, bloody dogs,
Melted with tenderness and mild compassion,
Wept like to children in their death's sad story.
"O thus," quoth Dighton, "lay the gentle babes."
"Thus, thus," quoth Forrest, "girdling one another 10
Within their alabaster innocent arms.
Their lips were four red roses on a stalk
And in their summer beauty kissed each other.
A book of prayers on their pillow lay,
Which once," quoth Forrest, "almost changed my 15
mind;
But O, the devil"—there the villain stopped;
When Dighton thus told on: "We smothered
The most replenishèd^o sweet work of Nature
That from the prime^o creation e'er she framèd."
Hence both are gone with conscience and remorse 20
They^o could not speak; and so I left them both,
To bear this tidings to the bloody king.

Enter [KING] RICHARD.

And here he comes. All health, my sovereign lord!

KING RICHARD

Kind Tyrrel, am I happy in thy news?

TYRREL

If to have done the thing you gave in charge 25
Beget^o your happiness, be happy then,
For it is done.

KING RICHARD But didst thou see them dead?

TYRREL

I did, my lord.

KING RICHARD And buried, gentle Tyrrel?

TYRREL

The chaplain of the Tower hath buried them;
But where (to say the truth) I do not know. 30

KING RICHARD

Come to me, Tyrrel, soon at aftersupper,^o
When thou shalt tell the process^o of their death.
Meantime, but think how I may do thee good
And be inheritor of thy desire.
Farewell till then.

TYRREL I humbly take my leave. [Exit.] 35

KING RICHARD

The son of Clarence have I pent up close;
His daughter meanly have I matched in marriage;
The sons of Edward sleep in Abraham's bosom,^o
And Anne my wife hath bid this world good night.
Now, for^o I know the Britain^o Richmond aims 40
At young Elizabeth, my brother's daughter,

And by that knot^o looks proudly on the crown,
To her go I, a jolly thriving wooer.

Enter RATCLIFFE.

RATCLIFFE

My lord!

KING RICHARD

Good or bad news, that thou com'st in so bluntly? 45

RATCLIFFE

Bad news, my lord. Morton is fled to Richmond,
And Buckingham, backed with the hardy Welshmen,
Is in the field, and still his power increaseth.

KING RICHARD

Ely with Richmond troubles me more near
Than Buckingham and his rash-levied^o strength. 50
Come, I have learned that fearful commenting^o
Is leaden servitor to dull delay;
Delay leads impotent and snail-paced beggary.^o
Then fiery expedition^o be my wing,
Jove's Mercury, and herald for a king! 55
Go muster men. My counsel is my shield;
We must be brief when traitors brave the field.

Exeunt.

Scene [IV. The palace.]

Enter old QUEEN MARGARET.

QUEEN MARGARET

So now prosperity begins to mellow
And drop into the rotten mouth of death.
Here in these confines silyly have I lurked
To watch the waning of mine enemies.
A dire induction^o am I witness to, 5
And will to France, hoping the consequence^o
Will prove as bitter, black, and tragical.
Withdraw thee, wretched Margaret. Who comes here? [Retires.]

Enter DUCHESS [OF YORK] and QUEEN [ELIZABETH].

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ah, my poor princes, ah, my tender babes!
My unblown^o flow'rs, new-appearing sweets! 10
If yet your gentle souls fly in the air
And be not fixed in doom perpetual,
Hover about me with your airy wings
And hear your mother's lamentation!

Hover about her, say that right for right 15
Hath dimmed your infant morn to aged night.

DUCHESS OF YORK

So many miseries have crazed^o my voice
That my woe-wearied tongue is still and mute.
Edward Plantagenet, why art thou dead?

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

Plantagenet doth quit^o Plantagenet, 20
Edward for Edward pays a dying debt.

Wilt thou, O God, fly from such gentle lambs
And throw them in the entrails of the wolf?
When didst thou sleep when such a deed was done?

QUEEN MARGARET [Aside.]

When holy Harry died, and my sweet son.

25

DUCHESS OF YORK

Dead life, blind sight, poor mortal living ghost,
Woe's scene, world's shame, grave's due by life
usurped,

Brief abstract° and record of tedious days,
Rest thy unrest on England's lawful earth,

[Sits down.]

Unlawfully made drunk with innocent blood!

30

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Ah that thou wouldst as soon afford a grave
As thou canst yield a melancholy seat!
Then would I hide my bones, not rest them here.
Ah, who hath any cause to mourn but we?

[Sits down by her.]

QUEEN MARGARET [Comes forward.]

If ancient sorrow be most reverend,
Give mine the benefit of seniory°
And let my griefs frown on the upper hand.°
If sorrow can admit society,

[Sits down with them.]

Tell° o'er your woes again by viewing mine.

I had an Edward, till a Richard killed him;

40

I had a husband, till a Richard killed him.

Thou hadst an Edward, till a Richard killed him;

Thou hadst a Richard, till a Richard killed him.

DUCHESS OF YORK

I had a Richard too, and thou didst kill him;

I had a Rutland too, thou holp'st° to kill him.

45

QUEEN MARGARET

Thou hadst a Clarence too, and Richard killed him.

From forth the kennel of thy womb hath crept

A hellhound that doth hunt us all to death.

That dog that had his teeth before his eyes

To worry lambs and lap their gentle blood,

50

That foul defacer of God's handiwork,

That excellent grand° tyrant of the earth

That reigns in gallèd° eyes of weeping souls,

Thy womb let loose to chase us to our graves.

O upright, just, and true-disposing° God,

55

How do I thank thee that this carnal° cur

Preys on the issue of his mother's body

And makes her pewfellow° with others' moan!

DUCHESS OF YORK

O Harry's wife, triumph not in my woes!

God witness with me I have wept for thine.

60

QUEEN MARGARET

Bear with me; I am hungry for revenge,

And now I cloy me with beholding it.

Thy Edward he is dead, that killed my Edward;

Thy other Edward dead, to quit my Edward;

Young York he is but boot,° because both they 65

Matched not the high perfection of my loss.

Thy Clarence he is dead that stabbed my Edward,

And the beholders of this frantic play,

Th' adulterate° Hastings, Rivers, Vaughan, Grey,

Untimely smothered in their dusky graves.

70

Richard yet lives, hell's black intelligencer,°

Only reserved their factor° to buy souls

And send them thither. But at hand, at hand,

Ensues his piteous and unpitied end.

Earth gapes, hell burns, fiends roar, saints pray,

75

To have him suddenly conveyed from hence.

Cancel his bond of life, dear God, I pray.

That I may live and say, "The dog is dead."

QUEEN ELIZABETH

O, thou didst prophesy the time would come

That I should wish for thee to help me curse

80

That bottled spider, that foul bunch-backed toad!

QUEEN MARGARET

I called thee then vain flourish of my fortune;

I called thee then poor shadow, painted queen,

The presentation of but° what I was,

The flattering index° of a direful pageant,°

85

One heaved a-high° to be hurled down below,

A mother only mocked with two fair babes,

A dream of what thou wast, a garish° flag

To be the aim of every dangerous shot,

A sign of dignity, a breath, a bubble,

90

A queen in jest, only to fill the scene.

Where is thy husband now? Where be thy brothers?

Where be thy two sons? Wherein dost thou joy?

Who sues and kneels and says, "God save the queen"?

Where be the bending peers that flattered thee?

95

Where be the thronging troops that followèd thee?

Decline° all this, and see what now thou art:

For happy wife, a most distressèd widow;

For joyful mother, one that wails the name;

For one being sued to, one that humbly sues;

100

For queen, a very caitiff° crowned with care;

For she that scorned at me, now scorned of me;

For she being feared of all, now fearing one;

For she commanding all, obeyed of none.

Thus hath the course of justice whirled about 105

And left thee but a very prey to time,

Having no more but thought of what thou wast

To torture thee the more, being what thou art.

Thou didst usurp my place, and dost thou not

Usurp the just proportion° of my sorrow?

110

Now thy proud neck bears half my burdened yoke,

From which even here I slip my wearied head

And leave the burden of it all on thee.

Farewell, York's wife, and queen of sad mischance!

These English woes shall make me smile in France.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Why should calamity be full of words?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Windy attorneys to their client's woes,°
 Airy succeeders of intestate joys,°
 Poor breathing orators of miseries,
 Let them have scope! Though what they will impart 130
 Help nothing else, yet do they ease the heart.

DUCHESS OF YORK

If so, then be not tongue-tied. Go with me
 And in the breath of bitter words let's smother
 My damnèd son that thy two sweet sons smothered.
 The trumpet sounds. Be copious in exclams. 135

Enter KING RICHARD and his TRAIN, [marching with drums and trumpets].

KING RICHARD

Who intercepts me in my expedition?°

DUCHESS OF YORK

O, she that might have intercepted thee,
 By strangling thee in her accursèd womb,
 From all the slaughters, wretch, that thou hast done!

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Hid'st thou that forehead with a golden crown 140
 Where should be branded, if that right were right,
 The slaughter of the prince that owed° that crown
 And the dire death of my poor sons and brothers?
 Tell me, thou villain-slave, where are my children?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Where is the gentle Rivers, Vaughan, Grey?

DUCHESS OF YORK

Where is kind Hastings?

KING RICHARD

A flourish, trumpets! Strike alarum, drums!
 Let not the heavens hear these telltale women 150
 Rail on the Lord's anointed. Strike, I say!

Flourish. Alarums.

 Or with the clamorous report of war
 Thus will I drown your exclamations.

DUCHESS OF YORK

DUCHESS OF YORK

KING RICHARD

And brief, good mother, for I am in haste.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Art thou so hasty? I have stayed° for thee,
 God knows, in torment and in agony.

KING RICHARD

And came I not at last to comfort you? 165

DUCHESS OF YORK

No, by the holy rood, thou know'st it well,
 Thou cam'st on earth to make the earth my hell.
 A grievous burden was thy birth to me;
 Tetchy° and wayward was thy infancy;
 Thy schooldays frightful, desp'rate, wild, and furious; 170
 Thy prime of manhood daring, bold, and venturous;
 Thy age confirmed,° proud, subtle, sly, and bloody,
 More mild, but yet more harmful, kind in hatred.

 That ever graced me with thy company? 175

KING RICHARD

To breakfast once forth of my company.

Let me march on and not offend you, madam.

DUCHESS OF YORK I prithee hear me speak. 180

KING RICHARD

You speak too bitterly.

DUCHESS OF YORK Hear me a word;

For I shall never speak to thee again.

KING RICHARD

So.

DUCHESS OF YORK

Either thou wilt die by God's just ordinance
 Ere from this war thou turn° a conqueror, 185
 Or I with grief and extreme age shall perish
 And never more behold thy face again.
 Therefore take with thee my most grievous curse,
 Which in the day of battle tire thee more
 Than all the complete armor that thou wear'st! 190
 My prayers on the adverse party fight!
 And there the little souls of Edward's children
 Whisper the spirits of thine enemies
 And promise them success and victory!

Though far more cause, yet much less spirit to curse
Abides in me. I say amen to her.

KING RICHARD

Stay, madam; I must talk a word with you.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

I have no moe^o sons of the royal blood
For thee to slaughter. For my daughters, Richard,
They shall be praying nuns, not weeping queens;
And therefore level^o not to hit their lives.

KING RICHARD

You have a daughter called Elizabeth,
Virtuous and fair, royal and gracious.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

And must she die for this? O, let her live,
And I'll corrupt her manners,^o stain her beauty,
Slander myself as false to Edward's bed,
Throw over her the veil of infamy;
So she may live unscarred of bleeding slaughter,
I will confess she was not Edward's daughter.

KING RICHARD

Wrong not her birth; she is a royal princess.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

To save her life, I'll say she is not so.

KING RICHARD

Her life is safest only in her birth.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

And only in that safety died her brothers.

KING RICHARD

Lo, at their birth good stars were opposite.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

No, to their lives ill friends were contrary.

KING RICHARD

All unavoi^oded^o is the doom^o of destiny.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

True, when avoided grace^o makes destiny.
My babes were destined to a fairer death
If grace had blessed thee with a fairer life.

KING RICHARD

You speak as if that I had slain my cousins!

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Cousins indeed, and by their uncle cozened^o
Of comfort, kingdom, kindred, freedom, life.
Whose hand soever lanced their tender hearts,
Thy head (all indirectly^o) gave direction.
No doubt the murd'rous knife was dull and blunt
Till it was whetted on thy stone-hard heart
To revel in the entrails of my lambs.
But that still use^o of grief makes wild grief tame,
My tongue should to thy ears not name my boys
Till that my nails were anchored in thine eyes;
And I, in such a desp'rate bay of death,
Like a poor bark of sails and tackling reft,
Rush all to pieces on thy rocky bosom.

KING RICHARD

Madam, so thrive I in my enterprise
And dangerous success^o of bloody wars

As I intend more good to you and yours
Than ever you and yours by me were harmed!

QUEEN ELIZABETH

What good is covered with the face of heaven,
To be discovered, that can do me good?

240

KING RICHARD

QUEEN ELIZABETH

KING RICHARD

The high imperial type^o of this earth's glory.

245

205 QUEEN ELIZABETH

Flatter my sorrow with report of it.
Tell me, what state, what dignity, what honor
Canst thou demise^o to any child of mine?

KING RICHARD

210 Even all I have—ay, and myself and all
Will I withal^o endow a child of thine,
So in the Lethe^o of thy angry soul
Thou drown the sad remembrance of those wrongs
Which thou supposest I have done to thee.

250

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Be brief, lest that the process^o of thy kindness

255

KING RICHARD

Then know that from my soul I love thy daughter.

215 QUEEN ELIZABETH

My daughter's mother thinks it with her soul.

KING RICHARD

What do you think?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

That thou dost love my daughter from^o thy soul.
So from thy soul's love didst thou love her brothers,
And from my heart's love I do thank thee for it.

260

KING RICHARD

220 Be not so hasty to confound my meaning.
I mean that with my soul I love thy daughter
And do intend to make her Queen of England.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Well then, who dost thou mean shall be her king?

265

KING RICHARD

Even he that makes her queen. Who else should be?

225 QUEEN ELIZABETH

What, thou?

KING RICHARD

Even so. How think you of it?

QUEEN ELIZABETH

How canst thou woo her?

230 KING RICHARD

That would I learn of you,
As one being best acquainted with her humor.^o

QUEEN ELIZABETH

And wilt thou learn of me?

KING RICHARD

Madam, with all my heart.

270

235 QUEEN ELIZABETH

Send to her by the man that slew her brothers
A pair of bleeding hearts; thereon engrave
"Edward" and "York." Then haply will she weep;

You mock me, madam; this is not the way
 To win your daughter.

QUEEN ELIZABETH There is no other way,
 Unless thou couldst put on some other shape
 And not be Richard that hath done all this.

KING RICHARD

Say that I did all this for love of her.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Nay, then indeed she cannot choose but hate thee,
 Having bought love with such a bloody spoil.^o

KING RICHARD

Look what^o is done cannot be now amended.
 Men shall deal unadvisedly^o sometimes,
 Which afterhours gives leisure to repent.
 If I did take the kingdom from your sons,
 To make amends I'll give it to your daughter.
 If I have killed the issue of your womb,
 To quicken your increase^o I will beget
 Mine issue of your blood upon your daughter.
 A grandam's name is little less in love
 Than is the doting title of a mother;
 They are as children but one step below,
 Even of your metal,^o of your very blood,
 Of all one pain, save for a night of groans
 Endured of^o her for whom you bid^o like sorrow.
 Your children were vexation to your youth,
 But mine shall be a comfort to your age.
 The loss you have is but a son being king,
 And by that loss your daughter is made queen.
 I cannot make you what amends I would;
 Therefore accept such kindness as I can.
 Dorset your son, that with a fearful soul
 Leads discontented steps in foreign soil,
 This fair alliance^o quickly shall call home
 To high promotions and great dignity.
 The king that calls your beauteous daughter wife
 Familiarly shall call thy Dorset brother.
 Again shall you be mother to a king,
 And all the ruins of distressful times
 Repaired with double riches of content.
 What! We have many goodly days to see.
 The liquid drops of tears that you have shed
 Shall come again, transformed to orient^o pearl,
 Advantaging their loan with interest
 Of ten times double gain of happiness.
 Go then, my mother, to thy daughter go;
 Make bold her bashful years with your experience;
 Prepare her ears to hear a wooer's tale.

335

QUEEN ELIZABETH

What were I best to say? Her father's brother
 Would be her lord? Or shall I say her uncle?
 Or he that slew her brothers and her uncles?
 Under what title shall I woo for thee
 That God, the law, my honor, and her love
 Can make seem pleasing to her tender years?

KING RICHARD

Now, by my George, my garter,^o and my crown—

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Profaned, dishonored, and the third usurped.

KING RICHARD

I swear—

QUEEN ELIZABETH By nothing, for this is no oath:

Thy George, profaned, hath lost his lordly honor;

Thy garter, blemished, pawned his knightly virtue; 370

Thy crown, usurped, disgraced his kingly glory.

If something thou wouldst swear to be believed,

Swear then by something that thou hast not wronged.

KING RICHARD

Then by myself—

QUEEN ELIZABETH Thyself is self-misused.

KING RICHARD

Now by the world—

QUEEN ELIZABETH 'Tis full of thy foul wrongs. 375

KING RICHARD

My father's death—

QUEEN ELIZABETH Thy life hath it dishonored.

KING RICHARD

Why then, by God—

QUEEN ELIZABETH God's wrong is most of all.

If thou didst fear to break an oath with him,

The unity the king my husband made

Thou hadst not broken, nor my brothers died. 380

If thou hadst feared to break an oath by him,

Th' imperial metal circling now thy head

Had graced the tender temples of my child,

And both the princes had been breathing here,

Which now, two tender bedfellows for dust, 385

Thy broken faith hath made the prey for worms.

What canst thou swear by now?

KING RICHARD

The time to come.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

That thou hast wronged in the time o'erpast;

For I myself have many tears to wash

Hereafter^o time, for time past wronged by thee. 390

The children live whose fathers thou hast slaughtered,

Ungoverned^o youth, to wail it in their age;

The parents live whose children thou hast butchered,

Old barren plants, to wail it with their age.

Swear not by time to come, for that thou hast 395

Misused ere used, by times ill-used o'erpast.

KING RICHARD

As I intend to prosper and repent,

So thrive I in my dangerous affairs

Of hostile arms! Myself myself confound!^o

Heaven and fortune bar me happy hours!

Day, yield me not thy light, nor, night, thy rest!

Be opposite all planets of good luck

To my proceeding if, with dear heart's love,

Inmaculate devotion, holy thoughts,

I tender^o not thy beauteous princely daughter!

In her consists my happiness and thine;

Without her, follows to myself and thee,

Herself, the land, and many a Christian soul,

Death, desolation, ruin, and decay.

It cannot be avoided but by this; 410

It will not be avoided but by this.

Therefore, dear mother—I must call you so—

Be the attorney of my love to her.

Plead what I will be, not what I have been;

Not my deserts, but what I will deserve. 415

Urge the necessity and state of times,^o

And be not peevish-fond^o in great designs.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Shall I be tempted of the devil thus?

KING RICHARD

Ay, if the devil tempt you to do good.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Shall I forget myself to be myself?^o 420

KING RICHARD

Ay, if yourself's remembrance wrong yourself.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Yet thou didst kill my children.

KING RICHARD

But in your daughter's womb I'll bury them,

Where in that nest of spicery^o they will breed

Selves of themselves, to your recomforture.^o 425

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Shall I go win my daughter to thy will?

KING RICHARD

And be a happy mother by the deed.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

I go. Write to me very shortly,

And you shall understand from me her mind.

KING RICHARD

Bear her my truelove's kiss; and so farewell. 430

Exit QUEEN [ELIZABETH].

Relenting fool, and shallow, changing woman!

Enter RATCLIFFE, [CATESBY following].

How now! What news?

RATCLIFFE

Most mighty sovereign, on the western coast

Rideth a puissant^o navy; to our shores

Throng many doubtful hollow-hearted friends, 435

Unarmed, and unresolved^o to beat them back.

'Tis thought that Richmond is their admiral;

And there they hull,^o expecting^o but the aid

Of Buckingham to welcome them ashore.

KING RICHARD

Some lightfoot friend post^o to the Duke of Norfolk: 440

Ratcliffe, thyself—or Catesby; where is he?

CATESBY

Here, my good lord.

400 KING RICHARD Catesby, fly to the duke.

CATESBY

What from your grace I shall deliver to him.

KING RICHARD

O, true, good Catesby. Bid him levy straight
The greatest strength and power that he can make
And meet me suddenly at Salisbury.

CATESBY

I go. Exit.

RATCLIFFE

What, may it please you, shall I do at Salisbury?

KING RICHARD

Why, what wouldst thou do there before I go?

RATCLIFFE

Your highness told me I should post before.

KING RICHARD

My mind is changed.

Enter Lord STANLEY [Earl of Derby].

Stanley, what news with you?

STANLEY

None good, my liege, to please you with the hearing,
Nor none so bad but well may be reported.

KING RICHARD

Hoyday, a riddle! Neither good nor bad!
What need'st thou run so many miles about
When thou mayest tell thy tale the nearest way?
Once more, what news?

STANLEY

Richmond is on the seas.

KING RICHARD

There let him sink, and be the seas on him!
White-livered runagate,^o what doth he there?

STANLEY

I know not, mighty sovereign, but by guess.

KING RICHARD

Well, as you guess?

STANLEY

Stirred up by Dorset, Buckingham, and Morton,
He makes for England, here to claim the crown.

KING RICHARD

Is the chair empty? Is the sword unswayed?
Is the king dead, the empire unpossessed?
What heir of York is there alive but we?
And who is England's king but great York's heir?
Then tell me, what makes he upon the seas?

STANLEY

Unless for that, my liege, I cannot guess.

KING RICHARD

Unless for that he comes to be your liege,
You cannot guess wherefore the Welshman comes.
Thou wilt revolt and fly to him, I fear.

STANLEY

No, my good lord; therefore mistrust me not.

KING RICHARD

Where is thy power then to beat him back?
Where be thy tenants and thy followers?
Are they not now upon the western shore,
Safe-conducting the rebels from their ships?

STANLEY

No, my good lord, my friends are in the north.

KING RICHARD

Cold friends to me! What do they in the north
When they should serve their sovereign in the west?

STANLEY

They have not been commanded, mighty king.
Pleaseth your majesty to give me leave,
I'll muster up my friends and meet your grace
Where and what time your majesty shall please.

KING RICHARD

Ay, thou wouldst be gone to join with Richmond.
But I'll not trust thee.

STANLEY

Most mighty sovereign,
You have no cause to hold my friendship doubtful.
I never was nor never will be false.

KING RICHARD

Go then and muster men; but leave behind
Your son George Stanley. Look your heart be firm,
Or else his head's assurance^o is but frail.

STANLEY

So deal with him as I prove true to you.

Exit STANLEY.

Enter a MESSENGER.

FIRST MESSENGER

My gracious sovereign, now in Devonshire,
As I by friends am well advertised,^o
Sir Edward Courtney and the haughty prelate,
Bishop of Exeter, his elder brother,
With many more confederates, are in arms.

Enter another MESSENGER.

SECOND MESSENGER

In Kent, my liege, the Guilfords are in arms,
And every hour more competitors^o
Flock to the rebels, and their power grows strong.

Enter another MESSENGER.

THIRD MESSENGER

My lord, the army of great Buckingham—

KING RICHARD

Out on ye, owls! Nothing but songs of death?

He striketh him.

There, take thou that, till thou bring better news.

THIRD MESSENGER

The news I have to tell your majesty
Is that by sudden floods and fall of waters
Buckingham's army is dispersed and scattered,
And he himself wand'ring away alone,
No man knows whither.

I cry thee mercy.

There is my purse to cure that blow of thine.
Hath any well-advised friend proclaimed
Reward to him that brings the traitor in?

THIRD MESSENGER

Such proclamation hath been made, my lord.

Enter another MESSENGER.

FOURTH MESSENGER

Sir Thomas Lovell and Lord Marquis Dorset,

'Tis said, my liege, in Yorkshire are in arms.
 But this good comfort bring I to your highness: 520
 The Britain° navy is dispersed by tempest.
 Richmond in Dorsetshire sent out a boat
 Unto the shore to ask those on the banks
 If they were his assistants, yea or no;
 Who answered him they came from Buckingham 525
 Upon his party. He, mistrusting them,
 Hoised° sail and made his course again for Britain.°

KING RICHARD

March on, march on, since we are up in arms,
 If not to fight with foreign enemies,
 Yet to beat down these rebels here at home. 530

Enter CATESBY.

CATESBY

My liege, the Duke of Buckingham is taken.
 That is the best news. That the Earl of Richmond
 Is with a mighty power landed at Milford
 Is colder news, but yet they must be told.

KING RICHARD

Away towards Salisbury! While we reason here, 535
 A royal battle might be won and lost.
 Someone take order Buckingham be brought
 To Salisbury; the rest march on with me.

Flourish. Exeunt.

Scene [V. Lord Stanley's house.]

Enter [Lord STANLEY Earl of] Derby, and Sir
 CHRISTOPHER [Urswick, a chaplain].

STANLEY

Sir Christopher, tell Richmond this from me:
 That in the sty of the most deadly boar
 My son George Stanley is franked up in hold;°
 If I revolt, off goes young George's head;
 The fear of that holds off my present aid. 5
 So get thee gone; commend me to thy lord.
 Withal say that the queen hath heartily consented
 He should espouse Elizabeth her daughter.
 But tell me, where is princely Richmond now?

CHRISTOPHER

At Pembroke or at Harfordwest° in Wales. 10

STANLEY

What men of name resort to him?

CHRISTOPHER

Sir Walter Herbert, a renownèd soldier,
 Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir William Stanley,
 Oxford, redoubted Pembroke, Sir James Blunt,
 And Rice ap Thomas, with a valiant crew, 15
 And many other of great name and worth;
 And towards London do they bend their power,
 If by the way they be not fought withal.

STANLEY

Well, hie thee to thy lord. I kiss his hand;
 My letter will resolve° him of my mind. 20

[Gives letter.]

Farewell.

Exeunt.

A C T V

Scene I. [Salisbury. An open place.]

Enter BUCKINGHAM with [SHERIFF and] HALBERDS,° led to execution.

BUCKINGHAM

Will not King Richard let me speak with him?

SHERIFF

No, my good lord; therefore be patient.

BUCKINGHAM

Hastings, and Edward's children, Grey and Rivers,
 Holy King Henry and thy fair son Edward,
 Vaughan, and all that have miscarrièd 5
 By underhand corrupted foul injustice,
 If that your moody discontented souls
 Do through the clouds behold this present hour,
 Even for revenge mock my destruction!
 This is All Souls' Day, fellow, is it not? 10

SHERIFF

It is, my lord.

BUCKINGHAM

Why, then All Souls' Day is my body's doomsday.
 This is the day which in King Edward's time
 I wished might fall on me when I was found
 False to his children and his wife's allies. 15

This is the day wherein I wished to fall
 By the false faith of him whom most I trusted.

This, this All Souls' Day to my fearful soul
 Is the determined respite of my wrongs.°

That high All-seer which I dallied with 20

Hath turned my feignèd prayer on my head
 And given in earnest what I begged in jest.

Thus doth he force the swords of wicked men

To turn their own points in their masters' bosoms.

Thus Margaret's curse falls heavy on my neck: 25

"When he," quoth she, "shall split thy heart with sorrow,

Remember Margaret was a prophetess."

Come lead me, officers, to the block of shame;

Wrong hath but wrong, and blame the due of blame.

Exeunt BUCKINGHAM with OFFICERS.

Scene II. [Camp near Tamworth.]

Enter RICHMOND, OXFORD, BLUNT, HERBERT, and others, with drum and colors.

RICHMOND

 Bruised underneath the yoke of tyranny,

Thus far into the bowels° of the land 15

Have we marched on without impediment;

And here receive we from our father Stanley 5

To reap the harvest of perpetual peace
By this one bloody trial of sharp war.

OXFORD

Every man's conscience is a thousand men
To fight against this guilty homicide.

HERBERT

I doubt not but his friends will turn to us.

BLUNT

He hath no friends but what are friends for fear,
Which in his dearest need will fly from him.

RICHMOND

All for our vantage. Then in God's name march!
True hope is swift and flies with swallow's wings;
Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings.

Exeunt omnes.

[Scene III. Bosworth Field.]

Enter KING RICHARD in arms, with NORFOLK, RATCLIFFE, and the Earl of SURREY, [and SOLDIERS].

KING RICHARD

Here pitch our tent, even here in Bosworth field.
My Lord of Surrey, why look you so sad?

SURREY

My heart is ten times lighter than my looks.

KING RICHARD

My Lord of Norfolk!

NORFOLK

Here, most gracious liege.

KING RICHARD

Norfolk, we must have knocks; ha, must we not?

NORFOLK

We must both give and take, my loving lord.

KING RICHARD

Up with my tent! Here will I lie tonight;

[SOLDIERS begin to set up the king's tent.]

But where tomorrow? Well, all's one for that.
Who hath descried the number of the traitors?

NORFOLK

Six or seven thousand is their utmost power.

KING RICHARD

Why, our battalia° trebles that account;
Besides, the king's name is a tower of strength,
Which they upon the adverse faction want.°

Up with the tent! Come, noble gentlemen,
Let us survey the vantage of the ground.

Call for some men of sound direction.°

Let's lack no discipline, make no delay,

For, lords, tomorrow is a busy day.

Exeunt.

Enter RICHMOND, Sir William BRANDON, OXFORD, and DORSET, [HERBERT, and BLUNT].

I'll draw the form and model of our battle,

25

And part in just proportion our small power.

My Lord of Oxford, you, Sir William Brandon,

And you, Sir Walter Herbert, stay with me.

The Earl of Pembroke keeps° his regiment;

Good Captain Blunt, bear my good-night to him,

30

And by the second hour in the morning

Desire the earl to see me in my tent.

Yet one thing more, good captain, do for me:

Where is Lord Stanley quartered, do you know?

BLUNT

Unless I have mista'en his colors much,

35

Which well I am assured I have not done,

His regiment lies half a mile at least

South from the mighty power of the king.

RICHMOND

If without peril it be possible,

Sweet Blunt, make some good means to speak with him

40

And give him from me this most needful note.

BLUNT

Upon my life, my lord, I'll undertake it;

And so God give you quiet rest tonight!

RICHMOND

Good night, good Captain Blunt. [Exit BLUNT.]

Come, gentlemen,

Let us consult upon tomorrow's business.

45

Into my tent; the dew is raw and cold.

They withdraw into the tent.

Enter, [to his tent, KING] RICHARD, RATCLIFFE, NORFOLK, and CATESBY.

KING RICHARD

What is't o'clock?

CATESBY It's suppertime, my lord;

It's nine o'clock.

KING RICHARD I will not sup tonight.

Give me some ink and paper.

What, is my beaver° easier than it was?

50

And all my armor laid into my tent?

CATESBY

It is, my liege; and all things are in readiness.

10

KING RICHARD

Good Norfolk, hie thee to thy charge;

Use careful watch, choose trusty sentinels.

NORFOLK

I go, my lord.

55

KING RICHARD

Stir with the lark tomorrow, gentle Norfolk.

15

NORFOLK

I warrant you, my lord.

Exit.

KING RICHARD

Catesby!

CATESBY

My lord?

KING RICHARD Send out a pursuivant-at-arms°

 Into the blind cave of eternal night. [Exit CATESBY.]
 Fill me a bowl of wine. Give me a watch.^o
 Saddle white Surrey^o for the field tomorrow.
 Look that my staves^o be sound and not too heavy. 65
 Ratcliffe!

RATCLIFFE

My lord?

KING RICHARD

Saw'st thou the melancholy Lord Northumberland?

RATCLIFFE

Thomas the Earl of Surrey and himself,
 Much about cockshut time,^o from troop to troop 70
 Went through the army, cheering up the soldiers.

KING RICHARD

So, I am satisfied. Give me a bowl of wine.
 I have not that alacrity of spirit
 Nor cheer of mind that I was wont to have.

[Wine brought.]

Set it down. Is ink and paper ready? 75

RATCLIFFE

It is, my lord.

KING RICHARD

Bid my guard watch. Leave me. Ratcliffe,
 About the mid of night come to my tent
 And help to arm me. Leave me, I say.

Exit RATCLIFFE. [KING RICHARD sleeps.]

Enter [STANLEY Earl of] Derby, to RICHMOND in his tent, [LORDS and GENTLEMEN attending].

STANLEY

Fortune and victory sit on thy helm! 80

RICHMOND

All comfort that the dark night can afford
 Be to thy person, noble father-in-law!
 Tell me, how fares our loving mother?

STANLEY

I by attorney bless thee from thy mother,
 Who prays continually for Richmond's good. 85
 So much for that. The silent hours steal on
 And flaky^o darkness breaks within the east.
 In brief, for so the season^o bids us be,
 Prepare thy battle early in the morning
 And put thy fortune to the arbitrament 90
 Of bloody strokes and mortal-staring^o war.
 I, as I may—that which I would I cannot—
 With best advantage^o will deceive the time^o
 And aid thee in this doubtful shock of arms.
 But on thy side I may not be too forward, 95
 Lest, being seen, thy brother, tender George,
 Be executed in his father's sight.
 Farewell; the leisure^o and the fearful time
 Cuts off the ceremonious vows of love
 And ample interchange of sweet discourse 100
 Which so long sund'red friends should dwell upon.

God give us leisure for these rites of love!
 Once more adieu; be valiant, and speed well.

RICHMOND

Good lords, conduct him to his regiment.
 I'll strive with^o troubled thoughts to take a nap, 105
 Lest leaden slumber peise^o me down tomorrow
 When I should mount with wings of victory.
 Once more, good night, kind lords and gentlemen.

Exeunt. Manet RICHMOND.

O thou whose captain I account myself,
 Look on my forces with a gracious eye! 110
 Put in their hands thy bruising irons of wrath,
 That they may crush down with a heavy fall
 The usurping helmets of our adversaries!
 Make us thy ministers of chastisement,
 That we may praise thee in the victory! 115
 To thee I do commend my watchful soul
 Ere I let fall the windows^o of mine eyes.
 Sleeping and waking, O defend me still!
Sleeps.

Enter the GHOST of Prince Edward, son to Henry the Sixth.

GHOST (To RICHARD.)

Let me sit heavy on thy soul tomorrow!
 Think how thou stab'st me in my prime of youth 120
 At Tewkesbury. Despair therefor^o and die!

(To RICHMOND.)

Be cheerful, Richmond; for the wrongèd souls
 Of butchered princes fight in thy behalf.
 King Henry's issue,^o Richmond, comforts thee.

[Exit.]

Enter the GHOST of Henry the Sixth.

GHOST (To RICHARD.)

When I was mortal, my anointed body 125
 By thee was punchèd full of deadly holes.
 Think on the Tower and me. Despair and die!
 Harry the Sixth bids thee despair and die!

(To RICHMOND.)

Virtuous and holy, be thou conqueror!
 Harry, that prophesied thou shouldst be king, 130
 Doth comfort thee in thy sleep. Live and flourish!

[Exit.]

Enter the GHOST of Clarence.

GHOST [To RICHARD.]

Let me sit heavy in thy soul tomorrow,
 I that was washed to death with fulsome wine,
 Poor Clarence, by thy guile betrayed to death. 135
 Tomorrow in the battle think on me,
 And fall^o thy edgeless sword. Despair and die!

(To RICHMOND.)

Thou offspring of the house of Lancaster,
 The wrongèd heirs of York do pray for thee.
 Good angels guard thy battle! Live and flourish!

[Exit.]

Enter the GHOST of Buckingham.

GHOST (To RICHARD.)

The first was I that helped thee to the crown;
The last was I that felt thy tyranny.
O, in the battle think on Buckingham,

RICHARD starteth up out of a dream.

KING RICHARD

Give me another horse! Bind up my wounds!
Have mercy, Jesu! Soft! I did but dream. 180
O coward conscience, how dost thou afflict me!
The lights burn blue. It is now dead midnight.
Cold fearful drops stand on my trembling flesh.
What do I fear? Myself? There's none else by.
Richard loves Richard: that is, I am I.
Is there a murderer here? No. Yes, I am. 185
Then fly. What, from myself? Great reason why!
Lest I revenge. What, myself upon myself?
Alack, I love myself. Wherefore? For any good
That I myself have done unto myself?
O no! Alas, I rather hate myself 190
For hateful deeds committed by myself.
I am a villain. Yet I lie, I am not.
Fool, of thyself speak well. Fool, do not flatter.
My conscience hath a thousand several^o tongues,
And every tongue brings in a several tale, 195
And every tale condemns me for a villain.
Perjury, perjury in the highest degree,
Murder, stern murder in the direst degree,
All several sins, all used in each degree,
Throng to the bar, crying all, "Guilty! Guilty!" 200
I shall despair. There is no creature loves me;
And if I die, no soul will pity me.
Nay, wherefore should they, since that I myself
Find in myself no pity to myself?
Methought the souls of all that I had murdered 205
Came to my tent, and every one did threat
Tomorrow's vengeance on the head of Richard.

Enter RATCLIFFE.

RATCLIFFE

My lord!

KING RICHARD

Zounds, who is there?

RATCLIFFE

Ratcliffe, my lord; 'tis I. The early village cock 210
Hath twice done salutation to the morn.
Your friends are up and buckle on their armor.

KING RICHARD

O Ratcliffe, I have dreamed a fearful dream!
What think'st thou, will our friends prove all true?

RATCLIFFE

No doubt, my lord.

KING RICHARD

O Ratcliffe, I fear, I fear!

215

RATCLIFFE

Nay, good my lord, be not afraid of shadows.

KING RICHARD

By the apostle Paul, shadows tonight 170
Have struck more terror to the soul of Richard
Than can the substance of ten thousand soldiers
Armèd in proof^o and led by shallow Richmond. 220

'Tis not yet near day. Come, go with me.
Under our tents I'll play the easesdropper°
To see if any mean to shrink from me.

Exeunt RICHARD and RATCLIFFE.

Enter the LORDS to RICHMOND sitting in his tent.

LORDS

Good morrow, Richmond.

RICHMOND

Cry mercy,° lords and watchful gentlemen,
That you have ta'en a tardy sluggard here.

LORDS

How have you slept, my lord?

RICHMOND

The sweetest sleep and fairest-boding dreams
That ever ent' red in a drowsy head
Have I since your departure had, my lords.
Methought their souls whose bodies Richard murdered

Came to my tent and cried° on victory.

I promise you my heart is very jocund

In the remembrance of so fair a dream.

How far into the morning is it, lords?

LORDS

Upon the stroke of four.

RICHMOND

Why, then 'tis time to arm and give direction.

His oration to his soldiers.

More than I have said, loving countrymen,
The leisure and enforcement of the time
Forbids to dwell upon; yet remember this:
God and our good cause fight upon our side;
The prayers of holy saints and wrongèd souls,
Like high-reared bulwarks, stand before our faces.
Richard except, those whom we fight against
Had rather have us win than him they follow.
For what is he they follow? Truly, gentlemen,
A bloody tyrant and a homicide;
One raised in blood and one in blood established;
One that made means° to come by what he hath,
And slaughtered those that were the means to help
him;

A base foul stone, made precious by the foil°
Of England's chair, where he is falsely set;
One that hath ever been God's enemy.
Then if you fight against God's enemy,
God will in justice ward° you as his soldiers;
If you do sweat to put a tyrant down,
You sleep in peace, the tyrant being slain;
If you do fight against your country's foes,
Your country's fat° shall pay your pains the hire;
If you do fight in safeguard of your wives,
Your wives shall welcome home the conquerors;
If you do free your children from the sword,
Your children's children quits° it in your age.
Then in the name of God and all these rights,
Advance your standards, draw your willing swords.
For me, the ransom° of my bold attempt

Shall be this cold corpse on the earth's cold face;
But if I thrive, the gain of my attempt
The least of you shall share his part thereof.
Sound drums and trumpets boldly and cheerfully;
God and Saint George! Richmond and victory!

270

[Exeunt.]

Enter KING RICHARD, RATCLIFFE, and [SOLDIERS].

225

What said Northumberland as touching Richmond?

RATCLIFFE

That he was never trained up in arms.

KING RICHARD

He said the truth; and what said Surrey then?

RATCLIFFE

He smiled and said, "The better for our purpose."

275

KING RICHARD

He was in the right, and so indeed it is.

The clock striketh.

Tell° the clock there. Give me a calendar.

Who saw the sun today?

235

RATCLIFFE

Not I, my lord.

KING RICHARD

Then he disdains to shine; for by the book

He should have braved° the east an hour ago.

280

A black day will it be to somebody.

Ratcliffe!

RATCLIFFE

My lord?

240

KING RICHARD The sun will not be seen today;

The sky doth frown and lour upon our army.

I would these dewy tears were from the ground.

285

Not shine today! Why, what is that to me

More than to Richmond? For the selfsame heaven

245

That frowns on me looks sadly upon him.

Enter NORFOLK.

NORFOLK

Arm, arm, my lord; the foe vaunts in the field.

KING RICHARD

Come, bustle, bustle. Caparison my horse.

290

Call up Lord Stanley, bid him bring his power.

I will lead forth my soldiers to the plain,

And thus my battle shall be orderèd:

My foreward shall be drawn out all in length,

255

Consisting equally of horse and foot;

295

Our archers shall be placèd in the midst;

John Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Earl of Surrey,

Shall have the leading of this foot and horse.

They thus directed,° we will follow

In the main battle, whose puissance° on either side

300

Shall be well wingèd with our chiefest horse.

This, and Saint George to boot!° What think'st thou,

Norfolk?

NORFOLK

A good direction, warlike sovereign.

This found I on my tent this morning.

He showeth him a paper.

For Dickon thy master is bought and sold."°

KING RICHARD

A thing devisèd by the enemy.
Go, gentlemen, every man unto his charge.
Let not our babbling dreams affright our souls;
Conscience is but a word that cowards use,
Devised at first to keep the strong in awe;
Our strong arms be our conscience, swords our law!
March on, join bravely, let us to it pell-mell,
If not to heaven, then hand in hand to hell.

His oration to his army.

What shall I say more than I have inferred?
Remember whom you are to cope withal,
A sort° of vagabonds, rascals, and runaways,
A scum of Britains and base lackey peasants,
Whom their o'erloydèd country vomits forth
To desperate ventures and assured destruction.
You sleeping safe, they bring to you unrest;
You having lands, and blest with beauteous wives,
They would distrai° the one, distain° the other.
And who doth lead them but a paltry fellow,
Long kept in Britain° at our mother's cost,
A milksop, one that never in his life
Felt so much cold as over shoes in snow?
Let's whip these stragglers o'er the seas again,
Lash hence these overweening rags of France,
These famished beggars, weary of their lives,
Who, but for dreaming on this fond° exploit,
For want of means, poor rats, had hanged themselves.
If we be conquerèd, let men conquer us,
And not these bastard Britains, whom our fathers
Have in their own land beaten, bobbed, and thumped, 335
And in record left them the heirs of shame.
Shall these enjoy our lands? Lie with our wives?
Ravish our daughters? (Drum afar off.) Hark! I hear their drum.
Fight, gentlemen of England! Fight, bold yeomen!
Draw, archers, draw your arrows to the head! 340
Spur your proud horses hard and ride in blood!
Amaze the welkin° with your broken staves!

Enter a MESSENGER.

What says Lord Stanley? Will he bring his power?

MESSENGER

My lord, he doth deny to come.

KING RICHARD

Off with his son George's head!

NORFOLK

My lord, the enemy is past the marsh.
After the battle let George Stanley die.

KING RICHARD

A thousand hearts are great within my bosom.
Advance our standards, set upon our foes!
Our ancient word of courage, fair Saint George, 350
Inspire us with the spleen° of fiery dragons!
Upon them! Victory sits on our helms. Exeunt.

[Scene IV. Bosworth Field.]

Alarum; excursions.° Enter CATESBY [and NORFOLK].

CATESBY

Rescue, my Lord of Norfolk, rescue, rescue!
The king enacts more wonders than a man,
Daring an opposite° to every danger.
His horse is slain, and all on foot he fights,
Seeking for Richmond in the throat of death. 5
Rescue, fair lord, or else the day is lost!

Alarums. Enter [KING] RICHARD.

KING RICHARD

315 A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!

CATESBY

Withdraw, my lord; I'll help you to a horse.

KING RICHARD

Slave, I have set my life upon a cast,°
And I will stand the hazard° of the die. 10
I think there be six Richmonds in the field;
Five have I slain today instead of him.
A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!

[Exeunt.]

[Scene V. Bosworth Field.]

RICHMOND

God and your arms be praised, victorious friends!
The day is ours; the bloody dog is dead.

STANLEY

Courageous Richmond, well hast thou acquit thee.
Lo, here this long-usurpèd royalty
From the dead temples of this bloody wretch 5
Have I plucked off, to grace thy brows withal.
Wear it, enjoy it, and make much of it.

RICHMOND

Great God of Heaven, say amen to all!
But tell me, is young Stanley living?

STANLEY

He is, my lord, and safe in Leicester town, 10
Whither, if it please you, we may now withdraw us.

RICHMOND

345 What men of name° are slain on either side?

STANLEY

John Duke of Norfolk, Walter Lord Ferrers,
Sir Robert Brakenbury, and Sir William Brandon.

RICHMOND

Inter their bodies as become their births. 15
Proclaim a pardon to the soldiers fled
That in submission will return to us;
And then, as we have ta'en the sacrament,°
We will unite the White Rose and the Red.

THE TRAGEDY OF TITUS ANDRONICUS

EDITED BY SYLVAN BARNET

Introduction

Titus Andronicus has had few admirers and numerous detractors. T. S. Eliot states the detractors' case as directly as any: Titus is "one of the stupidest and most uninspired plays ever written, a play in which it is incredible that Shakespeare had any hand at all, a play in which the best passages would be too highly honored by the signature of Peele." Unlike Eliot's notably original view that Hamlet "so far from being Shakespeare's masterpiece . . . is most certainly an artistic failure," his remark on Titus is a commonplace: Dr. Johnson, Hazlitt, Coleridge, and the editor of the Yale edition denied Shakespeare's authorship of most of the play; the editor of the New Cambridge edition gives much of it to Peele and saves some of the Shakespearean passages only by the desperate expedient of claiming that they are not really bad but are a clever burlesque of bad writing.

The idea that Titus may not be entirely Shakespeare's is at least as old as 1687, when Thomas Ravenscroft, who had recently given the stage his adaptation of the play, recorded that he had been told that Shakespeare "only gave some master touches to one or two of the principal parts or characters." But the evidence that Shakespeare wrote Titus is weighty. In 1598 Francis Meres listed it as one of Shakespeare's plays, and in 1623 Heminges and Condell, who had acted with Shakespeare for some twenty years, included Titus in the Folio collection of his plays. However displeased we may be by part or all of Titus, there is no evidence that it is not his.

There are, of course, some inconsistencies that have been offered as proof that Shakespeare was revising an older play. We are told in II.iii.86 that Tamora's infidelity to the emperor has "made him noted [notorious] long," although Tamora and the emperor have been married only one night. But such an inconsistency proves no more about dual authorship than the similar treatment of time in Othello, or the apparently contradictory remarks about Macbeth's children. More serious is the shift of the villain's role from Tamora to Aaron, but again it does not prove that Shakespeare is revising an earlier play; probably he found the Moor Aaron coming to life as he worked on him, and Tamora simply fell into the background until the last act, when her part is stronger.

There is no sense trying to dissociate Shakespeare from Titus; all the available evidence insists that it is canonical. But neither is there any sense in emphasizing, as has recently been done, its connection with Shakespeare's early historical plays or with his later Roman tragedies. A good deal has been written about the Elizabethan history play as a dramatized sermon on the wounds of civil war, a sermon of special interest to Englishmen whose monarch was an aging and heirless queen. The later Roman plays, too, are seen to have political subjects. It is true, of course, that Julius Caesar, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus are all concerned in part with civil war, but it is hard to believe that while witnessing a performance of, say, Antony and Cleopatra, Shakespeare's audience fretted about the possibility that England would find itself the battlefield of triumvirs; rather it must have been watching with interest a story in which political themes are subordinated to the doings of a "lass unparalleled" and a general who becomes "the noble ruin of her magic." Titus does indeed concern itself, in part of the first scene, with establishing the succession in Rome; Titus is asked (I.i.186) to "help to set a head on headless Rome." But thereafter the motif fades from view until the fifth act, when Lucius, one of Titus' sons, leads an army against the vicious emperor whom Titus in the first scene helped to establish. In V.iii.67 ff. there is a speech stressing the horror of civil war, but it can scarcely be said to be closely related to what has preceded it, and its ascription to a nameless "Roman Lord" suggests that it may well have been an afterthought. There is, furthermore, a curious bit of evidence that Shakespeare regarded the play as less political than did the earliest recorded interpreter, the printer or editor of the second quarto (1600). The first quarto (1594) concludes—as presumably Shakespeare concluded—with some lines about the deceased wicked queen:

As for that ravenous tiger, Tamora,
No funeral rite, nor man in mourning weed,
No mournful bell shall ring her burial;
But throw her forth to beasts and birds to prey.
Her life was beastly and devoid of pity,
And being dead, let birds on her take pity.

When a second edition was called for, it was apparently set up from a copy that had suffered some damage to the foot of the last leaf of text; the person overseeing the publication seems to have mistakenly thought that some lines had been lost at the foot, though in fact nothing was lost but "Finis the Tragedy of Titus Andronicus." He added four lines:

See justice done on Aaron, that damned Moor,
By whom our heavy haps had their beginning;
Then afterwards to order well the state,
That like events may ne'er it ruin.

The last two lines, though bad, are appropriate enough and have their parallels in later plays when rather colorless characters assure their fellows that some sort of order is returning to the state, but certainly neither these lines nor the first scene should turn our minds from characters and passions to politics. Shakespeare himself ended the play by calling attention not to political concerns but to the pitiless queen whose body will be left for scavenging birds.

To say that Shakespeare ended his play with a comment on the queen and not on the state is not to deny that there are substantial passages devoted to the state. But the final lines emphasize the central concern of the play—the passions and deeds that are the stuff of tragedy. Critics tend to suggest that we go to a tragedy so that we may draw political and ethical conclusions, but the tragic dramatists tend to emphasize deeds of horror and passionate responses to these deeds. Even at the end of a play, the emphasis is not on drawing conclusions but on experiencing emotions. Nobody who witnesses Hamlet can feel that the entrance of Fortinbras shifts attention from tragic experiences to ethics and politics; attention is kept on the catastrophic happenings in Denmark.

AMBASSADOR The sight is dismal;
And our affairs from England come too late.
The ears are senseless that should give us hearing.

HORATIO
But since, so jump upon this bloody question,
You from the Polack wars, and you from England,
Are here arrived, give order that these bodies
High on a stage be placèd to the view,
And let me speak to th' yet unknowing world
How these things came about. So shall you hear
Of carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts,
Of accidental judgments, casual slaughters,
Of deaths put on by cunning and forced cause,
And, in this upshot, purposes mistook
Fall'n on th' inventors' heads.

(Hamlet V.ii.369–71, 377–87)

The violence of Titus has often aroused condemnation, as though tragedy did not customarily dramatize violence. It is true that Titus has more than its share, but if, for example, we find especially abhorrent the introduction of the severed heads of two of Titus' sons, it is perhaps because we have forgotten (since directors customarily omit the business) a stage direction in the last act of Macbeth, "Enter Macduff, with Macbeth's head." Repulsive happenings are not something Shakespeare dramatized in his youth and then outgrew; Hamlet concludes with four corpses (there would be a fifth if Horatio had his way), to say nothing of the earlier deaths or the skulls the grave-diggers unearth; King Lear calls for Gloucester to be blinded before the audience, and it concludes with the (to modern taste) gratuitous introduction of the corpses of Goneril and Regan, who have had the grace to die offstage. The dozen or so deaths in Titus are about double the number in Lear, and the rape and cannibalism in Titus are unparalleled elsewhere in Shakespeare, but they are not incompatible with the idea of tragedy. Nor are they mere Elizabethan sensationalism. If we recall Clytemnestra exulting over her slaughtered husband, or the incestuous Oedipus entering on the stage with bloody eyeless sockets, or the lecherous Pentheus, whose mother will in a frenzy exult over his severed head, we remember that none of the world's four great tragic dramatists shrinks from dramatizing the demonic and the horrible. We tend, especially if we are readers rather than spectators, to emphasize the wisdom and patience that are allegedly achieved through heroic suffering, but surely we ought to recall, for example, that Hamlet in the last act forces poison down Claudius' throat. Again, we can talk of purgation and reconciliation in King Lear, but we must recall that the cries and horrors do not disappear toward the end of the play; it is only seventy-five lines before the end that Lear enters with the dead Cordelia in his arms ("Howl, howl, howl, howl"), and the play closes with a dead march.

Of Shakespeare's early tragedies—Richard III, Titus, Richard II, and Romeo and Juliet—Titus is certainly the poorest, but it alone has a protagonist who is both noble and flawed, and thus it looks forward to Julius Caesar and to the greater tragedies. Romeo and Juliet, perhaps the best of Shakespeare's early tragedies, is an incomparably finer piece of work than Titus, but its vision of star-crossed lovers is quite different from the tragic vision of Hamlet, Othello, Lear, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus, whose protagonists in a significant way resemble Titus. In Romeo and Juliet the lack of any vigorous presentation of evil (in most of the greater tragedies Shakespeare did not hesitate to draw potent villains), the decisive role played by chance, the youth and innocence of the lovers, and the emphasis on reconciliation at the end, all work together to produce a tragedy that strikes us as substantially different from the later tragedies. Of course one can say that the lovers are in some measure responsible for their fates—if they had not loved they might have outlived their parents—but the overall impression is one of innocence destroyed by destiny and released from this transitory world to a timeless realm. Titus is something else; in it, as in the great tragedies, deeds recoil on the head of the doers and even well-intentioned deeds may have their painful consequences. Titus offers up Alarbus as a sacrifice to the souls of the dead, and he thereby incurs the hatred of Tamora. Declining to accept the title of emperor, Titus helps to establish Saturninus, who quickly proves to be his foe. Titus nominates Saturninus apparently because he is the elder son—a reasonable basis—but the first two speeches of the play suggest to the hearer that Bassianus rather than Saturninus is the fitter. What Shakespeare is doing, of course, is dramatizing what seems to be an essential tragic fact—a man doing something according to his best lights and according to an impressive but, as it proves, mistaken code. In his dealings with his sons, as well as with Tamora and Saturninus, Titus prefigures the great tragic heroes: Titus' inflexible conception of honor alienates him even from those he loves. He moves, a Titan, in a world of his own, at times heroically silent when lesser men would weep, at times loudly lamenting to the stones when lesser men would be silent. At the start it is said of him,

A nobler man, a braver warrior,
Lives not this day within the city walls. (I.i.25-26)

His nobility, his bravery, sets him off from others, even from his own sons, and (like Othello's high vision of Desdemona that leads him to kill her when he thinks her unchaste) Titus' virtues themselves become oppressive. His code of honor sets him apart from other men; he becomes increasingly aware of a painful isolation, and he speaks of it grandly, as a tragic hero should. Juliet comes to realize that her "dismal scene [she] needs must act alone"; Macbeth, plotting Banquo's death, keeps even his wife "innocent of the knowledge"; Hamlet speaks "wild and whirling words" and is markedly detached from Horatio, as well as from Claudius, Gertrude, and Ophelia; Lear will "abjure all roofs"; Coriolanus, told that he is banished from Rome, will reply "I banish you." Titus, the earliest of these protagonists, says of himself:

For now I stand as one upon a rock,
Environed with a wilderness of sea,
Who marks the waxing tide grow wave by wave,
Expecting ever when some envious surge
Will in his brinish bowels swallow him.
This way to death my wretched sons are gone,
Here stands my other son, a banished man,
And here my brother weeping at my woes:
But that which gives my soul the greatest spurn
Is dear Lavinia, dearer than my soul. (III.i.93-102)

Like Shakespeare's other tragic figures, he wears the shirt of Nessus and gives vent to his feelings. The speech is a little too self-conscious, the assonance, alliteration, and other repetitions are a little too insistent (waxing, wave by wave; expecting, ever, envious; brinish bowels; stands, son; weeping, woes; soul, spurn, dear, dearer, soul), but one would be hard pressed to point to a better passage in the work of any of Shakespeare's early contemporaries other than Marlowe.

Shakespeare must have felt that his chief problem was one of style, not of plot: what sort of rhetoric could effectively present the bloody and unnatural horrors that were the substance of Elizabethan tragedy and of classical tragedy as he knew it? There was, of course, no question of presenting tragic happenings "realistically"; tragedy was concerned with unusual people in unusual situations; its medium was verse, not prose. Titus contains a few brief exchanges in prose, and indeed the Clown's prose is notable ("God forbid, I should be so bold to press to heaven in my young days"), but when he wrote Titus, Shakespeare must have been unable to conceive of the significant role that prose might play in his tragedies. Even half a century or so after Shakespeare's great achievements in tragic prose, England's best dramatic critic of the time believed that because tragedy shows us "nature wrought up to a higher pitch" it ought to be in verse. (Dryden advocated heroic couplets, however, not blank verse.) The verse drama of Shakespeare's infancy and much of that of his youth was rhymed, heavily alliterative, and rich in laments built on apostrophes, rhetorical questions, and exclamations. To us it seems stiff and foolish, even in the hands of, say, George Gascoigne, who was educated at Cambridge, and who wrote some lyric and satiric verse of considerable merit. Here is a passage from Gascoigne's tragedy Jocasta, produced at Gray's Inn in 1566:

ANTIGONE

O doleful day, wherein my sorry sire
Was born, and yet O more unhappy hour
When he was crownèd king of stately Thebes.
The Hymenei, in unhappy bed
And wicked wedlock, wittingly did join
The guiltless mother with her guilty son,
Out of which root we be the branches born
To bear the scourge of their so foul offense.

If a passage with less narrative content is wanted, the following will do to show the tragic lament full-blown:

ANTIGONE

O weary life, why bid'st thou in my breast
And I contented be that these mine eyes
Should see her die that gave to me this life,
And I not 'venge her death by loss of life?
Who can me give a fountain made of moan,
That I may weep as much as is my will,
To souse this sorrow up in swelling tears?

Finally:

OEDIPUS

O wife, O mother, O both woeful names,
O woeful mother, and O woeful wife,
O would to God, alas, O would to God
Thou ne'er had been my mother, nor my wife.

That Gascoigne is translating does not obscure the kind or the quality of his verse. Shakespeare must have been very familiar with this sort of writing; in A Midsummer Night's Dream he neatly parodies (through Bottom's speech) the lament of the previous generation:

But stay, O spite!
But mark, poor knight,
What dreadful dole is here!
Eyes, do you see?
How can it be?
O dainty duck! O dear!
Thy mantle good,
What, stained with blood!
Approach, ye Furies fell!
O Fates, come, come,
Cut thread and thrum;
Quail, crush, conclude, and quell! (V.i.274-85)

More subtle, Hotspur's dying words in 1 Henry IV have a touch of the same absurd apostrophe and alliteration that marked the older drama and that are appropriate to this anachronistic young knight:

O Harry, thou hast robbed me of my youth!
I better brook the loss of brittle life
Than those proud titles thou hast won of me.
They wound my thoughts worse than thy sword my flesh.
But thoughts, the slaves of life, and life, time's fool. . . .
(V.iv.75-79)

In Titus there is a good deal of alliteration, balance, and parallelism, especially in the first two acts:

Patient yourself, madam, and pardon me. (I.i.121)
Rome's readiest champions, repose you here in rest
(I.i.151)
Clear up, fair queen, that cloudy countenance.
Though chance of war hath wrought this change of cheer
(I.i.263-64)
And curtained with a counsel-keeping cave (II.iii.24)

On the whole the impression is not that of naiveté; or if there is a suggestion of naiveté, it is that of a highly talented writer infatuated with his medium and occasionally forgetful of the dramatic ends that every speech ought to serve. Despite the abundant (almost comically frequent) horrors, the atmosphere is more that of the hothouse than the slaughterhouse; the horrors exist in elegant luxuriance, and though the groundlings probably were delighted, the author must have felt he was creating a drama that would appeal also to the cultivated, who knew Seneca and Ovid.

The Latin quotations that dot the play are the most apparent sign of the lamp, but the fifty-odd mythological allusions are scarcely less apparent. Despite the classical setting, Shakespeare did not have to strew his play with references to Pyramus, Vulcan, Cerberus, Prometheus, Hecuba, the Styx, Dido and Aeneas, Priam, Virginius, and a host of others. Julius Caesar has only a tenth as many mythological allusions, but when he wrote Titus, Shakespeare evidently was aiming at something quite different from the spare style he was to use in Julius Caesar. In Titus he seeks to capture grandeur by abundance. Here is a sample:

Now climbeth Tamora Olympus' top,
Safe out of fortune's shot, and sits aloft,
Secure of thunder's crack or lightning flash,
Advanced above pale envy's threat'ning reach.
As when the golden sun salutes the morn,
And having gilt the ocean with his beams,
Gallops the zodiac in his glistering coach,
And overlooks the highest-peering hills;
So Tamora:
Upon her wit doth earthly honor wait,
And virtue stoops and trembles at her frown. (II.i.1-11)

The simile beginning in line 5 is markedly introduced by the prominent position that "As" occupies in the line, and it is markedly concluded by the similarly prominent

"So" in line 9; the explicit allusion to Olympus and the only barely less explicit allusion to Phoebus suggest that Shakespeare is attempting to climb, in Sidney's phrase, to "the height of Seneca his style." (Before the speech is over there will be a reference to Prometheus, and another to Semiramis.) Sidney was speaking, about 1585, of Gorboduc (1562), but his words apply to the infinitely superior Titus: "it is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases."

This heightened style, as well as the conception of a tragic hero pushed beyond the limits of endurance, surely owes something to Seneca, but Ovid, too, helped shape Titus. The grisly business of cooking Chiron and Demetrius and serving them as a meat pie to a parent is Ovidian as well as Senecan; Seneca's Thyestes includes such a feast, but so too does Ovid's tale of Procne in Metamorphoses. In a sense, the stories are inseparable; in Thyestes, Atreus himself compares the feast to that in the legend of Procne, and the basic idea of a parent dining on the flesh of his offspring (a vestige of rituals in which the father killed his son as his son became a competitor?) exists in various myths. In Titus, Shakespeare quotes—rather misquotes—bits of Seneca, but he alludes directly not only to the legend of Procne but to its rendition in the Metamorphoses. The strong Ovidian influence on Shakespeare's early writing, especially on the narrative poems, is beyond all doubt; Francis Meres said in 1598 what must have seemed commonplace: "The sweet witty soul of Ovid lives in mellifluous and honey-tongued Shakespeare; witness his Venus and Adonis, his Lucrece, his sugared sonnets." In Love's Labor's Lost a pedant, Holofernes, speaks of Ovid, and though Holofernes can scarcely be regarded as a reliable mouthpiece, here he seems to be voicing Shakespeare's opinion, though perhaps a little bumptiously: "For the elegancy, facility, and golden cadence of poesy, . . . Ovidius Naso was the man" (IV.ii.123-25).

Ovid's elegancy, facility, and golden cadence had been famous even in antiquity (Quintilian said Ovid was unable to curb his luxuriance—even as Ben Jonson was later to say that Shakespeare "flowed with that facility that sometime it was necessary he should be stopped"), and to English playwrights in the latter part of the sixteenth century Ovid must have seemed with Seneca to be the man to add dignity to the blatant huffings of earlier English tragedy. The earlier tragedies with their abundant "O's" were notably direct; Ovid is often equally direct, but he is also rich in comparisons. Philomela's severed tongue "writhed convulsively," a recent translation says, "like a snake's tail when it has been newly cut off and, dying, tried to reach its mistress' feet." In Arthur Golding's version of Ovid, which Shakespeare surely knew, the passage runs thus:

And with a pair of pinsons fast did catch her by the tongue,
And with his sword did cut it off. The stump thereon it hung
Did patter still. The tip fell down, and quivering on the ground
As though that it had murmured it made a certain sound,
And as an adder's tail cut off doth skip a while, even so
The tip of Philomela's tongue did wriggle to and fro,
And nearer to her mistressward in dying still did go.

Here is Ovid's description (in Golding's words) of Pyramus' wound: Pyramus drew

His sword, the which among his guts he thrust, and by and by
Did draw it from the bleeding wound beginning for to die,
And cast himself upon his back. The blood did spin on high
As when a conduit pipe is cracked, the water bursting out
Doth shoot itself a great way off and pierce the air about.

Probably Shakespeare felt that his description of the mutilated Lavinia was in the best Ovidian manner:

Why dost not speak to me?
Alas, a crimson river of warm blood,
Like to a bubbling fountain stirred with wind,
Doth rise and fall between thy rosèd lips,
Coming and going with thy honey breath. (II.iv.21-25)

In Lucrece, probably written in 1593, within three or four years of Titus and possibly within the same year, Shakespeare wrote:

And from the purple fountain Brutus drew
The murd'rous knife, and as it left the place,
Her blood, in poor revenge, held it in chase.
(lines 1734-36)

To defend Lucrece would be even more difficult than to defend Titus, but it ought to be evident that Shakespeare is attempting to make art out of violence. For naked violence we must turn, say, to Lear, where a woman plucks an old man's beard, urges her husband to gouge out the old man's eyes, and stabs a servant in the back. In Titus the horror is for the most part elevated, or at least veiled by ingenuity.

This is not to say that Shakespeare's treatment of horror is successful in Titus: the testimony of generations of readers (few playgoers have had the chance to see Titus) strongly suggests that it is unsuccessful. The elaborate treatment occasionally disgusts us, though perhaps it was meant to distance the horror and thereby make it acceptable. But in its day, and for a couple of decades after, the play was popular; as late as 1614 Ben Jonson grumbled that Titus still had its admirers. It is a remarkable achievement, superior in character, in plot, and in language to The Spanish Tragedy, and it rivals Marlowe, whose plays are the only other major plays of the period. Its exuberance, though in places distressing, is a sign of imaginative fertility that was later to be splendidly husbanded. It is, of course, a play that is of its age, but if we strongly have this impression, is it not partly because Shakespeare went on to write plays that are not of an age but for all time?

A NOTE ON THE SOURCE

Those Shakespeareans who are embarrassed by Titus (but who cannot overlook the strong evidence that he wrote it) sometimes assume that it represents his reworking of an older, and presumably worse, play. No such play has come to light, and though it is possible that Shakespeare's source was a play now extant only in Shakespeare's revision, it is more than possible—even likely—that his source was a prose tale regarded as history. The Folger Shakespeare Library has a unique copy of a mid-eighteenth-century booklet entitled The History of Titus Andronicus, which contains a prose narrative and a ballad. The ballad is a short metrical version of the prose narrative, but this latter seems to be a reprint of a much older piece—possibly of a late-sixteenth-century version that may have been Shakespeare's source. Certainly the prose narrative is not indebted to the play: it makes no reference to Shakespeare—as it surely would if it had been written in the eighteenth century—and it includes a good deal of alleged history that Shakespeare does not. Furthermore, some of its characters are unnamed; if the narrative were based on the play, Aaron, for example, would doubtless be mentioned by name, but he is merely called "the wicked Moor."

Put it this way: the extant History of Titus Andronicus is almost surely a reprint of a much older piece, quite possibly a reprint of the tale that Shakespeare dramatized. There is no opposing evidence.

The prose tale, like almost all fictions, draws upon earlier fictions: Lavinia calls attention to the parallel between her plight and Philomela's in Ovid's Metamorphoses; the banquet of human flesh is referred to in Ovid, and is an important part of Seneca's Thyestes. If Shakespeare did use the prose tale, he did not have to turn to Ovid or Seneca, but he surely knew some of their work at first hand anyway. But the source of the play is not simply in specific books. The play is indebted to an Elizabethan idea of what a classical tragedy ought to be—richly ornamented, with a hero overwhelmed by passion and driven to seek revenge. The villainous Aaron, however, is derived from another dramatic tradition, that of the native morality play, which offered (in the Vice) models of ingenious, unpitying villainy. The Senecan and Ovidian influences—first-hand or through the prose tale—are real, but they have been discussed almost too much; this native influence has been almost neglected except for the good study by Bernard Spivack, Shakespeare and the Allegory of Evil. (For a full discussion of the possible debts to numerous books, see Geoffrey Bullough, Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare, Vol. VI.)

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

There is an allusion to a Roman hero named Titus in A Knack To Know a Knave, acted in June 1592. Though the allusion may, of course, be to an earlier play on the subject rather than to Shakespeare's play, there is no need to multiply entities; Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus may have been on the stage before 1592. The next bit of evidence is a reference of January 23, 1594, in Henslowe's Diary to the effect that Sussex's men acted a new piece, "titus & ondronicus." If the allusion in A Knave is not to Shakespeare's play, quite possibly Titus Andronicus was indeed new in 1594, but it is equally possible that it was "new" only to Sussex's company, or that it had been newly revised. On February 6, 1594, the Stationers' Register entered "a book intituled a Noble Roman Historye of Titus Andronicus." Perhaps this entry alludes to the play, which indeed was published in 1594, though possibly the entry is to some other piece on the same subject. In 1614 Ben Jonson, in the Induction to Bartholomew Fair, mentions that Andronicus was seen on the stage as long ago as "fiue and twentie or thirtie yeeres"; strictly, Jonson's reference would date the play 1584–89, though probably he is speaking loosely and his evidence surely does not prohibit a date in the early nineties. The date widely favored is 1592–94, but there is no compelling reason to believe that Titus could not have been written in the late eighties.

Only one copy of the first quarto (1594) is known to be extant. Apparently the first quarto (Q1) was printed from Shakespeare's manuscript or from a copy of it; a number of stage directions—such as "Enter . . . as many as can be"—suggest an author's hand. In 1600 a second quarto (Q2) was issued. It omits a few lines, adds some, and alters a good deal of punctuation. There is no reason to believe that the alterations represent Shakespeare's revisions; probably all the revisions are a compositor's tamperings. Q3, issued in 1611, was set up from Q2 and therefore has no authority. The version in the First Folio (F) is based on Q3 but makes numerous small alterations (especially in stage directions) and adds an entire scene (III.ii). The new scene is of sufficient excellence to be Shakespeare's, and though the other changes in F do not suggest that great effort was made to give the play in a version much different from that of Q3, the new scene shows that the editors had access to some unpublished material. The present edition is based on Q1, except for III.ii, which is, of course, based on F. It regularizes speech prefixes (for example, Q1's "Saturnine," "Saturninus," "King," "Satur," are all given here as "Saturninus"); it slightly alters the position of a few stage directions, and it modernizes spelling and punctuation. The act divisions were first established by F; the scene divisions are the work of later editors and though of no authenticity they provide a convenient device for reference. Departures from Q1, other than those mentioned above and corrections of obvious typographical errors, are listed below, the adopted reading first, in boldface, followed by the original reading in roman. If the adopted reading is from Q2, Q3, or F, that fact is indicated in a bracket following the reading. If there is no such indication, the adopted reading is an editor's conjecture.

[Scene I. Rome. Before the Capitol.]

[Flourish.^o] Enter the TRIBUNES and SENATORS aloft; and then enter SATURNINUS and his FOLLOWERS at one door, and BASSIANUS and his FOLLOWERS [at the other,] with drums and trumpets.

SATURNINUS

Noble patricians, patrons of my right,
Defend the justice of my cause with arms;
And, countrymen, my loving followers,
Plead my successive title^o with your swords.
I am his first-born son that was the last
That wore the imperial diadem of Rome;
Then let my father's honors live in me,
Nor wrong mine age^o with this indignity.

BASSIANUS

Romans, friends, followers, favorers of my right,
If ever Bassianus, Caesar's son,
Were gracious^o in the eyes of royal Rome,
Keep^o then this passage to the Capitol,
And suffer not dishonor to approach
The imperial seat, to virtue consecrate,
To justice, continence,^o and nobility;
But let desert in pure election shine,
And, Romans, fight for freedom in your choice.

MARCUS (With the crown.)

Princes, that strive by factions and by friends
Ambitiously for rule and empery,^o
Know that the people of Rome, for whom we stand
A special party, have by common voice,
In election for the Roman empery,
Chosen Andronicus, surnamed Pius
For many good and great deserts to Rome.

quarto edition of Titus Andronicus, 1600.

A nobler man, a braver warrior,
 Lives not this day within the city walls.
 He by the senate is accited^o home
 From weary wars against the barbarous Goths;
 That with his sons, a terror to our foes,
 Hath yoked^o a nation strong, trained up in arms.
 Ten years are spent since first he undertook
 This cause of Rome, and chastisèd with arms
 Our enemies' pride: five times he hath returned Bleeding to Rome, bearing his valiant sons
 In coffins from the field.^o
 And now at last, laden with honor's spoils,
 Returns the good Andronicus to Rome,
 Renownèd Titus, flourishing in arms.
 Let us entreat, by honor of his name,
 Whom worthily you would have now succeed,
 And in the Capitol and senate's right,^o
 Whom you pretend^o to honor and adore,
 That you withdraw you and abate your strength,
 Dismiss your followers, and, as suitors should,
 Plead your deserts in peace and humbleness.

SATURNINUS

How fair^o the tribune speaks to calm my thoughts!

BASSIANUS

Marcus Andronicus, so I do affy^o
 In thy uprightness and integrity,
 And so I love and honor thee and thine,
 Thy noble brother Titus and his sons,
 And her to whom my thoughts are humbled all,
 Gracious Lavinia, Rome's rich ornament,
 That I will here dismiss my loving friends;
 And to my fortunes and the people's favor
 Commit my cause in balance to be weighed.

Exit [his] SOLDIERS.

SATURNINUS

Friends, that have been thus forward in my right,
 I thank you all, and here dismiss you all,
 And to the love and favor of my country
 Commit myself, my person, and the cause.^o

[Exeunt his FOLLOWERS.]

Rome, be as just and gracious unto me
 As I am confident and kind^o to thee.
 Open the gates and let me in.

BASSIANUS

Tribunes, and me, a poor competitor.^o
[Flourish.] They go up into the senate house.

Enter a CAPTAIN.

CAPTAIN

Romans, make way! The good Andronicus,
 Patron^o of virtue, Rome's best champion,

25 Successful in the battles that he fights,
 With honor and with fortune is returned
 From where he circumscribèd with his sword
 And brought to yoke the enemies of Rome.

30 Sound drums and trumpets, and then enter two of 'Titus' SONS, and then two MEN bearing a coffin covered with black, then two other SONS, then TITUS Andronicus, and then TAMORA, the Queen of Goths, and her three sons [ALARBUS,] CHIRON, and DEMETRIUS, with AARON the Moor, and others as many as can be; then set down the coffin, and TITUS speaks.

35

TITUS

Hail, Rome, victorious in thy mourning weeds!^o 70
 Lo, as the bark that hath discharged his fraught^o
 Returns with precious lading to the bay
 From whence at first she weighed her anchorage,^o
 Cometh Andronicus, bound with laurel boughs,
 To resalute his country with his tears, 75
 Tears of true joy for his return to Rome.
 Thou^o great defender of this Capitol,
 Stand gracious to the rites that we intend!
 Romans, of five and twenty valiant sons,
 Half of the number that King Priam had, 80
 Behold the poor remains, alive and dead!
 These that survive let Rome reward with love;
 These that I bring unto their latest^o home,
 With burial amongst their ancestors.
 Here Goths have given me leave to sheathe my sword. 85
 Titus, unkind^o and careless of thine own,
 Why suffer'st thou thy sons, unburied yet,
 To hover on the dreadful shore of Styx?^o
 Make way to lay them by their brethren.^o

They open the tomb.

There greet in silence, as the dead are wont, 90
 And sleep in peace, slain in your country's wars!
 O sacred receptacle of my joys,
 Sweet cell of virtue and nobility,
 How many sons hast thou of mine in store,
 That thou wilt never render to me more! 95

LUCIUS

Give us the proudest prisoner of the Goths,
 That we may hew his limbs, and on a pile
 Ad manes fratrum^o sacrifice his flesh,
 Before this earthy prison of their bones,
 That so the shadows be not unappeased, 100
 Nor we disturbed with prodigies^o on earth.

TITUS

I give him you, the noblest that survives,
 The eldest son of this distressed queen.

TAMORA

Stay, Roman brethren! Gracious conqueror,
 Victorious Titus, rue the tears I shed, 105
 A mother's tears in passion^o for her son:
 And if thy sons were ever dear to thee, sacrificed; perhaps Shakespeare neglected to cancel them in the manuscript after deciding to make Alarbus' execution part of the action) 41 the . . . right the right of the Capitol and

O, think my son to be as dear to me!
 Sufficeth not that we are brought to Rome,
 To beautify thy triumphs° and return,
 Captive to thee and to thy Roman yoke,
 But must my sons be slaughtered in the streets,
 For valiant doings in their country's cause?
 O, if to fight for king and commonweal
 Were piety in thine, it is in these.
 Andronicus, stain not thy tomb with blood.
 Wilt thou draw near the nature of the gods?
 Draw near them then in being merciful;
 Sweet mercy is nobility's true badge.
 Thrice-noble Titus, spare my first-born son.

TITUS

Patient° yourself, madam, and pardon me.
 These are their brethren, whom your Goths beheld
 Alive and dead, and for their brethren slain
 Religiously they ask a sacrifice.
 To this your son is marked, and die he must,
 T' appease their groaning shadows that are gone.

LUCIUS

Away with him! And make a fire straight,
 And with our swords, upon a pile of wood,
 Let's hew his limbs till they be clean consumed.

Exit Titus' SONS with ALARBUS.

TAMORA

O cruel, irreligious piety!

CHIRON

Was never Scythia° half so barbarous.

DEMETRIUS

Oppose° not Scythia to ambitious Rome.
 Alarbus goes to rest, and we survive
 To tremble under Titus' threat'ning look.
 Then, madam, stand resolved, but hope withal°
 The selfsame gods that armed the Queen of Troy°
 With opportunity of sharp revenge
 Upon the Thracian tyrant in his tent
 May favor Tamora, the Queen of Goths,
 (When Goths were Goths and Tamora was queen)
 To quit° the bloody wrongs upon her foes.

Enter the SONS of Andronicus again.

LUCIUS

See, lord and father, how we have performed
 Our Roman rites! Alarbus' limbs are lopped,
 And entrails feed the sacrificing fire,
 Whose smoke like incense doth perfume the sky.
 Remaineth naught but to inter our brethren,
 And with loud 'larums° welcome them to Rome.

TITUS

Let it be so, and let Andronicus
 Make this his latest farewell to their souls.

Sound trumpets, and lay the coffin in the tomb.

In peace and honor rest you here, my sons,
 Rome's readiest champions, repose you here in rest,

Secure from worldly chances and mishaps!
 Here lurks no treason, here no envy° swells,
 Here grow no damnèd drugs,° here are no storms,
 No noise, but silence and eternal sleep:
 In peace and honor rest you here, my sons!

Enter LAVINIA.

LAVINIA

In peace and honor live Lord Titus long,
 My noble lord and father, live in fame!
 Lo, at this tomb my tributary° tears
 I render for my brethren's obsequies,
 And at thy feet I kneel, with tears of joy
 Shed on this earth for thy return to Rome.
 O, bless me here with thy victorious hand,
 Whose fortunes Rome's best citizens applaud.

TITUS

Kind Rome, that hast thus lovingly reserved
 The cordial° of mine age to glad my heart!
 Lavinia, live, outlive thy father's days
 And fame's eternal date,° for virtue's praise!

[Enter above MARCUS Andronicus, SATURNINUS, BASSIANUS, and others.]

MARCUS

Long live Lord Titus, my belovèd brother,
 Gracious triumpher in the eyes of Rome!

TITUS

Thanks, gentle tribune, noble brother Marcus.

MARCUS

And welcome, nephews, from successful wars,
 You that survive, and you that sleep in fame!
 Fair lords, your fortunes are alike in all,
 That in your country's service drew your swords,
 But safer triumph is this funeral pomp,
 That hath aspired° to Solon's happiness°
 And triumphs over chance in honor's bed.
 Titus Andronicus, the people of Rome,
 Whose friend in justice thou hast ever been,
 Send thee by me, their tribune and their trust,
 This palliament° of white and spotless hue,
 And name thee in election for the empire
 With these our late-deceased emperor's sons:
 Be candidatus° then, and put it on,
 And help to set a head on headless Rome.

TITUS

A better head her glorious body fits
 Than his that shakes for age and feebleness:
 What° should I don this robe and trouble you?
 Be chosen with proclamations today,
 Tomorrow yield up rule, resign my life,
 And set abroad new business for you all?
 Rome, I have been thy soldier forty years,
 And led my country's strength successfully,
 And buried one and twenty valiant sons,
 Knighted in field, slain manfully in arms,
 In right and service of their noble country:

MARCUS

Titus, thou shalt obtain and ask° the empery.

SATURNINUS

Proud and ambitious tribune, canst thou tell?

TITUS

Patience, Prince Saturninus.

SATURNINUS

Romans, do me right.

Patricians, draw your swords and sheathe them not

Till Saturninus be Rome's emperor.

Andronicus, would thou were shipped to hell

Rather than rob me of the people's hearts.

LUCIUS

Proud Saturnine, interrupter of the good

That noble-minded Titus means to thee!

TITUS

Content thee, prince, I will restore to thee

The people's hearts, and wean them from themselves.

BASSIANUS

Andronicus, I do not flatter thee,

But honor thee, and will do till I die.

My faction if thou strengthen with thy friends,

I will most thankful be, and thanks to men

Of noble minds is honorable meed.°

TITUS

People of Rome, and people's tribunes here,

I ask your voices and your suffrages:

Will ye bestow them friendly on Andronicus?

TRIBUNES

To gratify the good Andronicus,

And gratulate° his safe return to Rome,

The people will accept whom he admits.°

TITUS

Tribunes, I thank you, and this suit I make,

That you create our emperor's eldest son,

Lord Saturnine; whose virtues will, I hope,

Reflect on Rome as Titan's° rays on earth,

And ripen justice in this commonweal:

Then, if you will elect by my advice,

Crown him and say, "Long live our emperor!"

MARCUS

With voices and applause of every sort,

Patricians and plebeians, we create

Lord Saturninus Rome's great emperor,

And say, "Long live our Emperor Saturnine!"

[A long flourish till they come down.]

SATURNINUS

Titus Andronicus, for thy favors done

To us in our election° this day,

I give thee thanks in° part of thy deserts,

And will with deeds requite thy gentleness.°

And for an onset,° Titus, to advance

Thy name and honorable family,

Lavinia will I make my empress,°

Rome's royal mistress, mistress of my heart,

And in the sacred Pantheon° her espouse.

Tell me, Andronicus, doth this motion° please thee?

200

TITUS

It doth, my worthy lord, and in this match

I hold me highly honored of your grace,

245

And here in sight of Rome to Saturnine,

King and commander of our commonweal,

The wide world's emperor, do I consecrate

My sword, my chariot, and my prisoners,

Presents well worthy Rome's imperious° lord.

250

Receive them then, the tribute that I owe,

Mine honor's ensigns° humbled at thy feet.

SATURNINUS

Thanks, noble Titus, father of my life!

How proud I am of thee and of thy gifts

Rome shall record, and when I do forget

255

The least of these unspeakable deserts,

Romans, forget your fealty° to me.

210

TITUS [To TAMORA.]

Now, madam, are you prisoner to an emperor,

To him that, for your honor and your state,

Will use you nobly and your followers.

260

SATURNINUS [Aside.]

A goodly lady, trust me, of the hue

That I would choose, were I to choose anew.

215

[Aloud.]

Clear up, fair queen, that cloudy countenance.

Though chance of war hath wrought this change of cheer,°

220

Thou com'st not to be made a scorn in Rome.

265

Princely shall be thy usage every way.

Rest on my word, and let not discontent

Daunt all your hopes. Madam, he° comforts you

Can make you greater than the Queen of Goths.

Lavinia, you are not displeased with this?

270

225

LAVINIA

Not I, my lord, sith° true nobility

Warrants° these words in princely courtesy.

SATURNINUS

Thanks, sweet Lavinia. Romans, let us go.

Ransomless here we set our prisoners free.

230

Proclaim our honors, lords, with trump and drum.

275

BASSIANUS

Lord Titus, by your leave, this maid is mine.

TITUS

How, sir! Are you in earnest then, my lord?

BASSIANUS

Ay, noble Titus, and resolved withal

To do myself this reason and this right.

235

MARCUS

Suum cuique° is our Roman justice.

Traitors, avaunt!° Where is the emperor's guard?
Treason, my lord! Lavinia is surprised!°

SATURNINUS

Surprised! By whom?

BASSIANUS

By him that justly may 285
Bear his betrothed from all the world away.

MUTIUS

And with my sword I'll keep this door° safe.

TITUS

Follow, my lord, and I'll soon bring her back.
[During the fray, exeunt SATURNINUS, TAMORA,
DEMETRIUS, CHIRON, and AARON.]

MUTIUS

My lord, you pass not here. 290

TITUS

What, villain boy! Barr'st me my way in Rome?
[He stabs MUTIUS.]

MUTIUS [Dying.]

Help, Lucius, help!

[Enter LUCIUS.]

LUCIUS

My lord, you are unjust; and more than so,
In wrongful quarrel you have slain your son.

TITUS

Nor thou, nor he, are any sons of mine: 295
My sons would never so dishonor me.
Traitor, restore Lavinia to the emperor.

LUCIUS

Dead if you will, but not to be his wife
That is another's lawful promised love. [Exit.]

Enter aloft the emperor [SATURNINUS] with TAMORA and her two SONS and AARON the Moor.

SATURNINUS

No, Titus, no; the emperor needs her not, 300
Nor her, nor thee, nor any of thy stock:
I'll trust by leisure° him that mocks me once;
Thee never, nor thy traitorous haughty sons,
Confederates all thus to dishonor me.
Was none in Rome to make a stale°
But Saturnine? Full well, Andronicus, 305
Agree these deeds with that proud brag of thine,
That saidst I begged the empire at thy hands.

TITUS

O monstrous! What reproachful words are these?

SATURNINUS

But go thy ways, go, give that changing piece° 310
To him that flourished for her with his sword:
A valiant son-in-law thou shalt enjoy,
One fit to bandy° with thy lawless sons,
To ruffle° in the commonwealth of Rome.

TITUS

These words are razors to my wounded heart. 315

SATURNINUS

And therefore, lovely Tamora, Queen of Goths,
That like the stately Phoebe° 'mongst her nymphs
Dost overshadow the gallant'st dames of Rome,
If thou be pleased with this my sudden choice,
Behold, I choose thee, Tamora, for my bride, 320
And will create thee Empress of Rome.
Speak, Queen of Goths, dost thou applaud my choice?

And here I swear by all the Roman gods,
Sith priest and holy water are so near,
And tapers burn so bright, and everything 325
In readiness for Hymenaeus° stand,
I will not resalute the streets of Rome,
Or climb my palace, till from forth this place
I lead espoused my bride along with me.

TAMORA

And here in sight of heaven to Rome I swear, 330
If Saturnine advance the Queen of Goths,
She will a handmaid be to his desires,
A loving nurse, a mother to his youth.

SATURNINUS

Ascend, fair queen, Pantheon. Lords, accompany 335
Your noble emperor and his lovely bride,
Sent by the heavens for Prince Saturnine,
Whose wisdom hath her fortune conquerèd.
There shall we consummate our spousal rites.

Exeunt omnes° [except TITUS].

TITUS

I am not bid° to wait upon this bride.
Titus, when wert thou wont to walk alone, 340
Dishonored thus and challengèd° of wrongs?

Enter MARCUS and Titus' sons [LUCIUS, QUINTUS, and MARTIUS].

MARCUS

O Titus, see, O, see, what thou hast done!
In a bad quarrel slain a virtuous son.

TITUS

No, foolish tribune, no; no son of mine, 345
Nor thou, nor these, confederates in the deed
That hath dishonored all our family,
Unworthy brother, and unworthy sons!

LUCIUS

But let us give him burial as becomes;°
Give Mutius burial with our brethren. 305

TITUS

Traitors, away! He rests not in this tomb: 350
This monument five hundred years hath stood,
Which I have sumptuously re-edified:°
Here none but soldiers and Rome's servitors
Repose in fame; none basely slain in brawls.
Bury him where you can, he comes not here. 355

MARCUS

My lord, this is impiety in you.
My nephew Mutius' deeds do plead for him;
He must be buried with his brethren.

And shall, or him we will accompany.

TITUS

And shall? What villain was it spake that word? 360

Titus' SON speaks.

[QUINTUS]

He that would vouch it in any place but here.

TITUS

What, would you bury him in my despite?°

MARCUS

No, noble Titus, but entreat of thee

To pardon Mutius and to bury him.

TITUS

Marcus, even thou hast stroke upon my crest, 365

And with these boys mine honor thou hast wounded.

My foes I do repute° you every one,

So trouble me no more, but get you gone.

MARTIUS

He is not with himself; let us withdraw.

QUINTUS

Not I, till Mutius' bones be buried.

The brother [MARCUS] and the SONS kneel.

MARCUS

Brother, for in that name doth nature plead—

QUINTUS

Father, and in that name doth nature speak—

TITUS

Speak thou no more, if all the rest will speed.°

MARCUS

Renownèd Titus, more than half my soul—

LUCIUS

Dear father, soul and substance of us all—

MARCUS

Suffer° thy brother Marcus to inter

His noble nephew here in virtue's nest,

That died in honor and Lavinia's cause.

Thou art a Roman, be not barbarous:

The Greeks upon advice° did bury Ajax°

That slew himself; and wise Laertes' son°

Did graciously plead for his funerals:

Let not young Mutius then, that was thy joy,

Be barred his entrance here.

Rise, Marcus, rise.

The dismal'st day is this that e'er I saw,

To be dishonored by my sons in Rome!

Well, bury him, and bury me the next.

They put him in the tomb.

LUCIUS

There lie thy bones, sweet Mutius, with thy friends,

Till we with trophies do adorn thy tomb.

They all kneel and say:

[ALL]

No man shed tears for noble Mutius,

He lives in fame that died in virtue's cause.

MARCUS

My lord, to step out of these dreary dumps,°

How comes it that the subtle Queen of Goths

Is of a sudden thus advanced in Rome?

TITUS

I know not, Marcus, but I know it is

Is she not then beholding° to the man

That brought her for this high good turn so far?

Yes, and will nobly him remunerate.

Enter the emperor [SATURNINUS], TAMORA, and her two SONS, with [AARON] the Moor, at one door. Enter at the other door BASSIANUS and LAVINIA, with others.

SATURNINUS

So Bassianus, you have played your prize:°

God give you joy, sir, of your gallant bride!

BASSIANUS

And you of yours, my lord! I say no more,

Nor wish no less, and so I take my leave.

SATURNINUS

Traitor, if Rome have law, or we have power,

Thou and thy faction shall repent this rape.

BASSIANUS

Rape, call you it, my lord, to seize my own,

My true-betrothèd love, and now my wife?

But let the laws of Rome determine all;

Meanwhile am I possessed of that is mine.

SATURNINUS

'Tis good, sir; you are very short with us,

But if we live we'll be as sharp with you.

BASSIANUS

My lord, what I have done, as best I may

Answer I must, and shall do with my life.

Only thus much I give your grace to know—

By all the duties that I owe to Rome,

This noble gentleman, Lord Titus here,

Is in opinion° and in honor wronged,

That, in the rescue of Lavinia,

With his own hand did slay his youngest son,

In zeal to you, and highly moved to wrath

To be controlled° in that he frankly° gave.

Receive him then to favor, Saturnine,

That hath expressed himself in all his deeds

A father and a friend to thee and Rome.

TITUS

Prince Bassianus, leave to plead° my deeds;

'Tis thou and those that have dishonored me.

Rome and the righteous heavens be my judge,

How I have loved and honored Saturnine!

TAMORA

My worthy lord, if ever Tamora

Were gracious in those princely eyes of thine,

Then hear me speak indifferently° for all;

And at my suit, sweet, pardon what is past.

What, madam! Be dishonored openly,
And basely put it up° without revenge?

TAMORA

Not so, my lord, the gods of Rome forbend°
I should be author° to dishonor you!
But on mine honor dare I undertake°
For good Lord Titus' innocence in all,
Whose fury not dissembled speaks his griefs:
Then at my suit look graciously on him;
Lose not so noble a friend on vain suppose,°
Nor with sour looks afflict his gentle heart.

[Aside.]

My lord, be ruled by me, be won at last,
Dissemble all your griefs and discontents—
You are but newly planted in your throne—
Lest then the people, and patricians too,
Upon a just survey, take Titus' part,
And so supplant you for ingratitude,
Which Rome reputes to be a heinous sin.
Yield at entreats:° and then let me alone.°
I'll find a day to massacre them all,
And race° their faction and their family,
The cruel father and his traitorous sons,
To whom I suèd for my dear son's life;
And make them know what 'tis to let a queen
Kneel in the streets and beg for grace in vain.

[Aloud.]

Come, come, sweet emperor—come, Andronicus—
Take up this good old man, and cheer the heart
That dies in tempest of thy angry frown.

SATURNINUS

Rise, Titus, rise, my empress hath prevailed.

TITUS

I thank your majesty, and her, my lord.
These words, these looks, infuse new life in me.

TAMORA

Titus, I am incorporate in Rome,
A Roman now adopted happily,
And must advise the emperor for his good.
This day all quarrels die, Andronicus.
And let it be mine honor, good my lord,
That I have reconciled your friends and you.
For you, Prince Bassianus, I have passed
My word and promise to the emperor
That you will be more mild and tractable.
And fear not, lords, and you, Lavinia;
By my advice, all humbled on your knees,
You shall ask pardon of his majesty.

[LUCIUS]

We do, and vow to heaven, and to his highness,
That what we did was mildly as we might,° Tend'ring° our sister's honor and our own.

TAMORA

Nay, nay, sweet emperor, we must all be friends. 480
The tribune and his nephews kneel for grace.
I will not be denied. Sweet heart, look back.

SATURNINUS

Marcus, for thy sake, and thy brother's here,
And at my lovely Tamora's entreats,
I do remit these young men's heinous faults. 485
Stand up.
Lavinia, though you left me like a churl,
I found a friend, and sure as death I swore
I would not part° a bachelor from the priest.
Come, if the emperor's court can feast two brides, 490
You are my guest, Lavinia, and your friends.
This day shall be a love-day,° Tamora.

TITUS

Tomorrow, and° it please your majesty
To hunt the panther and the hart with me,
With horn and hound we'll give your grace bonjour.° 495

SATURNINUS

Be it so, Titus, and gramercy° too.
Exeunt. Sound trumpets. Manet° [AARON the] Moor.

AARON

Now climbeth Tamora Olympus'° top,
Safe out of fortune's shot, and sits aloft,
Secure of° thunder's crack or lightning flash,
Advanced above pale envy's° threat'ning reach.
As when the golden sun salutes the morn, 5
And having gilt the ocean with his beams,
Gallops° the zodiac in his glistening coach,
And overlooks° the highest-peering hills;
So Tamora:
Upon her wit doth earthly honor wait, 10
And virtue stoops and trembles at her frown.
Then, Aaron, arm thy heart, and fit thy thoughts
To mount aloft with thy imperial mistress,
And mount her pitch,° whom thou in triumph long
Hast prisoner held, fettered in amorous chains, 15
And faster bound to Aaron's charming° eyes
Than is Prometheus° tied to Caucasus.

To wait upon this new-made empress.
To wait, said I? To wanton with this queen,
This goddess, this Semiramis,^o this nymph,
This siren, that will charm Rome's Saturnine
And see his shipwrack and his commonweal's.
Hollo! What storm is this?

Enter CHIRON and DEMETRIUS, braving.^o

DEMETRIUS

Chiron, thy years wants^o wit, thy wits wants edge,
And manners, to intrude where I am graced,^o
And may for aught thou knowest affected^o be.

CHIRON

Demetrius, thou dost overween^o in all,
And so in this, to bear down me with braves.^o
'Tis not the difference of a year or two
Makes me less gracious,^o or thee more fortunate;
I am as able and as fit as thou
To serve, and to deserve my mistress' grace;
And that my sword upon thee shall approve,^o
And plead my passions for Lavinia's love.

AARON

Clubs, clubs!^o These lovers will not keep the peace.

DEMETRIUS

Why, boy, although our mother, unadvised,^o
Gave you a dancing-rapier^o by your side,
Are you so desperate grown, to threat your friends?
Go to; have your lath^o glued within your sheath,
Till you know better how to handle it.

CHIRON

Meanwhile, sir, with the little skill I have,
Full well shalt thou perceive how much I dare.

They draw.

DEMETRIUS

Ay, boy, grow ye so brave?

AARON

Why, how now, lords!
So near the emperor's palace dare ye draw,
And maintain such a quarrel openly?
Full well I wot^o the ground of all this grudge.
I would not for a million of gold
The cause were known to them it most concerns,
Nor would your noble mother for much more
Be so dishonored in the court of Rome.
For shame, put up.^o

DEMETRIUS

Not I, till I have sheathed
My rapier in his bosom, and withal
Thrust those reproachful speeches down his throat,
That he hath breathed in my dishonor here.

CHIRON

For that I am prepared and full resolved,
Foul-spoken coward, that thund'rest with thy tongue
And with thy weapon nothing dar'st perform.

AARON

Away, I say!
Now, by the gods that warlike Goths adore,
This petty brabble^o will undo us all.
Why, lords, and think you not how dangerous
It is to jet^o upon a prince's right?
What, is Lavinia then become so loose,
Or Bassianus so degenerate,
That for her love such quarrels may be broached
Without controlment, justice, or revenge?
Young lords, beware! And should the empress know
This discord's ground,^o the music would not please.

CHIRON

I care not, I, knew she and all the world:
I love Lavinia more than all the world.

DEMETRIUS

Youngling, learn thou to make some meaner^o choice.
Lavinia is thine elder brother's hope.

AARON

Why, are ye mad? Or know ye not, in Rome
How furious and impatient they be,
And cannot brook competitors in love?
I tell you, lords, you do but plot your deaths
By this device.

CHIRON Aaron, a thousand deaths

Would I propose^o to achieve her whom I love.

AARON

To achieve her how?

DEMETRIUS

Why makes thou it so strange?^o

She is a woman, therefore may be wooed;

She is a woman, therefore may be won;

She is Lavinia, therefore must be loved.

What, man! More water glideth by the mill

Than wots the miller of, and easy it is

Of a cut loaf to steal a shive,^o we know:

Though Bassianus be the emperor's brother,

Better than he have worn Vulcan's badge.^o

AARON [Aside.]

Ay, and as good as Saturninus may.

DEMETRIUS

Then why should he despair that knows to court it

With words, fair looks, and liberality?

What, hast not thou full often stroke a doe,

And borne her cleanly by the keeper's nose?

AARON

Why then, it seems, some certain snatch^o or so

Would serve your turns.

CHIRON

Ay, so the turn were served.

DEMETRIUS

Aaron, thou hast hit it.

AARON

Would you had hit it too,

Then should not we be tired with this ado.

Why, hark ye, hark ye! And are you such fools

To square^o for this? Would it offend you then

That both should speed?^o

 A speedier course than ling'ring languishment
 Must we pursue, and I have found the path.
 My lords, a solemn^o hunting is in hand.
 There will the lovely Roman ladies troop:
 The forest walks are wide and spacious,
 And many unfrequented plots^o there are Fitted by kind^o for rape and villainy.
 Single^o you thither then this dainty doe,
 And strike her home by force, if not by words:
 This way, or not at all, stand you in hope.
 Come, come, our empress, with her sacred wit
 To villainy and vengeance consecrate,
 Will we acquaint withal what we intend,
 And she shall file our engines^o with advice,
 That will not suffer you to square yourselves,
 But to your wishes' height advance you both.
 The emperor's court is like the House of Fame,^o
 The palace full of tongues, of eyes, and ears:
 The woods are ruthless,^o dreadful, deaf, and dull;
 There speak, and strike, brave boys, and take your turns,
 There serve your lust shadowed from heaven's eye,
 And revel in Lavinia's treasury.

CHIRON
 Thy counsel, lad, smells of no cowardice.

DEMETRIUS
 Sit fas aut nefas,^o till I find the stream
 To cool this heat, a charm to calm these fits,
 Per Stygia, per manes vehor.^o Exeunt. 135

[Scene II. A forest near Rome.]

Enter TITUS Andronicus and his three SONS [and MARCUS], making a noise with hounds and horns.

TITUS
 The hunt is up, the morn is bright and gray,^o
 The fields are fragrant, and the woods are green:
 Uncouple^o here, and let us make a bay,^o
 And wake the emperor and his lovely bride,

II.ii.1 gray sky blue (?) 3 Uncouple unleash the hounds; make a bay keep up the cry of the hounds

And rouse the prince, and ring a hunter's peal, 5
 That all the court may echo with the noise.
 Sons, let it be your charge, as it is ours,
 To attend the emperor's person carefully:
 I have been troubled in my sleep this night,
 But dawning day new comfort hath inspired. 10

105 Here a cry^o of hounds, and wind horns in a peal: then enter SATURNINUS, TAMORA, BASSIANUS, LAVINIA, CHIRON, DEMETRIUS, and their ATTENDANTS.

Many good morrows to your majesty!
 Madam, to you as many and as good!
 I promised your grace a hunter's peal.

SATURNINUS
 And you have rung it lustily, my lords,
 Somewhat too early for new-married ladies. 15

115 BASSIANUS
 Lavinia, how say you?

LAVINIA I say, no;
 I have been broad awake two hours and more.

SATURNINUS
 Come on then, horse and chariots let us have,
 And to our sport. [To TAMORA.] Madam, now shall ye see
 Our Roman hunting.

MARCUS I have dogs, my lord, 20
 Will rouse the proudest panther in the chase,
 And climb the highest promontory top.

TITUS
 And I have horse will follow where the game
 Makes way and runs like swallows o'er the plain.

DEMETRIUS
 Chiron, we hunt not, we, with horse nor hound, 25
 But hope to pluck a dainty doe to ground. Exeunt.

[Scene III. The forest.]

Enter AARON alone [with a bag of gold].

AARON
 He that had wit would think that I had none,
 To bury so much gold under a tree
 And never after to inherit^o it.
 Let him that thinks of me so abjectly^o
 Know that this gold must coin a stratagem, 5
 Which, cunningly effected, will beget
 A very excellent piece of villainy.
 And so repose, sweet gold, for their unrest,
 That have their alms out of the empress' chest.
 [Hides the gold.]

Enter TAMORA alone to the Moor.

TAMORA
 My lovely Aaron, wherefore look'st thou sad 10
 When every thing doth make a gleeful boast?^o
 The birds chaunt melody on every bush,
 The snakes lies rollèd in the cheerful sun,
 The green leaves quiver with the cooling wind,
 And make a checkered shadow on the ground: 15

10 s.d. cry deep barking

II.iii.3 inherit possess 4 abjectly contemptuously 11 boast display

Under their sweet shade, Aaron, let us sit,
 And whilst the babbling echo mocks the hounds,
 Replying shrilly to the well-tuned horns
 As if a double hunt were heard at once,
 Let us sit down and mark their yellowing° noise: 20
 And after conflict such as was supposed
 The wandering prince and Dido° once enjoyed,
 When with a happy storm they were surprised
 And curtained with a counsel-keeping cave,
 We may, each wreathèd in the other's arms, 25
 (Our pastimes done) possess a golden slumber,
 Whiles hounds and horns and sweet melodious birds
 Be unto us as is a nurse's song
 Of lullaby to bring her babe asleep.

AARON

Madam, though Venus govern your desires, 30
 Saturn is dominator° over mine:
 What signifies my deadly standing° eye,
 My silence and my cloudy melancholy,
 My fleece of woolly hair that now uncurls
 Even as an adder when she doth unroll 35
 To do some fatal execution?
 No, madam, these are no venereal° signs:
 Vengeance is in my heart, death in my hand,
 Blood and revenge are hammering in my head.
 Hark, Tamora, the empress of my soul, 40
 Which never hopes more heaven than rests in thee,
 This is the day of doom for Bassianus:
 His Philomel° must lose her tongue today,
 Thy sons make pillage of her chastity,
 And wash their hands in Bassianus' blood. 45
 See'st thou this letter? Take it up, I pray thee,
 And give the king this fatal-plotted scroll.
 Now question me no more; we are espied.
 Here comes a parcel of our hopeful booty,°
 Which dreads not yet their lives' destruction.

Enter BASSIANUS and LAVINIA.

TAMORA

Ah, my sweet Moor, sweeter to me than life!

AARON

No more, great empress, Bassianus comes.
 Be cross with him, and I'll go fetch thy sons
 To back thy quarrels whatsoe'er they be. [Exit.]

BASSIANUS

Who have we here? Rome's royal empress, 55
 Unfurnished of° her well-beseeming troop?
 Or is it Dian, habited° like her.
 Who hath abandonèd her holy groves
 To see the general hunting in this forest?

TAMORA

Saucy controller° of my private steps! 60
 Had I the power that some say Dian had,

20 yellowing loudly calling 22 The . . . Thy temples should be planted presently°
 With horns, as was Actaeon's,° and the hounds
 Should drive upon thy new-transformèd limbs,
 Unmannerly intruder as thou art! 65

LAVINIA

Under your patience, gentle empress,
 'Tis thought you have a goodly gift in horning,°
 And to be doubted° that your Moor and you
 Are singled forth to try experiments:
 Jove shield your husband from his hounds today! 70
 'Tis pity they should take him for a stag.

BASSIANUS

Believe me, queen, your swart Cimmerian°
 Doth make your honor of his body's hue,
 Spotted,° detested, and abominable.
 Why are you sequest'èd from all your train, 75
 Dismounted from your snow-white goodly steed,
 And wand'red hither to an obscure plot,
 Accompanied but with a barbarous Moor,
 If foul desire had not conducted you?

LAVINIA

And, being intercepted in your sport, 80
 Great reason that my noble lord be rated°
 For sauciness. I pray you, let us hence,
 And let her joy° her raven-colored love;
 This valley fits the purpose passing well.

BASSIANUS

The king my brother shall have notice° of this. 85

LAVINIA

Ay, for these slips have made him noted° long.
 Good king, to be so mightily abused!

TAMORA

Why, I have patience to endure all this.

Enter CHIRON and DEMETRIUS.

DEMETRIUS

How now, dear sovereign, and our gracious mother,
 Why doth your highness look so pale and wan? 90

TAMORA

Have I not reason, think you, to look pale?
 These two have ticed° me hither to this place,
 A barren detested vale, you see it is;
 The trees, though summer, yet forlorn and lean,
 Overcome with moss and baleful mistletoe: 95
 Here never shines the sun; here nothing breeds,
 Unless the nightly owl or fatal raven:
 And when they showed me this abhorrèd pit,
 They told me, here, at dead time of the night
 A thousand fiends, a thousand hissing snakes, 100
 Ten thousand swelling toads, as many urchins,°
 Would make such fearful and confusèd cries,
 As any mortal body hearing it
 Should straight fall mad, or else die suddenly.
 No sooner had they told this hellish tale, 105
 But straight they told me they would bind me here
 Unto the body of a dismal yew,

62 presently immediately 63 Actaeon legendary hunter who spied on Diana bathing; she transformed him into a stag and his own hounds killed him 67 horning an unfaithful wife was said to give her husband horns 68 doubted suspected 72 Cimmerian dweller in darkness 74 Spotted infected 81 rated berated, rebuked 83 joy enjoy 85 notice monosyllabic; pronounced "notes" 86 noted notorious 92 ticed enticed 101 urchins hedgehogs

And leave me to this miserable death.
 And then they called me foul adulteress,
 Lascivious Goth,^o and all the bitterest terms
 That ever ear did hear to such effect.
 And, had you not by wondrous fortune come,
 This vengeance on me had they executed:
 Revenge it, as you love your mother's life,
 Or be ye not henceforth called my children.

DEMETRIUS

This is a witness that I am thy son.

Stab[s] him.

CHIRON

And this for me, struck home to show my strength.

[Stabs BASSIANUS.]

LAVINIA

Ay come, Semiramis, nay, barbarous Tamora!
 For no name fits thy nature but thy own!

TAMORA

Give me the poniard! You shall know, my boys,
 Your mother's hand shall right your mother's wrong.

DEMETRIUS

Stay, madam; here is more belongs to her.
 First thrash the corn, then after burn the straw.
 This minion stood upon^o her chastity,
 Upon her nuptial vow, her loyalty,
 And with that painted^o hope braves your mightiness:
 And shall she carry this unto her grave?

CHIRON

And if she do, I would I were an eunuch.
 Drag hence her husband to some secret hole,
 And make his dead trunk pillow to our lust.

TAMORA

But when ye have the honey we desire,
 Let not this wasp outlive us both to sting.

CHIRON

I warrant you, madam, we will make that sure.
 Come, mistress, now perforce we will enjoy
 That nice-preservèd honesty^o of yours.

LAVINIA

O Tamora! Thou bearest a woman's face—

TAMORA

I will not hear her speak; away with her.

LAVINIA

Sweet lords, entreat her hear me but a word.

DEMETRIUS

Listen, fair madam, let it be your glory
 To see her tears, but be your heart to them
 As unrelenting flint to drops of rain.

LAVINIA

When did the tiger's young ones teach the dam?^o
 O, do not learn^o her wrath; she taught it thee.
 The milk thou suck'st from her did turn to marble;
 Even at thy teat thou hadst thy tyranny.
 Yet every mother breeds not sons alike,

[To CHIRON.]

Do thou entreat her show a woman's pity.

CHIRON

What! Wouldst thou have me prove myself a bastard?

110 LAVINIA

'Tis true; the raven doth not hatch a lark:
 Yet have I heard—O could I find it now!—
 The lion, moved with pity, did endure
 To have his princely paws pared all away.

115

Some say that ravens foster forlorn children,
 The whilst their own birds famish in their nests:
 O, be to me, though thy hard heart say no,
 Nothing so kind but something pitiful!^o

150

155

TAMORA

I know not what it means; away with her!

LAVINIA

O, let me teach thee for my father's sake,
 That gave thee life when well he might have slain thee.
 Be not obdurate, open thy deaf ears.

160

TAMORA

Hadst thou in person ne'er offended me,
 Even for his sake am I pitiless.
 Remember, boys, I poured forth tears in vain
 To save your brother from the sacrifice,
 But fierce Andronicus would not relent.
 Therefore away with her, and use her as you will;
 The worse to her, the better loved of me.

165

125

O Tamora, be called a gentle queen,
 And with thine own hands kill me in this place!
 For 'tis not life that I have begged so long;
 Poor I was slain when Bassianus died.

170

TAMORA

130

What begg'st thou then? Fond^o woman, let me go.

LAVINIA

'Tis present death I beg, and one thing more
 That womanhood denies^o my tongue to tell.
 O, keep me from their worse than killing lust,
 And tumble me into some loathsome pit,
 Where never man's eye may behold my body.
 Do this, and be a charitable murderer.

175

135

TAMORA

So should I rob my sweet sons of their fee.
 No, let them satisfice their lust on thee.

180

DEMETRIUS

Away! For thou hast stayed us here too long.

LAVINIA

No grace? No womanhood? Ah beastly creature!
 The blot and enemy to our general name!^o
 Confusion^o fall—

140

CHIRON

Nay, then I'll stop your mouth. Bring thou her husband.

185

This is the hole where Aaron bid us hide him.

*[DEMETRIUS throws the corpse into a pit and then covers
 it with branches. Exeunt DEMETRIUS and CHIRON, dragging LAVINIA.]*

145

TAMORA

Farewell, my sons, see that you make her sure.
 Ne'er let my heart know merry cheer indeed
 Till all the Andronici be made away.^o

Now will I hence to seek my lovely Moor,
And let my spleenful^o sons this trull^o deflower. [Exit.]

Enter AARON with two of Titus' sons [QUINTUS and MARTIUS].

[AARON]

Come on, my lords, the better foot before!
Straight will I bring you to the loathsome pit
Where I espied the panther fast asleep.

QUINTUS

My sight is very dull, whate'er it bodes.

MARTIUS

And mine, I promise you. Were it not for shame,
Well could I leave our sport to sleep awhile.

[He falls into the pit.]

QUINTUS

What, art thou fallen? What subtle hole is this,
Whose mouth is covered with rude-growing briars,
Upon whose leaves are drops of new-shed blood
As fresh as morning dew distilled on flowers?
A very fatal place it seems to me.
Speak, brother, hast thou hurt thee with the fall?

MARTIUS

O, brother, with the dismal'st object hurt
That ever eye with sight made heart lament.

AARON [Aside.]

Now will I fetch the king to find them here,
That he thereby may have a likely guess
How these were they that made away his brother.

Exit.

MARTIUS

Why dost not comfort me and help me out
From this unhallowed and bloodstainèd hole?

QUINTUS

I am surprisèd^o with an uncouth^o fear,
A chilling sweat o'erruns my trembling joints;
My heart suspects more than mine eye can see.

MARTIUS

To prove thou hast a true-divining heart,
Aaron and thou look down into this den
And see a fearful sight of blood and death.

QUINTUS

Aaron is gone, and my compassionate heart
Will not permit mine eyes once to behold
The thing whereat it trembles by surmise.
O, tell me who it is, for ne'er till now
Was I a child to fear I know not what.

MARTIUS

Lord Bassianus lies berayed^o in blood,
All on a heap, like to a slaughtered lamb,
In this detested, dark, blood-drinking pit.

QUINTUS

If it be dark, how dost thou know 'tis he?

MARTIUS

Upon his bloody finger he doth wear
A precious ring that lightens all this hole,
Which, like a taper in some monument,
Doth shine upon the dead man's earthy cheeks,
And shows the ragged entrails^o of this pit:

190

So pale did shine the moon on Pyramus,
When he by night lay bathed in maiden blood.
O brother, help me with thy fainting hand—
If fear hath made thee faint, as me it hath—
Out of this fell^o devouring receptacle,
As hateful as Cocytus'^o misty mouth.

235

QUINTUS

Reach me thy hand, that I may help thee out;
Or, wanting^o strength to do thee so much good,
I may be plucked into the swallowing womb
Of this deep pit, poor Bassianus' grave.
I have no strength to pluck thee to the brink.

195

240

MARTIUS

Nor I no strength to climb without thy help.

QUINTUS

Thy hand once more; I will not loose again
Till thou art here aloft or I below:
Thou canst not come to me; I come to thee.

245

[Falls in.]

Enter the emperor [SATURNINUS] and AARON the Moor.

200

SATURNINUS

Along with me! I'll see what hole is here,
And what he is that now is leaped into it.
Say, who art thou, that lately didst descend
Into this gaping hollow of the earth?

205

MARTIUS

The unhappy sons of old Andronicus,
Brought hither in a most unlucky hour,
To find thy brother Bassianus dead.

250

SATURNINUS

My brother dead! I know thou dost but jest:
He and his lady both are at the lodge,
Upon the north side of this pleasant chase;
'Tis not an hour since I left them there.

210

255

MARTIUS

We know not where you left them all alive,
But, out alas! Here have we found him dead.

215

Enter TAMORA, [TITUS] Andronicus, and LUCIUS.

TAMORA

Where is my lord the king?

SATURNINUS

Here, Tamora, though grieved with killing grief.

260

TAMORA

Where is thy brother, Bassianus?

220

SATURNINUS

Now to the bottom dost thou search^o my wound;
Poor Bassianus here lies murderèd.

TAMORA

Then all too late I bring this fatal writ,
The complot^o of this timeless^o tragedy;
And wonder greatly that man's face can fold^o
In pleasing smiles such murderous tyranny.

265

She giveth Saturnine a letter.

SATURNINUS [Reads the letter.]

"And if^o we miss to meet him handsomely^o—

Sweet huntsman, Bassianus 'tis we mean—
Do thou so much as dig the grave for him.
Thou know'st our meaning. Look for thy reward
Among the nettles at the elder tree
Which overshades the mouth of that same pit
Where we decreed to bury Bassianus.
Do this and purchase us thy lasting friends."
O, Tamora! Was ever heard the like?
This is the pit, and this the elder tree.
Look, sirs, if you can find the huntsman out
That should° have murdered Bassianus here.

AARON

My gracious lord, here is the bag of gold.

SATURNINUS [To TITUS.]

Two of thy whelps, fell° curs of bloody kind,
Have here bereft my brother of his life.
Sirs, drag them from the pit unto the prison,
There let them bide until we have devised
Some never-heard-of torturing pain for them.

TAMORA

What, are they in this pit? O wondrous thing!
How easily murder is discoverèd!

TITUS

High emperor, upon my feeble knee
I beg this boon, with tears not lightly shed,
That this fell fault of my accursèd sons,
Accursèd, if the faults be proved in them—

SATURNINUS

If it be proved! You see, it is apparent.
Who found this letter? Tamora, was it you?

TAMORA

Andronicus himself did take it up.

TITUS

I did, my lord, yet let me be their bail,
For by my father's reverend tomb I vow
They shall be ready at your highness' will
To answer their suspicion° with their lives.

SATURNINUS

Thou shalt not bail them; see thou follow me.
Some bring the murdered body, some the murderers. 300
Let them not speak a word; the guilt is plain,
For by my soul were there worse end than death,
That end upon them should be executed.

TAMORA

Andronicus, I will éntreat the king.
Fear not° thy sons; they shall do well enough. 305

TITUS

Come, Lucius, come, stay not to talk with them.

[Exeunt.]

[Scene IV. The forest.]

Enter the empress' SONS with LAVINIA, her hands cut off, and her tongue cut out, and ravished.

DEMETRIUS

So, now go tell, and if° thy tongue can speak,
Who 'twas that cut thy tongue and ravished thee.

CHIRON

270 Write down thy mind, bewray° thy meaning so,
And if thy stumps will let thee play the scribe.

DEMETRIUS

See how with signs and tokens she can scrawl.° 5

CHIRON

275 Go home, call for sweet° water, wash thy hands.

DEMETRIUS

She hath no tongue to call nor hands to wash,
And so let's leave her to her silent walks.

CHIRON

And 'twere my cause,° I should go hang myself.

280 DEMETRIUS

If thou hadst hands to help thee knit the cord. 10

Exeunt [CHIRON and DEMETRIUS].

Enter MARCUS from hunting.

MARCUS

285 Who is this? My niece, that flies away so fast!
Cousin,° a word, where is your husband?
If I do dream, would all my wealth would wake me!
If I do wake, some planet strike me down,
That I may slumber an eternal sleep! 15

Speak, gentle niece, what stern ungentle hands
Hath lopped and hewed and made thy body bare
Of her two branches, those sweet ornaments,
Whose circling shadows kings have sought to sleep in,
And might not gain so great a happiness 20
As half thy love? Why dost not speak to me?

Alas, a crimson river of warm blood,
Like to a bubbling fountain stirred with wind,
Doth rise and fall between thy rosèd lips,
Coming and going with thy honey breath. 25

290 But, sure, some Tereus° hath deflowered thee,
And, lest thou shouldst detect° him, cut thy tongue.
Ah, now thou turn'st away thy face for shame!

And, notwithstanding all this loss of blood,
As from a conduit with three issuing spouts, 30
Yet do thy cheeks look red as Titan's° face
Blushing to be encount'ed with a cloud.
Shall I speak for thee? Shall I say 'tis so?

O, that I knew thy heart, and knew the beast,
That I might rail at him to ease my mind! 35

Sorrow concealèd, like an oven stopped,
Doth burn the heart to cinders where it is.
Fair Philomela, why she but lost her tongue,
And in a tedious sampler° sewed her mind: 40

But lovely niece, that mean is cut from thee;
A craftier Tereus, cousin, hast thou met,
And he hath cut those pretty fingers off,
That could have better sewed than Philomel.

O, had the monster seen those lily hands
Tremble like aspen leaves upon a lute, 45

And make the silken strings delight to kiss them,
He would not then have touched them for his life!

Or, had he heard the heavenly harmony
Which that sweet tongue hath made,

 Come, let us go and make thy father blind,
 For such a sight will blind a father's eye.
 One hour's storm will drown the fragrant meads;
 What will whole months of tears thy father's eyes? 55
 Do not draw back, for we will mourn with thee:
 O, could our mourning ease thy misery! Exeunt.

[A C T I I I]

[Scene I. Rome. A street.]

Enter the JUDGES and SENATORS with Titus' two SONS bound, passing on the stage to the place of execution, and TITUS going before, pleading.

TITUS
 Hear me, grave fathers! Noble tribunes, stay!
 For pity of mine age, whose youth was spent
 In dangerous wars, whilst you securely slept;
 For all my blood in Rome's great quarrel shed,
 For all the frosty nights that I have watched, 5
 And for these bitter tears, which now you see
 Filling the agèd wrinkles in my cheeks,
 Be pitiful to my condemnèd sons,
 Whose souls is not corrupted as 'tis thought.
 For two and twenty sons I never wept, 10
 Because they died in honor's lofty bed;

[TITUS] Andronicus lieth down° and the JUDGES pass by him.

For these, tribunes, in the dust I write
 My heart's deep languor° and my soul's sad tears:
 Let my tears staunch° the earth's dry appetite;
 My sons' sweet blood will make it shame and blush. 15
 O earth, I will befriend thee more with rain,
 That shall distill from these two ancient ruins,
 Than youthful April shall with all his show'rs:
 In summer's drought I'll drop upon thee still,°
 In winter with warm tears I'll melt the snow, 20
 And keep eternal springtime on thy face,
 So° thou refuse to drink my dear sons' blood.

Enter LUCIUS, with his weapon drawn.

O reverend tribunes! O gentle agèd men!
 Unbind my sons, reverse the doom° of death,
 And let me say, that never wept before, 25
 My tears are now prevailing orators.

LUCIUS
 O noble father, you lament in vain,
 The tribunes hear you not, no man is by,
 And you recount your sorrows to a stone.

TITUS
 Ah, Lucius, for thy brothers let me plead. 30
 Grave tribunes, once more I entreat of you.

51 Cerberus three-headed dog who guarded the entrance to Hades; he was lulled by Orpheus, "the Thracian poet"
 III.i.11 s.d. lieth down prostrates himself 13 languor grief
 14 staunch satisfy, satiate 19 still continuously 22 So provided that 24 doom judgment

LUCIUS

My gracious lord, no tribune hears you speak.

TITUS

Why, 'tis no matter, man, if they did hear
 They would not mark me, if they did mark
 They would not pity me, yet plead I must, 35
 And bootless° unto them.

Therefore I tell my sorrows to the stones,
 Who though they cannot answer my distress,
 Yet in some sort they are better than the tribunes,
 For that they will not intercept° my tale: 40

When I do weep they humbly at my feet
 Receive my tears and seem to weep with me;
 And were they but attirèd in grave weeds,°

Rome could afford no tribunes like to these.

A stone is soft as wax, tribunes more hard than stones: 45

A stone is silent and offendeth not,

And tribunes with their tongues doom men to death.

But wherefore stand'st thou with thy weapon drawn?

LUCIUS

To rescue my two brothers from their death,
 For which attempt the judges have pronounced 50
 My everlasting doom of banishment.

TITUS

O happy man! They have befriended thee.

Why, foolish Lucius, dost thou not perceive

That Rome is but a wilderness of tigers?

Tigers must prey, and Rome affords no prey 55

But me and mine. How happy art thou then,

From these devourers to be banishèd!

But who comes with our brother Marcus here?

Enter MARCUS with LAVINIA.

MARCUS

Titus, prepare thy agèd eyes to weep,

Or if not so, thy noble heart to break. 60

I bring consuming sorrow to thine age.

TITUS

Will it consume me? Let me see it then.

MARCUS

This was thy daughter.

TITUS

Why, Marcus, so she is.

LUCIUS

Ay me! This object° kills me!

TITUS

Fainthearted boy, arise, and look upon her. 65

Speak, Lavinia, what accursèd hand

Hath made thee handless in thy father's sight?

What fool hath added water to the sea,

Or brought a faggot to bright-burning Troy?

My grief was at the height before thou cam'st, 70

And now like Nilus° it disdaineth bounds.

Give me a sword, I'll chop off my hands too,

For they have fought for Rome, and all in vain;

And they have nursed this woe, in feeding life;

In bootless prayer have they been held up, 75

And they have served me to effectless use.

Now all the service I require of them

Is that the one will help to cut the other.

'Tis well, Lavinia, that thou hast no hands,

For hands to do Rome service is but vain. 80

LUCIUS

Speak, gentle sister, who hath mart' red° thee?

MARCUS

O, that delightful engine° of her thoughts,
That blabbed° them with such pleasing eloquence,
Is torn from forth that pretty hollow cage,
Where like a sweet melodious bird it sung
Sweet varied notes, enchanting every ear!

LUCIUS

O, say thou for her, who hath done this deed?

MARCUS

O, thus I found her, straying in the park,
Seeking to hide herself, as doth the deer
That hath received some unrecuring° wound.

TITUS

It was my dear, and he that wounded her
Hath hurt me more than had he killed me dead:
For now I stand as one upon a rock,
Environed with a wilderness of sea,
Who marks the waxing tide grow wave by wave,
Expecting ever when some envious° surge
Will in his brinish bowels swallow him.
This way to death my wretched sons are gone,
Here stands my other son, a banished man,
And here my brother weeping at my woes:
But that which gives my soul the greatest spurn°
Is dear Lavinia, dearer than my soul.
Had I but seen thy picture in this plight,
It would have madded me: what shall I do
Now I behold thy lively° body so?
Thou hast no hands to wipe away thy tears,
Nor tongue to tell me who hath mart' red thee.
Thy husband he is dead, and for his death
Thy brothers are condemned, and dead by this.°
Look, Marcus! Ah, son Lucius, look on her!
When I did name her brothers, then fresh tears
Stood on her cheeks, as doth the honey dew
Upon a gath' red lily almost withered.

MARCUS

Perchance she weeps because they killed her husband,
Perchance because she knows them innocent.

TITUS

If they did kill thy husband, then be joyful,
Because the law hath ta' en revenge on them.
No, no, they would not do so foul a deed;
Witness the sorrow that their sister makes.
Gentle Lavinia, let me kiss thy lips,
Or make some sign how I may do thee ease.°
Shall thy good uncle, and thy brother Lucius,
And thou, and I, sit round about some fountain,
Looking all downwards, to behold our cheeks
How they are stained, like meadows yet not dry
With miry slime left on them by a flood?
And in the fountain shall we gaze so long
Till the fresh taste be taken from that clearness,°
And made a brine pit with our bitter tears?
Or shall we cut away our hands, like thine?
Or shall we bite our tongues, and in dumb shows°

Pass the remainder of our hateful days?

What shall we do? Let us, that have our tongues,
Plot some device of further misery,
To make us wondered at in time to come.

LUCIUS

85 Sweet father, cease your tears, for at your grief
See how my wretched sister sobs and weeps.

MARCUS

Patience, dear niece. Good Titus, dry thine eyes.

TITUS

Ah, Marcus, Marcus! Brother, well I wot
Thy napkin° cannot drink a tear of mine,
For thou, poor man, hast drowned it with thine own.

LUCIUS

Ah, my Lavinia, I will wipe thy cheeks.

TITUS

Mark, Marcus, mark! I understand her signs:
Had she a tongue to speak, now would she say
That to her brother which I said to thee:
His napkin, with his true tears all bewet,
Can do no service on her sorrowful cheeks.
O, what a sympathy° of woe is this!
As far from help as Limbo is from bliss!

100 Enter AARON the Moor alone.

AARON

Titus Andronicus, my lord the emperor
Sends thee this word, that, if thou love thy sons,
Let Marcus, Lucius, or thyself, old Titus,
Or any one of you, chop off your hand
And send it to the king: he for the same
Will send thee hither both thy sons alive,
And that shall be the ransom for their fault.

110 TITUS

O, gracious emperor! O, gentle Aaron!
Did ever raven sing so like a lark,
That gives sweet tidings of the sun's uprise?
With all my heart, I'll send the emperor my hand.
Good Aaron, wilt thou help to chop it off?

115 LUCIUS

Stay, father! For that noble hand of thine
That hath thrown down so many enemies
Shall not be sent; my hand will serve the turn.
My youth can better spare my blood than you,
And therefore mine shall save my brothers' lives.

120 MARCUS

Which of your hands hath not defended Rome
And reared aloft the 'bloody battle-ax,
Writing destruction on the enemy's castle?
O, none of both but are of high desert:
My hand hath been but idle; let it serve
To ransom my two nephews from their death,
Then have I kept it to a worthy end.

125 AARON

Nay, come, agree whose hand shall go along,
For fear° they die before their pardon come.

130 MARCUS

My hand shall go.

TITUS

Sirs, strive no more; such with' red herbs as these
Are meet^o for plucking up, and therefore mine.

LUCIUS

Sweet father, if I shall be thought thy son,
Let me redeem my brothers both from death.

MARCUS

And, for our father's sake and mother's care,
Now let me show a brother's love to thee.

TITUS

Agree between you; I will spare my hand.

LUCIUS

Then I'll go fetch an ax.

MARCUS

But I will use the ax. Exeunt [LUCIUS and MARCUS]. 185

TITUS

Come hither, Aaron. I'll deceive them both;
Lend me thy hand, and I will give thee mine.

AARON [Aside.]

If that be called deceit, I will be honest,
And never whilst I live deceive men so:
But I'll deceive you in another sort,
And that you'll say, ere half an hour pass.

He cuts off Titus' hand.

Enter LUCIUS and MARCUS again.

TITUS

Now stay your strife, what shall be is dispatched.
Good Aaron, give his majesty my hand;
Tell him it was a hand that warded^o him
From thousand dangers; bid him bury it;
More hath it merited, that let it have.
As for my sons, say I account of them
As jewels purchased at an easy price,
And yet dear too because I bought mine own.

AARON

I go, Andronicus, and for thy hand
Look by and by to have thy sons with thee.

[Aside.]

Their heads, I mean. O, how this villainy
Doth fat^o me with the very thoughts of it!
Let fools do good, and fair men call for grace,
Aaron will have his soul black like his face. Exit. 205

TITUS

O, here I lift this one hand up to heaven,
And bow this feeble ruin to the earth.
If any power pities wretched tears,
To that I call! [To LAVINIA.] What, wouldst thou kneel with me?
Do then, dear heart, for heaven shall hear our prayers, 210
Or with our sighs we'll breathe the welkin dim,^o
And stain the sun with fog, as sometime clouds
When they do hug him in their melting bosoms.

MARCUS

O brother, speak with possibility,
And do not break into these deep extremes. 215

TITUS

Then be my passions^o bottomless with them.

178 meet fit 194 warded guarded 203 fat delight (literally, "nourish") 211 breathe . . . dim becloud the heavens with our breath 217 passions outbursts

MARCUS

But yet let reason govern thy lament.

TITUS

If there were reason for these miseries,
Then into limits could I bind my w^oes: 220
When heaven doth weep, doth not the earth o'erflow?
If the winds rage, doth not the sea wax mad,
Threat'ning the welkin with his big-swoll'n face?
And wilt thou have a reason for this coil?^o
I am the sea; hark, how her sighs doth flow! 225
She is the weeping welkin, I the earth:
Then must my sea be movèd with her sighs,
Then must my earth with her continual tears
Become a deluge, overflowed and drowned,
For why^o my bowels^o cannot hide her woes, 230
But like a drunkard must I vomit them.
Then give me leave, for losers will have leave
To ease their stomachs^o with their bitter tongues.

Enter a MESSENGER, with two heads and a hand.

MESSENGER

Worthy Andronicus, ill art thou repaid
For that good hand thou sent'st the emperor. 235
Here are the heads of thy two noble sons,
And here's thy hand in scorn to thee sent back;
Thy grief their sports, thy resolution mocked:
That^o woe is me to think upon thy woes,
More than remembrance of my father's death. [Exit.] 240

MARCUS

Now let hot Etna cool in Sicily,
And be my heart an ever-burning hell!
These miseries are more than may be borne!
To weep with them that weep doth ease some deal,^o
But sorrow flouted at is double death. 245

LUCIUS

Ah, that this sight should make so deep a wound,
And yet detested life not shrink^o thereat!
That ever death should let life bear his name,^o
Where life hath no more interest but to breathe!

[LAVINIA kisses TITUS.]

MARCUS

Alas, poor heart, that kiss is comfortless 250
As frozen water to a starvèd^o snake.

TITUS

When will this fearful slumber^o have an end?

MARCUS

Now, farewell, flatt'ry, die, Andronicus,
Thou dost not slumber: see thy two sons' heads,
Thy warlike hand, thy mangled daughter here, 255
Thy other banished son with this dear^o sight
Struck pale and bloodless, and thy brother, I,
Even like a stony image cold and numb.
Ah! Now no more will I control thy griefs:
Rend off thy silver hair, thy other hand 260
Gnawing with thy teeth, and be this dismal sight

Now is a time to storm; why art thou still?

TITUS Ha, ha, ha!

MARCUS

Why dost thou laugh? It fits not with this hour.

TITUS

Why, I have not another tear to shed.

Besides, this sorrow is an enemy,

And would usurp upon my wat'ry eyes

And make them blind with tributary° tears;

Then which way shall I find revenge's cave?

For these two heads do seem to speak to me,

And threat me I shall never come to bliss

Till all these mischiefs be returned again,

Even in their throats that hath committed them.

Come, let me see what task I have to do.

You heavy° people, circle me about,

That I may turn me to each one of you,

And swear unto my soul to right your wrongs.

The vow is made. Come, brother, take a head;

And in this hand the other will I bear.

And Lavinia, thou shalt be employed in these arms,

Bear thou my hand, sweet wench, between thy teeth:°

As for thee, boy, go, get thee from my sight.

Thou art an exile, and thou must not stay.

Hie to the Goths, and raise an army there,

And, if ye love me, as I think you do,

Let's kiss and part, for we have much to do.

Exeunt [all but LUCIUS].

LUCIUS

Farewell, Andronicus, my noble father,

The woeful'st man that ever lived in Rome!

Farewell, proud Rome, till Lucius come again;

He loves his pledges dearer than his life.

Farewell, Lavinia, my noble sister;

O, would thou wert as thou tofore° hast been!

But now nor Lucius nor° Lavinia lives

But in oblivion and hateful griefs.

If Lucius live, he will requite your wrongs,

And make proud Saturnine and his empress

Beg at the gates, like Tarquin° and his queen.

Now will I to the Goths and raise a pow'r,

To be revenged on Rome and Saturnine.

Exit LUCIUS.

[Scene II. Rome. Within Titus' house.]

A banquet.° Enter [TITUS] Andronicus, MARCUS, LAVINIA, and the BOY [Lucius].

As will revenge these bitter woes of ours.

And cannot passionate° our tenfold grief

With folded arms. This poor right hand of mine

Is left to tyrannize upon my breast;

Who, when my heart all mad with misery

Beats in this hollow prison of my flesh,

Then thus I thump it down.

[To LAVINIA.]

Thou map° of woe, that thus dost talk in signs,

When thy poor heart beats with outrageous beating,

Thou canst not strike it thus to make it still.

Wound it with sighing,° girl, kill it with groans;

Or get some little knife between thy teeth,

And just against thy heart make thou a hole,

That all the tears that thy poor eyes let fall

May run into that sink,° and, soaking in,

Drown the lamenting fool° in sea-salt tears.

MARCUS

Fie, brother, fie! Teach her not thus to lay

Such violent hands upon her tender life.

TITUS

How now! Has sorrow made thee dote already?

Why, Marcus, no man should be mad but I.

What violent hands can she lay on her life!

Ah, wherefore dost thou urge the name of hands,

To bid Aeneas° tell the tale twice o'er,

How Troy was burnt and he made miserable?

O, handle not the theme, to talk of hands,

Lest we remember still that we have none.

Fie, fie, how frantically I square° my talk,

As if we should forget we had no hands,

If Marcus did not name the word of hands!

Come, let's fall to; and, gentle girl, eat this.

Here is no drink? Hark, Marcus, what she says—

I can interpret all her martyred signs—

She says she drinks no other drink but tears,

Brewed with her sorrow, meshed° upon her cheeks.

Speechless complainer, I will learn thy thought;

In thy dumb action will I be as perfect°

As begging hermits in their holy prayers:

Thou shalt not sigh, nor hold thy stumps to heaven,

Nor wink,° nor nod, nor kneel, nor make a sign,

But I of these will wrest an alphabet,

And by still° practice learn to know thy meaning.

BOY

Good grandsire, leave these bitter deep laments.

Make my aunt merry with some pleasing tale.

MARCUS

Alas, the tender boy, in passion moved,

Doth weep to see his grandsire's heaviness.

Mine eyes are cloyed with view of tyranny:

A deed of death done on the innocent

Becomes not Titus' brother. Get thee gone;

I see thou art not for my company.

MARCUS

Alas, my lord, I have but killed a fly.

TITUS

"But"! How, if that fly had a father and mother?

How would he hang his slender gilded wings,

And buzz lamenting doings in the air!

Poor harmless fly,

That, with his pretty buzzing melody,

Came here to make us merry! And thou hast killed him.

MARCUS

Pardon me, sir; it was a black ill-favored° fly,

Like to the empress' Moor. Therefore I killed him.

TITUS

O, O, O,

Then pardon me for reprehending thee,

For thou hast done a charitable deed.

Give me thy knife, I will insult on° him,

Flattering myself, as if it were the Moor,

Come hither purposely to poison me.

There's for thyself, and that's for Tamora.

Ah, sirrah!°

Yet I think we are not brought so low

But that between us we can kill a fly

That comes in likeness of a coal-black Moor.

MARCUS

He takes false shadows for true substances.

TITUS

Come, take away.° Lavinia, go with me:

I'll to thy closet,° and go read with thee

Help, grandsire, help! My aunt Lavinia

Follows me everywhere, I know not why.

Good uncle Marcus, see how swift she comes.

Alas, sweet aunt, I know not what you mean.

MARCUS

Stand by me, Lucius, do not fear thine aunt.

TITUS

She loves thee, boy, too well to do thee harm.

BOY

Ay, when my father was in Rome she did.

MARCUS

What means my niece Lavinia by these signs?

TITUS

Fear her not, Lucius. Somewhat doth she mean.

See, Lucius, see, how much she makes of thee:

Somewhither would she have thee go with her.

Ah, boy, Cornelia° never with more care

Read to her sons than she hath read to thee

Sweet poetry and Tully's Orator.°

Canst thou not guess wherefore she plies thee thus?

BOY

My lord, I know not, I, nor can I guess,

Unless some fit or frenzy do possess her:

For I have heard my grandsire say full oft,

Extremity of griefs would make men mad;

And I have read that Hecuba of Troy

Ran mad for sorrow. That made me to fear,

Although, my lord, I know my noble aunt

Loves me as dear as e'er my mother did,

And would not, but in fury,° fright my youth,

Which made me down to throw my books and fly,

Causeless perhaps. But pardon me, sweet aunt:

And, madam, if my uncle Marcus go,

I will most willingly attend° your ladyship.

MARCUS

Lucius, I will.

TITUS

How now, Lavinia? Marcus, what means this?

Some book there is that she desires to see.

Which is it, girl, of these? Open them, boy.

But thou art deeper read, and better skilled.

Come, and take choice of all my library,

And so beguile thy sorrow, till the heavens

Reveal the damned contriver of this deed.

Why lifts she up her arms in sequence thus?

MARCUS

I think she means that there were more than one

Confederate in the fact.° Ay, more there was,

Or else to heaven she heaves them for revenge.

TITUS

Lucius, what book is that she tosseth° so?

BOY

Grandsire, 'tis Ovid's Metamorphosis;°

My mother gave it me.

MARCUS

Perhaps she culled it from among the rest.

Enter AARON, CHIRON, and DEMETRIUS, at one door, and at the other door young LUCIUS and another, with a bundle of weapons and verses writ upon them.

CHIRON

Demetrius, here's the son of Lucius,
He hath some message to deliver us.

AARON

Ay, some mad message from his mad grandfather.

BOY

My lords, with all the humbleness I may,
I greet your honors from Andronicus.

And pray the Roman gods confound° you both.

DEMETRIUS

Ay, just; a verse in Horace; right, you have it.

[Aside.]

Now, what a thing it is to be an ass!
Here's no sound jest! The old man hath found their guilt,

And sends them weapons wrapped about with lines
That wound, beyond their feeling, to the quick.

But were our witty° empress well afoot,
She would applaud Andronicus' conceit.°
But let her rest in her unrest awhile.

[Aloud.]

And now, young lords, was't not a happy star
Led us to Rome, strangers, and more than so,
Captives, to be advanced to this height?
It did me good, before the palace gate
To brave the tribune in his brother's hearing.

DEMETRIUS

But me more good, to see so great a lord
Basely insinuate° and send us gifts.

AARON

Had he not reason, Lord Demetrius?
Did you not use his daughter very friendly?

DEMETRIUS

I would we had a thousand Roman dames
At such a bay,° by turn to serve our lust.

CHIRON

A charitable wish and full of love.

AARON

Here lacks but your mother for to say amen.

CHIRON

And that would she for twenty thousand more.

DEMETRIUS

Come, let us go, and pray to all the gods
For our belovèd mother in her pains.

AARON [Aside.]

Pray to the devils, the gods have given us over.

Trumpets sound.

DEMETRIUS

Why do the emperor's trumpets flourish thus?

CHIRON

Belike,° for joy the emperor hath a son.

DEMETRIUS

Soft! Who comes here?

Enter NURSE with a blackamoor CHILD.

NURSE

God morrow, lords.

O, tell me, did you see Aaron the Moor?

AARON

Well, more or less, or ne'er a whit at all,
Here Aaron is; and what with Aaron now?

NURSE

O gentle Aaron, we are all undone!
Now help, or woe betide thee evermore!

AARON

Why, what a caterwauling dost thou keep!
What dost thou wrap and fumble° in thy arms?

NURSE

O, that which I would hide from heaven's eye,
Our empress' shame and stately Rome's disgrace!
She is delivered, lords, she is delivered.

AARON

To whom?

NURSE

I mean, she is brought abed.

AARON

Well, God give her good rest! What hath he sent her?

NURSE

A devil.

AARON Why, then she is the devil's dam;°

A joyful issue.

NURSE

A joyless, dismal, black, and sorrowful issue!
Here is the babe, as loathsome as a toad
Amongst the fair-faced breeders of our clime.
The empress sends it thee, thy stamp, thy seal,
And bids thee christen it with thy dagger's point.

DEMETRIUS

Villain, what has thou done?

AARON

That which thou canst not undo.

CHIRON

Thou hast undone our mother.

AARON

Villain, I have done^o thy mother.

DEMETRIUS

And therein, hellish dog, thou hast undone her.
Woe to her chance,^o and damned her loathèd choice!
Accursed the offspring of so foul a fiend!

CHIRON

It shall not live.

AARON

It shall not die.

NURSE

Aaron, it must; the mother wills it so.

AARON

What, must it, nurse? Then let no man but I
Do execution on my flesh and blood.

DEMETRIUS

I'll broach^o the tadpole on my rapier's point.
Nurse, give it me; my sword shall soon dispatch it.

AARON

Sooner this sword shall plow thy bowels up.
Stay, murderous villains! Will you kill your brother?
Now, by the burning tapers of the sky,
That shone so brightly when this boy was got,^o
He dies upon my scimitar's sharp point
That touches this my first-born son and heir!
I tell you, younglings, not Enceladus,^o
With all his threat'ning band of Typhon's brood,
Nor great Alcides,^o nor the god of war,
Shall seize this prey out of his father's hands.
What, what, ye sanguine,^o shallow-hearted boys!
Ye white-limed walls!^o Ye alehouse painted signs!
Coal black is better than another hue;
In that it scorns to bear another hue,
For all the water in the ocean
Can never turn the swan's black legs to white,
Although she lave^o them hourly in the flood.
Tell the empress from me, I am of age
To keep mine own, excuse it how she can.

DEMETRIUS

Wilt thou betray thy noble mistress thus?

AARON

My mistress is my mistress, this my self,
The vigor and the picture of my youth:
This before all the world do I prefer;
This mauger^o all the world will I keep safe,
Or some of you shall smoke^o for it in Rome.

DEMETRIUS

By this our mother is forever shamed.

CHIRON

Rome will despise her for this foul escape.^o

NURSE

The emperor in his rage will doom her death.

CHIRON

I blush to think upon this ignomy.^o

AARON

Why, there's the privilege your beauty bears:
Fie, treacherous hue, that will betray with blushing
The close enacts^o and counsels of thy heart!
Here's a young lad framed of another leer:^o
Look, how the black slave smiles upon the father,
As who should say, "Old lad, I am thine own."
He is your brother, lords, sensibly fed
Of that self blood^o that first gave life to you,
And from your womb where you imprisoned were
He is enfranchisèd and come to light:
Nay, he is your brother by the surer side,^o
Although my seal be stampèd in his face.

NURSE

Aaron, what shall I say unto the empress?

DEMETRIUS

Advise thee, Aaron, what is to be done,
And we will all subscribe^o to thy advice:
Save thou the child, so^o we may all be safe.

AARON

Then sit we down and let us all consult.
My son and I will have the wind of you:^o
Keep there; now talk at pleasure of your safety.

DEMETRIUS

How many women saw this child of his?

AARON

Why, so, brave lords! When we join in league,
I am a lamb: but if you brave the Moor,
The chafèd^o boar, the mountain lioness,
The ocean swells not so as Aaron storms.
But say again, how many saw the child?

NURSE

Cornelia the midwife, and myself,
And no one else but the delivered empress.

AARON

The empress, the midwife, and yourself:
Two may keep counsel when the third's away.
Go to the empress, tell her this I said.

He kills her.

Wheak, wheak!

So cries a pig preparèd to the spit.

DEMETRIUS

What mean'st thou, Aaron? Wherefore didst thou this?

AARON

O, Lord, sir, 'tis a deed of policy!^o
Shall she live to betray this guilt of ours?

 And now be it known to you my full intent.

 His child is like to her, fair as you are. 155
 Go pack^o with him, and give the mother gold,
 And tell them both the circumstance of all,^o
 And how by this their child shall be advanced,
 And be receivèd for the emperor's heir,
 And substituted in the place of mine, 160
 To calm this tempest whirling in the court;
 And let the emperor dandle him for his own.
 Hark ye, lords; you see I have given her physic,^o
 And you must needs bestow her funeral;
 The fields are near, and you are gallant grooms. 165
 This done, see that you take no longer days,^o
 But send the midwife presently to me.
 The midwife and the nurse well made away,
 Then let the ladies tattle what they please.

CHIRON

Aaron, I see thou wilt not trust the air
 With secrets. 170

DEMETRIUS For this care of Tamora,
 Herself and hers are highly bound to thee. Exeunt.

AARON

Now to the Goths, as swift as swallow flies,
 There to dispose this treasure in mine arms,
 And secretly to greet the empress' friends. 175
 Come on, you thick-lipped slave, I'll bear you hence;
 For it is you that puts us to`our shifts.^o
 I'll make you feed on berries and on roots,
 And feed on curds and whey, and suck the goat,
 And cabin^o in a cave, and bring you up 180
 To be a warrior and command a camp. Exit.

[Scene III. Rome. A street.]

Enter TITUS, old MARCUS, [his son PUBLIUS,] young LUCIUS, and other GENTLEMEN, with bows; and TITUS bears the arrows with letters on the ends of them.

TITUS

Come, Marcus, come; kinsmen, this is the way.
 Sir boy, let me see your archery;
 Look ye draw home^o enough, and 'tis there straight.
 Terras Astraea reliquit.^o
 Be you rememb'red,^o Marcus: she's gone, she's fled. 5
 Sirs, take you to your tools. You, cousins, shall Go sound the ocean, and cast your nets;
 Happily^o you may catch her in the sea;
 Yet there's as little justice as at land:
 No, Publius and Sempronius, you must do it; 10
 'Tis you must dig with mattock and with spade,
 And pierce the inmost center of the earth:
 Then, when you come to Pluto's region,^o

I pray you deliver him this petition:
 Tell him, it is for justice and for aid, 15
 And that it comes from old Andronicus,
 Shaken with sorrows in ungrateful Rome.
 Ah, Rome! Well, well; I made thee miserable
 What time^o I threw the people's suffrages 20
 On him that thus doth tyrannize o'er me.
 Go, get you gone, and pray be careful all,
 And leave you not a man of war unsearched:
 This wicked emperor may have shipped her hence,
 And, kinsmen, then we may go pipe for^o justice.

MARCUS

O, Publius, is not this a heavy case, 25
 To see thy noble uncle thus distract?

PUBLIUS

Therefore, my lords, it highly us concerns
 By day and night t' attend him carefully,
 And feed his humor^o kindly as we may, 30
 Till time beget some careful remedy.

MARCUS

Kinsmen, his sorrows are past remedy.
 But^o . . . 35
 Join with the Goths, and with revengeful war
 Take wreak^o on Rome for this ingratitude,
 And vengeance on the traitor Saturnine.

TITUS

Publius, how now! How now, my masters!
 What, have you met with her?

PUBLIUS

No, my good lord, but Pluto sends you word,
 If you will have revenge from hell, you shall:
 Marry, for justice, she is so employed, 40
 He thinks, with Jove in heaven, or somewhere else,
 So that perforce you must needs stay a time.

TITUS

He doth me wrong to feed me with delays.
 I'll dive into the burning lake below,
 And pull her out of Acheron^o by the heels. 45
 Marcus, we are but shrubs, no cedars we,
 No big-boned men framed of the Cyclops'^o size;
 But metal, Marcus, steel to the very back,
 Yet wrung with wrongs more than our backs can bear:
 And sith^o there's no justice in earth nor hell, 50
 We will solicit heaven, and move the gods
 To send down justice for to wreak^o our wrongs.
 Come, to this gear.^o You are a good archer, Marcus.

He gives them the arrows.

Ad Jovem, that's for you: here, Ad Apollinem:
 Ad Martem,^o that's for myself: 55
 Here, boy, to Pallas: here, to Mercury:
 To Saturn, Caius, not to Saturnine;
 You were as good to shoot^o against the wind.
 To it, boy! Marcus, loose when I bid.
 Of my word, I have written to effect; 60

TITUS

Now, masters, draw. O, well said, Lucius!
Good boy, in Virgo's^o lap; give it Pallas.

MARCUS

My lord, I aim a mile beyond the moon;
Your letter is with Jupiter by this.

TITUS Ha, ha!

Publius, Publius, what hast thou done!
See, see, thou hast shot off one of Taurus' horns.

MARCUS

This was the sport, my lord: when Publius shot,
The bull, being galled, gave Aries such a knock
That down fell both the ram's horns in the court,
And who should find them but the empress' villain?
She laughed, and told the Moor he should not choose
But give them to his master for a present.

TITUS

Why, there it goes! God give his lordship joy!

Enter the CLOWN,^o with a basket and two pigeons in it.

News, news from heaven! Marcus, the post is come.
Sirrah, what tidings? Have you any letters?
Shall I have justice? What says Jupiter?

CLOWN Ho, the gibbet maker!^o He says that he hath taken them down again, for the man must not be hanged till the next week.

TITUS But what says Jupiter, I ask thee?

CLOWN Alas, sir, I know not Jubiter; I never drank with him in all my life.

TITUS Why, villain, art not thou the carrier?

CLOWN Ay, of my pigeons, sir, nothing else.

TITUS Why, didst thou not come from heaven?

CLOWN From heaven? Alas, sir, I never came there!
God forbid, I should be so bold to press to heaven in my young days. Why, I am going with my pigeons to the tribunal plebs,^o to take up a matter of brawl betwixt my uncle and one of the emperal's^o men.

MARCUS Why, sir, that is as fit as can be to serve for your oration; and let him deliver the pigeons to the emperor from you.

TITUS Tell me, can you deliver an oration to the emperor with a grace?

CLOWN Nay, truly, sir, I could never say grace in all my life.

TITUS

Sirrah, come hither: make no more ado,
But give your pigeons to the emperor:
By me thou shalt have justice at his hands.
Hold, hold, meanwhile, here's money for thy charges.^o
Give me pen and ink. Sirrah, can you with a grace deliver up a supplication?

CLOWN Ay, sir.

TITUS Then here is a supplication for you. And when you come to him, at the first approach you must kneel, then kiss his foot, then deliver up your pigeons, and then look for your reward. I'll be at hand, sir!

See you do it bravely.^o

CLOWN I warrant you, sir, let me alone.

TITUS

Sirrah, hast thou a knife? Come, let me see it.

Here, Marcus, fold it in the oration,

For thou hast made it like an humble suppliant.

And when thou hast given it to the emperor,

Knock at my door, and tell me what he says.

CLOWN God be with you, sir; I will.

TITUS Come, Marcus, let us go. Publius, follow me.

Exeunt.

[Scene IV. Rome. Before the palace.]

Enter emperor [SATURNINUS] and empress [TAMORA] and her two SONS. The emperor [SATURNINUS] brings the arrows in his hand that Titus shot at him.

SATURNINUS

Why, lords, what wrongs are these! Was ever seen
An emperor in Rome thus overborne,
Troubled, confronted thus, and for the extent^o
Of egal^o justice used in such contempt?

My lords, you know, as know the mighty gods,

However these disturbers of our peace

Buzz in the people's ears, there naught hath passed

But even^o with law against the willful sons

Of old Andronicus. And what and if

His sorrows have so overwhelmed his wits,

Shall we be thus afflicted in his wrecks,^o

His fits, his frenzy, and his bitterness?

And now he writes to heaven for his redress!

See, here's to Jove, and this to Mercury,

This to Apollo, this to the god of war.

Sweet scrolls to fly about the streets of Rome!

What's this but libeling against the senate,

And blazoning^o our injustice everywhere?

A goodly humor, is it not, my lords?

As who would say, in Rome no justice were.

But if I live, his feignèd ecstasies^o

Shall be no shelter to these outrages,

But he and his shall know that justice lives

In Saturninus' health; whom, if he sleep,

He'll so awake, as he in fury shall

Cut off the proud'st conspirator that lives.

TAMORA

My gracious lord, my lovely Saturnine,

Lord of my life, commander of my thoughts,

Calm thee, and bear the faults of Titus' age,

Th' effects of sorrow for his valiant sons,

Whose loss hath pierced him deep and scarred his heart,

And rather comfort his distressed plight

Than prosecute the meanest or the best

For these contempts. [Aside.] Why, thus it shall become High-witted Tamora to gloze^o with all.

But, Titus, I have touched thee to the quick,

Enter CLOWN.

How now, good fellow? Wouldst thou speak with us?

CLOWN

TAMORA

Empress I am, but yonder sits the emperor.

CLOWN 'Tis he. God and Saint Stephen give you godden.° I have brought you a letter and a couple of pigeons here.

He [SATURNINUS] reads the letter.

SATURNINUS

Go, take him away, and hang him presently. 45

CLOWN How much money must I have?

TAMORA Come, sirrah, you must be hanged.

CLOWN Hanged! By Lady,° then I have brought up a neck° to a fair end. Exit [with GUARDS].

SATURNINUS

Despiteful and intolerable wrongs! 50

Shall I endure this monstrous villainy?

I know from whence this same device proceeds.

May this be borne as if his traitorous sons,

That died by law for murder of our brother,

Have by my means been butchered wrongfully. 55

Go, drag the villain hither by the hair,

Nor age nor honor shall shape privilege:°

For this proud mock I'll be thy slaughterman—

Sly frantic wretch, that holp'st to make me great,
In hope thyself should govern Rome and me. 60

Enter nuntius,° AEMILIUS.

What news with thee, Aemilius?

AEMILIUS

Arm, my lords. Rome never had more cause.

The Goths have gathered head,° and with a power°

Of high-resolvèd men, bent to the spoil,

They hither march amain, under conduct° 65

Of Lucius, son to old Andronicus;

Who threats, in course of this revenge, to do

As much as ever Coriolanus° did.

SATURNINUS

Is warlike Lucius general of the Goths?

These tidings nip me, and I hang the head 70

As flowers with frost or grass beat down with storms.

Ay, now begins our sorrows to approach:

'Tis he the common people love so much;

Myself hath often heard them say,

When I have walkèd like a private man, 75

That Lucius' banishment was wrongfully,

And they have wished that Lucius were their emperor.

TAMORA

Ay, but the citizens favor Lucius,

And will revolt from me to succor him. 80

TAMORA

King, be thy thoughts imperious, like thy name.

Is the sun dimmed, that gnats do fly in it?

The eagle suffers little birds to sing

And is not careful° what they mean thereby,

Knowing that with the shadow of his wings 85

He can at pleasure stint° their melody:

Even so mayst thou the giddy men of Rome.

Then cheer thy spirit: for know, thou emperor,

I will enchant the old Andronicus

With words more sweet, and yet more dangerous, 90

Than baits to fish, or honey stalks° to sheep;

Whenas the one is wounded with the bait,

The other rotted with delicious feed.

SATURNINUS

But he will not entreat his son for us.

TAMORA

If Tamora entreat him, then he will: 95

For I can smooth, and fill his agèd ears

With golden promises, that, were his heart

Almost impregnable, his old ears deaf,

Yet should both ear and heart obey my tongue.

[To AEMILIUS.]

Go thou before to be our ambassador: 100

Say that the emperor requests a parley

Of warlike Lucius, and appoint the meeting

Even at his father's house, the old Andronicus.

SATURNINUS

Aemilius, do this message honorably,

And if he stand in° hostage for his safety, 105

Bid him demand what pledge will please him best.

AEMILIUS

Your bidding shall I do effectually. Exit.

TAMORA

Now will I to that old Andronicus,

And temper° him with all the art I have,

To pluck proud Lucius from the warlike Goths. 110

And now, sweet emperor, be blithe again,

And bury all thy fear in my devices.

SATURNINUS

Then go successantly,° and plead to him. Exeunt.

[A C T V]

[Scene I. A plain near Rome.]

*Enter LUCIUS, with an army of GOTHs, with drums and

Which signifies what hate they bear their emperor,

And how desirous of our sight they are.
Therefore, great lords, be, as your titles witness,
Imperious, and impatient of your wrongs;
And wherein Rome hath done you any scath,^o
Let him make treble satisfaction.

GOTH

Brave slip,^o sprung from the great Andronicus,
Whose name was once our terror, now our comfort,
Whose high exploits and honorable deeds
Ingrateful Rome requites with foul contempt,
Be bold^o in us: we'll follow where thou lead'st,
Like stinging bees in hottest summer's day,
Led by their master to the flow' red fields,
And be avenged on cursèd Tamora.

[OTHER GOTHS]

And as he saith, so say we all with him.

LUCIUS

I humbly thank him, and I thank you all.
But who comes here, led by a lusty Goth?

Enter a GOTH, leading of AARON with his CHILD in his arms.

GOTH

Renownèd Lucius, from our troops I strayed
To gaze upon a ruinous monastery,
And, as I earnestly did fix mine eye
Upon the wasted^o building, suddenly
I heard a child cry underneath a wall.
I made unto the noise, when soon I heard
The crying babe controlled with this discourse:
"Peace, tawny^o slave, half me and half thy dame.^o
Did not thy hue bewray^o whose brat^o thou art,
Had nature lent thee but thy mother's look,
Villain, thou mightst have been an emperor:
But where the bull and cow are both milk-white,
They never do beget a coal-black calf.
Peace, villain, peace!" Even thus he rates^o the babe,
"For I must bear thee to a trusty Goth,
Who, when he knows thou art the empress' babe,
Will hold thee dearly for thy mother's sake."
With this, my weapon drawn, I rushed upon him,
Surprised him suddenly, and brought him hither,
To use as you think needful of the man.

LUCIUS

O worthy Goth, this is the incarnate devil
That robbed Andronicus of his good hand.
This is the pearl that pleased your empress' eye,
And here's the base fruit of her burning lust.
Say, walleyed^o slave, whither wouldst thou convey
This growing image of thy fiendlike face?
Why dost not speak? What, deaf? Not a word?
A halter, soldiers! Hang him on this tree,
And by his side his fruit of bastardy.

AARON

Touch not the boy; he is of royal blood.

LUCIUS

Too like the sire for ever being good.
First hang the child, that he may see it sprawl—
A sight to vex the father's soul withal.

AARON

Get me a ladder.^o Lucius, save the child,
And bear it from me to the empress.
If thou do this, I'll show thee wondrous things
That highly may advantage thee to hear.
If thou wilt not, befall what may befall,
I'll speak no more but "Vengeance rot you all!"

LUCIUS

Say on, and if it please me which thou speak'st,
Thy child shall live, and I will see it nourished.

AARON

And if it please thee! Why, assure thee, Lucius,
'Twill vex thy soul to hear what I shall speak;
For I must talk of murders, rapes, and massacres,
Acts of black night, abominable deeds,
Complots of mischief, treason, villainies
Ruthful^o to hear, yet piteously performed:^o
And this shall all be buried in my death,
Unless thou swear to me my child shall live.

LUCIUS

Tell on thy mind, I say thy child shall live.

AARON

Swear that he shall, and then I will begin.

LUCIUS

Who should I swear by? Thou believest no god:
That granted, how canst thou believe an oath?

AARON

What if I do not? As indeed I do not;
Yet, for I know thou art religious,
And hast a thing within thee callèd conscience,
With twenty popish tricks and ceremonies,
Which I have seen thee careful to observe,
Therefore I urge thy oath; for that I know
An idiot holds his bauble^o for a god,
And keeps the oath which by that god he swears,
To that I'll urge him: therefore thou shalt vow
By that same god, what god soe'er it be,
That thou adorest and hast in reverence,
To save my boy, to nourish and bring him up;
Or else I will discover naught to thee.

LUCIUS

Even by my god I swear to thee I will.

AARON

First know thou, I begot him on the empress.

LUCIUS

O most insatiate and luxurious^o woman!

AARON

Tut, Lucius, this was but a deed of charity
To^o that which thou shalt hear of me anon.
'Twas her two sons that murdered Bassianus;
They cut thy sister's tongue and ravished her,
And cut her hands, and trimmed her as thou sawest.

LUCIUS

O detestable villain! Call'st thou that trimming?

AARON

Why, she was washed, and cut, and trimmed, and 'twas
Trim sport for them which had the doing of it.

LUCIUS

O barbarous, beastly villains, like thyself!

AARON

Indeed, I was their tutor to instruct them.
That coddling° spirit had they from their mother,
As sure a card as ever won the set.°
That bloody mind, I think, they learned of me,
As true a dog as ever fought at head.°
Well, let my deeds be witness of my worth.
I trained° thy brethren to that guileful hole,
Where the dead corpse of Bassianus lay;
I wrote the letter that thy father found,
And hid the gold within that letter mentioned,
Confederate with the queen and her two sons;
And what not done, that thou hast cause to rue,
Wherein I had no stroke of mischief in it?
I played the cheater° for thy father's hand,
And when I had it drew myself apart,
And almost broke my heart with extreme laughter.
I pried me through the crevice of a wall,
When for his hand he had his two sons' heads;
Beheld his tears and laughed so heartily
That both mine eyes were rainy like to his:
And when I told the empress of this sport,
She sounded° almost at my pleasing tale,
And for my tidings gave me twenty kisses.

GOTH

What, canst thou say all this and never blush?

AARON

Ay, like a black dog, as the saying is.

LUCIUS

Art thou not sorry for these heinous deeds?

AARON

Ay, that I had not done a thousand more.
Even now I curse the day—and yet, I think,
Few come within the compass of my curse—
Wherein I did not some notorious ill:
As kill a man or else devise his death,
Ravish a maid or plot the way to do it,
Accuse some innocent and forswear° myself,
Set deadly enmity between two friends,
Make poor men's cattle break their necks,
Set fire on barns and haystacks in the night,
And bid the owners quench them with their tears.
Oft have I digged up dead men from their graves
And set them upright at their dear friends' door,
Even when their sorrows almost was forgot,
And on their skins, as on the bark of trees,
Have with my knife carved in Roman letters,
“Let not your sorrow die, though I am dead.”
But, I have done a thousand dreadful things
As willingly as one would kill a fly,
And nothing grieves me heartily indeed,
But that I cannot do ten thousand more.

LUCIUS

Bring down the devil, for he must not die
So sweet a death as hanging presently.

AARON

If there be devils, would I were a devil,
To live and burn in everlasting fire,
So I might have your company in hell,
But to torment you with my bitter tongue! 150

100 LUCIUS

Sirs, stop his mouth, and let him speak no more.

Enter AEMILIUS.

GOTH

105 My lord, there is a messenger from Rome
Desires to be admitted to your presence.

LUCIUS

Let him come near.
Welcome, Aemilius, what's the news from Rome? 155

110 AEMILIUS

Lord Lucius, and you princes of the Goths,
The Roman emperor greets you all by me;
And, for he understands you are in arms,
He craves a parley at your father's house,
115 Willing you to demand your hostages, 160
And they shall be immediately delivered.

GOTH

What says our general?

LUCIUS

120 Aemilius, let the emperor give his pledges
Unto my father and my uncle Marcus,
And we will come. March away. [Exeunt.] 165

[Scene II. Rome. Before Titus' house.]

Enter TAMORA and her two SONS, disguised [as Revenge attended by Rape and Murder].

125 TAMORA

Thus, in this strange and sad habiliment,°
I will encounter with Andronicus,
And say I am Revenge, sent from below
To join with him and right his heinous wrongs.
130 Knock at his study, where, they say, he keeps° 5
To ruminate strange plots of dire revenge;
Tell him Revenge is come to join with him,
And work confusion° on his enemies.

135 They knock, and TITUS [above] opens his study door.

TITUS

Who doth molest my contemplation?
Is it your trick to make me ope the door, 10
That so my sad decrees may fly away,
And all my study be to no effect?
140 You are deceived; for what I mean to do
See here in bloody lines I have set down.
And what is written shall be executed. 15

TAMORA

Titus, I am come to talk with thee.

145 TITUS

No, not a word. How can I grace my talk,
Wanting a hand to give that accord?°
Thou hast the odds of° me, therefore no more.

TITUS

I am not mad, I know thee well enough.

Witness this wretched stump, witness these crimson lines,

Witness these trenches made by grief and care,

Witness the tiring day and heavy night,

Witness all sorrow, that I know thee well 25

For our proud empress, mighty Tamora:

Is not thy coming for my other hand?

TAMORA

Know thou, sad man, I am not Tamora;

She is thy enemy, and I thy friend.

I am Revenge, sent from th' infernal kingdom 30

To ease the gnawing vulture of thy mind,

By working wreakful° vengeance on thy foes.

Come down and welcome me to this world's light;

Confer with me of murder and of death:

There's not a hollow cave or lurking place, 35

No vast obscurity or misty vale,

Where bloody murder or detested rape

Can couch° for fear, but I will find them out,

And in their ears tell them my dreadful name,

Revenge, which makes the foul offender quake. 40

TITUS

Art thou Revenge? And art thou sent to me,

To be a torment to mine enemies?

TAMORA

I am, therefore come down and welcome me.

TITUS

Do me some service ere I come to thee.

Lo, by thy side where Rape and Murder stands; 45

Now give some surance° that thou art Revenge;

Stab them, or tear them on thy chariot wheels;

And then I'll come and be thy wagoner,

And whirl along with thee about the globes.

Provide thee two proper palfreys,° black as jet, 50

To hale thy vengeful wagon swift away,

And find out murd'ers in their guilty caves:

And when thy car° is loaden with their heads,

I will dismount, and by thy wagon wheel

Trot like a servile footman all day long, 55

Even from Hyperion's° rising in the east,

Until his very downfall in the sea.

And day by day I'll do this heavy task,

So° thou destroy Rapine° and Murder there.

TAMORA

These are my ministers and come with me. 60

TITUS

Are they thy ministers? What are they called?

TAMORA

Rape and Murder; therefore callèd so,

'Cause they take vengeance of such kind of men.

TITUS

Good Lord, how like the empress' sons they are!

And you the empress! But we worldly° men 65

Have miserable, mad, mistaking eyes.

O sweet Revenge, now do I come to thee:

And, if one arm's embracement will content thee,

I will embrace thee in it by and by. [Exit above.]

TAMORA

This closing° with him fits his lunacy. 70

Whate'er I forge° to feed his brainsick humors,

Do you uphold and maintain in your speeches,

For now he firmly takes me for Revenge,

And, being credulous in this mad thought,

I'll make him send for Lucius his son; 75

And, whilst I at a banquet hold him sure,

I'll find some cunning practice° out of hand,°

To scatter and disperse the giddy Goths,

Or at the least make them his enemies.

See, here he comes, and I must ply my theme. 80

[Enter TITUS.]

TITUS

Long have I been forlorn, and all for thee.

Welcome, dread Fury, to my woeful house:

Rapine and Murder, you are welcome too:

How like the empress and her sons you are!

Well are you fitted, had you but a Moor: 85

Could not all hell afford you such a devil?

For well I wot the empress never wags°

But in her company there is a Moor;

And, would you represent our queen aright,

It were convenient° you had such a devil: 90

But welcome, as you are. What shall we do?

TAMORA

What wouldst thou have us do, Andronicus?

DEMETRIUS

Show me a murderer, I'll deal with him.

CHIRON

Show me a villain that hath done a rape,

And I am sent to be revenged on him. 95

TAMORA

Show me a thousand that hath done thee wrong,

And I will be revengèd on them all.

TITUS

Look round about the wicked streets of Rome,

And when thou find'st a man that's like thyself,

Good Murder, stab him; he's a murderer. 100

Go thou with him, and when it is thy hap°

To find another that is like to thee,

Good Rapine, stab him; he is a ravisher.

Go thou with them, and in the emperor's court

There is a queen attended by a Moor; 105

Well shalt thou know her by thine own proportion,

For up and down she doth resemble thee:

I pray thee, do on them some violent death;

They have been violent to me and mine.

TAMORA

Well hast thou lessoned us; this shall we do. 110

But would it please thee, good Andronicus,

To send for Lucius, thy thrice-valiant son,

Who leads towards Rome a band of warlike Goths,

And bid him come and banquet at thy house:

When he is here, even at thy solemn° feast, 115

The emperor himself, and all thy foes,
And at thy mercy shall they stoop and kneel,
And on them shalt thou ease thy angry heart.
What says Andronicus to this device?

TITUS

Marcus, my brother! 'Tis sad Titus calls.

Enter MARCUS.

Go, gentle Marcus, to thy nephew Lucius;
Thou shalt inquire him out among the Goths.
Bid him repair^o to me and bring with him
Some of the chiefest princes of the Goths:
Bid him encamp his soldiers where they are;
Tell him the emperor and the empress too
Feast at my house, and he shall feast with them.
This do thou for my love, and so let him,
As he regards his agèd father's life.

MARCUS

This will I do, and soon return again.

[Exit.]

TAMORA

Now will I hence about thy business,
And take my ministers along with me.

TITUS

Nay, nay, let Rape and Murder stay with me,
Or else I'll call my brother back again,
And cleave to no revenge but Lucius.

TAMORA [Aside to her SONS.]

What say you, boys? Will you abide with him,
Whiles I go tell my lord the emperor
How I have governed our determined jest?^o
Yield to his humor, smooth and speak him fair,^o
And tarry with him till I turn again.

TITUS [Aside.]

I knew them all, though they supposed me mad;
And will o'erreach them in their own devices,
A pair of cursèd hellhounds and their dame.

DEMETRIUS

Madam, depart at pleasure, leave us here.

TAMORA

Farewell, Andronicus: Revenge now goes
To lay a complot^o to betray thy foes.

TITUS

I know thou dost; and, sweet Revenge, farewell.

[Exit TAMORA.]

CHIRON

Tell us, old man, how shall we be employed?

TITUS

Tut, I have work enough for you to do.
Publius, come hither, Caius, and Valentine!

[Enter PUBLIUS and others.]

PUBLIUS

What is your will?

TITUS

Know you these two?

PUBLIUS

The empress' sons, I take them: Chiron, Demetrius.

TITUS

Fie, Publius, fie! Thou art too much deceived:

124 repair come 139 governed . . . jest managed the jest

The one is Murder, and Rape is the other's name:
And therefore bind them, gentle Publius:
Caius and Valentine, lay hands on them:

Oft have you heard me wish for such an hour,

120 And now I find it: therefore bind them sure;

And stop their mouths if they begin to cry. [Exit.]

160

CHIRON

Villains, forbear! We are the empress' sons.

PUBLIUS

And therefore do we what we are commanded.

Stop close their mouths, let them not speak a word:

Is he sure bound? Look that you find them fast.

165

125

Enter TITUS Andronicus with a knife, and LAVINIA with a basin.

TITUS

Come, come, Lavinia; look, thy foes are bound.

130

Sirs, stop their mouths, let them not speak to me,

But let them hear what fearful words I utter.

O villains, Chiron and Demetrius!

Here stands the spring whom you have stained with mud,

170

This goodly summer with your winter mixed.

You killed her husband, and for that vile fault

Two of her brothers were condemned to death,

135

My hand cut off and made a merry jest:

Both her sweet hands, her tongue, and that more
dear

175

Than hands or tongue, her spotless chastity,

Inhuman traitors, you constrained and forced.

What would you say if I should let you speak?

140

Villains, for shame you could not beg for grace.

Hark, wretches, how I mean to martyr you.

180

This one hand yet is left to cut your throats,

Whiles that Lavinia 'tween her stumps doth hold

The basin that receives your guilty blood.

You know your mother means to feast with me,

And calls herself Revenge, and thinks me mad:

185

145

Hark, villains, I will grind your bones to dust,

And with your blood and it I'll make a paste,

And of the paste a coffin^o I will rear,

And make two pasties of your shameful heads,

And bid that strumpet, your unhallowed dam,

190

Like to the earth, swallow her own increase.^o

This is the feast that I have bid her to,

And this the banquet she shall surfeit on;

For worse than Philomel you used my daughter,

And worse than Progne^o I will be revenged.

195

150

And now prepare your throats. Lavinia, come,

Receive the blood; and when that they are dead,

Let me go grind their bones to powder small,

And with this hateful liquor temper^o it,

And in that paste let their vile heads be baked.

200

To make this banquet, which I wish may prove

More stern and bloody than the centaurs' feast.^o

[Scene III. Rome. Within Titus' house.]

Enter LUCIUS, MARCUS, and the GOTHs [with AARON a prisoner, and an ATTENDANT bearing Aaron's CHILD].

LUCIUS
Uncle Marcus, since 'tis my father's mind
That I repair^o to Rome, I am content.

GOTH
And ours with thine, befall what fortune will.

LUCIUS
Good uncle, take you in this barbarous Moor,
This ravenous tiger, this accursèd devil;
Let him receive no sust'nance, fetter him,
Till he be brought unto the empress' face
For testimony of her foul proceedings:
And see the ambush of our friends be strong;
I fear the emperor means no good to us. 10

AARON
Some devil whisper curses in my ear,
And prompt me, that my tongue may utter forth
The venomous malice of my swelling heart!

LUCIUS
Away, inhuman dog! Unhallowed slave!
Sirs, help our uncle to convey him in. 15
[GOTHs lead AARON in. Trumpets sound.]

The trumpets show the emperor is at hand.

Sound trumpets. Enter emperor [SATURNINUS] and empress [TAMORA], with TRIBUNES and others.

SATURNINUS
What, hath the firmament mo^o suns than one?

LUCIUS
What boots^o it thee to call thyself a sun?

MARCUS
Rome's emperor, and nephew, break the parle;^o
These quarrels must be quietly debated. 20
The feast is ready, which the careful^o Titus
Hath ordained to an honorable end,
For peace, for love, for league, and good to Rome.
Please you, therefore, draw nigh, and take your places.

SATURNINUS
Marcus, we will. 25

Trumpets sounding, enter TITUS, like a cook, placing the dishes, and LAVINIA with a veil over her face, [young LUCIUS, and others].

TITUS
Welcome, my lord; welcome, dread queen;
Welcome, ye warlike Goths; welcome, Lucius;
And welcome, all: although the cheer^o be poor,
'Twill fill your stomachs; please you eat of it.

SATURNINUS

Why art thou thus attired, Andronicus? 30

TITUS

Because I would be sure to have all well,
To entertain your highness and your empress.

TAMORA

We are beholding to you, good Andronicus.

TITUS

And if your highness knew my heart, you were.
My lord the emperor, resolve^o me this: 35
Was it well done of rash Virginius
To slay his daughter with his own right hand,
Because she was enforced,^o stained, and deflow' red?

SATURNINUS

It was, Andronicus.

TITUS

Your reason, mighty lord! 40

SATURNINUS

Because the girl should not survive her shame,
And by her presence still renew his sorrows.

TITUS

A reason mighty, strong, and effectual,
A pattern, precedent, and lively warrant,
For me, most wretched, to perform the like. 45
Die, die, Lavinia, and thy shame with thee,
And with thy shame thy father's sorrow die!

[He kills her.]

SATURNINUS

What hast thou done, unnatural and unkind?^o

TITUS

Killed her for whom my tears have made me blind.

I am as woeful as Virginius was, 50
And have a thousand times more cause than he
To do this outrage, and it now is done.

SATURNINUS

What, was she ravished? Tell who did the deed.

TITUS

Will't please you eat? Will't please your highness feed?

TAMORA

Why hast thou slain thine only daughter thus? 55

TITUS

Not I; 'twas Chiron and Demetrius:
They ravished her and cut away her tongue;
And they, 'twas they, that did her all this wrong.

SATURNINUS

Go, fetch them hither to us presently.

TITUS

Why, there they are, both bakèd in this pie, 60
Whereof their mother daintily hath fed,
Eating the flesh that she herself hath bred.
'Tis true, 'tis true; witness my knife's sharp point.

He stabs the empress [TAMORA].

SATURNINUS

LUCIUS

Can the son's eye behold his father bleed?
There's meed for meed,^o death for a deadly deed.

[Kills SATURNINUS.]

MARCUS

You sad-faced men, people and sons of Rome,
By uproars severed, as a flight of fowl
Scattered by winds and high tempestuous gusts,
O, let me teach you how to knit again
This scattered corn into one mutual sheaf,
These broken limbs again into one body.

ROMAN LORD

Let Rome herself be bane^o unto herself,
And she whom mighty kingdoms curtsy to,
Like a forlorn and desperate castaway,
Do shameful execution on herself,
But if^o my frosty signs and chaps of age,^o
Grave witnesses of true experience,
Cannot induce you to attend my words.

[To LUCIUS.]

Speak, Rome's dear friend, as erst^o our ancestor,^o
When with his solemn tongue he did discourse
To lovesick Dido's sad attending^o ear
The story of that baleful^o burning night,
When subtle Greeks surprised King Priam's Troy;
Tell us what Simon^o hath bewitched our ears,
Or who hath brought the fatal engine in
That gives our Troy, our Rome, the civil wound.
My heart is not compact^o of flint nor steel;
Nor can I utter all our bitter grief,
But floods of tears will drown my oratory
And break my utt'rance, even in the time
When it should move ye to attend me most,
And force you to commiseration.
Here's Rome's young captain, let him tell the tale,
While I stand by and weep to hear him speak.

LUCIUS

Then, gracious auditory, be it known to you
That Chiron and the damned Demetrius
Were they that murd'ered our emperor's brother;
And they it were that ravished our sister.
For their fell^o faults our brothers were beheaded,
Our father's tears despised, and basely cozened^o
Of that true hand that fought Rome's quarrel out
And sent her enemies unto the grave.
Lastly, myself unkindly banished,
The gates shut on me, and turned weeping out,
To beg relief among Rome's enemies,
Who drowned their enmity in my true tears
And oped their arms to embrace me as a friend:
I am the turned-forth, be it known to you,
That have preserved her welfare in my blood,
And from her bosom took the enemy's point,
Sheathing the steel in my advent'rous body.
Alas, you know I am no vaunter,^o I;

65

My scars can witness, dumb although they are,
That my report is just and full of truth.
But, soft!^o Methinks, I do digress too much,
Citing my worthless praise. O, pardon me,
For when no friends are by, men praise themselves.

115

MARCUS

Now is my turn to speak. Behold the child:

Of this was Tamora deliverèd,

120

The issue of an irreligious Moor,

Chief architect and plotter of these woes:

The villain is alive in Titus' house,

And as he is to witness, this is true.

Now judge what cause had Titus to revenge

125

These wrongs, unspeakable, past patience,

Or more than any living man could bear.

75

Now have you heard the truth. What say you,
Romans?

Have we done aught amiss, show us wherein,

And, from the place where you behold us pleading,

130

The poor remainder of Andronici

Will, hand in hand, all headlong hurl ourselves

And on the ragged^o stones beat forth our souls,

And make a mutual closure^o of our house.

Speak, Romans, speak, and if you say we shall,

135

Lo, hand in hand, Lucius and I will fall.

80

AEMILIUS

Come, come, thou reverend man of Rome,

And bring our emperor gently in thy hand,

Lucius our emperor; for well I know

The common voice do cry it shall be so.

140

85

MARCUS

Lucius, all hail, Rome's royal emperor!

90

[To SOLDIERS.]

Go, go into old Titus' sorrowful house,

And hither hale that misbelieving Moor,

To be adjudged some direful slaught'ring death,

As punishment for his most wicked life.

145

95

[Exeunt ATTENDANTS.]

Lucius, all hail, Rome's gracious governor!

[Cries of approval.]

LUCIUS

Thanks, gentle Romans: may I govern so,

To heal Rome's harms and wipe away her woe!

But, gentle people, give me aim^o awhile,

For nature puts me to a heavy task.

150

Stand all aloof; but, uncle, draw you near

To shed obsequious^o tears upon this trunk.

105

O, take this warm kiss on thy pale cold lips,

These sorrowful drops upon thy bloodstained face,

The last true duties of thy noble son!

155

110

MARCUS

Thy brother Marcus tenders on thy lips:

O, were the sum of these that I should pay

Countless and infinite, yet would I pay them!

 When they were living, warmed themselves on thine!
 O, now, sweet boy, give them their latest^o kiss.
 Bid him farewell; commit him to the grave;
 Do them^o that kindness, and take leave of them.

BOY

O, grandsire, grandsire! Ev'n with all my heart
 Would I were dead, so you did live again!
 O Lord, I cannot speak to him for weeping;
 My tears will choke me if I ope my mouth.

[Enter ATTENDANTS with AARON.]

ROMAN

You sad Andronici, have done with woes;
 Give sentence on this execrable wretch
 That hath been breeder of these dire events.

LUCIUS

There let him stand and rave and cry for food:
 If anyone relieves or pities him,
 For the offense he dies. This is our doom.^o

AARON

Ah, why should wrath be mute, and fury dumb?
 I am no baby, I, that with base prayers
 I should repent the evils I have done:
 Ten thousand worse than ever yet I did
 Would I perform, if I might have my will:
 If one good deed in all my life I did,
 I do repent it from my very soul.

185

LUCIUS

Some loving friends convey the emperor hence,
 And give him burial in his father's grave:
 My father and Lavinia shall forthwith
 Be closèd in our household's monument.
 As for that ravenous tiger, Tamora,
 No funeral rite, nor man in mourning weed,
 No mournful bell shall ring her burial;
 But throw her forth to beasts and birds to prey.
 Her life was beastly and devoid of pity,
 And being dead, let birds on her take pity.

THE TAMING OF THE SHREW

EDITED BY ROBERT B. HEILMAN

Introduction

At a number of points critics of The Taming of the Shrew are in general agreement. No one doubts that Christopher Sly is skillfully characterized—in his coarseness, his liveliness, his unaffectedness, his candor, his partial yielding to illusion, his incongruous mixture of two styles of life, his difficulty in acting the gentleman and attending to even a rather popular brand of theatrical fare. No one doubts that Petruchio and Kate are made, if not altogether well-rounded characters, at least human beings of vitality and imaginativeness, so that they have an interest and plausibility that stereotypes would not have. Each first acts in a way that suggests a rather single-ply, rigid nature, and then reveals a capacity for crucial action of another quality and value. No one doubts that the Bianca plot is of secondary interest, that it turns on a conventional love story, that it has in it more of intrigue than of the romantic intensity that Shakespeare would later develop in his lovers, and that, despite its manifest limitations, Shakespeare has pumped theatrical life into it by the multiplication of candidates for Bianca's hand and by a brisk representation of their schemes and styles. No one doubts that the suitors are effectively distinguished from each other—Gremio, the clownish overage lover; Tranio, the virtuoso quasi-competitor who loves to play the gentleman; Hortensio, who can settle for an unromantic down-to-earth arrangement like a sensible man in Restoration comedy; and Lucentio, the straight man and winner. No one doubts that the lesser characters are, in brief space, endowed with much individuality and substance—Baptista, the worried and well-meaning father; Grumio, the spirited servant who finds histrionic pleasure in opposite roles, whether taking it from Petruchio or dishing it out to other servants; Biondello, the lively-talking aide-de-camp in the war of love; the conscientious and frustrated Tailor; the earnest Pedant, grimly determined to succeed in his role as Lucentio's helpful father; the actual Vincentio, driven into a temper by successive experiences of being put upon.

No one doubts, finally, that all these materials from diverse sources (see A Note on the Sources, p. 327) have been combined with so much ingenuity that the play has a convincing air of unity. The play-within-a-play is an old device: no one feels any hiatus between the audience (Sly and the Lord's household) and the performers of a play (the actors presenting the two love affairs). The taming plot and the relatively straight love plot are brought together mechanically by the fact that the two women are sisters and that the marriage of one depends on that of the other; by the fact that Bianca's suitors collaborate in finding a suitor for Kate and, even more than that, in assisting him in his suit; by the fact that Petruchio first aids Hortensio and that Hortensio later plays along with Petruchio's game as wife-tamer; and by the fact that the final wedding celebration is a joint affair. The two actions are held together organically by the fact that the women wooed, the wooers, and their methods of wooing are in contrast, not only esthetically but, by implication, morally; and by the still more striking fact that the apparent contrast, which seems so obvious at first, is reversed in the final act. When Kate and Bianca undergo a partial change of roles at the end, we see them, not simply as ending parallel plots, but as ironically revealing different aspects of one fundamental situation—the relations of husbands and wives.

Within the last decade critics have begun to detect a still subtler form of unity, one that considerably raises the esthetic status of the play. This is "the unity of 'supposes.'" When Lucentio is made to use the phrase "counterfeit supposes" (V.i.115), Shakespeare is alluding,¹ it is assumed, to his source, Gascoigne's play Supposes; in this title Gascoigne is Englishing the title of his source play, Ariosto's I Suppositi. The idea behind these words is that of "posing," of assuming identities other than one's own. From Gascoigne Shakespeare got the Bianca plot, which is of course full of assumed or "supposed" identities: Hortensio as Litio, Lucentio as Cambio, Tranio as Lucentio, and the Pedant as Vincentio; and then the true Vincentio is accused of being someone else posing as Vincentio. But recent criticism has observed that "supposes" are not limited either to physical identity or to the Bianca plot. Within the Bianca plot, Bianca and the widow are both "supposed" to be agreeable women who will be accommodating wives. That is, the dramatic treatment encourages us to see that beyond the mere putting on of a false name and a false social or professional identity may lie the putting on of a personality or moral identity (whether as a long-lasting habit or as a short-term device to secure a given end).

Once given such hints, the reader sees quickly a new and closer tie between the Bianca plot and the Sly plot (the Induction): in each, the basic mechanism is the use of "supposed" identities. The Lord and members of his household pretend to be Sly's servants and his wife. But we have hardly noted this when we see, also, that the mainspring of the Induction is a subtler alteration of identity: Sly is persuaded, or at least half-persuaded, that he is a lord. The Lord and his men have voluntarily changed identity in order to cause Sly involuntarily to change identity (just as Bianca's lovers, so to speak, have voluntarily changed identity in order to cause Bianca to accept them). From here it is only a quick step to the remarkable kinship that the main Petruchio-Kate plot has with the other two: Petruchio voluntarily assumes an identity ("poses" as a contrary, willful, autocratic, irrational man, a "shrew") in order to cause Kate involuntarily to change identity, to give up shrewishness and become a charming, cooperative wife. In three plots a "supposition" or impersonation is the means of inducing a person to act in a certain way: a man accepts a "wife" and two women accept husbands. "Acting" is the means of moving people toward a desired feeling and role; in this sense The Taming anticipates the much-quoted line in As You Like It, "All the world's a stage. . . ."

But there is a still subtler element in the functional identity of parts which creates the unity of the play. The "supposed" servants of Sly not only tell him he is a lord but hold before him verbal pictures—of omnipotence, luxury, pleasures—that move him in their own way toward imaginative acceptance of his high role. At least he accepts the external circumstances in which he finds himself; perhaps he even accepts the idea of a lordly personality in himself. The further he goes in this direction, the more fully the Induction anticipates the taming plot. For a part of Petruchio's method (by no means all of it) is to hold before Kate a picture of what she potentially is and may become if she will but cease resisting it—a "most patient, sweet, and virtuous wife" (III.ii.194). It is possible to assume that she imaginatively accepts this picture of herself and, under the stimulus of Petruchio's love, makes it come true. If this interpretation is valid, then the play—not only one of Shakespeare's earliest but a farcical one—has advanced remarkably at least to the edge of a philosophical realm. For it induces us to reflect on the belief in the primacy of the idea, on the creative powers of the imagination, on the view that, in Hamlet's phrase that has become a cliché, "Thinking makes it so." Hence The Taming, never thought one of Shakespeare's high achievements, moves up into the company of the truly Shakespearean, in which, however stereotyped the exterior and however obvious the popular appeal, there is a heart of profound meaningfulness and hence enduring excellence. It is possible that a once underrated play may be in danger of being overrated.

So far we have been summarizing the main grounds of agreement among critics, especially the grounds on which The Taming has been praised. However, the argument for unity depends somewhat on how we understand the change in Kate—transformation, acceptance of discipline, discovery of true nature, rejection of an assumed role? This is not so demonstrable as is the tight interweaving of plots at the level of overt action. When it is asserted that the play uncovers Bianca as the real shrew, and reveals that Kate is not a shrew at all or else was only pretending to be a shrew to serve her own ends, surely we come into the realm of the arguable. There is something of the arguable about The Taming; indeed there has been, alongside the areas of unanimity, considerable difference of opinion about it. We can profitably change our course, then, and approach the play from the other side—in terms of the disagreements, or at least the changes of opinion, about it.

One argument grows out of sheer factual uncertainty: did Shakespeare, or did he not, keep Sly in the play for occasional comments in the later acts, and for an epilogue completing the dramatic "frame"? In The Taming of a Shrew, a play related to this one (see A Note on the Sources, p. 327), Sly stayed on. Hence, what about The Shrew? There are various opinions: (1) Shakespeare forgot about Sly; (2) Shakespeare originally wrote a Sly epilogue, but it dropped out; (3) the loss of Sly, though not a major blot, is unfortunate; (4) the loss of Sly is fortunate, and shows Shakespeare's artistry. If Shakespeare did originally give Sly the closing lines, and if these did disappear—from an acting script and hence from the printer's copy—the only compelling reason for this (in the opinion of the present editor) was not esthetic but practical: it simplified production problems such as size of cast. There is no merit in the argument that the elimination of Sly prevented an anticlimax, for this begs the question whether a Sly epilogue would inevitably be anticlimactic. There is likewise little merit in the argument that the Sly story comes to its logical end when Sly takes himself for a lord and thus in anticipation parallels Kate's transformation into a lady. For, while Kate can, with effort, retain her new moral identity, Sly cannot, with any amount of effort, retain his new moral identity. Hence it is possible to visualize a very effective Sly epilogue which would work by contrast, making us note the discrepancy between an imaginable change of being and a temporary change of status, between a hypnotism for the therapy of the subject and the imposition of a dream for the fun of the observers. We can imagine, also, the use of Sly for a cynical irony such as we know in "black comedy": the end of his new lordship might hint the diminution of Kate's new ladyship. Or, in a lighter vein, Sly might entertain, as he does in A Shrew, visions of being a wife-tamer, and thus introduce an implicit contrast between those who can pull off such an exploit and those who cannot. Well, the imagining of alternative endings serves only one purpose: showing that the present one is not necessarily ideal. Surely most readers feel spontaneously that, in the treatment of Sly in The Shrew, something is left uncomfortably hanging, and many stage directors borrow additional Sly materials from A Shrew.

While Petruchio and Kate, as we have noted, are admired as lively and charming creatures, forerunners of Benedick and Beatrice in Much Ado About Nothing, there is lack of agreement on their natures and on the nature of the transactions between them. No one doubts, of course, that they come to love each other; the problem is what they bring to that love and how they exercise it. The older view was that Petruchio was a very skillful psychologist, one who really knew how to handle a difficult woman. On the other hand, many commentators, especially in the nineteenth century, tended to feel that Petruchio's methods were not civilized and that, though they may once have been countenanced, they would never do in modern life. That sense of real life, of what it is and should be, which repeatedly infiltrates literary judgments, appears in estimates of Petruchio: there have been editors who get on the bandwagon and declare him out of date and yet rather wistfully intimate that it is too bad he has gone out of date while the world still has need of him. But in repudiating Petruchio's methods, critics have had to find ways of redeeming Petruchio, since the play obviously does not make him an intolerable man. So it has been said that he is not so much "taming" Kate as leading her to a needed discipline; that in no essential does he pass the bounds of gentlemanliness; that he simply offers Kate a picture of male strength that can elicit the respect without which she cannot love; that the heart of his method is a love which begets love. Here we have Petruchio transmuted from the relentless and mechanical taskmaster, required by a monstrous female, into a remarkably gifted gentleman-lover who simply brings out the best in an extraordinary woman—a best that, as it comes out, totally displaces a worst that had once seemed pretty much the whole story. This view is much more in tune with modern views of the right relations between men and women. But this interpretation too, if not utterly replaced, has been given a new twist and all but turned upside down by a still more "modern" view. In this most recent reading of the play, Petruchio, far from "taming" or subtly having a beneficent influence on a woman, is in reality tamed by her. While having the illusion of conquering, he is conquered by her; when she says what he wants to hear, she is being ironic, undermining him with a show of acquiescence and virtually a wink to the audience. In this view, Shakespeare wrote What Every Woman Knows over three hundred years before Barrie.

Kate, of course, has been done over in the same way. Once she was naturally and unquestionably taken to be a shrew, that is, a type of woman widely known in life and constantly represented in song and story. Then critics began to contend that Kate differed from the stereotype: that instead of being simply aggressive and contentious, she was ripe for love, wanted love, and really suffered from the fact that, inside the family and out, Bianca more readily attracted affection. Here is the move toward seeing Kate, not as an allegorical abstraction, a figure of shrewishness, but as an actual human being with impulses and motives experienced by all of us. This move goes still further. In one modern view (that of Nevill Coghill and the late Professor Goddard), Kate's disagreeableness of manner is not a primary fact of personality but is caused by lack of affection at home: Baptista, a "family tyrant," has petted and spoiled Bianca, and Kate is the unhappy by-product of parental irresponsibility and stupidity ("gross partiality" toward Bianca). In this view, Kate is very much like a modern problem child. But the distinguished director of Shakespeare, Margaret Webster, offers us a still different Kate. To Miss Webster, Kate is a strong, intelligent, independent woman who is stuck in a stuffy household, "despises" her father and her "horrid little sister," thinks the local boys "beneath contempt," and finds in her fresh and vehement style the only available outlet for the talents and energy of a superior woman. Here we have the feminist's Kate, the modern woman whom it is perilous to hold back from self-expression and leadership—a far cry from the nagging Xanthippe that every now and then, from the beginning of time, would afflict a husband doomed, unless he took strong measures, to be ridiculed for his misfortune. But Goddard and Miss Webster agree in one thing: it is really Kate who takes over Petruchio, takes him over by simulating an obedience that is a paradoxical mastery. Her last long speech, then, is only a prolonged ironic commentary on the subordination of wives, and could be taken literally only by naïve believers in male supremacy.

As might be expected, critics differ on where Shakespeare stood. The most widely held assumption is that Shakespeare believed in the subordination of wives, and that in his age he could hardly do otherwise. While some readers accept this as calmly as most people accept what has happened long ago, others regret that Shakespeare was so little in accord with modern views; as early as 1897, even G. B. Shaw could insist that "the last scene is altogether disgusting to modern sensibility." The reader with a severe case of "modern sensibility" can either join Shaw in slapping Shakespeare's wrist or else go him one better by arguing that Shakespeare was really a modern at heart. The unspoken assumption here is that the "divine Shakespeare" could not possibly disagree with our answers to fundamental problems, especially those we have come to more recently. So various commentators say flatly that Shakespeare did not believe in the subordination of wives. Of Kate's long speech on the duty of wives (V.ii.138-181), Goddard, amazed at three centuries of acceptance, exclaims, "as if Shakespeare could ever have meant it!" But only Miss Webster faced the fact that to make Shakespeare modern, one had to do something better with the wifely-duty speech than ignore it or just assert that, though the longest speech in the play, it doesn't count. So she went whole hog and treated the speech as Kate's choicest joke of all on Petruchio, who from now on, we judge, will be simply a complacent husband, happy in the laughable illusion that he has an obedient wife.

It is doubtful that we can know "what Shakespeare thought," and in a sense it does not matter; what is important is how the play is to be taken (it is by no means impossible that the play "believes" something other than what Shakespeare as a man may have "believed"). All the aspects of it that have been taken now in one way, now in another, come together pretty well in the issue of what the play is to be called. By many critics it is called a "farce" and is discussed as a farce; yet there are those who deny vigorously that it is a farce. This difference of opinion is caused by a loose use of the term farce. Some people take farce as simply hurly-burly theater, with much slapstick, roughhouse (Petruchio with a whip, in the older productions), pratfalls, general confusion, trickery, uproar, gags, and so on. Yet such characteristics, which do appear generally in farce, are surface manifestations. What we need to identify is the "spirit of farce" which lies behind them. We may then be able to get away from insisting either that The Shrew is farce or that it is not farce, and to get on to seeing what it does with the genre of farce.

A genre is a conventionalized way of dealing with actuality, and different genres represent different habits of the human mind, or minister to the capacity for finding pleasure in different styles of representation. "Romance," for instance, is the genre that conceives of obstacles, dangers, and threats, especially those of an unusual or spectacular kind, as yielding to human ingenuity, spirit, or just good luck. On the other hand, "naturalism," as a literary mode, conceives of man as overcome by the pressure of outer forces, especially those of a dull, glacier-like, grinding persistence. The essential procedure of farce is to deal with people as if they lack, largely or totally, the physical, emotional, intellectual, and moral sensitivity that we think of as "normal." The enormous popularity of farce for several thousand years indicates that, though "farce" is often a term of disparagement, a great many people, no doubt all of us at times, take pleasure in seeing human beings acting as if they were very limited human beings. Farce offers a spectacle that resembles daily actuality but lets us participate without feeling the responsibilities and liabilities that the situation would normally evoke. Perhaps we feel superior to the diminished men and women in the plot; perhaps we harmlessly work off aggressions (since verbal and physical assaults are frequent in farce). Participation in farce is easy on us; in it we escape the full complexity of our own natures and cut up without physical or moral penalties. Farce is the realm without pain or conscience. Farce offers a holiday from vulnerability, consequences, costs. It is the opposite of all the dramas of disaster in which a man's fate is too much for him. It carries out our desire to simplify life by a selective anesthetizing of the whole person; man retains all his energy yet never gets really hurt. The give-and-take of life becomes a brisk skirmishing in which one needs neither health insurance nor liability insurance; when one is on the receiving end and has to take it, he bounces back up resiliently, and when he dishes it out, his pleasure in conquest is never undercut by the guilt of inflicting injury.

In farce, the human personality is without depth. Hence action is not slowed down by thought or by the friction of competing motives. Everything goes at high speed, with dash, variety, never a pause for stock-taking, and ever an athlete's quick glance ahead at the action coming up next. No sooner do the players come in than the Lord plans a show to help bamboozle Sly. As soon as Baptista appears with his daughters and announces the marriage priority, other lovers plan to find a man for Kate, Lucentio falls in love with Bianca and hits on an approach in disguise, Petruchio plans to go for Kate, Bianca's lovers promise him support, Petruchio begins his suit and introduces Hortensio into the scramble of disguised lovers. Petruchio rushes through the preliminary business with Baptista and the main business with Kate, and we have a marriage. The reader is hurried over to the rivalries of Bianca's lovers, making bids to Baptista and appealing directly to the girl herself, back to Kate's wedding-day scandals and out into the country for the postmarital welter of disturbances; then we shift back and forth regularly from rapid action in the Kate plot to almost equally rapid action in the Bianca plot. And so on. The driving pace made possible, and indeed necessitated by, the absence of depth is brilliantly managed.

In the absence of depth one is not bothered by distractions; in fact, what are logically distractions are not felt as such if they fit into the pattern of carefree farcical hammer and tongs, cut and thrust. At Petruchio's first appearance, the "knocking at the gate" confusion is there for fun, not function (I.ii.5-43). The first hundred lines (in IV.i) between Grumio and Curtis are a lively rattle, full of the verbal and physical blows of farce, but practically without bearing on the action. Kate is virtually forgotten for sixty lines (in IV.iii) as Petruchio and Grumio fall into their virtuoso game of abusing the Tailor. Furthermore, action without depth has a mechanical, automatic quality: when two Vincentios appear (V.i), the characters do not reason about the duplication but, frustrated by confusion and bluffing, quickly have recourse to blows and insults, accusations of madness and chicanery, and threats of arrest—standard procedures in farce from Plautus on. Vincentio's "thus strangers may be halèd and abused" is not a bad description of the manners of farce. Mechanical action, in turn, often tends to symmetrical effects (shown most clearly in The Comedy of Errors, in which Shakespeare has two pairs of identical twins): the lovers of Kate and Bianca first bargain with Baptista, then approach the girls; Hortensio and Tranio (as Lucentio) resign their claims to Bianca in almost choral fashion; Bianca and the Widow respond identically to the requests of their husbands. In this final scene we have striking evidence of the manipulation of personality in the interest of symmetrical effect. Shakespeare unmistakably wants a double reversal of roles at the end, a symmetry of converse movements. The new Kate has developed out of a shrew, so the old Bianca must develop into a shrew. The earlier treatment of her hardly justifies her sudden transformation, immediately after marriage, into a cool, offhand, challenging, and even contemptuous near-bitch. Like many another character in farce, she succumbs to the habits of the generic form. Yet by some modern critics she is treated as harshly as if from the start she were a particularly obnoxious female.

All these effects come from a certain arbitrarily limited sense of personality. Those who have this personality are not really hurt, do not think much, are not much troubled by scruples. Farce often turns on practical jokes, in which the sadistic impulse is not restrained by any sense of injury to the victim. It would never occur to anyone that Sly might be pained or humiliated by letting himself act as a lord and then being let down. No one hesitates to make rough jokes about Kate (even calling her "fiend of hell") in her hearing. No one putting on a disguise to dupe others has any ethical inhibitions; the end always justifies the means. When Kate "breaks the lute to" Hortensio, farce requires that he act terrified; but it does not permit him to be injured or really resentful or grieved by the loss of the lute, as a man in a nonfarcical world might well be. Verbal abuse is almost an art form; it does not hurt, as it would in ordinary life. No one supposes that the victims of Petruchio's manhandling and tantrums—the priest and sexton at the wedding, the servants and tradesmen at his home—really feel the outrageous treatment that they get. When Petruchio and Hortensio call "To her" to Kate and the Widow, it is like starting a dogfight or cockfight. Petruchio's order to Kate to bring out the other wives is like having a trained dog retrieve a stick. The scene is possible because both husbands and all wives are not endowed with full human personalities; if they were, they could not function as trainer, retriever, and sticks.

In identifying the farcical elements in The Shrew, we have gradually shifted from the insensitivity that the characters must have to the mechanicalness of their responses. These people rarely think, hesitate, deliberate, or choose; they act just as quickly and unambiguously as if someone had pressed a control button. Farce simplifies life by making it painless and automatic; indeed the two qualities come together in the concept of man as machine. (The true opposite of farce is Čapek's R. U. R., in which man-like robots actually begin to feel.) There is a sense in which we might legitimately call the age of computers a farcical one, for it lets us feel that basic choices are made without mental struggle or will or anxiety, and as speedily and inevitably as a series of human ninepins falling down one after another on the stage when each is bumped by the one next to it. "Belike you mean," says Kate to Petruchio, "to make a puppet of me" (IV.iii.104). It is what farce does to all characters. Now the least obvious illustration of the farcical view of life lies, not in some of the peripheral goings-on that we have been observing, but in the title action itself: the taming of the shrew. Fundamentally—we will come shortly to the necessary qualifications—Kate is conceived of as responding automatically to a certain kind of calculated treatment, as automatically as an animal to the devices of a skilled trainer. Petruchio not only uses the word tame more than once, but openly compares his method to that used in training falcons (IV.i.180 ff.). There is no reason whatever to suppose that this was not meant quite literally. Petruchio is not making a great jest or developing a paradoxical figure but describing a process taken at face value. He tells exactly what he has done and is doing—withholding food and sleep until the absolute need of them brings assent. (We hardly note that up to a point the assumptions are those of the "third degree" and of the more rigorous "cures" of bad habits: making it more unprofitable to assert one's will or one's bad habits than to act differently.) Before he sees Kate, he announces his method: he will assert as true the opposite of whatever she says and does and is, that is to say, will frustrate the manifestations of her will and establish the dominance of his own. Without naming them, he takes other steps that we know to be important in animal training. From the beginning he shows that he will stop at nothing to achieve his end, that he will not hesitate for a second to do anything necessary—to discard all dignity, or carry out any indecorous act or any outrageousness that will serve. He creates an image of utter invincibility, of having no weakness through which he can be appealed to. He does not use a literal whip, such as stage Petruchios were once addicted to, but he unmistakably uses a symbolic whip. Like a good trainer, however, he uses the carrot, too—not only marriage, but a new life, a happier personality for Kate. Above all, he offers love; in the end, the trainer succeeds best who makes the trainee feel the presence of something warmer than technique, rigor, and invincibility. Not that Petruchio fakes love, but that love has its part, ironically, in a process that is farcically conceived and that never wholly loses the markings of farce.

Only in farce could we conceive of the occurrence, almost in a flash, of that transformation of personality which, as known only too well in modern experience, normally requires a long, gradual, painstaking application of psychotherapy. True, conversion is believable and does happen, but even as a secular experience it requires a prior development of readiness, or an extraordinary revelatory shock, or both. (In the romantic form of this psychic event, an old hag, upon marriage to the knight, suddenly turns into a beautiful maiden.) Kate is presented initially as a very troubled woman; aggressiveness and tantrums are her way of feeling a sense of power. Though very modern, the argument that we see in her the results of paternal unkindness is not very impressive. For one thing, recent research on infants—if we may risk applying heavy science to light farce—suggests that basic personality traits precede, and perhaps influence, parental attitudes to children. More important, the text simply does not present Baptista as the overbearing and tyrannical father that he is sometimes said to be. Kate has made him almost as unhappy as she is, and driven him toward Bianca; nevertheless, when he heavily handicaps Bianca in the matrimonial sweepstakes, he is trying to even things up for the daughter that he naturally thinks is a poor runner. Nor is he willing to marry her off to Petruchio simply to get rid of her; "her love," he says, "is all in all." On her wedding day he says, kindly enough, "I cannot blame thee now to weep," and at the risk of losing husbands for both daughters he rebukes Petruchio (III.ii.96 ff.). (The Baptista that some commentators describe would surely have said nothing but "What do you expect, you bitch?") We cannot blacken Baptista to save Kate. Shakespeare presents her binding and beating Bianca (II.i.1 ff.) to show that he is really committed to a shrew; such episodes make it hard to defend the view that she is an innocent victim or is posing as a shrew out of general disgust. To sum up: in real life her disposition would be difficult to alter permanently, but farce secures its pleasurable effect by assuming a ready and total change in response to the stimuli applied by Petruchio, as if he were going through an established and proved routine. On the other hand, only farce makes it possible for Petruchio to be so skillful a tamer, that is, so unerring, so undeviating, so mechanical an enforcer of the rules for training in falconry. If Petruchio were by nature the disciplinarian that he acts for a while, he would hardly change after receiving compliance; and if he were, in real life, the charming and affectionate gentleman that he becomes in the play, he would find it impossible so rigorously to play the falcon-tamer, to outbully the bully, especially when the bully lies bleeding on the ground, for this role would simply run afoul of too much of his personality. The point here is not that the play is "unrealistic" (this would be a wholly irrelevant criticism) but that we can understand how a given genre works by testing it against the best sense of reality that we can bring to bear. It is the farcical view of life that makes possible the treatment of both Kate and Petruchio.

But this picture, of course, is incomplete; for the sake of clarity we have been stressing the purely generic in The Shrew, and gliding over the specific variations. Like any genre, farce is a convention, not a straitjacket; it is a fashion, capable of many variations. Genre provides a perspective, which in the individual work can be used narrowly or inclusively: comedy of manners, for instance, can move toward the character studies of James's novels or toward the superficial entertainments of Terence Rattigan. Shakespeare hardly ever uses a genre constrictively. In both The Comedy of Errors and The Taming of the Shrew, the resemblances between which are well known, Shakespeare moves away from the limited conception of personality that we find in "basic farce" such as that of Plautus, who influences both these plays. True, he protects both main characters in The Shrew against the expectable liabilities that would make one a less perfect reformer, and the other less than a model reformer, but he is unwilling to leave them automatons, textbook types of reformer and reformer. So he equips both with a good deal of intelligence and feeling that they would not have in elementary farce. Take sex, for instance. In basic farce, sex is purely a mechanical response, with no more overtones of feeling than ordinary hunger and thirst; the normal "love affair" is an intrigue with a courtesan. Like virtually all Renaissance lovers, Petruchio tells Kate candidly that he proposes to keep warm "in thy bed" (II.i.260). But there is no doubt that Petruchio, in addition to wanting a good financial bargain and enjoying the challenge of the shrew, develops real warmth of feeling for Kate as an individual—a warmth that makes him strive to bring out the best in her, keep the training in a tone of jesting, well-meant fantasy, provide Kate with face-saving devices (she is "curst . . . for policy" and only "in company"—II.i.285, 298), praise her for her virtues (whether she has them or not) rather than blame her for her vices, never fall into boorishness, repeatedly protest his affection for her, and by asking a kiss at a time she thinks unsuitable show that he really wants it. Here farce expands toward comedy of character by using a fuller range of personality. Likewise with Kate. The fact that she is a shrew does not mean that she cannot have hurt feelings, as it would in a plainer farce; indeed a shrew may be defined—once she develops beyond a mere stereotype—as a person who has an excess of hurt feelings and is taking revenge on the world for them. We do not, because we dislike the revenge, deny the painful feelings that may lie behind. Shakespeare has chosen to show some of those feelings, not making Kate an insentient virago on the one hand, or a pathetic victim on the other. She is jealous of Bianca and her lovers, she accuses Baptista of favoritism (in the opinion of the present editor, without justification); on her wedding day she suffers real anguish rather than simply an automatic, conventionally furious resolve for retaliation. The painful emotions take her way beyond the limitations of the essentially pain-free personality of basic farce. Further, she is witty, though, truth to tell, the first verbal battle between her and Petruchio, like various other such scenes, hardly goes beyond verbal farce, in which words are mechanical jokes or blows rather than an artistic game that delights by its quality, and in which all the speed of the short lines hardly conceals the heavy labors of the dutiful but uninspired punster (the best jokes are the bawdy ones). Kate has imagination. It shows first in a new human sympathy when she defends the servants against Petruchio (IV.i.145, 158–59). Then it develops into a gay, inspired gamesomeness that rivals Petruchio's own. When he insists, "It shall be what o'clock I say it is" (IV.iii.194) and "[The sun] shall be moon or star or what I list" (IV.v.7), he is at one level saying again that he will stop at nothing, at no irrationality, as tamer; but here he moves the power game into a realm of fancy in which his apparent willfulness becomes the acting of the creative imagination. He is a poet, and he asks her, in effect, less to kiss the rod than to join in the game of playfully transforming ordinary reality. It is the final step in transforming herself. The point here is that, instead of not catching on or simply sulking, Kate has the dash and verve to join in the fun, and to do it with skill and some real touches of originality.

This scene on the road to Padua (IV.v.1–78) is the high point of the play. From here on, it tends to move back closer to the boundaries of ordinary farce. When Petruchio asks a kiss, we do have human beings with feelings, not robots; but the key line in the scene, which is sometimes missed, is Petruchio's "Why, then let's home again./Come sirrah, let's away" (V.i.145–46). Here Petruchio is making the same threat that he made at IV.v.8–9, that is, not playing an imaginative game but hinting the symbolic whip, even though the end is a compliance that she is inwardly glad to give. The whole wager scene, as we have already noted, falls essentially within the realm of farce: the responses are largely mechanical, as is their symmetry. Kate's final long speech on the obligations and fitting style of wives (V.ii.138–81) we can think of as a more or less automatic statement of a generally held doctrine. The easiest way to deal with it is to say that we no longer believe in it, just as we no longer believe in the divine right of kings which is an important dramatic element in many Shakespeare plays. But to some interpreters, Kate has become such a charming heroine that they cannot stand her being anything less than a modern feminist. Hence the claim that she is speaking ironically. There are two arguments against this interpretation. One is that a careful reading of the lines will show that most of them have to be taken literally; only the last seven or eight lines can be read with ironic overtones, but this means, at most, a return to the imaginative gamesomeness of IV.v, rather than a denial of the doctrine formally asserted. The second is that forty-five lines of straight irony would be too much to be borne; it would be inconsistent with the straightforwardness of most of the play, and it would really turn Kate back into a hidden shrew whose new technique was sarcastic indirection, side-mouthing at the audience while her not very intelligent husband, bamboozled, cheered her on. It would be a poor triumph. If one has to modernize the speech of the obedient wife, a better way to do it is to develop a hint of Professor Goddard's: that behind a passé doctrine lies a continuing truth. That truth is that there are real differences between the sexes, and that they are to be kept in mind. That view at least does not strain the spirit of Kate's speech.

The Katolatry which has developed in recent years reveals the romantic tendency to create heroes and heroines by denying the existence of flaws in them and by imputing all sorts of flaws in their families and other associates. We have already seen how the effort to save Kate at the beginning has resulted in an untenable effort to make Baptista into a villainous, punitive father and Bianca into a calculating little devil whose inner shrewishness slowly comes out. But it is hard to see why, if we are to admire Kate's spirit of open defiance at the beginning, and her alleged ironic defiance at the end, we should not likewise admire the spirit of Bianca and Hortensio's widow at the end. It is equally hard to see why we should admire Kate's quiet, ironic, what-every-woman-knows victory, as some would have it, over an attractive man at the end, but should not admire Petruchio's open victory over a very unattractive woman earlier. In fact, it is a little difficult to know just what Kate's supposed victory consists in. The play gives no evidence that from now on she will be twisting her husband around her finger. The evidence is rather that she will win peace and quiet and contentment by giving in to his wishes, and that her willingness will entirely eliminate unreasonable and autocratic wishes in him. But after all, the unreasonable and the autocratic are his strategy, not his nature; he gives up an assumed vice, while Kate gives up a real one. The truth is that Kate's great victory is, with Petruchio's help, over herself; she has come to accept herself as having enough merits so that she can be content without having the last word and scaring everybody off. To see this means to acknowledge that she was originally a shrew, whatever virtues may also have been latent in her personality.

What Shakespeare has done is to take an old, popular farcical situation and turn it into a well-organized, somewhat complex, fast-moving farce of his own. He has worked with the basic conceptions of farce—mainly that of a somewhat limited personality that acts and responds in a mechanical way and hence moves toward a given end with a perfection not likely if all the elements in human nature were really at work. So the tamer never fails in his technique, and the shrew responds just as she should. Now this situation might have tempted the dramatist to let his main characters be flat automatons—he a dull and rough whipwielder, and she a stubborn intransigent until beaten into insensibility (as in the ballad that was perhaps a Shakespearean source). Shakespeare, however, makes a gentleman and lady of his central pair. As tamer, Petruchio is a gay and witty and precocious artist and, beyond that, an affectionate man; and hence, a remarkable therapist. In Kate, Shakespeare has imagined, not merely a harridan who is incurable or a moral stepchild driven into a misconduct by mistreatment, but a difficult woman—a shrew, indeed—who combines willfulness with feelings that elicit sympathy, with imagination, and with a latent cooperativeness that can bring this war of the sexes to an honorable settlement. To have started with farce, to have stuck to the main lines of farce, and yet to have got so much of the supra-farcical into farce—this is the achievement of The Taming of the Shrew, and the source of the pleasure that it has always given.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCES

Some time ago it was a rather generally held opinion that The Taming of the Shrew was Shakespeare's reworking of an anonymous play, The Taming of a Shrew (the conventional shorter form of a much longer title), published in 1594. There were at least two variations of the basic theory—one, that A Shrew itself was based on an earlier play; the other (and more widely held), that there was an intermediate play between A Shrew and Shakespeare's The Shrew. Such speculations were ways of explaining the similarities and dissimilarities between the two plays, and to some extent, also, the apparent inconsistencies within the plays. The latter led likewise, it may be added, to much theorizing about authorship: A Shrew was attributed to various contemporary dramatists whose styles were supposedly recognizable in it, and The Shrew was believed to reveal the hand, not only of Shakespeare, but of a less gifted collaborator.

Another theory of the relationship between The Shrew and A Shrew was that they were siblings—different offspring of a single parent-play (either by Shakespeare or by someone else). Another theory of authorship was that Shakespeare himself had helped write A Shrew. Long before the putting forward of these hypotheses, Alexander Pope (1725) attributed A Shrew entirely to Shakespeare, and in his History of English Poetry (1895–1910) W. J. Courthope expressed the same conviction, though it ran counter to orthodox views at the time. The justification for mentioning these points of view here is that, in different ways and in different measure, they anticipate what is apparently the prevailing view at the present time—namely, that Shakespeare's The Shrew is the prior play and that A Shrew in some way derives from it. (The first expression of this view was Samuel Hickson's essay of 1850 on The Shrew.) One theory is that A Shrew is a "memorial reconstruction" of The Shrew, that is, an acting company's effort to put together from memory a script perhaps sold to another company. This explains parts of A Shrew that sound like badly remembered parts of The Shrew, but it hardly explains the larger extent of the Christopher Sly framework plot in A Shrew, the addition of a third daughter for Baptista, or the changing of the names of all the characters. To deal with these problems there is the hypothesis that, though A Shrew is based on The Shrew, it is a conscious revision, for whatever reasons, rather than a reassembling from memory. Obviously, much is still left unexplained. But that is true of all these theories, most of which are based on assumptions and likelihoods rather than on very hard evidence. In the end, we do not really know what the relation between the two plays is.

Scholars who believed that The Shrew was the later play tended to date it after 1595. Those who accept it as the prior play date it 1592 or 1593.

If The Shrew is the prior play, the problem of sources is simplified, for we need not consider the differences between the two plays. The Shrew is usually admired for its ingenious merging of three different bodies of material—the Christopher Sly business in the Induction, the taming plot, and the straight love story involving rival lovers (Bianca, Lucentio, and so on)—that are all, so to speak, old stories.

The story of the trick played upon the sleeper when he awakes is at least as old as the Arabian Nights (collected about 1450), in which Harun al-Rashid victimizes Abu Hassan. One scholar theorizes that ambassadors from the East may have told this story to Philip the Good (1396–1467), Duke of Burgundy, who is said to have played the trick upon a drunken man in Brussels. An officer of the duke told it to the theologian and educator Juan Luis Vives (1492–1540), who reported it in a letter (Epistolarum . . . Farrago, Antwerp, 1556). From him it passed to Heuterus, whose version in De rebus burgundicis (1584) is the most probable immediate source for Shakespeare

(from Heuterus the story went via France into other English works later than The Shrew). Shakespeare may also have known the story in Richard Edwards' 1570 version, one of a collection of prose tales now lost.

In the taming plot Shakespeare utilized another old story of which there were versions in many countries. A possible immediate source is a long ballad (over 1100 lines) published in mid-sixteenth century, A Merry Jest of a Shrewd and Curst Wife Lapped in Morel's Skin for Her Good Behavior, but this is a cruder story of a rough and unsubtle husband ("Morel's Skin" is the salt hide of an old horse that the husband kills). Shakespeare, as Professor Hosley has shown, follows the humanist tradition embodied in, and perhaps derives some details from, Erasmus' colloquy, A Merry Dialogue Declaring the Properties of Shrewd Shrews and Honest Wives (1557). Several features of the Shakespeare story had appeared in Don Juan Manuel's El Conde Lucanor, a fourteenth-century collection of tales of which there was a sixteenth-century edition. Sisters somewhat like Baptista's daughters are contrasted in a tale in Giovanni Straparola's Piacevoli notti (1553).

Of the three main elements in The Shrew, the Bianca story is the only one whose source may be securely identified. That source is George Gascoigne's Supposes (acted 1566, published 1573; alluded to in The Shrew, V.i.115). Gascoigne's play, in turn, is a translation of an Italian play, Ariosto's I Suppositi (first acted at Ferrara in 1509). Ariosto, in turn, makes use of comic conventions that derive from the Romans Plautus and Terence and the Athenian Menander. The names Tranio and Grumio both come from Plautus. The Latin lesson may derive from a scene in R. W.'s Three Lords and Three Ladies of London (about 1590).

The farcical elements in The Shrew seem to have inspired revisers to outdo the farce of the original; Shakespeare's play is high comedy in contrast with versions of it that held the stage from mid-seventeenth to mid-nineteenth century. In 1667 Pepys saw an adaptation by John Lacy called Sauny the Scot: this magnifies Grumio's part (in A Shrew, the Grumio character was named Sander) and gives Grumio (that is, Sauny) a Scots accent. Garrick's Catherine and Petruchio (1756), which cut out the Sly and Bianca parts, was popular for over a century; indeed, toward the end of the nineteenth century Shaw was attacking Garrick for this commercialistic version that was still competing with Shakespeare's play. In the 1920's Fritz Lieber mounted a production in which Grumio was a Negro comic in a bellhop's uniform, and Grumio and Petruchio rode motorcycles. In 1948 Cole Porter wrote the musical Kiss Me, Kate, which is only nominally related to the original. However, modern productions tend, with variations, to produce The Taming of the Shrew in the 1623 version; the return to this began in 1844, with J. R. Planché's production at the Haymarket in London (under the sponsorship of Ben Webster, an ancestor of Margaret Webster, the modern director of Shakespeare). For more details of the stage history, see the entry under "Harold Child" in the Suggested References.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

The authority for the present text is the Folio of 1623 (F). Based on it were the quarto of 1631 and three later folios. These introduce a number of errors of their own but also make some corrections and some changes accepted by most subsequent editors. The present text adheres as closely as possible to F, accepting standard emendations only when F seems clearly erroneous. These emendations come mainly from such early editors as Rowe, Theobald, and Capell.

F's incomplete division into acts is almost universally altered by modern editors, and the present text conforms to standard practice. F has "Actus primus. Scoena [sic] Prima" at the beginning, whereas in modern practice approximately the first 275 lines are placed in an "Induction" with two scenes. F lacks a designation for Act II. F's "Actus Tertia [sic]," beginning with Lucentio's "Fiddler, forbear, etc.," is universally accepted. F's "Actus Quartus. Scena Prima" generally becomes modern IV.iii, and F's "Actus Quintus," modern V.ii.

F makes a number of erroneous or unclear speech assignments (at one time naming an actor, Sincklo, instead of the character). These are at Ind.i.88; III.i.47 ff.; IV.ii.4 ff. They are specifically listed below. Names of speakers, nearly always abbreviated in F, are regularly spelled out in the present edition. Speakers in F designated Beggar, Lady, and Man are given as Sly, Page, and Servingman, respectively.

F is not consistent in the spelling of some proper names. In the stage directions, the shrew, for instance, appears as Katerina, Katherina, Katherine (sometimes with a in the second syllable), and Kate; she is spoken to and of as Katherine and Kate; her speeches are headed Ka, Kat, and Kate. Since Kate is the most frequent form, this edition uses it throughout and does not include the change in the following list. In F, the name adopted by Hortensio when he pretends to be a music teacher appears three times as Litio, which we use here, and four times as Lisio. Many editors follow F2 and Rowe in emending to Licio.

Editors vary in the treatment of F's short lines, sometimes letting a short line stand independently, and sometimes joining several short lines into a quasi-pentameter. The latter practice is generally followed in the present edition. Modern editors are quite consistent in identifying as verse a few passages set as prose in F; and vice versa.

Errors in foreign languages in F are allowed to stand if they are conceivably errors made by the speaker, for example, errors in Latin and Spanish. Spellings of English words are corrected and modernized. The punctuation is modern. Obvious typographical errors, of which there are a great many, are corrected silently. The following materials, lacking in F, are given in square brackets in this edition: cast of characters, missing act and scene designations, indications of place of action, certain stage directions (F has an unusually copious supply of stage directions, some of which make interesting references to properties).

The following list includes all significant variations from F. The reading in the present text is in boldface, followed by the F reading in roman.

 And couple Clowder with the deep-mouthed brach.°
 Saw'st thou not, boy, how Silver made it good
 At the hedge-corner in the coldest fault?°
 I would not lose the dog for twenty pound.

FIRST HUNTSMAN

Why, Bellman is as good as he, my lord;
 He cried upon it at the merest loss°
 And twice today picked out the dullest scent.
 Trust me, I take him for the better dog.

LORD

Thou art a fool. If Echo were as fleet,
 I would esteem him worth a dozen such.
 But sup them well and look unto them all.
 Tomorrow I intend to hunt again.

FIRST HUNTSMAN

I will, my lord.

What's here? One dead or drunk? See, doth he breathe?

SECOND HUNTSMAN

He breathes, my lord. Were he not warmed with ale,
 This were a bed but cold to sleep so soundly.

LORD

O monstrous beast, how like a swine he lies!
 Grim death, how foul and loathsome is thine image!

FIRST HUNTSMAN

Believe me, lord, I think he cannot choose.

SECOND HUNTSMAN

It would seem strange unto him when he waked.

LORD

Even as a flatt'ring dream or worthless fancy.
 Then take him up and manage well the jest.
 Carry him gently to my fairest chamber
 And hang it round with all my wanton° pictures;
 Balm° his foul head in warm distillèd waters
 And burn sweet wood to make the lodging sweet.
 Procure me music ready when he wakes
 To make a dulcet° and a heavenly sound;
 And if he chance to speak, be ready straight°
 And with a low submissive reverence
 Say, "What is it your honor will command?"
 Let one attend him with a silver basin
 Full of rose water and bestrewed with flowers;
 Another bear the ewer, the third a diaper,°
 And say, "Will't please your lordship cool your hands?"
 Some one be ready with a costly suit

And ask him what apparel he will wear,
 Another tell him of his hounds and horse
 And that his lady mourns at his disease.
 Persuade him that he hath been lunatic,
 And when he says he is,° say that he dreams,
 For he is nothing but a mighty lord.
 This do, and do it kindly,° gentle sirs.
 It will be pastime passing excellent
 If it be husbanded with modesty.°

FIRST HUNTSMAN

My lord, I warrant you we will play our part
 As° he shall think by our true diligence
 He is no less than what we say he is.

LORD

Take him up gently and to bed with him,
 And each one to his office° when he wakes.
 [SLY is carried out.]

Sound trumpets.

Sirrah,° go see what trumpet 'tis that sounds.
 [Exit SERVINGMAN.]

Belike° some noble gentleman that means,
 Traveling some journey, to repose him here.

Enter SERVINGMAN.

How now? Who is it?

SERVINGMAN An't° please your honor, players
 That offer service to your lordship.

Enter PLAYERS.

LORD

Bid them come near. Now, fellows, you are welcome.

PLAYERS

We thank your honor.

LORD

Do you intend to stay with me tonight?

A PLAYER

So please your lordship to accept our duty.°

LORD

With all my heart. This fellow I remember
 Since once he played a farmer's eldest son;
 'Twas where you wooed the gentlewoman so well.
 I have forgot your name, but sure that part
 Was aptly fitted° and naturally performed.

SECOND PLAYER

I think 'twas Soto° that your honor means.

LORD

'Tis very true; thou didst it excellent.
 Well, you are come to me in happy° time,
 The rather for° I have some sport in hand
 Wherein your cunning° can assist me much.
 There is a lord will hear you play tonight.
 But I am doubtful of your modesties,°
 Lest overeyeing° of his odd behavior—
 For yet his honor never heard a play—

You break into some merry passion°
And so offend him, for I tell you, sirs,
If you should smile he grows impatient.

A PLAYER

Fear not, my lord, we can contain ourselves
Were he the veriest antic° in the world.

LORD

Go, sirrah, take them to the buttery°
And give them friendly welcome every one.
Let them want° nothing that my house affords.

Exit one with the PLAYERS.

Sirrah, go you to Barthol'mew my page
And see him dressed in all suits° like a lady.
That done, conduct him to the drunkard's chamber
And call him "madam"; do him obeisance.
Tell him from me—as he will° win my love—
He bear himself with honorable action
Such as he hath observed in noble ladies
Unto their lords, by them accomplished°.°
Such duty to the drunkard let him do
With soft low tongue and lowly courtesy,
And say, "What is't your honor will command
Wherein your lady and your humble wife
May show her duty and make known her love?"
And then, with kind embracements, tempting kisses,
And with declining head into his bosom,
Bid him shed tears, as being overjoyed
To see her noble lord restored to health
Who for this seven years hath esteemèd him
No better than a poor and loathsome beggar.
And if the boy have not a woman's gift
To rain a shower of commanded tears,
An onion will do well for such a shift,°
Which in a napkin° being close conveyed°
Shall in despite° enforce a watery eye.
See this dispatched with all the haste thou canst;
Anon° I'll give thee more instructions.

Exit a SERVINGMAN.

I know the boy will well usurp° the grace,
Voice, gait, and action of a gentlewoman.
I long to hear him call the drunkard husband,
And how my men will stay themselves from laughter
When they do homage to this simple peasant.
I'll in to counsel them; haply° my presence
May well abate the overmerry spleen°
Which otherwise would grow into extremes.

[Exeunt.]

[Scene II. Bedroom in the Lord's house.]

SLY For God's sake, a pot of small° ale!

FIRST SERVINGMAN

Will't please your lordship drink a cup of sack?°

SECOND SERVINGMAN

Will't please your honor taste of these conserves?°

THIRD SERVINGMAN

What raiment will your honor wear today?

SLY I am Christophero Sly; call not me "honor" nor "lordship." I ne'er drank sack in my life, and if you give me any conserves, give me conserves of beef.°
Ne'er ask me what raiment I'll wear, for I have no more doublets° than backs, no more stockings than legs nor no more shoes than feet—nay, sometime more feet than shoes or such shoes as my toes look through the overleather.

LORD

Heaven cease this idle humor° in your honor!

O that a mighty man of such descent,
Of such possessions and so high esteem,
Should be infused with so foul a spirit!

SLY What, would you make me mad? Am not I Christopher Sly, old Sly's son of Burton-heath,° by birth a peddler, by education a cardmaker,° by trans-mutation a bearherd,° and now by present profession a tinker? Ask Marian Hacket, the fat alewife of Wincot,° if she know me not. If she say I am not fourteen pence on the score° for sheer ale,° score me up for the lying'st knave in Christendom. What, I am not bestraught!° Here's—

THIRD SERVINGMAN

O, this it is that makes your lady mourn.

SECOND SERVINGMAN

O, this is it that makes your servants droop.

LORD

Hence comes it that your kindred shuns your house
As beaten hence by your strange lunacy.
O noble lord, bethink thee of thy birth,
Call home thy ancient thoughts° from banishment
And banish hence these abject lowly dreams.
Look how thy servants do attend on thee,
Each in his office ready at thy beck.
Wilt thou have music? Hark, Apollo° plays,
Music.

And twenty caged nightingales do sing.
Or wilt thou sleep? We'll have thee to a couch
Softer and sweeter than the lustful bed
On purpose trimmed up for Semiramis.°
Say thou wilt walk, we will bestrow° the ground.
Or wilt thou ride? Thy horses shall be trapped,°
Their harness studded all with gold and pearl.

FIRST SERVINGMAN

And till the tears that she hath shed for thee
Like envious floods o'errun her lovely face, 65
She was the fairest creature in the world,
And yet° she is inferior to none.

SLY

Am I a lord, and have I such a lady?
Or do I dream? Or have I dreamed till now?
I do not sleep: I see, I hear, I speak,
I smell sweet savors and I feel soft things.
Upon my life, I am a lord indeed
And not a tinker nor Christopher Sly.
Well, bring our lady hither to our sight,
And once again a pot o' th' smallest° ale. 75

SECOND SERVINGMAN

Will't please your mightiness to wash your hands?
O, how we joy to see your wit° restored!
O, that once more you knew but what you are!

Or when you waked so waked as if you slept. 80

SLY

But did I never speak of° all that time?

FIRST SERVINGMAN

Nor no such men as you have reckoned up,

Which never were nor no man ever saw.

SLY

I thank thee; thou shalt not lose by it.

How fares my noble lord? 100

SLY

Marry,° I fare well, for here is cheer enough.
Where is my wife?

PAGE

Here, noble lord. What is thy will with her?

SLY

Are you my wife and will not call me husband?
My men should call me "lord"; I am your goodman.° 105

PAGE

My husband and my lord, my lord and husband,
I am your wife in all obedience.

SLY I know it well. What must I call her?

LORD Madam.

70 SLY Al'ce madam or Joan madam? 110

LORD

Madam and nothing else. So lords call ladies.

SLY

Madam wife, they say that I have dreamed
And slept above some fifteen year or more. 75

PAGE

Ay, and the time seems thirty unto me,
Being all this time abandoned° from your bed. 115

SLY

'Tis much. Servants, leave me and her alone.
[Exeunt SERVANTS.]

Madam, undress you and come now to bed.

PAGE

Thrice noble lord, let me entreat of you
To pardon me yet for a night or two
Or, if not, so until the sun be set. 120
For your physicians have expressly charged,
In peril to incur° your former malady,
That I should yet absent me from your bed.
I hope this reason stands for my excuse.

MESSENGER

Your honor's players, hearing your amendment,
Are come to play a pleasant comedy.
For so your doctors hold it very meet, 130
Seeing too much sadness hath congealed your blood,
And melancholy is the nurse of frenzy.
Therefore they thought it good you hear a play
And frame your mind to mirth and merriment,
Which bars a thousand harms and lengthens life. 135

SLY Marry, I will let them play it. Is not a comontie^o a Christmas gambold^o or a tumbling trick?

PAGE

No, my good lord, it is more pleasing stuff.

SLY What, household stuff?^o

PAGE It is a kind of history. 140

SLY Well, we'll see't. Come, madam wife, sit by my side and let the world slip.^o We shall ne'er be younger.

[A C T I]

[Scene I. Padua. A street.]

Flourish.^o Enter LUCENTIO and his man^o TRANIO.

LUCENTIO

Tranio, since for the great desire I had
To see fair Padua,^o nursery of arts,
I am arrived for fruitful Lombardy,
The pleasant garden of great Italy,
And by my father's love and leave am armed 5
With his good will and thy good company,
My trusty servant, well approved^o in all,
Here let us breathe and haply institute
A course of learning and ingenious^o studies.
Pisa, renowned for grave citizens, 10
Gave me my being and my father first,^o
A merchant of great traffic^o through the world,
Vincentio, come of the Bentivolii.
Vincentio's son, brought up in Florence,
It shall become to serve^o all hopes conceived, 15
To deck his fortune with his virtuous deeds;
And therefore, Tranio, for the time I study,
Virtue and that part of philosophy
Will I apply^o that treats of happiness
By virtue specially to be achieved. 20
Tell me thy mind, for I have Pisa left
And am to Padua come, as he that leaves
A shallow plash^o to plunge him in the deep
And with satiety seeks to quench his thirst.

TRANIO

I am in all affected^o as yourself,
Glad that you thus continue your resolve
To suck the sweets of sweet philosophy.
Only, good master, while we do admire
This virtue and this moral discipline, 30
Let's be no stoics nor no stocks,^o I pray,
Or so devote^o to Aristotle's checks^o
As^o Ovid^o be an outcast quite abjured.
Balk logic^o with acquaintance that you have
And practice rhetoric in your common talk. 35
Music and poesy use to quicken^o you.
The mathematics and the metaphysics,
Fall to them as you find your stomach^o serves you.
No profit grows where is no pleasure ta'en.
In brief, sir, study what you most affect.^o 40

LUCENTIO

Gramercies,^o Tranio, well dost thou advise.
If, Biondello, thou wert come ashore,
We could at once put us in readiness
And take a lodging fit to entertain
Such friends as time in Padua shall beget. 45
But stay awhile, what company is this?

TRANIO

Master, some show to welcome us to town.

Enter BAPTISTA with his two daughters, KATE and BIANCA; GREMIO, a pantaloon;^o [and] HORTENSIO, suitor to Bianca. LUCENTIO [and] TRANIO stand by.^o

BAPTISTA

Gentlemen, importune me no farther,
For how I firmly am resolved you know,
That is, not to bestow my youngest daughter 50
Before I have a husband for the elder.
If either of you both love Katherina,
Because I know you well and love you well,
Leave shall you have to court her at your pleasure.

GREMIO

To cart^o her rather. She's too rough for me. 55
There, there, Hortensio, will you any wife?

KATE

I pray you, sir, is it your will
To make a stale^o of me amongst these mates?^o

HORTENSIO

Mates, maid? How mean you that? No mates for you
Unless you were of gentler, milder mold. 60

KATE

I' faith, sir, you shall never need to fear:
Iwis^o it^o is not halfway to her^o heart.
But if it were, doubt not her care should be
To comb your noddle with a three-legged stool
And paint^o your face and use you like a fool. 65

HORTENSIO

GREMIO

And me too, good Lord!

TRANIO [Aside.]Husht, master, here's some good pastime toward.^oThat wench is stark mad or wonderful froward.^oLUCENTIO [Aside.]

But in the other's silence do I see

Maid's mild behavior and sobriety.

Peace, Tranio.

TRANIO [Aside.]

Well said, master. Mum, and gaze your fill.

BAPTISTA

Gentlemen, that I may soon make good

What I have said: Bianca, get you in,

And let it not displease thee, good Bianca,

For I will love thee ne'er the less, my girl.

KATE

A pretty peat!^o It is bestPut finger in the eye,^o and^o she knew why.

BIANCA

Sister, content you in my discontent.

Sir, to your pleasure humbly I subscribe.

My books and instruments shall be my company,

On them to look and practice by myself.

LUCENTIO [Aside.]Hark, Tranio, thou mayst hear Minerva^o speak.

HORTENSIO

Signior Baptista, will you be so strange?^o

Sorry am I that our good will effects

Bianca's grief.

GREMIO

Why will you mew^o her up,

Signior Baptista, for this fiend of hell

And make her bear the penance of her tongue?

BAPTISTA

Gentlemen, content ye. I am resolved.

Go in, Bianca. [Exit BIANCA.]And for^o I know she taketh most delight

In music, instruments, and poetry,

Schoolmasters will I keep within my house,

Fit to instruct her youth. If you, Hortensio,

Or Signior Gremio, you, know any such,

Prefer^o them hither; for to cunning^o men

I will be very kind, and liberal

To mine own children in good bringing up.

And so, farewell. Katherina, you may stay,

For I have more to commune with^o Bianca. Exit.

KATE

Why, and I trust I may go too, may I not?

What, shall I be appointed hours, as though, belike,^oI knew not what to take and what to leave? Ha! *Exit.*GREMIO You may go to the devil's dam;^o your gifts 105 are so good, here's none will hold you. Their love is not so great,^o Hortensio, but we may blow our nailstogether^o and fast it fairly out. Our cake's dough onboth sides.^o Farewell. Yet for the love I bear my sweetBianca, if I can by any means light on a fit man to 110 teach her that wherein she delights, I will wish^o him to her father.

HORTENSIO So will I, Signior Gremio. But a word, I pray. Though the nature of our quarrel yet never brook'd parle,^o know now, upon advice,^o it toucheth^o 115 us both—that we may yet again have access to our fair mistress and be happy rivals in Bianca's love—to labor and effect one thing specially.

GREMIO What's that, I pray?

HORTENSIO Marry, sir, to get a husband for her sister. 120

GREMIO A husband! A devil.

HORTENSIO I say, a husband.

GREMIO I say, a devil. Think'st thou, Hortensio, though her father be very rich, any man is so very^o afool to^o be married to hell? 125

HORTENSIO Tush, Gremio, though it pass your patience and mine to endure her loud alarms,^o why,man, there be good fellows in the world, and^o a man could light on them, would take her with all faults, and money enough. 130

GREMIO I cannot tell, but I had as lief^o take her dowry with this condition, to be whipped at the high cross^o every morning.

HORTENSIO Faith, as you say, there's small choice in rotten apples. But come, since this bar in law^o makes 135us friends, it shall be so far forth^o friendly maintained, till by helping Baptista's eldest daughter to a husband,

we set his youngest free for a husband, and then have to't^o afresh. Sweet Bianca! Happy man be his dole!^o

He that runs fastest gets the ring. How say you, 140

Signior Gremio?

GREMIO I am agreed, and would I had given him the best horse in Padua to begin his wooing, that^o would thoroughly woo her, wed her, and bed her and rid the house of her. Come on. 145

Exeunt ambo.^o Manet^o TRANIO and LUCENTIO.

TRANIO

I pray, sir, tell me, is it possible

That love should of a sudden take such hold?

LUCENTIO

O Tranio, till I found it to be true

I never thought it possible or likely.

But see, while idly I stood looking on,

I found the effect of love-in-idleness^o 150

And now in plainness do confess to thee,

That art to me as secret^o and as dearAs Anna^o to the Queen of Carthage was,

TRANIO

Master, it is no time to chide you now.

Affection is not rated° from the heart.

If love have touched you, naught remains but so,°

“Redime te captum, quam queas minimo.”°

LUCENTIO

Gramercies,° lad, go forward. This contents.

The rest will comfort, for thy counsel’s sound.

TRANIO

Master, you looked so longly° on the maid,

Perhaps you marked not what’s the pith of all.°

LUCENTIO

O yes, I saw sweet beauty in her face,

Such as the daughter of Agenor° had,

That made great Jove to humble him to her hand

When with his knees he kissed the Cretan strond.°

TRANIO

Saw you no more? Marked you not how her sister

Began to scold and raise up such a storm

That mortal ears might hardly endure the din?

LUCENTIO

Tranio, I saw her coral lips to move

And with her breath she did perfume the air.

Sacred and sweet was all I saw in her.

TRANIO

Nay, then, ’tis time to stir him from his trance.

I pray, awake, sir. If you love the maid,

Bend thoughts and wits to achieve her. Thus it stands:

Her elder sister is so curst and shrewd°

That till the father rid his hands of her,

Master, your love must live a maid at home;

And therefore has he closely mewd° her up,

Because° she will not be annoyed with suitors.

LUCENTIO

Ah, Tranio, what a cruel father’s he!

But art thou not advised° he took some care

To get her cunning° schoolmasters to instruct her?

TRANIO

Ay, marry, am I, sir—and now ’tis plotted!°

LUCENTIO

I have it, Tranio!

TRANIO Master, for° my hand,

Both our inventions° meet and jump in one.°

LUCENTIO

Tell me thine first.

TRANIO You will be schoolmaster

And undertake the teaching of the maid.

That’s your device.

LUCENTIO It is. May it be done?

Keep house and ply his book, welcome his friends,

Visit his countrymen and banquet them?

LUCENTIO

Basta,° content thee, for I have it full.°

We have not yet been seen in any house,

Nor can we be distinguished by our faces

For man or master. Then it follows thus:

Thou shalt be master, Tranio, in my stead,

Keep house and port° and servants as I should.

I will some other be—some Florentine,

Some Neapolitan, or meaner° man of Pisa.

’Tis hatched and shall be so. Tranio, at once

Uncase° thee, take my colored° hat and cloak.

When Biondello comes he waits on thee,

But I will charm° him first to keep his tongue.

TRANIO

So had you need.

In brief, sir, sith° it your pleasure is

And I am tied° to be obedient—

For so your father charged me at our parting;

“Be serviceable to my son,” quoth he,

Although I think ’twas in another sense—

I am content to be Lucentio

Because so well I love Lucentio.

LUCENTIO

Tranio, be so, because Lucentio loves,

And let me be a slave, t’ achieve that maid

Whose sudden sight hath thralld° my wounded eye.

Enter BIONDELLO.

Here comes the rogue. Sirrah, where have you been?

BIONDELLO

Where have I been? Nay, how now, where are you?

Master, has my fellow Tranio stol’n your clothes,

Or you stol’n his, or both? Pray, what’s the news?

LUCENTIO

Sirrah, come hither. ’Tis no time to jest,

And therefore frame your manners to the time.°

Your fellow Tranio, here, to save my life,

Puts my apparel and my count’nance° on,

And I for my escape have put on his,

For in a quarrel since I came ashore

I killed a man and fear I was descried.°

Wait you on him, I charge you, as becomes,

While I make way from hence to save my life.

You understand me?

BIONDELLO

I, sir? Ne’er a whit.

LUCENTIO

And not a jot of Tranio in your mouth.

Tranio is changed into Lucentio.

BIONDELLO

The better for him. Would I were so too.

TRANIO

So could I, faith, boy, to have the next wish after,

That Lucentio indeed had Baptista’s youngest daughter.

But in all places else your master, Lucentio.

LUCENTIO

Tranio, let's go.

One thing more rests,° that thyself execute°— 245
To make one among these wooers. If thou ask me why,
Sufficeth my reasons are both good and weighty.

Exeunt.

The PRESENTERS° above speaks.

FIRST SERVINGMAN

My lord, you nod; you do not mind° the play.

SLY

Yes, by Saint Anne, do I. A good matter, surely.
Comes there any more of it? 250

My lord, 'tis but begun.

SLY

'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady.
Would 'twere done!

They sit and mark.°

[Scene II. Padua. The street in front of Hortensio's house.]

Enter PETRUCHIO° and his man GRUMIO.

PETRUCHIO

Verona, for a while I take my leave
To see my friends in Padua, but of all
My best belovèd and approvèd friend,
Hortensio, and I trow° this is his house.
Here, sirrah Grumio, knock, I say. 5

GRUMIO Knock, sir? Whom should I knock? Is there any man has rebused° your worship?

PETRUCHIO Villain, I say, knock me here° soundly.

GRUMIO Knock you here, sir? Why, sir, what am I,
sir, that I should knock you here, sir? 10

PETRUCHIO

Villain, I say, knock me at this gate°
And rap me well or I'll knock your knave's pate.°

GRUMIO

My master is grown quarrelsome. I should knock you first,
And then I know after who comes by the worst.

PETRUCHIO

Will it not be? 15
Faith, sirrah, and° you'll not knock, I'll ring° it;
I'll try how you can sol, fa,° and sing it.

He wrings him by the ears.

GRUMIO

Help, masters, help! My master is mad.

PETRUCHIO

Now, knock when I bid you, sirrah villain.

Enter HORTENSIO.

HORTENSIO How now, what's the matter? My old 20 friend Grumio, and my good friend Petruchio! How do you all at Verona?

PETRUCHIO

Signior Hortensio, come you to part the fray?
Con tutto il cuore ben trovato,° may I say.

HORTENSIO

Alla nostra casa ben venuto, 25
Molto honorato signior mio Petruchio.°

Rise, Grumio, rise. We will compound° this quarrel.

GRUMIO Nay, 'tis no matter, sir, what he 'leges° in Latin.° If this be not a lawful cause for me to leave his service—look you, sir, he bid me knock him and 30 rap him soundly, sir. Well, was it fit for a servant to use his master so, being perhaps, for aught I see,
two-and-thirty, a peep out?°

Whom would to God I had well knocked at first,
Then had not Grumio come by the worst. 35

PETRUCHIO

A senseless villain! Good Hortensio,
I bade the rascal knock upon your gate
And could not get him for my heart° to do it.

GRUMIO Knock at the gate? O heavens! Spake you not these words plain, "Sirrah, knock me here, rap 40 me here, knock me well, and knock me soundly"?
And come you now with "knocking at the gate"?

PETRUCHIO

Sirrah, be gone or talk not, I advise you.

HORTENSIO

Petruchio, patience, I am Grumio's pledge.
Why, this's a heavy chance° 'twixt him and you, 45
Your ancient, trusty, pleasant servant Grumio.
And tell me now, sweet friend, what happy gale
Blows you to Padua here from old Verona?

PETRUCHIO

Such wind as scatters young men through the world
To seek their fortunes farther than at home, 50
Where small experience grows. But in a few,° Signior Hortensio, thus it stands with me:
Antonio my father is deceased,
And I have thrust myself into this maze,°
Happily° to wive and thrive as best I may. 55
Crowns in my purse I have and goods at home
And so am come abroad to see the world.

HORTENSIO

Petruchio, shall I then come roundly° to thee
And wish thee to a shrewd ill-favored° wife?

24 Con . . . trovato with all (my) heart well found (i.e.,

 And yet I'll promise thee she shall be rich,
 And very rich—but thou'rt too much my friend,
 And I'll not wish thee to her.

PETRUCHIO

Signior Hortensio, 'twixt such friends as we Few words suffice; and therefore if thou know
 One rich enough to be Petruchio's wife—
 As wealth is burthen° of my wooing dance—
 Be she as foul° as was Florentius° love,
 As old as Sibyl°, and as curst and shrewd
 As Socrates' Xanthippe° or a worse,
 She moves me not, or not removes, at least,
 Affection's edge in me, were she as rough
 As are the swelling Adriatic seas.
 I come to wive it wealthily in Padua;
 If wealthily, then happily in Padua.

GRUMIO Nay, look you, sir, he tells you flatly what his mind is. Why, give him gold enough and marry him to a puppet or an aglet-baby° or an old trot° with ne'er a tooth in her head, though she have as many diseases as two-and-fifty horses. Why, nothing comes 80 amiss so money comes withal°.

HORTENSIO

Petruchio, since we are stepped thus far in,
 I will continue that° I broached in jest.
 I can, Petruchio, help thee to a wife
 With wealth enough and young and beauteous,
 Brought up as best becomes a gentlewoman.
 Her only fault—and that is faults enough—
 Is that she is intolerable curst°
 And shrewd and froward°, so beyond all measure
 That were my state° far worsen than it is,
 I would not wed her for a mine of gold.

PETRUCHIO

Hortensio, peace. Thou know'st not gold's effect.
 Tell me her father's name, and 'tis enough,
 For I will board° her though she chide as loud
 As thunder when the clouds in autumn crack°.

HORTENSIO

Her father is Baptista Minola,
 An affable and courteous gentleman.
 Her name is Katherine Minola,
 Renowned in Padua for her scolding tongue.

PETRUCHIO

I know her father though I know not her,
 And he knew my deceased father well.
 I will not sleep, Hortensio, till I see her,
 And therefore let me be thus bold with you,
 To give you over° at this first encounter
 Unless you will accompany me thither.

GRUMIO I pray you, sir, let him go while the humor° lasts. A° my word, and° she knew him as well as I do, she would think scolding would do little good° upon him. She may perhaps call him half a score knaves or so—why, that's nothing. And he begin once, he'll 110 rail in his rope-tricks°. I'll tell you what, sir, and she stand° him but a little, he will throw a figure in her face and so disfigure her with it that she shall have no more eyes to see withal than a cat. You know him not, sir. 115

HORTENSIO

Tarry, Petruchio, I must go with thee,
 For in Baptista's keep° my treasure is.
 He hath the jewel of my life in hold°,
 His youngest daughter, beautiful Bianca,
 And her withholds from me and other more,
 Suitors to her and rivals in my love,
 Supposing it a thing impossible,
 For° those defects I have before rehearsed,
 That ever Katherine will be wooed.
 Therefore this order° hath Baptista ta'en,
 That none shall have access unto Bianca
 Till Katherine the curst have got a husband.

GRUMIO

Katherine the curst!
 A title for a maid of all titles the worst.

HORTENSIO

Now shall my friend Petruchio do me grace°
 And offer° me, disguised in sober robes,
 To old Baptista as a schoolmaster
 Well seen° in music, to instruct Bianca,
 That so I may, by this device, at least
 Have leave and leisure to make love to her
 And unsuspected court her by herself.

Enter GREMIO, and LUCENTIO disguised [as a schoolmaster, Cambio].

GRUMIO Here's no knavery! See, to beguile the old folks, how the young folks lay their heads together!
 Master, master, look about you. Who goes there, ha?

HORTENSIO

Peace, Grumio. It is the rival of my love.
 Petruchio, stand by awhile.

[They eavesdrop.]

GRUMIO

A proper stripling°, and an amorous!

GREMIO

O, very well, I have perused the note°
 Hark you, sir, I'll have them very fairly bound—
 All books of love, see that at any hand°,
 And see you read no other lectures° to her.

And let me have them^o very well perfumed,
For she is sweeter than perfume itself
To whom they go to. What will you read to her?

LUCENTIO

Whate'er I read to her, I'll plead for you
As for my patron, stand you so assured,
As firmly as^o yourself were still in place^o—
Yea, and perhaps with more successful words
Than you unless you were a scholar, sir.

GREMIO

O this learning, what a thing it is!

GRUMIO [Aside.]

O this woodcock,^o what an ass it is!

PETRUCHIO

Peace, sirrah!

HORTENSIO

Grumio, mum! [Coming forward.] God save you,
Signior Gremio.

GREMIO

And you are well met, Signior Hortensio.
Trow^o you whither I am going? To Baptista Minola.
I promised to inquire carefully
About a schoolmaster for the fair Bianca,
And, by good fortune, I have lighted well
On this young man—for^o learning and behavior
Fit for her turn,^o well read in poetry
And other books, good ones I warrant ye.

HORTENSIO

'Tis well. And I have met a gentleman
Hath promised me to help me to^o another,
A fine musician to instruct our mistress.
So shall I no whit be behind in duty
To fair Bianca, so beloved of me.

GREMIO

Beloved of me, and that my deeds shall prove.

GRUMIO [Aside.]

And that his bags^o shall prove.

HORTENSIO

Gremio, 'tis now no time to vent^o our love.
Listen to me, and if you speak me fair,
I'll tell you news indifferent^o good for either.
Here is a gentleman whom by chance I met,
Upon agreement from us to his liking,^o
Will undertake^o to woo curst Katherine,
Yea, and to marry her if her dowry please.

GREMIO

So said, so done, is well.
Hortensio, have you told him all her faults?

PETRUCHIO

I know she is an irksome, brawling scold;
If that be all, masters, I hear no harm.

GREMIO

No, say'st me so, friend? What countryman?

PETRUCHIO

Born in Verona, old Antonio's son.
My father dead, my fortune lives for me,
And I do hope good days and long to see.

GREMIO

O, sir, such a life with such a wife were strange.
But if you have a stomach,^o to't a^o God's name;
You shall have me assisting you in all.
But will you woo this wildcat?

PETRUCHIO

Will I live? 195

GRUMIO [Aside.]

Will he woo her? Ay, or I'll hang her.

PETRUCHIO

Why came I hither but to that intent?
Think you a little din can daunt mine ears?
Have I not in my time heard lions roar?
Have I not heard the sea, puffed up with winds, 200
Rage like an angry boar chafèd with sweat?
Have I not heard great ordnance^o in the field
And heaven's artillery thunder in the skies?
Have I not in a pitchèd battle heard
Loud 'larums,^o neighing steeds, and trumpets' clang? 205
And do you tell me of a woman's tongue,
That gives not half so great a blow to hear
As will a chestnut in a farmer's fire?
Tush, tush, fear^o boys with bugs.^o

GRUMIO [Aside.]

For he fears none.

GREMIO

Hortensio, hark. 210
This gentleman is happily arrived,
My mind presumes, for his own good and ours.

HORTENSIO

I promised we would be contributors
And bear his charge of^o wooing, whatsoe'er.

GREMIO

And so we will, provided that he win her. 215

GRUMIO [Aside.]

I would I were as sure of a good dinner.

Enter TRANIO brave^o [as Lucentio] and BIONDELLO.

TRANIO

Gentlemen, God save you. If I may be bold,
Tell me, I beseech you, which is the readiest way
To the house of Signior Baptista Minola?

BIONDELLO

He that has the two fair daughters? Is't he you mean? 220

TRANIO

Even he, Biondello. 185

GREMIO

Hark you, sir. You mean not her to—

TRANIO

Perhaps, him and her, sir. What have you to do?^o

PETRUCHIO

Not her that chides, sir, at any hand,^o I pray.

TRANIO

I love no chiders, sir. Biondello, let's away. 225

LUCENTIO [Aside.]

Well begun, Tranio.

HORTENSIO Sir, a word ere you go.
Are you a suitor to the maid you talk of, yea or no?

TRANIO
And if I be, sir, is it any offense?

GREMIO
No, if without more words you will get you hence.

TRANIO
Why, sir, I pray, are not the streets as free 230
For me as for you?

GREMIO But so is not she.

TRANIO
For what reason, I beseech you?

GREMIO
For this reason, if you'll know,
That she's the choice° love of Signior Gremio.

HORTENSIO
That she's the chosen of Signior Hortensio. 235

TRANIO
Softly, my masters! If you be gentlemen,
Do me this right: hear me with patience.
Baptista is a noble gentleman
To whom my father is not all unknown,
And were his daughter fairer than she is, 240
She may more suitors have, and me for one.
Fair Leda's daughter° had a thousand wooers;
Then well one more may fair Bianca have.
And so she shall. Lucentio shall make one,
Though Paris° came° in hope to speed° alone. 245

GREMIO
What, this gentleman will out-talk us all.

LUCENTIO
Sir, give him head. I know he'll prove a jade.°

PETRUCHIO
Hortensio, to what end are all these words?

HORTENSIO
Sir, let me be so bold as ask you,
Did you yet ever see Baptista's daughter? 250

TRANIO
No, sir, but hear I do that he hath two,
The one as famous for a scolding tongue
As is the other for beauteous modesty.

PETRUCHIO
Sir, sir, the first's for me; let her go by.

GREMIO
Yea, leave that labor to great Hercules,
And let it be more than Alcides° twelve.

PETRUCHIO
Sir, understand you this of me in sooth:°
The youngest daughter, whom you hearken° for,
Her father keeps from all access of suitors
And will not promise her to any man
Until the elder sister first be wed.
The younger then is free, and not before.

TRANIO

If it be so, sir, that you are the man
Must stead° us all, and me amongst the rest, 265
And if you break the ice and do this feat,
Achieve° the elder, set the younger free
For our access, whose hap° shall be to have her
Will not so graceless be to be ingrate.°

HORTENSIO
Sir, you say well, and well you do conceive,°
And since you do profess to be a suitor, 270
You must, as we do, gratify° this gentleman
To whom we all rest° generally beholding.°

TRANIO
Sir, I shall not be slack, in sign whereof,
Please ye we may contrive° this afternoon
And quaff carouses° to our mistress' health 275
And do as adversaries° do in law,
Strive mightily but eat and drink as friends.

GRUMIO AND BIONDELLO
O excellent motion! Fellows, let's be gone.

HORTENSIO
The motion's good indeed, and be it so.
Petruchio, I shall be your ben venuto.° Exeunt. 280

[A C T I I]

[Scene I. In Baptista's house.]

245 Enter KATE and BIANCA [with her hands tied].

BIANCA
Good sister, wrong me not nor wrong yourself
To make a bondmaid and a slave of me.
That I disdain. But for these other gawds,°
Unbind my hands, I'll pull them off myself,
Yea, all my raiment, to my petticoat, 5
Or what you will command me will I do,
So well I know my duty to my elders.

250 KATE
Of all thy suitors, here I charge thee, tell
Whom thou lov'st best. See thou dissemble not.

BIANCA
Believe me, sister, of all the men alive 10
I never yet beheld that special face
Which I could fancy more than any other.

255 KATE
Minion,° thou liest. Is't not Hortensio?

BIANCA
If you affect° him, sister, here I swear
I'll plead for you myself but you shall have him. 15

You will have Gremio to keep you fair.°

Nay, then you jest, and now I well perceive

You have but jested with me all this while.

I prithee, sister Kate, untie my hands.

20

KATE

If that be jest then all the rest was so.

Strikes her.Enter BAPTISTA.

BAPTISTA

Why, how now, dame, whence grows this insolence?

Bianca, stand aside. Poor girl, she weeps.

Go ply thy needle; meddle not with her.

25

For shame, thou hilding° of a devilish spirit,

Why dost thou wrong her that did ne'er wrong thee?

When did she cross thee with a bitter word?

KATE

Her silence flouts me and I'll be revenged.

Flies after BIANCA.

BAPTISTA

What, in my sight? Bianca, get thee in.

30

Exit [BIANCA].

KATE

What, will you not suffer° me? Nay, now I see

She is your treasure, she must have a husband;

I must dance barefoot on her wedding day,°

And, for your love to her, lead apes in hell.°

Talk not to me; I will go sit and weep

Till I can find occasion of revenge.

35

[Exit.]

BAPTISTA

Was ever gentleman thus grieved as I?

But who comes here?

Enter GREMIO, LUCENTIO in the habit of a mean° man[Cambio], PETRUCHIO, with [HORTENSIO as a musicteacher, Litio, and] TRANIO [as Lucentio], with his boy[BIONDELLO] bearing a lute and books.

GREMIO Good morrow, neighbor Baptista.

BAPTISTA Good morrow, neighbor Gremio. God 40
save you, gentlemen.

PETRUCHIO

And you, good sir. Pray, have you not a daughter

Called Katherina, fair and virtuous?

BAPTISTA

I have a daughter, sir, called Katherina.

GREMIO [Aside.]

You are too blunt; go to it orderly.°

45

PETRUCHIO [Aside.]

You wrong me, Signior Gremio, give me leave.

[To BAPTISTA.]

I am a gentleman of Verona, sir,

That, hearing of her beauty and her wit,

Her affability and bashful modesty,

Her wondrous qualities and mild behavior,

50

Am bold to show myself a forward° guest

Within your house, to make mine eye the witness

Of that report which I so oft have heard.

And, for an entrance to° my entertainment,°

I do present you with a man of mine,

55

[Presenting HORTENSIO.]

Cunning in music and the mathematics,

To instruct her fully in those sciences,

Whereof I know she is not ignorant.

Accept of him, or else you do me wrong.

His name is Litio, born in Mantua.

60

BAPTISTA

Y'are welcome, sir, and he for your good sake.

But for my daughter Katherine, this I know,

She is not for your turn,° the more my grief.

PETRUCHIO

I see you do not mean to part with her,

Or else you like not of my company.

65

BAPTISTA

Mistake me not; I speak but as I find.

Whence are you, sir? What may I call your name?

PETRUCHIO

Petruchio is my name, Antonio's son,

A man well known throughout all Italy.

BAPTISTA

I know him well. You are welcome for his sake.

70

GREMIO

Saving° your tale, Petruchio, I pray,

Let us, that are poor petitioners, speak too.

Backare,° you are marvelous° forward.

PETRUCHIO

O pardon me, Signior Gremio, I would fain° be doing.°

GREMIO

I doubt it not, sir, but you will curse your wooing.

75

Neighbor, this is a gift very grateful,° I am sure of it.

To express the like kindness myself, that° have been more kindly beholding to you than any, freely give unto you this young scholar [presenting LUCENTIO]

that hath been long studying at Rheims—as cunning 80

in Greek, Latin, and other languages, as the other in music and mathematics. His name is Cambio.° Pray accept his service.

BAPTISTA A thousand thanks, Signior Gremio. Welcome, good Cambio. [To TRANIO.] But, gentle sir, 85

methinks you walk like° a stranger. May I be so bold to know the cause of your coming?

TRANIO

Pardon me, sir, the boldness is mine own,

That,° being a stranger in this city here,

Do make myself a suitor to your daughter,

90

Unto Bianca, fair and virtuous.

Nor is your firm resolve unknown to me

In the preferment of° the eldest sister.

This liberty is all that I request,

That, upon knowledge of my parentage,

And free access and favor° as the rest.
And, toward the education of your daughters
I here bestow a simple instrument,°
And this small packet of Greek and Latin books.
If you accept them, then their worth is great.

BAPTISTA [Looking at books.]

Lucentio is your name. Of whence, I pray?

TRANIO

Of Pisa, sir, son to Vincentio.

BAPTISTA

A mighty man of Pisa; by report
I know him° well. You are very welcome, sir.

[To HORTENSIO.]

Take you the lute, [to LUCENTIO] and you the set of books;

You shall go see your pupils presently.°

Holla, within!

Enter a SERVANT.

Sirrah, lead these gentlemen

To my daughters and tell them both

These are their tutors; bid them use them well.

[Exit SERVANT, with LUCENTIO, HORTENSIO, and BIONDELLO following.]

We will go walk a little in the orchard°

And then to dinner. You are passing° welcome,

And so I pray you all to think yourselves.

PETRUCHIO

Signior Baptista, my business asketh haste,

And every day I cannot come to woo.

You knew my father well, and in him me,

Left solely heir to all his lands and goods,

Which I have bettered rather than decreased.

Then tell me, if I get your daughter's love

What dowry shall I have with her to wife?

BAPTISTA

After my death the one half of my lands,

And in possession° twenty thousand crowns.

PETRUCHIO

And, for that dowry, I'll assure her of

Her widowhood,° be it that she survive me,

In all my lands and leases whatsoever.

Let specialties° be therefore drawn between us

That covenants may be kept on either hand.

BAPTISTA

Ay, when the special thing is well obtained,

That is, her love, for that is all in all.

PETRUCHIO

Why, that is nothing, for I tell you, father,

I am as peremptory° as she proud-minded.

And where two raging fires meet together

They do consume the thing that feeds their fury.

Though little fire grows great with little wind,

Yet extreme gusts will blow out fire and all.

So I to her, and so she yields to me,

For I am rough and woo not like a babe.

BAPTISTA

Well mayst thou woo, and happy be thy speed!°

But be thou armed for some unhappy words.

PETRUCHIO

Ay, to the proof,° as mountains are for winds

That shakes not, though they blow perpetually.

Enter HORTENSIO with his head broke.

BAPTISTA

How now, my friend, why dost thou look so pale?

HORTENSIO

For fear, I promise you, if I look pale.

BAPTISTA

What, will my daughter prove a good musician?

HORTENSIO

I think she'll sooner prove a soldier.

Iron may hold with her,° but never lutes.

BAPTISTA

Why, then thou canst not break° her to the lute?

HORTENSIO

Why, no, for she hath broke the lute to me.

I did but tell her she mistook her frets°

And bowed° her hand to teach her fingering,

When, with a most impatient devilish spirit,

"Frets, call you these?" quoth she; "I'll fume with them."

And with that word she stroke° me on the head,

And through the instrument my pate made way.

And there I stood amazed for a while

As on a pillory,° looking through the lute,

While she did call me rascal, fiddler,

And twangling Jack,° with twenty such vile terms

As° had she studied° to misuse me so.

PETRUCHIO

Now, by the world, it is a lusty° wench!

I love her ten times more than e'er I did.

O how I long to have some chat with her!

BAPTISTA [To HORTENSIO.]

Well, go with me, and be not so discomfited.

Proceed in practice° with my younger daughter;

She's apt° to learn and thankful for good turns.

Signior Petruchio, will you go with us

Or shall I send my daughter Kate to you?

Exit [BAPTISTA, with GREMIO, TRANIO, and HORTENSIO]. Manet PETRUCHIO.°

PETRUCHIO

I pray you do. I'll attend° her here

And woo her with some spirit when she comes.

Say that she rail,° why then I'll tell her plain

She sings as sweetly as a nightingale.

Say that she frown, I'll say she looks as clear

As morning roses newly washed with dew.

Enter KATE.

Good morrow, Kate, for that's your name, I hear.

KATE

Well have you heard,° but something hard of hearing.
They call me Katherine that do talk of me.

PETRUCHIO

You lie, in faith, for you are called plain Kate,
And bonny° Kate, and sometimes Kate the curst.
But, Kate, the prettiest Kate in Christendom,
Kate of Kate Hall,° my super-dainty Kate,
For dainties° are all Kates,° and therefore, Kate,
Take this of me, Kate of my consolation.
Hearing thy mildness praised in every town,
Thy virtues spoke of, and thy beauty sounded°—
Yet not so deeply as to thee belongs—
Myself am moved to woo thee for my wife.

KATE

Moved! In good time,° let him that moved you hither
Remove you hence. I knew you at the first
You were a movable.°

PETRUCHIO

Why, what's a movable?

KATE

A joint stool.°

PETRUCHIO Thou hast hit it; come sit on me.

KATE

Asses are made to bear° and so are you.

PETRUCHIO

Women are made to bear° and so are you.

KATE

No such jade° as you, if me you mean.

PETRUCHIO

Alas, good Kate, I will not burden thee,
For, knowing thee to be but young and light—

KATE

Too light for such a swain° as you to catch
And yet as heavy as my weight should be.

PETRUCHIO

Should be!° Should—buzz!

KATE

Well ta'en, and like a buzzard.°

PETRUCHIO

175 O slow-winged turtle,° shall a buzzard take° thee?

KATE

Ay, for a turtle, as he takes a buzzard.°

PETRUCHIO

Come, come, you wasp, i' faith you are too angry.

180 KATE

If I be waspish, best beware my sting.

210

PETRUCHIO

My remedy is then to pluck it out.

KATE

Ay, if the fool could find it where it lies.

PETRUCHIO

Who knows not where a wasp does wear his sting?
In his tail.

185 KATE In his tongue.

PETRUCHIO

Whose tongue?

KATE

Yours, if you talk of tales,° and so farewell.

215

PETRUCHIO

190 What, with my tongue in your tail? Nay, come again.
Good Kate, I am a gentleman—

KATE

That I'll try.

She strikes him.

PETRUCHIO

I swear I'll cuff you if you strike again.

KATE

So may you lose your arms:°
If you strike me you are no gentleman,
And if no gentleman, why then no arms.

220

PETRUCHIO

A herald,° Kate? O, put me in thy books.°

KATE

What is your crest?° A coxcomb?°

PETRUCHIO

200 A combless° cock, so° Kate will be my hen.

KATE

No cock of mine; you crow too like a craven.°

225

PETRUCHIO

Nay, come, Kate, come, you must not look so sour.

KATE

It is my fashion when I see a crab.°

PETRUCHIO

205 Why, here's no crab, and therefore look not sour.

KATE

There is, there is.

PETRUCHIO

Then show it me.

KATE

KATE

I care not.

PETRUCHIO

Nay, hear you, Kate, in sooth° you scape° not so.

KATE

I chafe° you if I tarry. Let me go.

PETRUCHIO

No, not a whit. I find you passing gentle.

'Twas told me you were rough and coy° and sullen,

And now I find report a very liar,

For thou art pleasant, gamesome, passing courteous,

But slow in speech, yet sweet as springtime flowers.

Thou canst not frown, thou canst not look askance,

Nor bite the lip as angry wenches will,

Nor hast thou pleasure to be cross in talk,

But thou with mildness entertain'st thy wooers,

With gentle conference,° soft and affable.

Why does the world report that Kate doth limp?

O sland'rous world! Kate like the hazel-twigg

Is straight and slender, and as brown in hue

As hazelnuts and sweeter than the kernels.

O, let me see thee walk. Thou dost not halt.°

KATE

Go, fool, and whom thou keep'st° command.

PETRUCHIO

Did ever Dian° so become a grove

As Kate this chamber with her princely gait?

O, be thou Dian and let her be Kate,

And then let Kate be chaste and Dian sportful!°

KATE

Where did you study all this goodly speech?

PETRUCHIO

It is extempore, from my mother-wit.°

KATE

A witty mother! Witless else° her son.

PETRUCHIO

Am I not wise?

KATE

Yes,° keep you warm.

PETRUCHIO

Marry, so I mean, sweet Katherine, in thy bed.

And therefore, setting all this chat aside,

Thus in plain terms: your father hath consented

That you shall be my wife, your dowry 'greed on,

And will you, nill° you, I will marry you.

Now, Kate, I am a husband for your turn,°

For, by this light, whereby I see thy beauty—

Thy beauty that doth make me like thee well—

Thou must be married to no man but me.

Enter BAPTISTA, GREMIO, TRANIO.

For I am he am born to tame you, Kate,

And bring you from a wild Kate° to a Kate

Conformable° as other household Kates.

Here comes your father. Never make denial;

I must and will have Katherine to my wife.

BAPTISTA

Now, Signior Petruchio, how speed° you with my daughter?

PETRUCHIO

How but well, sir? How but well?

235 It were impossible I should speed amiss.

BAPTISTA

Why, how now, daughter Katherine, in your dumps?°

KATE

Call you me daughter? Now, I promise° you

You have showed a tender fatherly regard

240 To wish me wed to one half lunatic,

A madcap ruffian and a swearing Jack

That thinks with oaths to face° the matter out.

PETRUCHIO

Father, 'tis thus: yourself and all the world

245 That talked of her have talked amiss of her.

If she be curst it is for policy,°

For she's not froward but modest as the dove.

She is not hot° but temperate as the morn;

For patience she will prove a second Grissel°

250 And Roman Lucrece° for her chastity.

And to conclude, we have 'greed so well together

That upon Sunday is the wedding day.

KATE

I'll see thee hanged on Sunday first.

GREMIO

Hark, Petruchio, she says she'll see thee hanged first.

255 TRANIO

Is this your speeding?° Nay, then good night our part!

PETRUCHIO

Be patient, gentlemen, I choose her for myself.

If she and I be pleased, what's that to you?

'Tis bargained 'twixt us twain, being alone,

That she shall still be curst in company.

I tell you, 'tis incredible to believe

How much she loves me. O, the kindest Kate,

She hung about my neck, and kiss on kiss

She vied° so fast, protesting oath on oath,

That in a twink° she won me to her love.

O, you are novices. 'Tis a world° to see

How tame, when men and women are alone,

A meacock° wretch can make the curstest shrew.

Give me thy hand, Kate. I will unto Venice

265 To buy apparel 'gainst° the wedding day.

Provide the feast, father, and bid the guests;

I will be sure my Katherine shall be fine.°

BAPTISTA

I know not what to say, but give me your hands.

God send you joy, Petruchio! 'Tis a match.

GREMIO AND TRANIO

Amen, say we. We will be witnesses.

PETRUCHIO

Father, and wife, and gentlemen, adieu.

I will to Venice; Sunday comes apace.

We will have rings and things and fine array,

And, kiss me, Kate, "We will be married a Sunday."°

Exit PETRUCHIO and KATE.

GREMIO

Was ever match clapped° up so suddenly?

BAPTISTA

Faith, gentlemen, now I play a merchant's part

And venture madly on a desperate mart.°

TRANIO

'Twas a commodity° lay fretting° by you;

'Twill bring you gain or perish on the seas.

BAPTISTA

The gain I seek is quiet in the match.

GREMIO

No doubt but he hath got a quiet catch.

But now, Baptista, to your younger daughter;

Now is the day we long have looked for.

I am your neighbor and was suitor first.

TRANIO

And I am one that love Bianca more

Than words can witness or your thoughts can guess.

GREMIO

Youngling, thou canst not love so dear as I.

TRANIO

Graybeard, thy love doth freeze.

GREMIO

But thine doth fry.

Skipper,° stand back, 'tis age that nourisheth.

TRANIO

But youth in ladies' eyes that flourisheth.

BAPTISTA

Content you, gentlemen; I will compound° this strife.

'Tis deeds must win the prize, and he of both°

That can assure my daughter greatest dower°

Shall have my Bianca's love.

Say, Signior Gremio, what can you assure her?

GREMIO

First, as you know, my house within the city

Is richly furnishèd with plate and gold,

Basins and ewers to lave° her dainty hands;

My hangings all of Tyrian° tapestry;

In ivory coffers I have stuffed my crowns,

In cypress chests my arras counterpoints,°

Costly apparel, tents,° and canopies,

Fine linen, Turkey cushions bossed° with pearl,

Valance° of Venice gold in needlework,

Pewter and brass, and all things that belongs

To house or housekeeping. Then, at my farm

I have a hundred milch-kine to the pail,°

And all things answerable to this portion.°

Myself am struck° in years, I must confess,

And if I die tomorrow, this is hers,

If whilst I live she will be only mine.

TRANIO

That "only" came well in. Sir, list to me.

I am my father's heir and only son.

If I may have your daughter to my wife,

I'll leave her houses three or four as good,

Within rich Pisa walls, as any one

Old Signior Gremio has in Padua,

Besides two thousand ducats° by the year

Of° fruitful land, all which shall be her jointure.°

What, have I pinched° you, Signior Gremio?

GREMIO [Aside.]

Two thousand ducats by the year of land!

My land amounts not to so much in all.

[To others.]

That she shall have besides an argosy°

That now is lying in Marcellus' road.°

What, have I choked you with an argosy?

TRANIO

Gremio, 'tis known my father hath no less

Than three great argosies, besides two galliasses°

And twelve tight° galleys. These I will assure her

And twice as much, whate'er thou off'rest next.

GREMIO

Nay, I have off'red all. I have no more,

And she can have no more than all I have.

If you like me, she shall have me and mine.

TRANIO

Why, then the maid is mine from all the world

By your firm promise. Gremio is outvied.°

BAPTISTA

I must confess your offer is the best,

And let your father make her the assurance,°

She is your own; else you must pardon me.

If you should die before him, where's her dower?

TRANIO

That's but a cavil.° He is old, I young.

GREMIO

And may not young men die as well as old?

BAPTISTA

Well, gentlemen,

I am thus resolved. On Sunday next, you know,

My daughter Katherine is to be married.

Now on the Sunday following shall Bianca

Be bride to you if you make this assurance;

If not, to Signior Gremio.

And so I take my leave and thank you both.

Exit.

Enter LUCENTIO [as Cambio], HORTENSIO [as Litio], and BIANCA.

LUCENTIO

Fiddler, forbear. You grow too forward, sir.
Have you so soon forgot the entertainment^o
Her sister Katherine welcomed you withal?

HORTENSIO

But, wrangling pedant, this is
The patroness of heavenly harmony.
Then give me leave to have prerogative,^o
And when in music we have spent an hour,
Your lecture^o shall have leisure for as much.

LUCENTIO

Preposterous^o ass, that never read so far
To know the cause why music was ordained!
Was it not to refresh the mind of man
After his studies or his usual pain?^o
Then give me leave to read^o philosophy,
And while I pause, serve in your harmony.

HORTENSIO

Sirrah, I will not bear these braves^o of thine.

BIANCA

Why, gentlemen, you do me double wrong
To strive for that which resteth in my choice.
I am no breeching^o scholar^o in the schools.
I'll not be tied to hours nor 'pointed times,
But learn my lessons as I please myself.
And, to cut off all strife, here sit we down.

[To HORTENSIO.]

Take you your instrument, play you the whiles;^o
His lecture will be done ere you have tuned.

HORTENSIO

You'll leave his lecture when I am in tune?

LUCENTIO

395 That will be never. Tune your instrument.

25

BIANCA Where left we last?

LUCENTIO Here, madam:

Hic ibat Simois, hic est Sigeia tellus,
Hic steterat Priami regia celsa senis.^o

BIANCA Conster^o them.

30

400 LUCENTIO Hic ibat, as I told you before, Simois, I am

HORTENSIO [Breaks in.] Madam, my instrument's in tune.

BIANCA Let's hear. O fie, the treble jars.^o

LUCENTIO Spit in the hole, man, and tune again. 40

BIANCA Now let me see if I can conster it. Hic ibat Simois, I know you not, hic est Sigeia tellus, I trust you not, Hic steterat Priami, take heed he hear us not, regia, presume not, celsa senis, despair not.

HORTENSIO [Breaks in again.]

Madam, 'tis now in tune.

LUCENTIO All but the bass.

45

HORTENSIO

The bass is right; 'tis the base knave that jars.

[Aside.]

5 How fiery and forward our pedant is!
Now, for my life, the knave doth court my love.
Pedascule,^o I'll watch you better yet.

BIANCA

In time I may believe, yet I mistrust.

50

LUCENTIO

10 Mistrust it not, for sure Aeacides
Was Ajax,^o called so from his grandfather.

BIANCA

I must believe my master; else, I promise you,
I should be arguing still upon that doubt.

But let it rest. Now, Litio, to you.

55

15 Good master, take it not unkindly, pray,
That I have been thus pleasant^o with you both.

HORTENSIO [To LUCENTIO.]

You may go walk and give me leave^o a while.
My lessons make no music in three parts.^o

LUCENTIO

20 Are you so formal, sir? [Aside.] Well, I must wait 60
And watch withal,^o for but^o I be deceived,
Our fine musician groweth amorous.

HORTENSIO

I must begin with rudiments of art 65

BIANCA

Why, I am past my gamut long ago.

70

HORTENSIO

Yet read the gamut of Hortensio.

BIANCA [Reads.]

Gamut I am, the ground° of all accord.°

E la mi, show pity or I die.

Call you this gamut? Tut, I like it not.

Old fashions please me best; I am not so nice°

To change true rules for odd inventions.

80

Enter a MESSENGER.

MESSENGER

Mistress, your father prays you leave your books

And help to dress your sister's chamber up.

You know tomorrow is the wedding day.

BIANCA

Farewell, sweet masters both, I must be gone.

[Exeunt BIANCA and MESSENGER.]

LUCENTIO

Faith, mistress, then I have no cause to stay. [Exit.]

85

HORTENSIO

But I have cause to pry into this pedant.

Methinks he looks as though he were in love.

Yet if thy thoughts, Bianca, be so humble

To cast thy wand'ring eyes on every stale,°

Seize thee that list.° If once I find thee ranging,° 90

Hortensio will be quit with thee by changing.° Exit.

[Scene II. Padua. The street in front of Baptista's house.]

Enter BAPTISTA, GREMIO, TRANIO [as Lucentio],

KATE, BIANCA, [LUCENTIO as Cambio] and others,

ATTENDANTS.

BAPTISTA [To TRANIO.]

Signior Lucentio, this is the 'pointed day

That Katherine and Petruchio should be married,

And yet we hear not of our son-in-law.

What will be said? What mockery will it be

To want° the bridegroom when the priest attends

To speak the ceremonial rites of marriage!

What says Lucentio to this shame of ours?

KATE

No shame but mine. I must, forsooth, be forced

To give my hand opposed against my heart

Unto a mad-brain rudesby,° full of spleen,°

10

Who wooed in haste and means to wed at leisure.

I told you, I, he was a frantic fool,

72 ground beginning, first note; accord harmony 79 nice whimsical 89 stale lure (as in hunting) 90 Seize . . . list let him who likes capture you; ranging going astray 91 changing sweethearts

And to be noted for° a merry man,

He'll woo a thousand, 'point the day of marriage, 15

Make friends, invite,° and proclaim the banns,

Yet never means to wed where he hath wooed.

Now must the world point at poor Katherine

And say, "Lo, there is mad Petruchio's wife,

If it would please him come and marry her." 20

TRANIO

Patience, good Katherine, and Baptista too.

Upon my life, Petruchio means but well,

Whatever fortune stays° him from his word.

Though he be blunt, I know him passing° wise;

Though he be merry, yet withal he's honest. 25

KATE

Would Katherine had never seen him though!

Exit weeping [followed by BIANCA and others].

BAPTISTA

Go, girl, I cannot blame thee now to weep.

For such an injury would vex a very saint,

Much more a shrew of thy impatient humor.°

Enter BIONDELLO.

BIONDELLO Master, master, news! And such old° 30 news as you never heard of!

BAPTISTA Is it new and old too? How may that be?

BIONDELLO Why, is it not news to hear of Petruchio's coming?

BAPTISTA Is he come? 35

BIONDELLO Why, no, sir.

BAPTISTA What then?

BIONDELLO He is coming.

BAPTISTA When will he be here?

BIONDELLO When he stands where I am and sees you 40
there.

TRANIO But, say, what to thine old news?

BIONDELLO Why, Petruchio is coming in a new hat and an old jerkin;° a pair of old breeches thrice turned;° a pair of boots that have been candle-cases,° one 45 buckled, another laced; an old rusty sword ta'en out of the town armory, with a broken hilt and chapeless;°
with two broken points;° his horse hipped° (with an old mothy saddle and stirrups of no kindred°), besides, possessed with the glanders° and like to mose in the 50 chine;° troubled with the lampass,° infected with the fashions,° full of windgalls,° sped with spavins,° rayed° with the yellows,° past cure of the fives,° stark to keep him from stumbling, hath been often burst and now repaired with knots; one girth° six times pieced,° and a woman's crupper° of velure,° which hath two 60 letters for her name fairly set down in studs,° and here and there pieced with packthread.°

BAPTISTA Who comes with him?

BIONDELLO O sir, his lackey, for all the world caparisoned° like the horse: with a linen stock° on one 65 leg and a kersey boot-hose° on the other, gart'ed with a red and blue list;° an old hat, and the humor of forty fancies° pricked° in't for a feather—a monster, a very monster in apparel, and not like a Christian footboy° or a gentleman's lackey. 70

TRANIO

'Tis some odd humor° pricks° him to this fashion,
Yet oftentimes he goes but mean-appareled.

BAPTISTA I am glad he's come, howsoe'er he comes.

BIONDELLO Why, sir, he comes not.

BAPTISTA Didst thou not say he comes? 75

BIONDELLO Who? That Petruchio came?

BAPTISTA Ay, that Petruchio came.

BIONDELLO No, sir, I say his horse comes, with him on his back.

BAPTISTA Why, that's all one.° 80

BIONDELLO [Sings.]

Nay, by Saint Jamy,

I hold° you a penny,

A horse and a man

Is more than one

And yet not many. 85

Enter PETRUCHIO and GRUMIO.

PETRUCHIO

Come, where be these gallants?° Who's at home?

BAPTISTA

You are welcome, sir.

PETRUCHIO

And yet I come not well.

BAPTISTA

And yet you halt° not.

TRANIO Not so well appareled as I wish you were.

PETRUCHIO

Were it better,° I should rush in thus. 90

But where is Kate? Where is my lovely bride?

How does my father? Gentles,° methinks you frown.

Gentles sirs

And wherefore gaze this goodly company
As if they saw some wondrous monument,°
Some comet or unusual prodigy?° 95

BAPTISTA

Why, sir, you know this is your wedding day.
First were we sad, fearing you would not come,
Now sadder that you come so unprovided.°
Fie, doff this habit,° shame to your estate,°
An eyesore to our solemn festival. 100

TRANIO

And tell us what occasion of import°
Hath all so long detained you from your wife
And sent you hither so unlike yourself.

PETRUCHIO

Tedious it were to tell and harsh to hear.

Sufficeth, I am come to keep my word 105

Though in some part enforcèd to digress,°

Which, at more leisure, I will so excuse

As you shall well be satisfied with all.

But where is Kate? I stay too long from her.

The morning wears, 'tis time we were at church. 110

TRANIO

See not your bride in these unreverent robes.

Go to my chamber; put on clothes of mine.

PETRUCHIO

Not I, believe me; thus I'll visit her.

BAPTISTA

But thus, I trust, you will not marry her.

PETRUCHIO

Good sooth,° even thus; therefore ha' done with words. 115

To me she's married, not unto my clothes.

Could I repair what she will wear° in me

As I can change these poor accouterments,

'Twere well for Kate and better for myself.

But what a fool am I to chat with you 120

When I should bid good morrow to my bride

And seal the title° with a lovely° kiss.

Exit [with GRUMIO].

TRANIO

He hath some meaning in his mad attire.

We will persuade him, be it possible,

To put on better ere he go to church. 125

BAPTISTA

I'll after him and see the event° of this.

Exit [with GRUMIO and ATTENDANTS].

TRANIO

But to her love concerneth us to add

Her father's liking, which to bring to pass,

As I before imparted to your worship,

I am to get a man—whate'er he be 130

It skills° not much, we'll fit him to our turn°—

And he shall be Vincentio of Pisa,

And make assurance° here in Padua

Of greater sums than I have promised.

94 monument warning sign 95 prodigy marvel 98

101 of import important 106 enforcèd to digress forced to wedding day," II.i.308) 115 Good sooth yes indeed 117

126 event upshot, outcome 131 skills matters; turn purpose

So shall you quietly enjoy your hope
And marry sweet Bianca with consent.

LUCENTIO

Were it not that my fellow schoolmaster
Doth watch Bianca's steps so narrowly,
'Twere good, methinks, to steal our marriage,^o
Which once performed, let all the world say no,
I'll keep mine own despite of all the world.

TRANIO

That by degrees we mean to look into
And watch our vantage^o in this business.
We'll overreach^o the graybeard, Gremio,
The narrow-prying father, Minola,
The quaint^o musician, amorous Litio—
All for my master's sake, Lucentio.

Enter GREMIO.

Signior Gremio, came you from the church?

GREMIO

As willingly as e'er I came from school.

TRANIO

And is the bride and bridegroom coming home?

GREMIO

A bridegroom say you? 'Tis a groom^o indeed,
A grumbling groom, and that the girl shall find.

TRANIO

Curster than she? Why, 'tis impossible.

GREMIO

Why, he's a devil, a devil, a very fiend.

TRANIO

Why, she's a devil, a devil, the devil's dam.^o

GREMIO

Tut, she's a lamb, a dove, a fool to^o him.
I'll tell you, Sir Lucentio, when the priest
Should ask, if Katherine should be his wife,
"Ay, by goggs woones!"^o quoth he and swore so loud
That, all amazed, the priest let fall the book,
And as he stooped again to take it up,
This mad-brained bridegroom took^o him such a cuff
That down fell priest and book and book and priest.
"Now, take them up," quoth he, "if any list."^o

TRANIO

What said the wench when he rose again?

GREMIO

Trembled and shook, for why^o he stamped and swore
As if the vicar meant to cozen^o him.
But after many ceremonies done
He calls for wine. "A health!" quoth he as if He had been aboard, carousing^o to his mates
After a storm; quaffed off the muscadel^o
And threw the sops^o all in the sexton's face,
Having no other reason
But that his beard grew thin and hungerly,^o
And seemed to ask him sops as he was drinking.

135

This done, he took the bride about the neck
And kissed her lips with such a clamorous smack
That at the parting all the church did echo,
And I, seeing this, came thence for very shame.
And after me, I know, the rout^o is coming.
Such a mad marriage never was before.
Hark, hark, I hear the minstrels play.

180

Music plays. Enter PETRUCHIO, KATE, BIANCA, HORTENSIO [as Litio], BAPTISTA [with GRUMIO and others].

PETRUCHIO

145

Gentlemen and friends, I thank you for your pains.
I know you think to dine with me today
And have prepared great store of wedding cheer,^o
But so it is, my haste doth call me hence
And therefore here I mean to take my leave.

185

BAPTISTA

Is't possible you will away tonight?

PETRUCHIO

150

I must away today, before night come.
Make it no wonder;^o if you knew my business,
You would entreat me rather go than stay.
And, honest company, I thank you all
That have beheld me give away myself
To this most patient, sweet, and virtuous wife.
Dine with my father, drink a health to me,
For I must hence, and farewell to you all.

190

195

TRANIO

Let us entreat you stay till after dinner.

155

PETRUCHIO

It may not be.

GREMIO

Let me entreat you.

PETRUCHIO

It cannot be.

KATE

Let me entreat you.

160

PETRUCHIO

I am content.

KATE

Are you content to stay?

200

PETRUCHIO

I am content you shall entreat me stay,
But yet not stay, entreat me how you can.

165

KATE

Now if you love me, stay.

PETRUCHIO

Grumio, my horse!^o

GRUMIO

Ay, sir, they be ready; the oats have eaten
the horses.^o

205

170

Nay then,
Do what thou canst, I will not go today,
No, nor tomorrow, not till I please myself.
The door is open, sir, there lies your way.
You may be jogging whiles your boots are green;^o
For me, I'll not be gone till I please myself.
'Tis like you'll prove a jolly^o surly groom,
That take it on you^o at the first so roundly.^o

KATE

I will be angry. What hast thou to do?^o

Father, be quiet; he shall stay my leisure.^o

GREMIO

Ay, marry, sir, now it begins to work.

KATE

Gentlemen, forward to the bridal dinner.

I see a woman may be made a fool

If she had not a spirit to resist.

PETRUCHIO

They shall go forward, Kate, at thy command.

Obeys the bride, you that attend on her.

Go to the feast, revel and domineer,^o

Carouse full measure to her maidenhead,

Be mad and merry, or go hang yourselves.

But for my bonny Kate, she must with me.

Nay, look not big,^o nor stamp, nor stare,^o nor fret;

I will be master of what is mine own.

She is my goods, my chattels; she is my house,

My household stuff, my field, my barn,

And here she stands. Touch her whoever dare,

Draw forth thy weapon, we are beset with thieves.

Rescue thy mistress, if you be a man.

Fear not, sweet wench; they shall not touch thee, Kate.

I'll buckler^o thee against a million.

Exeunt PETRUCHIO, KATE [and GRUMIO].

BAPTISTA

Nay, let them go, a couple of quiet ones.

GREMIO

Went they not quickly, I should die with laughing.

TRANIO

Of all mad matches never was the like.

LUCENTIO

Mistress, what's your opinion of your sister?

BIANCA

That being mad herself, she's madly mated.

GREMIO

I warrant him, Petruchio is Kated.

BAPTISTA

Neighbors and friends, though bride and bridegroom

For to supply the places at the table,

You know there wants no junkets^o at the feast.

[To TRANIO.]

Lucentio, you shall supply the bridegroom's place,

And let Bianca take her sister's room.

TRANIO

Shall sweet Bianca practice how to bride it?

BAPTISTA

She shall, Lucentio. Come, gentlemen, let's go.

Exeunt.

[A C T I V]

[Scene I. Petruchio's country house.]

Enter GRUMIO.

GRUMIO Fie, fie, on all tired jades,^o on all mad masters, and all foul ways!^o Was ever man so beaten? Was ever man so rayed?^o Was ever man so weary? I am sent before to make a fire, and they are coming after to warm them. Now were not I a little pot and soon hot,^o my very lips might freeze to my teeth, my tongue to the roof of my mouth, my heart in my belly, ere I should come by a fire to thaw me. But I with blowing the fire shall warm myself, for considering the weather, a taller^o man than I will take cold. Holla, ho, Curtis!

Enter CURTIS [a servant].

CURTIS Who is that calls so coldly?

GRUMIO A piece of ice. If thou doubt it, thou mayst slide from my shoulder to my heel with no greater a run^o but my head and my neck. A fire, good Curtis.

CURTIS Is my master and his wife coming, Grumio?

GRUMIO O ay, Curtis, ay, and therefore fire, fire; cast on no water.^o

CURTIS Is she so hot a shrew as she's reported?

GRUMIO She was, good Curtis, before this frost, but thou know'st winter tames man, woman, and beast; for it hath tamed my old master, and my new mistress, and myself, fellow Curtis.

CURTIS Away, you three-inch^o fool! I am no beast.

GRUMIO Am I but three inches? Why, thy horn^o is a foot, and so long am I at the least. But wilt thou make a fire, or shall I complain on thee to our mistress, whose hand—she being now at hand—thou shalt soon feel, to thy cold comfort, for being slow in thy hot office?^o

CURTIS I prithee, good Grumio, tell me, how goes the world?

GRUMIO A cold world, Curtis, in every office but thine, and therefore, fire. Do thy duty and have thy duty,^o for my master and mistress are almost frozen to death.

CURTIS There's fire ready, and therefore, good Grumio, the news.

GRUMIO Why, "Jack boy, ho boy!"^o and as much news as wilt thou.

CURTIS Come, you are so full of cony-catching.^o

GRUMIO Why therefore fire, for I have caught extreme cold. Where's the cook? Is supper ready, the house trimmed, rushes strewed,^o cobwebs swept, the servingmen in their new fustian,^o the white stockings, and every officer^o his wedding garment on? Be the

GRUMIO First, know my horse is tired, my master and mistress fall'n out.

CURTIS How? 50

GRUMIO Out of their saddles into the dirt—and thereby hangs a tale.

CURTIS Let's ha't, good Grumio.

GRUMIO Lend thine ear.

CURTIS Here. 55

GRUMIO There.

[Strikes him.]

CURTIS This 'tis to feel a tale, not to hear a tale.

GRUMIO And therefore 'tis called a sensible° tale, and this cuff was but to knock at your ear and beseech list'ning. Now I begin. Imprimis,° we came down a 60 foul° hill, my master riding behind my mistress—

CURTIS Both of° one horse?

GRUMIO What's that to thee?

CURTIS Why, a horse.

GRUMIO Tell thou the tale. But hadst thou not 65 crossed° me thou shouldst have heard how her horse fell and she under her horse. Thou shouldst have heard in how miry a place, how she was bemoiled,° how he left her with the horse upon her, how he beat me because her horse stumbled, how she waded through 70 the dirt to pluck him off me; how he swore, how she prayed that never prayed before; how I cried, how the horses ran away, how her bridle was burst, how I lost my crupper, with many things of worthy memory which now shall die in oblivion, and thou return 75 unexperienced° to thy grave.

CURTIS By this reck'ning° he is more shrew than she.

GRUMIO Ay, and that thou and the proudest of you all shall find when he comes home. But what° talk
I of this? Call forth Nathaniel, Joseph, Nicholas, 80
Philip, Walter, Sugarsop, and the rest. Let their heads be slickly° combed, their blue° coats brushed, and their garters of an indifferent° knit. Let them curtsy with their left legs and not presume to touch a hair of my master's horsetail till they kiss their hands. Are 85 they all ready?

CURTIS They are.

GRUMIO Call them forth.

CURTIS Do you hear, ho? You must meet my master to countenance° my mistress. 90

GRUMIO Why, she hath a face of her own.

CURTIS Who knows not that?

GRUMIO Thou, it seems, that calls for company to countenance her.

CURTIS I call them forth to credit° her. 95

GRUMIO Why, she comes to borrow nothing of them.

Enter our for five SERVINGMEN.

NATHANIEL Welcome home, Grumio!

PHILIP How now, Grumio?

JOSEPH What, Grumio!

NICHOLAS Fellow Grumio! 100

NATHANIEL How now, old lad!

GRUMIO Welcome, you; how now, you; what, you; fellow, you; and thus much for greeting. Now, my spruce companions, is all ready and all things neat?

NATHANIEL All things is ready. How near is our 105
master?

GRUMIO E'en at hand, alighted by this,° and therefore be not—Cock's° passion, silence! I hear my master.

Enter PETRUCHIO and KATE.

PETRUCHIO

Where be these knaves? What, no man at door

To hold my stirrup nor to take my horse? 110

Where is Nathaniel, Gregory, Philip?

ALL SERVINGMEN Here, here, sir, here, sir.

Here, sir, here sir, here, sir, here, sir!

You loggerheaded° and unpolished grooms!

What, no attendance? No regard? No duty? 115

Where is the foolish knave I sent before?

GRUMIO

Here, sir, as foolish as I was before.

PETRUCHIO

You peasant swain!° You whoreson° malt-horse drudge!°

Did I not bid thee meet me in the park°

And bring along these rascal knaves with thee? 120

GRUMIO

Nathaniel's coat, sir, was not fully made

And Gabriel's pumps were all unpinked° i' th' heel.

There was no link° to color Peter's hat,

And Walter's dagger was not come from sheathing.°

There were none fine but Adam, Rafe, and Gregory; 125

The rest were ragged, old, and beggarly.

Yet, as they are, here are they come to meet you.

PETRUCHIO

Go, rascals, go, and fetch my supper in.

Exeunt SERVANTS.

Enter one with water.

Where's my spaniel Troilus? Sirrah, get you hence
And bid my cousin Ferdinand come hither—

One, Kate, that you must kiss and be acquainted with.
Where are my slippers? Shall I have some water?
Come, Kate, and wash, and welcome heartily.
You whoreson villain, will you let it fall?

KATE

Patience, I pray you. 'Twas a fault unwilling.

PETRUCHIO

A whoreson, beetle-headed,° flap-eared knave!
Come, Kate, sit down; I know you have a stomach.°
Will you give thanks,° sweet Kate, or else shall I?
What's this? Mutton?

FIRST SERVINGMAN Ay.

PETRUCHIO

Who brought it?

PETER

I.

PETRUCHIO

'Tis burnt, and so is all the meat.
What dogs are these! Where is the rascal cook?
How durst you, villains, bring it from the dresser,°
And serve it thus to me that love it not?
There, take it to you, trenchers,° cups, and all,

[Throws food and dishes at them.]

You heedless joltheads° and unmannered slaves!
What, do you grumble? I'll be with° you straight.°

KATE

I pray you, husband, be not so disquiet.
The meat was well if you were so contented.°

PETRUCHIO

I tell thee, Kate, 'twas burnt and dried away,
And I expressly am forbid to touch it,
For it engenders choler,° planteth anger,
And better 'twere that both of us did fast—
Since of ourselves, ourselves are choleric°—
Than feed it° with such overroasted flesh.
Be patient. Tomorrow't shall be mended,°
And for this night we'll fast for company.°
Come, I will bring thee to thy bridal chamber.

Exeunt.

135

Enter CURTIS, a servant.

GRUMIO Where is he?

170

CURTIS In her chamber, making a sermon of continency to her,

And rails and swears and rates,° that she, poor soul,
Knows not which way to stand, to look, to speak,
And sits as one new-risen from a dream.

175

Away, away, for he is coming hither. [Exeunt.]

Enter PETRUCHIO.

PETRUCHIO

Thus have I politicly° begun my reign,
And 'tis my hope to end successfully.
My falcon° now is sharp° and passing empty,
And till she stoop° she must not be full gorged,°

180

For then she never looks upon her lure.°
Another way I have to man° my haggard,°

To make her come and know her keeper's call,

145

That is, to watch° her as we watch these kites°

That bate and beat° and will not be obedient.

185

She eat° no meat today, nor none shall eat.

Last night she slept not, nor tonight she shall not.

As with the meat, some undeservèd fault

I'll find about the making of the bed,

And here I'll fling the pillow, there the bolster,°

190

This way the coverlet, another way the sheets.

Ay, and amid this hurly° I intend°

That all is done in reverent care of her,

150

And in conclusion she shall watch° all night.

And if she chance to nod I'll rail and brawl

195

And with the clamor keep her still awake.

This is a way to kill a wife with kindness,°

And thus I'll curb her mad and headstrong humor.

He that knows better how to tame a shrew,°

Now let him speak—'tis charity to show. Exit. 200

Sir, to satisfy you in what I have said,
Stand by and mark the manner of his teaching. 5

Enter BIANCA [and LUCENTIO as Cambio].

LUCENTIO

Now mistress, profit you in what you read?

BIANCA

What, master, read you? First resolve° me that.

LUCENTIO

I read that° I profess,° the Art to Love.°

BIANCA

And may you prove, sir, master of your art.

LUCENTIO

While you, sweet dear, prove mistress of my heart. 10

[They court.]

HORTENSIO

Quick proceeders,° marry!° Now, tell me, I pray,
You that durst swear that your mistress Bianca
Loved none in the world so well as Lucentio.

TRANIO

O despiteful° love! Unconstant womankind!
I tell thee, Litio, this is wonderful.° 15

HORTENSIO

Mistake no more. I am not Litio,
Nor a musician, as I seem to be,
But one that scorn to live in this disguise,
For such a one as leaves a gentleman
And makes a god of such a cullion.° 20
Know, sir, that I am called Hortensio.

TRANIO

Signior Hortensio, I have often heard
Of your entire affection to Bianca,
And since mine eyes are witness of her lightness,°
I will with you, if you be so contented, 25
Forswear° Bianca and her love forever.

HORTENSIO

See, how they kiss and court! Signior Lucentio,
Here is my hand and here I firmly vow
Never to woo her more, but do forswear her,
As one unworthy all the former favors° 30
That I have fondly° flattered her withal.

TRANIO

And here I take the like unfeignèd oath,
Never to marry with her though she would entreat.
Fie on her! See how beastly° she doth court him.

HORTENSIO

Would all the world but he had quite forsworn.° 35
For me, that I may surely keep mine oath,
I will be married to a wealthy widow
Ere three days pass, which° hath as long loved me
As I have loved this proud disdainful haggard.°

Nay, I have ta'en you napping,° gentle love,
And have forsworn you with Hortensio.

BIANCA

Tranio, you jest. But have you both forsworn me?

TRANIO

Mistress, we have.

LUCENTIO

Then we are rid of Litio.

TRANIO

I' faith, he'll have a lusty° widow now, 50
That shall be wooed and wedded in a day.

BIANCA

God give him joy!

TRANIO

Ay, and he'll tame her.

BIANCA

He says so, Tranio.

TRANIO

Faith, he is gone unto the taming school.

BIANCA

The taming school! What, is there such a place? 55

TRANIO

Ay, mistress, and Petruchio is the master,
That teacheth tricks eleven and twenty long°
To tame a shrew and charm her chattering tongue.

Enter BIONDELLO.

BIONDELLO

O master, master, I have watched so long
That I am dog-weary, but at last I spied 60
An ancient angel° coming down the hill
Will serve the turn.°

TRANIO

What° is he, Biondello?

BIONDELLO

Master, a mercatante° or a pedant,°
I know not what, but formal in apparel,
In gait and countenance° surely like a father. 65

LUCENTIO

And what of him, Tranio?

TRANIO

If he be credulous and trust my tale,
I'll make him glad to seem Vincentio,
And give assurance to Baptista Minola
As if he were the right Vincentio. 70
Take in your love and then let me alone.

[Exeunt LUCENTIO and BIANCA.]

Enter a PEDANT.

PEDANT

God save you, sir.

Sir, at the farthest for a week or two,
But then up farther and as far as Rome,
And so to Tripoli if God lend me life.

TRANIO

What countryman,° I pray?

PEDANT

Of Mantua.

TRANIO

Of Mantua, sir? Marry, God forbid!
And come to Padua, careless of your life?

PEDANT

My life, sir? How, I pray? For that goes hard.°

TRANIO

'Tis death for anyone in Mantua
To come to Padua. Know you not the cause?
Your ships are stayed° at Venice and the duke,
For private quarrel 'twixt your duke and him,
Hath published and proclaimed it openly.
'Tis marvel, but that you are but newly come,
You might have heard it else proclaimed about.

PEDANT

Alas, sir, it is worse for me than so,°
For I have bills for money by exchange
From Florence and must here deliver them.

TRANIO

Well, sir, to do you courtesy,
This will I do and this I will advise° you.
First tell me, have you ever been at Pisa?

PEDANT

Ay, sir, in Pisa have I often been—
Pisa, renowned for grave citizens.

TRANIO

Among them, know you one Vincentio?

PEDANT

I know him not but I have heard of him—
A merchant of incomparable wealth.

TRANIO

He is my father, sir, and, sooth to say,
In count'nance somewhat doth resemble you.

BIONDELLO [Aside.] As much as an apple doth an oyster, and all one.°

TRANIO

To save your life in this extremity,
This favor will I do you for his sake,
And think it not the worst of all your fortunes
That you are like to Sir Vincentio.
His name and credit° shall you undertake,°
And in my house you shall be friendly lodged.
Look that you take upon you° as you should.
You understand me, sir? So shall you stay
Till you have done your business in the city.
If this be court'sy, sir, accept of it.

PEDANT

O sir, I do, and will repute° you ever
The patron of my life and liberty.

TRANIO

Then go with me to make the matter good.
This, by the way,° I let you understand:

To pass assurance° of a dower in marriage
'Twixt me and one Baptista's daughter here.
In all these circumstances I'll instruct you.
Go with me to clothe you as becomes you. Exeunt.

[Scene III. In Petruchio's house.]

Enter KATE and GRUMIO.

GRUMIO

No, no, forsooth, I dare not for my life.

KATE

The more my wrong,° the more his spite appears.
What, did he marry me to famish me?

Beggars that come unto my father's door,
Upon entreaty have a present° alms;
If not, elsewhere they meet with charity.

But I, who never knew how to entreat
Nor never needed that I should entreat,
Am starved for meat,° giddy for lack of sleep,
With oaths kept waking and with brawling fed.

And that which spites me more than all these wants,
He does it under name of perfect love,
As who should say,° if I should sleep or eat
'Twere deadly sickness or else present death.

I prithee go and get me some repast,
I care not what, so° it be wholesome food.

GRUMIO

What say you to a neat's° foot?

KATE

'Tis passing good; I prithee let me have it.

GRUMIO

I fear it is too choleric° a meat.
How say you to a fat tripe finely broiled?

KATE

I like it well. Good Grumio, fetch it me.

GRUMIO

I cannot tell, I fear 'tis choleric.
What say you to a piece of beef and mustard?

KATE

A dish that I do love to feed upon.

GRUMIO

Ay, but the mustard is too hot a little.

KATE

Why then, the beef, and let the mustard rest.

GRUMIO

Nay then, I will not! You shall have the mustard
Or else you get no beef of Grumio.

KATE

Then both or one, or anything thou wilt.

GRUMIO

Why then, the mustard without the beef.

KATE

Go, get thee gone, thou false deluding slave,

Beats him.

That feed'st me with the very name° of meat.

Enter PETRUCHIO and HORTENSIO with meat.

PETRUCHIO

How fares my Kate? What, sweeting, all amort?°

HORTENSIO

Mistress, what cheer?°

KATE

Faith, as cold° as can be.

PETRUCHIO

Pluck up thy spirits; look cheerfully upon me.

Here, love, thou see'st how diligent I am

To dress thy meat° myself and bring it thee.

40

I am sure, sweet Kate, this kindness merits thanks.

What, not a word? Nay then, thou lov'st it not,

And all my pains is sorted to no proof.°

Here, take away this dish.

KATE

I pray you, let it stand.

PETRUCHIO

The poorest service is repaid with thanks,

45

And so shall mine before you touch the meat.

KATE

I thank you, sir.

HORTENSIO

Signior Petruchio, fie, you are to blame.

Come, Mistress Kate, I'll bear you company.

PETRUCHIO [Aside.]

Eat it up all, Hortensio, if thou lovest me;

50

Much good do it unto thy gentle heart.

Kate, eat apace. And now, my honey love,

Will we return unto thy father's house

And revel it as bravely° as the best,

With silken coats and caps and golden rings,

55

With ruffs° and cuffs and fardingales° and things,

With scarfs and fans and double change of brav'ry,°

With amber bracelets, beads, and all this knav'ry.°

What, hast thou dined? The tailor stays thy leisure°

60

To deck thy body with his ruffling° treasure.

Enter TAILOR.

Come, tailor, let us see these ornaments.

Enter HABERDASHER.

Lay forth the gown. What news with you, sir?

HABERDASHER

Here is the cap your worship did bespeak.°

PETRUCHIO

Why, this was molded on a porringer°—

A velvet dish. Fie, fie, 'tis lewd° and filthy.

65

Why, 'tis a cockle° or a walnut shell,

A knack,° a toy, a trick,° a baby's cap.

Away with it! Come, let me have a bigger.

KATE

I'll have no bigger. This doth fit the time,°

70

And gentlewomen wear such caps as these.

PETRUCHIO

When you are gentle you shall have one too,

And not till then.

HORTENSIO [Aside.] That will not be in haste.

KATE

Why, sir, I trust I may have leave to speak,

And speak I will. I am no child, no babe.

75

Your betters have endured me say my mind,

And if you cannot, best you stop your ears.

My tongue will tell the anger of my heart,

Or else my heart, concealing it, will break,

And rather than it shall I will be free

80

Even to the uttermost, as I please, in words.

PETRUCHIO

Why, thou say'st true. It is a paltry cap,

A custard-coffin,° a bauble, a silken pie.°

I love thee well in that thou lik'st it not.

KATE

Love me or love me not, I like the cap,

85

And it I will have or I will have none.

[Exit HABERDASHER.]

PETRUCHIO

Thy gown? Why, ay. Come, tailor, let us see't.

O mercy, God! What masquing° stuff is here?

What's this? A sleeve? 'Tis like a demi-cannon.°

50

What, up and down,° carved like an apple tart?

90

Here's snip and nip and cut and slish and slash,

Like to a censer° in a barber's shop.

Why, what, a° devil's name, tailor, call'st thou this?

HORTENSIO [Aside.]

55

I see she's like to have neither cap nor gown.

TAILOR

You bid me make it orderly and well,

95

According to the fashion and the time.

PETRUCHIO

Marry, and did, but if you be rememb'ed,

I did not bid you mar it to the time.°

Go, hop me over every kennel° home,

For you shall hop without my custom, sir.

100

I'll none of it. Hence, make your best of it.

KATE

I never saw a better-fashioned gown,

More quaint,° more pleasing, nor more commendable.

Belike° you mean to make a puppet of me.

PETRUCHIO

Why, true, he means to make a puppet of thee.

105

She says your worship means to make a puppet of her.

 TAILOR
 Yqur worship is deceived. The gown is made
 Just as my master had direction.^o
 Grumio gave order how it should be done.
 GRUMIO I gave him no order; I gave him the stuff.
 TAILOR
 But how did you desire it should be made? 120
 GRUMIO Marry, sir, with needle and thread.
 TAILOR
 But did you not request to have it cut?
 GRUMIO Thou hast faced^o many things.
 TAILOR I have.
 GRUMIO Face^o not me. Thou hast braved^o many men; 125 brave^o not me. I will neither be faced nor braved. I say unto thee, I bid thy master cut out the gown, but I did not bid him cut it to pieces. Ergo,^o thou liest.
 TAILOR Why, here is the note^o of the fashion to

 PETRUCHIO Read it.
 GRUMIO The note lies in's throat^o if he^o say I said so.
 TAILOR "Imprimis,^o a loose-bodied gown."^o
 GRUMIO Master, if ever I said loose-bodied gown, sew me in the skirts of it and beat me to death with a 135

 PETRUCHIO Proceed.
 TAILOR "With a small compassed^o cape."
 GRUMIO I confess the cape.
 TAILOR "With a trunk^o sleeve."
 GRUMIO I confess two sleeves. 140
 TAILOR "The sleeves curiously^o cut."
 PETRUCHIO Ay, there's the villainy.

of Baptista's house.]

Enter TRANIO [as Lucentio] and the PEDANT dressed like Vincentio.

TRANIO

Sir, this is the house. Please it you that I call?

PEDANT

Ay, what else? And but° I be deceived,
Signior Baptista may remember me
Near twenty years ago in Genoa,
Where we were lodgers at the Pegasus.°

TRANIO

'Tis well, and hold your own° in any case
With such austerity as 'longeth to a father.

PEDANT

I warrant° you. But sir, here comes your boy;
'Twere good he were schooled.°

Enter BIONDELLO.

TRANIO

Fear you not him. Sirrah Biondello,
Now do your duty thoroughly,° I advise you.
Imagine 'twere the right Vincentio.

BIONDELLO

Tut, fear not me.

TRANIO

But hast thou done thy errand to Baptista?

BIONDELLO

I told him that your father was at Venice
And that you looked for him this day in Padua.

TRANIO

Th' art a tall° fellow. Hold thee that° to drink.
Here comes Baptista. Set your countenance, sir.

Enter BAPTISTA and LUCENTIO [as Cambio]. PEDANT booted and bareheaded.°

Signior Baptista, you are happily met.

[To the PEDANT.]

Sir, this is the gentleman I told you of.
I pray you, stand good father to me now,
Give me Bianca for my patrimony.

PEDANT

Soft,° son.

Sir, by your leave. Having come to Padua
To gather in some debts, my son Lucentio
Made me acquainted with a weighty cause°
Of love between your daughter and himself.
And—for the good report I hear of you,
And for the love he beareth to your daughter,
And she to him—to stay° him not too long,
I am content, in a good father's care,
To have him matched. And if you please to like°

No worse than I, upon some agreement
Me shall you find ready and willing
With one consent to have her so bestowed,
For curious° I cannot be with you,
Signior Baptista, of whom I hear so well.

BAPTISTA

Sir, pardon me in what I have to say.
Your plainness and your shortness° please me well.
Right true it is, your son Lucentio here
Doth love my daughter and she loveth him—
Or both dissemble deeply their affections—
And therefore, if you say no more than this,
That like a father you will deal with him
And pass° my daughter a sufficient dower,
The match is made, and all is done.
Your son shall have my daughter with consent.

TRANIO

I thank you, sir. Where, then, do you know° best
We be affied° and such assurance ta'en
As shall with either part's° agreement stand?

BAPTISTA

Not in my house, Lucentio, for you know
Pitchers have ears, and I have many servants.
Besides, old Gremio is heark'ning still,°
And happily° we might be interrupted.

TRANIO

Then at my lodging and it like° you.
There doth my father lie,° and there this night
We'll pass° the business privately and well.
Send for your daughter by your servant here;
My boy shall fetch the scrivener° presently.
The worst is this, that at so slender warning°
You are like to have a thin and slender pittance.°

BAPTISTA

It likes° me well. Cambio, hie you home
And bid Bianca make her ready straight,
And, if you will, tell what hath happenèd:
Lucentio's father is arrived in Padua,
And how she's like to be Lucentio's wife.

[Exit LUCENTIO.]

BIONDELLO

I pray the gods she may with all my heart! Exit.

TRANIO

Dally not with the gods, but get thee gone.
Signior Baptista, shall I lead the way?
Welcome, one mess° is like to be your cheer.°
Come, sir, we will better it in Pisa.

BAPTISTA

I follow you. Exeunt.

Enter LUCENTIO [as Cambio] and BIONDELLO.

BIONDELLO Cambio!

BIONDELLO The old priest at Saint Luke's church is at your command at all hours.

LUCENTIO And what of all this? 90

LUCENTIO Hear'st thou, Biondello?

BIONDELLO I cannot tarry. I knew a wench married in an afternoon as she went to the garden for parsley 100 to stuff a rabbit. And so may you, sir. And so adieu, sir. My master hath appointed me to go to Saint Luke's, to bid the priest be ready to come against you come^o with your appendix.^o Exit.

LUCENTIO

I may, and will, if she be so contented. 105 She will be pleased; then wherefore should I doubt? Hap what hap may, I'll roundly^o go about^o her. It shall go hard if Cambio go without her. Exit.

Enter PETRUCHIO, KATE, HORTENSIO [with SERVANTS.]

PETRUCHIO

Come on, a^o God's name, once more toward our father's.

Good Lord, how bright and goodly shines the moon.

KATE

The moon? The sun. It is not moonlight now.

PETRUCHIO

I say it is the moon that shines so bright.

KATE

I know it is the sun that shines so bright. 5

And not unluckily against the bias.^o 25

But soft,^o company^o is coming here.

Enter VINCENTIO.

[To VINCENTIO.]

Good morrow, gentle mistress; where away?

Tell me, sweet Kate, and tell me truly too,

Hast thou beheld a fresher^o gentlewoman?

Such war of white and red within her cheeks! 30

What stars do spangle heaven with such beauty

As those two eyes become that heavenly face?

Fair lovely maid, once more good day to thee.

Sweet Kate, embrace her for her beauty's sake.

HORTENSIO [Aside.]

'A^o will make the man mad, to make a woman of him. 35

KATE

Young budding virgin, fair and fresh and sweet,

Whither away, or where is thy abode?

Happy the parents of so fair a child!

Happier the man whom favorable stars

Allots thee for his lovely bedfellow! 40

PETRUCHIO

Why, how now, Kate, I hope thou are not mad.

This is a man, old, wrinkled, faded, withered,

And not a maiden, as thou say'st he is.

KATE

Pardon, old father, my mistaking eyes

That have been so bedazzled with the sun

That everything I look on seemeth green.^o 45

Now I perceive thou art a reverend father;

Pardon, I pray thee, for my mad mistaking.

That with your strange encounter^o much amazed me,
My name is called Vincentio, my dwelling Pisa,
And bound I am to Padua, there to visit 55
A son of mine which long I have not seen.

PETRUCHIO

What is his name?

VINCENTIO

Lucentio, gentle sir.

PETRUCHIO

Happily met, the happier for thy son.
And now by law as well as reverend age,
I may entitle thee my loving father. 60
The sister to my wife, this gentlewoman,
Thy son by this^o hath married. Wonder not
Nor be not grieved. She is of good esteem,
Her dowry wealthy, and of worthy birth;
Beside, so qualified^o as may beseem^o 65
The spouse of any noble gentleman.
Let me embrace with old Vincentio
And wander we to see thy honest son,
Who will of thy arrival be full joyous.

VINCENTIO

But is this true, or is it else your pleasure, 70
Like pleasant^o travelers, to break a jest
Upon the company you overtake?

HORTENSIO

I do assure thee, father, so it is.

PETRUCHIO

Come, go along, and see the truth hereof,
For our first merriment hath made thee jealous.^o 75
Exeunt [all but HORTENSIO].

HORTENSIO

Well, Petruchio, this has put me in heart.

Then hast thou taught Hortensio to be untoward.^o

PETRUCHIO

Sir, here's the door, this is Lucentio's house.
My father's bears^o more toward the marketplace; 10
Thither must I, and here I leave you, sir.

VINCENTIO

You shall not choose but drink before you go.
I think I shall command your welcome here,
And by all likelihood some cheer is toward.^o

Knock.

GREMIO They're busy within. You were best knock 15 louder.

PEDANT [as Vincentio] looks out of the window [above].

PEDANT What's^o he that knocks as he would beat down the gate?

VINCENTIO Is Signior Lucentio within, sir?

PEDANT He's within, sir, but not to be spoken withal.^o 20

VINCENTIO What if a man bring him a hundred pound or two, to make merry withal?

PEDANT Keep your hundred pounds to yourself; he shall need none so long as I live.

PETRUCHIO Nay, I told you your son was well 25 beloved in Padua. Do you hear, sir? To leave frivolous circumstances,^o I pray you tell Signior Lucentio that his father is come from Pisa and is here at the door to speak with him.

PEDANT Thou liest. His father is come from Padua^o 30 and here looking out at the window.

VINCENTIO Art thou his father?

PEDANT Ay sir, so his mother says, if I may believe her.

PETRUCHIO [To VINCENTIO.] Why how now, 35 gentleman? Why this is flat^o knavery, to take upon you another man's name.

PEDANT Lay hands on the villain. I believe 'a^o means to cozen^o somebody in this city under my countenance.^o 40

Enter BIONDELLO.

BIONDELLO I have seen them in the church together;
God send 'em good shipping!^o But who is here?
Mine old master, Vincentio! Now we are undone^o and brought to nothing.^o

VINCENTIO Come hither, crack-hemp.^o 45

BIONDELLO I hope I may choose,^o sir.

BIONDELLO Forgot you? No, sir. I could not forget you, for I never saw you before in all my life. 50

VINCENTIO What, you notorious^o villain, didst thou never see thy master's father, Vincentio?

BIONDELLO What, my old worshipful old master? Yes, marry, sir, see where he looks out of the window.

VINCENTIO Is't so, indeed? 55

He beats BIONDELLO.

BIONDELLO Help, help, help! Here's a madman will murder me. [Exit.]

PEDANT Help, son! Help, Signior Baptista! [Exit from above.]

PETRUCHIO Prithee, Kate, let's stand aside and see the end of this controversy. [They stand aside.] 60

Enter PEDANT [below] with SERVANTS, BAPTISTA, [and] TRANIO [as Lucentio].

TRANIO Sir, what are you that offer^o to beat my servant?

VINCENTIO What am I, sir? Nay, what are you, sir? O immortal gods! O fine^o villain! A silken doublet, a velvet hose, a scarlet cloak, and a copatain^o hat! O, I 65 am undone, I am undone! While I play the good husband^o at home, my son and my servant spend all at the university.

TRANIO How now, what's the matter?

BAPTISTA What, is the man lunatic? 70

TRANIO Sir, you seem a sober ancient gentleman by your habit,^o but your words show you a madman. Why sir, what 'cerns^o it you if I wear pearl and gold? I thank my good father, I am able to maintain it.

VINCENTIO Thy father! O villain, he is a sailmaker in 75 Bergamo.

BAPTISTA You mistake, sir, you mistake, sir. Pray, what do you think is his name?

VINCENTIO His name! As if I knew not his name! I have brought him up ever since he was three years old, 80 and his name is Tranio.

PEDANT Away, away, mad ass! His name is Lucentio, and he is mine only son and heir to the lands of me, Signior Vincentio.

VINCENTIO Lucentio! O he hath murd' red his master. 85 Lay hold on him, I charge you in the duke's name. O my son, my son! Tell me, thou villain, where is my son Lucentio?

TRANIO Call forth an officer.

[Enter an OFFICER.]

Carry this mad knave to the jail. Father Baptista, I 90 charge you see that he be forthcoming.^o

VINCENTIO Carry me to the jail!

GREMIO Stay, officer. He shall not go to prison.

BAPTISTA Talk not, Signior Gremio. I say he shall go to prison. 95

GREMIO Take heed, Signior Baptista, lest you be cony-catched^o in this business. I dare swear this is the right Vincentio.

PEDANT Swear, if thou dar'st.

GREMIO Nay, I dare not swear it. 100

TRANIO Then thou wert best^o say that I am not Lucentio.

GREMIO Yes, I know thee to be Signior Lucentio.

BAPTISTA Away with the dotard,^o to the jail with him! 105

VINCENTIO Thus strangers may be haled^o and abused. O monstrous villain!

Enter BIONDELLO, LUCENTIO, and BIANCA.

BIONDELLO O we are spoiled^o—and yonder he is. Deny him, forswear him, or else we are all undone.

Exit BIONDELLO, TRANIO, and PEDANT as fast as may be.

LUCENTIO

Pardon, sweet father. Kneel.

VINCENTIO Lives my sweet son? 110

BIANCA

Pardon, dear father.

BAPTISTA How hast thou offended?

Where is Lucentio?

LUCENTIO Here's Lucentio, Right son to the right Vincentio, That have by marriage made thy daughter mine While counterfeit supposes^o bleared thine eyne.^o 115

GREMIO

Here's packing,^o with a witness,^o to deceive us all!

VINCENTIO

Where is that damnèd villain Tranio

That faced and braved^o me in this matter so?

BAPTISTA

Why, tell me, is not this my Cambio?

BIANCA

Cambio is changed into Lucentio. 120

LUCENTIO

Love wrought these miracles. Bianca's love

Made me exchange my state with Tranio

While he did bear my countenance^o in the town,

And happily I have arrived at the last

Unto the wishèd haven of my bliss. 125

What Tranio did, myself enforced him to.

Then pardon him, sweet father, for my sake.

VINCENTIO I'll slit the villain's nose that would have sent me to the jail.

BAPTISTA [To LUCENTIO.] But do you hear, sir? 130 Have you married my daughter without asking my good will?

VINCENTIO Fear not, Baptista; we will content you, go to.^o But I will in, to be revenged for this villainy.

Exit.

 KATE Husband, let's follow, to see the end of this ado. 140
 PETRUCHIO First kiss me, Kate, and we will.
 KATE What, in the midst of the street?
 PETRUCHIO What, art thou ashamed of me?
 KATE No sir, God forbid, but ashamed to kiss.
 PETRUCHIO
 Why, then let's home again. 145
[To GRUMIO.]
 Come sirrah, let's away.
 KATE
 Nay, I will give thee a kiss. Now pray thee, love, stay.
 PETRUCHIO
 Is not this well? Come, my sweet Kate.
 Better once^o than never, for never too late.^o Exeunt.

[Scene II. Padua. In Lucentio's house.]

Enter BAPTISTA, VINCENTIO, GREMIO, the PEDANT, LUCENTIO, and BIANCA, [PETRUCHIO, KATE, HORTENSIO,] TRANIO, BIONDELLO, GRUMIO, and WIDOW; the SERVINGMEN with TRANIO bringing in a banquet.^o

LUCENTIO
 At last, though long,^o our jarring notes agree,
 And time it is, when raging war is done,
 To smile at 'scapes and perils overblown.^o
 My fair Bianca, bid my father welcome
 While I with selfsame kindness welcome thine. 5
 Brother Petruchio, sister Katherina,
 And thou, Hortensio, with thy loving widow,
 Feast with the best and welcome to my house.
 My banquet is to close our stomachs^o up
 After our great good cheer.^o Pray you, sit down,
 For now we sit to chat as well as eat.
 PETRUCHIO
 Nothing but sit and sit, and eat and eat.
 BAPTISTA
 Padua affords this kindness, son Petruchio.
 PETRUCHIO
 Padua affords nothing but what is kind.
 HORTENSIO
 For both our sakes I would that word were true. 15
 PETRUCHIO
 Now, for my life, Hortensio fears^o his widow.
 WIDOW
 Then never trust me if I be afeard.^o
 PETRUCHIO
 You are very sensible and yet you miss my sense:
 I mean Hortensio is afeard of you.

 KATE Mistress, how mean you that?
 WIDOW

 PETRUCHIO
 Conceives by^o me! How likes Hortensio that?
 HORTENSIO
 My widow says, thus she conceives her tale.^o
 PETRUCHIO
 Very well mended. Kiss him for that, good widow. 25
 KATE
 "He that is giddy thinks the world turns round."
 I pray you, tell me what you meant by that.
 WIDOW
 Your husband, being troubled with a shrew,
 Measures^o my husband's sorrow by his^o woe,
 And now you know my meaning. 30
 KATE
 A very mean^o meaning.
 WIDOW Right, I mean you.
 KATE
 And I am mean^o indeed, respecting you.

 Would say your head and butt were head and horn.^o
 VINCENTIO
 Ay, mistress bride, hath that awakened you?
 BIANCA
 Ay, but not frightened me; therefore I'll sleep again.
 PETRUCHIO
 Nay, that you shall not. Since you have begun,

Exit BIANCA [with KATE and WIDOW.]

PETRUCHIO

She hath prevented me.^o Here, Signior Tranio,
This bird you aimed at, though you hit her not;
Therefore a health to all that shot and missed.

TRANIO

O sir, Lucentio slipped^o me, like his greyhound,
Which runs himself and catches for his master.

PETRUCHIO

A good swift^o simile but something currish.

TRANIO

'Tis well, sir, that you hunted for yourself;
'Tis thought your deer^o does hold you at a bay.^o

BAPTISTA

O, O, Petruchio, Tranio hits you now.

LUCENTIO

I thank thee for that gird,^o good Tranio.

HORTENSIO

Confess, confess, hath he not hit you here?

PETRUCHIO

'A has a little galled^o me, I confess,
And as the jest did glance away from me,
'Tis ten to one it maimed you two outright.

BAPTISTA

Now, in good sadness,^o son Petruchio,
I think thou hast the veriest^o shrew of all.

PETRUCHIO

Well, I say no. And therefore, for assurance,^o
Let's each one send unto his wife,
And he whose wife is most obedient
To come at first when he doth send for her
Shall win the wager which we will propose.

HORTENSIO

Content. What's the wager?

LUCENTIO

Twenty crowns.

PETRUCHIO

Twenty crowns!

I'll venture so much of^o my hawk or hound,
But twenty times so much upon my wife.

LUCENTIO

A hundred then.

HORTENSIO

Content.^o

PETRUCHIO

A match,^o 'tis done.

HORTENSIO

Who shall begin?

LUCENTIO

That will I.

Go, Biondello, bid your mistress come to me.

BIONDELLO I go.

Exit.

BAPTISTA

Son, I'll be your half,^o Bianca comes.

LUCENTIO

I'll have no halves; I'll bear it all myself.

Enter BIONDELLO.

How now,^o what news?

BIONDELLO Sir, my mistress sends you word 80
That she is busy and she cannot come.

PETRUCHIO

How?^o She's busy and she cannot come?
Is that an answer?

GREMIO

Ay, and a kind one too.

Pray God, sir, your wife send you not a worse.

PETRUCHIO I hope, better.

85

HORTENSIO Sirrah Biondello, go and entreat my wife to come to me forthwith.^o Exit BIONDELLO.

PETRUCHIO O ho, entreat her! Nay, then she must needs come.

55

HORTENSIO I am afraid, sir, do what you can, yours 90 will not be entreated.

Enter BIONDELLO.

Now where's my wife?

BIONDELLO

She says you have some goodly jest in hand.
She will not come. She bids you come to her.

PETRUCHIO

60

Worse and worse. She will not come. O vile,
Intolerable, not to be endured!

95

Sirrah Grumio, go to your mistress; say
I command her come to me. Exit [GRUMIO].

HORTENSIO

I know her answer.

PETRUCHIO

What?

65

HORTENSIO She will not.

PETRUCHIO

The fouler fortune mine, and there an end.

100

Enter KATE.

BAPTISTA

Now, by my holidame,^o here comes Katherina.

KATE

70

What is your will, sir, that you send for me?

PETRUCHIO

Where is your sister and Hortensio's wife?

KATE

They sit conferring^o by the parlor fire.

PETRUCHIO

Go fetch them hither. If they deny^o to come,
Swinge^o me them soundly^o forth unto their husbands. 105

Away, I say, and bring them hither straight.

[Exit KATE.]

LUCENTIO

75

Here is a wonder, if you talk of a wonder.

HORTENSIO

And so it is. I wonder what it bodes.

PETRUCHIO

Marry, peace it bodes, and love, and quiet life,
An awful^o rule and right supremacy;
And, to be short, what not^o that's sweet and happy.

110

BAPTISTA

Now fair befall^o thee, good Petruchio.

For she is changed as she had never been.

PETRUCHIO

Nay, I will win my wager better yet
And show more sign of her obedience,
Her new-built virtue and obedience.

Enter KATE, BIANCA, and WIDOW.

See where she comes and brings your froward^o wives
As prisoners to her womanly persuasion.
Katherine, that cap of yours becomes you not.
Off with that bauble, throw it under foot.

[She throws it.]

WIDOW

Lord, let me never have a cause to sigh
Till I be brought to such a silly pass.^o

BIANCA

Fie, what a foolish—duty call you this?

LUCENTIO

I would your duty were as foolish too.
The wisdom of your duty, fair Bianca,
Hath cost me five hundred^o crowns since suppertime. 130

BIANCA

The more fool you for laying^o on my duty.

PETRUCHIO

Katherine, I charge thee, tell these headstrong women
What duty they do owe their lords and husbands.

WIDOW

Come, come, you're mocking. We will have no telling.

PETRUCHIO

Come on, I say, and first begin with her.

WIDOW

She shall not.

PETRUCHIO

I say she shall—and first begin with her.

KATE

Fie, fie, unknit that threatening unkind^o brow
And dart not scornful glances from those eyes
To wound thy lord, thy king, thy governor.
It blots thy beauty as frosts do bite the meads,
Confounds thy fame^o as whirlwinds shake^o fair buds,
And in no sense is meet or amiable.
A woman moved^o is like a fountain troubled,
Muddy, ill-seeming, thick, bereft of beauty,
And while it is so, none so dry or thirsty
Will deign to sip or touch one drop of it.
Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
Thy head, thy sovereign—one that cares for thee,
And for thy maintenance commits his body

115 To painful labor both by sea and land,
To watch^o the night in storms, the day in cold,
Whilst thou li'st warm at home, secure and safe;
And craves no other tribute at thy hands
But love, fair looks, and true obedience: 155
Too little payment for so great a debt.

120 Such duty as the subject owes the prince,
Even such a woman oweth to her husband,
And when she is froward, peevish, sullen, sour,
And not obedient to his honest^o will, 160
What is she but a foul contending rebel
And graceless traitor to her loving lord?
I am ashamed that women are so simple^o
To offer war where they should kneel for peace,
Or seek for rule, supremacy, and sway, 165

125 Why are our bodies soft and weak and smooth,
Unapt to^o toil and trouble in the world,
But that our soft conditions^o and our hearts
Should well agree with our external parts? 170
Come, come, you froward and unable worms,^o
My mind hath been as big^o as one of yours,
My heart as great, my reason haply more,
To bandy word for word and frown for frown.
But now I see our lances are but straws, 175
Our strength as weak, our weakness past compare,
That seeming to be most which we indeed least are.
Then vail your stomachs,^o for it is no boot,^o
And place your hands below your husband's foot,
In token of which duty, if he please, 180
My hand is ready, may it^o do him ease.

PETRUCHIO

Why, there's a wench! Come on and kiss me, Kate.

135 LUCENTIO

Well, go thy ways, old lad, for thou shalt ha't.

VINCENTIO

'Tis a good hearing^o when children are toward.^o

LUCENTIO

But a harsh hearing when women are froward. 185

PETRUCHIO

Come, Kate, we'll to bed.

140

We three are married, but you two are sped.^o
'Twas I won the wager, [to LUCENTIO] though you hit the white,^o
And, being a winner, God give you good night.
Exit PETRUCHIO [with KATE].

145 HORTENSIO

Now, go thy ways; thou hast tamed a curst shrow. 190

LUCENTIO

'Tis a wonder, by your leave, she will be tamèd so.

THE TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA

EDITED BY BERTRAND EVANS

Introduction

Perhaps more than any other work of Shakespeare's, The Two Gentlemen of Verona needs to be taken for what it is: a product of its time written by a young poet-dramatist seeking his way in what was for him a new genre. So understood, it requires no defense and no apology.

The genre was romantic comedy, in the sense we mean when we mention the masterpieces that would follow in quick succession—The Merchant of Venice, Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night. The date of The Two Gentlemen of Verona is uncertain; the play may have been written as early as 1590–91, or as late as 1594–95. Most likely it was written in about 1592–93. But however late or early, within these extremes, it was for Shakespeare the first of a kind. Probably the only comedy he had written before it was The Comedy of Errors, a generally more satisfactory work than this, but one of an essentially different species, which gave him little practice toward the new kind that he was attempting. For The Comedy of Errors he had a model, a good one, made by a master craftsman of Latin comedy, Plautus. Though Shakespeare injected certain romantic elements into this model, or grafted them onto it, the finished work remained rather more Plautine than Shakespearean, more a succession of farcical incidents than a pattern woven of romance elements.

And in the unlikely event that The Two Gentlemen of Verona followed rather than preceded *Love's Labor's Lost*¹ and The Taming of the Shrew, it must yet be said that Shakespeare gained from these very little practice toward his new genre. Love's Labor's Lost was aimed satirically at fashionable but outlandish excesses in courtly language, manners, and ideas, and to the exploitation of these excesses the elements of romance were only incidental. The main plot of The Shrew, that of the taming, had no place at all for romance, in either atmosphere or action; it was hilarious farce, done in burlesque proportions. Nor did the secondary plot, that of the competition for Bianca, offer happy accommodation to the spirit and mood of romance; it turned upon a game of "supposes," in which only the attitudes of farce could be at home.

Whether before or after Love's Labor's Lost and The Taming of the Shrew, then, it was with The Two Gentlemen of Verona that Shakespeare found the way that led to the ultimate Twelfth Night. The basic stuff of romance, of course, lay around him everywhere, in prose and verse, in English, French, Spanish, and Italian, in medieval and in contemporary tellings and retellings. Long before The Two Gentlemen of Verona was written, the materials of romance had grown enamored of specific themes and en-crusted with specific conventions. The theme of conflict between friendship and love was one that Chaucer had used and that was used again and again, in various forms of romantic tale and in various countries; indeed, Shakespeare's own sonnets play variations upon this theme, in the shadowy outline of a story that they tell of friendship between young men, of jealousy and separation occasioned by love of a third person, and finally of reconciliation. Lyly in his Euphues, Sidney in his Arcadia, less well-known contemporary romancers and translators all contributed to make the matters of romance, their themes and conventions, familiar to everyone who read or listened, familiar enough, indeed, that in any "new" romance, how a friend or lover, hero or heroine would behave in a given situation might be foretold with considerable accuracy.

What Shakespeare undertook in The Two Gentlemen of Verona was the experimental task of adapting the materials, themes, and conventions of meandering narrative romance (or of lyric verse) to dramatic form—to create action that might be contained in two hours, characters sufficiently credible that they might be represented by corporeal actors on a stage, a "world" of sufficient density to sustain both the action and the characters. For what he attempted there was nothing like a satisfactory precedent. For The Comedy of Errors he had had Plautus' Menaechmi; for the new genre of romantic comedy, he had nothing more suitable than, say, Lyly's Endimion, which was useful in every way except the one way that was needed; instead of being dramatically solid, Endimion was as watery as the tides governed by the moon.

For his principal story he turned to the tale of her life

told by the shepherdess Felismena, in the Diana Enamorada of Jorge de Montemayor. But in fact the whole reservoir of romance served him, inevitably, whether he would or no. Its conventions, intruding, have made three centuries of critics of The Two Gentlemen of Verona wince. How could Proteus have been so dastardly as to betray, in an instant, his beloved, his friend, and his royal host—not to mention his own honor? How could Valentine so abruptly forgive his disloyal friend all his trespasses? How could he as quickly proffer his beloved Silvia to the miscreant Proteus, who only a moment before threatened to rape her? How could Silvia—the daughter of a duke—stand by without a word during this base interchange? How could Julia, after this exhibition of general dastardliness, on the second or third bounce, welcome back her errant lover?

Indeed, very nearly the sole good thing that critics have found it appropriate to say about The Two Gentlemen of Verona is that it was a kind of “dry run” for its great successors, anticipating in many of its details the incidents, persons, and relationships the more masterful delineation of which distinguishes the later romantic comedies. It is impossible to do other than concur—in part—with this view of the play as proving ground for the later, greater works; in fact, we have already gone somewhat beyond concurrence by flatly stating that in this play Shakespeare found the way to Twelfth Night. That alone should be praise enough, for it allows to The Two Gentlemen of Verona the same kind and degree of significance that we allow to Julius Caesar when we say that in it Shakespeare first worked out the basic pattern of order and relationships that we have in mind when we speak of “Shakespearean” tragedy.

It is appropriate, therefore, that we review some of the ways in which this first of the romantic comedies prepared for those to come. Perhaps it is just to say that in most cases it furnished no more than an artist's preliminary sketches for the fuller, finished portraits of character, incident, and “world” that would come after. But at the same time that we review these, we should consider whether anything contains merit and deserves praise for itself, aside from being a “first.”

A good place to begin is with the heroine. Shakespeare did not invent the bright, daring girl of the comedies who, for one reason or another, casts off the outward signs of her sex and personal identity and goes a-masquerading in the world as a man; she existed already in the romances, both in those on which he directly drew for plot and in others which exercised a pervasive influence merely by existing. But in the romances she is a shadowy, pale, and bloodless abstraction that does not come alive enough to be visualized; she would never do on any stage. Shakespeare's creation, in Julia, of the flesh-and-blood heroine who set a great line going was a tremendous achievement. The world of the romantic comedies is a woman's world, and it is dominated by this recurrent figure who masquerades as a man while all of her womanliness is apparent to the audience, which is always aware of her secret. While each belongs to the line, each superlative heroine also has a life that is peculiarly her own. Portia of The Merchant of Venice, Rosalind of As You Like It, Viola of Twelfth Night—these can properly be likened to one another only in the common role they play, in specific recurrent situations in which they take part, and in a kind of brilliance they share that marks them as extraordinary human beings: yet this very brilliance varies markedly in its quality, showing in one as a grand and dignified capability, in another as a mischievous brightness, and in another as a gently feminine and utterly disarming subtlety.

No doubt each of these represents as much of an improvement on Julia as Julia does upon the nebulous female of the prose romances. Nearly every incident in which Julia takes part will be repeated in richer detail by one or more of the later heroines, and just because we are so busy noting the resemblances of the first version to the later ones, and mentally comparing the earlier—to its disadvantage, of course—with the later, we may overlook the peculiar charm of this first heroine herself as she plays her part. Thus in I.ii, Julia's review of the “fair resort of gentlemen” who “every day with parle encounter me” appears a puny forerunner of Portia's review, with Nerissa, of her suitors at Belmont; for one reason, in the latter version Shakespeare knew to give the witty descriptive lines to Portia, not Nerissa, whereas in this first sketch Julia merely asks the questions and it is Lucetta who furnishes the witty replies. But it is in the incident of the letter—an incident that is not repeated and thereby shamed by later versions—that we come suddenly upon the fresh and ingratiating charm by which Julia bursts out of the conventions among which the insipid heroines of prose romance move, and comes quite alive; no doubt, this was the first glimpse afforded by the English stage of a new and magnificent creature, the heroine of romantic comedy. The incident immediately follows the review of potential suitors. Lucetta presents a letter from Proteus, and Julia stretches to the tiptoes of indignation in upbraiding her:

Now, by my modesty, a goodly broker!
Dare you presume to harbor wanton lines?
To whisper and conspire against my youth?
Now, trust me, 'tis an office of great worth,
And you an officer fit for the place.
There, take the paper; see it be returned,
Or else return no more into my sight. (I.ii.41-47)

This show of spunk is itself worth a good deal; the pale heroine of romance could never have risen to it. Yet the heroine of Shakespearean romantic comedy is not truly born until the next instant, after Lucetta has left the stage; then, thus she speaks:

And yet I would I had o'erlooked the letter.
It were a shame to call her back again,
And pray her to a fault for which I chid her.
What fool is she, that knows I am a maid,
And would not force the letter to my view! (I.ii.50-54)

Shakespeare could definitely have stopped the incident at this; it would have been enough to establish a new institution. But he goes on: Julia calls back Lucetta, takes the letter from her, and, in a simply superb demonstration of the chastity of mind appropriate to highborn ladies in the presence of their lessers, tears it all to bits. Shakespeare could have stopped here, too; it would have been more than enough. But once more he goes on: Lucetta is again dismissed—and in an instant Julia is down on the floor, scrambling to reassemble the pieces:

Be calm, good wind, blow not a word away
Till I have found each letter in the letter,
Except mine own name: that some whirlwind bear
Unto a ragged, fearful-hanging rock,
And throw it thence into the raging sea! (I.ii.118–22)

In later scenes Julia repeatedly breaks the way for her great successors. In II.vii, she takes the plunge for all of them: she decides to go to Milan, to check on her—of course!—completely faithful Proteus; but not in her own identity:

Not like a woman, for I would prevent
The loose encounters of lascivious men.
Gentle Lucetta, fit me with such weeds
As may beseem some well-reputed page. (II.vii.40–43)

This was a fateful step. Soon Portia would say to Nerissa,

I'll hold thee any wager,
When we are both accoutered like young men,
I'll prove the prettier fellow of the two
(Merchant of Venice, III.iv.62–64)

Rosalind would say to Celia,

Were it not better,
Because that I am more than common tall,
That I did suit me all points like a man?
A gallant curtle-ax upon my thigh,
A boar-spear in my hand (As You Like It, I.iii.113–17)

and Viola would say to the Captain, who fished her out of the deep,

Conceal me what I am, and be my aid
For such disguise as haply shall become
The form of my intent. I'll serve this duke
(Twelfth Night, I.ii.53–55)

The parallels of this kind are numerous. Like all three of her famed successors, Julia talks with her loved one, who knows her not. Like Viola, she is sent as an envoy of love by her true love to his love. Like Portia, she receives from his finger the ring that she gave him. Like Rosalind, she all but gives away her sex by swooning at a crucial time. And like all the others, she gets her love at last on terms of uncompromising surrender:

What is in Silvia's face, but I may spy
More fresh in Julia's with a constant eye?

Bear witness, heaven, I have my wish forever.
(V.iv.115–16, 120)

In every parallel incident, she suffers from the inevitable comparison, and it is only in the rare moments when we catch her, so to speak, alone, doing something uniquely hers, not “trying out” something that her successors would perfect, that she has a chance to shine. So she does in the incident of the letter, and so, for example, she does in

IV.ii, when, wearing boy's clothes and accompanied by the Host, she eavesdrops on Proteus' serenade of Silvia. Here, though the song is all Silvia's, the dramatic center is all Julia's:

HOST How do you, man? The music likes you not.

JULIA You mistake; the musician likes me not.

HOST Why, my pretty youth?

JULIA He plays false, father. (IV.ii.55–59)

She is great here not merely for the emotional impact of her moment of heartbreak, but for her resilience. The pallid heroine of prose romance would have crawled away to bleed in secret; but Julia asks of the Host, “Where lies Sir Proteus?” Her mind has already conceived a device by which she can keep an eye on him until such time as she can capture him for once and all.

It is almost certain that Proteus and Valentine suffer less by comparison with their successors than does Julia. This will appear a startling statement, particularly with reference to Proteus, who has a long and virtually undeviating history of being abominated by critics. It is nevertheless essentially true, and the reason it is so is not hard to find. The fact is that the heroes of the romantic comedies—unlike the heroines, whose power to dazzle the eye and the imagination makes a beginning with Julia and at once thereafter becomes blinding—never do come to amount to very much. Proteus and Valentine, therefore, look about as good as any.

Between them, these two gentlemen define both of the emphases of which the one or the other dominates the later heroes. It is not strictly accurate to classify Shakespeare's romantic young males to two “types”—one wicked, the other stupid—but it is fair to say that each of them evinces a tendency in one or the other direction, and that two of them even tend toward both directions at the same time. To say that they exhibit a tendency toward wickedness or toward stupidity is not to say that they are wicked or stupid, but is to suggest that if they went somewhat farther along the road their qualities point them in, they would indeed be downright wicked or downright stupid. It should be added at once that though this view of the heroes is hardly flattering, surely none of us could seriously wish any one of the heroes changed in the slightest; each is perfect for the thing he is, perfect for the particular dramatic “world” of which he is part—and, what is most important, in each case the brilliant heroine loves the fellow either just as he stands or just as she has made him be by the end of the play.

Valentine is the simpler case, in more ways than one, and we should look at him before we deal with Proteus. Valentine looks ahead to the hero who is best represented by Orlando of As You Like It. The main thing to be said of this kind of hero is that there is nothing in the least “wrong” with him. He has nothing but virtues—all the virtues that anyone can name, except brilliance. He is kind, brave, loyal, generous, modest, forgiving—anything and everything as you like it; but any passing remark can make him look like a wonderful simpleton in an instant: “I found him under a tree,” says Celia of Orlando, “like a dropped acorn.” If Valentine is not quite up to Orlando in the kind that he is, he is nevertheless very nearly his equal, both in the sterling qualities of romantic young manhood that his kind of hero stands for and in the lack of intellectual keenness (especially around heroines) that he also stands for. Valentine is the perfect exemplar of friendship; he would never violate friendship even for love—and he is entirely true to his kind when, in the end, without needing to go through the painful process of thinking about it, he cheerfully offers Silvia—for whom he would just as cheerfully die—to Proteus. He could not do otherwise and be what he is; and because Shakespeare has been entirely clear in showing us what he is, it is we who are at fault if we so much as imagine that he should do otherwise. Valentine shares with Orlando, and not particularly with any of Shakespeare's other heroes of romantic comedy, a certain exaggeratedly heroic valor. Orlando hurls a professional wrestler to the ground, breaking his bones, and deals just as directly, and with no sweat, with a "sucked and hungry" lioness. But he best sums up all the qualities of his kind of romantic hero in a single incident and a single posture when, seeking food for old Adam, he pops into the clearing where the exiled duke and his followers are at table and, mistaking them all for savages who have never been out of the woods, demands with drawn sword that they "Forbear, and eat no more" until his needs are served. Here, in a stroke, he is heroic on the grand scale, great-hearted, nobly unselfish for his old servant—and, quite unconsciously, just a little ludicrous for having so much misjudged the situation.

With such a stroke, Shakespeare imparted a kind of flavor that transformed the romance hero, somewhat as he transformed the vapid romance heroine by adding some special feminine touches, including spunk. Bassanio of The Merchant of Venice exhibits the added quality very well when—of all people—he, the golden-fleece hunter, coolly reasons his way past the gold casket and the silver casket and takes the lead one; and he exhibits it again when, in the court scene, after Portia has pinned Shylock to the wall and has him quite at her mercy, he fails to perceive how completely the tables have turned and continues to rush forward, nobly generous, with bags of ducats—Portia's own—to buy off his friend. And this very way of surrounding his hero's grimly stalwart attitude with a tongue-in-cheek attitude Shakespeare first explored in Valentine, notably at his first encounter with the outlaws, upon whom he makes such a favorable impression that they invite him to be "king for our wild faction" after two minutes of conversation. Surely, this is an incident to the abruptness of which critics should take no such exception as some have; like Orlando's heroic-ludicrous posture at the duke's banquet, and like Valentine's own quick offer to surrender Silvia to Proteus, and like Bassanio's straight-faced choice of the leaden casket, it hints of what Shakespeare did to romance to make it romantic comedy.

Thus the attitude of comedy within which the actions of the Valentine-Orlando kind of hero are framed is not limited to the more obvious situations in which the comic potentialities of the hero's intellectual equipment are exploited—as in the case of Valentine's penning a love note for Silvia and not understanding, while the simple Speed is appalled by his obtuseness, that her "secret nameless friend" is himself—but extends to his most heroic and high-minded moments. On both counts, Valentine is more nearly a finished portrait than a first sketch.

At least as much may be said of Proteus, first of those who represent a contrary emphasis in the heroic character. Valentine, Bassanio, Orlando are innocent and good-hearted; none of them could ever be imagined as "going bad" under any circumstances. Proteus not only could but temporarily does go bad, and so do those who follow in his line, namely, Claudio of Much Ado About Nothing and—stepping just over the boundary into the "dark comedies"—Bertram of All's Well That Ends Well.

These heroes are clearly not so much like one another as are those of the other line, who might almost be said to be interchangeable. Claudio, in particular, shares with the Valentine-Orlando hero a certain congenital unawareness of situation; but, curiously, while this appears a lovable fault in the others and endears them to us as well as to the heroines, in Claudio it is odious. A callow princex of a youth, Claudio looks from the outset like one who could mistake a situation and become nasty about it, as indeed he does. If he is "cured" in the end, when the truth of the situation has been made apparent, yet he remains the same callow princex still, and one supposes that he would be capable of dastardly conduct again tomorrow or the next day if the right set of circumstances invited him. Bertram and Claudio differ most notably in that, while each is capable of dastardly conduct, Claudio's worst exhibition of contemptible qualities is based on his initial misunderstanding of situation, whereas Bertram's involvement in such unheroic activities as illicit pursuits and outright lying is quite deliberate. If Claudio is capable of contemptible behavior only when he misunderstands, Bertram is most capable of it when he understands very well.

As a hero of his kind, therefore, not being in competition with the Valentine-Orlando kind, but compared with Claudio and Bertram, Proteus looks remarkably good. As a dramatic character he is certainly as well drawn as they are, and as a man he is hardly worse than they. Proteus is like Bertram in needing no misunderstanding of situation to start him on a wayward course. It has been remarked of Macbeth that of all Shakespeare's tragic heroes he alone knowingly embraces evil as his good, and it may as well be said of Proteus and Bertram that they alone of the comic heroes knowingly take to the crooked paths of dishonor. Bertram rejects the wife of inferior birth who was forced on him; lies to her; pursues, with the intention of corrupting, for no reason but lust, a virgin of Florence; is prevented from committing adultery only by his wife's shrewd intervention; and thereafter, confronted with his deeds, lies, slanders others, and abandons all dignity and honor in an exhibition of squirming and twisting; and after his disgraceful wallowing, he is abruptly forgiven all his trespasses and welcomed home as a worthy subject, son, and husband.

Against Bertram's record as a hero, Proteus' fairly shines. He does not choose to leave his Julia, but is sent away by his father. Neither does he choose to fall in love with Silvia, any more than Romeo chooses to fall in love with Juliet (and many details of the play prove that Shakespeare had Brooke's Romeus and Juliet in mind as he wrote). Here, in reducing the odium of Proteus' initial fault, Shakespeare has been characteristically shrewd, for he has made Silvia irresistible, with both an inward and an outward beauty. If, lest she put Julia in the shade, he had made her only an ordinary beauty, Proteus' "three-fold perjury" committed in pursuit of her would have been difficult to understand and all but impossible to forgive. But on Silvia he has lavished all his superlatives, made her dazzling, wholly worthy of the song with which she is serenaded in Act IV and which is itself incomparable. All things considered, Silvia being as she is and what she is, who can blame Proteus?

In two other ways, also, Shakespeare goes farther toward explaining and extenuating Proteus' fault than he was to do with the faults of Claudio and Bertram. In the first scene of the play, Proteus is shown to be both a faithful friend and a faithful lover; but also the point is made evident that in a crisis of conflict between friendship and love, love would claim him:

He after honor hunts, I after love.
He leaves his friends to dignify them more,
I leave myself, my friends, and all, for love. (I.i.63-65)

He is love's votary; as it has been with Julia, so will it be with Silvia when the time comes: he will leave himself, his true friend, and all else, for love. Second, as he does not do for Claudio and Bertram, Shakespeare does Proteus the credit of allowing him to debate the right and wrong of his multiple perjury before he commits it, to debate the question, in fact, twice, in II.iv.192-214, and in II.vi.1-43. Claudio and Bertram, one notes, engage in no self-debate; they directly announce their bad intentions without troubling with any such preliminaries. Even though his decision is "wrong," Proteus at least undergoes the formality of weighing right and wrong. It is true that his self-debate involves no agonizing soul struggle such as Angelo of Measure for Measure undergoes in a roughly comparable situation, when flesh and the spirit are at war in him; Shakespeare quite rightly keeps Proteus' "struggle" light, superficial, artificial, well within the tone and the terms appropriate to romantic comedy:

And ev'n that pow'r which gave me first my oath
Provokes me to this threefold perjury:
Love bade me swear, and love bids me forswear.
(II.vi.4-6)

Surely, this is as far as a proper hero of romantic comedy dare go in soul struggle, and critics who deplore the too-easy entrance of Proteus into treachery—even as they deplore his too-easy return from it—would do well to remember that the moral ponderings of a Hamlet, an Angelo, or a Macbeth at this point would crash out of and destroy the very genre that this particular romantic hero helped to create.

But all this is not to suggest that Proteus is a blameless hero; if he were so, he would not belong with Claudio and Bertram, but with Valentine and Orlando. It is rather to insist that of the specific kind he represents, he runs true to form and measures up extremely well. Launce identifies him and his kind clearly enough: "I am but a fool, look you, and yet I have the wit to think my master is a kind of a knave." Is he any worse than that? For only a moment he seems to be, when he threatens Silvia with violence in the forest, and here perhaps Shakespeare did indeed go too far. But whether he would actually attack Silvia we neither know nor need to know; the fact is that he does not attack her, and we are quite aware that, with Valentine at hand, watching every move, there never was any real danger in the situation. He is guilty of nothing more than a thoroughly wicked intent, which is thwarted while it is only an impulse. A wicked impulse is not punishable, and in the world of romantic comedy is not even to be thought on too seriously.

Julia and Silvia, Valentine and Proteus are the most notable human fixtures in the special world of romantic comedy that was born with The Two Gentlemen of Verona. They are light but durable fixtures, as that world requires. If they are not wholly credible, yet they are more credible than were their forbears in the romances, and they are credible enough, palpable enough, one may say, for the world of romantic comedy, the nature of which would be altered if it were made to sustain creatures more solid. They are of a kind with this special world.

The world of romantic comedy, both as it was first drawn in this play and as it was re-created in each of the masterpieces that followed, of course includes other features besides the heroes and the heroines who invariably inhabit it. It includes, for example, clowns and fools. Speed and Launce stand rather uncertainly between the twin Dromios, the bewildered but witty slaves of The Comedy of Errors, before them, and the magnificent creations that came after, like Launcelot Gobbo of The Merchant of Venice and Touchstone of As You Like It. They are not as gifted as these—if Launcelot Gobbo, a great dunce, may be said to be gifted—and they talk too long with one another and with their masters. With the exception of Launce's long exhortation to his dog to be a better dog, their appearances are likely to be found tedious in both the theater and the study. But if they are not at all well and functionally fitted into the plot of the play—and the fact is that they are almost always purely interruptive—yet Shakespeare's introduction of them into romance helped to bring romantic comedy into being: the oozy world of romance needed their dryness. Their presence does not particularly help to make this incredible world more credible; but it does what is just as good—namely, helps to make the point that this world does not have to be perfectly credible, helps to render its very incredibility acceptable. In such a world as they inhabit, how can we reasonably balk at such a turn as the sudden redemption of Proteus or Valentine's magnanimous offer of Silvia? They are reminders that we are to keep our perspective and not consider things too seriously; annoying as they have proved for many critics, with their dreary stretches of low-grade quibbles and mental horseplay, they nevertheless serve the important perspective-giving function implied by Feste's refrain at the end of Twelfth Night: "the rain it raineth every day."

Like the heroes and the heroines, the clowns and fools, and the incidents that take extravagant turns, the dramatic verse of The Two Gentlemen of Verona needs also to be taken for what it is and does within the world of romantic comedy. No passages and almost no single lines in this play (setting aside the whole of the song to Silvia) are particularly memorable. If one sets, for instance, the poetic language of Julia's interviews (in disguise) with Proteus and with Silvia beside that of Viola-Cesario's interviews with Orsino and Olivia in Twelfth Night—a fair comparison, involving similar characters in virtually identical situations—the contrast is obvious enough; yet it is not shocking. Here is Julia-Sebastian speaking to Silvia:

She hath been fairer, madam, than she is.
When she did think my master loved her well,
She, in my judgment, was as fair as you.
But since she did neglect her looking glass,
And threw her sun-expelling mask away,
The air hath starved the roses in her cheeks
And pinched the lily-tincture of her face,
That now she is become as black as I. (IV.iv.149–56)

And here is Viola-Cesario, telling how she-he would woo Olivia:

Make me a willow cabin at your gate,
And call upon my soul within the house;
Write loyal cantons of contemnèd love
And sing them loud even in the dead of night;
Halloo your name to the reverberate hills
And make the babbling gossip of the air
Cry out, "Olivia!" (Twelfth Night, I.v.266–72)

There is a resonance, a throaty vibrance in the music of the great poetic passages of Twelfth Night:

She never told her love,
But let concealment, like a worm i' th' bud,
Feed on her damask cheek. She pined in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy
She sat, like Patience on a monument,
Smiling at grief (II.iv.110–15)

to which at best The Two Gentlemen of Verona never once attains, unless in the single line so much praised by Logan Pearsall Smith (Shakespeare, p. 74): "but it is only in the Two Gentlemen of Verona, with the song 'Who is Silvia,' with the line 'The uncertain glory of an April day,' and the passage about the brook that makes sweet music as it strays, that his power over words becomes a magic power, and his golden mastery of speech begins to almost blind us with its beauty."

Though it is easy to assent to the glory of this single line, no one would be likely to claim particular distinction for all the poetry of the play. What is here asserted, instead, is that the poetic language is "right" for the play, that it helps in the same way that the heroes and heroines and the extravagant incidents do to create the "world" of romantic comedy. This poetry has a good deal of chaff in it; it is sometimes glittering chaff, but chaff it is. It is light and usually frivolous; even when deep ideas are asserted, they are not asserted profoundly. The speakers habitually play along the surface of things:

PROTEUS

So, by your circumstance, you call me fool.

VALENTINE

So, by your circumstance, I fear you'll prove.

PROTEUS

'Tis Love you cavil at. I am not Love.

VALENTINE

Love is your master, for he masters you;
And he that is so yokèd by a fool,
Methinks, should not be chronicled for wise.

PROTEUS

Yet writers say, as in the sweetest bud
The eating canker dwells, so eating Love
Inhabits in the finest wits of all.

VALENTINE

And writers say . . . (I.i.36–45)

This is as typical an example as any of the poetic talk that fills the play, and in filling it defines its kind. It is both superficial and artificial, if one will, but "right" for the kind of world in which it is spoken and which it creates in being spoken, just as, for the same reason, the principal characters and incidents are also "right." There is an attitude of frivolity about this world which is figured forth in language, character, and incident.

Viewed thus, for what it is in part and whole, the play needs no apology, and certainly it does not deserve the harsh criticism that it has received from many who have not been content to take it for what it is. It transformed romance to romantic comedy, and it founded a great line. But, viewed as we have viewed it, it need not depend for its whole credit upon the fact that it was an important "first." It would be what it is if there were no Twelfth Night—indeed, it would no doubt look much better if there were no Twelfth Night.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCE

Both because its plot is filled with well-known romance elements and because its poetic style is laden with rhetorical devices fashionable at the time it was written, The Two Gentlemen of Verona appears inevitably to owe an unusual number of debts to a wide variety of materials. In its conventions as well as in its basic materials and their manner of use, it is as deeply embedded in the literary life of its time as any work of Shakespeare's.

The central theme of the play—conflict between the duties of friendship and love—had been used by Boccaccio in La Teseide, by Chaucer in The Knight's Tale, and by Lyly in Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit and Endimion; but, indeed, this theme is ancient and widespread, and Shakespeare would have encountered it in any event. Specific incidents and motifs in the play, such as Julia's disguise as a boy, may have been suggested by Sidney's pastoral romance of Arcadia; the abrupt election of Valentine as captain of the outlaws may derive from the same source. Many echoes of Brooke's Romeus and Juliet, the narrative poem which Shakespeare followed in Romeo and Juliet, occur in the play, perhaps the most notable being the device of the rope ladder which figures prominently in both plays.

In poetic manner and attitude, the play shows the pervasive influence of Lyly, the fashionable stylist of courtly language and the master of dramatic artifice in dialogue, scene, and character. Long stretches of wit duels between servant and servant, servant and master, lady and attendant, filled with quips and quirks and turns of phrase, mark the play as Lylyan in its most basic conception. In The Two Gentlemen of Verona the artifices of Lyly are more than superficial ornamentation; they are organic.

For the core of the play, however, which is the love story of Julia and Proteus, Shakespeare went to a prose romance originally written in Spanish, the Diana Enamorada, by the Portuguese Jorge de Montemayor, published in 1542. How Shakespeare came to know this work is uncertain, for though it was translated into English by Bartholomew Yonge about 1582, the translation was not published until 1598—some four to six years after the play was written. It has been suggested that Shakespeare could have become acquainted with the Diana through a French translation made before 1590; that he may have seen Yonge's manuscript before it was published; or that the story was represented in a play now lost.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

The Two Gentlemen of Verona was first printed in the First Folio of 1623, which is the authority for the present text. In the Folio it is the second play, standing between The Tempest and The Merry Wives of Windsor, the title of the latter play mistakenly appearing at the top of the final two pages. Names of characters who participate in each scene are grouped at the head of the scene, without notice made of the point of their entrance. The present edition deletes these names, and provides them, in square brackets, at the appropriate places later in the scenes. The Folio gives "Protheus" for "Proteus" and places the dramatis personae at the end of the text. Certain irregularities occur in place names, as though Shakespeare had changed his mind or become confused about principal locations; thus in II.v Padua rather than Milan is identified as the place of action by Speed, and in III.i the Duke of Milan speaks of a lady "in Verona here." In the present edition, speech prefixes have been regularized, spelling and punctuation have been modernized, and obvious typographical errors have been corrected. Added material (stage directions, and so on) is set in brackets. Act and scene divisions are those of the Folio, translated from Latin into English. The relatively few emendations of the Folio text are indicated below: the present reading is given in bold-face, followed by the Folio reading in roman.

A C T I

Scene I. [Verona. An open place.]

[Enter] VALENTINE [and] PROTEUS.

VALENTINE

Cease to persuade, my loving Proteus:
Home-keeping youth have ever homely wits.
Were't not affection chains thy tender days
To the sweet glances of thy honored love,
I rather would entreat thy company
To see the wonders of the world abroad,
Than, living dully sluggardized at home,
Wear out thy youth with shapeless idleness.
But since thou lov'st, love still, and thrive therein,
Even as I would, when I to love begin.

PROTEUS

Wilt thou be gone? Sweet Valentine, adieu!
Think on thy Proteus when thou haply° see'st
Some rare noteworthy object in thy travel:
Wish me partaker in thy happiness
When thou dost meet good hap;° and in thy danger, 15
If ever danger do environ thee,

The decorative border above appeared on the first page of The Two Gentlemen of Verona in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's plays, 1623.

I.i.12 haply by chance 15 hap luck

Commend thy grievance to my holy prayers,
For I will be thy beadsman,° Valentine.

VALENTINE

And on a love-book° pray for my success?

PROTEUS

Upon some book I love I'll pray for thee. 20

VALENTINE

That's on some shallow story of deep love:
How young Leander° crossed the Hellespont.

PROTEUS

That's a deep story of a deeper love,
For he was more than over shoes in love. 5

VALENTINE

'Tis true, for you are over boots in love,
And yet you never swum the Hellespont. 25

PROTEUS

Over the boots? Nay, give me not the boots.° 10

VALENTINE

No, I will not, for it boots° thee not.

PROTEUS

What?

VALENTINE

If lost, why then a grievous labor won;
However,° but a folly bought with wit,
Or else a wit by folly vanquishèd.

PROTEUS

So, by your circumstance,° you call me fool.

VALENTINE

So, by your circumstance, I fear you'll prove.

PROTEUS

'Tis Love you cavil at. I am not Love.

VALENTINE

Love is your master, for he masters you;
And he that is so yokèd by a fool,
Methinks, should not be chronicled° for wise.

PROTEUS

Yet writers say, as in the sweetest bud
The eating canker° dwells, so eating Love
Inhabits in the finest wits of all.

VALENTINE

And writers say, as the most forward° bud
Is eaten by the canker ere it blow,°
Even so by love the young and tender wit
Is turned to folly, blasting° in the bud,
Losing his verdure even in the prime,°
And all the fair effects of future hopes.
But wherefore waste I time to counsel thee,
That art a votary to fond desire?
Once more adieu! My father at the road°
Expects my coming, there to see me shipped.

PROTEUS

And thither will I bring° thee, Valentine.

VALENTINE

Sweet Proteus, no; now let us take our leave.
To Milan let me hear from thee by letters
Of thy success° in love, and what news else
Betideth here in absence of thy friend,
And I likewise will visit thee with mine.

PROTEUS

All happiness bechance to thee in Milan!

VALENTINE

As much to you at home! And so, farewell. Exit.

PROTEUS

He after honor hunts, I after love.
He leaves his friends to dignify them more,
I leave myself, my friends, and all, for love.
Thou, Julia, thou hast metamorphized me,
Made me neglect my studies, lose my time,
War with good counsel, set the world at nought,
Made wit with musing weak, heart sick with thought.

[Enter SPEED.]

SPEED Sir Proteus, save you!° Saw you my master? 70

PROTEUS But now he parted hence, to embark for Milan.

30 Twenty to one, then, he is shipped already,
And I have played the sheep° in losing him.

PROTEUS

Indeed, a sheep doth very often stray, 75
And if° the shepherd be awhile away.

35 SPEED You conclude that my master is a shepherd, then, and I a sheep?

PROTEUS I do.

SPEED Why then, my horns are his horns,° whether I 80
wake or sleep.

PROTEUS A silly answer, and fitting well a sheep.

SPEED This proves me still a sheep.

PROTEUS True, and thy master a shepherd.

SPEED Nay, that I can deny by a circumstance.° 85

40 PROTEUS It shall go hard but I'll prove it by another.

SPEED The shepherd seeks the sheep, and not the sheep the shepherd; but I seek my master, and my master seeks not me. Therefore I am no sheep.

PROTEUS The sheep for fodder follow the shepherd; 90 the shepherd for food follows not the sheep; thou for wages followest thy master, thy master for wages follows not thee. Therefore thou art a sheep.

SPEED Such another proof will make me cry "baa."

PROTEUS But, dost thou hear? Gav'st thou my letter 95 to Julia?

50 SPEED Ay, sir: I, a lost mutton, gave your letter to her, a laced mutton,° and she, a laced mutton, gave me, a lost mutton, nothing for my labor.

PROTEUS Here's too small a pasture for such store of 100 muttons.

SPEED If the ground be overcharged,° you were best stick° her. 55

PROTEUS Nay, in that you are astray; 'twere best pound° you. 105

SPEED Nay, sir, less than a pound shall serve me for carrying your letter.

PROTEUS You mistake. I mean the pound—a pinfold.

60 SPEED
From a pound to a pin? Fold it over and over,
'Tis threefold too little for carrying a letter to your lover. 110

PROTEUS But what said she?

SPEED [Nodding.] Ay.

PROTEUS Nod—ay. Why, that's noddy.°

SPEED You mistook, sir. I say she did nod; and you ask me if she did nod, and I say, "Ay." 115

PROTEUS And that set together is noddy.

SPEED Now you have taken the pains to set it together, take it for your pains.

PROTEUS No, no. You shall have it for bearing the letter. 120

SPEED Well, I perceive I must be fain to bear with you.

PROTEUS Beshrew^o me, but you have a quick wit.

SPEED And yet it cannot overtake your slow purse.

PROTEUS Come, come, open the matter in brief. What said she?

SPEED Open your purse, that the money and the matter may be both at once delivered. 130

PROTEUS Well, sir, here is for your pains. What said she?

SPEED Truly, sir, I think you'll hardly win her.

PROTEUS Why, couldst thou perceive so much from her? 135

SPEED Sir, I could perceive nothing at all from her; no, not so much as a ducat for delivering your letter. And being so hard to me that brought your mind, I fear she'll prove as hard to you in telling your mind. Give her no token but stones;^o for she's as hard as steel. 140

PROTEUS What said she? Nothing?

SPEED No, not so much as "Take this for thy pains." To testify your bounty, I thank you, you have testified me;^o in requital whereof, henceforth carry your letters yourself. And so, sir, I'll commend you to my master. 145

PROTEUS

Go, go, be gone, to save your ship from wrack, Which cannot perish, having thee aboard, 150 Being destined to a drier death on shore.^o

[Exit SPEED.]

I must go send some better messenger;
I fear my Julia would not deign my lines,
Receiving them from such a worthless post.^o Exit.

Scene II. [Verona. Julia's house.]

Enter JULIA and LUCETTA.

JULIA
But say, Lucetta, now we are alone,
Wouldst thou, then, counsel me to fall in love?

LUCETTA
Ay, madam; so you stumble not unheedfully.

JULIA
Of all the fair resort of gentlemen^o
That every day with parle^o encounter me, 5
In thy opinion which is worthiest love?

LUCETTA
Please you repeat their names, I'll show my mind
According to my shallow simple skill.

JULIA
What think'st thou of the fair Sir Eglamour?

LUCETTA
As of a knight well-spoken, neat, and fine; 10
But, were I you, he never should be mine.

124 Marry a casual oath (from "By the Virgin Mary") 126 Beshrew curse (used casually) 141 stones in addition to punning on its meanings of "jewels" and "worthless gifts," Speed may be punning on another meaning, "testicles" 145-46 testerned me given me a testern (sixpence) 151 Being . . . shore being destined to hang 154 post messenger I.ii.4 resort of gentlemen crowd of suitors 5 parle parley

JULIA
What think'st thou of the rich Mercatio?

LUCETTA
Well of his wealth; but of himself, so so.

JULIA
What think'st thou of the gentle Proteus?

LUCETTA
Lord, Lord! To see what folly reigns in us! 15

JULIA
How now! What means this passion^o at his name?

LUCETTA
Pardon, dear madam; 'tis a passing^o shame
That I, unworthy body as I am,
Should censure^o thus on lovely gentlemen.

JULIA
Why not on Proteus, as of all the rest? 20

LUCETTA
Then thus: of many good I think him best.

JULIA
Your reason?

LUCETTA
I have no other but a woman's reason:
I think him so because I think him so.

JULIA
And wouldst thou have me cast my love on him? 25

LUCETTA
Ay, if you thought your love not cast away.

JULIA
Why, he, of all the rest, hath never moved^o me.

LUCETTA
Yet he, of all the rest, I think, best loves ye.

JULIA
His little speaking shows his love but small.

LUCETTA
Fire that's closest kept burns most of all. 30

JULIA
They do not love that do not show their love.

LUCETTA
O, they love least that let men know their love.

JULIA
I would I knew his mind.

LUCETTA
Peruse this paper, madam.

JULIA
"To Julia."—Say, from whom? 35

LUCETTA
That the contents will show.

JULIA
Say, say, who gave it thee?

LUCETTA
Sir Valentine's page; and sent, I think, from Proteus.
He would have given it you; but I, being in the way,
Did in your name receive it. Pardon the fault, I pray. 40

JULIA
Now, by my modesty, a goodly broker!^o
Dare you presume to harbor wanton lines?
To whisper and conspire against my youth?
Now, trust me, 'tis an office of great worth,
And you an officer fit for the place. 45
There, take the paper; see it be returned,
Or else return no more into my sight.

16 passion emotion 17 passing surpassing 19 censure pass judgment 27 moved proposed to 41 broker go-between

LUCETTA

To plead for love deserves more fee than hate,

JULIA

Will ye be gone?

LUCETTA

That you may ruminate. Exit.

JULIA

And yet I would I had o'erlooked^o the letter. 50

It were a shame to call her back again,

And pray her to^o a fault for which I chid her.

What fool is she, that knows I am a maid,

And would not force the letter to my view!

Since maids, in modesty, say "no" to that 55

Which they would have the profferer construe "ay."

Fie, fie, how wayward is this foolish love,

That, like a testy^o babe, will scratch the nurse,And presently,^o all humbled, kiss the rod!

How churlishly I chid Lucetta hence, 60

When willingly I would have had her here!

How angerly I taught my brow to frown,

When inward joy enforced my heart to smile!

My penance is to call Lucetta back

And ask remission for my folly past. 65

What, ho! Lucetta!

Enter LUCETTA.

JUCETTA

What would your ladyship?

LULIA

Is't near dinnertime?

LUCETTA

I would it were;

That you might kill your stomach^o on your meat,And not upon your maid.^o

JULIA

What is't that you took up so gingerly? 70

LUCETTA

Nothing.

JULIA

Why didst thou stoop, then?

LUCETTA

To take a paper up that I let fall.

JULIA

And is that paper nothing?

LUCETTA

Nothing concerning me. 75

JULIA

Then let it lie for those that it concerns.

LUCETTA

Madam, it will not lie where it concerns,^o

Unless it have a false interpreter.

JULIA

Some love of yours hath writ to you in rhyme.

LUCETTA

That I might sing it, madam, to a tune. 80

Give me a note: your ladyship can set.^o

JULIA

As little by such toys^o as may be possible.Best sing it to the tune of "Light o' love."^o

LUCETTA

It is too heavy for so light a tune.

JULIA

Heavy! Belike it hath some burden,^o then? 85

LUCETTA

Ay, and melodious were it, would you sing it.

JULIA

And why not you?

LUCETTA

I cannot reach so high.

JULIA

Let's see your song. [Takes the letter.] How now, 90

LUCETTA

Keep tune there still, so you will sing it out:

And yet methinks I do not like this tune. 90

JULIA

You do not?

LUCETTA

No, madam; 'tis too sharp.

JULIA

You, minion, are too saucy.

LUCETTA

Nay, now you are too flat,

And mar the concord with too harsh a descant.^oThere wanteth but a mean^o to fill your song. 95

JULIA

The mean is drowned with your unruly bass.

LUCETTA

Indeed, I bid the base^o for Proteus.

JULIA

This babble shall not henceforth trouble me.

Here is a coil with protestation!^o[Tears the letter.]

JULIA

Go get you gone, and let the papers lie; 100

You would be fing'ring them, to anger me.

LUCETTA

She makes it strange;^o but she would be best pleasedTo be so ang'red with another letter. [Exit.]

JULIA

Nay, would I were so ang'red with the same!

O hateful hands, to tear such loving words! 105

Injurious wasps, to feed on such sweet honey,

And kill the bees, that yield it, with your stings!

I'll kiss each several^o paper for amends.

Look, here is writ "kind Julia." Unkind Julia!

As in revenge of thy ingratitude, 110

I throw thy name against the bruising stones,

Trampling contemptuously on thy disdain.

And here is writ "love-wounded Proteus."

Poor wounded name! My bosom, as a bed, 115

Shall lodge thee, till thy wound be throughly^o healed;And thus I search^o it with a sovereign kiss.

But twice or thrice was "Proteus" written down.

[Enter LUCETTA.]

LUCETTA
 Madam,
 Dinner is ready, and your father stays.

JULIA
 Well, let us go.

LUCETTA
 What, shall these papers lie like telltales here?

JULIA
 If you respect them, best to take them up.

LUCETTA
 Nay, I was taken up for laying them down;
 Yet here they shall not lie, for catching cold.

JULIA
 I see you have a month's mind° to them.

LUCETTA
 Ay, madam, you may say what sights you see;
 I see things too, although you judge I wink.°

JULIA
 Come, come; will't please you go?

Exeunt. 140

Scene III. [Verona. Antonio's house.]

Enter ANTONIO and PANTHINO.

ANTONIO
 Tell me, Panthino, what sad° talk was that Wherewith my brother held you in the cloister?

PANTHINO
 'Twas of his nephew Proteus, your son.

ANTONIO
 Why, what of him?

PANTHINO He wond' red that your lordship
 Would suffer him to spend his youth at home,
 While other men, of slender reputation,°
 Put forth their sons to seek preferment out:
 Some to the wars, to try their fortune there,
 Some to discover islands far away,
 Some to the studious universities.
 For any, or for all these exercises,
 He said that Proteus your son was meet,°
 And did request me to importune you
 To let him spend his time no more at home,
 Which would be great impeachment° to his age,
 In having known no travel in his youth.

ANTONIO
 Nor need'st thou much importune me to that Whereon this month I have been hammering.°

I have considered well his loss of time,
 And how he cannot be a perfect man,
 Not being tried and tutored in the world.
 Experience is by industry achieved,
 And perfected° by the swift course of time.
 Then, tell me, whither were I best to send him?

PANTHINO
 I think your lordship is not ignorant
 How his companion, youthful Valentine,
 Attends the emperor° in his royal court.

ANTONIO
 I know it well.

130 PANTHINO
 'Twere good, I think, your lordship sent him thither.
 There shall he practice tilts and tournaments,
 Hear sweet discourse, converse with noblemen,
 And be in eye of° every exercise
 Worthy his youth and nobleness of birth.

ANTONIO
 I like thy counsel; well hast thou advised.
 And that thou mayst perceive how well I like it,
 The execution of it shall make known.
 Even with the speediest expedition°
 I will dispatch him to the emperor's court.

PANTHINO
 Tomorrow, may it please you, Don Alphonso,
 With other gentlemen of good esteem,
 Are journeying to salute the emperor,
 And to commend their service to his will.

ANTONIO
 Good company; with them shall Proteus go.
 And—in good time! Now will we break with° him.

[Enter PROTEUS.]

PROTEUS
 Sweet love! Sweet lines! Sweet life!
 Here is her hand, the agent of her heart.
 Here is her oath for love, her honor's pawn.°
 O, that our fathers would applaud our loves,
 To seal our happiness with their consents!
 O heavenly Julia!

ANTONIO
 How now! What letter are you reading there?

PROTEUS
 May't please your lordship, 'tis a word or two
 Of commendations° sent from Valentine,
 Delivered by a friend that came from him.

ANTONIO
 Lend me the letter; let me see what news.

PROTEUS
 There is no news, my lord, but that he writes
 How happily he lives, how well beloved
 And daily gracèd by the emperor,
 Wishing me with him, partner of his fortune.

ANTONIO
 And how stand you affected to his wish?

PROTEUS
 As one relying on your lordship's will,
 And not depending on his friendly wish.

ANTONIO

My will is something sorted^o with his wish.
 Muse not that I thus suddenly proceed,
 For what I will, I will, and there an end.
 I am resolved that thou shalt spend some time
 With Valentinus in the emperor's court.
 What maintenance he from his friends receives,
 Like exhibition^o thou shalt have from me.
 Tomorrow be in readiness to go.
 Excuse it not,^o for I am peremptory.^o

PROTEUS

My lord, I cannot be so soon provided.
 Please you, deliberate a day or two.

ANTONIO

Look what^o thou want'st shall be sent after thee.
 No more of stay! Tomorrow thou must go.
 Come on, Panthino; you shall be employed
 To hasten on his expedition.

[Exeunt ANTONIO and PANTHINO.]

PROTEUS

Thus have I shunned the fire for fear of burning,
 And drenched me in the sea, where I am drowned.
 I feared to show my father Julia's letter,
 Lest he should take exceptions to my love;
 And with the vantage of mine own excuse
 Hath he excepted most against my love.^o
 O, how this spring of love resembleth
 The uncertain glory of an April day,
 Which now shows all the beauty of the sun,
 And by and by a cloud takes all away!

[Enter PANTHINO.]

PANTHINO

Sir Proteus, your father calls for you.
 He is in haste; therefore, I pray you, go.

PROTEUS

Why, this it is: my heart accords thereto,
 And yet a thousand times it answers "no." Exeunt.

Scene I. [Milan. The duke's palace.][Enter VALENTINE [and] SPEED.]

SPEED Sir, your glove.

VALENTINE Not mine; my gloves are on.

SPEED Why, then, this may be yours, for this is but one.^o

VALENTINE

Ha, let me see. Ay, give it me, it's mine.
 Sweet ornament that decks a thing divine!
 Ah, Silvia, Silvia!

SPEED Madam Silvia! Madam Silvia!

VALENTINE How now, sirrah?^o

SPEED She is not within hearing, sir.

VALENTINE Why, sir, who bade you call her?

65 SPEED Your worship, sir, or else I mistook.

VALENTINE Well, you'll still^o be too forward.

SPEED And yet I was last chidden for being too slow.

VALENTINE Go to, sir. Tell me, do you know Madam Silvia? 15

70 SPEED She that your worship loves?

VALENTINE Why, how know you that I am in love?

SPEED Marry, by these special marks: first, you have learned, like Sir Proteus, to wreath your arms, like 20 a malcontent; to relish a love song, like a robin red-breast; to walk alone, like one that had the pestilence; to sigh, like a schoolboy that had lost his A B C; to weep, like a young wench that had buried her grandam; to fast, like one that takes diet; to watch,^o like 25 one that fears robbing; to speak puling,^o like a beggar at Hallowmas.^o You were wont, when you laughed, to crow like a cock; when you walked, to walk like one of the lions; when you fasted, it was presently after dinner; when you looked sadly, it was for want of 30 money. And now you are metamorphized with a mistress, that,^o when I look on you, I can hardly think you my master.

VALENTINE Are all these things perceived in me?

SPEED They are all perceived without ye.^o 35

85 VALENTINE Without me? They cannot.

SPEED Without you? Nay, that's certain, for, without^o you were so simple, none else would. But you are so without these follies, that these follies are within you, and shine through you like the water in an 40 urinal, that not an eye that sees you but is a physician to comment on your malady.

VALENTINE But tell me, dost thou know my lady Silvia?

90 SPEED She that you gaze on so as she sits at supper? 45

VALENTINE Hast thou observed that? Even she, I mean.

SPEED Why, sir, I know her not.

VALENTINE Dost thou know her by my gazing on her, and yet know'st her not? 50

SPEED Is she not hard-favored,^o sir?

VALENTINE Not so fair, boy, as well-favored.

SPEED Sir, I know that well enough.

VALENTINE What dost thou know?

SPEED That she is not so fair as, of you, well favored. 55

VALENTINE I mean that her beauty is exquisite, but her favor^o infinite.SPEED That's because the one is painted, and the other out of all count.^o

VALENTINE How painted? And how out of count? 60

SPEED Marry, sir, so painted, to make her fair, that no man counts of^o her beauty.

VALENTINE How esteem'st thou me? I account of her beauty.

 VALENTINE I have loved her ever since I saw her;
 and still I see her beautiful.
 SPEED If you love her, you cannot see her. 70
 VALENTINE Why?
 SPEED Because love is blind. O, that you had mine eyes; or your own eyes had the lights they were wont to have when you chid at Sir Proteus for going ungartered!^o 75
 VALENTINE What should I see then?
 SPEED Your own present folly, and her passing^o garter his hose; and you, being in love, cannot see to put on your hose. 80

 VALENTINE Belike, boy, then, you are in love; for last morning you could not see to wipe my shoes.
 SPEED True, sir; I was in love with my bed. I thank you, you swung^o me for my love which makes me
 the bolder to chide you for yours. 85
 VALENTINE In conclusion, I stand affected to her.
 SPEED I would you were set,^o so your affection would cease.
 VALENTINE Last night she enjoined me to write some lines to one she loves. 90
 SPEED And have you?
 VALENTINE I have.
 SPEED Are they not lamely writ?
 VALENTINE No, boy, but as well as I can do them.
 Peace! Here she comes. 95

 SPEED [Aside.] He should give her interest, and she gives it him. 105
 VALENTINE
 As you enjoined me, I have writ your letter
 Unto the secret nameless friend of yours,
 Which I was much unwilling to proceed in,
 But for my duty to your ladyship.
 SILVIA
 I thank you, gentle servant; 'tis very clerkly^o done. 110
 VALENTINE
 Now trust me, madam, it came hardly off;
 For, being ignorant to whom it goes,
 I writ at random, very doubtfully.

SILVIA
 Perchance you think too much of so much pains?

 No, madam; so it stead^o you, I will write, 115
 Please you command, a thousand times as much.
 And yet—
 SILVIA
 A pretty period!^o Well, I guess the sequel;
 And yet I will not name it; and yet I care not;
 And yet take this again; and yet I thank you, 120
 Meaning henceforth to trouble you no more.
 SPEED [Aside.]
 And yet you will; and yet another "yet."
 VALENTINE
 What means your ladyship? Do you not like it?
 SILVIA
 Yes, yes: the lines are very quaintly^o writ;
 But since unwillingly, take them again. 125
 Nay, take them.
 VALENTINE Madam, they are for you.
 SILVIA
 Ay, ay. You writ them, sir, at my request;
 But I will none of them; they are for you;
 I would have had them writ more movingly.
 VALENTINE
 Please you, I'll write your ladyship another. 130
 SILVIA
 And when it's writ, for my sake read it over,
 And if it please you, so; if not, why, so.
 VALENTINE
 If it please me, madam, what then?
 SILVIA
 Why, if it please you, take it for your labor;
 And so, good morrow, servant. Exit SILVIA. 135
 SPEED
 O jest unseen, inscrutable, invisible,
 As a nose on a man's face, or a weathercock on a steeple!
 My master sues to her, and she hath taught her suitor,
 He being her pupil, to become her tutor.
 O excellent device! Was there ever heard a better, 140
 That my master, being scribe, to himself should write the letter?
 VALENTINE
 How now, sir? What are you reasoning with yourself?
 SPEED Nay, I was rhyming; 'tis you that have the reason.
 VALENTINE To do what? 145
 SPEED To be a spokesman from Madam Silvia.
 VALENTINE To whom?
 SPEED To yourself. Why, she woos you by a figure.^o
 VALENTINE What figure?
 SPEED By a letter, I should say. 150
 VALENTINE Why, she hath not writ to me?
 SPEED What need she, when she hath made you write to yourself? Why, do you not perceive the jest?
 VALENTINE No, believe me.
 SPEED No believing you, indeed, sir. But did you 155 perceive her earnest?^o
 VALENTINE She gave me none, except an angry word.
 SPEED Why, she hath given you a letter.

VALENTINE That's the letter I writ to her friend.

SPEED And that letter hath she delivered, and there 160

VALENTINE I would it were no worse.

SPEED I'll warrant you, 'tis as well;

For often have you writ to her, and she, in modesty,
Or else for want of idle time, could not again reply; 165
Or fearing else some messenger that might her mind discover,^o

Herself hath taught her love himself to write unto her lover.

All this I speak in print,^o for in print I found it.

Why muse you, sir? 'Tis dinnertime.

VALENTINE I have dined. 170

SPEED Ay, but hearken, sir; though the chameleon love can feed on the air,^o I am one that am nourished by my victuals, and would fain have meat. O, be not like your mistress; be moved, be moved. Exeunt.

Scene II. [Verona. Julia's house.]

Enter PROTEUS [and] JULIA.

PROTEUS

Have patience, gentle Julia.

JULIA

I must, where is no remedy.

PROTEUS

When possibly I can, I will return.

JULIA

If you turn^o not, you will return the sooner.
Keep this remembrance for thy Julia's sake. 5

[Giving a ring.]

PROTEUS

Why, then, we'll make exchange; here, take you this.

JULIA

And seal the bargain with a holy kiss.

PROTEUS

Here is my hand for my true constancy;
And when that hour o'erslips me in the day
Wherein I sigh not, Julia, for thy sake, 10
The next ensuing hour some foul mischance
Torment me for my love's forgetfulness!

My father stays^o my coming; answer not;

The tide is now—nay, not thy tide of tears;

That tide will stay me longer than I should. 15
Julia, farewell! [Exit JULIA.] What, gone without a word?

Ay, so true love should do: it cannot speak;

For truth hath better deeds than words to grace it.

[Enter PANTHINO.]

PANTHINO

Sir Proteus, you are stayed for.

PROTEUS

Enter LAUNCE [leading a dog].

LAUNCE Nay, 'twill be this hour ere I have done weeping; all the kind of the Launces have this very fault.
I have received my proportion,^o like the prodigious^o son, and am going with Sir Proteus to the imperial's court. I think Crab my dog be the sourest-natured dog 5 that lives. My mother weeping, my father wailing, my sister crying, our maid howling, our cat wringing her hands, and all our house in a great perplexity, yet did not this cruel-hearted cur shed one tear.
He is a stone, a very pebble stone, and has no more 10 pity in him than a dog. A Jew would have wept to have seen our parting. Why, my grandam, having no eyes, look you, wept herself blind at my parting. Nay, I'll show you the manner of it. This shoe is my father;
no, this left shoe is my father. No, no, this left shoe is 15 my mother; nay, that cannot be so neither. Yes, it is so, it is so, it hath the worser sole. This shoe, with the hole in it, is my mother, and this my father; a vengeance on't! There 'tis. Now, sir, this staff is my sister, for, look you, she is as white as a lily, and as small as a 20 wand. This hat is Nan, our maid. I am the dog. No, the dog is himself, and I am the dog. Oh! The dog is me, and I am myself; ay, so, so. Now come I to my father: Father, your blessing. Now should not the shoe speak a word for weeping: now should I kiss my 25 father: well, he weeps on. Now come I to my mother.
Oh, that she could speak now like a wood woman!^o
Well, I kiss her; why, there 'tis. Here's my mother's breath up and down.^o Now come I to my sister; mark the moan she makes. Now the dog all this while sheds 30 not a tear, nor speaks a word; but see how I lay the dust with my tears.

[Enter PANTHINO.]

PANTHINO Launce, away, away, aboard! Thy master is shipped, and thou art to post after with oars. What's the matter? Why weep'st thou, man? Away, ass! 35
You'll lose the tide, if you tarry any longer.

LAUNCE It is no matter if the tied were lost; for it is the unkindest tied that ever any man tied.

PANTHINO What's the unkindest tide?

LAUNCE Why, he that's tied here, Crab, my dog. 40

PANTHINO Tut, man, I mean thou'lt lose the flood,^o and, in losing the flood, lose thy voyage, and, in losing thy voyage, lose thy master, and, in losing thy master, lose thy service, and, in losing thy service—
Why dost thou stop my mouth? 45

LAUNCE For fear thou shouldst lose thy tongue.

PANTHINO Where should I lose my tongue?

LAUNCE In thy tale.

PANTHINO In thy tail!

LAUNCE Lose the tide, and the voyage, and the master, 50 and the service, and the tied! Why, man, if the river were dry, I am able to fill it with my tears; if the wind were down, I could drive the boat with my sighs.

LAUNCE Well, I will go. Exeunt.

Scene IV. [Milan. The duke's palace.]

Enter VALENTINE, SILVIA, THURIO, [and] SPEED.

SILVIA Servant!
VALENTINE Mistress?
SPEED Master, Sir Thurio frowns on you.
VALENTINE Ay, boy, it's for love.
SPEED Not of you. 5
VALENTINE Of my mistress, then.
SPEED 'Twere good you knocked him. [Exit.]
SILVIA Servant, you are sad.
VALENTINE Indeed, madam, I seem so.
THURIO Seem you that you are not? 10
VALENTINE Haply I do.
THURIO So do counterfeits.
VALENTINE So do you.
THURIO What seem I that I am not?
VALENTINE Wise. 15
THURIO What instance of the contrary?
VALENTINE Your folly.
THURIO And how quote° you my folly?
VALENTINE I quote it in your jerkin.
THURIO My jerkin is a doublet.° 20
VALENTINE Well, then, I'll double your folly.
THURIO How?
SILVIA What, angry, Sir Thurio! Do you change color?
VALENTINE Give him leave, madam; he is a kind of 25
chameleon.
THURIO That hath more mind to feed on your blood than live in your air.
VALENTINE You have said, sir.
THURIO Ay, sir, and done too, for this time. 30
VALENTINE I know it well, sir; you always end ere you begin.
SILVIA A fine volley of words, gentlemen, and quickly shot off.
VALENTINE 'Tis indeed, madam; we thank the giver. 35
SILVIA Who is that, servant?
VALENTINE Yourself, sweet lady; for you gave the fire. Sir Thurio borrows his wit from your ladyship's looks, and spends what he borrows kindly in your company. 40
THURIO Sir, if you spend word for word with me, I shall make your wit bankrupt.
VALENTINE I know it well, sir. You have an exchequer of words, and, I think, no other treasure to give your followers, for it appears by their bare° liveries that 45 they live by your bare words.
SILVIA No more, gentlemen, no more—here comes my father.

[Enter DUKE.]

DUKE
Now, daughter Silvia, you are hard beset.
Sir Valentine, your father's in good health. 50
What say you to a letter from your friends
Of much good news?
VALENTINE My lord, I will be thankful
To any happy messenger° from thence.
DUKE
Know ye Don Antonio, your countryman?
VALENTINE
Ay, my good lord, I know the gentleman 55
To be of worth, and worthy estimation,
And not without desert so well reputed.
DUKE
Hath he not a son?
VALENTINE
Ay, my good lord, a son that well deserves 60
The honor and regard of such a father.
DUKE
You know him well?
VALENTINE 10
I know him as myself; for from our infancy
We have conversed and spent our hours together;
And though myself have been an idle truant,
Omitting the sweet benefit of time 65
To clothe mine age with angellike perfection,
Yet hath Sir Proteus, for that's his name,
Made use and fair advantage of his days;
His years but young, but his experience old;
His head unmellowed, but his judgment ripe. 70
And, in a word, for far behind his worth
Comes all the praises that I now bestow,
He is complete in feature and in mind
With all good grace to grace a gentleman.
DUKE
Beshrew me, sir, but if he make this good, 75
He is as worthy for an empress' love
As meet° to be an emperor's counselor.
Well, sir, this gentleman is come to me
With commendation from great potentates,
And here he means to spend his time awhile. 80
I think 'tis no unwelcome news to you.
VALENTINE
Should I have wished a thing, it had been he.
DUKE
Welcome him, then, according to his worth.
Silvia, I speak to you, and you, Sir Thurio;
For Valentine, I need not cite° him to it. 85
I will send him hither to you presently. [Exit.]
VALENTINE
This is the gentleman I told your ladyship
Had come along with me, but that his mistress
Did hold his eyes locked in her crystal looks.
SILVIA
Belike that now she hath enfranchised them, 90
Upon some other pawn for fealty.°
VALENTINE
Nay, sure, I think she holds them prisoners still.
SILVIA
Nay, then, he should be blind; and, being blind,
How could he see his way to seek out you?

VALENTINE

Why, lady, love hath twenty pair of eyes. 95

THURIO

They say that love hath not an eye at all.

VALENTINE

To see such lovers, Thurio, as yourself.

Upon a homely object love can wink.

[Exit THURIO.]

SILVIA

Have done, have done; here comes the gentleman.

[Enter PROTEUS.]

VALENTINE

Welcome, dear Proteus! Mistress, I beseech you, 100
Confirm his welcome with some special favor.

SILVIA

His worth is warrant for his welcome hither,
If this be he you oft have wished to hear from.

VALENTINE

Mistress, it is. Sweet lady, entertain° him 105
To be my fellow servant to your ladyship.

SILVIA

Too low a mistress for so high a servant.

PROTEUS

Not so, sweet lady, but too mean° a servant
To have a look of such a worthy mistress.

VALENTINE

Leave off discourse of disability.°
Sweet lady, entertain him for your servant. 110

PROTEUS

My duty will I boast of, nothing else.

SILVIA

And duty never yet did want his meed.°
Servant, you are welcome to a worthless mistress.

PROTEUS

I'll die on° him that says so but yourself.

SILVIA

That you are welcome?

PROTEUS

That you are worthless. 115

[Enter THURIO.]

THURIO

Madam, my lord your father would speak with you.

SILVIA

I wait upon his pleasure. Come, Sir Thurio,
Go with me. Once more, new servant, welcome.
I'll leave you to confer of home affairs.

When you have done, we look to hear from you.

PROTEUS

We'll both attend upon your ladyship. 120
[Exeunt SILVIA and THURIO.]

VALENTINE

Now, tell me, how do all from whence you came?

PROTEUS

Your friends are well, and have them much commended.°

VALENTINE

And how do yours?

PROTEUS

I left them all in health.

VALENTINE

How does your lady? And how thrives your love? 125

PROTEUS

My tales of love were wont to weary you;
I know you joy not in a love discourse.

VALENTINE

Ay, Proteus, but that life is altered now.
I have done penance for contemning Love,
Whose high imperious thoughts have punished me 130
With bitter fasts, with penitential groans,
With nightly tears, and daily heartsore sighs;
For, in revenge of my contempt of Love,
Love hath chased sleep from my enthralled eyes,
And made them watchers of mine own heart's sorrow. 135
O gentle Proteus, Love's a mighty lord,
And hath so humbled me, as° I confess
There is no woe to° his correction,
Nor to his service no such joy on earth.
Now no discourse, except it be of love; 140
Now can I break my fast, dine, sup, and sleep
Upon the very naked name of love.

PROTEUS

Enough; I read your fortune in your eye.
Was this the idol that you worship so?

VALENTINE

Even she; and is she not a heavenly saint? 145

PROTEUS

No; but she is an earthly paragon.

VALENTINE

Call her divine.

PROTEUS

I will not flatter her.

VALENTINE

O, flatter me, for love delights in praises.

PROTEUS

When I was sick, you gave me bitter pills,
And I must minister the like to you. 150

VALENTINE

Then speak the truth by her; if not divine,
Yet let her be a principality,
Sovereign to all the creatures on the earth.

PROTEUS

Except my mistress.

VALENTINE

Sweet, except not any,
Except thou wilt except against° my love. 155

PROTEUS

Have I not reason to prefer mine own?

VALENTINE

And I will help thee to prefer° her too.
She shall be dignified with this high honor—
To bear my lady's train, lest the base earth
Should from her vesture chance to steal a kiss, 160
And, of so great a favor growing proud,
Disdain to root the summer-swelling flow'r,
And make rough winter everlastingly.

PROTEUS

Why, Valentine, what braggardism is this?

VALENTINE

Pardon me, Proteus. All I can is nothing 165
To her, whose worth makes other worthies nothing;
She is alone.

PROTEUS Then let her alone.

VALENTINE

Not for the world. Why, man, she is mine own,
And I as rich in having such a jewel
As twenty seas, if all their sand were pearl,
The water nectar, and the rocks pure gold.
Forgive me that I do not dream on^o thee,
Because thou see'st me dote upon my love.
My foolish rival, that her father likes
Only for his possessions are so huge,
Is gone with her along; and I must after,
For love, thou know'st, is full of jealousy.

PROTEUS

But she loves you?

VALENTINE

Ay, and we are betrothed; nay, more, our marriage hour,
With all the cunning manner of our flight,
Determined of: how I must climb her window,
The ladder made of cords, and all the means
Plotted and 'greed on for my happiness.
Good Proteus, go with me to my chamber,
In these affairs to aid me with thy counsel.

PROTEUS

Go on before; I shall inquire you forth.
I must unto the road, to disembark
Some necessities that I needs must use,
And then I'll presently attend you.

VALENTINE

Will you make haste?

PROTEUS

I will. Exit [VALENTINE].

Even as one heat another heat expels,
Or as one nail by strength drives out another,
So the remembrance of my former love
Is by a newer object quite forgotten.
Is it mine eye, or Valentine's praise,
Her true perfection, or my false transgression,
That makes me reasonless^o to reason thus?
She is fair; and so is Julia, that I love—
That I did love, for now my love is thawed,
Which, like a waxen image 'gainst a fire,
Bears no impression of the thing it was.
Methinks my zeal to Valentine is cold,
And that I love him not as I was wont.
O, but I love his lady too too much!
And that's the reason I love him so little.
How shall I dote on her with more advice,^o
That thus without advice begin to love her!
'Tis but her picture^o I have yet beheld,
And that hath dazzled my reason's light;
But when I look on her perfections,
There is no reason^o but I shall be blind.
If I can check my erring love, I will;
If not, to compass^o her I'll use my skill.

Exit.

Scene V. [Milan. A street.]

Enter SPEED and LAUNCE [meeting].

SPEED Launce! By mine honesty, welcome to Padua!¹⁰
LAUNCE Forswear^o not thyself, sweet youth; for I am not welcome. I reckon this always—that a man is never undone till he be hanged, nor never welcome to a place till some certain shot^o be paid, and the hostess say, "Welcome!"⁵
SPEED Come on, you madcap, I'll to the alehouse with you presently, where, for one shot of fivepence, thou shalt have five thousand welcomes. But, sirrah, how did thy master part with Madam Julia?¹⁰
LAUNCE Marry, after they closed in earnest,^o they parted very fairly in jest.
SPEED But shall she marry him?
LAUNCE No.¹⁸⁰
SPEED How, then? Shall he marry her?¹⁵
LAUNCE No, neither.
SPEED What, are they broken?
LAUNCE No, they are both as whole as a fish.
SPEED Why, then, how stands the matter with them?¹⁸⁵
LAUNCE Marry, thus: when it stands well with him,²⁰
it stands well with her.
SPEED What an ass art thou! I understand thee not.
LAUNCE What a block art thou, that thou canst not!
My staff understands me.
SPEED What thou sayest?²⁵
LAUNCE Ay, and what I do too. Look thee, I'll but lean, and my staff understands me.¹⁹⁰
SPEED It stands under thee, indeed.
LAUNCE Why, stand-under and under-stand is all one.
SPEED But tell me true, will't be a match?³⁰
LAUNCE Ask my dog. If he say ay, it will; if he say no, it will; if he shake his tail and say nothing, it will.
SPEED The conclusion is, then, that it will.¹⁹⁵
LAUNCE Thou shalt never get such a secret from me
but by a parable.³⁵
SPEED 'Tis well that I get it so. But, Launce, how sayest thou,^o that my master is become a notable lover?²⁰⁰
LAUNCE I never knew him otherwise.
SPEED Than how?⁴⁰
LAUNCE A notable lubber, as thou reportest him to be.
SPEED Why, thou whoreson ass, thou mistak'st me.
LAUNCE Why fool, I meant not thee; I meant thy master.²⁰⁵
SPEED I tell thee, my master is become a hot lover.⁴⁵
LAUNCE Why, I tell thee, I care not though he burn himself in love. If thou wilt, go with me to the alehouse; if not, thou art an Hebrew, a Jew, and not worth the name of a Christian.
SPEED Why?⁵⁰
LAUNCE Because thou hast not so much charity in thee as to go to the ale with a Christian.^o Wilt thou go?
SPEED At thy service. Exeunt.

PROTEUS

To leave my Julia shall I be forsworn;
 To love fair Silvia shall I be forsworn;
 To wrong my friend, I shall be much forsworn;
 And ev'n that pow'r which gave me first my oath
 Provokes me to this threefold perjury:
 Love bade me swear, and love bids me forswear.
 O sweet-suggesting Love, if thou hast sinned,
 Teach me, thy tempted subject, to excuse it!
 At first I did adore a twinkling star,
 But now I worship a celestial sun.
 Unheedful vows may heedfully be broken;
 And he wants° wit that wants resolvèd will
 To learn° his wit t' exchange the bad for better.
 Fie, fie, unreverend tongue! To call her bad,
 Whose sovereignty so oft thou hast preferred
 With twenty thousand soul-confirming oaths.
 I cannot leave to love, and yet I do;
 But there I leave to love where I should love.
 Julia I lose, and Valentine I lose.
 If I keep them, I needs must lose myself;
 If I lose them, thus find I by their loss
 For Valentine, myself, for Julia, Silvia.
 I to myself am dearer than a friend,
 For love is still most precious in itself;
 And Silvia—witness heaven, that made her fair!—
 Shows Julia but a swarthy Ethiopie.
 I will forget that Julia is alive,
 Rememb'ring that my love to her is dead;
 And Valentine I'll hold an enemy,
 Aiming at Silvia as a sweeter friend.
 I cannot now prove constant to myself,
 Without some treachery used to Valentine.
 This night he meaneth with a corded ladder
 To climb celestial Silvia's chamber window,
 Myself in counsel, his competitor.°
 Now presently I'll give her father notice
 Of their disguising and pretended° flight;
 Who, all enraged, will banish Valentine;
 For Thurio, he intends, shall wed his daughter.
 But, Valentine being gone, I'll quickly cross
 By some sly trick blunt Thurio's dull proceeding.
 Love, lend me wings to make my purpose swift,
 As thou hast lent me wit to plot this drift!° Exit.

Scene VII. [Verona. Julia's house.]Enter JULIA and LUCETTA.

JULIA

Counsel, Lucetta; gentle girl, assist me;
 And, ev'n in kind love, I do conjure thee,
 Who art the table° wherein all my thoughts
 Are visibly characterized and engraved,
 To lesson me, and tell me some good mean,

How, with my honor,° I may undertake
 A journey to my loving Proteus.

LUCETTA

Alas, the way is wearisome and long!

JULIA

A true-devoted pilgrim is not weary
 To measure kingdoms with his feeble steps;
 Much less shall she that hath love's wings to fly—
 And when the flight is made to one so dear,
 Of such divine perfection, as Sir Proteus.

LUCETTA

Better forbear till Proteus make return.

JULIA

O, know'st thou not his looks are my soul's food?
 Pity the dearth that I have pinèd in
 By longing for that food so long a time.
 Didst thou but know the inly° touch of love,
 Thou wouldst as soon go kindle fire with snow
 As seek to quench the fire of love with words.

LUCETTA

I do not seek to quench your love's hot fire,
 But qualify° the fire's extreme rage,
 Lest it should burn above the bounds of reason.

JULIA

The more thou damm'st it up, the more it burns.
 The current that with gentle murmur glides,
 Thou know'st, being stopped, impatiently doth rage;
 But when his fair course is not hinderèd,
 He makes sweet music with th' enameled° stones,
 Giving a gentle kiss to every sedge
 He overtaketh in his pilgrimage;
 And so by many winding nooks he strays,
 With willing sport, to the wild ocean.
 Then let me go, and hinder not my course.
 I'll be as patient as a gentle stream,
 And make a pastime of each weary step,
 Till the last step have brought me to my love;
 And there I'll rest, as after much turmoil
 A blessèd soul doth in Elysium.

LUCETTA

But in what habit° will you go along?

JULIA

Not like a woman, for I would prevent
 The loose encounters of lascivious men.
 Gentle Lucetta, fit me with such weeds°
 As may besem some well-reputed page.

LUCETTA

Why, then, your ladyship must cut your hair.

JULIA

No, girl; I'll knit it up in silken strings
 With twenty odd-conceited° truelove knots.
 To be fantastic may become a youth
 Of greater time° than I shall show to be.

LUCETTA

What fàshion, madam, shall I make your breeches?

JULIA

Out, out,° Lucetta! That will be ill-favored.

LUCETTA

A round hose, madam, now's not worth a pin,
 Unless you have a codpiece to stick pins on.

JULIA

Lucetta, as thou lov'st me, let me have
 What thou think'st meet, and is most mannerly.
 But tell me, wench, how will the world repute me
 For undertaking so unstaide° a journey?
 I fear me, it will make me scandalized.

LUCETTA

If you think so, then stay at home, and go not.

JULIA

Nay, that I will not.

LUCETTA

Then never dream on infamy, but go.
 If Proteus like your journey when you come,
 No matter who's displeased when you are gone:
 I fear me, he will scarce be pleased withal.°

JULIA

That is the least, Lucetta, of my fear.
 A thousand oaths, an ocean of his tears,
 And instances of infinite° of love
 Warrant me welcome to my Proteus.

LUCETTA

All these are servants to deceitful men.

JULIA

Base men, that use them to so base effect!
 But truer stars did govern Proteus' birth.
 His words are bonds, his oaths are oracles;
 His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate;
 His tears pure messengers sent from his heart;
 His heart as far from fraud as heaven from earth.

LUCETTA

Pray heav'n he prove so, when you come to him!

JULIA

Now, as thou lov'st me, do him not that wrong,
 To bear a hard opinion of his truth.
 Only deserve my love by loving him,
 And presently go with me to my chamber
 To take a note of what I stand in need of
 To furnish me upon my longing° journey.
 All that is mine I leave at thy dispose,
 My goods, my lands, my reputation;
 Only, in lieu thereof, dispatch me hence.
 Come, answer not, but to it presently!
 I am impatient of my tarriance.

Exeunt. 90

ACT III

Scene I. [Milan. The duke's palace.]

Enter DUKE, THURIO, [and] PROTEUS.

DUKE

Sir Thurio, give us leave, I pray, awhile;
 We have some secrets to confer about.

[Exit THURIO.]

Now, tell me, Proteus, what's your will with me?

PROTEUS

My gracious lord, that which I would discover°
 The law of friendship bids me to conceal;
 But when I call to mind your gracious favors
 Done to me, undeserving as I am,
 My duty pricks me on to utter that
 Which else no worldly good should draw from me.
 Know, worthy prince, Sir Valentine, my friend,
 This night intends to steal away your daughter.
 Myself am one made privy to the plot.
 I know you have determined to bestow her
 On Thurio, whom your gentle daughter hates,
 And should she thus be stol'n away from you,
 It would be much vexation to your age.
 Thus, for my duty's sake, I rather chose
 To cross my friend in his intended drift
 Than, by concealing it, heap on your head
 A pack of sorrows which would press you down,
 Being unprevented, to your timeless° grave.

DUKE

Proteus, I thank thee for thine honest care,
 Which to requite, command me while I live.
 This love of theirs myself have often seen,
 Haply when they have judged me fast asleep;
 And oftentimes have purposed to forbid
 Sir Valentine her company and my court.
 But, fearing lest my jealous° aim might err,
 And so, unworthily disgrace the man,
 A rashness that I ever yet have shunned,
 I gave him gentle looks; thereby to find
 That which thyself hast now disclosed to me.
 And, that thou mayst perceive my fear of this,
 Knowing that tender youth is soon suggested,°
 I nightly lodge her in an upper tow'r,
 The key whereof myself have ever kept;
 And thence she cannot be conveyed away.

PROTEUS

Know, noble lord, they have devised a mean
 How he her chamber window will ascend,
 And with a corded ladder fetch her down;
 For which the youthful lover now is gone,
 And this way comes he with it presently,
 Where, if it please you, you may intercept him.
 But, good my lord, do it so cunningly
 That my discovery be not aimed at;°
 For love of you, not hate unto my friend,
 Hath made me publisher of this pretense.°

DUKE

Upon mine honor, he shall never know
 That I had any light from thee of this.

PROTEUS

Adieu, my lord; Sir Valentine is coming. [Exit.] 50

[Enter VALENTINE.]

DUKE

Sir Valentine, whither away so fast?

VALENTINE

Please it your grace, there is a messenger
That stays to bear my letters to my friends,
And I am going to deliver them.

DUKE

Be they of much import? 55

VALENTINE

The tenor of them doth but signify
My health and happy being at your court.

DUKE

Nay then, no matter; stay with me awhile.
I am to break with thee of some affairs
That touch me near, wherein thou must be secret.
'Tis not unknown to thee that I have sought
To match my friend Sir Thurio to my daughter.

VALENTINE

I know it well, my lord; and, sure, the match
Were rich and honorable; besides, the gentleman
Is full of virtue, bounty, worth, and qualities
Beseeming such a wife as your fair daughter.
Cannot your grace win her to fancy him?

DUKE

No, trust me; she is peevish, sullen, froward,^o
Proud, disobedient, stubborn, lacking duty,
Neither regarding that she is my child
Nor fearing me as if I were her father.
And, may I say to thee, this pride of hers,
Upon advice,^o hath drawn^o my love from her;
And, where I thought the remnant of mine age
Should have been cherished by her childlike duty,
I now am full resolved to take a wife,
And turn her out to who will take her in.
Then let her beauty be her wedding dow'r,
For me and my possessions she esteems not.

VALENTINE

What would your grace have me to do in this? 80

DUKE

There is a lady in Verona here^o
Whom I affect; but she is nice^o and coy,
And nought esteems my agèd eloquence.
Now, therefore, would I have thee to my tutor—
For long ago I have forgot to court;
Besides, the fashion of the time is changed—
How and which way I may bestow^o myself,
To be regarded in her sun-bright eye.

VALENTINE

Win her with gifts, if she respect not words.
Dumb jewels often in their silent kind^o
More than quick words do move a woman's mind.

DUKE

But she did scorn a present that I sent her.

68 peevish . . . froward obstinate . . . willful 73 advice consideration; drawn withdrawn 81 in Verona here some editors emend "in" to "of," but probably Shakespeare forgot

87 bestow conduct 90 kind nature

VALENTINE

A woman sometimes scorns what best contents her.
Send her another; never give her o'er;
For scorn at first makes after-love the more. 95
If she do frown, 'tis not in hate of you,
But rather to beget more love in you.
If she do chide, 'tis not to have you gone;
For why, the fools are mad, if left alone.
Take no repulse, whatever she doth say;
For "get you gone," she doth not mean "away!" 100
Flatter and praise, commend, extol their graces;
Though ne'er so black, say they have angels' faces.
That man that hath a tongue, I say, is no man,
If with his tongue he cannot win a woman. 105

DUKE

But she I mean is promised by her friends
Unto a youthful gentleman of worth,
And kept severely from resort of men,
That no man hath access by day to her.

VALENTINE

Why, then, I would resort to her by night. 110

DUKE

Ay, but the doors be locked, and keys kept safe,
That no man hath recourse to her by night.

65

VALENTINE

What lets^o but one may enter at her window?

DUKE

Her chamber is aloft, far from the ground,
And built so shelving^o that one cannot climb it
Without apparent hazard of his life. 115

70

VALENTINE

Why, then, a ladder, quaintly made of cords,
To cast up, with a pair of anchoring hooks,
Would serve to scale another Hero's tow'r,
So bold Leander would adventure it. 120

75

DUKE

Now, as thou art a gentleman of blood,^o
Advise me where I may have such a ladder.

VALENTINE

When would you use it? Pray, sir, tell me that.

DUKE

This very night; for love is like a child,
That longs for everything that he can come by. 125

80

VALENTINE

By seven o'clock I'll get you such a ladder.

DUKE

But, hark thee; I will go to her alone.
How shall I best convey the ladder thither? 85

85

VALENTINE

It will be light, my lord, that you may bear it
Under a cloak that is of any length. 130

90

DUKE

A cloak as long as thine will serve the turn?

VALENTINE

Ay, my good lord.

DUKE

Then let me see thy cloak.
I'll get me one of such another length.

VALENTINE

Why, any cloak will serve the turn, my lord.

DUKE

How shall I fashion me to wear a cloak? 135

90

113 lets prevents 115 shelving steeply sloping 121 of blood of noble blood

I pray thee, let me feel thy cloak upon me.

[Opens Valentine's cloak.]

What letter is this same? What's here? "To Silvia"—
And here an engine° fit for my proceeding.
I'll be so bold to break the seal for once.

[Reads.]

"My thoughts do harbor with my Silvia nightly;
And slaves they are to me, that send them flying.
O, could their master come and go as lightly,
Himself would lodge where senseless they are lying!
My herald thoughts in thy pure bosom rest them,
While I, their king, that thither them importune,
Do curse the grace that with such grace hath blessed
them,

Because myself do want my servants' fortune.
I curse myself, for they are sent by me,
That they should harbor where their lord should be."
What's here?

"Silvia, this night I will enfranchise thee."
'Tis so; and here's the ladder for the purpose.
Why, Phaethon—for thou art Merops' son—
Wilt thou aspire to guide the heavenly car,
And with thy daring folly burn the world?°
Wilt thou reach stars, because they shine on thee?
Go, base intruder! Overweening slave!
Bestow thy fawning smiles on equal mates,
And think my patience, more than thy desert,
Is privilege for thy departure hence.
Thank me for this more than for all the favors
Which all too much I have bestowed on thee.
But if thou linger in my territories
Longer than swiftest expedition°
Will give thee time to leave our royal court,
By heaven, my wrath shall far exceed the love
I ever bore my daughter or thyself.
Be gone! I will not hear thy vain excuse;
But, as thou lov'st thy life, make speed from hence.

[Exit.]

VALENTINE

And why not death rather than living torment?
To die is to be banished from myself;
And Silvia is myself. Banished from her
Is self from self: a deadly banishment!
What light is light, if Silvia be not seen?
What joy is joy, if Silvia be not by?—
Unless it be to think that she is by,
And feed upon the shadow° of perfection.
Except I be by Silvia in the night,
There is no music in the nightingale;
Unless I look on Silvia in the day,
There is no day for me to look upon.
She is my essence, and I leave° to be,
If I be not by her fair influence°
Fostered, illumined, cherished, kept alive.
I fly not death, to fly his deadly doom:

138 engine contrivance (here, the ladder) 153–55 Phaethon

Tarry I here, I but attend on death;
But, fly I hence, I fly away from life.

[Enter PROTEUS and LAUNCE.]

PROTEUS Run, boy, run, run, and seek him out.

LAUNCE Soho, soho!

PROTEUS What see'st thou?

LAUNCE Him we go to find. There's not a hair° on's head but 'tis a Valentine.°

PROTEUS Valentine?

VALENTINE No.

PROTEUS Who then? His spirit?

VALENTINE Neither.

PROTEUS What then?

VALENTINE Nothing.

LAUNCE Can nothing speak? Master, shall I strike?

PROTEUS Who wouldst thou strike?

LAUNCE Nothing.

PROTEUS Villain, forbear.

LAUNCE Why, sir, I'll strike nothing. I pray you—

PROTEUS Sirrah, I say, forbear. Friend Valentine, a word.

VALENTINE

My ears are stopped, and cannot hear good news,
So much of bad already hath possessed them.

PROTEUS

Then in dumb silence will I bury mine,
For they are harsh, untunable, and bad.

VALENTINE

Is Silvia dead?

PROTEUS

No, Valentine.

VALENTINE

No Valentine, indeed, for sacred Silvia.

Hath she forsworn me?

PROTEUS

No, Valentine.

VALENTINE

No Valentine, if Silvia have forsworn me.

What is your news?

LAUNCE

Sir, there is a proclamation that you are vanished.

PROTEUS

That thou art banishèd—O, that's the news!—
From hence, from Silvia, and from me thy friend.

VALENTINE

O, I have fed upon this woe already,
And now excess of it will make me surfeit.
Doth Silvia know that I am banishèd?

PROTEUS

Ay, ay, and she hath offered to the doom—
Which, unreversed, stands in effectual force—
A sea of melting pearl, which some call tears:
Those at her father's churlish feet she tendered;
With them, upon her knees, her humble self;
Wringing her hands, whose whiteness so became them
As if but now they waxèd pale for woe.
But neither bended knees, pure hands held up,
Sad sighs, deep groans, nor silver-shedding tears,
Could penetrate her uncompassionate sire;

191 hair with pun on hare, prepared by preceding "Soho," a hunting cry 192 Valentine with pun, as in lines 211–215 below

But Valentine, if he be ta'en, must die.
 Besides, her intercession chafed him so,
 When she for thy repeal was suppliant,
 That to close prison he commanded her,
 With many bitter threats of bidding^o there.

VALENTINE

No more; unless the next word that thou speak'st
 Have some malignant power upon my life.
 If so, I pray thee, breathe it in mine ear,
 As ending anthem^o of my endless dolor.

PROTEUS

Cease to lament for that thou canst not help,
 And study help for that which thou lament'st.
 Time is the nurse and breeder of all good.
 Here if thou stay, thou canst not see thy love;
 Besides, thy staying will abridge thy life.
 Hope is a lover's staff; walk hence with that,
 And manage it against despairing thoughts.
 Thy letters may be here, though thou art hence;
 Which, being writ to me, shall be delivered
 Even in the milk-white bosom of thy love.
 The time now serves not to expostulate.
 Come, I'll convey thee through the city gate,
 And, ere I part with thee, confer at large
 Of all that may concern thy love affairs.
 As thou lov'st Silvia, though not for thyself,
 Regard thy danger, and along with me!

VALENTINE

I pray thee, Launce, and if^o thou see'st my boy,
 Bid him make haste, and meet me at the Northgate.

PROTEUS

Go, sirrah, find him out. Come, Valentine.

VALENTINE

O my dear Silvia! Hapless Valentine!

[Exeunt VALENTINE and PROTEUS.]

LAUNCE I am but a fool, look you, and yet I have the wit to think my master is a kind of a knave. But that's all one, if he be but one knave. He lives not now that knows me to be in love, yet I am in love; 265
 but a team of horse shall not pluck that from me, nor who 'tis I love, and yet 'tis a woman; but what woman, I will not tell myself, and yet 'tis a milkmaid; yet 'tis not a maid, for she hath had gossips;^o yet 'tis a maid, for she is her master's maid, and serves for 270 wages. She hath more qualities than a water spaniel—which is much in a bare Christian. [Pulling out a paper.] Here is the cate-log of her condition. "Imprimis:^o
 She can fetch and carry." Why, a horse can do no more: nay, a horse cannot fetch, but only carry; 275 therefore is she better than a jade.^o "Item: She can milk"; look you, a sweet virtue in a maid with clean hands.

Enter SPEED.

SPEED How now, Signior Launce! What news with your mastership?

LAUNCE With my master's ship? Why, it is at sea.

SPEED Well, your old vice still; mistake the word.
 What news, then, in your paper?

LAUNCE The black'st news that ever thou heard'st.

SPEED Why, man, how black? 285

235 LAUNCE Why, as black as ink.

SPEED Let me read them.

LAUNCE Fie on thee, jolthead!^o Thou canst not read.

SPEED Thou liest; I can.

LAUNCE I will try thee. Tell me this: who begot thee? 290

SPEED Marry, the son of my grandfather.

240 LAUNCE O illiterate loiterer! It was the son of thy grandmother. This proves that thou canst not read.

SPEED Come, fool, come; try me in thy paper.

LAUNCE There; and Saint Nicholas^o be thy speed!^o 295

SPEED [Reads.] "Imprimis: She can milk."

LAUNCE Ay, that she can.

245 SPEED "Item: She brews good ale."

LAUNCE And thereof comes the proverb: "Blessing of your heart, you brew good ale." 300

SPEED "Item: She can sew."

LAUNCE That's as much as to say, "Can she so?"

250 SPEED "Item: She can knit."

LAUNCE What need a man care for a stock^o with a wench when she can knit him a stock? 305

SPEED "Item: She can wash and scour."

LAUNCE A special virtue; for then she need not be washed and scoured. 255

SPEED "Item: She can spin."

LAUNCE Then may I set the world on wheels,^o when 310
 she can spin for her living.

SPEED "Item: She hath many nameless virtues."

LAUNCE That's as much as to say, bastard virtues—that, indeed, know not their fathers, and therefore 315 have no names.

SPEED "Here follow her vices."

LAUNCE Close at the heels of her virtues.

SPEED "Item: She is not to be kissed fasting, in respect of her breath."

LAUNCE Well, that fault may be mended with a 320 breakfast. Read on.

SPEED "Item: She hath a sweet mouth."^o

LAUNCE That makes amends for her sour breath.

SPEED "Item: She doth talk in her sleep."

LAUNCE It's no matter for that, so she sleep not in 325 her talk.

SPEED "Item: She is slow in words."

LAUNCE O villain, that set this down among her vices! To be slow in words is a woman's only virtue.

I pray thee, out with't, and place it for her chief 330 virtue.

SPEED "Item: She is proud."

LAUNCE Out with that too; it was Eve's legacy, and cannot be ta'en from her.

SPEED "Item: She hath no teeth." 335

LAUNCE I care not for that neither, because I love crusts.

SPEED "Item: She is curst."^o

280 LAUNCE Well, the best is, she hath no teeth to bite.

SPEED "Item: She will often praise her liquor." 340

LAUNCE If her liquor be good, she shall; if she will not, I will, for good things should be praised.

SPEED "Item: She is too liberal."

LAUNCE Of her tongue she cannot, for that's writ down she is slow of; of her purse she shall not, for 345 that I'll keep shut. Now, of another thing she may, and that cannot I help. Well, proceed.

SPEED "Item: She hath more hair than wit, and more faults than hairs, and more wealth than faults."

LAUNCE Stop there: I'll have her. She was mine, and 350 not mine, twice or thrice in that last article. Rehearse that once more.

SPEED "Item: She hath more hair than wit"—

LAUNCE More hair than wit? It may be; I'll prove it.
The cover of the salt° hides the salt, and therefore 355 it is more than the salt; the hair that covers the wit is more than the wit, for the greater hides the less. What's next?

SPEED "And more faults than hairs"—

LAUNCE That's monstrous. O, that that were out! 360

SPEED "And more wealth than faults."

LAUNCE Why, that word makes the faults gracious.
Well, I'll have her; and if it be a match, as nothing is impossible—

SPEED What then? 365

LAUNCE Why, then will I tell thee—that thy master stays for thee at the Northgate?

SPEED For me?

LAUNCE For thee! Ay, who art thou? He hath stayed for a better man than thee. 370

SPEED And must I go to him?

LAUNCE Thou must run to him, for thou hast stayed so long that going° will scarce serve the turn.

SPEED Why didst not tell me sooner? Pox of° your love letters! [Exit.] 375

LAUNCE Now will he be swung for reading my letter—an unmannerly slave, that will thrust himself into secrets! I'll after, to rejoice in the boy's correction.
[Exit.]

Scene II. [Milan. The duke's palace.]

Enter DUKE [and] THURIO.

DUKE
Sir Thurio, fear not but that she will love you,
Now Valentine is banished from her sight.

THURIO
Since his exile she hath despised me most,
Forsworn my company, and railed at me,
That I am desperate of obtaining her. 5

DUKE
This weak impress° of love is as a figure
Trenchèd in ice, which with an hour's heat
Dissolves to water, and doth lose his form.
A little time will melt her frozen thoughts,
And worthless Valentine shall be forgot. 10

[Enter PROTEUS.]

How now, Sir Proteus! Is your countryman,
According to our proclamation, gone?

PROTEUS

Gone, my good lord.

DUKE

My daughter takes his going grievously.

PROTEUS

A little time, my lord, will kill that grief. 15

DUKE

So I believe, but Thurio thinks not so.
Proteus, the good conceit° I hold of thee—
For thou hast shown some sign of good desert—
Makes me the better to confer with thee.

PROTEUS

Longer than I prove loyal to your grace, 20
Let me not live to look upon your grace.

DUKE

Thou know'st how willingly I would effect
The match between Sir Thurio and my daughter.

PROTEUS

I do, my lord.

DUKE

And also, I think, thou art not ignorant 25
How she opposes her against my will.

PROTEUS

She did, my lord, when Valentine was here.

DUKE

Ay, and perversely she perseveres so.
What might we do to make the girl forget
The love of Valentine, and love Sir Thurio? 30

PROTEUS

The best way is to slander Valentine
With falsehood, cowardice, and poor descent,
Three things that women highly hold in hate.

DUKE

Ay, but she'll think that it is spoke in hate.

PROTEUS

Ay, if his enemy deliver it; 35
Therefore it must with circumstance° be spoken
By one whom she esteemeth as his friend.

DUKE

Then you must undertake to slander him.

PROTEUS

And that, my lord, I shall be loath to do.
'Tis an ill office for a gentleman, 40
Especially against his very friend.

DUKE

Where your good word cannot advantage him,
Your slander never can endamage him;
Therefore the office is indifferent,° 45
Being entreated to it by your friend.

PROTEUS

You have prevailed, my lord. If I can do it
By aught that I can speak in his dispraise,
She shall not long continue love to him.
But say this weed her love from Valentine, 50
It follows not that she will love Sir Thurio.

THURIO

Therefore, as you unwind her love from him,
Lest it should ravel and be good to none,
You must provide to bottom° it on me;

355 salt saltcellar 373 going merely walking 374 Pox of plague (literally, syphilis) on
III.ii.6 impress impression (dent, groove)

17 conceit opinion 36 circumstance circumstantial detail 44 indifferent neutral in effect 53 bottom anchor, tie (as a weaver's thread)

Which must be done by praising me as much
As you in worth dispraise Sir Valentine.

55

DUKE

And, Proteus, we dare trust you in this kind,^o
Because we know, on Valentine's report,
You are already Love's firm votary
And cannot soon revolt and change your mind.
Upon this warrant shall you have access
Where you with Silvia may confer at large;
For she is lumpish, heavy, melancholy,
And, for your friend's sake, will be glad of you;
Where you may temper^o her by your persuasion
To hate young Valentine and love my friend.

PROTEUS

As much as I can do, I will effect.
But you, Sir Thurio, are not sharp enough;
You must lay lime to tangle^o her desires
By wailful sonnets, whose composèd rhymes
Should be full-fraught with serviceable vows.^o

DUKE

Ay, much is the force of heaven-bred poesy.

PROTEUS

Say that upon the altar of her beauty
You sacrifice your tears, your sighs, your heart.
Write till your ink be dry, and with your tears
Moist it again, and frame some feeling line
That may discover such integrity.^o
For Orpheus' lute was strung with poets' sinews,
Whose golden touch could soften steel and stones,
Make tigers tame, and huge leviathans

After your dire-lamenting elegies,
Visit by night your lady's chamber window
With some sweet consort;^o to their instruments
Tune a deploring dump.^o The night's dead silence
Will well become such sweet-complaining grievance.
This, or else nothing, will inherit^o her.

DUKE

This discipline^o shows thou hast been in love.

THURIO

And thy advice this night I'll put in practice.
Therefore, sweet Proteus, my direction-giver,
Let us into the city presently
To sort^o some gentlemen well skilled in music.
I have a sonnet that will serve the turn
To give the onset^o to thy good advice.

DUKE

About it, gentlemen!

PROTEUS

We'll wait upon your grace till after supper,
And afterward determine our proceedings.

DUKE

Even now about it! I will pardon you. Exeunt.

ACT IV

Scene I. [A forest.]

Enter certain OUTLAWS.

FIRST OUTLAW

Fellows, stand fast; I see a passenger.^o

SECOND OUTLAW

If there be ten, shrink not, but down with 'em.

[Enter VALENTINE and SPEED.]

THIRD OUTLAW

Stand, sir, and throw us that^o you have about ye.
If not, we'll make you sit, and rifle you.

SPEED

Sir, we are undone; these are the villains
That all the travelers do fear so much.

5

VALENTINE

My friends—

70

FIRST OUTLAW

That's not so, sir; we are your enemies.

SECOND OUTLAW

Peace! We'll hear him.

THIRD OUTLAW

Ay, by my beard, will we, for he's a proper^o man. 10

75

VALENTINE

Then know that I have little wealth to lose.
A man I am crossed with adversity.
My riches are these poor habiliments,
Of which if you should here disfurnish^o me,
You take the sum and substance that I have.

15

80

SECOND OUTLAW

Whither travel you?

VALENTINE

To Verona.

FIRST OUTLAW

Whence came you?

VALENTINE

From Milan.

THIRD OUTLAW

Have you long sojourned there? 20

90

VALENTINE

Some sixteen months, and longer might have stayed
If crooked fortune had not thwarted me.

FIRST OUTLAW

What, were you banished thence?

VALENTINE

I was.

SECOND OUTLAW

For what offense? 25

95

VALENTINE

For that which now torments me to rehearse:
I killed a man, whose death I much repent;
But yet I slew him manfully in fight,
Without false vantage^o or base treachery.

FIRST OUTLAW

Why, ne'er repent it, if it were done so.
But were you banished for so small a fault?

30

VALENTINE

I was, and held me glad of such a doom.^o

VALENTINE

My youthful travel therein made me happy,°
Or else I often had been miserable.

THIRD OUTLAW

By the bare scalp of Robin Hood's fat friar,
This fellow were a king for our wild faction!

FIRST OUTLAW

We'll have him. Sirs, a word.

SPEED Master, be one of them; it's an honorable kind of thievery.

VALENTINE Peace, villain!

SECOND OUTLAW Tell us this: have you anything to take to?°

VALENTINE Nothing but my fortune.

THIRD OUTLAW

Know, then, that some of us are gentlemen,
Such as the fury of ungoverned youth
Thrust from the company of awful° men:
Myself was from Verona banishèd
For practicing° to steal away a lady,
An heir, and near allied unto the duke.

SECOND OUTLAW

And I from Mantua, for a gentleman
Who, in my mood, I stabbed unto the heart.

FIRST OUTLAW

And I for suchlike petty crimes as these.
But to the purpose—for we cite our faults,
That they may hold excused our lawless lives;
And partly, seeing you are beautified
With goodly shape, and by your own report
A linguist, and a man of such perfection
As we do in our quality much want°—

SECOND OUTLAW

Indeed, because you are a banished man,
Therefore, above the rest, we parley to you.
Are you content to be our general,
To make a virtue of necessity,
And live, as we do, in this wilderness?

THIRD OUTLAW

What say'st thou? Wilt thou be of our consort?
Say ay, and be the captain of us all.
We'll do thee homage and be ruled by thee,
Love thee as our commander and our king.

FIRST OUTLAW

But if thou scorn our courtesy, thou diest.

SECOND OUTLAW

Thou shalt not live to brag what we have offered.

VALENTINE

I take your offer, and will live with you,
Provided that you do no outrages
On silly° women or poor passengers.

THIRD OUTLAW

No, we detest such vile base practices.
Come, go with us; we'll bring thee to our crews
And show thee all the treasure we have got,
Which, with ourselves, all rest at thy dispose. Exeunt.

Enter PROTEUS.

PROTEUS

Already have I been false to Valentine,
And now I must be as unjust to Thurio.
Under the color° of commending him,
I have access my own love to prefer.°
But Silvia is too fair, too true, too holy
To be corrupted with my worthless gifts.
When I protest true loyalty to her,
She twits me with my falsehood to my friend;
When to her beauty I commend my vows,
She bids me think how I have been forsworn
In breaking faith with Julia whom I loved.
And notwithstanding all her sudden quips,
The least whereof would quell a lover's hope,
Yet, spaniellike, the more she spurns my love,
The more it grows, and fawneth on her still.
But here comes Thurio; now must we to her window
And give some evening music to her ear.

[Enter THURIO and MUSICIANS.]

THURIO

How now, Sir Proteus, are you crept before us?

PROTEUS

Ay, gentle Thurio, for you know that love
Will creep in service where it cannot go.°

THURIO

Ay, but I hope, sir, that you love not here.

PROTEUS

Sir, but I do; or else I would be hence.

THURIO Who? Silvia?

PROTEUS Ay, Silvia, for your sake.

THURIO

I thank you for your own. Now, gentlemen,
Let's tune, and to it lustily awhile.

[Enter, at a distance, HOST, and JULIA in boy's clothes.]

HOST

Now, my young guest, methinks you're allycholly.°
I pray you, why is it?

JULIA

Marry, mine host, because I cannot be merry.

HOST Come, we'll have you merry. I'll bring you where you shall hear music, and see the gentleman that you asked for.

JULIA But shall I hear him speak?

HOST Ay, that you shall.

JULIA That will be music.

[Music plays.]

HOST Hark, hark!

JULIA Is he among these?

HOST Ay, but, peace! Let's hear 'em.

Song.

Who is Silvia, what is she,
That all our swains commend her?
Holy, fair, and wise is she;
The heaven such grace did lend her,
That she might admirèd be.

IV.ii.3 color pretense 4 prefer advance 20 go walk upright

Is she kind as she is fair?

For beauty lives with kindness.
Love doth to her eyes repair,
To help him of his blindness,
And, being helped, inhabits there.

Then to Silvia let us sing,
That Silvia is excelling;
She excels each mortal thing
Upon the dull earth dwelling.
To her let us garlands bring.

HOST How now! Are you sadder than you were before? How do you, man? The music likes^o you 55 not.

JULIA You mistake; the musician likes me not.

HOST Why, my pretty youth?

JULIA He plays false, father.

HOST How? Out of tune on the strings? 60

JULIA Not so; but yet so false that he grieves my very heartstrings.

HOST You have a quick ear.

JULIA Ay, I would I were deaf; it makes me have a slow^o heart. 65

HOST I perceive you delight not in music.

JULIA Not a whit, when it jars so.

HOST Hark, what fine change^o is in the music!

JULIA Ay, that change is the spite.

HOST You would have them always play but one 70 thing?

JULIA I would always have one play but one thing.
But, host, doth this Sir Proteus that we talk on Often resort unto this gentlewoman?

HOST I tell you what Launce, his man, told me—he 75 loved her out of all nick.^o

JULIA Where is Launce?

HOST Gone to seek his dog, which tomorrow, by his master's command, he must carry for a present to his lady. 80

JULIA Peace! Stand aside. The company parts.

PROTEUS

Sir Thurio, fear not you. I will so plead
That you shall say my cunning drift excels.

THURIO

Where meet we?

PROTEUS At Saint Gregory's well.

THURIO

Farewell.

[Exeunt THURIO and MUSICIANS.]

[Enter SILVIA above.]

PROTEUS

Madam, good even to your ladyship. 85

SILVIA

I thank you for your music, gentlemen.
Who is that that spake?

PROTEUS

One, lady, if you knew his pure heart's truth,
You would quickly learn to know him by his voice.

SILVIA

Sir Proteus, as I take it. 90

PROTEUS

Sir Proteus, gentle lady, and your servant.

SILVIA

What's your will?

PROTEUS

That I may compass yours.

SILVIA

You have your wish; my will is even this:
That presently you hie you home to bed.
Thou subtle, perjured, false, disloyal man!
Think'st thou I am so shallow, so conceitless,^o 95
To be seduced by thy flattery,
That hast deceived so many with thy vows?
Return, return, and make thy love amends.
For me, by this pale queen of night I swear, 100
I am so far from granting thy request
That I despise thee for thy wrongful suit,
And by and by intend to chide myself
Even for this time I spend in talking to thee.

PROTEUS

I grant, sweet love, that I did love a lady;
But she is dead. 105

JULIA [Aside.] 'Twere false, if I should speak it,
For I am sure she is not buried.

SILVIA

Say that she be; yet Valentine thy friend
Survives, to whom, thyself art witness,
I am betrothed. And art thou not ashamed 110
To wrong him with thy importunacy?

PROTEUS

I likewise hear that Valentine is dead.

SILVIA

And so suppose am I, for in his grave
Assure thyself my love is buried.

PROTEUS

Sweet lady, let me rake it from the earth. 115

SILVIA

Go to thy lady's grave, and call hers thence;
Or, at the least, in hers sepulcher thine.

JULIA [Aside.]

He heard not that.

PROTEUS

Madam, if your heart be so obdurate,
Vouchsafe^o me yet your picture for my love, 120
The picture that is hanging in your chamber.
To that I'll speak, to that I'll sigh and weep;
For since the substance of your perfect self
Is else devoted,^o I am but a shadow,
And to your shadow^o will I make true love. 125

JULIA [Aside.]

If 'twere a substance, you would, sure, deceive it,
And make it but a shadow, as I am.

SILVIA

I am very loath to be your idol, sir;
But since your falsehood shall become you well
To worship shadows and adore false shapes, 130
Send to me in the morning, and I'll send it.
And so, good rest.

PROTEUS

That wait for execution in the morn.

Scene III. [Milan. Beneath Silvia's window.]

Enter EGLAMOUR.

EGLAMOUR
This is the hour that Madam Silvia
Entreated me to call and know her mind.
There's some great matter she'd employ me in.
Madam, madam!

[Enter SILVIA above.]

SILVIA
Who calls?

EGLAMOUR Your servant and your friend, 5
One that attends your ladyship's command.

SILVIA
Sir Eglamour, a thousand times good morrow.

EGLAMOUR
As many, worthy lady, to yourself.
According to your ladyship's impose,^o
I am thus early come to know what service 10
It is your pleasure to command me in.

SILVIA
O Eglamour, thou art a gentleman—
Think not I flatter, for I swear I do not—
Valiant, wise, remorseful,^o well accomplished.
Thou art not ignorant what dear good will 15
I bear unto the banished Valentine,
Nor how my father would enforce me marry
Vain Thurio, whom my very soul abhors.
Thyself hast loved, and I have heard thee say
No grief did ever come so near thy heart 20
As when thy lady and thy true love died,
Upon whose grave thou vow'dst pure chastity.
Sir Eglamour, I would to Valentine,
To Mantua, where I hear he makes abode;
And, for the ways are dangerous to pass, 25
I do desire thy worthy company,
Upon whose faith and honor I repose.
Urge not my father's anger, Eglamour,
But think upon my grief, a lady's grief,
And on the justice of my flying hence 30
To keep me from a most unholy match,
Which heaven and fortune still rewards with plagues.
I do desire thee, even from a heart
As full of sorrows as the sea of sands,
To bear me company, and go with me: 35
If not, to hide what I have said to thee,
That I may venture to depart alone.

EGLAMOUR
Madam, I pity much your grievances,

Which since I know they virtuously are placed,
I give consent to go along with you, 40
Recking as little what betideth me
As much I wish all good befortune you.
When will you go?

SILVIA This evening coming.

EGLAMOUR Where shall I meet you? 45

SILVIA At Friar Patrick's cell, where I intend holy confession.

EGLAMOUR I will not fail your ladyship. Good morrow, gentle lady.

SILVIA Good morrow, kind Sir Eglamour. 50
Exeunt [severally].

Scene IV. [Milan. Beneath Silvia's window.]

Enter LAUNCE [with his dog].

LAUNCE When a man's servant shall play the cur with him, look you, it goes hard: one that I brought up of^o a puppy; one that I saved from drowning, when three or four of his blind brothers and sisters went to it! I have taught him, even as one would say precisely, 5
"thus I would teach a dog." I was sent to deliver him as a present to Mistress Silvia from my master, and I came no sooner into the dining chamber, but he steps me to her trencher^o and steals her capon's leg. O, 'tis a foul thing when a cur cannot keep^o himself in all 10 companies! I would have, as one should say, one that takes upon him to be a dog indeed, to be as it were, a dog at all things. If I had not had more wit than he, to take a fault upon me that he did, I think verily he had been hanged for't; sure as I live, he had suffered 15 for't. You shall judge. He thrusts me himself into the company of three or four gentlemanlike dogs under the duke's table; he had not been there—bless the mark!—a pissing while, but all the chamber smelt him. "Out with the dog!" says one. "What cur is that?" says 20 another. "Whip him out," says the third. "Hang him up," says the duke. I, having been acquainted with the smell before, knew it was Crab, and goes me to the fellow that whips the dogs. "Friend," quoth I, "you mean to whip the dog?" "Ay, marry, do I," 25 quoth he. "You do him the more wrong," quoth I; "'twas I did the thing you wot^o of." He makes me no more ado, but whips me out of the chamber. How many masters would do this for his servant? Nay, I'll be sworn, I have sat in the stocks for puddings^o 30 he hath stol'n; otherwise he had been executed. I have stood on the pillory for geese he hath killed; otherwise he had suffered for't. Thou think'st not of this now. Nay, I remember the trick you served me when I took my leave of Madam Silvia. Did not I 35 bid thee still mark me, and do as I do? When didst thou see me heave up my leg, and make water against a gentlewoman's farthingale? Didst thou ever see me do such a trick?

PROTEUS

I hope thou wilt. [To LAUNCE.] How now, you whoreson peasant!

Where have you been these two days loitering?

LAUNCE Marry, sir, I carried Mistress Silvia the dog 45
you bade me.

PROTEUS And what says she to my little jewel?

LAUNCE Marry, she says your dog was a cur, and tells you currish thanks is good enough for such a present. 50

PROTEUS But she received my dog?

LAUNCE No, indeed, did she not. Here have I brought him back again.

PROTEUS What, didst thou offer her this from me?

LAUNCE Ay, sir. The other squirrel^o was stol'n from 55 me by the hangman's boys^o in the market place, and then I offered her mine own, who is a dog as big as ten of yours, and therefore the gift the greater.

Or ne'er return again into my sight. 60

Away, I say! Stayest thou to vex me here?

Therefore, know thou, for this I entertain thee. 70
Go presently, and take this ring with thee;
Deliver it to Madam Silvia.
She loved me well delivered it to me.

JULIA

It seems you loved not her, to leave her token.
She is dead, belike?

PROTEUS Not so; I think she lives. 75

JULIA

Alas!

PROTEUS

Why dost thou cry, "Alas"?

JULIA I cannot choose

But pity her.

PROTEUS Wherefore shouldst thou pity her?

JULIA

Because methinks that she loved you as well
As you do love your lady Silvia. 80
She dreams on him that has forgot her love;
You dote on her that cares not for your love.
'Tis pity love should be so contrary;
And thinking on it makes me cry, "Alas!"

This letter. That's her chamber. Tell my lady
I claim the promise for her heavenly picture.
Your message done, hie home unto my chamber,
Where thou shalt find me, sad and solitary. [Exit.]

JULIA

How many women would do such a message? 90

Alas, poor Proteus! Thou hast entertained

A fox to be the shepherd of thy lambs.

Alas, poor fool! Why do I pity him

That with his very heart despiseth me?

Because he loves her, he despiseth me; 95

Because I love him, I must pity him.

This ring I gave him when he parted from me,

To bind him to remember my good will;

And now am I, unhappy messenger,

To plead for that which I would not obtain, 100

To carry that which I would have refused,

To praise his faith which I would have dispraised.

I am my master's true-confirmed love,

But cannot be true servant to my master

Unless I prove false traitor to myself. 105

Yet will I woo for him, but yet so coldly

As, heaven it knows, I would not have him speed.^o

[Enter SILVIA, attended.]

Gentlewoman, good day! I pray you, be my mean

To bring me where to speak with Madam Silvia.

SILVIA

What would you with her, if that I be she? 110

JULIA

If you be she, I do entreat your patience

To hear me speak the message I am sent on.

SILVIA

From whom?

JULIA

From my master, Sir Proteus, madam.

SILVIA

O, he sends you for a picture. 115

JULIA

Ay, madam.

SILVIA

Ursula, bring my picture there.

Go give your master this. Tell him, from me,

One Julia, that his changing thoughts forget,

Would better fit his chamber than this shadow. 120

JULIA

Madam, please you peruse this letter—

Pardon me, madam; I have unadvised^o

Delivered you a paper that I should not.

This is the letter to your ladyship.

SILVIA

I pray thee, let me look on that again. 125

JULIA

It may not be; good madam, pardon me.

SILVIA

There, hold!

I will not look upon your master's lines.

I know they are stuffed with protestations,

And full of new-found oaths which he will break 130

As easily as I do tear his paper.

JULIA

Madam, he sends your ladyship this ring.

107 speed prosper, succeed 122 unadvised unintentionally

SILVIA

The more shame for him that he sends it me,
For I have heard him say a thousand times
His Julia gave it him at his departure.
Though his false finger have profaned the ring,
Mine shall not do his Julia so much wrong.

JULIA

She thanks you.

SILVIA

What say'st thou?

JULIA

I thank you, madam, that you tender her.^o
Poor gentlewoman! My master wrongs her much.

SILVIA

Dost thou know her?

JULIA

Almost as well as I do know myself.
To think upon her woes, I do protest
That I have wept a hundred several^o times.

SILVIA

Belike she thinks that Proteus hath forsook her.

JULIA

I think she doth; and that's her cause of sorrow.

SILVIA

Is she not passing^o fair?

JULIA

She hath been fairer, madam, than she is.
When she did think my master loved her well,
She, in my judgment, was as fair as you.
But since she did neglect her looking glass,
And threw her sun-expelling mask away,
The air hath starved the roses in her cheeks
And pinched the lily-tincture of her face,
That now she is become as black^o as I.

SILVIA

How tall was she?

JULIA

About my stature: for, at Pentecost,^o
When all our pageants of delight were played,
Our youth got me to play the woman's part,
And I was trimmed in Madam Julia's gown,
Which servèd me as fit, by all men's judgments,
As if the garment had been made for me.
Therefore I know she is about my height.
And at that time I made her weep agood,^o
For I did play a lamentable part.
Madam, 'twas Ariadne^o passioning
For Theseus' perjury and unjust flight,
Which I so lively acted with my tears
That my poor mistress, movèd therewithal,
Wept bitterly; and would I might be dead
If I in thought felt not her very sorrow!

Sir Proteus, what says Silvia to my suit?

O, sir, I find her milder than she was;
And yet she takes exceptions at your person.

THURIO

What, that my leg is too long?

PROTEUS

No; that it is too little.

THURIO

I'll wear a boot, to make it somewhat rounder.

JULIA [Aside.]But love will not be spurred^o to what it loathes.

THURIO

What says she to my face?

PROTEUS

She says it is a fair one.

THURIO

Nay then, the wanton lies; my face is black.

PROTEUS

But pearls are fair; and the old saying is,
Black men are pearls in beauteous ladies' eyes.JULIA [Aside.]'Tis true, such pearls as put out ladies' eyes;
For I had rather wink than look on them.

THURIO

How likes she my discourse?

PROTEUS

Ill, when you talk of war.

THURIO

But well, when I discourse of love and peace?

JULIA [Aside.]

But better, indeed, when you hold your peace.

THURIO

What says she to my valor?

PROTEUS

O, sir, she makes no doubt of that.

JULIA [Aside.]

She needs not, when she knows it cowardice.

THURIO

What says she to my birth?

PROTEUS

That you are well derived.

JULIA [Aside.]

True, from a gentleman to a fool.

THURIO

Considers she my possessions?

PROTEUS

O, ay, and pities them.

DUKE

How now, Sir Proteus! How now, Thurio!
Which of you saw Sir Eglamour of late?

THURIO

Not I.

PROTEUS Nor I.

DUKE

Saw you my daughter?

PROTEUS

Neither.

DUKE

Why then,

She's fled unto that peasant Valentine,
And Eglamour is in her company.

35

'Tis true; for Friar Laurence met them both
As he in penance wandered through the forest.
Him he knew well, and guessed that it was she,
But, being masked, he was not sure of it;

40

Besides, she did intend confession
At Patrick's cell this even, and there she was not.
These likelihoods confirm her flight from hence.
Therefore, I pray you, stand not to discourse,
But mount you presently, and meet with me
Upon the rising of the mountain foot^o
That leads toward Mantua, whither they are fled.
Dispatch, sweet gentlemen, and follow me. [Exit.]

45

THURIO

Why, this it is to be a peevish girl
That flies her fortune when it follows her.
I'll after, more to be revenged on Eglamour
Than for the love of reckless Silvia. [Exit.]

50

PROTEUS

And I will follow, more for Silvia's love
Than hate of Eglamour, that goes with her. [Exit.]

VALENTINE

How use^o doth breed a habit in a man!
This shadowy desert,^o unfrequented woods,
I better brook than flourishing peopled towns.
Here can I sit alone, unseen of any,
And to the nightingale's complaining notes
Tune my distresses and record my woes.
O thou that dost inhabit in my breast,
Leave not the mansion so long tenantless,
Lest, growing ruinous, the building fall,
And leave no memory of what it was!
Repair me with thy presence, Silvia;
Thou gentle nymph, cherish thy forlorn swain!

[Noise within.]

What halloing and what stir is this today?
These are my mates, that make their wills their law,
Have^o some unhappy passenger in chase.
They love me well; yet I have much to do
To keep them from uncivil outrages.
Withdraw thee, Valentine. Who's this comes here?
[Retires.]

[Enter PROTEUS, SILVIA, and JULIA.]

PROTEUS

Madam, this service I have done for you—
Though you respect not aught your servant doth—
To hazard life, and rescue you from him
That would have forced your honor and your love.
Vouchsafe me, for my meed, but one fair look;
A smaller boon than this I cannot beg,
And less than this, I am sure, you cannot give.

VALENTINE [Aside.]

How like a dream is this I see and hear!
Love, lend me patience to forbear awhile.

SILVIA

O miserable, unhappy that I am!

PROTEUS

Unhappy were you, madam, ere I came;
But by my coming I have made you happy.

SILVIA

By thy approach thou mak'st me most unhappy.

JULIA [Aside.]

And me, when he approacheth to your presence.

SILVIA

Had I been seizèd by a hungry lion,
I would have been a breakfast to the beast
Rather than have false Proteus rescue me.
O, heaven be judge how I love Valentine

Whose life's as tender^o to me as my soul!
And full as much, for more there cannot be,
I do detest false perjured Proteus.
Therefore be gone; solicit me no more.

40

PROTEUS

What dangerous action, stood it next to death,
Would I not undergo for one calm look!
O, 'tis the curse in love, and still approved,^o
When women cannot love where they're beloved!

SILVIA

When Proteus cannot love where he's beloved!
Read over Julia's heart, thy first, best love,
For whose dear sake thou didst then rend thy faith
Into a thousand oaths; and all those oaths
Descended into perjury, to love me.
Thou hast no faith left now, unless thou'dst two,
And that's far worse than none; better have none
Than plural faith, which is too much by one.
Thou counterfeit to thy true friend!

10

SILVIA

All men but Proteus.

PROTEUS

Can no way change you to a milder form,
I'll woo you like a soldier, at arms' end,
And love you 'gainst the nature of love—force ye.

VALENTINE

Thou common^o friend, that's without faith or love—
For such is a friend now; treacherous man!
Thou hast beguiled my hopes; nought but mine eye
Could have persuaded me. Now I dare not say
I have one friend alive; thou wouldst disprove me.
Who should be trusted, when one's right hand
Is perjured to the bosom? Proteus,
I am sorry I must never trust thee more,
But count the world a stranger for thy sake.
The private^o wound is deepest. O time most accurst,

LOVE'S LABOR'S LOST

EDITED BY JOHN ARTHOS

Introduction

Love's Labor's Lost is one of Shakespeare's earliest and happiest comedies. It is excellently formed, moving easily toward its conclusion in a masque and a song, at the end recapitulating in all the stage's beauty the courting warfare of the young noblemen and ladies that has made up the chief part of the play, the sparrings and the surrenders and the victories. The play makes the point the theater seems to live to make, that sooner or later love conquers all, and although the title tells us that love's labor is lost, this we know is joking: the happy outcome is certain, and love and long life—as we learn at the end from what G. L. Kittredge called one of the best songs in the world—define the happy prospect.

In this Boccaccio-like setting another comic action plays its part, a comedy about the falsely learned and the grotesquely loving, partly contrasting with and partly parallel to the main story. The king and his lords, moved by the love of philosophy and virtue, have fallen into a most unphilosophical absurdity in supposing that the claims of love can easily be put aside. The foolish scholars light up the folly of the wise ones in still other ways, even as their own courting is mocked by the lovemaking of the others. As in so many of the later plays, it is all there—the multiple plot, the ranging between high and low minds, and love's challenge to every power in the world. All there, and as fluent in its display as in a dance.

The date of the play's composition must be guessed. The 1598 quarto title page mentions a performance of the play before her highness "this last Christmas," and it adds the phrase, "Newly corrected and augmented." This, taken along with the evidence of revisions in the text, and with the known dates of certain historical occurrences, leads to pretty substantial arguments for the composition of the play in 1593 or 1594. It should be said, however, that in the past the play was thought to be earlier than this; Coleridge, for example, believed it to be Shakespeare's first play because he thought Shakespeare was bringing into it part of the life he had just left, exploiting his experience as a schoolmaster while the memory of it was still fresh to him. This might push the writing back as far as 1589, and recently Alfred Harbage¹ has returned to a similar line of reasoning. Likenesses to Lyly's plays in the 1580's and certain considerations making for the possibility that the play was produced by child actors in either a private or public theater, lead him to suggest 1589 or even earlier as the time of performance.

The arguments for a later date point to a general friendliness in England for Henry of Navarre until he reverted to the Church of Rome in July 1593; the beginning of the investigation in 1594 into the atheism of men associated with Sir Walter Raleigh, a group perhaps identified in the play (in IV.iii.252) as "the school of night"; the use of language that suggests the Venus and Adonis of 1593, the Lucrece of 1594, and sonnets of presumably the same period. And, of course, a number of topical allusions.²

The occasion of the play's first production is not known, but it was surely meant for a private performance—the house of the Earl of Southampton has been suggested—perhaps in 1593. As such it would have been part of festivities in which music and dancing would naturally be called for. The first printed text of the play alludes to a performance before the queen at Christmas, either in 1597 or 1598, and the play's immediately succeeding stage history establishes the special suitability of the work for a courtly audience. The substance of the play also makes this clear enough—the initiating idea of learned gentlemen in the company of their monarch retiring from the life of power, the better to perfect their lives; the abjuring the society of women in serious as well as fantastic aspiration, following the directions of the most fashionable writers out of Italy; the mockery of literary men and most particularly of courtiers with ambitions in literature; the battles between the sexes conducted with the most elaborate and sensitive protocol. In large and small matters alike the play seems to be taking something directly out of the life of the court of Elizabeth (wisely enough under another name), making what it takes into something more than life-size. It gives the audience of lords and ladies a mirror in which they will see themselves in all the wit, imagining, beauty and fun they are absorbed in.

² The basic discussion of the date of the play's composition is H. B. Charlton's "The Date of Love's Labour's Lost," Modern Language Review, XIII (1918), 257–66; 387–400.

The idea of nobility sets the tone for it all. It begins in the king's first speech, it is taken up more than once by the princess, and, ironically, it is fully triumphant in Berowne, the railer at both love and philosophy, so dangerously close in his disposition to the discarding of all values, himself in the end the defender of an aspiration as passionately felt as it is truly thought.

When the king speaks of retiring to the learned academy, we feel the genuine love of learning and of virtue in his words:

Navarre shall be the wonder of the world;
Our court shall be a little academe,
Still and contemplative in living art. (I.i.12-14)

And the chief critic of the idea is no philistine. He is high-spirited and he is tired of going to school, but he has his wisdom, too, and we judge he has the experience to support it:

So study evermore is overshot.
While it doth study to have what it would,
It doth forget to do the thing it should. (I.i.141-43)

And so we immediately perceive that in the conflicts that are to rage in the play the sparks of thought will be flying everywhere. The issue is to be granted its proper dignity, whatever the comic emphasis, and in the end love will be allowed to break up the academy not only because it is strong but because it may claim a special worth, and because the temper of these noble persons is deeply founded in the cultivation of the best of everything the world offers.

The princess' first scene gives us so beautiful a picture of a woman that it carries all before it as if it were the very praise of womankind. The first words to tell us this come from one of her lords, advising her on her approach to the king:

Be now as prodigal of all dear grace
As Nature was in making graces dear
When she did starve the general world beside,
And prodigally gave them all to you. (II.i.9-12)

On the other side, the king is acknowledged as "the sole inheritor/Of all perfections that a man may owe" (II.i.5-6). The bounty of the woman and the perfection of the man, these are the qualities that set the tone, and these are the persons to lead the dancing interplay, the parryings and the reversals and the resolutions that are to come. They themselves are the matter of love's labors, the union of nobility and bounty, like some splendid foreshadowing of the masque of Ceres in The Tempest.

Nature has its austerity, and love has its temperance, and the princess' chiding of the busy old Lord Boyet for his flattery is a still more telling criticism of the affectations and grossness of another kind of courtly love:

my beauty, though but mean,
Needs not the painted flourish of your praise. (II.i.13-14)

Armado with his affectations brought from Spain and Italy and the courtiers with their sonnets are abusing "the heart's still rhetoric" (II.i.229). False speaking conforms to warped natures, and the play never loses sight of the idea of inherent excellence in manhood and womanhood and of the importance of true expression in love. Whatever the follies of the great as well as lesser characters, and whatever the ironies whereby nobility and the taking of oaths are made to seem like tinder before the fires of love, the decorum of the truly courtly prevails as the basis of the play's beauty.

The comic ideas also are as alive with intellectuality as the play's most serious affirmations. When the ladies call to mind and comment on the lords who accompany the king—men in the past they had encountered only briefly—praising them as it appears they deserve to be praised, we discover that all of them are in love before they know it. The audience enters into a kind of conspiracy with Shakespeare, schooled, as we are certain he was, by literature and the conventions of the stage, agreeing in advance that the great and noble always love the beautiful, and the beautiful the brave. Since this is the stage, we know that all these must be paired no matter what the claims of study. And so, won not only by the beauty and youth but by the wit of the ladies, we anticipate with pleasure the defeat of the men. We have seen the signs of love in the first words of each of the women as she sizes up her choice, and while we know enough of the men to know they will put up a kind of fight, we cannot be sorry at the prospect of a surrender they themselves will not regret.

The intermingling of the two plots is as expert as the rest. After the king has announced the program he means to follow and Berowne has had his say about it, we meet a clown, Costard, and a fop, Armado. They are showing off, and Shakespeare mocks both the clown's wenching and the fop's romancing. The scene is dramatically focused when the two confront each other in the presence of the one they are both taken with, the country maid, Jaquenetta. Costard, who has been misbehaving, is put into the custody of Armado, who is to guarantee his good behavior. The contrast is in itself pleasing—the fool who from time to time blunders into sense, and the most affected of courtiers who is yet not all fool. And in their folly as in their sense we see that they are being made to pose different versions of the questions the other characters are also asking—what has learning to do with love? and what has love to do with learning? As the plots proceed, the various lovers fall into many absurdities, but the questions themselves continually receive thoughtful answers, or thoughtful mockery. The varieties of the questioning, from such different kinds of lovers, require and get complex and significant answers, and the confusions of Costard and Armado prepare for the resolution Berowne will finally discover.

Meanwhile, the lords about the king are made to show their folly. One after another, subdued to his lady, takes to poetry, and one after another passes across the stage, sonnet in hand, or under his hat, or tucked into his belt—a snow of sonnets. The mockery is so lavish it adds the beauty of a pageant to the absurdity. The noble lords demean themselves in becoming poets, and they glory in their humiliation since they imagine it is pleasing to the ladies. This is indeed what the ladies require of those they favor, but they also require more than words. They require, as Rosaline says of her own lover, "That he should be my fool, and I his fate" (V.ii.68). The play will spell this out. Subjecting themselves to such cruel and whimsical tyrants, the men become as funny as Armado and Moth. Shakespeare lays it on with a trowel:

To see a king transformèd to a gnat!
To see great Hercules whipping a gig,
And profound Solomon to tune a jig,
And Nestor play at push-pin with the boys,
And critic Timon laugh at idle toys! (IV.iii.163-67)

At the end they will endure still greater transformations, but already they are well schooled in the doctrine that love is madness, and that that madness redeems all. As the song jubilantly declares of one lady:

Thou for whom Jove would swear
Juno but an Ethiop were. (IV.iii.114-15)

The beautiful lyric is part of the singing of the whole play, the beauty love worships is the beauty the play is celebrating. All the changes it is ringing on the courting of high and low, on absurdity and exaggeration, on grossness and refinement, are subdued to the grave and splendid beauty that conquers even Jove.

The secondary plot continues the mockery of false ideas of learning and it also brings before us the sight of other kinds of lovemaking. The most obvious point to the mockery of pedantry is as an abuse of what the academy stands for. Holofernes, the walking dictionary, may represent John Florio, or Thomas Harriot. The name Armado brings the Spanish Armada to mind, and so it has been argued that Armado is a portrayal of Sir Walter Raleigh, the man who defeated the Armada. (If this were to be substantiated, it might strengthen the argument of those who think the play was produced shortly after the defeat of the Armada in 1588.) Or the character may be thought to represent a quite different person, the arrogant and tedious Gabriel Harvey. Moth may be Thomas Nashe. But however much the possibility of such identifications causes the characters to jump out of their parts, the parts they do play are plainly so much more interesting to the audience for the comments they provide on the characters in the main action. The characters of the minor plot are strangers to the nobility of the others, and in their ambitions and pretensions they are illustrating not only the follies of the court but its essential superiority. The king values learning because it serves the noblest purposes in life; the ideas of the pedants are ignoble. For them it is always the letter at the expense of the spirit, and pride in learning at the expense of its good use.

The point is also being made that the abuse of learning is like the stupidity of affectation in love. The true power of love as well as the true worth of learning is lost upon the low characters, not only in their grossness but in their false refinement too. In the fun Shakespeare is making of them he strikes at everyone, but most of all he means to preserve our esteem for the truer men. They want glory for learning, for the academy, glory that will outlast death, because they want learning to be a light for those who will come after them. It is such men, no mere inkpots, who are love's true targets. In different ways, then, both plots are reinforcing the teaching that love belongs properly to the gentle heart.

Heightening and enriching this doctrine is the idea of the divinity of love. Character after character speaks of love as if it were a presence as well as a power. The play's title names love as the power at work in the play, and in every turn of the story we are shown events as if they were indeed the manipulations of a god—Eros, although unseen, yet surely directing and effecting all, showing his strength and enforcing his laws. As much as in All's Well That Ends Well, those who strive against him strive in vain.

Love's "labor" is a bringing to birth. The remembrances of ancient meetings come fast upon the courtiers and the ladies—"Did not I dance with you in Brabant once?" (II.i.114)—and in one after the other the seed burgeons. Part of the poetry as well as the comedy is that this growing of love goes on as it were in isolation. Cutting themselves off from so much of society, from the cares of power as well as from the entanglements with women, the lords are the more defenseless in their idleness. The king himself, treating of the matter the princess has come to negotiate on behalf of her sick father, even as he begins to talk of business finds that his heart is moved. Boyet notes this instantly:

Why, all his behaviors did make their retire
To the court of his eye, peeping thorough desire.
His heart, like an agate with your print impressed,
Proud with his form, in his eye pride expressed. (II.i.234-37)

Already love is at work, in the highest as in the lowest, sometimes beautifully and sometimes grotesquely, but always irresistibly.

This leads to the truly inspired idea in the extraordinary, not to say unlikely, happenings presumably only to be accounted for by a god's workings—that all the lovers should from the beginning have had no doubt who were to be their partners. In the masquing, the ladies switched their lords' favors in order to trick their lovers into another perjury, like Portia and Nerissa in The Merchant of Venice, merry in forging other chains for their slaves. So this time the lords will swear again, but to the wrong partners—as if another Puck were at work—and the ladies can mock the men until, as Berowne says, they are "dry-beaten" (V.ii.264)—the very blood leaves their faces. They are driven off, and it is no comfort to them to learn finally that they have now forsworn themselves twice. Shakespeare has had his fun with the idea of inexorable destiny in love at first sight, and he makes more fun of it still by asking another question: What is it that love sees?

Love's working and love's presence—a very god—come into full sight in Berowne's great speech, wherein the railer, at love and wisdom, himself now enslaved, mocks himself:

O, and I, forsooth, in love!
I, that have been love's whip,
A very beadle to a humorous sigh,
A critic, nay, a night-watch constable,
A domineering pedant o'er the boy,

Than whom no mortal so magnificent!
This wimpled, whining, purblind, wayward boy,
This senior-junior, giant-dwarf, Dan Cupid,
Regent of love rhymes, lord of folded arms,
Th' anointed sovereign of sighs and groans

And I to be a corporal of his field! (III.i.172-81, 186)

To make it worse, he is in love with the one he says is the least beautiful of the ladies, the most wanton, the one who would escape a guardian with a hundred eyes. But he accepts his fate: "Some men must love my lady, and some Joan" (III.i.204). This time Touchstone is a gentleman, and so somewhat more love's fool. But finally he will say more in praise of love than any other will, and however light in touch his words substantiate what the others must now acknowledge:

From women's eyes this doctrine I derive.

They are the books, the arts, the academes,
That show, contain, and nourish all the world;
Else none at all in aught proves excellent.

(IV.iii.347, 349-51)

With this conclusion the play moves toward its end. The haughty must change their tactics. There is the call to arms and the embrace of battle: "Advance your standards, and upon them, lords!" (IV.iii.364). And so they dance, recapitulating in their motions the warring that has made the play, the advances and retreats, the defeats and victories, the strivings and capitulations, and the final treaties.

For the play's last words there is a song sung by allegorical personages, Spring and Winter, fantastic figures out of the world of musical entertainment and Renaissance allegory. It speaks of flowers and countrymaids and ploughmen, of love and marriage and cuckoldry, of spring and winter, of idleness and of hard work, of nature when it is kind and when it is cruel, of life by the hearth. It is a song about love making peace with life, with things as they are. It provides the most brilliant of comments on all that has been fanciful in the beauty of the play and in the ideas of these fine people. In the perfection and balance of the contrast with all that has gone before, this song sung by the personifications of time is the true culmination of the play, the marriage of sophistication and reality, of the stage and its glory and the strength of love's endurance outside it. The song celebrates the poetry of life as it is, and it is one of Shakespeare's most glorious inspirations that he has it sung by the deities of "curds and flowers," magnificently adorned, without doubt, as the Renaissance imagined gods would be.

The song follows the princess' farewell as she and the ladies leave Navarre, postponing the marriages. The lords are meanwhile to prove themselves by the most strenuous and demanding discipline, for the courtship has been

A time, methinks, too short

To make a world-without-end bargain in. (V.ii.786-87)

The words of wisdom are indeed harsh after the music of the god of poetry, as the comment that ends the play says, words that may be given to Armado. They are words that sustain us as the play sustains us, and as the marvelous song does. And the reflection to which the last scene leads us is that love, like learning, is but a part of life, and what the whole of it is there is no one to say—there is only the testing, and good hope.

A NOTE ON THE SOURCES

No source for the plot of Love's Labor's Lost is known to exist, but it is often supposed that Shakespeare was building upon reports of historic events. The very names of Navarre and the lords,³ the matter of property disputes involving the King of France, the existence of a learned academy favored by the French nobility, and accounts of political negotiations in which certain court ladies were involved, all these point to incidents in recent French history which were reported upon at the time. So far no record has been found of any single happening that is plainly the original of the episodes of the play. It is only in the sum of the reports of similar incidents that the idea that Shakespeare is building upon historical matters comes to seem truly likely.

The play, whether meant originally for performance at a great house, or at a children's theater, exploited these historical events presumably because they treated matters in which the audience was also interested. English court circles were also drawn to the idea of learned academies and were involved in disputes centering on Platonic theories of love. Upon reflection, the treatment of certain episodes in France would have served as comment upon the life of the court in England. Quite as naturally Shakespeare could work into the main story all sorts of allusions to the life of letters and introduce subsidiary plotting to expand upon the story of the aristocratic academicians. So the play directs particular satire against specific English fashions—euphuism, for instance—as well as the universal extravagances of humanists and pedants and actors. Here, too, the references seem again and again to point to particular persons and to specific incidents, and scholars have therefore argued that Shakespeare took some of his contemporaries as models for the characters in his comic plot, and the characters that were in part borrowed from the commedia dell'arte from time to time present themselves in the guise of Thomas Nashe, Sir Walter Raleigh, John Florio, and perhaps others. To J. D. Wilson these matters become so important that he is convinced that the play "was written as a topical play." But G. L. Kittredge, and others after him, have thought it "merely whimsical" to identify Armado and Holofernes and the others in any such way.

On particular points it is seldom possible to resolve this dispute, most especially if the supposed allusions are studied primarily in the light of literary history. But the direction of much modern literary scholarship is to give precedence in the consideration of the elements of a work of art to a study of their relation to the work itself as an imaginative entity, and the effect of such an emphasis is to work in opposition to any theory that regards the work primarily as a historical record. In short, the impression of topical allusion is inescapable, but if one takes the play as substantially summed up by its title, the topicality seems to be absorbed in the imaginative and the fanciful, and in all the charm of the play's poetic and theatrical effects.

The historical documents that are most often cited in presenting analogues to certain incidents in the play are The Chronicles of Enguerrand de Monstrelet, 1440-1516; Pierre de la Primaudaye, The French Academie; H. C. Davila, The History of the Civil Wars of France; Gesta Grayorum: or The History of the High and Mighty Prince Henry, Prince of Purpoole . . . Who Reigned and Died, A.D. 1594. The relevant sections can be found in the first volume of Geoffrey Bullough's Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare. There are of course no documents that in any substantial way support the ascriptions of topicality.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

This edition is based upon the quarto of 1598, which, it is generally agreed, was printed from a manuscript in Shakespeare's own hand. The title page reads: "A/Pleasant/ Conceited Comedie/ Called, /Loues labors lost./ As it was presented before her Highnes/ this last Christmas./ Newly corrected and augmented/ By W. Shakespere./ Imprinted at London by W. W./ for Cutbert Burby./ 1598."

Although here there may be a reference to a previous printing, there is no trace of an earlier edition. "Newly corrected and augmented" probably refers to revisions in the manuscript, some of which, as it happens, may be detected in examining the printed text. (See notes to IV.iii.293 and V.ii.815-20.)

The printing of the 1623 Folio is based upon the quarto. It corrects some errors of the quarto and adds a number of its own. It provides act divisions (mistakenly heading the fifth act Actus Quartus), but the scene divisions as well as the list of the names of the persons in the play are the contributions of later editors.

Apart from a considerable number of misreadings the most noteworthy confusions in the quarto are in the speech headings. It is not merely that occasionally "Nathaniel" stands for "Holofernes," that the king is sometimes "Navarre" and sometimes "Ferdinand" in the early part of the second act, and that in the same part of the play Rosaline and Katherine are confused. In the next act the character previously identified as Armado becomes "Braggart," Moth, the page, becomes "Boy," Holofernes becomes "Pedant," Costard becomes "Clown." Later Sir Nathaniel becomes "Curate" and "Constable" becomes "Dull." The use of the generic names to take the place of the individual ones may be evidence of Shakespeare's revisions. In the present edition the speech headings have been made consistent, but the later substitutions are made evident by the supplementary stage directions indicating the entrances of the various characters.

The revision of the manuscript has left a couple of other obvious confusions. Berowne's speech in IV.iii contains lines that belong to an earlier version, and some of these should have been canceled. If lines 293-314 were omitted, the speech would continue connectedly and without obvious repetitions. It also seems that the exchange between Berowne and Rosaline in V.ii.815-20 was meant to be struck out. In the present edition these passages are retained, but enclosed in square brackets.

The text of this edition is based upon the Heber-Daniel copy of the quarto in the British Museum; the spelling and punctuation have been modernized, obvious misspellings and wrong speech headings corrected, and the quotations from foreign languages regularized. Other departures from the quarto text are listed below: the adopted reading is given first in boldface, followed immediately by the quarto reading in roman.

Scene: Navarre]

[A C T I]

[Scene I. The park of the King of Navarre.]

Enter Ferdinand KING of Navarre, BEROWNE, LONGAVILLE, and DUMAINE.

KING

Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives,
Live regist'ed upon our brazen tombs
And then grace us in the disgrace^o of death,
When, spite of cormorant^o devouring Time,
Th' endeavor of this present breath may buy
That honor which shall bate^o his scythe's keen edge
And make us heirs of all eternity.

Therefore, brave conquerors—for so you are
That war against your own affections

And the huge army of the world's desires—
Our late edict shall strongly stand in force:
Navarre shall be the wonder of the world;

Our court shall be a little academe,^o
Still and contemplative in living art.^o

You three, Berowne, Dumaine, and Longaville, 15
Have sworn for three years' term to live with me,

My fellow scholars, and to keep those statutes
That are recorded in this schedule here.

Your oaths are passed; and now subscribe your names,
That his own hand may strike his honor down 20
That violates the smallest branch herein.
If you are armed^o to do as sworn to do,
Subscribe to your deep oaths, and keep it too.

5 LONGAVILLE

I am resolved. 'Tis but a three years' fast.

The mind shall banquet though the body pine. 25
Fat paunches have lean pates, and dainty bits
Make rich the ribs, but bankrout^o quite the wits.

10 DUMAINE

My loving lord, Dumaine is mortified.^o

The grosser manner of these world's delights

He throws upon the gross world's baser slaves. 30

The decorative border above appeared on the title page of the quarto edition of Love's Labor's Lost, 1598.

I.i.3 disgrace degradation 4 cormorant ravenous 6 bate make dull

13 academe academy 14 Still . . . art continually studying the art of living 22 armed resolved 27 bankrout bankrupt 28 mortified dead to worldly pleasures

To love, to wealth, to pomp, I pine and die,
With all these living in philosophy.

BEROWNE

I can but say their protestation over°—
So much, dear liege, I have already sworn,
That is, to live and study here three years.
But there are other strict observances:
As not to see a woman in that term—
Which I hope well is not enrollèd there;
And one day in a week to touch no food,
And but one meal on every day beside—
The which I hope is not enrollèd there;
And then to sleep but three hours in the night,
And not be seen to wink of° all the day
(When I was wont to think no harm all night
And make a dark night too of half the day)—
Which I hope well is not enrollèd there.
O, these are barren tasks, too hard to keep,
Not to see ladies, study, fast, not sleep!

KING

Your oath is passed, to pass away from these.

BEROWNE

Let me say no, my liege, and if° you please.
I only swore to study with your grace
And stay here in your court for three years' space.

LONGAVILLE

You swore to that, Berowne, and to the rest.

BEROWNE

By yea and nay,° sir, then I swore in jest.
What is the end of study, let me know?

KING

Why, that to know which else we should not know.

BEROWNE

Things hid and barred, you mean, from common sense?

KING

Ay, that is study's godlike recompense.

BEROWNE

Come on then, I will swear to study so,
To know the thing I am forbid to know:
As thus—to study where I well may dine
When I to feast expressly am forbid;
Or study where to meet some mistress fine
When mistresses from common sense are hid;
Or having sworn too hard-a-keeping oath,
Study to break it and not break my troth.°
If study's gain be thus, and this be so,
Study knows that which yet it doth not know.
Swear me to this, and I will ne'er say no.

KING

These be the stops° that hinder study quite
And train° our intellects to vain delight.

BEROWNE

Why, all delights are vain, but that most vain
Which, with pain purchased, doth inherit pain:
As, painfully to pore upon a book,
To seek the light of truth, while truth the while Doth falsely° blind the eyesight of his look.

Light seeking light doth light of light beguile;°
So, ere you find where light in darkness lies,
Your light grows dark by losing of your eyes.

Study me how to please the eye indeed 80

By fixing it upon a fairer eye,
Who dazzling so, that eye shall be his heed°
And give him light that it was blinded by.

Study is like the heaven's glorious sun, 85

That will not be deep-searched with saucy looks.
Small have continual plodders ever won

Save base authority from others' books.
These earthly godfathers° of heaven's lights,

That give a name to every fixèd star 90

Have no more profit of their shining nights
Than those that walk and wot° not what they are.

Too much to know is to know nought but fame;°
And every godfather can give a name.

KING

How well he's read to reason against reading!

DUMAINE

Proceeded° well, to stop all good proceeding! 95

LONGAVILLE

He weeds the corn,° and still lets grow the weeding.°

BEROWNE

The spring is near, when green geese° are a-breeding.

DUMAINE

How follows that?

BEROWNE

Fit in his place and time.

DUMAINE

In reason nothing.

BEROWNE

Something then in rhyme.

KING

Berowne is like an envious sneaping° frost 100

That bites the first-born infants of the spring.

BEROWNE

Well, say I am! Why should proud summer boast
Before the birds have any cause to sing?

Why should I joy in an abortive birth?

At Christmas I no more desire a rose 105

Than wish a snow in May's new-fangled shows,

But like of each thing that in season grows.

So you—to study now it is too late—

Climb o'er the house to unlock the little gate.

KING

Well, sit you out. Go home, Berowne. Adieu. 110

BEROWNE

No, my good lord, I have sworn to stay with you;

And though I have for barbarism° spoke more

Than for that angel knowledge you can say,

Yet confident I'll keep what I have sworn,

And bide the penance of each three years' day.° 115

Give me the paper, let me read the same,

And to the strictest decrees I'll write my name.

KING

How well this yielding rescues thee from shame!

BEROWNE [Reads.] "Item. That no woman shall come within a mile of my court—" Hath this been pro- 120 claimed?

LONGAVILLE Four days ago.

BEROWNE Let's see the penalty. [Reads.] "—on pain of losing her tongue." Who devised this penalty?

LONGAVILLE

Marry,^o that did I.

BEROWNE Sweet lord, and why? 125

LONGAVILLE

To fright them hence with that dread penalty.

BEROWNE

A dangerous law against gentility!^o

[Reads.] "Item. If any man be seen to talk with a woman within the term of three years, he shall endure such public shame as the rest of the court can 130 possibly devise."

This article, my liege, yourself must break;

For well you know here comes in embassy

The French king's daughter with yourself to speak,

A maid of grace and complete majesty, 135

About surrender up of Aquitaine

To her decrepit, sick, and bedrid father.

Therefore this article is made in vain,

Or vainly comes th' admirèd princess hither.

KING

What say you, lords? Why, this was quite forgot. 140

BEROWNE

So study evermore is overshot.^o

While it doth study to have what it would,

It doth forget to do the thing it should;

And when it hath the thing it hunteth most,

'Tis won as towns with fire^o—so won, so lost. 145

KING

We must of force^o dispense with this decree.

She must lie^o here on mere^o necessity.

BEROWNE

Necessity will make us all forsworn

Three thousand times within this three years' space:

For every man with his affects^o is born, 150

Not by might mast' red, but by special grace.

If I break faith, this word shall speak for me,

I am forsworn "on mere necessity."

So to the laws at large I write my name;

[Subscribes.]

And he that breaks them in the least degree 155

Stands in attainder of^o eternal shame.

Suggestions^o are to other as to me,

But I believe, although I seem so loath,^o

I am the last that will last keep his oath.

But is there no quick recreation granted? 160

KING

Ay, that there is. Our court, you know, is haunted

With a refinèd traveler of Spain,

A man in all the world's new fashion planted,

That hath a mint of phrases in his brain;

One who the music of his own vain tongue 165

Doth ravish like enchanting harmony;

A man of complements,^o whom right and wrong

Have chose as umpire of their mutiny.

This child of fancy, that Armado hight,^o

For interim^o to our studies shall relate 170

In highborn words the worth of many a knight

From tawny Spain, lost in the world's debate.

How you delight, my lords, I know not, I,

But, I protest, I love to hear him lie,

And I will use him for my minstrelsy.^o 175

BEROWNE

Armado is a most illustrious wight,

A man of fire-new^o words, fashion's own knight.

LONGAVILLE

Costard the swain^o and he shall be our sport;

And so to study three years is but short.

Enter [DULL] a constable, with COSTARD [a clown], with a letter.

DULL Which is the duke's own person? 180

BEROWNE This, fellow. What wouldst?

DULL I myself reprehend^o his own person, for I am his grace's farborough.^o But I would see his own person in flesh and blood.

BEROWNE This is he. 185

DULL Signior Arm—Arm—commends you. There's villainy abroad. This letter will tell you more.

COSTARD Sir, the contempts^o thereof are as touching me.

KING A letter from the magnificent Armado. 190

BEROWNE How low soever the matter, I hope in God for high words.

LONGAVILLE A high hope for a low heaven. God grant us patience! 195

BEROWNE To hear, or forbear hearing?

LONGAVILLE To hear meekly, sir, and to laugh moderately, or to forbear both.

BEROWNE Well, sir, be it as the style shall give us cause to climb in the merriness.

COSTARD The matter is to me, sir, as concerning 200 Jaquenetta. The manner of it is, I was taken with the manner.^o

BEROWNE In what manner?

COSTARD In manner and form following, sir—all those three: I was seen with her in the manorhouse, 205 sitting with her upon the form,^o and taken following her into the park; which, put together, is, in manner and form, following. Now, sir, for the manner—it is the manner of a man to speak to a woman. For the form—in some form. 210

BEROWNE For the following, sir?

COSTARD As it shall follow in my correction,^o and God defend the right!

KING Will you hear this letter with attention?

BEROWNE As we would hear an oracle. 215 compliments of devoted and heartburning heat of 270 duty,

Don Adriano de Armado."

BEROWNE This is not so well as I looked for, but the best that ever I heard.

KING Ay, the best for the worst. But, sirrah,^o what 275 say you to this?

COSTARD Sir, I confess the wench.

KING Did you hear the proclamation?

COSTARD I do confess much of the hearing it, but 280 little of the marking of it.

KING It was proclaimed a year's imprisonment to be taken with a wench.

COSTARD I was taken with none, sir; I was taken with a damsel.

KING Well, it was proclaimed "damsel." 285

COSTARD This was no damsel neither, sir, she was a virgin.

KING It is so varied^o too, for it was proclaimed "virgin."

COSTARD If it were, I deny her virginity. I was taken 290 with a maid.

KING This maid will not serve your turn, sir.

COSTARD This maid will serve my turn,^o sir.

KING Sir, I will pronounce your sentence: you shall fast a week with bran and water. 295

COSTARD I had rather pray a month with mutton and porridge.

KING

And Don Armado shall be your keeper.
