EDITOR'S PREFACE

Of the forty or so publications by Dr. Ebenezer Cobham Brewer, his Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, still in the hands of its original publishers, has outlived all the others. That this somewhat miscellaneous compilation has continued in active circulation for a century is sufficient testimony of its proven usefulness and it is seldom found at the second-hand booksellers'. Although initially regarded as a rather doubtful commercial venture, it has long established itself as an authoritative companion for those with literary interests and catholic tastes. Biographical information on the author, and a list of Dr. Brewer's other writings, will be found in the memoir kindly contributed by his grandson, Captain P. M. C. Hayman; it remains for me to make some brief remarks on the book itself and to explain what changes have been effected in this centenary edition.

Dr. Brewer's acquaintance with an astonishingly wide range of subjects and authors becomes apparent the more one delves into the book, and his familiarity with the Bible, Lemprière's Classical Dictionary, the works of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton and Scott, Percy's Reliques and Butler's Hudibras, stand out. Perhaps his second range of favourite works were those of Thomson, Pope, Dryden, Byron, Thackeray, Dickens, and Tennyson, but the total range of his gleanings extends over many fields, from the writings of ancient authors to those of the Victorians.

In the earlier editions, the author referred to his dictionary as an "alms-basket of words" and the title page described it as a "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable giving the Derivation, Source, or Origin of Common Phrases, Allusions, and Words that have a Tale to Tell". Since his death in 1897, successive editors have modified the text, deleted the obsolete or more trifling entries and added new material, especially contemporary phrase. Nevertheless the core of the book is still essentially and substantially Brewer's, a fact which emphasises the original soundness of his selection.

The present edition is based on that of 1963, but I have sought to return more closely to Dr. Brewer's original conception by discarding entries (e.g. Artesian Wells, China Clay, Copyright, Exchange Equalisation Fund, Lacrosse, Liqueur, Rack and Pinion Railway, Rhodes Scholarships, etc.) which seemed to have little claim to be in a dictionary of "Phrase and Fable". Words which have no particular "tale to tell" have also been deleted, as well as numerous words and technical expressions, etc., for an explanation of which the average reader would naturally turn to the household dictionary, general encyclopaedia, or specialized reference book rather than to "Brewer". There has also been certain re-arrangement of sub-entries. Repetition has been largely eliminated by comprehensive cross-referencing, which may also help those inclined to browse; the text has been carefully checked for accuracy of content and reference, and also extensively re-written to take account of more recent scholarship. I have aimed at clarity and conciseness and to give origins and explanations wherever I have been able, but nothing has been changed merely for the sake of giving it a "new look". Comparison of such present entries as Madoc, Miching, Hungry Forties, Parts of Speech, The Wars of the Roses (under Rose), Tich, with their predecessors will give those interested some idea of the kinds of alteration effected.

In spite of deletions and the endeavour to avoid prolixity, the book is considerably larger than the previous edition, since much new material has been added, a good deal of this being recent and current phrase (e.g. Brain Drain, Do-it-yourself, Golden Handshake, Four-letter Words, Mods and Rockers, Oxbridge, Redbrick, South Bank Religion, etc.), although there are very many which do not fall into this category, (e.g. Hobbitt, Jersey Lily, Kiss me Hardy, Mabinogion, Mari Lwyd, Milner's Kindergarten, Moody and Sankey, Rasputin, Rowley, Sanctuary, Yellow Book, etc.). Somewhat greater attention than in the past has been given to Irish and Welsh "fable" and to American and Commonwealth expressions. Furthermore, I have not been pedantically consistent in keeping to my terms of reference and have included various "oddities" in accordance with the "Brewer" tradition.

The task of revision has been arduous and has occupied most of my "spare time" since the end of 1964. This has involved considerable neglect of my family for whose forbearance and help I must be grateful. Especial thanks must go to Margaret C. Quarterman for her enthusiastic spadework on a very large number of new entries, also to John C. Woods for his revision of the entry on Regimental and Divisional Nicknames (British Army), and to those numerous friends and correspondents who have given me the benefit of their specialized knowledge on particular points. Furthermore, I must acknowledge the courtesy and consideration extended to me by the publishers, and in particular thank Dr. Desmond Flower for the interest he has shown and for a number of helpful suggestions.

In conclusion, it must be emphasised that mine is the responsibility for any errors or inconsistencies that may remain, but it is earnestly hoped that critics will not find this Centenary Edition unworthy of its predecessors.

E. COBHAM BREWER LL.D.

A brief memoir by his grandson

Captain P. M. C. Hayman, J.P.

It is inevitable that the passage of time, which has made the Brewer of the dictionary a household name among the educated, has obscured Brewer the man. In this brief memoir, prepared for the centenary edition of my grandfather's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, I have therefore sought to redress the balance and to satisfy the reader's natural curiosity as to the character of the man who originally compiled this famous reference book.

Ebenezer Cobham Brewer was born on 2 May, 1810, the second of the four surviving sons of John Sherren Brewer by his second wife Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Kitton of Barton Hall, Norwich. In later life, Dr. Brewer, as I shall now call him, frequently stated that he was born at London, but an entry in a recently-discovered Bible shows that he was in fact born at Calvert Street, Norwich and baptised "Ebenezer" at Cambridge. He did not, however, use his baptismal name, always signing himself "E. Cobham Brewer". His father had given him this second name probably to mark the link between this branch of the Brewer family and the Cobhams, through the connection of one of his ancestors with the family of Sir John Oldcastle, the adherent of John Wyclif, martyred for his religious beliefs in 1417.

The family was Kentish and Dr. Brewer's father was born at Dartford. An imprudent first marriage ended his Oxford career without a degree, but the scholarship which enabled him to conduct a school at Norwich with success and repute was passed on to the four sons of his second marriage, each of whom was distinguished in his way. Dr. Brewer's eldest brother, another John Sherren Brewer, was Professor of English Literature and Modern History at King's College, London, and for many years engaged in the invaluable work of calendaring the State Papers relating to the reign of Henry VIII in the Public Record Office; while of the two younger, William, a doctor, became intimately concerned with London local government and was a Member of Parliament for Colchester, and Robert Kitton gave up the promise of a brilliant musical career to become a Baptist minister.

Dr. Brewer was educated privately and went up to Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1832. As an undergraduate he won many prizes and he obtained First Class Honours when he graduated in Civil Laws in 1836. In 1848 he proceeded LL.D., but in the meantime he had taken orders, being ordained deacon in 1836, and priest in 1838.

However, he never held a cure, and would seem to have sought ordination, like so many others, as a further qualification for a scholastic career. On leaving the University he assisted his father at his boarding-school, Mile End House, Norwich, and succeeded the latter as headmaster, on his retirement. The school was later known as King's College School, Norwich, and no doubt the connection it maintained in more than name with King's College, London, was due to Dr. Brewer's brother, John Sherren Brewer, then lecturer in Classical Literature at King's.

It was natural, even then, that Dr. Brewer's thoughts should turn to literature, since he was justly proud of the fact that he kept himself at the University entirely by his pen, never once calling upon his parents for assistance, and having a balance of £30 over, out of which he bought his robes—a feat which can have been equalled by few other Cambridge undergraduates before or since!

His earlier works were written while headmaster of his Norwich school, and it was perhaps their success which impelled him to leave teaching for authorship. From the 1850s, he was to devote himself to science and literature and, until his marriage (5 July, 1856) with Ellen Mary, eldest daughter of the Reverend Francis Tebbutt of Hove, he travelled extensively on the Continent and lived for some years in Paris. Here he became something of a lion in society and had his entrée to the Court of Napoleon III. He became well acquainted with the Emperor, for whom he retained a lasting admiration, having known the chronic state of unrest in France before the advent of the Second Empire, and plaster busts of the Emperor and Empress always stood on the mantelpiece in his room.

His nephew H. W. Brewer, the architectural artist, has an amusing story of him at this period:

I had the pleasure of spending some time with my uncle, Dr. Cobham Brewer, in Paris. He is a most genial and popular man, but was supposed by many people to be a kind of Cagliostro. He was at that time unmarried and lived in chambers where he had an excellent reference library—about a thousand volumes. His housekeeper was immensely proud of her lodger, but firmly believed him to be a kind of wizard and we found that when he was away from Paris, as he frequently was for short periods, she used to exhibit his rooms and used to declare that he had written all the books which were on the shelves of his library. There was a little kitchen where I believe he never did anything but cook his breakfast, for he was a wonderfully good hand at cooking and turned out the best omelette I have ever eaten. This little room used to be shown as the place where he manufactured lightning. I told Dr. Brewer what I had heard and he laughed at it but said, "Of course this must be put a stop to. I will soon settle Madame . . .!" So he sent for her and she came into the room. The Doctor put on his most severe air and said to her: "Madame, how dare you exhibit my rooms when I am from home?" The poor woman was so frightened that she fell down on her knees and implored forgiveness. "Of course," she said, "I ought to have known that you can see everything that goes on while you are away."

The result of this residence in France was that he so completely mastered the language that, when his Guide to Science was translated into French, he performed the task himself. It was indeed a remarkable undertaking, rendered the more so by the fact that the book was not just a translation, but virtually a new book on the same lines, every idiom, phrase and proverb being transfused and not translated, and every custom not common to France being wholly changed into something familiar. As La Clef de la Science it first appeared in 1854 and such was its success that the Emperor Napoleon III expressed a desire to have an edition prepared for the use of the Prince Imperial. This appears to have been the fifth French edition, "Dedicated by Authority" to the Emperor.

This Guide to Science was the first (and a very successful first) of a long series of popular educational works. Published about 1840, the Guide had not only sold over half-a-million copies by the time of its author's death in 1897, but had, in addition, been translated into French, German, Italian, Spanish, Swedish, Greek and Welsh. But Dr. Brewer's literary life was so busy, his publications so numerous, that it would overload this short memoir to try to discuss even some of them. I have therefore appended a chronological list of his books, to which I have added, when known to me, a note of the numbers of editions through which they went, from which the reader can see both the range and the popularity of his writings in their own day. This list however does not include every single thing that Dr. Brewer wrote and published. For example, I have in my possession the draft of what he describes as a "scaling rhyme" on the opening of the Crystal Palace, which was published in 1851, and sold at 1/-, illustrated. I have also the printed proofs of a long, detailed Story of the Great French Exhibition 1867, from which I see under his name as author, The Story of the Atlantic Cable, published the year previously. I have also a vast number of MSS in his very beautiful handwriting on every conceivable subject, including poems for young children.

Two works, however, have outlived the others — one better-known now than when it was first published. Chatto & Windus first issued The Reader's Handbook in 1880 and Dr. Brewer was actually revising a later edition of it at the time of his death. This revision was completed by my mother, his eldest daughter, Mrs. Hayman, whose work was described by the critics as 'being in a spirit and with an industry indistinguishable from that of her father Dr. Brewer.' It was last published in 1940.

In 1870, the Dictionary of Phrase and Fable had appeared and in this, the Centenary Edition, a few words about its history may not be inappropriate.

It was in 1864 that Dr. Brewer offered Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin the manuscript of what was to prove one of the most famous books which he was to write. It was his boyhood habit of notetaking, which he continued all his life, that he attributed the success of both this and The Reader's Handbook. In the middle of the room which later in life he used as a study at Edwinstowe Vicarage, there was a long wooden box arrangement. The front was open and divided into pigeon-holes, lettered from A to Z, in which were the slips of paper on which were written the notes and references he made and continued to make daily. This was the genesis of the Dictionary, as shown in the Author's copy of the 36th Edition. There Dr. Brewer wrote a note in ink giving the "History of this Dictionary".

He first refers to the extraordinary success of the Guide to Science, and then continues, "the popularity of this book brought me in a large number of questions on all imaginary matters. I kept these questions and their answers till they grew into a large book, when I sorted them and made the nucleus of the Dictionary of Phrase and Fable. I consulted the Editor of The Despatch, to whom I was well known, but it was his opinion that the book would have no sale as it would be wholly impossible to exhaust the subject."

Dr. Brewer then states that, not discouraged, he offered the manuscript to Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin who, though doubtful whether the book would pay the expense of printing, agreed to risk the venture. The book was published in 1870 and proved to be a great success, edition following edition. "When in 1894," the note continues, "the sale had exceeded 100,000 copies, the new firm* asked me what I would charge for revising the book and adding such new matter as I had at hand. I said £250, to which they agreed, and when the book was completed, the firm sent me a gratuity of 50 guineas. I went carefully over the old matter which I thought proper to retain and added some 400 pages of new matter. The sale of the new 'Enlarged Edition', issued in fifteen pamphlets, far exceeded our utmost expectations."

Meanwhile, and probably in the early 1860s, he became editor-in-chief to Cassell, Petter, Galpin & Co. There is no surviving record of the dates during which he held this appointment, but he himself stated that he remained with Messrs. Cassell's for a number of years, editing the vast number of books they published and playing a prominent part in the affairs of this important firm. Subsequently he retained a room on the premises of the company where he was engaged in writing his various educational books for the young. Such was his activity, that it is not in the least surprising that he had a serious breakdown in health, which obliged him to give up his position with Cassell's and to leave London for the country. He took a house at Lavant, near Chichester in Sussex, and lived there for many years, adding for a time to his literary activities the editorship of the now long defunct Morning Herald, a post which he held jointly with his elder brother, Professor John Sherren Brewer.

Following the death of his wife at Lavant in 1878, Dr. Brewer came to live with his eldest daughter, my mother. She had married the Reverend (later Canon) Henry Telford Hayman, Vicar of Edwinstowe in Nottinghamshire, and I should like to conclude with a few personal memories of my grandfather.

Dr. Brewer must have been nearly eighty years of age when I was old enough to remember him at the Vicarage. He had an upstairs room furnished as a bed-sitting-room, for he used to work far into the night, often until three or four in the morning. He always declared that he did his best work then—but he was always down to breakfast dead on time at nine o'clock.

The walls of this room were papered with a plain white paper, upon which he used to write in pencil stray memoranda and the names of any particularly interesting visitors and the dates on which they came to see him. These names included that of the Duchess of Portland, then one of the most beautiful women in the country. She insisted on going upstairs to my grandfather's own room and carried on a long conversation with him, sitting on his bed, a highly informal proceeding in those days, which particularly pleased the old gentleman!

He had a wonderful way with children and would put aside whatever he was doing to amuse the children of the house before they went to bed. He was a great hand at cutting out, drawing, telling stories, showing his "treasures" which he had collected in various countries and relating his experiences in France and at the Court of Napoleon III and his Empress. But it was his sense of humour, which he could adapt to the childish mind, which made Dr. Brewer in his old age such a very delightful companion to the youngest of his grandchildren.

He was also quite fearless. On one occasion the Vicarage odd-job-man—not remarkable for either intelligence or courage—came up to the house to announce that a rough-looking man was asleep in the stable. Before my father, a county cricketer and a noted sportsman, could move, Dr. Brewer had seized a stick and, when the Vicar arrived at the stable, he found the old gentleman belabouring the trespasser, a hulking tramp, and exclaiming, "Be off, you scoundrel!" This onslaught was too much for the tramp, who made off as hard as he could go.

At one time he had played a good deal of chess, and there was a small round table in his room marked out as a chess board which he himself had made, but, although he taught my elder brother the moves, it is doubtful if he could have found anyone at Edwinstowe capable of giving him a serious game.

An acquaintance of Dr. Brewer's latter years gives us the following picture of him—"To the last he spent hours in study and reading, while his favourite recreation seemed to be gardening, an occupation to which he devoted himself in all weathers. . . . There was always a bright cheery welcome in the cosy drawing-room into which one was shown, and soon would appear the slight, stooping figure of an old man, with a long grey venerable beard and bushy eyebrows, under which large, grey-blue eyes glanced still keenly out on the world on which they had looked for eighty-six years. He walked rather slowly, but other signs of age there were practically none, and once ensconced in his own particular chair he was ready to chat on any subject under the sun which the visitor chose. I can safely say that I never parted from him without learning something new or interesting."

He died on 6 March, 1897, at Edwinstowe Vicarage, in his eighty-seventh year, and it was at Edwinstowe that he was buried.

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION

VOWELS

a	as in far (far).	o	as in not (not).
ǎ	„ fat (fǎt).	ō	„ no (nō).
ā	„ fate (fāt).	ô	„ north (nôrth).
aw	„ fall (fawl).	oo	„ food (food).
â	„ fair (fâr).
e	„ bell (bel).	u	„ bull (bul).
ě	„ her (hěr).	ũ	„ sun (sũn).
ē	„ beef (bĕf).	ū	„ muse (mūz).
i	„ bit (bit).	ou	„ bout (bout).
ī	„ bite (bīt).	oi	„ join (join).

A dot placed over a, e, o, or u (â, ě, ô, ũ) signifies that the vowel has an obscure, indeterminate, or slurred sound, as in:—

advice (âd-vîś), current (kŭr' ěnt), notion (nō' shôn).

y when used as a vowel is rendered by i as in Polycrates (pol i' krâ tĕz).

CONSONANTS

b, d, f, h (see the combinations below), k, l, m, n, p, r, t, v, w, x, z, and y when used as a consonant, have their usual values.

c (except in the combinations ch and ch) is not used, the hard c being rendered by k as in cachet (kăsh' â), and the soft c by s as in Cinderella (sin dĕr rel' â).

q is not used and is rendered by k as in quey (kwâ).

s is used only for the sibilant s, as in toast (tōst); the sonant s is rendered as z, as in toes (tōz).

x is not used and is rendered by z or ks as in Xerxes (zĕrks' ěz).

ch is rendered by k when thus pronounced, as in Acheron (ăk' er on), and by sh in words of French origin as in panache (păn ăsh).

ph is rendered by f as in Pharaoh (fâr' ô).

ch	as in church (chĕrch).	hw	as in white (hwit).
ch	„ loch (loch).	sh	„ shawl (shawl).
		zh	„ measure (mezĥ' ũr).
g	„ get (get).
j	„ join (join).	th	„ thin (thin).
		th	„ thine (th in).

The soft g is rendered by j as in gin (jin) and in words of French origin by zh as in gendarme (zhon' darm). J is also rendered by zh in words of French origin as in jeunesse (zhĕr nes').

The accent (') follows the syllable to be stressed.

CROSS-REFERENCES

These are indicated in the text by the use of SMALL CAPITALS unless q.v. is used.

A

A. This letter is modified from the Egyptian hieroglyph representing the eagle. The Phœnician (Hebrew) symbol was aleph (=an ox), doubtfully assumed to represent an ox-head. The Greek A (alpha) was the symbol of a bad AUGURY in the sacrifices. See also SCARLET LETTER.

A in logic denotes a universal affirmative.

AI means first-rate—the very best. In Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping the state of a ship's hull is designated by letters and that of the anchors, cables, etc. by figures. Thus AI is a mark of the first class.

A from a windmill, Not to know. To be very obtuse or ignorant. Possibly suggested by the similarity between the shape of a capital A and that of a distant tower windmill. Current in popular speech until the late 19th century.

Aalu, or Aaru. In ancient Egyptian religion the fields of Aalu, where food was grown for the dead to supplement the votive offerings of their descendants, correspond roughly with the Elysian fields of Greek mythology.

Aaron (ár'on). The patriarch of the Jewish priesthood (Exod. xxviii), possibly connected with haaron, "the ark".

Aaron's Beard. The popular name of many wild plants, including Great St. John's Wort (Rose of Sharon), the Ivy-leaved Toadflax, Meadowsweet, Saxifrage sarmemosa, etc. The reference is to Ps. cxxxiii, 2.

Aaron's Rod. The name given (with reference to Num. xvii, 8) to various flowering plants including Golden Rod and Great Mullein. Also a name for the DIVINING ROD.

Aaron's serpent. Something so powerful as to swallow up minor powers (Exod. vii, 10-12). Thus Prussia was the Aaron's serpent that swallowed up the lesser German States between 1866 and 1870.

Aaru. See AALU.

Aarvak. See HORSE.

Aback, To be taken, to be astounded, taken by surprise. From the sailing-ship term aback, when the sails press against the mast and progress is suddenly stayed.

Abacus (áb'á kùs). The name given to a variety of counting devices first used by the ancient civilizations of the Mediterranean and China (where it is called Suan-Pan and is still in use), but most commonly to the familiar nursery frame with its horizontal wires, each carrying ten sliding balls. The word is derived from a tablet covered in dust or sand (Gr. abax). The multiplication table invented by PYTHAGORAS is called Abacus Pythagoricus. See NAPIER'S BONES.

In architecture the abacus is the topmost member of a capital.

Abaddon (á bād'ón). The angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix, 11), from Heb. abad, he perished. Milton used the name for the pit itself:

In all her gates Abaddon rues
Thy bold attempt.

Paradise Regained, IV, 624.

Abaris (áb'á ris). The dart of Abaris. A mythical priest of APOLLO mentioned by Herodotus, PINDAR, etc. and surnamed "the Hyperborean". Apollo gave him a magic arrow which rendered him invisible and on which he rode through the air. He cured diseases and spoke oracles. Abaris gave the dart to PYTHAGORAS.

Abatement (O.Fr. abatre, to beat down). In HERALDRY, is a mark of dishonour of coat armour.

Abaton (áb'á ton) (Gr. a, not; baino, I go). As inaccessible as Abaton. A name given to various places of antiquity difficult of access.

Abbassides (áb'á sídz). A dynasty of caliphs who ruled the Arabian Empire from 750 to 1258, descended from Abbas, uncle of MOHAMMED. Haroun al-Raschid (b. 765, reigned 786-808), of the ARABIAN NIGHTS, was one of their number.

Abbot of Misrule. See KING OF MISRULE.

Abbot's Bromley Horn, or Antler Dance. One of the rare European animal dances surviving from remote times. Originally danced on Twelfth Day at Abbot's Bromley, Staffordshire, it now takes place on the first Monday after 4 September. The six dancers, all male as in MORRIS DANCES, hold antlers (three of which are painted red and three white) to their heads as they dance. It may originally have been a form of fertility rite since the dancers go the round of neighbouring farms before the dance.

A B C. The alphabet. Hence "He doesn't know his A B C" means he is very ignorant: "he doesn't understand the

A B C of the subject" means that he has not grasped its rudiments. An Absey Book or A B C Book was a child's primer.

Abd in Arabic = slave or servant, as ABDIEL and ABDALLAH (servant of God), Abd-el-Kader (servant of the Mighty One), Abdul-Latif (servant of the Gracious One), etc.

Abdallah (äb däl' ä). The father of MOHAMMED. He was so beautiful that when he married Amina 200 virgins broke their hearts from disappointed love. He died before his son was born. See Washington Irving's Life of Mahomet.

Abdals (äb' dälz). The name given by MOSLEMS to certain mysterious persons whose identity is known only to God and through whom the world is able to continue in existence. When one dies another is secretly appointed by God to fill the vacant place.

Abdera (äb dër' ä). A maritime town of Thrace, mythically founded by HERCULES in memory of ABDERUS. The Abderites or Abderitans were proverbial for stupidity, said to be caused by the air, but among them were DEMOCRITUS, the laughing philosopher (hence Abderitan laughter = scoffing laughter, and Abderite = scoffer); Protagoras, the sophist; Anaxarchos, the philosopher friend of Alexander; and Hecatæus, the historian.

Abderus. A friend of HERCULES, who was devoured by the horses of DIOMEDES when keeping guard over them.

Abdiel (äb' dël). See ABD. In Milton's Paradise Lost (V, 805, 896, etc.) the faithful seraph who withstood SATAN when he urged the angels to revolt.

Abe, Old or Honest Abe. Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States from 1861 to 1865.

Abecedarian (ä bë si dâr' i än). A teacher or learner of the A B C or rudiments. Also an ANABAPTIST sect, the ZWICKAU PROPHEETS, founded in 1520. Led by Nicholas Stork, a weaver, they relied on direct inspiration from God, rejecting all learning as a hindrance.

Abecedarian Hymns. Hymns the lines or divisions of which begin with the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. In Hebrew the 119th Psalm is abecedarian. See ACROSTIC POETRY.

Abelard and Héloïse (äb' e lard, ä lö ëž). Peter Abelard (1079-1142), eminent scholar, theologian and philosopher, studied under William of Champeaux and Anselm, and founded an internationally famous school of theology in Paris. At the age of thirty-six he became tutor to Héloïse, the beautiful and accomplished seventeen-year-old niece of Canon Fulbert of Notre Dame. They fell in love, a son was born and they were secretly married, but Héloïse soon disavowed the marriage that she might not hinder Abelard's preferment. Fulbert, enraged at her husband's seeming connivance, caused him to be emasculated. Abelard entered the monastery of St. Denis. Héloïse became a nun. Abelard continued his highly controversial teaching and later founded another school near Nogent-sur-Seine called PARACLETE, which, after his departure to take charge of the Abbey of St. Gildas in Brittany, was given to a sisterhood under Héloïse. His stormy career ended in 1142 and Héloïse was laid by his side in 1164. Their remains were transferred from Paraclete and re-buried in the PÈRE-LACHAISE cemetery (Paris) in 1817.

Abelites (äb' e litz), Abelians, or Abelionians. A Christian sect of the 4th century living in North Africa, mentioned by St. Augustine. They married but remained virgin, as they affirmed Abel did, since no children of his are mentioned in the SCRIPTURES. Children were adopted to maintain the sect.

Abenezra. See ADMIRABLE.

Abhorrrers. See PETITIONERS.

Abif. See HIRAM ABIF.

Abigail (äb' i gäl). A lady's maid. Abigail (I Sam. xxv, 24-28) repeatedly called herself David's handmaid, hence the usage. Beaumont and Fletcher in The Scornful Lady called the "waiting gentlewoman" by this name, and it was used by Swift, Fielding and others. Probably the usage was popularized by the political notoriety of Abigail Hill (Mrs. Masham), waiting-woman to QUEEN ANNE and royal favourite.

Abingdon Law. See CÚPAR JUSTICE.

Abhidhamma (äb id a' ma). The third pitaka of the three texts (TRIPITAKA) which together form the sacred canon of the Buddhists. In seven treatises it is essentially concerned with metaphysics.

Abiogenesis (Gr. a, without, bios, life + genesis), a term applied by T. H. Huxley in 1870 to the ancient theory that non-living matter could produce living. An example of such spontaneous generation is found in VIRGIL's Georgics (Bk. IV), when the shepherd Aristæus, son of APOLLO and CYRENE, having lost his bees through disease and famine, slew four bulls at his mother's orders. On the ninth morning bees poured forth from the decomposing cattle.

Abolitionists. In Great Britain historically applied to supporters of the anti-slavery movement; in the U.S.A. specifically applied to those who agitated for the abolition of Negro slavery in the period 1830-1861; in Australia, to those, in the 19th century, who sought to end the transportation of British convicts.

Abominable Snowman. Name, popularized by Shipton's Everest Expedition of 1951, for the yeti, a rare, elusive, and supposedly bear-like animal of the Himalayas.

Abo (äb' ö). Shortened form of aborigine in general colloquial use in Australia.

Abomination of Desolation. Probably refers to some statue set up in the Temple by heathens or the Romans and is mentioned in Dan. ix, xi, xii, and Matt. xxiv, 15. The subject is very obscure.

Abou-Bekr (ä boo bekr) (c. 573-634), called Father of the Virgin (AYESHA). He was the immediate successor of MOHAMMED or first CALIPH (632-34) and was supported by the SUNNITES.

Abou Hassan (ä boo häs' än). A rich merchant (in the ARABIAN NIGHTS, The Sleeper Awakened), transferred while asleep to the bed of the Caliph HAROUN AL-RASCHID. Next morning he was treated as the CALIPH and every effort was made to make him forget his identity. The same trick was played on Christopher SLY in the Induction of Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew; and according to Burton (Anatomy of Melancholy, 1621) by Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, on a drunken rustic, the subject of The Prolisome Duke, or the Tinker's Good Fortune found in PERCY'S RELIQUES. Calderón's play, Life's a Dream (c. 1633) contains another version.

Abou ibn Sina. See AVICENNA.

About the size of it. How matters stand, approximately the facts of the case.

Above-board. Honest and open. According to Johnson "borrowed from gamblers, who, when they put their hands under the table, are changing their cards."

Above oneself, To be. Temporarily more than ordinarily high-spirited, self-confident, or conceited.

Ab ovo (Lat. from the egg). Laboriously from the very beginning. Stasinus in his Cypria, an introduction to the ILIAD, begins with the eggs of LEDA, from one of which HELEN was born. If Leda had not laid this egg Helen would never have been born, therefore PARIS could not have eloped with her, therefore there would have been no TROJAN WAR, etc The English use of the phrase probably derives from the line in Horace's De Arte Poetica:

Nec gemino bellum Troianum orditur ab ovo.

Abracadabra. A cabalistic charm, said to be made up from the initials of the Hebrew words Ab (Father), Ben (Son), and Ruach ACadsch (Holy Spirit), and formerly used against ague, flux, toothache etc. The word was written on parchment as shown and hung from the neck by a linen thread.

Abracax. See ABRAXAS.

Abraham. In addition to the BIBLE stories about the Hebrew patriarch, Mohammedan legend adds the following: His parents were Prince Azar and his wife Adna. As King Nimrod had been told that one shortly to be born would dethrone him, he proclaimed a "massacre of the innocents". Adna retired to a cave where Abraham was born and was nourished by sucking two of her fingers, one giving milk and the other honey. At fifteen months the boy was the size of a lad of fifteen, and so wise that Azar introduced him to Nimrod's court. Further Abraham and his son "Ismail" rebuilt for the fourth time the KAABA; Abraham destroyed the idols made and worshipped by his father Terah; and that the mountain on which he offered up his son ("Mount Moriah" in the Bible) was "Arfaday".

The GHEBERS say that the infant Abraham was thrown into the fire by Nimrod's order but it turned into a bed of roses on which he went to sleep.

To sham Abraham. See ABRAM-MAN.

Abrahamic Covenant. The promise given by God to Abraham because he left his father's house to live in a strange land as God told him, and interpreted to mean that the MESSIAH should spring from Abraham's seed (Gen. xii, 1, 2, 3 and xvii).

Abraham Newland, An. A bank-note: from Abraham Newland, chief cashier of the Bank of England (1782-1807), whose signature appeared on its notes.

Abraham's bosom. The repose of the happy in death:

The sons of Edward sleep in Abraham's bosom.
 SHAKESPEARE, Richard III, IV, iii.

Abraxas

The allusion is to the ancient custom of allowing a dear friend to recline on one's bosom (Luke xvi, 22), as did John on the bosom of Jesus.

There is no leaping from Delilah's lap into Abraham's bosom—i.e. those who live and die in notorious sin must not expect to go to heaven at death.

Abram-colour. "Abram" here is a corruption of auburn. In Shakespeare's Coriolanus, II, iii, the word is so printed in the first three folios.

Our heads are some brown, some black, some Abram, some bald.

Abram-man, or Abraham cove. In Tudor and early Stuart times a pretended maniac who wandered about begging; a TOM O'BEDLAM; hence to sham Abraham meaning to sham illness in order to dodge work.

Inmates of BEDLAM who were not dangerous were kept in the "Abraham Ward" and occasionally allowed out in distinctive dress and permitted to beg. This gave an opportunity to many impostors. The Canting Academy (Richd. Head, 1674) says they used to beg alms but "for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along."

They are also portrayed in King Lear, II, iii, and Beaumont and Fletcher's Beggar's Bush, II, i.

Abraham, Plains of, or Heights of, south-west of the city of Quebec, the scene of the decisive battle (13 September 1759) between the British under Wolfe and the French under Montcalm, as a result of which the conquest of Canada was effected. They were named after a pilot known as Maitre Abraham (A. Martin). Both Montcalm and Wolfe died in the battle.

Abraxas (à bräks' às). A cabalistic word used by the GNOSTICS to denote the Supreme Being, the source of 365 emanations, the sum of the numbers represented by the Greek letters of the word. It was often engraved on gems (Abraxas stones) used as TALISMANS. By some authorities the name is given as that of one of the horses of AURORA.

Abalom and Achitophel (à kit' ò fel). A great political satire, Part I (1681) by Dryden, Part II (1682) largely by Nahum Tate. Directed against the WHIG opposition, DAVID stands for Charles II; Abalom for the Duke of Monmouth, ACHITOPHEL for Lord Shaftesbury, ZIMRI for the Duke of Buckingham, and Abdael for Monck. The poem is based upon II Sam. xiv-xviii.

Absence. The Etonian term for "roll-call".

Absent. The proverb "Out of sight out of mind" appears as the title of one of Barnabe Googe's Eglogs in 1563. Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke (1554-1628), in his 56th Sonnet gives it as "Out of mind as soon as out of sight."

The absent are always wrong. From the French proverb, les absents ont toujours tort. It implies that it is always easy to blame those not present, who cannot defend themselves. Found in G. Herbert, Outlandish Proverbs, 1640.

Absence makes the heart grow fonder. A tag from the song, The Isle of Beauty, by T. Haynes Bayly (1797-1839).

Absent Flag. A blue flag flown by a yacht to show that the owner is not aboard.

Absinthe (äb' sinth). A green liqueur flavoured with wormwood (Artemisia absinthium) together with angelica root, etc. It appears frequently in accounts of the life of French literary and artistic circles at the end of the 19th century and the early 20th century, and was first popularized by being prescribed as a febrifuge to French troops during the Algerian War (1830-47). L'Absinthe is the title by which the painting "Au Café" by Degas (exhibited in London in 1893) is better known. Émile Zola vividly described the horrors of absinthe poisoning in L'Assommoir. Its sale and manufacture are now illegal in France.

Absolute. A Captain Absolute, a bold despotic man, determined to have his own way, so called from the character in Sheridan's The Rivals.

Abstinence. Ecclesiastically Days of Abstinence are those when the eating of meat is not permitted; on Fasting Days only one full meal is allowed in the twenty-four hours.

Abstract Numbers are numbers considered without reference to anything else, i.e. 1, 2, 3; if we say one year, two feet, three men, etc. the numbers are concrete.

Things are said to be taken in the abstract when considered absolutely without relation to other things.

An abstract of title is a legal phrase meaning a précis of the evidences of ownership of real property.

Abstraction. An empty abstraction, a mere ideality of no practical use and thus often eventually rejected as unsatisfying:

Give us, for our abstractions, solid facts;
For our disputes, plain pictures.

WORDSWORTH: Excursion, V, 636.

Abudah (ä bü' da). Thackeray's allusion:
Like Abudah, he is always looking out for the Fury, and knows that the night will come with the inevitable hag with it, is to a merchant of Baghdad, haunted every night by an old hag described in Ridley's Tales of the Genii.

Abundant Number, An. A number the sum of whose aliquot parts is greater than itself, e.g., 12, because its divisors, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, = 16, which is greater than 12. Cp. DEFICIENT NUMBER, PERFECT NUMBER.

Abyla. See CALPE.

Abyssinian Christians. A branch of the Coptic Church. See COPTS.

Academy. Originally a garden near Athens where PLATO taught (named after Academos). Hence the philosophical school or system of Plato, and later a place, society or institution where the arts and sciences are taught or fostered.

The teaching of Plato and his early followers came to be known as the Old Academy; the modified Platonic system founded by Arcesilaus (c. 224 B.C.), as the Middle; the half-sceptical school founded by Carneades (c. 160 B.C.), as the New. Plato's followers were known as Academics. In addition to its usage in reference to an academy or university the adjective academic has come to mean "theoretical, scholarly, abstract, unpractical". See PLATONISM.

Acadia (à kâ' diâ), Acadie. A former French settlement which now forms part of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Ceded to Great Britain in 1713, the French inhabitants continued to intrigue against the British, and in 1755 were dispossessed and dispersed among the British colonies to the southward. This deportation provides the subject for Longfellow's Evangeline.

Acadine (âk' à dîn). A Sicilian fountain mentioned by Diodorus Siculus as having magic properties. Writings were thrown into it to be tested; if genuine they floated, if spurious they sank to the bottom.

Acanthus (â kân' thûs). The representation of the leaf of Acanthus mollis used to decorate the capitals of Corinthian and composite columns. The story is that an acanthus sprang up around a basket of flowers that Callimachus had placed on his daughter's grave. This so struck the fancy of the architect that he introduced the design into his buildings.

Accessory after the fact is one who screens a felon or helps him in any way to profit from his crime. A receiver of stolen goods, knowing or even suspecting them to be stolen, is an accessory ex post facto.

Accessory before the fact is one who is aware that another intends to commit an offence, but is absent when the offence is committed.

Accident. A logical accident is some quality or property which a thing possesses but which is not essential to it, the removal or change of which would not necessarily affect it, as the height of our bodies, the whiteness of paper or the redness of a brick. Theologians explain the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION by maintaining that the substance of the bread and wine is changed into that of the body and blood of Christ, but their accidents (flavour, appearance, etc.) remain unchanged.

Accidental colours. See COLOURS.

Accius Nævius (âk' kiûs nê' vi ùs). A legendary Roman augur who forbade TARQUIN the Elder (616-579 B.C.) to increase the number of centuries (i.e. divisions of the army) instituted by ROMULUS, without consulting the augurs. Tarquin asked him if, according to the augurs, the thought then in his (Tarquin's) mind was feasible of accomplishment. "Undoubtedly", said Accius after consultation. "Then cut through this whetstone with the razor in your hand". The priest gave a bold cut and the block fell in two (Livy, I, 36).

Accommodation. In commercial use, a loan of money.

Accommodation note or bill. A bill of exchange for which value has not been received, used for the purpose of raising money on credit.

Account, To keep open. Merchants are said to keep open account when they agree to honour each other's bills of exchange.

On the account. An old phrase for sailing on a piratical expedition.

The account on the Stock Exchange means the credit allowed on dealings for the fortnightly settlement, or the fortnightly settlement itself, which is also called account-day or settling-day.

To be called to one's last account. To die.

To be sent to one's account. To have final judgment passed on one. The ghost in Hamlet (I, v) uses the phrase as a synonym for death:

Sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head.

To square accounts with someone means to get even with or retaliate upon. Derived from "square accounts" in which debit balances credit.

Accusative. Calvin was so called by his college companions. An "accusative age" is an obsolete expression denoting an age that is searching, one that eliminates error by accusing or censuring it.

This hath been a very accusative age.—Sir E. DERING (16th century).

Ace. The unit of cards or dice from as, the Latin unit of weight. In World War I the French word as, applied to an airman who had brought down ten enemy aeroplanes, was imported in its English equivalent ace, then extended to any especially expert flier, golfer, etc.

Within an ace. Within a hair's breadth of; he who wins with an ace wins within a single mark. See AMBSAS.

To bate an ace. To make an abatement or to give a competitor some start or advantage making the combatants more equal. See BOLTON.

Aceldama (à sel' dá mà). The Aramaic for the "field of Blood" figuratively used for any place of great slaughter. It was the potter's field near Jerusalem bought to bury strangers in (see Matt. xxvii, 7, 8 and Acts i, 18, 19), and was used by Christians during the CRUSADES and as late as the 17th century.

Acephalites (à sef' à litz) (Gr. akephale, without a head). A name given to various schismatical Christian bodies, principally to (1) those MONOPHYSITES who rejected the authority of Peter Mongus, Bishop of Alexandria, in 482, and were later absorbed by the JACOBITES; (2) those NESTORIANS rejecting patriarchal condemnation of Nestorius in 431; (3) priests rejecting episcopal authority or bishops that of their metropolitans; (4) a group of English LEVELLERS in the reign of Henry I, who acknowledged no leader.

The name is also given to various legendary headless monsters.

Acestes (à ses' tēz). The arrow of Acestes. In a trial of skill Acestes, the Sicilian, shot his arrow with such force that it took fire (Æneid, V, 525).

Achates (à kâ' tēz). A fidus Achates is a faithful companion, a bosom friend. Achates (in VIRGIL'S Æneid) was the chosen comrade of ÆNEAS.

Achemon (à ke' mon). According to Greek legend, Achemon and his brother Basalas were two Cercopes for ever quarrelling. One day they saw HERCULES asleep under a tree and insulted him, so he tied them by their feet to his club and walked off with them, heads downwards. Everyone laughed at the sight, and it became a proverbial cry among the Greeks, when two men were seen quarrelling—"Look out for Melampygos!" (i.e. Hercules):

Ne incidas in Melampygam.

Acheri. The ghost of a little girl, who, according to folk tradition of India, comes down at night from her mountain haunts to bring sickness to children in human habitations. A bright-red thread worn round the neck is believed to be a protection from such molestation.

Acheron (äk' er on). The "woeful river" of the underworld into which flow the PHLEGETHON and COCYTUS. Also HADES itself.

They pass the bitter waves of Acheron
Where many souls sit wailing woefully.

SPENSER: Faerie Queene I, v, 33.

See also VIRGIL'S Æneid, Bk. VI.

Acherontian Books. See TAGES.

Acherusia (äk er ooz' i à). A cavern on the borders of Pontus, through which HERCULES dragged CERBERUS from the infernal regions to earth.

Acheulean (à sher' li àn). The name given to stages of PALAEOOLITHIC hand-axe culture typified by the tools found at St. Acheul, near Amiens.

Achillea (äk il ē' à). A genus of plants of the aster family, including common yarrow (Achillea millefolium), so called from ACHILLES. The tale is that the Greeks, on the way to TROY, landed in Mysia and were opposed by Telephus, son of HERCULES. DIONYSUS caused Telephus to stumble and he was wounded by Achilles with his spear. Told by the ORACLE that Achilles (the wounder) would be the healer (meaning milfoil or yarrow), Telephus sought out the Greek leader, promising to lead him to Troy in return for his help. Achilles agreed, scraped some rust from his spear from which sprang the plant milfoil, and this healed the wound. It is called carpenters' wort by the French (herbe aux charpentiers) because it is supposed to heal wounds made by carpenters' tools.

Achilles (à kil' ēz). Hero of the ILIAD, the son of Peleus, King of the MYRMIDONS in Thessaly, and grandson of Æacus. Brave and relentless, his quarrel with AGAMEMNON, the Greek commander-in-chief, caused him to withdraw from the struggle. The TROJANS prevailed and Achilles allowed PATROCLUS to lead the Myrmidons back. Patroclus was killed by HECTOR. Achilles then returned, routed the Trojans, and slew Hector. According to later poems Achilles was killed by PARIS at the Scæan gate. See ACHILLES TENDON.

Achilles and the tortoise. Alludes to a paradox by ZENO. In a race Achilles, who can run ten times as fast as a tortoise, gives the latter 100 yards start; but cannot win the race because while he is running the first 100 yards, the tortoise runs ten, while Achilles runs that ten the tortoise runs one, while Achilles is running one, the tortoise runs one-tenth of a yard, and so on ad infinitum.

Achilles of England. The Duke of Wellington (1769–1852).

Achilles of Germany. Albert, Elector of Brandenburg (1414–1486).

Achilles of Lombardy. In Tasso's JERUSALEM DELIVERED, the brother of Sforza and Palamedes in the allied army of Godfrey. He was slain by Corinna.

Achilles of Rome. Lucius Sicinius Dentatus, tribune of the Roman plebs, 454 B.C., also called the "Second Achilles".

Achilles of the West. ROLAND the PALADIN, also called "the Christian THESEUS".

Achilles tendon (tendo Achillis). A strong sinew connecting the heel and calf frequently strained by athletes. The tale is that THETIS took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river STYX to make him invulnerable, but the heel in her hand remained dry. The hero was slain by an arrow wound in the heel—the one weak spot (a post-Homeric story).

Achilles's horses. BALIOS and XANTHOS. See HORSE.

Achilles's mistress in Troy. Hippodamia, surnamed BRISEIS.

Achilles's spear. See ACHILLEA. Shakespeare and Chaucer allude to its powers. Whose smile and frown, like to Achilles' spear,
Is able with the change to kill and cure.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Part II, V, i.

And of Achilles with his queyne's speere,
For he coude with it both hele and dere [harm].

CHAUCER: Squire's Tale, 238.

Achilles's tomb. In Sigeum, over which no bird ever flies. Pliny, X, 29.

Achilles's tutors. PHENIX, who taught him the arts of war and rhetoric, and CHIRON, the CENTAUR, the art of healing.

Achilles's wife. DEIDAMIA.

The English Achilles. John Talbot, first Earl of Shrewsbury (1388?–1453).

The heel of Achilles. The vulnerable spot in the character of a man or a nation. See ACHILLES TENDON.

Achitophel (á kit' ó fel). Achitophel was David's traitorous counsellor, who deserted to Absalom but hanged himself when his advice was disregarded (II Sam. xvii, 23). See ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL.

Achor (á' kôr). Said by Pliny to be the deity prayed to by the Cyreneans for the averting of insect pests. See FLIES, GOD OF.

Acid Drop, The. Nickname by which Mr. Justice Avory (1851–1935) was known in legal circles, from his caustic wit in court.

Acid on, To put the. Used originally in Australia and New Zealand meaning to ask for a loan. It has since come to mean to make excessive demands on. Possibly derived from ACID TEST.

Acid test. Gold is not attacked by most acids but reacts to AQUA FORTIS (and AQUA REGIA)—the acid test. Hence applied to a decisive or searching test.

Acis (á' sis). The son of Faunus, in love with GALATEA, crushed to death with a rock by his rival, POLYPHEMUS the CYCLOPS, and changed into the river Acis (Ovid, Metam. xiii, 750–968).

Ack Ack. Slang from World Wars I and II meaning Anti-Aircraft Guns. Field telephone, cp. ACK EMMA.

Ack Emma. See PIP EMMA.

Acknowledge the corn. To admit the truth of the point at issue, an American expression. In a Congressional debate in 1828 one of the states which claimed to export corn admitted that the corn was actually used to feed hogs, and exported in that form.

"I hope he will give up the argument, or to use a familiar phrase acknowledge the corn" (Mr. Speight of Mississippi speaking in the U.S. Senate in 1846).

Acme (ák' mi) (Gr. a point). The highest pitch of perfection. Old medical writers divided the progress of a disease into the arce, or beginning; the anabasis or increase; the acme, or crisis; and the paracme, or decline.

Aconite (ák' ó nit). The herb Monkshood or Wolfsbane. According to classic fable when HERCULES, at the command of Eurystheus, dragged CERBERUS from the infernal regions, the poisonous aconite grew from the foam which dropped from his mouths.

Acrasia (á krá' zi á). The personification of intemperance, the name signifying "lack of self control". In Spenser's Faerie Queene (II, xii) Acrasia, an enchantress, mistress of the "Bower of Bliss", transformed her lovers into monstrous shapes and kept them captive. Sir Guyon destroyed her bower, freed her victims, and sent her in chains of adamant to the Faerie Queene.

Acre. O.E. æcer, akin to Lat. ager, a field.

God's Acre, a cemetery or churchyard. A modern borrowing from Germany, wrongly called by Longfellow an "ancient Saxon phrase".

Acre-Fight. See under FIGHT.

Acre-Shot. Obsolete name for a land-tax. "Shot" is scot. See SCOT AND LOT.

Acres, Bob. A coward is sometimes called

"a regular Bob Acres" after a character in Sheridan's The Rivals, whose courage always "oozed out at his fingers' ends".

Acres of Diamonds. A lecture said to have been given 6,000 times by the American Baptist minister, R. H. Conwell (1843-1925), in which he urged the acquisition of riches as a social duty. His assertion that 3,900 of the 4,500 American millionaires were self-made men led to the growth of the popular "success story" in American magazines.

Across someone, To get. To quarrel with or annoy a person; cp. "cross" in the sense of obstruct or thwart.

Across, To put, or get something. Generally used of a speaker making his point and carrying his audience with him. Probably derived from the theatre where actors must reach their audience across the footlights, or possibly from the game of baseball.

Acrostic (Gr. akros, outermost; stichos, line of verse). Verse in which the initial letters of each line read downwards to form a word; if the final letters also form a word it is a double acrostic; if the middle letters also it is a triple acrostic. The term was first applied to the obscure prophecies of the Erythraean SIBYL written on loose leaves, which made a word when sorted into order (Dionys. IV, 62).

Acrostic Poetry among the Hebrews consisted of twenty-two lines or stanzas beginning with the letters of the alphabet in succession (cp. ABECEDARIAN HYMNS).

Act of Opponency. An "act", at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, consisted of a thesis publicly maintained by a candidate for a degree, with the "disputation" thereon. The person "disputing" with "the keeper of the Act" was called the "opponent" and his function was called an "opponency". In some degrees the student was required to keep his Act, and then to be the opponent of another disputant. This custom has long been given up, but at Cambridge the thesis and examination for the doctor's degree in Medicine is still called an "Act".

Act of God. A term applied by lawyers to happenings indisputably outside human control, for which there is no legal redress (e.g., losses caused by flood, hurricane, earthquake, etc.).

Act of Truth. An event which, following a solemn oath, was held to prove or disprove its truth as in trial by ORDEAL.

Act of Parliament. A law or statute made by PARLIAMENT. Introduced as a BILL, it becomes an Act when passed, after it has received the royal assent. See REGNAL YEAR under YEAR.

Actæon (äk tē' on). In Greek mythology a huntsman who, having surprised DIANA bathing (or according to Euripides boasted his superiority in the chase) was changed into a stag and torn to pieces by his own hounds. Thus (as a stag) he became representative of men whose wives are unfaithful. See HORN.

Action Games (äk' ti ãn). The games celebrated at Actium in honour of APOLLO, renewed by AUGUSTUS after his naval victory over Antony off Actium (31 B.C.).

Action Sermon. In the Scottish PRESBYTERIAN Church the sermon sometimes preached before administering the Communion.

Actresses. Thomas Coryate says "When I went to a theatre [in Venice] I observed certain things that I never saw before; for I saw women act . . . I have heard that it hath sometimes been used in London" (Coryat's Crudities, 1611). Female parts on the English stage were always taken by boys until the RESTORATION. The first actress to perform in public was Margaret Hughes (Prince Rupert's mistress) playing Desdemona in Othello at a theatre in Clare Market, London (8 December 1660). Edward Kynaston (d. 1706) seems to have been the last actor to take female parts in serious drama.

Whereas, women's parts in plays have hitherto been acted by men in the habits of women . . . we do permit and give leave for the time to come that all women's parts be acted by women.

Charles II's licence of 1662.

Ad inquirendum (äd in kwí ren' dum) (Lat.). A judicial writ commanding an inquiry to be made into some complaint.

Ad Kalendas Græcas (äd ka len' däs grē' kās) (Lat.). (Deferred) to the Greek Calends—i.e. for ever. (It shall be done) on the Greek Calends—i.e. never—for the Greeks had no CALENDs. Suetonius says AUGUSTUS used this reply if asked when he was going to pay his creditors.

Ad libitum (äd lib' i tum) (Lat.). To choice, at pleasure, without restraint.

Ad libbing. From ad libitum. In theatrical, broadcasting and musical parlance, to depart from the script or music and improvise.

Ad valorem (äd väl ör' em) (Lat.). According to the value. A term used in imposing customs and stamp duty, the duty increasing according to the value of the transaction or goods involved.

Ad vitam aut culpam (äd ví' tam awt kül' pam) (Lat.). Literally "to lifetime or fault", used in Scottish law of the permanency of an appointment during good behaviour.

Adam. The Talmudists say that Adam lived in PARADISE only twelve hours before he was thrust out. Mohammedan legend says that:

God sent GABRIEL, MICHAEL, and ISRAFAEL in turn to fetch seven handfuls of earth from different depths and of different colours for the creation of Adam (hence the varying colours of mankind), but they returned empty-handed because Earth foresaw that the creature to be made from her would rebel against God and draw down his curse on her. AZRAEL was then sent and he fulfilled the task, and so was appointed to separate the souls from the bodies, hence becoming the ANGEL of Death. The earth he fetched was taken to ARABIA to a place between MECCA and Tayef, kneaded by angels, fashioned into human form by God and left to dry for either 40 days or 40 years. The tradition holds that Adam was buried on Aboucais, a mountain in Arabia.

For the Bible story of Adam see Gen. i-v.

Adam. The elegant neo-classical style of architecture and interior decoration created by the brothers Adam, especially Robert Adam (1728-1792). See ADELPHI.

As old as Adam. Means that something was well known long ago.

The curse of Adam. The necessity of working for a living. "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground" (Gen. iii, 19). In the story of the Creation, Adam and Eve were driven from the Garden of EDEN for disobedience, and God cursed the earth, which had hitherto borne only plants "pleasant to the sight and good for food" (Gen. ii, 9) so that it now put forth "thorns also and thistles" (Gen. iii, 18).

The old Adam. The offending Adam etc.

Consideration, like an angel, came
And whipped the offending Adam out of him.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, I, 1.

Adam, as the head of unredeemed man, stands for "original sin", or "man without regenerating grace".

The Second Adam, the New Adam, etc. Jesus Christ is so called.

The Tempter set
Our second Adam in the wilderness,
To show him all earth's Kingdoms and their glory.
Paradise Lost, XI, 383.

In the same way Milton calls MARY our "second Eve" (Paradise Lost, V, 387 and X, 183).

When Adam delved:

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?

This, according to the Historia Anglicana of Thos. Walsingham (d. 1422), was the text of John Ball's speech at Blackheath to the rebels in the PEASANTS' REVOLT (1381). Possibly adapted from lines by Richard Rolle of Hampole (d.c. 1349):

When Adam dalfe and Eve spanne
To spire of thou may spede,
Where was then the pride of man,
That now marres his meed?

Cp. JACK'S AS GOOD AS HIS MASTER.—See under JACK.

Adam Bell. See CLYM OF THE CLOUGH.

Adam Cupid, i.e. Archer CUPID, probably alluding to ADAM BELL. In all early editions the line in Romeo and Juliet (II, i, 13) "Young Adam Cupid, he that shot so trim", reads "Young Abraham Cupid". The emendation was suggested by George Stevens (1736-1800).

Adam's ale. Water; first man's only drink, sometimes called Adam's wine in Scotland.

Adam's apple. The protuberance in the forepart of the throat; so called from the supposition that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat.

Adam's needle. A name given chiefly to the Yucca and to certain other plants with needle-like spines. Gen. iii, 7 tells us that Adam and Eve "sewed fig leaves together".

Adams, Parson. See PARSON.

Adam's Peak. A mountain in Ceylon where, according to Mohammedan legend, ADAM, after his expulsion from PARADISE, expiated his crime by standing on one foot for 200 years until GABRIEL took him to Mount Ararat, where he found EVE. In the granite there is a large impression resembling a human foot. Hindus assert that it was made by BUDDHA when he ascended into heaven.

Adam's profession. Gardening or agriculture. See Gen. ii, 15 and Gen. iii, 23.

There is no ancient gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers; they hold up Adam's profession.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, V, i.

Adamites (ād' à mīts). The name given to various heretical sects, possibly of misguided ascetics, who practised nudity and rejected marriage. Such were the 2nd-century Adamites in North Africa, but similar ideas, leading to licentiousness, were revived in Europe by the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit in the 13th century; the BEGHARDS in France, Germany and the Netherlands; and the PICARDS of Bohemia in the 14th and 15th centuries, etc. Adamites are mentioned in James Shirley's comedy Hyde Park (II, iv) (1632) and in the Guardian, No. 134 (1713).

Adamastor (ăd â măs' tôr). The spirit of the Cape of Storms (Good Hope), described by Camoëns (1524-1580) in the LUSIADS, who appeared to Vasco da Gama and foretold disaster to all attempting the voyage to India.

Add insult to injury. To wound by word or deed someone who has already suffered an act of violence or injustice. PHÆDRUS quotes the fable of ÆSOP about a bald man who, in attempting to kill a fly which had bitten his head, missed and dealt himself a sharp smack. Whereupon the fly said: "You wished to kill me for a mere touch. What will you do to yourself since you have added insult to injury?"

Add up, It does not. No sensible answer can be arrived at from the known facts, it does not make sense. It is derived from simple arithmetic.

Addison of the North. Henry Mackenzie (1745-1831), author of The Man of Feeling, literary leader in Edinburgh. So called by Sir Walter Scott.

Addisonian termination. The name given by Bishop Hurd (1720-1808) to the construction, frequently employed by Joseph Addison (1672-1719), which closes a sentence with a preposition, e.g., "which the prophet took a distinct view of".

Addle is the Old English adela, mire or liquid filth, hence rotten, putrid, worthless. Thus addled eggs, a rotten egg and figuratively addle-headed, addle-pate, muddle-headed or lacking brains.

Addled Parliament (5 April-7 June 1614). So called for its sterility, being dissolved by James I without passing a single Act. It refused to grant supplies unless the king abandoned IMPOSITIONS.

Adelantado (ă de lăn ta' dō). Spanish for "his excellency". Hence a figure of importance.

Open no door. If the adelantado of Spain were here he should not enter.—BEN JONSON: Every Man out of his Humour, V, vi.

Middleton, in Blurt, Master Constable (IV, iii), used the abbreviation lantedo.

Adelphi, The. A small district between the STRAND and Thames designed by Robert ADAM and his brothers in 1768 (Adelphoi is the Greek word for brothers). Originally the site of the Bishop of Durham's palace, it is rich in literary and historical associations, having accommodated the Savage Club, Garrick, Rowlandson, Hardy, Barrie, etc. The arches upon which the streets were built, known as the SHADES or Darkies, became of ill repute. John Adam Street still accommodates the Royal Society of Arts but most of the Adelphi has been replaced by unneighbourly modern buildings.

Adept. One who has attained (Lat. adeptus). The alchemists applied the term vere adeptus to those who professed to have found out the ELIXIR OF LIFE or the PHILOSOPHER'S STONE.

Adiaphorists (ăd i âf' or ists) (Gr. indifferent). Moderate Lutherans, followers of Melancthon, who accepted the Interim of Leipzig (1548) on ceremonies indifferent (i.e. neither sanctioned nor forbidden by the Scriptures), causing controversy among the Lutherans, which substantially ended in 1555. See AUGSBURG.

Adieu (a dū) (Fr. to God). An elliptical form for I commend you to God. Cp. GOOD-BYE.

Aditi. The great earth mother of Hindu mythology, sometimes an abstract concept of limitless space and time. Various descriptions as the mother, wife, and daughter of VISHNU.

Adityas. In the VEDAS they are the divine sons of ADITI, the chief being VARUNA, sustainer of the moral law, who is often called Aditya.

Adjective colours are those which require a mordant before they can be used as dyes.

Admass. Coined by J. B. Priestley in Journey Down a Rainbow (1955) to describe the vast mid-20th-century proliferation of commercial advertising and high-pressure salesmanship, especially in the U.S.A.

Admirable, The. Abraham ben Meir ibn Ezra (1092-1167), a celebrated Spanish Jew was so called. He was a noted mathematician, philologist, poet, astronomer, and commentator on the BIBLE, and the Rabbi Ben Ezra of Robert Browning's poem of that name.

The Admirable Crichton. James Crichton (1560-1585), Scottish traveller, scholar and swordsman. So called by Sir Thomas Urquhart (1611?-1660?). Hence one distinguished by all-round talents.

Also the name of one of Sir J. M. Barrie's plays, which appeared in 1902. Admirable Doctor (Doctor mirabilis). Roger Bacon (c. 1214-1294), the great English philosopher.

Admiral, from the Arabic amir (lord or commander), with the article al as in amir-al-bahr (commander of the sea), amir-al-Omra (commander of the forces). Milton, speaking of SATAN, uses the old form for the ship itself:

His spear—to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great admiral, were but a wand
He walked with.

Paradise Lost, I, 292.

In the Royal Navy there are now four ranks of Admiral—Admiral of the Fleet, Admiral, Vice-Admiral, Rear-Admiral. Up to 1864 Flag-Officers were graded as Admirals, Vice-Admirals, and Rear-Admirals of the Red, White, and Blue, according to the colour of their squadrons.

Admiral of the Blue (see above), facetiously used for a butcher or a tapster from their blue aprons.

As soon as customers begin to stir
The Admiral of the Blue cries "Coming, Sir!"
Poor Robin (1731).

Admiral of the Red (see above), also applied to a wine-bibber whose nose and face are red.

Yellow Admiral, nickname for those promoted from Captain to Admiral but not employed actively (the Quarantine Flag being yellow). The Retired List proper dates from 1870.

Admonitionists, or Admonitioners. These who in 1572 sent admonitions to PARLIAMENT condemning EPISCOPACY and advocating the doctrines and practices of Geneva.

Adonai (á dō ní) (Heb. pl. of adon, lord). A name for the Deity used by the Hebrews, instead of Yahweh (JEHOVAH), "the ineffable name", wherever it occurs. See TETRAGRAMMATON.

Adonists. Those Hebraists who maintain that the vowels of the word ADONAI are not those necessary to make the TETRAGRAMMATON J H V H into the name of the Deity. See JEHOVAH.

Adonais (ád ō nā' is). The name given by Shelley to Keats in his elegy (Adonais, 1821) lamenting the latter's death, probably in allusion to the mourning for ADONIS.

Adonia (ád ō' ni á). An eight-day feast of ADONIS, celebrated in Assyria, Alexandria, Egypt, Judæa, Persia, Cyprus, Greece and Rome. The women first lamented the death of ADONIS then wildly rejoiced at his resurrection—a custom referred to in the BIBLE (Ezek. viii, 14), where Adonis appears under his Phœnician name, Tammuz. See THAMMUZ.

Adonis (á dō' nis). In classical mythology, a beautiful youth, son of MYRRHA (or Smyrna), he was beloved by APHRODITE (Venus) and killed by a boar while hunting. Hence, usually ironical, any beautiful young man. Leigh Hunt was sent to prison for libelling the Prince Regent by calling him "a corpulent Adonis of fifty" (Examiner, 1813).

Adonis Flower, the rose, once white, but coloured red by the blood of APHRODITE when pricked by a thorn rushing to help the fallen ADONIS; the anemone which sprang from his blood or the tears of Aphrodite; and more commonly Pheasant's Eye (Adonis autumnalis), which arose from the hunter's blood.

Adonis garden. A worthless toy; very perishable goods.

Thy promises are like Adonis' gardens
That one day bloomed and fruitful were the next.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI Pt. I, I, vi.

Adonis River, the stream near Byblos which ran red with the soil brought down from Lebanon.

Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded.

MILTON, Paradise Lost, I, 446.

Adoption by arms. An ancient custom of giving arms to a person of merit, which put him under the obligation of being your champion and defender.

Adoption by baptism. Being godfather or godmother to a child.

Adoption by hair. Boso, King of Provence (879–889), is said to have cut off his hair and given it to Pope John VIII (872–882) as a sign that the latter had adopted him.

Adoption controversy. Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix Bishop of Urgel (in the 8th century), maintained that Christ in his human nature was the son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii, 29), though in his pre-existing state he was the "begotten Son of God" in the ordinary Catholic acceptance. The adoptionists were condemned by the Council of Frankfort in 794.

Adoptive Emperors. The five Emperors—Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius—each of whom (except Nerva, who was elected by the Senate) was the adopted son of his predecessor. Their period (96–180) is said to have been the happiest in Roman history.

Adrammelech (á drám' e lek). A Babylonian deity to whom infants were burnt in sacrifice (II Kings xvii, 31). Possibly the sun god worshipped at Sippar (Sepharvaim).

Adrastus (á drás' tus). (i) A mythical Greek king of Argos, leader of the expedition of the SEVEN AGAINST THEBES. (ii) An Indian prince, slain by RINALDO (in Tasso's JERUSALEM DELIVERED, Bk. XX), who aided the king of Egypt against the crusaders.

Adriatic. See BRIDE OF THE SEA.

Adrift. At the mercy of wind and tide, something which has carried or broken away. In colloquial naval usage it means being late, overdue from leave or absent from place of duty.

All adrift, figuratively used, means an aimless and confused state of mind.

Adullamites (à dül' à mits). A group of some thirty LIBERALS led by R. Lowe and E. Horsman, who led the opposition to Lord Russell's Reform Bill in 1866; likened by John Bright to the malcontents who joined David when he escaped to the cave of Adullam.

And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him.

I Sam. xxii, 1, 2.

Adulterous Bible. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Advent (Lat. adventus, arrival). The four weeks before CHRISTMAS, beginning on St. ANDREW's Day (30 November), or the Sunday nearest to it, commemorating the first and second coming of Christ; the first to redeem, and the second to judge the world.

Advent Sunday. The first Sunday in Advent, the beginning of the Church Year, except in the Greek Church where it begins on St. MARTIN's Day (11 November).

Adversary, The. SATAN or the DEVIL (from I Pet. v, 8.)

Adversity Hume. Joseph Hume (1777-1855) was so called through his forebodings of national disaster in the mid-1820's. Cp. PROSPERITY ROBINSON.

Advocate. The Devil's Advocate. A carping or adverse critic, from Advocatus Diaboli (Devil's Advocate), the person appointed (in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH) to oppose rigorously the claims of a candidate for CANONIZATION. The supporter is called Advocatus Dei (God's Advocate).

Advocate's Library, was founded in Edinburgh (1682) by Sir George Mackenzie, Dean of the Faculty of Advocates (i.e. members of the Scottish bar). In 1925 it became the National Library of Scotland and has received a copy of all books published since the Copyright Act of 1709. See FAMOUS LIBRARIES under LIBRARY.

Advowson (Lat. advocatio, a summoning). The right of presentation to a church BENEFICE. Thus named because the patron was the advocate or defender of the living and of the claims of his candidate. The different advowsons are:

Advowson appendant. When the right of presentation belongs to and passes with the manor whose owner originally built, or endowed, the church.

Advowson collative. When the BISHOP himself is patron; presentation, admission, and institution are replaced by collation.

Advowson donative. When the patron (usually the Crown) donated the benefice without the bishop's playing any part in its disposal. These became presentative after 1898.

Advowson in gross. One which has been sold and become legally separated from the manor. See GROSS.

Advowson presentative. Where the patron presents the clerk to the BISHOP, who must institute the nominee unless there are legal or ecclesiastical grounds for refusal.

The transfer and sale of advowsons is now subject to restrictions.

Adytum (Gr. aduton, not to be entered). The holy of holies in Greek and Roman temples, into which the public was not admitted; hence a sanctum.

Ægeus (ē' jūs). A mythical king of Attica, who sent his son THESEUS to Crete to deliver ATHENS from the yearly tribute of seven youths and seven maidens exacted by MINOS. If successful, Theseus was to hoist white sails (in place of black) on the return, as a signal of his safety. He omitted to do so. Ægeus, thinking his son was lost, threw himself into the sea. The story is repeated in the tale of TRISTRAM and Isolde.

Æginetan Sculptures consist of two groups of figures from the east and west pediments of the temple of ATHENE, in the island of Ægina, representing exploits of the Greek heroes at TROY. They date from c. 500 B.C., being found in 1811, and are preserved in the Glyptothek, in Munich.

Ægir (ē' jir, ē' gi r). In Norse mythology the god of the ocean, husband of Ran. They had nine daughters (the billows), who wore white robes and veils.

Ægis (ē' jis) (Gr. goat skin). The shield of ZEUS, made by HEPHÆSTOS and covered with the skin of the goat AMALTHEA, who had suckled the infant Zeus. With the GORGON's head in the centre, it was also carried by his daughter ATHENE. By shaking his ægis Zeus produced storms and thunder. In relation to Athene it is usually represented as a kind of cloak fringed with serpents and the Gorgon's head. It is symbolical of divine protection, hence under my ægis, under my protection.

Ægyptus (ē jip' tus). In Greek legend a son of Belus and twin brother of Danaus who was king of that part of Africa named after him (Ægypt).

A.E.I.O.U. The device adopted by Frederick V, Archduke of Austria, on becoming the Emperor Frederick III in 1440. The letters, used by his predecessor, Albert II, stood for:

Albertus Electus Imperator Optimus Vivat.

Frederick gave them the meaning:

Archidux Electus Imperator Optime Vivat.

Among other versions are:

Austria: Est Imperare Orbi Universo.
Alles Erdreich Ist Oesterreich Unterthan.
Austria's Empire Is Overall Universal.

To which was added after the war of 1866:

Austria's Empire Is Ousted Entirely.

Frederick is said to have translated the motto thus:

Austria Erit In Orbe Ultima (Austria will be lowest in the world).

Æmilian Law. The Roman prætor Aemilius Mamercus made a law (A.U.C. 391) empowering the eldest prætor to drive a nail in the Capitol on the IDES of September, with the supposition that it would stop pestilence or avert a calamity. It is mentioned in Livy VII, iii.

Æneas (ē nē' as). In Greek mythology the son of Anchises, King of Dardanus, and APHRODITE. According to HOMER he fought in the TROJAN WAR and after the sack of TROY withdrew to Mount IDA and reigned in the Troad. The post-Homeric legends are largely embodied in the ÆNEID.

Æneid (ē' ne id or ē nē' id). VIRGIL's epic poem in twelve books, accounting for the settlement of ÆNEAS in Italy, thus claiming Trojan origins for the Roman state. The story tells how Æneas escaped from the flames of TROY carrying his father Anchises, to Mount IDA. With his Trojan followers he sailed to Crete but learnt in a vision that he was destined for Italy, and eventually reached Sicily where his father died. Heading for the mainland, he was wrecked on the coast of Carthage. He left secretly, at JUPITER's behest, whereupon the lovelorn queen DIDO killed herself. Reaching Latium he was betrothed to LAVINIA, daughter of king LATINUS; but war arose with Turnus, king of the Rutuli, who also wished to marry Lavinia. Turnus was finally killed by Æneas.

Æolian Mode, in music, the ninth of the "church modes" according to the classification established by Henricus Glareanus in 1547, the range being from A to A with dominant E.

Æolian Rocks. Those which have been deposited or eroded largely by the wind.

Æolus (ē' ō lūs), in Homeric legend, was appointed ruler of the winds by ZEUS, and lived on his Æolian island.

Æon (ē' on) (Gr. aion). An age of the universe, an infinite length of time. Also the personification of an age, a god, any being that is eternal. Basilides, in the early 2nd century, held that there had been 365 such Æons but Valentinus, the 2nd-century Gnostic, restricted the number to 30.

Æschylus (ēs' ki lūs) (525-456 B.C.), the main father of Greek tragic drama. Only seven plays, of over seventy known titles, are extant. Fable says he was killed by a tortoise dropped by an eagle (to break the shell) on his bald head (mistaken for a stone).

Æschylus of France. Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon (1674-1762).

Æsculapius (ēs kū lā' pi us). The Latin form of the Greek Asklepios, god of medicine and of healing, son of APOLLO and father of HYGEIA. The usual offering to him was a cock, hence "to sacrifice a cock to Æsculapius"—to give thanks (or pay the doctor's bill) after recovery from an illness.

When men a dangerous disease did scape,

Of old, they gave a cock to Æsculape.

BEN JONSON: Epigram.

Introduced to ROME (293 B.C.), in the form of a snake, during a pestilence, the SERPENT entwined round a staff became his attribute.

Æsir (ē' zēr). The collective name of the mythical gods of Scandinavia, who lived in ASGARD. (1) ODIN the chief; (2) THOR; (3) TIU; (4) BALDER; (5) Brag, god of poetry; (6) Vidar, god of silence; (7) Hoder the blind (slayer of Balder); (8) Hermoder, Odin's son and messenger; (9) Hœnir, a minor god; (10) Odnir, husband of FREYJA; (11) LOKI; (12) Vali (Odin's youngest son).

Æson's Bath (ē' son).

I perceive a man may be twice a child before the days of dotage; and stands in need of Æson's Bath before three score.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE: Religio Medici, Section xlii.

The reference is to MEDEA rejuvenating Æson, father of JASON, with the juices of various magic herbs. After Æson had absorbed these juices, Ovid says:

Barba comæque,

Canitie posita, nigrum rapuere, colorem.

Metamorphoses, VII, 288.

Æsop's Fables (ē' sop). These popular animal fables are traditionally the work of Æsop, a deformed Phrygian slave (c. 620–560 B.C.), but many are far older, being found on Egyptian papyri of 800–1,000 years earlier. SOCRATES, in prison, began committing them to verse. A collection made in CHOLIAMBIC by BABRIUS (early 3rd century A.D.), was found in a monastery on Mount Athos in 1844. See PHÆDRUS.

Æsop of England. John Gay (1685–1732).

Æsop of France. Jean de LA FONTAINE (1621–1695).

Æsop of India. Pilpay has been so called.

Ætion (ē' ti ōn) in Spenser's Colin Clout's Come Home Againe (1595) typifies Michael Drayton, the poet.

Aetites (ā ē rī tēz) (Gr. aetos, an eagle). Eagle stones, also called gagites: according to fable found in eagle's nests, possessing magical and medical properties.

The stone in question is big with another inside it, which rattles, as if in a jar when you shake it.

PLINY: Natural History, X, iv (see also XXX, xlv). Lyly's Euphues (1578–1580) says:

The precious stone Aetites which is found in the filthy nests of the eagle.

Affluent Society. A phrase, popular from the later 1950s, denoting the overall growth in material prosperity of British society as evidenced by the growingly widespread ownership of motor cars, television sets, washing machines, refrigerators, etc.; a society further cushioned by its "free" social services. J. K. Galbraith's The Affluent Society was published in 1958.

Afghan, The. A weekly train from Adelaide to the ALICE in the heart of Australia; so called because it was at one time frequently used by Afghan traders.

Afreet, Afrit (āf' rēt). In Mohammedan mythology the second most powerful of the five classes of JINN or devils. They were of gigantic stature, malicious and inspiring great dread.

Africa. Teneo te, Africa. When CÆSAR landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he tripped and fell—a bad omen; but with great presence of mind pretended that it was intentional. He kissed the soil, exclaiming, "Thus do I take possession of thee, O Africa." The story is told also of Scipio and again of Cæsar on his landing in Britain.

Africa semper aliquid novi affert. "Africa is always producing some novelty." A Greek proverb quoted by Pliny, in allusion to the belief that Africa abounded in strange monsters.

African Sisters, The. The HESPERIDES, who dwelt in Africa.

Afrikaner Bond. A party founded in Cape Colony in 1874 to promote "a united South Africa under its own Flag", essentially under Boer domination.

After-cast. An obsolete expression for something done too late; literally a throw of the dice after the game is ended.

Ever he playeth an after-cast
Of all that he shall say or do.

GOWER.

After-clap. A catastrophe or misfortune after an affair is supposedly over. In thunderstorms a "clap" is often heard after the rain stops, and the clouds break.

What plaguy mischief and mishaps
Do dog him still with after-claps.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. I, iii.

After-guard. The men who tended the gear in the after part of a ship, also the officers, who had their quarters aft.

After me the deluge. See APRÈS MOI LE DÉLUGE.

Aft-meal. An extra meal; a meal taken after and in addition to the ordinary meals.

At aft-meals who shall pay for the wine?

THYNN: Debate (c. 1608).

Agag (ā' gāg), in Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, is Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Titus Oates gave evidence on the POPISSH PLOT. Soon afterwards Godfrey was found murdered in a ditch near Primrose Hill. Agag was hewed to pieces by Samuel (I Sam. xv, 33).

And Corah [Titus Oates] might for Agag's murder call

In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.

I, 675–6.

Agamemnon (āg ā mem' non). In Greek legend, the King of Mycenæ, son of Atreus, grandson of PELOPS, brother of MENELAUS, and leader of the Greeks at the siege of TROY. He married CLYTEMNESTRA. ORESTES was their son. Their daughters were IPHIGENIA and/or Iphianassa, Laodice (in later legend ELECTRA), and Chrysothemis. He returned from Troy with CASSANDRA (daughter of King PRIAM) and both were murdered by his wife Clytemnestra and her paramour Ægisthus. The guilty pair were killed by Orestes, called Agamemnonides.

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona, a quotation from HORACE (Od. IV, ix), paraphrased by BYRON in Don Juan (i, 5): Brave men were living before Agamemnon
And since, exceeding valorous and sage,
A good deal like him too, though quite the same none;

But then they shone not on the poet's page,
And so have been forgotten.

In general, we are not to suppose our own age or locality monopolizes all that is good.

Aganippe (äg á nip' i). In Greek legend a fountain of BŒOTIA at the foot of Mount HELICON, dedicated to the MUSES because it imparted poetic inspiration. Hence the Muses are sometimes called Aganippides. Also the NYMPH of this fountain.

Agape (äg' á pi). A love-feast (Gr. agape, love). The early Christians held a love-feast in conjunction with the Lord's Supper when the rich provided food for the poor. Eventually they became a scandal and were condemned by the Council of Carthage, 397. Agape was the mother of Priamond, Diamond, Triamond and Cambina in Spenser's Faerie Queene (IV, ii, 4188).

Agapemone (äg á pem' ó ni). A sect of men and women, adherents of Henry James Prince (1811-1899), curate of Charlynch, Somerset, and his rector Samuel Starky (hence they were sometimes called Starkyites). These zealots founded an Agapemone or Abode of Love at Spaxton in 1849, living on a common fund, but their licentious conduct led to trouble with authority. After 1890 the movement revived as the "Children of the Resurrection" under Smyth-Pigott, who was unfrocked in 1909.

Agapetræ (äg á pē' tē) (Gr. beloved). A group of 3rd-century ascetic women who, under vows of virginity, contracted spiritual marriage with monks and attended to their wants. The practice became widespread and the scandals arising led to their condemnation in the 4th century and suppression by the LATERAN COUNCIL of 1139.

Agate (äg' át). So called, says Pliny (XXXVII, 10), from Achates or Gagates, a river in Sicily, near which it is found in abundance. It was supposed to render a person invisible, and to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

A diminutive person has been called an agate from the custom of carving small figures on seals made from agate. Thus Shakespeare speaks of Queen MAB as no bigger than an agate-stone on the fore-finger of an alderman.

Agatha, St. (äg' á thá), was tortured and murdered at Catania in Sicily, possibly during the Decian persecution of 250-3. She is sometimes represented holding a salver containing her severed breasts, and the shears or pincers with which she was mutilated. Her feast day is 5 February.

Agave (a gā' vi), named from Agave, daughter of CADMUS, a group of tropical American plants of the Amaryllis family including the gigantic "American Aloe" or Maguey of Mexico, mistakenly called the century plant, in the belief that it took 100 years to flower.

Agdistes (äg dis' tēz). The god who kept the "Bower of Bliss" in Spenser's Faerie Queene.

Agdistis (äg dis' tis). A Phrygian mother goddess sometimes identified with CYBELE, the goddess of fertility. Originally hermaphrodite, she was made female by castration.

Age, a word used in mythology, geology, archaeology, history, etc. to denote a period of time marked by particular characteristics, e.g., GOLDEN AGE, ICE AGE, STONE AGE, DARK AGES, MIDDLE AGES, Elizabethan Age, AUGUSTAN AGE, Machine Age, Atomic Age, etc.

Hesiod (?8th century B.C.) names five ages: the Golden or patriarchal, under the care of SATURN; the Silver or voluptuous, under JUPITER; the Brazen or warlike, under NEPTUNE; the Heroic or renaissance, under MARS; the Iron or present, under PLUTO.

Lucretius (c. 94-55 B.C.) distinguishes three ages, stone, bronze, and iron, according to the material from which implements were made (V, 2128).

Varro (116-27 B.C.) recognizes three—from the beginning of mankind to the DELUGE; from the Deluge to the first OLYMPIAD, called the mythical period; from the first Olympiad to his own time, called the historic period (Fragments, p. 219 Scaliger's edition, 1623).

Ovid (B.C. 43-A.D. 18) describes four ages—Golden, Silver, Bronze and Iron (Metamorphoses I, 89-150).

Thomas Heywood (c. 1572-1650) has a series of plays based on classical mythology called The Golden Age, The Silver Age, The Brazen Age, and The Iron Age.

Shakespeare's seven ages of man are described in As You Like It, II, vii.

Age of Animals. According to an old CELTIC rhyme:

Thrice the age of a dog is that of a horse;
Thrice the age of a horse is that of a man;
Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer;
Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle.

Age of Consent. The age at which a girl's consent to seduction is legal. In English and Scottish law the age is 16.

Age of Discretion. In English law a subject is deemed capable of using his discretion at the age of 14.

Age of Reason, for Roman Catholics the end of the seventh year when they begin to assume moral responsibility, the obligation of confession, etc.

The eighteenth century is also called the Age of Reason as a period of enlightenment when philosophy was in vogue throughout Europe.

Canonical Age. Ages fixed by Canon Law when individuals may undertake various functions, duties, etc. In the CHURCH OF ENGLAND a man may become a deacon at 23, a priest at 24, and a BISHOP at 30. In the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH a novice must be 16, a deacon 22, and a bishop 30. FASTING begins at the age of 21.

Age hoc (a' jē hok). "Attend to this." In sacrifice the Roman crier perpetually repeated these words to arouse attention. Somewhat similar is the frequent use of the exhortation "Let us pray" in the Church of England services.

Agelasta (āj e lās' tā) (Gr. joyless). The stone on which CERES (Demeter) rested when wearied in the search for her daughter, PERSEPHONE.

Agenor (ā jen' or). King of Tyre, son of POSEIDON (Neptune). His descendants Europa, CADMUS, PHOENIX, Cilix, etc., are known as Agenorides.

Aggie Weston's, Aggies. The Royal Sailors' Rest Homes founded in Portsmouth, Chatham, and Devonport by Dame Agnes E. Weston (1840-1918).

Aglaia (ā gli' ā). One of the three GRACES.

Aglaonice (āg lā ō nī' si), the Thessalian, being able to calculate eclipses, claimed power over the MOON and to be able to draw it from heaven. Her vaunting became a laughing-stock, and gave rise to the Greek proverb cast at braggarts, "Yes, as the Moon obeys Aglaonice."

Agnes. A sort of female "VERDANT GREEN", so unsophisticated that she does not even know what love means: from a character in Molière's L'École des Femmes.

Agnes, St. patron saint of young virgins, possibly martyred in the Diocletian persecution (c. 304) at the age of 13. There are various unreliable and conflicting accounts on the manner of her death; some say she was burnt at the stake and others that she was beheaded or stabbed. She vowed that her body was consecrated to Christ and rejected all her suitors. Her festival is on 21 January. Upon St. Agnes's night, says Aubrey in his Miscellanies (1696), you take a row of pins, and pull out every one, one after another. Saying a PATERNOSTER, stick a pin in your sleeve, and you will dream of him or her you shall marry. In Keats' The Eve of St. Agnes, we are told:

how upon St. Agnes' Eve,
Young virgins might have visions of delight,
And soft adorings from their loves receive
Upon the honey'd middle of the night,

If ceremonies due they did aright;
As, supperless to bed they must retire.

Tennyson has a poem called St. Agnes' Eve.

Agnoitæ (äg' nō itz) (Gr. a, not; gignoskein, to know).—(1) Certain 4th-century Eunomian heretics, who maintained that God was not completely omniscient.

(2) A group of 6th-century MONOPHYSITES, who maintained that Christ, by the limitations of his human nature, had incomplete knowledge of both present and future.

Agnostic (Gr. a, not; gignoskein, to know). A term coined by T. H. Huxley in 1869 (with allusion to St. PAUL's mention of an altar "To the Unknown God" in Acts xvii, 23) to indicate the mental attitude of those who withhold their assent from whatever is incapable of proof, e.g. the existence of God, a First Cause, etc. An agnostic simply says "I do not know". See THEIST.

Agnus Bell. See AGNUS DEI.

Agnus-castus. See VITEX.

Agnus Dei (äg' n ūs de' i) (Lamb of God). (1) A title of Jesus; (2) the figure of a lamb bearing a cross or flag, the symbol of Christ; (3) the cake of wax or dough bearing this imprint, distributed by the POPE on the Sunday after EASTER—a relic of the ancient custom of distributing the wax of the Paschal candle, which was stamped with the lamb. (4) That part of the MASS introduced by the ringing of the Agnus bell, beginning with the words, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi (O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world); also part of the Gloria in the English Communion service.

Agonistes (ā gon is' tēz) (Gr. champion). The title of Milton's last poem, Samson Agonistes (1671), simply means "Samson the Champion". Similarly Sweeney Agonistes, a poem by T. S. Eliot (1888-1965).

Agonistics (ā gon is' tiks). A group of roving DONATISTS in Africa in the early 4th century. The name means "Champions" (of Christ). They committed acts of violence and were called Circumcellions by the Catholics because they wandered among the dwellings of the peasants (circum cellas).

Agony column. A column in a newspaper containing advertisements of missing relatives and friends.

Aguecheek. Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a straight-haired country squire, stupid even to silliness, self-conceited, living to eat, and wholly unacquainted with the world of fashion. The character is in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Agur's Wish (ā' gēr) (Prov. xxx, 8). "Give me neither poverty nor riches."

Ahasuerus (á hās ū ēr' ūs). Under this name the Emperor XERXES (485-465 B.C.), husband of Esther, appears in the Biblical books of Ezra and Esther. The Ahasuerus of Daniel has not been identified. It is also traditionally the name of the WANDERING JEW.

Ahithophel (a hith' ō fel), or Achitophel. A treacherous friend and adviser. Ahithophel was David's counsellor, but joined Absalom in revolt. He counselled like "the oracle of God" (II Sam. xvi, 20-23). See ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL.

Ahmed, Prince (a' med), in the ARABIAN NIGHTS, is noted for the tent given him by the fairy Paribanou, which would cover a whole army, but might be carried in one's pocket; and for the apple of Samarkand (see APPLE, PRINCE AHMED'S), which would cure all diseases. Similar qualities to those of the tent are common to many legends. See BAYARD; CARPET; SKIDBLADNIR.

Aholah and Aholibah (á hō' la, a hō lí' bá) (Ezek. xxiii). Personifications of prostitution. Used by the prophet to signify religious adultery or running after false faiths.

Ahriman (a' ri mán). In the dualism of later Zoroastrianism, the spirit of evil, also called Angra Mainyu. He is in eternal conflict with Ahura Mazda or ORMUZD. The spirit of deceit and wickedness was earlier personified as Druj.

Ahura Mazda. See ORMUZD.

Aide-mémoire (Fr. aider, to help; mémoire, memory). A memorandum or reminder. In diplomatic parlance, a memorandum sent by one government through its ambassador to the Foreign Minister of another government summarizing the points he has been instructed to make by word of mouth.

Aide-toi, le Ciel t'aidera (ād twa lé sē el tā dé ra). A line from LA FONTAINE (Fables, vi, 18). Literally "Help yourself, heaven will you". The motto of a French liberal political society founded in 1824 to secure the advancement of the working classes. It helped in bringing about the Revolution of 1830 and was dissolved in 1832. Guizot was at one time its president and Le Globe and Le National its organs.

Aim, To give. To stand aloof. A term in archery, meaning to stand within a suitable distance from the butts, to inform the archers how near their arrows fall to the target.

But, gentle people, give me aim awhile,
For nature puts me to a heavy task;
Stand all aloof.

SHAKESPEARE: Titus Andronicus, V, iii.

Aim-crier. An abettor, one who encourages. In archery the one appointed to cry "aim".

Thou smiling aim-crier at princess' fall,
GERVAIS MARKHAM: English Arcadia (1638).

To cry aim. To applaud, encourage. In archery those chosen to cry "aim" to encourage the archer.

All my neighbours shall cry aim.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, III, ii.

Air. Held by Anaxagoras (c. 500-c. 428 B.C.) to be the primary form of matter and one of the four elements according to Empedocles and ARISTOTLE. See ELEMENT.

Air-brained. A mis-spelling of HARE-BRAINED.

Air-line. Often used in the U.S.A. comparably to the English BEE-LINE, as well as for railways which follow direct routes (e.g., The Seaboard Air Line). Aeroplane companies flying on scheduled routes are also called Air Lines. This has been known to lead to misunderstanding among speculators.

Hot air. See HOT.

The air of the court, the air of gentility; hence to give oneself airs—to assume a manner, appearance, tone, superiority to which one has no real claim.

Aisle sitters. American theatre critics. Where in England aisle is usually restricted to the walks, or passages between the pews of a church, in the U.S.A. it is applied to any kind of gangway in public buildings and vehicles. In a theatre an aisle sitter could escape from a boring play before the end or leave to send copy to his newspaper without disturbing other theatregoers.

Aitch-bone. Corruption of "naitch-bone", i.e. the haunch-bone (Lat. nates). For other instances of the coalescence of the "n" of "an" with an initial vowel (or the coalescence of the "n" with the article), see APRON, NICKNAME.

Ajax (ā jaks). (1) The Greater. A famous hero of the TROJAN WAR. Son of Telamon and King of Salamis, a man of giant stature, daring and slow-witted. In the ODYSSEY, when the armour of ACHILLES was awarded to Odysseus (ULYSSES), as the champion, Ajax killed himself.

(2) The Lesser. In HOMER, son of Oileus, King of Locris, in Greece, and of small stature. In consequence of his attack on PRIAM's daughter CASSANDRA he was drowned by POSEIDON after being shipwrecked.

Akbar (āk' bar). An Arabic title, meaning "Very Great", especially applied to Jelal-ed-din-Mohammed, Akbar Khan, MOGUL emperor of India (1556-1605).

Alabama claims were made by the U.S.A. against Great Britain for losses caused during the CIVIL WAR (1861-5) by British-built Confederate raiders and notably the Alabama. In 1871 an international tribunal awarded the U.S.A. $15,500,000.

Aladdin (à lăd' in), in the ARABIAN NIGHTS, obtains a magic lamp and has a splendid palace built by the genie of the lamp. He marries the daughter of the SULTAN of China, who disposes of the lamp, and his palace is transported to Africa. He subsequently recovers the lamp and returns with both wife and palace to China to live happily for many years.

Aladdin's lamp. The source of wealth and good fortune. After his good luck and marriage Aladdin neglected his lamp and allowed it to rust.

To finish Aladdin's window—i.e. to attempt to complete something begun by a master hand or genius. The palace built by the genie of the lamp had a room with twenty-four windows, all but one being set in precious stones; the last being left for the SULTAN to finish but his resources proved unequal to the task.

Alamo (al' âm o). American cottonwood tree, hence the name Alamo Mission for the Franciscan mission at San Antonio, Texas, which stood in a grove of cottonwood trees. Founded in 1718, it was later used as a fort. During the Texan rebellion against Mexico in 1836 a garrison of 187 Texans, including David CROCKETT, was wiped out by 3,000 Mexicans under Santa Anna, after a thirteen-day siege. "Remember the Alamo" became the war cry with which Sam Houston led the Texans to victory. ALAMO is sometimes called the "THERMOPYLÆ of America" and the buildings are now a national monument.

Alans. Large hunting dogs introduced to Britain from Spain, whither they are said to have been brought by the Alani, a barbarian tribe which entered Spain c. 410. Chaucer in The Knight's Tale describes Lycurgus on his throne guarded by "alaunts, twenty and mo, as grete as any steer". Scott mentions them in The Talisman (ch. vi).

Al Araf (al' â' rāf) (Arab. the partition). In the KORAN, a region between PARADISE and Jahannam (HELL), for those who are neither morally good nor bad, such as infants, lunatics and idiots. Also where those whose good and evil deeds are equally balanced can await their ultimate admission to HEAVEN—a kind of LIMBO.

Alasnam (à lās' nām). In the ARABIAN NIGHTS Alasnam had eight diamond statues, but was required to find a ninth more precious still, to fill the vacant pedestal. The prize was found in the woman who became his wife, at once the most beautiful and perfect of her race.

Alasnam's mirror. The "touchstone of virtue", given to him by one of the genii. If he looked into this mirror and it remained unsullied so would the maiden he had in mind; if it clouded she would prove faithless.

Alastor (à lās' tor). The evil genius of a house; a NEMESIS, the Greek term for an avenging power who visits the sins of the fathers on their children. Shelley has a poem entitled Alastor; or the Spirit of Solitude.

Alauda. A Roman legion raised by Julius CÆSAR in GAUL, so called from the lark's tuft worn on top of their helmets.

Alban, St. (ól' bân). Britain's first martyr, beheaded c. 305 at Verulamium during the Diocletian persecution, for harbouring a Christian priest. The monastery of St. Albans was built by Offa in 795 on the spot where he died. His feast is on 22 June, although the CHURCH OF ENGLAND keeps 17 June. The story is given in the works of GILDAS. Like many other SAINTS he is sometimes represented carrying his head in his hands to signify death by beheading.

Albany, Albainn, or Albin (Celtic alp or ailp, rock or cliff). An ancient name applied to the northern part of Scotland, inhabited by PICTS, and called "Caledonia" by the Romans. The name Albany survives in Breadalbane, the hilly country of Albainn, i.e. western Perthshire.

In Spenser's Faerie Queene (II, x, 14, etc.) northern Britain is called Albania.

Also the name of a famous block of bachelors' chambers converted from the Duke of York's house in 1803 and adjoining Burlington House, PICCADILLY, where Macaulay wrote his History of England. BYRON and Lord Lytton also lived there. The Albany is no longer exclusively restricted to bachelors.

Albatross. The largest of web-footed birds, called the Cape Sheep by sailors from its frequenting the CAPE of Good Hope. It was said to sleep in the air without any apparent motion of its wings, and sailors say that to shoot one is fatal. See ANCIENT MARINER.

Alberich. In Scandinavian mythology, the all-powerful King of the dwarfs. In Wagner's version of the NIBELUNGENLIED he appears as a hideous GNOME and steals the magic GOLD guarded by the Rhine Maidens but is later captured by the gods, and forced to give up all he has in return for freedom.

Albert, An. A watch-chain across the waistcoat from one pocket to another or to a buttonhole; so called from Albert, Prince Consort, who set the fashion. He was presented with such a chain by the jewellers of Birmingham, when visiting the town in 1849.

Albert the Bad (d. 1314). Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen.

Albert the Good. The Prince Consort (1819-1861).

Beyond all titles, and a household name, Hereafter, thro' all times, Albert the Good.

TENNYSON: Dedication to Idylls of the King.

Albert the Great. (1) Albertus Magnus (c. 1206-1280), Albert of Cologne, famous DOMINICAN scholastic philosopher, also called doctor universalis.

(2) A nickname, by analogy with Albert the Good, given to Albert Chevalier (1861-1923), the coster's LAUREATE and great favourite of the late Victorian and Edwardian MUSIC HALLS. Among the most famous of his songs are Knock'd'em in the Old Kent Road and My Old Dutch. See DUTCH and KNOCK.

Albigenses (äl bi jen' sēs). A common name for various 12th- and 13th-century MANICHEAN sects in southern France and northern Italy; so called from the city of Albi in LANGUEDOC, where their persecution began. Violent opponents of the CATHOLIC Church, Innocent III proclaimed a CRUSADE against them in 1208 and they were finally exterminated by the end of the 14th century. They were also called Cathari and Bulgarians.

Albin. See ALBANY.

Albino (al bē' nō) (Lat. albus, white). This term denoting congenital absence of colouring pigment in human beings, animals, etc. is occasionally used figuratively. Thus Oliver Wendell Holmes, in The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (ch. viii), speaks of Kirke White as one of the "sweet albino poets", whose "plaintive song" he admires; apparently implying some deficiency of virility and possibly playing upon the name.

Albion. An ancient and poetical name for Great Britain, probably from the white (Lat. albus) cliffs that face GAUL, but possibly from the CELTIC alp. Albion or ALBANY originally may have been the Celtic name of all Great Britain.

One legend is that a giant son of NEPTUNE, named Albion, discovered the country and ruled over it for forty-four years. Another such derivation is that the fifty daughters of the King of Syria (the eldest of whom was named Albia), were all married on the same day, and murdered their husbands on their wedding night. They were set adrift in a ship as punishment and eventually reached this western isle where they duly married natives.

In POLY-OLBION (1613) Michael Drayton says that Albion came from ROME and was the first Christian martyr in Britain.

Although the phrase perfidè Albion is attributed to NAPOLEON, the sentiment is much older, for Bossuet (1627-1704) wrote: "L'Angleterre, ah! la perfidè Angleterre".

New Albion. The name under which Sir Francis Drake annexed California in 1579, during his voyage of circumnavigation. He recorded this act by setting up a brass plate. Such a plate was found near San Francisco in 1937.

Al Borak. See BORAK.

Alcaic Verse (äl kâ' ik) or Alcaics. A Greek and Latin lyrical metre so called from Alcæus (7th century B.C.) who supposedly invented it.

Alcantara, Order of (äl kân' tá rá). A military and religious order, developing from the 12th-century order of St. Julian de Pereiro, founded to combat the MOORS in Spain, and following the CISTERCIAN rule. Charged with the defence of Alcantara since the early 13th century, it became a lay order in the mid-16th century and a civil and military decoration after 1875.

Alceste (äl sest'). The hero of Molière's Misanthrope, not unlike Shakespeare's character of Timon, and taken by Wycherley for the model of his Manly.

Alchemilla (äl kē mil' á). A genus of plants of the rose family; so called because alchemists collected the dew of its leaves for their operations. Also called "Lady's Mantle", from the Virgin MARY, to whom the plant was dedicated.

Alchemy (äl' kē mi). The derivation of this word is obscure: al is the Arabic article the, and kimia the Arabic form of the Greek chemeia, which seems to have meant "Egyptian art"; hence "the art of the Egyptians". Its main objects were the transmutation of baser metals into gold, and the search for the PHILOSOPHER'S STONE, the universal solvent or ALKAHEST, the PANACEA, and the ELIXIR OF LIFE. It was the forerunner of the science of chemistry. Ben Jonson wrote a play called The Alchemist (1610).

Alcimedon

Alcimedon (äl sim' é don). A generic name for a first-rate carver in wood.

Pocula ponam

Fagina, coelatum divini opus Alcimedontis.

VIRGIL: Eclogue III, 36.

Alcina (äl sé' ná). In Ariosto's ORLANDO FURIOSO (1516) the personification of carnal pleasure; the CIRCE of fable and Labe of the Arabians. Handel's opera Alcina appeared in 1735.

Alcinoo poma dare (äl sin' ö ö pö' má da' re) (to give apples to Alcinoos). "To carry COALS to Newcastle." The gardens of Alcinoos, legendary king of the Phæacians, by whom ULYSSES was entertained, were famous for their fruits.

Alcmena (älk mē' ná). In Greek mythology, daughter of Electryon (King of Mycenæ), wife of AMPHITRYON, and mother (by ZEUS) of HERCULES. The legend is that at the conception of Hercules, Zeus (in the guise of Amphitryon), for additional pleasure with Alcmena, made the night the length of three ordinary nights.

Alcofribas Nasier (äl ko' fre bãs nã' syer). The anagrammatic pseudonym used by Rabelais under which the first two books of GARGANTUA and PANTAGRUEL appeared.

Aldebaran (äl deb' á rãn) (Arab. al, the; davaran, the follower, because its rising follows that of the PLEIADES). A red star of the first magnitude, α Tauri, it forms the bull's eye in the constellation of TAURUS.

Aldgate Pump, A draught on. A worthless cheque or bill. The pun is on the word "draught", which may mean either an order on a bank or a drink.

Aldine Editions. Internationally famous and reliable octavo editions of the Greek and Latin classics printed and published at Venice by the firm founded by Aldus Manutius in 1490. The type called italics, once called Aldine, was devised by his type-designer, Francesco Griffo. The founder's grandson (Aldus, the Younger) closed the business on taking charge of the VATICAN press in 1590.

Ale is the Old English alu, connected with the Scandinavian öl. Beer is the Old English beor connected with the German bier. A beverage made from barley is mentioned by Tacitus (c. 55-120?) and even Herodotus (5th century B.C.). Ale in Britain is of pre-Roman origin and was a malt brew without hops. Hopped or bitter beer was introduced by the Flemings in the 15th century. Fuggles hops are now used for most beers and goldings for pale ales—ale and beer now being largely synonymous terms, although the word ale is not used for the thick black beers (STOUT and porter) which became so popular in the 18th century. In some areas ale is used for the stronger malt liquors and beer for the weaker, in others the terms are reversed. See also AUDIT-ALE, CHURCH-ALE, ENTIRE.

Aleberry. A corruption of ale-bree. A drink made of hot ale, spice, sugar and toast. Burns speaks of the barley-bree (A.S. briw, broth).

Ale-dagger. A dagger used in self-defence in ale-house brawls.

He that drinks with cutters must not be without his ale-dagger.

LYLY?: Pappe with a Hatchet (1589).

Ale-draper. The keeper of an ale-house. Ale-dravery, the selling of ale, etc.

No other occupation have I but to be an ale-draper.

CHEVILE: Kind Harts Dreame (1593).

Ale-knight. A tippler, a sot.

Ale-silver. Formerly, the annual fee paid to the Lord MAYOR of London for the privilege of selling ale within the city.

Ale-stake, or ale-pole. The pole set up before an ale-house by way of a sign, often surmounted by a bush or garland. Thus, Chaucer says of the Sompnour:

A garland hadde he sette upon his hede
As gret as it were for an ale-stake.

Canterbury Tales, Prologue, 666.

Ale-wife. The landlady of an alehouse. In America a fish of the herring family, possibly from supposed resemblance to a stout landlady; or from a corruption of aloofe, a North American Indian name; or from the French alose, a shad.

Alecto (á lek' tō). In Greek mythology "she who rests not", one of the three ERINYES, goddesses of vengeance, the Latin FURIES.

Alectorian Stone (á lek tōr' i àn) (Gr. alector, a cock). A stone, fabled to be of talismanic power, found in the stomach of cocks. Those who possess one are strong, brave, and wealthy. MILO of Crotona owed his strength to one.

Alectryomancy (á lek' tri ö män si). Divination by a cock. Draw a circle, and write in succession round it the letters of the alphabet, on each of which lay a grain of corn. Then put a cock in the centre of the circle, and watch what grains he eats. The letters will prognosticate the answer. Libanus and Jamblicus thus discovered who was to succeed the emperor Valens. The cock ate the grains over the letters t, h, e, o, d = Theod (orus).

Alexander. So PARIS, son of PRIAM, was called by the shepherds who brought him up.

Alexander the Great. Alexander III of Macedon (356–323 B.C.).

Alexander and the Robber. The pirate Diomedes, having been captured, was asked by Alexander how he dared to molest the seas. "How darest thou molest the earth?" was the reply. "Because I am the master of a single galley I am termed a robber; but you who oppress the world with huge squadrons are called a king." Alexander was so struck by this reasoning that he made Diomedes a rich prince, and a dispenser of justice. See GESTA ROMANORUM, Tale cxlvi.

Only two Alexanders. Alexander said, "There are but two Alexanders—the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable painting of the hero by Apelles."

The continence of Alexander. Having won the battle of Issus (333 B.C.), the family of Darius III fell into his hand; but he treated the women with the greatest decorum. His continence drew respect from Darius. See CONTINENCE.

You are thinking of Parmenio and I of Alexander.—i.e. you are thinking of what you ought to receive, and I what I ought to give; you are thinking of those castigated or rewarded, but I of my position, and what reward is consistent with my rank. The allusion is to the tale that Alexander said to Parmenio, "I consider not what Parmenio should receive, but what Alexander should give."

Alexander of the North. The war-loving Charles XII of Sweden (1682–1718), whose army was annihilated by Peter the Great at Pultawa (1709).

Alexander the Corrector. The self-assumed nickname of Alexander Cruden (1701–1770), bookseller and compiler of the Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1737). Several times confined to a lunatic asylum, his activities as a corrector of morals were many and varied. He carried a damped sponge to wipe out the obscene and profane scrawls found on walls and buildings. See GRAFFITTI.

Alexander's beard. A beardless, smooth chin—an AMAZONIAN CHIN.

I like this trustie glasse of Steele . . .
Wherein I see a Sampson's grim regarde
Disgraced yet with Alexander's bearde.

GASCOIGNE: The Steele Glas (1576).

Alexandra Day. A day in June when rose emblems are sold for the hospital fund inaugurated in 1912 by Queen Alexandra (1844–1925), Danish consort of Edward VII, to celebrate the fiftieth year of her residence in England.

Alexandra limp. In the 1860s Queen Alexandra (then Princess of Wales), after a minor accident, developed a very slight limp, which was imitated in sycophantic fashion by many women about the court. Hence the description "Alexandra limp".

Alexandrian. Anything from the East was so called by the old writers because Alexandria was the depot from which Eastern goods reached Europe. Thus ARIOSTO says:

Reclined on Alexandrian carpets (i.e. Persian).
Orlando Furioso, X, 37.

Alexandrian Codex. A Greek MS. of the Scriptures, probably of the 5th century, written in UNCIALS on parchment, and supposed to have originated at Alexandria. It was presented to Charles I in 1628 by the PATRIARCH of Constantinople, and was placed in the BRITISH MUSEUM on its foundation.

Alexandrian Library. See LIBRARY.

Alexandrian School. An academy of learning founded about 310 B.C. at Alexandria by Ptolemy I (Soter) and Demetrius of Phaleron, especially noted for its literary scholars and mathematicians. Of the former the most noted were Aristarchus (c. 217–145 B.C.), Eratosthenes (c. 275–194 B.C.), and Harpocration (2nd century A.D.); and of its mathematicians EUCLID (fl.c. 300 B.C.), the author of the Elements, the celebrated treatise on geometry, and Claudius Ptolemæus (2nd century A.D.), the astronomer. Alexandria remained a centre of learning until 640 A.D. when the library was, supposedly, finally destroyed.

Alexandrine. In prosody, an IAMBIC or trochaic line of twelve syllables or six feet with, usually, a caesura (break) at the sixth syllable. So called either from the 12th-century French metrical romance, Li Romans d'Alexandre (commenced by Lambert-li-Cort and continued by Alexandre de Bernay), or from the old Castilian verse chronicle, Poema de Alexandro Magno, both of which are written in this metre. Pope sometimes used it but wrote:

A needless Alexandrine ends the song
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.

Essay on Criticism (1709), ii, 356.

Alexandrine Age. When the Alexandrine school was the centre of literature, science and philosophy.

Alexandrine Philosophy. A school of philosophy which developed at Alexandria in the early centuries of the Christian era. It gave rise to Gnosticism and Neoplatonism and attempted to reconcile Christianity and Greek philosophy.

Alexis, St. Patron saint of hermits and beggars. According to the story in the GESTA ROMANORUM (Tale xv) he lived on his father's estate as a hermit until he died, but was never recognized.

Alfadir (al fa' der) (father of all). In Scandinavian mythology, one of the epithets of ODIN.

Alfana. See HORSE.

Alfar. The elves of northern mythology. In German legend the dockalfar frequent dark underground caverns and mines. The O.E. Ælfric means "ruler of the elves".

Alfonsin, Alfonsine Tables. See ALPHONSIN, etc.

Alfred the Great (849-899), King of WESSEX, especially noted for his resistance to the Danish invaders who in the winter of 877-8 occupied much of Wessex. Alfred withdrew to his base at Athelney and it is to this period that the story of Alfred and the cakes belongs—the first known version probably dating from the 11th/12th century. The story is that the king, unrecognized, took refuge in a cowherd's hut. He was sitting by the fire seeing to his equipment and allowed the housewife's loaves to burn. For this he was vigorously scolded. The story is not found in Asser's Life of Alfred (written in 893). After the defeat of the Danes Alfred commanded the building of a monastery at Athelney.

The beautiful gold enamelled relic, known as Alfred's Jewel, and bearing his name, was dug up at Athelney in 1693. It is now in the ASHMOLEAN MUSEUM, Oxford.

Alfred's scholars. The name given to the group of learned men which Alfred the Great gathered around him in his devoted efforts to revive learning in WESSEX. Chief among them were the Mercian clerics Plegmund, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, Werferth, Bishop of Worcester, Werwulth and Athelstan; Grimbold of St. Omer; John, a continental Saxon; and Asser, priest of St. David's.

Algarsife (äl' gar sif). In Chaucer's unfinished Squire's Tale, son of CAMBUSCAN, and brother of Camballo, who "won Theodora to wife".

This noble kyng, this Tartre Cambyuscan,
Hadde two sones on Elpheta his wyf,
Of which the eldest sone highte Algarsyf,
That oother sone was cleped Camballo.
A doghter hadde this worthy kyng also
That yongest was and highte Canacee.

Hence the reference in Milton's II Penseroso:

Or call up him that left half told
The story of Cambuscan bold
Of Camball and of Algarsife,
And who had Canace to wife.

Alhambra (äl häm' brä) (Arab. Kal'-at al hamra, the red castle). The citadel and palace built at Granada by the Moorish kings in the 13th century. Also the name of a famous theatre and music hall in Leicester Square, built in Moorish style, and demolished in 1936. From 1854 to 1858 it was called the PANOPTICON.

Ali (a' lē). MOHAMMED's cousin and son-in-law, famed among Persians for the beauty of his eyes, hence Ayn Hali (eyes of Ali) as the highest expression for beauty.

Ali Baba (ä' lē ba' ba). The hero of a story in the ARABIAN NIGHTS ENTERTAINMENTS, who sees a band of robbers enter a cave by means of the magic password "Open SESAME". When they have gone away he enters the cave, loads his ass with treasure and returns home. The Forty Thieves discover that Ali Baba has learned their secret and resolve to kill him, but they are finally outwitted by the slave-girl MORGIANA.

Alias (ä' li äs). "You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot," said to one who passes under many names. The phrase is from Gay's Beggar's Opera: Robin of Bagshot, one of Macheath's gang, was alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Carbuncle, alias Bob Booty and intended for Sir Robert Walpole.

Alibi (ä' li bi) (Lat. elsewhere). A plea of having been elsewhere at a time that an offence is alleged to have been committed. A clock which strikes an hour, while the hands point to a different time, has been humorously called an alibi clock. A modern usage of the word is for an excuse or pretext.

Aliboron. The name of a jackass in LA FONTAINE's Fables; hence Maitre Aliboron = Mr. Jackass.

Alice in Wonderland. Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865) and Through the Looking Glass (1871), widely read children's classics, originally illustrated by Sir John Tenniel, were written by C. L. Dodgson, an Oxford mathematician, under the pseudonym of Lewis Carroll. The original of Alice was Alice Liddell, daughter of Dean Liddell, famous as joint author of Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon. The Alice stories are noted for their whimsical humour and the "non-sense" verse included in them.

Alice, The. The town of Alice Springs

Northern Territory, Australia, "the capital of the centre". Presumably named from Lady Alice Todd, wife of Sir Charles Todd, who supervised the building of the Overland Telegraph in the 1870s. It was formerly called Stuart after the explorer John McDouall Stuart. See AFGHAN.

It's railroad, of course, for trucking cattle down to Adelaide—that's one thing.—But it's a go-ahead place is Alice; all sorts of things go on there.

NEVIL SHUTE: A Town Like Alice, Ch. vi.

Alien priory. A priory which was dependent upon a monastery in a foreign country.

Alifanfaron (äl i fan' fá ron). Don QUIXOTE attacked a flock of sheep, and declared them to be the army of the giant Alifanfaron. Similarly AJAX, in a fit of madness, fell upon a flock of sheep, mistaking them for the sons of Atreus.

Al Kadr (äl käd'r) (the divine decree). A particular night in the month RAMADAN, when Mohammedans say that angels descend to earth and GABRIEL reveals to man the decrees of God.—Al Koran, ch. xviii.

Alkahest (äl' ká hest). A sham-Arabic word attributed to PARACELUS. See ALCHEMY.

All abroad. To be confused in mind, or wide of the mark.

All adrift. See ADRIFT.

All and Some. An old expression meaning "one and all", confused sometimes with "all and sum", meaning the whole total.

They that wolde nought Crystene become,
Richard lect sleen hem alle and some.

Cœur de Lion. 14th cent.

All Fool's Day. (1 April). See APRIL FOOL.

All Fours. A game of cards; so called from the four points at stake, viz. High, Low, Jack, and Game.

To go on all fours is to crawl about on all four limbs like a quadruped or an infant. The phrase used to be all four, as in Lev. xi, 42, "whatsoever goeth upon all four".

It does not go on all fours means it does not suit in every particular; it limps like a lame quadruped. Thus the Latin saying, Omnis comparatio claudicat (all similes limp) was translated by Macaulay as "No simile can go on all fours".

All-Hallows' Day. All Saints' Day (1 November), "hallows" being the Old English halig, a holy (man), a saint. Pope Boniface IV converted the PANTHEON at Rome into a Christian church, dedicated to all the martyrs, in 610. The festival of All Saints, originally held on 1 May, was changed to 1 November in 834.

All-Hallows' Eve or Hallowe'en (31 October), also called "NUTCRACK NIGHT" and "Holy Eve", is associated with many ancient customs including bobbing for apples (see BOB), cracking nuts (mentioned in The Vicar of Wakefield), finding one's lover by various rites, etc. Burns portrays the Scottish customs in his poem Hallowe'en, and Scottish tradition says that those born on HALLOWE'EN have the gift of second sight. Thus Mary Avenel, in Scott's The Monastery (1820), is made to see the WHITE LADY.

All-Hallows Summer. Another name for St. Martin's SUMMER or an INDIAN SUMMER, so called because it set in about All-Hallows; similarly there is a St. Luke's Summer (from 18 October).

Farewell, thou latter spring! farewell, All-hallow Summer!

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV Part I, I, ii.

All hands and the cook (western U.S.A.). A state of total emergency when the herds were so restless that everyone, including the sacrosanct cook, had to ride to quieten them down.

All Heal. The common Valerian, formerly supposed to have many medicinal virtues, also called Hercules Wound-wort, because HERCULES is supposed to have learned its virtues from CHIRON. Spikenard, mentioned in the BIBLE (Mark xiv, 3), and extracted from a Himalayan member of the family, was used in perfumes by the ancient Egyptians, Greeks and Romans.

All in. Completely exhausted.

All my eye and Betty Martin. All nonsense, BOSH, rubbish. A curious phrase of uncertain origin. A common explanation was that it was a British soldiers' or sailors' rendering of "O mihi, beate Martine" an invocation to ST. MARTIN heard abroad. "All my eye" is the older saying:

That's all my eye, the King only can pardon, as the law says.

GOLDSMITH: The Good Natur'd Man (1767).

All of. Quite as much or possibly more than, for example: "It is all of fifty miles from London to Brighton".

All-overish. Not to be at one's best, beset with lassitude and indifference as before the onset of an illness.

All Saints. See ALL HALLOWS.

All serene (Sp. sereno). In Spain the word was used by night watchmen to indicate that the weather was fine and is equivalent to our "All's well". It was a popular catch-phrase from the late 19th century.

All ship-shape and Bristol fashion. Everything stowed and the ship in every way ready for sea, thus "to be completely organized and ready". It derives from the port of Bristol's reputation for efficiency in the days of sail.

All Sir Garnet, meaning "everything is as it should be" began as an army phrase of the 1880s arising from Sir Garnet Wolseley's skilfully organized operations in Egypt.

All Souls College, Oxford, was founded in 1437 by Henry Chichele, Archbishop of Canterbury, as a CHANTRY, where masses were to be said for the souls of those killed or who might be killed in the French wars of Henry V and Henry VI. It has a Warden and fifty fellows (few of whom are in residence) and is unique in having no undergraduates.

All Souls' Day (2 November). The day which Roman Catholics devote to prayer and almsgiving on behalf of the faithful departed. According to tradition, a pilgrim returning from the HOLY LAND took refuge on a rocky island during a storm. There he met a hermit, who told him that among the cliffs was an opening to the infernal regions, through which flames ascended, and where the groans of the tormented were distinctly audible. The pilgrim told Odilo, abbot of Cluny, who appointed the day following (2 November 998) to be set apart for the benefit of those souls in PURGATORY.

All Souls' Parish Magazine. The Times was so nicknamed during the editorship (1923-1941) of G. G. Dawson, Fellow of All Souls. He and some of his associates, who were also fellows of the college, frequently met there for discussions.

All standing. A nautical expression meaning "fully equipped", "all sails set". To be brought up all standing is to be suddenly checked when unprepared, or to be taken by surprise.

To turn in all standing is to go to one's hammock, bunk or bed fully dressed.

All Stuarts are not sib (O.E. gesibb, related), i.e. related to the Royal Family. An old Scottish proverb rebuking those who, sharing a surname with a famous person, advance false claims of kinship to inflate their self-esteem.

All the Talents. The unsuitable name given to Lord Grenville's ministry (1806-7) formed on the death of the younger Pitt. It was an attempt at a broadly-based administration but largely consisted of the followers of Charles James Fox, who was Foreign Secretary. Its one great measure was the abolition of the slave trade in 1807.

All this for a song! Said to be Burghley's remark when Queen Elizabeth I ordered him to give £100 to Spenser as a royal gratuity. See under SONG.

All to break. "And a certain woman cast a piece of millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to break his skull" (Judges ix, 53). This does not mean for the sake of breaking his skull but that she wholly smashed his skull. The to, signifying in twain, is used as an intensifying prefix (as is zer in German), the all being a natural addition. Compare Chaucer's

All is to-brosten [broken] thilke regioun.

Knight's Tale, 1899.

Allah (äl' ä). The Arabic name of the Supreme Being (al, the, ilah, god). The Mohammedan war-cry Allah il Allah is a form of la illah illa allah "there is no God but the God"—the first clause of their confession of faith. Allah akbar means "God is most mighty".

Allan-a-Dale. A minstrel in the ROBIN HOOD ballads who also appears in Scott's Ivanhoe. Robin Hood helped him to carry off his bride when she was on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

Alleluiah. See HALLELUJAH.

Alley, or Ally. A choice, large playing-marble made of stone or alabaster (from which it takes its name). The alley tor (taw) beloved of Master Bardell (Pickwick Papers, xxxiv) was a special alley that had won many taws or games. Also in Australia, a group of gamblers, or their den.

Alley, Right up one's. A variation of right up one's street, meaning some kind of activity in which one is specially skilled or particularly well informed. Current since the early 19th century.

Alley, The. An old name for Change Alley in the City of London, where dealings in the public funds, etc. used to take place.

Alley up. In Australia, to pay up one's debts.

Alliensis, Dies (äl i en' sis, di' éz). The day when the Romans were cut to pieces by the Gauls (390 B.C.) near the banks of the river Allia. It was ever after held to be a DIES NEFASTUS, or unlucky day.

Alligator. When the Spaniards first saw this reptile in the New World, they called it el lagarto (the lizard). In American slang alligator has several figurative meanings, among them "a Mississippi River keel-boat sailor", derived from the real or supposed battles of early boatmen with alligators; hence it is a symbol of manliness.

Alligator Pear. The name given to the fruit of the West Indian tree. Persea gratissima (also called avocado or agna- cate). It is a corruption of the Carib avouacate, called by the Spanish discoverers avocado or avigato, or of the Aztec ahuacath, which was transmitted through the Spanish aguacete.

Alliteration. The rhetorical device of commencing adjacent accented syllables with the same letter or sound, as ridiculed by Quince in A Midsummer Night's Dream (V, i):

Whereat with blade, with bloody blameful blade,
He bravely broach'd his boiling bloody breast.

Alliteration was a SINE QUA NON in Old and Middle English poetry, and is frequently used in modern poetry with great effect, as in Coleridge's Ancient Mariner:

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free.

Many fantastic examples of excessive alliteration are extant (see AMPHIGOURI). Henry Harder composed a poem of 100 lines in Latin hexameters on cats, each word beginning with c, called Canum cum Catis certamen carmine compositum currente calamo C Catulli Canini.

Thomas Tusser (1524-1580) has a rhyming poem of twelve lines, every word of which begins with a t; and in the 1890s a Serenade of twenty-eight lines was published "sung in M flat by Major Marmaduke Muttinhead to Mademoiselle Madeline Mendoza Marriott", which contained only one word not beginning with M—in the line "Meet me by moonlight, marry me". The alliterative alphabetic poem beginning:

An Austrian army awfully arrayed
Boldly by battery besieged Belgrade;
Cossack commanders, cannonading come,
Dealing destruction's devastating doom;

was published in The Trifler (7 May 1817), ascribed to the Rev. B. Poulter, later revised by Alaric A. Watts.

Ally Pally. A familiar and affectionate name for the Alexandra Palace in North London, first opened in 1863 but burnt down and rebuilt in 1873. A popular amusement centre like the CRYSTAL PALACE, it is now partly used as a broadcasting and television centre.

Alma (āl' mā) (Ital. soul, spirit, essence). In Matthew Prior's poem Alma, or The Progress of the Mind, the name typifies the mind or guiding principles of man. Alma is queen of "Body Castle", and is beset by a rabble rout of evil desires, foul imaginations and silly conceits for seven years. In Spenser's Faerie Queene (II, ix-xi) Alma typifies the soul. She is mistress of the House of Temperance, and there entertains Prince Arthur and Sir Guyon.

Alma Mater (Lat. bounteous mother).

A collegian so calls his university. Also applied to one's school and other "fostering mothers".

You might divert yourself, too, with Alma Mater, the Church.

HORACE WALPOLE: Letters (1778).

Almack's. A suite of assembly rooms in King Street, St. James's (WESTMINSTER) built in 1765 by William Macall, a Scotsman, who inverted his name to avoid prejudice, and who had previously founded the club now known as Brooks's. Balls, presided over by a committee of ladies of the highest rank, were held there; and to be admitted was almost as great a distinction as being presented at Court. After 1840 they became known as Willis's Rooms, after the then proprietor, and were largely used for dinners. They were closed in 1890 and destroyed in an air raid in 1941.

Almagest (āl' mā jest). The English form of the Arabic name (al Majisti) given to Ptolemy's Mathematike syntaxis, his classic astronomical treatise in thirteen books, of the mid-2nd century. An Arabic translation was made about 820. In the third book the length of the year was first fixed at 365½ days. His geocentric astronomy lasted until the introduction of the COPERNICAN SYSTEM.

Almanac. A mediæval Latin word of obscure origin for a calendar of days and months with astronomical data, etc.

A calendar, a calendar! look in the almanac; find out moonshine, find out moonshine.

SHAKESPEARE: A Midsummer Night's Dream III, i.

Some early almanacs before the invention of printing are:

By Solomon Jarchi	in and after 1150
Peter de Dacia	about 1307
Walter de Elvendene	1327
John Somers, Oxford	1380
Nicholas de Lynna	1386
Purbach	1150-1461

Examples after the invention of printing are:

By Regiomontanus at Nuremberg	1474
Zainer at Ulm	1478
Richard Pynson
(Shepherd's Kalendar)	1497
Stoffer at Venice	1499
Poor Robin's Almanac (g.v.)	1652
Francis Moore's Almanack	1698-1713
Poor Richard's Almanack
(U.S.A.)	1732-1757
Almanach de Gotha	1764-1944
(Successively suppressed by Hitler, Stalin and Adenauer)
Whitaker's Almanack	from 1869

Almanzor (āl' mān' zor). The word, derived from the Arabic, means "the invincible" and was adopted as a title by several MOSLEM rulers, notably the second Abasside Caliph Abu Jafar Abdullah (712-775), who founded Baghdad.

The kingdoms of Almanzor, Fez and Sus, Morocco, and Algiers, and Tremisen.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, XI, 403.

One of the characters in Dryden's Conquest of Granada (1672) is an Almanzor; and it is also the name of one of the lackeys in Molière's Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Almesbury. It was in a sanctuary at Almesbury that Queen GUENEVERE according to Malory, took refuge, after her adulterous passion for LANCELOT was revealed to King ARTHUR. Here she died; but her body was buried at GLASTONBURY.

Almighty Dollar. Washington Irving seems to have first used this expression:

The almighty dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout our land . . .
Wolfert's Roost, Creole Village, p. 40 (1837).

Ben Jonson (?1573-1637) in his Epistle to Elizabeth, Countess of Rutland, speaks of "almighty gold".

Almonry. The place where the almoner resides. In monasteries, one-tenth of the income was distributed to the poor by the almoner. Almonry is from the Latin elemosynarium, a place for alms but the word became confused with ambry, thus "Ambry Close" in WESTMINSTER used to be called "Almonry Close".

The place wherein this chapel or almshouse stands was called the "Elemosinary" or Almonry, now corrupted into Ambrey, for that the alms of the Abbey are there distributed to the poor.

STOW: Survey of London (1598).

Alms (amz) (O.E. ælmysse, ultimately from Latin elemosina from Greek eleemosyne, compassion), gifts to the poor. It is a singular word which, like riches (from Fr. richesse), has by usage become plural. In the BIBLE we have "(he) asked an alms" (Acts iii, 3), but Dryden gives us "alms are but the vehicles of prayer" (The Hind and the Panther, iii, 106), 1687.

Alms Basket (in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, V, i). To live on the alms basket. To live on charity.

Alms-drink. Leavings; the liquor which a drinker finds too much, and therefore hands to another. See Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, II, vii.

Almshouse. A house or group of dwellings built and endowed for the accommodation of the poor and aged.

Alms-man. One who lives on alms.

Alnaschar's Dream. Counting your chickens before they are hatched. In the ARABIAN NIGHTS, Alnaschar, the Talkative Barber's fifth (and deaf) brother, spent all his money on a basket of glassware, on which he was to make a profit which was to be invested to make more, and so on until he grew rich enough to marry the VIZIER's daughter. Being angry with his imaginary wife he gave a kick, overturned his basket and broke all his wares.

A.L.O.E. These initials represent A Lady of England, the pseudonym of Charlotte Maria Tucker (1821-1893), the author of popular tales and allegories for children.

Aloe (Gr. aloe). A genus of very bitter plants of the family Liliaceæ; hence the line in Juvenal's sixth satire (181), Plus aloes quam mellis habet, "He has in him more bitter than sweets", said of a writer with a sarcastic pen. The French say, "La côte d'Adam contient plus d'aloès que de miel", where côte d'Adam means woman or one's wife.

Alombrados. See ALUMBRADO; ILLUMINATI.

Alonzo of Aguilar. When Fernando, King of Aragon, was laying siege to Granada in 1501, he asked who would undertake to plant his banner on the heights. Alonzo, "the lowmost of the dons", undertook the task but was cut down by the MOORS. His body was exposed in the wood of Oxijera and the Moorish damsels, struck with its beauty, buried it near the brook of Alpuxarra. The incident is the subject of a number of ballads.

À Poutrance (a loo' trons). To the uttermost, to the death. An incorrect English form of the French à outrance.

Alpha (äl' fä). "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last" (Rev. i, 11). Alpha (A) is the first and Omega (Ω) the last letter of the Greek alphabet. See TAU.

Alphabet. Compounded from alpha and beta, the first two letters of the Greek alphabet. Ezra vii, 21 contains all the letters of the English alphabet except j.

The number of letters in an alphabet varies in different languages. Although the English alphabet is capable of innumerable combinations and permutations, we have no means of differentiating our vowel sounds; take a, we have fate, fat, Thames, war, orange, ware, abide, calm, swan, etc. So with e, we have era, the, there, prey, met, England, sew, herb, clerk, etc. The other vowels are equally indefinite. See LETTER.

Alpheus and Arethusa (äl fē' us, äre thū' za). Greek legend says that the river-god Alpheus fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, who fled from him in affright to Ortygia, an island near Syracuse, where ARTEMIS changed her into a fountain. Alpheus flowed under the sea from Peloponnesus to rise in Ortygia and so unite with his beloved. The myth seems to derive from the fact that the Alpheus, in places, does flow underground.

Alphonsin (äl fon' sin). An old surgical instrument for extracting shot from wounds named after Alphonso Ferri, a surgeon of Naples, who invented it in 1552.

Alphonsine Tables. Astronomical tables completed in 1252 by a group of Jewish, Arabian and Christian astronomers under the patronage of Alphonso X of Castile.

Alpine Race. Another name for the broad-headed CELTIC Race, because of its distribution in the mountainous regions from Armenia to the Pyrenees. They were a midway race between the Scandinavian Nordics and the dark Mediterranean folk. The LA TÈNE period (500 B.C.—? A.D.) witnessed the zenith of their culture.

Alruna-wife, An (äl roo' ná). The Alrunes were the LARES or PENATES of the ancient Germans; and an Alruna-wife, the household goddess.

She looked as fair as the sun, and talked like an Alruna-wife.

KINGSLEY: Hypatia (1853), ch. xii.

Alsatia (äl sä' shá). The Whitefriars district of London, which retained privileges derived from being a converted SANCTUARY until 1697, and was the haunt of debtors and law-breakers. Bounded on the north and south by FLEET STREET and the THAMES, on the east and west by the Fleet river (now New Bridge Street) and the TEMPLE, it was probably named after Alsace (Lat. Alsatia), which was for centuries a disputed frontier and refuge of the disaffected. This rookery is described in Shadwell's Squire of Alsatia (1688), from which Scott borrowed freely when describing this precinct in The Fortunes of Nigel (1822), as did Leigh Hunt in The Town (1848).

Al-Sirat (Arab. the path). In Mohammedan mythology, the bridge leading to PARADISE; a bridge over mid-hell, no wider than the edge of a sword, across which all who enter heaven must pass.

Also ran, An. In horse-racing this refers to a runner who fails to come in among the first three, hence, metaphorically, it denotes one who has failed to make his mark or to distinguish himself.

Altar (Lat. altus, high). The block or table used for religious sacrifice. In Protestant churches the term is applied to the Communion Table.

Led to the altar, i.e. married, said of a woman, who as a bride is led up to the altar-rail, where marriages are solemnized.

Alter ego (äl' ter eg' ö) (Lat. other I, other self). One's double, one's intimate and thoroughly trusted friend; one who has full power so act for another. Cp. ONE'S SECOND SELF (see SECOND).

Althæa's Brand (äl' thæ á), a fatal contingency. Althæa's son MELEAGER was to live just so long as a log of wood, then on the fire, remained unconsumed, so she snatched it from the fire. Years later, to avenge her brothers (slain by Meleager) she threw the brand into the fire, and her son died as it was consumed (Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii).

As did the fatal brand Althæa burned.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI Part II, I, i.

Althea. The divine Althea of Richard Lovelace (1618–1658) was Lucy Sacheverell, also called by the poet "Lucasta".

When love with unconfin'd wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates.

Lovelace was imprisoned in the Gatehouse, Westminster, by the LONG PARLIAMENT for his royalist activities; hence the grates or railings referred to.

Altis. The sacred precinct of ZEUS at OLYMPIA combining the altar of Zeus, the temples of Zeus and HERA, the Pelopion (grave of PELOPS), etc. It was connected by an arched passage with the STADIUM, where the games were held.

Altmark, The. In the Royal Navy an opprobrious synonym for a ship or an establishment with a reputation for very strict discipline. It derives from a famous naval exploit of February 1940 when Captain Vian, commanding the destroyer H.M.S. Cossack, entered Norwegian territorial waters to effect the release of 299 British prisoners of war from the German auxiliary-cum-prison ship Altmark, which had taken refuge in Josing Fiord.

Alto rilievo. Italian for "high relief". A term used for sculptures so cut as to project more than one-half their thickness from the background. The ELGIN MARBLES are notable examples. See BAS-RELIEF.

Alumbrado (Sp. illuminated, enlightened). A perfectionist; so called from a Spanish sect claiming special "illumination", which arose in 1575. See ILLUMINATI.

Alvina weeps, or "Hark! Alvina weeps", i.e. the wind howls loudly, a Flemish saying. Alvina was the daughter of a king, who was cursed by her parents because she married unsuitably. From that day she roamed about the air invisible to the eye of man, but her moans are audible.

Alzire (äl' zër). A daughter of Montezuma, invented by VOLTAIRE and the central character of his play Alzire (1736), which is set in Peru instead of Mexico.

Amadis of Gaul (á ma' dis). The hero of the famous prose romance of the same title. The oldest extant edition (1508) is in Spanish by Montalvo but is probably an adaptation of a 14th-century Portuguese or Spanish original with his own additions. Many details are derived from ARTHURIAN legend, and subsequent writers increased the romance to fourteen books by adding other exploits. It long enjoyed popularity and exerted a wide influence on literature.

Amadis, called the "Lion-Knight", from the device on his shield, and "Beltenebros" (darkly beautiful), was a love-child of Perion, King of Gaula (Wales), and Elizena, Princess of Brittany. He was cast away at birth and became known as the Child of the Sun. After many adventures he secured the hand of Oriana. He is represented as a poet and musician, a linguist and a gallant, a knight-errant and a king, the very model of CHIVALRY.

Other names by which Amadis was called were the Lovely Obscure, the Knight of the Green Sword, the Knight of the Dwarf, etc.

Amadis of Greece. A supplemental part of the romance Amadis of Gaul supposedly added by the Spaniard Feliciano de Silva in 1530.

Amaimon (á mí' i mon). A DEVIL, king of the eastern portion of HELL in mediæval demonology. He might be bound or restrained from doing hurt from the third hour till noon, and from the ninth hour till evening. ASMODEUS is his chief officer. See BARBASON; LUCIFER.

Amaimon sounds well; Lucifer well; Barbason well; yet they are devils' additions, the names of fiends.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, II, ii.

Amalfitan Code (á mál' fi tán). The oldest existing collection of maritime law, compiled in the 11th century at Amalfi, then an important trading centre.

Amalthea (ám ál thé' á). In Greek mythology a NYMPH, the nurse of ZEUS; (alternatively the she-goat which suckled him). In Roman legend a SIBYL of Cumæ who offered the SIBYLLINE Books to Tarquin II.

Amalthea's horn. The cornucopia or HORN OF PLENTY. The infant ZEUS was fed with goat's milk by Amalthea, daughter of Melisseus, King of Crete. Zeus, in gratitude, broke off one of the goat's horns, and gave it to Amalthea, promising that the possessor should always have in abundance everything desired. See ÆGIS.

When Amalthea's horn
O'er hill and dale the rose-crowned flora pours,
And scatters corn and wine, and fruits and flowers.
CAMOËNS: Lusiad, Bk. II.

Amaranth (ám' á ránth) (Gr. amarantos, everlasting). In Pliny the name of some real or imaginary fadeless flower. Clement of Alexandria says:

Amarantus flos, symbolum est immortalitatis.
It is so called because its flowers retain to the last much of their deep blood-red colour. The best-known species are "Love lies bleeding" (Amarantus caudatus), and "Prince's feather" (Amarantus hypochondriacus). Wordsworth has a poem called Love lies Bleeding, and Milton refers to "Immortal amaranth" in Paradise Lost (III, 353). Spenser has "sad Amaranthus" (The Faerie Queene, III, vi, 45), one of the flowers "to which sad lovers were transformed of yore", but there is no known legendary basis for this.

In 1653 Queen Christina of Sweden instituted an order of Knights of the Amaranth which lapsed on her death.

Amaryllis (ám á ril' is). A rustic sweetheart, from a shepherdess in the pastorals of Theocritus and VIRGIL.

To sport with Amaryllis in the shade.

MILTON: Lycidas, 68.

In Spencer's Colin Clout's Come Home Again, Amaryllis is intended for Alice Spenser, Countess of Derby.

Amasis, Ring of (á mā' sis). Herodotus tells us (III, iv) that Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in everything that Amasis, King of Egypt, fearing such unprecedented luck boded ill, advised him to part with something which he highly prized. Polycrates accordingly threw into the sea an extremely valuable RING, but a few days afterwards a fish was presented to him, in which the ring was found. Amasis now renounced friendship with Polycrates, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long afterwards the latter was crucified by his host, the satrap Oroetes.

Amati (á ma' tí). A first-rate violin; properly one made by the brothers Andrea and Nicolo Amati or their successors at CREMONA. Cp. STRAD.

Amaurote (ám ô rō' te) (Gr. the shadowy or unknown place). The chief city of Sir Thomas More's Utopia. Rabelais introduces Utopia and "the great city of the Amaurots" into his Pantagruel (Bk. II, ch. xxiii).

Amazement. Not afraid with any amazement (1 Pet. iii, 6), introduced at the end of the marriage service in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. The meaning is, you will be God's children so long as you do his bidding, and are not drawn aside by any distraction. Shakespeare uses the word in the same tense.

Behold, destruction, frenzy, and amazement,
Like witless antics, one another meet,

Troilus and Cressida, V, iii.

Amazon (ām' á zon). A Greek word meaning without breast. In Greek mythology a race of female warriors living in Scythia, although some writers mention an older nation of Amazons in Africa. There were no men in the nation, but any sons born of their union with their neighbours were killed or sent to their fathers. The girls had their right breasts burnt off, that they might better draw the bow. The term is now applied to any strong brawny woman of masculine habits.

She towered, fit person for a Queen
To lead those ancient Amazonian files;
Or ruling Bandit's wife among the Grecian isles.

WORDSWORTH: Beggars.

Amazonia (ām á zō' ni á). An old name for the regions about the river Amazon in South America, which was so called by the early Spanish explorers under Orellana who claimed to have seen female warriors on its banks.

Amazonian chin. A beardless chin like that of a woman warrior.

When with his Amazonian chin he drove
The hristled lips before him.

SHAKESPEARE: Coriolanus, II, ii.

Amber. A yellow, translucent, fossilized vegetable resin, the name of which originally belonged to amberggris. Legend says that amber is a concretion of the tears of birds who were the sisters of MELEAGER and who never ceased weeping for the death of their brother (Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii, 170).

Amber meaning a repository is an obsolete spelling of AMBRY.

Ambree, Mary. An English heroine whose valour in the siege of Ghent of 1584 is recorded in the ballad Mary Ambree in PERCY'S RELIQUES:

When captaines couragious, whom death cold not daunte,

Did march to the siege of the city of Gaunt,
They mustred their souldiers by two and by three,
And the foremost in battle was Mary Amhree.

Her name was proverbial for a woman of heroic spirit or a virago.

My daughter will be valliant

And prove a very Mary Ambry in the busines.

BEN JONSON: Tale of a Tub, I, ii.

Ambrose, St. (c. 340–397) became BISHOP of Milan in 374. He was noted for the penance he imposed on the Eastern Emperor Theodosius, for his victory over the ARIANS at the synod of Aquileia (381), and for his organization of church music. The Ambrosian Chant was used until the GREGORIAN CHANT became the basis of church music two centuries later. His feast day is 7 December. His emblems are (1) a beehive, in allusion to the legend that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth when he was lying in his cradle—a favourable omen; (2) a scourge, by which he expelled the Arians from Italy.

Ambrosian Library, founded in Milan (1609) by Cardinal Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, and named in honour of St. Ambrose. Its famous collection of manuscripts includes a 4th-century codex of HOMER, the earliest known.

Ambrosia (ām brō' zi á) (Gr. a, not, brotos, mortal). The food of the gods, so called because it made them immortal. Hence anything delicious to the taste. See NECTAR.

Ambrosian Nights. John Wilson (Christopher North), James Hogg and other literary figures forgathered at Ambrose's Tavern, Edinburgh, of an evening for convivial conversation, recorded largely by North (with embellishments) in the famous NOCTES AMBROSIANAE (1822–1835), published in Blackwood's Magazine.

Ambrosius Aurelianus. A shadowy 5th-century figure, according to GILDAS the last of the Roman nation in Britain, under whose leadership the Britons rallied to resist the SAXON invaders.

Ambry (am' bri) (Lat. armarium, cupboard, chest). A cupboard, wall-press, or locker. In church a closed recess for keeping books, vestments, sacramental plates, consecrated oil, etc. Cp. ALMONRY.

Ambs-as, or ace, or Ames-ace (āmz ās) (Lat. ambo-asses, both or two aces). Two aces, the lowest throw in dice; figuratively, bad luck.

I had rather be in this choice than throw ames-ace for my life.

SHAKESPEARE: All's Well that Ends Well, II, iii.

Also the name of a card game sometimes spelt aumo-ace.

Amelia. A model of conjugal affection in Fielding's last novel, Amelia (1751). It is said that the character was intended for his own wife. Amelia Sedley, "one of the best and dearest creatures", appears in Thackeray's Vanity Fair (1847–8).

Amen Corner, at the west end of PATER-NOSTER ROW, London, was where the monks finished the Pater Noster, on CORPUS CHRISTI Day, as they went in procession to St. Paul's Cathedral. They began in Paternoster Row with the Lord's Prayer in Latin, which was continued to the end of the street; then said Amen at the corner of the Row; on turning down Ave Maria Lane, commenced chanting the Hail Mary! then, crossing LUDGATE entered Creed Lane chanting the CREDO. Paternoster Row, Amen Corner and much of Ave Maria Lane were destroyed in an air raid on 28 December 1940.

Amen-Ra, or Amon-Ra. The King of the gods during the ancient Egyptian Empire, a development from Amon ("the hidden one"), patron of Thebes. Usually figured as human-headed, with two long ostrich plumes rising above his head, sometimes with a ram's head. The ram was sacred to him and his oracle was at the oasis of Jupiter AMMON. The Greeks identified him with ZEUS.

Amende honorable. An anglicized French phrase for a full and public apology. In mediæval France the term was applied to the degrading punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides and the sacrilegious, who were brought into court with a rope round their necks, stripped to the shirt and made to beg pardon of God, the King and the court.

A mensa et thoro. See A VINCULO.

Amenthes (a men' théz). The HADES of the ancient Egyptians, the abode of the spirits of the dead where judgment was passed by OSIRIS.

America. See UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Americans, Good—when they die go to Paris. Not an original witticism of Oscar Wilde, who used it in A Woman of No Importance, but attributed by Oliver Wendell Holmes to Thomas Appleton (1812-1884).

American Workhouse, The. A name given to the Park Lane Hotel, London, by taxi-drivers because of its popularity with wealthy Americans, and hence in general a hotel offering luxurious accommodation.

Amerindian (äm ér in' di än). A PORTMANTEAU WORD combining American and Indian applied to native peoples of the NEW WORLD as distinct from those of India and the East Indies.

Ames-ace. See AMBS-AS.

Amethea. See FAMOUS HORSES under HORSE.

Amethyst (äm' e thist) (Gr. a, not; methusko, intoxicate). A violet-blue variety of quartz supposed by the ancients to prevent intoxication. Drinking-cups of amethyst were a charm against inebriety and it was especially cherished by Roman matrons from the belief that it would preserve inviolate the affection of their husbands.

Amiable, or Amicable Numbers. Any two numbers either of which is the sum of the aliquots of the other, e.g., 220 and 284. The aliquots of 220 are 1, 2, 4, 5, 10, 11, 20, 22, 44, 55, 110, the sum of which is 284; and the aliquots of 284 are 1, 2, 4, 71, 142, the sum of which is 220.

Amiel (am' i el). In Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL (i, 899-913), this is meant for Sir Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons. The name is an anagram of Eliam (God is kinsman). Eliam, in II Sam. xxiii, 34, is the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, and one of David's heroes; in II Sam. xi, 3 it appears as the name of BATHSHEBA's father, which in I Chron. iii, 5 is given as Ammel.

Aminadab (a min' á dáb). A QUAKER. The Scripture name has a double m, but in old comedies, where the character represents a Quaker, the name has generally only one. Obadiah was also used to signify a Quaker and Rachel a Quakeress.

Amiral, or Ammiral. An early form of the word ADMIRAL.

Amis and Amile. See AMYS.

Amish, The. Followers of Jacob Ammann; a strictly conservative sect which separated from the Mennonites in the late 17th century. They first appeared in Pennsylvania in c. 1714 and settlements in other parts of America followed. They are conspicuous for their colourful customs, industry, and frugality. They still use the German language, wear old-fashioned dress and beards with moustaches, use hooks and eyes instead of buttons, and employ horse-drawn vehicles.

Ammon, or Hammon. The Greek form of the name of the Libyan and Egyptian god Amun or Amon. See AMEN-RA.

Son of Ammon. ALEXANDER the Great was thus greeted by the priests of the Libyan temple of JUPITER Ammon.

Ammon's great son one shoulder had too high.
POPE: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 117.

Ammonites (äm' an itz). Fossil molluscs allied to the nautilus and cuttlefish. So called because they resemble the horn upon the ancient statues of Jupiter Ammon.

Also the children of Ammon; the descendants of Ben-ammi, the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix, 38).

Amoret (äm' ár et), in Spenser's Faerie Queene, (Bk. III) is the type of female loveliness—young, handsome, gay, witty, and good; soft as a rose, sweet as a violet, chaste as a lily, gentle as a dove, loving everybody and by all beloved.

Also a love-song, love-knot, love-affair, or love personified.

He will be in his anorets, and his canzonets, his pastorals, and his madrigals.—THOMAS HEYWOOD: Loves Maistrisse (1633).

Amorous, The. Philip I of France (1060–1108); he deserted his wife Bertha and carried off Bertrada, wife of Fulk of Anjou.

Amour propre (a' moor propr) (Fr.). Ones self-love, vanity, or opinion of what is due to oneself. To wound his amour propre is to gall his good opinion of himself.

Ampersand. The character "&" for and. In the old HORNBOOKS, after giving the twenty-six letters, the character & was added (. . . x, y, z, &), and was called "Ampersand", a corruption of "and per se &" (and by itself, and). The symbol is an adaptation of et (Lat. and), as can be seen if we look at the italic ampersand —&—where the "e" and the cross of the "t" are clearly recognizable. See TIRONIAN.

Amphialus (âm fi' à lûs). In Sidney's Arcadia (1580–1590) the valiant and virtuous son of the wicked Cecropia, in love with Philoclea; he ultimately married Queen Helen of Corinth.

Amphictyonic Council (âm fik ti on' ik) (Gr. amphiktyones, dwellers round about). In Greek history, the council of the Amphictyonic League, consisting of the deputies of the twelve member tribes, who met twice a year, at DELPHI or THERMOPYLAE. With Delphi it administered the sanctuary of the Pythian APOLLO and it also conducted the PYTHIAN GAMES. It was named after its supposed founder Amphictyon, son of DEUCALION.

Amphigouri (âm fi goor' i). Verses which, while sounding well, contain no meaning. A good example is Swinburne's Nepheidia, a well-known parody of his own style, which begins:

From the depth of the dreamy decline of the dawn through a notable nimbus of nebulous noon-shine,

Pallid and pink as the palm of the flag-flower that flickers with fear of the flies as they float,
Are they looks of our lovers that lustroously lean from a marvel of mystic miraculous moon-shine ? etc.

Amphion (âm fi' on). The son of ZEUS and Antiopé who, according to Greek legend, built Thebes by the music of his lute, which was so melodious that the stones danced into walls and houses of their own accord.

Amphisbæna (âm fis bē' nâ) (Gr. amphis, both ways; baino, go). A fabulous venomous serpent with a head at each end and able to move in either direction.

The name is applied to a genus of South American lizards.

Amphitrite (âm fi tri' ti). In classical mythology, the goddess of the sea, wife of POSEIDON, daughter of NEREUS and Doris (Gr. amphi-trio for tribo, rubbing or wearing away [the shore] on all sides).

Amphitryon (âm fit' ri on). Son of Alcæus and husband of ALCMENA.

Le véritable Amphitryon
Est l'Amphitryon où l'on dine.

MOLIÈRE: Amphitryon.

That is, the person who provides the feast (whether master of the house or not) is the real host. The tale is that ZEUS assumed the likeness of Amphitryon, for the purpose of visiting Alcmena, and gave a banquet; but Amphitryon came home and claimed the honour of being master of the house. As far as the servants and guests were concerned "he who gave the feast was to them the host".

Amphrysian Prophetess (âm fri' zi ân). The Cumæan SIBYL; so called from Amphrysus, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which APOLLO fed the herds of Admetus.

Ampoule, La Sainte (la sant am pool'). The vessel containing oil used in anointing the kings of France, and said to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the coronation service of St. LOUIS. It was preserved at Rheims till the French Revolution, when it was destroyed.

Amram's Son. Moses (Exod. vi, 20). Milton's reference in Paradise Lost, I, 338–40:

As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day, Waved round the coast,

is to Exod. x, 13.

Amri (âm' ri), in ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL Pt. II, 1013–24 (Dryden and Tate) is designed for Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor.

Amrita (âm rē' tâ). In Hindu mythology the ELIXIR of immortality, corresponding to the AMBROSIA of classical mythology.

Amulet (Lat. amuletum, a charm). Something worn, usually round the neck, as a preventive charm. The word was formerly connected with the Arabic himalah, the name given to the cord that secured the KORAN to the person.

The early Christians used to wear amulets called ICHTHUS. See also TALISMAN.

Amun, or Amon. See AMEN-RA.

Amyclæan Silence (âm i klē' ân). Amyclæ in the south of Sparta was so often alarmed by false rumour of the approach of the Spartans, that a decree was issued forbidding mention of the subject. When the Spartans actually came no one dared give warning and the town was taken. Hence the proverb, more silent than Amyclæ.

Ruled by the mythical Tyndareus, CASTOR AND POLLUX were born there and are hence sometimes called the Amyclean Brothers.

Amyris plays the Fool (ă mī' ris). An expression used of one who assumes a false character with an ulterior object like JUNIUS BRUTUS. Amyris was a SYBARITE sent to DELPHI to consult the ORACLE, who informed him of the approaching destruction of his nation; he fled to Peloponnesus and his countrymen called him a fool; but like the madness of David, his "folly" was true wisdom, for thereby he saved his life.

Amys and Amyllion, or Amis et Amiles. A late 12th-century French romance telling the story of the friendship of two knights in the reign of CHARLEMAGNE. At the end of the story Amyllion slays his children to cure his friend of leprosy.

Anabaptists. At the time of the REFORMATION the name given to various sects which did not believe in infant baptism, and noted for their extremist views, especially at Zwickau and Munster in Germany. On coming to years of discretion they were re-baptized (Gr. ana, over again). In 17th-century England Baptists were often abusively called Anabaptists.

Anacharsis (ăn â kar' sis). A Scythian PHILOSOPHER (c. 600 B.C.) and admirer of Greek civilization. He studied at Athens and became acquainted with SOLON.

In 1787 the Abbé Barthélemy published Le Voyage du Jeune Anacharsis en Grèce, giving an account of Greek customs and antiquities. It became a popular work, and was the imaginary narrative of a descendant of the Scythian philosopher.

Anacharsis Clootz. Jean Baptiste Clootz (1755-1794), also known as "the Orator of the human race". A Prussian noble and apostle of revolution, who travelled Europe as a young man and became a member of the CONVENTION. He was guillotined by Robespierre in 1794.

Anachronism (Gr. ana chronos, out of time). Something wrongly dated, thus in the wrong chronological relationship with other things and events, and most commonly found in imaginative works which are in an historical setting. Thus in Shakespeare's Henry IV Pt. I, II, i, the carrier complains "The turkeys in my panner are quite starved", but turkeys were introduced from America, which was not discovered until nearly a century after Henry IV's time. In Julius Cæsar, II, i, the clock strikes and Cassius says "The clock has stricken three", yet striking clocks were not invented until 1400 years after the days of Cæsar. Mediæval romances abound with anachronisms.

Anacletus. Another name for the AGELASTA.

Anacreon (ă năk' ri ân). A Greek lyric poet (born c. 570 B.C.) who wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine. Hence Anacreontics as a name for this kind of verse or the metrical form in which they were written.

Anacreon Moore. Thomas Moore (1779-1852), who not only translated Anacreon into English (1800), but also wrote original poems in the same style.

Anacreon of Painters. Francesco Albano (1578-1660), a painter of beautiful women.

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuzac (1755-1841), one of the Committee of Public Safety; so called from the flowery language and convivial jests directed towards his miserable victims.

Anacreon of the Temple. Abbé Guillaume Amfrye de Chaulieu (1639-1720), poet and wit and member of the LIBERTINE circle of the TEMPLE which influenced VOLTAIRE.

Anacreon of the Twelfth Century. Walter Map or Mapes, ecclesiastic (1140-1210), the "jovial archdeacon", was unsuitably so called. He is perhaps best known for the verse which became the famous drinking-song "Meum est propositum in taberna mori".

The French Anacreon. Pontus de Thiard or Tyard (1521-1605), one of the PLÉIADE poets; also Pierre Laujon (1727-1811).

The Persian Anacreon. Hafiz of Shiraz (c. 1320-1389) whose Divan of over 500 poems revealed him as the greatest Persian lyric poet.

The Scotch Anacreon. Alexander Scott, poet (c. 1520-c. 1585).

The Sicilian Anacreon. Giovanni Meli (1740-1825).

Anagram (Gr. ana graphein, to write over again). A word or phrase formed by transposing the letters of another word or phrase. Some famous examples are:

Dame Eleanor Davies (prophetess in the reign of Charles I) = Never so mad a ladie.

Gustavus = Augustus.

Horatio Nelson = Honor est a Nilo.

Florence Nightingale=Flit on cheering angel.
Queen Victoria's Jubilee=I require love in a subject.

Quid est Veritas (John xviii, 38)=Vir est qui adest.

Marie Touchet (mistress of Charles IX of France)=Je charme tout (made by Henry IV).
Voltaire is accepted as an anagram of Arouet l(e) f(éune).

These are interchangeable words:
Alcunus and Calvinus; Amor and Roma;
Eros and Rose; Evil and Live.

Anastasia, St. (än as tä' zi a), a Roman matron said to have been beheaded with St. Basilissa for having buried the bodies of St. PETER and St. PAUL.

Anathema (ä näth' i mä). A denunciation or curse. A Greek word meaning "a thing set up or hung up", an offering to the gods. Thus Gordius (see GORDIAN KNOT) hung up his yoke and beam; the shipwrecked hung up their wet clothes; retired workmen hung up their tools, cripples their crutches, etc. Later it came to mean a thing devoted to evil since animals offered up were destined for death.

In the Catholic and Calvinistic churches it became a more extreme form of denunciation than EXCOMMUNICATION.

Anatomy. He was like an anatomy—i.e. a mere skeleton, very thin, like one whose flesh has been anatomized or cut off.

They brought 'one Pinch; a hungry lean-faced villain,

A mere anatomy, a mountebank.

SHAKESPEARE: The Comedy of Errors, V, i.

Shakespeare also uses atomy as a synonym. Thus Quickly calls the Beadle "Thou atomy, thou!" in Henry IV Pt. II, V, iv.

Ancæus (än sē' äs). Helmsman of the ship ARGO, after the death of Tiphys. He was told by a hard-pressed slave that he would never live to taste the wine of his vineyards, and when such wine was set before him he sent for the slave to laugh at the latter's prognostications; but the slave made the answer "there's many a slip 'twixt the CUP and the lip". At this instant Ancæus was told that the Calydonian BOAR was devastating his vineyard, whereupon he set down his cup, went out against the boar, and was slain in the encounter.

Anchor. In Christian symbolism the anchor is the sign of hope, in allusion to Heb. vi, 19, "Hope we have as an anchor of the soul". In art it is an attribute of Pope CLEMENT who was supposed to have been bound to an anchor and cast into the sea (1st century); and St. Nicholas of Bari, the patron saint of sailors.

Anchor light. A white light visible all round the horizon, shown from the forepart of an anchored vessel. Vessels over 150 feet in length must carry two, one being aft.

Anchor watch. A watch kept when a vessel is anchored as a precaution against dragging, etc.

Swallowing the anchor. A sailor is said to do so when he retires from the sea.

The anchor is a-peak. In shortening cable, when the ship is drawn completely over the anchor.

The anchor comes home. When it breaks out of the ground by dragging. Figuratively, the enterprise has failed, notwithstanding the precautions employed.

To weigh anchor. To haul in the anchor. When broken out of the ground it is aweigh. Figuratively to begin an enterprise which has hung on hand.

Ancien Régime (Fr.). The old order of things; a phrase used during the French Revolution for the system of government, with all its evils, which existed under the BOURBON monarchy.

Ancient. In the now obsolete sense of a flag or standard bearer, is a corruption of ensign. Pistol was Falstaff's ancient and Iago Othello's.

'Tis one Iago, ancient to the general.

SHAKESPEARE: Othello, II, i.

My whole charge consists of Ancients, corporals, lieutenants, gentlemen of companies . . .

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV Pt. I, IV, ii.

Ancient Lights on a notice board in England means that for at least 20 years uninterruptedly a certain window has admitted light, and no building may be erected which substantially deprives it of light.

Ancient Mariner. Having shot an albatross, he and his companions were subjected to fearful penalties. On repentance he was forgiven, and on reaching land told his story to a hermit. At times, however, distress of mind drove him from land to land, and wherever he abode told his tale of woe, to warn from cruelty and persuade men to love God's creatures. This story in Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner, which was first published in Lyrical Ballads (1798), is partly based on a dream told by his friend Cruickshank, and partly gathered from his reading. Wordsworth told him the story of the privateer George Shelvocke, who shot an albatross while rounding Cape Horn in 1720, and was dogged by bad weather. Other suggested sources are Thomas James's Strange and Dangerous Voyage (1683) and the Letter of St.

Paulinus to Macarius, in which he relates astounding wonders concerning the shipwreck of an old man (1618). A full and definitive examination of the sources is to be found in The Road to Xanadu (1927) by J. L. Lowes.

Ancient of Days. A scriptural name given to God (Dan. vii, 9).

Ancile (än' sil). The PALLADIUM of ROME; the sacred buckler said to have fallen from heaven in the reign of Numa. To prevent its being stolen, as the safety of the state depended on it, he caused eleven others, exactly similar, to be made, and entrusted them to twelve priests called SALII.

Ancren Riwe, or Ancrene Wisse. The rule of the Anchoresses; a mediæval treatise (? early 13th century) in rhythmical prose of great charm, written for the guidance of women who were trying to live the strict religious lives of anchoresses. Among the counsels given them is to work hard, avoid gossiping and to limit their pets to "but one cat", unlike Chaucer's Prioress who possessed an unspecified number of small pet dogs. It is of uncertain authorship.

Andaman Marble. An exceptionally hard timber grown in the Andaman Islands, of the same family as ebony.

Andiron (änd' ir ön). A fire-dog; that is, one of a pair of short horizontal iron bars, with legs or a supporting stand, for holding the ends of logs in an open fireplace. The word is from the Old French andier, after the Late Latin andedus, andena, or anderius and has nothing to do with iron. End-iron and hand-iron are variants.

Andrea Ferrara (än drä' ä fè ra' rà). A sword, also called an Andrew and a Ferrara after the famous 16th-century sword maker of this name.

JOHN FLETCHER: The Chances (1618).

Andrew, a name used in old plays for a valet or man-servant. Cp. ABIGAIL. See also MERRY ANDREW.

St. Andrew was a fisherman and brother of St. PETER, depicted in Christian art as an old man with long white hair and beard, holding the Gospel in his right hand, and leaning on a St. Andrew's cross. His day is 30 November. It is said that he was crucified in Patræ (c. A.D. 70) on a crux decussata (see CROSS). He is also the patron saint of Russia and Scotland. See RULE, ST.; CONSTANTINE'S CROSS under CROSS.

The Andrew meaning "the Royal Navy" derives from the time of the French Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars when one Andrew Miller acquired such a reputation in the Portsmouth area as a PRESS-GANG operator that it came to be said that his victims had been snatched into "the Andrew". In the 19th century Andrew Miller was also used to mean "a warship" or "government authority".

Androcles and the Lion (än drō' klēz). Androcles was a runaway slave who took refuge in a cavern. A lion entered and, instead of tearing him to pieces, lifted up his forepaw that Androcles might extract from it a thorn. The slave, being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena. It so happened that the same lion was led out against him, and recognizing his benefactor, showed towards him every demonstration of love and gratitude.

The tale is told by Aulus Gellius (c. 130-180) and similar stories are found in ÆSOP'S FABLES and the GESTA ROMANORUM. Bernard Shaw's Androcles and the Lion (1916) is based on the story.

Android. An old name for an AUTOMATON figure resembling a human being (Gr. andros-eidos, a man's likeness).

Andromache (än drom' ä ki). In Greek legend she was the wife of HECTOR, on whose death she was given to Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus). The latter was killed by ORESTES and she became the wife of Helenus, Hector's brother. It is the title of a play by Euripides.

Andromeda (än drom' e dà). Daughter of CEPHEUS and CASSIOPEIA. Her mother boasted that her beauty surpassed that of the NEREIDS; so the Nereids induced NEPTUNE to send a sea-monster to the country, to which the oracle of Jupiter AMMON declared ANDROMEDA must be surrendered. She was accordingly chained to a rock but was delivered by PERSEUS, who married her and slew Phineus, her uncle, to whom she had been promised. After death she was placed among the stars.

Angel. In post-canonical and apocalyptic literature angels are grouped in varying orders. The commonly used hierarchy of nine orders is that popularized by the Pseudo-Areopagite or Pseudo-Dionysius (early 5th century) in his De Hierarchia Celesti, which arranges them in three triads:

- (1) Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones in the first circle.
- (2) Dominions, Virtues, and Powers in the second circle.
- (3) Principalities, Archangels, and Angels in the third circle.

The names are taken from the Old Testament and Eph. i, 21 and Col. i, 16.

The seven holy angels are MICHAEL, GABRIEL, RAPHAEL, URIEL, Chamuel, Jophiel and ZADKIEL. Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the BIBLE, Raphael in the Apocrypha and all appear in Enoch (viii, 2).

Milton in Paradise Lost, Bk. I, 392 gives a list of the fallen angels.

Mohammedans say that angels were created from pure bright gems; the genii from fire, and man from clay.

Angel. An English gold coin copied from the French ange and minted from 1465 to the reign of Charles I. It was to replace the NOBLE and was first called angel-noble. Valued at 6s. 8d. and later at 10s., it bore the figure of the archangel MICHAEL slaying the dragon, and was the coin presented to persons touched for the KING'S EVIL.

Angel. In modern theatrical parlance denotes the financial backer to a play.

Angel. See PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGNS.

On the side of the angels. See SIDE.

Angel of the Schools. St. Thomas Aquinas. See ANGELIC DOCTOR.

Angel-beast. A 17th-century card-game. The game was called la bête (beast), and an angel was a usual stake, hence angel-beast, much as we say "shilling-whist" or "halfpenny nap".

This gentleman offers to play at Angel-beast, though he scarce knows the cards.

SEDLEY: The Mulberry Garden (1668).

Angels of Mons. The 3rd and 4th Divisions of the OLD CONTEMPTIBLES, under the command of General Smith-Dorrien, were sorely pressed in the retreat from Mons (26-27 August 1914). Their losses were heavy and that they survived at all was by some attributed to divine intervention. Arthur Machen, writing from FLEET STREET, described with great verisimilitude St. GEORGE and the angels, who, clad in white, with flaming swords held back the might of the German First Army. For some the imaginary became a reality and the Angels of Mons became a phrase and fable.

Angel visits. Delightful intercourse of short duration and rare occurrence.

Like angel visits, few and far between.

T. CAMPBELL: Pleasures of Hope (1799), II, 378.

Angel-water. An old Spanish cosmetic, made of roses, trefoil, and lavender; but originally mainly from ANGELICA, hence the name.

Angel-water was the worst scent about her.

SEDLEY: Bellamira, or the Mistress (1687).

Angelic Brothers, or Gichtelians. A separatist sect founded in Holland in the latter part of the 17th century by the German mystic Johann Gichtel (1638-1710).

Angelic Doctor. Thomas Aquinas (c. 1225-1274) was so called, probably because of the purity and excellence of his teaching. His exposition of the most recondite problems of theology and philosophy was judged to be the fruit of almost more than human intelligence and in 1879 Pope Leo XIII directed that the teachings of Aquinas should be the basis of theology. His Summa Theologica is the culmination of SCHOLASTICISM.

Angelic Hymn, The. The hymn beginning with Glory to God in the highest (Luke ii, 14), so called because the former part of it was sung by the angel host that appeared to the shepherds of Bethlehem.

Angelic Salutation, The. The AVE MARIA.

Angelica (än'jel' i ká). This beautiful but fickle young woman was the heroine of Boiardo's ORLANDO INNAMORATO and Ariosto's ORLANDO FURIOSO. Orlando's unrequited love for her drove him mad. The name was used by Congreve for the principal character in Love for Love and by Farquhar in The Constant Couple and Sir Harry Wildair. Also the name of a plant (Archangelica officinalis) cultivated for its aromatic stalks which when candied are used in decorating cakes and confectionery. Called the angelic herb from a belief in its medicinal virtues, especially against plague and pestilence, it was also used as an ingredient of ABSINTHE and of gin and "bitters".

Angelical Stone. The speculum of Dr. DEE. He asserted that it was given him by the angels RAPHAEL and GABRIEL. It passed into the possession of the Earl of Peterborough, thence to Lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to the Duke of Argyll, whose son presented it to Horace Walpole. It is now in the BRITISH MUSEUM.

Angelico, Fra. The name by which Giovanni da Fiesole (1387-1455), who was famed for the spiritual quality of his paintings, is better known.

Angelus, The (än'je lüs). A Roman Catholic devotion in honour of the Annunciation. It begins with the words Angelus Domini nuntiavit Mariae. It is recited thrice daily, usually at 6 a.m., noon, and 6 p.m. at the sound of the Angelus bell.

Angevin Kings of England (än'je vin).

The early PLANTAGENET kings from Henry II to John. Henry II (1154-1189) was the son of Matilda (daughter of Henry I) and Geoffrey "Plantagenet", Count of Anjou. John lost Anjou in 1204.

Angle, A Dead

Angle, A Dead. A term applied in old books on fortification to the ground before an angle in a wall which can be neither seen nor defended from the parapet.

Angle with a silver hook. To buy fish at the market; said of an unsuccessful angler who buys fish to conceal his failure.

The Father of Angling. Izaak Walton (1593-1683). See THE GENTLE CRAFT.

Angles, Non Angli, sed angeli (Not Angles, but angels). The legend is that when Pope GREGORY THE GREAT (590-604) saw some fair-complexioned youths in the slave-market he asked whence they had come. He was told that they were Angles and also heathen. "Not Angles, but angels" was his comment and on becoming Pope he sent St. Augustine to effect their conversion.

Anglican. In America means "English" (sometimes with no ecclesiastical implications).

... suitable abodes for country gentlemen, in the strictly Anglican sense of the expression.
C. E. CASON: Culture in the South.

In England it is used in connexion with the CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. The first history in the English language to use the dating system anno Domini. It was probably begun in the reign of ALFRED THE GREAT (871-899). There are seven manuscript versions extant, which substantially deal with events from the time of Julius Cæsar to 1154, and four of these are really distinct chronicles. It is the basic source for the history of Anglo-Saxon England.

Angra Mainyu. See AHRIMAN.

Angry Young Men. A name applied to certain living British dramatists, particularly John Osborne, from whose play Look Back in Anger (1956) the term was derived. They are characterized by dissatisfaction with established social, moral, political and intellectual values. By association it is also applied to some American writers of protest.

Angurvadel. FRITHIOF's sword, inscribed with runic letters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed with a dim light in time of peace. See SWORD.

Anima Mundi (ân 'i má mûn' dî) (Lat. the soul of the world), with the oldest of the ancient philosophers meant "the source of life"; with PLATO it meant "the animating principle of matter"; inferior to pure spirit; with the STOICS it meant "the whole vital force of the universe".

G. E. Stahl (1660-1734) taught that the phenomena of animal life are due to an immortal anima, or vital principle distinct from matter.

Animal Farm. A satirical "fairy story" by George Orwell (1903-1950) of totalitarianism of the Russian kind under Stalin. A modern fable in which the pigs, by cunning, treachery and ruthlessness, lord it over the more honest, gullible and hardworking farm animals. It was first published in 1945.

Animals in Christian Art. Some animals are appropriated to certain saints: as the calf or ox to St. LUKE; the cock to St. PETER; the eagle to St. JOHN the Divine; the lion to St. MARK and St. JEROME; the raven to St. Benedict, etc.

Animals in Heaven. According to Mohammedan legend the following ten animals have been allowed to enter paradise: Jonah's whale; Solomon's ant; the ram caught by ABRAHAM and sacrificed instead of Isaac; the lapwing of BALKIS; the camel of the prophet Saleh; Balaam's ass; the ox of MOSES; the dog KRATIM of the SEVEN SLEEPERS; Al BORAK, MOHAMMED's steed; and Noah's dove.

Animals in symbolism.

The lamb, the pelican, and the unicorn, are symbols of Christ.

The dragon, serpent, and swine, symbolize Satan and his crew. The ant symbolizes frugality and prevision; ape, uncleanness, malice, lust, and cunning; ass, stupidity; bantam cock, pluckiness, priggishness; bat, blindness; bear, ill-temper, uncouthness; bee, industry; beetle, blindness; bull, strength, straightforwardness; bulldog, pertinacity; butterfly, sportiveness, living in pleasure; calf, lumpishness, cowardice; camel, submission; cat, deceit; cicada, poetry; cock, vigilance, overbearing insolence; crocodile, hypocrisy; crow, longevity; cuckoo, cuckoldom; dog, fidelity, dirty habits; dove, innocence, harmlessness; duck, deceit (French, canard, a hoax); eagle, majesty, inspiration; elephant, sagacity, ponderosity; fly, feebleness, insignificance; fox, cunning, artifice; frog and toad, inspiration; goat, lasciviousness; goose, conceit, folly; grasshopper, old age; gull, gullibility; hare, timidity; hawk, rapacity, penetration; hen, maternal care; hog, impurity; horse, speed, grace; jackdaw, vain assumption, empty conceit; jay, senseless chatter; kitten, playfulness; lamb, innocence, sacrifice; lark, cheerfulness; leopard, sin; lion, noble courage; lynx, suspicious vigilance; magpie, garrulity; mole, blindness, obtuseness; monkey, tricks; mule, obstinacy; nightingale, forlornness; ostrich, stupidity; owl, wisdom; ox, patience, strength, pride; parrot, mocking verbosity; peacock, pride; pig, obstinacy, dirtiness, gluttony; pigeon, cowardice (pigeon-livered); puppy, conceit; rabbit, fecundity; raven, ill-luck; robin redbreast, confiding trust; serpent, wisdom; sheep, silliness, timidity; sparrow, lasciviousness; spider, williness; stag, cuckoldom; swan, grace; tiger, ferocity; tortoise, chastity; turkey cock, official insolence; turtle-dove, conjugal fidelity; vulture, rapine; wolf, cruelty, ferocity; worm, cringing; etc.

Animals sacred to special deities:

To Æsculapius, the serpent; to Apollo, the wolf, the griffon, and the crow; to Bacchus, the dragon and the panther; to Diana, the stag; to Hercules, the deer; to Isis, the heifer; to Juno, the peacock and the lamb; to Jupiter, the eagle; to the Lares, the dog; to Mars, the horse and the vulture; to Mercury, the cock; to Minerva, the owl; to Neptune, the bull; to Tethys, the halcyon; to Venus, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow; to Vulcan, the lion, etc.

Animal, Cries of.

To the cry, call or voice of many animals a special name is given; to apply these names indiscriminately is always wrong and frequently ludicrous. Thus, we do not speak of the "croak" of a dog or the "bark" of a bee. Apes gibber; asses bray; bears growl; bees hum; beetles drone; bitterns boom; blackbirds and thrushes whistle; bulls bellow; calves bleat; cats mew, purr, swear and caterwaul; chaffinches chirp and pink; chickens peep; cocks crow; cows moo or low; crows caw; cuckoos cry cuckoo; deer bell; dogs bark, bay, howl and yelp; doves coo; ducks quack; eagles, vultures and peacocks scream; falcons chant; flies buzz; foxes bark and yelp; frogs croak; geese cackle and hiss; grasshoppers chirp and pitter; guineafowls cry "Come back"; guineapigs and hares squeak; hawks scream; hens cackle and cluck; horses neigh and whinny; hyenas laugh; jays and magpies chatter; kittens mew; linnets chuckle in their call; lions and tigers roar and growl; mice squeak and squeal; monkeys chatter and gibber; nightingales pipe and warble—we also speak of their "jug-jug"; owls hoot and screech; oxen low and bellow; parrots talk; peewits cry peewit; pigs grunt, squeak and squeal; pigeons coo; ravens croak; rooks caw; screech owls screech or shriek; sheep and lambs baa or bleat; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp; stags bellow and call; swallows twitter; swans cry and are said to sing just before death (see SWAN); turkey-cocks gobble; wolves howl. Most birds, besides many of those here mentioned, sing, but we speak of the chick-chick of the blackcap, the drumming of the grouse, and the chirr of the whitethroat.

Animosity meant originally animation, spirit, as the fire of a horse, called in Latin equi animositas. Its present exclusive use in a bad sense is an instance of the tendency by which words originally neutral have come to assume a bad meaning.

Animula, vagula, etc. (an im' ū lā vāg' ū lā). The opening of a poem to his soul, ascribed to the dying Emperor Hadrian (A.D. 76-138):

Animula, vagula, blandula,
Hospes, comesque, corporis;
Quae nunc abibis in loca,
Pallidula, rigida, nudula?

Sorry-lived, blithe little, fluttering sprite,
Comrade and guest in this body of clay,
Whither, ah! whither, departing in flight,
Rigid, half-naked, pale minion, away?

E.C.B.

BYRON also has an English rendering.

Ann, Mother. Ann Lee (1736-1784), the founder and "spiritual mother" of the American sect of SHAKERS.

Annabel, in Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, is designed for Anne Scott, Duchess of Monmouth and Countess of Buccleuch, the richest heiress in Europe. The Duke was faithless to her, and after his death the widow, still handsome, married again.

To all his [Monmouth's] wishes nothing he denied
And made the charming Annabel his bride.

I, 33, 34.

Annates (än' ätz) (Lat. annus, a year), also called FIRST FRUITS. Payments to the POPE, on the appointment of a BISHOP or other ecclesiastic, of a year's income of the SEE or BENEFICE. In England these payments were finally stopped in 1534 and transferred to the Crown. See QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.

Anne's Fan, Queen. Your thumb to your nose and your fingers spread.

Anne's Great Captain. The Duke of Marlborough (1650-1722).

Annie Laurie was the eldest of three daughters of Sir Robert Laurie of Maxwellton, born 16 December 1682. William Douglas, of Fingland (Kirkcudbright) wrote the popular verses which were altered by Lady Scott (1810-1900), who composed the air, but in 1709 Annie married Alexander Fergusson of Craigdarroch. She was the grandmother of Alexander Fergusson, the hero of Burns's song called The Whistle.

Annie Oakley. See OAKLEY.

Anno Domini (än' ō dom' i nī) (Lat.). In the Year of our Lord; i.e. in the year after the Nativity; or A.D. This system of dating was introduced by the monk Dionysius Exiguus who lived in the first half of the 6th century. Anno Domini is also used colloquially as a synonym for old age, e.g., "Anno Domini is his complaint."

Annunciation, The Feast of the. 25 March, also called LADY DAY, on which the angel GABRIEL announced to the Virgin MARY that she would be the mother of the MESSIAH (Luke i, 26-38).

Order of the Annunciation. An Italian order of military knights thus named from 1518, but founded by Amadeus VI, count of Savoy, in 1362 as the Order of the Collar, from its badge, a silver collar bearing devices in honour of the Virgin.

Sisters of the Annunciation. See FRANCISCANS.

Annus Luctus (än' ūs lük' tūs) (Lat. the year of mourning). The period during which a widow is supposed to remain unmarried. If she marries within about nine months from the death of her husband and a child is born, a doubt might arise as to its paternity. Such a marriage is not illegal.

Annus Mirabilis (än' ūs mir äb' i lis). The year of wonders, 1666, memorable for the Great FIRE OF LONDON and the successes of English arms over the Dutch, commemorated in Dryden's poem entitled Annus Mirabilis.

Annwn (än' oon), or Annwyfn (än oi' vün).

In Welsh legend, the land of the departed, the Celtic HADES.

Anodyne Necklace, An. An anodyne relieves pain: an anodyne necklace was an AMULET supposedly efficacious against suffering. Johnson's Idler, No. 40, says:

The true pathos of advertisements must have sunk deep into the heart of every man that remembers the zeal shown by the seller of the anodyne necklace, for the ease and safety of poor soothing infants.

The term then came to be applied to a hangman's noose:

May I die by an anodyne necklace, but I had rather be an under-turnkey than an usher in a boarding school.

GOLDSMITH: Vicar of Wakefield, ch. x.

Anon. The O.E. on ane, in one mind (state, body, etc.), the present meaning soon, in a little while, is a misuse of the earlier meaning, straightway, at once. Mark i, 30 (AUTHORIZED VERSION) gives an instance of the old meaning:

But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever, and anon they tell him of her.

The REVISED VERSION gives straightway. Wordsworth in The White Doe of Rylstone, I, 31, exemplifies the later meaning:

Fast the churchyard fills; — anon
Look again, and they are all gone.

The word was also used by servants, tapsters, etc., as an interjectory reply meaning "Coming, sir!"

Anschluss, The. This German word meaning "junction" or "union" in a modern historical context refers to the seizure of Austria by Germany in March 1938.

Answer like a Norman, To, that is, evasively.

Answer more Scotico, To. Avoiding the direct question by starting another question or subject.

"Hark you sirrah", said the doctor, "I trust you remember you are owing to the laird four stones of barleymeal and a bow of oats . . ." "I was thinking" replied the man more Scotico (in the Scottish fashion), that is returning no direct answer on the subject on which he was addressed "my best way would be to come to your honour, and take your advice yet, in case my trouble should come back".

SIR WALTER SCOTT: The Abbot, ch. xxvi.

Answer to a Maiden's Prayer, The. A young good-looking and wealthy bachelor or generally anything which exactly meets requirements.

Ant. For many centuries the ant has been a symbol of thrift and industry. The Bible says "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise" (Proverbs vi, 6). Æsop has a fable on the "Ant and the Grasshopper" in which the indolent grasshopper, in the winter, went to the busy little ants to beg food.

Antæus (än tē' us), in Greek mythology, a gigantic wrestler, son of Earth and Sea (GÆA and POSEIDON), who became stronger whenever he touched the earth. HERCULES lifted him from the ground and slew him.

Antediluvian. Before the DELUGE. Colloquially used for anything hopelessly outdated.

Anthology (Gr. garland of flowers). A collection of poems or prose extracts.

The Greek Anthology. A modern edition of sixteen books, largely of Greek epigrammatic poetry, based upon the 10th-century Anthology of Cephalas of Constantinople, which was rearranged by Maximus Planudes in 1301 and first published at Florence in 1494. The work of Cephalas incorporated the Garland of Meleager (1st century B.C.), the Garland of Philippos (1st century A.D.) and the Circle of Agathias (6th century). The text of Planudes was superseded by the Palatine MS., when the Anthology of Cephalas was discovered (1606) in the Count Palatine's Library at Heidelberg.

Anthony Eden. Popular name for the style of black felt homburg worn by Sir Anthony Eden (Lord Avon) when Foreign Secretary in the 1930s, and which was fashionable in WHITEHALL circles.

Anthony the Great, St. (c. 250–356), the patron saint of herdsmen and hermit of Upper Egypt; also the father of Christian monasticism. The story of his temptations by the devil was a popular subject in literature and art. His day is 17 January.

Anthony of Padua, St. (1195–1231), rigorous follower of St. FRANCIS of ASSISI and famous preacher. He was canonized in 1232 by Pope Gregory IX. His day is 13 June.

St. Anthony's Cross. The TAU cross, T called a lace.

St. Anthony's fire. Erysipelas or the rose is so called from the belief that those who sought the intercession of St. Anthony recovered from this distemper or sacred fire.

St. Anthony's pig. A pet pig, the smallest of the litter, also called the TANTONY PIG.

Anthroposophus (än thrō pos' ð fūs). The nickname of Thomas Vaughan (1622–1666), cleric and alchemist and twin brother of Henry Vaughan the SILURIST. He was so called from his book Anthroposophia Theomagica (1650), which dealt with the condition of man after death.

Anthroposophy (än thrō pos' ð fi). (Gr. anthropos, man; sophia, knowledge). The name given to the "spiritual science" developed by the Austrian philosopher Rudolf Steiner (1861-1925), a former theosophist.

Antic Hay. See HAY.

Antichrist, or the Man of Sin, due to appear at the end of time, is mentioned in the Epistles of St. John (I, ii, 18, 22) and is derived from Hebrew teachings. The belief that the arrival of Antichrist was to precede the second advent is chiefly founded on II Thess. ii, 1-12, and Rev. xiii. In the early Christian Church the ROMAN EMPIRE and its rulers were frequently referred to as Antichrist and later the title was bestowed upon the Emperor Frederick II and various Popes. With the REFORMATION the PROTESTANT conception of the papacy as Antichrist became widespread and its later use is largely as an abusive term and it has been applied even to NAPOLEON and William II of Germany. The Mohammedans have a legend that Christ will slay the Antichrist at the gate of the Church at Lydda, in Palestine.

See also NUMBER OF THE BEAST.

Antigone (än-tig' ò ni). The subject of a tragedy by Sophocles: she was the daughter of OEDIPUS by his mother, Jocasta. She slew herself to avoid being buried alive for disobeying an edict of Creon. She was famed for her devotion to her brother Polynices, hence the Duchess of Angoulême (1778-1851) was called the Modern Antigone for her attachment to her brother Louis XVII.

Antimony (an' ti mon i). A word probably from the Arabic as it was introduced through ALCHEMY, but Johnson's Dictionary derives it erroneously from the Greek antimonachos (bad for monks). The explanation copied from earlier writers, was that a prior gave some of this mineral to his convent pigs, who thrived upon it and became very fat. He next tried it on the monks, who died from its effects.

Antinomian (an ti no' mi an) (Gr. anti-nomos, exempt from the law). One who believes that Christians are not bound to observe the "law of God", but "may continue in sin that grace may abound". The term was first applied to John Agricola by Martin Luther, and was given to a sect that appeared in Germany about 1535. It was put forward as an excuse for immorality by extremist sects from early Christian times and appeared in England during the COMMONWEALTH period.

Antinous (än tin' ò ùs). A model of manly beauty. He was favourite and companion of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor.

Anti-pope. A usurping or rival pontiff set up in opposition to one canonically elected. Of the thirty or so anti-popes, those residing at Avignon during the Great SCHISM (1378-1417) are perhaps best known. When John XXIII summoned the Council of Constance (1414) to end the schism, there were three rival popes. John and Benedict XIII were deposed as schismatics, Gregory XIII resigned and a new POPE, Martin V, was elected.

Antisthenes (än tis' the nêz). Athenian philosopher (c. 455-c. 360 B.C.), founder of the CYNIC School. He wore a ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff like a beggar. SOCRATES, whose pupil he was, wittily said he could "see rank pride peering through the holes of Antisthenes' rags".

Antonine's Wall. A turf wall fronted by a deep ditch with forts at intervals stretching from Carriden on the Forth, to Old Kilpatrick on the Clyde (c. 36 miles). Built between 140 and 142 by Lollius Urbicus, governor of Britain under the Emperor Antoninus Pius, it was abandoned before the end of the 2nd century. See HADRIAN'S WALL.

Antrustions (än trüs' ti ònz). Members of the military household of the Frankish kings (O.H. Ger. trost, trust, fidelity). They survived as a bodyguard until the 8th century.

None but the king could have antrustions.

STUBBS: Constitutional History, I, ix.

Anu. Chief God of the Sumerians and Babylonians, king of heaven and ruler of destiny. The centre of his cult was at Erech, mentioned in Genesis (x, 10) as part of Nimrod's kingdom.

Anubis (á nū' bis). An Egyptian god similar to HERMES of Greece with whom he was sometimes identified. His office was to take the souls of the dead before the judge of the infernal regions. The son of OSIRIS, the judge, he was represented with a human body and a jackal's head.

Anvil. It is on the anvil, under deliberation, the project is in hand.

Anxious seat, to be on the. To be in a state of apprehension or suspense. A METAPHOR derived from American revivalist meetings where the penitents' bench was popularly known as the anxious bench.

Anzac. A word coined in 1915 from the initials of the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. It was also applied to the cove and beach in Gallipoli where they landed.

Anzac Day. 25 April, commemorating the landing of the Anzacs in Gallipoli in 1915.

Anzac Pact. The agreement between Australia and New Zealand in 1944 to co-operate in their policies with regard to armistices with the AXIS powers, the post-war settlement, and in certain other matters.

Aonian (ā ō' ni an). Poetical, pertaining to the MUSES. The Muses, according to Greek mythology, dwelt in Aonia, that part of Bœotia which contains Mount HELICON and the MUSES' fountain. MILTON speaks of "the Aonian mount" (Paradise Lost, I, 15), and Thomson calls the fraternity of poets:

The Aonian hive
Who praised arc, and starve right merrily,
Castle of Indolence, II, 2.

À outrance. See A L'OUTRANCE.

Apache (à päch' i). The name of a group of tribes of North American Indians, given to (or adopted by) the hooligans of Paris about the end of the 19th century (here pronounced à päch'). This usage has a close parallel in the MOHOCKS of the 18th century.

Apache State. Arizona, the land of the Apache Indians.

Ape. To copy, to imitate.

He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed; Hamlet, IV, ii. Most of the OLD WORLD monkeys have cheek pouches, used as receptacles for food.

The buffoon ape, in Dryden's The Hind and the Panther, means the Freethinkers.

Next her the buffoon ape, as atheists use,
Mimicked all sects, and had his own to chase.
Part I, 39.

To lead apes in hell. It is an old saying (frequent in the Elizabethan dramatists) that it is the fate of old maids. Hence ape-leader, an old maid. Thus Beatrice says:

I will even take sixpence in earnest of the bearward, and lead his apes into hell.

SHAKESPEARE: Much Ado About Nothing, II, i.

To play the ape, to play practical jokes or silly tricks, to pull faces like an ape.

To put an ape into your hood or cap, i.e. to make a fool of you. Apes were formerly carried on the shoulders of fools and simpletons.

To say an ape's paternoster, is to chatter with fright or cold, like an ape. One of the books in Rabelais' Library of St. Victor is called "The Ape's Paternoster".

Apelles. See CHIAN PAINTER.

Apemantus (âp e mân' tús). A churlish philosopher in Shakespeare's Timon of Athens.

A-per-se (â pèr sê). An AI; a person or thing of unusual merit. "A" all alone with no one who can follow, nemo proximus aut secundus. Chaucer calls Cresseide "the fioure A-per-se of Troi and Greek".

London, thou art of towns A-per-se.
DUNBAR: In honour of the city of London (1501).

Aphrodite (âf' rô di ti) (Gr. aphros, foam). The Greek VENUS; so called because she sprang from the foam of the sea. In HOMER she is the daughter of ZEUS and DIONE.

Aphrodite's girdle. The CESTUS.

Apicius (a pis' i ús). A gourmand. The name of three famous Roman gourmands. Marcus Gavius Apicius, of the time of AUGUSTUS and Tiberius, whose income was reduced by luxurious living, put an end to his life to avoid the misery of a plain diet.

A-pigga-back. See PICK-A-BACK.

Apis (â' pis). In Egyptian mythology, Hap, the bull of Memphis, sacred to Ptah (later associated and identified with OSIRIS) of whose soul it was supposed to be the image. SERAPIS was the dead Apis. The sacred bull had to be black with special markings. Sometimes it was not suffered to live more than twenty-five years, when it was sacrificed and embalmed with great ceremony. Cambyses, King of Persia (529-521 B.C.), and conqueror of Egypt, slew the bull of Memphis, and is said to have been punished with madness.

Apocalyptic Number. The mysterious number 666 (Rev. xiii, 15). See NUMBER OF THE BEAST.

Apocrypha (â pok' ri fâ) (Gr. apokrupto, hide away); hence the meaning "withheld from general circulation" (for various reasons), and therefore coming to be regarded as of doubtful origin, false or spurious. In the early 5th century JEROME was responsible for its inappropriate application to the non-canonical books of the Old Testament found in the SEPTUAGINT and VULGATE and not usually included in PROTESTANT Bibles. In the preface to the Apocrypha in the 1539 Bible the explanation that the books are so called "because they were wont to be read not openly" is untenable. The Apocrypha was included in the AUTHORIZED VERSION OF 1611. The Apocrypha proper consists of:

I and II Esdras, Tobit, Judith, additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, part of the Epistle of Jeremy, the Song of the Three Holy Children, the History of Susannah, Bel and the Dragon, the Prayer of Manasses, I and II Maccabees.

Apart from other Old Testament Apocryphal books there are numerous New Testament Apocryphal Gospels, Acts and Teachings of the APOSTLES, Epistles and Apocalypses. See PROT-EVANGELIUM; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

Apollinarians (á pol in ár' i anz). An heretical 4th-century sect, followers of Apollinaris, Bishop of Laodicea, a vigorous opponent of Arianism. They denied that Christ had a human soul and asserted that the Logos supplied its place. This heresy was condemned at the Council of Constantinople (381) and subsequently.

Apollo (á pol' ó). In Greek mythology, son of ZEUS and Leto (LATONA), and sometimes identified with HELIOS the sun-god. He was the brother of Artemis (see DIANA), half-brother of HERMES, and father of ÆSCULAPIUS. He was the god of music, poetry, archery, prophecy and the healing art. His plant was the LAUREL and he is represented as the perfection of youthful manhood.

the fire rob'd god,
Golden Apollo.
SHAKESPEARE: A Winter's Tale, IV, iii.

A perfect Apollo is a model of manly beauty, referring to the APOLLO BELVEDERE.

Apollo Belvedere, so called from the Belvedere Gallery in the VATICAN, where it stands; an ancient statue of Apollo, supposedly a copy of a bronze votive statue of Delphi commemorating the repulse of an attack by the Gauls on his shrine in 279 B.C. It was discovered at Antium (Anzio) in 1485.

Apollo of Portugal. Luis de Camoëns (1524-1580), author of the LUSIAD, so called for the beauty of his poetry.

Apollonius of Tyana. A Pythagorean philosopher (born shortly before the Christian era), accredited with exceptional powers of magic. It was he who discovered that the Phœnician woman whom Menippus Lycius intended to wed was in fact a serpent or LAMIA. This story was noted by Robert Burton in his Anatomy of Melancholy, and it forms the subject of Keats' Lamia.

Apollyon (á pol' yón). The Greek name of ABADDON, King of HELL. It is used by Bunyan in The Pilgrim's Progress.

Apostopesis. See QUOS EGO.

Apostate, The. Julian, the Roman Emperor (c. 331-363). So called because he forsook the Christian faith for paganism, which he sought to promote after his accession (361).

A posteriori (ā pos tē' ri ór' i) (Lat. from the latter). An a posteriori argument is proving the cause from the effect. Thus if we see a watch, we conclude there was a watchmaker. ROBINSON CRUSOE inferred there was another human being on the desert island, because he saw a human footprint in the wet sand. It is thus that the existence and character of God are inferred from his works. See A PRIORI.

Apostles. The badges or symbols of the fourteen apostles (i.e. the original twelve with MATTHIAS and PAUL) are as follows:

Andrew, an X-shaped cross because he was crucified on one.

Bartholomew, a knife, because he was flayed with a knife.

James the Great, a scallop shell, a pilgrim's staff, or a gourd bottle, because he is the patron saint of pilgrims.

James the Less, a fuller's pole, because he was killed by a blow on the head with a pole, dealt him by Simeon the fuller.

John, a cup with a winged serpent flying out of it, in allusion to the tradition about Aristodemus, priest of Diana, who challenged John to drink a cup of poison. John made the sign of a cross on the cup, Satan like a dragon flew from it, and John then drank the cup which was quite innocuous.

Judas Iscariot, a bag, because he "had the bag and bare what was put therein" (John xii, 6).

Jude, a club, because he was martyred with a club.

Matthew, a hatchet or halberd because he was slain at Nadabar with a halberd.

Matthias, a battleaxe, because he was first stoned, and then beheaded with a battleaxe.

Paul, a sword, because his head was cut off with a sword. The convent of La Liala in Spain boasts of possessing the very instrument.

Peter, a bunch of keys, because Christ gave him "the keys of the kingdom of heaven". A cock, because he went out and wept bitterly when he heard the cock crow (Matt. xxvi, 75).

Philip, a long staff surmounted with a cross, because he suffered death by being suspended by the neck from a tall pillar.

Simon, a saw, because he was sawn to death, according to tradition.

Thomas, a lance, because he was pierced through the body, at Meliapore, with a lance.

According to Catholic legend, seven of the Apostles are buried in Rome.

ANDREW lies buried at Amalfi (Naples).

BARTHOLOMEW, at Rome, in the church of Bartholomew, on the Tiber Island.

JAMES THE GREAT was buried at St. Jago de Compostella, in Spain.

JAMES THE LESS, at Rome, in the church of SS. Philip and James.

JOHN, at Ephesus.

JUDE, at Rome.

MATTHEW, at Salerno (Naples).

MATTHIAS, at Rome, in the church of St. Peter.

PAUL, at Rome, in the church of S. Paolo fuori le Mura.

PETER, at Rome, in the church of St. Peter.

PHILIP, at Rome.

SIMON or SIMON, at Rome.

THOMAS, at Ortona (Naples). (?Madras).

The supposed remains of MARK THE EVANGELIST were buried at Venice, about 800.

LUKE THE EVANGELIST is said to have been buried at Padua.

N.B.—Italy claims thirteen of these apostles or evangelists—Rome seven, Naples three, Mark at Venice, Luke at Padua, and Paul at Rome.

See EVANGELISTS.

Yorkshire, Paulinus, Archbishop of York (d. 644).
Wales, St. David (c. 500-c. 600).

Prince of the Apostles, St. PETER (Matt. xvi, 18, 19).

Apostle spoons. Silver spoons having the figure of one of the APOSTLES at the top of the handle, formerly given at christenings. Sometimes twelve spoons, representing the twelve apostles; sometimes four, representing the four EVANGELISTS; and sometimes only one was presented. Occasionally a set occurs, containing in addition the "Master Spoon" and the "Lady Spoon". Silver spoons were given to children of the wealthier classes, hence the saying BORN WITH A SILVER SPOON IN ONE'S MOUTH. See under BORN.

Apostles' Creed. A church creed supposed to be an epitome of doctrine taught by the apostles. It was received into the Latin Church, in its present form, in the 11th century, but a formula somewhat like it existed in the 2nd century. Items were added in the 4th and 5th centuries, and verbal alterations much later.

Apostolic Fathers. Christian writers born in the 1st century supposedly in contact with the original APOSTLES. Polycarp, the last of the Apostolic Fathers, born about 69, was believed to be the disciple of St. John the Apostle. Clement of Rome died c. 101, Ignatius c. 120, and Polycarp c. 155. Others are Barnabas, Hermas (author of The Shepherd and Papias (a bishop of Hierapolis, mentioned by Eusebius).

Apostolic Majesty. A title borne by the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary, first conferred by Pope Sylvester II on King Stephen of Hungary in 1001.

Apostolic Succession. The doctrine that the mission given to the APOSTLES by Christ (Matt. xxviii, 19) must extend to their legitimate successors in an unbroken line. Thus the only valid ministry is that of clergy ordained by properly consecrated BISHOPS.

Apparel. One meaning of this word used to be "ornament" or "embellishment", especially applied to orphreys, the embroidered borders of ecclesiastical vestments, and in particular to the ornamental parts of the alb, at the lower edge and at the wrists.

The albe should be made with apparels worked in silk or gold, embroidered with ornaments.

PUGIN: Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament (1844).

Appeal to the Country, An. To ask the nation to express its opinion on some particular issue or issues by dissolving PARLIAMENT and holding a general election.

Appiades (ăp' i á dēz). Five divinities whose temple stood near the Appian aqueduct in ROME. Their names are VENUS, PALLAS, Concord, Peace, and VESTA. They were represented on horseback, like AMAZONS. Also a name for the courtesans of this locality.

Appian Way (ăp' i ân). The "queen of long-distance roads" leading from Rome to Brundisium (Brindisi). This most famous Roman road was begun by the censor Appius Claudius about 312 B.C.

Apple. The apple appears more than once in Greek story; see APPLE OF DISCORD; ATALANTA'S RACE; HESPERIDES.

There is no mention of an apple in the Bible story of Eve's temptation. She took "the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden" (Gen. iii, 3).

For the story of William Tell and the apple, see TELL.

Apple, Newton and the. The well-known story of Newton and the apple originated with VOLTAIRE, who says that Mrs. Conduit, Newton's niece, told him that Newton was at Woolsthorpe (visiting his mother) in 1666 when, seeing an apple fall, he was led into the train of thought which resulted in his contribution to the laws of gravitation.

Apple, Prince Ahmed's, a cure for every disorder. In THE ARABIAN NIGHTS story of Prince Ahmed, the Prince purchased his apple at Samarkand.

Apple of Discord. A cause of dispute; something to contend about. At the marriage of THETIS and Peleus, where all the gods and goddesses assembled, Discord (Eris), who had not been invited, threw on the table a golden apple "for the most beautiful". Hera (JUNO), Pallas Athene (MINERVA), and Aphrodite (VENUS) put in their claims and PARIS, as referee, gave judgment in favour of Aphrodite. This brought upon him the vengeance of Hera and PALLAS, to whose spite the fall of TROY was attributed.

Apple of the eye. The pupil, because it was anciently supposed to be a round solid ball like an apple. Figuratively anything held extremely dear or much cherished.

He kept him as the apple of his eye.
Deut. xxxii, 10.

Apple Tree Gang. The name given to John Reid and his Scottish friends who introduced golf into the U.S.A. in 1888, at Yonkers, N.Y. The name was coined in 1892 when they moved to their third "course" at Yonkers—a 34-acre orchard which yielded six holes.

Apple-cart. To upset the apple-cart. To ruin carefully laid plans. To have one's expectations blighted, as a farmer's might be when his load of apples was overturned. This phrase is recorded in use as early as 1796.

Apple-islanders. NICKNAME for the inhabitants of Tasmania, who are also known as Tassies and Mountain-devils.

Apple-jack. An apple-turnover is sometimes so called in East Anglia; in the U.S.A. the name of a drink distilled from fermented apple juice—like French Calvados.

Apple-john. An apple so called from its being mature about St. JOHN THE BAPTIST'S Day, 24 June. The French call it Pomme de Saint Jean. We are told that apple-johns will keep for two years, and are best when shrivelled.

I am withered like an old apple-john.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Part I, III, iii.

Incorrectly called Apples of King John, other probable names are Deus Ans, Dusand, Dewsum, Jewsum and Pomme de Fer.

Apple-pie bed, or pie bed. A bed in which the sheets are so folded that a person cannot get his legs down. Perhaps a corruption of nappe pliée (French), a folded sheet.

Apple-pie order. Everything just so, in perfect order. The origin of the phrase is uncertain. Perhaps the suggestion nappes pliées (Fr. folded linen), neat as folded linen, is near the mark. See APPLE-PIE BED.

Apple-polishing. An attempt to win favour by gifts or flattery. From the practice of American schoolchildren bringing shiny apples to their teachers.

Apples, Isle of. See AVALON.

Apples of Iduna. See IDUNA.

Apples of Istakhar are "all sweetness on one side, and all bitterness on the other".

Apples of Paradise, according to tradition, had a bite on one side, to commemorate the bite given by Eve.

Apples of perpetual youth. See IDUNA.

Apples of Pyban, says Sir John Mandeville, fed the pigmies with their odour only.

Apples of Sodom. Possibly the madar or oschur (Caloptiris procerata). The fruit of trees reputed to grow on the shores of the Dead Sea "which bear lovely fruit, but within are full of ashes". Josephus, Strabo and Tacitus refer to them.

Like an apple of Sodom, signifies disappointment and disillusion. "Dead Sea fruit" has a similar meaning.

Like to the apples on the Dead Sea shore,
All ashes to the taste.

BYRON: Childe Harold, III, 34.

Après moi le déluge. After me the deluge—I care not what happens after I am dead. Madame de Pompadour (1721–1764), mistress of Louis XV, used the phrase, Après nous le déluge, when remonstrated with on account of the extravagances of the Court, possibly having heard her royal lover use it. Metternich (1773–1859), the Austrian statesman, used the expression, meaning that the existing order would collapse when his guiding hand was removed.

April. The opening month (Lat. aperire, to open) when trees unfold and the womb of nature opens with young life. In the French Republican CALENDAR of 1793 it was called Germinal, the time of budding (21 March to 19 April).

April fool called in France un poisson d'avril, and in Scotland a gowk (cuckoo), a person befooled or tricked on All Fool's Day (1 April). In India similar tricks are played at the Holi Festival (31 March), so that it cannot refer to the uncertainty of the weather, nor yet to a mockery of the trial of our Redeemer, the two most popular explanations. A better solution is this: as 25 March used to be New Year's Day, 1 April was its octave, when its festivities culminated and ended.

It may be a relic of the Roman CEREALIA, held at the beginning of April. The tale is that PROSERPINA was sporting in the Elysian meadows, and had just filled her lap with daffodils, when PLUTO carried her off to the lower world. Her mother, CERES, heard the echo of her screams, and went in search of the voice; but her search was a fool's errand, it was "hunting the gowk", or looking for the "echo of a scream".

A priori (ā pri ōr' i) (Lat. from an antecedent). An a priori argument is one in which a fact is deduced from something antecedent, as when we infer certain effects from given causes. Mathematical proofs are of this kind whereas judgments in the law courts are usually A POSTERIORI; we infer the animus from the act.

Apron (O. Fr. napperon). Originally napron in English, it is representative of many words that have either lost or gained an "n" through coalescence, or the reverse, with the article "a" or "an". A napron became an apron. Other examples are adder for a nadder, auger for a nauger, and umpire for a numpire. The opposite coalescence may be seen in newt for an ewt, NICKNAME for an ekename, and the obsolete nuncle for mine uncle. See NONCE.

Apron-string tenure. A tenure held in virtue of one's wife. Tied to one's mother's apron strings. Completely under one's mother's thumb, particularly of a young man dominated by his mother.

Aqua Fortis (āk' wā for' tis) (Lat. strong water). Nitric acid.

Aqua Regia (āk' wā rē' jā) (Lat. royal water). A mixture usually of one part concentrated nitric acid with three parts concentrated hydrochloric acid; so called because it dissolves GOLD, the king of metals.

Aqua Tofana (āk' wā tof' ā nā). A poisonous liquid containing arsenic, much used in Italy in the 18th century by young wives who wanted to get rid of their husbands. It was invented about 1690 by a Greek woman named Tofana, who called it the Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari, from a widespread notion that an oil of miraculous efficacy flowed from the tomb of that saint.

Aqua vitæ (āk' wā vi' tē) (Lat. water of life). Brandy or distilled spirits. EAU DE VIE, whisky, and the Irish USQUEBAUGH have the same meaning. Also certain ardent spirits used by the alchemists. Ben Jonson calls a vendor of such an "acquavitæ man" (Alchemist, I, i.) The ELIXIR OF LIFE was made from distilled spirits.

Aquarius (ā kwār' i ūs) (Lat. the water-bearer). The eleventh sign of the ZODIAC (21 January to 18 February). Its symbol is a man pouring water from a vessel, its sign ♃ representing a stream of water.

Aquila non captat muscas (āk' wi lā non cāp' tāt mūs' kās). A Latin phrase—"an eagle does not hawk at flies", a proverbial saying implying that little things are beneath a great man's contempt.

Aquiline. See FAMOUS HORSES under HORSE.

Aquinian Sage, The. Juvenal is so called because he was born at Aquinum, a town of the Volscians, in Latium.

Arabesque. A term now applied to forms of design derived from classical grotesque.

The original Moorish Arabesque (now usually called Moresque, Alhambresque or Saracenic) did not admit representation of natural objects.

Arabia. It was Ptolemy who was the author of the threefold division into Arabia Petræa, or Stony (Hejaz); Arabia Felix, or Fruitful (Hasa, Hadramaut, Oman and Yemen); Arabia Deserta or Desert (Nejd).

Arabian Bird, The. The PHOENIX; hence, figuratively, a marvellous or unique person.

All of her that is out of door most rich!
If she be furnish'd with a mind so rare,
She is alone the Arabian bird.

SHAKESPEARE: Cymbeline, I, vi.

Arabian Nights Entertainments, The, or The Thousand and One Nights.

These ancient Oriental tales were first introduced into western Europe in a French translation by Antoine Galland (12 vols., 1704-1717), derived from an Egyptian text probably of 14th- or 15th-century origin. English translations based on Galland were made by R. Heron (1792) and W. Beloe (1795). The later English translations by Henry Torrens (1838), E. W. Lane (1839-1841), John Payne (1882-1884), and Sir Richard Burton's unexpurgated edition published at Benares (16 vols., 1885-1888) are based on a late 18th-century Egyptian text. The standard French translation by J. C. Mardrus (1899-1904) has been severely criticized.

The framework of the tales is that they were told by SCHEHERAZADE, bride of Sultan Schahriah, to stave off her execution.

Arabians. An obscure Arabian Christian sect of the 3rd century who maintained that the soul dies with the body but rejoins the body on the last day. This heresy was overcome by Origen (c. 185-c. 254).

Arabic figures. The figures 1, 2, 3, 4, etc., so called because they were introduced into Spain by the MOORS or Arabs about the end of the 10th century who brought them from India about two centuries previously. They did not generally supersede the Roman figures (i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii, ix, x, etc.), until the 16th century. Far more important than the characters is the decimalism of these figures; 1 figure = units, 2 figures = tens, 3 figures = hundreds, and so on. See NUMBERS.

Street Arabs. Children of the houseless poor; street urchins. So called from the nomadic habits of the Arabs who had no fixed abode.

Arachne's Labours (à rāk' ni). Spinning and weaving. The story is that Arachne challenged ATHENE to a weaving contest and hanged herself when the goddess destroyed her web. Athene then changed her into a spider, hence Arachnida, the scientific name for spiders, scorpions and mites.

Aram, Eugene (âr' âm) (1704-1759). A schoolmaster of considerable learning who while at Knaresborough was involved with one Daniel Clark in a series of frauds. He murdered Clark in 1745 but was not found out until 1758, when he was teaching at King's Lynn. He was executed on 6 August 1759. A competent scholar in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Welsh, etc., his story is told in Hood's poem The Dream of Eugene Aram (1831), and Lytton's novel Eugene Aram (1832).

Arawn (ã' roun). King of ANNWN.

Arbor Day. A day set apart in Canada, the United States and New Zealand, for planting trees, first observed in Nebraska in 1872 where it became a legal holiday in 1885. The date varies according to locality.

Arbor Judæ. See JUDAS TREE.

Arcadia (ar' kã' di à). A district of the Peloponnesus named after Arcas, son of JUPITER, chiefly inhabited by shepherds and the abode of PAN. According to VIRGIL it was the home of pastoral simplicity and happiness. The name was used by Sidney for the title of his romance (1590) and soon became a byword for rustic bliss.

Arcades ambo (ar' kã' dēz' âm' bō) (Lat.). From VIRGIL's seventh ECLOGUE: "Ambo florentes etatibus, Arcades ambo" (Both in the flower of youth, Arcadians both), meaning "both poets or musicians", now extended to two persons having tastes or habits in common. BYRON gave the phrase a whimsical turn:

Each pulled different ways with many an oath,
"Arcades ambo"—id est, blackguards both.

Don Juan, iv, 93.

Arcadian beasts. An old expression to be found in Plautus, Pliny, etc. See PERSIUS, iii, 9:

Arcadiae pecuaria rudere credas, and Rabelais, V, vii. So called because the ancient Arcadians were renowned as simpletons. Juvenal (vii, 160) has arcadicus juvenis, meaning a stupid youth.

Arcas. See CALISTO.

Archangel. In Christian story the title is usually given to MICHAEL, the chief opponent of SATAN and his angels, and to GABRIEL, RAPHAEL, URIEL, Chamuel, Jophiel and ZADKIEL. See ANGEL.

According to the KORAN, there are four archangels; Gabriel, the angel of revelations, who writes down the divine decrees; Michael, the champion, who fights the battle of the faith; AZRAEL, the angel of death; and ISRAFAEL, who is commissioned to sound the trumpet of the resurrection.

Archers. The best archers in British legend are ROBIN HOOD, and his two companions LITTLE JOHN and Will Scarlet.

The famous archers of Henry II were Tepus, his bowman of the guards, Gilbert of the white hind, Hubert of Suffolk, and Clifton of Hampshire.

Nearly equal to these were Egbert of Kent and William of Southampton, and CLYM OF THE CLOUGH.

Domitian, the Roman emperor, we are told, could shoot four arrows between the spread of the fingers of a man's hand.

The story of TELL reproduces the Scandinavian tale of EGIL, who at the command of King Nidung performed a precisely similar feat.

Arches, Court of. The ecclesiastical court of appeal for the province of Canterbury, which was anciently held in the church of St. Mary-le-Bow (Beata Maria de Arcubus, St. Mary of the Arches), Cheapside, London.

Archeus (ar' kē' us). According to PARACELSUS (c. 1490-1541), the immaterial principle which energizes all living substances. There were supposed to be numerous archei; the chief one was said to reside in the stomach.

Archies. In World War I anti-aircraft guns and batteries were thus nicknamed—probably from Archibald, the hero of one of George Robey's songs.

Archilochian Bitterness (ar' ki lō' ki ân). Ill-natured SATIRE or bitter mockery, so named from Archilochus, a Greek satirical poet (fl. c. 650 B.C. and after).

Archimago (ar' ki mā' gō). The enchanter in Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bks. I and II), typifying hypocrisy.

Archimedes' Principle

Archimedes' Principle (ar ki mē' dēz).

The apparent loss in weight of a body immersed in liquid will equal the weight of the displaced liquid. This discovery was made by Archimedes of Syracuse (c. 287-212 B.C.). See EUREKA.

Archimedes Screw. A spiral screw for raising water, etc. invented by Archimedes. A carpenter's auger works on this principle.

Architecture, Orders of. In classical architecture, DORIC, IONIC, CORINTHIAN, Tuscan (a debased form of Doric) and Composite (a compound of Ionic and Corinthian).

Archontics. A 2nd-century Gnostic sect attributing the creation to God's agents or archons (Greek archon, a chief magistrate or ruler).

Arcite (ar si' ti, ar' sit). A Theban knight made captive by Duke THESEUS, and imprisoned with Palamon at ATHENS. Both captives fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister (or daughter in some versions), and after gaining their liberty Emily was promised by the duke to the victor in a tournament. Arcite won but was thrown from his horse and killed when riding to receive his prize. Emily became the bride of Palamon. Chaucer, in his Knight's Tale, borrowed the story from Boccaccio's Teseide (1341), and it is told by Fletcher in his Two Noble Kinsmen (1634), and Dryden in his Fables (1699).

Arcos Barbs. War steeds of Arcos, in Andalusia, famous in Spanish ballads. See BARB.

Arctic Region means the region of the Bear stars, from arktos, bear (meaning both the animal and the constellation), hence northern. Arcturus (the bear-ward) or Alpha Boötis is the brightest star in the Northern Hemisphere and can be found by following the curve of the Great Bear's tail. In Job xxxviii, 32, Arcturus is used for the Great Bear itself. See under BEAR.

Arden, The Forest of. In north Warwickshire, once part of a large Midland forest, famous as the probable setting of Shakespeare's As You Like It.

Arden, Enoch. The story in Tennyson's poem of this name (1864), of a husband who mysteriously and unwillingly disappears, and returns years later to find that his wife (who still treasures his memory) is married to another, is not an uncommon theme. It is reminiscent of Crabbe's The Parting Hour, and a similar story appeared in Adelaide Anne Procter's Homeward Bound (in her Legends and Lyrics, 1858), and Mrs. Gaskell's Manchester Marriage.

Arden of Feversham. A play (printed in 1592) once attributed to Shakespeare and possibly written by Thomas Kyd (1558-1594), based on the murder of Thomas Arden, Mayor of Faversham, Kent (1548). Alice Arden plans the murder with the aid of two ruffians, who rush in on the signal "Now I take you", when her husband and her paramour, Mosbie, are playing draughts.

George Lillo's play of this name was completed after his death (1739) by Dr. John Hoadly and acted in 1759.

Areopagus (ār e op' á gus) (Gr. the hill of Mars or Ares). The seat of a famous tribunal in ATHENS; so called from the tradition that MARS was tried there for causing the death of NEPTUNE's son Halirrothius.

Ares (ār' ēz). The Greek god of war, son of ZEUS and HERA and identified with the Roman MARS.

Arethusa. See ALPHEUS AND ARETHUSA.

Aretinian Syllables. Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, used by Guido d'Arezzo or Aretino in the 11th century for his hexachord, or scale of six notes. These names were taken from the Latin hymn by Paulus Diaconus, addressed to St. JOHN, which Guido used in teaching singing:

Ut queant laxis, Re-sonare fibris,
Mi-ra gestorum Fa-muli tuorum,
Sol-ve pollutis La-biis reatum

Ut-tered be thy wondrous story,
Re-prehensive though I be,
Me make mindful of thy glory,
Fa-mous son of Zacharee;
Sol-ace to my spirit bring,
La-bouring thy praise to sing.

E.C.B.

Si was added in the 16th century and do (doh), probably from dominus, took the place of ut in the 17th century. In England te replaced si in the 19th century (ti or si are used in the U.S.A.).

Argan (ar' gán). The principal character in Molière's Malade Imaginaire, a hypochondriac, uncertain whether to think more of his ailments or of his purse.

Argenis (ar' jen is). A political allegory by John Barclay (1582-1621) written in Latin and published in 1621. It deals with the state of Europe, and France in particular, in the time of the CATHOLIC LEAGUE. "Sicily" is France, "Poliarchus" (with whom Argenis is in love) is Henry IV, "Hyanisbe" is Queen Elizabeth I, etc.

Argentine, Argentina (ar' jen ün, ar jen tē' ná). This South American republic, The Silver Republic, takes its name from the Rio de la Plata, or River of Silver, so called from the Indian silver work sent to Spain by Sebastian Cabot in 1526, assumed to indicate vast future wealth.

Argo (Gr. argos, swift). The galley of JASON that went in search of the GOLDEN FLEECE. Hence a ship sailing on any specially adventurous voyage. Also a southern constellation (the Ship) into which ATHENE transformed the ARGONAUTS after the failure of their quest.

Argonauts. The sailors of the ship Argo, who sailed from Iolcos to Colchis in quest of the GOLDEN FLEECE. Apollonius of Rhodes wrote an epic poem on the subject. The name is also given to a family of cephalopod molluscs (cuttlefish).

Argosy. A merchant ship. A corruption of ragusea. Large merchant ships were built and sailed from Ragusa in Dalmatia.

He hath an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indies . . . a third at Mexico, a fourth for England.

SHAKESPEARE: The Merchant of Venice, I, iii.

Argus-eyed. Jealously watchful. According to Grecian fable, Argus had 100 eyes, and JUNO set him to watch IO, of whom she was jealous. MERCURY, however, charmed him to sleep with his lyre, and slew him. Juno then set the eyes of Argus on the peacock's tail. See PEACOCK'S FEATHER.

So praysen babes the Peacocks spotted train,
And wondren at bright Argus blazing eye.

SPENSER: The Shepherds Calendar, October.

Argyle, God bless the Duke of Argyle, a phrase supposed to have been used by Scottish Highlanders when they scratched themselves. The story is that a Duke of Argyle had posts erected on a treeless part of his estates so that his cattle might rub against them to ease themselves of the "torment of flies". The herdsmen saw the value of the practice, and as they rubbed their itching backs against the posts they thankfully uttered the above words.

Ariadne (ä ri äd' ni). In Greek mythology, daughter of the Cretan King, MINOS. She helped THESEUS to escape from the LABYRINTH, and later went with him to Naxos where he deserted her. Here DIONYSUS found her and married her.

Arians (är' i änz). The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the Church of Alexandria in the 4th century. He maintained (1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence prior to His appearance on earth, but not from eternity; (4) that the MESSIAH was not real man, but a divine being in a veil of flesh. The heresy was condemned by the Council of Nicæa (325), which upheld the orthodox view of Athanasius that the Son was "of the same substance" with the Father.

Ariel (är' iel). A Hebrew name signifying "lion of God". In Isaiah xxix, 1-7, it is applied to Jerusalem; in astronomy a satellite of URANUS; in demonology and literature, the name of a spirit. Thus Ariel is one of the seven angelic "princes" in Heywood's Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels (1635); one of the rebel angels in Milton's Paradise Lost, VI, 371 (1667); a SYLPH, the guardian of Belinda, in Pope's Rape of the Lock (1712); but best known as "an ayrie spirit" in Shakespeare's Tempest. According to the play Ariel was enslaved to the witch Sycorax (I, ii) who overtaken him, and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his power, shut him up in a pine-riфт for twelve years. On the death of Sycorax, Ariel became the slave of CALIBAN, who tortured him most cruelly. PROSPERO liberated him and was gratefully served by the fairy until set free.

Aries (är' ēz). The RAM. The first sign of the ZODIAC in which the sun is from 21 March to 20 April. The legend is that the ram with the golden fleece, which bore Phrixus and Helle on its back, was finally sacrificed to ZEUS, who set it the heavens as a constellation.

Arimanes (a ri ma' nēz). Another form of AHRIMAN. BYRON introduces him under this name in Manfred, seated "on a Globe of Fire, surrounded by the Spirits".

Arimaspians (är im äs' pi änz). A one-eyed people of Scythia constantly at war with the GRIFFINS who guarded a hoard of gold. They are mentioned by Lucan (Pharsalia, iii, 280), Herodotus (iii, 116; iv, 13, 27), Pliny, Strabo etc. Rabelais (IV, lvi, and V, xxix) so names the peoples of northern Europe who had accepted the REFORMATION, the suggestion being that they had lost one eye—that of faith.

As when a gryphon, through the wilderness
With winged course, o'er hill or moory dale
Pursues the Arimaspan, who by stealth
Had from his wakeful custody purloin'd
The guarded gold.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, II, 943-7.

Arioch (är' i ok). The name means "a fierce lion" and was used for one of the fallen angels in Paradise Lost (VI, 371); Milton took it from Dan. ii, 14, where it is the name of the captain of the guard.

Arion (ä ri' on). A Greek poet and musician (7th century B.C.) reputed to have been cast into the sea by mariners but carried to Taenaros on a dolphin's back. See HORSE.

Ariosto, Lodovico (är i os' tō) (1474-1533). Italian poet, author of ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Ariosto of the North. So BYRON called Sir Walter Scott (Childe Harold, iv, 40).

Aristides (ä ris' ti dēz). Athenian statesman and general, surnamed "the Just" (c. 520-c. 468 B.C.), who took part in the battles of Marathon and Salamis, and was in command at Platæa.

The British Aristides. Andrew Marvell (1621-1678), poet and satirist.

The French Aristides. Jules Grévy (1807-1891), president of the Third Republic (1879-1887), a barrister by profession.

Aristophanes (är is tof' ä nēz) (c. 450-c. 385 B.C.). The great Athenian comic dramatist.

The English or modern Aristophanes. Samuel Foote (1722-1777), author of The Mayor of Garret.

The French Aristophanes. MOLIÈRE (Jean Baptiste Poquelin) (1622-1673).

Aristotle (är' is totl) (384-322 B.C.). The great Greek philosopher, pupil of Plato, and founder of the PERIPATETIC SCHOOL.

Aristotelian philosophy (är is tot ē' li än). Aristotle maintained that four separate causes are necessary before anything exists: the material cause, the formal, the final, and the moving cause. The first is the antecedents from which the thing comes into existence; the second, that which gives it its individuality; the moving or efficient cause is that which causes matter to assume its individual forms; and the final cause is that for which the thing exists. According to Aristotle, matter is eternal.

Aristotelian Unities. See DRAMATIC UNITIES.

Arm, Arms. This word, with the meaning of the limb, has given rise to numerous common phrases, such as:

Arm of the sea. A narrow inlet.

Secular arm. Civil as opposed to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

To chance your arm. See CHANCE.

At arm's length. At a good distance; hence with avoidance of familiarity.

Infant in arms. One too young to walk and so has to be carried.

With open arms. Cordially, as a dear friend is received, with arms open for an embrace.

Arm-shrines. In the MIDDLE-AGES bodily relics of saints were often put in metal containers modelled on the shape of the contents. Arm-shrines were normally cylinders of silver ending in the shape of a hand. Head-shrines were called Chefs.

The word arm is almost always used in the plural nowadays when denoting implements or accoutrements for fighting, etc., and also in heraldic usage. Some common phrases are:

A nation in arms is one in which the people are armed for war.

A passage of arms. A literary controversy; a battle of words.

An assault at arms (or of arms). A hand-to-hand military exercise.

Coat of Arms. See ARMOUR.

Small arms. Those which do not, like artillery, require carriages.

To appeal to arms. To decide an issue by resorting to the test of war.

To arms. Make ready for battle.

To lay down arms. To cease from armed hostilities; to surrender.

Under arms. Prepared for battle; in battle array.

Up in arms. In open rebellion; figuratively, roused to anger.

King of Arms. See HERALDRY.

The right to bear arms. This is based on proven descent, through the male line, from an ancestor entitled to bear certain arms; or by a grant from the College of Arms (Heralds' College) in England and Wales; the NORROY and ULSTER King of Arms in Ulster; and the LYON King of Arms in Scotland. A person having such right is said to be armigerous. Actually there is little to prevent individuals from adopting arms without the consent of these authorities. See HERALDRY.

In the U.S.A. the right to bear arms means the right of a citizen to have a gun and is still zealously championed by many. It derives from Article II in the BILL OF RIGHTS which reads, "A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

The Royal Arms of England. The systematic use of Royal Arms begins with Richard I, who introduced the three lions passant gardant. In 1340 Edward III styled himself "of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King", and quartered the arms of France with those of England. This title and practice was abandoned in 1801 when the Arms were re-marshalled consequent upon the Union with Ireland. During Mary Tudor's reign the arms of Philip II of Spain were impaled on the existing Arms. James I of England and VI of Scotland introduced the LION rampant of Scotland and the harp of Ireland (derived from the badge assigned to Ireland in the reign of Henry VIII). During the reign of William III and Mary II the arms of Nassau were added, and on the accession of George I the White Horse of Hanover was superimposed until the Hanoverian connection ended with the accession of Victoria in 1837. The lion supporter for England and the UNICORN for Scotland were introduced by James I. The lion statant gardant on the crest was first used by Edward III.

The correct emblazoning of the arms of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is:

Quarterly, first and fourth gules, three lions passant gardant in pale, or, for England; second or, a lion rampant with a double tressure flory-counterflory gules, for Scotland; third azure, a harp or, stringed argent, for Ireland; all surrounded by the Garter. Crest.—Upon the royal helm, the imperial crown proper, thereon a lion statant gardant or, imperial crowned proper. Supporters.—A lion rampant gardant, or, crowned as the crest. Sinister, a unicorn argent, armed, crined, and unguled proper, gorged with a coronet composed of crosses patée and fleur de lis, a chain affixed thereto passing between the forelegs, and reflexed over the back, also or. Motto.—"Dieu et mon Droit" in the compartment below the shield, with the Union rose, shamrock, and thistle engrafted on the same stem.

Armageddon (ar má ged' ón). The name given in the Apocalypse (Rev. xvi, 16) to the site of the last great "battle of that great day of God almighty" between the forces of good and evil. Hence any great battle or scene of slaughter.

Armchair general. A person who thinks he knows how to direct affairs in which he is not taking part. Somewhat similarly one talks of BACK SEAT DRIVER.

Arme Blanche (arm blonsh) (Fr. white arm). Steel weapons—the sword, sabre, bayonet, or spear—in contradistinction to firearms.

Armida (ar mé' da). In Tasso's JERUSALEM DELIVERED a beautiful sorceress, with whom RINALDO fell in love and wasted his time in voluptuous pleasure. After his escape from her, Armida followed him, but being unable to lure him back, set fire to her palace, rushed into a combat, and was slain.

In 1806 Frederick William of Prussia declared war on NAPOLEON, and his young queen rode about in military costume to arouse popular enthusiasm. When Napoleon was told of it, he said, "She is Armida, in her distraction setting fire to her own palace."

Arminians. Followers of Jacobus Hermansen or Arminius (1560-1609), anti-Calvinist theologian and professor at Leiden. They asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent and believe; that He wills all men to be saved and that His predestination is founded on His foreknowledge. His Dutch followers came to be called "Remonstrants" after their "remonstrance" of 1610 embodying their five points of difference from orthodox Calvinism. In England the name was applied to the supporters of William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury (1633-1645).

Armistice Day. 11 November, the day set aside to commemorate the fallen in World War I, marked by a two-minute silence at 11 a.m. and religious ceremonies. The armistice ending the war was signed at 11 o'clock on 11 November 1918. In 1946 the name was changed to REMEMBRANCE DAY to include a memorial of those who gave their lives in World War II. It is kept on the second Sunday of November. In the U.S.A. and Canada 11 November is a legal holiday, its name being changed to Veterans' Day in 1954.

Armory. The old name for HERALDRY, the word originally used to describe arms, military equipment and their employment.

Armory is an Art rightly prescribing the true knowledge and use of Armes.

Guillim's Display of Heraldrie (1610).

Armory, Armoury. The place where armour and arms are kept. It may also mean armour collectively, as in Paradise Lost, IV, 553:

but nigh at hand

Celestial armoury, shields, helms, and spears,
Hung high with diamond flaming and with gold.

Armour, Coat, or a Coat of Arms, was originally a coat of silk or linen used to cover the Knight's armour from the heat of the sun, or from rust and dirt, and it was colourfully embroidered with the distinguishing device of the wearer.

Arnauts (ar' nauts) (Turk. brave men). Albanian mountaineers.

Stained with the best of Arnaut's blood.

BYRON: The Giaour.

Arnold of Rugby. Dr. Thomas Arnold (1795-1842), father of the poet Matthew Arnold, and famous headmaster and reformer of Rugby School portrayed as "The Doctor" in Tom Brown's Schooldays by Thomas Hughes. His avowed aim in education was "if possible to form Christian men, for Christian boys I can scarcely hope to make."

Arod, in Dryden and Tate's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, Part II, is designed for Sir William Waller.

But in the sacred annals of our plot
Industrious Arod never be forgot,
The labours of this midnight magistrate
May vie with Corah's [Titus Oates] to preserve the state.

Aroint thee. Get ye gone, be off. The phrase occurs in Shakespeare's Macbeth (I, iii, 6) and King Lear (III, iv, 129), on both occasions in connexion with witches. Its origin is unknown. The Brownings made a verb of it, Mrs. Browning in her To Flush ("Whiskered cats arointed flee") and Browning in The Two Poets of Croisic, and elsewhere.

Aroundight (ar' on dit). The sword of Sir LANCELOT OF THE LAKE.

Arras (ar' às). Tapestry, so called from Arras in Artois, once famed for its manufacture. When rooms were hung with tapestry it was easy for persons to hide behind it; so Hubert hid the two villains who were to put out Arthur's eyes (Shakespeare, King John, IV, i, 2); Polonius was slain by Hamlet while concealed behind the arras (Hamlet, III, iv); Falstaff hid behind it in Ford's house (Merry Wives of Windsor, III, iii); etc.

Arrière-ban. See BAN.

Arrière-pensée (Fr. behind-thought). A hidden or reserved motive, not apparent on the surface.

Arrow. See BROAD ARROW; JONATHAN'S ARROWS.

Artaxerxes (ár táks erks' éz), younger son of XERXES and king of the Persians (465-425 B.C.). His Persian name was Artakhshatra and he was called the long-handed (Longimanus) because his right hand was longer than his left. He is mentioned in the Bible in connexion with his part in the restoration of Jerusalem after the Captivity (Ezra iv, vi, vii, and Neh. ii, v, and xiii).

Artegal, or Arthegal, Sir (ar' te gál). The hero of Bk. V of Spenser's Færie Queene, lover of BRITOMART, to whom he was made known by means of a magic mirror. He is emblematic of Justice, and in many of his deeds, such as the rescue of Irena (Ireland) from Grantorto, is mirrored on Arthur, 14th Lord Grey de Wilton, who became lord deputy of Ireland in 1580 with Spenser as his secretary. See ELIDURE.

Artemis. See DIANA.

Artemus Ward. The name of an imaginary YANKEE showman and writer, the guise adopted by the American humorist, Charles Farrer Browne (1834-1867), for a series of books which became popular in America and England.

Artesian State, The. South Dakota, better known as the Coyote State.

Artful Dodger. A young thief, a most perfect adept in villainy, up to every sort of wicked dodge. Such was the character of Jack Dawkins, pupil of Fagin, in Dickens's Oliver Twist.

Arthegal. See ARTEGAL.

Arthur. As a shadowy "historical" figure is first mentioned under the Latin name Artorius in the late 7th-century Historia Britonum (usually known by the name of Nennius, its 9th-century editor). Arthur, as Dux Bellorum, not king, is said to have led the Britons against the Saxons in twelve great battles culminating in the great victory of Mons Badonicus (fought between 493 and 516). He is mentioned again by William of Malmesbury (early 12th century), but ARTHURIAN ROMANCES owe most to Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Arthur's Seat. A hill overlooking Edinburgh from the east. The name is a corruption of the GAELIC Ard-na-said, the height of the arrows, a convenient shooting ground.

Arthurian Romances. The stories which have King Arthur as their central figure appear as early as 1136 in Geoffrey of Monmouth's mainly fabulous Historia Regum Britannia, which was purported to be a translation (in Latin) of an ancient CELTIC history of Britain, lent to him by Walter Map, Archdeacon of Oxford. Geoffrey's Historia was dedicated to Robert, Earl of Gloucester, a natural son of Henry I. This was verified in French in Wace's Roman de Brut or Brut d'Angleterre (1155), which is the first to mention the ROUND TABLE. These were used by Layamon, the Worcestershire priest, whose BRUT (in English) was completed in about 1205, with additions such as the story of the faeries at Arthur's birth, who transported him to AVALON at his death. In France, in the late 12th century, Robert de Borron introduced the legend of the GRAIL and gave prominence to MERLIN; Chrestien de Troyes brought in the tale of ENID and GERAINT, the tragic loves of LANCELOT and GUINEVERE, the story of PERCEVAL and other material which was probably drawn from Welsh sources including the MABINOGION. Thus Walter Map and the Arthurian writers introduced the romantic spirit of CHIVALRY and courtly manners into European literature and King Arthur became the embodiment of the ideal Christian KNIGHT. Many other Welsh and Breton ballads, lays and romances popularized the legend and the whole corpus was collected and edited by Sir Thomas Malory (d. 1471) whose great prose romance Le Morte d'Arthur was produced by Caxton in 1485. Tennyson's Morte d'Arthur and Idylls of the King (1857-1885) were based upon it. See ASTOLAT, ALMESBURY, ARONDIGHT, BALIN, BAN, BEDIVERE, CAMELOT, CAMLAN, DAGONET, DIAMOND JOUSTS, ELAINE, EXCALIBUR, GLASTONBURY, LAUNFAL, LYONESSE, MODRED, MORGAN LE FAY, TRISTRAM, YSOLDE, etc.

Articles of Roup. The conditions of sale at a ROUP, as announced by a crier.

Artists, the Prince of. Albrecht Dürer (1471-1528) of Nuremberg was so called by his countrymen.

Arts, Degrees in Arts. In the mediæval universities the seven liberal arts consisted of the TRIVIUM (grammar, logic and rhetoric), and the QUADRIVIUM (arithmetic, geometry, music and astronomy).

In mediæval England the Master of Arts was the person qualified to teach or be the master of the students in arts; as the Doctor was in theology, law, or medicine.

Arundel. See HORSE.

Arundelian Marbles. A collection of ancient sculptures made at great expense by Thomas Howard, 14th Earl of Arundel (1585-1646), and presented to Oxford University in 1667 by his grandson Henry, 6th Duke of Norfolk. They include the famous Marmor Chronicon or Parian Chronicle (said to have been executed in the island of Paros about 263 B.C.) which recorded events in Greek history from 1582 to 264 B.C., although now incomplete and ending at 354 B.C.

Art Union. In Australia any kind of charitable lottery in which the prizes were original paintings. Whether these were attempts to bring culture to Australia or to unload unsaleable "works of art" is a moot point.

Arval Brothers (Fratres Arvales). An ancient Roman college of Priests, revived by AUGUSTUS. It consisted of twelve priests (including the Emperor), whose sole duty was to preside at the festival of Dea Dia in May. Ceremonies took place in Rome and in the grove of the goddess, who seems to be identical with Acca Larentia, goddess of cornfields.

Aryans. A name used for the parent stock of the Indo-European family of nations and popular with 19th-century philologists for the Indo-European languages (also sometimes called Indo-Germanic and JAPHETIC but more accurately Indo-Hittite). They include Sanskrit, Zend, Latin, Greek, Celtic, Persian, Hindu and all the European languages except Basque, Turkish, Hungarian, Finnish and Estonian. The name Aryan means "noble" and was used by early Hindus and Persians, to whose descendants it can be more properly applied. Anti-Semites prostituted the word and it was used by the German NAZIS to denote any people or thing that was not Semite, even the Japanese being classified as Aryans.

Asaph. In the Bible, a famous musician in David's time (I Chron. xvi, 5 and xxv, 1, 2). He is supposed to be the founder of the hereditary choir of b'ne Asaph in the Second Temple (Ezra iii, 10, 11 and Neh. vii, 44). Psalms 50 and 73-83 are ascribed to Asaph.

Tate lauds Dryden under this name in ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, Pt. II, 1063. While Judah's throne and Sion's rock stand fast, The song of Asaph and the fame shall last.

St. Asaph. A 6th-century Welsh saint, probably the first bishop of the see of Llanelwy which came to be called St. Asaph.

Ascalaphus. In Greek mythology, a son of ACHERON who said that PROSERPINE had partaken of a pomegranate when PLUTO had given her permission to return to the upper world if she had eaten nothing. In revenge Proserpine turned him into an owl by sprinkling him with the water of PHLEGETHON.

Ascendant. In casting a HOROSCOPE the point of the ECLIPTIC or degree of the ZODIAC which is nearest the eastern horizon at the time of birth is called the ascendant, and the easternmost star represents the house of life (see HOUSES, ASTROLOGICAL; STAR), because it is in the act of ascending. This is a man's strongest star, and when his outlook is bright, we say his star is in the ascendant.

The house of the Ascendant, includes five degrees of the zodiac above the point just rising, and twenty-five below it. Usually, the point of birth is referred to.

The lord of the ascendant, is any planet within the "house of the Ascendant". The house and lord of the ascendant at birth were said by astrologers to exercise great influence on the future life of the child. Deborah referred to the influence of the stars when she said "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Judges v, 20).

Ascension Day, or Holy Thursday (q.v.). The day set apart by the Christian Churches to commemorate the ascent of our Lord from earth to heaven. It is the fortieth day after EASTER. See BOUNDS, BEATING THE.

Asclepiads, or Asclepiadic Metre (ās kle pī' ādz). A Greek and Latin verse, possibly invented by Asclepiades (3rd century B.C.) consisting of a spondee, two (or three) choriambi, and an iambus, usually with a central cæsura, thus:

— — | — 0 0 — || — 0 0 — | 0 —

The first ode of HORACE is Asclepiadic. Its first and last two lines have been translated in the same metre:

Dear friend, patron of song, sprung from the race of kings;
Thy name ever a grace and a protection brings . . .
My name, if to the lyre haply you chance to wed,
Pride would high as the stars lift my exalted head.
E.C.B.

Ascot Races. A very fashionable race meeting held early in June on Ascot Heath, Berkshire. The course dates from 1711.

Ascræan Poet, or Sage (ās krē' ān). Hesiod, the Greek didactic poet, born at Ascræa in Bœotia. VIRGIL (Eclogues, vii, 70) calls him the "Old Ascræon".

Asgard (ās' gard) (As, a god; gard or gardh, an enclosure, garth or yard). The realm of the ÆSIR or the Northern gods, the OLYMPUS of Scandinavian mythology. It is said to be situated in the centre of the universe, and accessible only by the rainbow bridge, BIFROST. It contains many regions, and mansions such as Gladshheim and VALHALLA.

Ash Tree, or Tree of the Universe. See YGGDRASIL.

Ash Wednesday. The first day of LENT, so called from the Roman Catholic custom of sprinkling on the heads of penitents the consecrated ashes of palms remaining from the previous PALM SUNDAY. The custom is of uncertain date but is commonly held to have been introduced by GREGORY THE GREAT (Pope 590-604).

Ashes. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust. A phrase from the English burial service, used sometimes to denote total finality. It is founded on scriptural texts such as "dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return" (Gen. iii, 19), and "I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth in the sight of all them that behold thee" (Ezek. xxvii, 18).

Ashes to ashes and dust to dust,
If God won't have him the Devil must.

According to Sir Walter Scott (see his edition of Swift's Journal to Stella, 25 March 1710-11) this was the form of burial service given by the sexton to the body of the French spy Guiscard, who, in 1711, had attempted the life of Robert Harley.

The Ashes. The mythical prize contended for in the test CRICKET matches between England and Australia. When England was beaten in 1882 a humorous epitaph on English cricket appeared in the Sporting Times, winding up with the remark that "the body will be cremated and the ashes taken to Australia".

Ashmolean Museum (āsh mō' li ān). The first public museum in England opened at the University of Oxford in 1683 from a collection presented by Elias Ashmole (1617-1692), the antiquarian, in 1677; also called the Tradescant from John Tradescant, whose coveted collection Ashmole had secured.

Ashtaroth, or Ashtoreth. The goddess of fertility and reproduction among the Canaanites and Phœnicians, called by the Babylonians ISHTAR (VENUS) and by the Greeks ASTARTE. She is referred to in I Sam. xxi, 10; I Kings xi, 5 and II Kings xxiii, 13; and she may be the "queen of heaven" mentioned by Jeremiah (vii, 18; xlv, 17, 25). Formerly she was supposed to be a moon-goddess, hence Milton's reference in his Hymn on the Nativity.

And moonèd Ashtaroth, Heav'ns Queen and Mother both.

Ashur. See ASSHUR.

Asir. See ÆSIR.

Ask. The dialectal ax was common literary form until the late 16th century. The word is from the O.E. ascian, which by METATHESIS became ascian, and so axian.

How sholde I axen mercy of Tisbe
When I am he that have yow slain, alas!
CHAUCER: Legend of Good Women, 835.

The Wyclif version of Matt. vii, 7-10 begins:

Axe ye and it schal be gyven to you.

Askance at, to look. To regard obliquely, with suspicion or disapproval. Of uncertain origin but the expression of ill will sometimes used by gypsies "May the Lord look upon you sideways" probably stems from the same root idea.

Asleep at the switch. A failure in alertness of mind or lack of awareness of threatened danger. An American expression derived from the railroads. "To switch a train" is to transfer it to another set of rails by operating a switch. Failure to do this according to schedule might well lead to a catastrophe.

Asmodeus (ās mō' dē' us, ās mō' di ūs). The evil demon who appears in the Apocryphal book of TOBIT and is derived from the Persian Aeshma. In Tobit Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and causes the death of seven husbands in succession, each on his bridal night. He was finally driven into Egypt through a charm made by Tobias of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes, as described by Milton in Paradise Lost (IV, 167-71). Hence Asmodeus often figures as the spirit of matrimonial jealousy or unhappiness. Le Sage gave the name to the companion of Don Cleofas in his Le Diable Boiteux (1707).

Asmodeus flight. Don Cleofas, catching hold of his companion's cloak, is perched on the steeple of St. Salvador. Here the foul fiend stretches out his hand, and the roofs of all the houses open in a moment, to show the Don what is going on privately in each respective dwelling.

Could the reader take an Asmodeus-flight, and, waving open all roofs and privacies, look down from the roof of Notre Dame, what a Paris were it!

CARLYLE: French Revolution II, vi.

Asoka (ās' ō kā). Emperor of India c.274-232 B.C., who was converted to BUDDHISM by a miracle and became its "nursing father", as Constantine was of Christianity.

Aspasia (a spā' zī ā). A courtesan. The most celebrated of the Greek Hetæraæ. She lived at Athens as mistress of Pericles and after his death (429 B.C.) with Lysicles, the democratic leader.

Aspatia (a spā' shā), in the Maid's Tragedy, of Beaumont and Fletcher, is noted for her deep sorrows, her great resignation, and the pathos of her speeches. Amyntor deserts her, women point at her with scorn, she is the jest and byword of everyone, but she bears it all with patience.

Aspen, or trembling poplar. The aspen leaf is said to tremble, from shame and horror, because our Lord's cross was made of this wood. In fact, owing to the shape of the leaf and its long, flexible leaf-stalk, it is peculiarly liable to move with the least breath of air.

Asphaltic Lake. The DEAD SEA, where asphalt abounds both on the surface of the water and on the banks.

There was an Asphaltick and Bituminous nature that Lake before the fire of Gomorrhah.

SIR THOS. BROWNE: Religio Medici, i, 19.

Asphodel (ās' fō del). A plant genus of the lily family, particularly associated with death and the underworld in Greek legend. They were planted on graves, and the departed lived their phantom life in the Plain of Asphodel. The name daffodil is a corruption of asphodel.

Aspidistra. A very hardy member of the lily family, with broad lance-shaped leaves and small inconspicuous flowers borne at soil level. It was a very popular house plant from late Victorian times until the 1920s owing to its ability to survive in heated gas-lit rooms. It has become a symbol of Victorian lower-middle-class philistinism, respectability and stuffiness. George ORWELL wrote a novel called Keep the Aspidistra Flying.

Ass. According to tradition the dark stripe running down the back of an ass, crossed by another at the shoulders, was the cross communicated to the creature when our Lord rode on the back of an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

Ass, deaf to music. This tradition arose from the hideous noise made by "Sir Balaam" in braying. See ASS-EARED.

An ass in a lion's skin. A coward who hectors, a fool that apes the wise man. The allusion is to the fable of an ass that put on lion's skin, but was betrayed by his braying.

An ass with two panniers. A man out walking with a lady on each arm, called in Italy a pitcher with two handles, and formerly in London walking bodkin (see BODKIN). Our expression is from the French faire le panier à deux anses.

Ass-eared. MIDAS had the ears of an ass. The tale says APOLLO and PAN had a contest, and chose Midas to decide which was the better musician. Midas gave sentence in favour of Pan; and Apollo, in disgust, changed his ears into those of an ass.

Avarice is as deaf to the voice of virtue, as the ass to the voice of Apollo.

ARIOSTO: Orlando Furioso, xvii.

Golden Ass. See GOLDEN.

Sell your ass. Get rid of your foolish ways.

That which thou knowest not perchance thine ass can tell thee. An allusion to Balaam's ass (Num. xxii, 21-33).

The ass waggeth his ears. A proverb applied to those who lack learning, and yet talk as if they were very wise; men wise in their own conceits. The ass, proverbial for having no "taste for music", will nevertheless wag its ears at a "concord of sweet sounds", just as if it could well appreciate it.

Till the ass ascends the ladder—i.e. NEVER. A rabbinical expression. The Romans had a similar one, cum asinus in tegulis ascenderit (when the ass climbs to the tiles).

Ass's bridge. See PONS ASINORUM.

Well, well! honey is not for the ass's mouth. Persuasion will not persuade fools. The gentlest words will not divert the anger of the unreasonable.

Wrangle for an ass's shadow. To contend about trifles. The tale told by Demosthenes is, that a man hired an ass to take him to Megara; and at noon, the sun being very hot, the traveller dismounted, and sat himself down in the shadow of the ass. Just then the owner came up and claimed the right of sitting in this shady spot, saying that he let out the ass for hire, but there was no bargain made about the ass's shade. The two men then fell to blows to settle the point in dispute. While they were wrangling the ass took to its heels and ran away, leaving them both in the glare of the sun.

Asses as well as pitchers have ears. Children and even the densest minds hear and understand many a word and hint which the speaker supposed would pass unheeded.

Feast of Asses. See under FOOL.

Asses that carry the mysteries (asini portant mysteria). A classical knock at the Roman clergy. The allusion is to the custom of employing asses to carry the cista which contained the sacred symbols, when processions were made through the streets (WARBURTON: Divine Legation, ii, 4).

Assassins (à sàs' inz). Killers by treachery and violence. Originally a sect of MOSLEM fanatics founded in Persia, about 1090, by Hassan ben Sabbah (better known as the Old Man of the MOUNTAIN), their terrorism was mainly directed against the SELJUK authority. From Persia and Iraq they extended their activities to Syria in the early 12th century. Their power was broken by 1273 through the attacks of the Mongols and the MAMELUKE Sultan Bibars. Their name hashishin is derived from their reputed habit of dosing themselves with hashish or bang prior to their murderous assaults.

Assay (à sã), or Essay (through O.Fr. from Lat. exagium, weighing). To try or test metals, coin, etc.; and formerly to taste food or drink before it was offered to a monarch; hence, to take the assay is to taste wine to prove it is not poisoned.

The aphetic form of the word, "say", was common until the 17th century. Thus Edmund in King Lear (V, iii), says to Edgar, "thy tongue some say of breeding breathes"; i.e. thy speech gives indication of good breeding—it savours of it.

Assay as a noun means a test or trial.

(He) makes vow before his uncle never more
To give the assay of arms against your majesty.
SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, II, ii.

For the last 300 years the spelling essay (from French) has been used for the noun, except in connexion with the assaying of metals.

Assaye Regiment. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Asshur. Originally the local god of Asshur, the capital of Assyria, he became the chief god of the kingdom. His symbol was the winged sun disc enclosing a male figure wearing a horned cap, often with a bow in his hand. His name was frequently linked with the goddess ISHTAR of Nineveh. See ASHTAROTH.

Assumption, Feast of the. 15 August, celebrated in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH to commemorate the death of the Virgin MARY and the assumption of her body into HEAVEN when it was reunited to her soul. It can be traced back to the 6th century and in 1950 Pope Pius XII declared that the Corporal Assumption was thenceforth a dogma of the Church.

Assurance. Audacity, self-confidence. "His assurance is quite unbearable". Also a security against loss, insurance.

To make assurance doubly sure. To make security doubly sure or secure.

But yet I'll make assurance double sure
 And take a bond of fate.

SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, IV, i.

Astarte (á star' tí). The Greek name for Astoreth (ASHTAROTH), sometimes considered a moon-goddess. Hence Milton's allusion in Paradise Lost I, 437-9,

With these in troop

Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians call'd
 Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.

BYRON gave the name to the lady beloved by Manfred in his drama, Manfred. It has been suggested that Astarte was drawn from the poet's sister, Augusta (Mrs. Leigh).

Astolat (ás' tō lát). This town, mentioned in the ARTHURIAN ROMANCES, is generally identified with Guildford, in Surrey.

The Lily Maid of Astolat. ELAINE.

Astoreth. See ASHTAROTH.

Astræa (ás tré' á). Justice, innocence. During the GOLDEN AGE this goddess dwelt on earth, but when sin began to prevail, she reluctantly left it, and was metamorphosed into the constellation VIRGO.

Astral Body. In theosophical parlance, the phantasmal or spiritual appearance of the physical human form, that is existent both before and after the death of the material body, though during life it is not usually separated from it; also the "Kamarupa" or body of desires, which retains a finite life in the astral world after bodily death.

Astral spirits. The spirits animating the stars. According to occultists, each star had its special spirit; and PARACELUS maintained that every man had his attendant star, which received him at death, and took charge of him until the great resurrection.

Astrea, Incomparable, Mrs. Aphra Behn (1640-1689), playwright and novelist, author of Oroonoko, the first English novel written by a woman.

The stage how loosely does Astrea tread.

POPE: Satires, V, 290.

Hymnes of Astrea in Acrostic Verse, twenty-six poems written by Sir John Davies (1569-1626), in honour of Elizabeth I, the ACROSTICS being based on the name Elizabeth Regina.

Astrology. The pseudo-science of the ancient and mediæval world, concerned with DIVINATION, etc., based on the stars and heavenly bodies. Natural Astrology dealt with the movements and phenomena of the heavenly bodies, time, tides, eclipses, the fixing of EASTER, etc., and was the forerunner of the science of astronomy (cp. ALCHEMY); Judicial Astrology dealt with what is now known as astrology, the influence of the stars upon human affairs. See ASCENDANT; HOUSES, ASTROLOGICAL; HOROSCOPE; MICROCOSM; STAR.

Astronaut (Lat. astrum, star; nauta, sailor). One who voyages in interstellar space. This word, first used in 1929, gained popular acceptance after the first manned spacecraft flight by Major Yuri Gagarin of the U.S.S.R. in April 1961. He landed safely after orbiting the earth in 89 minutes at altitudes ranging from 110 to 188 miles. See COSMONAUT.

Astronomers Royal. (1) Rev. J. Flamsteed, 1675; (2) E. Halley, 1720; (3) Rev. J. Bradley, 1742; (4) Rev. N. Bliss, 1762; (5) Rev. N. Maskelyne, who originated the Nautical ALMANACK, 1765; (6) J. Pond, 1811; (7) Sir J. B. Airy, 1835; (8) Sir W. H. M. Christie, 1881; (9) Sir F. W. Dyson, 1910; (10) Sir H. S. Jones, 1933; (11) Sir Richard Woolley, 1955.

Astrophel (äs' trō fel). Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586). "Phil. Sid." being a contraction of Philos Sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron-philos (star-lover), the "star" being Penelope Devereux, whom he called Stella in his collection of sonnets known as Astrophel and Stella. Spenser wrote a pastoral called Astrophel, to the memory of his friend and patron, who fell at Zutphen.

Asur (äs' ūr). See ASSHUR.

Asurbanipal. See SARDANAPALUS.

Asynja (äs in' yà). The goddesses of ASGARD; the feminine counterparts of the ÆSIR.

At Home. See HOME.

Atalanta's Race (ät à län' tà). In Greek myth the daughter of Iasus or of Schoenus. She took part in the hunt of the Caledonian BOAR and, being very swift of foot, refused to marry unless the suitor should first defeat her in a race. Milanion (or HIPPOMENES) overcame her by dropping at intervals during the race three golden apples, the gift of VENUS. Atalanta stopped to pick them up, lost the race and became his wife.

Atargatis (ät ar gät' is). The "Syrian Goddess", the "fish goddess". A fertility goddess represented at Ascalon as half woman, half fish.

Atatürk. Father of the Turks. A surname adopted in 1934 by Mustapha Kemal (1881-1938), the maker of modern Turkey, when all Turks were made to assume surnames. In World War I he held the Dardanelles and subsequently ruthlessly set out to westernize the republic he had established in 1923. European dress was imposed, polygamy abolished, women enfranchised, and the Latin script replaced the Arabic.

Ate (ä' tē). In Greek mythology, the goddess of vengeance and mischief; she was cast down to earth by ZEUS.

With Ate by his side come hot from hell . . .

Cry "Havoc" and let slip the dogs of war.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Caesar, III, i.

In Spenser's Færie Queene (IV, i, iv, ix, etc.), the name is given to a lying and slanderous hag, the companion of DUESSA.

Atellane, or Atellan Farces (ä të la' nē). Coarse improvised interludes in the Roman theatres introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Macchus and Bucco are the forerunners of our PUNCH and CLOWN.

Athanasian Creed (äth á ná' shán). One of the three creeds accepted by the Roman and Anglican churches; so called because it embodies the opinions of Athanasius (c.298-373) respecting the TRINITY. It is of unknown authorship.

Atheists. During World War II Father W. T. Cummings, an American army chaplain in Bataan, in a sermon used the phrase "there are no atheists in foxholes", meaning that no one can deny the existence of God in the face of imminent death.

Athena. See ATHENE.

Athenæum (äth é nē' ūm). (1) A temple in Athens which became a meeting place of learned men. (2) A famous academy in Rome founded by Hadrian c. 135 A.D. The name is still used for literary and scientific institutions.

The Athenæum Club in PALL MALL was founded in 1824; the literary review called The Athenæum was founded by James Silk Buckingham in 1828 and was incorporated with The Nation in 1921, which merged with the New Statesman in 1931.

Athene, or Pallas Athene (ä thē' ne). The patron goddess of ATHENS and patroness of arts and crafts; the goddess of wisdom and identified with the Roman MINERVA.

Athens. When ATHENE and POSEIDON disputed for the honour of being the city's patron, the goddess of wisdom produced an olive branch, the symbol of peace and prosperity, and the sea-god created a horse, symbolical of war. The gods deemed the olive the better boon, and the city was called Athens.

Athens of Ireland. Belfast.

Athens of the New World. Boston.

Athens of the West. Cordoba, in Spain, was so called in the MIDDLE AGES.

The Modern Athens. Edinburgh.

Athenian Bee. PLATO (c. 429-347 B.C.), a native of ATHENS, was so called from the tradition that a swarm of bees alighted on his mouth, when he was in his cradle, consequently his words flowed with the sweetness of honey. The same tale is told of St. AMBROSE, and others. See BEE. Xenophon (c. 430-c. 354 B.C.) was also called "the Athenian Bee" or "Bee of Athens". See ATTIC BEE.

Athole Brose (Scots). A compound of oatmeal, honey and whisky.

Charm'd with a drink which Highlanders compose,
A German traveller exclaim'd with glee,—
Potztausend! sare, if dis is Athol Brose,
How goot dere Athol Boetry must be!

THOMAS HOOD.

Atkins. See TOMMY ATKINS.

Atlantean Shoulders. Shoulders able to bear a great weight, like those of ATLAS.

Sage he stood,
With Atlantean shoulders fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, II, 305-7.

Atlantes (ât lán' tēz). Figures of men, used in architecture as pillars. So called from ATLAS. Female figures are called CARYATIDES. See also TELAMONES.

Atlantic Charter. During World War II, President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill met at sea (14 August 1941) and made this eight-point declaration of the principles on which peace was to be based, consequent upon Allied victory. It can be compared with President Wilson's FOURTEEN POINTS.

Atlantic Ocean, is named after the Atlas mountains or the mythical ATLANTIS.

Atlantic Wall. The name given by the Germans in World War II to their defences along the Atlantic coast of Europe built to resist invasion.

Atlantis. According to ancient myth, an extensive island in the Atlantic Ocean, mentioned by PLATO in the Timæus and Critias. It was said to have been a powerful kingdom before it was overwhelmed by the sea. Cp. LEMURIA; LYONESSE.

The New Atlantis. An allegorical romance by Francis Bacon (written in 1624) in which he describes an imaginary island where was established a philosophical commonwealth bent on the cultivation of the natural sciences. See UTOPIA; CITY OF THE SUN.

Mrs. Manley, in 1709, published under the same title a scandalous chronicle, in which the names of contemporaries are so thinly disguised as to be readily recognized.

Atlas. In Greek mythology, one of the TITANS, condemned by ZEUS for his part in the war of the Titans to uphold the heavens on his shoulders. His abode became the Atlas mountains in Africa, which accorded with the legend that they supported the heavens.

A book of maps is so called because the figure of Atlas with the world on his back was put on the title page by Rumold Mercator when he published his father's maps in 1595. In the paper trade Atlas is a standard size of drawing paper measuring 26 x 34 in.

Atli. See ETZEL.

Attic, of Athens or Attica.

Atman. In Buddhist philosophy the noumenon of one's own self. Not the EGO, but the Ego divested of all that is objective; the "spark of heavenly flame". In the UPANISHADS the Atman is regarded as the sole reality.

Atomic theory. From the 5th century B.C. atomic theories were held by Greek philosophers, notably EMPEDOCLES, LEUCIPPUS, DEMOCRITUS, and EPICURUS. Matter was said to consist of minute, indivisible, and indestructible particles. Modern atomic theory largely begins with John Dalton (1766-1844) who first wrote on the subject in 1803. His hypotheses still remain of real value in chemistry and to a lesser extent in physics; but the indivisibility of the atom was disproved and fresh concepts of the structure of atoms resulted from the discovery of the electron and the nucleus. See also CORPUSCULAR PHILOSOPHY.

Atomy. See ANATOMY.

Atossa. Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough (1660-1744), is said to be intended by Pope (Moral Essays, ii). Her friend, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, is called SAPHO. The Duchess of Buckingham has also been suggested for Atossa.

Atropos (ât' rō pos). In Greek mythology the eldest of the Three FATES, and the one who severs the thread of life.

Attaboy. An exclamation of enthusiastic approval or encouragement, originating in America and widely used in the 1930s by young people in the English-speaking countries of the British Commonwealth.

Attic. Of ATHENS or Attica.

The Attic Bee. Sophocles (c. 496-406 B.C.), the Athenian tragic poet, so called from the sweetness of his compositions. See also ATHENIAN BEE.

The Attic Bird. THE NIGHTINGALE; so called because Philomel was the daughter of the King of Athens, or because of the abundance of nightingales in Attica.

Where the Attic bird
Trills her thick-warbled notes the summer long.
MILTON: Paradise Regained, IV, 245.

The Attic Boy. Cephalos, beloved by AURORA or Morn; passionately fond of hunting.

Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not trickt and frounc't as she was wont,
With the Attick Boy to hunt,
But cherchef't in a comly Cloud.

MILTON: Il Penseroso.

Attic faith. Inviolable faith, the very opposite of PUNIC FAITH.

The Attic Muse. Xenophon (c. 430-c. 354 B.C.), the historian, a native of Athens; so called because the style of his composition is a model of elegance. See ATHENIAN BEE.

Attic salt. Elegant and delicate wit. Salt, both in Latin and Greek, was a common term for wit, or sparkling thought well expressed, thus CICERO says, Scipio omnes saepe superabat (Scipio surpassed all in wit). The Athenians were noted for their wit and elegant turns of thought.

Atticus (ăt' i kus). An elegant Roman scholar and master of Greek, publisher, and patron of the arts (109-32 B.C.). His taste and judgment were so highly thought of that even CICERO submitted several of his treatises to him.

The Christian Atticus. Reginald Heber (1783-1826), Bishop of Calcutta, a great hymn writer.

The English Atticus. Joseph Addison (1672-1719), so called by Pope (Prologue to Satires), on account of his refined taste and philosophical mind.

The Irish Atticus. George Faulkner (1700-1775), bookseller, publisher, and friend of Swift; so called by Lord Chesterfield when Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Attila. See ETZEL.

Attis. See ATYS.

Attorney (a ter' ni) (Fr. atourner, to attorn or turn over to another). One who acts for another in business and especially legal matters. Solicitors practised in the courts of equity and attorneys in the courts of common law until the Judicature Act of 1873 declared "all persons admitted as solicitors, attorneys, or proctors . . . shall be called Solicitors of the Supreme Court". In the U.S.A. an attorney-at-law possesses the functions of both BARRISTER and solicitor.

Power of Attorney. Legal authority given to another to collect rents, pay wages, etc. or to act in matters stated in the legal instrument or Warrant of Attorney, according to his own judgment. In such cases quod aliquis facit per aliquem, facit per se.

The Attorney-General is the chief law officer of the Crown, chief legal adviser to the government and head of the BAR. Since the Revolution of 1688 the Attorney-General has sat in the HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In the U.S.A. the Attorney-General is the chief law officer of the Federal Government and his office dates from 1789. First giving legal advice to the government and conducting government cases in the Supreme Court, he became head of the new Department of Justice in 1870 with control over State attorneys and Marshals.

Much of his duties are now administrative. He is also a member of the CABINET.

Atys (ă' tis). A youth beloved by AGDISTIS (Cybele). Driven mad by her jealousy he castrated himself with a sharp stone. According to Ovid's Metamorphoses Cybele changed him into a pine tree as he was about to commit suicide.

A.U.C. Abbreviations of the Lat. ab urbe condita, or Anno urbis conditæ, "from the foundation of the city" (ROME) "in the year of the city's foundation". It is the starting point of the Roman system of dating, and corresponds with 753 B.C.

Au courant (ō koo' ron) (Fr.), "acquainted with" (literally, in the current of events). To keep one au courant of everything is to keep one informed of passing events.

Au fait (Fr.). Skilful, a thorough master of, conversant with.

Au pair (Fr.). An arrangement by which foreigners who wish to learn the language or study the way of life of another country offer their services as domestic help in return for board and lodging, and usually a small payment as well.

Au pied de la lettre (Fr.). Litteratim et verbatim; according to the strict letter of the text.

Arthur is but a boy, and a wild and enthusiastic young fellow, whose opinions one must not take au pied de la lettre.

THACKERAY: Pendennis, i, 11.

Au revoir (Fr.). "Good-bye for the present". Literally, till seeing you again.

Aubaine. See DROIT D'AUBAINE.

Aubry's Dog.

Auburn. The hamlet described by Goldsmith in The Deserted Village, said to be Lissoy, County Westmeath, Ireland.

Audit Ale. A strong ALE which was brewed at some of the Oxford and Cambridge colleges and originally broached on audit day when college accounts had to be paid up by the students. Whether this was intended as a consolation to the students or a mild form of celebration by the college authorities is uncertain.

Audley. We will John Audley it. A theatrical phrase meaning to abridge, or bring to a conclusion, a play in progress. It is said that an 18th-century travelling showman named Shuter used to lengthen out his performance until sufficient newcomers were waiting for the next house. An assistant would then call out, "Is John Audley here?" and the play was ended as soon as possible.

Audrey. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, an awkward country wench who jilted William for Touchstone. See also TAWDRY.

Auf Wiedersehen (ouf vë' der zän). The precise German equivalent of the French AU REVOIR.

Augean Stables (aw jë' än). The stables of Augeas, the mythological King of Elis, in Greece, which housed his great herd of oxen. They were never cleaned and it was one of the labours of HERCULES to cleanse them, which he did by diverting the course of a river through them. Hence to cleanse the Augean stables means to clear away an accumulated mass of corruption, physical, moral, religious or legal.

Augsburg Confession. The historical confession of faith compiled by MELANCHTHON in consultation with Luther and presented to Charles V at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530.

Augury (aw' gū ri) (etymology uncertain), means properly the function of an augur, a Roman religious official. The duty of members of the college of Augurs was to pronounce, by the observation of signs called AUSPICES, whether the gods favoured or disfavoured a proposed course of action, and they were consulted before any important public action. See IN-AUGURATE; SINISTER.

August. Formerly called sextilis in the Roman calendar, the sixth month from MARCH (when the year began). It was changed to Augustus in 8 B.C. in honour of AUGUSTUS (63 B.C.-A.D. 14), the first Roman Emperor, whose "lucky month" it was. Cp. JULY. It was the month in which he began his first consulship, celebrated three TRIUMPHS, received the allegiance of the legions on the Janiculum, reduced Egypt, and ended the civil wars.

The old Dutch name for August was Oostmaand (harvest month); the old Saxon Weedmonath (weed-month, weed meaning vegetation in general); the French Republicans called it THERMIDOR (hot month, 19 July to 17 August).

Augusta. A name given to many Roman provincial towns. London was called Augusta Trinobantia.

Augustan Age. The GOLDEN AGE of Latin literature, so called from the Emperor AUGUSTUS, in whose reign (27 B.C.-A.D. 14) HORACE, Ovid, VIRGIL, Livy, Propertius, Tibullus, etc., flourished.

Augustan Age of English Literature. The period of the classical writers of the time of Queen Anne and George I, or to interpret it more widely, from Dryden to Johnson.

Augustan Age of French Literature. The period of Corneille (1606-1684), MOLIÈRE (1622-1673), and Racine (1639-1699).

Augustan History. A series of biographies of the Roman Emperors from Hadrian to Carinus (A.D. 117-284), purporting to be the work of six authors, but possibly written as propaganda during the reign of Julian the Apostate (361-363).

Augustine, The Second. Thomas Aquinas, the ANGELIC DOCTOR.

Augustinian Canons. Regular CANONS who adopted the Rule of St. Augustine in the 11th century. Also called Austin Canons, their first house in England was established at Colchester between 1093 and 1099. They took religious vows like the monks but made clerical and parochial duties their predominant obligation.

Augustinian, or Austin Friars, also called Augustinian Hermits from whom they were formed (1243-1256). The fourth of the MENDICANT ORDERS, they first came to England in 1248.

Augustus. A title, meaning venerable, bestowed upon Gaius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, the first Roman Emperor, in 27 B.C., and borne by his successors. In the reign of Diocletian (284-305) the two emperors, of the East and the West, were called Augustus, each with his Cæsar or colleague.

Augustus was the name given to Philip II of France (1165-1223) and to Sigismund II of Poland (1520-1572), both of whom were born in August.

Auld Hornie. After the establishment of Christianity, the heathen deities were degraded by the Church into fallen angels; and PAN, with his horns, crooked nose, goat's beard, pointed ears, and goat's feet, was transformed to his Satanic majesty, and called Old Horny.

O thou, whatever title suit thee,
Auld Hornie, Setan, Nick, or Clootie.

BURNS.

Auld Reekie. Edinburgh old town; so called because it generally appeared to be capped by a cloud of "reek" or smoke.

Aulis (aw' lis). The port in BEOTIA where the Greek fleet assembled before sailing against TROY. Becalmed by the intervention of ARTEMIS, because AGAMEMNON had killed a hind sacred to her, she was propitiated by the sacrifice of his daughter IPHIGENIA. This is the subject of Gluck's opera Iphigenia in Aulis (1774).

Aums-acc. See AMBSAS.

Aunt Sally. A game in which sticks or cudgels are thrown at a wooden (woman's) head mounted on a pole, the object being to hit the nose of the figure, or break the pipe stuck in its mouth. The word aunt was anciently applied to any old woman; thus, in Shakespeare, PUCK speaks of:

The wisest aunt telling the saddest tale.
Midsummer Night's Dream, II, i.

Aureole (Fr. through Latin aura, air). A luminous radiance surrounding the whole figure in paintings of the Saviour and sometimes of the SAINTS. Du Cange (1610-1688) informs us that the aureole of nuns is white, of martyrs red, and of doctors green. See HALO; NIMBUS; VESICA PISCIS.

Auri sacra fames (aw' ri sāk' rá fā' mēz). A Latin tag from the ÆNEID (III, 57), meaning "the cursed hunger for wealth", which almost amounts to monomania.

Aurignacian (aw rig nā' shán). An upper PALÆOLITHIC culture characterized by the very extensive use of flint scrapers, blade flakes, and bone tools, probably originating in Palestine. It is the period of CRO-MAGNON man, notable for his cave paintings like those of Altamira in Spain.

Aurora (aw rôr' à). Early morning. According to Greek mythology, the dawn-goddess Eos (Lat. Aurora), called by HOMER "rosy-fingered", sets out before the sun to proclaim the coming of day.

Aurora's tears. The morning dew.

Aurora borealis. Bands of light usually seen in high latitudes, hence the name Northern Lights. (See MERRY DANCERS; DERWENTWATER.) The similar phenomenon in the southern hemisphere is called Aurora Australis. Both are forms of Aurora Polaris and the lights are probably due to electrically charged solar particles.

Ausone, Château (aw sôn). A very fine claret, so called because the vineyard is reputed to be on the site of a villa at Lucaniacum (St. Émilion), built by the 4th-century Latin poet Ausonius.

Ausonia (aw sō' ni à). An ancient name of Italy; so called from Auson, son of ULYSSES, and father of the Ausones.

Auspices (aw' spi sēz) (Lat. avis, a bird; specere, to observe). In ancient ROME the name for the interpreters of signs from birds, animals, and other phenomena, who were later called augurs.

AUGURY depended on the observation and interpretation of signs which were known as auspices. Only the chief in command was allowed to take the auspices of war, thus if a subordinate gained a victory he won it "under the good auspices" of his superior.

Aussie (aw' si, os' i). A familiar name given to Australian soldiers during and after World War I. Their own colloquial epithet was "DIGGER".

Auster (Gr. austeros, hot, dry). A wind pernicious to flowers and health. In Italy one of the south winds was so called; its modern name is the Sirocco. In England it is a damp wind, generally bringing wet weather.

Australia. The States of Australia have their own familiar names:

South Australia, the Wheat State.

Queensland, Bananaland.

Victoria, the Cabbage Patch.

New South Wales, Ma State.

Northern Territory, Land of the White Ant.

Among the cities, Perth is called The Swan City; Adelaide, the City of the Churches; Melbourne, City of the Cabbage Garden.

Australian Capital Territory. The name given to an area in New South Wales, of just over 900 square miles, which is Federal territory, containing Canberra, the Federal capital and seat of government.

Austrian Lip. A characteristic of the royal family of HABSBURGS, one of the most famous cases of hereditary physical deformity, said to have been derived through marriage with a daughter of the Polish princely house of Jagellon. Motley (The Rise of the Dutch Republic) describing the Emperor Charles V, at the age of fifty-five, says, "the lower jaw protruding so far beyond the upper, that it was impossible for him to bring together the few fragments of teeth which still remained, or to speak a whole sentence in an intelligible voice." Of Philip II of Spain, he says "He had the same heavy, hanging lip, with a vast mouth, and monstrously protruding lower jaw." Macaulay (History of England) says of Charles II, the last of the Spanish Habsburgs, "the malformation of the jaw, characteristic of his family, was so serious that he could not masticate his food."

Aut Cæsar aut nullus (awt sē' sār awt nul' us) (Lat. either Cæsar or a nobody). Everything or nothing; all or not at all. CÆSAR used to say, "he would sooner be first in a village than second at Rome". The phrase was used as a motto by Pope Alexander VI's natural son, Cesare Borgia (1476-1507).

Authentic Doctor. A title bestowed on the scholastic philosopher, Gregory of Rimini (d. 1358).

Authorized Version, The. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Auto da fe (aw' tō da fā) (Port. an act of faith). The ceremonial procedure of the Spanish INQUISITION when sentences against heretics were read. Persistent HERETICS were subsequently delivered to the secular ARM for punishment. The reason why their victims were burnt was because inquisitors were forbidden to "shed blood"; a tergiversation based on the axiom of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, Ecclesia non novit sanguinem (The Church is untainted with blood).

Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. A name given to Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809–1894), who wrote a series of essays under this title first published in the Atlantic Monthly in 1857.

Autolycus (aw tol' i kūs). In Greek mythology, son of MERCURY, and the craftiest of thieves. He stole his neighbours' flocks and altered their marks; but SISYPHUS outwitted him by marking his sheep under their feet. Delighted with this device, Autolycus became friends with Sisyphus. Shakespeare uses his name for a rascally pedlar in The Winter's Tale (IV, ii).

My father named me Autolycus; who being, as I am, littered under Mercury, was likewise a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles.

Automedon (aw tom' è don). A coachman. He was the charioteer of ACHILLES.

Auto State, The. An alternative nickname to "the Wolverine State" for Michigan, in which Detroit is situated, and where Ford automobiles were originally made.

Autumn. The third season of the year. Figuratively a season of maturity or decay as in Shelley's Alastor (248):

And now his limbs were lean; his scattered hair,
Sere'd by the autumn of strange suffering,
Sung dirges in the wind.

Avalon (äv' à lon). Called Avilion in Tennyson's Morte d'Arthur, a CELTIC word meaning the "island of apples", and in Celtic mythology the Island of the Blessed Souls. In the ARTHURIAN ROMANCES it is the abode and burial place of ARTHUR, who was carried thither by MORGAN LE FAY. Its identification with GLASTONBURY is due to etymological error. OGIER THE DANE and OBERON also held their courts at Avalon.

Avant-garde (ä' von gard) (Fr.). The advanced guard of an army, usually nowadays shortened to vanguard. The term is also applied to ultra-modern and experimental young artists and writers.

Avars. See BANAT.

Avatar (Sans. avatara, descent; hence incarnation of a god). In Hindu mythology the advent to earth of a deity in a visible form. The ten avatars of VISHNU are the most celebrated. He appeared as (1) the fish (Matsya); (2) the tortoise (Kurma); (3) the boar (Varaha); (4) half-man, half-lion (Nrisinha); (5) the dwarf (Vamana); (6) RAMA with the Axe (Parasurama); (7) again as Rama (Ramachandra); (8) KRISHNA; (9) BUDDHA; the tenth advent is to occur at the end of the four ages and will be in the form of a white horse with wings (Kalki), to destroy the earth.

The word is used metaphorically to denote a manifestation or embodiment of some idea or phrase:

I would take the last years of Queen Anne's reign as the zenith, or palmy state of Whiggism, in its divinest avatar of common sense.

COLERIDGE: Table-talk.

Ave (ä' vi, a'vä). Latin for "Hail!"

Ave atque vale. See VALE.

Ave Maria (Lat. Hail, Mary!). The first two words of the Latin prayer to the Virgin MARY used in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. (See Luke i, 28.) The phrase is applied to the smaller beads of a ROSARY, the larger ones being termed PATERNOSTERS.

Avenger of Blood, The. The man who, in the Jewish polity, had the right of taking vengeance on him who had slain one of his kinsmen (Josh. xx, 5, etc.). The Avenger in Hebrew is called GOEL.

Cities of refuge were appointed for the protection of homicides, and of those who had caused another's death by accident (Num. xxxv, 12). The KORAN sanctions the Jewish custom.

Avernus (ä vër' nūs) (Gr. a-ornis, without a bird). A lake in CAMPANIA, so called from the belief that its sulphurous and mephitic vapours caused any bird that attempted to fly over it to fall into its waters. Latin mythology made it the entrance to hell; hence VIRGIL'S lines:

Facilis descensus Averno;
Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis;
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hic labor est.

Eneid vi, 126.

Rendered in Dryden's Virgil as:

Smooth the descent and easy is the way
(The Gates of Hell stand open night and day);
But to return and view the cheerful skies,
In this the task and mighty labour lies.

Avesta (ä ves' tä). The sacred writings of ZOROASTER, sometimes called ZEND-AVESTA. The present fragment is from the Avesta compiled under the SASSANIDES, using earlier sources from the time of Zoroaster onwards and adding to them. It essentially comprises (1) the Yasna, the chief liturgical portion including the Gathas, or hymns; (2) the Vispered, another liturgical work; (3) the Vendidad, which like our PENTATEUCH, contains the laws; (4) the Yashts, dealing with stories of the different gods, etc.; (5) the Khordah Avesta (Little Avesta), containing short prayers.

Avianus (äv i ä' nūs). A Roman fabulist whose work was a popular mediæval school book. His material is largely based on BARRIUS.

Avicenna (Abu Ibn Sina) (980-1037). A great Arabian PHILOSOPHER, mathematician, astronomer and physician. About 100 treatises are attributed to him and his Canon of Medicine remained a standard text-book into the 17th century.

Avignon Popes (ä vë' nyon). In 1309 Pope Clement V (1305-1314), a Gascon, under pressure from Philip the Fair of France, transferred the papal court to Avignon, where it remained until 1377. This BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY weakened the papacy and led to the GREAT SCHISM.

Other Avignon popes were:

John XXII	1316-34	Innocent VI	1352-62
Benedict XII	1334-42	Urban V	1362-70
Clement VI	1342-52	Gregory XI	1370-78

A vinculo matrimonii (ä vin' kû lô mât ri mô' ni i) (Lat.). A total divorce from the marriage bond. A divorce a mensa et thoro (i.e. from table and bed—from bed and board), equivalent to a modern decree of judicial separation, was formerly granted by the Church courts until the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 transferred this jurisdiction to the King's Court.

Avoid Extremes. A traditional wise saw of Pittacus of Mitylene (c. 650-570 B.C.).

Awar. One of the sons of EBLIS.

Awkward Squad. Military recruits not yet trained to take their place in the ranks. "Squad" is a contraction of "squadron".

Axe. See ASK.

He has an axe to grind. Some selfish motive in the background; some personal interest to answer. Benjamin Franklin tells of a man who wanted to grind his axe, but had no time to turn the grindstone. Going to the yard where he saw young Franklin, he asked the boy to show him how the machine worked, kept praising him till his axe was ground, and then laughed at him for his pains.

To hang up one's axe. To retire from business, to give over a useless project. The allusion is to the battle-axe, formerly devoted to the gods and hung up when fighting was over.

To put the axe on the helve. To solve a difficulty. To "hit the nail on the head".

To send the axe after the helve. To "send good money after bad", or spend more in the hope of recovering bad debts.

Geddes axe. The name given to the drastic cuts in public expenditure, especially on the army, navy, and education, recommended by the Geddes Committee in 1922.

Axinomancy (äks' in ð män si). DIVINATION by an axe, practised by the ancient Greeks with a view to discovering crime. An agate or piece of jet was placed on a red-hot axe which indicated the guilty person by its motion.

Axis. The name given to the alliance of the FASCIST states of Germany and Italy (October 1936), described by Mussolini as "an axis round which all European states animated by the will to collaboration and peace can also assemble". It became the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis in 1937.

Axle grease. Money; an Australian colloquial expression. Money makes life run more smoothly, as axle grease helps the running of a wagon.

Aysha, or A'isha (i yesh' a). Favourite wife of MOHAMMED, daughter of ABOU BEKR. He married her when she was only a child, soon after the HEGIRA, and ultimately died in her arms. Sir Henry Rider Haggard (1856-1925) wrote a novel called Aysha.

Aymon, The Four Sons of (ä' mon). The geste of Doon de Mayence (13th century) describes the struggle of certain feudal VASSALS against CHARLEMAGNE, including Doon of Mayence and Aymon of Dordone. The exploits of the four sons of Aymon—Renaud or RINALDO, Alard, Guichard, and Richard with their famous horse BAYARD is a central feature. They appear in many other poems and romances including Boiardo's ORLANDO INNAMORATO, Pulci's MORGANTE MAGGIORE, Ariosto's ORLANDO FURIOSO, Tasso's Rinaldo and JERUSALEM DELIVERED, etc.

Ayrshire poet. Robert Burns (1759-1796), who was born at Alloway in Ayrshire.

Azazel (ä zäz' el). In Lev. xvi, 7-8, we read that AARON, as an atonement, "shall cast lots" on two goats "one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scapegoat" (Azazel). Milton uses the name for the standard-bearer of the rebel angels (Paradise Lost, I, 534). In Mohammedan demonology Azazel is the counterpart of the devil, cast out of HEAVEN for refusing to worship ADAM. His name was changed to EBLIS (Iblis), which means "despair".

Azazel (ä zäz' i el). In BYRON's Heaven and Earth, a seraph who fell in love with Anah, a granddaughter of Cain. When the flood came he carried her under his wing to another planet.

Azilian (á zil' i án). A MESOLITHIC culture of the transitional period between PALÆOLITHIC and NEOLITHIC. Named from the bone and flint implements found in the cave at Mas d'Azil in the south of France.

Azoth (áz' oth) (Arab.). The alchemists' name for mercury; also the PANACEA or universal remedy of PARACELTUS. In Browning's Paracelsus (Bk. V), it is the name of Paracelsus' sword:

Last my good sword; ah, trusty Azoth, leapest
Beneath thy master's grasp for the last time?

Azrael (áz' rāl). The Mohammedan ANGEL of death. He will be the last to die, but will do so at the second trump of the ARCHANGEL. See ADAM.

The Wings of Azrael. The approach of death; the signs of death coming on the dying.

Azrafil. See ISRAFAEL; ADAM.

Aztec State, The. One of the names by which Arizona, the Apache State, has been known. Also called the Grand Canyon State and the Valentine State, the latter because it was admitted as a state of the U.S.A. on St. VALENTINE'S Day (14 February) 1912.

Azure (ázh' ūr ā' zūr). From the Arabic lazura (lapis-lazuli). Heraldic term for the colour blue. Represented in royal arms by the planet JUPITER, in noblemen's by the sapphire. The ground of the old shield of France was azure. Emblem of fidelity and truth. Represented in heraldic devices by horizontal lines. Also used as a synonym for the clear blue sky.

B

B. The form of the Roman capital "B" can be traced through early Greek to Phœnician and Egyptian hieratic; the small "b" is derived from the cursive form of the capital. In Hebrew the letter is called beth (a house); in Egyptian hieroglyphics it was represented by the crane.

B in Roman notation stands for 300; with a line above, it denotes 3,000.

Marked with a B. In the MIDDLE AGES, and as late as the 17th century (especially in America), this letter was branded on the forehead of convicted blasphemers. In France être marqué au "b" means to be one-eyed, hump-backed, or lame (borgne, bossu, boiteux); hence, an ill-favoured creature.

Not to know B from a battledore, or from a bull's foot. To be quite illiterate, not to know even one's letters. Conversely, I know B from a bull's foot means "I'm a sharp, knowing person; you can't catch me!" Cp. I KNOW A HAWK FROM A HANDSAW under HAWK. See also BATTLEDORE-BOOK.

B. and S. Brandy and soda.

B.C. In dating an abbreviation for "Before Christ", before the Christian era.

Marked with B.C. When a soldier disgraced himself by insubordination he was formerly marked with "B.C." (bad character) before he was finally drummed out of the regiment.

B Flats. Bugs; which obnoxious insects are characterized by their flatness.

B. of B.K. Mysterious initials applied to himself in Arthur Orton's diary (see TICHBORNE CASE). Supposed to denote "Baronet of British Kingdom", they were for some time popularly applied to anyone who put on airs.

Ba. The SOUL, which according to more primitive Egyptian belief roamed the burial places at night. Later belief held that it travelled to the realm of OSIRIS, after a harrowing journey, where its happiness was assured.

Baal. A Semitic word meaning proprietor or possessor, primarily the title of a god as lord of a place (e.g. Baal-peor, lord of Peor), or as possessor of some distinctive attribute (e.g. Baal-zebul or BEELZEBUB). The worship of local Baals was firmly established in Canaan when the Israelites arrived. The latter adopted many rites of the Canaanites and grafted them on to their own worship of Jahweh (JEHOVAH), who thus tended to become merely the national Baal. It was this form of worship that Hosea and other prophets denounced as heathenism. BEL is the Assyrian form of the name. See also BELPHEGOR.

Baal, or Bale Fires. Fires lighted on the highest moorland hill-tops on Midsummer Eve, etc. The custom still survives in Cornwall. See BELTANE.

Baalbec. See CHILMINAR.

Baba Yaga. A cannibalistic ogress of Russian folk-lore who stole young children and cooked them. She lived in the remote forest, sailed through the air in an iron cauldron raising tempests on her way, and swept with a broom all traces of her passing. She bears a strong resemblance to BERCHTA of S. German folk-lore.

Babbitt (băb' it). The leading character in Sinclair Lewis's novel of this name (1922). He is a prosperous "realtor" or estate agent in the Western city of Zenith, a simple, likeable fellow, with faint aspirations to culture that are forever smothered in the froth and futile hustle of American business life. Drive (which takes him nowhere), hustle (by which he saves no time) and efficiency (which does not enable him to do anything) are the keynotes of his life. Babbitt in present usage typifies the business man of orthodox outlook and virtues, with no interest in cultural values.

Babe the Blue Ox. A legendary and equally remarkable beast that belonged to Paul BUNYAN.

Babel. A perfect Babel. A thorough confusion. "A Babel of sounds", a confused uproar and hubbub. The allusion is to the confusion of tongues at Babel (Gen. xi).

Babes in the Wood. See CHILDREN. The phrase has been humorously applied to (1) simple trustful folks, never suspicious and easily gulled; (2) Irish insurrectionaries who infested the mountains of Wicklow and the woods of Enniscorthy towards the close of the 18th century; and (3) men in the stocks or in the pillory.

Babes, Protecting deities of. According to Varro (116-27 B.C.), Roman infants were looked after by Vagitanus, the god who caused them to utter their first cry; FABULINUS, who presided over their speech; CUBA, the goddess who protected them in their cots; and Domiduca, who brought young children safe home, and guarded them when out of their parents' sight. In the Christian Church St. NICHOLAS is the patron saint of children.

Babies in the Eyes. Love in the expression of the eyes. Love is the little babe CUPID, hence the conceit, originating from the miniature image of a person in the pupil of another's eyes.

She clung about his neck, gave him ten kisses.
Toyed with his locks, looked babies in his eyes.
HEYWOOD: Love's Maistresse (1633).

Babrius. Ancient fabulist, probably a Hellenized Roman of the early 3rd century, possibly dwelling in Syria. See ÆSOP'S FABLES.

Baby with the bath-water, To throw out the. Over-zealous reform, reorganization or action, which in getting rid of unwanted elements casts away the essentials as well.

Babylon (băb' i lôn). The Modern Babylon. London is sometimes so called on account of its wealth, luxury and dissipation.

The hanging gardens of Babylon. See HANGING.

The whore of Babylon. A PURITAN epithet for the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The allusion is to Rev. xvii-xix (cp. SCARLET WOMAN), where Babylon stands for Rome, the embodiment of luxury, vice, splendour, tyranny and all that the early Church held was against the spirit of Christ.

Babylonian Captivity. The period beginning from 597 B.C., when the Jews became captives in Babylon after the attacks by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, until their return (from 538 B.C.) after their release by Cyrus, consequent upon his conquest of Babylon.

Babylonian Captivity of the Papacy. See AVIGNON POPES.

Babylonian numbers. Nec Babylonios temptaris numeros (HORACE: Odes, Bk. 1, xi, 2). Do not make trial of Babylonian calculations, i.e. do not consult astrologers or fortune-tellers. The Babylonians or Chaldeans were the most noted of astrologers.

Baca, The Valley of (ba' ka). An unidentified place mentioned in Ps. lxxxiv, 6, meaning the "Valley of Weeping", and so translated in the Revised Version.

Bacbus (băk' būc). A Chaldean or Assyrian word for an earthenware pitcher, cruse, or bottle, taken by Rabelais as the ORACLE of the Holy Bottle (and of its priestess). PANURGE consulted the Holy Bottle on the question whether or not he ought to marry and it answered with a click, like the noise made by glass snapping. Bacbus told Panurge the noise meant trinc (drink), and that was the response, the most direct and positive ever given by the oracle. Panurge might interpret it as he liked, the obscurity would always save the oracle.

Bacchus (băk' ūs). In Roman mythology, the god of wine, the Dionysus of the Greeks, son of ZEUS and SEMELE. The name "Bacchus" is a corruption of the Gr. Iacchus (from Iache, a shout) and was originally merely an epithet of Dionysus as the noisy and rowdy god. First represented as a bearded man, he later appears as a beautiful youth with black eyes and flowing locks, crowned with vine and ivy. In peace his robe was purple, in war a panther's skin. According to some accounts he married ARIADNE after her desertion by THESEUS.

Bacchus, in the LUSIAD, is the evil demon or antagonist of JUPITER, the lord of destiny. AS MARS is the guardian power of Christianity, Bacchus is the guardian power of Mohammedanism.

Bacchus sprang from the thigh of Zeus. The tale is that SEMELE, at the suggestion of JUNO, asked JUPITER to appear before her in all his glory, but the foolish request proved her death. Jupiter saved the child, which was prematurely born, by sewing it up in his thigh till it came to maturity.

What has that to do with Bacchus? i.e. What has that to do with the matter in hand? When Thespis introduced recitations in the vintage songs, the innovation was suffered to pass, so long as the subject of recitation bore on the exploits of BACCHUS; but when, for variety's sake, he wandered to other subjects, the Greeks pulled him up with the exclamation, "What has that to do with Bacchus?"

Bacchus a noyé plus d'hommes que Neptune. The ale-house has overwhelmed more men than the ocean.

A priest, or son of Bacchus. A toper.

Bacchanalia. Roman festivals in honour of BACCHUS, the equivalent of the Greek Dionysia, characterized by drunkenness and licentiousness (although it must be noted that Greek drama had its origins in the Dionysia). Hence Bacchanalian orgy now denotes any wild and drunken revelry.

Bacchanals (bäk' á nálz), Bacchants, Bacchantes. Priests and priestesses, or male and female votaries of BACCHUS; hence drunken roysterers. See also BAG O'NAILS under PUBLIC HOUSE SIGNS.

Bach, or Batch. In Australia a hut or shanty, from the fact that a BACHELOR was the usual occupant of these simple dwellings.

Bachelor. A man who has not been married. The word is of uncertain etymology from the O.Fr. bachelor, derived from the late Latin word baccalaris. The word was applied to aspirants to knighthood, and KNIGHTS of the lowest rank were known as knights bachelor, those too young to display their own banners.

With him ther was his sone, a young Squyer
A loyere, and a lusty bachelor.
CHAUCER: Prologue to the Canterbury Tales 1, 80.

Bachelor of Arts, Science, Medicine, etc. In most British and American universities one who has taken his first degree in the appropriate faculty. Originally the degrees of "master" and "doctor" were for those further qualified to teach at the university.

Bachelor of Salamanca. The last novel of Le Sage (published in 1736); the hero, Don Cherubin de la Ronda, is a bachelor of arts.

Bachelor's buttons. Buttons, similar in principle to press-studs used in dress-making, and affixed without the need of sewing, hence the name.

Also several button-shaped flowers are so called—red bachelor's buttons (double red campion), yellow (the upright crow-foot and buttercup), white (white ranunculus and white campion). Rustics were wont to put them in their pockets and their growth was an indication that they would find favour with their sweethearts. Maidens wore them under their aprons.

Bachelor's fare. Bread and cheese and kisses.

Bachelor's porch. An old name for the north door of a church. Menservants and old men used to sit on benches down the north aisle, and maidservants and poor women on the south side. After service the men formed one line and the women another, through which the clergy and gentry passed.

Bachelor's wife. A hypothetical ideal or perfect wife.

Bachelors' wives and maids' children be well taught.

JOHN HEYWOOD: Proverbs.

Back, To. To support with money, influence, or encouragement: to lay money on a horse or any other participant in a race or contest.

A commercial term meaning to endorse. When a merchant backs or endorses a bill he guarantees its value.

Falstaff says to the Prince:

You care not who sees your back: call you that backing of your friends?

A plague upon such backing!

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV Pt. I, II, iv.

Back and edge. Entirely, heartily, TOOTH AND NAIL, with might and main. The reference is, perhaps, to a wedge driven home to split wood.

Back-of-beyond. A phrase originating in Australia to describe the vast inland spaces, the great Outback. The term back-block is found in 1850, referring to those territories divided up by the government into blocks for settlement.

Back the oars, or back water, is to row backwards to check way, or go astern.

Back to Square One. Back to where one started from. Derived from the early days of broadcast commentaries on football matches when, in order to make the course of the game easier to follow, a diagram of the pitch, divided into numbered squares, was printed in radio programmes.

Laid on one's back. Laid up with ill health; helpless.

Thrown on his back. Completely beaten. A figure taken from wrestling.

To back and fill. A nautical phrase, denoting a mode of tacking when the tide is with the vessel and the wind against it. Metaphorically, to be irresolute.

To back down. To yield a point contrary to the stand one had previously made.

To back out. To withdraw from an engagement, commitment, etc.; to retreat from a difficult position.

To back the field. To bet on all horses bar one.

To back the sails. Sheeting them to windward to check the vessel's way. A sailing vessel is "backed" by so using the sails.

To back up. To uphold, to support. As one who stands at your back to support you. In CRICKET an advance by the batsman not taking strike, in order to take a quick run if the striker makes an opportunity.

To be a back number. To be superseded, relegated, out of the SWIM, to be a person with outdated ideas. From old back numbers of newspapers which carry news that is no longer current.

To break the back of. To finish the hardest part of (one's work).

To get one's back up. To become annoyed or angry. The allusion is to a cat, which sets its back up when attacked by a dog or other animal.

To go back on one's word. To withdraw from what one has promised or said.

To go back on a person is to betray him.

To have one's back to the wall. To act on the defensive against odds. One beset with foes tries to get his back against a wall to prevent attack from behind.

To take a back seat. To withdraw from a position one has occupied into relative obscurity; to submit to humiliation.

To turn one's back on. To have nothing more to do with.

Back-bencher. See under BENCH.

Back end, The. Autumn. Widely used in the North of England.

Back-friend. A secret enemy. SHAKESPEARE uses it in this sense.

A back-friend, a shoulder clapper . . .
One that, before the judgement, carries poor souls to hell.

The Comedy of Errors: IV, ii.

Back-hander. A blow with the back of the hand. Also one who takes back the decanter to hand himself another glass before the decanter is passed on.

I'll take a backhand, as Clive don't seem to drink.
THACKERAY: The Newcomes, ch. xliii.

A back-handed compliment. One so phrased as to imply depreciation.

Backroom boys. A name given to the unpublicized scientists and technicians in World War II who contributed so much to the development of scientific warfare and war production, and since applied generally to such anonymous laboratory workers. The phrase comes from a speech by Lord Beaverbrook on war production (24 March 1941): "To whom must praise be given . . . to the boys in the backroom."

Back-seat driver. One who gives a motor-car driver advice and instructions from the back seat. Has the same meaning as ARMCHAIR GENERAL.

Back-slang. A form of slang which consists in pronouncing the word as spelt backwards. Thus police becomes ecilop (hence the term slop for a policeman), parsnips, spinsrap, etc. It was formerly much used by "flash" cockneys (see COCKNEY), thieves, etc. The widely-used epithet job may be aptly defined as a "backward boy".

Backstairs influence. Private or unrecognized influence, especially at Court. Royal palaces have more than one staircase, and backstairs would be used by those who sought the sovereign upon private matters; it was, therefore, highly desirable to conciliate the servants or underlings in charge of the "backstairs".

Hence backstairs gossip, tittle-tattle obtained from servants; backstairs plots, or politics, underground or clandestine intrigue.

Backward. He is not backward in coming forward. He is by no means self-effacing, shy, or reluctant to make himself prominent, or to draw attention to himself.

Backwardation. A Stock Exchange term denoting the sum paid by a seller i.e. on a "BEAR ACCOUNT" (a speculation on a fall in the price of certain stock) in order to postpone the completion of the transaction till the next settling day. Cp. CONTANGO.

Backward blessing. A curse. To say the Lord's Prayer backwards was to invoke the DEVIL.

Backwater. Properly a pool or stretch of water fed by the backflow of a stream or river. Figuratively to be in a backwater is to be isolated from the active flow of life.

Bacon. To baste your bacon. To strike or scourge one. Bacon is the outside portion of the sides of pork, and may be considered generally as the part which would receive a blow. Here baste means "to thrash".

Falstaff's remark to the travellers at Gadshill, "On, bacons, on!" (Henry IV, Pt. I, II, ii) is an allusion to the fact that formerly bacon was the normal meat of English rustics hence such terms as bacon-brains and CHAW-BACON for a country yokel.

To bring home the bacon. To bring back the prize; to succeed. Possibly a reference to the DUNMOW flitch, or to the sport of catching a greased pig at country fairs.

To save one's bacon. To save oneself from injury; to escape loss. The allusion may be to the care taken by our forefathers to save from the dogs of the household the bacon which was stored for winter use.

But here I say the Turks were much mistaken,
Who, hating hogs, yet wished to save their bacon.
BYRON: Don Juan, vii, 42.

He may fetch a flitch of bacon from Dunmow. He is so amiable and good-tempered he will never quarrel with his wife. See DUNMOW.

Baconian Philosophy. Inductive philosophy as formulated by Francis Bacon (1561-1626) in the second book of the Novum Organum. He did not invent it but gave it a new importance.

Baconian Theory. See SHAKESPEARE.

Bacon's Brazen Head. See BRAZEN HEAD.

Bactrian Sage. ZOROASTER or Zarathustra, founder of the ancient Persian religion, who was probably either a Bactrian or a Mede.

Bad. Among rulers called "the Bad" are William I, King of Sicily from 1154 to 1166; Albert, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen (d. 1314); Charles II, King of Navarre from 1349 to 1387.

Bad blood. Vindictiveness, ill-feeling; hence to make bad blood is to create or renew ill-feeling.

You are in my bad books. Under disgrace, in disfavour. Similarly "in my BLACK BOOKS".

Bad debts. Debts unlikely to be paid.

Bad egg. A disreputable character.

A bad excuse is better than none. An adage first appearing in Nicholas Udall's Ralph Roister Doister, the first English comedy, performed c. 1553.

Bad form. Not in good taste. "It's not done" is commonly used in the same sense.

Bad hat. A rascal or good-for-nothing. In America also applied to a bad actor.

Bad Lands, The. In particular the Mauvoises Terres, of the early French trappers in the west of South Dakota; extensive tracts of sterile, rocky and desolate hill-country.

A bad lot. One morally or commercially unsound. Also a commercial project or stock that is worthless. Perhaps from auctioneering meaning a lot for which no one will bid. Similarly an inefficient soldier is called one of the Queen's bad bargains.

A bad shot. A wrong guess. A sporting phrase for a shot that misses the mark.

He is gone to the bad. He is mixing with bad companions, has acquired bad habits, has become ruined or depraved.

To the bad. On the wrong side of the account; in arrears.

Badge-men. Licensed beggars, or almshouse men; so called from their special dress or badge, worn to indicate that they belonged to a particular foundation.

He quits the gay and rich, the young and free,
Among the badge-men with a badge to be.
GEORGE CRABBE: The Borough, Letter XIV (1810).

Recipients of parish relief formerly wore a badge on the shoulder of the right sleeve, consisting of the letter P, with the initial of their parish, in red or blue cloth. See DYVOUR. In the Royal Navy a rating who holds Good Conduct Badges is called a "one", "two", or "three badgeman" according to the number of chevrons he wears on his left arm.

Badger, A. A hawker, huckster, or itinerant dealer, especially in corn, but also in butter, eggs, fish, etc. Its derivation is uncertain.

This court taking notice of the great prices of corn and butter and cheese and all other commodities, it was ordered that from henceforth no badger whatsoever be licensed but in open sessions.
Somerset Quarter Sessions Records, Vol. 24, p.120 (1630).

In the U.S.A. badger is the slang name of an inhabitant of Wisconsin.

To badger. To tease, annoy, or persistently importune, in allusion to badger-baiting. The badger was kennelled in a tub and dogs were set upon him to "draw him out". When dragged from his tub the badger was allowed to retire to recover and then the process was repeated several times.

It is a vulgar error that the legs of a badger are shorter on one side than on the other.

His [Titus Oates's] legs uneven as those of a badger.

MACAULAY: The History of England, ch. iv.

Badinguet (ba' din gā). A nickname given to NAPOLEON III, reputedly the name of the workman whose clothes he wore when he escaped from the fortress of Ham in 1846. His adherents were known as Badingueux.

Badminton

If Badinguet and Bismarck have a row together let them settle it between them with their fists.
ZOLA: The Downfall, ch. ii.

Badminton. The Gloucestershire seat of the Dukes of Beaufort which has given its name to a claret-cup and the game played with rackets and shuttlecocks. In pugilistic parlance blood, which is sometimes called CLARET, from the colour, is also called "badminton".

Badoura (ba doo' rá). "The most beautiful woman ever seen upon earth", heroine of the story of Camaralzaman and Badoura in the ARABIAN NIGHTS.

Baedeker (bā' dé ker). Karl Baedeker (1801-1859) published the first of the famous series of guidebooks, modelled on John Murray's Handbooks, at Coblenz in 1839. Noted for reliability and thoroughness, they became widely used by tourists the world over. Baedeker inaugurated the practice of marking with one or more stars objects and places of interest according to their historic or aesthetic importance, hence starred in Baedeker.

Baedeker Raids. A phrase used in Britain, 29 April 1942, to describe German air attacks, in reprisal for British raids on Cologne and Lübeck, deliberately directed on historic monuments such as listed in Baedeker (e.g. Bath, Canterbury, Norwich).

Baffle. Originally a punishment or degradation of a recreant KNIGHT including hanging him or his effigy by the heels from a tree.

He by his heels him hung upon a tree
And bawful so, that all which passed by,
The picture of his punishment might see.
SPENSER: The Faerie Queene, VI, vii, xxvii.

Bag and Baggage. In entirety. (Cp. LOCK, STOCK AND BARREL.) Originally a military phrase signifying the soldier with all his belongings or the whole of the equipment and stores of an army. (See BAGGAGE.) Hence Mr. Gladstone's Bag and Baggage policy with regard to the Near East, which implied that the Turks must be completely cleared out of the Balkans.

Let the Turks now carry away their abuses in the only possible manner, namely by carrying away themselves, . . . one and all, bag and baggage, shall I hope, clear out from the province they have desolated and profaned.
W. E. GLADSTONE: The Bulgarian Horrors and the Question of the East, 1876.

A bag of bones. Very emaciated.

Bag o'Nails. See PUBLIC HOUSE SIGNS.

A bag of tricks, or the whole bag of tricks. The whole lot, the entire collection. An allusion to the conjuror's bag, in which he carried his equipment for performing tricks.

In the bag. As good as certain. In horse-racing parlance in Australia it means that the horse referred to will not be running.

The bottom of the bag. The last expedient, after having emptied one's bag of all others. A trump card held in reserve.

To be left holding the bag. To be deserted by one's comrades and left with the entire onus of what was originally a group responsibility. Somewhat similar expressions are to be left HOLDING THE BABY, or left TO CARRY THE CAN.

To empty the bag. To tell everything and conceal nothing (Fr. vider le sac, to expose all to view).

To give the bag, now means to give the sack, but it seems formerly to have meant the reverse. An employee who left without giving notice was said to have given his master "the bag".

To let the cat out of the bag. See CAT.

To bag. To secure for oneself, to purloin; probably from sporting or poaching use, to put into one's bag what one has shot or trapped. Hence, a good bag, a large catch of game, fish, etc.

To set one's bag. In America is used of someone setting out to secure political office or preferment.

Bag-man, A. A commercial traveller, from the bag of samples that he carries. Formerly the horses of commercial travellers often bore outsize saddle-bags.

Bags. Slang for "trousers" which may be taken as the bags of the body. When the pattern was strong and "loud" they once were called howling-bags.

Bags I. Schoolboy slang assertion of a claim. See FAINS.

Oxford bags were wide-bottomed flannel trousers, popularized by Oxford undergraduates in the 1920s.

Bags of mystery. Slang for sausages and saveloys; the allusion is obvious.

Baga de Secretis. Records in the Public Record Office of treason and other State trials from 1477 to 1813. These records contain the proceedings in the trials of Anne Boleyn, Sir Walter Raleigh, Guy Fawkes, the regicides, and of the Jacobite risings of 1715 and 1745.

Baggage, as applied to a worthless or flirtatious woman, dates from the days when soldiers' wives, taken on foreign service with the regiment, travelled with the regimental stores and baggage.

Bail up! The Australian BUSHRANGER's equivalent for the highwayman's "Stand and deliver!"

Bailey (probably ultimately from O.Fr. bailler, to enclose). The external wall of a mediæval castle, also the outer court, the space immediately within the outer wall. When there were two courts they were distinguished as the inner and outer bailey. Subsequently the word was attached to the buildings as the OLD BAILEY (London) the Bailey (Oxford). The paved surround at the back of a house is still called "the bailey" in South Wales.

Bailey bridge. In World War II a metal bridge of amazing strength made of easily portable sections and capable of speedy erection, invented by the British engineer D. C. Bailey. They were a major factor in the rapidity of Allied advances especially in N.W. Europe.

Bailiff. See BUM-BAILIFF.

Bailiff of Bedford. The overflowing of the River Ouse in former days was so called, possibly because it turned people out of their homes.

Bailiff of the Marshland. A feverish shivering fit to which newcomers to Fenland were supposed to be prone. It is mentioned in Fuller's History of the Worthies of England, published posthumously in 1662. The newcomer to the Fens was said to be arrested by the "Bailiff of the Marshland".

Bailiff's Daughter of Islington, The. A ballad given in PERCY'S RELIQUES on the popular theme of a pair of lovers separated by differences of social rank—a squire's son and a bailiff's daughter. Islington in Norfolk is the place meant. It has appeared in the U.S.A. as "Ireland Town" and "Hazelington Town".

Baily's Beads. See BEAD.

Bain Marie (băn mã rē'). The French name for a double saucepan like a gluepot. It appears in Mrs. Glasse's Cookery Book, 1796, under its Latin name, Balneum Mariae, hence the "St. Mary's bath" of Ben Jonson's Alchemist, II, iii. The name is supposed to be due to the gentleness of this method of heating.

Bairam (bī rām). The name given to two Mohammedan feasts. The word in Turkish means "festival". The Lesser begins on the new moon of the month Shawwal, immediately after the fast of RAMADAN and lasts three days. The Greater (seventy days after the Lesser) lasts three days, beginning on the tenth day of the twelfth month, and forms the concluding ceremony of the pilgrimage to MECCA.

Bajadere. See BAYADERE.

Bajan, or Bajanella. See BEJAN.

Bajazet (bāj' à zet), or Bayezid I. Ottoman SULTAN from 1389 to 1403, and a great warrior, noted for his victories especially against the Hungarians and their allies at Nicopolis in 1396. He was overwhelmed by TIMUR at Ankara in 1402 and held prisoner until his death. There is no evidence for the story, popularized by Christopher Marlowe (1564-1593) and Nicholas Rowe (1674-1718), that Timur carried him about in an iron cage.

Baked Meats, or Bake meats. Meat pies.

The funeral bak'd meats
Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, I, ii.

i.e. the hot meat pies, served at the funeral and not eaten, were served cold at the marriage banquet, so short was the interval between the death of Gertrude's husband (Hamlet's father) and her remarriage to Claudius.

Baker, The. Louis XVI was so called and his Queen "the baker's wife", and the DAUPHIN the "shop boy"; because they gave bread to the starving men and women who came to VERSAILLES on 6 October 1789.

The return of the baker, his wife, and the shop-boy to Paris had not the expected effect. Flour and bread were still scarce.

A. DUMAS: The Countess de Charny, ch. ix.

Baker's dozen. Thirteen for twelve. When a heavy penalty was inflicted for short weight, bakers used to give a surplus number of loaves, called the inbread, to avoid all risk of incurring a fine. The 13th was the vantage loaf.

To give one a baker's dozen, to give one a sound drubbing, i.e. all he deserves and one stroke more.

Baker's kneec. Knock-knee. Bakers were said to be particularly liable to this deformity owing to the constrained position in which they had to stand when kneading bread.

Bakha. The sacred bull of Hermonthis in Egypt, an incarnation of Menthu, a personification of the heat of the sun. He changed colour every hour of the day.

Baksheesh (bāk' shēsh). A Persian word for a gratuity. These gifts are persistently demanded throughout the Near East by beggars, camel-men, servants, etc. more as a claim than a gratuity.

I was to give the men, too, a "baksheish", that is a present of money, which is usually made upon the conclusion of any sort of treaty.

KINGLAKE: Eothen.

Balaam (bā' lām). (1) In Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL (l. 574), the Earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in Monmouth's army.

(2) The "citizen of sober fame", who lived hard by the MONUMENT, in Pope's Moral Essays, Ep. iii, was drawn, in part, from Thomas Pitt ("Diamond Pitt", see PITT DIAMOND), grandfather of the Earl of Chatham. He "was a plain, good man; religious, punctual and frugal"; he grew rich, got knighted; seldom went to church; became a courtier; "took a bribe from France"; was hanged for treason and all his goods were confiscated to the State. The name Balaam is sometimes applied derogatorily to time-serving public figures.

(3) This word was also used for matter kept in type for filling up odd spaces in periodicals—the words of one who talks like Balaam's ass (Numb. xxii, 30). Lockhart (Life of Scott, ch. lxx) tells us:

Balaam is the cant name for asinine paragraphs about monstrous productions of nature and the like, kept standing in type to be used whenever the real news of the day leaves an awkward space that must be filled up somehow.

Hence Balaam basket, or box; the printer's slang for the receptacle for such matter, and also (in America) for the place where stereotyped "fill-ups" are kept.

Balaam's Ass. See under ASS.

Balaclava. See CARDIGAN.

Balafre, Le (bāl a' frā) (Fr. the gashed). Francis, second Duke of Guise (1519–1563). In the siege of Boulogne (1545) he received a sword-cut which left a frightful scar on his face. At Dormans (1575), his son Henri, third Duke of Guise (1550–1588) earned the same title. It was given by Scott (in Quentin Durward) to Ludovic Lesly, an archer of the Scottish Guard.

Balan (bā' lán). A strong and courageous giant in many old romances. In FIERABRAS the "Sowdan of Babylon", father of Fierabras, ultimately conquered by CHARLEMAGNE. In the Arthurian cycle, brother of BALIN.

Balance, The. LIBRA, an ancient zodiacal constellation between VIRGO and SCORPIO representing a pair of scales, the 7th sign of the ZODIAC, which the sun enters a few days before the autumnal equinox.

According to Persian mythology, at the LAST DAY there will be a huge balance as big as the vault of heaven. The two scale pans will be called that of light and that of darkness. In the former all good will be placed, in the latter all evil; and everyone will be rewarded according to the verdict of the balance.

In commercial parlance one's balance is the money remaining after all assets are realized and liabilities discharged. Hence the phrases:

He has a good balance at his banker's. His credit side shows a large balance in his favour.

Balance of power. Such an adjustment of power among sovereign states that no state has such a preponderance as to endanger the independence of the rest.

Balance of trade. The money-value difference between the exports and imports of a nation.

To strike a balance. To calculate the exact difference, if any, between the debit and credit sides of an account.

Balclutha (bāl cloo' thā). A fortified town on the banks of the Clutha (i.e. the Clyde) mentioned in Carthou, one of the OSSIAN poems. It was captured and burnt by Comhal, father of FINGAL, in one of his forays against the Britons.

Bald, Charles le Chauve. Charles II of France (823, 840–877), son of Louis the Pious or le Débonnaire, was named "the Bald". Sometimes known as Charles I (when CHARLEMAGNE is omitted from the list).

Bald as a coot. Completely bald. The common coot, a water bird, has a white bill and frontal shield which give the impression of baldness.

Baldheaded. To go for someone bald-headed, that is, without constraint or compunction, probably dating from the days when men wore wigs, and any energetic action or fray required that the wig should be thrown aside. According to the Army Quarterly (July 1937) it commemorates a cavalry charge at Warburg (1760) led by the Marquis of Granby (see PUBLIC HOUSE SIGNS), whose wig fell off in the battle.

Balder (bol' der). A Scandinavian god of light, son of ODIN and FRIGG who dwelt at Breidhablik, one of the mansions of ASGARD. One legend says that Frigg bound all things by oath not to harm him, but accidentally omitted MISTLETOE, with a twig of which he was slain. Another tells that he was slain by his rival Hodhr while fighting for the beautiful Nanna. His death was the final prelude to the overthrow of the gods.

Baldwin. (1) In the CHARLEMAGNE romances, nephew of ROLAND and the youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne's PALADINS.

(2) First King of Jerusalem (1100–1118), brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, the previous ruler. He figures in Tasso's JERUSALEM DELIVERED as the restless and ambitious Duke of Bologna, leader of 1,200 horse in the allied Christian army.

Bale. When bale is highest, boot is highest. An old Icelandic proverb appearing in Heywood and other English writers. It means, when things have come to the worst they must needs mend. Bale means "evil", boot is the M.E. bote, relief, remedy, good.

Bale out. Literally to empty water out of a boat with pails, etc.; also an airman's phrase meaning to parachute from an aircraft in an emergency. In army usage it means hastily escaping from a tank when it is hit.

Balfour of Burley, John. Leader of the COVENANTERS in Scott's Old Mortality (1816).

Balfour's Poodle. The HOUSE OF LORDS. From 1906 the CONSERVATIVE leader A. J. Balfour exploited their majority in the House of Lords to block the legislation of the LIBERAL government which had an overwhelming majority in the Commons. When the Lords rejected the Licensing Bill of 1908, Mr. Henry Chaplin, M.P., claimed that the House of Lords was the "watchdog of the constitution", to which Mr. Lloyd George replied, "You mean it is Mr. Balfour's poodle! It fetches and carries for him. It barks for him. It bites anybody that he sets it on to!"

Bloody Balfour. See BLOODY BALFOUR.

Balin (bal' in). In the ARTHURIAN ROMANCES devoted brother of BALAN. They accidentally slew one another in ignorance of each other's identity and were buried in one grave by MERLIN. The story is told by Malory in Bk. II and an altered version appears in Tennyson's Idylls of the King.

Balios. See HORSE.

Balisarda. See SWORD.

Balk (balk, bawk). Originally a ridge (O.E. balca), then the ridge between two furrows left in ploughing. The word came to be applied to any obstacle, stumbling-block or check on one's actions. Thus in billiards, the balk is the part of the table behind the balk-line from which one has to play when in certain circumstances one's freedom is checked. So to balk is to place obstacles in one's way.

A balk of timber is a large roughly squared piece of timber.

To make a balk. To miss a part of the field in ploughing. Hence, to disappoint, to withhold deceitfully.

Balker. One who from an eminence on shore directs fishermen where shoals of herrings have gathered together (O.E. baelcan, to shout). See HUER.

Balkis (bol' kis). The Mohammedan name of the Queen of SHEBA, who visited SOLOMON.

Ball. "Ball", the spherical body, is a Middle English and old Teutonic word; "ball", the dancing assembly, is from O.Fr. baler, to dance, from late Lat. ballare.

A ball of fortune. One tossed like a ball, from PILLAR to post; one who has experienced many vicissitudes of fortune.

The ball is with you, or in your court. It is your turn now.

To have the ball at your feet. To have an opportunity, a METAPHOR from football.

To keep the ball rolling. To continue without intermission. To keep the fun, conversation, or the matter going. A metaphor from ball games.

To open the ball. To lead off the first dance at a ball, hence to begin the matter by taking the lead.

To play ball. A colloquial phrase on both sides of the Atlantic, meaning to agree to a suggestion or to co-operate in some plan or action.

To strike the ball under the line. To fail in one's object. The allusion is to tennis, in which a line is stretched in the middle of the court, and the players standing on each side have to send the ball over the line.

To take the ball before the bound. To anticipate an opportunity; to be overhasty. A metaphor from CRICKET.

Ball's Bull. A person with no ear for music. According to an old tale this bull kicked a fiddler, whose music angered him, over a bridge.

The Three Golden Balls. The once familiar pawnbroker's sign was taken from the coat of arms of the MEDICI family and first introduced to London by the LOMBARD bankers and moneylenders. The positioning of the balls was popularly explained in that there were two chances to one that what was brought to UNCLE would be redeemed.

Also the emblem of St. NICHOLAS of Bari, who is said to have given three purses of gold to three virgin sisters to enable them to marry.

Ballad. Originally a song to dance-music (from Late Lat. ballare, to dance, through O.Fr. balade).

Let me make the ballads, and who will make the laws. Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in Scotland, wrote to the Marquis of Montrose, "I knew a very wise man of Sir Christopher Musgrave's sentiment. He believed, if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws" (1703).

Ballet. A theatrical representation combining PANTOMIME, music and dancing, introduced into France from Italy by Catherine de' MEDICI, whose valet, Baldas Baldassarino de Belgioso, produced the first ballet of importance in 1581, called Le Ballet Comique de la Reyne.

Balliol College, Oxford, founded in 1263, by Sir John de Baliol of Barnard Castle (father of Baliol, King of Scotland) as a penance, and augmented by his wife, Devorguilla. In the 19th century Balliol scholarships became a much coveted distinction. Benjamin Jowett, its most famous Master, was in office from 1870 to 1893.

I know I'd rather win two schoolhouse matches running than get the Balliol scholarship any day.
THOMAS HUGHES: Tom Brown's Schooldays.

Balloon, A pilot. Metaphorically, a feeler to ascertain opinion.

Ballot. This method of voting was common in ancient Greece and Rome. (See BEANS.) The name comes from the use of small balls put secretly in a box (Fr. ballotte, a little ball). In more modern times secret voting at governmental elections was first used in South Australia in 1856, hence the term Australian Ballot. Although one of the six points of CHARTISM, voting by ballot was not adopted in Great Britain until the Ballot Act of 1872, and not until after 1884 in the U.S.A.

Ballplatz, The. The Foreign Office of Austria-Hungary was so called because it was situated in the square in Vienna named Ballplatz or Ballhausplatz.

Ballyhoo (bäl i hoo'). The word is said to come from Ballyhooly, a village in Co. Cork, but in its present sense of a noisy demonstration to attract attention, extravagant advertisement or publicity, originates from the U.S.A.

Balm (Fr. baume, a contraction of balsam). An aromatic, resinous gum exuded from certain trees and used in perfumery and medicine.

Is there no balm in Gilead? (Jer. viii, 22). Is there no remedy, no consolation? "Balm" here is the Geneva Bible's translation of the Heb. sori, which probably means "mastic", the resin yielded by the mastic tree, Pistacia lentiscus. In Wyclif's Bible the word is translated "gumme" and in Coverdale's "triacle". (See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH; TREACLE.)

The gold-coloured resin now known as "Balm of Gilead" is that from Balamodendron gileadense.

Balmerino (bäl mer' i nō). The story was long current that when Lord Balmerino was executed for his part in the JACOBITE rebellion of 1745, the executioner bungled and only half cut off his head, whereupon his lordship turned round and grinned at him.

Balmy. I am going to the balmy—i.e. to "balmy sleep"; one of Dick Swiveller's pet phrases (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop). See also BARMY.

Balnibarbi (bäl ni bar' bi). A land occupied by projectors (Swift: Gulliver's Travels).

Balthazar (bäl tház' ár). One of the three kings of Cologne. See MAGI.

Baltic, The. In commercial parlance is the familiar name of the Baltic and Mercantile Shipping Exchange, which was founded in the 18th century. Originally concerned with the Baltic trade, it now deals with shipping, freights, insurance, etc., all over the world.

Bamberg Bible, The. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Bambocciades (bäm boch' i ädz). Pictures of scenes in low life, such as country WAKES, PENNY WEDDINGS, and so on; so called from the Ital. bamboccio, a cripple, nickname given to Pieter van Laar (1592-c.1675), a noted Dutch painter of such scenes.

Bamboo Curtain, The. Formed by analogy with IRON CURTAIN to denote the veil of secrecy and mistrust drawn between the Chinese Communist block and the non-Communist nations.

Bampton Lectures. Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, minor CANON of Salisbury, who, in 1751, left £120 per annum to the University of Oxford, to pay for eight divinity lectures on given subjects to be preached yearly at Great St. Mary's and for their subsequent publication. Only M.A.s of Oxford and Cambridge are eligible as lecturers and the same person may not be chosen twice. First given in 1780, the lectures by Dr. Hampden in 1832 aroused great controversy in theological circles. Cp. HULSEAN LECTURES.

Ban (O.E. bannan, to summon, O. Teut. bannan to proclaim). Originally meaning to summon, the verb came to mean to anathematize, to imprecate; and the noun was applied specifically to an ecclesiastical curse, a formed prohibition, a sentence of outlawry. Banish and BANNS are from the same root.

Lever le ban et l'arrière ban (Fr.). To levy the ban was to call the king's VASSALS to active service; to levy the arrière ban was to levy the vassals of a suzerain or under-lord.

Ban, King. In the ARTHURIAN ROMANCES, father of Sir LANCELOT DU LAC. He died of grief when his castle was taken and burnt through the treachery of his seneschal.

Banagher, That beats (băn' à her). Wonderfully inconsistent and absurd—exceedingly ridiculous. Banagher is a town in Ireland, on the Shannon, in Offaly. It formerly sent two members to PARLIAMENT and was a notorious POCKET BOROUGH. When a member spoke of a family borough where every voter was a man employed by the owner, it was not unusual to reply, "Well, that beats Banagher."

According to Francis Grose, however, Banagher (or Banaghan) was an Irish minstrel famous for telling wonderful stories of the MÜNCHHAUSEN kind.

"Well," says he, "to gratify them I will. So just a morsel. But Jack, this beats Banagher."

W. B. YEATS: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry.

Bananalanders. Nickname for the inhabitants of Queensland, Australia, who are also known as Canecutters.

Banana oil. Used colloquially in Australia and America for "nonsense" or "insincere talk".

Banat (băn' át). A territory governed by a ban (Persian for lord, master), particularly certain districts of Hungary and Croatia. The word was imported by the Avars who settled in Dacia in the latter half of the 6th century.

Banbury. A town in Oxfordshire, proverbially known for its PURITANS, its "cheese-paring", its cakes and its cross. Hence a Banbury man is a Puritan or bigot. Zeal-of-the-land Busy, in Jonson's Bartholomew Fair, is described as a "Banbury Man".

In my progress travelling Northward
Taking my farewell o'th Southward,
To Banbery came I, O prophane one
Where I saw a Puritane one,
Hanging of his cat on Monday,
For killing of a Mouse on Sondag.

RICHARD BRATHWAITE: Barnabee's Journal (1638).

As thin as Banbury cheese. In Jack Drum's Entertainment (1600) we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring"; and Bardolph compares Slender to Banbury cheese (Merry Wives I, i). The Banbury cheese is a rich milk cheese about an inch thick.

Banbury cake is a kind of spiced pastry turnover, once made exclusively at Banbury.

Banbury Cross of nursery rhyme fame was removed by the PURITANS as a heathenish memorial in 1646. Another CROSS was erected on the site in 1858.

Banbury Tinkers. People who try to put things right but only make them worse. The Banbury tinkers were said to make three holes in a pot while mending one.

Banco. A commercial term denoting bank money of account as distinguished from currency; used in exchange business when current money had depreciated from its former value.

In Banco, or in Banc. A Late Latin legal phrase, meaning "on the bench"; it is applied to sittings of a superior court of COMMON LAW in its own bench or court, and not en circuit or at NISI PRIUS. The work of the courts in Banco was transferred to Divisional Courts of the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act of 1873.

Mark Banco. The mark of fixed value used as an invariable standard in the old Bank at Hamburg, and used by the HANSEATIC LEAGUE. Deposits in GOLD and SILVER were credited in Mark Banco in which all banking accounts were carried on so that they were unaffected by variations in exchange.

Bancus Communium Placitorum. THE BENCH OF COMMON PLEAS.

Bancus Regius, or Bancus Reginae. The King's or Queen's Bench.

Bandbox, He looks as if he were just out of a. He is so neat and carefully got up in his dress and person, that he looks like some company dress, carefully kept in a bandbox, a cardboard box for millinery formerly used by parsons for keeping their BANDS in.

Neat as a bandbox. Neat as clothes folded and put by in a bandbox.

The Bandbox Plot. Paul de Rapin (1661-1725) in his Histoire d'Angleterre (Vol. IV) tells us that in Queen Anne's reign a bandbox was sent to the lord-treasurer containing three pistols charged and cocked, the triggers being tied to a pack-thread fastened to the lid. When the lid was lifted, the pistols would go off and shoot the person who opened the lid. Dean Swift happened to be by when the box arrived, and seeing the pack-thread, cut it, thus saving the life of the lord-treasurer.

Bandicoot. A small Australian marsupial (Perameles) which ravages garden and farm produce.

Bald as a bandicoot. (Austr.) Quite bald. An alliterative variant of BALD AS A COOT. Meaning is sacrificed to euphony since the bandicoot is not bald. The expression busy as a bandicoot similarly means "extremely busy".

To bandicoot is an Australian phrase meaning to steal vegetables—often by removing the roots and leaving the tops standing so that the theft is not noticed.

Band of Hope. The name given (c. 1847) to children's temperance societies in the UNITED KINGDOM. The movement grew steadily and the Band of Hope Union was founded in 1855.

Bands. Clerical bands are a relic of the ancient amice, a square linen tippet tied about the neck of priests during the saying of MASS. Disused by ANGLICAN clergy in the late 19th century, they have partially come back into fashion of late and are also worn by PRESBYTERIAN ministers and continental clergy.

Legal bands are a relic of the wide falling collars which formed a part of the ordinary dress in the reign of Henry VIII, and which were especially conspicuous in Stuart times. In the showy days of Charles II the plain bands were changed for lace ends.

The eighth Henry as I understand,
Was the first prince that ever wore a band.
JOHN TAYLOR (1580-1653).

Bandwagon. To climb on the bandwagon is to show support for a popular movement or trend with intent to profit or reap easy material benefit. It was customary in the U.S.A., particularly in southern States, for a band to play on a wagon through the streets to advertise a forthcoming meeting, political or otherwise. At election time local leaders would show their support of a candidate by climbing on the wagon and riding with the band.

Bandy. I am not going to bandy words with you. i.e. to wrangle. The METAPHOR is from the Irish game bandy (the precursor of hockey), in which each player has a stick with a crook at the end. The ball is banded from side to side, each party trying to beat it home to the opposite goal. It was earlier a term in tennis as is shown by the line in John Webster's Vittoria Corombona (IV, iv):

That while he had been bandying at tennis. (1612).

Bane really means ruin, death, or destruction (O.E. bana, a murderer); and "I will be his bane" means I will ruin or murder him. Bane is therefore a mortal injury.

Bangorian Controversy. A theological pamphlet-war occasioned by a sermon preached by Dr. Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, before George I in 1717. Taking as his text "My kingdom is not of this world", he denied that Christ had delegated his authority to the Church. Convocations were prorogued to silence the opposition and the Convocation of Canterbury did not meet effectively until 1852 and that of York until 1861.

Bang-up. SWELL. Current as colloquial English by the end of the 18th century. A second meaning, now obsolete, was "overcoat".

A green coat cut round in jockey fashion, and over it a white bang-up.

C. J. LEVER: Jack Hinton the Guardsman (1843).

Banian, or Banyan (bān' yān) (Sanskrit vanij, a merchant). A name applied to a caste of Hindu traders and moneylenders, who wore a particular dress, were strict in their observance of fasts, and abstained from eating any kind of flesh. It is from this circumstance that sailors speak of BANYAN DAY.

The word is also applied to a form of loose house-coat worn by Anglo-Indians.

Bank. Originally meaning "bench" or "shelf", in Italy the word banco was applied specially to a tradesman's counter, and hence to a money-changer's bench or table, from which the modern meaning of an establishment dealing with money, etc., is derived.

Banker. In Australia, a river in flood running as high as its banks. In North America, a cod fisherman of the Newfoundland Banks, or his ship.

Bank of river. Stand with your back to the source, and face to the sea or outlet: the left bank is on your left, and right bank on your right hand.

Bankrupt. In Italy, when a moneylender was unable to continue business, his bench or counter was broken up, and he was spoken of as a bancorotto—i.e. a bankrupt.

Bankside. An historic part of the borough of SOUTHWARK on the right bank of the Thames between Blackfriars and London bridges. At one end stood the CLINK prison and the church of St. Mary OVERIE (now Southwark Cathedral). Also famous in Shakespeare's England for BULL-BAITING and the Globe theatre, and notorious for its brothels and evil-doers. Hence Sisters of the Bank, an old term for prostitutes.

Come I will send for a whole coach or two of Bankside ladies, and we will be jovial.
RANDOLPH: The Muses' Looking Glass, II, iv (c. 1632).

Banks's Horse. A horse called Marocco, belonging to one Banks about the end of Queen Elizabeth I's reign, and trained to do all manner of tricks. One of his exploits is said to have been the ascent of St. Paul's steeple. A favourite story of the time is of an apprentice who called his master to see the spectacle. "Away, you fool," said the shopkeeper, "what need I go to see a horse on the top when I can see so many horses at the bottom!" The horse is mentioned by Raleigh, Gayton, Kenelm Digby, Ben Jonson and others.

Bannatyne Club. A literary club founded by Sir Walter Scott, Archibald Constable and others in 1823 and named after George Bannatyne (1545?-1608), to whose manuscript (now in the ADVOCATES LIBRARY) we owe the preservation of much 15th and early 16th-century Scottish poetry. The club had convivial meetings and printed 116 rare works of Scottish history and literature. It was dissolved in 1861. Cp. ROXBURGHE CLUB.

Assist me ye friends of Old Books and Old Wine,
To sing in the praises of sage Bannatyne,
Who left such a treasure of old Scottish lore
As enables each age to print one volume more,
One volume more, my friends, one volume more
We'll ransack old Banny for one volume more.
SCOTT: The Bannatyne Club, I.

Banner of the Prophet, The. What purports to be the actual standard of MOHAMMED is present in the Eyab mosque of Istanbul. It is twelve feet in length and made of four layers of silk, the top-most being green, embroidered with GOLD. In times of peace it is kept in the hall of the "noble vestment" as the Prophet's garb is styled, along with his stirrup, sabre, bow and other relics.

Banner of France, The sacred. The ORIFLAMME.

Banners in churches. These are suspended as thank offerings to God. Those in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Henry VII's Chapel, WESTMINSTER, etc., are to indicate that the KNIGHT whose banner is hung up avows himself devoted to God's service.

Banner State. In the U.S.A. the State, which in a presidential election, gives the victor the biggest majority or vote. The adjective is used in other contexts to mean "leading" or "foremost".

Banneret. One who leads his vassals to battle under his own banner. Also an order of Knighthood conferred on the field of battle for deeds of valour by tearing off the points of the recipient's pen-

non. This mediæval order lapsed after the reign of Elizabeth I, and was last properly conferred by Charles I in 1642 on Colonel John Smith for his recovery of the Royal Standard at Edgehill.

Banns of Marriage. The publication in the parish church for three successive Sundays of an intended marriage. It is made after the second lesson of the Morning Service, or of Evening Service (if there be no Morning Service). The word is from the same root as BAN.

To forbid the banns. To object formally to the proposed marriage.

And a better fate did poor Maria deserve than to have a banns forbidden by the curate of the parish who published them.

STERNE: Sentimental Journey (1768).

Banquet in addition to its present meaning once also meant dessert. Thus in the Pemyles Pilgrimage (1618) John Taylor, the WATER POET, says: "Our first and second course being three-score dishes at one board, and after that, always a banquet." The word is from the Italian banco, a bench or table (see BANK).

Bantam. A little bantam cock. A plucky little fellow that will not be bullied by a person bigger than himself. The bantam cock will encounter a dunghill cock five times his own weight, and is therefore said to "have a great soul in a little body". The bantam originally came from Bantam in Java.

Banting. Reducing superfluous fat by living on an essentially protein diet, and abstaining from beer, port, etc., and farinaceous food, according to the method adopted by William Banting (1797-1878). This London undertaker explained in his pamphlet Corpulence (1864), how he reduced his weight from 202 lb. to 156 lb. between August 1862 and August 1863. The word was used by The Times on 12 August 1864.

A greater benefactor to mankind was Sir Frederick Grant Banting (1891-1941), who discovered insulin in 1922.

Bantling. A child, a brat; usually in a depreciatory sense, or meaning an illegitimate child. It is from Ger. Bankling, a bastard, from Bank, a bench; hence a child begotten casually, as on a bench or out of the marriage-bed. The word has been confused with bandling, taken to mean a little one in swaddling clothes.

Banyan Day. An English nautical phrase to describe a day on which no meat was issued in the rations. In Australia it is found in official documents of the late 18th century. On Australian out-stations Banyan Day for the hands was when meat supplies were exhausted, before the end of the ration period. See BANIAN.

Baphomet (Fr. Baphomet; O.Sp. Matomat). A corruption of Mahomet, the imaginary idol which the TEMPLARS were said to worship with licentious rites.

Baptēs. Priests of the goddess COTYTTO, the Thracian goddess of lewdness, whose midnight orgies were so obscene that they disgusted even the goddess herself. The name is derived from the Greek verb bapto, to wash, because of the so-called ceremonies of purification connected with her rites (Juvenal, ii, 91).

Baptism. This SACRAMENT of the Christian Church dates back in one form or another to pre-apostolic times.

Baptism for the dead was a kind of vicarious baptism of a living person for the sake of one dead. An heretical and superstitious custom referred to in I Cor. xv, 29.

Baptism of blood. Martyrdom for the sake of Christ which supplied the place of the sacrament if the martyr was unbaptized.

Baptism of desire is the grace or virtue of baptism acquired by one who earnestly desires baptism by water but dies before receiving it.

Baptism of fire is really martyrdom, but usually means experiencing the fire of battle for the first time. It was so used by NAPOLEON III.

Bar. The whole body of barristers, cp. BENCH. The bar, in the INNS OF COURT, is the partition separating the benchers from the rest of the hall.

At the bar. The prisoner at the bar, the prisoner in the dock before the judge.

To be called to the bar. To be admitted a BARRISTER. Students having attained the necessary standing used to be called from the body of the hall to the bar. To disbar means to expel a barrister from his profession.

To be called within the bar. To be appointed QUEEN'S COUNSEL, i.e. to be admitted within the bar which separated the members of the court from the prisoners, junior counsel, and public. Q.C.s are thus of the inner bar.

Trial at Bar. By full court of judges in the QUEEN'S BENCH division. These trials are for very difficult causes, before special juries, and occupy the attention of the four judges in the superior court, instead of at NISI PRIUS.

Bar. Excepting. In the language of the TURF, "two to one, bar one" means betting two to one against any horse in the field with one exception. The word means "barring out", "debarring", "excluding", as in Shakespeare's:

Nay, but I bar to-night; you shall not gage me by what we do to-night.

Merchant of Venice, II, ii.

Bar. In HERALDRY, a horizontal band across the shield taking up not more than one-fifth of the Field. A diminutive of the fesse.

A barre . . . is drawne overthwart the escochon . . . it containeth the fifth part of the Field.
JOHN GULLIM: The Display of Heraldry (1610).

Bar sinister. An heraldic term popularly mistaken as an indication of bastardy, correctly denoted by a baton sinister. See BEND SINISTER.

Barring out. In bygone days the practice of barricading the masters out of the classroom or the school. Maria Edgeworth (1767-1848) has a tale so called. In 1818 soldiers were called in to deal with a rebellious outbreak at Winchester College.

Barataria. SANCHO PANZA's island-city, in Don QUIXOTE, over which he was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Doctor Pedro Rezio de Agüero, who caused every dish set upon the board to be removed without being tasted—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it, some for one ill effect, and some for another; so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing. The word is from Sp. barato, cheap.

Barataria is also the setting of Act II of The Gondoliers. cp. BARMECIDE'S FEAST.

Barathron, or Barathrum. A deep ditch behind the Acropolis of ATHENS into which malefactors were thrown; somewhat in the same way as criminals at ROME were cast from the TARPEIAN ROCK. Sometimes used figuratively, as in Mas-singer's New Way to Pay Old Debts, where Sir Giles Overreach calls Greedy a "barathrum of the shambles" (III, ii), meaning that he was a sink into which any kind of food or offal could be thrown.

Carion: Barathrum? What's Barathrum?

Mercury: Why, Barathrum is Pluto's bogbards [privy]: you must all be thrown into Barathrum.

RANDOLPH: Hey for Honesty, V, i (c. 1630).

Barb (Lat. barba, a beard). Used in early times in England for the beard of a man and thus for the feathers under the beak of a HAWK (beard feathers). Its first English use was for a curved-back instrument such as a fish-hook. The barb of an arrow had two iron "feathers" or hooks near the point to hinder extraction.

Barb. A Barbary steed, noted for docility, speed, endurance, and spirit; also called a Barbary. See BARBARY ROAN.

Barbara Allen. The heroine of an old ballad given in PERCY'S RELIQUES called Barbara Allen's Cruelty. She died of remorse after showing no pity for the young man who was dying of love for her.

Farewell, she sayd, ye virgins all,
And shun the fault I fell in:
Henceforth take warning by the fall
Of cruel Barbara Allen.

Barbara, St. Virgin and martyr (c. 4th century). Her father, a fanatical heathen, delivered her up to Martian, governor of Nicomedia, for being a Christian. After she had been subjected to the most cruel tortures, her unnatural father was about to strike off her head, when a lightning flash laid him dead at her feet. Hence she is invoked against lightning and is the patron saint of arsenals and artillery.

Barbari. Quod non fecerunt barbari, fecerunt Barberini. i.e. What the barbarians left standing, the Barberini contrived to destroy. A saying current in ROME at the time when Pope Urban VIII (1623-1644) (Barberini) converted the bronze girders of the PANTHEON, which had remained in splendid condition since 27 B.C., into cannon and into pillars for the Baldacchino, or canopy of St. Peter's.

Barbarian. The Greeks and Romans called all foreigners barbarians (babblers; men who spoke a language not understood by them). The word was probably merely imitative of unintelligible speech. The extension of meaning to imply uncivilized, uncultured, is a natural consequence.

Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me.
I Cor. xiv, 11.

Barbarossa (Red-beard). The surname of Frederick I (c. 1123-1190), Holy Roman EMPEROR. He was drowned whilst on the Third CRUSADE. Also the name applied by the Christians to a family of Turkish sea rovers, especially well known being the famous corsair Khair ud-Din Barbarossa, who became Bey of Algiers in 1518 and High ADMIRAL of the Turkish fleet in 1537.

Barbary Coast. The western Mediterranean coast of Africa which was infested by MOSLEM sea rovers from the 16th century until the early 19th century. The native Berbers derive their name from the Roman habit of referring to indigenous peoples as barbari.

In Sydney, New South Wales it is a slang term for a part of one of that city's thoroughfares which runs from Taylor Square, through Oxford and Liverpool streets, to the Central Railway Station. In the U.S.A. the name was given, before the 1906 earthquake, to a rather disreputable district of San Francisco.

Barbary Roan, the favourite horse of Richard II.

O, how it yearn'd my heart, when I beheld,
In London streets, that coronation-day,
When Bolingbroke rode on Roan Barbary,
The horse that thou [Rich. II] so often hast bestrid,
The horse that I so carefully have dres'd!
SHAKESPEARE: Richard II, V, v.

Barbason (bar' bá son). A fiend mentioned by Shakespeare in The Merry Wives of Windsor, II, ii, and in Henry V, II, i.

Amsimon sounds well; Lucifer, well; Barbason, well; yet they are devils' additions, the names of fiends.—Merry Wives.

The name seems to have been obtained from Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584).

Barbecue (bar' be kū) (Sp. barbacoa, a wooden framework set up on posts). A West Indian term formerly used in America for a wooden bedstead, and also for a large gridiron upon which an animal could be roasted whole. Hence an animal, such as a hog, so cooked; also the feast at which it is roasted and eaten. Popularly applied in Britain to an outdoor party when the food is cooked on a fire in the open.

Oldfield, with more than harpy throat subdued,
Cries, "Send me, ye gods, a whole hog barbecued!"
POPE: Satires, ii, 25.

Barbed Steed. A horse in armour. Barbed should properly be barded; it is from the Fr. barde, horse-armour. Horses' "bards" were the metal coverings for the breast and flanks.

And now,—instead of mounting barbed steeds
To fright the souls of fearful adversaries,—
He capers nimbly in a lady's chamber
To the lascivious pleasing of a lute.
SHAKESPEARE: Richard III, I, i.

Barber. Every barber knows that.

Omnibus notum tonsoribus,
HORACE: I Satires, vii, 3.

From ancient Roman times the barber's shop has been a centre for the dissemination of scandal, and the talk of the town.

Barber Poet. Jacques Jasmin (1798-1864), a Provençal poet, who was also known as "the last of the TROUBADOURS". He was a barber.

Barber's pole. This pole, painted spirally with two stripes of red and white, and displayed outside barber's shops as a sign, derives from the days when they also practised phlebotomy. The pole represents the staff gripped by persons in venesection, which was painted red since it was usually stained with blood. The white spiral represents the bandage twisted round the arm previous to blood-letting. The gilt knob at the end of the pole represents the brass basin which was sometimes actually suspended from it. The basin had a notch cut in it to fit the throat, and was used for lathering customers before shaving. The Barber-Surgeons' Company dates from 1462 and was re-incorporated in 1540 as the Company of Barbers and Surgeons. The trade of barber was separated from the practice of surgery in 1745. The last barber-surgeon in London is said to have been one Middleditch, of Great Suffolk Street in the BOROUGH, who died in 1821.

Barber of Seville. The comedy of this name (Le Barbier de Séville) was written by Beaumarchais and produced in Paris in 1775. In it appeared as the barber the famous character of FIGARO. Paisello's opera appeared in 1780 but was eclipsed by Rossini's Barbiere di Siviglia, with words by Sterbini. The latter was hissed on its first appearance in 1816 under the title of Almaviva.

Barcelona. A fichu, piece of velvet for the neck, or small necktie, made at Barcelona, and common in England in the early 19th century. Also a neckcloth of some bright colour, as red with yellow spots.

Now on this handkerchief so starch and white
She doubled a Barcelona black and tight.

PETER PINDAR: Portfolio (Dinah).

A double Barcelona protected his neck.

SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak (Prefatory Letter).

Barchester. An imaginary cathedral town (modelled on Winchester), in the county of Bassetshire; the setting of Anthony Trollope's "Barchester Novels". These are: The Warden, 1855; Barchester Towers, 1857; Doctor Thorne, 1858; Framley Parsonage, 1861; The Small House at Allington, 1864; and The Last Chronicle of Barset, 1867. Angela Thirkell (1890-1961) also used Bassetshire and Barchester as a setting for some of her stories.

Barcochabah, or Barcochebas (barkoch' e ba). In Hebrew means "Son of a star". One Simeon, a heroic Jewish leader against the Romans, who is reputed to have claimed to be the "Star out of Jacob" mentioned in Num. xxiv, 17, was so called. He took Jerusalem in 132 and was acclaimed by some as the MESSIAH. He was overwhelmed and slain by the forces of Julius Severus in 135.

Bard. The minstrel of the ancient Celtic peoples, the Gauls, British, Welsh, Irish and Scots. They celebrated the deeds of the gods and heroes, incited to battle, acted as heralds, and sang at festivities. The oldest extant bardic compositions are of the 5th century.

Bard of Avon. William Shakespeare (1564-1616), who was born and buried at Stratford-upon-Avon.

Bard of Ayrshire. Robert Burns (1759-1796), a native of Ayrshire.

Bard of Hope. Thomas Campbell (1777-1844), author of The Pleasures of Hope (1799).

Bard of the Imagination. Mark Akenside (1721-1770), author of The Pleasures of the Imagination (1744, rewritten 1757).

Bard of Memory. Samuel Rogers (1763-1855), author of The Pleasures of Memory (1792).

Bard of Olney. William Cowper (1731-1800), who for many years lived at Olney, Buckinghamshire.

Bard of Prose. Boccaccio (1313-1375), author of the DECAMERON.

The Bard of Prose, creative spirit! he
Of the Hundred Tales of Love.

BYRON: Childs Harold, IV, lvi.

Bard of Rydal Mount. William Wordsworth (1770-1850); so called because Rydal Mount was his home.

Bard of Twickenham. Alexander Pope (1688-1744), who had a house at Twickenham. Also called the Wasp of Twickenham by some of his contemporaries.

Bardolph. One of FALSTAFF's inferior officers. Falstaff calls him "the knight of the burning lamp", because his nose was so red, and his face "so full of meteors". He is a low-bred, drunken swaggerer, without principle, and "POOR AS A CHURCH MOUSE". (Henry IV, Parts I and II, Henry V, Merry Wives).

Barebones Parliament (4 July - 11 December 1653). The Nominated or Little PARLIAMENT of 140 members approved by Cromwell and the officers and derisively named after one of its members, Praise-God Barebon.

Barefooted. Certain FRIARS and nuns (some of whom wear sandals instead of shoes), especially the reformed section of the CARMELITES (White Friars) founded by St. TERESA in the 16th century, known as the Discalced Carmelites (Lat. calceus, a shoe). The practice is defended by the command of our Lord to His disciples "Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes" (Luke x, 4). The Jews and Romans used to put off their shoes in mourning and public calamities, by way of humiliation.

Bare poles, Under. When a ship has no sails set due to bad weather and gale conditions. Figuratively applied to a man reduced to the last extremity.

Bargain. Into the bargain. In addition thereto; besides what was bargained for.

King's, or Queen's bad bargain. See under KING.

To make the best of a bad bargain. To make the best of a matter in which one has been worsted.

To stand to a bargain. To abide by it; the Lat. stare conventis, conditionibus stare, pactis stare, etc.

Barisal Guns. The name given to certain mysterious booming sounds which occur at Barisal (Eastern Bengal) which seem to come from the sea. Similar phenomena at Seneca Lake, New York, are called Lake guns; on the coast of Holland and Belgium mispoeffers; and in Italy bombiti, baturlio marina, etc.

Bark. Dogs in their wild state never bark, but howl, whine, and growl. Barking is an acquired habit.

Bark and the tree, Put not thy hand between the. Do not interfere in disputes between the closely related. Thomas Tusser advises in 1573 "not to put thy hand betwixt bark and the tree, least through thy owne follie so pinched thou be."

Barker. A pistol, which barks or makes a louder report. Also the man who stands at the entrance to a sideshow of a circus, etc., or touts outside a shop, shouting to attract custom. In the U.S.A. it is also applied to a baseball coach.

Barking dogs seldom bite. Huffing, bouncing, hectoring fellows rarely possess cool courage. Similar proverbs are found in Latin, French, Italian, and German.

His bark is worse than his bite. He scolds and abuses roundly, but does not bear malice or act harshly.

To bark at the moon. To rail uselessly, especially at those in high places, as a dog thinks to frighten the moon by baying at it. There is a superstition that when a dog does this it portends death or ill-luck.

I had rather be a dog, and bay the moon,
Than such a Roman.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Caesar, IV, iii.

To bark up the wrong tree. To waste energy, to be on the wrong scent. The phrase comes from raccoon hunting, which takes place in the dark. The dogs are used to mark the tree where the raccoon has taken refuge, but they can mistake the tree in the dark and bark up the wrong one.

Barkis is willin'. The message sent by Barkis to Peggotty through David Copperfield, expressing his desire to marry. It has become a proverbial expression indicating willingness.

Barlaam and Josaphat (bar' lām, jós á fāt). An Indian romance telling how Barlaam, an ascetic of the desert of Sinai, converted Josaphat, a Hindu prince, to Christianity. Probably translated into Greek by the 6th century, and put into its final form by St. John of Damascus, a Syrian monk of the 8th century, in part it corresponds closely with the legendary story of BUDDHA's youth. It became a widely popular mediæval romance. The Story of the Three Caskets was used by SHAKESPEARE in The Merchant of Venice.

Barley. To cry barley. An old country game akin to "Prisoners' Base", having a "home" which was called "hell". Herrick has a poem, Barley-break, or Last in Hell. Barley, a corruption of parley, was, in rough games, a cry for a truce.

Barley-bree. ALE: malt liquor brewed from barley, also called barley-broth.

The cock may crawl, the day may daw,
And aye we'll taste the barley-bree,

BURNS: Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maist.

Barley-mow. A heap or stack of barley (O.E. muga; cp. Icel. muge, a swathe). See MOW.

John, or Sir John Barleycorn. A personification of malt liquor. The term was popularized by Burns.

Inspiring bold John Barleycorn,
What dangers thou canst make us scorn!
Tam o' Shanter.

To wear the barley cap. To be top-heavy or tipsy with BARLEY-BREE.

Barmecide's Feast. An illusion, particularly one containing a great disappointment. In the ARABIAN NIGHTS, The Barber's story of his sixth Brother, a prince of the great Barmecide family in Baghdad, desirous of sport, asked Schacabac, a poor starving wretch, to dinner. Having set before him a series of empty plates, the merchant asked, "How do you like your soup?" "Excellently well," replied Schacabac. "Did you ever see whiter bread?" "Never, honourable sir," was the civil answer. Illusory wine was later offered, but Schacabac excused himself by pretending to be drunk already, and knocked the Barmecide down. The latter saw the humour of the situation, forgave Schacabac, and provided him with food to his heart's content.

Bar Mitzvah (Heb. Son of duty). The ceremony celebrating the arrival of a Jewish boy at the age of responsibility, thirteen years.

Barmy. Mad, crazy, i.e. full of froth. Sometimes incorrectly spelled "balmy". Hence, in prison slang, to put on the barmy stick is to feign insanity. There is a popular misconception that the word comes from Barming (near Maidstone) because the county lunatic asylum was built at Barming Heath.

Barnabas. St. Barnabas's Day, 11 June. St. Barnabas was a fellow-labourer of St. PAUL. His symbol is a rake, because 11 June is the time of hay-harvest.

Barnabites. An order of regular clerks of St. PAUL, recognized by Clement VII in 1533. Probably so called from the Church of St. Barnabas in Milan which became their centre.

Barnaby Bright. An old provincial name for St. BARNABAS's Day (11 June). Before the reform of the CALENDAR it was the longest day, hence the jingle in Ray's Collection of Proverbs—

Barnaby bright! Barnaby bright!
The longest day and the shortest night.

Barnaby Lecturers. In the University of Cambridge, four lecturers elected annually on St. BARNABAS's Day, to lecture on mathematics, philosophy, rhetoric, and logic.

Barnaby Rudge. This novel by Charles Dickens, which first appeared in 1840, centres round the Gordon riots of 1780, and he drew upon the memories of survivors of these times. Barnaby was a half-witted lad whose companion was a raven.

Barnacle. A species of wild GOOSE allied to the Brent Goose, called in Germany the "duck-mussel". Also the popular name of the Cirripedes, especially those attached by a stalk to floating baulks of timber and the bottoms of ships. In mediæval times it was held that the goose developed from it as a frog does from a tadpole.

The name is given figuratively to close and constant companions, hangers-on; and also to PLACEMEN who cling to office, like barnacles sticking to the bottoms of ships.

Barnacles. Spectacles, especially those of heavy make and clumsy appearance. A slang term from their supposed resemblance to the twitches or barnacles formerly used by farriers to restrain unruly horses while being shod, etc. This instrument, consisting of two branches joined at one end by a hinge, was used to grip the horse's nose. Probably a diminutive of the O.Fr. bernac, a kind of muzzle for horses.

Barnard's Inn. One of the old Inns of CHANCERY, formerly situated on the south side of HOLBORN and once known as "Mackworth's Inn", because Dean Mackworth of Lincoln (d. 1454) lived there.

Barn-burners. Destroyers, who, like the Dutchmen of story, would burn down their barns to rid themselves of the rats. In the U.S.A. the term was applied to the radical section of the Democratic party in New York State in the Presidential election of 1844 by their conservative opponents, who were called HUNKERS. The Barn-burners finally joined the Republican party in the 1850s to further the cause of anti-slavery.

Barney. A dispute, argument or rumpus. A contraction of BARNABAS, current in England and Australia. Barney was a fairly common name among Irish settlers in the 19th century, and the usage is probably an allusion to their reputed temperament and behaviour.

Barnstormer. A strolling player, and hence any second-rate actor, especially one whose style is of an exaggerated declamatory kind. From the itinerant actors who performed in village barns.

Barnwell, George. The subject of the 17th-century ballad in PERCY'S RELIQUES which formed the basis of George Lillo's prose tragedy The London Merchant, or the History of George Barnwell, produced in 1731. Barnwell was a London apprentice, who fell in with a wanton in SHORE-DITCH, named Sarah Millwood, to whom he gave £200 of his master's money in return for her favours. He next robbed his uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow, and beat out his brains. Having spent the money, Sarah turned him out; each informed against the other and both were hanged.

Baron is from Late Lat. baro, a man (especially opposed to something else, as a freeman to a slave, etc.). After the Norman CONQUEST it denoted the man or VASSAL of a great noble, especially the king, and by the 13th century the distinction between greater and lesser barons was well established. The greater barons came to be summoned to the GREAT COUNCIL by individual writs and the term baronage became equated to peerage. It is now the lowest order of nobility.

In colloquial speech in the U.S.A. it is equivalent to "magnate" as in "beef baron" and "soap baron".

Baron and feme. An heraldic term for husband and wife, an example of the older use of the word BARON.

Baron Bung. Mine host, master of the beer bung.

Baron Münchhausen. See MÜNCHHAUSEN.

Baron of beef. A double SIRLOIN, left uncut at the backbone, and of great size, roasted at special festivities. Jocosely, but wrongly, said to be a pun upon baron and sir loin.

Barons of the Cinque Ports. The name given to the representatives of the CINQUE PORTS in the HOUSE OF COMMONS. Another example of the freer use of the word BARON.

Barons' War. The name applied to the civil war (1264–1267) between the baronial supporters of Simon de Montfort and the supporters of Henry III. Drayton's poem The Barrons Wars appeared in 1603.

Tobacco Baron. See TOBACCO BARON.

Baronet. An hereditary title instituted by James I in 1611, the sale of which was to provide funds for the defence of the plantation of Ulster. The Red Hand of ULSTER became the badge of Baronets of England; of Great Britain; of the United Kingdom; and of Ireland (instituted in 1619). Baronets of Scotland and Nova Scotia were created from 1625. Nova Scotian patents ceased in 1638 after the colony had fallen to the French. Scottish creations ceased in 1707 and Irish from 1801, consequent upon the respective Acts of UNION.

Barrack. To barrack, is to jeer at, to receive with derisive applause, to interrupt with rude comments, particularly at the players of games. The word came into use in Australia about 1880, where barracking is considered legitimate, and was introduced into England by visiting Australian cricketers. The term may have derived from the rough and noisy games of football that were played on waste ground near the Victoria Barracks, Melbourne, the players being known locally as "barrackers". See BORAK.

Barrack Hack. A lady who attends all barrack social events and hangs on the sleeves of the officers.

Barrack-room lawyer. A soldier with a real or professed knowledge of regulations who makes complaints against authority. A grouser. Cp. SEA LAWYER.

Barrack stanchion. In naval usage, a sailor who remains in barracks for a length of time instead of being sent to sea. The meaning is obvious.

Barrel House. A name applied in the U.S.A. in the late 19th century to a small squalid drinking saloon, where customers drew their own liquor from the cask. Also given to a rough uninhibited type of JAZZ.

Barrell's Blues. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Barricade. To block up a street, building, etc., against attack. The term arose in France in 1588, when Henri of Guise returned to Paris in defiance of Henry III. The King called out the SWISS GUARDS, and the Parisians tore up the pavements, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels (Fr. barriques) filled with earth and stones, from behind which they shot down the Swiss.

The day of the Barricades—

(1) 12 May 1588, when the people forced Henry III to flee from Paris.

(2) 5 August 1648, the beginning of the FRONDE.

(3) 27 July 1830, the first day of la grande semaine which resulted in the abdication of Charles X.

(4) 24 February 1848, when Louis Philippe abdicated.

(5) 25 June 1848, when the Archbishop of Paris was shot in attempting to quell the insurrection consequent upon the closing of the national workshops.

(6) 2 December 1851, the day of Louis NAPOLEON III's coup d'état, when the RADICALS attempted resistance.

In spite of Napoleon III's street widening in Paris, partly to prevent the successful erection of barricades, the Communards made further use of them during the second siege of Paris in 1871.

Barrister. One who has been "called to the BAR", and is thereafter entitled to plead in any court, having received his brief from a solicitor. Formerly called "outer" or "UTTER" barristers, after ten years as junior counsel they may apply to "take SILK" to become QUEEN'S (King's) COUNSEL. Until 1877 there was a superior third group called SERGEANTS-AT-LAW. The Q.C. is a senior barrister and is entitled to wear a silk gown and full-bottomed wig. Other barristers wear a stiff gown and short wig.

A Revising Barrister. One appointed to revise the lists of electors for members of PARLIAMENT.

A Vacation Barrister. Formerly one newly called to the bar, who for three years had to attend in "Long Vacation". The practice is now obsolete.

Barristers' Bags. See LAWYERS.

Barrister's gowns. "UTTER barristers wear a stiff or bombazine gown, and the puckered material between the shoulders of the gown is all that is now left of the purse into which, in early days, the successful litigant . . . dropped his . . . pecuniary tribute . . . for services rendered" (Notes and Queries, 11 March 1893, p. 124). Barristers' fees have always been treated as gratuities and even now are not recoverable at law.

Barrowists. In the reign of Elizabeth I, PURITAN followers of Henry Barrow, holding CONGREGATIONALIST views similar to the BROWNISTS.

Barry Cornwall. The NOM DE PLUME of Bryan Waller Procter (1787-1874). Writer of once popular songs.

Bartholomew, St. The symbol of this SAINT is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was flayed alive, reputedly in A.D. 44. His day is 24 August.

Bartholomew doll. A TAWDRY overdressed woman; like one of the flashy bespangled dolls offered for sale at Bartholomew Fair.

Bartholomew Fair. A FAIR opened annually at SMITHFIELD on St. Bartholomew's Day, from 1133 to 1752; after the reform of the CALENDAR it began on 3 September. It was removed to Islington in 1840 and was last held in 1855 (See CALEDONIAN MARKET). One of the great national fairs dealing in cloth, livestock, etc., accompanied by a variety of amusements and entertainments, it long held its place as a centre of London life. The PURITANS failed to suppress it. Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair, a comedy of manners, was first acted in 1614.

Here's that will challenge all the fairs,
Come buy my nuts and damsons and Burgamy pears!

Here's the Woman of Babylon, the Devil and the Pope.

And here's the little girl just going on the rope!
Here's Dives and Lazarus, and the World's Creation;

Here's the Tall Dutchwoman, the like's not in the nation.

Here is the booths where the high Dutch maid is,
Here are the bears that dance like any ladies;

Tat, tat, tat, tat, says little penny trumpet;
Here's Jacob Hall, that does so jump it, jump it;
Sound trumpet, sound, for silver spoon and fork.
Come, here's your dainty pig and pork!

Wit and Drollery (1682).

Bartholomew, Massacre of St. The slaughter of the French HUGUENOTS begun on St. Bartholomew's Day, 24 August 1572, in Paris and the provinces, at the instigation of Catherine de' MEDICI, mother of Charles IX. Probably some 50,000 people perished.

Bartholomew pig. A very fat person. At

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR one of the chief attractions used to be a pig, roasted whole, and sold piping hot. Doll Tearsheet calls Falstaff—

Thou whoreson little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig.
Henry IV, Pt. II, II, iv.

Bartolist. One skilled in law, or specifically a student of Bartolus. Bartolus (1314-1357) was an eminent Italian lawyer who greatly enhanced the status of the law school of Perugia, particularly by his Commentary on the Code of Justinian.

Bas Bleu. See BLUE STOCKING.

Base Tenure. Originally tenure not by military, but by base service, such as a serf or VILLEIN might give; later, villein tenure became COPYHOLD tenure.

Bashaw. An arrogant, domineering man; a corruption of the Turkish pasha, a viceroy or provincial governor.

The Three Bashaws of Somerset

House. A popular nickname for the three Poor Law Commissioners (T. Frankland Lewis, J. G. Shaw Lefevre, George Nicholls) appointed under the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834. SOMERSET HOUSE was their headquarters.

A three-tailed bashaw. A beglerbeg or prince of princes among the Turks, who has a standard of three horse-tails borne before him. The next rank is the bashaw with two tails, and then the bey who has only one horse-tail.

Bashi-bazouk (bāsh' i bá zook'). A savage and brutal ruffian (Turkish bashi, head-dress; bozук, unkempt). It was applied in Turkey to non-uniformed irregular soldiers who made up in plunder what they did not get in pay. The term came into prominence at the time of the Crimean War and again through the Bulgarian atrocities of 1876.

Basic English. A fundamental selection of 850 English words designed by C. K. Ogden as a common first step in the teaching of English and as an auxiliary language. The name comes from the initials of the words British, American, Scientific, International, Commercial.

Basilian Monks. A monastic order founded by St. Basil in c. 360 whose rule became the basis of monasticism in the Greek and Russian churches.

Basilica (bā zil' i ká) (Gr. basilikos, royal). Originally a royal palace, but afterwards (in ROME) a large building with nave, aisles, and an apse at one end used as a court of justice and for public meetings. Some were adapted by the early Christians and many churches were modelled on them. Constantine built the great basilicas of St. PETER, St. PAUL, and St. John Lateran.

Basilisco. A braggart. Basilisco was a cowardly, bragging KNIGHT in Kyd's (?) tragedy Solyman and Perseda (?1588). SHAKESPEARE (King John, I, i) makes the BASTARD say to his mother, who asks him why he boasted of his ill-birth, "Knight, knight, good mother, Basilisco-like" i.e. my boasting has made me a knight.

Basilisk (baz' i lisk). The fabulous king of serpents (Gr. basileus, a king), also called a COCKATRICE and alleged to be hatched by a SERPENT from a cock's egg. It was reputed to be capable of "looking anyone dead on whom it fixed its eyes".

The Basiliske . . .
From powerful eyes close venom doth convey
Into the lookers hart, and killeth farre away.
SPENSER: Faerie Queene, IV, vii, 37.

Also the name given to a genus of Central American lizard and to a large brass cannon of Tudor times.

Basin Street. A street in the RED-LIGHT DISTRICT of the French quarter of New Orleans which is possibly the original home of American JAZZ music. The well-known Basin Street Blues was composed by Spencer Williams in 1928.

Basket. To be left in the basket. Neglected or uncared for. Formerly foundling hospitals used to place baskets at their doors for the reception of abandoned infants. Basket is also a slang term for BASTARD.

To give a basket. To refuse to marry. In Germany it was an old custom to fix a basket on the roof of one who had been jilted.

To go to the basket Old slang for consignment to prison: referring to the dependence of the lowest grade of poor prisoners upon what passers-by put in the basket for their sustenance.

To put all your eggs in one basket. See EGG.

Basochians (bá sosh' yánz). An old French term for clerks of the PARLEMENTS, hence, lawyers. In Paris, their chief, called le roi de la basoche, had his court, coin and grand officers, and reviewed his subjects annually. Henry III (1574-1589) suppressed the office.

The basoche presented entertainments including farces, political satires, and moralities, thus contributing to the development of the theatre. There were also certain local basoches. All were abolished by 1790. Cp. Enfants SANS SOUCI.

Messenger produced a comic opera called La Basoche in 1890.

Bast. See BUBASTIS.

Bastard. An illegitimate child, from the Old French bast, a pack-saddle, used by muleteers as a bed; hence, one begotten on a pack-saddle bed. Cp. BANTLING.

Also an old name for a sweetened Spanish wine made from the bastard muscadine grape.

I will pledge you willingly in a cup of bastard.
SIR WALTER SCOTT: Kenilworth, Ch. III.

Baste. I'll give you a thorough basting, i.e. beating. The word is of uncertain origin but may derive from the fact that lazy scullions and TURNSPITS were sometimes beaten by the enraged cook with the basting-stick, a long-handled wooden spoon ending in a funnel which was used for basting the joint of meat on the spit with hot fat from the dripping pan beneath.

Bastille (bás tēl') (O.Fr. bastir, now bâtir, to build). A fortress, but specifically the famous state prison in Paris built as a royal castle by Charles V between 1370 and 1383, seized and sacked by the mob in the French Revolution, 14 July 1789. Regarded as a symbol of tyranny, bastille, when used of a building or establishment, implies prison-like qualities. Cp. ALTMARK.

Bat. HARLEQUIN's lath wand (Fr. batte, a wooden sword).

Off his own bat. By his own exertions; on his own account. A cricketer's phrase, meaning runs made by a single player.

Parliament of Bats. See CLUB PARLIAMENT.

To bat along, to get along at a great bat. Here the word means beat, pace, rate of speed.

To bat on a sticky wicket. To have to take action or carry on in difficult circumstances where things make success unlikely. In CRICKET the batsman playing on recently rained-on turf finds the movement of the ball very tricky.

To carry one's bat (in cricket). A batsman who goes in first and is "not out" at the end of the innings.

To have bats in the belfry, or attic. To be crazy in the head, bats here being the nocturnal variety.

On a bat, or on the bat.

On a spree I went to a bat in S's rooms and we smoked till three.

W. T. WASHFORD: Fair Harvard (1869).

Without batting an eyelid. Without betraying surprise. Here batting is derived from the now obsolete bate (from (O.Fr. batre) meaning to beat the wings, to flutter.

Batman. A military officer's soldier-servant; originally a soldier in charge of a bat-horse (pack-horse) and its load of officer's baggage. From Fr. bat, a pack-saddle (see BASTARD).

Bate me an Ace. See BOLTON.

Bath. Knights of the Bath. This order derives its name from the ceremony of bathing which was formerly practised at the inauguration of a KNIGHT, as a symbol of purity. Established in the reign of Henry IV, the last knights were created in the ancient manner at the coronation of Charles II in 1661. G.C.B. stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first class); K.C.B., Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class); C.B., Companion of the Bath (the third class).

Bath brick. A scouring brick made at Bridgwater, Somerset, and used for cleaning steel knives, metals, etc. It is made from sand and clay taken from the River Parret, which runs through the town.

Also a naval nickname for Malta, derived from the particular hue of its stone buildings.

Bath chair. An invalid chair mounted on wheels, first used at Bath, frequented by invalids on account of its hot springs.

Bath, King of. Richard Nash (1674-1762), commonly called BEAU NASH, for 56 years the celebrated master of ceremonies at Bath.

Bath King-of-Arms. See HERALDRY.

Bath metal. An alloy like PINCHBECK consisting of copper, zinc, lead and tin. Also called mosaic gold, DUTCH GOLD, etc.

Bath Oliver. A special kind of biscuit invented by Dr. William Oliver (1695-1764), founder of the Royal Mineral Water Hospital, Bath; an authority on GOUT, he left his biscuit recipe to his coachman, Atkins.

Bath post. A letter paper with a highly glazed surface, used by the ultra-fashionable visitors of Bath when that spa was in its prime. See POST PAPER.

Bath shillings. Silver tradesmen's tokens coined at Bath in 1811-1812 with face values of 4s., 2s. 1s.

Bath stone. An attractive, but not very durable building stone, quarried in the Lower Oolite, near Bath.

Bath, St. Mary's. See BAIN MARIE.

There, go to Bath with you! Don't talk nonsense. Insane persons used to be sent to Bath for the benefit of its mineral waters. The implication of silliness is obvious.

Bathia (báth' i á). The name given in the TALMUD to the daughter of PHARAOH who found MOSES in the ark of bulrushes.

Bathos (bā' thos) (Gr. bathos, depth). First used by Pope (1727) in the sense of a ludicrous descent from grandiloquence to the commonplace.

And, thou Dalhousie, the great god of war,
Lieutenant-general to the Earl of Mar.

Bathos, ix.

Bathsheba (báth' shé bá). In Dryden and Tate's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, intended for the Duchess of Portsmouth, a mistress of Charles II. The allusion is to the wife of Uriah the Hittite, beloved by David (II Sam. xi).

Bathyllus (báth' i lús). A beautiful boy of Samos, greatly beloved by Polycrates the tyrant, and by the poet ANACREON (Horace: Epistle xiv, 9).

Bat-Kol (bát kol') (daughter of the voice). A heavenly or divine voice announcing the will of God. It existed in the time of the Jewish prophets but was also heard in post-prophetic times. The expression "daughter of a voice", meaning a small voice, differentiated it from the customary voice. Bat-Kol also denoted a kind of OMEN or AUGURY. After an appeal to Bat-Kol the first words heard were considered oracular.

Batrachomyomachia (bá' trak ō mí' ō mā kyá). A "STORM IN A TEACUP"; much ado about nothing. The word means The Battle of the Frogs and Mice and is the name of a mock heroic Greek epic once attributed to HOMER but probably by Figes of Caria.

Batta (bát' à). An Anglo-Indian term for perquisites. Properly an extra allowance once paid to officers of the British army in India which varied according to where they were stationed, etc. Also spelt batty.

He would rather live on half-pay in a garrison that could boast of a five-court than vegetate on full batta where there was none.

G. R. GLEIG: Thomas Munro, vol. I, ch. iv, p. 287.

Battels (bát' élz). At Oxford University the accounts for board and provisions, etc., and more loosely for total college expenses for the term, including tuition fees, etc. The word, of uncertain origin, has also been used for the provisions or rations themselves.

Battersea. You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut. A reproof to a simpleton, or one who makes a very foolish observation. The market gardeners of Battersea used to grow simples (medicinal herbs), and the London apothecaries went there to cut or select such as they wanted.

Battle. A pitched battle. A battle which has been planned, and the ground pitched on or chosen beforehand.

A close battle. Originally a naval engagement at close quarters in which opposing ships engage each other alongside.

Half the battle. Half determines the battle. Thus "the first stroke is half the battle", that is, the way in which the battle is begun determines what the end will be.

Line of battle. The formation of the ships in a naval engagement. A line of battle ship was a CAPITAL SHIP fit to take part in a main attack.

Trial by battle, or by Combat; Wager of battle. An ancient usage abolished by 59 Geo. III, c 46 (1819), after a man accused of murder escaped conviction in 1818, by appealing to wager of battel by throwing down the glove, which his accuser did not take up. Originally one of the forms of ORDEAL, when the accuser and accused could settle a case by personal combat in the presence of the court under the assumption that God would give the victory to the innocent.

Battle above the clouds. See CLOUDS.

Battle bowler. A nickname given in World War I to the soldier's steel helmet or tin hat. In World War II it was also called a "tin topee".

Battle of Britain. The attempt of the German Luftwaffe by their prolonged attack on S.E. England (August–October 1940) to defeat the R.A.F., as a prelude to invasion. R.A.F. Fighter Command gained the victory and universal admiration. The name arose from Sir Winston Churchill's speech (18 June 1940)—"What General Weygand called the 'Battle of France' is over. I expect that the Battle of Britain is about to begin."

Battle of the Books. A satire by Swift (written 1697, published 1704) on the current literary dispute as to the relative merits of ancient and modern authors. In the battle, ancient and modern books assail each other in St. James's Library. See BOYLE CONTROVERSY.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice. See BATRACHOMYOMACHIA.

Battle of the Giants. See GIANTS.

Battle of the Herrings. See HERRINGS.

Battle of the Nations. See NATIONS.

Battle of the Poets, The. A satirical poem (1725) by John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, in which the versifiers of the time are brought into the field.

Battle of the Spurs. See SPURS.

Battle of the Standard. See STANDARD.

Battle of the Standards. The nickname given to the presidential election contest of 1896. The Republican candidate, William McKinley, upheld the single GOLD STANDARD, and the Democratic candidate, William Jennings Bryan, fought for the free and unrestricted coinage of silver. The latter was defeated by a comparatively small margin. It was regarded as a victory for "big property".

Battle of the Three Emperors. See THREE EMPERORS.

Battle-painter, The. See MICHAEL ANGELO.

Battle Royal. In COCKFIGHTING, a certain number of birds are pitted together and left to fight until there is one survivor, the victor of the battle royal (cp. WELSH MAIN). Metaphorically the term is applied to any contest of wits, a general mêlée, etc.

Battle, Sarah. A character in one of Lamb's Essays of Elia, who considered that WHIST "was her life business; her duty; the thing she came into the world to do, and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards over a book."

Battledore-book. A name sometimes used for a HORN-BOOK, because of its shape like a shuttlecock bat or battledore. Hence, perhaps, the phrase "not to know B from a battledore". See B; CHRIS-CROSS.

Batty. See BATTIA. Also slang for crazy, to have "bats in the belfry" (see BAT).

Baturlio marina. See BARISAL GUNS.

Baabee. See BAWBEE.

Bauble. A fool should never hold a bauble in his hand. "Tis a foolish bird that fouls its own nest", a fool should not advertise his folly. The bauble was a short stick, ornamented with ass's ears, carried by licensed fools (O.Fr. babel, or baubel, a child's toy; perhaps confused with M.E. babyll or babulle, a stick with a thong). Oliver Cromwell thus contemptuously alluded to the House of Commons MACE, when dismissing the RUMP. "What shall we do with this bauble?" he said, picking up the mace, "Take it away."

If every fool held a bauble, fuel would be dear. The proverb indicates that the world contains a vast number of fools.

To deserve the bauble. To be so foolish as to qualify for the fool's emblem.

Baucis. See PHILEMON.

Bauld Willie. See BELTED WILL.

Baulk. See BALK.

Baviad, The (bāv' i äd). A merciless satire by William Gifford on the DELLA CRUSCAN poetry, published in 1794, and republished with The Maeviad in 1795. Bavius and Maevius were two minor poets pilloried by VIRGIL (Eclogue, iii, 9).

He may with foxes plough, and milk he-goats,
Who praises Bavius or on Maevius dotes.

Their names are used for inferior poets.

May some choice patron bless each grey goose quill,
May every Bavius have his Bufo still.

POPE: Prologue to Satires, 249-250.

Bavieca. See FAMOUS HORSES (under HORSE).

Bavius. See BAVIAD.

Bawbee. A Scottish small coin or half-penny first issued in 1541. The word is probably derived from a mint-master of that time, the laird of Sillebawby.

Jenny's bawbee. Her marriage portion.

Bawtry. Like the saddler of Bawtry, who was hanged for leaving his liquor (Yorkshire proverb). It was customary for criminals on their way to execution to stop at a certain tavern in York for a "parting draught". The saddler of Bawtry refused to accept the liquor and was hanged. If he had stopped a few minutes at the tavern, his reprieve, which was on the road, would have arrived in time to save his life.

Baxterians. Followers of Richard Baxter (1615-1691), eminent divine of PRESBYTERIAN sympathies, who took a prominent part in the SAVOY CONFERENCE, but was ejected by the Act of Uniformity (1662). His chief doctrines were—(1) That Christ died in a spiritual sense for the elect, and in a general sense for all; (2) that there is no such thing as reprobation; (3) that even saints may fall from grace.

Bay. A shrub of the LAUREL family, Laurus nobilis, used for flavouring, was the bay of the ancients. As the tree of APOLLO it was held to be a safeguard against thunder and lightning. Hence, according to Pliny, Tiberius and other Roman emperors wore a wreath of bay as an AMULET.

Reach the bays—

I'll tie a garland here about his head;

'Twill keep my boy from lightning.

WEBSTER: Vitoria Corumbona, V, i.

The bay being sacred to Apollo derives from the legend of his love for and rejection by the beautiful DAPHNE. The withering of a bay tree was supposed to be an OMEN of evil or death. Holinshed's reference to this superstition is used by SHAKESPEARE in King Richard II (II, iv).

'Tis thought the King is dead; we will not stay.
The bay trees in our country all are wither'd.

In another sense bay is a reddish-brown colour, generally used of horses. The word is the Fr. bai, from Lat. badius, a term used by Varro in his list of colours appropriate to horses. Thus BAYARD means "bay-coloured".

Crowned with bays. A reward of victory: from the ancient Roman custom of so crowning a victorious general.

The Queen's Bays. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Bay at the moon, To. See BARK.

Bay salt. Coarse-grained salt, formerly obtained by slow evaporation of sea water and used for curing meat, etc. "Bay" here does not signify colour; perhaps the salt is so called because originally imported from the coast of the Bay of Biscay.

Bay Psalm Book, or The Whole Booke of Psalmes. A translation for colonial churches by Thomas Welde, Richard Mather and John Eliot and the first book published in NEW ENGLAND, printed by Stephen Daye and his family at Cambridge, Mass., in 1640, and of which only eleven copies are known to have survived. Now highly prized, a copy changed hands in 1947 for $151,000.

Bay State, The. Massachusetts. Originally the Colony of Massachusetts Bay.

Bayadere (bā ya' dār). A Hindu professional dancing girl or nautch-girl employed for religious dances and private amusements. The word is a French corruption of the Portuguese bailadeira, a female dancer.

Bayard (bā' yard). A horse of incredible swiftness, given by CHARLEMAGNE to the four sons of AYMON. If only one of the sons mounted, the horse was of ordinary size; but if all four mounted, his body became elongated to the requisite length. He is introduced in Boiardo's ORLANDO INNAMORATO and Ariosto's ORLANDO FURIOSO, Tasso's RINALDO, etc. It is the name given to Fitz-James's horse in Scott's The Lady of the Lake. The name is used for any valuable or wonderful horse. See BAY.

Bold as a Blind Bayard. Foolhardy. If a blind horse leaps, the chance is that he will fall into a ditch. Francis Grose's Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue (1823) has the following expression, To ride Bayard of ten toes—"Going by the MARROW-BONE STAGE"—i.e. walking.

Keep Bayard in the stable. Keep what is valuable under lock and key.

Bayard, Chevalier de. Pierre du Terail (1475-1524), a celebrated French KNIGHT and national hero, distinguished in the Italian campaigns of Charles VIII, Louis XII and Francis I. Le bon chevalier, le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche were names bestowed upon him.

Bayard of the Confederate Army. Robert E. Lee (1807-1870).

The Bayard of the East, or of the Indian Army. Sir James Outram (1803-1863).

The British Bayard. Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586), the pride of Elizabeth I's court, who was mortally wounded at the battle of Zutphen (1586).

The Polish Bayard. Prince Joseph Poniatowski (1763-1813), who served with the greatest distinction under NAPOLEON.

Bayardo. The famous steed of RINALDO, which once belonged to AMADIS OF GAUL. See BAYARD.

Bayardo's Leap. Three stones, about thirty yards apart, near Sleaford. It is said that Rinaldo was riding on his favourite steed, when the demon of the place sprang up behind him; but Bayardo took three tremendous leaps and unhorsed the fiend.

Bayes (bāz). A character in the Rehearsal (1671), by the 2nd Duke of Buckingham, designed to satirize Dryden. The name is derived from the BAY Laurel of the laureateship.

Dead men may rise again, like Bayes's troops, or the savages in the Fantocini. In the Rehearsal a battle is fought between foot-soldiers and great HOBBY-HORSES. At last DRAWCANSIR kills all on both sides. Smith then asks how they are to go off, to which Bayes replies, "As they came on—upon their legs", upon which they all jump up alive again.

Bayonets. A synonym of "rank and FILE", that is, privates and corporals of infantry. As, "the number of bayonets was 25,000".

Bayou State (bi' yoo). The State of Mississippi; so called from its numerous bayous. A bayou is a creek or sluggish and marshy offshoot of a river or lake. The word is probably a corruption of the Fr. boyau, gut.

Bazooka (1) A comedian's trombone-type wind instrument. The name is perhaps modelled on Kazoo, a once popular submarine-shaped toy producing sounds of the "comb and paper" variety. (2) American infantry light rocket-firing tube used as an anti-tank weapon in World War II. It was then applied to the British P.I.A.T. (projectile, infantry anti-tank) and the German Panzerfaust.

To be bazookaed. To be in a tank struck by such a weapon and thus metaphorically to be "scuppered", put out of action, done for.

Beachcomber. One who subsists on what FLOTSAM AND JETSAM he can find on the seashore. The word originated in New Zealand, where it is found in print in 1844; an earlier form (1827) was beach ranger, analogous to BUSHRANGER.

Bead. From O.E. -bed (in gebed), a prayer. "Bead" thus originally meant "a prayer"; but as prayers were "told" (i.e. account was kept of them) on a PATERNOSTER, the word came to be transferred to the small globular object which, threaded on a string, made up the paternoster or ROSARY.

To count one's beads. To say one's prayers. See ROSARY.

To draw a bead on. See DRAW.

To pray without one's beads. To be out of one's reckoning.

Baily's beads. When the disc of the moon has (in an eclipse) reduced that of the sun to a thin crescent, the crescent assumes a resemblance to a string of beads. This phenomenon, caused by the sun shining through the depressions between the lunar mountains, was first accurately described by Francis Baily in 1836, hence the name.

St. Cuthbert's beads. See under CUTHBERT.

St. Martin's beads. See under MARTIN.

Bead-house. An almshouse for BEADSMEN.

Bead-roll. A list of persons to be prayed for; hence also any list.

Beadsman, or Bedesman. Properly, one who prays; hence an inmate of an ALMSHOUSE, since most of these charities, under the terms of their foundation, required the inmates to pray for the soul of the founder. See BEAD.

Beadle. One whose duty it is to bid or cite persons to appear in a court; also a church servant, whose duty it was to bid parishioners to attend the VESTRY and to execute its orders. The word is ultimately from the Old High Ger. Bitel, one who asks, but it came to us from the O.Fr. badel, a herald. See BEDEL.

Beak. Slang for a police magistrate, but formerly (16th and 17th cent.) for a constable. Of uncertain origin.

Beam. Thrown on my beam-ends. Driven to my last shift. An old phrase of the days of sail, as when a ship was laid completely on her side in a heavy gale, i.e. the part where her beams end. Beams are the transverse timbers stretching across a ship at right angles to the keel.

On the port beam. Away on the left-hand side of the ship, at right angles to the keel when facing forward.

On the starboard beam. Similarly on the right-hand side.

On the weather beam. The beam of the ship on which the wind is blowing.

To be on the beam is to be on the right course or track. A modern phrase coming from the directing of aircraft by means of a radio beam.

To kick the beam. See KICK.

Beam (of a stag). The main trunk of the horn, the part that bears the branches (O.E. béam, a tree).

Bean. Every bean has its black. Nemo sine vitis nascitur (everyone has his faults). The bean has a black eye (Ogni grano ha la sua semola).

He has found the bean in the cake. He has got a prize in the lottery, has come to some unexpected good fortune. The allusion is to the custom of hiding a bean in TWELFTH-NIGHT cakes. When the cake is cut up, he who gets the bean is BEAN-KING.

Jack and the bean-stalk. See JACK.

Old bean. A colloquial expression of good-natured familiarity (cp. Old boy, Old chap, Old man, etc.). Very common early in the 20th century.

Bean-feast. Much the same as WAYZ-GOOSE. Properly an annual dinner given by an employer to his employees, possibly because beans or a BEAN-GOOSE were prominent in the meal. Now applied to various annual outings and jollifications or beanos.

Bean-goose. A grey goose (A. fabalis) which arrives in England in the autumn; so named from a mark on its bill like a horse-bean. It is also reputed to be fond of newly sown beans.

Bean-king. Rey de Habas, the child appointed to play king on TWELFTH-NIGHT, the Bean-king's festival. The one who has found the bean in the Twelfth-night cake (see above).

Beans. Slang for property, money; also for a sovereign and a GUINEA, probably the O.Fr. cant, biens, meaning property. In such phrases as not worth a bean, the allusion is to the bean's small value. Similarly without a bean means penniless or "broke".

PYTHAGORAS forbade the use of beans to his disciples—not as a food, but the use of beans for political elections. Magistrates and other public officers were elected by beans cast by the voters into a helmet, and what Pythagoras advised was that his disciples should not interfere with politics or "love beans" (i.e. office). According to ARISTOTLE the word bean implied venery and that the prohibition "to abstain from beans" was equivalent to "keeping the body chaste".

Blue Beans. Lead shot. Cp. BLUEY.

Beans are in flower. A catch-phrase intended to account for a person's silliness. Our forefathers imagined that the perfume of bean flowers made people silly or light-headed.

He knows how many beans make five. He is no fool; he is "up to SNUFF"; he is not to be imposed upon. The reference is to an old catch. Everyone knows five beans make five, and on getting the correct answer the questioner says "But you don't know how many blue beans make five white ones." The correct answer to this is "Five—if peeled."

Full of beans. Said of a fresh and spirited horse; hence in good form; full of health and spirits.

I'll give him beans. I'll give him a thrashing. There is a similar French proverb, S'il me donne des pois, je lui donnerai des fèves (if he gives me peas I will give him beans), I will give him TIT FOR TAT, a ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

To spill the beans. To give away a secret, to let the cat out of the bag.

Bear. In Stock Exchange parlance, a speculator for a fall (cp. BULL). Thus to operate for a bear, or to bear the market, is to use every effort to depress prices so as to buy cheap and profit on the rise. Such a transaction is known as a Bear account. The term was current at least as early as the SOUTH SEA BUBBLE and probably derives from the proverb "Selling the SKIN before you have caught the bear". One who sold stocks in this way was formerly called a bearskin jobber. See BACKWARDATION.

The Bear. Albert, margrave of Brandenburg (c. 1100-1170).

The bloody bear, in Dryden's The Hind and the Panther (1687), means the INDEPENDENTS.

The Great Bear and Little Bear. These constellations were so named by the Greeks and their word, arktos, a bear, is still kept in the names Arcturus, the bear-ward or guard, and Arctic. See ARCTIC REGION, CHARLES'S WAIN, NORTHERN WAGONER.

The wind-shak'd surge, with high and monstrous mane,

Seems to cast water on the burning bear
And quench the guards of th'ever-fixed pole.

SHAKESPEARE: Othello, II, i.

The "guards" referred to in this quotation are β and γ of URSA MINOR. One classical fable is that the nymph CALISTO had a son by ZEUS called Arcas. She was changed into a bear by the angry HERA. Calisto and her son were then set in the sky as constellations by Zeus.

'Twas here we saw Calisto's star retire
Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno's ire.
CAMOËNS: Lusiad, Bk. V.

The Northern Bear. An old nickname for Russia. In political cartoons the U.S.S.R. is still usually depicted as a bear.

A bridled bear. A young nobleman under the control of a travelling tutor. See BEAR-LEADER.

The bear and ragged staff. Crest of the Nevilles and later, Earls of Warwick, attracting particular note through the activities of WARWICK THE KINGMAKER and used as a PUBLIC HOUSE SIGN.

Now by my father's badge, Old Nevil's crest,
The rampant bear chain'd to the ragged staff.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. II, V, i.

Legend has it that the first earl was Arthgal of the ROUND TABLE, whose cognizance was a bear through having strangled one. Morvid, the second earl, slew a giant with a club made of a young tree stripped of its branches. To commemorate this victory he added the "ragged staff".

The bear and the tea-kettle. Said of a person who injures himself by foolish rage. The story is that one day a bear entered a hut in Kamchatka, when a kettle was on the fire. Master Bruin smelt at it and burnt his nose; greatly irritated he seized it and squeezed it against his breast, scalding himself terribly. He growled in agony till some neighbours killed him with their guns.

A bear sucking his paws. It was once held that when a bear was deprived of food it sustained life by sucking its paws. The same was said of the badger. The phrase is applied to industrious idleness. As savage as a bear with a sore head. Unreasonably ill-tempered.

As a bear has no tail, for a lion he'll fail. The same as Ne sutor supra crepidam (let not the cobbler aspire above his last). Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, a descendant of the Warwick family, is said to have changed his own crest (a green lion with two tails) for the Warwick bear and ragged staff. Given command of the expedition to the Netherlands (1585), he was suspected of wider ambitions when the Netherlanders granted him "absolute authority" (1586). As the lion is monarch among beasts, some wit wrote under his crest set up in public, Ursa caret cauda non queat esse leo, i.e.:

Your bear for lion needs must fail,
Because your true bears have no tail.

To take the bear by the tooth. To "put your head into the LION's mouth"; needlessly to run into danger.

Bear garden, This place is a perfect. that is, full of confusion, noise, tumult and quarrels. In Tudor and Stuart times the gardens where bears were kept and baited for public amusement were notorious for noise and riotous disorder.

Bear-leader. In the 18th century denoted the tutor who conducted a young nobleman or youth of wealth and fashion on the GRAND TOUR. It is taken from the old custom of leading muzzled bears about the streets and making them show off to attract notice and money. (This practice was only made illegal in 1925).

Bear! (said Dr. Pangloss to his pupil). Under favour, young gentleman, I am the bear-leader, being appointed your tutor.

G. COLMAN: Heir-at-Law (1797).

Bear, To. Come, bear a hand! Come and render help. Lend a hand, or bring your hand to bear on the work going on.

To bear arms. To do military service; to be entitled to heraldic coat of arms and crest.

To bear away (nautical). To keep away from the wind.

To bear one company. To be one's companion.

His faithful dog shall bear him company.

POPE: Essay on Man, Epistle i, 112.

To bear down. To overpower.

To bear down upon (nautical). To approach from the weather side.

To bear in mind. Not to forget; to remember for consideration.

To bear out. To corroborate, to confirm.

To bear up. To support; to keep the spirits up. In nautical language, to keep further away from the wind.

To bear with. To show forbearance.

To bear the bell. See BELL.

Beard. Among the Jews, Turks, Persians and many other peoples the beard has long been a sign of manly dignity and to cut it off wilfully is a deadly insult. MOSLEMS swore by the beard of the Prophet and to swear by one's beard was an assurance of good faith. To pluck or touch a man's beard was an extreme affront, hence the phrase to beard one, to defy or insult or contradict flatly.

To beard the lion in his den. To defy personally or have it out FACE TO FACE.

Bearings

To make one's beard. To have one wholly at your mercy, as a barber when holding a man's beard to dress it, or shaving the chin of a customer. So, to be able to do what you like with one, to outwit or delude him.

Though they prey Argus, with his hundred yēn,
To be my warde-cors, as he can best,
In feith, he shal nat kepe me but me lest;
Yet coude I make his berd, so moot I thee.

CHAUCER: Wife of Bath's Prologue, 358.

I told him to his beard. I told him to his face, regardless of the consequences; openly and fearlessly.

Maugre his beard. In spite of him.

Old Man's Beard. Clematis vitalba, so called from its head of long-bearded fruits. Also known as Traveller's Joy.

"'Tis merry in hall when beards wag all"—i.e. when feasting goes on.

With pleasure too did wag the minstrel's beard,
For Plenty courted him to drink and bite.

PETER PINDAR: Elegy to Scotland.

To laugh at a man's beard. To attempt to make a fool of him—to deceive by ridiculous exaggeration.

"By the Prophet! but he laughs at our beards," exclaimed the Pacha angrily. "These are foolish lies."—MARRYAT: Pacha of many Tales.

To laugh in one's beard. To laugh up one's SLEEVE, that is, surreptitiously.

To lie in one's beard. To accuse someone of doing so is to stress the severity of the accusation.

To run in one's beard. To offer opposition to a person; to do something obnoxious to a person before his face.

With the beard on the shoulder (Sp.). In the attitude of listening to overhear something; with circumspection, looking in all directions for surprises and ambushes.

They rode, as the Spanish proverb expresses it "with the beard on the shoulder", looking around, that is, from time to time, and using every precaution to have the speediest knowledge of any pursuit

SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. vii.

Tax upon beards. Peter the Great (1672-1725) encouraged shaving in Russia by imposing a tax upon beards. Clerks were stationed at the gate of every town to collect the tax. He personally cut off the beards of his chief boyars.

Bearded Master. So Persius styled SOCRATES, under the notion that the beard is a symbol of wisdom.

The bearded. A surname (Pogonatus) given to Constantine IV, Byzantine Emperor (668-685); also to Baldwin IV, Count of Flanders (988-1036); and St. Paula. Fidel Castro is known as El Barbudo.

Bearings. I'll bring him to his bearings. I'll bring him to his senses, put him on the right track. In navigation bearings are taken of the direction in which an object is seen. Thus to keep to one's bearings is to keep on the right course, in the right direction.

To lose one's bearings. To be off course, to become lost, bewildered, to get perplexed.

To take the bearings. To ascertain the relative position of an object.

Béarnais, Le. Henry IV of France (1553-1610). So called from Le Béarn, his native province.

Beast. The number of the Beast. See NUMBER.

Beast of Belsen. In World War II the name given to Joseph Kramer, commandant of the infamous Belsen concentration camp.

Beasts of heraldry. In English HERALDRY all manner of creatures (many derived from BESTIARIES) have been borne as charges or as crests, the principal being the lion, bear, bull, boar, cat, swallow (called a martlet), pelican, unicorn, stag. The attitude or position of the animal is thus described: couchant, lying down with head erect; dormant, sleeping, with head lowered; passant, walking; passant gardant, walking but looking at the beholder; RAMPANT, on its hind legs; rampant combattant, two beasts rampant facing one another; rampant endorsed, two beasts rampant back to back. A beast can be proper, that is, emblazoned in its natural colour; naissant, emerging out of a fesse or ordinary; erased, a head or limb torn from the body; etc.

Beat (O.E. beatan). The first sense of the word was that of striking; that of overcoming or defeating was a natural extension. Also a track, range or walk, trodden or beaten by the feet, as a policeman's beat.

Beat group. A type of "pop music" group of the 1950s and 1960s, characterized by a marked emphasis on rhythm or beat.

Dead beat. So completely beaten or worsted as to have no strength left. Like a dead man with no fight left in him: quite tired out.

Dead beat escapement (of a watch). One in which there is no reverse motion of the escape-wheel.

Not in my beat. Not in my line; not in the range of my talents or inclination.

Off his beat. Not on duty; not in his appointed walk; not his speciality or line.

Off his own beat his opinions were of no value.
EMERSON: English Traits, ch. i.

On his beat. The reverse of the above.

Out of his beat. In his wrong walk; out of his proper sphere.

That beats Banagher. See BANAGHER; TERMAGANT.

To beat about. A nautical phrase meaning to tack against the wind.

To beat about the bush. To approach a matter cautiously in a roundabout way, to SHILLY-SHALLY; perhaps because one goes carefully when beating a bush to find if any game is lurking within.

To beat an alarm. To give notice of danger by beat of a drum. To beat to arms, to beat a charge, are likewise military orders by drum beat.

To beat a retreat is to withdraw from or abandon a position, undertaking, etc.

To beat retreat, in the military sense, was originally to summon men by drum beat to withdraw to camp or behind the lines when hostilities temporarily ceased at the approach of darkness; also to give warning to the guards to collect and be posted for the night.

The drums were later augmented by fifes and more recently, with the advent of military bands, beat retreat became an impressive ceremonial display.

To beat down. To make a seller abate his price.

To beat, or drum a thing into someone. To repeat as a drummer repeats his beats on the drum.

To beat hollow, or to a mummy, a frazzle, to ribbons, a jelly, etc. To beat wholly, utterly, completely.

To beat the air. To strike out at nothing as pugilists do before a fight; to toil without profit; to work to no purpose.

So fight I, not as one that beateth the air. I Cor. ix, 26.

To beat the booby. See BOOBY.

To beat the bounds. See BOUNDS.

To beat the bush. To allow another to profit by one's exertions; "one beat the bush and another caught the hare." The allusion is to beaters who start the game from the bushes for a shooting party.

To beat the devil's tattoo. See DEVIL.

To beat the Dutch. To "draw a very long BOW"; to say something very incredible.

To beat the band has a similar meaning.

To beat time. To indicate time in music by beating or moving the hands, feet or a baton.

To beat up someone. To make one the victim of vicious and brutal assault.

To beat up someone's quarters. To hunt out where he lives; to visit without ceremony. A military term signifying to make an unexpected attack on an enemy in camp.

To beat up the quarters of some of our less-known relations.—LAMB: Essays of Elia.

To beat up recruits, or supporters. To hunt them up or call them together, as soldiers are summoned by beat of drum.

To beat one with his own staff. To confute him with his own words. An argumentum ad hominem.

Can High Church bigotry go further than this? And how well have I since been beaten with mine own staff.—J. WESLEY (He refers to his excluding Bolzious from "the Lord's table", because he had not been canonically baptized.)

Beati Possidentes (bē a' tī pos i den' tēz). Blessed are those who have (for they shall receive). "Possession is nine points of the law." (See under NINE.)

Beatific Vision. The sight of God, or of the blessed in the realms of HEAVEN, especially that granted to the SOUL at the instant of death. See Is. vi, 1-3 and Acts vii, 55, 56.

Beatification (bē āt i fī kā' shùn). In the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH this is a solemn act by which a deceased person is formally declared by the POPE to be one of the blessed departed and therefore a proper subject for a MASS and OFFICE in his honour, generally with some local restriction. Beatification is usually, though not necessarily, a step to CANONIZATION.

Beatitude (bē āt' i tūd). Blessedness, perfect felicity.

The Beatitudes are the eight blessings pronounced by Our Lord at the opening of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v, 3-11).

Beatnik. A "beat" person, one who lives a beat life, akin to the American hipster. Socially, politically, intellectually and artistically the beatnik stands apart, and is an ANGRY YOUNG MAN or woman, ultra-BOHEMIAN, flouting all or most of the established conventions and values. The beatnik is distinguished by unconventional dress and slovenliness. The term may derive from the "beat generation" (meaning dissatisfied young people) and a Russian suffix (nik, as in SPUTNIK).

Beatrice. See DANTE.

Beau (bō). Fr. fine or beautiful. In England and America used for a lover or admirer;

Beauclerc

formerly prefixed to the name of a fop or man of fashion, such as the following:

Beau Brummel. George Bryan Brummel (1778-1840), an intimate of the Prince Regent.

Beau Didapper, in Fielding's Joseph Andrews, a young fop with a passion for Fanny.

Beau D'Orsay. Count D'Orsay (1801-1852), called by BYRON Jeune Cupidon.

Beau Feilding. Robert Feilding (d. 1712), called "Handsome Feilding" by Charles II. He died in Scotland Yard, London, after having been convicted of bigamously marrying the Duchess of Cleveland, a former mistress of Charles II. He figures as Orlando in Steele's Tatler (Nos. 50 and 51).

Beau Hewitt. The model for Sir Fopling Flutter, hero of Etherege's The Man of Mode (1676).

Beau Nash. Richard Nash (1674-1762). Born at Swansea and educated at Jesus College, Oxford. As a noted gambler, he nevertheless achieved distinction as Master of Ceremonies at Bath, which he made the leading English spa.

Beau of Leadenhall Street. See DIRTY DICK'S.

Beau Tibbs, in Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, noted for his finery, vanity and poverty.

Beau ideal. "The ideal Beautiful" is the proper meaning of the original French, but often used in English to mean the beautiful ideal.

Beau monde. The fashionable world; people who make up the coterie of fashion.

Beau trap. An old name for a loose paving-stone under which water lodged and which squirted up filth when trodden on, to the discomfort of the smartly dressed.

Beauclerc (bō' klērk) (good scholar). Applied to Henry I, King of England (1100-1135) for his scholarly accomplishments.

Beaumontague, Beaumontage, or Beaumontique. A filling compound used in joinery and metalwork said to be named after the French geologist Élie de Beaumont (1798-1874), who also gave his name to beaumontite, a silicate of copper. As it can be used for disguising bad workmanship, it has the added meanings of bad joinery, literary padding and bad work generally.

Beautiful Parricide. Beatrice Cenci, daughter of Francesco Cenci, a dissolute Roman nobleman. Because of her father's cruelties to the family, she and two of her brothers contrived his murder. She was beheaded in 1599. Their story has been a favourite theme in literature and art; Shelley's tragedy, The Cenci (1819), is particularly noteworthy.

Beauty. Beauty is but skin deep.

O formose puer, nimium ne crede colori.
VIRGIL: Bucolics, Eclogue ii.

(O my pretty boy, trust not too much to your pretty looks.)

Beauty and the Beast. A handsome woman with an uncouth or uncomely male companion.

The hero and heroine of the well-known fairy tale in which Beauty saved the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast; and the Beast, being disenchanted by Beauty's love, became a handsome prince, and married her. The story is found in Straparola's Piacevoli Notti (1550), and this is probably the source of Mme. le Prince de Beaumont's popular French version (1757). It is the basis of Grétry's opera Zémire et Azor (1771). The story is of great antiquity and takes various forms. Cp. LOATHLY LADY.

Beauty of Buttermere. Mary Robinson, married in 1802 to John Hatfield, a heartless impostor, and already a bigamist; who was executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803. She was the subject of many dramas and stories. Wordsworth told her story in The Prelude, vii, 231-58.

Beauty Sleep. Sleep taken before midnight. Those who habitually go to bed after midnight, especially during youth, are supposed to become pale and haggard.

Beaux Esprits (bō zā sprē) (Fr.). Men of wit or genius (singular, Un bel esprit, a wit, a genius).

Beaux yeux (bō zyēr) (Fr.). Beautiful eyes or attractive looks. "I will do it for your beaux yeux" (because you are so pretty, or because your eyes are so attractive).

Beaver. The lower and movable part of a helmet; so called from Fr. bavière, which meant a child's bib, to which it had some resemblance.

Hamlet: Then you saw not his face?
Horatio: O yes, my lord; he wore his beaver up.
SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, I, ii.

Beaver is also an old name for a man's hat because some hats used to be made of beaver fur. In the 1920s the word was popularly applied to anyone wearing a beard.

Beavers, or Bevers. Refreshments of bread and beer served in the afternoon, answering to the modern 5 o'clock tea. It is still a rural term for afternoon "ELEVENSENS". See BEVER.

The Beaver. Name given in journalistic circles to Lord Beaverbrook (William Maxwell Aitken, 1879-1964), Canadian-born politician and newspaper magnate. He served in a number of capacities in World War I and as Minister of Aircraft Production in World War II, being responsible for stepping up the output of the Spitfire fighter and Whitley bomber. He became Minister of Supply in 1941.

Bed. The great bed of Ware. A four-poster bed eleven feet square and capable of holding twelve people. It dates from the late 16th century and was formerly at Rye House, Hertfordshire, but in 1931 it came into the possession of the Victoria and Albert Museum.

Although the sheet were big enough for the bed of Ware in England.

SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, III, ii.

As you make your bed, so you must lie on it. Everyone must bear the consequences of his own acts.

To bed out. To transfer plants raised in pots or a greenhouse out into the open ground.

To make the bed. To arrange the bedding ready for use. In America, a room put ready is said to be made.

You got out of bed the wrong way, on the wrong side, or with the left leg foremost. Said of a person who is moody or grumpy. It was held to be unlucky to set the left foot on the ground first when getting out of bed. The same superstition applies to putting on the left shoe first. AUGUSTUS Caesar was very superstitious in this respect.

Bed of Justice. See LIT.

A bed of roses. A situation of ease and pleasure.

A bed of thorns. A situation of great anxiety and apprehension.

In the twinkling of a bed-post, or bed-staff. As quickly as possible. A bed-staff was the loose slat across the bed-frame, also the staff, sometimes used to beat the bed and clean it. Staves were also placed at the two sides of the bed to prevent the bedding slipping off. In the reign of Edward I, Sir John Chichester had a mock skirmish in which his servant was accidentally killed, Sir John wielding his rapier and the servant the bed-staff. Wright, in his Domestic Manners, shows us a chambermaid of the 17th century, using a bed-staff to beat up the bedding.

"Twinkling" is from the O.E. twinclian, a twitch or flicker, an instant.

I'll do it instantly, in the twinkling of a bed-staff.
SHADWELL: Virtuoso I, i (1676).

Cp. In the twinkling of an eye which has a similar and more self-evident meaning.

"In the twinkling of a bed-post", became the usual phrase when the bed-staff became obsolete.

Bedchamber Crisis, or Question. In May 1839, Lord Melbourne's insecure WHIG ministry resigned and when Sir Robert Peel accepted office he requested that some of the Whig ladies of the bed-chamber be replaced by TORIES. Queen Victoria refused and Peel resigned, whereupon Melbourne was recalled to office. The question was resolved, with the intervention of the Prince Consort, before Melbourne's resignation in 1841.

Beddgelert (Bêth gël'ert). The name of a village in Caernarvonshire (the grave of Gelert). According to Welsh folklore, Prince Llewelyn returned to his castle to find his dog Gelert's jaws dripping with blood. His son had been left in Gelert's care but the baby was not to be found. In his distress, Llewelyn slew the faithful hound and then found his son, close to the body of a wolf, which the hound had killed. This story has many variants in other ancient literatures.

Bede, The Venerable (c. 673-735). Also called the English Doctor. This most renowned of early English scholars became a monk at Jarrow and devoted his life to religion and learning. His industry, output and range were remarkable, but he is probably best known for his Ecclesiastical History of the English People, a work of unusual merit and value, which has led him to be called the Father of English History. His book is a major source of information to the year 731. The title "venerable" is by one tradition assigned to an angelic hand; it is certainly not due to great age as is often thought.

Bedel, or Bedell (bê' dèl). Old forms of the word BEADLE, still used at Oxford and Cambridge universities for the officer who carries the mace before the Vice-Chancellor and performs certain other duties. At Oxford there are four bedels; at Cambridge two bedells, or esquire-bedells. London also has an esquire-bedell and a Court bedell.

Bedivere, or Bedver. In the ARTHURIAN ROMANCES, a knight of the ROUND TABLE, butler and staunch adherent of King ARTHUR. It was he who, at the request of the dying king, threw EXCALIBUR into the lake, and afterwards bore his body to the ladies in the barge which was to take him to AVALON.

Bedlam. A lunatic asylum, a madhouse; a contraction of Bethlehem. The priory of St. Mary of Bethlehem outside Bishopsgate was founded in 1247 and began to receive lunatics in 1377. It was given to the City of London as a hospital for lunatics by Henry VIII in 1547. In 1676 it was transferred to Moorfields and became one of the sights of London, where for twopence, anyone might gaze at the poor wretches and bait them. It was a place for assignations and one of the disgraces of 17th-century London.

All that I can say of Bedlam is this; 'tis an almshouse for madmen, a showing room for harlots, a sure market for lechers, a dry walk for loiterers.

NED WARD: The London Spy (1698).

In 1815 Bedlam was moved to St. George's Fields, Lambeth, the present site of the Imperial War Museum, when in 1931 the occupants were moved to West Wickham. Hannah SNELL died in Bedlam in 1792.

Bedlamite. A madman, a fool, an inmate of Bedlam. See ABRAM-MAN.

Bedlam, Tom o'. See TOM.

Bednall Green. See BEGGAR'S DAUGHTER.

Bedouins (bed' ou inz). French (and thence English) form of an Arabic word meaning "a dweller in the desert", applied to the nomadic tribes of Arabia and Syria. Formerly also the homeless street poor. Cp. STREET ARABS.

Bed-rock. American slang for one's last dollar. "I'm come down to bedrock", the end of one's resources. Bedrock is the miner's term for the hard basis rock which is reached when the mine is exhausted.

Bedroll (Western U.S.A.). A tarpaulin in which a COWBOY keeps his blanket and possessions. Once he has thrown it on the cook's chuck-wagon, he owes complete allegiance to the outfit.

Bee. Legend has it that JUPITER was nourished by bees, similarly PINDAR was nourished by bees with honey (instead of milk). The Greeks consecrated bees to the MOON. With the Romans a flight of bees was considered a bad OMEN. Appain (Civil War, Bk. II) says a swarm of bees lighted on the altar and prognosticated the fatal issue of the battle of Pharsalia. See AMBROSE; ATHENIAN BEE; ATTIC BEE.

The name bee is given, particularly in America, to a social gathering for some useful work (See ANIMALS IN SYMBOLISM), e.g. a sewing bee. A spelling-bee is a competition or gathering to compete in spelling.

Bee-line. The shortest distance between two given points such as a bee is supposed to take in making for its hive. See AIR-LINE.

To have your head full of bees, or to have a bee in your bonnet. To be cranky; to have an idiosyncrasy; to be full of devices, crotchets, fancies, inventions and dreamy theories. The connexion between bees and the soul was once generally maintained: hence MOHAMMED admits bees to PARADISE. Porphyry says of fountains, "they are adapted to the NYMPHS or those souls which the ancients called bees." Cp. MAGGOT.

Beef. From the O.Fr. boef, an ox. Like mutton (O.Fr. moton) it is a reminder of the period after the Norman Conquest when the Saxon was the servant of the conquerors. The Saxon was the herdsman and used the word for the beast under his charge, the Normans had the cooked meat and used the appropriate French name for it.

Beefeaters. The popular name of the Yeomen of the Guard, first formed as a royal bodyguard at Henry VII's coronation in 1485; also of the Yeomen Extraordinary of the Guard, who were appointed as Warders of the TOWER of London by Edward VI, and wear the same Tudor-period costume. The name was probably first specifically applied to the Yeomen of the Guard about the middle of the 17th century.

That "eater" was formerly a synonym for "servant" is shown by the O.E. word hlaf-oeta (loaf-eater), which meant "a menial servant" and by the passage in Ben Jonson's Silent Woman III, ii (1609), where Morose, calling for his servants, shouts:

Bar my doors! bar my doors! Where are all my eaters? My mouths, now? Bar up my doors you varlets!

The literal meaning "eaters of beef" is the probable origin of the word, rather than the Fr. word buffetier. It is found in a letter of Prince Rupert's (1645), quoted in Sir S. D. Scott's The British Army (I, 513). Also we have:

Those goodly Juments of the guard would fight

WM. CARTWRIGHT: The Ordinary, II, (c. 1635).

Beefsteak Club. The original club, frequented by the wits, where refreshment was limited to steaks and beer or wine, was established in LONDON in 1709, with a gridiron as its badge. In 1735 the Sublime Society of Steaks was inaugurated when Lord Peterborough supped with John Rich, manager of the COVENT GARDEN Theatre. His lordship was so delighted with the steak provided that he proposed to repeat the entertainment every Saturday. The Sublime Society continued to meet there until the fire of 1808, when it moved to other premises. The "Steaks" included many famous actors until its cessation in 1867. The modern Beefsteak Club was founded in 1876.

Beelzebub. Other forms are Beelzebul, Baalzebub. Baalzebub was the god of Ekron (II Kings i, 3), and the meaning is obscure although it has been popularly held to mean "lord of FLIES". In any event it was probably a derisory title. The most likely explanation so far is that Baalzebub means "lord of the lofty dwelling" and refers to the Syrian BAAL. This was altered to Baalzebub by the Jews, as the former title seemed only proper to JAHWEH. To the Jews he came to be the chief representative of the false gods. In Matt. xii, 24, he is referred to as "the prince of the devils" and similarly in Mark iii, 22, and Luke xi, 15. Hence Milton places him next in rank to SATAN.

One next himself in power, and next in crime,
Long after known in Palestine, and named Beelzebub.

Paradise Lost, I, 79.

Beer. See ALE.

Beer-money. An allowance of one penny per day paid to British soldiers and N.C.O.s between 1800 and 1823 instead of an issue of beer. Now sometimes used to denote "spending money" for refreshment or pleasure.

Life is not all beer and skittles, i.e. not all eating, drinking, and play; not all pleasure.

Small beer. See SMALL.

Beeswing. Thus named from its appearance. A crust or film of tartar which forms in port and other wines after long keeping. It is not detrimental if it passes into the decanter.

Beetle, To. To overhang, to threaten, to jut over. The word seems to have been first used by SHAKESPEARE:

Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff
That beetles o'er his base into the sea.
Hamlet, I, iv.

It is formed from the adjective beetle-browed, having prominent or shaggy eyebrows. The derivation of beetle in this use is uncertain, but it probably refers to the tufted antennæ which, in some beetles, stand straight out from the head.

Beeton, Mrs. The Book of Household Management, a classic mid-Victorian work on "domestic economy", was written by Mrs. Isabella Beeton (1836-1865) and first published in 1861. The bulk of its contents consisted of some 4,000 recipes and it readily established itself as the most famous of all English cookery books. The name of Mrs. Beeton became synonymous with this book, although she compiled other lesser ones during her short life. In its revised editions it is still widely used.

Befana (be fá na). The good fairy of Italian children, who is supposed to fill their stockings with toys when they go to bed on TWELFTH NIGHT. Someone enters the children's bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, "Ecco la Befana." According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to look after the MAGI when they went out to offer their gifts, and said she would wait to see them on their return; but they went another way, and Befana, every Twelfth Night, watches for them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Before the Lights. See LIGHTS.

Before the Mast. See MAST.

Beg the Question, To. To assume a proposition which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing you profess to prove. The phrase is the common English equivalent of the Latin term, PETITIO PRINCIPII.

Beggar. A beggar may sing before a pickpocket. Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator (Juvenal, x, 22) A beggar may sing in the presence of thieves because he has nothing in his pocket to lose.

Beggar's daughter of Bednall Green, Bessee the. An old ballad given in PERCY'S RELIQUES; the subject of a play by Chettle and Day (1600) and also one by Sheridan Knowles (1834). The beautiful Bessee had four suitors—a knight, a gentleman of fortune, a London merchant, and the son of the innkeeper at Romford. She told them that they must obtain the consent of her father, the poor blind beggar of Bethnal Green, whereupon they all slunk off except the knight, who went to ask the beggar's leave to wed the "pretty Bessee". The beggar gave her £3,000 for her dower, and £100 to buy her wedding gown. At the wedding feast he explained to the guests that he was Henry, son of Sir Simon de Montfort.

Beggars cannot be choosers. Beggars must take what is given to them and be thankful. They are not in a position to pick and choose or dictate terms to the giver.

Beggars' barm. The yeast-like scum which collects on the surface of ponds, brooks, etc. where the current is arrested. Unfit for use, it is only beggarly barm (froth) at best.

Beggars' bullets. Stones.

Beggars of the Sea. See GUEUX.

Beggar's Opera, The. Produced in 1728, its enormous success gave a new impetus to English comic opera. The hero is a highwayman, MacHeath, and it centres around NEWGATE. This topical satire by John Gay was produced by Rich (see BEEFSTEAK CLUB). It is said to have made Gay rich and Rich gay. The music was made up of traditional ballads and popular tunes of the day arranged by Pepusch.

Begging Friars. See MENDICANT ORDERS.

King of the Beggars. Bampfylde Moore Carew (1693-1770), a famous English vagrant who became King of the Gipsies. Transported to Maryland, he escaped and is said to have joined the Young PRETENDER and followed him to Derby.

Set a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to the de'il. There is no one so proud and arrogant as a beggar who has suddenly grown rich.

Such is the sad effect of wealth—rank pride—
Mount but a beggar, how the rogue will ride!
PETER PINDAR: Epistle to Lord Lonsdale.

To go by beggar's bush, or go home by beggar's bush—i.e. to go to ruin. Beggar's bush is the name of a tree which once stood on the left hand of the London road from Huntingdon to Caxton; so called because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars.

Beghards (be gardz), Monastic fraternities which first arose in the Low Countries in the late 12th century, named after Lambert le Bègue, a priest of Liège, who also founded the BÈGUINES. They took no vows and were free to leave the society at will. In the 17th century, those who survived Papal persecution joined the TERTIARIES of the FRANCISCANS. The word beggar possibly derives from beghards. Le Bègue means "the stammerer". Cp. LOLLARDS.

Beglerbeg. See BASHAW.

Beguine (bè gën'). A popular Martinique and South American dance, or music for this dance in bolero rhythm. It inspired Cole Porter's success of the 1930s, Begin the Beguine.

Béguines (bā gën'). A sisterhood founded in the late 12th century by Lambert le Bègue (see BEGHARDS). They were free to quit the cloister and to marry, and formerly flourished in the Low Countries, Germany, France, Switzerland and Italy. There are still communities in Belgium. The cap called a béguin: was named from this sisterhood.

Behemoth (be hē' moth). The animal described under this name in Job xl, 15-24, is probably the hippopotamus. The poet James Thomson apparently took it to be a rhinoceros;

Behold! in plaited mail,
Behemoth rears his head.
The Seasons: Summer, 709, 710.

The word is more often pronounced Be' hemoth; but Milton, like Thomson, places the accent on the second syllable.

Scarce from his mould
Behemoth, biggest born of earth, upheaved
His vastness.

Paradise Lost, VII, 471.

Behistun, Rock of. A cliff-like mountain face in western Persia, east of Kirmansha, bearing CUNEIFORM inscriptions in Persian, Elamitic or Susian, and Babylonian, recounting the achievements of Darius I. By 1846 Henry Rawlinson had succeeded in translating the ancient Persian, thus providing the key for the subsequent translation of the Susian and Babylonian, and laying the foundations of scientific Assyriology. Cp. ROSETTA STONE.

Behmenists (bā' men ists). A sect of theosophical mystics, called after their founder Jacob Behman or Boehme (1575-1624). Jane Leade founded a Behmenist sect in England in 1697 called the Philadelphists.

Behram (bā' rām). The most holy kind of fire according to the PARSEES. See also GUEBRES.

Bejan (bē' ján). A freshman or greenhorn in the Scottish universities of St. Andrews and Aberdeen. A woman student is called a bajanella or bejanella. The word is a corruption of the Fr. bec jaune, yellow beak, with allusion to a nestling or unfledged bird, and was used in the University of Paris and elsewhere. In France béjaune is still the name for the repast that a freshman is supposed to provide for his new companions. The word also means an "ignorant young man".

Bel. The name of the Assyrio-Babylonian gods EN-LIL and MARDUK. It has the same meaning as BAAL. The story of Bel and the Dragon, in which we are told how Daniel convinced the King that Bel was not an actual living deity but only an image, was formerly part of the book of Daniel, but is now relegated to the APOCRYPHA.

Bel Esprit (bel es pré') (Fr.). Literally, fine mind; thus a vivacious wit, one of quick and lively parts, ready at repartee (pl. beaux esprits).

Belch, Sir Toby. A reckless, roistering jolly fellow; from the knight of that name in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Belcher. A pocket-handkerchief—properly, one with white spots on a blue ground; so called from Jim Belcher (1781-1811), the pugilist, who adopted it. The Belcher ring was a massive GOLD affair, sometimes set with a precious stone.

Belfast Regiment, The. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Bel-fires. See BELTANE.

Belfry. Originally a movable tower used in sieges from which the attackers threw missiles. (O.Fr. berfrei. Mid. High Ger. Berçfrit, a place of safety. Thence a watch-tower, beacon or alarm bell-tower.) Thus a church bell tower is not called a belfry because bells are hung in it.

Belial (bē' li āl) (Heb.). In Old Testament usage it has the meaning of worthlessness, wickedness, but later it is used as a proper noun in the sense of the wicked one.

What concord hath Christ with Belial?
II Cor. vi, 15.

Milton thus uses it as a proper name:

Belial came last—than whom a spirit more lewd
Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself.

Paradise Lost, I, 490.

Sons of Belial. Lawless, worthless, rebellious people.

Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial; they knew not the Lord.—I Sam. ii, 12.

Belisarius (bel i sār' i us). Belisarius begging for an obolus. Belisarius (d. 565), the greatest of Justinian's generals, was accused of conspiring against the emperor and imprisoned in 562, but restored to favour six months later. The later story that his eyes were put out and that he was reduced to asking passers-by to "Give an obolus to Belisarius" is without foundation.

Belisha Beacon. An amber-coloured globe mounted on a black and white banded pole, the sign of a pedestrian crossing. Named after Leslie Hore-Belisha, Minister of Transport (1934-1937), who introduced them.

Bell, Acton, Currer, and Ellis. These were the names under which Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë wrote their novels.

Bell. As the bell clinks, so the fool thinks, or As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks. The tale says when Dick WHITTINGTON ran away from his master, and had got as far as Highgate Hill, he was hungry, tired, and wished to return. BOW BELLS began to ring, and Whittington fancied they said, "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London." The bells clinked in response to the boy's thoughts.

At three bells, at five bells, etc. At sea a bell is rung at half-hourly intervals to mark the passing of time in the WATCH. Five of the seven watches last four hours. Thus "three bells" (three strokes on the bell) denotes the third half-hour of the watch, "five bells" the fifth, etc. "Eight bells" marks the ending of a watch. The two Dog watches are each of two hours duration (4 p.m. to 6 p.m. and 6 p.m. to 8 p.m.). The passing of the 1st DOG WATCH is marked by four bells and the 2nd or Last Dog by eight.

Bell, book, and candle. The popular phrase for ceremonial EXCOMMUNICATION in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. After pronouncing sentence the officiating cleric closes his book, quenches the candle by throwing it to the ground and tolls the bell as for one who has died. The book symbolizes the book of life, the candle that the soul is removed from the sight of God as the candle from the sight of man.

Hence, in spite of bell, book and candle signifies in spite of all opposition the Christian hierarchy can offer.

Give her the bells and let her fly. Don't throw good money after bad; make the best of the matter but don't try to bolster it up. In falconry, when a HAWK was worthless it was allowed to escape, even at the expense of bells attached to it. I'll not hang all my bells on one horse. I'll not leave all my property to one son. The allusion is manifest.

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh (Hamlet, III, i). A metaphor for a deranged mind.

One bell in the Last Dog Watch. It is a common story in the Royal Navy that one bell has been struck at 6.30 p.m. instead of five since the mutinies of 1797, because in one port five bells in the dog watches was to be the signal for mutiny. This was prevented by the foreknowledge of officers, who caused one bell to be struck instead.

Passing bell. The hallowed bell which used to be rung when persons were in extremis, to scare away evil spirits which might be lurking ready to snatch the SOUL while passing from the body. A secondary object was to announce to the neighbourhood that all good Christians might pray for the safe passage of the soul into PARADISE. The bell rung at a funeral is sometimes improperly called the "passing bell".

Athenians used to beat on brazen kettles at the moment of decease to scare away the FURIES.

Ring the bell backwards is ringing a muffled peal. Backwards is often used to denote "in a reverse manner", as, "I hear you are grown rich"—"Yes, backwards", meaning "quite the reverse". A muffled peal is one of sorrow, not of joy, and was formerly sometimes employed as a tocsin or notice of danger.

Ring the hallowed bell. Consecrated bells were believed to be able to disperse storms and pestilence, drive away devils (See PASSING BELL) and extinguish fire. It is said that as late as 1852 the Bishop of Malta ordered the church bells to be rung for an hour to "lay a gale of wind".

Sound as a bell. Quite sound. A cracked bell is useless.

That rings a bell, that strikes a chord, that sounds familiar, that reminds me of something.

To bear, or carry away the bell. To be first fiddle; to carry off the palm; to be the best. The BELLWETHER bore the bell, hence the phrase; but it has been confused with an old custom of presenting to winners of horse-races, etc., a little GOLD or SILVER bell as a prize.

Tolling the bell for church. The "church-going bell" as Cowper called it (Verses by Alexander Selkirk) was in pre-Reformation days rung as an Ave Bell to invite worshippers to a preparatory prayer to the Virgin.

Warming the bell. A nautical phrase, doing something before the proper time, e.g. preparing to leave early, etc. Possibly from the idea that a bell, like a clock, if warmed moves faster.

Warwick shakes his bells. Beware of danger, for Warwick is in the field. "Trojans beware, ACHILLES has donned his armour." A METAPHOR from falconry, the bells being those of a HAWK.

Neither the king, nor he that loves him best
The proudest he that holds up Lancaster,
Dares stir a wing, if Warwick shakes the bells.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. III, I, i.

Who is to bell the cat? Who will risk his own life to save his neighbour's? Anyone who encounters great personal hazard for the sake of others undertakes to "bell the cat". The allusion is to the fable of the cunning old mouse (given in Piers Plouman and elsewhere), who suggested that they should hang a bell on the cat's neck to give notice to all mice of her approach. "Excellent", said a wise young mouse, "but who is to undertake the job?"

Bell-the-Cat. Archibald Douglas, fifth Earl of Angus (d. 1514), was so called. James III made favourites of architects and masons, Cochrane, a mason, being created Earl of Mar. The Scottish nobles held a council in the church of Lauder for the purpose of putting down these upstarts, when Lord Gray asked "Who will bell the cat?" "That will I," said Douglas, and he fearlessly put to death, in the king's presence, the obnoxious minions.

Bell-man. See TOWN CRIER.

Bell-rope. A humorous name for a curl worn by a man—a "rope" for the "belles" to play with. Cp. BOW-CATCHER.

Bell Savage. See LA BELLE SAUVAGE.

Bell-wavering. Vacillating, swaying from side to side like a bell. A man whose mind jangles out of tune from delirium, drunkenness or temporary insanity, is said to have his wits gone bell-wavering.

I doubt he his wits have gone a bell-wavering by the road.

SIR W. SCOTT: The Monastery, ch. vii.

Bellwether of the flock. A jocular and rather deprecatory term applied to the leader of a party. The allusion is to the wether, or sheep, which leads the flock with a bell fastened to its neck.

Belladonna. The Deadly Nightshade. The name is Italian and means "beautiful lady". Its power of enlarging the pupils was put to use by would-be glamorous females. This is the usual explanation of the name but another is that it was used by an Italian poisoner named Leucota to poison beautiful women.

Bellarmino (bel' ar min). A large Flemish GOTCH, or stone beer-jug, originally made in Flanders in ridicule of CARDINAL Bellarmine (1542-1621), a great defender of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. It carried a rude likeness of the Cardinal. Cp. DEMIJOHN; GREYBEARD.

Belle (bel) (Fr.). A beauty. The Belle of the ball. The most beautiful woman in the room.

Belles-lettres (bel letr). Polite literature; poetry and standard literary works; the study or pursuit of such.

Bellerophon (be ler' ō fon). The JOSEPH of Greek mythology; Antæa, spouse of Prætus being the "POTIPHAR'S WIFE" who tempted him and afterwards falsely accused him. Prætus sent Bellerophon with a letter to Iobates, King of Lycia, his wife's father, narrating the charge, and praying that the bearer might be put to death. Iobates, reluctant to slay Bellerophon himself, gave him many hazardous tasks, including the killing of the CHIMERA, but as he succeeded in all of them Iobates made him his heir. Later Bellerophon attempted to fly to heaven on PEGASUS, but ZEUS sent a gadfly to sting the horse, and the rider was thrown.

Bellerophon. The name of the former seventy-four-gun ship of the Royal Navy which took part in the Battle of the Nile and Trafalgar and to whose captain NAPOLEON finally surrendered himself after Waterloo. The name was corrupted by sailors to "Billy Ruffian", "Bully-ruffran", "Belly-ruffron", etc.

Letters of Bellerophon. Letters or documents either dangerous or prejudicial to the bearer. See BELLEROPHON.

Bellerus (bè lē' rūs). A Cornish giant invented by Milton to account for "Bellerium", the Roman name for the Land's End area.

Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old.
Lycidas, 160.

Bellona. The Roman goddess of war, wife (or sometimes sister) of MARS.

Belly. The belly and its members. The fable of Menenius Agrippa to the Roman people when they seceded to the Sacred Mount. "Once upon a time the members refused to work for the lazy belly; but, as the supply of food was thus stopped, they found there was a necessary and mutual dependence between them". The fable is given by ÆSOP and by Plutarch, whence Shakespeare introduced it in his Coriolanus, I, i.

The belly has no ears. A hungry man will not listen to advice or arguments. The Romans had the same proverb, Venter non habet aures; and in French, Ventre affamé n'a point d'oreilles.

Belly-timber. Food. An old expression used by the Elizabethans and given by Cotgrave (1611) as a translation of the French Carrelure de ventre (a resoling, or refurnishing of the stomach).

... through deserts vast
And regions desolate they pass'd
Where belly-timber above ground
Or under, was not to be found.

BUTLER: Hudibras.

Scott also uses it in Pevevil of the Peak, ch. 48.

And now, Dame Pevevil, to dinner, to dinner!—
the old fox must have his belly-timber, though the hounds have been after him the whole day.

Belomancy (bel' ò mán si) (Gr.). DIVINATION by arrows. Labels being attached to a given number of arrows, the archers let them fly, and the advice on the label of the arrow which flies farthest is accepted. It was used by the Babylonians, Scythians, etc. Sir Thomas Browne describes it in Pseudodoxia Epidemica, v, 23, and it is also mentioned in Ezekiel xxi, 21.

Beloved Disciple. St. JOHN, (John xiii, 23).

Beloved Physician. St. LUKE (Col. iv, 14).

Belphegor (bel' fe gôr). The Assyrian form of Baal-Peor (see BAAL), the Moabitish god to whom the Israelites became attached in Shittim (Numb. xxv, 3), which was associated with licentious orgies (Hos. ix, 10).

The name was given in mediæval Latin legend to a demon sent into the world by his fellows to test rumours concerning the happiness of married life on earth. After a thorough trial, he fled to the happy regions where female companionship was non-existent. Hence the name is applied to a misanthrope and to a nasty, obscene, licentious fellow. The story is found in MACHIAVELLI, and occurs in English in Barnabe Rich's Farewell to the Militarie Profession (1581) and is used in Grim, The Collier of Croyden (1600), Jonson's The Divell is an Asse (1616), and John Wilson's Belphegor, or the Marriage of the Devil (1691).

Belpheobe (bel fè' bi). The Huntress-goddess in Spenser's Faerie Queene, daughter of Chryso gone and sister of AMORET, typifies Queen Elizabeth I as a model of chastity. She was of the DIANA and MINERVA type; cold as an icicle, passionless, immovable and, like a moon-beam, light without warmth.

Belt. To hit below the belt. To strike unfairly. It is prohibited in the QUEENSBERRY RULES of prize-fighting to hit below the waist-belt.

To hold the belt. To be the champion. In pugilism, a belt usually forms part of the prize in big fights.

To belt the grape. American slang meaning to drink heavily.

Belted earl, or knight. This refers to the belt and spurs with which KNIGHTS, etc., were invested when raised to the dignity. In American usage, belted earl is a person who claims noble birth.

Belted Will. Lord William Howard (1563-1640), third son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk. Scott gives him this name in The Lay of the Last Minstrel (IV, vi), and also makes him warden of the western marches, but he was known to contemporaries as Bauld (bold) Willie. He carried out an enlightened policy in restoring order and civilization to the border districts. His wife was called "Bessie with the braid (broad) apron" from her ample dowry.

Beltane (bel' tăn) (Gaelic, bealtainn). The derivation is uncertain but it is not connected with baal. In Scotland, May Day (O.S.); also an ancient Celtic festival when bel-fires were kindled on the hill-tops and cattle were driven between the flames, either to protect them from disease, or as a preparatory to sacrifice.

Benares (ben ār' ēz). The holy city of the Hindus, being to them what MECCA is to the MOSLEMS. It contains many temples including the Golden Temple of SIVA and is much frequented by pilgrims. It is of great antiquity and was for centuries a Buddhist centre.

Bench. Originally the same word as BANK; properly, a long wooden seat, hence the official seat of judges or magistrates in court, BISHOPS in the HOUSE OF LORDS, aldermen in the council chamber, etc.; hence by extension judges, bishops, etc., or the dignity of holding such official status.

The front bench. In the HOUSE OF COMMONS the leading members of the government occupy the front bench to the right of the SPEAKER. This is called the Treasury Bench. The OPPOSITION leaders occupy the opposite front bench; hence, by extension, the leaders of the government, or of the opposition.

To be raised to the bench. To be made a judge.

To be raised to the Episcopal bench. To be made a BISHOP.

Bench and Bar. Judges and barristers. See BAR; BARRISTER.

Benchers. Senior members who administer the INNS OF COURT and call students to the BAR. They also exercise powers of expulsion.

Back-benchers. Ordinary members of the House of Commons who do not hold office and occupy the back benches. The front benches are reserved for ministers and their parliamentary secretaries on the one side, and for leaders of the opposition on the other.

Bend. In HERALDRY, an ORDINARY formed between the two parallel lines drawn across the shield from the DEXTER chief (i.e. the top left-hand corner when looking at the shield) to the SINISTER base (the opposite corner). It is said to represent the sword-belt.

Bend sinister. A bend running across the shield from the SINISTER chief i.e. from right to left. It is occasionally an indication of bastardy (cp. BAR SINISTER) though more often a baton sinister is used. He has a bend sinister means he was not born in lawful wedlock.

Beyond my bend, i.e. beyond my means or power. It is probably a corruption of beyond my bent, but it may be in allusion to a bow or spring, which breaks if strained beyond its bending power.

To bend over backwards. To make exceptional or unnecessary efforts to please or appease.

To go round the bend, or to be driven round the bend. To go mad or to be driven crazy. Here bend is used in the sense of "taking a turn".

Bender. A sixpenny piece; perhaps because it could be bent fairly easily. In schoolboy slang a caning which was taken in a bent position. In Scotland it is an old term for a hard drinker and in the U.S.A. it means a drinking bout.

Bendy, Old. The DEVIL; who is willing to bend to anyone's inclination.

Benedicite (ben e dis' i ti) (Lat.). "Bless you", or "may you be blessed". In the first sense it is the opening word of many old graces; hence a grace or a blessing. The second sense accounts for its use as an expression of astonishment.

The god of love, A benedicite,
How myghty and how great a lord is he!
CHAUCER: Knigh't's Tale, 927.

Benedick, or Benedict. A sworn bachelor caught in the snares of matrimony: from Benedick in SHAKESPEARE'S Much Ado about Nothing.

Benedictines. Monks who follow the rule of St. Benedict of Nursia (c. 480-c. 553), also known as the "Black Monks". Monte Cassino became their chief centre and they were renowned for their learning. Apart from their religious exercises, the monks were to be employed in study, teaching and manual labour. The Benedictines were a great civilizing influence in western Europe. St. Benedict's sister Scholastica is regarded as the founder of the Benedictine nuns.

Benedictine. A liqueur still made on the site of the Benedictine abbey at Fécamp.

Benefice. Under the Romans certain grants of land made to veteran soldiers were called beneficia, and in early feudal times, an estate held for life, in return for military service, was called a benefice. The term came to be applied to the possessions of the Church held by individuals as a recompense for their services. Hence a church "living".

Benefit of Clergy. Formerly, the privilege enjoyed by the English clergy of exemption from trial by a secular court. Eventually it was extended to all who could read, and were therefore capable of entering into holy orders. By the end of the 17th century, most of the serious crimes were excluded, but it was not totally abolished until 1827. See NECK-VERSE.

Benevolence. A royal expedient for raising money without consent of PARLIAMENT. First so called in 1473, when Edward IV raised such a forced loan as a mark of goodwill towards his reign. Last levied by James I in 1614, it was declared illegal by the BILL OF RIGHTS, 1689.

Bengal Tigers. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Benghazi Cooker. An Australian name in World War II for a contrivance for heating water, made from a can containing petrol-soaked sand.

Bengodi (ben gō' di). A "land of COCK-AIGNE" mentioned in Boccaccio's Decameron (viii, 3), where "they tie the vines with sausages, where you may buy a fat goose for a penny and have a gosling into the bargain; where there is also a mountain of grated Parmesan cheese, and people do nothing but make cheesecakes and macaroons. There is also a river which runs MALMSEY wine of the very best quality," etc., etc.

Benjamin. The pet, the youngest; in allusion to Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv, 18). Also (in early and mid-19th century), an overcoat, so called from a tailor of this name, and rendered popular by its association with JOSEPH'S "coat of many colours".

Benjamin's mess. The largest share. The allusion is to the banquet given by Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, to his brethren. "Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs" (Gen. xliii, 34).

Benjamin tree. A tree of the Styrax family that yields benzoin, of which the name is a corruption. Friar's Balsam or Jesuit's Drops is compounded from its juice.

Taste, smell; I assure you, sir, pure benjamin, the only spirited scent that ever awaked a Neapolitan nostril.—BEN JONSON: Cynthia's Revels, V, ii.

Beowulf (bā' ō wulf). The hero of the Old English epic poem of the same name of unknown date and authorship, but certainly originally written before the Saxons came to England and modified subsequent to the introduction of Christianity. In its present form, it probably dates from the 8th century. It is the oldest epic in English and also in the whole Teutonic group of languages.

The scene is laid in Denmark or Sweden; the hall of King Hrothgar is raided nightly by GRENDDEL, whom Beowulf mortally wounds after a fierce fight. Next night Grendel's mother comes to avenge his death. Beowulf pursues her to her lair under the water and slays her with a magic sword. He eventually becomes king and fifty years later is killed in combat with a DRAGON, which had ravished the land.

Berchta. A goddess of South German mythology akin to the HULDA of North Germany, but after the introduction of Christianity she was degraded into a BOGY to frighten children. She was sometimes represented with a long iron nose and one large foot. See BERTHA; WHITE LADY.

Bereans. Followers of the Rev. John Barclay (1734-1798), who seceded from the Scottish kirk in 1773. They held that all we know of God is from the Bible alone; that all the Psalms refer to Christ; that assurance is the proof of faith; that unbelief is the unforgivable sin, etc. They took their name from the Bereans mentioned in Acts xvii, 10, 11, who "received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily".

Berecynthian Hero. MIDAS, the mythological king of Phrygia; so called from Mount Berecynthus in Phrygia.

Berenice. The wife of Ptolemy III Eurygetes (246-221 B.C.). She vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods, if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. She suspended her hair in the temple, but it was stolen the first night and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had wafted it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of LEO, called Coma Berenices.

Bergomask (ber' gō mask). A rustic dance (see Midsummer Night's Dream, V, i); so called from Bergamo, a Venetian province, whose inhabitants were noted for their clownishness. Also a CLOWN.

Berlin. A four-wheeled carriage with a hooded seat behind. It was introduced into England by a German officer about 1670.

Bermoothes (bār mō ooth' ēz). The name of the island in The Tempest, feigned by SHAKESPEARE to be enchanted and inhabited by WITCHES and DEVILS. He almost certainly had the newly discovered Bermudas in mind.

Bermudas (bēr mū' dáz). An old name for a district of WESTMINSTER, probably the narrow alleys in the neighbourhood of Bernard, St.

COVENT GARDEN, St. Martin's Lane, and the STRAND whose residents had certain privileges against arrest. Hence to live in the Bermudas, to skulk in some out-of-the-way place for cheapness or safety. Cp. ALSATIA.

Bernard, St. (1090-1153). Abbot of Clairvaux. Renowned for his wisdom and abilities, he did much to promote the growth of the Cistercian Order, and exercised great influence in Church matters. He was nicknamed the "mellifluous doctor".

Bernardine. A monk of the Order of ST. BERNARD of Clairvaux; a CISTERCIAN.

Bonus Bernardus non videt omnia. The good Bernard does not see everything. We are all apt to forget sometimes; events do not always turn out according to plan. Cp. HOMER SOMETIMES NODS.

Lucullus Bernard. Samuel Bernard, famous French capitalist (1651-1739).

Petit Bernard. Bernard Salomon, engraver of Lyons (16th century).

Poor Bernard. Claude Bernard of Dijon, philanthropist (1588-1640).

St. Bernard dogs. See ST. BERNARD PASSES under PASSES.

St. Bernard Soup. See STONE SOUP.

Bernardo del Carpio. A semi-mythical Spanish hero of the 9th century and a favourite subject of minstrels. Lope de Vega wrote several plays around his exploits. He is credited with having defeated ROLAND at Roncesvalles.

Bernesque Poetry. Serio-comic poetry; so called from Francesco Berni (c. 1497-1536), who greatly excelled in it. BYRON'S Beppo is a good example of English bernesque, with reference to which he wrote to John Murray, his publisher:

Whistlercraft is my immediate model, but Berni is the father of that kind of writing.

Berserker. In Scandinavian mythology, the son of Berserk, grandson of the eight-handed Starkadder and Alfhilde. The name probably means bear-sark, or bear-coat. Berserk always fought ferociously and recklessly, without armour. Hence berserk for a savage and reckless fighter, one with the fighting fever on him.

Berth. He has fallen into a good berth. A good situation or fortune. The place where a ship is anchored or tied up is called its berth. Nautically, a good berth is one that is safe and favourable. One's sleeping space in a ship is called a berth.

To give a wide berth. Not to come near a person; to keep at a safe distance from; literally to give a ship plenty of room to swing at anchor.

Bertha. A German impersonation of the EPIPHANY with some of the attributes of BERCHTA, and corresponding to the Italian BEFANA. She is a WHITE LADY, who steals softly into nurseries and rocks infants to sleep, but is the terror of all naughty children.

Berthe au Grand Pied (bert õ gron pē ā'). Mother of CHARLEMAGNE, and great-granddaughter of Charles Martel; she had a club-foot and died in 783. Many of her qualities, as described in the Charlemagne romances, appear to be derived from BERCHTA.

Bertram, Count of Roussillon, beloved by Helena, the hero of SHAKESPEARE'S All's Well that Ends Well.

I cannot reconcile my heart to Bertram, a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who married Helena as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate.—DR. JOHNSON.

Besaile. A word once used in England for a great-grandfather; it is the French bisatèul.

Besant. See BEZANT.

Beside the Cushion. An odd phrase first used by Judge Jeffreys in the sense of "beside the question", "not to the point".

Besom. Jumping the besom. Omitting the marriage service after the publication of BANNES, and living together as man and wife. In Lowland Scots, besom is a name applied to a prostitute or woman of low character.

To hang out the besom. To have a fling when your wife is gone on a visit. To be a quasi bachelor again. Cp. the French colloquialism, rôtir le balai (to roast the besom) which means "to live a fast life", "to go on the RAZZLE".

Bess, Good Queen. Queen Elizabeth I (1533-1603).

Bess o' Bedlam. A female lunatic vagrant. See BEDLAM.

Bess of Hardwick. Elizabeth Talbot, Countess of Shrewsbury (1518-1608), to whose husband's charge Mary Queen of Scots was committed in 1569. The countess treated the captive queen harshly, through real or feigned jealousy of her husband. Daughter of John Hardwick of Derbyshire, she married four times: Robert Barlow (when she was only fourteen); Sir William Cavendish; Sir William St. Loe, Captain of the Queen's Guard; and lastly George Talbot, 6th Earl of Shrewsbury. Known as "building Bess of Hardwick", she built Hardwick Hall, Oldcotes, Worksop, Bolsover, and completed Chatsworth.

Black Bess. Dick Turpin's mythical but celebrated mare, created by Harrison Ainsworth in his romance Rookwood (1834), particularly known for Dick's famous ride to York. See TURPIN.

Bessee of Bednall Green. See BEGGAR'S DAUGHTER.

Bessie Bell and Mary Gray. A ballad relating how two young women of Perth, to avoid the plague of 1666, retired to a rural retreat called the Burnbraes, near Lynedock, the residence of Mary Gray. A young man, in love with both, carried them provisions, and they all died of the plague and were buried at Dornock Hough.

Bessie with the braid apron. See BELTED WILL.

Best. At best, or At the very best. Looking at the matter in the most favourable light. Making every allowance.

Man is a short-sighted creature at best.
DEFOE: Colonel Jack.

At one's best. On top form in all respects.

For the best. With the best of motives; with the view of obtaining the best results.

I must make the best of my way home. It is getting late and I must use my utmost diligence to get home as soon as possible.

To best somebody. To get the better of him; to outwit him and so have the advantage.

To have the best of it, or to have the best of the bargain. To have the advantage or best of a transaction.

To make the best of the matter. To submit to ill-luck with the best grace in your power.

Best Man (at a wedding). The bridegroom's chosen friend who waits on him as the bridesmaids wait on the bride.

Bestiaries, or Bestials. Books which had a great vogue between the 11th and 14th centuries, describing the supposed habits and peculiarities of animals both real and fabled, with much legendary lore and moral symbolism. They were founded on the Physiologi of earlier centuries and those in English were mostly translations of continental originals. Among the most popular were those of Philippe de Thau, Guillaume le Clerc, and Richard de Fournival's satirical Bestiaire d'Amour (c. 1250).

The unicorn represents Jesus Christ, who took on him our nature in the virgin's womb, was betrayed to the Jews, and delivered into the hands of Pontius Pilate. Its one horn signifies the Gospel truth, that Christ is one with the Father, etc.

GUILLAUME: Le Bestiaire Divin.

Bête Noire (bāt nwar) (Fr. black beast).

The thorn in the side, the bitter in the cup, the SPOKE IN THE WHEEL, the BLACK-SHEEP, one's pet aversion. A black sheep has always been considered an eyesore in a flock. In times of superstition it was looked on as bearing the devil's mark.

Beth Gelert. See BEDDGELERT.

Bethlehemites. (1) A monastic order existing at Cambridge in 1257. Members wore a red star on the breast in memory of the Star of Bethlehem. (2) A short-lived military order instituted by Pius II in 1459 against the Turks. (3) A religious society for tending the sick, founded in Guatemala, c. 1659, by Pierre de Bethencourt, a native of the Canaries. Innocent XI approved of the order in 1687. (4) Followers of John Hus, from the fact that he used to preach in the church of Bethlehem in Prague.

Better. Better off. In easier circumstances.

For better for worse. Forever. From the English marriage service, expressive of indissoluble union.

My better half. My wife. As the twain are one, each is half. Horace calls his friend animæ dimidium meæ (Odes I, iii, 8).

To be better than his word. To do more than he promised.

To think better of the matter. To give it further consideration; to form a more correct opinion respecting it, and usually to revise one's intentions as a result.

Bettina. Elisabeth von Arnim (1785-1859), German writer and wife of the poet Ludwig Achim von Arnim. Her first book, Letters to a Child (1835), was based upon her letters to Goethe.

Betubium (be tū' bi um). The old poetic name for the Cape of St. Andrew, Scotland.

The north-inflated tempest foams
O'er Orka's and Betubium's highest peak.
THOMSON: Autumn, 891, 2.

Between. Between hay and grass.

Neither one thing nor yet another; a hobbledohoy, neither a man nor yet a boy.

Between cup and lip. See SLIP.

Between Scylla and Charybdis. Between equal dangers. See CHARYBDIS; SCYLLA. Cp. HOBSON'S CHOICE.

Between the devil and the deep (blue sea). Similar in use to BETWEEN SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS. With no way out.

Between two fires. Between two dangers as soldiers caught between fire from opposite sides.

Between two stools, you fall to the ground. As when accidentally, or as the victim of a practical joke, you miss both stools and fall to the ground. To miss both chances through hesitance or indecision.

Betwixt and Between

Between you and me. In confidence. Alternatively, Between you and me and the gatepost, or bed-post; between ourselves. Often an indication that some gossip or slander about a third person is to follow.

Betwixt and between. Neither one nor the other, but somewhere between the two. Thus, grey is neither white nor black, but betwixt and between the two. Betwixt wind and water. In a most dangerous spot. The phrase refers to that part of a sailing ship's hull around the waterline, which is alternately wet and dry according to the motion of both ship and waves. A dangerous place for a ship to be holed.

Beulah. See LAND OF BEULAH.

Bever (bev' er). A snack (originally a drink) between meals; through O.Fr. beivre from Lat. bibere, to drink—beverage has the same origins. At Eton "Bever days" were when extra beer and bread were served during the afternoon in the College Hall to scholars and their friends.

He is none of these same ordinary eaters, that will devour three breakfasts and as many dinners without any prejudice to their bevers, drinkings, or suppers.

BRAUMONT and FLETCHER: Woman Hater, I, iii.

Bevin Boys. Nickname for the young men directed to work in coal mines under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act (1940). Ernest Bevin (1881-1951) was Minister of Labour and National Service at the time.

Bevis (bē' vis). In Scott's Marmion, Lord Marmion's red-roan charger.

Bevis of Hampton. Sir Bevis was the hero of this popular English mediæval romance slightly connected with the CHARLEMAGNE cycle. Bevis sought to avenge his father's death, which had been contrived by his mother. As a result he was sold to heathen merchants, and after many adventures he married Josian, daughter of King Ermyne, eventually returning to England to avenge his father. Hampton is usually interpreted as Southampton. The English version (14th century) is based on an earlier French version, but it is possible that the story had previous English origins. Drayton tells the story in his Polyolbion, Song ii, lines 260-384.

Bevoriskius (be vôr is' ki ùs), whose Commentary on the Generations of Adam is referred to by Sterne in the Sentimental Journey, was Johan van Beverwyck (1594-1647), a Dutch physician and author.

Bevy. A throng or company of ladies, roebucks, quails, or larks. The word is the Italian beva, a drink; possibly it acquired this meaning because timid, gregarious animals go down to a river to drink in company. Ladies in former times were regarded as timid creatures.

Bezaliel (be zā' li el). In Dryden and Tate's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL is meant for Henry Somerset, 3rd Marquis of Worcester and 1st Duke of Beaufort (1629-1700), an adherent of Charles II.

Bezaliel with each grace and virtue fraught,
Serene his looks, serene his life and thought;
On whom so largely Nature heaped her store,
There scarce remained for arts to give him more.
Pt. II, 947.

Bezant (be zánt) (from Byzantium, the old name of Constantinople, now Istanbul). A gold coin of varying value struck by the Byzantine Emperors and current in England until the time of Edward III. In HERALDRY the name is given to a plain gold ROUNDEL on the shield.

Bezoar (bē' zōr) A stone from the stomach or gall-bladder of an animal (usually goats and antelopes), set as a jewel and believed to be an antidote against poison. The word is of Persian origin (pad-zahr) and means "counter-poison".

Bezonian (be zō' ni ân). A raw recruit; applied originally in derision to young, ill-equipped soldiers sent from Spain to the Italian Wars, who arrived in want of everything (Ital. bisogni, from bisogno, need; Fr. besoin). Hence a beggar, a knave, etc.

Great men oft die by vile bezonians.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. II, IV, i.

Bhagavad Gita (The Song of the Blessed). One of the great religious and philosophical poems of India which occurs in the sixth book of the MAHABHARATA. In it, KRISHNA, in the form of a charioteer, instructs Arjuna, chief of the Pandus, in his duties and elaborates his ethical and pantheistic philosophy, finally revealing himself as the Supreme Being.

Bianchi (bē āng' ki) (It. the Whites). In 1300 the GUELPH family in Florence split into two factions, "Whites" and "Blacks" (Neri). The Bianchi, among whom Dante was prominent, allied with their Ghibelline opponents. After the triumph of the Neri in 1301, Dante was exiled from Florence.

Bib. Best bib and tucker. See TUCKER.

Biberius Caldius Mero. The punning nickname of Tiberius Claudius Nero (Roman Emperor, A.D. 14–37). Biberius (Tiberius) drink-loving, Caldius Mero (Claudius Nero), by METATHESIS for calidus mero, hot with wine.

Bible. The word is derived from the Greek Ta Biblia through mediæval Latin and means The Books.

Bible, The English. The principal versions in chronological order are:

Wyclif's Bible. The name given to two translations of the VULGATE. The earlier one completed c. 1384 is the first complete English Bible, although there were renderings of parts of the Scriptures from Anglo-Saxon times. Wyclif may have translated parts of it and one of his circle, Nicholas of Hereford, is known to have participated. The second and improved version, probably written between 1395 and 1397, is considered to owe much to John Purvey, a LOLLARD scholar. As a whole it remained unprinted until a monumental edition of both versions, prepared by Forshall and Madden, appeared in 1850.

Tyndale's Bible. This consists of the New Testament printed at Cologne in 1525 (Revisions 1534 and 1535); the PENTATEUCH, printed at Marburg, 1530; the Book of Jonah, 1531; Epistles of the Old Testament (after the Use of Salisbury), 1534; and a MS. translation of the Old Testament to the end of Chronicles, which was afterwards used in MATTHEW'S BIBLE. His work was chiefly based on Greek originals, while making use of the Greek and Latin versions of the New Testament by Erasmus, Luther's Bible, and the VULGATE. His work fixed the language and style of subsequent English versions which were more often revisions of his work rather than independent translations.

Coverdale's Bible. This first printed edition of a complete English Bible appeared in 1535, translated "out of Douche (German) and Latyn", by Miles Coverdale. It was based on Luther, the ZÜRICH BIBLE, the VULGATE, the Latin version of Pagninus, and Tyndale. The first edition was probably printed at Zürich, the second was printed by Nicolson at Southwark in 1537 (the first Bible printed in England). See BUG BIBLE.

Matthew's Bible. Printed in Antwerp in 1537 as the translation of Thomas Matthew, most probably an alias, for self-preservation, of John Rogers, an assistant of Tyndale. It is essentially made up from the work of Tyndale and Coverdale. Like Coverdale's third edition it appeared under the King's licence, but was soon superseded by the GREAT BIBLE. It is important as a basis of the approved editions which culminated in the AUTHORIZED VERSION. See BUG BIBLE.

Taverner's Bible. A revision of MATTHEW'S BIBLE by Richard Taverner printed in 1539. It had little influence on subsequent translations, but is notable for its idiomatic English.

The Great Bible. Published by Grafton and Whitchurch in 1539 as an authorized Bible sponsored by Cranmer and Cromwell, being a revision by Coverdale substantially based on MATTHEW'S BIBLE. It went through seven editions and it was made compulsory for all parish churches to possess a copy. See CRANMER'S BIBLE, CROMWELL'S BIBLE.

Cromwell's Bible. The GREAT BIBLE of 1539. The title-page includes a portrait of Thomas Cromwell, under whose direction the Bible was commissioned.

Cranmer's Bible. The name given to the 1540 edition of the GREAT BIBLE. It and later issues contained a prologue by Cranmer, and, on the woodcut title-page by Holbein, Henry VIII is shown seated handing copies to Cranmer and Cromwell. Its Psalter is still incorporated in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

The Geneva Bible. An important revision in the development of the English Bible, undertaken by English exiles in Geneva during the Marian persecutions, first published in 1560; largely the work of William Whittingham, assisted by Anthony Gilby and Thomas Sampson. Whittingham had previously (1557) published a translation of the New Testament. Based on the GREAT BIBLE, MATTHEW'S BIBLE, etc., it was the first English Bible to be printed in roman type instead of black letter, in QUARTO size, and the first in which the chapters were divided into verses (on the model of Robert Stephen's Greek-Latin Testament of 1537). It was immensely popular; from 1560 to 1616 no year passed without a new edition. See BREECHES BIBLE, GOOSE BIBLE, PLACE-MAKER'S BIBLE.

The Bishops' Bible. A revision of the GREAT BIBLE to counter the growing popularity of the GENEVA BIBLE. Organized by Archbishop Matthew Parker, it appeared in 1568 and a number of the abler bishops took part in the work. It reached its 18th edition by 1602 and was the basis of the AUTHORIZED VERSION. See TREACLE BIBLE.

Matthew Parker's Bible. THE BISHOPS' BIBLE.

The Douai Bible (dou' ā). A translation of the VULGATE by English Roman Catholics. The New Testament was published at the English College at Rheims in 1582, the Old Testament at Douai in 1609; hence called the Rheims and Douai version. See ROSIN BIBLE.

The Authorized Version. This version, still in general use in England, was produced by some 47 scholars, working at the command of King James I, and was a by-product of the HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE. Begun in 1607 and published in 1611, it was based on the BISHOPS' BIBLE, but Tyndale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's and the Geneva Bibles were followed where they were more accurate renderings.

King James's Bible. The AUTHORIZED VERSION.

The Revised Version. This revision of the AUTHORIZED VERSION resulted from a resolution passed by Houses of Convocation in 1870. It was the work of two companies of English scholars, with American co-operators. The New Testament appeared in 1881, the Old Testament in 1885, and the APOCRYPHA in 1895.

The American Standard Version (1901). Essentially a modification of the Revised Version of 1881 to meet American preferences.

The New Testament in Modern Speech (1902). A translation by R. F. Weymouth.

Moffat's Translation. A revised edition of the Bible by James Moffat (N.T., 1913; O.T., 1924; complete edition, 1935).

Knox Version. A new Roman Catholic translation of the VULGATE by Monsignor R. A. Knox. The N.T. was authorized in 1945, the O.T. (for private use only) in 1949.

The Revised Standard Version. The work of American scholars issued between 1946 and 1952. It was to embody the results of modern scholarship "and to be in the diction of the simple classic English style of the King James version". The APOCRYPHA was published in 1957.

The New English Bible. A translation into contemporary English first proposed by the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND and directed by a joint committee of the PROTESTANT Churches of Great Britain and Ireland. The N.T. appeared in 1961 and the translations of the O.T. and the APOCRYPHA were finished in 1966. The complete Bible was published in 1970.

The Jerusalem Bible. A new translation of the Bible, prepared from the ancient originals by Roman Catholic scholars, largely in contemporary English. First published in 1966, it derives its notes and introduction from the French La Bible de Jérusalem produced under the editorship of Père Roland de Vaux in 1956.

BIBLE. SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

The Adulterous Bible. The WICKED BIBLE.

The Affinity Bible, of 1923, which contains a table of affinity with the error, "A man may not marry his grandmother's wife."

The Bad Bible. A printing of 1653 with a deliberate perversion of Acts vi, 6, whereby the ordination of deacons was ascribed to the disciples and not to the apostles.

The Bear Bible. The Spanish Protestant version printed at Basle in 1569; so called because the woodcut device on the title-page is a bear.

Bedell's Bible. An Irish translation of the Old Testament carried out under the direction of Bishop William Bedell (1571-1642). The Irish N.T. was published in 1601.

The Breeches Bible. The popular name for the GENEVA BIBLE because in it Gen. iii, 7, was rendered, "and they sowed figge-tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." It is also given in the then unprinted Wyclif MS. (ya swiden ye levis of a fige tre and madin brechis), and also in the translation of the PENTATEUCH printed in Caxton's edition of Voragine's Golden Legend (1483).

The Brothers' Bible. The KRALITZ BIBLE.

The Bug Bible. COVERDALE'S BIBLE of 1535 is so called because Ps. xci, 5, is translated: "Thou shalt not nede to be afrayed for eny bugges by night." The same occurs in MATTHEW'S BIBLE and its reprints. Both the AUTHORIZED VERSION and REVISED VERSION read "terror".

Camel's Bible, of 1823. Gen. xxiv, 61, reads: "And Rebekah arose, and her camels (for damsels)."

Complutensian Polyglot. Published between 1514 and 1517 at Alcalá (the ancient Complutum), near Madrid, at the expense of Cardinal Ximenes. In six FOLIO volumes, it contains the Hebrew and Greek texts, the Septuagint, the VULGATE, and the Chaldee paraphrase of the PENTATEUCH with a Latin translation, together with Greek and Hebrew grammars and a Hebrew dictionary.

The Denial Bible. Printed at Oxford in 1792, in Luke xxii, 34, the name Philip is substituted for Peter, as the apostle who should deny Jesus.

The Discharge Bible. An edition of 1806 containing discharge for charge in 1 Tim. v, 21: "I dis-charge thee before God, . . . that thou observe these things."

The Ears to Ear Bible. An edition of 1810, in which Matt. xiii, 43, reads: "Who hath ears to ear, let him hear."

The Ferrara Bible. The first Spanish edition of the Old Testament (1553) for the use of Spanish Jews. A second edition for Christians was published in the same year.

The Fool Bible. An edition of Charles I's reign in which Psalms xiv, 1, reads: "The fool hath said in his heart there is a God." The printers were fined £3,000 and all copies were suppressed.

The Forgotten Sins Bible, of 1638. Luke vii, 47, reads: "Her sins which are many, are forgotten (instead of forgiven)."

The Forty-two-line Bible. The MAZARIN BIBLE.

The Goose Bible. The editions of the GENEVA BIBLE printed at Dort: the Dort press had a goose for its device.

The Gutenberg Bible. The MAZARIN BIBLE.

The He Bible. In the first of the two editions of the AUTHORIZED VERSION in 1611, known as "the He Bible", Ruth iii, 15, reads: "and he went into the city." The other, and nearly all modern editions (except the REVISED VERSION) have "she". "He" is the correct translation of the Hebrew.

The Idle Bible. An edition of 1809, in which "the idol shepherd" (Zech. xi, 17) is printed "the idle shepherd". In the REVISED VERSION the translation is "the worthless shepherd".

The Incunabula Bible. The date on the title page reads 1495 instead of 1594. The word incunabula came to be applied to all books printed before 1500, the period when typography was in its "swaddling-clothes", or its beginnings.

The Indian Bible. The first complete Bible printed in America, translated into the dialect of the Indians of Massachusetts by the Rev. John Eliot and published by Samuel Green and Marmaduke Johnson in 1663.

Judas Bible, of 1611. Matt. xxvi, 36, reads "Judas" instead of "Jesus".

The Kralitz Bible, also called the Brothers' Bible, was published by the United Brethren of Moravia at Kralitz, 1579-1593.

The "Large Family" Bible. An Oxford edition of 1820 prints Isaiah lxvi, 9: "Shall I bring to the birth and not cease (for cause) to bring forth?"

The Leda Bible. The third edition (second folio) of the BISHOPS' BIBLE, published in 1572, and so called from the decoration to the initial at the Epistle to the Hebrews which is a startling and incongruous woodcut of JUPITER visiting LEDA in the guise of a swan. This and other decorations in the New Testament were from an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses. Such was the protest that they were never used again.

The Leopolda Bible. A Polish translation of the VULGATE by John of Lemberg (ancient Leopolis) published at Cracow in 1561.

The Lions Bible. A Bible issued in 1804 containing many printers' errors such as: Numbers xxv, 18, "The murderer shall surely be put together (instead of to death)"; 1 Kings viii, 19, "but thy son that shall come forth out of thy lions (for loins)"; Galatians v, 17, "For the flesh lusteth after the Spirit (for against the Spirit)".

The Mazarin Bible. The first known book to be printed from movable type, probably by Fust and Schöffer at Mainz, who took over most of Gutenberg's presses in 1455. This edition of the VULGATE was on sale in 1456 and owes its name to the copy discovered in the Mazarin Library in Paris in 1760. A copy of Vol. I fetched a record price of £21,000 at a London auction in 1947. It was for long credited to Gutenberg and is frequently called the Gutenberg Bible. It is usually known to bibliographers as the Forty-two-line Bible (it having 42 lines to the column) to differentiate it from the THIRTY-SIX-LINE BIBLE.

More Sea Bible, of 1641. Rev. xxi, 1, reads: "and there was more sea", instead of "no more sea".

The Murderers' Bible. An edition of 1801 in which Jude 16 reads: "These are murderers (for murmurers), complainers", etc.

The Old Cracow Bible. The LEOPOLITA BIBLE.

The Ostrog Bible. The first complete Slavonic edition; printed at Ostrog, Volhynia, Russia, in 1581.

Pfister's Bible. The THIRTY-SIX-LINE BIBLE.

The Placemakers' Bible. The second edition of the GENEVA BIBLE, 1562. Matt. v, 9, reads: "Blessed are the placemakers (peacemakers): for they shall be called the children of God." It has also been called the WHIG BIBLE.

The Printers' Bible. An edition of about 1702 which makes David complain that "printers (princes) have persecuted me without a cause". (Ps. cxix, 161).

The Proof Bible (Probe-Bibel). The revised version of the first impression of Luther's German Bible. A final revision appeared in 1892.

The Rosin Bible. The DOUAI BIBLE, 1609, is so called because it has in Jer. viii, 22: "Is there noe rosin in Galaad?" The AUTHORIZED VERSION translates the word by "balm", but gives "rosin" in the margin as an alternative. Cp. TREACLE BIBLE.

Sacy's Bible. A French translation by THE JANSENIST, Louis Isaac le Maistre de Sacy, director of PORT ROYAL (1650-79). He began his work when imprisoned in the BASTILLE.

Schelhorn's Bible. The THIRTY-SIX-LINE BIBLE.

The September Bible. Luther's German translation of the New Testament, published anonymously at Wittenberg in September 1522.

The She Bible. See HE BIBLE.

"Sin on" Bible. The first printed in Ireland was dated 1716. John v, 14, reads: "sin on more", instead of "sin no more". The mistake was undiscovered until 8,000 copies had been printed and bound.

The Standing Fishes Bible. An edition of 1806 in which Ezek. xlvi, 10, reads: "And it shall come to pass that the fishes (fishers) shall stand upon it," etc.

The Sting Bible of 1746. Mark vii, 35, "the sting of his tongue", instead of "string".

The Thirty-six-line Bible. A Latin Bible of 36 lines to the column, probably printed by A. Pfister at Bamberg in 1460. It is also known as the Bamberg, and Pfister's, Bible and sometimes as Schelhorn's, as it was first described by the German bibliographer J. G. Schelhorn, in 1760.

The To-remain Bible. In a Bible printed at Cambridge in 1805 Gal. iv, 29, reads: "persecuted him that was born after the spirit to remain, even so it is now." The words "to remain" were added in error by the compositor, the editor having answered a proof-reader's query as to the comma after "spirit", with the pencilled reply in the margin "to remain". The mistake was repeated in the Bible Society's first 8vo edition (1805) and their 12mo edition of 1819.

The Treacle Bible. A popular name for the BISHOPS' BIBLE, 1568, because Jer. viii, 22, reads: "is there no tryacle in Gilead, is there no phisition there?" "Tryacle" is also given for "balm" in Jer. xlvi, 11, and Ezek. xxvii, 17. Cp. ROSIN BIBLE. COVERDALE'S BIBLE also uses the word 'triacle'. See TREACLE.

The Unrighteous Bible. A Cambridge printing of 1653 contains: "know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the Kingdom of God?", instead of "shall not inherit" (I Cor. vi, 9). Also in Rom. vi, 13, "Neither yield ye your members as instruments of righteousness unto sin," in place of "unrighteousness". This edition is also sometimes known as the WICKED BIBLE.

The Vinegar Bible. An Oxford printing of 1717 in which part of the chapter heading to Luke xx reads: "The parable of the Vinegar" (for Vineyard).

The Whig Bible. Another name for the PLACEMAKERS' BIBLE. The jibe is obvious. See PLACEMEN.

The Wicked Bible. So called because the word "not" was omitted in the seventh commandment (Exod. xx, 14) making it, "Thou shalt commit adultery." It was printed by Barker and Lucas, the King's printers, at Blackfriars in 1631. The fine of £300 helped to ruin the printer. It is also called the Adulterous Bible. See UNRIGHTEOUS BIBLE.

The Wife-hater Bible. An 1810 edition gives Luke xiv, 26, as: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother . . . yea, and his own wife also," instead of "life".

Wuyck's Bible. An authorized Polish translation by the Jesuit, Jacob Wuyck, printed at Cracow in 1599.

The Zürich Bible. A German version of 1530 composed of Luther's translation of the New Testament and portions of the Old, with the remainder and the APOCRYPHA by other translators.

Bible, Statistics of. The following statistics are those given in the Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Bible, by Thos. Hartwell Horne, D.D., first published in 1818. They apply to the English AUTHORIZED VERSION.

	O.T.	N.T.	Total
Books	39	27	66
Chapters	929	260	1,189
Verses	23,214	7,959	31,173

APOCRYPHA. Books, 14; chapters, 183; verses, 6,031; words, 125,185; letters, 1,063,876.

	O.T.	N.T.
Middle book	Proverbs	II Thess.
Middle chapter	Job xxix	Rom. xiii and xiv
Middle verse	II Chron. xx, 17 & 18	Acts xvii, 17
Shortest verse	I Chron. i, 25	John xi, 35
Shortest chapter	Psalms cxvii
Longest chapter	Psalms cxiix

Ezra vii, 21, contains all the letters of the alphabet except j.

II Kings xix and Isaiah xxxvii are exactly alike. The last two verses of II Chron. and the opening verses of Ezra are alike.

Ezra ii and Nehemiah vii are alike. The word and occurs in the O.T. 35,543 times, and in the N.T. 10,684 times.

The word Jehovah occurs 6,855 times, and Lord 1,855 times.

About thirty books are mentioned in the Bible, but not included in the canon.

In addition it is noteworthy that by the end of 1965 the United Bible Societies had circulated the Scriptures in 1,251 languages.

Bible-backed. Round-shouldered, like one who is always poring over a book.

Bible-carrier. A scornful term for an obtrusively pious person.

Some scoff at such as carry the scriptures with them to church, terming them in reproach Bible-carriers.

GOUGE: Whole Armour of God (1616), p. 318.

Bible Christians. An evangelical sect founded in 1815 by William O'Bryan, a Cornish METHODIST; also called Bryanites. The movement grew steadily, firstly in the fishing and farming districts of Devon and Cornwall. They joined the United Methodist Church in 1907.

Bible-Clerk. A student at Oxford or Cambridge who formerly got pecuniary advantages for reading the Bible at chapel, etc.

Bible-puncher. A modern equivalent of BIBLE-CARRIER.

Biblia Pauperum (Lat., poor man's Bible). A MISNOMER coined long after the first appearance in the 1460s of these late mediæval BLOCK BOOKS. They contain a series of New Testament scenes from the life of Christ, each surrounded by their Old Testament antetypes, and with a brief text engraved in the same block below the illustration. Despite their name, the Biblia Pauperum can have hardly been intended for the illiterate, their iconography and text being replete with allegory and symbol, and must rather have served itinerant preachers and the lower orders of clergy. See SPECULUM HUMANÆ SALVATIONIS.

Bibliomancy. DIVINATION by means of the Bible. See SORTES.

Bibliomania. A love of books pursued to the point of unreason or madness. One Don Vicente, a Spanish scholar, is reputed to have committed murder to obtain a supposedly unique book.

Bibliophilia. A devotion to books and book collecting within the limits of reason.

Bibulus. Colleague of Julius Caesar, a mere cipher in office; hence proverbial for one in office who is a mere fainéant.

Bickerstaff, Isaac. A name assumed by Dean Swift in a satirical pamphlet against Partridge, the almanack-maker. So diverting was the ensuing paper war that Steele issued the Tatler under the editorial name of "Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., Astrologer" (1709). An actual Isaac Bickerstaff, playwright, was born in Ireland in 1735.

Bicorn (bi' kôrn). A mythical beast, fabled by the early French romancers to grow very fat through living on good and enduring husbands. It was the antitype of CHICHEVACHE.

Bi-corn (two-horns) contains an allusion to the horned CUCKOLD.

Bid. The modern verb "to bid" may be from either of two Old English verbs, (1) béodan, to stretch out, offer, present, and hence to inform, proclaim, command, or (2) biddan, to importune, beg, pray, and hence also, command. The two words have now become very confused. The following four examples are from (1) beodan:

To bid fair. To seem likely; as "He bids fair to do well"; "It bids fair to be a fine day".

To bid for (votes). To promise to support certain measures in PARLIAMENT in order to obtain votes.

To bid against one. To offer a higher price for an article at auction.

I bid him defiance. I offer him defiance; I defy him.

The next examples are from (2) biddan:
I bid you good night. I wish you good night, or I pray that you may have a good night.

Neither bid him God speed. II John 10.

To bid one's beads. To tell off one's prayers by beads. See BEAD.

To bid the (marriage) banns. To ask if anyone objects to the marriage of the persons named. Cp. SI QUIS.

To bid to the wedding. To ask to the wedding feast.

Bid-ale (or Help-Ale). A gathering to drink ALE and to collect for the relief of some poor man or other charity. They frequently became an excuse for excessive conviviality.

There was an ancient custom called a Bidale or Bidder-ale . . . when any honest man decayed in his estate was set up again by the liberal benevolence and contributions of friends at a feast to which those friends were bid or invited. It was most used in the West of England, and in some counties called a Help-ale.

BRAND: Popular Antiquities (1777).

Bidding-prayer (O.E. biddan; see BID). In the CHURCH OF ENGLAND this term is now commonly applied to a prayer for the souls of benefactors said before the sermon, in cathedrals, university churches, and on special occasions. It stems from the pre-REFORMATION vernacular prayer of the "bidding of the beads". "Bidding" was here used in the sense of "praying" and the priest told the people what to remember in their prayers. By the time of Elizabeth I the "bidding of prayers" came to mean the "directing" or "enjoining" of prayers, hence the modern meaning.

Biddy (i.e. Bridget). A generic name for an Irish servant-maid, as Mike is for an Irish labourer. Such names were once very common: for example Tom Tug, a waterman; Jack Pudding, a buffoon; JACK TAR, a sailor; TOMMY Atkins, a soldier (World War I); BROTHER JONATHAN, a citizen of the U.S.A.; JOHN BULL, an Englishman; COUSIN MICHEL a German; Colin Tampon, a Swiss; Mossoo, a Frenchman; John Chinaman, etc. Nic Frog is a Dutchman (frogs are called "Dutch Nightingales"), but the word has been transferred to the French as they have the reputation of eating frogs.

Biddy. In America is applied to a hen.

The English hens had a contented cluck as if they never got nervous like Yankee biddies.

L. M. ALCOTT: Little Wives.

Also an Australian name for a woman teacher.

Old Biddy. In the U.S.A. a term applied to an elderly woman who is somewhat of a busybody.

Red Biddy is a highly intoxicating concoction with a basis of cheap port. Chiefly popular in the East End of London.

Bideford Postman. Edward Capern (1819-1894), the poet, so called from his former occupation and abode.

Bidpay. See PILPAY.

Bifrost (Icel. bifa, tremble; rost, path). In Scandinavian mythology, the bridge between heaven and earth, ASGARD and MIDGARD. The rainbow may be considered to be this bridge, and its various colours are the reflections of its precious stones. HEIMDALL is its keeper.

Big. To look big. To assume a consequential air.

To look as big as bull beef. To look stout and hearty, as if fed on bull beef which was held to make men strong and muscular.

To talk big. To boast or brag.

Big Ben. The famous bell in the Clock Tower (St. Stephen's Tower) of the Houses of PARLIAMENT. It weighs 13½ tons and was named after Sir Benjamin Hall, Chief Commissioner of Works in 1856, when it was cast. Hall was himself called "Big Ben" on account of his size.

Big Bertha. A German gun of large calibre used to shell Paris from a range of 75 miles, during World War I. Named by the French in allusion to Frau Bertha Krupp of armament fame. In American slang "Big Bertha" means a fat woman.

Big bird, To get the (i.e. the goose). To be hissed; to receive one's congé; originally a theatrical expression. Today the usual phrase is "to get the bird".

Big brother refers to the police activities of an authoritarian state and derives from George ORWELL's 1984 (1949).

Big-endians. In Swift's Gulliver's Travels, a party in the empire of Lilliput who made it a matter of conscience to break their eggs at the big end; they were looked on as heretics by the orthodox party, who broke theirs at the little end. The Big-endians typify the CATHOLICS and the Little-endians the PROTESTANTS.

Big Gooseberry Season, The. The "SILLY SEASON", the dead season, when newspapers are glad of any subject to fill their columns; monster gooseberries will do for such a purpose.

Big head. A conceited person.

Big House. American slang for a prison. Also the name given to the large structure formerly erected by the Delaware Indians for their twelve-night ceremony to propitiate the Great Spirit (see MANITOU).

Big nob, Big noise. See BIG-WIG.

Big Sea Day. An old-time custom in New Jersey, when, on the second Saturday in August, the farmers and their families drove to the sea-shore to picnic and to bathe in the clothes they were wearing. Also called "Farmers' Wash-Day".

Big shot. See BIG-WIG.

Big Smoke, The. One of the nicknames of London, more commonly "the SMOKE"; also of Sydney, N.S.W. Cp. AULD REEKIE.

Big stick diplomacy. Backing negotiations or policy with the threat of military force. The term was popularized by Theodore Roosevelt's declaration in 1900 that he had always been fond of the West African proverb "speak softly and carry a big stick". He used such tactics successfully (1902-4) in the Alaskan boundary dispute and the second Venezuelan crisis.

Big Triangle. A sailor's term denoting the round trip frequently made by sailing ships from a British port to Australia, thence with New South Wales coal to South America, and back home with a cargo of nitrates.

Big-wig. A person in authority, an important person. The term arises from the custom of judges and BISHOPS, and so on, wearing large WIGS. Judges still wear them. Big nob, Big noise, Big shot are similarly used.

Bight (bit). To hook the bight—i.e. to get entangled. A nautical term; the bight is the loop or doubled part of a rope, and when the fluke of one anchor gets into the bight of another's cable it is "hooked".

Bilbo. A rapier or sword. So called from Bilbao, in Spain, once famous for its finely tempered blades. Falstaff says to Ford:

I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; first an intolerable fright, to be detected . . . next, to be compassed, like a good bilbo . . . hilt to point, heel to head.—Merry Wives, III, v.

Bilboes. A bar of iron with sliding fetters attached to it, by which mutinous sailors or prisoners were linked together. Possibly derived from Bilbao where they may have been first made. Some of the bilboes from the Spanish Armada are kept in the TOWER of London.

Bile. It rouses my bile. It makes me angry or indignant. In Latin, biliosus (a bilious man) meant a choleric one. According to ancient theory, bile is a HUMOUR of the body, black bile is indicative of melancholy. When excited abnormally, bile was supposed to produce cholera or rage.

It raised my bile

To see him so reflect their grief aside.

HOOD: Plea of Midsummer Fairies, stanza liv.

Bilge-water. Stale dregs; bad beer; any distasteful or nauseating drink. The bilge is the inside or curve of the ship immediately above the keel, where the rain or seawater collects and becomes foul. In slang bilge means worthless stuff, rubbish.

Bilk. Originally a term in cribbage meaning to spoil your adversary's score, to BALK him; perhaps the two words are mere variants.

It now usually means to cheat, to obtain goods and depart without paying.

He cannot drink five bottles, bilk the score,

Then kill a constable, and drink five more.

COWPER: Progress of Error, l. 193.

Bill. The nose, also called the beak. Hence Billy is slang for a pocket-handkerchief.

Bill, A. The draft of an ACT OF PARLIAMENT. When a Bill is passed and receives the royal assent it becomes an Act.

A Private Bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament affecting private persons, groups or corporations.

A Private Member's Bill is a public bill introduced by a private member as distinct from a member of the Government. Few reach the STATUTE Book.

A Public Bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament affecting the general public.

A True Bill. Under the old judicial system before a case went to the Criminal Assizes it was examined by the Grand Jury. If they decided that there was enough evidence to justify a trial they were said "to find a true bill"; if they decided to the contrary they were said to ignore the bill and it was endorsed ignoramus. Hence to find a true bill is a colloquial way of saying that something after examination can go forward as true.

Bill of Attainder. In mediæval England felons under sentence of death, outlaws, etc., were attainted and subject to forfeiture of goods, etc. Bills of Attainder were used for arbitrarily destroying political enemies of the government, for criminal offences against the State and public peace, PARLIAMENT acting as both judge and jury. First introduced in 1549, the last Bill of Attainder was passed against Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Irish rebel leader, in 1798.

Bill of Exchange. An order transferring a named sum of money at a given date from the debtor (drawee) to the creditor (drawer). The drawee having signed the bill becomes the "acceptor", and the document is then negotiable in commercial circles just as is money itself.

Bill of Fare. A list of dishes provided in a restaurant, etc.; a menu.

Bill of Health. A document signed by the proper authorities to the master of a ship certifying that when the ship sailed no infectious disorder existed in the place. This is a clean bill of health, and the term is often used figuratively.

A foul bill of health, or the absence of a clean bill, means that the place, from which the vessel sailed, was infected.

Bill of Lading. A document signed by the master of a ship in acknowledgement of goods laden in his vessel. In this document he binds himself to deliver the articles in good condition to the persons named, subject to certain circumstances. These bills are generally in triplicate—one for the sender, one for the receiver, and one for the master of the vessel.

Bill of Pains and Penalties. A Parliamentary proceeding like a BILL OF ATTAINDER imposing punishment less than capital. The last such bill against Queen Caroline, wife of George IV, was dropped in 1820.

Bill of Rights (Oct. 1689). A constitutional enactment of fundamental importance consolidating the GLORIOUS REVOLUTION of 1688. It asserted the liberties and rights of the nation, declared William and Mary King and Queen, and settled the succession.

A Bill of Rights, designed to guarantee civil liberties, was embodied in the American Constitution in 1791. It consists of the first ten amendments, proposed in 1789.

Bill of Sale. When a person borrows money and delivers goods as security, he gives the lender a "bill of sale", i.e. permission to sell the goods if the money is not returned on the stated day.

Bills of Mortality. In 1592, on the occasion of a great pestilence, the Company of Parish Clerks, representing 109 parishes in and around London, began to publish weekly returns of all deaths occurring; later they included births or baptisms. They were very inaccurate and were superseded by the Registrar-General's returns after 1836.

Within the Bills of Mortality means within the districts covered by the Bills of Mortality, which grew with the growth of London.

Bills receivable. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, or other acceptances held by a person to whom the money stated is payable.

Billabong (Austr.). A dried-up watercourse, from billa, a creek, and bong, to die.

Once a jolly swagman camped by a billabong
Under the shade of a coolibah tree.

A. B. PATERSON: Waltzing Matilda.

Billies and Charleys. See FORGERIES.

Billingsgate. The site of an old passage through that part of the city wall that protected London on the river side, named from an early property-owner in the area. The site of a fish-market for many centuries, where porters were famous for their foul and abusive language at least four centuries ago.

To talk Billingsgate. To slang; to use foul and abusive language; to scold in a vulgar fashion.

You are no better than a Billingsgate fish-fag. You are as rude and ill-mannered as the women of Billingsgate fish-market.

Billingsgate pheasant. A red herring; a bloater.

Billjim. A synonym for "Australian", supposedly on account of the frequency of the names William and James among the early settlers.

Billy. (1) A policeman's staff, which is a little bill or billet. (2) A pocket-handkerchief (see BILL). A blue billy is a handkerchief with blue ground and white spots. (3) The can in which Australian station-hands originally made tea and did their cooking. Possibly from billa, a creek—hence water.

Billy and Charley. See FORGERIES.

Billy Barlow. A street droll, A MERRY ANDREW; so called from a half-idiot of that name well known in the East End of London, for witty and droll behaviour, in the early half of the 19th century. He died in a WHITECHAPEL workhouse.

Billy Blue. Admiral Sir William Cornwallis (1744-1819).

Billy boy. A bluff-bowed North Country coaster of river-barge build.

Billy goat. A male goat. From this came the term once common for a tufted beard—a "billy" or goatie.

Billycock Hat. A round, low-crowned, hard-felt hat with a wide brim. One account says the name is the same as "bully-cocked", that is, as worn by a bully or swell, a term used in Amherst's Terrae Filius (1721). Another says that it was first used by Billy Coke (Mr. William Coke) at the great shooting parties at Holkham about 1850. Old established West End hatters used to call them "Coke hats". See BOWLER HAT.

Billy the Kid. William H. Bonney (1859-1881), baby-faced killer, who committed his first murder at the age of twelve. Prominent in the Lincoln County cattle war in New Mexico, he boasted that he had killed a man for every year of his life. He was finally shot (aged 21) by Sheriff Pat Garrett.

Bi-metallism. The employment for coinage of two metals, SILVER and GOLD which would be of fixed relative value; both being standard money or legal tender.

Bimini. A legendary island of the Bahamas where the fountain of youth gave everlasting life to all who drank from it.

Binary Arithmetic (bí' ná ri). Arithmetic in which the base of the notation is 2 instead of 10, a method suggested for certain uses by Leibnitz. The unit followed by a cipher signifies two, by another unit signifies three, by two ciphers it signifies four, and so on. Thus 10 signifies 2, 100 signifies 4; while 11 signifies 3, etc. Most computers work on this system.

Bing Boys. The nickname of the Canadian troops in World War I from the name of their commanding officer, Lord Byng of Vimy. Also from the revue team of the same name.

Bingham's Dandies. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Birchin Lane. I must send you to Birchin Lane. i.e. whip you. The play is on birch (a rod), but the derivation of the name really means "the lane of barbers".
A suit in Birchin Lane. Birchin Lane was once famous for all sorts of apparel and was known for second-hand clothing in Shakespearean times.

Passing through Birchin Lane amidst a camp-royal of hose and doublets, I took . . . occasion to slip into a captain's suit—a valiant buff doublet stuffed with points and a pair of velvet slops scored thick with lace.

MIDDLETON: Black Book (1604).

Bird. This is the Old English and Middle English brid (sometimes byrde in M.E.), which meant the young of feathered flying animals. Foul, foule, or fowel was the M.E. equivalent of the modern bird.

The now obsolete use as an endearing name for a girl is connected with BURD. In modern slang "bird" is often a somewhat disparaging term for a young female.

Bird is also a name for the shuttlecock used in Badminton.

A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush; a pound in the purse is worth two in the book. Possession is better than expectation.

It exists in several languages:

Italian: È meglio aver oggi un uovo, che domani una gallina.

French: Un tiens vaut, ce dit-on, mieux que deux tu l'auras.

German: Ein Vogel in der Hand ist besser als zehn über Land.

Besser ein Spatz in der Hand, als ein Storch auf dem Dache.

Latin: Certa amittimus dum incerta petimus (Plautus).

On the other side we have, "Qui ne s'aventure, n'a ni cheval ni mule."

"Nothing venture, nothing win." "Use a sprat to catch a mackerel." "Chi non s'arrischia non guadagna."

A bird of ill omen. One who is regarded as unlucky or who is in the habit of bringing bad news. The phrase comes from the custom of AUGURY and even today OWLS, CROWS and RAVENS are often regarded as unlucky birds, SWALLOWS and STORKS as lucky ones. Ravens by their acute sense of smell can often locate dead and decaying bodies at a great distance, hence, perhaps, they indicate death. Owls screech when bad weather is at hand and, as foul weather often precedes sickness, so the owl is looked on as a funeral bird.

A bird of passage. A person who shifts from place to place, a temporary visitant, like a cuckoo, swallow, starling, etc.

A little bird told me so. From Eccles. x, 20:

Curse not the King, nor not in thy thought; . . . for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

Birdcage Walk (St. James's Park, WESTMINSTER); named from the aviary kept there by Charles II.

Birdie. A hole at golf which the player has completed in one stroke less than par (the official figure). Two strokes less is an eagle.

Bird's-eye view. A mode of perspective drawing in which the artist is supposed to be over the objects drawn, in which case he beholds them as a bird in the air would see them; a general or overall view.

Birds of a feather flock together. Those of similar character, taste or station associate together. Hence, of that feather, of that sort.

I am not of that feather to shake off
My friend, when he most need me.

SHAKESPEARE: Timon of Athens, I, i.

Bird walking weather. A flying expression of American origin, indicating CEILING ZERO, coined from the phrase, "the weather is so bad, even the birds are walking."

Fine feathers make fine birds. See FEATHER.

Old birds are not to be caught with chaff. Experience teaches wisdom.

One beats the bush, another takes the bird. The workman does the work, master makes the money. See BEAT.

The Arabian bird. The PHOENIX.

The bird of Juno. The peacock. MINERVA's bird is either the COCK or the owl; that of VENUS is the DOVE.

The bird of Washington. The American or bald-headed EAGLE.

Birds Protected by Superstitions

Thou hast kept well the bird in thy bosom. Thou hast remained faithful to thy allegiance or faith. The expression was used of Sir Ralph Percy (slain in the battle of Hedgeley Moor, 1464) to express his fidelity to the House of Lancaster.

'Tis the early bird that catches the worm. It is the early riser or one who acts promptly who attains his object.

To get the bird. To be hissed; to be given a hostile reception. See BIG BIRD.

To kill two birds with one stone. To achieve two ends with one effort or outlay.

Birds Protected by Superstitions:

The Chough was protected in CORNWALL because the soul of King ARTHUR was fabled to have migrated into one.

The Falcon was held sacred by the Egyptians because it was the form assumed by RA and HORUS; and the Ibis because the god THOTH escaped from the pursuit of TYPHON disguised as an Ibis.

Mother Cary's Chickens, or Stormy Petrels, are protected by sailors from a superstition that they are the living embodiment of the souls of dead mariners. See also MOTHER.

The Robin is protected on account of Christian tradition and nursery legend. See ROBIN REDBREAST.

The Stork is held sacred in Sweden, from the legend that it flew round the cross crying, "Styrka, Styrka!" when Jesus was crucified. See STORK.

Swans are protected in Ireland from the legend of the FIONNUALA (daughter of LIR) who was metamorphosed into a swan and condemned to wander the waters until the advent of Christianity. Moore wrote a poem on the subject.

Birler. In Cumberland, a birler is the master of revels at a bidden-wedding, who sees that the guests are well furnished with drink. To birle is to carouse or pour out liquor (O.E. byrelian).

Birmingham by way of Beachy Head. Metaphorically, a roundabout approach. It is a quotation from G. K. Chesterton's poem The Rolling English Road.

He (Mr. George Brown) grows impatient with a Civil Service that makes him travel to Birmingham by way of Beachy Head.

The Times, London, 22 February 1965.

Birmingham Poet. John Freeth, who died at the age of seventy-eight in 1808. He was a wit, poet, and publican, who not only wrote the words and tunes of songs, but sang them also, and sang them well.

Birrellism. A good-humoured but penetrating comment tinged with kindly irony. Named after Augustine Birrell (1850-1933), Professor of Law at University College, London, politician, and man of letters, who is probably best remembered for his witty and urbane essays called Obiter Dicta.

Birth-day suit. He was in his birthday suit. Quite nude, as when born.

Originally, the magnificent suit of clothes specially ordered by courtiers to be worn on the sovereign's birthday.

The Sun himself, on this auspicious Day,
Shines, like a Beau in a new Birth-day Suit.

FIELDING: Tom Thumb the Great, I, i.

Bis (Lat. twice). French and Italians use this as English audiences use encore.

Bis dat, qui cito dat. He gives twice who gives promptly—i.e. quick relief will do as much good as twice the sum later.

Bishop (O.E. biscop; from Lat. episcopus, and Gr. episcopos, an overseer). One of the higher order of Christian priesthood who presides over a diocese and who has powers of ordaining and confirming.

The name is given to one of the men in CHESS (formerly called the archer); to the LADYBIRD (see BISHOP BARANBEE); to a lady's bustle (sometimes called a "stern reality"), and to a drink made by pouring red wine, such as CLARET or burgundy, either hot or cold, on ripe bitter oranges, the liquor being sugared and spiced to taste. Similarly a Cardinal is made by using white wine instead of red and a Pope by using tokay. See also BOY BISHOP.

Bishop Barker. An Australian term used around Sydney for the largest glass of beer available, named from Frederick Barker (1808-1882), Bishop of Sydney, who was a very tall man.

Bishop Barnabee. The May-bug, ladybird, etc. There is an old Sussex rhyme:

Bishop, Bishop Barnabee,
Tell me when my wedding shall be;
If it be tomorrow day,
Ope your wings and fly away.

Bishop of Fleet Street. A nickname given to Hannen Swaffer (1879-1962) by his fellow journalists because of his pronouncements on public morality, and his sombre stylized mode of attire.

Bishop in Partibus. See IN PARTIBUS.

The bishop has put his foot in it. Said of milk or porridge that is burnt, or of meat over-roasted. Tyndale says, "If the porage be burned to, or the meate over rosted we saye the byshope hath put his fote in the potte"; and explains it thus, "because the bishopes burnt who they lust". Such food is also said to be bishopped.

The Bishops' Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

To Bishop was formerly used in the sense of to confirm, to admit into the Church. There are two verbs to bishop, both from proper names. One is obsolete and meant to murder by drowning; from the name of a man who drowned a little boy in Bethnal Green and sold the body to the surgeons for dissection. The other means to conceal a horse's age by "faking" his teeth.

Bissextile (bi seks' til). LEAP YEAR. We add a day to February in leap year, but the Romans counted 24 FEBRUARY twice, and called it dies bissextus (sexto calendae Martias), the sextile or sixth day before 1 MARCH. This day was reckoned twice (bis) in leap year, which was called annus bissextus.

Bistonians (bi tō' ni ānz). The Thracians; so called from Biston, son of MARS, who built Bistonia on the Lake Bistonis.

Bistro(t). A small, unpretentious café in France, where meals as well as drinks, can be obtained quickly. The suggestion that the word comes from the Russian, bistro quick, and dates from the Allied Occupation of 1815, is open to doubt, since it is not found until 1884. It may possibly be derived from bistouille, rot-gut liquor, served in such a café.

Bit. A piece, a morsel. Really the same word as bite (O.E. bitan), meaning a piece bitten off. It is the substantive of bite, as morsel (Fr. morceau) is of mordre.

Also used for a piece of money as a "threepenny bit", a "two-shilling bit", etc. In the U.S.A. a bit was 12½ cents: two bits are a QUARTER.

Bit is old thieves' slang for money and a coiner is called a "bit-maker".

In the 1920s bit was slang for a girl, short for a "bit of fluff", now a "bit of stuff". "Piece (or bit) of skirt" is similarly used.

Bit (of a horse). To take the bit between, or in one's teeth. To be obstinately self-willed; to make up one's mind not to yield. When a horse has a mind to run away, he catches the bit between his teeth and the driver has no longer control over him.

Bite. A cheat; one who bites us. "The biter bit" explains the origin. We say a man was "bitten" when "he burns his fingers", meddling with something that promised well but turned out a failure, "The biter bit" is the moral of ÆSOP's fable The Viper and the File.

Bites and Bams. Hoaxes and quizzes; humbug.

(His) humble efforts at jocularity were chiefly confined to . . . bites and bams.

SCOTT: Guy Manner, ch. iii.

To bite off more than one can chew. To undertake more than one is capable of doing, or seeing through.

To bite one's thumb at another. To insult or defy by putting the thumbnail into the mouth and clicking it against the teeth. Why this should be so provocative is not clear.

Gregory: I will frown as I pass by; and let them take it as they list.

Sampson: Nay, as they dare. I will bite my thumb at them: which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it.

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, i.

To bite the dust, or the ground. To fall, or be struck off one's horse, hence to be slain. The phrase "another Redskin bit the dust", derived from fabulous Western stories, was popularized in World War II, especially in R.A.F. circles.

To bite the lip, indicative of suppressed chagrin, passion, or annoyance.

To bite upon the bridle. To champ the bit, like an impatient or restless horse.

Bit. To bitt the cable is to pass a bight of chain over the bitts, thus securing the cable. Bitts are now usually cast-iron bollards fitted on the foredeck, in small vessels often wooden posts.

Bitter end, The. À outrance, with relentless hostility; also applied to affliction, as "she bore it to the bitter end", meaning to the last stroke of adverse fortune. The end of the cable or last link is secured to the bitts to prevent the cable being lost overboard—this is the "bitter end".

A Bitter is but the turne of a Cable about the bitts, and weare it out by litle and litle. And the Bitters end is that part of the Cable doth stay within boord.

CAPT. SMITH: Seaman's Grammar, 1627.

In the Bible, Proverbs v, 4, reads: "But her end is bitter as wormwood." This may have some share in the present use of this phrase.

Bittock. A little bit: -ock as diminutive is preserved in bullock, hillock, buttock, etc. "A mile and a bittock" is a mile and a little bit.

Black. See COLOURS for its symbolism. Its use for mourning was a Roman custom (Juvenal, x, 245), borrowed from the Egyptians. At funerals mutes who wore black cloaks were sometimes known as the blacks, and sometimes as Black Guards. See BLACKGUARDS.

I do pray ye

To give me leave to live a litle longer.

You stand about me like my Blacks.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER: Monsieur Thomas, III, i.

In several of the Oriental nations it is a badge of servitude, slavery and low birth. Our word blackguard seems to point to this meaning, and the Lat. niger, black, also meant bad, impropitious.

Beaten black and blue. A very severe beating when the skin is bruised black and blue.

Black as a crow, etc. Among the common similes used to denote "blackness" are black as a crow, a RAVEN, a raven's wing, ink, HELL, HADES, death, the grave, your hat, thunder or a thundercloud, Egypt's night, a NEWGATE KNOCKER, ebony, coal, pitch, soot, tar, etc. Most of these are self-explanatory.

Black in the face. Extremely angry. The face being discoloured with passion or distress.

Mr. Winkle pulled . . . till he was black in the face.—DICKENS, Pickwick Papers.

He swore himself black in the face.

PETER PINDAR.

I must have it in black and white, i.e. in writing; the paper being white and the ink black.

To say black's his eye, i.e. to vituperate, to blame. Black's the white of his eye is a modern variant. To say the eye is black or evil is to accuse a person of an evil heart or great ignorance.

I can say black's your eye though it be grey. I have connived at this.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER: Love's Cure, II, i.

To swear black is white. To swear to any falsehood no matter how glaring.

All Blacks, The. New Zealand's Rugby XV which first played in England in 1905.

Black and Tans. The name of a pack of hounds in County Limerick, applied to the irregulars enlisted by the British government in 1920 to supplement the Royal Irish Constabulary. This notorious force was so called for their original uniform of army khaki with the black belts and dark-green caps of the R.I.C.

Black Act. An Act of 1722 (9 Geo. I, c. 22) imposing the death penalty for certain offences against the Game Laws, and specially directed against the Waltham deer-stealers who blackened their faces and, under the name of Blacks, carried out their depredations in Epping Forest. Dick TURPIN was a member of such a gang at the outset of his career. This Act was repealed in 1827.

Blackamoor. Washing the blackamoor white—i.e. engaged upon a hopeless and useless task. The allusion is to one of ÆSOP'S FABLES of that name.

Black Assize. 6 July 1577, when a putrid pestilence broke out at Oxford and the SHERIFF and a large number of gentry died during the Assize.

Black-balled. Not admitted to, or rejected by a club or suchlike. In the BALLOT those who accepted a candidate dropped a red or white ball into the box, those rejecting dropped a black one.

Blackbirds. Slang for negro slaves or indentured labourers. Hence blackbirding, capturing or trafficking in slaves. Cp. BLACK CATTLE.

Blackboard Jungle, The. Downtown schools in which delinquency is rife and discipline is difficult to impose. The name is taken from the title of a novel by Evan Hunter published in 1954 and filmed in 1955, based on a New York school, which was a savage indictment of certain aspects of the American state educational system.

Black Book. Perhaps the most important bearing this title are: (1) The Black Book of the Admiralty, a 14th-century collection of maritime law; (2) The Black Book of the Exchequer, an official account of royal revenues, payments, perquisites, etc., in the reign of Henry II; (3) The Black Book of the Household, purporting to deal with court customs of the reign of Edward III; (4) The earliest records of LINCOLN'S INN (dating from 1422) are called Black Books; (5) The reports presented to Parliament in 1536 prior to the dissolution of the monasteries are collectively termed the Black Book; (6) The Black Book (1820) and the Extraordinary Black Book (1831), which set out to expose the abuses in Church and State of those times.

Black books. To be in my black books. Out of favour, in disgrace. A black book is one recording the names of those who are in disgrace or have merited punishment. Amhurst, in his Terrae Filius, or the Secret History of the University of Oxford (1726), speaks of the PROCTOR'S black book, and tells us that no one can proceed to a degree whose name is found there.

Black Brunswickers. A corps of 700 volunteer hussars commanded by Frederick William, Duke of Brunswick, who had been deprived of his father's dukedom by NAPOLEON. They were called "Black" from their uniform.

Black Canons. The AUGUSTINIANS, from their black cloaks.

Black cap. A small square of black cloth. In Britain it was worn by a judge when passing the death sentence; it is part of a judge's full dress and is also worn on 9 November, when the new Lord Mayor of London takes the oath at the Law Courts. Covering the head was a sign of mourning among the Israelites, Greeks, Romans, and Anglo-Saxons. Cp. II Sam. xv, 30.

Black Cattle. Negro slaves. Cp. BLACK-BIRDS, BLACK IVORY, and see BLACK OX.

Black Country, The. The crowded manufacturing district of the Midlands of which Birmingham is the centre. It includes Wolverhampton, Walsall, Red-ditch, etc., and has been blackened by its many coal mines, ironworks and its factory smoke.

Black Death. A form of bubonic plague which ravaged Europe in 1348-1351. Black spots formed on the body and death followed rapidly. It reached England in 1348 and probably carried off one-eighth of the population. It re-occurred subsequently in 1361-1362 and 1379. Its effects in Africa and Asia were probably worse than in Europe.

Black Diamonds. Coal. Coal and diamonds are both forms of carbon. Truffles are also called black diamonds.

Black Dick. Richard, Earl Howe (1726-1799), British admiral and victor of the Battle of the First of June, 1794. So called from his swarthy complexion.

Black Dog. See DOG. A common name in 18th century for a counterfeit silver coin made of pewter double-washed.

Black Doll. The sign of a MARINE STORE. The doll was a dummy dressed to indicate that cast-off garments were bought. See DOLLY SHOP.

Black Douglas. See DOUGLAS.

Blackfellows. Australian aborigines are so called, although their complexion is but a dark coffee colour.

Black Flag. The pirate's flag; the JOLLY ROGER. A black flag was formerly hoisted over a prison immediately after an execution.

Chinese mercenaries who opposed the French in Tongkin in the 1880s were known as the Black Flags, as also were the troops of the CALIPH of Baghdad, because his banner, that of the ABASSIDES, was black. It is said that the black curtain which hung before the door of AYESHAH was taken for a national flag.

Blackfoot. A Scottish term for a match-maker, or an intermediary in love affairs; if he chanced to play traitor he was called a whitefoot. Also the name of one of the Irish agrarian secret societies of the early 19th century.

And the Blackfoot who courted each foeman's approach,
Faith! 'tis hot-foot he'd fly from the stout Father Roach.

LOVER.

Blackfeet. The popular name of two North American Indian tribes, one an Algonquin nation calling themselves the Silksika, and the other, the Sihasapa.

Black Friars. The DOMINICAN Friars, from their black mantle. The district of this name is on the site of the former Dominican monastery.

Black Friday. Notably (1) 6 December 1745, the day on which the news arrived in London that the Young PRETENDER had reached Derby; (2) 11 May 1866, when widespread financial panic was caused by Overend, Gurney and Co., the bankers, suspending payments; (3) 15 April 1921 was Black Friday for the British Labour Movement when the threatened General Strike was cancelled; (4) in the U.S.A., 24 September 1869, when the many speculators were ruined by the Government's release of gold into the open market in order to bring down the price, which had been forced up by stock manipulators. See also RED FRIDAY

Black Game. Heath-Fowl; in contradistinction to red game, as grouse. The male bird is called a black cock.

Black Genevan. A black preaching gown formerly used in many Anglican churches and still used by NONCONFORMISTS. So called from Geneva, where Calvin preached in such a robe.

Blackguards. The origin of this term, long applied to rogues and scoundrels, is uncertain. In the 16th and 17th centuries it was applied to lowest menials in great houses, army hangers-on, scullions, camp-followers, etc. It was also given to the link-boys and torch-bearers at funerals. A proclamation of 1683 in the Lord Steward's office reads:

Whereas . . . a sort of vicious, idle, and masterless boyes and rogues, commonly called the Black guard, with divers other lewd and loose fellows . . . do usually haunt and follow the court . . .

Black Hand. The popular name of the Slav secret society largely responsible for contriving the assassination of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand in Sarajevo, 28 June 1914. This was the event which precipitated World War I. Also a criminal society, once active in New York, largely made up of Italians.

Blackheath. A district of S.E. London once the haunt of footpads and highwaymen. The followers of Wat Tyler in 1381 and Jack CADE in 1450 assembled there. Here also the Londoners welcomed Henry V after Agincourt and Charles II met the army on his way to London in 1660.

Black Hole of Calcutta (20–21 June 1756). Surajah Dowlah, Nawab of Bengal, thoughtlessly confined 146 British prisoners, including one woman, in the small prison (eighteen feet by fourteen feet ten inches) of the East India Company's Fort William, after its capture. Only 22 men and the woman escaped suffocation in the Black Hole.

The punishment cell in barracks, etc., is often nicknamed the "Black Hole" and very dark stuffy places are often likened to the Black Hole of Calcutta.

Black Horse. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Black Ivory. Negro slaves from Africa.

Black jack. A large leather GOTCH, or can for beer, so called from the outside being tarred.

He hath not pledged one cup, but looked most wickedly

Upon good Malaga; flies to the black-jack still,
And sticks to small drink like a water-rat.

MIDDLETON: The Witch, I, i.

Cornish miners called blende or sulphide of zinc "Black Jack", the occurrence of which was considered a favourable indication. Hence the saying Black Jack rides a good horse, the blende rides upon a lode of good ore.

A blackjack is a small club or cosh, usually leather covered; and the American scrub oak is called Black Jack.

The nickname Black Jack was given to the American General J. A. Logan (1826–1886) on account of his dark complexion and hair, and to General Pershing (1860–1948) who commanded the Americans in World War I.

Blacklead. See MISNOMERS.

Black-leg. An old name for a swindler, especially at cards or races; now almost solely used for a non-union member who works for less than trade-union rates, or especially one who works during a strike.

Black letter. Gothic or German type, which in the early days of printing was the most commonly used. The term dates from c. 1600 because of its heavy black appearance in comparison with roman type.

Black letter day. An unlucky day. The allusion is to the old liturgical calendars in which saints' days and festivals were distinguished by being printed in red. See RED LETTER. The Romans marked the unlucky days with a piece of charcoal, and their lucky ones with white chalk.

Black list. A list of those in disgrace, or who have incurred censure or punishment; a list of bankrupts for the private guidance of the mercantile community. Cp. BLACK BOOKS.

Black looks. Looks of displeasure.

Blackmail. "Mail" here is the Old English and Scottish word meaning rent, tax, or tribute. In Scotland mails and duties are rents of an estate in money or otherwise. Blackmail was originally a tribute paid by the BORDER farmers to FREEBOOTERS in return for protection or immunity from molestation. Hence payment extorted by intimidation or threat, or extractions and exorbitant charges.

Black Maria. The police van used for the conveyance of prisoners. It is suggested that the name is derived from that of Maria Lee, a Boston negress who kept a lodging-house. She was of such great size that when the police required help they sent for Black Maria, who soon collared the refractory men and led them to the lock-up.

Black market. A World War II phrase to describe illicit dealing in rationed goods. See UNDER THE COUNTER.

Black Mass. A sacrilegious MASS in which the DEVIL is invoked in place of God and various obscene rites performed in ridicule of the proper ceremony. See MEDMENHAM MONKS.

It is also a REQUIEM Mass from the custom of wearing black vestments.

Black Monday. Supposedly Easter Monday, 14 April 1360, when Edward III was besieging Paris. The day was so dark, windy and bitterly cold that many men and horses died. In fact 14 April 1360, fell on the Tuesday of the week after Easter. The Monday after Easter Monday is called "Black Monday" in allusion to this fatal day.

In Melbourne, 27 February 1865, was so called from a terrible wind from the N.N.W. which caused dreadful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemaine.

Black money. See BLACK DOG.

Black Monks. The BENEDICTINES.

Black Nell. Wild Bill Hickok's famous mare. See DEAD MAN'S HAND.

Black-out. From the outbreak of war against Germany (3 September 1939) until 23 April, 1945, (coastal areas, 11 May), it was obligatory throughout Great Britain to cover all windows, skylights, etc., before dark so that no gleam of light could be seen from outside. Moving vehicles were only allowed the dimmest of lights. This essential air raid precaution was called the Black-out.

Black ox. The black ox has trod on his foot, i.e. misfortune has come to him.

Black oxen were sacrificed to PLUTO and other infernal deities.

Black Parliament. A name given to the REFORMATION Parliament (1529–1536) which effected the breach with ROME.

Black Pope. The General of the JESUITS.
Black Prince. Edward, Prince of Wales (1330–1376), eldest son of Edward III. He is popularly supposed to be named from wearing black armour, but there is no evidence for this. Froissart says he was “styled black by terror of his arms” (c. 169). The name does not appear to have been used before the latter part of the 16th century and first appeared in writing in 1569.

Brave Gaunt, thy father and myself
 Rescued the Black Prince, that young Mars of men,
 From forth the ranks of many thousand French.

SHAKESPEARE: Richard II, II, iii.

Black Rod. The short title of the “Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod”, named from his staff of office—a black wand surmounted by a gold lion. He is responsible for maintaining order in the HOUSE OF LORDS and summoning the Commons to the Peers when the royal assent is given to bills, etc. He is also chief gentleman usher to the sovereign and usher to the order of the GARTER.

Black Rood of Scotland. The “piece of the true cross” or ROOD, set in an ebony crucifix, which St. MARGARET, wife of King Malcolm Canmore, left to the Scottish nation in 1093. It fell into English hands at the battle of Neville’s Cross (1346) and was kept in Durham Cathedral until the REFORMATION when it was lost.

Black Russia. Central and southern Russia, from the black soil.

Blacks, The. See BLACK HORSE, under REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES; BIANCHI.

Black Saturday. In Scotland 4 August 1621, because a violent storm occurred at the very moment the PARLIAMENT was sitting to force EPISCOPACY upon the people.

Black Sea, The. Formerly called the EUXINE and probably given its present name by the Turks, possibly from its dangers and lack of shelter.

Black sheep. A disgrace to the family or community; a mauvais sujet. Black sheep are not as valuable as white and are disliked by some shepherds. Cp. BÊTE NOIRE.

Black Shirts. The distinguishing garment worn by Mussolini’s Italian FASCISTS and adopted in England by their imitators. Also a name for the German s.s. or Schutzstaffeln, led by Himmler. See BROWNSHIRTS.

Blacksmith. A smith who works in black metal (such as iron). See HARMONIOUS; LEARNED.

Black Stone. The famous stone kissed by every pilgrim to the KAABA at MECCA. Moslems say that it was white when it fell from heaven but it turned black because of the sins of mankind. The stone was worshipped centuries before MOHAMMED. In Persian legend it was an emblem of SATURN.

Black strap. Bad port wine. A sailor’s name for any bad liquor. In North America it is a mixture of rum and molasses, and sometimes with vinegar added.

The seething blackstrap was pronounced ready for use.—PINKERTON: Molly Maguires (1882).

Black Swan. See RARA AVIS.

Blackthorn winter. The cold weather, which frequently occurs when the blackthorn is in blossom. See ICE SAINTS; PEEWIT’S PINCH.

Black Thursday. In Australia 6 February 1851, from a terrible bush fire which occurred in Victoria.

Black Tom. The 10th Earl of Ormonde (1532–1614), Lord High Treasurer of Ireland, from his ungracious ways and “black looks”.

Black Tom Tyrant. Thomas Wentworth (1593–1641), Earl of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, from his policies in support of Charles I.

Black velvet. A drink of champagne and Guinness in equal parts. It was the favourite drink of Bismarck, the IRON CHANCELLOR.

Black Watch. Originally companies employed from 1729 by the English Government to watch the HIGHLANDS and to enforce the Disarming Act, and recruited from the WHIG clans. Named Black Watch from their dark tartan, they were enrolled under the Earl of Crawford as the 42nd Regiment in 1739, later the Royal Highland Regiment. They are distinguished by the red hackle (small group of red feathers) on their bonnets.

Blade. A knowing blade, a sharp fellow; a regular blade, a BUCK or fop. Originally the word conveyed a sense of somewhat bullying bravado, and probably the name arose from the sword a swaggering buck would carry.

Bladud (blā’ dūđ). A mythical English king, father of King LEAR. According to Geoffrey of Monmouth he built Bath and dedicated the medicinal springs to MINERVA, studied magic, and was dashed to pieces when he fell into the temple of APOLLO whilst trying to fly.

Blanch, To. A method of testing the quality of money paid in taxes to the King, used by Roger of Salisbury in the reign of Henry I. 44 shillings' worth of SILVER coin was taken from the amount being paid in, a pound's weight of it was melted down and the impurities were skimmed off. If then found to be light, the taxpayer had to throw in enough pennies to balance the scale.

Blanchefleur (blonsh' flêr). The heroine of the Old French metrical romance, Flore et Blanchefleur, used by Boccaccio for his prose romance, Il Filocolo. It is substantially the same as that of Dianora and Ansaldo in the DECAMERON and that of DORIGEN and Aurelius by Chaucer. The tale is of a young Christian prince who is in love with the SARACEN slave-girl with whom he has been brought up. They are parted, but after many adventures he rescues her unharmed from the harem of the Emir of Babylon.

Blank. To draw blank. See DRAW.

Blank cartridge. Cartridge with powder only, without shot, bullet, or ball; used in drill and saluting. Thus figuratively, empty threats.

Blank cheque. A signed cheque, leaving the amount to be filled in by the payee. Thus to give a blank cheque is, figuratively, to give CARTE BLANCHE.

Blank verse. Rhymeless verse in continuous decasyllables with IAMBIC or trochaic rhythm, first used in English by the Earl of Surrey about 1540 in his version of Books II and IV of the ÆNEID. There is other unrhymed verse, but it is not usual to extend to such poems as Collins's Ode to Evening, Whitman's Leaves of Grass, or the vers libre of today, the name of blank verse.

Blanket. To be born on the wrong side of the blanket. To be illegitimate.

A wet blanket. A discouragement; a MARPLOT or spoilsport. A person who discourages a proposed scheme is a wet blanket. A wet blanket smothers fire and has a dampening effect.

Blanketeers. The starving handloom weavers and spinners who assembled in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, 10 March 1817, each equipped with a blanket for their march to London to present a petition to the Prince Regent. Only a few reached Macclesfield after intimidation from the authorities, and no organized marchers got farther than Derby.

Blarney. Soft wheedling speeches to gain some end; flattery or lying with unblushing effrontery. Legend has it that Cormac MacCarthy in 1602 undertook to surrender

Blarney Castle (near Cork) to the English, as part of an armistice. Daily the Lord President Carew looked for the fulfilment of the terms, but received nothing but soft speeches, till he became the laughing-stock of Elizabeth's ministers, and the dupe of the Lord of Blarney.

Among American criminals "to blarney" means to pick locks.

To kiss the Blarney Stone. In the wall of Blarney Castle about twenty feet from the top and difficult of access is a triangular stone inscribed, "Cormac MacCarthy fortis me fieri fecit, A.D. 1446". Tradition says that whoever kisses it is endowed with wonderful powers of cajolery. As it is almost impossible to reach, a substitute has been provided, which is said to be as effective as the original.

Blasphemous Balfour. Sir James Balfour (d. 1583), Scottish judge, was so called for his apostasy. He "served with all parties, deserted all, and yet profited by all".

Blast. To strike by lightning; to cause to wither, e.g. the "blasted oak". This is the sense in which the word is used as an expletive.

In full blast. In full swing, all out. "The speakers at MARBLE ARCH on Sunday were in full blast." A METAPHOR from the blast furnace in full operation.

Blatant Beast. In Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bks. V, VI) "a dreadful fiend of gods and men, ydrad"; the type of calumny or slander. He was born of CERBERUS and CHIMÆRA, and had a hundred tongues and a sting; with his tongues he speaks things "most shameful, most unrighteous, most untrue"; and with his sting "steeps them in poison". Sir CALIDORE muzzled him and drew him with a chain to Fairyland but the beast escaped. The word blatant seems to have been coined by Spenser and is probably from the provincial word blate, to bellow.

Blayney's Bloodhounds. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Blaze (Icel. blesi). A white star on the forehead of a horse. Hence a white mark made on a tree by chipping off a piece of bark. It is not connected with the blaze of a fire.

To blaze a trail. To notch trees as a guide. The white wood revealed is called a blaze and in America trees so marked are called blazed trees.

To blaze abroad (Icel. blasa, to blow), to noise abroad.

... and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter. Mark, i, 45.

Blazer. Originally a brightly coloured jacket used in boating, CRICKET, etc. These are now often called sports blazers to distinguish them from the more sober styles used as everyday wear by students, schoolchildren, etc.

A blazer is the red flannel boating jacket worn by the Lady Margaret, St. John's College, Cambridge Boat Club.—Daily News, 22 August 1889.

It has been suggested that the name derives from H.M.S. Blazer whose captain, in 1845, dressed his ship's company in somewhat striking blue and white striped jerseys.

Blazes. Go to blazes. Go to HELL. Here the word is from O.E. blaese, a torch.

Bleed. To bleed someone white is to extort the uttermost farthing from them. Money is the life-blood of commerce.

It makes my heart bleed. It makes me very sorrowful.

Bleeding of a dead body. It was once believed that at the approach of a murderer, the blood of the murdered body gushed out. If there was the slightest change observable in the eyes, mouth, feet, or hands of a corpse the murderer was supposed to be present.

Bleeding the monkey. The same as Sucking the Monkey. See MONKEY.

Blefuscu (ble fūs' kū). An island in Swift's Gulliver's Travels. In describing it he satirized France.

Blemmyes (blem' iz). An ancient Ethiopian tribe mentioned by Roman writers as inhabiting Nubia and Upper Egypt. They were fabled to have no head, their eyes and mouth being placed in the breast. Cp. ACEPHALITES; CAORA.

Blenheim Palace (blen' im). This mansion, given to the Duke of Marlborough for his great victory over the French at Blenheim (1704), has given its name to the Blenheim spaniel, and to a golden-coloured apple, the Blenheim Orange.

Blenheim Steps. Going to Blenheim Steps meant going to be dissected, or unearthed from one's grave. Sir Astley Cooper (1768-1841), the great surgeon, presided over an anatomical school at Blenheim Steps, Bond Street. Here "RESURRECTIONISTS" were sure to find a ready mart for their gruesome wares.

The body-snatchers, they have come,
And made a snatch at me;
'Tis very hard them kind of men
Won't let a body be.
The cock it crows—I must be gone—
My William we must part;
But I'll be yours in death although
Sir Astley has my heart.

HOOD: Mary's Ghost.

Bless. He has not a sixpence to bless himself with, i.e. in his possession; wherewith to make himself happy. Perhaps this expression goes back to the time when coins were marked by a deeply indented cross. Crossing the palm with silver is still practised by gipsies as a sign of good luck.

Blessing with three fingers in Christian churches is symbolical of the TRINITY.

Blest. I'll be blest if I do it. I will not do it. A EUPHEMISM for damned.

Blighty. Soldier's name for England or the homeland widely current in World War I, but was well known to soldiers who had served in India long before. It is the Hind. bilayati, foreign, from Arab. wilayet, meaning "provincial", "removed at some distance"; hence adopted by the military for England.

Blimp. A word originally applied to an observation balloon in World War I. "Colonel Blimp" was created by David Low, the cartoonist, between the wars, to embody the elderly dyed-in-the-wool Tory, opposing all and any change. A blimp has come to mean an elderly, unprogressive, reactionary "gentleman" of somewhat limited intelligence.

Blind. A pretence; something ostensible to conceal a covert design. The METAPHOR is from window-blinds, which prevent outsiders from seeing in.

Blind Alley, A. A cul-de-sac. It is blind because it has no "eye" or passage through it. "A blind alley occupation" is one that leads nowhere; there are no prospects of promotion.

Blind as a bat, or beetle, or mole, or owl. Blind, with very poor sight. None of these creatures is actually blind. The phrase is often used sarcastically of one who is unable to see what is under his nose.

Trust a woman for being as blind as a bat when she won't see.

KIPLING: The Story of the Gadsbys
(The Tents of Kedar).

Blind Department, The. In Post Office parlance, the Returned Letter Office (formerly Dead Letter Office), the department where efforts are made to trace the proper destination of inaccurately or illegibly addressed mail. The clerk in charge was called the "Blind Man". Dr. Brewer had one delivered from France addressed "A Mons. E. Cobham, brasseur, Angleterre".

Blind ditch. One which cannot be seen. Here blind means concealed, obscure.

Blind drunk. Very drunk, so drunk as to be unable to distinguish things clearly.

Blind Half-hundred, The. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Blind Harper, The. John Parry, who died in 1782. He lived at Ruabon, and published collections of Welsh music.

Blind Harry. A Scottish minstrel who died c.1492 and left in MS. an epic of 11,858 lines on Sir William Wallace.

Blind Hedge. A ha-ha, Milton used the word blind for concealed, as "In the blind mazes of this tangled wood" (Comus, line 181).

Blind leaders of the blind. Those who give advice to others or who take the lead but who are unfitted to do so, or incapable themselves. The allusion is to Matt. xv, 14.

Blind Magistrate, The. Sir John Fielding (1722-1780), Bow Street Magistrate, blinded in his youth, was reputed to know countless thieves by their voices.

Blind Man. See BLIND DEPARTMENT.

Blindman's buff. A very old-established children's game. "Buff" here is short for "buffet", and is an allusion to the three buffs or pats which the "blind man" gets when he has caught a player.

Blindman's holiday. The hour of dusk when it is too dark to work, and too soon to light candles. The phrase was in common use at least as early as the 16th century.

What will not blind Cupid doe in the night, which is his blindman's holiday.

T. NASHE: Lenten Stuffe (1599).

Blindmen's Dinner, The. A dinner unpaid for, the landlord being the victim. EULENSPIEGEL, being asked for alms by twelve blind men, said "Go to the inn; eat, drink and be merry, my men; and here are twenty florins to pay the bill." They thanked him, each supposing one of the others had received the money. After having provided them with food and drink at the inn, the landlord asked for payment, whereupon they all said, "Let him who received the money pay for the dinner." But none had received a penny.

Blind spot. This is a small area not sensitive to light, situated on the retina where the optic nerve enters the eye. The term is used figuratively to denote some area in one's understanding where judgment and perception are always lacking.

To go it blind. To enter upon some project without sufficient forethought, inquiry, or preparation.

To turn a blind eye. To pretend tactfully not to see; to ignore, in order to avoid embarrassment to all concerned.

When the devil is blind. A circumlocution for NEVER.

You came on his blind side. His tender-hearted side. He yielded because he was not wide awake to his own interest. Said of persons who wheedle some favour out of another.

Block. To block a bill. In parliamentary language means to postpone or prevent the passage of a bill by giving notice of opposition, thus preventing its being taken after ten o'clock at night.

A chip of the old block. See CHIP.

To cut blocks with a razor. See CUT.

Block books. Late mediæval books printed from wood-blocks in which both text and illustrations (if any) were carved in relief. The impression was taken by laying the paper on the block moistened with a brown or grey water-based ink and rubbing the verso by hand with a cloth, though some later block-books were produced with black oil-based printer's ink in a press. As the water-based ink tended to soak through the paper, impressions were generally taken on one side of the leaf only. The most important block books were pictorial works of devotion, such as the BIBLIA PAUPERUM, Ars Moriendi, Apocalypse, et al., but the same method was also used for printing various scientific works, Latin grammars, etc., with or without illustrations. Although there are references in earlier documents which might possibly imply that such books were current several decades before the invention of printing from movable type (c. 1450), the earliest of the surviving block books dates from the early 1450s, most of the remainder from the 1460s and 1470s, and a few from as late as the 1520s.

Blockhead. A stupid person; brainless. The allusion is to a wig-maker's dummy or tête à perruque.

Nay, your wit will not so soon out as another man's will—'tis strongly wedged up in a blockhead.—SHAKESPEARE: Coriolanus, II, iii.

Blockhouses. The oldest Negro Regiment in the U.S. Army, nicknamed from its gallant assault on a blockhouse in the Spanish-American War.

Blondin (blon'din). One of the most famous acrobats of all time. Born at St. Omer in 1824, his real name was Jean François Gravelet; he died at Ealing in 1897. His greatest feat was in 1859, when he crossed the Niagara Falls on a tight-rope, embellishing the performance by repeating it blindfolded, wheeling a barrow, twirling an umbrella, and carrying a man on his back. He made a fortune by this feat and soon after settled in England, where he gave performances until old age forced him to retire.

Blood. In figurative use came to denote members of the same family or race, family descent generally, and thence one of noble or gentle birth, finally a BUCK or aristocratic rowdy.

The gallants of those days pretty much resembled the bloods of ours.
GOLDSMITH: Reverie at the Boar's Head Tavern.

It also denotes royalty as in the phrase "a prince of the blood", and the once popular "PENNY DREADFULS".

A blood horse. A thoroughbred; a horse of good parentage or stock.

A prince of the blood. One of a royal family.

Bad blood. Anger, etc., as, It stirs up bad blood. It provokes ill-feeling and resentment.

Blood and Guts. Nickname given by the soldiers in World War II to the American General George Smith Patton (1885-1945). Also a disrespectful term for the RED ENSIGN.

Blood and iron policy. A policy requiring war as its instrument. The phrase was coined by Bismarck in 1886.

Blood and thunder. Melodrama, sensational and blood-curdling stuff.

Bloodhound. Figuratively, one who follows up someone or something with real pertinacity.

Blood is thicker than water. Relationship has a claim which is generally acknowledged. It is better to seek kindness from a kinsman than from a stranger. The interest we take in a stranger is thinner and more evanescent than that which we take in a blood relation.

Blood money. Money paid to a person for giving such evidence as shall lead to the conviction of another; or for the betrayal of another, as JUDAS was paid for his betrayal of Jesus. Also at one time money paid to the next of kin as compensation for the murder of his relative or to induce him to forgo his "right" of seeking for blood.

Blood relation. One in direct descent from the same father or mother; one of the same family stock.

Blood Royal. The royal family or royalty; also called "the blood".

Bloodstone. See HELIOTROPE.

Bloodsucker. A leech-like animal which, if allowed, will rob a person of all vitality. Hence a sponger, a parasite, an extortioner.

Blood, toil, tears and sweat. The words used by Sir Winston Churchill in his speech to the HOUSE OF COMMONS, on becoming Prime Minister, 13 May 1940. "I would say to the House, as I have said to those who have joined this Government. I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears and sweat." In his Anatomie of the World, John Donne, says, "Mollifie it with thy teares, or sweat, or blood", and Byron has,

Year after year they voted cent per cent,
Blood, sweat, and tear-wrung millions—why?
for rent!

The Age of Bronze, xiv, 54.

Blue blood. See BLUE.

In cold blood. Deliberately; not in the excitement of passion or battle.

It makes one's blood boil. It provokes indignation and anger.

It runs in the blood. It is inherited or is characteristic of the family or race.

Laws written in blood. Demades said that the laws of Draco were written in blood, because every offence was punishable by death. See DRACONIAN CODE.

Man of Blood. Any man of violent temper. David was so called in II Sam. xvi, 7 (REVISED VERSION), and the PURITANS applied the term to Charles I.

My own flesh and blood. My own children, my own brothers and sisters, or other near kindred.

The Blood of the Grograms. TAFFETA gentility; make-believe aristocratic blood. Grogram is a coarse silk taffeta stiffened with gum (Fr. gros grain).

Our first tragedian was always boasting of his being "an old actor", and was full of the blood of the Grograms.

C. THOMSON: Autobiography, p. 200.

The Field of Blood. ACELDAMA, the piece of ground purchased with the blood-money of our Saviour.

The battlefield of CANNÆ, where Hannibal defeated the Romans, 216 B.C., is also so called.

Young blood. Young members; as, "To bring young blood into the concern." The term with the article, "a young blood", signifies a young RIP, a young aristocrat of convivial habits.

Bloody. Several fanciful derivations are suggested for this expletive, that it is a corruption of "By our Lady", or associated with "bloods" or aristocratic rowdies; but the obvious meaning of the word with its unpleasant and lurid associations is a sufficient explanation of its origin and its use as an intensive.

It was bloody hot walking today.

SWIFT: Journal to Stella, letter xxii.

As a title the adjective has been bestowed on Otto II, Holy Roman Emperor (973-983) and Queen Mary Tudor (1553-1558) was called "Bloody Mary" from the persecution of PROTESTANTS during her reign.

Bloody Angle. A section of the battlefield of Spottsylvania Court House, Virginia, where on 11 and 12 May 1864 the armies of Grant and Lee fought one of the bloodiest encounters of the CIVIL WAR.

Bloody Assizes. The Assizes conducted in the western circuit under Judge Jeffreys after MONMOUTH'S REBELLION, 1685. Named from the brutality, severity, and unfairness of the proceedings.

Bloody Balfour. In 1887, when A. J. Balfour became Chief Secretary for Ireland, the police fired on a riotous mass meeting at Mitchelstown, County Cork, occasioned by the prosecution of a nationalist leader, William O'Brien. Three people were killed. As a consequence of Balfour's resolute support of authority the nickname Bloody Balfour soon became current in Ireland. The meeting in Trafalgar Square on BLOODY SUNDAY was held to protest against O'Brien's imprisonment.

Bloody Bill, The. Better known as the Act of the SIX ARTICLES (31 Henry VIII, c. 14), it made the denial of TRANSUBSTANTIATION a heresy punishable by death.

Bloody-bones. A HOBGOBLIN; generally "RAW-HEAD and Bloody-bones".

Bloody Eleventh. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Bloody Hand. A term in Old Forest Law denoting a man whose hand was bloody, and who was therefore presumed to be the one guilty of killing the deer. In HERALDRY it is the badge of a BARONET and the armorial device of ULSTER. See HAND.

Bloody Pots, The. See KIRK OF SKULLS.

Bloody Sunday. (1) 13 November 1887. The dispersal of a socialist demonstration in Trafalgar Square which had been prohibited by the Commissioner of Police led to baton charges being made, Footguards and Life Guards being brought in, and the arrest of two M.P.s, R. Cunningham-Graham and John Burns. Two of the crowd died of injuries. (2) 22 January 1905. A deputation of workers led by Father Gapon marched to St. Petersburg to present a petition to the Czar. They were attacked by troops and hundreds of unarmed peasants were killed.

Bloody Thursday. The Thursday in the first week in LENT, that is, the day after ASH WEDNESDAY, used to be so called.

Bloody Wedding. The massacre of St. BARTHOLOMEW in 1572 is so called because it took place during the marriage celebrations of Henry of Navarre and Margaret de Valois, daughter of Catherine de' Medici.

Bloomers. Originally a female costume consisting of jacket, skirt and Turkish trousers gathered closely round the ankles, introduced by Mrs. Amelia Bloomer of New York in 1849. Associated with the Woman's Rights Movement, the outfit met with little success. Nowadays "bloomers" is applied to the trousers portion of the outfit, or drawers.

Blooming. A meaningless EUPHEMISM for BLOODY.

Bloomsbury Group. The name given to a group of friends of intellectual distinction who met at two houses in Bloomsbury, where the son and daughter (Virginia) of Leslie Stephen, lived. Virginia married Leonard Woolf, one of the circle, which included J. M. Keynes, G. Lytton Strachey, E. M. Forster, and David Garnett, the latter three having been contemporaries at Cambridge. The group was prominent from about 1904 until World War II.

Blot. To blot one's copybook. See COPYBOOK.

Blow. This represents three words of different origin: (1) To move as a current of air, to send a current of air from the mouth, etc., from the O.E. blawan, cognate with the Mod.Ger. blahen and Lat. flare.

A blow out. A "tuck in" or feast which swells out the paunch. Also the sudden collapse of a pneumatic tyre when the inner tube is punctured.

Blow me tight. An expletive.

If there's a soul, will give me food, or find me in employ,

By day or night, then blow me tight! (he was a vulgar boy).

R. H. BARHAM: Ingoldsby Legends: Misadventures at Margate.

Blown herrings. Herrings bloated, swollen or cured by smoking; another name for bloaters.

Blown upon. Blown upon by the breath of slander. His reputation has been blown upon means that he has been the subject of derogatory gossip. Cp. FLY-BLOWN.

Blow-point. A game similar to pea-shooting, only instead of peas small skewers of pointed wood were puffed through the tube. It is alluded to by Florio, Strutt and others.

Fly-blown. See under FLY.

It will soon blow over. It will soon cease to be talked about, as a gale blows over or ceases.

I will blow him (up) sky high. Give him a good scolding. The metaphor is from blasting by gunpowder.

To blow a cloud. To smoke a cigar, pipe, etc. This term dates from Elizabeth I's reign.

To blow a trumpet. To sound a trumpet, but to blow one's own trumpet is to go in for self-advertisement, to boast.

To blow great guns. Said of a wind that blows so violently that its noise resembles the roar of artillery.

To blow hot and cold. To be inconsistent, to be irresolute, unable to make up one's mind. The allusion is to the fable of a traveller who was entertained by a SATYR. Being cold the traveller blew his fingers to warm them, and afterwards blew his hot broth to cool it. The satyr, in great indignation turned him out of doors, because he blew both hot and cold with the same breath.

To blow off steam. To get rid of superfluous temper. The allusion is to the forcible escape of superfluous steam no longer required.

To blow one's top. To lose one's temper.

To blow the gaff. To let out a secret; to inform against a companion; to "peach". Here gaff is a variant of GAB.

To blow up. To inflate, to explode, to burst into fragments; to censure severely. See I WILL BLOW HIM UP (above).

You be blown. A mild imprecation or expletive.

Don't link yourself with vulgar folks, who've got no fixed abode,

Tell lies, use naughty words, and say "they wish they may be blow'd!"

R. H. BARHAM: Ingoldsby Legends: Misadventures at Margate.

(2) To blossom, to flourish, from O.E. blowan, cognate with bloom, Ger. blühen, and Lat. florere.

Full-blown. In full flower, hence fully developed or qualified. "He is a full-blown doctor now" means he is no longer a student but fully qualified to practise.

(3) A stroke with the fist, etc., probably from an old Dutch word blau, to strike.

At one blow. By one stroke.

The first blow is half the battle. Well begun is half done. PYTHAGORAS used to say: "the beginning is half the whole". "Incipe, Dimidium facti est cæpisse" (Ausonius). "Dimidium facti, qui cæpit, habet" (Horace). "Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte" (see under PREMIER).

Without striking a blow. Without coming to a contest.

Blowzelinda (blou ze lin' dâ). A common 18th-century name applied to a rustic girl.

Sweet is my toil when Blowzelind is near;
Of her bereft, 'tis winter all the year . . .
Come Blowzelinda, ease thy swain's desire,
My summer's shadow and my winter's fire.

GAY: Shepherd's Week, Pastoral, i.

A blowse was a ruddy fat-cheeked wench:

Sweet blowse you are a beauteous blossom, sure.
Titus Andronicus, Shakespeare: IV, ii.

Bluchers (bloo' kerz). Half-boots; named after the Prussian Field-Marshal von Blücher (1742-1819), of Waterloo fame. See WELLINGTON.

Bludger. (Austr). Originally (19th century) a pimp, but later any scrounger or one profiting without risk. In World War I to bludge on the flag meant to slack in the army.

Bludsoe, Jim. The hero of a poem by the American John M. Hay (1838-1905). Bludsoe was the engineer of a steamboat on the Mississippi who, when the vessel caught fire, sacrificed himself to save his passengers.

Blue, or AZURE. See COLOURS for its symbolism.

The COVENANTERS wore blue as their badge in opposition to the scarlet of royalty. They based their choice on Numb. ix, 38, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes on the borders of their garments . . . and that they put upon the fringe . . . a ribband of blue." It was one of the traditional Whig colours, also blue and buff. The LIBERAL colours are now blue and yellow, and the CONSERVATIVES blue. It was also the colour of the Unionists in the American CIVIL WAR; the CONFEDERATE colour was grey.

A blue, or a true blue, politically speaking usually means a TORY. Also at Oxford and Cambridge a blue is a man who has been chosen to represent his 'VARSITY in rowing, CRICKET, etc.

A dark blue. An Oxford man or Harrow boy.

A light blue. A Cambridge man or Eton boy.

A priest of the blue bag. A CANT name for a BARRISTER. See LAWYER'S BAGS.

Bluebeard. A BOGY, a murderous tyrant in Charles Perrault's Contes du Temps (1697). In this version Bluebeard goes on a journey leaving his new wife the keys of his castle, but forbidding her to enter one room. Curiosity overcomes her and she opens the door to find the bodies of all Bluebeard's former wives. On his return he finds a blood spot on the key which tells him of his wife's disobedience. He is about to cut off her head when her two brothers rush in and kill him. The tale is of an internationally widespread and ancient type and it is unprofitable to regard Gilles de Rais or Henry VIII as the historical Bluebeard.

Bluebeard's Key. When the bloodstain of this key was rubbed out on one side, it appeared on the other; so prodigality being overcome will appear in the form of meanness; and friends, over-fond, will often become enemies.

Blue beans. See under BEAN.

Blue Billy. See under BILLY.

Blue Bird of Happiness. This is an idea elaborated from Maeterlinck's play of that name, first produced in London in 1910. It tells the story of a boy and girl seeking "the blue bird" which typifies happiness.

Blue blood. High or noble birth or descent; it is of Spanish origin, from the fact that the veins of the pure-blooded Spanish aristocrat, whose race had suffered no Moorish admixture, were more blue than those of mixed ancestry.

Blue Boar. The cognizance of Richard III was a white boar and a popular inn sign. After his defeat at Bosworth, White Boars were changed into Blue Boars. See PUBLIC HOUSE SIGNS.

Blue Bonnets, or Blue Caps. The Highlanders of Scotland, or the Scots generally; from the blue woollen cap formerly in very general use in Scotland.

March, march Eskdale and Liddesdale,
All the Blue Bonnets are bound for the Border.
SCOTT: Border Ballad.

Blue Books. In Great Britain parliamentary reports and other official parliamentary publications. Each volume is in FOLIO with a blue cover. SHORT ACTS OF PARLIAMENT, etc., even without a wrapper, come under the same designation, Cp. WHITE PAPER.

Bluebottle. A constable, a policeman; also formerly an almsman, or anyone else whose distinctive dress was blue. Shakespeare makes Doll Tearsheet denounce the BEADLE as a "blue-bottle rogue".

I will have you as soundly swinged for this, you blue-bottle rogue.—Henry IV, Pt. II, v, 4.

Blue Caps. See BLUE BONNETS.

Blue-Coat School. Christ's Hospital is so called because the boys there wear a long blue coat girded at the loins with a leather belt. Formerly in the City of London, it moved to Horsham in 1902. There were other Charity schools so named; the building of the Westminster Blue-Coat School still remains although the funds were diverted in 1909 to Grey-Coat Hospital and the United Westminster Schools.

Blue-eyed Boy, The. The favourite, one highly thought of and shown preference or marks of favour.

Blue-eyed Maid. MINERVA, the goddess of wisdom, is so called by HOMER.

Now Prudence gently pulled the poet's ear,
And thus the daughter of the Blue-eyed Maid,
In flattery's soothing sounds, divinely said,
"O Peter, eldest-born of Phœbus, hear."

PETER PINDAR: A Falling Minister.

Blue gown. A harlot. Formerly a blue gown was a dress of ignominy for a prostitute who had been put in the HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

The bedesmen to whom the Scottish kings distributed certain alms were known as blue gowns from their dress of coarse blue cloth. The number of these bedesmen was equal to the king's years and they were privileged to ask alms throughout Scotland. See GABERLUNZIE.

Blue Hen's Chickens. The inhabitants of the State of Delaware. It is said that in the Revolutionary War, one Captain Caldwell, commander of a very efficient Delaware regiment, used to say that no cock could be truly game whose mother was not a blue hen. Hence his regiment became known as "Blue Hen's Chickens", and the name was transferred to the inhabitants generally.

Bluejackets. Sailors; named from the colour of their jackets.

Blue John. A blue fluorspar, found in the Blue John Mine near Castleton, Derbyshire; so called to distinguish it from BLACK JACK. Called John from John Kirk, a miner who first noticed it.

Blue laws. In the U.S.A. denotes laws such as SUMPTUARY LAWS and those regulating personal morals or interfering with personal freedom.

Blue-light Federalists. A name given to those Americans who were believed to have made friendly (blue-light) signals to British ships in the war of 1812.

Bluemantle. One of the four English PURSUIVANTS attached to the College of Arms or Heralds' College, so called from his official robe.

Blue Monday. The Monday before LENT, spent in dissipation, which is said to give everything a blue tinge. Hence "Blue" means tipsy.

Blue moon. Once in a blue moon. Very rarely indeed.

Blue murder. To shout blue murder. Indicative of terror and alarm rather than real danger. It appears to be a play on the French exclamation morbleu.

Blue-noses. The Nova Scotians.

"Pray Sir," said one of my fellow-passengers, "can you tell me the reason why the Nova Scotians are called Blue-noses?"

"It is the name of a potato," said I, "which they produce in the greatest perfection, and boast to be the best in the world. The Americans have, in consequence, given them the nickname of Blue Noses."

HALIBURTON: Sam Slick.

Blue Peter. A blue flag with a white square in the centre, hoisted as a signal that a ship is about to sail. Here "Peter" is a corruption of "repeater", the flag having been originally used to mean that a signal had not been read and should be repeated.

Blue-pencil. The mark of editing or censorship.

Blue-pictures. Indecent cinema shows.

Blue-print. Properly the reproduction of a detailed architectural or engineering drawing, etc., in white lines on a blue ground. Now increasingly used for a project, scheme, or design.

Blue Riband of the Atlantic. The liner gaining the record for the fastest Atlantic crossing is said to hold the "Blue Riband of the Atlantic" and from 1907 to 1929 it was held by Cunard liner Mauretania. It then passed to the Europa (1930) and Bremen (1933) of Germany, to the Rex of Italy (1933), and to the French liner Normandie in 1935. It was next held by the Queen Mary of Britain from 1938 until its capture by the American-owned United States in 1952. A trophy offered in 1935 by H. K. Hales (1868-1942) was first accepted by the United States Lines in 1952. The average speed of the Mauretania was 27.4 knots, that of the United States 35.69 knots. Cp. BLUE RIBBON.

Blue Ribbon. The blue ribbon is the GARTER, the most coveted Order of Knighthood in the gift of the British Crown; hence the term is used to denote the highest honour attainable in any profession or walk of life, etc. The Blue Ribbon of the Church is the Archbishopric of Canterbury, that of the Law, the office of Lord Chancellor. See CORDON BLEU.

A weal from a blow has had the term "blue ribbon" applied to it, because a bruise turns the skin blue.

"Do you want a blue ribbon round those white sides of yours, you monkey?" answered Orestes: "because, if you do, the hippopotamus hide hangs ready outside."—KINGSLEY: Hypatia, ch. iv.

Blue Ribbon of the Turf. The Derby. Lord George Bentinck sold his stud and found to his vexation that one of the horses sold won the Derby a few months later. Bewailing his ill-luck, he said to Disraeli, "Ah! You don't know what the Derby is." "Yes, I do," replied Disraeli, "it is the blue ribbon of the turf." See DERBY DAY.

Blue Ribbon Army. A TEETOTAL society founded in the U.S.A. and extending to Great Britain by 1878, whose members wore a piece of narrow blue ribbon as a badge. It became the Gospel Temperance Union in 1883. The phrase came in time to be applied to teetotalers generally.

Blue Shirts. A force of Irish Volunteers under General O'Duffy who helped General Franco in the Spanish Civil War, 1936-1939.

Blue Sky Laws. In the U.S.A., laws passed to protect the inexperienced buyer of stocks and bonds against fraud. The name is said to have its origin in a phrase used by one of the supporters of the earliest of these laws, who said that certain business operators were trying to capitalize "the blue skies".

Blue Squadron. From 1625 until 1864 one of the three divisions of the British Fleet, and the third in order of precedence. See ADMIRAL OF THE BLUE.

Blue-stocking. A female pedant or learned woman who tends to neglect "feminine graces" and their accompaniments. In 1400 a society of men and women was formed in Venice, distinguished by the colour of their stockings and called della calza. A similar society appeared in Paris in 1590 and was the rage among lady savants. The name is derived directly from such a society, founded by Mrs. Montagu about 1750, from the fact that a prominent member, Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, wore blue stockings. The last of the clique was Miss Monckton, afterwards Countess of Cork, who died in 1840. Mrs. Montagu is also said to have deliberately adopted the badge of the French Bas-bleu club.

Blues. A traditional form of American Negro folk-song expressive of the unhappiness of slaves in the Deep South.

Blues usually consist of 12 bars made up of three 4-bar phrases in 4/4 time. Both the words and accompaniment (which form an antiphonal) should be improvised, though many famous blues have been written down. The usual subject matter is love, the troubles which beset the singer, or a nostalgic longing for home. The best known Blues singer was Bessie Smith (d. 1936).

To have a fit of the blues is to be downcast, to be depressed or in low spirits.

Bluey. A slang word for lead. Also an Australian name for blue-coloured blankets widely used in the 19th century, hence the SWAG which tramps carried in their blankets. In Tasmania bluey was a blue shirt-like garment issued to convicts.

The Oxford Blues. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

To be blue in the face. To have made a great effort; to be breathless and exhausted, either bodily or more usually with suppressed anger or emotion.

To look or feel blue. To be depressed.

True blue will never stain. A really noble heart will never disgrace itself. The reference is to blue aprons and blouses worn by butchers. They do not show bloodstains.

True as Coventry blue. The reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made at Coventry, noted for its permanent dye.

'Twas Presbyterian true blue (Hudibras, I, i). The allusion is to the blue apron which some PRESBYTERIAN preachers used to throw over their preaching-tub before they began to address the people. In one of the RUMP songs we read of a person going to hear a lecture, and the song says:

Where I a tub did view,
Hung with an apron blue;
'Twas the preacher's I conjecture.

Bluff, To. In poker and other card-games, to stake on a bad hand. This is a ruse to lead an adversary to throw up his cards and forfeit his stake rather than risk them against the "bluffer".

So, by extension, to bluff is to deceive by pretence. To call someone's bluff is to unmask his deception.

Bluff Harry, or Bluff King Hal. Henry VIII (1509-1547), from his bluff manner.

Blunderbore. A nursery-tale giant, brother of CORMORAN, who put JACK THE GIANT KILLER to bed and intended to kill him; but Jack thrust a billet of wood into the bed, and crept under the bedstead.

Blunderbore came with his club and broke the billet to pieces and was amazed to see Jack next morning at breakfast. He asked Jack how he had slept. "Pretty well," said the Cornish hero, "but once or twice I fancied a mouse tickled me with its tail." This increased the giant's surprise. Hasty pudding being provided for breakfast, Jack stowed away such a bulk in a bag concealed within his dress that the giant could not keep pace. Jack cut the bag open to relieve the "gorge" and the giant, to effect the same relief, cut his throat and thus killed himself.

Blunt. Slang for ready money, origin unknown.

To get a signora to warble a song,
You must fork out the blunt with a haymaker's prong!—HOOD: A Tale of a Trumpet.

Blurb. A publisher's note on the dust-jacket or cover of a book purporting to tell what the book is about and usually of a laudatory nature. The word was coined by Gelett Burgess, the American novelist (1866-1951), about 1914, when he defined it as "self praise, to make a noise like a publisher".

Blush, At first blush. At first sight, on the first glance. The word is from the M.E. blusche, a gleam, a glimpse; a meaning now obsolete except in the above phrase.

At the first blush we thought they had been shippes come from France.

HARLUYT: Principal Navigations, III.

To blush like a blue dog. Not to blush at all.

To put to the blush. To make someone blush with shame, annoyance, or confusion.

Bo. You cannot say Bo!, or Boo! to a Goose. A proverbial saying implying timidity.

Boa. Pliny (Natural History, VIII, xiv) says the word is from Lat. bos (a cow), and it arose from the belief that this snake sucked the milk of cows.

Boadicea (bō á dis ē' á), or Boudicca. The famous British warrior queen, wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni. On her husband's death (A.D. 61) the Romans had seized the territory, scourged the widow for her opposition and violated her two daughters. Boudicca raised a revolt of the Iceni and Trinovantes, burned Camulodunum (Colchester), Londinium (London), and Verulamium (St. Albans), but, when finally routed by Suetonius Paulinus, she took poison. She is the subject of poems by Cowper and Tennyson.

Boanerges (bō á nēr' jéz). A name given to James and John, the sons of Zebedee, because they wanted to call down "fire from heaven" to consume the Samaritans for not "receiving" the Lord Jesus. It is said in the Bible to signify "sons of thunder", but "sons of tumult" would be a better rendering. (Luke ix, 54; Mark iii, 17).

Boar, The. Richard III. See BLUE BOAR.

The wretched, bloody, and usurping boar,
That spoiled your summer fields and fruitful vines,
Lies now even in the centre of this isle,
Near to the town of Leicester, as we learn.
SHAKESPEARE: Richard III, v, ii.

Buddha and the boar. A Hindu legend relates that BUDDHA died from eating dried boar's flesh. The third AVATAR of VISHNU was in the form of a boar, and in the legend "dried boar's flesh" probably typifies esoteric knowledge prepared for popular use. None but Buddha himself must take the responsibility of giving out occult secrets, and he died while preparing for the general esoteric knowledge.

The bristled Baptist boar. So Dryden denominates the ANABAPTISTS in his Hind and Panther.

The bristled Baptist boar, impure as he [the ape],
But whitened with the foam of sanctity,
With fat pollutions filled the sacred place,
And mountains levelled in his furious race.
Pt. I, 43.

The Calydonian boar. In Greek legend, Oeneus, King of Calydon in Aetolia, having neglected the sacrifices to ARTEMIS, was punished by the goddess sending a ferocious boar to ravage his lands. A band of princes collected to hunt the boar, which was wounded by Atalanta (see ATALANTA'S RACE), and killed by MELEAGER.

The wild boar of the Ardennes. Guillaume, Comte de la Marck, beheaded in 1485, was so called from his ferocity. He features in Scott's Quentin Durward.

Boar's Head. The old English custom of serving this as a Christmas dish is said to derive from Norse mythology. FREYR, the god of peace and plenty, used to ride on the boar Gullinbursti; his festival was held at YULETIDE, when a boar was sacrificed to his honour. The English custom is described in Washington Irving's Sketch Book (The Christmas Dinner). The Boar's Head was brought in ceremoniously to a flourish of trumpets and a carol was sung. The following is the first verse of that sung before Prince Henry at St. John's College, Oxford, at Christmas, 1607:

The Boar is dead
So, here is his head;
What man could have done more
Than his head off to strike,
Meleager like
And bring it as I do before?

Irving gives the Boar's Head Carol of Queen's College, Oxford.

The Boar's Head Tavern. Made immortal by SHAKESPEARE and Prince Hal, this used to stand in Eastcheap. Destroyed in the Great Fire (See FIRE), it was rebuilt and annual Shakespeare Dinners were held there until 1784. It was demolished in 1831. Washington Irving has an essay, "The Boar's Head Tavern, Eastcheap", in his Sketch Book.

Board. In all its many senses it is the O.E. bord, a board, plank, or table; the verb to board meaning to enter a ship by force, hence to embark in a ship, is from the Fr. aborder, which is itself from the same word bord, meaning the side of a ship, as in STARBOARD, larboard, inboard, overboard, etc.

For I will board her though she chide as loud
As thunder, when the clouds in autumn crack.
SHAKESPEARE: The Taming of the Shrew, I, ii.

A board. A council which sits at a board or table: as Board of Directors, School Board, Board of Trade, etc.

The Board of Green Cloth. A financial committee of the English Royal Household under the presidency of the Lord Steward. Its powers were curtailed in 1782 and it is now concerned with the royal domestic arrangements under the Master of the Household.

In modern slang the board of green cloth is the card-table or billiard-table.

Board School. Undenominational elementary schools as established by Forster's Education Act of 1870, from the fact that they were controlled by locally elected committees called SCHOOL BOARDS. These Boards were abolished by Balfour's Education Act of 1902 and their functions transferred to local government authorities, the schools being renamed "council schools".

He is on the boards. He is an actor by profession.

To sweep the board. To win and carry off all the stakes in a game of cards, or all the prizes at some meeting.

To board. To feed and lodge. From the custom of dining at table or board.

Boarding School. One where the pupils are fed and lodged as well as being taught. The term is sometimes applied euphemistically to prison.

Board Wages. Wages paid to servants which include the cost of food. Servants "on board wages" provide their own victual. Pretty little Polly Perkins of Paddington Green, the title and subject of Clifton's popular Victorian song, "lived on board wages".

Boast of England, The Board in many nautical phrases is that part of the sea which a ship passes over in tacking.

To go by the board. To go for good and all, to be quite finished with, thrown overboard. Here board means the ship's side.

To make a long, good, or short board. To make a long or short tack.

To make a stern board. To sail stern foremost.

To run aboard of. To run foul of another ship.

Boast of England, The. A name given to TOM THUMB or Tom-a-lin by Richard Johnson, who in 1599 published a "history of this ever-renowned soldier, the Red Rose Knight, surnamed The Boast of England".

Boater. A flat-topped, shallow-crowned straw hat, usually trimmed with a band of ribbon, popular in Edwardian England for wear at CRICKET matches, picnics, and boating parties (hence the name). It is the established headgear of Harrow School and was formerly much favoured by butchers.

Boaz. See JACHIN.

Bob. Slang for a SHILLING. This use, of unknown origin, dates from about 1800. Also a term used in campanology denoting certain CHANGES in the long peals. A bob minor is rung on six bells, a bob triple on seven, a bob major on eight, a bob royal on ten, and a bob maximus on twelve.

To bob for apples or cherries is to try and catch them in the mouth while they swing backwards and forwards. Bob here means to move up and down buoyantly; hence the word also means to "curtsy", as in the Scottish song If it isn't weel bobbit we'll bob it again, signifying if it is not well done we'll do it again.

To bob for eels is to fish for them with a bob, which is a bunch of lobworms like a small mop.

To bob also means to thump, and a bob is a blow.

He that a fool doth very wisely hit,
Doth very foolishly, although he smart,
Not to seem senseless of the bob.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, II, vii.

A bob wig. One in which the bottom locks are turned up into bobs or short curls.

Bear a bob. Be brisk. The allusion is to bobbing for apples which requires great agility and quickness.

Bobbed hair is hair that has been cut short; docked like a bobtailed horse.

Bobbing John. John Erskine, Earl of Mar

(1675-1732), was so called from his frequent change of allegiance. He began as a WHIG but eventually led the JACOBITES in rebellion of 1715.

Pretty bobbish. Pretty well (in spirits and health), from bob as in BEAR A BOB.

Bob's your uncle. That will be all right; you needn't bother any more. In use in the 1880s but of unknown origin.

Bobbery. Kicking up a bobbery. Making a squabble, kicking up a SHINDY. It was most used in India and probably comes from Hind. bagpre, "Oh, father!" a common exclamation of surprise.

Bobby. A policeman, from Sir Robert Peel, Home Secretary, who established the Metropolitan Police in 1829. Cp. PEELER.

Bobby-sox. Long white cotton socks or ankle socks affected by teenage girls in the U.S.A. in the early 1940s. Hence the name Bobby-soxers for the young females who distinguished themselves for their intemperate and moronic behaviour at the public appearances of crooners and suchlike.

Bobadil. A military braggart of the first water, Captain Bobadil is a character in Ben Johnson's Every Man in his Humour. This name was probably derived from Bobadilla, the first governor of Cuba, who sent Columbus home in chains.

Bocland, or Bookland. Denotes land of inheritance granted from FOLKLAND in Anglo-Saxon England by the King and the Witan by written charter or book. It was at first given to the Church, but also to lay subjects. The place-name Buckland is derived from this.

Bodkin. Originally signified a small dagger but in Elizabeth I's reign it was applied to the stiletto pin worn by ladies in their hair. SHAKESPEARE probably used it in this sense.

When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin.

Hamlet, III, i.

To ride bodkin. To ride in a carriage between two others. Probably the allusion is to the bodkin, something so slender that it can be squeezed in anywhere.

There is barely room between Jos and Miss Sharp, who are on the front seat, Mr Osborne sitting bodkin opposite, between Captain Dobbin and Amelia.—THACKERAY: Vanity Fair, Ch. vi.

Bodle, or Boddle. A former Scotch COPPER coin of low value; said to be so-called from Bothwell, a mint-master.

To care not a boddle is equivalent to the English phrase "not to care a farthing".

Fair play, he car'd na deils a boddle.
BURNS: Tam o' Shanter, 110.

Bodleian Library (bod lé' án). The famous Oxford library, named from Sir Thomas Bodley who restored it in 1598. Rich in manuscript collections, in England it is second only to the BRITISH MUSEUM Library in importance, and receives copies of all publications under the Copyright Acts.

Body (O.E. bodig).

Body colour. Paint containing body or density.

Body corporate. A group of individuals legally united into a corporation.

Body line. In CRICKET, fast bowling at the batsman rather than the wicket with the intention of forcing him to give a catch while defending his person. The accurate but dangerous bowling of Larwood and Voce won the ASHES for England 1932-1933, but roused a storm of indignation in Australia which caused a modification in the laws of cricket.

Body politic. A whole nation considered as a political corporation; the State.

Body-snatcher. One who traded in newly buried corpses to sell them to surgeons for dissection. The first recorded instance was in 1777, when the body of Mrs. Jane Sainsbury was "resurrected". The RESURRECTION MEN were imprisoned for six months. See BURKE AND HARE.

By a play on the words, a BUM-BAILIFF was so called, because his duty was to snatch or capture the body of a delinquent.

The heavenly bodies. The SUN, MOON, stars, etc.

A regular body, in geometry means one of the five regular solids called PLATONIC BODIES.

The seven bodies (of alchemists). The seven metals supposed to correspond with the "seven planets".

Planets

1. Apollo, or the Sun
2. Diana, or the Moon
3. Mercury
4. Venus
5. Mars
6. Jupiter
7. Saturn

Metals

- Gold
- Silver

To body forth. To give mental shape to an ideal form.

And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown.

SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, V, i.

To keep body and soul together. To sustain life; from the notion that the SOUL gives life. The Lat. anima, and the Gr. psyche, mean both soul and life. According to Homeric mythology and the common theory of "ghosts", the departed soul retains the shape and semblance of the body. See ASTRAL BODY.

Bœotia (bē ō' shâ). The ancient name for a district in central Greece, probably so called from its abundance of cattle. The fable is that CADMUS was conducted thence by an ox (Gr. bous) to the spot where he built THEBES.

Bœotian (bē ō' shan). Rude and unlettered, a dullard. The ancient Bœotians were an agricultural and pastoral people, so the Athenians used to say that they were as dull and thick as their own atmosphere; yet Hesiod, Pindar, Corinna, Plutarch, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas were Bœotians.

Bœotian ears. Ears unable to appreciate music or rhetoric.

Well, friend, I can assure thee thou hast not got Bœotian ears (because you can appreciate the beauty of my sermons).—LE SAGE: Gil Blas, vii, 3.

Boethius (bō ē' thi ùs). Roman philosopher and writer (c. 475-c. 525 A.D.). His manuals and translations from the Greek were widely used in the MIDDLE AGES. Both King Alfred and Chaucer translated his De Consolatione Philosophiæ.

Boffin. A nickname given by the R.A.F. in World War II to research scientists or BACKROOM BOYS.

Bogey. See BOGY.

Bogomils. A long-lasting heretical sect which sprang up in Thrace and Bulgaria in the 10th century, named after the priest Bogomil. Their heresy was a compound of Manichæism and the errors of the Massalians, rejecting the TRINITY and the sacraments and holding that matter is evil. As a result Bulgar became an abusive term in the West, being identified with Bogomilism and evil practices generally. Hence the word bugger as a low term of abuse, etc. See also MANICHÆANS.

Bog-trotters. Irish tramps; from their skill in Irish bogs, trotting from tussock to tussock, either as guides or to escape pursuit.

Bogy. A HOBGOBLIN; a person or object of terror; a bugbear. The word appeared only in the 19th century, and is probably connected with the Scottish bogle, and so with the obsolete BUG.

Colonel Bogy. A name given in golf to an imaginary player whose score for each

Bohemia, The Queen of hole is settled by the committee of the particular club and is supposed to be the lowest that a good average player could do it in.

Beating Bogey or the Colonel, is playing the hole in a lesser number of strokes.

Colonel Bogey is also the name of a well-known military march tune by K. J. Alford.

Bohemia, The Queen of. This old public-house sign was in honour of Elizabeth, daughter of James I, and wife of Frederick, Elector of the Palatinate, whose election to the throne of Bohemia touched off the THIRTY YEARS WAR. George I, king of England, was their descendant.

Bohemian. A term applied to artists and writers of unconventional, loose or irregular habits. Originally the name was applied to a GIPSY from the belief that Bohemia was the home of the gipsies, or because the first to arrive in France (1427) came by way of Bohemia.

Bohemian Brethren. A religious sect formed from the HUSSITES which arose in Prague in the 15th century. They were the forerunners of the MORAVIANS.

Boiling point. He was at boiling point.

Very angry indeed. Properly the point at which water under ordinary conditions boils (212° Fahrenheit, 100° Centigrade, 80° Réaumur).

Bold. Bold as Beauchamp. It is said that Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, with one squire and six archers, overthrew 100 armed men at Hogges, in Normandy, in 1346. This exploit is not more incredible than that attributed to Captal-de-Buch, who, with forty followers, cleared Meaux of the JACQUERIE in 1358, slaying some 7,000!

Bold as brass. Downright impudent; without modesty. Similarly we say brazen-faced.

I make bold to say. I take the liberty of saying; I venture to say.

Bollandists. JESUIT writers of the Acta Sanctorum or Lives of the Saints, the original editor being John Bolland, a Dutchman. The first two volumes giving the SAINTS commemorated in January were published in 1643. The work is unfinished; by 1931 sixty-five volumes had been published.

Bollen. Swollen. The past participle of the obsolete English verb, bell, to swell. The seed capsule of flax or cotton is called a boll.

The barley was in the ear, and the flax was bollen.
Exod, ix, 31.

Bolognese School. There were three periods to the Bolognese School in painting—the Early, the Roman, and the ECLECTIC. The first was founded by Marco Zoppo in the 15th century, and its best exponent was Francia. The second was founded in the 16th century by Bagnacavallo, and its chief exponents were Primaticcio, Tibaldi, and Niccolò dell'Abbate. The third was founded by Carracci at the close of the 16th century, and its best masters were Domenichino, Lanfranco, Guido, Schidone, Guercino, and Albani.

Boloney. It is all boloney. It is all nonsense, rubbish or pretence. Originally the name for a Bologna sausage. "Bunk" and "hoey" are similarly used.

Bolshevik (bol' she vik), or less correctly Bolshevist. Properly a member of the Russian revolutionary party under Lenin that seized power in 1917, aiming at the establishment of the supreme power of the proletariat and declaring war on capitalism. The Bolsheviks were so called from the fact that at the party conferences of 1902-1903 the Leninists were the majority group (Bolsheviki = majority). The defeated minority were called MENSHEVIKS.

Bolshie, or Bolshy. A contraction of "Bolshevik". Also used to denote a person with "red" or revolutionary tendencies, or sometimes a trouble-maker.

Bolt. Originally a short thick arrow with a blunt head as used in a cross-bow. It then came to be applied to the door fastening of similar shape, and these meanings have given rise to phrases of widely different implication. There is also an almost obsolete word bolt (O.Fr. butier, connected with Lat. burra, a coarse cloth) meaning a sieve, or to sieve.

The curious few
Who care to sift a business to the bran
Nor coarsely bolt it like the simpler sort.
BROWNING: The Ring and the Book, i, 923.

Bolted arrow. A blunt arrow for shooting young rooks with a cross-bow, called "bolting rooks".

Bolt in tun. In HERALDRY, a bird-bolt, in pale, piercing through a tun, often used as a PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGN. The punning crest of Serjeant Bolton, who died in 1787, was "on a wreath a tun erect proper, transpierced by an arrow fesseways or". There is a Bolt-in-Tun Court off FLEET STREET, London. These punning signs or rebuses for such names as Luton, Hatton, Ashton, etc., were quite common. See REBUS.

Bolt upright. Straight as an arrow.

Wingshe she was, as is a jolly colt,
Long as a mast, and upright as a bolt.
CHAUCER: Miller's Tale, 77.

A bolt from the blue. A sudden and wholly unexpected event or catastrophe, like a thunderbolt from the blue sky, or a flash of lightning without warning. Here "bolt" is used for lightning, although strictly a meteorite is a thunderbolt.

The fool's bolt is soon spent. A foolish archer shoots all his arrows so heedlessly that he leaves himself no resources in case of need.

The horse bolted. The horse shot off like a bolt or arrow.

To bolt food. To swallow it quickly without waiting to chew it; hence to bolt a Bill, a political phrase used of Bills passed without adequate time or opportunity for consideration.

To bolt out the truth. To blurt it out; also to bolt out, to exclude or shut out by bolting the door.

Bolton. Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton. Give me some advantage. What you say must be qualified, as it is too strong. Ray says that a collection of proverbs was once presented to the VIRGIN QUEEN, with the assurance that it contained all the proverbs in the language; but the Queen rebuked the boaster with the proverb, "Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton", a proverb omitted in the compilation. John Bolton was one of the courtiers who used to play cards and dice with Henry VIII, and flattered the King by asking him to allow him an ACE or some advantage in the game.

Bomb. A metal shell filled with an explosive. From the Gr. bombos, any deep (especially humming) noise; ultimately the same word as boom.

Bombshell, To drop a. To suddenly deliver or release some shattering or surprising news. Cp. A BOLT FROM THE BLUE.

King Bomba. A nickname given to Ferdinand II, King of Naples, for his cruel and wanton bombardment of Messina in 1848. His son Francis II was called Bomba II, or Bombalino (Little Bomba), for his bombardment of Palermo in 1860.

Bombast literally means the produce of the bombyx, or silkworm (Gr. bombux); formerly applied to cotton-wool used for padding, and hence to inflated language.

We have received your letters full of love . . .
And, in our maiden council, rated them . . .
As bombast and as lining to the time.

SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, V, ii.

Bombastes Furioso. (bom bās' tēz fū ri ō' zō). One who talks big or in an ultra-bombastic way. From the hero of a burlesque opera so called, by William Barnes Rhodes, produced in 1813 in parody of ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Bombay Duck. A fish, the bummalo, which is dried and eaten with curries.

Bombiti. See BARISAL GUNS.

Bon Gaultier Ballads (bon gol' tyèr). Parodies of contemporary poetry by W. E. Aytoun and Sir Theodore Martin. They first appeared in Tait's, Fraser's and Blackwood's Magazine in the 1840s, and in volume form in 1885.

Bon mot (bon mō) (Fr.). A good or witty saying; a pun; a clever repartee.

Bon ton (Fr.). Good manners or manners accredited by good society.

Bon vivant (Fr.). A free liver; one who indulges in the good things of the table.

Bon viveur means much the same but suggests one who pursues other pleasures as well.

Bona Fide (bō' nā fī di) (Lat.). Without subterfuge or deception; really and truly. Literally, in good faith. To produce bona fides is to produce credentials, to give proof of identity or ability to perform what one professes.

Bona-roba (bō' nā rō' ba) (Ital. buona roba, good stuff, fine gown, fine woman).

A courtesan; so called from the smartness of her dress.

We knew where the bona-robas were.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, III, ii.

Bonduca (bon dū' ka). Another form of BOADICEA, or Boudicca. Fletcher wrote a tragedy of this name in 1616.

Bone. Old thieves' slang for "good", "excellent". From the Fr. bon. The lozenge-shaped mark chalked by tramps on the walls of houses where they have been well received is known among the fraternity as a "bone".

Also slang for dice and counters used at cards; and the man who plays the clappers or bones in a Negro minstrel show is known as "Uncle Bones".

Bone, To. To filch, as, I boned it. SHAKESPEARE (Henry VI, Pt. II, I, iii) says, "By these ten bones, my lord," meaning the fingers and calls the ten fingers "pickers and stealers" (Hamlet, III, ii). So "to bone" may mean to finger, that is, "to pick and steal".

Other suggested explanations are that it is in allusion to the way a dog makes off with a bone or that it is a corruption of the slang BONNET.

You thought that I was buried deep
Quite decent-like and chary
But from her grave in Mary-bone,
They've come and boned your Mary!

HOOD: Mary's Ghost.

A bone of contention. A disputed point; a point not yet settled. The METAPHOR is taken from two dogs fighting for a bone.

Bone-lace. Lace woven on bobbins made of trotter-bones.

Bone-shaker. An "antediluvian", dilapidated four-wheel cab; an old bicycle of the days before pneumatic tyres, spring saddles, etc.; any "old crock" of a vehicle.

Bred in the bone. A part of one's nature. "What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh." A natural propensity cannot be repressed.

I have a bone in my leg. An excuse given to children for not moving from one's seat. Similarly "I have a bone in my arm", and must be excused using it for the present.

I have a bone in my throat. I cannot talk; I cannot answer your question.

Napier's bones. See NAPIER.

One end is sure to be bone. It won't come up to expectation. "All is not gold that glitters."

To give one a bone to pick. To throw a sop to CERBERUS; to give a lucrative appointment to a troublesome opponent to silence him, or to a colleague who is for any reason an embarrassment. It is used in political life, by removing members of the Commons to the Lords by gift of a peerage or by giving appointments in the colonies, in nationalized industries, etc.

To have a bone to pick with someone. To have an unpleasant matter to discuss and settle. This is another allusion from the kennel. Two dogs and one bone invariably forms an excellent basis for a fight.

To make no bones about the matter. To do it, say it, etc., without hesitation or scruple; to offer no opposition, present no difficulty. Dice are called bones and the Fr. flatter le dé (to slide the dice, to soften a thing down) is the opposite of our expression. To make no bones of a thing is not to "make much of" or coax the dice in order to show favour. Hence without more bones, without further scruple or objection.

To point a bone at (Austr.). To place a death curse on someone. In an Australian aboriginal ceremony a small sharp bone was pointed at the person to whom ill was wished while the curse was uttered.

Boney (bō' ni). "If you aren't a good boy Boney will catch you," was an old threat from a children's nurse or harassed parent; Boney being NAPOLEON Bonaparte, whose threatened invasion of England was a real scare in the early years of the 19th century.

Bonfire. Originally a bone-fire, that is, a fire made of bones. The Festywall of 1493, printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1515, says, "in the worship of St. John the people . . . made three manner of fires: one was of clean bones and no wood, and that is called a bone fire; another of clean wood and no bones, and that is called a wood-fire . . . and the third is made of wood and bones, and is called St. John's fire." Also:

In some parts of Lincolnshire . . . they make fires in the public streets . . . with bones of oxen, sheep, etc. . . heaped together . . . hence came the origin of bon-fires.—LELAND (1546).

Bonhomme. See JACQUERIE.

Boniface. A sleek, good-tempered, jolly landlord; from Farquhar's comedy of the Beaux' Stratagem (1707).

St. Boniface. The apostle of Germany, a West Saxon whose English name was Wynfrith (680-754).

St. Boniface's cup. An extra cup of wine; an excuse for an extra glass. Pope Boniface, we are told in the Ebrietas Encomium, instituted an indulgence to those who drank his good health after grace, or the health of the POPE of the day. This probably refers to Boniface VI, an abandoned profligate, who was elected Pope by the mob in 896 and died fifteen days later. The only Saint Boniface to be Pope was Boniface I, who died in 422.

Bonne Bouche (Fr.). A delicious morsel; a titbit.

Bonnet. In slang, a player at a gaming table or an accomplice at auctions, to lure others to play or bid, so called because he blinds the eyes of his dupes, just as if he had "bonneted them" or crashed their hats down over their eyes.

Balmoral bonnet. A flat Scottish cap.

Bonnet lairds. Local magnates or petty squires of Scotland, who wore the BRAID BONNET, like the common people.

Bonnet-piece. A gold coin of James V of Scotland, the king's head of which wears a bonnet.

Bonnet Rouge. The red CAP OF LIBERTY worn by the leaders of the French Revolution in 1789.

Braid bonnet. The old Scottish cap, made of milled woollen, without seam or lining.

Glengarry bonnet. The highland bonnet, which rises to a point.

He has a bee in his bonnet. See BEE.

He has a green bonnet. Has failed in trade. In France it used to be customary, even in the 17th century, for bankrupts to wear a green bonnet (cloth cap).

To cast one's bonnet over a windmill. To throw caution to the winds. To decide on a hazardous course of action.

Bonnie Dundee. John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee (1649–1689). A noted supporter of the Stuart cause and a relative of Montrose. He was killed at the battle of Killiecrankie.

Bonny-clabber. Sour buttermilk used as a drink (Irish bainne, milk; claba, thick or thickened).

It is against my freehold, my inheritance,
My Magna Charta, cor laetificat,
To drink such balderdash or bonny-clabber!
Give me good wine!

BEN JONSON: The New Inn, I, i.

Booby. A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon. The player who comes in last in whist-drives, etc.; the lowest boy in the class.

Ye bread-and-butter rogues, do ye run from me?
An my side would give me leave, I would so hunt ye,

Ye porridge-gutted slaves, ye real-broth boobies!
BEAUMONT and FLETCHER:

Humorous Lieutenant, III, vii.

A species of gannet (Sula piscator) is called a booby, from its apparent stupidity.

A booby will never make a hawk. The booby, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself.

Booby-prize. A prize, often of a humorous or worthless kind, given to the "booby" at whist-drives, parties, etc., i.e. to the player who has the lowest score, etc.

Booby trap. A trap set to discomfit an unsuspecting victim, such as placing an object on top of a door to fall on whoever opens the door. More deadly "booby traps" are used in warfare.

To beat the booby. A sailor's term for warming the hands by striking them under the armpits.

Boogie-woogie (boo' gi woo' gi). A style of piano playing. The left hand maintains a heavy repetitive pattern over which the right hand improvises at will. Probably developed in the Middle West by jazz musicians early in the 20th century, and later given its name by the Negro pianist Cou-Cou Davenport, from "Boogie", the DEVIL, or all the troubles in life.

Boojum. See SNARK.

Book (O.E. boc; Dan. beuke; Ger. Buche, a beech tree). Possibly derived from the use of beech bark for carving names before the days of printing.

In betting, the book is the record of bets made by the bookmaker with different people on different horses.

In WHIST, bridge, etc., the book is the first six tricks taken by either side. The whole pack of cards is sometimes called a "book"—short for "the DEVIL'S PICTURE-BOOK".

Bell, book and candle. See under BELL.
Beware of a man of one book. Never attempt to controvert the statement of anyone in his own special subject. A shepherd who cannot read will know more about sheep than the wisest book-worm. This caution is given by St. Thomas Aquinas.

Book-keeping is a system of keeping debtor and creditor accounts in books provided for the purpose, either by single or by double entry. In the former each debit or credit is entered only once in the ledger, either as a debit or credit item, under the customer's or salesman's name; in double entry, each item is entered twice in the ledger, once on the debit and once on the credit side. The daily debits and credits are entered in the Day book and these are ultimately "posted" in the ledger. In the Waste book each transaction is entered as it occurs.

Bookmaker, or Bookie. The professional betting man. See BOOK.

Bookworm. One who is always poring over books, so called in allusion to the maggot that eats holes in books, and lives in and on their leaves.

He is in my books, or in my good books. The former is the older phrase; both mean to be in favour. The word book was at one time used more widely, a single sheet or even a list being called a book. To be on my books is to be on my list of friends.

He is in my black, or bad books. In disfavour. See BLACK BOOKS.

On the books. On the list of a club, on the list of candidates, or any official or members' list. At Cambridge University they say "on the boards".

Out of my books. Not in favour; no longer on my list of friends.

That does not suit my book. Does not accord with my arrangements. The reference is to the betting-book of the BOOKMAKER in which bets are formally entered.

The Battle of the Books. See BOYLE CONTROVERSY.

The Book of Books. The BIBLE; also called simply "the Book", or "the good Book".

The Book of Common Prayer. The official liturgy of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND first issue in 1549 under Cranmer. Modified in 1552, 1559, and 1604 it was revised after the RESTORATION and reissued in 1662. The amended Prayer Books of 1927 and 1928 were approved by Convocation but rejected by PARLIAMENT.

The Book of Kells. An exceptionally fine illustrated copy of the Gospels in Latin. It is kept in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, and probably dates from the 8th century.

The Book of Life, or of Fate. In BIBLE language, a register of the names of those who are to inherit eternal life (Phil. iv, 3; Rev. xx, 12).

The Book of the Dead. A collection of ancient Egyptian texts, both religious and magical, concerned with guidance for the safe conduct of the soul through Amenti (the Egyptian HADES). The Egyptians called it The Book of Going Forth by Day and copies, or parts of it, were buried with the mummy. There is a variety of texts.

To be booked. Not to be available; to have a previous commitment in one's engagement book or diary. Also to have something booked or entered up against one, hence caught.

To book a ticket, or seat. Now means to purchase a ticket for a theatre, railway journey, etc. In coaching days and in the early days of railways, tickets sold at Booking Offices were written out and entered up in the books by clerks.

To book it. To take down an order; to enter it in a book; to make a memorandum.

To bring him to book. To call him to account; to make him prove his words. Make him show that what he says accords with the records, the written agreement, or the book which treats of the subject.

To kiss the book. See KISS.

To know one's book. To know one's own interest; to know on which side one's bread is buttered (see under BREAD). Also, to have made up one's mind.

To speak by the book. To speak with meticulous exactness. To speak literatim, according to what is in the book.

To speak like a book. To speak with great precision and accuracy; to be full of information. Often used of a pedant.

To speak without the book. To speak without authority; from memory only, without consulting or referring to the book.

To take one's name off the books. To withdraw from a club, from an organization or register, etc. In the passive voice it means to be excluded. See ON THE BOOKS, above.

To take a leaf out of someone else's book. To follow someone else's example; to copy.

Boom meaning the spar of a ship, etc., is the Dutch boom equivalent to our beam.

Booming along. Going along at a merry pace. A sailing ship under full sail and with studdingsail set was said to boom along.

Boom passenger. A convict on board a transport ship, who was chained to a boom when made to take his daily exercise.

Boomer. Since the early 19th century an Australian name for the kangaroo, the national animal; possibly of Tasmanian aboriginal origin.

Boomers. In the U.S.A. the name given to the land speculators and would-be settlers who forced their way into the Oklahoma District in the 1880s.

Boomerang. A remarkable wooden missile developed by the Australian aborigines, bent in a curve and varying from two feet to two feet nine inches long, which when thrown returns near to or behind the thrower.

Metaphorically a boomerang is a scheme or proposal that recoils upon its originator. A scheme can also be said to boomerang upon its author, i.e. to have repercussions to his disadvantage.

Boon Companion. A convivial or congenial companion. (Fr. bon, good.)

Boon work, or Bene work, or Precariae. Special work at request (ad precem or at bene), i.e., extra work done by the mediæval VILLEIN from Saxon times for the lord at haytime and harvest, etc. Boon days were in addition to the normal WEEK WORK.

Boondoggling. An expression used in the early 1930s to denote useless spending, usually with reference to the U.S. government's expenditure in the effort to combat the depression. It apparently derives from the Scottish word boondoggle, meaning a marble you receive as a gift without having worked for it.

Boone, Daniel (1733-1820). American pioneer and frontiersman renowned for his prowess and exploits, who became a hunter when only twelve years old and at one time was captured and adopted by the Shawnees. He is now part of American folk-lore.

Boosening (M.E. bousen, to drink or tipple). An old method of treating insanity by immersing the patient in cold water.

See BOOZE.

Boot. An instrument of torture made of four pieces of narrow board nailed together, of a length to fit the leg. Wedges were inserted till the victim confessed or fainted.

All your empirics could never do the like cure upon the gout as the rack in England or your Scotch boots.

JOHN MARSTON: The Malcontent (1604).

Boot and saddle. The order to cavalry for mounting. It is a corruption of the Fr. boute selle (put on the saddle), and has nothing to do with boots.

Boot-hill (western U.S..A). A frontier cemetery, thus called because so many of its occupants "died with their boots on".

Boot-jack. See JACK.

Bootless errand. An unprofitable or futile errand. Cp. I WILL GIVE YOU THAT TO BOOT, below.

I sent him

Bootless home and weather-beaten back.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, III, i.

Bootlegger. One who traffics illegally in alcoholic liquor, derived from the smuggling of flasks of liquor in boot legs.

Bootlegging became a major racket in the U.S.A. during the years of prohibition (1920-1934), MOONSHINERS and RUM-RUNNERS playing their part. Criminal elements took over and the profits of bootlegging fostered the growth of underworld bosses like CAPONE.

Boots. An inn or hotel servant whose duty it is to clean the boots. Dickens has a Christmas Tale (1855) called The Boots of the Holly-tree Inn.

The BISHOP with the shortest period of service in the HOUSE OF LORDS, whose duty it is to read prayers, is colloquially known as the "Boots", perhaps because he walks into the House in a dead man's shoes or boots, i.e. he was not there till the death of a bishop caused a vacancy.

I will give you that to boot, i.e. in addition. The O.E. bot means advantage, good, profit, as in Milton's "Alas! what boots it with incessant care" (Lycidas), Alas! what profit is it . . . ?

It also meant compensation paid for injury; reparation. Cp. HOUSE-BOTE.

As anyone shall be more powerful . . . or higher in degree, shall he the more deeply make boot for sin, and pay for every misdeed.

Laws of King Ethelred.

I will not lick his boots. I will not stoop or demean myself to CURRY FAVOUR. A bootlicker is a TOADY or creep.

Like old boots. Slang for vigorously; "like anything". "I was working like old boots," means "I was doing my very utmost."

Puss in Boots. See under PUSS.

Seven-leagued boots. The boots worn by the giant in the fairy tale, called The Seven-leagued Boots. A pace taken in them measured seven leagues.

The boot is on the other foot. The case is altered; you and I have changed places; you have changed your tune now that the circumstances are different.

The order of the boot. "The sack"; notice of dismissal from one's employment or office.

To die with your boots on. To die fighting.

To go to bed in one's boots. To be very tipsy.

To have one's heart in one's boots. To be utterly despondent.

When bale is highest boot is highest. See BALE.

Boötes (bō oo' tēz). Greek for "the ploughman"; the name of the constellation which contains the bright star, Arcturus (see ARCTIC REGION). According to ancient mythology Boötes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death was taken to HEAVEN with his plough and oxen and made a constellation. HOMER calls it "the wagoner", i.e. the wagoner of CHARLES'S WAIN, the Great Bear. See BEAR.

Booze. To drink steadily and continually. Though regarded as slang this is the M.E. bousen, to drink deeply, probably connected with Dut. buizen, and Ger. bousen, to drink to excess. Spenser uses the word in his description of Gluttony:

Still as he rode, he somewhat still did eat,
And in his hand did beare a bousing can,
Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His drunken corse he scarce upholden can.

Faerie Queene, I, iv, 22.

Bor. An East Anglian form of address to a lad or young man as, "Well, bor, I saw the mauther you spoke of"—i.e. "Well, boy, I saw the lass . . .". It is connected with the Dut. boer, a farmer, and with the -bour of neighbour.

Borachio (bō ra' chō). Originally a wine bottle made of goat-skin; hence a drunkard, one who fills himself with wine. Sp. borracha; Ital. borraccia.

A follower of Don John, in SHAKESPEARE'S Much Ado About Nothing, is called Borachio; he thus plays upon his own name:

I will, like a true drunkard [borachio], utter all to thee.—III, iii.

Borak, or Al Borak (bôr' ak) (the lightning). The animal brought by GABRIEL to carry MOHAMMED to the seventh heaven, and itself received into PARADISE. It had the face of a man but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had the wings of an eagle, spoke with the voice of a man, and glittered all over with radiant light.

To poke Borak at. To make fun of or jeer at. From an Australian aboriginal word for "banter". It has been suggested as a possible source of BARRACK.

Bordar. In Anglo-Saxon England, a VILLEIN of the lowest rank who did menial service to his lord in return for his cottage; the bordars or bordarii were the labourers, and the word is the Med.Lat. bordarius, a cottager. See COTTAR.

Border, The. The frontier of England and Scotland which from the 11th to the 15th century was a field of constant forays.

Border Minstrel. Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832), because he sang of the Border.

The Border States. The five "slave" states (Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri) which lay next to the "free" states. So called in the American CIVIL WAR, 1861-1865.

Boreas (bôr' ë äs). In Greek mythology, the god of the north wind, and the north wind itself. He was the son of Astræus, a TITAN, and Eos, the morning, and lived in a cave of Mount Hæmus, in Thrace.

Hence boreal, of or pertaining to the north.

In radiant streams,
Bright over Europe, bursts the Boreal morn.
THOMSON: Autumn, 98.

Borgias (bôr' jáz). A glass of wine with the Borgias was a great and sometimes fatal honour, for Caesar and Lucretia Borgia, children of Pope Alexander VI, were reputed to be adept in ridding themselves of foes or unwanted friends by inducing them to pledges in poisoned wine.

Born. Born in the gutter. Of base origins; the child of beggars or vagrants.

Born in the purple. See under PURPLE; PORPHYROGENITUS.

Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. Born to good luck; born with hereditary wealth. The reference is to the usual gift of a silver spoon by the god-parents (see APOSTLE SPOONS). The lucky child does not need to wait for the gift for it inherits it at birth. A phrase with a similar meaning is born under a lucky star; here the allusion is to ASTROLOGY.

Born to be hanged. "He that is born to be hanged shall never be drowned." An old proverb quoted in different forms by SHAKESPEARE.

I have great comfort from this fellow: methinks he hath no drowning mark upon him; his complexion is perfect gallows.

The Tempest, I, i.

Go, Go; begone to save your ship from wreck,
Which cannot perish, having thee aboard,
Being destined to a drier death on shore.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, I, i.

In all my born days. Ever since I was born; in all my experience.

Not born yesterday. Not inexperienced and gullible; not to be taken in.

Poets are born, not made. One can never be a poet by mere training if one has been born without the "divine afflatus". A translation of the Lat. phrase Poeta nascitur non fit, of which an extension is Nascimur poetæ finis oratores, we are born poets, we are made orators. The idea has, of course, been extended to other callings.

Borough, or Burgh (bü' rô). A corporate town with privileges granted by royal charter. Nowadays they are of two kinds, county boroughs and non-county boroughs, the councils of the former having the same powers as county councils. The powers of non-county boroughs are more limited.

A Parliamentary Borough is one that sends at least one "burgess" or member to PARLIAMENT.

A Rotten, or Pocket Borough was a borough of much diminished population with the parliamentary seat at the disposal of a patron (frequently the Crown). Fifty-six such boroughs were disfranchised by the Reform Act of 1832.

Borough English. A custom abolished in 1925 by which real estate passed to the youngest instead of the eldest son. It was of English origin and was so called to distinguish it from Norman custom. If there was no son, then the youngest daughter was sole heiress; failing a daughter, the youngest brother, then the youngest sister, etc. Land held by Borough English was sometimes termed Cradle-Holding or Cradle-land. It was found in Kent, Middlesex, Surrey, Sussex and Somerset. See GAVELKIND.

The Borough, used as a proper name denotes SOUTHWARK, a district rich in historical and literary associations. The TABARD INN, BANKSIDE, and the MARSHAL-SEA are but examples.

It is also the title of a collection of poetical tales by George Crabbe (1810) about the Suffolk borough of Aldeburgh, one of which forms the theme of Benjamin Britten's opera Peter Grimes.

Borrow. Originally a noun (O.E. borg) meaning a pledge or security, the modern sense of the verb depended originally on the actual pledging of something as security for the loan. Even today the idea that a loan is the property of the lender and must be returned some day is always present. The noun sense is seen in the old oath St. George to borowe, which is short for "I take St. George as pledge," or "as surety"; also in:

Ye may retain as borrows my two priests.
SCOTT: Ivanhoe, ch. xxxiii.

Borrowed, or borrowing days. The last three days of MARCH are said to be "borrowed from APRIL", as is shown by the proverb in Ray's Collection: "March borrows three days of April, and they are ill." One old rhyme says:

March borrowed frae Aprile
Three days an' they were ill;
The first o' them was wind and weat,
The second o' them was snaw an' sleet,
The third o' them was sic a freeze,
That the birds' legs stack to the trees.

In Scotland, FEBRUARY also has its "borrowed days", the 12th, 13th, and 14th, which are said to be borrowed from JANUARY. If these prove stormy the year will be one of good weather; if fine, the year will be foul. They are called Faoilteach.

Borrowed time, To live on. To continue to live after every reasonable presumption is that one should be dead, i.e. living on time borrowed from Death.

Bosey (Austr.). In CRICKET, another name for a GOOGLY, so named from its inventor, the English bowler B. J. T. Bosanquet, who toured Australia in 1903-1904. The term was also applied in World War II to a single bomb dropped from a plane.

Bosh. A Turkish word meaning empty, worthless. It was popularized by James Morier in his novel Ayesha (1834), and other Eastern romances.

To talk bosh. To talk rubbish, to be quite on the wrong track.

Bosky. On the verge of drunkenness. A slang term possibly connected with the legitimate bosky meaning bushy, hence overshadowed, obscured.

And with each end of thy blue bow dost crown
My bosky acres and my unshrubb'd down.
SHAKESPEARE: Tempest, IV, i.

Bosom friend. A very dear friend. Nathan says it "lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter" (II Sam. xii, 3). St. JOHN is represented in the New Testament as the "bosom friend" of Jesus.

Bosom sermons. Sermons committed to memory and learnt by heart; not extempore or delivered from notes.

The preaching from "bosom sermons", or from writing, being considered a lifeless practice before the Reformation.

BLUNT: Reformation in England, p. 179.

Bosporus (bos' pōr ūs), or less correctly Bosphorus, is a Greek compound meaning "ox-ford". The Thracian Bosporus unites the Sea of Marmora with the EUXINE or BLACK SEA. Greek legend says that ZEUS, enamoured of Io, changed her into a white heifer from fear of HERA, to flee from whom Io swam across the strait, which was thence called bos porus, the passage of the cow. Hera discovered the trick, and sent a gadfly to torment Io, who was made to wander, in a state of frenzy, from land to land, ultimately finding rest on the banks of the Nile. The wanderings of the Argive princess were a favourite theme among ancient writers.

Boss (1) A master, is the Dut. baas, head of the household. Hence the great man, chief, overseer, and originally more widely used in the U.S.A. than England, for political leaders and financial magnates, etc. Thus to boss someone about is to try to take charge of them, to order them about, etc.

(2) Boss is also a protuberance like the shield or a raised ornament in architecture, etc. Hence boss-backed, a good old word for "hump-backed".

(3) Boss-eyed. Slang for having a bad squint or one eye injured, or only one eye. Hence, boss one's shot, to miss one's aim, as a person with a defective eye might be expected to do; and a boss, a bad shot. The derivation here is unknown.

Boston. From colonial days until after the CIVIL WAR, it was the intellectual, social and literary capital of America, and was known as "the Hub".

And this is good old Boston,
The home of the bean and the cod,
Where the Lowells talk only to Cabots,
And the Cabots talk only to God.

J. C. BOSSIDY: On the Aristocracy of Harvard.

Boston Tea-Party (1773). An incident serving to worsen the relations between Great Britain and her American colonies. By the Tea Act of 1773 the East India Company was enabled to ship its surplus stocks of tea direct to America to the disadvantage of American merchants. At Boston, patriots, disguised as Indians, boarded the tea ships and dumped all the tea into the harbour. As a consequence the British PARLIAMENT passed the INTOLERABLE ACTS.

Botanomancy

Botanomancy (bot' an ð mǎn si), DIVINATION by leaves. One method was by writing sentences on leaves which were exposed to the wind, the answer being gathered from those which were left; another was through the crackling made by leaves of various plants when thrown on the fire or crushed in the hands.

Botany Bay. An inlet in the coast of New South Wales five miles south of Sydney discovered by Captain Cook in 1770, and so named by him on account of the great variety of new plants observed there. Although the first convicts landed there in 1788 the settlement was established at Sydney, Port Jackson. In contemporary parlance Botany Bay was an alternative name for New South Wales and to be sent to Botany Bay meant sentence of transportation to Australia.

One of the great difficulties in Botany Bay is to find proper employment for the great mass of convicts who are sent out.

SYDNEY SMITH: Botany Bay

Botany wool is so called because Australian woollens were first made at Botany Bay by Simeon Lord in 1815.

Both ends against the middle, To play (western U.S.A.). A method of rigging a pack of cards in faro, from which the expression became common for any sharp practice with a risk of being found out.

Bothie (perhaps from Gaelic Bothag). A humble cottage or hut. Particularly applied to the one-room farm servants' dwelling in the north-east of Scotland which was often part of the stabling. The bothie system was formerly widespread, and the unmarried men were crowded into these sparsely furnished habitations, often preparing their own food.

Botley Assizes. The joke is to ask a Botley man, "When are the Assizes coming on?" The reference is to the tradition that the men of Botley once hanged a man because he could not drink so deep as his neighbours.

Bo-tree. The pipal tree or Ficus religiosa of India, allied to the banyan and so called from Pali Bodhi, perfect knowledge, because it is under one of these trees that GAUTAMA attained enlightenment and so became the BUDDHA. At the ruined city of Anuradhapura in Ceylon is a bo-tree reputed to have grown from a cutting sent by King ASOKA in 288 B.C.

Bottle. The accepted commercial size of a wine bottle is one holding 26½ fluid ounces per reputed quart. Large bottles are named as follows:

Double-magnum
or Jeroboam	" 4 " "
Rehoboam	" 6 " "
Methuselah	" 8 " "
Salmanazar	" 12 " "
Balthazar	" 16 " "
Nebuchadnezzar	" 20 " "

A Nip is ¼ of a bottle, a Baby is ⅓.

A three-bottle man. A toper who can drink three bottles of port at a sitting.

Bottle-chart. A chart of ocean surface currents made from the track of sealed bottles thrown from ships into the sea.

Bottle-holder. One who gives moral but not material support. The allusion is to boxing or prize-fighting, where the attendant on each combatant, whose duty it is to wipe off blood, to refresh him with water, and to do other services to encourage his man to persevere and win, is called "the bottle-holder".

Lord Palmerston considered himself the bottle-holder of oppressed States . . . He was the steadfast partisan of constitutional liberty in every part of the world.—The Times.

Bottle-neck. Metaphorically, a narrowing of the main highway impeding the smooth flow of traffic; an impediment holding up production or trade.

Bottle-washer. Chief agent; the principal man employed by another; a factotum. The full phrase—which is usually applied more or less sarcastically—is "chief cook and bottle-washer".

Bottled moonshine. Social and benevolent schemes, such as UTOPIA, Coleridge's PANTISOCRACY, the dreams of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon and so on.

Godwin! Hazlitt! Coleridge! Where now are their "novel philosophies and systems"? Bottled moonshine, which does not improve with keeping.—BIRRELL: Obiter Dicta, p. 109 (1885).

Brought up on the bottle. Said of a baby which is artificially fed instead of being nursed at the breast.

Looking for a needle in a bottle of hay, or in a haystack. Looking for a very small article amidst a mass of other things. Bottle here is a diminutive of the Fr. botte, a bundle.

Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle of hay. SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, IV, i.

To be bottled. A colloquialism for being drunk.

To bottle up one's feelings, emotions, etc. To suppress them; to hold them well under control.

To put new wine into old bottles. A saying found on Matt. ix, 17; typical of incongruity. New wine expands as it matures. If put in a new skin (bottle) the skin expands with it; if in an old skin, when the wine expands, the skin bursts.

Bottom. Of a ship, the lower part of the hull, usually below the waterline; hence the hull itself or the whole ship as in such phrases as goods imported in British bottoms or in foreign bottoms.

A vessel is said to have a full bottom when the hull construction allows large stowage, and a sharp bottom when it is capable of speed.

At bottom. Radically, fundamentally; as, "the young prodigal lived a riotous life, but was good at bottom", or below the surface.

A horse of good bottom means of good stamina, good foundation.

From the bottom of my heart. Without reservation.

He was at the bottom of it. He really instigated it or prompted it.

Never venture all in one bottom. Do not put all your eggs in one basket. This has allusion to the marine use of the word.

My ventures are not in one bottom trusted.
SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, I, i.

To have no bottom. To be unfathomable; to be unstable.

To get to the bottom of the matter. To ascertain the entire truth; to "BOLT (sieve) a matter to its bran".

To knock the bottom out of anything. See under KNOCK.

To stand on one's own bottom. To be independent. "Every tub must stand on its own bottom."

To touch bottom. To reach the lowest depth.

Bottom the Weaver. A man who fancies he can do everything, and do it better than anyone else. Shakespeare has drawn him as profoundly ignorant, brawny, mock heroic, and with an overflow of self-conceit. He is in one part of Midsummer Night's Dream represented with an ass's head, and Titania, queen of the fairies, under a spell caresses him as an ADONIS.

The name is very appropriate, as one meaning of bottom is a ball of thread used in weaving, etc. Thus in Clark's Heraldry we read, "The coat of Badland is argent, three bottoms in fess gules, the thread or."

Bottomless Pit, The. Hell is so called in Revelation, xx, 1. See ABADDON. William Pitt, the younger (1759-1806), was humorously called the bottomless Pitt, in allusion to his thinness.

Boudicca. The preferred form of BOADICEA.

Bought and Sold, or Bought, Sold, and Done For. Ruined, done for, outwitted.

It would make a man mad as a buck, to be so bought and sold.

SHAKESPEARE: Comedy of Errors, III, i.

Bouillabaisse (boo' ya bās). A soup, for which Marseilles is celebrated, made of fish boiled with herbs in water or white wine.

This Bouillabaisse a noble dish is—
A sort of soup, or broth, or brew,
Or hotchpotch of all sorts of fishes
That Greenwich never could outdo:
Green herbs, red peppers, mussels, saffron,
Soles, onions, garlic, roach and dace;
All these you eat at Terre's tavern,
In that one dish of Bouillabaisse.

W. M. THACKERAY: The Ballad of Bouillabaisse.

Boulangism (boo lonj' izm). The name given to a wave of political hysteria that swept over France, especially in Paris, in 1886-1887, and to the movement in support of General Boulanger (1837-1891). As Minister of War (1886-1887), he achieved some popularity for army reforms, but more particularly for his handsome military figure and identification with the policy of revenge against Germany. Deprivation of command (1888) increased his popularity, but his plans for a COUP D'ÉTAT were never realized. His flight abroad, when sentenced to exile (1889) for crimes against the Republic, lost him his supporters, and he shot himself in Brussels in 1891.

Boule, or Boule (bool). A kind of marquetry in which brass, gold, or enamelled metal is inlaid into wood or tortoise-shell, named after André Charles Boule (1642-1732), the celebrated cabinet-maker who worked for Louis XIV on the decorations and furniture at VERSAILLES. With English furniture dealers buhl (a Germanized form of the name) or buhlwork came to denote inlay work of this sort, however inferior or cheap.

Bounce. Brag, swagger; boastful and mendacious exaggeration.

He speaks plain cannon, fire, and smoke, and bounce.—SHAKESPEARE: King John, II, i.

On the bounce. Ostentatiously swaggering. Trying to achieve some object "on the bounce" is trying to attain one's end through making an impression that is unwarrantable.

That's a bouncer. A gross exaggeration, a braggart's lie. A bouncing lie is a thumping lie and a bouncer is a thumper. A bouncer is also a "chucker-out" at a dance-hall, etc.

Boundary Rider. An employee on an Australian pastoral station who looks for and repairs damaged fences, attends to water supplies and treats sick stock.

Bounds, Beating the Bounds, Beating the. An old custom still kept up in a few English parishes, of going round the parish boundaries on Holy Thursday or ASCENSION DAY. The schoolchildren, accompanied by the clergymen and parish officers, walked round the boundaries, which the boys struck with peeled willow-wands. The boys were sometimes "whipped" at intervals and water was sometimes poured on them from house windows "to make them remember" the boundaries.

In Scotland beating the bounds was called Riding the marches (bounds), and in England the day is sometimes called gang-day.

Bounty. See QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY; ROYAL BOUNTY.

Bounty-jumpers. Men, often foreigners, who enlisted during the American CIVIL WAR and, having been paid their bounty, promptly deserted to re-enlist elsewhere.

Bounty, The Mutiny of the. This celebrated mutiny broke out on 28 April 1789, and was as much due to the mutineers' attachment to the damsels of Otaheite as to the exacting discipline of Captain William Bligh. The Bounty had been engaged in a bread-fruit collecting voyage in the South Seas and Bligh was unaware of the impending mutiny. The mutineers reached Tahiti and some of them, accompanied by native men and women, sailed to Pitcairn Island, where they were not discovered until 1808, John Adams being the only surviving mutineer. Bligh, with 18 loyal companions, was set adrift in an open boat and made the remarkable passage of 3,618 nautical miles to Timor near Java.

Bourbon (boor' bon). The family name of the kings of France from 1589 to 1793 (Henry IV, Louis XIII, XIV, XV, XVI), and from 1814 to 1830 (Louis XVIII, Charles X), derived from the seignior of Bourbon, in the Bourbonnais in central France; the family is a branch of the house of CAPET. Bourbons also ruled in Spain, Naples and Sicily, and later in Lucca, Parma and Piacenza, as a result of the accession of Philip of Anjou (grandson of Louis XIV) to the Spanish throne in 1700.

It was said of the restored Bourbons that they had learned nothing and forgot nothing. Hence in the U.S.A. the name Bourbon was applied to the Democratic Party leaders of the southern States, with the implication that they were guided by a pre-CIVIL WAR outlook.

In the U.S.A. the term Bourbon is also used for a whisky made from Indian corn, sometimes with rye or malt added. The first Kentucky whisky was made by a Baptist clergyman named Elijah Craig at Royal Spring, near Georgetown, in 1789. Georgetown (now County seat of Scott County) was then in Bourbon (pron. bér' bün) County.

Bourgeois (Fr.). Our burgess; a member of the class between the "upper" and "working" classes. It includes merchants, shopkeepers and professional people, the so-called "middle class".

In typography bourgeois (pron. bur-jois') is the name of a size of type between long PRIMER and brevier.

Bourgeoisie (Fr.). The merchants, manufacturers, master-tradesmen, etc., considered as a class; much maligned since the days of Karl Marx who portrayed it as the exploiting class.

The bourgeoisie has stripped of its halo every occupation hitherto honoured and looked up to with reverent awe. It has converted the physician, the lawyer, the priest, the poet, the man of science, into its paid wage-labourers.

MARX and ENGELS: Communist Manifesto, 1848.

More recently the word has also been used to denote the conventional, narrow-minded and philistine elements of the middle classes. See PHILISTINES.

Bouse. See BOOZE.

Boustrapa. A nickname of NAPOLEON III; in allusion to his unsuccessful attempts at a COUP D'ÉTAT at Boulogne (1840) and Strasbourg (1836) and the successful one at Paris (1851).

Boustrophedon (boo strof' e dön). A method of writing found in early Greek inscriptions in which the lines run alternately from right to left and left to right, like the path of oxen in ploughing. (Gr. boustrepho, ox-turning).

Bouts-rimés (boo rē' mā) (Fr. rhymed endings). A parlour game which had a considerable vogue in 18th-century literary circles as a test of skill. A list of words that rhyme with one another is drawn up; this is handed to the competitors, and they have to make a poem to the rhymes, each rhyme-word being kept in its place on the list.

Bow (bō) (O.E. boga; connected with the O.Teut. beguan, to bend).

Draw not your bow till your arrow is fixed. Have everything ready before you begin.

He has a famous bow up at the castle. Said of a braggart or pretender.

He has two strings to his bow. Two means of accomplishing his object; if one fails, he can try the other. The allusion is to the custom of bowmen carrying a reserve string for emergency.

To be too much of the bow-hand. To fail in a design; not to be sufficiently dexterous. The bow-hand is the left hand, the hand which holds the bow.

To draw a bow at a venture. To attack without proper aim; to make a random remark which may hit the truth.

A certain man drew a bow at a venture, and smote the King of Israel.—I Kings xxii, 34.

To draw the longbow. To exaggerate. It is said that a good archer could hit between the fingers of a man's hand at a considerable distance, and could propel his arrow a mile. The tales told about longbow exploits, especially in the ROBIN HOOD stories, fully justify the application of the phrase. See TELL.

To unstring the bow will not heal the wound (Ital.). René of Anjou (1409-1480), king of Sicily, on the death of his wife, Isabella of Lorraine, adopted the emblem of a bow with the string broken, with the words given above for the motto, by which he meant, "Lamentation for the loss of his wife was but poor satisfaction."

Bow (bou). The fore-part of a boat or ship. (O.E. bog or boh; connected with Dan. boug, Icel. bogr, a shoulder).

On the bow. A bearing midway between ahead and abeam, i.e., within 45° on either side of the stem.

Up in the bows, To be. To be enraged.

Bow Bells (bō). Born within sound of Bow Bells. Said of a true COCKNEY. St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside, long had one of the most celebrated bell-peals in London, until an air raid destroyed the bells and the interior of the church in 1941. John Dun, mercer, in 1472 gave two tenements to maintain the ringing of Bow Bell every night at nine o'clock, to direct travellers on the road to town. In 1520 William Copland gave a bigger bell for the purpose of "sounding a retreat from work". It is said that the sound of these bells, which seemed to say, "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London", encouraged the young Dick WHITTINGTON to return to the city and try his luck again.

Bow Street Runners (bō). The first regular police and detective force in London, organized in the mid-18th century under the chief magistrate at Bow Street, near COVENT GARDEN. They were eventually superseded (1829-1839) by the Metropolitan Police.

Bow-catcher (bō). A corruption of "Beau catcher", a love-curl, termed by the French an accroche-cœur. A love-curl worn by a man is a bell-rope, i.e. a rope to pull the belles with.

Bow-window in Front. A big belly or corporation.

He was a very large man . . . with what is termed a considerable bow-window in front.

CAPTAIN MARRYAT: Poor Jack, i.

Bow-wow (bou-wou). A word in imitation of the sound made, as hiss, cackle, murmur, cuckoo, etc. Hence the bow-wow school is derisively applied to those philologists who sought to derive speech and language from the sounds made by animals. The terms were first used by Max Müller. See ONOMATOPEIA.

Bowden (bou' den). Not every man can be vicar of Bowden. Not everyone can occupy the first place. Bowden was one of the best livings in Cheshire.

Bowdlerize (bou' dler iz). To expurgate a book. Thomas Bowdler, in 1818, published a ten-volume edition of Shakespeare "in which nothing is added to the original text; but those words are omitted which cannot with propriety be read aloud in a family". He also expurgated Gibbon's Decline and Fall, hence the words bowdlerist, bowdlerizer, bowdlerism, etc.

Bowels of Mercy. Compassion, sympathy. The affections were once supposed to be the outcome of certain secretions or organs, as the bile, the kidneys, the heart, the liver, the bowels, the SPLEEN etc. Hence the word melancholy or "black bile", the Psalmist says that his reins, or kidneys, instructed him (Ps. xvi, 7), meaning his inward conviction; the head is the seat of understanding, the heart of affection and memory (hence "learning by heart"); the bowels of mercy, the spleen of passion or anger, etc. See HUMOUR.

His bowels yearned over, upon, or towards him. He felt a secret affection for him.

Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother.

Gen. xliiii, 30; see also I Kings, iii, 26.

Bower. A lady's private room (O.E. bur, a chamber).

But come to my bower, my Glasgerion,
When all men are att rest;
As I am a ladie true of my promise,
Thou shalt bee a welcome guest.

PERCY: Reliques (Glasgerion).

Hence, bower-woman, a lady's maid and companion.

Bower, the term used in euchre, is from the Ger. bauer, a peasant or knave. The right bower is the knave of trumps, the left bower is the other knave of the same colour.

Bowery, The

But the hands that were played
By that heathen Chinee,
And the points that he made,
Were quite frightful to see—
Till at last he put down a right bower
Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

BRET HARTE: Plain Language from Truthful James.

Bower anchor. The anchors normally in use carried at the bow of a ship. The longer vessels carry two, the best bower and the small bower.

Starboard being the best bower, and port the small bower.—SMYTH: Sailor's Word-book.

Bower of Bliss. In Spenser's Fæerie Queene (Bk. II), the enchanted home of Acrasia. In Tasso's JERUSALEM DELIVERED, ARMIDA's garden.

Bowery, The. (Dut. bouwerij, a farm). A densely populated cosmopolitan street in New York city which runs through the former farm or bouwerij of Governor Peter Stuyvesant (1592-1672). Noted for its many cheap lodging houses, saloons and shops, it was once the haunt of the notorious ruffians called the Bowery Boys.

Bowie Knife. James Bowie (pron. Boo-ee) was a Southerner who for some years from 1818 smuggled negro slaves with the great pirate Jean Laffitte. In 1827 he was present at a duel on a sandbar in Mississippi near Natchez which ended in a general mêlée. Six of the seconds and spectators were killed and fifteen wounded. Bowie killed one Major Norris Wright with a knife fashioned from a blacksmith's rasp some 10 to 15 inches long, with one sharp edge curving to the point. This knife attracted such attention that Bowie sent it to a cutler in Philadelphia who marketed copies as the Bowie knife. Bowie was with Davy CROCKETT at the fall of the ALAMO on 6 March 1836.

Bowling (bou'ing). We uncover the head when we wish to salute anyone with respect; but the Jews, Turks, Siamese, etc., uncover their feet. The reason is that with us the chief act of investiture is crowning or placing a cap on the head, but in the East it is the putting on of slippers.

Bowled. To be bowled out, or to be clean bowled are metaphors from CRICKET, meaning to be defeated in argument or detected in a falsehood.

Bowled over. To be knocked down; or figuratively to be overcome by a sudden assault on the emotions.

Bowler Hat. A hard felt hat, known in the U.S.A. as the DERBY Hat. Like the BILLYCOCK HAT it is said to have been introduced by the Norfolk landowner, William Coke. Because he found his tall riding hat frequently swept off by overhanging branches, he asked (c. 1850) a famous hatter of the period, Mr Beaulieu (hence bowler), to design him a lower-crowned hat.

To be bowler-hatted. To be discharged from the forces with a gratuity before the normal termination of one's commission, a bowler hat being the emblem of CIVVIE STREET. Cp. GOLDEN HANDSHAKE.

Bowling, Tom (bō ling). The type of a model sailor; from the character of that name in Smollett's Roderick Random.

The Tom Bowling referred to in the long-famous sea-song was Captain Thomas Dibdin, brother of Charles Dibdin (1768-1833), who wrote the song, and father of Thomas Froggnall Dibdin, the BIBLIOMANIAC.

Bowls. They who play bowls must expect to meet with rubbers. Those who touch PITCH must expect to defile their fingers. Those who enter upon affairs of chance, adventure, or dangerous hazard must make up their minds to encounter crosses, losses, or difficulties. Rubbers, in bowls, is the collision of two bowls.

Bowyer God. The "archer god", usually applied to CUPID.

Bowyang (Austr.). A string or strap used by labourers to hitch the trouser leg below the knee, hence a symbol of manual labour.

From bowyangs to bowyangs. The Australian equivalent of CLOGS to CLOGS IS ONLY THREE GENERATIONS.

Box. I've got into the wrong box. I am out of my element, or in the wrong place or a false position.

"Box about, 'twill come to my father anon." During an argument with his son, Sir Walter Raleigh gave him a blow on the head. Not wishing to strike his father back, young Walter hit the man on his other side at table making the above remark, intending that the blow should go right round the table and get back to his father. According to Aubrey this became a common proverb in the 17th century.

Box and Cox has become a phrase which can only be explained by the story. Mrs Bouncer, a deceitful lodging-house landlady, let the same room to two men, Box and Cox, who unknown to each other occupied it alternately, one being out at work all day, the other all night. It is from the farce by J. M. Morton (1811-1891) called Box and Cox (adapted from the French).

Box-cars. In throwing dice, in the U.S.A., a double six is known as box-cars; from its resemblance to freight cars or goods wagons.

Box Days. A custom established in the Scottish Court of Session in 1690, providing two days in spring and autumn, and one at CHRISTMAS (during vacation) on which pleadings could be filed. Informations were to be placed in a box for each judge and examined in private.

To be in the same box. To be in the same predicament as somebody else; to be equally embarrassed. To be in the same boat is a similar phrase.

To box Harry. A commercial traveller's phrase; applied to one who avoids the TABLE D'HÔTE and has a substantial tea, in order to save expense, especially after a bout of extravagance. To box a tree is to cut the bark to procure the sap, and these travellers drain the landlord by having a cheap tea instead of an expensive dinner.

To box the compass. A nautical phrase meaning to name the thirty-two points of the compass in their correct order. Hence a wind is said to "box the compass" when it blows from every quarter in rapid succession; hence, figuratively, to go right round in political views, etc., and end at one's starting-place.

Boxing Day. See CHRISTMAS BOX.

Boxer Hat (Austr.). A BOWLER HAT.

Boxers. A branch of the White Lotus sect in China which took a prominent part in the rising against foreigners in 1900 and was suppressed by joint European action. The Chinese name was I Ho Chuan or "Righteous Harmony Fists", implying training for the purpose of developing righteousness and harmony.

Boy. In a number of connexions "boy" has no reference to age. It is a common term for a "native" servant or labourer of any age, and a ship's boy is the lowest category among mariners, being essentially a GREENHORN. An "old boy" can be a former member of a particular school or an elderly man, and "Hello, old boy," is quite a normal way in which to greet an acquaintance.

The Boy, meaning champagne, takes its origin from a shooting-party at which a boy with an iced bucket of wine was in attendance. When the Prince of Wales (Edward VII) needed a drink, he shouted "Where's the boy?", and thence the phrase found its way into would-be smart parlance.

He will say that port and sherry his nice palate always cloy;
He'll nothing drink but "B. and S." and big magnums of "the boy".

Punch (1882).

Boy Bishop. St. NICHOLAS of Bari was called "the Boy Bishop" because from his cradle he manifested marvellous indications of piety.

The custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral or parish choir on his day (6 December), as a mock BISHOP, is very ancient. The boy held office for three weeks and the rest of the choir were his prebendaries. If he died in office he was buried in pontificalibus. Probably the reference is to the boy Jesus sitting in the temple among the doctors. The custom was abolished by Henry VIII in 1541, revived in 1552, and finally abolished by Elizabeth I.

Boy Scouts. An outstandingly imaginative and successful youth movement started by General Sir Robert Baden-Powell (Lord Baden-Powell of Gilwell) in 1908. The aim was to train boys to be good citizens with high ideals of honour, service to others, cleanliness and self-reliance, based essentially on training in an outdoor setting. The movement became world-wide with a membership now of over eight million young people. A complete Scout Group now consists of Cub Scouts (formerly Wolf Cubs), age 8 to 11; Scouts, 11 to 16; Venture Scouts (formerly Rover Scouts), 16 to 20.

Naked boy. See NAKED.

Boycott. To boycott is to coerce by preventing any social and commercial dealings with a person, group, or nation. The term dates from 1880, when such methods were used by the Irish Land League under Parnell, who advocated that anyone taking over a farm from an evicted tenant should be "isolated from his kind as if he were a leper of old". This treatment was first used against Captain Boycott, a land agent in County Mayo. Cp. TO SEND TO COVENTRY under COVENTRY.

Boyle Controversy. A book-battle between Charles Boyle, fourth Earl of Orrery (1676-1731), and Richard Bentley (1662-1742), respecting the Epistles of Phalaris which were edited by Boyle in 1695. In 1697 Bentley wrote an essay declaring the Epistles to be spurious, and finally routed his opponents in his famous Dissertation of 1699. Swift's BATTLE OF THE BOOKS was one result of the controversy.

Boyle's Law that the volume of a gas is inversely proportional to the pressure if the temperature remains constant, was formulated by Robert Boyle (1627-1691) in the early 1660s.

Boyle Lectures. A course of eight sermons to be delivered annually, in defence of the Christian religion; endowed by the Hon. Robert Boyle, the natural philosopher, and first given in 1692.

Boz. Charles Dickens (1812-1870). "Boz, my signature in the Morning Chronicle," he tells us, "was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, in honour of the Vicar of Wakefield, which being pronounced Boses, got shortened into Boz."

Bozzy. James Boswell (1740-1795), the biographer of Dr. Johnson.

Brabançonne, La (bra ban son). The national anthem of Belgium, composed by Van Campenhout in the revolution of 1830, and so named from Brabant, of which Brussels is the chief city.

Braccata. See GENS BRACCATA; GALLIA.

Bradamante (brăd' á mánt). The sister of RINALDO in ORLANDO FURIOSO and ORLANDO INNAMORATO. She is represented as a wonderful Christian AMAZON, possessed of an irresistible spear which unhorsed every KNIGHT it struck.

Bradbury. A £1 note, as issued by the Treasury 1914-1928, bearing the signature of J. S. Bradbury (first Baron Bradbury), who as Joint Permanent Secretary to the Treasury began the issue.

Bradman. A second Bradman. An outstanding batsman, likened to the great Australian cricketer, Sir Donald Bradman.

Bradshaw's Guide. This famous railway guide was started in 1839 by George Bradshaw (1801-1853), printer, in Manchester. The Monthly Guide was first issued in December 1841, and consisted of thirty-two pages, giving tables of forty-three lines of English railway. Publication ceased in 1961.

"Just look up the trains in Bradshaw," said he, and turned back to his chemical studies.

A. CONAN DOYLE: Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (The Adventure of the Copper Beeches).

Brag. A game at CARDS; so called because the players brag of their cards to induce the company to make bets. The principal sport of the game is occasioned by any player bragging that he holds a better hand than the rest of the party, which is declared by saying "I brag", and staking a sum of money on the issue.

Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Talking is all very well, but doing is far better.

Trust none;
For oaths are straws, men's faiths are wafer-cakes,
And holdfast is the only dog, my duck.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, II, iii.

There is also the English proverb "Brag is a good dog but dare not bite", meaning braggarts fear to make good their pretensions.

Jack Brag. A vulgar, pretentious braggart, who gets into aristocratic society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief. The character is in Theodore Hook's novel (1837) of the same name.

Braggadocio (brăg á dō' si ō). A braggart; one who is valiant with his tongue but a great coward at heart. Cp. ERYTHYNUS. The character is from Spenser's Faerie Queene, and a type of the "Intemperance of the Tongue". After a time, like the jackdaw in borrowed plumes, Braggadocio is stripped of all his glories; his shield is claimed by Sir Marinell; his lady is proved by the golden girdle to be the false Florinel; his horse is claimed by Sir Gyon; Talus shaves off his beard and scourges his squire; and the pretender sneaks off amidst the jeers of everyone. It is thought that the poet had the Duke of Alençon, a suitor of Queen Elizabeth I, in mind when he drew this character (Faerie Queene, II, iii; III, v, viii, x; IV, ii, iv; V, iii, etc.).

Bragi. In Norse mythology, the god of poetry and eloquence, son of ODIN and husband of IDUNA. He welcomes the slain heroes who arrive in VALHALLA.

Brahma (bra' má). In Hinduism Brahma, properly speaking, is the Absolute, or God conceived as entirely impersonal. This theological abstraction was later endowed with personality and became the Creator of the universe, the first in the divine Triad, of which the other partners were VISHNU the maintainer, and SIVA, the destroyer. As such the Brahmins claim Brahma as the founder of their religious system.

Brahma Soma (Sans., the Society of Believers in the One God). A Hindu theistic religious movement founded in 1828 by Ram Mohan Roy (1772-1833), a wealthy and well-educated BRAHMIN who wished to purify his religion and found a national church which should be free from idolatry and superstition. It was further developed after 1841 by Debendra Nath Tagore, but schisms occurred before the end of the century.

Brahmin. A worshipper of BRAHMA, the highest CASTE in the system of Hinduism and of the priestly order.

Brain-child. A project, scheme, invention, etc., the product of an individual's brain.

Brain Drain. A phrase used to denote the drift abroad (from the early 1960s), of British-trained scientists, technologists, doctors and university teachers (especially to the U.S.A.), attracted by higher salaries and often better facilities for their work.

Brain-washing. The subjection of a person to an intensive course of indoctrination in order to transform his opinions and transfer his political loyalties to those approved by the "washers".

Brain-wave. A sudden inspiration; "a happy thought".

Brains Trust. Originally the name "Brains Trust" was applied by James M. Kieran of the New York Times to the advisers of F. D. Roosevelt in his election campaign; later to the group of college professors who advised him in administering the NEW DEAL. In Britain it became the name of a popular B.B.C. programme in which well-known public figures aired their views on questions submitted by listeners. Now in general use for any such panel of experts or team which answers questions impromptu.

Bran. If not Bran, it is Bran's brother.

"Mar e Bran, is e a brathair, if it be not Bran, it is Bran's brother", was the proverbial reply of Maccombich.—SCOTT: Waverley, ch. xlv.

If not the real "SIMON PURE" it is just as good. A complimentary expression. Bran, the well-known dog of FINGAL, was a mighty favourite.

Bran-new, or Brand-new (O.E. brand, a torch). Fire new, new from the forge. SHAKESPEARE, in Love's Labour's Lost, I, i, says, "A man of fire-new words"; again in Twelfth Night, III, ii, "Fire-new from the mint"; in King Lear, V, iii, "Fire-new fortune"; in Richard III, I, "Your fire-new stamp of honour is scarce current." Originally applied to metals and things manufactured in metal which shine. Subsequently applied generally to things quite new.

Brand. The merchant's or excise mark branded on a commodity or article. He has the brand of villain in his looks. It was once customary to brand vagabonds and convicted offenders with a red-hot iron. In Tudor times vagabonds were branded with a V on the breast, and brawlers or "fray-makers in church" with an F, and so on. In the reign of William III it was enacted that branding for theft and larceny should be on the left cheek (1698). This was repealed in 1707 and in the 18th century "cold branding" was often passed as a normal sentence until branding was finally abolished in 1829. Army deserters, etc., were "branded" by tattooing until 1879. See MAVERICK.

Brandan, St., or Brendan. A semi-legendary Irish saint, said to have been born at Tralee in 484. He founded the abbey of Clonfert and died in 577. The Rule of St. Brendan was dictated to him by an angel and he is said to have presided over 3,000 monks in the various houses of his foundation.

He is best known for the mediæval legend, widespread throughout Europe, of his seven-year voyage in search of the "Land of the Saints", the Isle of St. Brendan, reputed to be in mid-Atlantic. The very birds and beasts he encountered observed the Christian fasts and festivals. The earliest surviving version of the story is the Navigatio Brendani (11th century). See MAELDUNE.

And we came to the isle of a saint who had sailed with St. Brendan of yore,
He had lived ever since on the Isle and his winters were fifteen score.

TENNYSON: Voyage of Maeldune.

Brandenburg Confession. A formulary of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg in 1610, by order of the elector, with the view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

Brandon. An obsolete form of brand, a torch. Dominica de brandonibus (St. VALENTINE'S Day), when boys used to carry about brandons (CUPID'S torches).

Brandy Nan. Queen Anne, who was very fond of brandy. On her statue in St. Paul's Churchyard a wit once wrote:

Brandy Nan, Brandy Nan, left in the lurch,
Her face to the gin-shop, her back to the church.

A "gin palace" used to stand at the south-west corner of St. Paul's Churchyard. See EST-IL POSSIBLE.

Brank (Scot). A gag for scolds consisting of an iron framework fitting round the head with a piece projecting inwards which went into the mouth and prevented the tongue wagging. There is one dated 1633, in the church vestry at Walton-on-Thames, inscribed:

Chester presents Walton with a bridle
To curb women's tongues that talk too idle.

Brasenose College (brāz' nōz) (Oxford). Over the gate is a brass nose, the arms of the college; but the word is a corruption of brasenhuis, a brasserie or brewhouse, the college having been built on the site of a brewery. For over 550 years the original nose was at Stamford, for in the reign of Edward III the students migrated thither in search of religious liberty, taking the nose with them. It was re-acquired by the college in 1890.

Brass. As bold as brass. With barefaced effrontery or impudence. Brass is also a slang term for money. A church brass is a memorial plate often engraved with a representation of the person commemorated. The earliest complete specimen is late 13th century, in Stoke d'Abernon Church, Surrey, commemorating Sir John d'Abernon who died in 1277.

Brassbounder. A premium apprentice on a merchant ship, a midshipman.

Brass Hat. A service term for an officer of high rank. It dates from the first Boer War (1880-1881), and refers to the gold oak leaves on the brim of senior officers' caps, sometimes nicknamed "scrambled egg". Officers of the highest rank are called top brass.

The Man of Brass. Talus, the work of Hephæstus (VULCAN). He was the guardian of Crete and threw rocks at the ARGONAUTS to prevent their landing, and used to make himself red-hot, and then hug intruders to death.

To get down to brass tacks. To get down to the essentials.

Brave. A fighting man among the American Indians was so called.

Alphonso IV of Portugal (1290-1357) was called "the Brave".

Bravest of the Brave. Marshal Ney (1769-1815). So called by the troops of Friedland (1807), on account of his fearless bravery. NAPOLEON said of him, "That man is a lion."

Brawn. The test of the brawn's head (boar's head). In The Boy and the Mantle (PERCY'S RELIQUES), a little boy came to the court of King ARTHUR and brought in a boar's head saying "there never was a cuckold's knife that could carve it". No knight in the court except Sir Cradock was able to accomplish the feat.

He brought in the boar's head,
And was wondrous bold
He said ther was never a cuckold's knife,
Carve itt that cold.

Brazen Age. The age of war and violence. It followed the SILVER AGE. See AGE.

To this next came in course the brazen age,
A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody rage,
Not impious yet. Hard steel succeeded them,
And stubborn as the metal were the men.

DRYDEN: Metamorphoses, i.

Brazen-faced. Bold (in a bad sense), without shame. Cp. BRASS.

What a brazen-faced varlet art thou!
SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, II, ii.

Brazen head. The legend of the wonderful head of brass that could speak and was omniscient, found in early romances, is of Eastern origin. Ferragus in VALENTINE AND ORSON is an example but the most famous in English legend is that fabled to have been made by the great Roger Bacon. It was said if Bacon heard it speak he would succeed in his projects; if not, he would fail. His familiar, Miles, was set to watch, and while Bacon slept the Head spoke thrice: "Time is"; half an hour later it said, "Time was". In another half-hour it said, "Time's past", fell down and was broken to atoms. Byron refers to this legend.

Like Friar Bacon's head, I've spoken,
"Time is", "Time was", "Time's past."
Don Juan, i, 217.

References to Bacon's brazen head are frequent in literature. Most notable is Robert Greene's Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friary Bungay, 1594. Other allusions are:

Bacon for his brazen head.
POPE: Dunciad, III, 104.
Quoth he, "My head's not made of brass,
As Friar Bacon's noddle was."
BUTLER: Hudibras, II, i.

See also SPEAKING HEADS.

To brazen it out. To stick to an assertion knowing it to be wrong; to outface in a shameless manner; to disregard public opinion.

Breach of Promise. A contract to marry is as binding in English law as any other contract, and the man or woman who breaks an engagement is liable in law. The plaintiff is entitled to recover any pecuniary loss due to outlay in anticipation of marriage and a woman may be awarded substantial damages in certain circumstances. If the man is the injured party he is better advised to seek consolation or compensation other than in a court of law.

Breaches, meaning reeks or small bays, is to be found in Judges v, 17. Deborah, complaining of the tribes who refused to assist her in her war with Sisera, says that Asher "abode in his breaches", that is, creeks on the seashore.

Spenser has the same usage:

The headful boateman strongly forth did stretch
His brawnie armes, and all his body straine,
That the utmost sandy breach they shortly fetch.
Faerie Queene, II, xii, 21.

Bread. Bread is the staff of life (17th-century proverb).

Bread and cheese. The barest necessities of life.

Bread and circuses. Free food and entertainment. Panem et circenses were, according to Juvenal's Satires, the two things the Roman populace desired.

Bread-basket. The stomach.

Bread never falls but on its buttered side. An old north country proverb.}

We express the completeness of ill-luck by saying "The bread never falls but on its buttered side".

J. L. KIPLING: Man and Beast in India (1891).

Breaking of bread. The EUCHARIST. In scriptural language to break bread is to partake of food.

They continued . . . in breaking of bread, and in prayer.—Acts, ii, 42 (also 46).

Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days (Eccles. xi, 1). The interpretation of this well-known passage is obscure. Perhaps the most likely meaning is "do not be afraid to give generously without hope of immediate gain, sooner or later you will reap as you have sown." Another common explanation is that seed cast on flooded land will take root and profit the sower when the waters recede, bread in this context meaning "corn" or "seed".

Don't quarrel with your bread and butter. Don't foolishly give up your job or take action that will deprive you of your living.

He took bread and salt, i.e. he took his oath. In Eastern lands bread and salt were once eaten when an oath was taken.

To know which side one's bread is buttered. To be mindful of one's own interest.

To take the bread out of someone's mouth. To forestall another; to take away another's livelihood.

Break. A short solo improvisation in jazz music.

To break. To bankrupt.

To break a bond. To dishonour it.

To break a butterfly on a wheel. To employ superabundant effort in the accomplishment of a small matter.

Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel?
Who breaks a butterfly upon the wheel?

POPE: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 307.

To break a journey. To stop before the journey is accomplished, with the intention of completing it later.

To break a matter to a person. To be the first to impart it, and to do so cautiously and piecemeal.

To break away. To escape, to go away abruptly; to start too soon in a race.

To break bread. See BREAD.

To break cover. To start forth from a hiding-place.

To break down. To lose all control of one's feelings; to collapse, to become hysterical; also to demolish or to analyse. A breakdown is a temporary collapse in health; it is also the name given to a wild kind of Negro dance.

To break faith. To violate one's word or pledge; to act traitorously.

To break ground. To commence a new project, as a settler does.

To break in. To interpose a remark. To train a horse or animal to the saddle, harness, etc., or to train a person to a way of life. To enter as a burglar does.

To break off. To stop a conversation, etc. To end an engagement or friendship.

To break one's fast. To take food after long abstinence; to eat one's breakfast after the night's fast.

To break one's neck. To dislocate the bones of one's neck. To be in a violent hurry.

To break on the wheel. To torture on a "wheel" by breaking the long bones with an iron bar. See COUP DE GRÂCE.

To break out. To escape from prison. To throw off restraint.

To break out of bounds. To go beyond the prescribed limits.

To break the ice. To prepare the way; to get through the stiffness and reserve of a first meeting with a stranger; to impart distressing news to another delicately and tactfully.

To break through. To force a passage. To overcome major obstacles especially in the field of scientific or technical progress.

To break your back. To make you bankrupt; to reduce you to a state of impotence. The METAPHOR is from carrying burdens on the back.

To break up. To discontinue classes at the end of term and go home; to separate. Also to become rapidly decrepit and infirm.

To break up housekeeping. To discontinue keeping a separate house.

To break with someone. To quarrel or discontinue relations.

To get a break. To have an unexpected chance; to have an opportunity of advancing oneself.

To make a break. To make a complete change; to commit a social error or make an unfortunate mistake.

To run up a score in billiards or snooker.

Breakers Ahead. Hidden danger at hand. Breakers in an open sea always announce sunken rocks, sandbanks, etc.

Breaking a Stick. Part of the marriage ceremony of certain North American Indians, as breaking a wineglass is part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews.

One of Raphael's pictures shows an unsuccessful suitor of the Virgin Mary breaking his stick. This alludes to the legend that suitors were each to bring an almond stick to be laid up in the sanctuary overnight. The owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor approved by God. It was thus Joseph became the husband of Mary.

Breast. To make a clean breast of it. To make a full confession, concealing nothing.

Breath. All in a breath. Without taking breath (Lat. continenti spiritu).

It takes one's breath away. The news is so astounding it causes one to hold one's breath with surprise.

Out of breath. Panting from exertion; temporarily short of breath.

Save your breath to cool your porridge. Don't talk to me, it is only wasting your breath.

To catch one's breath. To check suddenly the free act of breathing.

To hold one's breath. Voluntarily to cease breathing for a time, as in fear, etc.

To take breath. To cease for a little time from some exertion in order to recover from exhaustion of breath.

Under one's breath. In a whisper or undertone.

To breathe one's last. To die.

Brière de Roland. A deep defile in the crest of the Pyrenees, some three hundred feet wide. The legend is that ROLAND, the PALADIN, cleft the rocks in two with his sword DURANDAL, when he was set upon by the Gascons at RONCESVALLES.

Breeches. She wears the breeches. Said of a woman who usurps the prerogative of her husband. Cp. THE GREY MARE IS THE BETTER HORSE, under MARE.

Breeches Bible. See BIBLE.

Brehon Laws (bré' hon). The English name for the ancient laws of Ireland, which prevailed until the mid-17th century. They cover every phase of Irish life and provide an invaluable source of historical information.

Brendan, St. See BRANDAN, ST.

Bren-gun. A World War II light machine-gun, fired from the shoulder. Originally made in Brno, Czechoslovakia, then in Enfield, England. Bren is a blend of Brno and Enfield.

Brent (Scot.). Without a wrinkle. Burns says of Jo Anderson, in his prime of life, "his locks were like the raven", and his "bonnie brow was brent".

Brent-hill means the eyebrows. Looking or gazing from under brent-hill, in Devonshire means "frowning at one"; and in west Cornwall to brent means to wrinkle the brows.

Brentford. Like the two kings of Brentford smelling at one nosegay. Said of persons who were once rivals, but have become reconciled. The allusion is to The Rehearsal (1672), by the Duke of Buckingham. "The two kings of Brentford enter hand in hand", and the actors, to heighten the absurdity, used to make them enter "smelling at one nosegay". (Act II, Sc. ii).

Bretwalda (bret' wol' dâ). The title given in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to Egbert of Wessex (802-839) and seven earlier English kings, who exercised a supremacy, often rather shadowy, over other English kings south of the Humber. The title probably means "overlord of the Brëts (Britons)" and was sometimes assumed by later kings. See HEPTARCHY.

Breviary (bré' vi' ár i). A book containing the ordinary and daily services of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, which those in orders are bound to recite. It omits the EUCHARIST, which is contained in the MISSAL, and the special services (marriage, ordination, etc.), which are found in the Ritual or Pontifical. It is called a breviary because it is an abbreviation in the sense that it contains prayers, hymns, and lessons, etc., thus obviating the need to use a separate hymn book, and BIBLE.

Brew. Brew me a glass of grog, i.e. mix one for me. Brew me a cup of tea, i.e. make one for me. The tea is set to brew, i.e. to draw. The general meaning of the word is to boil or mix; the restricted meaning is to make malt liquor.

As you brew, so you will bake. As you will go on; you must take the consequences of your actions; "as you make your BED so you will lie on it."

To brew up. To burn. Said of tanks in World War II.

Brewer. The Brewer of Ghent. Jacob van Artevelde (d. 1345); a popular Flemish leader who allied with Edward III against France. Although by birth an aristocrat, he was a member of the Guild of Brewers.

Brian Boru, or Boroma (brí' an bo roo', bo ro' ma) (926-1014). This great Irish chieftain became king of Munster in 978 and chief king of all Ireland in 1002. On Good Friday 1014, his forces defeated the Danes of Dublin at the battle of Clontarf, but Brian, too old to fight, was killed in his tent.

Briareus (brí ár' ē ùs), or Ægeon. A giant with fifty heads and a hundred hands. Homer says the gods called him Briareus, but men called him Ægeon (Iliad, I, 403). He was the offspring of Heaven and Earth and was one of the race of TITANS, against whom he fought in their war with ZEUS.

He [Ajax] hath the joints of everything, but everything so out of joint that he is a gouty Briareus, many hands and no use, or purblind Argus, all eyes and no sight.

SHAKESPEARE: Troilus and Cressida, I, ii.

Bold Briareus. Handel (1685-1759), so called by Pope:

Strong in new arms, lol giant Handel stands,

Like bold Briareus, with a hundred hands;

To stir, to rouse, to shake the soul he comes.

And Jove's own thunders follow Mars's drums.

Dunciad, IV, 65.

The Briareus of Languages. Cardinal Mezzofanti (1774-1849), who is said to have spoken fifty-eight different tongues. BYRON called him "a walking polyglot; a monster of languages; a Briareus of parts of speech".

Bric-à-brac. Odds and ends of curiosities.

In French, a marchand de bric-à-brac is a seller of junk, old stores, etc., usually of small value; we employ the phrase for odds and ends of vertu. Bricoler in French means faire toute espèce de métier, to be Jack of all trades. Brac is the RICOCHET of bric, as FIDDLE-FADDLE and scores of other double words in English. Littré says that it is formed on the model of de bric et de broc, by hook or by crook.

Brick. A regular brick. A jolly good fellow; perhaps because a brick is solid, four-square, plain and reliable.

A fellow like nobody else, and in fine, a brick.

GEORGE ELIOT: Daniel Deronda, Bk. II, ch. xvi.

Brick and mortar franchise. A Chartist phrase for the £10 householder franchise.

Brickdusts. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Brickfielder (Austr.). A southerly gale experienced at Sydney which used to blow dust into the city from the nearby brickfields.

Brick tea. The interior leaves of the plant mixed with a glutinous substance (sometimes bullock's or sheep's blood), pressed into cubes and dried. These blocks were frequently used as a medium of exchange in central Asia.

To drop a brick. To make a highly tactless remark.

To make bricks without straw. To attempt to do something without having the necessary material supplied. The allusion is to the Israelites in Egypt, who were commanded by their taskmasters so to do (Ex. v, 7).

Bride. The bridal wreath is a relic of the corona nuptialis used by the Greeks and Romans to indicate triumph.

Bride, or wedding favours represent the TRUE-LOVER'S KNOT and symbolic union.

Bride-ale. See CHURCH-ALE. It is from this word that we get the adjective bridal.

Bride cake. A relic of the Roman confarreatio, a mode of marriage practised by the highest class in Rome. It was performed by the Pontifex Maximus before ten witnesses and the contracting parties mutually partook of a cake of salt, water, and flour (far). Only those born in such wedlock were eligible for the high sacred offices.

Bride of the Sea. Venice; so called from the ancient ceremony of the wedding of the sea by the Doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic saying, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination."

This took place annually on ASCENSION DAY, and was enjoined upon the Venetians in 1177 by Pope Alexander III, who gave the Doge a gold ring from his own finger in token of the Venetian fleet's victory over Frederick Barbarossa, in defence of the Pope's quarrel. At the same time his Holiness desired the event to be commemorated each year. See BUCENTAUR.

Bridegroom. In O.E. this word was brydguma (the latter element from the Old Teutonic gumon, man), becoming replaced by bridegroom in the 16th century. The last change appears to be due to the confusion of gome with M.E. groom, the word for a man-servant.

Bridegroom's men. In the Roman marriage by confarreatio, the bride was led to the Pontifex Maximus by bachelors, but was conducted home by married men. Polydore Virgil says that a married man preceded the bride on her return, bearing a vessel of GOLD and SILVER. See BRIDE CAKE.

Bridewell. A generic term for a HOUSE OF CORRECTION, or a prison, so called from the City Bridewell, Blackfriars, formerly a royal palace built over the holy well of St. Bride (Bridget). After the REFORMATION, Edward VI made it a penitentiary for unruly apprentices and vagrants. It was demolished in 1863 although much of the palace was destroyed in the GREAT FIRE OF LONDON. (See under FIRE.)

At my first entrance it seemed to me rather a Prince's Palace than a House of Correction, till gazing round me, I saw in a large room a parcel of ill-looking mortals stripped to their shirts like hay-makers, pounding hemp . . . From thence we turned to the women's apartment, who we found were shut up as close as nuns.

NED WARD: The London Spy (1698).

Bridge of Gold. According to a German tradition, CHARLEMAGNE's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, to bless the vineyards and cornfields.

Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne,
Upon thy bridge of gold.

LONGFELLOW: Sonnets, Autumn.

To make a bridge of gold for him is to enable a man to retreat from a false position without loss of dignity.

Bridge of Jehennam. Another name for AL SIRAT.

Bridge of Sighs. Over this bridge, which connects the Doge's palace with the state prisons of Venice, prisoners were conveyed from the judgment hall to the place of execution. The passageway which used to connect the Tombs prison in New York with the criminal court was so dubbed for similar reasons.

A bridge over the Cam at St. John's College, Cambridge, which resembles the Venetian original, is called by the same name.

Waterloo Bridge, London, was also called The Bridge of Sighs when suicides were frequent there. Hood gave the name to one of his poems:

One more Unfortunate,
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death.

Bridgewater Treatises. Instituted by the Rev. Francis Howard Egerton, eighth Earl of Bridgewater. He left £8,000 to be given to the author or authors of the best treatise or treatises "On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation". The money was divided between eight authors: Dr. Chalmers, Dr. John Kidd, Dr. Whewell, Sir Charles Bell, Dr. Peter Roget, Dean Buckland, the Rev. W. Kirby, and Dr. William Prout. The award was made by the President of the Royal Society (Davies Gilbert) in consultation with the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Howley) and the Bishop of London (Dr. Blomfield).

Bridle road, or path. A way for a riding-horse, but not for a horse and cart.

To bite on the bridle is to suffer great hardships. Horses bite on the bridle when trying, against odds, to get their own way.

To bridle up. In Fr. se rengorger, to draw in the chin and toss the head back in scorn or pride. The METAPHOR is from a horse pulled up suddenly and sharply.

Bridport. Stabbed with a Bridport dagger, i.e. hanged. Bridport in Dorsetshire was famous for its hempen goods, supplying ropes and cables for the Royal Navy, and it is still a centre for net-making. The hangman's rope, being made at Bridport, gave rise to the phrase.

Brigade of Guards. See HOUSEHOLD TROOPS.

Brigand. A French word from the Ital. brigante, pres. part. of brigare, to quarrel. The 14th-century FREE COMPANIES of France, such as The White Company in Conan Doyle's story, were brigands, i.e. irregular troops addicted to marauding. In the course of time the Ital. brigante came to mean a robber or pirate; hence brig, brigandine, brigantine for a pirate ship, then a type of sailing vessel. Brigade and Brigadier are also derivatives.

Brigandine (brig' an din). The armour of a BRIGAND, consisting of small plates of iron on quilted linen, and covered with leather, hemp, etc. The word occurs twice in Jeremiah (xlvi, 4; li, 3), and in both of these passages the REVISED VERSION reads "coats of mail".

Brighton. Doctor Brighton. The town of Brighton in Sussex, from its popularity as a health resort. Originally the fishing village of BRIGHTHELMSTONE, it changed its name at the beginning of the 19th century. Dr. Richard Russell drew attention to its possibilities as a watering-place in the 1750s and it rapidly gained in favour after the PRINCE OF WALES first spent a holiday there in 1782. Subsequently he built the Royal Pavilion, in which he resided on his annual visits, thereby making the town fashionable. This NICK-NAME seems to have come into being about the end of the REGENCY.

And then fell to talking about Brighton, and the sea-air and the gaieties of the place.

THACKERAY: Vanity Fair, Ch. xxv.

Brilliant. A form of cutting of precious stones introduced by Vincenzo Peruzzi at Venice in the late 17th century. Most diamonds are now brilliant cut and the word brilliant commonly means a DIAMOND cut in this way. In a perfect brilliant there are fifty-eight facets.

Brilliant Madman, The. Charles XII of Sweden (1682, 1697-1718).

Macedonia's madman or the Swede.
JOHNSON: Vanity of Human Wishes.

Bring. To bring about. To cause a thing to be done.

To bring down the house. To cause rapturous applause in a theatre.

To bring forth. To produce or give birth.

To bring in. To introduce, to pronounce a verdict.

To bring into play. To cause to act, to set in motion.

To bring off. To achieve successfully.

To bring on. To cause an event or speed it up.

To bring round. To restore to consciousness or health; to cause one to recover from a faint or fit, etc.

To bring to. To restore to consciousness, to resuscitate. In sailing, to luff.

There are other meanings.

"I'll bring her to," said the driver, with a brutal grin; "I'll give her something better than camphor."—H. BEECHER STOWE: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

To bring to bear. To apply oneself to, to focus one's efforts or attention upon, as guns or searchlights are trained on a target.

To bring to book. To detect one in a mistake, to bring one to account.

To bring to pass. To cause to happen.

To bring to the hammer. To offer or sell by public auction.

To bring under. To bring into subjection.

To bring up. To rear from birth or an early age. To moor or anchor a ship. Also numerous other meanings.

Brinkmanship. A term coined by Adlai Stevenson in 1956 (though he disclaimed originality), with especial reference to the policy of J. Foster Dulles as leading to the brink of war. It is now generally used for policies leading to the verge, and possible outbreak, of war.

Brinvilliers, Marquise de (brin vè' yā), (c. 1630-1676), a notorious French poisoner. She married the Marquis in 1651 and became the mistress of the Seigneur de Sainte Croix in 1659. Her father secured the latter's consent to the BASTILLE by lettre de CACHET, where Sainte Croix learnt the use of poison (probably AQUA TOFANA). Together they plotted revenge and she poisoned her father in 1666 and two brothers in 1670. Her crimes were discovered when Sainte Croix died of accidental poisoning in 1672, and the Marquise was duly beheaded and burned. See CHAMBRE ARDENTE.

Briny. I'm on the briny. The sea, which is salt like brine.

Brioche (bré' osh). A kind of sponge-cake made with flour, butter, and eggs. When Marie Antoinette was talking about the bread riots in Paris of 5 and 6 October 1789, the Duchesse de Polignac naïvely exclaimed, "How is that these silly people are so clamorous for bread, when they can buy such nice brioches for a few sous?" It is said that our own Princess Charlotte avowed that she would for her part "rather eat beef than starve" and wondered why the people should insist upon bread when it was so scarce.

Briseis. The patronymic name of Hippodamia, daughter of Briseus. She was the cause of the quarrel between AGAMEMNON and ACHILLES, and when the former robbed Achilles of her, Achilles withdrew from battle and the Greeks lost ground daily. Ultimately, Achilles sent his friend PATROCLUS to supply his place; he was slain, and Achilles, towering with rage, rushed to battle, slew HECTOR, and TROY fell.

Brissotins. A name given to the republican group in the French Revolution led by Jaques Pierre Brissot (1754-1793), more commonly known as the GIRONDISTS.

Bristol Board. A stiff drawing paper or fine cardboard said to have been first made at Bristol.

Bristol Boy, The. Thomas Chatterton (1752-1770), who was born at Bristol and there composed his ROWLEY POEMS (see under FORGERIES).

The marvellous boy,
The sleepless soul that boisted in his pride.
WORDSWORTH: Resolution and Independence.

Bristol cream is a particularly fine rich brand of SHERRY. See BRISTOL MILK.

Bristol diamonds. Brilliant crystals of colourless quartz found in St. Vincent's Rock, Clifton, Bristol. Spenser refers to them as "adamants".

Bristol fashion. See ALL SHIP-SHAPE AND BRISTOL FASHION under ALL.

Bristol milk. Sherry SACK, at one time given by the Bristol people to their friends.

This metaphorical milk, whereby Xeres or Sherry-sack is intended.—FULLER: Worthies.

Bristol waters. Mineral waters of Clifton, Bristol, formerly celebrated in cases of pulmonary consumption.

Britain (M.E. Bretayne through O.Fr. Bretaigne from Lat. Britannia). An anglicized form of the Latin name for England,

Britannia

WALES and SCOTLAND, called Britannia by CAESAR and other Roman writers. In the 4th century B.C. the inhabitants were known as Pritani or Priteni, and under the Roman occupation they were known as Britones.

Great Britain consists of "Britannia prima" (England), "Britannia secunda" (Wales), and "North Britain" (Scotland), united under one sway. The term was first officially used in 1604 when James I was proclaimed "King of Great Britain" and was previously used by some writers to distinguish Britain from "Brittania Minor", or Brittany, in France.

Britannia. The earliest figure of Britannia as a female figure reclining on a shield is on a Roman coin of Antoninus Pius, who died in A.D. 161. The figure reappeared on our copper coin in the reign of Charles II, 1665, and the model was Frances Stewart, afterwards Duchess of Richmond. The engraver was Philip Roetier.

The king's new medall, where in little, there is Mrs. Stewart's face . . . and a pretty thing it is, that he should choose her face to represent Britannia by.

Pepys's Diary.

British Lion, The. The pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to the JOHN BULL, which symbolizes their substantiality, solidity and obstinacy.

To twist the tail of the British lion, or to twist the lion's tail used to be a favourite phrase particularly in America for attempting to annoy the British people or provoke them by abuse or to inflict a rebuff. This was a device used to gain the support of Irish Americans.

British Museum. This famous institution began in Montagu House, Great Russell Street. It resulted from an Act of 1753 and its first collections were purchased from the proceeds of a public lottery.

Britomart (brit' ð mart). In Spenser's Faerie Queene, a female knight, daughter of King Ryence of Wales. She is the personification of chastity and purity; encounters the "savage, fierce bandit mountaineer" without injury, and is assailed by "hag and unlaidd ghost, goblin and swart fairy of the mine", but "dashes their brute violence into sudden adoration and blank awe". She finally marries ARTEGAL.

Spenser got the name, which means "sweet maiden", from Britomartis, a Cretan NYMPH of Greek mythology, who was very fond of the chase. King MINOS fell in love with her, and persisted in his advances for nine months, when she threw herself into the sea.

Briton. To fight like a Briton is to fight with indomitable courage.

To work like a Briton is to work hard and perseveringly. A similar phrase is "To work like a Trojan".

Brittany, The Damsel of. Eleanor, daughter of Geoffrey, second son of Henry II of England and Constance, daughter of Conan IV of Brittany. At the death of Prince Arthur (1203) she became heiress to the English throne, but King John confined her in Bristol castle, where she died in 1241.

Broach. To broach a subject. To open up a subject or start a topic in conversation. The allusion is to beer barrels which are tapped by means of a peg called a broach. So "to broach a subject" is to bring it to light, as beer is drawn from the cask after it has been broached.

I did broach this business to your highness.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, II, iv.

Broad Arrow. The symbol with which Government stores are marked as a precaution against theft, also once forming a pattern on convicts' uniforms. There are various explanations of its origin but in 1698 an Act was passed imposing heavy penalties on anyone found in possession of naval stores or other goods marked with the broad arrow. See ROGUE'S YARN.

Broad Bottom Ministry. A name particularly applied to Henry Pelham's administration (1743-1754) from 1744, which was reinforced by the admission of members of various opposition groups.

Broad Church. A group within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND favouring theological liberalism and tolerance, typified by the writers of Essays and Reviews (1860). The name dates from the mid-19th century and the party have certain affinities with the LATITUDINARIANS of former times. They were the forerunners of the MODERNISTS. Cp. HIGH CHURCH; LOW CHURCH.

Broadside. In naval language, the whole side of a ship, thus to fire a broadside is to discharge all the guns on one side simultaneously. It is also another name for a broadsheet, a large sheet of paper printed on one side, once a popular form of selling printed ballads, etc.

Brobdingnag. In Swift's Gulliver's Travels, the country of the giants, to whom Gulliver was a pigmy "not half so big as a round little worm plucked from the lazy finger of a maid". Hence the adjective, Brobdingnagian, colossal.

Brocken. See SPECTRE.

Brodie, Steve. He jumped off Brooklyn Bridge, 23 July 1886. Known as "the man who wouldn't take a dare" he made this leap to win a bet of $200.

Broken Music. In Tudor England this term meant: (1) Part, or concerted music, i.e. music performed on instruments of different classes such as the consorts given in Morley's Consort Lessons (1599), which are written for the treble lute, cithern, pandora, flute, treble viol, and bass viol; (2) Music played by a string orchestra, the term in this sense probably originating from harps, lutes, etc., played without a bow and unable to sustain a long note. Bacon uses it in this sense.

Dancing to song is a thing of great state and pleasure. I understand it that the song be in quire, placed aloft and accompanied with some broken music.—Essays: Of Masques and Triumphs.

SHAKESPEARE makes verbal play with the term:

Pand: Fair prince, here is good broken music.
Paris: You have broke it cousin: and by my life, you shall make it whole again.

Troilus and Cressida, III, i.

Broker. This word originally meant a man who broached wine and then sold it; hence one who buys to sell again, a retailer, a second-hand dealer, a middleman. The word is formed in the same way as tapster, one who taps a cask. Thus bill-broker, cotton-broker, pawn-broker, ship-broker, stock-broker, etc.

Bromide. One given to trite remarks, then the remark itself. It was first used in this latter sense by Gelett Burgess (1866–1951) in his novel Are You a Bromide? (1906).

Brontes (bron' tēz). A blacksmith personified; in Greek mythology, one of the CYCLOPS. The name signifies Thunder.

Brontës, The. The three novelist sisters and their brother Patrick. See BELL.

Bronx cheer. The American term for a vulgar derisive sound made with the tongue between the lips, known in England as a "RASPBERRY".

Broom. The small wild shrub with yellow flowers (Lat. planta genista) from which the English royal dynasty unhistorically called PLANTAGENETS were named. The founder of the dynasty, Geoffrey of Anjou (father of Henry II), was nicknamed Plantagenet because he wore a sprig of broom in his hat, but it was not until about 1448 that the name was assumed by Richard, Duke of York (father of Edward IV), as a surname. It is more correct to refer to ANGEVIN, LANCASTRIAN, and YORKIST kings.

Broom. A broom hung at the masthead of a ship indicates that it is for sale or to be "swept away". The idea is popularly taken to be an allusion to Admiral Van Tromp (see PENNANT). It is more probably due to the custom of hanging up something special to attract notice, as a bush meant wine for sale; an old piece of carpet outside a window meant furniture for sale; a wisp of straw meant oysters for sale, etc.

New brooms sweep clean. Those new in office are generally very zealous at first, and sometimes ruthless in making changes.

Brosier my dame. A phrase used at Eton, meaning "to eat one out of house and home". When a dame kept an unusually bad table, the boys agreed on a day to eat, pocket, or waste everything eatable in the house. The hint was generally effective. (Gr. broso, to eat.)

Brother used attributively with another noun denotes a fellow-member of the same calling, order, corporation, etc. Apart from the more formal instances, we may note: brother birch, a fellow-schoolmaster; brother blade, a fellow-soldier or companion in arms; brother brush, a fellow-painter; brother bung, a fellow-innkeeper; brother Crispin, a fellow-shoemaker; brother Mason, a fellow-free-mason; brother string, a fellow-violinist; etc.

Brother Jonathan. It is said that when Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion was forthcoming. "We must consult brother Jonathan," said the general, meaning His Excellency Jonathan Trumbull, governor of the State of Connecticut. This was done and the difficulty was remedied. Hence the set phrase "To consult Brother Jonathan", and Brother Jonathan became the JOHN BULL of the United States until replaced by UNCLE SAM. (See under SAM.)

Brougham (brō' am, brum). A closed four-wheel carriage drawn by one horse, very similar to the old GROWLERS. It was named after Lord Brougham (1778–1868), a prominent WHIG politician and one-time Lord CHANCELLOR.

Brow-beat. To beat or put down with sternness, arrogance, in a bullying manner, etc.; from knitting the brows and frowning on one's opponent.

Brown. A copper coin; a penny; so called from its colour, just as a sovereign was a "yellow boy".

Browned off. A slang phrase (derivation uncertain) widely current in World War II, signifying "fed up" or "bored stiff". Cheesed off is a similar expression. See COOKING.

To be done brown. To be deceived, taken in; seen off, to be "roasted". One of the many expressions connected with cooking. See ROAST; COOK.

Brown Bagger. A "swot" type of undergraduate, especially at the modern universities. The term is derived from the brown attaché case in which students (especially non-resident students) used to carry their books.

A "Brown Bagger" I must explain, is a peculiar person; he is one who arrives at 10 a.m. (or earlier) and leaves at 5 p.m., takes no active part in the social life of the college, works at home or elsewhere on Boat Race and Athletic Days when the college is shut and perhaps knows only by hearsay where the Union is.

Westminster City School Magazine, Dec. 1930.

Brown Bess. A familiar name for the old flint-lock musket formerly in use in the British Army. In 1808 a process of browning was introduced but the term was current long before this and probably referred to the colour of the stock. Bess is unexplained but may be a counterpart to Bill in BROWN BILL.

Brown Bill. A kind of halberd used by foot-soldiers before muskets took their place. The brown probably refers to their rusty condition though it may equally stand for burnished (Dut. brun, shining) as in the old phrases "my bonnie brown sword", "brown as glass", etc. Keeping the weapons bright, however, is a modern habit; our forefathers preferred the honour of bloodstains. In the following extract the term denotes the soldiers themselves:

Lo, with a band of bowmen and of pikes
Brown bills and targetiers.

MARLOW: Edward II, I, 1324.

Brown Bomber. Joe Louis (b. 1914), undefeated heavyweight champion of the world from 1937 until his retirement in 1949. On his return in 1950 he was defeated by Ezzard Charles. He began his career in 1934, winning 27 fights, all but four by knockouts. The phrase comes from his being a Negro and from the great power of his punches.

Brown George. A large earthenware vessel such as that mentioned by Thomas Hughes in Tom Brown at Oxford (1861).

Brown, Jones, and Robinson. The typification of middle-class Englishmen; from the adventures of three Continental tourists of these names which were told and illustrated by Richard Doyle in Punch in the 1870s. These sketches hold up to ridicule the gaucherie, insularity, vulgarity, extravagance, conceit, and snobbery of the middle class, and are in themselves an outstanding example of Victorian snobbery in their ill-mannered sneers at the uneducated.

Brown Shirts. Hitler's NAZI Party in Germany, so called from the colour of their shirts.

Brown study. Absence of mind; apparent thought but real vacuity. The corresponding French phrase explains it—sombre rêverie. Sombre and brun both mean sad, melancholy, gloomy, dull.

Brownie. The home spirit in Scottish superstition. He is called in England ROBIN GOODFELLOW. At night he is supposed to busy himself on little jobs for the family over which he presides. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits and farms are their favourite abode. See also GIRL GUIDES.

Brownists. Followers of Robert Browne, who established a congregational society at Norwich in 1580. Both episcopal and presbyterian organization was rejected. Browne eventually left his own society and returned to the Church. See INDEPENDENTS.

I had as lief be a Brownist as a politician.
SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, III, ii.

Browse his jib, To. A sailor's phrase meaning to drink till the face is flushed and swollen. The jib means the face and to browse here means "to fatten". Formed from "to bowse the jib" which means to hold the jib taut, thus metaphorically signifying to be "TIGHT".

Bruin (bru' in). In Butler's Hudibras, one of the leaders arrayed against the hero. His prototype in real life was Talgol, a NEWGATE butcher who obtained a captaincy for valour at Naseby. He marched next to Orsin (Joshua Gosling, landlord of the bear-gardens at SOUTHWARK).

Sir Bruin. The bear in the famous medieval beast-epic, REYNARD THE FOX.

Brumaire (brū' mâr). In the French Revolutionary CALENDAR, the month from 23 October to 21 November; named from brume, fog (Lat. bruma, winter). The celebrated COUP D'ÉTAT of 18 Brumaire (9 November 1799) was when NAPOLEON overthrew the DIRECTORY and established the Consulate, thus ending the sway of the revolutionary oligarchy.

Brumby. An Australian wild horse. The origin of the word is obscure.

Brummagem (brūm' à jem). Worthless or inferior metal articles made in imitation of better ones. The word is a local form of the name Birmingham, formerly noted for its output of cheap trinkets, toys, imitation jewellery, etc.

Brummel, George Bryan. See BEAU.

Brunhild (broon' hild). Daughter of the King of Islant, and of superhuman physique, beloved by GUNTHER, one of the two great chieftains in the NIBEL-UNGENLIED. She was to be won by strength, and SIEGFRIED contrived the matter but Brunhild never forgave him for his treachery.

Brunswicker. See BLACK BRUNSWICKERS.

Brunt. To bear the brunt. To bear the worst stress, the worst of the shock. The brunt of the battle is the hottest part of the fight. Brunt is possibly connected with the Icel. bruna, to advance like fire.

Brush. The tail of a fox or a squirrel, which is bushy and brush-like.

He brushed by me. He just touched me as he hurried by. Hence also brush, a slight skirmish.

Give it another brush. A little more attention; bestow a little more labour on it.

To brush aside. To sweep out of the way; to take no account of.

To brush up. To renovate or revive; to bring back into use that which has been neglected as, "I must brush up my French."

To get the brush off (of American origin). To be put aside, rejected or dismissed.

Brut. A rhyming chronicle of British history beginning with the mythical Brut, or BRUTE, and so named from him. Wace's Le Roman de Brut, or Brut d'Angleterre, is a rhythmic translation of Geoffrey of Monmouth's History, with additional legends. Wace's work formed the basis of Layamon's Brut (early 13th century), a versified history of England from the fall of TROY to A.D. 698. (See ARTHURIAN ROMANCES.)

Brute (broot), or Brutus. In the mythological history of Britain the first king was Brute, the son of Sylvius (grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of ÆNEAS). Having inadvertently killed his father, he first took refuge in Greece, and then in Britain. In remembrance of TROY he called the capital of his kingdom TROY-NOVANT, now London.

Brutum fulmen (broo' tum fül' men) (Lat.) A noisy but harmless threatening; an innocuous thunderbolt. The phrase is from Pliny II, xliii, 113: "Bruta fulmina et vana, ut quae nulla veniant ratione naturae"—Thunderbolts that strike blindly and harmlessly, being traceable to no natural cause.

The actors do not value themselves upon the Clap, but regard it as a mere Brutum fulmen, or empty Noise, when it has not the sound of the Oaken Plant in it.

ADDISON: Spectator (29 Nov. 1711).

Brutus, Junius (broo' tus, joo' ni ùs). In legend, the first consul of ROME, fabled to have held office about 509 B.C. He condemned to death his own two sons for joining a conspiracy to restore the banished TARQUIN.

Brutus, Marcus (85-42 B.C.). Caesar's friend, who joined the conspiracy to murder him.

Et tu Brute. Thou, too, Brutus! Caesar's exclamation when he saw that his old friend was one of his assassins. "Does my old friend raise his hand against me?"

The Spanish Brutus. Alphonso Perez de Guzman (1258-1320). While he was governor, Castile was besieged by Don JUAN who had revolted against his brother Sancho IV. Juan threatened to cut the throat of Guzman's son, whom he held captive, unless Guzman surrendered the city. Guzman replied, "Sooner than be a traitor, I would myself lend you a sword to slay him," and he threw a sword over the city wall. With this the son was slain before his father's eyes.

Bryanites. See BIBLE CHRISTIANS.

Bub. Drink; particularly strong beer.

Drunk with Helicon's waters and double-brewed bub.—PRIOR: To a Person who wrote ill.

Bubastis. The Greek name of the Egyptian goddess of the city of Bast. The Greeks identified her with ARTEMIS and the CAT was sacred to her.

Bubble, or Bubble Scheme. A worthless, unstable, unsound project—an ephemeral scheme, frail as a bubble. See MISSISSIPPI: SOUTH-SEA.

The Bubble Act. An Act of 1719 designed to check the formation of "bubble" companies or schemes. It proved ineffectual and was repealed in 1825.

Bubble and Squeak. Cold boiled potatoes and greens fried up together. They first bubbled in water when boiled and afterwards hissed or squeaked in the frying pan.

Bucca (bŭk' á). A GOBLIN of the wind, once supposed by Cornish people to foretell shipwrecks; also a sprite fabled to live in the tin mines.

Buccaneer (bŭc á nêr'). This name is particularly applied to the PROTESTANT sea rovers and pirates of England, France and the Netherlands who haunted the Caribbean in the 17th century. It is derived through the Fr. boucanier from the Caribbean boucan, smoked dried meat, the preparation of which the adventurers learned from the natives of Hispaniola, where they carried on an illicit trade in boucan. This trade was inevitably combined with lawlessness and piracy and so the word came to signify a desperate piratical adventurer.

Bucentaur (bū sen' tōr) (Gr. bous, ox; centauros, centaur). The name of the Venetian state galley used by the Doge on ASCENSION DAY when Venice was made BRIDE OF THE SEA. The original galley was probably ornamented with a man-headed ox. The third and last Bucentaur was destroyed by the French in 1798.

The spouseless Adriatic mourns her lord
And, annual marriage now no more renewed,
The Bucentaur lies rotting unrestored,
Neglected garment of her widowhood.

BYRON: Childe Harold, iv, 9.

Bucephalus (bull-headed). A horse. The famous charger of ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

Buchan's Weather Periods (bū kán). Alexander Buchan (1829-1907) was secretary of the Scottish Meteorological Society which, under his influence, built an observatory on Ben Nevis. After many years' observation of weather and temperatures he worked out a curve of recurrent periods, six cold and two warm, in the year. The cold periods are 7-10 Feb.; 11-14 April; 9-14 May; 29 June-4 July; 6-11 Aug; 6-12 Nov. The warm periods are 12-15 July; 12-15 Aug. It should be noted that these dates are the mean of many observations and do not predict the probable weather every year.

Buchanites. A deluded group of fanatics, appearing in the west of Scotland in the latter part of the 18th century, and named after their foundress Mrs., or Lucky, Buchan. She called herself the "Friend Mother" claiming to be the woman mentioned in Rev. xii and maintaining that the Rev. Hugh White, a convert, was the "man-child".

I never heard of ale-wife that turned preacher, except Luckie Buchan in the west.

SCOTT: St. Roman's Well, ch. ii.

Buchmanism. See OXFORD GROUP.

Buck. A DANDY; a gay and spirited fellow; a fast young man.

A most tremendous buck he was, as he sat there serene, in state, driving his greys.

THACKERAY: Vanity Fair, ch. vi.

The word is also American slang for a DOLLAR, derived from the time when skins classified as "bucks" and "does", the former being the more valuable.

Buck-basket. A linen-basket. To buck is to wash clothes in lye. The word is probably connected with the Ger. beuchen, Fr. buer, to steep in lye, and perhaps with O.E. bue, a pitcher.

Buck board. An open four-wheeled horse-drawn vehicle formerly used in the U.S.A.; named from the "bucking" motion endured by the occupants due to the springy structure of the floor-boards.

Buckeye State. Ohio, from the abundance of buckeyes or horse-chestnut trees that grow there. A Buckeye is a native of Ohio.

Buck horn. See STOCKFISH.

Buckhorse. A severe blow or slap on the face, from an 18th-century pugilist, John Smith, whose nickname was "Buckhorse". For a small sum he would allow anyone to strike him heavily on the side of the face.

Buck-tooth. A large projecting front-tooth; once called a butter-tooth.

Passing the buck. To evade a task or responsibility and shift it on to someone else. The term is from poker and was the equivalent of passing (i.e. not bidding) in a game of bridge.

Bucket, To. An obsolete slang term for to cheat, of American origin.

Bucket-shop. Probably derived from TO BUCKET, it denoted the office of an "outside" stockbroker, i.e. a non-member of the Stock Exchange. As these offices are used for gambling in stocks rather than investing, the name usually implies a shady establishment.

To give the bucket, to get the bucket. To give (or receive) notice of dismissal from employment. Here bucket is synonymous with SACK.

To kick the bucket. To die. Bucket here is a beam or yoke (O.Fr. buquet, Fr. trébuchet, a balance), and in East Anglia the big frame in which a newly killed pig is suspended is called a bucket. Another theory is that the bucket was kicked away by a suicide, who stood on it the better to hang himself.

Buckle. I can't buckle to. I can't give my mind to work. The allusion is to buckling on one's armour or belt.

To cut the buckle. To caper about, to heel and toe it in dancing. In jigs the two feet buckle or twist into each other with great rapidity.

Throth, it wouldn't lave a laugh in you to see the parson dancing down the road on his way home, and the minister and methodist praicher cuttin' the buckle as they went along.

W. B. YEATS: Fairy tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 98.

To talk buckle. To talk about marriage.
Buckler. See SHIELD.

Bucklersbury (London) was at one time the noted street for druggists and herbalists; hence Falstaff says:

I cannot cog, and say thou art this and that, like a many of these lipping hawthorn buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklers-bury in simple time.
 SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, III, iii.

Buckley's Chance (Austr.). An extremely remote chance. One explanation of the phrase is that it comes from a convict named Buckley who escaped in 1803 and lived over thirty years with aborigines. The second explanation derives it from the Melbourne business house of Buckley and Nunn—hence the pun, "There are just two chances, Buckley's or None."

"To have two chances—mine and Buckley's" is a way of emphasizing that there is only one feasible course of action to take.

Buckmaster's Light Infantry. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Buckram. A strong coarse kind of cloth.

Men in buckram. Imaginary men, as in Falstaff's vaunting tale to Prince Henry. Hence a "buckram army", one which exists only in the imagination.

Four rogues in buckram let drive at me.
 SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv.

Buckshee. Free, gratis. Military slang derived from BAKSHRESH.

Buckskin. A Virginian.

Buddha (būd' à) (Sans. the enlightened). The title given to Prince Siddhartha or GAUTAMA (c. 623-543 B.C.), the founder of BUDDHISM; also called Sakyamuni from the name of his tribe, the Sakyas.

Buddhism. A religion inaugurated by the BUDDHA in India in the 6th century B.C. It holds that the world is a transient reflex of the deity; that the soul is a "vital spark" of deity; and that it will be bound to matter till its "wearer" has, by divine contemplation, so purged and purified it that it is fit to be absorbed into the divine essence.

The four sublime verities of Buddhism are as follows:

- (1) Pain exists.
- (2) The cause of pain is "birth sin" which is the accumulated sins of man's previous existences.
- (3) Pain is only ended by Nirvana.
- (4) The eightfold way that leads to Nirvana is—right faith, right judgment, right language, right purpose, right practice, right obedience, right memory and right meditation.

Esoteric Buddhism. See THEOSOPHY.

Bude, or Gurney Light. A very bright light obtained by supplying an argand gas jet with oxygen, invented by Sir Goldsworthy Gurney (1793-1875) about 1834 and first used in the lighthouse at Bude, Cornwall.

Budge. Lambskin with the wool dressed outwards, worn on the edges of capes, graduates' hoods, etc. Hence the word is used attributively to denote pedantry, stiff formality, etc. Budge Row, Cannon Street, is so called because it was chiefly occupied by budge-makers.

O foolishness of men! that lend their ears
 To those budge-doctors of the stoic fur.
 MILTON: Comus, 706.

Budge Bachelors. A company of men clothed in long gowns lined with budge or lamb's wool, who used to accompany the Lord MAYOR at his inauguration.

Budget (O.Fr. bougette, a wallet). The present meaning of the (normally) annual estimate of revenue and expenditure and statement on financial policy, which the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER lays before the HOUSE OF COMMONS, arose from the custom of bringing the relevant papers to the House in a leather bag and laying them on the table. Hence to budget, to estimate, or to make proper provision for meeting one's expenses.

A budget of news. A bagful of news, a large stock of news.

Cry budget. A watchword or shibboleth; short for MUMBUDGET. Slender says to Shallow:

We have a nay-word how to know one another. I come to her in white and cry mum: she cries budget; and by that time we know one another.
 SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, V, ii.

Buff. Properly, soft stout leather prepared from the skin of a buffalo; hence any light-coloured leather; then figuratively, the bare skin. To stand in buff is to stand without clothing; to strip to the buff is to strip to the skin.

To stand buff. To stand firm; unflinching. Here buff means a blow or buffet. Cp. BLINDMAN'S BUFF.

The phrase also occurs as to stand bluff. Here the allusion is probably nautical; a "bluff shore" is one with a bold and upright front.

That he should have stood bluff to old bachelor so long, and sink into a husband at last.
 SHERIDAN: School for Scandal, II, iii.

Bufs. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Buffalo Bill. William Frederick Cody (1847-1917) earned this name for his hunting the buffalo to provide meat for the labourers constructing the Kansas Pacific Railway in 1876-1878. He is held to have killed 4,280 buffaloes in 18 months. He was born in Iowa and, when little more than a boy, was a rider of the PONY EXPRESS. In 1861 he became a scout for the U.S. army and fought in the CIVIL WAR. Later on he was fighting once more in the Indian wars and single-handedly killed Yellowhand, the Cheyenne chief. In 1883 he organized his Wild West Show, which he brought to Europe for the first time in 1887. He paid various subsequent visits and toured the Continent in 1910. His show, with its Indians, cowboys, sharpshooters and roughriders was outstanding.

Buffer. A chap, a silly old fellow. In M.E. it is used for a stammerer or stutterer.

Buffer State. A small state between two larger neighbours acting as a shock-absorber between the two.

Bug. An old word for GOBLIN, sprite, BOGY; probably from the Welsh bug, a ghost. The word is used in the BUG BIBLE (see BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED), and survives in bogle, bogy, and in bugaboo, a monster or goblin, and bugbear, a scarecrow, or sort of HOBGOBLIN in the form of a bear.

Warwick was a bug that feared us all.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. III, V, ii.

In common usage the word bug is applied to almost any kind of insect or germ, especially an insect of the creeping crawling sort. Also it is colloquially used to refer to anyone "bitten" with a particular craze or obsession, from the love-bug to the money-bug. See BUGHOUSE.

A big bug. A person of importance, especially in his own eyes, a SWELL, a conceited man. There is an old adjective bug, meaning pompous, proud.

Dainty sport toward, Dalvall! sit, come sit.
Sit and be quiet; here are kingly bug-words.
FORD: Perkin Warbeck, III, ii.

Bug-Eye. A flat-bottomed boat used by the oyster fishermen of the coast of Maryland and Virginia, especially in Chesapeake Bay.

Bug-eyed Monster. Generic for the creatures of the science-fiction writers' imaginations, inhabitants of, or visitors from, outer space; from the American slang "bug" (i.e. bulging) eyes.

Bughouse (U.S.A.). Crazy or demented. Also used in England for the old-time cheap cinema in the same way as fleapit.

Fire-bug. A person with a mania for incendiarism. A term of American origin.

Buhl. An incorrect form of BOULE.

Bull. (1) A blunder, or inadvertent contradiction of terms, for which the Irish are proverbial. The British Apollo (No.

22, 1708) says the term is derived from one Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of London in the reign of Henry VII, whose blundering in this way was notorious, but there is no corroboration of this story which must be put down as ben trovato. Another explanation is that it is suggested by the contradiction in a PAPAL BULL in which the POPE humbly styles himself "servant of servants" while asserting complete authority. There was a M.E. verb to bull, to befool, to cheat, and there is the O.Fr. boule or bole, fraud, trickery; the word may be connected with one of these.

(2) Slang for a five-shilling piece. Half a bull is half a CROWN. Possibly from bulia (see PAPAL BULL.); but as BULL'S EYE was older slang term for the same thing, this is doubtful. Hood, in one of his comic sketches, speaks of a crier who, being apprehended, "swallowed three hogs (shillings) and a bull".

(3) It is also short for BULL'S EYE.

(4) Bull (short for bull-shit), originally army slang for excessive spit and polish and unnecessary cleaning of equipment, etc. Now used also for anything useless, unnecessary, or just rubbish and pretence.

(5) In Stock Exchange language, a bull is a speculative purchase for a rise; also a buyer who does this, the reverse of a BEAR. A bull-account is a speculation made in the hope that the stock purchased will rise before the day of settlement. Since the early 18th century the terms bull and bear have been broadly used on the Stock Exchange to describe an optimist or pessimist in share-dealing.

(6) In astronomy, the English name of the northern constellation (Lat. Taurus) which contains ALDEBARAN and the PLEIADES; also the sign of the ZODIAC that the sun enters about 22 April.

(7) Bull is also the name given to a drink from the swillings of empty spirit casks.

Bulling the barrel. Pouring water into a nearly empty rum cask to prevent it leaking. The water which gets impregnated with the spirit is called bull. Hence the seaman's phrase of bulling the teapot (making a second brew).

A brazen bull. An instrument of torture. See INVENTORS.

A bull in a china shop. One who behaves clumsily or acts in a gauche manner, without finesse, or even with violence.

A Papal Bull. An edict issued by the POPE, named from the seal (Lat. bulia) appended to the document. See GOLDEN BULL.

Bull and Gate. Bull and Mouth. PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGNS. A corruption of Boulogne Gate or Mouth, adopted out of compliment to Henry VIII, who took Boulogne in 1544. Fielding's Tom Jones stayed at the "Bull and Gate" in HOLBORN, where there is still a public house of that name.

Bull-baiting. Bull and bear-baiting were popular spectacles in Tudor and Stuart England. The beasts were usually tethered and set upon by dogs. It was made illegal in 1835.

Bull-ring. In Spain the arena where bullfights take place; in England, the place where bulls used to be baited. The name survives in many English towns, as in Birmingham. See MAYOR OF THE BULL-RING.

Bull-Roarer. A flat piece of wood, about eight inches long, attached to a cord and whirled above the head, producing a moaning or humming sound. It was used by the primitive peoples of Australia (called tundun) and North America in rain-making, initiation and fertility ceremonies.

Bull sessions. In the U.S.A. this phrase is applied to long talks, among men only, about life in general or some particular problem.

John Bull. See JOHN BULL.

To score a bull. See BULL'S EYE.

To take the bull by the horns. To attack or encounter a threatened danger fearlessly; to go forth boldly to meet a difficulty, just as a MATADOR will grasp the horns of a bull about to toss him.

Bull's-eye. The inner disc or centre of a target.

Also a black and white streaked peppermint-flavoured sweet.

Also a small cloud appearing seemingly in violent motion, and expanding till it covers the entire vault of heaven, producing a tumult of wind and rain (I Kings, xviii, 44).

Also a thick disc or boss of glass. Hence a bull's-eye lantern, also called a bull's-eye.

To make a bull's-eye, or to score a bull. To gain some signal advantage; a successful coup. To hit the centre of the target.

Bulldog. A man of relentless, tenacious disposition is sometimes so called. A bulldog courage is one that flinches from no danger. The bulldog was formerly used for BULL-BAITING. At Oxford and Cambridge the bulldogs or bullers are the two MYRMIDONS of the proctor, who attend on his heels like dogs, ready to spring on any offending undergraduate.

Boys of the bulldog breed. Britons, especially with reference to their pug-nacity. This phrase comes from Arthur Reece's music-hall song Sons of the Sea, All British born which had a tremendous vogue in late Victorian and Edwardian England. It came at the time of naval rivalry with the Kaiser's Germany and had the same kind of effect as the JINGO song.

Bullet. Every bullet has its billet. Nothing happens by chance and no act is altogether without effect.

Bulletin. An official report of a public event or public news, or of medical attendants on the health of public personages. The word is borrowed from the French, from the Ital. bulletino, a theatre or lottery ticket, from bulla (see PAPAL BULL, above), because of their authentication by an official bulla or seal.

Bully. To overbear with words. A bully is a blustering menacer. The original meaning of the noun was "sweetheart" as in

I kiss his dirty shoe, and from my heart-strings
I love the lovely bully.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, IV, i.

It is probably from the Dut. boel, a lover; and the later meaning may have been influenced by Dut. bul, a bull, also a clown, and bulderen, to bluster.

Bully-beef. Tinned corned beef. Probably from Fr. boulli, boiled meat.

Bully-rag. To intimidate; bully-ragging is abusive intimidation. A rag is a scold.

Bully-rook. SHAKESPEARE uses the term (Merry Wives, I, iii, 2) for a jolly companion, but later it came to mean a hired ruffian.

Bum. An old word for the buttocks or posterior. An American term for a vagrant, hence any worthless fellow.

Bum-bailiff. The Fr. pousse-cul seems to favour the view that bum-bailiff is no corruption. These officers, who made an arrest for debt by touching the debtor on the back, are frequently referred to as bums.

Scout me for him at the corner of the orchard, like a bum-bailiff.

SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, III, iv.

Bum-boat. A small wide boat used to carry provisions to vessels lying off shore. Also called "dirt boats", being used for removing filth from ships lying in the Thames.

Bumble. A BEADLE. So called from the officious, overbearing beadle in Dicken's Oliver Twist; hence bumbledom, fussy officialism, especially on the part of parish officers; also parochial officials collectively.

Bummaree. Middlemen or fishjobbers in BILLINGSGATE Market. It has been suggested that the word is a corruption of bonne marée, good fresh fish, marée being a French term for all kinds of fresh sea-fish.

Bump-off. To murder, a EUPHEMISM deriving from "to take for a ride" (see RIDE).

Bump Races. Rowing contests held annually at Oxford and Cambridge between the colleges, where the boats seek to bump each other, not to overtake.

Bump Suppers. Festivities which follow the BUMP RACES, often accompanied by hilarious behaviour from the undergraduates.

Bun. A tail. See BUNNY.

Bun. Hot cross-buns on GOOD FRIDAY were supposed to be made of the dough kneaded for the HOST, and were marked with a cross accordingly. As they are said to keep for twelve months without turning mouldy, some persons still hang up one or more in their house as a "charm against evil".

The Greeks offered cakes with "horns" to APOLLO, DIANA, HECATE and the MOON. Such a cake was called a bous, and (it is said) never grew mouldy. The round bun represented the full moon, and the cross symbolized the four quarters.

Good Friday comes this month: the old woman runs.

With one a penny, two a penny "hot cross buns",
Whose virtue is, if you believe what's said,
They'll not grow mouldy like the common bread.
Poor Robin's Almanack, 1733.

Bunce. A slang term for money; particularly for something extra or unexpected in the way of profit. Also sometimes used in the sense of perquisites, which can be sold for money. Thought to be a corruption of bonus (in the sense of extra dividend).

Bunch, Mother. A noted London alewife of the late 16th century, on whose name have been fathered many jests and anecdotes, and who is mentioned more than once in the drama of the period.

Now, now, Mother Bunch, how dost thou?
What, dost frowne, Queen Gwyniver, dost winkle?—DEKKER: Satiromastix, III, 1.

Pasquil's Jestes, mixed with Mother Bunches Merriments was published in 1604 and she is humorously described in the "Epistle to the Merrie Reader":

... She spent most of her time in telling of tales, and when she laughed she was heard from Aldgate to the monuments at Westminster, and all South-warke stood in amazement, the Lyons in the Tower, and the Bulls and Beares of Parish Garden roar'd louder than the great roaring Megge ...

She dwelt in Cornhill neere the exchange, and sold strong ale ... and lived an hundred and seventy and five yeares, two days and a quarter, and halfe a minute.

Other books were named after her, such as Mother Bunch's Closet newly Broke Open, containing rare secrets of art and nature, tried and experienced by learned philosophers, and recommended to all ingenious young men and maids, teaching them how to get good wives and husbands.

Bunch of Fives. Slang for the hand or fist.

Bundle off. Get away. To bundle a person off is to send him away unceremoniously. Similar to pack off. The allusion is obvious.

Bundles for Britain. An organization founded in the U.S.A., January 1940, by Mrs. Wales Latham to send parcels of "comforts" to Britain during World War II.

Bundle of Sticks. Æsop, in one of his fables, shows that sticks one by one may be readily broken; not so when several are bound together in a bundle. The lesson taught is that "Union gives strength".

The bundle of rods with an axe or Fasces, the Roman symbol of absolute authority, was adopted by Mussolini's Party. Hence the name FASCIST.

Bundling. The curious and now obsolete New England custom of engaged couples going to bed together fully dressed and thus spending the night. It was a recognized proceeding to which no suggestion of impropriety was attached.

Stopping occasionally in the villages to eat pumpkin pie, dance at country frolics, and bundle with the Yankee lasses.

WASHINGTON IRVING: Knickerbocker.

The same custom existed in Wales and the remoter parts of Scotland.

Bung. A CANT term for a publican; also for a toper. "Away, ... you filthy bung," says Doll to Pistol (SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, II, iv).

Bung up. Close up, as a bung closes a cask.

Bungalow (Hind. bangla, of, or belonging to, Bengal). Originally, the house of a European in India, generally of one storey only with a verandah all round it, and the roof thatched to keep off the hot rays of the sun. A dak-bungalow is a caravansary or house built by the government for the use of travellers. Dr. Brewer says, in his 1894 edition of this dictionary, "There are English bungalows at Birchington and on the Norfolk coast near Cromer."

Bungay. See FRIAR BUNGAY.

Bungay play. Leading with the highest scoring cards in WHIST, instead of attempting any finesse. It may be a corruption of "bungling" or a reference to the supposed rustic slow-wittedness of the people of Bungay in Suffolk.

Castle of Bungay. See CASTLE.

Go to Bungay with you!—i.e. get away and don't bother me; don't talk such stuff. Bungay in Suffolk was famous for the manufacture of leather breeches, once very fashionable. Persons who required new ones re-seated went or sent to Bungay for them. Hence rose the cant saying, "Go to Bungay, and get your breeches mended", shortened into "Go to Bungay with you!"

Bunkum. Claptrap. Now more commonly shortened to bunk. A representative at Washington being asked why he made such a flowery and angry speech, so wholly uncalled for, made answer, "I was not speaking to the House, but to Buncombe," which he represented (North Carolina).

Bunny. A rabbit. So called from the provincial word bun, a tail, especially of a hare, which is said to "cock her bun". Bunny, a diminutive, applied to a rabbit, means the animal with the "little tail".

Bunting. In Somersetshire bunting means sifting flour. Sieves were once made of a strong gauzy woollen cloth, which was tough and capable of resisting wear. It has been suggested that this cloth was found suitable for making flags, hence its present meaning of a material for this purpose.

A "bunt-mill" is a machine for sifting corn.

Bunting-tosser, or sometimes shortened to bunts, a naval nickname for a signalman because he hoisted the bunting (flags and pendants), nowadays a Radio Operator (Tactical). Cp. SPARKER.

Bunyan, Paul. A legendary hero of the lumber camps of the north-western U.S.A. His feats—such as cutting the Grand Canyon of the Colorado by dragging his pick behind him—are told and retold with embellishments by the lumbermen; some of them were collected in a curious volume entitled, Paul Bunyan Comes West.

Bunyip. According to Australian aboriginal folk-lore, a man-eating bellowing monster who drags his victims down to the bottom of the lake or swamp that he inhabits. It is also used to mean an "impostor".

Burble (bĕr'bĕl). To mutter nonsense. In its modern use this is a word invented by Lewis Carroll (Through the Looking Glass) with the meaning to make a sound somewhere between a bubble and a gurgle.

The Jabberwock, with eyes of flame,
Came whiffling through the tulgy wood
And burbled as it came.

Burd. A poetic word for a young lady (cp. BIRD). Obsolete except in ballads.

Burden of a song. A line repeated at intervals constituting a refrain or chorus. It is the Fr. bourdon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double diapason of an organ, used in forte parts and choruses.

Burden of Isaiah. "The Burden of Babylon, which Isaiah the son of Amoz did see" (Isaiah iii, 1, etc.). Burden here is a literal translation of the Heb. massa (rendered in the Vulgate by onus), which means "lifting up", either a burden or the voice; hence utterance, hence a prophecy announcing a calamity, or a denunciation of hardships on those to whom the burden is uttered.

The burden of proof. The obligation to prove something.

Bureaucracy. A system of government in which business is carried on in bureaux or departments. The Fr. bureau means not only the office of a public functionary but the whole staff attached to it. Hence bureaucrat, the head of a department in a bureaucracy; now used to imply a short-sighted, bumpitious, soulless RED-TAPE minded administrator, lacking vision and intelligent understanding.

Burglary means, in English law, breaking into a house by night with intent to commit a felony, and by the Larceny Act of 1861 "night" is limited to the hours between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. At other times such an offence becomes house-breaking.

Burgoyne, Gentleman Johnny. General John Burgoyne (1722-1792), who surrendered to General Gates at Saratoga (1777). He later devoted his time to writing light literature and plays. He earned his nickname for his elegant manner and fondness of fashionable life.

Burgundian. A Burgundian blow, i.e. decapitation. The Duc de Biron, who was put to death for treason by Henry IV, was told in his youth by a fortune-teller, "to beware of a Burgundian blow". When going to execution, he asked who was to be his executioner, and was told he was a man from Burgundy.

Burial of an Ass

Burial of an Ass. No burial at all, just thrown on a refuse heap.

He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Jer. xxii, 19.

Buridan's Ass. A man of indecision; like one on "double business bound, who stands in pause where he should first begin, and both neglects". Buridan was a French scholastic philosopher who died c. 1360, incorrectly reputed to be the father of the well-known SOPHISM:

If a hungry ass were placed exactly between two haystacks in every respect equal, it would starve to death, because there would be no motive why it should go to one rather than to the other.

Burke. To murder by smothering. So called from William Burke, an Irish NAVVY, who with his accomplice William Hare, used to suffocate his victims and sell the bodies to Dr. Robert Knox, an Edinburgh surgeon. Aided by their wives they lured fifteen people to their deaths before discovery. Hare turned King's EVIDENCE and Burke was hanged in 1829.

To burke a question. To smother it at birth. The publication was burked, suppressed before it was circulated.

To be in Burke. To be of an aristocratic family. Burke's Peerage, Baronetage and Knightage has, since 1826, been a recognized authority on Britain's titled classes with their family pedigrees. Cp. DEBRETT.

Burlaw. See BYRLAW.

Burleigh. As significant as the shake of Lord Burleigh's head. In Sheridan's Critic is introduced a mock tragedy called The Spanish Armada. Lord Burleigh is supposed to be too full of state affairs to utter a word; he shakes his head, and Puff explains what the shake means.

Burler. See BIRLER.

Burlesque. Father of burlesque poetry. Hipponax of Ephesus (6th cent. B.C.).

Burlington Bertie. A MASHER. Portrayed in Vesta Tilly's song of that name.

Burma Road. This great highway was made in 1937-1939 to open up the western interior of China by communication with the sea, and ran from Lashio to Kunming in Yunnan, a distance of 770 miles. It was the chief highway for supplies to China during World War II until the Japanese cut it in 1941. It was recaptured in 1945.

Burn. His money burns a hole in his pocket. He cannot keep it in his pocket, he cannot refrain from spending it.

The burnt child dreads fire. Once caught twice shy. "What! wouldst thou have a serpent sting thee twice?"

To burn used adjectivally as in such phrases as money to burn or time to burn means to have much more than is needed and therefore it can be expended without causing any hardship or sense of deprivation.

To burn one's boats. To take an irrevocable step; to cut oneself off from all chance of retreat. When invading forces burned their boats they were impelled to conquer or die—there could be no going back. Cp. RUBICON.

To burn one's fingers. To suffer loss or mischance. The allusion is to taking chestnuts from the fire.

To burn the midnight oil. To work or study late into the night.

To burn the Thames. To set the Thames on fire. See HE'LL NEVER SET THE THAMES ON FIRE under THAMES.

To have a burn. A slang phrase meaning to have a smoke.

The burning question. A question hotly under discussion, the vital question.

You cannot burn the candle at both ends. You cannot do two opposite things at one and the same time, or more commonly, you cannot exhaust your energies in one direction and yet reserve them unimpaired for something else. If you overdo it your health will suffer. To burn the candle at both ends often implies a hectic and somewhat dissipated existence.

We burn daylight. We waste time in talk instead of action (SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, II, i).

Burning Crown. A crown of red-hot iron set on the head of a regicide.

He was adjudged
To have his head seared with a burning crown.
Tragedy of Hoffman (1631).

Burnt Candlemas. The name given by the Scots to the period around CANDLEMAS DAY, 1355-1356, when Edward III marched through the Lothians with fire and sword.

Bursa (Gr. a hide). So the citadel of Carthage was called. The tale is that when DIDO came to Africa she bought from the natives "as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide". The agreement was made, and Dido cut the hide into thongs so as to enclose a space sufficient for a citadel. Cp. DONCASTER.

The following is a similar story: The Yakuts granted to the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a cow's hide; but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the port and town of Yakutsk.

The Indians have a somewhat similar tradition. The fifth incarnation of VISHNU was in the form of a DWARF called Vamen who obtained permission to have as much land as he could measure in three paces to build a hut on. The request was laughed at but granted; whereupon the dwarf grew so prodigiously that with three paces he encircled the world.

Burst. To inform against an accomplice. The same as "split" (to turn King's EVIDENCE). The one who does this splits or breaks up the whole concern.

I'm bursting to tell you so-and-so. I'm all agog to tell you; I can't rest till I've told you.

On the burst. See BUST.

Burton. Gone for a Burton. Dead, or presumed dead; missing or lost (referring to persons or things). Widely used in the services in World War II and said to have originated in the R.A.F.

Burton is famous for beer, hence "a Burton" as a common and popular drink to order in many areas. Thus a token explanation for a person's absence could be "he has gone for a Burton", i.e. he has gone for a beer or drink. The other meanings could come by extension. For sailormen first and airmen afterwards "the drink" is a colloquial expression for the sea. An interconnection of these ideas may be the more likely explanation of the origins and growth of the phrase.

Bury the Hatchet. Let bygones be bygones. The "GREAT SPIRIT" commanded the North American Indians, when they smoked their calumet or peace-pipe, to bury their hatchets, scalping-knives, and war clubs, that all thought of hostility might be put out of sight.

Buried was the bloody hatchet,
Buried was the dreadful war club;
Buried were all warlike weapons,
And the war-cry was forgotten.
There was peace among the nations.

LONGFELLOW: The Song of Hiawatha, xiii.

Burying at the cross roads. See CROSS ROADS.

Bus. A contraction of omnibus. An affectionate term for a car, aeroplane, etc.

Busman's holiday. There is a story that in the old horse-bus days a driver spent his holiday travelling to and fro on a bus driven by one of his pals. From this has arisen the phrase, which means to occupy one's spare or free time on the same or similar work to one's everyday occupation, i.e. a holiday in name only.

To miss the bus. To miss a chance or opportunity.

Bush. One beats the bush but another has the hare. See BEAT THE BUSH.

Good wine needs no bush. That which has real worth, quality or merit does not need to be advertised. An ivy-bush (in the ancient world sacred to BACCHUS) was once the common sign of taverns and ale and wine vendors.

Some ale-houses upon the road I saw,
And some with bushes showing they wine did draw.

Poor Robin's Perambulations (1678).

The proverb is a Latin one, and shows that the Romans introduced the custom into Europe. Vino vendibili hedera non opus est (Columella). It is also common to France. (Au vin qui se vend bien, il ne faut point de lierre).

If it be true that good wine needs no bush, 'tis true that a good play needs no epilogue.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, Epilogue.

Shakespeare does continue with words more encouraging to the modern advertiser: "Yet to good wine they do use good bushes; and good plays prove the better by the help of good epilogues."

Bush. An Australian term for wild wooded and sparsely populated country, derived from the Dut. bosch and imported from South Africa before 1820. It has given rise to a whole vocabulary.

Bush Baptist. A person of dubious religious convictions.

Bush Brotherhood. An association formed to take the Christian religion to the OUTBACK and remote cattle stations. Its members sacrifice their own personal and domestic comforts in so doing.

Bush carpenter. A clumsy, inept joiner.

Bush lawyer. One who argues glibly on a slight or inaccurate basis.

Bushed. An Australian word meaning "lost" or "confused". It has become so general that we find, "a small ship became bushed in the great Van Dieman's Gulf". (BARRATT: Coast of Adventure, 1944).

Bushman. A Hyde Park Bushman. An ignoramus as regards bush life whose acquaintance with the outdoors is limited to city parks such as Sydney's Hyde Park.

Bushmen (Dut. Boschjesman). The Cape of Good Hope aborigines; dwellers in the Australian bush; bush farmers.

Bushrangers. Originally escaped convicts in Australia who lived as robbers in the wilds to avoid recapture, in which sense it is found in the Sydney Gazette in 1805. The word has a modern sense of those who take advantage of their fellows by sharp practice or crime. See KELLY.

Bush-shanty. In Australia a hut selling illegal liquor, often in the gold-rush areas. Hence to shanty is to PUB-CRAWL.

Bush telegraph. In early Australian slang, one who informed the BUSHRANGERS of police movements. Now widespread to indicate any unofficial and undisclosed source of information.

Bush-whacker (Dut. bosch wachter, forest-keeper). In Australia, one who lives in the bush, especially an axeman engaged in clearing scrub. In the U.S.A. a deserter in the CIVIL WAR, who looted behind the lines. Pulling a boat along by means of bushes growing on the river banks was also known as bushwhacking.

It's Sydney or the bush (Austr.). To make a decisive choice between alternatives which might result in success or disaster.

To take to the bush. To become a BUSH-RANGER and live by plunder like a run-away convict.

Bushel. To hide one's light under a bushel. To conceal one's talents; to be self-effacing and modest about one's abilities. The bushel was measured in a wooden or earthenware container, hence under a bushel is to hide something.

Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick.—Matt. v, 15.

To measure other people's corn by one's own bushel. To make oneself the standard of right and wrong; to appraise everything as it accords or disagrees with one's own habits of thought and opinions.

Bushido. The code of conduct of the SAMURAI of Japan. Courage, self-discipline, courtesy, gentleness, and keeping one's word were among the virtues enjoined. Cp. CHIVALRY.

Bushnell's Turtle. A Dutchman, Cornelius van Drebel, successfully demonstrated a submarine in the THAMES in the reign of James I; but the first to be used in naval warfare was David Bushnell's Turtle built at Saybrook, Conn., in 1775 and used to attack (unsuccessfully) the British 64-gun Eagle in New York harbour (1776). It was employed subsequently for laying mines in the Delaware River. It was made of oak, coated with tar and looked like two turtle shells joined together. A foot pedal operated a cock to let in water when it was desired to dive, and two other hand pumps expelled the water to make the vessel rise again.

Business. O.E. bisigness and bisigian, to occupy, to worry, to fatigue. In theatrical parlance "business" or "biz" means by-play, e.g. Hamlet trifling with Ophelia's fan. The "business" is usually the creation of the actor who plays the part and it is handed down by tradition.

Business tomorrow. When the SPARTANS seized upon Thebes they placed Archias over the garrison. Pelopidas with eleven others banded together to put Archias to the sword. A letter giving full details of the plot was given to Archias at the banquet table but he thrust the letter under his cushion, saying, "Business tomorrow." But long ere the sun rose he was dead.

The business end. The end of the tool, etc., with which the work is done. The business end of a chisel is the cutting edge, of a rifle the barrel.

Busiris (bū sī'ris). A mythical king of Egypt who, in order to avert a famine, used to sacrifice to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. HERCULES was seized by him; and would have fallen a victim, but he broke his chain, and slew the inhospitable king.

Busker. There is an old verb to busk, meaning to improvise, and it is from this word that busker is derived, to describe a street or beach singer or performer.

Buskin. Tragedy. The Greek tragic actors used to wear a thick-soled boot or cothurnus to elevate their stature. Cp. SOCK.

Or what (though rare) of later age
Enobled hath the busking stage.

MILTON: Il Penseroso.

Buss. To kiss. An obsolete word, probably of onomatopœic origin, but cp. Lat. basium, Ital. bacio, Sp. beso, and Fr. baiser.

Yon towers, whose wanton tops do buss the clouds,
Must kiss their own feet.

SHAKESPEARE: Troilus and Cressida, IV, v.

Bust. A frolic; a drunken debauch. The word is a vulgarization of BURST.

Busted. Done for, exploded.

To be bust. To be spent up with no money left, to be "broke".

To go on the bust. To go on the SPREE; to PAINT THE TOWN RED.

Buster. Anything of large or unusual size or capacity; a "whacking great lie".

A southerly buster, in Australia, is a heavy gale from the south, striking the east coast of Australia and New Zealand.

To come a buster. To come a CROPPER; to meet with a serious set-back or fall.

Butcher. A title given to many soldiers and others noted for their bloodthirstiness. Achmed Pasha was called djezzar (the butcher), and is said to have whipped off the heads of his seven wives. He was killed at the siege of Acre in 1804.

The Bloody Butcher. The Duke of Cumberland (1721-1765), second son of George II. So called for his ruthless suppression of the Highlanders after the rising under the Young PRETENDER. See JACOBITES.

The Royalist Butcher. Blaise de Montluc (1502-1577), a Marshal of France, distinguished for his cruelties to the PROTESTANTS in the reign of Charles IX.

Butter. Often used figuratively for flattery or "soft-soap", in order to appease or win somebody over. To butter up a person is to flatter them and smooth them down. Punch called it "the milk of human kindness churned into butter".

Butter-fingers. Said of a person who lets things fall out of his hands or slip through his fingers. Often used on the CRICKET field.

I never was a butter-fingers, though a bad batter.—H. KINGSLEY.

Buttered ale. A beverage made of ALE or beer mixed with butter, sugar and cinnamon.

He knows which side his bread is buttered. He knows his own interest.

He looks as if butter would not melt in his mouth. He seems suspiciously amiable. He looks quite harmless, but his innocence is probably misleading. He seems too good to be true.

Soft, or fair words butter no parsnips. Saying "Be thou fed" will not feed a hungry man. Mere words will not find salt to our porridge, or butter our parsnips.

To butter one's bread on both sides. To be wastefully extravagant and luxurious; also to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, to gain advantages from two sides at once.

Buttercups. So called because they were once supposed to increase the butter content of milk. Miller, in his Gardener's Dictionary, says that they were named "under the notion that the yellow colour of butter is owing to these plants".

Butterfly. A light, flippant, objectless young person who flutters from pleasure to pleasure. One who is bright when conditions are favourable but is "done for" when the clouds gather.

The name was once used in the cab trade for those drivers who took up the occupation at the best of the season, in summertime only.

The feeling of the regular drivers against these "butterflies" is very strong.

Nineteenth Century (March 1893, p. 177).

Butterfly kiss. A kiss with the eyelashes, that is, stroking the cheek with one's eyelashes.

Button. A decoy in an auction room was known as a button, because he "buttoned" or tied the unwary to bargains offered for sale. The button fastens or fixes what otherwise would slip away.

Button's Coffee House was established by Daniel Button in 1712, a former servant of the Dowager Countess of Warwick whom Addison married in 1716. It stood on a site in Russell Street, COVENT GARDEN, which was later occupied by HUMMUMS. It was much frequented by Joseph Addison and his circle, which included Steele, Eustace Budgell, Ambrose Philips (see NAMBY-PAMBY), and Carey. It became as much a centre of the WHIG literary fraternity as did WILL'S COFFEE-HOUSE that of the TORY.

Buttons. A page whose jacket in front is remarkable for a display of small round buttons, as close as they can be fixed, from chin to waist. In the pantomime of CINDERELLA, Buttons, the page, is a stock character.

So at last Mrs. Casey, her pangs to assuage,
Having snapped off his buttonses, curried the page.

WALTER DE LA MARE: Buttons.

Bachelor's buttons. See BACHELOR.

He has not all his buttons. He is half-silly; "not all there"; he is a "button short", a "screw loose".

The buttons come off the foils. Figuratively, the courtesies of controversy are neglected. The button of a foil is a ball of waxed thread about one third of an inch in diameter drawn round and over the tip of the blade to prevent injury in fencing.

The button of an épée is a three-pronged piece of metal bound on to the tip of the blade with waxed thread and, by catching in a fencer's clothing, simulates the drawing of blood in a duel. In competitive épée, the button is in two parts, fractionally divided; a hit closes the two parts together, thus completing an electric circuit which, via a thin wire in the blade itself and cables leading from each competitor to an apparatus in front of the judge, causes one of the two bulbs to light up and so automatically register a hit. A similar apparatus for foils is under development.

The button of the cap. The tip-top. Thus in Hamlet (II, ii), Guildenstern says, "On fortune's cap we are not the very button" i.e. the most highly favoured. The button on the cap was a mark of honour. In Imperial China the first grade of literary honour was the privilege of adding a gold button to the cap, and the several grades of MANDARINS are distinguished by a different coloured button on top of their cap. The idea has been used on schoolboys' caps. See PANJANDRUM.

'Tis in his buttons. He is destined to obtain the prize; he is the accepted lover. Boys used to count their buttons, as plum-stones, etc., are counted on one's dish, to see what trade they were to follow, whether to do a thing or not, and whether some favourite favours them.

'Tis in his buttons; he will carry't.
SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, III, ii.

To have a soul above buttons. To be worthy, or rather, to consider oneself worthy, of better things; to believe that one has abilities too good for one's present employment. This is explained by George Colman in Sylvester Daggerwood (1795): "My father was an eminent button-maker . . . but I had a soul above buttons . . . and panted for a liberal profession."

To have something buttoned up. To have something organized; to have it under control, everything tied up.

To press the button. To set in motion, literally or figuratively; generally by simple means, as the pressing of a button will start electrically driven machinery.

To take by the button. TO BUTTONHOLE A PERSON.

Buttonhole. A flower or nosegay worn in the coat buttonhole.

To buttonhole a person. To detain him in conversation; to deliberately waylay someone to speak to them. The allusion is to a former habit of holding a person by the button or buttonhole while in conversation. The French have the same locution: Serrer le bouton (à quelqu'un).

To take one down a buttonhole. To take one down a PEG; to lower one's conceit.

Better mind yerselves, or I'll take ye down a buttonhole lower.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE: Uncle Tom's Cabin, IV.

Buy. To buy in. To collect stock by purchase; to withhold the sale of something offered at auction because the bidding has not reached the reserve price. On the Stock Exchange buying in is the term used when, a seller having sold stock that he is unable to deliver, the buyer purchases the stock himself in the market and charges the extra cost, if any, to the original seller.

See SELLING OUT.

Buying a pig in a poke. See PIG.

To buy off. To give a person money or some form of reward to drop a claim, put an end to contention, or throw up a partnership.

To buy out. To redeem or ransom.

Not being able to buy out his life,
Dies ere the weary sun set in the west.
SHAKESPEARE: Comedy of Errors, I, ii.

To buy over. To induce one by a bribe to renounce a claim; to gain over by bribery.

To buy up. To purchase stock to such an amount as to obtain a virtual monopoly, and thus command the market; to make a CORNER, as to "buy up corn", etc.

Buzfuz (büz'füz). Sergeant Buzfuz was the windy, grandiloquent counsel for Mrs Bardell in the famous breach of promise trial described in Pickwick Papers. He represented a type of barrister of the early 19th century, seeking to gain his case by abuse of the other side and a distortion of the true facts.

Buzz. A rumour, a whispered report. An old usage. The word buzzer for a whisperer of rumours, a secret whisperer, etc., is now seldom used, instead we have buzz-monger, as a spreader of rumours, etc.

To buzz. Either, to empty the bottle to the last drop, in which case the partially-filled glass is called a buzz and entitles the recipient to another full glass; or, when there is not enough liquor left to fill a glass for everyone, to share it out equally. Perhaps a corruption of bouse. See BOOZE.

Buzzard. In Dryden's The Hind and the Panther is meant for Dr. Burnet.

Between hawk and buzzard. Not quite the equal of master or mistress nor quite a servant. Applied to BEAR-LEADERS, governesses, and other adults who used to be allowed to come down to dessert, but not to the dinner table.

Buzzard called hawk by courtesy. It is a EUPHEMISM, a brevet rank, a complimentary title.

The noble Buzzard ever pleased me best;
Of small renown, 'tis true; for, not to lie
We call him but a hawk by courtesy.

DRYDEN: The Hind and the Panther, III, 1221.

By-and-by now means a little time hence, but at the time of the preparation of the AUTHORIZED VERSION of the Bible it meant instantly. "When tribulation or persecution ariseth . . . by-and-by he is offended" (Matt. xiii, 21); rendered in Mark iv, 17, by the word "immediately". Our presently means in a little time, soon, but formerly it meant at present, at once; in this sense it is not an uncommon usage in the U.S.A.

By the street of by and by one arrives at the house of never. A Spanish proverb which is roughly the equivalent of, "Procrastination is the thief of time." Things postponed never get done.

By and large. Taking one thing with another, generally speaking. This is really a nautical phrase. When a vessel is close-hauled, to sail by and large is to sail slightly off the wind, making it easier for the helmsman to steer and less likely for the vessel to be taken ABACK.

By-blow. A bastard.

I it is have been cheated all this while,
Abominably and irreparably—my name
Given to a cur-cast mongrel, a drab's brat,
A beggar's bye-blow.

BROWNING: The Ring and the Book, iv, 612.

By-laws. Local laws. From by, a town (e.g. Selby). Laws of local or restricted application introduced by local government authorities, joint-stock companies, etc. They must not conflict with the laws of the land. See BYRLAW.

By-line. A journalist's signature. When a newspaper reporter progresses from anonymous to signed contributions, he is said to have got a by-line.

By-the-by. En passant, laterally connected with the main subject. By-play is side or secondary play; by-roads and streets are those which branch out of the main thoroughfare. The first by means passing from one to another, as in the phrase "Day by day". Thus By-the-by is passing from the main subject to a by or secondary one.

By-the-way. An introduction to an incidental remark thrown in, and tending the same way as the discourse itself.

Bycorne. See BICORN.

Bye Plot, or Watson's Plot. So called from its presumed connection with Cobham's plot or the MAIN PLOT. In 1603, William Watson, a Roman Catholic priest, and others, plotted to capture James I and to secure toleration from him. Some PURITANS collaborated but the plans were revealed by a JESUIT and Watson was beheaded.

Byerly Turk. See DARLEY ARABIAN.

Byrlaw. A local law in the rural districts of Scotland. The inhabitants of a district used to make certain laws for their own observance, and appoint one of their neighbours, called the Byrlaw-man, to carry out the pains and penalties. Byr = by, common in such names as Derby, the town on the Derwent, Grimsby, Aswardby, Spilsby, etc., and is present in BY-LAWS.

Byron. Lord George Gordon Byron (1788-1824). The great English poet, much admired by his European contemporaries, who died at Missolonghi, serving the cause of Greek Independence.

The Polish Byron. Adam Mickiewicz (mês kâ' vetch) (1798-1855), orator and national poet, buried among the Polish kings in Wawel Cathedral.

The Russian Byron. Alexander Sergeivich Pushkin (1799-1837).

Byrsa. See BURSA.

Byzantine (bi zân tin). Another name for the BEZANT.

Byzantine Art (from Byzantium, the former name of Constantinople, now Istanbul). A blend of Roman and Eastern influence and Christian symbolism by the early Greek or Byzantine artists. Its chief features are the circle, dome and round arch; and its chief symbols the LILY, CROSS, VESICA and NIMBUS. St. Sophia at Istanbul and St. Mark at Venice are excellent examples of Byzantine architecture and decoration. Westminster Cathedral, the great Roman Catholic cathedral in Ashley Gardens, Westminster, first used in 1904, is a fine modern example of Early Byzantine style. It was designed by J. F. Bentley, who died in 1903. Cardinal Wiseman and Cardinal Manning are buried there.

Byzantine Empire. The Eastern or Greek Empire, which lasted from the separation of the eastern and western Roman Empires on the death of Theodosius in 395 until the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.

C

C. The form of the letter is a rounding of the Gr. gamma (Γ), which was a modification of the Phœnician sign for gimel, a camel. It originally corresponded with the Gr. gamma, as its place in the alphabet indicates.

C in Roman notation stands for centum, 100. Hence the Fr. cent, etc. When the French c has a mark called a cedilla under it, thus, ç, it is to be pronounced as an s. There are poems written in which every word begins with C. There is one by Hamconius called "Certamen catholicum cum Calvinistis" and another by Henry Harder in Latin on Cats. See ALLITERATION.

C3. Signifies a physical weakling or something of third-rate quality. The lowest category in the medical examination for service in the armed forces. Cp. A1.

Ca'canny. A Scots expression meaning "go easy", "don't exert yourself", much the same as "go slow". In trade-union parlance it means WORKING TO RULE, restricting output as a means of exerting pressure on employers. Ca' is caw, to drive, and canny here means "gently".

Ça ira (it will go). The name and refrain of a popular French patriotic song which became the Carillon National of the French Revolution. It went to the tune of the Carillon National, which Marie Antoinette was for ever strumming on her harpsichord.

As a rallying cry it was borrowed from Benjamin Franklin, who used to say, in reference to the American Revolution, "Ah! ah! ça ira, ça ira!" ('twill be sure to do). The refrain of the French revolutionary version was:

Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira,
Les aristocrates à la lanterne.

Caaba. See KAABA.

Cab. A contraction of cabriolet, a small one-horse carriage, from the Ital. capriola, a caper, the leap of a kid, from the lightness of the carriage compared with its lumbering early predecessors. Cabs were introduced into London in the 19th century.

Cabal. A JUNTO, a council of intriguers. The famous Cabal (1667-1673) of Charles II's reign, the group of five ministers, the initial letters of whose names (Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, Lauderdale) by coincidence spelt this word, did not give rise to the usage. It was often applied in the 17th century to the king's inner group of advisers. See CABBALA.

Cabala, Cabalist. See CABBALA.

Cabbage. An old term for odd bits of cloth, etc., left over after making up suits and other garments, appropriated by working tailors as perquisites. Hence a tailor was sometimes nicknamed "cabbage", and to cabbage means to pilfer. It was formerly so used in schoolboy slang as well as for something "cribbed". (See TO CRIB under CRIB.)

Cabbage-garden, Battle of Widow McCormack's. The derisive name given to the scuffle in Ballingarry which terminated Smith O'Brien's pitiful insurrection of July 1848. The cabbages suffered most in the struggle.

Cabbage-garden patriots. Cowards. A reference to William Smith O'Brien's easily dispersed rebels.

Cabbage-patchers. Nicknames for the inhabitants of Victoria, Australia, who are also known as YARRA-YABBIES.

Cabbage Tree Ned. Edward Devine, born in Tasmania, 1833, died at Ballarat, 1909. Australia's most famous coach driver who for many years drove the Geelong to Ballarat coach. In 1862 he drove the great twelve-horse coach which carried ninety passengers, among them the first visiting CRICKET team from England, whose driver he remained throughout their tour.

Cabbala. The word is the Heb. qabbalah or kabbalah, which means "accepted by tradition." It is particularly applied to a Jewish mystical system of theology and metaphysics, dating from the 11th and 12th centuries, but with much older antecedents in the teachings of the Neoplatonists and Neopythagoreans, etc. Its aim was to relate the finite and the infinite, which was brought about by emanations from the Absolute Being. Scriptural passages were treated as symbolic and interpretation was based on the significance of numbers. The most important Cabbalistic work is the Zohar, written in the 13th century, but based on earlier material. Our CABAL is from Cabbala.

Cabbalist. From the later MIDDLE AGES the cabbalists were chiefly occupied in concocting and deciphering charms, mystical anagrams, etc., by unintelligible combinations of letters, words and numbers; in searching for the PHILOSOPHER'S STONE; in prognostications, attempted or pretended relations with the dead, and suchlike fantasies.

Cabinet, The. In Britain, the inner committee of ministers, headed by the Prime Minister, who hold the highest executive offices and largely determine national policy. The Prime Minister chooses the many ministers and decides the composition of the Cabinet, which has varied in size, but latterly contained about twenty. Among those now included are the Chancellor of the Exchequer; the Secretaries of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, Home Affairs, Scotland, Wales, Economic Affairs, Employment and Productivity; the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; the Ministers of Defence, Education and Science, Housing and Local Government, Technology, Transport; the President of the Board of Trade, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, and the Lord Privy Seal. The Cabinet is collectively responsible to Parliament and its decisions are binding on all members of the government.

The word cabinet originally meant a small room and eventually came to apply to the group of politicians who met in the room. The Cabinet has its real origins in the reign of Charles II (1660-1685) and it developed steadily from Hanoverian times with the growth of the Prime Minister's influence, and by the latter part of the 18th century ministerial responsibility was fairly well established.

In the U.S.A. the Cabinet consists of the heads of the great departments of state (twelve in number), who are appointed by the President and serve as his advisers. Unlike their British counterparts they are not members of the legislature and cannot take part in debates. A new Cabinet post must be authorized by an Act of Congress. They hold office during the President's pleasure. If the President is elected for a second term they continue in office, except the Postmaster General, who has to be reappointed. The President is more independent of his cabinet's advice than is the British Prime Minister.

Shadow Cabinet. A potential cabinet formed from leaders of the OPPOSITION party in PARLIAMENT, who also take the lead as critics of particular features of government policy.

Cabiri (ka bí' ri), probably of Phrygian origin, worshipped in Asia Minor, Greece and the islands. Samothrace was the centre of their worship, which involved scandalous obscenities. The traditional four deities are Axierus, Axiocersa, Axiocersus and Cadmilus who promoted fertility and safeguarded mariners.

Cable. In nautical usage commonly denotes the rope or chain to which the anchor is secured. Ship's cable is measured in shackles, a shackle being 12½ fathoms.

A cable's length. Eight shackles or 100 fathoms, one-tenth of a nautical mile.

To range cable is to haul it out of the chain locker and lay it in lengths along the deck with the running part to the ship's side.

To veer cable is to pay or ease out cable.

Caboched (O.Fr. caboche, head). A term in HERALDRY when a beast's head is borne full face, without any part of the neck.

Caboodie (ká boodl'). The whole caboodie. The whole lot, the whole collection. Possibly from the Dut. boedel, possession, household goods, property. In this sense it has long been a common term among New England longshoremen.

Caboshed, or Cabossed. See CABOCHED.

Cachecope Bell (kásh'kōp). In some parts of England it was customary to ring a bell at a funeral when the PALL was thrown over the coffin. This was called the cachecope bell, from Fr. cache corps, conceal the body.

Cachet (kásh'ā) (Fr.). A seal; hence a distinguishing mark, a stamp of individuality.

Lettres de cachet (letters sealed). Under the old régime in France, letters or orders issued by the king under the royal seal (cachet). The name is best known for those used to imprison or punish a subject without trial, there being no HABEAS CORPUS in France. In the 18th century they were often issued as blank warrants, leaving the name to be filled in subsequently by the authorities or parties concerned. They were used against lunatics and prostitutes, and obtained by heads of families against their relatives; thus Mirabeau was consigned to prison by his father. During the administration of Cardinal Fleury (1726-1743) 80,000 of these cachets are said to have been issued, mostly against the JANSENISTS. They were abolished by the CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY (January 1790).

Cacodæmon (kák ð dé'mon) (Gr. kakos daimon). An evil spirit. Astrologers gave this name to the Twelfth House of Heaven, from which only evil prognostics proceed.

Hee thee to hell for shame, and leave this world,
Thou cacodemon.

SHAKESPEARE: Richard III, I, iii.

Cacoethes (kák ð êth êz) (Gr.). A bad habit.

As soon as he came to town, the political Cacoethes began to break out upon him with greater violence because it had been suppressed.

SWIFT: Life of Steele.

Cacoethes loquendi. A passion for making speeches or talking.

Cacoethes scribendi. The love of rushing into print; a mania for authorship.

Tenet insanabile multos
Scribendi cacoethes.

Juv. vii, 51.

The incurable itch for scribbling affects many.

Cactus, To be in the (Austr. and New Zealand). In an uncomfortable or awkward situation. The allusion is obvious.

Cacus (ká'kus). In classical mythology, a famous robber, son of VULCAN, represented as three-headed and vomiting flames. He lived in Italy and was strangled by HERCULES for stealing some of his cattle. The curate of La Mancha says of Lord Rinaldo and his friends, "They are greater thieves than Cacus" (Don Quixote).

Cad. A low, vulgar, nasty fellow; also, before the term fell into disrepute, an omnibus conductor. The word is like the Scots CADDIE, probably from CADET.

Caddice-garter, or caddis. A servant, a man of mean rank (caddice, worsted yarn or binding, crewel). When garters were worn in sight, the cheaper variety was worn by small tradesmen, servants, etc. Prince Henry calls Poins a "caddis-garter" (SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv).

Dost hear,
My honest caddis-garter?
CLAPTHORNE: Wit in a Constable (1639).

Caddie. This is now almost solely associated with the boy or man who carried a golfer's clubs on the links, and now and then gave the tyro advice, and the two-wheeled container which has largely replaced them. It is another form of CADET and was formerly commonly used in Scotland for errand boys, odd-job men, chairmen, etc.

All Edinburgh men and boys know that when sedan-chairs were discontinued, the old caddies sank into ruinous poverty, and became synonymous with roughts. The word was brought to London by James Hannay, who frequently used it.
M. PRINGLE.

Caddy. In some English dialects, a ghost, a bugbear; from cad, a word of uncertain origin which in the 17th century meant a FAMILIAR spirit. It is not connected with caddis, a grub, which is from caddice, the allusion being to the similarity of the caddis-worm to the larva of the silkworm.

Caddy in tea-caddy is a Malay word (kati), and properly denotes a weight of 1 lb 5 oz 2 dr., that is used in China and the East Indies.

Cade. Jack Cade legislation. Pressure from without. An allusion to Jack Cade's Kentish insurrection of 1450. He marched on LONDON, encamped on BLACKHEATH and demanded redress of grievances from King Henry VI. He held London for two days, then his followers began to plunder and disperse. He was finally killed near Heathfield, Sussex. His popular name was JACK AMEND-ALL.

Cadency, Marks of. See DIFFERENCE.

Cader Idris (Ká'der id' ris). Cader in Welsh means chair, and Idris is the name of one of the old Welsh giants. The legend is that anyone who passes the night in this "chair" will either be a poet or a madman.

Cadet (ká det). Younger branches of noble families are called cadets from Fr. cadet, a diminutive, ultimately from Lat. caput, head, hence little head, little chieftain. Their armorial shields bore the marks of cadency (Lat. cadere, to fall). See DIFFERENCE.

The word is now commonly used to denote certain categories of military trainees, etc.

Cadger. A SPONGER, one who sets out to obtain things from others without payment, a scrounger, etc. Originally an itinerant dealer in butter, eggs, etc., who visited remote farmhouses and probably made what extra he could by a little judicious wheedling or begging. The word is possibly connected with catch.

Cadmus. In Greek mythology, the son of AGENOR, King of Phœnicia and Telephassa, founder of THEBES (Bœotia) and the introducer of the alphabet into Greece. Legend says that, having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dirce, in BŒOTIA, he sowed its teeth, and a number of armed men sprang up with intent to kill him. By the counsel of ATHENE, he threw a PRECIOUS STONE among them and they killed each other in the struggle to gain it, except five who helped to build the city. See also JASON.

Cadmean letters. The sixteen simple Greek letters, which CADMUS is supposed to have introduced from Phœnicia. See also PALAMEDES.

Cadmean victory. A victory purchased with great loss. The allusion is to the armed men who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by CADMUS.

Cadogan (ká dög' an), or Catogan. A style of dressing the hair by securing it at the back with a ribbon, affected by men in the second half of the 18th century. Derived from a popular portrait of the first earl of Cadogan, it was imitated also by fashionable ladies and introduced at the court of Montbéliard by the Duchesse de Bourbon.

Caduceus. A white wand carried by Roman heralds when they went to treat for peace; the wand placed in the hands of MERCURY, the herald of the gods, with which, poets feign, he could give sleep to whomsoever he chose; wherefore Milton styles it his "opiate rod" (Paradise Lost, XI, 133). It is generally pictured with two SERPENTS twined about it (a symbol thought to have originated in Egypt), and—with reference to the serpents of ÆSCULAPIUS—it was adopted as the badge of the Royal Army Medical Corps.

Cædmon (käd'mon) (d. 680). Anglo-Saxon poet famed for his Hymn preserved in Bede's Latin. All his other work is lost. BEDE says he was an ignorant man knowing nothing of poetry, but was commanded in a dream, by an ANGEL, to sing the Creation, which he straightway did. On waking he remembered his verses and composed more. He was received into the monastery at Whitby, where he spent his life praising God in poetry. He has been called the "father of English song".

Cærlleon (kâr' lê' on). The Isca Silurum of the Romans, about three miles N.E. of Newport in South Wales. It is the traditional residence of King ARTHUR, where he lived in splendid state, surrounded by hundreds of knights, twelve of whom he selected to be KNIGHTS OF THE ROUND TABLE.

Cæsar (sé' zâr). The cognomen of Caius Julius Cæsar, assumed by his male successors, and by the heir-apparent to the imperial throne. The titles Kaiser and Czar or Tzar are variants of the name.

Cæsarism. A term applied to rule by a quasi-popular dictatorship where power has been seized by a COUP D'ÉTAT as in the case of a NAPOLEON or Hitler.

Cæsar's wife must be above suspicion. The name of Pompeia having become involved with an accusation against P. Clodius, Cæsar divorced her, not because he believed her guilty, but because the wife of Cæsar must not be even suspected of crime (Suetonius, Julius Cæsar must not be even suspected of crime, Cæsar, 74).

Cæsarian operation. The extraction of a child from the womb by cutting the abdomen; supposedly so called because Julius Cæsar was thus brought into the world, but the obstetric use of the word cæsarian is most probably derived from Lat. cæsus (past participle of cædere, to cut).

Caf. See KAF.

Cage. To whistle, or sing in the cage. The cage is a jail, and to whistle in a cage is to turn King's EVIDENCE, or peach against a comrade. The lift in which miners descend the pit shaft is termed a cage.

Cagliostro (kã lyos' trõ). Count Alessandro di Cagliostro was the assumed name of the notorious Italian adventurer and impostor Giuseppe Balsamo (1743-1795), of Palermo. He played a prominent part in the affair of the DIAMOND NECKLACE, and among his many frauds was the offer of everlasting youth to all who would pay him for his secret.

Cagmag (kãg' mág). Offal, bad meat; also a tough old goose; food which none can relish.

Cagots (ka' gõ). A sort of GYPSY race, in the MIDDLE AGES living in Gascony and Béarn, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths and shunned as something loathsome, possibly because they may have been leprous. Cp. CAQUEUX; COLLI-BERTS. In modern French, a hypocrite or ultra-devout person is called a cagot. From this came the word cagoule, meaning a penitent's hood or cowl, and from this the terrorist political organization of the latter 1930's, the Cagouards, took their name.

Cain-coloured Beard. Yellowish, or sandy red, symbolic of treason. In the ancient tapestries Cain and JUDAS are represented with yellow beards. See YELLOW.

He hath but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard, a Cain-coloured beard.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, I, iv.

Cainites (kã' nítz). An heretical sect of the 2nd century so named because they held that Cain was made by an almighty power and Abel by a weak one. They renounced the New Testament in favour of The Gospel of Judas which justified the false disciple and the crucifixion of Jesus, and held that the way to salvation was to give way to every lust and make a trial of everything.

To raise Cain. To "raise the devil", to "play hell", to make an angry fuss or noisy disturbance. Cain here is either used as an alternative to "the DEVIL", or is a direct allusion to Cain's violent anger which drove him to kill his brother. (See Gen. iv, 5.)

Seven men from all the world back to Docks again
Rolling down the Ratcliffe Road drunk and raising Cain.

KIPLING: Ballad of the 'Bolívar' (1890).

Caius (kēz) College, or properly Gonville and Caius. Established by Edmund Gonville at Cambridge in 1348 as a hall, it was raised to the status of a college by Dr. John Caius (1510-1573), of Norwich in 1558. He was first physician to Edward VI, Mary Tudor and Elizabeth I and wrote treatises on various subjects, including one on the antiquity of Cambridge University which, he asserted, was founded by Cantaber in 394 B.C.

Cake. Obsolete slang for a fool, a poor thing. Cp. HALF-BAKED.

Cakes and ale. A good time. Life is not all cakes and ale. Life is not all BEER AND SKITTLES—all pleasure. W. Somerset Maugham has a novel called Cakes and Ale.

It's a piece of cake. It's easy, it can be done with little trouble or effort—as easy as eating cake.

My cake is dough. All my swans are turned to geese. Occisa est res mea; my project has failed; mon affaire est manquée.

The land of cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

Land o'cakes and brither Scots.—BURNS.

To go like hot cakes. To be a great success, to sell well.

To take the cake, bun, or biscuit. To carry off the prize (ironically). That beats everything. The reference is to the Negro cake walk, the prize for which was a cake. The competitors walk round the cake in pairs while the judges decide which couple walk the most gracefully. From this a dance developed which was popular in the early 20th century before the coming of JAZZ.

In ancient Greece, a cake was the award to the toper who held out longest and in Ireland the best dancer in a dancing competition was rewarded, at one time, by a cake.

A churn-dish stuck into the earth supported on its flat end a cake, which was to become the prize of the best dancer.

BARTLETT and COYNE:
Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland, vol. II, p. 64.

You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot spend your money and yet keep it. You cannot serve God and MAMMON. You cannot have it both ways.

Calainos (ká lí' nos). The most ancient of Spanish ballads. Calainos the Moor asked a damsel to wife; she consented on condition that he should bring her the heads of the three PALADINS of CHARLEMAGNE—RINALDO, ROLAND, and OLIVER. Calainos went to Paris and challenged them. First Sir Baldwin, the youngest Knight, accepted the challenge and was overthrown; then his uncle Roland went against the Moor and smote him.

Calamity Howler, A. Colloquial American for a pessimist, particularly one given to voicing his misgivings widely and loudly.

Calas. The case of Jean Calas (cál' às). A celebrated case in French history. Jean Calas (1698–1762), a HUGUENOT cloth-merchant of Toulouse, was tortured, broken on the wheel and burnt in 1762, having been found guilty of the murder of his twenty-nine-year-old son Marc-Antoine. The motive was supposed to be that Jean was determined to prevent his son becoming a Roman Catholic. The evidence was circumstantial although suicide was perhaps the most obvious conclusion to draw. The widow's case was taken up by Voltaire in his book Sur la Tolérance, with the result that the family, who had also suffered the penalties of intolerance, were declared innocent and given 30,000 livres by Louis XV.

Calatrava, Order of (käl á tra' va). A Spanish military order of knighthood, founded by Sancho III of Castile in 1158 from the many warriors who had concentrated there for the town's defence against the MOORS. They at first entered the order of Citeaux and wore a white scapulary and hood; in 1397 they were permitted to wear secular dress, their badge being a red cross fleury. The knights took vows of poverty, obedience and conjugal chastity. It became an order of merit in 1808.

Calceolaria (käl sē ō lár' í). Little shoe-flowers; so called from their resemblance to fairy slippers (Lat. calceolus).

Calchas. The famous Greek soothsayer in the TROJAN WAR who told the Greeks that the aid of ACHILLES was essential for the taking of the city, that IPHIGENIA must be sacrificed before the fleet could sail from AULIS, and that the siege would take ten years. He died of disappointment when beaten in a trial of skill by the prophet Mopsus.

Calculate is from the Lat. calculi (pebbles), used by the Romans for counters. In the ABACUS the round balls were called calculi. The Greeks voted by pebbles dropped into an urn—a method adopted both in ancient Egypt and Syria; counting these pebbles was calculating the number of voters.

I calculate. A peculiarity of expression common in the western states of North America. In the southern states they say "I reckon", in the middle states "I expect", and in New England "I guess". All were imported by the early settlers from England.

Your aunt sets two tables, I calculate, don't she?
SUSAN WARNER: Queechy, ch. xix.

The calculator. Among those of unusual mathematical prowess who have been awarded this title are:

Alfragan, the Arabian astronomer (d. 830).

Jedediah Buxton (1705–1772), of Elmton in Derbyshire; a farm labourer of no education, who exhibited in London in 1754.

George Bidder (1806–1878) of Moreton-hampstead, Devon, and Zerah Colburn (1804–1840), of Vermont, U.S.A., who exhibited publicly.

Jacques Inaudi (1867–1950), an Italian, who exhibited "his astounding powers of calculating" at Paris in 1880; his additions and subtractions, contrary to the usual procedure, were from left to right.

Buxton, being asked "How many cubical eighths-of-an-inch there are in a body whose three sides are 23,145,786 yards, 5,642,732 yards and 54,965 yards?" replied correctly without setting down a figure.

Colburn being asked the square root of 106,929 and the cube root of 268,336,125, replied before the audience had set the figures down.

PRICE: Parallel History, vol. ii, p. 570.

See TRACHTENBERG SYSTEM.

Caledonia. Scotland; the ancient Roman name, now only used in poetry and in a few special connexions, such as the Caledonian Hotel, the Caledonian Canal, etc.

Caledonian Market. Until its closure at the outbreak of World War II, this Islington cattle and general market was especially noted for miscellaneous second-hand goods and was much frequented by bargain hunters. Dubbed the "thieves' market", it was partially a relic of the pedlar's part of London's BARTHOLOMEW FAIR, which ceased in 1855, the year in which the Caledonian Market opened.

Calembour (ka lem boor') (Fr.) A pun, a jest. From Wigan von Theben, a priest of Kahlenberg in Lower Austria, who was introduced in Till EULENSPIEGEL and other German tales. He was noted for his jests, puns, and witticisms. In the French translation he appeared as the Abbé de Calembourg or Calembour.

Calendar.

The Julian Calendar. See JULIAN.

The Gregorian Calendar. A modification of the Julian, introduced in 1582 by Pope Gregory XIII and at first adopted only by Catholic countries, and not used in Great Britain until January 1752. This is called "the New Style". See GREGORIAN YEAR.

The Jewish Calendar. This dates from the Creation, fixed at 3761 B.C. and consists of 12 months of 29 and 30 days alternately, with an additional month of 30 days interposed in EMBOLISMIC years to prevent any great divergence from the months of the Solar year. The 3rd, 6th, 11th, 14th, 17th, and 19th years of the METONIC CYCLE are Embolismic Years.

The Mohammedan Calendar, used in Moslem countries, dates from 16 July 622, the day of the HEGIRA. It consists of 12 lunar months of 29 days 12 hours 44 minutes each; consequently the Mohammedan year consists of only 354 or 355 days. A cycle is 30 years.

The French Revolutionary Calendar. Adopted by the National CONVENTION on 5 October 1793, retrospectively as from 22 September 1792, and in force in France till 1 January 1806, when NAPOLEON restored the GREGORIAN CALENDAR.

It consisted of 12 months of 30 days each, with 5 intercalary days, called SANS-CULOTTIDES. Every fourth or Olympic Year was to have six such days. It was devised by Gilbert Romme (1750-1795), the months being named by the poet Fabre d'Eglantine (1755-1794).

The Newgate Calendar. See NEWGATE.

Calender. The Persian galandar, a member of a begging order of dervishes founded in the 13th century by Qalander Yusuf-al-Andalusi, a native of Spain. They took a vow of perpetual wandering and feature in the story of the Three Calenders in the ARABIAN NIGHTS.

Calends (from Lat. calare, to call). The first day of the Roman month. Varro says the term originated in the practice of calling the people together on the first day of the month, when the pontifex informed them of the time of the new moon, the day of the NONES, with the festivals and sacred days to be observed. The custom continued till A.U.C. 450, when the FASTI or calendar was posted in public places. See GREEK CALENDIS.

Calepin, A (käl' e pin). A dictionary. Ambrosio Calepino of Calepio in Italy was the author of a famous Latin dictionary (1502), so that my Calepin was used in earlier days as my EUCLID, my Liddell and Scott, my Lewis and Short, my Kennedy, etc., became common later.

Whom do you prefer
For the best linguist? And I sillily
Said that I thought Calepine's Dictionary.
DONNE: Fourth Satire.

Calf. Slang for a dolt, a "mutton-head", a raw, inexperienced, childish fellow. See also CALVES.

The golden calf. See GOLDEN.

There are many ways of dressing a calf's head. Many ways of saying or doing a foolish thing; a simpleton has many ways of showing his folly; or, generally, if one way won't do we must try another. The allusion is to the banquets of the CALVES' HEAD CLUB.

To eat the calf in the cow's belly. To be over-ready to anticipate; to count one's chickens before they are hatched. See under CHICKEN.

To kill the fatted calf. To celebrate, to welcome with the best of everything. The phrase is from the parable of the prodigal son (Luke xv, 30).

Calf-love. Youthful fancy, immature love as opposed to lasting attachment.

Calf-skin. Fools and jesters used to wear a calf-skin coat buttoned down the back. In SHAKESPEARE'S King John, III, i,

Constance says scathingly to the Archduke of Austria:

Thou wear a lion's hide! Doff it for shame,
And hang a calf's skin on those recreant limbs!

Caliban (kāl' i bān). Rude, uncouth, unknown. The allusion is to SHAKESPEARE's Caliban in The Tempest, the deformed half-human son of a devil and a witch, slave to Prospero.

Caliburn (kāl' i bērn). Same as EXCALIBUR, King ARTHUR's well-known sword.

And onward Arthur paced, with hand
On Caliburn's resistless brand.

SCOTT: Bridal of Triermain, xv.

Calidore, Sir (kāl' i dōr). In Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bk. VI) the type of courtesy, and the lover of "fair Pastorella". He is described as the most courteous of all knights, and is entitled the "all-beloved". He typifies Sir Philip Sidney or the Earl of Essex.

Caligula (kā lig' ū lā). Roman Emperor (A.D. 37-41); so called because, when with the army as a boy, he wore a military sandal called a caliga which had no upper leather and was only used by the common soldiers.

Caligula was a voluptuary whose cruelties and excesses almost amounted to madness. Hence Horace Walpole coined the word Caligulism. Speaking of Frederick, Prince of Wales, he says:

Alas! it would be endless to tell you all his Caligulisms.—Letter to France. 29 Nov. 1745.

Calipash and Calipee (kāl i pāsh, kāl i pē). These are apparently fancy terms (though the former may come from carapace, the upper shell of a tortoise and crustaceans), to describe choice portions of the turtle. Calipash is the fatty, dull-greenish substance of the upper shield; calipee is the light-yellow fatty stuff belonging to the lower. Only epicures and aldermen can tell the difference!

Cut off the bottom shell, then cut off the meat that grows to it (which is the calpepy or fowl).

Mrs. RAFFALD: English Housekeeping (1769).

Caliph (kā lif). A title given to the successors of MOHAMMED (Arab. Khalifah, a successor). The caliphate of Baghdad reached its highest splendour under Haroun al-Raschid (786-809). From the 13th century the titles of Caliph, Sultan, Imam came to be used indiscriminately, but in the 19th century Ottoman Sultans sought to revive their claim to the title, especially Abdul Hamid II (1876-1908). In 1924 the Turks declared the abolition of the Caliphate.

Calisto and Arcas. Calisto was an Arcadian NYMPH metamorphosed into a she-bear by JUPITER. Her son Arcas having met her in the chase, would have killed her, but Jupiter converted him into a he-bear, and placed them both in the heavens, where they are recognized as the Great and Little Bear. See ARCTIC REGION.

Calixtenes (ka liks' tinz). A Bohemian religious sect of the 15th century; so called from calix (the chalice), which they insisted should be given to the laity, i.e. communion of both kinds. They were also called UTRAQUISTS.

Call. A summons, or invitation felt to be divine, as a "call to the ministry".

A call bird. A bird trained as a decoy.

A call-boy. A boy employed in theatres to call or summon actors in time for them to appear on the stage.

A call-box. A public telephone booth.

A call-girl. A prostitute who uses her telephone for arranging to receive her customers.

A call of the House. An imperative summons sent to every Member of PARLIAMENT to attend. This is done when the sense of the whole house is required.

A call on shareholders. A demand to pay the balance of money due for shares allotted in a company, or a part thereof.

A call to the Bar. The admission of a law student to the privileges of a BARRISTER. See BAR.

A call to the pastorate. An invitation to a clergyman by the members of a PRESBYTERIAN or NONCONFORMIST congregation to serve as their minister.

A curtain call. An invitation to an actor to appear before the curtain and receive the applause of the audience.

Payable at call. To be paid on demand.

The call of Abraham. The invitation or command of God to ABRAHAM, to leave his idolatrous country, under the promise of becoming father of a great nation (Gen. xii, 1-2).

The call of God. An invitation, exhortation, or warning by the dispensations of Providence (Isa. xxii, 12); divine influence on the mind to do or avoid something (Heb. iii, 1).

To call. To invite; as the trumpet calls.

If honour calls, where'er she points the way,

The sons of honour follow and obey.

CHARLES CHURCHILL: The Farewell (1764).

In the U.S.A. to call usually means to telephone.

To be called home. To have one's banns of marriage called in church. An old English rural usage.

To call a man out. To challenge him; to appeal to a man's honour to come forth and fight a duel.

To call God to witness. To declare solemnly that what one states is true.

To call in question. To doubt the truth of a statement; to challenge the truth of a statement. "In dubium vocare."

To call in. To summon a doctor or invite for consultation, etc. In banking, to take coins or notes out of circulation.

To call it a go, or a day. To give in, to give up, to stop work.

To call off. To cancel a forthcoming event, to withdraw from a deal.

To call over the coals. See COALS.

To call to account. To demand an explanation; to reprove.

To be called, or sent to one's account. To be removed by death, to be called to the judgment seat of God to give an account of one's deeds.

To call to arms. To summon to prepare for battle. "Ad arma vocare."

To call to mind. To recollect, to remember.

To call up. To summon for military service.

Caller herrings. Fresh herrings. The adjective is also applied in SCOTLAND to fresh air, water, etc.

Calliope (ká lí' ó pi) (Gr. beautiful voice). Chief of the nine MUSES; the muse of epic or heroic poetry, and of poetic inspiration and eloquence. Her emblems are a stylus and wax tablets.

The name is also applied to a steam organ, making raucous music on steam whistles.

Callippic Period (ká lip' ik). A correction of the METONIC CYCLE by Callippus, the Greek astronomer of the 4th century B.C. To remedy the defect in the Metonic Cycle, Callippus quadrupled the period of Meton, making his cycle one of seventy-six years, and deducted a day at the end of it, by which means he calculated that the new and full moons would be brought round to the same day and hour. His calculation, however, is not absolutely accurate, as there is one whole day lost every 553 years.

Calomel (kál' ó mel). Hooper's Medical Dictionary says: This name, which means "beautiful black", was originally given to the Aethiops mineral, or black sulphuret of mercury. It was afterwards applied in joke by Sir Theodore Mayerne to the chloride of mercury, in honour of a favourite negro servant whom he employed to prepare it. As calomel is a white powder, the name is merely a jocular misnomer. See MISNOMERS.

Calotte (ká lot'). Regime de la calotte. Administration of government by ecclesiastics. The calotte is the small skull-cap worn over the TONSURE.

Régiment de la calotte. A society of wits and satirists in the reign of Louis XIV. When any public character made himself ridiculous, a calotte was sent to him to "cover the bald or brainless part of his noddle".

Caloyers (ká ló' yérs). Monks in the Greek church, who follow the rule of St. Basil. They are divided into cenobites, who recite the offices from midnight to sunrise; anchorites, who live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in caverns and live on alms (Gr. calos and geron, beautiful old man).

Calpe (kál' pi). Gibraltar, one of the PILLARS OF HERCULES, the other, the opposite promontory in Africa (Jebel Musa, or Apes' Hill), was anciently called Abyla. According to one account these two were originally one mountain which HERCULES tore asunder; but some say he piled up each mountain separately.

The pack of hounds introduced into the peninsula by Wellington's officers is the Calpe Hunt.

Caltrop, Caltrap, or Chevaltrap. A mediæval four-pronged iron device placed on the ground so that the horses of the attacking cavalry might be lamed. There is a similar modern one for puncturing pneumatic tyres.

Calumet (kál' u met). The "pipe of peace" of the North American Indians. The word is of French Canadian origin, being the Norman form of the Fr. chalumeau (Lat. calamus, a reed); it was the name they gave to certain plants used by the natives as pipe stems, and hence, the pipe itself. The calumet is about two-and-a-half feet long, the stem is reed and the bowl is of highly polished red marble. To present the calumet to a stranger is a mark of hospitality and goodwill; to refuse the offer is an act of hostile defiance.

Gitche Manito, the mighty
Smoked the calumet, the Peace-pipe
As a signal to the nations.

LONGFELLOW: Hiawatha, l.

Calvary. The Latin translation of the Gr. Golgotha, which is a transliteration of the Hebrew word for a skull. It is the name given to the place of our Lord's crucifixion. Legend has it that the skull of ADAM was preserved here, but the name is probably due to a fancied resemblance of the configuration of the ground to the shape of a skull.

The actual site may be that occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, or possibly an eminence above the grotto of Jeremiah not far from the Damascus Gate.

A Calvary. A representation of the successive scenes of the PASSION of Christ in a series of pictures, etc., in a church. The shrine containing such representations. Wayside calvaries or crosses, representing the Crucifixion, are common in parts of Europe and some notable examples are to be found in Brittany.

A calvary cross. A Latin CROSS mounted on three steps (or grises).

Calvayo clover. A common trefoil, Medicago echinus, said to have sprung up in the track made by PILATE when he went to the cross to see his "title affixed" (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews). Each of the three leaves has a little carmine spot in the centre; in the daytime they form a sort of cross; and in the flowering season the plant bears a little yellow flower, like a "crown of thorns". Julian tells us that each of the three leaves had in his time a white cross in the centre, and that the centre cross remains visible longer than the others.

Calves. The inhabitants of the Isle of Wight were sometimes so called from a tradition that a calf once got its head firmly wedged in a wooden pale, and instead of breaking up the pale, the farm-hand cut off the calf's head.

His calves are gone to grass. Said of a spindle-legged man. And another mocking taunt is, "Veal will be dear, because there are no calves."

Calves' Head Club. Instituted in ridicule of Charles I, and apparently first mentioned in a tract (given in the Harleian Miscellany) of 1703 by Benjamin Bridgwater, stating that it first met in 1693. It lasted till about 1735. The annual banquet was held on 30 January, the anniversary of the King's execution, and according to the Secret History of the Calves' Head Club, or the Republicans unmasked, attributed to Ned Ward:

Their bill of fare was a large dish of calves' heads, dressed several ways, by which they represented the king and his friends who had suffered in his cause; a large pike with a small one in its mouth, as an emblem of tyranny; a large cod's head by which they intended to represent the person of the king singly; a boar's head with an apple in its mouth, to represent the king as bestial, . . .

We are also told that after the repast the EKON BASILIKE was burnt and a calf's skull filled with wine was drunk to "those worthy patriots who had killed the tyrant". Furthermore "the company only consisted of INDEPENDENTS and ANABAPTISTS".

Calvinism. The doctrines of the Reformer Jean Calvin (1509-1564), particularly as expressed in his Institutio Religionis Christiane (1536). Some chief points of his teaching are:

- (1) the transcendence of God;
- (2) the total depravity of natural man. He can achieve nothing without God;
- (3) predestination or particular election. Before the world began God chose some men for salvation through Christ;
- (4) the scriptures and the Holy Spirit are the sole authority;
- (5) the community must enforce the Church's public discipline.

Calydon (kal' i don). In classical geography, a city in Ætolia, near the forest which was the scene of the legendary hunt of the CALYDONIAN BOAR (see BOAR). Also in Arthurian legend, the name given to a forest in northern England.

Calypso (ká lip' sō). In classical mythology, the queen of the island Ogygia on which ULYSSES was wrecked. She kept him there for seven years and promised him perpetual youth and immortality if he would remain with her for ever. She bore him two sons and was inconsolable when he left. Ogygia is generally identified with Gozo, near Malta.

A calypso is a type of popular song popularized by the coloured folk of Trinidad, improvised on topical subjects.

Cam and Isis. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford; so called from the rivers on which they stand.

May you, my Cam and Isis, preach it long,
The right divine of kings to govern wrong.

POPE: Dunciad, iv, 187.

Cama. The god of young love in Hindu mythology. His wife is Rati (voluptuousness), and he is represented as riding on a sparrow, holding in his hand a bow of flowers and five arrows (i.e. the five senses).

Over hills with peaky top engrail'd,
And many a tract of palm and rice,
The throne of Indian Cama slowly sail'd
A summer fann'd with spice.

TENNYSON: The Palace of Art.

Camacho (kám a' chō). A rich but unfortunate man in one of the stories in Don Quixote, who is cheated of his bride just when he has prepared a great feast for the wedding; hence the phrase Camacho's wedding to describe useless show and expenditure.

Camarina. Ne moveas Camarinam (Don't meddle with Camarina). Camarina, a lake in Sicily, was a source of malaria to the inhabitants, who, when they consulted APOLLO about draining it, received the reply, "Do not disturb it." Nevertheless, they drained it, and ere long the enemy marched over the bed of the lake and plundered the city. The proverb is applied to those who remove one evil, but thus give place to a greater—"LEAVE WELL ALONE".

Cambalo's Ring. Cambalo was the second son of CAMBUSCAN in Chaucer's unfinished Squire's Tale. He is introduced as Cambel in the Faerie Queene. The ring, which was given him by his sister Canace, had the virtue of healing wounds.

Camber. In British legend, the second son of BRUTE. WALES fell to his portion; which is one way of accounting for its name of Cambria.

Cambria. The ancient name of WALES, the land of the Cymry.

Cambridge Apostles, The. A debating society founded at Cambridge by John Sterling (1806-1844) in 1826, remarkable for the talent of its undergraduate members and for the success to which they attained in after life. Among them may be mentioned Frederick Denison Maurice, Richard Chenevix Trench, John Kemble, James Spedding, Monckton Milnes, Tennyson and A. H. Hallam.

Cambuscan. In Chaucer's unfinished Squire's Tale, the king of Sarra, in Tartary, model of all royal virtues. His wife was Elfeta; his two sons ALGARSIFB and Cambalo; and his daughter Canace.

Camden Society. An historical society founded in 1838 for the publication of early historical texts and documents, named after William Camden (1551-1623), schoolmaster, antiquary and author of Britannia, a survey of the British Isles. In 1897 it amalgamated with the Royal Historical Society, and its long series of publications were transferred to that body.

Camel. MOHAMMED'S favourite camel was Al Kaswa. The mosque at Koba covers the spot where it knelt when he fled from MECCA. He considered the kneeling of the camel as a sign sent by God, and remained at Koba in safety for four days. The swiftest of his camels was Al Adha, who is fabled to have performed the whole journey from JERUSALEM to Mecca in four bounds, thereby gaining a place in heaven along with BORAK, Balaam's ASS, Tobit's dog, and the DOG OF THE SEVEN SLEEPERS.

It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God (Matt. xix, 24 and Mark x, 25). In the KORAN we find a similar expression: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." The meaning of the passage is reinforced by Mark x, 24, "How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the Kingdom of God!" In the Rabbinical writings there is a variant of the expression, "Perhaps thou art one of the Pampeditians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle."

Camelot (kám' e lot). In British fable, the legendary spot where King ARTHUR held his court. It has been tentatively located at CAERLEON, Queen Camel in Somerset, Camelford in Cornwall, where the Duke of Cornwall resided in his castle of TINTAGEL, etc. It is mentioned in Shakespeare's King Lear II, ii, and Tennyson's Idylls of the King, etc.

On either side the river lie
Long fields of barley and of rye,
That clothe the wold and meet the sky;
And through the field the road runs by
To many-tower'd Camelot.

TENNYSON: The Lady of Shalott.

Cameron Highlanders. The 79th Foot, raised by Allan Cameron of Errock in 1793. It became the Queen's Own Highlanders (Seaforth and Cameron).

Cameronians, or Reformed PRESBYTERIANS, were organized by the strict COVENANTER and field preacher, Richard Cameron, who was slain in battle at Aird's Moss in 1680. He objected to the alliance of Church and State under Charles II and seceded from the Kirk. His followers refused to take the Oath of Allegiance and thus deprived themselves of some of the privileges of citizenship. In 1876 the majority of Cameronians united with the Free Church.

Cameronian Regiment. The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of CAMERONIANS in the Revolution of 1688, called the Cameronians (Scottish Rifles) from 1881.

Camford. A name, made up from Cambridge and Oxford, which has never acquired the same currency as OXBRIDGE. Cp. REDBRICK.

He was a Camford man and very nearly got
The English Prize Poem, it was said
THACKERAY: Pendennis, ch. lii.

Camilla (ká mil' á). In Roman legend a virgin queen of the Volscians. She helped Turnus against ÆNEAS. VIRGIL (Aeneid VII, 809) says she was so swift that she could run over a field of corn without bending a single blade, or make her way over the sea without even wetting her feet.

Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o'er the unbending corn and skims along the main.

POPE: Essay on Criticism, 372.

Camisard, or Camisardo (kám' i sard, kám i sa' dō). A night attack; so called because the attacking party wore a camise or camisard over their armour, but to conceal it, and that they might better recognize each other in the dark.

Camisards. In French history the PROTESTANT insurgents of the Cévennes, who resisted the violence of the DRAGONADES occasioned by the Revocation of the Edict of NANTES in 1685 and carried on a fierce war of reprisals with Louis XIV's forces until finally suppressed in 1705. Their leader was Jean Cavalier (1681-1740), afterwards governor of Jersey and later of the Isle of Wight. So called from the camise or blouse worn by the peasantry.

Camlan, Battle of. In Arthurian legend the battle which put an end to the KNIGHTS OF THE ROUND TABLE, and at which ARTHUR received his death wound from the hand of his nephew MODRED, who was also slain.

Camlet, camelot. A fabric. As far back as the 13th century camlet was a rich stuff made of silk and camel's hair. Later it was a durable cotton and woollen cloth mixture, etc.; also the name of a waterproof material before the introduction of indiarubber.

After dinner I put on my new camelott suit, the best that I ever wore in my life, the suit costing me above £24.—PEPYS: Diary (1 June 1664).

Cammock. As crooked as a cammock. A cammock is a staff or stick with a crook-end like a hockey stick or shinty club.

Though the cammock, the more it is bowed the better it serveth; yet the bow, the more it is bent and occupied the weaker it waxeth.

LYLY: Euphues.

Camorra (ká mor' á). A lawless secret society of the 19th century, run on gangster lines, which terrorized Naples. It began amongst prisoners in the gaols about 1820, and exacted tribute from traders and brothel-keepers alike. From 1848 it began to intervene in politics and continued to be a very real menace until 1911, when severe judicial action led to its extinction. The name is probably from the Sp. Camorra, a quarrel, and now has the same significance as THUG, APACHE, gangster, etc.

Campaign Wig. This style of WIG came from France in the early 18th century. It was very full, curled, and 18 inches in length at the front with deep locks. Sometimes the back part was put in a black silk bag. The name refers to Marlborough's campaign in the Netherlands.

Campania (kám pā' ni á) (Lat. level country). The ancient geographical name for the fertile district south-east of the Tiber, containing the towns of Cumæ, Capua, Baiæ, Puteoli, Herculaneum, Pompeii, etc.

Disdainful of Campania's gentle plains.

THOMSON: Summer.

Campaspe (kám pās' pe). A beautiful concubine, favourite of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, whom he handed over to Apelles, who it is said modelled his VENUS Anadyomene from her.

Cupid and my Campaspe play'd
At cards for kisses—Cupid paid.

LYLY: Song from "Campaspe".

Campbellites. Followers of John McLeod Campbell (1800-1872), who taught the universality of the atonement, for which he was ejected from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in 1831.

In the U.S.A. the name is sometimes given to the Disciples of Christ, a body founded by Thomas and Alexander Campbell of Pennsylvania in 1809. They reject creeds and practise baptism by immersion and weekly communion, and uphold Christian union on the foundation of the Bible alone. They are also known simply as Christians.

Campbells are coming, The. This stirring song is supposed to have been composed in 1715 when John Campbell, Duke of Argyll, defeated the Earl of Mar and the JACOBITES.

It is the regimental march of the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders, and at the relief of Lucknow in 1857, as the troops of this regiment approached, a Scots woman lying ill on the ground heard the pipes and exclaimed "Dinna ye hear it? Dinna ye hear it? The pipes o' Havelock sound." (Sir Henry Havelock was commander of the relieving force.)

Campeador. The CID.

Camp-followers. The old-time armies which lived on the country, moved in a leisurely fashion and laid up in winter quarters, were accompanied by numerous civilian followers, such as washerwomen and sutlers who sold liquor and provisions, etc. These were called camp-followers.

In the moment of failure (at Bannockburn) the sight of a body of camp-followers, whom they mistook for reinforcements to the enemy, spread panic through the English host.

J. R. GREEN: Short History of the English People, ch. iv, 6.

Camp of the Tartars. The shopkeepers of part of the Palais Royal, Paris, in the early years of the 19th century, whose rapacity was said to equal that of the TARTAR hordes.

Canard (kån' ar) (Fr. a duck). A hoax, a ridiculously extravagant report. The French lexicographer Emile Littré (1801-1881) says that the term comes from an old expression, vendre un canard à moitié, to half-sell a duck. As this is no sale at all, it came to mean "to take in", "to make a fool of". Another explanation is that a certain Cornelissen, to try the gullibility of the public, reported in the papers that he had twenty ducks, one of which he cut up and threw to the nineteen, who devoured it greedily. He then cut up another, then a third, and so on till the nineteenth was gobbled up by the survivor—a wonderful proof of duck voracity.

Canary. Wine from these islands was very popular in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Farewell, my hearts, I will to my honest knight Falstaff, and drink canary with him.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, III, ii.

It was also at one time slang for a guinea or sovereign, from its yellow colour.

Cancan. A fast and extremely dexterous dance, sometimes accompanied by extravagant and often indecent postures, and originally performed in the casinos of Paris. The most famous example is in Offenbach's opera Orpheus in the Underworld (1858).

They were going through a quadrille with all those supplementary gestures introduced by the great Rigolboche, a notorious danseuse, to whom the notorious cancan owes its origin.

A. EGMONT HAKE: Paris Originals (1878).

Cancer (Lat. crab). One of the twelve signs of the ZODIAC, the Crab. It appears when the sun has reached its highest northern limit, and begins to go backward to the south; but like a crab the return is sideways (21 June to 23 July).

According to fable, JUNO sent Cancer against HERCULES when he combated the HYDRA of Lerna. It bit the hero's foot, but Hercules killed the creature, and Juno took it up to heaven.

Candaules (kån daw' lēz). King of Lydia about 710 to 668 B.C. Legend relates that he exposed the charms of his wife to GYGES, whereupon she compelled him to assassinate her husband, after which she married the murderer.

Candid Camera. An unseen camera which is used to photograph an unsuspecting subject. Candid camera shots, which are often ridiculous, are much used in pictorial journalism.

Candidate (Lat. candidatus, clothed in white). One who seeks or is proposed for some office, appointment, etc. Those who solicited the office of consul, quæstor, prætor, etc., among the Romans, arrayed themselves in a loose white robe. It was loose that they might show the people their scars, and white in sign of fidelity and humility.

Candide (kan' dēd). The hero of Voltaire's philosophical novel, Candide, ou l'Optimisme (1759). All sorts of misfortunes are heaped upon him which he bears philosophically. It was written at the time of the Lisbon earthquake to satirise philosophical optimism.

Candle. Bell, book, and candle. See BELL.

Fine, or Gay as the king's candle. "Bariolé comme la chandelle des rois", in allusion to an ancient custom of presenting on 6 January a candle of various colours at the shrine of the three kings of COLOGNE. It is generally applied to a woman overdressed, especially with gay ribbons and flowers. "FINE AS FIVEPENCE."

He is not fit to hold a candle to him. He is very inferior. The allusion is to link boys who held candles in theatres and other places of night amusement.

The game is not worth the candle. Le jeu n'en vaut pas la chandelle. The effort is not worth making; not worth even the cost of the candle that lights the players.

To burn the candle at both ends. See BURN.

To hold a candle to the Devil. To aid or countenance that which is wrong. The allusion is to the Roman Catholic practice of burning candles before the images of saints.

To sell by the candle. A form of sale by auction. A pin is thrust through a candle about an inch from the top, and bidding goes on till the candle is burnt down to the pin; when the pin drops into the candlestick the last bidder is declared the purchaser. Such an auction was held at Aldermaston and reported in the Reading Mercury (16 Dec.) in 1893.

The Council thinks it meet to propose the way of selling by "inch" of candle, as being the most probable means to procure the true value of the goods.—MILTON: Letters.

To vow a candle to the Devil. To propitiate the DEVIL by a bribe, as some seek to propitiate the saints in glory by a votive candle.

What is the Latin for candle? See TACE.

Candle-holder. An abettor. The reference is to the CATHOLIC practice of holding a candle for the reader. In ordinary parlance it applies to one who assists in some slight degree but is not a real sharer in an action or undertaking.

I'll be a candle-holder and look on.
SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, iv.

Candlemas Day. 2 February, formerly the Feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, now called the Presentation of Our Lord; one of the QUARTER DAYS in Scotland. In Roman Catholic churches all the candles which will be needed in the church throughout the year are consecrated on this day; they symbolize Jesus Christ, called "the light of the world", and "a light to lighten the Gentiles". The ancient Romans had a custom of burning candles to scare away evil spirits.

If Candlemas Day be dry and fair,
The half o'winter's come and mair;
If Candlemas Day be wet and foul,
The half o'winter was gone at Youl.
Scotch Proverb.

The badger peeps out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and, if he finds snow, walks abroad; but if he sees the sun shining he draws back into his hole.
German Proverb.

Candlewick. The name given to a type of embroidery with tufts of soft cotton yarn, used mainly to decorate bedspreads. It is said that snippets of the thick yarn used for the wicks of candles were put to decorative use on the borders of the dust covers for beds by the thrifty wives of the early settlers in America.

Candour, Mrs. In The School for Scandal Sheridan drew the perfect type of female back-biter, concealing her venom under an affectation of frank amiability.

Canecutters. Nickname for the inhabitants of Queensland, Australia, who are also known as Bananalanders.

Canephorus (ká nef' ór ús). A sculptured figure of a youth or maiden bearing a basket on the head. In ancient ATHENS the canephoroi bore the sacred things necessary at the feasts of the gods.

Canicular Days (Lat. canicula, dim. of canis, a dog). The DOG-DAYS.

Canicular Period. The ancient Egyptian cycle of 1,461 years or 1,460 Julian years, also called a SOTHIC PERIOD, during which it was supposed that, any given day had passed through all the seasons of the year.

Canicular Year. The ancient Egyptian year computed from one heliacal rising of the DOG STAR to the next.

Canker. The briar or dog-rose.

To put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose,
And plant this thorn, this canker, Bolingbroke.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, I, iii.

Also a caterpillar that destroys leaves, buds, etc.

As killing as the canker to the rose.
MILTON: Lycidas.

Canmore. See GREAT HEAD.

Cannæ. The place where Hannibal defeated the Romans under Varro and Æmilius with great slaughter in 216 B.C. Any fatal battle that is the turning point of a great general's success may be called his Cannæ. Thus Moscow was the Cannæ of NAPOLEON.

Canned music. Music recorded and reproduced, as opposed to "live music", i.e. played by musicians present in person. Canned music, like canned foods, can be stored and used when required.

Cannon. This term in billiards is a corruption of carom, which is short for Fr. carambole, the red ball (carambolier, to touch the red ball). A cannon is a stroke by which the player's ball touches one of the other balls in such a way as to glance off it and strike the remaining ball.

To cannon into, or against someone. An unexpected collision of persons or chance encounter.

Canny. See CA' CANNY.

Canoe. A Haitian word brought to Europe by the Spaniards. It meant a boat hollowed out of a tree trunk.

Paddle your own canoe. Rely upon yourself. The caution was given by President Lincoln, but it is an older saying and was used by Captain Marryat (Settlers in Canada, ch. viii) in 1844. Sarah Bolton's poem in Harper's Magazine for May 1854 popularized it:

Voyage upon life's sea,
To yourself be true,
And, whatever your lot may be,
Paddle your own canoe.

Canon. From Lat. and Gr. canon, a carpenter's rule, a rule, hence a standard (as "the canons of criticism"), a model, an ordinance, as in SHAKESPEARE:

Or that the everlasting had not fir'd
His canon 'gainst self-slaughter.

Hamlet, I, ii.

The canon. The body of books in the BIBLE which are accepted by the Christian Church generally as genuine and inspired; the whole Bible from Genesis to Revelation, excluding the APOCRYPHA. Called also the sacred canon and the Canonical Books.

The Church dignitary known as a Canon is a capitular member of a cathedral or collegiate church, usually living in the precincts, and observing the rule or canon of the body to which he is attached.

The canons, with the DEAN or provost at their head, constitute the governing body, or CHAPTER, of the cathedral. These are the canons-residentiary; there are also honorary canons who have no share in the cathedral government, or emoluments. Minor canons are mainly concerned with the singing of the services and have no part in the decisions of the chapter.

The title once had a much wider application and was used to designate most of the diocesan clergy. When its use came to be limited to the secular clergy of a cathedral, they were called secular canons as distinct from the canons regular such as the Austin or AUGUSTINIAN CANONS.

Also in music, from the same derivation, a composition written strictly according to rule, for two or three voices which sing exactly the same melody, one a few beats after the other, either at the same or different pitch. Simple forms are the catch and the round such as Three Blind Mice and London's Burning. A London choral club was founded in 1843 called the "Round, Catch and Canon Club".

Canoness. The title was given to certain women living under rule, less strict than that of nuns, in the Frankish empire from the late 8th century. Like their male counterparts they came to be divided into canonesses regular and secular.

Canon law, or canons. A collection of ecclesiastical laws which serve as the rule of church government. The professors or students of canon law are called canonists.

Doubt not, worthy senators! to vindicate the sacred honour and judgement of Moses your predecessor, from the shallow commenting of scholastics and canonists.

MILTON: Doctrine of Divorce, Introd.

Book of Canons. A collection of 178 canons enacted by the councils of Nicæa, Ancyra, Neocesarea, Laodicea, Gangra, Antioch, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. It was first published in 1610 and is probably of late 4th or early 5th-century origin.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND "Book of Canons" was adopted in 1604 as the basis of ecclesiastical law. A Book of Canons for the Scottish Church was drawn up under Charles I's command and issued in 1636. It mainly helped to precipitate religious strife in Scotland.

Canon of the Mass. The fixed form of consecratory prayer used in the GREEK and ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCHES—from the Sanctus to the PATERNOSTER.

Canonical Age. See under AGE.

Canonical dress. The distinctive or appropriate costume worn by the clergy according to the direction of the canon; BISHOPS, DEANS and archdeacons, for instance, wear canonical hats. This distinctive dress is sometimes called simply "canonicals"; Macaulay speaks of "an ecclesiastic in full canonicals". The same name is given also to the special parts of such robes, such as the pouch on the gown of an M.D., originally designed for carrying drugs; the lamb-skin on some B.A. hoods, in imitation of the toga candida of the Romans; the tippet on a BARRISTER's gown, meant for a wallet to carry briefs in; and the PROCTORS' and proproctors' tippet for papers—a sort of sabre-tache.

Canonical Epistles. The seven catholic epistles, i.e. one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. The epistles of Paul were addressed to specific churches or to individuals.

Canonical hours. The different parts of the Divine Office which follow, and are named after the hours of the day. They are seven—MATINS, PRIME, tierce, sext, NONES, VESPERS and COMPLINE. Prime, tierce, sext and nones are the first, third, sixth and ninth hours of the day, counting from six in the morning. (See BREVIARY.) The reason why there are seven canonical hours is that David says, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (Ps. cxix, 164).

In England the phrase means more especially the time of the day within which persons can be legally married, i.e. from 8 in the morning to 6 p.m.

Canonical obedience. The obedience due by the inferior to the superior clergy. Thus bishops owe canonical obedience to the archbishop of the same province.

Canonization. The solemn act by which the Pope proclaims the sanctity of a person, subsequent to the lesser act of BEATIFICATION; whereupon he is worthy to be honoured as a SAINT and is put upon the Canon or Catalogue of Saints of the Church.

Canopus (ká nō' pus). Alpha Argus or Canopus, in the constellation Argo Navis, is the brightest star in the heavens after SIRIUS.

It is also the name of a seaport in ancient Egypt, 15 miles N.E. of Alexandria. Canopy properly means a gnat curtain. Herodotus tells us (II, 95) that the fishermen of the Nile used to lift their nets on a pole, and form thereby a rude sort of tent under which they slept securely, as gnats will not pass through the meshes of a net. Subsequently the hangings of a bed were so called, and lastly the canopy borne over kings (Gr. konops, a gnat).

Canossa (ká nos' á). Canossa, in the duchy of Modena, is where the Holy Roman Emperor Henry IV humbled himself to Pope Gregory VII (Hildebrand) by standing for three days barefooted in the courtyard of the palace in the garb of a penitent (January 1077). This was during the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY.

Hence, to go to Canossa is to undergo humiliation, to EAT HUMBLE PIE, to submit after having refused to do so. During Bismarck's quarrel with Pope Pius IX at the time of the KULTURKAMPF he said in the Reichstag (14 May 1872): "Nach Canossa gehen wir nicht." (We shall not go to Canossa!)

Cant. Language peculiar to a social class, profession, sect, etc., jargon; technical language; insincere talk, hypocrisy. As its derivation (Lat. cantus, song) shows, the earlier application of the word was to music and thereby intonation. Soon the term came to be applied to the whining speech of beggars, who were known as the CANTING CREW. In Harman's Caveat, or Warning for Common Cursetors, vulgarly called Vagabonds (1567), we read:

As far as I can learne or understand by the examination of a number of them, their language—which they term peddelars Frenche or Canting—begin within these xxx yeeres.

One example of canting that he gives begins:

Bene Lightmans to thy quarromes, in what tipken hast thou lyped in this darkemans, whether in a lybbege or in the strummel? (Good-morrow to thy body, in what house hast thou laid all night, whether in a bed or in the straw?)

The term was in use to denote professional slang by the 17th century.

The doctor here . . .
When he discourses of dissection . . .
Of vena cava and of vena porta . . .
What does he else but cant?

BEN JONSON: The Staple of News, IV, i (1625).

As insincerity or conventionality in speech or thought we have:

Rid your mind of cant.—DR. JOHNSON.

Canting crew. Beggars, gipsies, thieves and vagabonds, who use CANT. In 1696 E. B. Gent published the first English Slang Dictionary with the title A New Dictionary of the terms, Ancient and Modern, of the Canting Crew in its several Tribes.

Cantabrian Surge. The Bay of Biscay. So called from the Cantabri who dwelt about the Biscayan shore.

Cantate Sunday (kán tá te). ROGATION Sunday, the fourth Sunday after EASTER. So called from the first word of the introit of the MASS: "Sing to the Lord". Similarly "LÉTARE SUNDAY", the fourth after LENT, is so called from the first word of the introit of the mass. Cp. QUASIMODO SUNDAY.

Canter. An easy gallop; originally called a Canterbury pace or gallop, from the ambling gait adopted by mounted pilgrims to the shrine of St Thomas à Becket at Canterbury.

A preliminary canter. Something which precedes the real business in hand, a trial run. The reference is to the trial trip of horses before racing.

To win in a canter. Easily; well ahead of all competitors.

Canterbury Tales. Chaucer represented that he was in company with a party of pilgrims going to Canterbury to pay their devotions to the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket. The party assembled at the TABARD INN, SOUTHWARK, and there agreed to tell one tale each, both in going and returning. He who told the best story was to be treated with a supper on the homeward journey. The work is incomplete and we have none of the tales told on the way home.

Canucks (ka nüks'). The name given to Canadians generally, but in Canada to Canadians of French descent. Possibly a corruption of Connaught, a name originally applied by the French Canadians to Irish immigrants.

Canvas means cloth made of hemp (Lat. cannabis, hemp).

To be under canvas. To be in camp, in a tent.

To carry too much canvas means that a sailing ship has spread more sail than she can safely carry; figuratively that something far too big for one's resources is being attempted.

To canvas a subject is to strain it through a hemp strainer, to sift it.

To canvass a constituency is to solicit votes. In the U.S.A. it is also used to mean scrutinizing voting papers after the ballot.

Caora (ka ór' á). A river described in Hakluyt's Voyages, on the banks of which dwelt a people whose heads grew beneath their shoulders. Their eyes were in their shoulders, and their mouths in the middle of their breasts. Raleigh, in his Description of Guiana, gives a similar account of a race of men. Cp. BLEMMYES.

Cap. The word is used figuratively by SHAKESPEARE for the top, the summit (of excellence, etc.); as in They wear themselves in the cap of the time (All's Well, II, i), i.e. "They are the ornaments of the age"; a very riband in the cap of youth (Hamlet, IV, vii); Thou art the cap of all the fools alive (Timon, IV, iii); on fortune's cap we are not the very button (Hamlet, II, ii); etc.

Black cap. See BLACK.

Cap acquaintance. A bowing acquaintance. One just sufficiently known to touch one's cap to.

Cap and bells. The insignia of a professional fool or jester.

Cap and feather days. The time of childhood.

Here was I got into the scenes of my cap and feather days.—COBBETT.

Cap and gown. The full academical costume of a university student, tutor or graduate, worn on formal occasions, etc.

Is it a cap and gown affair?
C. BEDE: Verdant Green.

Cap and stocking. A public-house sign in Leicester commemorating the importance of these articles to the town's industry, especially the making of STATUTE CAPS.

Cap in hand. Submissively. Like a servant.

Cap money. Money collected in a cap or hat; hence an improvised collection.

Cap of liberty. When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small Phrygian cap, usually of red felt, called a pileus, was placed on his head and he was termed libertinus (a freed-man). When Saturninus, in 100 B.C., possessed himself of the Capitol, he hoisted a similar cap on the top of his spear, to indicate that all slaves who joined his standard should be free. Marius employed the same symbol against Sulla, and when CÆSAR was murdered, the conspirators marched forth with a cap elevated on a spear in token of liberty.

In the French Revolution the cap of liberty (bonnet rouge) was adopted as an emblem of freedom from royal authority.

Cap of maintenance. A cap of dignity anciently belonging to the rank of duke; the fur cap of the Lord MAYOR of London, worn on days of state; a cap carried before the British sovereigns at their coronation. The significance of maintenance here is not known, but the cap was an emblem of very high honour, for it was conferred by the POPE three times on Henry VII and once on Henry VIII. By certain old families it is borne in the COAT OF ARMS, either as a charge or in place of the wreath.

Canterbury cap. A soft flat cloth cap sometimes worn by dignitaries of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Cater cap. A square cap of MORTARBOARD (Fr. quartier).

College cap. A TRENCHER, like the caps worn at the English universities.

Dunce's cap. A conical cap worn by the class "dunce" as a symbol of disgrace and stupidity. See DUNCE.

Fool's cap. A conical cap with feather and bells, such as licensed fools used to wear.

Forked cap. A bishop's MITRE.

John Knox cap. An early form of the TRENCHER, mortar-board, or COLLEGE CAP worn at the Scottish universities.

Monmouth cap. See MONMOUTH.

Phrygian cap. CAP OF LIBERTY.

Scotch cap. A cloth cap worn in Scotland as part of the national dress.

Square Cap. A TRENCHER or MORTARBOARD.

Statute cap. A "cap of wool knit", the wearing of which on holidays was enforced on all over six years of age (with certain exceptions for rank and sex) by a statute of Elizabeth I of 1571, for the benefit of the woollen trade. The fine for non-compliance was 3s. 4d. "for each day's transgression". The act was repealed in 1597. To a similar end, persons were at one time obliged to be buried in woollen shrouds. See CAP AND STOCKING.

Well, better wits have worn plain statute caps.
SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, V, ii.

Trencher cap, or mortar-board. A cap with a square board on top, generally covered with black cloth, and with a tassel, worn with academical dress; a COLLEGE CAP.

A feather in one's cap. An achievement to be proud of; something creditable.

I must put on my thinking cap. I must consider before I give a final answer. The allusion is to the official cap of the judge, formerly donned when passing sentence, later reserved for passing the death sentence.

If the cap fits, wear it. If the remark applies to you, apply it yourself. Hats and caps vary only slightly in size but everyone knows his own when he puts it on.

Setting her cap at him. Trying to catch for a sweetheart or husband. In the days when ladies habitually wore caps they would naturally put on the most becoming to attract the attention of the favoured gentleman.

To cap. To take off, or touch one's cap to, in token of respect; also to excel.

Well, that caps the globe.—C. BRONTE: Jane Eyre.

I cap to that. I assent to it. The allusion is to the custom among French judges. Those who assent to the opinion stated by any of the bench signify by lifting their toques from their heads.

To cap a story. To go one better; to follow a good story with a better one of the same kind.

To cap verses. Having the metre fixed and the last letter of the previous line given, to add a line beginning with that letter, thus:

The way was long, the wind was cold (D).
Dogs with their tongues their wounds do heal (L).
Like words congealed in northern air (R).
Regions Cæsar never knew (W).
With all a poet's ecstasy (Y).
You may decide my awkward pace, etc., etc.

There are parlour games of capping names, proverbs, etc., in the same way, as: Plato, Otway, Young, Goldsmith, etc., "Rome was not built in a day"; "Ye are the salt of the earth", "Hunger is the best sauce", "Example is better than precept", "Time and tide wait for no man", etc.

To cap it all. To surpass what has gone before; to make things even worse.

To gain the cap. To obtain a bow from another out of respect.

Such gains the cap of him that makes 'em fine,
But keeps his book uncrossed.

SHAKESPEARE: Cymbeline, III, iii.

To pull caps. To quarrel like two women who pull each other's caps. An obsolete phrase, used only of women. In a description of a rowdy party in 18th-century Bath we read:

At length they fairly proceeded to pulling caps, and everything seemed to presage a general battle... they suddenly desisted, and gathered up their caps, ruffles and handkerchiefs.

SMOLLETT: Humphry Clinker, Letter xix.

To send the cap round. To make a collection. From the custom of street musicians, singers, etc., sending a cap round to collect pennies among the onlookers.

Wearing the cap and bells. Said of a person who is the butt of the company, or one who excites laughter at his own expense. The reference is to licensed jesters, formerly attached to noblemen's establishments, who wore the CAP AND BELLS.

One is bound to speak the truth—whether he mounts the cap and bells or a shovel hat [like a bishop].—THACKERAY.

Your cap is all on one side. Many workmen, when they are perplexed or bothered, scratch their heads and in so doing push their cap on one side of the head, generally over the right ear, because the right hand is occupied.

Capful of wind. Olaus Magnus tells us that Eric, King of Sweden, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soever he turned his cap the wind would blow, and for this he was called Windy Cap. The Laplanders drove a profitable trade in selling winds, and even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie of Pomona (Orkney), used to sell favourable winds to mariners for the small sum of sixpence.

To be capped. A player who has represented ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, IRELAND, OR WALES in an international match at any of the major field sports may wear a cap bearing the national emblem. Hence the phrase, he was capped for England.

Capability Brown. Lancelot Brown (1715–1783), landscape gardener and architect, patronized by most of the rich men of taste. He set their great houses in a surround of parkland and informal pastoral charm. He was given this nickname because he habitually assured prospective employers that their land held "great capabilities".

Cap-à-pie (kăp á pè). From head to foot; usually with reference to arming or accoutring. From O.Fr. cap-à-pie (Mod. Fr. de pied en cap).

Armed at all points exactly cap-a-pie.
SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, II, i.

Cape. The Cape. Cape of Good Hope (originally known as the Cape of Storms), Cape Province.

Cape cart. A two-wheeled, hooded cart with a single shaft or pole, much used in Cape Colony and South Africa in colonial days.

Cape Gooseberry. Physalis peruviana, a plant much prized for its decorative bladder-like calyx, it takes its name from the Cape, but is of South American origin.

Cape Cod Turkey. Salt fish, a product of the Cape Cod fisheries, Massachusetts. Cp. BOMBAY DUCK. See also CAPON.

Cape Doctor. A bracing S.E. wind blowing at the Cape of Good Hope; so named from the time when the British in India used the Cape as a health resort, to recuperate from the more exacting climate of India, until hill stations came to be used for the same purpose.

Cape of Storms. See STORMS.

Spirit of the Cape. See ADAMASTOR.

Capel Court. A lane adjacent to the London Stock Exchange where dealers congregate to do business; so called from Sir William Capel, Lord Mayor in 1504. Hence used sometimes for the Stock Exchange itself. Hence also Capel Courtier, a humorous term for a professional stock-dealer.

Caper. The weather is so foul not even a Caper would venture out. A Manx proverb. A Caper is a fisherman of Cape Clear in Ireland, who will venture out in almost any weather.

Caper Merchant. A dancing master who "cuts capers".

Cut your capers! Be off with you!

I'll make him cut his capers, i.e. ruc his conduct.

To cut capers. To spring upwards in dancing, and rapidly interlace one foot with the other; figuratively to act in a manner with the object of attracting notice. Caper here is from the Ital. capra, a she-goat, which will jump about in an erratic way.

Capet. Hugh Capet (938-996), the founder of the Capetian dynasty of France, is said to have been named from the cappa, or monk's hood, which he wore as a lay abbot of St. Martin de Tours. The Capetians of the direct line ruled from 987 till 1328 when they were succeeded by the collateral house of VALOIS and by that of BOURBON in 1589 (Henry of Navarre). Louis XVI was arraigned before the National CONVENTION under the name of Louis Capet.

Capital. Money or money's worth available for production.

His capital is continually going from him (the merchant) in some shape and returning to him in another.

ADAM SMITH: Wealth of Nations, Bk. II, ch. i.

Active capital. Ready money or property readily convertible into it.

Capital cross. A Greek CROSS with terminations similar to Tuscan capitals.

Capital levy. A State exaction on capital. First proposed in the British HOUSE OF COMMONS in 1914. A Capital Gains tax was introduced in 1965.

Capital punishment. The imposition of the death penalty for crime (Lat. caput, head).

Capital ship. Warships of the largest class like the now obsolete battleship of which the DREADNOUGHT was the prototype.

Circulating capital. Wages or raw material. This sort of capital is not available a second time for the same purpose.

Fixed capital. Land, buildings, and machinery, which are only gradually consumed.

To make capital out of. To turn to account; thus, in politics, one party is always ready to make political capital out of the errors or misfortunes of the other.

Capitán, El Gran (el grán káp i ta' n) (the Great Captain). The name given to the famous Spanish general Gonsalvo de Cordova (1453-1515), through whose efforts Granada and Castile were united.

Capitulary (káp it' ū lár i). A collection of ordinances or laws, especially those of the Frankish kings. The laws were known as capitulars, from their being arranged in chapters (Med. Lat. capitularius). See CHAPTER.

Capon. (kă' pon). Properly a castrated cock; but the name has been given to various fish, perhaps originally by humorous friars who wished to avoid the Friday fast and so eased their consciences by changing the name of the fish and calling a chicken a fish out of the coop. Thus we have:

A Crail's capon. A dried haddock.

A Glasgow capon. A salt herring.

A Severn capon. A sole.

A Yarmouth capon. A red herring.

Capon is also an obsolete term for a love-letter, after the Fr. poulet, which means not only a chicken, but also a love-letter or a sheet of fancy notepaper. Thus Henry IV, consulting with Sully about his marriage, says: "My niece of Guise would please me best, though report says maliciously that she loves poulets in paper better than in fricassee."

Boyet, you can break-up this capon (i.e. open this love-letter).

SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, IV, i.

Capone, Alphonse (1899-1947). Al (Scarface) Capone, notorious Chicago gangster and racketeer of Sicilian origin. He rose to power in the heyday of BOOTLEGGING in the 1920s and made himself master of the rackets in the city by organizing the killing of most of the rival gunmen. After the St. Valentine's Day Massacre of 1929, when seven rival gangster leaders were machine-gunned, he was left in supreme control of the protection racket, speak-easies, brothels, etc. The suburb of Cicero was completely dominated by him. See also MAFIA.

Capricorn (káp' ri kôrn). Called by Thomson in his Winter, "the centaur archer". Anciently the winter solstice occurred on the entry of the sun into Capricorn, i.e. the Goat; but the stars having advanced a whole sign to the east, the winter now falls at the sun's entrance into SAGITTARIUS (the Centaur Archer), so that the poet is strictly right, though we commonly retain the classical manner of speaking. Capricorn is the tenth or strictly eleventh sign of the ZODIAC (21 December–20 January).

In classical mythology Capricorn was PAN, who, from fear of the great TYPHON, changed himself into a goat, and was made by JUPITER one of the signs of the Zodiac.

Captain. The Great Captain. See CAPITÁN.

A led captain. An obsequious person, a hanger-on, who dances attendance on the master and mistress of a house, for which service he has a knife and fork at the dinner table.

Captain Armstrong. A name for a cheating jockey—one who pulls a horse with a strong arm, and so prevents him winning.

Captain Cauf's Tail. In Yorkshire, the chief MUMMER who led his following from house to house on PLOUGH MONDAY. He was most fantastically dressed, with a cockade and many coloured ribbons; and he always had a genuine calf's (cauf's) tail affixed behind.

Captain Cooks, or Cookers. The popular name for the scrawny wild pig of New Zealand descended from those introduced by Captain Cook (1728–1779), the explorer.

Captain Moonlight. In Ireland a mythical person to whom was attributed the performance of atrocities by night especially in the latter part of the 19th century. Arson, murder, and the maiming of cattle were his specialities.

Captain of the Heads. In naval ships, the rating in charge of the Heads or lavatories. The name Heads arises from the original position of the ship's latrines, right forward in the beakhead or heads of the vessel.

Capua (káp' ū á). Capua corrupted Hannibal. Luxury and self-indulgence will ruin anyone. Hannibal was everywhere victorious until he wintered at Capua, the most luxurious city of Italy, after which his star began to wane. Another form of the saying is Capua was the Cannæ of Hannibal. (See CANNÆ.)

Capuchin (káp' ū chin). A friar of the strict group of FRANCISCANS that arose about 1520; so called from the capuce or pointed cowl. They became a separate order in 1619.

Capulet (káp' ū let). A noble house in Verona, the rival of that of Montague; in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, Juliet is of the former, and ROMEO of the latter.

Lady Capulet is the BEAU IDEAL of a proud Italian matron of the 15th century.

In a few years their few successors will go to the family vault of "all the Capulets."

BURKE: Reflections on the Revolution in France.

Caput Mortuum (káp' ut môr tū um) (Lat. dead head). An alchemist's term for the residuum left after exhaustive distillation or sublimation; hence, anything from which all that made it valuable has been removed. Thus a learned scholar paralysed is a mere caput mortuum of his former self. The French DIRECTORY, towards its close, was a mere caput mortuum of a government.

Caqueux (ka kè). A sort of gipsy race in Brittany, similar to the CAGOTS of Gascony and COLLIBERTS of Poitou.

Carabas (kár' a ba). He is a Marquis of Carabas. An ultra-conservative nobleman of unbounded pretensions and vanity, who would restore the lavish foolery of the reign of Louis XIV; one with the purse of FORTUNATUS, which was never empty. The character is taken from Perrault's tale of PUSS IN BOOTS.

Prêtres que nous vengeons
Levez la dime et partageons;
Et toi, peuple animal,
Porte encor le bat féodal . . .
Chapeau bas! Chapeau bas!
Gloire au marquis de Carabas!
BÉRANGER (1816).

The Marquis of Carabas in Disraeli's Vivian Grey is intended for the Marquis of Clanricarde.

Carabinier. See CARBINEER.

Caracalla (kár' a kál' á). Aurelius Antoninus, Roman Emperor (211–217), was so called because instead of the Roman TOGA he adopted the Gaulish caracalla. It was a large, close-fitting, hooded mantle, reaching to the heels, and slit up before and behind to the waist.

Caradoc (ká rád' ok). A Knight of the ROUND TABLE, noted for being the husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear "the mantle of matrimonial fidelity". He appears as Craddocke in the old ballad The Boy and the Mantle in PERCY'S RELIQUES. See BRAWN.

Craddocke called forth his ladye,
And bade her come in;
Saith, Winne this mantle, ladye,
With a little dinne.

Also in history, the British king whom the Romans called Caractacus, who was taken captive to Rome in A.D. 51.

Caran d'Ache (ká rán dash'). The pseudonym of Emmanuel Poiré (1858–1909), a well-known French caricaturist, born and educated at Moscow. (Russ. karandash, pencil.)

Carat. For precious stones, a measure of weight, about 1/142 of an ounce; for GOLD it is a ratio or proportional measure of 1/24th. Thus 22 carats of gold means 22 parts gold, 2 parts alloy. The name is perhaps from the Arab. qirat, meaning the seed of the locust tree, which was used for weighing gold and PRECIOUS STONES.

Caraway (kār' à wā). Once caraway "seeds" were very commonly used for flavouring cakes which were then called caraways. The liqueur kummel is also distilled from caraway oil.

Nay, you shall see my orchard, where in an arbour, we will eat a last year's pippin of my own grafting, with a dish of caraways.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, V, iii.

Carbineer, or Carabineer. A soldier armed with a short firearm called a carbine. The 6th Dragoon Guards were known as the Carabiniers, which with the 3rd and 6th Dragoon Guards became the 3rd Carabiniers (Prince of Wales's Dragoon Guards). The name (more commonly used in France) was given by William III in 1692. Louis XIV's Royal Carabiniers were so named in 1693.

Carbonado (kar bon à' dō). Grilled meat or fish. Strictly speaking, a carbonado is a piece of meat cut crosswise for the grid-iron (Lat. carbo, a coal).

If he do come in my way, so; if he do not—if I come in his willingly, let him make a carbonado of me.—SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, V, iii.

Carbonari (kar bo na' rē). The name means charcoal burners and was assumed by a political secret society in Naples formed about 1808 with the aim of overthrowing despotic and foreign government. Their meeting-place was called a "hut", the inside "the place of selling charcoal", the outside "the forest", their opponents "wolves", etc. Much of their ritual was drawn from FREEMASONRY and kindred societies grew up throughout Italy and also France. The Italian Carbonari were largely merged into YOUNG ITALY in the 1830s. BYRON and Mazzini were members, and NAPOLEON III was associated with the movement in his earlier days.

Card. Slang for a queer fellow, an eccentric, a "character". Arnold Bennett has a novel called The Card (1911).

You're a sbaky old card; and you can't be in love with this Lizzie.

DICKENS: Our Mutual Friend, Bk. III, ch. i.

Perhaps suggested by the phrase A SURE CARD, we have such phrases as the following:

A cool card. A person who coolly asks for something preposterous or outrageous; "cool" here means "coolly impudent". Cp. A COOLING CARD.

A cooling card. An obsolete expression for something that cools one's ardour, probably derived from some old game of cards. It is quite common in Shakespeare's day. In Euphues (1579) Lyly calls the letter to Philantus "a cooling card for Philantus and all fond lovers", and says:

The sick patient must keep a straight diet, the silly sheep a narrow fold, poor Philantus must believe Euphues, and all lovers (he only excepted) are cooled with a card of ten or rather fooled with a vain toy.

A card of ten was evidently an important card; SHAKESPEARE has:

A vengeance on your crafty wither'd hidel
Yet I have faced it with a card of ten.

Taming of the Shrew, II, I.

which means either to put a bold face on it, or to meet an attack with craft and subtlety.

A great card. A BIG-WIG, a person of note.

A knowing card. A sharp fellow, next door to a sharper. The allusion is to card-sharppers and their tricks.

Whose great aim it was to be considered a knowing card.—DICKENS: Sketches, etc.

A leading card. The strongest point in one's argument, etc.; a star actor. In card games a person leads from his strongest suit.

A loose card. A worthless fellow who lives on the loose.

A loose card is a card of no value, and consequently the properest to throw away.

HOYLE: Games, etc.

A queer card. An eccentric person, "indifferent honest"; one who may be "all right", but whose proceedings arouse mild suspicion and do not inspire confidence.

A sure card. A person one can fully depend on; one sure to command success. A project certainly to be depended on, as a winning card in one's hand.

A clear conscience is a sure card.

LYLY: Euphues (1579).

Court cards. See COURT.

He played his cards well. He acted judiciously and skilfully, like a WHIST-player who plays his hand with judgment.

On the cards. Likely to happen, projected, and talked about as likely to occur. Probably derived from fortune-telling by cards, but possibly an allusion to a racing programme or card.

That's the card. The right thing. It probably refers to card games—"that's the right card to play"—but it means the same as "that's the ticket" and may refer to a ticket, or a race-card, etc.

That was my trump card. My best chance, my last resort.

The cards are in my hands. I hold the disposal of events which will secure success; I have the upper hand, the whip-end of the stick.

The Devil's Four-poster. See under DEVIL.

To ask for one's cards. To resign one's job. The reference is to the National Insurance cards kept by a person's employer. Similarly to be given one's cards means to be dismissed or sacked.

To count on one's cards. To anticipate success under the circumstances; to rely on one's advantages.

To go in with good cards. To have good patronage; to have excellent grounds for expecting success.

To have a card up one's sleeve. To have resources unsuspected by one's opponents, to have a last stroke in reserve. From cheating at cards, but with no implication of dishonesty in the figurative use.

To play one's best card. To do that which one hopes is most likely to secure victory.

To speak by the card. Here the allusion is probably to the card of a mariner's compass. It means to be careful with one's words; to be deliberate and have as much claim to be right as a compass. It may, however, have reference to written agreements such as made between a merchant and the master of a ship, i.e. to speak according to the written instructions.

Law . . . is the card to guide the world by.

HOOKER: Ecclesiastical Policy, Pt. II, sec. v.

We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.—SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, V, 1.

When Osric tells Hamlet (V, ii) that Laertes is "the card and calendar of gentry" the compass card is implied with all its points.

Cardigan. A knitted woollen over-waistcoat, named after the 7th Earl of Cardigan, who led the Light Brigade in the famous charge of Balaclava (1854). It appears to have been first worn by the British to protect themselves from the bitter cold of the Crimean winter. The Balaclava helmet or cap, a knitted woollen covering for the head and neck, has a similar origin.

Cardinal (Lat. cardo, a hinge). The adjective cardinalis meant originally "pertaining to a hinge", hence "that on which something turns or depends", thus "the principal or chief". At first applied in ecclesiastical usage to the clergy regularly serving a particular church (that church being for them the cardo or centre), the term from the mid-8th century came to designate urban as distinct from rural clergy. It was next applied to the clergy of a diocesan town and its cathedral, but was by later usage restricted to the cardinals of the Roman see. In 1567 Pius V formally reserved it for members of the Pope's Council, the COLLEGE OF CARDINALS.

The Cardinal's red hat was made part of the official vestments by Innocent IV in 1245. This 30-tasselled hat (not worn) was abolished in 1969. See also BISHOP.

College of Cardinals, or Sacred College. Originally formed from the clergy of the see of ROME, it now contains members from many nations who take their titles, as has always been customary, from a Roman parish. It consists of Cardinal-Bishops, Cardinal-Priests, and Cardinal-Deacons (the latter possibly deriving from the seven deacons appointed by St. PETER), but these terms are essentially of historical significance only, as all cardinals are now consecrated bishops. The number of cardinals was fixed at 70 by Sixtus V in 1586. John XXIII (1958-1963) raised it to 87, and in 1969 it reached 136. The POPE is elected by and from the College of Cardinals.

Cardinal humours. An obsolete medical term for the four principal humours of the body. See HUMOUR.

Cardinal numbers. The natural primitive numbers, which answer the question "how many?" such as 1, 2, 3, etc. 1st, 2nd, 3rd, etc., are ordinal numbers.

Cardinal points of the compass. Due north, south, east, and west. So called because they are the points on which the intermediate ones (NE., NW., NNE., etc.) hinge. The poles, being the points on which the earth turns, were called in Latin cardines. (See CARDINAL.) The cardinal points are those which lie in the direction of the poles and of sunrise and sunset. Thus the winds which blow due north, east, west, and south, are called cardinal winds. It is probably from the fact that there are four cardinal points that there are four cardinal humours, virtues, etc.

Cardinal signs (of the ZODIAC). The two equinoctial and the two solstitial signs. ARIES and LIBRA, CANCER and CAPRICORN.

Cardinal virtues. Justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, on which all other virtues hang or depend. A term of the SCHOOLMEN, to distinguish the "natural" virtues from the "theological" virtues (faith, hope and charity).

Care. Care killed the cat. It is said that "a cat has nine lives", yet care would wear them all out.

Hang sorrow! care'll kill a cat.
BEN JONSON: Every Man in his Humour, I, iii.

Care Sunday. The fifth Sunday in LENT. "Care" here means trouble, suffering; and Care Sunday means PASSION SUNDAY (as in O.H. Ger. kar-fritag is GOOD FRIDAY).

Care Sunday is also known as Carle or Carling Sunday. It was an old custom, especially in the north, to eat parched peas fried in butter on this day, and they were called Carlings.

Care-cloth. In the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, the fine silk or linen cloth formerly laid over the newly-married, or held over them as a canopy.

Carle Sunday; Carlings. See CARE SUNDAY.

Carlists. Don Carlos (1788-1855), second son of Charles IV of Spain, would have become king on the death of his brother Ferdinand VII, had not the SALIC LAW been set aside in favour of Ferdinand's daughter, Isabella. Don Carlos was supported by the Church, and the Carlist Wars ensued (1833-1840), but Isabella's supporters triumphed. Carlist intrigues continued until the death of Don Carlos II in 1909 and in 1937 the Carlists supported General Franco's FALANGE. They still maintain a claimant to the throne (Carlos Hugo de Borbón-Parma).

Carlovingians (kar lo ving' giänz), Carolingians, or Karlings. The dynasty named from Carolus Magnus or CHARLEMAGNE. They were descended from Arnulf, a 7th-century bishop of Metz, and ruled in France (751-987), Germany (752-911), and Italy (774-887).

Carmagnole (kar ma nyöl). Originally the name of a workman's jacket introduced into France from Carmagnola in Piedmont and adopted by French revolutionaries. Thus the name came to be applied to them, to the soldiers of the Republic, and to a widely popular song and dance which was almost invariably used at the executions of 1792 and 1793. The first verse of the song is:

Madame Veto avait promis
De faire égorger tout Paris,
Madame Veto avait promis
De faire égorger tout Paris,
Mais son coup a manqué.

Dansons la carmagnole, Vive le son, vive le son,
Dansons la carmagnole, Vive le son du canon.

Madame VETO was their name for

Marie Antoinette, as she was supposed to have instigated the king's unfortunate use of the veto. Carmagnole was subsequently applied to other revolutionary songs such as ÇA IRA, the MARSEILLAISE, the CHANT DU DÉPART, also to the speeches in favour of the execution of Louis XVI, called by Barère des Carmagnoles.

Carmelites (kar' me litz). A mendicant order of friars of 12th-century origin, taking its name from Mount Carmel in Syria and with a mythical history associating them with the prophet Elijah. Also called WHITEFRIARS from their white mantle. See BAREFOOTED.

Carmen Sylva (kar' men sil' vá). The pen-name of Queen Elizabeth of Roumania (1843-1916). She was a musician, painter, and writer of poems and stories.

Carnival. The season immediately preceding LENT, ending on SHROVE TUESDAY, and a period in many Roman Catholic countries devoted to amusement; hence revelry, riotous amusement. From the Lat. caro, carnis, flesh; levare, to remove; signifying the abstinence from meat during Lent. The earlier word carnilevamen was altered in Italian to carnevale as though connected with vale, farewell—farewell to flesh.

Carol (O.Fr. carole, probably from Lat. choraula, a flute-player). The earliest use of the word in English was for a round dance, then later a light and joyous hymn particularly associated with the Nativity. The following verse is a translation from Old English of our earliest extant Christmas carol:

Lordlings listen to our lay—
We have come from far away
To seek Christmas;
In this mansion we are told
He his yearly feast doth hold;
'Tis today!
May joy come from God above,
To all those who Christmas love.

The first printed collection came from the press of Wynkyn de Worde in 1521; it included the Boar's Head Carol, which is still sung at Queen's College, Oxford. See BOAR'S HEAD.

Carolingians. See CARLOVINGIANS.

Carolus (ká rō' lus). A GOLD coin of the reign of Charles I. It was at first worth 20s., later 23s.

Carpathian Wizard. PROTEUS, who lived in the island of Carpathus (now Scarpanto), between Rhodes and Crete, and could transform himself into any shape he pleased. He is represented as carrying a sort of crook in his hand, because he was an ocean shepherd and had to manage a flock of sea-calves.

Carpe diem

Carpe diem (kar' pā dī' em). Seize the present day. Enjoy yourself while you have the chance. "Dum vivimus, vivamus".

Carpe diem quam minimum credula postere.

HORACE: Odes I, xi, 8.

Seize the present, trust tomorrow e'en as little as you may.

CONNINGTON.

Carpet. The magic carpet. The apparently worthless carpet, which transported whoever sat upon it wheresoever they wished, is one of the stock properties of Eastern story-telling. It is sometimes Prince Housain's carpet, because of the popularity of the Story of PRINCE AHMED in the ARABIAN NIGHTS, when it supplies one of the main incidents; but the chief magic carpet is that of King SOLOMON which, according to the KORAN, was of green silk. His throne was placed on it when he travelled, and it was large enough for all his forces to stand upon, the men and women on his right hand, and the spirits on his left. When ready, Solomon told the wind where he wished to go, and the carpet rose in the air, and landed at the place required. The birds of the air, with outspread wings, protected the party from the sun.

To be on the carpet, or to be carpeted. To be reprimanded, to be "called over the COALS".

To bring a question on the carpet. To bring it up for consideration; a translation of the Fr. sur le tapis (on the tablecloth)—i.e. before the House, under debate.

Carpet-bagger. The name given in the U.S.A. to the northern political adventurers who sought a career in the southern states after the CIVIL WAR ended (1865). Their only "property qualification" was their "carpet bag" of personal belongings, and they were regarded by the southerners as parasites and exploiters. The southern state governments of this time are called carpet-bagger governments from the presence of these Republican office-holders from the north.

Hence a general term for one who comes to a place for political or particular ends, as a political candidate who has no real roots in the constituency he seeks to represent.

Carpet-biter. A person subject to violent fits of rage. Chewing and biting of this kind has always been a sign of uncontrolled temper, and there are many accounts of this type of behaviour among the notoriously violent-tempered from the ANGEVINS to Adolf HITLER.

Carpet-knight. One dubbed at Court by favour, not having won his spurs by military service in the field. Perhaps because non-military knightships were conferred "on the carpet", rather than "in the field", but more probably in allusion to the attachment shown to the carpeted drawing-room by non-martial knights.

You are women

Or, at the best, loose carpet-knights.

MASSINGER: Maid of Honour, II, v.

Carriage. This used to mean things carried, luggage.

And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.—Acts xxi, 15.

Carriage company. People who kept their own carriage for visiting, etc.

Seeing a great deal of carriage company.

THACKERAY.

Carronade (kār o nād). A short gun of large calibre like a mortar, having no trunnions and thus differing from howitzers. First made in 1779 at the Carron iron foundry in Scotland, carronades were fastened to their carriages by a loop underneath, and were chiefly used on ships to enable heavy shot to be thrown at close quarters.

Carry. Carry arms! Carry swords! Military commands directing that the rifle or drawn sword is to be held in a vertical position in the right hand and against the right shoulder.

To carry away. In nautical language, to break a spar, or rope or other part of a ship's gear.

To carry both ends of the log (Austr). To do all the work supposed to be shared by two.

To carry coals. See COAL.

To carry everything before one. To carry off all the prizes, to be highly successful in any form of sport, contest, or examination.

To carry fire in one hand and water in the other. To say one thing and mean another; to flatter, to deceive; to lull suspicion in order the better to work mischief.

Altera manu fert aquam, altera ignem,
Altera manu fert lapideum, altera panem ostentat.
PLAUTUS.

In one hand he carried water, in the other fire; in one hand he bears a stone, in the other he shows a piece of bread.

To carry on. (1) To continue an activity from the point already reached. (2) To make a scene, lose one's temper—"he carried on something dreadful".

To carry on with someone. To indulge in an amorous affair.

To carry one's bat. Said of a cricketer who goes in first and is "not out" at the innings close. Hence, figuratively, to outlast one's opponents, to succeed in one's undertaking.

To carry one's point. To succeed against opposition, to overrule, to win. Candidates in ROME were balloted for and the votes marked on a tablet by points. Hence, omme punctum ferre meant "to be carried nem. con.", or to gain every vote; and "to carry one's point" is to carry off the points at which one aimed.

To carry out, or through. To continue a project to its completion.

To carry the can. To receive the blame for the misdeeds or mistakes in which others have participated. Probably from the performance of menial tasks in the services, which benefit others.

To carry the day. To win the contest; to carry off the honours of the day.

To carry weight. To have influence. In horse-racing, to equalize the weight of two or more riders by adding to the lighter ones.

He carries weight! he rides a race!
'Tis for a thousand pounds.

OWPER: John Gilpin.

Cart. To put the cart before the horse is to reverse the right or natural order of things.

This methinks is playnely to sett the carte before the horse.

The Babees Book (Early English Tract Society, p. 23).

In other languages we have:

French: Mettre la charrette avant les bœufs.

Latin: Currus bovem trahit præpostere.

Greek: Hysteron proteron.

German: Die Pferde hinter den Wagen spannen.

Italian: Metter il carro innanzi ai buoi.

Carte. Carte blanche (Fr.). Literally a blank paper. A paper with only the signature written on it, so that the recipient may write his own terms upon it, knowing they will be accepted. Of military origin, referring to unconditional surrender, but now entirely used in a figurative sense meaning to confer absolute freedom of action on someone. Cp. BLANK CHEQUE.

Carte de visite (Fr.). A visiting card; a photographic likeness on a card, originally intended to be used as a visiting card; an idea which started in 1857 but never "caught on", although it made the small size of photograph very popular.

Cartesian Philosophy (kar tē' zhàn). The philosophical system of René Descartes (1596-1650), often called the father of modern philosophy. The basis of his system is COGITO ERGO SUM. Thought must proceed from SOUL and therefore man is not wholly material; that soul must be from some Being not material, and that Being is God. As for physical phenomena, they must be the result of motion excited by God, and these motions he termed vortices, to explain the movement of heavenly bodies. This latter theory was replaced by Newton's theory of gravitation. See NEWTONIAN PHILOSOPHY.

Carthage of the North. This name was given to Lübeck when it was the head of the HANSEATIC LEAGUE.

Carthaginem esse delendam. See DELENDAM EST CARTHAGO.

Carthaginian faith. Treachery. See PUNIC FAITH.

Carthusians. An order of monks founded about 1084 by St. Bruno of Cologne, who with six companions retired to the solitude of La Grande Chartreuse, thirteen miles north-east of Grenoble, and there built his famous monastery. It was here they made the famous liqueur called CHARTREUSE. In 1902 the monks were evicted by order of the French government and they moved to the Certosa (Charterhouse) near Lucca.

The first English Charterhouse was founded by Sir Walter de Menny in London in 1371 and the Carthusians were among the staunchest opponents of Henry VIII at the time of the Dissolution of the Monasteries. In 1833 the Carthusians were re-established in the Charterhouse at Parkminster, Sussex.

Carvilia. See MORGAN LE FAY.

Caryatides, or Caryatids (kār i ät' idz). Figures of women in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Caryæ, in Laconia, sided with the Persians at THERMOPYLÆ; in consequence of which the Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxiteles, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of these women instead of columns. Cp. ATLANTES, CANEPHORUS, TELAMONES.

Casabianca (kās ä bi äng' kâ). At the Battle of the Nile (1798), Louis Casabianca, Captain of the French flagship L'Orient (120 guns), gallantly fought his ship to the end, although the Admiral had been killed. His thirteen-year-old son, Giacomo Jocante, refusing to leave him, perished with his father.

The boy stood on the burning deck
Whence all but he had fled;
The flame that lit the battle's wreck
Shone round him o'er the dead.

MRS. HEMANS: Casabianca.

Casanova. To be regarded as a "regular Casanova" is to have a reputation for amorous escapades, in allusion to the notorious Giovanni Jacopo Casanova de Seingalt (1725-1798), who secured his own reputation as an insatiable amorist by the writing of his lengthy Mémoires. Expelled from a Venetian seminary for his immoral conduct, after a period in the household of Cardinal Acquaviva, he wandered the capitals of Europe mixing with aristocratic and wealthy society, posing as alchemist, preacher, gambler, diplomatist, etc., and generally leading a vicious life. He was also a knight of the papal order of the Golden Spur, and was acquainted with Stanislaus Poniatowski and Frederick the Great, but he soon exhausted the goodwill of those around him and found it necessary to move on.

Case. The case is altered. See PLOWDEN. To case. To skin an animal; to deprive it of its "case". See FIRST CATCH YOUR HARE under CATCH.

To case a joint (Amer.). A criminal's expression for investigating, reconnoitring or inspecting a "joint" (the building or property concerned) preparatory to the intended robbery, etc.

Case-hardened. Impenetrable to all sense of honour or shame. The allusion is to steel hardened by carbonizing the surface.

Casket. A small chest or box.

Casket Homer. See HOMER.

Casket, Children of the. Between 1728 and 1751 the Mississippi Company sent regular shipments of respectable middle-class girls to New Orleans to provide wives for the French settlers in Louisiana; each was presented on her departure with a casket of suitable clothing. They were known as filles à la cassette, to distinguish them from the women of bad character shipped out from the Salpêtrière prison during the same period. Louisiana families like to claim descent from a casket girl as New Englanders do from a MAYFLOWER pilgrim.

Casket Letters, The. Letters supposed to have been written between Mary Queen of Scots and Bothwell, at least one of which was held to prove the complicity of the Queen in the murder of Darnley, her husband. They were kept in a casket which fell into the hands of the Earl of Morton in 1567; they were examined in England and used as evidence (though denounced as forgeries by the Queen, who was never allowed to see them), and they disappeared after the execution of the Earl of Gowrie (1584), into whose possession they had passed on Morton's execution in 1581. Their authenticity is still in dispute.

Cassandra (ká sán' drá). A prophetess. In Greek legend the daughter of PRIAM and HECUBA, gifted with the power of prophecy. She refused APOLLO's advances and he brought it to pass that no one believed in her predictions, although they were invariably correct. She appears in SHAKESPEARE's Troilus and Cressida. In the figurative sense the name is usually applied to a prophet of doom.

Cassation. The Court of Cassation, in France, is the highest Court of Appeal, the court which can casser (quash the judgment of other courts).

Cassi. Inhabitants of the Cassio HUNDRED, Hertfordshire, referred to by CÆSAR in his Commentaries. The name survives in Cassiobury Park, Watford.

Cassibelan (kás ib' el án). Uncle to Cymbeline, mentioned in Shakespeare's Cymbeline. He is the historical Cassivelaunus, a British king who ruled over the Catuvellauni (in Herts., Bucks., and Berks.), about 50 B.C., and was conquered by CÆSAR. See CUNOBELIN.

Cassiopeia (kás i ð pé' á). In Greek mythology, the wife of CEPHEUS, King of Ethiopia, and mother of ANDROMEDA. In consequence of her boasting of her beauty, she was sent to the heavens as the constellation Cassiopeia, the chief stars of which form the outline of a woman sitting in a chair and holding up both arms in supplication.

Cassiterides (kás i ter' i dēz). The tin islands, generally supposed to be the Scilly Islands and CORNWALL; but possibly the isles in Vigo Bay are meant. It is said that the Veneti procured tin from Cornwall and carried it to these islands, keeping its source a profound secret. The Phœnicians were the chief customers of the Veneti.

Cast. A cast of the eye. A squint. One meaning of the word cast is to twist or warp. Thus, a fabric is said to "cast" when it warps; seamen speak of "casting", or turning the head of a ship on the tack it is to sail. We also speak of a CASTING VOTE.

My goode bowe clene cast (twisted) on one side.
ASCHAM: Toxophilus.

Cast down. Dejected (Lat. dejectus).

Casting vote. The vote of the presiding officer or chairman when the votes of the assembly are equal. The final vote casts, turns, or determines the issue.

To cast about. To deliberate, to consider, as, "I am casting about me how I am to meet the expenses." A sporting phrase. Dogs, when they have lost scent,

"cast for it", i.e. spread out and search in different directions to recover it.

To cast accounts. To balance or keep accounts. To cast up a line of figures is to add them together and set down the sum they produce.

To cast anchor. To throw out the anchor in order to bring the vessel to a standstill (Lat. anchoram jacere).

To cast a sheep's eye at one. See SHEEP.

To cast beyond the moon. To form wild conjectures. One of Heywood's proverbs. At one time the MOON was supposed to influence the weather, to affect the ingathering of fruits, to rule the time of sowing, reaping and slaying cattle, etc.

I talk of things impossible, and cast beyond the moon.—HEYWOOD.

To cast in one's lot. To share the good or bad fortune of another.

To cast in one's teeth. To throw reproach at one. The allusion is to knocking one's teeth out by stones.

All his faults observed,
Set in a notebook, learn'd and conn'd by rote,
To cast in my teeth.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Cæsar, IV, iii.

To cast pearls before swine. To offer what is precious to those who are unable to understand its value or appreciate it; a Biblical phrase (Matt. vii, 6). If pearls were cast to swine, the swine would trample them underfoot.

Castaly (kās' tā li). A fountain of PARNASSUS sacred to the MUSES. Its waters had the power of inspiring with the gift of poetry those who drank of them.

Caste (Port. casta, race). One of the hereditary classes of society among Hindus; hence any hereditary or exclusive class. The four Hindu castes are BRAHMINS (the priestly order), Shatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaiśya (husbandmen and merchants), Sudra (agricultural labourers and artisans). The first issued from the mouth of BRAHMA, the second from his arms, the third from his thighs, and the fourth from his feet. Below this come thirty-six inferior classes, to whom the VEDAS are sealed, and who are held cursed in this world and without hope in the next.

To lose caste. To lose position in society. To be degraded from one caste to an inferior one.

Castle. Castle in the air. A visionary project, day-dream, splendid imagining which has no real existence. In fairy tales we often have these castles built at a word and vanishing as soon, like that built for ALADDIN by the Genie of the Lamp. Also called Castles in Spain; the French call them Châteaux en Espagne or Châteaux en Asie.

Castle of Bungay. In Camden's Britannia (1607) the following lines are attributed to Lord Bigod of Bungay on the borders of Suffolk and Norfolk:

Were I in my castle of Bungay
Upon the river of Waveney,
I would ne care for the king of Cockney.

The events referred to belong to the reign of Stephen or Henry II. The French have the proverb: Je ne voudrais pas être roi, si j'étais prévôt de Bar-sur-Aube (the most lucrative and honourable of all the provostships in France). A similar idea is expressed in the words:

And often to our comfort, we shall find
The sharded beetle in a safer hold
Than is the full-winged eagle.

SHAKESPEARE: Cymbeline, III, iii.

Similarly Pope says:

And more true joy Marcellus exiled feels
Than Cæsar with a senate at his heels.

Essay on Man, iv, 257.

Castle of Indolence. In Thomson's poem of this name (1748) it is situated in the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner was an enchanter, who deprived all who entered his domains of their energy and free will.

Castle Terabil, or Terrible, in ARTHURIAN legend stood in Launceston, Cornwall. It had a steep keep environed with a triple wall. Sometimes called Dunheved Castle.

Castor and Pollux (kas' tór, pol' uks). In Roman mythology, the twin sons of JUPITER and LEDA, also known as the DIOSCURI. They had many adventures including sailing with JASON in quest of the GOLDEN FLEECE, were worshipped as gods, and finally placed among the constellations as the GEMINI.

Their names used to be given by sailors to the ST. ELMO'S FIRE, or CORPOSANT. If only one flame showed itself, the Romans called it HELEN, and said that the worst of the storm was yet to come; two or more luminous flames they called Castor and Pollux, and said that they boded the termination of the storm.

Casus belli (kâ' sūs bel' i) (Lat.). A ground for war; an occurrence warranting international hostilities.

Cat. Called a "FAMILIAR", from the mediæval superstition that SATAN's favourite form was a black cat. Hence witches were said to have a cat as their familiar. The superstition may have arisen from the classical legend of Galentias who was turned into a cat and became a priestess of HECATE.

In ancient Rome the cat was a symbol of liberty and the goddess of Liberty was represented with a cat at her feet. No animal is so opposed to restraint as a cat.

In Ancient Egypt the cat was held sacred. The goddess Bast (see BUBASTIS), representative of the life-giving solar heat, was portrayed as having the head of a cat, probably because that animal likes to bask in the sun. Diodorus tells us that in Egypt whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was punished by death. According to tradition DIANA assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the GIANTS.

The male, or Tom, cat in SCOTLAND is called a Gib cat; the female is a Doe cat. Cat is also a term for a spiteful woman, a spiteful remark is said to be "catty" and "cat" was once a slang term for a harlot.

A cat has nine lives. A cat is more tenacious of life than many animals, it is careful and hardy and after a fall generally lands upon its feet without injury, the foot and toes being well padded.

Tyb: What wouldst thou have with me?

Mer: Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives.

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, III, i.

A cat has nine lives, and a woman has nine cats' lives.—FULLER: Gnomologia.

A cat may look at a king. An impertinent remark by an inferior, meaning, "I am as good as you." There was a political pamphlet published with this title in 1652.

All cats love fish but fear to wet their paws. An old adage said of one who is anxious to obtain something of value but does not care to incur the necessary trouble or risk. It is to this saying that SHAKESPEARE referred in Macbeth I, vii:

Letting "I dare not" wait upon "I would",
Like the poor cat i' the adage.

Before the cat can lick her ear. Never; before the GREEK CALENDERS. No cat can lick her ear. See NEVER.

Care killed the cat. See CARE.

Cat i' the adage. See ALL CATS LOVE FISH, ETC.

Dick Whittington and his cat. See WHITTINGTON.

Enough to make a cat laugh. Incongruously ridiculous.

Enough to make a cat speak. Said of something (usually good liquor) that will loosen one's tongue.

Come on your ways; open your mouth; here is that which will give language to you, cat; open your mouth.—SHAKESPEARE: Tempest, II, ii.

Hang me in a bottle like a cat. (Much Ado about Nothing, I, i). In olden times a cat was for sport enclosed in a bag or leather bottle, and hung to the branch of a tree, as a mark for bowmen to shoot at. Percy in his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765) mentions a variant of the "sport":

It is still a diversion in Scotland to hang up a cat in a small cask or firkin, half filled with soot; and then a parcel of clowns on horseback try to beat out the ends of it, in order to show their dexterity in escaping before the contents fall upon them.

It is raining cats and dogs. Very heavily. See under RAIN.

Like a cat on hot bricks. Very uneasy; not at all "at home" in the situation; very restless.

Muffled cats catch no mice (Ital. Gatta guantata non piglia sorce). Said of those who work in gloves for fear of soiling their fingers.

Not room to swing a cat. Used to indicate that a space, room, house, etc., is very restricted and small. There are various suggested origins of the phrase. Swinging cats by their tails as a mark for sportsmen was once a popular amusement. There were several variants of the diversion; see HANG ME IN A BOTTLE, above; and TO FIGHT LIKE KILKENNY CATS, below. Cat was an abbreviation for CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS and in view of the restricted space in the old sailing ships where the cat was often administered, it is most likely derived from swinging this particular kind of cat. Cat is also an old Scottish word for rogue, and if the derivation is from this, the "swing" is that of the condemned rogue hanging from the gallows.

See how the cat jumps. See "which way the wind blows"; await the course of events, but see what is going to happen before you pass an opinion, support a course of action or commit yourself. The allusion is either to the game of "tip-cat", in which before you strike you must watch which way the "cat" has jumped up, or to the cruel pastimes mentioned under NOT ROOM TO SWING A CAT.

Sick as a cat. Cats are very prone to vomiting. Hence one is said to cat or to shoot the cat when vomiting.

The cat's pyjamas. Something superlatively good; first rate; attractive. An American colloquialism in use by 1900 and current in England in the 1920s and 1930s. The cat's whiskers is used in the same way and with the same meaning.

To bell the cat. See BELL.

To be made a cat's paw of. See under CAT'S PAW.

To cat the anchor. To hang the anchor on the cathead, a fitment on the ship's side near the hawse-pipe. It is used to hang the BOWER ANCHOR, when the hawse-pipe is needed for the cable in securing to a buoy.

To fight like Kilkenny cats. To fight till both sides have lost their all; to fight with the utmost determination and pertinacity. The story is that during the Irish rebellion of 1798 Kilkenny was garrisoned by a troop of Hessian soldiers, who amused themselves by tying two cats together by their tails and throwing them across a clothes-line to fight. When an officer approached to stop the "sport", a trooper cut the two tails with a sword and the two cats bolted. When an explanation of the two bleeding tails was asked for, he was told that two cats had been fighting and devoured each other all but the tails.

To grin like a Cheshire cat. An old simile popularized by Lewis Carroll:

"please would you tell me," said Alice a little timidly, . . . "why your cat grins like that?" "It's a Cheshire cat," said the Duchess, "and that's why."
Alice in Wonderland (1865), ch. vi.

The phrase has never been satisfactorily explained, but it has been said that Cheshire cheese was once sold moulded like a cat that appeared to be grinning. The waggish explanation is that the cats know that Cheshire is a COUNTY PALATINE and find the idea a source of perpetual amusement.

To lead a cat and dog life. To be always snapping and quarrelling, as a cat and a dog.

To let the cat out of the bag. To disclose a secret. See A PIG IN A POKE under PIG.

To live under the cat's foot. To be under PETTICOAT GOVERNMENT; to be HEN-PECKED. A mouse under the cat's paw lives but by sufferance and at the cat's pleasure.

To put the cat among the pigeons. To stir up trouble, to cause dissension. The allusion is obvious.

To turn cat-in-pan. To turn traitor, to be a TURNCOAT. The phrase seems to be the Fr. tourner côté en peine (to turn sides in trouble).

Touch not a cat but a glove. The punning motto of the Mackintosh clan, whose crest is a "cat-a-mountain salient guard-ant proper", with "two cats proper" for supporters. The meaning of "but" here is "without" or "except with".

What can you have of a cat but her skin? Said of something that is useless for any purpose but one. The cat's fur was used for trimming cloaks, etc., but the flesh was no good for anything.

When the cat's away the mice will play. Advantage will be taken of the absence of the person in authority. A proverb found in many languages. It is given in Ray's Collection.

Cat and Fiddle. There are several fanciful derivations for this inn sign but it most probably comes from the nursery rhyme:

Heigh diddle diddle
The cat and the fiddle, etc.

There is a possible reference to the once popular game of tip-cat or trap-ball and the fiddle for a dance that were provided as attractions for customers. The second highest English inn is the Cat and Fiddle near Buxton, Derbyshire.

Cat and Kittens. A PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGN alluding to the large and small pewter pots in which beer was served. Stealing these pots was called "cat and kitten sneaking".

Cat and Mouse Act. Popular name for the Prisoners (Temporary Discharge for Ill-Health) Act of 1913, passed during the SUFFRAGETTE disturbances to avoid the imprisoned law-breakers from achieving martyrdom through hunger strikes. They were released on licence when necessary, subject to re-arrest if need arose. To play cat and mouse is to do what you like with someone in your power.

Cat-call. A kind of whistling noise sometimes used by theatre audiences, etc., to express displeasure or impatience.

I was very much surprised with the great consort of cat-calls . . . to see so many persons of quality of both sexes assembled together in a kind of caterwauling.—ADDISON: Spectator, No. 361.

Cat-eyed. Able to see in the dark.

Cat ice. Very thin, almost transparent ice, from under which the water has receded; unable to bear the weight of a cat.

Cat-lap. A contemptuous name for tea, or other "soft" drink such as a cat would drink; non-alcoholic liquor.

A more accomplished old woman never drank cat-lap.—SCOTT: Redgauntlet, ch. xiii.

Cat o'mountain. The wild-cat; also the leopard, or panther; hence a wild, savage sort of man.

Cat-o'-nine-tails. A whip with nine lashes used for punishing offenders, briefly known as the "cat". Once used for flogging in the Army and Navy and not formally abolished as a civil punishment for crimes of violence until 1948. Popular superstition says that the nine tails were because flogging by "a trinity of trinities" would be both more efficient and more efficacious.

Cat Stane. Certain monoliths in Scotland (there is one near Kirkliston, Linlithgow), so called from the Celtic cat, a battle, because they mark the site of a battle. They are not Druidical stones.

Cat's-brains. This curious name is given to a geological formation of sandstone veined with chalk. It is frequently met with in old agricultural deeds and surveys.

Cats' concert. A noisy jangle, a discordant din; like the caterwauling of cats at night.

Cat's cradle. A game played with a piece of twine by two children. It has been suggested that the name is a corruption of cratch-cradle, or the manger cradle in which the infant Saviour was laid (cratch is the Fr. crèche, a rack or manger), but this is no more than surmise.

Cat's eye. A gem which possesses chatoyancy, or a changeable lustre. The true or precious cat's eye is a variety of chrysoberyl. The semi-precious kind is a form of quartz.

It is also the name of a reflector embedded in the road as a guide for motorists after lighting-up time or in fog.

Cat's paw. A light air, seen afar off, indicated by a ripple on a calm sea, and usually heralding a storm, is so called by sailors. It is also a nautical term for a loop formed in a rope for attaching a hook, etc.

To be made a cat's paw of, i.e. the tool of another, to do another's dirty work. The allusion is to the fable of the monkey who wanted to get some roasted chestnuts from the fire, and used the paw of his friend the cat for the purpose.

Cat's whisker. In the old fashioned "crystal" wireless sets, this was the name given to the fine wire that made contact with the crystal. See also CAT'S PYJAMAS.

Catacomb (kät' á cöm). A subterranean gallery for the burial of the dead, especially those at ROME. The origin of the name is unknown but the cemetery of St. SEBASTIAN on the APPIAN WAY was called the Catacumbas, probably a place-name and in the course of time the name was applied to similar cemeteries. Their extensive development in Rome took place in the 3rd and 4th centuries and was due to the spread of Christianity. At times they were used by the Christians for their meetings. They suffered much destruction from the GOTHs and Lombards and eventually came to be forgotten until rediscovered in 1578 as the result of a landslip.

Cataian (kät á' yan). A native of CATHAY or China; hence a thief, liar or scoundrel, because the Chinese were supposed to have these characteristics.

I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, II, i.

Catalogue raisonné (rá' zó nā) (Fr.). A catalogue of books, paintings, etc., classed according to their subjects and often with explanatory notes or comments.

Catamaran (kät á má rán'). A scraggy old woman, a vixen; so called from a play on the first syllable. It properly means a raft consisting of three logs lashed together with ropes; used on the coasts of Coromandel and Madras, etc. (Tamil kattamararam, tied-log).

No, you old catamaran, though you pretend you never read novels.

THACKERAY: Lovel the Widower, ch. i.

It is now largely used to denote a boat made of two hulls connected in parallel.

Catastrophe (ká tās tró fi) (Gr. kata downwards; strephein, to turn). A turning upside down. Originally used of the change which produces the dénouement of a drama, which is usually a "turning upside down" of the beginning of the plot.

All the actors must enter to complete and make up the catastrophe of this great piece.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE: Religio Medici.

Pat! he comes like the catastrophe of the old comedy.—SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, I, ii.

Catch. Catch as catch can. Get by HOOK OR CROOK all you can; a phrase from the child's game of this name, or from the method of wrestling so called, in which the wrestlers are allowed to get a grip anyhow or anywhere.

Catch me at it. Most certainly I shall never do what you say, I will never do that.

Catch weights. A term in racing, wrestling or boxing, meaning without restrictions as to weight.

First catch your hare. This direction is generally attributed to Hannah Glasse, habit-maker to the Prince of Wales, and author of The Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy (1747). Her actual directions are, "Take your hare when it is cased, and make a pudding, . . . etc." To "case" means to take off the skin, as in Shakespeare's All's Well, iii, vi, "We'll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him." "First catch your hare," is a very old phrase and in the 13th century Bracton (Bk. IV, tit. i, ch. xxi, sec. 4) has these words:

Vulgariter, quod primo oportet cervum capere, et postea, cum captus fuerit, illum excoiriare. (It is commonly said that you must first catch your deer, when it is caught, skin it.)

To be caught bending. To be caught at a disadvantage. If you catch a small boy bending over it is easy to smack him on that portion of his anatomy provided by nature for the purpose. Some time about 1903 one of George Robey's songs declared:

My word! If I catch you bending!

The expression also occurs, of course, in Knees up, Mother Brown.

To be caught napping. To suffer some disadvantage while off one's guard. Pheasants, hares, and other animals are sometimes surprised "napping".

To be caught out. To be unmasked in a lie or subterfuge, from CRICKET, etc., in which the striker is out when a catch is caught by a fieldsman.

To catch a crab. In rowing when the oarsman fails to strike the blade deeply enough into the water and falls backwards as a result, or too deeply and risks being thrown overboard.

To catch a tartar. To catch a troublesome prisoner; to have dealings with a person who is more than a match for one; to think one is going to manage a person, only to find it is no easy job.

To catch a Yankee. The equivalent of TO CATCH A TARTAR, before Yankee lost its derogatory implication.

To catch on. To make its way; something which becomes popular, such as a song, a phrase, a fashion, etc.

To catch someone with his pants down. An American METAPHOR meaning to take someone at a great disadvantage. Hardly a phrase of drawing-room origin but sufficiently vivid not to require explanation.

To catch the Speaker's eye. See SPEAKER.

To lie upon the catch. To lie in wait; to try to catch one tripping.

You'll catch it. You'll get severely punished. Here "it" stands for the undefined punishment, such as a whipping, a scolding, etc.

Catch penny. A worthless article puffed up to catch the pennies of those who are foolish enough to buy it.

Catchphrase. A phrase which has caught on and is repeated by all and sundry. Virtually the same as CATCHWORD.

Catchpole. A constable; a law officer whose business it was to apprehend criminals. This is nothing to do with a pole or staff, nor with poll, the head, but is the mediæval Latin chassipullus, one who hunts or chases fowls.

Catchword. A popular cry, a word or CATCHPHRASE, particularly adopted as a political slogan. "Three acres and a cow", "your food will cost you more", "CHINESE SLAVERY", "Scholarships not battleships", "the NEW MORALITY", "the AFFLUENT SOCIETY", are examples.

In printing, the first word on a page which is printed at the foot of the preceding page is known as the catchword; the first printer to employ catchwords may be either Balthazar Azoguidus of Bologna (in his Italian and Latin editions of Antoninus' Confessionale, 1472) or Vindelino de Spira of Venice (in his undated editions of Philolephus' Epistolae and Tacitus' Opera printed before 1474).

Printers also use the name for the main words in a dictionary; i.e. those at the head of each article, printed in bold type so as to catch the eye.

In the theatre, the cue (the last word or so of an actor's lines) is called the catchword.

Catechumen (kât e kû' men). One taught by word of mouth (Gr. katechein, to din into the ears). Those about to be baptized in the Early Church were first taught by word of mouth, and then catechized on their religious faith and duties.

Caterans, or Catherans (kât' e rânz). Highland Scottish FREEBOOTERS; the word occurs in Scottish romances and ballads.

Cater-cousin. An intimate friend, a remote kinsman. The word probably refers to persons being catered for together, "friends so familiar that they eat together".

Alternatively it may derive from cater or quater (Fr. quatre, four) meaning a fourth cousin or remote relation; or from the dialect word cater meaning "diagonally", hence an indirect relation.

His master and he, saving your worship's reverence, are scarce cater-cousins.

SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, II, ii.

Caterpillar Club. An unofficial club started by the Irvin Parachute Company during World War II and still in being; the caterpillar being that of the silkworm which supplied the material from which parachutes were formerly made. The Company presented a small gold caterpillar pin to any R.A.F. airman who had baled out in action, on his supplying the number of the parachute which had saved his life. Similarly the Goldfish Club existed for those who had been forced to use their rubber dinghies. Since then, similar clubs have been formed to encourage the wearing of protective clothing by industrial workers.

Catgut. Cords of various thicknesses, made from the intestines of animals (usually sheep, but never cats) and used for the strings of musical instruments and racquets for ball-games. Why it is called catgut has never been satisfactorily explained, but it may be a corruption of kii-gut, kii being an old word for a small fiddle.

Hersey: Do you not hear her guts already squeak like kit-strings?

Slicer: They must come to that within This two or three years: by that time she'll be True perfect cat.

CARTWRIGHT: The Ordinary (1634), I, ii.

Here's a tune indeed! pish,
I had rather hear one ballad sung i' the nose now
Than all these simpering tunes played upon cat'sguts

And sung by little kitling.

T. MIDDLETON: Women Beware Women (1657), III, ii.

SHAKESPEARE, however, gives catgut its true origin:

Now divine air! Now is his soul ravished! Is it not strange that Sheep's guts should hale souls out of men's bodies? Well, a horn for my money when all's done.—Much Ado, II, iii.

Catgut scraper. A fiddler.

Catharine. See CATHERINE.

Cathay (ká thā'). The name used by Marco Polo for what roughly corresponds to northern China, and the name for that part of China, which the 16th-century navigators sought to discover via a NORTH-EAST or NORTH-WEST PASSAGE. The word comes from Khitai, a Manchurian Tartar kingdom of the 10th century. It was also used less specifically for China in general. See MANGI.

Paulus Venetus, who dwelt many yeres in Cataia, affirmed that he sayled 1500 miles upon the coastes of Mangia, and Anian, towards the Northeast: always finding the open seas before him . . .

SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT: Discourse to prove a passage by the Northwest to Cataya, etc. (printed 1576).

An English Cathay Company was founded by Michael Lok in 1577 to develop Frobisher's discoveries. In more modern times the name remained as a poetic usage.

Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.
TENNYSON: Locksley Hall.

Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. The ancient cathedrals that existed in England before Henry VIII founded and endowed new cathedrals out of some of the revenues from the Dissolution of the Monasteries. These latter are known as Cathedrals of the New Foundation; they are Chester, Gloucester, Peterborough, Bristol and Oxford.

Catherine, St. Virgin and martyr of noble birth in Alexandria. She adroitly defended the Christian faith at a public disputation with certain heathen philosophers at the command of the Emperor Maximinus, for which she was put on a wheel like that of a chaff-cutter. Legend says that as soon as the wheel turned, her bonds were miraculously broken; so she was beheaded. Hence the name CATHERINE WHEEL. She is the patron saint of wheelwrights.

Catherine wheel. A kind of firework, in the form of a wheel, which is driven round by the recoil from the explosion of the various squibs of which it is composed.

Catherine-wheel window. A wheel-window, sometimes called a rose-window, with radiating divisions.

The Order of St. Catherine. (1) An extinct military order established in 1063 to guard the remains of ST. CATHERINE and to protect pilgrims. It followed the rule of St. Basil.

(2) A Russian order founded by Peter the Great, confined to female members, and so named as a compliment to his second wife, who succeeded him as Catherine I in 1725.

To braid St. Catherine's tresses. To live a virgin.

Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catherine's tresses.—LONGFELLOW: Evangeline.

Catherine Théot (tā' ð). A French prophetess like the English Joanna Southcott, calling herself "The Mother of God" and changing her name to Theos (God). In the height of the Revolution she preached the worship of the Supreme Being and announced that Robespierre was the forerunner of The Word. She called him her well-beloved son and chief prophet. She died in prison in 1794.

This Théot mystery they affect to regard as a Plot; but have evidently introduced a vein of satire, of irreverent banter, not against the Spinster alone but obliquely against her Regenerative Man! CARLYLE: The French Revolution, Pt. III, Bk. VI, ch. vi.

Catholic. The word (Gr. katholikos) means general, universal, comprehensive. It is used in this sense in the following extract:

Creed and test
Vanish before the unreserved embrace
Of Catholic humanity.

WORDSWORTH: Ecclesiastical Sonnets, III, xxxvi.

Hence from the Church viewpoint it distinguishes (1) the whole body of Christians as apart from "Jews, heretics and infidels", (2) a member of a church which claims the APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION and direct descent from the earliest body of Christians; (3) the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, i.e. the Western or Latin branch of the ancient Catholic or universal Church.

Alphonso I, King of the Asturias, 739-757, was surnamed the Catholic on account of his zeal in erecting and endowing monasteries and churches. See CATHOLIC KING.

A man of Catholic tastes is one who is interested in a wide variety of subjects.

Catholic Church. The whole body of Christians as distinct from the Churches and sects into which they are divided. The Latin Church called itself Catholic after the separation from the Eastern or Orthodox Church. At the REFORMATION the Reformers called the Western Church under papal jurisdiction the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH as opposed to their own Reformed or PROTESTANT Churches. Members of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND hold themselves to be Catholics but in popular usage Catholic usually means Roman Catholic.

I believe in the Holy Ghost; The holy Catholic Church; etc.

Book of Common Prayer: Apostles' Creed.

Catholic and Apostolic Church. The name given to the followers of Edward Irving (1792-1824), and to the Church founded in 1835, after his death (also called IRVINGITES). He was a former member of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND from which he was expelled for heresy in 1833.

Catholic Association (1823-1829). Founded in Ireland by Daniel O'Connell and supported by the Roman Catholic clergy to promote the political emancipation of Roman Catholics. It became a powerful organization, aided by the monthly subscriptions of the peasantry called "Catholic Rent", and achieved its objective with the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act in 1829.

Catholic Epistles. Those Epistles in the New Testament not addressed to any particular church or individual; the epistles of James, Peter, and Jude and the first of John; II John is addressed to a "lady", and III John to Gaius, but they are often included.

Catholic King, or His Most Catholic Majesty. A title given by Pope Innocent VIII to Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile, and confirmed by Pope Alexander VI on account of their conquest and subsequent expulsion of the MOORS in 1492. Those who remained and became nominal Christians were called Moriscos. The title was thereafter used as an appellation of the kings of Spain. Cp. RELIGIOUS.

Catholic League. (1) The party headed by the Guise faction in France (1584) in alliance with Philip II of Spain. Their object was to prevent the succession of Henry of Navarre to the French crown and place the Cardinal of BOURBON on the throne on the death of Henry III. (2) A Catholic confederacy formed in Germany in 1609 to counterbalance the Protestant Union of 1608. These rival groupings resulted in the THIRTY YEARS WAR (1618-1648).

Catholic Roll. A document which Roman Catholics were obliged to sign on taking their seats as Members of PARLIAMENT. It was abolished when a single oath was prescribed to all members by an Act of 1866.

Old Catholics. Those Roman Catholics who objected to the decree of Papal infallibility in 1870 which they held to be new dogma. In Germany the opposition was particularly marked and it received State support in the KULTURKAMPF with ROME. The Old Catholics within a few years became another PROTESTANT Church and similar schisms arose in Austria, Switzerland, the United States and elsewhere.

Catholicon (ká thol' i kón). A PANACEA, a universal remedy, from the Greek word meaning universal, all-embracing.

Also the name of a comprehensive work of the encyclopaedic dictionary type. A famous edition of the 13th century Catholicon (the first so called) of Johannes Balbus of Genoa was printed by Gutenberg at Mainz in 1460. An English-Latin dictionary compiled about 1483, called Catholicon Anglicanum was published by the Early English Text Society in 1881, and a Breton-Latin-French dictionary called the Catholicon was printed in 1499.

Catholicos (ká thol' i kós). The head of the Assyrian NESTORIANS. Since called the Patriarch of Armenia.

Catiline's Conspiracy (kát' i lín). Lucius Sergius Catilina conspired with a number of dissolute young nobles (64 B.C.) to plunder the Roman treasury, destroy the senate, and fire the city as part of a political revolution. CICERO, who was consul, got full information of the plot and delivered his first Oration against Catiline 8 November 63 B.C., whereupon Catiline quitted ROME. Next day Cicero delivered his second Oration, and several of the conspirators were arrested. His third Oration respecting the punishment to be accorded was made on 4 December and, after his fourth Oration the following day, sentence of death was passed. Catiline was slain with his supporters at Pistoria in Etruria (62 B.C.).

Cato (kă' tō). He is a Cato. A man of simple life, self-denying habits, strict justice, brusque manners, blunt of speech, like the Roman Censor Marcus Porcius Cato (234-149 B.C.).

Cato Street Conspiracy. A plot by Arthur Thistlewood (1770-1820) and his associates to murder the CABINET while the members were dining with the Earl of Harrowby in Grosvenor Square (23 February 1820). Hand grenades were to be used. The conspirators met in a loft in Cato Street, a small mews near the Edgware Road, where some were arrested. Thistlewood and others escaped, but he was caught the following morning. Five, including Thistlewood, were hanged and decapitated and five others were transported for life.

Caucasian (kaw kă' shān). The white or European race is so called. The term originated with Blumenfeld (1752-1840) who, in 1775, selected a Georgian skull as the perfect type of Indo-European. His views are no longer held, but the word has been used with certain qualifications by later anthropologists.

Caucus (kaw' kūs). An American word, first recorded as having been used in Boston about 1750 and popularized in England by Joseph Chamberlain about 1878 in Birmingham. In America it means a meeting of some division, large or small, of a political or legislative body for the purpose of agreeing upon a united course of action in the main assembly. In England it is applied opprobriously to an inner group which seeks to manipulate affairs behind the backs of its party. The origin of the word is unknown, but it may be connected with the Algonquin word cau-cau-as-u, one who advises.

In all these places is a severall commander, which they call Werowance, except the Chick-hamansians, who are governed by their priests and their Assistants, or their Elders, called cau-cawmassoughes.

Capt. JOHN SMITH:
Travels in Virginia, 6th voyage (1606).

Caudillo (kaw dil' yō). The title adopted by General Franco, head of the FALANGIST government in Spain, in imitation of Mussolini's DUCE and Hitler's FÜHRER. Like them it means "Leader".

Caudine Forks. A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the Valley of Arpaia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls T.

Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius, fell into the hands of the Samnites (321 B.C.), and were made to pass "under the YOKE".

Caudle. Any sloppy mess, especially that sweet mixture of gruel and wine or spirits once given by nurses to recently confined women and their "gossips" who called to see the baby during the first month. The word means "something warm" (Lat. calidus).

Caudle lecture. A curtain lecture. The term is derived from a series of papers by Douglas Jerrold, Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures, which were published in Punch (1846). These papers represent Job Caudle as a patient sufferer of the lectures of his nagging wife after they had gone to bed and the curtains were drawn.

Caught bending, napping, etc. See under CATCH.

Caul. The word was formerly used for a net in which women enclosed their hair, now called a SNOOD.

Her head with ringlets of her hair is crowned,
And in a golden caul the curls are bound.
DRYDEN: Aeneid, VII.

It was also used to describe any membrane enclosing the viscera, e.g. "The caul that is above the liver", Exod. xxix, 13.

The membrane on the head of some new-born infants is the caul and is held to be a charm, especially against death by drowning. They were once advertised for sale and frequently sought after by mariners. To be born with a caul was with the Romans tantamount to being BORN WITH A SILVER SPOON IN ONE'S MOUTH.

You were born with a caul on your head.
BEN JONSON: Alchemist I, i.

Cauld-lad, The, of Hilton Hall. A house-spirit who moved about the furniture during the night. Being resolved to banish him, the inmates left for him a green cloak and hood, before the kitchen fire, which so delighted him that he never troubled the house any more; but sometimes he might be heard singing:

Here's a cloak, and here's a hood,
The cauld-lad of Hilton will do no more good.

Cauliflower ear. An ear permanently thickened and deformed by boxing injuries.

Caurus (kaw' rūs). The Latin name for the west-north-west wind, anglicized below as Chorus:

... the sonne is hid whan the sterres ben clusted
by a swifte winde highte Chorus.

CHAUCER: Boethius, Bk. I, Mett. iii.

The ground by piercing Caurus seared.
THOMSON: Castle of Indolence, ii, 78.

Causa causans (kaw' zá kaw' zánz). The initiating cause, the primary cause.

Causa causata. The cause which owes its existence to the CAUSA CAUSANS; the secondary cause.

Causa vera. (a) The immediate predecessor of an effect; (b) a cause verifiable by independent evidence (Mill).

In theology, God is the causa causans, and creation the causa causata. The presence of the sun above the horizon is the causa vera of daylight, and its withdrawal below the horizon is the causa vera of night.

Cause. Aristotelian causes.

(1) The Efficient Cause. That which immediately produces the effect.

(2) The Material Cause. The matter on which (1) works.

(3) The Formal Cause. The Essence or "Form" (or group of attributes) introduced into the matter by the efficient cause.

(4) The Final, or Ultimate Cause. The purpose or end for which the thing exists or the causal change takes place. But God is called the Ultimate Final Cause, since, according to ARISTOTLE, all things tend, so far as they can, to realize some Divine attribute.

God is also called the First Cause, or the Cause Causeless, beyond which even imagination cannot go.

Cause, The. A mission; the object or project.

The Cause, or the Good Old Cause in the 17th century is the PURITAN cause, and was commonly used by the supporters of the Puritan Revolution in Cromwellian times and afterwards.

The army, resolute as it still remained for the maintenance of "the cause", was deceived by Monk's declarations of loyalty to it . . .

J. R. GREEN:

A Short History of the English People, ch. viii, sec. x.

To make common cause. To work for the same object. Here "cause" is the legal term meaning the cause or side of the question advocated.

Cause célèbre (Fr.). Any famous law case or trial, such as the TICHBORNE CASE or the case of Jean CALAS.

Caution. So-and-so's a caution, meaning that he is odd in his ways, likely to do something unexpected, often with a quaint twist to it. The phrase is originally American and had a somewhat wider application:

The way the icy blast would come down the bleak shore was a caution.

C. F. HOFFMAN: Winter West (1835).

His wife was what the Yankées call a Caution.

MORTIMER COLLINS: Vivien (1870).

Caution money. A sum deposited with college authorities, at an INN OF COURT, etc., as a safeguard against misbehaviour. Some colleges retain a portion of the sum at the end of a student's course as a "gift" to augment their revenues.

Cavalier. A horseman; whence a knight, a gentleman (Span. caballero, b and v being pronounced alike in that language).

Personages styled The Cavalier.

Charles de Beaumont d'Eon (1728-1810), French diplomat and secret agent; Chevalier d'Eliz. He stayed at the court of the Tsarina Elizabeth dressed as a woman.

Charles Breydel (1677-1744), Flemish landscape painter.

Francesco Cairo (Cavaliere del Cairo) (1598-1674), Italian historical and portrait painter.

Jean le Clerc, le chevalier (1587-1633), French painter.

Giovanni Battista Marini (1569-1625), Italian poet; Il Cavaliere.

Andrew Michael Ramsay (1686-1734), Scottish-French writer.

Cavaller, or Chevalier of St. George. James Francis Edward Stuart, called the PRETENDER, or the Old Pretender (1688-1766). See WARMING-PAN.

The Young Cavalier, or the Bonnie Chevalier. Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender (1720-1788). See PRETENDER.

The Laughing Cavalier. The name given to the famous portrait of an unknown gallant, by the Dutch painter Frans Hals, now in the Wallace Collection, London.

Cavalier Parliament (1661-1679). The first PARLIAMENT of Charles II after the RESTORATION and thus named from its Royalist majority. It was also called the PENSIONARY PARLIAMENT or LONG PARLIAMENT of Charles II.

Cavaliers. The Royalists or adherents of Charles I at the time of the CIVIL WARS. Their opponents were called ROUNDHEADS.

Cavaliere servente (käv a lyér' i sér ven' te) (Ital.). A cavalier in attendance; especially a man who devotes himself to running about after a married woman; much the same as a CICUISBEO.

Cave of Adullam. See ADULLAMITES.

Caveat (käv' vē ät) (Lat. let him beware). A notice directing the recipient to refrain from some act pending the decision of the court. Hence, to enter a caveat, to give legal notice that the opponent is not to proceed with the suit in hand until the party giving notice has been heard; to give a warning or admonition.

Caveat emptor (Lat. let the purchaser beware). The buyer must keep his eyes open, for the bargain he agrees to is binding. The full legal maxim is: Caveat emptor, quia ignorare non debuit quod ius alienum emit. (Let a purchaser beware, for he ought not to be ignorant of the nature of the property which he is buying from another party.)

Caviare (käv' i år). Sturgeon's roe, pickled, salted and used as a savoury or HORS D'ŒUVRE, etc. Caviare is usually only appreciated by those who have acquired a taste for it, hence Shakespeare's caviare to the general (Hamlet II, ii), above the taste or comprehension of ordinary people.

He (Cobbett) must, I think, be caviare to the Whigs.—HAZLITT: Table-talk.

Cavo-rilievo (ka' vō ril yā' vō). "Relief", cut below the original surface, the highest parts of the figure being on a level with the surface.

Caxon. A worn-out WIG; also a big cauliflower wig, worn out or not. It has been suggested that the word is from the personal name Caxon.

People scarce could decide on its phiz,
Which looked wisest—the caxon or jowl.
PETER PINDAR: The Portfolio.

Caxton, William. Father of English printing, hence his name is widely applied to branded articles in the printing and paper trades. Born in the Weald of Kent, he learnt his printing in Cologne and Bruges. He set up shop at the sign of the Red Pale in the shadow of Westminster Abbey about 1476 and died in 1491, by which time he had printed about a hundred books. He was printer, publisher, retailer and translator.

Cayuse. An Indian pony. The Cayuses were a RED INDIAN tribe. Since about 1880 the word has meant "a horse of little value".

Cean (sē' an). The Cean poet. Simonides of Ceos, c. 556-468 B.C.

The Cean and the Teian muse.
BYRON: Don Juan (Song: The Isles of Greece.)

Cecilia, St. (se sil' i à). Patron saint of the blind and patroness of music and especially of Church music. Born in Rome, she is usually supposed to have been martyred in A.D. 230, but A.D. 176 is a more probable date. She was blind, and according to tradition, was inventor of the organ. An ANGEL fell in love with her for her musical skill; her husband saw the heavenly visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom which he brought from PARADISE. Her day is 22 November, on which the Worshipful Company of Musicians, a LIVERY COMPANY of LONDON, meet and go in procession for divine service in St. Paul's Cathedral. Both Dryden and Pope wrote odes in her honour.

At length divine Cecilia came,
Inventress of the vocal frame.
DRYDEN: Alexander's Feast.

Cecil's Fast. A dinner off fish. William Cecil, Lord Burghley, for nearly forty years chief minister to Queen Elizabeth I, introduced a law to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days in order to promote the fishing industry.

Ceelict, St. An English name of St. Calixtus, who is commemorated on 14 October, the day of the Battle of Hastings. Browne Willis tells us there was once a tablet in Battle parish church with these words:

This place of war is Battle called, because in battle
here
Quite conquered and o'erthrown the English nation were.
This slaughter happened to them upon St.
Ceelict's day.

Ceiling. The term is figuratively applied to the maximum height to which an aeroplane can rise, the highest price that can be reached for any article, etc. In aeronautical circles it denotes the height of the cloud base above ground level.

Ceiling zero means that the clouds or mist are down to ground level.

Celestial City. Heaven is so called by John Bunyan in his Pilgrim's Progress.

Celestial Empire. China; a translation of the Chinese Tien Chao, literally "heavenly dynasty", alluding to the belief that the old Emperors were in direct descent from the gods. Hence the Chinese are sometimes called Celestials.

Celestines. An order of reformed BENE-DICTINES founded about 1260 by Pietro di Murrone, who became Pope Celestine V in 1294.

Celt (selt, kelt). A piece of stone, ground artificially into a wedge-like shape with a cutting edge, used for axes, chisels, etc. The term is also loosely applied to metal axe-heads, especially of bronze.

Celtic (sel'tik, kel' tik). Applied to the peoples and languages of that branch of the Aryan family which includes the Irish, Manx, Welsh, Cornish, Breton, and Scottish Gaels. Anciently the term was applied by the Greeks and Romans to the peoples of western Europe generally, but when CÆSAR wrote of the Celtæ he referred to the people of middle GAUL only. The word Celt probably means a warrior; fable accounts for it by the story of Celtina, daughter of Britannus, who had a son by HERCULES, named Celtus, who became the progenitor of the Celts. Celtic Fringe. Those parts of Great Britain and Ireland whose population is predominantly of Celtic stock, namely WALES, CORNWALL, SCOTLAND and IRELAND.

Cemetery properly means a sleeping-place (Gr. koimeterion, a dormitory). The Persians call their cemeteries "the Cities of the Silent".

Cenci. See BEAUTIFUL PARRICIDE.

Cenomanni (sen ð ma' ni). The name given to the inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge by CÆSAR in his Commentaries.

Cenotaph (sen' o táf) (Gr. kenos, empty; taphos, tomb). A sepulchral monument raised to the memory of a person or persons buried elsewhere. By far the most noteworthy to all of British race is that in Whitehall, designed by Sir E. Lutyens, which was dedicated on 11 November 1920, to those who fell in World War I. It has since been adapted to commemorate the fallen of World War II.

Among the most noted cenotaphs of the ancients are those of:

ÆNEAS to Deiphobus (Æneid, I, 6; v, 505);

ANDROMACHE to Hector (Æneid, I, 3; v, 302);

ARISTOTLE to Hermias and Eubulus (Diogenes Laertius);

The Athenians to the poet Euripides; Callimachus to Sopolis, son of Dioclesides (Epigram of Callimachus, 22);

Catullus to his brother (Epigram of Catullus, 103);

DIDO to Sichæus (Justin, xviii, 6);

The Romans to Drusus in Germany, and to Alexander Severus, the emperor, in Gaul (Suetonius: Life of Claudius; and the Anthologia);

Statius to his father (The Sylvae of Statius, v, Epicedium 3);

Xenocrates to Lysidices (Anthologia).

Centaur. Mythological beast, half horse and half man. Centaurs are said to have dwelt in ancient Thessaly; a myth the origin of which is probably to be found in the expert horsemanship of the inhabitants. (See IXION.) The Thessalian centaurs were invited to a marriage feast and behaved with great rudeness to the women. The LAPITHÆ took the women's part and drove the centaurs out of the country.

Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles (son noo vel'). This collection of "a hundred new tales" first appeared in the MS. dated 1456. It is on much the same lines as the DE-CAMERON and tells in French some of the stories already made familiar by the Italian novelists. Saintsbury calls it the best of all the late mediæval prose works. Nicolas of Troyes produced his Grand Parangon de Nouvelles Nouvelles in 1535, containing tales of his own and drawing from the GESTA ROMANORUM and Decameron.

Cento (Lat. a patchwork). Poetry made up of lines borrowed from established authors, an art freely practised in the decadent days of Greece and Rome. Ausonius, who has a nuptial idyll composed from verses selected from VIRGIL, made rules for their composition. Well-known examples are the Homero-centones, the Cento Virgilianus by Proba Falconia (4th century), and the hymns made by Metellus out of the Odes of HORACE.

Centre Party. In politics, the party occupying a place between two extremes: the left centre is the more radical wing, and the right centre the more conservative. In the French Revolution the Centre of the Legislative Assembly included the friends of order.

Head Centre. The FENIAN Brotherhood (founded by Irishmen in the United States in 1858) was organized from centres and, at the time of the Fenian raid into Canada and the abortive rising in Ireland (1886), the leader or Head Centre was James Stephens.

The Centre, Dead Centre, Dead Heart, or Red Centre. The arid central areas of Australia where vegetation is sparse and short-lived and only briefly seen after one of the infrequent rainfalls.

Centurion (sentū' ri on) (Lat. centum, a hundred). A Roman officer who had the command of 100 men. There were sixty centurions, of varying ranks, to a legion, the chief being the first centurion of the first maniple of the first cohort; his title was Primus pilus prior or Primpilus. The centurion's emblem of office was a vine-staff.

Century of the Common Man. The twentieth century, the age of democracy. The Century of the Common Man (1940) was the title of a book by Henry A. Wallace, New-Dealer and Vice-President of the United States (1941-1945) under F. D. Roosevelt. The phrase speedily became popular on both sides of the Atlantic and was much favoured by Nancy, Viscountess Astor.

Cephalus and Procris (sef' a lūs, prok' ris). Cephalus was husband of PROCRIS, who deserted him through jealousy. He went in search of her and rested awhile under a tree. Procris crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him and Cephalus, hearing the noise and thinking it was made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew Procris. When he discovered what he had done he slew himself with the same javelin.

Pyramus: Not Shafalus to Procrus was so true.
Thisbe: As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.
SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, V, i.

Cepheus (sē' fūs). A northern constellation; named from Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, husband of CASSIOPEIA and father of ANDROMEDA.

Cepola (sep' ō lá). Devices of Cepola. Quips of law are so called from Bartholomew Cepola whose law-quirks, teaching how to elude the most express law, and to perpetuate lawsuits ad infirmitum, have been frequently reprinted—once in 8vo, in BLACK LETTER, for John Petit of Paris, in 1503.

Cerberus (sēr' bē rus). A grim, watchful keeper, house-porter, guardian, etc. Cerberus according to classical mythology is the three-headed dog that keeps the entrance of the infernal regions. HERCULES dragged the monster to earth and let him go again. (See ACONITE.) ORPHEUS lulled Cerberus to sleep with his lyre and the SIBYL who conducted ÆNEAS through the INFERNO also threw the dog into a profound sleep with a cake seasoned with poppies and honey. (See SOP.)

The origin of the fable of Cerberus may be found in the custom of the ancient Egyptians of guarding graves with dogs.

Cerealia. Festivals in honour of CERES, celebrated by the Romans. First held in April, a second festival was introduced by CICERO in August.

Ceremonious, The. Pedro IV of Aragon (1336-1387) was so named.

Ceremony (Lat. cærimonia). By way of accounting for this word, which is probably connected with the Sans. karman, a religious action, a rite, Livy tells us that when the Romans fled before Brennus, one Albinus, who was carrying his wife and children in a cart to a place of safety, overtook at Janiculum the VESTALS bending under their load. He took them up and conveyed them to Cære in Etruria, where they remained and continued to perform their sacred rites, which were consequently called Cære-monia.

Master of the Ceremonies. A court official, first appointed by James I to superintend the reception of ambassadors and strangers of rank, and to prescribe the formalities to be observed in LEVEES and other public functions. The title is now given to one whose duty it is to superintend at a ball and similar social gatherings; usually now abbreviated to "M.C."

Don't stand on ceremony. Make yourself at home, be natural, don't be formal.

Ceres (sē' rēz). The Roman name of MOTHER EARTH, the protectress of agriculture, and of all the fruits of the earth. She is the Corn Goddess and she had a daughter by JUPITER, called PROSERPINE. She is identified with the Greek DEMETER.

Cess. A tax, contracted from assessment; as, a "church-cess". In Ireland the word is sometimes used as a contraction of success, meaning luck, as, "Bad cess to you!" It is also a common contraction of cesspit or cesspool.

Out of all cess. Beyond all estimation or valuation.

The poor jade is wrung in the withers out of all cess.—SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, II, i.

To have a mind like a cesspool. To have a dirty mind that harbours unclean thoughts. A similar expression is to have a mind like a sewer.

C'est magnifique. C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre. "It is magnificent, but it is not war." The criticism on the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaclava (25 October 1854), made on the field at the time, by the French General Bosquet to A. H. Layard.

Cestui que vie. This and the two following are old Anglo-French legal terms (cestui = he, or him). The person for whose life any lands or hereditaments may be held.

Cestui que use, the person to whose use anyone is infeoffed of lands or tenements.

Cestui que trust, the person for whose benefit a trust has been created.

Cestus (ses' tus). The girdle of VENUS, made by her husband VULCAN; but when she wantoned with MARS it fell off, and was left on the "Acidalian Mount". It was of magical power to move to ardent love. By poetical fiction, all women of irresistible attraction are supposed to be wearers of Aphrodite's girdle, or the cestus.

The word is also used for the Roman boxing-glove composed of leather thongs wound round the hand and wrist, and sometimes loaded with iron.

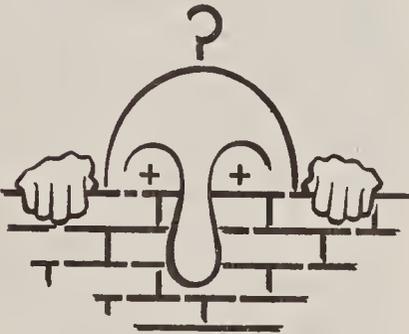

Ceteris paribus (set' ēris pā' ribus) (Lat.). Other things being equal.

Chacun a son goût (shāk' ūn a son goo). "Everyone has his taste" is the correct French phrase. "Everyone to his taste" (à, to, instead of a, has) is English-French. The phrase is more common with us than it is in France, where we meet with the phrases, Chacun a sa chacunerie (everyone has his own idiosyncrasy), and chacun a sa marotte (everyone has his hobby). In Latin sua cuique voluptas, every man has his own pleasures.

Chad, St. (Ceadda). A Northumbrian by birth and a pupil of St. Aidan, he subsequently became BISHOP of MERCA with Lichfield as his SEE. He died in 672 and was the patron SAINT of springs. The New River which was once London's main water supply has its source in Chad's Well Springs between Hertford and Ware. There was also a spa at King's Cross opened early in the reign of George III called St. Chad's Well.

Chadpennies. Lichfield Cathedral is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Chad; the WHITSUNTIDE offerings used to be devoted to the upkeep of the building and were called Chadpennies.

WOT NO CHAR?

Chad. A character whose bald head and large nose were depicted appearing over a wall and inquiring, "Wot, no [word filled in to suit the circumstances]?", as a comment or protest against a shortage or shortcoming. Widely current in the latter part of World War II but of unknown origin. Cp. KILROY.

Chadband. This synonym for a religious hypocrite is taken from a character in Dickens's Bleak House—a gluttonous, unctuous, illiterate rogue, minister of some indeterminate sect.

Chaff. An old bird is not to be caught with chaff. An experienced man, or one with his wits about him, is not to be deluded by humbug. The reference is to throwing chaff instead of birdseed to allure birds. Hence perhaps:

You are chaffing me. Making fun of me. A singular custom used to exist in Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire. When a husband ill-treated his wife, the villagers emptied a sack of chaff at his door, to intimate that "thrashing was done within".

Chain letter. A letter, frequently anonymous, which the recipient is asked to copy and send to one or more friends, requesting that they should do the same, good luck being supposed by the superstitious to follow the faithful fulfilment of the conditions. It is sometimes used by the unscrupulous as a device for obtaining money from the credulous.

Chair, The. The seat of authority, or the office of same. The person in authority or the president of an assembly or meeting whose decisions, like those of the SPEAKER of the HOUSE OF COMMONS, are final in all points of doubt. When debaters call out "Chair", they mean that the Chairman is not being sufficiently heeded and properly supported. Similarly, "Pray support the chair", has the same significance.

A university professorship is also called a chair, as "the chair of poetry at Oxford".

Below the chair. Said of one who has not yet reached the presidential position, as of an alderman who has not yet served the mayoralty.

Passed the chair. One who has held the office.

To take the chair. To be the chairman of a meeting or assembly, committee, etc. Colloquially to be in the chair means to act as host or to be the one paying for the round of drinks.

Chair of St. Peter. The office of the POPE of Rome, founded by St. PETER, the apostle; but St. Peter's Chair means the Catholic festival held in commemoration of the two episcopates founded by the apostle, one at Rome, and the other at Antioch (18 January; 22 February).

Chalk. Chalk it up. Put it on the SLATE, put it to his credit.

Chalk and talk. A common phrase in the scholastic profession to denote teaching essentially relying upon oral instruction and the use of the blackboard, a method not always popular with the professors of pedagogy, but likely to remain the basis of most good teaching.

I beat him by a long chalk. Thoroughly. A reference to the custom of making merit marks with chalk, before lead pencils were so common.

I'll chalk out your path for you, i.e. lay it down or plan it out, as a carpenter or shipwright plans out his work with a piece of chalk.

Challenge

I can walk a chalk as well as you. I am no more drunk than you are. The allusion is to a test given to those suspected of drunkenness which consists of walking steadily along a line chalked on the floor.

I cannot make chalk of one and cheese of the other. I must treat both alike; I must show no favouritism.

I know the difference between chalk and cheese. Between what is worthless and what is valuable, between a counterfeit and a real article.

A popular phrase, no doubt helped by its alliteration.

This Scotch scarecrow was no more to be compared to him than chalk was to cheese.

SCOTT: Woodstock, xxiv.

They are no more alike than chalk and cheese is another common variant.

The tapster is undone by chalk, i.e. credit. The allusion is to the old custom of tavern-keepers scoring on a door or board the amounts owed by customers. This was a common practice early in the 19th century when milk and bread scores were also general.

Walk your chalk. Get you gone. Lodgings wanted for the royal retinue were once taken arbitrarily by the marshal and sergeant-chamberlain and the occupants of houses marked with the chalk were sent to the right-about. The phrase is "Walk, you're chalked", corrupted to Walk your chalk. When Marie de' MEDICI came to England in 1638, Sieur de Labat was employed to mark "all sorts of houses commodious for her retinue in Colchester".

At one time it was customary for a landlord to give the tenant notice to quit by chalking the door.

The prisoner has cut his stick, and walked his chalk, and is off to London.

C. KINGSLEY: Two Years Ago, i.

Challenge. This meant originally an accusation or charge, and secondly a claim, a defiance, etc. It comes through French from the Lat. calumnia, a false accusation, and is etymologically the same word as "calumny".

Challenging a jury. This may be to object to all the jurors from some informality in the way they have been "arrayed" or empanelled, or to one or more of the jurors, from some real or supposed disqualification or bias of judgment. In the first case it is a challenge to the array, and this must be based on some default of the sheriff or his officer.

Cham (kám). The sovereign prince of Tartary, now written Khan.

Fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard.

SHAKESPEARE: Much Ado about Nothing, II, i.

The great Cham of Literature. An epithet applied to Dr. Johnson (1709-1784) by Tobias Smollett.

Chambré (shom' brā). From Fr. chambre, a room. Used of wine which has been warmed to raise it from cellar temperature to the temperature of the room in which it is to be served, which for red wine is ideal.

Chambre Ardente (shombr ar dont') (Fr.). In French history, the name given to certain courts of justice held under the ANCIEN RÉGIME, for trying exceptional cases such as charges of heresy, poisoning, etc. They were usually held at night, and both then and when held in daytime were lighted by torches. These courts were devised by the Cardinal of Lorraine and first used by Francis I in 1535. Louis XIV used a Chambre Ardente in 1679 to investigate suspected poisoners as a result of the scare caused by the trial of the Marquise de BRINVILLIERS. These courts were abolished in 1682.

Chambre Introuvable (shombr an' troo vab lá) (Fr. the chamber not to be found again). The French Chamber of Deputies, which met in 1815 after the second return of Louis XVIII, was so named by the king for its fervent royalist sympathies. It was afterwards used to denote any ultra-royalist assembly.

Chameleon. You are a chameleon, i.e. very changeable, like a VICAR of BRAY, shifting according to the opinions of the others, as the chameleon (to a very limited extent) can change its hue to that of contiguous objects.

As the chameleon, who is known
To have no colours of its own,
But borrows from its neighbours hue,
His white or black, his green or blue.

PRIOR.

Would they ever change their hue
As the light camelions do,
Suiting it to every ray
Twenty times a day?

SHELLEY: An Exhortation.

Champ de Mars (shon dē mars). Clovis and the early Frankish kings held meetings in MARCH when feudal gifts and fees were paid and homage received. It was this ancient custom that was seized upon in the French Revolution when, in the summer of 1790, an enormous amphitheatre was dug by the Paris citizens, and the Federation of Freedom sworn at the altar of the Fatherland.

NAPOLÉON gave the name of Champ de Mai to the assembly he called together on 1 May 1815, when he proclaimed the result of the plebiscite ratifying the liberal Acte additionnel on his return from Elba.

Champak (chám' pāk). An Indian magnolia (Michelia champaca). The wood is sacred to BUDDHA, and the strongly scented golden flowers are worn in the black hair of Indian women.

The Champak odours fail.
SHELLY: Lines to an Indian Air.

Champion of England, or King's Champion. A person whose office it was to ride up Westminster Hall on a Coronation Day, and challenge anyone who disputed the right of succession. The office was established by William the Conqueror and was given to Robert de Marmion and his male descendants with the manor of "broad Scrivelsby". De Ludlow received the office and manor through the female line, and at the coronation of Richard II Sir John Dymoke succeeded, also through the female line. Since then it has continued in the Dymoke family, but the custom of the challenge was last observed at the coronation of George IV. Instead the Champion bears the sovereign's standard at the coronation.

Chamuel. See ARCHANGEL.

Chance. See MAIN CHANCE.

To chance your arm, or your luck. To run a risk in the hope of "bringing it off" and obtaining a profit or advantage of some sort.

Chancel means a lattice screen. In the Roman law courts the lawyers were cut off from the public by such a screen (Lat. cancellus).

Chancel of a church. That part of the church (usually at the eastern end) containing the altar and choir, which is often separated from the nave by a screen of wood or iron lattice-work and often with a raised floor level.

Chancellery. "The chancelleries of Europe" is a favourite journalistic phrase and is the equivalent of saying the Foreign Offices or ministries of the European powers. See CHANCERY.

Chancellor. Originally an official (cancellarius) in the Roman law courts stationed at the CHANCEL as usher of the court and in the Eastern Empire a secretary or notary, subsequently invested with judicial functions. The name has been used in most European countries for an officer of state with varying powers and functions. In England, the office of Chancellor was introduced by Edward the Confessor and under the Normans the Chancellor became the chief secretary in charge of all important legal documents, head of CHANCERY, and keeper of the GREAT SEAL. In France, the Chancellor was the royal notary, president of the councils, and keeper of the Great Seal. Bismarck was made Chancellor of the newly created German Empire in 1871.

There are also diocesan chancellors who preside over the bishop's court, chancellors of cathedrals, academic chancellors who are usually the titular heads of universities, etc.

Chancellor, Dancing. See DANCING.

The Lord Chancellor, or the Lord High Chancellor. The highest judicial functionary of Great Britain, who ranks above all peers, except princes of the BLOOD and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He is keeper of the GREAT SEAL, is called "Keeper of His (or Her) Majesty's Conscience", and presides on the WOOLSACK in the House of Lords and in the CHANCERY Division of the Supreme Court of Judicature or High Court of Justice.

Chancellor of the Exchequer. The minister of finance in the British CABINET; the highest financial official of state in the kingdom.

Chancery. One of the three divisions of the High Court of Justice. It is mainly concerned with Equity and is presided over by the LORD CHANCELLOR. Not all its work is done in London; there is also a Chancery Court in Manchester, such jurisdiction having existed in the COUNTY PALATINE of Lancashire since the end of the 15th century. The word is shortened from Chancellery.

A Ward of Chancery is the term applied to a minor whose guardianship is vested in the Court of CHANCERY for various legal reasons. It is contempt of court to marry a ward of Chancery without the court's consent.

To get a man's head into Chancery is to get it under your arm, where you can pummel it as long as you like, and he cannot get it free without great difficulty. The allusion is to the long and exhausting suits for which the Court of Chancery was once notorious.

Never can there come a fog too thick, never can there come mud and mire too deep, to assort with the groping and floundering condition which this High Court of Chancery, most pestilent of hoary sinners, holds, this day, in the sight of heaven and earth.—DICKENS: Bleak House, ch. i.

If a man once got his head there, the lawyers could punish him to their heart's content.

Change

When I can perform my mile in eight minutes or a little less, then I feel as if I had old Time's head in chancery.

HOLMES: Aocrat of the Breakfast Table, ch. vii.

Change. Ringing the changes. Repeating the same thing in differing ways. The allusion is to bell-ringing. For the sharper's meaning of the term, see RINGING.

To know how many changes can be rung on a peal, multiply the number of bells in the peal by the number of changes that can be rung on a peal consisting of one bell less, thus: 1 bell, no change; 2 bells, 1 by 2 = 2 changes; 3 bells, 2 by 3 = 6 changes; 4 bells, 6 by 4 = 24 changes; 5 bells, 24 by 5 = 120 changes; 6 bells, 120 by 6 = 720 changes, etc.

Changeling. A peevish, sickly child. The notion used to be that the fairies took a healthy child, and left in its place one of their starveling elves which never thrived.

Chansons de Geste (shon son də zhest) (Fr.). Narrative poems dealing with the heroic families of French history and legend, and composed at various times between the 11th and 15th centuries. The famous Chanson de Roland is generally regarded as the finest. (See under ROLAND.) Gestes (Lat. gesta) is used to mean the deeds of a hero and the account of his deeds.

Chant du départ (shon dū də par). After the MARSEILLAISE, this was the most celebrated song of the French Revolution. It was written by M. J. Chénier for a public festival in 1794 to commemorate the taking of the BASTILLE. The music is by Méhul. A mother, an old man, a child, a wife, a girl, and three warriors sing a verse in turn, and the sentiment of each is, "We give up our claims on the men of France for the good of the Republic." Cp. CARMAGNOLE.

La république nous appelle,
Sachons vaincre ou sachons périr;
Un Français doit vivre pour elle,
Pour elle un Français doit mourir.

Chantage. Blackmail; money accepted by low-class journals to prevent the publication of scandals, etc. Chantage is the common name in France for this form of subsidy; and the word has been used in the same way in England.

Chanticleer. The cock, in the tale of REYNARD THE FOX, and in Chaucer's Nonnes Prestes Tale; also in Rostand's play Chanticleer, produced in Paris in 1910 (Fr. Chanter clair, to sing clearly).

Chantrey Bequest. When Sir Francis Legatt Chantrey (1781-1841), the sculptor, died, he left a sum yielding £3,000 a year to the Royal Academy, of which the President was to receive £300, the secretary £50, and the remainder to be devoted to the purchase for the nation of works of art executed in Great Britain.

Chantry. A religious and often charitable endowment usually connected with a chapel (often part of the parish church) and mainly to provide for the chanting of masses for the founder. Their spoliation was begun by Henry VIII in 1545 and completed under Edward VI in 1547. Little of the proceeds was used for charitable or educational purposes.

Chaonian Bird (kā ō' ni án). This is the poetic name for a DOVE, and takes its origin from the legend that the dove bore the oracles of Chaonia.

Chaonian food. Acorns. So called from the acorns of Chaonia or DODONA. Some think beech-mast is meant, and tell us that the bells of the ORACLE were hung on beech-trees, not on oaks.

Chap. A man, properly a merchant. A chap-man (O.E. ceap-mann) is a merchant or tradesman. "If you want to buy, I'm your chap." A good chap-man or chap became in time a good fellow. Hence, a good sort of chap, a clever chap, etc.

An awkward customer is an analogous phrase.

Chap-book. A cheap little book containing tales, ballads, lives, etc., sold by chapmen.

Chaps are wide leather overall trousers worn by American COWBOYS to protect their legs from injury, colloquially abbreviated from the Sp. chaparejos, leather breeches.

Chapeau bras (shăp ō bra) (Fr.). A soft three-cornered flat silk hat which could be folded and carried under the arm (Fr. chapeau, hat; bras, arm). It was worn in France with the court dress of the 18th century.

Chapel. Originally a chest containing relics or the shrine thereof, so called from the capella (little cloak or cope) of St. MARTIN, which was preserved by the Frankish kings as a sacred relic. The place in which it was kept when not in the field was called the chapelle, and the keeper thereof the chapelain. Hence the name came to be attached to a sanctuary, or a private place of worship other than a parish or cathedral church; and is also used for a place of worship belonging to the Free Churches, as a METHODIST Chapel, Baptist Chapel, etc., or a separately dedicated oratory within a church.

Among printers a chapel is an association of journeymen (compositors, machine-men, etc.), who meet periodically to discuss matters of common interest and take decisions affecting their conditions of employment, etc. The chairman is called the "father of the chapel". This use of the word possibly derives from the earliest days of English printing when presses were set up in chapels attached to abbeys. See CAXTON; FRIAR; MONK.

Chapel of ease. A place of worship for the use of parishioners residing at a distance from the parish church.

Lady chapel. A chapel dedicated to the Virgin within a larger church.

The Old Chapel. An unusual public house at the corner of Duke Street, Devonport, which still has some of its original features. It was opened as a Unitarian church in what was then Plymouth Dock, in 1791. This was the time of the French Revolution and UNITARIANS were suspect, as is evidenced by the burning down of Joseph Priestley's Unitarian church in Birmingham. Commissioner Fanshawe, Controller of the Dockyard, suspecting the Unitarians (many of whom were government employees), of revolutionary intrigues, closed their chapel and it was converted to a tavern in 1801.

Chapelle Ardente (shā pel' ar dont') (Fr.). The chapel or resting-place of kings or exalted personages when lying in state, so called from the many candles which were lit round the catafalque, a custom at least dating from the funeral rites of DAGOBERT, king of the FRANKS in 638. The term is now also applied to other mortuary chapels.

Chaperon (shāp' e rōn). A married or mature woman who escorted a young unmarried girl in public places and acted as adviser and protector. So called from the Spanish hood worn by the duennas in former days. Also the hood or cap worn by Knights of the GARTER.

Chapter. From Lat. caput, a head. The chapter of a cathedral, composed of the canons (see CANON) and presided over by the DEAN or provost is so called from the ancient practice of the canons and monks reading at their meetings a capitulum (cp. CAPITULARY) or chapter of their Rule or of Scripture. Ire ad capitulum meant to go to the meeting for the reading of the chapter, hence to the meeting, hence to the body which made up the meeting.

Chapter of accidents. A series of unforeseen events. To trust to a chapter of accidents is to rely on something unforeseen turning up in your favour.

Chapter of possibilities. A maybe in the course of events.

To give chapter and verse. To give the exact authority for a statement, as the name of the author, the title of the book, the date, the chapter, etc., which may make verification readily possible.

To the end of the chapter. To the end of a proceeding. The allusion is obvious.

Char. This is a common abbreviation for "charwoman", or woman who chars or chares, i.e. works by the hour or day at house-cleaning. The word comes from O.E. cerr, cerran, meaning to turn. It has come back to England from the U.S.A. in the form of "chores", a monotonous but necessary task.

The slang word "char" meaning tea appears to derive from the army in India from the Hind. cha, meaning tea.

Character. An oddity. One who has a distinctive peculiarity of manner. Sam Weller is a character, so is Pickwick.

In character. In harmony with personality and habitual behaviour.

Out of character. Not in harmony with a person's usual actions, writing, profession, age, status, etc.

Chare Thursday. Another form of Shear or Shere Thursday; the same as MAUNDY THURSDAY.

Charge, To. To make an attack or onset.

To be on charge. To be up before a magistrate.

To be on one's charge. To be responsible for the care or custody of something and answerable for it as members of the services are for government property.

To be put on a charge. In the Armed Forces to be entered up as a defaulter and brought before the appropriate officer for a hearing. If the charge is held proven, punishment is then awarded in accordance with Service regulations.

To charge a person. To accuse him formally of a crime or misdemeanour. It must be answered before the appropriate court or authority.

To charge like a bull at a gate. To go at something BALDHEADED, head first; to tackle something in a precipitate manner without due forethought.

To charge oneself with. To take upon oneself the onus of a given task.

To give charge over. To set in authority over.

I gave my brother Hanani ... charge over Jerusalem.—Neh. vii, 2.

To give in charge. To hand over a person to the charge of a policeman.

To have in charge. To have the care of something.

To return to the charge. To renew the attack.

To take in charge. To "take up" a person given in charge; to make an arrest; to take upon oneself the responsibility for something.

Charge-sheet. The form setting out in correct language and according to law the specific charges which an accused person has to answer.

Chargé d'Affaires. The proxy of an ambassador who is in charge during the ambassador's absence on leave, etc. A Chargé d'Affaires is sometimes maintained long after an ambassador's departure as a snub to the foreign government concerned.

Charing Cross. The original Charing Cross was erected in the centre of the ancient village of Charing, which stood midway between the cities of LONDON and WESTMINSTER, by Edward I to commemorate his Queen, Eleanor. It was the spot where her coffin was halted for the last time on its way from Harby, Notts, to Westminster.

The cross was sited where the statue of King Charles I now stands on the south side of Trafalgar Square, but it was destroyed by the PURITANS in 1647. The present Gothic cross in the courtyard of Charing Cross Station was designed by E. M. Barry and erected in 1865.

Undone, undone, the lawyers are:
They wander about the town;
Nor can they find the way to Westminster,
Now Charing-cross is down;
At the end of the Strand they make a stand,
Swearing they are at a loss,
And chaffing say, that's not the way
They must go by Charing-cross.

PERCY Reliques: The Downfall of Charing-Cross.

Chariot. According to Greek mythology, the chariot was invented by ERICHTHONIUS to conceal his feet, which were those of a dragon.

Chariot of the gods. So the Greeks called Sierra Leone, in Africa, a ridge of mountains of great height. A sierra means a saw, and is applied to a ridge of peaked mountains.

Her palmy forests, mingling with the skies,
Leona's rugged steep behind us flies.
CAMOËNS: Lusiad, Bk. V.

Chariots, or cars. That of:

Admetus was drawn by lions and wild boars,
BACCHUS by panthers,
CERES by winged dragons,
CYBELE by lions,
DIANA by stags,
JUNO by peacocks,
NEPTUNE by sea-horses,

PLUTO by black horses,
The SUN by seven horses (the seven days of the week),
VENUS by doves.

Charity. Charity begins at home. "Let them learn first to show piety at home" (I Tim. v, 4).

Cold as charity. An ironic allusion to unsympathetic benevolence.

Charivari (shă ri va' ri). A French term for an uproar caused by banging pans and kettles and accompanied by hissing, shouting, etc., to express disapproval. As a verb (charivariser) it means to subject someone to disapproval. Originally a common practice at weddings in mediæval France, it was later only used as a derisive or satirical demonstration at unpopular weddings. The fracas resembled what we would call a CATS' CONCERT. The name Charivari was adopted for a satirical paper in Paris in 1832 and used in the sub-title for Punch which derided the shortcomings of society, the politicians, etc. See SHIVAREE; ROUGH MUSIC.

Charlatan (shar' lâ tân). From the Ital. ciarlare, to prate, to chatter, to babble. One who pretends to knowledge or skill he does not possess; a MOUNTEBANK. It is usually applied to vendors of QUACK remedies who cover their ignorance in a spate of high-sounding and often meaningless words.

Saltimbancoes, Quacksalvers, and Charlatans deceive the people in lower degrees.

SIR T. BROWNE: Pseudodoxia Epidemica, I, iii.

It is difficult to make a choice among the charlatans of history. A striking example in modern times was Sequoa, a white man posing as RED INDIAN, who (about 1890) toured Britain in a coach with attendant Redskins and a brass band, drawing teeth "painlessly" (all squeals drowned by the band) and supplying an "Indian oil" to cure all manner of aches and pains. Cp. PSALMANAZAR.

Charlemagne (sharl' măn) (742-814). Charles the Great became king of the Franks in 771 and first Holy Roman EMPEROR in 800. He ruled over most of western Europe and was noted as a law-giver, administrator, protector of the Church and promoter of education. He was married nine times.

Charlemagne and his Paladins are the centre of a great series of chivalric romances. (See PALADIN.) We are told that he was eight feet tall and of enormous strength and could bend three horse-shoes at once in his hands. He was buried at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aachen), but according to legend he waits, crowned and armed, in Oldenburg, Hesse, for the day when ANTICHRIST shall appear; he will then go forth to battle and rescue Christendom. Another legend says that in years of plenty he crosses the Rhine on a BRIDGE OF GOLD, to bless the cornfields and vineyards.

Charles. Many rulers bearing this name have been afflicted with misfortune:

England:

CHARLES I was beheaded by the Cromwellians (1649).

Charles II lived long in exile. See also CHARLES AND THE OAK.

Charles Edward, the Young PRETENDER, died in poverty in Rome in 1788.

France:

Charles II, the Fat, reigned wretchedly, was deposed in 877 and died in poverty in 888.

Charles III, the Simple, died a prisoner in the castle of Péronne in 929.

Charles IV, the Fair, reigned six years (1322-1328), married thrice, buried all his children except one daughter, who was forbidden by THE SALIC LAW to succeed to the crown.

Charles VI (reigned 1380-1422) went mad in 1392.

Charles VII starved himself to death in 1461, partly through fear of being poisoned and partly because of a painful and incurable abscess in the mouth.

Charles VIII accidentally smashed his head against the lintel of a doorway in the Château d'Amboise, and died in agony (1498), leaving no issue.

Charles IX died at the age of twenty-four (1574), harrowed in conscience for the part he had taken in the Massacre of St. BARTHOLOMEW.

Charles X spent a quarter of a century in exile, and after less than six years on the throne, fled for his life and died in exile (1836).

Charles the Bold, of Burgundy, lost his life at Nancy in 1477, when he was utterly defeated by the Swiss.

Naples:

Charles I (1266-1285) lost Sicily as a result of the SICILIAN VESPERS and experienced only disasters.

Charles II, the lame, was in captivity at the time of his father's death (died 1309).

Charles III, his great-grandson, was killed (1386).

Charles I of England. When Bernin's bust of Charles I was brought home, the king was sitting in the garden of WHITEHALL Palace. He ordered the bust to be uncovered, and at that moment a hawk with a bird in its beak flew by, and a drop of blood fell on the throat of the bust. The bust was ultimately destroyed when the palace was burnt down.

The bronze statue of Charles I in Whitehall was modelled by Le Sueur and cast in 1633 for the Earl of Portland for his home in Roehampton. The earl died before the statue was finished and it was stored in the crypt of St. Paul's, COVENT GARDEN, until it was sold for scrap by PARLIAMENT in 1650. John Revett, the purchaser, did a flourishing trade in knives, forks, etc., "made from the statue" which was in fact hidden away. It was recovered by the Earl of Portland's son at the RESTORATION and erected on the present site, roughly the old position of CHARING CROSS, in 1674. Wreaths are still laid on the statue, on the anniversary of the king's execution, by the JACOBITES of today.

Charles and the Oak. When Charles II fled from the Parliamentary army after the battle of Worcester (3 September 1651), he took refuge in Boscobel House; but it was unsafe to remain there, and he hid himself in an oak-tree. Dr. Stukeley says that this tree "stood just by a horse-track passing through the wood, and the king, with Colonel Carlos, climbed into it by means of the hen-roost ladder. The family reached them victuals with a nut-hook" (Itinerarium Curiosum, ii, p. 57, 1724).

Charles's Wain. An old popular name for the seven bright stars of the Great Bear (see under BEAR). The constellation forms the rough outline of a wheelbarrow or rustic wagon and the name is held to be a corruption of "Churl's wain" (peasant's cart). Another version derives it from "CHARLEMAGNE's wain". It is also called the Wagon, the Plough, and the Dipper, and by the Romans the Septentriones (the seven plough-oxen).

Charley Moore. An old navy term for anything honest and respectable, probably originating from a publican's advertisement in Malta, which read "Charley Moore—the Fair thing" (mid-19th century). Hence "that ain't no Charley Moore" means that isn't honest, that is underhand.

Charley Noble. The galley funnel. So called from a Merchant Service Captain who kept his copper galley funnel brightly polished.

Charleys, or Charlies. The old night watch, before the police force was organized in 1829. Possibly from Charles I, under whom London's WATCH system was reorganized in 1640.

Charlie Dunn. To give a Charlie Dunn (Austr.). To expel for cheating. The origin is obscure.

Charleston. A FOX-TROT popular c. 1925-1927, originated as a dance among the American Negroes. Charleston is the name of a cotton-trading seaport in South Carolina, one-third of the population of which is Negro.

Charm. Deriving from the Lat. carmen, a song, a charm is an incantation that is alleged to work magic, although the word is usually applied to some object that averts bad luck or brings good.

Charon's Toll. A coin placed in the mouth or hand of the dead by the ancient Greeks to pay Charon for ferrying the spirit across the River STYX to the ELYSIUM.

Chartism. A working-class movement beginning in 1837 which embodied its agreed demands in the People's Charter of 1838. Its six points included: manhood suffrage, vote by ballot, annual parliaments, payment of M.P.s, equal constituencies and the abolition of the property qualification for M.P.s. It collapsed after the failure of their petition to Parliament in 1848.

Chartreuse. A greenish or yellowish liqueur made of brandy and various aromatic herbs. Made at La Grande Chartreuse by the CARTHUSIANS, but now commercially produced. Originally the money was spent on the maintenance of the Carthusian houses and mostly on charity.

Charybdis (ká rib' dis). A whirlpool on the coast of Sicily. SCYLLA and Charybdis are employed to signify twofold dangers. Thus HORACE says an author trying to avoid Scylla, drifts into Charybdis, i.e. seeking to avoid one fault, he falls into another.

The Homeric account says that Charybdis dwelt under an immense fig-tree on the rock, and that thrice every day he swallowed the waters of the sea and thrice threw them up again; but later writers have it that he stole the oxen of HERCULES, was killed by lightning, and changed into the gulf.

Chase (O.Fr. chasier from Lat. captiare, to chase). A small unenclosed deer forest held mainly by private individuals, and protected only by COMMON LAW. Forests were royal prerogatives and protected by the Forest Laws.

An iron frame used by printers for holding sufficient type for one side of a sheet, which is held tight by quoins, or small wedges of wood or metal, is also called a chase. Here the word is the Fr. chasse (Lat. capsa), a case.

Chasidim (chá s i dim). See HASIDEANS.

Chastity Girdle. A padded, metal appliance in the shape of a belt that a man could fasten around his wife in such a way as to preclude possibility of unfaithfulness during his prolonged absence. It is said to have come into vogue at the time of the CRUSADES when such protracted absence was common. One or two examples exist in museums.

Chasuble (chá z' ū bl) (Fr. from Med. Lat. casabula, a little cottage). The principal vestment worn by the priest in celebrating MASS. It is a roughly rectangular sleeveless garment, with a hole for the head in the middle, thus hanging down both back and front. It is usually richly decorated with embroidery, and mediæval chasubles were finely ornamented with gold wire and gilded silver, this form of work being known throughout Europe as OPUS ANGLICANUM. The City of London was the home of some of the best work of the 12th and 13th centuries. The chasuble is said to represent the seamless coat of Christ.

And ye, lonely ladyes, with youre longe fynghes,
That ye han silke and sendal to sowe, what tyme is,
Chesibles for chapelleynes cherches to honour.
PIERS PLOWMAN.

Château (shā tō). French for castle, mansion, country seat or estate.

The wines of various districts of France are named after the château of the estate from which they are produced.

Château en Espagne. A castle in the air. See CASTLE.

Chatelaine (shāt' e lân). Originally the mistress of a château, a chatelaine now usually signifies a brooch or clasp from which a variety of trinkets hang on short chains. They are the things which the mistress of a castle was likely to use, keys, scissors, knives, etc.

Chatelaine's (shāt' e lánz). This was a famous ORDINARY in COVENT GARDEN, established soon after the RESTORATION and a favourite resort of wits and men of fashion.

Met their servant coming to bring me to Chatelaine's . . . and there with music and good company . . . mighty merry till ten at night.

PEPYS: Diary, 22 Apr. 1668.

Spanish: Come, but where do we dine?
Horner: Even where you will.

Spanish: At Chatelaine's.

WYCHERLEY: The Country Wife.

Chatterbox. A talkative person. SHAKESPEARE speaks of the CLACK-DISH. "His use was to put a ducat in her clack-dish" (Measure for Measure, III, ii), i.e. the beggars' alms-dish which was clattered or rattled to attract attention. We also find chatter-basket in old writers, referring to the child's rattle.

Chatterpie. The magpie, also used figuratively for a chatterbox.

Chautauqua (shá tawk' wá). In the U.S.A. the name given to an assembly for educational purposes with lectures, entertainments, etc., held largely out of doors, modelled on the Chautauqua Assembly. This was started in 1874 at the village and summer resort on Lake Chautauqua, New York State, which developed into the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle in 1878 to promote home reading and study.

Chauvinism (shō' vin izm). Blind and exaggerated patriotism similar to jingoism (see JINGO). Nicolas Chauvin was a soldier of the French Republic and Empire well known by contemporaries for his devoted enthusiasm for NAPOLEON. He was introduced as a type of exaggerated bellicose patriotism into a number of plays (e.g. Scribe's Le Soldat laboureur, Cogniard's La Cocarde tricolore, Bayard and Dumanoir's Les Aides de camp, and Charet's Conscrit Chauvin), and his name was quickly adopted on both sides of the Channel.

Chawbacon. A contemptuous name for an uncouth rustic, whose only meat was bacon.

Che sarà, sarà (kā sa ra', sa ra'). What will be, will be. The motto of the Dukes of Bedford and the Russell family.

Cheap as a Sardinian. A Roman phrase referring to the great crowds of Sardinian prisoners brought to ROME by Tiberius Gracchus, and offered for sale at almost any price.

Cheap-jack. A travelling vendor of small wares who is usually ready to "cheapen" his goods, i.e. take less for them than the price he first named.

Cheapside bargain. A weak pun meaning that the article was bought cheap or under its market value. Cheapside; on the south side of the Cheap (or Chepe), was the principal market-place of old LONDON, so called from O.E. ceaptan, to buy; cypan, to sell; ceap, a price or sale.

Cheater. Originally an Escheator, or officer of the King's EXCHEQUER appointed to receive dues and taxes. The present meaning shows how these officers were wont to fleece the people. Cp. PUBLICANS.

A windcheater. A warm semi-weather-proof garment of the blouse or jacket type. The derivation is obvious.

Check. A sudden stop, hindrance or control. From the game of CHESS in which a threat to the king is called a check. Cp. CHECKMATE.

Checkmate. A term in CHESS meaning to place your adversary's king in such a position that, had it been any other piece, it could not escape capture. Figuratively "to checkmate" means to foil or outwit another. The term is from the Arabic shah mat, the king is dead, and was introduced into Old Spanish and Portuguese as xaque mate.

In check. Under restraint.

To check in. To register on arrival at a hotel, conference, etc.

To check out. To settle one's account at a hotel on leaving, to register one's departure.

To check up on. To examine someone's personal record, etc.

Checks. To hand in one's checks. See HAND.

Cheek. Cheek by jowl. Side by side, close together.

I'll go with thee, cheek by jowl.
SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, III, ii.

It is the same as "cheek by jaw".

So cheek by cheek and jaw by jaw,
We both sucked cider through a straw.
Popular song.

None of your cheek. None of your insolence. A cheeky person is one who is saucy and presumptuous.

To check, or to give cheek. To be insolent, to be saucy.

To have the cheek. To have the face or assurance or presumption. "He hadn't the cheek to ask for more."

Cheese. Tusser in his Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry (1573), says that a cheese to be perfect should be (1) not like Gehazi, i.e. dead white like a leper; (2) not like Lot's wife, all salt; (3) not like Argus, full of eyes; (4) not like Tom Piper, "hoven and puffed" like the cheeks of a piper; (5) not like CRISPIN, leathery; (6) not like LAZARUS, poor; (7) not like Esau, hairy; (8) not like MARY MAGDELENE, full of whey or maudlin; (9) not like the Gentiles, full of maggots or gentils; and (10) not like a bishop, made of burnt milk; this last is a reference to the old phrase, the bishop has put his foot in it. See BISHOP.

A green cheese. An unripe cheese; also a cheese that is eaten fresh (like a cream cheese) and is not kept to mature.

Big Cheese (slang). The boss, or someone in an important position.

Bread and cheese. Food generally, but of a frugal nature. CHARTISM has often been referred to as a "bread and cheese question", meaning it was largely caused by want and hunger, in this case lack of bread and cheese. "Come and take your bread and cheese with me this evening"—that is, come and have a light supper, anything that's going.

Cheese it! Stop it! Stow it! Also (in thieves' slang) clear off, make yourself scarce.

Cheesed off. Services' slang for disgusted, disgruntled.

Hard cheese. Hard lines; rotten luck.

He is quite the cheese, or just the cheese—i.e. quite the thing. Here "cheese" is the Persian and Urdu chiz (cheez), meaning "thing". The phrase is of Anglo-Indian origin; but it has been popularly treated as being connected with Eng. cheese, and thus we get the slang varieties, That's prime Stilton, or double Gloucester—i.e. SLAP UP. Hence:

It is not the cheese. Not the right thing; said of something of rather dubious propriety or morals.

Who ever heard of a young lady being married without something to be married in?

Well, I've heard Nudity is not the cheese on public occasions!

CHAS. READE: Hard Cash, ii, 186.

The moon made of green cheese. See MOON.

'Tis an old rat that won't eat cheese. It must be a wondrously toothless man that is inaccessible to flattery; he must be very old indeed who can abandon his favourite indulgence; only a very cunning rat knows that cheese is a mere bait.

Cheesemongers. See under REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Cheeseparer. A skinflint, one who would pare off the rind of his cheese very thinly so as to waste the minimum. The tale is told of a man who chose his wife out of three sisters by the way they ate their cheese. One pared it—she was mean (he said); one cut it off extravagantly thick—she was wasteful; The third sliced it off in a medium way, and there his choice fell.

Cheese-toaster. A sword; also called a "toasting-fork", etc.

The sight of the blade, which glistened by moonlight in his face, checked in some sort, the ardour of his assailant, who desired he would lay aside his toaster, and take a bout with him at equal arms.—SMOLLETT: Perigrine Pickle, ch. xxiv.

Cheesewring, The Devil's. A mass of eight stones, towering to the height of thirty-two feet, in the Valley of Rocks, Lynmouth, Devon, so called because it looks like a gigantic cheese-press.

Chef d'œuvre (shā der' vr) (Fr. a chief work). A masterpiece.

Chefs. See ARM-SHRINES.

Chellean. (shell' ē ān). An early PALÆOLITHIC core-tool culture named by G. de Mortillet, French anthropologist, from the site at Chelles-sur-Marne where the remains were found.

Chemosh (kē mosh). The national god of the Moabites; very little is known of his cult, but human beings were sacrificed to him in times of crisis.

Next Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's sons,
From Aroer to Nebo and the wild
Of southmost Abarim.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, I, 406-8.

Cheque-book journalism. A phrase introduced in the mid-1960s to describe the misuse of the wealth of the press to obtain copy by purchase, especially of exclusive rights, to the detriment of less wealthy competitors and possible corruption of the public. A particular abuse is the buying of stories from criminals, harlots, and notorious persons generally, thus financially rewarding the evildoer and tending to encourage others in vicious activities with the prospect of gain. Such conduct has been condemned by the Press Council.

Chequers (chek' ērz). A PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGN. The arms of Fitzwarren the head of which house had the privilege of licensing ale-houses in the reign of Edward IV, probably helped to popularize this sign, but it is of much older origin. It has been found on houses in Pompeii and probably referred to some game like draughts being played on the premises. One explanation is that in mediæval times some innkeepers were also money-changers and used an "exchequer board" as a sign of their calling. Also certain public houses were used by the parish authorities for the payment of doles, etc., and a chequer-board was provided for that purpose and also adopted as a sign.

Chequers, the country seat of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, in the Chiltern country near Princes Risborough, was presented to the nation for this purpose by Sir Arthur and Lady Lee (Lord and Lady Lee of Fareham) in 1917, and first officially used by Lloyd George in 1921.

Cheronean (kē rō nē' ān). The Cheronean Sage. Plutarch (A.D. 46-120), who was born at Cheronea in BŒOTIA.

Cherry. Cherry-breeches, or cherry-pickers. Familiar names for the 11th Hussars. See CHERUBIMS under REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Cherry fairs. Cherry orchards where sales of fruit were held, such gatherings frequently becoming boisterous. Their temporary character caused them to be used to typify the evanescence of life; thus Gower says of this world, "Alle is but a cherye-fayre."

Cherry-trees and the cuckoo. The cherry-tree is strangely mixed up with the CUCKOO in many cuckoo stories, because of the tradition that the cuckoo must eat three good meals of cherries before he is allowed to cease singing.

Cuckoo, cuckoo, cherry-tree,
Good bird, prithee, tell to me
How many years I am to see.

The answer is gathered from the number of times the cuckoo repeats its cry.

The whole tree or not a cherry on it. "AUT CÆSAR NULLUS." All in all or none at all.

To make two bites of a cherry. To divide something too small to be worth dividing; to take two spells over a piece of work that should be done in one.

Cherubims. See under REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Cheshire Cat. To grin like a Cheshire cat. See under CAT.

Chess. "The game of kings"; the word being the English equivalent of the Persian shah (see CHECKMATE), a king. In Arabic the word was pronounced shag, which gave rise to the late Lat. scaccus, whence the O.Fr. eschec, Mod.Fr. échecs, and E. chess. Derivatives in other languages are scacco (Ital.), jaque (Span.), xaque (Port.), Schach (Ger.).

Chestnut. A stale joke. The term is said to have been popularized in America by a Boston actor named Warren, who, on a certain apposite occasion, quoted from The Broken Sword, a forgotten melodrama by William Dimond, first produced at COVENT GARDEN in 1816, in which one of the characters, Captain Xavier, is forever telling the same jokes with variations, one of which concerned his exploits with a cork-tree. He is corrected by Pablo who says "A chestnut. I have heard you tell the joke twenty-seven times, and I am sure it was a chestnut."

Chestnut Sunday. A Sunday in spring, generally that immediately before or after ASCENSION DAY, is so called in the London district, because about that time the chestnut avenue at Hampton Court bursts into bloom.

Cheval (shé vâl') (Fr. a horse).

Cheval de bataille (Fr. literally "horse of battle"). One's strong argument, one's favourite subject.

Cheval de frise. An apparatus consisting of a bar carrying rows of pointed stakes, set up so that the bar can revolve, and used in warfare as a defence against enemy cavalry. So called from its first use by the Frisians (who had few if any horses) in the siege of Groningen, Friesland, in 1594. A somewhat similar engine had been used before. In German it is "a Spanish horseman" (ein spanischer Reiter).

Cheval glass. A large, swinging mirror, long enough to reflect the whole of the figure; so called from the "horse" or framework which supports it.

Chevalier de St. George. See CAVALIER.

Chevalier d'industrie. A man who lives by his wits and calls himself a gentleman; an adventurer, a swindler.

Be cautiously upon your guard against the infinite number of fine-dressed and fine-spoken chevaliers d'industrie and aventuriers, which swarm at Paris.

CHESTERFIELD: Letters to his son (26 Apr. 1750).

Cheveril (chev' èr il). He has a cheveril conscience. An accommodating one; one that will easily stretch like kid leather.

Oh, here's a wit of cheveril, that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad!

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, II, iv.

Your soft cheveril conscience would receive,
If you might please to stretch it.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, II, iii.

Chevy Chase. There had long been a rivalry between the families of Percy and Douglas, which showed itself by incessant raids into each other's territory. Percy of Northumberland once vowed he would hunt for three days in the Scottish border, without condescending to ask leave of Earl Douglas. The Scots warden said in his anger, "Tell this vaunter he shall find one day more than sufficient." The ballad called Chevy Chase mixes up this hunt with the battle of Otterburn, which, Bishop Percy justly observes, was "a very different event". The ballad of The Battle of Otterburn is also given in PERCY'S RELIQUES.

Chian Painter, The. Apelles, famous Grecian painter and contemporary of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, born at Colophon on the coast of Asia Minor.

The Chian painter, when he was required
To portrait Venus in her perfect hue,
To make his work more absolute, desired
Of all the fairest maids to have the view.

Spenser: DEDICATORY SONNETS, xvii.

Chicane (chi kân'). A term used in bridge for a hand containing no trumps. Its general meaning is the use of mean, petty subterfuge, especially legal dodges and quibbles. It is a French word which, before being used for sharp practice in law-suits, meant a dispute in games, particularly mall, and originally the games of mall itself. (See PALL MALL.) It seems to be ultimately from the Persian chaugan, the crooked stick used in polo, and it is also applied to an obstacle on a race-course, particularly to the artificial bends introduced on motor-racing tracks.

Chichevache (chich' e vash). A fabulous monster that lives only on good women, and was hence all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce; the antitype to BICORN. Chaucer introduced and changed the word from the French chichifache (thin or ugly face) into chichevache (lean or meagre-looking cow).

O noble wyves, ful of heigh prudence,
Lat noon humylitee youre tonge naille,
Ne lat no clerk have cause or diligence
To write of yow a storic of swich mervaille
As of Grisildis, pacient and kynde,
Lest Chichivache yow swelwe in hire entraille.
CHAUCER: Lenvoy de Chaucer, Clerk's Tale.

Lydgate wrote a poem called Bycorne and Chichevache.

Chicken. Chicken-feed, chick-feed, or chicken-corn. Trivial amounts of money, small rewards or comparatively trifling costs; from the fact that chicken corn usually consists of the smaller and cheaper grains.

Chicken-hearted, or chicken-livered. Cowardly. Young fowls are remarkably timid and run to the hen on the slightest alarm.

Children and chicken must always be pickin'. They are always hungry and ready to eat.

Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. See CURSE.

Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. Make sure that a thing is actually yours before you speak or act as if it were already yours. The saying in a slightly different form is first found in the writings of Erasmus. "Don't crow till you are out of the wood" has a similar meaning. Cp. ALNASCHAR'S DREAM; A BIRD IN THE HAND IS WORTH TWO IN THE BUSH (under BIRD).

His chickens have come home to roost. His sins have found him out; he has got what he asked for; his actions have caught up on him.

Mother Carey's chickens. See MOTHER CAREY.

She's no chicken, or she's no spring chicken. She's no youngster, she is not young.

Where the chicken got the axe. See NECK. TO GET IT IN THE NECK.

Chicken of St. Nicholas. So the Piedmontese call our "LADYBIRD", the little red beetle with spots of black. The Russians call it "God's little cow", and the Germans, who say it is sent as a messenger of love, "God's little horse".

Child. At one time this was a provincial term for a female infant, and was the correlative of boy.

Mercy on's, a bairn; a very pretty bairn! A boy or a child, I wonder?
SHAKESPEARE: Winter's Tale, III, iii.

Child of God. In the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, one who has been baptized; others consider the phrase to mean one converted by special grace and adopted into the holy family of God's Church.

In my baptism; wherein I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven.

Catechism, Book of Common Prayer.

Childe. In Childe Harold, Childe Roland, Childe Tristram, etc., "childe" is a title of honour like the Sp. "infante". In the days of CHIVALRY, noble youths who were candidates for knighthood, during their time of probation, were called infans, valets, damoysels, bacheliers, and childe.

Childe Harold. Byron's poem depicts a man sated of the world, who roams from place to place to escape from himself. The "Childe" was, in fact, BYRON himself, who was only twenty-one when he began the poem, and twenty-eight when he finished it. In Canto I (1809), he visited Portugal and Spain; in Canto II (1810), Turkey in Europe; in Canto III (1816), Belgium and Switzerland; and in Canto IV (1817), Venice, Rome and Florence.

Childermas. The Old English name for the festival, or MASS of the HOLY INNOCENTS (28 December).

Children. Three hundred and sixty-five at a birth. It is said that a countess of Henneberg accused a beggar of adultery because she carried twins, whereupon the beggar prayed that the countess might carry as many children as there are days in the year. According to the legend, this happened on Good Friday, 1276. All the males were named John, and all the females Elizabeth. The countess was forty-two at the time.

The Children, or Babes in the Wood. The story is, that the master of Wayland Hall, Norfolk, left a little son and daughter to the care of his wife's brother; both were to have money, but if the children died first the uncle was to inherit. After twelve months the uncle hired two ruffians to murder the babes; one of them relented and killed his partner, leaving the children in a wood. They died during the night, and "ROBIN REDBREAST" covered them over with leaves. All things now went ill with the wicked uncle; his sons died, his barns were fired, his cattle died, and he finally perished in gaol. After seven years the ruffian was taken up for highway robbery, and confessed the whole affair.

The ballad The Children in the Wood appears in PERCY'S RELIQUES and also in a crude MELODRAMA, printed in 1601 and attributed on the title-page to Rob. Yarrington, called Two Lamentable Tragedies; the one of the murder of Maister Beech, a chandler in Thames-streete, etc. The other of a young child murdered in a wood by two ruffians, with the consent of his unkle. It is uncertain which is earlier, the play or the ballad.

Chiliasts (ki' li ásts) (Gr. chilias, a thousand). Also called MILLENARIANS. Those who believe that Christ will return to this earth and reign a thousand years in the midst of His saints. Originally a Judaistic theory, it became a heresy in the early Christian Church, and though it was condemned by St. Damasus, who was Pope from 366 to 384, it was not extirpated. Article xli of the English Church further condemned Chiliasm in 1553; this Article was omitted in 1562.

Chillingham Cattle. A breed of cattle still preserved in the Northumberland park of the Earl of Tankerville, reputed to be the last remnant of the wild oxen of Britain.

Chillon (shé' yong). Prisoner of Chillon. François de Bonnavard (died c. 1570), a Genevan prelate and politician. BYRON, in his poem, makes him one of six brothers, all of whom suffered for their opinions. The father and two sons died in battle; one was burnt at the stake; three were imprisoned in the dungeon of Chillon, on the edge of Lake Geneva—of these, two died, and François, who had been gaoled for republican principles by the Duke-Bishop of Savoy, was liberated, after four years, by the BÉARNAIS.

Chilminar and Baalbec (kil min ar', bál' bek). According to legend, two cities built by the Genii, acting under the orders of Jinn bin Jann, who governed the world long before ADAM. Chilminar, or the "Forty Towers", is Persepolis. They were intended as lurking places for the Genii to hide in.

Chilo. One of the "Seven Sages of Greece". See WISE MEN.

Chiltern Hundreds. The HUNDREDS of Stoke, Desborough and Burnham, Buckinghamshire, over which a Steward was originally appointed to suppress the robbers who frequented the thickly wooded Chiltern Hills. The necessity has long since ceased, but the office remains. As a consequence of the Succession Act of 1701 and later Place Acts, the holding of most non-political offices of profit under the Crown meant resignation from the HOUSE OF COMMONS, and after 1750 application for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds was used as a means of relinquishing membership of Parliament (since members cannot resign directly). The Stewardships of Old Shoreham, East Hendred, Hempholme, Poynings, and Northstead were also used for this purpose, as were (till 1838) the Escheatorships of Munster and Ulster. By the House of Commons Disqualification Act (1957), the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds and the Manor of Northstead (Yorks), were retained for this use and their gift remains with the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Chimæra (ki mē' rà) (Gr. chimaira, a she-goat). A fabulous monster in Greek mythology. According to HOMER it has a lion's head, a goat's body, and a dragon's tail. It was born in Lycia and slain by BELLEROPHON. Hence the use of the name in English for an illusory fancy, a wild incongruous scheme.

Chime in. To join in a conversation already in progress, or to be in accord with or agree to suggestions made by others. The allusion is to the chiming of bells.

Chimney Money, or Hearth Money. A yearly tax of two shillings on every fireplace in all houses liable to church and poor rates, or above a minimum value of 20s. per year. First levied in 1663, it was abolished in 1689 and replaced by the WINDOW TAX in 1696.

Chimney-pot hat. The same as a stove-pipe hat; the ordinary cylindrical black silk hat or top-hat.

Chinaman. A cricketing term (not to be confused with GOOGLY) denoting an off-break bowled from the back or side of the hand by a left-handed bowler. It is said that the name derives from the Chinese bowler Ellis Achong, who played for the West Indies, and who practised this kind of bowling, although he was not the first to do so.

Chinatown. That part of any city which forms the Chinese quarter, especially in the U.S.A.

Chindit (Chin' dit). Stylized lions characteristic of Burmese and Malayan sculpture and religious architecture. Adopted in World War II as the insignia of the troops under General Wingate operating in the Malayan jungle behind the Japanese lines, who became familiarly known as Chindits.

Chinese Gordon. General Charles Gordon (1833-1885), who in 1863 was placed in command of the EVER-VICTORIOUS ARMY and after thirty-three engagements succeeded in suppressing the formidable TAI-PING rebellion by 1864.

After the MAHDI's revolt in the Sudan, he was sent out by Gladstone's government to effect the evacuation of the Egyptian garrisons, but allowed himself to be cut off in Khartoum and was killed (26 January) after a heroic defence lasting nearly a year. The relief force under Wolseley arrived two days too late, due to CABINET procrastination.

Chinese Slavery. Virtual slavery; excessively hard graft for negligible rewards. The phrase became widely used as a political slogan by the LIBERALS from 1903, when Balfour's CONSERVATIVE government (1902-1905) introduced indentured coolies from China to combat the shortage of Kaffir labour in the Rand gold mines after the dislocation caused by the South African War. They were kept in compounds and only allowed out under permit.

Chink. Money; so called because it chinks or jingles in the purse. It was formerly in good repute as a synonym for coin.

Have chinks in thy purse.

TUSSER: Five Hundred Points (1573).

I shall tell you, he that can lay hold of her Shall have the chinks.

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, v.

Chinook. A warm, dry wind which blows down the east side of the Rockies in winter causing rapid rises in temperature and sudden thawing of snow. It is a cooling wind in the summer and takes its name from the Chinook Indians of the Columbia River area.

Chintz. A plural word that has erroneously become singular. The Hindi chint (from Sans. chitra, variegated) was the name given in the 17th century to the painted and stained calico imported from the East; but as the plural chints was more common in commercial use it came to be taken for the singular, and was written chince or chinse and finally chintz.

Chios (ki'os). The man of Chios. See SCIO'S BLIND OLD BARD.

Chip. A carpenter is known by his chips. A man is known to be a carpenter by the chips in his workshop, so the profession or taste of other men may be known by their manners or mode of speech.

A chip of the old block. A son or child of the same stuff as his father. The chip is the same wood as the block. Burke applied the words to William Pitt the younger.

Brother Chip. Properly a brother carpenter, but in its extended meaning applied to anyone of the same vocation as oneself. A ship's carpenter is commonly called "Chips" or "Chippy".

He's had his chips. He is finished or come to an end as far as this is concerned, he is out of it. Probably from the game of poker. See TO CHIP IN.

Such carpenters, such chips. As the workman, so his work will be.

The chips are down. The situation is urgent or desperate. Probably the same derivation as TO CHIP IN.

To chip in. It has two meanings; to make a contribution, and to interrupt. The former derives from the game of poker, in which the chips, representing money, are placed by the players in the "pot". The latter is obscure, but possibly from the same source.

To have a chip on one's shoulder. To be quarrelsome; to parade or have a grievance. Of 19th-century American origin, possibly as a man might carry a chip on his shoulder daring others to dislodge it.

Chippie. A knee-length frock worn in the RED-LIGHT DISTRICT of New Orleans; hence the U.S. term for a prostitute. It can be used as a back-handed term of affection, as with the Blues singer Bertha "Chippie" Hill.

Chiron (ki'ron). The centaur who taught ACHILLES, and many other heroes, music, medicine, and hunting. JUPITER placed him in heaven among the stars as SAGITTARIUS.

Dante, in his INFERNO, gives the name to the keeper of the lake of boiling blood, in the seventh circle of HELL.

Chirping Cup. A merry-making glass or cup of liquor. Wine that makes glad the heart of man, or makes him sing for joy.

A chirping cup is my matin song,
And my vesper bell is my bowl; Ding dong!
WILLIAM SHIELD: A Friar of Orders Grey (1784).

The Chirping and moderate bottle.
BEN JONSON.

Chisel. I chiselled him means, I cheated him or cut him out of something. Hence a chiseller, a cheat or one who takes unfair advantage.

Chivalry (shiv' ál ri). A general term for all things pertaining to the romance of the old days of knighthood. The word is of similar origin to cavalry, coming from the Fr. cheval, a horse, and chevalier, a horseman. Chivalry embodied the mediæval conception of the ideal life, where valour, courtesy, generosity and dexterity in arms were the summit of any man's attainment.

For him behoveth to be of soch chivalrie and so adventurouse that he com by hymselfe and enquere after the seint Graal that my feire daughter kepeth.
Merlin (E.E.T.S., iii).

A great literature arose out of chivalry—the ROLAND epics, those of CHARLEMAGNE, and ARTHUR. It was, perhaps, prophetic of the fate of chivalry itself that in every case these great epics end in tragedy.

The PALADINS of CHARLEMAGNE were all scattered by the battle of RONCESVALLES.

The champions of Dietrich were all assassinated at the instigation of Chriemhild (KRIEMHILD), the bride of ETZEL, king of the Huns.

The Knights of the ROUND TABLE were all destroyed in the fatal battle of CAMLAN.

The flower of chivalry. See FLOWER.

Chivy. To chase or urge someone on; also a chase in the game of "Prisoner's Base". One boy "sets a chivy" by leaving his base, when one of the opposite side chases him, and if he succeeds in touching him before he reaches "home", the boy touched becomes a prisoner. The word is a variant of chevy, from CHEVY CHASE.

Chivy, or chivvy. The face. An example of rhyming slang.

Chloe (klō' é). The shepherdess beloved by DAPHNIS in the Greek pastoral romance of Longus called Daphnis and Chloe, and hence a generic name in literature for a rustic maiden—not always of the artless variety.

In Pope's Moral Essays (ii) Chloe is intended for Lady Suffolk, mistress of George II, "Content to dwell in decencies for ever"; and Prior uses the name for Mrs. Centlivre.

Chock-full. Chock-a-block. Full right up; no room for any more. When two blocks of a tackle meet preventing any more purchase being gained it is said to be two blocks or chock-a-block.

Chocolate. The produce of the cocoa-berry was introduced into England from Central America in the early 16th century as a drink. It was sold in London coffee-houses from the middle of the 17th century. The Cocoa Tree was one of the famous coffee-houses of the early 18th century. See COFFEE.

Chocos (Austr.). A diminutive of chocolate soldiers, applied to militiamen and conscripts in World War II.

Choice spirit. A specially select or excellent person, a leader in some particular capacity. From Antony's speaking of Cæsar and Brutus as:

The choice and master spirits of this age.
SHAKESPEARE: Julius Cæsar, III, i.

Choice spirit of the age. Figuratively used for a gallant of the day; one who delights to exaggerate the whims of fashion.

Hobson's choice. See HOBSON'S CHOICE.

Of two evils choose the less. The proverb is given in John Heywood's collection (1546), but it is a good deal earlier and occurs in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (ii, 470) as:

Of harmes two, the leſse is for to chese.

Thomas a Kempis (Imitatio Christi, III, xii) has:

De duobus malis minus est semper eligendum
(Of two evils the lesser is always to be chosen.)

which is an echo of Cicero's:

Ex malis eligere minima oportere. (Of evil one should select the least.)—De Officiis, III, i.

Choke. May this piece of bread choke me, if what I say is not true. In ancient times a person accused of robbery had a piece of barley bread given him over which MASS had been said. He put it in his mouth uttering the above words, and if he could swallow it without being choked he was pronounced innocent. Tradition ascribes the death of Earl Godwin to choking with a piece of bread after this solemn appeal. See CORSNED.

Choke-damp. The carbonic acid gas which accumulates in coal mines, and can cause suffocation. Also called after-damp or foul-damp.

Choke-pear. A kind of pear with a rough, astringent taste. From this the term was applied to anything that stopped speaking, such as an unanswerable argument or a biting sarcasm.

He gave him a choake-peare to stoppe his breath.
LYLY: Euphuus.

Pardon me for going so low as to talk of giving choke-pears.

RICHARDSON: Clarissa.

Choke Weed. Hemp. An obsolete Americanism for the plant which provides the material for the hangman's rope. The name is also applied to the parasitic plant broomrape (Orobanche).

Chop

Choker. Formerly a broad neck-cloth, worn in full dress by waiters, clergymen and others; then a high stiff collar or necklace or scarf, worn tight round the neck.

Chop. (1) to chop, meaning to cut a piece off with a sudden blow, is a variant spelling of chap, a cleft in the skin, and to chap, to open in long slits or cracks. From this we get:

Chops of the Channel. The short, broken motion of the waves, experienced in crossing the English Channel; also the place where such motion occurs. In this use, however, the word may be chops, the jaw (see below), because the Chops of the Channel is an old and well-understood term for the entrance to the Channel from the Atlantic.

Chop house. An eating-house where chops and steaks are served.

I dine at the Chop-House three days a week, where the good company wonders they never see you of late.

STEELE: Spectator, No. 308 (22 Feb. 1712).

(2) In the following phrases chop comes from the same root as chap in CHAPMAN and signifies to barter, exchange, or sell.

To chop an article means to dispose of it arbitrarily, even at a loss.

To chop and change. To barter by RULE OF THUMB; to fluctuate, to keep changing one's mind or vary continuously.

To chop logic. To bandy words; to altercation. Bacon says, "Let not the counsellor chop with the judge."

How now, how now, chop logic! What is this? "Proud", and "I thank you", and "I thank you not",

And yet "not proud".

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, III, v.

The wind chops about. Shifts from point to point suddenly. Hence choppy, said of a variable wind, and of the rough sea produced by such; and to chop round:

How the House of Lords and House of Commons chopped round.

THACKERAY: The Four Georges (George I).

(3) Chop, the face, and chops, the jaws or mouth, is a variant spelling of chap (as in Bath chap, the lower part of a pig's face, cured). From this come:

Chop-fallen, or chap-fallen. CREST-FALLEN, down in the mouth.

Down in the chops. Down in the mouth; in a melancholy state; with the mouth drawn down.

To lick one's chops. To relish in anticipation.

(4) In the slang phrase first chop, meaning excellent, the word is the Hindi chhap, a print or stamp, formerly used in India and China by English residents for an official seal, also for a passport or permit; and a Chinese custom-house is known as a chop-house.

Chopsticks. The two thin sticks of wood or ivory that the Chinese use to eat with. The word is a rendering of the Chin. K'wai-tsze, meaning "the quick ones". In PIDGIN-ENGLISH chop means "quick", hence chop chop, hurry, be quick.

Chopsticks is also the name of a quick traditional waltz tune played as a duet by schoolchildren. The French call it Côtelettes (Cutlets), and the Germans Koteletten Walzer.

Choragus (Kôr a' gûs). The leader of the chorus in the ancient Athenian drama.

At Oxford, the title was given to the assistant of the Professor of Music, but formerly to the officer who superintended the practice of music. See CORYPHEUS.

Choriambic Metre. HORACE gives us a great variety, but the main feature in all is the prevalence of the choriambus (— ∪ ∪ —). Specimen translations in two of these metres are subjoined:

(1) Horace, Odes, I, viii.

Chouans (shoo' ong). French peasant bands in Brittany, under the leadership of Jean Cottereau (1767-1794), who rose in revolt in 1793 and joined the royalists of La VENDÉE. Chouan (a corruption of chat-huant, a screech-owl) was the nickname given to Cottereau, who imitated the screech of the owl to warn his companions of danger; and the name was extended to his followers. Georges Cadoudal (executed 1804) was their leader after 1794. The movement reappeared in 1814-1815 and again during the JULY REVOLUTION of 1830. See also COMPANIONS OF JEHU.

Choughs. See under BIRD.

Chouse (chouz). To cheat or swindle. It derives from the Turkish cha' ush, an interpreter, messenger, etc. The interpreter of the Turkish embassy in England in 1609 defrauded his government of £4,000, and the notoriety of the swindle gave rise to the term.

What do you think of me,
That I am a Chiause?
BEN JONSON: Alchemist, I, ii.

You shall chouse him out of horses, clothes, and money, and I'll wink at it.
DRYDEN: Wild Gallant, II, i.

Chriem-hild. See KRIEMHILD.

Chrisom, or Chrism signifies properly "the white cloth set by the minister at baptism on the head of the newly anointed with chrism"—a composition of oil and balm (Gr. chrisma, anointing, unction). It then came to be applied to the white baptismal robe, which was used as a shroud if the child died within the month of baptism. In the bills of mortality, as late as 1726, such infants were called chrisoms.

'A made a finer end, and went away, an it had been any chrism child.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, II, iii.

Chriss-cross, or Christ-cross row. The alphabet in a HORNBOOK, which had a cross like the MALTESE CROSS (✠) at the beginning and end.

Sir Ralph. I wonder, wench, how I thy name might know.
Mall. Why you may find it, sir, in th' Christcross row.
PORTER: Two Angry Women of Abington, V, i (1599).

The word appears as Christ-cross, criss-cross, etc., and Shakespeare shortened it to cross-row:

He harkens after prophecies and dreams;
And from the cross-row plucks the letter G,
And says a wizard told him that by G
His issue disinherited should be.
Richard III, I, i.

As the Maltese cross was also sometimes used in place of XII to mark that hour on clocks, chriss-cross has occasionally been used for noon:

The feskewe of the Diall is upon the Chrisscrosse of Noone.
The Puritan Widow, IV, ii (ANON., 1607).

Christadelphians, or Brethren of Christ, sometimes called Thomasites after their founder Dr. John Thomas (1805-1871), who migrated from London to Brooklyn and established the sect in 1848. They believe in "conditional immortality" for the faithful and the full inspiration of the BIBLE, and look for the return of Christ to reign on this earth.

Christendom. All Christian countries generally; formerly it also meant the state or condition of being a Christian.

By my christendom,
So I were out of prison, and kept sheep,
I should be as merry as the day is long.
SHAKESPEARE: King John, IV, i.

Christian. A follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch (Acts xi, 26). Also the hero of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress who fled from the CITY OF DESTRUCTION and journeyed to the CELESTIAL CITY. He started with a heavy burden on his back, which fell off when he stood at the foot of the cross.

Christian Brothers. A secret society formed in London in the early 16th century to distribute the New Testament in English. The name is now better known as that of the Roman Catholic teaching congregation of laymen, founded by the Abbé de la Salle in 1684. It still flourishes in France, Great Britain and elsewhere.

Christian Science. The religion founded at Boston by Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy in 1879, "the scientific system of divine healing". Her views were put forward in her book Science and Health, with key to the Scriptures, first published in 1875. Christian Science is founded on the Bible, but distinguishes between what is taught in the New Testament and what is taught in the creeds and later dogma. It has now a considerable following and is not limited, as is popularly assumed, to the healing of those who are ill.

Most Christian Doctor. John Charlier de Gerson (1363-1429), French theologian.

Most Christian King. The style of the king of France since 1429, when it was conferred on Louis XI by Pope Paul II. Previously the title had been given in the 8th century to Pepin le Bref by Pope Stephen III (714-768), and again in the 9th century to Charles le Chauve. See RELIGIOUS.

Christiana (kris ti an' a). The wife of CHRISTIAN in Pt. II of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, who journeyed with her children and Mercy from the CITY OF DESTRUCTION some time after her husband.

Christinos. Supporters of the Queen-Regent Christina during the CARLIST wars in Spain, 1833-1840.

Christmas. 25 December is Christmas Day although almost certainly not the day on which Christ was born, as is popularly supposed. The date was eventually fixed by the Church in A.D. 440, the day of the winter SOLSTICE, which had anciently been a time of festival among heathen peoples. In Anglo-Saxon England, the year began on 25 December, but from the late 12th century until the adoption of the Gregorian Calendar in 1752 the year began on LADY DAY, 25 March. See GREGORIAN YEAR; OLD STYLE.

Christmas box. A gratuity given on Boxing Day (the day after Christmas Day). Boxes placed in churches for casual offerings used to be opened on Christmas Day, and the contents, called the "dole of the Christmas box", or the "box money", were distributed next day by the priests. Apprentices also used to carry a box round to their masters' customers for small gratuities (See PIGGY-BANKS). Postmen received such gifts until after World War II, and some dustmen and errand-boys still call to collect them. Cp. HANDSEL.

Christmas cards. These boosters of post office and stationers' revenues are of comparatively recent origin. W. C. T. Dobson, R.A., is usually regarded as having sent the first such card in 1844. Sir Henry Cole and J. C. Horsley produced the first commercial Christmas card in 1846, although it was condemned by temperance enthusiasts because members of the family group in the centre piece were cheerfully drinking wine. After Tucks, the art printers, took to printing them in the 1870s, they really came into VOGUE.

Christmas decorations. The Roman festival of SATURN was held in December and the temples were decorated with greenery; the DRUIDS are associated with MISTLETOE, and the Saxons used HOLLY and IVY. These customs have been transferred to the Christian festival. The holly or holy-tree is called Christ's thorn in Germany and Scandinavia, from its use in church decorations and its putting forth its berries about Christmas time. The early Christians gave an emblematic turn to the custom, referring to the "righteous branch", and justifying it from Isaiah ix, 13: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary."

The decorated Christmas tree was in use among the Romans and was introduced into England from Germany soon after Queen Victoria's marriage with Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha in 1840. SANTA CLAUS and his reindeer came to England at the same time.

Christopher, St. Legend relates that St. Christopher was a giant who one day carried a child over a brook, and said, "Chylde, thou hast put me in gret peryll. I might bere no greater burden." To which the child answered "Marvel thou nothing, for thou hast borne all the world upon thee, and its sins likewise." This is an allegory: Christopher means Christ-bearer; the child was Christ, and the river was the river of death.

Christy Minstrels. For many years the mid-Victorian publics of London and New York were entertained by the troupe of black-faced minstrels organized by the American Christy brothers (1815-1862). To an accompaniment of various stage-Negro antics they sang plantation songs and cracked innocent jokes with Bones, Sambo, and the rest. Stephen Collins Foster provided their best songs, of which Beautiful Dreamer is the most famous. They were succeeded by Moore and Burgess, and other troupes of the same genre.

Why is it almost certain that Shakespeare was a broker?
Because he furnished so many stock quotations.
The Merry Book of the Moore and Burgess Minstrels.

Chronicle. Chronicon ex Chronicis. An early 12th-century chronicle from the creation to 1117 written by Florence, a monk of Worcester (d. 1118). It is largely based on Marianus Scotus, a lost version of the ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE, and Asser. His own contributions begin with 1106 and it was carried on to 1141 by John of Worcester.

To chronicle small beer. To note down events of no importance whatsoever. Small beer was the term for weak beer, of low alcoholic content.

She was a wight, if ever such wight were . . .
To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.
SHAKESPEARE: Othello, II, i.

Chronogram. A sentence or inscription in which certain letters stand for a date or epoch. In this double chronogram upon the year 1642 (one part in Latin and the other in the English of that Latin) the capitals in each produced the total of 1642.

Chronon-hoton-thologos (krō' non hō' ton thol' ō gos). A burlesque pomposo, king of Queerummania, in Henry Carey's farce of the same name—"the most tragical tragedy ever tragedized" (1734). The name is used for any bombastic person who delivers an inflated address.

Chrysippus. Nisi Chrysippus fuisset, Porticus non est. If Chrysippus had not been, there would be no Porticus (STOIC philosophy—the portico was the place where ZENO taught). Chrysippus of Soli was a disciple of Zeno the Stoic and Cleanthes, his successor. He did for the Stoics what St. PAUL did for Christianity—that is, he explained the system, showed by plausible reasoning its truth, and how it was based on a solid foundation. Stoicism was founded by Zeno; but if Chrysippus had not been its advocate, it would never have taken root.

Chum. A crony, a familiar companion.

To chum up with. To become friendly with, to make a companion of.

Church. This is the O.E. circe, or cirice, which comes through W.Ger. kirika, from Gr. kuriakon, a church, the neuter of the adjective kuriakos, meaning of or belonging to the Lord. It denotes the whole body of Christians; the place of worship; a particular sect or group of Christians; the CLERGY.

Anglican Church. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Broad Church. See BROAD.

Catholic Church. See CATHOLIC.

Established Church. The church officially recognized and established by law and enjoying a privileged position. In England the established Church is Episcopalian, in Scotland it is PRESBYTERIAN. See EPISCOPACY.

Church of England. First severed its connexion with ROME under Henry VIII and finally under Elizabeth I (1559). Doctrinal changes were largely effected in the reign of Edward VI (1547-1553) and embodied in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER of 1549 and the more definitely PROTESTANT version of 1552.

Church of Ireland. This became PROTESTANT in the same way as the Church of England and, although most of the Irish remained Roman CATHOLIC, it was not disestablished and largely disendowed until 1869.

Church of North America (Episcopalian), was established in November 1784, when Bishop Seabury, chosen by the churches of Connecticut, was consecrated in Scotland. The first convention was held at Philadelphia in 1787.

Church of Scotland. It first became PRESBYTERIAN in 1560, but EPISCOPACY was cautiously restored by James VI and I from 1599, to be rejected finally in 1638. It is an ESTABLISHED CHURCH, but has none of the problems of patronage which beset the Church of England.

Church in Wales was separated from the province of Canterbury in 1920, after the long-standing agitation for disestablishment, which resulted in the Act of 1914 for this purpose.

Church-ale. Also called Easter-ale and Whitsun-ale from their being sometimes held at EASTER and WHITSUNTIDE; a church festivity akin to the WAKES, when specially brewed ale was sold to the populace and money was collected in addition for church purposes. The word "ale" is used in such composite words as bride-ale, church-ale, clerk-ale, lamb-ale, Midsummer-ale, Scot-ale, etc., for revel or feast, ale being the chief liquor provided.

which mault being made into very strong ale, or beer, is set to sale, either in the church, or in some other place . . . If all be true which they say, they bestow the money which is got thereby for the repair of their churches and chappels; they buy bookes for the service, etc. . . .

PHILIP STUBBS: Anatomie of Abuses (1595).

Church scot. A tribute, earlier known as food-rent, paid on ST. MARTIN'S Day (11 November) in corn and poultry, etc., to support the parish priests in Saxon times. It is named from the Early Saxon silver coin called a sceat.

High Church. See HIGH.

Low Church. See LOW.

Orthodox Church. See ORTHODOX.

The Church Army. A CHURCH OF ENGLAND evangelical body founded by the Rev. Wilson Carlile in 1882. It began its work among the poor of London on somewhat similar lines to those of the SALVATION ARMY.

The Church Invisible. Those who are known to God alone as His sons and daughters by adoption and grace. See CHURCH VISIBLE.

There is . . . a Church visible and a Church invisible; the latter consists of those spiritual persons who fulfil the notion of the Ideal Church—the former is the Church as it exists in any particular age, embracing within it all who profess Christianity.—F. W. ROBERTSON: Sermons (series IV, ii).

The Church Militant. The Church or whole body of believers who are said to be "waging the war of faith" against "the world, the flesh and the devil". It is therefore militant, or in warfare.

The Church Triumphant. Those who are dead and gone to their rest. Having fought the fight and triumphed, they belong to the Church Triumphant in heaven.

The Church Visible. All ostensible Christians; all who profess to be Christians; all who have been baptized and admitted into the communion of the Church. Cp. CHURCH INVISIBLE.

Churrigueresque

The Seven Churches of Asia. See SEVEN.

To church a woman. To read the appointed service when a woman comes to church to give thanks after childbirth.

To go into the Church. To take HOLY ORDERS; to enter the ministry.

Uniat Churches. See UNIAT.

Churchwarden. A long clay pipe, such as churchwardens used to smoke a century or so ago when they met together in the parish tavern, after they had made up their accounts in the VESTRY, or been elected to office at the EASTER meeting.

Churchyard cough. A deep, chesty cough of an ominous kind. The allusion is obvious.

Churrigueresque (chu rig er esk'). Over-ornate as applied to architecture. The word, frequently used by Richard Ford (1796-1858) in his writings on Spain, derives from José Churriguera (1650-1723), a Spanish architect of the Baroque school.

Ci-devant (sê de vong) (Fr.). Former, of times gone by. As Ci-devant governor, once a governor but no longer so; ci-devant philosophers, philosophers of former days. In the time of the first French Republic the word was used as a noun meaning a nobleman of the ANCIEN RÉGIME.

Cicero (sis' er ô). Marcus Tullius, the great Roman orator, philosopher, and statesman (106-43 B.C.); said by Plutarch to have been called Cicero from Lat. cicer (a wart or vetch), because he had "a flat excrescence on the tip of his nose".

La Bouche de Ciceron. Philippe Pot, chief minister of Louis XI France (1428-1494).

The British Cicero. William Pitt, Earl of Chatham (1708-1778).

The Christian Cicero. Lucius Coelius Lactantius or Lactantius Firmianus; a Christian Father (c. 260-c. 340).

The Cicero of France. Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663-1742), a noted pulpit orator.

The Cicero of Germany. John, Elector of Brandenburg (1486-1499).

The Cicero of the British Senate. George Canning (1770-1827).

The German Cicero. Johannes Sturm, printer and scholar (1507-1589).

Cicerone. A guide who points out objects of interest to strangers. So called from the great orator Cicero, in the same way as PAUL was called by the men of Lystra, "Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker."

Cicisbeo (chich is bâ' ô). A dangler about women; the professed gallant of a married woman. Cp. CAVALIERE SERVENTE. Also the knot of silk or ribbon which is attached to fans, walking-sticks, umbrellas, etc.

Cid (sid). A corruption of seyyid, Arabic for lord. The title given to Roderigo or Ruy Diaz de Bivar (c. 1040-1099), also called El Campeador, the national hero of Spain and champion of Christianity against the MOORS. His exploits, real and legendary, form the basis of many Spanish romances and chronicles, as well as Corneille's tragedy Le Cid (1636).

Cid Hamet Benengell. The supposititious author upon whom Cervantes fathered the Adventures of Don Quixote.

Of the two bad cassocks I am worth . . . I would have given the latter of them freely as even as Cid Hamet offered his . . . to have stood by.—STERNE.

Cigars and Cigarettes. The word cigar comes from cicada, the Spanish name for the cigar-shaped insect. The natives of Cuba were already smoking tobacco in this form when Europeans first arrived. Cigars as we know them were introduced into the U.S.A. by General Putnam in 1762, on his return from the capture of Havana by the Earl of Albemarle.

Cheroots (from the Tamil shuruttu, a roll) are made from tobacco grown in Southern India, Burma or the Philippines, and are merely rolled with the ends cut square.

Cigarettes originated in Spain (Borrow calls them paper cigars, and the Spaniards cigarrillos or little cigars), first rolled by the smoker as he needed them. It was not until the late 19th century that they were sold in packets ready made.

Cimmerian Darkness (sî mēr' i ân). HOMER (possibly from some story as to the Arctic night) supposes the Cimmerians to dwell in a land "beyond the ocean stream", where the sun never shone (Odys. XI, 14). Spenser refers to "Cymerian shades" in Virgil's Gnat and Milton to "Cimmerian desert" in L'Allegro.

The Cimmerians were known in post-Homeric times as an historical people on the shores of the BLACK SEA, whence the name Crimea.

Cinchona (sin chō' na), or Quinine. So named from the wife of the Conte del Chinchon, viceroy of Peru, who was cured of a tertian fever by its use, and who brought it to Europe in 1640. Linnæus erroneously named it Cinchona for Chinchona. See PERUVIAN BARK.

Cincinnatus (sin si nā' tus). A legendary Roman hero of about 500 to 430 B.C., who, after having been consul years before, was taken from his plough to be Dictator. After he had conquered the Æquians and delivered his country from danger, he laid down his office and returned to his plough.

The Cincinnatus of the Americans. George Washington (1732-1799).

The Cincinnati were members of a society of officers of the American Army after the peace of 1783 "to perpetuate friendship, and to raise a fund for relieving the widows and orphans of those who have fallen during the war". On their badge was a figure of Cincinnatus.

The Ohio city of this name, formerly Losantiville, was renamed in 1790 in honour of General St. Clair, governor of the North West Territory, who was president of the Cincinnati.

Cinderella (sin der rel' à). Heroine of a fairy tale of very ancient, probably Eastern, origin, found in German literature in the 16th century and popularized by Perrault's Contes de ma mère l'oye (1697). Cinderella is drudge of the house, while her elder sisters go to fine balls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is found again by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own.

The glass slipper has been conjectured as a fur or sable slipper, supposedly from pantoufle de vair not de verre. Perrault's text of 1697 has "de verre", which is more in keeping with the story.

Cinquecento (ching' kwè chen' tō). The Italian name for the 16th century, applied as an epithet to art and literature with much the same significance as RENAISSANCE or Elizabethan. It was the revival of the classical or antique, but is also understood as a derogatory term, implying debased or inferior art.

Cinque Ports (sink). Originally the five Kent and Sussex seaports of Hastings, Sandwich, Dover, Romney, and Hythe, which were known by this name collectively from the 12th century and were granted special privileges in consideration of their providing ships and men for the defence of the Channel. Winchelsea and Rye were subsequently added and there were ultimately thirty-two lesser members. Their privileges were largely surrendered in 1685. The Duke of Wellington and Sir Winston Churchill are among these who have held the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. In 1965 Sir Robert Menzies, Prime Minister of Australia, was given this appointment.

Circe (sēr' si). A sorceress in Greek mythology, who lived in the island of Ææa. When ULYSSES landed there, Circe turned his companions into swine, but Ulysses resisted this metamorphosis by virtue of a herb called MOLY, given him by MERCURY.

Who knows not Circe,
The daughter of the sun, whose charmed cup
Whoever tasted, lost his upright shape,
And downward fell into a grovelling swine?
MILTON: Comus, 50-3.

Circle. Great circle. A line on the surface of a sphere which lies on a plane through its centre, or any circle which divided it into two equal parts. The great circle is of major importance in navigation by sea or in the air. The shortest distance between any two points on the earth's surface is on a great circle. The Equator and all lines of longitude are great circles.

Circle of Ulloa. A white rainbow or luminous ring sometimes seen in Alpine regions opposite the sun in foggy weather. Named from Antonio de Ulloa (1716-1795), a Spanish naval officer who founded the observatory at Cadiz and initiated many scientific enterprises.

Circuit. The journey through the counties of Great Britain made by the judges twice a year to administer justice. There are six circuits in ENGLAND, two in WALES, and three in SCOTLAND. Those in England are called the Western, South-Eastern, Oxford, Midland, North-Eastern, Northern; those of Wales, the North Wales and Chester, and the South Wales Division; and those of Scotland, the Southern, Western, and Northern.

Circuit Rider. A METHODIST minister in America who rode on horseback round the outlying stations of his circuit to preach and perform other pastoral duties. Francis Asbury, a follower of John Wesley, began the practice in 1771.

Circumlocution Office. A term applied in ridicule by Charles Dickens in Little Dorrit to our public offices, because each person tries to shuffle off every act to someone else; and before anything is done it has to pass through so many departments with such consequent delays that it is hardly worth having bothered about it.

Whatever was required to be done, the Circumlocution Office was beforehand with all the public departments in the art of perceiving—How not to do it.—DICKENS: Little Dorrit, ch. x.

Cist (kist) (Gr. kiste, Lat. cista). A chest or box, generally used as a coffer for the remains of the dead by prehistoric man, made from flat stones placed on edge with another stone as a lid, and usually covered by a round barrow. The Greek and Roman cist was a deep cylindrical basket made of wickerwork. The basket into which voters cast their tablets was called a cist; but the mystic cist used in the rites of CERES was latterly made of bronze. Cp. KIST OF WHISTLES.

Cistercians. A monastic order, founded at Cistercium or Cîteaux (near Dijon) in 1098, by Robert, abbot of Molesme, as strict BENEDICTINES. They are also known as Grey or White Monks from their habit and as Bernadines from St. Bernard of Clairvaux, who with thirty companions joined the abbey of Cîteaux in 1113. They were noted agriculturalists, and in the 13th-century England became great producers of wool.

Citizen King, The. Louis Philippe of France. So called because he was elected King of the French (1830-1848), not King of France, after the downfall of Charles X. He was the son of PHILIPPE ÉGALITÉ.

City. A town thus incorporated by charter; any large town is so called in ordinary speech. In England, the term is of historical and ceremonial rather than administrative significance. In the Bible, it means a town having walls and gates.

The City. The City of London within its historic boundaries as distinct from other London boroughs; also a general term for the business and financial interests of the City of London.

The big city. London.

The City College. An old irony for NEWGATE GAOL.

The City of a Hundred Towers. Pavia, in Italy; famous for its towers and steeples.

The City of Bells. Strasbourg.

The City of Brotherly Love. Philadelphia. A somewhat ironical but quite etymological nickname for this city (Gr. philadelphia, brotherly love).

The City of David. Jerusalem. So called in compliment to King David (II Sam. v, 7, 9).

The City of Destruction. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, the world of the unconverted.

The City of Dreaming Spires. Oxford. A name derived from Matthew Arnold's Thyrsis: "that sweet City with her dreaming spires".

The City of Dreadful Knights. Cardiff. After World War I, Lloyd George, Prime Minister in the Coalition government, made lavish grants of honours in a cynical and blatant fashion. In 1922 Lord Salisbury opened an attack and it was alleged that the government had fixed prices for the sale of titles, the money being put into party political funds. The CONSERVATIVE PARTY profited as did Lloyd George's private party chest. As a consequence, a Royal Commission was set up in 1922 to recommend future procedure. Three people connected with prominent South Wales newspapers were among the recipients of these honours, hence Cardiff was dubbed the "City of Dreadful Knights", a punning allusion to The City of Dreadful Night, a poem by James Thomson (1834-1882).

The City of Elms. New Haven, Connecticut.

The City of God. The Church, or whole body of believers; the Kingdom of Christ, in contradistinction to the CITY OF DESTRUCTION. The phrase is from St. Augustine's famous work, De Civitate Dei.

The City of Lanterns. A suppositious city in Lucian's Veræ Historiæ, situate somewhere beyond the ZODIAC. Cp. LANTERN-LAND.

The City of Legions. Caerleon-on-Usk, where King ARTHUR held his court.

The City of Lilies. Florence.

The City of Magnificent Distances. Washington, D.C., famous for its wide avenues and splendid vistas.

The City of Palaces. Agrippa, in the reign of AUGUSTUS, converted ROME from "a city of brick huts to one of marble palaces".

Marmoream se relinquere quam latericiam accepisset.—SUTONIUS: Aug. xxix.

Calcutta is also called the "City of Palaces".

The City of St. Michael. Dumfries, of which St. MICHAEL is the patron SAINT.

The City of Saints. Montreal is so named because of its streets named after SAINTS. Salt Lake City, Utah, U.S.A., is also so called, from its MORMON inhabitants.

The City of the Golden Gate. San Francisco. See GOLDEN GATE.

The City of the Prophet. MEDINA. See CITIES OF REFUGE.

The City of the Seven Hills. ROME, built on seven hills (Urbs Septacollis). The hills are the Aventine, Cælian, Capitoline, Esquiline, Palatine, Quirinal, and Viminal.

The Aventine Hill was given to the people. It was deemed unlucky because here Remus was slain. It was also called "Collis Dianæ", from the temple of DIANA which stood there.

The Cælian Hill was given to Cælius Vibenna, the Tuscan, who came to the help of the Romans in the Sabine war.

The Capitoline Hill or "Mons Tarpeius", also called "Mons Saturni", on which stood the great castle or capitol of Rome. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

The Esquiline Hill was given by AUGUSTUS to MÆCENAS, who built thereon a magnificent mansion which he bequeathed to Augustus.

The Palatine Hill was the largest of the seven. Here Romulus held his court, whence the word "palace" (palatium).

The Quirinal Hill was where the Quirès or Curès settled. It was also called "Cabalinus", from two marble statues of a horse, one of which was the work of Phidias, the other of Praxiteles.

The Viminal Hill was so called from the number of osiers (vimines) which grew there. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Viminalis.

The City of the Sun. Baalbec, Rhodes, and Heliopolis, which had the sun for tutelary deity, were so called. It is also the name of a treatise on the Ideal Republic by the Dominican Friar Campanella (1568-1639), similar to the REPUBLIC of Plato, UTOPIA of Sir Thomas More, and the NEW ATLANTIS of Bacon.

The City of the Three Kings. Cologne; the reputed burial place of the MAGI.

The City of the Tribes. Galway; because it was anciently the home of the thirteen "tribes" or chief families, who settled there in 1232 with Richard de Burgh.

The City of the Violated Treaty. Limerick; because of the way the Pacification of Limerick (1691) was broken by England.

The City of the Violet Crown. Athens is so called by Aristophanes (Equites, 1323 and 1329; and Acharmians, 637). Macaulay refers to Athens as the "violet-crowned city". Ion (a violet) was a legendary king of ATHENS, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian tribes; and Greece in Asia Minor was called Ionia. Athens was the city of "Ion crowned his king" or "of the Violet crowned".

Cities of Refuge. Six walled cities (Joshua, xxxv, 6), three on each side of the Jordan, set aside under MOSAIC LAW as a refuge for those who committed accidental homicide. Such refuges were necessitated by the primitive law which exacted blood vengeance by next of kin. All seeking asylum were tried, and if found guilty of murder right of asylum was withdrawn. The cities were Ramoth, Kedesh, Bezer, Shechem, Hebron, and Golan (Joshua xx, 7, 8). In Numbers xxxv, and other references, the choice of cities is attributed to Moses, but in Joshua xx, to Joshua.

Among Mohammedans, MEDINA, in Arabia, where MOHAMMED took refuge when driven by conspirators from MECCA, is known as "the City of Refuge". He entered it, not as a fugitive, but in triumph (622 A.D.). Also called the City of the Prophet.

The Cities of the Plain. Sodom and Gomorrah.

Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent towards Sodom.—Gen. xiii, 12.

Civil List. The annual grant, fixed in 1952 at £475,000, voted by PARLIAMENT for royal expenditure from the CONSOLIDATED FUND. It was so named in the early 18th century because the salaries of Civil Servants, Judges, etc., were paid from it (until 1831) and it has its origins in the reign of William III. George III gave up most of the hereditary revenues in 1760 in return for an annual grant. See ROYAL BOUNTY.

Civil Service. This name for all those employed in administering the civil business of the State was originally used by the English East India Company to distinguish its civilian employees from its soldiers.

Civil Service Estimates. The annual Parliamentary grant to cover the expenses of the diplomatic service, the Home Office and prisons, education, the collection of the revenue, and other expenses pertaining to neither the sovereign nor the armed services of the Crown.

Civil War. War between citizens (civiles) of the same state. In English history, the term is particularly applied to the war between Charles I and PARLIAMENT; but the BARONS' WAR and the Wars of the Roses (see under ROSE) were also civil wars. The U.S.A. was confronted with a costly civil war between 1861 and 1865, when the eleven CONFEDERATE STATES sought to secede from the Union.

Civis Romanus sum (siv' is rō mā' nus sūm). "I am a Roman citizen", a plea which sufficed to stop arbitrary condemnation, bonds, and scourging. No Roman citizen could be condemned unheard; by the Valerian Law he could not be bound; by the Sempronian Law it was forbidden to scourge him or beat him with rods. When the chief captain commanded PAUL "should be examined by scourging", he asked, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?"

The phrase gained an English fame from the peroration of Palmerston's great speech in the House of Commons (24 June, 1850) over the Don PACIFICO affair: "As the Roman, in days of old, held himself free from indignity, when he could say Civis Romanus sum, so also a British subject, in whatever land he may be, shall feel confident that the watchful eye and the strong arm of England will protect him against injustice and wrong."

Civvies. Civilians or civilian clothes as opposed to military uniform. See MUFTI.

Civvie Street (siv' i). The usual term by which members of the armed services refer to civilian life.

Clabber Napper's Hole. Near Gravesend; said to be named after a FREEBOOTER; but more likely the Celtic Caerber l'arber (water-town lower camp).

Clack Dish. A dish or basin with a movable lid. Some two or three centuries ago, beggars used to proclaim their want by clacking the lid of a wooden dish.

Can you think, I get my living by a bell and clack-dish?—

How's that?

Why, begging, sir?

THOMAS MIDDLETON: Family of Love (1608).

Clam. A bivalve mollusc like an oyster, which burrows in sand or mud. In America especially, clams are esteemed a delicacy and are gathered only when the tide is out. Hence the saying, "Happy as a clam at high tide." The word is also used as slang for the mouth, and for a close-mouthed person.

Close as a clam. Mean, close-fisted; from the difficulty with which a clam is made to open its shell.

Clameur de Haro. See HARO.

Clan. This is from the mediæval Latin planta, a branch. The prevalent idea that the Scottish Highland clan consisted of the chief of a family and his followers, related by ties of kinship and bearing his name, is unsound. It comprised the chief and his followers irrespective of descent, and only in its narrowest sense applies to the chief, his family, and kindred. The legal power and hereditary jurisdiction of the head of a clan was abolished in 1747 after the '45 Rebellion. The phrase a gathering of the clans implies any assembly of like-minded persons, usually for convivial purposes.

Clan-na-Gael (Klän ná gäl'). An Irish FENIAN organization founded in Philadelphia in 1881, and known in secret as the "United Brotherhood". Its object was to secure "the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain, and the complete severance of all political connexion between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland".

Clancy of the Overflow. The hero of Bush Ballads by A. B. (Banjo) Paterson (1864-1941), author of the words of WALTZING MATILDA. Clancy may have been drawn in part from T. M. Macnamara, a first-class shot, horseman and bushman, who died in 1943 at the age of 94.

Clapham Sect. The name bestowed by Sydney Smith upon the group of EVANGELICALS with common social and political interests who lived in Clapham at the end of the 18th and in the early 19th centuries. William Wilberforce (1759-1833) the ABOLITIONIST was their leader. Henry Thornton the banker, Zachary Macaulay, and James Stephen were among his close associates. Their opponents derisively called them "the Saints".

Clapperclaw. To jangle, to claw or scratch; to abuse, revile; originally meaning to claw with a clapper of some sort.

Now they are clapper-clawing one another; I'll go look on.

SHAKESPEARE: Troilus and Cressida, V, iv.

Clapper-dudgeon. An ABRAM-MAN, a beggar from birth. The clapper is the tongue of the bell, and in CANT language the tongue. Dudgeon is the hilt of a dagger; and perhaps the original meaning is one who knocks his clap dish or CLACK DISH with a dudgeon.

Clap-trap. Something introduced to win applause: something really worthless but sure to take with the groundlings. A trap to catch applause.

Claque (kläk). A body of hired applauders at a theatre, etc.; said to have been originated or first systematized by a M. Sauton, who, in 1820, established in Paris an office to secure the success of dramatic performances. The manager ordered the required number of claqueurs, who were divided into commissaires, those who commit the piece to memory, and noisily point out its merits; rieurs, who laugh at the puns and jokes; pleureurs, chiefly women who hold their handkerchiefs to their eyes at the emotional parts; chatouilleurs, who are to keep the audience in good humour; and bisseurs, who are to cry BIS (encore). Claque is also the French for an opera-hat. Thackeray thus uses it.

A gentleman in black with ringlets and a tuft stood gazing fiercely about him, with one hand in the armhole of his waistcoat and the other holding his claque.—Pendennis, ch. xxv.

Clare. County Clare Election. The famous election of 1828 which resulted in the return of the CATHOLIC candidate, Daniel O'Connell, and which brought about the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829.

Clare, Order of St. A religious order of women founded in 1212, the second that St. Francis instituted. The name derives from their first abbess, Clare of Assisi. The nuns are also called Clarisses, Poor Clares, Minorettes, or Nuns of the Order of St. Francis. See FRANCISCANS.

Clarenceux King of Arms (klär' en sü). The second of the three English Kings of Arms, under the head of the College of Arms, having jurisdiction over the counties east, west, and south of the Trent. The office was instituted by the Duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. See HERALDRY.

Clarendon Code. The famous four acts passed by the CAVALIER PARLIAMENT, named after the King's minister, the Earl of Clarendon, although he was not their originator. They comprise the Corporation Act (1661), the Act of Uniformity (1662), the Conventicle Act (1664), and the Five-Mile Act (1665). They were directed against the NON-CONFORMISTS.

Clarendon type. A bold-faced condensed type, such as that used for a CATCHWORD or words.

The Constitutions of Clarendon. Laws made by Henry II at a council held at Clarendon in Wiltshire in 1164, to check the power of the Church and to restrain the prerogatives of ecclesiastics. These sixteen ordinances defined the limits of the patronage and jurisdiction of the POPE in England.

Claret. The English name for the red wines of Bordeaux, originally the yellowish or light red wines as distinguished from the white wines. The name (which is not used in France) is the O.Fr. claret, diminutive of clair, from Lat. clarus, clear. The colour receives its name from the wine.

Claret cup. A drink made of claret, brandy, lemon, borage, sugar, ice, and carbonated water. See BADMINTON.

To broach one's claret, or to tap one's claret jug. To give one a bloody nose. See BADMINTON.

Claribel. The pen-name of Mrs. Charlotte Alington-Barnard (1830-1869), writer of many one-time popular ballads, the best known being Come back to Erin.

Clark(e). Nobby Clark(e) is the popular name used by British army and naval personnel for every man of the name of Clark(e). It originated in the dressy or "NOBBY" turn-out affected by clerks and other blackcoated workers of the early 19th century.

Clary Water. A cordial of bygone days made from an infusion of the flowers of wild sage or clary in brandy, flavoured with cinnamon.

Classics. The best authors. The Romans were divided by Servius into five classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicus, all the rest were said to be infra classem (unclassified). From this the best authors were termed classici auctores (classic authors), i.e. authors of the best or first class. The high esteem in which Greek and Latin authors were held at the RENAISSANCE obtained for these authors the name of classic. When other first-rate works are intended some distinctive name is added, as the English, French, Spanish, etc., classics.

Classic Races. The five chief horse-races in England, all for three-year-olds, namely: The One Thousand Guineas (fillies only), and the Two Thousand Guineas (fillies and colts), both run at Newmarket; the OAKS, the DERBY, and the ST. LEGER.

Claude Lorraine (i.e. of Lorraine). This incorrect form is generally used in English for the name of Claude Gellée (1600-1682), the French landscape painter, born at Chamagne in Lorraine.

Clause Rolls. See CLOSE ROLLS.

Clavie. Burning of the Clavie on New Year's Eve (old style) in the village of Burghead, on the southern shore of the Moray Firth. The clavie is a sort of bonfire made of casks split up. One of the casks is split into two parts of different sizes, and an important item of the ceremony is to join these parts together with a huge nail made for the purpose. Whence the name, from clavus (Lat.), a nail. Chambers in his Book of Days (vol. II, p. 789) minutely describes the ceremony and suggests that it is a relic of DRUID worship. The two unequal divisions of the cask possibly symbolize the unequal parts of the old and new year.

Claw. Claw me I will claw thee. "Praise me, and I will praise you", or "scratch my back, and I'll scratch yours". To claw meaning to tear or scratch, formerly also meant to stroke or tickle; hence to please, flatter or praise.

Laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour.

SHAKESPEARE: Much Ado About Nothing, 1, iii.

Claw-backs. Flatterers. Bishop Jewel (1522-1571) speaks of "the Pope's claw-backs".

Clay, Feet of. An unexpected flaw in the character of a person of good repute. The phrase arises from the image in Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Daniel ii, 31, 32) of which the head was of gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet of iron and clay.

Clean. Free from blame or fault.

Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me.—Psalms li, 10.

Used adverbially, it means entirely, wholly; as "you have grown clean out of knowledge", i.e. wholly beyond recognition.

Contricioun hadde clene forgotten to crye and to wepe.—Piers Plowman, xx.

The people were passed clean over Jordan.
Joshua iii, 17.

A clean tongue. Not abusive, not profane, not addicted to swearing.

To clean down. To sweep down, to swill down.

To clean out. To purify, to make tidy. Also, to win another's money till his pocket is quite empty; to completely impoverish someone. De Quincey says that Richard Bentley, after his lawsuit with Dr. Colbatch, "must have been pretty well cleaned out".

To clean up. To wash up, to put in order; to wash oneself.

To have clean hands. To be quite clear of some stated evil. Hence to keep the hands clean, not to be involved in wrongdoing; and "clean handed".

He that hath clean hands and a pure heart.
Psalms xxiv, 4.

To live a clean life. To live blameless and undefiled.

To make a clean breast of it. To make a full and unreserved confession.

To make a clean sweep. To dispose completely of anything; to get rid of materials, methods or staff regarded as obsolete or redundant. See under BROOM.

To show a clean bill of health. See BILL.

To show a clean pair of heels. To run away, to make one's escape by superior speed. Here clean means free from obstruction.

Clean and unclean animals. Among the Jews of the Old Testament (see Lev. xi) those animals which chew the cud and part the hoof were clean, and might be eaten. Hares and rabbits could not be eaten because (although they chew the cud) they do not part the hoof. Pigs and camels were unclean, because (although they part the hoof) they do not chew the cud. Birds of prey were accounted unclean. Fish with fins and scales were accounted fit food for man.

According to PYTHAGORAS, who taught the doctrine of the TRANSMIGRATION OF THE SOUL, it was lawful for man to eat only those animals into which the human soul never entered, the others being held unclean. This notion existed long before the time of Pythagoras, who learnt it in Egypt.

Cleanliness is next to godliness. An old saying, quoted by John Wesley (Sermon xcii, On Dress), Matthew Henry, and others. The origin is said to be found in the writings of Phinehas ben Yair, an ancient rabbi.

Clear (verb). To be quite cleared out. To have spent all one's money; to have nothing left. Cleared out means, my purse or pocket is cleared out of money.

To clear an examination paper. To floor it, to answer every question.

To clear away. To remove, to melt away, to disappear.

To clear for action. To prepare for action, TO CLEAR THE DECKS.

To clear off. To make oneself scarce, to remove oneself or something.

To clear out. To eject; to empty out, to make tidy, to make off.

To clear out for Guam. An obsolete shipping phrase; used when a ship was bound for no specific port. In the height of the gold rushes ships carried passengers to Australia without making arrangements for return cargoes. They were, therefore, obliged to leave Melbourne in ballast, and to sail in search of homeward freights. The Customs regulations required that some port should be specified on clearing outwards, so it became the habit of captains to name Guam (a small island of the Ladrone group) as their hypothetical destination.

To clear the air. To get rid of sultriness, oppressiveness, etc.; figuratively, to remove misunderstandings or ambiguities of a situation, argument, etc.

To clear the court. To remove all strangers, or persons not officially concerned in the suit.

To clear the customs. To have been inspected and dealt with by the customs officers.

To clear the decks. To remove everything not required, especially when preparing for action; playfully used of eating everything available on the table at meal-times.

To clear the dishes. To empty them of their contents, or TO CLEAR THE TABLE.

To clear the land. As a nautical phrase means to have good SEA ROOM, to escape from the land.

To clear the room. To remove from it every thing or person not required.

To clear the table. To remove what has been placed upon it.

To clear up. To become fine after rain or cloudiness; to make manifest; to elucidate what was obscure; to tidy up.

Clear (adjective). Used adverbially, clear has much the same force as the adverb CLEAN—wholly, entirely: as, "He is gone clear away", "Clear out of sight".

A clear day. An entire, complete day. "The bonds must be left three clear days for examination", means that they must be left for three days not counting the first or last. It also means a cloudless day, or one free from engagements.

A clear head. A mind that is capable of understanding things clearly.

A clear statement. A straightforward and intelligible statement.

A clear style (of writing). A lucid method of expressing one's thoughts.

A clear voice. A voice of pure intonation, neither husky, mouthy, nor throaty.

Clear grit. The right spirit, real pluck; the genuine article, the real thing. A phrase of American origin.

In Canadian politics of the early 1880s the radicals were called Clear-grits.

Clearing House. The office or house where bankers do their "clearing", that is, the exchanging of bills and cheques and the payment of balances, etc. In LONDON, the bankers' clearing house has been in Lombard Street since 1775. Each bank sends to it daily all the bills and cheques not drawn on its own firm; these are sorted and distributed to their respective houses, and the balance is settled by transfer tickets. A clearing banker is a banker who has the ENTRÉE of the CLEARING HOUSE.

Similarly the railway companies formed a clearing house to organize through traffic on each others' lines and to adjust payment. Other examples are those existing for sorting out and passing on applications to the various teacher training colleges and universities.

Cleave. Two quite distinct words, the one meaning to stick to, and the other to part asunder. A man "shall cleave to his wife" (Matt. xix, 5), the former, is the O.E. clifian, to stick to; as one that "cleaveth wood" (Ps. cxli, 7), the latter, is cleofan, to split.

Cleft stick, To be caught in a. Figuratively to be caught in two awkward situations which combine to embarrass one. The form of torture inflicted on ARIEL by the witch Sycorax in SHAKESPEARE'S The Tempest (I, ii) was to confine him in the trunk of a cleft pine tree.

Clement, St. Patron SAINT of tanners, being himself a tanner. His day is 23 November, and his symbol is an anchor, because he is said to have been martyred by being thrown into the sea tied to an anchor.

Clench, and clinch. The latter is a variant of the former, which is the M.E. clenchen, from O.E. (be-) clencan, to hold fast. In many uses the two words are practically synonymous, meaning to grasp firmly, to fasten firmly together, to make firm; but clench is used in such phrases as "he clenched his fists", "he clenched his fingers firmly to endure the pain", "to clench one's teeth"; while clinch is used in the more material senses, such as to turn the point of a nail in order to make it fast, and also in the phrase "to clinch an argument". In business "to clinch a deal" is to settle it, to make it certain.

That was a clincher. That argument was not to be gainsaid; that remark drove the matter home, and fixed it.

Cleopatra (klè ò pāt' rà). (69-30 B.C.). She was Queen of Egypt, being joint ruler with and wife of her brother Ptolemy Dionysius. In 48 B.C. she was driven from the throne, but was reinstated in 47 by Julius Cæsar, by whom she had a son. In 41 Mæc Antony fell under her spell and repudiated his wife Octavia. When he was defeated at Actium by Octavian, he committed suicide, and Cleopatra is supposed to have killed herself by means of the bite of an asp.

Cleopatra and her pearl. It is said that Cleopatra gave a banquet for Antony at Alexandria, the costliness of which excited his astonishment. When Antony expressed his surprise she took a pearl ear-drop and dissolved it in her drink, the further to impress him.

A similar story is told of Sir Thomas Gresham when Queen Elizabeth I visited the ROYAL EXCHANGE. He is said to have pledged her health in a cup of wine in which a precious stone worth £15,000 had been crushed to atoms.

Heywood refers to this in his play If you know not me you know nobody (1604):

Here fifteen thousand pounds at one clap goes
Instead of sugar; Gresham drinks the pearl
Unto his queen and mistress.

Cleopatra's Needle. The OBELISK so called, now on the Thames Embankment, was brought from Alexandria in 1877, whither it and its fellow (now in Central Park, New York) had been moved from Heliopolis by Augustus about 14 B.C. It has no connexion with Cleopatra other than having been in her capital, Alexandria, and was originally set up by Thotmes III about 1500 B.C.

Cleopatra's nose. Blaise Pascal (1623-1662) wrote, "If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter, the whole face of the earth would have been changed" (Pensées viii, 29). The allusion is to the momentous effects of her conquest, through her charm and beauty, first of Julius Cæsar, then of Mark Antony.

Clergy. Ultimately from Gr. kleros, a lot or inheritance, with reference to Deut. xviii, 21 and Acts i, 17; thus, the men of God's lot or inheritance. In St. Peter's First Epistle (ch. v, 3) the Church is called "God's heritage" or lot. In the Old Testament the tribe of Levi is called the "lot or heritage of the Lord".

Clergy, Benefit of. See BENEFIT.

Clerical Titles. Clerk. In remote times the clergyman was usually one of the few who could read and write, so the word clerkial, as used in "clerkial error", came to mean an orthographical error. As the respondent in church was able to read, he received the name of clerk, and the assistants in writing, etc., were so termed in business (Late Lat. clericus, a clergyman).

Curate. One who has the cure of souls in a parish. Properly a rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, but the word curate is now generally used to denote an "assistant" curate or unbeneficed clergyman.

Parson. The same word as person. As Blackstone says, a parson is "persona ecclesiae", one that hath full rights of the parochial church".

Though we write "parson" differently, yet 'tis but "person"; that is the individual person set apart for the service of such a church, and 'tis in Latin persona, and personatus is a parsonage. Indeed with the canon lawyers, personatus is any dignity or preferment in the church.

SELDEN: Table-talk.

Rector. One who received the great TITHES. From Lat. rector, a ruler—the man who rules and guides the parish.

Vicar. Originally one who does the "duty" of a parish for the owner or owners of the tithes (Lat. vicarius, a deputy). Perpetual Curates are now termed Vicars.

The French curé equals our vicar, and their vicaire our curate.

In the U.S.A. a vicar is the priest of a chapel, dependent on a church.

Chapel vestments. White. Emblem of purity, worn on all feasts, saints' days, and sacramental occasions.

Red. The colour of blood and of fire, worn on the days of martyrs, and on WHIT SUNDAY, when the HOLY GHOST came down like tongues of fire.

Green. Worn on days which are neither feasts nor fasts.

Purple. The colour of mourning, worn on ADVENT Sundays, in LENT, and on EMBER DAYS.

Black. Worn on GOOD FRIDAY, and when masses are said for the dead.

Clerihew (kler' i hü). The name given to a particular kind of humorous verse invented by E. Clerihew Bentley. It is usually satirical and often biographical, consisting of four rhymed lines of uneven length. For inclusion in this Dictionary Mr. Bentley suggested the following:

It was a weakness of Voltaire's
To forget to say his prayers,
And one which, to his shame,
He never overcame.

He also wrote:

Sir Christopher Wren
Said "I'm going to dine with some men.
If anyone calls,
Say I'm designing St. Paul's."

Clerk-ale. See CHURCH-ALE.

Clerk of the Weather. A humorous personification of whatever forces govern the weather.

Clerkenwell (klar' en wel). At the holy well in this district the parish clerks of LONDON used to assemble yearly to play some sacred piece.

Clew up. To draw up the lower ends of square sails to the upper yard ready for furling. Figuratively, to finish something completely, to tie it up leaving no loose ends.

Clicquot (klē kō). A nickname of Frederick William IV of Prussia (1795-1861), so called from his fondness for champagne, in allusion to the well-known brand, Veuve Clicquot. See WIDOW.

Cliff-hanger. Figuratively, a state of affairs producing anxiety. From the early serial adventure films where the hero was often left in such a hazardous plight in order to whet the cinema-goer's appetite for the next instalment.

Climacteric (kli māk' tér ik). It was once believed by astrologers that the 7th and 9th years, with their multiples, especially the odd multiples (21, 27, 35, 45, 49, 63, and 81), were critical points in life; these were called the Climacteric Years and were presided over by SATURN, the malevolent planet. 63, which is produced by multiplying 7 and 9 together, was termed the Grand Climacteric, which few persons succeeded in outliving.

Climate of Opinion. The way people in general think and feel about matters, the state of opinion. A hackneyed vogue phrase much used in political speeches and writings of the mid-20th century.

Climb down, To. To abandon as untenable an attitude or opinion that one has hitherto vigorously supported.

Clinch, Clincher. See CLENCH.

Clink. Slang term for prison, derived from the famous gaol, the Clink in SOUTHWARK, destroyed in the Gordon Riots of 1780.

Clio (kli' ō). One of the nine MUSES, the inventress of historical and heroic poetry, the Muse of history. Hence the pun, "Can Clio do more than amuse?"
Addison adopted the name as a pseudonym, and many of his papers in the Spectator are signed by one of the four letters in this word, probably the initial letters of where they were written—of Chelsea, LONDON, Islington, Office. Cp. NOTARIKON.

Clip-joint. A night club or place of entertainment where patrons are grossly overcharged or cheated, i.e. clipped.

Clipper. A fast sailing-ship, first built at Baltimore about 1830; in Smyth's Sailors Word Book (1867) described as "formerly applied to the sharp-built raking schooners of America, and latterly to Australian passenger-ships" (see CUTTY SARK). The name was applied in the mid-20th century to a transatlantic flying-boat. She's a clipper. Said of a stylish or beautiful woman.

Clippie (klip' i). A popular nickname for bus conductresses during and since World War II, since they clipped or punched the tickets.

Cliveden Set. The name given to the right-wing politicians and journalists who gathered for week-end parties in the late 1930s at Cliveden, the country home of Lord and Lady Astor in Buckinghamshire. They were alleged to favour the appeasement of NAZI Germany.

Cloacina (klō a sí' ná). (Lat. cloaca, a sewer) Goddess of sewers.

Then Cloacina, goddess of the tide,
Whose sable streams beneath the city glide,
Indulged the modish flame: the town she roved,
A mortal scavenger she saw, she loved,
GAY: Trivia, II.

Cloak and Sword Plays. Swashbuckling plays, full of fighting and adventure. The name comes from the comedies of the 17th-century Spanish dramatists, Lope de Vega and Calderón—Comedias de capa y espada. With them it signified merely a drama of domestic intrigue and was named from the rank of the chief characters, but in France (and, through French influence, in England) it was applied as above. They are also called cloak and dagger plays. The intrigues, undercover and often melodramatic activities of those involved in espionage, etc., are similarly called cloak and dagger operations.

Clock. So church bells were once called (Ger. Glocke: Fr. cloche: Med. Lat. cloca).

The tale about St. Paul's clock striking thirteen is given in Walcott's Memorials of Westminster, and refers to John Hatfield, a soldier of William III's reign who died in 1770, aged 102. Accused before a court martial of falling asleep on duty upon Windsor Terrace, he asserted in proof of his innocence that he heard St. Paul's strike thirteen. His statement was confirmed by several witnesses.

Another strange incident is related concerning BIG BEN. On the morning of Thursday, 14 March, 1861, "the inhabitants of Westminster were roused by repeated strokes of the new great bell, and most persons supposed it was for the death of a member of the royal family. It proved, however, to be due to some derangement of the clock, for at four and five o'clock ten and twelve strokes were struck instead of the proper number." Within twenty-four hours of this the Duchess of Kent (Queen Victoria's mother) was declared to be dying and early on the 16th she was dead.

To put the clock back. To revert to an earlier practice or way of life; also to set the hands of a clock at the end of DAYLIGHT SAVING.

To put the clock on. To put forward the hands of a clock at the commencement of a period of DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Clockwork. Like clockwork. Used of any enterprise that runs as planned, without any hitch.

Clodhopper. A rustic, a farm labourer, who hops or walks among the clods.

Infantry are called "clodhoppers" or "footsloggers", because they have to walk.

Clog Almanac. A primitive almanac or calendar, originally made of a four-square "clog" or log of wood. The sharp edges were divided by notches into three months each, every week being marked by a bigger notch. The faces contained the saints' days, the festivals, the phases of the moon, and so on, sometimes in Runic characters (See RUNE), whence the clog was also called a "Runic Staff". They are not uncommon and specimens may be seen in the BRITISH MUSEUM, the BODLEIAN, the ASHMOLEAN, and elsewhere.

Clogs to clogs is only three generations is an old Lancashire saying, implying that however a man may prosper and raise himself from poverty, his grandson will be wearing clogs, and back to the condition the family started from.

Cloister. He retired into a cloister, he entered a monastery. Most monasteries had a cloister or covered walk, which generally occupied three sides of a quadrangle. Hence cloistered, confined, withdrawn from the world in the manner of a recluse.

I cannot praise a fugitive, and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat.—MILTON: Areopagitica.

Cloutie, Auld Cloutie. OLD NICK (see NICK). The Scots call a cloven hoof a clout, so that Auld Cloutie is Old Clovenfoot.

And maybe Tam, for a' my cants,
My wicked rhymes an' drucken rants
I'll gie auld Cloven Cloutie's haunts
An unco sly yet,
An' snugly sit among the saunts

At Davie's hip yet!
BURNS: Reply to a Trimming Epistle.

Cloutz, Baron Jean Baptiste. See ANACHARSIS.

Close Rolls. CHANCERY enrolments of royal letters closed with the GREAT SEAL. Close writs date from 1204 but in the 16th century the Close Rolls came to consist only of private deeds, enclosure awards, etc. They ceased in 1903. Cp. PATENT ROLLS.

Close Shave. A narrow escape; a figure based on the extremely small margin between a smooth, closely shaven skin and a painful gash.

Close-time for Game. See SPORTING SEASONS.

Closed Shop. See SHOP.

Closure. The ending of a HOUSE OF COMMONS debate by a member moving "that the question be now put". The chair is not bound to accept the motion. The procedure was derived from the French clôture and first used by Speaker Brand in 1881 against Parnell and his Irish obstructionists, consequent upon the famous sitting of February 1881 which lasted from 4 p.m. Monday until 9.30 a.m. on the following Wednesday. See FILIBUSTER; GUILLOTINE; KANGAROO.

Cloth, The. Once applied to the customary garb of any calling and similar in usage to the word LIVERY. In the 17th century it became restricted to the CLERGY and clerical office. Thus we say "having respect for the cloth".

Cloth of Gold, Field of. See FIELD.

Cloth-yard. A measure for cloth, slightly differing from the yard of today.

Cloth-yard shaft. An arrow a cloth-yard in length.

Clotho. (Gr. klotho, to draw thread from a distaff). One of the three FATES in classic mythology. She presided over birth and drew from her distaff the thread of life. See ATROPOS; LACHESIS.

Cloud. A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes. A white spot is called a star, and an elongated star is a BLAZE.

Agrippa: He [Antony] has a cloud in's face.

Enobarbus: He were the worse for that, were he a horse.

SHAKESPEARE: Antony and Cleopatra, III, ii.

A clouded cane. A malacca cane clouded or mottled from age and use. These canes were very popular in the first quarter of the 18th century and earlier.

Sir Plume of amber snuff-box justly vain,
And the nice conduct of a clouded cane,
POPE: Rape of the Lock, iv, 123.

Cloud-Cuckoo-Land. The Nephelococcygia of The Birds, by Aristophanes; an imaginary city built in the air by the birds. Hence any impractical Utopian scheme.

Every cloud has a silver lining. There is some redeeming brightness in the darkness prospect; while there is life there is hope.

He is in the clouds. In dreamland; entertaining visionary notions and so having no distinct idea about the matter in question.

He is under a cloud. Under suspicion, in disrepute.

The Battle above the Clouds. A name given to the battle of Lookout Mountain, part of the battle of Chattanooga, fought during the American CIVIL WAR, on 24 November, 1863. The Union forces defeated the Confederates and part of the fighting took place in a heavy mist on the mountains, hence the name.

To blow a cloud. See BLOW.

Cloven Foot. To show the cloven foot, or hoof. i.e. to show a knavish intention; a base motive. The allusion is to SATAN, represented with the legs and feet of a goat. However disguised he could never conceal his cloven feet. See CLOOTIE.

Clover. He's in clover. In luck, in prosperous circumstances, in a good situation. The allusion is to cattle feeding in fields of clover.

Clown. The clown of circus and PANTOMIME, in his baggy costume, whitened face, grotesque red lips, and odd little tuft of black hair is probably a relic of the DEVIL as he appeared in mediæval miracle plays. He is the descendant of many court fools and jesters. Of all the clowns, Joseph Grimaldi (1779-1837), and the Swiss "Grock", Adrien Wettach (1880-1959), were outstanding. See HARLEQUIN.

Club. In England the club has played an important part in social life. John Aubrey (1626-1697) says "we now used the word clubbe for a sodality in a tavern". Some were political, such as the ROTA, the OCTOBER, the GREEN RIBBON and the somewhat eccentric CALVES' HEAD CLUB; others more riotous like the MOHOCKS and the HELL FIRE CLUB. Clubs came into vogue in the reign of Queen Anne as is evidenced by the Tatler and Spectator. Dr. Johnson's Ivy Lane Club (1749) and the Literary Club (1764), which he founded with Sir Joshua Reynolds, set a new standard in social clubs where like-minded men of culture could meet and converse. The latter included Burke, Garrick, Goldsmith, and Boswell among its members. For many years clubs met in taverns and COFFEE houses and did not begin to occupy their own premises until the REGENCY. Many more sprang up in the early 19th century, some such as Watiers' (1806-1819) and CROCKFORD'S (1828-1844), being solely gaming clubs. The first exclusive modern ladies' club was the Alexandra (1883), to which no man was allowed admittance. Among the principal London clubs (with the dates of their foundation) are the following:

Army and Navy, 1838	Guards, 1813
ATHENÆUM, 1824	Junior Carlton, 1864
Bath, 1894	Lansdowne, 1935
BEERSTRAK, 1876	National Liberal, 1822
Boodle's, 1762	Reform, 1832
Brooks's, 1764	Savage, 1857
Carlton, 1832	Savile, 1868
Cavalry, 1890	Thatched House, 1865
Conservative, 1840	Travellers, 1819
Constitutional, 1883	United Services, 1815
Devonshire, 1875	White's, 1693
Garrick, 1831

Among the famous clubs associated with sport are:

M.C.C., 1787
Royal Aero, 1901

Royal Automobile, 1897
Turf, 1868

Clubs of many kinds have long been a common feature of national and provincial life among all classes and range from the serenity of the Athenæum to the less austere atmosphere of the STRIP-TEASE Club. See also CORDELIER; JACOBINS.

Club-bearer, The. In Greek mythology, Periphetes, the robber of Argolis, is so called because he murdered his victims with an iron club.

Club car. A railway carriage furnished as a lounge, often with a refreshment bar. Club cars, reserved for subscribing season ticket holders, were formerly provided on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway's business expresses between Blackpool and Manchester and by the London and North Western Railway between Llandudno and Manchester.

Club-land. That part of the West End of London centred around PALL MALL where the principal clubs are situated; also the members of such clubs.

Club-law. The law of might or compulsion through fear of chastisement; "might is right"; "do it or get a hiding".

Club men. The bands of rustics, formed in the southern and western counties in 1645 to resist the exactions of both CAVALIERS and ROUNDHEADS, were so called from their cudgels.

Club Parliament, or the Parliament of Bats, was held at Northampton in 1426, during the quarrel between the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort. Forbidden to bear arms by the Regent Bedford, the members came armed with clubs or "bats".

Club sandwich. An American term for a "three decker" sandwich, usually with different fillings between the layers.

Clue. I have not yet got the clue; to give a clue, i.e. a hint. A clue is a ball of thread (O.E. cleoven). The only way of finding the way out of the Cretan LABYRINTH was by a skein of thread, which, being followed, led the right way.

I haven't a clue. A colloquial usage meaning "I haven't an inkling", "I haven't the vaguest idea" (of what you are asking or talking about, etc.).

Cluricaune. An ELF in Irish folklore. He is of evil disposition and usually appears as a wrinkled old man. He has a knowledge of hidden treasure and is the fairies' shoemaker. Another name for him is LEPRE-CHAUN.

Clydesdale Horses. See SHIRE HORSES.

Clydesiders, The. A loosely attached group of left-wing M.P.s representing Glasgow and Clydeside constituencies, who enlivened British politics and Parliament from 1922 until they were much diminished in numbers by the 1931 election. Notable among them were John Wheatley, of Housing Act fame, Campbell Stephen, Emanuel Shinwell, and best known of all James Maxton who became chairman of the Independent LABOUR Party. They acted as a GINGER GROUP on the Labour Party and were notable champions of the poor and unemployed.

Clym of the Clough. A noted archer and outlaw, who, with Adam Bell and WILLIAM OF CLOUDESLEY, forms the subject of a ballad in PERCY'S RELIQUES. The three became as famous in the north of England as ROBIN HOOD and LITTLE JOHN in the midland counties. They were presumed to have lived before Robin Hood and abode in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. Clym of the Clough means Clement of the Cliff. He is mentioned in Ben Jonson's Alchemist (I, ii, 46).

Clytemnestra. In Greek legend, the faithless wife of AGAMEMNON. She was a daughter of Tyndarus and LEDA. See also ELECTRA.

Clytie. In classical mythology an ocean NYMPH, in love with APOLLO. She was deserted by him and changed into the heliotrope or sunflower, which, traditionally, still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Cnidian Venus, The. The exquisite statue of VENUS by Praxiteles, formerly in her temple at Cnidus. It is known through the antique reproduction now in the VATICAN.

Coach. When railways replaced horse-drawn road transport in the 1830s and 1840s they took over the old coaching terms as the steamship did from the days of sail. Carriage, coach, driver, guard, "Right away"! are all reminiscent of former coaching days.

To get on fast you took a coach. It is from this association that a private tutor or a sports trainer is called a coach, for it is his job to get his pupils trained as fast as possible.

A slow coach. A dullard, an unprogressive person.

To dine in the coach. In the captain's private apartment. The coach or couch of one of the old wooden battleships was the small compartment built on the aftmost part of the QUARTERDECK and under the poop.

To drive a coach and four through an Act of Parliament. To find a way of flagrantly ignoring or evading its provisions wholesale, thereby reducing it to an absurdity. In effect, to make it useless.

Coade Stone. An artificial stone of great durability and firmness of outline, much used from the 1770s until the 1830s for statues and ornamentations for buildings (CARYATIDS, keystone masks, friezes, vases, etc.) Made from a kind of frost-resistant terra-cotta, and presumably invented by the sculptor John Bacon (1740-1799), it was produced in Mrs. Eleanor Coade's factory at Lambeth (later the firm of Coade and Sealy). The huge red lion which has been a familiar figure on the SOUTH BANK since 1837 is an excellent example. The secret of its manufacture has been lost.

Coal. To blow the coals. To fan dissensions, to excite smouldering animosity into open hostility, as dull coals are blown into a blaze with a pair of bellows.

To call, or haul over the coals. To bring to task for shortcomings; to scold. At one time the Jews were "bled" whenever the kings or barons wanted money. One very common torture, if they resisted, was to haul them over the coals of a slow fire, to give them a "roasting". In Scott's Ivanhoe, Front-de-Bœuf threatens to haul Isaac over the coals.

To carry coals. To be put upon. "Gregory, o'my word, we'll not carry coals"—i.e. submit to be "put upon" (Romeo and Juliet, I, i). So in Every Man out of his Humour, "Here comes one that will carry coals, ergo, will hold my dog." The allusion is to the dirty, laborious occupation of charcoal carriers.

To carry coals to Newcastle. To do what is superfluous; to take something where it is already plentiful. The French say, "Porter de l'eau à la rivière" (to carry water to the river). ALCINOO POMA DARE is a Latin equivalent.

To heap coals of fire on one's head. To melt down one's animosity by deeds of kindness: to repay bad treatment with good.

If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink; for thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the Lord shall reward thee.

Prov. XXV, 21, 22.

To post the coal, or cole. See COLE.

Coal brandy. Burnt brandy. The old way to set brandy on fire was to drop in it a live or red-hot piece of charcoal.

Coaling, in theatrical slang, means telling phrases and speeches, as, "My part is full of coaling lines." Possibly from COLE (money), such a part being profitable.

Coalition Government. One formed of rival parties, usually in times of crisis, when party differences are set aside. Examples are those of Fox and North in 1783; of WHIGS and PEELITES under Aberdeen, 1852-1855; of CONSERVATIVES and LIBERAL-UNIONISTS under Salisbury 1895-1902; of LIBERALS, UNIONISTS, and LABOUR under Asquith 1915-1916 (re-formed under Lloyd George 1916-1922); Macdonald's NATIONAL GOVERNMENT, 1931-1935; and Winston Churchill's Coalition Government, 1940-1945.

Coast. The coast is clear. There is no likelihood of interference. It was originally a smuggling term, implying that no coastguards were about.

Coastal Eastern. The form of American English which has much the same relation to other variants of that language as Standard Received English has to variants in England. Both developed in those districts where academic and cultural influences were strongest.

Coasters. Vessels engaged in the coasting trade. Also travelling containers, often on castors or wheels, for passing food and drink (such as cheese, wine and beer) along large tables. They were commonly used in England in the 18th and early 19th centuries and some were elaborate representations of carts and other wheeled vehicles.

Coasting lead. A sounding lead used in shallow water.

Coasting waiter. An officer of Customs in the Port of London, whose duty it was to visit and make a return of coasting vessels which (from the nature of their cargo) were not required to report or make entry at the Custom House, but which were liable to payment of certain small dues. The coasting waiter collected these, and searched the cargo for contraband. Like TIDE WAITERS, they were abolished in the latter part of the 19th century and their duties taken over by the examining officer.

Coat. Coat Card. See COURT CARDS.

Cut your coat according to your cloth. Curtail your expenses to the amount of your income; live within your means. Si non possis quod velis, velis id quod possis.

To baste someone's coat. To dust his jacket; to beat him.

To trail one's coat. To try deliberately to pick a quarrel. From an old Irish custom of trailing one's coat along the ground as a sign that the owner was prepared to fight anyone daring to tread on his coat-tails.

To wear the King's coat. To be a soldier.

Turning one's coat for luck. It was an ancient superstition that this was a charm against evil spirits. See TURNCOAT.

William found

A means for our deliverance: "Turn your cloaks",
Quoth hee, "for Pucke is busy in these oakes".
RICHARD CORBETT: (1582-1635) Iter Boreale.

Coat of Arms. Originally a linen or silken surcoat worn by KNIGHTS to protect their armour from the sun's heat, dirt, etc., with his arms embroidered upon it. The use of coats of arms probably began in the 12th century. In HERALDRY the coat of arms comprises shield, helmet, crest, mantling and supporters. The shield is the central part.

Cob. A short-legged, stout variety of horse, rather larger than a pony, from thirteen to nearly fifteen hands high. (See HAND.) The word means big, stout. It also meant a tuft or head (from cop), hence eminent, large, powerful. The cob of the county is the great boss thereof. A rich cob is a plutocrat. Hence also a male as a cob-swan.

Riding horses run between fifteen and sixteen hands in height, and carriage horses between sixteen and seventeen hands.

Cobalt. From the Ger. kobold, a GNOME, the demon of the mines. This metal, from which a deep blue pigment is made, was so called by miners partly because it was thought to be useless and partly because the arsenic and sulphur, with which it was found in combination, had bad effects on their health and on the silver ores. Its presence was therefore attributed to the mine demon.

Cobb and Co. The mail and passenger coach company whose fame is legendary in Australia. Founded by Freeman Cobb and three other Americans in 1854, during the Ballarat gold rush, they provided reliable and comfortable transport between Melbourne and Bendigo in American-built coaches. Later, under the ownership of James Rutherford, another American, the company absorbed or eclipsed rival firms and secured a monopoly throughout Victoria, New South Wales and Queensland. At the height of its prosperity the company covered 28,000 miles per week, but the growth of railway and motor transport brought inevitable decline, although the last run was made as late as 1924. Tales of the exploits of Cobb and Co.'s crack drivers are as exciting as any told of WELLS FARGO.

Behind six foaming horses, and lit by flashing lamps,
Old Cobb and Co., in royal state, went dashing past the camps.

HENRY LAWSON (1867-1922):
The Roaring Days.

Cobber (Austr.). A friend or companion; possibly from the old Suffolk to cob, to form a friendship.

Cobber Kain. Flying Officer E. J. Kain, D.F.C., the first New Zealand air ace, who was killed on active service in June 1940.

Cobbler. A drink made of sherry, sugar, lemon and ice. See COBBLER'S PUNCH.

This wonderful invention, sir, . . . is called a cobbler: Sherry cobbler, when you name it long, cobbler when you name it short.

DICKENS: Martin Chuzzlewit, xvii.

Also the name of a deep fruit pie with no bottom crust and a top crust resembling scone or plain cake dough. The name is possibly suggested by the resemblance of the uneven surface of the top crust to cobble stones.

A cobbler should stick to his last. Let no one presume to interfere in matters of which he is ignorant.

Ne supra crepidam sutor judicaret.
Pliny, xxv, x, 85.

There is the story of a cobbler who detected a fault in a shoe-latchet in a painting by Apelles. The artist rectified the fault. The cobbler then ventured to criticize the legs but Apelles answered, "Keep to your trade—you understand about shoes, but not about anatomy."

The Cobbler Poet. Hans Sachs of Nuremberg (1494-1576), prince of the MEISTERSINGERS of Germany. He was trained as a cobbler.

Cobbler's punch. Gin and water, with a little treacle and vinegar.

Cobbler's toast. Schoolboy's bread and butter, toasted on the dry side and eaten hot.

Cobham's Plot. See MAIN PLOT.

Coburg. A corded or ribbed cotton cloth made in Coburg (Saxony), or an imitation thereof. Chiefly used for ladies' dresses.

Also a type of round loaf, said to have been named in honour of the Prince Consort, who was of the House of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

Cobweb. To blow away the cobwebs. To clear one's mind by taking fresh air; to freshen oneself up.

Cock (noun). In classical mythology the cock was dedicated to APOLLO because it gives notice of the rising sun. It was also dedicated to MERCURY, because it summons men to business by its crowing; and to ÆSCULAPIUS, because "early to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy".

Mohammedan legend says that the Prophet found in the first heaven a cock of such enormous size that its crest touched the second HEAVEN. The crowing of this celestial bird arouses every living creature except man. When this cock ceases to crow, the Day of JUDGMENT will be at hand.

Peter Le Neve (1661-1729), English antiquary, affirms that a cock was the warlike ensign of the GOTHs and therefore used in GOTHIC churches for ornament.

The weathercock is a very old symbol of vigilance. As the cock heralds the coming of day, so does the weathercock tell the wise man what the weather will likely be.

A cock and bull story. A long, rambling, idle, or incredible yarn, a CANARD. The origin of the term is probably connected with the old fables in which cocks, bulls and other animals discoursed in human language. In Bentley's Boyle Lecture (1692) occurs the passage:

That cocks and bulls might discourse, and hinds and panthers hold conferences about religion.

The "hind and panther" allusion is an obvious reference to Dryden's poem (published five years before), and it is possible that "cocks and bulls" would have had some well-known meaning long since forgotten. The last words in Sterne's Tristram Shandy are:

Lord! said my mother, what is all this story about?

A Cock and a Bull, said Yorick—And one of the best of its kind, I ever heard.

The French equivalents are faire un coq à l'âne and un conte de ma mère l'oie (a mother goose tale). In Scotland a satire or lampoon, and also a rambling, disconnected story used to be called a cockalayne, direct from the Fr. coq à l'âne.

A cock of hay, or haycock. A small heap of hay thrown up temporarily (Ger. Kocke, a heap of hay; Norw. kok, a heap).

By cock and pie. We meet with cock's bones, cock's wounds, cock's mother, cock's body, cock's passion, etc., where there is no doubt that the word is a minced oath, and stands for God. The pie is the table or rule in the old Catholic office, showing how to find out the service for each day (from Med. Lat. pica).

By cock and pie, sir, you shall not away to-night.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, V, i.

Cock and Bottle, Cock and Pie. Both are PUBLIC HOUSE SIGNS. The latter is probably "The Cock and Magpie" and the former probably means that draught and bottled beer are sold on the premises (here cock would mean the tap).

Cock of the North. George, fifth Duke of Gordon (1770-1836), who raised the Gordon Highlanders in 1795, is so called on a monument erected to his honour at Fochabers in Morayshire.

The brambling, or mountain finch, is also known by this name.

Cock of the walk. The dominant bully or master spirit. The place where barn-door fowls are fed is the walk, and if there is more than one cock, they will fight for the supremacy of this domain.

Every cock crows on its own dunghill, or Ilka cock crows on its ain midden. It is easy to brag of your deeds in your own castle when safe from danger and not likely to be put to proof.

Nourish a cock, but offer it not in sacrifice. This is the eighteenth Symbolic Saying in the Protreptics of Iamblichus. The cock was sacred to MINERVA, and also to the SUN and MOON, and it would be impious to offer a sacrilegious offering to the gods. What is already consecrated to God cannot be employed in sacrifice.

That cock won't fight. That dodge won't answer; that tale won't wash. The allusion is to COCK-FIGHTING.

The red cock will crow in his house. His house will be set on fire.

"We'll see if the red cock craw not in his bonnie barnyard ae morning." . . . "What does she mean?" said Mannering . . . "Fire-raising," answered the . . . dominie—SCOTT: Guy Mannering, ch. iii.

To cry cock. To claim the victory; to assert oneself to be the superior. To assert oneself as COCK OF THE WALK.

Cock-boat. A small ship's boat; a very light or frail craft.

That now no more we can the maine-land see,
Have care, I pray, to guide the cock-bote well.
SPENSER: Faerie Queene, III, viii, 24.

This "cock-bote" is previously (III, vii, 27) called a "little bote" and a "shallop". Cokke or cocke is an obsolete word for a small boat, and is probably connected with cog, a mediæval cargo-ship, from Scan. kog, kogge, originally a wicker frame covered with leather, akin to the Welsh coracle.

Cock-crow. The Hebrews divided the night into four watches: (1) The "beginning of the watches" or "even" (Lam. ii, 10); (2) the "middle watch" or "midnight" (Judges vii, 19); (3) The "cock-crow"; (4) The "morning watch" or "dawning" (Exod. xiv, 24).

Ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crow, or in the morning.—Mark, xiii, 35.

The Romans divided the day into sixteen parts, each one hour and a half, beginning at midnight. The third of these divisions (3 a.m.) they called gallicinium, the time when cocks begin to crow; the next was conticinium, when they ceased to crow; and the fifth was diluculum, dawn.

If the Romans sounded the hour on a trumpet three times it would explain the diversity of the Gospels: "Before the cock crow" (John xiii, 38; Luke xxii, 34; Matt. xxvi, 34) and "Before the cock crow twice" (Mark xiv, 30)—that is, before the trumpet has finished sounding.

Apparitions vanish at cock-crow. This is a Christian superstition, the cock being the watch-bird placed on church spires, and therefore sacred.

The morning cock crew loud,
And at the sound it [the Ghost] shrunk in haste away,
And vanish'd from our sight.
SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, I, ii.

Cock-eye. A squint. Cock-eyed, having a squint; cross-eyed. It may mean that such an eye has to be cocked, as the trigger of a gun is cocked, before it can do its work effectively; or it may be from the verb to cock in the sense of "turning up" as in to cock the nose. Cock-eyed is also slang for nonsensical.

Cockfighting was a favourite sport with both Greeks and Romans and was introduced into Britain by the Romans.

From the 12th to the 19th century cockfighting and throwing at cocks was the sport of schoolboys on SHROVE TUESDAY and the triumphant boy, holding the winning bird in his hands, was sometimes carried aloft by some of his companions. This may be the origin of the old schoolboy phrase "cock of the school". THE COCKPIT at WHITEHALL was added by Henry VIII and the "royal diversion" was very popular with James I and Charles II. Cockfighting was made illegal in Britain in 1849. See also BATTLE ROYAL; WELSH MAIN.

That beats cockfighting. That is most improbable and extraordinary. The allusion is to the extravagant tales told of fighting cocks.

To live like fighting cocks. To live in luxury. Fighting cocks were highly fed to increase their mettle and powers of endurance.

Cock-horse. To ride a cock-horse. A cock-horse is really a HOBBY-HORSE, but the phrase means to sit astride a person's foot or knee while he jigs it up and down.

Cock Lane Ghost. A tale of terror without truth; an imaginary tale of horrors. In Cock Lane, Smithfield (1762), certain knockings were heard, which Mr. Parsons, the owner, declared proceeded from the ghost of Fanny Kent, who died suddenly. Parsons, with the hope of blackmail, wished people to suppose that she had been murdered by her husband. All London was agog with the story. Royalty and the nobility made up parties to go to Cock Lane to hear the ghost. Dr. Johnson and others of learning and repute investigated the alleged phenomena. Eventually it was found that the knockings were made by Parson's eleven-year-old daughter rapping on a board which she took into her bed. Parsons was condemned to the pillory. Cp. STOCKWELL GHOST.

Cock Lorell's Bote. An imitation of Alexander Barclay's Ship of Fools (1509) published by Wynkyn de Worde about 1510. It satirized low-class life. Cock Lorell, a tinker, was the captain of a motley crew of rogues and vagabonds.

Cockpit. The arena in which game-cocks were set to fight; also the name of a theatre built about 1618 on the site of a cockpit in DRURY LANE. The after part of the orlop deck of an old man-of-war (formerly used as quarters for junior officers and as a sick-bay in battle), and the well of a small yacht where the helmsman sits, are also so called.

Captain Hardy, some fifty minutes after he had left the cock-pit, returned; and, again taking the hand of his dying commander, congratulated him on having gained a complete victory.

SOUTHEY: Life of Nelson, ch. ix.

In aeroplanes the space where the pilot sits is called the cockpit.

The judicial committee of the PRIVY COUNCIL was called the cockpit of Whitehall Palace.

Great consultations at the cockpit about battles, duels, victories, and what not.

Poor Robin's Almanack, 1730.

Cockpit of Europe. Belgium is so called because it has so frequently been the battleground of Europe, as is evidenced by Ramillies (1706); Oudenarde (1708); Fontenoy (1745); Fleurus (1794); Jemmapes (1792); Ligny, Quatre Bras and Waterloo (1815); Mons, Ypres and the continuous battles of World War I; the German invasion of 1940.

Cockshut, or Cockshut time. Twilight; The time when the cockshut (a large net to catch woodcocks) was spread. The net was so named from being used in a glade through which the woodcocks might shoot or dart.

Let me never draw a sword again,
Nor prosper in the twilight, cockshut light
When I would fleece the wealthy passenger . . .
If I, the next time that I meet the slave,
Cut not the nose from off the coward's face.
Arden of Feversham (1592), III, ii.

See also SHAKESPEARE's Richard III, V, iii.

Cockshy. A free fling or "shy" at something. The allusion is to the once popular SHROVE TUESDAY sport of shying or casting stones or sticks at cocks.

The phrase was popular in military circles in World War II, implying an ill-considered, ill-prepared attempt at something.

Cock sure. As sure as a cock, brazenly self-confident; meaning either "with all the assurance of a game-cock", or "as sure as the cock is to crow in the morning". Shakespeare uses it in the sense of "sure as the cock of a fire-lock".

We steal as in a castle, cock-sure.
Henry IV, Pt. I, II, i.

The phrase "sure as a gun" seems to favour the latter explanation.

Cock (verb). In the following phrases, all of which connote assertiveness, obtrusiveness, or aggressiveness in some degree, the allusion is to game-cocks, whose strutting about, swaggering, and ostentatious pugnacity is proverbial.

To cock the ears. To prick up the ears, or turn them as a horse does when he listens to a strange sound.

To cock the nose, or cock up the nose. To turn up the nose in contempt. See TO COCK YOUR EYE.

To cock up your head, foot, etc. To lift up or turn up your head or foot.

To cock your eye. To shut one eye and look with the other in a somewhat cheeky fashion; to glance at questioningly. Cp. COCK-BYE.

To cock your hat. To set your hat on one side of the head; to look knowing and pert.

To cock a snook. To make a long nose; to put the thumb to the nose and spread wide the fingers. See ANNE'S FAN.

Cock-a-hoop. Jubilant; exultant; as a cock crowing boastfully; but the saying may come from the fact that when the spigot or cock is removed from the beer barrel and laid on a hoop of the barrel, the beer flowed freely for jollity and high spirits.

Cocked hat. A hat with the brim turned, like that of a BISHOP, DEAN, etc. It is also applied to the CHAPEAU BRAS, and the military full-dress hat, pointed before and behind the rising to a point at the crown, the chapeau à cornes. Cock here means to turn; cocked, turned up.

Knocked into a cocked hat. To beat someone in a contest of skill, etc., by a wide margin. In the game of ninepins, three pins were set up in the form of a triangle and when all the pins except these three were knocked down, the set was said to be "knocked into a cocked hat".

Cockade (Fr. cocarde, a plume, rosette, or bunch of ribbons). A badge worn on the head-dress of menservants of Royalty, naval and military officers, diplomatists, lord-lieutenants, high sheriffs, etc. The English cockade is black and circular in shape with a projecting fan at the top, except for naval officers, for whom the shape is oval without the fan. This form was introduced from Hanover by George I; under Charles I the cockade was scarlet but Charles II changed it to white. Thus the white cockade became the badge of the House of Stuart; William III (as Prince of Orange) adopted an orange cockade.

To mount the cockade. To become a soldier.

Cockaigne, Land of (kok ān'). An imaginary land of idleness and luxury, famous in mediæval story. Ellis in his Specimens of Early English Poets gives an early translation of a 13th-century French poem called The Land of Cockaigne in which "the houses were made of barley sugar cakes, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods for nothing".

LONDON has been so called, with punning reference to COCKNEY. Boileau applies the name to Paris.

The name may well mean the "land of cakes", ultimately from Lat. coquere, to cook. Scotland is called the "land of cakes" (see under CAKE).

Cockatoo. Old Australian slang for a convict serving his sentence on Cockatoo Island, Sydney, which was first used for convicts in 1839. Also used for small farmers in Australia who were "just picking up the grains of a livelihood like cockatoos do maize".

Cockatrice. A fabulous and heraldic monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a DRAGON, and head of a cock; the same as BASILISK. Isaiah says, "The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den" (xi, 8), to signify that the most obnoxious animal shall not hurt the most feeble of God's creatures.

Figuratively, it means an insidious, treacherous person bent on mischief.

They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrices.—SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, III, iv.

Cocker. According to Cocker. All right according to Cocker. According to established rules, according to what is correct. Edward Cocker (1631-1675) published his Arithmetick which ran through over a hundred editions. The phrase was popularized by Murphy in his farce, The Apprentice (1756). Cp. GUNTER.

Cockle. Cockle-boat. See COCK-BOAT.

Cockle hat. A pilgrim's hat. Pilgrims used to wear cockle (scallop) shells on their hats, the symbol of St. JAMES of COMPOSTELA in Spain. This supposed shrine of James, the son of Zebedee, was especially favoured by English pilgrims. The polished side of the shell was scratched with some crude drawing of the Virgin, the Crucifixion, or some other object related to the pilgrimage. Being blessed by the priest, the shells were considered as amulets against spiritual foes, and might be used as drinking vessels.

How should I your true love know
From another one?
By his cockle hat and staff,
And by his sandal shoon.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, IV, v.

Cockle shell. A small boat or frail craft. See also COCKLE HAT.

Hot cockles. See HOT.

To cry cockles. To be hanged; from the gurgling noises made in strangulation.

To warm the cockles of one's heart. Said of good wine and anything which particularly warms and gratifies one's feelings (Lat. cochleæ cordis, the ventricles of the heart).

Cockney. This is the M.E. cokeney, meaning "a cock's egg" (-ey = O.E. æg, an egg), applied to the small malformed egg occasionally laid by young hens; hence applied to a foolish or spoilt child, or a simpleton.

I made thee a wanton and thou hast made me a fool. I brought thee up like a cockney and thou hast handled me like a cock's-comb, I made more of thee than became a father and thou less of me than beseemed a child.—LYLY: Euphues (1578).

The word then came to be applied by country folk, the majority of the population, to townfolk generally for their reputed ignorance of country life, customs and habits. Its restriction to Londoners, particularly those born within the sound of the bells of St. Mary-le-Bow, dates from the 17th century. It is also used to denote London peculiarities of speech.

As Frenchmen love to be bold, Flemings to be drunk, Welchmen to be called Britons, and Irish to be costermongers; so cockneys, especially she cockneys, love not aqua-vitae when 'tis good for them.

DEKKER AND WEBSTER:
Westward Hoe, II, ii (1607).

SHAKESPEARE uses the word for a squeamish woman.

Cry to it, nuncle, as the cockney did to the eels, when she put them i' the paste alive.

King Lear, II, iv.

The Cockney School. A nickname given by Lockhart to a group of writers including Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats. It was used derogatorily on account of the kind of rhymes they used in their verse, which smacked too much of everyday life instead of the classic purity preferred by the critics.

If I may be permitted to have the honour of christening it, it may be henceforth referred to by the designation of the "Cockney School".

LOCKHART: Blackwood's Magazine (Oct., 1817).

The King of Cockneys. A master of the revels chosen by the students of LINCOLN'S INN on CHILDERMAS Day.

Cocktail. An aperitif, or short drink taken before a meal, usually concocted of spirits, bitters, fruit-juice or other flavourings, etc. There are many varieties of the American appetizer. The origin of the name is uncertain but suggestions vary from "a tail that cocks up" and "the tail of a cock" to the name of an Aztec princess Xochitl, who is supposed to have given such a drink to the king with romantic results. Coquetel, a mixed drink from the wine-growing district of the Gironde, has also been suggested as a possible source.

Did ye iver try a brandy cocktail, Cornel?
THACKERAY: The Newcomes, xiii.

Coconut. Milk in the coconut. See MILK.

Cocqigrués. At the coming of the Cocqigrués. (kok' sé groo.) (More correctly coquecigrués.) Fabulous animals of French legend that have become labels for an idle story. In French the above phrase—à la venue des coquecigrués, means "NEVER".

"That is one of the seven things," said the fairy Bedonebyasyoudid, "I am forbidden to tell till the coming of the Cocqigrués."

C. KINGSLEY: The Water Babies, ch. vi.

Cocytus (ko si' tús). One of the five rivers of HELL, which flows into the ACHERON. The word means the "river of lamentation". The unburied were doomed to wander about its banks for 100 years.

Cod. You can't cod me. You can't take me in, or deceive me.

Codille (kò dil'). Triumph. In the game of OMBRE, when one of the two opponents of ombre has more tricks than ombre, he is said to have won codille and takes all the stakes for which ombre played. Thus, Belinda is said, in the Rape of the Lock, to have been "between the jaws of ruin and Codille". She wins with the "King of hearts", and she wins codille.

Coehorn, or Coehoorn. A small mortar named after Baron von Coehoorn of Holland (1641-1704), who was called the Dutch Vauban, after Louis XIV's famous siege engineer and fortifications expert, Sebastien Le Prestre de Vauban (1633-1707).

Cœlacanth (see' lēkanth). See FOURLEGS, OLD.

Cœnobites, or Cenobites (sen' ò bit) (Gr. koinos bios). Monks who live in common, in contradistinction to hermits or anchorites.

Cœur de Lion (kěr de lé' on). Richard I of England (1157, 1189-1199); called the lionhearted for his valour in the Third CRUSADE.

Coffee. From the Turkish form kahveh of the Arabic qahwah, the drink. The first coffee-house in England opened at Oxford in 1650 and the first in London about 1652. They soon became centres for social and political gossip and meeting places for the wits and literary men of the day. See also BUTTON'S COFFEE-HOUSE; CHOCOLATE; CLUB; LLOYD'S; WILL'S COFFEE-HOUSE.

I date all gallantry from White's; all poetry from Will's; all foreign and domestic news from St. James's, and all learned articles from the Grecian. SIR RICHARD STEELE: The Tatler, 12 April 1709.

Pousse café. Liqueur served after coffee. Also a drink of various liqueurs in layers in a glass.

Coffin. A raised pie crust, like the lid of a basket (Gr. kophinos, a basket). Hence Shakespeare speaks of a "custard-coffin" (Taming of the Shrew, IV, iii) meaning a custard under a crust. Also,

And of the paste a coffin I will rear.
Titus Andronicus, V, ii.

Coffin nail. A cigarette. An expression in use long before the association between cigarette smoking and lung cancer but probably connected with the risk to health.

To drive a nail into one's coffin. To do anything that would tend to hasten one's death, or finish one off, usually by annoyance and frustration.

Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt;
But every grin so merry draws one out.

PETER PINDAR: Expostulatory Odes, xv.

Cog. A boat. See COCK-BOAT.

Coggeshall (kog' shál). A Coggeshall job. Something foolish. It is said that the Coggeshall (Essex) folk wanted to divert the current of a stream, and so fixed hurdles in its bed. Another tale is that a mad dog bit a wheelbarrow, and the people, fearing its madness, chained it up in a shed. Cp. GOTHAM.

Cogito, ergo sum. The axiom formulated by Descartes (1596-1650) as the starting point of his philosophic system: it means, "I think, therefore I am." He provisionally doubted everything until he concluded that "I think" presupposed the existence of "I". See PETITIO PRINCIPII.

He [Descartes] stopped at the famous formula, "I think, therefore I am." Yet a little consideration will show this formula to be full of snares and verbal entanglements. In the first place, the "therefore" has no business there. The "I am" is assumed in the "I think", which is simply another way of saying "I am thinking". And, in the second place, "I think" is not one simple proposition, but three distinct assertions rolled into one. The first of these is "something called I exists"; the second is "something called thought exists"; and the third is, "the thought is the result of the action of the I".

Now it will be obvious to you, that the only one of these three propositions which can stand the Cartesian test of certainty is the second.

T. H. HUXLEY: Descartes' Discourse on Method.

Coif. Serjeants of the Coif. SERJEANTS-AT-LAW were so called from the close-fitting white lawn or silk cap once worn as a symbol of their rank (Ö.Fr. coife, a cap).

Coin. See ANGEL, BAWBEE, CAROLUS, CROSS AND PILE, CROWN, DOLLAR, FARTHING, FLORIN, GROAT, GUINEA, MANCUS, PENNY, PIECES OF EIGHT, SHILLING, SOVEREIGN, etc.

Paid in his own coin. TIT FOR TAT.

To coin a phrase. To invent a phrase. If it is a telling phrase it may gain currency, i.e. become popular and widespread.

To coin money. To make money with rapidity and ease.

Coke. Slang for cocaine.

Coke upon Littleton. Eighteenth-century slang for a mixture of tent (a deep-red Spanish wine) and brandy. Coke upon Littleton is the lawyers' name for the reprint and translation of Littleton's Tenures (first printed c. 1481), published in 1628 with a commentary by Sir Edward Coke (1552-1634).

To cry coke. To cry PECCAVI; to ask for mercy.

Colbronde, or Colbrand. The Danish giant slain by Guy of Warwick. By his death the land was delivered from Danish tribute.

I am not Samson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbrand,
To mow 'em down before me.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, V, iii.

Colcannon (köl kán' òn). Potatoes and cabbage pounded together and then fried in butter (Irish). "Col" is cole or cale, i.e. cabbage. Cp. BUBBLE AND SQUEAK.

About 1774 Isaac Sparks, the Irish comedian, founded in Long Acre a Colcannon Club.
The Athenæum, 20 January, 1875.

Colcannon Night. HALLOWEEN in parts of N.E. Canada, when it is traditional to eat this dish.

Cold. Cold as Charity. See CHARITY.

Cold blood. Done in cold blood (Fr. sang froid). Not in the heat of temper; deliberately, and with forethought. The allusion is to the old notion that the temperature of the blood ruled the temper.

Cold-blooded animals. As a rule, all invertebrates, and all fishes and reptiles, the temperature of their blood being about equal to the medium in which they live.

Cold-blooded people. Those not easily excited. Those with little feeling.

Cold chisel. A steel chisel made in one piece and so tempered that it will cut cold metal when struck with a hammer.

Cold shoulder. To show, or to give one the cold shoulder. To assume a distant manner, to indicate that you wish to cut someone.

Cold steel. The persuasion of cold steel. Persuasion enforced at the point of the sword or bayonet.

Cold war. The term applied to the state of tension between states which behave with marked distrust and hostility towards each other without recourse to actual fighting.

Cold-water ordeal. An ancient method of testing guilt or innocence. The accused, being tied under the arms, was thrown into a river. If he sank, he was held guiltless and drawn up by the cord; if he floated, the water rejected him because of his guilt.

Cold water. To pour cold water on. To discourage. To damp the fires of enthusiasm.

Cold without. An elliptical expression, meaning spirits mixed with cold water without sugar.

Cold Bath Fields. A district of CLERKENWELL, London, so called from the cold baths established there in 1697, for the cure of rheumatism, convulsions, and other nervous disorders. The Fields were famous for the prison which was established there in 1794 and closed in 1877. Leigh Hunt's brother, John, was an inmate from 1813 to 1815, for his part in an article ridiculing the Prince Regent. See ADONIS.

Coldbrand. See COLBRONDE.

Coldstream Guards. One of the five regiments of Foot Guards. General Monk's Regiment which crossed the border at Coldstream in Berwickshire to effect the RESTORATION of Charles II in 1660. It became the 2nd Regiment of Footguards in 1661 and in 1670 was officially called the Coldstream Guards.

Cole. An old canting term for money. Cp. COALING.

My lusty rustic, learn and be instructed. Cole is, in the language of the witty, money: the ready, the rhino.

SHADWELL: Squire of Alsatia, IV, xvi (1688).

To post, or tip the cole. To pay or put down the cash.

If he don't tip the cole without more ado, give him a taste of the pump, that's all.

HARRISON AINSWORTH: Jack Sheppard.

Cole, King. A legendary British king, described in the nursery rhyme as "a merry old soul" fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his fiddlers three. Robert of Gloucester says he was father of St. HELENA (and consequently grandfather of the Emperor Constantine). Colchester was said to have been named after him.

Colettines. See FRANCISCANS.

Colin Clout. A name which Spenser assumes as a shepherd's boy in The Shepheard's Calendar (1579), and in the pastoral Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595), which represents his return from a visit to Sir Walter Raleigh, "the Shepherd of the Ocean". Skelton had previously (c. 1520) used the name as a title of a satire directed against the abuses of the Church.

Colin Tampon. The old nickname of a Swiss, as JOHN BULL is of an Englishman. Cp. BROTHER JONATHAN; CRAPAUD.

Collaeum. See COLLOSSEUM.

Collar. Against the collar. Somewhat fatiguing. When a horse travels uphill the collar distresses his neck, so foot travellers often find the last mile or so "against the collar", or distressing.

Out of collar. Out of work, out of a place.

Collar-day. A day on which KNIGHTS of the different orders when present at LEVEES or other Court functions wear all their insignia and decorations, including the collar.

In the late 18th century it was a slang term for execution port.

Collar of S's. A decoration restricted to the Lord Chief Justice, the Lord Mayor of London, the Kings of Arms, the HERALDS, the SERJEANTS-AT-ARMS, and the Serjeant Trumpeter. It is composed of a series of golden S's joined together, and was originally the badge of the adherents of the House of Lancaster.

To collar. To seize (a person) by the collar; to steal; to appropriate without leave; to acquire (of possessions).

To collar the bowling. In CRICKET, to hit the bowling all over the field so that it becomes easier to score, through the bowlers losing their length.

To collar the cole. To steal the money. See COLE.

To slip the collar. To escape from restraint; to draw back from a task begun.

To work up to the collar. To work TOOTH AND NAIL; not to shirk the work in hand. A horse that lets his collar lie loose on his neck without bearing on it does not draw the vehicle at all, but leaves another to do the real work.

Dog-collar. See under DOG.

Spit and rub collar. A jocular term for the "celluloid" collar worn by clerics, which does not need laundering but can be cleaned by rubbing with a damp cloth.

White collar worker. See WHITE.

College. From Lat. collegium, a colleague; hence a body of colleagues with common duties and privileges, etc. In English the word has a wide range, as College of Surgeons, Heralds' College, College of Justice, College of Preceptors. It is most commonly used for a separate foundation of teachers and scholars within a university and for a wide range of educational institutions, including many schools.

In old slang a prison was known as a college, and the prisoners as collegiates. NEWGATE was "New College" and to take one's final degree at New College was to be hanged. The King's Bench Prison was "King's College" and so on.

College port. The vintage port laid down in university college cellars for the special use of the senior Common Room. The excellence of this is a source of college pride.

College pudding. A small, sweet, individual-sized pudding. The name may be an abbreviation of New College Pudding.

Colliberts. A sort of GYPSY race similar to the CAGOTS and CAQUEUX, living in boats, chiefly on the rivers of Poitou. In feudal times a collibert was a partly free serf but still bound to certain services (Lat. collibertus, a fellow freedman).

Collins. A word sometimes applied to the "thank you letter" one writes after staying at another person's house. In Pride and Prejudice Mr. Collins appears as a bore and a snob of the first water; after a protracted and unwanted visit at the Bennets' his parting words are: "Depend upon it, you will speedily receive from me a letter of thanks for this, as for every mark of your regard during my stay in Hertfordshire" (ch. xxi).

Tom Collins. See TOM.

Colly, my Cow. Colly is an old term of endearment for a cow and properly refers only to a polled cow (one deprived of its horns). It is from Scan. kolla, a beast without horns (Icel. kollr, a shaven crown).

Cologne (ko lōn'). The Three Kings of Cologne. The three Wise Men of the East, the MAGI, whose bones, according to mediæval legend, were deposited in Cologne Cathedral.

Eau de Cologne. See EAU DE COLOGNE.

Colonel. When an officer in the British Army is promoted to the rank of colonel he loses his regimental identity and becomes a member of the Staff Corps. The titular head of a regiment is also called the colonel and is usually a distinguished serving or retired General. The titular head of a Territorial Army regiment is called the Honorary Colonel.

Colonial Goose. A roast leg of mutton which has been boned and the cavity filled with a stuffing of onions, bread-crumbs and savoury herbs. A recipe intended to vary the monotony of too frequently recurring mutton on Australian sheep stations. Cp. BOMBAY DUCK; CAPE COD TURKEY.

Colophon. Originally, as the name implies, the tail-piece at the end of a book giving the printer's name, the date and place of printing, etc., sometimes with laudatory remarks designed to promote sales. It survives in the brief information usually given on the front or back of the title-page. The term is now loosely applied to a printer's or publisher's house device, such as LA BELLE SAUVAGE appearing on the title-page of this book.

Colophon, an Ionian city, was famed for its horsemen who were always reputed to turn the tide of battle by their last charge, hence this name for the final part of the book. To add a colophon means "to supply the finishing stroke".

Coloquintida, St. (col ō kwīn' tī dā). Charles I was so called by the LEVELLERS, to whom he was as bitter as gall or coloquintida (colocynth), the bitter-apple.

Colorado (U.S.A.). The river (and hence the State) was so named by the Spanish explorers from its coloured (i.e. reddish) appearance.

Colosseum (kol o sē' ūm). The great Flavian amphitheatre of ancient ROME, said to be named from the colossal statue of NERO that stood close by in the Via Sacra. It was begun by Vespasian in A.D. 72, and for 400 years was the scene of gladiatorial contests. The name has been since applied to other amphitheatres and places of amusement. Cp. PALLADIUM.

Colossus, or Colossos (ko los' ūs) (Lat. and Gr. for a giant statue). The bronze colossus of Rhodes, completed by Chares about 280 B.C., was a representation of the sun-god HELIOS, and commemorated the successful defence of Rhodes (305-304 B.C.) against Demetrius Poliorcetes. It was one of the Seven WONDERS of the World and probably stood some 100 ft. high. It was destroyed by an earthquake in 224 B.C. The story that it was built striding across the harbour and that ships could pass between its legs is of 16th-century origin and is not found in Strabo or Pliny's descriptions,

He doth bestride the narrow world
Like a Colossus.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Cæsar, I, ii.

Colour. A man of colour, or a coloured man, a Negro or one with Negro blood. His coward lips did from their colour fly. (Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, I, ii). He was unable to speak. As cowards run away from their regimental colour, so Cæsar's lips, when he was ill, ran away from their colour and turned pale.

I should like to see the colour of your money. I should like proof that you have any; I should like to be paid.

Off colour. Not up to the mark; run down; seedy. In the U.S.A. a risqué joke is called off colour.

To change colour. To blush; especially to look awkward and perplexed when found out in some deceit or meanness.

To colour up. To turn red in the face; to blush.

To give colour, or some plausible colour to the matter. To render it more plausible; to give it a more specious appearance.

To put a false colour on a matter. To misinterpret it, or put a false construction on it.

Under colour of. Under pretence of; under the alleged authority of.

Colours. Accidental colours. Those colours seen on a white ground after looking for some time at a bright object such as the sun. The accidental colour of red is bluish green, of orange dark blue, of violet yellow, and the converse.

Complementary colours. Colours which in combination, produce white light.

Fast colours. Colours which do not run or wash out in water.

Fundamental colours. The seven colours of the spectrum: violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red.

Primary, or simple colours. Colours which cannot be made by mixing other colours. Usually red, yellow, and blue (violet is sometimes substituted for blue).

Secondary colours. Those which result from the mixture of two or more PRIMARY COLOURS, such as orange, green, and purple.

Regimental colours. The flags peculiar to regiments, carried into battle until 1881, on which they are entitled to embroider their battle honours, by permission of the sovereign. The Royal Regiment of Artillery has no colours, regarding the capture of its guns as the same disgrace as having one's colours captured. The regimental colours of NAPOLEON'S Army were the famous eagle standards, copied from the eagles of the Roman legions. The capture of a Napoleonic eagle was such an unusual feat that regiments which did so (such as the Scots Greys) usually incorporated the eagle into their regimental device. See QUEEN'S COLOUR.

Colours. PHRASES.

To come off with flying colours. To be completely triumphant, to win "hands down". The allusion is to a victorious fleet sailing into port with their flags still flying at the mastheads.

To come out in one's true colours. To reveal one's proper character, divested of all that is meretricious.

To describe (a matter) in very black colours. To see it with a jaundiced eye, and describe it accordingly; to describe it under the bias of strong prejudice.

To desert one's colours. To become a TURNCOAT; to turn tail. The allusion is to the military flag.

To get one's colours. To be rewarded for prowess in sport by the privilege of wearing school, college, or university colours on the appropriate garment, blazer, etc. See TO BE CAPPED, under CAP; FLANNELS.

To paint in bright, or lovely colours. To see or describe things in COULEUR DE ROSE.

To sail under false colours. To try to attain your object by appearing to be other than you are, to act hypocritically. The allusion is to the practice of pirate ships approaching their unsuspecting victim with false colours at the mast.

To see things in their true colours. To see them as they really are.

University colours. Cambridge, light blue; Oxford, dark blue; London, purple; etc. Used as distinguishing dress in all sport. Oxford and Cambridge teams are commonly referred to as the Dark Blues and the Light Blues. See TO GET ONE'S COLOURS above.

Wearing his colours. Taking his part; being strongly attached to him. The idea is from livery.

With colours nailed to the mast. Holding out to the bitter end. Colours so fixed cannot be lowered in sign of defeat or submission.

If they catch you at disadvantage, the mines for your life is the word,—and so we fight them with our colours nailed to the mast.

SIR W. SCOTT: The Pirate, ch. xxi.

With the colours. Said of a soldier who is on the active strength of a regiment, as opposed to the reserve.

Colours IN SYMBOLISM, ECCLESIASTICAL USE, etc.

Black:

In blazonry, sable, signifying prudence, wisdom and constancy; it is engraved by perpendicular and horizontal lines crossing each other at right angles.

In art, signifying evil, falsehood, and error.

In Church decoration it is used for GOOD FRIDAY.

As a mortuary colour, signifying grief, despair, death. (In the Catholic Church violet may be substituted for black.)

In metals it is represented by lead.

In precious stones it is represented by the DIAMOND.

In planets it stands for SATURN.

Blue:

Hope, love of divine works; (in dresses) divine contemplation, piety, sincerity.

In blazonry, azure, signifying chastity, loyalty, fidelity; it is engraved by horizontal lines.

In art (as an angel's robe) it signifies fidelity and faith; (as the robe of the Virgin Mary) modesty and (in the Catholic Church) humility and expiation.

In Church decoration, blue and green were used indifferently for ordinary Sundays in the pre-Reformation Church.

As a mortuary colour it signifies eternity (applied to Deity), immortality (applied to man).

In metals it is represented by tin.
In precious stones it is represented by sapphire.
In planets it stands for JUPITER.

Colour-blindness. A term introduced by Sir David Brewster (1781-1868), the inventor of the kaleidoscope, to denote the various forms of defective colour vision or perception. Also known as Daltonism after John Dalton (1766-1844) the scientist, who first described it in 1794, and who also suffered from it. Inability to perceive any colours as such is called total colour-blindness. Complete partial colour-blindness is where some bright colours are confused, as opposed to incomplete partial colour-blindness where composite and neutral shades are not recognized.

Colour sergeant. From 1813 to 1915 the senior non-commissioned officer of an infantry company who had charge of the regimental colours. It is now a staff-sergeant's appointment whose badge is a sergeant's chevrons surmounted by a crown. The original badge was of crossed colours above the chevrons.

Colporteur. A hawk or PEDLAR; so called because he carries his basket or pack round his neck (Fr. col. neck; porter, to carry). The name is especially given to hawkers of religious books.

Colt. A person new to office; an awkward young fellow who needs "breaking in"; specifically in legal use, a BARRISTER who attended a SERJEANT-AT-LAW at his induction.

I accompanied the newly made Chief Baron as his colt.—POLLOCK.

In CRICKET and football a Colt team consists of a club's most promising young players.

Colt is also an abbreviation for "Colt's revolver"; patented by the American Col. Sam Colt in 1835, as well as an old nautical term for an 18-inch length of knotted rope for use on the ship's boys; a CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS.

To colt. Obsolete slang for to befool, gull, cheat.

Harebrain: We are fools, tame fools!

Bellamore: Come, let's go seek him.

He shall be hanged before he colt us so basely.

BAUMONT AND FLETCHER:

Wit Without Money, III, ii.

The verb is still used in some provincial dialects for making a newcomer pay his footing.

Colt-pixy. A PIXY, PUCK, or mischievous fairy. To colt-pixy is to take what belongs to the pixies, and is specially applied to the gleanings of apples after the crop has been gathered in.

Colt's-tooth. The love of youthful pleasure. Chaucer uses the word "coltish" for skittish.

Columbine

He was, I trowe, a twenty winter old,
And I was fourty, if I shal seye sooth;
But I hadde alwey a coltes tooth.

Wife of Bath's Tale, Prologue, 602.

Horses have colt's teeth at three years old, a period of life when their passions are strongest.

Your colt's-tooth is not cast yet.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, I, iii.

Columbine. A stock character in old Italian comedy from about 1560 and transferred to English PANTOMIME. She was the daughter of PANTALON and the sweetheart of HARLEQUIN, and, like him, was supposed to be invisible to mortal eyes. Columbina in Italian is a pet name for a lady-love, and means dove-like.

Columbus of the Skies, The. Sir William Herschel (1738-1822), discoverer of URANUS, was so called. The name has also been applied to Galileo (1564-1642), Tycho Brahe (1546-1601), and Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727).

Columbus's Egg. An easy task once one knows the trick. The story is that Columbus, in reply to a suggestion that other pioneers might have discovered America had he not done so, is said to have challenged the guests at a banquet in his honour to make an egg stand on end. All having failed, he flattened one end of the egg by tapping it against the table and so standing it up, thus indicating that others might follow but he had discovered the way.

Column. The Column of Marcus Aurelius, or Antonine Column. Erected at Rome in honour of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (A.D. 121-180), covered like that of TRAJAN with spiral bas-reliefs representing the emperor's wars. It is a Roman DORIC column of marble 95 ft. in height on a square pedestal.

Sixtus V caused the original statue on this column to be replaced by a figure of St. PAUL in 1589.

The Column at Boulogne, or The Column of the Grand Army, a marble DORIC column 176 ft. high carrying a bronze statue of NAPOLEON I, to commemorate the camp at Boulogne 1804-1805, formed there for the invasion of England.

The Duke of York's Column, in London, at the top of Waterloo Steps leading from Waterloo Place into the MALL. Completed in 1833 in memory of Frederick, Duke of York, George III's second son, who died in 1827. It is of the Tuscan order, designed by R. Wyatt, and is made of Aberdeen granite, surmounted by a statue of the Duke by R. Westmacott. It contains a winding staircase to the platform and is 124 ft high. See NOBLE DUKE OF YORK.

Columns, or Pillars, of Hercules. See PILLAR.

The Column of July. Erected in Paris in 1840 on the site of the BASTILLE to commemorate the July revolution of 1830 when Charles X abdicated. It is a bronze column 154 ft. high surmounted by a gilded statue of LIBERTY.

London's Column. See MONUMENT.

Nelson's Column. A CORINTHIAN column of Devonshire granite on a square base in Trafalgar Square, London, completed in 1843. The four lions, by Landseer, were added in 1867. It stands 185 ft. high overall; the column is a copy of one in the temple of MARS Ultor (the Avenger) at ROME. The statue, by E. H. Bailey, R.A., is 17 ft. high. The following bronze reliefs are on the sides of the pedestal: (north) the battle of the Nile, 1798; (south) Nelson's death at Trafalgar, 1805; (east) the battle of Copenhagen (1801); (west) the battle of Cape St. Vincent (1797). See NELSON'S PILLAR under PILLAR.

Column of the Place Vendôme. Erected in Paris (1806-10) in honour of Napoleon I. Made of marble encased with bronze, the spiral outside in bas-relief represents his battles ending with Austerlitz (1805). This imitation of TRAJAN'S COLUMN is 142 ft. high and the statue of NAPOLEON at the top was hurled down by the Communards in 1871 and replaced by a statue of LIBERTY in 1874.

Trajan's Column. At ROME. Built of marble (A.D. 114) by Apollodorus of Damascus, it is a Roman DORIC column 127½ ft. high, on a square pedestal with spiral staircase inside lighted by 40 windows. It was surmounted by a statue of the Emperor Trajan but Sixtus V substituted one of St. PETER. The outside spiral represents in bas-relief the emperor's battles.

Coma Berenices. See BERENICE.

Comazant (kom' á zánt). See CORPOSANT.

Comb. A crabtree comb. Slang for a cudgel. To smooth your hair with a crabtree comb is to give the head a knock with a stick.

Reynard's wonderful comb. This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He said it was made of the Panther's bone (see PANTHER), the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always cheerful and merry.—Reynard the Fox (g.v.).

To comb out. To disentangle the hair or remove foreign bodies from it with a comb. A thorough clearing out from offices, works, etc., of men of military age, into the Army, in accordance with the Military Service Acts of World War I, was called a comb-out.

To comb the cat. An old military and naval phrase for untangling the cords of a CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS by drawing it through the fingers.

To comb your noddle with a three-legged stool (SHAKESPEARE: Taming of the Shrew, I, i) is to beat you about the head with a stool. The three-legged milking stool is the weapon in question.

To cut someone's comb. To take down a person's conceit. In allusion to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

To set one's combs. To be cocky and vainglorious.

Come. A come down. Loss of prestige or position.

Can you come that? Can you equal it? Here "come" means to arrive at, to accomplish.

Come February, Michaelmas, etc. A colloquialism for "next February", etc.

Come Lammas-eve at night shall she be fourteen.
SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, iii.

Come hell or high water. No matter what happens.

Come home. Return to your house; to touch one's feelings or interest.

I doe now publish my Essayes: which, of all my other workes, have been most currant: for that, as it seems, they come home to men's businesse and bosomes.

BACON: Epistle Dedicatory to the Essays, 1625.

Come out. Formerly said of a young woman after she had been presented at Court, and more generally, when she comes out into society as a "grown up" person.

Come-ye-all. A type of ballad consisting of a strong simple narrative with little dialogue and usually ending with a moral reflection. Double ballad metre is the traditional form, and a typical first line is "Come all ye young maidens". Hence the name.

Don't try to come it over me. Don't try to boss me or order me about; don't set yourself in a position above me.

Has he come it? Has he lent the money? Has he hearkened to your request? Has he come over to your side?

If the worst comes to the worst. See WORST.

Marry come up. See MARRY.

To come a cropper. See CROPPER.

To come by. To acquire, with a hint of premeditation in the transaction.

To come clean. To tell the whole truth, to make a full and frank admission, to reveal completely.

The President of the Board of Trade will not "come clean".—Hansard (1950), Vol. 473, p. 627.

To come down. To leave the university finally or to commence vacation.

To come down handsome. To pay a good price, reward, subscription, etc.

To come down upon one. To reproach, to punish severely, to make a preemptory demand.

To come it strong. To LAY IT ON THICK; to exaggerate or overdo. See DRAW IT MILD.

To come of good stock. To be descended from a good family.

To come off. To occur, as "my holiday didn't come off after all". Also to be accomplished successfully.

To come over one. To wheedle one to do or give something; to cheat or overreach one; to conquer or get one's own way.

To come round. To recover consciousness; to recover from a fit of the sulks; return to friendship; "he is coming round to my way of thinking", he is beginning to think as I do.

To come short. Not to be sufficient. "To come short of" means to miss or fail of attaining.

To come the old soldier over one. To attempt to intimidate or bully one by an assumption of authority.

To come to. To amount to, as in "It will not come to much"; to obtain possession; to regain consciousness after fainting, etc.

To come to blows. To start fighting.

To come to grief, to hand. See GRIEF; HAND.

To come to pass. To happen, to befall, to come about.

It came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree.—Luke ii, 1.

To come to stay. To come as a guest, also used of something which will be permanent or long-lasting.

To come to the point. See POINT.

To come under. To be classed under.

To come under the hammer. See HAMMER.

To come up against. To encounter opposition; to come across; to encounter by chance.

To come up smiling. To laugh at discomfiture or punishment; to emerge from disaster unruffled.

To come upon the parish. To enter the workhouse, to be supported by the parish.

To come up to. To equal, to amount to the same quantity.

To come up to scratch. See SCRATCH.

To come Yorkshire over one. To bamboozle one, to overreach one. Yorkshire has been proverbial for shrewdness and sharp practice. "I's Yorkshire too" means I am as sharp as you and am not to be taken in.

To stage a come-back. To return successfully to former standing in political or professional life, etc., after withdrawing from it.

What's to come of it? What's to come of him? A contracted form of become.

Comedy (Gr. komē-ōdē). Originally a village song, referring to the village merry-makings, in which songs still take a conspicuous place. Greek comedy appears to have originated from such village revels and certain elements of the festivities connected with the worship of DIONYSUS. The chorus probably derives from the practice of Attic revellers masquerading as birds, frogs, fishes, etc. Cp. TRAGEDY.

The Father of Comedy. Aristophanes (c. 450-385 B.C.), the Athenian dramatist.

Comet Wine. A term denoting wine of a superior quality from the notion that grapes of "comet years" (i.e. years in which remarkable comets appear) are better in flavour than those of other years.

Command Night. In the theatre the night of a command performance, i.e. by royal command and usually in the presence of royalty.

Commandment. The ten commandments. A common piece of slang in Elizabethan days for the ten fingers or nails.

Could I come near your beauty with my nails
I'd set my ten commandments in your face.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. II, I, iii.

The eleventh commandment. An ironical expression, signifying "Thou shalt not be found out".

Commando (Port. commandar, command). Originally armed units of Boer horsemen on military service. They achieved notable successes for their daring and mobility during the South African War (1899-1902).

Lord Kitchener's relentless policy of attrition was slowly breaking the hearts of the commandos.

DENBYS REITZ: Commando, ch. xxvi.

In World War II it was adopted as the name of the especially trained British assault troops formed from volunteers to undertake especially hazardous tasks, and also used for a member of these units.

Comme il faut (kom ēl fō) (Fr.). As it should be; quite proper; quite according to etiquette or rule.

Commemoration. See ENCÆNIA.

Commendam. A living in commendam is one temporarily held by someone (often a BISHOP) until an incumbent is appointed, and the practice arose of commending several livings to the bishops of poorer sees. The custom was abolished in 1836.

Commendation Ninepence. This was a bent ninepenny silver piece, commonly used in the 17th century as a love-token, giver and receiver saying, "To my love, from my love." Sometimes the coin was broken, each keeping a part.

Like commendation ninepence, crooked,
With "To and from my love" it looked.

SAMUEL BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. I, i.

Committee. A Committee of the whole House, in Parliamentary language, is when the SPEAKER leaves the chair, the mace is placed under the table, and the chair is taken by the Chairman of WAYS AND MEANS. Any member may speak more than once.

A Joint Committee is a committee nominated by the HOUSE OF LORDS and the HOUSE OF COMMONS, in practice a Select Committee of the Commons which meets a Select Committee of the Lords.

A Select Committee is a fact-finding body of members selected from the whole House.

A Standing Committee in the Commons is formed so as to represent the different parties according to their relative strength in the House. They are appointed for the Session to deal with bills in the Committee stage.

Commodore. A corruption of "commander" (Fr. commandeur; Dut. kommandeur). A naval officer ranking above a captain and below a rear-admiral, of equivalent rank to a brigadier in the army. By courtesy, the title is given to the senior captain when two or more ships are in company; also to the president of a yacht club.

In the United States Navy the title was abolished in 1899, except as a retiring rank for captains.

Common. Short for common land which cannot be enclosed without an ACT OF PARLIAMENT. The enclosure of common land was a source of friction and discontent over the centuries and was not halted until the Commons Preservation Act of 1876.

Rights of Common are (1) Pasture, the right of feeding stock; (2) Piscary, the right of fishing; (3) Estovers, the right of cutting wood, furze, etc.; (4) Turbary, the right of cutting turves.

Common Law. Originally the unwritten law of custom of the King's courts (except of Equity). From the late 15th century precedent began to be accepted and gradually superseded local customs until the 19th century when precedent and case-made law predominated.

Common Pleas. Actions between subject and subject at Common Law. The Court of Common Pleas was for the trial of civil actions and was transferred to the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act of 1873 and then merged in the Queen's Bench Division (1881).

Common Prayer. The Book of Common Prayer. See under BOOK.

Common sense. Good, sound, practical sense; general sagacity. Formerly it denoted a supposed internal sense held to be common to all the senses, or one that acted as a link between them. See SEVEN SENSES under SENSE.

Commoner. One of the common people, one below the rank of peer, a member of the British HOUSE OF COMMONS; also one with RIGHTS OF COMMON and, at Oxford colleges, a student not on the foundation. The Great Commoner. William Pitt the elder (1708-1778), Earl of Chatham, famous statesman, and, like Sir Winston Churchill, a great House of Commons man.

Commons. To put someone on short commons. To stint him, to give him scanty meals. In the University of Cambridge the food provided for each student at breakfast was called his commons; hence food in general or meals.

To come into commons. To enter a society in which the members have a common or general dinner table. To be removed from the society is to be discommonsed:

He [Dryden] was in trouble [at Cambridge] on 19 July 1652, when he was discommonsed and gated for a fortnight for disobedience and contumacy.—SAINTSBURY: Dryden, ch. 1.

Commonwealth, The. A term specifically applied to England in 1649 by the RUMP, after it had abolished the HOUSE OF LORDS and the monarchy and established the Council of State. Oliver Cromwell was styled Lord PROTECTOR of the Commonwealth in 1653, and the period of his rule is usually called the Protectorate.

In current usage the term is applied to the British Commonwealth, the free association of most nations of the former British Empire.

Ideal Commonwealths. The best known ideal or imaginary Commonwealths are those sketched by Plato in the Republic (from which later examples derive), by CICERO in his De Republica, by St. Augustine in his De Civitate Dei, by Dante in his De Monarchia, by Sir Thomas More in UTOPIA, by Bacon in the New Atlantis (see under ATLANTIS), by Campanella in his Civitas Solis, and by Samuel Butler in EREWON.

Others are Johnson's Rasselas, Lytton's Coming Race, Bellamy's Looking Backward, Wm. Morris's News from Nowhere, H. G. Wells's In the Days of the Comet, and The World Set Free.

Communism, in the general sense of a society or community based on common ownership of property and common labour with all sharing the common product, has been practised in many primitive societies and particular groups (See DIGGERS). Since the time of Plato's Republic various forms of communism have been elaborated, but in current usage it derives from the theories of Karl Marx (1818-1883) and Friedrich Engels (1820-1895) as set out in their Communist Manifesto (1848) and in the former's Capital (1867-1894). See DIALECTICAL MATERIALISM.

The distinguishing feature of Communism is not the abolition of property generally, but the abolition of bourgeois property.

Communist Manifesto, II.

Companions of Jehu. The CHOUANS were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task, and that given to Jehu when anointed king over Israel. Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house (II Kings ix, 6-8). The Chouans were to cut off all who murdered Louis XVI, and to place his brother Louis XVIII (Jehu) on the throne.

Comparisons are odorous. So says Dogberry (SHAKESPEARE: Much Ado About Nothing, III, v).

We own your verses are melodious,
But then comparisons are odious.

SWIFT: Answer to Sheridan's "Simile".

Complementary Colours. See COLOURS.

Complex. A combination of memories and wishes which exercise an influence on the personality. See also under ÆDIPUS.

Compline

Inferiority complex. A feeling of inferiority in persons who appear over-conscious of their own shortcomings.

To have a complex about something. To have a strong feeling either for or against something; to be over concerned about it.

Compline (kom' plin). The last of the CANONICAL HOURS, said about 8 or 9 p.m., and so called because it completes the series of the daily prayers or hours. From M.E. and O.Fr. complie, Lat. completa (hora).

In ecclesiastical Lat. vesperinus, from vesper, means evening service, and completinus appears to be formed on this model.

Complutensian Polyglot. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Compos Mentis. See NON COMPOSITIS.

Compostela, or Compostella (kom pos tel' á). Santiago de Compostela, the city in Spain where the relics of St. JAMES the Great are supposed to be preserved; a corruption of Giacomopostolo (James the Apostle). See COCKLE HAT.

Comstockery. The vigorous suppression of books, plays, and other literature deemed to be salacious or corrupting, as advocated by the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, whose moving spirit was Anthony Comstock (1844-1915). The word was coined by G. B. Shaw.

Comus. (kõ' mus) (Gr. komos, carousal). In Milton's masque of this name, the god of sensual pleasure, the son of BACCHUS and CIRCE.

In the masque, the elder brother is meant for Viscount Brackley, the younger brother is Thomas Egerton, and the lady is Lady Alice Egerton, children of the Earl of Bridgewater, at whose castle in Ludlow it was first presented in 1634.

Con amore (kon a mõ' i) (Ital.). With heart and soul; as, "he did it con amore"—i.e. lovingly, with delight, and therefore in good earnest.

Con spirito (Ital.). With quickness and vivacity. A musical term.

Conan (kõ' nan). In the literature of OSSIAN "a kind of Thersites, but brave even to rashness".

Blow for blow or claw for claw, as Conan said. Conan made a vow never to take a blow without returning it. When he descended into the infernal regions, the arch fiend gave him a cuff, which Conan instantly returned, saying, "Claw for claw."

Conceptionists. See FRANCISCANS.

Concert Pitch. The degree of sharpness or flatness adopted by musicians playing in concert, that all the instruments may be in accord. In England concert pitch is usually slightly higher than the pitch to which instruments are generally tuned.

Hence figuratively to screw oneself up to concert pitch is to make oneself absolutely ready, prepared for any emergency or anything one may have to do.

Conchobar (kon kõ' bar). In Irish romance, son of Nessa, and king of ULSTER at the opening of the Christian era. He was uncle and guardian of CUCHULAIN and also responsible for the upbringing of DEIRDRE. He is said to have died of anger on the day of Christ's crucifixion.

Conchy. See CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR.

Conclamatio. Amongst the ancient Romans, the loud cry raised by those standing round a death-bed at the moment of death. It probably had its origin in the idea of recalling the departed spirit and was similar to the Irish howl over the dead. "One not howled over" (corpus nondum clamatum) meant one at the point of death; and "one howled for" was one given up for dead or actually deceased. Hence the phrase conclamatum est, he is dead past all hope, he has been called and gives no sign. VIRGIL makes the palace ring with howls when DIDO burnt herself to death.

Lamentis, gemituque, et femineo ululato,
Texta fremunt.

Aeneid, IV, 667.

Conclave. Literally, a room or set of rooms, all of which can be opened by one key (Lat. cum clavis). The word is applied to small cells erected for the CARDINALS who meet, after the death of a POPE, to elect a successor; hence the assembly of cardinals for this purpose; hence any private assembly for discussion. The conclave of cardinals dates from 1274. The cardinals assembled in the VATICAN are secluded in the conclave apartments and votes are taken morning and evening until one candidate has secured a two-thirds majority of votes. He is then acclaimed Pope.

And once more in my arms I bid him [Cardinal
Campeius] welcome,
And thank the holy conclave for their loves.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, II, ii.

To meet in solemn conclave is to meet together to decide matters of importance.

Concordat (kon kõr' dăt). An agreement made between a secular ruler and the POPE; as the Germanic Concordat of 1448 between the Emperor Frederick III and

Nicholas V; the Concordat of 1516 between Francis I of France and Leo X to abolish the PRAGMATIC SANCTION; and the Concordat of 1801 between NAPOLEON and Pius VII. In 1929 a concordat between the Papacy and the Italian Government established the VATICAN City State.

Concrete Numbers. See ABSTRACT NUMBERS.

Condottieri (It. condotto, hired). A name applied to the leaders of bands of FREE-BOOTERS, mercenaries, or military adventurers of the 14th and 15th centuries. Notable among them were Sir John Hawkwood at Florence, Francesco of Carmagnola, and Francesco Sforza. Italy was particularly plagued by them. The singular is condottiere.

Confederate States. The eleven states which seceded from the Union in the American Civil War (1861-1865)—viz. Alabama, Arkansas, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia.

Confederation of the Rhine. The sixteen German states which allied themselves with France in 1806. The confederation was dissolved in 1813.

The North German Confederation was formed in 1867 under the presidency of the King of Prussia, consequent upon the defeat of Austria in 1866. It consisted of all 22 states north of the river Main.

Confession, Seal of. The obligation which binds a priest not to divulge outside the confessional anything he may hear therein. He cannot be forced to reveal in the witness-box of a court of law any information he may have thus obtained.

Confusion worse confounded. Disorder made worse than before.

Congé (kon zhä') (Fr. leave). "To give a person his congé" is to dismiss him from your service. "To take one's congé" is to give notice to friends of your departure by leaving a card at the friend's house inscribed P.P.C. (pour prendre congé, to take leave) on the left-hand corner.

Congé d'élire (Fr. leave to elect). A royal writ given to a CHAPTER to elect a named priest to a vacant SEE. Its use dates from 1533.

Congleton Bears. Men of Congleton, or Beartowners. Congleton in Cheshire was a noted north of England bear-baiting centre in the 16th and 17th centuries. Tradition has it that at some time in the 16th century the town bear died just before the annual wakes (See WAKE). Money intended to purchase a Bible was diverted to purchase a bear, hence Congleton came to be called Bear Town and its inhabitants Congleton Bears. In the words of the jingle—

Congleton rare, Congleton rare,
Sold the Bible to buy a bear.

Congregationalists. Those PROTESTANT Dissenters who maintain that each congregation is an independent community with a right to govern its own affairs and choose its own minister. They derive from the BROWNISTS and BARROWISTS of Elizabeth I's reign. The Congregational Union was formed in 1832.

Congress System. Refers to the attempts made after the Vienna Settlement of 1815 to settle problems affecting the peace of Europe by congresses or conferences between the major powers. The experiment ended with the Congress of St. Petersburg (1825).

Congreve Rockets. A rocket invented in 1808 for use in war by Sir William Congreve (1772-1828). It was not very successfully used at Leipzig in 1813. He was Comptroller of the Royal Laboratory at Woolwich.

But vaccination certainly has been
A kind antithesis to Congreve's rockets.
BYRON: Don Juan I, cxxix.

Congreves. Predecessors of the LUCIFERMATCH, invented by Sir William Congreve. The splints were dipped in sulphur then tipped with chlorate of potash paste, in which gum was substituted for sugar, then a small quantity of sulphide of antimony was added. The match was ignited by being drawn through a fold of sand-paper. Cp. PROMETHEAN.

Conjuring Cap. I must put on my conjuring cap—i.e. your question requires deliberate thought, and I must reflect upon it. Tradition says that Eric XIV, King of Sweden (1560-1568), who became insane, was a great believer in magic and had an "enchanted cap" by means of which he pretended to exercise power over the elements. When a storm arose, his subjects used to say, "The King has got on his conjuring cap." Cp. I MUST PUT ON MY THINKING CAP, under CAP.

Conker (kon' kër). A children's name for a horse-chestnut; possibly derived from the Fr. conque, a shell. Schoolboys thread a chestnut on a string knotted at one end, and then play conkers by each taking a turn at striking his opponent's conker until one or other is broken from the string. Perhaps conk, slang for nose, is similarly derived; hence, conky, a big- or beak-nosed person.

Old Conky. The Duke of Wellington (1769–1852) was so nicknamed from the shape of his nose or CONK.

To conk out, used of an engine or motor, means to break down or stop running. This usage is probably onomatopoeic. It also means to die.

Connecticut (kò net' i kùt) is the Mohegan dialect word Quonaugicut, meaning "long tidal river". See NUTMEG STATE.

Conqueror. The title was applied to the following:

ALEXANDER THE GREAT. The conqueror of the world (356–323 B.C.).

Alfonso I of Portugal (c. 1114–1185).

Aurangzebe, Mogul Emperor of India (1659–1707).

James I of Aragon (1213–1276).

Mohammed II, Sultan of Turkey (1451–1481).

Othman or Osman I, founder of the Ottoman dynasty in Turkey (1300–1326).

Francisco Pizarro. Conquistador, conqueror of Peru (c. 1470–1541).

William, Duke of Normandy, conqueror of England (1066–1087).

Conqueror's nose. A prominent straight nose, rising at the bridge. CHARLEMAGNE had such a nose, so had Henry the Fowler of Germany; Rudolf I of Germany; Frederick I of Hohenzollern; our own IRON DUKE; Bismarck, the IRON CHANCELLOR of Germany, etc.

Conquest, The. William of Normandy's conquest of England (1066).

Conscience. Conscience clause. A clause in an ACT OF PARLIAMENT to relieve persons with conscientious scruples from certain requirements in it (usually of a religious character). It acquired a wider significance in connexion with the Compulsory Vaccination Act of 1898.

Conscience money. Usually refers to money paid anonymously to the government by persons who have defrauded the revenue, most frequently by understating their income-tax liabilities. The sum is advertised in the London Gazette. It also has a more general connotation.

Court of Conscience. Courts for the recovery of small debts, established at LONDON and various other commercial centres, eventually superseded by County Courts.

Why should not Conscience have vacation,
As well as other courts o' th' nation.

BUTLER: Hudibras, II, ii.

Have you the conscience to [demand such a price]? Can your conscience allow you to [demand such a price]?

In all conscience. As, "And enough too, in all conscience", i.e. the demand made is as much as conscience would tolerate; verging on the border of sharp practice or of that fine line which divides honesty from dishonesty.

My conscience! An oath. I swear by my conscience.

To have a Nonconformist Conscience. To have opinions as to right or wrong like those commonly held by NONCONFORMISTS; to have a puritan conscience especially with regard to drinking and gambling.

To make a matter of conscience of it. To deal with it according to the dictates of conscience, to treat it conscientiously.

To speak one's conscience. To speak one's own mind, give one's own candid thoughts and opinions.

By my troth I will speak my conscience of the king.—SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, IV, i.

Conscientious objector. One who takes advantage of a conscience clause, and so evades some particular requirement of the law in question. Once specially applied to those who had a conscientious objection to vaccination, but since World War I it has come to mean one who obtains exemption from military service on grounds of conscience. Such people are also called C.O.s or Conchies.

Conscript Fathers. Lat. Patres Conscripti, the Roman Senate. One explanation is that ROMULUS is supposed to have instituted a senate of a hundred elders called Patres (Fathers). After the SABINES joined the State, another hundred were added. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king, added a third hundred, called Patres Minorum Gentium. When Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh and last king of Rome, was banished, several of the Senate followed him, and the vacancies were filled up by Junius Brutus, the first consul. The new members were enrolled in the senatorial register and so called conscripti; the entire body was then addressed as Patres [et] Conscripti or Patres, Conscripti. See TARQUIN.

Consentes Dii. The twelve chief Roman deities, six male and six female, the same as the Athenian Twelve Gods:

JUPITER, APOLLO, NEPTUNE, MARS, MERCURY, VULCAN, JUNO, DIANA, MINERVA, VENUS, CERES, VESTA.

Ennius puts them into two hexameter verses:

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars,
Mercurius, Jovi, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.

Called consentes, says Varro,

Quia in consilium Jovis adhibebantur.

De Lingua Latina, vii, 28.

Consenting Stars. Stars forming configurations for good or evil. In Judges v, 20, we read that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera", i.e. formed unlucky or malignant configurations.

... Scourge the bad revolting stars
That have consented unto Henry's death.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. I, I, i.

Conservative. One who essentially believes in amending existing institutions cautiously and who opposes doctrinaire changes. The name came to be applied to the TORY party from the 1830s after its use by J. W. Croker in the Quarterly Review of January 1830. "We have always been conscientiously attached to what is called Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative Party" (p. 276). Canning somewhat similarly used the word in a speech at Liverpool in March 1820.

Conservator of the Peace. The predecessor of the Justice of the Peace and usually a function of the KNIGHT OF THE SHIRE.

Consistory (Lat. consistorium, a place of assembly). As an ecclesiastical court in the Church of Rome it is the assembly in council of the POPE and CARDINALS; in England it is a diocesan court presided over by the CHANCELLOR of the diocese.

Consolidated Fund. The national revenue from all sources is paid into this fund and held in the EXCHEQUER account at the Bank of England. The fund, which dates from 1787, is pledged for meeting the interest and management costs of the National Debt, CIVIL LIST, etc.

Consols. A contraction of CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Constable (Lat. comes stabuli) means Count of the Stable or Master of the Horse. In the BYZANTINE EMPIRE the Constable was master of the imperial stables and a great officer of state, hence the use of the name for an official of a royal household or a military commander. It was adopted by the Frankish kings and the office grew steadily more important under their successors. (See CONSTABLE OF FRANCE.) Constable is also the term for a governor of a fortress, as the Constable of the TOWER of London. From Tudor times it became the designation of a parish officer, and later a policeman, as officers appointed to keep the peace. In England a Special Constable is one enrolled to help the regular constabulary in time of pressure or emergency.

The Constable of England, or Lord High Constable is first identifiable in Henry I's reign (1110-1135), but since 1521 has been appointed for coronation days only.

The Constable of France was once a great household official, judge of all matters pertaining to CHIVALRY, etc., and from the 14th century commander-in-chief of the army. The office was suppressed by Louis XIII in 1627, but temporarily revived by NAPOLEON.

The Lord High Constable of Scotland. An office similar to those of England and France instituted by David I about 1147. It was conferred by Robert Bruce in 1315 on Sir Gilbert Hay, created Earl of Erroll, in which family it was made hereditary and is still held.

Drink the constable. See MOROCCO.

To overrun, or outrun the constable. To fall into debt; to overspend one's income; to talk about what you do not understand.

Quoth Hudibras, Friend Ralph, thou hast
Outrun the constable at last:
For thou art fallen on a new Dispute, as senseless as untrue.

BUTLER: Hudibras, I, iii.

Who's to pay the constable? Who is to pay the score?

Constantine, Donation of. See DECRE-TALS.

Constantine's Cross. See CROSS.

Constituent Assembly. The first of the National Assemblies of the French Revolution which sat from July 1789 until 1791; so called from its main objective of drawing up a new constitution.

After World War II a National Constituent Assembly of 522 deputies was elected in France, according to the constitution promulgated in October 1945.

Constitution. The fundamental law or body of custom by which a state is organized and governed, i.e. constituted.

To give a nation a constitution usually means to establish a system of government limiting the arbitrary power of the head of the state thus preventing a despotism or autocracy.

Apostolic Constitutions. A comprehensive rule in eight books concerning church doctrines and customs. Of unknown authorship, they are probably of Syrian origin and probably date from the 4th century. They are certainly post-Apostolic.

Constitutions of Clarendon. See CLAR-ENDON.

Consummatum est. (kon sūm ā' tum est) (Lat.). It is finished; the last words of our Lord on the CROSS (John xix, 30).

Contango

Meph.: O, what will I not do to obtain his soul?
Faust.: Consummatum est: this bill is ended.
And Faustus hath bequeathed his soul to Lucifer.

MARLOWE: Doctor Faustus, V, 74.

Contango. In Stock Exchange parlance, the sum paid by the purchaser of stock to the seller, for the privilege of deferring the completion of the bargain till the next, or some future settling day. Cp. BACKWARDATION.

Contemplate. To meditate or reflect upon: to consider attentively. The word takes us back to the ancient Roman augurs (see AUGURY), for the templum (whence our temple) was that part of the heavens which he wished to consult. Having mentally divided it into two parts from top to bottom, he watched to see what would occur; and this watching of the templum was called contemplating.

Contempt of Court. A term of wide coverage which briefly defined consists of refusal to obey the rules, orders, and processes of the courts of law; or interference with the course of justice. Offenders can be jurors, parties, witnesses, solicitors, etc.

Contempt of Parliament. Any disobedience or disrespect or obstruction to the due course of proceedings or gross reflection on the character of a member is a breach of PRIVILEGE.

Contemptibles, The Old. Members of the British Expeditionary Force of 160,000 men that left Britain in 1914 to join the French and Belgians against Germany. The soldiers gave themselves this name from an army order (almost certainly apocryphal) said to have been given at Aix on 19 August by the Kaiser.

It is my royal and imperial command that you exterminate the treacherous English, and walk over General French's contemptible little army.

The surviving veterans held their last national parade at St. Paul's Cathedral in May 1966 and were afterwards entertained by the Corporation of the City of London. In the words of the parade organizer "Some of our chaps are getting a bit old for marching," hence the decision to go out with a final flourish.

Contest of Wartburg. Sometimes called the Battle of the Minstrels, the famous poetical contest of MINNESINGERS held in 1207 at the Wartburg, a castle in Saxe-Weimar. The best of the contestants was Walther von der Vogelweide and the contest is commemorated in Wagner's TANNHÄUSER.

Continnence of a Scipio. It is said that a beautiful princess fell into the hands of Scipio Africanus, and he refused to see her, "lest he should be tempted to forget his principles". Similar stories are told of many historical characters including Cyrus and ALEXANDER.

Continental. Not worth a continental. Worthless like the paper money issued by the American Continental Congress during the War of Independence, which became valueless by the end of 1780.

Continental System. The name given to NAPOLEON's plan to cripple Britain by economic warfare when the invasion plan had failed. The Berlin Decrees of 21 NOVEMBER 1806 excluded all British goods from the ports of France and her allies, and declared the British Isles in a state of blockade.

Continuity Man, or Girl. The technique of cinematography allows of a play, etc., being photographed in scenes and incidents not necessarily in sequence and each scene, etc., may be "shot" many times. It is essential that every detail of costume, scenery, etc., is correctly repeated each time a scene is "shot". It is the task of the continuity man or girl to ensure this.

Contra (Lat.). Against: generally in the phrase pro and contra or pro and con. In bookkeeping a contra is an entry on the right-hand or credit side of the ledger. See PER CONTRA.

A contra-account is one kept by a firm which both buys from and sells to the same client, so that the transactions cancel out as paper entries.

Contra bonos mores (Lat.). Not in accordance with good manners; not COMME IL FAUT.

Contra jus gentium (Lat.). Against the law of nations; specially applied to usages in war which are contrary to the laws or customs of civilized peoples.

Contra mundum (Lat.). Against the world at large. Used of an innovator or reformer who sets his opinion against that of everyone else, and specially connected with Athanasius in his vehement opposition to the ARIANS.

Contretemps (Fr.). A mischance, something inopportune. Literally "out of time".

Conventicle. The word was applied by the early Christians to their meeting places and inevitably acquired the derogatory sense of a clandestine meeting. With the advent of Protestantism in England it came to be applied to the meetings and meeting-places of DISSENTERS.

Conventicle Act. In 1593 such an Act was passed containing severe penalties against those attending religious conventicles. The better-known Act of 1664 forbade religious conventicles of more than five persons except in accordance with the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. It was repealed in 1812.

Convention Parliaments. Two parliaments were so called: one in 1660, because it was not summoned by the king, but was convened by General Monk to effect the RESTORATION of Charles II; and that authorized by William of Orange in January 1689 which offered the throne to William and Mary as joint sovereigns.

In 1787 the Constitution of the U.S.A. was drawn up by a convention at Philadelphia. In the U.S.A. National Party Conventions elect the official candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency.

In the French Revolution, the National Convention succeeded the Legislative Assembly (21 September 1792), proclaimed the Republic (22 September) and governed France until October 1795, when it was succeeded by the DIRECTORY.

Convey (Lat. conveho, to carry away). A polite term for steal. Thieves, by a similar euphemism are called conveyers.

Convey, the wise it call: Steall fob! a fico for the phrase!

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, I, iii.

Convict. In circus parlance a zebra, because of the resemblance of its stripes to a convict's striped shirt.

Cooing and Billing, like Philip and Mary on a shilling. The reference is to coins struck in 1555, in which Mary and her consort are placed face to face, and not cheek by jowl, the usual way.

Still amorous, and fond, and billing,
Like Philip and Mary on a shilling.

BUTLER: Hudibras, Pt. III, i.

Cook, Cooking. Terms belonging to cuisine applied to man under different circumstances: Sometimes he is well basted; he boils with rage, is baked with heat, and burns with love or jealousy. Sometimes he is battered and well buttered; he is often cut up, devoured with a flame and done brown. We dress his jacket for him; sometimes he is eaten up with care; sometimes he is fried. We cook his goose for him, and sometimes he makes a goose of himself. We make a hash of him, and at times he makes a hash of something else. He gets into hot water, and sometimes into a mess. Is made into mincemeat, makes mincemeat of his money, and is often in a pickle. We are often asked to toast him, sometimes he gets well roasted, is sometimes set on fire, put into a stew, or is in a stew.

A "softie" is half-baked, one severely handled is well peppered. To falsify accounts is to cook or salt them, wit is Attic salt, and an exaggerated statement must be taken cum grano salis.

A pert young person is a sauce box, a shy lover is a spoon, a rich father has to fork out, and is sometimes dished of his money.

A conceited man does not think small beer (or small potatoes) of himself, and one's mouth is called a potato-trap. A simpleton is a cake, a gudgeon, and a pigeon. Some are cool as a cucumber, others hot as a quail. A chubby child is a little dumpling. A woman may be a duck; a courtesan was called mutton or laced mutton, and a large coarse hand is a mutton fist. Side whiskers are called mutton chops. A greedy person is a pig, a fat one is a sausage, and a shy one, if not a sheep, is certainly sheepish; while a Lubin casts sheep's eyes at his lady-love. A coward is chicken-hearted, a fat person is crummy, and a cross one is crusty, while an aristocrat belongs to the upper crust of society. Yeomen of the Guard are BEEF-EATERS, a soldier is a red herring, or a lobster, and a stingy, ill-tempered old man is a crab. A walking advertiser between two boards is a sandwichman. An alderman in his chain is a turkey hung with sausages. Two persons resembling each other are like two peas. A chit is a mere sprat, a delicate maiden is a tibbit, and a colourless countenance is called a whey-face. Anything unexpectedly easy is a piece of cake.

Cooked. The books have been cooked. The accounts have been falsified.

Cook your goose. See GOOSE.

What's cooking? What's in hand? What's doing?

Cookie-pusher (U.S.A.). A young and junior diplomat whose most onerous duties appear to consist in handing round plates and food at official receptions.

Cool. Cool card; cooling card. See CARD.

Cool as a cucumber. Perfectly composed; not in the least angry or agitated.

Cool hundred, thousand (or any other sum). The whole of the sum named, cool being emphatic; it may have originally had reference to the calm deliberation with which the sum was counted out.

He had lost a cool hundred, and would play no longer.—FIELDING: Tom Jones, VIII, xii.

Cool tankard, or cool cup. A drink made of wine and water, with lemon, sugar, and borage; sometimes also slices of cucumber.

Coon. Short for raccoon, a small North American arboreal animal, about the size of a fox, valued for its fur. The animal was adopted as a badge by the old WHIG party in the United States about 1840. In the 19th century the word became slang for a Negro.

A coon's age. Quite a long time; a "month of Sundays" (U.S.A.).

A gone coon. A person in a terrible fix; one on the verge of ruin. The coon being hunted for its fur is a "gone coon" when it is treed and so has no escape from its pursuers.

To go the whole coon. An American equivalent of the English "to go the whole hog". See HOG.

Coop. U.S. slang for prison.

To fly the coop is to escape from prison.

Cooper. Half STOUT and half porter. The term arose from the old practice at breweries of allowing the coopers a daily portion of stout and porter. As they did not like to drink porter after stout, they mixed the two together. See also ALE.

Coot. A silly coot, Stupid as a coot. The coot is a small waterfowl.

Bald as a coot. A particular feature of the coot is its conspicuous white forehead shield which gives it a bald-headed appearance.

Cop. To catch, lay hold of, capture. To "get copped" is to get caught, especially by the police, whence cop and COPPER for a policeman. Perhaps connected with Lat. capere, to take, etc. The word is used for catching almost anything, as punishment at school, or even an illness.

A fair cop is applied to one caught in flagrante delicto.

Cope, Johnnie. See JOHNNIE GOPE.

Copenhagen (kō pèn hā' gèn). The famous chestnut horse ridden by the Duke of Wellington at Waterloo. The name commemorates the Duke's part in the Copenhagen expedition of 1807. Copenhagen was pensioned off at Stratfield Saye and lived to the age of twenty-seven.

Copernican System, Copernicanism. The heliocentric or sun-centred theory of the universe postulated by Nicolaus Copernicus (1473-1543) in his book De Revolutionibus Orbium. This superseded the PTOLEMAIC SYSTEM in which the sun is supposed to move round the earth. The idea was not entirely new and was vaguely held by the School of PYTHAGORAS. Pope Gregory XIII used De Revolutionibus when constructing his CALENDAR but the book was placed on the INDEX in 1616. See ALMAGEST.

Cophetua (ko fet' ū à). An imaginary king of Africa who fell in love with Penelophon (SHAKESPEARE'S Zenelophon in Love's Labour's Lost, IV, i) and married her. They lived happily and were widely lamented at death. The story is given in the ballad King Cophetua and the Beggar-Maid in PERCY'S RELIQUES and is referred to in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet (II, i) and Richard II (V, iii).

Copper. Among the old alchemists copper was the symbol of VENUS.

The name is also given to the large boiler used for laundry purposes, cooking, etc., which was originally made of copper but later of iron; also to pence, half-pence, farthings, etc., once minted of copper but from 1860 of bronze.

In slang a copper is a policeman, i.e. one who "cops" or catches offenders.

Copper captain. A "BRUMMAGEM", or sham captain; a man who "swanks about" with the title but has no right to it. Michael Perez is so called in Beaumont and Fletcher's Rule a Wife and have a Wife.

To this copper-captain was confided the command of the troops.—W. IRVING: Knickerbocker.

Copper Nose. Oliver Cromwell; also called "Ruby Nose", "Nosey", and "Nose Almighty", no doubt from some scorbatic tendency which showed itself in a big red nose.

Copper-nose Harry. Henry VIII was notorious for his debasement of the coinage (from 1526). The copper content in the "silver" coins soon showed itself on the more prominent parts, especially the nose. Hence the king came to be called "Old Copper Nose" or "Copper-nose Harry".

Copperheads. Secret foes. Copperheads are North American poisonous snakes which attack without warning. The name was applied by the early colonists to the Indians, then to the Dutch (see Washington Irving's History of New York). In the AMERICAN CIVIL WAR it was given to those Northerners who were against the coercion of the CONFEDERATE STATES of the South. Copper-head badges were devised from one cent copper pieces and some Copperheads engaged in subversive activities joining secret societies such as the KNIGHTS OF THE GOLDEN CIRCLE.

Copts. Christian descendants of the Ancient Egyptians who became MONOPHYSITES and JACOBITES and who have retained the patriarchal chair of Alexandria since the Council of Chalcedon in 451, which still has nominal jurisdiction over the Ethiopian Church. Coptic ceased to be a living language in the 16th or early 17th century but is still used in their liturgy. The word is derived from the Gr. Agyptos which became Qibt after the 7th-century Arab invasion.

Copus (kō' pūs). Old university slang for a drink made of beer, wine, and spice heated together and served in a LOVING CUP. Various accounts for as being DOG-LATIN for cupellon Hippocratis (a cup of Hippocras), or short for episcopus, in which case it would be the same as the drink BISHOP.

Copy. That's a mere copy of your countenance. Not your real wish or meaning, but merely one you choose to present to me.

Copy-book. A book in which specimen entries of handwriting, letters, and figures are printed with blank spaces for the learner to imitate or copy them. Such exercise books were used in schools until the present century.

Fair as a text B in a copy-book.
SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, V, ii.

Copy-book maxims. Commonplace moral precepts, etc., of the sort found in copy-books. Actual examples are:

All good subjects love their country.
Your aim in life should be a noble one.
Britannia must ever rule the waves.

To blot one's copy-book. To make a serious blunder, to mar one's reputation, to do something disgraceful. The derivation is obvious.

Copyhold estate. Land held by possession of a copy made by the steward of a manor from the court-roll of the manor. Copyhold was enfranchised in 1925.

Coq à l'âne. See A COCK AND BULL STORY under COCK.

Corah (kōr' a). in Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, is meant for Titus Oates, notorious inventor of the POPISH PLOT. See Numb. xvi.

Coral. The Romans used to hang beads of red coral on the cradles and round the necks of infants as a charm against sickness, etc., and soothsayers held that it was a charm against lightning, whirlwind, shipwreck and fire. PARACELSUS similarly advocated its use "against fits, sorcery, charms and poison". The bells on an infant's coral were a Roman Catholic tradition to frighten away evil spirits.

Coral is good to be hanged about the neck of children . . . to preserve them from the falling sickness. It has also some special sympathy with nature, for the best coral . . . will turn pale and wan if the party that wears it be sick, and it comes to its former colour again as they recover.

SIR HUGH PLATT:
Jewel House of Art and Nature (1594).

Sir Thomas Browne, Pseudoxica Epidemica, V, xxiii, says:

Though Coral doth properly preserve and fasten the Teeth in men, yet it is used in Children to make an easier passage for them: and for that intent is worn about their necks.

Coram judice (kōr' am joo' di si) (Lat.). Under consideration; still before the judge.

Cordelia (kōr dē' li á). The youngest of King LEAR's three daughters, and the only one that loved him. Cp. GONERIL.

Cordelia's gift. "Her voice was ever soft, gentle, and low—an excellent thing in woman". SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, V, iii.

Cordelier (kōr dē' lyá, kōr de lēr'), i.e. cord-wearer. Franciscan Observantists or "brethren of more strict observance" are called Cordeliers in France on account of their girdles of knotted cord (see FRANCISCANS). The story is that when these Minorites repulsed an army of infidels, St. LOUIS of France (Louis IX, 1226–1270) is reputed to have asked who those gens de cordeliés (corded people) were. From this they received their name.

Cordeliers' Club. A French Revolutionary political club of the extreme left founded in 1790 by Danton, Marat, and Camille Desmoulins, which met originally in the old convent of the Cordeliers; also called the "Society of the Friends of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen" and nicknamed the "PANDEMONTUM". In advance of their rivals, the JACOBINS, in demanding the abolition of the monarchy, the club rapidly declined after the execution of its leaders in March and April 1794.

Il ne faut pas parler latin devant les Cordeliers. Don't talk Latin before the Cordeliers, i.e. FRANCISCANS. A common French proverb, meaning that one should be careful what one says before those who are masters of the subject.

Cordon (Fr.). A ribbon or cord; especially the ribbon of an order of chivalry; also a line of sentries or military posts encircling some position, hence an encircling line.

Cordon bleu. Originally in France a knight of the Order of the St. Esprit (HOLY GHOST) from the fact that their insignia was suspended on a blue ribbon. Hence un repas de cordon bleu is a well-cooked and well-appointed dinner. The Commandeur de Souvé, Comte d'Olonne, and other cordons bleus (i.e., knights of St. Esprit), met together as a sort of club, and were noted for their excellent dinners. Hence when anyone has dined well he says, "Bien, c'est un vrai repas de cordon bleu." Thus the title was playfully bestowed on good cooks.

Cordon noir. A knight of the Order of St. MICHAEL, distinguished by a black ribbon.

Cordon rouge. A chevalier of the Order of St. LOUIS, distinguished by a red ribbon.

Cordon sanitaire. A sanitary cordon, a barrier line enclosing an infected area patrolled by watchers.

Un grand cordon. A member of the French Légion d'Honneur. The cross is attached to a grand (broad) ribbon.

Corduroy. A corded fabric, originally made of silk, and worn by the kings of France in the chase (Fr. corde du roy). It is also a coarse, thick, ribbed cotton stuff, capable of standing hard wear. Hence corduroys as a name for trousers made of such material.

Corduroy road. Roads formed of tree trunks sawn in two longitudinally and laid transversely, thus presenting a ribbed appearance like corduroy.

Corineus. A mythical hero in the suite of BRUTE, who conquered the giant GORMAGOT, for which achievement the whole western horn of England was allotted to him. He called it Corinea, and the people Corineans from his own name. This is the legendary explanation of the name of the county of CORNWALL. See also BELLARUS.

In meed of these great conquests by them got,
Corineus had that province utmost west
To him assayed for his worthy lot,
Which of his name and memorable gest,
He called Cornwall.

SPENSER: Faerie Queene, II, x.

Corinth. Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum. A tag from HORACE (Ep., I, xvii), quoted of some difficult attainment that can be achieved only by good fortune or great wealth. Professor Conington translates it:

You know the proverb "Corinth town is fair,
But 'tis not every man that can get there".

Gellius in his Noctes Atticæ, I, viii, says that Horace refers to Lais who sold her favours at so high a price that not everyone could afford to buy them; but Horace says (I Odes, vii), "To please princes is no little praise, for it falls not to every man's lot to go to Corinth." That is, it is as hard to please princes, as it is to get to Corinth, either because of the expense, or because it is situated between two seas, and hence called Bimaris Corinthus.

Corinthian. A licentious libertine. The loose living of Corinth was proverbial both in Greece and ROME.

In the REGENCY the term was applied to a hard-living group of sportsmen devoted to pugilism and horse-racing. The sporting rake in Pierce Egan's Life in London (1821) was known as "Corinthian Tom"; in SHAKESPEARE's day a "Corinthian" was the "fast man" of the period. Cp. EPHESIAN.

I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy.
Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv.

The term survives in the Royal Corinthian Yacht Club and the Corinthian Amateur Football Club.

Corinthian brass. An alloy made of a variety of metals (said to be gold, silver and copper) melted at the conflagration of Corinth in 146 B.C., when the city was burnt to the ground by the consul Mummius. Vases and other ornaments, made by the Romans, were more highly prized than if they had been of SILVER and GOLD.

I think it may be of Corinthian brass,
Which was a mixture of all metals, but
The brazen uppermost.

BYRON: Don Juan, vi, 56.

Corinthian Order. The most richly decorated of the five orders of Greek architecture. The shaft is fluted, and the capital is bell-shaped and adorned with ACANTHUS leaves.

Corked. This wine is corked, i.e. it tastes of the cork.

Corker. That's a corker. That's a tremendous example of whatever is in question—something very difficult to answer or deal with—said of a story, a problem, a ball in CRICKET, etc.

Corking-pins. Pins of the largest size, at one time used by ladies to keep curls on the forehead fixed and in trim.

Cormoran. The Cornish giant, who in the nursery tale fell into a pit dug by JACK THE GIANT-KILLER. For this doughty achievement Jack received a belt from King ARTHUR, with this inscription—

This is the valiant Cornish man
That slew the giant Cormoran.
Jack the Giant-killer.

Corn, Acknowledge the corn. See ACKNOWLEDGE.

There's corn in Egypt. There is abundance; there is a plentiful supply. The reference is to the Bible story of Joseph in Egypt (Gen. xliii, 2).

To tread on his corns. To irritate his prejudices; to annoy another by disregarding his pet opinions or habits or to offend his susceptibilities.

Up corn, down horn. An old saying suggesting that when corn is up or dear, beef is down or cheap, because people had less money to spend on meat.

Corn Laws. Enactments beginning in 1360 which were designed to regulate the export, and subsequently the import of grain. Particularly noteworthy and unpopular was the Corn Law of 1815 which forbade the import of foreign wheat until the home price reached 80s. per quarter. This kept the price of bread unduly high in times of bad harvests, thus increasing the hardships of the poor. A sliding scale was introduced in 1828 which was further modified in 1842. In 1839 the Anti-Corn Law League was founded in Manchester, and in 1846 Sir Robert Peel secured the virtual repeal of the duties. A nominal duty of 1s. per quarter remained until 1869.

The Corn-Law Rhymer. Ebenezer Elliott (1781-1849) denounced the Corn Laws by portraying the sufferings and miseries of the poor in terms which gave them a wide appeal. His Corn-Law Rhymes appeared in 1831.

Ye coop us up and tax our bread,
And wonder why we pine;
But ye are fat, and round and red,
And filled with tax-bought wine.

Caged Rats.

Cornage. A feudal rent for pasture paid by free men and fixed with relation to the number of horned cattle in their possession. It was most common in the north of England. In Littleton's Tenures (c. 1481) (see COKE) it was mistakenly said to be "a kind of tenure in grand serjeanty", the service being to blow a horn when an invasion of the Scots was imminent.

Cornelia, Mother of the Gracchi. The model of Roman matronly virtue. She was the second daughter of Scipio Africanus. On the death of her husband, T. Sempronius Gracchus, in 154 B.C. she refused to remarry and devoted herself to the education of her three surviving children, Tiberius, Gaius, and Sempronius. When asked to show her jewels, Cornelia produced her two sons, saying, "These are the only jewels of which I can boast."

Corner, To. To buy up the whole of any stock in the market, to buy up the available stocks of a commodity to secure a virtual monopoly in order to raise the price. The idea is that the goods are piled and hidden in a corner out of sight.

The price of bread rose like a rocket, and speculators wished to corner what little wheat there was.
New York Weekly Times (13 June 1894).

To be driven into a corner. Placed where there is no escape; driven from all subterfuges and excuses.

To make a corner. To combine in order to control the price of a given article, and thus secure greater profits.

Corner-stone. A large stone laid at the base of a building to strengthen the two walls forming a right-angle. In figurative use, Christ is called (Eph. ii, 20) the chief corner-stone because He united the Jews and Gentiles into one family; and daughters are called corner-stones (Ps. cxliv, 12) because, as wives and mothers, they unite together two families.

Cornet. The Terrible Cornet of Horse. A nickname of William Pitt the Elder (1708-1778). He obtained a cornetcy in Cobham's Horse in 1731.

Cornish. The Cornish hug. A hug to overthrow you. Cornish men were noted wrestlers and tried to throttle their antagonist with a particular grip or embrace called the Cornish hug.

The Cornish are Masters of the Art of Wrestling . . . Their Hugg is a cunning close with their fellow combatant; the fruits whereof is his fair fall, or foil at the least. It is figuratively applicable to the deceitful dealing of such who secretly design their overthrow, whom they openly embrace.

FULLER: Worthies (1662).

Cornish language. A Brythonic branch of the CELTIC language now only used as an acquired speech by a few. It is supposed that Dolly Pentreath (Dorothy Jeffery, 1685-1778) was the last to speak Cornish as a native language.

Cornish names.

By Tre, Pol, and Pen
You shall know the Cornishmen.

Thus Tre (a hamlet) gives Trebilcock, Tredinnick, Tregaskis, Tregenza, Tre-lawny, Treloar, Tremayne, Trenowth, Treseder, etc.

Pol (a pool) gives Polglase, Polking-horne, Polmear, Polwhele, etc.

Pen (a top) gives Penberthy, Pengelly, Penhale, Penprase, Penrose, Penruddock, etc.

There are countless similarly formed place-names.

The Cornish Wonder. John Opie (1761-1807), the Cornish painter. It was "Peter Pindar" (John Wolcot) who gave him this name.

Cornstalks. In Australia, especially in New South Wales, from colonial times a name for youths, perhaps from their being taller and more slender than their parents.

Cornubian Shore

Cornubian Shore. Cornwall, formerly famous for its tin mines.

... from the bleak Cornubian shore
Dispense the mineral treasure, which of old
Sidonian pilots sought.

AKENSIDE: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cornucopia. See AMALTHEA'S HORN.

Cornwall. The county is probably named from the CELTIC corn, cornu, a horn, with reference to its shape. See also CORINEUS.

Coronation Chair. See SCONE.

Coronet. A crown inferior to the royal crown. The coronet of the Prince of Wales has one arch less than the royal crown; those of other princes are without arches; a duke's coronet is adorned with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a marquis with strawberry leaves alternating with pearls; that of an earl has pearls elevated on stalks, alternating with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a viscount has a string of pearls above the band, but no leaves; that of a baron has only six pearls.

Coronis. (kôr ô' nis). Mother of ÆSCULAPIUS by APOLLO, who slew her for her infidelity; also the daughter of CORONÆUS, King of Phocis, changed by ATHENE into a crow to enable her to escape from NEPTUNE.

Corporal Violet. See VIOLET.

Corporation. A body or succession of persons having legal existence, rights and duties, as distinct from the individuals from whom it is formed. In Britain its usual application is to the body of individuals elected for the local government of a city or town. In America it commonly applies to a company. The word corporation is also facetiously given to a fat paunch, from the tendency of civic bodies to indulge in well-provided feasts, thus acquiring generous figures.

Corposant. The ball of fire which is sometimes seen playing around the masts of ships in a storm. So called from the Ital. corpo santo, holy body. To the Romans the phenomenon was known as CASTOR AND POLLUX, and it is also known as ST. ELMO'S FIRE, HELEN'S FIRE, and Comazant.

Upon the maintopgallant mast-head, was a ball of light, which the sailors call a corposant (corpus sancti), and which the mate had called out to us to look at ... for sailors have a notion that if the corposant rises in the rigging it is sign of fair weather, but if it comes lower down there will be a storm.

R. H. DANA:
Two Years Before the Mast, Ch. XXIV.

Corps Diplomatique (Fr.). The diplomatic body in a capital made up of the diplomatic representatives of the various foreign states.

Corps législatif (Fr.). At various times in modern French history this name has been used for the lower house of the legislature. In 1799 NAPOLEON substituted a Corps législatif and a tribunal for the two councils of the DIRECTORY. In 1807 there was a c.l. and a conseil d'état (council of state); in 1849 a c.l. was formed with 750 deputies; and under NAPOLEON III the legislative power was vested in the Emperor, the Senate, and the c.l.

Corpse Candle. The IGNIS FATUUS is so called by the Welsh because it was supposed to forbode death, and to show the road the corpse would take. The large candle used at LICH WAKES was similarly named.

When any Christian is drowned in the river Dee, there will appear over the water where the corpse is, a light, by which means they do find the body; and it is therefore called the Holy Dee.

AUBREY: Miscellanies (1721), p. 179.

Corpse coins. An old name for the pennies placed on the eyelids of dead persons to prevent them from opening. In the New England states a half-dollar was the traditional coin.

Corpus (Lat. a body). The whole body or substance; especially the complete collection of writings on one subject or by one person, as the Corpus poetarum Latinorum, the Corpus historicum mediæ ævi, etc. Also short for CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE.

Corpus Christi. A church festival kept on the Thursday after TRINITY SUNDAY, in honour of the Blessed Sacrament. It was instituted by Pope Urban IV in 1264. It was the regular time for the performance of religious dramas by the trade guilds and in England, many of the Corpus Christi plays of York, Coventry, and Chester are extant.

Corpus Christi College at Cambridge was founded in 1352, and the college of the same name at Oxford in 1516.

Corpus delicti. (Lat. the body of the crime or offence). The material thing in respect to which a crime has been committed; thus a murdered body or some of the stolen property would be a "corpus delicti".

Corpuscular Philosophy. The theory promulgated by Robert Boyle which sought to account for all natural phenomena by the position and motion of corpuscles. Cp. ATOMIC THEORY.

Corrector. See ALEXANDER THE CORRECTOR.

Corridors of Power. Collectively the ministries in WHITEHALL with their top-ranking civil servants. The phrase was first used by C.P. (Lord) Snow in his novel Homecomings (1956) and gained speedy acceptance. It was used in the title of a later novel Corridors of Power (1964).

Boffins at Daggers Drawn in Corridors of Power.
TIMES (Headline) 8 April, 1965.

Corroboree. A dance practised by Australian aborigines on festal or warlike occasions; hence any hilarious or slightly riotous assembly.

He roared, stamped, and danced corrobory, like any blackfellow.

KINGSLEY: The Water-Babies, ch. viii.

Corruption of Blood. Loss of title and entailed estates in consequence of treason, by which a man's blood was attainted and his issue suffered.

Corsican. An epithet applied to NAPOLEON who was born in Corsica, which became a French possession in 1768. He was often referred to as "the Corsican upstart".

Corsned (kôrs' ned) (O.E. cor, choice, trial; snaed, piece). The piece of bread "consecrated for exorcism", formerly given to a person to swallow as a test of his guilt, a form of trial by ORDEAL. The words of "consecration" were: "May this morsel cause convulsions and find no passage if the accused is guilty, but turn to wholesome nourishment if he is innocent." See CHOKER.

Cortina (kôr' tí nà) (Lat. cauldron). The tripod of APOLLO, which was in the form of a cauldron; hence any tripod used for religious purposes by the ancient Romans.

Corvinus (kôr ví' nus). Matthias I, King of Hungary (1458-90), younger son of John (Janos) Hunyadi, was so called from the raven (Lat. corvus) on his shield. He was one of the greatest of all book collectors and some of the earliest European gilt-tooled bindings were executed for his library. They may be recognized by the raven stamped in the centre of the covers.

Corvus, Marcus Valerius (c. 370-270 B.C.) was so called because while in combat with a gigantic Gaul during the Gallic War he was helped by a raven (corvus) which flew at the Gaul's face.

Corybantes (kor i bân' tēz). The Phrygian priests of CYBELE, whose worship was celebrated with orgiastic dances and loud, wild music. Hence a wild, unrestrained dancer is sometimes called a corybant. In 1890 Prof. T. H. Huxley referred to the members of the SALVATION ARMY as being "militant missionaries of a somewhat corybantic Christianity".

Corycian Cave (kor is' i án). A cave on Mount PARNASSUS named after the NYMPH Corycia. The MUSES are sometimes in poetry called Corycides or the Corycian Nymphs.

The immortal Muse
To your calm habitations, to the cave
Corycian . . . will guide his footsteps.

AKRNSIDE: Hymn to the Naiads.

Corydon (kor' i don). A conventional name for a rustic, a shepherd; a brainless love-sick fellow; from the shepherd in Virgil's Eclogue vii, and in Theocritus.

Coryphæus (kôr i fē' us). The leader and speaker of the chorus in Greek dramas; hence figuratively, the leader generally, the most active member of a board, company, expedition, etc. At Oxford University the assistant of the CHORAGUS was so called. The offices of Choragus and Coryphæus have long since disappeared.

In the year 1626, William Heather, desirous to ensure the study and practice of music at Oxford in future ages, established the offices of Professor, Choragus, and Coryphæus, and endowed them with modest stipends.

Grove's Dictionary of Music.

The Coryphæus of German Literature. Goethe, "prince of German poets" (1749-1832).

The Coryphæus of Grammarians. Aristarchus of Samothrace (2nd century B.C.), an outstanding grammarian and critic.

The Coryphæus of Learning. Richard Porson (1759-1801), renowned for his knowledge of Greek.

Coryphée. A ballet-dancer; strictly speaking, the leader of the ballet.

Cosmonaut. An inflated form of ASTRONAUT, similarly coined when the Russians and Americans began their adventures into space.

Coss, Rule of. An old name for algebra (also called the Cossic Art), from the Ital. regola de cosa, cosa being an unknown quantity, or a "thing". See WHETSTONE OF WITTE.

Costa Brava (kos' ta bra' va). The precipitous coast of Spain lying on the Mediterranean between Port Bou and San Feliù de Guixols.

Costa del Sol. The sunny south-eastern Mediterranean coast of Spain of which Málaga is the largest resort.

Costard. A large ribbed apple, and metaphorically, a man's head. Cp. COSTERMONGER.

Take him on the costard with the hilts of thy sword.—SHAKESPEARE: Richard III, I, iv.

SHAKESPEARE gives the name to a clown in Love's Labour's Lost, who apes the court wit of the period, but miscalls like Mrs. MALAPROP or Dogberry.

Costermonger. A street vendor of fruit, vegetables, fish, etc., properly an appleseller: from COSTARD and monger, a dealer or trader (O.E. mangian, to trade), as in ironmonger, fishmonger, etc. Often abbreviated to coster, the word is generally applied in London to "barrow boys" and COCKNEY dealers. See PEARLIES.

Côte d'Azur. The Mediterranean coast of France between Menton and Cannes, so named in 1887 by the poet Stephen Liégeard.

Côte-d'Or. The department of France of which Dijon is the chief town, famous for its vineyards where the best Burgundy is produced.

Côtes-du-Rhône. The collective name for the wines grown in the Rhône valley below Lyon, of which the most famous are Châteauneuf-du-Pape and Hermitage.

Cote-hardi. A long sideless garment worn in the later mediæval period.

Cotillon, Cotillon (ko til' yon) (Fr. petticoat). Originally a brisk dance by four or eight persons, in which the ladies held up their gowns and showed their under petticoats. It later became a form of quick waltz. The French phrase for PETTICOAT GOVERNMENT is régime du cotillon.

Cotset. A word found in DOMESDAY BOOK denoting 'one of the lowliest types of feudal bondsmen from O.E. cot-saeta, a cottage-dweller.

Cotswold. You are as long a-coming as Cotswold barley. The Cotswold Hills in Gloucestershire are bleak and cold, and wind-exposed. Backward in vegetation, they yield a good supply of late barley.

Cotswold lion. An ironical name for a sheep, for which the Cotswold hills are famous.

Then will he look as fierce as a Cotswold lion.
UDALL: Ralph Roister Doister, IV, vi (c. 1553).

Cottage Countess, The. Sarah Hoggins of Shropshire, daughter of a small farmer, who in 1791 married Henry Cecil, nephew and heir-presumptive of the 9th Earl of Exeter, Lord of Burleigh. He was living under the name of John Jones at the time, and separated from his wife (Emma Vernon), who eloped with a clergyman. He subsequently obtained a divorce to legitimize the children of his second wife. Sarah was seventeen at the time of her marriage at Bolas Magna, Salop, and "John Jones" was thirty. They lived there for two years until his succession to the peerage made her a countess. She died in 1797. Tennyson has a poem on the subject, called The Lord of Burleigh.

Cottage loaf. A loaf of bread in two round lumps, the smaller being on top, and baked with a good crust.

Cottage Orné (Fr. orné, adorned). A cottage residence belonging to persons in good circumstances.

Cottage piano. A small upright pianoforte.

Cottar. In England a class of VILLEIN, a cottager, virtually the same as a BORDAR; one who usually held a few acres in the village fields and who had to give one or two days each week to working for his lord.

In the Highlands of Scotland and in the Orkney and Shetland Isles the name applied to certain tenants with small patches of land owing no services.

Cotton. A cotton king. A rich Lancashire or Manchester cotton manufacturer, a king in wealth, style of living, equipage, etc. Sir Robert Peel, the statesman, could be so designated.

Cotton kingdom. In the U.S.A., the agricultural states of the South, where cotton production expanded rapidly from the close of the 18th century, and stimulated the support for slavery.

Cottonopolis. Manchester, the headquarters of cotton manufacture; Great Britain's largest single export during the 19th century.

Cotton snobs. In the U.S.A., a name applied in the 19th century to the slave-owning cotton magnates of the South, reputed to be pompous and overbearing, without the merits of an older aristocracy.

To cotton on. To catch on, to grasp a line of thought.

To cotton on to a person. To cling to or take a fancy to someone. To stick to a person as cotton sticks to our clothes.

Cottonian Library. The remarkable library founded by Sir Robert Cotton (1571-1631), the antiquary. Rich in early MSS., and augmented by his son and grandson, it was secured for the nation in 1700 and transferred first to Essex House and then to Ashburnham House, Westminster, in 1730. A disastrous fire in 1731 destroyed over 100 volumes of irreplaceable MSS., and the remainder (some 800 volumes) were moved to Westminster School and finally lodged in the BRITISH MUSEUM in 1753.

Cottus (kot' ūs). One of the hundred-handed giants, son of URANUS (Heaven) and GÆA (Earth). His two brothers were BRIAREUS and Gyes.

Cotytto (ko ti tō). The Thracian goddess of immodesty and debauchery, worshipped at Athens with licentious rites. See BAPTES.

Hail goddess of nocturnal sport,
Dark-veiled Cotytto.

MILTON: Comus, 128, 129.

Couéism. A form of psychotherapy dependent upon auto-suggestion, propagated by Émile Coué (1857-1926), a French pharmacist. The key phrase of his system was, "Every day, and in every way, I am becoming better and better."

Couleur de rose (koo lër de röz) (Fr. rose-coloured). Highly coloured; too favourably viewed; overdrawn with romantic embellishments, like objects viewed through rose-tinted spectacles.

Council. Privy, Œcumenical, etc. See these words.

Count (Lat. comitem, accusative of comes, a companion). The continental equivalent of the English EARL (O.E. eorl, a warrior), of which COUNTESS is still the feminine.

Count of the Saxon Shore. Comes Litoris Saxonici, the Roman general in charge of the coastline of Britain from the Wash to the Solent, whose task it was to combat Saxon and Frankish raiders. In the later 4th century his jurisdiction was extended to the Yorkshire coast.

Count, To. From O.Fr. conter; Lat. computare, to compute, to reckon.

Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. See under CHICKEN.

To count kin with someone. A Scots expression meaning to compare one's pedigree with that of another.

To count out the house. When the SPEAKER adjourns a sitting of the HOUSE OF COMMONS because there are not forty members present, after his attention has been called to the fact.

To be counted out is said of a boxer who, after being knocked down, fails to rise during the ten seconds counted out loud by the referee. Count me out. Do not reckon me in this.

To count upon. To rely with confidence on someone or something; to reckon on.

To count without one's host. See TO RECKON WITHOUT YOUR HOST, under HOST.

Countenance, To. To sanction, to support. Approval or disapproval is shown by the countenance. The Scriptures speak of "the light of God's countenance", i.e. the smile of approbation; and to "hide His face" (or countenance) is to manifest displeasure.

Out of countenance. Ashamed, confounded. With countenance fallen or cast down.

To keep in countenance. To encourage, or prevent someone losing his countenance or feeling dismayed.

To keep one's countenance. To refrain from smiling or appearing downcast, to avoid revealing one's thoughts by the face.

To put one out of countenance is to make one ashamed or disconcerted. To discountenance is to set your face against something done or propounded.

Counter. Under the counter. A phrase that became current in World War II, to denote a common practice of dishonest tradesmen. Articles in short supply were kept out of sight, or under the counter, for sale to favoured customers, often at enhanced prices. Cp. BLACK MARKET.

Counter-caster. One who keeps accounts or casts up accounts by counters. Thus Iago (Othello, I, i) contemptuously calls Cassio "a great arithmetician", and "this counter-caster"; and the Clown in The Winter's Tale (IV, ii) says: "Fifteen hundred shorn: what comes the wool to? I cannot do't without counters."

Countercheck Quarrelsome. Sir, how dare you utter such a falsehood? Sir, you know that it is not true. This, in Touchstone's classification (SHAKESPEARE'S As You Like It, V, iv), is the third remove from the lie direct; or rather, the lie direct in the third degree.

The REPROOF VALIANT, the Countercheck Quarrelsome, the Lie Circumstantial and the Lie Direct, are not clearly defined by Touchstone. That is not true; how dare you utter such a falsehood; if you say so you are a liar; you lie or are a liar, seem to fit the four degrees.

Counter-jumper. A contemptuous epithet applied to a shop assistant who may be supposed to have to jump over the counter to go from one part of the shop to another.

Countess. See COUNT; COTTAGE COUNTESS.

Country. Black Country. See BLACK.

Country dance. A corruption of the Fr. contre danse; i.e. a dance where the partners face each other, as in the Sir Roger de Coverley. See COVERLEY.

Father of his country. See FATHER.

To appeal, or go to the country. To dissolve PARLIAMENT in order to ascertain the wishes of the country by a general election.

County (Fr. comté). A SHIRE. Since the Local Government Act of 1888 certain of the larger towns have county status as county boroughs. See also HUNDRED.

County family. A family belonging to the nobility or gentry with an ancestral seat in the county.

County Palatine, or Palatinate (Lat. palatinus, of the palace). Properly the dominion of an earl palatine over which he had quasi-royal jurisdiction. Cheshire, Shropshire, Durham and Kent became

Coup

Counties Palatine after the Norman Conquest as frontier districts, and Lancaster in 1351. At one time Pembroke, Hexhamshire and the Isle of Ely were so designated but only Cheshire, Durham and Lancaster still retain the title, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is a member of the Government. Their jurisdictions are now vested in the Crown. See PALATINATE.

Coup (koo) (Fr.). A blow or stroke. Now used in English for a successful move or stroke in certain games (chess, billiards), a stroke of policy or a sudden and successful act, an illegal attempt to overthrow an established government. See COUP D'ÉTAT.

A good coup. A good hit or haul.

Coup d'essai. A trial-piece; a piece of work serving for practice.

Coup d'état. A state stroke, one of those bold measures taken by a government to forestall a supposed or actual danger to the régime; more commonly a violent or illegal seizure of power from above.

The famous coup d'état by which Louis Napoleon seized power occurred on 2 December 1851.

Coup de grâce. The finishing stroke; the stroke of mercy. When a prisoner was being tortured, the executioner finished him off with a coup de grâce to put him out of his misery.

Coup de main. A sudden stroke, a stratagem whereby something is effected suddenly; a coup.

It appears more like a line of march than a body intended for a coup de main, as there are with it bullocks and baggage of different kinds.

WELLINGTON: Dispatches, vol. I, p. 25.

Coup d'œil. A view, glance, prospect; the effect of things at the first glance; literally "a stroke of the eye".

Coup de pied de l'âne. A kick from the ass's hoof; figuratively, a blow given to a vanquished or fallen man; a cowardly blow; an insult offered to one who has not the power of returning or avenging it. The allusion is to the fable of the sick lion kicked by the ass.

Coup de soleil. A sunstroke or any malady produced by exposure to the sun.

Coup de théâtre. An unforeseen or unexpected turn in a drama producing a sensational effect; something planned for effect, such as Burke's throwing down of the dagger in the HOUSE OF COMMONS. See DAGGER SCENE.

Coup manqué. A false stroke, a miss, a failure.

Shoot dead, or don't aim at all; but never make a coup manqué.

OUIDA: Under Two Flags, ch. xx.

Coupon (Fr. a remnant, a piece cut off.) In commercial usage a detachable ticket cut off a bond entitling the owner to payment of interest. Also used for a variety of slips and tickets which can be detached or cut out for special uses such as food coupons from ration books, coupons from advertisements, etc.

Coupon Election. The General Election of 1918, when PRIME MINISTER Lloyd George and Mr. Bonar Law sent a certificate or coupon to all candidates supporting the Coalition. The coupon was not accepted by the Asquith LIBERALS nor by the LABOUR Party. A couponer was a politician who accepted the coupon.

Course. Another course would have done it. A little more would have effected our purpose. It is said that the peasants of a Yorkshire village tried to wall in a cuckoo in order to enjoy an eternal spring. They built a wall round the bird, and the cuckoo just skimmed over it. "Ah!" said one of the peasants, "another course would 'a' done it".

In the course of nature. In the due or proper time or order, etc.; in the ordinary procedure of nature.

Of course. Naturally; as would be expected. A matter of course is something that belongs to ordinary procedure, or that is customary.

To hold, or keep on the course. To go straight; to do one's duty in that course [path] of life in which we are placed. The allusion is to navigation.

Court. From Lat. cohors, cohortis, originally an enclosure for sheep or cattle; subsequently as many soldiers as could be cooped together in such an enclosure was called a cohort. The cattle-yard, being the nucleus of the farm, became the centre of a group of farm buildings and cottages, then of a hamlet, town, fortified place, and lastly of a royal residence.

Court cards. A corruption of coat card, because they bore the representation of a clothed or coated figure, and not because the king, queen, and knave belonged to a court.

The King of Clubs may originally have represented the arms of the Pope; of Spades, the king of France; of Diamonds, the king of Spain; and of Hearts, the king of England. The French kings of cards are called David (Spades), Alexander (Clubs), Cæsar (Diamonds), and Charles (Hearts)—representing the Jewish, Greek, Roman and Frankish empires. The queens or dames are Argine, i.e. Juno (Hearts), Judith (Clubs), Rachel (Diamonds), and Pallas (Spades)—representing royalty, fortitude, piety and wisdom. They were likenesses of Maria d'Anjou, the queen of Charles VII; Isabeau, the queen-mother; Agnès Sorel, the royal mistress; and Jeanne d'Arc, the dame of Spades or war.

Court Circular. Daily information concerning the official engagements of royalty for publication in the newspapers. George III introduced the custom in 1803 to prevent misstatements.

Court cupboard. A movable buffet to hold flagons, cans, cups, and beakers.

Court fools. See FOOLS.

Court-hand. A cursive form of handwriting which developed in England by the late 12th century as the legal script employed in the writing of the king's business, the law courts, etc. It was abolished in the reign of George II.

Court holy water. An obsolete term of Elizabeth I's reign for fair speeches, which look like promises of favour, but end in nothing.

O nuncle, court holy-water in a dry house is better than this rain-water out o' door.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, III, ii.

In Florio's Italian Dictionary (1598) Mantellizzare is translated by "to flutter or fawne upon, to court one with faire words or give court holywater".

Court-leet. See LEET.

Court martial. A court convened to try a person subject to military law. In Great Britain, such courts resulted from the Mutiny Act of 1689.

Court plaster. Sticking-plaster, so called from the fashion of court ladies patching their faces with fanciful shapes cut out from such plaster. This fashion was in vogue in the reign of Charles I and in Queen Anne's time was employed as a political badge.

Your black patches you wear variously,
Some cut like stars, some in half-moons, some lozenges.

FLETCHER and MASSINGER:
The Elder Brother, III, ii.

Court of Arches. See ARCHES.

Court of Love. A judicial court for deciding affairs of the heart, established in Provence during the days of the TROUBADOURS. The following is a case submitted to their judgment: A lady listened to one admirer, squeezed the hand of another, and touched with her toe the foot of a third. Query: Which of these three was the favoured suitor?

Court of Piepowder. See PIEPOWDER.

Court of Session. The supreme court of civil jurisdiction in SCOTLAND, first established in 1532, and originally modelled on the PARLEMENT of Paris.

Out of court. Not admissible evidence within the terms of reference of the trial being conducted; ruled as being out of consideration.

They are but in the Court of the Gentiles. They are not wholly God's people; they are not the elect, but have only a smattering of the truth. The "Court of the Israelites" in the Jewish Temple was for Jewish men; the "Court of Women" for Jewish women; the "Court of the Gentiles" was for those who were not Jews.

To pay court to someone is to pay attention to or cultivate someone whose favour or interest is wanted.

To settle out of court. A case, almost always involving damages, which is settled by the respective litigants' solicitors, before it is called to court, agreeing on a sum to be paid by the litigant who admits himself to be in the wrong.

Courtesy (kĕr' tĕ si). Civility, politeness. It was at court that those in attendance practised the refinements of the age. The word originally meant the manners of the court.

Courtesy titles. Titles assumed or granted by social custom, without legal status. The courtesy title of the eldest son of a DUKE is MARQUIS; of a marquis is EARL; of an earl is VISCOUNT. Younger sons of dukes and marquesses are styled LORD followed by Christian name and surname. Similarly all daughters of dukes, marquesses, and earls are styled LADY. Sons and daughters of viscounts and BARONS and younger sons of earls are styled the HONOURABLE. These titles do not carry the right to sit in the HOUSE OF LORDS.

Cousin. Blackstone says that Henry IV, being related or allied to every EARL in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged the connexion in all public acts. The usage has descended to his successors, and in royal writs and commissions an earl is addressed "Our right trusty and well-beloved cousin", a MARQUIS "Our right trusty and entirely-beloved cousin", and a DUKE "Our right trusty and right-entirely-beloved cousin".

The word is also used by sovereigns in addressing one another formally.

Cousin Betsy, or Betty. A half-witted person, a BESS OF BEDLAM.

Nobody can say Fosters wronged him of a penny or gave short measure to a child or a cousin Betty.

MRS. GASKELL: Sylvia's Lovers, ch. xiv.

Cousin-german. The children of brothers and sisters, first cousins; kinsfolk (Lat. germanus, a brother, one of the same stock).

There is three cousin-germans that has cozened all the hosts of Reading, of Maidenhead, of Colebrook, of horses and money.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, IV, v.

Cousin Jack. So Cornishmen are called in the western counties, and in places where they are working as miners.

Cousin Michael. The Germans were so called Michel, in Old German, means "gross"; Cousin Michael is meant to indicate a slow, heavy, unrefined, coarse-feeding people.

I wouldn't call the king my cousin. I am perfectly satisfied with things as they are; they couldn't be bettered even if I were cousin to the king.

To call cousins. This formerly meant to claim relationship.

He is half-brother to this Witwoud by a former wife, who was sister to my Lady Wishfort, my wife's mother; if you marry Millamant you must call cousins too.

CONGREVE: Way of the World, I, v.

Cove. An individual; as a flash cove (a swell), a rum cove (a man whose position and character are not quite obvious), a gentry cove (a gentleman), a downy cove (a very knowing individual), etc. The word is old thieves' CANT.

A ben cove, a brave cove, a gentry coffin.

MIDDLETON and DEKKER:

The Roaring Girl, V, i (1611).

Covenanters. A term applied to those Scottish PRESBYTERIANS subscribing to various bonds or covenants for the security and advancement of their cause. The first was entered into by the Lords of the Congregation in 1557 and another by ordinance of King James VI in 1581. In 1638 the National Covenant was directed against the Laudian prayer-book imposed by Charles I. In 1643 a Solemn League and Covenant pledged the Scots and their English Parliamentary allies to preserve Presbyterianism in SCOTLAND and to establish it in ENGLAND and IRELAND.

The name Covenanter is particularly applied to those who adhered to the Covenants after they were declared unlawful in 1662. Between the RESTORATION and the Revolution of 1688 they were harried and proscribed but exhibited a brave and often fanatical resistance. See CAMERONIANS.

The envoy of the Covenanters, to judge by his mein and manners, seemed fully imbued with that spiritual pride, which distinguished his sect.

SCOTT: Old Mortality, ch. vx.

Covent Garden. A corruption of Convent Garden; the garden and burial ground attached to the convent or Abbey of WESTMINSTER, granted at the dissolution of the monasteries to the Duke of Somerset and on his attainder in 1552 it passed to the Earl of Bedford, in whose family it remained until 1910. The original church of St. Paul's Covent Garden was built by Inigo Jones between 1631 and 1638, separated from St. Martin's parish in 1645, and rebuilt after a disastrous fire in 1795. Its peculiar feature is that the portico that appears to be the front is really the back.

The fruit, flower, and vegetable market developed from the 17th century, when the square became popular with stall-holders. The nucleus of the present market buildings date from 1850. In the 17th and 18th centuries the area was the stamping ground of the MOHOCKS and other semi-fashionable ruffians, and its COFFEE-houses and taverns the favourite resorts of poets, actors and artists.

Covent Garden Theatre was opened by John Rich the HARLEQUIN in 1732 but was burnt down in 1808 and again in 1856. It became the Royal Italian Opera House in 1847 and the new opera house was opened in 1858. Since 1949 it has been State-owned. See BOW STREET RUNNERS; BUTTON'S COFFEE-HOUSE; EVANS'S SUPPER ROOMS; HUMMUMS; WILL'S COFFEE-HOUSE.

Coventry. As true as Coventry blue. A proverbial saying, derived from Coventry's connexion with the wool trade, and its reputation for the quality of its dyeing.

Coventry Mysteries. Miracle plays supposed to have been acted at CORPUS CHRISTI at Coventry until 1591. Called Ludus Coventriæ by Sir Robert Bruce Cotton's librarian in the time of James I, their special connexion with Coventry or Corpus Christi is doubtful, although there are two such plays extant, the play of the Shearman and Tailors, and the play of the Weavers. See also MYSTERY.

Peeping Tom of Coventry. See GODIVA.

To send one to Coventry. To take no notice of him; to make him feel that he is in disgrace by ignoring him. Cp. BOYCOTT. It is said that the citizens of Coventry once had so great a dislike of soldiers that a woman seen speaking to one was instantly tabooed; hence when a soldier was sent to Coventry he was cut off from all social intercourse. Clarendon, in his History of the Great Rebellion, says that Royalist prisoners captured in Birmingham were sent to Coventry, which was a Parliamentary stronghold.

Cover. To break cover. To start from the covert or temporary lair. The usual earth-holes of a fox being blocked the night before a hunt, the fox seeks some other temporary cover, and as soon as it quits it the hunt begins.

Coverley. Sir Roger de Coverley. A member of an imaginary club in the Spectator, "who lived in SOHO Square when he was in town". Sir Roger is the type of an English squire in the reign of Queen Anne.

The country dance of this name (or rather as Roger of Coverly) was well known before Addison's time.

Cow. The cow that nourished YMIR with four streams of milk was called Audhumla. Always behind, like a cow's tail. A proverbial saying of ancient date. Cp. Tanquam coda vituli (Petronius).

Cow Cockie. A New Zealand or Australian dairy farmer. See COCKATOO.

Curst cows have curt horns. Angry men cannot do all the mischief they wish. Curst means "angry" or "fierce", and curt is "short", as curt-mantle, CURT-HOSE. The Latin proverb is, Dat Deus iymiti cornua curta bovi.

The cow knows not the worth of her tail till she loses it, and is troubled with flies, which her tail brushed off.

The tune the old cow died of. See TUNE.

The whiter the cow, the surer it is to go to the altar. The richer the prey, the more likely it is to be seized. Pagan sacrifices demanded white cattle.

Cowboy. The term used for the cattlemen of the American West, much romanticized in popular ballad and story. Their "ten-gallon" hats, leather chaps, and high-heeled boots, were characteristic dress in the great days of the Cattle Kingdom. The name was also applied during the Revolutionary Wars to TORY partisans of New York State, notorious for their harsh treatment of their opponents.

Cow-lick. A tuft of hair on the forehead that cannot be made to lie in the same direction as the rest of the hair.

This term must have been adopted from a comparison with that part of a . . . cow's hide where the hairs, having different directions, meet and form a projecting ridge, supposed to be occasioned by the animals licking themselves.

BROCHETT: Glossary of North Country Words.

Cowpuncher. A COWBOY, derived from the metal-tipped pole with which cattle are driven when being loaded on rail.

Cow with the iron tail, The. A pump, from its use in dishonestly watering-down milk.

Coward. Ultimately from Lat. cauda, a tail, either from an animal "turning tail" when frightened, or from cowering with its tail between its legs.

A beast cowered, in HERALDRY, is one drawn with its tail between its legs.

Cowper Justice. See CUPAR JUSTICE.

Cowper-Temple Clause. A famous amendment to the Education Act of 1870 secured by W. Cowper-Temple (1811-1888) which enacted that, "in any school provided by a SCHOOL BOARD, no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination, shall be taught."

Coxcomb. An empty-headed vain person. The ancient licensed JESTERS were so called because they wore a cock's comb in their caps.

Let me hire him too; here's my coxcomb.
SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, I, iv.

Coxswain (cok' sön). The helmsman; originally the swain or man in charge of the COCK-BOAT, formerly spelt cockswain.

Coyne and livery. An old Irish term for food and entertainment for soldiers and forage for their horses, formerly exacted by Irish chiefs when on the march. Coyne is Irish coinnemh, billeting, or one billeted.

Coystril. A term of reproach, meaning a low fellow, a knave, a varlet.

He's a coward and a coystril that will not drink to my niece.

SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, I, iii.

It is a variant of the obsolete custrel, an attendant on a KNIGHT, seemingly from O.Fr. coustillier, a soldier armed with a coustille (a two-edged dagger). Every soldier in the life-guards of Henry VIII was attended by a man called a coystrel or coystril.

Cozen. To cheat. This is the same word as cousin; the Fr. cousiner means "to sponge on" as well as "to call cousin" (see under COUSIN). In England one who cozened another was one who lived on another just as though they were "cousins". See SHAKESPEARE'S Merry Wives, IV, ii, and V, v.

Crab. A walking-stick made of crab-apple wood; a crabstick.

Out bolts her husband upon me with a fine taper crab in his hand.—GARRICK: Lying Valet, I, ii.

To catch a crab. See CATCH.

Crack. First-rate, excellent, quite at the top of its class; as a crack regiment, a crack shot, a crack hand of cards, etc. (See TO CRACK UP.) Formerly the word was used substitively for a lively young fellow, a WAG.

Cracker

Indeed, la! 'tis a noble child; a crack, madam.
SHAKESPEARE: Coriolanus, I, iii.

Nowadays a crack or a wisecrack is a sharp, witty, or humorous saying, or just "a dig" at someone. Both derive from O.E. cracian, to make a sudden sharp noise.

A gude crack. In Scottish dialect, a good chat or conversation, also a good talker.

Wi' merry sangs an' friendly cracks,
I wat they did na weary;
And unco tales, an' funnie jokes—
Their sports were cheap an' cheery.
BURNS: Halloween.

To be a gude crack, that is, to possess talents for conversation, was essential to the trade of a "puir body" of the more esteemed class.

SCOTT: The Antiquary (Advertisement).

Crack-brained. Eccentric; slightly mad.

Cracked pipkins are discovered by their sound. Ignorance is betrayed by speech.

They bid you talk—my honest song
Bids you forever hold your tongue;
Silence with some is wisdom most profound—
Cracked pipkins are discovered by the sound.
PETER PINDAR: Lord B. and his Motions.

Cracked pots last longest. An old proverb. Long-sufferers from ill health or some disability often outlive the seemingly fit and healthy.

Cracks and slams (U.S.A.). Jokes and jibes directed against institutions or individuals (See CRACK.) Slam is to hit or put in place with force.

In a crack. Instantly. In a snap of the fingers, in the time taken by a crack or shot.

Do pray undo the bolt a little faster—
They're on the stair just now, and in a crack
Will all be here.

BYRON: Don Juan, I, cxxxvii.

To be given a fair crack of the whip. To be fairly treated; to receive just treatment; to be given a fair share of something.

To crack a bottle. In this phrase the word implies to open and drink.

You'll crack a quart together, ha! will you not,
Master Bardolph.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, V, iii.

Dear Tom, this brown jug that now foams with mild ale,

From which I now drink to sweet Nan of the Vale,
Was once Toby Filpot's, a thirsty old soul
As e'er cracked a bottle, or fathomed a bowl.
O'KEEFE: Poor Soldier.

To crack a crib. To break into a house and steal. (See CRIB.) Hence, cracksman, a burglar.

To crack up. To praise highly, to eulogize.

We find them cracking up the country they belong to, no matter how absurd may be the boast.
JAMES PAYN: By Proxy, ch. i.

It also means to break down in health or mind.

Cracker-barrel philosophy (U.S.A.) is roughly the same as Homespun philosophy. The barrels in which crackers, or biscuits, used to be kept, were often used as seats in the country stores by local folk who met there and exchanged views on topics of the day, etc. See CROSS-ROADS.

Crackers. In colloquial usage means CRACK-BRAINED.

Cradle-holding. Land held by BOROUGH ENGLISH.

Cradle-snatching. Said of a grown man who consorts with a young girl well below his own age.

Craft. The Craft. A name given to FREEMASONRY by its members.

The Gentle Craft. See under GENTLE.

Crambo. A game which consists in someone setting a line which another is to rhyme to, but no word of the first line must occur in the second. The word is of uncertain origin.

Get the maids to crambo of an evening and learn the knack of rhyming.

CONGREVE: Love for Love, I, i.

Dumb crambo is a somewhat similar game where rhymes of the given word are pantomimed or acted in dumb show until guessed.

Cramp-rings. Rings blessed by English sovereigns and distributed on GOOD FRIDAY, supposed to cure cramp and "falling sickness" (epilepsy). The custom grew up after the time of Edward the Confessor, who was said to have been given such a ring by a pilgrim, and was continued until the reign of Queen Mary Tudor. Cp. KING'S EVIL.

Because Coshawk goes in a shag-ruff band, with a face sticking up in't which shows like an agate set in a cramp-ring, he thinks I'm in love with him.
MIDDLETON: The Roaring Girl, IV, ii (1611).

The superstitious use of cramp-rings, as a preservative against fits, is not entirely abandoned; instances occur where nine young men of a parish each subscribe a crooked sixpence, to be moulded into a ring for a young woman afflicted with this malady.

ROKEWODE:

The Hundred of Thingoe (Suffolk), Introd. (1838).

Cranmer's Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Crannock. An Irish measure which, in the time of Edward II, contained either eight or sixteen pecks. Curnock is another form of the word: this was a dry measure of varying capacity, but usually 3 bushels for wheat, 4 bushels for corn, and from 10 to 15 bushels for coal, lime, etc.

Crapaud, or Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman. See FLEUR-DE-LIS.

Les anciens crapauds prendront Sara. One of the cryptic prophecies of NOSTRADAMUS (1503-1566). Sara is Aras reversed, and when the French under Louis XIV took Arras from the Spaniards, this verse was remembered.

Crape. A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn. (Pope: Ep. to Cobham, 136.) Crape (a sort of bombazine or alpaca) is the stuff of which cheap clerical gowns used to be made, lawn refers to the sleeves of a BISHOP. A saintly parson is all very well but the same goodness in a bishop is exalted into something much more noteworthy.

Craps. The American term for dice, a most popular form of gambling in the U.S.A. About 1800, when New Orleans was a French city, Bernard Marigny introduced dice-playing from France. He was a CREOLE and known as Johnny CRAPAUD, thus dice-playing, or Johnny Crapaud's game, became shortened into "craps". Burgundy Street in the Vieux Carré of New Orleans was, until 1860, known as Craps Street, after Marigny.

Cravat. This neckcloth was introduced into France in the 17th century. Croatian soldiers or Cravates (O.Slav. khruvat) guarded the Turkish frontier of the HABSBURG territories and when France organized a regiment on the model of the Croats, their linen neckcloth was imitated, and the regiment was called "The Royal Cravat".

To wear a hempen cravat. To be hanged.

Craven. The word is derived from O.Fr. cravant, pres. part. of craver or crever, to burst or break, hence to be overcome.

When controversies were decided by an appeal to battle, the combatants fought with batons, and if the accused could either kill his adversary or maintain the fight till sundown he was acquitted. If he wished to call off, he cried out "Craven!" and was held infamous.

Crawler (Austr.). A convict who escaped with the connivance of the overseer, allowing himself to be recaptured in order that the overseer might collect the reward. In this sense it is found in The Adventures of Philip Rashleigh (1825), and thus considerably antedates the modern use as a sycophant or "creep".

Crawley. Crooked as Crawley, or Crawley brook. This brook rising near Woburn in Bedfordshire and running into the Ouse was noted for its meanderings. The proverb is given in Fuller's Worthies.

Creaking doors hang the longest. Delicate persons often outlive the more robust. Cp. CRACKED POTS.

Creatura Christi, or Creature. At one time newly-born children, in danger of dying before the arrival of a priest, were often baptized by a midwife. In the flurry of the moment mistakes could occur over sex of the child, and to avoid the possibility of boys being baptized with girls' names, or the reverse, midwives often named them Creature or Creatura Christi—Christ's Creature being suitable in either case.

Creature. That which is created, animate or inanimate. Thus we speak of a man or animals as "God's creatures" and in the Communion Service (BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER), "these thy creatures of bread and wine".

Creature in the sense of whisky or other liquors is a facetious adaptation of the passage "Every creature of God is good" (I Tim. iv, 4), used in the defence of the drinking of alcoholic beverages.

I find my master took too much of the creature last night, and is now angling for a quarrel.

DRYDEN: Amphitryon, III, i.

Creature also has the meaning of a dependent or hanger-on.

Creature-comforts. Food and other things necessary for the comfort of the body. Man being supposed to consist of body and soul, the body is the creature, but the soul is the "vital spark of the heavenly flame".

A very strong smell of brandy and water forewarned the visitor that Mr. Squeers had been seeking in creature comforts a temporary forgetfulness of his unpleasant situation.

DICKENS: Nicholas Nickleby, ch. ix.

Credat Judæus, or Credat Judæus Apella (Lat.). Let the Jew Apella believe it (HORACE, I Satires, v, 100); tell that to the Marines. (See HORSE MARINES.) Who this Apella was is not known.

Credence Table (kré' dên). The table near the altar on which the bread and wine are placed before they are consecrated. In former times food was placed on a credence table to be tasted prior to being set before the guests, to assure them that the meat was not poisoned (Ital. credenza, a shelf or buffet).

Credit Squeeze. A comprehensive term to cover governmental attempts to check internal consumption and spending in order to curb inflationary tendencies, and often with the further aim of improving the balance of payments. Tight control over borrowing and lending is exercised by raising the bank rate, resulting in dearer money, the restriction of bank lending, hire purchase, etc.

Credo (Lat.). A statement of belief. Literally "I believe".

Credo quia impossibile (Lat.). I believe it because it is impossible. A paradox ascribed to St. Augustine, but founded on a passage in Tertullian's De Carne Christi, IV:

Credibile est, quia ineptum est . . . certum est quia impossibile.

Crème de la Crème (krām de la krām) (Fr.). Literally "cream of the cream"; used figuratively for the very choicest part of something which itself is very choice; the very best.

Cremona (kre mō' nā). A town in Lombardy famous for its violin makers (1550-1750). The most famous makers were Nicolo AMATI (1596-1684), teacher of Andreas GUARNIERI (c. 1626-1698) and Antonio Stradivari (1644-1737). The term is loosely applied to any good instrument. See also STRAD.

The organ-stop known as the cremona is a corruption of the German krumhorn, crooked horn. It is a reed stop of 8-foot tone.

Cremorne Gardens. Famous Victorian pleasure gardens opened in 1845 as a rival to VAUXHALL GARDENS on the land of Chelsea Farm, the former property of Thomas Dawson, Viscount Cremorne. A popular venue for fêtes and entertainments, their clientèle degenerated and they were closed in 1877 after many local complaints. Lots Road Power Station, on the left bank of the Thames near Battersea Bridge, largely occupies their site. Their memory is preserved in Whistler's Nocturnes.

Creole (krē' ōl) (Fr. from Sp. criollo; W. Indian corruption of criadillo from criado, bred, brought up). Originally a person of Spanish parentage born in the West Indies as against those of mixed blood, Negroes, new immigrants, and aboriginals. It is often wrongly used to denote those of mixed blood but its usage varies in different places. In the West Indies it implies European descent; in Louisiana the French-speaking whites; in Mexico, whites of Spanish blood. Non-whites are called Negro creoles, but in Mauritius, Réunion, etc., creole is usually applied to Negroes. The Empress Josephine was a creole from Martinique and the liberated slaves of Liberia called themselves creoles.

Crescent. Tradition says that, "Philip, the father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set the workmen to undermine the walls, but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried; consequently the Byzantines erected a statue to DIANA, and the crescent became the symbol of the state."

Another legend is that Othman, the SULTAN, saw in a vision a crescent moon, which kept increasing till its horns extended from east to west, and he adopted the crescent of his dream for his standard, adding the motto, "Donec repleat orbem".

The crescent as a symbol was used by the Seljuk Sultan Ala-ud-din in the mid-13th century, and it was reputedly adopted from this source by Osman, who founded the Ottoman dynasty in c. 1281. It is also said that the crescent was placed on the Turkish flag by Mohammed II, after the capture of Constantinople in 1453.

Crescent City. The descriptive name in the U.S.A. for New Orleans.

Cresset. A beacon light. The original cresset was an open metal cup at the top of a pole, the cup being filled with burning grease or oil. Hence the name; from O.Fr. craisse (Mod. Fr. graisse), grease.

At my nativity
The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,
Of burning cressets.

SHAKESPEARE: King Henry IV, Pt. I, III, 1.

Cressida, or Cressid. Daughter of Calchas, a priest, beloved by TROILUS. They vowed eternal fidelity and as pledges Troilus gave the maiden a sleeve, and Cressid gave the Trojan prince a glove. Scarce had the vow been made when an exchange of prisoners was agreed to. Diomed gave up three Trojan princes, and was to receive Cressid in lieu thereof. Cressid vowed to remain constant, and Troilus swore to rescue her. She was led off to the Grecian's tent and soon gave all her affections to Diomed—nay, even bade him wear the sleeve that Troilus had given her in token of his love.

As false
As air, as water, wind, or sandy earth,
As fox to lambs, as wolf to heifer's calf,
Pard to the hind, or step-dame to her son;
"Yea," let them say, to stick the heart of falsehood,
"As false as Cressid".

SHAKESPEARE: Troilus and Cressida, III, 1.

Cresswell, Madam. A notorious bawd and procuress who flourished in London between c. 1670 and 1684 and was much patronized by RESTORATION courtiers and politicians. She wintered in CLERKENWELL and kept house in Camberwell in the summer. "Old Mother Cresswell" was not married, although Sir Thomas Player went by the nickname of Sir Thomas Cresswell. In her old age she became religiously inclined and bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. Scott attributes the sermon to the Duke of Buckingham.

"Why," said the Duke, "I had caused the little Quodling to go through his oration thus—"That whatever evil reports had passed current during the lifetime of the worthy matron whom they had restored to dust that day, malice itself could not deny that she was born well, married well, lived well, and died well; since she was born in Shadwell, married to Cresswell, lived in Camberwell, and died in Bridewell."

Peveril of the Peak, ch. xlv.

Crestfallen. Dispirited. The allusion is to fighting cocks, whose crest falls in defeat, and rises rigid and of a deep-red colour in victory.

Shall I seem crest-fallen in my father's sight?
SHAKESPEARE: Richard II, I, i.

Cretean Labyrinth. See LABYRINTH.

Crete. Hound of Crete. A bloodhound.

Coups la gorge, that's the word. I thee defy again,
O hound of Crete.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, II, i.

The infamy of Crete. The MINOTAUR.

At the point of the departed ridge lay stretch'd
The infamy of Crete, detested brood
Of the feigned heifer.

DANTE: Hell, xii (Cary's translation).

Creteism (kret' in izm). Mental imbecility accompanied by goitre, so called from the Crétins of the Alps. The word is a corruption of Christian (Chrétien), because being baptized, and only idiots, they were "washed from original sin", and incapable of actual sin. Similarly, idiots are called innocents.

Crew Cut. A form of hair-cut popularized by U.S. athletes, particularly college rowing teams, in the decade following World War II. The hair is cut very short all over and brushed upright on top, reminiscent of a hedgehog.

Crewel Garters. Garters made of worsted or yarn. The resemblance in sound between crewel (the derivation of which is unknown) and cruel gave rise to many puns.

Ha, ha! he wears cruel garters.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, II, iv.

Crewian Oration. A Latin oration delivered in alternate years by the Public Orator and Professor of Poetry at the ENCENIA of Oxford University, essentially to commemorate the benefactions of Nathaniel, third Baron Crew (1633-1721), Bishop of Oxford and later of Durham. He was a notorious sycophant and a favourite of the Duke of York, afterwards James II. From 1688 he was in disgrace and his benefactions may be regarded as belated attempts to restore his name.

Crib. Thieves' slang for a house or dwelling as "Stocking Crib" (a hosier's shop), "Thimble Crib" (a silversmith's); also slang for a petty theft; and for a literal translation of a Greek or Latin text used as an aid in translating, either openly or surreptitiously.

The word originally denoted a fodder rack with bars in a stable or shippen; hence its application to a child's cot, as in the Lutheran carol beginning, "Away in a manger, no crib for a bed."

In the West Country a working man still has his mid-morning crib or refreshment during his crib-break.

To crack a crib. See CRACK.

To crib is to pilfer, purloin, or to copy someone else's work (especially applied to cheating or "copying" among school children), also to plagiarize.

Cricket. Probably from O.E. cric, cryec, a staff or stick, and thus connected with crutch. Strutt in his Sports and Pastimes of the People of England (1801) suggests that cricket originated from the mediæval game of club-ball. John Derrick of Guildford in 1598 (being then aged c. 59) states that as a boy at school "hee and several of his fellows did runne and play there at Crickett and other plaies". The game was certainly played at Winchester school before the Civil Wars. It began to come into its own in the 18th century and owed much to the Hambledon Club matches on Broad Halfpenny Down, which came to an end in 1793. The Marylebone Cricket Club (M.C.C.), which is regarded as the governing body of the game, was founded in 1787, and the present LORD'S CRICKET GROUND was opened in 1814.

Single and double wicket was played from early on, and sizes of wicket, etc., varied considerably. At the beginning of the 18th century two stumps, 12 inches high and 24 inches apart, were used. In the rules made in 1774 the stumps were to be 22 inches high with a bail of 6 inches. The third stump was added by the Hambledon Club in 1775 and the height of the stump raised from 27 to 28 inches in 1929. See also CHINAMAN; GOOLY.

Who would think that a little bit of leather, and two pieces of wood, had such a delightful and delighting power!

MISS MITTFORD:

Our Village (A Country Cricket-Match).

It's not cricket. It's not done in a fair and sportsmanlike way.

Merry as a cricket. See GRIG.

Crillon kré' yon). Where wert thou, Crillon? Balbis de Berton de Crillon (1543-1615) was one of the greatest warrior captains of the 16th century. Henry IV entitled him "le brave des braves". Crillon, in his old age, was in church listening intently to the story of the Crucifixion. In the middle of the narrative he grew excited, and, unable to contain himself, cried out, "Où étais-tu, Crillon?". Henry IV, after the battle of Arques (1589) wrote to Crillon: "Pends-toi, brave Crillon, nous avons combattu à Arques, et tu n'y étais pas". This letter has become proverbial.

Crimen Læsæ Majestatis (kri' men læ' ze māj es tā' tis) (Lat.). See LÈSE-MAJESTÉ.

Cripplegate. The origin of the name for this district in the City of London is uncertain. St. GILES is the patron SAINT of cripples, but the name is not derived from the former parish church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, which was spelt Crupelgate in the early 13th century. It is possibly from O.E. crepel (a burrow) or crypele (a den). The gate was demolished in 1760.

Crishna. See KRISHNA.

Crisis (Gr. krinein, to decide or to determine), properly means the "ability to judge". HIPPOCRATES said that all diseases had their periods, when the humours of the body (see HUMOUR) ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. These tidal days he called critical days, and the tide itself a crisis, because it was on these days the physician could determine whether the disorder was taking a good or bad turn. The seventh and all its multiples were critical days of a favourable character.

Crispin. A shoemaker. St. Crispin was a shoemaker, and was therefore chosen for the patron saint of the craft. It is said that two brothers, Crispin and Crispian, born in Rome, went to Soissons in France (A.D. 303), to propagate the Christian religion, and maintained themselves wholly by making and mending shoes. Probably the tale is fabulous, for crepis is Greek for a shoe (Lat. crepida) and St. Crepis or Crepid became Crepin and Crispin.

St. Crispin's Day. 25 October, the day of the battle of Agincourt. Shakespeare makes Crispin Crispian one person, and not two brothers. Hence Henry V says to his soldiers:

And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by—
But we in it shall be remembered.

Henry V, IV, iii.

St. Crispin's holiday. Every Monday, with those who begin the working week on Tuesday, still a common practice with some butchers, fishmongers, etc.; a non-work day with shoemakers.

St. Crispin's lance. A shoemaker's awl.

Criss-cross Row. See CHRISS-CROSS.

Critic. A judge, an arbiter. (See CRISIS.) A captious, malignant critic is called a ZOILUS.

Prince of Critics. Aristarchus of Byzantium (2nd century B.C.), who compiled a critical edition of the Homeric poems, commentaries, etc.

Stop-watch critics.

"And how did Garrick speak the soliloquy last night?" "Oh, against all rule, my lord, most ungrammatically. Betwixt the substantive and the adjective, which should agree together in number, case, and gender, he made a breach, thus—stopping as if the point wanted settling; and betwixt the nominative case, which, your lordship knows, should govern the verb, he suspended his voice in the epilogue a dozen times, three seconds and three-fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time." "Admirable grammarian! But in suspending his voice was the sense suspended likewise? Did no expression of attitude or countenance fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrowly look?" "I looked only at the stop-watch my lord." "Excellent observer!"

STERNE: Tristram Shandy, vol. III, ch. xii.

Croak, To. In slang this means to die, the term probably coming from the hoarse death rattle or croak of the expiring breath. A HEDGE doctor or wandering QUACK is known as a Crocus, or one who makes his patients croak.

Croaker. A raven, so called from its croak; one who takes a despondent view of things. Goldsmith, in his Good-natured Man, has a character so named.

Croakumshire. A name given to the county of Northumberland because the natives were supposed to speak with a peculiar croak. It was supposed to be especially observable in Newcastle and Morpeth, where the people were said to be born with a burr in their throats preventing their giving effect to the letter r.

Crockett, Davy (1786–1836). American folk hero famed as a marksman, bear hunter, and fighter. He served under Andrew Jackson in the Creek War (1813–1814). His popularity led him to Congress where his natural wit and homespun stories made him a noted character. He was killed at the ALAMO in 1836.

Crockford. The popular name for Crockford's Clerical Directory, published since 1838 and first compiled by John Crockford. It is a reference book of all the clergy of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and of the other churches in communion with the SEE of Canterbury.

Crockford's was established as an exclusive gambling club at 50 St. James's Street in 1827 by William Crockford (1775–1844), the son of a fishmonger. It became the favourite haunt of the world of fashion, and fortunes were staked there.

Crockford made more than £1,000,000 before he retired in 1840.

Crockford's closed down (c. 1848), consequent upon a change in the Gaming Laws. The present club of this name opened in 1928 essentially as a bridge club. The new Betting and Gaming Act of 1960 permitting the revival of games of chance enabled it to acquire a leading position, with chemin de fer as its main game.

Crocodile. A symbol of deity among the Egyptians, because, says Plutarch, it is the only aquatic animal which has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen, as God sees all, Himself not being seen. To this he adds: "The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech." (De Iside et Osiride, vol. II, p. 381.)

Achilles Tatius says, "The number of its teeth equals the number of days in a year." Another tradition is that, during the seven days held sacred to APIS, the crocodile will harm no one. At Crocodilopolis in the Faiyum, he was worshipped under the name of Sobek.

Crocodile tears. Hypocritical tears. The tale is that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress, to allure travellers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while devouring it.

As the mournful crocodile
With sorrow snares relenting passengers.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. II, III, i.

Cræsus (krē' sūs). Rich as Cræsus. Cræsus, the last king of Lydia (560-546 B.C.), was so rich and powerful that his name became proverbial for wealth. Many of the wise men of Greece were drawn to his court, including Æsop (see under ÆSOP'S FABLES) and SOLON. He was overthrown by Cyrus of Persia.

Crofters. Smallholders in the Highlands of Scotland and the Western Isles, holding their land by a variety of ancient tenures; a COTTAR is somewhat similar to a crofter.

Cro-Magnon Man. A prehistoric race-type named after the Cro-Magnon cave near Les Eyzies in the Dordogne, France, where four of their skeletons were discovered in 1868. Cro-Magnon man is associated with the AURIGNACIAN culture. His skull was long and narrow and larger than that of the average European of today.

Cromlech (krom' lek). A name formerly used by British archaeologists for a NEOLITHIC AGE monument consisting of a large flat stone resting on top of two or more others, like a table (Welsh crom, bent; llech, a flat stone). They appear to be the uncovered remains of burial chambers or cairns, and the French name DOLMEN is now more commonly used.

WAYLAND SMITH'S Cave (Berkshire), Trethevy Quoit (Cornwall), Kit's Coty House (Kent), and the "killing-stone" at Louth (Ireland), are examples among many.

Cromwell's Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Cronian Sea. The north polar sea; so called from Cronos (see KRONOS). Pliny says, "A Thule unius diei navigatione mare concretum, a nonnullis cronium appellatur." (Nat. Hist., iv, 16.)

As when two polar winds blowing adverse
Upon the Cronian sea.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 290.

Cronos, or Cronus. See KRONOS.

Crook. By hook or crook. See HOOK.

Crooked as Crawley. See CRAWLEY.

There is a crook in the lot of every one. There is trial or vexation in every person's life. When lots were drawn by bits of stick it was desirable to get sticks which were smooth and straight; but one without a crook or some other defect is rare. Thomas Boston (1676-1732), a Scottish pastor, published a popular book entitled The Crook in the Lot.

To crook the elbow, or finger. This occurs in England before the mid-1780s. It is the American equivalent to ELBOW-LIFTING. More recently in England to crook the finger means to drink from a tea or coffee cup with the little finger noticeably crooked. This is often regarded as a somewhat ostentatious mark of gentility.

Crooning as a sentimental type of singing began in the U.S.A. about 1929 and rapidly became popular. The singing is very soft "somewhere near the written notes, but preferably never actually on those notes" (Eric Blom), and its effects depend largely on electrical amplification.

Crop Up, or Out. To rise out of, to appear at the surface; hence to occur or arise. A mining term. Strata which appear near the surface are said to crop out. We say a subject crops up from time to time and such and such a thing crops out of what you were saying.

Cropper. To come a cropper. To get a bad fall, literally or metaphorically. "Neck and crop" means altogether, and "to come a cropper" is to come to the ground neck and crop.

Croquemitaine. A HOBGOBLIN, an evil sprite or ugly monster, used by French nurses and parents to frighten children into good behaviour. In 1863 M. L'Épine published a romance with this title, telling the story of a god-daughter of CHARLEMAGNE whom he called "Mitaine". It was translated by Tom Hood (the younger).

Croquet (krō' ki). This garden game takes its name from the Fr. croc, a hook, as the early croquet mallets were shaped like hockey-sticks. It is probably descended from the earlier game of pell mell or PALL MALL. It became popular in England from the 1850s.

Crosier, or Crozier (from Late Lat. crocia; connected with our crook; confused with Fr. crosier from crois, a cross). The pastoral staff of an abbot or BISHOP, and sometimes applied to an archbishop's staff, which terminates in a cross and not in a crook as does the bishop's crosier.

A bishop turns his staff outwards to denote his wider authority; an abbot turns it inwards to show that his authority is limited to his own convent. The abbot covers his staff with a veil when walking in the presence of a bishop, his superior.

Cross. The cross is not solely a Christian symbol originating with the crucifixion of the Redeemer. In Carthage it was used for ornamental purposes; runic crosses were set up by the Scandinavians as boundary marks, and were erected over the graves of kings and heroes. CICERO tells us (De Divinatione, ii, 27, and 80, 81) that the augur's staff with which they marked out the heaven was a cross; the Egyptians employed it as a sacred symbol, and two buns marked with a cross were discovered at Herculaneum. It was also a sacred symbol among the Aztecs; in Cozumel it was an object of worship; at Tabasco it symbolized the god of rain. It was one of the emblems of QUETZALCOATL, as lord of the four cardinal points, and the four winds that blow therefrom.

The cross of the crucifixion is said to have been made of palm, cedar, olive, and cypress, to signify the four quarters of the globe.

In his Monasteries of the Levant (1848) CURZON gives the legend that SOLOMON cut down a cedar and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethesda stood later. A few days before the crucifixion the cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was used as the upright of the Saviour's cross.

Constantine's Cross. It is said that Constantine on his march to ROME saw a luminous cross in the sky with the motto In hoc vinces, by this [sign] conquer. In the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra

(312) he was commanded in a vision to inscribe the cross and motto on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice and prevailed. The LABARUM of Constantine was not really in the form of a cross but a monogram  (XPI) formed of the first three letters of the word Christ in Greek. The legend of the DANNEBROG is similar and there are others. The Scots are said to have adopted St. ANDREW's cross because it appeared in the heavens the night before Achaius, King of the Scots, and Hungus, King of the Picts, defeated Athelstan.

The Cross in heraldry. As many as 285 varieties of cross have been recognized, but the twelve in ordinary use, from which the others are derived, are: (1) the ordinary cross; (2) the cross humetté, or coupé; (3) the cross urdé, or pointed; (4) the cross potent; (5) the cross crosslet; (6) the cross botonné, or treflé; (7) the cross moline; (8) the cross potency; (9) the cross fleury; (10) the cross patté; (11) the Maltese cross (or eight-pointed cross); (12) the cross cleché and fiché.

The cross as a mystic emblem may be reduced to the four following:

1. The Greek cross, found on Assyrian tablets, Egyptian and Persian monuments, and on Etruscan pottery.

2. The crux decussata, generally called St. ANDREW's cross, an X-shaped cross. Quite common in ancient sculpture.

3. The Latin cross, or crux immissa. This symbol is found on coins, monuments, and medals long before the Christian era.

4. The tau cross, or crux commissa. Very ancient indeed and supposed to be a phallic emblem.

The tau cross with a handle, or crux ansata, is common to several Egyptian deities as ISIS, OSIRIS, etc.; and is the emblem of immortality and life generally. The circle on the top signifies the eternal preserver of the world, and the T is the monogram of THOTH, the Egyptian MERCURY, meaning wisdom.

The Cross of Lorraine, with two bars, was adopted as the emblem of the Free French during World War II.

Long Cross. See DAGGER.

The Red Cross on a white ground, sometimes called the Cross of Geneva, is the Swiss flag reversed, and indicates the neutrality of hospitals and ambulances. See GENEVA CONVENTION under GENEVA;

Cp. THE RED CRESCENT under RED. The Red Cross is also the cross of St. GEORGE.

True Cross. See THE INVENTION OF THE CROSS.

Creeping to the Cross. The GOOD FRIDAY ceremony of the Veneration of the Cross was commonly so called in England, when priest and people kneel and kiss the cross on the sanctuary steps. The custom derives from the veneration of the True Cross at Jerusalem. See THE INVENTION OF THE CROSS.

On Good Friday above all in holy Church men creep to the church and worship the cross.

Dives and Pauper

Everyone must bear his own cross. Everyone must carry his own burden or troubles. The allusion is to the practice of the person condemned to crucifixion being made to carry his cross to the place of execution.

Exaltation of the Cross. See under EXALTATION.

Hot cross buns. See BUN.

The Invention of the Cross. Until its abolition by Pope John XXIII in 1960, a church festival held on 3 May, in commemoration of the finding (Lat. invenire, to find) of the "true cross of Christ" by St. HELENA. At her direction, after a long and difficult search in the neighbourhood of the HOLY SEPULCHRE (which had been over-built with heathen temples), the remains of the three buried crosses were found. These were applied to a sick woman, and that which affected her cure was declared the True Cross. The Empress had this enclosed in a silver shrine (after having taken a large piece to ROME) and placed in a church built on the spot for that purpose. See IRON CROWN OF LOMBARDY under CROWN.

The Judgment of the Cross. An ordeal instituted in the reign of CHARLEMAGNE. The plaintiff and defendant were required to cross their arms upon their breast, and he who could hold out the longest gained the suit.

Veneration of the Cross. See CREEPING TO THE CROSS.

On the cross. Not "on the square", not straightforward. To get anything "on the cross" is to get it unfairly or dishonestly.

To cross it off, or out. To cancel it by running your pen across it.

To cross swords. To fight a duel; metaphorically to encounter someone in argument or debate.

To cross the hand, or palm. Gipsy fortune-tellers always bid their dupe to "cross their hand with a bit of silver". This, they say, is for luck. The coin remains with the owner of the crossed hand. The sign of the cross warded off witches and all other evil spirits, and as fortune-telling belongs to the black arts, the palm is signed with a cross to keep off the wiles of the DEVIL.

Crossing the palm is also used colloquially to mean giving a tip or small "bribe". To cross the line is to cross or pass the Equator. The event is accompanied by a long-established ceremony. Those on board are summoned to King Neptune's court and ceremoniously ducked by "bears" and often soap "pills" are administered. The celebrations make a popular diversion from routine and are probably reminiscent of much older maritime rites. In the 18th century similar customs were observed in passing the Straits of Gibraltar and the Cape of Good Hope.

Cross and Ball. The orb of royalty is a sphere or ball surmounted by a cross, an emblem of empire introduced in representations of our Saviour. The cross stands above the ball, to signify that the spiritual power is above the temporal.

Cross and Pile. The obverse and reverse sides of a coin or head and tail; hence money generally and the game of PITCH AND TOSS in particular, to which Edward II was said to be partial. Coins were, in former times stamped with a cross on one side. Pile (Lat. pila) is French for the reverse of a coin.

A man may now justifiably throw up cross and pile for his opinions.

LOCKE: Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690).

Marriage is worse than cross I win, pile you lose.
SHADWELL: Epsom Wells (1672).

I have neither cross nor pile. Not a penny in the world. The French phrase is, "N'avoir ni croix ni pile."

Whachum had neither cross nor pile.
BUTLER: Hudibras, II, iii.

Crossbelts. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Cross-bench. Seats set at right angles to the rest of the seats in the HOUSE OF COMMONS and the HOUSE OF LORDS, and on which members independent of party usually sit. Hence cross-bencher, an independent, and the cross-bench mind, open or unbiased.

Crossbill. The red plumage and curious crossing of the upper and lower bill-halves are accounted for by a mediæval fable which says that these distinctive marks were bestowed on the bird by the CROSSES.—1. Latin. 2. Calvary. 3. Patriarchal, Archiepiscopal, Lorraine. 4. Papal. 5. Greek. 6. Russian. 7. Celtic. 8. Maltese. 9. St. Andrew's. 10. Tau. 11. Pommé. 12. Botonné. 13. Fleury. 14. Moline. 15. Patté. 16. Crosslet. 17. Quadrate. 18. Potent. 19. Voided and coupéd. 20. Patté fiché. 21. Fylfot, Swastika.

Saviour at the Crucifixion, as a reward for its having attempted to pull the nails from the cross with its beak. The fable is best known to English readers through Longfellow's Legend of the Crossbill, a translation from the German of Julius Mosen.

Cross-biting. Cheating; properly cheating one who has been trying to cheat you—biting in return. Hence cross-biter, a swindler. Laurence Crossbiter is the name given to one of the rogues in COCK LORELL'S BOTE.

Cross-bones. See SKULL AND CROSS-BONES.

Cross-grained. Bad-tempered, self-willed. Wood only works smoothly with the grain; when the grain crosses we get a knot or curling which is hard to work.

Cross-legged Knights. Crusaders were generally represented on their tombs with crossed legs.

From him descended cross-legg'd knights,
Fam'd for their faith and warlike fights.

BUTLER: Hudibras, I, i, 471.

To dine with cross-legged knights. See DINE.

Cross questions and crooked answers. A parlour game which consists in giving ludicrous or irrelevant answers to simple questions. Hence the phrase is used of one who is "hedging" or trying by his answers to conceal the truth when questioned.

Cross-roads. In the U.S.A. when used as an adjective implies a rural or unsophisticated quality. From the building of general stores at cross-roads which in thinly populated areas became meeting places for gossip. Cp. CRACKER-BARREL PHILOSOPHY.

Cross-roads, Burial at. All excluded from holy rites (criminals and suicides) were at one time buried at cross-roads. The ancient Teutonic peoples used such places for holding sacrifice and they thus by association came to be places of execution.

Cross-roads of the Pacific. A nickname of Honolulu, from its position on shipping and air routes.

Dirty work at the cross-roads. Foul play; nefarious activity. Probably the phrase arose from the association with burial at cross-roads (see above), or from the fact that cross-roads were often the scene of foul play.

Cross-row. Short for CHRIS-CROSS ROW.

To cross a person's bows. To cause annoyance to another and incur his displeasure. A naval phrase. It is a breach of good manners for a junior ship to cross the bows of a senior.

To cross someone's path. To meet or to thwart a person.

Cross, meaning irritable, bad-tempered.

As cross as a bear with a sore head, as the tongs, as two sticks. Common phrases used of one who is very vexed, peevish, or cross. The allusions are obvious.

Cross-patch. A disagreeable, ill-tempered person. PATCH is an old name for a fool, and with the meaning "fellow" is common enough in SHAKESPEARE, as a "scurvy patch", "What patch is our porter?" etc.

Cross-patch, draw the latch,
Sit by the fire and spin;
Take a cup, and drink it up,
Then call your neighbours in.

Old Nursery Rhyme.

Crotona's Sage (kro tō' ná). PYTHAGORAS. So called because he established his chief school of philosophy at Crotona in Italy (c. 530 B.C.). Such success followed his teaching that the whole aspect of the town became more moral and decorous in a very short time.

Crouchmas. An old name for the festival of the INVENTION OF THE CROSS, also for ROGATION Sunday and Rogation week. "Crouch", here from Lat. crux, means cross.

From bull-cow fast,
Till Crouchmas be past.
TUSSEY: May Remembrances.

Croud. See CROWD.

Crow. A crow symbolizes contention, discord, strife.

As the crow flies. The shortest distance between two places. The crow flies straight to its destination. Cp. AIR-LINE; BEE-LINE.

I must pluck a crow with you; I have a crow to pick with you. I am displeased with you, and must call you to account. I have a small complaint to make against you. In Howell's proverbs (1659) we find the following used in the same sense, "I have a goose to pluck with you." Cp. TO HAVE A BONE TO PICK WITH SOMEONE under BONE.

If a crow help us in, sirrah, we'll pluck a crow together.—SHAKESPEARE: Comedy of Errors, III, 1.

Jim Crow. See JIM.

To crow over one. To exult over a vanquished or abased person. The allusion is to cocks who habitually crow when victorious.

To eat crow. To be forced to do something extremely distasteful. The expression derives from an incident during an armistice of the Anglo-American War of 1812-1814. A New Englander unwittingly crossed the British lines while hunting and brought down a crow. An unarmed British officer heard the shot and determined to punish the offender. He gained hold of the American's gun by praising his marksmanship and asking to see his weapon. The Britisher then told the American he was guilty of trespass and forced him at the point of the gun to take a bite out of the crow. When the officer returned the gun the American in his turn covered the soldier and compelled him to eat the remainder of the crow.

Crow-eaters. Nickname for the inhabitants of South Australia.

Crowd, Croud, or Cruth (Crwth). A mediæval rectangular shaped instrument, with from three to six strings, played with a bow. Hence crowder, a player of the crowd. It lingered on in WALES much longer than elsewhere. John Morgan who died in 1720 was a noted player, and the Welsh crwth survived until the end of the 18th century.

Harkel how the Minstrils gin to shrill aloud
Their merry musick that resounds from far,
The pipe, the tabor, and the trembling croud.
SPENSER: Epithalamion.

I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas, that I found not my heart mooved more than with a trumpet: and yet it is sung by some blinde
Crouder, with no rougher voyce, then rude stile.
SIDNEY: Apology for Poetrie.

Crown. In HERALDRY, nine crowns are recognized: the oriental, the triumphal or imperial, the DIADEM, the obsidional crown, the civic, the crown vallary, the mural crown, the naval, and the crown celestial.

Among the Romans of the Republic and Empire crowns of various patterns formed marks of distinction for different services; the principal ones were:

1. The blockade crown (corona obsidionalis), given to the general who liberated a beleaguered army. This was made of grass and wild flowers gathered from the spot.

2. A camp crown (corona castrensis) was given to the first to force his way into the enemy's camp. It was made of GOLD, and decorated with palisades.

3. A civic crown to one who saved a civis (Roman citizen) in battle. It was of oak leaves, and bore the inscription, H.O.C.S.—i.e., hostem occidit, civem servavit (a foe he slew, a citizen saved).

4. A mural crown was given to the first to scale the wall of a besieged town. It was made of gold and decorated with battlements.

5. A naval crown, of gold, decorated with the beaks of ships, was given to him who won a naval victory.

6. An olive crown was given to those who distinguished themselves in battle in some way not specially provided for.

7. An ovation crown (corona ovatio), made of myrtle, was given to the general who won a lesser victory.

8. A triumphal crown was given to the general granted a triumph. It was made of LAUREL or bay leaves. Sometimes a massive gold crown was given to the victorious general.

The Iron Crown of Lombardy is the crown of the ancient Longobardic kings, said to have been bestowed by Pope GREGORY THE GREAT. CHARLEMAGNE was crowned (774) with it as King of Italy, as was Charles V in 1530. In 1805 NAPOLEON put it on his head with his own hands. It was restored to the King of Italy by the Emperor of Austria in 1866 and replaced in the cathedral at Monza. It is so called from the inner fillet of iron which is said to have been beaten out of a nail from the True Cross which was given to Constantine by his mother, St. HELENA. (See INVENTION OF THE CROSS.) The outer circlet is of beaten GOLD, and set with PRECIOUS STONES.

The crown in English coinage when first minted (1526) was valued at 4s. 6d. and called the crown of the rose, but in the same year replaced by one worth 5s. It was a GOLD coin and did not disappear as such until the reign of Charles II. Silver crowns were struck from 1551. The name derives from the French gold coin (couronne) first issued by Philip of Valois in 1339, which bore a crown on the obverse.

In the paper trade crown is a standard size of printing paper measuring 15 by 20 inches; so called from an ancient watermark.

Crowns of Egypt. See under EGYPT.

Crown of the East. Antioch, ancient capital of Syria, which consisted of four walled cities, encompassed by a common rampart that "enrounded them like a coronet".

Crown of Thorns. The crown of Christ upon the Cross.

Crown of Wild Olive. The satisfaction of having performed a worthwhile task for its own sake rather than for gain. This crown was the only prize awarded to victors in the ancient OLYMPIC GAMES, the wild olive being held sacred from its having been first planted by HERCULES.

John Ruskin has a book of this title, first published in 1866, which is a series of four essays or lectures on work, traffic, war, and the future of ENGLAND.

Crowquill, Alfred. This was the name used by Alfred Henry Forrester (1805-1872), the black-and-white artist of Punch and the Illustrated London News. He was famous in his day as the illustrator of DR. SYNTAX, the BON GAULTIER BALLADS, Baron MUNCHAUSEN and other popular works.

Crozler. See CROSIER.

Crucial (kroo' shál). A crucial test. A very severe and undeniable test. The allusion is to a fancy of Francis Bacon, who said that two different diseases or sciences might run parallel for a time but would ultimately cross each other; thus, the plague might for a time resemble other diseases, but when the bubo or boil appeared, the plague would assume its special character. Hence the phrases instantiacrucis (a crucial or unmistakable symptom), a crucial experiment, example, question, etc. Cp. CRUX.

Cruel, The. Pedro, King of Castile (1333, 1350-1369), so called for the murders he perpetrated. He was finally overthrown and slain in Du Guesclin's tent by his brother Henry.

Cruel Garters. See CREWEL.

Cruft's. The usual name for the internationally famous Cruft's Dog Show, now held at Olympia and founded by Charles Cruft in 1891. Some years after his death in 1938, the show was taken over by the Kennel Club. Cruft's interest in dogs largely arose from his apprenticeship to James Spratt in 1876. Spratt had recently started a "dog cake" business in HOLBORN, having got the idea from America.

Crummy. In obsolete slang, expressive of something desirable, as that's crummy, that's good; also meaning plump, well developed, as she's a crummy woman, a fine, handsome woman. No doubt from crumb, being the soft or fleshy part of the bread. Among soldiers the word has usually meant lousy, infested with lice, and this is its present meaning. Here it is probably from the likeness in appearance between breadcrumbs and the eggs of a louse. Cp. CRUSTY.

Crumpet. See MUFFINS.

Crusades. Wars undertaken by Christians in the late MIDDLE AGES to secure the right of Christian pilgrims to visit the Holy Sepulchre and to recover the HOLY LAND from its Mohammedan conquerors. The name is derived from the CROSS which the Crusaders wore on their dress. Ideas of CHIVALRY as well as hopes of material gain were prominent. According to Matthew Paris, each nation had its special colour, which was red for France; white for ENGLAND; green for Flanders; blue or azure for Italy; gules for Spain; for SCOTLAND, a St. Andrew's cross; for the Knights TEMPLAR, red on white.

There were eight principal crusades:

1. Proclaimed by Urban II in 1095. The futile expeditions under PETER THE HERMIT and Walter the Penniless were destroyed by the Turks, but the main expedition (1096-1099) under Raymond of Toulouse, Robert of Normandy, and Godfrey of Bouillon, ended with the capture of Jerusalem. The Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem was set up in 1100 under Baldwin I.

2. After the loss of Edessa an unsuccessful expedition (1147-1149) was promoted by St. BERNARD under the leadership of the Emperor Conrad III and Louis VII of France.

3. Inspired by the fall of Jerusalem in 1187, and led by Frederick Barbarossa, Philip Augustus of France and Richard I of England. Begun in 1188, it reached a stalemate in 1192.

4. Promoted by Innocent III in 1202 and led by Thibaut of Champagne and Baldwin of Flanders it was diverted, in spite of the Pope's prohibitions, into an attack on Constantinople. Baldwin became the first Latin Emperor of Constantinople in 1204.

5. Proclaimed by Innocent III for 1217 to recover Jerusalem. The main force was directed against Egypt. Damietta was taken but given up in 1221.

6. The Emperor Frederick II obtained Nazareth, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem by negotiation (1222-1229), although he was under excommunication at the time, but was absolved on his return.

7. Followed the loss of Jerusalem in 1244. It was organized and led by St. LOUIS (Louis IX) of France in 1248. The main expedition against Egypt led to his capture in 1250. After release he made fruitless efforts to recover the Holy Land and returned home in 1254.

8. The Last Crusade. Undertaken by St. Louis, Charles of Anjou, and Prince Edward of England. St. Louis died in 1270 at Tunis and the project finally petered out in 1272.

The Children's Crusade of 1212 was due to misguided zeal. There were two main expeditions. Some 40,000 German children under one Nicholas, set off over the Alps for Italy. Only a few reached Genoa and ROME, where Innocent III ordered them home. Some hundreds possibly sailed from Brindisi to disappear from history. Another 30,000 French children, under Stephen of Cloyes, set out for Marseilles and about 5,000 were eventually offered passage by scoundrelly ship masters only to be wrecked or sold as slaves to the MOSLEMS. See PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.

Crush. To crush a bottle—i.e. to drink one. Milton has crush't the sweet poison (Comus, 47). The idea is that of crushing grapes. SHAKESPEARE also has burst a glass in the same sense (Induction of The Taming of the Shrew), Cp. TO CRACK A BOTTLE under CRACK.

Come and crush a cup of wine.
SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, ii.

To crush a fly on a wheel. Another form of "to break a butterfly on a wheel". See under BREAK.

To have a crush on someone is to have an infatuation for someone—a school-girl's phrase.

Crush-room. An old term for a room in a theatre or opera-house, etc., where the audience can collect and talk during intervals, wait for their carriages, and so on.

Crust. The upper crust (of society). The aristocracy; the UPPER TEN thousand. The phrase was first used in Haliburton's Sayings and Doings of Sam Slick. The upper crust was at one time the part of the loaf placed before the most honoured guests.

Crusted port. When port is first bottled its fermentation is not complete; in time it precipitates argol on the sides of the bottle, where it forms a crust. Crusted port, therefore, is port which has completed its fermentation.

Crusting. An American hunting term for taking big game in winter when the ice of ponds, rivers and lakes will bear the weight of a man but not that of a moose or deer.

Crusty. Ill-tempered, apt to take offence, cross, peevish. (Cp. CRUMMY.) ACHILLES addresses the bitter THERSITES with:

Thou crusty batch of nature, what's the news?
SHAKESPEARE: Troilus and Cressida, V, i.

Crutched Friars. Crutched is the Lat. cruciati, crossed, from the cross at the top of their staff, later embroidered on their dress. They were a mendicant order established in Italy by 1169 and followed an Augustinian rule. They arrived in England in 1244 and the order was suppressed by the POPE in 1656.

Crux. A knotty point, an essential point, that on which a decision depends. It does not refer to the CROSS as an instrument of punishment, but to the crossing of two lines, called a node or knot; hence trouble or difficulty. Quæ te mala crux agitat? (Plautus); What evil cross distresses you?—i.e. what difficulty, what trouble are you under? See CRUCIAL.

Crux Ansata. See TAU CROSS under CROSS.

Crux Decussata. See CROSS.

Crux pectoralis (Lat. pectus, breast). A cross suspended over the breast usually worn by BISHOPS, abbots and CARDINALS.

Cry. For the distinctive cries of animals, see ANIMALS.

A far cry. A long way; a very considerable distance; used both of space and time, as, "it is a far cry from David to Disraeli, but they were both Jews"; "it's a far cry from Clapham to Kamchatka".

One of the Campbells replied, "It is a far cry to Lochow"; a proverbial expression of the tribe, meaning that their ancient hereditary domains lay beyond the reach of an invading enemy.

SCOTT: Legend of Montrose, ch. xii.

For crying out loud. A colloquial exclamation of astonishment or annoyance current since the 1920s, probably a subconscious EUPHEMISM for a blasphemous utterance.

Great cry and little wool. A proverbial equivalent expressive of contempt for one who promises great things but never fulfils the promises—i.e. "all talk and no do". Originally the proverb ran, "Great cry and little wool, as the Devil said when he sheared the hogs." It appears in this form in the ancient MYSTERY of David and Abigail, in which Nabal is represented as shearing his sheep and the DEVIL imitates him by shearing a hog.

Thou wilt at best but suck a bull,
Or shear swine, all cry and no wool.
BUTLER: Hudibras, I, i, 851.

Hue and cry. See HUE.

In full cry. In full pursuit. A hunting phrase, with allusion to a yelping pack of hounds in full chase.

It's no good crying over spilt milk. It's useless lamenting what has happened, it is done and cannot be undone.

To cry aim. See AIM.

To cry cave (kā' vi). To give warning (Lat. cave, beware); a traditional school-boy's warning given to his fellows on the approach of a master.

To cry down. To condemn, to belittle.

To cry havoc. See HAVOCK.

To cry off. To go back on a bargain or arrangement. In the U.S.A. it means to sell at auction.

To cry quits. See under QUIT.

To cry stinking fish. To belittle one's own endeavours, offerings, etc. "To cry" here is to offer for sale by shouting one's wares in the street.

To cry up. To praise loudly and publicly.

To cry wolf. See under WOLF.

Crystal Gazing, or, as it is sometimes called, Scrying, is a very ancient form of DIVINATION. By gazing fixedly and deeply into a polished crystal ball, it was held that those possessing the gift could see what is about to happen or what was actually happening at some distant place, etc. To gaze into the crystal ball is to see into the future, to seek inspiration to answer questions.

Crystal Palace. One of the glories of the Victorian era. It was designed entirely of glass and iron by Joseph Paxton, a former head gardener at Chatsworth, to house the Great Exhibition of 1851, or to give it its full name, the Great Exhibition of the Works of Industry of All Nations. It was originally erected in Hyde Park but moved to Sydenham in 1854 with some alterations, including the addition of two towers, and used as an exhibition, entertainment, and recreational centre. It became national property in 1911 and was destroyed by fire in 1936.

The Crystalline Sphere. According to Ptolemy, the ninth orb, identified by some with "the waters which were above the firmament" (Gen. i, 7); it was placed between the "PRIMUM MOBILE" and the firmament, or sphere, of the fixed stars, and was held to have a shivering movement that interfered with the regular motion of the stars.

They pass the planets seven, and pass the fixed,
And that crystalline sphere, whose balance weighs
The trepidation talked.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, III, 481.

Crystallomancy. Divination by means of transparent bodies such as a crystal globe, polished quartz, and precious stones, especially a beryl. See CRYSTAL GAZING.

Cub. An ill-mannered lout. See TO LICK INTO SHAPE under LICK.

Cubbing, or Cub-hunting. Preliminary training for young foxhounds. Fox cubs have not the cunning nor the staying power of the grown fox, and thus offer better sport for young hounds and young riders.

Wolf Cub. See BOY SCOUT.

Cuba. The Roman deity who guarded infants in their cribs and sent them to sleep (Lat. cubo, I lie down in bed). See BABES, PROTECTING DEITIES OF.

Cubism. The style of an early 20th-century school of painters who depict surfaces, figures, tints, light and shade, etc., by means of a multiplicity of shapes of a cubical and geometrical character. The name was given somewhat disparagingly by Henri Matisse in 1908. It was essentially abstract and divorced from realism. It rejected any attempt to depict actual appearances and turned its back on all accepted canons of art. Its chief exponents were Braque, Derain, Léger, and notably Picasso. See also DADA, IMPRESSIONISM, SURREALISM.

Cubit (Lat. cubium, elbow). An ancient measurement of length from the elbow to the tip of the longest finger. The Roman cubit was c. 17½ in., the Egyptian c. 21 in. (which was divided into seven palms), and that of the Hebrews c. 22 in. The English cubit was 18 in.

Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?—Mat. vi, 27.

Cuchulain, or Cú Chulainn (koo kŭl in, koo koo lin). A legendary Irish hero, called the "Hound of Culann" because, having accidentally slain the watchdog of the smith, Culann, in penance he had to take the animal's place. He was brought up in the court of King CONCHOBAR of Ulster, whose kingdom he defended single-handed against the Queen of Connaught. He is called Cuthullin by OSSIAN.

Cuckin'-stool. A kind of stool once used for ducking scolds, disorderly women, dishonest apprentices, etc., in a pond. "Cucking" is from the old verb cuck, to void excrement, and the stool used was often a close-stool.

Now, if one cucking-stool was for each scold,
Some towns, I fear, would not their numbers hold.
Poor Robin (1746).

Cuckold. The husband of an adulterous wife; so called from the CUCKOO, whose chief characteristic is to deposit its eggs in other birds' nests. Johnson says, "it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out 'Cuckoo', which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned." Greene calls the cuckoo "the cuckold's quirister" (Quip for an Upstart Courtier, 1592), and the Romans used to call an adulterer a "cuckoo", as "Te cuculum uxor ex lustris rapit" (Plautus: Asinaria, V, iii). Cp. ACTÆON; HORN.

The cuckoo then, on every tree,
Mocks married men, for thus sings he—Cuckoo;

Cuckoo

Cuckoo, cuckoo,—O word of fear
Unpleasing to a married ear!
SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, V, ii.

Cuckold's Point. A spot on the Thames-side near Deptford so called from a tradition that King John there made love successfully to a labourer's wife.

Cuckoo. Cuckoo folklore and superstitions abound and are often tokens of the bird's popularity as a herald of spring. There are many old rhymes and proverbs about this bird; one says:

In April the cuckoo shows his bill;
In May he sings all day;
In June he alters his tune;
In July away he'll fly;
In August go he must.

Also:

Turn your money when you hear the cuckoo, and you'll have money in your purse till he come again.

And:

The cuckoo sings from St. Tiburtius' Day (14 April) to St. John's Day (24 June).

Cuckoo oats and woodcock hay make a farmer run away. If the spring is so backward that oats cannot be sown till the cuckoo is heard (i.e. April), or if the autumn is so wet that the aftermath of hay cannot be got in till woodcock shooting (middle of November), then the farmer is in a bad way.

Cuckoo flowers, etc. There are many flower and plant names associated with the cuckoo. As a representative selection may be mentioned cuckoo-flower or lady's smock; cuckoo's joy, marsh marigold; cuckoo's sorrow, sheep sorrel; cuckoo-pint, LORDS AND LADIES or priest in the pulpit; cuckoo-grass, woodrush; cuckoo's potatoes, pignut; cuckoo's sorrel, wood sorrel.

Cuckoo-spit, or frog-spit. A frothy exudation deposited on plants by certain insects, especially the froghopper (Aphrophora spumaria), for the purpose of protecting the larvae. So called from an erroneous popular notion that the froth was spat out by cuckoos.

Cicades are bred out of cuckoo spittle or Wood-sear; that is, that spumous, frothy dew or exudation or both, found upon Plants, especially about the joints of Lavender and Rosemary, observable with us about the latter end of May.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE:
Pseudodoxia Epidemica, v, 3. (1646).

Cloud-cuckoo-land. See under CLOUD. Don't be a cuckoo. Don't be a silly ass; don't go and make a fool of yourself.

To wall in the cuckoo. See COURSE.

Cucullus non facit monachum (ku kul' lus non fak' it mo na' kum) (Lat. The cowl does not make the monk). Do not judge a person by external appearances. An old proverb quoted by SHAKESPEARE in Twelfth Night, I, v.

Cuddy, an abbreviation of Cuthbert, and the North Country and Scottish familiar name for a donkey, elsewhere called NEDDY or Jack. As an ass it also means a fool or dolt.

Cudgel. To cudgel one's brains. To make a painful effort to remember or understand something. The idea is from taking a stick to beat a dull boy under the notion that dullness is the result of temper or inattention.

Cudgel thy brains no more about it; for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, V, i.

To take up the cudgels. To maintain an argument or position. To fight, as with a cudgel, for one's own way or point of view.

Cue. Besides the usual dictionary meaning of a catchword for an actor or a hint, as SHAKESPEARE'S "When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer" (Midsummer Night's Dream, IV, i), it also meant a humour or frame of mind.

The lassies were pretty and agreeable; the baillie's wife one of the best creatures that ever lived; and my uncle in thoroughly good cue.

DICKENS: Pickwick Papers, ch. xlix.

Cuff. Speaking off the Cuff. Without previous preparation. Probably from the habit of some after-dinner speakers of making jottings on their stiff shirt cuffs as ideas occur to them during the meal.

Cuffy, or Cuffee. A Negro. Both a generic word and a proper name; possibly from the association of slavery with cuffs (handcuffs). Cf. SAMBO; JIM CROW.

Boots blacked—pass in pocket—all grand as Cuffee.

H. BEECHER STOWE, Uncle Tom's Cabin, ch. vi.

Cufuffle, Curfuffle, or Carfuffle. A fuss or excitement. An old and expressive word of uncertain origin, but possibly from a verb used in Northern Ireland meaning to shake up and toss hay or straw. Cufuffled is also to be ruffled or rumped.

And wha suld come whirling there in a post-chaise but Monkbarns in an unco carfuffle—now it's no little thing that will make his honour take a chaise and post-horse twa days rinnin'.

SCOTT: The Antiquary, ch. xx (1816).

Cui bono? (kwi bō' nō). Who is benefited thereby? To whom is it a gain? A common but wrong meaning attached to the phrase is, "What good will it do?" "For what good purpose?" It was the question of the Roman judge L. Cassius Pedanius (see Cicero, Rosc. Am., xxv, 84).

Cato, that great and grave philosopher, did commonly demand, when any new project was propounded unto him, cui bono, what good will ensue in case the same is affected?

FULLER: Worthies (The Design), i.

Culdees (kūl dēz'). A religious order in IRELAND and SCOTLAND from about the 8th century to the 13th, although they continued in Ireland until the REFORMATION. So called from the Old Irish céle dé, servants of God. They seem to have originated as independent communities of hermits or anchorites and latterly were essentially secular CANONS.

Cullinan Diamond. The largest known DIAMOND, named after the chairman of the Premier Mine, Johannesburg, where it was found in 1905. Its uncut weight was 3,025½ carats (about 1 lb. 6 oz.). It was presented to King Edward VII by the South African Government and was cut into a number of stones (the largest weighing some 516 carats), which now form part of the Crown Jewels. Cp. KOH-I-NOOR.

Cullion. See CULLY.

Cully. A fop, a fool, a dupe, a strumpet. Possibly a contraction of cullion, a despicable creature, a sponger (Ital. coglione, Lat. coleus, a leather bag or sheath). SHAKESPEARE says "Away, base cullions!" (Henry VI, Pt. II, I, iii), and in The Taming of the Shrew, IV, ii—"And makes a god of such a cullion". Cp. GULL.

You base cullion, you.

JONSON: Every Man in his Humour, III, ii.

Culross Girdles. The thin plate of iron on which oaten cakes, scones, etc., are cooked is called a "girdle" in Scotland and is similar in use to the Welsh bake-stone. Thus we speak of girdle cakes and bakestone cakes. Culross was formerly celebrated for its iron girdles.

Locks and bars, plough-graith and harrow-teeth! and why not grates and fireprongs, and Culross girdles?—SCOTT: Fair Maid of Perth, ch. ii.

Cultures, The Two. The existence in England, and to a great extent in Western Europe, of two separate cultures with few points of contact between them; one based on the humanities and the other on the sciences. The phrase gained immediate popularity after C.P. (Lord) Snow's Rede Lecture, subsequently published as The Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution (1959). A useful comparison may be made with the ideas expressed in Matthew Arnold's Culture and Anarchy (1869) and his Rede Lecture entitled Literature and Science (1882).

Culver (kūl' vér). A dove or pigeon; from O.E. culfre, hence culver-house, a dovecote or pigeonhouse. The word is not connected with Lat. columba, dove.

Pigeons formed a very useful addition to the table in former times and the culver-houses were maintained by manorial lords, monasteries, and parish clergy. There were some thousands still in use in 17th-century England.

Culverkeys. An old popular name for such plants as the bluebell, columbine, squill, etc., the flowers of which have some resemblance to a bunch of keys (O.E. culfre, a dove).

Cumberland Poets. See LAKE SCHOOL.

Cumberland Presbyterians. A separatist group formed in Cumberland, Kentucky, in 1810, following a dispute with the Kentucky Synod of the American PRESBYTERIAN Church over the formal requirements for the ministry. Those of the Cumberland presbytery unsuccessfully urged the need to dispense with the usual high educational standards in a frontier environment.

Cum grano salis (kūm grā' nō sā' lis) (Lat. with a grain of salt). There is some truth in the statement but we must use great caution in accepting it. Similarly we "take something with a pinch of salt", i.e. we do not wholly accept it.

Cummer. A gude wife, old woman, midwife, gossip, neighbour (Fr. commère). Frequently used in Scott's novels. Cp. GAFFER; GAMMER.

Cunctator (kūngk tā tōr) (Lat. the delayer). Used of one given to delay and especially of Quintus Fabius Maximus. He gained the epithet as an abusive title for his delaying tactics against Hannibal and avoidance of pitched battles, but subsequent events, such as Hannibal's great victory at CANNÆ (216 B.C.), seemed to justify his policy, and what started as a slur became an honour. Du Guesclin used similar tactics successfully against the English during the HUNDRED YEARS WAR. See FABIUS.

Cuneiform Letters. Wedge-shaped letters, also called arrow-headed (Lat. cuneus, a wedge). A name for the writing of ancient Babylonia, Assyria, Persia, and the Hittites, which was made up of wedge-shaped impressions made on soft clay. The name cuneiform is said to have been first used by the Orientalist Thomas Hyde, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford (1636-1703). Cuneiform script was used from c. 3800 B.C. until the early years of the Christian era. The first to decipher the letters was Grotefend of Hanover in 1802.

Cunning

Cunning. A word with several meanings which comes from the O.E. cuman, as does "ken", to know, and was applied to someone who knew things. As WYCLIF'S BIBLE translates Genesis ii, 9:

A tree of kunnyng of good and euil.

By extension of this came the meaning of skill:

If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.—Psalms cxxxvii.

The word had already begun to infer a knowledge of occult and evil matters:

We take cunning for a sinister, or crooked wisdom.—BACON: Of Cunning (1612).

and a Cunning Man or Woman was merely another name for a WIZARD, or WITCH. Hence the usual present meaning of sly and crafty.

The originally American usage of charming, pretty, engaging or clever was customary there by the mid-19th century.

Cunobelin (kü' nō bel' in). Cunobelinus, King of the Catuvellauni (A.D. 5-40), and the father of Caractacus (see CARADOC). His name is preserved in modified form in Cymbeline, and in "Cunobelin's gold-mines", the local name for the dene-holes in the chalk beds of Little Thurrock, Essex, traditionally said to have been used by Cunobelin (and also by the Danes) for refuge.

Cup. A mixture of strong ale with sugar, spice, and a lemon, properly served up hot in a silver cup. Sometimes a roasted orange takes the place of a lemon. Cp. BISHOP.

Cider cup, claret cup, etc., are drinks made of these beverages, with sugar, fruit, and herbs.

Cup Final. The final round of a football contest, etc., on the result of which a championship cup is awarded. In England the most popular is for the Football Association Cup. An engraved cup, usually of silver, is a common form of trophy for many sporting events.

Divination by cup. An ancient method of DIVINATION by floating certain articles on a cup of water and reading the signs. The practice survives in fortune-telling with a cup of tea. After the last of the liquid is disposed of the arrangement of the sediment is examined for signs.

Grace Cup. See LOVING or GRACE CUP under LOVE.

He was in his cups. Drunk. Inter pocula, inter vina (Horace: Odes III, vi, 20).

Let this cup pass from me. Let this trouble or affliction be taken away, that I may not be compelled to undergo it. The reference is to Christ's agony in the Garden of GETHSEMANE (Matt. xxvi, 39). Loving, or Grace Cup. See under LOVE. My cup runs over. My blessings overflow. Here cup signifies portion or blessing.

My cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life. Ps. xxiii, 5, 6.

Not my cup of tea. This does not suit me, this is not my line, this is not the sort of thing I want.

Stirrup cup. See under STIRRUP.

The cup of vows. In Scandinavia it was anciently customary at feasts to drink from cups of mead, and vow to perform some great deed worthy of the song of the skald. There were four cups: one to ODIN, for victory; one to FREYJA, for a good year; one to NIORD, for peace; and one to BRAGI, for celebration of the dead in poetry.

The Cups that cheer but not inebriate. Tea. A quotation from Cowper's Task, iv, 36, 40.

There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. Success is not always certain, things can go wrong at the last moment. See ANCÆUS.

We must drink the cup. We must bear our allotted burden, the sorrow which falls to our lot.

Cupar (koo' par). He that will to Cupar maun to Cupar. A wilful man must have his way, even to his own injury. A Scottish proverbial saying. Caleb Calderston uses it in Scott's Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xviii. The reference is to the fact that the Five Courts of Justice were formerly at Cupar.

Cupar justice. The same as "Jedburgh justice", hang first and try afterwards. It is sometimes called "Cowper law" and it owed its rise to a baron-baile in Coupar-Angus before heritable jurisdictions were abolished. Abingdon Law is a similar phrase. It is said that during the COMMONWEALTH Major-General Browne of Abingdon first hanged his prisoners, then tried them. Cp. JEDWOOD JUSTICE; LYDFORD LAW.

Cupboard Love. Love from self-interest or hope of gain. The allusion is to the love of children for some indulgent person who gives them something nice from her cupboard.

Cupid (Lat. cupido, desire, love). The Roman god of love, identified with the Greek EROS. He is usually represented as a beautiful winged boy, blindfolded, and carrying a bow and arrows. There are varying legends of his parentage.

Cupid and Psyche (si' ki). The story is told in the GOLDEN ASS of Apuleius. See PSYCHE.

Cupid's golden arrow. Virtuous love.

Cupid's leaden arrow. Sensual passion.

Deque sagittifera promisit duo tela pharetra
Diversorum operum; fugat hoc, facit illud amorem.

Quod facit auratum est, et cuspidē fulget acuta.—
Quod fugat obtusum est, et habet sub arundine plumbum.

OVID: Apollo and Daphne.

I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow;
By his best arrow with the golden head . . .
By that which knitteth souls and prospers love.
SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, I, i.

Cupid's torches. See BRANDON.

Cupidon, Le Jeune (lè zhèrn kù' pe dong) (Fr. young Cupid). Count D'Orsay (1801-1852), famous dandy and wit and extremely good looking, was so styled by Lord Byron. The Count's father was styled Le beau d'Orsay.

Curate. See CLERICAL TITLES.

Curate's Egg. Among the catch-phrases that Punch (see MR. PUNCH under PUNCH) has introduced into the language, "Good in parts, like the curate's egg" is proverbial. The illustration showed a nervous young curate at his bishop's breakfast table. Asked by his lordship whether the egg is to his liking, he is terrified to say that it is bad and stammers out that, "Parts of it are excellent!"

Curé de Meudon (kù'r ā de mē don) i.e. Rabelais (c. 1495-1553), who was first a monk, then a leech, then a CANON of St. Maur, and lastly curé of Meudon.

Curfew (kér' fū). The custom of ringing a bell every evening as a signal to put out fires and go to bed; also the hour for this and the bell itself. The word is from O.Fr. couvre-feu, cover-fire, which reveals its Norman origin. WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR instituted the curfew in England in 1068, at the hour of 8 p.m. The word is now extended to mean the period commonly ordered by occupying armies or government authorities in time of war or civil commotion when civilians must stay within doors.

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.
GRAY: Elegy written in a Country Churchyard.

Curlies (Austr.). GOOGLES. Used figuratively of awkward and embarrassing situations as "the question was a curly one".

Curmudgeon (kér' mǔj' òn). A grasping, miserly fellow. A word of unknown origin, but of it Johnson's Dictionary says: "It is a vitious manner of pronouncing cœur méchant, Fr., an unknown correspondent", meaning that this suggestion was supplied by some correspondent unknown. By a ridiculous blunder, Ash (1775) copied it into his dictionary as "from Fr. cœur, unknown, méchant, correspondent"!

Curnock. See CRANNOCK.

Currant. A corruption of Corinth, whence currants were imported. Originally called "raisins of Corauntz", Corauntz being Anglo-French for Corinth.

Currency. A word applied in early colonial Australia to the wide variety of coins then in circulation, as distinct from English gold coins, which were called STERLING. The word assumed the connotation of "Australian" and "uncurrency" meant "un-Australian".

Currency lad, or lass. In the early 19th century this meant one of European descent born in Australia, as opposed to sterling, i.e. English-born settlers.

Current. The drift of the current is the rate per hour at which the current runs.

The setting of the current is the direction or point of the compass towards which the current flows.

Curry Favour. A corruption of the M.E. to curry favel, to rub down Favel: Favel (or Fauvel) being the name of the CENTAUR in the early 14th-century French satirical romance Fauvel. This fallow-coloured creature symbolizes cunning and bestial degradation; hence to curry, or smooth down, Favel, was to enlist the services of duplicity, and so to seek to obtain by insincere flattery, to ingratiate oneself by sycophantic officiousness, etc.

Curse. Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. Curses rebound on the head of the curser, as chickens which stray during the day return to their roost at night.

Cursing by bell, book, and candle. See under BELL.

Curst cows have curt horns. See under COW.

Not worth a curse. I don't care (or give) a (tinker's) curse (or cuss), i.e. not worth anything, I care not at all. Similar expressions are "not a STRAW", "not a PIN", "not a bit", "not a RAP", "not a jot", "not a pin's point", "not a button".

The curse of Cain. One who is always on the move and has no abiding place is said to be "cursed with the curse of Cain". The allusion is to God's judgment on Cain after he had slain his brother Abel.

And now art thou cursed from the earth . . . a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.
Gen. iv, 11-12.

The curse of Scotland. The nine of diamonds. The phrase seems to be first recorded in the early 18th century, for in Houston's Memoirs (1715-1747) we are told that Lord Justice Clerk Ormiston became universally hated in SCOTLAND and was called the Curse of Scotland; and when the ladies encountered the Nine of Diamonds at cards they called it Justice Clerk. Among the suggested origins of the phrase are:

(1) It may refer to the arms of Dalrymple, Earl of Stair—viz. or, on a saltire azure, nine lozenges of the first. The earl was justly held in abhorrence for his share in the massacre of GLENCOE.

(2) The nine of diamonds in the game of POPE JOAN is called the Pope, the ANTICHRIST of the Scottish reformers.

(3) In the game of comette, introduced by Queen Mary, it was the great winning card, and the game was the curse of Scotland because it was the ruin of many.

(4) The word "curse" is a corruption of cross, and the nine of diamonds is so arranged as to form a St. Andrew's Cross; but so are the other nines.

(5) Some say it was the card on which BUTCHER Cumberland wrote his cruel order after the battle of Culloeden (1746); but the term was apparently already in vogue.

(6) Grose says somewhat inaccurately in his Tour Thro' Scotland (1789): "Diamonds . . . imply royalty . . . and every ninth king of Scotland has been observed for many ages to be a tyrant and a curse to the country."

Cursitors. The 24 junior clerks who wrote out of the formal CHANCERY writs in their office in Chancery Lane, London, adjoining Cursitor Street. The name comes from the Latin, meaning one who runs hither and thither, and refers to their journeyings when issuing writs. They were abolished in 1835.

Cursor Mundi (Lat. cursor, runner, mundus, world). An early 14th-century English poem of some 24,000 lines in northern dialect. It describes the "Course of the World" from the Creation until Doomsday. It is essentially scriptural and designed to edify and supplant chivalric romance. The author wrote in English so those who had not the more fashionable French might understand. It is a valuable source of legend.

Curtain. Curtain Lecture. The nagging of a wife after she and her husband are in bed. See CAUDLE LECTURE.

If one must be your choice, which d'ye approve,
The Curtain-Lecture or the Curtain-Love?
DRYDEN: Epilogue to Henry II.

Curtain Raiser. See LEVER DE RIDEAU. To ring down the curtain. To bring a matter to an end. A theatrical term. See RABELAIS under DYING SAYINGS.

Curtal Friar (kér tál). A curtal was a horse with its tail docked, whence its application to other things that were cut down or shortened. A curtal friar was one who wore a short cloak. In later use, especially by Scott, it acquired a vaguely derisory or belittling significance.

Curtana (kér tá' ná). The sword of mercy borne before kings of ENGLAND at their coronation; it has no point and is therefore shortened (O.Fr. curt; Lat. curtus). It is also called the sword of Edward the Confessor, which, having no point, was the emblem of mercy.

But when Curtana will not do the deed
You lay the pointless clergy-weapon by,
And to the laws, your sword of justice, fly.
DRYDEN: The Hind and the Panther, Pt. II, 419.

Curthose (kért' hoz). Robert II, Duke of Normandy (1087-1134), eldest son of WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR. He was also called "Short-thigh", as in Drayton's The Tragical Legend of Robert, Duke of Normandy, surnamed Short-thigh (1596).

Curtmantle (kért' mán tál). Henry II (1133, 1154-1189), who introduced the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors. Cp. CARACALLA.

Curule Chair. (kú' rúl). A folding stool inlaid with ivory, and with curved legs, from Lat. currus, a chariot, because it was originally a chariot chair. It was the ancient Roman chair of office of the higher magistrates (e.g. dictators, consuls, prætors, censors, and the chief ædiles), termed curules or curule magistrates, and emperors.

Those mounted in a chair-curule,
Which Moderns call a Cucking-stool.
BUTLER: Hudibras, II, ii.

Cushcow Lady. A Yorkshire name for a LADYBIRD.

Cushion Dance. A lively dance, popular in early Stuart times, in which kissing while kneeling on a cushion was a major feature.

In our court in Queen Elizabeth's time, gravity and state was kept up; in King James's time things were pretty well; but in King Charles's time there has been nothing but Trench-more and the cushion dance, omnium gatherum, tolly polly, hoyte cum toyte.

SILDEN: Table Talk (King of England).

It survived quite late in rural districts. John Clare (1793-1864), the peasant poet of Northamptonshire, mentions it in his May-Day Ballad:

And then comes the cushion, the girls they all shriek,
And fly to the door from the old fiddler's squeak;
But the doors they are fastened, so all must kneel down,
And take the rude kiss from th' unmannerly clown.

To miss the cushion. To make a mistake, to miss the mark.

Custard Coffin. See COFFIN.

Custer's Last Stand. In America in the late 19th century as favourite a subject for paintings and engravings as the "Relief of Ladysmith" became in England. Lt.-Col. George A. Custer was a dashing cavalry man with a popular reputation. The annihilation of his force of 207 men by some 25,000 Sioux warriors under Sitting Bull at the Battle of Little Big Horn (25 June 1876) made a tremendous impact, and the episode became part of the national epic. Custer alone was spared (as a blood brother of Sitting Bull), but shot himself.

Custom clothes, or custom tailoring. The American equivalent of "made to measure", or "bespoke tailoring". These terms were appearing in English fashion magazines by the 1960s.

Customer. A rum customer. A queer or strange fellow, one not to meddle with. Here rum is the old CANT term meaning "fine", "gallant", or "spirited".

An ugly customer. One better left alone as he is likely to prove vicious if interfered with.

Custos Rotulorum (Lat. keeper of the rolls). Those officers charged with keeping the records of the courts in a county. The Lord-Lieutenant is now the Custos Rotulorum and the work is done by the Clerk of the Peace in his capacity of deputy.

Cut. Cut of his jib. The contour or expression of his face. "I don't like the cut of his jib" means, "I don't like the look of him." The phrase is of nautical origin. The cut of the jib or headsail betokened the quality of character of the vessel.

To cut. To renounce or ignore acquaintance. There are four sorts of cut—

1. The cut direct is to stare an acquaintance in the face and pretend not to know him.
2. The cut indirect, to look another way, and pretend not to see him.
3. The cut sublime, to admire the top of some tall edifice or the clouds of heaven till the acquaintance has passed by.

4. The cut infernal, to stoop and adjust your boots till he has gone past.

He is cut, he is half cut. Drunk or nearly so.

To cut blocks with a razor. To do something remarkable by insignificant means; to do something more eccentric than expedient; to "make pin-cushions of sunbeams" (Swift). It is an allusion to the story of ACCIUS NÆVIUS, which is used in the BON GAULTIER BALLADS and is also referred to by Goldsmith in his Retaliation.

In short, 'twas his [Burke's] fate, unemployed or in place, sir,
To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.

To cut capers. See under CAPER.

Cut your coat according to your cloth. See COAT.

To cut one's comb. See under COMB.

To cut a dash. To make a show; to get oneself looked at and talked about for a showy or striking appearance. "Dashing" means showy or striking, as a "dashing fellow", a "dashing equipage".

Diamond cut diamond. See under DIAMOND.

To cut the ground from under one, or from under his feet. To leave an adversary no ground to stand upon, by disproving or forestalling all his arguments or undermining his case.

Cut neither nails nor hair at sea. Petronius says:

Non licere cuiquam mortalium in nave neque ungues neque capillos deponere nisi cum pelago ventus irascitur.

The cuttings of the nails and hair were votive offerings to PROSERPINE, and it would excite the jealousy of NEPTUNE to make offerings to another in his own special kingdom.

Cut no ice. Be of no account, make no impression, possibly borrowed from figure skating.

To cut the knot. To break through an obstacle. The reference is to the GORDIAN KNOT.

To cut the painter. See under PAINTER.

I must cut my stick, i.e. depart. The Irish usually cut a SHILLELAGH before starting on an expedition. Punch gives the following derivation: "Pilgrims on leaving the Holy Land used to cut a palm-stick, to prove that they had really been to the Holy Sepulchre. So brother Francis would say to brother Paul, "Where is brother Benedict?" "Oh (says Paul), he has cut his stick!"—i.e. he is on his way home."

To cut a swath. To make an impression. An American expression usually used in the negative. A swath is the amount cut by one sweep of a scythe.

He has cut his eye teeth. See under TOOTH.

To cut your wisdom teeth. See under WISDOM.

Cut-off. The American equivalent of the English "short cut".

Cut off with a shilling. Disinherited. To be left a shilling showed that the testator had not forgotten, but had intentionally disinherited a person by bequeathing a trifling sum.

Cut out. Left in the lurch; superseded. When there are too many for a game of cards (say whist or bridge), it is customary for the players to cut out after a rubber, in order that another may have a turn. The players cut the cards on the table the lowest turn-up gives place to a newcomer.

To be cut out for. To be naturally suited for, as, "He is cut out for a sailor." The allusion is to cutting out cloth for specific purposes.

To cut short is to shorten, to silence by interruption.

To cut it short means to bring to an end. Cp. AUDLEY.

His life was cut short. He died prematurely. The allusion is to ATROPOS, one of the three FATES, cutting the thread of life spun by her sister CLOTHO.

To cut up rough. To be disagreeable or quarrelsome about anything.

He'll cut up well. He is rich and on his death his property will cut into good slices among his heirs.

Cut and come again. Take a cut from the joint, and come for another if you like it, i.e. "there's plenty of it, have as much as you like." It is used by Swift in his Polite Conversation, ii.

Cut and dried. All ready, fixed or arranged beforehand. "He had a speech all cut and dried." The allusion is to timber, cut, dried and ready for use.

Sets of phrases, cut and dry,
Evermore thy tongue supply.
SWIFT: Betty the Grisette.

To cut and run. To escape in a hurry, to quit. In the days when a ship's anchor cable was made of hemp, the cable was cut, if the occasion demanded it, and the vessel allowed to run before the wind. A classical example of this was when the Spanish Armada was anchored off Calais. Most of the captains cut their cables on the approach of Howard's fireships.

Sails were also set in a hurry by cutting their gaskets.

Cuthbert. A name coined by "Poy", the cartoonist of the Evening News, during World War I for the fit men of military age, especially in Government offices, who were not called for military service, or who positively avoided it. These civilians were depicted as frightened-looking rabbits. See TO COMB OUT under COMB.

Cuthbert Bede. The pen-name of the Rev. Edward Bradley (1827-1889), author of VERDANT GREEN and other humorous works.

St. Cuthbert's Beads. Single joints of the articulated stems of encrinites (fossil crinoids), also called stone lilies. They are perforated in the centre and bear a fanciful resemblance to a CROSS; hence they were once used for ROSARIES. Legend relates that the 7th-century St. Cuthbert sits at night on a rock in HOLY ISLAND and uses the opposite rock as an anvil while he forges the beads.

St. Cuthbert's Duck. The eider duck, so called because it breeds in the Farne Islands, the headquarters of St. Cuthbert.

Cutler's poetry. Mere jingles or rhymes. At one time knives had a distich inscribed on the blade by means of AQUA FORTIS.

Whose posy was
For all the world like cutler's poetry
Upon a knife.
SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, V, i.

Cutpurse. A pickpocket nowadays. When purses were worn suspended from a girdle, thieves cut the strings by which the purse was attached. When purses, etc., came to be kept in pockets the cutpurse became a pickpocket.

To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse.

SHAKESPEARE: Winter's Tale, IV, ii.

Moll Cutpurse. The familiar name of Mary Frith (c. 1585-1660), a woman of masculine vigour, and who often dressed as one. She was a notorious thief and once attacked General Fairfax on Hounslow Heath, for which she was sent to NEWGATE. She escaped by bribery and finally died of dropsy. Middleton and Dekker's The Roaring Girl is founded on her exploits.

Cutter's law. Not to see a fellow want while we have cash in our purse. Cutter's law means the law of CUTPURSES, robbers, brigands, and highwaymen.

I must put you in cash with some of your old uncle's broad pieces. This is cutter's law; we must not see a pretty fellow want, if we have cash ourselves.—SCOTT: Old Mortality, ch. ix.

Cuttle. Captain Cuttle. An eccentric, kind-hearted sailor in Dickens's Dombey and Son, simple as a child, credulous of every tale, and generous as the sun. He is immortalized by his saying "When found, make a note of" (see ch. xv.) This phrase was adopted by Notes and Queries.

Cutty. Scots for short, as cutty pipe, a short clay pipe; cutty spoons; a cutty gun, a popgun; a cutty, a dumpty girl or a woman of dubious character. See CUTTY SARK.

Not a gleed of fire, then, except the bit kindling peat, and maybe a spunk in Mysie's cutty-pie.

SCOTT: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xxvi.

Cutty Sark (Scot.). A short petticoat or short-tailed shirt. The name of the famous clipper built at Dumbarton in 1869 for Captain John Willis, shipowner and master mariner. After a long career, mainly in the China tea trade and in shipping wool from Australia, she became a Portuguese trader in 1895 and was renamed the Ferreira. Purchased by Captain Dowman in 1922, and restored at Falmouth as a boys' training ship, she was towed round to the Thames in 1938 and taken over by the Cutty Sark Preservation Society in 1952—the last survivor of the clippers. The name is taken from Burns' poem "Tam O'Shanter" which was illustrated on the carvings round the ship's bows, but the figure-head was of a woman in flowing garments with outstretched arm. The accompanying "witches" round the bows were naked. At one stage in the ship's career a short shirt emblem was flown at the main truck.

When'e't to drink you are inclined
Or Cutty Sark's run in your mind
Think: you may buy the joys ever dear,
Remember Tam O'Shanter's mare.

Cutty stool. A short-legged wooden stool; in Scotland the familiar name for the STOOL OF REPENTANCE.

Cwt. is C. centum, wt. weight, meaning hundred-weight. Cp. DWT.

Cyanean Rocks, The (sī ān' i ān). Two rocky islands at the entrance of the EUXINE SEA, where the breakers make the passage very hazardous. It was anciently supposed that they floated and closed together to crush a vessel when it attempted to sail between them.

Cybele. Mother goddess of Phrygia, also goddess of fertility and of the mountains. Commonly identified with AGDISTIS, her favourite was ATYS and her priests were called CORYBANTES. She is also associated with DEMETER.

Cycle. A period or series of events or numbers which recur everlastingly in the same order.

Cycle of the moon. The METONIC CYCLE, from its discoverer Meton of ATHENS (5th century B.C.). It is a period of nineteen years, at the expiration of which the phases of the MOON repeat themselves on the same days as they did nineteen years previously. See CALLIPPIC PERIOD.

Cycle of the sun. A period of twenty-eight years, at the expiration of which the days of the month fall on the same days of the week as they did twenty-eight years previously.

The Platonic Cycle, or Great Year. That space of time which, according to ancient astronomers, elapses before all the stars and constellations return to their former positions in respect to the equinoxes. Tycho Brahe calculated this period at 25,816 years, and Riccioli at 25,920.

Cut out more work than can be done
In Plato's year, but finish none.

BUTLER: Hudibras, III, ii.

Cyclic Poets (sī' klik). Post-Homeric epic poets who wrote continuations, illustrations or additions to HOMER'S poems. These poets wrote between 800 and 550 B.C., and were called cyclic because they confined themselves to the cycle of the TROJAN WAR. The chief were Agias, Arctinus, Eugammon, Lesches, and Stasinus.

Cyclops (sī' klops) (Gr. circular-eye). A group or race of GIANTS. They had only one eye each and that in the centre of their forehead, and their work was to forge iron for VULCAN. Hesiod limits their number to three: Arges, Steropes, and Brontes. Cp. ARIMASPIANS.

Cyclopiian Masonry (sī klō' piān). The old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy, such as the Gallery of Tiryns, the Gate of Lions at Mycenæ, the Treasury of ATHENS, and the tombs of Phoroneus and Danaos. They are made of huge blocks fitted together without mortar and are fabled to be the work of the CYCLOPS. The term is applied to similar huge structures elsewhere.

Cygnus. See PHAETON'S BIRD.

Cylleneius (sī lē' ni ūs). MERCURY. So called from Mount Cyllene, in Peloponnesus, where he was born.

Cymbeline. See CUNOBELIN; CASSIBELAN.

Cymodoce (sī mod' ō si). One of the NEREIDS, a companion of VENUS in Virgil's Georgics (IV, 338) and ÆNEID (V, 826). In Spenser's Faerie Queene (III, iv, and IV, xii), she is a daughter of Nereus and mother of Marinell by Dumarin. She frees Florimel from the power of PROTEUS. The word means "wave-receiving".

The Garden of Cymodoce. Sark, one of the Channel Islands. It is the title of a poem by Swinburne in his Songs of the Springtides.

Cynic. The ancient school of Greek philosophers known as the Cynics was founded by ANTISTHENES and made famous by his pupil DIOGENES. They were ostentatiously contemptuous of ease, luxury or wealth, and convention. The name is either derived from their dog-like, slovenly, and uncouth habits or from the fact that Antisthenes held his school in the Gymnasium called Cynosarges (white dog), from the incident when a white dog carried away part of a victim which was then being offered to HERCULES. The effigy over the pillar of Diogenes was a dog with the inscription, as rendered by Dr. Brewer:

"Say, dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb?"
 "A dog."—"His name?"—"Diogenes."—"From far?"
 "Sinope."—"What! who made a tub his home?"
 "The same; now dead, amongst the stars a star."

Cynic Tub. The tub from which Diogenes lectured. Similarly we speak of the PORCH, meaning STOIC philosophy; the GARDEN, Epicurean philosophy; the ACADEMY, Platonic philosophy; and the Colonnade, meaning Aristotelian philosophy. See PERIPATETIC SCHOOL.

And fetch their precepts from the Cynic tub.
 MILTON: Comus, line 708.

Cynosure (sin' ō shur). The Pole star; hence the observed of all observers. Greek for dog's tail, and applied to the constellation called URSA MINOR. As mariners guide their ships by the north star, and observe it as well, the word "cynosure" is used for whatever attracts attention, as "The cynosure of neighbouring eyes" (Milton, L'Allegro), especially for guidance in some doubtful matter.

Cynthia. The MOON; a surname of Artemis or DIANA, who represented the moon, and was called Cynthia from Mount Cynthus in Delos, where she was born.

The name was one of many applied to Elizabeth I by contemporary poets.

Cypress. A funeral tree; dedicated by the Romans to PLUTO, because when once cut it never grows again. It is said that its wood was once used for making coffins; hence SHAKESPEARE'S "In sad cypress let me be laid" (Twelfth Night, II, iv). The Greeks and Romans put cypress twigs in the coffins of the dead and it is much associated with cemeteries. It was also traditionally the wood from which CUPID'S arrows were made.

Cyprian (sip' ri an). Cyprus was formerly famous for the worship of VENUS; hence the application of the adjective to lewd and profligate persons and prostitutes.

A Night Charge at Bow Street Office; with other matters worth knowing, respecting the unfortunate Cyprian, the feeling Coachman, and the generous Magistrate.

PIERCE EGAN: Life in London, Bk. II, ii.

Cyprian brass, or æs Cyprium, copper. Pliny (Bk. XXXIV, c, ii) says, "in Cypro enim prima æris inventio fuit".

Cyrene. A Thessalian nymph, daughter or granddaughter of the river god Peneus. She was carried off by APOLLO to the country which came to be called Cyrenaica, where she bore him a son named Aristæus. See ABIOGENESIS.

Cyrillic Alphabet. The form of letters traditionally used by the Slavonic peoples, a form of the Greek alphabet invented by two brothers, the apostles of the Slavs, Constantine (827-869) and Methodius (c. 825-885) of Thessalonica. Constantine was more popularly known by his religious name of Cyril.

D

D. This letter is the outline of a rude archway or door. It is called in Phœnician and Hebrew daleth (a door) and Gr. delta. In Egyptian hieroglyphics it is a man's hand.

D., or d. indicating a penny or pence is the initial of the Lat. denarius. As a Roman numeral D stands for 500, and represents the second half of CIO, the ancient Tuscan sign for one thousand. D̄ stands for 5,000.

D.C. See DA CAPO.

D Day. In World War II, the day appointed for the Allied invasion of Europe and the opening of the long-awaited second front. It was eventually fixed for 5 June 1944, but owing to impossible weather conditions postponed at the last moment until 6 June.

D.O. Demi-official. A British War Office term for a letter on official business but addressed personally from one officer to another.

D.O.M. An abbreviation of the Lat., Deo Optimo Maximo (to God the best the greatest) or Datur omnibus mori (it is allotted to all to die). In the former sense it is inscribed on bottles of BENEDICTINE.

D.T.s. A contraction of delirium tremens.

D.V. See DEO VOLENTE.

Da Capo (D.C.) (Ital.). A musical term meaning from the beginning—that is, finish with a repetition from the beginning to the point indicated.

Dab. Clever, skilled; as “a dab-hand at it”. Possibly a contraction of the Lat. adeptus, an adept. Dabster is another form.

An Eton stripping training for the law,
A dunce at learning, but a dab at law [marbles].
ANON: Logic; or, The Biter Bit.

Dab, Din, etc.

Hab Dab and David Din
Ding the deil o'er Dabson's Linn.

“Hab Dab” (Halbert Dobson) and “David Din” (David Dun) were CAMERONIANS who lived in a cave near “Dabson's Linn”, a waterfall near the head of Moffat Water. Here, legend relates, they saw the DEVIL in the form of a pack of dried hides, and after fighting him for some time, they “dinged” him into the waterfall.

Dabbat (Arab. Dabbatu 'l-ard). In Mohammedan mythology the monster, reptile of the earth, that shall arise at the last day and cry that mankind has not believed in the Divine revelations.

By some it is identified with the Beast of the Apocalypse (Rev. xix, 19; xx, 10).

Dactyls. Mythical beings connected with the worship of CYBELE in Crete, supposed to be the discoverers of iron and copper; also called Idæan Dactyls (the fingers of IDA), after their mountain home. Their number is given as ten or more but was originally three—the Smelter, the Hammer, and the Anvil.

In prosody a dactyl is a foot of three syllables, the first long and the others short (— ∪ ∪)—again from the similarity to the joints of a finger.

Dad, or Daddy. A child's word for “father” common to many languages, Gaelic, daidein; Welsh, tad; Cornish, tat; Latin, tata, tatula (papa); Greek, tata, tetta, used by youths to an elder; Sanskrit, tata; Lap, dadda; are examples.

Dad and Dave. Two figures becoming traditional in Australian humour, invented by A. H. Davis (Steele Rudd), 1868–1935. They first appeared in his humorous sketches, On Our Selection, 1899, which deals with the hard lives of the small farmers of the period. Dad and Dave have since been widely used in Australian broadcasting serials.

Daddy Long-legs. A crane-fly, applied also to the long-legged spiders called “harvestmen”.

Dadaism (da' da izm). An anarchic and iconoclastic art movement which began at Zürich in 1916, arising from indignation and despair at the catastrophe of World War I. Its supporters, writers and painters, sought to free themselves from all artistic conventions, and what they considered cultural shams. Dadaism was influenced by CUBISM and FUTURISM and after about 1922 it was succeeded by SURREALISM. The name Dadaism was derived from dada, the French word for a hobby-horse, and was named by Tristan Tzara after opening a dictionary at random. A plaque, showing a human navel, was unveiled at Zürich in February 1966, to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the movement.

Dædalus (dē' dá lūs). A legendary Athenian, father of ICARUS, who formed the Cretan LABYRINTH and made wings, by means of which he flew from Crete across the archipelago. He is said to have invented the saw, the axe, the gimlet, etc., and his name is perpetuated in our dædal, skilful, fertile of invention; dædalian, labyrinthine or ingenious.

Daffodil. Legend says that the daffodil, or LENT LILY, was once white; but Persephone (PROSERPINA), who had wreathed her head with them and fallen asleep in the meadow, was captured by PLUTO, and carried off in his chariot. She let fall some of the lilies and they turned to a golden yellow. Theophilus and Pliny tell us that they grow on the banks of ACHERON and that the spirits of the dead delight in the flower, called by them the ASPHODEL. In England it used to be called the Affodil (Fr. asphodile; Lat. asphodelus; Gr. asphodelos).

In the present century it has become an alternative to the LEEK as a Welsh emblem, because the leek was considered vulgar by some.

O Proserpina,
For the flowers now, that, frightened, thou lett'st fall
From Dis's waggon!—daffodils,
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty.

SHAKESPEARE: Winter's Tale, IV, iii.

Dagger, or Long Cross (†), used for reference to a note after the asterisk (*), was originally used in church books, prayers of EXORCISM, at benedictions, and so on, to remind the priest where to make the sign of the cross. It is sometimes called an obelisk (Gr. obelos, a spit).

In the arms of the City of London, the dagger supposedly commemorates Sir William Walworth's dagger, with which he slew Wat Tyler in 1381. Before this time the cognizance of the City was the sword of St. PAUL. The inscription below

Daggle-tail

Sir William's statue in Fishmongers' Hall announced:

Brave Walworth Knyght Lord Mayor that slew
Rebellious Tyler in his alarms—
The king therefore did give in lieu
The Dagger to the Cyttes armes.

Dagger ale. The ale of the Dagger, a low class gambling-house in HOLBORN, famous in the time of Elizabeth I for its strong drink, furnerty, and meat-pies. There was another tavern of the same name in Cheapside.

My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night
In Holborn at the Dagger.

BEN JONSON: The Alchemist, I, i.

Dagger Money. The sum once paid to judges on the Northern Circuit for the purchase of weapons as a protection against thieves and robbers.

Dagger-scene in the House of Commons. Edmund Burke, during the French Revolution, threw down a dagger on the floor of the House, exclaiming as he did so: "There's French fraternity for you! Such is the weapon which French Jacobins would plunge into the heart of our beloved king." Sheridan spoils the dramatic effect, and set the House in a roar by his remark: "The gentleman, I see, has brought his knife with him, but where is his fork?" See COUP DE THÉÂTRE. To be at daggers drawn. To be fiercely opposed, at great enmity.

Boffins at Daggers Drawn in Corridors of Power.
The Times (Headline of 8 April 1965).

To speak, or look daggers. To speak or look so as to wound, to convey open hostility.

I will speak daggers to her, but use none.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, III, ii.

Daggle-tail, or Draggle-tail. A slovenly woman, the bottom of whose dress trails in the dirt. Dag (of uncertain origin) means loose ends, mire, dirt; whence dag-locks, the soiled locks of a sheep's fleece, and dag-wool, refuse wool.

Dagobert (däg' õ bert). King Dagobert and St. Eloi. There is a traditional French song in which the king's minister St. Eloi tells Dagobert that his coat has a hole in it, and the king replies, "C'est vrai, le tien est bon; prête-le moi." After many such complaints and answers St. Eloi says, "My lord, death is at hand!" "Why can't you die instead of me?" says the king.

In the time of the Revolution, and subsequently, the song has been adapted to suit the political events of the day. In 1814, for example, it was banned by the authorities on account of verses against NAPOLEON and the Russian campaign of 1812.

Dagon. A Semitic god worshipped by the PHILISTINES after their arrival in Canaan, supposed to have been symbolized as half man and half fish. Samson's vengeance on the Philistines occurred after their riotous celebrations to Dagon (Judges xvi, 23-30).

Dagon his name, sea-monster, upward man
And downward fish: yet had his temple high
Rear'd in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,
And Accaron and Gaza's frontier bounds.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, I, 462.

Dagonet, Sir. In ARTHURIAN ROMANCES, the fool of King Arthur, knighted by the king himself.

Dagonet was the name under which G. R. Sims (1847-1922) wrote his popular articles in The Referee.

Daikoku (da ē' kō ku). One of the seven Japanese gods of luck. He is god of wealth and good fortune and is represented sitting on bags of rice.

Daisy. An emblem of deceit. Greene (Quip for an Upstart Courtier) speaks of the "dissembling daisie". "Light of love wenches" are warned by it "not to trust every fair promise that such amorous bachelors make them". Ophelia in SHAKESPEARE's Hamlet gives the queen a daisy to signify, "that her light and fickle love ought not to expect constancy in her husband".

The word is Day's eye (O.E. dæges eage), and the flower is so called because it closes its pinky lashes and goes to sleep when the sun sets, but in the morning expands its petals to the light. See VIOLET.

That well by reason men call it maie,
The daisie, or else the cie of daie.
CHAUCER: Legend of Good Women (Prol.).

Daisy-cutter. In CRICKET a ball that fails to rise when delivered, and in tennis a service which behaves similarly. In the 19th century a horse that lifted its feet very little above the ground was so described, and more recently it was applied colloquially by the R.A.F. to a perfect landing.

Daisy-roots. Legend says that these, like the berries of dwarf elder, stunt the growth, a superstition which probably arose from the notion that everything had the property of bestowing its own speciality on others. Cp. FERN SEED.

She robbed dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit
And fed him early with the daisy root,
Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran,
And formed the besauteous miniature of man.

TICKELL: Kensington Gardens.

Dak-bungalow. See BUNGALOW.

Dalai-Lama. See LAMAISM.

Dalkey, King of. A burlesque officer, like the Mayor of GARRATT. Dalkey is a small island near Dun Laoghaire, to the south of Dublin Bay.

Daltonism. See COLOUR-BLINDNESS.

Damiens' Bed of Steel (dám' i enz). Robert François Damiens, in 1757, attempted to stab Louis XV. As a punishment he was chained to an iron bed that was heated, his right hand was burned in a slow fire, his flesh was torn with pincers and the wounds dressed with molten lead, boiling wax, oil and resin. He was finally torn to pieces by wild horses.

The uplifted axe, the agonising wheel, Luke's iron crown, and Damiens' bed of steel.
GOLDSMITH: The Traveller (1768).

Damn. Not worth a damn. Worthless; not even worth a curse. Goldsmith in his Citizen of the World, uses the expression "Not that I care three damns" and a common expression of the Duke of Wellington was "Not a twopenny damn". The derivation of these phrases from the coin, a dam, is without foundation.

To damn with faint praise. To praise in such restrained terms as to deprive the praise of any value.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And, without sneering teach the rest to sneer.
POPE: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

Damocles. The Sword of Damocles. Impending evil or danger. Damocles, a sycophant of Dionysius the Elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the TYRANT to try the felicity he so much envied. Accepting, he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Damocles was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalizing torment to him.

Damon (dá' mon). The name of a goatherd in VIRGIL's Eclogues, and hence used by pastoral poets for rustic swains. Cp. CORYDON.

Damon and Pythias. Models of devoted friendship. In the 4th century B.C. Pythias (correctly Phintias) was condemned to death by Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, but obtained leave to go home to arrange his affairs after his friend Damon had agreed to take his place and be executed should Pythias not return. Pythias returned in time to save Damon, and Dionysius was so struck with this honourable friendship that he released both of them.

Damper. An Australian name for a simple type of unleavened bread made with water and wheat flour into a flat cake and baked in the ashes of a fire. Made by the settlers travelling in the bush, the name may derive from the fact that it damps down the ashes when placed upon them. Small dampers are called "beggars-on-the-coals".

A damp squib. See under SQUIB.

Damsel. A maiden or young woman, a waiting-maid or attendant. The word is the O.Fr. damoisele, the feminine of damoiseil, a squire; this is from Med. Lat. domicellus, a contracted form of domanicellus, the diminutive of dominus, lord (cp. DONZEL). In mediæval France the domicellus or damoiseau was the son of a king, prince, KNIGHT, or lord before he entered the order of knighthood; the king's bodyguards were called his damoiseaux or damsels. Froissart styles Richard II le jeune damoiseil Richart, and Louis VII (Le Jeune) was called the royal damsel.

Dan. A title meaning Sir or Master (Lat. dominus; cp. Span. Don) common with the old poets, as Dan Phœbus, Dan Cupid, Dan Chaucer, etc. Cp. DOM.

Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled,
On Fame's eternal beadroll worthy to be filed.
SPENSER: Fæerie Queene, IV, ii, 32.

From Dan to Beersheba. From one end of the kingdom to the other; everywhere. The phrase is scriptural, Dan being the most northern and Beersheba the most southern cities of the HOLY LAND. We have the similar expression, "From Land's End to John o'Groats".

Danace (dán' às). An ancient Persian coin, worth rather more than the Greek OBOLUS, and sometimes placed by the Greeks in the mouth of the dead to pay CHARON'S TOLL.

Danaë (dán' á ë). Daughter of Acrisius, King of Argos. He was told that his daughter's son would put him to death, and so resolved that Danaë should never marry. She was accordingly locked up in an inaccessible tower. ZEUS foiled the King by changing himself into a shower of gold, under which guise he readily found access to the fair prisoner, and she thus became the mother of PERSEUS.

Danaïdes (dán' á' i dëz). The fifty daughters of Danaus, King of Argos. They married fifty sons of ÆGYPTUS, and all but HYPERMNESTRA, wife of LYNCEUS, at the command of their father murdered their husbands on their wedding night. They were punished in HADES by having to draw water everlastingly in sieves from a deep well.

Dance. I'll lead you a pretty dance. I'll bother or put you to trouble. The French say Donner le bal à quelqu'un. The reference is to the complicated dances of former times, when all followed the leader.

St. Vitus's Dance. See VITUS.

To dance and pay the piper. To work hard to amuse and have to take all the trouble and bear the expense as well. The allusion is to Matt. xi, 17: "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced."

To dance attendance. To wait obsequiously, to be at the beck and call of another. It was an ancient custom at weddings for the bride, no matter how tired she was, to dance with every guest.

I had thought
They had parted so much honesty among 'em
(At least good manners) as not thus to suffer
A man of his place, and so near our favour,
To dance attendance on their lordship's pleasures.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, v, ii.

To dance the Tyburn jig. To be hanged.
See TYBURN.

To dance upon nothing. To be hanged.

Dance of Death, or Danse Macabre. An allegorical representation of Death (usually a dancing skeleton or corpse) leading all sorts and conditions of men to the grave. It is first found in the 14th century, and there is a famous series of woodcuts on the subject by Hans Holbein the Younger (1497-1543). In the cloister of Old St. Paul's a "Dance of Death" called the "Dance of St. Paul's" was painted at the cost of John Carpenter, town clerk of London (15th century), with translations of French verses by John Lydgate. There is a copy in the LAMBETH PALACE library. W. H. Auden's poem The Dance of Death was published in 1933.

Floral Dance, or Furry Dance. See FURRY DANCE.

Horn Dance. See ABBOT'S BROMLEY.

Morris Dance. See MORRIS.

Dances of the Ancient World.

Astronomical dances, invented by the Egyptians, designed to represent the movements of the heavenly bodies.

Bacchic dances were of three sorts: grave (like the minuet), gay (like the gavotte), and a mixture of grave and gay.

The danse champêtre, invented by PAN, quick and lively. The dancers (in the open air) wore wreaths of oak and garlands of flowers.

Children's dances, in Lacedæmonia, in honour of DIANA. The children were nude; and their movements were grave, modest, and graceful.

Corybantic dances, in honour of BACCHUS, accompanied with timbrels, fifes, flutes, and a tumultuous noise produced by the clashing of swords and spears against brazen bucklers.

Funeral dances, in Athens, slow, solemn dances in which the priests took part. The performers wore long white robes, and carried cypress slips in their hands.

Hymenæal dances were lively and joyous. The dancers were crowned with flowers.

Jewish dances. David danced in certain religious processions (II Sam. vi, 14). The people sang and danced before the GOLDEN CALF (Exod. xxxii, 19). And in the book of Psalms (cl, 4) we read, "Praise him with the timbrel and dance". Miriam, the sister of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea, was followed by all the women with timbrels and dances (Exod. xv, 20).

Of the Lapitheæ, invented by Pirithous. These were performed after some famous victory, designed to imitate the combats of the CENTAURS and LAPITHEÆ, and were both difficult and dangerous.

May-day dances at Rome. At daybreak lads and lasses went out to gather "May" and others flowers for themselves and their elders; and the day was spent in dances and festivities.

Military dances. The oldest of all dances, executed with swords, javelins and bucklers. Said to be invented by MINERVA to celebrate the victory of the gods over the TITANS.

Nuptial dances. A Roman pantomimic performance representing the dances of our HARLEQUIN and COLUMBINE.

Pyrrhic dance. See PYRRHIC.

Salic dances, instituted by Numa Pompilius in honour of MARS. They were executed by twelve priests selected from the highest of the nobility, and were performed in the temple while sacrifices were being made and hymns sung to the god.

Dances, National. When Handel was asked to point out the peculiar taste of the different nations of Europe in dancing, he ascribed the minuet to the French, the saraband to the Spaniard, the arietta to the Italian, and the HORNPIPE and the MORRIS DANCE to the English. To these might be added the reel to the Scots, and the JIG to the Irish.

Dancing Chancellor, The. Sir Christopher Hatton (1540-1591) was so called, because he first attracted Queen Elizabeth I's notice by his graceful dancing in a masque at Court. He was Lord Chancellor from 1587 till his death.

His bushy beard and shoestrings green,
His high-crowned hat and satin doublet,
Moved the stout heart of England's queen,
Though Pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.
GRAY: A Long Story.

Dancing Dervishes. The Mawlawis, one of the many MOSLEM religious fraternities of dervishes for whom their dirge or zikr is a devotional rite. The chant is accompanied by a slow whirling movement with their eyes shut and arms stretched out. It lasts until a state of catalepsy is attained.

Dancing round the Maypole. See MAYPOLE.

Dancing-water. A magic elixir, common to many fairy tales, which beautifies ladies, and makes them young again and enriches them. In the Countess d'Aulnoy's Contes des Fées it fell in a cascade in the Burning Forest, and could only be reached by an underground passage. Prince Chery fetched a bottle of it for his beloved Fairstar, but was aided by a dove.

Dander. Is your dander up, or riz? Is your anger excited? Are you in a rage?

This is generally considered to be an Americanism but as a synonym for anger has been a common dialect word in several English counties. It is more likely that it was imported into America by the early Dutch colonists and is from their donder, thunder; the Dutch op donderen is to burst into a sudden rage.

He was as spunky as thunder, and when a Quaker gets his dander up, it's like a Northwester. SEBA SMITH: Letters of Major Jack Downing (1830).

Dandiprat. A small coin issued in the reign of Henry VII, value three halfpence. The term is also applied to a DWARF and a page and to a conceited little fellow, much as we speak of a "little twopenny-ha'penny fellow". Stanyhurst calls CUPID a "dandiprat" in his translation of VIRGIL'S Aeneid, Bk. I (1582).

Dando. One who frequents hotels, restaurants, and such places, satisfies his appetite, and decamps without payment. From Dando, hero of many popular songs in the early 19th century, who was famous for this.

Dandy. A COXCOMB, a fop. Of late 18th-century Scottish origin; possibly one who has been spoilt by overmuch dandying, or from the name Andrew, or a corruption of DANDIPRAT or the earlier JACK-A-DANDY.

In paper-making the dandy, or dandy-roller, is the cylinder of wire gauze which comes into contact with paper while on the machine in a wet and elementary stage. It impresses the watermark, and also the ribs in "laid" papers.

Dandy King, The. Joachim Murat (1767-1815), NAPOLEON'S dashing cavalry leader, made King of Naples in 1808, was so nicknamed from his fondness for personal adornment. Napoleon is reputed to have called him "un roi de théâtre" (a player king).

Dandy traps. The same as BEAU TRAPS.

Danegeld. The geld or tax on land originally raised to buy peace from the Danes in the time of Ethelred II (978-1016) and continued as a tax long after it was needed for its original purpose.

And that is called paying the Dane-geld;
But we've proved it again and again,
That if once you paid him the Dane-geld
You never get rid of the Dane.

KIPLING: Dane-Geld.

Danelaw, or Danelagh (O.E. Dena lagu, law of the Danes). That part of north and east England, roughly bounded by a line from LONDON to Chester, to which ALFRED THE GREAT (871-899) succeeded in containing the Danes and where Danish law was thus in force. The term was not used until the reign of King Cnut (1017-1035).

Danesblood, or Danewort. Dwarf elder (Sambucus ebulus), called Danesblood from a belief that it was supposed to flourish in places where there had been battles against the Danes; called Danewort because it is believed to have been introduced by the Danes.

Dane's skin. A freckled skin. Red hair and a freckled skin were regarded as the traditional characteristics of Danish blood.

Dannebrog, or Danebrog (dän' e brog). The national flag of Denmark (brog is Old Danish for cloth). The tradition is that Waldemar II of Denmark saw a fiery cross in the heavens which betokened his victory over the Estonians (1219). For similar legends of ST. ANDREW and Constantine see CONSTANTINE'S CROSS under CROSS.

The Order of Danebrog. The second of the Danish orders of Knighthood; traditionally instituted in 1219 by Waldemar II, but the present order derives from that founded by Christian V in 1671.

Daniel. A Daniel come to judgment. One who displays wisdom beyond his years.

In SHAKESPEARE'S Merchant of Venice, IV, i, Shylock says:

A Daniel come to judgement! yea, a Daniel!
O wise young judge, how I do honour thee!

The History of Susannah in the APOCRYPHA tells how Susannah rejected the advances of two elders, was falsely accused by them and condemned to death. They claimed to have seen her lying under a tree with a young man. Her innocence was established by the youthful Daniel, who asked both accusers separately under what kind of tree the adultery took place. They each named a different tree.

Dannocks. Hedging-gloves. The word is said to be a corruption of Doornick, the Flemish name of Tournai, where they may have been originally manufactured. Cp. DORNICK.

Dansker. A Dane. Denmark used to be called Danskë. Hence Polonius says to Reynaldo, "Inquire me first what Danikers are in Paris." (Shakespeare: Hamlet, II, i).

Dante and Beatrice. Beatrice Portinari was only eight years old when Dante first saw her. The poet's love for her was pure as it was tender. Beatrice married a nobleman, Simone de' Bardi, in 1287 and she died in 1290 (under the age of twenty-four). Dante, a few years later, married Gemma Donati. Beatrice is celebrated and idealized in Dante's Vita Nuova and Divina Commedia. In the latter work the poet is conducted first by VIRGIL (who represents human reason) through HELL and PURGATORY; then by the spirit of Beatrice (who represents the wisdom of faith); and finally by St. BERNARD (who represents the wisdom from on high).

Again mine eyes were fix'd on Beatrice;
And, with mine eyes, my soul that in her looks
Found all contentment.

DANTE: Divine Comedy, Canto XXI.

Dantesque (dăn tek). Dante-like—that is, a minute lifelike representation of horrors, whether by words, as in the poet, or in visual form, as in Doré's illustrations of the Inferno.

Daphne (dăf'ni). Daughter of the river-god Peneus in Thessaly, beloved by APOLLO. She had resolved to spend her life in perpetual virginity and fled from him, seeking the protection of the gods, who changed her into a BAY-tree. Apollo declared that henceforth he would wear bay-leaves instead of the oak, and that all who sought his favour should follow his example.

Daphnis (dăf'nis). In Greek mythology, a Sicilian shepherd who invented pastoral poetry. He was a son of MERCURY and a Sicilian nymph and was protected by DIANA. He was taught by PAN and the MUSES.

Also the lover of CHLOE. Daphnis was the model of Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd (1725), and the tale is the basis of Bernardin de St.-Pierre's Paul et Virginie (1787).

Dapple. The name given in Smollett's translation of Don Quixote to SANCHO PANZA's donkey (in the original it has no name). The word is probably connected with Icel. depill, a spot, and means blotched, speckled in patches. A dapple-grey horse is one of a light grey shaded with a deeper hue; a dapple-bay is of a light bay spotted with a bay of deeper colour.

Darbies. Handcuffs. Probably derived from a personal name; the phrase "father Derbies bands" for handcuffs is found in George Gascoigne's Steele Glas (1576).

And hark ye! Jem Clink will fetch you the darbies.—SCOTT: Feveril of the Peak, ch. xxxiii.

Johnny Darbies, policemen, is a perversion of the Fr. gendarmes, in conjunction with the above.

Darby and Joan. The type of loving, old-fashioned, virtuous couples. The names belong to a ballad written by Henry Woodfall, first published in the Gentle- man's Magazine in 1735. The characters are said to be John Darby, of Bartholomew Close, who died in 1730, and his wife "As chaste as a picture cut in alabaster. You might sooner move a Scythian rock than shoot fire into her bosom." Woodfall served his apprenticeship to John Darby; but another account localizes the couple in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The French equivalent is C'est St. Roch et son chien (see ROCH).

Darbyites (dar' bi itz). A name sometimes given to the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN, from John Nelson Darby (1800-1882), their founder.

Daric. An ancient Persian gold coin, probably so called from dara, a king (see DARIUS), much in the same way as our SOVEREIGN. There was also a silver daric, worth one-twentieth of the gold.

Darius (dă ri' ūs). A Greek form of Persian dāra, a king, or of Sanskrit darj, the mountaineer. Darius the Great, son of Hystaspes (Vishtaspa), governor of Persia, assumed the name when he became king in 521 B.C.

Legend relates that he conspired with six other Persian nobles to overthrow Smerdis, the usurper, and that they agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; and the horse of Darius was the first to neigh. His exploits are recorded on the rock of BEHISTUN.

It is said that Darius III (Codomanus), the last king of the Persian empire, who was conquered by ALEXANDER the Great (331 B.C.), sent for the tribute of golden eggs on Alexander's accession. The Macedonian replied: "The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Darius must seek them." The Persian king then sent him a bat and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers, with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master's hand. Lastly, Darius sent him a bitter melon as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the Persian eat his own fruit.

Dark. A dark horse. A racing term for a horse of possible promise, but of which nothing is positively known by the general public. The epithet is applied to a person whose abilities or probable course of action are unknown.

A leap in the dark. A step the consequences of which cannot be foreseen. See HOBBS under DYING SAYINGS. Lord Derby applied the words to the 1867 Reform Act.

Dark Ages, The. A term applied to the MIDDLE AGES, but more particularly to the early centuries; so called because of the intellectual darkness, held to be characteristic of the period, consequent upon the collapse of classical civilization. Hallam considered this term to apply to the period from the 5th to the 12th century, but it is now applied to a much more limited period "darkened" by the lack of contemporary written sources.

Dark and bloody ground. Kentucky. So called by the Indians because of the fierce wars waged in the forests, and later so known by the whites for the same reason in their struggle against the redman.

Dark Continent, The. Africa; concerning which the world was so long "in the dark", and much of which was an unknown land of mystery. It is also the land of dark races. H. M. Stanley's Through the Dark Continent appeared in 1878, In Darkest Africa in 1890, and My Dark Companions and their Strange Stories in 1893.

Darkie. A colloquial name for an American Negro, found as early as 1775.

Darkies, The. A popular name for the former ADELPHI arches.

The darkest hour is that before the dawn. When things have come to their worst, they must mend. In Lat., Post nubila Phæbus.

To darken counsel. To confuse an issue by introducing irrelevant or ill-founded considerations.

Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?—Job xxxviii, 2.

To keep dark. To lie perdu; to lurk in concealment.

To keep it dark. To keep it a dead secret; not to enlighten anyone about the matter.

To darken one's door. To cross one's threshold. Usually used in a threatening way as "Don't you dare to darken my door again!" The door is darkened by one's shadow.

Darley Arabian. In 1704 Thomas Darley sent from Aleppo to his father Richard Darley, of Aldby Park, Yorks, an Arab horse of the best Maneghi breed. From this thoroughbred stallion came a famous breed of race-horses, including ECLIPSE.

All thoroughbred racehorses throughout the world are descended from three Arabs, of which Darley Arabian was one. The others were Byerly Turk, the charger of Capt. Byerly at the battle of the Boyne (1690), and Godolphin Arabian, brought to England in 1730 by Edward Coke, from whom it passed into the possession of the Earl of Godolphin.

Darling, Grace (1815-1842). An English heroine of almost legendary fame, the daughter of William Darling, keeper of the Longstone Lighthouse, Farne Islands, Northumberland. She and her father attempted the rescue of survivors of the wrecked Forfarshire in 1838. They launched their small boat in perilous seas and brought back five survivors to the lighthouse. Darling made a second trip with two of the Forfarshire's crew and saved four more, 43 being drowned. Grace died of consumption in 1842.

England's Darling. See under ENGLAND.

Darnex. See DORNICK.

Dart. See ABARIS.

Darwinian Theory. The theory of evolution as put forward by Charles Darwin (1809-1882), notably in his famous book of 1859 The Origin of Species by Natural Selection, summed up by Herbert Spencer as "the survival of the fittest". Evolution was not a new idea to science but the shock to established science and orthodox Christian belief was profound.

Dash. Cut a dash. See CUT.

Dash it all, dash my wig, buttons, etc. In these expressions dash is a EUPHEMISM for "damn". Wig, buttons, etc., are relics of a fashion adopted by "MASHERS" of "swearing" without using profane or obscene language.

Date. Not up to date. Behind the times, not in the latest fashion, behindhand.

To date. As yet, up to the present time.

To have a date. To have an appointment, especially with one of the opposite sex.

Datum Line (dā' tūm). A term used in surveying and engineering to describe a line from which all heights and depths are measured. The datum line upon which the Ordnance Survey maps of Great Britain were based until 1921 was the mean sea-level at Liverpool. Since 1921 it has been the mean sea-level at Newlyn, Cornwall.

Daughter. The daughter of Peneus. The bay-tree was so called because it grew in greatest perfection on the banks of the river Peneus. See BAY; DAPHNE.

The daughter of the horseleech. One very exigent; one for ever sponging on another, Prov. xxx, 15.

The horseleech hath two daughters crying, Give, give.

The scavenger's daughter. See SCAVENGER.

Dauphin (daw' fin). The heir of the French crown under the VALOIS and BOURBON dynasties. Guy IX, Count of Vienne, was the first so styled, and he wore a dolphin as his cognizance. The title descended in the family till 1349, when Humbert III ceded his seigneurie, the Dauphiné, to Philippe VI (de Valois), one condition being that the heir of France assumed the title of le dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; and the last was the Duc d'Angoulême, son of Charles X, and he renounced the title in 1830.

The dauphinate of Auvergne appeared as a title in the 13th century, was joined to the French royal family by marriage in 1428, and was annexed to the crown in 1693. The heir to the French throne was called the "King Dauphin" and the Dauphin of Auvergne the "Prince Dauphin".

Grand Dauphin. Louis (1661-1711), eldest son of Louis XIV, for whose use the DELPHIN CLASSICS were prepared.

Second, or Little Dauphin. Louis (1682-1712), son of the Grand Dauphin.

Davenport. Two different articles of furniture bear this name, which is probably that of some forgotten craftsman. One is a small desk with drawers each side, the other is a large upholstered sofa or settee.

Davenport-trick. A trick by which a person can release himself when bound round and tied with rope. The term derives from the Davenport brothers, two American impostors who professed that spirits would untie them when bound with cords. Their imposition was exposed in 1865.

DAVID. In Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, represents Charles II.

Once more the godlike David was restor'd
And willing nations knew their lawful lord.
Pt. I, i, 1030.

St. David, or Dewi Sant. Patron SAINT of WALES, whose day is 1 March. Historical information is scanty. He lived in the 6th century and died c. 600, and as the chief bishop of South Wales moved the ecclesiastical centre from CAERLEON to Menevia (St. David's). Legend is far more prolific and says that he was the son of Xantus, Prince of Ceretic (Cardiganshire), and became an ascetic in the Isle of Wight; that he visited Jerusalem, confuted Pelagius, and was preferred to the see of Caerleon. Geoffrey of Monmouth makes him the uncle of King ARTHUR.

David and Chad, sow peas good and bad. An old proverb meaning that one should sow peas by the saints' days on the first and second of March regardless of weather conditions. St. David's day is 1 March, St. CHAD's 2 March.

David and Jonathan. A type of inseparable friends. Cp. DAMON AND PYTHIAS; Pylaides AND ORESTES.

I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan:
very pleasant hast thou been unto me. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.
II Sam, i, 26.

Davidians, Davists. See FAMILISTS.

Davus sum, non Œdipus. I am Davus, not ŒDIPUS; I am a plain simple fellow, and no solver of riddles like Œdipus. The words are from Terence's Andria, I, ii, 23, and the reference is to the riddle of the SPHINX.

Davy Crockett. See CROCKETT.

Davy Jones. An 18th-century sailor's term for the evil spirit of the sea. Of the many conjectures as to its derivation the most plausible are that Davy is a corruption of the West Indian duppy (devil) and that Jones is a corruption of Jonah, or that Davy Jones was a pirate.

Davy Jones's Locker. The sea, especially as the grave of drowned sailors.

Davy's sow. Drunk as Davy's sow. According to Grose (Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue), one David Lloyd, a Welshman who kept an ale-house at Hereford, had a sow with six legs, which was an object of great curiosity. One day David's wife, having indulged too freely, lay down in the sty to sleep, and a company came to see the sow. David led them to the sty saying as usual, "There is a sow for you! Did you ever see the like?" One of the visitors replied, "Well it is the drunkenest sow I ever beheld." Whence the woman was ever after called "Davy's sow".

Dawson, Bully. A noted London sharper, who swaggered and led a most abandoned life about Blackfriars in the reign of Charles II.

Jemmy Dawson. The hero of Shennstone's ballad of this name given in PERCY'S RELIQUES. James Dawson joined the Young CHEVALIER and was one of the Manchester rebels who were hanged, drawn, and quartered on Kennington Common in 1746. A lady of gentle blood was in love with the gallant young rebel, and died of a broken heart after witnessing his execution.

The dismal scene was o'er and past,
The lover's mournful hearse retir'd;
The maid drew back her languid head,
And sighing forth his name expir'd.

Day. When it begins. (1) At sunset: for the Jews in their "sacred year", and the Christian Church, hence the eve of feast-days; the ancient Britons "non dierum numerum, ut nos, sed noctium computant," says Tacitus, hence "se'n-night" and "fort'night"; the ancient Greeks, Chinese, Mohammedans, etc.; (2) At sunrise: for the Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks; (3) At noon: for the ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers; (4) At midnight: for the Romans, English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese, Americans, etc.

A day after the fair. Too late; the fair you came to see is over.

Day in, day out. All day long and every day.

Day of Atonement, or Day of Coverings. See YOM KIPPUR.

Day of the Barricades. See under BARRICADE.

Day of Dupes. See DUPES.

Days of Grace. See GRACE DAYS.

Every dog has its day. See DOG.

I have had my day. My prime of life is over. I am no longer in the SWIM and am of little account now.

"Old Joe, Sir," said the Major, "was a bit of a favourite . . . once. But Joe has had his day."
DICKENS: Dombey and Son, ch. xx.

I have lost a day. The exclamation (Perdidi diem) of the Roman emperor Titus, when on occasion he could recall nothing done during the past day for the benefit of his subjects. See DELIGHT.

Today a man, tomorrow a mouse. Fortune is so fickle that one day we may be at the top of the WHEEL, and the next day at the bottom. The French equivalent is, "Aujourd'hui roi, demain rien."

To lose the day. To lose the battle, to be defeated.

To win, or gain the day is to be victorious or successful.

Daylight. In drinking bumpers, means the light seen between the wine and the rim of the glass when the wine-glass is not full. Toastmasters used to cry out "Gentlemen, no daylight nor heeltaps." See HEEL-TAP under HEEL.

Daylight robbery. Flagrant overcharging or swindling.

Daylight Saving. The idea of making fuller use of the hours of daylight by advancing the clock originated with Benjamin Franklin, but its introduction was due to its advocacy from 1907 by William Willett (1856-1915), a Chelsea builder. It was adopted in 1916 in Germany, then England, as a wartime measure. In Britain it became permanent by an Act of 1925. Summer Time, as it was called, until 1939, and again in 1946 and from 1948 till 1959, began on the day following the third Saturday in April (unless that was Easter Day, in which case it was the day following the second Saturday in April). It ended on the day following the first Saturday in October. In 1961 Summer Time was extended by six weeks, beginning in March and ending in October, and similar extensions were made in 1962 and subsequent years. During World War II it extended from 25 February in 1940 and 1 January 1941-1944, until 31 December. In 1945 it ended in October. Double Summer Time (i.e. two hours in advance of G.M.T. instead of one hour) was in force during 1941-1945 and 1947 to save fuel. See also GREENWICH TIME.

Summer Time was adopted by some other European countries and in the U.S.A. has been introduced in some states, but not in others owing to opposition (mainly from agriculturists).

Daylights. Pugilists' slang for eyes.

To beat the living daylights out of him, to chastise heavily.

To let daylight into him. To pierce a man with sword or bullet.

Daysman. An umpire, judge, or intercessor. The obsolete verb to day meant to appoint a day for the hearing of a suit, hence to judge between; the man who dayed was the daysman.

Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both.—Job ix, 33.

Dayspring. The dawn.

The dayspring from on high hath visited us.
Luke i, 78.

Daystar. The morning star; hence the emblem of hope and better prospects.

Again o'er the vine-covered regions of France,
See the day-star of Liberty rise.
WILSON: Noctes Ambrosianæ (Jan. 1831).

De die in diem (dē dī' ē in dī' em) (Lat.). From day to day continuously, till the business is completed.

De facto (Lat.). Actually, in reality; as opposed to de jure, lawfully or rightfully. Thus John was de facto king, but Arthur was so de jure. A legal axiom says: "De jure Judices, de facto Juratores, respondent"; Judges look to the law, juries to the facts.

De jure. See DE FACTO.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum (dē mōr' tū is nil nī' si bō' num) (Lat.). Of the dead speak kindly or not at all. "Speak not evil of the dead" was one of the maxims of Chilo (see WISE MEN).

De novo (dē nō' vō) (Lat.). Afresh; over again from the beginning.

De profundis (dē prō fūn' dis) (Lat.). Out of the deep; hence a bitter cry of wretchedness. Ps. cxxx is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It forms part of the Roman Catholic burial service.

These words were chosen as the title of Oscar Wilde's apologia, published posthumously in 1905.

De rigueur (dē rigēr') Fr.). According to strict etiquette; quite COMME IL FAUT, in the height of fashion.

De trop (dē trō) (Fr.). One too many; when a person's presence is not wished for, that person is de trop.

Deacon. To deacon apples, etc. An American phrase arising out of the thrifty habits ascribed to the rural NEW ENGLAND deacons who are said to have put the best of the fruit, etc., on the top of the baskets in which they were being sold, concealing the inferior goods beneath.

Dead. Dead as a door-nail. The door-nail is either one of the heavy-headed nails with which large outer doors used to be studded, or the knob on which the knocker strikes. As this is frequently knocked on the head, it cannot be supposed to have much life left in it. The expression is found in PIERS PLOWMAN.

Old Marley was as dead as a door-nail.
DICKENS: Christmas Carol, Stave i.

Other well-known similes are "Dead as a shotten herring", "as the nail in a coffin", "as mutton", and Chaucer's "as stoon [stone]", and "as the Dodo" (see below).

Dead as the Dodo. See DODO.

Let the dead bury their dead (Matt. viii, 22). Let bygones be bygones. Don't rake up old scores and dead grievances.

Gladstone, speaking on the second Home Rule Bill for Ireland (13 Feb. 1893), explains the phrase:

"Let me entreat you to let the dead bury the dead, to cast behind you every recollection of bygone evils."

Dead beat. Exhausted. In the U.S.A. the word is used as a noun for a worthless fellow.

Dead. Book of the Dead. See under BOOK.

Dead certainty. An absolute certainty.

Dead drunk. So drunk as to be totally incapable or senseless.

Dead duck. See under DUCK.

Dead end kids. Children from poverty-stricken back streets for whom the future seems to hold little promise.

Dead-eye. A wooden block with three holes but without sheaves used for the setting up of shrouds in sailing ships. The holes are the eyes.

Dead fire. CORPOSANT, believed at one time by the credulous to presage death.

Dead hand. One who is a "dead hand" at anything can do it every time without fail.

First-rate work it was too; he was always a dead hand at splitting.

BOLDREWOOD: Robbery Under Arms, xv.

Dead-heads. Those admitted to theatres, etc., without payment; they are "dead" so far as box office receipts are concerned.

As a nautical usage, a log or obstruction floating low in the water, only a small part being visible.

Dead heat. A race in which two or more competitors tie for first place.

Dead horse. To flog a dead horse is to attempt to revive a question already settled or worn thin, thereby wasting time and energy.

To work a dead horse is to perform work already paid for, or to pay off a debt.

Dead knock. A knocking at the door caused by no visible agent, supposed to presage the death of an occupant of the house or someone closely connected with it.

Dead languages. Languages no longer spoken, such as Latin and Sanskrit.

Dead letter. A law or regulation no longer acted upon. A letter which the post office has been unable to deliver either because of an incorrect address or because the person addressed is untraceable.

Dead-letter office. See BLIND DEPARTMENT; DEAD LETTER.

Dead lift. I am at a dead lift. In a strait or difficulty where I greatly need help; a hopeless exigency. A dead lift is the lifting of a dead or inactive mass which depends on sheer strength.

Deadlights. Formerly strong wooden shutters to darken or protect the cabin windows of a ship. In a modern vessel they are steel plates fitted over the scuttles or portholes to strengthen the ship's side and to prevent the internal lighting showing outboard. To ship the deadlights was to shut or fasten them in position, they are now usually closed.

Deadline. The final date or time when a task or assignment must be completed, etc. This sense of strict demarcation derives from the "deadline" round a military prison camp. The phrase was coined in the notorious Confederate prisoner of war camp, Andersonville, during the American CIVIL WAR. Some distance from the peripheral wire fence a line was marked out and any prisoner crossing this line was shot at sight.

Deadlock. A lock which has no spring catch. Metaphorically a state of things so entangled that there seems to be no solution; to reach a complete standstill.

Dead Man's Hand. In the western states of U.S.A., a combination of aces and eights in poker, so called because when Sheriff Wild Bill Hickok was shot in the back at Deadwood, S. Dakota, he held such cards in his hand.

It is said that carrying a dead man's hand will provide a dead sleep. Another superstition is that a lighted candle placed in the hand of a dead man gives no light to anyone but him who carries the hand. See HAND OF GLORY under GLORY; Cp. DEAD HAND.

Dead man's handle. A handle on the controller of an electric train, etc., so designed that it cut off the current and applied the brakes if the driver released his pressure from illness or some other cause. It was formerly applied to electric, diesel-electric, diesel-mechanical, and diesel-hydraulic trains but is now called Driver's Safety Device, a term with less distressing associations.

Dead Marines. Empty bottles. Of this it is said: "an empty bottle is no good to anyone", and "an empty bottle has done good service and is ready to do it again".

Dead men. Empty bottles. When the "spirit" is out of the bottle it is dead. In the U.S.A. dead soldiers has the same meaning.

Down among the dead men let me lie. Let me get so drunk as to slip from my chair, and lie under the table with the empty bottles.

Dead men's fingers. (1) The common British Alcyonium digitatum, a form of marine animal found attached to rocks and seaweed, so called from its appearance when out of the water. (2) The early purple orchis (Orchis mascula) which has tuberous roots somewhat resembling distorted hands.

long purples
That liberal shepherds give a grosser name,
But our cold maids do dead men's fingers call them.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, IV, vii.

Dead men's shoes. See under SHOE.

Dead pays. In the 15th and 16th centuries the pay of English officers on land and sea was augmented by permitting a fictitious increase in the numbers borne on the muster-roll. These "dead pays" were divided among the officers.

Dead reckoning. Calculating a ship's position by plotting on from the last fix, or trustworthy observed position, the speed made good through the water along the compass course steered.

Dead right. Entirely right.

Dead ropes. Those which are fixed or do not run on blocks.

Dead Sea. The Palestinian Salt Sea or Sea of the Plain of the Old Testament, in the ancient Vale of Siddim; called by the Romans Mare Mortuum and Lacus Asphaltites. It is about 46 miles long and 5 to 9 miles wide and is fed by the Jordan from the north, but has seemingly no outlet. The water is of bluish-green colour and its surface is about 1,300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. The northern end is some 1,300 ft. deep and its salt content is 25 per cent while that of sea-water is usually between 3 and 4 per cent. It supports no life other than microbes and a few very low organisms.

Dead Sea Fruit. See APPLES OF SODOM.

Dead Sea Scrolls. In 1947 a Bedouin goatherd, Muhammed the Wolf, made the first scroll discoveries in a cave at the N.W. end of the DEAD SEA, since when some hundreds more have been found and more discoveries are probable. Most scholars accept them as originating from the monastery of the Jewish sect of the ESSENES at Qumran. There is still much controversy over their interpretation but it is expected that these manuscripts (from the period 150 B.C. to A.D. 70) will add very considerably to the understanding of Old Testament textual criticism and the background of the New Testament.

Dead Set. To be at a dead set. To be set fast, so as not to be able to move. The allusion is to machinery.

To make a dead set upon someone. To concentrate steadfastly upon gaining someone's attention or notice; to concentrate on gaining someone's affection, particularly of the opposite sex; to make a prolonged and resolute onslaught. The allusion is to dogs, etc., set on each other to fight.

Dead soldiers. See DEAD MEN.

Dead to the world. In a deep sleep, or state of exhaustion or intoxication, so that a person is totally unconscious of his surroundings.

Dead water. The eddy-water which closes in round a ship's stern as it passes through the water.

Dead weight. The weight of something without life; a burden that does nothing towards easing its own weight; a person who encumbers us and renders no assistance. Cp. DEAD LIFT.

Deaf

Deaf. Deaf as an adder. "Even like the adder that stoppeth her ears; which refuseth to hear the voice of the charmer: charm he never so wisely" (Ps. lviii, 4, 5). In the East, if a viper entered the house, the charmer was sent for, who enticed the serpent and put it into a bag. According to tradition, the viper tried to stop its ears when the charmer uttered his incantation, by applying one ear to the ground and twisting its tail into the other.

In the United States deaf adders are sometimes called COPPERHEADS.

Deaf as a beetle. This does not refer to the insect but to the heavy wooden mallet used to level paving-stones or drive in stakes.

Deaf as a post. Quite deaf; or so inattentive as not to hear what is said. One might as well speak to a gatepost or log of wood.

Deaf as a white cat. It is said that white cats are deaf and stupid.

None so deaf as those who won't hear. The French have the same saying: Il n'y a de pire sourd que celui qui ne veut pas entendre.

Dean (Lat. decanus, one set over ten). The ecclesiastical dignitary who presides over the CHAPTER of a cathedral or COLLEGIATE CHURCH, this having formerly consisted of ten canons. In the more recent foundations decanal functions are carried out by a PROVOST. The Bishop of London is an ex officio Dean of the Province of Canterbury and Dean of the Chapels Royal. The Dean of the Chapel Royal of Scotland (Holyrood), is also Dean of the Order of the THISTLE. The Dean of Christchurch, Oxford, is head of the college and also Dean of the cathedral. The Dean of King's College, London, controls the Theological Department.

In the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, the resident don responsible for undergraduate discipline, or in charge of the chapel, is called a dean. In Scottish and most modern English universities the title is given to the head of a faculty, as in America, where it is also applied to certain other college and administrative officers. Cp. DOYEN.

Dean of the Arches. The judge presiding over the Court of ARCHES. Bow church was formerly a PECULIAR.

Dean of Faculty. In Scotland the barrister who presides over the Faculty of Advocates.

Dean of Guild. One who formerly decided mercantile and maritime causes in a Scottish burgh, but more recently largely concerned with regulations affecting buildings.

Deans of Peculiars. Once numerous, and including those of Collegiate Churches such as Westminster and Windsor, surviving examples are those of Battle, Bocking, Jersey and Guernsey. See COLLEGIATE CHURCH; PECULIARS.

Dean of the Sacred College, is the senior cardinal-bishop who is given the title of Bishop of Ostia and Velletri. He ranks next to the POPE in the hierarchy. See CARDINAL.

Rural Dean. An incumbent who assists in administering part of an archdeaconry. An ancient office effectively revived from the mid-19th century.

Dear. Dear bought and far brought, or felt. A gentle reproof for some extravagant purchase or luxury.

My dearest foe. As "my dearest friend" is one with whom I am on the greatest terms of friendship, so "my dearest foe" is one with whom I am on the greatest terms of enmity.

Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven,
Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio!
SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, I, ii.

Oh, dear me! A very common exclamation, most likely a EUPHEMISM for "Oh, damn me!"

Death. Angel of Death. See AZRAEL.

Black Death. See BLACK.

At death's door. On the point of death; very dangerously ill.

In at the death. Present when the fox was caught and killed; hence, present at the climax or final act of an exciting event.

Till death us do part. See DEPART.

Death from Strange Causes.

Æschylus was killed by a tortoise, dropped on his bald head by an eagle (Valerius Maximus, IX, xii, and Pliny, History, VII, vii).

Anacreon was choked by a grape-stone (Pliny, History, VII, vii).

Bacon died of a cold contracted when stuffing a fowl with snow as an experiment in refrigeration.

Burton, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, died on the very day that he had himself astrologically predicted.

Chalchas, the soothsayer, died of laughter at the thought of having outlived the predicted hour of his death.

Charles VIII, of France, conducting his queen into a tennis-court, struck his head against the lintel, which caused his death.

Fabius, the Roman prætor, was choked by a single goat-hair in the milk which he was drinking (Pliny, History, VII, vii).

Frederick Lewis, Prince of Wales, son of George II, died from the blow of a cricket-ball.

George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV, was drowned in a butt of MARMSEY.

Lepidus (Quintus Æmilius), going out of his house, struck his big toe against the threshold and died.

Louis VI met his death when a pig ran under his horse causing it to stumble.

Lully (Jean Baptiste), the composer, when beating time by tapping the floor with his staff while directing a performance of the Te Deum, struck his foot and subsequently died from the abscess which set in.

Otway, the poet, in a starving condition, had a guinea given him, with which he bought a loaf of bread and died while swallowing the first mouthful.

Philomenes died of laughter at seeing an ass eating the figs provided for his own dessert (Valerius Maximus).

William III died from a fall from his horse which stumbled over a mole-hill.

Death in the pot. During a dearth in Gilgal, there was made for the sons of the prophets a pottage of wild herbs, some of which were poisonous. When they tasted the pottage, they cried out "there is death in the pot". Then Elisha put into it some meal and the poisonous qualities were counteracted (II Kings iv, 40).

Death or Glory Boys. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Death under shield. Death in battle.

Her imagination had been familiarized with wild and bloody events . . . and had been trained up to consider an honourable "death under shield" (as that in a field of battle was termed) a desirable termination to the life of a warrior.

SCOTT: The Betrothed, ch. vi.

Death-bell. A tinkling in the ears, supposed by the Scottish peasantry to announce the death of a friend.

O lay, 'tis dark, an' I heard the death-bell,

An' I darena gae yonder for gowd nor fee.

JAMES HOGG: Mountain Bard.

Death coach. A ghostly carriage, whose coachman is sometimes headless, which, in Irish and Breton superstition, is reputed to stop in front of a house where a death is about to occur.

Death-watch. Any species of Anobium, a genus of wood-boring beetles, that make a clicking sound, once supposed to presage death.

Death's head. A skull. Bawds and procuresses used to wear a ring bearing the impression of a death's head in the time of Queen Elizabeth I.

Sell some of the cloaths to buy thee a death's head, and put upon thy middle finger: your least considering bawd does so much.

MASSINGER: The Old Law, IV, i.

Death's-head Moth. Acherontia atropos is so called from the markings on the back of the thorax which closely resemble a skull. It is the largest British Hawk-moth.

Death's-man. An executioner; a person who kills another brutally but lawfully.

He's dead, I'm only sorry

He had no other death's-man.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, IV, vi.

Debatable Land. A tract of land between the Esk and Sark claimed by both ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, and for long in dispute. It was the haunt of thieves and vagabonds.

Debon. See DEVONSHIRE.

Debonair (de bon âr') (Le Débonnaire). Louis I of France (778, 814-840), son and successor of CHARLEMAGNE as Holy Roman Emperor; also called the PIOUS.

Debrett. Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionship, first compiled and published by John Debrett in 1802 and since published continuously. To be in Debrett is the same as to be in Burke (see under BURKE).

Debt of Nature. To pay the debt of Nature. To die. Life is a loan and the debt is paid off by the death.

The slender debt to Nature's quickly paid.

QUARLES: Emblems.

Decabrists, or Dekabrists. See DECEMBRISTS.

Decameron (de kām' é rôn). The collection of 100 tales by Boccaccio, completed c. 1353, represented as having been told in ten days (Gr. deka, ten, hemera, day) during the plague at Florence in 1348, seven ladies and three gentlemen each telling a tale daily. Cp. HEPTAMERON.

Decathlon. An athletic contest in the modern OLYMPIC GAMES consisting of ten events: 100 metres race, long jump, putting the shot, high jump, 400 metres race, 110 metres hurdles, discus, pole vault, throwing the javelin, and 1,500 metres race.

December (Lat. the tenth month). So it was when the year began in MARCH with the vernal equinox; but, since JANUARY and FEBRUARY have been inserted before it, the name is somewhat misplaced.

The Man of December. NAPOLEON III (1808-1873). He was elected President of the Second French Republic 10 December 1845; made his COUP D'ÉTAT

Decimo-sexto

2 December 1851; and became Emperor 2 December 1852.

Decembrists. Conspirators in the Russian army who tried to overthrow the Czar Nicholas I in December 1825.

Decimo-sexto. An obsolete expression for a small, insignificant person. The term comes from the book trade: sexto-decimo (16mo) is a book in which each sheet is folded to a sixteenth of its size, giving 32 pages; hence it is a small book. Cp. DUODECIMO.

How now! my dancing braggart in decimo-sexto!

Charm your skipping tongue.

BEN JOHNSON: Cynthia's Revels, I, i.

Deck. A pack of cards, or that part of the pack left after the hands have been dealt. The term was current in England until the 19th century; it is now mostly used in the U.S.A.

But, whiles he thought to steal the single ten,
The king was slyly finger'd from the deck.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. III, V, i.

To sweep the deck. To clear off all the stakes.

Clear the decks. Get everything out of the way that is not essential, also to clear the decks of personnel. A nautical expression.

To clear lower deck is to assemble the ship's company from below.

Decoration Day, or Memorial Day. 30 May. Set apart in the United States for decorating the graves of those who fell in the CIVIL WAR (1861-1865).

Decree nisi. See NISI.

Decretals. The name given to papal decrees or letters which embody decisions in ecclesiastical law.

The False, or Forged Decretals aimed at enhancing the position of BISHOPS and papacy and strengthening the Church against inroads by the temporal power. The collection contains many spurious letters and documents, ranging from the 1st to the 7th century, including the pretended DONATION OF CONSTANTINE, intermingled with, and thus supported by, genuine decretals. They appeared in the mid-9th century and were issued under the name of Isidore Mercator. They were first seriously challenged in the 15th century and finally discredited by the PROTESTANT minister David Blondel in 1620. They are also known as the ISIDORIAN DECRETALS.

The Isidorian Decretals. The False Decretals wrongly assigned to Isidore, Archbishop of Seville, a noted 7th-century scholar and codifier of canon law.

They were probably compiled in France and accepted by Pope Nicholas I. Since their forgery became manifest they commonly came to be called the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals.

Decuman Gate. The principal entrance to a Roman military camp, situated on the farthest side from the enemy, and so called because it was guarded by the 10th cohort of each legion (decimus, tenth).

Dedalian. See DÆDALUS.

Dee, Dr. John Dee (1527-1608), famous mathematician, alchemist and astrologer, was patronized by Queen Elizabeth I, but eventually died a pauper at Mortlake, where he was buried. He wrote 79 treatises on a variety of subjects. Dee's Speculum or Mirror, of solid pink-tinted glass, about the size of an orange, once in Horace Walpole's collection at Strawberry Hill, is now in the BRITISH MUSEUM.

Deed Poll. A deed made by one party, and so called because it was written on parchment with a polled or straight edge as opposed to an INDENTURE, one with indented or wavy edge.

Deemster, Dempster, or Doomster. The two judges of the Isle of Man are called Deemsters and they take an oath to execute the laws "as indifferently as the herring backbone doth lie in the midst of the fish". (See DOOM.) Hall Caine's once popular romance The Deemster appeared in 1887.

In SCOTLAND, a Dempster or Doomster was formerly appointed to recite the sentence after it had been pronounced by the court. He combined this office with that of executioner.

"And this," said the Doomster, aggravating his harsh voice, "I pronounce for doom."

SCOTT: Heart of Midlothian, ch. xxiv.

Deer. Supposed by poets to shed tears. The drops, however, which fall from their eyes are not tears, but an oily secretion from the so-called tear-pits.

A poor sequester'd stag . . .
Did come to languish . . . and the big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, II, ii.

Small deer. Any small animal; and used metaphorically for trifling matters or any collection of trifles. Cp. SMALL BEER.

But mice and rats, and such small deer
Have been Tom's food for seven long year.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, III, iv.

Default. Judgment by default is when the defendant does not appear in court on the day appointed. The judge gives sentence in favour of the plaintiff, not because the plaintiff is right, but from the default of the defendant. Hence used of a judgment made in a person's absence.

Defender of the Faith (Lat. fidei defensor). A title given to Henry VIII by Pope Leo X (11 October 1521) for his treatise Assertio Septem Sacramentorum attacking Luther's teachings. The initials 'F.D.' continuously appeared on the British coinage from the reign of George I.

Defenders. An association of Irish Catholics (1784-1798), formed in Northern IRELAND in opposition to the PEEP-OF-DAY BOYS. In 1795 a pitched battle was fought between the two and the Defenders suffered severe losses.

Defenestration of Prague. An incident in Bohemia prior to the outbreak of the THIRTY YEARS WAR, when the two leading Roman Catholic members of the Bohemian National Council were thrown out of a window of the castle of Prague by the PROTESTANT members. They landed in the moat and sustained only minor injuries.

Deficient. A deficient number is one of which the sum of all its divisors is less than itself, as 10, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 5=8, which is less than 10.

Déficit, Madam. Marie Antoinette, because she was always in need of money. She was noted for her extravagance and popularly regarded as being responsible for the nation's bankruptcy. According to the Revolutionary song:

La Boulangère a des écus,
Qui ne lui comptent guère.

See BAKER.

Degrees, Songs of. Another name for the GRADUAL PSALMS.

De gustibus non est disputandum (Lat.). There is no accounting for tastes; a somewhat similar English proverb is, "One man's meat is another man's poison." Cp. CHACUN A SON GOÛT.

Dei Gratia (dē i grā' shā) (Lat.). By the grace of God. As early as c. 690 we find "I, Ine, by God's grace King of the West Saxons", and in an ordinance of William I, "Willelmus gratia Dei Rex Anglorum". It was first used on the GREAT SEAL by William II and all Great Seals from the reign of Edward I. It still appears on British coins, where it was originally introduced on the gold coins of Edward III in 1344. See GRACELESS FLORIN.

The style was also sometimes used by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, until as late as the 17th century, and is still so used by BISHOPS of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Dei Judicium (dē i joo dish' i um) (Lat.). The judgment of God; so the judgment by ORDEAL was called, because it was taken as certain that God would deal rightly with the appellants.

Deianira (dē i ān ira). Wife of HERCULES and the unwitting cause of his death. NESSUS, the CENTAUR, having carried her across a river, attempted to assault her and was shot by Hercules with a poisoned arrow. The expiring centaur gave Deianira his tunic, steeped in blood, telling her that it would reclaim her husband from illicit loves. When she had occasion to give it to Hercules, the poisoned blood brought about his death.

Deidamia (dē i dā' mia). Daughter of Lycomedes, King of Scyros. AGHILLES, when sojourning there disguised as a woman, became the father of her son Pyrrhus, or Neoptolemus.

Deiphobus (dē i fō' bus). Third husband of HELEN of Troy whom he married after the death of his brother PARIS. Helen betrayed Deiphobus to her first husband, MENELAUS, who killed his rival.

Deirdre (dir' drē). In Irish romance the daughter of the king of ULSTER's storyteller. At her birth it was prophesied that she would bring ruin to IRELAND. King CONCHOBAR brought her up and planned to marry her, but she fell in love with Naoise, the eldest of the three sons of USNECH. She escaped to Scotland with the three brothers but they were lured back by Conchobar with false promises. The jealous king killed the three young men. One version of the story says that Deirdre killed herself, another that she died the following year after living unhappily with Conchobar. Deirdre is the subject and title of a play by W. B. Yeats, and J. M. Synge also dramatized the legend in his Deirdre of the Sorrows.

Deist. See THEIST.

Deities. The more important classical, Teutonic, and Scandinavian deities appear under their own names; the present list is only intended to include certain collective names and some better-known gods, sprites, etc., of special localities, functions, etc.

Déjeuner à la Fourchette (Fr.). A fork lunch; a cold collation with meat and wine.

Dekko, To take a. To glance at, to have a look at. This is one of the many phrases brought back from India by the British Army. In Hindustani dekho means "look". Cp. CHAR.

Delectable Mountains. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, a range of mountains from which the "CELESTIAL CITY" may be seen.

Delenda est Carthago (dé len' dá est kar tha' gō) (Lat.). Carthage must be destroyed; the words with which Cato the Elder concluded every speech in the Senate after his visit to Carthage in 157 B.C. where he saw in her revived prosperity a standing threat to ROME. The phrase is now proverbial and means "that which stands in the way of our greatness must be removed at all costs".

Delight. The delight of mankind. So Titus the Roman emperor (40, 79-81) was called on account of his benevolence and munificence. See I HAVE LOST A DAY under DAY.

Delilah, A. A beautiful but treacherous woman, from the story of Samson and Delilah (Judges xvi).

Delinquents. During the English civil wars (1642-1645) a term applied to the royalists by their opponents. Charles I was called the "chief delinquent".

Delirium. From the Lat. lira (the ridge left by the plough), hence the verb de-lilare, to make an irregular ridge in ploughing. Thus delirus for one who could not plough straight, and hence a crazy, doting person, one whose mind wandered from the subject in hand. Delirium is that state of such a person. Cp. PREVARICATION.

Della Cruscan (del' a krūs' kánz), or Della Cruscan School. A school of poetry started by some young Englishmen in Florence in the latter part of the 18th century. Their silly, sentimental affectations, which appeared in The World and The Oracle, created a temporary stir but were mercilessly pilloried in The Baviad and The Mœviad. The clique took its name from the famous Accademia della Crusca (Academy of Chaff) which was founded in Florence in 1582 with the object of purifying the Italian language by sifting away its "chaff", and which in 1611 published an important dictionary.

Delos. The smallest island of the Cyclades, sacred to APOLLO. It comes from the Greek word for a ring, as the rest of the islands encircle Delos. It was fabled to have been called out of the deep by POSEIDON, and remained a floating island until ZEUS chained it to the bottom of the sea. It was the legendary birthplace of Apollo and Artemis (DIANA).

Delphi, or Delphos (now Kastri). A town of Phocis at the foot of Mount PARNASSUS, famous for a temple of APOLLO and for its celebrated oracle which was silenced only in the 4th century by the Emperor Theodosius. Delphi was regarded by the ancients as the "navel of the earth", and in the temple there was a white stone bond with a red ribbon to represent the navel and umbilical cord.

In the Winter's Tale (the same play in which he gives Bohemia a sea-coast) SHAKESPEARE makes Delphos an island.

A Delphic utterance is one which has the ambiguity associated with the words of the ORACLE.

The President's broad wishes, as expressed in his periodic but carefully Delphic press conferences.

The Times, 3 Jan. 1966.

Delphin Classics. A set of Latin classics prepared under the superintendence of Pierre Daniel Huet and Anne Lefevre (Madame Dacier) for the use of the Grand DAUPHIN (ad usum Delphini). They were published between 1674 and 1730 and were subsequently frequently reprinted in various parts of Europe.

Deluge. The Biblical story of the flood (Gen. vi, vii, viii) has its counterpart in a variety of mythologies. In Babylonia it appears in the 11th tablet of the GILGAMESH EPIC, but on a higher level of civilization, for UTNAPISHTIM takes both craftsmen and treasure into his ark.

Apollodorus tells the story of DEUCALION AND PYRRHA in some versions of which Deucalion is replaced by Ogyges. (See OGYGIAN DELUGE.) The story is also found in Ovid's Metamorphoses, Bk. I, 253-415.

In India one legend tells how MANU was warned by a fish of the approaching flood and the fish subsequently towed his vessel to safety.

Kindred stories are found in China, Burma, New Guinea, etc., and in both the American continents.

Delusion. A snare and a delusion. Something that raises hopes only to dash them. Lord Denman's judgment in O'Connell v. the Crown (September 1844) has, "Trial by jury . . . will be a delusion, a mockery and a snare."

Demesne. See MANOR.

Demeter (de mē' ter). The corn goddess of Greek legend, identified with the Roman CERES. She was the mother of Persephone (PROSERPINE) and the goddess of fruit, crops, and vegetation.

Demijohn (dem' i jon). A glass or stone-ware vessel with a large body and a small neck enclosed in wickerwork and containing more than a bottle. A common capacity is five gallons. The word is probably from the Fr. dame-jeanne, Dame Jane. Cp. BELLARMINE.

Demi-monde (dem' i mond) (Fr. demi, half; monde, world, society). As le beau monde is society, le demi-monde denotes that class of women whose social standing is only half acknowledged or who are of uncertain reputation. The term was first used by Dumas fils for the title of a play (Le Demi-Monde, 1855), and is sometimes incorrectly applied to fashionable courtesans.

[Dumas'] demi-monde is the link between good and bad society . . . the world of compromised women, a social limbo, the inmates of which . . . are perpetually struggling to emerge into the paradise of honourable and respectable ladies.

Fraser's Magazine, 1885.

Demi-rep (dem' i rep). A woman whose character has been blown upon, one "whom everybody knows to be what nobody calls her" (Fielding). A contraction of demi-reputable.

Demi-urge (dem' i ērj) (Gr. demiourgos, artisan, handicraftsman, etc.). In the language of the Platonists, that mysterious agent which made the world and all that it contains. The Logos, or Word, spoken of by St. JOHN, in the first chapter of his gospel, is the Demiurgus of Platonizing Christians. Among the Gnostics, JEHOVAH (as an eon or emanation of the Supreme Being) is the Demiurge. See MARCIONITES.

Certain officials in some of the ancient Greek states were called Demiurgoi.

Democritus (de mok' ri tus) (c. 460-370 B.C.). Called "Wisdom" during his life and later the "laughing philosopher". He was a follower of Leucippus and head of the school at ABDERA in Thrace. He should rather be termed the deriding philosopher, because he derided or laughed at people's folly or vanity. It is said that he put out his eyes that he might think the more deeply. He was no mere scoffer, and in many ways is to be ranked with PLATO and ARISTOTLE.

Democritus, dear droll, revisit earth,
And with our follies glut thy heightened mirth.

PRIOR: Democritus and Heraclitus.

Democritus Junior. The name under which Robert Burton's (1577-1640) The Anatomy of Melancholy first appeared in 1621.

Demogorgon (dem ō gor' gon). A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. He is first mentioned by the 4th-century Christian writer, Lactantius, who in doing so broke with the superstition that the very reference to Demogorgon by name brought death and disaster.

Must I call your master to my aid,
At whose dread name the trembling furies quake,
Hell stands abashed, and earth's foundations shake?

ROWE: Lucan's Pharsalia, vi.

Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" (Paradise Lost, II, 966). According to Ariosto, Demogorgon was king of the elves and fays who lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. Spenser (Faerie Queene, IV, ii, 47) says that he dwells "down in the bottom of the deep abyss" with the three fatal sisters. In Dryden's The Flower and the Leaf (493) he appears as "cruel Demogorgon" and in Shelley's Prometheus Unbound he is the eternal principle that ousts false gods.

Demon (Austr.). A convict serving his sentence of transportation in Van Diemen's Land (Tasmania) was so called.

Demons, Prince of. ASMODEUS, also called "the Demon of Matrimonial Unhappiness".

Demos, King (dē' mos). The electorate, the proletariat; those who choose the rulers of the nation and are therefore ultimately sovereign. A facetious or derisive term (Gr. demos, people).

Demy. (Fr. demi, half). A demy of Magdalen College, Oxford, is a foundation scholar, whose allowance or "commons" was originally half that of a Fellow.

Den. God ye good den! An abbreviated form of the old salutation "God give you good even(ing)".

Nurse: God ye good morrow, gentlemen.
Mer: God ye good den, fair gentlewoman.
SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, 11, iv.

Denarius (den ár' i ús). A Roman silver coin originally equal to ten ases (demi-ases). The word was used in France and England for the inferior coins whether of silver or copper, and for ready money generally. The initial "d" for PENNY (£ s. d.) is from denarius.

Denarius Dei (Lat. God's penny). An earnest of a bargain, which was given to the Church or poor.

Denarii St. Petri. Peter's pence. (See under PETER.)

Denis, St. See DENYS.

Denmark. According to the Roman de la Rose, Denmark means the country of Danaos, who settled there after the siege of TROY, as BRUTUS is said by the same sort of legend to have settled in BRITAIN. Saxo-Germanicus, with equal fancifulness, explains the name by making Dan, the son of Humble, the first king.

Something is rotten in the state of Denmark. A hidden cause of uneasiness or fear, which is felt but cannot be precisely defined. From SHAKESPEARE'S Hamlet, IV, i.

Denys, St. (dé nē'). The apostle to the Gauls and patron saint of France, said to have been beheaded at Paris in 272. According to tradition, after martyrdom he carried his head in his hands for six miles and laid it on the spot where stands the cathedral bearing his name. The tale may have arisen from an ancient painting representing his martyrdom in which the artist placed the head between the martyr's hands so that the trunk might be identified.

Montjoie Saint Denys! See MONTJOIE.

Deo gratias (dé' ō grā shās) (Lat.). Thanks to God. Cp. DEI GRATIA.

Deo juvante, or adjuvante (dé' ō joo vān' te) (Lat.). With God's help.

Deo volente (dé' ō vō len' te) (Lat.). God be willing; by God's will; usually contracted into D.V.

Doch-an-doruís. See DOCH-AN-DORIS.

Deodand (dé' ō dānd). Literally, something which should be given to God (Lat. deo-dandum). In English law a personal chattel responsible for the death of an individual was forfeited to the crown for some pious use. For example, if a man met his death from the fall of a ladder, the kick of a horse, etc., the cause of death was sold and the proceeds given to the Church. It originated from the idea that as the sufferer was sent to his account without the sacrament of extreme unction, the money could serve to pay for masses for his repose. Deodands were abolished in 1846.

Depart. Literally, to part thoroughly; to separate effectually. The marriage service in the old prayer-books had "till death us depart", which has been corrupted into "till death us do part".

"Depart" is sound English for "part asunder", which was altered to "do part" in 1661, at the pressing request of the Puritans, who knew as little of the history of their national language as they did of that of their national Church.

J. H. BLUNT: Annotated Book of Common Prayer.

Derby (dēr' bi). The American name for the hat known as the BOWLER in England. The Brown Derby is a well-known Hollywood restaurant, shaped like a hat, and frequented by the film colony.

Derby Day (dar' bi) is the day when the DERBY STAKES are run for, during the great Epsom Summer Meeting; it is usually during the week before or after Whit Sunday.

Derby Dog. The stray dog that so often wanders on to the race-course on Epsom Downs as soon as it has been cleared for the main race. Something that inevitably "turns up".

Derby Stakes (dar' bi). One of the CLASSIC RACES, also called the BLUE RIBBON OF THE TURF, was instituted by the twelfth Earl of Derby in 1780, one year after he established the OAKS. The Derby is for three-year-old colts and fillies only, therefore no horse can win it twice.

Derbyite. In World War I, a soldier enlisted under the Derby Scheme of 1915. The Earl of Derby was Director of Recruiting and sought to promote a scheme of voluntary enlistment by age groups. The response was quite inadequate and conscription was instituted in May 1916.

Derbyshire neck. Goitre, from its occurrence in that county more commonly than in other parts of Britain.

Derrick. A contrivance or form of crane used for hoisting heavy objects; so called from Derrick, the TYBURN hangman of the early 17th century. The name was first applied to the gibbet and, from its similarity, to the crane.

He rides circuit with the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyborne the inn at which he will light.—DEKKER: Bellman of London (1608).

Derwentwater. Lord Derwentwater's Lights. A local name of the AURORA BOREALIS; James, Earl of Derwentwater, was beheaded 24 February 1716 for his part in the 1715 rebellion in support of the Old Pretender. (See PRETENDER.) It is said that the northern lights were unusually bright that night.

Deseret. Deseret was the MORMON name for a honey bee and their original name for the State of Utah.

Desert Fathers. See under FATHER.

Desert Rats. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Desmas. See DYSMAS.

Despair. Giant Despair, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, dwelt in DOUBTING CASTLE.

Destruction. Prince of Destruction. TAMERLANE, or Timur, the Tartar (1336–1405), the famous oriental conqueror of Persia and a great part of India. He was threatening China when he died.

Desultory. Roman circus-riders who used to leap from one horse to another were called desultores; hence used figuratively in Latin to mean an inconstant person, or one who went from one thing to another; and desultory thus means after the manner of a desultor (Lat. desiko, leap down, alight).

Deucalion and Pyrrha. Deucalion (the Greek counterpart of Noah) was a son of PROMETHEUS and married Pyrrha, daughter of Epimetheus. He was king of part of Thessaly. When ZEUS, angered at the evils of the Bronze Age (See AGE), caused the DELUGE, Deucalion built an ark to save himself and his wife, which came to rest on Mount PARNASSUS. Told by the ORACLE of THEMIS that to restore the human race they must cast the bones of their mother behind them (which they interpreted as the stones of Mother Earth), he and his wife obeyed the direction. The stones thrown by Deucalion became men and those thrown by Pyrrha became women.

And men themselves, the which at first were framed

Of earthly mould, and form'd of flesh and bone,
Are now transformed into hardest stone;
Such as behind their backs (so backward bred)
Were thrown by Pyrrha and Deucalion.

SPENSER: Faerie Queene, V, Intro., ii.

Deuce. The two, in games with cards, dice, etc. (Fr. deux). The three is called "tray" (Fr. trois).

Deuce-ace. A throw of two dice, one showing one spot and the other showing two; hence, exceptionally bad luck.

Among the origins ascribed to the word deuce used as a EUPHEMISM for DEVIL is that it may come from the two at dice being an unlucky throw. Other suggestions are that it is from the Latin expletive Deus! My God!; from the Celtic dus, teuz, phantom, spectre; or from the Old German Durse, Turse, giant.

Deuce take you. Get away! you annoy me.

It played the deuce with me. It made me very ill; it disagreed with me. It gave me the devil of a time.

The deuce is in you. You are a very demon.

What the deuce is the matter? What the devil is up? What in the world is amiss?

Deus. Deus ex machina (Lat.). The intervention of some unlikely or providential event just in time to extricate one from difficulties or to save a situation; especially as contrived in a novel or a play. Literally it means "a god let down upon the stage from the machine", the "machine" being part of the stage equipment in an ancient Greek theatre.

Deus vult (Lat. God wills it). The war-cry of the First CRUSADE, enjoined by Pope Urban II because these words were spontaneously used by the crowd in response to his address at Clermont in 1095.

Deva. The Roman legionary fortress on the site of the present Chester; the river Dee.

Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream.
MILTON: Lycidas.

Devil, The. Represented with a cloven foot, because by the Rabbinical writers he is called seirizzim (a goat). As the goat is a type of uncleanness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem. As the Prince of Evil he is also called SATAN.

In legal parlance a counsel who prepares a brief for another is called a devil and the process is called devilling. It is also applied where one counsel transfers his brief to another to represent him in court.

The Attorney-General's Devils are the Counsel of the Treasury, who not infrequently get promoted to the BENCH. A printer's devil. A printer's errand boy; formerly the boy who took the printed sheets from the tympan of the press. Moxon says (1683): "They do commonly so black and bedaub themselves that the workmen do jocosely call them devils".

Devil

DEVIL PHRASES.

As the Devil loves holy water. That is, not at all. HOLY WATER drives away the devil. The Latin proverb is, "Sicut sus amaricinum amat" (as swine love marjoram), which similarly means not at all, since Lucretius, VI, 974, says, "amaricinum fugitat sus."

Beating the Devil's tattoo. Drumming on the table with one's fingers a wearisome number of times, or on the floor with one's foot; repeating any rhythmical mechanical sound with annoying persistence.

Between the Devil and the deep sea. Between SCYLLA and CHARYBDIS; between two evils or alternatives, to be in a hazardous or precarious position. It is seemingly of nautical origin and means between the devil (gunwale) and the waterline of a ship. See THE DEVIL TO PAY AND AND NO PITCH HOT, below.

Cheating the Devil. Mincing an oath; doing evil for gain, and giving part of the profits to the Church, etc. It is not unusual in monkish traditions. Thus the "Devil's Bridge", over the Fall of Reuss in Switzerland, is a single arch over a cataract. It is said that Satan knocked down several bridges but promised the abbot, Giraldus of Einsiedeln, to let this one stand, provided he would give him the first living thing that crossed it:

The Abbot, standing at its head,
Threw across it a loaf of bread,
Which a hungry dog sprang after,
And the rocks re-echoed with peals of laughter
To see the Devil thus defeated!

LONGFELLOW: Golden Legend, V.

Rabelais (Pantagruel, Bk. IV, ch. xlvi), says that a farmer once bargained with the Devil for each to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The canny farmer sowed carrots and turnips when it was his turn to have the under-soil share, and wheat and barley the year following.

Devil dodger. A sly hypocrite; a ranting preacher.

Devil-may-care. Wildly reckless; also a reckless individual.

Give the Devil his due. Give even a bad person, or one hated like the devil, such credit as he deserves.

Go to the Devil. Go to ruin. In the 17th century wits used to make a play on the applicability of the phrase to the Devil Tavern, TEMPLE BAR, a favoured rendezvous among lawyers and writers. The sign was St. DUNSTAN pulling the Devil's nose.

Bloodhound: As you come by Temple Bar make a step to the Devil.

Tim: To the Devil, father?

Sim: My master means the sign of the Devil, and he cannot hurt you, fool; there's a saint holds him by the nose.

W. ROWLEY: A Match at Midnight, 1633.

He needs a long spoon who sups with the Devil. See SPOON.

Here's the very Devil to pay. Here's a pretty KETTLE OF FISH. I'm in a pretty mess.

Needs must when the Devil drives. If I must, I must; there is no option. The French say: "Il faut marcher quand le diable est aux trousses." The Italian version is: "Bisogna andare, quando il diavolo e nella coda."

He must needs go that the Devil drives.

SHAKESPEARE: All's Well that Ends Well, I, iii.

Pull Devil, pull baker. Lie, cheat and wrangle away, "have a go at each other". Sometimes "parson" is substituted for "baker".

Then my mither and her quarrelled, and pu'ed me two ways at anes, as if ilk ane had an end o' me, like Punch and the Deevil rugging about the Baker at the fair.—SCOTT: Old Mortality, ch. xxxviii.

Talk of the Devil and he's sure to appear. Said of a person who has been the subject of conversation and who unexpectedly makes his appearance. An older proverb still is: "Talk of the Dule and he'll put out his horns"; and a more modern version is, "Talk of an angel and you'll hear the fluttering of its wings."

Forthwith the devil did appear,
For name him, and he's always near.

PRIOR: Hans Carvel.

Tell the truth and shame the Devil. A very old saying, of obvious meaning.

The Devil among the tailors. Said when a good slanging match is in progress; it is also the name of a game in which a top (the "devil") is spun among a number of wooden men (the "tailors") to knock down as many as possible.

The phrase is said to have originated from a fracas made at a benefit performance about 1830 for the actor William Downton (1764-1851). The piece was a burlesque called The Tailors: a Tragedy for Warm Weather, and the row was made outside the Haymarket Theatre by a large crowd of tailors, who considered the play a slur on their trade.

The Devil and all. Everything, especially everything bad.

The Devil and his dam. The Devil and something worse. Dam here may mean mother or wife and numerous quotations may be adduced in support of either interpretation. Rabbinical tradition relates that LILITH was the wife of ADAM, but was such a vixen that Adam could not live with her, and she became the Devil's dam. We also read that BELPHEGOR "came to earth to seek him out a dam". In many mythologies the Devil is typified by an animal, and in such cases dam for mother is not inappropriate.

The Devil catch the hindmost. A phrase from late mediæval magic. The Devil was supposed to have had a school at Toledo, or at Salamanca, where the students, after making certain progress in their mystic studies, were obliged to run through a subterranean hall, and the last man was seized by the Devil and became his imp. See also under SHADOW.

The Devil dances in an empty pocket. An old proverb. Poverty or an empty pocket leads to temptation or crime. Many coins bore a cross on the obverse and so the Devil could not gain entrance to the pocket if they were present.

The Devil in Dublin City. The Scandinavian form of Dublin was Divelin[a], and the Latin Dublinia. Dublin is the Gael. dhu linn, the black pool. Devlin, in Co. Mayo, is the same word and preserves the Scandinavian form.

Is just as true's the deil's in hell
Or Dublin City.

BURNS: Death and Dr. Hornbrook.

The Devil is not so black as he is painted. Said in extenuation or mitigation, especially when it seems that exaggerated censure has been given.

The Devil looking over Lincoln. Said of a vitriolic critic or a backbiter. Fuller in his Worthies (under Oxford), says the phrase may allude either to the "stone picture of the Devil which doth [1661] or lately did, overlook Lincoln Colledge", or to a grotesque sculpture at Lincoln Cathedral.

Than wolde ye looke ouer me with stomoke swolne
Like as the diuell lookt ouer Lincolne.

JOHN HEYWOOD: Proverbs (1562).

The Devil rides on a fiddlestick. Much ado about nothing. Beaumont and Fletcher, SHAKESPEARE and others, use the phrase. "Fiddlesticks!" as an exclamation means rubbish!, nonsense! When the prince and his merry companions are at the Boar's Head, first Bardolph rushes in to warn them that the sheriff's officers are at hand, then the hostess enters to warn her guests. But the prince says:

Heigh, heigh! the devil rides upon a fiddlestick:
what's the matter?—Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv.

The Devil's advocate. See ADVOCATE.

The Devil's dancing-hour. Midnight.

The Devil's daughter's portion. The saying is:

Deal, Dover, and Harwich,
The Devil gave with his daughter in marriage.

occasioned by the scandalous impositions once practised in these ports on sailors and casual visitors.

The Devil's door. A small door in the north wall of some old churches, which used to be opened at baptisms and communions to "let the Devil out". The north used to be known as "the Devil's side", where SATAN and his legion lurked to catch the unwary.

The Devil sick would be a monk.

When the Devil was sick, the Devil a monk would be;

When the Devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

Said of those persons who in times of sickness or danger make pious resolutions, but forget them when danger is past and health recovered.

The Devil to pay and no pitch hot. The "devil" was the outboard plank by the waterways of a ship, and the seam between it and the side of the vessel was wider than the others and difficult of access. It consequently needed more pitch when caulking and paying, and so there was the chance of "the devil to pay and no pitch hot". To "pay" is to cover with pitch (O.Fr. peier). See PAY.

To hold a candle to the Devil. See CANDLE.

To kindle a fire for the Devil. To offer sacrifice, to do what is really sinful, under the delusion that you are doing God's service.

To lead one the Devil's own dance. To give one endless trouble.

To play the very Devil with something. To thoroughly mar or spoil.

To pull the Devil by the tail. To struggle constantly against adversity.

To say the Devil's paternoster. To grumble; to rail at providence.

To vow a candle to the Devil. See CANDLE.

To whip the Devil round the stump. An American phrase meaning to enjoy the fruits of evil-doing without having to suffer the penalty; to dodge a difficulty dishonestly but successfully.

When the Devil is blind. Never.

Why should the Devil have all the good tunes? A saying originating with Charles Wesley about 1740, when he adapted the music of current popular songs to promote the use of his hymns.

Devil

DEVIL. SOME TOPOGRAPHICAL USAGES.

Devil's Arrows. Three remarkable "Druid" stones near Boroughbridge, Yorkshire.

Devil's Bridge. A popular name in mountainous areas for bridges built over ravines and chasms. There is a notable one over the Reuss in the Swiss canton of Uri. (See CHEATING THE DEVIL.) The Cardiganshire hamlet of this name is so called from the bridge across the gorge of the Mynach. The lower or Monk's Bridge was built by the monks of Strata Florida in the 12th century and the upper tiers in the 12th and 20th.

Devil's Cheese-wring. See CHEESEWRING.

Devil's Coits. See HACKELL'S COIT.

Devil's Current. Part of the current of the BOSPORUS is so called, from its great rapidity.

Devil's Den. A CROMLECH near Marlborough.

Devil's Dyke. (1) An ancient earthwork in Cambridgeshire stretching from Reach to Wood Ditton. On the eastern side it is 18 ft. high. (2) A ravine in the South Downs to the N.W. of Brighton. The legend is that St. Cuthman, priding himself on having christianized the area and having built a nunnery where the dyke-house was later built, was confronted by the Devil and told that all his labour was vain for he would swamp the whole country before morning. St. Cuthman went to the nunnery and told the abbess to keep the sisters in prayer till after midnight and then illuminate the windows. The Devil came at sunset with mattock and spade, and began cutting a dyke into the sea, but was seized with rheumatic pains all over his body. He flung down his tools, and the cocks, mistaking the illuminated windows for sunrise, began to crow; whereupon the Devil fled in alarm, leaving his work not half done. (3) See GRIM'S DYKE under GRIM.

Devil's Frying-pan. A curious rock basin filled by the sea at high tide, situated near the village of Cadgwith, east of Lizard Point, CORNWALL.

Devil's Hole. A name of the Peak Cavern in Derbyshire.

Devil's Island. A small island off the coast of French Guiana, formerly used as a convict settlement. Captain Alfred Dreyfus was confined there (see DREYFUSARD).

Devil's Lake. A lake in North Dakota, U.S.A.; also the name of a city on its shore.

Devil's Nostrils. Two vast caverns separated by a huge pillar of natural rock on the Mainland of Zetland.

Devil's Punch Bowl. A deep combe on the S.W. side of Hindhead Hills, in Surrey, scene of the murder of an unknown sailor in 1786. His assassins, Lonagan, Casey and Marshall, were hanged in chains on nearby Hindhead Common. A similar dell in Mangerton Mountain, near Killarney, has the same name.

Devil's Throat. Cromer Bay, so called from the danger to navigation.

Devil's Tower. A natural tower of volcanic rock some 600 ft. high on the Belle Fourche River, Wyoming, U.S.A.

DEVIL. IN PERSONAL NOMENCLATURE.

Devil Dick. A nickname of Richard Porson (1759-1808), Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge and an outstanding Greek scholar.

The Devil's Missionary. A nickname given to VOLTAIRE (1694-1778).

The French Devil. Jean Bart (1651-1702), French admiral and a native of Dunkirk. He was a terror to English shipping during the wars between William III and Louis XIV.

Robert the Devil. See under ROBERT.

Son of the Devil. Ezzelino da Romano (1194-1259), the noted GHIBELLINE leader and Governor of Vicenza; so called for his infamous cruelty.

White Devil. Vittoria Corombona, an Italian murderess whose story was dramatized (1608) by John Webster under this name. "White devils" was 16th- and 17th-century slang for prostitutes.

The White Devil of Wallachia. SCANDERBEG or George Castriota (1403-1468), the Albanian leader, was so called by the Turks.

DEVIL. IN MISCELLANEOUS TERMS AND NAMES.

Devil and bag o'nails. See BAG O'NAILS under PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGNS.

Devil on two sticks. See DIABOLO. It is also the English name of Le Sage's novel Le Diable Boiteux (1707) in which ASMODEUS features.

Devil's apple. The MANDRAKE; also the thorn apple.

Devil's bedpost. In card games, the four of clubs. Cp. DEVIL'S FOUR-POSTER, below.

Devil's Bible. See DEVIL'S BOOKS below.

Devil's bird. A Scots name for the yellow bunting; from its note, deil.

Devil's-bit. A species of scabious, Scabiosa succisa, the root of which ends abruptly and is supposed to have been bitten off by the devil to destroy its usefulness to mankind.

Devil's bones. Dice, which were made of bones and led to ruin.

Devil's books, or Devil's picture-book. Playing cards. A PRESBYTERIAN phrase, used in reproof of the name King's Books, applied to a pack of cards, from the Fr. livre des quatre rois (the book of the four kings). Also called the Devil's Bible.

Devil's candle. So the Arabs call the MANDRAKE, from its shining appearance at night.

Devil's candlestick. The common stinkhorn fungus, Phallus impudicus; also called the devil's horn and the devil's stinkpot.

Devil's coach-horse. The cock-tail beetle, Ocytus olens. Also called devil's cow.

Devil's coach-wheel. The corn crow-foot.

Devil's daughter. A shrew. Cp. DEVIL'S DAUGHTER'S PORTION in PHRASES above.

Devil's dozen. Thirteen; twelve and one for the Devil. Cp. BAKER'S DOZEN.

Devil's dung. An old pharmaceutical nickname for the asafœtida, an evil-smelling resinous gum.

Devil's dust. Flock and shoddy made from old rags torn up by a machine called a "devil".

Does it besem thee to weave cloth of devil's dust instead of true wool?

Carlyle: Miscellanies, IV. Dr. Francis (1843).

Devil's fingers. The starfish; also belemnites.

Devil's four-poster. A hand of cards containing four clubs. It is said that there never was a good hand at WHIST containing four clubs. Cp. DEVIL'S BEDPOST, above.

Devil's horn. See DEVIL'S CANDLESTICK, above.

Devil's livery. Black and yellow. Black for death, yellow for quarantine.

Devil's luck. Astounding good luck. Such lucky people were thought at one time to have compounded with the Devil.

Devil's Mass. Swearing at everybody and everything.

Devil's milk. The sun-spurge, from its poisonous milky juice.

Devil's Own, The. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Devil's Parliament. The parliament which met at Coventry in 1459 and passed Acts of Attainder against the YORKIST leaders.

Devil's Paternoster. See TO SAY THE DEVIL'S PATERNOSTER in PHRASES above.

Devil's shoestrings. Goats-rue, Tephrosia virginiana, from its tough thin roots.

Devil's snuff-box. A puff-ball of the genus Lycoperdon; a fungus full of dust.

Devil's stinkpot. See DEVIL'S CANDLESTICK above.

Devonshire. The name is derived from the early CELTIC inhabitants, the Defnas. According to legend it is from Debon, one of the heroes who came with BRUTUS from TROY, and who was allotted this part of ALBION, which was thus Debon's share.

In need of these great conquests by them gott, Corineus had that province utmost west . . .

And Debon's shayre was that is Devonshyre.

SPENSER: Faerie Queene, II, x, 12.

The Devonshire Poet. O. Jones, a journeyman wool-comber who lived at the close of the 18th century. Other Devonshire poets are John Gay (1685-1732) of Barnstaple and Edward Capern (1819-1894), the postman poet of Bideford. The bell which Capern carried on his rounds still hangs in a niche on his tombstone at Heanton Punchardon.

Dew-beater. One who is out early and treads through the dew.

Dew-beaters. The feet; shoes to resist the wet.

Hold put your dew-beaters till I take off the darbies.—SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. xxxvi.

Dew-cup, or dew-drink. An early morning allowance of beer formerly given to harvest-workers.

Dew Ponds. Artificial ponds or pools on the heights of the chalk downs of southern ENGLAND and elsewhere, which very rarely dry out even in the most severe drought. Formerly providing water for sheep, and known locally as "sheep ponds", their water supply depends upon rain and mist. Some date from the NEOLITHIC AGE. The pits were first lined with flints and stones, followed by a layer of straw, and finally a thick coating of puddled clay.

Only the dewpond on the height,
Unfed, that never fails.

RUDYARD KIPLING, Sussex.

Dexter. A Latin word meaning "to the right-hand side", hence dextrous originally meant "right-handed". In HERALDRY the term dexter is applied to that side of the shield to the right of the person holding it, hence it is the left side of the shield as seen by the viewer.

Diable, Le. Olivier Le Dain, the tool of Louis XI, and once the king's barber. Much feared and even more disliked, he was hanged in 1484, after the king's death.

Diabolo

Oliver le Dain, called sometimes Oliver le Mauvais, and sometimes Oliver le Diable, epithets derived from the unscrupulous cunning with which he assisted in the execution of the schemes of his master's tortuous policy.

SCOTT: Quentin Durward, ch. viii.

Diabolo. A modern name for an old toy formerly called the "devil on two sticks". The "devil" is a hollow turned piece of wood, roughly the shape of two cones joined at the points. The player places the "devil" on a cord, held loosely between two sticks, and it is then made to spin by manipulating the sticks.

Diadem (Gr. dia, round; deo, bind). In ancient times the headband or fillet worn by kings as a badge of royalty was so called; it was made of silk, linen, or wool, and was tied at the back with the ends falling on the neck. The diadem of BACCHUS was a broad band which might be unfolded to make a veil. The diadem eventually became a flexible band of gold and its development and decoration became largely inseparable from that of the CROWN.

All hail the power of Jesu's Name;
Let Angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem
To crown him Lord of all.

EDWARD FERRONET: Hymn.

Dial of Ahaz. The only time-measuring device mentioned in the BIBLE. It was probably a form of sun-clock and its introduction by Ahaz may have been due to his contacts with the Assyrians. It is referred to in II Kings xx, 9-11 and Is. xxxviii, 8.

And he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz.—II Kings xx, 11.

Dialectic, or Dialectics (Gr. dialektikos, belonging to discussion or disputation). Commonly used to mean abstract discussion, logic in general, or the investigation of truth by analysis, but the word has various technical implications in the language of philosophy. Under SOCRATES dialectic became a search for definition by the systematic use of question and answer, and for PLATO the method of the highest kind of speculation. For ARISTOTLE, a dialectic proof was a probable deduction as opposed to a scientific or demonstrative proof. From the time of the STOICS until the end of the mediæval period dialectic was synonymous with logic.

Hegel (1770-1831) gave dialectic a new meaning—the action and reaction between opposites (thesis and antithesis), out of which the new or higher synthesis emerges. See also MATERIALISM.

Dialectical Materialism. The philosophical basis of MARXISM as formulated by Karl Marx (1818-1883) and Friedrich Engels (1820-1895). It was based on the Hegelian DIALECTIC, but on a materialist basis where ideas and institutions are the reflections of material conditions—the reverse of the Hegelian approach. See HISTORICAL MATERIALISM under MATERIALISM.

Diamond (Gr. adamas, unconquerable.) A corruption of adamant. So called because the diamond, which cuts other substances, can only be cut or polished by one of its kind.

In Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bk. IV), Diamond is one of the three sons of AGAPE. He was slain by Cambell.

Diamond. In baseball the four-sided space enclosed within the four bases. In cards the suit marked with red diamond-shapes.

A diamond of the first water. A specially fine diamond, one of the greatest value for its size (the colour or lustre of a diamond is called its "water"). Thus we speak of a "genius of the first water" meaning a very great genius; "a rogue of the first water" meaning one who excels in roguery; "a blunder of the first water" meaning an outstanding blunder, etc.

A rough diamond. An uncultivated person but intrinsically of great merit; a person of excellent parts, but lacking social polish.

Black diamonds. See under BLACK.

Diamond cut diamond. Cunning outwitting cunning; a hard bargain overreached. A diamond is so hard that it can only be ground by diamond dust or by rubbing one against another.

Diamond Jim. Jim Brady, or more correctly James Buchanan Brady (1856-1917), American speculator and philanthropist, who started life as a bell-boy in a New York hotel. A well-known character in the night life of Broadway, he attracted attention and gained this nickname from the valuable and varied diamond ornaments with which he adorned his person.

Diamond Jousts, The. Jousts instituted by King ARTHUR "who by that name had named them, since a diamond was the prize". The story as embroidered by Tennyson in his Lancelot and Elaine (from Malory, Bk. XVIII) is that Arthur once picked nine diamonds from the crown of a slain KNIGHT and when he became king he offered them as a prize for nine successive annual jousts, all of which were won by Sir LANCELOT. The knight attempted to present them to Queen GUINEVERE but she flung them out of the casement into the river below, through jealousy of ELAINE.

Diamond Necklace, The Affair of the. A notorious scandal in French history (1784-1786) centring round Queen Marie Antoinette, Cardinal de Rohan, an ambitious profligate, and an adventuress, the Countess de Lamotte. Partly by means of the queen's signatures (almost certainly forged), Rohan was induced to purchase for the queen (for 1,600,000 livres) a diamond necklace, originally made for the Countess du Barry. He handed the necklace to Lamotte, who was to pass it to the queen, but it was never delivered. When the jewellers, Boehmer and Bassenge of Paris, claimed payment, the queen denied all knowledge of the matter. The arrest of Rohan and Lamotte followed. After a sensational trial, the Cardinal was acquitted and exiled to the abbey of la Chaise-Dieu, and the Countess was branded as a thief and consigned to the Salpêtrière, but subsequently escaped.

That extraordinary 'Procès du Collier Necklace Trial', spinning itself through Nine other ever-memorable Months, to the astonishment of the hundred and eighty-seven assembled parlementiers.
CARLYLE: The Diamond Necklace (1837).

Diamond Pitt. Thomas Pitt (1653-1726), East India merchant and owner of the famous PITT DIAMOND, and grandfather of the first Earl of Chatham.

Diamond Sculls, The. An annual race for amateur single scullers at the Henley Royal Regatta, first rowed in 1844. The prize is a pair of crossed silver sculls nearly a foot in length, surmounted by an imitation wreath of LAUREL, and having a pendant of diamonds. The trophy passes from winner to winner but each winner retains a silver cup.

Diana. An ancient Italian goddess identified with Artemis. Commonly regarded as a moon-goddess, on somewhat slender evidence, she was also the goddess of hunting and the woodlands. Associated with fertility, she was largely worshipped by women, and was invoked by the Romans under her three aspects. Cp. SELENE.

Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,
Now the sun is laid to sleep,
Seated in thy silver chair,
State in wonted manner keep.

BEN JONSON: Hymn to Diana.

Diana of Ephesus. This statue, we are told, fell from heaven. She is represented with many breasts and with trunk and legs enclosed in an ornamental sheath.

The temple of Diana of Ephesus was one of the Seven Wonders of the World (see under WONDER), with a roof supported by 127 columns. It was set on fire by Erastrotatus for the sake of perpetuating his name.

Diana's Worshippers. Midnight revelers. So called because they return home by moonlight, and so, figuratively, put themselves under the protection of DIANA.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians. A phrase sometimes used to signify that self-interest blinds the eyes, from the story of Demetrius, the Ephesian silversmith in Acts xix, 24-28, who made shrines for the temple of DIANA.

The Tree of Diana. See PHILOSOPHER'S TREE.

Diapason (di à pā' zon). A Greek word (short for dia pason chordon, through all the strings) which means an harmonious combination of notes, hence harmony itself. According to the Pythagorean system (see PYTHAGORAS) the world is a piece of harmony and man the full chord.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony
This universal frame began;
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man.

DRYDEN: Song for St. Cecilia's Day.

Diavolo, Fra. Michele Pozza (1771-1806), an Italian brigand and enemy of the French occupation, renowned for his atrocities. He features in Auber's light opera of this name.

Dibs. Money. Cp. TIP. The knuckle-bones of sheep used for gambling games were called dibs and stones used for the same purpose were called dibstones.

Dicers' oaths. False as dicers' oaths. Worthless or untrustworthy, as when a gambler swears never to touch dice again (see Hamlet, III, iv).

Dick, That happened in the reign of Queen Dick, i.e. NEVER; there never was a Queen Richard.

Dick Turpin. See TURPIN.

Dick Whittington. See WHITTINGTON.

King Dick. A scornful term for Richard Cromwell (1626-1712), who succeeded his father Oliver as Lord Protector in September 1658 and showed no capacity to govern. See also TUMBLEDOWN DICK.

Dick's hatband. A popular reference to Richard Cromwell's "crown" as in:

Dick's hatband was made of sand. His regal honours were a "rope of sand".

As queer as Dick's hatband. Few things have been more ridiculous than the exaltation and abdication of Oliver's son.

As tight as Dick's hatband. The crown was too tight for him to wear with safety.

Dirty Dick's. See under DIRT.

Dickens. To play the dickens. To play the devil. Dickens here is probably a EUPHEMISM for the DEVIL or OLD NICK, and is nothing to do with Charles Dickens.

What the dickens. What the devil. See TO PLAY THE DICKENS above.

I cannot tell what the dickens his name is.
SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, III, ii.

Dickey, or Dicky. In George III's time, a flannel petticoat.

A hundred instances I soon could pick ye—
Without a cap we view the fair,
The bosom heaving alto bare,
The hips ashamed, forsooth, to wear a dicky.
PETER PINDAR: Lord Auckland's Triumph.

It was afterwards applied to what were called false shirts—i.e. a starched shirt front worn over another; also to leather aprons and children's bibs. It was also applied to the driver's seat in a carriage and the servant's seat behind. In the earlier "two-seater" motor-cars the dicky was the additional seating at the rear, where the occupants were exposed to the weather in the space corresponding to the boot of later models.

Dicky. A donkey; especially in East Anglia, where it was anciently called Dickass or Dicky-ass. It is a term of endearment, as we call a little bird a dicky-bird. The ass is also called Dicky (little Richard), CUDDY, NEDDY, Jack-ass, MOKE or MIKE.

Dicky Sam. A native born inhabitant of Liverpool. Cp. TIM BOBBIN.

Dictys Cretensis (Dictys of Crete). A companion of Idomeneus at TROY and reputed author of an eyewitness account of the siege of Troy. The manuscript was probably written in the 2nd or 3rd century A.D. and translated into Latin in the 4th century. It is important as the chief source used by mediæval writers on the Trojan legend.

Didache (Gr. teaching). An early Christian treatise, also known as The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, probably belonging to the late 1st or early 2nd century. It was discovered in the Patriarchal Library at Constantinople in 1875 and falls into two parts. The first is concerned with moral teachings and is based on an earlier document, seemingly of Jewish origin, called The Two Ways, with additions from the Sermon on the Mount, etc. The second part is concerned with church ordinances.

Diderick. See DIETRICH.

Dido, also called Elissa, was the legendary daughter of Belus of Tyre and founder Queen of Carthage, after the murder of her husband Sichæus by PYGMALION.

According to VIRGIL's Æneid she fell in love with Æneas, who was driven by a storm to her shores, and committed herself to the flames through grief at his departure. Older legend says that she did it to avoid marriage with the king of Libya.

Porson (see DEVIL DICK) said he could rhyme on any subject; and being asked to rhyme upon the three Latin gerunds, which appeared in the old Eton Latin grammar as -di, -do, -dum, gave this couplet:

When Dido found Æneas would not come,
She mourned in silence and was Di-do-dum(b).

Cutting a dido, or dancing dido. The American equivalent of cutting a CAPER. The phrase appears as early as 1807 in the autobiographical work A Narrative of the Life and Travels of John Robert Shaw, the Well-Digger. Its origin is unknown but it has been fancifully suggested that Dido, Queen of Carthage, by a smart piece of work, managed to secure more land than she had agreed to buy, on which she built the city of Carthage.

Didymus (did' i mus). This Greek word for a twin was applied to St. THOMAS, as the name Thomas in Aramaic means a twin.

Die. The die is cast. The step is taken and there is no drawing back. So said Julius CÆSAR when he crossed the RUBICON—jacta alea est! Die here is ultimately from Lat. datum, given.

I have set my life upon a cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die.
SHAKESPEARE: Richard III, V, iv.

Die. Never say die. Never despair; never give up. Die here is "to cease to live".

To die in harness. To die working, while still in active employment or before retirement; like the draught horse which drops dead between the shafts of a cart, or the soldier who dies fighting in harness [armour].

Blow, wind! come, wrack!
At least we'll die with harness on our back.
SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, V, v.

To die in the last ditch. To fight to the death or last gasp.

"There is one certain means," replied the Prince William of Orange, "by which I can be sure never to see my country's ruin—I will die in the last ditch."—HUME: History of England.

Whom the gods love die young. This is from Menander—Hon hoi theoi philousim apothneskei neos. Demosthenes has a similar apophthegm. Plautus has the line, Quem di diligunt adolescens moritur (Bacch. IV, vii, 18).

Die-hards. In political phraseology those members of a party who refuse to abandon long-held theories and attitudes regardless of the changes that time and situation may bring. They would rather "DIE IN THE LAST DITCH" than give way.

Die-hards, The. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Dies (di' ēz). Dies Alliensis. See ALLIENSIS.

Dies Iræ (Lat. Day of Wrath). A famous mediæval hymn on the Last JUDGMENT, probably the composition of Thomas of Celano (in the Abruzzi), who died c. 1255. It is derived from the VULGATE version of Joel ii, 31, and is used by Roman Catholics in the MASS for the Dead and on ALL SOULS' DAY. Scott has introduced the opening into his Lay of the Last Minstrel (Canto vi, xxx).

Dies iræ, dies illa
Solvēt sæclum in favilla.

Dies nefastus (Lat. dies, day, nefas, that which is contrary to divine law, sinful), An unlucky or inauspicious day. For the Romans Dies nefasti were days on which no judgment could be pronounced nor any public business transacted. See ALLIENSIS.

Dies non (Lat. a "not" day). A non-business day, a contracted form of Dies non juridicus, a non-judicial day, when the courts do not sit and legal business is not transacted, as SUNDAYS; The PURIFICATION in HILARY TERM; the ASCENSION, in EASTER term; and ALL SAINTS' DAY, with ALL SOULS' in MICHAELMAS term.

Dietrich of Bern (dē' trik). The name given by the German MINNESINGERS to Theodoric the Great (c. 454-526), King of the Ostrogoths (Bern = Verona). He appears as a liegeman of King ETZEL in the NIBELUNGENLIED and other Middle High German poems.

Dieu (dyé). Dieu et mon droit (God and my right). The parole of Richard I at the battle of Gisors (1198), meaning that he was no vassal of France, but owed his royalty to God alone. The French were signally beaten, but the battle-word does not seem to have been adopted as the royal motto of ENGLAND till the time of Henry VI.

Difference. When Ophelia is distributing flowers (Hamlet, IV, v) and says: "You must wear your rue with a difference", she is using the word in the heraldic sense, probably implying that she and the queen were to rue; herself as the affianced of Hamlet, eldest son of the late king; the queen with a difference as the wife of Claudius, the late king's brother, and therefore the cadet branch.

In HERALDRY differences or marks of cadency indicate the various branches of a family. The eldest son, during the lifetime of his father, bears a label, i.e. a bar or fillet having three pendants often now shaped like a dovetail. The second son bears a crescent. The third, a mullet (i.e. a star with five points). The fourth, a martlet. The fifth, an annulet. The sixth, a fleur-de-lis. The seventh, a rose. The eighth, a cross-moline. The ninth, a double quatrefoil.

To difference is to make different by the superimposition of a further symbol.

Digest. A compendium, synopsis, or summary, especially the Digest of Roman Law, or PANDECTS, compiled by Tribonian and his sixteen assistants (530-533) by order of Justinian.

Digger. An Australian. The name was in use before 1850, consequent upon the discovery of GOLD, and was applied to ANZAC troops fighting in Flanders in World War I and again in World War II.

Diggers. A small group of extreme RADICALS and social revolutionaries under Winstanley who began to dig the common at St. George's Hill, Surrey in 1649. Their aim was to give back the land to the common people, but they were soon suppressed by the Cromwellian army leaders. Cp. LEVELLERS.

Diggings, or digs. Lodgings, rooms. A word imported from California and its gold diggings.

My friend here wants to take diggings; and as you were complaining that you would get someone to go halves with you, I thought I had better bring you together.

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE:
A Study in Scarlet, ch. 1.

Digits (Lat. digitus, a finger). The first nine numerals are so called from the habit of counting as far as ten on the fingers.

Dii Penates (di' i pe nā' tēz) (Lat.). Household gods; now colloquially used for specially prized household possessions. See LARES AND PENATES.

Dilemma. The horns of a dilemma. A difficult choice in which the alternatives appear equally distasteful or undesirable. "Lemma" means an assumption, a thing taken for granted (Gr. lambanein, to take). "Dilemma" is a double lemma, a two-edged sword, called by the SCHOOLMEN argumentum cornutum, or a bull which will toss you whichever horn you lay hold upon. Thus:

A young rhetorician said to an old sophist, "Teach me to plead, and I will pay you when I gain a cause." When his old tutor sued for payment, he argued, "If I gain the cause I shall not pay you, because the judge will say I am not to pay; and if

Diligence

I lose my cause I shall not be required to pay, according to the terms of our agreement." To this the master replied: "Not so; if you gain your cause you must pay me according to the terms of our agreement; and if you lose your cause the judge will condemn you to pay me."

Diligence. A four wheeled stage-coach common in France before the days of the railway. The word meant speed, dispatch, promptitude, as in Shakespeare's "If your diligence be not speedy I shall be there before you" (King Lear, I, v).

Dilly. A stage-coach, as in the Derby Dilly. The word is an abbreviation of diligence.

Dime (U.S.A.). A ten-cent piece. From French dîme (tithe).

Dime novel (U.S.A.). A cheap and lurid publication, formerly obtainable for a dime. Cp. PENNY-DREADFUL.

Dimensions. See FOURTH DIMENSION.

Dimissory. A letter dimissory is a letter from the bishop of one diocese to some other bishop, giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him (Lat. dimittere, to send away).

Dimity. Stout cotton cloth woven with raised patterns. It has been said to be so called from Damietta, in Egypt, but is really from Gr. dimitos, double-thread. Cp. SAMITE.

Dine. To dine with Democritus. To be cheated out of one's dinner. DEMOCRITUS was the derider, or philosopher who laughed at men's folly.

To dine with Duke Humphrey; to dine with Sir Thomas Gresham. To go dinnerless. See HUMPHREY.

To dine with Mohammed. To die, and dine in paradise.

To dine with the cross-legged knights. To have no dinner at all. The knights referred to are the stone effigies of the TEMPLE Church where lawyers once met their clients and where vagabonds loitered in the hope of being hired as witnesses. See CROSSLEGGED KNIGHTS. Cp. TO DINE WITH DUKE HUMPHREY.

Dingbats. An Australian colloquial term for delirium tremens.

Ding-dong. A ding-dong battle. A fight in good earnest. Ding-dong is an onomatopoeic word reproducing the sound of a bell; and here the idea is that the blows fall regularly and steadily, like the hammer-strokes of a bell.

Dinkum (Austr.). Genuine, sincere, honest. The word probably derives from English country dialect.

Dinkum oil (Austr.). Genuine information.

Hard dinkum meaning hard work was first used in Australia by Rolf Boldrewood in Robbery Under Arms (1881). In World War I the Australian troops were called Dinks or Dinkums. Cp. ANZAC.

Dinmont. See SHEEP.

Dinnyhayser (Austr.). A knock-out blow, as delivered by the fighter Dinny Hayes.

Dinos. See FAMOUS HORSES under HORSES.

Dint. By dint of war; by dint of argument; by dint of hard work. Dint means a blow or striking (O.E. dymt); whence perseverance, power exerted, force; it also means the indentation made by a blow, now dent.

Strong were our sires, and as they fought they writ,
Conquering with force of arms and dint of wit.

DRYDEN: To Mr. Congreve, On The Double Dealer.

Diogenes (dī oj' è nēz). Founder of the CYNIC sect at Athens (c. 400-c. 325 B.C.), who, according to Seneca, lived in a tub. ALEXANDER THE GREAT so admired him that he said, "If I were not Alexander I would wish to be Diogenes."

The whole world was not half so wide
To Alexander, when he cry'd
Because he had but one to subdue
As was a paltry narrow tub to Diogenes.

BUTLER: Hudibras, I, iii.

Diogenes Crab. A West Indian hermit crab which lives in another creature's shell as Diogenes in his tub.

Diogenes Cup. The cup-like hollow formed by the palm of the hand with closed fingers bent upward. An allusion to the philosopher's simple mode of life.

Diomedes (dī ò mē' dēz), or Diomed. In Greek legend, a hero of the siege of TROY, second only to ACHILLES in bravery. With ULYSSES he removed the PALLADIUM from Troy. He appears as the lover of CRESSIDA in Boccaccio's Filostrato and in later works.

Diomedean exchange. One in which all the benefit is on one side. The expression is founded on an incident related in the ILLIAD. GLAUCUS recognizes Diomed on the battlefield, and the friends change armour:

For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device,
For which nine oxen paid (a vulgar price),
He gave his own, of gold divinely wrought,
An hundred beeves the shining purchase bought.
POPE: Iliad, VI.

Dione (dī ò' nī). Daughter of OCEANUS and TETHYS and mother by JUPITER of VENUS. The name has been applied to Venus herself; Julius CÆSAR, who claimed descent from her, was sometimes called Dioneus Cæsar.

So young Dione, nursed beneath the waves,
And rocked by Nereids in their coral caves . . .
Lisped her sweet tones, and tried her tender smiles.

ERASMUS DARWIN: Economy of Vegetation, ii.

Dionysia. See BACCHANALIA.

Dionysus. (dī ō nī' sūs). The Greek name of BACCHUS.

Dioscuri. CASTOR AND POLLUX (Gr. Dios Kouroi, sons of ZEUS).

The horses of the Dioscuri. Cyllaros and Harpagus. See HORSE.

Dip, or angle of dip. The angle between a freely suspended needle and the horizontal. It is zero at the magnetic equator, where the needle rests horizontal, and 90 degrees at the magnetic poles. In geology it is the angle between the horizontal and the line of greatest slope of a stratum.

Dip. A candle made by dipping the cotton wick into melted tallow.

A farthing dip. A synonym for something almost valueless. Cp. NOT WORTH A RUSH under RUSH.

A lucky dip. A bran tub or other receptacle into which the hand is dipped to withdraw a prize or present at random.

The dip of the horizon is the apparent slope of the horizon as seen by an observer standing above sea-level. This slope is due to the convexity of the earth.

To dip snuff (U.S.A.). A once prevalent habit in the southern states of dipping a stick into snuff and smearing it on the teeth and gums.

To dip the flag is to lower it momentarily and then hoist it again as a form of salute.

To dip the headlights of a car is to lower them, usually when meeting oncoming traffic.

To go for a dip. To go bathing.

Diphthera (dif' thē rā) (Gr.). A piece of prepared hide or leather; specifically the skin of the goat AMALTHEA on which JOVE wrote the destiny of man.

Diphtheria. An infectious disease of the throat; is so called from its tendency to form a false membrane.

Diplomat. One provided with a diploma or letters authorizing him to represent his government abroad.

A diplomatic cold, illness, etc. When indisposition is pleaded as a tactful excuse for avoiding a meeting or engagement which might prove awkward or embarrassing.

Diplomatic. The scientific study of the official sources of history, namely charters, treaties, statutes, registers, etc., as opposed to literary and other sources.

The name comes from an extended use of the Latin word diploma for an historical document. As a modern study it was largely established by one of the BOLLANDISTS, Jean Mabillon, with his famous text-book De re diplomatica which appeared in 1681. His work was further advanced by Dom Toustain and Dom Tassin in their six-volume Nouveau Traité de Diplomatie (1750-1765).

Diplomatic Revolution. A phrase specifically applied to the reversal of alliances in 1756 under which Austria, France, Prussia and Great Britain had fought the War of the Austrian Succession, with the result that, in the ensuing SEVEN YEARS WAR, France and her former enemy Austria fought against Great Britain and her former enemy Prussia.

Dipper. An old name for the seven principal stars of the constellation URSA MAJOR (Great Bear); also known as the Plough or CHARLES'S WAIN. The name is derived from the supposed resemblance to the kitchen utensil of this name—a pan with a long handle.

Dircean Swan. Pindar (518-438 B.C.), so called from the fountain of Dirce near Thebes, the poet's birthplace. Dirce was changed into a fountain by the gods, out of pity for the sufferings inflicted upon her by the sons of Antiope, who were avenging torments she had imposed upon their mother.

Direct action. To seek to attain industrial or political ends by coercive action such as strikes, etc., as opposed to industrial or political negotiation and agitation.

Direct tax. Taxation such as income tax or land tax collected directly from the individual liable for such tax. Indirect taxes are those levied on marketable commodities, etc., which are thus paid by the citizen indirectly.

Directory, The. The French constitution of 1795 which vested the executive authority in five Directors. The "Five Majesties" were Barras, Reubell, Sieyès, Letourneur, and La Revellière. Sieyès retired at the outset and was replaced by Carnot. Its rule was ended by NAPOLEON'S coup d'état of 18 BRUMAIRE (9 November) 1799 and the Consulate was established in its place.

Dirleton. Doubting with Dirleton, and resolving those doubts with Stewart. Doubting and answering those doubts, but doubting still. It is a Scottish phrase and the allusion is to the Doubts and Questions in Law (1698), by Sir John Nisbet of Dirleton, the Lord President, and Sir James Stewart's Dirleton's Doubts and Questions . . . Resolved and Answered (1715). Of the former work Lord Chancellor Hardwicke remarked, "His Doubts are better than most people's certainties."

Dirt. (M.E. drit probably from Icel. drit, excrement). It has been extended to include filth generally, soil, dust, etc., and obscenity of any kind, especially language.

Pay dirt. Soil containing gold or diamonds, whichever is being sought.

Dirt cheap. Very low-priced, as cheap as dirt.

Throw plenty of dirt and some will be sure to stick. Scandal always leaves a trail behind; some of it will be believed. In Lat., Fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhærebit.

To eat dirt. To put up with insults and mortification.

Dirt-track racing. Motor-cycle racing on a track of cinders or similar material; introduced into England from Australia in 1928.

Dirty Dick's. A tavern in Bishopsgate, London, the interior of which is festooned with cobwebs and grimed with dirt. The name was taken from the once famous Dirty Warehouse in Leadenhall Street, owned by Nathaniel Bentley (c. 1735-1809). Brought up in easy circumstances and a frequent visitor to Paris, he was known as the Beau of Leadenhall Street, but suddenly his mode of life altered completely to one of miserly squalor and he came to be called "Dirty Dick". His hardware store became famous for its dirt and decay which increased with the years and after his death some of its contents were bought by the tavern keeper to attract custom. Bentley's change from a man of fashion to excessive slovenliness was reputedly the consequence of a broken engagement.

Dirty Half-Hundred, The. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Dirty money. Money acquired by dishonest or disreputable means.

Dirty Shirts, The. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Dirty Warehouse. See DIRTY DICK'S.

Dirty word. An obscene word; also currently used of something which has become socially or politically unpopular or suspect, often through unmerited criticism and denigration or from being out of line with current trends.

Disastrous Peace, The (La Paix Malheureuse). The Treaty of Cateau-Cambresis (1559), essentially between France and Spain. It recognized Spanish supremacy in Italy and involved renunciation of the VALOIS claims there.

Disc. Disc Jockey. The established name for those who present broadcast programmes of gramophone records or discs, interspersed with commentary. Christopher Stone (1882-1965) was the pioneer of such performances in England.

Discalced. See BAREFOOTED.

Discharge Bible, The. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Disciples of Christ. See CAMPBELLITES.

Discipline, A. A scourge used for penitential purposes.

Before the cross and altar, . . . a lamp was still burning, . . . and on the floor lay a discipline, or penitential scourge of small cord and wire, the lashes of which were stained with recent blood.
SCOTT: The Talisman, ch. iv.

This is a transferred sense of one of the ecclesiastical uses of the word—the mortification of the flesh by penance.

Discipline, Books of. The books which formed the basis of the constitution and procedure of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND after the REFORMATION. The first was drawn up under John Knox in 1566, and the second, which amplified the first, between 1575 and 1578.

Discord. Literally, severance of hearts (Lat. discorda). It is the opposite of concord, the coming together of hearts. In music it means disagreement of sounds, as when a note is followed by, or played with another which is disagreeable to a musical ear.

Apple of Discord. See APPLE.

Discount. At a discount. Not in demand; little valued; less esteemed than formerly; below PAR (Med. Lat. dis-computare, to deduct, to discount).

Dished. I was dished out of it. Cheated out of it; or rather, someone else contrived to obtain it. When one is dished or dished up he is completely done for, and the allusion is to food which, when it is quite done, is dished. Thus Disraeli "dished the Whigs" with his Reform Bill of 1867.

Where's Brummel? Dished!
BYRON: Don Juan.

Disjecta membra (dis yek' tá mem' brá) (Lat.). Scattered limbs, remains, fragments. The phrase occurs in Ovid (Met., III, 724) and HORACE has "Etiam disjecti membra poetæ" (Sat., I, iv, 62).

Dismal Science. See SCIENCE.

Dismas, St. See DYSMAS.

Dispensation (Lat. dispensatio, from dis- and pendere, to dispense, distribute, arrange). The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between himself and man. The dispensation of ADAM was between Adam and God; the dispensation of ABRAHAM, and that of MOSES, were those imparted to these holy men; the GOSPEL dispensation is that explained in the Gospels.

A Papal dispensation. Permission from the POPE to dispense with something enjoined; a licence to do what is forbidden, or to omit what is commanded by the law of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

A Papal dispensation enabled Catherine to wed the brother of her late husband, the young sovereign himself.

J. R. GREEN: History of the English People, ch. vi.

Displaced Persons. A phrase applied to the millions of homeless and uprooted people in Europe, India and Asia whose misfortunes were due to the havoc produced by World War II and subsequent events.

Dissenters. In England another name for the NONCONFORMISTS and commonly used from the RESTORATION until the 19th century, when it gradually fell into disuse.

Distaff. The staff from which the flax was drawn in spinning; hence, figuratively, woman's work, and a woman herself, in allusion to what was women's common daily task. Cp. SPINSTER.

I blush that we should owe our lives to such A king of distaffs!

BYRON: Sardanapalus, II, i.

St. Distaff's Day. 7 JANUARY. So called because the CHRISTMAS festival terminated on Twelfth Day, and on the day following the women returned to their distaffs or daily occupations. Cp. PLOUGH MONDAY.

Give St. Distaff all the right,
Then give Christmas sport good night,
And next morrow every one
To his own vocation.—(1657.)

It is also called ROCK DAY, "rock" being an old name for the distaff.

What! shall a woman with a rock drive thee away?
Fye on thee, traitor!

Digby Mysteries.

The distaff side. The female side of a family; a branch descended from the female side. See also SPINDLE-SIDE.

To have tow on the distaff. To have work, or serious business on hand.

He hadde more tow on his distaff
Than Gerveys knew.

CHAUCER: Miller's Tale, 558.

Distrain. To seize goods for non-payment, to coerce by exacting fines, etc. (Lat. distringere, to pull asunder, to draw tight.)

Distraint of Knighthood. The compelling of persons with lands of certain value and tenants of knights fees to become knights and assume the obligations and liabilities of such rank (relief, wardship, SCUTAGE, etc.). It was introduced in the reign of Henry III (1216-1272). The fines levied by Charles I on those who neglected this obligation angered many of the gentry. It was abolished by the LONG PARLIAMENT in 1641.

Dithyramb (dith i rām') (Gr. dithyrambos, a choric hymn). Dithyrambic poetry was originally a wild impetuous kind of Dorian lyric in honour of BACCHUS, traditionally ascribed to the invention of ARION of Lesbos who gave it a more definite form (c. 600 B.C.) and who has hence been called the father of dithyrambic poetry.

Dittany (dit' à ni). This plant (Origanum dictamnus), so named from Dicte in Crete, where it grew in profusion, was anciently credited with many medicinal virtues, especially in enabling arrows to be drawn from wounds and curing such wounds. In Tasso's JERUSALEM DELIVERED (Bk. IX) Godfrey is healed in this way.

Stags and hinds, when deeply wounded with darts, arrows, and bolts, if they do but meet the herb called dittany, which is common in Candia, and eat a little of it, presently the shafts come out, and all is well again; even as kind Venus cured her beloved by-blow Æneas.

RABELAIS (URQUHART and MOTTEUX), Bk. IV, ch. lxii.

Ditto (dit' ò) (Ital. detto, said; from Lat. dictum). That which has been said before; the same or a similar thing. In writing the word is often contracted to do.

Dittoes, or a suit of dittoes. Coat, waistcoat, and trousers to match, all alike.

To say ditto. To endorse or agree with somebody else's expressed opinion.

Divan. (Turk. and Pers.). A counting-house, a tribunal; hence the account book or register; the office or room where they are kept; a collection of poems; a long seat or bench covered with cushions; a court of justice and a custom-house (whence, Fr. douane). The order of derivation is not certain but the word in its ramifications and extensions is rather like our BOARD. In England its chief meanings are a sofa, a bed with headboard or footboard, and formerly a coffee-house used for smoking.

Divan of the Sublime Porte. The former council of the Turkish Empire presided over by the Grand VIZIER.

Dives (di' vèz). The name popularly given to the rich man (Lat. dives) in the parable of the Rich Man and LAZARUS (Luke xvi, 19).

Lazar and Dives liveden diversely
And diverse gerdoun haddon they ther-by.
CHAUCER: Somnour's Tale, 169.

Divide

Divide. When the members in the British HOUSE OF COMMONS interrupt a speaker by crying out Divide, they mean, bring the debate to an end and put the motion to the vote—i.e. let the ayes divide from the noes, one group going into one LOBBY, and the others into another.

Divide and rule, or govern (Lat. divide et impera). Divide a nation into parties or set people at loggerheads and you can have your own way or exercise control.

Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand.—Matt. xii, 25.

Divination. There are numerous forms of divination. The following appear in the Bible:

ASTROLOGY (Judicial) (Dan. ii, 2).
CASTING LOTS (See LOTS) (Josh. xviii, 6).
HEPATOSCOPY (Ezek. xxi, 21–26).
Oneiromancy (Gen. xxxvii, 10).
NECROMANCY (I Sam. xxviii, 12–20).
RHABDOMANCY (Hos. iv, 12).
TERAPHIM (Gen. xxxi, Zech. x, 2).
WITCHCRAFT (I Sam. xxviii).

There are numerous other references including divination by fire, air, and water; thunder, lightning, meteors, etc. Consult: Gen. xxxvii, 5–11; xl, xli; I Sam. xxviii; II Chron. xxxiii, 6; Prov. xvi, 33; Ezek. xxi; Hos. iii, 4, etc. See also AUGURY, AXINOMANCY, BELOMANCY, BOTANOMANCY, CRYSTALLOMANCY, EMPYROMANCY, URIM AND THUMMIM, XYLOMANCY.

Divine, The. Theophrastus (c. 372–c. 287 B.C.), the philosopher pupil of PLATO and whose name means the Divine Speaker, is said to have changed his name from Tyrtamus when this epithet was bestowed upon him by ARISTOTLE.

Hypatia (c. 370–415), daughter of Theon, who presided over the Neoplatonic School at Alexandria, was known as the Divine Pagan.

Jean de Ruysbroek (1293–1381), the ECSTATIC DOCTOR, was also called the Divine Doctor.

Michelangelo (1475–1564) was called the Divine Madman.

Ariosto (1474–1533), Italian poet; Raphael (1483–1520), the painter; Luis de Morales (c. 1509–1586), Spanish religious painter; and Fernando de Herrera (1534–1597), Spanish lyric poet, were all known as the Divine. See also ST. JOHN THE DIVINE under JOHN.

The Divine Plant. Vervain. See HERBA SACRA.

The Divine Right of Kings. A theory, of mediæval origin, that kings reign by divine ordination was first formulated in a rudimentary way during the struggle between the Papacy and the Empire. It was developed more fully to strengthen the European monarchies when they were later threatened by the activities of PROTESTANT and CATHOLIC extremists and others. Monarchy based on primogeniture was held to be divinely anointed and therefore unquestioning obedience could be demanded from subjects. Monarchs were responsible to God alone and their model was the patriarchal rule portrayed in the Old Testament. The theory was expounded fully by James I in his True Law of Free Monarchies (1598) and in Sir Robert Filmer's Patriarcha (1642—published 1680). Divine Right was destroyed in Great Britain by the GLORIOUS REVOLUTION of 1688.

The Right Divine of Kings to govern wrong.
POPE: Dunciad, IV, 188.

Divining Rod, or virgula divina, also called AARON'S ROD or the Wand of Mercury. It is usually a forked branch of hazel or willow which when manipulated by the diviner or dowsler inclines towards the place where a concealed spring or a metallic lode is to be found. The Romans used the virgula divina in AUGURY and the forked twig, or virgula furcata, was introduced into the Cornish mines from Germany in the reign of Elizabeth I. With the decline of mining in the West Country dowsing is now confined to water-finding.

"Pray, Mr. Dousterswivel . . . will you assist us with your triangular vial of May-dew, or with your divining-rod of witch's hazel?"
SCOTT: The Antiquary, ch. xxiii.

Division. The sign ÷ for division was introduced by John Pell (1611–1685), the noted Cambridge mathematician who became Professor of Mathematics at Amsterdam in 1643.

Division of labour. The division of an employment or manufacture into particular parts so that each individual is concerned with one part or process of the whole. Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations (1776) argued strongly in its favour.

Divisions. In the Royal Navy the formal morning parade of officers and ship's company is so called, the custom being introduced by Kempenfelt in 1780. The name derives from the fact that the ship's complement is customarily divided or organized into parts of ship or divisions, usually Quarterdeck, Maintop, Foretop, and Forecastle. Divisions are subdivided into watches. See WATCH.

Divisionist technique. See POINTIL-LISME.

Divorcement. A Bill of Divorcement is a phrase from former days of divorce procedure. Before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, "divorce", or in effect judicial separation, could be granted only by the ecclesiastical courts, but remarriage was prohibited except when a special bill was promoted and passed in PARLIAMENT for either of the parties. Few could afford such an expensive process. See A VINCULO MATRIMONII.

Divus (dī' vūs) (Lat. a god; godlike). After the Augustan period this was conferred as an epithet on deceased Roman Emperors proclaiming them "of blessed memory" rather than enrolling them among the gods.

Dix. American slang for a ten-dollar bill, apparently derived from the fact that a bank in New Orleans used to issue ten-dollar bills with the French word dix (ten) printed on the back.

Dixie, or Dixieland is a popular name for the southern states of the U.S.A., south of the MASON-DIXON LINE and may well have originated from DIX. Dixieland also denotes the type of JAZZ played in New Orleans about 1910.

Dixiecrat, or Dixiegop. In the U.S.A. those BOURBON members of the Democratic Party in the southern states who stand for the retention of white supremacy over the Negroes.

Dixie, the oval-shaped army cooking kettle is from the Hindi degshi, a pot or vessel. Its naval counterpart is called a FANNY.

Dizzy. A nickname of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield (1804-1881), Queen Victoria's favourite Prime Minister.

Djinn. See JINN.

Djinnestan. The realms of the jinns or genii of Oriental mythology.

Do. See DITTO, DOH.

Do. A verb and auxiliary, that forms part of countless phrases and has equally numerous uses. Some chief modern significations are:

1. Transitive: To put, as in To do to death; to bestow, cause to render, give, etc., as, It did him no harm, To do a good turn; to perform, perpetrate, effect, etc., as To do one's work, Thou shalt do no murder, All is done and finished.

2. Intransitive: To exert actively, act, make an end, fare, suffice, etc., as Let us do or die, I have done with you, How do you do? I'm doing very well, That will do.

3. Causal and Auxiliary: Used instead of a preceding verb, as He plays as well as you do. Periphrastically as an auxiliary of the Present and Past Indicative and the Imperative, used for the sake of emphasis, euphony, or clarity, also in negative and interrogative sentences: I do wish you would let me alone, Not a word did he say, Billiards and drinking do make the money fly, Do you like jazz? I do not care for it, Do tell me where you have been! Don't stop!

A do. A regular swindle, a fraud; a party.
Do as you would be done by. Behave to others as you would have them behave to you.

Do-it-yourself. A post-World War II phrase applied primarily to the efforts of the amateur house-repairer, improver, and decorator, etc., but also more widely applied to many forms of self-help. A "do-it-yourself" shop is one which caters for the growing needs of the amateur decorator, furniture repairer, etc.

To do away with. To abolish, put an end to, destroy entirely.

To do for. To act for or manage for. A man ought to do well for his children; a landlady does for her lodgers. Also to ruin, destroy, wear out. I'll do for him, I'll ruin him utterly, or even, I'll kill him; taken in and done for, cheated and fleeced; this watch is about done for, it's nearly worn out.

To do it on one's head. Said of doing something with consummate ease; "I bet you couldn't walk a mile in seven minutes"; "Nonsense! I could do it on my head."

To do on. See DON.

To do one, to do one down, or brown, to do one out of something. To cheat or trick one out of something; to get the better of one.

To do one proud. To make much of one; to treat one in an exceptionally lavish and hospitable way.

To do oneself proud, or well. To give oneself a treat.

To do the grand, amiable, etc. To act (usually with some ostentation) in the matter indicated by the adjective.

To do to death. To murder savagely, or to overcook excessively; to wear out or render stale by frequent repetition.

To do up. To repair, put in order, renovate. This room wants doing up, i.e. needs redecorating. Also to fasten a shoe-lace, a parcel, a button, etc., and to wear out or tire. He has quite done himself up, he is thoroughly worn out or exhausted.

To do up brown (U.S.A.). To do thoroughly in a good or bad sense—as beating someone up badly.

To do without so-and-so. To deny oneself something, to manage without it.
To have to do with. To have dealings with, to have relation to. "That has nothing to do with the case."

Well-to-do. In good circumstances, well off.

Dobbin. A steady old horse, a child's horse.

Dobby, a silly old man, also a GOBLIN or house-elf. Like DOBBIN, it is an adaptation of Robin, diminutive of Robert.

The Dobby's walk was within the inhibited domains of the Hall.

SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. x.

Docetes. An early Gnostic sect, which maintained that Jesus Christ was divine only, and that his visible form, the crucifixion, resurrection, etc., were merely illusions. Christ had no real body on earth, but only a phantom body. The word is Greek and means phantoms.

Doch-an-doris (Gael. deoch, drink, an, the, dorris, of the door). A Scottish term for a STIRRUP CUP or a final drink before departing, made familiar in England by one of Sir Harry Lauder's songs. Variants are doch-an-doroch, deuch-an-doris, etc.

After the lord keeper, the Master, and the domestics, had drunk doch-an-doroch, or the stirrup-cup . . . the cavalcade resumed its progress.

SCOTT: Bride of Lammermoor, ch. xviii.

Dock Brief. When a prisoner in the dock pleads inability to employ counsel, the presiding judge can instruct a BARRISTER present in court to undertake the defence, a fee for this being paid by the court.

Dock defence. The instruction of counsel by a prisoner in the dock without the aid of a solicitor.

Dockers' K.C. A nickname gained by Ernest Bevin (1881-1951) for his successful championing of the dockers' case before the Commission of Inquiry of 1920. Many of his union's demands were met.

Doctor. A name given to various adulterated or falsified articles because they are "doctored" i.e. treated in some way that strengthens them or otherwise makes them appear better than they actually are. Thus a mixture of milk, water, nutmeg, and rum is called Doctor; the two former ingredients being "doctored" by the two latter. Brown sherry is also called Doctor because it is concocted from thin wine with the addition of unfermented juice and some spirituous liquor.

In nautical parlance, the ship's cook is known as "the doctor" because he is supposed to doctor the food; and a seventh son used to be so dubbed from the popular belief that he was endowed with power to cure agues, the KING'S EVIL and other diseases.

Doctored dice, or Doctors. Loaded dice; dice which are so "doctored" as to make them turn up winning numbers.

"The whole antechamber is full, my lord—knights and squires, doctors and dicers."

"The dicers, with their doctors in their pockets, I presume!"

SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. xxviii.

The three best doctors are Dr. Quiet, Dr. Diet, and Dr. Merryman.

Si tibi deficiant medici, medici tibi fiant

Hæc tria: Mens-læta, Requies, Moderata-Dieta.

To doctor the accounts. To falsify them, to COOK them; the allusion is to drugging wine, beer, etc., and adulteration generally.

To doctor the wine. To drug it, or strengthen it with brandy; to make wine stronger, and "sick" wine more palatable. The fermentation of cheap wines is increased by fermentable sugar. As such wines fail in aroma, connoisseurs smell at their wine.

To have a cat doctored. To have a young TOM-cat "cut", or castrated.

To put the doctor on a man. To cheat him. The allusion is to DOCTORED DICE.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree? When authorities differ, the question SUB JUDICE must be left undecided. (POPE: Moral Essays, Ep. iii, line 1.)

Doctors of the Church. Certain early Christian Fathers, and other saints whose doctrinal writings gained special acceptance and authority.

(a) Eastern Church. St. Athanasius, who defended the divinity of Christ against the ARIANS; St. Basil the Great; St. Gregory of Nazianzus; ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

(b) Western Church. St. Alphonsus Liguore; St. AMBROSE; St. Anselm of Canterbury; St. Augustine of Hippo; St. BERNARD of CLAIRVAUX; St. Bonaventura; St. Gregory the Great; St. Hilary; St. JEROME; St. Thomas Aquinas.

Doctors of Learning, Piety, etc.

SINGULAR DOCTOR: William of Occam (c. 1280-1349).

SUBTLE DOCTOR: Duns Scotus (c. 1265-1308).

UNIVERSAL DOCTOR: Albert of Cologne or Albertus Magnus (c. 1206-1280); Alain de Lille (c. 1128-1202).

Wonderful Doctor: Roger Bacon (c. 1214-1294).

Dr. Brighton. See BRIGHTON.

Dr. Dee. See DEE.

Dr. Faustus. See FAUST.

Dr. Fell. See FELL.

Dr. Sangrado. See SANGRADO.

Dr. Slop. See SLOP.

Dr. Syntax. See SYNTAX.

Doctors' Commons. The association and buildings established on St. Bennet's Hill, St. Paul's Churchyard, for practitioners of canon and civil law, under the presidency of the DEAN OF ARCHES. This self-governing body was established in the 16th century and dissolved after the passing of the Court of Probate Act and the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857. The buildings were demolished in 1867. The name arises from the fact that the doctors had to dine there four days in each term. See TO COME INTO COMMONS under COMMONS.

Documentary film. A film devised and produced for the sole purpose of giving a realistic and accurate picture of some aspect of everyday life or work.

Doddypoll. A blockhead, a silly ass. Poll is head and doddy is the modern dotty, silly, from the verb to dote, to be foolish or silly. There is a comedy called The Wisdom of Doctor Doddypoll (c. 1595), attributed by some to George Peele.

As wise as Dr. Doddypoll. Not wise at all; a DUNCE.

Dodger. The Artful Dodger. The sobriquet of John Dawkins, a young thief in Dickens's Oliver Twist.

Dodman. A snail; a word still used in Norfolk. Fairfax, in his Bulk and Selvedge (1674), speaks of "a snayl or dodman". The eastern point of Vryan Bay, CORNWALL, is called the Dodman. See DUDMAN.

Doddiman, doddiman, put our your horn,
Here comes a thief to steal your corn.

Norfolk rhyme.

Hodmandod, a variant of DODMAN.

Dodo. Didus ineptus, a large bird about the size of a turkey last known to exist in Mauritius in the 1680s.

As dead as a dodo. Long since dead and forgotten and finished with; very much a thing of the past, completely extinct.

Dodona (do dō' ná). The site of a most ancient ORACLE of Epirus dedicated to ZEUS. The oracles were delivered from the tops of oak-trees, the rustling of the leaves being interpreted by the priests. The cooing of the sacred pigeons, and the clanging of brass plates suspended in the trees when the wind blew, gave further signs to the priests and priestesses. The Greek phrase kalkos Dodones (brass of Dodona), meaning a babbler, probably stems from this.

The black pigeons of Dodona. Two black pigeons, we are told, took their flight from Thebes, in Egypt; one flew to Libya, and the other to Dodona. On the spot where the former alighted, the temple of Jupiter AMMON was erected; in the place where the other settled the ORACLE of JUPITER was established, and there responses were made by the black pigeons that inhabited the surrounding groves. The fable is possibly based on a pun upon the word peleiai which usually meant "old women", but in the dialect of the Epirots signified pigeons or doves.

Doc. John Doe and Richard Roe. Any plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. They were sham names formerly used to save certain "niceties of law". This legal fiction was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. The names "John o'Noakes" and "Tom Styles" were similarly used.

Doeg (dō' eg). In Dryden and Tate's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, Pt. II, is meant for Elkanah Settle, a poet who wrote satires upon Dryden, but was no match for him.

Doff is do-off, as "Doff your hat". So DON is do-on, as "Don your clothes". Cp. DUP, DOUT.

Dog. "Dog" entries are arranged as follows:

1. Dogs in Phrases and Colloquialisms.
2. Dogs of note in the Classics and in Legend.
3. Dogs of noted people and in Literature, etc.
4. Dogs in Symbolism and Metaphor.
5. Combinations of Dog or Dog's.

(I) IN PHRASES AND COLLOQUIALISMS.

A black dog has walked over him. Said of a sullen person. HORACE tells us that the sight of a black dog with its pups was an unlucky omen, and the DEVIL has been frequently symbolized by a black dog.

A dead dog. Something utterly worthless.

After whom is the king of Israel come out? . . . after a dead dog, after a flea (I Sam. xxiv, 14).

Cp. IS THY SERVANT A DOG, etc., below.

A dirty dog. One morally filthy, a CAD, a rotter, etc. In the East the dog is still the scavenger of the streets. "Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the city shall the dogs eat" (I Kings xiv, 11).

A dog in a doublet. A bold resolute fellow. In Germany and Flanders, the strong dogs used in hunting the wild boar wore a kind of buff doublet round their bodies. A dog in one's doublet. A false friend.

A dog in the manger. A mean-spirited individual who will not use what is wanted by another, nor yet let the other have it to use; one who prevents another enjoying something without any benefit to himself. The allusion is to the fable of the dog that fixed his place in a manger and would not allow the ox to come near the hay but would not eat it himself.

A dog's age. A long time.

A dog's chance. Virtually no chance at all.

A gay dog. Said of one who gets around and enjoys himself, especially with the ladies.

A living dog is better than a dead lion (Eccles. ix, 4). The meanest thing with life in it is better than the noblest without. The Italians say, "A live ass is worth more than a dead doctor."

A surly dog. A surly tempered fellow. Dog is often used for "chap" or "fellow" as in a dull dog, A GAY DOG, etc.

A well-bred dog hunts by nature. Breeding "tells". The French proverb is "Bon chien chasse de race."

Barking dogs seldom bite. See under BARK.

Brag's a good dog, etc. See under BRAG.

Dog eat dog. The equivalent of, "No quarter given."

Dog don't eat dog. The equivalent of, "There's honour among thieves."

Dogs howl at death. A widespread superstition.

In the rabbinical book, it saith
The dogs howl, when, with icy breath
Great Sammael, the Angel of Death,
Takes through the town his flight!

LONGFELLOW: Golden Legend, III, vii.

Every dog has his day. You may crow over me today, but my turn will come by and by. In Latin, Hodie mihi, cras tibi, "Today to me, tomorrow to thee." Nunc mihi, nunc tibi, benigna fortuna,

FORTUNE visits every man once; she favours me now, but she will favour you in your turn.

Thus every dog at last will have his day—
He who this morning smiled, at night may sorrow;
The grub today's a butterfly tomorrow.

PETER PINDAR: Odes of Condolence.

Give a dog a bad name and hang him. If you besmirch a person's reputation he will be as good as condemned. Give a person a bad reputation and he might as well be hanged as try to recover his good name. Cp. THROW PLENTY OF DIRT, etc., under DIRT.

He who has a mind to beat his dog will easily find a stick. If you want to abuse a person, you will easily find something to blame. Dean Swift says, "If you want to throw a stone, every lane will furnish one."

Hungry dogs will eat dirty pudding. Those really hungry are not particular about what they eat, and are by no means dainty. "To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet" (Heywood, Prov. xxvii, 7).

I am his Highness' dog at Kew; Pray tell me sir, whose dog are you? Frederick, Prince of Wales, had a dog given him by Alexander Pope, and these words are said to have been engraved on his collar. They are sometimes quoted with reference to an overbearing, bump-tious person.

I don't keep dogs and bark myself. I don't keep servants to do their work for them, or to do the work myself.

In the doghouse. To be in the doghouse is to be in disgrace, as a dog confined to his kennel. Usually applied to a husband who has been misbehaving or has thoroughly displeased his wife, and is consequently treated with marked disfavour. In J. M. Barrie's PETER PAN, Mr. Darling lived in the dog kennel until his children returned, as a penance for his treatment of NANA.

Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing? Said in contempt when asked to do something derogatory or beneath one. The phrase (slightly modified) is from II Kings viii, 13.

When Landseer, the celebrated painter of dogs and animals, asked Lockhart if he would like to sit for his portrait, Lockhart's answer was: "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" The phrase was adopted and much used by Sydney Smith.

It was the story of the dog and the shadow. A case of one who gives up the substance for its shadow. The allusion is to the fable of the dog who dropped his bone into the stream because he opened his mouth to seize the reflection of it.

Lazy as Lawrence's, or Ludlam's dog.
See LAZY.

Let sleeping dogs lie; don't wake a sleeping dog. Let well alone. Don't stir up trouble by seeking to make changes. If your course of action is likely to cause trouble, let things be.

It is nought good a sleping hound to wake,
Nor yeve a wight a cause to devyne.

CHAUCER: Troilus and Criseyde, iii, 764.

Love me love my dog. If you love me you must love my accompaniments; you must put up with my defects.

Not to have a word to throw at a dog.
Said of one who is sullen or sulky.

Cel: Why, cousin; why, Rosalind;—Cupid have mercy!—Not a word?

Ros: Not one to throw at a dog.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, I, iii.

St. Roch and his dog. Emblematic of inseparable companions. See ROCH, ST.

Sick as a dog. Very sick. We also say, "Sick as a cat." (See CAT.) The Bible speaks of dogs returning to their vomit (Prov. xxvi, 11; II Pet. ii, 22).

The dogs of war. The horrors of war, especially fire, sword and famine.

Cry Havoc and let slip the dogs of war.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Caesar, III, i.

The hair of the dog that bit you. See under HAIR.

The more I see of men the more I love dogs. A misanthropic saying of obvious meaning, probably of French origin. Plus je vois les hommes, plus j'admire les chiens.

There are more ways of killing a dog than by hanging. There is more than one way of achieving your object. The proverb is found in Ray's Collection (1742).

Throw it to the dogs. Throw it away, it is useless and worthless.

Throw physic to the dogs, I'll none of it.

SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, V, iii.

To blush like a dog, or like a blue, or black dog. Not to blush at all.

To call off the dogs. To desist from some pursuit or inquiry; to break up a disagreeable conversation. In the chase the huntsman calls off the dogs if they are on the wrong track.

To die like a dog. To have a shameful or miserable end.

To go to the dogs. To go to ruin, morally or materially.

To help a lame dog over a stile. To give assistance to one in distress; to hold out a helping hand; to encourage.

Do the work that's nearest,
Though it's dull at whiles,
Helping, when we meet them,
Lame dogs over stiles.

CHARLES KINGSLEY: The Invitation.

To lead a cat and dog life. See under CAT.

To lead a dog's life. To be harried from PILLAR to post, to be nagged constantly, never to be left in peace.

To put on the dog. To behave in a conceited or bumptious manner.

To rain cats and dogs. To rain very heavily. See under RAIN.

To wake a sleeping dog. To take action which stirs up or leads to trouble. See LET SLEEPING DOGS LIE, above.

Try it on the dog! A jocular phrase used of medicine that is expected to be unpalatable or of food that is suspect or dubious.

You can never scare a dog away from a greasy hide. It is difficult to free oneself from bad habits. The line is from HORACE's Satires (II, v, 83): Canis a corio nunquam absterrebitur uncto.

You cannot teach old dogs new tricks. Elderly people are not adaptable. They do not readily take to new ways.

(2) DOGS OF NOTE IN THE CLASSICS AND IN LEGEND.

Aubry's Dog, or the Dog of Montargis. Aubry of Montdidier was murdered in 1371 in the forest of Bondy. His dog Dragon excited suspicion of Richard of Macaire by always snarling and flying at his throat whenever he appeared. Richard, condemned to a judicial combat with the dog, was killed, and, in his dying moments, confessed the crime.

Cuchulain's Hound. Luath.

Fingal's Dog. BRAN.

Geryon's Dogs. Gargittios and the two-headed Orthos. Both were slain by HERCULES.

Icarius's Dog. Mæra (the glistener). See ICARIUS.

King Arthur's Favourite Hound. Cavall.

Llewelyn's Greyhound. Gelert. See BEDDGELERT.

Mauthe Dog. See MAUTHE.

Montargis, Dog of. AUBRY'S DOG.

Orion's Dogs. Arctophonos (bear-killer), and Ptoophagos (the glutton of Ptoon, in Bœotia).

Procris's Dog. Lælaps. See PROCRISS.

Roderick the Goth's Dog. Theron.

Seven Sleepers, Dog of the. Katmir who, according to Mohammedan tradition, was admitted to heaven. He accompanied the seven noble youths (see SEVEN SLEEPERS) to the cavern in which they were walled up. He remained standing for the whole time, neither moving, eating, drinking nor sleeping.

Tristan's Dog. Hodain, or Leon.

Ulysses's Dog. Argos; he recognized his master after his return from TROY, and died of joy.

(3) DOGS OF NOTED PEOPLE AND IN LITERATURE, etc.

Boatswain. Byron's favourite dog; buried at Newstead Abbey. His master wrote the epitaph.

Bounce. Alexander Pope's dog.

Boy. Prince Rupert's dog, killed at the battle of Marston Moor.

Brutus. Landseer's greyhound; jocularly called "The Invader of the Larder".

Dash. Charles Lamb's dog.

Diamond. Sir Isaac Newton's little dog which one winter's morning upset a candle on his master's desk causing the destruction of the records of many years' experiments. On perceiving this disaster Newton exclaimed: "Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!" And at once set to work to repair the loss.

Flush. Elizabeth Barrett Browning's dog.

Geist. One of Matthew Arnold's dachshunds. He wrote the poem Geist's Grave in memory of him.

Giallo. Walter Savage Landor's dog.

Hamlet. Sir Walter Scott's black greyhound.

Kaiser. Another of Matthew Arnold's dachshunds commemorated in his Kaiser Dead. See GEIST above.

Luath. The favourite of Robert Burns.

Lufra. The hound of Douglas, in Scott's Lady of the Lake.

Maida. Sir Walter Scott's favourite deerhound.

Mathe. Richard II's greyhound which left him in favour of Bolingbroke.

Nana. Mr. and Mrs. Darling's dog in J. M. Barrie's PETER PAN.

Rufus. Sir Winston Churchill's poodle.

St. Bernard Dogs. See PASSES, ST. BERNARD.

Toby. PUNCH's famous dog; named after the dog that followed TOBIT in his journeys, a favourite in mediæval Biblical stories and plays.

(4) DOGS IN SYMBOLISM AND METAPHOR.

Dogs in mediæval art, symbolize fidelity. A dog is represented as lying at the feet of St. BERNARD, St. Benignus, and St. Wendelon; as licking the wounds of St. ROCH; as carrying a lighted torch in representations of St. DOMINIC.

Dogs in effigy. In funeral monuments a dog in effigy is usually a memento of the dead person's pet with no symbolical significance.

Lovell the Dog. See RAT, CAT AND DOG under RAT.

The Derby Dog. See under DERBY.

The Dog. DIOGENES (412-323 B.C.). When ALEXANDER of Macedon went to see him he introduced himself with these words: "I am Alexander, surnamed the Great." To which the philosopher replied: "And I am Diogenes, surnamed the Dog." The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble, surmounted by a dog. See CYNIC.

The Dog of God. So the Laplanders call the bear, which "has the strength of ten men and the wit of twelve".

The Thracian Dog. ZOILUS, the carping critic of ancient Greece.

Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feast,
And feed on scraps refused by every guest;
From the old Thracian dog they learned the way
To snarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey.
PITT: To Mr. Spence.

Dog—or dog's—in combination, is used, besides in its literal sense (as in dog-biscuit) for

(a) denoting the male of certain animals, as dog-ape, dog-fox, dog-otter.

(b) denoting inferior plants, or those which are worthless as food for man, as dog-briar, dog-cabbage, dog-leek, dog-lichen, dog's mercury, dog-parsley, dog-violets (scentless), dog-wheat. See below DOG-GRASS, DOG-ROSE.

(c) expressing spuriousness or some mongrel quality, as dog's-logic, DOG-LATIN.

Dog-cart. A light one-horse trap popular for informal country use in Victorian and Edwardian times, originally designed for carrying sportsmen's dogs. Also the name of a small cart drawn by dogs.

Dog-cheap. Extremely cheap; "dirt-cheap".

Dog-collar. As well as its literal meaning, it is the popular name for a clergyman's "back to front" collar. Also the ornamental band or collar worn close to the throat by women.

Dog-days. Days of great heat. The Romans called the hottest weeks of the summer caniculares dies. Their theory was that the DOG-STAR, rising with the SUN, added to its heat, and the dog-days (about 3 July to 11 July) bore the combined heat of both.

Dog-ears. The corners of pages crumpled and folded down; dog-eared pages are so crumpled, like the turned-down ears of many dogs.

Dog-fall. A fall in wrestling when the two combatants touch the ground together.

Dog-grass. Couch-grass (Triticum repens), which is eaten by dogs when they have lost their appetite; it acts as an emetic and purgative.

Dog-head. In a flintlock, the part of the gun which bites or holds the flint.

Dog-Latin. Pretended or mongrel Latin. An excellent example is Stevens's definition of a kitchen:

As the law classically expresses it, a kitchen is "camera necessaria pro usus cookare; cum saucepannis, stewpannis, scullero, dressero, coalholo, stovis, smoak-jacko; pro roastandum boilandum fryandum et plum-pudding-mixandum . . ."

A Law Report (Daniel v. Dishclout).

Dog-leech. A dog-doctor; formerly applied contemptuously to a medical practitioner.

Dog-rose. The common wild rose (Rosa canina, Pliny's cynorrodon), so called because it was supposed by the ancient Greeks to cure the bite of mad dogs.

Dogs, Isle of. See ISLE.

Dog's-nose. Gin and beer, etc.

"Dog's-nose, which your committee find upon inquiry, to be compounded of warm porter, moist sugar, gin and nutmeg."

DICKENS: Pickwick Papers, ch. xxxiii.

Dogsbody. A drudge, one who is generally exploited and used as a menial.

Dog-sleep. A pretended sleep; also a light, easily broken sleep. Dogs seem to sleep with "one eye open".

Dog-star. SIRIUS, the brightest star in the firmament, whose influence was anciently supposed to cause great heat, pestilence, etc. See DOG-DAYS above.

Dog-tags. Identity discs of members of the U.S. armed forces (World War II).

Dog-tired. Exhausted, usually after exercise or hard manual labour; and wanting only to curl up like a dog and go to sleep.

Dog-vane. A nautical term for a small vane placed on the weather gunwale to show the direction of the wind. Sailors also apply it to a COCKADE.

Dog-watch. Two-hour watches (4-6 p.m. and 6-8 p.m.) instead of the usual four-hour watches introduced to enable seamen to vary their daily watch-keeping rota. Among suggested origins are that it is a "docked" or shortened watch or a corruption of "dodge" watch. See WATCH.

Dog-whipper. A minor church officer of the days when sheepdogs, TURNSPITS and others accompanied their owners to church. His job was to keep order among the canine congregation, to eject the badly behaved and to exclude troublesome dogs generally. Whips and dog-tongs were used. The office became redundant in the 19th century. Even as late as 1856 Mr. John Pickard was appointed dog-whipper in Exeter Cathedral.

Dog-whipping Day. 18 October (St. LUKE's Day). It is said that a dog once swallowed a consecrated wafer on this day.

Doggo. To lie doggo. To get into hiding and remain there; to keep quiet and out of sight.

Dog-goned. An American EUPHEMISM for "God-damned".

But when that choir got up to sing,
I couldn't catch a word;
They sang the most doggonest thing
A body ever heard!

WILL CARLETON: Farm Ballad.

Dogaressa. The wife of a DOGE.

Dogberry. An officious and ignorant JACK IN OFFICE. The allusion is to the ignorant, self-satisfied, overbearing, but good-natured night-constable of this name in SHAKESPEARE'S Much Ado About Nothing.

Doge (dōj) (Lat. dux, a leader or duke). The chief magistrate of the Venetian Republic. The first doge was Paolo Anafesto (Paoluccio), 697, and the last Luigi Manin, 1789. See BRIDE OF THE SEA.

For six hundred years . . . her [Venice's] government was an elective monarchy, her . . . doge possessing, in early times at least, as much independent authority as any other European sovereign.

RUSKIN: Stones of Venice, vol. I, ch. i.

The chief magistrate of Genoa was also called a doge from 1339 until 1796 when the French established the Ligurian Republic.

Dogget's Coat and Badge. The prize given in an annual rowing match for Thames watermen held under the auspices of the Fishmongers' Company on or near 1 August. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of DRURY LANE, who signaled the accession of George I by instituting the race in 1715. It is from the Swan Steps at London Bridge to the "Swan" at Chelsea, the average time taken being 30 mins. The coat is an orange-coloured livery jacket.

Dogie, or dogy (dō' gi). In the western U.S.A. the term for an undersized calf. At round-up time all motherless calves were called "dough-guts", which became contracted into dogie. Being prematurely weaned, their stomachs could not digest grass and swelled accordingly.

Doh, or Do (dō). The first or tonic note of the solfeggio system of music. See ARETINIAN SYLLABLES.

Doily, or Doyley. A small ornamental mat, or napkin used on cake dishes, etc., or on which to stand glasses, bottles, etc. In the 17th century it denoted a kind of woollen material; thus Dryden speaks of "doyley petticoats", and Steele in No. 102 of the Tatler speaks of his "doiley suit". The Doyleys, from which the stuff was named, were linen drapers in the STRAND from the time of Queen Anne until 1850.

Doit. An old Dutch coin of low value; hence any coin of little worth, a trifle.

When they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out ten to see a dead Indian.
SHAKESPEARE: The Tempest, II, ii.

Dolce far niente (dol' chi far ni en' ti) (Ital.). Delightful idleness. Pliny has "Jucundum tamen nihil agere" (Ep. viii, 9).

Doldrums, The. A condition of depression, slackness, or inactivity; hence applied by sailors to regions where ships were likely to be becalmed, especially those parts of the ocean near the Equator noted for calms, light winds, etc.

But from the bluff-head, where I watched today, I saw her in the doldrums.

BYRON: The Island, II, xxi.

Dole (Lat. dolor, grief, sorrow). Lamentation.

To make dole. To lament, mourn.

Yonder they lie; the poor old man, their father, making such pitiful dole over them that all the beholders take his part with weeping.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, I, ii.

Dole (O.E. dal, a portion; dael, deal). A portion allotted, a charitable gift, alms. From Saxon times the strips of land, especially of common meadow, distributed annually were called doles. Since the National Insurance Act of 1911, it is the everyday name for "unemployment benefit".

Happy man be his dole. May his share or lot be that of a happy or fortunate man.

Your father and my uncle have made motions; if it be my luck, so: if not, happy man be his dole!
SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, III, iv.

Dollar. The sign $ is probably a modification of the figure 8 as it appeared on the old Spanish "pieces of eight" which were of the same value as the dollar.

The word is a variant of thaler (Low. Ger. Dahler; Dan. daler), and means valley (our dale). The Counts of Schlick, at the close of the 15th century, coined ounce-pieces from the silver extracted from the mines at Joachim's Thal (Joachim's valley). These pieces called Joachim's Thalers or Schlickthalers gained such repute that they became standard coin. Other coins made like them came to be called thalers. Bank of England dollars were struck as bank tokens in 1797 and subsequently. Dollars were first coined in the U.S.A. in 1794.

The Almighty Dollar. An expressive term emphasizing the power of money. See ALMIGHTY.

Dollar Diplomacy. A term applied to governmental support and furtherance of commercial interests abroad for both political and economic ends. The phrase, popular with critics of American policy, stems from the Taft administration (1909-1913), which fostered such policies in the Far East and Latin America. Their intention was to control as well as to promote enterprise abroad by substituting dollars for bullets and lending "all proper support to every legitimate and beneficial American enterprise abroad".

Dolly Shop. A MARINE STORE where rags and old clothes are bought; so called from the black doll hung up as a sign. It is suggested that the name was originally a corruption of tally shop.

Dolly-tub. A wash-tub, the predecessor of the electric washing machine, with a dolly or revolving wooden disc with projecting dowels which stirred up its contents and was manually operated. The name was earlier applied to the keeve or tub which was part of the dollying-machine used in the Cornish tin-mining industry.

Dolmen (dol' men). A word of CELTIC origin, the equivalent of the Welsh CROMLECH. The name is particularly used in Brittany. They are often called devils' tables, fairies' tables, etc.

The Constantine Dolmen, CORNWALL, is 33 ft. long, 14½ ft. deep, and 18½ ft. across and estimated to weigh 750 tons. It is poised on the points of two natural rocks.

Dolphin. See DAUPHIN. The dolphin in mediæval art symbolizes social love.

Dom (Lat. dominus). A title applied in the MIDDLE AGES to the POPE, and later to other Church dignitaries. It is now largely restricted to monks of the BENEDICTINE and CARTHUSIAN Orders. The Sp. don, Port. dom, and M.E. dan are the same word. See DAN; DON.

Domboc. See DOOM.

Domdaniel. A fabled abode of evil spirits, GNOMES, and enchanters "under the roots of the ocean" off Tunis, or elsewhere. It first appears in Chaves and Gazotte's Continuation of the Arabian Nights (1788-1793), was introduced by Southey into his Thalaba, and used by Carlyle as synonymous with a den of iniquity. The word is made up from Lat. domus, a house, and danielis, of Daniel, the latter being taken as a magician.

Domesday Book consists of one folio volume of 382 pp. and one quarto of 450 pp., written in Latin, now housed in the Public Record Office, but formerly kept in the EXCHEQUER. They contain the records of a survey of England begun in 1085 by order of WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR. Certain remote areas (Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Durham) were omitted.

Details of the ownership, extent, value, population, stock, etc., of all holdings are given for the time of Edward the Confessor and also at the time of the survey. The value is also given for the time of the Conquest. It was long used for taxation purposes and as a general governmental reference book. It is also called The King's Book and The Winchester Roll because it was once kept there. It was reproduced in typographical facsimile in 1783. The name is from O.E. dom, judgment. Cp. EXON DOMESDAY.

Domiciliary Visit (dom i sil' yá ri). An official police visit to search a private dwelling after the essential warrant from the magistrate has been obtained.

Dominations. See DOMINIONS.

Domine, quo vadis? (Lat. Master, whither goest thou?). According to tradition, when St. PETER was fleeing from persecution in ROME, he met Christ on the APPIAN WAY and greeted Our Lord with these words. The reply "Venio Romam, iterum crucifigi" (I am coming to Rome to be crucified again) so shamed the apostle that he returned to martyrdom in Rome. The meeting is commemorated by a church on the Appian Way.

Dominic, St., de Guzman (1170-1221), the founder of the Dominican Order, or Preaching Friars, noted for his vehemence against the ALBIGENSES and called by the POPE "Inquisitor-General". He was canonized by Gregory IX. He is represented with a sparrow at his side and a dog carrying in its mouth a burning torch. It is said that the DEVIL appeared to him in the form of a sparrow, and the dog refers to his mother's dream, during her pregnancy, that she had given birth to a dog which lighted the world with a burning torch.

Dominical Letters, or Sunday Letters.

The first seven letters of the alphabet used in calendars, almanacs, etc., to mark the Sundays throughout the year (Lat. Dominica Dies, the Lord's Day, Sunday). If 1 January is a Sunday the Dominical Letter for the year will be A and if 2 January is a Sunday the Letter will be B, and so on. Dominical Letters are used for finding on what day of the week any day of the month falls in any particular year, also in determining EASTER. Tables and instructions are to be found in Prayer Books, Breviaries, etc.

Dominicans. The order of preaching friars founded by St. DOMINIC de Guzman in 1215, their rule being based on that of St. Augustine. Their first home in England was at Oxford (1221). They gained the name of BLACK FRIARS and in France they were called JACOBINS. They were also called Domini canes or Hounds of the Lord. Albertus Magnus, St. Thomas Aquinas and Savonarola were representatives of an order notable for its intellectual distinction.

Dominions. The sixth of the nine orders in the mediæval hierarchy of angels, also known as Dominations and symbolized in art by an ensign. See ANGEL.

From the formation of the Dominion of Canada (1867) the word also came to be applied to the self-governing units of the British Empire as they were formed, and their relations with the mother country were handled by the Dominions Office. As the word Empire came to be replaced by that of COMMONWEALTH, the Dominions Office became the Commonwealth Relations Office in 1947 and Commonwealth Office in 1966, which was combined with the Foreign Office in 1968.

The Old Dominion. The State of Virginia, formerly an English colony.

Domino (Ital.). Originally a hooded clerical cloak; hence such a hooded garment worn at masquerades, then a hood only, and finally the half mask covering an inch or two above and below the eyes, worn as a disguise. The black ebony pieces used in the game of dominoes may have derived their name from some allusion to the black domino cloak or the black mask with the eyes showing through as the white pips.

Don is do-on, as "Don your bonnet".
See DOFF; DOUT; DUP.

Then up he rose, and donn'd his clothes,
And dupp'd the chamber-door.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, IV, v.

Don (Lat. dominus, lord). A Spanish gentleman, any Spaniard, an aristocrat, a man of mark, a university tutor, fellow, etc.

Don Juan. See under JUAN.

Don Pacifico. See under PACIFICO.

Don Quixote. See under QUIXOTE.

Donation of Constantine. The presumed grant by the Emperor Constantine (306-337) to Pope Silvester and his successors in perpetuity, consequent upon his baptism of Constantine in 326, of the temporal jurisdiction over ROME and Italy, etc. The document is now accepted as an 8th-century forgery. See DECRETALS.

Donation of Pepin, or Pippin. When Pippin III (the Short) conquered Aistulf the Lombard king, the exarchate of Ravenna fell into his hands (756). Pippin gave it with the surrounding country and the Republic of Rome to Pope Stephen II, thus founding the Papal States and the temporal power of the papacy.

With the exception of the city of ROME, the Papal States were incorporated in the Kingdom of Italy in 1860 and when Rome was made the Italian capital in 1870 the Pope declared himself a "prisoner" in the VATICAN. This seclusion was ended by the CONCORDAT with Mussolini's government in 1929.

Donatists. Schismatic followers of Donatus, a Numidian bishop of the 4th century who, on puritanical grounds, opposed the election of Cæcilianus to the bishopric of Carthage (311). Their chief dogma was that the Church was a society of holy people and that mortal sinners were to be excluded. St. Augustine of Hippo vigorously combated their heresies.

Doncaster. The "City on the river Don" (Celt. don, that which spreads). Sigebert, monk of Gemblours, in 1100, derived the name from Thong-ceaster, "the castle of the thong", and says that HENGIST AND HORSIA purchased from the British king as much as they could encompass with a leather thong, which they cut into strips and so encompassed the land occupied by the city. Cp. CUTTING A DIDO under DIDO.

Done. The done thing. That which is recognized as socially acceptable and proper. Cp. U AND NON-U.

Donkey. An ass. The word is first found in the later 18th century and is a diminutive probably derived from dun with reference to its colour. For the story concerning the cross on the donkey's back, see ASS.

A donkey's breakfast. A merchant navy term for a straw-filled mattress.

Not for donkey's years. Not for a very long time. The allusion is to the old tradition that one never sees a dead donkey.

The donkey means one thing and the driver another. Different people see things from different standpoints, according to their own interests. The allusion is to a fable in PHÆDRUS, where a donkey-driver exhorts his donkey to flee, as the enemy is at hand. The donkey asks if the enemy will load him with double pack-saddles. "No," says the man. "Then," replies the donkey, "what care I whether you are my master or some other?"

To ride the black donkey. To be pig-headed, obstinate like a donkey. Black is added in the sense of bad, as in BLACK BOOKS, BLACK LOOKS, etc.

Two more, and up goes the donkey. An old cry at fairs, the showman having promised his credulous hearers that as soon as enough pennies are collected his donkey will balance himself on the top of a pole or ladder. Always a matter of "two more pennies", the trick is never performed.

Who stole the donkey? An old gibe against policemen. The story is that in the early days of the force a donkey was stolen, but the police failed to discover the thief, and this gave rise to the laugh against them. The correct answer is "The man with the white hat", because white hats were made from the skins of donkeys, many of which were stolen and sold to hatters.

Donkey engine, pump, etc. Small auxiliary engines or pumps used for subsidiary work, just as the horse does more important work than the donkey.

Donkey-work. Uninteresting work; less responsible work, drudgery.

Donnybrook Fair. This FAIR, held in August from the time of King John till 1855, was noted for its bacchanalian routs and light-hearted rioting. Hence it is proverbial for a disorderly gathering of regular rumpus. The village is now one of the south-eastern suburbs of Dublin.

Donzel. A SQUIRE or young man of good birth not yet knighted (Ital. doncello, from Late Lat. domicellus). See DAMSEL.

He is esquire to a knight-errant, donzel to the damsels.

S. BUTLER: Characters.

Doom (O.E. dom). The original meaning was law, or judgment, and a doomsman was a judge. (See DEEMSTER.) The book of laws compiled by King Alfred was called the Domboc.

Crack of doom. The last trump, the signal for the final judgment.

To falsify a doom. A Scottish term meaning to protest against a sentence.

Doomsday Book. See DOMESDAY.

Doomsday Sedgwick (c. 1610–c. 1669), a Puritan zealot during the COMMONWEALTH. He claimed to have it revealed to him in a vision that doomsday was at hand; and, going to the house of Sir Francis Russell, in Cambridgeshire, he called upon a party of gentlemen playing at bowls to leave off and prepare for the approaching dissolution.

Door. The O.E. dor (fem. duru). The word is similar in many other languages, thus, Dan. dor, Icel. dyrr; Gr. thura; Lat. fores; Ger. Tür.

Dead as a door-nail. See DEAD.

Door-money. Payment taken at the doors for admission to an entertainment, dance, etc.

Doors of Perception. The senses; the greatly increased sensitivity achieved by the taking of certain drugs, as described by Aldous Huxley in his book of that title.

He laid the charge at my door. He accused me of doing it.

Indoors. Inside the house; also attributively, as, an indoor servant, indoor clothes.

Next door to it. Within an ace of it (see ACE); very like it; next-door neighbour to it.

Outdoor, or Out of doors. Outside the house; in the open air.

Sin lieth at the door (Gen. iv. 7). The blame of sin attaches to the wrongdoer, and he must take the consequences.

The door must be either shut or open. It must be one way or the other. This is from de Bruce's and Palaprat's comedy, Le Grondeur (produced 1691); the master scolds his servant for leaving the door open. The servant says that he was scolded the last time for shutting it, and adds: "Do you wish it shut?"—"No."—"Do you wish it open?"—"No."—"Why," says the man, "it must be either shut or open."

To darken one's door. See under DARK.
To make the door. To make it fast by shutting and bolting it.

Make the door upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, IV, i.

To meet behind closed doors. In secret; without the press or public present.

To show someone the door. Peremptorily to ask a person to leave one's house; to get rid of someone whose presence is unwelcome.

To shut the door in someone's face. To shut the door deliberately and to refuse to have any dealings with the caller.

Dora. The popular name of the Defence of the Realm Act, 1914 (D.O.R.A.), which imposed innumerable temporary restrictions. It passed into common speech after having been used in the Law Courts by Mr. Justice Scrutton. Dora was portrayed as an elderly female, the personification of restriction (Cp. GRUNDY). There have been countless similar coinages since World War II and their derivation is usually, but not always, obvious. "Ernie" (Electronic Random Number Indicating Equipment), the selector of prizewinning numbers for holders of Government Premium Bonds; "Unesco" (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization); and "Swab" (South Western Electric Company Board) are typical examples. Cp. ENSA.

Dorado, EL. See EL DORADO.

Dorcas Society. A woman's circle making clothing for charitable purposes. So called from Dorcas in Acts ix, 39, who made "coats and garments" for widows.

Dorian, Doric. Pertaining to Doris, one of the divisions of ancient Greece, or to its inhabitants, a simple, pastoral people.

Dorian Mode. The scale represented by the white keys on a pianoforte, beginning with D. A simple, solemn form of music, the first of the authentic Church modes.

Doric Dialect. The broad, hard dialect spoken by the natives of Doris, in Greece. Hence any broad rustic dialect, and especially that of Scotland, of which Robert Burns's verses are a notable example.

Doric Order. The oldest, strongest, and simplest of the Grecian orders of architecture. The Greek Doric is simpler than the Roman imitation. A characteristic of the Grecian is that the column stands directly on the pavement, whereas the Roman is placed on a plinth.

The Doric Land. Greece, of which Doris forms a part.

The Doric Reed. Pastoral poetry. Everything Doric was very plain, but cheerful, chaste and solid.

The Doric reed once more
Well pleased, I tune.

THOMSON: The Seasons, Autumn, line 3.

Doris. See NEREIDS.

Dornick. Stout figured linen for table-cloths, etc.; so called from Doornick, the Flemish name of Tournai, where it was originally made. The word is also spelt Dornock, Darnex, etc. See DANNOCKS.

I have got . . . a fair Darnex carpet of my own
Laid cross for the more state.

FLETCHER: The Noble Gentleman, V, 1.

Dorothea, St. (dor ò thé' á). A martyr under Diocletian about 300. She is represented with a rose-branch in her hand, a wreath of roses on her head, and roses with fruit by her side. The legend is that Theophilus, the judge's secretary, scoffingly said to her as she was going to execution, "Send me some fruit and roses, Dorothea, when you get to Paradise." Immediately after her execution, a young angel brought him a basket of apples and roses, saying "From Dorothea in Paradise", and vanished. Theophilus was a convert from that moment. The story forms the basis of Massinger and Dekker's tragedy, The Virgin Martir (1622).

Dorset. Once the seat of a British tribe, calling themselves Dwr-trigs (dwellers by the water). The Romans latinized Dwr-trigs into Duro-triges. Lastly came the Saxons, who translated the original words into their own tongue, dor-saetta, saetta being a seat or settlement.

The Dorsetshire Poet. William Barnes (1800-1886), a clergyman who was born and lived in Dorset, and who wrote much poetry in the local dialect.

The Dorsetshire Novelist. Thomas Hardy (1840-1928), of Dorset stock on both sides, who made the Dorset rustic and countryside a central feature of his novels.

Dot. Dot and carry one. An infant just beginning to toddle; one who limps in walking; a person who has one leg longer than the other.

On the dot. Precisely on time. A probable reference to the minute-hand of the clock being exactly over the dot marking the given minute on the dial.

To dot the i's and cross the t's. To be meticulous; to give most careful attention to detail; to finalize the details of an agreement. From the liability to confuse these letters if carelessly written without cross or dot.

Dotheboys Hall (doo' the boiz). A private boarding school in Dickens's Nicholas Nickleby where boys were taken in and done for by Mr. Wackford Squeers, a brutish, ignorant, overbearing knave, who starved them and taught them nothing.

The ruthless exposure of this kind of school led to the closing or reformation of many.

Dotterel. A doting old fool; an old man easily cajoled. So called from the bird, a species of plover, which is easily approached and caught.

To dor the dotterel. Dor is an obsolete word meaning to trick or cheat, whence the phrase means to cheat the simpleton.

Douai Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Double (Lat. duplus, twofold). One's double is one's alter ego. The word is applied to such pairs as the Corsican brothers in the play Les frères corses, the DROMIO brothers, and the brothers Antipholus.

Double-barrelled. A double-barrelled gun is one with two barrels; to have a double-barrelled name is to have a hyphenated surname; a double-barrelled compliment is an ambiguous or two-edged compliment.

Double dealing. Deceit or duplicity; professing one thing and practising another.

Double Dutch. Gibberish or jargon, as of infants or of a foreign tongue not understood by the hearer. Dutch is a synonym for foreign in this context; and double implies to an excessive degree.

Double-edged. Able to cut either way; used metaphorically of an argument which makes for and against the person employing it or of a compliment or statement with a double meaning.

"Your Delphic sword," the panther then replied,
"Is double-edged and cuts on either side."
DRYDEN: The Hind and the Panther, Pt. III, 191.

Double entendre (doo' blón tón dra). An incorrect English version of the French double entente. Used of a word or phrase with a double meaning, one of which is usually coarse or indelicate.

A double first. Formerly in the first class both of the classical and mathematical triposes at Cambridge. Now, a first class in any two final examinations.

Double-headed Eagle. See THE TWO-HEADED EAGLE under EAGLE.

Double or quits. The winner stakes his stake, and the loser promises to pay twice the stake if he loses again; but if he wins the second throw, etc., his loss is cancelled and no money passes.

Double-quick. In military usage, means to proceed at double-quickstep or double-time, the quickest step next to a run. See TO DOUBLE-UP.

Double Summer Time. See DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Double take. An actor's trick. It is to look away from the person who has addressed a remark to you, and then to look back at him quickly when the purport of the remark sinks in. A second look occasioned by surprise or admiration.

Double-talk. An expression of American origin. Talk that sounds promising but in reality means nothing, or can be made to mean what the speaker wishes.

Double-think. A term used by George Orwell in his Nineteen Eighty-four (1949) to describe what unscrupulous propagandists achieved by "NEWSPEAK", a kind of DOUBLE-TALK. It denoted the mental ability to hold and accept simultaneously two entirely conflicting views or beliefs.

Double-time. As a military expression, the same as DOUBLE-QUICK.

Double-tongued. Making contrary declarations on the same subject at different times; deceitful; insincere.

Be grave, not double-tongued.—I Tim. iii, 8.

Double X. See x.

To double a cape. Said of a ship that sails round a cape to the other side; hence its course proceeds along both sides.

To double a part. Said of an actor playing two parts in the same piece.

To double and twist. To prevaricate, act evasively or to try to extract oneself from a difficulty by tortuous means. The phrase is taken from courting—a hare "doubles and twists" in seeking to escape the hounds. In weaving, "to double and twist" is to add one thread to another and twist them together.

To double back. To turn back on one's course.

To double-cross. Properly to cheat or cross each of two parties, to betray both sides; but now commonly used to mean the betrayal or deception of an associate.

To double up. To fold together. "To double up the fist" is to clench the fist. "To double a person up" is to strike him in the wind and make him fold double with pain. In military language, "Double up" is an order to hurry or run.

To work double tides. To work extra hard, with all one's might. It implies doing three days work in two, or a minimum of two tides work in 24 hours. When a ship is left aground between tides for repairs below the waterline, a tide's work is that period of labour possible during the ebb and slack water.

Doubling Castle. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, the castle of the giant Despair, in which CHRISTIAN and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called Promise.

Doubling Thomas. See THOMAS.

Doughboy. Originally a dough cake baked for sailors, but from the late 1840s the name came to be given to American soldiers until World War II when "G.I." generally took its place. The common explanation is that the large brass buttons of the soldier's uniform resembled the dough cake.

Doughface (U.S.A.). An inhabitant of the northern states who was in favour of maintaining slavery in the South.

Douglas. The Scottish family name is from the river Douglas in Lanarkshire, which is the Celt. dhu glaise, black stream, a name in use also in IRELAND, the Isle of Man, etc., and in Lancashire corrupted to Diggles. Legend explains it by the story that in 770 an unknown chief came to the assistance of a Scottish king. After the battle the king asked who was the "Duglass" chieftain, his deliverer, and received for answer Sholto Du-glass which means "Behold the dark grey man".

The complexion of the day is congenial with the original derivation of the name of the country, and the description of the chiefs to whom it belonged—Sholto Dhu Glass—(see yon dark grey man).

SCOTT: Castle Dangerous, ch. iii.

Black Douglas. Sir James Douglas (1286–1330), or "Good Sir James", champion of Robert Bruce, was called "Black Douglas" by the English of the Border to whom he became a figure of dread. He twice took Douglas Castle from its English occupants by stratagem. The story is told in Scott's Castle Dangerous.

The Douglas Larder. ON PALM SUNDAY 1307 Sir James Douglas regained his castle by a ruse and, knowing that he could not hold it, caused all the provisions to be heaped together in the cellar along with the bodies of the slain prisoners and dead horses. Drink was then poured over all and salt cast upon it. The castle was then fired. This cellar is known as the "Douglas Larder".

Douse, or dowse. To strike, to douse a sail is to lower it hastily; to extinguish; to drench. The origin of the word is uncertain but possibly from Old Dut. doesen, to beat, or strike. See also DOWSE.

A douse in the chops. A heavy blow in the face.

Douse the Glim. Put out the candle, put out the light; also to knock out a man's eye.

"What though he has his humours, and made my eye douse the glim in his fancies and frolics."

SCOTT: The Pirate, ch. xxxiv.

Dout. A contraction of do out. In some southern counties we find dout the candle and dout the fire, and extinguishers are called douters. Cp. DOFF; DON; DUP.

Dove. The name means "the diver-bird"; perhaps from its habit of ducking its head. So also Lat. columba is the Gr. kolumbis, a diver.

In Christian art the dove symbolizes the HOLY GHOST and the seven rays proceeding from it the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. It also symbolizes the SOUL and as such is sometimes represented coming out of the mouth of saints at death. A dove bearing a ring is an attribute of St. AGNES; St. DAVID is shown with a dove on his shoulder; St. DUNSTAN and St. Gregory the Great with one at the ear; St. Enurchus with one on his head; and St. REMIGIUS with the dove bringing him holy chrism.

The clergy of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND are allegorized as doves in Dryden's The Hind and the Panther, Pt. III, 947.

The dove is also the symbol of peace, tenderness, innocence, and gentleness. To cause a flutter in the dovecot. To alarm, disturb, or cause confusion among those conventionally minded or settled in their ways, as would a bird of prey in a dovecot.

Dover. In the professional slang of English cooks a resurrection pie or any réchauffé is called a dover (do over again).

A Jack of Dover. See JACK.

When Dover and Calais meet. NEVER.

Dovercourt. A confused gabble, a babel. According to legend Dovercourt church, in Essex, once possessed a cross that spoke; and Foxe says that the crowd in the church was so great "that no man could shut the door". Dovercourt also seems to have been noted for its scolds and chattering women.

And now the rood of Dovercourt did speak,
Confirming his opinions to true.

Grim, the Collier of Croydon (1600).

When bells ring round and in their order be,
They do denote how neighbours should agree;
But when they clam, the harsh sound spoils the sport

And 'tis like women keeping Dovercourt.
Lines in the Belfry of St. Peter's, Shaftesbury.

Dowelling Money. Dwelling-house money. In mediæval England the equivalent of a church rate i.e., a parochial levy in each household. See PENTECOSTAL; SMOKE-FARthings under SMOKE.

Dowlas, Mr. A generic name for a linen-draper, who sold dowlas, a coarse linen cloth (so called from Daoulas, in Brittany, where it was made).

Mrs. Quickly: I bought you a dozen of shirts to your back.

Falstaff: Dowlas, filthy dowlas: I have given them away to bakers' wives, and they have made bolsters of them.

Mrs. Quickly: Now, as I am a true woman, holland of eight shillings an ell.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, III, iii.

Down, Down and out. At the end of one's resources with no apparent chance of recovery. Homeless vagrants are termed down-and-outs.

Down at heel. In decayed circumstances, of which worn-down heels are a sign.

A good man's fortune may grow out at heels.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, II, ii.

Down in the dumps. See DUMPS.

Down in the jib. The nautical equivalent of DOWN IN THE MOUTH.

Down in the mouth. Out of spirits; disheartened. When persons are very sad and low-spirited, the corners of the mouth are drawn down.

Down on his luck. In ill luck; short of cash and credit.

Down with! Away with! A cry of rage and exasperation, like the Fr. à bas.

He is run down. Out of condition. In need of a thorough rest. Like a clock that has run down and needs rewinding.

I was down on him in a minute. I pounced on him directly. I detected his trick immediately. The allusion is to birds of prey.

That suits me down to the ground. Wholly and entirely, like a well-tailored garment.

The down train. The train away from London or the local centre, in contradistinction to the up train, which goes to it. We also have the down platform, etc.

To be sent down. To be sent from the university as a punishment.

To down tools. To lay one's tools aside and stop work; to come out on strike.

To go down. In university parlance, to commence vacation or to leave the university finally.

To have a down on. To have a grudge or spite against.

To run a man down. To denigrate or discredit someone to a third party.

Ups and downs. The twists and turns of fortune; one's successes and reverses.

Fraudulent transactions have their downs as well as their ups.

DICKENS: Martin Chuzzlewit, ch. xvi.

Down-easter. An American from New England.

Down-town. The business district of an American city, so called from New York, where financial houses are concentrated on the southern tip of Manhattan Island; the lower part of a town.

Down under. At the Antipodes; in Australia.

Downing Street. A street leading off WHITEHALL and a synonym for the British Government.

No. 10 was given in 1725 by George II to Sir Robert Walpole as the official residence of the PRIME MINISTER, and it is there that CABINET meetings are usually held. No. 11 is the official residence of the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER; No. 12 is the Government WHIP'S Office. The street was named after Sir George Downing (c. 1623-1684), a noted parliamentarian and ambassador, who served under both Cromwell and Charles II, and owned property there.

Downright. Downright Dunstable. See DUNSTABLE.

Downy. A downy cove. A knowing or cunning fellow up to or, as formerly, down to every dodge. In Vaux's Flash Dictionary (1812) down is given as a synonym for "awake":

When the party you are about to rob sees or suspects your intention, it is then said that the cove is down.

Dowsabell. A common name in 16th-century poetry for a sweetheart, especially an unsophisticated country girl. It is the Fr. douce et belle, sweet and beautiful.

He had, as antique stories tell,
A daughter cleaped Dowsabell,
A maiden fayre and free.

DRAYTON: The Ballad of Dowsabell.

Dowse (see also DOUSE). To search for water, etc., with a DIVINING-ROD or dowsing-rod, and the practitioners of the art are called dowers. The practice was introduced into the Cornish mines from Germany in the reign of Elizabeth I.

Doxology (Gr. doxologia). The word means a hymn of praise to God. The Greater Doxology is the hymn Gloria in Excelsis Deo at the EUCHARIST. The Lesser Doxology is the Gloria Patri (Glory be to the Father, etc.) sung or said at the end of each psalm in the liturgy. The hymn "Praise God from whom all blessings flow" is also known as the Doxology.

Doyen. Fr. for DEAN (Lat. decanus). Used to denote accredited ambassador in a capital, but if there is a Papal Nuncio he is ipso facto the doyen. It is also applied to the senior member of a profession, etc.

Professor John Orr, F.B.A., Emeritus Professor in the University of Edinburgh, and the doyen and outstanding representative of Romance philology in Britain, and in the English speaking world, died on Wednesday at Edinburgh.

The Times, 15 Aug. 1966.

Dozen. Twelve. The word is derived from the Lat. duodecim.

A long dozen is thirteen. See BAKER'S DOZEN.

To talk nineteen to the dozen. To talk at a tremendous speed or with excessive vehemence.

Drachenfels (drak' èn felz) (Ger. Dragon-rock). So called from the legend that it was the home of the dragon slain by SIEGFRIED, the hero of the NIBELUNGENLIED.

The castled crag of Drachenfels
Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine,
Whose breast of waters broadly swells
Between the banks which bear the vine.

BYRON: Childe Harold, iii, 55.

Draconian Code (drá kó' ní an). A very severe code. Draco was an Athenian of the 7th century B.C. who drew up a code of laws noted for their severity. As nearly every violation of his laws was a capital offence, Demades, the orator, said that Draco's code was written in blood.

Draft. Draft on Aldgate pump. See ALDGATE.

Draggle-tail. See DAGGLE-TAIL.

Dragon. The Greek word drakon comes from a verb meaning "to see", to "look at", and more remotely "to watch" and "to flash".

In classical legend the idea of watching is retained in the story of the dragon who guards the golden apples in the Garden of the HESPERIDES, and in the story of CADMUS. In mediæval romance captive ladies were often guarded by dragons.

A dragon is a fabulous winged crocodile, usually represented as of large size, with a serpent's tail; whence the words dragon and SERPENT are sometimes interchangeable. In the Middle Ages the word was the symbol of sin in general and paganism in particular, the METAPHOR being derived from Rev. xii, 9, where SATAN is termed "the great dragon" and Ps. xci, 13, where it is said "the dragon shalt thou trample under feet". Hence, in Christian art it has the same significance.

Among the many SAINTS usually pictured as dragon-slayers are St. MICHAEL, St. GEORGE, St. MARGARET, St. Samson (Archbishop of Dol), St. Clement of Metz; St. Romain of Rouen, who destroyed the huge dragon La GARGOUILLE, which ravaged the Seine; St. PHILIP the Apostle; St. MARTHA, slayer of the terrible dragon Tarasque, at Aix-la-Chapelle; St. Florent, who killed a dragon which haunted the Loire; St. Cado, St. Maudet, and St. Pol, who performed similar feats in Brittany; and St. KEYNE of CORNWALL.

Dragonnades

Among the ancient Britons and the Welsh the dragon was the national symbol on the war standard; hence the term PENDRAGON for the dux bellorum, or leader in war. A red dragon is the central feature of the Welsh flag.

Dragon's Blood. An old name in pharmacy for the resin from certain plants, formerly used in certain preparations, etc. The East Indian palm (Calamus draco) is used as a colouring matter for artists' varnishes, etc.

In German legend, when SIEGFRIED was told to bathe in the blood of a dragon in order to make him immune from injury, a linden leaf fell on him and the place it covered remained vulnerable. There is a possible connexion between this story and the term "dragon's blood" applied to a powder used in printing which, applied to a block for processing, prevents the etching of that portion covered.

A flying dragon. A meteor.

The Chinese dragon. In China, a five-clawed dragon is introduced into pictures and embroidered on dresses as an AMULET.

The Dragon of Wantley. See WANTLEY.

To sow dragon's teeth. To foment contentions; to stir up strife or war; especially to do something which is intended to put an end to strife but which brings it about. The Philistines "sowed dragons' teeth" when they took SAMSON, bound him, and put out his eyes; Ethelred II did the same when he ordered the massacre of the Danes on St. Brice's Day (1002), as did the Germans when they took Alsace-Lorraine from France in 1871.

The reference is to the classical story of CADMUS.

Dragon's Hill. A site in Berkshire where one legend has it that St. GEORGE killed the dragon. A bare place is shown on the hill, where nothing will grow, for there the dragon's blood was spilled.

In Saxon annals we are told that Cerdic, founder of the West Saxon kingdom, there slew Naud or Natanleod, the PENDRAGON, and five thousand men.

Dragon Mountains. The Drakensberg Mountains in South Africa.

Dragonnades. The name given to Louis XIV's persecutions of the HUGUENOTS from 1681, until after the Revocation of the Edict of NANTES in 1685. The name arises from the billeting of DRAGOONS on those PROTESTANTS who refused to renounce their "heresy". The soldiery were given a free hand with the obvious results.

Dragoon. The name of certain cavalry regiments, originally a mounted infantryman. The name is taken from the carbine called a dragon which spouted fire like the fabulous beast of this name.

To dragoon is to persecute; to coerce. The derivation is obvious from the above. "He was dragooned into" means that he was coerced into it.

Drake's Drum. See under DRUM.

Drama. Father of Danish Drama. Ludwig von Holberg (1684-1754).

Father of French Drama. Étienne Jodelle (1532-1573).

Father of Greek Drama. Thespis (6th century B.C.).

Father of Modern German Drama. Andreas Gryphius (1616-1664).

Father of Spanish Drama. Lope de Vega (1562-1635).

Dramatic Unities. The three dramatic unities, the rules governing the so-called "classical" dramas, are founded on RENAISSANCE misconceptions of passages in ARISTOTLE's Poetics, and are hence often, though very incorrectly, styled the Aristotelian Unities. They are, that in dramas there should be (1) Unity of Action, (2) Unity of Time, (3) Unity of Place. Aristotle lays stress on the first, the second was deduced by Castelvetro (1505-1571), the Italian scholar and critic, from an incidental reference to it by Aristotle, and the third followed almost perforce.

The convention of the three unities was adopted in France, especially after the triumph of Corneille's Le Cid (1636), but met with little success in ENGLAND. SHAKESPEARE, like Aristotle, was only concerned with the Unity of Action but the three unities were purposely adhered to in Ben Johnson's Alchemist (1610).

Dramatis personæ (drām' à tis pēr sō' nē). The characters of a drama, novel or, by extension, of an actual transaction.

Drapier's Letters (drā' pēr). A series of letters written by Dean Swift to the people of Ireland, appearing in 1724 under the signature of M. B. Drapier, rousing them against the copper coinage called WOOD'S HALFPENNY.

Drat. A variant of Od rot! "Od" being a minced form of "God", and the vowel showing the same modifications as in "Gad!" or "Gadzooks!" See OD'S.

Draupnir (drawp' nēr). ODIN'S magic ring, from which every ninth night dropped eight rings equal in size and beauty to itself. It was made by the DWARFS.

Draw. A drawn game, battle, etc. One in which neither side can claim a victory; perhaps so called from a battle in which the troops are drawn off on both sides when no decision seems possible.

A good draw. A first-rate attraction. "Performing elephants are always a good draw at circuses."

Draw it mild! Don't exaggerate! Don't make your remarks (or actions) stronger than necessary. The allusion is to the drawing of ALE.

Hanged, drawn, and quartered. Strictly, the phrase should read Drawn, hanged, and quartered; for the allusion is to the sentence usually passed on those guilty of high treason, which was that they should be drawn to the place of execution on a hurdle or at a horse's tail. Later, drawing (or disembowelling) was added to the punishment after the hanging and before the quartering. Thus the sentence (August 1305) on Sir William WALLACE was that he should be drawn (detrahatur) from the Palace of WESTMINSTER to the TOWER, then hanged (suspendatur), then disembowelled or drawn (devaletur), then beheaded and quartered (decapitetur et decolletur). His quarters were gibbeted at Newcastle, Berwick, Stirling and Perth.

Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough (1750-1818) used to say to those condemned:

"You are drawn on hurdles to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged, but not till you are dead; for, while still living, your body is to be taken down, your bowels torn out and burnt before your face; your head is then cut off, and your body divided into four quarters."
Gentleman's Magazine, 1803.

To draw a badger. See BADGER.

To draw a bead on somebody. To take aim at him with a rifle or revolver. The bead referred to is the foresight.

To draw a bow at a venture; to draw the long bow. See BOW.

To draw a furrow. To plough or to make a furrow.

To draw a person out. To entice a person to speak on any subject, to encourage one too shy to talk, to obtain information.

To draw amiss. To take the wrong direction. A hunting term, to draw meaning to follow a scent.

To draw a veil over. To say no more about a matter; to conceal something from the knowledge of others as a veil conceals a woman's face.

To draw blank. To meet with failure in one's pursuit. The allusion is to sportsmen "drawing" a covert and finding no game. To draw a blank means having no luck in a lottery, etc., to fail in a search.

To draw in one's horns. See under HORN.

To draw the cork. To give one a bloody nose. Cp. CLARET.

To draw the King's, or Queen's picture. To coin false money.

To draw the line. To set a definite limit beyond which one refuses to go; to impose a restriction on one's behaviour for fear of going too far. "He was utterly unprincipled, but he drew the line at blackmail," i.e. he would not stoop to blackmail, he would stop short of that.

To draw the nail. To release oneself from a vow. It was a Cheshire custom to register a vow by driving a nail into a tree, swearing to keep your vow as long as it remained there. If you withdrew the nail, the vow was cancelled.

To draw rations, stores, etc. A military phrase; to go to the place of issue and collect same.

To draw rein. To pull up short, to check one's course.

To draw stumps. At the end of a game of CRICKET the wickets are dismantled, the stumps being drawn out of the ground.

Drawcansir. A bustling braggart, from the burlesque tyrant in Buckingham's Rehearsal (1671). He was a caricature of Dryden's ALMANZOR. Drawcansir's opening speech (he has only three) is:

He that dares drink, and for that drink dares die,
And knowing this, dares yet drink on, am I.
Rehearsal, IV, i.

which parodies Almanzor's:

He who dares love, and for that love must die,
And, knowing this, dares yet love on, am I.
Almanzor, IV, iii.

Cp. BAYES; BOBADIL.

Drawer. Bottom Drawer. The most capacious drawer in a chest is usually at the bottom, and when a young woman who is engaged starts collecting articles for setting up her future home, she is said to be putting them in her bottom drawer.

Out of the top drawer. Upper class, to be of good family, to be of top grade socially. The expression probably derives from the fact that the top drawers of a chest often contain the more valued of one's personal effects.

Drawing-room. Originally the with-drawing room to which the ladies retired after dinner leaving the men to continue their drinking, etc.

Drawing-room of Europe. So NAPOLEON called St. Mark's Square in Venice.

Drawlatch. An old name for a robber, a house-breaker; i.e. one who entered by drawing up the latch with the string provided for the purpose.

Dreadnought. The name given to the 17,900-ton turbine-engined big-gun battleship completed in 1906, the first of a famous class, which greatly influenced subsequent naval construction. The first ship of this name was in use in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I.

The Seamen's Hospital at Greenwich, known as the Dreadnought Hospital, takes its name from the seventh Dreadnought, which was first in action in 1809, and from 1857 was anchored off Greenwich as a seamen's hospital. It was broken up in 1875.

Dreams, The Gates of. There are two, that of ivory and that of horn. Dreams which delude pass through the Ivory Gate, those which come true pass through the Gate of Horn. This fancy depends upon two puns: ivory in Greek is elephas, and the verb elephairo means "to cheat with empty hopes"; the Greek for horn is keras, and the verb karanoo means to accomplish.

That children dream not the first half-year; that men dream not in some countries, with many more, are unto me sick men's dreams; dreams out of the ivory gate, and visions before midnight.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE: On Dreams.

The Immortal Dreamer. John Bunyan (1628-1688), whose allegory, The Pilgrim's Progress, is in the form of a dream.

Drengage. An ancient form of tenure, connected with hunting services. Such service existed on the manors of the Bishop of Durham before the CONQUEST. The word is from Dan. dreng, a boy, a servant.

Thus there are persons holding in "drengage", who have to feed a horse and a dog and "to go in the great hunt (magna casa) with two harriers and 15 cordons", etc.

F. SEEBOHM:

The English Village Community, ch. II, 10.

Dresden China. This fine hard porcelain, which attained such high repute in the 18th century and afterwards, was made at Meissen (some 12 miles from Dresden) from about 1709. Among the many figurines produced there, the Dresden Shepherdess has remained a favourite for daintiness and grace. The factory was established by Augustus II, King of Poland and Elector of Saxony, and its success was the result of the discovery of kaolin at Aue. Every effort was made to retain the process of manufacture, the kaolin was dispatched from Aue in casks sealed by dumb persons and the workmen at Meissen sworn to secrecy, but by 1718 the secret was known in Vienna. In the 1750s beautifully ornamented "table services" were selling at prices between 100 and 1,000 guineas.

Dressed. Dressed to kill. Dressed in the height of fashion. Very smartly dressed. The idea is from that of so dressing to make a conquest or "kill" of one of the opposite sex.

Dreyfusard. An advocate of the innocence of Capt. Alfred Dreyfus (1859-1935), a French artillery officer of Jewish descent who was convicted in 1894 on a charge of betraying military secrets to Germany and sent to DEVIL'S ISLAND. In 1898 Clémenceau and Zola took up his case and Zola wrote his famous open letter J'accuse. In 1899 Dreyfus was retried, but again condemned; but shortly afterwards pardoned. In 1906 the proceedings were finally quashed. The whole affair reflected the greatest discredit on the French military hierarchy of the time.

Drink. Drink-money. A "tip"; a small gratuity to be spent on drinking the health of the giver; a pourboire (Fr. for drink); also money allocated for drink.

Drinking of healths. See GABBARA; HEALTH.

In the drink. In the sea, in the water; long-established nautical slang.

It is meat and drink to me. Something that is almost essential to my well-being; something very much to my liking; just what I appreciate.

It is meat and drink to me to see a clown.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, V, i.

One must drink as one brews. One must take the consequences of one's actions; "as one makes his bed so must he lie on it".

I am grieved it should be said he is my brother, and take these courses: well, as he brews, so shall he drink.

JONSON: Every Man in His Humour, II, i.

The big drink. An American expression for any large stretch of water, such as the Atlantic (cp. HERRING-POND) or Lake Superior.

Those who drink beer will think beer. A saying attributed to Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester (1698-1779). Some non-teetotaler capped it with, "And those that drink water will think water."

To drink at Freeman's Quay. To get one's drink at someone else's expense. It is said, somewhat improbably, that at one time all porters and carmen calling at Freeman's Quay, near London Bridge, had a pot of beer given them gratis.

To drink deep. To take a deep draught; to drink heavily.

A little learning is a dangerous thing;

Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.

POPE: Essay on Criticism, I, 216.

SHAKESPEARE uses the expression metaphorically.

Cant: If it pass against us,
We lose the better half of our possession;

And to the coffers of the king, beside,
A thousand pounds by the year. Thus runs the bill.

Ely: This would drink deep.

Cant: 'Twould drink the cup and all.

Henry V, I, i.

To drink like a fish. To drink abundantly or excessively. Many fish swim open-mouthed, thus appearing to be continually drinking. The expression is found in Beaumont and Fletcher.

To drink the cup of sorrow. To undergo affliction, to suffer one's share of sorrow. "To drink the cup" is used in the sense of "being allotted one's portion".

To drink the waters. To take medicinal waters, especially at a spa.

Drive. He is driving pigs, or driving pigs to market. Said of one who is snoring, because the grunt of a pig resembles the snore of a sleeper.

To drive a coach and four through an Act of Parliament. See under COACH.

To drive a good, or hard bargain. To exact more than is quite equitable.

Heaven would no bargain for its blessings drive.

DRYDEN: Astræa Redux, line 137.

To drive a nail into one's coffin. See under COFFIN.

To drive a point home. To stress a point with the utmost persistence; to ensure the acceptance of one's point and to make sure that it is understood; like driving a nail to its full extent.

To drive a roaring trade. To do a brisk business.

To drive a ship is to press on with full sail.

To drive the swine through the hanks of yarn. To spoil what has been painfully done; to squander thrift. In Scotland, the yarn wrought in the winter (called the gude-wife's thrift) was laid down by the burn-side to bleach, and thus exposed to damage from passing animals, such as from a herd of pigs.

To drive to the wall. To push to extremity; to break or crush.

To let drive. To attack.

Thou knowest my old ward; here I Falstaff lay, and thus I bore my point. Four rogues in buckram let drive at me.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv.

What are you driving at? What do you want to prove? What do you want to infer?

Who drives fat oxen shall himself be fat. Henry Brooke in his Gustavus Vasa (1739) says: "Who rules o'er free-men should himself be free". Dr. Johnson parodied the line—and the sentiment, with which he did not agree.

Droit d'Aubaine (drwa' dô bân). Aubain (Fr.) means "alien", and droit d'aubaine the "right over an alien's property". In France the king was entitled, at the death of foreign residents (except Swiss and Scots), to all their movable estates, a right that was not finally abolished until 1819.

Had I died that night of an indigestion, the whole world could not have suspended the droit d'aubaine. My shirts and black pair of breeches, portmanteau, and all must have gone to the King of France.

STERNE: Sentimental Journey (Intro.).

Dromio (drô' mi ô). The brothers Dromio. Two brothers exactly alike, who served two brothers who were exactly alike. The mistakes of masters and men form the fun of SHAKESPEARE'S Comedy of Errors, based on the Menæchmi of Plautus.

Drone. The male of the honey bee which does no work but lives on the labour of the worker bees; hence a sluggard, an idler, a parasite.

The three lower pipes of a bagpipe are called the drones because they produce a monotonous bass humming like that of a bee.

I am as melancholy as a gib-cat . . . or the drone of a Lincolnshire bagpipe.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, I, ii.

Drop. Acid drop, The. See ACID.

A drop in one's eye. Not exactly intoxicated, but having had quite enough.

We are no fou, we're nae that fou,

But just a drappie in our e'e!

BURNS: Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maun.

A drop in the ocean, or bucket. A negligible or tiny quantity; something that makes little difference.

A drop of the cratur. See CREATURE.

A dropping fire. An irregular fusillade from small-arms, machine-guns, etc.

Dropouts. An American name for those who fail to complete their college courses or those who drift into hoodlum gangs on leaving school.

Drop serene (Lat. gutta serena). An old name for amaurosis, a disease of the optic nerve, causing blindness without affecting the appearance of the eye. It was at one time thought that it was caused by a transparent, watery humour distilling on the nerve.

So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, III, 25.

Prince Rupert's Drops. See RUFERT.

To drop across. To encounter accidentally or casually.

To drop an acquaintance. To allow acquaintanceship to lapse.

To drop in. To make a casual call or informal visit.

To drop off. To fall asleep (especially from weariness). When "friends drop off" they fall away gradually.

To drop someone a line. To write to them.

To drop the pilot. To dismiss a well-tried and trusted leader. The phrase was popularized by Tenniel's famous Punch cartoon (29 March 1890) showing Count von Bismarck, wearing pilot's uniform, being dismissed by Kaiser Wilhelm II.

To get the drop on someone. To have him in your power; a phrase taken from pistol shooting, where it means being ready to shoot before your opponent.

To take a drop. A EUPHEMISM for taking anything from a sip to a DUTCHMAN'S DRAUGHT.

To take one's drops. To drink spirits in private.

Drown. Drowning men catch, or clutch at straws. People in acute danger or desperate circumstances cling in hope to trifles wholly inadequate to be of use.

To drown the miller. See MILLER.

Drows. See TROWS.

Drug. A drug in the market. Something which no one wants, something for which there is little or no demand, especially from there being a surfeit of the particular product in question.

Druids. The ancient order of priestly officials in pre-Roman Gaul, pre-Roman Britain, and IRELAND. They seem to have combined priestly, judicial, and political functions. The Druidic cult presents many obscurities and our main literary sources are Pliny and the Commentaries of CÆSAR. We are told that their rites were conducted in oak-groves, that human sacrifices were offered up, and that they regarded the OAK and MISTLETOE with particular veneration. It is now suggested that the name Druid is derived from some "oak" word. They practised DIVINATION and ASTROLOGY and taught that the soul at death was transferred to another body. Their distinguishing badge was a serpent's egg. (See DRUID'S EGG.)

In the 18th and 19th centuries there was a revival of interest in Druidism and a new romantic and unhistorical cult grew up associated with the Welsh

Eisteddfodau. This is usually termed Neo-Druidism. See EISTEDDFOD.

Druid's Circles. A popular name for circles of standing stones, of which STONEHENGE is the most famous example.

The Druid's Egg. According to Pliny, who claimed to possess one, this wonderful egg was hatched by the joint labour of several serpents and was buoyed in the air by their hissing. The person who caught it had to escape at full speed to avoid being stung to death; but the possessor was sure to prevail in every contest, and to be courted by those in power.

United Ancient Order of Druids. A secret benefit society, akin to FREEMASONRY, founded in London in 1781 and introduced into the U.S.A. in 1833. It now has lodges, or "groves", in many parts of the world.

Druj. See AHRIMAN.

Drum. A popular name in the 18th century and later for a crowded evening party, so called from its resemblance in noise to the drumming up of recruits. The more riotous of these parties were called drum-majors. Cp. HURRICANE; ROUT.

This is a riotous assembly of fashionable people of both sexes, at a private house, consisting of some hundreds, not unaptly stiled a drum, from the noise and emptiness.

SMOLLETT: Advice, a Satire (1746).

A kettle drum. An afternoon tea. An obvious derivative of drum and a pun upon the tea kettle. A tea party was also called a drum.

Drake's Drum. Sir Francis Drake's (c. 1541-1596) drum of legendary fame.

Take my drum to England, hang et by the shore,
Strike et when your powder's runnin' low;
If the Dons sight Devon, I'll quit the port
o'heaven,

An' drum them up the Channel as we drummed them long ago.

SIR HENRY NEWBOLT: Drake's Drum.

John, or Jack Drum's entertainment. Turning an unwelcome guest out of doors.

O! for the love of laughter, let him fetch off his drum; he says he has a stratagem for't. When your lordship sees the bottom of his success in't, and to what metal this counterfeit lump of ore will be melted, if you give him not John Drum's entertainment, your inclining cannot be removed.

SHAKESPEARE: All's Well that Ends Well, III, vi.

John Marston wrote a comedy with the title Jack Drum's Entertainment (1600), in which he is supposed to have satirized Ben Jonson.

Drum ecclesiastic. The pulpit cushion or pulpit, often vigorously thumped by "rousing preachers".

When Gospel-trumpeter, surrounded
With long-ear'd rout, to battle sounded;

And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist instead of a stick.
BUTLER: Hudibras, I, i.

Drum-head court martial. One held in haste in the field to punish on the spot; from the one-time custom of holding it round the big drum.

To be drummed out. To be expelled ignominiously, as a soldier in disgrace was dismissed the regiment to the accompaniment of drum beats.

To drum up. To get together unexpectedly or in an emergency, as "to drum up a meal".

Drumsticks. Legs, especially thin ones. Also the legs of dressed or cooked poultry.

Drummers. An Americanism for commercial travellers, their vocation being to collect customers as a recruiting officer "drums up" recruits. Among criminals, the word is used for women who take domestic employment to pave the way for robbery by their husbands or other accomplices.

Drummond Light. The limelight. So named from the inventor, Thomas Drummond (1797-1840).

Drunk. Drunk as a fiddler, or fiddler's bitch. The fiddler at WAKES, FAIRS, and aboard ship, used to be paid in liquor for playing to the dancers.

Drunk as a lord. Obviously the nobility of bygone days could afford to indulge in excessive drinking if they were so inclined. In the 18th and 19th centuries gross intoxication was common and many men of fashion prided themselves on the number of bottles of wine they could consume at a sitting.

Drunk as blazes. Very drunk. Blazes here means the DEVIL, or HELL, etc., or, as has been suggested, it is a corruption of "blaiziers", i.e. those gildsmen who took part in the feastings and revelry in honour of St. Blaize, the patron saint of wool-combers.

Drunk as Chloe. Chloe was the cobbler's wife of Linden Grove to whom the poet Prior was attached. She was notorious for her drinking habits.

Drunk as David's sow. See DAVY'S SOW. There are many other common similes, such as drunk as a coot, drunk as a newt, drunk as an owl; Chaucer has drunk as a mouse, Massinger drunk as a beggar.

Drunkard's cloak. A tub with holes for the arms to pass through, used in the 17th century for drunkards and scolds by way of punishment.

Drunken Parliament, The. The Parliament assembled at Edinburgh, January

1661, of which Burnet says the members "were almost perpetually drunk".

Drury Lane. This famous London thoroughfare and its theatre takes its name from Drury House, built by Sir William Drury in the time of Henry VIII.

The parent of the present Drury Lane Theatre was opened in 1663 but was burned down nine years later. Its successor was designed by Wren but replaced by a new structure in 1794. This was destroyed by fire in 1809. The present theatre, designed by Wyatt, was opened in 1812. Many famous actors have appeared at Drury Lane, including Garrick, Kemble, and Kean.

Sweet Nell of Old Drury. Nell Gwyn (1651-1687), the one-time orange-seller who became famous as an actress of the Drury Lane Theatre Company and as mistress of King Charles II. She was noted for wit, charm and generosity.

Druses. A people and sect of Syria of 11th-century origin, living about the mountains of Lebanon and Anti-Libanus. Their faith is a mixture of the PENTATEUCH, the GOSPEL, the KORAN and Sufism. They worship in both mosques and churches, but have their own SCRIPTURES. Their name is derived from their first apostle Ismail Ad-darazi.

Dry. I am dry with talking, i.e. I am thirsty after talking so long. Thus to dry up is to cease speaking. Cp. WET. To go dry is to adopt prohibition.

Not dry behind the ears. As innocent as a new-born child. When young animals are born, the last place to become dry after birth is the small depression behind each ear.

Dry-bob. A boy at Eton College who plays CRICKET and football instead of rowing. See WET-BOB.

Dry lodgings. An old expression for sleeping accommodation without board. Gentlemen who took their meals at clubs lived in "dry lodgings".

Dry shave. A shave without lathering the face; to scratch the face and bruise it. To give someone a dry shave is also to rub their cheeks with one's own bristly face.

I'll shave her, like a punished soldier, dry.
PETER PINDAR: The Lousiad, canto ii.

Dry wine. Opposed to sweet. In sweet wine some of the sugar is not yet decomposed; in dry wine all the sugar has been converted into alcohol.

Dryad. In classical mythology, a tree-nymph (Gr. drus, an oak-tree), who was supposed to die when the tree died. Also called Hamadryads (Gr. hama, with). EURYDICE, the wife of ORPHEUS, was a dryad.

Dryasdust. The name given by Scott to the fictitious "reverend doctor", a learned pundit to whom he addressed some of his prefaces, hence a heavy, plodding author, very prosy, very dull, and very learned; an antiquary without imagination.

Dual (Lat. dualis, twofold, divided in two). Dual personality. Used of someone who, on different occasions, reveals two quite different characters.

Dual Monarchy. When two states share the same monarchy but remain politically separate, as in the case of England and Scotland from 1603. The Stuart kings reigned in both countries which, however, remained politically independent of each other until the Act of Union of 1707.

Historically the phrase is specifically applied to Austria-Hungary from the time of the Ausgleich, or Compromise, of 1867 until the collapse of 1918. During this period Francis Joseph was Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary.

Dualism. A system of philosophy which refers all things that exist to two ultimate principles, such as Descartes's Thought (res cogitans) and Extension (res extensa), or—in the theological sense—good and evil. In modern philosophy it is opposed to MONISM and insists that creator and creation, mind and body, are distinct entities.

Dub. The original meaning (from O.E. dubban, to equip with arms) was to confer knighthood by a stroke of a sword; whence it acquired figurative meanings, such as to nickname some thing or person e.g. "he was dubbed a ladies' man".

Dub up. Pay down the money; "fork out". Dub another form of DUP.

Dubglas. See DUGLAS.

Ducat (dük' át). A coin first minted in 1140 by Roger II of Sicily as Duke of the Duchy (ducato) of Apulia. In 1284 the Venetians struck a GOLD coin bearing the legend Sit tibi, Christe, datus, quem tu regis, iste ducatus (may this duchy which you rule be devoted to you, O Christ), and through this the name ducat gained wider use.

Duce (doo' chā) (Ital. leader). The title adopted by Benito Mussolini (1883-1945), the FASCIST dictator of Italy from 1922 to 1943.

Duck. See DUCK'S EGG.

A dead duck. Figuratively, something of no further interest.

At the last election Britain's relationship with Europe was a dead duck.

The Times, 17 June 1966.

A lame duck. A STOCK-JOBBER or dealer who will not, or cannot, pay his losses. he has to "waddle out of the alley like a lame duck". Also a defaulter or one who is disabled.

"I don't like the looks of Mr. Sedley's affairs . . . He's been dabbling on his own account I fear . . . unless I see Amelia's ten thousand down you don't marry. I'll have no lame duck's daughter in my family."

THACKERAY: Vanity Fair, ch. xiii.

Duck Lane. Duck Lane (now Duke Street, leading from LITTLE BRITAIN to Long Lane, in the City of London) in Queen Anne's time was famous for its secondhand bookstalls.

Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain
Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck Lane.
POPE: Essay on Criticism, Pt. II.

Duck's egg. Now always used in the shortened form of "a duck", meaning in CRICKET no score at all. It arose from the resemblance of 0 to a duck's egg. In American usage goose-egg is used for no score at all in a game. See SPECTACLES.

Ducks and drakes. The ricocheting or rebounding of a stone thrown to skim along the surface of a pond, etc. To play ducks and drakes with one's money is to throw it away carelessly, just for the sake of amusement and watching it make a splash.

What figured slates are best to make
On watery surface duck and drake.

BUTLER: Hudibras, II, iii.

Like a dying duck in a thunderstorm. Quite CHOP-FALLEN (under CHOP (3)), very woebegone. Young ducks die speedily of chill if caught by a sudden downpour away from warmth and shelter.

To get one's ducks in a row. An American expression meaning to have one's arrangements completed, to have things organized or lined up; or, literally, to have one's skittles set up. In an American bowling alley the skittles, or pins, are called ducks.

Ducking stool, or Scold's chair. A specially made chair in which the culprit was bound and publicly "ducked" or immersed in the water. It was commonly used until the early 18th century, but its last recorded use in England was at Leominster, Herefordshire, in 1809, when Jenny Pipes was ducked.

Dude. A fop or dandy, a MASHER.

Dude Ranch. In the western states of the U.S.A., one especially organized as a holiday camp for inexperienced riders.

Dudman and Ramhead. When Dudman and Ramhead meet, i.e. NEVER. The DODMAN and Ramehead (as they are now spelt) are two forelands on the south coast of CORNWALL about 23 sea miles apart.

Duds. A very old word of unknown origin once applied to coarse cloaks but now used for clothes of any kind, as "He was dressed in his best duds", or "He was wearing his oldest duds". A dudder or dudsman or dudman is a scarecrow, or a pedlar who sells dress materials, etc.

Duglas. According to the Historia Brittonum by Nennius, King ARTHUR fought twelve great battles against the Saxons. "The second, third, fourth, and fifth, were on another river, by the Britons called Duglas in the region Linius." The topography is vague and the whereabouts of the river Duglas (or Dubglas) is open to conjecture.

Duke (Lat. dux, leader). The title of the highest rank of nobility in Great Britain. The first English dukedom to be created was that bestowed by Edward III on his eldest son the BLACK PRINCE in 1338, when he was raised from Earl of Cornwall to Duke of Cornwall. The title is very rarely conferred except for royal dukes; and since 1874 (when Hugh Lupus Grosvenor, 3rd Marquis of Westminster, was made Duke of Westminster), it has been conferred only on the Earl of Fife, who was created Duke of Fife on his marriage with Princess Louise in 1889. On his death in 1912, his daughter, Princess Arthur of Connaught, became Duchess of Fife in her own right, by special remainder. Prince Philip was created Duke of Edinburgh in 1947. Other than royal dukes there are twenty-six noble dukedoms.

Duke Combe. William Combe (1741-1823), also called Count Combe, author of The Tour of Dr. Syntax, etc., was so called from the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment, in the days of his prosperity. Having spent all his money he turned author, but passed much of his life in the King's Bench Prison. He died at Lambeth. See SYNTAX.

Duke Humphrey. See HUMPHREY.

Duke or Darling. Heads or tails. When the scandals about the Duke of York (1763-1827) and his mistress, Mrs. Mary Anne Clarke, were the talk of the town, boys in the street used to cry Duke or Darling, instead of Heads or Tails.

Iron Duke. See THE GREAT DUKE.

The Duke of Exeter's daughter. The rack. It was introduced into England in 1447, when the Duke of Exeter was Constable of the TOWER, hence the name. The Great Duke. The Duke of Wellington (1769-1852), victor at the battle of Waterloo, also called the IRON DUKE.

To meet one in the Duke's Walk. To fight a duel. Duke's Walk, near Holyrood Palace, was the favourite promenade of the Duke of York (afterwards James II), during his residence in SCOTLAND and it became the common rendezvous for settling "affairs of honour", as did the fields behind the site of the BRITISH MUSEUM in ENGLAND.

Dukeries. A district in Nottinghamshire, so called from the number of noble residences in the vicinity, including Welbeck Abbey (Duke of Portland), Clumber (Duke of Newcastle), Thoresby (Duke of Kingston till 1773), Worksop Manor (formerly Duke of Norfolk).

Dulcarnon (dül kar' non). The horns of a DILEMMA (or syllogismum cornutum); at my wit's end; a puzzling question. From an Arabic word meaning "the possessor of two horns". The 47th proposition of the First Book of EUCLID is called the Dulcarnon (the theorem of PYTHAGORAS), because the two squares which contain the right angle roughly represent horns.

To be at Dulcarnon. To be in a quandary, or on the horns of a dilemma.

"I am, til god me bettere mynde sende,
At dulcarnon, right at my wittes end."
CHAUCER: Troilus and Criseyde, Bk. III, 931.

To send me to Dulcarnon. To daze with puzzles.

Dulce Domum (dül' si dō' mūm). A school holiday song originating at Winchester College. The words mean "the sweet (sound of the word) home" not as often interpreted "sweet home". It is said to have been written by a boy detained, during the WHITSUN holidays, for misconduct "as report says, tied to a pillar". According to tradition he pined away and died. On the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays, the master, scholars and choristers still walk in procession round the pillar, chanting the six stanzas of the song. The music is by John Reading (d. 1692), organist of Winchester Cathedral and of the college.

Dulce domum resonemus.

Let us make the sweet sound of home to resound.

Dulce est desipere in loco (dül' si est dá sip' ér i in lō' kō). It is delightful to play the fool occasionally; it is nice to throw aside one's dignity and relax at the proper time (HORACE: IV Odes, xii, 28).

Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori (dül si et de kōr' um est prō pāt' ri á môr' i). It is sweet and becoming to die on our country's behalf, or to die for one's country (HORACE: III Odes, ii, 13).

Dulcinea (dül sin' ē ä). A lady-love. Taken from the name of the lady to whom DON QUIXOTE paid his knightly homage. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcinea del Toboso.

Dulcinists (dül' si nists). Heretical followers of Dulcinus (in northern Italy) who rejected papal authority and church rites and ceremonies. Dulcinus was burnt (1307) by order of Clement IV.

Dulia. See LATRIA.

Dullness. King of Dullness. So Pope called Colley Cibber (1671-1757), appointed Poet Laureate in 1730.

"God save King Cibber!" mounts in every note. . . .

So when Jove's block descended from on high . . .

Loud thunder to its bottom shook the bog,
And the hoarse nation croaked, "God save King Log!"

POPE: Dunciad, Bk. I.

Dum sola (Lat.). While single or unmarried.

Dum vivimus vivamus (dûm vi vî mûs vi vâ' mûs) (Lat.). While we live, let us enjoy life. This was the motto of the Epicureans. (See EPICURUS.) Catullus has a similar theme: Vivamus, mea Lesbia, atque amemus (Lesbia mine, let us live and love). The motto was adopted on Dr. Doddridge's coat of arms and converted into the following epigram:

"Live, while you live," the epicure would say,
"And seize the pleasures of the present day."
"Live, while you live," the sacred preacher cries,
"And give to God each moment as it flies."
Lord, in my views, let each united be;
I live in pleasure, when I live to thee.

Dumb. Dumb crambo. See CRAMBO.

Dumb Ox, The. St. Thomas Aquinas (1224-1274), known afterwards as "the Angelic Doctor", or "Angel of the Schools". Albertus Magnus, his tutor, said of him: "The dumb ox will one day fill the world with his lowing."

Dumb-waiter. An 18th-century English contribution to the amenities of the DRAWING-ROOM. The mahogany dumb-waiter introduced in the 1730s consisted of two or three circular trays of graduated sizes pivoted on a central stem, the legs of which were on castors. The trays usually contained wine and glasses, etc., thus obviating the need for keeping servants hovering around the guests on social occasions. In the days when servants were noted for making improper use of overheard confidences, the dumb-waiter was a notable asset.

Dumdum. A half-covered steel-cased bullet which expands on impact and causes a very terrible wound. So called from the arsenal at Dumdum, near Calcutta, where they were first made in the 1890s. Their use was proscribed by the Second Hague Conference in 1899. At the time of the INDIAN MUTINY (1857), Dumdum was the scene of the first protests against the "greased cartridges".

Dumps. To be in, or down in the dumps. Out of spirits; Gay's Third Pastoral is Wednesday, or the Dumps.

Why, how now, daughter Katherine? In your dumps?

SHAKESPEARE: The Taming of the Shrew, II, i.

In the 16th century the name was given to any plaintive tune, and also to a slow and mournful sort of dance.

They would have handled me a new way;
The devil's dump had been danced then.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER: The Pilgrim, V, iv.

Dun. One who importunes for payment of a bill. The tradition is that it refers to Joe Dun, a bailiff of Lincoln in the reign of Henry VII. The British Apollo (1708) said he was so active and dexterous in collecting bad debts that when anyone became "slow to pay" the neighbours used to say to the creditors, "Dun him" (send Dun after him).

An Universitie dunne . . . is an inferior creditor of some ten shillings or downwards, contracted for horse hire, or perchance drinke, too weak to be put in suite.

EARLE: Micro-cosmographie (1628).

Squire Dun. The hangman between Richard Brandon (executioner of Strafford, Laud, and Charles) and JACK KETCH (executioner of Russell and Monmouth).

And presently a halter got,
Made of the best strong hempen teer;
And, ere a cat could lick his ear,
Had tied him up with as much art
As Dunn himself could do for's heart

CHARLES COTTON: Virgil Travestied, Bk. IV.

Dun Cow. The savage beast slain by GUY OF WARWICK. A huge tusk, probably that of an elephant, is still shown at Warwick Castle as one of the horns of the dun cow. The fable is that it belonged to a giant, and was kept on Mitchell Fold, Shropshire. Its milk was inexhaustible; but one day an old woman who had filled her pail wanted to fill her sieve also. This so enraged the cow that she broke loose from the fold and wandered to Dunsmore Heath, where she was slain.

On Dunsmore heath I alsoe slewe
A monstrous wyld and cruell beast;
Calld the Dun-cow of Dunsmore heath;
Which manye people had opprest.
Some of her bones in Warwickc yett
Still for a monument doe lye.

PERCY: Reliques (The Legend of Sir Guy).

The Book of the Dun Cow. An early 12th-century manuscript account of earlier Irish romance. It derives its name from the story that it is a copy of those written down on the hide of a cow by St. Kieran of Clonmacnoise in the 6th century.

The Old Dun Cow. A derisive nickname given by the troops to the steamer River Clyde beached at Gallipoli in 1915 during World War I. It was probably a reference to the popular song containing the words "The old Dun Cow she's done for now".

To draw Dun out of the mire. To lend a helping hand to one in distress; to assist when things are at a standstill. The allusion is to an old English game, in which a log of wood, called Dun (a name formerly given to a cart-horse), is supposed to have fallen into the mire, and the players are to pull it out. Each does all he can to obstruct the others, and as often as possible the log is made to fall on someone's toes.

Sires, what? Dun is in the mire.
CHAUCER: Prologue to the Maunciples Tale.

If thou art dun, we'll draw thee from the mire.
SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, iv.

Dunce. A dolt; a stupid person. The word is taken from Duns Scotus (c. 1265-1308), the famous schoolman so called from his birthplace, Dunse, in Scotland. His followers were called Dunsers or SCOTISTS. Tyndal says, when they saw that their hair-splitting divinity was giving way to modern theology, "the old barking curs raged in every pulpit" against the classics and new notions, so that the name indicated an opponent to progress, to learning, and hence a dunce.

Duns Scotus was buried at Cologne; his epitaph reads:

Scotia me genuit, Anglia me suscepit,
Gallia me docuit, Colonia me tenet.

The Parliament of Dunces. Convened by Henry IV at Coventry in 1404, and so called because all lawyers were excluded from it. Also known as the Lawless, and Unlearned Parliament.

Dunciad. The dunce-epic, a satire by Alexander Pope, first published in 1728 with Theobald featuring as the Poet Laureate of the realm of Dullness, but republished with an added fourth part in 1741 with Colley Cibber in that role. Many contemporary writers who were pilloried in this poem would have otherwise been unnoticed by posterity.

Dundreary Whiskers. Lord Dundreary was the chief character in Tom Taylor's Our American Cousin (1858), the personification of a good-natured, indolent, blundering, empty-headed SWELL. E. A. Sothern created the character by the brilliance of his acting and the liberties he took with the original text. The theatrical make-up for the part included long side-whiskers which set a fashion among the young men about town.

Dunedin. See EDINBURGH.

Dunghill! Coward! Villain! this is a cockpit expression; all cocks, except gamecocks, being called dunghills.

Out, dunghill! dar'st thou brave a nobleman?
SHAKESPEARE: King John, IV, iii.

Every cock crows on its own dunghill.
See under COCK.

Dunheved Castle. See CASTLE TERABIL.

Dunkers. See TUNKERS.

Dunkirk. This once notorious haunt of pirates and privateers has acquired fresh associations since World War II. The name is now used figuratively to denote a forced military evacuation by sea to avoid disaster, a speedy and complete withdrawal, an entire abandonment of a position. The allusion is to the heroic evacuation of the main British expeditionary force (26 May-4 June 1940), in the face of imminent disaster, by Vice-Admiral Ramsay's motley force of destroyers, yachts, etc., with essential air cover from R.A.F. Fighter Command.

Dunmow (dün' mō). To eat Dunmow bacon. To live in conjugal amity, without even wishing the marriage knot to be less firmly tied. The allusion is to a custom said to have been instituted by Juga, a noble lady, in 1111, and restored by Robert de Fitzwalter in 1244. It was that any person going to Dunmow, in Essex, and humbly kneeling on two sharp stones at the church door, might claim a gammon of bacon if he could swear that for twelve months and a day he had never had a household brawl or wished himself unmarried.

Between 1244 and 1772 eight claimants were awarded the flitch. Their names merit immortality:

- 1445 Richard Wright, labourer, Bawburgh, near Norwich.
- 1467 Steven Samuel, Little Ayston, Essex.
- 1510 Thomas Ley, fuller, Coggeshall, Essex.
- 1701 William (and Jane) Parsley, butcher, Much-Easton, Essex.
Also John (and Ann) Reynolds of Hatfield Regis.
- 1751 Thomas Shakeshaft, woolcomber, Weathersfield, Essex.
- 1763 Names not recorded.
- 1773 John and Susan Gilder, Tarling, Essex.

Allusions to the custom are frequent in 17th- and 18th-century literature and the custom was revived again in the second half of the 19th century.

"Ah madam! cease to be mistaken;
Few married folk peck Dunmow bacon".
PRIOR: Turtle and Sparrow, 233.

Dunscore. The saut lairds o'Dunscore.

Gentlefolk who have a name but no money. The tale is that the "puir wee lairds of Dunscore" (a parish near Dumfries) clubbed together to buy a stone of salt, which was doled out to the subscribers in spoonfuls, that no one should get more than his due quota.

Duns Scotus. See DUNCE.

Dunstable. Nathan Bailey (d. 1742), lexicographer, gives the etymology of the name of this Bedfordshire town as Duns' stable; adding Duns or "Dunus was a robber in the reign of Henry I, who made it dangerous for travellers to pass that way". The actual derivation is Dunn's (or Duma's) stapol (O.E. for pillar or post).

Downright Dunstable. Very blunt, plain speaking, straightforward; like the Dunstable to London road (a part of Watling Street) which has many long straight stretches. Hence also Plain as the road to Dunstable i.e. quite clear and straightforward.

Dunstable larks. Once a highly prized dish, in the same way as Whitstable oysters. Famed from the 17th century, they were served as a speciality in the local inns, which were much patronized by the visiting gentry.

Dunstan, St. (c. 925-988). Archbishop of Canterbury (961), and patron saint of goldsmiths, being himself a noted worker in GOLD. He is represented in pontifical robes, and carrying a pair of pincers in his right hand, the latter referring to the legend that on one occasion he seized the DEVIL by the nose with a pair of red-hot tongs and refused to release him till he promised never to tempt Dunstan again. See also HORSESHOE.

Dunsterforce. The name given to the men sent to Baku in 1918 under the command of Maj.-Gen. L. C. Dunsterville (1865-1946), who had been a schoolfellow of Rudyard Kipling and was the hero of Stalky and Co. The purpose of this expedition was to prevent the Turks and Germans seizing the oil-wells and Dunsterforce adequately accomplished its object.

Duodecimo (dū ō des' i mō). A book whose sheets are folded into twelve leaves each (Lat. duodecim, twelve), often called "twelvemo", from the contraction 12mo. The book is naturally a small one, hence the expression is sometimes applied to other things or persons of small size. Cp. DECIMO-SEXTO.

Dup is do up. Thus Ophelia says, "he . . . dupp'd the chamber door", i.e. he did up or pushed up the latch, in order to open the door, that he might "let in the maid" (Hamlet, IV, v). Cp. DOFF, DON.

Iche weene the porters are drunk. Will they not dup the gate today.
RICHARD EDWARDS: Damon and Pithias (c. 1564).

Dupes, Day of the. In French history, 11 November 1630 when Marie de' MEDICI, the queen mother, and others sought the overthrow of Louis XIII's minister, Cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal's friends interviewed Louis at Versailles later in the day and by the evening Richelieu was reassured of the royal favour. This was the "day of dupes" for those who counted upon the minister's fall.

Durandal, or Duranda, or Durenda, etc. See ROLAND'S SWORD under ROLAND.

Durden, Dame. A generic name for a good old-fashioned housewife. In the old song she kept five serving girls to carry the milking pails, and five serving men to use the flail and spade; and of course, the five men love the five maids.

'Twas Moll and Bet, Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Draggletail;
And John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail.

Anon.

Dust. Slang for money; probably in allusion to the moralist's contention that money is worthless.

Down with the dust! Out with the money; DUB UP! The expression is at least three hundred years old, and it is said that Swift once took for the text of a charity sermon, "He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord". Having thrice repeated his text, he added: "Now brethren, if you like the security, down with your dust." That ended his sermon.

I'll dust your jacket for you. Give you a good beating; also used with doublet, trousers, pants, etc., in place of jacket.

To bite the dust. See under BITE.

To kiss, or lick the dust. See under KISS.

To raise a dust, to kick up a dust. To make a commotion or disturbance.

To shake the dust from one's feet. To show extreme dislike of a place, and to leave it with the intention of never returning. The allusion is to the Eastern custom.

And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet.—Matt. x, 14.

But the Jews . . . raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts. But they shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came into Iconium. . . .

Acts. xiii, 50, 51.

To throw dust in one's eyes. To mislead. The allusion is to "the swiftest runner in a sandy race, who to make his fellows aloof, casteth dust with his heels into their envious eyes" (Cotgrave, 1611).

The Mohammedans had a practice of casting dust into the air for the sake of confounding the enemies of the Faith. This was done by the Prophet on two or three occasions, as in the battle of Honein; and the KORAN refers to it when it says: "Neither didst thou, O Mahomet, cast dust into their eyes; but it was God who confounded them."

The dustman has arrived, or more usually nowadays "The sandman is about", the "dustman" having lost popularity in nursery talk since the association with refuse collecting. The phrase means that it is bedtime, for the children rub their eyes, as if sand or dust was in them.

Well, it is not so dusty, or Not so dusty. I don't call it bad; rather smart in fact, just as "not bad" is often used to mean "very good". Here dusty means soiled, bad, worthless.

Dustyfoot. See PIEPOWDER COURT.

Dusty Miller. A common nickname, particularly in the Royal Navy, for all those with the surname Miller, just as all Clarks are called "NOBBY", and Bells "Daisy" or "Dinger". Its origin is obvious and appropriate.

Dutch. This word, properly meaning "Hollandish", is the M.Dut. Dutsch or Ger. Deutsch, and formerly denoted the people of Germany or of Teutonic stock, not merely the Low Dutch or Netherlanders. (See PENNSYLVANIA DUTCH.) The derogatory implications of some of the undermentioned phrases derive from the Anglo-Dutch wars of the 17th century.

Dutch auction. An auction in which the auctioneer offers the goods at gradually decreasing prices, the first bidder to accept becoming the purchaser; to reverse the process of a normal auction.

Dutch bargain, or wet bargain. A bargain settled over drinks, the Dutch being formerly reputed to be steady drinkers.

Dutch collar. A horse collar.

Dutch comfort. Cold comfort, i.e. things might have been worse.

Dutch concert. A great noise and uproar, like that made by a party of drunken Dutchmen, some singing, others quarrelling, speechifying, etc.

Dutch courage. The courage exerted by drink; POT VALOUR. The Dutch were considered heavy drinkers. Cp. DUTCH BARGAIN.

Dutch cousins. Close friends, a play upon COUSINS GERMAN.

Dutch defence. A sham defence.

To confess the truth, I am afraid Mr. Jones maintained a kind of Dutch defence, and treacherously delivered up the garrison, without duly weighing his allegiance to the fair Sophia.

FIELDING: Tom Jones, IX, v.

Dutch gleek. Tippling. GLEEK is a game and the name implies that the game loved by Dutchmen is drinking.

Nor could be partaker of any of the good cheer except it were the liquid part of it, which they call "Dutch Gleek".

GAYTON: Pleasant Notes upon Don Quixote (1654).

Dutch gold. "German" gold, an alloy of copper and zinc, yellow in colour, which easily tarnishes unless lacquered. Imitation gold leaf is made from it, hence the name Dutch leaf. It is also called Dutch metal.

Dutch nightingales. Frogs. Similarly we have Cambridgeshire nightingales; Liège nightingales, etc.

Dutch talent. That which is not done in true nautical and shipshape fashion, more the result of brawn than brain.

Dutch treat. A meal, amusement, etc., at which each person pays for himself.

Double Dutch. See under DOUBLE.

In Dutch. In prison.

My old Dutch. Here the word is a contraction of duchess and has nothing to do with Holland or Germany. It is a colloquial term for one's wife, especially the wife of a coster, as in the song My Old Dutch. See ALBERT THE GREAT.

The Dutch have taken Holland. A quiz when anyone tells what is well known as a piece of wonderful news. Similar to Queen Bess (or Queen Anne) is dead.

Dutchman. I'm a Dutchman if I do. A strong refusal. During the Anglo-Dutch rivalry of the 17th century the name was synonymous with all that was despicable and when a man said, "I would rather be a Dutchman than do what you ask me," he used the strongest possible terms of refusal.

If not, I'm a Dutchman, means, I will do it, or I will call myself a Dutchman.

The Flying Dutchman. See under FLY.

Well, I'm a Dutchman! An exclamation of strong incredulity.

Duty

Dutchman's breeches, or sailor's trousers. Two patches of blue appearing in a stormy sky giving the promise of better weather, i.e. enough blue sky to make a Dutchman (or sailor) a pair of breeches.

The plant Dicentra cucullaria is also called Dutchman's Breeches from its two-spurred flowers.

Dutchman's draught. A "big swig", a copious draught; one of the many allusions to the Dutchman's reputed fondness for heavy drinking. Cp. DUTCH COURAGE; DUTCH GLEEK, etc.

Dutchman's log. A rough method for finding a ship's speed by throwing a piece of wood, etc., into the sea well forward and timing its passage between two marks on the vessel of known distance apart.

Duty means what is due or owing, a debt which should be paid. In this sense it is applied to taxes levied by a government on certain classes of goods, hence we speak of customs duties, revenue duties, excise duties, etc.

England expects that every man will do his duty. Nelson's famous signal to his fleet before the battle of Trafalgar. The intended signal was "England confides, etc.", but the signal officer obtained permission to substitute "expects" in order to save seven hoists as the word "confides" was not in the signal book.

Dwarf. Dwarfs have figured in the legends and mythology of nearly every people, and the success of Walt Disney's children's classic Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs (1938) is evidence of their enduring appeal. Pliny gives particulars of whole races of them, possibly following travellers' tales of African pygmies. They are prominent in Teutonic and Scandinavian legend and generally dwelt in rocks and caves, and recesses of the earth. They were guardians of mineral wealth and precious stones and very skilful at their work. They were not unfriendly to man, but could on occasions be intensely vindictive and mischievous.

In England, dwarfs or midgets were popular down to the 18th century as court favourites or household pets. In later times they were often exhibited as curiosities at circuses, etc.

Among those recorded in legend or history (with their reputed heights) the following are, perhaps, the most famous:

ALBERICH, the dwarf of the NIBELUNGENLIED.

ANDROMEDA and CONOPAS, each 2 ft. 4 in. Dwarfs of Julia, niece of Augustus.

BEBE, or NICHOLAS FERRY, 2 ft. 9 in. A native of France (1714-1737). He had a brother and sister, both dwarfs.

BORUWLASKI (Count Joseph), 3 ft. 3 in. (d. 1837).

CHE-MAH (a Chinaman), 2 ft. 1 in., weight 52 lb.

Exhibited in London in 1880.

COLOBRI (Prince) of Sleswig, 2 ft. 1 in., weight 25 lb. at the age of twenty-five (1851).

CONOPAS. See ANDROMEDA, above.

COPPERNIN, the dwarf of the Princess of Wales, mother of George III. The last court dwarf in England.

CRACHAMI (Caroline). Born at Palermo; 1 ft. 8 in. (1814-1824). Exhibited in Bond Street, London, 1824.

DECKER, or DUCKER (John), 2 ft. 6 in. An Englishman (1610).

FAIRY QUEEN (The), 1 ft. 4 in., weight 4 lb. Exhibited in Regent Street, London, 1850. Her feet were less than two inches.

GIBSON (Richard), a good portrait painter (1615-1690). His wife's maiden name was Anne Shepherd. Each measured 3 ft. 10 in. Waller sang their praises:

Design or chance makes others wive,

But Nature did this match contrive.

HUDSON (Sir Jeffery). Born at Oakham, Rutland; 3 ft. 9 in. at the age of thirty (1619-1682); he figures in Scott's Peveril of the Peak.

JARVIS (John), 2 ft. Page of honour to Queen Mary (1508-1556).

LOLKES (Wybrand), 2 ft. 3 in., weight 57 lb. Exhibited at Astley's in 1790.

LUCIUS, 2 ft., weight 17 lb. The dwarf of the Emperor Augustus.

MAGRI (Count Primo), see WARREN, below.

MARINE (Lizzie), 2 ft. 9 in., weight 45 lb.

MIDGETS (The). Lucia Zarate, the elder sister, 1 ft. 8 in., weight 4½ lb., at the age of eighteen. Her sister was a little taller. Exhibited in London, 1881.

NUTT, COMMODORE. See TOM THUMB, below.

PAAP (Simon). A Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 4 in., weight 27 lb.

SAWYER (A.L.), 2 ft. 6½ in., weight 39 lb. Editor in 1833 of the Democrat, a paper of considerable repute in Florida.

STOBERIN (C.H.), of Nuremberg, 2 ft. 11 in. at the age of twenty.

STOCKER (Nanette), 2 ft. 9 in. Exhibited in London in 1815.

STRASSE DAVIT Family. Man, 1 ft. 8 in.; woman, 1 ft. 6 in.; child at seventeen only 6 in.

TERESIA (Madame). A Corsican, 2 ft. 10 in., weight 27 lb. Exhibited in London, 1773.

TOM THUMB (General), whose name was Charles S. Stratton, born at Bridgeport in Connecticut, U.S.A. (1838-1883). Exhibited first in London in 1844. In 1863 he married Lavinia WARREN, and was then 31 in. in height, she being 32 in. and 21 years old. They visited England in the following year with their dwarf son, Commodore NUTT.

WANNER (Lucy). 2 ft. 6 in., weight 45 lb. Exhibited in London 1801, at the age of forty-five.

WARREN (Lavinia). See TOM THUMB above. In 1884 she married another dwarf, Count Primo Magri, who was 2 ft. 8 in.

WORMBERG (John), 2 ft. 7 in. at the age of thirty-eight (Hanoverian period).

XIT was the dwarf of Edward VI.

ZARATE. See MIDGETS, above.

The Black Dwarf. A GNOME of the most malignant character, once held by the dalesmen of the BORDER as the author of all the mischief that befell their flocks and herds. In Scott's novel of this title (1816), the name is given to Sir Edward Mauley, alias Elshander, the recluse, Cannie Elshie, and the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor.

Dwt. D-wt., i.e. denarius-weight (penny-weight). Cp. CWT.

Dye. A villain of the deepest dye. One steeped in villainy, a villain of the worst kind.

Dyed in the wool. Thorough-going, 100 per cent (16th-century origin).

Dying Sayings. Many of them are either apocryphal or have survived in inaccurate versions.

ADAMS (President): "Independence for ever."

ADAMS (John Q.): "It is the last of earth. I am content."

ADDISON: "See in what peace a Christian can die."

ALBERT (Prince Consort): "I have such sweet thoughts." Or, "I have had wealth, rank, and power; but, if these were all I had, how wretched I should be!"

ALEXANDER I (of Russia; to his wife Elizabeth): "Que vous devez être fatiguée."

ALEXANDER II (of Russia): "I am sweeping through the gates, washed in the blood of the Lamb."

ALFIERI: "Clasp my hand, dear friend, I am dying."

ANAXAGORAS (the philosopher, who kept a school; being asked if he wished for anything, replied): "Give the boys a holiday."

ANTONY (of Padua): "I see my God. He calls me to Him."

ARCHIMEDES (being ordered by a Roman soldier to follow him, replied): "Wait till I have finished my problem."

AUGUSTUS (to his friends): "Do you think I have played my part pretty well through the farce of life?"

BACON (Francis): "My name and memory I leave to men's charitable speeches, to foreign nations and to the next age."

BECKET (Archbishop; before he was struck dead by Sir William de Tracy): "I am prepared to die for Christ and His Church."

BEDE (The Venerable; having dictated the last sentence of his translation of St. John's Gospel, and being told by the Scribe that the sentence was now written): "It is well; you have said the truth: it is indeed."

BEECHER (Henry Ward): "Now comes the mystery."

BEETHOVEN (who was deaf): "I shall hear in heaven."

BLOOD (Colonel): "I do not fear death."

BOILEAU: "It is a great consolation to a poet on the point of death that he has never written a line injurious to good morals."

BOLEYN (Anne): "The executioner is, I believe, very expert; and my neck is very slender."

BURKE: "God bless you."

BURNS: "Don't let the awkward squad fire over my grave."

BYRON: "I must sleep now."

CÆSAR (to Brutus, his most intimate friend when he stabbed him): "Et tu, Brute?"

CASTLEREAGH (said to his doctor): "Bankhead, let me fall into your arms. It is all over."

CATSBY (one of the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot): "Stand by me, Tom, and we will die together."

CATO THE YOUNGER (on seeing that the sword's point was sharp and before thrusting it into his body): "Now I am master of myself."

CAVELL (Nurse; before facing the German firing party in 1915): "Patriotism is not enough. I must have no hatred or bitterness towards anyone."

CHARLEMAGNE: "Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit". Cp. COLUMBUS, LADY JANE GREY, and TASSO.

CHARLES I (just before he laid his head on the block, to Juxon, Archbishop of Canterbury): "Remember."

CHARLES II: "I have been a most unconscionable time a-dying; but I hope you will excuse it." (To his brother, James II): "Do not, do not let poor Nelly starve."

CHARLES VIII (of France): "I hope never again to commit a mortal sin, nor even a venial one, if I can help it."

CHARLES IX (of France, in whose reign occurred the Massacre of St. BARTHOLOMEW): "Nurse, nurse, what murder! what blood! O! I have done wrong: God pardon me."

CHESTERFIELD (Lord): "Give Dayrolles a chair."

CHRYSOSTOM: "Glory to God for all things. Amen."

CICERO (to his assassins): "Strike."

COKE (Sir Edward): "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done."

COLIGNY (to the German who assassinated him): "Honour these grey hairs, young man."

COLUMBUS: "Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." Cp. CHARLEMAGNE and TASSO.

COPERNICUS: "Now, O Lord, set Thy servant free." (See Luke ii, 29.)

CRANMER (as he held in the flames his right hand which had signed his apostasy): "That unworthy hand! That unworthy hand!"

CROMWELL: "My design is to make what haste I can to be gone."

CUVIER (to the nurse who was applying leeches): "Nurse, it was I who discovered that leeches have red blood."

DANTON (to the executioner): "Be sure you show the mob my head. It will be a long time ere they see its like."

DARWIN: "I am not in the least afraid to die."

DEMONAX (the philosopher): "You may go home, the show is over" (Lucian). Cp. RABELAIS.

DIDEROT: "The first step towards philosophy is incredulity."

DOUGLAS: "Fight on, my merry men."

EDWARD I: "Carry my bones before you on your march, for the rebels will not be able to endure the sight of me, alive or dead."

EDWARDS (Jonathan): "Trust in God, and you need not fear."

ELDON (Lord): "It matters not where I am going whether the weather be cold or hot."

ELIZABETH I: "All my possessions for a moment of time."

ELLIOTT (Ebenezer): "A strange sight, sir, an old man unwilling to die."

ENGHIEN (Duc d'; shot by order of Napoleon I in 1804): "I die for my king and for France."

EPAMINONDAS (wounded; on being told that the Thebans were victorious): "Then I die happy." Cp. WOLFE.

ETTY: "Wonderful Wonderful this death!"

FONTENELLE: "I suffer nothing, but I feel a sort of difficulty in living longer."

FOX (C. J.; to his wife): "It don't signify, my dearest, dearest Liz."

FOX (George, the Quaker): "Never heed the Lord's power is over all weakness and death."

FREDERICK V (of Denmark): "There is not a drop of blood on my hands." Cp. PERICLES.

GAINSBOROUGH: "We are all going to heaven and Van Dyck is of the company."

GARTH (Sir Samuel; to his physicians—Garth was a doctor himself): "Dear gentlemen, let me die a natural death."

GASTON DE FOIX: "I am a dead man! Lord, have mercy upon me!"

GEORGE IV (said to his page, Sir Walthen Waller): "Wally, what is this? It is death, my boy. They have deceived me."

GOETHE: "Light, more light!"

GRANT (General): "I want nobody distressed on my account."

GRATTON: "I am perfectly resigned. I am surrounded by my family. I have served my country. I have reliance upon God and I am not afraid of the Devil."

GREBLEY (Horace): "It is done."

- PITT (William, the Younger): "My country! How I leave my country!"
- PLATO: "I thank the guiding providence and fortune of my life, first, that I was born a man and a Greek, not a barbarian nor a brute; and next, that I happened to live in the age of Socrates."
- POE (Edgar Allan): "Lord, help my soul!"
- POMPADOUR (Madame de): "Stay a little longer, M. le Curé, and we will go together."
- POPE: "Friendship itself is but a part of virtue."

QUIN (the actor): "I could wish this tragic scene were over, but I hope to go through it with becoming dignity."

RABELAIS: "Let down the curtain, the farce is over." Cp. DEMONAX. Also, "I am going to seek the great perhaps."

RALEIGH (said on the scaffold where he was beheaded): "It matters little how the head lies, so the heart be right."

RENAN: "We perish, we disappear, but the march of time goes on for ever."

REYNOLDS (Sir Joshua): "I know that all things on earth must have an end, and now I am come to mine."

RHODES (C. 7): "So little done, so much to do."

RICHARD I: "Youth, I forgive thee!" (Said to Bertrand de Gourdon, who shot him with an arrow at Chalus. Then, to his attendants, he added): "Take off his chains, give him 100 shillings, and let him go."

RICHARD III (at Bosworth, where his best men deserted him): "Treason! treason!"

ROLAND (Madame; on her way to the guillotine): "O Liberty! What crimes are committed in thy name!"

ROSCOMMON (Earl of):
 "My God, my Father, and my Friend,
 Do not forsake me at my end."
 (Quoting from his own translation of the Dies Irae.)

RUSSELL (Lord; executed 1683): "The bitterness of death is now past."

SALADIN: "When I am buried, carry my winding-sheet on the point of a spear, and say these words: Behold the spoils which Saladin carries with him! Of all his victories, realms and riches, nothing remains to him but this." Cp. SEVERUS.

SCARRON: "Ah, my children, you cannot cry for me so much as I have made you laugh."

SCHILLER: "Many things are growing plain and clear to my understanding."

SCOTT (Sir Walter; to his family): "God bless you all, I feel myself again."

SERVETUS (at the stake): "Christ, Son of the eternal God, have mercy upon me." (Calvin insisted on his saying, "the eternal Son of God" but he would not, and was burnt to death.)

SEVERUS: "I have been everything, and everything is nothing. A little urn will contain all that remains of one for whom the whole world was too little." Cp. SALADIN.

SHERIDAN: "I am absolutely undone."

SIDNEY (Sir Philip; to his brother Robert): "Govern your will and affections by the will and word of your creator: in me beholding the end of this world with all her vanities."

SIWARD (the Dane): "Lift me up that I may die standing, not lying down like a cow." Cp. VESPASIAN.

SOCRATES: "Crito, I owe a cock to Æsculapius."
 STAEL (Madame de): "I have loved God, my father, and liberty."

STEPHEN (the first Christian martyr): "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."

STRAFFORD (before his execution in 1641): "Put not your trust in princes."

TASSO: "Lord, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." Also recorded of Charlemagne, Lady Jane Grey, Columbus, and others.

TAYLOR (General Zachary): "I have tried to do my duty, and am not afraid to die. I am ready."

TAYLOR (the "Water-Poet"): "How sweet it is to rest!"

TENTERDEN (Lord Chief Justice): "Gentlemen of the jury, you may retire."

THERAMENES (the Athenian condemned by Critias to drink hemlock, said as he drank the poison): "To the health of the fair Critias."

THISTLEWOOD (executed for high treason, 1820): "I shall soon know the grand secret."

THORAU: "I leave this world without a regret."

THURLOW (Lord): "I'll be shot if I don't believe I'm dying."

TYNDALE: "Lord, open the eyes of the King of England [i.e. Henry VIII]."

VANE (Sir Harry): "It is a bad cause which cannot bear the words of a dying man."

VESPASIAN: "A king should die standing" (see SIWARD); but his last words were "Ut puto, deus fio," i.e. "I suppose I am now becoming a god," referring to the apotheosization of Cæsars after death.

VICTORIA (Queen; referring to the war in South Africa then in progress): "Oh, that peace may come."

VOLTAIRE: "Do let me die in peace."

WASHINGTON: "It is well. I die hard, but am not afraid to go."

WEBSTER (Daniel): "Life, life! Death, death! How curious it is!"

WESLEY (Charles): "I shall be satisfied with Thy likeness—satisfied."

WESLEY (John): "The best of all is, God is with us."

WILLIAM (the Silent): "O my God have mercy upon my soul! O my God, have mercy upon this poor people!"

WILSON (the ornithologist): "Bury me where the birds will sing over my grave."

WISHART (at the stake): "I fear not this fire."

WOLCOT ("Peter Pindar"): "Give me back my youth!"

WOLFE (General): "What! do they run already? Then I die happy." Cp. EPAMINONDAS.

WOLSEY (Cardinal): "Had I but served God as diligently as I have served the King, He would not have given me over in my grey hairs."

WORDSWORTH: "God bless you! Is that you, Dora?"

ZISKA (John): "Make my skin into drum-heads for the Bohemian cause."

Dymoke. The name of the family which has held the office of CHAMPION OF ENGLAND since the coronation of Richard II (1377).

Dymphna (dim' ná). The patron saint of the insane. She is said to have been the daughter of a 6th-century Irish chieftain, who fled to Gheel in Belgium to escape her father's incestuous attentions, and devoted herself to charitable works. She was eventually murdered by her father. In art she is shown dragging away a devil. Gheel has long been a centre for the treatment of the mentally afflicted.

Dysmas (diz' mäs). The traditional name of the Penitent Thief, who suffered with Christ at the Crucifixion. His relics are claimed by Bologna, and in some calendars he is commemorated on 25 March. In the apocryphal GOSPEL OF NICODEMUS he is called Dimas (and elsewhere Titus), and the Impenitent Thief Gestas.

In Longfellow's The Golden Legend (The Miracle Play, V), Dumachus (Dysmas) and Titus both belonged to a band of robbers who molested the HOLY FAMILY on their flight into Egypt.

Dyvour (di' vör). The old name in Scotland for a bankrupt (Fr. devoir, to owe). From the 17th century Dyvours were by law compelled to wear an upper garment half yellow and half brown, with part-coloured cap and hose. This requirement was not formally abolished until 1836.

Dyzemas Day (diz' mäs). Tithe day (Port. dizimas, tithes; Lat. decima, a tenth part, a tithe).

E

E. This letter is derived from the Egyptian hieroglyph , and the Phœnician and Hebrew sign called he.

The following legend is sometimes found in churches under the two tables of the Ten Commandments:

PRSVR Y PRFCT MN
VR KP THS PRCPTS TN

The vowel e
Supplies the key.

E.G., e.g. (Lat. exempli gratia). By way of example; for instance.

E pluribus unum (ē ploō' ri bus ū' nūm) (Lat.). One out of many. It is taken from Moretum (l. 103), a Latin poem attributed to VIRGIL, and was long regarded as the motto of the United States of America; but, in 1956, Congress formally adopted the motto "In God we trust".

Eager beaver. An American expression in World War II for an over-zealous recruit whose keenness was marked by volunteering on every possible occasion, and subsequently applied in civilian life to similar enthusiasts.

Eagle. In mythology, the eagle commonly represents the SUN, but in Scandinavian myth is usually associated with storm and gloom. It is also emblematic of courage, immortality, etc. In Christian art, it is the symbol of ST. JOHN THE EVANGELIST (hence its use on church lecterns), St. Augustine, ST. GREGORY THE GREAT, and ST. PRISCA. Emblematically, or in HERALDRY, the eagle is a charge of great honour. It was called the Bird of JOVE by the Romans and was borne on their military standards; and they used to let an eagle fly from the funeral pile of a deceased emperor, symbolizing the reception of his soul among the Gods. Dryden alludes to this custom in the opening stanza of his poem on the death of Oliver Cromwell:

Like eager Romans ere all rites were past,
Did let too soon the sacred eagle fly.

An eagle is also an American gold ten-dollar piece, first coined in 1795.

The Golden Eagle and the Spread Eagle are commemorative of the CRUSADES and were the devices of the Eastern Roman Empire. France (under the Empires), Germany, Austria, Prussia and Russia also adopted the eagle as a royal or imperial emblem. See THE TWO-HEADED EAGLE.

The white-headed American eagle, Haliaetus leucocephalus (sometimes wrongly termed the Bald Eagle), with outspread wings or spread-eagle (the "eagle displayed" of HERALDRY) is specifically the emblem of the U.S.A.

The term spread-eaglesism denotes bombastic display and ostentation of speech or action, especially of vulgar patriotism, and in the United States was the counterpart of JINGOISM in Britain. In the navy a man was said to be spread-eagled when he was lashed to the rigging for flogging, with outstretched arms and legs.

The Two-headed Eagle. The German eagle has its head turned to our left hand and the Roman eagle to our right hand. CHARLEMAGNE, as successor to the Roman emperors, is said to have adopted the eagle as a badge, but the two-headed eagle, reputedly symbolizing the eastern and western divisions of the empire, did not appear on the arms of the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE until the early 15th century. It was retained by the Austrian Emperors as successors to the Holy Roman Emperors. In 1472 Ivan III of Russia assumed the two-headed eagle after his marriage to Sophia, daughter of Thomas Palæologus, and niece of Constantine XIV.

An eagle eye. One with keen and piercing sight; figuratively used of acute intellectual vision.

Eagle stones. See ÆTITES.

Grand eagle. Paper, 28 $\frac{3}{4}$ in. by 42 in.; so called from a watermark first met with in 1314.

The Eagle. Gaudenzio Ferrari (c. 1480–1549), the Milanese painter.

The Eagle of Brittany. Bertrand Du Guesclin (1320–1380), Constable of France.

The Eagle of the Divines. St. THOMAS AQUINAS (c. 1225–1274).

The Eagle of the Doctors of France. Pierre d'Ailly (1350–1420), French cardinal and schoolman, who helped to end the Papal schism.

The Eagle of Meaux. Jacques Bénigne Bossuet (1627–1704), Bishop of Meaux, the great pulpit orator, theologian, and historian.

The Eagle of the North. Count Axel Oxenstierna (1583–1654), the Swedish statesman.

The Eagle and Child. The crest of the Stanley family and Earls of Derby, and a well-known PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGN. The legend is that Sir Thomas Latham, an ancestor of the house, caused his illegitimate son to be placed under the foot of a tree in which an eagle had built its nest. When out walking with his wife, they "accidentally" found the child, which he persuaded her to adopt as their heir. Later he changed his mind and left most of his wealth to his daughter, and the family altered the eagle crest of Sir Thomas to that of an eagle preying upon a child.

The eagle does not hawk at flies. See AQUILA NON CAPTAT MUSCAS.

Land of the White Eagle. See under LAND.

Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's (Ps. ciii, 5). This refers to the ancient superstition that every ten years the eagle soars into the "fiery region", and plunges into the sea, where, moulting its feathers, it acquires new life. Cp. PHOENIX.

At last she saw where he upstarte brave
Out of the well, wherein he drenched lay:
As eagle fresh out of the ocean wave,
Where he hath lefte his plumes all hory gray,
And deckt himself with feathers youthly gay.
SPENSER: Faerie Queene, I, xi, 34.

Ear (O.E. eare). If your ears burn someone is talking about you. This is a very old superstition; Pliny says, "When our ears do glow and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence." In SHAKESPEARE'S Much Ado About Nothing (III, i), Beatrice says when Ursula and Hero had been talking of her, "What fire is in mine ears?" Sir Thomas Browne ascribes the conceit to guardian angels, who touch the right ear if the talk is favourable and the left if otherwise. This is done to cheer or warn.

One ear tingles; some there be
That are snarling now at me.
HERRICK: Hesperides.

About one's ears. Causing trouble. The allusion is to a hornet's nest buzzing about one's head; thus "to bring the house about one's ears" is to set the whole family against one.

Bow down thine ear. Condescend to hear or listen (Ps. xxxi, 2).

By ear. To sing or play by ear is to sing or play without reading the music, depending on the ear alone.

Dionysius's Ear. A bell-shaped chamber connected by an underground passage to the king's palace which enabled the tyrant of Syracuse to overhear the conversation of his prisoners. A similar whispering gallery exists beneath Hastings Castle. It is cut from the solid rock and the listening post is again shaped like an ear.

Give ear to. Listen to; give attention to.
I am all ear. All attention.

I was all ear,
And took in strains that might create a soul
Under the ribs of death.
MILTON: Comus, 560.

In one ear and out of the other. Forgotten as soon as heard.

the sermon . . . of Dame Resoun . . .
It toke no sojour in myn hede.
For alle yede out at oon er
That in at that other she did leve.
Romaunt of the Rose, 5148 (c. 1400).

Lend me your ears. Pay attention to what I am about to say.

Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears;
I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.
SHAKESPEARE: Julius Cæsar, III, ii.

Little pitchers have long ears. See PITCHER.

Mine ears hast thou bored. Thou hast accepted me as thy bond-slave for life. If a Hebrew servant declined to go free after six years' service, the master was to bore his ear with an awl, in token of his voluntary servitude for life (Exod. xxi, 6).

No ear. A bad ear for music, the opposite of a good ear.

Over head and ears, or up to the ears. Wholly, desperately; said of being in love, debt, trouble, etc.

To be sent off with a flea in your ear. See under FLEA.

To be willing to give one's ears. To be prepared to make a considerable sacrifice. The allusion is to the old practice of cutting off the ears for various offences.

To come to the ears of. To come to someone's knowledge, especially by hearsay.

To fall together by the ears. To fight and scuffle together; to contend in strife. See TO SET PEOPLE TOGETHER BY THE EARS below.

To get the wrong sow by the ear. See under SOW.

To have itching ears. To enjoy scandal-mongering, hearing news or current gossip (II Tim. iv, 3).

To have one's ear to the ground. To be alert and well informed of what is taking place, to be alive to the probable trend of events. A figure derived from woodcraft.

To prick up one's ears. To listen attentively to something not expected, as horses prick up their ears at a sudden sound.

Earl

Like unbacked colts, they pricked their ears.

SHAKESPEARE: Tempest, IV, i.

To set people together by the ears. To create ill will among them; to set them quarrelling and, metaphorically, pulling each others ears as dogs do when fighting.

When civil dudgeon first grew high,
And men fell out, they knew not why;
When hard words, jealousies, and fears
Set folks together by the ears.

BUTLER: Hudibras (opening lines).

To tickle the ears. To gratify the ear either by pleasing sounds or gratifying words.

To turn a deaf ear. To refuse to listen; to refuse to accede to a request.

Walls have ears. See under WALL.

Within earshot. Within hearing.

You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. See under SILK.

Ear-finger. The little finger, which, because of its convenient size, is thrust into the ear when it tickles.

Ear-marked. Marked so as to be recognized; figuratively, something allocated or set aside for a special purpose. The allusion is to owner's marks on the ears of cattle and sheep.

Ears to Ear Bible, The. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Earing. Ploughing (O.E. erian, to plough; cp. Lat. aro).

And yet there are five years, in which there shall neither be earing nor harvest.—Gen. xiv, 6.

Earl (O.E. eorl, a man of position in opposition to a ceorl or churl; cp. Dan. jarl). The third in dignity in the British peerage, ranking next below MARQUESS. In later Anglo-Saxon England, earls became important administrative officers commanding the MILITIA of their areas, and their growing political power is exemplified by that of Earl Godwin. William the Conqueror tried to introduce the name COUNT unsuccessfully, but the wife of an earl is still called a countess. An earl's coronet has eight silver balls mounted on gold rays which reach to the top of the cap, with small strawberry leaves alternating between them. Cp. VISCOUNT.

The sheriff is called in Latin vice-comes, as being the deputy of an earl or comes, to whom the custody of a shire is said to have been committed.

BLACKSTONE: Commentaries, I, ix.

Earl Marshal. The officer of State who presides over the College of Arms, grants armorial bearings and is responsible for the arrangements of State ceremonials, processions, etc. Since 1483 the office has been hereditary in the line of the Dukes of Norfolk.

'Tis the list
Of those that claim their offices this day,
By custom of the coronation . . .

. . . next, the Duke of Norfolk,

He to be earl marshal.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, IV, i.

Earl of Mar's Grey-Breeks. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Earth. Down to earth. Forthright and plain spoken.

Gone to earth. Gone into hiding. A figure derived from fox-hunting.

The ends of the earth. See under END.

To come back to earth. To abandon fantasy for reality.

To run something to earth. To trace something to its source, as a fox is chased or traced to its earth.

Earthquakes. According to Indian mythology the world rests on the head of a great elephant, "Muhu-pudma", and when, for the sake of rest, the huge monster refreshes itself by moving its head, an earthquake is produced.

The lamas say that the earth is placed on the back of a gigantic frog and when it moves its limbs or head it shakes the earth. Other Eastern myths place the earth on the back of a tortoise.

Greek and Roman mythologists ascribe earthquakes to the restlessness of the giants whom JUPITER buried under high mountains. Thus VIRGIL (Aeneid, III, 578) ascribes the eruption of Etna to the giant ENCELADUS.

Earwig (O.E. ear-wicga, ear-beetle). So called from the erroneous notion that these insects are apt to enter the ears and penetrate the brain.

Metaphorically, one who whispers scandal, etc., in order to CURRY FAVOUR.

Ease. From O.Fr. eise, Mod. Fr. aise.

At ease. Resting; without pain or anxiety.

Chapel of Ease. See CHAPEL.

Ill at ease. Uneasy, anxious, uncomfortable.

Stand at ease! A military command for a position less rigid than attention, with the feet apart and the hands joined behind the back.

Stand easy. In military drill a position in which relaxation is permitted, short of moving away. In the Royal Navy a short break during working hours is called a stand easy.

To ease one of his money, or purse. To steal it.

East. In the Christian Church the custom of turning to the east when the creed is repeated is to express the belief that Christ is the Dayspring and Sun of Righteousness. The altar is placed at the east end of the church to remind us of Christ, the DAYSPRING and Resurrection; and persons are buried with their feet to the East to signify they died in the hope of the Resurrection.

The ancient Greeks always buried their dead with the face upwards, looking towards HEAVEN; and the feet turned to the east, or the rising SUN, indicating that the deceased was on his way to ELYSIUM, and not to the region of night (Diogenes Laertius: Life of Solon).

East is East and West is West. A phrase from Rudyard Kipling, emphasizing the divergence of views on ethics and life in general between the Oriental and Western peoples.

Oh, East is East, and West is West and never the twin shall meet,
Till Earth and Sky stand presently at God's great Judgement Seat.

The Ballad of East and West.

Far East. South-East Asia, China, Japan, etc.

Middle East and Near East. The precise meaning of these terms has become blurred by recent usage, which has either treated them as interchangeable or used Middle East for what was formerly called the Near East. Iran, Iraq, Afghanistan, India, and Burma used to be called Middle East, and the Near East comprised Libya, Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Syria and Turkey.

The Eastern Question, as an historical term, essentially refers to the problem created by the decay and disintegration of the Turkish Empire in south-eastern Europe and the NEAR EAST from the time of the Greek revolt in 1821 until the establishment of the Turkish Republic in 1922, which began a new chapter.

He came safe from the East Indies, and was drowned in the Thames. He survived many great dangers, but was at last killed when he thought himself secure.

To send to the East Indies for Kentish pippins. To go round about to accomplish a very simple thing. To BREAK A BUTTERFLY ON A WHEEL. See under BREAK.

East-ender. A term particularly used to denote inhabitants of the inner London boroughs east of the City itself.

Eastern Church. The Orthodox Church. Cp. GREEK CHURCH.

Eastern Empire. The BYZANTINE EMPIRE.

Easter. The name was adopted for the Christian Paschal festival from O.E. eastre, a heathen festival held at the vernal equinox in honour of the Teutonic goddess of dawn, called Eostre by Bede, which fell about the same time.

Easter Sunday is the first Sunday after the Paschal full moon, i.e. the full moon that occurs on the day of the vernal equinox (21 March) or on any of the next 28 days. Thus Easter Sunday cannot be earlier than 22 March, or later than 25 April, as laid down by the Council of Nicaea in 325. The Eastern Church still celebrates Easter independently and in 1963 the Vatican Council declared itself in favour of fixing the date of Easter when agreement with other churches could be reached.

It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day.

But oh, she dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING: Ballad upon a Wedding.

Sir Thomas Browne combats the superstition:

We shall not, I hope, disparage the Resurrection of our Redeemer, if we say the Sun doth not dance on Easter day. And though we would willingly assent unto any sympathetic exultation, yet cannot conceive therein any more than a Tropical expression.

Pseudodoxia Epidemica, V, xxii.

Easter-ale. See CHURCH-ALE.

Easter Eggs, or Pasch Eggs. The egg as a symbol of fertility and renewal of life derives from the ancient world, as did the practice of colouring and eating eggs at the spring festival. The custom of eating eggs on Easter Sunday and of making gifts of Easter Eggs to children probably derives from the Easter payment of eggs by the VILLEIN to his overlord. The idea of the egg as a symbol of new life was adopted to symbolize the Resurrection. Pasch Eggs or pace eggs, hard-boiled and coloured, were rolled down slopes as one of the Easter games, a practice surviving in the yearly egg rolling held on the lawn of the WHITE HOUSE in Washington.

Eat. To eat together was, in the East, a sure pledge of protection. There is a story of a Persian grandee who gave the remainder of a peach which he was eating to a man who implored his protection, only to find that his own son had been slain by this man. The nobleman would not allow the murderer to be punished, but said, "We have eaten together; go in peace." Cp. TO EAT A MAN'S SALT under SALT.

Go and eat cokel Go away and don't bother me; GO TO HALIFAX. An expression of annoyance and impatience.

Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall die. Is. xxii, 13. A traditional saying of the Egyptians who, at their banquets, exhibited a skeleton to the guests to remind them of the brevity of life.

To eat a man's salt. See under SALT.

To eat dirt. See under DIRT.

To eat dog. An American Indian custom at councils of importance. Later, when white men took exception, they were allowed to avoid offence by placing a silver dollar on the dish; the next man ate dog and took the dollar. Hence the expression in American politics to eat dog for another.

To eat humble pie. To come down from a position you have assumed and to be obliged to defer to others, to submit to humiliation. Here "humble" is a pun on umble, the umbles being the heart, liver, and entrails of the deer, the huntsman's perquisites. When the lord and his household dined off the venison on the dais, the huntsman and his fellows took lower seats and partook of the umbles made into a pie.

To eat its head off. Said of an animal (usually a horse) that eats more than it is worth, or whose work does not cover the cost of its keep.

To eat one out of house and home. Literally, to eat so much that the householder or host is ruined. A favourite complaint of the mother of a growing family. Mistress Quickly in SHAKESPEARE'S Henry IV, Pt. II (II, i) when the Lord Chief Justice asks her "for what sum" she had caused Sir John Falstaff to be arrested, answers, "He hath eaten me out of house and home; he hath put all my substance into that fat belly of his."

To eat one's heart out. To fret or worry excessively; to allow grief or vexation to predominate and tincture all one's ideas, and absorb all other emotions.

To eat one's terms. To be studying for the BAR. Students are required to dine in the hall of an INN OF COURT at least thrice in each of the twelve terms before they are "called" to the bar.

To eat one's words. To retract in a humiliating manner; to unsay what you have said.

To eat out of someone's hand. To be submissive and compliant to someone, as a tame animal will eat from its master's hand.

To eat the leek. See under LEEK.

To eat up into the wind. A sailing-ship expression meaning to make good progress to windward.

To eat well. To have a good appetite.

It eats well means that what is eaten is agreeable. To eat badly is to eat without appetite or too little.

Eau de Cologne (Fr. water of Cologne). A perfumed spirit invented by an Italian chemist, Johann Maria Farina, who settled in Cologne in 1709. The usual recipe prescribes twelve drops of each of the essential oils, bergamot, citron, neroli, orange, and rosemary, with one dram of Malabar cardamoms and a gallon of rectified spirits, which are distilled together.

Eau de vie (Fr. water of life). Brandy. A translation of the Lat. acqua vitæ. This is a curious perversion of the Ital. acqua di vite (water, or juice of the vine), rendered by the monks into acqua vitæ instead of acqua vitis, and confounding the juice of the grape with the alchemists' ELIXIR OF LIFE. Cp. USQUEBAUGH.

Eavesdropper. One who listens stealthily to other people's conversation. The eavesdrop or eavesdrip was the space of ground around the house which received the water dripping from the eaves. An eavesdropper was one who stationed himself in the eaves-drip to overhear what was said in the house.

Under our tents I'll play the eavesdropper,
To hear if any mean to shrink from me.
SHAKESPEARE: Richard III, V, iii.

Ebenezer. A name often adopted by NON-CONFORMIST chapels from the Heb. word meaning "stone of help" (I Sam. vii, 12) and thus sometimes used as a symbol of Nonconformity. See EXETER HALL.

Lest there should be any well-intentioned persons who do not perceive the difference . . . between religion and the cant of religion . . . let them understand that it is always the latter and never the former which is satirized here . . . whether it establish its headquarters, for the time being, in Exeter Hall or Ebenezer Chapel, or both.

CHARLES DICKENS: Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club (Preface).

Ebionites (Heb. ebion, poor). In the early Church the name was given to the ultra-Jewish Christians, many of whom rejected the Virgin Birth and who kept the Jewish Sabbath as well as the Lord's Day. As a separate heretical sect from the 2nd century, they called themselves the Poor Men, and remained isolated from the Church, developing a mixture of creeds.

Eblis. A jinn of Arabian mythology, the ruler of the evil genii, or fallen angels. Before his fall he was called AZAZEL. When ADAM was created, God commanded all the angels to worship him; but Eblis replied, "Me thou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?" God turned the disobedient ANGEL into a Sheytan (DEVIL), and he became the father of devils.

When he said unto the angels, "Worship Adam", all worshipped him except Eblis. Al Koran, ii.

E-boat. In World War II an abbreviation for "Enemy War Motorboat", the British name for the German motor torpedo boat.

E-boat alley. In World War II, the name given to the coastal convoy route approximately off the Norfolk and Suffolk coast which was the scene of much successful E-boat activity in the early years of the war.

Ebony. God's image done in ebony, Negroes. An expression coined by Thomas Fuller.

Ebrew Jew, i.e. Hebrew Jew meaning a Jew of the purest stock, completely a Jew. "You ebrew Jew" is an old expression of abuse meaning "you utter Jew" and therefore one not to be believed, trusted, or one who is excessively mean. It derives from the days when Jews were subjected to recurrent persecution and were also unpopular from their association with usury.

You rogue, they were bound, every man of them; or I am a Jew else, an Ebrew Jew.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv.

Ecce homo (ek' ki hō' mō) (Lat. Behold the man). The name given to many paintings of Our Lord crowned with thorns and bound with ropes, as He was shown to the people by PILATE, who said to them, "Ecce homo!" (John xix, 5). Especially notable are those by Correggio, Titian, Guido Reni, Van Dyck, Rembrandt, Poussin, and Albrecht Dürer. In 1865 Sir John Seeley published a study of Christ under this title.

Ecce signum (ek' ki sig' nūm). See it, in proof. Behold the proof.

I am eight times thrust through the doublet, four through the hose; my buckler cut through and through; my sword hacked like a handsaw—ecce signum!—SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iv.

Ecclesiastes. This book of the Old Testament was formerly ascribed to Solomon, because it says (i, 1), "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, King in Jerusalem." It is now generally assigned to an unknown author of about the 3rd century B.C.

Ecclesiastical. The Father of Ecclesiastical History. Eusebius of Cæsarea (c. 264–340).

Ecclesiasticus. The Latin name, probably meaning "church book" (from its frequent use in the church), for the Book of Sirach, traditionally ascribed to Jesus the son of Sira. It is perhaps the most important book of the Old Testament APOCRYPHA and both the German hymn Nun danket alle Gott (Now thank we all our God) and the Jubilee Rhythm of St. Bernard of Clairvaux are taken from it. It has been much used by the Lutheran Church.

Echidna (e kid' ná). In classical mythology, a monster, half woman, half SERPENT and mother of the CHIMÆRA, the many-headed dog ORTHOS, the hundred-headed DRAGON of the HESPERIDES, the Colchian dragon, the SPHINX, CERBERUS, SCYLLA, the GORGONS, the LERNAËN HYDRA, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of PROMETHEUS, and the NEMEAN LION.

Spenser makes her the mother of the BLATANT BEAST in the Faerie Queene, VI, vi, 10.

In zoology an echidna is a porcupine ant-eater found in Australia, Tasmania, and New Guinea, allied to the platypus.

Echo (ek' ō). The Romans say that Echo was a NYMPH in love with NARCISSUS, but her love not being returned, she pined away till only her voice remained.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
Within thy airy shell,
By slow Meander's margent green—
Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair
That liketh thy Narcissus are?

MILTON: Comus, 230.

To applaud to the echo. To applaud vigorously—so loudly as to produce an echo.

Eckhardt (ek' hart). A faithful Eckhardt, who warneth everyone. Eckhardt, in German legends, appears on the evening of MAUNDY THURSDAY to warn all persons to go home, that they may not be injured by the headless bodies and two-legged horses which traverse the streets on that night.

Eclectics (ek lek' tiks). The name given to those who do not attach themselves to any special school (especially philosophers and painters), but pick and choose from many (Gr. eklegein, to choose, select). The name was first given to such a group of Greek philosophers of the 2nd and 1st centuries B.C. The 17th-century Italian painters who followed the great masters are known as the Eclectic School.

Eclipse, one of the most famous of English race-horses, the great-grandson of DARLEY ARABIAN, foaled 1 April 1764. He ran his first race 3 May 1769, and from then until October 1770 ran in eighteen races, never being beaten. His skeleton is preserved in the Royal Veterinary College, London. His fame gave rise to a saying applied to a person of outstanding ability who outstrips all rivals, "Eclipse first and the rest nowhere."

The Eclipse Stakes is a race inaugurated in 1884 for horses of three years and upwards, run at Sandown Park.

Eclipses were considered by the Greeks and Romans as bad OMENS and the latter would never hold a public assembly during an eclipse. Some of their poets feign that an eclipse of the MOON is because she is on a visit to ENDYMION.

A general notion among some races was that the SUN or moon was devoured by some monster, hence the beating of drums and kettles to scare it away. The Chinese, Lapps and Persians call the evil beast a DRAGON. The East Indians say it is a black GRIFFIN.

The ancient Mexicans thought that eclipses were caused by quarrels between sun and moon.

Ecliptic. The track in the heavens along which the sun appears to perform its annual march. It lies in the middle of the ZODIAC and is an imaginary line produced by the earth's motion about the sun.

Eclogue (Gr. a selection). The word was originally used for VIRGIL'S Bucolics, because they were selected poems; as they were all pastoral dialogues it came to denote such poems, and hence an Eclogue is now a pastoral or rustic dialogue in verse.

Economy. Literally, household management (Lat œconomia, from Gr. oikos, house; nemein, to deal out).

I was going, to-day, by the side of a plat of ground where there was a very fine flock of turkey. I stopped to admire them, and observed to the owner how fine they were, when he answered, "We owe them entirely to you, sir, for we never raised one till we read your Cottage Economy."

WM. COBBETT: Rural Rides
(From Kensington across Surrey).

Sound economy includes the avoidance of waste, hence the sense of frugality which is illustrated by numerous proverbs: "Ever save, ever have"; "TAKE CARE OF THE PENCE (under PENNY) and the pounds will take care of themselves"; "MANY A MICKLE MAKES A MUCKLE"; "A PENNY SAVED IS A PENNY GAINED"; "Little and often fills the purse"; etc.

The Christian Economy. The religious system based on the teachings of Jesus Christ as recorded in the New Testament.

The Economy of Nature. The laws and provisions of nature whereby the greatest amount of good is obtained, and by which the animal and vegetable kingdoms are regulated.

If we forget, for an instant, that each species tends to increase inordinately, and that some check is always in action, yet seldom perceived by us, the whole economy of Nature will be utterly obscured.

CHARLES DARWIN: Origin of Species, ch. xi.

The Mosaic Economy. The religious system revealed by God to Moses and set forth in the Old Testament.

Political Economy. The science of the production and distribution of wealth, etc., which in the 20th century came to be called economics.

Ecstasy (Gr. ek, out; stasis, a standing). Literally, a condition in which one stands out of one's mind, or is "beside oneself". ST. PAUL refers to this when he says he was caught up to the third heaven and heard unutterable words, "whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell" (II Cor. xii, 2-4). ST. JOHN also says he was "in the spirit"—i.e. in an ecstasy—when he saw the apocalyptic vision (Rev. i, 10). The belief that the soul left the body at times was common in former ages, and there was a class of diviners among the ancient Greeks called Ecstas-tici, who used to lie in trances, and when they came to themselves gave strange accounts of what they had seen while they were "out of the body".

The Ecstatic Doctor. Jan van Ruysbroek (1293-1381), the Dutch mystic.

Ector, Sir. The foster-father of King ARTHUR.

Edda. This name, which may be from Icel. edda, great-grandmother, or from Old Norse odhr, poetry, is given to two works or collections, The Elder, or Poetic Edda, and The Younger Edda, or Prose Edda of Snorri. The first-named was found in 1643 by an Icelandic bishop and consists of mythological and heroic poetry dating from about the 9th century. Erroneously attributed to Sæmund Sigfusson (d. 1133), it is sometimes called Sæmund's Edda. The Younger Edda by Snorri Sturluson (d. 1242) is in prose and verse and forms a guide to poets and poetry. Found in 1628, it consists of the Gylfaginning (an epitome of Scandinavian mythology), the Skaldskaparmal (a glossary of poetical expressions, etc.), the Hattatal (a list of metres with examples, lists of poets, etc.).

Eden. PARADISE, the country and garden in which ADAM was placed by God (Gen. ii, 15). The word means delight, pleasure.

Eden Hall. The Luck of Eden Hall. An enamelled drinking-glass (probably made in Venice in the 10th century) in the possession of the Musgrave family at Eden Hall, Cumberland, and supposed to be endowed with fortune-bringing properties. The tale is told that it was taken from St. Cuthbert's Well in the garden where it was left by the fairies while they danced. The superstition is:

If that glass should break or fall,
Farewell the luck of Eden Hall.

The estate was broken up in 1920 and the glass is now in the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

Edge (O.E. ecg). Back and edge. See under BACK.

It is dangerous to play with edged tools. It is dangerous to tamper with mischief or that which may bring you into trouble.

Not to put too fine an edge on it. Not to mince the matter; to speak plainly.

To be on edge. To be very eager or nervously impatient.

To edge away. To move away very gradually, as a ship moves away from the edge of the shore.

To edge on. See EGG ON.

To fall by the edge of the sword. By a cut from the sword; to be slain in battle.

To have the edge on someone. To have an advantage.

To set one's teeth on edge. To induce a tingling or grating sensation in one's teeth as from acids or harsh noises; to jar one's nerves or to feel aversion.

In those days they shall say no more, the fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge. Jer. xxxi, 29.

I had rather hear a brazen canstick turn'd,
Or a dry wheel grate on the axle-tree;
And that would set my teeth nothing on edge,
Nothing so much as mincing poetry.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, III, i.

Edge-bone. See AITCH-BONE.

Edinburgh. Edwin's burgh; the fort built by Edwin, king of Northumbria (616-632). Dunedin (Gael. dun, a fortress) and Edina are poetical forms. Also called the Modern ATHENS, or Athens of the North.

Edinburgh Review. An outstanding quarterly magazine founded at Edinburgh in 1802 by Francis Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, and Henry Brougham, and originally published in the buff and blue colours of the WHIG party by Constable. The first three numbers were edited by Smith, who then handed over to Jeffrey. Its brilliance and wit gave it great literary and political influence, especially in the earlier decades, but the unfairness and savageness of some of its reviews were particularly marked in the case of Wordsworth and Southey, and it drew forth Byron's satire English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809). Its contributors included Hazlitt, Macaulay and Carlyle. It ceased publication in 1929.

Edwardian. Belonging to the reign of King Edward VII (1901-1910). Edwardian style of dress was affected by many young men and youths in the 1950s, who soon came to be called Teddy Boys. They were as much distinguished for anti-social behaviour as for their peculiarities of costume. Cp. BEATNIK; MODS AND ROCKERS; MOHOCKS.

Eel. A salt eel. A rope's end used for scourging. At one time eelskins were used for whips.

With my salt eele, went down in the parler, and there got my boy and did beat him.
Pepys' Diary.

Eel-skins. Old slang for very tight trousers or tightly fitting frocks.

Holding the eel of science by the tail. To have a smattering of the subject, the kind which slips from the memory as an eel would wriggle out of one's fingers if held by the tail.

To get used to it, as a skinned eel. It may be unpleasant at first, but habit will get the better of such annoyance; arising from the curious old notion that eels feel little more than a slight discomfort when skinned alive.

To skin an eel by the tail. To do things the wrong way.

Effigy. To burn, or hang one in effigy. To burn or hang the dummy or representation of someone in order to show dislike or contempt. From earliest times it has been believed that magic was worked by treating an effigy as one would fain treat the original. In France the public executioner used to hang the criminal in effigy when the criminal himself could not be found.

Égalité (ā gāl' itā). Philippe, Duc d'Orléans (1747-1793) (father of Louis-Philippe, King of the French) assumed this name when he renounced his title and voted for the death of Louis XVI. It is taken from the revolutionary motto "Liberty, Equality (égalité), and Fraternity". He was guillotined in 1793.

Egeria (e jēr' i ā). The NYMPH who instructed Numa Pompilius, second king of ROME (753-673 B.C.), in his wise legislation; hence a counsellor, adviser.

It is in these moments that we gaze upon the moon. It is in these moments that Nature becomes our Egeria.

LORD BEACONSFIELD: Vivian Grey, III, vi.

Egg. See also SHELL.

A bad egg. See under BAD.

A duck's egg. See under DUCK.

Curate's egg. See under CURATE.

Druids' egg. See under DRUIDS.

Easter Eggs. See under EASTER; EGG FEAST.

Golden eggs. Great profits. See under GOOSE.

Scrambled egg. See BRASS HAT.

The mundane egg. The Phœnicians, Egyptians, Hindus, Japanese and others maintained that the world was egg-shaped and was hatched from an egg made by the Creator. In some mythologies a bird is represented as laying the mundane egg on the primordial waters. Anciently this idea was attributed to ORPHEUS, hence the "mundane egg" is also called the Orphic egg.

The opinion of the oval figure of the earth is ascribed to Orpheus and his disciples; and the doctrine of the mundane egg is so peculiarly his that 'tis called by Proclus the Orphic egg. BURNET: The Sacred Theory of the Earth (1684).

As sure as eggs is eggs. Very sure, certain in fact. It has been suggested that this is a corruption of the logician's formula "x is x".

Don't put all your eggs in one basket. Don't venture all you have in one speculation or enterprise. The allusion is obvious.

I have eggs on the spit. I am very busy, and cannot attend to anything else. The reference is to roasting eggs on a spit. They were first boiled, then the yolk was taken out, braided up with spices, and put back again; the eggs were then drawn on a spit and roasted. The process needed constant attention.

Like as two eggs. Exactly alike.

They say we are almost as like as eggs. SHAKESPEARE: Winter's Tale, I, ii.

Show him an egg and instantly the whole air is full of feathers. Said of a very sanguine man, because he is "counting his chickens before they are hatched".

Teach, or tell your grandmother to suck eggs. Said derisively to someone who tries to teach his elders or the more experienced.

There is reason in roasting egg. Even the most trivial thing has a reason for being done in one way rather than some other. When wood fires were usual, it was more common to roast eggs than to boil them, and some care was required to prevent their being "ill-roasted", "all on one side", as Touchstone says in SHAKESPEARE'S As You Like It, III, ii.

One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg;
The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg.
POPE: Second Epistle of the Second Book of Horace.

To crush in the egg. TO NIP IN THE BUD; to ruin some scheme before it has been fairly started.

To egg on. To incite, to urge on. Here egg is another form of edge, thus it means to encourage one to move little by little in the direction of the edge.

To take eggs for money. To allow yourself to be imposed upon. The saying derives from the days when eggs were plentiful and exceedingly cheap.

Leon: Mine honest friend
Will you take eggs for money?

Mam: No, my lord, I'll fight.
SHAKESPEARE: Winter's Tale, I, ii.

To tread upon eggs. To walk gingerly, as if walking over eggs, which are easily broken.

Egg Feast, or Egg Saturday. The Saturday before SHROVE TUESDAY used to be so called, particularly in Oxfordshire, as the eating of eggs was forbidden during LENT.

Egg-Head. A bald person or an intellectual person. The latter derives from the former on the supposition that intellectuals are often bald. See also HIGH-BROW; SQUARE.

Egg-trot, or Egg-wife's trot. A cautious jog-trot pace, like that of a housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers.

Egil. Brother of Weland (see WAYLAND), the VULCAN of Northern mythology. He was a great archer and in the Saga of Thidrik there is a tale told of him exactly similar to that about William TELL and the apple.

Ego (Lat. "I"). In various philosophical systems, ego is used of the conscious thinking subject and non-ego of the object. The term ego was introduced into philosophy by Descartes, who employed it to denote the whole man, body and mind. Fichte later used the term the absolute ego, meaning thereby the non-individual being, neither subject nor object, which posits the world of individual egos and non-egos.

In psychoanalysis the ego is that part of the mind that perceives and takes cognizance of external reality and adjusts responses to it. See ID.

Egypt. Crown of Egypt. In ancient Egypt there were many worn by kings and gods. As rulers of Upper Egypt, or the South Land, and Lower Egypt, or the Northern Land, the kings wore the double crown (pschent) made up of the Red Crown, the head-dress of the Delta, to which was added the White Mitre of the South. The Khepresh, called the war-helmet of the PHARAOHS, was blue with round dots. Each of the many crowns had its particular significance and symbolism and the gods wore crowns which indicated their attributes.

Egyptian Days. Unlucky days, days on which no business should be undertaken. The Egyptian astrologers named two in each month, but the last Monday in APRIL, the second Monday of AUGUST, and the third Monday of DECEMBER seem to have been specially baneful. Cp. DIES NEFASTUS.

Eight. Behind the eight ball. In a dangerous position from which it is impossible to escape. The phrase comes from the game of Kelly pool, in one variety of which all the balls must be pocketed in a certain order, except the black ball, numbered eight. If another ball touches the eight ball, the player is penalized. Therefore, if the eight ball is in front of the one which he intends to pocket, he is in a hazardous position.

One over the eight. Slightly drunk.

Eikon Basillike (i' kon báz il' i ki) (Gr. royal likeness). Eikon Basillike: The Portraiture of His Sacred Majestie in His Solitudes and Sufferings appeared in 1649 very soon after the execution of Charles I. It purported to be his own account of his reflections and feelings during, and before, his imprisonment. It greatly strengthened royalist sentiment and led to Milton's less influential Eikonoklastes. Dr. John Gauden (1605-1662) afterwards claimed authorship at the time of his election to the bishopric of Worcester. It appears that he had edited the king's papers and his version received the royal approval.

Eisel (i' sel). An old name for vinegar; through Old Fr. from Late Lat. acetillum, diminutive of acetum (vinegar). Hamlet asks Laertes, Would'st drink up eissell—to show his love for the dead Ophelia (V, i).

Whilst, like a willing patient, I will drink
Potions of eysell, 'gainst my strong infection.
SHAKESPEARE: Sonnet cxi.

Eisenhower Platz. Nickname of Grosvenor Square, London, during World War II, when all the buildings surrounding the square were occupied by American Military Headquarters.

Eisteddfod (i steth' vod) (Welsh, a session; from eistedd, to sit). Eisteddfodau were held in mediæval Wales and later, largely to regulate the admission of aspirants seeking to qualify as bards or minstrels. Thus in 1568, the Council for the Marches of Wales commissioned the holding of an Eisteddfod at Caerwys because "vagraunt and idle persons, naming them selves mynstrelles Rithmrs, and Barthes, are lately grown into such an intollerable multitude . . . that not only gentlemen and other by their shameles disorders are oftentimes disquieted in their habitacions. But also the expert mynstrelles and musiciens in tonge and Conyng therby much discouraged . . ." All such minstrels and bards were to appear before the experts and those found not worthy of their professions were "to returne to some honest Labor and due Exercise, such as they be most apt unto maytenaunce of their lyvings, upon paine to be taken as sturdy and idle vacaboundes . . ." Revival of the Eisteddfodau was largely due to the romantic movement and their modern development grew from the Corwen Eisteddfod of 1789, the druidic rites being introduced by Iolo Morgannwg in the early 19th century. They have been held annually since 1880, primarily for the encouragement of Welsh literature and music.

Elagabalus, or Heliogabalus. A Syro-Phœnician sun-god. Varius Avitus Basianus (205-222), who became Roman emperor as Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (218-222), was called Elagabalus because he had been a high priest of the sun-god at Emesa. Two temples were built at Rome for this god, which was represented by a huge conical stone. His brief reign was marked by unparalleled debaucheries, cruelties, and loathsome practices. He and his mother were slain by the PRÆTORIAN GUARD.

Elaine. The Lily Maid of ASTOLAT, whose unrequited love for Sir LANCELOT caused her death. The story is told in Tennyson's Lancelot and Elaine (Idylls of the King) based upon Malory (Bk. XVIII, ch. ix-xx). She loved him "with that love which was her doom". Sir Lancelot wore her favour at the ninth of the DIAMOND JOUSTS, thus arousing the jealousy of Queen GUINEVERE.

Elbow. See ELL.

A knight of the elbow. A gambler. Cp. ELBOW-SHAKER.

At one's elbow. Close at hand.

Elbow grease, use plenty of elbow grease, etc. The pressure and physical effort applied when rubbing, polishing, scrubbing, etc. A jocular expression in use for more than three centuries. A time-hallowed joke was to send the GREENHORN to the shop to buy "elbow-grease".

Elden Hole

Elbow-lifting. Drinking. To lift the elbow is to drink and both expressions are used to indicate fondness of alcohol.

Elbow-room. Sufficient space for the work in hand; room to extend the elbows.

Elbow-shaker. A dicer, a sharper or gambler.

More power to your elbow. A jocular toast of encouragement and support implying that a stronger elbow will lift more glasses to the mouth.

Out at elbow. Shabbily dressed, like one who wears a coat worn out at the elbows. "Down at heel" has a similar meaning. See under HEEL.

To elbow one's way in. To push one's way through a crowd; to get a place by HOOK OR CROOK. See under HOOK.

To elbow out; to be elbowed out. To supersede; to be ousted by a rival. A thruster or pusher who selfishly pursues his own interest is said to use his elbows.

Up to one's elbows. Very busy, with work piled up to one's elbows. Cp. UP TO THE EYES under EYE.

Elden Hole. Elden Hole needs filling. A reproof given to great braggarts. Elden Hole is a deep chasm in the Derbyshire Peak, long reputed to be bottomless. It is mentioned in Scott's Peveril of the Peak, ch. iii.

Elder. The importance of elders as people of authority in ancient communities was a natural development. In the Old Testament they appear as official authorities of a locality; and as the elders of the SYNAGOGUE they exercised religious discipline. The members of the SANHEDRIN were called elders. The name was also applied to officers of the early Christian Church and is still used in this sense by the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Elder Brethren. See TRINITY HOUSE.

Elder-tree. There are many popular traditions and superstitions associated with this tree. The cross is supposed to have been made from its wood and, according to legend, JUDAS hanged himself on an elder, mushroom-like excrescences on the bark still being known as Judas's (or Jew's) ears. The Travels of Sir John Mandeville and SHAKESPEARE in Love's Labour's Lost, V, ii, say that Judas was hanged on an elder.

Judas he japed
With Jewen silver

And sithen on an eller
Hanged hymselfe.
Vision of Piers Plowman: Passus I.

Warts are cured by being rubbed with elder and it is a protection against witchcraft. See also FIG-TREE; JUDAS TREE.
El Dorado (el dór a' dō) (Sp. the gilded). Originally the name given to the supposed king of the fabulous city of MANOA believed to be on the Amazon. The king was said to be covered with oil and then periodically powdered with gold-dust so that he was permanently, and literally, gilded. Expeditions from Spain and England (two of which were led by Sir Walter Raleigh) tried to discover this territory. El Dorado and Manoa were used by the explorers as interchangeable names for the "golden city". Metaphorically it is applied to any place which offers opportunities of getting rich quickly or acquiring wealth easily.

Eleanor Crosses. The crosses erected by Edward I to commemorate his first wife Eleanor of Castile, who died at Hadby in Nottinghamshire in 1290. She was buried in Westminster Abbey and crosses were set up at each of the twelve places where her body rested on its journey—Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Geddington, Northampton, Stony Stratford, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, West Cheap (Cheapside) and CHARING CROSS. Only those at Geddington, Northampton, and Waltham survive.

Eleatic Philosophy. A school of philosophy founded at Elea in Italy in the latter part of the 6th century B.C. Parmenides and ZENO were its chief exponents, although Xenophanes of COLOPHON is usually regarded as the founder. He had attacked the current polytheism and anthropomorphism and the Eleatics maintained a conception of the universal unity of being. Their thought considerably influenced PLATO.

Elecampane (Inula helenium), one of the Compositae, allied to the aster. Its candied roots are used as a sweetmeat and were formerly held to confer immortality and to cure wounds. Pliny tells us that the plant sprang from HELEN's tears. It was much used in old medicines and herb remedies.

Electors. In the HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE those rulers who formed an Electoral College to appoint the Emperor were called Electors. Their number was eventually regularized by the GOLDEN BULL of 1356 and the seven Electors were to be the bishops of Mainz, Trier, and Cologne, with the rulers of the Rhine Palatinate, Saxony, Brandenburg and Bohemia. The ruler of Bavaria gained admission during the THIRTY YEARS WAR and Hanover became an Electorate in 1708. The office disappeared with the abolition of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806.

The Great Elector. Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620–1688), who left for his successors a position in Germany next in importance to that of Austria.

Electra (1) One of the PLEIADES, mother of Dardanus, the mythical ancestor of the Trojans. She is known as “the Lost Pleiad”, for she is said to have disappeared a little before the TROJAN WAR to avoid seeing the ruin of her beloved city. She showed herself occasionally to mortal eye, but always in the guise of a comet. See Odyssey, V, and Iliad, XVIII.

(2) A sister of ORESTES who features in the Oresteia of Aeschylus and the two other dramas entitled Electra by Sophocles and Euripides. The daughter of AGAMEMNON and CLYTEMNESTRA, she incited Orestes to kill their mother in revenge for latter’s murder of Agamemnon. In modern psychology, an Electra Complex is a girl’s attraction towards her father accompanied by hostility towards her mother.

Electricity (Gr. elektron, amber). Thales of Miletus (600 B.C.) observed that amber when rubbed attracted small particles. From such observations of electrical phenomena the modern science of electricity has developed.

Electronic Brain. A popular name for a computer.

Electuary. Coming from a Greek word meaning to lick up, this term is applied in pharmacy to medicines sweetened with honey or syrup, and originally meant to be licked off the spoon by the patient.

Elegant Extracts. At Cambridge, in former days, men too good to be PLUCKED and not good enough for the POLL, but nevertheless luckily allowed to pass, were nicknamed the Elegant Extracts, from the usual name for the popular anthology compiled by Vicesimus Knox and frequently reprinted in the 19th century. (It was published in 1791 as Extracts, Elegant, Instructive, and Entertaining in Poetry; from the most approved authors.) There was a similar LIMBO in the honour list called the GULF. See also REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Elegiacs. Verse consisting of alternate hexameters and pentameters, so called because it was the usual metre in which Greek and Roman elegies were written. In Latin it was commonly used by Ovid,

Catullus, Propertius, Tibullus, and others; the following is a good specimen of English elegiacs:

Man with inviolate caverns, impregnable holds in his nature,
 Depths no storm can pierce, pierced with a shaft of the sun:
 Man that is galled with his confines, and burdened yet more with his vastness,
 Born too great for his ends, never at peace with his goal.
 SIR WILLIAM WATSON: Hymn to the Sea (1899).

Element. A word of uncertain etymology. In ancient and mediæval philosophy, earth, air, fire and water were the four elements from which all other substances were composed. This conception was introduced by EMPEDOCLES in the 5th century B.C. Later a fifth immaterial element was added, called the QUINTESSENCE, or quinta essentia, supposed by ARISTOTLE to permeate everything.

The use of the word in chemistry to denote substances which resist analysis into simpler substances begins with Robert Boyle.

In one’s element. One’s natural surroundings, within one’s ordinary range of activity, enjoying oneself thoroughly. The allusion is to the natural abode of any animals, as the air to birds, water to fish.

God who created me
 Nimble and light of limb,
 In three elements free
 To run, to ride, to swim.

H. C. BEECHING: A Hymn.

To brave the elements. To venture out into the weather, to defy adverse weather conditions. The elements here are the atmospheric powers; the winds, storms, etc.

I tax not you, you elements, with unkindness;
 I never gave you kingdom, call’d you children;
 You owe me no subscription; then, let fall
 Your horrible pleasure.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, III, ii.

Elephant. The Order of the Elephant.

A Danish order of knighthood said to have been instituted by Christian I in 1462, but reputedly of earlier origin. It was reconstituted by Christian V in 1693 and, besides the sovereign and his sons, consists of 30 KNIGHTS. The collar is of gold elephants and towers.

A white elephant. Some possession the expense or responsibility of which is not worth while; a burdensome possession. The allusion is to the story of a king of Siam who used to make a present of a white elephant to courtiers he wished to ruin.

King of the White Elephant. The proudest title borne by former kings of Ava and Siam. In Ava the white elephant bore the title of "lord", and had a minister of high rank to superintend his household.

Only an elephant can bear an elephant's load. An Indian proverb: Only a great man can do the work of a great man; also, the burden is more than I can bear; it is a load fit for an elephant.

Elephant paper. A large-sized drawing paper measuring 23 inches by 28 inches. Double Elephant is a standard size of printing paper 27 inches by 40 inches. The name is probably from an ancient watermark.

To see the elephant (U.S.A.). To see all there is to see.

Elephant and Castle. The sign of a public house at Newington Butts that has given its name to a railway station and to a district in South London. The sign is the crest of the Cutlers' Company, into whose trade the use of ivory entered largely.

In ancient times, war-elephants bore "castles" on their backs containing bowmen and armed knights.

Eleusinian Mysteries. The religious rites in honour of DEMETER or CERES, originally an agrarian cult, performed at Eleusis in Attica and later taken over by the Athenian state and partly celebrated at ATHENS. The rites included sea bathing, processions, religious dramas, etc., and the initiated obtained thereby a happy life beyond the grave. Little is known about the chief rites, hence the figurative use of the phrase to mean something deeply mysterious. The Eleusinian Mysteries were abolished by the Emperor Theodosius about the end of the 4th century A.D.

Elevation of the Host. In the MASS, after the consecration, the raising of the Host and the Chalice by the celebrant for the adoration of the faithful.

Eleven. At the eleventh hour. Just in time; from the parable in Matt. xx, 1-16.

Eleven Days. Give us back our eleven days. When ENGLAND adopted the Gregorian CALENDAR (by Chesterfield's Act of 1751) in place of the JULIAN CALENDAR, eleven days were dropped, 2 September 1752 being followed by 14 September. Many people thought that they were being cheated out of eleven days and also eleven days' pay. Hence the popular cry from the populace, "Give us back our eleven days!"

The Eleven Plus. The name given to the much-abused selection tests set to schoolchildren at the age of eleven, or just over that age, and used as a means of judging their suitability for the various types of secondary education provided by the Education Act of 1944 (secondary modern, secondary technical, secondary grammar, etc.). It soon became the WHIPPING BOY for all those who, for reasons political and social rather than essentially educational, were seeking to demolish the existing pattern of education in England in favour of comprehensive schools. Most of the attacks made on the efficiency or fairness of the "eleven plus", although tendentious and often unsubstantiated, nevertheless succeeded in creating a popular bogey.

The Eleven Thousand Virgins. See URSULA.

The Eleven Years' Tyranny. Denotes the period from 1629 to 1640 when Charles I, with the support of Strafford and Laud, governed without PARLIAMENT.

Elevenses. A popular name for a mid-morning refreshment snack with tea or coffee. See also CRIB.

Elf. Originally a dwarfish being of Teutonic mythology, possessed of magical powers which it used for the good or ill of mankind. Later the name was used for a malignant imp, and then for FAIRY creatures that dance on the grass in the full MOON, etc.

Every elf and fairy sprite

Hop as light as bird from brier.

SHAKESPEARE: A Midsummer Night's Dream, V, ii.

The derivation of elf and GOBLIN from GUELF AND GHIBELLINE is mentioned in Johnson (with disapproval); the word is O.E. ælf, from icel, alfr, and Teut. alp, a nightmare.

Elf-arrows. Arrow-heads of the NEOLITHIC AGE. At one time they were supposed to be shot by elves at people and cattle out of malice or revenge.

Elf-fire. The IGNIS FATUUS.

Elf-locks. Tangled hair. It used to be said that one of the favourite amusements of Queen MAB was to tie people's hair in knots. When Edgar impersonates a madman in SHAKESPEARE's King Lear, II, iii, he says, "I'll . . . elf all my hair in knots."

That is that very Mab

That plats the manes of horses in the night;
And bakes the elf-locks in foul sluttish hairs.

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, I, iv.

Elf-marked. Those born with a natural defect, according to ancient Scottish superstition, are marked by the elves for mischief. SHAKESPEARE makes Queen Margaret call Richard III:

Thou elvish-mark'd, abortive, rooting hog!
Richard III, I, iii.

Elf-shot. Afflicted with some unknown disease which was supposed to have been caused by an ELF-ARROW.

Elgin Marbles. The 7th Earl of Elgin (1766-1841) was envoy to the Sublime Porte from 1799 to 1803 and noticed that many of the classical sculptures at ATHENS were suffering from neglect and depredations. At his own expense, he made a collection of statuary and sculpture, including the frieze from the PARTHENON and works of Phidias, and brought them to England. He sold the "Elgin Marbles" to the BRITISH MUSEUM in 1816 for £36,000, a good deal less than they had cost him.

Elia. A nom de plume used by Charles Lamb (1775-1834), under which a series of essays appeared. The first of these (in the London Magazine, 1820) was a description of the Old South-Sea House, with which he associated the name of Elia, an Italian clerk, a "gay light-hearted foreigner", who was a fellow employee.

Eliab. In Dryden's ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL, Eliab is meant for Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington. Eliab was one of the chiefs of the Gadites who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. xii).

Elidure. A legendary king of Britain, who in some accounts was advanced to the throne in place of his brother, Arthgallo (or ARTEGAL), supposed by him to be dead. Arthgallo, after a long exile, returned to his country, and Elidure resigned the throne. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject called Artegal and Elidure.

Eligius, St. See ELOI, ST.

Elijah's Mantle. Metaphorically the assumption of powers previously enjoyed by another, as Elisha took up the mantle of Elijah (II Kings ii, 13).

Elijah's Melons. Certain stones on Mount Carmel are so called from the legend that the owner of the land refused to supply food for the prophet, and for punishment his melons were turned into stones.

Eliot, George. The pseudonym of Mary Ann, or Marian, Evans (1819-1880). Her first novel appearing under this name was Scenes of Clerical Life, 1858.

Elliott's Tailors. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Elissa. DIDO, Queen of Carthage, was sometimes called Elissa.

Elixir of Life. The supposed potion of the alchemists that would prolong life indefinitely. It was sometimes imagined as a powder, sometimes as a fluid (Arab.

a powder for sprinkling on wounds). It also meant the PHILOSOPHER'S STONE, used for transmuting base metals into GOLD. The name is now given to any sovereign remedy—especially of the "QUACK" variety.

Elizabeth. St. Elizabeth of Hungary (1207-1231). Patron SAINT of the Third Order of St. FRANCIS of which she was a member. Her day is 19 November and she was noted for her good works and love of the poor. She is commemorated in Kingsley's poem The Saint's Tragedy. The story is told that her husband Louis at first forbade her abounding gifts to the poor. One day he saw her carrying away a bundle of bread and told her to open it asking what it contained. "Only flowers, my lord," said Elizabeth and, to save the lie, God converted the loaves into flowers and the king was confronted with a mass of red roses. This miracle converted him.

Ell. An old measure of length, which, like foot, was taken from a part of the body, viz. the forearm. The word (O.E. eln) is from a Teutonic word alina, the forearm to the tip of the middle finger, which also gives elbow, and is cognate with Latin ulna. The English ell was 45 inches, the Scotch ell only 37 inches, while the Flemish ell was three-quarters of a yard, and a French ell a yard and a half.

Give him an inch and he'll take an ell. Give him a little licence, and he will take great liberties or make great encroachments.

The King's Ell-wand. The group of stars called "ORION'S Belt".

Elmo's Fire, St. Elmo through Ermo, is an Italian corruption of St. Erasmus, a 4th century Syrian bishop who came to be regarded as the patron SAINT of seamen. and St. Elmo's Fire was attributed to him. Through some confusion the name St. Elmo was also applied by Spanish sailors to the 13th century DOMINICAN, Blessed Peter Gonzalez, who revered him as their particular guardian for his labours among them. See CORPOSANT.

Elohim. The plural form of the Heb. eloah, God. It expresses the general notion of Deity in the same way as the more widely used El, which is found in Babylonian, Aramaean, Phœnician, Hebrew, and Arabic. JEHOVAH (Yahweh or Yahve), however, is used with the special meaning of the God of Israel.

Elohistic and Yahwistic Sources. The Mosaic authorship of the PENTATEUCH is no longer held by Biblical scholars and the first six books of the BIBLE (the Hexateuch) are usually regarded as a literary entity compounded of a variety of sources. Among the evidence used to support this view, is the use of the names ELOHIM and YAHWEH. In some sections of the Hexateuch Elohim is used, in others Yahweh, and in some the names are used indifferently, the general conclusion being that the various sources, written at different periods, were subsequently blended. See also JEHOVAH, ADONAI.

Eloi, St., or St. Eligius (el' oi, el ij' i us) (588-659). Patron SAINT of goldsmiths and apostle of Flanders. Trained as a goldsmith, he was treasurer to DAGOBERT I (King of the Franks) and Bishop of Noyon.

Eloquent. The old man eloquent. Isocrates (436-338 B.C.), the Greek orator. He wrote a letter to Philip of Macedon congratulating him on his victory at Chæronea and died soon after. He was a Greek patriot in the wider sense and possibly thought Philip's triumph would promote peace and unity. The old view was that he died of grief at the Macedonian victory.

That dishonest victory
At Chæronea, fatal to liberty,
Killed with report that old man eloquent.
MILTON: Sonnets (To Lady Margaret Ley).

The Eloquent Doctor. The SCHOOLMAN, Peter Aureolus (Pierre d'Auriol, 14th century), Archbishop of Aix.

Elysium (e liz' i ùm). In Greek mythology, the abode of the blessed; hence the Elysian Fields, the PARADISE or Happy Land in Greek poetry. Elysian means happy, delightful.

Would Take the prison'd soul,
And lap it in Elysium.

MILTON: Comus, 256, 7.

Elzevir. An edition of a classic author from the house of Elzevir, booksellers, printers and publishers, who made such works their chief concern. The firm was founded by Louis in 1580, a Calvinist of Louvain, who settled at Leiden to escape persecution, and it continued in business until 1712. Members of the family established branches at The Hague, Utrecht, and Amsterdam, and Isaak (1596-1651) was appointed printer to the University of Leiden in 1620. The firm was at its best in the first half of the 17th century and their DUODECIMO classics sold all over Europe. The Amsterdam branch closed in 1680, having published works of Bacon, Comenius, Descartes, Milton, Hobbes, Molière, and Pascal. Elzevirs were cheap, soundly produced, and recognized for the quality of their scholarship. The cult of collecting them reached its height during the 19th century.

Em. The unit of measure in printing. The square of the body of any size of type. For standard purposes the pica em is taken, measuring 12 points or one-sixth of an inch. The depth and width of a printed page is measured in ems. An em is half an em, and is the average width of the letters in a fount; it is thus used as a basis for casting-off or estimating a quantity of typed matter.

Embargo. To lay an embargo on. To prohibit, to forbid. The word comes from the Sp. embargar, to detain, and is especially applied to the prohibition of foreign ships to enter or leave a port, or to undertake any commercial transaction; also to the seizure of a ship, goods, etc., for the use of the State.

Embarras de richesse (om ba ra' de rē shes') (Fr.). A perplexing amount of wealth, or too great an abundance of anything; more matter than can be conveniently employed. The phrase was used as the title of a play by the Abbé d'Allainval (1753).

Ember Days. The Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of the four EMBER WEEKS once observed as days of fasting and abstinence, the following Sundays being the days of Ordination. The name is the M.E. ymbere, from O.E. ymbren, a period, course or circuit (as the rotation of the seasons).

Ember Weeks. The weeks next after the first Sunday in LENT, WHIT SUNDAY, HOLY CROSS DAY (14 September), and St. Lucia's Day (13 December). Uniformity of observance was fixed by the Council of Placentia in 1095, but they were introduced into Britain by Augustine.

Ember goose. The northern diver or loon; called in Norway imbre, because it appears on the coast about the time of Ember days in ADVENT. In Germany it is called Adventsvogel.

Emblem. A symbolical figure or representation; a pictorial design with an allusive meaning which is inserted or "cast into" the visible device (Gr. em, in; ballein, to cast). Thus a balance is an emblem of justice, white of purity, a sceptre of sovereignty.

Some of the most common and simple emblems of the Christian Church are:

A chalice. The eucharist.

The circle inscribed in an equilateral triangle, or the triangle in a circle. To denote the co-equality and co-eternity of the TRINITY.

A cross. The Christian's life and conflict; the death of Christ for man's redemption.

A crown. The reward of the perseverance of the SAINTS.

A dove. The HOLY GHOST.

A hand from the clouds. To denote God the Father.

A lamb, fish, pelican etc. The Lord Jesus Christ.

A phoenix. The resurrection.

Emblematical poems. Poems consisting of lines of different lengths so that the outline of the poem on the written page can be made to represent the object of the verse. Thus, George Herbert in the Temple wrote a poem on the Altar that is shaped like an altar, and one on Easter Wings like wings. George Puttenham in his Arte of English Poesie (1589) gives a chapter on this form of word-torture (which he calls "Proportion in Figure"), giving examples of eggs, crosses, pillars, pyramids, etc., and it was gibbeted by Ben Jonson, Dryden, Addison, and others.

As for altars and pyramids in poetry, he has outdone all men that way; for he has made a gridiron and a frying-pan in verse, that besides the likeness in shape, the very tone and sound of the words did perfectly represent the noise that is made by these utensils.

SAMUEL BUTLER: Character of a Small Poet.

Embolismic (Late Lat. embolismus, intercalation). Pertaining to intercalation, that which is inserted; thus in the Jewish CALENDAR an embolismic year consists of thirteen lunar months, an ordinary year of twelve.

Emerald. According to legend, an emerald protected the chastity of the wearer. It also warded off evil spirits, and epilepsy, cured dysentery, and was anciently supposed to aid weak eyesight.

The Emerald Isle. Ireland, from its bright-green verdure. The term was first used by Dr. Drennan (1754-1820) in his poem called Erin.

Nor one feeling of vengeance presume to defile
The cause or the men of the Emerald Isle.

E. J. DRENNAN: Erin.

Émigré (á' mē grā) (Fr.). An emigrant or refugee. The word is particularly applied to those royalists and members of the privileged classes who left France during the Revolution. Their co-operation with foreign powers led to severe laws against them. NAPOLEON, as First Consul, proclaimed a general amnesty, when many returned to France. After the fall of the Empire they were rewarded with political favours by Louis XVIII, but did not recover their estates and former privileges.

Emilie. The "divine Emilie" to whom VOLTAIRE wrote verses, was the Marquise du Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey for some ten years, between 1735 and 1749.

Emmanuel, or Immanuel (Heb. God with us). The name of the child whose birth was foretold by Isaiah, and who was to be a sign from God to Ahaz (Is. vii, 14). The name was later applied in the New Testament to the Messiah.

Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us.—(Matt. i, 23).

Empedocles (em ped' ō klēz). Greek philosopher, statesman, and poet (c. 493-c. 433 B.C.). According to Lucian, he cast himself into the crater of ETNA, that people might believe he was returned to the gods; but Etna threw out his sandal and destroyed the illusion (HORACE, Ars Poetica, 404).

He who to be deemed
A god, leaped fondly into Etna flames,
Empedocles.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, III, 469.

Matthew Arnold published (1853) a classical drama with the title Empedocles on Etna.

Emperor (Lat. Imperator). This title, borne by certain monarchs as a mark of the highest regal dignity, derives from its use by the rulers of the Roman Empire. In the days of the Roman Republic, the title imperator was given to magistrates vested with imperium, the supreme administrative power, which included military command. It came to be applied as a title of honour to military commanders after a victory until the celebration of their triumph. Julius Cæsar was the first to use the title permanently and it was adopted by Octavian as a prænomen (i.e. imperator Cæsar, not Cæsar imperator). In due course it became the monarchical title of the head of the Empire. Constantine Palæologus, the last of the emperors, fell in the siege of Constantinople in 1453.

CHARLEMAGNE was crowned Roman Emperor in 800 but the first known use of the title HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE occurs in 1254. The so-called Holy Roman Emperors, whose office was abandoned by Francis II in 1806, were at best rulers of Germany, Burgundy and northern Italy, and from 1556 the HABSBURG emperors were but virtual presidents of a loose Germanic federation.

In 1804 the Holy Roman Emperor

Francis II assumed the hereditary title of Emperor of Austria (as Francis I), a title last borne by Francis Joseph (1848-1916).

In 1804 NAPOLEON crowned himself Emperor of the French. The First Empire lasted until 1815; NAPOLEON III ruled the Second Empire from 1852 until 1870.

Peter the Great was proclaimed "Emperor of All Russia" in 1721. The Russian Empire lasted until 1917.

In 1871 King William I of Prussia was proclaimed Emperor of Germany at Versailles. William II, the last German Emperor, abdicated in 1918.

King Victor Emmanuel III of Italy was declared Emperor of Abyssinia in 1936, when Italian forces invaded the country and the rightful Emperor, Haile Selassie I, went into exile until his return to his capital in 1941. Italy became a Republic in 1946.

Queen Victoria assumed the title of Empress of India in 1876. The title was relinquished by British sovereigns in 1947.

Emperors ruled Brazil from 1822 to 1889; Mexico from 1822 to 1823 and from 1864 to 1867 (the ill-fated Maximilian of Austria); Haiti from 1804 to 1806. The title of Emperor has also been given to rulers of India, China, Japan, Ethiopia, etc.

Emperor. A standard size of drawing paper measuring 48 inches by 72 inches, the largest sheet made by hand.

Emperor, not for myself, but for my people. The maxim of the Roman Emperor Hadrian (117-138).

The Emperor of Believers. Omar I (581-644), father-in-law of MOHAMMED, and second of the Mohammedan caliphs.

The Emperor's Chambermaids. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Empire City, The. New York, the great commercial city of the United States, from its situation in the Empire State, the name given to New York State on account of its wealth and importance. Hence the name of the famous and tallest New York skyscraper.

Empire Day. Instituted by the Earl of Meath in 1902, after the end of the South African War, as a day to encourage schoolchildren to be aware of their duties and responsibilities as citizens of the British Empire. The day set aside was 24 May, Queen Victoria's birthday. In 1916 it was given official recognition in the United Kingdom, and was renamed Commonwealth Day in December 1958.

Empire Loyalist. See UNITED EMPIRE LOYALISTS.

Empire Promenade, The. A once famous feature of the former Empire Theatre, Leicester Square. This open space behind the dress circle was a regular parade of the "ladies of the town". In 1894, Mrs. Ormiston Chant of the London County Council directed a purity campaign against the MUSIC-HALLS and sought to effect the closure of the Empire Promenade and its adjoining bars. This led to the erection of canvas screens between them, but these were soon demolished by a riotous crowd, a prominent member being the young Winston Churchill. Brick partitions were subsequently built.

Thus the temples of Venus and Bacchus, though adjacent, would be separated, and their attack on human frailties could only be delivered in a successive or alternating and not in a concentrated form.

W. S. CHURCHILL: My Early Life, ch. iv.

Empire Style. The style of furniture, decoration, costume, etc., that came into vogue in Napoleonic France and lasting from about 1800 until 1820. The Empire style followed the pseudo-classical fervour of the Revolution, but was much influenced by NAPOLEON's wish to emulate the splendour of Imperial Rome, hence the imitation of Roman architecture. The Egyptian campaign led to the introduction of Egyptian embellishments, notably the SPHINX. There was much use of bronze appliqué ornament, mirrors, and brocade, and court costume was rich and ornate. Women's fashions changed frequently, but the high-waisted Grecian style remained a constant motif.

Empirics. A school of medicine founded by Serapion of Alexandria (c. 200-150 B.C.) who made observation and experiment the first guide to treatment (Gr. empeiros, experienced). The statements of established authorities were placed second. Hence any medical QUACK or pretender is called an empiric.

We must not

So stain our judgement, or corrupt our hope,
To prostitute our past-cure malady
To empirics.

SHAKESPEARE: All's Well That Ends Well, II, i.

Empyrean (em pi rē' ān). According to Ptolemy, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure elemental fire and the seat of deity; this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (Gr. empyros, fiery); hence in Christian angelology, the abode of God and the angels. See HEAVEN.

Now had the Almighty Father from above,
From the pure Empyrean where he sits
High thron'd above all height, bent down his eye.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, III, 56.

Empyromancy. An ancient method of divination by observing the behaviour of certain objects when placed on a sacrificial fire. Eggs, flour and incense were used for this purpose as well as a shoulder-blade.

En avant (on ä von) (Fr.). Forward.

En bloc (on blok) (Fr.). The whole lot together. Cp. EN MASSE.

En famille (on fa më) (Fr.). In the privacy of one's own home.

En garçon (on gar' son) (Fr.). As a bachelor. "To take me en garçon", without ceremony, as a bachelor fares in ordinary life.

En grande toilette; en grande tenue (on grond twa let; on grond tẽ nü) (Fr.). In full dress; dressed for a great occasion.

En masse (on mãs) (Fr.). The whole lot, just as it stands; the whole.

En papillotes (on papê yot) (Fr.). In a state of undress; literally, in curl-papers. Cutlets with frills on them are en papillote.

En passant (on pãs' on) (Fr.). By the way. A remark made en passant is one dropped in, almost an aside.

En pension (on pon' si on) (Fr.). Pension is payment for board and lodging; hence, a boarding-house. "To live en pension" is to live at a boarding-house or hotel, etc., for a charge that includes board and lodging.

En rapport (on ra pôr) (Fr.). In harmony with; in agreement.

En route (on root) (Fr.). On the way; on the road or journey.

Encænïa (en se' ni ä) (Lat. from Gr., commemoration). The annual commemoration in June which concludes the academic year at Oxford and held in the SHELDONIAN THEATRE. Benefactors are commemorated, honorary degrees conferred, prize compositions recited, etc.

Enceladus (en sel' ä düs). The most powerful of the hundred-armed giants, sons of URANUS and GE, who conspired against ZEUS. The king of gods and men cast him down at Phlegra, in Macedonia, and threw Mount ETNA over him. The poets say that the flames of the volcano arise from the breath of this giant.

Encomium (en kô' mi ùm) (Gr. komos, revel). In ancient Greece, a eulogy or panegyric in honour of a victor in the games; hence, praise, eulogy, especially of a formal nature. The encomium was sung in the procession which escorted the victor home.

Encore (on kôr). A good example of "ENGLISH FRENCH". Our use of this word is not as in France, where they say bis (twice) if they wish a thing to be repeated.

Encore une tasse is "another cup", encore une fois, "once again".

Enkratites (en krät' i tẽz). In the early Church, and especially among the Gnostics, those ascetics who condemned marriage, forbade eating flesh or drinking wine, and rejected all the luxuries and comforts of life. The name is Greek, and signifies "the self-disciplined" or "continent".

Encyclopedia (en sï klô pê' di ä) or Encyclopædia. A book or books giving information on all branches of knowledge or on a particular subject, usually arranged alphabetically. The Greek word was used to denote a complete system of learning. The earliest encyclopedia extant is Pliny's Naturalis historia in 37 books (1st century A.D.). In c. 1360 Bartholomew de Glanville, an English Franciscan friar, wrote De proprietatibus rerum, in 19 books, starting with an article on God and ending with a list of birds' eggs, but the first encyclopedia in English was that of John Harris (c. 1667-1719) who in 1704 produced a Lexicon technicum or an Universal English Dictionary of Arts and Sciences. This was soon overshadowed by the work of Ephraim Chambers (d. 1740), who, in 1728, brought out his Cyclopædia, or an Universal Dictionary of Art and Sciences, etc., in two volumes, the forerunner of Chambers's Encyclopædia which is still the leading British production in this field. The Encyclopædia Britannica was first published at Edinburgh in three volumes (1768-1771). It was later taken over by Constable, then by A. and C. Black, and in 1920 it passed into American hands. The 11th edition (1908) in 29 volumes was issued by the Cambridge University Press, by arrangement. It is now published "with the editorial advice of the faculties of the University of Chicago and a committee of members of Oxford, Cambridge, and London Universities".

The French Encyclopédie developed from a translation of Chambers's Cyclopædia. The new work appeared at Paris between 1751 and 1772 in 28 volumes (including 11 volumes of plates) under the editorship of Diderot, assisted by d'Alembert, and many of the leading men of letters contributed to it. The Encyclopedists were exponents of sceptical, deistic and heretical opinions and their attacks on the Church and despotic government served the cause of revolution. Thus the name Encyclopedist designated a certain form of philosophy and gave their work conspicuous political importance resulting in censorship and attempts at suppression.

The above are but examples of the growth of a multitude of such reference books now too numerous to mention.

End. A rope's end. A short length of rope used for beating someone, a once convenient and common disciplinary weapon in a ship.

A shoemaker's end. A length of thread pointed with a bristle, and used by shoemakers.

At a loose end. See LOOSE.

At my wits' end. In a quandary how to proceed further; not knowing what further to do; nonplussed.

East End. The district or part of a town east or west of the central part. In LONDON and many other large towns the East End is essentially a working-class district and the WEST END is the fashionable quarter.

End for end. In reverse position, as to turn a rope or plank so that each end occupies the opposite to its former position.

End it or mend it. Said when an impasse or a crisis is reached, when things are intolerable and something simply must be done.

The Labour Party declared for the total abolition of the Second Chamber, but the Government preferred "mending" to "ending".

J. A. R. MARRIOTT: Modern England, ch. xvii.

He is no end of a fellow. A capital chap; a most agreeable companion.

Odds and ends. Fragments, remnants; bits and pieces of trifling value.

On end. Erect; also, in succession, without a break, as, "He'll go on talking for days on end."

One's latter end. The close of one's life.

So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning. Job xlii, 12.

The end justifies the means. A false doctrine, frequently condemned by various Popes, which teaches that evil means may be employed to produce a good result.

The End must justify the means;
He only sins who ill intends;
Since therefore 'tis to combat Evil;
'Tis lawful to employ the Devil.

PRIOR: Hans Carvel.

The End of the World. According to rabbinical legend, the world was to last six thousand years. The reasons assigned are (1) because the name Yahweh contains six letters; (2) because the Hebrew letter m occurs six times in the book of Genesis; (3) because the patriarch Enoch, who was taken to heaven without dying, was the sixth generation from ADAM (Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch); (4) because God created the world in six days; (5) because six contains three binaries—the first 2,000 years were for the law of nature, the next 2,000 the written law, and the last 2,000 the law of grace. See LAST TRUMP under TRUMP.

The ends of the earth. The remotest parts of the earth, the regions farthest from civilization.

All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.—Ps. xcvi, 3.

To begin at the wrong end. To take things in the wrong order; to attempt to do something without any method.

To be one's end. The cause or agent of his death.

This apoplexy will certain be his end.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, IV, iv.

To burn the candle at both ends. See under BURN.

To come to the end of one's tether. See TETHER.

To go off the deep end. To get unnecessarily excited or angry.

To have something at one's fingers' ends. See under FINGER.

To make ends, or both ends meet. To make one's income cover expenses; to manage to live without getting into debt.

To put an end to. To terminate, or cause to terminate.

To the bitter end. See BITTER.

West End. See under WEST.

End-irons. Two movable iron cheeks or plates, formerly used in cooking-stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure. The term explains itself but must not be mistaken for "dogs". See ANDIRON.

End papers. The two leaves at the front and back of a book, one of which is pasted down on to the inside of the cover and the other is a fly-leaf. They were formerly usually coloured or marbled. Sometimes maps, plans, etc., are printed on them.

End-stopped. A term in prosody denoting that the sense of the line to which it is applied is completed with that line and does not run over to the next; the opposite of enjambement. In the following lines the first is an example of enjambement, and the second is end-stopped.

Awake, my St. John, leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of Kings.
POPE: Essay on Man, I, i.

Endymion (en dim' i on). In Greek mythology, the shepherd son of Aethlius, loved by SELENE, the Moon goddess who bore him fifty daughters. Another story is that ZEUS gave him eternal life and youth by allowing him to sleep perpetually on Mount Latmus and Selene came down nightly to embrace him. The story is used by Keats in his Endymion (1818) and it forms the basis of Lyly's comedy, Endimion, the Man in the Moone (1585).

The moon sleeps with Endymion,
And would not be awaked.
SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, V, i.

Enemy. How goes the enemy?, or What says the enemy? What o'clock is it? Time is the enemy of man, especially of those who are behindhand.

Enfant terrible (on fon te rêbl) (Fr.). Literally, a terrible child. An embarrassing person, one who says or does awkward things at embarrassing times; one who stirs up trouble for his cause or party by his impetuousness.

England. In O.E. it is Engla land, meaning the land of the Angles, a Germanic people who began to invade Britain in the late 5th century from the Baltic coastlands, Angeln at the south of the Danish peninsula being their chief centre. Their kingdoms were those of the East and Middle Angles, Mercia, and Northumbria.

England's Darling. A name given to Hereward the Wake (fl. 1070), the patriot who held the Isle of Ely against WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR and eventually escaped with a few followers when the isle was beset by William's forces.

England expects that every man this day will do his duty. See under DUTY.

Little Englander. A name applied to those RADICAL and LIBERAL politicians and propagandists of Victorian England who, influenced by the doctrines of LAISSAFAIRE and the MANCHESTER SCHOOL, or from more positive and idealistic reasons, opposed IMPERIALISM and advocated retrenchment in the colonial field. Gladstone, Granville, Cobden, and Bright are examples.

That is why I distrust . . . the late Government, because in their ranks were men who notoriously were "Little England" men, who took every opportunity of carping at and criticizing those brave Englishmen who have made for us homes across the sea, men who are opposed to any extension of the responsibilities and obligations of Empire, men who are unworthy sons of the ancestors who have made this country what it is.

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN:
Speech at Walsall (15 July 1895).

English. The language of the people of ENGLAND. It is derived from the West Germanic branch of the Germanic or Teutonic division of the Indo-European or Aryan family of languages. Historically it is divided into three main stages of development—Old English, or Anglo-Saxon, from the invasion to c. 1100;

Middle English from c. 1100 to c. 1500; Modern, or New English, from c. 1500. It is the most widely used language in the world.

In typography English was the name given to a large size of type, two points (i.e. one-thirty-sixth of an inch) larger than pica and four points smaller than great primer.

Basic English. See BASIC.

Borough English. See under BOROUGH.

King's, or Queen's English. English as it should be spoken. The term occurs in SHAKESPEARE'S Merry Wives of Windsor (I, iv), but it is older and was evidently common. Queene's English is found in Nashe's Strange Newes of the Intercepting Certain Letters (1593), and "thou clipt the Kinge's English" in Dekker's Satiro-Mastix (1602).

These fine English clerkes will saith thei speake in their mother tongue, if a manne should charge them for counterfeiting the kinges Englishe.

THOMAS WILSON: Arte of Rhetorique (1553).

Plain English. Plain, unmistakable speech or writing. To tell a person in plain English what you think of him is to give your very candid opinion without any beating about the bush.

To put on English (U.S.A.). In billiards and in baseball, to apply spin to the ball.

English French. A kind of perversity seems to pervade many of the words which we have borrowed from the French. Thus our curate is the Fr. vicaire, and our vicar the Fr. curé. Also note epergne (Fr. surtout); surtout (Fr. pardessus). Screw (Fr. vis), whereas the Fr. écrou we call a nut; and our vice is the Fr. étai. Some still say à l'outrance (Fr. à outrance). We say double entendre, the French à double entente. See ENCORE.

Englishman. The national nickname of an Englishman is JOHN BULL. The old nickname for him in France was GODDAM.

An Englishman's home, or house is his castle. Because so long as a man shuts himself up in his own house, no bailiff can break through the door to arrest him or seize his goods. It is generally used to mean that an Englishman is inviolable in his own home. In the third of his Institutes Sir Edward Coke (1552-1634) says:

A man's house is his castle, et domus sua cuique tutissimum refugium.

And, again, in his report on Semayne's case:

The house of everyone is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence as for his repose.

Englishry. The differentiation between English and Normans or Anglo-Normans and Welsh. WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR introduced the murdrum, or fine for murder, to protect his fellow Normans. The fine was payable by the HUNDRED if the murderer could not be found. If it could be proved Englishry, i.e., that the corpse was English, the Hundred was exempt.

Enid. The daughter and only child of Yniol, and wife of Prince GERAINT, one of the Knights of the ROUND TABLE. Ladies called her "Enid the Fair", but the people named her "Enid the Good". Her story is told in Tennyson's Geraint and Enid (Idylls of the King).

Enjambement. See END-STOPPED.

Enlightened Doctor, The. Raymond Lully of Palma (c. 1235-1315), a Spaniard, and one of the most distinguished of the 13th-century SCHOOLMEN.

Enniskillens. See INNISKILLINGS.

Ennius. "The father of Roman poetry" (239-169 B.C.). Noted for his dramas and epic poetry.

The English Ennius. Layamon (fl. c. 1200), who made a late Old English paraphrase of Wace's Brut d'Angleterre. Chaucer is also called the English Ennius.

The French Ennius. Guillaume de Loris (fl. 1230), author of the Roman de la Rose; also Jean de Meung (c. 1240-c. 1305) who wrote a continuation of the romance, is sometimes so called.

The Spanish Ennius. Juan de Mena (1411-1456), Spanish poet and author of El Laborinto de Fortuna.

Ensa Concerts. In World War II, concerts provided for the British fighting forces on active service by the Entertainments National Service Association (E.N.S.A.). Many famous figures in the entertainment and musical world took part.

Entail. An estate in which the rights of the owner are cut down (Fr. tailler, to cut) by his being deprived of the right of the power of alienating them at pleasure and so depriving the rights of his issue; also the settlement of an estate in such a manner. Tail males or tail females were entails where the property passed exclusively to the males or females respectively.

To cut off the entail. To put an end to the limitation of an inheritance to a particular line or class of heirs.

Entente Cordiale (on tont' kôr di al') (Fr.). A cordial understanding between nations; not amounting to an alliance but something more than a rapprochement. The term is particularly applied to the Anglo-French Entente of 1904, for which King Edward VII's visit to Paris in 1903 was a valuable preliminary. The phrase was used in the time of Louis-Philippe when Guizot was in power. He achieved a "cordial understanding" with Lord Aberdeen in 1844.

If Guizot remains in office Normanby must be recalled, as the only chance of a renewal of the entente cordiale.

GREVILLE'S Diary, p. 189 (1847).

Enter. To enter the lists. Figuratively, to enter any field of rivalry or controversy; an allusion to the arrival of a challenger in the tilting-ground in mediæval TOURNAMENTS.

Entertain. To entertain an angel un-awares. To meet and talk with someone famed for saintliness of life, while unaware of his identity; nowadays more usually applied to the entertainment of persons of note rather than sanctity.

Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares.

Hebrews, xliii, 2.

Cp. PHILEMON AND BAUCIS.

Enthusiast (Gr. en theos). Literally, one who is possessed or inspired by a god. "Inspired" is very similar, being the Lat. in spirare, to breathe in (the god-like essence). In the 17th and 18th centuries the word enthusiasm was applied disparagingly to emotional religion.

Entire. As the name of a beer, the term is now rarely used, but is still seen on public-house signs and advertisements. In the early 18th century the chief malt liquors were ALE, beer, and twopenny (a superior kind of ale sold at 2d. a pint). The constant demand for mixtures induced the brewers to combine the qualities of the three in a liquor called entire (from its being drawn from one cask). Being much drunk by porters it also came to be called porter.

The Fokers had been at the Cistercian school from father to son; at which place, our friend, whose name could be seen over the playground wall, on a public-house sign, under which "Foker's Entire" was painted, had been dreadfully bullied on account of his trade.

THACKERAY: Pendennis, ch. v.

Entrée (on' trā) (Fr.). To have entrée. To have the right or privilege of entry or admission.

Entre nous (on tré noo') (Fr.). Between you and me; in confidence.

Eolithic Age, The. The name given to the earliest part of the STONE AGE (Gr. eos, dawn; lithos, a stone). It is characterized by the rudest stone implements.

Eolus. See ÆOLUS.

Eon. See ÆON.

Epact (Gr. epagein, to intercalate). The excess of the solar over the lunar year, the former consisting of 365 days, and the latter of 354, or eleven days less. The epact of any year is the number of days from the last new moon of the old year to the first of the following January. It was used in determining the date of EASTER. (See Table of Movable Feasts at the beginning of the Book of Common Prayer.)

Epaulette (ep' aw let). A shoulder ornament worn by officers of the Royal Navy above the rank of sub-lieutenant, when in full dress. Epaulettes ceased to be worn in the army in 1855. Officers of the U.S. Navy above the rank of ensign wear epaulettes, but since 1872, in the army, they are worn by generals only.

Ephebi (e fē' bi) (Gr.). Youths who had reached the age of puberty. At Athens it denoted a youth who had reached the age of eighteen, and who had to spend a year in military training and a second year on garrison duty. When fully trained, he was given his shield and spear. He also attended public functions and was immune from taxation.

The system was adopted throughout the Greek world and, during the Roman period, athletic, cultural and religious studies took the place of military training, and admission for ephebi was by selection.

Ephesian. A jolly companion; a roysterer. The origin of the term is unknown. SHAKESPEARE also uses CORINTHIAN in much the same way.

It is thine host, thine Ephesian calls.
Merry Wives of Windsor, IV, v.

Diana of the Ephesians. See under DIANA.

The Ephesian Poet. Hipponax, born at Ephesus in the 6th century B.C.

Ephialtes. A giant, son of POSEIDON and brother of Otus. When nine years old, they were nine fathoms tall and nine cubits broad. They were slain by APOLLO.

Ephors. In Sparta, the five magistrates annually elected from the ruling caste. They exercised control over the king, the Gerousia (Council of Elders) and the Apella (Assembly).

Epic Poetry. Narrative poetry of an elevated and dignified style dealing with heroic and historical events, real or fictitious and mythical. The ILIAD and ODYSSEY, Virgil's ÆNEID and Milton's Paradise Lost are outstanding examples.

Father of Epic Poetry. HOMER.

Epicurus (ep i kū' rus). The Greek philosopher (c. 341-c.270 B.C.) who founded the Epicurean School and taught that "pleasure" was the natural aim and highest good, but a pleasure which consisted of right living which led to tranquility of mind and body. The idea that "good living" and luxury were the pleasures to be sought was a corruption of his teaching.

Hence, epicure, one devoted to the pleasures of the table, but fastidious in his choice; epicurean, pertaining to good eating and drinking.

Epicurean cooks
Sharpen with cloyless sauce his appetite.
SHAKESPEARE: Antony and Cleopatra, II, i.

See DUM VIVIMUS VIVAMUS.

Epigoni. See THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES under THEBES.

Epigram. A short piece of verse ending in a witty or ingenious thought, or WITH A STING IN ITS TAIL (under TAIL); or any short pointed or witty saying. The original Greek verse epigrams were graceful lines for inscription on tombstones, etc.

Treason doth never prosper; what's the reason?
For if it prosper, none dare call it treason.

SIR JOHN HARINGTON.

You beat your pate, and fancy wit will come:
Knock as you please, there's nobody at home.

ALEXANDER POPE.

The Devil having nothing else to do
Went off to tempt My Lady Poltargue.
My Lady, tempted by a private whim,
To his extreme annoyance, tempted him.

HILAIRE BELLOC.

Sir, I admit your general rule,
That every poet is a fool:
But you yourself may serve to show it,
That every fool is not a poet.

MATTHEW PRIOR.

Epimenides (e pi men' i dēz). A religious teacher and wonder worker of Crete (6th or 7th century B.C.). According to Pliny (Natural History), he fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake for 57 years. He is supposed to have lived for 299 years. Cp. RIP VAN WINKLE under WINKLE.

Epiphany (e pif' à ni) (Gr. epiphaneia, an appearance, manifestation). The manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, i.e. to the Wise Men from the East. 6 January is the Feast of the Epiphany in commemoration of this. The vigil of the Epiphany (5 January) was the time for choosing the BEAN-KING. See TWELFTH NIGHT under TWELVE.

Episcopacy (Gr. episkopos, overseer, Lat. episcopus, bishop). Church government by BISHOPS. Hence an episcopalian church is a church governed by bishops and its supporters are designated episcopalians. Episcopacy in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND was contested early on by Calvinists, who advocated a PRESBYTERIAN system, and was abolished by PARLIAMENT in 1643, but restored with the return of the Stuarts. See ROOT AND BRANCH.

Episcopal Signatures

Episcopal Signatures. It is the custom of BISHOPS of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND to sign themselves with their Christian name and name of their SEE. In some of the older dioceses the Latin form is used, sometimes abbreviated:

Cantuar.	Canterbury.	Norwic.	Norwich.
Ebor.	York.	Oxon.	Oxford.
Carloli.	Carlisle.	Petriburg.	Peterborough.
Cestr.	Chester.	Roffen.	Rochester.
Cestr.	Chichester.	Sarum.	Salisbury.
Dunelm.	Durham.	Truron.	Truro.
Exon.	Exeter.	Winton.	Winchester.
Gloucest.	Gloucester.

Episode (Gr. coming in besides, adventitious). Originally the parts in dialogue which were interpolated between the choric songs in Greek tragedy; hence an adventitious tale introduced into the main story; an incident or happening standing by itself, but part of a wider series of events as, "an episode in the Egyptian campaign".

In music, an intermediate or connective passage in certain forms of composition, especially a fugue.

Epistle (e pis' èl). This word, related in origin to apostle, comes from a Greek verb meaning "to send to". The word is particularly applied to the New Testament letters, from which extracts are read at the Communion service. There are thirteen from St. PAUL, one from St. JAMES, two from St. PETER, three from St. JOHN, and one from St. JUDE, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, of unknown authorship, written to the various churches with which they were concerned.

The epistle side of the altar. That side from which the Epistle is read at the Communion service. It is to the right of the celebrant as he faces the altar.

Epitaph (ep' i taf). Strictly, an inscription on a tomb, but usually it refers to any brief verses or apt commemoration of the departed.

Here a pretty baby lies
Sung asleep with lullabies;
Pray be silent, and not stir
Th' easy earth that covers her.
ROBERT HERRICK, Upon a child.

Fuller's Earth.
Thomas Fuller's epitaph on himself, 1661.

His foe was folly and his weapon wit.
Epitaph on W. S. Gilbert by "Anthony Hope" Hawkins.

Life is a jest, and all things show it;
I thought so once, and now I know it.
John Gay's epitaph on himself, 1732.

Si monumentum requiris circumspecte.
Sir Christopher Wren's epitaph in St. Paul's.

Epithalamium (e pi thá lā' mi um). In ancient Greece, a song sung by youths and maidens outside the bridal chamber. The poets developed it as a special literary form, notably SAPPHO, ANACREON, Stesichorus and Pindar. Spenser's Epithalamion (1595) is, however, the most celebrated English poem of this kind.

Epoch (ē' pok) (Gr. a stop or pause). A definite point in time. The succession of events in the period following, and reckoned from an epoch, is called an ERA. In general usage epoch and era are treated as interchangeable terms.

Epode (Gr. epodos; an aftersong). A Greek ode, the part after the strophe and anti-strophe; in the epode the chorus returned to their places and remained stationary. Also a form of lyric poetry invented by Archilochus in which a longer verse is followed by a shorter one. The Epodes of HORACE are the best known examples.

Father of Choral Epode. Stesichorus of Sicily (c. 632-c. 553 B.C.).

Eppur si muove (e poor sē mwō' vē) (Ital. and yet it [the earth] does move). The phrase said to have been uttered by Galileo immediately after his recantation of belief in the COPERNICAN SYSTEM. He appeared before the INQUISITION at ROME in 1633, and record of the saying (certainly apocryphal), first occurs in 1761.

Epsom Races. Horse races instituted in the reign of James I and held on Epsom Downs (continuously from 1730). The main meeting is held in May or June. The second day (Wednesday) is DERBY DAY, and on the fourth the OAKS is run.

Epsom Salts. Magnesium sulphate; used as a purgative, etc., and so called because it was originally obtained by the evaporation of the water of a mineral spring at Epsom in Surrey. According to Fuller's Worthies, the spring was discovered by a farmer in 1618, who noticed that, in spite of the drought, his cows refused to drink water from the spring. On analysis, it was found to contain the bitter purgative, sulphate of magnesia. Epsom Wells developed, like Tunbridge Wells, as a favourite London spa. Aubrey, Pepys, Nell Gwyn, and Queen Anne's consort were among its visitors. Shadwell's comedy Epsom Wells (1672) portrays the loose life of the spa in those times.

Equality. The sign of equality in mathematics, two parallel lines (=), was invented by Robert Recorde, who died in 1558. As he said, nothing is more equal than parallel lines.

Equation of Time. The difference between mean time (as on a perfect clock) and apparent time (as indicated by a sundial). The greatest difference is at the beginning of November, when the sun is somewhat more than sixteen minutes slow. There are days in December, April, June, and September when the sun and the clocks agree.

Era. A series of years beginning from some EPOCH or starting-point as:

	B.C.
The Era of the Chinese	2697
" Abraham (1 Oct.)	2016
" the Greek Olympiads	776
" the Foundation of Rome	753
" Nabonassar (Babylon)	747
" Alexander the Great	324
" the Selucidae	312
" the Maccabees	166
" Tyre (19 Oct.)	125
" Julian	45
" Actium (1 Jan.)	30
" Augustus (27 June)	27
	A.D.
" Diocletian (29 Aug.)	284
" Armenia (9 July)	552
" the Hegira (16 July)	622
" Yezdegird (Persian) (16 June)	632
" American Independence (4 July)	1776
" the French Republic (22 Sept.)	1792

The Christian Era begins theoretically from the birth of Christ, though the actual date of the Nativity is uncertain and was probably B.C. 6 or 7. The epoch of the Christian Era was fixed by calculations of Dionysius Exiguus in 527 A.D. and was inexact.

Erastianism. A term derived from Thomas Erastus (1524–1583), denoting the supremacy of the State in ecclesiastical affairs. Erastus (Gr. lovely, or beloved) was the name adopted by Thomas Lieber (Lieber, or Luber), professor of medicine at Heidelberg and at Basel, where he later held the chair of ethics. He was a follower of Zwingli, noted for his opposition to Calvinistic claims, and held that punishment for sin was the prerogative of the civil authority.

The term was popularized in England after its use in the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY, and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND is sometimes called Erastian because in certain matters it is subject to State control. See BAN-
GORIAN CONTROVERSY; CONGÉ D'ÉLIRE.

Erato. One of the nine MUSES; the Muse of erotic poetry, usually represented with a lyre.

Erebus. In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and brother of Night; hence darkness personified. His name was given to the gloomy underground cavern through which the Shades had to walk in their passage to HADES.

Not Erebus itself were dim enough
To hide thee from prevention.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Cæsar, II, i.

Eretrian. The Eretrian Bull. Menedemus of Eretria (c. 319–c. 265 B.C.) was so called from his gravity. He was a follower of the MEGARIAN SCHOOL of philosophy and founder of the Eretrian School.

Erewhon (ēr' won, âr' e won). An anagram of "Nowhere", the name of the ideal commonwealth in Samuel Butler's philosophical novel of the same name (1872). Cp. IDEAL COMMONWEALTHS under COMMONWEALTH.

Erichthonius. Fathered by VULCAN and very deformed. ATHENE put him in a box and gave its charge to the daughters of Cecrops with strict orders not to open it but they did so and out of fright at what they saw jumped off the Acropolis to their death. He became King of ATHENS and established the worship of ATHENE. He was set up as the constellation Auriga (Lat. charioteer). See CHARIOT.

Erigena. Johannes Scotus, or John the Scot (c. 815–c. 877), philosopher and theologian. The name Erigena is taken to mean "born in Erin" (Ireland) but nothing is known of his early life.

Erigone. See ICARIUS.

Erin. An ancient name for Ireland.

Erin go bragh. Ireland for ever. See MAVOURNIN.

Eriyves (e rin' yêz). In Greek mythology, avengers of wrong, the Latin FURIES. See EUMENIDES.

Erk. Originally "airk", an R.A.F. nickname of World War I given to aircraftmen and mechanics. It later became "erk" and is applied to beginners, juniors, and underlings generally.

Erking. In German legend, a malevolent GOBLIN who haunts forests and lures people, especially children, to destruction. Goethe has a poem on him, set to music by Schubert.

Ermine (ēr' min). Another name for the stoat (Putorius erminea), but more usually used for its fur which is brown in summer and white in winter. It is one of the furs used in HERALDRY and is represented by a white field flecked with black ermine tails. Black tails on a white field is now called ermine. Other variants are erminois, a gold field with black tails; ermirâtes, the same as ermine but with a red hair on either side of each black tail.

Ermine Street. The name of this essentially Roman road from LONDON to Lincoln, through Braughing and Huntingdon, is of later origin. It derives from Earningastræt (the road to Earn's people), a group of Anglo-Saxons who settled near part of its route through Cambridgeshire.

Eros. The Greek god of love, usually personified as a young boy with bow and arrows; the equivalent of the Roman CUPID. It is also the popular name for the winged archer surmounting the memorial fountain to the 7th Earl of Shaftesbury, in the centre of Piccadilly Circus, London, which is actually a symbol of Christian charity. It is the work of Sir Alfred Gilbert (1854-1934) and was unveiled in 1893.

Erra-Pater. The supposititious author of an ALMANAC published about 1535 as The Pronostycacion for ever of Erra Pater: a Jewe born in Jewery, a Doctour in Astronomye and Physycke. It is a collection of astrological tables, rules of health, etc., and is arranged for use in any year. He is alluded to in Beaumont and Fletcher's Scornful Lady and Elder Brother, and by John Taylor, the WATER POET.

He had got him a suit of durance, that would last longer than one of Erra Pater's almanacks, or a constable's browne bill.

NASHE: Nashe's Lenten Stuffe (1599).

The almanacks were frequently reprinted and nearly a hundred years later Butler (Hudibras, I, i) says of William Lilly, the almanack-maker and astrologer:

In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater.

Erse. The native language of the HIGHLANDS and Western Isles of SCOTLAND. The word is a variant of Irish, the Scots coming originally from IRELAND. It was formerly applied by the Lowlanders to the CELTIC tongue of the Highlanders. It is now usually called GAELIC and the term Erse is more usually applied to the native language of Ireland.

Of the Earse language as I understand nothing, I cannot say more than I have been told. It is the rude speech of a barbarous people, who had few thoughts to express, and were content, as they conceived grossly, to be grossly understood.

JOHNSON: A Journey to the Western Islands (Ostig in Sky) (1775).

Erudite. Most erudite of the Romans. Marcus Terentius Varro (116-27 B.C.), a man of vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature, the greatest of Roman scholars.

Erythynus (e rith' i nùs). Have no doings with the Erythynus, i.e. "don't trust a braggart". The Erythynus is mentioned by Pliny (ix, 77) as a red fish with a white belly, and PYTHAGORAS used it as a symbol of a BRAGGADOCIO, who fable says is white-livered.

Escorial, or Escurial. The royal palace, MAUSOLEUM, and monastery built by Philip II of Spain some 27 miles north-west of Madrid. It was erected between 1563 and 1584 on a rocky altitude to commemorate his victory of St. Lawrence's Day over the French at St. Quentin (1557). It is generally believed that the shape of its plan represents the gridiron on which St. LAWRENCE was martyred.

Escuage. See SCUTAGE.

Esculapius. See ÆSCULAPIUS.

Escutcheon. In HERALDRY, the shield on which armorial bearings are depicted. The word is from O.Fr. escuchon from Lat. scutum (Late Lat. scutionem), a shield.

Escutcheon of Pretence. In heraldry, the small shield of a wife, either heiress or co-heiress, placed in the centre of her husband's shield.

To blot one's escutcheon. To incur disgrace or mar one's reputation. Cp. TO BLOT ONE'S COPYBOOK under COPYBOOK.

Esoteric (Gr.) Those within, as opposed to exoteric, those without. The term originated with PYTHAGORAS, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his exoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoteric.

ARISTOTLE adopted the same terms; those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, he called his exoterics; and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Esoteric Buddhism. See THEOSOPHY.

Esprit de corps (es' prē de kôr) (Fr.). The spirit of pride in the organization with which you are associated, and regard for its traditions and associations, as a naval man speaks of "pride of ship".

Esquire. (O.Fr. esquier from Lat. scutarius, shield-bearer). One who carried the shield of a KNIGHT and who ranked immediately below him. In 1893 the College of Heralds held that:

The following persons are legally "Esquires": The sons of peers, the sons of baronets, the sons of knights, the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and their eldest sons in perpetuity, the eldest son of the eldest son of a knight, and his eldest son in perpetuity, the king of arms, the heralds of arms, officers of the Army or Navy of the rank of captain and upwards, sheriffs of counties for life, J.P.s of counties whilst in commission, serjeants-at-law, Queen's counsel, serjeants-at-arms, Companions of the Orders of Knighthood, certain principal officers in the Royal household, deputy lieutenants, commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, masters of the Supreme Court, those whom the Sovereign, in any commission or warrant, styles esquire, and any person who, in virtue of his office, takes precedence of esquires.

Such efforts to restrict the title proved abortive and it is widely applied in correspondence, etc. (abbreviated to "Esq."), as an alternative to "Mr."

Essays. Bacon's essays were the first in English to bear this name.

Certain brief notes . . . which I have called essays. The word is late but the thing is ancient.
Suppressed Dedication to Prince Henry.

Essenes. A Jewish fraternity originating about the 2nd century B.C. who lived a monastic kind of life and who rejected animal sacrifices. They were distinguished for their piety and virtue and were strict observers of the SABBATH. They were given to acts of charity and maintained themselves by manual labour (chiefly agriculture), lived in fellowship, and held their goods in common. Their way of life was akin to that of Jesus and His disciples. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS; HASID-EANS.

Essex Lions. Calves, for which the county is famous.

Valiant as an Essex lion. Said ironically of a timid person. Cp. COTSWOLD LION.

Establishment, The (O.Fr. établissement). A term long used to denote in particular the established CHURCH OF ENGLAND, but now a popular designation for the influential hierarchy or inner circle in any particular sphere of the community, or of the community in general. It has a somewhat derogatory significance associated with reaction, privilege, and lack of imagination.

They were in fact appointed, of course, because they had been trained to think in the way that what is now called "the establishment" thinks and it was clear that they did not dissent from this manner of thinking.

S. G. EVANS: The Social Hope of the Christian Church, ch. vi (1965).

Estate (O.Fr. estat; Lat. status from stare, to stand).

Estates General (États généraux. Fr.). The French assembly first summoned in 1302 as a consultative body consisting of clergy, nobility and THE THIRD ESTATE. It did not meet again after 1614 until 1789 when the Revolution began.

Estates of the Realm. Those classes, or orders, which have a recognized share or part in the body politic. In Britain the three estates are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons, although the term is now anachronistic.

The King and the three estates of the realm assembled in parliament.—Collect for 5 Nov.

The Third Estate. The Commons. Historically the term usually refers to the third chamber (Tiers État) of the French ESTATES GENERAL at the time of the Revolution.

The Fourth Estate. The Press. Burke, referring to the Reporters' Gallery in the HOUSE OF COMMONS, is reputed to have said, "Yonder sits the Fourth Estate, more important than them all", but it does not appear in his published works. In former days the phrase has also been applied to the working classes.

The Fifth Estate. The British Broadcasting Corporation has jocularly been so called.

Est-il possible (ā tēl pos ēbl). A nickname of Prince George of Denmark (1653–1708), the consort of Queen Anne. The story goes that when he was told of the abdication of his father-in-law, James II, all he did was to exclaim, "Est-il possible?" and when told further of the various noblemen who had deserted him, could only add, "Est-il possible?" See also BRANDY NAN.

Estotiland. An imaginary tract of land near the Arctic Circle in North America, said to have been discovered by John Scalve, a Pole. It is mentioned and shown in Peter Heylin's Microcosmos (1622).

The snow
From cold Estotiland.
MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 685.

Estrich. The old name for ostrich.

Eternal, The. God.

The Eternal City. ROME. The epithet occurs in Ovid, Tibullus, etc., and in many official documents of the Empire. It has also been applied to the "City of God".

The eternal fitness of things. The congruity between an action and the agent.

Can any man have a higher notion of the rule of right, and the eternal fitness of things?
FIELDING: Tom Jones, BK. IV, ch. iv.

The Eternal Tables. In Mohammedan legend, a white PEARL extending from east to west, and from heaven to earth, on which God has recorded every event, past, present, and to come.

The Eternal Triangle. The oft-recurring comic or tragic situation of the amorous involvement of one of a married couple with another member of the opposite sex.

Etesian Wind (e tē' zhán). A Mediterranean wind which rises annually (Gr. etos, a year) about the DOG-DAYS, and blows mainly from the north for about 40 days. It is gentle and mild.

And he who rules the raging wind,
To thee, O sacred ship, be kind;

And gentle breezes fill they sails,
Supplying soft Etesian gales.
DRYDEN: Tr. of Horace's Odes, I, 3.

Ethon. The eagle or vulture that gnawed the liver of PROMETHEUS.

Etna, or Ætna (et' nà). The highest active volcano in Europe. It stands over the Straits of Messina, c. 1,700 ft. high, covering an area of 460 sq. miles. In Sicily, Etna is known as Monte Gibello and many towns and villages live under its continual threat. The last serious eruption was in 1928. VIRGIL (Æneid III, 578, etc.) ascribes its eruption to the restlessness of ENCELADUS, the most powerful of all the giants who plotted against JUPITER and who lies buried under the mountain. According to the Greek and Latin poets it is the site of the smithy of CYCLOPS and the forges of VULCAN.

Eton Crop. A short boyish hairstyle, fairly popular among English women in the 1920s, called after the famous school for boys at Eton.

Etrenne. See STRENIA.

Etruria is a district of Hanley, Stoke-upon-Trent, where Josiah Wedgwood established his famous Etruria pottery works in 1769, named after the ancient Etruria in Italy, the home of the famous Etruscan ware.

Ettrick Shepherd. The name given to James Hogg (1770-1835), the Scottish poet who was born at Ettrick, Selkirkshire, the son of a shepherd, and, for a time, a shepherd himself.

Etzel. In German heroic legend, Attila, King of the Huns (d. 453).

Eucharist (ū' kà rist) (Gr. eucharistos, grateful). An ancient name for the Lord's Supper, Holy Communion, or MASS; also the consecrated Elements in the Communion. Literally, a thank-offering. Our Lord gave thanks before giving the bread and wine to His disciples at the LAST SUPPER. The Church offers the Eucharist as a service of praise and thanksgiving. See IMPANATION.

Euchre (ū' kër). A word of doubtful etymology and the name of the most popular card game in the United States before it was replaced by auction bridge. To be euchred is when the side that makes the trumps fails to win three tricks. Hence, figuratively, to be beaten, to be at a disadvantage. Cp. TO TURN THE TABLES under TABLE.

Euclid (ū' klid). Many generations of schoolboys knew geometry only as "Euclid", because the teaching of that branch of mathematics was based on the Elements of Euclides, a Greek mathematician, who taught at Alexandria about 300 B.C. Although many rival text-books have been produced to supplant Euclid, none yet commands the same respect.

Eucrates (ū krā' tēz). More shifts than Eucrates. Eucrates, the miller, was one of the archons of Athens, noted for his shifts and excuses for neglecting the duties of his office.

Eudoxians (ū doks' i anz). Followers of Eudoxius, a 4th-century patriarch of Constantinople, who maintained the heresies of the ARIANS.

Euhemerus (ū hū' mē rūs). A Greek philosopher of the 4th century B.C., who lived at the court of Cassander, King of Macedonia. In his Sacred History, he maintained the theory that the gods were formerly kings and heroes of exceptional ability, revered after death and finally deified. Hence the term euhemerism for such explanations of primitive myth and the derivation of mythology from an historical basis.

Eulalia, St. (ū' là lia). Eulalon (i.e. the sweetly spoken) is one of the names of APOLLO, and there are two 4th-century virgin martyrs called Eulalia both presumed to have been put to death under Diocletian in 304—St. Eulalia of Barcelona and St. Eulalia of Merida, whose ashes were scattered over a field upon which a pall of snow is said to have descended.

Eulenspiegel (oi len shpé' gèl), Till. The name (owl-glass) of a 14th-century villager of Brunswick round whom gathered a large number of popular tales of mischievous pranks and often crude jests, first printed in 1515. The work was translated into many languages and rapidly achieved wide popularity. Till Eulenspiegel is the subject of the picaresque novel Ulenspiegel by Charles de Coster (1867) and of a symphonic poem by Richard Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks (1895).

Eumæus (ū mē' ūs). The slave and swineherd of ULYSSES; hence a swineherd.

Eumenides (ū men' i dēz) (Gr. the good-tempered ones). The name given by the Greeks to the FURIES, as it would have been bad policy to call them ERINYES, their right name.

Euphemism (ū' fè mizm) (Gr. euphemismos, speaking fair). A word or phrase substituted to soften an offensive expression. Thus—His Satanic Majesty (the DEVIL); light-fingered gentry (pickpockets or thieves); an obliquity of vision (a squint); a lady of the town (a prostitute), are common examples. Cp. EUMENIDES; EUXINE SEA; FOUR-LETTER MAN.

Euphuism (ū' fū izm). An affected and artificial literary style, characterized by alliteration, ornate language, lengthy similes taken from myth and fable, etc., after the manner of John Lyly (1554-1606), author of Euphues: the Anatomy of Wit (1578) and Euphues and his England (1580). Euphues, the hero of Lyly's romance, is taken from the Greek, implying a man "well-endowed by nature". Euphuism was much imitated by Lyly's contemporaries, including Queen Elizabeth I.

Eureka (ū rē' kà) (Gr. Heureka, I have found it). An exclamation of delight at having made a discovery; originally that of Archimedes, the Syracusan philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero's crown. The tale is, that Hiero gave some GOLD to a smith to be made into a votive crown, but suspecting that the gold had been alloyed with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test it. The philosopher did not know how to proceed, but in getting into his bath, which was full, observed that some of the water ran over and immediately concluded that a body must displace its own bulk of water when immersed; silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound weight of silver is bulkier than a pound weight of gold and would consequently displace more water. Thus he found that the crown was deficient in gold. Vitruvius says:

When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath exclaiming, "Heureka! heureka!" and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment.

"Eureka!" is the motto of California, in allusion to the gold discovered there.

The Eureka Stockade. A fortified stockade erected by the diggers at the Ballarat goldfield in 1854, after the arrest of three of their fellows. It was the climax to their protests against ill treatment by the police, lack of political representation, and the licence system. Troops carried the stockade, twenty miners and two police being killed. Some improvements resulted as a consequence.

Eurus (ū' rūs). The east wind; connected with Gr. eos and Lat. aurora, the dawn.

While southern gales or western oceans roll,
And Eurus steals his ice-winds from the pole.
DARWIN: Economy of Vegetation, canto vi.

Euryalus. See NISUS.

Eurydice (ū rid' i si). In Greek mythology the wife of ORPHEUS, killed by a serpent when fleeing from the attentions of Aristæus. Orpheus sought her in HADES, charmed PLUTO by his music, and was promised her return on condition that he did not look back until Eurydice had reached the upper world. Nearing the end of his journey he turned his head to see if Eurydice was following and she was instantly caught back into Hades.

Euterpe (ū tēr' pi). One of the nine MUSES, daughter of JUPITER and MNEMOSYNE, inventress of the double flute, muse of Dionysiac music, patroness of joy and pleasure, and of flute-players.

Eutyrians (ū tik' i anz). Followers of Eutyches (c. 380-c. 456), archimandrite of Constantinople, and author of the Eutyrian controversy. He fiercely opposed the NESTORIANS and held that Christ, after the incarnation, had only one nature, the divine. He was excommunicated, reinstated, and later exiled. They were the forerunners of the MONOPHYSITES.

Euxine Sea (ūks' in). The ancient Greek name for the BLACK SEA, meaning the "hospitable". It was originally called Axeinos, inhospitable, on account of its stormy character and rocky shores but the name was probably changed euphemistically to propitiate the powers supposedly controlling the elements. Cp. ERINYES; EUMENIDES.

Evangelic Doctor, The. John Wyclif (c. 1320-1384), "the morning star of the Reformation".

Evangelical. From the time of the REFORMATION, Protestant Churches were often called Evangelical Churches from their insistence that their teachings were based on the evangel, or Gospel (i.e. the Bible). Those known as Evangelicals in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND emerged at the same time as the METHODISTS and they notably emphasized the importance of scriptural authority and salvation by faith in Christ, etc. Cp. CLAPHAM SECT; LOW CHURCH.

Evangelists. The four Evangelists, MATTHEW, MARK, LUKE and JOHN, are usually represented in art as follows:

Matthew. With pen in hand and scroll before him, looking over his left shoulder at an ANGEL.

Mark. Seated writing, and by his side a couchant winged LION.

Luke. With a pen, in deep thought, looking over a scroll, with a cow or ox nearby chewing the cud. Also shown painting a picture, from the tradition that he painted a portrait of the Virgin.

John. As a young man of great delicacy, with an eagle in the background to denote sublimity.

The more ancient symbols were: for

Evans's Supper Rooms

Matthew, a man's face; for Mark, a lion; for Luke, an ox; and for John, a flying EAGLE; in allusion to the four living creatures before the throne of God, described by St. John the Divine.

And the first beast was like a lion, and the second beast was like a calf, and the third beast had a face as a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle.—Rev. iv, 7.

Another explanation is that Matthew is symbolized by a man because he begins his gospel with the humanity of Jesus, as a descendant of David; Mark by a lion, because he begins with the scenes of JOHN THE BAPTIST and Jesus in the Wilderness; Luke by a calf, because he begins with the priest sacrificing in the temple; and John by an eagle, because he soars high, and begins with the divinity of the Logos. The four symbols are those of Ezekiel's cherubim (Ezek. i, 10).

Irenæus says: "The lion signifies the royalty of Christ; the calf His sacerdotal office; the man's face His incarnation; and the eagle the grace of the Holy Ghost."

The name evangelist was applied in the early Church to preachers of the Gospel and is often used today to denote a revivalist preacher.

Evans's Supper Rooms. In the 19th century, one of the best-known resorts of London night life; situated at the corner of King Street, COVENT GARDEN. The premises, used by the National Sporting Club, were opened as a family hotel (1773) and in the 1830s occupied by the Star Dinner and Coffee Room which was much frequented by the nobility. The name Evans's Supper Room, by which the premises were known until their closure in 1880, derives from W. C. Evans, a member of the chorus of the Covent Garden Theatre, who was one-time owner. He made it the most famous song and supper room in London giving entertainment of the "blue" variety and allowing his patrons to outdo each other in singing dirty songs. John Greenmore (Paddy Green) took over in 1844 and added a splendid new hall with a platform at one end. All the performers were male, and women were only admitted on giving their names and addresses, and even then only enjoyed the privilege of watching from behind a screen. The standard of entertainment under Green was outstanding and Evans's more than any other song and supper room can be regarded as the precursor of the MUSIC HALL. The Prince of Wales (afterwards Edward VII) was a frequent visitor in the 1860s.

Eve (Heb. havvah, life, lifegiving, or possibly, snake). The first woman, formed from one of the ribs of ADAM.

And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living.—Gen. iii, 20.

Daughter of Eve. Woman. Often used with reference to feminine curiosity.

Even-Christian. An old term for a fellow-Christian, a neighbour in the Gospel sense.

He that hath desdayn of his neighebre, that is to seyn, of his evene Cristene.

CHAUCER: Parson's Tale (De Superbia).

The more pity that great folk should have countenance in this world to drown and hang themselves more than their even Christian.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, V, i.

Events. At all events. In any case; be the issue what it may; utcumque ceciderit.

In the event. "In the event of his being elected", means in case, or provided he is elected; if the result is that he is elected.

To be wise after the event. To give advice on what should have been done to prevent some happening after it has occurred.

Ever and anon. From time to time, every now and then. See ANON.

Ever-Sworded. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Ever-Victorious Army, The. A force of Chinese, officered by Europeans and Americans at Shanghai in 1861, and placed under the command of CHINESE GORDON in 1863. It stamped out the TAIPING REBELLION.

Everlasting staircase. The treadmill.

Everyman. The central character in the most famous English MORALITY PLAY (c. 1529) drawn from a late 15th-century Dutch original. Everyman is summoned by Death and invites all his acquaintances (such as Kindred, Good Deeds, Goods, Knowledge, Beauty, Strength, etc.) to accompany him on his journey, but only Good Deeds will go with him.

Every man Jack. Everyone, without exception.

Sir Pitt had numbered every "Man Jack" of them. THACKERAY: Vanity Fair, ch. viii.

Evidence (Lat. evidentia, clearness). Evidence, meaning testimony in proof of something, has a wide variety of classifications, such as:

Circumstantial evidence. That based on relevant fact and circumstances to the fact in issue.

Conclusive evidence. That which establishes proof beyond doubt.

Demonstrative evidence. That which can be proved without leaving a doubt.

Direct evidence. Evidence of a fact in issue; that of an eyewitness.

Documentary evidence. Evidence supplied in written documents.

External evidence. That derived from history or tradition.

Hearsay evidence. That which is heard from another but not known to be true.

Internal evidence. That derived from conformity with what is known.

King's or Queen's evidence. That of an accessory against his accomplices.

Material evidence. That which is essential in order to carry proof.

Moral evidence. That which accords with general experience.

Presumptive evidence. That which is highly probable.

Prima facie evidence. That which seems likely unless it can be explained away.

Self evidence. That derived from the senses: manifest and indubitable.

In evidence. Before the eyes of the people; to the front; actually present.

Evil. Evil communications corrupt good manners. The words used by St. PAUL (I Cor. xv, 33); but he was evidently quoting Menander (Thais). Similar proverbs are, "he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith" (Ecclesiasticus, xiii, 1); "one scabbed sheep infects a whole flock"; "the rotten apple injures its neighbours".

Evil Eye. An ancient and widespread belief that certain individuals had the power to harm or even kill with a glance. Various charms and gestures, many of an obscene kind, were employed to counteract it. Virgil speaks of an evil eye bewitching lambs.

Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos.
Bucolics, Ecl. iii, 103.

Evil May Day. The name given to the serious rioting of 1 May 1517, when the London apprentices attacked the foreign merchants and artisans. It forms the basis of an anonymous play of SHAKESPEARE's day, Sir Thomas More.

The Evil One. The DEVIL.

Evil Principle. AHRIMAN.

King's Evil. See under KING.

Of two evils, choose the less. See CHOICE.

Ewe-lamb. A single possession greatly prized; in allusion to the story told in II Sam. xii, 1-14.

Ex (Lat. from, out of, after, or by reason of). It forms part of many adverbial phrases, of which those in common use in English are given below. As a prefix to the name of an office or dignity it denotes a former holder of that office (e.g. an ex-president), or the present holder's immediate predecessor (e.g. the ex-president).

Ex cathedra. With authority. The POPE speaking ex cathedra (from the chair, or Papal throne) is said to speak with an infallible voice—as the successor and representative of St. PETER. The phrase is applied to dicta uttered by authority and ironically to self-sufficient, dogmatic assertions.

Ex hypothesi. According to what is supposed or assumed; in consequence of assumption made.

Ex libris. Literally, "from the (collection of) books". It is written in books or on bookplates followed by the name of the owner (properly in the genitive). Hence, a bookplate is often called an ex-libris.

Ex luce lucellum. A gain or small profit out of light. It was originally said of the old window tax, and when, in 1871, Robert Lowe, CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER, proposed a tax on matches he intended this Latin pun to be printed on the revenue stamps on the matchboxes. The tax had to be withdrawn after protests.

Ex officio. By virtue of office. As, "the Vicar shall be ex officio one of the trustees".

Ex parte. Proceeding only from one of the parties; hence likely to be prejudiced. An ex-parte statement is a one-sided or partial statement, made by one side without modification from the other.

Ex pede Herculem. From the foot (we judge) a HERCULES; from this sample we can judge the whole. PYTHAGORAS calculated the height of Hercules by comparing the length of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length but Hercules' stadium at OLYMPIA was much longer; therefore, said the philosopher, the foot of Hercules was proportionately longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained. Ex ungue leonem, a lion (may be drawn) from its claw, is a similar phrase.

Ex post facto. From what is done afterwards; retrospective. An ex post facto law is one made to operate retrospectively.

Ex professo. Avowedly, expressly.

Ex proprio motu. Of his (or its) own accord; voluntarily.

Ex uno (disce) omnes. From one instance you may infer the rest. A general inference from a particular example; if one OAK bears acorns, all oaks will.

Exaltation. In ASTROLOGY, a planet was said to be in its "exaltation" when it was in that sign of the ZODIAC in which it was supposed to exercise its strongest influence. Thus the exaltation of VENUS is in Pisces, and her "dejection" in Virgo.

And thus, god wot, Mercurie is desolat
In Pisces, wher Venus is exaltat.

CHAUCER: Wife of Bath's Prologue.

Exaltation of the Cross. A feast held in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH on 14 September (HOLY CROSS DAY), in commemoration of the restoration of the true cross to CALVARY in 629, after the victory of Heraclius over the Persians. The CROSS had been taken by Chosroes in 614.

Excalibur (eks käl' i bër). The name of King Arthur's sword (O.Fr. Escalibor), called by Geoffrey of Monmouth Caliburn, and in the MABINOGION, Caledvwlch. There was also a legendary Irish sword called Caladbolg (hard-belly), i.e. capable of consuming anything.

By virtue of being the one KNIGHT who could pull Excalibur from a stone, in which it had been magically fixed, ARTHUR was acclaimed king. After his last battle, when he lay sore wounded, it was returned at his command by Sir BEDIVERE to the LADY OF THE LAKE. See Malory, Le Morte d'Arthur, Bk. XXI, ch. v, and Tennyson's Passing of Arthur (Idylls of the King).

Excelsior (Lat. higher). Aim at higher things still. It is the motto of New York State and has been popularized by Longfellow's poem of this name:

And from the sky, serene and far,
A voice fell, like a falling star,
Excelsior!

Exception. The exception proves the rule. Without a rule, there could be no exception; the very fact of an exception proves there must be a rule.

To take exception. To feel offended; to find fault with or to object.

Exchequer. The name derives from the chequered cloth used for calculations. It dealt with the Crown's income and expenditure and was in being by Henry I's reign (1100-1135). It was presided over by the Treasurer until 1714 (when the Treasury board took over) and was abolished in 1833.

Chancellor of the Exchequer. See under CHANCELLOR.

Excommunication. An ecclesiastical censure which excludes a person from the communion of the Church and sometimes accompanied by other deprivations. If clerics, they are forbidden to administer the sacraments. As a form of discipline, it no doubt derives from the Jewish practice at the time of Christ, which entailed exclusion from religious and social intercourse. It was a common punishment in mediæval times and was on occasions applied to whole nations. Pope Adrian IV used it against ROME in 1155, and Pope Innocent III employed it against ENGLAND in 1208. (See I Cor. v, 5.) The practice was also adopted by PROTESTANT Churches at the REFORMATION. The thirty-third of the Articles of Religion in the Book of Common Prayer is headed "Of Excommunicate Persons, how they are to be avoided".

Cp. INTERDICT; BELL, BOOK AND CANDLE.
Exempli gratia (Lat.). For the sake of example: abbreviated to "e.g." when used as the introduction to an example.

Exequatur (Lat. he may perform or exercise). The letter PATENT issued to a diplomat by the government to which he is accredited authorizing him to exercise his power; a temporal sovereign's recognition of a BISHOP under papal authority, or of a PAPAL BULL, thus implying the right of rejection.

Exeter. An episcopal SEE and the county town of Devonshire; called Isca Dumniorium by the Romans. See also EXTER.

The Duke of Exeter's daughter. See DUKE.

The Exeter Book. A MS. collection of Old English poetry presented (c. 1060) by Bishop Leofric to Exeter Cathedral, and still preserved in the cathedral library. It includes riddles, proverbs, poems, and legal documents. Among them are Cynewulf's Christ, Juliana, Guthlac; Widsith, Deor's Lament, and The Wanderer. Widsith is the earliest English poet known by name. The Exeter or EXON DOMESDAY is also sometimes called the "Exeter Book".

Exeter Hall. A public hall opened in the STRAND, London, in 1831 and largely used for the MAY MEETINGS of religious and philanthropic organizations. Their influence on colonial policy and in humanitarian causes was considerable, especially in the 1830s, and is generally known as "the Exeter Hall influence". It was acquired by the Y.M.C.A. in 1880 and demolished in 1907, the site being used for the Strand Palace Hotel.

The spiritual successors of the Clapham Sect were the large body of people who in the mid-nineteenth century were grouped under the generic title of the Exeter Hall party, from the use of that building for their public demonstrations. . . . Exeter Hall was a dominant force until 1870, and powerful to a later date.

J. A. WILLIAMSON: Short History of British Expansion, vol. II, ch. I.

Mr. David has since had a "serious call",
He never drinks ale, wine, or spirits, at all,
And they say he is going to Exeter Hall
To make a grand speech, and to preach and to teach People that "they can't brew their malt liquor too small".

BARHAM: Ingoldsby Legends

Exhibition. The Great Exhibition. The Exhibition of 1851, largely inspired by the Prince Consort and housed in the CRYSTAL PALACE, Hyde Park, LONDON. There were over 13,000 exhibitors in the four classes—raw materials, machinery, manufactures, and fine arts. It was a conspicuous success and the profits were mainly used for educational foundations at South Kensington. Its centenary was celebrated by another Exhibition on the SOUTH BANK in 1951.

Existentialism. A philosophical attitude owing much to the writings of Søren Kierkegaard (1813-1855) which developed in Germany after World War I and somewhat later in France and Italy. Atheistic existentialism was popularized in France by Jean-Paul Sartre (born 1905) during World War II. Existentialists emphasize the freedom and importance of individual "existence" and personality, and show a distrust of philosophical idealism. Much of their writings are characterized by disillusionment. The term is the translation of the German Existenz-philosophie.

Exon. One of the four officers in command of the YEOMEN OF THE GUARD, who are exempt from regimental duties. The word is an Anglicized pronunciation of the Fr. exempt, the former title of a junior officer who commanded in the absence of his superiors and was exempt from ordinary duty.

Exon (short for Lat. Exoniensis, of Exonia, i.e. Exeter. See EPISCOPAL SIGNATURES).

Exon Domesday. A magnificent MS. transcript of the Great, or Exchequer Domesday for the counties of Wiltshire, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall, preserved in the muniments of Exeter Cathedral. It was published in 1816. See DOMESDAY BOOK.

Exorcism. The expelling of evil spirits by prayers and incantations. An ancient practice taken over by the Christian Church, after the example of Jesus Christ and the APOSTLES who healed those possessed of evil spirits. The use of this rite in the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is now carefully regulated.

And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out.—Matt. x, 1.

Expectation Week. Between ASCENSION and WHIT SUNDAY, when the APOSTLES continued praying "in earnest expectation of the Comforter".

Experimental Philosophy. Science founded on experiments or data, in contradistinction to moral and mathematical sciences; also called natural philosophy.

Experto crede (Lat.). Believe one who has had experience in the matter. The phrase is used to add significance or weight to a warning.

Exter. That's Exter, as the old woman said when she saw Kerton. A Devonshire saying, meaning, I thought my work was done, but I find much still remains before it is completed. The story is that the woman in question was going to Exeter for the first time, and seeing the fine old church of Kerton (Crediton) supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. "That's Exter" (a local pronunciation of Exeter), she said, "and my journey is over"; but alas! she had still eight miles to walk.

Extreme Unction. The last sacramental unction, the anointing with oil when a person is in extremis. One of the seven SACRAMENTS of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH founded on James v, 14, "Is there any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

Eye. Apple of the Eye. See under APPLE.

Bull's eye. See under BULL.

Cat's eye. See under CAT.

Eagle eye. See under EAGLE.

Evil Eye. See under EVIL.

Eye of the Baltic. Gotland.

Eye of Greece. ATHENS.

Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts.
MILTON: Paradise Regained, IV, 240.

Eye of a needle, It is easier for a camel to go through the. See under CAMEL.

Eye of the storm. An opening between the storm clouds. Cp. BULL'S EYE.

Eyes and no eyes. Unobservant. "Eyes have they, but they see not". Ps. cxv, 5.

Eyes to the blind. A staff; perhaps in allusion to that given to TIRESIAS.

A green eye. A jealous or envious eye; jealousy is figuratively described as "a green-eyed monster".

Do you see any green in my eye? Do I look credulous and easily bamboozled? Do I look a GREENHORN?

My eye! or Oh, my eye! An exclamation of astonishment.

All my eye and Betty Martin. See ALL. One-eyed. An expression of contempt, as, "I've never seen such a one-eyed town", i.e. such a hopeless and lifeless place.

One-eyed peoples. See ARIMASPIANS; CYCLOPS.

In my mind's eye. In my perceptive thought.

In the twinkling of an eye. Immediately, in a very short time.

In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible.

1 Cor. xv, 52.

In the wind's eye. Directly opposed to the wind.

A sheet in the wind's eye. An early stage of intoxication. An expression of nautical origin. See THREE SHEETS IN THE WIND, under SHEET.

A sight for sore eyes. A proverbial expression used of something that is very welcome, pleasant, and unexpected.

Mind your eye. Look out, be careful; keep your eyes open to guard against mischief.

There's more in that than meets the eye. There is more to it than appears at first sight or on the surface.

To cry one's eyes out. To cry immoderately or excessively.

To get one's eyes in. To adjust one's sight at CRICKET, billiards, golf, bowls, etc.

To give the glad eye to. To cast inviting or amorous glances at.

To have, or keep an eye on. To keep watch over someone or something.

To have an eye for. To have due sense of appreciation and judgment for.

To have an eye to. To keep constantly in view; to act from motives of policy.

To have an eye to the future. To bear future circumstances in mind when acting or making a decision.

To have an eye to the main chance. To keep self-advantage or profit constantly in view.

To have bags under one's eyes. Bulges under the eyes, often a sign of dissipation.

To keep one's eyes skinned. To be particularly watchful.

To look babies in one's eyes. See BABIES.

To make eyes at. To look amorously or lovingly at. Cp. TO MAKE SHEEP'S EYES.

To make sheep's eyes. See under SHEEP.

To make someone open his eyes. To surprise him very much, and make him stare with wonder or admiration; to bring someone to realize what is happening, to enlighten him.

To meet the eye. To arrest the sight, to come into notice.

To pipe your eye. See under PIPE.

To see eye to eye. To be precisely of the opinion; to agree completely or think alike.

To see with half an eye. Easily, at a mere glance.

To set, or lay eyes on. To have sight of.

To throw dust in his eyes. To mislead, to dupe or trick him.

Up to the eyes. Wholly, completely; as, up to the eyes in work, very fully occupied; up to the eyes in debt, very heavily in debt.

Eyebrow. To raise an eyebrow. A natural sign of surprise.

Eyelid. Without batting an eyelid. Without the involuntary lowering or flicker of the eyelids that betrays surprise. "Batting" is from the O.Fr. batre, to beat or flap.

Eye-opener. Something that provides enlightenment; also, a strong mixed drink, especially a morning pick-me-up.

Eye-picking. An Australian expression in the days of the settlers for the practice of buying up the choice lots of land, leaving the waste parts in between to settlers of smaller means; it was called "picking the eyes out of the country". Those who adopted this practice were called peacockers. Cp. GRIDIRONER.

Eye-service. Unwilling service, of the sort only done when one's master is looking.

Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters, . . . not with eyeservice, as menpleasers; but as the servants of Christ.—Eph. vi, 5, 6.

Eye-teeth. The canine teeth; so called because they are located (in the upper and lower jaw) just under the eyes.

He has cut his eye-teeth. See under TOOTH.

To draw one's eye-teeth. See under TOOTH.

Eye-wash. In colloquial usage means "BUNKUM", "humbug"; something to blind one to the real state of affairs.

Eyre (ár) (Lat. iter; O.Fr. eire, a journey).

Justices in Eyre. From the time of Henry II (1154-1189), itinerant judges travelled the country on circuit to hear pleas, etc., usually sitting in the SHIRE court. They lapsed in the mid-14th century, being made redundant by the Justices of Assize.

F

F. The first letter in the Runic FUTHORC, but the sixth in the Phœnician and Latin alphabets and their derivatives. The Egyptian hieroglyph represented a horned asp and the Phœnician character a peg.

Double F (Ff, or ff) as an initial in a few personal names, as Ffoulkes, ffrench, etc., is a mistaken use in print of the mediæval or Old English capital F (ƿ) as it appears written in engrossed leases, etc. In script the old capital F looked very much like two small f's entwined. Its modern use is an affectation.

F is written on his face. The letter F (for fraymaker) used to be branded on the cheek of brawlers in church or churchyard. The practice was begun in the reign of Edward VI (1547-1553) to check the violent outbursts occasioned by changes in ritual. It was abolished in 1822.

F.E.R.T. The Order of the Annunciation (see under ANNUNCIATION) has these letters on its collar. Fert (Lat. he bears) is an ancient motto of the House of Savoy. But the letters have also been held to be the initials of Fortitudo Ejus Rhodum Tenet (His courage held Rhodes), in allusion to the succour rendered to Rhodes by Savoy in 1310; Fœdere et Religione Tenemur (We are bound by our word and oath), on the gold doubloon of Victor Amadeus I (1630-1637); or, Fortitudo Ejus Rempublicam Tenet (His courage holds the State).

F.F.I. Forces Françaises de l'Intérieur. Frenchmen within France who continued the struggle against Germany after the fall of their country in 1940, familiarly known as the MAQUIS.

F.F.V. First Families of Virginia, a snobbish term used in the 19th century by those claiming descent from the first settlers.

Fabius (fā' bi ūs). Quintus Fabius Maximus (d. 203 B.C.), surnamed CUNCTATOR. According to Ennius (Annals, XII):

Unus homo nobis cunctando restituit rem.

i.e. one man by delaying saved the State for us.

The American Fabius. George Washington (1732-1799), whose tactics in the American War of Independence were somewhat similar to those of FABIVS.

Fabian Society. A society founded in January 1884 by a small group of middle-class intellectuals to propagate evolutionary socialism by transforming the State to an organization to promote social welfare through increasing state intervention in the economy. They took their name from Quintus FABIVS Maximus, believing that "long taking of counsel" was necessary before they could achieve their objective. George Bernard Shaw (1856-1950), Sidney Webb (1859-1947), Graham Wallas (1858-1932), and Annie Besant (1847-1933) were prominent among them.

It envisaged socialism as a heap of reforms to be built by the droppings of a host of successive swallows who would in the end make a Socialist summer.

COLE and POSTGATE:
The Common People, ch. xxiv.

Fabian tactics. Delaying tactics, masterly inactivity, winning by delay; after the manner of FABIVS called CUNCTATOR.

Fables (Lat. fabula, a narrative story or fable). Although this name is applied in a general sense to fictitious tales, legends and myths, it is more particularly applied to didactic stories of which a moral forms an integral part. In this more restricted class, human thoughts and attributes are usually portrayed by members of the animal and insect world. See ÆSOP; BABRIUS; LA FONTAINE; PHAEDRUS; PILPAY.

Fabliaux (fab' lē ō). Mediæval French metrical tales, mostly comical and satirical, and intended primarily for recitation by the TROUVÈRES, or early poets north of the Loire, and essentially of the latter part of the 12th century to the latter half of the 14th. They have little connexion with the fable proper, beyond the name, and were usually in octosyllabic couplets. They were essentially to entertain the common people and were characterized by coarseness and satirical treatment of the weaknesses of the clergy and feminine frailty, and the familiar incidents of ordinary life.

Fabricius (fā brish' ūs), Gaius Lusinus. A Roman consul (d. c. 270 B.C.) and hero of the war against Pyrrhus, representative of incorruptibility and honesty. Roman writers tell of the frugal way in which he lived on his farm; how he refused the rich bribes offered him by the Samnite ambassadors, and how at death he was too poor to leave a portion for his daughters, for whom the Senate provided.

Fabulinus (fabulor, to speak). The god, mentioned by Varro, who taught Roman children to utter their first word. See BABES, PROTECTING DEITIES OF.

Face. A colloquialism for cheek, impudence, self-confidence, etc., as "He has face enough for anything", i.e. cheek or assurance enough. The use is quite an old one. Cp. NECK.

Faced

A brazen face. See BRAZEN-FACED. Cp. BRASS.

A pasty face. Pale faced, like paste; unhealthy looking.

A wry face. The features drawn awry, expressive of distaste.

Face to face. In the immediate presence of each other; two or more persons facing each other.

On the face of it. To all appearance; in the literal sense of the words.

That puts a new face on the matter. Said when fresh evidence has been produced, or something has happened which puts things in a new or different light.

To be double-faced, or two-faced. To be hypocritical. To say one thing and act differently.

To draw, or wear a long face. To look dissatisfied or sorrowful, as when the mouth is drawn down at the corners, and the eyes are dejected, giving the face an elongated appearance.

To face about. To turn round on one's ground.

To face down. To withstand with boldness and effrontery. To abash by fixity of look.

To face it out. To persist in an assertion which is not true. To maintain a bold front.

To face the music. To stand up boldly and not falter at the moment of trial.

To face up to something. To meet one's difficulties without weakening.

To fly in the face of. To set at defiance rashly; to oppose violently and unreasonably.

To have two faces, or to keep two faces under one hood. To pretend to be very religious, and yet live an evil life; TO BE DOUBLE-FACED.

To look a person in the face, or full in the face. To meet with a steady gaze, implying lack of fear, or, sometimes, a spirit of defiance.

To lose face. To be lowered in the esteem of others through an affront to one's dignity—a matter of especial concern in the Far East.

To make faces. To grimace or "pull faces".

To put a bold, or a good face on the matter. To make the best of a bad matter; to bear up under something disagreeable.

To save one's face. To avoid disgrace or discomfiture.

To set one's face against something. To oppose it firmly; to resist its being done.

To shut the door in one's face. To put an end to negotiations; to refuse to have dealings with.

To take things at their face value. To judge matters on their apparent worth.

Face-lifting. A method of enhancing looks or concealing the marks of age by treatment which tightens the skin of the face and removes the wrinkles.

To give something a face-lift. To renovate and give it a new look.

Faced. With a facing; covering the surface of one material with another; dressing the surface of a material. See FACINGS.

Bare-faced. The present meaning, audacious, shameless, impudent, is a depreciation of its earlier sense of open or unconcealed. A "bare-face" is a beardless face, where the features are in no way hidden. The French equivalent is à visage découvert, with uncovered face.

Shame-faced. Having shame expressed in the face.

Face-card, or Faced-card. A COURT CARD, a card with a face on it; also a card which has been dealt face up.

Facings. Lapels and cuffs on uniforms, etc., which differ in colour from the body of the coat. Cp. BUFFS under REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

To put someone through his facings. To examine or test; to ascertain if what appears on the surface is superficial only.

Facile princeps (fāk' i lā prin keps) (Lat.). Easily first.

Facilis descensus Averno. See AVERNUS.
Façon de parler (fā son dé par lay) (Fr.). Idiomatic or usual form of speech.

Faction. In Roman and Byzantine history the factiones were originally the companies into which the charioteers were divided, each group having its special colour. The original two factions at ROME were the white (albata) and red (russata), to which the green (prasina) and blue (veneta) were added when the number of competing chariots was increased from two to four. From this the "factions" of the circus and hippodrome arose as political partisans.

Factory King. The name given to Richard Oastler (1789-1861) for his strenuous and lifelong efforts to improve the lot of the factory workers, especially children. He initially aroused attention by writing to the Leeds press on "Yorkshire Slavery" and was the constant advocate of a ten-hour day.

Factotum (Lat. facere totum, to do everything required). One who does all kinds of services for his employer; sometimes called a Johannes Factotum. Formerly the term meant a "JACK-OF-ALL-TRADES", and it was in this sense that Greene used it in his famous reference to SHAKESPEARE:

There is an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers heart wrapt in a Players hide, supposes he is as well able to bum-bast out a blank verse as the best of you; but being an absolute Johannes fac totum, is in his owne conceit the onely Shake-scene in a countrey.

GREENE: Groatsworth of Wit (1591).

Fade, To fade in, to fade out. Phrases applied in cinematography to the operation of causing a picture to appear or disappear gradually; in broadcasting, it describes the fading of sound.

In golf, a ball so struck that towards the end of its flight it drifts towards the right, is said to have a bit of a fade.

Fadge. Probably a Scandinavian word, connected with faga, to suit. To suit or fit together, as, It won't fadge; we cannot fadge together; he does not fadge with me.

How will this fadge?

SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, II, ii.

Fadge is also old slang for a FARTHING.

Faerie (fā' ēr i). The land of the fays or fairies, the dominions of OBERON. See AVALON.

The land of faery,
Where nobody gets old and godly and grave,
Where nobody gets old and crafty and wise,
Where nobody gets old and bitter of tongue.
W. B. YEATS: The Land of Heart's Desire.

Faerie Queens, The. An allegorical romance of CHIVALRY by Edmund Spenser (c. 1552-1599), originally intended to have been in twelve books, each of which was to have portrayed one of the twelve moral virtues, but only six books were completed. It details the adventures of various knights, who personify different virtues (e.g. ARTEGAL, justice; Sir CALIDORE, courtesy), and who belong to the court of GLORIANA, who sometimes typifies Queen Elizabeth I.

Fag. A schoolboy drudge who performs menial tasks for his seniors in certain boarding schools. Perhaps from flag in the sense of "drooping", to fag is to work until weary.

From supper until nine o'clock three fags taken in order stood in the passages, and answered any praeporter who called "Fag", racing to the door, the last comer having to do the work . . . And besides this night-work, each praeporter had three or four fags specially allotted to him, of whom he was supposed to be the guide, philosopher, and friend.
T. HUGHES: Tom Brown's Schooldays, ch. vii.

Fag is also slang for a cigarette, possibly connected with "vag", a Devonshire term for a turf for burning. Cp. COFFIN-NAIL.

It's too much fag. Too much trouble, too much needless exertion.

Quite fagged out. Tired out, wearied with hard work.

Fag-end. Originally the coarse end of a piece of cloth; hence the remaining part of anything; as "the fag-end of a leg of mutton"; "the fag-end of a conversation". It is also slang for a cigarette stub (see FAG above).

The Kitchen and Gutters and other Offices of noise and drudgery are at the fag-end.
Howell's Familiar Letters (20 May 1619).

Faggot. A bundle of sticks. In the days when heretics were burnt at the stake, an embroidered representation of a faggot was worn on the arm by those who recanted, thus showing what they merited but had narrowly escaped. Faggot was also applied to a hireling who took the place of another at the muster of a regiment.

Faggot votes. Votes obtained by the nominal transfer of property to individuals in the days when this was a necessary qualification for voting rights, the minimum necessary being the forty-shilling freehold. The "faggot" was in this context a bundle of property divided into small lots.

Fainéant. Les Rois Fainéants. "Do-nothing" or puppet kings (Fr. faire, do; néant, nothing). An epithet particularly applied to the later MEROVINGIAN kings of France, whose powers were increasingly wielded by the MAYOR OF THE PALACE. The first of these largely nominal monarchs was Thierry III (d. 690), followed by Clovis III, Childebert III, Dagobert III, Chilperic II, Thierry IV, and lastly Childeric III who was deposed by Pepin the SHORT, Mayor of the Palace, who assumed the title of king in 751. Louis V (d. 987), last of the CARLOVINGIANS, was likewise so called.

"My signet you shall command with all my heart, madam," said Earl Philip. . . . "I am, you know, a most complete Roi Fainéant, and never once interfered with my Maire de palais in her proceedings."

SIR WALTER SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. xv.

Fains. A schoolchildren's term of unknown origin exempting the first to call: "Fains I goal-keeping". The opposite of "Bags I", by means of which a positive claim is asserted.

Faint heart never won fair lady. An old proverb with obvious meaning.

Fair (O.E. fæger, beautiful, pleasing; also light in colouring, clear, clean, satisfactory, just, etc.). The following have been given this epithet:

Edwy, or Eadwig, King of Wessex (938-958).

Philip the Fair, King of France, le Bel (1268, 1285-1314).

Charles IV, King of France, le Bel (1294, 1322-1328), youngest son of Philip the Fair.

The fair. The FAIR SEX.

The Fair-haired. Harold I, King of Norway (872-930).

Fair Isle. One of the Shetland islands, where a special pattern of knitting is done, which is believed to be of Moorish origin and to have been derived from contacts with shipwrecked sailors from the Spanish Armada of 1588. The Duke of Medina Sidonia, admiral of the Armada, was wrecked on Fair Isle.

Fair Maid of Anjou. Lady Edith Plantagenet, a kinswoman of Richard I and an attendant on Queen Berengaria, who married David, Earl of Huntingdon, Prince Royal of Scotland. She is a central character in Scott's Talisman.

Fair Maid of Brittany. Eleanor (d. 1241), granddaughter of Henry II and, after the death of her brother Arthur, the rightful sovereign of ENGLAND. Her uncle the usurper King John, imprisoned her in Bristol Castle, which she eventually left to enter a nunnery at Amesbury. Her father, Geoffrey, John's elder brother, was Count of Brittany.

Fair Maid of February. A once popular name for a snowdrop.

Fair Maid of Kent. Joan (1328-1385), Countess of Kent, wife of the BLACK PRINCE, and only daughter of Edmund Plantagenet, Earl of Kent. The Prince was her second husband.

Fair Maid of Norway. Margaret (1283-1290), daughter of Eric II of Norway, and granddaughter of Alexander III of SCOTLAND. Acknowledged as heir to the throne of Scotland and affianced to Prince Edward, son of Edward I of England, she died in the Orkney islands on her way to Britain.

Fair Maid of Perth. Katie Glover, heroine of Scott's novel of this name, is supposed to have lived in the early 15th century, but is not a definite historical character, though her house is still shown at Perth. Bizet's opera, La Jolie Fille de Perth (1867), is based on the novel.

Fair Rosamond. See ROSAMOND.

A fair field and no favour. Every opportunity being given.

By fair means. Straightforwardly; without deception or compulsion.

Fair and soft goes far in a day. Courtesy and moderation will help one to effect a good deal of one's purpose.

Fair and square. Honestly, justly, with straightforwardness.

Fair fall you. Good befall you; good luck to you.

Fair game. A worthy subject of banter; legitimately to be pursued or attacked.

Fair to middling. Moderately good; reasonably well.

Fair trade. An old EUPHEMISM for smuggling. It also signifies reciprocal trading privileges with another country as a condition of free trade or tariff concessions.

Fair words butter no parsnips. See under BUTTER.

The fair sex. Women; a phrase modelled on the French le beau sexe.

Pretty fair. Fairly well; reasonably satisfactory; "not bad".

To bid fair. To give good promise; to indicate future success as, "He bids fair to be a good preacher."

To speak fair. To speak civilly or courteously.

Fairs (O.Fr. feire; Lat. feria, a holiday).

These great periodical markets of former days were often held at the time of Church festivals and came to be associated with side-shows, amusements and merry-making. Although trade fairs or exhibitions are a link with the commercial aspect of the fairs of the past, the name is largely associated with the travelling amusement fair. See BARTHOLOMEW FAIR; DONNYBROOK FAIR; GOOSE FAIR; PIE-POWDER COURT.

A day after the fair. See under DAY.

Hiring Fair. A STATUTE FAIR, virtually the same as a MOP FAIR; once an annual event in most market towns in England and Wales on MARTINMAS Day (11 Nov.), when men and maids stood in rows to be inspected by those seeking servants, farm workers, etc.

Mop Fair. A HIRING FAIR, probably taking its name from the tufts or badges worn by those seeking employment. Carters fastened a piece of whipcord to their hats; shepherds, a lock of wool; grooms, a piece of sponge. Others carried a pail, a broom, a mop, etc.

Statute Fair. A fair legalized by statute as opposed to custom or usage; a HIRING FAIR.

Fairlop Oak. A huge tree in Hainault Forest, Essex, blown down in 1820. Prior to that, a FAIR was held annually in July beneath its spreading branches.

Fairy, or Fay. In folk-lore and legend, a diminutive supernatural being of human shape, with magical powers. The names of the principal fairies and sprites, etc. known in fable and legend appear in this dictionary as individual entries. See also BROWNIE, DEITIES, DWARF, ELF, GNOME, GOBLIN, LEPRECHAUN, PIXIE.

Fairy darts. Flint arrow-heads. Cp. ELF ARROWS.

Fairy loaves, or stones. Fossil sea-urchins, said to be made by the fairies.

Fairy money. Found money, said to be placed by some good fairy at the spot where it is picked up. Also in legend, money given by the fairies which soon turned into "leaves" or other worthless forms.

Fairy of the Mine. A malevolent GNOME supposed to live in mines who busied himself cutting ore, turning the windlass, etc.

No goblin or swart fairy of the mine
Hath hurtful power o'er true virginity.

MILTON: Comus, 436.

Fairy rings. Circles of dark green grass often found in lawns and meadows and popularly supposed to be produced by fairies dancing on the spot. They are due to the growth of certain fungi below the surface. The spawn radiates from the centre at a similar rate annually and the darker colour is due to the increased nitrogen produced by the action of the fungus.

You demi-puppets that

By moonshine do the green sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe note bites.

SHAKESPEARE: Tempest, V, i.

Fairy sparks. The phosphoric light from decaying wood, fish, and other substances. Thought at one time to be lights prepared for the fairies at their revels.

Fait accompli (fā tā kom' plē) (Fr.). An accomplished fact, something already done; often used in the sense of some act carried out in order to steal a march on some other party.

I pointed out to Herr von Jagow that this fait accompli of the violation of the Belgian frontier rendered, as he would readily understand, the situation exceedingly grave.

Sir Edward Goschen, Ambassador in Berlin, to Sir Edward Grey, 8 Aug. 1914.

Faith. Act of faith. See AUTO DA FE.

Defender of the Faith. See DEFENDER.

In good faith. "Bona fide", "de bonne foi"; with no ulterior motive, with complete sincerity.

Punic Faith. See PUNIC.

To pin one's faith on. See under PIN.

Faithful. The active supporters of any cult are called the faithful and in former times a PURITAN was sometimes Brother Faithful.

Commander of the Faithful. The CALIPH was so called by Mohammedans.

Father of the Faithful. ABRAHAM (Rom. iv, 16; Gal. iii, 6-9).

The Most Faithful King. The epithet by which the kings of Portugal used to be addressed by the VATICAN. Cp. RELIGIOUS.

Falange (Sp. Phalanx). At first a right-wing party in Spain formed in 1932 by José Antonio Primo de Rivera to uphold his father's memory against republican criticism, and later adopted by General Franco as the one official party in the State. Essentially representing a combination of European fascism and Spanish nationalism, it was used to counterbalance royalist, army, and Church influence and in 1937 forced the CARLISTS to join with it. Since 1957 the latter group has re-emerged. The Falange is disliked by the Church for the anti-clericalism of its more radical members and its relations with the Spanish dictator or CAUDILLO are less enthusiastic.

Falernian. A choice Italian wine esteemed by the ancient Romans and celebrated by VIRGIL and HORACE; so called because it was made of grapes from Falernus.

Falkiner. In New South Wales, a once popular name for a former Australian SHILLING. It derives from the association of a ram's head, which it bore, with the name of the Falkiner family, noted sheep breeders.

Fall. In music, a sinking of tone, a cadence.

That strain again; it had a dying fall.

SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, I, i.

In the fall. In the autumn, at the fall of the leaf. Though now commonly classed as an Americanism, the term is found in the works of Drayton, Middleton, Raleigh, and others.

What crowds of patients the town doctor kills,
Or how, last fall, he raised the weekly bills.

DRYDEN: Juvenal.

The Fall of Man. The degeneracy of the human race in consequence of the disobedience of ADAM.

The fall of the drop. In theatrical parlance, means the fall of the drop-curtain at the end of the act or play.

To fall away. To lose flesh; to degenerate; to quit a party, as, "His adherents fell away one by one."

To fall back upon. To have recourse to.
To fall between two stools. To fail, through hesitating between two choices. The French say, Être assis entre deux chaises.

To fall flat. To fall prostrate; to fail to interest, as, "The last act fell flat."

To fall foul of one. To quarrel with; to make an assault on someone. A nautical term. A rope is said to be foul when it is entangled; one ship falls foul of another when they run against each other.

To fall for. To be captivated by; to be taken in by; to become enamoured of.

To fall from. To tumble or slip off; to violate, as "to fall from one's word"; to abandon or depart from, as "to fall from grace", to lapse into error or sin, to lose favour.

To fall in. To take one's place in the ranks; to take one's place with others. Cp. TO FALL OUT.

To fall in love with. To become enamoured of.

To fall in with. To meet accidentally; to come across; to agree with, as, "He fell in with my views."

To fall into a snare. To stumble accidentally into a snare. This is a Latin phrase, insidias incidere. Similarly, to fall into disgrace is the Latin in offensionem cadere.

To fall on deaf ears. To go unheeded or to be deliberately ignored.

To fall on evil days. To sink into poverty or suffer similar misfortune.

To fall on stony ground. Said of ideas, etc., which meet with no response and fail to take root. The allusion is to the parable of the sower (Matt. xiii, 5, 6).

To fall out. To quarrel; to happen.

See that ye fall not out by the way—Gen. xlv, 24.

Also, in military language, to be dismissed or to disperse from the ranks. Cp. TO FALL IN.

To fall short of. To be deficient of a supply; not to come up to standard. To fall short of the mark is a figure taken from archery, quoits, etc., where the missile falls to the ground before reaching the mark.

To fall sick. To be unwell. A Latin phrase, in morbum incidere. Cp. FALLING SICKNESS.

To fall through. To come to nothing; not carried out.

To fall to. To begin (eating, fighting, etc.).

Come, sir, fall to then; you see my little supper is always ready when I come home, and I'll make no stranger of you.

WALTON and COTTON: The Compleat Angler, Pt. II, ch. ii.

To fall to the ground. To fail; to come to nothing, as, "His hopes fell to the ground."

To fall together by the ears. See under EAR.

To fall under. To incur, as, "to fall under the reproach of carelessness"; to become subject to, as, "He fell under the influence of bad companions."

To fall upon. To attack, as, "to fall upon the enemy"; to throw oneself on, as, "he fell on his sword"; to happen on, as, "On what day does Easter fall?"

To fall upon one's feet. To be unexpectedly lucky; to find oneself unexpectedly in a very favourable situation. Evidently from the old theory that the CAT always falls upon its feet unharmed.

To ride for a fall. See under RIDE.

To try a fall. To wrestle, when each tries to "fall", or throw the other.

I am given, sir, secretly to understand that your younger brother, Orlando, hath a disposition to come in disguis'd against me to try a fall.

SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It, I, i.

Fall-back chaise. A chaise with an adjustable hood.

Fall Guy (U.S.A.). A loser, dupe or victim. Towards the end of the nineteenth century professional wrestling became widely popular in America and many of the bouts were "rigged". One wrestler would promise to "take a fall" if the other agreed to deal with him gently, but the winner often broke his word and roughly handled his opponent. In such circumstances the loser came to be known as a "fall guy".

Fall Line. The line formed by the edge of a plateau where rivers and streams make a sudden fall to the coastal plain; in particular, the boundary in the U.S.A. between the older Appalachian uplands and the Atlantic coastal plain, where its influence in determining the location of cities emphasizes its economic importance. Those living in this belt are sometimes referred to as Fall Liners.

Fall-out. A name given to radioactive dust resulting from atomic and nuclear explosions. Figuratively, the effect of an action which extends beyond the intended range.

Fallen angels. Those cast out of HEAVEN; colloquially, women who have slipped from the paths of virtue.

Falling-bands. Neck bands or broad collars of cambric, lace or linen, made to lie upon the shoulders. Also called falls as distinct from the stiff ruff. They were common in the 17th century.

Under that fayre ruffe so sprucely set
Appears a fall, a falling-band forsooth!
MARSTON: Scourge of Villainie, iii (1599).

Falling sickness. Epilepsy, in which the patient falls suddenly to the ground. SHAKESPEARE plays upon the term:

Brutus: He hath the falling-sickness.
Cassius: No, Cæsar hath it not; but you, and I,
And honest Casca, we have the fallingsickness.

Julius Cæsar, I, ii.

Falling stars. Meteors. A wish made as a star falls is supposed to come true. Mohammedans believe them to be fire-brands flung by good angels against evil spirits when they approach too near the gates of HEAVEN.

False. False quantity. A term used in prosody to denote the incorrect use of a long for a short vowel or syllable, or vice versa.

To play false. To act treacherously, to be faithless.

To sail under false colours. See under COLOUR.

Falstaff. A fat, sensual, boastful, and mendacious KNIGHT; full of wit and humour; the boon companion of Henry, Prince of Wales (the future King Henry V); as portrayed by SHAKESPEARE in Henry IV, Pts. I and II, and Merry Wives of Windsor. Hence, Falstaffian, possessing the qualities and characteristics of Falstaff.

Falutin. See HIGH FALUTIN'.

Fame. Temple of Fame. A PANTHEON where monuments to the famous dead of a nation are erected and their memories honoured. Hence, he will have a niche in the Temple of Fame means his achievements will cause his people to honour him and keep his memory green.

Familiar, or familiar spirit (Lat. famulus, a servant). A spirit slave, sometimes in human shape, sometimes appearing as a cat, dog, raven, etc., attendant upon a WITCH, WIZARD, or magician, and supposed to be a demon in disguise.

Away with him! he has a familiar under his tongue.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. II, IV, vii.

Familiarity. Familiarity breeds contempt. The proverb appears in English at least as early as the mid-16th century and was well known in Latin. The same idea is conveyed in the saying that a prophet is not appreciated in his own country.

Familists. Members of the "Family of Love", an extremist sect founded by Hendrik Nicolaes at Emden, about 1540. He derived his mysticism from David George, or Jorizoon, an ANABAPTIST of Delft, whose followers are sometimes called Davidists or Davists. He implanted his ideas in England in the reign of Edward VI and the sect gained a hold in the eastern counties in spite of persecution. It revived under the COMMONWEALTH, and lingered on until the 18th century. They maintained that all people are of one family and that religion consisted essentially of love.

Family Compact. (1) The name given to the three agreements (1733, 1743, and 1761) between the BOURBON Kings of France and Spain to assert their interests. They were essentially directed against Austrian ascendancy in Italy and British mercantile and maritime supremacy. (2) The social coterie in early 19th-century Connecticut under the Dwight brothers which dominated Connecticut. So called from their inter-relationship. (3) The clique, of UNITED EMPIRE LOYALIST origins, which dominated political and social life in Upper Canada prior to the rebellion of 1837, and which was of an anti-democratic character.

Family of Love. See FAMILISTS.

Fan. I could brain him with his lady's fan. Hotspur's words in SHAKESPEARE's Henry IV, Pt. I, II, iii. Fans were made of feathers, and were the lightest of weapons; a contemptuous phrase.

Queen Anne's Fan. See under QUEEN.

Fan. Used from about 1900 for an ardent admirer or devotee. It is an abbreviation of FANATIC. Admiring letters written to the object of such admiration are known as fan mail.

Fanatic (Lat. fanum, temple). Literally, one who is possessed of the enthusiasm or madness of the temple engendered by over-indulgence in religious rites.

Earth's fanatics make Too frequently heaven's saints.
MRS. BROWNING: Aurora Leigh, ii, 448.

Fancy. Love—i.e. the passion of the fantasy or imagination.

Tell me, where is fancy bred,
Or in the heart or in the head?
SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, III, ii.

The Fancies. In early 19th-century slang parlance a collective name for prize-fighters and devotees of the prize-ring. It is now sometimes applied to supporters of other pastimes.

Fancy-free. Not in love.

And the imperial votaress passed on,
In maiden meditation, fancy-free.

SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, II, ii.

Fancy-man. Originally a CAVALIERE SERVENTE or CICISBE0; one selected by a married woman to escort her to theatres, etc., to ride about with her, and to amuse her. It is now more usually applied to a sweetheart, and a harlot's souteneur.

Fancy-sick. Love-sick.

All fancy-sick she is, and pale of cheer.

SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, III, ii.

To fancy oneself. To be conceited.

To tickle one's fancy. To tickle one's imagination thus exciting amusement.

Fanfaron (Fr. fanfare, a flourish of trumpets). A swaggering bully, a cowardly boaster who blows his own trumpet. Scott uses the word for finery, especially for the gold lace worn by military men.

Hence fanfaronade, swaggering; vain boasting; ostentatious display.

Fanny. A naval mess kettle, somewhat similar in size and use to an army DIXIE. The name is said to have been applied to the tins in which preserved mutton or FANNY ADAMS was first issued. The sailors found them useful as mess traps and the name was transferred to the official kettle subsequently provided from naval stores.

Fanny, Lord. A nickname given by Pope to Lord Hervev (1696-1743) for his effeminate and foppish manners. He painted his face, and was as pretty in his ways as a boarding-school miss.

The lines are weak, another's pleased to say,
Lord Fanny spins a thousand such a day.

POPE: Satires of Horace, I.

Fanny Adams, or Sweet Fanny Adams, or Sweet F.A. means "nothing at all" or "sweet nothing" though (especially by its initials) it has a somewhat ambiguous connotation. It is a phrase of tragic origin. In 1867 Fanny Adams, a child of eight, was murdered in a hop-garden at Alton, Hants, and her body horribly dismembered. The Royal Navy, with gruesome humour, adopted her name as a synonym for tinned mutton, which was first issued at this time. Sweet Fanny Adams became, as a consequence, a phrase for anything worthless, and then for "nothing at all". Cp. HARRIET LANE.

Fantom. An old spelling of PHANTOM.

Far. A far cry. See CRY.

Far and away. Beyond comparison; as "far and away the best", incomparably the best.

Far and wide. To a good distance in every direction. "To spread the news far and wide", to blazon it everywhere.

Far-fetched. Brought from afar; remotely connected, strained, as "a far-fetched simile", "a far-fetched conceit".

Far from it. Not in the least; by no means; quite the contrary. If the answer to, "Was he sober at the time?" is, "Far from it", the implication is that he was more than a little drunk.

Far gone. Deeply affected, as, "far gone in love".

Fare (O.E. faran, to go, to travel, etc., ultimately connected with Lat. portare, to carry). The noun formerly denoted a journey for which a sum was paid; then the sum itself, and by extension, the person who pays it. In certain English dialects, e.g. Suffolk, the verb fare is used in its original sense, "to go". The noun also means food and drink, the provisions of the table.

He cannot fare well but he must cry out roast meat. Said of one who blazons his good fortune from the house-top.

Farmer George. George III (1738, 1760-1820). A keen and progressive farmer who transformed his agricultural holdings. Under the name of Ralph Robinson he contributed the Robinson Letters to Arthur Young's Annals of Agriculture. His nickname of farmer was used by his political critics to arouse ridicule but:

A better farmer ne'er brushed dew from lawn.
BYRON: Vision of Judgement.

Farmers General. See FERMIERS GÉNÉRAUX.

Farnese (far nā' zē). A noted Italian family who ruled Parma and Piacenza from 1545 to 1731. Alessandro Farnese, as Pope Paul III (1534-1549), set up his son Pierluigi in the duchy and established the family politically.

The Farnese Bull. A marble group executed by Apollonius of Tralles and his brother Tauriscus in the 2nd century B.C. The group represents Dirce bound to the horns of a bull by Zethus and Amphion for ill-using their mother. It was discovered in the Baths of Caracalla in 1546, and placed in the Farnese Palace at Rome. It is now in the Museo Nazionale at Naples.

The Farnese Hercules. Glykon's copy of the famous statue by Lysippus, the Greek sculptor of the time of ALEXANDER THE GREAT. It represents the hero leaning on his club, with one hand on his back, as if he had just got possession of the apple of the HESPERIDES. It was removed from the Farnese Palace at Rome, with other famous sculptures, to the Museo Nazionale at Naples.

Farrago (fá ra' gō). A farrago of nonsense. A confused heap of nonsense. Farrago (Lat.) is properly a mixture of far (meal) with other ingredients for the use of cattle, i.e. mixed fodder.

Farthing (O.E. feorthing, a fourthling or fourth part). The early silver penny was divided into two or four parts on the reverse thus ⊕ on the lines of the cross. Each of these quarters was a farthing. Farthings were demonetized on 31 December 1960.

Not worth a brass farthing. Virtually worthless. Erasmus, when Professor of Greek at Cambridge, described his profits as "not worth a brass farthing" and the phrase is possibly an allusion to the Nuremberg Monastic token; the expression probably gained further use from the 17th-century farthing tokens or HARRINGTONS, and Gun-money. (See under GUN.)

Farthingale. The hooped understructure of the large protruding skirt fashionable in the reigns of Elizabeth I and James I. The word is the O.Fr. verdugale, a corruption of Span. verdugado, green rods, which were used for the framework before WHALEBONE took their place.

Fasces (Lat.). A bundle of rods tied round with a red thong from which an axe projected. In ancient ROME fasces were assigned to the higher magistrates as symbols of authority, representing power over life and limb. In modern times the fasces became the emblem of the Italian FASCISTS.

Fascinés (fäs' ēnz). Bundles of faggots used to build up military defences or to fill ditches which impeded attack. Their use was revived for this latter purpose in World War II. The name derives from the Roman FASCES.

Fascist. Originally an Italian political movement taking its name from the old Roman FASCES. It was founded in 1919 by Benito Mussolini (1883-1945) who took advantage of the discontent in Italy after World War I to form a totalitarian nationalist party against left-wing radicalism and socialism. In 1922 the Fascists marched on ROME and demanded power, and King Victor Emmanuel III made Mussolini Prime Minister. He styled himself DUCE (leader) and made himself Dictator in 1925, suppressing all other political parties the following year. The Fascists controlled Italy until 1943.

The term Fascism soon came to be applied to similar totalitarian movements in other countries. Ruthlessness, inhumanity, and dishonest and disreputable practices were notable characteristics of its adherents. See HITLERISM; NAZI.

Benito Mussolini provided Italy with a new theme of government which, while it claimed to save the Italian people from Communism, raised himself to dictatorial power. As Fascism sprang from Communism, so Nazism developed from Fascism.
WINSTON CHURCHILL: The Gathering Storm, ch. i.

Fash. Dinna fash yourself! Don't get excited; don't get into a flurry about it. The word is not of Scottish origin, it is the O.Fr. fascher (Mod. Fr. fâcher), to anger.

Fashion. In a fashion, or after a fashion. "In a sort of way", as, "He spoke French after a fashion."

In the fashion. Dressed in the latest style, modish; in accordance with current trends.

Fast. The adjective is used figuratively of someone of either sex who is addicted to pleasure and dissipation; of a young man or woman who "goes the pace", which amounts to the same thing.

To play fast and loose. To run with the hare and hunt with the hounds; to blow both hot and cold; to say one thing and do another. The allusion is probably to an old cheating game once practised at FAIRS. A belt or strap was doubled and rolled up with the loop in the centre and placed on edge on a table. The player then had to catch the loop with a skewer while the belt was unrolled, but this was done in such a way by the trickster as to make the feat impossible.

Like a right gipsy, hath, at fast and loose,
Beguiled me to the very heart of loss.

SHAKESPEARE: Antony and Cleopatra, IV, xii.

To pull a fast one. To gain an advantage by sharp practice or by a sudden and unexpected display of skill.

Fasti. In ancient ROME, working days when the law courts were open. Holy days (DIES NON) when the law courts, etc., were not open were called nefasti.

The Fasti were listed in calendars, and the list of events occurring during the year of office of a pair of consuls was called fasti consulares; hence, any chronological list of events or office-holders became known as fasti. The surviving six books of Ovid's Fasti are a poetical account of the Roman festivals of the first six months of the year. Cp. CALENDIS.

Fasting. Strictly a complete abstinence from food and drink, but the word is more usually applied to an extreme or fairly strict limitation of diet, and is of proved value in treating certain complaints. It is ancient and widespread as a form of penance, or purification, and was so used by the Jews. It was practised by Christ and adopted by the early Church. As currently practised in the Church, it is marked by abstinence from flesh meat and observance of a light diet. Throughout the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH fasting is obligatory on ASH WEDNESDAY and GOOD FRIDAY. The main fast of the Mohammedans is during the month of RAMADAN.

Mahatma Gandhi (1869-1948) practised fasting, an ancient Hindu observance, as a form of asceticism and as a political protest. See HUNGER-STRIKE; CAT AND MOUSE ACT under CAT.

Moreover when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance; for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast.

Matt. vi, 16.

Fat in printer's slang, composition that does not entail a lot of setting, and hence can be done quickly.

A bit of fat. An unexpected stroke of luck; also, the best part of anything, especially among actors, a good part in a play.

The fat is in the fire. Something has been let out inadvertently which will cause a "regular flare up"; it's all over, all's up with it, the damage is done. If, in cooking, the grease spills into the fire, it blazes up and smokes, there is risk of trouble and the food is spoilt.

The Fat. Alphonso II of Portugal (1185, 1211-1223); Charles III of France, le Gros (839, 884-888), also known as Charles II when CHARLEMAGNE is excluded from the list of French kings; Louis VI of France, le Gros (1081, 1108-1137), were so called.

Fat-head. A silly fool, a dolt.

Fata (fa ta) (Ital. a fairy). Female supernatural beings introduced in Italian mediæval romance, usually under the sway of DEMOGORGON.

Fata Morgana. The fay, or fairy Morgana, sister of King ARTHUR; also a mirage often visible in the Straits of Messina, so named from MORGAN LE FAY who was fabled by the Norman settlers in England to dwell in Calabria.

Fatal Gifts. See CADMUS; GOLD OF TOLOSA under GOLD; HARMONIA; FATAL NECKLACE under NECKLACE; NESSUS; NEIBELUNGEN-LIED; OPAL.

Fates. The Cruel Fates. The Greeks and Romans supposed there were three Parcæ, or Fates, who arbitrarily controlled the birth, life and death of everyone. They were CLOTHO, LACHESIS and ATROPOS; called cruel because they paid no regard to the wishes of anyone.

Father. In the HOLY TRINITY, God. The name is given as a title to Roman Catholic priests, and sometimes to CHURCH OF ENGLAND clergy of the HIGH CHURCH persuasion; also to the senior member of a body or profession, as the Father of the House of Commons; and to the originator or first leader of some movement or school, etc., as the Father of Comedy, the Father of History. In ancient Rome the title was given to the senators (cp. PATRICIAN; CONSCRIPT FATHERS), and in ecclesiastical history to the early Church writers and doctors.

Father Mathew, Neptune, etc. See these names.

Father Thoughtful. Nicholas Catinat (1637-1712), a marshal of France; so called by his soldiers for his cautious and thoughtful policy.

Father of Angling. Izaak Walton (1593-1683).

Father of the Chapel. See CHAPEL.

Father of Chemistry. Robert Boyle (1627-1691).

Father of Christian Monasticism. St. Anthony (c. 250-350). See FATHERS OF THE DESERT.

Father of Comedy. Aristophanes (c. 450-c. 385 B.C.).

Father of Courtesy. Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick (1382-1439).

Father of Ecclesiastical History. Eusebius of Cæsarea (c. 260-c. 340).

Father of English Botany. William Turner (c. 1520-1568), Dean of Wells, who wrote his New Herball (1551-1562), which is held to begin the scientific study of botany in ENGLAND.

Father of English History. The Venerable Bede (673-735), author of the famous Ecclesiastical History of the English People (written in Latin).

Father of the English Novel. Both Samuel Richardson (1689-1761) and Henry Fielding (1707-1754) have been given the title.

Father of English Poetry. Chaucer (c. 1340-1400).

Father of English Song. Caedmon (fl. 670).

Father of Epic Poetry. HOMER.

Father of the Faithful. ABRAHAM.

Father of Greek Tragedy. Æschylus (c. 525-456 B.C.).

Father of his Country. CICERO (106-43 B.C.) was so entitled by the Roman senate; also Julius CÆSAR (100-44 B.C.) and Augustus (63 B.C.-A.D. 14) were among the several Cæsars given the title.

Andronicus Palæologus II (c. 1260-1332), who assumed the title.

Cosimo de' MEDICI of Florence (1389-1464).

Andrea Doria (1466-1560) of Genoa.

George Washington (1732-1799), first President of the United States.

Victor Emmanuel II (1820-1878), first King of Italy, was popularly so designated in allusion to his unnumbered progeny of bastard children.

Father of History. Herodotus (c. 485-c. 424 B.C.).

Father of Letters. Francis I (1494-1547), King of France.

Lorenzo de' MEDICI (1449-1492), the Magnificent.

Father of Lies. SATAN.

Father of Medicine. Hippocrates (469-399 B.C.).

Father of Moral Philosophy. St. THOMAS AQUINAS (c. 1225-1274).

Father of the People. Louis XII, King of France (1462-1515). Henry IV (1553-1610) was also termed "the Father and Friend of the people".

Christian III (1552-1559), King of Denmark and Norway.

Father of Ridicule. Rabelais (c. 1495-1553). See RABELAISIAN.

Father of the Waters. The Irrawaddy in Burma and the Mississippi in North America. The Nile is so called by Dr. Johnson in his Rasselas.

The epithet Father is not uncommonly applied to rivers, especially those on which cities are built.

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen

Full many a sprightly race

Disporting on thy margent green,

The paths of pleasure trace.

GRAY: Distant Prospect of Eton College.

O Tiber, Father Tiber,

To whom the Romans pray.

MACAULAY: Lay of Horatius.

Fathers of the Church. All those church writers of the first twelve centuries whose works on Christian doctrine are considered of weight and worthy of respect. But the term is more strictly applied to those teachers of the first twelve, and especially of the first six, centuries who added notable holiness and complete orthodoxy to their learning. Representative among them are:

1st cent., Clement of Rome; 2nd cent., Ignatius of Antioch, Justin, Irenæus, Polycarp; 3rd cent., Cyprian, Dionysius, Origen, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Gregory Thaumaturgus; 4th cent., Hilary, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory Nyssen, John Chrysostom, Eusebius, Jerome, Epiphanius, Athanasius, Basil, Ambrose; 5th cent., Rufinus, Augustine, Pope Leo the Great, Cyril of Alexandria, Vincent of Lerins; 6th cent., Cæsarius of Arles; 7th cent., Isidore, Pope Gregory the Great; 8th cent., John of Damascus, Venerable Bede; 11th cent., Peter Damian; 12th cent., Anselm, Bernard.

Cp. APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

Fathers of the Constitution. The framers of the constitution of the United States who took part in the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia in 1787. In particular, James Madison (1751-1836) is known as the Father of the Constitution for the part he played in its formation.

Fathers of the Desert, or Desert Fathers. The monks and hermits of the Egyptian deserts in the 4th century from whom Christian monasticism derives. The most famous were ST. ANTHONY, who founded his first monastery in 305; St. Pachomius, the hermit and founder of monasteries; and St. Hilarion. There is a good description of their mode of life in Kingsley's Hypatia.

Pilgrim Fathers. See PILGRIM.

Fatima. The last wife of BLUEBEARD. MOHAMMED's daughter was also called Fatima.

Fatimids, or Fatimites. An Arab dynasty ruling in Egypt and North Africa (909-1171), descended from Fatima and her husband ALI.

Fatted Calf. See TO KILL THE FATTED CALF under CALF.

Fault. In geology, the break or displacement of a stratum of rock.

At fault. Not on the right track. Hounds are at fault when the fox has jumped upon a wall, crossed a river, cut through a flock of sheep, or doubled like a hare, because the scent, i.e., the track, is broken.

For fault of a better. For want of a better; no one (or nothing) better being available. SHAKESPEARE uses the expression in the Merry Wives of Windsor (I, iv).

In fault, at fault. To blame.

Is Antony or we in fault for this?

SHAKESPEARE: Antony and Cleopatra, III, xiii.

No one is without his faults. No one is perfect.

To a fault. In excess; as, "kind to a fault". Excess of every kind is almost a defect; there is a similar idea expressed in the phrase to kill by kindness (see KILL).

To find fault. To blame; to express disapprobation.

Fauna (faw' ná). The animals of a country at any given period. The term was first used by Linnæus in the title of his Fauna Suecica (1746), a companion volume to his Flora Suecica (1745), and is the name of a rural goddess, counterpart of Faunus (see PAN).

Nor less the place of curious plant he knows;
He both his Flora and his Fauna shows.

CRABBE: The Borough, Letter viii.

Faust (foust). The hero of Marlowe's Tragical History of Dr. Faustus (c. 1592) and Goethe's Faust (1772-1831) is founded on Dr. Johann Faust, or Faustus, a magician and astrologer, who was born in Württemberg and died about 1538, and about whom many stories soon began to circulate crediting him with supernatural gifts and evil living. The suggestion that Johann Fust, or Faust, the printer and one-time partner of Gutenberg, was the original upon whom the Faust stories were built, is now completely rejected. In 1587 The History of Dr. Faustus, the Notorious Magician and Master of the Black Art was published by Johann Spies at Frankfurt. It immediately became popular and was soon translated into English, French, and other languages. Many other accounts followed and the Faust theme was developed by writers, artists and musicians over the years. It was Goethe who was responsible, however, for transforming the necromancer into a personification of the struggle between the higher and lower natures in man. Notable among musical compositions on the story are Spohr's opera Faust 1813, Wagner's overture Faust, 1840; Berlioz's Damnation de Faust, 1846; Gounod's opera Faust, 1859; Biotto's Mefistofele, 1868; and Busoni's Doktor Faust, 1925.

The idea of making a pact with a DEVIL for worldly reasons is of Jewish origin. The basis of the Faust story is that he sold his soul to the Devil in return for twenty-four years of further life during which he is to have every pleasure and all knowledge at his command. The climax comes when the Devil claims him for his own.

O lente, lente currite noctis equi!
The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike,
The Devil will come, and Faustus must be damned.
O' I'll leap up to my God! Who pulls me down?
See, see where Christ's blood streams in the firmament!

MARLOWE: Doctor Faustus, V, iii.

Faute de mieux (fôt dé mê êr) (Fr.). For want of something better.

Fauvism (fô' vizm). The name given to the work of a group of young French artists of the first decade of the 20th century, whose leader was Henri Matisse, and which included Derain, Braque, Vlaminck, Dufy, Marquet, Friez, and Rouault. There was a corresponding German movement known as Die Brücke (The Bridge). The French school derives from the influence of Van Gogh and their work was characterized by the imaginative use of brilliant colour, decorative simplicity, vitality and gaiety. The name Fauves (wild beasts) arose from a remark of the critic Vauxcelles at an exhibition of their work in 1905, Donatello au milieu des fauves, occasioned by the sight of their spectacularly coloured pictures. Cp. IMPRESSIONISM; CUBISM; FUTURISM.

Faux pas (fô pa) (Fr. A false step). A breach of manners or good conduct.

The fact is his Lordship, who hadn't, it seems,
Form'd the slightest idea, not ev'n in his dreams,
That the pair had been wedded according to law,
Conceived that his daughter had made a faux pas.

BARHAM: Ingoldsby Legends

(Some account of a New Play).

Favonius. The Latin name for the ZEPHYR or west wind. It means the wind favourable to vegetation.

If to the torrid zone her way she bend,
Her the cool breathing of Favonius lend,
Thither command the birds to sing their quires,
That zone is temp'rate.

HABINGTON: Castara: To the Spring (1634).

Favour. Ribbons made into a bow are called favours from being bestowed by ladies on the successful champions of tournaments. Cp. TRUE-LOVERS' KNOT.

Here, Fluellen; wear thou this favour for me, and stick it in thy cap.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, IV, vii.

To curry favour. See CURRY.

Favourites. False curls on the temples; a curl of hair on the temples plastered with some cosmetic; whiskers made to meet the mouth.

You tell me, sire, don't you as nice appear
With your false calves, bardash, and fav'rites
here?

MRS. GENTILVRE: The Platonic Lady: Epilogue (1721).

Fay. See FAIRY.

Morgan le Fay. See FATA MORGANA and MORGAN.

Feal and Divot. In SCOTLAND, the right to cut turf or peat, from which, by jocular derivation, comes the divot of golf, a piece of turf removed by a player's club. Both words mean "turf".

Fearless (Fr. sans peur). Jean, Duke of Burgundy (1371-1419) was so called. Cp. BAYARD.

Feast, or Festival. As a day or days specially set apart for religious observances is an ancient practice common to all religions. The number of Feasts in the ROMAN CATHOLIC and GREEK CHURCHES is extensive; the CHURCH OF ENGLAND after the REFORMATION only retained a certain number. The Feasts in the Christian CALENDAR have been divided in various ways, one of which is to group them as movable or immovable. All SUNDAYS are Feast Days.

The chief immovable feasts are the four quarter-days—viz. the ANNUNCIATION, or LADY DAY (25 March); The Nativity of ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST (24 June); MICHAELMAS DAY (29 September); CHRISTMAS DAY (25 December). Others are the Circumcision (1 January), EPIPHANY (6 January), ALL SAINTS (1 November), the several Apostles' days and the anniversaries of martyrs and saints.

The movable feasts depend upon EASTER Day and also among them are the Sundays after the EPIPHANY, SEPTUAGESIMA SUNDAY, the Sundays of LENT, Rogation Sunday, ASCENSION DAY, PENTECOST or WHIT SUNDAY, TRINITY SUNDAY, and the Sundays after Trinity.

Feast of Reason. Conversation on and discussion of learned and congenial subjects.

There St. John mingles with my friendly bowl
The feast of reason and the flow of soul.
POPE: Imitations of Horace, II, i.

Feasts of Reason. See REASON, THE GODDESS OF.

Feather. A broken feather in one's wing. A scandal connected with someone.

A feather in your cap. An honour to you. The allusion is to the very general custom in Asia and among the American Indians of adding a feather to the headgear for every enemy slain. The ancient Lycians and many others had a similar custom, just as the sportsman who killed the first woodcock put a feather in his cap. In Hungary, at one time, none might wear a feather but he who had slain a Turk. When CHINESE GORDON quelled the TAI-PING rebellion he was honoured by the Chinese Government with the "yellow jacket and peacock's feather".

Birds of a feather flock together. See under BIRD.

Fine feathers make fine birds. Said of an overdressed person who does not really match up to his or her clothes.

In full feather. Well supplied with money. In allusion to birds not on the moult.

In grand feather. Dressed "up to the nines" (see under NINE). Also, in perfect health, thoroughly fit.

In high feather. In exuberant spirits, joyous.

Of that feather. See BIRDS OF A FEATHER.
Prince of Wales's feathers. See WALES, PRINCE OF.

Tarred and feathered. See TAR.

Tickled with a feather. Easily moved to laughter. Pope in his Essay on Man (II, 276) has, "Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw."

To cut a feather. A ship moving at speed is said to cut a feather in allusion to the ripple set up by her bows. Metaphorically, "to cut a dash" (see under DASH).

To feather an oar. To turn the blade parallel with and move it along the surface of the water as the hands are moved forward for a fresh stroke. The oar throws off the water in a feathery spray.

To feather one's nest well. To provide for one's own interests, especially financial. The phrase is commonly used with implications of disapproval.

To feather one's propeller. In flying, to rotate the aeroplane's propeller blades, when the engine is stopped, to an angle at which they produce minimum drag. In boats to perform a similar operation to lessen water resistance on the screw.

To make the feathers fly. To make a noisy scene when angered, to make the "fur fly"; an allusion to the fighting of cock birds.

To show the white feather. See WHITE.

To smooth one's ruffled feathers. To recover one's equanimity after an insult, etc.

To featherbed. To pamper, to cushion; the allusion is obvious.

Featherweight. Something of extreme lightness in comparison with others of its kind. The term is applied to a jockey weighing not more than 4 st. 7 lb. or to a boxer weighing not more than 9 st. In the paper trade, the name is given to very light antique, laid, or wove book papers, which are loosely woven and made mainly from esparto.

February. The month of purification amongst the ancient Romans (Lat. februus, I purify by sacrifice).

2 February, CANDLEMAS DAY, is the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary. It is said that if the weather is fine and frosty at the close of JANUARY and the beginning of February, there is more winter ahead than behind.

Si sol splendescat Maria Purificante,
Major erit glacies post festum quam fuit ante.
SIR T. BROWNE: Vulgar Errors.

The Anglo-Saxons called this month "sprout-kale" from the sprouting of cabbage or kale. In the French Republican CALENDAR it was called Pluviôse, rain-month (20 January to 20 February). See also FILL-DYKE.

Fecit (fā' kit) (Lat. he made it). A word often inscribed after the name of an artist, sculptor, etc., as David fecit, Goujon fecit; i.e., David painted it, Goujon sculptured it, etc.

Federalists. Those Americans who supported the proposed new constitution of 1787, led by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, John Adams, John Jay, and others. Hamilton, Madison and Jay published 85 essays under the name Publius, in support of Federalism, known in their collected form as The Federalist (1788). The party controlled the government until 1801 and came to an end in 1816. Cp. CONFEDERATE STATES.

Fee. An Anglo-French word, from Old High Ger. Fehu, wages, money, property, and it is connected with the O.E. feoh, cattle, goods, money. So in Lat. pecunia, money, from pecus, cattle. Capital is capita, heads (of cattle), and chattels is a mere variant.

At a pin's fee. See PIN.

Fee-farm. A tenure by which land is held in FEE SIMPLE without any other services from the tenant other than a perpetual fixed rent.

Fee-penny. A fine for money overdue; an earnest or pledge for a bargain.

Fee simple. A property held by a person in his own right, free from condition or limitation. A conditional fee simple is one granted subject to conditions which if unfulfilled give the grantor the right to re-enter and is not a legal estate.

Fee-tail. An estate limited to a person and his lawful heirs; an entailed estate (see ENTAIL). Fee-tail as such was abolished by the Law of Property Act, 1925.

Retaining fee. To secure the right to call on the services of someone, especially a lawyer, by a fee paid.

To hold in fee. To hold as one's lawful, absolute possession.

Once did she hold the gorgeous east in fee;
And was the safeguard of the west.
WORDSWORTH: The Venetian Republic.

Feeble. Most forcible Feeble. Said of one whose language is pretentious but whose ideas are very jejune. Feeble is a woman's tailor brought to Sir John Falstaff as a recruit (SHAKESPEARE, Henry IV, Pt. II, III, ii). He tells Sir John he will do his good will, and the knight replies, "Well said, courageous Feeble! Thou wilt be as valiant as the wrathful or magnanimous mouse . . . most forcible Feeble."

Fehmgericht. See VEHMGERICHTE.

Felix the Cat, hero of early animated film cartoons which appeared in 1921 in a production by Pat Sullivan. Throughout his many adventures Felix kept on walking and thus originated the once-familiar catch-phrase.

Fell. Doctor Fell.

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this I know, I know full well,
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.

These well-known lines are by the "facetious" Tom Brown (1663-1704) and the person referred to was Dr. John Fell, Dean of Christ Church (1625-1686), who expelled him, but said he would remit the sentence if Brown translated the thirty-third Epigram of Martial:

Non amo te, Zabidi, nec possum dicere quare;
Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te.

The foregoing translation is said to have been given impromptu.

It was this Dr. Fell who in 1667 presented to the University of Oxford a complete typefoundry containing punches and matrices of a large number of founts—Arabic, Syriac, Coptic and other learned alphabets, as well as the celebrated "Fell" Roman.

Fellow. At the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and at Trinity College, Dublin, a Fellow is a member of the foundation sharing in its government and drawing a stipend from the college revenues. There are also Honorary Fellowships, etc. At University College and King's College, London, election as a Fellow is a mark of honour to a distinguished member. At other universities there are Research or Postgraduate Fellowships for further study.

Fellow-Commoner. An undergraduate at Cambridge who was formerly privileged to "common" (i.e. dine) at the fellows' table for extra payment, the corresponding Oxford term being Gentleman Commoner.

In 'varsity slang these names were given to empty bottles, from the implication that such students were empty-headed.

Fellow-traveller. A person in sympathy with a political party but not a member of that party; usually restricted to Communist sympathizers. The term (Rus. poputchik) was coined by Leon Trotsky.

"He is but one of a reputed short list of seven fellow-travellers under threat of expulsion."—Comment in Time and Tide, 1 May 1948, on the Labour Party's expulsion of one of its members.

Felo de se (fē' lō dē sē). Self-destruction, the act of suicide; also the self-murderer himself. Murder is felony, and a man who murders himself commits this felony on himself. An Anglo-Latin expression.

Feme-covert (fem kūv' ert). A married woman, one under the cover, authority, or protection of her husband. The expression is derived from Old French.

Feme sole (fem sōl). A single woman.

Feme sole merchant. A woman, married or single, who carries on a trade on her own account.

Feminine ending. An extra unaccented syllable at the end of a line of verse, e.g. in lines 1 and 3 of the following:

With rue my heart is laden
For golden friends I had,
For many a rose-lipt maiden
And many a light-foot lad.

A. E. HOUSMAN.

Femynye (fem' i ni). A mediæval name for the Kingdom of the AMAZONS. Gower terms PENTHESILEA "queen of Feminee".

He [Theseus] conquered at the regne of Femynye
That whylom was y-claped Scithia;
And weddede the quene Ipolita.

CHAUCER: Knight's Tale, 8.

Fen Nightingale. A frog, which sings at night in the fens, as nightingales sing in the groves.

Fence. A slang term for a receiver of stolen goods.

Fence month, or season. The fawning time of deer, therefore the close time, i.e. from about fifteen days before mid-summer until fifteen days after it. Also a close time for fishing, etc.

To sit on the fence. To take care not to commit oneself; to hedge. The characteristic attitude of "Mr. Facing-Both-Ways".

Fencibles. Companies of regular troops of horse and foot, raised for home service in 1759, again in 1778-1779, and 1794 for special emergencies. The word is short for defensibles.

Fenians. An anti-British secret society of Irishmen founded in New York in 1838 by John O'Mahony and in IRELAND by James Stephens, with the object of making Ireland a republic and bringing English domination to an end. The word is from the Old Irish Fene, a name of the ancient Irish, confused with Fianna, the legendary warriors who defended Ireland in the time of Finn.

The Fenian Brotherhood, or Irish Republican Brotherhood, attempted invasions of Canada in 1866 and 1870-1871. In 1867 there were insurrectionary attempts in Ireland, attacks on Chester Castle, Clerkenwell Gaol, and an attack on a policeman in Manchester, etc. The movement petered out in the late 1870s. Cp. CLAN-NA-GAEL; PHŒNIX PARK MURDERS; SINN FEIN.

Fennel. This herb was anciently supposed to be an aphrodisiac, thus "to eat conger and fennel" was provocative of sexual licence. Hence Falstaff's remark to Poins:

He plays at quoits well, and eats conger and fennel, and drinks off candles' ends for flapdragons, and rides the wild mare with the boys.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, II, iv.

It was also emblematical of flattery, and may have been included among the herbs distributed by Ophelia (Hamlet, IV, v) for this reason.

Uppon a banke, bordring by, grew women's weedes, Fenell I meane for flatterers, fit generally for that sexe.

GREENE: A Quip for an Upstart Courtier (1592).

Culpeper also says:

A decoction of the leaves and root is good for serpent bites, and to neutralise vegetable poison, as mushrooms, etc. The New English Physician Enlarged (1653).

Fenrir, or Fenris (fen' rēr). In Scandinavian mythology, the wolf of LOKI. He was the brother of HEL and when he gaped one jaw touched earth and the other heaven. At the RAGNAROK he broke his fetters and swallowed ODIN, who was avenged by VIDAR thrusting his sword into the yawning gullet and piercing the beast's heart.

Feræ Naturæ (fer' i ná tū' ri) (Lat. of savage nature). The legal term for animals living in a wild state, as distinguished from those which are domesticated.

Women are not comprised in our Laws of Friendship: they are Feræ Naturæ.

DRYDEN: The Mock Astrologer, IV.

Ferdiad. A hero of Irish legend who was persuaded to fight for Queen MAEVE against CUCHULAIN, his dearest friend. After a struggle lasting three days he was killed, to Cuchulain's bitter grief.

Fergus mac Roich. The heroic tutor of CUCHULAIN, who left CONCHOBAR's court after the treacherous murder of the sons of USNECH.

Ferguson. It's all very well Mr. Ferguson, but you can't do that, you mustn't go there, etc. A popular catch phrase of the early and mid-nineteenth century, the equivalent of the modern, "You can't do that there 'ere." It originated from the bright young men about town who, when brought before the "BEAK" for knocking down watchmen, wrenching off knockers, etc., gave the name "Ferguson" instead of their proper names.

Fermiers Généraux (Fair mē ā zhe ne rō). Before the French Revolution of 1789, those who farmed the indirect taxes in return for an agreed sum (Med. Lat. firma, fixed payment). Taxes were leased on a six-year contract. They retained any surplus for themselves and consequently grew rich. The system was a gross abuse during the ANCIEN RÉGIME.

Fern Seed. We have the receipt of fern seed, we walk invisible (SHAKESPEARE, Henry IV, Pt. I, II, i). Fern seed was popularly supposed only to be visible on St. JOHN'S Eve, and as it was thus so seldom seen it was believed to confer invisibility on those who carried it. Plants were often supposed to convey their own particular quality on their wearer. Thus the yellow celandine was said to cure jaundice; wood-sorrel, which has a heart-shaped leaf, to cheer the heart; liverwort to be good for the liver, etc.

I had
No medicine, sir, to go invisible
No fern-seed in any pocket.

BEN JOHNSON: New Inn, I, i.

Ferney. The Patriarch, or Philosopher of Ferney. VOLTAIRE (1694-1778); so called because for the last twenty years of his life he lived at Ferney, a village near Geneva.

Ferragus. The giant of Portugal in VALENTINE AND ORSON. The great BRAZEN HEAD, that told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, was kept in this giant's castle.

Ferrara. See ANDREA FERRARA.

Ferrara Bible, The. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Ferrex and Porrex. Two sons of Gorboduc, a mythical British king, who divided his kingdom between them. Porrex drove his brother from Britain, and when Ferrex returned with an army he was slain, but Porrex was shortly after torn to pieces by his mother with the assistance of her women. The story is told in Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Britonum (ch. xvi), and it forms the basis of the first regular English tragedy, Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex, written by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, and acted in 1562.

Ferry Pilot. A World War II term for a pilot flying new aircraft from the factory to the air station.

Fescennine Verses. LAMPOONS; so called from Fescennium in Tuscany, where performers at merry-makings used to ex-temporize scurrilous jests of a personal nature to amuse the audience.

Fesse. See HERALDRY.

Festina Lente. (fes tēn' a len tā) (Lat.). Make haste slowly. It is the punning motto of the Onslow family.

Festschrift (fest shrift) (Ger. fest, festival; schrift, writings). This term is commonly used for the volume of essays, papers, etc., prepared by colleagues and friends as a tribute to a scholar on some special occasion (usually on retirement or a particular anniversary).

The "Festschrift", the present English Miscellany, speaks for itself, and will remain a permanent record of the esteem in which Dr. Furnivall is held wherever English literature is read, or the English language studied.

An English Miscellany (Presented to Dr. Furnivall in Honour of his Seventy-fifth Birthday).

Fetch. A WRAITH—the disembodied ghost of a living person; hence fetch-light, or fetch candle, a light appearing at night supposed to foretell someone's death. Fetches most commonly appear to distant friends and relations at the very moment before the death of those they represent. The word is of uncertain origin.

The very fetch and ghost of Mrs. Gamp, bonnet and all, might be seen hanging up, any hour in the day, in at least a dozen secondhand clothes-shops about Holborn.

DICKENS: Martin Chuzzlewit, xix.

It is also used in the sense of a stratagem, artifice, or trick.

Deny to speak with me? They are sick? they are weary?

They have travelled all night? Mere fetches.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, II, iv.

Fetish (fet' ish) (Port. fetico, sorcery, charm; Lat. facticius, artificial). The name given by early Portuguese voyagers to AMULETS and other objects supposed by the natives of the Guinea Coast to possess magic powers: hence an idol, an object of devotion. Fetishism is found in all primitive nations in which the services of a spirit may be appropriated by the possession of its material emblem. In psycho-pathology the word is used to denote a condition or perversion in which sexual gratification is obtained from some object, etc., that has become emotionally charged.

Fettle, as a verb, means to bind, repair, put in order, etc.; as a noun it means condition, state of health, as, in good fettle. It is probably from O.E. fetel, bond or girdle, with allusion to girding oneself up.

Fettle ale. ALE warmed and spiced.

Feu de joie (Fēr dē zhwa) (Fr. fire of joy). A ceremonial discharge of musketry into the air by a line of soldiers on an occasion of rejoicing.

Feudalism, or Feudal system (Med. Lat. feodum, fee). The name given to an institutional growth in Europe from the time of the decay of the Roman Empire. It arose from the need of the individual and society to gain protection from attack, occasioned by internal disorder and external threat. In return for protection from some powerful individual, the dependant offered services or surrendered to an overlord his land which was then held subject to conditions. English feudalism is commonly held to begin with WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR who acted on the principle that all land belonged to him. It was granted to the tenant-in-chief in return for homage and military service, etc., who passed on land to sub-tenants in return for other services. Thus a pyramidal social structure developed in which every man was bound to an overlord and ultimately to the King.

Feuillants (fêr' yon). A reformed CISTERCIAN order instituted in 1577 by Jean de la Barrière, Abbot of the Cistercian monastery of Feuillants in Languedoc.

The Club of the Feuillants in the French Revolution was formed by moderate JACOBINS in 1791. Among its members were Sieyès, Barère, Lafayette, Lameth and Barnave. The club's proper title, indicative of its attitude, was the Société des Amis de la Constitution and the popular name was derived from its premises in the Rue St. Honoré, formerly a convent of the Feuillants. In June 1792 all its members were disfranchised.

Few. The Few. The R.A.F. pilots of the BATTLE OF BRITAIN, so called from Prime Minister Winston Churchill's memorable tribute in the HOUSE OF COMMONS (20 August 1940), "Never in the field of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few."

Fiacre (fê akr'). A French cab or HACKNEY coach, so called from the hotel of St. Fiacre, Paris, where the first station of these coaches was established by M. Sauvage, about 1650.

Legend has it that St. Fiacre was a 7th-century hermit of Irish origin. He settled in France and built a monastery at Breuil. His day is 30 August and he is the patron saint of gardeners.

Fiars (fi' ars). Striking the fiars. Fixing the prices of the different varieties of grain in the various counties of Scotland. The decision was made by the sheriff on the advice of a jury. The system was originally used for determining crown rents, clerical stipends, etc., and applied to all contracts where the prices were not fixed by the parties concerned. The word is from M.E. and O.Fr. feor, Lat. forum, a market.

Fiasco (Ital. a flask). A complete failure. In Italy an unpopular singer is sometimes greeted with the cry Olà, olà, fiasco! The word was used by the glassblowers of Venice to describe bad workmanship and it may have some allusion to the bursting of a bottle.

Fiat (fi at) (Lat. let it be done). I give my fiat to that proposal. I consent to it. A fiat in law is a certificate of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL giving leave to take certain proceedings for which Crown permission is required.

Fiat justitia ruat coelum (Lat.). Let justice be done though the heavens should fall. See PISO'S JUSTICE.

Fico (Ital. a fig, from Lat. ficus). A popular term in Shakespeare's England for a gesture of contempt such as made by thrusting the thumb between the first and second fingers; much as we say, "I don't care that for you", snapping the fingers at the same time. Figo is another form.

Convey, the wise it call. Steal! fo! a fico for the phrase.

SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, I, iii.

Pist. And fico for thy friendship.

Flu. It is well.

Pist. The fig of Spain!

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, III, v.

See also I DON'T CARE A FIG FOR YOU under FIG.

Fiddle. (M.E. fithle; possibly connected with Med.Lat. vitula, viol). The word fithle occurs in Layamon's Brut (line 7002) and Chaucer refers to the fidel in the Canterbury Tales (Prol. line 298). A stringed instrument of the violin type.

For him was lever have at his beddes hed
A twenty bokes, clothed in black or red,
Of Aristotle and his Philosophie,
Than robes riche or fidel or sautrie.

In Stock Exchange slang a fiddle is one-sixteenth of a pound—1s. 3d.

To fiddle. To manipulate accounts, etc., in a dishonest way in order to gain some advantage or to cover up a deficiency. To work a fiddle is substantially the same and usually implies some dishonest or "smart work".

To fiddle about. To trifle, fritter away one's time, mess about. To fiddle with one's fingers is to move them about as a fiddler does on the strings of a violin.

Fit as a fiddle. In fine condition.

He was first fiddle. The leading or most distinguished of the company. The allusion is to the first violin, who leads the orchestra.

To play second fiddle. To take a subordinate part, but next after the leader.

Fiddle-de-dee! An exclamation signifying what you say is nonsense.

All the return he ever had . . . was a word, too common, I regret to say, in female lips, viz. fiddle-de-dee.

DE QUINCEY: Secret Societies.

Fiddle-faddle. To busy oneself with nothing; to dawdle; to talk nonsense.

Ye may as easily
Ostrun a cloud, driven by a northern blast,
As fiddle-faddle so.

JOHN FORD: The Broken Heart, I, iii (1633).

Fiddler. Slang for sixpence; also for a FARTHING.

Drunk as a fiddler. See under DRUNK.

Fiddler's fare, or pay. Meat, drink, and money.

Fiddler's Green. The happy land imagined by sailors where there is perpetual mirth, a fiddle that never stops playing for dancers who never tire, plenty of GROG, and unlimited tobacco.

Fiddler's money. A silver penny. The fee given to a fiddler at a WAKE by each dancer.

Fiddler's news. Stale or late news, because fiddlers were long reputed to be purveyors of out-of-date news.

Fiddlesticks! Much the same as FIDDLE-DE-DEE, i.e. you are talking nonsense.

The devil rides on a fiddlestick. See DEVIL PHRASES under DEVIL.

Fidei Defensor. See DEFENDER OF THE FAITH.

Fiduciary. Fiduciary Issue. That part of a note issue which is not backed by coin or bullion although it may be backed by government securities, etc. If there is no such backing for the paper currency as a whole, then the whole issue is fiduciary. Fiduciary means that which is held or given in trust (Lat. fiduciarius).

Field. In huntsman's language the field means all the riders; in horse-racing it means all the horses in any one race. In military parlance it is the place of battle, the battle itself or the place of campaign. In HERALDRY it means the entire surface of the shield.

Field of Blood. See ACELDAMA.

Field of Cloth of Gold. The plain in Picardy between Guines and Ardres where Henry VIII met Francis I of France in June 1520. Francis hoped for English support against the Emperor, Charles V. A temporary palace was erected, lavish and spectacular arrangements were made for jousting, dancing, and banqueting, and Henry was accompanied by a magnificent retinue. Henry, however, later met the Emperor with whom he effected a treaty.

Field of fire. That part of the terrain before infantry or machine-guns which their weapons can cover, uninterrupted by contours, woods or other obstructions.

Field of force. A term used in physics to denote the range within which a force, such as magnetism, is effective.

Field of the Forty Footsteps, or The Brother's Steps. The land at the back of the BRITISH MUSEUM, once called Southampton Fields, near the extreme north-east of the present Montague Street. The tradition is that at the time of the Duke of MONMOUTH'S REBELLION (1685) two brothers fought each other here until both were killed, and for many years forty impressions of their feet remained on the field. No grass would grow there, nor upon the bank where the young woman sat who was the object of their contest. The site was built upon about 1800.

Field of vision, or view. The space over which things can be seen; the space or range within which objects are visible when looking through an instrument such as a telescope or microscope, etc.

In the field. A competitor for a prize, a term from horse-racing. In military usage it denotes being on active campaign.

Master of the field. The winner; the conqueror in battle.

To back the field means to bet against all the horses except one.

To keep back the field is to keep back the riders.

To take to the field. To make the opening moves in a military campaign.

To win the field. To win the battle.

Field allowance. An extra allowance paid to officers in the field or on campaign.

Field-day. A day of particular excitement or importance, or of unusual bustle and exertion. A military term for a day when troops have manœuvres or exercises.

Field-Marshal. In the British army this title, the highest rank, is conferred on generals who have rendered conspicuous services, and on royalty. The title was first used in ENGLAND in 1736.

Field Officer. In the British army an officer above the rank of captain and below that of general.

Field piece. A piece of field artillery, a field gun.

Field works. Defensive or protective works, or temporary fortifications, made by an army to strengthen its positions.

Open-field System. See under OPEN.

Three-field System. See under THREE.

Fierabras, Sir (fi ér á brás). The son of BALAN, King of Spain. For height of stature, breadth of shoulder, and hardness of muscle, he knew no equal, but his pride was laid low by OLIVER. He became a Christian, was accepted by CHARLEMAGNE as a PALADIN and ended his days in an odour of sanctity.

Fieri facias (fi' er i fâk'i às) (Lat. cause it to be done). A writ of execution to a sheriff to levy from the goods of a debtor the sum according to the judgment given. The phrase is often abbreviated to fi fa. The term was also punningly used in the 16th century in connection with red noses and "fiery faces" through drink.

Fiery Cross, The. An ancient signal in the Scottish Highlands when a chieftain wished to summon his clan in an emergency. It was symbolical of fire and sword and consisted of a light wooden cross the ends of which were dipped in the blood of a goat slain for the purpose. It was carried from settlement to settlement by swift runners. Disobedience to the summons implied infamy, hence the alternative name of Cross of Shame.

Scott's Lady of the Lake (canto iii) contains a graphic account of the custom.

When the KU KLUX KLAN arose after the AMERICAN CIVIL WAR, it adopted this symbol.

Fifteen, The. The Jacobite rebellion of 1715 when James Edward Stewart, the Old PRETENDER, made an unsuccessful attempt to gain the throne. The Earl of Mar's Scottish forces were defeated at Sheriffmuir and the English JACOBITES under Squire Foster were beaten at Preston. Cp. BOBBING JOHN.

Fifth. Fifth-Amendment Communist. In the United States, one who refuses to answer the charge of Communist activities by invoking the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution (1791), which states that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself".

Fifth Column. Traitors; those within a country who are working for the enemy, often by infiltrating into key positions, and seeking to undermine the body politic from within. The origin of the phrase is attributed to General Mola, who, in the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939), said that he had four columns encircling Madrid, and a fifth column working for him in the city.

Fifth-Monarchy Men. Religious extremists of Cromwellian times who maintained that the time had come for the rule of Christ and His Saints—the Fifth Monarchy, succeeding those of Assyria, Persia, Macedonia, and Rome; as the four monarchies described in the Book of Daniel (ch. ii) give way to that set up by the "God of Heaven". VENNER'S RISING of 1661 marked the end of their attempts to establish the Fifth Monarchy.

Fifty-four Forty or Fight. The slogan of the Democratic party in the U.S. presidential election campaign of 1844 which won the day for President Polk. It arose from the long-standing Oregon boundary dispute between Great Britain and the U.S.A. A convention of 1818 had provided for a ten-year joint occupation of the disputed area and this was renewed in 1827 for an indefinite period. The question came to the forefront again in the 1840s with the growing popularity of the OREGON TRAIL, hence the appeal of the slogan. Nevertheless Polk and the Senate agreed to the British proposal that the boundary between Canada and the U.S.A. be continued along the 49th parallel to the Pacific. Such a boundary had been proposed by the Americans as early as 1826 but it was then rejected by the British.

Fig. Most phrases that include the word fig have reference to the fruit as being an object of trifling value; but, In full fig, meaning "in full dress", figged out, etc., "dressed up", the word is here a variant of feague.

I don't care a fig for you; not worth a fig. Nothing at all. Here fig is either an example of something of little value, or alternatively the fig of Spain or FICO.

A fig for Peter.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VI, Pt. II, II, iii.

I shan't buy my Attic figs in future, but grow them. Said by way of warning to one who is building CASTLES IN THE AIR—"don't count your chickens before they are hatched". XERXES boasted that he was going to conquer Attica, where the figs grew, and add it to his own empire; but he met defeat at Salamis, and "never loosed his sandal till he reached Abdera".

In the name of the Prophet, Figs! A burlesque of the solemn language in the common business of life associated with eastern countries. The line occurs in imitation of Dr. Johnson's pompous style, in Rejected Addresses (1812), by James and Horace Smith.

To fig up a horse. To make it lively and spirited by artificial means.

Fig leaf. The leaf of the fig-tree was used by ADAM and EVE to cover their nakedness after the fall (Gen. iii, 7). Hence its use in statuary and paintings in times when "modesty" was in fashion, notably in the Victorian period.

Fig Sunday. An old provincial name for PALM SUNDAY. Figs were eaten on that day in commemoration of the blasting of the barren fig-tree by Our Lord (Mark xi). Many festivals still have their special dishes, as, the goose for MICHAELMAS, pancakes for SHROVE TUESDAY, hot cross BUNS for GOOD FRIDAY, etc.

Fig-tree. It is said that Judas hanged himself on a fig-tree. See ELDER-TREE; JUDAS TREE.

Mercury fig. See under MERCURY.

Figaro. A type of daring, cunning and witty roguery, and intrigue. The character is in Le Barbier de Séville (1775), and Le Mariage de Figaro (1784) by Beaumarchais. There are several operas based on these dramas, as Mozart's Nozze die Figaro, and Paisiello's and Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia.

Hence the name of the famous Parisian periodical which appeared from 1826 to 1833 and its successor which began life in 1854. Le Figaro is one of the foremost French dailies to survive World War II.

Fight. Acre-fight. A good example of a GHOST-WORD. It was wrongly explained by Cowell as a duel in the open field, fought with sword and lance by single combatants, on the Anglo-Scottish border. It is actually a transliteration of Med. Lat. acram committere where acram (for pugnam) is a poor translation of "camp combat" which was confused with Lat. campus (field), Fr. champ and so with the English acre. It is found only in Cowell and some modern dictionaries which have perpetuated the error.

He that fights and runs away may live to fight another day. An old saw found in many languages. Demosthenes, being reproached for fleeing from Philip of Macedon at Chæronea, replied, "A man that runs away may fight again." The same sentiment is expressed in Butler's Hudibras, III, iii.

For those that fly may fight again
Which he can never do that's slain.

The Fighting Fifth. See REGIMENTAL AND DIVISIONAL NICKNAMES.

Fighting French, or La France Combattante. All those Frenchmen at home and abroad who combined with the Allied nations in their war against the AXIS powers before the fall of France (in June 1940). General de Gaulle and others escaped to England and he formed them into "The Free French" with the CROSS of Lorraine for their emblem. The name was later changed to "The Fighting French" (14 July 1942). One of their most noted feats was the march of General Leclerc's column across the Sahara, from Lake Chad, to join the British 8th Army in Libya. These men were honoured by being the first formation to enter Paris on 23 August 1944. The Fighting French supported the Allies in Africa, Italy and elsewhere and made a valuable contribution to the liberation of France, in conjunction with the F.F.I.

The Fighting Prelate. Henry Spenser, or Despenser, Bishop of Norwich (1370-1406), who put down the insurgents of Norfolk and Suffolk during the PEASANTS' REVOLT of 1381. At North Walsham he burnt down the church in which they took refuge. He later fought in Flanders and France for Pope Urban VI against the antipope's followers, and was denounced by Wyclif as a fighting bishop.

To live like fighting cocks. See under COCK.

To fight for one's own hand. To uphold one's own cause, to struggle for one's own interest.

To fight shy of. To avoid; to resist being brought into contest or conflict.

To fight the tiger. To play against the bank at faro.

To fight with the gloves off. To dispute mercilessly "WITH NO HOLDS BARRED" (see under HOLD); without any regard to the courtesies of debate, not "PULLING ANY PUNCHES" (see under PULL).

To fight with the gloves on. Figuratively, to spar or dispute without open animosity, to observe the courtesies and to show some consideration for one's opponent.

Fig. See FICO.

Figure. From Lat. figere, to shape or fashion; not etymologically connected with Eng. finger, though fingers were used as a primitive method of calculating.

A figure of fun. Of droll appearance, whether from untidiness, quaintness or other peculiarity; one to be scoffed at.

A figure of speech. An established form of abnormal expression designed to produce a special effect, such as hyperbole, METAPHOR, METATHESIS, etc.

A figure of speech only, or only a figure of speech is another name for a piece of exaggeration.

To cut a figure. To make an imposing appearance through dress, bearing, etc. Cp. CUT A DASH under CUT.

To cut a pretty, or a sorry figure. To give a poor impression, little to one's credit.

To make a figure. To make a name or reputation, to be a notability.

What's the figure? How much am I to pay? What do I owe?

Figure-head. A carved figure on the head or bows of a sailing ship, which has ornamental value but is of no practical use (see CUTTY SARK). Hence, a nominal leader who plays no real part, but often one whose social or other position inspires confidence.

Figures, Roman. See NUMERALS.

Filch. To steal or purloin. A piece of 16th-century thieves' slang of uncertain origin (cp. FILE).

With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart.

SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night's Dream, I, ii.

A filch, or filchman was a staff with a hook at the end, for plucking clothes from hedges, articles from shop windows, etc.

File. Old slang for a rapsallion or worthless person; also a pickpocket. It comes from the same original as the word vile.

In single file. Single line; one behind another (Fr. file, a row). Cp. INDIAN FILE.

Rank and file. Soldiers and non-commissioned officers as apart from commissioned officers; hence the followers in a movement as distinct from its leaders. Rank refers to men in line abreast or side by side, file to men standing one behind another.

Filibuster (Dut. vrijbuit, a freebooter). The earlier form of the word fibuster (Fr. fibustier) was applied to the pirates plundering in West Indian waters in the 17th century. Filibuster was later used of certain 19th-century bands organized from the United States, in defiance of international law, to invade and revolutionize certain Spanish-American territories. The most notable of these filibusters were those led by Narcisco Lopez against Cuba (1850-1851) and William Walker against Sonora (1853-1854). See also FREEBOOTER.

After an abortive filibuster in Lower California he appeared in 1855 in Nicaragua with a few hundred hard-boiled Californians.

L. D. BALDWIN: Stream of American History, I, xxiii, 2.

To filibuster. As a term meaning the use of obstructive tactics in a legislature, by excessive use of technicalities, lengthy speeches, etc., first came into use in the U.S.A. in 1841. Such tactics were notably employed by the Irish Nationalists under Parnell. In July 1877 the HOUSE OF COMMONS sat for 26 hours. See CLOSURE.

Filioque Controversy (fil i ô' kwè). An argument concerning the "Procession of the Holy Spirit" that long disturbed the Eastern and Western Churches, and the difference of opinion concerning which still forms one of the principal barriers between them. The point was: Did the HOLY GHOST proceed from the Father and the Son (Filio-que), or from the Father only? The argument basically is this: If the Son is one with the Father, whatever proceeds from the Father must proceed from the Son also. The filioque was first introduced by the Western Church at the Council of Toledo in 589 and was added to the NICENE CREED in the 11th century.

Fill-dyke. The month of FEBRUARY, when the rain and melted snow fills the ditches to overflowing.

February fill dyke, be it black or be it white;
But if it be white it's the better to like.

Old Proverb.

Fille de joie (Fê dé zhwa) (Fr. daughter of joy). A prostitute.

Fimbul-Winter. In Norse legend, such a severe winter of horrors never before known which lasted three years without any summer to lessen its onslaught; trees, plants and men died of hunger. It was the forerunner of RAGNAROK.

Fin de siècle (fân dé sê ekl) (Fr. end of century). It has come to imply decadent, with particular reference to the end of the 19th century.

Finality Jack. Lord John Russell (1792-1878), 1st Earl Russell, who originally maintained that the Reform Act of 1832 was a finality, yet made further attempts to extend Parliamentary reform in 1854, 1860, and 1866.

Financial Year. See YEAR.

Find. Findings, keepings! An exclamation made when one has accidentally found something, implying that it is now the finder's property. This old saying is very faulty law.

Findabair. In Irish legend, the wondrously beautiful daughter of Queen MAEVE of Connacht. She was promised in marriage to the man who would challenge CUCHULAIN in the WAR OF THE BROWN BULL and died after her lover, Fraech, was slain in battle by Cuchulain.

Fine. Fine as fivepence. An old alliterative saying meaning splendidly dressed or turned out.

Fine feathers make fine birds. See under FEATHER.

In fine. In short; to sum up; to come to a conclusion.

One of these fine days. Some time or other; when the opportunity occurs; at some indefinite time in the future.

The Fine Arts. Those arts which depend upon creative imagination and the quest for the expression of beauty, as music, painting, poetry, sculpture and architecture, as opposed to the useful arts, i.e., those which are practised primarily for their utility, as the arts of weaving, metal-working, etc.

Fingal. The great Gaelic legendary hero, father of OSSIAN, who was purported by Macpherson to have been the original author of the long epic poem Fingal (1762), which narrates the hero's adventures.

Fingal's Cave. The basaltic cavern on Staffa, said to have been a home of FINGAL. It is the name given to Mendelssohn's Hebridean Overture (1830).

Finger (O.E. finger). The old names for the fingers are:

Thuma (O.E.), the thumb.

Towcher (M.E. the finger that touches), foreman, or pointer. This was called the scite-finger (shooting finger) by the Anglo-Saxons, now usually known as the index finger because it is used for pointing.

Long-man, or long finger.

Lech-man, or ring finger. The former means the "medical finger" and the latter is the Roman digitus annularis, called by the Anglo-Saxons the gold-finger. This finger was used as the ring finger (also annular finger) in the belief that a nerve ran through it to the heart. Hence the Greeks and Romans called it the medical finger, and used it for stirring mixtures under the notion that it would give instant warning to the heart if in contact with anything noxious. It is still a popular superstition that it is bad to rub salve or scratch the skin with any other finger.

At last he put on her medical finger a pretty, handsome gold ring, wherewith was enchased a precious toadstone of Beausse.

RABELAIS: Pantagruel, III, xviii.

Little man, or little finger. Called by the Anglo-Saxons the EAR-FINGER. It is also known as the auricular finger.

The fingers each had their special significance in ALCHEMY, and Ben Jonson says:

The thumb, in chiromancy, we give to Venus,
The fore-finger to Jove; the midst to Saturn;
The ring to Sol; the least to Mercury.

Alchemist, I, ii.

Blessing with the fingers. See BLESSING.

Cry, baby, cry; put your finger in your eye, etc. This nursery rhyme seems to be referred to in SHAKESPEARE'S Comedy of Errors, II, ii:

Come, Come, no longer will I be a fool,
To put the finger in the eye and weep.

Fingers and toes. A popular name for anbury, or ambury, a soft tumour on horses and oxen, and club-root, which affects cabbages, turnips, etc.

Fingers were made before forks. A saying used especially at mealtimes to imply that ceremony is unnecessary. Forks were not introduced into England until about 1620, before which period fingers were used.

Finished to the finger-nail. Complete and perfect in every detail, to all the extremities. The allusion is obvious.

His fingers are all thumbs. Said of a person who is clumsy with his hands.

Lifting the little finger. Tippling. Many people in holding a tankard or glass stick out or lift up the little finger. Cp. TO CROOK THE ELBOW, or FINGER under CROOK; ELBOW-LIFTING.

Lightfingered gentry. Pickpockets, thieves.

My little finger told me that. The same as "A little bird told me that" (see under BIRD), meaning, I know it, although you did not expect it. The popular belief was that an itching or tingling foretold that something was about to happen.

By the pricking of my thumbs,
Something wicked this way comes.

SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, IV, i.

Not to lift a finger. Not to make the slightest effort; not to give any assistance.

To be finger and glove with another. To be in close collusion with, to be in the closest co-operation. The more common expression is TO BE HAND IN GLOVE WITH. (See under HAND.)

To burn one's fingers. See under BURN.

To have a finger in. To be concerned in.

To have a finger in the pie. To have a share in doing something, usually with the implication of officious interference or meddling.

The devil speed him! no man's pie is freed
From his ambitious finger.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, I, i.

To have it at one's fingers' ends. To be completely familiar with it and able to do it adequately and readily. The Latin proverb is, Scire tanquam unguis digitosque suos, to know it as well as one's fingers and nails. The allusion is self-evident. The Latin tag is referred to by Shakespeare in Love's Labour's Lost, V, 1:

Costard: Go to; thou has it ad dunghill, at the fingers' ends, as they say.

Holofernes: I smell false Latin; dunghill for unguem.

To keep one's fingers crossed. To hope for success, to try to ensure against disaster. From the superstition that making the sign of the cross will avert bad luck.

To lay, or put one's finger upon. To point out precisely the meaning, cause, etc.; to detect with complete accuracy.

To slip through one's fingers. To miss an opportunity, to let something elude one, just as a fielder in CRICKET fumbles a catch.

To twist someone round one's little finger. To do just what one likes with him.

With a wet finger. Easily, directly. The allusion is to spinning, in which the spinner constantly wetted the fore-finger with the mouth.

Flores: Canst thou bring me thither?

Peasant: With a wet finger.

Wisdom of Doctor Dodipoll (c. 1596).

Sailors find the wind by holding up a wet finger for the breeze to cool it, thus finding that side whence it comes.

Finger-print. An impression taken in ink of the whorls of lines on the finger. In no two persons are they alike, and they never change throughout life, hence their great value as a means of identifying criminals. From ancient times they were used for certifying documents by the Chinese and Japanese and Sir Francis Galton's Finger Prints (1892) and Finger Print Directories (1895) drew attention to their usefulness. Sir Edward Henry, Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police (1903-1918), devised a system for classifying impressions which was widely adopted. The American Federal Bureau of Investigation uses his method.

Fingle-fangle. A RICOCHET word from fangle meaning a fanciful trifle. It was fairly common in the 17th century and was evolved from new fangle (new-fangled).

Fionnuala. In Irish legend, the daughter of LIR, who was transformed into a swan and condemned to wander over the lakes and rivers until Christianity came to IRELAND. Moore has a poem on the subject in his Irish Melodies.

Firbolgs. See MILESANS.

Fire (O.E. fyr; Gr. pur).

St. Anthony's Fire. See under ANTHONY.

St. Elmo's Fire; St. Helen's Fire. See CORPOSANT.

The Great Fire of London (Sept. 1666) broke out at Master Farryner's bakehouse in Pudding Lane, Thames Street, in the early hours of Sunday (2 Sept.) and aided by high winds spread from the TOWER to the TEMPLE and from the THAMES to SMITHFIELD. St. Paul's Cathedral and eighty-nine other churches were destroyed and 13,200 houses. In five days it covered 387 acres within the walls and 73 without. It was not the reason for the disappearance of the Plague, as is commonly held, since most of the slum quarters escaped. The fire was halted by blowing up houses at Pie Corner, Smithfield.

Greek Fire. See under GREEK.

Kentish Fire. See under KENT.

Between two fires. Subjected to attack, criticism, etc., from both sides at once.

The burnt child dreads the fire. See under BURN.

The fat is in the fire. See under FAT.

Fire away! Say on; say what you have to say. The allusion to the firing of a gun is obvious. You are primed up to the muzzle with something to say; fire away and discharge your thoughts.

Fire in the fern. Trouble brewing; smouldering discontent. A New Zealand expression.

I have myself passed through the fire; I have smelt the smell of fire. I have had experience in trouble, and am all the better for it. The allusion is to the refining of GOLD, which is passed through fire and so purged of all its dross.

I will go through fire and water to serve you, i.e., through any hardships or any test. It may derive from the ORDEAL OF FIRE (see under ORDEAL).

If you would enjoy the fire you must put up with the smoke. You must take the rough with the smooth. Every convenience has its inconvenience.

Letter of fire and sword. In SCOTLAND, before the Union with ENGLAND (1707), an order issued by the Scottish Privy Council authorizing a sheriff to dispossess a tenant, or to proceed against a delinquent by all the means of force at his disposal.

Men stand with their backs to the fire. An old explanation is that when the dog's nose proved too small to stop a leak in the Ark, Noah sat on the hole to keep the water out. Ever since men have felt the need to warm their backs, and dogs have had cold noses.

More fire in the bedstraw. More mischief brewing. A relic of the time when straw was used for beds.

No smoke without fire. To every scandal there is some foundation. Every effect is the result of some cause.

Out of the frying-pan into the fire. See FRYING-PAN.

To fire, or to fire out. To discharge from employment suddenly and unexpectedly. An expression originating in the U.S.A.

To fire up. To become indignantly angry; to flare up; to get unduly and suddenly excited.

To hang fire. To delay; to be irresolute; to be slow in taking action. An expression derived from gunnery, when the gun is slow in firing the charge.

To heap coals of fire on one's head. See under COAL.

To play with fire. To meddle with that which is perpetually dangerous or harmful.

To set the Thames on fire. See HE'LL NEVER SET THE THAMES ON FIRE under THAMES.

We do not fire first, gentlemen. According to tradition this very chivalrous reply was made to Lord Charles Hay (commanding the Guards) at the opening of the battle of Fontenoy (1745) by the French Marquis d'Auteroche after Hay had invited the French commander to order his men to fire. The story is told by the historian Espagnac and by VOLTAIRE, but it is not borne out by the description of the battle written shortly after the conflict by Lord Charles to his father, the Marquis of Tweeddale.

Lord Charles Hay . . . stepped to the front of his battalion and saluted with his hat. Then he took out a pocket-flask and ironically drank to their health, shouting, "We are the English Guards, and hope you will stand till we come up to you, and not swim the Scheldt as you did the Main at Dettingen!"—F. H. SKRINE: Fontenoy (1906).

Fire-brand. An incendiary; one who incites to rebellion; like a blazing brand which sets on fire all it touches.

Our fire-brand brother, Paris, burns us all.
SHAKESPEARE: Troilus and Cressida, II, ii.

Fire-bug. An habitual perpetrator of arson; a FIRE-RAISER. The term is also applied to a glow-worm.

Fire-cross. See FIERY CROSS.

Fire dog. See ANDIRON.

Fire-drake, or fire-dragon. A fiery serpent, an IGNIS FATUUS of large proportions, superstitiously believed to be a flying DRAGON keeping guard over hidden treasures.

There is a fellow somewhat near the door, he should be a brazier by his face, for, o' my conscience, twenty of the dog-days now reign in 's nose . . . that fire-drake did I hit three times on the head.—SHAKESPEARE: King Henry VIII, V, iii.

Fire-eaters. Those ready to quarrel with anyone; those looking for trouble; eager fighters. The allusion is to the jugglers who swallow flaming tow, etc.

Fire-hunting. An American term for hunting at night with the aid of fire-pans or links.

Fire-new. SPICK AND SPAN NEW.

You should then have accosted her; and with some excellent jests fire-new from the mint.
SHAKESPEARE: Twelfth Night, III, ii.

Fire-raiser. One guilty of arson, often to collect the insurance money.

Fire-ship. A ship filled with combustibles sent against enemy vessels to set them on fire. English fire-ships scattered the Spanish Armada in confusion when anchored off Calais in 1588.

Fire-watcher. The name given to those volunteers in Britain who kept watch for fires started by enemy air raids during World War II.

Fire-worship is said to have been introduced into Persia by Phœdima, widow of Smerdis, and wife of Hystaspes. It is not the SUN that is worshipped, but the god who is supposed to reside in it; at the same time the fire worshippers reverence the sun as the throne of the deity. Cp. PARSEES.

Fire-side Chats. The name adopted by President F. D. Roosevelt for his broadcasts to the American people on topics of national interest and importance. They began in 1933 and became customary during his administration.

First. A diamond of the first water. See under DIAMOND.

At first hand. From one's own knowledge or personal observation.

First cause. A cause that does not depend on any other. The Creator.

First chop. See CHOP.

First come first served. Promptness reaps its own reward. Chaucer in The Wife of Bath's Tale (Prologue) says :

Whoso first cometh to the mill, first grint.

The first stroke is half the battle. "Well begun is half done." "A good lather is half the shave."

First Fleet. The first expedition of eleven ships under Captain Arthur Phillip, R.N., bringing convicts to Australia in 1788. The second fleet arrived in 1790. To have been a first fleeter became a matter of pride.

First floor. In ENGLAND the first floor is that immediately above the ground floor; in America it is the ground floor.

First foot, or first footer. The first visitor at a house after midnight on New Year's Eve. In SCOTLAND and the North of ENGLAND the custom of first footing is still popular.

First-fruits. The first profitable results of labour. In husbandry, the first corn that is cut at harvest, which by the ancient Hebrews was offered to JEHOVAH. Such offerings became customary in the early Christian Church. ANNATES were also called First-fruits. The word is used figuratively as well in such expressions as "the first fruits of sin", "the first fruits of repentance".

First light. In the armed forces "first light" denotes the earliest time (roughly dawn) at which light is sufficient for movements of ships, or for military operations to begin. Similarly last light is the latest time when such movements can take place. The expression was current in World War II.

First nighter. One who makes a practice of attending the opening performance of plays.

The First Gentleman of Europe. A nickname given to George IV, but Thackeray says in The Four Georges, "We can tell of better gentlemen."

The First Grenadier of the Republic. A title given by NAPOLEON to La Tour d'Auvergne (1743-1800), a man of extraordinary courage and self-effacement. He refused all promotion beyond that of captain, as well as this title.

Fish. The fish was used as a symbol of Christ by the early Christians because the letters of its Greek name ichthus (see ICHTHYS) formed a monogram of the initial letters of the words Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour.

Ivory and mother-of-pearl counters used in card games, some of which are more or less fish-shaped, are so called, not from this shape, but from Fr. fiche, a peg, a card counter. La fiche de consolation (a little piece of comfort or consolation) is the name given in some games to the points allowed for the rubber.

A fish out of water. Said of a person out of his usual environment and who thus feels awkward; also of one who is without his usual occupation and is restless in consequence.

A loose fish. A man of loose or dissolute habits. Fish as applied to a human being is mildly derogatory.

A pretty kettle of fish. See under KETTLE.

A queer fish. An eccentric person.

All is fish that comes to my net. I turn everything to some use; I am willing to deal in anything out of which I can make a profit.

He eats no fish. In the time of Elizabeth I, a way of saying he is an honest man and one to be trusted, because he is not a Papist. Roman Catholics were naturally suspect at this time, and PROTESTANTS refused to adopt their custom of eating fish on Fridays (see FISH DAY).

I do profess to be no less than I seem; to serve him truly that will put me in trust . . . to fight when I cannot choose, and to eat no fish.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, I, iv.

The government, however, sought to enforce the observance of fish days in order to help the fishing ports and the seafaring population; and to check the consumption of meat which encouraged the conversion of arable into pasture.

It shall not be lawful . . . to eat any flesh upon any days now usually observed as fish dayes, or upon any Wednesday now newly limited to be observed as fish day.—Act 5 Eliz. c. 5, 1564.

I have other fish to fry. I have other things to do. I am busy and cannot attend to anything else now.

Neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, or neither fish, flesh nor good red herring. Suitable to no class of people; neither one thing nor another. Not fish (food for the monk), nor flesh (food for the people generally), nor yet red herring (food for the poor).

Damned neuters in their middle way of steering, Are neither fish nor flesh nor good red-herring.

DRYDEN: Epilogue to "The Duke of Guise".

The best fish swim near the bottom. What is most valuable is not to be found near the surface, nor is anything really worth having to be obtained without effort and trouble.

There's as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it. Don't be disheartened if you've lost the chance of something good, you'll get another. Those who get preference are not the only capable people.

To cry stinking fish. See under CRY.

To drink like a fish. See under DRINK.

To feed the fishes. To be sea-sick; to be drowned.

To fish for compliments. To try to obtain praise, usually by putting leading questions.

To fish in troubled waters. To scramble for personal advantage in times of stress, political unrest, etc.; to try to make a calamity a means to personal gain. To fish the anchor. To hoist the flukes of an anchor to the bulwarks after the anchor has been "catted" (see CAT THE ANCHOR under CAT).

You must not make fish of one and flesh of the other. You must treat both alike. You must not discriminate.

Fish day. In France known as jour maigre (a lean day), a day when Roman Catholics and others used to abstain from meat and customarily eat fish. In the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH there was a general law of abstinence on all Fridays (unless FEASTS), but BISHOPS now urge the faithful voluntarily to practise this or some other form of self-denial.

Fish-wife. A woman who sells fish in a fish market or who hawks fish. Fish-wives are renowned for their flow of invective, hence the term is sometimes applied to a vulgar, scolding female.

Fish Royal. Sturgeon and whale (although the latter is not a fish). If caught near the coast they are the property of the Crown.

Fisher King. In the legends of the Holy GRAIL, the uncle of PERCEVAL.

Fisherman's Ring. A seal-ring with which the POPE is invested at his election, bearing the device of ST. PETER fishing from a boat. It is used for sealing papal briefs, and is officially broken up at the Pope's death by the Chamberlain of the Roman Church.

Fitz. The Norman form of the modern French fils, son of; as Fitz-Herbert, Fitz-William, Fitz-Peter, etc. It is sometimes assumed by the illegitimate ormorganatic children of royalty, as Fitz-Clarence, Fitz-roy, etc.

Fitzroy Cocktail (Austr.). One of the many concoctions drunk by strong men "OUT BACK". The recipe is methylated spirits, ginger beer, and one teaspoonful of boot polish.

Fitzwilliam Museum (Cambridge). So called from the 7th and last Viscount Fitzwilliam (1745-1816), who in 1816 left £100,000, with books, paintings, etc., to form the nucleus of a museum for the benefit of the university. The present building was begun in 1837 and was considerably extended in 1930-1931.

Five. The pentad, one of the mystic numbers, being the sum of 2 and 3, the first even and first odd compound. Unity is God alone, i.e., without creation. Two is diversity, and three (being 1 and 2) is the compound of unity and diversity, or the two principles in operation since creation, and representing all the powers of nature.

Bunch of fives. Pugilistic slang for the fist.

The Five Ails. See PUBLIC-HOUSE SIGNS. The Five Boroughs. In English history, the Danish confederation of Derby, Leicester, Lincoln, Nottingham, and Stamford in the 9th and 10th centuries.

Five fingers. A fisherman's name for the starfish.

The Five Members. Pym, Hampden, Haselrig, Holles, and Strode; the five members of the LONG PARLIAMENT whom Charles I attempted to arrest in 1642.

The Five-Mile Act. An Act passed in 1665 (repealed in 1812), the last act of the CLARENDON CODE prohibiting NONCONFORMIST clergy from coming within five miles of any corporate town or within that distance of the place where they had formerly ministered.

The Five Nations. A description applied by Kipling to the British Empire—the Old Country, with Canada, Australia, South Africa, and India.

In American history the term refers to the five confederated Indian tribes inhabiting the present State of New York, viz. the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas; also known as the IROQUOIS Confederacy. HIAWATHA is traditionally regarded as the founder of this league, to which the Tuscarora were admitted as a Sixth Nation about 1715.

The Five Points of Calvinism. See CALVINISM.

The Five Senses. These are hearing, sight, smell, taste and touch.

The Five Towns. Towns in the Potteries which Arnold Bennett (1867-1931) used as the scene of the best known of his novels and stories. They are Tunstall, Burslem, Hanley, Stoke-upon-Trent, Longton, and Fenton—actually six—but for artistic purpose Bennett called them five. All are now part of Stoke-on-Trent. Cp. ETRURIA.

The Five Wits. Common sense, imagination, fantasy, estimation and memory; in general, the faculties of the mind; also an alternative expression for the five senses.

If thy wits run the wild-goose chase, I have done; for thou hast more of the wild-goose in one of thy wits than, I am sure, I have in my whole five.—SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, II, 1, v.

These are the five witts removing inwardly: First, "Common witte", and then "Ymagination", "Fantasy", and "Estimation" truly, And "Memory".

STEPHEN HAWES: The Passetyme of Pleasure (1507).

Five-Year Plans. In the U.S.S.R., plans for developing the whole of the nation's economy in a co-ordinated effort by a five-year programme. The first Five-Year Plan was launched by Stalin in 1928 with the aims of making the Soviet Union self-supporting, mechanizing agriculture, promoting literacy, etc. Further Five-Year Plans followed and the example was copied by other countries.

Fiver. A five-pound note.

Fix. In a fix. In an awkward predicament.

To fix on, or upon. To determine upon; to settle upon; to choose.

To fix up. To mend or repair; to arrange.

Fixed Air. An old name of carbonic acid gas (carbon dioxide), given to it by Dr. Joseph Black (1728-1799), because it is "fixed" in solid carbonates until driven out by heat.

Fixed Oils. The true oils; i.e., those which do not volatilize by heating without decomposition, and which harden on exposure to the air, thus differing from essential oils. The glycerides, such as linseed and walnut oils, are examples. Such oils make a permanent greasy stain on paper.

Fixed Stars. Stars whose relative position to other stars is always the same, as distinguished from planets, which shift their relative positions.

Flaccus (flāk' ūs). HORACE, (65-8 B.C.), the Roman poet, whose full name was Quintus Horatius Flaccus.

Flag. A word of uncertain origin. National flags are flown as the symbols of a state and are particularly important as a means of recognition of ships at sea. Merchant ships usually wear their flag or ensign at the stern, warships wear their flag or jack at the bows and their ensign at the stern. Flags are also used as personal banners or standards, especially by royalty and high-ranking naval and military officers, by regiments, as house flags by companies, for signalling purposes, etc. That part of a flag which is nearest the mast is called the hoist and the disc at the top of the flagstaff is the truck. The fly is the end of the flag furthest from the staff.

Flags on Church flagstaffs. In the CHURCH OF ENGLAND the proper flag to be flown is that of ST. GEORGE, with the arms of the SEE in the first quarter.

A black flag is the emblem of piracy or of no QUARTER (see under BLACK); also the anarchists' flag. In World War II, submarines, on returning to base, sometimes hoisted a black flag to indicate a "kill".

A green flag is used on railways, roads, etc. for signalling "Go ahead".

A red flag is generally used to indicate danger or as a stop signal. It is also the symbol of international socialism and The Red Flag is a socialist anthem still used, somewhat incongruously, by the British LABOUR PARTY.

Then raise the scarlet standard high,
Beneath its shade we'll live and die
Though cowards flinch and traitors sneer
We'll keep the Red Flag flying here.

JAMES CONNELL: The Red Flag.

A white flag is the flag of truce or surrender, hence to hang out the white flag is to sue for QUARTER, to give in.

A yellow flag signifies contagious disease on board ship, and all vessels in quarantine or having contagious disease aboard are obliged to fly it. Cp. YELLOW ADMIRAL under ADMIRAL.

A flag of convenience is a foreign flag under which a vessel is registered to avoid taxation, etc.

The flag of distress. When a ship's ensign is flown upside down it is a signal of distress.

To break a flag is to hoist it rolled up and to "break" it by pulling the halyard to release the hitch which holds it together.

To dip a flag is to haul it down to a half-mast position and then rehoist it. This is the usual salute between ships at sea.

To flag down. To stop someone; from motor racing, in which the stewards wave a flag at the winner or any driver they require to stop or to warn to proceed with caution.

The flag's down. Indicative of distress; also the start of a race. When the face is pale the "flag is down"; alluding to the old custom of taking down the flag of theatres when they were closed during LENT.

'Tis Lent in your cheeks, the flag's down.
Dodsley's Old Plays, vol. V (Mad World).

To get one's flag. To become an admiral. See FLAG OFFICER.

I do not believe that the bullet is cast that is to deprive you of life, Jack; you'll get your flag, as I hope to get mine.

KINGSTON: The Three Admirals, xiii.

To hang the flag at half-mast is a sign of mourning.

To lower one's flag. TO EAT HUMBLE PIE; (see under HUMBLE), to yield or confess oneself in the wrong; to eat one's own words.

To strike the flag. To lower it completely. It is also a token of surrender; and when an ADMIRAL relinquishes his command he strikes his flag.

Trade follows the flag. See under TRADE.

Flag Captain. The captain commanding the vessel in which the ADMIRAL is flying his flag.

Flag Day. In the U.S.A., 14 June, the anniversary of the adoption of the STARS AND STRIPES in 1777. In Britain a flag day is any day on which small paper flags or emblems for wearing on the apparel are sold for the support of charities, etc.

Flag Lieutenant. An ADMIRAL's aide-de-camp, colloquially known as "Flags".

Flag Officer. An ADMIRAL, vice-admiral or rear-admiral who fly the flags appropriate to their rank. An Admiral of the Fleet flies a UNION JACK; an admiral a ST. GEORGE'S Cross on a white ground, a vice-admiral the same, with one red ball in the upper canton next the staff, and a rear-admiral a second red ball in the canton immediately below.

Flag-ship. A ship carrying the FLAG OFFICER.

Flagellants (flă jel' ants). The Latin flagellum means a scourge, and this name is given to those extremists who scourged themselves in public processions in mediæval times, and subsequently, as penance for the sins of the world. There was a particular outbreak in Italy in 1260 and again in 1348-1349, at the time of the BLACK DEATH, when the movement spread over Europe. The Church has never encouraged such practices.

Flagellum Dei (Lat. the scourge of God). See SCOURGE OF GOD.

Flamboyant Architecture. The last phase of French GOTHIC architecture, named from Fr. flambe (flame). Characterized by the flame-like tracery and elaboration of detail, it flourished from about 1460 until the 16th century.

Flame. A sweetheart. An old flame, a quondam sweetheart.

Flaming swords. Swords with a wavy or flamboyant edge, used now only for state ceremonies. The Dukes of Burgundy carried such swords, and they were worn in Britain until the time of William III (1689-1702).

Flaminian Way. The great northern road, the Via Flaminia, of ancient Italy, constructed by G. Flaminus in 220 B.C.

It led from the Flaminian gate of Rome to Ariminum (Rimini).

Flanders Babies. Cheap wooden jointed dolls common in the early 19th century.

Flanders Mare. So Henry VIII called Anne of Cleves, his fourth wife whom he married in January 1540, and divorced the following July. She died at Chelsea in 1557.

Flanders Poppies. The name given to the red artificial poppies sold for REMEMBRANCE DAY to benefit ex-service men. The connexion with poppies comes from a poem by John McCrae, which appeared in Punch, 8 December 1915:

If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.

Flannel. That's all flannel. That sounds pretentious. What you say does not really impress me. Flannel may have acquired this kind of connotation in the same way as BOMBAST and FUSTIAN.

To be awarded one's flannels. To gain one's CRICKET colours at Eton.

Flannelled fools. Cricketers. This term, used either derisively or humorously, is taken from Kipling's poem The Islanders.

Then ye returned to your trinkets; then ye contented your souls
With the flannelled fools at the wicket or the muddled oafs at the goals.

Flap. To be in a flap. A colloquial expression meaning to be in a state of anxious excitement, as birds flap and flutter when disturbed.

Flap-dragons. An old name for SNAP-DRAGON, i.e. raisins soaked in spirit, lighted and floating in a bowl of spirituous liquor. GALLANTS used to drink flap-dragons to the health of their mistresses, and would frequently have lighted candle-ends floating in the liquor to heighten the effect. Hence:

And drinks off candles' ends for flap-dragons.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, II, iv.

Flapjack. A flat cake of batter baked on a griddle or in a shallow pan, and so called from turning it by tossing it into the air.

We'll have flesh for holidays, fish for fasting-days, and more'o'er puddings and flapjacks.
SHAKESPEARE: Pericles, II, i.

In the 20th century the word has been applied to a woman's flat powder compact.

Flapper. In the early years of the 20th century a term applied to a girl in her teens, now called a teenager. It is suggested that her plaited pigtail was the "flapper" but it is perhaps relevant that the term was previously applied in some areas to young birds trying out their wings. By the 1920s the name was commonly applied to a young woman, or "bright young thing".

The Flapper Vote. An irreverent name for the vote granted to women of 21 by the Equal Franchise Act of 1928, sponsored by Baldwin's Conservative government. See FLAPPER.

Flash. Showy, smart, "swagger"; as a flash wedding, a flash hotel. In Australia the term flash or flashy is applied to anyone who is proud and has nothing to be proud of.

J. KIRBY: Old Times in the Bush of Australia, 1895.

Also counterfeit, sham, fraudulent. Flash notes are forged notes, a flash man is a thief or an associate of one; and a flash-house is one frequented by thieves and prostitutes.

The excesses of that age [the Restoration] remind us of the humours of a gang of footpads, revelling with their favourite beauties at a flash-house.

MACAULAY:
Essays (Hallam's Constitutional History).

A mere flash in the pan. A failure after a showy beginning; like the attempt to discharge an old flint-lock gun that ends with a flash in the lock-pan, the gun itself "hanging fire" (see TO HANG FIRE under FIRE).

Flat. Flat as a flounder. I knocked him down "flat as a flounder". A flounder is one of the flatfish.

Flat as a pancake. Quite flat.

Flat out. At full speed, all out, fully extended.

He is a regular flatfish. A dull, stupid fellow. The play is upon flat (not sharp, i.e. dull), and such fish as plaice, dabs, etc.

To lie like a flatfish. To lie blatantly. The punning derivation is obvious.

To be caught flat-footed. To be caught unprepared, as a football player who is tackled by an opponent before he has been able to advance.

To be in a flat spin. To be very flurried, to be in a panic. In flying, a flat spin is when the longitudinal axis of an aircraft inclines downwards at an angle of less than 45°. In the early days this inevitably involved loss of control. It is now an aerial manoeuvre performed at low level in air combat as an evasive action.

To come out flat-footed. To state one's beliefs positively, as though firmly planted on one's feet.

Flat-foot. A policeman. Sometimes called a flattie.

Flat race. A race on the "flat" or level ground without obstacles, as opposed to hurdling, STEEPLECHASING, etc.

Flat top. A World War II name for an aircraft-carrier.

Flatterer. Aulus Vitellius, Roman Emperor for most of A.D. 69, through flattery and suitable other vices was a favourite of Tiberius, CALIGULA, Claudius, and NERO. His name became a Roman synonym for a flatterer (Tacitus, Ann., vi, 32).

When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner. Flattery is so pernicious, so fills the heart with pride and conceit, so perverts the judgment and disturbs the balance of mind, that SATAN himself could do no greater mischief, so he may go to dinner and leave the leaven of wickedness to work its own mischief.

Flea. A flea's jump. It has been estimated that if a man, in proportion to his weight, could jump as high as a flea, he could clear St. Paul's Cathedral with ease (365 ft. high).

Aristophanes, in the Clouds, says that SOCRATES and Chærephon tried to measure how many times its own length a flea jumped. They took in wax the size of a flea's foot; then on the principle of EX PEDE HERCULEM, calculated the length of its body. They then measured the distance of a flea's jump from the hand of Socrates to Chærephon and the problem was resolved by simple multiplication.

A mere flea-bite. A thing of no moment, a very small portion or contribution.

Great fleas have lesser fleas. No matter what our station in life, we all have some hangers-on.

Hobbes clearly proves that every creature
Lives in a state of war by nature.

So naturalists observe, a flea
Has smaller fleas that on him prey;
And these have smaller still to bite 'em,
And so proceed ad infinitum.

SWIFT: Poetry; a Rhapsody.

To be sent off with a flea in our ear. Sent away discomfited by a reproof or repulse. A dog which has a flea in the ear is very restless, and runs off in terror and distress.

An old phrase dating at least from the 15th century in English, and earlier in French. It is found in Scogan's Jests, Heywood's Proverbs, Nashe's Pierce Penilesse, etc.

Ferardo . . . whispering Philautus in his ear
(who stooed as though he had a flea in his care), desired him to keepe silence.

LYLY: Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit (1579).

Here the phrase implies that vexatious news has been heard; and in Deloney's

Gentle Craft (1597) there is a similar instance, where a servant goes away shaking his head "like one that hath a flea in his ear".

Flecknoe, Richard. A Roman Catholic priest, and author of poems, plays and other works. He died about 1678. He is now only remembered through Dryden's satire Mac Flecknoe, where it is said he reigned without dispute

Through all the realms of Nonsense, absolute.

Fleet, The. A famous London prison of mediæval origin which stood on the east side of Farringdon Street, until its demolition (1845-1846), on the site now partly occupied by the Memorial Hall. It took its name from the river Fleet which (now piped) enters the THAMES at Blackfriars Bridge. As a royal prison it housed some distinguished prisoners in Tudor and Stuart times, including those committed by STAR CHAMBER, but mainly owes its notoriety to its subsequent use as a debtor's prison. It was destroyed in the GREAT FIRE OF LONDON (see under FIRE), rebuilt, and again burned during the Gordon Riots. The Warden farmed out the prison to the highest bidder which encouraged the shameful treatment of its occupants. Cp. FLEET MARRIAGES.

Most of our readers will remember, that, until within a very few years past, there was a kind of iron cage in the wall of the Fleet Prison, within which was posted some man of hungry looks, who, from time to time, rattled a money-box, and exclaimed, in a mournful voice "Pray, remember the poor debtors; pray, remember the poor debtors".

DICKENS: Pickwick Papers, ch. XLII.

Fleet Book Evidence. No evidence at all. The books of the Old Fleet prison are not admissible as evidence of a marriage. See FLEET MARRIAGES below.

Fleet Marriages. Clandestine marriages, especially of minors, at one time performed without BANNIS or licence in the chapel of the FLEET, but from the latter part of Anne's reign performed by the Fleet clergy in rooms of nearby taverns and houses.

Before the door of the Fleet prison, men plied in behalf of a clergyman, literally insisting people to walk in and be married. They performed the ceremony inside the prison, to sailors and others for what they could get.

LEIGH HUNT: The Town, ch. II.

James Malcolm, the topographer, tells us that as many as "thirty couple were joined in one day" and that 2,954 marriages were registered in the four months ending 12 February, 1705. The practice was destroyed by Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act of 1753 which declared such marriages void. Cp. GREYNA GREEN MARRIAGES.

Fleet Street. The famous thoroughfare which runs from LUDGATE Circus to the STRAND taking its name from the Fleet river, once navigable for coal barges as far as HOLBORN. Formerly noted for its bookshops, it is now synonymous with journalism and the newspaper world.

The Liberties of the Fleet. The district immediately surrounding the FLEET, in which prisoners were sometimes allowed to reside, and beyond which they were not permitted to go. They included the north side of LUDGATE Hill and the OLD BAILEY to Fleet Lane, down the lane to the market, and on the east side along by the prison wall to the foot of Ludgate Hill.

Flemish Account. A sum less than expected. When accounts in Amsterdam were kept in livres, sols, and pence, the livre or pound consisted of 12*s.*; hence an account of 100 livres Flemish was worth only £60 to an English creditor.

Flemish School. A school of painting founded by the brothers van Eyck, in the 15th century. The chief early masters were Memling, Weyden, Matsys, and Mabuse; of the second period, Rubens and Van Dyck, Snyders, and the younger Teniers. As well as the invention of oil painting by Jan van Eyck the school was notable for the perfection and unsurpassed representation of reality.

Flesh. A thorn in the flesh. See THORN.

To be one flesh. To be closely united, as in marriage.

He fleshed his sword. i.e. used it for the first time.

Men fleshed in cruelty. Those initiated or used to it when being trained. Young sporting dogs and hawks are rewarded with the first game they catch. This first introduction to flesh encourages the taste for blood.

The wild dog
Shall flesh his tooth in every innocent.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. II, IV, iv.

The Fleshly School. In the Contemporary Review for October 1871, Robert Buchanan published a violent attack on the poetry and literary methods of Swinburne, Rossetti, Morris, O'Shaughnessy, John Payne, and one or two others under the heading The Fleshly School of Poetry, over the signature "Thomas Maitland". The incident created a literary sensation; Buchanan first denied the authorship but was soon obliged to admit it, and was reconciled to Rossetti, his chief victim, some years later. Swinburn's very trenchant reply is to be found in his Under the Microscope (1872).

Fleur-de-lis, -lys, or -luce (flêr de lê, lês, loos) (Fr. lily-flower). The name of several varieties of iris or flags, and also of the heraldic LILY here shown and which was borne as a charge on the old French royal COAT OF ARMS. In the reign of Louis VII (1137-1180) the national STANDARD was thickly charged with lilies but in 1376  the number was reduced to three by Charles V in honour of the TRINITY. Guillim's Display of Heraldrie (1610) says the device is "Three TOADS erect, saltant"; in allusion to which NOSTRADAMUS in the 16th century called Frenchmen CRAPAUDS. The fleur-de-lis was used to decorate the north point on the mariner's card before the end of the 15th century and in the 20th century it was adopted as the badge of the BOY SCOUTS. See also FLORIN.

Flibbertigibbet. One of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom" in King Lear (IV, i). SHAKESPEARE got the name from Harsnet's Declaration of Egregious Popish Impositions (1603), where we are told of forty fiends which the JESUITS cast out, and among the number was "Flibbertigibbet", a name which had been previously used by Latimer and others for a mischievous GOSSIP. Elsewhere the name is apparently a synonym for PUCK.

Flicks. To go to the flicks. To go to a film show, an expression derived from the early days of such shows when the pictures "flickered" on the screen.

Flimsy. A journalist's term for newspaper copy, arising from the thin paper (often used with a sheet of carbon paper to take a copy) on which reporters and others wrote up their matter for the press. The white £5 Bank of England note, which ceased to be legal tender in March 1961, was known as a flimsy. In the Royal Navy the name is also given to the brief certificate of conduct issued to an officer by his Captain on the termination of his appointment to a ship or establishment; the name again derives from the thin quality paper.

Fling. I must have a fling at. Metaphorically, throw a stone at, i.e. attack with words, especially sarcasm; to make a haphazard venture.

To have his fling. To have full freedom of action; to indulge in pleasure to the fullest extent; to sow his wild OATS. The Scots have a proverb:

Let him tak' his fling and find oot his ain wecht [weight] meaning, give him a free hand and he'll soon find his level.

Flint. To skin a flint. See under SKIN.

Floating Academy. A convict ship, one of the HULKS.

Flogging a dead horse. See under HORSE.

Flogging round, or through the fleet. In the Royal Navy, according to the ancient practice of the sea, this barbarous punishment consisted of a number of lashes from the CAT-O'-NINE-TAILS administered alongside each ship present, usually to the accompaniment of the ROGUE'S MARCH. Death was a common result. It ceased before the end of the 18th century but flogging at the gangway was not finally "suspended" until 1879. After the mutiny at the Nore in 1797 one seaman of the Monmouth was sentenced to 380 lashes.

Flood, The. See DELUGE.

Floor. I floored him. Knocked him down on the floor; hence figuratively, to overcome or beat.

To cross the floor. In Parliamentary usage, means to change parties; from the fact that government and OPPOSITION benches are on opposite sides of the floor of the HOUSE OF COMMONS.

To get in on the ground floor. See under GROUND.

To take the floor. To speak in a debate; to begin to dance.

Floor traders, or Room traders. A name particularly used in New York for those members of a stock exchange who buy and sell stock on their own account, unlike commission brokers who act exclusively on behalf of clients.

Flora's Dial. A fanciful dial formed of flowers which open or close at the various hours.

Flora Macdonald (1722-1790). The Scottish heroine who aided the escape of Prince Charles Edward after the failure of the FORTY-FIVE Rebellion. She conducted the YOUNG PRETENDER (see PRETENDER), disguised as Betty Bourke, an Irish woman, from Benbecula to Skye and thence to Portree, often in imminent danger from the military search parties. She was subsequently imprisoned in the TOWER OF LONDON but released in 1747 under the Act of Indemnity. She married Allan Macdonald in 1750, emigrated to North Carolina, 1774, but returned to Scotland in 1779.

After dinner, Flora Macdonald on horseback, and her supposed maid and Kingsburgh, with a servant carrying some linen, all on foot, proceeded towards that gentleman's house. Upon the road was a small rivulet which they were obliged to cross. The Wanderer [the Prince], forgetting his assumed sex, that his clothes might not be wet, held them up a great deal too high. Kingsburgh mentioned this to him, observing, it might make a discovery.

BOSWELL: Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides (13th September).

Florentine Diamond. A large and famous diamond weighing 133 carats. It formed part of the Austrian crown jewels and previously belonged to Charles, Duke of Burgundy.

Florian, St. A 4th-century martyr who was drowned in the river Enns in Austria during the Diocletian persecution. He is the patron saint of Poland and of mercers, having been himself of that craft. His cult was introduced into Poland in 1183.

Florida. In 1512 Ponce de León sailed to the west in search of "the Fountain of Youth". He first saw land on Easter Day which was then popularly called in Spain Pascua florida, flowery EASTER, and on that account called the land "Florida". It is also called the "Peninsula State". Its city of St. Augustine is the oldest European settlement in the original UNITED STATES.

Florin. (Ital. fiorino, a little flower). As a gold coin was first minted in 13th-century Florence and named after the lily on the reverse. The FLEUR-DE-LIS was the badge of Florence. Edward III coined an English gold florin in 1344 valued at 6s. The English silver florin representing 2s. was first issued in 1849 as a tentative introduction of a decimal coinage.

Graceless, or Godless florin. The first English silver florin struck in 1849, called "graceless" because the usual "Dei Gratia" (by God's grace) was omitted; and "Godless" because of the omission of F.D. (DEFENDER OF THE FAITH).

Some attributed the cholera outbreak of that year to the new florin. The coins were called in and the Master of the Mint, Richard Lalor Sheil (1791-1851), a Roman Catholic, left the MINT the following year.

Florizel. George IV, when Prince of Wales, corresponded under this name with Mrs. Robinson, the actress, generally known as Perdita, in which character she first attracted his attention. The name comes from SHAKESPEARE's Winter's Tale.

In Lord Beaconsfield's Endymion (1880), Prince Florizel is meant for NAPOLEON III.

Flotsam and Jetsam. Properly wreckage and other goods found in the sea. "Flotsam", goods found floating on the sea (O.Fr. floter, to float); "jetsam", things thrown overboard (Fr. jeter, to throw out). The term is now also applied to wreckage found on the shore. Lagan, a word of uncertain origin, applies to goods thrown overboard but tied to a float for later recovery.

The house bore sufficient witness to the ravages of the ocean, and to the exercise of those rights which the lawyers term Flotsome and Jetsome.

SCOTT: The Pirate, ch. xii.

Flotsam and Jetsam were also the names adopted by two popular entertainers of variety stage and broadcasting fame. B. C. Hilliam (b. 1890), English composer and pianist, took the name Flotsam and his partner, the Australian bass singer, Malcolm McEachern (1884-1945), that of Jetsam.

Flourish. To flourish like a green bay tree. To prosper exceedingly. The bay throws out large numbers of fresh green branches every year from both base and trunk. Psalms xxxvii, 35 has:

I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree.

Flowers in Christian Tradition. Many plants and flowers play a part in Christian tradition. The ASPEN is said to tremble because the cross was made of its wood and there are other traditions connected with the ELDER-TREE, FIG-TREE, PASSION FLOWER, THISTLE, etc. See also FIG LEAF; GLASTONBURY.

The following are said to owe their stained blossoms to the blood which trickled from the CROSS: the red anemone; the arum; the purple orchis; the crimson-spotted leaves of the roodselken (a French tradition); the spotted persicaria or snakeweed.

The Flower of Chivalry. A name given to several knights of spotless reputation, e.g.:

Sir William Douglas, Knight of Liddesdale (c. 1300-1353).

Chevalier de Bayard. See under BAYARD.

Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586).

The Flower of Kings (Lat. Flos regum). King ARTHUR was so called by King of Exeter, Bishop of Winchester (d. 1268).

The Flowery Kingdom. China; a translation of the Chinese Hwa-Kwo.

Fluff. A little bit of fluff. A girl or woman, especially one of the fluffy variety. A colloquial expression of Edwardian origin, fluff being the light, downy, soft stuff.

Flush. In cards, a whole hand of one suit.

Flush of, or with money. Very well supplied with money. Similarly a flush of water means a sudden and full flow of water (Lat. fluxus, flowing).

To flush game. A gun-dog is said to flush game when he disturbs them and they take to the air.

Flute. The Magic Flute. In Mozart's opera of this name (Die Zauberflöte, 1791) the magic flute was bestowed by the powers of darkness, and had the power of inspiring love. By it Tamino and Pamina are guided through all worldly dangers to knowledge of Divine Truth.

Flutter. A colloquial term for a small gamble.

To flutter, or cause a flutter in the doves. To disturb the equanimity of a group of people. In Shakespeare's Coriolanus (V, vi) we have:

That, like an eagle in a dove-cote, I
Flutter'd your Volscians in Corioli.

Fly (plural flies). A one-horse hackney-carriage. A contraction of Fly-by-night, as sedan chairs used to be called in the REGENCY. These "Fly-by-nights", much patronized by the Regent and his boon companions at Brighton, were invented in 1809 by John Butcher, a carpenter.

Fly. An insect (plural flies). For the theatrical use, see FLYMAN.

It is said that no fly was ever seen in Solomon's temple, and according to Mohammedan legend, all flies shall perish except one, the bee-fly.

The God, or Lord of Flies. Every year, in the temple of Actium, the Greeks used to sacrifice an ox to ZEUS, who in this capacity was surnamed Apomyios, the averter of flies. Pliny tells us that at ROME sacrifice was offered to flies in the temple of HERCULES Victor, and the Syrians offered sacrifice to these insects. See ACHOR; BEELZEBUB.

An eagle does not hawk at flies. See AQUILA.

As the crow flies. See under CROW.

The fly in the ointment. The trifling cause that spoils everything; a Biblical phrase.

Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.
Eccles. x, 1.

The fly on the coach-wheel. One who fancies himself of great importance, one who is in reality of none at all. The allusion is to ÆSOP's fable of a fly sitting on a chariot-wheel and saying, "See what dust I make."

There are no flies on him. He's very shrewd and wide awake; he won't be CAUGHT NAPPING (see under CATCH).

To crush a fly on a wheel. An allusion to the absurdity of taking a wheel used for torturing criminals and heretics for killing a fly. Cp. TO USE A SLEDGEHAMMER TO CRUSH A NUT under NUT; TO BREAK A BUTTERFLY ON A WHEEL under BREAK.

To fly a kite. See KITE.

To fly blind. To pilot an aircraft solely by means of instruments; the opposite of visual navigation.

To fly in one's face. To get into a passion with someone; to insult; as a HAWK, when irritated, flies in the face of its master.

To fly in the face of danger. To defy danger in a foolhardy manner, as a hen flies in the face of a dog.

To fly in the face of providence. To act rashly, and throw away good opportunities; to court danger.

To fly off the handle. To burst out into angry and violent speech without control, as a hammer loses its head when loose after a blow has been struck.

To fly out at. To burst or break into a passion.

To let fly. To make a violent attack upon, either literally or by a torrent of abuse, etc.

To make the feathers, or fur fly. To create a violent disturbance or to attack vigorously, either physically or by speech or writing, as when birds or animals are attacked.

To rise to the fly. To rise to the bait, to fall for a hoax or trap, as a fish rises to the angler's fly and is caught.

No flying without wings. Nothing can be done without the proper means.

To come off with flying colours. See under COLOUR.

A fly bird. A knowing one, a WIDE BOY. The origin of fly in this sense is unknown.

Fly-blown. Fouled by flyblows; hence tainted, spoiled. At one time naturalists thought that maggots were actually blown on to the meat by blow-flies.

Fly-boy. The boy in a printing-office who lifts the printed sheets off the press; so called because he catches the sheets as they fly from the tympan immediately the frisket is opened.

Fly-by-night. One who defrauds his creditors by decamping in the night; a dubious character. See also FLY (a cab).

Fly-flat. A racing man's term for a punter who thinks he knows all the ins and outs of the turf, but doesn't. Cp. FLAT.

Flyman. In the theatre, the scenshifter, or man in the "flies", i.e. the gallery over the proscenium where the curtains, scenery, etc., are controlled.

The flyman's plot. The list of all the articles required by the flyman in the play concerned.

Flying bedstead. Nickname of the experimental wingless and rotorless vertical take-off jet aircraft demonstrated in Britain in 1954. Built by Rolls-Royce, the name was inspired by its appearance.

The Flying Duchess. Mary du Caurroy

Russell, Duchess of Bedford (1865-1937). After making record-breaking return flights to India (1929) and South Africa (1930) with Captain Barnard, she obtained an "A" pilot's licence in 1933 and disappeared on a solo flight over the North Sea in March 1937.

The Flying Dutchman. In maritime legend, a spectral ship that is supposed to haunt the seas around the Cape of Good Hope and to lure other vessels to their destruction or to cause other misfortune. According to Jal's Scènes de la Vie Maritime, he is said to be a Dutch captain, who persisted in trying to round the Cape, in spite of the violence of the storm, and the protests of passengers and crew. Eventually a form, said to be the Almighty, appeared on the deck, but the Captain did not even touch his cap but fired upon the form and cursed and blasphemed. For punishment, the Dutchman was condemned to sail and to be a torment to sailors until the Day of JUDGMENT. A skeleton ship appears in Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, and Washington Irving tells of "the Flying Dutchman of the Tappan Sea" in his Chronicles of Woolfer's Roost. Wagner has an opera Der Fliegende Holländer (1843) and Captain Marryat's novel The Phantom Ship (1839) tells of Philip Vanderdecken's successful but disastrous search for his father, the captain of the Flying Dutchman. Similar legends are found in many other countries.

The Demon Frigate braves the gale;
And well the doom'd spectators know
The harbinger of wreck and woe.
SCOTT: Rokeby, canto II, xi.

Flying Tigers. The nickname of a volunteer group of American airmen who supported China against Japanese aggression. Formed in August 1941, under Major-General C. L. Chennault, some months before America's entry into the war, they fought with distinction until merged with the 23rd Fighter Squadron of the U.S.A.A.F. in July 1942.

Fob. You are trying to fob, or fub me off. You are trying to put me off (with something inferior or by deception). Fob is connected with Ger. foppen, to hoax.

Fo's's'le. See FORECASTLE.

Foil. That which sets off something to advantage. The allusion is to the metallic leaf used by jewellers to set off PRECIOUS STONES (Fr. feuille; Lat. folium; Gr. phullon, a leaf).

I'll be your foil, Laertes; in mine ignorance
Your skill shall, like a star in the darkest night,
Stick fiery off indeed.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, V, ii.

The buttons come off the foil. See under BUTTON.

To run a foil. To puzzle; to lead astray. The track of game is called its foil; and a hunted animal will sometimes run back over its foil to mislead its pursuers. The word also means "to baffle, frustrate, parry". It comes from the O.Fr. fouler, to trample upon (it is the same word in the phrase "to full cloth").

Folio. The word is the ablative of the Lat. folium, a leaf.

In bibliography and printing it has distinct applications. (1) A sheet of paper (for printing) in its standard size. (2) A book in folio, in [one] sheet, is a book, the sheets of which have been folded once only, so that each sheet makes two leaves; hence a book of large size. (3) It is also applied to the leaf of a book of any size. Until the mid-16th century, when printed pagination became common, books were foliated, i.e. numbered on the recto or front of the leaf only and not on the verso. (4) Printers call a page of MS. or printed matter a folio regardless of size.

In BOOK-KEEPING Folio so-and-so means page so-and-so, and also two pages which lie exposed at the same time, one containing the credit and the other the debit of one and the same account. So called because ledgers, etc., are made in folio.

In conveyances, MSS., type-written documents etc., 72 words, and in Parliamentary proceedings 90 words, make a folio, where it is used for assessing the length of a document. In the U.S.A. it is 100 words.

Folkland. An uncommon Anglo-Saxon term formerly explained as land which was the common property of the "folk" from which the king could grant land to his followers. The more accepted theory, initiated by Vinogradoff in 1893, is that folkland is land held by folkright. Folkland was subject to FOOD-RENT and other duties to the king, from which BOCLAND was exempt.

Folk-lore. The traditional beliefs, customs, popular superstitions and legends of a people. The word was coined in 1846 by W. J. Thomas (1803-1885), editor of the Athenæum (see under ATHENÆUM CLUB), and founder of Notes and Queries.

Folk-mote. The meeting of the free men in the shire MOOT.

Follow. Follow-my-leader. A parlour game in which each player must exactly imitate the actions of the leader, or pay a forfeit.

Follow your nose. Go straight on.

He who follows truth too closely will have dirt kicked in his face. Be not too strict to pry into abuse.

To follow suit. To do as the person before you has done. A phrase from card-playing.

Follower. In addition to its usual meaning of one who follows a leader, the word was used in Victorian days to designate a maid-servant's young man.

Mrs. Marker . . . offers eighteen guineas . . .
Five servants kept . . . No followers.

DICKENS: Nicholas Nickleby, ch. XVI.

Folly. A fantastic or foolishly extravagant country seat or costly structure, built for amusement or vain glory. Fisher's Folly, a large and beautiful house in Bishopsgate, with pleasure-gardens, bowling green and hothouses, built by Jasper Fisher, one of the six clerks of CHANCERY, is an historical example. Queen Elizabeth I lodged there; in 1625 it was acquired by Earl of Devonshire and its site is now occupied by Devonshire Square.

Kirkby's castle, and Fisher's folly,
Spinola's pleasure, and Megse's glory.

STOWE: Survey (1603).

A classic example was that of Fonthill, Wiltshire, built by William Beckford (1760-1844), author of Vathek, at a cost of some £273,000. It took 18 years to complete and was sold in 1822 for £330,000. Three years later the tower, 260 ft. high, collapsed, destroying part of the house.

Palmerston's Follies. The nickname given to the line of forts surrounding Portsmouth and Plymouth, the building of which was supported by the Prime Minister, Lord Palmerston, in 1859 when he thought attack from NAPOLÉON III's France was a possibility. They were called follies because they were never used for their original purpose. Fort Southwick, near Portsmouth, was used as the headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief, Portsmouth, during World War II.

Fond. A foolish, fond parent. Here fond does not mean affectionate, but silly, from the obsolete fon, to act the fool, to become foolish (connected with our fun). Chaucer uses the word fonne for a simpleton (Reeve's Tale, 169); SHAKESPEARE has "fond desire", "fond wretch", "fond madwoman", etc.

Font, or Fount. A complete set of type of the same body and face with all the points, accents, figures, fractions, signs, etc., that ordinarily occur in printed books and papers. A complete fount (which includes italics) comprises over 200 separate pieces of type, without the special characters needed in ALMANACS, astronomical and medical works, etc. The word is French, fonte, from fondre (to melt or cast). See also LETTER.

Fontange (fôn tonzh). A head-dress introduced in France about 1680, and named after Louis XIV's mistress, the Duchesse de Fontanges (1661-1681). It became progressively more extravagant in height and similar to the English Tower or Commode of the same period.

Fontarabia (font à râ' bi à). Now called Fuenterrabia (Lat. Fons rapidus), near the Gulf of Gascony. Here, according to legend, CHARLEMAGNE and all his chivalry fell by the swords of the SARACENS. The French romancers say that, the rear of the king's army being cut to pieces, Charlemagne returned to life and avenged them by a complete victory.

When Charlemain with all his peerage fell
By Fontarabia.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, I, 587.

Food. Food for powder. Soldiers; especially raw recruits levied in time of war; cannon fodder.

Prince: I did never see such pitiful rascals.

Fal.: Tut, tut; good enough to toss; food for powder; they'll fill a pit as well as better: tush, man, mortal men, mortal men.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry IV, Pt. I, IV, ii.

Food for thought. Something to cogitate upon.

The food of the gods. See AMBROSIA; NECTAR.

To become food for worms, or for the fishes. To be dead and buried, or to be drowned.

Food-rent. In Anglo-Saxon England the victuals payable by a group of villis (townships) on the royal estates sufficient to provide for the king and his household for 24 hours. A food-rent used for the endowment of parish churches came to be called CHURCH SCOT.

Fool. A fool and his money are soon parted; Fortune favours fools; There's no fool like an old fool, etc., are among the "fool phrases" which need no explanation. Others are:

A fool's bolt is soon shot (SHAKESPEARE, Henry V, III, vi). Simpletons cannot wait for the fit and proper time, but waste their resources in random endeavours. The allusion is to bowmen in battle; the good soldier shot with a purpose, the foolish soldier at random. Cp. Prov. xxix, 11.

A fool's errand. A fruitless errand which is a waste of time.

A fool's paradise. A state of contentment or happiness founded on unreal, fanciful, or insecure foundations.

As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks. A foolish person believes what he desires. See under BELL.

At forty every man is a fool or his own physician. Said by Plutarch (Treatise on the Preservation of Health) to have been a saying of Tiberius. A man at the age of forty ought to have learnt enough about his own constitution to be able to keep himself healthy.

Every man hath a fool in his sleeve. No one is always wise; there is something of the fool in everyone.

To be a fool for one's pains. To have worked ineffectively; to have had no reward for one's labours.

To be a fool to. Not to come up to; to be very inferior to; as, "Bagatelle is a fool to billiards."

To make a fool of someone. To mislead him; to trick him; to make him appear foolish.

Young men think old men fools, old men know young men are. An old saying quoted by Camden in his Remains (1605), as by a certain Dr. Metcalfe. It also occurs in Chapman's All Fools, V, ii (acted 1599).

To fool about, or around. To play the fool; to play around in an aimless fashion.

To fool away one's time, money, etc. To squander it; to fritter it away.

All Fools' Day. The first day of April. See APRIL FOOL.

April Fool. See APRIL.

Court Fools. From mediæval times until the 17th century licensed fools or jesters were commonly kept at court, and frequently in the retinue of wealthy nobles. Holbein painted Sir Thomas More's jester, Patison, in his picture of the chancellor; the Earl of Morton, Scottish Regent (executed 1581), had a fool called Patrick Bonny; and as late as 1728 Swift wrote an epitaph on Dickie Pierce, the Earl of Suffolk's fool, who is buried in Berkeley Churchyard, Gloucestershire. See also DAGONET.

Among the most celebrated court fools are:

Rahère (founder of St. Bartholomew's Hospital), of Henry I; John Scogan (See SCOGAN'S JESTS), of Edward IV; PATCH, of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII; Will Somers, of Henry VIII; Jenny Colquhoun and James Geddes, of Mary Queen of Scots; Robert Grene, of Queen

Elizabeth I; Archie Armstrong and Thomas Derrie, of James I; Muckle John, of Charles I, who was probably also the last court fool in England.

In France, Miton and Thévenin de St. Léger were fools of Charles V; Haincelin Coq belonged to Charles VI, and Guillaume Louel to Charles VII. Triboulet was the jester of Louis XII and Francis I; Brusquet, of Henri II; Sibilot and Chicot, of Henri III and IV; and l'Angély, of Louis XIII and Louis XIV.

In chess the French name for the "bishop" is fou (a fool) and they used to represent it in a fool's dress.

The Feast of Fools. A kind of clerical SATURNALIA, popular in the MIDDLE AGES and not successfully suppressed until the REFORMATION, and even later in France. The feast was usually centred on a cathedral and most commonly held on the Feasts of St. STEPHEN (26 December), St. JOHN (27 December), HOLY INNOCENTS (28 December). The mass was burlesqued and braying often took the place of the customary responses. Obscene jests and dances were common as well as the singing of indecent songs. The ass was a central feature and the Feast of Asses was sometimes a separate festival. Cp. BOY BISHOP.

Gooseberry Fool. A dish essentially made of gooseberries, cream or custard, and sugar, the fruit being crushed through a sieve. Here the word fool comes from the Fr. fouler, to crush.

Tom Fool. See under TOM.

The wisest fool in Christendom. James I was so called by Henri IV of France, who learnt the phrase from Sully.

Foolscap. Properly the jester's cap and bells or the conical paper hat of a DUNCE. The standard size of printing paper measuring $13\frac{1}{2} \times 17$ in. and of writing paper measuring $13\frac{1}{4} \times 16\frac{1}{2}$ in. take their name from an ancient watermark showing a fool's head and cap.

Fool's gold. See under GOLD.

Foot. The foot as a measure of length (12 in., $\frac{1}{3}$ of a yard, or 0.3047075 of a metre) is common to most peoples, and has never varied much more than does the length of men's feet, from which the name is taken.

In prosody, the term denotes a division in verse which consists of a certain number of syllables (or pauses), one of which is stressed. Here the term, which comes from Greece, refers to beating time with the foot.

Enter a house right foot foremost (Petronius). It is unlucky to enter a house or to leave one's room left foot foremost. Augustus was very superstitious on this point. PYTHAGORAS taught that it is necessary to put the shoe on the right foot first.

First foot. See under FIRST.

How are your poor feet? A cry said to have originated at the Great Exhibition of 1851 (see CRYSTAL PALACE), from the excessive amount of tramping about involved in visiting its galleries.

I have not yet got my foot in. I am not yet familiar and at home with the work. The allusion is to the preliminary exercises in Roman foot-races. While the starting signal was awaited the contestants made essays at jumping, running, etc., to limber up. This was "getting their foot in" for the race. Cp. TO GET ONE'S HAND IN under HAND.

To be carried out feet foremost. To be dead.

To cast oneself at someone's feet. To be entirely submissive to him, to throw oneself on his mercy.

To fall, or land on one's feet. To secure a good position; to be fortunately placed. As a cat luckily lands on its feet.

To find one's feet. To get on one's feet; to settle down and develop a grip on one's work.

To have feet of clay. Said of someone hitherto held in high regard or in an important position who shows disappointing weaknesses of character. The allusion is to Dan. ii, 31-45.

To have one's foot on another's neck. To have him at your mercy; to tyrannize over, or domineer over him completely. See Josh. x, 24.

To measure another's foot by your own last. To apply your personal standards to the conduct or actions of another; to judge people by yourself.

To put one's best foot foremost. To walk as fast as possible, with all dispatch; to try to make a good impression.

To put one's foot down. To take a firm stand, to refuse or insist upon something firmly and finally. In driving, to depress the accelerator.

To put one's foot in it. To perpetrate a blunder, to make a FAUX PAS, to get into trouble. The allusion is obvious. There is a famous Irish BULL, "Every time I open my mouth I put my foot in it".

To set a man on his feet. To start him off in business, etc., especially after he has "come a CROPPER".

To set on foot. To set going.

Footlights

To show the cloven foot, or hoof. To betray an evil intention. An allusion to the DEVIL who is represented with a cloven hoof.

To trample under foot. To oppress, or outrage; to treat with the greatest contempt and discourtesy.

With one foot in the grave. In a dying state.

To foot it. To walk the distance instead of riding; also to dance.

Lo! how finely the Graces can it foote
To the Instrument:
They dancen deffly, and singen soote,
In their meriment.

SPENSER: Shepherd's Calendar: April.

To foot the bill. To pay it; to promise to pay the account by signing one's name at the foot of the bill.

Washing the feet. See MAUNDY THURSDAY; MAUNDS.

He is on good footing with the world. He stands well with the world. Cp. TO BE ON A GOOD FOOTING.

To be on a good footing (with someone). To be on friendly terms with a person; to be in good standing.

To pay your footing. To give money for drink when you first enter a trade, etc. Entry money for being allowed to put your foot in the premises occupied by fellow craftsmen. Cp. GARNISH.

Footloose and fancy free. Unfettered, unattached to a member of the opposite sex.

Footmen. See RUNNING FOOTMEN.

Footlights. To appear before the footlights. To appear on the stage. The footlights are placed near the front edge of the stage.

Pop's Alley. An old name for a promenade in a theatre, especially the central passage between the stalls (right and left in the opera-house).

Forbidden Fruit. Forbidden or unlawful pleasure of any kind, especially illicit love. The reference is to Gen. ii, 17, "But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it." According to Mohammedan tradition the forbidden fruit par-taken of by ADAM and EVE was the banyan or Indian fig.

Forcible Feeble. See FEEBLE.

Fore! A cry of warning used by golfers before driving.

To come to the fore. To stand forth; to stand out prominently; to distinguish oneself.

To the fore. In the front rank; eminent.

Fore-and-aft. The whole length of the ship from stem to stern; lengthwise. Fore here is the fore or front part and aft the after or rear part. Sailing vessels are classed as square-rigged or fore-and-aft rigged, the latter having their sails extending from the fore-and-aft line to the lee side. Such vessels carry no square sails and can sail closer to the wind. In the Royal Navy a seaman's uniform of cap, jumper, and bell-bottomed trousers is termed square-rig, while the peaked cap, jacket, and trousers of petty officers and above is called fore-and-aft rig.

Forecastle, or fo'c's'le (fök' sul). So called because anciently the fore part of a ship was raised and protected like a castle, so that it could command the enemy's deck. Similarly the after part (now termed the quarter deck) was called the after castle. Soldiers were stationed in these castles to carry on the fighting. It has always been customary to place the crew's quarters in the fo'c's'le and the officers' quarters aft.

Forestick. The front log laid across the ANDIRONS on a wood fire, which holds the others in. Its opposite number at the back is the backlog.

Forest City. Cleveland, Ohio, from its many well-shaded, tree-lined streets.

Forest Courts. The ancient courts established for the conduct of forest business and the administration of the forest laws, the main aim of which was to preserve the wild animals for the royal chase. Such laws existed in Saxon England and were reinforced by the Norman kings. William I created the New Forest in the sense that he placed the area under Forest Law, and the forests reached their greatest extent under Henry II (1154-1189). The young Henry III was forced to concede a Forest Charter in 1217 modifying the laws and disafforesting lands afforested by Henry II. See REGARD; ROBIN HOOD; SWANIMOTE; WOODMOTE.

Forgery (O.F. forgier, Lat. fabricare, to fabricate or make). Generally speaking a forgery is an attempt to pass off as genuine some piece of spurious work or writing with the intent to deceive or defraud. It is not always easy to distinguish a forgery and an imposture. Among the notable examples given below the ROWLEY POEMS (see below) are perhaps impostures rather than forgeries. See also OSSIAN.

Billies and Charlies. Bogus mediæval metal objects, chiefly plaques, cast in lead or an alloy of lead and copper known as cock metal, and artificially pitted with acid. Between 1847 and 1848 William Smith and Charles Eaton (Billy and Charley) produced these objects by the thousand and planted them on sites being excavated in and around London. Many simple folk and the more naive collectors were taken in, though the crudity of the work was obvious. The business was exposed at a meeting of the British Archaeological Association in 1858.

The Ireland Forgeries. One of the most famous literary forgers was William Henry Ireland (1777-1835), the son of a bookseller and amateur antiquarian. When only 19, young Ireland produced a number of seemingly ancient leases and other documents purporting to be in SHAKESPEARE'S handwriting, including a love poem to "Anna Hatherrawaye". Emboldened by their acceptance he next came out with two "lost" Shakespeare plays—Vortigern and Henry II. Ignoring the suspicions of Kemble, Sheridan produced Vortigern at DRURY LANE in 1796. During the rehearsals Mrs. Siddons and Mrs. Palmer resigned their roles and Kemble helped to ensure the play was laughed off the stage. When he spoke the line "When this solemn mockery is o'er", the house yelled and hissed until the curtain fell. Meanwhile Malone and Steevens had studied the Miscellaneous Papers, said to be Shakespeare's, and had declared them forgeries. Ireland confessed later in the same year. His motive appears to have been a craving to secure the regard and admiration of his father, whose antiquarian interests amounted to an obsession.

The Pigott Forgeries. In April 1887, The Times published in facsimile a letter attributed to Charles Stewart Parnell, the Irish leader, condoning the PHOENIX PARK MURDERS. Parnell denounced this as a forgery, but The Times continued to publish its damaging articles on "Parnellism and Crime" which deeply influenced English opinion. In 1888 O'Donnell, one of those besmirched, sued The Times for libel. From the judicial inquiry which resulted, the letters were found to be forged by Richard Pigott, who sold them to The Times for a large sum, money being his only motive. The Times had to pay £250,000 in costs. Pigott fled to Madrid and shot himself when arrest was impending.

The Piltdown Skull, or Piltdown Man. In 1908 and 1911 Charles Dawson of Lewes "found" two pieces of a highly mineralized human skull in a gravel bed near Piltdown Common, Sussex. By 1912 he and Sir Arthur Smith Woodward had discovered the whole skull. This was thought to be that of a new genus of man and was called Eoanthropus Dawsoni. It came to be accepted as such by most pre-historians, archaeologists, etc., although a few were sceptical. In 1953 J. S. Weiner, K. P. Oakley and W. E. Le Gros Clark issued a report (Bulletin of the British Museum (Natural History), Vol. II, No. 3) announcing that the Piltdown mandible was a fake, in reality the jaw of a modern ape, the rest of the skull being that of Homo sapiens. It appears to have been a carefully planned hoax which took in most of the experts.

The Rowley Poems. Certain poems written by Thomas Chatterton (1752-1770), and said by him to have been the work of a 15th-century priest of Bristol called Thomas Rowley (a fictitious character). Chatterton began to write them before he was 15 and, after having been refused by Dodsley, they were published in 1769. Many prominent connoisseurs and litterateurs, including Horace Walpole, were hoaxed.

The Vermeer Forgeries. Han (Henri) van Meegeren (1889-1947) began his series of brilliant fakes of Dutch masters in 1936 with The Disciples of Emmaus which was sold as a "Vermeer" for 550,000 gulden. It was, of course, vetted by the experts! His intention seems to have been to indulge his contempt and hatred of the art critics by a superlative hoax, but the financial success of his first fake led to others, mostly "Vermeers". Discovery only came in 1945 when Allied commissioners were seeking to restore to their former owners the art treasures which had found their way to Germany during the war. Among Goering's collection was an unknown Vermeer—The Woman taken in Adultery—and its original vendor was found to be van Meegeren. Sale of such a work of national importance involved a charge of collaboration with the enemy. To escape the heavy penalty, van Meegeren confessed to the faking of 14 Dutch masterpieces, 9 of which had been sold for a total of 7,167,000 gulden, and to prove his story agreed to paint another "old masterpiece" in prison in the presence of the experts. He was sentenced to one year's imprisonment in October 1947 but died on 30 December.

The Zinoviev Letter, or Red Letter Scare. A letter, which purported to be signed by Zinoviev, president of the Presidium of the Third Communist International, summoning the British Communist Party to intensify its revolutionary activities and to subvert the armed forces of the crown, was published (25 October 1924), four days before a General Election. It helped to promote a "red scare" and possibly increased a probably certain CONSERVATIVE majority. Many Labour leaders held it to be a forgery and its authenticity was denied by the Russians. In December 1966 The Sunday Times published an article establishing that the letter was a forgery perpetrated by a group of WHITE RUSSIAN émigrés, at the same time suggesting that certain leaders at the Conservative Central Office knew that it was a fake, although the Conservative party as a whole assumed it to be genuine. The "informant" was paid for his services.

Forget-me-not. According to German legend this flower takes its name from the last words of a knight, who was drowned while trying to pick some from the riverside for his lady. The botanical name myosotis (mouse-ear) refers to the shape of the leaves.

Forgotten Man, The. A phrase derived from W. G. Sumner (1840–1910), the American sociologist, to describe the decent, hardworking, ordinary citizen. It was later popularized by F. D. Roosevelt in 1932 during the Presidential election campaign, although he actually used the expression before his nomination. He advocated a NEW DEAL and appealed to the "forgotten man at the bottom of the economic pyramid".

Fork. To fork out. Fork is old thieves' slang for a finger, hence "to fork out" is to produce and hand over, to pay up.

Fingers were made before forks. See FINGERS.

A forked cap. A bishop's MITRE; so called by John Skelton (c. 1460–1529). It is cleft or forked.

The forks. The gallows (Lat. furca). Among the Romans the word also meant a kind of yoke, with two arms stretching over the shoulders, to which the criminal's hands were tied. The punishment was three degrees of severity; (1) The furca ignominiosa; (2) the furca pœnalis; and (3) the furca capitalis. The first, for slight offences, consisted of carrying the furca (usually weighted) on the shoulders; the second involved scourging as well; and the third being scourged to death.

The Caudine Forks. See CAUDINE.

Forlorn Hope. This is the Dutch verloren hoop, the lost squad or troop. The French equivalent is enfants perdus, lost children. The forlorn hope was a picked body of men sent in front to begin an attack, particularly the body of volunteers who first entered the breach in the storming of defensive fortifications. The phrase is now usually applied to a body of men selected for some desperate enterprise.

Hoop means a troop or company, and word play or mistaken etymology have resulted in the phrase being used to mean a "faint hope" or an enterprise offering little chance of success.

Form. (O.Fr. forme, Lat. forma). Shape, figure, manner, etc. Good or bad form is behaving in accordance—or otherwise—with the established conventions of good manners and behaviour.

We'll eat the dinner and have a dance together, or we shall transgress all form.

STEELE: Tender Husband, V, ii.

Forma pauperis (fôr' ma pou' per is) (Lat. in the character of a pauper, i.e., as a poor man). To sue or defend an action in forma pauperis was when a person was unable to bring or defend a High Court action because of inability to pay the legal expenses, and arrangements were made for such to receive legal services gratuitously. The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, replaced these proceedings although appeals in forma pauperis may still be taken to the HOUSE OF LORDS.

Fortiter in re (fôr' ti tēr in rē) (Lat.). Firmness in doing what is to be done; an unflinching resolution to persevere to the end. See SUAVITER.

Fortunatus. A hero of mediæval legend (derived from Eastern sources) who possessed an inexhaustible purse, a wishing cap, etc. He appears in a German Volksbuch of 1509. Hans Sachs dramatized the story in 1553, and Dekker's Pleasant Comedy of Old Fortunatus was first performed in December 1599.

You have found Fortunatus's purse. You are in luck's way.

Fortune. Fortune favours the brave.

The expression is found in Terence—"Fortis fortuna adjuvat" (Phormio, I, iv); also in VIRGIL—"Audentis fortuna adjuvat" (Æn. X, 284). and many other classic writers.

Fortunate Islands. An ancient name for the Canary Islands; also, for any imaginary lands set in distant seas, like the "Islands of the Blest".

Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds that echo farther west
Than your sire's Islands of the Blest.
BYRON: Don Juan, canto III, lxxxvi, 2.

Forty. A number of frequent occurrence in the SCRIPTURES and hence formerly treated as, in a manner, sacrosanct. Moses was "in the mount forty days and forty nights"; Elijah was fed by ravens for forty days; the rain of the FLOOD fell forty days; and another forty days expired before Noah opened the window of the ark; forty days was the period of embalming; Nineveh had forty days to repent; Our Lord fasted forty days; He was seen forty days after His Resurrection, etc.

ST. SWITHIN betokens forty days' rain or dry weather; a QUARANTINE extends to forty days; in Old English law forty days was the limit for the payment for the fine for manslaughter; a stranger, at the end of forty days, was compelled to be enrolled in the TITHING; the privilege of SANCTUARY was for forty days; the widow was allowed to remain in her husband's house for forty days after his decease; a KNIGHT enjoined forty days' service of his tenant; a new-made burgess had to forfeit forty pence unless he built a house within forty days, etc., etc.

Field of the Forty Footsteps. See under FIELD.

Fool or physician at forty. See FOOL.

Forty stripes save one. The Jews were forbidden by MOSAIC LAW to inflict more than forty stripes on an offender, and for fear of breaking the law, they stopped short of the number. If the scourge contained three lashes, thirteen strokes would equal "forty save one".

The THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND used sometimes to be called "the forty stripes save one" by theological students.

Forty winks. A short nap.

The Forty Immortals, or simply The Forty. The members of the French Academy, who number forty.

The Hungry Forties. See HUNGRY.

The Roaring Forties. A sailor's term for the stormy regions between 40° and 50° south latitude, where heavy westerly winds (known as Brave West Winds) prevail. In the days of sail, owing to these winds, mariners used often to return to Europe via Cape Horn instead of the Cape of Good Hope. The term has also been applied to the North Atlantic crossing between Europe and America between 40° and 50° North latitude.

Twice I have entered the Roaring Forties and been driven out by gales and squalls. The last one was on Tuesday when I handled the boat badly and it was damaged.

SIR FRANCIS CHICHESTER;

Article in The Sunday Times (30 October 1966).

The Forty-Five. The name given to the rebellion of 1745 led by Charles Edward Stuart, the Young PRETENDER. He landed on Eriskay Island (23 July) and raised his standard at Glenfinnan (19 August). Joined by many Scottish clansmen, he proclaimed the Old Pretender King, as James III, and defeated Sir John Cope at Prestonpans (21 September), and marched south reaching Derby (4 December). His plan to proceed to London was frustrated by the advice of his supporters and lack of support from English JACOBITES. He retreated to SCOTLAND and was decisively defeated by the Duke of Cumberland at Culloden Moor (16 April 1746). The Young Pretender escaped to France (20 September) with the help of FLORA MACDONALD. Cumberland earned the nickname "Butcher" for the subsequent reprisals taken against the Highlanders.

"Number 45" is the celebrated number of John Wilkes's North Briton (23 April 1763), in which the KING'S SPEECH referring to the Treaty of Paris of that year as "honourable to my Crown and beneficial to my people" was held to be a lie. See GENERAL WARRANTS.

Forty-niners. Those who took part in the Californian gold rush, after the discovery of gold there in 1848. Most of the adventurers arrived in 1849, coming from many parts of the world, including Australia and China.

In a cavern, in a canyon,
Excavated for a mine,
Dwelt a miner, forty-niner,
And his daughter Clementine.

Clementine.

Forty-two Line Bible, The. See BIBLE, SOME SPECIALLY NAMED EDITIONS.

Forty Years On. This oft quoted phrase forms the opening of the famous Harrow Football Song, the first four lines of which are given below. It is also the school song. The words by Edward Bowen were set to music by his colleague John Farmer, who directed the music at Harrow from 1862 to 1885.

Forty years on, when afar and asunder
Parted are those who are singing today,
When you look back and forgetfully wonder
What you were like in your work and your play . . .

Forwards, Marshal. Blücher (1742-1819) was called Marschall Vorwärts, from his constant exhortation to his soldiers in the campaigns preceding Waterloo. Vorwärts! always Vorwärts!

Fosse, or Foss Way. One of the principal Roman roads in Britain. It runs on the line Axmouth - Ilchester - Bath - Cirencester - Leicester - Lincoln. Its name derives from the ditch (Lat. fossa) on each side of the road. Cp. ERMINE STREET.

Fou. A Scottish expression for drunk. It is a variant of full.

The clachan yill had made me canty
I was na fou, but just had plenty.
BURNS: Death and Dr. Hornbrook.

Foul anchor. When the ship's cable has taken a turn round the anchor. It was used as an official seal by Charles Howard, Earl of Nottingham (1536-1624), when Lord High Admiral, and later as a badge on naval uniform buttons, cap badges and the Admiralty crest.

Foul-weather Jack. Admiral John Byron (1723-1786), grandfather of the poet, said to have been as notorious for foul weather as Queen Victoria was for fine (see QUEEN'S WEATHER). Admiral Sir John Norris (c. 1660-1749) was also so called.

Fountain of Arethusa. See ALPHEUS AND ARETHUSA.

Fountain of Youth. In popular legend, a fountain with the power of restoring youth. Much sought after, at one time it was supposed to be in one of the Bahama Islands. Ponce de León, discoverer of FLORIDA, set out in search of BIMINI.

Four. Four-ale. Small ALE or cheap ale, originally sold at fourpence per quart. Hence four-ale bar as a name in a public house or inn for the public bar, where prices are lowest.

The Four Corners of the Earth. Generally speaking, the uttermost ends of the earth, the remotest parts of the earth.

In 1965 members of the Johns Hopkins Applied Physics Laboratory named the four corners of the earth as being in Ireland, south-east of the Cape of Good Hope, west of the Peruvian coast, and between New Guinea and Japan. Each of these "corners" (of several thousand square miles in area) is some 120 ft. above the geodetic mean and the gravitational pull is measurably greater at these locations.

The Four Freedoms. These were defined by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in his message to Congress, 6 January 1941, as the freedom of speech and expression, the freedom of worship, and the freedom from fear and want. They were to be the aims of the U.S.A. and ultimately of the world. The occasion was his proposal to make the U.S.A. "the arsenal of democracy" and to extend Lease-Lend to Britain.

Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. In The Revelation of St. John the Divine (ch. vi), four agents of destruction, two being agents of war and two of famine and pestilence. The first appeared on a white horse, the second on a red horse, the third on a black horse, and the fourth on a pale horse.

Vicente Blasco Ibáñez (1867-1928), the Spanish writer, published a novel of this title in 1916 which appeared in English in 1918.

The Four Hundred. A late 19th-century term for New York's most exclusive social set, which came into general use as a designation of social exclusiveness. In 1892, Mrs. William Astor finding the need to limit her guests to the capacity of her ballroom, which was asserted to be suitable for 400 guests, asked Ward McAllister, the self-appointed organizer of New York society, to prune her invitations. McAllister is also reported to have claimed that there were only 400 people in New York city who could claim to be "society". Cp. UPPER TEN under TEN.

The History of the Four Kings (Livre des Quatre Rois). A pack of cards. In a French pack the four kings are CHARLEMAGNE, David, ALEXANDER THE GREAT and CÆSAR. See COURT CARDS under COURT.

Four Letters, The. See TETRAGRAMMATON.

Four-letterman. A EUPHEMISM for one who is sufficiently obnoxious to be designated by certain of the FOUR-LETTER WORDS.

Four-letter words. The long established term for the blunt O.E. words for certain parts and functions of the body. Such words, not used in polite society, gained a much wider currency during the two World Wars and have since attained a degree of literary usage, especially after the Lady Chatterley's Lover case in 1960, when Penguin Books were acquitted of issuing an obscene publication. The most widely used of these words has since found its way into the Oxford History of England (vol. XV), if only in a footnote. The attempt to restore such words to normal usage is somewhat curious in a society which has converted "W.C.s" and "lavatories" into "toilets", and "urinals" into "Gentlemen".

The Annals of the Four Masters is the name usually given to a collection of old Irish chronicles published (1632-1636) as Annals of the Kingdom of Ireland. The Four Masters (authors or compilers) were Michael O'Clery (1575-1643), Conaire his brother, his cousin Cucoigriche O'Clery (d. 1664), and Fearfeasa O'Mulconry.

Four-minute men. In the U.S.A. during World War I, the name given to the members of a volunteer organization some 75,000 strong who, in 1917-1918, set out to promote the sale of Liberty Loan Bonds and stir up support for the war in Europe. They gave talks of four minutes duration to church congregations, cinema audiences, lodges, etc.

Four-minute mile. The running of a mile in four minutes was for many years the hoped-for achievement of first-class athletes. The rigorous training and timed pacing of P. J. Nurmi (Finland) achieved a time of 4 mins. 10.4 secs. in 1924 but R. G. Bannister (b. 1929) was the first man to reach the goal in 1954. He achieved a sub-four-minute mile at Oxford in 1954 (3 mins. 59.4 secs.) after constant and carefully planned efforts. Others have since improved upon this record.

The four-minute mile had become rather like an Everest—a challenge to the human spirit.
R. BANNISTER: First Four Minutes, ch. xiii.

Four Sons of Aymon. See AYMON.

Fourlegs, Old. Nickname for the coelacanth, a species of fish held to be extinct for millions of years until a specimen was caught in 1938 off East London, South Africa. The lobate fins, which could be used more or less as limbs, gave rise to the name.

Fourth dimension. As a mathematical concept, a hypothetical dimension, whose relation to the recognized three of length, breadth and thickness, is analogous to their relation with each other. Albert Einstein in 1921 introduced time as the fourth dimension in his THEORY OF RELATIVITY. The expression is also sometimes used to describe something beyond the limits of normal experience.

Fourth Republic. The French Republic established in 1946 which replaced the provisional governments that followed the collapse of the VICHY régime after D-DAY. Essentially a continuation of the THIRD REPUBLIC, it gave way to the Fifth Republic in 1958.

Fourth of July. See INDEPENDENCE DAY.

The Fourth of June. King George III's birthday and SPEECH DAY at Eton. The day is celebrated with a procession of boats, cricket matches, and fireworks. George III was a particular patron of the school.

Fourth Party. The nickname of a group of four members of the CONSERVATIVE opposition, who harassed Gladstone's second administration (1880-1885). It consisted of Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, Sir John Gorst, A. J. Balfour and their leader, Lord Randolph Churchill. They seized their first opening during the disputes over Bradlaugh's admission to Parliament, when as an atheist he refused to take the Parliamentary oath of allegiance. They made every use of their political opportunities against the government, and strongly criticized their own front bench under the somewhat ineffective leadership of Sir Stafford Northcote. The name "Fourth Party" arose when a member of the Commons referred to two parties (LIBERAL and CONSERVATIVE) and Parnell, the Irish leader, called out "three"; Randolph Churchill then interjected to make it "four".

Fourierism. A utopian socialist system advocated by François Marie Charles Fourier (1772-1837) of Besançon. Society was to be organized into "phalanges" each consisting of about 1,600 people sharing common buildings (the phalanstère) and working about 5,000 acres of land, with suitable facilities for the development of handicrafts and sources of amusement and a harmonious social life. The most menial tasks were to be the best rewarded out of the common gain and pleasant labour the least. The "phalanges" were to be linked together in suitable groups and finally into one great federation with the capital Constantinople. A number of short-lived Fourierist phalanges were established in the U.S.A. in the middle years of the 19th century but all had disappeared by 1860.

Fourteen. In its connection with Henri IV and Louis XIV of France are the following curious coincidences:

HENRI IV:

There are 14 letters in the name Henri de Bourbon. He was the 14th King of France and Navarre on the extinction of the family of Navarre. He was born on 14 December, 1553, the sum of which year amounts to 14. His first wife, Marguerite Valois, was born on 14 May 1553; on 14 March 1590 he won his decisive victory at Ivry and on 14 May 1590 a great ecclesiastical and military demonstration was organized in Paris against him. It was Gregory XIV who placed Henry under the papal ban, and on 14 May 1610 Henry was assassinated by Ravailac.

LOUIS XIV:

The fourteenth king of this name. He mounted the throne in 1643, the sum of which figures equals 14. He died in 1715, the sum of which figures equals 14. He reigned 77 years, the sum of which figures equals 14. He was born in 1638 and died in 1715, which added together equals 3353, the sum of which figures equals 14.

Fourteen Hundred. The cry raised on the Stock Exchange to give notice that a stranger has entered the "HOUSE". The term is said to have been in use in Defoe's time, and to have originated when, for a considerable period, the number of members had remained stationary at 1,399.

Fourteen Points. The 14 conditions laid down by President Woodrow Wilson (1856-1924) as those on which the Allies were prepared to make peace with Germany on the conclusion of World War I. He outlined them in a speech to Congress on 8 January 1918 and they were eventually accepted as the basis for the peace. They included the evacuation by Germany of all allied territory, the restoration of an independent Poland, freedom of the seas, reduction of armaments, and OPEN DIPLOMACY.

Fowler, The. Henry I (876-936), son of Otto, Duke of Saxony and King of Germany from 919 to 936. According to 11th-century tradition, when the deputies announced to him his election to the throne, they found him fowling with a HAWK on his fist.

Fox. As a name for the old English broadsword, fox probably refers to a maker's mark of a dog, wolf, or fox. Such swords were manufactured by Julian del Rei of Toledo, whose trade mark was a little dog, mistaken for a fox.

O signieur Dew, thou diest on a point of fox,
Except, O signieur, thou do give to me
Egrecious ransom.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, IV, iv.

The Old Fox. Marshal Soult (1769-1851) was so nicknamed from his strategic talents and fertility of resource.

Reynard the Fox. See REYNARD.

A case of the fox and the grapes. Said of one who wants something badly, but cannot obtain it, and so tries to pretend that he does not really want it at all. See GRAPES.

A fox's sleep. A sleep with one eye open. Assumed indifference to what is going on. Cp. TO FOX.

A wise fox will never rob his neighbour's henroost. It would soon be found out, so he goes farther afield where he is less likely to be discovered.

Every fox must pay his skin to the furrier. The crafty will be taken in by their own wiliness.

I gave him a flap with a fox-tail. I cajoled him; I made a fool of him. The fox-tail was one of the badges of the MOTLEY, and to flap with a fox-tail is to treat one like a fool.

To set a fox to keep the geese (Lat. ovem lupo committere). Said of one who entrusts his money to sharpers.

To fox. To steal or cheat; to keep an eye on somebody without seeming to do so; to baffle. A dog, a fox, and a weasel sleep, as they say, "with one eye open".

Foxed. A print or page of a book stained with reddish-brown marks is said to be "foxed" because of its colour. Foxed is also used to imply "baffled" or "bewildered", and fuddled or the worse for liquor.

Fox-fire. The phosphoric light, without heat, which occurs on decaying matter. It is the Fr. faux or false.

Foxglove (Digitalis purpurea). The flower is named from the animal and the glove. It is not known how the fox came to be associated with it, but one suggestion is that it is a corruption of "folk's glove", folks being the fairies or little people. In Welsh it is called menygellyllon (elves' gloves) or menyg y llwynog (fox's gloves) and in Ireland it is called a fairy thimble.

Fox-hole. A small slit trench for one or more men.

There are no atheists in foxholes. See ATHEISTS.

Fox-trot. The short quick walking pace, as of a fox. "Only a fox's step away" means a very small distance away. It is also the name of a ballroom dance originating in America, popular from the 1920s until the 1950s.

Fra Diavolo. See DIAVOLO.

France. See FRANKS.

Francesca de Rimini (frān ches' ká da rim' i ni). Daughter of Guido da Polenta, Lord of Ravenna. Her story is told in DANTE's Inferno (canto v). She was married to Giovanni Malatesta, Lord of Rimini, but her guilty love for his younger brother, Paolo, was discovered and both were put to death about 1289. Leigh Hunt wrote a poem of this name (1816) and there are tragedies on the subject by Silvio Pellico (1818), Stephen Phillips (1900), Gabriele d'Annunzio (1902), and F. M. Crawford (1902).

Francis of Assisi, St. The founder of the FRANCISCANS. Born in 1182, son of a wealthy merchant, he was rejected by his father for his generous gifts to the poor folk of Assisi and his little chapel, called the Portuncula, was soon thronged with disciples. His love of nature was a characteristic as was his purity and gentleness of spirit and his preaching to the birds became a favourite subject for artists. His begging friars lived in extreme poverty and he was canonized two years after his death (1226).
