A reflective poem, usually in ▷ blank verse, in which the poet meditates aloud, ostensibly talking to a friend. It adopts a more intimate, introspective tone than its predecessor, the 18th-century verse epistle. The term is especially associated with ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who first used it. His Eolian Harp (1795), This Lime-Tree Bower (1800), The Nightingale (1798) and ▷ Frost at Midnight (1798) are often termed 'conversation poems'.

Cook, Eliza (1818-89)

Poet, essayist and ⊳ feminist. The youngest of eleven children, she was born in London and grew up in Horsham, Sussex. She educated herself and published her first verses, Lays of a Wild Harp, in 1835. The collection was wellreceived, and encouraged her to contribute poems to the Metropolitan Magazine, the New Monthly Magazine and the Weekly Dispatch, the last of which printed her most famous poem, 'The Old Arm Chair', in 1837. Her work varies between sentimental, domestic verse, fiery political > ballads and satirical poetry. Her second collection, Melaia and Other Poems (1838), sold well both in Britain and North America, and three further volumes followed: Poems: Second Series (1845); I'm Afloat: Songs (1850) and New Echoes, and Other Poems (1864). From 1849-54 she wrote and edited ➤ Eliza Cook's Journal, a feminist miscellany addressing topics such as work, marriage and the law. The 1860 publication Jottings From My Journal includes much of this material. Cook also wrote a collection of aphorisms, Diamond Dust (1865). She never married, but was passionately attracted to Charlotte Cushman, an actress.

➤ Women's movement; Lesbianism.

Bib: Hickok, K., Representations of Women:
19th Century British Women's Poetry; Leighton,
A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Cook's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. The Cook's Tale, set in low-life London, begins a story about 'Perkyn Revelour' before breaking off after only 58 lines. The nature of the Cook's contribution to the story-telling competition seems rather uncertain. Later in the journey, the Host calls upon the Cook to contribute a story, but the Manciple pre-empts any response from the drunken Cook (in the Prologue to the \triangleright Manciple's Tale). In some manuscripts of the Canterbury Tales, the romance of \triangleright Gamelyn is inserted and attributed to the Cook.

Cookson, Catherine (b 1906)

Romantic novelist. Cookson is one of the best-selling writers currently working in Britain, whose stories have much in common with classic Mills and Boon plots but which also deploy historical motifs and display richer characterization. Her native Northumberland, in which most of her novels are set, has become immortalized as 'Cookson Country' by the local tourist board, which at least is testament to the rich evocations of landscape and regional feeling which her primarily romantic fiction offers.

Her wide range of novels, all written since she was in her early forties, include: Fanny McBride (1977); Pure as the Lily (1978); The Mallen Novels (1979); Tilly Trotter (1980); Marriage and Mary Ann (1984); The Wingless Bird (1990); and A Ruthless Need (1995).

Bib: Radford, J. (ed.), The Progress of Romance: The Politics of Popular Fiction; Radway, J., Reading the Romance.

Cooper, Edith (1862–1913)
Poet and dramatist who published separately, and collaborately with ▷ Katherine Bradley under the ▷ pseudonym ▷ Michael Field.

Cooper, William (b 1910)

Pen name of H. S. Hoff, novelist. Having already published four novels under his real name, Cooper came to prominence in 1950 with Scenes from Provincial Life, the story of an unconventional and sceptical schoolteacher living in a Midlands town around the outbreak of World War II. In reacting against the experimental tradition of the > Bloomsbury Group and of > modernism, Cooper's novel initiated the 1950s school of dissentient > realism, which included such writers as > John Braine, > David Storey, > Stan Barstow and > John Wain. Scenes from Metropolitan Life (written in the 1950s but not published for legal reasons until 1982) and Scenes from Married Life (1961) complete a trilogy. Other novels include: You Want the Right Frame of Reference (1971), Love on the Coast (1973) and Scenes from Later Life (1983).

Cooper's Hill (1642)

➤ Denham, Sir John.

Copernicus (1473–1543)
This was the Latinized form of surname of Nicolas Koppernik, a Polish astronomer. In De Revolutionibus orbium coelestium (Concerning the Revolutions of the Heavenly Spheres) (1543) he expounded for the first time since classical times the belief that the earth and other planets move around the sun. This was contrary to the hitherto accepted theory of the Egyptian astronomer > Ptolemy, according to which the earth was the centre of the solar system. The Ptolemaic system suited the traditional Christian conception of the universe and the place of man within it - it is still assumed, for instance, in > Milton's epic of the Creation, ➤ Paradise Lost – but the Copernican theory caused little scandal since at the time it was regarded merely as an ingenious hypothesis. Only when > Galileo claimed its validity on demonstrable grounds after the invention of his new telescope, did the Church condemn the theory outright in 1616 and require Galileo to repudiate his findings.

Coppard, A. E. (1878-1957)

Writer of short stories. He was largely selfeducated, and began serving in a shop at the age of nine. Later he began writing while working as an accountant, and his literary interests were nourished when he obtained a post at Oxford where he met and made friends with the intelligentsia. The best of his stories are chiefly in the earlier volumes: Adam and Eve and Pinch Me (1921); Clorinda Walks in Heaven (1922); Fishmonger's Fiddle (1925); and The Field of Mustard (1926). Later volumes include: Pink Furniture (1930); Tapster's Tapestry (1938); You Never Know Do You? (1939); and The Dark-Eyed Lady (1947). He also wrote poems: Collected Poems (1928); Easter Day (1931); and Cherry Ripe (1935), and an autobiography, It's Me, O Lord (1957).

Coppard had a remarkably acute ear for the spoken word, and his best tales have the freshness and simplicity of oral folk-tales. Although his subject matter was often more sophisticated than this suggests, many of his finest stories are about the life of the countryside. He was influenced by > Thomas Hardy's short stories, and he often shows a stoically resigned attitude to human destiny which is similar to Hardy's outlook, but he combined this with a remarkable talent for sharp comedy, again reminiscent of peasant folk-tales.

Coppe, Abiezer (1619-72)

Religious prose writer. Coppe was born in Warwick and educated at Oxford; he became a baptist minister in the 1640s, but broke with formal religion in 1640 and was imprisoned for blasphemy in 1650 on the basis of his prophetic text Fiery Flying Rolle (1650). It is probable that the work was considered dangerous because of its overt Leveller ideals and its suggestion of male and female equality. A later work, Copp's

Return (1651) is a quasi-recantation. Bib: Pooley, R., English Prose of the Seventeenth Century, 1590 1700

Copyright, The law of

The right of writers, artists and musicians to refuse reproduction of their works. The right is now established law in every civilized country. The first copyright law in England was passed under Oueen Anne in 1700. Before this, it was possible for publishers to publish books without the author's permission, and without allowing him or her any profits from sale, a practice very common during the lifetime of ➤ Shakespeare. Until 1909, the laws of the United States did not adequately safeguard British authors against having their works 'pirated' there, ie published without their permission and without giving them suitable financial return. > Dickens was a main sufferer from this state of affairs, and it greatly angered him.

➤ Shakespeare's plays; Stationers' Register.

Corelli, Marie (1855-1924)

> Pseudonym of novelist Mary Mackay, born in London the illegitimate daughter (though she claimed to be adopted and born in 1864) of Scottish songwriter Charles Mackay. Educated by ⊳ governesses and for a while at a convent, she was a gifted pianist and had intended to take up a musical career, for which she adopted the name Corelli. In 1885 a psychic experience led her to start writing and her novels are sensational, full of trances, swoons, religious conversions and visions. Her first novel, A Romance of Two Worlds (1886), was so successful that she abandoned music to become a professional writer. Her great popularity occured with Barabbas: A Dream of The World's Tragedy (1886), despite unfavourable reviews, and of her twenty-eight best-selling novels, The Sorrows of Satan (1895) had a greater initial sale than any previous English novel. After 1901 she lived with her friend, Bertha Vyver, in Stratford-upon-Avon, and never married. Her popularity declined into ridicule before her death. Other novels include The Mighty Atom (1896) and Boy (1900)

➤ Sensation, Novel of.

Bib: Coates, E.G., Life; Bigland, E., Marie

Corelli: The Woman and the Legend; Masters, B.,

Now Barabbas Was a Rotter: The Extraordinary

Life of Marie Corelli.

Corey, Katherine (?1635-?)

Actress, Katherine Corey (née Mitchell) claimed to be the first professional English actress; she may have played Dol Common in a production of ▷ Ben Jonson's ▷ The Alchemist in December 1660, and certainly played the part in 1664.

Coriolanus (?1608)

A ➤ tragedy by ➤ Shakespeare about a legendary Roman hero (5th century BC). Shakespeare took the story from the Lives by > Plutarch translated into English by > Sir Thomas North. A war is being waged between Rome and the neighbouring city of Corioli, capital city of the Volscians. The hero of the play, Caius Marcius, wins the title Coriolanus for his heroism against the enemy. But Rome is morally at war within herself: the arrogant patricians (aristocrats) despise the plebs, or common people, who in turn are factious and disorderly. Coriolanus differs from his fellow patricians only in being still prouder than they are, in that he cannot stoop to flatter the plebs for their votes. They succeed in expelling him from the city, whereupon he allies himself with the Volscians and returns to destroy it. His mother, Volumnia, who embodies the qualities of the arrogant patricians and has herself bred her son to value his pride above all. succeeds in deterring him; he is then assassinated by the Volscians as a traitor. The tragedy has peculiar interest for its study of social influence on the individual, and it is difficult to determine whether society, as embodied by the mob/group, is unthinking or reasonable. It is less popular than some other tragedies by Shakespeare, but it is certainly among the finest of his plays.

Corn Laws, Repeal of the, 1846

The Corn Laws existed to protect English homegrown corn from competition from imported foreign corn. Their existence made for higher food prices and assumed the superior importance of agricultural interest over urban industrial interests. In the first half of the 19th century the Tory party derived its main support from landowners, whereas the Whigs owed much of their support to the new industrialists of the rapidly growing industrial towns. The Whig Anti-Corn Law League consequently represented not merely opposition to a particular measure but rivalry between main segments of society; moreover, the workers, anxious above all for cheap food, supported the urban middle class and the Whigs. It was nonetheless a Tory Prime Minister, > Robert Peel, who repealed the Corn Laws under pressure of a severe famine in Ireland. The abolition of the Corn Laws was of historic importance in several ways: 1 it divided the Tory party, sending its younger leader, > Benjamin Disraeli, into opposition, with his supporters, against Peel; 2 it began the era of > free trade (ie trade unrestricted by import or export taxes); 3 it acknowledged implicitly that industrial interests were henceforth to be regarded as more important than agricultural interests; 4 it relieved the almost revolutionary restlessness of the working class, so that England was one of the few countries in Europe not to undergo upheaval or serious threat of upheaval in the Year of Revolutions, 1848.

➤ Hungry Forties, The.

Corneille, Pierre (1606–84)
One of the great French classical dramatists whose work exiled English writers encountered during the ▷ Interregnum. His dramas, Le Cid (1636–7), Horace, Polyeucte and Cinna (between 1640 and 1643), debate the conflict between duty and love, passion and honour, and highlight the difficulties posed by the heroic ethos. They show the influence also of the neo-classical conception of the unities (▷ classical unities) Corneille's critical essays (the Examens and the Discours) were pioneers in serious drama criticism. ▷ Dryden was an admirer, but his heroic dramas did not match Corneille's attainments.

Cornford, Frances (1886-1960)

Poet. Although Frances Cornford's poetic career spans the period of high ▷ modernism, she was essentially a ▷ Georgian poet, producing accessible, pastoral lyrics which often celebrate the life of and landscape around Cambridge, where she lived. She was a friend of many of the Georgians, especially ▷ Rupert Brooke, as well as being the mother of 1930s poet John Cornford and the grand-daughter of Charles Darwin. Her works include: Poems (1910); Autumn Midnight (1923); Travelling Home (1948); Collected Poems (1954); On a Calm Shore (1960). Bib: Anderson, A., A Bibliography of the Writings of Frances Cornford; Delancy, P., The Neo-Pagans.

Cornhill Magazine, The

A monthly periodical, at the height of its fame soon after its foundation by ▷ William Thackeray, the novelist, in 1860. Contributors included ▷ John Ruskin, ▷ Matthew Arnold, ▷ Mrs Gaskell, ▷ Anthony Trollope and ▷ Leslie Stephen, besides Thackeray himself. It continued this century to publish the work of many writers.

Cornwall, Barry

> Proctor, Bryan Waller.

Corombona, Vittoria

The tragic female protagonist of > The White Devil by > John Webster. Her resilience in the face of adversity combined with her lack of sexual and moral integrity render her a fascinating and emancipated character. This is evident particularly in the famous trial scene when she emerges as morally no more guilty than her accusers, who use the full panoply of the law to pursue their spurious ends against her.

Corpus Christi, The Feast of

A festival of the Roman Catholic Church in honour of the Holy Sacrament. It was ordained in 1264 by Pope Urban IV. By the 15th century it was the principal Church feast in the year, and was associated with the performance of → mystery plays.

Corpus Christi Plays

➤ Cycle plays.

Corsair, The (1814)

A narrative poem in heroic ⊳ couplets by > Lord Byron, Conrad, who has become a pirate for some mysterious reason, disguises himself as a dervish in order to gain entry to the palace of the pasha, Seyd. In the fight which ensues he insists that his men must not invade Seyd's harem ('wrong not on your lives/ One female form'), and Sevd's wife Gulnare, described decorously as 'the trembling fair', consequently falls in love with him. All his men are killed and Conrad is thrown into a dungeon to await a slow death next day. Gulnare sets him free, but when he realizes that she has murdered her own husband, Conrad is filled with revulsion. He returns to his island to find that his faithful consort Medora has died in his absence, upon which he himself mysteriously disappears. The poem's self-indulgent blend of escapist adventure, condescending sexism and glamorous exoticism, made it one of the most popular of Byron's poems.

Cortegiano, Il (The Courtier)

➤ Castiglione, Baldassare.

Cotton, Priscilla (d 1664)

Pamphleteer. Cotton was a Quaker, who was imprisoned in Exeter gaol for preaching with her compatriot, Mary Cole. She is noteworthy as the first woman to write in defence of women preaching in To the Priests and the People of England (1655). This represented a general trend amongst Puritan women to speak openly of their faith, since the authority to preach (God's) was higher than that which forbade them to do so (man's). Cotton's other works provide similar forthright defences of women and Quakers (As I was in the Prison House (1656), A Briefe Description (1659) and A Visitation of Love (1661)).

Bib: H. Hinds in Cerasano, S. P. and Wynne-Davies, M. (eds.), Gloriana's Face.

Counter-Reformation

A movement in the Catholic Church to counter the Protestant ➤ Reformation. It arose from the Council of Trent (1545-63) composed of the ecclesiastical leaders of the Catholic Church. The only important English writer to be influenced by the Counter-Reformation was the poet ➤ Richard Crashaw.

Countess Kathleen, The (1892)

A verse play by \triangleright W. B. Yeats. Its theme is a woman who sells her soul to the devil in order to save the poor from starvation. It marks the beginning of Yeats' career as a poetic dramatist, and was one of the plays used by the Irish Literary Theatre as a starting-point.

➤ Abbey Theatre.

Country Wife, The (1675)

Comedy by ➤ William Wycherley. The irrational jealousy of Pinchwife, instead of keeping his naïve country wife faithful to him, puts ideas into her head which are encouraged by the libertine Horner. Horner has convinced the men of the town that he is impotent, but secretly seduces several of their wives. Most treat him merely as a means for their sexual satisfaction, and in one of the play's most famous scenes (IV, 3) Horner, pretending as a cover for his activities that he is offering china for sale, tells the women that he has sold out of china, a code meaning that he has exhausted his energy for sexual congress. Margery, the country wife of the title, cares for him more than the others, and is hurt when he rejects her and forces her to return to her husband. Meanwhile Pinchwife's sister, Alithea, is to be married to Sparkish. The latter pretends to affection but is interested only in the money which Alithea will bring as dowry, and takes her for granted. She is attracted to Harcourt, who really loves her, but resists his attentions out of duty to Sparkish. Eventually Sparkish is revealed in his true colours, and she marries Harcourt. The play's chief assets are the comedy of its scenes, heavy with dramatic irony, and the author's caustic wit. Its free treatment of sexuality drew condemnation even in its own time, and there has been critical debate about whether Horner was intended as a hero, to be admired for his cleverness, or a vicious object of Wycherley's satire. It was adapted by > Garrick as The Country Girl (1766).

Couplet

A pair of rhymed lines of verse of equal length. The commonest form is the so-called ▶ heroic couplet of 10 syllables and five stresses in each line. It was first used in ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Legend of Good Women.

A thousand times have I herd men telle That ther is joye in heven, and peyne in

The heroic couplet had its most prolific period between 1660 and 1790 when many poets from Dryden to Dryden to Crabbe used it; its master was ⊳ Pope:

Most souls, 'tis true, but peep out once an age, Dull sullen pris'ners in the body's cage (Elegy to an Unfortunate Lady)

➤ Leigh Hunt's 'Abou Ber Adhem' also provides a good example of the couplet:

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!) Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace.

▶ Blank verse was a derivative of the couplet. The 8-syllable (octosyllabic) couplet gives a lighter, less dignified rhythm. It was also used by Chaucer (The Romaunt of the Rose, > The Book of the Duchess, > The House of Fame) in his earlier work. It is less common after 1600 than before, but a notable later user of it is > Jonathan Swift (eg On the Death of Dr Swift). > Keats used it for The Eve of St Mark (1819):

All was silent, all was gloom, Abroad and in the homely room: Down she sat, poor cheated soul! And struck a lamp from the dismal coal.

In the 20th century it was used by ▷ W. H. Auden for his New Year Letter (1941).

Courtly Love

Since the 1950s there has been considerable debate over the historical authenticity of 'courtly love', the term being coined in the late 19th century to refer to a codified, stylized expression of the experience of love, found in medieval European texts. Many of the problems have arisen from the over-rigid use of this term by literary critics. What is clear from considering the literary culture of the 12th century onwards is that the stylized expression of the lover's experience in texts cannot be assimilated and organized into a single code of behaviour or set of procedural 'rules': courtly love is a disparate phenomenon, arising out of the confluence of various literary and philosophical traditions and its definition would vary, to some extent, depending on the provenance of the medieval texts under discussion.

The notion of a refined and ennobling love experience is not a medieval invention; scholars have traced Arabic influences in the modes of expression employed by the ⊳ troubadour poets of 12th-century France, whose work is often taken as the earliest expression of courtly love sentiments in medieval Europe. Classical Latin texts, especially the treatises on the arts and remedies of loving produced by ▷ Ovid, exert a great influence on medieval attempts to formalize and codify the lover's experience. What is distinctive about medieval expressions of courtly love is the development of a range of terms and conventions which portray the love experience in terms of feudal models and ethics: the male lover serves his lady as a member of a court might do his lord; the relationship is one of love service, in which the lady has the power to bestow gifts and rewards to her faithful love-servant. This love service is frequently represented as a refining, disciplined experience which has its own protocol, and there may be a sense of contiguity between the quality of the love experience for the female object of desire and the love of a trascendental, divine subject (indeed the first may lead to the second, as it does in Dante's Divina Commedia and in > Petrarch's Rime Sparse).

'Fin'amor' is an important term within the more general conceptual framework signalled by 'courtly love': it derives from a tradition of moral philosophy and denotes a quality of loving which is not self-seeking, self-gratifying or possessive.

The relationship between the theory and practice of this feudalized love ethic is the subject of literary discussion and debate throughout the medieval period in a wide range of texts. The different versions of the stories of lovers such as ▷ Tristram and Isolde, ▷ Lancelot and Guinevere, illustrate how the issue of the rights and wrongs of loving is a matter for discussion and debate, and not a clear-cut or rigidly codified matter. Even those texts which may appear to offer a more theoretical guide to the rules of courtly love illustrate the way in which love remains a subject of discussion and debate, despite attempts to codify it. One of the texts frequently cited as offering an authoritative guide to courtly love, De Arte Honeste Amandi (The Art of Honourable Loving), written some time in the later 12th century by > Andreas Capellanus, was itself interpreted in very different ways in subsequent centuries, as it is by more recent scholars who hope to find an interpretative key in this work. Debates about the protocol of a lover's behaviour constitute a medieval literary genre in their own right and are often set in the context of a 'Court of Love' of some kind. But considering the relationship between the theory and practice of heterosexual loving can lead to discussions of varying dimensions and import. The influential 13th-century dream-vision poem ▷ Le Roman de la Rose shows how the relationship between the theory and practice of refined loving can become the focal point for an exploration of all the resources of human culture itself. If courtly love is not seen by modern readers as a monolithic concept, but rather as an area of discussion and debate, a nexus point for a wide range of issues from court etiquette to the principles of universal ordering, issues trivial and profound, then the tonal range employed in such texts as > Chaucer's > Parliament of Foulys may be easier to appreciate.

How far the conventionalized modes of representing love experience and ideals in medieval texts influenced and reflected courtly practice at the time is a controversial and complex area, and generalizations are of little profit here. However, the influence of economic and political factors in determining marital arrangements should not be underestimated and, in practice, there seems little room for the exercise of female choice in the arrangements for choosing a legally recognized partner. The conceptual framework offered by the phenomenon of courtly love perhaps served a powerful compensatory function. If this feudalized love ethic arose out of the social circumstances of a specific historic moment, its power to transcend those circumstances and be used as a register for expressing and shaping ideals about loving is demonstrated by its survival through the Renaissance period and beyond.

DOvid.

Bib: Boase, R., The Origin and Meaning of Courtly Love.

Couzyn, Jeni (b 1942)

Poet. Couzyn was born and educated in South Africa, which she left in 1965, and has since become a Canadian citizen, although she lives in Britain. Her volumes of verse include: Flying (1970); Christmas in Africa (1975); Life By Drowning: Selected Poems (1985). Couzyn edited the important 1985 > anthology, The Bloodaxe Book of Contemporary Women Poets, and she also writes for children.

Covent Garden Theatres

In 1732 Edward Shepherd (1670–1747) planned the first Covent Garden Theatre, or Theatre Royal, on the site of the present Royal Opera House, to which the actor-manager ▷ John Rich transferred from Lincoln's Inn Fields. The name derives from a convent which had stood on the site previously. Following the Licensing Act of 1737 (▷ Theatres) the Covent Garden Theatre was one of only three theatres in London to be granted a licence. In 1773 Oliver Goldsmith's ▷ She Stoops to Conquer was staged here for the first time, and ▷ Charles Macklin mounted his innovative production of Macbeth, dressed for the first time in 'Scottish' costume. The present theatre opened in 1858.

Coventry Plays

➤ Cycle plays; N-Town Cycle.

Coverdale, Miles (1488–1568)

➤ Bible in England

Coverley, Sir Roger de

A fictional character invented by the essayist > Sir Richard Steele for the pages of > The Spectator, and developed by his colleague > Joseph Addison. The name was taken from a north country dance, Roger of Coverley. Sir Roger was at first a member of an imaginary club, the Spectator Club, where Steele in his journalist guise of the 'Spectator' purported to be studying human nature. In the hands of Addison, Sir Roger came to take up much more space than the other members; the papers devoted to describing his life (20 by Addison, eight by Steele, and two by Budgell) are much the best known parts of The Spectator. In his conservatism, his devotion to the Church of England, and his kindly but despotic control of his tenants, he is a typical squire of the time, but in his civilized manners he is deliberately made superior to the general run of country squires (compare Squire Western in > Fielding's > Tom Jones). In his simplicity and idiosyncrasies he was individual, with a literary relationship to Don Quixote. Though the 'Coverley Papers' are not a novel, the envisioning of the character is distinctly novelistic, so that they rank among the precursors of the English novel. Addison's especial aim, beyond entertainment, was to civilize the country squire; a secondary aim was the political one of making fun of the Tory English gentry.

Coward, Sir Noël (1899-1973)

British stage and film actor, dramatist and director. He began his theatrical career at the age of 12 acting in a fantasy play called The Goldfish. As a dramatist he gained some notoriety with his early works, The Young Idea (1923), The Vortex (1924), Fallen Angels (1925) and Sirocco (1927), which was greeted with a riot. However his partnership with the promoter and theatre manager C. B. Cochran proved his ability to work creatively and successfully within the commercial theatre. His reputation rests mainly on the six astringent comedies he wrote between 1923 and 1942: Fallen Angels (1925); Hay Fever (1925); Bitter Sweet (1929); Private Lives (1930); Design for Living (1932) and Present Laughter (1942). Bib: Gray, F., Noël Coward; Kiernan, R. F., Noël Coward; Lahr, J., Coward the Playwright.

Cowley, Abraham (1618-67)

Poet and essayist. Ever since Samuel Johnson's disparaging comments on Cowley in his Lives of the Poets (1779–81), Cowley's reputation has suffered, and yet Cowley is one of the most important and influential of the mid-17th-century poets. A Royalist in politics, he accompanied Queen Henrietta Maria into exile in Paris in 1644–6, returned to England in 1654, was imprisoned in 1655 and later released.

His chief works include: Poeticall Blossoms (written 1633), a collection of poetry published in 1656 which contained Pindaric ≥ odes and ≥ elegies on William Harvey among others, and an essay on the advancement of science: A Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy (1661). Cowley's attachment, after the ≥ Civil War, to the figures associated with the early ≥ Royal Society is evidenced both in his important ode celebrating the Royal Society (first published in Thomas Sprat's History of the Royal Society) and in his celebration of scientific figures and their works in his poetry.

As well as celebrating the advance of science, Cowley also composed an unfinished ▶ epic, A Poem on the Late Civil War (1679), which he abandoned at the point when the war began to turn against the Royalist forces. He also anticipated ▶ John Milton's ▶ Paradise Lost in attempting a biblical epic, Davideis ('A sacred poem of the Troubles of David', published in the Poems of 1656). In the 19th century and through much of the 20th, Cowley was read as a species of inferior ➤ John Donne or ➤ Thomas Carew, yet the range of his writing (which embraced'science, ➤ translation and experiments in form and metre as well as critical statements on the nature of poetic discourse) make him an important figure in his own right. Bib: Hinman, R., Abraham Cowley's World of Order, Trotter, D., The Poetry of Abraham Cowley.

Cowley, Hannah (1743-1809)

Poet, novelist and dramatist. The story goes that Cowley began writing plays after being mocked by her husband, who accused her of never actually undertaking any of the projects she planned. The result was thirteen published plays, although since she was very careless of her own writing there may well have been more. Cowley's skill was in comedy and she was adept at turning themes which had centred upon men into plots about women; examples of this gender inversion are The Belle's Stratagem (1780) and A Bold Stroke For a Husband (1783). Her awareness of the precarious role of the female dramatist is made clear in the ironic prologue to The Belle's Stratagem, where a male character complains about the lines she has given him:

... on affairs of state
I might hold faith – yet in her cursed play,
The deuce a word am I allow'd to say;
Or rather coop'd, like other folks we know,
Between two barren adverbs – Ay and no.
Tis thus we're served, when sancy women write –

Cowley also wrote a ▷ Gothic novel, The Italian Marauders (1810), and several long poems. In all Cowley's works the heroines are intelligent and independent women, perfectly able to control the situations in which they find themselves.

Bib: Uphaus, R.W. and Foster, G.M., The 'Other' Eighteenth Century.

Cowper, William (1731-1800)

Poet and letter-writer. Son of the rector of Great Berkhampstead in Hertfordshire, he was called to the bar in 1754, and through family connections was offered the post of Clerk of the Journals in the House of Lords. However, the early death of his mother, his experiences of bullying at public school and a thwarted love affair, had caused severe neurosis which led him to contemplate suicide at the prospect of the clerkship examination. He spent a year in an asylum and thereafter led a retired life on his own private income, first in the home of Morley and Mary Unwin in Huntingdonshire and then after Morley's death with Mary Unwin in Olney. They planned to marry in 1773, but Cowper's conviction of his own personal damnation prevented this.

In Olney he came under the influence of the evangelical Rev. John Newton with whom he published Olney Hymns (1779), including 'Hark my soul! it is the Lord', and 'God moves in a mysterious way'. In 1780 Newton left Olney for London and Cowper's life became less spiritually strenuous. Mary Unwin encouraged him to write, in order to counteract his religious melancholia. His Poems (1782) contain Table Talk, and eight moral satires in heroic > couplets which, though uneven in quality, display a distinctive unforced sententiousness which is one of his most attractive poetic characteristics. The volume also includes Boadicea: an Ode and Verses supposed to be written by Alexander Selkirk ('I am monarch of all I survey'). In the same year Cowper published his famous comic ballad John Gilpin. He made the acquaintance of Lady Austen, who suggested the scheme of the > mock-heroic, discursive poem > The Task: A Poem in Six Books, which appeared in 1785, and is in the more 'natural' medium of blank verse, rather than couplets. He followed this with an undistinguished translation of > Homer (1791). In 1794 Mary Unwin died, and Cowper's only subsequent work is the introspective and despairing Castaway, published after his death, as were his Letters (1803), which are among the most famous in the language.

Cowper's work illustrates the movement away from the public themes of Augustanism towards a more domestic and personal poetry of sensibility. His work eschews brilliance or technical virtuosity, and can be banal. But at their best his > lyrics are delicately moving, and his couplet and blank verse writing achieves an unassuming lucidity of tone, which evokes profound resonances.

> Romanticism.

Bib: Cecil, D., The Stricken Deer; King, J., William Comper: A Biography; Hutchins, B., The Poetry of William Comper; Priestman, M., Comper's Task: Structure and Influence; Newey, V., Comper's Poetry: A Critical Study and Reassessment.

Crabbe, George (1754-1832)

Poet. Crabbe was born at Aldeburgh in Suffolk and his work is intimately associated with the region. He practised medicine before taking orders in 1781. Crabbe's earliest works, The Library (1781) and the anti-pastoral The Village (1783) have an heroic ▷ couplet metre and public, discursive tone already distinctly old-fashioned at the time.

Samuel Johnson (1709-84) gave advice on the composition of the second poem, and in his grimly stoical vision of life and his distrust of pretension and excess, Crabbe resembles Johnson in temperament. The Village is relentless in its rejection of the conventions of literary pastoralism, showing nature with bitter realism as it was known to the poor. In his later works The Parish Register (1807), The Borough (1810), Tales in Verse (1812), Tales of the Hall (1819) he depicts the diverse lives of his parishioners in a series of highly original short stories in couplets, a form which he made peculiarly his own. His best work treats social outcasts and extreme psychological states, as do a number of poems by > William Wordsworth. But where Wordsworth's approach is transcendental and contemplative, Crabbe's involvement with his characters is compassionate in a more downto-earth and intimate way. In Peter Grimes (Letter XXII of The Borough) the landscape of coastal East Anglia becomes an evocative symbol for the protagonist's breakdown and despair. Crabbe's narrative artistry and uncompromising realism were admired by > Jane Austen, who remarked half-seriously that he was the only man she could ever think of marrying. Bib: Crabbe, G. (junior), Life; Pollard, A. (ed.), Crabbe: The Critical Heritage; Bareham, T., George Crabbe; New, P., George Crabbe's Poetry.

Craft Guilds

Medieval societies for the protection and regulation of trade. They grew up in the 13th century out of the already existing merchant guilds, the difference being that the merchant guilds were associations of all the traders in a town, whereas the craft guilds were each limited to a particular craft or line of business. By degrees the craft guilds eliminated the merchant guilds by making them redundant. Each town had its own guilds and part of their function was to protect the trade of that town against competition from 'foreigners'. They gave much-needed security to the exercise of trade in disorderly times, provided some social security to their members in times of need. and settled standards of work and conditions of sale. The members were ▷ master craftsmen. Guilds declined fairly rapidly in the 16th century as the capitalist, free-enterprise employers became more numerous; the guild system was too restrictive of trade to be compatible with > capitalism. For the study of literature, one of the main interests of the craft guilds was their performance of ⊳ cycle plays at festivals, especially > Corpus Christi.

Craig, Edward Gordon (1872–1966)
Son of actress Ellen Terry and designer E. W. Godwin, and one of the most influential of early 20th-century stage designers. He began his theatrical career working with Henry Irving at the Lyceum, though disillusionment with English theatre led him to spend much of his time on the continent. Most of his highly innovative designs were never actually put into practice, but of those that were his most famous were for a production of Hamlet at the Moscow Art Theatre, in 1912, and ▷ Ibsen's The Pretenders at the Royal Danish Theatre, Copenhagen, in 1926. His influential theories on the crucial role of the theatre designer and the importance of expressive, poetic movement are explored in his books, The Art of the Theatre (1905); On the Art of the Theatre (1911); Towards a New Theatre (1907); The Marionette (1918); The Theatre Advancing (1921); Books and Theatres (1925).

Bib: Craig, E., Gordon Craig; Innes, C., Edward Gordon Craig.

Craik, Dinah Mulock (1826-87)

Novelist and essayist, who also wrote poetry and short stories. She was born in Stoke-on-Trent, the daughter of a nonconformist clergyman who was feckless and eccentric and was committed as a pauper lunatic in the 1830s. She wrote prolifically - novels, plays, poetry, biography, > travel books, didactic essays and children's stories - to help support her family. After an unsettled childhood she lived with her brother in London, becoming well-known in literary society and marrying George Craik, a partner in Macmillan's publishing house, in 1865. Her first novel was The Ogilvies (1849), and her most famous > 7ohn Halifax, Gentleman (1856). Craik's fiction is predominantly sentimental and romantic, but it also questions traditional sex roles and often depicts female characters attempting to discover autonomous identities. Her novels include The Head of the Family (1852), Agatha's Husband (1853), Christian's Mistake (1865) and The Woman's Kingdom (1869). Her non-fiction includes A Woman's Thoughts About Women (1858), Plain Speaking (1882), and Concerning Men and Other Papers (1888). These essays address the need for female self-reliance, offering advice to women on ways to gain independence. She was not a radical writer, but nevertheless contributed to the exploration of woman's role in the Victorian period. She was also a shrewd negotiator and businesswomen, but a generous one, using a pension granted to her in 1864 to help needy authors.

➤ Women's Movement; Children's literature. Bib: Foster, S., Victorian Women's Fiction: Marriage, Freedom and the Individual.

Craik, Helen (c 1750-1825)

Poet and novelist. A ▷ Scottish writer who was encouraged by ▷ Robert Burns, Craik's poetry is now hardly read and recent criticism has focused upon her ▷ Minerva novels. Her prose writing tends towards the gloomy and fantastic, but her characters are well-drawn and introduce a realistic element into the otherwise far-fetched nature of the narrative. Among her novels are: Julia de Saint Pierre (1796), Henry of Northumberland, or The Hermit's cell (1800) and The Nun and Her Daughter (1805).

> Scottish literature in English.

Cramond, Elizabeth (d 1651)

Devotional writer. Cramond was the author of A Ladies Legacie to her Daughters (1645) which consists of three separate sets of prayers drawn from her own personal experiences. The first consoles her daughters for their lack of monetary inheritance, the second is a series of devotions written upon the death of her second husband, and the third was meant to bring private solace during a protracted illness.

Cranford (1853)

A novel by > Elizabeth Gaskell (1810-65), first published in > Household Words (ed. ➤ Charles Dickens) 1851–3. It is the best known of her novels. The town of Cranford is actually based on Knutsford, some 17 miles from Manchester. The book describes the life of the predominantly feminine genteel society of the place. Though apparently very slight, it contains graphic description, and subtle, ironic humour resembling > Jane Austen's. Gaskell's moral judgments, like those of Austen, are implicated with class discriminations: the novel attempts to distinguish between the vulgar arrogance of the merely rich and the sensitive, humane pride of the gentility. Its most famous characters are the blatant and ostentatious Honourable Mrs Iamieson and, in contrast, the timid, retiring, yet distinguished Miss Matty.

Cranmer, Thomas (1489-1556)

Archbishop of Canterbury, and responsible for the Book of Common Prayer (1549 and 1552) containing the liturgy of the ➤ Church of England. He was made Archbishop of Canterbury by ➤ Henry VIII during the king's conflict with the Papacy, and supported his rejection of the Pope's authority (➤ Act of Supremacy, 1534), the starting-point of the Church of England. Under Henry's Roman Catholic daughter, ➤ Queen Mary I, Cranmer renounced his opinions, but repudiated his renunciation when he was burnt at the stake in 1556. He is especially important for the literary value of his Prayer Book.

➤ Common Prayer, Book of. Bib: Ridley, J., Thomas Cranmer.

Crashaw, Richard (?1612-49)

Poet. He belongs to the ➤ Metaphysical school of English poets, but in a special sense. In 1645 he became a Roman ➤ Catholic, despairing of the survival of the Church of England at that stage of the ➤ Civil War. He earlier came under the influence of the work of the Italian baroque poet Giovanni Battista Marino (1569-1625), whose extravagance of imagery to some extent resembled the drawing together of unlike ideas into a single image that typified the English metaphysicals. Although Crashaw was perhaps the most sensuous of the English poets of this tendency, his Catholicism and the influence of Marino give to Crashaw's ecstasy an impersonal quality quite different from the direct, very personal devotional poetry of ▷ Donne and ➤ George Herbert – the latter of whom had been Crashaw's first master. Crashaw's masterpiece is his Hymn to Saint Theresa; the one that shows his extravagances most obtrusively is The Weeper. His poems were published in 1646 in one volume under the titles Steps to the Temple and The Delights of the Muses.

Bib: Roberts, J. R. (ed.), New Perspectives on the Life and Art of Richard Crashaw; Warren, A., Richard Crashaw; White, H. C., The Metaphysical Poets; Williamson, G., The Donne Tradition.

Crécy, Battle of (1346)

The first major victory of the English in the Hundred Years' War which was brought about by the English yeomen as archers, using the longbow. For military history, this meant the beginning of the end of the domination of war by the mounted knight in armour, and the beginning of the importance of infantry. The English forces were commanded by Edward III and the French by King Philip VI.

➤ Archery.

Cresseid, The Testament of > Testament of Cresseid.

Cressida

The lover of the Trojan prince Troilus in medieval and post-medieval versions of the Troy story who is involuntarily separated from Troilus when forced to join her father Calchas in the Greek camp (Calchas, a priest, has previously deserted the Trojan side). In the Greek camp she becomes the lover of Diomedes. She first appears in this role in the 12thcentury text, the Roman de Troie, composed by Benoît de Sainte-Maure (in which she is called 'Briseida') and it is possible that the figure of Briseis, a lover of Achilles, whose story features in one of ▷ Ovid's Heroides, provides a precedent for the development of the Briseida character. The form of her name changes as the story of her love affair with Troilus is amplified and reworked by a series of writers from Benoît onwards, notably > Boccaccio (Criseida), > Chaucer (Criseyde), > Robert Henryson (Cresseid), and ➤ Shakespeare (Cressida).

➤ Troy.

Cricket on the Hearth, The (1846)

A Christmas book by \triangleright Charles Dickens, one of a series started by \triangleright A Christmas Carol, 1843. It is a tale in which the evil schemes of old Tackleton to injure the married love of Peerybingle and his young wife, Dot, and to marry May Fielding are frustrated by the magic of the Cricket and by a mysterious stranger.

Crimean War

A war between the Russians and the British, French and Ottoman Turkish which took place between October 1853 and February 1856, and was fought mainly on the Crimean Peninsular. It was caused primarily by an act of aggression by Russia against the Ottoman sultan and by a dispute between Russia and France concerning the holy lands in Palestine. Britain fought in defence of the Turks and major engagements took place at the Alma River on September 20, at Balaklava on October 25, and at Inkerman on November 5, 1854. In addition to high war casualties, disease accounted for the deaths of over a quarter of a million of the men lost on both sides. The British conscience was stirred by reports of the appalling conditions endured by sick and wounded servicemen, and women were urged to join the troops as nurses.

Among those who volunteered was the pioneer of the nursing profession Florence Nightingale (1820-1910). She arrived at the barrack hospital at Scutari, Turkey on November 5, 1854 where she was put in charge of nursing. Due to the initial hostility of doctors to female presence on the wards, Nightingale and her nurses were forced to stand by and watch as casualties died in overcrowded and insanitary conditions plagued by fleas and rats. When finally allowed to help she began by scrubbing down the wards and washing the patients' clothes. Her individual care of the wounded soldiers earned her the soubriquet 'The Lady with the Lamp'. Nightingale became a national hero and her efforts helped establish the Royal Commission on the Health of the Army in May 1857. This in turn led to the founding of the Army Medical School in the same year. Using her considerable private funds, and money raised by public subscription to commemorate her work in the Crimea, she set up the Nightingale School for Nurses at St Thomas' Hospital in 1860, which was the first nursing school of its kind.

The Crimean War stirred a certain amount of jingoism in England. ▷ Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, defended it as necessary to the maintenance of public law in Europe and doubled income tax in 1854 in order to pay for Britain's involvement. Just prior to the outbreak of hostilities in the Crimea, Tennyson wrote of 'the blood-red blossom of war' in his long poem Maud but added six lines in 1856 to suggest that the speaker of these lines was deranged. Maud nevertheless retains its bellicosity and is suffused with references to the Crimean War. Tennyson also marked the disastrous events at Balaklava in his patriotic poem > 'The Charge of the Light Brigade' (1854). An opposing point of view is expressed by ➤ Sydney Dobell, a member of the so-called > Spasmodic school of poetry. In his England in Time of War (1856), jingoism gives way to compassion for the tragic personal consequences of war. In similar vein > Newman, moved and enraged by reports concerning the state of the British army in the Crimea, wrote a series of letters to the Catholic Herald in 1855 entitled 'Who's to Blame?'. Minor novelist Thomas William Robertson (1829-71) wrote Ours (1866) which deals with the private lives of British officers serving in the Crimea. It also exploits the pathos and ironies of war in general, and the Crimean War in particular. The Crimean War features in the play Birth (1870) by Thomas William Robertson, ➤ Thackeray's The Rose and the Ring (1855) and D Charles Kingsley's The Heroes (1856).

Critic, The: Or, a Tragedy Rehearsed (1779) Satiric comedy by ➤ Richard Brinsley Sheridan, using the 'play within a play' technique employed in > The Rehearsal in order to mock contemporary dramatic technique. In the first act Dangle discusses with his wife, a fellow theatregoer called Sneer, and the author, Sir Fretful Plagiary, the fact that a new tragedy, The Spanish Armada, is being prepared at > Drury Lane. In the second and third acts, Puff invites the three men to observe a rehearsal of his play, which concerns the approach of the Armada. Tilburnia, daughter of the governor of Tilbury Fort, expresses her love for one of the Spanish prisoners, Don Ferolo Whiskerandos. As in The Rehearsal, the acting of the absurd play is accompanied by the fatuous explanations and instructions of the author, and scathing comments of his guests. The play ends with the destruction of the Spanish fleet, and strains of 'Rule Britannia', > Handel's 'Water Music', and the march from Judas Maccabaeus. The tragedy was intended to satirize the works of dramatists such as ▷ Colman and ▷ Cumberland, of whom Sir Fretful Plagiary is a caricature. The play was acted 131 times before 1800.

Critique

A term used in critical theory. Traditional conceptions of 'criticism' have privileged the acts of judgement and comparison but have often anchored them in the unspecified sensitivity of the reader. Criticism pre-supposes a direct relationship between reader and literary text; the reader responds to the stimulus of particular verbal forms which are evaluated according to their appeal to a universal human condition. The practice of 'critique', in a literary context, however, concerns itself not just with producing readings of primary texts and accounting for those social, cultural, or psychological motivations which are responsible for its appearance in a particular form, but also with appraising critical readings of those texts. Critique addresses itself to questions of why individual texts should be accorded importance at particular historical moments, and implicates 'criticism' in its more traditional guise as a process whereby meanings are constructed, as opposed to being passively discovered.

Cromwell, Oliver (1599-1658)

Chief commander of the Parliamentarian forces in the ➤ Civil War against ➤ Charles I and Lord Protector of the Realm (1653-8) in place of a king. He belonged to the landowning class in the east of England and supported the Independents among the Puritans. It was his generalship that defeated the forces of Charles I and the Scottish supporters of ▷ Charles II after the execution of Charles I. After his death, his son, Richard Cromwell, succeeded as Lord Protector for some months, after which Charles II was restored by the action of one of Oliver's generals, General Monk, in 1660. After 1660 he suffered the censure of his political opponents and it was not until Thomas Carlyle published Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches (1845) that his stature was generally appreciated. Bib: Fraser, A., Cromwell Our Chief of Men.

Cromwell, Thomas (1485–1540)
Chief minister of ➤ Henry VIII; organized the dissolution of the English monasteries in 1536 and 1539. His sister married Morgan Williams; their son adopted the name of Cromwell and was the direct ancestor of ➤ Oliver Cromwell. Bib: Elton, G. R., Thomas Cromwell.

Crotchet Castle (1831)

A novel by ➤ Thomas Love Peacock. The plot is unimportant, and the novel consists mainly of witty talk, burlesquing and satirizing contemporary attitudes and ideas. A crotchet is an eccentric and frivolous notion or prejudice. Some of the characters are representatives of intellectual tendencies, eg MacQuedy, a Scots economist whose name suggests 'Q.E.D.' (quod erat demonstrandum), stands for the excessive rationalism of the political economists and utilitarians of the age. On the other hand, Mr Skionar stands for the poet, critic and philosopher, ▷ S. T. Coleridge, and burlesques his transcendental mysticism. Mr Chainmail stands for the sentimental cult of the 'Gothic', ie the romance and sensationalism of the cult of the Middle Ages, familiar from the historical novels of ➤ Walter Scott and from the ➤ Gothic novels of the previous generation. Sanity is represented by Dr. Folliott, a clergyman, a character of robust and cheerful common sense.

Crowe, Catherine (?1800-72)

Novelist and short story writer, born in Kent. She married Lt Col John Crowe in 1822 and moved to Edinburgh until the death of her husband in 1860, after which she went to live in Folkestone. A prolific writer, she is bestknown for her collection of supernatural stories, Night Side of Nature or Ghosts and Ghost Stories (1848), which ran to several editions. She also wrote plays, her first work being the tragedy Aristomedus, published anonymously in 1838. Her novel Susan Hopley (1841) was successfully adapted for the stage, and The Cruel Kindness (1853), a drama, was performed at the Haymarket Theatre. Other novels include Manorial Rights (1839), Linny Dawson (1847) and, for children, Adventures of a Monkey (1861). Bib: Sergeant, A., Women Novelists of Queen

Crowley, Aleister (1875-1947)

Victoria's Reign.

Magician, novelist and poet. Aleister Crowley, once dubbed by the Daily Mail, 'the Wickedest Man in the World', has become the lurid paradigm of post-Symbolist diabolism. His hedonistic sexual and pharmacological activities (leading to his famous motto, 'Do What Thou Wilt Shall Be The Whole Of The Law') have led to his celebration and denigration as a precursor to 1960s permissiveness. It is hard to separate prolificity and charlatanry in Crowley's work. However, the novels The Diary of a Drug Fiend (1922) and Moonchild (1929) have retained their power to provoke. Crowley's attempts to found an influential cult collapsed, and he died, addicted to heroin, in a Hastings boarding house.

Crowne, John (?1640-?1703)

Dramatist. Crowne published a > romance in 1665, and his first play, Juliana, or the Princess of Poland, a tragi-comedy, in 1671. Thereafter, he experimented with various genres: a court > masque, Calisto; a tragedy, Andromache; and a comedy based on a play by > Molière (Le Sicilien ou L'amour peintre), The Country Wit, all appeared in 1675. The heroic verse tragedy, The Destruction of Jerusalem, was performed in two parts in 1677. Several political plays followed. Crowne became a favourite of ➤ Charles II, and later Queen Mary (➤ Mary II). His greatest success, Sir Courtly Nice; Or, It Cannot Be (1685), modelled on a Spanish play (> Spanish influence on English literature), remained popular for over a century. Bib: McMullin, B. J., The Comedies of John Crowne: A Critical Edition.

Cruelty, Theatre of ➤ Theatre of Cruelty.

Cruikshank, George (1792–1878) Illustrator, with a strong satirical and moralistic bent: famous especially for his illustrations to Charles Dickens' novel Oliver Twist. He also illustrated works by Burns,
 Scott and
 Thackeray and produced many political caricatures.

Crusades, The

Military expeditions from Western Christendom which were represented as spiritual in motivation to recover the Holy Land, and in particular the Holy City of Jerusalem, from the Muslims (though in practice, these expeditions might have a variety of political and economic motivations also). Nine crusades have attracted the attention of modern historians as the most important, from the first proclaimed by Pope Urban II in 1095, which made Godfrey of Bouillon King of Jerusalem in 1099, to that on which St Louis died (King Louis IX of France) in 1270. In the thirteenth century, the term crusade (which derives from the sign of the cross which distinguished its participants) was also used to refer to military expeditions against heretics (such as the Albigensians) and expeditions against the political enemies of the pope.

Crystal Palace

> Exhibition, The Great.

Cuchulain

In Irish myth the hero of a cycle of prose legends called the Cuchulain or Ulster cycle (9th−13th centuries AD). In English, he is chiefly known by the poems and plays about him by ▷ W. B. Yeats. Yeats' work issued from his support of Irish nationalism, which revived interest in the Irish myths, and led to the publication of English versions of them.

▶ Irish literature in English.Bib: Hull, E., The Cuchulain Saga.

Culler, Jonathan (b 1944)

Academic and critic whose works have done much to introduce English-speaking audiences to the works of ⊳ structuralist and ⊳ post-structuralist critics. His major studies include Structuralist Poetics (1975), The Pursuit of Signs (1981) and On Deconstruction (1983). He is Professor of English and Comparative Literature at Cornell University.

Culloden, Battle of (1746)

A battle in the north of Scotland in the 1745

> Jacobite Rebellion on behalf of the House of > Stuart in the attempt to recover the British throne from the House of Hanover, which had been installed by Parliament in 1714. The Jacobites, consisting mainly of Scottish Highland clans commanded by Prince Charles Edward Stuart ('Bonnie Prince Charlie'), were decisively defeated by the Duke of Cumberland – Butcher Cumberland to his enemies. Not only did Culloden end the rebellion but it practically put an end to the Highland clan system, which remains chiefly in name by force of romantic nostalgia.

> Old Pretender, The; Scotland; Scottish literature in English.

Cultural Materialism

The most important book in the formation of cultural materialism is Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfield's collection of essays Political Shakespeare (1985), whose foreword acts as a manifesto for this radical Marxist criticism. The authors themselves trace the origins of the theory to géneral dissatisfaction in the British academic world with the traditional essentialism humanism of existing criticism and the rise of numerous alternative approaches (> feminism, structuralism, > psychoanalytic criticism). Apart from a debt to the political commitment to change, derived from Marxism, cultural materialism also draws upon Raymond Williams' cultural analysis which 'seeks to describe the whole system of significations by which a society or a section of it understands itself and its relations with the world' (Political Shakespeare). Thus, cultural materialism rejects any notion of 'high culture', and sets material values in the place of the idealism of conventional criticism, looking instead at texts in history. Cultural materialism also has links with new historicism (particularly the work of Stephen Greenblatt) in its emphasis upon the nature of subjectivity and the decentring of man, and with feminism, where the exploration of the gendered human subject is an overlapping interest. Antagonistic to the (allegedly) ahistorical and dangerously apolitical conclusions of ⊳ deconstruction, a sceptical and combative tone, together with an interest in decentring, is nevertheless common to both, suggesting an increased disillusion with traditional, this is to say, humanist, literary criticism ➤ Post-structuralism.

Culture

Despite its widespread use, culture remains one of the most difficult of words in the modern critical vocabulary. It is used in two, broad senses. First, it indicates a group of products (eg art objects or books) or personal acquisitions (eg 'refined tastes' or the appreciation of art) or activities (eg visiting the theatre or classical music concerts) which are deemed to be of considerable value or status in a society. The other sense carries different evaluative connotations and refers to the activities of a particular way of life. Thus we might speak, for example, of French culture or working-class culture. Here is indicated, therefore, a whole spread of activities which define the distinctive 'Frenchness' or 'working-classness' of a way of life and these might well include some or all of the activities mentioned above. But this second usage would tend to avoid connotations of superior, learned or elite tastes or habits.

Five different usages of the word are detectable in literary studies.

- 1 In the first place, culture is distinguished from ignorance or crudeness when a person becomes 'cultivated'.
- 2 Culture is opposed to the worlds of work and money, and is therefore associated with recreation, fine living or higher values. (The connection with aristocratic values and lifestyles in this association is obvious.)

3 Culture is opposed to popular or 'mass' forms of activity. Here, culture is often associated with the 'high-brow', the privileged or elite.

4 Culture refers to the special province of human creativity and therefore to possibilities for improvement, either personal or general

5 Finally, one tradition of radical, Marxist-influenced theory pictures culture negatively. In this line of thinking, it is associated with ideology, and its function is to shackle human thought and imagination in the interests of the status quo (▷ Myth).

It is clear, therefore, that the idea of culture is enmeshed with strong value judgements and, typically, in much literary commentary of the late 10th and early 20th centuries (for example, that of ▷ Matthew Arnold, ▷ T. S. Eliot and F. R. Leavis), the world of high, or minority, culture was opposed to the assumed degradation of moral or spiritual standards brought on by industrialization, modern commercialism and mass culture. Though lip-service was paid to the idea of culture as a 'whole way of life', in practice it was somewhat exclusively identified with traditional institutions like the Church and with the literary canon. More recent commentary, however, has taken different directions. The term 'popular culture' has flourished, and attention is given to forms of writing and cultural production which had been previously despised (film and television for example). The idea of cultural identity has also become a key term, often in relation to writing produced in societies composed of social groups with divergent traditions and interests, for example post-colonial societies (> Colonialism).

In contemporary literary studies several trends are therefore apparent. There is still an interest in what has been called the 'culture and society' tradition of thought based around writers of the late 19th and early 20th centuries from Arnold to > George Orwell. But, more widely, a tradition of cultural studies has been established in which literary works are studied as part of the analysis of the general cultural environment of a period alongside non-literary, non-canonical or popular material. This often includes visual as well as written products. In some quarters, this has become known as > 'cultural materialism' and signals an approach to cultural artefacts which stresses their social.

political, intellectual and economic origins and functions rather than their aesthetic, moral or spiritual qualities.

Bib: Ross, A., No Respect: Intellectuals and Popular Culture; Williams, R., Culture and Society 1780–1950; Culture.

Culture and Anarchy (1869)

A volume of essays by > Matthew Arnold, originally published as articles in > The Cornhill Magazine. It is subtitled An Essay in Political and Social Criticism and was designed to demonstrate that culture was the best remedy for the political, social and religious unrest that, in his view, characterized England at that time. Arnold defined the main purpose of culture as the stimulation of intelligence and reason. Its advance was blocked by certain inequalities, confusions and imbalances within English life which, unchecked by an adequate centre of authority, threatened to slide towards anarchy. Arnold distinguishes between two categories of mind in contemporary society: the Hebraic, with its emphasis on the virtues of private conduct and practical achievement: and the Hellenic, which valued contemplation, reason and critical discrimination. England, he considered, was becoming barbarous owing to the preponderance of the former over the latter, with which he identified. The answer to the conflict lay in culture with its emphasis on the development of the individual within the broader framework of society, its commitment to the growth of the moral life and its aspirations towards perfection.

Cumberland, Richard (1732-1811)

Dramatist, poet, novelist, translator, essayist, associated with the rise of sentimental domestic comedy on the English stage. He began writing poetry while still a pupil at school in Bury St Edmunds. After further education at Westminster School and Cambridge University he published his first play, The Banishment of Cicero in 1761. Disappointed in his career aspirations in government, he turned to writing for the stage in earnest. He continued this activity even after his political fortunes improved, eventually completing over 50 plays, operas, and adaptations of plays. His first success of any consequence was with the comedy, The Brothers, in 1769. In 1770 he wrote his most famous play, generally considered his best, The West Indian, which the actor David Garrick (1717-79) staged in the following year. Even so his work was often under attack for its supposed sentimentality, and Sheridan satirized him as the vain and defensive Sir Fretful Plagiary in The Critic (1779). However, Cumberland was sympathetic to the causes of others, especially outcast and vilified groups. He defended the Jews in The Jew (1794), which was translated into several languages, including Yiddish and Hebrew, and remained popular well into the 19th century. The Jew of Mogadore (1808) again portrays a Jew in a kindly light, and Cumberland also defended Jews in articles in The Observer, written under a Jewish pseudonym. His efforts did much to rescue Jews from the villainous anti-Semitic image hitherto afforded them on the stage. In addition to plays, he wrote two novels, translations of Greek plays, ▶ epic poetry, and pamphlets expressing his views on controversial topics of the day.

Bib: Borkat, R. F. S. (ed.), The Plays of Richard Cumberland.

Cunningham, Lady Margaret (?-c 1622) Scottish author of letters and an > autobiography, her work is not well known, but her life story provides dramatic and romantic reading. Cunningham was married to Sir James Hamilton of Crawfordjohn in 1598, but her strong Protestant faith and moral values soon clashed with his Catholic convictions and boorish behaviour. When reconciled she wrote him passionate letters and verses in which she attempted to reform him, but after their final separation in 1608 she wrote of how he had denied her food and shut her out of their home. Cunningham had 11 children, five by Crawfordjohn and six by her second, happier marriage to Sir James Maxwell of Calderwood. Her autobiography was published in 1827 and is available at the National Library of Scotland.

Cursor Mundi

An encyclopaedic verse narrative in English, dating from around 1300, originating in the north of England, which recounts Christian history from Creation to Doomsday with a particular emphasis on the mediating role of the Virgin Mary. The Cursor Mundi literally 'courses over' Christian history but it also travels as a text through England; a southern version is extant. Eight manuscript copies of Cursor Mundi survive of varying length (the longest running to 30,000 lines of octosyllabic verse).

Curtis, Tony (b 1946)

Poet, short story writer, editor and critic. Tony Curtis was born in Carmarthen and educated at University College, Swansea, and at Goddard College, Vermont, USA. His teaching career took him to schools in Cheshire and Yorkshire before he secured a lecturer's post at Glamorgan College of Education in Barry. This institution's merger with the Polytechnic of Wales at Treforest, Pontypridd, ultimately led to his becoming the first Professor of Poetry to be appointed in Wales when the Polytechnic was elevated to the status of University of Glamorgan. Tony Curtis has been a lively crusader for the cause of poetry not only in Wales but also in Europe and North America, this contributing to a breadth of vision in his work in a historical overview that places Welshness in an international context and looks beyond the narrower and more parochial concerns that sometimes influence Anglo-Welsh poetry. This is most evident in the new poems placed first in his Selected volume. His poetry charts the nuances of living in the modern world, illuminating situations concerned with family or place in a compassionate and perceptive manner. His earliest poems appeared in Walk Down A Welsh Wind (1972) and in Three Young Anglo-Welsh Poets (1974) which also included poems by Nigel Jenkins and Duncan Bush. Since then, Tony Curtis' poetry collections have been Album (1974), Preparations (1980), Letting Go (1983), Selected Poems (1986), The Last Candles (1989), Taken for Pearls (1993) and War Voices (1995). He has also published a collection of short stories and prose poems Out of the Dark Wood (1977), a monograph on Dannie Abse in the Writers of Wales series (1985), and as well as editing Madog, an arts magazine, in his early years at the Polytechnic of Wales, he has also edited two volumes of critical essays, The Art of Seamus Heaney (1982) and Wales: The Imagined Nation (1993), and finally, with Sian James, an anthology of poetry and prose, Love from Wales, in 1991. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales.

Curzon, Sarah Anne (1833–98) Born Sarah Vincent in Birmingham, England, she married Robert Curzon, and emigrated with him to Canada in 1862. She was a strong advocate of suffrage and education, contributed to many journals, and wrote a column on women's issues. Laura Secord, the Heroine of 1812: A Drama, And Other Poems (1887) and The Story of Laura Secord, 1813 (1891) are both historical representations of Laura Secord's heroic actions in crossing enemy lines to warn the British of impending American attack in the war of 1812. The earlier volume includes The Sweet Girl Graduate, a comic play about a woman who disguises herself as a man in order to graduate from the University of Toronto

➤ Women's Movement.

Cycle plays

A type of vernacular drama, performed in England from the later 14th century until the latter half of the 16th century, composed of a sequence of episodes, or pageants, dramatizing Christian history. The scope of the sequences characteristically extends from the beginning of Christian history (the fall of the Angels, and the Creation) to the Last Judgement. These plays have been referred to by modern critics variously as 'miracle plays', 'mystery plays', 'Corpus Christi plays': each of these terms has some justification but each may lead to misconceptions of one kind or another. The term 'miracle play' has the advantage of employing a medieval dramatic term but the word 'miracle' was used during the medieval period as a very general term, applicable to any kind of religious drama, not just cycle plays. 'Mystery play' is a term (first used according to the O.E.D. in 1744) deriving from the French word for a trade or craft ('mystère') and is applied to the cycle plays because they were very frequently performed by the craft guild of a town, in association with the religious guilds and ecclesiastical authorities. However, not all the extant play cycles appear to be designed for performance by guild members (the so-called > 'N-Town' cycle seems scripted for performance by semi-professionals) and the term 'mystery' may conjure up quite misleading, modern associations. The plays have been called 'Corpus Christi plays' with some justice, for the performance of the plays is associated with the celebration of the feast day of ➤ Corpus Christi. This feast day, which is 11 days after Whitsunday, was instituted to celebrate the Eucharist, and was marked by a procession. Precisely if, and how, this feast day stimulated the performance of cycle plays is not clear but there is evidence that by the end of the 14th century at least one major town in England (York) marked the feast day by the performance of a sequence of pageants taken from Christian history. But not all the play cycles were performed on this day: the plays at Chester, for example, were performed over three days in Whitsun week. 'Cycle play' seems the most appropriate term, therefore, for this medieval dramatic phenomenon.

There are four major play cycles extant (the → York, → Chester, → Wakefield, and → N-Town cycles), and fragments survive from play cycles associated with Coventry, Newcastle and Norwich (in addition to three cycle plays in Cornish). The central focus of the cycles is on the events leading up to the Crucifixion and Resurrection, prefaced by selected episodes from O.T. history and followed by the Day of Judgement (the source material being drawn from the Bible, supplemented by legendary and apocryphal narratives). There is some variation in the choice of episodes, as there is in the mode of production of the pageants: those at York and Chester (and probably Wakefield too) were staged on waggons and enacted at fixed points in the streets of the town; the text of the N-Town cycle seems scripted for performance on a fixed set. Necessarily, drama on this scale requires considerable resources, so it is not surprising that the cycles are associated with prosperous provincial towns. Although the efforts of the reformed English Church succeeded in suppressing performances of play cycles in the later 16th century (because they were regarded as idolatrous), the survival of the drama until this time suggests that cycle plays continued to perform a useful municipal function, displaying civic order and wealth, even if their religious function was now outmoded.

Cycle drama is drama in process: the cycles were not static events, their composition continued to change; pageants were written and rewritten, inserted and omitted. This process of composition, and indeed the context of cycle production, can only be partially recreated, since most of the play cycles (apart from Chester) exist in single manuscript copies with few indications of production details or even stage directions. However, the intense scholarly interest in the cycle plays, particularly over the last 20 years, has helped to recreate their forms and contexts, resulting in radical reassessments of this major dramatic genre of medieval Europe.

> Craft Guilds

Bib: Cawley, A. C., et al., The Revels History of Drama in English: Vol I Medieval Drama; Happé, P. (ed.), English Mystery Plays.

Cymbeline (1609-10)

A late tragicomedy by Shakespeare; sometimes called a romance because of its avoidance of realism. Much of the play is set in the court of the ancient British king Cymbeline (1st century AD) and the climax is the defeat of a Roman invasion; on the other hand the love triangle of Posthumus, the British princess Imogen, and the Italian Iachimo is thoroughly > Renaissance: Shakespeare has in fact combined a story of ancient British history from the chronicler > Raphael Holinshed with a lovestory from > Boccaccio's > Decameron. Thus a victory of British patriotism over Roman imperialism is fused with a more up-to-date victory of English single-minded devotion over Italian duplicity. Cymbeline has also been called a reconciliation play, because, like > Pericles before it and > The Winter's Tale and > The Tempest after it, it steadily darkens with murderous conspiracy from the outset to the middle, and then lightens towards a general clarification in candour and love at the end. Also like the other three plays, Cymbeline has as a central theme the loss to the world and, except in The Tempest, to the father of a young girl whose recovery expresses the recovery of the qualities of youth, purity, beauty, trust and potentiality.

➤ Romances of Shakespeare.

Cynewulf (fl 800)

Old English poet, probably working in the late 8th or early 9th century, who signed his name in runes in four poems, Christ II, Elene, Juliana and The Fates of the Apostles. The poems suggest that Cynewulf was a learned writer, familiar with Latin and thus probably a cleric, although nothing more is known about him as a historical personage.

➤ Old English literature.

Cynics, The

A school of ancient Greek philosophers founded by Antisthenes in the 4th century BC. Their belief, that the only realizable aim in life was the fulfilment of the individual by the strict application of reason to practical issues, led them to an extreme individualism, according to which social considerations were irrelevant, ambition was a distraction, pleasure a corruption, and poverty and disrepute were of active assistance in promoting self-reliance. The word 'cynic' seems to derive from the Greek word for 'dog', and they agreed in taking this animal as their emblem. The word has degenerated to imply an attitude of disbelief in the goodness of human motives and in the reality of human values.

D

Dabydeen, David (b 1955)

Guyanese novelist and poet. Dabydeen came to Britain in 1969 and studied at the universities of Cambridge, London and Oxford. During the 1980s he worked as a community education officer and as a lecturer in Caribbean Studies at the University of Warwick. His first novel was The Intended (1991), followed by Disappearance (1993), and his collection of poems, Slave Song (1984) won the Commonwealth Poetry Prize. He has also published critical works on the 18th-century painter Hogarth and on black writing in Britain.

Dacre, Charlotte (c 1782-?)

Novelist and poet. Dacre and her sister, the writer > Sophia King, dedicated their first work Trifles From Helicon (1798) to their notorious father, John King, who had just been arrested for bankruptcy. She adopted the name 'Rosa Matilda' when visiting ➤ Rachel Despenser and in publishing her first book The Confessions of the Nun of St Omer (1805), which she dedicated to Matthew > 'Monk' Lewis; it was also under this name that > Byron chose to ridicule her. Her most famous work is Zofloya, or the Moor (1806), a > Gothic novel indebted to The Monk, which supposedly warns against the dangers of lust and passion, though Dacre's obvious fascination in depicting these sentiments belies the stated ⊳ didactic purpose. The final scene is a tour de force in which the heroine is thrown to her death from a cliff by the devil. Zofloya influenced > Shelley's Zastrozzi and was published in > chapbook format as The Daemon of Venice (1810). Dacre wrote several other novels, poetry, and the lyrics for popular stage songs. No evidence remains as to how she spent her later life.

Dactyl

A verse foot consisting of an accented syllable followed by two unaccented ones. It thus gives a light falling rhythm, and is commonly used with > trochees in lines which end in an accented syllable or an iambus.

➤ Metre.

Dada

Artistic and literary movement. It arose in two distinct places at about the same time. One group was formed in Zurich in 1916 by three refugees, Tristan Tzara (1887–1968), Hans Arp (1887–1966) and Hugo Ball (1886–1927); another group was formed in New York in the years 1916–19 by Marcel Duchamp (1887–1968), Man Ray (1890–1976) and Francis Picabia (1879–1953). By 1920, both groups had united and made their headquarters in Paris where their journal was Littérature (1919–21). The Dada emphasis was on instinctual expression free from constraints and the consequent cultivation of destructiveness, randomness and incoherence; indeed, the very name 'Dada' (= hobby horse) was a random selection from the dictionary. The movement lasted until the early 1920s. A number of its adherents joined the ➤ Surrealists, a movement which in part evolved out of Dada.

Daedalus

In Greek myth, an artist of wonderful powers. He made wings for himself and his son Icarus, and flew from Crete to Sicily to escape the wrath of King Minos, for whom he had built the labyrinth. The fact that he was an artist explains the use of a form of the name by James Joyce − Dedalus − in ▷ Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man.

Daisy Miller (1879)

A story by ➤ Henry James. It concerns the visit of an American girl to Europe, and is one of the stories in which James contrasts American freshness of impulse, moral integrity, and naivety with the complexity and deviousness of the European mentality. The girl's innocence and candour is misinterpreted as moral turpitude by the Americans who are long settled in Europe, including the young man who acts as focal character for the narrative.

Dame schools

Schools for poor children in the 18th and 19th centuries, especially in country towns and villages. Unlike the charity schools, they were run by private initiative, especially by single women supplementing their income by teaching reading and writing.

> Education.

Dame Sirith

A Middle English verse ➤ fabliau of some 450 lines, dating from the 13th century, which survives in a single manuscript. The narrative, set in dialogue form, relates how a cleric seduces a woman with the help of the tricks of Dame Sirith.

Dance of Death

A theme of artistic and literary representation from the later medieval period, in which representative figures from different social estates were taken away to their graves by skeletal, cadaverous corpses. The earliest known representation of the Dance of Death (or danse macabre) was made in 1424, in the cemetery of the Innocents in Paris, and was copied in a cloister of Old St Paul's (for which ▶ John Lydgate translated the verse inscriptions).

Dane, Clemence (1887–1965) Playwright and novelist. Clemence Dane is the pseudonym of Winifred Ashton, a highly prolific playwright and novelist whose work was extremely successful in her lifetime, but who has to some extent been neglected bycritical history. Her career was a long one -Dane published her first novel (which deals with power and lesbianism in a girls' public school), Regiment of Women, in 1917, and continued writing until her death - some of her later works were dramas for BBC television. She also wrote essays, and was awarded the CBE in 1953. Her plays include: A Bill of Divorcement (1921); Naboth's Vineyard (1925); Manners (1927); The Saviours (1942); and Call Home the Heart (1947). Her novels include Enter Sir John (1930); The Moon is Feminine (1938); and He Brings Great News (1939).

Danegeld

A tax raised by Anglo-Saxon kings as tribute to the Danes to prevent their invasions of southern England.

Dangaremba, Tsitsi (b 1958)

Novelist and playwright, born and brought up in Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe). She was educated in Harare (at that time called Salisbury) before going on to study medicine and psychology at the University of Oxford and film at the Berlin film school. Her novel Dangerous Conditions (1988) won the Commonwealth Prize and reveals some of the psychological effects of colonialism through the lives of two young girls in pre-independence Rhodesia.

Daniel Deronda (1876)

A novel by ➤ George Eliot (Mary Ann Evans). It contains a double story: that of the hero, Daniel Deronda, and that of the heroine Gwendolen Harleth. Daniel is the adopted son of an aristocratic Englishman, and a young man of gracious personality and positive values; he discovers that he is of Jewish parentage, and ends by marrying a Jewish girl, Mirah and devoting himself to the cause of establishing a Jewish homeland. Gwendolen belongs to an impoverished upper-class family and marries (under pressure from her clergyman uncle) a rich and entirely self-centred aristocrat, Henleigh Grandcourt, to redeem their fortunes. Her story is the discovery of the truth of her own nature, just as Deronda's story is the discovery of his origin and vocation. Their stories are linked by the almost casual but entirely beneficent influence of Deronda over Gwendolen, whom he saves from despair after the death of her husband in circumstances that compromise her conscience. (The theme of artistic dedication is central.) Critics have observed that the story of Gwendolen is one of the masterpieces of English fiction, but that that of Daniel is comparatively flat and unconvincing.

Daniel, Samuel (1562–1619) Poet and dramatist. After returning from extensive travel in France and Italy (c 1586), he was employed as a tutor to the son of > William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke (patron of ➤ Shakespeare) and to ➤ Mary Sidney's family, as well as to ➤ Lady Anne Clifford. His first publication was 28 sonnets included in the unauthorized edition of ▷ Sir Philip Sidney's ➤ Astrophil and Stella (1591). In 1592 he published his own collection of sonnets under the title of Delia. His dramatic work includes The Tragedy of Cleopatra (1594), and Philotas (1605), which deals with a trial, on a charge of treason, of an ambitious favourite of > Alexander the Great - a theme which the authorities thought uncomfortably close to the events of the > Essex rebellion of 1601 and which led to Daniel being summoned before the Privy Council to explain the play's intentions. His publications also included several > masques, and a philosophical dialogue in verse form, entitled Musophilus (1599), which discusses the conflict between humanist theory and the value of practical arts. Daniel's masques are considered some of the most beautiful and, perhaps, challenging of the ➤ Jacobean court entertainments. Although never as scholarly as those of ⊳ Ben Jonson, Daniel's shows, under the > patronage of > Queen Anne, presented gender roles in a disturbing light.

Daniel's major project, however, was his huge unfinished work The Civil Wars. This historical ▷ epic dealing with the Wars of the Roses first appeared in four books in 1592, and by 1609 eight books in all had been published, which brought his account to the marriage of ▷ Edward IV. After the project had been abandoned, Daniel turned to writing a prose history of England, which appeared in two parts between 1612 and 1617. In addition to his historical enterprises, Daniel published, in 1603, his answer to ▷ Thomas Campion's Observations in the Art of English Poesy.

Though Daniel's sonnets represent the major portion of his writings read in the 20th century, his attempt at creating a historical epic forms an important part of the late Elizabethan project (shared in by > Edmund Spenser and > Michael Drayton) to create a firmly realized sense of national identity.

➤ Histories and Chronicles. Bib: Michel, L. (ed.), The Civil Wars; Rees, J., Daniel: A Critical and Biographical Study.

Daniels, Sarah (b 1957)

Dramatist. Daniels is one of the most controversial British playwrights, and the only radical lesbian feminist to have made it into the mainstream. She first came to prominence with Ripen Our Darkness (1981) which premiered, like Byrthrite (1987), at the Royal Court Upstairs (which also presented Masterpieces after its Royal Manchester Exchange opening). Her attacks on patriarchy involve the rebellion of mothers (Ripen Our Darkness and The Devil's Gateway, 1983) and the discussion of lesbian custody of children in Neaptide (1984). Byrthrite is a warning for women about the possible consequences of modern genetic engineering and reproductive techniques and is linked to a familiar theme of the persecution of the old 'wise women' of the 17th century. The Gut Girls (1988) continues the historical theme with its celebration of Victorian working-class women, and Beside Herself (1990) tackles childhood abuse in a mythological frame.

Needless to say, Daniels' plays and her expression of unpalatable truths (especially if you are a man) have invoked, in their turn, vitriolically hostile reviews from critics (mostly but not exclusively male), particularly over Masterpieces (1983) and Byrthrite. But Daniels' early protagonists are recognisable suburban wives and mothers rebelling – wittily – against their roles as general moppers-up after men and the male value system that has put them there. In Daniels' world, the personal becomes graphically political.

Masterpieces, Daniels' best known work, is an uncompromisingly didactic play that makes a direct link between the seemingly innocuous dinner table misogynist joke and male violence against women. It is a tale of growing awareness, focused on a social worker who gradually moves from naivety to anger, from passivity to action and wholesale rejection of the man-made world in which she lives and to which she has, in the past, given tacit acceptance. The play has an irrefutable emotional force about it and has deservedly come to be regarded as a feminist classic, even if some find its philosophical links questionable. Other plays include: Head Rot Holiday (1992) and The Madness of Esme and Shaz (1994).

Dante Alighieri (1265-1321)

Poet and philosopher. Very little is known about the early life of Dante. He was born in Florence, a member of the Guelf family, and married Gemma Donati in 1285. His involvement in Florentine politics from 1295 led in 1300 to his exile from Florence, to which he never returned. He died at Ravenna in 1321. According to his own report, he was inspired throughout his life by his love for Beatrice, a woman who has been identified as Bice Portinari (d 1200).

It is difficult to date Dante's work with any degree of precision. The Vita Nuova (1290-4) is a lyric sequence celebrating his inspirational love for Beatrice, linked by prose narrative and commentary sections. His Latin treatise De Vulgari Eloquentia, perhaps begun in 1303-4 but left unfinished, is a pioneering work of literacy and linguistic commentary. Here Dante considers the state and status of Italian as a literary language, and assesses the achievements of earlier French and Provençal poets in elevating the status of their vernacular media. The Convivio (1304-7) is an unfinished philosophical work, a 'banquet of knowledge', composed of prose commentaries on allegorical poetic sequences. Dante's political ideas, specifically the relationship between the Pope, Emperor, and the universal Empire, are explored in De Monarchia (c 1310). Dante may not have begun his principal work, the Divina Commedia, until as late as 1314. This supremely encyclopaedic work, which encompasses a discussion of every aspect of human experience, knowledge and belief, recounts the poet's journey, with ⊳ Virgil as his guide, through Hell (Inferno) and Purgatory (▷ Purgatorio) and finally, through the agency of Betarice herself, to Paradise (> Paradiso).

▶ Boccaccio (1315-75) composed an account of Dante's life and was the first to deliver a series of public lectures on the text of the Divina Commedia (1313-14), thus confirming the literary authority, prestige and influence of the work and its author. ➤ Chaucer, the first English poet to name Dante in his work, undoubtedly knew the Divina Commedia; quotations from it are scattered through his later work. Dante was read and admired by English poets in the 16th and 17th centuries (including > Milton), and one of the earliest translations (of part of the Inferno) appeared in 1719. 19th-century poets, especially ▷ Byron, ▷ Shelley, and ▷ Thomas Carlyle much admired Dante's work and thus revived interest in the medieval poet. Of 20th century writers, > T. S. Eliot in particular was profoundly influenced by Dante's work. According to Eliot, Dante has the power to make the 'spiritual visible'. Bib: Holmes, G., Dante.

D'Arblay, Madame

Dares Phrygius

➤ Burney, Fanny.

A Trojan priest, mentioned in ➤ Homer's > Iliad, who is reputedly the author of an eyewitness acount of the Trojan war, De Excidio Troiae Historia (The Fall of Troy, A History), which presents a rationalized, chronologically ordered account of events that ultimately relies on material from Homer. It is likely that Dares' account was originally composed in Greek during the 1st century but it only survives in a Latin version from the 6th century. Together with the other eyewitness account of the war, attributed to Dictys, Dares' narrative forms the basis for the most influential medieval versions of the Troy story, being used by Benoît de Sainte-Maure for his 12th-century vernacular narrative of the destruction of Troy. It was not until the beginning of the 18th century that the accounts of Dares and Dictys were conclusively exposed as forgeries.

> Troy

Bib: Frazer, R. M. (ed. and trans.), The Trojan

War: the Chronicles of Dictys of Crete and Dares the Phrygian.

Darley, George (1795-1846)

Poet, dramatic critic and art historian. Darley was a reclusive Irish author whose sharp dramatic criticism often angered the authors of the plays he reviewed for ▷ The London Magazine. As a creative writer, he wrote several volumes of poetry including Sylvia (1827), as well as plays. His most famous work is Nepenthe (1835) which undertakes an allegorical description of the imagination and which is indebted to ▷ Keats and ▷ Shellev.

> Irish literature in English.

Bib: Heath-Stubbs, J., In His Darkling Plain: a study of the later fortunes of romanticism in English poetry from Darley to W.B. Yeats; Ridler, A. (ed), Selected Poems of George Darley.

Darwin, Charles Robert (1809-82)

Biologist. His book On the Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection (1859) not only expounded the theory of the evolution of natural organisms (which in itself was not new, for it had been held by, among others, Darwin's grandfather, the poet Erasmus Darwin) but presented persuasive evidence for the theory. In brief, this was that species naturally tend to produce variations and that some of these variations have better capacity for survival than others, which in consequence tend to become extinct. Darwin's conviction partly began with his study of > Malthus on population, and it thus belongs to the rationalistic tradition which the 19th century inherited from the 18th. The book greatly disturbed many religious people, since it apparently contradicted the account of the creation of the world of Genesis in the Bible; it also raised serious doubts about the existence of the soul and its survival after the death of the body. However, it is possible to exaggerate the importance of the Darwinian theory as a cause of religious disbelief: on the one hand, > Charles Lyell's Principles of Geology (1830-3) had already done much to upset traditional beliefs (those, for instance, of the poet > Tennyson) and so had scientific scholarship on biblical texts by men like Charles Hennell (as in the case of the novelist ➤ George Eliot); on the other hand, intelligent believers such as the poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834) had long ceased to accept the Bible as a sacred record of fact in all its books. The effect of Darwin's ideas was probably rather to extend religious doubt from the intelligentsia (who were already deeply permeated by it) to wider circles. Another kind of effect was to produce in the popular mind a naive optimism that man was subject to a general law of progress; it thus encouraged an uncritical view of history and society.

Darwin wrote a number of other scientific works, including The Descent of Man (1871).

His Journal of Researches into the Geology and Natural History of the various countries visited by H.M.S. 'Beagle', a report of his first important scientific expedition (1831–6), is a fascinating travel book. He also wrote a brief but interesting Autobiography (edited with additions by Nora Barlow, 1958).

> Agnosticism.

Bib: Huxley, L., Charles Darwin; Stevenson, L., Darwin among the Poets; West, G., Darwin: the Fragmentary Man; Darwin, F., Life and Letters; Beer, G., Darwin's Plots.

Darwin, Erasmus (1731-1802)

Poet and physician, grandfather of the zoologist Charles Darwin. He wrote a lengthy poem, The Botanic Garden in grotesquely elaborate > couplets, on the subject of the scientific classification of plants (Part II: The Loves of the Plants, 1789; Part I: The Economy of Vegetation, 1791).

Daryush, Elizabeth (1887-1977)

Poet. Daryush was the daughter of poet
➤ Robert Seymour Bridges, and her writing is a continuation and expansion of his experiments in syllabic metre. She lived for some time in Persia, and syllabically translated some Persian poetry. Publications include: Daryush's own selection of her work, Selected Poems, Verses I-VI (1972) and the more recent Collected Poems (1976).

Dathorne, O.R. (b 1934)

Novelist, poet and critic. Dathorne was born in Guyana and educated at the universities of Sheffield, London and Miami. He has taught at universities in Zaire, Nigeria, Sierra Leone and the USA, where he is now professor at the University of Kentucky. His novels are: Dumplings in the Soup (1963), set in London, The Scholar-Man (1964), set in Africa and Dele's Child (1986). Kelly's Poems (1977) and Songs for a New World (1988) are collections of poems. He has published a number of short stories and several critical works on African and Caribbean literature as well as editing collections of poetry, stories and essays. His novels present cultural displacement and the search for a sense of identity and history.

D'Avenant, Lady Henrietta Maria (d 1691) Theatre proprietress, wife of ⊳ Sir William D'Avenant: she took over management of the ▷ Duke's Company after his death in 1668, and saw his plans for a new theatre at Dorset Garden to completion. Lady D'Avenant was born in France, and met William during his stay there, probably in 1646. He returned about ten years later and brought her back to England as his wife in 1655. She had at least nine children by him, and also cared for some of his children by his earlier marriages. As theatre manager she operated effectively, delegating many artistic and technical problems, ensuring the publication of her husband's works, founding Nurseries for the training of young actors and actresses, and defending the interests of the actor-manager George Jolly after a campaign by ⊳ Thomas Killigrew and Lady D'Avenant's late husband to cheat him and squeeze him out of the profession. In 1673 she ceded control of the company to her son Charles, but held on to her shares in the company and various rights, including income from a fruit concession at the playhouse. Bib: Hotson, L., The Commonwealth and Restoration Stage.

D'Avenant (Davenant), Sir William (1606-68)

Theatrical innovator, impresario, dramatist and poet, D'Avenant's career spanned the reign of > Charles I, the > Interregnum and the Restoration. A pivotal figure in the history of the English theatre, he was involved in most of the developments of this transitional period, including the dissemination of theatrical techniques associated with the aristocratic cultural form of the > masque to the public stage, the creation of new genres (he is credited with the first English > opera), and the introduction of actresses to the professional English stage. He adapted some of > Shakespeare's plays to the new theatrical conditions, including ▷ The Tempest with Dryden (1667) in a version that was the basis of English productions until 1838. During the 1650s, as official Interregnum disapproval of stage plays waned, he openly mounted several musical performances, including > The Siege of Rhodes (1656), which is often considered to be the first English opera. When the theatres reopened in 1660 D'Avenant and ➤ Killigrew obtained the only two patents granted by > Charles II allowing them to stage theatrical performances in London. D'Avenant formed the ▷ Duke's Company and began converting Lisle's Tennis Court at Lincoln's Inn Fields into a theatre. After his death D'Avenant's widow, ➤ Lady Mary D'Avenant, inherited his patent.

Bib: Blaydes, S. B. and Bordinat, P., Sir William Davenant: An Annotated Bibliography, 1629–1985.

David Copperfield (1849-50)

A novel in ▷ autobiographical form by ▷ Charles Dickens. 'Of all my books I like this the best; like many fond parents I have a favourite child and his name is David Copperfield.' Some commentators have thought that the hero is representative of Dickens himself, and point to the resemblance of initials: C.D. and D.C. It is true that in outline Copperfield's experiences

- his sense of early rejection, > child labour in a warehouse, experience as a journalist and final success as a novelist - are similar to Dickens' own. But Dickens' purpose was to present an imaginative picture of growth from childhood to manhood in his own period of history, using his own experience as some of its material but without intending a biographical record. The social landscape of this novel is broader than an autobiography would be likely to achieve. It includes the moralistic and sadistic oppressiveness of Copperfield's mercantile stepfather, Murdstone, and the intimate study of selfish hedonism in Copperfield's aristocratic friend, Steerforth; the spontaneous cordiality of the humble Yarmouth boatman, Peggotty, and his sister, and the cunning deviousness of Uriah Heep, whose servile humility is disguise for his total ruthlessness in making his way from bleak beginnings to a position of power. The novel is strong in dramatic contrast, and particularly interesting in the counterbalancing of the women characters in a series of feminine archetypes. Copperfield is fatherless, and his gentle, guileless mother (who becomes victim in matrimony to Murdstone) is like an elder sister to the child; both are children to the motherly, protective servant, Clara Peggotty. She is replaced by the harsh and loveless Miss Murdstone who plays the role of cruel stepmother. Copperfield runs away and takes refuge with his idiosyncratic aunt, Betsey Trotwood, who has shaped for herself an eccentric independence of men, retaining for a harmless lunatic (Mr Dick) a compassionate tenderness which she now extends to her nephew, in spite of having rejected him at birth because he was a boy. Copperfield's first wife, Dora Spenlow, is a simulacrum of his mother a child wife, on whom ➤ Ibsen seems to have based Nora in A Doll's House. Two other representatives of Victorian womanhood are Agnes Wickfield (whom he eventually marries), the stereotype of defenceless womanly sanctity and nearly a victim of Heep's rapacity, and Little Em'ly who is first under the protection of Peggotty and then becomes 'the > fallen woman' when she is seduced by Steerforth. Another very striking portrait is Rosa Dartle, companion to Steerforth's mother and poisoned by vindictive hatred of him because of his cool assumption of social and masculine privilege. Though not the richest and deepest of Dickens' novels, it is perhaps psychologically the most revealing, both of Dickens himself and of the society of his time.

Bib: Storey, G., David Copperfield: Interweaving Text and Fiction.

Davidson, John (1857-1909)

Poet. Best remembered for his ballads and songs, in particular Thirty Bob a Week, he also wrote plays, novels and philosophical works. A friend of poet W.B. Yeats (1865–1939) and fellow member of the ▷ Rhymer's Club, a group of ▷ Nineties poets which met to read their poetry from 1890–94 at the Cheshire Cheese, a pub in Fleet Street. Davidson was also influenced by ▷ Nietzsche in his passionate ▷ atheism, exemplified by God and Mammon (1907), a trilogy of which only two parts were complete when Davidson committed suicide. He contributed to the ▷ Yellow Book, and was an important figure in the development of the 20th-century Scottish Renaissance (▷ Scottish literature in English).

Rib: Turnhull A (ed.) Poems: Lindsay M

Bib: Turnbull, A. (ed.), Poems; Lindsay, M. (ed.), John Davidson: A Selection of his Poems (Preface by T.S. Eliot).

Davie, Donald (b 1922)

Poet and literary critic. Donald Davie's rational, cool and technically pure poetry perhaps epitomizes the verse of the ▷ Movement; his critical work of 1952, Purity of Diction in English Verse was the Movement's bible. Davie was born in Barnsley, a place which recurs gloomily throughout his work, and has taught at universities in Britain and the U.S.A. His many publications include: Brides of Reason (1955); The Forests of Lithuania (1959); Events and Wisdoms 1957–1963; Collected Poems 1950–70 (1972); In the Stopping Train (1977); Under Briggflatts (1989).

Davies, Lady Eleanor (1590-1652)

Author of prophecies and spiritual revelations. Lady Eleanor's maiden name was Audeley, but she is more commonly known by Davies, the surname of her first husband, ▷ Sir John Davies, whom she married in 1609. Although always learned, it was not until 1625 that she received her first revelation and published A Warning to the Dragon and All His Angels, a work replete with the contemporary fashion for anagrams (for example, she reworks her own names as 'A Snare O Devil' (Davies) and 'Reveale O Daniele' (Audeley)). She prophesied her own husband's death when he threw A Warning onto the fire, and immediately commenced wearing mourning clothes; he died the following year. Her second marriage, to Sir Archibald Douglas, followed the same pattern, he burning her books and she predicting his spiritual downfall. Strangely, Lady Eleanor's prophecies often came true. She predicted the death of ▷ Buckingham in 1628, the outcome of Henrietta Maria's pregnancies and, more dangerously, the downfall of ▷. Charles I and the Archbishop of Canterbury > William Laud. This last work, which she published in Amsterdam, resulted in her being summoned before the Court of High Commission in 1633 and accused of writing scandalous and fanatical pamphlets. It was suggested that she be committed to Bedlam, but in the event she was fined £3,000, imprisoned for two years, her books were burned, and she was humiliated by a mocking anagram of her name, 'Never So Mad A Ladie' (Dame Eleanor Davies). Undeterred, she continued to prophesy and was incarcerated in both Bedlam and the Tower of London before the > Civil War heralded a more permissive age for women writers, preachers as well as prophetesses. In 1648 she presented her 1633 prophecies, newly entitled The Armies Commission, to ▷ Oliver Cromwell, and finally received benign recognition from the state. She also had the sweetness of revenge, since Laud had been executed in 1645, and she was able to write to Charles I before he was beheaded, reminding him of the accuracy of her predictions. Lady Eleanor's prophecies were finally published in an uncensored form as The Restitution of Prophecy (1651) and she was honoured at her death, perhaps somewhat ironically, with the epitaph: 'In a woman's body, a man's spirit'.

Bib: Frazer, A., The Weaker Vessel.

Davies, Hugh Sykes (1909-84)

Novelist, poet and critic. Hugh Sykes Davies was an eccentric and mercurial figure, combining at various times the identities of Cambridge don and surrealist poet. He wrote the existentialist novels No Man Pursues (1950) and Full Fathom Five (1956), alongside scholarly works on >> Browning, >> Wordsworth and English grammar. His most considerable achievements are, however, the Surrealist poem-novel Petron (1935) and the anti-nuclear prophetic novel The Papers of Andrew Melmoth (1960) in which a scientist working on rats 'goes over' to join the subjects of his research. His ability to link humour, Surrealism and apocalyptic warning link his work to that of >> David Gascoyne.

Davies, Sir John (1569-1626)

Poet, lawyer and attorney-general for Ireland (1606-19). Sir John Davies wrote virtually all his poetry in the years 1593-9. After 1603 Davies devoted his career to advancement within the Jacobean administration of Ireland, being one of the architects of the policy of 'plantation' in Ulster which brought Scots and English to the northern parts of Ireland, a source of friction ever since. In 1600 he married ➤ Lady Eleanor Davies, the author of prophecies and spiritual revelations. In 1612 Davies published an account of Ireland, entitled A Discoverie of the True Causes why Ireland was never entirely Subdued nor brought under Obedience of the Crown of England Untill his Majesties Happie Raigne a work which can be compared in its delineation of English misunderstanding of Irish culture to > Edmund Spenser's accounts of Ireland at the end of the previous century. Davies died in 1626 having had his death prophesied by his wife the previous year.

Davies' chief poetic works are the two long poems Orchestra (1596) and Nosce Teipsum (1500), a series of epigrams and the 26 acrostic poems on the name of ▷ Elizabeth I, Hymns of Astrea (1599). Both Orchestra and Nosce Teipsum are, in their own ways, remarkable works. Orchestra, composed c 1594, announces itself as 'A Poem of Dauncing', and that, in essence, is what it is: a philosophical account of the physical world in terms of a universal dance. Nosce Teipsum, on the other hand, develops no over-all > conceit, but is instead a philosophical poem on human knowledge derived from Davies' reading in the works of > Cicero, > Montaigne and the two French philosophers Philippe de Mornay and Pierre de la Primaudaye. The end of the poem is to promote self-knowledge, as the title, which translates as 'Know Yourself', indicates. Bib: Editions include: Kreuger, R. (ed.), Poems.

Davies, John, of Hereford (?1565-1618) Very little is known of this prolific writer, often confused with his better-known namesake, > Sir John Davies. Davies was a writing master and the author of numerous > epigrams on his poetic contemporaries. He also taught ▷ Prince Henry and became part of the young prince's court. Perhaps his most ambitious project, however, was a group of three long poems, which undertook to survey existing areas of human knowledge, and which cover a vast number of disparate topics, including English history, psychology, religion and human anatomy. These poems are: Mirum in Modum (1602), Microcosmos (1603), and Summa Totalis (1607). Bib: Rope, H. E. G., 'John Davies of Hereford:

Catholic and Rhymer,' Anglo-Welsh Review II

(1961), pp. 20-36.

Davies, W(illiam) H(enry) (1871-1940) Poet. Born in Newport, Monmouthshire, adopted by his father's parents after his mother's second marriage and brought up in a dockland public house to which his sea-captain grandfather had retired, W.H. Davies not unexpectedly became a wanderer by nature. A period in the North American continent resulted in an accident that caused the amputation of his right leg but helped to inspire his first major success, The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp (1908) and its less well known sequel, Beggars (1909); and further reminiscences followed in Later Days (1925). Both his novels A Weak Woman (1911) and Dancing Mad (1927) were unsuccessful, but his poetry which focussed on the commonplace and deliberately eschewed complexity, expressing a delight in nature and in human companionship, gradually gained in popularity. In this he was encouraged by George Bernard Shaw and Edward Thomas, His poetry collections are The Soul's Destroyer and Other Poems (1905), New Poems (1906), Nature Poems and Others (1908), Farewell to Poetry (1910), Songs of Joy (1911), Foliage: Various Poems (1913); and all these, with the addition of many later poems previously unpublished, making up a total of 636 in number, were collected in The Poems of W. H. Davies, published shortly before his death. His marriage to Helen Payne in 1923 brought contentment to his later years, so that the theme of married love makes its presence felt in his later work. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Davies, (William) Robertson (b 1913) Canadian novelist, playwright and critic. Born in Thamesville, Ontario, and educated at the universities of Queen's (Kingston) and Oxford, Davies has worked as an actor, journalist, and newspaper editor. From 1963 to 1981 he was Professor of English at the University of Toronto. His plays include: Fortune, My Foe (1948); A Masque of Aesop (1952); A Masque of Mr Punch (1963); Question Time (1975). Davies is primarily known as a novelist, however, particularly for his three trilogies: the 'Salterton' - Tempest-Tost (1951); Leaven of Malice (1954); A Mixture of Frailties (1958) - the 'Deptford' - Fifth Business (1970); The Manticore (1972); World of Wonders (1975) and the 'Cornish' - The Rebel Angels (1981); What's Bred in the Bone (1985); The Lyre of Orpheus. These novels are essentially satirical comedies of manners, characterized by an often recondite allusiveness (for example, to the arcane lores of alchemy, saints, vaudeville, and fortune-telling). Despite this > post-modern playfulness, Davies writes in the 19th-century moralist tradition, employing tightly constructed and interweaving plots. His most recent novels are Murther and Walking Spirits (1991), in which the ghost of a murdered man watches films of his ancestors, which together constitute a personalized history of Canada, and The Cunning Man (1994). Other books include a collection of ghost stories, High Spirits (1982), and The Papers of Samuel Marchbanks (1985), a collection of newspaper pieces.

➤ Post-colonial fiction. Bib: Lawrence, R. G. and Macey, S. L., Studies in Robertson Davies' Deptford Trilogy.

Davis, Jack (b 1917)

➤ Post-colonial literature.

Davys, Mary (1674–1732)
Dramatist and novelist, originally from Dublin. Her husband was the Reverend Peter Davys, and through him she knew the satirist ➤ Jonathan Swift. Her husband died in 1698, and she came to England, where she lived by writing. Her first fiction was Amours of Alcippus and Lucippe (1704, republished 1725), and she wrote about Ireland in The Fugitive (1705, rewritten 1725).

Life in York, in the north of England, is worked into her comedy The Northern Heiress, or the Humours of York, which was staged in 1716. She set up a coffee-house in Cambridge, and published later works by subscription, The Reform'd Coquet, or Memoirs of Amoranda (1724) and Works (1725), which includes revisions of earlier writings. She also wrote the poem 'The Modern Poet' and other fictions and comedies, including The Accomplish'd Rake, or Modern Fine Gentleman (1727).

Bib: Lonsdale, Roger (ed.), Eighteenth-Century Women Poets.

Day, John (1574–1640)
English dramatist contemporary with

➤ Shakespeare and ➤ Ben Jonson. In his plays he collaborated with a number of other dramatists such as ➤ Henry Chettle and ➤ Thomas Dekker. His Isle of Gulls (1606), played by the Children of the Queen's Revels, lost them royal favour at Court because of the play's satire on the impact in the country of the ➤ Jacobean accession. Day's most acclaimed work is his ➤ masque The Parliament of Bees (1609).
Bib: Oastler, C. L., John Day, the Elizabethan Printer.

Day-Lewis, Cecil (1904-72)

Poet and critic. Day-Lewis was one of the small group of poets (with > W. H. Auden and > Stephen Spender) which made a considerable impact in the 1930s under the encouragement of > T. S. Eliot and the political influence of Marx. His early poetry was often propagandistic, and, like many of his contemporaries, he wrote in support of the Republican cause in the Spanish Civil War (Spanish influence on English literature), using with effect the ⊳ sprung rhythm and alliteration of ⊳ Gerard Manley Hopkins. World War II broke up the group and tempered Day-Lewis' political aims. His later work shows the versatility which caused him to be chosen as ▶ Poet Laureate in 1968. Works include Collected Poems (1954; reprinted 1970) and Poems 1925-72 (ed. Parsons). Critical essays include A Hope for Poetry (1934), The Poetic Image (1946), The Lyric Impulse (1965). He also translated the poetry of Virgil and wrote ▷ detective fiction under the pen-name Nicholas Blake.

De Beauvoir, Simone (1908–86)
French novelist and one of the founding

'mothers' of 20th-century ▷ feminism, long associated with ▷ Sartre and the ▷ existentialist movement, whose views she promoted in a series of novels: L'Invitée (1943); Le Sang des autres (1944); Les Mandarins (1954). Her uncensored Letters to Sartre (1991) reveal the intensity and passion of their relationship. A play, Les Bouches inutiles was performed in 1945. She contributed greatly to the genre of autobiography: (Mémoires d'une jeune fille rangée (1958); La Force de l'âge (1960); La Force des choses (1965); Tout compte fait (1974) (all translated). Her two-volume study of femininity and the condition of women, The Second Sex (Le Deuxième sexe 1949) is one of the most important feminist texts of this century, and her influence on subsequent thinkers is now eclipsing Sartre's. Contemporary feminist writers who have taken up her ideas in particular include Kate Millett (in Sexual Politics, 1970), > Germaine Greer, Mary Ellman (in Thinking About Women, 1968) and Betty Friedman (The Feminine Mystique, 1963). Bib: Moi, T., Sexual/Textual Politics; Moi, T., French Feminist Thought: A Reader.

De la Mare, Walter (1873-1956) Poet, novelist, writer of short stories. He was born in Kent, and educated at St Paul's Cathedral Choir School. From 1890 to 1908 he was a clerk in the offices of the Anglo-American Oil Company; he was then given a government ('Civil List') pension to enable him to devote himself to writing. Many of his poems and his stories were addressed to children. Books of verse of this sort were: Songs of Childhood (1902); A Child's Day (1912); Peacock Pie (1913). > Children's stories: The Three Mulla-mulgars (1910); The Riddle (1923); The Magic Jacket (1943); The Dutch Cheese (1946). He had conspicuous talent for retelling traditional ▷ fairy-tales: Told Again (1927); and compiled two unusual anthologies: Come Hither (for children, 1923) and Love (for adults, 1943). His most remarkable prose fiction for adults is probably On the Edge (stories, 1926) and Memoirs of a Midget (novel, 1921). His books of verse for adults include: The Listeners (1912); The Veil (1921); Memory and other poems (1938); The Burning-glass and other poems (1945); The Traveller (1946); Inward Companion (1950); Winged Chariot (1951); O Lovely England and other poems (1953); Collected Poems (1979). See also > W. H. Auden's collection, A Choice of De la Mare's Verse (1963).

His poems are conservative in technique, with the melody and delicacy of diction characteristic of the poetry of the late 19th and early 20th century, but are unusual in the quiet intensity with which they express evanescent, elusive and mysterious experience. His stories have a singular quietness of tone and are written in an unassuming style, conveying material which is on the borderline of conscious experience. De la Mare's unusual combination of intensity and innocence makes the borderline between his work for children and for adults an almost imperceptible one. Bib: Mégroz, R. L., De la Mare: A Biographical and Critical Study; Reid, Forrest, De la Mare: A Critical Study.

De Loutherbourg, Philip James (Philippe Jacques) (1740–1812) Painter, set designer, of noble Polish descent. In 1771 after a successful exhibition in Paris De Loutherbourg moved to London, where he met ▶ David Garrick, and presented him with proposals for co-ordinated improvements to the lighting, scenes, costumes and mechanical effects at ▶ Drury Lane.

Engaged at the theatre, De Loutherbourg 'astonished the audience', according to one observer, by his skilful and innovative use of various translucent coloured silks, lit from behind and mobile, to give changing effects of richness, subtlety, and depth to the sets. His detailed and naturalistic cut-out scenery was likened to fine paintings of contemporary and fantastic views. In 1781 he became a member of the > Royal Academy.

Admired in his day by > Thomas Gainsborough, De Loutherbourg is now considered one of the most influential designers for the English stage, bringing both imagination and technical abilities to bear, so as to create scenes and spectacles of unprecedented realism and magnificence. Much of his work can be seen as an important early contribution to the > Romantic movement in literature and art.

De Man, Paul (1919-83)

Arguably the most rigorous of the so-called Yale School of criticism, and by the time of his death the foremost exponent in the USA of b deconstruction as applied to Romantic, and other, poetry. His crucial essay of 1969, 'The Rhetoric of Temporality' (collected in Blindness and Insight, 1983) used texts by > Wordsworth, > Coleridge, > Rousseau and others, in order to establish the undoing of Romantic ambition, expressed in ▶ rhetorical terms such as the 'symbol', by what de Man calls 'allegory'. His approach was extended in books such as Allegories of Reading (1980) and The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984). De Man reflected on the whole of this process, and upon the resistance to certain sorts of theoretical enquiry, in a collection of essays, The Resistance to Theory published posthumously in 1986.

Paul de Man remains a controversial figure, not only because of the nihilistic conclusions of his mature work, but by the rediscovery after his death of certain pieces of 1940s journalism that express hospitality towards the intellectual consequences of Nazi occupation.

De Profundis (1905;1949)

A prose piece by ▷ Oscar Wilde written during the author's imprisonment in Reading Gaol (1895–97) for ▷ homosexual practices. It takes the form of an extended letter written to Wilde's erstwhile companion Lord Alfred Douglas ('Bosie'), whose father, the Marqess of Queensberry, was instrumental in securing Wilde's incarceration. In it, Wilde upbraids Douglas for distracting him from his work and encouraging him in dissipation. He also criticizes Douglas for his shallowness and neglect and accuses him of being a petty parasite, greedy, extravagant and over-indulged. At the same time the letter praises the devotion of Robert Ross, who finally became Wilde's executor. It was sent to Douglas, who destroyed it after reading the opening pages. Afterwards he denied having received it. A drastically edited version of the letter was published by Ross in 1905 under the title De Profundis (taken from the opening line of Psalm 130). It was revised and reprinted in a more complete form in 1949.

De Quincey, Thomas (1785-1859) Essavist and critic. Most famous for his autobiography > Confessions of an English Opium-Eater. His work was mostly for periodicals and is voluminous, but only a few pieces are now much read. His strong points as a writer were his exceptionally sensitive, inward-turning imagination and his breadth of understanding. The first produced not only his autobiography but a fragment of exceptional literary criticism, 'Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth'. The English Mail Coach (1849) and 'Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts' (1827) show the quality of an exceptional psychological novelist. His second gift produced studies of German philosophy (> Kant, Lessing, Richter) and able translations of German tales, besides some original historical criticism. He was very much a representative of the second generation of English ➤ Romanticism and as the poets of the first generation found new ranges of expression for their medium, so De Quincey expanded the poetic range of prose, partly by recapturing some of the quality of the early 17th-century prose writers.

Bib: Abrams, M. H., The Milk of Paradise; Barrell, J., The Infection of Thomas De Quincey: the Psychopathology of Imperialism; Clapton, G. T., Baudelaire et De Quincey; Eaton, H. A., Life; Jordan, J. E., Thomas De Quincey, Literary Critic; Saintsbury, G., in Essays in English Literature; Sackville-West, E., A Flame in Sunlight; Lindop, G., The Opium Eater.

Death and Life

An alliterative narrative, dating from the 15th century, in which a dream frame is used as a vehicle for a dramatic debate between Life and Death, over their respective powers. In the course of the debate, the notion of Life is enlarged to encompass that of Eternal Life, and Life herself evokes scriptural authorities to prove she can, therefore, circumvent the power of Death. This technique of analysing abstract concepts through a personified debate can be paralleled in other alliterative poems (including ▷ Piers Plomman and ▷ Winner and Waster). But whereas ▷ Langland's poem combines a focus on contemporary social satire with an investigation into transhistorical Christian truths, Death and Life concentrates on communicating a spiritual truth. Bib: Gollancz, I., and Day, M. (eds.), Select Early English Poems 3.

Decadents

A term attributed to the French poet Paul Verlaine in 1885, who contributed to a review, Le Decadent, founded by Anatole Baju, from 1886-9. The French Decadents were inspired by > Charles Baudelaire and counted Arthur Rimbaud (1854-91), Stephane Mallarmé (1842-98) and Tristran Corbière among their number. J.K. Huysmans' novel A rebours (Against the Grain, 1894) was called 'the breviary of the Decadence' by poet Arthur Symons (1865–1945). In England the term 'Decadents' was applied to a group of poets at the end of the 10th century, which included > Arthur Symons, > Oscar Wilde, > Ernest Dowson and Lionel Johnson (1867–1902), who constituted the later generation of the > Aesthetic Movement and included the English followers of the French > Symbolist poets. Their aim was to set art free from the claims of life and their art is characterized by a 'world weariness' brought on by the death of the century, a sense of social decline and spiritual dispossession. G.L. van Roosebroeck gives an account of the term in The Legend of the Decadents.

▶ Rhymer's Club; Yellow Book; French influence on Victorian literature.

Decameron, The

A collection of 100 stories in prose, compiled by ➤ Boccaccio in the years 1349-51. The fictional framework of the collection describes how the stories were told by a company of ten gentle-ladies and gentlemen who decide to retreat from plague-ridden Florence and spend two weeks in the country. They spend their weekdays telling short stories to pass the time, and the proceedings are organized by one member of the company who is elected anew every day. Many of the stories concern heterosexual relations of some kind, usually set in the contemporary world, and treated in a variety of serious and comic ways. Many of the short stories have > fabliau-type plots. It seems likely that > Chaucer knew and used the Decameron as a resource for the > Canterbury Tales (though the connection has not been definitely proved and remains a controversial issue). Boccaccio's work undoubtedly provided many later writers and dramatists (including > Shakespeare) with an important source of narratives. Many of Boccaccio's stories were incorporated into William Painter's > Palace of Pleasure, and the first English translation of the Decameron itself appeared in 1621. Bib: McWilliam, G. H. (trans.), The Decameron.

Decentring

The idea of decentring is common in much > poststructuralist theory and is used in connection with either individual subjectivity or bodies of written ideas and beliefs. An individual is said to be decentred in the sense that, though most people act as though they have a consistently unified sense of identity, this is illusory and a person's self is in reality more fragmentary and unstable. It lacks, that is, a centre. This view depends heavily on the psychoanalytic theory of ➤ Jacques Lacan. In the realm of ideas, related arguments are put by ➤ Jacques Derrida who argues that even apparently stable bodies of written ideas are always internally contradictory and divided against themselves, not least by the language in which they are expressed and despite their logocentric hopes. As such they need to be > deconstructed to reveal their decentred state. > Postmodern theory, meanwhile, argues that contemporary culture generally is decentred in the sense that it is international rather than national, and pluralist rather than canonical.

Declaration of Independence (1776)

The assertion of independence by the American colonists, starting-point of the United States. It was signed by 13 states. Although the Committee that ordered the drafting of the Declaration included such hard-headed, 18thcentury rationalists as Benjamin Franklin, their document (and the Constitution of 1787) may be seen as essentially Romantic in its idealization of freedom for the individual. The new nation demanded a new literature, and the emergence in the mid-19th-century of a truly American philosophy (promulgated by Emerson) and its corollary in poetry (supplied by Walt Whitman) may be seen as a perpetuation of Romanticism in its hospitality to experience and its emphasis on freedom of conscience, and consciousness.

Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, The (1776-88)

By > Edward Gibbon; the most eloquent and imposing historical work in the English language. It begins at the height of the Roman Empire in the 1st and 2nd centuries AD - an age with which Gibbon's own era, so deeply imbued with Latin scholarship, felt strong kinship. It then proceeds to record the successive stages of Roman decline, the rise of Christianity, the struggle with the Eastern Roman Empire (the Byzantine) centred on Constantinople (Byzantium), and that empire's eventual extinction by the capture of Constantinople in 1453. As an account, it has of course become somewhat outdated, but as an imaginative epic (still regarded as substantially true) and an expression of the background to modern Europe as understood in the 18th century, it remains a much-read and very important work. Its structure is as spacious as the subject, and is sustained by the energy of Gibbon's style. The attitude is one of 18th-century truth-seeking, and of urbane irony towards the Christian religion, whose growth Gibbon sees as one of the agents of destruction of classical civilization. Gibbon's sceptical mind is at the same time constantly critical of human pretensions to self-sufficiency, the attainment of wisdom, and integrity of motive; in such respects he is in the tradition of the great satirists of his century, > Alexander Pope and > Jonathan Swift.

Deconstruction

A concept used in critical theory. It has a long philosophical pedigree, but is usually associated with the work of the French philosopher > Jacques Derrida. It is a strategy applied to writing generally, and to literature in particular, whereby systems of thought and concepts are dismantled in such a way as to expose the divisions which lie at the heart of meaning itself. If interpretation is a process designed to reduce a text to some sort of 'order', deconstruction seeks to undermine the basis upon which that order rests. Deconstruction challenges the notion that all forms of mental and linguistic activity are generated from within an autonomous 'centre', advancing the more disturbing proposition that such centres are themselves to be grasped textually only as rhetorical constructions.

Bib: Derrida, J., Speech and Phenomena; Writing and Difference; Of Grammatology; Positions; Norris, C., Deconstruction: Theory and Practice.

Dedalus, Stephen

Principal character in ▷ James Joyce's novel ▷ Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man; he is also a main character in Joyce's ▷ Ulysses. The surname derives from the mythical artist of ancient Greece, ▷ Daedalus.

Deerbrook (1839)

The only novel by journalist and feminist > Harriet Martineau, Deerbrook is set in a tranquil English village in the early 19th century. Two orphaned sisters, Hester and Margaret Ibbotson, come to stay with their cousins, the Grey family. The personal lives of the sisters become entwined with the life of the village portrayed as a hotbed of personal rivalries, gossip and intrigue. The sisters are contrasted in personality: Hester is beautiful but prone to jealousy, Margaret less physically attractive but more intelligent. Romances develop between the sisters and the two most eligible men in the village. The novel also contains > feminist sentiments, expressed mainly by Maria, the crippled > governess, who protests against the restricted opportunities available to middleclass women. Deerbrook was well-received, being favourably compared to Jane Austen's (1775–1817) novels. ➤ Charlotte Brontë later claimed that Martineau's honest portrayal of passion had influenced her own writing.

Defamiliarization

In the context of critical theory this term has its origins in Russian > Formalism and in the desire to distinguish between the > Aristotelian view of writing as an image of reality (> mimesis) and imaginative literature as a form of writing which deploys images rhetorically. The Russian term 'ostranenie' means literally, 'making strange'. rendering unfamiliar that which has hitherto been regarded as familiar. It draws attention to the fact that 'reality' is never depicted in literature in an unprocessed, or unmediated way. Indeed, what literature exposes is the formal means whereby what is commonly taken to be reality itself is, in fact, a construction. In many ways, 'defamiliarization' is a form of > deconstruction, although its objective is to replace one set of epistemological principles (those upon which capitalism as a particular kind of social formation rests), with other ways of organizing reality. By contrast, deconstruction has the effect of undermining all assumptions and certainties about what we know.

➤ Alienation effect.

Defence of Poesie, The

> Apologie for Poetrie, An.

Defence of Poetry, A (1840) A prose essay by ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley written as an 'antidote' to The Four Ages of Poetry by > Thomas Love Peacock, which appeared in 1821. Shelley sent his Defence to Peacock in the same year, but it was not published until 1840. Peacock had argued that with the growth of scientific knowledge, the primitive metaphorical 'visions' of the poet were out of date: 'A poet in our times is a semi-barbarian in a civilized community'. Poetry only wasted time that would be better spent on 'some branch of useful study'. Shelley answered that poetry is not only useful, but essential, in enlarging 'the social sympathies' of humankind. The 'vitally metaphorical' language of the poet is the key to all morality: 'A man, to be greatly good, must imagine intensely and comprehensively; he must put himself in the place of another and of many others; the pains and pleasures of his species must become his own.' In the aftermath of the failure of the ideals of the > French Revolution, Shelley is eager to envisage a political role for the poet, though inevitably this is expressed in rhetoric of an abstract and ideal kind: 'Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world'; 'Poetry is a sword of lightning, ever unsheathed'. However, Shelley's analysis of the totalitarian tendency of Peacock's > utilitarianism anticipates Marx and post-Marxist thinking. Only 'anarchy and despotism' he asserts, can be expected from 'an unmitigated exercise of the calculating faculty'.

Defoe, Daniel (1660-1731)

Son of a London tallow-chandler, James Foe, Defoe changed his name in about 1695 to suggest a higher social status. His writings reflect his > Puritan background: Defoe was educated at Morton's academy for ▷ Dissenters at Newington Green, and his pamphlet of 1702, The Shortest Way with Dissenters, landed him in the pillory when its ironic attack on Dissenters was taken seriously.

Defoe's attempts to make a living form a colourful picture. Various business enterprises failed dramatically, including the scheme of marine insurance, unfortunately timed during a war, and a disastrous project to breed civet cats. Between 1703 and 1714 he worked as a secret agent for the Tory government of Robert Harley, writing many political (and anti- > Jacobite) pamphlets.

Defoe produced some 560 journals, tracts and books, many of them published anonymously or pseudonymously. His reputation today rests on his novels, a genre to which he turned with great success late in his life.

The Life and strange surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe (> Robinson Crusoe) appeared in 1719 and its sequel, The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, was published some months later. 1720 saw the publication of the Life and Adventures of Mr Duncan Campbell, and > Captain Singleton; 1722, > Moll Flanders, > A Journal of the Plague Year, The History of Peter the Great, and Colonel Jack; 1724, > Roxana, the Memoirs of a Cavalier, and A New Voyage round the World; and 1726, The Four Voyages of Capt. George Roberts. His guide-book, A Tour through the Whole Island of Great Britain, appeared in three volumes, 1724-6.

Among Defoe's later works are The Complete English Tradesman (1726), A Plan of the English Commerce and Augusta Triumphans (1728), and The Complete English Gentleman, not published until 1890. Defoe died in Moorfields, and was buried in the area now called Bunhill Fields. Bib: Moore, J. R., Daniel Defoe: Citizen of the Modern World; Richetti, J., Defoe's Narratives: Situations and Structures; Bell, Ian A., Defoe's Fiction.

Deism

A form of religious belief which developed in the 17th century as an outcome of the ➤ Reformation. ➤ Edward Herbert evolved the idea that, while the religion revealed in the Gospels was true, it was preceded by 'natural' religion, according to which by his own inner light a man could perceive all the essentials of religious truth. Herbert's deism was further expounded in the 18th century by others (often in such a way as to suggest that the Christian revelation as presented in the Gospels was redundant), and it suited the 18th-century cool and rational habit of mind which tended to see God as abstract and remote. Bishop Butler among the theologians and ▶ Hume and > Kant among the philosophers, exposed the unsoundness of deistic arguments in the 18th century, and in the 19th century the growth of the genetic sciences demolished the basic assumptions of deism, ie, that human nature and human reason have always been constant, in a constant environment.

Dejection: An Ode (1802)

A poem by ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge. The earliest version was addressed to Sara Hutchinson ('O Sara'), with whom the unhappily married Coleridge was in love. In a subsequent version this becomes 'O Wordsworth', and in the published text Sara is reinstated, but anonymously ('O Lady'). As these changes suggest, the poem reflects a complex personal unhappiness, but it was also influenced by ➤ William Wordsworth's expression of flagging inspiration in the first part of the Immortality Ode, written at this time. Coleridge watches a beautiful sunset, but finds that in his 'wan and heartless mood' the objective beauty of the clouds, stars and moon, inspire no response in him: 'I see them all so excellently fair,/ I see, not feel, how beautiful they are!' He reflects on the subjectivity of experience, concluding that 'we receive but what we give/ And in our life alone does Nature live'. He thus rejects the idea of the ministering benevolence of nature which was so important to Wordsworth. It is subjective imagination not objective nature which is the 'shaping spirit'. He is ambiguously cheered by reminiscences from other poets, conjured up by the wind blowing through an > Aeolian harp, and the work ends, as midnight approaches, with a poignantly selfless prayer that his beloved be sleeping, safe from the storm. His love for her restores the meaning which nature had lost, but on a strictly metaphorical level: 'May all the stars hang bright above her dwelling,/ Silent as though they watched the sleeping Earth!'

Dekker, Thomas (?1570-1632)

Dramatist and pamphleteer. His best-known play is ➤ The Shoemaker's Holiday, based on ➤ Thomas Deloney's The Gentle Craft – a narrative about the London crafts. The play celebrates the proud traditions of the citizens, and the romantic zest of its plot and dialogue has kept it alive. His next best known play is The Honest Whore, Pt. I (1604). He was essentially a dramatist of middle life. He collaborated with > Rowley in The Witch of Edmonton (1623); with ➤ Middleton in The Roaring Girl (1611); and with ➤ Massinger in Virgin Martyr (1622).

His pamphlets are as notable as his plays, especially The Wonderful Year (1603), a vivid account of an epidemic of plague in London, and The Gull's Hornbook, a satire on the manners of a fashionable young man. He was a master of the racy, vigorous, colloquial prose of his time. Dekker was immensely popular in his own time and, despite a falling off in esteem, has been critically reappraised, and it is now possible to perceive him as a politically aware and strongly Protestant dramatist.

Bib: Bowers, Fredson, The Dramatic Works of Thomas Dekker (4 vols.); Bose, T., The Gentle Craft of Revision in Thomas Dekker's Last Plays; Gasper, J., The Dragon and the Dove.

Delaney, Shelagh (b 1939)

One of few female dramatists to make an impact during the 1950s. Her best-known play, A Taste of Honey (first performed in 1958), was written when she was only 17 and is about a young woman's relationship with her mother, her black lover and a gay art student. It was performed by ➤ Joan Littlewood's Theatre Workshop company, transferred to the West End, and was later filmed. Other plays include: The Lion in Love (1960); The House That Jack Built (1978); and for radio: So Does the Nightingale (1980); Don't Worry About Matilda (1983). Her films include: Charley Bubbles (1968) and Dance with a Stranger (1985).

Delany, Mrs Mary (1700-88)

One of the famous letter writers of the 18th century. She had a wide circle of friends among the famous people of her day, and her letters give a vivid picture of contemporary life.

Deloney, Thomas (?1543-?1600)

Pamphleteer and balladeer. Little of Deloney's verse can be securely attributed to him, although in the 1590s he was the most popular > ballad writer in England. It is, however, Delonev's prose narratives - The Gentle Craft (complete version ?1635), Thomas of Reading (1612, 12th edition) and Jack of Newbery (1619, 8th edition) that have secured for him a reputation. These works anticipate the kind of novel which Daniel Defoe (1660-1731) was later to write. They mark the end of the tradition of producing courtly romance such as > Sir Philip Sidney's > Arcadia, and share, with the writings of > Thomas Nashe, an interest in depicting the life led by those outside the elevated circles of the court.

As well as his fictional works, Deloney produced ▷ translations and ▷ anthologies, which include his Strange Histories of Kings (1600). Despite the diversity of his output, it is for the creation of a 'middle-class' fiction that Deloney is of importance.

Bib: Lawless, M. E., Apology for the Middle Class: The Dramatic Novels of Thomas Deloney. > Elizabethan Novels; Pamphlet.

Demos: A Story of English Socialism (1886) A novel by ▷ George Gissing in which he questions the validity of socialism and the qualities of its leaders. The story centres on the founding of an Owenite ironworks in an unspoilt valley.

> Owen, Robert.

Demosthenes (4th century BC)

In ancient Greece, a great Athenian orator; he is often referred to in English literature as the pattern and ideal of all orators. He is especially famous for his speeches warning the Athenians of the danger from the growing empire of Philip of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great. Hence the word 'philippic' for an aggressive political speech.

Denham, Sir John (1615-69)

Poet and playwright. He took the Royalist side in the ▷ Civil War, translated Book II of the ▷ Aeneid into pentameter couplets (The Destruction of Troy, 1656) and published a play in ▷ blank verse, The Sophy (1642). His Cooper's Hill (1642; enlarged version, 1655), a topographical poem describing the scenery around Windsor, was much admired and imitated. In it he abandons the enjambements of his Virgil translation, preferring a balanced, endstopped couplet. The passage on the Thames was cited and imitated by poets from John Dryden (1631–1700) onwards as the perfection of heroic couplet writing:

O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream My great example, as it is my theme! Though deep, yet clear, though gentle, yet not dull, Strong without rage, without o'er-flowing full.

The lines are comically parodied in Alexander Pope's (1688–1744) Dunciad (Bk. III, ii. 163–6). Samuel Johnson (1709–84), in his Lives of the Poets (1781), called Denham 'one of the fathers of English poetry'.

Bib: O'Hehir, B., Harmony from Discords: a

Life of Sir John Denham.

Dennis, John (1657-1734)

Although Dennis' efforts as a poet and playwright are undistinguished, he was one of the foremost literary critics of the ▷ Augustan era. His feud with ▷ Pope for which he is best remembered, was angry and ill-tempered on both sides, but Dennis' critical views, favouring ▷ blank-verse ▷ epics on Christian themes, are worthy of more serious attention. Among his most notable works are The Advancement of Reformation of Modern Poetry (1701), The Grounds of Criticism in Poetry (1704) and An Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakespeare (1712).

Bib: Paul, H. G., John Dennis, his Life and Criticism; Hooker, E. N. (ed.), The Critical Works of John Dennis.

Dennis, Nigel (b 1912)

Novelist. He is best known for Cards of Identity (1955), a satirical fantasy about the nature of individual and cultural identity, influenced by the ▷ existentialism of ▷ Jean-Paul Sartre. It reflects the atmosphere of British life in the early 1950s, but combines this with a self-referential concern with the nature of fiction. His other novels are: Boys and Girls Come Out to Play (1949); A House in Order (1966).

Denotation

> connotation and denotation

Depression, The

A 'depression' signifies the slowing of economic activity for a considerable period of time. High unemployment and poverty usually accompany economic depression. The most significant such period in Britain was the 1930s, which is currently called 'The Depression'. It gave rise to several novels documenting the plight of the working classes, the best known being Walter Greenwood's Love on the Dole (1933).

Derrida, Jacques (b 1930)

Although he is primarily a philosopher, the influence of Derrida's work on the study of literature has been immense. He is the originator of a mode of reading known as > 'deconstruction', the major strand in what is now regarded as the general area of poststructuralism. His main works are Speech and Phenomena (trans. 1973), Of Grammatology (trans. 1974), and Writing and Difference (trans. 1978). For Derrida, as for > Saussure, language is composed of differences, that is, a series of non-identical elements which combine with each other to produce linguistic signs which are accorded meaning. Traditionally, this process is anchored to an organising principle, a centre, but Derrida questions this concept and rejects the idea of a 'presence' in which authority resides, thereby lifting all restrictions upon the 'play' of differences. But, in addition to the idea that language is composed of 'differences'. Derrida also deploys the term 'differance' to indicate the continual postponement of 'presence' which is located in all signifiers. Thus, signs are produced through a relatively free play of linguistic elements (difference), but what they signify can never be fully present since meaning is constantly 'deferred' (différance). Derrida's influence has been greatest in the U.S.A. where after his visit to Johns Hopkins and his teaching at Yale, deconstruction has become the successor to American new criticism. The thrust of literary theory in Derrida's writing bears on the question of literature itself, and opposes a traditional scholarly attachment to, and privileging of, poetry. Commissioned as an essay on Shelley, his piece 'Living On' (in Bloom (ed.) Deconstruction and Criticism, 1979) rapidly becomes a freewheeling meditation on death, absence and writing. Acts of Literature (1992) does however collect a number of essays explicitly concerned with the literary.

> Grammatology; De Man, Paul.

Desai, Anita (b 1937)

Indian novelist and short-story writer. Her novels offer a satirical view of social change in India since Independence, with a powerful sense of waste, limitation, self-deception and failure. Where Shall We Go This Summer (1975) and Clear Light of Day (1980) are particularly concerned with the problems of Indian women to whom westernization offers an apparent freedom. She uses visual detail and an impressionistic style in an attempt to convey a sense of the meaning underlying everyday behaviour and objects. Her other novels include: Cry the Peacock (1963); Voices in the City (1965); Bye-Bye Blackbird (1971); Fire on the Mountain (1977); and In Custody (1984). Story collection: Games at Twilight (1978). She has also written works for children, including The Village by the Sea (1982).

Descartes, René (1596-1650)

French philosopher, mathematician. In ethics and religious doctrine he was traditional, but in method of thought he was the starting point of the total reliance on reason - > rationalism that was pre-eminent in the later 17th and 18th centuries. In his Discours de la Méthode (1637) he reduced knowledge to the basic principle of Cogito, ergo sum (I think, therefore I am), from which intuition he deduced the existence of God and thence the reality of the external world. He also distinguished mind and matter, finding their source of combination again in God. It was the influence of Descartes' writings that drew the English philosopher > John Locke, the dominant figure in English rationalism, to the study of philosophy.

Deschamps, Eustache (c 1346–1406)
French poet who, like ▷ Guillaume de Machaut his mentor, was interested in developing the technical art of vernacular lyric poetry, and was the author of one of the first treatises on the subject. ▷ Chaucer read and was influenced by his work (including his narrative poetry) but Deschamps seems to have been very aware of Chaucer's literary skills too: his ▷ ballade addressed to the English poet describes Chaucer as a writer whose learning has illuminated Britain.

Deserted Village, The (1770)
A poem in heroic > couplets by > Oliver

Goldsmith, written in protest against the enclosure of common land by powerful landowners. The poet recalls his youth in Auburn in the traditional terms of idyllic > pastoral, and laments the present desolation and depopulation. Goldsmith's conventional literary opposition between rural innocence and commercial corruption, prompted > George Crabbe's realistic portrayal of the grimness of peasant life in The Village (1783).

Deshpande, Shashi (b 1938)

Novelist and short-story writer. Deshpande was born in Dharwad, south India and educated at the universities of Bombay and Bangalore (where she took degrees in economics and law) and the University of Mysore. Much of her fiction deals with feminist issues: the struggle of a daughter to be allowed to study medicine in The Dark Holds No Terrors (1983); questions of autonomy, responsibility and power within marriage in That Long Silence (1988). Her feminism is informed by Hindu thought and myth and by her knowledge of Sanskrit texts, as well as showing some influence of Buddhist ideas. Her other novels are: Roots and Shadows (1983); Come up and be Dead (1983); It was the Nightingale (1986); The Binding Vine (1993). Volumes of short stories: The Legacy (1971), The Miracle (1986), It was Dark (1986).

Despenser, Rachel Fanny Antonina (1773–1829)

Political writer and autobiographer. Despenser was an illegitimate child who, on her father's death, was sent away to a French convent where she received a > classical education. She returned to Britain when the ▶ French Revolution began. Despenser's education had encouraged her democratic beliefs and she became one of the more radical writers of her day. ▷ De Quincey compared her to ▷ Shelley, and > Wordsworth admired her Essay on Government (1808), which asserted the rights of women and the lower classes. Her personal life was, however, more complicated: she had eloped in 1794 with Matthew Lee, but left him the following year to pursue her political endeavours uninterrupted. In 1804 she either eloped with or was abducted by two brothers from the Gordon family; the stories vary, and although a case was brought against them for abduction they were cleared of the accusation. Despenser subsequently retired to the country to escape public hostility resulting from the trial. She retaliated by publishing her own version of events, Vindication in 1807. Her Memoirs (c 1812) reveal an increasingly unstable mentality and her developing paranoia led her to accuse her family of attempted murder.

Desperate Remedies (1871)

➤ Thomas Hardy's first published novel in which he adopted the formulae of the popular > sensation novel of the time.

Destruction of Troy, The

A Middle English translation, in ▷ alliterative verse, of ▷ Guido de Columnis' account of the first and second falls of Troy. The 14th-century English text was apparently commissioned (though the narrator does not give any precise information about the identity of the patron), and reflects considerable linguistic and metrical skill, sustained for some 14,000 lines.

Bib: Panton, G., and Donaldson, D. (eds.), The 'Gest Historiale' of the Destruction of Troy.

Detective fiction

This branch of literature is usually easy to distinguish from the much wider literature of crime and retribution in drama and in the novel. Unlike the latter, detective fiction seldom relies on the presentation of deep emotions or on subtle and profound character creation. Character, emotion, psychological analysis of states of mind, social reflections, will all be present as flavouring, and may even be conspicuous, but the indispensable elements are always a mysterious - but not necessarily horrible crime, and a detective, who is commonly not a professional policeman, but who has highly developed powers of scientific deduction. It is essential that the surface details should be convincing, and that the author should keep no clues from the reader, who may thus have the satisfaction of competing with the detective at his game. In the detective story proper, as opposed to the crime novel, the criminal's identity is not revealed until the end, and provides the focus of attention. Precursors of the form are > Wilkie Collins' novel > The Moonstone (1868) and the stories of the American writer Edgar Allan Poe (1809-49), featuring the French detective Dupin. But the widespread popularity of detective fiction began with ➤ Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes stories, of which the first was A Study in Scarlet (1887). The staggering perspicuity of the amateur detective from Baker Street, and his superiority to the police and to his companion and foil, Dr Watson, won him a world-wide audience. Another early exponent of the detective short story was > G. K. Chesterton, whose detective, Father Brown, is a modest and intuitive Roman Catholic priest who first appeared in The Innocence of Father Brown (1911).

The first women detectives in fiction appeared in the 1860s; the stereotype of women's 'nosiness' and obsessive interest in gossip and trivia was often used to explain the female detective's skill in ferreting out crimes and criminals. By the end of the 19th century a number of women writers were producing detective and mystery fiction for an increasingly profitable market. This trend was to continue into the 20th century when some of the foremost writers of the genre were women. From the time of E. C. Bentley's classic work Trent's Last Case (1912) the full-length novel became the most popular form. After Conan Doyle, the dominant figure of detective fiction is Dorothy L. Sayers, whose aristocratic amateur detective, Lord Peter Wimsey, appears in works such as Murder Must Advertise (1933) and The Nine Tailors (1934); she also published a history of crime fiction in 1928 and wrote critical essays on the genre. Other prominent authors of detective fiction include Agatha Christie (the creator of Hercule Poirot and Miss Marple), Michael Innes (pseudonym of the novelist and critic J. I. M. Stewart), H. C. Bailey, P. D. James and H. R. F. Keating. The American school of tough detective fiction is exemplified by Raymond Chandler (1888-1959) and Dashiell Hammett (1894-1961).

Bib: Sleung, M., Crime on her Mind; Craig, P., The Lady Investigates; Wing, G., Ed. 'Edwin Drood and Desperate Remedies: prototypes of Detective Fiction in 1870', Studies in English Literature 13 677–87 Autumn 1973.

Determination.

A Marxist term used in critical theory, it is often confused with 'determinism' whereby a particular action or event is wholly caused by some external agency, and must therefore be assumed to be inevitable. In 'determination'. the traditional fatalistic implications of the term 'determinism' are softened considerably, to draw attention to those constraints and pressures which mould human action. Thus a distinction is to be made between a tendency which attributes all movement in the social formation to economic factors, and one which seeks to account structurally for the patterns of dominance and subordination (> contradictions) operating at any one moment in history. The concept of determination can also be used to ask questions about particular literary > genres and their historical significance, as well as helping to account for particular elements of the rhetorical structures of text. Determination helps in seeing texts as part of a larger social context rather than as isolated verbal constructs, and it helps also to raise a number of questions concerning the inter-relationship between literature and the ways in which it represents 'reality'.

Device ➤ Formalism.

Devil is an Ass, The (1616)

A satirical comedy by Den Jonson, attacking the speculators, financial tricksters, and their dupes, in contemporary London. The young dupe, Fitzdottrel, is cheated out of his land by the 'projector' Meercraft with elaborate projects of land reclamation; Pug, an inferior devil trying his hand at deceiving and betraying humanity, finds that he is not the equal in this to human beings themselves.

Dhondy, Farouk (b 1944)

Novelist and playwright. Dhondy was born in Poona, Bombay, India and educated at Cambridge University, Bombay Engineering College and Leicester University. He has taught English in schools in London. His work includes the novel Vigilantes (1988) and the plays, Mama Dragon (1980), Trojans (an adaptation of the plays of Euripides) and Kipling Sahib (1982). He has also written television plays and fiction for children.

Diachronic

➤ Synchronic.

Dialectic

Originally used to refer to the nature of logical argument, but in the 19th century this term underwent something of a revaluation, and came to be associated with the work of the German philosophers Kant and Hegel. 'Dialectic' referred to the process whereby the 'idea' (thesis) was self-divided, and its internal oppositions (antithesis) were resolved in a synthesis which opened the way to a higher truth. In Marxist thinking 'dialectic' refers to the > contradictions present in any one phenomenon, and to their resolution through conflict. It is the nature of the opposition and that conflict which determines movement and change.

▶ Marx, Karl.

Dialogic

▶ Bakhtin, Mikhail.

Dialogism

A term introduced by the Russian theorist and critic ⊳ Mikhail Bakhtin who originally applied it to the novel, although it is now used in relation to other genres as well. A dialogical novel is one composed in multiple, interactive voices without giving particular priority to any one of them and the term originates in the idea of dialogue, as opposed to monologue. But the significance of dialogical writing for Bakhtin extends far beyond this. For him, dialogical writing is an un-hierarchical form in which the various voices are in energetic interplay in a way that is subversive of ideological structures. A monological composition, by contrast, tends in Bakhtin's view, to be hierarchical, and therefore authoritarian.

➤ Univocal.

Bib: Bakhtin, M., The Dialogical Imagination; Dentith, S., Bakhtinian Thought. Diana of the Crossways (1885)

A novel by ➤ George Meredith in which the central character Diana Warwick is accused of adultery by her husband. His action for divorce fails but the couple agree to separate. Diana forms a relationship with Percy Dacier, a rising young politician, but their affair ends after Diana's betrayal of a political secret to the press. Diana eventually marries an old admirer after the death of her husband. The character of Diana Warwick has much in common with ➤ Hardy's Sue Bridehead, the heroine of ➤ Jude the Obscure, and is an example of the ➤ 'New Woman' fiction of the period.

Diaries

As a form of literature diaries began to be significant in the 17th century. The spirit of criticism from the ▶ Renaissance and the stress on the individual conscience from the ▶ Reformation combined with the political and social turbulence of the 17th century to awaken people to a new awareness of personal experience and its possible interest for general readers. The private nature of the diary form also led to many women taking up this form of writing. Thus the art of the diary arose with the art of ▶ biography and ▶ autobiography.

Diaries may first be divided into two classes: those clearly meant to be strictly private and those written more or less with an eye to eventual publication – although ▶ Oscar Wilde was quick to see the disingenuousness of such a division. In his play The Importance of Being Earnest (1895) Cecily Cardew hides her diary from Algernon claiming that it is 'simply a young girl's record of her own thoughts and impressions, and consequently meant for publication'. A further division may be made between those diaries which are interesting chiefly as a record of the time in which the writer lived and those which are mainly a record of the writer's personality.

In the ➤ Renaissance the diary became a popular form of expressing personal concerns such as ➤ Anne Clifford's diary. However, the best known of the English diaries is that of ➤ Samuel Pepys (1633–1703), which was both purely private (written in code) and entirely unself-conscious, as well as an excellent record of the time. His contemporary, > John Evelyn (1620-1706), is less famous partly because his diary is a more studied, self-conscious work. > Jonathan Swift's Journal to Stella (covering the years 1710-13) is a personal revelation but unusual in that it was addressed to the woman Swift loved. The diary of the ➤ Quaker, ➤ George Fox (1624-91), is a record of his spiritual experience for the education of his followers. In the 18th and early 19th century the most famous is that of the novelist ➤ Fanny Burney (Madame D'Arblay, 1752-1840), considered as a record of the time ingenuously imbued with her own personality. The diary of the great religious reformer, > John Wesley (1703-91), is comparable to that of Fox as a spiritual record, with a wider outlook on his time. In the 19th century the diaries of Thomas Creevey (1768-1838) and Charles Greville (1794-1865) are famous as records of public affairs, and that of > Henry Crabb Robinson (1775-1867) for impressions of the leading writers who were his friends. Hannah Culwick. a Victorian maidservant, wrote seventeen diaries running from 1854-74, providing a fascinating account of a life in service in the Victorian period. The socialist and reformer Beatrice Webb wrote diaries which are a major source of English social and political history and a record of the difficulties encountered by women wishing to work on an equal level with men. → George and Weedon Grossmith's Diary of a Nobody (1892) is a comic novel of late Victorian manners which parodies the form, claiming to be the diary of city clerk Charles Pooter. In the 20th century the Journal of ➤ Katherine Mansfield is an intimate and vivid record of personal experience, and that of ▷ Virginia Woolf is an extremely interesting record of a writer's experience of artistic creation.

Dibdin, Charles (1745-1814)

Song-writer, dramatist and actor. Dibdin the elder is best known for his popular songs about the sea and his ▷ dramatic monologues. He also wrote an ▷ autobiography, The Professional Life of Mr Dibdin (1803), which contains interesting details about life in the theatre at the time and which includes transcriptions of 600 fashionable songs. One of his sons followed him into the world of entertainment, Charles Dibdin (1768–1833), who became a dramatist. His nephew ▷ Thomas Dibdin was the renowned bibliographer.

Dibdin, Thomas Frognall (1776–1847)
Bibliographer. The nephew of the actor and song-writer ▷ Charles Dibdin, Thomas had a very different career. He was the librarian to Lord Spencer of Althorp, the first secretary of the ▷ Roxburghe Club, and an erudite bibliographer. His most important works include Bibliomania (1809), Bibliophobia and Reminiscences of a Literary Life (1836). As the secretary of the Roxburghe Club he also supervised the editing and reissue of a number of important literary works, mainly from the ▷ Renaissance period.

Dickens, Charles (1812-70)

The most popular and internationally known of English novelists. His father was a government clerk who liked to live prosperously, and his sudden impoverishment and imprisonment for debt in the D Marshalsea was a drastic shock to the boy Dickens; prisons recur literally and symbolically in many of his novels, which are also filled with attacks on the injustice of social institutions and the inequalities between the rich and the poor. He began his writing career as a journalist, and all his novels were published serially in periodicals, especially in two edited by himself – > Household Words started in 1850, and > All the Year Round, started in 1859, both of them weeklies.

His first book, > Sketches by Boz (1836), was a collection of stories and descriptive pieces written for various papers in the tradition of the essayists - Charles Lamb (1775-1834), William Hazlitt (1778-1830), Leigh Hunt (1784-1859) - of the previous generation, with the especial difference that Dickens wrote about the hitherto neglected lower middle class. ▷ The Pickwick Papers (1836-7), at first loosely connected but gathering unity as it proceeded, was immensely successful. There followed: > Oliver Twist (1837-8), > Nicholas Nickleby (1838-9), > The Old Curiosity Shop and > Barnaby Rudge (1840-1). This concludes the first, comparatively light-hearted phase of Dickens' writing, in which he developed his characteristic comedy and melodrama. > Martin Chuzzlewit (1843-4) begins a more impressive style of writing in which the comedy and melodrama deepen into new intensity, though critics observe that the beginning of the novel is still in the earlier manner. In 1843 begins his series of Christmas Books, including ▷ A Christmas Carol and > The Cricket on the Hearth. Thereafter come his mature masterpieces: ➤ Dombey and Son (1846-8); > David Copperfield (1849-50); Delak House (1852-3); Delard Times (1854); ➤ Little Dorrit (1855-7); ➤ A Tale of Two Cities (1859); > Great Expectations (1860-1); Down Mutual Friend (1864-5). Dickens was writing > Edwin Drood when he died. Bib: Forster, J., Life; Johnson, E., Life; Wilson, E., in The Wound and the Bow; Chesterton, G.K., Charles Dickens; Gissing, G., Charles Dickens: A Crucial Study; House, H., The Dickens World; Leavis, F.R., in The Great Tradition; Collins, P., Dickens and Crime; Dickens and Education; Gross J., Dickens and the Twentieth Century; Leavis, F.R. and Q.D., Dickens the Novelist; Wilson A., The World of Charles Dickens; Carey, J., The Violent Effigy: A Study of Dickens' Imagination; Kaplan, F., Dickens: a Biography; Jaffe, A., Vanishing Points: Dickens, Narrative and the Subject of Omniscience.

Dickens, Monica (b 1915)

Novelist, children's writer and journalist. Monica Dickens is best known as the author of the popular Follyfoot series of books written in the 1970s (and subsequently televised), but she only began writing for children in 1970, by which time she had already published a range of (often semi-autobiographical) novels, beginning with One Pair of Hands in 1939. The inspiration for Dickens' writing has often come from her working life, as a nurse (One Pair of Feet; 1942), as a journalist (My Turn to Make the Tea; 1951), with the Samaritans (The Listeners; 1970) and more generally in her life in the countryside (The House at World's End; 1970, and the Follyfoot books). Dickens was a columnist for the Woman's Own magazine from 1946 to 1965, and is the great-granddaughter of the Victorian novelist ➤ Charles Dickens. Other works include: Mariana (1940); The Fancy (1943); Flowers on the Grass (1949); The Winds of Heaven (1955); The Room Upstairs (1966); Follyfoot (1971); World's End in Winter (1972); Follyfoot Farm (1973); Stranger at Follyfoot (1976); The Ballad of Favour (1985); One of the Family (1993).

Diction

The choice of words a writer uses in a work such as, for example, archaic, ornate or colloquial.

▶ lexis.

Dictionary of the English Language (1755) Usually known as 'Johnson's Dictionary', it was compiled by ➤ Samuel Johnson and published in 1755. It was accepted as authoritative for about a hundred years. The excellence of the work is not so much its scholarship as its literary intelligence. It is weak in etymology, as this was still an undeveloped science, but it is strong in understanding of language, and in particular the English language. In the Preface, Johnson writes a short grammar, but he points out that English simplicity of forms and freedom from inflexions make an elaborate one (as grammar was then understood) unnecessary. He makes clear that the spirit of the English language had been unduly influenced by the spirit of French, and he rejects the idea that correctness should be fixed by the authority of an Academy, since the inherent mutability of language will always cause it to follow its own laws. Johnson thus began the English habit of relying upon current English dictionaries and manuals of usage to discover the best existent expression: Fowler's Modern English Usage and the Oxford New English Dictionary are 20th-century descendants of 'Johnson's Dictionary'.

Dictys Cretensis

A supposed eyewitness of the Trojan war who kept a diary of events, Ephemeris Belli Troiani (A Journal of the Trojan War), which, along with the work of the Trojan > Dares, formed the basis for the most influential medieval versions of the Troy story. Dictys, as a warrior on the Greek side, provides a pro-Greek view of events and also includes an account of the homecoming of the Greeks. A small portion of a Greek version of Dictys' work has survived from the early 3rd century but all the rest of the manuscript versions are of Latin reworkings which date from the 4th century. Although the account claims to be that of an eyewitness, the material is basically a rationalized version of events drawn from > Homer's > Iliad, organized chronologically. The narratives of Dictys and Dares were shown to be forgeries in the early 18th century.

▶ Benoît de Sainte-Maure; Troy.

Didactic literature

Literature designed to teach, or to propound in direct terms a doctrine or system of ideas. In practice, it is not always easy to identify; so much literature is didactic in intention but not in form; sometimes writers renounce didactic intentions but in practice use didactic forms. Thus ▷ Spenser declared that ▷ The Faerie Queene was meant to 'fashion a gentleman . . . in vertuous and gentle discipline', but the poem may be enjoyed for its imaginative vision without much regard to its didacticism, and the same is true of > Bunvan's > Pilgrim's Progress. In the 18th century much poetry had at least didactic leanings, such as ▷ Pope's ▷ Essay on Criticism and his > Essay on Man; minor work by other poets is much more unmistakably didactic. The prevalence of didactic poetry in the 18th century arose from the especially high regard this century had for ancient Greek and Latin literature: Hesiod's Works and Days (Greek, 8th century BC) and ➤ Lucretius' De Rerum Natura (Latin, 1st century BC) being the major examples of didactic verse. The Romantic poets of the early 19th century (> Wordsworth, ➤ Coleridge, ➤ Shelley, ➤ Keats) reacted against the 18th-century Augustans, and since then there has been a persistent prejudice against explicit didacticism. In fact much of Wordsworth (eg> The Excursion, 1814) and of Shelley (eg > Queen Mab, 1813) was highly didactic, though the undisguised passion to some extent conceals the fact. The 19th-century novelists, especially > Dickens and > George Eliot, used didactic digressions, but in the former such passages are especially of passionate social invective, and in the latter they are usually more integrated into the imaginative art than is apparent. In the 1930s there was a revival of verse didacticism, especially in the work of ➤ W. H. Auden, eg New Year Letter (1941). In general, the view now is that poets and even novelists may be didactic if they choose. True didacticism, however, requires a body of assumptions commonly held by author and reader, as was true of the age of Pope, but is not so today.

Diderot, Denis (1713-84)

French philosopher, novelist, dramatist and critic, and major figure of the French

Enlightenment; born at Langres in Champagne. He was educated by Jesuits and was employed as a tutor, and by a bookseller.
Diderot became an > atheist, and his arguments for the equality of all mankind anticipate those of the > French Revolution. His was a period of ferocious censorship in France, and Diderot was persecuted by the authorities, and was for a time imprisoned because of his Lettre sur les aveugles ('Letter on the blind' 1749), which set out his materialistic and anti-clerical views. He was known in England particularly for his work on > L'Encyclopédie, translated and expanded from Ephraim Chambers' Cyclopaedia (1728). At first, Diderot worked together with the mathematician D'Alembert, later he headed it alone. The work was published in 17 volumes between 1751 and 1765, with a further 11 volumes of plates completed in 1772. It was an anthology of 'enlightened' views on politics, philosophy and religion, and included contributions by ▷ Voltaire, ▷ Montesquieu, and ➤ Rousseau. It sought to harness all available knowledge, and to show the order and interdependence of its various branches, in a manner embodying the humanistic and rational ideals of the philosophes, including Diderot's own iconoclasm. The Encyclopédie was repeatedly banned because of its perceived challenge to the established order. Later Diderot became a favourite of Catherine II of Russia, whom he visited in 1773, and who gave him financial support. His fiction includes La Religieuse, a study of convent life, and Jacques le fataliste et son maitre (c 1774). His Supplement aux voyages de Bougainville (published posthumously, 1796) contrasts morals and customs of the natural inhabitants of Tahiti with those of civilized Europeans, to the detriment of the latter. Le Neveu de Rameau (date uncertain, probably between 1761 and 1774, published posthumously) is a satiric study of society, in the form of a dialogue between the author, in the role of a philosoper idealist, and a disillusioned beggar. The work was translated by ⊳ Goethe and it influenced the philosopher Hegel, who saw in it a portrait of the 'alienated man'. Diderot's views about literature and life were also expressed in his vast correspondence with society figures and other writers. He admired > Samuel Richardson, whom he described him as a 'painter of nature', to the point of adulation, and greatly helped to popularize his books on the Continent, Much in Diderot's work anticipates views of some later ➤ Romanticists: he has been described as a pantheist, as well as an atheist. His plays were mostly short melodramas.

Bib: Crocker, L. G., Diderot, the Embattled Philosopher.

Différance

> Jacques Derrida

Difference

A term introduced by > Ferdinand de Saussure in his study of linguistics and used in literary theory. It is the means whereby value is established in any system of linguistic signs whether it be spoken or written. Saussure's Course in General Linguistics (1915) argues that in speech it is 'the phonetic contrasts' which permit us to distinguish between one word and another that constitute meaning. In writing the letters used to form words are arbitrary signs, and their values are therefore 'purely negative and differential' (Saussure). The result is that the written sign becomes important only insofar as it is different from other signs within the overall system of language. The notion of difference as a principle of opposition has been extended beyond the limits of Structuralist thinking laid down by Saussure. For example, the ➤ Marxist philosopher ➤ Mikhail Bakhtin in a critique of Saussurean Structuralism argued that 'the forms of signs are conditioned above all by the social organization of the participants involved and also by the immediate conditions of their interaction' (Marxism and The Philosophy of Language; 1930). Thus the clash of opposites through which meaning and value emerge is determined by the social positions of those who use the language. This means that secreted at the very heart of the form of the linguistic sign is a series of dialectical opposites whose interaction refracts the struggle taking place within the larger framework of society itself. For Bakhtin these oppositions can be defined in terms of the struggle between social classes, but the dialectical structure of these conflicts makes the notion of difference suitable for any situation which can be analysed in terms of binary opposites. For example, for ⊳ feminism this would be an opposition between 'masculine' and 'feminine' as the basis upon which sexual identity is constructed. ▶ Jacques Derrida has adapted the term to form the neologism 'differance', which denotes the deferral of meaning whereby no sign can ever be brought into direct alignment with the object that it purports to recall. This means that meaning is always deferred, and can never be final.

Digby Plays

A collection of three medieval plays dating from the 16th century, from the East Anglian region and found with non-literary material in a single manuscript, now kept in Oxford, MS Bodley Digby 133. Two of the plays, Mary Magdalene and The Conversion of St Paul, are rare survivals of the popular medieval genre of saints' plays. The third play, The Killing of the Children, is a self-contained biblical piece written, it seems, for performance on a feast day.

Bib: Baker, Donald et al (eds.), The Late Medieval Religious Plays of Bodleian MSS Digby 133 and E. Muse 160.

Dillon, Wentworth ➤ Roscommon, Fourth Earl of.

Dinesen, Isak

➤ Blixen, Karen.

Discourse

A term used in critical theory. Especially in the writings of > Michel Foucault, 'discourse' is the name given to the systems of linguistic representations through which power sustains itself. For Foucault discourse manifests itself only through concrete examples operating within specific areas of social and institutional practice. He argues that within individual discourses a series of mechanisms are used as means of controlling desire and power, which facilitate 'classification . . . ordering [and] distribution' (Foucault). In this way a mastery is exerted over what appears to be the randomness of everyday reality. It is thus possible to investigate those discourses which have been used to master reality in the past eg discourses concerned with questions of 'sexuality', criminality and judicial systems of punishment, or madness, as Foucault's own work demonstrates. Bib: Foucault, M., The Order of Things; Power/Knowledge: Selected Interviews and Other Writings (ed. C. Gordon).

Dismal science, The Political economy; so called by ➤ Thomas Carlyle because the social thought of such writers as Adam Smith (1723–90) ➤ Jeremy Bentham, ➤ Thomas Malthus and David Ricardo tended to be pessimistic about the alleviation of poverty and inhumanly indifferent to the consequences of economic laws as they saw them.

Displacement

For ⊳ psychoanalytical usage 'displacement' is associated by ▷ Freud (along with ▷ 'condensation') with the mechanisms whereby the conscious mind processes the unconscious in dreams. 'Displacement' is a form of censorship which effectively distorts the ideas which act as the controlling forces of the dream (what Freud calls 'the latent dream-thoughts'), and attaches them to other, more acceptable thoughts or ideas. This complex process is one which involves the omission or re-arrangement of detail, and modification of the dream thoughts. In order to reach the unconscious the 'manifest dream' must be interpreted as a symbolic expression of another text which lies beneath its surface and which is not readily accessible to the conscious mind. This whole mechanism rests on the assumption that psychic energy can attach itself to particular ideas, or objects (cathexis); those ideas or objects are related to the 'latent dream-thoughts', but derive their new-found significance by a process of association. Literature habitually invests objects and ideas with value, and psychic intensity, and the manner in which it does so can be read > psychoanalytically as a manifestation of deeper, more disturbing activities going on in the mind of the writer, or by analogy in the 'unconscious' of the society of which the writer is a part.

Disraeli, Benjamin (Lord Beaconsfield) (1804-81)

Statesman and novelist. He was of Spanish-Jewish descent; his grandfather settled in England in 1748. His political career was brilliant; he entered Parliament in 1837; in the 1840s he was the leader in the House of Commons of a small number of Tory politicians who, as the 'Young England' group, wanted a revival of the party and of the national spirit in an alliance between a spiritually reborn aristocracy and the common people; by 1848 he was leading the Conservatives in the House of Commons; in 1868 and in 1874-80 he had his two periods as one of the most brilliant of English Prime Ministers. Both politically (he secured the vote for the urban working class) and socially (eg his trade union legislation) he at least partly succeeded in securing support for his party from the working class. He was made Earl of Beaconsfield in 1876.

The novels which now chiefly hold attention are his 'Young England Trilogy': ➤ Coningsby (1844); > Sybil (1845) and Tancred (1847). All were written to promulgate his doctrine of Tory Democracy and they all have imperfections, partly because for Disraeli literature was second to politics. On the other hand they have great liveliness of characterization and show keen insight into the structure of society with its cleavage between rich and poor, which Disraeli called 'the two nations'. His other novels are: Vivian Grey (1826); The Young Duke (1831); Alroy and Ixion in Heaven (1833); The Infernal Marriage and The Rise of Iskander (1834); Henrietta Temple and Venetia (1837); Lothair (1870) and Endymion (1880).

Description Descr

Dissenters

A term used for those ➤ Puritans who, owing to their 'dissent' from the established ➤ Church of England, were refused certain political, educational, and (at first) religious rights from the second half of the 17th century. That is to say, they could not enter Parliament, they could not enter a university, and, until 1688, they could not join together in worship.

Puritans were not thus formally restricted before 1660. They were released from their political restraints in 1828. In the 19th century it became more usual to call them Nonconformists or Free Churchmen. The term does not apply to Scotland, where the established Church is Presbyterian, not the episcopalian Church of England.

Dissenters' Schools and Academies
In the 18th century, Protestants who did not belong to the Church of England (ie Dissenters or Nonconformists) were not allowed to attend its schools. They could enter Scottish but not English universities. They therefore set up their own educational institutions which provided efficient education, often more upto-date than that in the schools attended by Anglicans. Dissenting schools and academies became steadily less important in the 19th century, especially after London University was opened in 1828. The last restrictions on non-Anglicans at Oxford and Cambridge were removed in 1871.

Dissociation of Sensibility

A critical expression made famous by > T. S. Eliot, and used in his essay The Metaphysical Poets (1021, included in his Selected Essays). He states: 'In the seventeenth century a dissociation of sensibility set in, from which we have never recovered; and this dissociation . . . was aggravated by the influence of the two most powerful poets of the century, ▷ Milton and Dryden.' Eliot's argument is that before 1660 poets, in particular the ➤ Metaphysical poets, were 'engaged in the task of trying to find the verbal equivalent for states of mind and feeling', and that after that date 'while the language became more refined, the feeling became more crude'. Poetry, henceforward, is put to more specialized purposes: > 'Tennyson and ▶ Browning are poets, and they think; but they do not feel their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose. A thought to ▶ Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility.' The implication behind the argument is that poets (with exceptions) ceased to bring all their faculties to bear upon their art: > 'Racine or Donne looked into a good deal more than the heart. One must look into the cerebral cortex, the nervous system, and the digestive tracts.'

The theory has had great influence. Those who uphold it support it with the evidence provided by the rise of modern prose after 1660, and the gradual displacement of poetry from its centrality in literature thereafter; poetry either subjected itself to the rational discipline of prose $(eg \triangleright \text{Pope})$, or, in the 19th century, it tended to cultivate areas of feeling to which this rational discipline was not relevant $(eg \triangleright \text{Swinburne})$. However, the theory has been attacked for various reasons.

Eliot himself felt that he had used the expression in too simplified a way (Milton, 1974, in Poets and Poetry), and that the causes of the process were more complicated than his earlier essay had implied. Other writers have suggested that such a dissociation did not happen; or that it happened in different ways at different periods; or that, if it did happen, no deterioration in imaginative writing can be attributed to it. See Frank Kermode, Romantic Image and F. W. Bateson in Essays in Criticism, vol. 1.

Dithyramb

A Greek choric ▷ lyric or ▷ hymn in honour of the god Dionysus (Bacchus), and irregular and vehement in rhythm. 'Dithyrambic' is used to describe verse with similar rhythm. Not commonly used in English poetry; the best-known imitation is ▷ Dryden's Alexander's Feast.

Divina Commedia (Divine Comedy)
The principal work of the Italian poet ▷ Dante (1265-1321). For an account of its contents, see the entries under its major sections: ▷ Inferno, ▷ Purgatorio, ▷ Paradiso.
Bib: Cunningham, G. F., The Divine Comedy in English, 1090-1966; Sinclair, J. N. (trans.), The Divine Comedy.

Dixon, Ella Hepworth (1855–1932)
Journalist, short-story writer and feminist.
Dixon's one novel, The Story of a Modern Woman (1894), is an autobiographical account of the loneliness suffered by a woman who leads an independent life as a journalist. It is one of the most moving of the ▷ New Woman novels.

Dobell, Sydney (Thompson) (1824-74) Poet, born in Kent, the son of a wine merchant. Precocious as a child, he never attended school or university but was privately educated in Cheltenham. He married at the age of twenty after a five-year engagement and was said to have never been separated from his wife for more than thirty hours during their thirty years of marriage. His dramatic poem The Roman (1850) supported the cause of Italian nationalism but the publication of the first part of Balder (1854) qualified him for inclusion in the > Spasmodic school of poetry identified and ridiculed by > William Aytoun, who parodied the ludicrous plot in his Firmilian (1854). Dobell never completed his epic poem. Other, less sensationalist, works include England in Time of War (1856), notable for its compassionate and non-jingoistic treatment of the ▶ Crimean War, and a collection of essays, Thoughts on Art, Philosophy, and Religion, which appeared posthumously in 1876.

➤ Gilfillan, George.

Doctor Faustus, The Tragical History of
A tragedy in > blank verse, with comic episodes in prose, by > Christopher Marlowe. The play resembles a medieval ▷ morality play in that its theme is Faustus' sacrifice of his soul to the devil (represented by Mephistophilis) for the sake of unlimited power, glory and enjoyment in this world. On the other hand, it is also thoroughly ▷ Renaissance in its treatment: the conflict of choice is made convincing as it would not have been in a medieval play, and the psychology, not only of Faustus but of Mephistophilis, is presented with moving insight. The medieval and the Renaissance outlooks fuse in Doctor Faustus, showing the very important continuity, as well as the contrast, between the two outlooks.

There are two uncertainties about the play. One is about its date. Marlowe uses the material of the German Faustbuch (Faustbook), which is about an early 16th-century scholar who had claimed powers of black magic, and fuses this historical figure with medieval legends about a man selling his soul to the devil. The earliest surviving English version is dated 1502, and the maturity of the poetry also suggests a date for the play late in Marlowe's live. On the other hand, some critics have found good reason to date Faustus at least as early as 1588. The other uncertainty concerns the extent of Marlowe's authorship. Did he have a collaborator for the comic parts? And were some of these added after his death? The edition of 1616 has considerably extended comedy, as compared with the first edition of 1604. The main reason for suspecting a collaborator is that much of the comedy is superfluous as well as trivial. It is, however, a mistake to suppose that the mere presence of comedy is injurious to the highest tragedy; the combination is frequent in Elizabethan serious drama - tragedies and history plays including > Shakespeare's; and it is one of the inheritances from medieval mystery and morality plays, with which English Renaissance drama kept a close relationship. Some of the comedy in Faustus enriches the tragedy by extending its relevance to common life, eg in the parody in which Faustus' servant, Wagner, also tries his hand at summoning the devil.

> Faust; Mephistopheles.

Doctor Thorne (1858)

The third novel in ➤ Anthony Trollope's ➤ Barsetshire sequence. It was his most popular novel during his lifetime and extends the sequence to take account of county society.

Docwra, Anne (1624-1710)

Quaker author of numerous pamphlets in which she argued for the supremacy of God's word over human laws, and the importance of the 'inner light' as a revelation of God's love. She supported women's active involvement in the Church, and also pleaded for religious tolerance, although she was forceful in attacking those whom she felt were enemies of the Quaker cause. Among these was an apostate Quaker, Francis Brigg, with whom she engaged in a vigorous and colourful > pamphlet war. Docwra defended > George Fox against accusations of indulgence.

Doggerel

Any carelessly made, irregular verse, often of a frivolous nature. The term is used by the host in ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales in regard to the tale of ▷ Sir Thopas, told by Chaucer himself as one of the pilgrims: "This may wel be rym doggerel", quod he'.

Doll's House, A (1879)

A bold and controversial play by Norwegian dramatist ➤ Henrik Ibsen written in 1879 and first performed in London in 1889. In it Ibsen describes the financial and intellectual enslavement of Nora by her husband and the play discusses notions of individual freedom and social conformity, and in particular the relationship of this debate to the position of women. The play provoked a storm of controversy. It was criticized for its 'immorality' – a point of view satirized by ➤ George Bernard Shaw as 'Ibsenism' – and praised by supporters of the ➤ Women's Movement for its daring and emancipated conclusion.

Dombey and Son (1847-8)

One of the earliest of the mature novels by ➤ Charles Dickens. Dombey is a proud and heartless London merchant whose sole interest in life is the perpetuation of his name in connection with his firm. For this reason he neglects his deeply affectionate daughter Florence for the sake of his little son, Paul, whom, however, he values not for himself but as the future embodiment of his firm. The boy is motherless, deprived of affection and physically delicate - he dies in childhood. To prevent Florence from marrying a mere clerk in his firm, Dombey sends her lover - Walter Gay - on business to an unhealthy colony in the West Indies. Dombey's pride makes him susceptible to flattery; he is preyed upon by Carker, his manager, one of Dickens' most notable villains, and by Major Joe Bagstock. He is led into marriage with a cold, disillusioned girl, Edith Granger, who runs away from him with Carker. Both his pride and his wealth are eventually taken from him and he finds himself in the end dependent on the forgiving Florence and Walter Gay. A particular interest of the book is that railways play an important part in it just at the time when they were transforming English life. The sombreness of Dombey's mansion is opposed to the warmhearted if unbusinesslike environment of the shop of Solomon Gills, Gay's uncle.

Domesday Book

(Dome = doom, ie judgement, implying a complete and final record as on the Day of Judgement at the end of the world.) The record of a survey carried out by the order of > William I and completed in 1086. It contains a description of the greater part of the landed property of England and was compiled to assist taxation and other government purposes.

Dominicans

▶ Friars.

Don Juan

The hero of legends from various European countries. His exploits were the subject of the Spanish play El Burlador de Sevilla by Tirso de Molina (1571–1641), who gave him his distinctive character of sensual adventurer. Plays and stories were woven round him in French and Italian, and he is the protagonist of an opera by Mozart (Don Giovanni). In English literature by far the most important work about him is the satirical epic > Don Juan (1819–24) by > Lord Byron.

Don Juan (1819-24)

> Lord Byron's unfinished satirical epic in > ottava rima, based very freely on the legendary figure of ➤ Don Juan. After a love affair in Spain (Canto I), Juan is sent abroad by his mother, but is shipwrecked and washed ashore on a Greek island where he is cared for by a Greek maiden, Haidee, Cantos III and IV describe their love and the destruction of their relationship by Haidee's pirate father, Lambro. In Canto V Juan has been sold as a slave to a Turkish princess who loves him; and in Cantos VI, VII and VIII he escapes and serves the Russian army against the Turks in the siege of Ismail. In Canto IX he attracts the attention of the Russian Empress, Catherine the Great, who in Canto X sends him on a mission to England, the setting for Cantos XI-XIII. Juan's affair with a duchess, and his deeper emotion for an English Catholic girl, are used as foci for a free-ranging satire on contemporary society. Juan has fewer mistresses in Byron's poem than in earlier versions of the legend, and is portrayed essentially as an ingénu, more often seduced by women than the seducer. The story-line is however subordinated to the philosophizing commentary of the poet himself, which ranges from flippant witticism ('What men call gallantry, and gods adultery,/ Is much more common where the climate's sultry'), through the moving rhetoric of the inserted lyric 'The isles of Greece', to harsh satire on 'the best of cutthroats', the Duke of Wellington ('And I shall be delighted to learn who,/ Save you and yours, have gain'd by Waterloo?'). The greatness of the poem derives from its flexible and informal metrical form which, unlike the ➤ Spenserian stanzas of > Childe Harold's Pilgrimage and the couplets of his verse tales, allows Byron to give full expression to his complex and contradictory personality.

Don Quixote de la Mancha (1605-15) A satirical romance by the Spanish writer Miguel de Cervantes (1547-1616). It begins as a satire on the medieval and > Renaissance style of romance about wandering knights and their adventures in the pursuit of the rectification of injustices. It deepens into an image of idealism perpetually at odds with the pettinesss, vulgarity and meanness of the real world. Don Quixote is an impecunious gentleman whose mind has been turned by reading too many romances. He sets out on his wanderings accompanied by his servant, Sancho Panza, the embodiment of commonplace credulity and a shrewd sense of personal advantage. He takes as his patroness a peasant girl, Dulcinea del Toboso, whom he transfigures in his imagination and who is quite unaware of his devotion. The book was translated into English in 1612-20, and again a hundred years later in a more famous version by Peter Motteux. Its influence on our literature has been extensive. In the 17th century the burlesque element is emulated by Francis Beaumont in his play ➤ The Knight of the Burning Pestle and by > Samuel Butler in his mock epic > Hudibras.

Donne, John (1572-1631)

Poet, Dean of St Paul's and prose writer. John Donne is (and was) regarded as one of the most important writers of the > Renaissance period. The early part of his life was spent at the margins of the Elizabethan court. He took part in the expeditions of the ⊳ Earl of Essex to Cadiz in 1596 and the Azores in 1597, and became private secretary to the Lord Keeper, Sir Thomas Egerton, in 1508. He travelled on the continent in 1605-6 and 1611-12. Originally a Roman Catholic, he was ordained into the Anglican Church in 1615, becoming Reader in Divinity at Lincoln's Inn in 1616, and Chaplain to Viscount Doncaster's embassy into Germany in 1619. In 1621 he was made Dean of St Paul's, and in the following year an Honorary Member of the Council of the Virginia Company.

Donne's works cover an enormous variety of genres and subjects. They include religious works such as the Devotions on Emergent Occasions published in 1624 and the Essays in Divinity (1651); anti-Catholic works such as Pseudo-Martyr (1610) and Ignatius his Conclave (1611); a considerable number of sermons (collections appearing in 1625, 1626, 1634 and 1640); a treatise on suicide entitled Biathanatos (1646); a collection of paradoxes (1633); and, in poetry, ▷ satires, ▷ lyrics, ▷ elegies, ▷ epigrams, verse letters and divine ▷ sonnets.

As a preacher, Donne was justly famous in an age of famous preachers, as > Izaak Walton, his first biographer, recalled. His poetry, however, with the important exception of the two anniversary poems of 1611 and 1612, did not, for the most part, appear until after his death, when a collection was published in 1633. His poetry was, however, well known among his contemporaries, numerous manuscript versions of both his secular and his religious verse being in circulation. Donne's privileged status in the canon of English literature only came about in the first part of the 20th century (1920-50), when the highly-wrought and intellectual witticism of his verse fitted the critical tenor of the day, that is > new criticism. Recent attempts have been made to see Donne as more anxious (I. Carey), but the pre-World War II image remains entrenched. The recent discovery of the Dalhousie Manuscripts, which provide us with contemporary transcriptions, implies that editions of Donne's work will change over the next decade.

Bib: Grierson, H. J. C. (ed.), Poems (2 vols.); Smith, A. J. (ed.), John Donne: The Complete English Poems; Patrides, C. A. (ed.), The Complete English Poems of John Donne; Bald, R. C., Donne: A Life; Carey, J., John Donne: Life Mind Art; Parfitt, G., John Donne: A Literary Life. ▶ Songs and Sonnets.

Doolittle, Hilda

➤ H. D.

D'Orsay, Alfred Guillaume Gabriel, Count (1801-52)

Artist and dandy. A Frenchman who came under the patronage of ➤ Marguerite, Countess of Blessington, with whose entourage he travelled on the continent, meeting ➤ Byron, of whom he made a now famous pencil sketch.

Dorset Garden Theatre

The Dorset Garden Theatre, also known as the Duke's Theatre because of its patronage by the Duke of York, later ➤ James II, was designed by ➤ Sir Christopher Wren for ➤ Sir William D'Avenant, and was considered the most magnificent public theatre when it opened in 1671.

The stage had four doors, two on each side, admitting the performers to a deep forestage or apron stage which projected into the pit, past the side-boxes. On this the prologue was spoken, and much of the acting took place, allowing great intimacy between actors and audience. Scene changes were carried out in full view of the audience, the curtain or front 'scene' being moved only at the beginnings and ends of performances; actors could step forward or backward into different, perhaps newly revealed, 'sets' as they were speaking. This made possible fast-paced, fluid action, particularly in comedy. From the first the Dorset Garden specialized in staging the very elaborate performances, including many operas, as distinct from the Theatre Royal Drury Lane (▶ Drury Lane Theatres), which concentrated on plays. After the ▶ King's Company and ▶ Duke's Company were merged in 1682, Dorset Garden continued for a time to be the main venue for spectacles. In 1689 it was renamed the Queen's Theatre, in deference to Queen ▶ Mary II. It gradually fell out of use, and was demolished in 1709.

➤ Theatres.

Dorset, Lord

➤ Sackville, Thomas.

Dorset, Sixth Earl of (1638–1706)
Poet and patron. Charles Sackville, Lord
Buckhurst, and later Earl of Dorset, was a Restoration courtier and author of ▷ satires and ▷ lyric poems (Works, 1714). ▷ John Dryden's Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of Satire is addressed to him, and contains high praise for his poetry.

Dostoevsky, Fyodor Mikhailovich (1821-81). Russian novelist. Born in Moscow and educated at the St Petersburg Engineering Academy, he was arrested in 1849 for his socialist activities and spent eight years in a penal colony and in the army, during which period he experienced a religious conversion (to the Russian Orthodox Church), an experience which informs his major works. These include Notes from the House of the Dead (1869-61), The Insulted and the Injured (1861), Notes from the Underground (1864), Crime and Punishment (1866), The Idiot (1868), The Devils (1872) and The Brothers Karamazov (1880). Dostoevsky's moral and religious intensity, the compelling momentum of his narrative and his insight into extreme and disturbed states of mind have made his work highly influential in England, especially during the 20th century (much of his work was translated into English during the 1880s).

Double-Dealer, The (1694)

Busy and rather bitter play by > William Congreve. At its heart is the Machiavellian character of Maskwell, an arch dissembler and schemer. Setting himself up as everyone's friend and ally, he contrives to deceive and entrap each character in his single-minded plot to indulge his own lust and greed. His aim is to displace his supposed friend Mellefont, both in the fortune Mellefont is due to inherit from his uncle and aunt, Lord and Lady Touchwood, and in the hand of Cynthia as his wife. The means by which he almost succeeds are shown with infinite skill, as he manipulates other gullible and fallible characters, and situations, with breathtaking credibility. He seduces and then uses Lady Touchwood, and exploits the unhappiness of two other couples. A recurring feature is the ease with which the wives manage to allay their husbands' suspicions of their cuckoldry. Only two characters emerge from this comparatively unstained: Cynthia, and Mellefont − but even he is tainted (as Congreve points out in the preface) by his blind and stubborn adherence to Maskwell. The play's seamy and unpleasant atmosphere is mitigated by scenes of high comedy. It recalls, to some extent, ▷ William Wycherley's ▷ The Plain Dealer, and looks forward to ▷ Oliver Goldsmith's The Good-Natur'd Man.

Doubting Castle

In Part I of ▷ John Bunyan's ▷ Pilgrim's Progress, the castle belonging to the Giant Despair, where Christian and Hopeful lie prisoners. In Part II the Castle is destroyed by the champion Greatheart.

Douglas, Black

The Douglases were a family of the Scottish medieval border nobility, constantly at war with the English ▶ Percy family on the south side of the border. Two famous Douglases bore the epithet 'Black': James Douglas (?1286–1330), supporter of Robert the Bruce in the Scottish War of Independence, and eventually killed fighting the Moors in Spain; Archibald Douglas (also called 'the Grim'), another famous warrior, who lived later in the 14th century.

> Chevy Chase, The Ballad of; Otterbourne, The Battle of.

Douglas, Gavin (?1475–1522)
Scottish poet and Bishop of Dunkeld. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he wrote only in the vernacular, and is most famous for his translation of ▷ Virgil's ▷ Aeneid, Aeneados, printed in 1533, which seems to have been used by the ▷ Earl of Surrey. His allegorical poem, the Palice of Honor (1501), was influenced by ▷ Chaucer's House of Fame. Douglas, who was heavily involved in ecclesiastical and secular politics, died in exile in England.

Bib: Small, J. (ed.), Works, Bawcutt, P., Gavin

Douglas, Keith (1920-44)

Douglas: A Critical Study.

Poet. Keith Douglas was born in Kent, and educated at Oxford University under the tutorship of poet ➤ Edward Blunden, before enlisting with the British Army when World War II broke out. He is the most famous English poet of that war, although he began publishing his work at the age of 16. His verse is precise, unsentimental and at times chilling, in its treatment of desire and sexuality as well as in its pervasive obsession with death and the relation of death to writing. Douglas was killed in Normandy, having also written about his involvement in the war in North Africa, his slim but intensely powerful corpus concluded at an early age. His work began to receive the acclaim it deserves only when ▶ Ted Hughes, a great admirer, edited and introduced a collection in 1964 (Selected Poems). See also the more recent Complete Poems (ed. Desmond Graham; 1978).

'Dover Beach'

A poem of religious doubt and despair by Matthew Arnold, published in New Poems (1867), and probably the best known of all his works. It contains the line 'Ah, love, let us be true to one another', and is a classic statement of the transitory nature of religious faith to which the speaker opposes love and faithfulness.

Dowden, Edward (1894-1913)

Critic and scholar born in Cork and educated at Queen's College and Trinity College, Dublin where he was appointed Professor of English Studies in 1867. He is distinguished for his work on Shakespeare, editing twelve plays for the original Arden edition and writing Shakspeare: A Critical Study of His Mind and Art (1875), which was the first book in English to attempt a study of Shakespeare's development as a dramatist, although he sentimentalized his poetry. He also wrote A Shakspeare Primer (1877), a study of the poet Southey (1879) and biographies of Shelley (1886) and ▷ Browning (1905). He was also one of the earliest admirers of Walt Whitman, and his own Poems appeared in 1876. ▶ Irish Literature in English.

Dowland, John (1563-1626)

Composer and lutenist. Refused the post of court lutenist by ▷ Elizabeth I, Dowland travelled on the continent from 1594 to 1606, becoming famous throughout Europe as a composer for the lute. He was finally given the post of court lutenist by ▷ James I, but does not appear to have composed any work of note after this overdue royal recognition. He wrote three books of Songs or Ayres (1597, 1600 and 1603) while abroad, from which several songs are still known today.

Bib: Poulton, D., John Dowland.

Dowriche, Anne

Poet. Anne Edgecombe was married to Hugh Dowriche, the rector of Honiton, and in 1589 published her major work, The French Historie, A Lamentable Discourse of Three of the Chiefe and Most Famous Bloodie Broiles That Have Happened in France for the Gospell Of Jesus Christ, which recounts the suffering of the Protestant martyrs in France in a manner similar to that of ▷ John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563).

The poem is written in > alexandrines and includes many long heroic speeches by the major characters.

> Protestantism.

Dowson, Ernest (Christopher) (1867-1900) Poet, born in Kent and one of the most talented of the circle of late 1890's English poets known as the Decadents. He was an active member of the > Rhymers' Club (1891-4), which included W.B. Yeats (1865-1939), ➤ Arthur Symons (1865-1943), Richard Le Gallienne (1866-1947), Lionel Johnson (1867-1902), ➤ Aubrey Beardsley and occasionally ➤ Oscar Wilde. He contributed poems to the ▷ Yellow Book and the Savoy. He left Queen's College, Cambridge without a degree, due to a decline in his family's fortunes and worked at his father's dock. His literary idols were Edgar Allan Poe, ➤ Baudelaire, Verlaine (1844–96) and > Swinburne and in 1801 he met the twelve-year-old Adelaide Foltinowicz, who became the inspiration for much of his poetry and a symbol of love and innocence which counteracted his world-weariness, despite her refusal of his offer of marriage. In the same year he converted to Roman > Catholicism and published his best-known poem 'Non Sum Qualis Eram Bonae sub Régno Cynarae', remembered for its refrain 'I have been true to you Cynara, in my fashion'. After the deaths of his parents in 1894 he discovered symptoms of his own tuberculosis. Adelaide married a waiter in her father's restaurant and Dowson moved to France where he was discovered wretched, penniless and addicted to absinthe by his friend R.H. Sherard, in whose house he died. The poet of ennui and idealized love, his verse first achieved attention in Poems (1896). Decorations, which included experimental prose poems, followed in 1899. Dowson's output, as were his themes, was limited, but his poems are remarkable for their lyricism and cadence and he had a significant influence on Yeats and Rupert Brooke (1887-1915). Dowson also published two novels in collaboration with Arthur Moore - A Comedy of Masks (1893) and Adrian Rome (1899) - and a one-act verse play, The Pierrot of the Minute (1897). His Letters were published in 1967. Bib: Davidson, D., British Poetry of the 1890s.

Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan (1859–1930) Novelist; chiefly noted for his series of stories and novels about the amateur detective, Sherlock Holmes, a genius in minute deduction and acute observations. His friend, Dr Watson, is represented as the ordinary, ingenuous man, who needs to have everything pointed out to him and explained; and this offsets the ingenuity of the detective. The combination of acute detective and obtuse colleague has been imitated in many detective stories ever since.

The stories include: A Study in Scarlet (1887); The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1891); The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1893); The Hound of the Baskervilles (1902); The Return of Sherlock Holmes (1905). Conan Doyle also wrote historical novels of merit; eg Micah Clarke (1888), The White Company (1891), and Rodney Stone (1896).

> Detective fiction: Historical novel. Bib: Lamond, J., Conan Doyle: a Memoir; Conan Doyle, A., The True Conan Doyle; Carr, J.D., The Life of Conan Doyle; Roberts, S.C., Holmes and Watson; Pearsall, R; Conan Doyle: A Biographical Solution.

Doyle, Roddy (b 1958)

Irish novelist and dramatist, who teaches English and Geography in a North Dublin school. He is best known for his Barrytown Trilogy, affectionate and comic portraits of the struggles, joys and frustrations of working-class Dublin life, focusing on the Rabitte family: The Commitments (1987), about the formation of a Dublin soul band, was filmed by Alan Parker; The Snapper (1990), about an initially unwanted but eventually welcomed baby, was filmed by Stephen Frears; The Van (1991) is the story of two friends who run a fish-andchip van after they are made redundant. Doyle makes rich use of the nuances of the local idiom and writes extensive dialogue. Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha (1993) won the Booker Prize. Plays: Brownbread (1987); War (1989).

Drabble, Margaret (b 1939)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Sheffield and educated at Cambridge University. The novelist > A.S. Byatt is her sister. She achieved considerable popular success with her novels of the 1960s, which dealt with the personal dilemmas of intelligent and educated heroines. In The Millstone (1965) Rosamund struggles for independence, and achieves relative stability and a sense of moral responsibility through her love for her baby daughter, the result of a casual liaison. Drabble's later novels broaden their scope, subsuming feminist issues in a general concern for equality and justice, and addressing wider national and international issues. The Needle's Eye (1972) established her as a major writer by the moral intensity of its concern with social justice. The Ice Age (1977) is a sombre picture of the corrupt and sterile condition of Britain in the mid-1970s. Drabble sees herself as a social historian, and admires the novelist ➤ Arnold Bennett, a biography of whom she published in 1974. The literary allusion which has been a feature of all her work becomes more marked in the 1970s, and her narrative techniques become more adventurous, as in the three points of view, alterations of style and self-conscious authorial voice of The Realms of Gold (1975). Her other novels are: A Summer Bird-Cage (1962); The Garrick Year (1964); Terusalem the Golden (1967); The Waterfall (1969); The Middle Ground (1980); The Radiant Way (1987); A Natural Curiosity and Gates of Ivory (1991). Story collections: Penguin Modern Stories 3 (with others) (1969); Hassam's Tower (1980). She also edited The Oxford Companion to English Literature (1985). Bib: Creighton, I. V., Margaret Drabble,

Dracula (1897)

A novel by > Bram Stoker which has become, like Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1818), a modern myth. The story opens with the diary of Jonathon Harker, who falls victim to Count Dracula whilst acting as his solicitor. Dracula then travels to Whitby where the story is resumed in letter form by Harker's fiancée, Mina Murray, who witnesses her friend Lucy Westenra fall under Dracula's spell. A stake through the heart restores Lucy to peace and Dracula is thwarted in his pursuit of Mina and finally destroyed. Elaine Showalter reads the novel as a 'decadent fantasy of reproduction through transfusion', with strong hints of homoeroticism, and as an attack on the sexual daring of the > 'New Woman'.

> Horror fiction. Bib: Showalter, E., Sexual Anarchy: Gender and Culture at the Fin de Siècle.

Drake, Sir Francis (?1549-96)

Built up at the end of the 19th and early 20th century as a national hero for his seafaring exploits. He engaged in numerous voyages in which he successfully raided Spain and her American colonies, and circumnavigated the world in his ship the Golden Hind, 1577-81. He was one of the commanders of the English fleet against the > Armada during the attempted Spanish invasion of 1588. Bib: Williams, N., Francis Drake.

Dramatic Irony

Dramatic irony occurs when a character in a play makes a statement in innocent assurance of its truth, while the audience is well aware that he or she is deceived.

Dramatic monologue

A poetic form in which the poet invents a character, or, more commonly, uses one from history or legend, and reflects on life from the character's standpoint. The dramatic monologue is a development from the > conversation poem of > Coleridge and > Wordsworth, in which the poet reflects on life in his own person.

> Tennyson was the first to use the form, eg > The Lotos-Eaters (1833), Ulysses (1842) and Tithonus (pub. 1860). In these poems, he takes the standpoint of characters in Greek myth and causes them to express emotions relevant to their predicaments. The emotions, however, are really more relevant to those of Tennyson's own age, but the disguise enables him to express himself without inhibition, and particularly without involving himself in the responsibility of having to defend the attitudes that he is expressing. His most ambitious poem in this form is the monodrama > Maud (1855).

However it was ➤ Robert Browning who used the form most profusely, and with whom it is most associated, eg My Last Duchess (1845); Fra Lippo Lippi, Andrea del Sarto, The Bishop Orders His Tomb, Bishop Blougram's Apology, all in > Men and Women (1855); Mr Sludge the Medium in > Dramatis Personae (1864); and The Ring and the Book (1869). Browning used it differently from Tennyson: his characters are more detached from his own personality; the poems are attempts to explore a wide variety of attitudes to art and life. His monologues have little to do with drama, though superficially they resemble soliloquies in plays of the age of Shakespeare. They have an even closer resemblance, though still a rather superficial one, to the medieval convention of public confession by characters such as the Wife of Bath and the Pardoner in ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales. Most of all, however, they emulate the exploration of character and society in the novel of Browning's own day, and his The Ring and the Book is really an experiment in the novel; the tale unfolds through monologues by the various participators in and spectators of the events. Still another use for the dramatic monologue is that to which > Arthur Clough puts it in his poem Dipsychus (Divided Mind, 1850). This poem is in the form of a dialogue, but it is a dialogue between the two parts of a man's mind: that which tries to sustain moral principle, and that which is sceptical of principle, seeking only pleasure and material well-being.

A more searching irony was brought to the dramatic monologue by ➤ T. S. Eliot in The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock (1915) and Gerontion (1920). Since the 1930s a range of different developments have tended to make the dramatic monologue seem either false or outdated. The emphasis on authenticity of voice in poetry of the 1950s and 1960s, and the current tendency to foreground the author's ethnic origins in the language used (as in 'dub' poetry), have little use for a form to which indirectness is so intrinsic. However, the dramatic monologue has certain affinities with first-person ➤ narration and ➤ stream of consciousness in the novel.

Dramatic Studies (1866)

The first collection of poetry by ➤ Augusta Webster, including the much-admired poem 'Snow-waste'. The ➤ dramatic monologues of the collection show the influence of ➤ Robert Browning, but Webster's subjects tend to be related specifically to women's experience, as in 'By The Looking Glass', a poem about spinsterhood. The > realism and directness of the verse disturbed some Victorian critics.

Dramatis Personae (1864)

A collection of poems by ➤ Robert Browning, including a number of his more famous ones: 'Abt Vogler', 'Rabbi Ben Ezra', 'A Death in the Desert', 'Caliban upon Setebos', 'Mr Sludge the Medium'.

Drapier's Letters (1724)

A series of pamphlets by ▷ Jonathan Swift against a monopoly to issue copper coins in Ireland, granted by the English Government to the Duchess of Kendal (▷ George I's mistress) and sold by her to William Wood ('Wood's halfpence'). The Irish considered that the monopoly would be economically harmful to them. Swift wrote in their support in the semblance of a Dublin 'drapier' (= draper), ie an ordinary shopman. The pamphlets are an example of his apparently moderate, plain style carrying an immense force of irony; they were so effective that the Government had to withdraw the monopoly.

Drayton, Michael (1563-1631)

Poet. Little is known of the life of this prolific writer, whose works encompassed a wide range of ▷ genres and subject matter. His collection of ▷ sonnets, gathered under the title Idea's Mirror, first appeared in 1594, and consists of 51 sonnets, mainly in the ▷ Petrarchan mode. The sequence was continuously revised, with additions appearing in the editions of 1602, 1605 and the final version of 1619.

Apart from sonnets, however, Drayton wrote > eclogues indebted to > Edmund Spenser, > Ovidian verses and historical poetry. Of his historical poetry, Piers Gaveston (1593, revised in 1596) is remarkable for its combination of the Ovidian and the homoerotic. In 1596, Drayton published the first version of a historical narrative Mortimeriados – an ambitious account, in verse, of the events which ➤ Christopher Marlowe was to dramatize in his play Edward II.

In common with Spenser and ➤ Samuel Daniel, Drayton was alert to the importance of celebrating the idea of the nation-state. Drayton's contribution to this late Elizabethan project was the topographical verse description of England, Poly-Olbion (Part I, 1612; Part II, 1622). Poly-Olbion sets out to celebrate, in ➤ alexandrine verse, not only the geographical features of England, but the customs and histories of all the counties of the kingdom. It was an ambitious project which was never to reach completion. But Poly-Olbion was only one part of Drayton's desire to celebrate English history. Another aspect of his historiographical enterprise is revealed in the publication, in 1606, of his Poems Lyric and Pastoral. The collection contains two verse accounts on themes of considerable national importance — a version of ▷ Richard Hakluyt's 'First Voyage to Virginia', and an account of the battle of Agincourt based mainly on ▷ Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles. The creation of a national past and the formation of a national identity can thus be seen as merging in the work of this writer.

→ Histories and Chronicles.
Bib: Hebel, J. W., Tillotson, K. and Newdigate,
B. H. (eds.), Complete Works (4 vols.); Brink,
J. R., Michael Drayton Revisited; Hardin, R. F., Drayton and the Passing of Elizabethan England.

Dream of John Ball, A (1888)

A story by ➤ William Morris serialized in The Commonweal, 1886–7, in which the protagonist describes a dream in which he is transported back to Kent during the peasant's revolt of 1381. John Ball, a dissenting priest, inspires the peasants to victory and later discusses their hopes and plans for change with Morris. Morris describes the 19th century and the Industrial Revolution, whereupon John Ball realizes he is, in fact, dreaming of the future. A Dream of John Ball anticipates Morris' News From Nowhere (1890) in its use of the dream motif to link past, present and future.

Dream of the Rood

A highly sophisticated ▷ Old English ▷ dreamvision poem which relates the dreamer's encounter with a speaking Cross. The Cross recounts its experience of the Crucifixion, its subsequent burial and its resurrection as a Christian symbol. The poem is preserved only in an 11th-century copy but the material seems to have originated much earlier. The 8th-century preaching cross, the Ruthwell Cross preserved in Dumfriesshire has an inscription which closely resembles parts of the Cross's speech in the Dream of the Rood.

➤ Qld English literature.
Bib: Swanton, M. (ed.), The Dream of the Rood.

Dream-vision poetry

An important medieval narrative form. What is distinctive about the category of medieval dream-vision poetry is not that a dream sequence is included in the narrative but that a dream sequence offers the framework for a narrative which is presented as the reported experience of the narrator/dreamer. The traditions behind medieval dream-vision poetry are as diverse as the literary dream-experiences themselves: dream-vision poetry is a distinctive, but not homogeneous, literary category. There are numerous classical and biblical precedents for the use of dreams and visions as the mediums for philosophical and/or spiritual truths, but as developed by medieval vernacular poets from the 13th century onwards, the dream-vision form appears to have offered the opportunity for self-conscious literary creation in the guise of unconscious experience. The Old French poem, the > Roman de la Rose, provided an especially influential paradigm for later vernacular writers.

The speculative licence of dream-vision poetry is used by medieval writers in many different ways. The frequent appearance of personifications within dream-vision poetry indicates the analytical interest of many of the texts in otherwise hidden processes. Sometimes dream-vision poems investigate the workings of the individual psyche, especially the inner experience of sacred and profane kinds of love (such as in > Chaucer's > Book of the Duchess, or the ▷ Gawain poet's ▷ Pearl); sometimes the form is used to examine the veiled workings of contemporary society itself and the dream experience becomes the occasion for social satire. In ➤ William Langland's complex visionary narrative, > Piers Plomman, the sequence of dream visions (including the experience of dreams within dreams) is the occasion for a highly challenging enquiry into the interaction of inner and outer worlds, personal and public history, in Christian society. A number of Middle English ➤ alliterative narratives, dating from the 14th century, use the dream-vision form for literary debates about issues of personal/public ethics (such as > Winner and Waster, Death and Life, the > Parlement of the Three Ages). Chaucer's dream-vision poems are especially bookish in their orientation: in the Book of the Duchess, the > House of Fame and the > Parliament of Foulys, the activity of reading a book prompts the narrators' dreams. Vernacular writers from the 15th and early 16th centuries (such as ➤ Robert Henryson, ➤ William Dunbar, > John Skelton) continue to employ the dream-vision mode in their works, but the dream-vision form is less frequently used as the frame for a large-scale narrative thereafter, perhaps because fictional activity no longer required a framing justification. Bib: Spearing, A. C., Medieval Dream Poetry.

Druids

The wise and holy men of the ancient Celts in Gaul, ancient Britain, and Ireland. We know about them from Roman writers (eg Julius Caesar in De Bello Gallico) and from Welsh and Irish myth. They held the oak and the mistletoe as sacred, worshipped in oak groves, and believed in the survival of the soul and its transmigration after death into other bodies. There seems to be some doubt as to whether they ever flourished in southern Britain, where in any case they were eliminated by the Roman conquest in the 1st century AD, but they were important in Ireland and in > Scotland, and the early Welsh ⊳ bards, or sacred poets, called themselves druids. Caesar does not mention bards but ascribes to the druids a bardic, or sacred, poetic function. In the 18th and 19th centuries a cult of the druids grew up in England, attributing to them mysterious knowledge and wisdom.

Drummond, William, of Hawthornden (1585–1649)

Scottish poet. Drummond's first publication was a eulogy on the death of Prince Henry, the eldest son of ⊳ James I of England, published in 1613. A volume of poems was published in 1614, and then withdrawn, revised, and republished as Poems: Amorous, Funeral, Divine, Pastoral, in Sonnets, Songs, Sextains, Madrigals, whose title indicates the range of Drummond's interests. A large proportion of the verses contained in the 1616 collection are paraphrases and translations of continental writers. Other volumes of verse followed, including a celebration of the visit of James I to Edinburgh in 1618. Perhaps Drummond's most famous work is not poetic, however, but is instead his record of a series of remarkable conversations with Ben Ionson, who visited Drummond in 1618. Drummond was careful to keep a record of Jonson's conversation, though much of what was said is the product (one supposes) of a good deal of drink rather than critical insight. Nevertheless, Conversations with Drummond of Hawthornden, first published in 1711, does suggest something of Jonson's wit. Bib: MacDonald, R. H. (ed.), Poems and Prose of William Drummond of Hawthornden.

Drury Lane Theatres

The first was an old riding school in Bridges Street, converted by ➤ Thomas Killigrew to form the original Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, also known as the King's Theatre.

In 1682 the ▷ King's Company was absorbed by the ▷ Duke's, and the resulting ▷ United Company continued to stage plays at Drury Lane, and the larger spectacles and operas at ▷ Dorset Garden. After a difficult period under ▷ Christopher Rich, the theatre prospered with ▷ Colley Cibber, ▷ Robert Wilks, Thomas Doggett (c1670-1721), and various other managers jointly in charge, and then again under ▷ David Garrick, who took over in 1747.

In 1776 upon Garrick's retirement, Drury Lane was taken over by ➤ Richard Brinsley Sheridan, who continued to run it until its destruction by fire in 1809. The present theatre opened in 1812.

> Theatres.

Dryden, John (1631-1700)

Poet, critic, dramatist. By family background and personal sympathies he was on the ▷ Puritan, anti-monarchical side during the Protectorate, and in an early poem, Heroique Stanzas (1659) he eulogized ▷ Oliver Cromwell, who had died in 1658. However, like many others, he welcomed the Restoration, composing Astræa Redux (1660) and Panegyric (1661) to welcome the king's return. With the ▷ Earl of Rochester he dominated English letters in the reign of ▷ Charles II, being appointed ▷ Poet Laureate in 1668 and Historiographer Royal in 1670. On the accession of ▷ James II in 1685 Dryden became a ▷ Catholic, and refusing to abandon his new faith after 1688, he was stripped of the Laureateship and other royal appointments.

It was in the theatre that Dryden enjoyed the greatest financial success, and between 1663 and 1681 he wrote almost a play a year. His best dramatic work, ▷ All for Love (1677), is an entirely new version of ▷ Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra. The Indian Empress (1667), The Conquest of Granada (1669–70), and ▷ Aureng-Zebe (1675) are heroic dramas on the grand model of the French dramatist ▷ Corneille. He also wrote comedies such as ▷ Marriage à la Mode (1673).

Dryden's first poetic works, such as his brilliant Upon the death of the Lord Hastings (1640), belong to the overblown decadence of 'metaphysical' wit. > Annus Mirabilis (1667) looks at the events of 1666, including sea engagements with the Dutch and the ▶ Great Fire. It maintains a ▶ baroque elaboration of imagery, but presented in a new public, > Augustan manner. His greatest works are political > satires in > heroic > couplets, a form which his example secured in preeminence for several decades after his death. ➤ Absalom and Achitophel (1681-2) shows an ironic assurance of tone, a novelist's eye for telling characterization, a complex layering of imagery, and a virtuoso flair for fast-running narrative. Occasionally his satire is biting and cruel, as in the passage on ➤ Shaftesbury (Achitophel). Elsewhere there is good-humoured 'raillery' in the portrait of the Duke of Buckingham (Zimri) ('A man so various, that he seem'd to be / Not one, but all Mankind's Epitome'), and broad farce in the passage on Settle and ➤ Thomas Shadwell in Part II.

➤ The Medall (1682) continued the attack on the first Earl of Shaftesbury, while > MacFlecknoe (1682) shows Dryden in a more relaxed, uninhibited mood, again attacking Shadwell (the man who was to succeed him as laureate) in a burlesque lampoon which is purely, even at times surrealistically, comic. The two long didactic poems ➤ Religio Laici (1682) and > The Hind and the Panther (1687), on the religious question which at the time divided his sympathy, contain fine passages, but their didactic mode makes them difficult to admire today. Similarly the rhetoric of his Pindaric odes (eg Alexander's Feast, 1697) tends to be regarded now as artificial. Despite its public and impersonal cast, Dryden's poetry can on occasion be deeply moving, as in the elegy on his friend > John Oldham. His last poetic work, Fables Ancient and Modern (1699), is a series of translations from ➤ Homer, ➤ Ovid, ➤ Boccaccio and Chaucer.

Dryden has been called 'the Father of English prose'. He set his own stamp on the new informal, persuasive style, which under the new constitutional system, replaced the ornamental court prose of the absolutist ➤ Tudors and early > Stuarts. He also produced the first extended works of literary theory in the language. A Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of Satire relates the different classical styles of satire found in ▷ Juvenal and ▷ Horace to modern English writing, including his own. His celebrated essay Of Dramatic Poesy discusses the principles of drama and judiciously compares the qualities of ➤ Ben Jonson and ➤ Shakespeare. The Preface to the Fables (1700) brings a very modern sense of historical perspective to the question of the development and enrichment of literary language.

Bib: Johnson, S., Lives of the Poets; Ward, C. E., Life; Eliot, T. S., Selected Essays; Leavis, F. R., Revaluation; van Doren, M., The Poetry of Dryden; Bredvold, L. I., John Dryden's Intellectual Milieu; Nichol Smith, D., John Dryden; Kinsley, J. and H., Dryden: the Critical Heritage; Wykes, D., A Preface to Dryden; Rogers, P., The Augustan Vision; Roper, A., and Swedenborg, H.T. Jr. (eds.), Works.

Du Bartas, Guillaume de Saluste, Sieurdu Bartas (1544-90)

Protestant poet and soldier. The major work for which Du Bartas became famous in England in the 17th century was his ≥ epic on the story of the creation entitled La Semaine (1578), which was followed by a continuation, La Seconde Semaine (1584). This enormous poem, which celebrates the first two weeks of the biblical creation of the world, was to have a considerable influence on English writers in the period, though it is now hardly read. The > translation of Du Bartas' work into English became the major undertaking of Joshua Sylvester (1562/3-1618), though he was not the only English writer to attempt translations of the work. ➤ Philip Sidney is said to have produced a translation (now lost), and ▷ James I and ▷ Thomas Lodge both translated small parts of the text. In the 17th century Du Bartas' original and Sylvester's translation became inseparably associated with one another, and a considerable number of poets were to praise the work or write under its influence. 'Divine Bartas', as he became known, was praised by ➤ Edmund Spenser, ➤ Samuel Daniel, ➤ Michael Drayton and > Edmund Campion. Perhaps the high point of the reputation of the work was in the influence that it had on ▶ John Milton's Paradise Lost. In the 18th century, however, Du Bartas' reputation underwent a decline from which it has never properly recovered.

Bib: Sylvester, J.(trans.), Snyder, S. (ed.), The Divine Weeks and Works of Guillaume de Saluste, Sieur du Bartas (2 vols.).

Du Bellay, Joachim (1522–60)
Together with ▷ Ronsard, one of the most prominent of the French Renaissance group known as the ▷ Pléiade. His Deffence ☺ Illustration de la langue francoyse (1549) is often regarded as their manifesto. He was the nephew of Cardinal Jean du Bellay, the protector of ▷ Rabelais, and spent the years 1553–7 in Rome in the service of his uncle. It was here that he composed the sonnet collection Les Regrets (based on ▷ Ovid's Tristia) as well as Les Antiquitez de Rome and the Songe of which ▷ Spenser's versions, Ruines of Rome and The Visions of Bellay, appeared in the 1591 Complaints.

Bib: Keating, L. C., Joachim du Bellay.

Du Maurier, Daphne (1907-89)

Novelist and short-story writer. Daphne Du Maurier began publishing in 1928, and her long career spanned and mastered a wide range of ⊳ genres. She was a skilled writer of psychological suspense and supernatural tales, as well as the author of the classic romantic thriller, Rebecca (1938), which was filmed by Alfred Hitchcock in 1940, and has run to many editions in many different languages. Hitchcock also filmed Du Maurier's famous short story 'The Birds' in 1963, and the Hitchcock connection underlines what is perhaps most remarkable about Du Maurier's work: its concern with neo-Gothic motifs and the thin line which divides psychological obsession from supernatural possibilities. Du Maurier is also interested in exploring concepts of time in her fiction, both in the sense of how history is lived in the present (one of the concerns of her Cornish historical romances) and in concepts of nonlinear time, and parallel time-scales, as the framework for her psychological thrillers. This last interest is best illustrated by the 1971 story Don't Look Now, which, again, was filmed, this time by Nicholas Roeg in 1973. Du Maurier's success as the originator of a number of classic modern horror films is important. She is also one of Cornwall's most famous inhabitants, and four famous Cornish historical romances, Jamaica Inn (1936), Frenchman's Creek (1941); My Cousin Rachel (1951) and Rebecca itself have become key props for the Cornish tourist industry. Du Maurier's passion for her county is also evident in her non-fictional writing, particularly Vanishing Cornwall.

Other works include: The Loving Spirit (1931); The Apple Tree (1952); The Breaking Point (1959); The Birds and Other Stories (1963); The House on the Strand (1969); Echoes from the Macabre: Selected Stories (1976); The Blue Lenses and Other Stories (1970). Autobiographical works include: Growing Pains: The Shaping of a Writer (1977) and The Rebecca Notebook and Other Memories (1980).

Bib: Light, A., 'Rebecca' in Feminist Review, 1984; Radcliffe, E. J., Gothic Novels of the 20th Century: An Annotated Bibliography.

> Horror fiction; Detective fiction.

Du Maurier, George (1834-96)

Graphic artist and novelist; born in Paris. His grandparents had been refugees in England from the ▷ French Revolution; his father was a naturalized British subject; his mother was English. In 1865 he joined the staff of ▷ Punch and became one of the best known British humorous artists, satirizing the upper classes rather in the style of ▷ William Thackeray. He wrote three novels: Peter Ibbetson (1891), ▷ Trilby (1894) and The Martian (posthumous, 1896). The first two were extremely popular, but their sentimentality has put them out of fashion.

Bib: Ormond, L., George du Maurier.

Dubliners (1914)

A volume of short stories by ➤ James Joyce. Joyce later wrote: 'My intention was to write a chapter of the moral history of my country and I chose Dublin for the scene because that city seemed to me the centre of paralysis. I have tried to present it . . . under four of its aspects: childhood, adolescence, maturity and public life. The stories are arranged in this order.' He adds that he has used in them 'a style of scrupulous meanness', but, in fact, the apparent bare realism of the stories conceals subtle mimetic and symbolic effects which render the spiritual poverty and domestic tragedy of Dublin life through its characteristic colloquial idioms. The stories are based on Joyce's theory of the 'epiphanies', by which he meant that deep insights might be gained through incidents and circumstances which seem outwardly insignificant. Their effect is thus often through delicate implication, like the stories of > Chekhov. However, some of them contain sharp humour, notably 'Grace', and more have very sensitive poignancy, especially the last and longest, 'The Dead'. This story, which moves from ironical satire to a highly poetic conclusion, is often regarded as a masterpiece; it was filmed in 1987 by John Huston.

Duchess of Malfi, The (1613)

With > The White Devil, one of the two famous verse tragedies by > John Webster. The plot is taken from a tale by the Italian writer Matteo Bandello in an English version included in William Painter's > Palace of Pleasure. Set in Italy, the drama concerns the vengeance taken upon the young Duchess for marrying her steward, Antonio, against the commands of her brothers, the Cardinal, and Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, who is her twin. Ferdinand employs an impoverished malcontent soldier, ▷ Bosola, as his instrument for the mental torturing of the Duchess, but Bosola has a character of his own, and is filled with remorse. The Duchess is finally strangled, but Ferdinand goes mad with horror at his own deed, and ends by killing Bosola, who had already killed the Cardinal.

Two main problems arise in assessing the drama. The first is whether the Duchess is purely a guiltless victim. She is a young widow who marries a man of lower status for love: commentators argue that contemporary opinion was against the remarrying of widows, that the Duchess offends against the principle of degree by marrying beneath her, and that her deception of her brothers offends against the principle that a just life must be led in openness. None of these arguments is likely to have force with modern audiences, and those contemporary with the play must have been chiefly impressed by the proud dignity with which the Duchess sustains her cumulative afflictions. The more important problem is that of the brothers' motives. That of the Cardinal is intelligible: he is a cold > Machiavellian who resents his sister's humiliation of the family, and no doubt the fact that by her second marriage she now has heirs to her estate. But Ferdinand's prolonged sadism, and his madness after her death, seem in excess of their ostensible causes. The natural explanation is that he is incestuously in love with his sister, and insanely jealous at her marriage; this is doubted by some critics who point out that incestuous passion is nowhere explicit in the play, which was written at a time when such motives were rarely left to the audience's inference. Webster may have preferred to leave the question open, since the bond between a twin sister and brother might itself sufficiently explain Ferdinand's extravagance. Another explanation, since the play is remarkable for its strikingly effective individual scenes, might be that Webster was more interested in opportunities for dramatizing situations than in the exposition of a dominant theme. Even this reductive judgement cannot obscure the grandeur with which Webster dramatizes extreme passion and the horror of its degradation, and, in contrast, the dignity with which an individual can outface suffering.

Duck, Stephen (1705-56)

Known as the 'Thresher Poet', and often described as 'the first proletarian author'. He was discovered working as a thresher and writing in the Wiltshire countryside, brought to London, and given a salary and accommodation near Richmond by Queen Caroline; he was also assisted by ➤ Pope. He subsequently studied and became a clergyman. His The Thresher's Labour is one of the early poems showing the hardships of country life and labour, in contrast to the idealized pictures painted by ➤ pastoral tradition. It was included in Poems on Several Occasions (1738). Later, in poems such as On Richmond Park, and Royal Gardens, Duck succumbed to the same idealizing tendencies as his forbears. He ended by drowning himself.

Duenna, The (1775)

Comic opera by > Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Don Jerome is attempting to force his daughter Louisa to marry the rich but unpleasant converted Jew, Isaac, and locks her up to await the marriage. However, she loves Don Antonio, and uses her duenna as a go-between, to carry messages. Jerome discovers the duenna's role in their affair, and dismisses her, but Louisa escapes disguised as the duenna, while the latter impersonates her mistress and receives Isaac. Meanwhile, Louisa's brother and Antonio's friend, Don Ferdinand, has fallen in love with Donna Clara, who is to be forced into a convent. She too escapes from her father, and the two young women join forces. The duenna tricks Isaac into marrying her, and into helping Louisa and Antonio to marry. Ferdinand and Clara are also united, and Jerome is reconciled to both situations. The play was successfully performed at > Covent Garden.

Duessa

Character in ➤ Edmund Spenser's ➤ The Faerie Queen. She is described as 'clad in scarlot red' (Book I. ii. 13), which associates her with the Catholic Church, Antichrist and the Whore of Babylon, as Protestant commentaries on Revelation XVII. 4 make clear. She may also be identified in the poem's contemporary political ➤ allegory as ➤ Mary Queen of Scots, and was so identified by her son ➤ James VI and I. ➤ Catholicism (Roman) in English literature.

Duffy, Maureen (b 1933)

Novelist, poet and dramatist. Her autobiographical first novel, That's How it Was (1962) is the account of a childhood of material insecurity and social isolation illuminated by a living relationship between mother and daughter. The themes of her fiction have been the outsider, the oppressions of poverty and class, the varieties of sexual experience and the power of love to transform and redeem. Her work reflects her socialism, lesbianism and commitment to animal rights. The Microcosm (1966) is a study of lesbian society using various modes of narration, including pastiche and > stream of consciousness; it shows the distance between sexual creativity and ordinary life imposed by society. Duffy has lived in London for most of her adult life, and celebrated that city in Capital (1975). She employs colloquial language, and a laconic but vivid style. Her play Rites, a black farce set in a ladies' public lavatory, was produced at the > National Theatre in 1969. Rites, Solo (1970) and Old Tyme (1970) rework the Greek myths of the Bacchae, Narcissus and Uranus respectively in terms of modern sexual and public life. Her other plays are: The Lay Off (1962); The Silk Room (1966) and A Nightingale in Bloomsbury Square (1973). Other novels are: The Single Eye (1964); The Paradox Players (1967); Wounds (1969); Love Child (1971); I Want to Go to Moscom (1973); Housespy (1978); Gor Saga (1981); Scarborough Fear (as D. M. Layer, 1982); Londoners: An Elegy (1983); and Change (1987). Poetry: Collected Poems (1985).

Duke of Milan, The (1621)
A > tragedy of court intrigue, possessive jealousy and murder by > Philip Massinger.

Duke's Company, The

Acting company formed by ▷ Sir William D'Avenant after the Restoration of ▷ Charles II. It performed from June 1661 at the former Lisle's Tennis Court in ▷ Lincoln's Inn Fields, which had been converted to a theatre. In November 1671 the company moved to a new playhouse at ▷ Dorset Garden, also known as the Duke's Theatre, where it remained until its union with the ▷ King's Company to form the ▷ United Company in 1682.

Duke's Theatre, The

➤ Dorset Garden Theatre.

Dunbar, William (?1460-?1520) Scottish poet and priest. Little is known about his life. He was employed at the Scottish court, was involved in a shipwreck off Zeeland while engaged on a diplomatic mission, and was given a pension by James IV in 1500. A relatively large corpus of his poetry survives, which is notable for its wide range of subjects and tone. The 'Thrissil and the Rose', a political allegory about the marriage of James IV to Margaret Tudor, was written in 1503. 'The Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis', in which the narrator sees a devil call a dance of unshriven outcasts, dates from 1507. Also dating from around this time are Dunbar's more famous pieces: 'The Golden Targe' (a dream-vision love adventure); 'The Lament for Makaris' (an elegy on life's transience and the passing of great English and Scottish poets such as ➤ Chaucer, ➤ John Gower, and ➤ Robert Henryson); and 'The Tretis of the Twa Mariit Wemen and the Wedo' (a midsummer dream experience in which a male narrator overhears three spirited women revealing their histories and their desires). Dunbar's 'Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedie' is a consummate exercise in poetic abuse. Bib: Kinsley, J. (ed.), Poems; Harvey Wood, H., Two Scots Chaucerians, Robert Henryson and William Dunbar.

Dunciad, The (1728–43)
A > mock-heroic > satire in pentameter > couplets by > Alexander Pope, satirizing his literary enemies. In the earlier three-book version, published anonymously in 1728, the hero is the scholar Lewis Theobald (spelled 'Tibbald' in the poem), whose Shakespeare Restored (1726) had offended Pope by pointing out mistakes and oversights in his edition of Shakespeare's works (1725). In a brilliantly appropriate stroke, which two centuries later would have been considered daringly modernist, The Dunciad itself is presented in a scholarly edition, complete with learned footnotes, as though it were a classic. In the notes Pope and his friends (under the pseudonym > Scriblerus) discuss the knotty textual cruxes of the work, draw attention to its various poetic excellences, and heap straightfaced praise upon the solecisms of other critics and poets. In 1742 Pope issued a fourth book under the title The New Dunciad, and in 1743 the whole four-book version reappeared with a new hero, the popular playwright, > Colley Cibber, who to much derision had been made > Poet Laureate in 1730, and thus appears as ▶ Baves.

In Book I Cibber is snatched from his benighted labours by the goddess Dulness and is crowned Laureate in succession to Laurence Eusden, who now 'sleeps among the dull of ancient days'. In Book II the new King of the Dunces presides over a modern > Grub Street version of the ancient classical games, including a pissing match (to determine 'Who best can send on high/ The salient spout, farstreaming to the sky'), a patron-tickling contest, and a competition to see who can dive deepest into the open sewer of Fleet-ditch. The book ends with the company being read to sleep by the works of John Henley and ▷ Sir Richard Blackmore: 'Soft creeping words on words, the sense compose,/ At ev'ry line they stretch, they yawn, they doze.' In Book III Cibber sleeps in the lap of Dulness and has visions, in true classical style, of the future triumph of the goddess and the destruction of civilization. Book IV traces the pantomimic progress of Dulness through the realms of science and letters ('Art after art goes out, and all is Night'), and ends in biblical solemnity with a description of the restoration of the ancient Empire of Chaos. Despite its sometimes irritating plethora of topical references, the poem is a unique masterpiece. Its nervous, ironic tone merges raucous vulgarity, exquisite sensuousness, surreal fantasy, euphoric farce and sombre despair in strange and original evocative effects.

Dunn, Douglas (b 1942)

Poet. Dunn was born in Renfrewshire, Scotland, and educated in Scotland and Hull. His first volume, Terry Street (1969) showed him much under the influence of philip Larkin in its documentation of everyday provincial life; his later volumes St Kilda's Parliament (1981) and Elegies (1985) show more varied subject matter, meditating on Celtic history and on his own Scottish ancestry and on the loss of loved ones. He has trained and worked as a librarian. His other poetry includes: Backwaters (1971); Love or Nothing (1974); Barbarians (1979); and Selected Poems (1986).

> Scottish literature in English.

Dunn, Nell (b 1936)

Playwright and novelist. Dunn started work in the early 1960s as a key player in the British 'docudrama' movement (along with other writers and directors such as Ken Loach, > David Mercer and Jeremy Sandford), which was a literary marriage of investigative journalism and naturalistic fiction. Dunn's first work, a series of short stories which observe ordinary workingclass life in South London, Up the Junction (1963), brought her great fame in Britain, as did her early 1980s feminist play, Steaming (1981), about a group of women who try to keep open a public baths threatened with closure, was extremely successful. Her other works include: Poor Cow (1967); Talking to Women (1965); I Want (with Adrian Henri); The Only Child (1978); and The Little Heroine (1988).

Duns Scotus, John (?1265-?1308) One of the most influential medieval philosophers. He was born at the village of Duns in Scotland, studied at Oxford, and taught at Paris and Cologne. He was the chief opponent of > Thomas Aquinas in the late medieval Church, He opposed Aquinas' belief in the harmony of reason and religious faith by declaring that some doctrines were incapable of proof (eg the immortality of the soul); he declared, in opposition to Aquinas, that the will was not necessarily subordinate to the reason; he insisted that individual objects contain a principle of reality distinct from that of the class to which each belongs. The last doctrine was of importance to the Catholic poet ▶ G.M. Hopkins in his formation of the terms 'inscape' and 'instress'. Duns Scotus' philosophy underwent much criticism in the 16th century by both the b humanist scholars influenced by Plato, and the Protestant reformers. His followers, the Scotists, were regarded as the enemies of the > New Learning, and in consequence a 'Dunsman' or 'Dunce' became eventually, in common speech, synonymous with a stupid person, impervious to education.

Duration

One of the five categories in which ▷ Genette analyses narrative discourse, duration is concerned with the relationship between how long a fictional event would notionally last and how much of the text is devoted to telling of it (eg in Virginia Woolf's ▷ To the Lighthouse, the long first section of the novel tells the events of one day; the shorter second section tells the events of ten years). Duration, ▷ order and ▷ frequency are matters of temporal arrangement or 'tense'; the other two categories are ▷ mood and ▷ voice.

D'Urfey (Durfey), Thomas (1653-1723) Dramatist and song-writer, born in Devon, he probably trained originally for the law. He became a close friend of ➤ Charles II, who liked to hum his songs. He often stayed with the Earl of Dorset at Knowle, where there is a portrait of him painted in his sleep, according to one anecdote, for he hated the idea of being portrayed. He wrote 33 plays, including tragedies, comedies and opera, but is best remembered for his comedies, including Madam Fickle (1676), and A Fond Husband (1677), both comedies of intrigue, and political satires such as The Royalist (1682), and Sir Barnaby Whigg (1682). Love for Money (1691), and The Richmond Heiress (1603) both show tendencies toward ⊳ Reform comedy. He also adapted a number of earlier works, including ➤ Shakespeare's Cymbeline, renamed The Island Princess (1682). Some of his plays' perceived bawdiness made him a target for attack by > Jeremy Collier. His own and other ballads were published together in six volumes, under the title of Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy (1720-21).

Durrell, Lawrence (1912-90)

Novelist and poet. He began writing before the war, and published an experimental novel, The Black Book (1938) in France which was partly the result of his fruitful and life-long friendship with American novelist Henry Miller. His present high international reputation is based in particular on the sequence The Alexandria Quartet comprising Justine (1957); Balthazar (1958); Mountolive (1958) and Clea (1960). The Alexandria Quartet has achieved fame partly through its lavishly exotic appeal, and partly through Durrell's experimental technique: a wide range of narrative forms are employed, and the same events are seen, and interpreted quite differently, by the different characters participating in them. Tunc (1968) and Nunquam (1970) together form The Revolt of Aphrodite, which explores the destruction of love and creativity by social pressures, embodied in the 'Firm', a vast and dehumanizing multinational enterprise. Durrell followed up the success of The Alexandria Quartet with a five-volume novel, The Avignon Quincunx, which also used exotic settings and multiple narratives, and, combining elements of myth with philosophical speculation, satirized the values of western society. It is made up of the following volumes: Monsieur; or, The Prince of Darkness (1974); Livia; or, Buried Alive (1978); Constance; or Solitary Practices (1982); Sebastian; or, Ruling Passions (1983); Quinx; or, The Ripper's Tale (1985).

As the titles of his two major sequences suggest, the spirit of particular places was always of importance to Durrell; he said that in The Alexandria Quartet he 'tried to see people as a function of place'. He published many volumes of travel writing, particularly about the islands of the Mediterranean, including: Prospero's Cell (about Corcyra; 1945); Reflections on a Marine Venus (about Rhodes; 1953); Bitter Lemons (about Cyprus; 1957); The Greek Islands (1978). Durrell also published collections of short stories, including: Sauve Qui Peut (1966); The Best of Antrobus (1974); Antrobus Complete (1985); a number of plays, including: Sappho (1959); Acto (1961); An Irish Faustus (1963) and many volumes of poetry: Collected Poems (1960; revised 1968) and Collected Poems 1931-74 (1980). But his greatest achievement was to express the indeterminate and multi-faceted nature of experience through the techniques of experimental fiction.

Bib: Fraser, G. S., Lawrence Durrell: A Critical Study; Friedman, A. W., Lawrence Durrell and The Alexandria Quartet.

Dutch Courtesan, The (1605)
A punitive satirical comedy by ▷ John Marston about deceit and youthful recklessness, in which the central character, Malheureux, has his values tested when he falls in love with a prostitute. Like ▷ Shakespeare's Angelo in ▷ Measure for Measure he is saved only at the gallows, but Marston's tone is more comic than Shakespeare's.

Dver, John (?1700-58)

Poet and painter. Born in Carmarthenshire, Dyer studied painting under Jonathan Richardson and visited Italy in 1724-5. In 1741 he entered the Church. His most important work, Grongar Hill (1727), is a topographical landscape poem in the tradition of > Sir John Denham's Cooper's Hill and ▷ Alexander Pope's ▷ Windsor-Forest, but its fluent use of tetrameter rather than pentameter (▷ metre) ▷ couplets gives it a lyrical élan all of its own. Moreover, Dyer's painterly eye leads him to focus, in a most original way, on the transient visual effects which succeed each other as he climbs up from the valley of the Towy. Dyer's feeling for the ⊳ picturesque, rooted in his study of the paintings of Claude and Poussin, was influential on later poetry until well into the Romantic (▷ Romanticism) period. In 1740 appeared The Ruins of Rome, and in 1757, The Fleece, long discursive and didactic (> Didactic literature) poems in Miltonic (▷ Milton) ▷ blank verse. The second emulates the example of > John Philips' Cyder, in its celebration of British scenery and British industry. It attempts to encompass all aspects of the wool trade, from the techniques of sheepfarming, modern and ancient, to the growing prosperity of Leeds and Sheffield and the growth of trade which promises to distribute British woollen manufactures 'over the whole globe'.

Bib: Humphrey, B., John Dyer.

Dystopia

> Utopian fiction.

Eagleton, Terry (b. 1943)

The foremost ➤ Marxist critic writing in Britain today. Until recently Eagleton was a Fellow at Wadham College, Oxford, and he has for some time been a leading force in Marxism's encounter with a range of intellectual movements from Structuralism onwards. His book Criticism and Ideology (1976) laid the foundation for the introduction into British literary criticism of the work of the French critic Pierre Macherey, and is a clear development of > Louis Althusser's understanding of culture. In later works, such as Walter Benjamin or Towards a Revolutionary Criticism (1981), The Rape of Clarissa (1982), The Function of Criticism (1984), and William Shakespeare (1986), he has sought to develop a sophisticated > materialist criticism which is prepared to engage with, but which refuses to be overawed by, Post-structuralism.

Earle, John

> Characters, Theophrastian.

Earthly Paradise, The (1868-70)

A poem by > William Morris published in three volumes, consisting of twenty-four tales written in verse with a prologue and a linking narrative, and describing a medieval > Utopia which offers an alternative to the industrial society of the mid-19th century. One of the verse tales, Atalanta's Race, tells the story of the legendary Atalanta, a beautiful girl famed for her speed. To win her, suitors had to beat her in a race or else be killed by her dart. She was eventually beaten by Milanion, who distracted her by throwing down three golden apples. Atalanta is also celebrated by ⊳ Swinburne in > Atalanta in Calydon. The poem proved popular with the Victorian public and helped establish Morris as one of the leading poets of the day.

➤ Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood; medievalism.

East India Company

The best known of the Charter Companies, given a monopoly of eastern trade by Queen ▷ Elizabeth in 1600. Competition with the Dutch in the East Indian islands turned its attention to the Indian mainland, where in the 18th century its extensive commercial influence developed into political power. To protect its Chinese trade, it gained control of the Burmese and Malayan coasts down to Singapore, which it founded in 1819. After the Indian Muttiny of 1857 it was taken over by the British government, which had shared its rule in India since ▷ Pitt (the Younger)'s Indian Act of 1784. It was familiarly known as John Company and its ships as East Indiamen.

➤ Companies, joint-stock.

East Lynne (1861)
A novel of ▷ sensation by ▷ Mrs Henry

Wood. Lady Isabel Vane mistakenly believes her husband to be having an affair, and runs away with rakish Frank Levison. Her fate as a > 'fallen woman' is one of the most appalling in Victorian literature. She has a child, is deserted, crippled in a train crash and reported dead, then returns home in disguise to become > governess to her own children. In the meantime, her husband has married the woman Isabel believed he was involved with. Her final punishment is having to watch her son die without revealing her identity to him. The book was favourably reviewed in The Times, sold over 2.5 million copies by 1900, was translated into several languages and adapted into a stage melodrama. Conventional Victorian values towards > marriage and the family are forcibly driven home, and Wood displays an almost sadistic relish in her punitive treatment of Isabel.

> Cometh Up as a Flower.

Eastward Hoe (1605)

A ▷ citizen comedy about London apprentices and craftsmen written collaboratively by ▷ George Chapman, ▷ Ben Jonson and ▷ John Marston. Modern interest in this play stems not primarily from its undeniable imaginative vitality so much as from its foolhardy satire of the Scots in Act III, which led to the imprisoning and facial disfigurement (ears and noses cut) of Jonson and Chapman − Marston had decamped. The play is one of several works of the period such as ▷ Thomas Middleton's ▷ A Game At Chess and ▷ John Day's Isle of Gulls to challenge or parody the volatile contemporary political order through the theatre.

Eclecticism

In ancient Greece, a term for the kind of philosophy that did not follow any one school of thought (eg Platonism) but selected its doctrines from a number of schools. The term is now applied to thinkers, artists and writers who follow this principle in the formation of their thought or artistic methods.

Eclogue

A short pastoral dialogue, usually in verse. The most famous example is the Bucolics of the Latin poet ▷ Virgil. The word is often used as an equivalent for ▷ idyll, or a ▷ pastoral poem without dialogue. One of the most famous examples of a Renaissance poem written in the tradition of Virgilian eclogues is ▷ Spenser's ▷ The Shepherd's Calendar.

Ecriture

Literally the French for 'writing', but in > poststructuralist theory écriture has a supercharged sense and is used instead of its English equivalent to indicate a particular attitude to written text. Poststructuralists argue that literary writing revels in the indeterminancy of meaning. So, in écriture, meaning accumulates and disperses, but is never stable, and readers should attend to this process and not to any finished meaning or interpretation (> closure). ▶ Jacques Derrida and ▶ Roland Barthes are notable theorists in this area, and their work has influenced a considerable body of critical opinion (> Readerly and Writerly Texts). Both Derrida and Barthes were connected with the French > avant-garde literary and political journal Tel Quel in the late 1960s and the idea of écriture is associated with a particular style of innovative, experimental writing promoted by the journal.

Ecriture féminine

A term usually reserved for a particular kind of critical writing by women, emanating from the radical ⊳ feminism of contemporary French critics such as Luce Irigaray, Hélène Cixous and Julia Kristeva. What unites this form of feminist criticism is the belief that there is an area of textual production that can be called 'feminine', that it exists beneath the surface of masculine discourse, and only occasionally comes to the fore in the form of disruptions of 'masculine' language. A further assumption is that woman is given a specific identity within the masculine structures of language and power, and that she must strive to challenge it. This particular brand of radical feminism takes the view that there is an 'essential' femininity that can be recovered, and that it is also possible to distinguish between a genuine feminine 'writing' and other forms of language. Bib: Kristeva,, J., Desire in Language; Moi, T. (ed.), The Kristeva Reader; Moi, T., Sexual/ Textual Politics; Marks, E. and De Courtivon, I., New French Feminisms; Newton, J. and Rosenfelt, D., Feminist Criticism and Social Change; Greene, G. and Kahn, C., Making the Difference: Feminist Literary Criticism.

Eden, Emily (1797-1869)

The daughter of William Eden, the first Baron Auckland, Emily Eden was born in Westminster. She was a close friend of Prime Minister Melbourne, who appointed her brother George governor general of India in 1835. She went with him and her sister Frances, and acted as his hostess until their return in 1842, and in London till 1849. She was a member of the highest social circles and many celebrities visited her house where she held morning gatherings due to ill health. In 1844 she published Portraits of the People and Princes of India, and then in 1866 and 1872, Up the Country: Letters Written from the Upper Provinces of India. In 1919 her great-niece edited a further selection of her letters. Her novels, The Semi-detached House (1859), published anonymously, and The Semi-attached Couple (1860), by 'E. E.', were written some 30 years previously. They portray fashionable society with good-humoured wit and owe something to ▷ Jane Austen whom Eden much admired.

Edgar, David (b 1948)

One of Britain's major dramatists, Edgar has written for both radical touring companies and the > National Theatre and the > RSC. He is also active in socialist debates on theatre and culture.

Edgar was born in Birmingham, of a theatrical family, and much of his early work was written for political theatre groups (Wreckers, 1977, was written for 7:84, Teendreams, co-written with Susan Todd, 1979 for Monstrous Regiment) or in response to political events (A Fart for Europe, co-written with ➤ Howard Brenton, 1973, was written as an anti-EEC polemic at the time of Britain's entry into the EEC).

As a socialist dramatist Edgar has chosen to base his intervention in the theatre, believing that television is an isolating experience, while theatre has to be experienced in a collective audience. Maydays (1983), an epic account of dissent in Britain and Russia was produced by the > RSC as one of the first new plays to be produced on the main stage at the Barbican.

Edgar's greatest success, The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby (1980) was developed over a long period with the cast, who thoroughly researched and devised the play with Edgar. The result was a collaborative project and a conviction in the performances and production that is rarely seen in mainstream theatre. Edgar was later invited by ⊳ Ann Jellicoe to collaborate in a theatre community project in Dorset: Entertaining Strangers (1985) was based on research into the history of Dorchester, and devised by and for the local community. It was then given a production in revised form at the > National Theatre with professional actors (1987). That Summer (1987), The Shape of the Table (1990), and Pentecost (1994) have continued his readiness to engage with recent political events. That Summer, an unusually small-scale work for Edgar, written in the form of a domestic comedy, examines culture clashes and left-wing reactions to the miners' strike of 1984. The Shape of the Table by contrast, although considered a static, talkinghead piece by some is still a fascinating attempt to analyse the realpolitik behind momentous changes in Eastern Europe at the end of 1989, in an imagined capital not a million miles away from Prague.

Bib: Bull, J., New British Political Dramatists; Chambers, C. and Prior, M., Playwrights' Progress

Edgeworth, Maria (1767–1849) Novelist. Her tales are commonly set in Ireland.

Her work is minor but still read for its vivacity, good sense and realism. Castle Rackrent (1800) and The Absentee (1812) are two of her works still in print. She was also an excellent writer for children (see Tales ed. by Austin Dobson). She collaborated with her father, a noted educationist, in Practical Education (1798), influenced by the French-Swiss thinker ➤ Rousseau. She was admired by ➤ Jane Austen, William Thackeray (1811-63) and ➤ Walter Scott, whom she influenced. She has recently been re-evaluated by > feminist critics as a liberal contributor to women's social history. In her satirical Letters for Literary Ladies (1795) she parodies those men who opposed the education of women (> Women, education of), and in 'Letter from a Gentleman to his friend upon the birth of a daughter' she writes:

Literary ladies will, I am afraid, be losers in love as well as in friendship, by their superiority — . . . gentlemen are not apt to admire a prodigious quantity of learning and masculine acquirements in the fair sex.

Bib: Clarke, I. C., Life; Newby, P. H., Maria Edgeworth; Butler, M. S., Maria Edgeworth.

Edinburgh Festival

The Edinburgh Festival, now the biggest arts festival in Britain, is actually two festivals, the official 'International Festival of Music and Drama', instituted in 1947, and the Fringe, which began in 1949. Held annually during the three weeks from mid-August to September, it is now almost a trade fair for the theatre profession. Britain's literary managers, agents, and artistic directors scour the Festival each year for new talent; and many productions offered in winter seasons at theatres all over the country will have originated at the Edinburgh Festival.

The Official Festival was initiated by the opera impresario, Rudolph Bing, then general manager of Glyndebourne, and has since imported international theatre, opera, dance companies and orchestras, and new work from British companies. > T. S. Eliot, > Sean O'Casey and Ionesco are among the playwrights to have had premieres of new plays at the Festival. The Official Festival now provides one of the best opportunities to see world theatre.

The Fringe Festival grew up spontaneously in response to the Official Festival, and now outnumbers it in the range of productions it offers. There is no qualification for entry in the Fringe Festival, and amateur, student and professional companies battle it out for their share of the audience.

In recent years the Fringe has become increasingly professionalised, often rivalling the Official Festival in quality and innovation of its productions. Fringe Festival awards, which are offered weekly and help to attract audiences to the otherwise hidden away and unnoticed, are now also matched by the very up-market Perrier awards given at the end of the Festival and specifically aimed at cabaret performers.

Edinburgh Review

A quarterly periodical founded by ▷ Francis Jeffrey, Sydney Smith and ▷ Henry Brougham in 1802. It introduced a new seriousness into literary criticism and generally took a moderate Whig position in politics. Jeffrey's literary taste was rigidly classicist and he had little sympathy with the 'Lake Poets', ▷ William Wordsworth, ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge and ▷ Robert Southey. The term originates in the Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1807. ▷ Blackwood's Magazine.

Edward I (1272-1307)

King of England. He is known for the importance of his laws, the conquest of ➤ Wales and the attempted conquest of ➤ Scotland.

Edward II (1307-27)

King of England. His reign is chiefly noted for his decisive defeat by the Scots in the Scottish War of Independence (battle of ➤ Bannockburn, 1314) and for his conflicts with the barons over his excessive indulgence of favourites, especially Piers Gaveston.

➤ Christopher Marlowe's play Edward II presents him as a decadent sensual prince in ➤ Renaissance style, but pitiable in his horrible death by assassination.

> Scotland.

Edward III (1596)

An historical drama about the perverted courtship of the Countess of Salisbury by the king, and set during the French wars. It is one of the anonymous plays that, it has been argued (by Kenneth Muir, Shakespeare as Collaborator, and G. R. Proudfoot, British Academy Shakespeare Lecture 1985), on internal evidence should be attributed to ⊳ Shakespeare.

Edward III (1327-77)

The king of England under whom the ➤ Hundred Years' War with France began.
Up to 1360 he was notably successful, and the English armies won the battles of ➤ Crécy (1346) and Poitiers (1356). He was succeeded on the throne by his grandson, ➤ Richard II, his eldest son, the ➤ Black Prince, having died in 1376.

The play ▷ Edward III (1596) has sometimes been ascribed to ▷ Shakespeare, at least in part.

Edward IV (1461-83)

First of the kings of England belonging to the House of York; he was victorious in the ➤ Wars of the Roses over the last king of the House of Lancaster, ➤ Henry VI.

Edward IV plays a prominent part in > Shakespeare's > Henry VI, Part III, where he first appears as the Earl of March, and in > Richard III, in which he dies and his throne is seized from the rightful heir, his son, by Edward IV's brother, Richard, Duke of Gloucester.

Edward V (1483)

The boy-king, son of Edward IV. He was deposed in the year of his accession to the throne by his uncle, Richard, Duke of Gloucester, who became > Richard III. Edward and his younger brother were imprisoned by their uncle in the Tower of London and were never heard of again. Legend (and the 16th century chroniclers) always insisted that he had them murdered there.

Edward VI (1547-53)

The boy-king who succeeded ➤ Henry VIII. Under the regency of the Protectors (the Duke of Somerset and, later, the Duke of Northumberland) Henry's essentially political ➤ Reformation became more Protestant in doctrine, though the new ➤ Book of Common Prayer was a wise compromise. Persecution of Roman Catholics in Edward's reign led to a reaction against Protestantism when his sister ➤ Mary succeeded him.

Edward the Confessor (reigned 1042–66) Edward was famed for his piety more than his political achievements and was canonized in 1161. He founded Westminster Abbey (where he was buried), but no dynasty. Edward was succeeded by Harold, Earl of Wessex, though the legitimacy of this succession was challenged by William, Duke of Normandy, who successfully prosecuted his claim to the throne of England in his military campaign of 1066.

Edwardian

A term descriptive of the political, social and cultural characteristics of the early years of the 20th century, roughly corresponding to the reign of King Edward VII (1901-1910). The period is often remembered nostalgically for its luxury and brilliance, soon to be darkened by the horror of World War I (1914-18) and obliterated by the relative austerity of the post-war years. This life of luxury, easy foreign travel, low taxation, etc. is also thought of as being relatively free from the close moral restraint commonly associated with the preceding Victorian period. It is sometimes remembered, however, that such brilliance was restricted to the upper class and the wealthier members of the middle class, and that life for four-fifths of the population was at best dull and at worst squalid and impoverished. This darker aspect of the time was responsible for the rise of the socialist Labour Party and the prominence of polemical writers, like ➤ George Bernard Shaw and ➤ H. G. Wells. Such writers attacked the social injustice and selfishness of the upper classes in an idiom designed to reach wide audiences. Another critic of the dominant materialism was the novelist ▶ E. M. Forster. ▶ Arnold Bennett was a more representative novelist: his novels were not polemical and convey a materialistic vigour and excitement which were important elements in the harsh but inspiring environments of the more prosperous provincial towns. Thus some aspect of materialism is generally associated with Edwardianism, whether it is being enjoyed, suffered or criticized. Politically, the period was one of disturbance and rapid development: trade unionism was militant, women fought for political rights (> Suffragette Movement), and the social conscience inspired legislation which was later to mature into the Welfare State of the 1040s.

Edwards, Amelia (1831-92)

Novelist, short story and ⊳ travel writer. She was born in Weston-super-Mare and educated at home by her mother. After working as a journalist, she published her first novel, My Brother's Wife, in 1855. She subsequently wrote several more romantic novels and two historical works, The History of France (1856) and A Summary of English History (1858), before editing a collection of poetry, Home Thoughts and Home Themes (1865). She contributed a number of notable ghost stories to leading periodicals of the day before turning her attention to travel writing in the 1870s. A Thousand Miles up the Nile (1877) was a highly successful account of her journey through Egypt to the Nubian desert. Edwards then became an enthusiastic and learned Egyptologist, publishing a further work, Pharaohs, Fellahs and Explorers (1892), as well as translating a manual on Egyptian archaeology and lecturing on the subject in Britain and North America, earning herself an honorary doctorate from Columbia University.

Edwards, Richard (1523-66)

Master of the children of the Chapel Royal and author of the popular courtly drama about ideal friendship, ▷ Damon and Pithias (1561), as well as of an influential, posthumously published collection of poets of the early Elizabethan period, The Paradyse of Dainty Devises (1576).

Edwin Drood, The Mystery of (1870) A novel by > Charles Dickens, unfinished at his death. The novel begins in a cathedral town (based on Rochester); the plot turns on the engagement of Edwin and Rosa Bud, who do not really love each other, and the rivalry for Rosa's love of Edwin's sinister uncle, John Jasper, and an exotic newcomer to the town, Neville Landless. Edwin disappears and Neville is arrested for his murder; Rosa flees to London to escape Jasper; on her behalf the forces for good are rallying in the shape of Rosa's guardian, Mr Grewgious, a clergyman called Crisparkle and a mysterious stranger, Mr Datchery, when the story breaks off. The fragment is quite sufficient to show that Dickens was not losing his powers. The sombreness and the grotesque comedy are equal to the best in his previous works. There have been numerous attempts to end the novel but none of any particular note.

EFL

Teaching English as a Foreign Language: a specialist skill and a profitable enterprise. It covers both the instruction of schoolchildren and their parents whose mother-tongue is not English but who live in Britain, which is a social necessity and prime task in a multiracial society, as well as the work done in private language schools with older people not permanently resident in Britain. This is where the money lies. The number of these schools continues to increase: overseas the ▷ British Council has also expanded its teaching of English. Material relating to EFL teaching now takes up considerable space in many publishers' lists and is a major export.

Egdon Heath

A gloomy tract of country which is the Dorsetshire setting for ➤ Thomas Hardy's novel ➤ The Return of the Native. As often in Hardy's novels, the place is not merely a background to the events but exercises an active influence upon them.

Egerton, George (1859-1945)

The ▶ pseudonym of novelist and short story writer Mary Chavelita Dunne. She was born in Melbourne, Australia, and travelled widely as a young woman. In 1887 she eloped with Henry Higginson to Norway. She later married George Egerton Clairmonte and moved to Ireland where she began to write seriously. Her most successful works were two volumes of short stories, > Keynotes (1893) and Discords (1894). The stories challenged patriarchal attitudes, and Egerton became associated with the > 'New Woman' movement. Her later writing did not live up to her early potential and she faded from view. Later works include Fantasias (1898); Rosa Amorosa (1901) and Flies in Amber (1905). Bib: Cunningham, G., The New Woman and the Fictions of the 1890s.

Egerton, Sarah Fyge ➤ Sarah Fyge.

Egoist, The (1879)

One of the most admired novels by > George Meredith. The 'egoist' is the rich and fashionable Sir Willoughby Patterne, who is intolerably self-centred and conceited. The story concerns his courting of Clara Middleton and her fight for independence from his assertiveness. Willoughby is opposed by Vernon Whitford, who is austere, honest and discerning, the tutor of Willoughby's poor relation, Crossjay, a boy whose vigorous animal spirits are accompanied by deep and spontaneous feeling. Partly owing to Crossiay, Clara is eventually enabled to evade Willoughby's advances, which have been backed by her father whose luxurious tastes Willoughby has indulged. She marries Whitford, a conclusion which is a victory for integrity over deceitful subtlety. The story is told with the brilliance of Meredith's rather mannered wit and is interspersed with exuberant passages of natural description symbolically related to the theme. Though Meredith's mannerism has lost the book some of its former prestige, his analysis of self-deceit and his understanding of the physical components of strong feeling make The Egoist an anticipation of kinds of fiction more characteristic of the 20th century. ➤ Gentleman.

Dentieman.

Eisteddfod

Any festival in Wales held to encourage literature in the Welsh language, music, and other aspects of Welsh national culture. Its origins are possibly 12th-century; the word is Welsh and means 'a session'. The National Eisteddfod is held annually, alternately in North and South Wales.

Ekwensi, Cyprian (b 1921)

Nigerian, novelist and short-story writer. Ekwensi's fiction, widely read in Nigeria, depicts in many cases the experience of modern urban life in Lagos. For example, Jagua Nana (1961) is about the life of a prostitute (its title refers to the famous novel by > Zola, Nana) and People of the City (1954) is a story of journalists and jazz musicians. Ekwensi's work stresses storytelling and uses a rich variety of language and styles. His other novels include: When Love Whispers (1947); Burning Grass (1962); Beautiful Feathers (1963); Iska (1966); Survive the Peace (1976); For a Roll of Parchment (1987); Divided We Stand (1980); Jagua Nana's Daughter (1986). Volumes of short stories: Locotown (1966); Restless City (1975). He has also written fiction for children and edited an anthology of Nigerian writing. Bib: Emenyonu, E.N. (ed.), The Essential Ekwensi: A Literary Celebration of Cyprian Ekwensi's Sixty-Fifth Birthday.

Elegy

An elegy is usually taken to be a poetic lament for one who has died, or at least a grave and reflective poem. In ancient Greek and Latin literature, however, an elegy was a poem written in a particular > metre (line of six dactylic feet alternating with lines of five feet) and it had no necessary connection with death or gravity; the Latin poet ➤ Ovid used it for love poetry. Following his example, the English poet ▷ John Donne wrote a series of elegies with amorous or satirical themes. Most of the famous elegies in English, however, follow the narrower and more widely accepted definition: > Milton's > Lycidas is inspired by the death of his friend Edward King; > Shelley's > Adonais laments that of the poet > Keats; > Grav's > Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard is a meditation on life and death; > Arnold's Thyrsis, that of his friend ➤ Clough. All four of these are in the > pastoral convention, in imitation of a 3rd-century BC Greek elegy called the Lament of Moschus for Bion. > W. H. Auden's In Memory of W. B. Yeats is a famous 20th-century response to the death of Yeats. Contemporary poetry's interest in absence and bereavement has led to a renewed interest in elegy, eg Douglas Dunn, Elegies. In 1992, Nigerian writer Ben Okri's volume of verse An African Elegy was published to considerable critical acclaim.

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard (1751) A poem by ➤ Thomas Gray, in iambic pentameter quatrains, rhyming abab (➤ metre). Its quiet subtlety of tone raises the platitudes of conventional graveyard musing to a unique intensity, and several of its eloquent generalizations and phrases have become proverbial: 'Some mute inglorious Milton', 'the madding crowd's ignoble strife', 'Melancholy mark'd him for her own', 'Full many a flower is born to blush unseen, And waste its sweetness on the desert air.'

➤ Samuel Johnson, though contemptuous of Gray's more inspirational experiments such as the Pindaric odes, had high praise for this poem: 'The Churchyard abounds with images which find a mirror in every mind and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo.'

➤ Elegy; Sensibility.

Elements, The (Four)

The 'four elements' are the ancient Greek and medieval conception of the basic components of matter; they are air, fire, earth and water. It was a division made by ➤ Empedocles of Sicily and adopted by ➤ Aristotle. Aristotle was writing before the beginnings of chemical analysis and considered matter in regard to the 'properties' or qualities that he believed all things to possess; these he found to be 'hotness', 'coldness', 'wetness' and 'dryness'. His four elements contained these properties in different combinations: air = hot and wet; fire = hot and dry, earth = cold and dry, water = cold and wet. These, therefore, were the basic constituents of nature. Aristotle's great prestige in the Middle Ages caused his theory to dominate the thought of the time. The medieval alchemists, forbears of the modern analytical chemist, noticed that the properties of various kinds of matter change, eg iron becomes rust, and they deduced from Aristotle's theory that materials could be changed, provided that they retained the same basic properties, eg lead could be changed into gold. The theory dominated European thought until the 17th century, when the English 'natural philosopher' and chemist, Robert Boyle (1627-91) taught that an element is to be regarded as a substance in itself and not as a substance with certain basic properties. Since Boyle, chemists have discovered that elements are very much more numerous that the original four, and that air, fire, earth and water are not in fact elements at all. Nonetheless, the pervasiveness of these so-called 'four elements' in our environment has caused them to keep their hold on the modern imagination, when it is not engaged in scientific thinking, so that they are still employed as symbols for the basic constituents of our experience of the world in some imaginative literature.

The theory of the 'four elements' was connected in classical and medieval times with the medical and psychological theory of the 'humours', or four basic liquid constituents of the body. The blood humour ('hot and wet') is linked to air; choler ('hot and dry') is associated with fire; phlegm ('cold and wet') corresponds to water and melancholy ('cold and dry') to earth. The preponderance of one or other of these humours in the make-up of a person's character was supposed to determine the temperament.

> Humour.

➤ Essays of Elia.

Eliot, George (1819-80)

Pen-name of the novelist Mary Ann Evans (at different times of her life she also spelt the name Mary Anne, Marian and Marianne). She was the daughter of a land-agent in the rural midlands (Warwickshire); her father's work (the management of estates) gave her wide experience of country society and this was greatly to enrich her insight and the scope of her novels. Brought up in a narrow religious tradition, in her early twenties she adopted > agnostic opinions about Christian doctrine but she remained steadfast in the ethical teachings associated with it. She began her literary career with translations from the German of two works of religious speculation (> German influence on Victorian literature); in 1851 she became assistant editor of the > Westminster Review, a journal of great intellectual prestige in London. Her friendship with ▶ George Lewes led to a union between them which they both regarded as amounting to > marriage; this was a bold decision in view of the rigid opposition in the English society of the time to open unions not legalized by the marriage ceremony.

Her first fiction consisted of tales later collected together as ▷ Scenes of Clerical Life. Then came her series of full-length novels: > Adam Bede (1859), > The Mill on the Floss (1860), > Silas Marner (1861), > Romola (1862-3), > Felix Holt (1866), > Middlemarch (1871-2) and Daniel Deronda (1876). Up till Romola the novels and tales deal with life in the countryside in which she was brought up; the society is depicted as a strong and stable one, and the novelist combines in an unusual degree sharp, humorous observation and intelligent imaginative sympathy. Romola marks a dividing point; it is a ▶ historical novel about the society of the Italian city of Florence in the 15th century. As a work of imaginative literature it is usually regarded as scholarly but dead; however, it seems to have opened the way to the more comprehensive treatment of English society in her last three novels, in which the relationship of the individual to society is interpreted with an intelligence outstanding in the history of the English novel and often compared with the genius of the Russian novelist, ➤ Leo Tolstov (1828-1910). Her critical reputation has varied; it declined somewhat after her death, her powerful intellect being considered to damage her creativity. She was defended by ➤ Virginia Woolf (1882-1941) in an essay in 1919, but was really re-established by inclusion in F.R. Leavis' The Great Tradition (1948). With the rapid strides in feminist criticism in the 1980s, however, Eliot has been reclaimed as a major influence on women's writing and her works have been the focus of numerous feminist critiques, eg S. Gilbert and S. Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic (1979).

George Eliot's poetry (The Spanish Gipsy, 1868, and The Legend of Jubal, 1870) is now little regarded but her essays for the Westminster Review include work of distinction and she published a collection, The Impressions of Theophrastus Such, in 1879.

In 1880, George Lewes having died, she married John Walter Cross, but she died in the same year.

Bib: Haight, G.S., Life; Leavis, F.R., in The Great Tradition; Bennett, J., George Eliot: Her Mind and her Art; Harvey, W.J., The Art of George Eliot; Pond, E.J., Les Idées Morales et Réligieuses de George Eliot; Hardy, B., The Art of George Eliot; Roberts, N., George Eliot: Her Beliefs and Her Art; Newton, K.M., George Eliot; Norbelie, B.A., Oppressive Narrowness: A Study of the Female Community in George Eliot's Early Writings.

Eliot, T. S. (Thomas Stearns) (1888-1965) Poet, critic, and dramatist. Born in St Louis, Missouri, he later settled in England, where his first important long poem - The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock - appeared in the magazine Poetry in 1915; his first book, Prufrock and Other Observations appeared in 1917. From 1917 to 1919 he was Assistant Editor of the magazine The Egoist (with ➤ H. D.). His most famous poem, > The Waste Land, came out in 1922, in which year he established The Criterion, one of the most influential literary reviews of this century. In 1927 he became a naturalized British subject, and in the same year he demonstrated his conversion to Christianity by becoming a member of the Church of England. His remaining important volumes of poetry were Ash Wednesday (1930) and ▶ Four Quartets (1935-42). The total body of his verse is not large, but it is one of the most important collections of the century. His poetic influences were preponderantly the French 19th-century ➤ Symbolists (➤ Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Laforgue), and the early 17th-century dramatists (▷ Middleton, ▷ Webster, ▷ Tourneur, the later > Shakespeare) and their contemporaries the Metaphysical poets. The great sermon writers of the same period - > John Donne, Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Andrewes - exercised a double influence on his style and his thought, and so did the great Italian medieval poet > Dante. The contemporary who influenced him most and, in particular, greatly contributed to his early poetic development, was his fellow American > Ezra Pound. Finally, the idealist philosophy of ⊳ F. H. Bradley, whom Eliot studied as a student at Harvard and Oxford, was an important formative influence on Eliot's mind; his early academic thesis on Bradley was published in 1963.

Eliot's importance as a critic is linked with his importance as a poet, inasmuch as his really influential criticism was concerned with a reassessment of the past in such a way as to lead up to his own poetic production. Thus The Sacred Wood (1920) came between his first two volumes of verse. The most important of these early essays were republished in Selected Essays (1932). His work as a critic of society and civilization, After Strange Gods (1933) and Notes Towards a Definition of Culture (1948), has been such as to produce less fruitful, more sectarian discussion than his best literary criticism.

Eliot also experimented with verse drama, Murder in the Cathedral (1935), The Family Reunion (1939) and The Cocktail Party (1950) being the most commercially and artistically successful. In 1981 his 1939 collection for children, Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats, was turned into Andrew Lloyd Webber's hit musical Cats, thus reaching an enormous audience.

Eliot's non-dramatic poetry and his early criticism have had the effect in this century of reordering and renewing literary taste both in this country and in America. He was not alone, but he was outstanding, in reviving admiration for the ➤ Metaphysical poets, and reducing the relative status of the ➤ Spenserian and ➤ Miltonic strains in the English tradition. His poetry enlarged the range and form of poetic expression as a medium of the modern consciousness.

Bib: Hayward, J., Selected Prose; Kenner, H., Invisible Poet; Williamson, G., A Reader's Guide; Smith, G., Eliot's Poetry and Plays; Drew, E., T. S. Eliot: The Design of his Poetry; Gardner, H. L., The Art of T. S. Eliot; Moody, A. D., Thomas Stearns Eliot, Poet; Smith, C. H., Eliot's Dramatic Theory and Practice; Çalder, A., T. S. Eliot.

Elision

The suppression of sounds in words with the effect of drawing words together.

Eliza Cook's Journal (1849-54)

A journal written and edited (almost single-handedly), by ▷ Eliza Cook, English poet and essayist. It was aimed at middle-class women and attempted to inform and entertain as well as intervene in debates around the ▷ 'Woman Question'. It included reviews, essays, poetry and sketches, and treated such subjects as the position of working women, the need for legal reform, the social construction of the 'old maid' and the inadequacy of girls' ▷ education. It ceased publishing after five years due to Cook's ill-health, but much material was later included in Jottings from My Journal (1860).

Elizabeth I (1558-1603)

Queen of England. Her reign was an extremely critical one, in which the personal fate of the queen was unusually bound up with that of the nation and the national Church. As a Protestant, she broke > Mary's ties with Rome and restored her father's independent Church of England, but tolerance and compromise won her the lovalty of Catholics and Puritans alike. For 30 years she successfully played off against each other the two great Catholic powers, France and Spain. While she remained single, there was always a chance that her Catholic cousin ➤ Mary, Queen of Scots and widow of a French king, might succeed her. Even when Mary, deposed by the Scots, took refuge in England and connived at plots to murder her, Elizabeth avoided reprisals for nearly 20 years. Mary's eventual execution was followed in 1588 by Philip of Spain's attempted invasion of England, which resulted in the defeat of his powerful fleet, the great ➤ Armada. This was represented as a great triumph for Elizabeth personally, and in her person the English nation saw its own triumph.

The reign saw an efflorescence of national spirit in other ways. It was the period of the first great achievements in English seamanship.

Elizabeth's court was the focus of the real flowering of the English ➤ Renaissance, expressing itself through music and literature; especially, the age of English poetic drama began. Commerce expanded through the joint stock merchant companies and with it a wealthy upper class, partly landed and partly mercantile, who left their mark in the immense country mansions they built all over the land. It was also the period of nationalistic expansion and the founding of many colonies (> Colonialism) in the New World. The queen herself, though cautious in statesmanship, was spirited and highly cultivated. She is now recognized as an author of considerable skill and learning; her speeches and poetry are available in contemporary editions.

➤ Companies, Joint Stock; Drake, Sir Francis; Elizabethan period of English literature; Ralegh, Sir Walter; Sidney, Sir Philip; Sixteenth-century literature.

Bib: Salter, R., Elizabeth I and Her Reign; Travitsky, B., The Paradise of Women.

Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia (1595-1660) Poet and patron. The daughter of ▷ James I, Princess Elizabeth was more influenced by her brother > Henry than by her father. Her marriage to the Elector Palatine in 1613 and their acceptance of the crown of Bohemia in 1619 confirmed her early Protestant leanings. On the loss of Bohemia in 1620 and throughout the ensuing negotiations with Spain, Elizabeth crossed the continent in search of funds and support for the Protestant cause. In Britain she was seen as a tragic heroine in exile and called 'the winter queen', while her Protestantism identified her with the old queen, > Elizabeth I, and there were angry requests for James to send aid to his daughter. She also wrote some poetry. Bib: Greer, G. (ed.), Kissing the Rod.

Elizabethan novels

The events in a novel or novella are not drawn directly from traditional or legendary sources but are invented by the writer, so that they are new (or 'novel') to the reader. The 'novels' of the Elizabethan period are distinguishable from the long prose romances, such as Sir Philip Sidney's > Arcadia, by their comparative brevity, but Arcadia is sometimes included among them.

The Italian novella began its history in the 13th century, and one of its best practitioners,

 Giovanni Boccaccio, was already well known in England, especially from Chaucer's adaptation of his work. In the first 20 years of Elizabeth I's reign, various Italian 'novelle', especially those of Bandello (?1480–1562), were translated into English, notably by William Painter in his collection
 The Palace of Pleasure (1566–7). These translations created a taste for the form, and led to the production of native English 'novels'. > John Lyly's Euphues (1578) was the first of these. Best known among those that followed arc: Lyly's Euphues and his England (1580), Barnabe Rich's (1542–1617) collection Farewell to the Military Profession (1581), > Robert Greene's > Pandosto (1588) and Menaphon (1589), > Thomas Lodge's Rosalynde (1590), De Thomas Nashe's Description (1594), and ▷ Thomas Deloney's Thomas of Reading, Jack of Newbury and The Gentle Craft (all between 1596 and 1600). The style of these works varies greatly. Rich, Greene and Lodge wrote mannered and courtly tales in imitation of Lyly; Nashe's rambling narrative is sometimes strongly realistic, and his style parodies a wide range of contemporary prose styles; Deloney addressed a middle-class public and at his best (in Thomas of Reading) anticipates the sober vividness of Daniel Defoe (1660-1731). The taste for the form lapsed in the early 17th century. There is no continuous development between the Elizabethan novel and the novel form as we know it today: the latter has its beginnings in the work of Defoe in the early 18th century, though it had late 17th-century forerunners.

Both the Italian and the English novels were used as sources for plots by contemporary English dramatists. Shakespeare's \triangleright Twelfth Night is drawn from Apolonius and Silla in Rich's collection, adapted from an Italian original; his \triangleright As You Like It is based on Lodge's Rosalynde; his \triangleright Winter's Tale draws on Greene's Pandosto.

Bib: Margolies, D., Novel and Society in Bib: Margolies, D., Novel and Society in Elizabethan England; Pooley, R., English Prose of the Seventeenth Century 1590–1700.

Elliott, Ebenezer (1781-1849)

Poet. Often called the 'Corn Law Rhymer', Elliott is best known for his political poetry, especially his attack upon unpopular Corn Laws in Corn Law Rhymes (1830). The Village Patriarch (1829) was another work which attempted to raise social consciousness with its description of a poverty-stricken old man. He was admired by Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881).

Bib: Briggs, A., Ebenezer Elliott, the Corn Law Rhymer.

Ellis, Alice Thomas (b before 1939)
Novelist. Alice Thomas Ellis' work has much in common with that of ▷ Beryl Bainbridge, Patrice Chaplin and Caroline Blackwood (with whom Ellis wrote Darling, You Shouldn't Have Gone to So Much Trouble in 1980), who have all been collectively termed 'the Duckworth gang' for the similarity of their concerns and plot: most of their novels deal (with varying degrees of irony and biting wit) with modern women negotiating their own obsessions and a bizarre range of domestic situations, often stemming from sexual and romantic traumas. Thomas Ellis' works are psychologically astute black comedies of contemporary moral dilemmas, which map the terrain between modern sexual codes and (Ellis' strongly Catholic) religious background. She is married to the director of Duckworth publishers (hence 'the Duckworth gang'), and her works include: The Sin Eater (1977); The 27th Kingdom (1982, nominated for the Booker Prize); Unexplained Laughter (1985); Home Life (1986); Secrets of Strangers (1986 with Tom Pitt-Atkins); The Skeleton in the Cupboard (1988); and Pillars of Gold (1992).

Ellis, Henry Havelock (1859–1939)
Psychologist and essayist. Part of his work was scientific: Man and Woman (1894); Studies in the Psychology of Sex (1897–1910). Part of it was literary and expressed in reflective essays: Little Essays in Love and Virtue (1922); Impressions and Comments (1914–23); The Dance of Life (1923). In the latter work he exemplified the revival of the essay as a reflective form early in this century. He was a friend of the novelist > Olive Schreiner.

Bib: Calder Marshall, A., Life; Collis, J.S., An Artist of Life.

Ellmann, Lucy (b 1956)

Novelist. Daughter of the American writers Richard and Mary Ellmann, she was educated at Essex University and the Courtauld Institute and lives in Britain. Sweet Desserts (1988), which won the Guardian fiction prize, concerns the destructiveness of consumerism and the life of a young woman overshadowed by a successful academic father. Her second novel is Varying Degrees of Hopelessness (1991).

Eloisa to Abelard (1717)

An Ovidian (▷ Ovid) monologue in heroic couplets by ▷ Alexander Pope, based on the tragic love affair between the medieval philosopher ▷ Abelard (1079–1142) and Heloise (Eloisa) the daughter of a canon at Notre Dame Cathedral. Eloisa's family, disapproving of the affair, had Abelard castrated, and she became a nun. Their later correspondence on theological and philosophical issues is famous. In Pope's poem Eloisa writes from her convent, expressing her unabated longing, with a mixture of 'romantick' melancholy and theatrical rhetoric. The poem's combination of spirituality and eroticism illustrates the emotional, ▷ Catholic side of Pope's temperament.

Elstob, Elizabeth (1683–1756) Anglo-Saxon scholar and translator, Elstob was born in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and by 1691 both her parents were dead. Although her guardian opposed women's education, Elstob published An English Anglo-Saxon Homily, on the birth-day of St Gregory (1709), having gone to Oxford with her brother. She may have established a day school. She regarded herself as the first woman to study Anglo-Saxon, and in the preface to the Homily she justified women's learning: 'it will be said, What has a Woman to do with Learning? This I have known urged by some Men, with an Envy unbecoming that greatness of Soul, which is said to dignify their Sex. For if Women may be said to have Souls, and their Souls are their better part and that what is best deserves our greatest Care for its Improvement. We must retort the Question. Where is the fault in Womens seeking after Learning?' She also published The Rudiments of Grammar for the Anglo-Saxon Tongue, first given in English with an apology for the study of northern antiquities (1715).

Bib: Ferguson, M., First Feminists.

Elyot, Sir Thomas (?1499-1546) Diplomat and scholar. A member of ▶ Sir Thomas More's circle, he was friendly with ▶ humanists such as ▶ Erasmus, Thomas Linacre and John Colet (1467-1519). His major publication was A Book Named the Governor (1531), dedicated to ➤ Henry VIII. The work is similar to educational and political conduct books such as ➤ Baldassare Castiglione's Il Cortegiano and > Machiavelli's Il Principe, in that it sets out the humanist ideal of the educated and powerful monarch. Elyot also wrote two other works of political philosophy The Image of Governance (1541) and The Doctrinal of Princes (composed c 1534). Bib: Warren, L. C., Humanistic Doctrines of the Prince from Petrarch to Sir Thomas Elyot.

Emblem-books

Books, very popular in England in the 16th century, containing pictures of ordinary objects (compasses, bottles, flowers, etc.) together with short poems showing how the object could be used to teach a truth applicable to life or conduct. Probably the first English emblembook was Thomas Palmer's Two Hundred Poosees (c 1565), created for the ➤ Earl of Leicester. The fashion influenced the imagery of the 17thcentury ➤ Metaphysical poets who commonly used simple objects as more or less complex illustrations of human experience, as when the poet ⊳ John Donne in 'Valediction Forbidding Mourning' compares the relationship of himself and his wife when he goes on a journey to a pair of geometrical compasses whose points can divide but which yet remain united. Poets such as ▷ Francis Quarles and ▷ George Wither wrote verses sometimes shaped like such objects - a bottle, wings, etc. George Wither's A Collection of Emblems, Ancient and Modern appeared in four volumes in 1635, Frances Quarles' Emblems also in 1635, and the slightly earlier collection by ▶ Henry Peachman entitled Minerva Britannia in 1612. Peacham's collection set out to proclaim not so much philosophical truths, but to celebrate English 'worthies' such as > Francis Bacon. It has been argued that poets such as > Richard Crashaw, > George Herbert and > Henry Vaughan were influenced by emblem-books. Such an influence might possibly be discerned not just in the imagery of individual poems, but in the titles and organization of their collections of poetry.

Bib: Emblematica: An Interdisciplinary Journal for Emblem Studies.

Emecheta, Florence Onye Buchi (b 1944) Novelist, short-story writer, radio and television playwright. Born near Lagos, Nigeria of Ibuza parents, she moved to England in 1962 and took a sociology degree at London University. She has worked in the Library Office at the British Museum and as a youth and community worker, and, since 1972, as a writer and lecturer. She has also served on the Advisory Council to the British Home Secretary on race and equality. and on the Arts Council of Great Britain. In 1980-81 she was Senior Research Fellow in the Department of English and Literary Studies at the University of Calabar, Nigeria and she has held various visiting professorships in the United States. Her novels are: In the Ditch (1972); Second Class Citizen (1974); The Bride Price (1976); The Slave Girl (1977); The Joys of Motherhood (1979); Destination Biafra (1982); Naira Power (1982); Double Yoke (1982); The Rape of Shari (1983); Adah's Story: A Novel (1983); A Kind of Marriage (a novella, 1986; also as a teleplay, 1987); Gwendolen (1989); The Family (1990). She has written several teleplays, including Tanya: A Black Woman and The Juju Landlord and four works for children: Titch the Cat (1979); Nowhere To Play (1980); The Wrestling Match (1980); The Moonlight Bride (1981). Head Above Water (1988) is an autobiography. Much of her work contains a strong autobiographical element and deals with the situation of women confronting oppression in both African and Western value-systems and social practices, while a number of her novels are historical, set in Nigeria before and after independence.

Emma (1816)

A novel by ▶ Jane Austen. The heroine, Emma Woodhouse, has wealth, social prestige, good looks and intelligence. But her good fortune and the admiration she elicits are in reality her greatest disadvantage: they blind her to the need for self-knowledge and self-criticism. In what she imagines to be pure generosity of heart, she sets about trying to control the fate of her orphan friend of illegitimate birth and insignificant character, Harriet Smith, imagining her to be the daughter of an aristocrat and deserving a marriage socially worthy of her paternity. Later she also becomes involved with a young man, Frank Churchill, who unknown to her is secretly engaged to a girl, Jane Fairfax, who is superior to Emma in talent but much inferior in worldly fortune. Jane Austen is in fact expanding the theme of the way in which romantic fantasy can blind a character to the realities of experience, more overtly used in earlier novels, > Northanger Abbey and Sense and Sensibility. Emma, who has imagination and ability but nothing on which to employ them, is first trying to make a real-life novel with Harriet Smith as heroine and then participating in a mysterious drama, which she misconceives as her own fantasy wants it to be, with Jane Fairfax as main protagonist. But Harriet decides that she is to marry the man. George Knightley, with whom Emma herself has long been unconsciously in love; Emma also discovers that Churchill, with whom she has been conducting a flirtation, has merely been using her as a tool to mask his secret engagement. She realizes, in fact, that she has caused herself to be a victim of the first of her romances and has been made to play an ignominious and unworthy role in the second. Duly repentant, Emma is ultimately rewarded by Mr Knightley's proposal of marriage. The novel is perhaps Jane Austen's finest, displaying her irony at its most subtle.

Empedocles (5th century BC)

A philosopher and statesman of the Greek colony of Agrigentum in Sicily. He is said to have led the people against the tyrannous government of a powerful class and then to have refused to become their king. According to a legend he met his death in the volcano of Etna, though in reality he seems to have died in Greece. There are various allusions to his legendary end in English literature and it is usually ascribed to dangerous curiosity. The most famous account of it is the poem Empedocles on Etna (1852) by > Matthew Arnold; in this his death is represented as deliberate suicide by a disillusioned and banished political leader. Arnold uses the poem to express his own scepticism.

'Empedocles on Etna' (1852)

A poem by Matthew Arnold, and the most famous account of the legendary death of Empedocles, philosopher and statesman of the Greek colony of Agrigentum in Sicily, who is said to have led the people against the tyrannical government of a powerful class and then to have refused to become their king. According to legend he met his death in the volcano of Etna, though in reality he seems to have died in Greece. In the poem the philosopher is counselled by a physician, Pausanias, and a poet, Callicles, but neither is able to dispel his despair and he throws himself into the crater of Mount Etna – a disillusioned and banished political leader. Arnold's own scepticism is expressed within the poem.

Empiricism

A philosophical theory, according to which ideas are derived from experience, and the verification of knowledge must depend upon experience.

Empson, William (1906–84)

Critic and poet. Empson was born in Yorkshire and worked under I. A. Richards at Cambridge. His main critical works are: Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), The Structure of Complex Words (1951), and Milton's God (1961). Volumes of his verse include: Poems (1940) and Collected Poems (1955).

As a critic, he was very influential, especially through his analysis of the nature of language when it is used in imaginative writing, particularly poetry. His approach was influenced by the attitude to language of 20th century linguistic philosophers, especially > Bertrand Russell and Wittgenstein, who concentrated on the tendency of language, by the ambiguities inherent in it, to confuse clear thought. Empson's teacher, Richards, in his Principles of Literary Criticism (1924), discussed the kinds of truth that are to be found in poetic statements, and how these truths differ from, without being less valuable than, the truths of philosophical and scientific statement. Empson's first book (Seven Types) discusses the way in which various kinds of semantic ambiguity can be used by poets, and shows the relevance of this study to the assessment of poems. It has become a major text in what came to be known as New Criticism. His later books develop the psychological (particularly > Freudian) and philosophical aspects of this approach. More recently post-structuralist and > psychoanalytic critics have become interested in Seven Types of Ambiguity. Empson's poetry is difficult, academic - heavily annotated by him - and itself highly ambiguous. Although difficult and obscure, his poetry was greatly influential on the work of the > Movement.

Enclosures, Enclosure Acts

The term 'enclosure' describes the partitioning and appropriation by individuals of land that was previously either open (▷ open field system) and farmed by communities, or uncultivated and available to anyone for gathering wood or fruit, or grazing animals. Enclosure entailed erecting physical barriers − hedges or fences − to separate land from its surroundings and transferring the responsibility for drainage and other matters onto individual caretakers. It could be done by mutual 'agreement' among owners of private land − 'sensibly dividing the country among opulent men,' as ⊳ Adam Smith wrote - or by > Act of Parliament, the latter especially when large tracts of land were involved. However, sometimes wealthy people simply enclosed or sold off common land, without any negotiation or legislation at all. The process resulted in a concentration of ownership in far fewer hands than before. It led to increased crop yields, healthier and fatter livestock, and greater wealth for large-scale owners. But it also increased poverty among the dispossessed who were unable to afford the new arrangements, such as the smaller landowners, tenant farmers and agricultural labourers. They had always led a precarious existence, exercising their ancient cultivation, grazing and gathering rights on what had been common land. Many were deprived of their rights and all their property, often being driven off the land altogether. Their plight contributed to rural poverty (> Poor Laws), and also to the rapid growth of towns, especially London, as people flocked to them in search of work. Although enclosure is usually associated with the middle and late 18th century, it began as early as the 15th, though not on the same scale. The first part of ▷ Thomas More's ▷ Utopia (1516) is a stinging attack on enclosures, and their effects on poorer farmers and farmworkers. Some of his descriptions of people unable to find employment, falling into crime and ending up in prison or even hanged for theft, could as well apply to the 17th and 18th centuries.

After the > Civil War, and especially after the > Glorious Revolution of 1688, estates began to grow larger, aided by careful purchases of land and strategic marriages. The practice of marrying oneself or one's children for money, or to add a title and perhaps an estate to a fortune, forms the stuff of much Restoration and 18th-century comic drama and novel writing. ▷ Wycherley's ▷ The Country Wife (1675), > Etherege's > The Man of Mode (1676), > Behn's > The City Heiress (1682) and > The Lucky Chance (1687), and ➤ Richardson's ➤ Clarissa are just some of the numerous works that deal with these subjects, with variations and sometimes ambiguities as to the precise social classes and backgrounds of the protagonists. Some families acquired enormous wealth and huge estates: a new class of ultra-rich landowners emerged whose main concern was to increase their farm yields and profits even further. Enclosures offered a way. By 1700 about half the cultivatable land had been enclosed, but there still remained a broad stretch of unenclosed land, including parts of East Anglia and much of the Midlands. A series of Acts was passed, accelerating the process of enclosure especially in the second half of the 18th century. From 1760 to 1799 enclosures brought between two and three million acres of land into cultivation.

The resulting increase in surplus wealth created a leisure class and the development of aesthetic ▷ taste, as a stimulus to consumption. But escalating rural poverty encouraged a new kind of poetry, such as ▷ Goldsmith's ▷ The Deserted Village and ▷ Crabbe's The Village, protesting against the sufferings of the rural poor and recalling happier times. This social change was a factor in the growth of ▷ Radicalism and the ▷ Romantic movement.

Bib: Plumb, J. H., England in the Eighteenth Century; Williams, R., The Country and the City; Porter, R., English Society in the Eighteenth Century; Sharpe, J. A., Early Modern England 1550-1760.

Encounter

Political and literary magazine, founded in 1953 and initially edited by the poet Stephen Spender and Irving Kirstol. During the 1950s and early 1960s it provided a prominent forum for the discussion of cultural issues, especially the condition and future of British society. Politically it was anti-communist and claimed to advocate reform on the basis of a post-ideological consensus in the West.

Encyclopaedists

The collaborators in the production of the great French encyclopaedia (> L'Encyclopédia) of the 18th century. The enterprise began with a translation of the English Cyclopaedia by Ephraim Chambers but the French version was intellectually altogether more impressive. Its editors were two leaders of the 'philosophers' D'Alembert and Diderot - and its contributors were the leading male minds of France, such men as > Voltaire and > Rousseau. The inspiration was faith in reason and the desire to destroy superstition and beliefs thought to arise from it. The movement contributed to the influences which later led to the > French Revolution, and it reinforced > rationalism throughout Europe. In England the movement influenced > Jeremy Bentham and through him the > Utilitarians of the 10th century.

> French literature in England.

Encyclopédie, L'

An encyclopaedia published in 28 volumes between 1751 and 1772, under the editorship of ▷ Diderot (1713–84) and (until 1758) the mathematician D'Alembert (1717–83). Its contributors included ▷ Voltaire, ▷ Rousseau, ▷ Montesquieu, Buffon (1707–88) and Turgot (1727–81). The work originated in a translation of the English Cyclopaedia, or the Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences (1728) of Ephraim Chambers (d 1740), but the French version was intellectually more ambitious and more impressive. It was guided by a trust in reason and ▷ rationalistic explanation, and the desire to destroy superstition and the beliefs thought to arise from it. The work's fierce attacks on Church and State proved potent criticism of the ▷ Ancien Régime (it was suppressed at various stages of its composition) and heralded the overthrow of the monarchy in the ▷ French Revolution. It reinforced European rationalism and in England influenced ▷ Jeremy Bentham and through him the 19th-century Utilitarians (▷ Utilitarianism).

End-rhyme

Rhyme occurring in the usual position, ie at the end of a line; internal rhymes occur in the middle of a line, and head-rhymes are the correspondence of the beginnings of words, ie alliteration.

End-stopped lines

Lines of verse, especially blank verse, which end at the end of a sentence or at strongly marked pauses within the sentence. The opposite effect is produced by run-on lines, when the syntax makes the voice go on to the next line without pause.

> Enjambment.

Endymion (1818)

Poem by > John Keats. It is based on an ancient Greek myth about a shepherd with whom the moon goddess fell in love. The poem has passages of great freshness and beauty, but, as Keats soon came to realize, it is immature. Its classicism is a resource for the free embroidering of fanciful stories; and the theme, the indulgence of the senses, is one that Keats quickly outgrew.

➤ Classical mythology; Greek literature.

England's Helicon

An Elizabethan verse ▷ anthology, published in 1600 and possibly edited by one Nicholas Ling. The collection mainly comprises ▷ pastoral verse, and contains poems by ▷ Sir Philip Sidney, ▷ Edmund Spenser, ▷ Michael Drayton, ▷ Thomas Lodge and others, as well as 'The Passionate Sheepheards Song' by ▷ Shakespeare. This last was taken from Act IV of ▷ Love's Labour's Lost, first published in quarto in 1598. The poem was republished in ▷ The Passionate Pilgrim of 1599. In 1614 a second edition of England's Helicon appeared, which included additional verses by Sidney and a poem by ▷ William Browne.

Bib: Macdonald, H. (ed.), England's Helicon.

English Language

English does not originate in England. English has its roots in the Germanic dialects of the peoples of north-western Europe who invaded Britain in the 5th century, after the Romans had withdrawn. According to the Venerable Bede, the bulk of the Angle, Saxon, and Jutish settlers arrived in 449, pushing back the native Celtic tribes into Cornwall, Wales and Scotland. This and subsequent invasions account for much of the current diversity in the languages of Britain. The development of the Celtic languages, notably, Cornish, Welsh and Scottish Gaelic, proceeded relatively independently of English. Each established its own literary tradition, and, excepting Cornish which died out in the 18th century, are living languages today.

The Angles settled in (and gave name to) what is now East Anglia, and also spread to Mercia (the Midlands) and further North to Northumbria (north of the Humber and southeast Scotland). The Saxons remained in the south, a fact evidenced by the area names Sussex ('south saxons'), Essex ('east saxons'), and the old name for the south-west Wessex ('west saxons'). The lutes seem to have remained largely in Kent. Some of the dialectal differences in today's English originate in the Germanic dialects spoken by these tribes, though there is some debate about whether these differences were present before the tribes came to Britain or whether the dialectal divisions developed in England itself as a result of political, social and economic factors. Whatever the case, the differences were originally slight, and from the very beginning writers of these tribes referred to their language as 'Englisc' (derived from the name of the Angles), regardless of their own particular dialect. The most common vocabulary items in usage today come from these Germanic dialects.

In the 9th century Britain saw the beginning of a second wave of invaders - the Scandinavian Vikings. Arriving from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, they soon took over the East of England and were only halted when King Alfred (the king of Wessex) won a decisive victory over the Danish King Guthrum in 878. The following year a treaty was drawn up whereby the Danes retreated to the east of a line running roughly from Chester to London, an area which became known as Danelaw. The significance of this boundary is that it had the effect of increasing dialectal differences between the north and the south. For example, the fact that today the words farm and sir are more likely to be pronounced as varm and zir in the south-west is partly a result of this settlement. However, the Scandinavian dialects were not greatly different from the Germanic dialects that constituted English, and in fact were readily assimilated into the core of English. For example, the word 'are' (part of the most common verb in today's English) is Scandinavian in origin.

The third wave of invaders were the Norman French who arrived in 1066. This date is an important point in the development of English. Scholars usually refer to English before 1100 as Old English; that of 1100–1500 as Middle English; and that of 1500 today as Modern English. Most surviving records of Old English are written in West Saxon, which became the principal written variety from the 9th century, largely as a result of the increasing political supremacy of Wessex. The longest work of Old English literature, and probably the best known, is the poem Beowulf. The arrival of French, however, diminished the cultural status of West Saxon. In the Middle English period Latin was used for highly formal texts (e.g. laws, religious texts, scholarly works), Norman French became a prestige language spoken by the upper classes and used for administration, and English was a set of largely spoken dialects. Middle English is characterised by great regional variety. In the absence of any type of standard, writers who wrote in English wrote in their own dialects. As a result, all dialects are well represented in the literature of the period. For instance, the York 'mystery plays' are good examples of the Northern dialect, the poems Sir Gawain and the Green Knight Pearl, Patience and Purity are written in the dialect of the northwest Midlands, and William Langland's Piers Plowman represents the south-west Midlands dialect. Chaucer wrote in the east Midlands dialect, and John of Trevisa wrote scholarly works in a south-western dialect.

By the end of the Middle English period, French had been displaced by English as the language of the aristocracy. Until about 1430, almost all official documentation was written in French or Latin. With an expanding population a more efficient medium for communication was needed, not a language that was understood by a very small elite. The particular variety of English that was adopted by the bureaucracy was a mixture of elements from the Midlands dialects. This development was one factor that played a role in the formation of a national standard of written English. The involvement of the Midlands dialects seems logical because of their geographical centrality: people to the north and south could understand the dialect in the middle, but not so easily each other. Moreover, the variety of English spoken in London was basically the dialect of the east Midlands. It is not surprising that London English was a key factor in the rise of this standard, given that it was the language of the capital (the centre of commerce and administration) and, importantly, that Caxton established his printing press there in the 15th century. In the 16th century we begin to see the production of English dictionaries, grammar books, and spelling books. These were adopted in schools, and became arbiters of the language. They had the effect of fixing the standard and thus stabilising the variation in written English. The development of a written standard explains why English in texts of the 18th century looks relatively familiar to us and does not vary too much from one writer to the next, whereas that of 15th-century texts and before looks alien and varies drastically.

The development of a kind of spoken

'standard' follows a very different path from that of the written standard. In Old and Middle English, writing more or less reflected speech. With the standardisation of writing, a rift opened up: writing was retarded in its natural changes, whereas speech continued to change unabated. Thus, although spelling became fixed when a written standard developed, pronunciation continued to change. In fact, from approximately 1400-1600, English saw dramatic changes in the pronunciation of long vowels; a process that is traditionally labelled 'The Great Vowel Shift'. A consequence of this is that today's spelling seems so ill matched with pronunciation. Scholars of the past, particularly in the 18th century, expressed their concern for this rift and also the apparently chaotic variability of pronunciation. Although no 'standard' (in the sense of a variety used by a majority) developed, from the 16th century onwards one variety of speech acquired particular social prestige, namely, the pronunciation of the court, based on that of the London area. Pronunciation was a marker of position in society. Just as technology (printing presses) had played a role in establishing a written standard, so technology was to play a role in promoting one variety of spoken English. In the 20th century the BBC chose 'Received Pronunciation' as the variety of spoken English they would broadcast. This was the variety spoken by the upper classes and, in particular, spoken in public schools. Today, we might well refer to it as 'BBC English', 'The Oueen's English' or simple 'talking posh'. Received Pronunciation, however, has less authority now than it used to have in the first half of 20th century. It has always been spoken by a small minority, today around 3% of the population.

Successive waves of invaders brought English into contact with other languages. One important consequence of this has been the steady expansion of English vocabulary. About 1,800 words of Scandinavian origin have survived into present day English. The number of French borrowings is far greater, largely because of the great prestige enjoyed by the French language. Even after English displaced French as the language of the ruling classes, French culture exerted a powerful influence, and continues to do so today. Some 10,000 words were adopted into English in the Middle English period. In particular, French borrowings can be seen in the language of the legal system (eg judge, jury, prison), administration (eg parliament, government), fashion (eg dress, jewel, cloak), cuisine (eg beef, lettuce, mutton, pork, sausage, venison), and art (eg art, beauty, romance). In many cases Anglo-Saxon words were replaced by French ones (eg stow by place, wyrd by fortune). Where both survived meanings tended to drift apart (eg house and mansion, blood and sanguine).

An enormous number of the French borrowings had originally come from Latin. There were also several thousand direct Latin borrowings, particularly towards the end of the Middle English period. Most of these were from areas such as religion, science, law and literature (eg scripture, client, conviction, library, scribe, dissolve, quadrant, medicine, ulcer). The main influx of Latin, and also Greek vocabulary, commenced in the 16th century. The Renaissance saw the development of new concepts and techniques, the flowering of the arts and sciences, as well as further exploration of the world. Much of this took place on the continent of Europe, and English writers often borrowed the European terms for these developments. At this time, learning was given a boost by printing: books became widely available. However, many literary, scientific and religious texts were in Latin. Latin was the language of scholarship and scholarly literature. To make these texts more widely available, people began to translate them into English, often using a Latin word in the translation when no good English equivalent could be found. The upshot of these developments was that words from many languages were adopted into English, but especially words from Latin, Greek and the Romance languages French, Italian, and Spanish. One estimate is that as many as 20,000 Latin words entered English in the 16th century alone. Examples of Latin borrowings include absurdity, benefit, exist, exaggerate, external, jocular, obstruction, relaxation, relevant, vacuum, virus, excursion, fact, impersonal, and eradicate.

The fact that English has a multi-sourced vocabulary has important implications for the language today. An obvious one is that English has an incredibly large vocabulary. Furthermore, words of Germanic and Latinate origin have acquired distinctive flavours of their own, and are used in different contexts and for different purposes. The basic core of everyday spoken English is Germanic, and more abstract, formal, written English tends to be Latinate. English also has many groups of near synonyms. Triple synonyms such as fire (Germanic), flame (French) and conflagration (Latinate) clearly vary on scale from informal to formal. Moreover, although these words might have the same basic meaning, they have developed different connotations. The word inexpensive (Latinate), for example, is relatively neutral when compared with the negative connotations of cheap (Germanic).

Authors have been able to capitalise on the resources of English vocabulary. Shakespeare made full use of both Germanic and Latinate vocabulary for purposes such as creating a particular tone, developing a character or achieving a dramatic contast. Some writers have expressed a preference for either Latinate or Germanic vocabulary. Dryden saw latin as a necessary means of giving 'ornament' to our 'old Teutonic syllables'. Milton favoured Latinate vocabulary, as did many writers of the 18th century. Others hotly debated this preference, viewing it as the abandonment of 'natural, common speech' in favour of words coming from books or the inkhorn (hence this debate which began in the Renaissance was termed the 'Inkhorn Controversy'). Recent exponents of this view have included the Dorset poet William Barnes and George Orwell.

The English language has also expanded in other respects. The uses to which English is put have multiplied over the years. By the end of the 17th century, Latin had been replaced by English as the language of scholarly works. Schools began to switch from Latin to English. Literacy improved, and in the 19th century there was a boom in publishing. Today, English dominates the world stage in a number of language uses: it is the main language of publishing, science, technology, commerce, diplomacy, air-traffic control, and popular culture. The reasons for this are to do with the political and economic power of Britain in the 19th century and America in the 20th century. These same reasons also account for a dramatic increase in the number of users of English. In the 16th century there were around three million speakers of English. today, there are over 300 million native speakers of English. To this one could add a further 300 million who regularly speak English as a second language (ie in addition to their native language). In fact, it has been estimated that in total around a billion people use English in varying degrees. English is the most widely used language in the world.

With the international spread of English it is perhaps more appropriate now to speak of 'World Englishes'. American and British English are the two most important national varieties, both in terms of numbers of speakers and world-wide impact. Other important varieties of English include those of Australia, Canada, Ireland, New Zealand and South Africa, where English is principally a native language, and also various countries in Africa, the subcontinent of India, the Caribbean, and south-east Asia, where English is principally a second language. In each of these countries English has acquired its own distinctive characteristics and developed its own literature. Perhaps an indication that these literatures have come of age is the fact that the 1992 Nobel Prize for Literature was awarded to Caribbean poet

Derek Walcott.

Bib: Burchfield, R., The English Language; Baugh, A. C. and Cable, T., A History of the English Language; Crystal, D., The English Language.

Enjambment

A term describing the continuing of the sense from line to line in a poem, to the extent that it is unnatural in speaking the verse to make a pause at the line ending. The effect is that of 'run-on' lines.

➤ End-stopped lines

Enlightenment

The term was originally borrowed into English in the 1860s from German (Aufklärung), to designate the spirit and aims of the French philosophers of the 18th century, such as Diderot and ➤ Voltaire. But as historical perspectives have changed the word has come to be used in a much wider sense, to denote the whole period following the > Renaissance, during which scepticism and scientific > rationalism came to dominate European thinking. Enlightenment grew out of Renaissance at different times in different countries. In Britain, the empiricism of ➤ Francis Bacon (1561-1626) and the secular pragmatism of > Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679) mark its early stages. Its golden age began however with ▶ John Locke (1632–1704) in philosophy, and ➤ Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1727) in science, and it reached its height in the first half of the 18th century. Locke argued that 'Reason must be our last judge and guide in everything', and rejected medieval philosophy as superstition. Newton's theory of gravitation seemed to explain the mysteries of the solar system. The fact that Newton had also worked on optics was ingeniously alluded to in > 'Alexander Pope's couplet: 'Nature, and Nature's Laws lay hid in Night. God said, Let Newton be! and All was Light'.

The onset of Enlightenment in Britain coincided with the bourgeois revolution and many of its values reflect the optimistic temper of the newly dominant class, as much as any abstract philosophical system. In contrast to the previous ideology of static hierarchy, appropriate to a landowning aristocracy and its peasant underclass, the new ideology of merchants and professional men placed its emphasis on understanding and dominating the environment. God lost his numinousness, becoming a kind of divine mathematician, and the Deist thinkers of the time rejected the dogmas of the scriptures in favour of 'natural religion' based on an understanding of God's laws through science. Pope expresses this idea in classic form in his > Essay on Man (1733-4), cleverly blending it with the older hierarchical idea of the Great Chain of Being. Pope's Essay stands as a compendium of popular Enlightenment ideas, expressing the expansive confidence of the middle class that 'Whatever is, is right.' It was easy for the middle-class reader of the day to feel that British philosophy, science, trade and imperialism were all working together to advance civilization throughout the world. It is a myth projected in many of the works of Pope, > James Thomson and other writers of the time.

As the 18th century developed, the bourgeoisie's confidence in its progressive destiny faltered, reaching a crisis after the > French Revolution in what we now call the > Romantic movement. > William Blake attempted to restore the pre-Enlightenment numinousness of God and nature, rejecting Newton's 'particles of light', and the idea of inert matter or empty space. Imagination, not science, was for him the key to nature: 'Every thing possible to be believ'd is an image of truth.' > Percy Bysshe Shelley, using politically resonant imagery, asserted that 'man, having enslaved the elements, remains himself a slave' and warned of the dangers of 'an unmitigated exercise of the calculating faculty' (one of the characteristic institutions of the Enlightenment period was, of course, the slave trade). Even the fundamentally materialist > John Keats complained about the prosaic nature of Enlightenment philosophy:

There was an awful rainbow once in heaven: We know her woof, her texture; she is given In the dull catalogue of common things. Philosophy will clip an Angel's wings. (Lamia; 231-4)

More recently 'Enlightenment' has been given a yet wider historical application by the German philosophers Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer, whose book, Dialectic of Enlightenment (1944) sees the manipulative, calculating spirit of Enlightenment as the identifying characteristic of western civilization. They trace its manifestations from ➤ Odysseus' tricking of the primitive bumpkin Polyphemus, to the treatment of people as means rather than ends which characterizes both modern totalitarian politics and consumer > capitalism. Recent ecological movements, which advocate a respect for nature, rather than an exploitation of it, continue the same dialectic. Bib: Willey, B., The Eighteenth-Century Background; Redwood, J., Reason, Ridicule and Religion: The Age of Enlightement in England.

'Enoch Arden'

A poem by > Tennyson written in 1861 and 1862 and published in Enoch Arden and Other Poems in 1864, which brought its author £,6000 in one year. It was one of the most popular of Tennyson's poems in its day. Based on a story furnished by his sculptor friend, Thomas Woolner, it tells of a man who returns from a voyage of many years, having undertaken to save his wife and children from penury, to find her happily remarried. Rather than destroy her happiness he conceals the fact of his return and lives alone for the rest of his life. His literal and symbolic isolation is powerfully realized in the description of his shipwreck on a lonely island, and in the moment when he renounces his wife and children after seeing the new family through the window. Enoch Arden is associated with Christ, and with Ulysses, who figures again in Tennyson's powerful lyric 'Crossing the Bar'. The theme is common to > Elizabeth Gaskell's Sylvia's Lovers and > Adelaide Anne Procter's poem 'Homeward Bound'.

Enright, D. J. (b 1920)

Poet, novelist and literary critic. Enright was an important figure in the ▶ Movement in the 1950s, and his poetry remains strongly humanistic and anti-romantic. His volumes of verse include: The Laughing Hyena (1953); Bread Rather Than Blossoms (1956); Some Men Are Brothers (1960); Selected Poems (1968); Sad Ires (1975); and A Faust Book (1979).

Ephelia

The name used by a late 17th-century poet writing in English, whose identification is made all the more difficult by the fact that it is a name frequently used by other writers, or as the name of the recipient of a poem. How much weight we give to the internal evidence of poems – such as the poems to 'Strephon' – depends on how literally we imagine these poems can be related to a 'life'. The guesses at the identity of this author have included \triangleright Katherine Philips' daughter, Elizabeth Mordaunt.

Publications attributed to this name include: Panegyric to the King (1678); Female Poems on Several Occassions (1679), and Advice to His Grace (1681/2).

Bib: Greer, G. et al., Kissing the Rod.

Enic

I A narrative of heroic actions, often with a principal hero, usually mythical in its content, offering inspiration and ennoblement within a particular cultural or national tradition.

2 The word denotes qualities of heroism and grandeur, appropriate to epic but present in other literary or even non-literary forms.

Epics occur in almost all national cultures, and commonly give an account of national origins, or enshrine ancient, heroic myths central to the culture. For European culture at large, much the most influential epics are the ▷ Iliad and the ▷ Odyssey of ▷ Homer and the ▷ Aeneid by ▷ Virgil. ▷ C. S. Lewis in Preface to Paradise Lost makes a helpful distinction between primary and secondary epics: primary ones, such as Homer's, are composed for a society which is still fairly close to the conditions of society described in the narrative; secondary epics are based on the pattern of primary epics but written for a materially developed society more or less remote from the conditions described, eg Virgil's Aeneid. In English literature the ▷ Old English ▷ Beomulf may be counted as a primary epic. A number of attempts at secondary epic have been made since the 16th century, but > John Milton's > Paradise Lost is unique in its acknowledged greatness and its closeness to the Virgilian structure. ▷ Spenser's ▷ The Faerie Queene has many epic characteristics, but, in spite of the important classical influences upon it, the poem's structure is derived from the 'romantic epic' of the 16th-century Italian poets, ▷ Ariosto and Tasso; moreover, though allegory often plays a part in epics, the allegorical elements in The Faerie Queene are so pervasive as to present a different kind of imaginative vision from that normally found in them.

Many other works in English literature have epic qualities without being definable as epics. For example, ▷ Fielding described ▷ Tom Tones as a comic epic, and it is this as much as it is a novel: a series of adventures of which Tom is the hero, but of which the consequences are loss of dignity rather than enhancement of dignity. Melville's prose romance Moby Dick (1851) has true epic scale, seriousness of treatment and relevance to the human condition. > James Joyce's > Ulysses uses the Odyssey as the ground plan for a narrative about a day in the life of a Dublin citizen, and though the intention of this and of Joyce's succeeding work > Finnegans Wake is in part comic, there is also in both books deep seriousness, such as derives from the authentic epic tradition. In fact, this tradition, in the last three hundred years, has mingled with other literary forms, such as the romance, the comic romance (eg > Don Quixote), and the novel, and it is in this mixed rather than in its original pure form that it has proved most productive.

Epic, Mock

➤ Mock epic

Epic simile

Prolonged similes, commonly used in ▷ epic or heroic poetry, giving the subject described a spaciousness suited to its grandeur. Thus in Paradise Lost Bk. I, ▷ Milton wants to say that the fallen Satan is as big as a whale; this would be to use an ordinary simile. He expands it to an epic simile thus:

As huge as ...

Leviathan, which God of all his works
Created hugest that swim th'Ocean stream:
Him haply slumbring on the Norway foam
The Pilot of some small night-founder'd Skiff, Deeming some Island, oft, as Sea-men tell,
With fixéd Anchor in his skaly rind
Moors by his side under the Lee, while Night
Invests the Sea, and wishéd Morn delayes:
So stretcht out huge in length the Arch-fiend lay.

Epic Theatre

A term used to describe dramatic and → theatrical practices originally associated with Bertolt Brecht and Erwin Piscator that attempt to combat audiences' tendencies to empathic reactions, particularly those associated with Naturalism. Brecht developed a range of strategies to achieve an Alienation effect, whereby the audience remained aware of the processes of the theatrical event and able to reflect on it rather than be consumed by it. Very little contemporary dramaturgy and staging is unaffected in some way by Epic Theatre. Bib: Styan, J. L., Modern Drama in Theory and Practice 3: Expressionism and Epic Theatre; Willett, J. ed, Brecht on Theatre.

Epicoene, or The Silent Woman (1609) A comedy by ➤ Ben Jonson. Epicoene means having the characteristics of either sex. The main character, Morose, who has an extreme hatred of noise, wants to disinherit his nephew and marry a silent woman if she can be found. A completely silent one is found, but after marriage she finds the use of her tongue and is anything but silent. Morose promises to reinstate his nephew as his heir, with an additional reward, if he can free his uncle of the wife who is now the opposite of what he hoped. The nephew then discloses that the wife is a boy disguised. Though not one of the greatest of Jonson's comedies, it has always been one of his most popular, owing to a large cast of lively comic characters. The play is given a close analysis in Dryden's (1631-1700) Essay on Dramatic Poesy.

> Querelle des Femmes.

Epigram

For the ancient Greeks the word meant 'inscription'. From this, the meaning extended to include very short poems notable for the terseness and elegance of their expression and the weight and wit of their meaning. The richest of the ancient Greek collections is the Greek > Anthology; the greatest Latin masters were > Catullus and Martial. > Ben Jonson's epigrams are in their tradition; for example, To the Reader, Pray thee, take care, that tak'st my book in hand, To read it well: that is, to understand. After him, epigrams became shorter and most commonly had satirical content; > Pope was the greatest master of this style, and his poems include many epigrams.

▶ Aphorism.

Epiphany

A Church festival celebrating the showing ('epiphany' means manifestation) of the Christ child to the Magi, otherwise known as the three Wise Men or the Three Kings (Matthew II). The festival is 12 days after Christmas Day, so it is also called Twelfth Night. It concludes the season of Christmas festivities.

The novelist ➤ James Joyce began his career by writing what he called 'epiphanies', ie sketches in which the incident, though often in itself slight, manifests or reveals the inner truth of a character. This is the method he pursues in \triangleright Dubliners. Other 'epiphanal' experiences might be \triangleright Virginia Woolf's 'moments of being' or Wordsworth's \triangleright 'Spots of Time'.

Epipsychidion (1821)

> Shelley's turbulent poem concerning the relationship between the intellectual flights of metaphor and the felt reality of love, composed in Pisa and triggered by the incarceration of 'the noble and unfortunate lady', Emilia Viviani, in a convent. The degree to which the poet's relationship with Emilia was flirtatious or > platonic is not clear to us now, and may not have been so then. What is more clear is that the imprisonment of a beautiful girl (by parents in search of a suitable husband) was a gift to Shelley as a poet, enabling him to attack favourite targets such as marriage and the church with passionate and trenchant oratory. Indeed, ▷ Romantic ▷ rhetoric in this poem begins to become its own subject, and the unfortunate Emilia becomes less a woman than a fecund figure of speech, 'A Metaphor of Spring and Youth and Morning; A Vision like Incarnate April, warning/ With smiles and tears, Frost the Anatomy/ Into his summer grave'. At once fiery and self-questioning, Epipsychidion not only bears on those themes that ▷ Deconstructionist critics such as ▷ Paul de Man have detected in Romantic poetry, but appears through the complexities of its language to deconstruct itself.

Episteme

The traditional meaning of the term 'epistemology' is 'the theory of science of the method or grounds of knowledge' (Oxford English Dictionary). In the work of the French philosopher ➤ Michel Foucault, 'episteme' has come to mean something more specific. He uses the term to describe 'the total set of relations that unite, at a given period, the discursive practices that give rise to epistemological figures, sciences, and possibly formalized systems,' (The Archaeology of Knowledge; 1972). In short the episteme is historicized as the basic unit used to describe the manner in which a society represents knowledge to itself. Foucault conceives of the episteme in dynamic rather than static terms, since knowledge is always a matter of the ways in which 'desire' and 'power' negotiate their way through the complex ▷ discourses of society. Foucault is at pains to point out, however, that the episteme does not establish a transcendental authority which guarantees the existence of scientific knowledge, but rather points towards the fact that different kinds of knowledge are inscribed in 'the process of a historical practice'.

Epistolary novel

A novel which takes the form of letters written by one or more of the characters. One of the best-known examples in English is ➤ Samuel Richardson's > Pamela (1740-1).

Epitaph

An inscription on a tomb, or a short verse or prose inscription that might serve such a purpose. As literary compositions, epitaphs became popular in the > Renaissance, and the requirement of brevity gives epitaphs a resemblance to ⊳ epigrams. The 18th century, the great age of the epigram, was also that in which the epitaph was most cultivated.

Epithalamion (1594)

Edmund Spenser's ode written in 1594, and published at the end of the ▷ sonnet sequence > Amoretti (1595). The poem celebrates the marriage of Spenser to Elizabeth Boyle at Cork on 11 July 1594. > Prothalamion.

Epvllion

A term, now largely unused, to describe the short-lived but popular Elizabethan genre of the minor or brief > epic. It often, though not exclusively, denoted narrative verse which took as its model not the epics of ⊳ Homer or ➤ Virgil, but the writings of ➤ Ovid. The genre flourished in England in the late 16th century, and includes works such as > Thomas Lodge's Scilla's Metamorphosis (1589), Ovid's Banquet of Sence (1595) by ⊳ George Chapman (?1559-1634) and ➤ Francis Beaumont's Salmacis and Hermaphroditus (1602). The most famous examples of the genre are undoubtedly > Christopher Marlowe's > Hero and Leander of 1598, to which Chapman and Henry Petowe (fl 1598-1612) appended 'continuations', and ➤ Shakespeare's ➤ Venus and Adonis (1593). Invariably, the epyllion's subject matter was erotic myth, but unlike earlier translations of Ovid, there was no attempt at placing the erotic within ➤ allegorical or moral context. Bib: Alexander, N. (ed.), Elizabethan Narrative Verse.

Erasmus, Desiderius (?1466-1536) Dutch-born Augustinian monk, translator, humanist, educationalist, biblical scholar and linguist. Erasmus was one of the most important northern European scholars of the ➤ Renaissance period. The diversity of his interests, the range of his accomplishments, and the weight of his influence on European thought in the 16th century and later are almost impossible to quantify.

Erasmus' chief works are: the Adages (first published in 1500), the Enchiridion (1503), the Praise of Folly (1509) and the Colloquies (first published in 1516). But to these popular successes can be added his editions of the Church Fathers, paraphrases, commentaries on the scripture, editions of the classics and a huge correspondence with other European scholars and thinkers, the most important of whom, in England, was his close friend ➤ Sir Thomas More. The Praise of Folly, a satirical work which ranges widely over all aspects of public life in the period, was conceived while Erasmus was travelling to England to see More – a circumstance preserved in the work's punning Latin title: Encomium Moriae.

The Enchiridion, on the other hand, is a manual of the Christian life which encourages knowledge of pagan (that is > classical) literature as a preparative towards attaining Christian scriptural understanding. The Adages - a work which grew from some 800 'adages' or classical sayings into over 4,000 short essays by the time Erasmus died - provided an entry into classical literature, and into humanistic thought generally, for the public at large. Similarly, the Colloquies expanded as Erasmus worked at the project until they eventually formed a wideranging series of dialogues on a huge variety of topics, which were to include education, games, travel, parenthood, punishment and social and religious questions. Bib: The Collected Works of Erasmus; Huizinga,

J., Erasmus of Rotterdam.

Erewhon (1872) and Erewhon Revisited (1901) Satirical anti-utopias by ➤ Samuel Butler. ➤ Sir Thomas More's ➤ Utopia is a description of an ideal country as different as possible from England. Erewhon (an anagram of 'Nowhere') represents a country many of whose characteristics are analogous to English ones, caricatured and satirized. Thus Butler satirizes ecclesiastical institutions through the Musical Banks and parental tyranny through the Birth Formulae; machinery has to be abolished before it takes over from human beings. In Erewhom Revisited, Higgs, the English discoverer of Erewhon, finds that his previous departure by balloon has been used by Professors Hanky and Panky ('hanky-panky' is deceitful practice) to impose a new religion, according to which Higgs is worshipped as a child of the sun. Butler's method in these satires resembles > Jonathan Swift's satirical technique in the Lilliput of ➤ Gulliver's Travels.

Esmond, The History of (1852)

A historical novel by ➤ William Makepeace Thackeray. It is a very careful reconstruction of early-18th-century English aristocratic and literary society. The hero's father has been killed fighting for James II, ie he was a > Jacobite. The politics of the book are involved with Jacobite plotting by the Roman ➤ Catholic branch of the House of > Stuart to recover the throne of Britain from the Protestant branch. There are portraits of some of the distinguished personalities of the time - the Duke and Duchess of ➤ Marlborough, and the writers ➤ Sir Richard Steele, ➤ Joseph Addison and ➤ Jonathan Swift. The style emulates that of Addison himself. The theme is the devotion of the young Henry Esmond to his relatives, Lady Castlewood, eight years older than himself, and her proud and ambitious daughter, Beatrix. These relationships are complicated by political intrigues and by family mysteries — Esmond is in reality himself the heir to the title and properties inherited by Lady Castlewood's husband. In the end, Esmond marries the widowed Lady Castlewood and emigrates to Virginia; his story continues in The Virginians (1857–9).

Essay concerning Human Understanding (1690) A philosophical treatise by ➤ John Locke. Locke emphasizes reason as the dominant faculty of man. All knowledge is acquired through experience based on sense impressions; there are no 'innate ideas', ie no knowledge arises in the mind independently of impressions received from the outside world. These impressions divide into primary qualities, ie the measurable ones such as size, number, form, etc., and secondary ones, such as colour, sound and scent, which are not demonstrably part of the object, but dependent on the observer. Knowledge begins with perception of agreement or disagreement in the qualities observed in the objects or, as Locke calls them, 'ideas'. He distinguishes between rational judgement, which identifies and analyses ideas, and 'wit', which relates them by their resemblances; the distinction is practically one between reason and imagination and gives advantage to reason. Faith, eg in religious doctrine, is not distinct from reason, but the assent of the mind to a belief that accords with reason. Thus Locke appeals to clear definition in language and expression; he depreciates the intuitive and imaginative faculties of the mind and elevates the rational ones. His thesis accords with the reaction at the end of the 17th century against the intolerance and fanaticism of the religious conflicts which had prevailed during the first half of it. The influence of his philosophy is impressed on the imaginative prose literature of the first thirty years of the 18th century, for instance in the realism of ➤ Daniel Defoe. Later in the century, the novelist > Laurence Sterne makes ingenious use of Locke's theory of the association of ideas in > Tristram Shandy.

Essay on Criticism (1711)

Written when he was only 21 and published when he was 23, ➤ Alexander Pope's compendium of neo-classical poetic theory in ➤ heroic couplets was highly praised by ➤ Joseph Addison, and helped to make his reputation. Pope defends the poetic art by arguing, in the tradition of ➤ Aristotle, ➤ Horace, and more recently ➤ Boileau, that 'true wit' is merely an 'imitation' of nature, and is not startling and original like the 'false wit' of the discredited 17th-century > 'metaphysical' poets. 'True wit is Nature to Advantage drest,/ What oft was Thought, but ne'er so well Exprest'.

Moreover Nature has already been perfectly understood by the revered ancient Greek and Latin poets, and the modern poet need not go to the trouble of copying direct from it since: 'To copy 'Nature is to copy Them'. Exception is however made for those of great genius who 'rise to Faults true Criticks dare not mend; . . . And snatch a Grace beyond the Reach of Art'.

The aphoristic quality of some lines in the poem seems to bear out Pope's ideas on true wit: 'To Err is Human; to Forgive, Divine'; 'For Fools rush in where Angels fear to tread'. However the best poetry in the Essay is as idiosyncratic and figuratively adventurous as anything in the 'metaphysical' poets of the previous century, as for example the description of the blockheads, too dull to perceive that they are being satirized: 'Still humming on, their drowzy Course they keep,/And lash'd so long, like Tops, are lash'd asleep' (600-1), or the deliberately bad lines, imitating various vices of versification: 'And ten low Words oft creep in one dull Line' (347). Despite its parade of sober respectability Pope's Essay is best seen as the protective camouflage of a brilliant poet adapting to the prosaic temper of the times, rather than a seriously pondered theoretical system. It is however important as a summary of neo-classical and 'Augustan' maxims.

Essay on Man (1733-4)

After the scurrilities of > The Dunciad (1728) > Alexander Pope turned to the philosophical poem which he hoped would crown his poetic career. The Essay was published anonymously so as to wrong-foot his enemies, who were not sure whether to damn it as Pope's, or to praise it as superior to anything Pope could have achieved. In four heroic-couplet epistles, addressed to the Tory politician > Lord Bolingbroke, the poet attempts with cheerful optimism to 'vindicate the ways of God to Man', arguing that 'Whatever is, is right'. Pope expounds the medieval and > Renaissance concept of a 'chain of being', with its primitive blend of theology and natural philosophy, and reconciles it uneasily with the modern empirical science of > Sir Isaac Newton. The work became a kind of handbook of popular > Enlightenment notions throughout Europe and was extensively translated.

It expresses the ▷ Deist view that God can be apprehended through nature, and not only through 'revealed' scriptures. 'Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutor'd mind/Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind'. The 'natural religion' of the poem, influenced by Bolingbroke, and by the Whig philosopher, the third ▷ Earl of Shaftesbury, incurred a magisterial rebuke from the Swiss professor of divinity Jean Paul de Crousaz, and Pope, a > Catholic, was embarrassed to discover that his work was potentially heretical. Today Pope's facile blend of science and religion appears spiritually trivial in comparison with both the consistent 'atheist' Deism of ➤ Rochester, and the sense of original sin of an orthodox Christian such as ➤ Jonathan Swift. The poem does however give brilliant poetic expression to a mood of enlightened confidence and élan which characterizes the period, even when what is being said is quite unremarkable: 'Know then thyself, presume not God to scan;/ The proper study of Mankind is Man.' And it contains some fine passages and isolated ➤ couplets: 'The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine!/ Feels at each thread, and lives along the line.' ➤ Enlightenment.

Essay, The

Essay' derives from the French essai meaning 'experiment', 'attempt'. As a literary term it is used to cover an enormous range of composition, from schoolboy exercises to thorough scientific and philosophical works, the only quality in common being the implied desire of the writer to reserve to himself some freedom of treatment. But the essay is also a recognized literary form in a more defined sense: it is understood to be a fairly short prose composition, in style often familiarly conversational and in subject either self-revelatory or illustrative (more or less humorously) of social manners and types. The originator of the form was the great French writer > Montaigne.

Montaigne's essays were published in completed form in 1595, and translated by > John Florio into English (1603). His startingpoint is 'Que sais-je?' ('What do I know?') and it leads him into a serious inquiry into his own nature as he feels it, and into investigations of facts, ideas, and experiences as he responds to them. In 1597 the first great English essayist, > Francis Bacon, published his first collection of essays, of a very different kind: they are impersonal and aphoristic, weightily sententious. The character writers, ➤ Sir Thomas Overbury and John Earle (?1601-65) use the classical model of the Greek writer > Theophrastus. reminding one that with so indefinite a form it is impossible to be too precise about the dating of starting-points. ➤ Abraham Cowley published the first essays in English closely corresponding to what is now understood by the form, and perhaps shows the first sign of its degeneracy: easiness of tone, which in Montaigne is a graciousness of manner introducing a serious and interesting personality, but which in less interesting writers may be an agreeable cover for saying nothing in particular.

In the early years of the 18th century ➤ Addison and ➤ Steele firmly established what is now known as the 'periodical essay' - a kind of higher journalism, intended often to please rather than instruct, but in their case to instruct through pleasure. In creations such as ➤ Sir Roger de Coverley, they developed the Theophrastian character into a personal, idiosyncratic portrait anticipating the characterization of the novelists a little later in the century. Their graciousness and lightness of tone take points and interest from their serious and conscious social purpose. > Dr Johnson in The Rambler and in his essays as > 'The Idler' used the weighty, impressive style soon to be regarded as unsuitable for the medium. > Oliver Goldsmith in The Citizen of the World (1762) perfected the graceful, witty manner which came to be considered ideal for it.

If the 18th century was what may be called the golden age of the English essay, the early 19th, in the work of ➤ Charles Lamb, ➤ William Hazlitt, ➤ Leigh Hunt and ➤ De Quincey, was perhaps its silver age. In these writers, social comment combines with a confessional, autobiographical element which had never been so prominent in the English essay before. This was true to the autobiographical spirit of so much 19th-century literature. These essayists were links between the early Romantic poets especially ➤ Wordsworth - and the mid-Victorian novelists; they shared the close interest in material surroundings characteristic of these poets, and their essays often contained character delineations related to such environmental settings. The earliest work of > Charles Dickens, \triangleright Sketches by Boz, is in the essavists' tradition.

After 1830, the periodical essay in the tradition of Addison, Goldsmith, Hazlitt and Lamb dissolved into the morass of constantly increasing journalism; though they had emulators in the 20th century, the form was increasingly despised by serious writers, and the famous essayists of the later 10th century were the more specialized sort, such as ➤ Matthew Arnold and ➤ John Stuart Mill. Yet is is not true to say that the informal essay of serious literary interest has disappeared. In the later 19th and 20th century, essays of natural description of remarkable intensity were produced by ➤ Richard Jefferies and ➤ Edward Thomas. More important still is the use of the essay for unspecialized but serious social and cultural comment by - to take leading examples - D. H. Lawrence, > George Orwell, and > Aldous Huxley. With the growth in popularity ➤ Aldous Huxley. With the growth in popularity of serious ➤ magazines and the extended articles in the Sunday newspapers, the essay is today having a considerable revival. These informal arguments and 'personality pieces', such as those by Bernard Levin in The Times, are very far, however, from the formal essay genre.

> Characters, Theophrastian.

Essay to Revive the Ancient Education of Gentlewomen, An (1673) A prospectus for a school at Tottenham, just north of London, by > Bathsua Pell Makin. This prospectus is also an argument for women's education, and is an early part of the debate about the education of women in literacy, numeracy and languages (see also > Catharine Macaulay, ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft, ➤ Sarah Fielding). The tract confines itself to the education of gentlewomen, never suggesting that education should spread throughout society, but it does make a significant argument for broadening the accepted curriculum for girls to place more emphasis on languages and literacy. Makin also situates her argument historically (note the word 'revive' in the title) and this serves to remind readers of a tradition of women's education before the English Civil War.

➤ Women, Education of..

Essays, Bacon's

➤ Bacon, Francis.

Essays in Criticism (1865, 1888) The two volumes (First Series 1865; Second Series 1888) that contain much of the most important of ➤ Matthew Arnold's literary critical work. The first volume opens with 'The Function of Criticism at the Present Time', a discussion of the relevance of criticism both to creative literature and to society and civilization; it is an example of what the poet T. Eliot (1888-1965) was later to call Arnold's 'propaganda for criticism', and it has been influential among 20th-century critics. The second essay, 'The Literary Influence of Academies', makes a case for authoritative standards in culture, and constitutes an implicit criticism of the habits of English culture, again in a way that is still relevant. The remainder of the first volume comprises essays on foreign writers and literature. The Second Series opens with a striking essay on 'The Study of Poetry', in which Arnold puts his view that poetry will supply to the modern world the kind of inspiration that was afforded by great religions in the past - a view which has also been put forward in the 20th century, notably by I.A. Richards in The Principles of Literary Criticism (1924), though he expresses the view in other terms. The remainder of the Second Series consists principally of studies of English poets of the 18th and 19th centuries. On the whole, Arnold's fame rests more on the broad themes of the relationships of literature and society than on his particular studies, though some of these, eg on the German poet Heinrich Heine in the First Series, are of great interest.

Essays of Elia (1823; 1833)
A series of essays by ➤ Charles Lamb, published in ➤ The London Magazine and then in a collected edition. They emulate the essays of Joseph Addison (1672–1719) and Sir Richard Steele (1672–1729) in the Spectator and Tatler of a century before, but depend less on their content than on Lamb's attempt to win the affection and interest of the reader for himself as a person. The style is whimsical and self-conscious, owing something to the musical and humorously eccentric appeal of Robert Burton's (1577–1640) Anatomy of Melancholy which to some extent it emulates. However, there are passages of witty observation and acute character sketches.

► Essay.

Essentialism

Philosophically, the notion of 'essence' refers to the proposition that the physical world embodies in it a range of fixed and timeless essences which precede existence. In Christianity this is exemplified in the division between the soul and the body, where the latter is relegated to the realm of temporal existence. In > materialist accounts essentialism has come to be associated with attempts to deny the primacy of history as a formative influence on human affairs and human personality. It also challenges the emphasis upon the autonomy of the individual as a theoretically 'free' agent who is the centre of meaning. Any questioning of the notion that essence precedes existence deeply affects the issue of what is assumed to be the coherent nature of human identity. It also resists the attempt to reduce material reality to a set of mental images. To remove the human subject from the centre and to reinscribe him or her in a series of complex historical relations is to challenge, at a theoretical level, human autonomy. It also suggests that those philosophical arguments which place the individual at the centre of meaning and authority are restrictive in that they propose a view of the world which masks the connection between knowledge and particular human interests.

Essex, Robert Devereux, Earl of (1566–1601)

Patron, poet and favourite of ➤ Queen Elizabeth I. Robert Devereux, second Earl of Essex was the stepson of the > Earl of Leicester and followed him into the intimate circle of the queen's favourites. He pursued a political and martial career which won him glory throughout the 1590s; however in 1599 he was sent to Ireland to suppress Tyrone's rebellion and returned unexpectedly without Elizabeth's permission having failed in his mission. He remained under house arrest until in 1601 he attempted to seize power from the queen in an ill-fated rebellion. He was executed on 25 February of the same year. Although Elizabeth had ordered his death, even in the face of final pleas for mercy, she never recovered her old vigour and the last 18 months of her reign seem to have been shrouded in a recognition of her own mortality. Some of Essex's fellow conspirators arranged for a special performance of what we believe to be ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Richard II around the city of London on the day before the revolt. The play shows the abdication of an unpopular monarch and its enactment was supposedly to rouse the crowds into calling for a similar relinquishing of power on the part of Elizabeth. Shakespeare also refers to Essex in ▷ Henry V, where a successful return from the Irish campaign is hoped for.

Bib: Lacey, R., An Elizabethan Icarus.

Esther Waters (1894)

A novel by George Moore, this sympathetic treatment of a servant girl seduced brought him instant success. Esther is a member of the Plymouth Brethren who goes into service at Woodview for the Barfield family to escape her drunken father. Aged only seventeen, she is seduced and deserted by the footman William Latch. Dismissed from her position, Esther endures a bitter and humiliating struggle to rear her son. She rejects an offer of marriage from a respectable Salvationist and marries William Latch for the sake of their son. In addition to being a good husband and father Latch is also a publican and bookmaker and is ruined both physically and financially by his involvement in horse racing. He dies leaving the family destitute, but Esther's son soon becomes independent. Esther returns to Woodview at the close of the novel and to the widowed and impoverished Mrs Barfield who was previously kind to her. Here she finds peace and fulfilment. Esther Waters shares many similarities with ▷ Hardy's ▷ Tess of the d'Urbervilles (1801) but the former is less naturalistic and its heroine is resourceful and enduring rather than tragic.

> 'Fallen Woman, The'.

Etherege, Sir George (?1634-92)

Dramatist, one of those who set the style of Restoration comedy after the return to the throne of ➤ Charles II. Etherege may have studied at Cambridge University, and is believed to have spent some of his early adulthood in France. He read law at the Inns of Court. His first play, Love in a Tub; Or, > The Comical Revenge (1664), composed partly in rhymed > couplets, established him in court circles, but his next play, > She Wou'd if She Cou'd (1668) was a relative failure. Both these plays show the influence of ➤ Molière. In 1668 Etherege was appointed secretary to the English ambassador to Constantinople. Returning to England in 1671, Etherege continued to write and his last, most famous play, ▷ The Man of Mode came in 1676. Some time after 1677 Etherege married a widow, Mary Arnold, it is said for her fortune. In 1685 he was appointed Ambassador at Ratisbon (Regensburg), and abandoned his wife. He had an affair with the actress ➤ Elizabeth Barry, among his many intrigues with women; Barry bore him a daughter. In 1680 he joined the deposed King > James II in Paris, where he died. Known as 'Gentleman George', Etherege epitomized to many of his contemporaries the sort of hellraising rake depicted in his plays. The part of Bellair in The Man of Mode is thought to be a selfportrait, while the flamboyant Dorimant is said to have been modelled on his friend, the > Earl of Rochester. His comedy depends primarily on his witty and often cynical dialogue among characters in fashionable society. Several of his comic types were used by later dramatists, such as ▷ Wycherley, ▷ Behn, and ▷ Congreye, and his fluent, easy style set a precedent for many of their plays.

Bib: Rosenfeld, S., The Letterbook of Sir George Etherege; Underwood, D., Etherege and the Seventeenth Century Comedy of Manners.

Ettrick Shepherd, The → Hogg, James.

Eugenia

Name used by a writer who attacked John Sprints The Bride-Woman's Counsellor (1699) in The Female Advocate (1700), arguing that, although the woman is bound to passive obedience, yet 'I defy the meekest woman in the world, if she meets with an unreasonable, domineering, insolent creature... to forbear wishing it otherwise.'

➤ Chudleigh, Lady Mary Bid: Browne, A. The Eighteenth Century Feminist Mind.

Euphemism

> Figures of speech.

Euphues (1578-80)

A prose romance by > John Lyly, in two parts; the first, Euphues, or the Anatomy of Wit was published in 1578; the second, Euphues and his England, in 1580. The tales have very little story; they have been described as 'pattern books' for courtly behaviour, especially in love. Their most striking quality is their elaborate style: long sentences balance clause against clause and image against image, so as to produce an effect of ornament taking priority a long way over sense. > Falstaff in > Henry IV Part I (II.iv) parodies Euphues when he is burlesquing the king, eg 'for though the camomile, the more it is trodden on, the faster it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears'. Though often parodied as the language of fops, the style was much imitated, especially by Elizabethan romance writers such as ➤ Robert Greene in Menaphon (1589) and ➤ Thomas Lodge in Rosalynde (1500). Even > Beatrice and Benedick in ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Much Ado

About Nothing indulge in the courtly verbal play characterized by Lyly. The name 'Euphues' is from Greek, and means generally, 'well endowed by nature'. ▶ Roger Ascham in The Schoolmaster had already used it to designate a man well endowed for learning and able to put it to good use. Ascham was an admirer of ▶ Castiglione's The Courtier, and Lyly's cult of the courtly virtues is in the same tradition. Basic to it is the conception that nature is not to be imitated but to be improved upon.

Euphuism

> Figures of Speech.

Euripedes (480-406 BC)

The last of the three great Athenian writers of tragedy, the other two being ▷ Aeschylus and ▷ Sophocles. Like them, he had no direct influence upon the Elizabethan period of English drama, though ▷ Gascoigne's Jocasta (1575) is a translation of an Italian adaptation of Euripedes' Phoenissae. Like Aeschylus and Sophocles, however, Euripedes was admired by ▷ Milton, who emulated the Greeks in ▷ Samson Agonistes. Among Euripedes' surviving plays are Alcestis, Medea, Hippolytus, Andromache, Hecuba, Bacchae, Electra, The Trojan Women, Orestes, Heracles, Iphigenia at Aulis, Iphigenia among the Tauri, Ion.

Europeans, The (1878)

A novel by ▷ Henry James, first published serially in The Atlantic Monthly from July to October 1878. Alongside ▷ Daisy Miller, which appeared in same year, it opened up the international theme in James' writing, using the ▷ 'novel of manners' style to contrast two cultures − Europe and the USA.

Eustace Diamonds, The (1873)

A novel by ▷ Anthony Trollope initially serialized in ▷ The Fortnightly Review from 1871–73, and forming the third in the ▷ Palliser sequence. The novel shares many of the concerns of ▷ Wilkie Collins' The Moonstone (1868).

Evangelical Movement

A movement for Protestant revival in the Church of England in the late 18th and early 19th century. It is stimulated partly by ▷ John Wesley's Methodist revival and the activities of other sects (especially among the lower classes) outside the Church of England; it was also a reaction against the ▷ rationalism and scepticism of the 18th-century aristocracy, and against the ▷ atheism of the ▷ French Revolution. Politically, the movement tended to be conservative and was therefore strong among the Tories, whereas the Whigs (especially their aristocratic leaders such as ▷ Charles James Fox) retained more of the 18th-century worldliness and scepticism. In doctrine the Evangelicals were inclined to be austere, to attach importance to strength of faith and biblical guidance, and to oppose ceremony and ritual. Socially they developed a strong sense of responsibility to their fellow human beings, so that one of their leaders, ➤ William Wilberforce, devoted his life to the cause of abolishing slavery and the slave trade in British dominions, and later Lord Shaftesbury (1801-85) made it his life-work to alleviate the social and working conditions of the working classes. The leaders of the movement were laymen rather than clergy, and upper class rather than lower class, amongst whom the > Nonconformist sects were more actively influential. As the Nonconformists were to contribute to English socialism later in the century a religious rather than a Marxist inspiration, so the Evangelicals later led to generations of highly responsible, independent-minded intellectuals such as the historians Thomas Babington Macaulay and Trevelvan, and the novelist ➤ Virginia Woolf.

Evans, Caradoc (1878-1945)

Short story writer, novelist and playwright. Born in Carmarthenshire, moving to Cardiganshire in early childhood, Caradoc Evans worked as a draper and shop assistant in Carmarthen, Barry, Cardiff and London where, after attending evening classes in English composition, he found employment as a journalist in 1906, later editing various magazines between 1915 and 1929. According to Professor Gywn Jones, the 'first distinctive ancestral voice' of Anglo-Welsh writing, Caradoc Evans gave lasting offence to the Welsh-speaking literary establishment through his presentation of Cardi peasantry with grotesqueries of character and speech, and lust, greed and hypocrisy that established a false Welsh stereotype in his short stories that amused Londoners and created both his literary reputation and his unpopularity in his native land. His short story collections were: My People (1915); Capel Sion (1916); My Neighbours (1919); Pilgrims in a Foreign Land (1942); and the posthumously published The Earth Gives All and Takes All (1946). His novels were: Nothing to Pay (1930); Wasps (1933); This Way to Heaven (1934); Morgan Bible (1943); and Mother's Marvel (posthumously, in 1949). His one play, Taffy (1923) attacked Welsh village life. A recently published miscellany of his writings entitled Fury Never Leaves Us, ed. John Harris, appeared in 1985. ·Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales); Jones, G., The Dragon Has Two Tongues; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Eve of St Agnes (1820)

The 18th-century fashion for pseudo-medieval poetry in ➤ Spenserian stanzas culminated in > John Keats' masterpiece of sensuous aestheticism. Madeline retires to bed on St Agnes' Eve hoping to be granted a vision of her lover by the saint. Meanwhile her lover Porphyro, an enemy to her family, steals into her chamber, aided by an aged servant woman, and watches his beloved undress from a closet. When the girl wakes she finds that Porphyro has prepared a sumptuous banquet of 'cakes and dainties'. They make love before fleeing into the storm. The poet employs every extreme of verbal artifice to transform this flimsy escapist fantasy into a pattern of archetypal contrasts: youth and age, fire and ice, security and danger. The interwoven rhyme scheme and the final > alexandrine of each stanza are each made to vield the maximum ornamental and musical effect. Dense, tactile imagery abounds ('the tiger-moth's deep-damask'd wings'). There are crowded alliterations ('the silver, snarling trumpets 'gan to chide'); inventive archaisms ('carven imag'ries', 'blue affraved eves'); neologisms ('jellies soother than the creamy curd'); transferred epithets ('azure-lidded sleep', 'silken Samarkand'); exotic compounds ('flawblown sleet', 'palsy-twitch'd'); and synaesthetic constructions ('warm gules', 'perfume light'), all designed to overwhelm and delight the reader's senses.

Ėvelina (1778)

A novel in letters by > Fanny Burney. Evelina has been abandoned by her aristocratic father, and her socially much humbler mother is dead. She has been brought up by her guardian, a solitary clergyman. As a beautiful, well-bred, and intelligent young girl, she pays a visit to a friend in London, where she falls in love with a handsome aristocrat, Lord Orville, is pursued by an unscrupulous rake, Sir Clement Willoughby, and is much embarrassed by vulgar relatives, especially her grandmother, Madame Duval. The convincing and delightful part of the novel consists in its acute and lively social observation, in many ways superior to anything of the sort yet accomplished in the 18thcentury novel, and anticipating the maturer art of > Jane Austen in the early 19th century.

> Epistolary novel.

Evelyn, John (1620–1706)
Chiefly remembered as a diarist. His diary, published in 1818, covers the years 1641–97, and includes impressions of distinguished contemporaries, customs and manners, and accounts of his travels. He published ➤ translations from Greek, Latin and French, as well as essays on the practical arts (gardening, the cultivation of trees, engraving, architecture). He also wrote an interesting ➤ biography of a court lady (The Life of Mrs Godolphin, unpublished until 1847).

▶ Diaries.

Bib: Diary, ed. E. S. de Beer; Ponsonby, A., Life; Hiscock, W. G., John Evelyn and his Family Circle; Marburg, C., Mr Pepys and Mr Evelyn.

Every Man in his Humour (1598) The first important play by ➤ Ben Jonson. By > 'humour' is to be understood as a passion generated by irrational egotism and amounting sometimes to a mania. The play - which is better known in its revised form with English characters than in the first version of 1508 with Italian characters - is a comedy of misunderstandings bred largely through the deceitfulness of Brainworm, a mischievous servant, acting on the absurd humours of the other characters: the jealousy of the merchant Kitely, the credulity of his young wife, the susceptibility of her sister, the bullying boastfulness of the cowardly soldier Bobadill, etc.

> Humours, Comedy of.

Every Man out of his Humour (1599) The second of ▶ Ben Jonson's comedies of > humours, with a range of satirical portraits: Fastidious Brisk, the foppish courtier with the sharp tongue; Sordido, the landowner who delights in shortages because they increase the price of his grain; Deliro, the infatuated husband; Puntarvolo, the knight who takes out an insurance on his pets; Fungoso, the would-be courtier who is always behind the fashion, etc. The method of satire is partly through character sketches in the tradition of Theophrastus and partly through the method that Jonson developed from > Marlowe (in > The Jew of Malta) of making a character carry his extravagance to the point of selfcaricature. This play is, however, too narrow in the range and depth of its satire to rank among Jonson's great ones. The opening scene includes a speech (by Asper, lines 93-120) which contains an explicit account of what Jonson meant by a > 'Humour'.

> Characters, Theophrastian.

Everyman

A > morality play dating from the end of the 15th century, which in its extant form is based on a Dutch play Elekerlije. It dramatizes the final acts of Everyman's life, when he is unexpectedly summoned by Death for a journey beyond this world. Everyman looks for companions for his journey, but as Goods, Kindred et al. vanish away, he discovers that Good Deeds alone will support him. The play rehearses Church teaching on the doctine of penance and provides a vehicle for a reaffirmation of the importance of the clergy as mediators between God and the laity.

Bib: Cawley, A. C. (ed.), Everyman.

Ewing, Juliana Horatia (1841-85) Writer of ⊳ children's literature. Born in Ecclesfield, Yorkshire, the daughter of ➤ Margaret Gatty. Her first published story was in ➤ Charlotte Yonge's Monthly Packet in 1861. She also contributed to her mother's periodical for children, Aunt Judy's Magazine, taking over its editorship in 1873. She was an extremely prolific writer and very popular in her time, though her sentimental and moralizing tone makes her less liked by children today. Her stories include: Mrs Overthemay's Remembrances (1866–8); The Brownies (1865); Jan of the Windmill (1872) and Jackanapes (1879). Bib: Eden, Mrs H.F.K., Juliana Horatia Ewing and her Books.

Examiner, The

- I A right-wing (Tory) journal, started by Lord Bolingbroke and continued by ▷ Jonathan Swift. Engaged in controversy with the left-wing writers, Joseph Addison and ▷ Sir Richard Steele.
- 2 A weekly periodical founded by John and Leigh Hunt in 1808, famous for its radical politics. It had no political allegiance, but criticized public affairs, in the words of Leigh Hunt's friend John Keats, 'from a principle of taste'. In 1813 the Hunts were sent to prison for two years for exposing the gross flattery of the Prince Regent (later George IV) in another paper.

Excalibur

A modification of 'Caliburnus', the name of ➤ King Arthur's sword, forged in ➤ Avalon, in > Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae. In later versions of Arthurian narrative, the name Excalibur is applied to the sword which Arthur receives, mysteriously, from the hand of the > Lady of the Lake (as a replacement for his first sword, drawn from the stone). When Arthur is mortally wounded, he arranges for Excalibur to be returned to the lake. One of his knights (most commonly Bedevere but sometimes Girflet) is finally persuaded to throw the sword into the lake, where it is caught and brandished by a hand, before disappearing below. Both ▷ Malory and > Tennyson relate this episode in their respective Arthurian narratives.

Exclusion Bills

Statutory attempts by ➤ Lord Shaftesbury and his followers to exclude the Duke of York, ➤ Charles II's brother, from succession to the throne, on grounds of his ➤ Catholic faith. Exclusion Bills were brought in each of the years 1679–81. All were unsuccessful, and the Duke duly acceded to become ➤ James II in 1685. The underlying religious and political tensions continued to simmer, however, eventually boiling up into a head-on clash, resolved with the so-called ➤ Glorious Revolution of 1688 which overthrew James. The period of strain and uncertainty surrounding the introduction of the Bills is also known as the Exclusion Crisis.

Excursion, The (1814)

A long > didactic poem in > blank verse by ➤ William Wordsworth. It was intended to be the middle part of a three-part philosophical poem, to be called The Recluse, but the other two parts were never written. > The Prelude, intended as an introduction to The Recluse, was completed in 1805, but was not published until after Wordsworth's death in 1850. Book I of The Excursion, which contains the most enduring poetry in the work, comprises a piece written some years before: Margaret or the ▶ Ruined Cottage. Books II-IV contain discussion between the poem's protagonist, the Wanderer, and his friend, the Solitary, who lacks faith in man and God. In Books V-VII a new character, the Pastor, relates the histories of some of his former parishioners buried in the churchyard. The last two books are concerned with the degradation of the poor by industrial expansion, and proposes educational reforms.

> Education.

Exhibition, The Great

Held in 1851, in Hyde Park in London, it was the first international exhibition of the products of industry and celebrated the peak of the British ▷ industrial revolution. It was regarded as a triumph for British prosperity and enlightenment, though by some critics, eg the philanthropist ▷ Lord Shaftesbury, as concealing the scandal of immense urban slums. Its principal building, the Crystal Palace, was a pioneer construction in the materials of glass and cast-iron. The architect was Joseph Paxton.

Existentialism

A modern school of philosophy which has had great influence on European literature since World War II. The doctrines to which the term has been applied are in fact very various, but a number of common themes may be identified. The first is the primacy of the individual, and of individual choice, over systems and concepts which attempt to explain him or her. For instance, the > essentialist notion that the human self is built on a pre-social 'essence' or core of selfhood. Existentialism argues, in > Jean-Paul Sartre's words, that 'existence precedes essence': that is, that one's freely chosen individual path constitutes one's existential reality and self - the self, for the existentialist, is not essentially pre-ordained or God-given, but comes into being in the material world through social interactions. Sartre explores this in Being and Nothingness. The second is the absurdity of the universe; reality, it is claimed, always evades adequate explanation, and remains radically contingent and disordered. This absurdity causes anxiety, but also makes freedom possible, since our actions also cannot be causally explained or predicted. Neither the behaviour nor the nature of others can be understood by observation. Existentialism sees freedom of choice as the most important fact of human existence. According to Sartre, consciousness of our own freedom is the sign of 'authentic experience', as opposed to the 'bad faith' of believing oneself bound. Investigation of this freedom involves investigation of the nature of being, and this has caused existentialism to form two main streams, the first atheistic, which interprets individual existence as dependent on transcendent Being. The best-known leaders of existentialism have been the philosophers Martin Heidegger (1889-1976) and Karl Jaspers (1883-1969) in Germany, and Sartre (1905-80) and the philosopher and dramatist Gabriel Marcel (1889-1973) in France. Marcel represents the religious stream whose progenitor was the 19th-century Danish thinker Sören Kierkegaard (1813-55).

Existentialism has had relatively little influence on British philosophy, because of the strong empirical tradition in Britain, although the novelist and philosopher > Iris Murdoch has termed modern British empiricists existentialist in her essay The Sovereignty of Good. Correspondingly, existentialism has had a less powerful influence on literature than in France, where authors like Sartre, > Simone de Beauvoir, and Albert Camus have expounded its doctrines in, for example, such works as Sartre's trilogy of novels, Roads to Freedom (1947-9) and his play No Exit (1944), or Camus' novel The Outsider (1942), or in de Beauvoir's series of autobiographies. Nevertheless, these doctrines have been important in two ways. First, they have directly influenced a number of experimental novelists with continental affinities, such as ➤ David Caute, ▷ Nigel Dennis, ▷ Andrew Sinclair, ➤ Colin Wilson and ➤ Christine Brooke-Rose. The most important writer in this category is > Samuel Beckett in whose plays and novels the isolation and anxiety of the characters combine with an awareness of the issues of manipulation and choice implicit in the narrative and dramatic modes, to present existential dilemmas with unrivalled power. Second, existentialist doctrines have contributed much to the general ethos of > postmodernism, and affected a number of major writers, prompting either admiration or resistance. Thus the postmodern concern with the nature of fictionality arises in part from the sense that neither individuals nor reality as a whole can be adequately conceptualized. The author's manipulation of his or her characters has provided a fruitful metaphor for the exploration of issues of freedom, as for example in the work of > John Fowles, Iris Murdoch and > Muriel Spark. Existentialism speaks powerfully to the sense of the 20th century as a chaotic and even catastrophic era, in which certainties have been lost and man is faced with the abyss of nothingness, or of his own capability for evil. It lays stress on extreme situations, which produce dread, arising from awareness of freedom of choice (according to Sartre) or awareness of original sin (according to Kierkegaard). Extremity and existential dread are important in the work of > William Golding and > Patrick White, and, earlier in the century, > Joseph Conrad, who in this respect as in others anticipates the 20th-century Zeitgeist.

Expedition of Humphry Clinker, The (1771)

> Humphry Clinker, The Expedition of.

Experience, Songs of ➤ Songs of Innocence and of Experience.

Expressionism

Expressionism was originally intended to define an artistic movement which flourished at the beginning of the 20th century in Europe, especially in Germany. The expressionist painters, such as Edvard Munch and Vasili Kandinsky, built upon the departure from realism of Vincent van Gogh and Henri Matisse, and developed towards the expression of feeling through colour and form. This often led to exaggeration and distortion, which induced unease in the viewing public. Similar haunting and irrational imagery were used in German expressionist cinema, such as Robert Wiene's The Cabinet of Dr Caligari (1919) and F. W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922).

The origins of expressionism as a theatrical movement are to be found in the work of a number of German dramatists who wrote between 1907 and the early 1920s. These include Ernst Barlach, Reinhard Goering, Walter Hasenclever, Carl Hauptmann, Franz Kafka, Georg Kaiser, Oscar Kokoschka, Carl Sternheim and Ernst Toller. Even > Brecht was influenced by the movement in his early days. Although their individual styles differ greatly the expressionist playwrights rejected the 'objective' approach of naturalism and developed a highly emotional and subjective form of dramatic expression which aimed to explore the 'essence' of human experience. In their view this could be revealed only by getting beyond the surface appearances of ordinary life and exploring man's subconscious desires and visions. The impulse for this was revolutionary, if politically unclear. > Strindberg, Wedekind, > Freud and > Nietzsche were the idols of the movement. Bourgeois ideology was the enemy and the uniting vision ubiquitously advocated was the rebirth of man (with the emphasis very much on the male) in touch with his spirit and free from petty social restraints. The use of exaggerated gesture, disturbing sound, colour and movement was a vital part of the dramatists' technique of shocking the audience and conveying ecstatic or Angst-ridden states of being. Short disconnected scenes replaced carefully constructed plots and scenery was distorted and hallucinatory rather than realistic. Later dramatists, such as Eugene O'Neill, Elmer Rice and ➤ Sean O'Casey, have tended to borrow from the dramatic language of expressionism without necessarily sharing the fervour of their German predecessors.

Extravaganza

Any composition which relies on its fantastic content for its effect. It is usually comic and irregular in its construction although commonly used today to describe any lavish show. Unlike ➤ farce, however, it is not a defined literary mode; consequently it more often describes a critical reaction to a work than the author's intention in the work.

F

Fabian Society

A large society of socialistic intellectuals, closely bound up with the British Labour Party. It was founded in 1884 and named after the Roman general Fabius Cunctator 'Fabius the Delayer' - who in the 3rd century BC saved Rome from the Carthaginian army under Hannibal, by using a policy of attrition instead of open battle, ie he destroyed the army by small attacks on isolated sections of it. instead of risking total defeat by confronting Hannibal with the entire Roman army. The Fabian Society similarly advocated socialism by piecemeal action through parliamentary reform instead of risking disaster by total revolution; this policy has been summarized in the phrase 'the inevitability of gradualness'. The Fabians were among the principal influences leading to the foundation of the Labour Party in 1900. The years between 1884 and 1900 were those of its greatest distinction; they were led by ➤ George Bernard Shaw and Sidney and ▶ Beatrice Webb, and made their impact through the Fabian Essays on social and economic problems. They always advocated substantial thinking on solid evidence, in contrast to the more idealistic and 'utopian' socialism of such Victorian writers as William Morris. The diversification of socialist thought under the combined impact of theory emanating from France and political upheavals in Eastern Europe has perhaps made the Fabian framework anachronistic.

Fabliau

Derived from 'fable', the term is applied to a medieval genre of short, humorous narratives, particularly popular in Old French poetry of the 13th century, which are usually structured around a battle of wits of some kind. Wit and ingenuity are celebrated in these stories; their outcomes may not conform to the dictates of a Christian morality. Characteristically, fabliaux are located in contemporary settings and many, though not all, have plots centred an adulterous situations. Explicitly sexual, scatological and bawdy terms are frequently employed in these narratives, as befits the kind of action they depict. ➤ Chaucer is one of the first English writers to work in this genre (in the > Miller's Tale, the > Reeve's Tale, the > Shipman's Tale, for example), but from the evidence of the Anglo-Norman fabliaux in ➤ Harley 2253, it is clear that fabliaux were circulating in England before the composition of the > Canterbury Tales. Many of the narratives in ➤ Boccaccio's Decameron are reworkings of fabliaux plots.

Fabula, Sjuzet/Syuzhet

The Russian Formalist critics made a distinction between the fābula (the chronological series of events that are represented or implied in a fiction) and the sjuzet or syuzhet (the order, manner and techniques of their presentation in the narrative). The distinction closely resembles that made in more recent ⊳ narratology between ⊳ story and ⊳ narrative or text; but a third category, that of the act of ⊳ narrating has now been added.

Fabulation

A form of writing which playfully flaunts its' own fictionality and narrative artifice. The term has been applied in particular to American novelists such as John Barth and South American writers such as > Jorge Luis Borges.

Faction

A form of writing in which real persons and events are portrayed, but the detail and presentation are fictional. The form has similarities to the dramatized television documentary. The term was coined by the American novelist Truman Capote, for his book In Cold Blood. An example is Coming through Slaughter by Michael Ondaatje, which is about the life of the jazz cornet player Buddy Bolden.

Faerie Queene, The (1590-6)

Description Edmund Spenser's unfinished Descriptional romance. The Faerie Queene was first mentioned in correspondence by Spenser in 1580, and was probably circulating in manuscript form by 1588. Books I–III were published in 1590, and a second edition which contained Books IV–VI appeared in 1596. In 1609 a folio edition of the poem appeared, which contained the first six books of the poem, together with the 'Mutabilitie Cantos'. This is all of the work which has survived, though whether any more was written is doubtful.

The design of the poem, and Spenser's general conception of what the poem should set out to achieve, is recorded in a letter from Spenser to > Sir Walter Ralegh that was published in the first edition of 1590. Here Spenser explains that his intention was to 'fashion a gentleman or noble person', and we can thus understand the poem as forming part of that ➤ Renaissance desire to create and sustain a personal identity. But the work is also a legendary history and celebration of the emergent British state and its monarch, > Elizabeth I. The urgency of this project is understandable given Spenser's own residence in the unstable environment of Ireland for much of the period of the poem's composition.

In structure the poem follows the adventures of six knights, representing (Spenser claimed in his letter to Ralegh) the ▷ Aristotelian virtues. But the poem is episodic rather than possessed of a cumulative narrative structure. At the same time, to mention Aristotle is to mention only one of the poem's many progenitors, which include Plato, ▷ Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, ▷ Torquato Tasso, ▷ Virgil and Arthurian romance.

The Faerie Queene is perhaps best thought of as a rich synthesis of Protestant and humanist ideals, and, at the same time, an anxious declaration of faith in the vision of national identity which it is the poem's task to display. Its influence on later writers, especially ▶ John Milton, was enormous.

➤ Arthur, King; Belphoebe; Duessa; Fidessa; Florimell; Gloriana; Orgoglio; Red Cross Knight. Bib: Hamilton, A. C. (ed.), The Faerie Queene; Heale, E., The Faerie Queene: A Reader's Guide; Miller, D. L., The Poem's Two Bodies.

Fainlight, Ruth (b 1931)

Poet and translator. Born in New York, Fainlight lives in Britain, although she is an American citizen. Her work is marked for its exploration of different poetic identities, and different possibilities for selfhood as a woman poet. Her volumes of poetry include: Cages (1966); The Region's Violence (1973); Twenty One Poems (1975); Another Full Moon (1976); Sibyls and Others (1980); Climates (1983); and This Time of Year (1993). She has also translated the Portuguese poet Sophia de Mello Brevner.

Fair Maid of the West, The (1600/1630)
A romantic and ▷ picaresque comedy in two parts (1600 and 1630) by ▷ Thomas Heywood. It is set during ▷ Essex's expedition to the Azores in 1597 and dramatizes the adventures of the chivalrous Master Spencer and the beautiful Bess Bridges, whom he champions and who rescues him in turn after his capture by the Spaniards.

Fairbairns, Zoe (b 1948)

Novelist. Her novels are: Live as Family (1968); Down: An Exploration (1969); Benefits (1982); Stand We At Last (1983); Here Today (1984); Closing (1987). She uses a range of genres, such as ▷ science fiction (Benefits) or the crime thriller (Here Today; ▷ detective fiction) to explore the development of ▷ feminist consciousness. Stand We At Last recounts the lives of a succession of women from the middle of the 19th century up to the 1970s, and may be compared with The Seven Ages by ▷ Eva Figes in its project of rediscovering the unwritten history of women's experience.

Fairy-Tales

Fairy-tales have often been seen as simple narratives to amuse children, but their more pervasive significance was noted as early as the 17th century when writers used the stories for a didactic purpose. In the 19th century there was an emphasis on the moral role and related psychological impact of the tales. The major development in the theoretic treatment of fairy-tales occurred, however, with \triangleright Freud and

Jung: the former saw the narratives as a way in which the subjects could work out their psychic problems, while the latter looked for universal and archetypal patterns. More recently the stories have been linked to a process of socialization as well as the imposition on girls of patriarchal value judgements. ➤ Angela Carter's feminist reworking of traditional fairy-tales attempted to counter this.

Bib: Zipes, J., Don't Bet on the Prince.

Faithful Shepherdess, The (1610)

A > pastoral romance by > John Fletcher which, in a short but influential preface about tragicomedy, acknowledges its indebtedness to the pastoral idiom of G. B. Guarini, the author of the seminal and famous pastoral play, Il Pastor Fido (1598); it thereby contributed to the vogue of English tragicomedies in the 1610s. But, whereas Fletcher's definition of tragicomedy specifically precluded death from its imaginative idiom, the English uses of the genre have tended to weld together the tragic and comic modes in a harsher manner and allowed death its full place in Arcadia.

Falconer, William (1732-69)

Author of a popular poem, The Shipwreck (1762; revised 1769), describing the sinking of a ship off the coast of Greece. Falconer himself drowned at sea.

'Fallen Woman, The'

A number of British women writers addressed the subject of the 'fallen woman' in the latter half of the 19th century. Sympathetic representations include ▷ Elizabeth Gaskell's ▷ Ruth, and Marion Erle in ▷ Elizabeth Barrett Browning's ▷ Aurora Leigh. Both these works brought attention to the sexual double standard, and both figure maternal-love as the path of redemption for the woman. In other novels such as ▷ Mrs Henry Wood's ▷ East Lymne the errant woman was cruelly punished in the course of the narrative, serving as a warning to women readers.

Falstaff, Sir John

A character in \triangleright Shakespeare's history plays, \triangleright Henry IV, Parts I and II, and in the comedy \triangleright The Merry Wives of Windsor. His death is described in \triangleright Henry V (II. ii). In the history plays he is a very active comic character, embodying fleshly indulgence, and considered to be the chief injurious influence on Prince Hal (Henry), the heir to the throne. Though a fully realized character in his own right, he clearly carries also some force from medieval \triangleright allegory, representing the temptations of physical indulgence or 'riot'. Accordingly Hal, once anointed as King Henry V, casts him off at the end of Henry IV, Part II. In The Merry Wives he is much less substantial, and plays the role of a comparatively commonplace buffoon.

➤ Oldcastle, Sir John.

Fanshawe, Lady Ann (1625-80) Biographer. Although her Memoirs (completed 1676) ostensibly tell the life of her beloved husband for the benefit of his son, in fact they are a vivid and lively account of her own experiences, as well as those of Sir Richard Fanshawe. Lady Ann's life after she married Sir Richard in 1644 was full of the poverty-stricken turmoils and disappointments that characterized the Royalist party during the ➤ Interregnum. She was almost shipwrecked, almost abducted by pirates (she saved herself by adopting the disguise of a cabin boy), trapped in Galway during an outbreak of the plague, and bore 14 live children. Although the Fanshawes shared in the triumphal return of the monarchy, at her husband's death in 1666 Lady Ann was again left without financial support and she remained poor until her death. Memoirs is a dramatic account of the life of the Fanshawe family, but it is also a deeply moving account of marital love, which despite numerous trials endured undiminished.

➤ Biography; Autobiography. Bib: Fraser, A., The Weaker Vessel; Wilcox, H., in Cerasano, S. P. and Wynne-Davies, M. (eds.), Gloriana's Face.

Fanshawe, Catherine (1765-1834) Poet and letter-writer. Fanshawe came from a genteel background, which encouraged the education and cultural activity of women. In some ways perceptions of Fanshawe resemble those of > Jane Austen, for during the 19th century she was considered a feminine, refined and respectable author, whose poetry was suitable for young women. However, on reading her work now it seems impossible that anyone could miss the sharp and incisive irony. Fanshawe parodies different ➤ discourses, satirizes political conventions and displays a worldly and somewhat cynical view about women's position in polite society. She and her sisters are also accredited with editing the memoirs of Lady Ann Fanshawe, who was an important > Renaissance woman.

Fantastic

As used by the critics Tzvetan Todorov and ▷ Christine Brooke-Rose, the term fantastic denotes a situation in which the reader of a fiction cannot be sure whether an event (or a set of events) has a natural or a supernatural explanation. The classic example is ▷ Henry James' ▷ novella ▷ The Turn of the Screw, where the reader may remain uncertain, even after reaching the end, as to whether the ghosts were 'real' or a figment of the governess's imagination. If a natural explanation is forthcoming, the fantastic gives way to the uncanny; if supernatural explanations are explicitly required, then we are in the realm of the marvellous.

Far from the Madding Crowd (1874) A novel by > Thomas Hardy. The title is a quotation from Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard (1751) by Thomas Gray (1716-71). It is one of Hardy's ➤ Wessex novels, and the first of real substance, following the comparatively slight ➤ Under the Greenwood Tree. The central character is Bathsheba Everdene, who is loved by three men: Farmer Boldwood, a solid but passionate squire; Gabriel Oak, a shepherd, who loves her with quiet constancy and wins her in the end, and the glamorous soldier, Sergeant Troy, whom she marries first. Troy combines fascinating gallantry with ruthless egoism; he allows his wife-to-be, Fanny Robin, to die in a workhouse, and is capricious and cruel to Bathsheba; he is eventually murdered by Boldwood. A crude outline such as this brings out the ballad-like quality of the story, characteristic of all Hardy's novels but more subtly rendered in later ones. Its distinction of substance is in Hardy's intimate understanding and presentation of the rural surroundings of the characters, and in the contrast between the urbane attractions of Troy and the rough but environmentally vigorous qualities of Boldwood and Oak. Bathsheba herself is a capricious and colourful heroine, not presented with psychological depth but with confident assertiveness which makes her convincing.

Farah, Nuruddin (b 1945)

Novelist and playwright. Farah was born in Somalia and educated in Ogaden (which is now in Ethiopia), at Paniab University in India and at the universities of London and Essex. The main theme of his work has been social and political change in East Africa but he chose to write in English, partly to circumvent censorship in Somalia and partly to gain an international readership. He was obliged to flee from Somalia in 1973 and subsequently lived in many parts of the world, including Nigeria, Gambia, Sudan, France, Germany, Italy and the United States. Since 1990 he has been Professor at Makere University, Kampala, Uganda. His novels have satirized the rule of dictators and the regime in Somalia as well as exploring the dilemmas of independent women living in a society where traditional gender roles are dominant. Stylistically, his fiction draws on the complex and elegant traditions of Somali poetry as well as alluding to a range of modern European writers. His novels are: From a Crooked Rib (1970); A Naked Needle (1976); Sweet and Sour Milk (1979); Sardines (1981); Close Sesame (1983); Maps (1986); and Gifts (1993), a novel set in Mogadishu before the civil war, which deals with the political and moral issues surrounding foreign aid through the story of a nurse who wishes to resist dehumanizing dependence. Plays include The Offering (1975) and Yussuf and his Brothers (1982). He has also written for radio.

Farce

A comic dramatic genre, characteristically presenting an anarchic world in which authority, order and morality are under threat, and in which ordinary people are caught up in extraordinary goings on or extraordinary people are caught up in ordinary goings on. At its best it gives subversive expression to our wilder imaginings and rebellious instincts. Although comedy may incorporate the farcical, farce on the whole devotes less attention to character, and has more manic physical activity and accelerating momentum in its plots. In farce at its best, the successive discoveries, reversals, coincidences and repetitions are worked into an intricate and completely satisfying pattern, which persuades an audience of the logic of each successive step along the way, even if the final result seems supremely illogical. Disguising, role-playing, improvisation are forced upon the characters to keep them one step ahead of disaster, or enable them to keep up appearances as events spiral out of control. A degree of manic activity results, drawing extensively on the physical skills of the actor.

Farces often rely heavily on stereotypes – comic cleaning woman, bossy mother-in-law, apoplectic military man, etc. Inventively handled, these can be very funny and an essential part of the farcical mechanism. Uninventively handled, they can reinforce prejudice and create easy laughs.

Many of the plays of ⊳ Aristophanes and > Plautus offer fine examples of farcical techniques and structure, and it was also a characteristic feature of much medieval secular and religious drama. Since the ➤ Renaissance, three periods of particular creative activity in farce may be distinguished. The first is Commedia dell'arte in 16th- and 17th-century Italy, with its stock characters, situations, improvisations and comic routines. The second is France between the mid-1800s and the 1920s, where such prolific writers as Labiche and Feydeau satirized bourgeois life and the institution of marriage. Recently farce techniques and episodes have been extensively used for their subversive potential in 'serious' plays, which seek to challenge conventional sexual, political or social responses, for example, > Caryl Churchill's Cloud Nine (1979) and ➤ Edward Bond's Early Morning (1968). Bib: Davis, J., Farce; Smith, L., Modern British Farce .

Farquhar, George (1678–1707) Dramatist, whose topics and style straddle

those of the Restoration period and of the 18th century, showing some elements of ⊳ Reform comedy. The son of a Church of England clergyman, Farquhar was born in Londonderry, and entered Trinity College, Dublin. Lacking funds, and the ambition to study, however, he left and turned to acting, at the > Smock Alley Theatre in Dublin. There he met ➤ Robert Wilks, who became his friend and acted in several of his subsequent plays. The accidental wounding of another actor during a performance of > Dryden's The Indian Emperor shocked him profoundly, and he left the stage and turned to writing for the theatre instead. In 1697 Farquhar went to London, where his first play, Love and a Bottle, was performed successfully at the Theatre Royal (> Drury Lane Theatres) in 1698. With > The Constant Couple; Or, A Trip to the Jubilee (1699) he became fully established as a popular dramatist, Wilks acting the role of Sir Harry Wildair, and ▷ Susanna Verbruggen the part of Lady Lurewell. Sir Harry later became a favourite breeches part for actresses, including > Peg Woffington. The play's sequel, Sir Harry Wildair (1701) was less successful. Farguhar obtained a commission in the army, but failed to obtain advancement. He did however travel through various parts of England, recruiting for the military, and used his experiences of army life to satiric effect in > The Recruiting Officer (1706). The influence of changing theories about drama which took hold toward the turn of the century is evident in several of Farquhar's plays, especially The Twin Rivals (1702) and his last play, ▷ The Beaux' Stratagem (1707), which show a more humane and spontaneous attitude to life than the works of some authors of the high Restoration period. The contemporary dramatist > Susannah Centlivre praised him for avoiding the risqué elements which so offended the > Rev. Jeremy Collier, prompting him to write his A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage. Centlivre's fulsome appreciation of Farquhar led to a correspondence between them, later published. In 1703 Farquhar married a woman who is said to have deceived him into believing her an heiress. He died in poverty after a lengthy illness.

Bib: Farmer, A. J., Farguhar.

Farrell, J. G. (James Gordon) (1935–79) Novelist. His best work consisted of carefully researched, and powerfully imagined historical novels. The Siege of Krishnapur (1973), a fictitious account of the Indian mutiny, won the Booker Prize; The Singapore Grip (1978) recounts the collapse of British power in Malaya, culminating in the Japanese capture of Singapore in 1942; Troubles (1970) is set in Ireland in 1919. These three novels, which form a kind of trilogy concerned with the long demise of the British Empire, represent an ambitious attempt at historical novel-writing.

His career was ended by his early death on a fishing expedition in Ireland. Other novels are: A Man From Elsewhere (1963); The Lung (1965); A Girl in the Head (1967); The Hill Station (unfinished, 1981).

Fathers of the Church

Early Christian writers, important in the formation of Christian doctrine. They included Cyprian (3rd century), Athanasius (4th century), Gregory of Nazianzus (4th century), Augustine of Hippo (4th–5th century), Pope Gregory I, the Great (end of the 6th century). Those Fathers who were nearly contemporary with the original Apostles of Christ are often called the Apostolic Fathers; they include Clement of Rome, Polycarp of Smyrna, Ignatius of Antioch – all of the 1st century or the 1st and early 2nd centuries.

Faustus

Doctor Faustus, The Tragical History of.

Feinstein, Elaine (b 1930)

Poet, novelist and translator. Born in Lancashire and educated at Cambridge, Feinstein has taught literature at Essex University as well as working in publishing. Her poetry is written closely from personal situations, and is deeply experiential. Her volumes of verse include: In a Green Eye (1966) (her first collection); The Magic Apple Tree (1971); The Celebrants (1973); Some Unease and Angels: Selected Poems (1977); The Feast of Eurydice (1980); and Selected Poems (1994). She has also edited an edition of Marina Tsvetayeva's poetry, and her novels include Children of the Rose (1975) and The Border (1984).

Felix Holt the Radical (1866)

A novel by > George Eliot. The hero is a talented young working man who makes it his vocation to educate the political intelligence of his fellow-workers. His rival for the love of Esther Lyon, the daughter of a Nonconformist minister, is the local landowner, Harold Transome, also a radical politician, though pursuing a more conventional career. George Eliot makes Holt utter high-minded speeches which weaken the reality he is supposed to possess. On the other hand, a subsidiary theme which concerns Harold Transome's mother, the secret of Harold's illegitimacy, and his hostility to the lawyer, Jermyn, who is really his father, is treated so well that it is among the best examples of George Eliot's art.

Fell, Alison (b 1944)

Poet, journalist and fiction writer. Born in Dumfries, Fell has worked as a sculptor, with women's theatre and for the feminist journal Spare Rib, for whom she edited the fiction > anthology, Hard Feelings. As well as her volume of poetry, Kisses for Mayakovsy, in 1981 she published a children's novel, and two novels.

Fell, Margaret (1614-1702)

Pamphleteer and autobiographer. Until her 38th year Margaret Fell led an unremarkable and conventional life, having married Thomas Fell, a judge, in 1632. But in 1652 she heard the ▷ Quaker ▷ George Fox preach and instantly converted. Most of her household converted and although her husband did not he remained tolerant of her faith, allowing her to use their house, Swarthmore Hall, as a centre for Quakerism. She was never an itinerant preacher like > Priscilla Cotton, but formed the pivot of a strong Quaker community and wrote numerous pamphlets and letters, some to noted personages such as Henrietta Maria and > Oliver Cromwell. When she refused to abstain from Quaker practices and meetings during her trial in 1664, Margaret was imprisoned, but she used the opportunity to write and produced an important text in women's history, Women's Speaking Justified (1666). She married George Fox in 1669 and died within the warmth and admiration of her own family at the age of 88. Her writings were published posthumously as A Brief Collection (1710).

> Autobiography.

Bib: Fraser, A., The Weaker Vessel.

Female Spectator, The (1744-46)

A monthly ⊳ essay paper, launched by ⊳ Eliza Haywood, and loosely modelled on ▷ The Spectator. Haywood's periodical, under the guise of a crusade against the sins of society, carried salacious gossip and scandalous accounts of individuals' indiscretions. More seriously, the editor attacked profligacy and gambling, and warned against reckless romance, while at the same time opposing arranged marriages, and arguing in favour of divorce. The paper developed a correspondence column, in which topical concerns were raised by readers, with replies by Haywood herself. After its demise, Haywood briefly ran a weekly paper with a similar format called The Parrot. Bib: Adburgham, A., Women in Print.

Female Tatler, The

Title given to two separate journals whose names were intended to invoke ▷ The Tatler:

1 Publication launched in 1709 by ▷ Delarivière Manley, under the pseudonym of 'Mrs Crackenthorpe, a Lady that knows Everything'. The journal was a vehicle for her Tory views, but also contained anecdotes of contemporary life, as well as gossipy and sometimes scandalous accounts of the activities of real people, whose names were often thinly disguised. After threats of legal proceedings from some of them, Manley resigned her editorship in November 1709, and The Female Tatler passed into more discreet hands. It then devoted itself to accounts of women noted for their achievements, stories, and some > sentimental verses, and survived to March 1710.

2 A rival paper, also started in 1709, by the dramatist Thomas Baker, who is also thought to have produced a spurious number of Steele's

The Tatler in 1711. His The Female Tatler resembled Manley's creation, and the two hurled abuse at one another for a time, before Baker's publication closed down.

Bib: Adburgham, Al., Women in Print.

Feminism

In literary criticism this term is used to describe a range of critical positions which argue that the distinction between 'masculine' and 'feminine' (> gender) is formative in the generation of all discursive practices. In its concern to bring to the fore the particular situation of women in society 'feminism' as a focus for the raising of consciousness has a long history, and can be taken to embrace an interest in all forms of women's writing throughout history. In its essentialist (> Essentialism) guise, feminism proposes a range of experiences peculiar to women, which are, by definition, denied to men, and which it seeks to emphasize in order to compensate for the oppressive nature of a society rooted in what it takes to be patriarchal authority. A more materialist (> Materialism) account would emphasize the extent to which gender difference is a cultural construction, and therefore amenable to change by concerted political action. Traditional materialist accounts, especially those of > Marx, have placed the issue of 'class' above that of 'gender', but contemporary feminism regards the issue of 'gender' as frequently cutting across 'class' divisions and raising fundamental questions about the social role of women in relations of production and exchange. In so far as all literature is 'gendered', then feminine literary criticism is concerned with the analysis of the social construction of 'femininity' and 'masculinity' in particular texts. One of its major objectives is to expose how hitherto 'masculine' criticism has sought to represent itself as a universal experience. Similarly, the focus is adjusted in order to enable literary works themselves to disclose the ways in which the experiences they communicate are determined by wider social assumptions about gender difference, which move beyond the formal boundaries of the text. To this extent feminism is necessarily the focus of an interdisciplinary approach to literature, psychology, sociology and philosophy.

Psychoanalytic feminism, for example, often overlaps with socialist feminism. It approaches the concept of gender as a problem rather than a given, and draws on > Freud's emphasis on the instability of sexual identities. The fact that femininity – and masculinity – are never fully acquired, once and for all, suggests a relative openness allowing for changes in the ways they are distributed. Literature's disturbance and exploration of ways of thinking about sexual difference have proved a rich source for feminist critics. In the 1990s the multiplicity of feminist criticisms has led some women to welcome this as a ▷ utopian pluralism, while others fear that this pluralism is simply a reassertion of liberal values to the detriment of political activism.

➤ Women's movement.

Bib: de Beauvoir, S., The Second Sex; Greene, G. and Kahn, C. (eds.), Making a Difference: Feminist Literary Criticism; Millett, K., Sexual Politics; Spender, D., Feminist Theorists; Wollstonecraft, M., Vindication of the Rights of Women.

Feminist critique

A phrase coined by Elaine Showalter in her influential essay 'Towards a Feminist Poetics' (1979) to describe an early form of modern feminist criticism. Feminist critique involves the identification and criticism of prejudiced male images or views of women in works of literature or criticism. Feminist critique aims at the identification of female stereotypes - either idealised or denigratory - and the projection of male needs and ideas onto female characters. Showalter argues, however, that though the feminist critique is a necessary beginning for feminist criticism, it is limited by its emphasis on negativity and victimization, and by the fact that, though it aims to criticise male ideas, it paradoxically remains centred on them. > gynocriticism.

Bib: Showalter, E., (ed.), The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature and Theory.

Fenton, James (b 1949)

Poet. Educated at Oxford, Fenton has worked as a journalist in Britain (as theatre critic for the Sunday Times) and abroad, including in Vietnam. His publications include: Terminal Moraine (1972); A Vacant Possession (1978); A German Requiem (1980); The Memory of War (1982).

Fenwick, Eliza (c 1760-c1840)

Novelist and children's author. Fenwick may be associated with the development of radical women's writing at the end of the 18th century. She was friendly with ▶ Mary Wollstonecraft and ▶ Mary Lamb, and she left her alcoholic husband in 1800, supporting herself, without regrets, for the remaining 40 years of her life. Fenwick's most important and, indeed, compelling piece of work is her novel, Secresy, or The Ruin on the Rock (1705). It focuses on the lives of two women, Sibella and Caroline, who grow in self-awareness and recognize the ills of their society. The ending is tragic, with both women losing what they love, but the sexual openness of the work, together with its praise of female friendship, ensure that the overall tone of the book remains challenging rather than depressing (> Feminism). Fenwick believed that education was the answer to social problems, a theme which she takes up in her didactic children's book, Visits to the Juvenile Library (1805). Her last years were spent running > Godwin's library and travelling the world as a governess.

Bib: Wedd, A.F., The Fate of the Fenwicks.

Ferguson, Adam (1723-1816) Scottish philosopher and historian, often thought of as the founder of modern sociology. Born at Logierait in Perthshire, Ferguson became chaplain to the Black Watch regiment, and later succeeded his friend ➤ David Hume as keeper of the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh. He was made a professor at Edinburgh University, first of Natural Philosophy, then of Moral Philosophy and finally of Mathematics. His Essay on the History of Civil Society (1767) analyses human existence in terms of man's social nature and tendency to form groups; it represents a landmark in the development of sociology as an academic discipline. In it he also argued that the growing division of labour encouraged individualistic pursuit of gain, and worked against the interests of the social group. Other writings include Institutes of Moral Philosophy (1769) and The History of the Progress and Termination of the Roman Republic (1782) which became a standard work. Bib: Kettler, D., The Social and Political Thought of Adam Ferguson.

Fergusson, Robert (1750-74)

Poet. A clerk in the Commissary Office in Edinburgh, he died in the local ▷ Bedlam after falling ill and becoming prev to religious melancholy. He wrote extensively in English in the usual genres of the day: ➤ lyrics imitative of > William Shenstone, tetrameter (> metre) fables and Miltonic > blank verse. But his most important poetry is in the Scots vernacular and builds on the tradition begun by Allan Ramsay, often employing Ramsav's distinctive stanza forms. His Auld Reekie and Hallow-Fair depict the urban scene with pungent particularity. He intended to translate ▷ Virgil's ▷ Georgics and > Aeneid into Scots, but the project was never realized because of his early death. The 1782 edition of Fergusson's works helped inspire some of ➤ Robert Burns' best poetry.

Ferrar, Nicholas

> Little Gidding.

Ferrers, George (c 1500–1579) Poet. Ferrers was Master of the King's Pastimes at the court of ▷ Henry VIII and in this post was responsible for writing and producing several ▷ masques. He was still in the royal service during the reign of ▷ Elizabeth I and composed several verses to be recited during her visit to Kenilworth (▷ George Gascoigne). Ferrers is best known, however, for his part in the planning, with William Baldwin, of ▷ A Mirror for Magistrates (1559, 1563 and 1578), a work which recorded in verse the political successes and failures of historical persons.

Ferrier, Susan Edmonstone (1782-1854) Novelist. The youngest of ten children, Susan Ferrier was born in Edinburgh. Her father was a lawyer, a principal clerk of session along with ⊳ Sir Walter Scott, so Ferrier was early introduced to literary society. Through visits to Inverary Castle she also became acquainted with the fashionable world. After her mother died in 1797 her three sisters married and she kept house for her father who died in 1829. She later insisted on the destruction of correspondence with a sister, thus destroying much biographical material. Her novels of Scottish life included portraits of known people. Marriage (1818) was written in 1810 with a minimal contribution from her friend Miss Clavering, The Inheritance in 1824 and Destiny, or the chief's daughter in 1831. Her aim was didactic and her method keen observation, comedy and clear writing.

➤ Silver-fork novels.

Bib: Grant, A., Susan Ferrier of Edinburgh: a Biography.

Feuilleton

In French, a leaflet. Also used in French for that part of a newspaper devoted to literature, non-political news and gossip. In English the term was once used for the instalment of a serial story: it was the French newspaper Le Siècle which was the first to commission a serial novel specifically for part publication, in 1836. They were called romans feuilletons.

Fidessa

A character in ▷ Edmund Spenser's ▷ The Faerie Queene (Book I). Though the name Fidessa implies fidelity, she is, in reality, the false ▷ Duessa, and her intention is to lead the ▷ Red Cross Knight, standing for the faith of Protestant Church of England, into captivity.

Field, Michael (Katherine Bradley,

1846–1914 and Edith Cooper, 1862–1913) Collaborative poets and dramatists. Katherine Bradley moved to the home of her niece, Edith Cooper, in 1865, and thereafter the two women were devoted and constant companions, viewing themselves as a spiritual partnership – 'closer married' than their friends the Brownings – until Edith's death in 1913. Although they sometimes published separately under the > pseudonyms Arran (Katherine) and Isla (Edith) Leigh, they first collaborated, using these pseudonyms, in a volume of poems, Bellerophon, and in the first 'Michael Field' play, Callirrhoe (1884), which was widely acclaimed. Enjoying a private income they produced twenty-seven tragic dramas and eight volumes of verse, all written in partnership and often published in limited editions. Centring mostly on classical and historical subjects, only one of their plays was ever performed, but their poetry is notable for its sensuousness, passion and mysticism, and includes love poems to each other. Their verse collections include Long Ago (1889) based on poems by Sappho the Greek poet; (7th-6th century BC) Underneath the Bough (1893); Wild Honey from Various Thyme (1908); Poems of Adoration (1912) written by Edith, and Mystic Trees (1913), written mainly by Katherine. The two women also co-wrote a journal, Works and Day, extracts from which were published in 1933 (ed. T. and D.C. Moore). In 1907 they converted to Catholicism. They lived together almost all their lives, dying of cancer within months of each other.

▶ Lesbianism

Bib: Sturgeon, M., Michael Field; Hickok, K., Representations of Women: 19th Century British Women's Poetry; Faderman, L., Surpassing the Love of Men; Leighton, A., Victorian Women Poets: Writing Against the Heart; Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Field, Nathaniel (1587-1633)

Actor; he was one of the most famous in the lifetime of ▷ Shakespeare. He is mentioned in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's works as having played parts in them, and he also took leading roles in plays by ▷ Ben Jonson and the chief one in ▷ George Chapman's most famous play, ▷ Bussy d' Ambois. He wrote two ▷ 'citizen comedies' in the style of Jonson: A Woman is a Weathercock and Amends for Ladies. Bib: Perry, W. (ed.), The Plays of Nathan Field.

Field of Cloth of Gold

The name given to the meeting-place of the English ➤ Henry VIII and the French Francis I, in France. The object of the meeting near Guisnes in 1520 was to arrange an alliance, but the encounter is less memorable politically than it is for its characteristically ➤ Renaissance splendour.

Fielding, Henry (1707-54)

Born at Sharpham Park in Somerset, the son of a lieutenant. After the death of his mother when he was II, Fielding was sent to Eton. At the age of 19, after an unsuccessful attempt to elope with an heiress, Fielding tried to make a living in London as a dramatist.

In 1728 his play Love in Several Masques was successfully performed at ▷ Drury Lane, and Fielding departed for university at Leyden, where he studied classical literature for about 18 months. On his return to London he continued his career as a dramatist, writing some 25 plays in the period 1729–37. His dramatic works are largely satirical, the most successful being ▷ Tom Thumb (performed in 1730). Fielding also edited four periodicals, The Champion (1739–41), The Covent Garden Journal (under the pseudonym Sir Alexander Drawcansir, 1752), The True Patriot (1745–6) and Jacobite's Journal (1747–8), but his major achievement is as a novelist.

Depart Shamela, a parody of Department Richardson's Pamela, published in 1741, was developed into the theme of Deseph Andrews (1742), an original and comic creation. In 1743 Fielding published Deserois The Life of Jonathan Wild the Great, a satire on the criminal class comparable in its inversion of values to Deserois Department Opera. In the same year his lesser-known satire, A Journey From This World to the Next, also appeared. Deserois Tom Jones, his greatest work, was published in 1749, and Deserois Amelia in 1751.

In 1748 Fielding was made Justice of the Peace for Westminster, and pursued a successful career of social reform. In 1754, his health failing, he embarked on a journey to Lisbon in search of a better climate, but died on the way. A Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, his final achievement, was published posthumously the following year.

▶ Fielding, Sarah.

Bib: Alter, R., Fielding and the Nature of the Novel; Rogers, P., Henry Fielding; Rawson, C. J. Henry Fielding and the Augustan Ideal under Stress.

Fielding, Sarah (1710-68)

Sarah Fielding, sister of the novelist ▷ Henry Fielding, was highly praised by ▷ Samuel Richardson, who rated her achievements more highly than her brother's: 'his was but a knowledge of the outside of a clockwork machine, while yours was that of the finer springs and movements of the inside'. Her first appearance in print consisted of contributions to her brother's works.

Sarah Fielding's first novel, The Adventures of David Simple, began to appear in 1744, and proved a great success. In its interpretation of social conventions from a female point of view, it provides a revealing contrast with the attitudes expressed by male writers; the heroine, Cynthia, is subjected to constant sexual harassment condoned as socially acceptable behaviour. The second volume of David Simple appeared in 1747, and the final volume in 1753.

Sarah Fielding's concern for female

→ education is evident in The Governess or The Little Female Academy (1749). Its success as a (somewhat pious) moral novel for young people ensured that it stayed in print for over 150 years.

In 1754, Sarah Fielding published The Cry, a dramatic fable co-written with her friend

▶ Jane Collier. In this allegorical framework the heroine tells her story to representatives of truth and justice, malice and exploitation.

Samuel Richardson was the publisher of Sarah Fielding's next work, The Lives of Cleopatra and Octavia, in which the two characters give different versions of their lives. In 1759 Richardson again helped with the printing of The History of The Countess of Dellmyn, a further critique of male-dominated society. Her later works include The History of Ophelia (1760) and a translation of Xenophon's Memoirs of Socrates (1762).

Bib: Grey, J., 'Introduction' to The Governess.

Fiennes, Celia (1662-1741)

English Protestant travel writer, and daughter of a regicide. She travelled around the English counties alone and accompanied, riding and using a coach. Her 'Book' was first published in part in 1888. Its descriptions combine the interests of a traveller with details which make the familiar social territory strange – for example, her vivid story of the recovery of a human relic in the abandoned monastery at York.

Fifth Monarchists

A sect of Puritans who believed, on the basis of a prophecy in the Bible (Daniel 2), that ▷ Oliver Cromwell's rise to power was a preparation for the Second Coming of Christ and the establishment of the great fifth and last monarchy, the previous four having been the Assyrian, the Persian, the Greek and the Roman. In disillusionment, they began to turn against Cromwell and after the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660 they tried to raise a rebellion in London. It was easily suppressed and the leaders were executed.

Fifth Monarchy Men

A sect of ▷ Puritans who believed, on the basis of a prophecy in the Bible (Daniel 2), that ▷ Oliver Cromwell's rise to power was a preparation for the Second Coming of Christ, and the establishment of the great fifth and last monarchy; the previous four had been the Assyrian, the Persian, the Greek and the Roman. In disillusionment, they began to turn against Cromwell and after the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660 they tried to raise a rebellion in London. It was easily suppressed and the leaders were executed.

Figes, Eva (b 1032)

Novelist and > feminist writer. Born Eva Unger to a German Jewish family who escaped to England in 1939 after the imprisonment of her father by the Nazis. Educated at London University, she worked in publishing before writing her first novel, Equinox (1966), a partly autobiographical and largely pessimistic account of a woman's search for meaning and human relationships. The influence of ▷ Virginia Woolf is apparent in her exploration of the inner world of the self and her lyrical sense of the flux of experience and the continuity of memories. Days (1974) and The Seven Ages (1986) seek to establish an unrecorded female history, linking many generations of women, while Waking (1981) is structured around seven waking moments of a woman or women. These ➤ modernist techniques combine with the influence of ▷ Samuel Beckett in Winter Journey (1967), which represents the inner world of an old man dying alone. Figes has a sense of herself as a European, and an awareness of the Holocaust which is a part of her family history, and draws on the work of one of the great European modernists, Franz Kafka. Konek Landing (1969) is a Kafkaesque story of victims and executioners in a nameless country. Figes' work rejects the English realist tradition in favour of a > post-modernist commitment to experiment, apparent especially in B (1972), a self-reflexive novel about the nature of creativity, and the problematic relations of reality and fiction. She has written short stories, radio plays, children's fiction, criticism, and a classic text of the feminist movement, Patriarchal Attitudes: Women in Society (1970) as well as editing a volume of Women's Letters in Wartime 1450-1945 (1993). Little Eden: A Child at War (1978) is autobiography. Her other novels are: Nelly's Version (1977); Light (1983); Ghosts (1988); The Tenancy (1993).

Figures of Speech

Alliteration The beginning of accented syllables near to each other with the same consonantal sound, as in many idiomatic phrases: 'safe and sound'; 'thick and thin'; 'right as rain'. Alliteration is thus the opposite of ▷ rhyme, by which the similar sounds occur at the ends of the syllables: 'near and dear'; 'health and wealth'. Alliteration dominated the pattern of Old English poetry; after the Conquest, French influence caused rhyme to predominate. However, in the 14th century there seems to have been an 'alliterative revival', producing such important poems as ▷ Piers Plowman and ▷ Sir Gawain and the Green Knight.

An example from the latter text reveals the power of Middle English alliteration:

...the scharp of the schalk schyndered the bones, And schrank thurgh the schyire grece, and scade hit in twynne.

[the sharp blade shattered the man's bones and sank into the fair flesh, cutting it in two.]

Alliterative verse was accentual, ie did not depend on the regular distribution of accented syllables in a line, but on the number of accented syllables in the lines.

After the 14th century, rhyme and the regular count of syllables became the normal pattern for English verse. Alliteration, however, continued to be used unsystematically by every poet. For example, > Burns used it to comic effect in 'The Twa Dogs':

His locked, letter'd, brawbrass collar Shew'd him the gentleman and scholar.

Anacoluthon From the Greek: 'not following on'. Strictly speaking, this is not a figure of speech, but a grammatical term for a sentence which does not continue the syntactical pattern with which it starts. It may be used deliberately with the virtue of intensifying the force of a sentence eg by the sudden change from indirect to direct speech. Its capacity for dramatic fragmentation is used repeatedly for comic effect by ▷ Byron in ▷ Don Juan, eg:

Sooner shall heaven kiss earth – (here he fell sicker)
Oh, Julia! What is every other woe?

(Canto I)

Anti-climax

➤ Bathos (below).

Antithesis A method of emphasis by the placing of opposed ideas or characteristics in direct contrast with each other.

Apostrophe A form of direct address often used by a narrator in the middle of his narrative as a means of emphasizing a moral lesson. Apostrophe frequently addresses a real person, living or dead, as in the opening of > Wordsworth's sonnet on Milton: 'Milton! Thou shouldst be living at this hour!'

Assonance The rhyming of vowel sounds without the rhyming of consonants.

Bathos From the Greek: 'death'. The descent from the sublime to the ridiculous. This may be the result of incompetence in the writer, but > Alexander Pope used it skilfully as a method of ridicule:

Here thou, great ANNA! whom three realms obey Dost sometimes counsel take – and sometimes tea. (The Rape of the Lock)

Pope wrote an essay Bathos, the Art of Sinking in Poetry, as a travesty of the essay by ▷ Longinus, On the Sublime (1st century AD). Longinus had great prestige as a critic in Pope's time. Among the canonical Romantic poets, ▷ Byron is the absolute master of bathos, as in the lines written on the back of his manuscript of ▷ Don Juan, Canto I:

I say – the future is a serious matter – And so – for God's sake – hock and soda-water!

Climax From the Greek: 'a ladder'. The climb from lower matters to higher, with the consequent satisfying of raised expectations.

Euphemism A mild or vague expression used to conceal a painful or disagreeable truth, eg 'he passed on' for 'he died'. It is sometimes used ironically.

Euphuism A highly artificial quality of style resembling that of > John Lyly's > Euphues, as may be seen from the following quotation:

How frantic are those lovers which are carried away with the gay glistering of the fine face, the beauty whereof is parched with the summer's blaze and chipped with the winter's blast; which is of so short continuance that it fadeth before one perceive it flourish; of so small profit that it poisoneth those that possess it; of so little value with the wise that they accompt it a delicate bait with a deadly hook, a sweet panther with a devouring paurich, a sour poison in a silver pot.

Hyperbole Expression in extreme language so as to achieve intensity, eg ▷ Shelley's exclamation at the apparent failure of his own poem to achieve its target, towards the end of ▷ Epipsychidion: 'I pant, I sink, I tremble, I expire!'

Innuendo A way of expressing dislike or criticism indirectly, or by a hint; an insinuation.

Irony From the Greek: 'dissimulation'. A form of expression by which the writer intends his meaning to be understood differently and less favourably, in contrast to his overt statement:

It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife.

This opening sentence of ▷ Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice is to be understood as meaning that the appearance of such a young man in a neighbourhood inspires very strong wishes in the hearts of mothers of unmarried daughters, and that these wishes cause the mothers to behave as though the statement were indeed a fact.

Dramatic irony occurs when a character in a play makes a statement in innocent assurance of its truth, while the audience is well aware that he or she is deceived. Tragedies by ▷ Byron, or ▷ Shelley's The Cenci, are indebted to Elizabethan and Jacobean drama in this area.

Litotes Emphatic expression through an ironical negative, eg 'She's no beauty', meaning that the woman is ugly.

Malapropism A comic misuse of language, usually by a person who is both pretentious and ignorant. The term derives from the character Mrs Malaprop in Sheridan's play The Rivals (1775). For example, Mrs Malaprop cries 'O mercy! – I'm quite analyzed, for my part!' when she really intends to say that she is 'amazed'. This comic device had in fact been used by earlier writers, such as \triangleright Shakespeare in the portrayal of Dogberry in Much Ado About Nothing.

Meiosis Understatement, used as a deliberate method of emphasis by irony, eg 'Would you like to be rich?' - 'I should rather think so!'

Metaphor A figure of speech by which unlike objects are identified with each other for the purpose of emphasizing one or more aspects of resemblance between them. A simple example: 'the camel is the ship of the desert'. Romantic poetry abounds in more complex examples, as in the opening of ▷ Keats' 'Ode on a Grecian Urn', which employs humanized metaphor to treat an inanimate object:

Thou still unravish's bride of quietness, Thou foster-child of silence and slow time.

The opposite approach to metaphor is adopted by \triangleright Shelley in \triangleright Epipsychidion, when the human addressee of a poem, Emilia, is called:

A metaphor of Spring and Youth and Morning; A Vision like Incarnate April, warming, With smiles and tears, Frost and Anatomy Into his summer grave.

('Anatomy' here means 'skeleton'.)

Mixed metaphor is a confused image in which the successive parts are inconsistent, so that (usually) absurdity results: 'I smell a rat, I see it floating in the air, but I will nip it in the bud', ie 'I suspect an evil, and I can already see the beginnings of it, but I will take action to suppress it.' However, mixed metaphor is sometimes used deliberately to express a state of confusion.

Dead metaphor is one in which the image has become so familiar that it is no longer thought of as figurative, eg the phrase 'to take steps', meaning 'to take action'.

Metaphysical conceit

➤ Metaphysical Poets.

Metonymy The naming of a person, institution or human characteristic by some object or attribute with which it is clearly associated, as when a king or queen may be referred to as 'the Crown':

Sceptre and Crown Must tumble down, And in the dust be equal made With the poor crooked scythe and spade. ('The Levelling Dust', James Shirley)

Here 'Sceptre and Crown' refer to kings, and perhaps more broadly to the classes which control government, while 'scythe and spade' stand for the humble peasantry. Metonymy has taken on additional meanings since the advent of Structuralism. One of the originators of Russian Formalism, > Roman Jakobson, draws a distinction between 'metaphor' - the linguistic relationship between two different objects on the grounds of their similarity and 'metonymy' as a means of establishing a relationship between two objects in terms of their contiguity. Where metaphor is regarded as a major rhetorical device in poetry, metonymy is more usually associated with prose. The critic and novelist ➤ David Lodge takes up this distinction in his book The Modes of Modern Writing (1977), and suggests that 'metaphor' and 'metonymy' constitute a structurally significant binary opposition that enables the distinction to be made between poetry and drama on the one hand, and prose on the other. Lodge emphasizes, however, that these terms are not mutually exclusive, but rather contribute to 'a theory of dominance of one quality over another'. Hence it is possible for a novel to contain 'poetic' effects and vice versa.

Oxymoron A figure of speech formed by the conjunction of two contrasting terms in a compressed paradox, such as ▷ Coleridge's 'Life-in-Death' from ▷ The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

Palindrome A word or sentence that reads the same backwards or forwards, eg

Lewd did I live; evil I did dwel (Phillips, 1706)

Paradox A statement that challenges the mind by appearing to be self-contradictory.

Pathetic fallacy A term invented by the critic > John Ruskin (Modern Painters, Vol. III, Pt. iv, Ch. 12) to denote the tendency common especially among poets to ascribe human emotions or qualities to inanimate objects, eg > Coleridge's line 'As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing' from ➤ Kubla Khan. Ruskin describes it by dividing writers into four classes: those who do not use it merely because they are insensitive; superior writers in whom it is a mark of sensitivity; writers who are better still and do not need it because they 'feel strongly, think strongly, and see truly'; and writers of the best sort who use it because in some instances they 'see in a sort untruly, because what they see is inconceivably above them'. In general, he considers that the pathetic fallacy is justified when the feeling it expresses is a true one.

Personification A kind of metaphor, by which an abstraction or inanimate object is endowed with personality. As for example in ▶ Keats' 'To Autumn', where Autumn is described as a human being:

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store? Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find Thee sitting careless on a granary floor, Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind;

Play on words A use of a word with more than one meaning or of two words which sound the same in such a way that both meanings are called to mind. In its simplest form, as the modern pun, this is merely a joke. In the 16th and 17th centuries poets frequently played upon words seriously; this is especially true of ▷ Shakespeare and dramatists contemporary with him, and of the ▷ Metaphysical poets, such as ▷ John Donne and ▷ George Herbert.

This very serious use of puns or plays upon words decreased in the 18th century, when ➤ Samuel Johnson censured Shakespeare's fondness for puns (or, as Johnson called them, 'quibbles'). The reason for this disappearance of the serious 'play upon words' was the admiration of educated men for what Bishop Sprat in his History of the Royal Society (1667) called 'mathematical plainness of meaning', a criterion emulated by poets as well as by prose writers. Poetry of the Romantic period is however characterized by daring or subtle play on words, as in Keats' reckless punning in his 'Ode on a Grecian Urn':

O Attic shape! Fair altitude! with brede Of marble men and maidens overwrought

'Brede' and 'overwrought' are here puns, and 'Attic' calls up the word 'altitude'. > Byron and > Shelley play continuously on words for comic and philosophical effect respectively, and > Blake's play on words in even such brief lyrics as 'The Sick Rose' and 'London' becomes so intense as to make it impossible for a reader to find less than a multitude of interpretations for them. In the 19th century, the play on words was revived by humorous writers and writers for children, such as. Thomas Hood, ▷ Edward Lear and ▷ Lewis Carroll (> Children's books). Although their use of the pun was ostensibly comic, its effect in their writings is often unexpectedly poignant or even profound, especially in Carroll's 'Alice' books. Puns continued to be despised by the adult world of reason, but they could freely and revealingly be used in what was regarded as the childish world of nonsense and fantasy.

Modern poets and critics have recovered the older, serious use of the play on words. Ambiguity of meaning which in the 18th century was considered a vice of expression, is now seen as a quality of rich texture of expression, though of course 'good' and 'bad' types of ambiguity have to be distinguished. ▷ James Joyce used the technique with unprecedented elaboration in ▷ Finnegans Wake; ▷ William Empson revived the serious punning of Donne and ▷ Marvell in his poems, and investigated the whole problem in Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930). Just as admiration for mathematics and the physical sciences caused the decline of the play on words, so the revival of it has been partly due to the rise of another science, that of psychoanalysis, especially the school of ▷ Freud, with its emphasis on the interplay of conscious and unconscious meanings in the use of language.

Pun

▶ Play on words (above).

Rhyme A verbal music made through identity of sound in the final syllables of words. Several varieties of rhyme exist:

End-rhyme When the final syllables of lines of verse are rhymed.

Internal rhyme When one at least of the rhyming words is in mid-line; as in 'fair' and 'air' in the following couplet by > Swinburne:

We have seen thee, O Love, thou art fair; thou art goodly, O Love; Thy wings make light in the air as wings of a dove.

Masculine rhymes are single stressed syllables as in the following example from ➤ Anna Barbauld's 'Life':

Life! I know not what thou art, But know that thou and I must part.

Feminist rhymes are on two syllables, the second of which is unaccented. As in the following from ▷ Coleridge's ▷ Dejection: an Ode:

Mad lutenist! who in this month of showers, Of dark brown gardens, and of peeping flowers.

and in ➤ Marlowe's Passionate Shepherd:

And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle
Embroider'd all with leaves of myrtle

Half-rhymes (pararhymes) are the rhyming of consonants but not of vowels (contrast ➤ Assonance). They are sometimes used as an equivalent for full rhymes, since consonants are more noticeable in rhyme music than vowels. Change in pronunciation sometimes has the effect of changing what was intended as full rhyme into half-rhyme, as in the following example from Pope:

Tis not enough, taste, judgement, learning, join; In all you speak, let truth and candour shine:

In the 18th century, 'join' was pronounced as 'jine'.

Simile Similar to metaphor, but in similes the comparison is made explicit by the use of a word such as 'like' or 'as'.

Syllepsis A figure of speech by which a word is used in a literal and a metaphorical sense at the same time, eg 'You have broken my heart and my best china vase'.

Synecdoche A figure of speech by which a part is used to express a whole, or a whole is used to express a part, eg 'fifty sail' is used for fifty ships, or the 'smiling year' is used for the spring. In practice, synecdoche is indistinguishable from ▷ metonymy. Like metonymy this figure depends upon a relationship of contiguity, and is regarded as one side of the opposition between 'poetry' and 'non-poetry'. Both metonymy and synecdoche operate by combining attributes of particular objects, therefore they are crucial rhetorical devices for the representation of reality, and are closely related to ▷ realism as a literary style insofar as they function referentially.

Transferred epithet The transference of an adjective from the noun to which it applies grammatically to some other word in the sentence, usually in such a way as to express the quality of an action or of behaviour, eg 'My host handed me a hospitable glass of wine', instead of 'My hospitable host handed me...'

Zeugma A figure similar to ⊳ syllepsis; one word used with two others, to only one of which it is grammatically or logically applicable.

Filmer, Robert (1588-1653)

Political prose writer. Born in Kent and educated at Cambridge and Lincoln's Inn, he supported the king during the civil war and began publishing his political views in the late 1640s. However, his most influential book, Patriarcha (1680) was not published until after his death, although it circulated in manuscript and is known to have been influential, especially on the work of ▷ John Locke. Filmer's argument is that the origin of regal power is patriarchal, as in the father figures of the Old Testament. Bib: Pooley, R., English Prose of the Seventeenth Century, 1590−1700.

Filostrato, Il

Description Descr

Finch, Anne, Countess of Winchilsea (1660–1720) English poet, at present best known for her 'A Nocturnall Reeverie', esteemed by ➤ William Wordsworth. With ➤ Anne Killigrew she was a Maid of Honour to Mary of Modena and married Heneage Finch. After > James II fled. they moved to Kent and she wrote poetry. A few poems were printed, but she published Miscellany Poems on Several Occassions (1713). Finch uses the natural world in a distinctive and subtle way in her poetry, linking landscape and state of mind in a way that blends the features of the inner and outer worlds, politics and place. She also had a vein of sharp satire in 'Unequal Fetters' she wrote: 'Marriage does but slightly tve men / Whil'st close Pris'ners we remain / They the larger slaves of Hymen / Still are begging Love again / At the full length of all their chain.'

Finlay, Ian Hamilton (b 1925)

Scottish poet and sculptor. Finlay works simultaneously in both words and the sculpture of physical objects, exploring the possibility of poetry as a form of visual art. His work is in certain ways representative of Concrete Poetry, the experimental movement which, since the 1960s, has sought to emphasize poetry's physical, typographical existence. Finlay has created a famous garden at Stonypath, Lanarkshire, which functions as a gallery for his work. His publications include: The Dancers Inherit the Party (1961); Tea Leaves and Fishes (1966); Poems to Hear and See (1971); Heroic Emblems (1978).

Finnegans Wake (1939)

A novel by > James Joyce. It is one of the most original experiments ever undertaken in the novel form, and the most difficult of his works to read. It purports to be one night in the life of a Dublin public-house keeper, H. C. Earwicker, and as he is asleep from the beginning to the end of the book, his experiences are all those of dream. The advantage of dream experience is that it is unrestricted by selfconscious logic, and operates by free association unrestrained by inhibitions. The basis of the 'story' is his relationships with his wife, Anna Livia Plurabelle, his daughter, Isobel, and his twin sons Shem and Shaun; it reaches out, however, into Irish and European myths as these are suggested to his sleeping consciousness by objects in his house and neighbourhood. Joyce intends in fact to make Earwicker a type of 'Everyman'. The language is made by fusing together words so as to cause them - as in dreams - to suggest several levels of significance simultaneously; this is a device which had already been used playfully by ▷ Lewis Carroll in his poem 'Jabberwocky' in the dream story for children Through the Looking-Glass (1872). Jovce, however, in his desire to universalize Earwicker, freely combines words from foreign languages with English ones, so that Earwicker's mind becomes representatively European while remaining his own. The movement of the narrative is based on the ideas of the 18thcentury Italian philosopher Vico, who believed that ages succeed each other - gods, heroes, men - and then recommence; this is followed out in Earwicker's successive identifications (as Adam, Humpty Dumpty, Christ, Cromwell, Noah, The Duke of Wellington etc.), until at the end of the book the final sentence is completed by the first sentence at its beginning. The Christian pattern of fall and resurrection also contributes to the structure of the work. Another important influence on Joyce was the psychological ideas of ⊳ Sigmund Freud on the mechanism of repression and the characteristics of dream association. Study necessitates the assistance of such a work as A Reader's Guide to Finnegans Wake by W. Y. Tindall.

Firbank, Ronald (1886-1926)

Writer of witty fantasies whose extravagant humour derives from the subtly calculated and highly-wrought style. His best-known tales are probably Vainglory (1915); Valmouth (1919); The Flower Beneath the Foot (1923); The Artificial Princess (1934). His stylistic innovations, including his highly condensed imagery, are regarded by some critics as a major contribution to ▷ modernism.

Bib: Fletcher, I. K., Memoir; Forster, F. M., in Abinger Harvest; Brooke, J., Firbank.

Fisher King

The title of the Grail Keeper in Arthurian legendary narrative. The name first appears in ➤ Chrétien de Troyes' romance Perceval (where it is not explained), and is given a Christian interpretation in ➤ Robert de Boron's late 12th/early 13th-century version of the ➤ Grail story. In versions of the 'Quest of the Holy Grail' narrative, the Fisher King is not always the same figure as the Grail King.

Fisher, Roy (b 1930)

Poet. Born in Birmingham, Fisher's work is realist in its evocation of the Midlands industrial landscape – this is especially true of his early work, which was generally unknown until the Oxford edition Poems 1955–1980 (1981) appeared (most of his previous work had been published by the small presses, especially by Fulcrum). Fisher is a prolific poet, and his works include: City (1961); The Memorial Fountain (1966); Collected Poems (1969); Matrix (1971); The Thing About Joe Sullivan (1978); A Furnace (1986); and Birmingham River (1994).

Fitz-Boodle, George Savage

The pen-name assumed by the novelist ➤ William Makepeace Thackeray for the 'Fitz-Boodle Papers' contributed to ➤ Fraser's Magazine, 1842-3. FitzGerald, Edward (1809-93)

Translator and poet; chiefly known for his extremely popular translation of the Persian poem > The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (1859). He also published Euphranor (1851), a > Platonic dialogue; translations of Six Dramas of Calderon (1853), and in 1865, a translation of > Aeschylus' Agamemnon. His delicate praise of a life of pleasure and his enjoyment of beauty, evident in his Rubaiyat, countered the moral earnestness of the age and influenced the 'anti-Victorian' > Pre-Raphaelite and > Aesthetic movements later in the century.

Bib: Benson, A. C., FitzGerald; Terhune, A. M., Life; Campbell, A. Y., in Great Victorians, eds. Massingham, A. J. and H.

Flamineo

Brother, and ultimately pimp, of > Vittoria Corombona in > The White Devil by > John Webster. Flamineo is presented as an embittered and cynical villain who spurns all the dictates of conscience and duty for self-advancement.

Flat and Round Characters

A categorization of characters, proposed by ➤ E.M. Forster in his influential study, ➤ Aspects of the Novel. Flat characters are 'constructed round a single idea or quality'; they are types or caricatures (such as Mrs Micawber in ➤ Dickens' ➤ David Copperfield). Round characters (such as ➤ Defoe's ➤ Moll Flanders) are 'capable of surprising [the reader] in a convincing way'. The idea of the flat character has passed into general use in the derogatory form of the 'two-dimensional character', but Forster himself recognized the virtues as well as the limitations of the flat character.

Flaubert, Gustave (1821-80)

French novelist. His first novel, Madame Bovary, involved him in a court action for immorality on its publication in 1857. The story of the adultery of a doctor's wife in Normandy, it ironizes not only the Romanticism of the principal character, but also the unappealing bourgeois values of the characters around her and the parochial milieu from which she attempts to escape. The book is equally notable for its contribution to psychological realism in the form of style indirect hibre (> free indirect discourse). Flaubert's 1869 novel, L'Education sentimentale, intended as the moral history of his generation, portrays the fruitless love of Frédéric Moreau for Mme Arnoux, against the background of 1840s Paris and the 1848 Revolution; love and politics prove comparable in misdirected and misrecognized opportunities, which defuse both the dynamism of character and the fulfilment of plot. History, together with religion, comes under renewed investigation in Salammbô (1862), La Tentation de Saint Antoine (1874) and Trois Contes (1877). These end in further equivocation, with the reader left uncertain about what values are to be derived from works so pervaded by irony and authorial impersonality. In the unfinished Bouvard et Pécuchet (1881), the work's eponymous protagonists are composed of the novels, guide books and folk-lore they avidly read, and conversely they take for reality what are only representations of it. In addition to foregrounding fictive processes, this novel also dwells on the stupidity of bourgeois society and the received ideas on which this society feeds, a Flaubertian theme since Madame Bovary.

In the 19th century, Flaubert was prized for his ▷ realism (he was also claimed by ▷ naturalism and rejected both labels), understood as psychological representation or the accumulation of circumstantial detail (called the 'reality effect' by ▷ Roland Barthes). Yet such detail in Flaubert tends to overwhelm rather than sharply define the character. Accordingly, the 20th century has valued him for his challenges to ▷ mimesis, including the traditional privileged ties between author and reader, writer and character, individual and society.

Flecknoe, Richard (17th century)
A poet who was the victim of a satire by

➤ Andrew Marvell, Fleckno, an English Priest at Rome (1645). Dryden chose the title ➤ Mac Flecknoe (son of Flecknoe) for his satire against ➤ Thomas Shadwell.

'Fleshly School of Poetry, The' A term taken from an article by ➤ Robert Buchanan (who signed himself 'Thomas Maitland'), published in ▷ The Contemporary Review in October 1871. In it Buchanan links > Dante Gabriel Rossetti, > Algernon Swinburne and ➤ William Morris together as poets perversely loyal to each other and united against the common decencies. His main criticism was that their work was too obsessed with the body and with aesthetics in general. Buchanan also claimed that their work was morally irresponsible. Rossetti, against whom the main thrust of Buchanan's criticism was directed, replied in a dignified article entitled 'The Stealthy School of Criticism' published in > The Athenaeum in December of the same year. However, he was deeply affected by the 'fleshly school' controversy. For Swinburne it provided vet more ammunition in his private war with Buchanan, who finally defeated Swinburne's publisher in a libel suit. However, Buchanan's literary career was irreparably damaged by the controversy. In their comic opera Patience, > Gilbert and Sullivan based the character of Bunthorne, a 'fleshly poet', partly on ➤ Oscar Wilde, who was delighted by the association. Bib: Buckley, J.H., The Victorian Temper; Doughty, O., 'The Fleshly School of Poetry: 1871-72' in Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Fletcher, Giles (the elder) (?1549–1611)
Author of a book on Russia (1591), suppressed by the government at the request of the English joint stock Russia Company (▷ Companies, Joint Stock) as likely to offend the Russian government and hinder trade. He also wrote a sonnet sequence, Licia, or Poems of Love (1593) in emulation of ▷ Sir Philip Sidney's ▷ Astrophil and Stella.
Bib: Barry, L. E., (ed.), English Works.

Fletcher, Giles (the younger) (1585–1623) Poet; author of ▷ allegorical religious poems, especially his ▷ epic in ▷ Spenserian stanzas, Christ's Victorie and Triumph (1610). He was the younger son of ▷ Giles, Fletcher the elder. Bib: Hunter, W. B. (ed.), The English Spenserians.

Fletcher, John (1579-1625)

Dramatist; nephew of > Giles Fletcher the elder. The 1679 edition of his work contains 57 plays – the largest of all the Elizabethan collections

- but most of them were collaborations.

Among the works probably by himself alone are: The Faithful Shepherdess (1608), a ▶ pastoral; the tragedies Bonduca (> Boadicea) and Valentinian (1614); the tragicomedies, The Loyal Subject (1618) and The Humorous Lieutenant (1619); the comedies, The Wild Goose Chase, Monsieur Thomas and The Pilgrim (1621).

It was in collaboration with Beaumont that Fletcher produced his most famous work; their best plays are commonly held to be the tragicomedy > Philaster and the tragedy The Maid's Tragedy. Another tragedy, A King and No King (1611), was greatly admired by John Dryden (1631-1700); the domestic comedy The Scornful Lady (1610) has also been highly praised.

Fletcher seems to have ceased collaborating with Beaumont in 1613, and to have joined briefly with \triangleright Shakespeare. \triangleright Henry VIII, formerly attributed to Shakespeare entirely, is now thought to be partly Fletcher's work, and Shakespeare is also thought to have written part of \triangleright The Two Noble Kinsmen.

Fletcher's name has also been linked with several other dramatists, including > Ben Jonson, but especially with > Massinger between 1619 and 1622. Among these Massinger collaborations are Thierry and Theodoret and The False One.

Fletcher's reputation stood highest at the Restoration, when he was ranked with Shakespeare and Jonson. The opinion of most 20th-century criticism is that he was an extremely skilful theatrical craftsman, a master of striking but superficial dramatic effects; his verse, similarly, is admitted to be fluent and musical, but is felt to lack authentic depth and strength of feeling.

Bib: Waith, E. M., The Pattern of Tragicomedy in Beaumont and Fletcher; Bradbrook, M. C., Elizabethan Tragedy; Danby, J., Poets on Fortune's Hill; Finkelpearl, P. J., Court and Country Politics in the Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher; Maxwell, B., Studies in Beaumont, Fletcher and Massinger, Leech, C., The John Fletcher Plays.

Fletcher, Phineas (1582-1650)

Elder son of ➤ Giles Fletcher the elder: → allegorical poet in the tradition of → Edmund Spenser. Principal work: The Purple Island, or the Isle of Man (1633), an allegorical representation of the human mind and body.

Bib: Hunter, W. B. (ed.), The English Spenserians; Longdale, A. B., Phineas Fletcher: Man of Letters, Science and Divinity.

Flodden, Battle of (1513)

The invading Scottish forces under King James IV, fighting in alliance with France which had been invaded by Henry VIII of England, were heavily defeated by the English general, the Earl of Surrey. James himself was killed, as well as large numbers of his nobility. The battle was commemorated by a famous dirge, The Flowers of the Forest, the best-known version of which is by Jean Elliott (1727-1805).

Florio, John (?1553-1625)

Translator, Florio published, in 1578 and 1591, two Italian phrase books, as well as an Italian-English dictionary, A World of Words (1598). His best-known work, however, was his > translation of the Essays of > Montaigne, which was published in 1603. Bib: Yates, F. A., John Florio.

Flowerdew, Alice (1759-1830)

Poet. After the death of her husband, Flowerdew published her spiritual and > didactic work. including some interesting > hymns, in Poems on Moral and Religious Subjects (1803), probably from financial need. The third edition (1811) of this collection carries a new preface in which the education of women (> Women, education of) is discussed. By this time Flowerdew was teaching in a London school and the practical nature of her argument clearly stems from personal experience. She forthrightly asserts that men and women have equal intellectual potential, but that women have been repressed by the lack of a proper education.

▶ Feminism.

Flyting

A verbal combat, in which the combatants compete against each other in satirical abuse. The device was particularly common in medieval literature, eg > Dunbar's The Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedy, and Chaucer's > The Parliament of Foulys.

Focal character

The character within a narrative 'whose point of view orients the narrative perspective'

(> Genette). Where there is a focal character, his or her sense impressions and/or perceptions are what the narrative presents to the reader. The focal character is distinguished from the > narrator, since the latter may be a different person. For example, there may be an impersonal, extradiegetic narrator, focalizing through a character in the third person, as in > Henry James' > The Ambassadors, or the narrator and focal character may be the same person, but at different points in time, as in > Margaret Atwood's Cat's Eye.

> Narratology; Focalization.

Focalization

In ⊳ narratology, focalization is an aspect of > mood, and is adopted by > Genette as a more precise term than 'point of view' to indicate the focus of a narrative. Internal focalization views events through the mind of a particular > focal character, external focalization follows the experiences of a character without revealing his or her thoughts, while non-focalized narration is told by an impersonal narrator without restriction.

Folio

As applied to books, a folio is one for which the paper has been folded once, and therefore of the largest size. The expression 'the first folio' commonly refers to the first collected edition of ➤ Shakespeare's plays (1623); there were three other folio editions of Shakespeare's plays in the 17th century.

The 1623 volume is edited by two fellow actors of the King's Men - Heming and Condell - and contains a preface by them and prefatory poems, notably one by ⊳ Ben Jonson. Following the poems there is a list of the 'principal actors in all these plays'; the list includes Shakespeare himself, > Richard Burbage, ▷ Nathaniel Field, and of course the editors. The edition opens with the print of a rather inferior engraved portrait of the poet by Martin Droeshout. Thirty-six plays are included; ➤ Pericles, included by modern editors, is omitted. Eighteen of the plays had already been published in small > quarto editions (some of them close to the folio version and some differing substantially), and the remainder were being published for the first time. The plays are undated, and grouped into Comedies, Histories and Tragedies; some have divisions into > acts and scenes, and some are without them.

Fontenelle, Bernard le Bovyer (Bouvier) de (1657-1757)

French author, born at Rouen, a nephew of ➤ Corneille. Educated as a lawyer he followed in his uncle's footsteps by abandoning this profession in favour of literature, at first writing for the theatre. Failing at this, despite the help of his uncle, he turned to other forms of authorship including a history of the French theatre, satires, criticism, and scientific and moral treatises. His Dialogue des morts (1683), in imitation of the classical Greek writer > Lucian, established his reputation. He became a member of the French Academy in 1691, and of the Academy of Sciences in 1697. He was praised for his clarity and wit, as well as his ability to render complex scientific theories in simple language that could be easily understood even by nonscientists. He was admired by a number of English authors including > Aphra Behn, who in 1688 translated his Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes (A Discovery of New Worlds), and Histoire des oracles (The History of Oracles and the Cheats of the Pagan Priests).

> French literature in England.

Foote, Samuel (1720-77)

Actor, manager and dramatist, born at Truro to a landowning family. He trained for the law, but moved instead, like many of his contemporaries, to the stage. He studied with > Macklin and played the title role in > Othello to Macklin's Iago in 1744. He also acted at the ➤ Smock Alley Theatre in Dublin. In 1747 he leased the 'Little Theatre in the Hay' (> Haymarket Theatres), opening with a piece of his own called The Diversions of the Morning, which proved a great success, and which he followed with more of his own productions. In 1766 a riding accident caused him to lose a leg, but he was acting again only five months later. Out of sympathy, he was given a patent for life at the Haymarket. His plays, mainly social and political satires, include Taste (1752) and The Minor (1760). He was an excellent mimic, and became the subject of legal action by a number of people whom he had imitated on stage. He also wrote two pamphlets on acting and dramatic theory. > Samuel Johnson praised his broad humour and wit, and he was sometimes nicknamed the 'English Aristophanes'.

Ford, Ford Madox (Ford Hermann Hueffer) (1873–1939)

Novelist, critic, poet. His father was of German origin, and became music critic for The Times; his mother was daughter of the ▷ Pre-Raphaelite painter, Ford Madox Brown. Ford was first known as an aesthetic writer of fairy stories, but he became deeply interested in contemporary French writing and culture, and became a propagandist for the rigorous discipline of French art, exercising a strong personal influence on ▷ Joseph Conrad and ▷ Ezra Pound. He co-operated with Conrad on two novels, The Inheritors (1901) and Romance (1903). He was a prolific writer, but is now chiefly remembered for The Good Soldier (1915) and for the four novels known in Britain as The Tietjens Tetralogy (after the name of its hero), and in America as Parade's End: Some Do Not (1924), No More Parades (1925), A Man Could Stand Up (1926), and Last Post (1928). The tetralogy is regarded by some critics as the most memorable fiction about the war of 1914–18 (in which Ford served, although he was 40 on enlistment), and as the most remarkable account of the upheaval in English social values in the decade 1910–20. The Good Soldier is a subtle and ambiguous study of the cruelty, infidelity and madness below the respectable surface of the lives of two couples, and is notable for its use of an ▷ unreliable narrator.

Ford has an undoubted importance in literary history because of his personal influence. As a poet, he played a significant part in the founding of ➤ Imagism. In 1908-9 he was editor of the brilliant but short-lived English Review, to which ▷ Thomas Hardy, ▷ Henry James, ▷ H. G. Wells, Joseph Conrad and the Russian novelist Leo Tolstov all contributed. He was also an early champion of > D. H. Lawrence. Brought up in the relatively narrow Pre-Raphaelite and ▷ aesthetic movements, in the 1900s he was a central figure among the writers who were thinking radically about problems of artistic form, especially in novelwriting. He regarded the 19th-century English novel as too much a product of the accident of genius, and, aligning himself with James and Conrad, was in opposition to H. G. Wells who preferred the title of journalist to that of artist. After World War I he moved to Paris and became part of a circle of expatriate writers, including ▶ James Joyce, Ernest Hemingway and Gertrude Stein. He also founded the Transatlantic Review.

After 1930 his imaginative writing was somewhat neglected but he is now recognized as an important figure of the ▷ modernist movement. Of present-day novelists, he has perhaps had most effect on ▷ Graham Greene. Apart from The Tietjens Tetralogy and The Good Soldier, novels selected for praise include the historical trilogy about Tudor England (The Fifth Queen, 1906; Privy Seal, 1907; The Fifth Queen Crowned, 1908). His Collected Poems were published in 1936.

Bib: Cassell, R. A. (ed.), Ford Madox Ford: Modern Judgements; Green, R., Ford Madox Ford, Prose and Politics; Meixner, J. A., Ford Madox Ford's Novels: A Critical Study; Mizener, A., The Saddest Story (biography); Ohmann, C., Ford Madox Ford: From Apprentice to Craftsman.

Ford, John (1586-?1640)

The best of the ▷ Caroline dramatists. He is best known for two tragedies, ▷ 'Tis Pity She's a Whore and The Broken Heart (1633), and a tragic history play, Perkin Warbeck (1634). Less well known are Lover's Melancholy (1629) and Love's Sacrifice (1633). He collaborated with other dramatists, notably with ▷ Dekker and ▷ Rowley in The Witch of Edmonton (1623). In spite of sensational themes and incidents (eg 'Tis Pity is about incestuous love), Ford's characteristic tone is the melancholy of private, frustrated passion; pathos rather than tragedy. Indeed, late 20th-century criticism has suggested that there are reasoned and serious themes in the plays and that far from being precious, Ford focuses on the moral judgements of his age. Bib: Anderson, Donald K., John Ford; Neill, M. (ed.), John Ford: Critical Re-Visions.

Foregrounding

An idea originating in Russian > Formalism, foregrounding refers to the way literature, despite containing multiple elements, stresses some of them while allowing others to fade into the background. As their name suggests, the Formalists were particularly interested in the formal construction of literature, and the way literature calls attention to its own language use. So for them it is certain features of literary language that are foregrounded and the term therefore has quite a technical sense. But foregrounding is now used more generally, sometimes as a mere jargon word for emphasizing.

Forest of Arden > Arden, Forest of.

Form

In a simple sense, form is opposed to content, but this analytical separation has to be used with caution because, especially in literary works, the way something is said is inseparable from what is said, and the form of a work profoundly influences a reader's response to the content. In discussing form abstractly, however, it is useful to distinguish between forms which are established quite strictly and those with a more flexible organisation. An example of the former kind would be the traditional > sonnet which has very exacting formal requirements. An example of the latter would be a larger ▶ genre such as > tragedy whose > conventions are much more malleable within certain limits. The > Romantic poet > Coleridge, in the early 10th century, proposed a distinction which has been influential. He distinguished between organic and mechanical form. Organic form is when a work's shape and organization evolve in relation to its content (> organicism). Mechanical form, by contrast, is a form determined in advance. The distinction is a useful one, but not absolute, since in practice it is often difficult to label a particular work entirely one or the other. Coleridge himself, for example, wrote a number of free-flowing odes which have an 'organic' feel. But the ode itself is of course an established form with certain expectations. One thing, however, is certain: issues of content in literature can never be separated from a consideration of the formal means by which they are communicated.

Formalism

A general name for a kind of artistic practice or criticism which emphasises form or artistic technique rather than the content of art works. As such, formalism is for many a negative description. There are, however, different varieties of formalist criticism of literature. Two schools have been especially influential in the 20th century. The first of these is the Russian > Formalist school whose work has had a significant impact on recent critical thought. The second is the American movement known as New Criticism which flourished from around 1940 to around 1970. However, probably the most interesting recent work in this area relates the study of literary form to issues of historical content and development. The interest in the work of ⊳ Mikhail Bakhtin, who was himself a contemporary of the Russian Formalists and much influenced by them, is one example. Another is to be found in the work of Raymond Williams and the ▷ 'cultural materialist' and 'new historicist' critics. In Williams' work on drama, for example, he traces the development of modern dramatic forms in their historical evolution and social context showing how form enables and limits the expression of a certain > structure of feeling.

Bib: Thompson, E. M., Russian Formalism and Anglo-American New Criticism; Williams, R., Drama From Ibsen to Brecht.

Forman, Simon (1552-1611)

Astrologer, physician and diarist. This unusual figure is of importance to us because of his casebook or diary and his Book of Plaies, where he recorded personal information about prominent > Elizabethan figures, as well as recounted details from the performances of several plays. For example, he has provided us with material about ➤ Aemilia Lanyer's life, as well as comments about ▶ Shakespeare's ➤ Macbeth, ➤ Cymbeline and ➤ The Winter's Tale. It was Forman's casebook which first gave A. L. Rowse the idea that Lanver was the dark lady of Shakespeare's sonnets. While this hypothesis has little or no verification, Forman's personal revelations and his wide acquaintance with contemporary gossip make his work an important source of ▶ Renaissance social history and biographical detail. Bib: Rowse, A. L., Simon Forman: Sex and Society in Shakespeare's Age.

Forster, E. M. (Edward Morgan) (1879–1970) Novelist. His work is primarily in a realistic mode, and his ideas in the liberal tradition; indeed, much of his work is concerned with the legacy of Victorian middle-class liberalism. He was educated at Tonbridge School (a public school whose ethos is characterized by Sawston in the first two novels) and then at King's College, Cambridge, of which he was later made an honorary fellow. Through contacts made at Cambridge he came to be associated with the ▷ Bloomsbury Group. He travelled in Europe, lived in Italy and Egypt, and spent some years in India, where he was for a time secretary to a rajah after World War I.

Forster's novels are: Where Angels Fear to Tread (1905); The Longest Journey (1907); A Room with a View (1908); > Howards End (1910); > A Passage to India (1924); and Maurice (1971). The last of these, which has a homosexual theme, was published posthumously, as was The Life to Come (1972), a collection of stories, many of which treat the same theme. His other two collections of short stories are: The Celestial Omnibus (1914) and The Eternal Moment (1928). These are mainly early work; they were published in a collected edition in 1947. His high reputation rests mainly on his fiction, but he has also written biographies and essays which are important for understanding his outlook as an imaginative writer. The biography of his friend Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson (1934) is about a Cambridge scholar who was an important leader of liberal political opinion; that of his great-aunt. Marianne Thornton (1956), is enlightening about Forster's background. The Hill of Devi (1953) is an account of his experiences in India. The essays in Abinger Harvest (1936) and Two Cheers for Democracy (1951) include expressions of his opinions about politics, literature and society. Aspects of the Novel (1927) is one of the best-known critical works on the novel form. He co-operated with Eric Crozier on the libretto for Benjamin Britten's opera Billy Budd (1951).

Forster's dominant theme is the habitual conformity of people to unexamined social standards and conventions, and the ways in which this conformity blinds individuals to recognition of what is true in what is unexpected, to the proper uses of the intelligence, and to their own resources of spontaneous life. Spontaneous life and free intelligence also draw on traditions, and Forster shows how English traditions have on the one hand nourished complacency, hypocrisy, and insular philistinism, and on the other hand, humility, honesty, and sceptical curiosity. In several of the novels, and especially in A Passage to India, British culture is contrasted with a foreign tradition which has virtues that the British way of life is without. His style is consistently light and witty, with a use of irony which recalls ▷ Jane Austen and a use of comedy of situation which recalls ➤ George Meredith. A Passage to India stands out from his work for the subtlety and resonance of its symbolism.

Bib: Trilling, L., E. M. Forster; McConkey, J., The Novels of Forster; Bradbury, M. (ed.),

E. M. Forster: A Collection of Critical Essays; Stone, W., The Cave and the Mountain; Furbank, P.N., E. M. Forster: A Life (2 vols).

Forster, Margaret (b 1938)

Novelist. Forster has produced a steady stream of writings since the early 1960s, as well as the screenplay (from her own novel) for one of the classic films of 'Swinging Sixties' London, Georgy Girl (1966, directed by Silvio Narizzano). Her works are broadly feminist, and often centre on a female protagonist or on relationships between women. Her other works include: Dames' Delight (1964); The Bogeyman (1966); The Seduction of Mrs Pendlebury (1974); Mother Can You Hear Me? (1979) and Marital Rites (1982). She has also written biographies of Victorian poet Elizabeth Barrett Browning and of Daphne Du Maurier, and published Significant Sisters: The Grassroots of Active Feminism 1839-1939.

Forsyte Saga, The

A sequence of novels constituting a study of Victorian and Edwardian society by John Galsworthy (1867–1933). They comprise: The Man of Property (1906): The Indian Summer of a Forsyte (1918); In Chancery (1920); Awakening (1920); To Let (1921). A television serialization of the work in 1967 was extremely popular.

Forties, The Hungry

The decade 1840–50, so called because bad harvests caused serious food shortages, leading to mass agitation for abolition of the tax on imported corn (Anti-Corn Law League) and for a more democratic political system (the ➤ Chartist Movement). It was in the years 1845–51 that the Irish Famine took place: about 10 per cent of the population died from hunger and disease, and mass emigration ensued from those remaining.

➤ Corn Laws; Free Trade.

Fortnightly Review, The

The Fortnightly Review was founded in 1865 by, among others, the novelist ▷ Anthony Trollope. It was a vehicle of advanced liberal opinion, and included amongst its contributors the scientist ▷ T.H. Huxley, the political scientist ▷ Walter Bagehot, the positivist philosopher Frederick Harrison, the critics ▷ Matthew Arnold and ▷ Leslie Stephen, the novelists ▷ George Eliot and ▷ George Meredith, the poets ▷ D.G. Rossetti and ▷ Algernon Swinburne, and ▷ Walter Pater and ▷ William Morris, the last two both leaders of social and critical thought.

Forty Shilling Freeholders

The class, outside the towns, who from the 13th century until the ▶ Reform Bill of 1832 possessed the minimum property qualification to vote for a representative in Parliament, or to be elected as one. 'Freeholder' implies owning land, not renting it from another landowner; 'forty shillings' is the annual value of the land.

> Franchise.

Forty-five, The

The rebellion or rising of 1745, ie the second of the two main > Jacobite attempts in the 18th century to regain the throne of Great Britain for the > Catholic branch of the House of > Stuart. It was led by Charles Stuart ('Bonnie Prince Charlie' to his Scottish supporters, the 'Young Pretender' to his enemies), elder son of the claimant James Stuart (the > 'Old Pretender'). Charles succeeded in rousing the Highlands and occupying Edinburgh. He then advanced into England and reached Derby. He had by then attracted very few English supporters, and retreated to Scotland. He was defeated by the Duke of Cumberland in 1746 at the Battle of ➤ Culloden in northern Scotland, but escaped abroad.

Fothergill, Jessie (1851-91)

Novelist, born in Chetham Hill, Manchester. She was sent to boarding school in Harrogate after her father's death, and began her literary career with Healey (1975). Eleven novels followed, including The First Violin (1877), The Lasses of Leverhouses (1888) and her last work, Oriole's Daughter (1893). Much of her fiction concerns romantic involvements between people of different social classes.

➤ Novel of Manners.

Foucault, Michel (1926-84)

Along with ➤ Louis Althusser and ➤ Jacques Derrida, Foucault is one of the most influential of French philosophers whose work has been taken up by the practitioners of other disciplines. Foucault rejects the totalizing explanations of human development in favour of a more detailed analysis of how power functions within particular ➤ discourses. In Madness and Civilization (1965) he explored the historical opposition between 'madness' and 'civilization', applying ➤ Saussure's notion of differentials (> Difference) to the various ways in which society excludes the behaviour which threatens it. He later took this issue up in Discipline and Punish (1977), and I Pierre Riviere (1978). In The Order of Things (1971) and The Archaeology of Knowledge (1972) he investigated the ways in which human knowledge is organized, and the transition from discourses which rely upon a notion of 'self-presence', to those which operate differentially to produce the kind of linguistic self-consciousness characteristic of ⊳ postmodernism. In essays such as those translated in Language, Counter-memory, Practice (1977), he sought to clarify specific areas of opposition through which discourse is constructed. At the time of his death he had embarked on an investigation of the discourses of sexuality through the ages, and the three volumes of The History of Sexuality (1978–87) have now been published.

Four P's, The (1568)

One of the amusing > interludes written by > John Heywood. It begins with a competition between a palmer, a pardoner and an apothecary, judged by a pedlar, to find the best liar.

Four Quartets (1935-42)

Four poems written between 1935 and 1942 by > T. S. Eliot, eventually published as a single work. They are contemplative, religious poems, each concerned with a distinct aspect of spiritual experience. Each has as its symbolic centre a place; each uses symbolically one of the four 'elements' of medieval physics; each has a structure analogous to the movements and the instruments of a musical quartet; the theme that unites the four is that of the human consciousness in relation to time and the concept of eternity. Burnt Norton (the element of air) centres on the rose garden of a ruined country house (Burnt Norton) in Gloucestershire and plays on the differences and relationships between the actual present, the past in memory, and speculation on what might have been. East Coker (earth) is based on a village in Somerset, whence the poet's ancestors derived, and it includes quotations from The Governor (1531) by > Sir Thomas Elvot; the poem is concerned with man as part of the process of nature. Dry Salvages (water) is named after rocks off the coast of Massachusetts; the poem is concerned with racial time and memory, larger than the time of history and of the seasons, and embracing the more unconscious regions of the mind. > Little Gidding (fire) derives its title from the religious community in the reign of Charles I, who is supposed to have visited it when broken by defeat at the battle of Naseby. Fire in this poem is used as destruction (with reference to the raids on London during World War II), purification, illumination, and as an emblem of Divine Love.

Four Quartets was Eliot's last major work in non-dramatic poetry; the remainder of his career was devoted to poetic drama.

▶ Gardner, Helen. Bib: Drew, E., T. S. Eliot: The Design of his Poetry.

Fourteenth of July

The French annual national festival, dating from the storming of the Bastille, a state prison in Paris, on 14 July 1789. This was the first triumph of the ▷ French Revolution, and marked the end of the ▷ Ancien Régime.

Fourth Estate, The

Traditionally, and for political purposes, English society was thought until the 20th century to have three estates: the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, the commons. ➤ Carlyle alludes to a Fourth Estate, ie the press, implying that the newspapers have an essential role in the political functions of society. He attributed the phrase to the 18th-century statesman ➤ Edmund Burke.

Fowles, John (b 1926)

Novelist. Born in Essex and educated at Oxford University. His novels are: The Collector (1963); The Magus (1965; revised edition 1977); The French Lieutenant's Woman (1969); Daniel Martin (1977); Mantissa (1982); A Maggot (1985). He is an experimental writer, interested in the nature of fiction and its interaction with history and reality, but he combines this with a skill in story-telling and an ability to create compelling characters and a vivid sense of social context. Several of his novels have been bestsellers, and three: The Collector, The Magus and The French Lieutenant's Woman have been filmed. His reception by the critics had tended to be more enthusiastic in the U.S.A. than in Britain. The recurrent concerns of his novels are the power of repressive convention and social conformity, the enigmatic nature of sexual relations, the desire to manipulate and control and the problem of individual freedom. The last of these concerns reflects the influence of existentialism.

The Collector, the story of the kidnapping of an attractive and wealthy girl by an introverted clerk, is in part a study of a pathological desire for possession, and in part a fable about social deprivation. It is in three parts, the first and last narrated by the man, and the second by the girl. Fowles' novels are highly allusive: The Magus, like The Collector, employs parallels with Shakespeare's The Tempest. It also draws on the literary archetype of the quest in its story of a young man who travels to a Greek island where he is lured by a series of magical illusions into a confrontation with existential uncertainty and freedom of choice. The French Lieutenant's Woman employs parody of 19th-century novelistic style, quotations from sociological reports, from > Darwin, Marx, ➤ Arnold and Tennyson, and authorial interruptions. Fowles' belief in the fundamental uncertainty of existence is reflected in his use of open endings; in The Magus the future of the main characters is 'another mystery' and The French Lieutenant's Woman has a choice of endings. Daniel Martin is more realist than his earlier work, exploiting his descriptive skill in a range of settings: it has less of the element of mystery and a more clearly affirmative ending. He has also written a volume of short stories, The Ebony Tower (1974) and works of non-fiction, including: Islands (1978); The Tree (1979); The Enigma of Stonehenge (1980) and Land (1985).

Bib: Conradi, P., John Fowles; Loveday, S., The Romances of John Fowles; Woodcock, B., Male Mythologies: John Fowles and Masculinity.

Fox, Charles James (1749-1806) Principal leader of the Whig party from 1775 (the beginning of the ➤ American War of Independence) until his death. The crown was not then above politics and the Tories, almost continuously in power during the same period, had the support of George III. Fox's fearless opposition in the House of Commons to the policies of the government in America, in ➤ Ireland and in regard to the ➤ French Revolution caused the king to refuse his offer of participation in the government in 1804, when he became convinced of the rightness of the war against France. Fox was dissolute in private life but set a high standard of political independence of mind. His principal political opponents were the Prime Ministers Lord North during the American war and ➤ William Pitt the Younger during the French one. Though powerful in opposition, he was less effective in office; but his service as Foreign Secretary in the Whig governments of 1782 and 1806 was too brief to show results.

Fox, George (1624-91)

Religious leader. He founded the Society of Friends (> Quakers), and left a journal of his spiritual experience, published in 1694. Apart from its religious importance, Fox's journal is one of the classics amongst the English diaries. In 1669 he married > Margaret Fell, a Quaker pamphleteer.

Bib: Foulds, E. V., George Fox and the Valiant Sixty.

Foxe, John (1516-87)

Author of the Book of Martyrs; this was the title under which it was popularly known; the correct title of the 1st edition (1563) was Acts and Monuments of these latter and perilous days. Foxe was a Puritan who first set out to write a history of Christian martyrdom in Latin. The first outline dealt chiefly with the 14th-century reformers, the English John Wycliffe (?1320-84) and the Bohemian John Huss. In 1554 he went abroad to escape persecution under the Catholic > Mary, and completed his book there. The English version is fierce and eloquent, and had immense sales; for generations it inspired hatred for ➤ Catholicism in Britain, and was read alongside the Bible by simple folk who read little else. It is a classic of popular prose in the Elizabethan period.

> Reformation.

Bib: Olsen, V. N., John Foxe and the Elizabethan Church.

Frame, Janet (b 1942) New Zealand novelist and short-story writer. Her collection of stories, The Lagoon (1951), and her trilogy of novels Owls Do Cry (1957), Faces in the Water (1961) and The Edge of the Alphabet (1962) are about childhood innocence and the imagination, both threatened by bereavement and a repressive society. Scented Gardens for the Blind (1963) and The Adaptable Man (1965) explore the limitations and potentialities of language. Of her later work, Intensive Care (1970), written while Frame was in the U.S.A., draws on the horrors of the Vietnam War for a visionary satire on the place of war in the New Zealand consciousness. Her other novels are: Living in the Maniototo (1979); A State of Siege (1982); and The Carpathians (1988). Other story collections: You Are Now Entering the Human Heart (1983). She has also written three volumes of autobiography, and the 1991 film, An Angel at my Table (dir. Jane Campion), was based on her life and books.

Frame narrative, first-order narrative, extradiegetic narrative

Terms used for the outside or first narrative in a fiction, where this encloses a second-order narrative. For example, ▷ Conrad's ▷ Heart of Darkness has a frame narrative of a group of men sitting on a boat on the Thames; one of them, Marlow, narrates a second-order narrative about his experiences in Africa.

narratology

Francis, Anne (1738-1800)

Poet and translator. Anne Francis was a distinguished scholar; she had a > classical education, learning Latin, Greek and Hebrew. After her marriage to Revd Robert Francis, she published a translation of the Song of Solomon (1781) which she also edited, and in 1785 she brought out The Obsequies of Demetrius Poliorcetes, which reworked some of Plutarch's writing. Francis was also an admirer of > Goethe and wrote Charlotte to Werther: A Poetical Epistle (1787) as a vehicle for defending him against what she felt were unjust accusations. Several more personal works remain, for example the elegies and odes to her family published in Miscellaneous Poems (1790). In light of this detailed and scholarly activity, it is surprising that Francis should think that such work was 'an improper undertaking for a moman' (Preface to the Song of Solomon).

Frankenstein, or the Modern Prometheus (1817) A philosophical romance which is also a tale of terror, by ▷ Mary Shelley. It belongs in part to the 'Gothic' tradition popular at the time and partly to a philosophical tradition going back to ▷ Rousseau, concerned with themes of isolation, suffering and social injustice. Mary Shelley originally wrote it to compete with the tales of terror being composed for their own amusement by her lover and later husband, ▶ P. B. Shelley and their friend, the poet ➤ Lord Byron. Frankenstein is a Swiss student of natural philosophy who constructs a monster and endows it with life. Its impulses are benevolent, but it is everywhere regarded with loathing and fear; its benevolence turns to hatred, and it destroys its creator and his bride. Versions of and sequels to the story have been a regular feature in the cinema from the days of silent film to Kenneth Branagh's Frankenstein (1994). Indeed, the English actor Boris Karloff (1887-1969) was able to found a career in the movies on his memorable performance as the Creature, for Universal Studios in the 1930s. Alongside the plethora of adaptations (and travesties) of Bram Stoker's novel > Dracula, Frankenstein offers the most popular example of what might be termed the persistence of the Gothic.

▶ Gothic novels.

Bib: Hammond, R., The Modern Frankenstein: Fiction Becomes Fact; Baldick, C., In Frankenstein's Shadow: Myth, Monstrosity and Nineteenth-century Writing.

Franklin's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. The Franklin suggests that his tale derives from old, insular narrative sources and introduces it as a lay which formerly circulated amongst 'olde, gentil, Britons'. In fact the tale seems to be drawn from Italian sources (from a narrative recounted by ▷ Boccaccio), which have been given a British gloss by Chaucer.

The narrative focusses on the strains placed on the marital vows of Dorigen and Arveragus, when Dorigen, unwittingly, pledges herself to her unwelcome suitor, Aurelius. Aurelius is able to fulfil Dorigen's 'impossible' condition for accepting him as a lover with the help of a clerk-magician, who appears to make the black rocks off Brittany's coast disappear. The chain of interlocking vows is broken when Arveragus and Aurelius cede their claim to exclusive rights over Dorigen's body. The clerk-magician also cedes his claim for payment for his services. The narrator concludes with a question to the audience about who was the most 'free' in the tale.

▶ Breton Lays.

Fraser, Antonia (b 1932)

Novelist and historian. Antonia Fraser is a popular writer of historical ▷ biographies, who has done much to make the lives of famous figures in British history accessible to a wide audience. Her works are meticulously researched but have been criticized for lacking historical context and finally offering a selective reading of British history. She is now married to the dramatist ▷ Harold Pinter, with whom she continues to campaign vigorously for the arts in Great Britain. She has been a member of the > Arts Council, and is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature. Her works include: Mary Queen of Scots (1969); A History of Toys (1966); Cromwell, Our Chief of Men (1973); King Charles II (1979); and The Weaker Vessel: Woman's Lot in the 17th Century (1984). Her fiction includes Quiet as a Nun (1977) and The Wild Island: A Mystery (1978).

Fraser's Magazine

It started in 1830 as an imitator of Blackmood's, but after the mid-19th century it became Liberal. It published ▷ Thomas Carlyle's ▷ Sartor Resartus in 1833-4; at this time it was under the influence of S.T. Coleridge's (1772–1834) Conservative philosophy. In 1848 it published ▷ Charles Kingsley's novel of idealistic reform, Yeast. The historian J.A. Froude was its editor 1861-74, and tried to publish ▷ Ruskin's radical treatise on the nature of wealth, Munera Pulveris (1862-3), but this proved unpopular with the public, and the treatise was left unfinished. ▷ William Allingham was its editor between 1874 and 1879. The magazine folded in 1882.

Frayn, Michael (b 1933)

British dramatist and novelist. His first plays, Jamie (1968) and Birthdays (1969) were written for television. Since then he has acquired a reputation both as a leading comic writer for the stage, particularly with his production of Noises Off (1982), and an important translator of ➤ Chekhov's plays. Other plays include: The Two of Us (1970); The Sandboy (1971); Alphabetical Order (1975); Donkeys' Years (1976); Clouds (1976); Liberty Hall (1980); Make and Break (1980); Benefactors (1984). Translations: The Cherry Orchard (1978); The Fruits of Enlightenment (1979); Three Sisters (1983); Number One (1984); Wild Honey (1984); The Seagull (1986); Uncle Vanya (1988); Look Look (1990); and Here (1993). Novels include: The Tin Men (1965); The Russian Interpreter (1966); Towards the End of the Morning (1967); A Very Private Life (1968); Sweet Dreams (1973).

Frazer, Sir James G. (1854–1915)
Anthropologist. His Golden Bough (1890–1915; abridged edition 1922) is a vast study of ancient mythology; it influenced 20th-century poetry such as T.S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922). Other publications include: Totemism (1887); Adonis, Attis, Osiris, Studies in the History of Oriental Religion (1906); Totemism and Exogamy (1910); Folklore in the Old Testament (1918). Frazer was a major influence on the development of 20th-century anthropology and psychology, and in addition edited works by William Cowper (1731–1800) and Joseph Addison (1672–1719).

Free indirect discourse A technique whereby a narrative reports the speech or thoughts of a character, referring to that character in the third person but adopting the character's own idiom. Free indirect discourse thus falls between direct speech (or thought), which quotes a character's words verbatim, and reported speech (or thought), which paraphrases the speech or thoughts of the character in the idiom of the ▷ narrator. When free indirect discourse is used there is often a productive ambiguity as to which judgements are attributable to the character and which to the narrator and/or ▷ implied author. Also known as free indirect speech and (using the French term) as style indirect libre.

Free verse

A way of writing poetry without use of > rhyme, > stanza pattern, or > metre. Free verse perhaps had French origins; at all events it is often referred to as vers libre. It was practised, especially in the first 30 years of this century, in an attempt to escape from the rather mechanical uses of rhyme and metre by the late romantics. > T. S. Eliot attacked the whole concept of free verse, declaring that it could only be defined by negatives (no rhyme, etc.) and that a genuine form would have a positive definition (Reflections on Vers Libre; 1917); 'But the most interesting verse which has vet been written in our language has been done either by taking a very simple form, like the iambic pentameter, and constantly withdrawing from it, or taking no form at all, and constantly approximating to a very simple one.' Eliot himself was as bold as any of his contemporaries in rhythmic experimentation, but his methods are clearly one or other of the two which he here describes. Bib: Hartman, C., Free Verse.

French literature in England

The history of relations between English and French literature is long and complex, dating from the times before the Norman ➤ Conquest, when Latin was the lingua franca.

Later, in the 12th century Chrétien de Troyes' romances, as well as Marie de France's Lais, jointly suppose a sophisticated readership acquainted with Arthurian (> Arthur, King) background and named settings, usually in southern England and Wales. This period was one of intense literary activity which benefited England through the marriage of ➤ Henry II with Eleanor of Aquitaine. The civilization of the southern French courts became available throughout England and elsewhere in Europe fuelled the revolution in courtly attitudes which was to affect the Italian poets > Dante and > Petrarch. The English vernacular itself resorted recognition as a means of securing its own achievements. Such imitative activity reaches an apogee with > Chaucer. If his prioress spoke her French 'after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe', Chaucer himself was more fully conversant, as is attested by The Book of the Duchess, > The House of Fame and > The Merchant's Tale, the last itself stimulated by the popularity of the lai (> Lay). Similar observations could be made about ▷ Sir Thomas Malory's contacts with France. At the same time. Chaucer translated Guillaume de Lorris' > Le Roman de la Rose and in the later > Middle Ages there are also adaptations and translations of earlier epic and romance works. Thus the history of the cross-Channel literary flow from France to England is to no small degree the history of the translations and adaptations undergone by French literature.

The influence of Petrarch, felt early on both sides of the Channel, was prolonged by the Italian vogue prevalent in France in the 1550s-70s and compounded by the English admiration for Pierre de Ronsard. Ronsard's love poetry found favour with the ➤ Renaissance sonneteers, Henry Constable (1562-1613), ▷ Samuel Daniel and ➤ Thomas Lodge among them. ➤ Spenser's cultivation of the 16th-century French poet > Joachim Du Bellay is untypical of his age. However, it is noticeable that poetry is the favoured genre for imitation, possibly because in France itself it is at once the most deeply exploited and the most cohesively organized. Of French drama there is no trace in England; and the fortunes of prose are the fortunes of translation, as represented most momentously in ➤ Shakespeare's recourse to ➤ John Florio for > Montaigne's essay Des Cannibales for > The Tempest. Yet while Montaigne can unquestionably be said to have had a hand in shaping the English essay form, > Rabelais leaves more elusive traces and to discern his equivalent in English literature, one has to look as close to the Renaissance as Sir John Harington (?1560-1612), > Thomas Nashe and ➤ Samuel Butler, and as far forward as ➤ Laurence Sterne and ➤ James Joyce.

Florio and Sir Thomas Urquhart (1611-60) -Rabelais' 17th-century translator - are authors in their own right. At the same period, Joshua Sylvester's (c 1563-1618) translation of Guillaume de Salluste Du Bartas was no less influential. In the later 17th and early 18th centuries, translations were supplemented by (undistinguished) adaptations, notably those which represent the barest throes of imitation of French classical drama. One such adaptation was ➤ Ambrose Philip's The Distrest Mother (1712), behind which stands ➤ Racine's Andromague (1667). Its success is recounted in ➤ Samuel Johnson's Life of Philips, a success greater than the original would have had in England at that time. This exemplifies a measure of the degree to which the Restoration was culturally as well as politically out of sympathy with French classical idiom. It was left to ▷ Dryden to put > Corneille back on the literary agenda, while English > comedy of manners was indebted to ➤ Molière. ➤ Alexander Pope and Johnson, in the following century, attended to the criteria of taste laid down by > Nicholas Boileau and René Rapin (1621-87).

If the ➤ Augustans turned to French precedents in their search for prescriptive aesthetics and decorum, the rise of the novel in England provided models for French writers both > Jean Jacques Rousseau (La Nouvelle Héloïse, 1765) and Pierre Laclos (Les Liaisons Dangereuses 1782) explored the epistolary form developed by > Samuel Richardson, while ➤ Laurence Stern's ➤ Tristram Shandy (1759-67) established the ludic and parodic mode (itself derived in part from Rabelais) which Denis Diderot (1713-84) adopted in Jacques le Fataliste (1773).

Diderot was also one of the prime movers behind the collective project of the > Encyclopédie, a platform for rationalist ideas which provided some of the intellectual foundations for the > American War of Independence of 1776, the > French Revolution of 1789, and contemporary political dissidence in England and Ireland. Rousseau also contributed articles to the Encyclopédie, but it was his autobiographical writings which were to exert an abiding influence on the first- and second-generation ➤ Romantics – William Wordsworth's ➤ The Prelude explores at greater length the themes of time and subjectivity broached in the Rêveries d'un Promeneur Solitaire (1778), devoting more space to both the role of the imagination and the interaction between self and social environment, while ➤ Lord Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812-18) and ▶ Percy Bysshe Shelley's The Triumph of Life (1822) both interrogate the legacy of their Swiss precursor.

Byron's portrayal of mal du siècle restlessness and tortured sexuality through a combination of the exotic travel narrative and Gothic locations also recalls Vicomte François René de Chateaubriand's René (1802), with its sibling incest plot and New World frame. Chateaubriand (1768-1848) was one of the first 19th-century French historians of English literature (Essai sur la Littérature Anglaise, 1836), and much of French Romanticism developed under the shadow of the second-generation English Romantics, particularly Byron, whose combination of melancholic self-dramatization and emancipatory politics appealed to Victor Hugo and Alphonse Marie Louis de Lamartime (1790-1869).

The ➤ Gothic mode was also to play a considerable role in 19th-century France. While the dissident rationalism of ➤ William Godwin (Caleb Williams, 1794) and ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft (Mary, 1788) attacked the monstrosity of the old regime and the disillusioned radical Romanticism of > Mary Shelley (> Frankenstein, 1818) suggested the monstrous potential of failed revolution, Gothic fiction in France was to receive a psychological inflection in the conte fantastique. In the mid-19th century Gothic was re-imported into France through the work of the American ▷ Edgar Allan Poe, translated by both ▷ Charles Pierre Baudelaire and Stephane Mallarmé, who tended to stress the macabre and formalistic aspects of his work respectively.

The main mode of prose fiction in 19thcentury France was of course the realist novel. Although given a kind of programme by the critic Champfleury in 1857, ▷ realism never designated a school proper and the French novel of the period retains traces of Romanticism in its delineation of society and history, largely through its reliance on young male protagonists driven by ambition for social success. In ⊳ Stendhal, heroes of energy and imagination who incarnate a kind of principle of unpredictability are crushed by a conformist society which perceives them as a threat (Le Rouge et le Noir, 1831). Since, for Stendhal, realism as a mode is implicated in the reproduction of conformist modes of behaviour, the novel form is subject to self-conscious parody and irony.

Such irony is absent from Honoré de Balzac, whose aspiration to be History's secretary led to the conception and execution of the vast social panorama of La Comédie Humaine (1829-55). The cycle of novels attempts to provide a taxonomy of existing social types as well as a study of social mobility during the Restoration and the July Monarchy. As a whole, the cycle is characterized by a kind of tension between an interpretative and classificatory project premised upon the immediate legibility of signs of social class and character on the one hand and the demands of melodramatic plot requiring the mystery and suspense of deferred legibility on the other. The mixture of documentary and melodrama, together with the use of names to reveal and conceal essences, forms an obvious parallel with the work of ▷ Dickens, in spite of the gulf between Balzac's conservative cynicism and the English novelist's reformist pathos.

If Stendhal and Balzac retain certain Romantic traits, > Gustave Flaubert's work, in contrast, represents a devastating critique of Romanticism - its valorization of the self and affect are debunked as a symptom of the stupidity of received opinion (bêtise). Thus Emma Bovary in Madame Bovary (1856) is a victim of having read too much > Walter Scott, whose work engenders in her an insatiable desire to imitate impossible models, leading to serial affairs, compulsive consumption, mounting debts and then suicide as her creditors begin to close in. Although Flaubert's early work seems to attempt to escape the logic of bêtise, his later work implies that no such escape is possible. This ultimately leads to his collation of a dictionary of received opinions, quoted deadpan without quotation marks (Dictionnaire des Idées Reçues, 1880). His last novel L'Education Sentimentale (1869), set during the revolutions of 1848, tells the (non) story of a failed generation, where no-one learns anything from the past and any notion of the genuine or the original is expunged, to the extent that the very possibility of the new is denied through 'revolutions' which are no more than cycles of repetition and devaluation. But Flaubert's technical approach allows the possibility that even this end-of-politics/endof-history thesis may itself be nothing more than another example of received opinion. Such ambiguity is fostered through the systematic use of devices such as point of view and free indirect style, which disoriginate the voice of the narrative and question the authority of its statements. So although Flaubert was received by English contemporaries as a realist dealing with subjects such as provincial adultery, his rejection of the convention of discreet thirdperson omniscient narration actually served to undermine the technical basis of realism and it is this technical legacy to later writers such as ➤ Henry James and ➤ Virginia Woolf which has since identified him as a proto-modernist.

The realist tradition was extended instead by the > Naturalist movement and in particular by the work of Emile Zola. The Rougon-Macquart cycle (1871–93) in a sense repeats the Balzacian project of a total description of society, but in terms of a different politics and a different science. Zola's liberal socialist politics were accompanied by a belief in environmental and biological determinism, hence his adoption of a family tree as a compositional schema. The picture of Second Empire France which emerges through this exercise in genealogy is not one of Balzacian energy but one of a society in entropic decay, degenerating inexorably into chaos. Hence the closing image of La Bête Humaine (1890) - a driverless train full of drunken soldiers hurtling towards inevitable destruction, just as the imperial regime plunges into defeat in the Franco-Prussian War. Arguably, though, Zola's influence on subsequent writers lies elsewhere. His interest in socialization and heredity, particularly with regard to workingclass communities, was not only documentary and political but also sensationalist. Technically conventional, his first major novel Thérèse Raquin (1867) tells a story of triangular adultery and murder motivated by sex and money, thereby establishing the paradigm for much 20th-century popular narrative in book and film. In terms of immediate impact, Zola's concern with contemporary social problems was taken up by writers such as ⊳ George Gissing and Arthur Morrison (1836-1945) in England Theodore Dreiser (1871-1945) and Frank Norris (1870-1902) in America.

Compared with English literature, there is a relative dearth of canonical woman novelists in 19th-century France. Revisions of the canon are in the process of redressing this, notably in the case of ▷ George Sand (1804–76), whose early novels centre on a critique of the oppressive nature of bourgeois marriage. Indiana (1832), the story of a West Indian woman married to an older European man explores the overlapping injustices of colonialism and patriarchy which later formed the backdrop to ▷ Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847) and the subject of ▷ Jean Rhys' prequel to Brontë, Wide Sargasso Sea (1966).

Realism in its ➤ Naturalist guise was followed and eroded by the Symbolist novel, whose best-known exponent is Joris-Karl Huysmans (1848–1907). The episodic structure of A Rebours (1884), the story of a hypochondriac recluse amassing an eclectic collection of rare artefacts, reduces plot to a pretext for a catalogue of precious objects and rarefied experience. The novel was to become a cult text among ➤ Decadents on both sides of the Channel, and is cited by ➤ Oscar Wilde in The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890).

For the English Decadents, the most important French poet of the 19th century was > Charles Baudelaire, and his reputation has survived even if the reasons for it have changed. Together with Théophile Gautier (1811-1872), he helped develop the aesthetic of art-for-art's-sake, translating his anti-Romantic allergy to nature into a cult of the artificial and the unnatural in his major collection Les Fleurs du Mal (1857). The emphasis on the 'unnatural' determined the lesbian and sadomasochistic content which appealed to the Decadents (> Algernon Swinburne, Arthur Symons), while the concern with the artificial led to an exploration of the fragmentary character of modern urban life, which was to influence the modernist project of ▷ T. S. Eliot.

Baudelaire's poetry was relatively conventional in form, and innovation in this area began modestly with Paul Verlaine's insistence on the musicality of verse ('Art Poétique', 1874), a paradigmatic emphasis echoed by Walter Pater ('School of Giorgione', 1873) and later transformed into the basis of formalist aesthetics (Roger Fry, Clive Ball). More radical change came with the experimental and iconoclastic work of Arthur Rimbaud (Illuminations, published 1886) whose prose poetry and fragmentary imagery prefigures the modernism of Eliot and Ezra Pound.

Equally but more quietly radical was the work of Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–1898), whose dense hermetic sonnets enact the poet's effort to control meaning, to close the gap between signifier and signified, sound and sense, through rigorous overdetermination of structure and syntax. Mallarmé was eventually to acknowledge the futility of his attempt to eliminate the arbitrary from language in his last great work, Un Coup de Dés Jamais N'Abolira le Hasard (published 1914). In 1890s England, Mallarmé was assimilated to art-for-art's-sake, providing a model for some of > William Butler Yeats' early work. But his recognition of the paradoxical necessity of chance was to provide the starting point for the Surrealist celebration of the arbitrary in écriture automatique.

The Surrealist emphasis on the random encounter and chance juxtaposition as a privileged means of access to the unconscious proposed a perceptual revolution derived in part from Rimbaud. This appealed both to artists in other European countries (including in England Hugh Sykes Davis, Ronald Penrose and David Gascoyne) and to non-metropolitan francophone writers such as the Martinican poet Aimé Césaire, who saw in Surrealism a means of articulating the divided identity and experience of colonized cultures.

A further source of Surrealism was ➤ Andre Gide's notion of the acte gratuit, the kind of unmotivated acts which punctuate many of his narratives. In a sense, the prime acte gratuit for Gide was writing itself, since many of his texts revolve around the problem of motivating their own narration, hence his early use of first-person forms and his later turn to multiple-perspectives self-reflexivity (Les Faux-Monnayeurs, 1924). Similar techniques can be found in > Marcel Proust's A la Recherche du Temps Perdu (1913-27), where minute attention to the detail of subjective consciousness ultimately leads to the fragmentation of the unitary identity of character and event. Of the ▷ Bloomsbury group, ▷ E. M. Forster shared Gide's criticism of the oppressiveness of convention and his interest in contingency, while Woolf, like Proust, sought to develop a style adequate to the modern experience of time and consciousness. All four writers explored the volatility of sexual identity in different ways. Surrealism emerged from World War II largely discredited through the American exile of its major exponents and > Existentialism quickly became the hegemonic movement of the 1950s. > Jean-Paul Sartre's belief in the possibility and ethical necessity of self-definition through action proved a liberating notion for a generation, in France and elsewhere. Its anti-essentialism proved a useful resource both for the groundbreaking theoretical feminism of ⊳ Simone De Beauvoir (Le Deuxième Sexe, 1949) and for Frantz Fanon's critique of colonialism (Peau Noire, Masques Blancs, 1962). It also provided an initial context for the writing of Jean Genet, whose analysis of the interdependent relations between identity, power and desire were to anticipate the theoretical work of ⊳ Michel Foucault at the same time as his characteristic combination of polished style and tabooed content (Journal d'un Voleur, 1949) was to influence much later gay writing within and outside France.

The post-war ➤ Theatre of the Absurd stressed among other themes the reversibility of power relations (Genêt's Le Balcon, 1956), the arbitrariness and unreliability of language (Eugene Ionesco's La Leçon, 1951), and the theme of survival/living on through repetition with minimal variation (▷ Beckett's Fin de Partie, 1953). The drama of Nathalie Sarraute (b 1902) and Marguerite Duras (b 1914) dwells on pregnant silence in ways which echo ▷ Harold Pinter's work.

In a sense, the > nouveau roman marks the culmination of a movement towards selfreflexibility which began with Gide and Proust, foregrounding the medium to the exclusion of most other content, hence Alain Robbe-Grillet's circular detective story which is also a story of writing and erasure, remembering and forgetting (Les Gommes, 1953). The nouveau roman is often closely identified with the development of structuralism in the human sciences. Fundamental to structuralism is the idea that identity has no substantive content, since it is constituted by differential relations within a systematic structure (that of kinship for human identity, that of language for the identity of meaning). Towards the end of the 1960s, structuralism developed into > poststructuralism when it was pointed out that a structure of differential relations extends infinitely and is thus a structure without structure (a structure which is not a finite bounded whole). The major figures associated with structuralism included Claude Lévi-Strauss (b 1908) and > Roman Jakobson (1896–1982), while post-structuralism encompassed a younger generation of thinkers including ➤ Jacques Derrida (b 1930) and Gilles Deleuze (b 1930). The careers of figures such as ➤ Jacques Lacan (1901-81), Michel Foucault (1926-84) and the single most influential French literary critic of the period in the Anglo-Saxon world ➤ Roland Barthes (1915–80) demonstrate their involvement in both projects. Broadly, in literary criticism, structuralism advanced a critique of the 'referential illusion', of realism, stressing the arbitrary relationship between a sign and what it refers to. This resulted in an attention to the autonomy and self-reflexivity of the text: Post-structuralism insists instead upon the arbitrary relationship, within the sign, between signifier and signified, word and meaning. This has resulted in some cases in the generation of an endless free play of self-cancelling meanings from a given text. Important precursors of post-structuralism include Georges Bataille (1897-1962) with his emphasis on the necessary self-immolation of identity and meaning and Maurice Blanchot (b 1907) with his stress on the impersonal and silent unworking of the work of art.

Perhaps the most important application of the critique of structuralism has been within the theory and practice of écriture feminine, the experimental development of kinds of writing which refuse to signify within a closed patriarchal system of meaning and seek instead to subvert language and the gender-identities constructed through it. Important figures here include > Hélène Cixous (b 1937) and Monique Wittig (b 1935), whose experimentalism has clearly influenced both the theoretical agenda of British feminism, and the work of writers such as > Angela Carter (1940–92) and > Jeanette Winterson (b 1959). The contemporary French woman writer best-known in England is probably Marguerite Duras, whose explorations of cultural difference and apocalytic history (Hiroshima mon Amour, 1959) focus on traumatized subjectivity condemned to compulsive repetition (Le Ravissement de Lol V. Stein, 1964).

Other contemporary work which share concerns with recent French theory include

> John Fowles' self-reflexive and unresolved novels (The Magus, 1966/77, The French Lieutenant's Woman, 1969), Graham Swift's meditation on revolution and the end of history (Waterland, 1983) and > Peter Ackroyd's commitment to pastiche and quotation (The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde, 1984). More self-conscious engagements with the French tradition include > Julian Barnes' Flaubert's Parrot (1984), an account of a doctor's obsession with the author, and Angela Carter's Black Venus (1985), a re-telling of the story of Baudelaire's Creole mistress Jeanne Duval.

Like England, France is, in spite of its official reluctance to recognize itself as such, a post-colonial and multi-cultural nation, so the growth in recent British Asian writing (> Salman Rushdie Midnight Children, 1981, Hanif Kureishi's The Buddha of Suburbia, 1990) is echoed by the development of fiction written by French-resident or French-born (beur) Maghrebian Arabs (Tahar Ben Jellour's La Nuit Sacrée, 1987). Metropolitan connections with former or current overseas territories also form the context for the work of francophone Maghrebian and Caribbean writers such as Abdelkebir Khatibi and Edouard Glissant (b 1928), whose emphasis on cultural hybridity finds a parallel in the work of non-metropolitan anglophone writers such as ➤ Derek Walcott (b 1930).

Bib: Denis Hollier (Ed.), A New History of French Literature (1989).

French Revolution (1789-94)

The immediate effect of the French Revolution was to abolish the French monarchy, to reduce forever the rigid class divisions of French society, and to begin wars (lasting till 1815) which for the time being extensively altered the map of Europe. Its lasting effect was to inspire the European mind with the belief that change is historically inevitable and static order unnatural, and to imbue it with modern ideas of democracy, nationalism and equality at least of opportunity.

The immediate effect on England was confusing, for many of the changes being brought about in France had already occurred here in the 17th century, especially the establishment of the sovereignty of the elected representatives of the people in > Parliament in 1688. Such changes had occurred here, however, without the same upheavals, partly because English society and politics had always been more fluid

French Revolution (1789-94)

The immediate effect of the French Revolution was to abolish the French monarchy, to reduce forever the rigid class division of French society, and to begin wars (lasting till 1815) which for the time being extensively altered the map of Europe. Its lasting effect was to inspire the European mind with the belief that change is historically inevitable and static order unnatural, and to imbue it with modern ideas of democracy, nationalism and equality, at least of opportunity.

The immediate effect on England was confusing, for many of the changes being brought about in France had already occurred here in the 17th century, especially the establishment of the sovereignty of the elected representatives of the people in Parliament in 1688. Such changes had occurred here, however, without the same upheavals, partly because English society and politics had always been more fluid than in the other larger states of Europe, and though unjustified privileges and inequalities existed, there were few definable between the Whigs on the left who were neutral or sympathetic to the revolution, and the Tories on the right who feared it from the start. Only when General Bonaparte took increasing charge of France and became Emperor Napoleon I in 1804 did Britain become united in fear of French aggression. However, ▷ Edmund Burke published in 1790 his > Reflections on the Revolution in France, one of the most eloquent documents of English political thinking, foretelling the disasters which the Revolution was to bring, and condemning it as ruthless surgery on the living organism of society. His opponent > Tom Paine answered him with The Rights of Man (1791), and the younger intellectuals agreed with Paine. > Wordsworth wrote later in The Prelude 'Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive', and William Blake wore a revolutionary cockade in the streets; Robert Southey and > Coleridge planned the ideal communist society, Pantisocracy; the philosophic novelist ▶ William Godwin published Political Justice and Caleb Williams to prove that reason was the only guide to conduct and society needed by man. Later Wordsworth and Coleridge came round to a view closer to Burke's, and the vounger generation, ▷ Byron and ▷ Shelley, saw them as traitors; the more so because the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo introduced a phase of political and social repression everywhere. But the older generation (except perhaps Southey) did not so much go back on their earlier enthusiasms as think them out more deeply; the philosophical conservatism of the older Coleridge was as radical in its thinking as the ▷ Utilitarianism of the philosophical radicals, ▷ Bentham and James and ▷ John Stuart Mill. Fear of revolution, prompted by the French model, is evident in ▷ Dickens' novel ▷ A Tale of Two Cities.

Frequency

One of the five categories in which \triangleright Genette analyses narrative discourse, frequency is concerned with the relationship between how many times a fictional event took place, and how many times it is narrated. Frequency, \triangleright duration and \triangleright order are matters of temporal arrangement or 'tense'; the other two categories are \triangleright mood \triangleright voice.

Frere, John Hookham (1769–1846)
Friend of the statesman ▷ George Canning and British envoy in Lisbon and later Madrid in the first decade of the 19th century. He collaborated with ▷ Robert Southey on his translation of The Chronicles of the Cid (1808) contributed extensively to The Anti-Jacobin (▷ Jacobin) and was one of the founders of ▷ The Quarterly Review. His mock-romantic Arthurian poem, The Monks and the Giants (1817–18), written under the pseudonym 'Whistlecraft' introduced ▷ Lord Byron to the ▷ ottava rima style in which he wrote ▷ Beppo and ▷ Don Juan.

In the 1830s and 40s Frere produced lively verse translations of four plays by the Greek dramatist Aristophanes (> Greek literature).

Freud, Sigmund (1856-1939)

The founder of psychoanalysis, and one of the seminal figures of 20th-century thought. Born in Moravia, then part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, he settled in Vienna. He began his career as a doctor specializing in the physiology of the nervous system and after experimenting briefly with hypnosis, developed the technique of free association for the treatment of hysteria and neurosis. His work is based on a number of principles. The first is psychic determinism, the principle that all mental events, including dreams, fantasies, errors and neurotic symptoms, have meaning. The second is the primacy of the unconscious mind in mental life, the unconscious being regarded as a dynamic force drawing on the energy of instinctual drives, and as the location of desires which are repressed because they are socially unacceptable or a threat to the ego. The third is a developmental view of human life, which stresses the importance of infantile experience and accounts for personality in terms of the progressive channeling of an initially undifferentiated energy or libido. Important aspects of ⊳ psychoanalytical theory and practice arising from these principles include the theory of infantile sexuality and its development, centred on the > Oedipus Complex, the techniques of free association and dream interpretation as means of analyzing repressed material, and the beliefs that much behaviour is unconsciously motivated, that sexuality plays a major role in the personality, and that civilization has been created by the direction of libidinous impulses to symbolic ends (including the creation of art). Freud regarded neurotic and normal behaviour as differing in degree rather than kind.

Despite his scientific orientation, Freud's thought had affinities with that of the Romantic poets (> Romanticism), and several features of modern literature which show his influence also have Romantic antecedents. These include a particular interest in the quality and significance of childhood experience, a fascination with memory and with what is buried in the adult personality, and a concern with disturbed states of consciousness. Such features are found in the work of ▷ James Joyce and ▷ Virginia Woolf, as well as many later writers. The > stream of consciousness technique and other experimental narrative techniques which abandon external realism in favour of the rendering of consciousness, of dreams or of fantasies, owe much to Freud's belief in the significance of these areas of experience, which had been relatively neglected by scientific thought. Furthermore, the technique of free association revealed a tendency of the mind, when rational constraints were lessened, to move towards points of psychic conflict, and this discovery helped to validate new means of structuring literary works, through association, symbol, and other forms of non-rationalistic patterning (for example in the work of \triangleright T. S. Eliot). The view that the individual's unconscious life is as important as his or her public and social self is crucial to much 20-th century literature, a notable example being the work of > D. H. Lawrence, which rests on the assumptions that human beings live through their unconscious, and that sexuality is central to the personality. The Freudian unconscious is in particular the realm of fantasy, and Freudian thought has encouraged the belief that fantasy is of profound significance in our lives, with considerable consequences for literary forms and modes.

Psychoanalysis has developed very considerably since Freud, and continues to interact with literary practice and theory. In the field of theory, those who have studied but radically revised Freud's ideas, such as > Jacques Lacan and > feminist theorists, have been especially important.

Bib: Brown, J. A. C., Freud and the Post-Freudians; Freud, S., Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis.

Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay

A romantic comedy by ➤ Robert Greene, first acted in 1592. The title characters are based on historical figures – Franciscan ➤ friars of the 13th century whom popular tradition had made into magicians – and the play is based on a pamphlet of anecdotes about them. It has a double plot: one action concerns Bacon's manufacture of a brass head endowed (with the help of the devil) with power of speech, and the other is a > pastoral love-story about the rival loves of Prince Edward and Lord Lacy for Margaret, a village maiden. The play is Greene's best; his use of the double plot to present two aspects of a theme, and his treatment of romantic love, have relevance to the later development of > Elizabethan drama, including > Shakespeare's.

Friar's Tale, The

One of ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales. It is an amplified exemplum (or moral story) which recounts how a summoner is damned as a result of his corrupt practices, specicifically his attempt to extort money from a poor widow. It concludes with the summoner being carried off to hell by a 'summoning' colleague, a devil. This tale, which makes the pilgrim Summoner its butt, provokes the ➤ Summoner's Tale, a barbed narrative satire on the corrupt practices of friars.

Friel, Brian (b 1929)

Dramatist. Friel, born in Derry, is probably both the best-known and the best contemporary Irish dramatist. His work is naturally much preoccupied with the political situation in Ireland in the broadest terms, particularly with the pressures that contribute to the intractability of that situation, the difficulty of rational responses to the legacy of hundreds of years of hostility and mistrust, communities divided by religion and language and the search for a way out of the impasse. There is a strong emphasis on the theme of exile which reflects one traditional escape route from the economic and political ills of Ireland; in Philadelphia, Here I Come! (1965) the escape is to America, in The Gentle Island (1971) it is to Glasgow. The renewed violence and gradual breakdown of the political situation after 1968 is reflected in such plays as The Freedom of the City (1973) and The Volunteers (1975) which deal directly with aspects of 'the Troubles', but Friel is also concerned with the wider problems of communication and identity. He may not be a particularly daring dramatist in terms of formal experimentation but he makes effective use of splitting a character into public and private selves in Philadelphia and of the contrast between the judicial inquiry which 'establishes' that the civil rights marchers were terrorists in The Freedom of the City and their innocent behaviour in the flashbacks that show what led up to their deaths. In The Faith Healer (1979) three characters speak four forty-minute monologues in a hauntingly written multi-viewpoint drama which again draws on the themes of exile and return and the pains of both.

Translations (1981), the first play staged by Field Day, the company Friel co-founded with the actor Stephen Rea, is a very fine parable of the current situation in Northern Ireland which also teases out some of its cultural roots. The play is set in 1830s Donegal, in a world where tramps can read Homer in the original but not > Shakespeare, a world doomed to vanish under the assault of state education (in English) and the Royal Engineers' Survey of Ireland. Although the issues are serious and the allegorical applications clear, Friel handles events with a light touch and there is much gentle comedy at the expense of two lovers failing to communicate - they both actually speak English in the play but neither understands the other - and at the expense of linguistic failures in general.

Friel's other plays include: Making History (1988) and Dancing at Lughnasa (1990)

Fringe theatre

A name which originates from unofficial theatre shows performed on the periphery of the Edinburgh Festival. The term is now used more generally and often refers to an alternative kind of theatre which provides a consciously oppositional entertainment to that on offer at mainstream establishment theatres. One of the typical fringe companies is > John McGrath's 7:84 group which has always pursued a policy of touring plays and performing for workingclass audiences away from conventional theatres (a policy which has been more successful in Scotland than in England). The term is useful in as much as it describes a general movement to a politically more radical kind of theatre since the late 1960s (which produced a number of dramatists, such as Howard Brenton, > Carvl Churchill, ▷ David Hare and ▷ David Edgar, who now tend to work within the theatre establishment). However, 'fringe' is now used to describe such a variety of theatrical activity that it no longer has a precise meaning. Other notable groups belonging, or who have belonged, to the political fringe are: Foco Novo (1972); Belt and Braces (founded in 1974); The Women's Theatre Group (1975); Gay Sweatshop (1975); Joint Stock Theatre Group (1974); Monstrous Regiment (1976).

Froissart, Jean (c 1337-c1410)

A French chronicler and poet, who visited England on several occasions, and recorded events at the courts of France and England, from 1325–1400, in the form of a chronicle narrative, translated into English prose by Lord Berners in 1523–5. Froissart's lyric and be dream-vision poetry influenced by Chaucer's work.

Frost at Midnight (1798)

➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge's ➤ conversation

poem issues from the first phase of English > Romantic poetry, characterized by its emphasis on spiritual > autobiography, memory and the workings of the intellect and imagination, and the idealistic projection of a life of freedom for the poet's child, > Hartley, under the benign tutelage of ⊳ Nature. The idealism of the poem is shadowed not only by the dissipation of energies shown by the real Hartley Coleridge in later life, but by a discrepancy between what the poet desires or imagines, and what he can occupy with certainty. If this melancholy divergence reflects aspects of Coleridge's personality, as a dreamer and an opium addict, it may also express a more general truth about the fall from linguistic illusionism to a darker existential reality. ▶ Deconstructionist critics such as > Paul de Man have been particularly alert to this kind of doubleness in Romantic texts.

Fry, Christopher (b 1907)

British dramatist whose first stage success was with A Phoenix Too Frequent (1946). The Lady's Not For Burning, first staged in 1948, starred ➤ John Gielgud and seemed to herald a return of verse drama to the stage. Other notable actors who played major roles in his plays include: ➤ Laurence Olivier in Venus Observed (1950), Paul Scofield in an adaptation of Anouilh's Ring Round the Moon (1950) and Edith Evans in The Dark is Light Enough (1954). His popularity on the commercial stage was short-lived and by the mid-1950s he was already out of favour. Curtmantle (1961) was performed by the ➤ Royal Shakespeare Company but was only a moderate success. His own particular brand of religious verse drama was, however, one of the few notable dramatic developments in the immediate post-war years. Film scripts include: Barabbas (1952); Ben Hur (1959); La Bibbia (1966). Bib: Stanford, D., Fry.

Fuller, Roy (1912-91)

Poet and novelist. Fuller was born in Lancashire, and trained and worked as a solicitor. He began writing in the 1930, and published two volumes of poetry whilst he was in the Royal Navy during World War II: The Middle of a War (1942) and A Lost Season (1944) (his first volume appeared in 1939). His later publications include: Counterparts (1954); Collected Poems (1962), From the Joke Shop (1975) and Last Poems (1993). His novels are restrained in tone and style but frequently express an underlying psychological tension as well as a sharp, though understated, critique of social practices. They include: With My Little Eye (1948); The Second Curtain (1953), Fantasy and Fugue (1954); Image of a Society (1956); The Ruined Boys (1959); The Father's Comedy (1961); The Perfect Fool (1963); My Child, My Sister (1965); The Carnal Island (1970); Stares (1990).

Funds, The; The Funded Debt; Fundholders

From the reign of > William III the government sought to finance its wars by borrowing from private investors, issuing 'bonds' ('debentures') in acknowledgement of the loan and paying regular interest. This is the > National Debt. It became the commonest investment for small investors and was the source of many 'private incomes' in the 19th century.

Fyge, Sarah (1669/72-1722/3)

English author of the verse The Female Advocate, or an Answere to a late Satyr against the Pride, Lust and Inconstancy etc., of Women (1686), which she claimed to have written when she was fourteen. This was a reply to an attack on women by Robert Gould (1683), 'written by a lady in vindication of her sex'. The defence begins with a reworking of the much-disputed question of the nature of Eve - 'The Devil's strength weak Woman might deceive, / But Adam only tempted was by Eve, / She had the strongest Tempter, and least Charge; / Man's knowing most, doth make his sin more large.' Fyge claimed in a poem (published in Poems on Several Occassions, together with a Pastoral, 1703) that in the 1680s her father banished her to a village far from the comfort of friends. She wrote one of the elegies in The Nine Muses (1700) and had two husbands, first Field, and then the Reverend Thomas Egerton, to whom she was unhappily married. In The Liberty she wrote 'My daring Pen, will bolder Sallies make, / and like myself, an uncheck'd freedom take.'

➤ Manley, Delarivière Bib: Medoff, Jeslyn, 'New Light on Sarah Fyge (Field, Egerton)', Tulsa Studies in Women's Literature, 1, 2 (1982), pp. 155–75. Gael, Gaelic

The Scottish highland branch of the Celtic race and its language. The words are sometimes used for the Scottish and Irish Celts together.

Gainsborough, Thomas (1727-88)

English painter, born at Sudbury in Suffolk, he became one of the 36 founders of the English Academy. He lacked formal training as an artist, and taught himself to paint by copying trees, rocks and other objects that he saw in the countryside around him, his style being influenced by Dutch painting. He developed into a successful landscape artist and portrait painter, whose clients included some of England's wealthiest nobility, including members of the royal family. His contemporary > Sir Joshua Reynolds described him as a genius and suggested he had founded an English school of art.

Galahad

Galahad is the son of ➤ Lancelot and Elaine of Corbenic, conceived as a result of a magical trick played on Lancelot by Elaine's father, the Grail Keeper ➤ Pelles. When Galahad comes to > Arthur's court he is marked out as the knight who will achieve the Quest of the Grail by marvellous signs: he alone can sit in the Perilous seat at the ➤ Round Table and draw the sword from the stone, where it has been fixed by Merlin. His role is effectively that of a knight-contemplative, whose values and actions are directed entirely towards spiritual ends. In early versions of the Grail narrative, the role of Grail seeker is played by ▶ Perceval who becomes a companion of ➤ Galahad's in later reworkings of the Grail narrative, including ➤ Malory's Morte D'Arthur.

> Arthur, King; Grail.

Galileo Galilei (1564-1642)

Italian astronomer; he was able, by improving the newly invented telescope, to confirm the theory of ▷ Copernicus that the earth revolves round the sun, contrary to the theory of Ptolemy that the earth is the centre of the solar system. The observation was made in 1610; in 1611 the English poet ▷ John Donne wrote the Anatomy of the World:

And new Philosophy calls all in doubt.
The Element of fire is quite put out;
The Sun is lost, and th'earth, and no man's wit
Can well direct him where to look for it.

In fact the Church was disturbed at the implications of Galileo's discovery in regard to acceptance of the Holy Scriptures, and declared it a heresy. Nonetheless Galileo's view slowly became accepted. ➤ Milton, in his epic of the Creation of the World, ➤ Paradise Lost, uses the Ptolemaic theory, though he had met Galileo and alludes to him in the poem ('the Tuscan Artist' of Bk. 1, lines 288–01).

Bib: Drake, S., Galileo.

Gallant Mavis (b 1922)

Novelist and short story writer. Gallant is one of the foremost writers of short stories in Canada, indeed, in the whole of North America, and her work is consistently published in the New Yorker magazine. She is fluent in English and French and began her career in the 1940s writing pieces for Canadian journals and for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. However by 1960 she had settled in Paris, allowing her observations upon Canadian life a certain ironic detachment. Among her most well-known collections are, The Other Paris: Stories (1956), The End of the World and Other Stories (1974) and Home Truths: Selected Canadian Stories (1981). Gallant continues to be immensely popular on both sides of the Atlantic, as well as influential upon younger Canadian short-story writers.

Gallathea (1585)

A lyrical and courtly transvestite comedy by > John Lyly about a virgin-sacrifice to Neptune and the ensuing unwitting love-affair of two disguised girls, one of whom Venus promises to transform into a boy. The play's heroine provides an early model for > Shakespeare's Viola in > Twelfih Night, and through its jewelled elegance and mythopoeia Lyly's play took English comedy to new heights in the crucial decade preceding the 1590s.

Galloway, Janice (b 1956)

Novelist. Born in Ayrshire, Galloway is one of a group of Glasgow writers that has emerged since the 1980s (▷ Gray, Alasdair; ▷ Kelman, James). She has also worked as a teacher. The Trick Is To Keep Breathing (1989) uses a range of discourses – first-person narrative, stream of consciousness, dialogue and typographical effects – to represent a disturbed mind. Blood (1991) is a collection of stories which explore feminist issues of identity and autonomy through a mixture of realism and fantasy and an inventive use of language, while Foreign Parts (1995) is an understated but powerful study of female friendship.

Galsworthy, John (1867-1933)

Novelist and dramatist. As a novelist, his reputation was high in the first quarter of this century for his surveys of upper-class English life, especially the ▷ Forsyte Saga sequence (1906-21) and A Modern Comedy (The White Monkey, 1924; The Silver Spoon, 1926; Swan Song, 1928). After World War I, Galsworthy underwent severe criticism by novelists of the new generation as different as ▷ Virginia Woolf ('Modern Fiction' in The Common Reader; 1925) and ▷ D. H. Lawrence ('John Galsworthy', in Phoenix; 1927). These novelist-critics were writing in a period of rich experiment in rendering the inwardness of human experience and in testing and renewing humane values in the social context; to them, Galsworthy was artistically an obstructive conservative, severely limited to a vision of the outside of social phenomena and to a merely social definition of human beings. From such attacks, Galsworthy's reputation has never recovered among the intelligentsia; however, the popularity of a televised serial version of the Forsyte Saga in 1967 suggests that he may still be favoured by at least the older generation of the general public. His other novels are: Jocelyn (1898); The Country House (1907); Fraternity (1909); The Patrician (1911); The Freelands (1915); Maid in Waiting (1931); Flowering Wilderness (1932).

As a dramatist, Galsworthy was one of those in the first decade of the century who restored to the English theatre a substantiality of subject matter which had long been missing from it. His plays dramatized ethical problems arising from social issues. These too, however, have lost prestige, partly because of weaknesses similar to those that his novels are supposed to suffer from. Another criticism of the plays is that he brought to the theatre a novelist's vision rather than a dramatist's: during the last 50 years, British dramatists have believed that the drama requires an approach to the depiction of character and to the use of dialogue which is different to the vision of the novelist. Plays: The Silver Box (1906); Foy (1907); Strife (1909); Justice (1910); The Pigeon (1912); The Eldest Son (1912); The Fugitive (1913); The Skin Game (1920); Loyalties (1922); The Forest (1924). > Realism.

Bib: Barker, D., A Man of Principle; Marrot, H. V., The Life and Letters of John Galsworthy; Fréchet, A., John Galsworthy, A Reassessment.

Galt, John (1779-1839)

Scottish writer of poems, travels, dramas and novels. He is chiefly remembered for his novels, especially The Ayrshire Legatees (1821), Annals of the Parish (1821), The Provost (1822) and The Entail (1823). These are vivid, realistic, humorous accounts of Scottish provincial society.

➤ Scottish literature in English. Bib: Gordon, R. K., John Galt; Aberdein, J. W., John Galt; Parker, W. M., Susan Ferrier and John Galt (British Council).

Game at Chess, A (1624)

A bold political ▷ allegory by ▷ Thomas Middleton. It enjoyed a short but highly successful run in London, because of its imaginative use of the pieces of chess and its appeal to popular sentiment hostile to the proposed Spanish marriage. In the play England is represented by white and Spain by black.

Gamelyn

An anonymous Middle English verse romance, dating from the mid-14th century. Gamelyn is the youngest of three brothers who is deprived of his heritage and ill-treated by his eldest brother. He takes to the forest and leads the life of an outlaw with a band of merry men. Eventually he succeeds in overthrowing the forces of the law which side with his unjust brother, retrieves his heritage and is appointed Chief Justice. The romance appears in some manuscripts of the > Canterbury Tales as the tale told by the pilgrim Cook (which is evidently an attempt by a 15th-century editor to fill out the unfinished state of ▷ Chaucer's text). Gamelyn was used by > Thomas Lodge for his prose romance Rosalynde (1590), which > Shakespeare used as a source for his comedy > As You Like It.

Bib: Sands, D. (ed.), Middle English Verse Romances.

Gammer Gurton's Needle

A slight but very lively verse comedy of uncertain authorship, first acted in 1566, and printed in 1575. Gammer = old woman. She loses her needle, which she had been using to mend her man's breeches. The whole village is upset, until the needle is found in the seat of the breeches.

Garden of Cyrus, The (1658)

A treatise on the quincunx (a shape or pattern composed of five parts) by \triangleright Sir Thomas Browne. It was published together with \triangleright Urm Burial, or Hydriotaphia, and is characteristic of Browne's delight in intellectual curiosity and his interest in the relationship between science and faith.

Gardner, Helen (1908-86)

Critic. Helen Gardner was perhaps one of the most formidable literary critics of the century, publishing a number of well-respected works which did much to promote the careful reading of many poets now firmly established in the literary canon. Gardner's position, in keeping with her generation, was in line with many of the ideas of 'new criticism', in believing that the written text is the sovereign expression of its author, whose meaning must be uncovered by close readings of the text. She was later to denigrate the proliferation of modern forms of critical theory (in her last work, In Defence of the Imagination, 1982), but she was one of the most influential critics of her generation. Her work on the ➤ Metaphysical poets and > T. S. Eliot is particularly significant. Her texts include: The Art of T. S. Eliot (1949); The Metaphysical Poets (1957); The Elegies and the Songs and Sonnets of John Donne (1965); Literary Studies (1967); Religion and Literature (1971).

Gareth

Gareth is the youngest son of King Lot of Orkney and Morgause. The fourth book of Malory's Morte D'Arthur recounts how Gareth (nicknamed Beaumains) becomes established as a knight of the ➤ Round Table (he is a protégé of ➤ Lancelot), and how he finally wins the hand of the lady Lyones. Lancelot accidentally kills Gareth as he rescues ➤ Guinevere from the stake. ➤ Gawain, in response, vows to revenge his brother's death. Thus Gareth's death provokes the hostilities between Gawain and Lancelot which form one of the factors contributing to the break-up of the Round Table and the end of ➤ King Arthur's reign.

Gargantua

A giant, chiefly known as the hero of ▷ François Rabelais' romances Gargantua and Pantagruel, though he had a previous existence in French folklore connected with the Arthurian (▷ Arthur, King) legends. He is mentioned in ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ *As You Like It II.*2 before Rabelais had been translated into English (1653), though Shakespeare may have read Rabelais in French.

Garlick, Raymond (b 1926)

Poet, editor and critic. Raymond Garlick was born in London but as a schoolboy often visited his grandparents who had settled in Llandudno. Initially at the University of Leeds, he was later to return to Wales to read English at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, where he began to acquire a knowledge of Welsh, became aware of Anglo-Welsh literature and, above all, started to write poetry. In 1949, while teaching at Pembroke Dock Grammar School, he founded, jointly with the headmaster Roland Mathias, the literary magazine Dock Leaves, becoming its first editor from 1949 to 1961, and pursuing the creditable aim of building bridges between Welsh language and English language writers in Wales. He relinquished his editorship on joining the staff of an international school in Holland though he returned to Wales again in 1967, this time as a senior lecturer at Trinity College, Carmarthen. Raymond Garlick has made a major contribution to Anglo-Welsh literature which he sees (unlike Gwyn Jones) as originating from late 15th-century Welshmen writing poetry in the English language, a view developed in his seminal critical study, An Introduction to Anglo-Welsh Literature (1970) and supported in the chronological span of the anthology Anglo-Welsh Poetry 1480-1980) (1984) which he edited with Roland Mathias. In his own poetry, Raymond Garlick's verse forms are often intricately structured and his themes include a nationalist view of Wales in the wider context of European civilization, a celebration of people in the praise-tradition of Welsh poetry, a passionate concern for justice and a hatred of violence, and a preoccupation with language, in which he envisages English as one of the languages of a fully bilingual Wales. His carlier poetry collections were Poems from the Mountain-House (1950), The Welsh-Speaking Sea (1954), and a long radio poem, Blaenau Observed (1957) whereas his middle period produced a trilogy of poetry collections, A Sense of Europe (1968), A Sense of Time (1972), and Incense (1976). Recently he made a welcome return to poetry with Travel Notes (1992), inspired by a Mediterranean cruise which rekindled his enthusiasm for the classical world, especially that of ancient. Greece. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Garner, Alan (b 1934)

Novelist and writer for children. Many of Garner's works are set in his home territory of Cheshire, and the south Manchester landmark Alderley Edge figures particularly prominently as the setting for a series of fantasy plots which mingle contemporary reality with an uncanny sense of the mythic past, which cause alternative values and belief systems to erupt into the present. Garner draws particularly on Celtic mythology and the beliefs of pre-Christian religions (especially in his first novels, The Weirdstone of Brisingamen, 1960, Elidor, 1965, and The Owl Service, 1967), and is also interested in the fictional possibilities of parallel time scales and relativity, which he explores in the more adult novel, Red Shift (1973). More recent works include The Stone Book Quartet (1076-8).

➤ Children's books.

Garrick, David (1717-79)

Actor, theatre manager, dramatist, whose genius as an actor greatly enhanced the theatrical profession in social prestige, and who was also responsible for far-reaching innovations in the theatre.

In 1737 he came to London with ▷ Samuel Johnson who had been his tutor at Lichfield, and entered Lincoln's Inn, but his career there did not last. He had shown a taste for theatricals early in his youth, and in 1740 he put together a burlesque play based on characters of ▷ Henry Fielding, Lethe: or Aesop in the Shades, which was performed at a benefit night for ▷ Henry Giffard.

In 1741 Giffard took a small company including Garrick to Ipswich, and here the actor performed regularly for the first time, making his debut as Aboan in ➤ Thomas Southerne's Oroonoko, before returning to Giffard's Theatre at ➤ Goodman's Fields. Garrick, still unknown, played Richard III, to a rapturous reception. In 1742 Garrick travelled to Dublin with ➤ Peg Woffington, who became his mistress, and together they joined the ➤ Smock Alley Theatre. They returned to London and in 1742 Garrick opened his first season at > Drury Lane. Denied their salaries by the irresponsible manager Charles Fleetwood, Garrick, > Charles Macklin, and several other actors rebelled in 1743. Eventually, after a series of further disruptions, including several riots at the theatre, and a season at > Covent Garden (1746-47), Garrick became a joint manager at Drury Lane in 1747. Two years later he married the actress Eva Maria Veigel.

Garrick proved a vigorous and creative manager, reviving the fortunes of Drury Lane, and adding to his own status as the leading actor of his generation. His sensitive and naturalistic acting style, inspired by that of Macklin but perfected by Garrick himself, set a standard for the period, making the previous formal and 'stagey' methods of acting seem outmoded. In 1763, after further rioting at the theatre, Garrick abolished the long practice of allowing spectators on the stage. He introduced lighting concealed from the audience which he had observed during a professional visit to Paris, and engaged the brilliant scene designer ➤ De Loutherberg, who created a series of sets in naturalistic, romantic (▷ Romanticism) style that complemented Garrick's own style of acting. He also wrote a number of plays, and rewrote others to conform with the tastes of his time, including The Lying Valet (1741), ▷ Miss in Her Teens (1747), in which he himself played the part of the fop, Fribble, > The Clandestine Marriage (1766) (in collaboration with ➤ George Colman the Elder), The Country Girl (1766) (a revision of ➤ William Wycherley's ➤ The Country Wife), The Irish Widow (1772), Bon Ton; Or High Life Above Stairs (1775), and reworkings of several plays of ▷ Shakespeare.

Garrick retired in 1776 and died at his home in London after a long and painful illness. He was buried at Westminster Abbey, near the monument to Shakespeare who had provided him with many of his finest tragic roles, including Richard III, Hamlet (his most popular part), Macbeth, and Lear. Garrick also excelled in comedy, his best parts including Abel Drugger in ▷ Ben Jonson's ▷ The Alchemist, Benedick in ▷ Much Ado About Nothing, and ▷ Bayes in the Duke of Buckingham's ▷ The Rehearsal (▷ George Villiers) in which he triumphed when he imitated several well-known contemporary actors.

Bib: Murphy, A., The Life of Garrick; Oman, G., David Garrick; Kahrl, G. M. and Stone, G. W., David Garrick, A Critical Biography; Kendall, A., David Garrick: A Biography; Wood, E. R (ed.) Plays by David Garrick and George Colman the Elder.

Garter, The Order of the

An order of knighthood instituted by ➤ Edward III about 1344. The order was an imitation of the legendary one established by

➤ King Arthur, and Edward III built the great round tower of Windsor Castle as its meeting-place. In keeping with the ▷ Tudor myth, several panegyric poems link ▷ Elizabeth's courtiers to the chivalric idealism of Edward's and Arthur's reigns. More significantly, ▷ Spenser weaves the garter motif into his praise of Elizabethan knighthood in ▷ The Faerie Queene. ▷ Shakespeare alludes heavily to the garter and its ceremonies in ▷ The Merry Wives of Windsor.

Garth, Sir Samuel (1661–1719)
Doctor and member of the Whig clique known as the ▷ Kit-Cat Club. His ▷ heroic couplet poem The Dispensary (1699) is a burlesque attack on the claim of apothecaries to exclusive control over the dispensing of medicines.

Gascoigne, George (1539-77)

Poet and playwright. His chief works include the unauthorized A Hundreth Sundrie Flowers, published in 1573; a collection of poems republished in 1575 as The Posies; some of the earliest > satires, including including Glasse of Government (1575), The Steel Glass (1576); and a number of plays which include Supposes (1566), one of the earliest comedies in English and Jocasta (1573) the second English > tragedy. Gascoigne's talents also encompassed fiction, a treatise on prosody and a > masque held at Kenilworth for > Elizabeth I. Gascoigne's verse grew increasingly out of favour as he could, or would, not imitate the court wits such as ➤ Lyly, and continued with the more old-fashioned ➤ lyrical style.

➤ Ferrers, George; Breton, Nicholas. Bib: Johnson, R. C., Gascoigne.

Gascoyne, David (b 1916)

Poet and translator. Gascoyne was born in Salisbury, and published his first volume of verse when he was only 16 (Roman Balcony; 1932). His poetry is fairly unusual in being strongly influenced by that of French Surrealists, whom he has translated; at the age of 19 Gascoyne wrote A Short Survey of Surrealism (1935). His publications include: Man's Life is this Meat (1936); Poems 1937–1942 (1943); Collected Poems (1965 and 1988); The Sun at Midnight (1970); and Collected Verse Translations (1970).

> French literature in England.

Gaskell, Elizabeth Cleghorn (1810–65) Novelist, short story writer and biographer. Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson was the daughter of a ▷ Unitarian minister and spent her childhood with her aunt in Knutsford, Cheshire after her mother's death in 1811. In 1832 she married William Gaskell, also a Unitarian minister, based in Manchester, with whom she had four daughters, and a son who died in infancy. She and her husband first intended to write the annals of the Manchester poor in the manner of George Crabbe (1754-1832, who wrote about rural life in Suffolk with uncompromising realism); and her first novel, > Mary Barton (1848), presented the outlook of the industrial workers with justice and sympathy sufficient to anger some of the employers. It won the attention of > Charles Dickens and most of her later work was published in his periodical magazines > Household Words and > All the Year Round. ➤ Cranford began to appear in 1851, and > Ruth in 1853, the latter novel causing a scandal because of its sympathetic treatment of a > 'fallen woman'. Cranford, a study of a small circle in a small town based on Knutsford, has been compared with the work of Iane Austen in its ability to endow smallness of circumstance with large implications. Social issues are also at the heart of > North and South (1854-5) and many of Gaskell's short stories. In 1863 the ➤ historical novel ➤ Sylvia's Lovers appeared and A Dark Night's Work: Cousin Phyllis and Other Tales. Her masterpiece > Wives and Daughters, though unfinished, was published posthumously between 1864 and 1866. Other works include the celebrated biography of her friend ➤ Charlotte Brontë (1857), and ghost stories, a selection of which has recently been reprinted as Lois the Witch and Other Stories (1989).

Mrs Gaskell's work reveals a commitment to humanitarian principles and to Unitarianism. The > 'social problem' novels call for reconciliation between employers and workers. for Gaskell was always reforming rather than radical. She advocated motherhood as woman's mission in life, but her fiction often exposes the contradictions in Victorian attitudes and calls for more 'nurturing' men. Recent feminist critics have re-assessed Gaskell's portrayal of 'marginalized women' - the spinsters, widows, > orphan girls and madwomen who figure largely within her work. Her novels are an interesting connecting link between those of → Jane Austen and → George Eliot. Bib: Hopkins, A.B., Life; Cecil, D., Early Victorian Novelists; Haldane, E., Mrs Gaskell and her Friends; Tillotson, K. (on Mary Barton) in Novels of the Eighteen-Forties; Gerin, W., Elizabeth Gaskell: A Biography; Easson, A., Elizabeth Gaskell; Stoneman, P., Elizabeth Gaskell.

Gatty, Margaret (1809-73)

Writer of ▷ children's literature and a keen botanist. She was born Margaret Scott in Burnham vicarage, Essex, and moved to Yorkshire after marrying the Rev. Alfred Gatty in 1839. Of her ten children, ▷ Juliana Horatia Ewing worked most closely with her on Aunt Judy's Magazine, a periodical for children. Gatty's works include The Fairy Godmothers (1851); Parables from Nature (a series of five books published between 1855 and 1871); Aunt Judy's Tales (1859); Christmas Crackers (1870), and a two-volume History of British Seaweeds (1863), which became the standard source of information about seaweeds for the next 80 years. Gatty's writing for children reveals a good sense of humour, but contains too much moralizing to appeal to 20th-century readers. She was, however, highly popular in her day.

Gawain

One of > King Arthur's principal knights, the eldest son of King Lot of Orkney and Arthur's half-sister Morgause (called Anna in ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of Arthurian history). Gawain is an established member of Arthur's entourage in early accounts of Arthur's reign, and his role as an embodiment of the chivalric ethos is developed in the romances of > Chrétien de Troyes. His reputation seems to have declined in later French Arthurian narratives, especially in the > Grail stories, in which he is portrayed as a knight committed to vain worldly pursuits and ends. He is, however, the central hero of the Middle English romance > Gawain and the Green Knight, in which the question of how to judge his performance becomes one of the main issues of the narrative. The variable representation of Gawain in Arthurian narrative is illustrated by his different roles in > Malory's compilation of Arthurian history. In Malory's Morte D'Arthur Gawain is an exemplary chivalric figure, a failed knight of the grail quest, a loval defender of the integrity of the > Round Table who resists attempts by his half-brother Mordred and brother Aggravain to break up Arthur's court, and in the later stages of the narrative, an implacable enemy of ➤ Lancelot who, after the death of ➤ Gareth, promotes Arthur's war against Lancelot and thus plays a major part in the dissolution of Arthur's court. The mysterious link between Gawain's strength and the movement of the Sun, alluded to in Malory, is perhaps a remnant of a distant connection between Gawain and a Sun-god figure of Celtic mythology. According to Malory, Gawain's skull can still be seen at Dover castle.

Gawain and the Green Knight

One of the four later 14th-century ▷ alliterative narratives attributed to the ▷ Gawain poet, which survives, along with ▷ Patience, ▷ Cleanness and ▷ Pearl, in a single manuscript. While the other poems address explicitly Christian topics and material, Gawain and the Green Knight tackles the traditions and conventions of Arthurian romance in a brilliant and complex narrative, structured around a series of interlocking games which have potentially very serious outcomes.

The story tells how a mysterious Green Knight visits > King Arthur's court on New Year's Eve, offering a game. He offers any knight the opportunity to strike his head with an enormous axe if, in return, the knight agrees to submit to a return blow the following year. Gawain accepts the challenge on behalf of the court, and beheads the Green Knight, who proceeds to pick up his head and leave Arthur's court, reminding Gawain of his promise to come to his Green Chapel in a year for a return blow. The following year Gawain embarks on his quest for the Green Chapel, and takes refuge over the Christmas period in the castle of one Sir Bertilak. There Gawain gets involved in another game: for three days Bertilak is to go hunting and present Gawain with his winnings every evening. In return Gawain is to give Bertilak whatever he has won during the day at the castle. Over the next three days Gawain is subject to the attentions of Bertilak's beautiful wife as he rests in bed. His chastity, loyalty to his host, and courtesy are tested, for in defending himself against the lady's advances, Gawain has to avoid any offence to her. At the end of every one of the three days Gawain has kisses to exchange for the spoils of Bertilak's hunting expeditions. However, on the final day Gawain does not hand over the green girdle he has accepted from the wife (she has claimed it has magic qualities and will protect Gawain's life against any threat). Gawain, wearing the green girdle, leaves Bertilak's court, and eventually finds the Green Chapel and the Green Knight. There Gawain is made to submit to three feints from the axe of the Green Knight, the last just cutting the flesh of his neck. Although Gawain is overjoyed at having survived his ordeal, his mood changes as the Green Knight reveals his identity and the mechanics of the games which Gawain has played. The Green Knight and Sir Bertilak are the same figure: the outcome of Gawain's experience at the Green Chapel has depended on how honestly he has played the exchange of winnings game at the castle. Gawain's slight wound repays his retention of the girdle, which the Green Knight now excuses. Gawain is mortified, and vows to wear the girdle as a sign of his shame and failure, but is fêted as a great hero on his return to Arthur's court. Henceforth all the members of Arthur's court decide to wear a green girdle.

There are analogues in earlier French romances and Welsh narrative for the beheading game and the exchange of winnings game, but not for their combination. The power and skill of the narrative technique of Gawain is reflected in the enormous amount of modern critical interest in the poem, but there is hardly any evidence at all which illuminates its contemporary reception. Bib: Burrow, J. A., A Reading of Gawain and the Green Knight; Tolkien, J. R. R., Gordon, E. V. and Davis, N. (eds.), Gawain and the Green Knight:

Gawain Poet (or Pearl Poet)

The name given to the hypothetical author of the four Middle English ▷ alliterative poems (▷ Patience, ▷ Pearl, ▷ Cleanness, ▷ Gawain and the Green Knight), composed in the second half of the 14th century, in the north-west Midlands area. The poems are all found in a single manuscript, British Library, Nero A. x. There is no external evidence to suggest the poems are the work of a single writer: the theory of single authorship depends largely on the evidence of shared thematic interests, narrative techniques and sheer poetic skill which can be traced in all four poems.

Bib: Andrew, M. and Waldron, R. A. (eds.),

Bib: Andrew, M. and Waldron, R. A. (eds.).
The Poems of the Pearl Manuscript.

Gay, John (1685-1732)

Dramatist and poet, born at Barnstaple in Devon, the youngest son of William Gay. In 1708 he published 'Wine', a poem to celebrate the Act of Union between England and Scotland (> Union, Act of) and in 1711 a pamphlet The Present State of Wit. The following year he became a 'domestic steward' to the Duchess of Monmouth, and in 1714 secretary to Lord Clarendon, Tory envoy to Hanover. However, the accession to power of the Whigs threw him again upon his own resources. His farce, The What D'Ye Call It, a burlesque on what he deemed to be the moral and emotional falsity of heroic tragedy, as well as the growing taste for > sentiment in comedy, followed in 1715. The play, which also satirized the idealization of country life, became a target for attack by the enemies of ▶ Pope, whom he had befriended. Gay's Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London (1716), on the conditions of life in the capital, is now considered a minor classic. In 1717 he collaborated with Pope and ➤ Arbuthnot on the satirical ➤ Three Hours After Marriage caricaturing a number of contemporary literary figures. This was an initial success, but then lapsed from favour. Gay's Poems on Several Occasions (1720) made him some money, which he invested in the South Sea Company. When this failed, he was temporarily ruined (> South Sea Bubble).

Gay is best known for his ballad opera, > The Beggar's Opera (1728). An instant success, the piece was said to have made 'Gay rich and Rich (the theatre manager) gay'. The so-called Newgate pastoral', with music by the German composer Pepusch, satirized the London underworld, and corruption in general. It was also read as an attack on the ruling party of ⊳ Sir Robert Walpole, who retaliated with Licensing Act of 1737, restricting the activities of the theatre (> theatres). The sequel, Polly (1729), was banned by the Lord Chamberlain, although published by subscription. In his last years Gay lived mainly with two of his patrons, the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry in Wiltshire. He wrote the libretto for ⊳ Handel's Acis and Galatea in 1731. Gay returned to London in 1732, and there died suddenly. He was buried in ➤ Westminster Abbey, where his epitaph, written by himself, is 'Life is a jest, and all things show it; I thought so once, and now I know it'.

Bib: Johnson, S., Lives of the Poets; Melville L., The Life and Letters of John Gay; Irving, W. H., Gay, Favourite of the Wits; Sutherland, J., Pope and his Contemporaries.

Gems, Pam (b 1925)

British playwright, she established her reputation relatively late in life, only becoming actively involved in the theatre when she was in her 40s. Although her plays deal specifically with female issues she distances herself from direct >> feminist polemic. A recurrent theme in her work is the need for women to discover their own identity in a world dominated and defined by men. Major works include: Dead Fish (later Dusa, Fish, Stas and Vi; 1976); Queen Christina (1977); Piaf (1978); Loving Women (1984); Camille (1985); The Blue Angel (1992). Bib: Keyssar, H., Feminist Theatre; Wandor, M., Understudies.

Gender

Originally used to distinguish between the categories of 'masculine' and 'feminine'. In modern ⊳ feminist criticism it denotes something more than the different physical characteristics of both sexes. Feminist criticism regards 'masculinity' and 'femininity' as primary social constructions, supported by a range of cultural phenomena. The relationship between men and women is seen in material terms as a process of domination and subordination which functions objectively in material relations, but also subjectively in the ways in which men and women think of themselves. The concept of gender draws attention to the objective and subjective constructions of sexual difference, making possible an understanding of the mechanisms by which they operate, and offering the possibility of change.

There is a difference between the more sociological accounts and those – sometimes psychoanalytically based – which suggest there is something irreducible and specific in the nature of sexual difference. Here 'gender' is not one cultural label among others, but a firmly established basis for identity, as masculine or feminine (and not necessarily according to biological sex).

> Ecriture séminine; Feminism.

Genette, Gérard (b 1930)

French critic. His book Narrative Discourse (1980, translated by Jane E. Lewin) provides one of the most systematic and thorough categorizations of forms and modes of narrative.

▶ Narratology; Structuralism.

Genre

In its use in the language of literary criticism

the concept of 'genre' proposes that particular groups of texts can be seen as parts of a system of representations agreed between writer and reader. For example, a work such as ➤ Aristotle's Poetics isolates those characteristics which are to be found in a group of dramatic texts which are given the generic label > 'tragedy'. The pleasure which an audience derives from watching a particular tragedy emanates in part from its fulfilling certain requirements stimulated by expectations arising from within the form itself. But each particular tragedy cannot be reduced simply to the sum of its generic parts. It is possible to distinguish between a tragedy by > Sophocles, another by > Shakespeare, or another by ⊳ Edward Bond, yet at the same time acknowledge that they all conform in certain respects to the narrative and dramatic rules laid down by the category 'tragedy'. Each example, therefore, repeats certain characteristics which have come to be recognized as indispensable features of the genre, but each one also exists in a relationship of difference from the general rule. The same kind of argument may be advanced in relation to particular sorts of poetry, or novel. The concept of genre helps to account for the particular pleasures which readers/spectators experience when confronted with a specific text. It also offers an insight into one of the many determining factors which contribute to the formation of the structure and coherence of any individual text.

Gentleman Dancing Master, The (1672) Play by ➤ William Wycherley, inspired partly by Calderón de la Barca's El Maestro de Danzar (> Spanish influence on English literature). 14-year-old Hyppolyta is forcibly betrothed to the stupid fop, Monsieur de Paris, but schemes to evade the watch kept on her and her woman Prue, to keep them in the house and away from men. She is attracted to Gerrard, and tricks her suitor into bringing Gerrard to her window. The pair meet secretly, but are interrupted by her father, Don Diego, alias Mr Formal. Hyppolyta passes Gerrard off as her dancing master, employed to teach her the fashionable dance the Corant, and gains permission for him to visit her again. Gerrard is confused but drawn to her beauty, and her fortune. He plans their elopement. After many more farcical episodes, the two are married. Mr Formal reveals that far from being 'of an honourable house', as he has claimed, he is descended from a long line of merchants. He accepts the marriage, while Monsieur de Paris is obliged to return to Mrs Flirt, a 'common woman of the town', with whom he has had an affair. This is one of Wycherley's least appealing plays, and was not successful.

Gentleman's Magazine, The Founded in 1731, it was the first to call itself a 'magazine'. It included, as later magazines were to do, a wider variety of material than the ➤ Reviews, including political reports which, in 1739-44, were contributed by ➤ Samuel Johnson.

Geoffrey of Monmouth (d 1155)

Author of the highly influential account of British history, in Latin prose, the > Historia Regum Britanniae (History of the Kings of Britain), completed c 1138, which opened up a new vision of insular history, revealing Britain to be a formerly great European power. Little is known for certain about Geoffrey of Monmouth himself. He was probably born in Monmouth, of Welsh or Breton extraction, and seems to have been a resident of Oxford, probably a canon of the college of St George's, for many years of his life (?1129-51). In 1151 he became Bishop Elect of St Asaph. Before finishing his history of Britain, he produced a version of ➤ Merlin's prophecies, which were then incorporated into the history itself. At a later stage he returned to the subject of Merlin and around 1150 produced a Latin poem, the Vita Merlini (The Life of Merlin).

His history of Britain is an accomplished and complex exercise in history writing. He claims to have access to a source of British history, 'an ancient book in the British language', which has not been used by his contemporary historiographers, nor their predecessors. His narrative seems less likely to be the product of a single unidentified source, and much more the result of a careful act of compilation (using the work of contemporaries such as William of Malmesbury and earlier authorities on the history of the island, notably ⊳ Gildas, ⊳ Bede, and ▷ Nennius), and fabrication. In Geoffrey's narrative, a shadowy period of the island's past, covering the period before and after the Roman conquest, up to the beginnings of Saxon control in the 6th century, was given relatively detailed documentation, and a rather startling revision of Roman/British and British/Saxon power relations was advanced which disrupted some of the accepted facts of insular history. Geoffrey not only suggested that at certain stages of British history the power of Britain was a major threat to that of Rome, but that Britain was a unified realm well into the 6th century. His history also presented a picture of Britain as a world famous chivalric centre during the reign of ➤ King Arthur. A powerful argument for unified rule emerges from the history, which is a point of some relevance to the turbulent political context in which Geoffrey was writing.

The historical value of the History of the Kings of Britain was a controversial issue, debated and disputed by some historians of the 12th and later centuries. But Geoffrey's formulation of British history was widely used in chronicle histories of the island up to the 16th century and provided a historic foundation for the development of Arthurian narrative during the medieval period. Approximately 200 manuscripts survive of the history, and in addition there are numerous vernacular translations and adaptations extant. Poetic and dramatic versions of early British history, such as ▷ Gorboduc (1565), ▷ Spenser's ▷ Faerie Queene, ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ King Lear and ▷ Cymbeline, all use material which derives ultimately from Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of Britain.

▶ Laʒamon.

Bib: Thorpe, L. (trans.), Geoffrey of Monmouth: The History of the Kings of Britain.

George Barnwell, The History of ▷ London Merchant, The.

Georgian

A term for the architectural style of the period 1714–1810, under George I, II and III. Georgian architecture was severe but balanced in its proportions. It was influenced partly by the Palladian style of Inigo Jones (1573–1651) and partly by the direct experience of English travellers who made the Grand Tour of Italy and admired its classical buildings. The term is not usually applied to 18th-century literature; in other arts its suggestion of elegance and proportion is often modified by a taste for satire and caricature, as in Hogarth's paintings. It was followed by the ▶ Regency style.

Georgian Poetry

A series of verse ➤ anthologies of which five volumes appeared between 1912 and 1922. It was called 'Georgian' owing to the accession of George V (1910) and to imply a new start for English poetry, involving a degree of experiment and freshness of approach to the art. The poets represented in it included > Rupert Brooke, W. H. Davies, ▷ Walter de la Mare, ▷ D. H. Lawrence, > John Masefield and > Robert Graves. However, the contemporary work of ➤ W. B. Yeats, ➤ Ezra Pound and ➤ T. S. Eliot, more original and more substantial than the work of the Georgian poets, quickly made their movement seem relatively unexciting. Since 1950 there has been some revival of interest in it. It was lyrical, colloquial, emancipated from some of the dead poetic convention left over from the decadent > Romanticism of the previous century, but it lacked the strength and boldness of thought which marked the work of Yeats, Eliot and Pound.

Bib: Vines, S., Movements in Modern English Poetry and Prose; Stead, C. K., The New Poetic; Ross, R. M., The Georgian Revolt: The Rise and Fall of a Poetic Ideal 1910–1922; Rogers, T. (ed.), Georgian Poetry, 1911–1922: The Critical Heritage; Reeves, J. (ed.), Georgian Poetry.

Georgic

Virgil's Georgics (from the Greek word for a farmer) comprise four poems, addressed to the Emperor Augustus (▷ Caesar, Augustus), describing the techniques of agriculture. During the 17th and 18th centuries they were extensively imitated in English, in ▷ blank verse or pentameter couplets (▷ metre), examples being ▷ John Philips' Cyder, ▷ John Dyer's The Fleece, and, in a more general way, ▷ Alexander Pope's ▷ Windsor Forest and much of ▷ William Cowper's The Task. ▷ John Gay's Trivia, set in London, is a humorous 'urban Georgie'.

Georgics

A poem on agricultural life by the Latin poet ▷ Virgil; it describes the peasant's year and contrasts the virtues of life in natural surroundings with the burdensomeness of urban luxury. The poem was of great influence on the tradition of ▷ pastoral poetry from the 16th to 18th centuries.

Germ, The (1850)

The literary magazine of the ▷ Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood lasting for only four issues from January to April 1850. ▷ Dante Gabriel Rossetti, ▷ Christina Rossetti, ▷ Coventry Patmore and Thomas Woolner (▷ 'Enoch Arden') published poetry in it. Dante Gabriel Rossetti's short story Hand and Soul was also printed in it. It was edited by the Rossettis' brother, William Michael Rossetti.

German Princess, The

▷ Carleton, Mary

German influence on English literature Unlike other European literatures, such as French or Italian, the literature of the Germanspeaking world did not begin to make itself felt in Britain to any great extent until relatively recent times. There are two reasons for this. The first is that the great flowering of a literature written in the modern form of the German language did not take place until the second half of the 18th century; the second is that German did not begin to assume the status of a major foreign language for the English until the second decade of the following century and even then it remained far behind French importance. However, there are isolated examples of such influence before the late 18th century, two of which are particularly interesting because they show clearly that the structural model of influencing and influenced literature falsifies what is a far more complex pattern of reciprocal interchange between two literary cultures. For many years it was a matter of debate whether the anonymous work Der bestrafte Brudermord was derived from one of the sources of ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Hamlet or was merely a botched version of the play. It is now thought that the German play can teach us nothing about Shakespeare's sources, but another classic of the Elizabethan stage,

Description Descr

In the cultural interchange between the two literatures Britain has on balance been the dominant partner. German men and women of letters during the 18th century were far more likely to have a lively awareness of current developments in English literature than were their English counterparts of developments in Germany. For example, the status of > Paradise Lost as an epic poem was debated, > Alexander Pope's > Rape of the Lock was read and discussed. > Oliver Goldsmith. > Edward Young, ▷ Laurence Sterne and ▷ James Thomson were all known and admired. In this way English literature was able to play a crucial role in the process by which German writers of the late 18th century succeeded in exerting their independence from the prevailing standards of neo-classical decorum which French models seemed to dictate. The writers of the Sturm und Drang ('Storm and Stress'), as later the German romantics, looked to Britain rather than France for support and justification of their revolutionary project. Shakespeare's status as a German classic dates from this time, and the early attempts of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-81), Goethe (1749-1832) and Friedrich Schiller (1759-1805), who also translated > Macbeth, to provide a repertoire for a German national theatre owed a great deal to the English dramatist. So when German theatre first made an impression in Britain, the new stimulus contained many, though unrecognized, indigenous elements. Interest in German theatre seems to have been kindled by the Scot ⊳ Henry Mackenzie who gave an address on the subject to the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1788. During the 1790s the English stage experienced a vogue for German plays, but the public's taste was essentially for the > Gothic, and the most performed writer was the justly forgotten August von Kotzebue (1761-1819). It was not in drama, however, that the first impact of the new German literature was felt but in the novel. Goethe's epistolary novel Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (The Sorrows of Young Werther, 1774) was a landmark, for it was the first work of German literature to achieve European recognition. It was translated into most European languages and reached Britain in 1779, significantly via a French version. The novel's apparent defence of suicide caused a storm of righteous indignation, but the huge popularity of the novel, here as elsewhere, had much to do with the fact that it appealed to a taste for 'sentimental' literature which had already been established in Germany and Britain by, among others, > Samuel Richardson. Other currents also made themselves felt. Bishop Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765) had stimulated Johann Herder and, through him, Goethe to explore their own native oral tradition of 'natural' Volkspoesie. This interest is reflected in the novel in Werther's admiration of ▷ Ossian (Oisin), ▷ James Macpherson's collection of supposed fragments of lost Celtic epics, which had appeared in 1765. The frustrations of the novel's middle-class hero were also felt to carry a political meaning, and in the early 1790s the young poet Robert Southey, still the unreconstructed democrat, always had the novel about him.

614

This discovery of German literature by an English audience unfortunately soon met an insurmountable obstacle in the form of war. In the wake of the > French Revolution a climate of opinion was created which was deeply and indiscriminately suspicious of all mainland European influence as Jacobin, subversive and unpatriotic. The fashion of German plays was snuffed out almost instantly, and it was not until the ending of the Napoleonic wars, with England and Prussia as victorious allies, that a new climate favourable to the reception of German writers could be created. The publication of Madame de Staël's De l'Allemagne (1813) is rightly regarded as a crucial event in this process. When English interest was reawakened, it was once again Goethe who was at the centre of controversy. It is easy to smile now at the response to the first part of Faust (1808), but the work was then felt to be deeply shocking. Quite apart from a degree of frankness in sexual matters unthinkable in an English work, there were features which were regarded as highly offensive to orthodox Christian sentiment. Goethe's reputation as an immoral author was revived, and it seems likely that fear for his own reputation played some part in > Samuel Coleridge not undertaking a commissioned translation of the work. It is one of the imbalances in the relations between English and German literature that while English classics found immensely talented translators in Germany - the Tieck-Schlegel version of Shakespeare, for example - many great German works have been either completely overlooked or ill-served by their English translators.

Of the first generation of English romantic poets only Coleridge, if we discount ▷ William Blake's idiosyncratic relationship to ▷ Emanuel Swedenborg and the visionary mystic Jakob Bohme (1575–1624), was deeply influenced by German culture. A cautious admirer of Goethe, translator of Schiller's Wallensteins Tod (Wallenstein's Death), Coleridge visited Göttingen in 1798. His thought was deeply indebted to ▷ Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744–1803) and the Naturphilosophie of Friedrich Schelling (1775–1854). ▷ William Wordsworth, who in his view of nature was far closer to Goethe than he realized, shared the opinion of many in dismissing him as an immoral and irreligious writer, but > Lord Byron and > Percy Bysshe Shelley had no sympathy with such smallmindedness. Shelley valued Faust highly, and it is a loss to English culture that his efforts at translation never extended beyond a few small fragments of the work. As for Byron, his admiration was genuine, if not matched by any great depth of response. His esteem, however, was reciprocated. Byron, whose works, > Childe Harold's Pilgrimage and > Don Juan especially, were widely read and admired in Germany as in the rest of Europe, sadly did not live to see the tribute Goethe paid him in the second part of Faust (1832), where the English poet is represented as the child of Faust and Helen. For ▷ Thomas Carlyle, Goethe and Byron signified opposite moral and artistic poles, and it was Carlyle who was the single most important conduit of German literature and thought in the 19th century. He had already published his translation of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister when, in 1839, his Critical and Miscellaneous Essays appeared, containing the many articles on German literature which he had written for the journals of the day. The work was seminal and inaugurated what was the great age of German influence in Britain. Probably inspired by Carlyle, > Matthew Arnold immersed himself in the works of Goethe and was deeply influenced by him. His discovery and admiration of Heinrich Heine (1797-1856) on the other hand was quite independent, and an appreciative essay on the later poet is included in > Essays in Criticism (1865). For Arnold, Goethe and Heine were great modern spirits in comparison with whom the English romantics were insular and intellectually deficient. Arnold's German culture extends far beyond these two authors however, and, in scope at least, he is like ➤ George Eliot in this regard. It is now appreciated that the profound influence of the so-called 'Higher Criticism' in Britain did not commence with the publication in 1846 of Eliot's translation of David Straub's Das Leben Tesu (1835) but has roots which reach back into the last quarter of the 18th century, and that Coleridge was ahead of his time in his appreciation of the significance to religion and philosophy of the German school of Biblical criticism. George Eliot is less a beginning than a culmination. Arnold had recognized in Goethe a figure who was working to 'dissolve' the dogmatic Christianity which had once been the bedrock of European civilization. It is now clear, however, that it was the Higher Criticism which, by mythologizing Christianity, undermined its claims more surely even than > Charles Darwin, the geologists and positivist science. From this it is clear that when considering the massive response of English writers to German literature at this time, no sharp line can be drawn between works of imagination on the one hand and works of historical scholarship, cultural history and philosophy on the other. If a novel of ideas such as ➤ Daniel Deronda could hardly have been written without Straub (1808-74) and Ludwig Feuerbach (1804-72), then Goethe's Wilhelm meister is scarcely less crucial. The relevance here of ▷ G. H. Lewes, whose Life of Goethe appeared in 1855, is obvious. In the last decade of the century another admirer of Goethe, Oscar Wilde, with inspired flippancy, could show in The Importance of Being Ernest young Cecily earnestly studying her German grammar under the eves of Miss Prism and the Reverend Chasuble, but for many the loss of religious faith which followed the encounter with German thought gave rise to great anguish before it brought serenity.

It is one of the paradoxes of the Victorian era that, while a series such as Bohn's Standard Library made available to a reading public a large number of German classic texts in translation, there were still many gaps and absences. The imaginative literature of the middle and second half of the century, represented by writers such as the Austrian Franz Grillparzer (1791-1872), E. Mörike (1804-75), A. Stifter (1805-68), Friedrich Hebbel (1813-63), T. Storm (1817-88), Theodor Fontane (1819-98), and the Swiss writers G. Keller (1819-90) and C. F. Meyer (1825-98) did not reach the wider audience it deserved. Because some of this literature is in a sense provincial, its failure to make much impression in Britain is less surprising than the British blindness to the considerable achievements of important earlier figures such as Heinrich von Kleist (1777-1881) or E. T. A. Hoffmann (1776-1822), though the latter was not unknown and certainly influenced Edgar Allan Poe. Of this generation it was perhaps the figure of Richard Wagner (1813-83), more associated with music than literature, whose work has had most influence on English literature. In some ways he was an important precursor of the Celtic revival, and his aesthetic theories as much as his use of the leitmotif influenced subsequent writers throughout Europe. ▶ James Joyce associated the technique with Wagner and, of course, > T. S. Eliot famously quotes Tristan und Isolde in > The Waste Land.

In the 20th century, however, the European character of ▷ modernism in literature, as of romanticism before it, is impossible to mistake, and the German presence is particularly marked even if the complex and contradictory nature of modernism makes generalization hazardous. To study the poetry of Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926) and ▷ W. B. Yeats, however, is to be conscious of a broadly similar response to a common cultural situation rather than of indebtedness or influence. Deprived of belief in orthodox religion, both poets satisfied their need for a spiritual sense of existence by creating personal mythologies which display many striking parallels with each other. Rilke is unusual in being, after Heine, who influenced > A. E. Housman, perhaps the only German writer to achieve recognition in England solely as a poet. This was certainly made possible by the Leishman, and Leishman-Spender translations, but ⊳ Stephen Spender was not alone in his generation in being able to read German literature without the need for translations. > Louis MacNeice himself was a co-translator of Faust, both ▷ W. H. Auden and ➤ Christopher Isherwood knew German, Auden translating Goethe's Italienische Reise and some works of ➤ Bertolt Brecht, During the 1930s the rise of ⊳ fascism in Germany brought about the exile of nearly every significant writer, and resistance to this evil united many writers of both countries in a sense of common purpose. In the theatre the leading German > naturalist playwright > Gerhart Hauptmann (1862-1946) may not have had the impact of the Scandinavian dramatists > Henrik Ibsen and ➤ August Strindberg but, in intellectual left-wing circles at least, he was read and admired. The presentation of industrial class conflict in Die Weber (The Weavers; 1892), where Hauptmann succeeds in creating a 'social' drama without individualized heroes, renewed interest in German theatre and in some ways foreshadowed the political commitment associated with the name of Brecht. Hauptmann is rarely performed in Britain now, but this is true of most German dramatists. German expressionist theatre swiftly found interest in Britain during the 1920s because of its radically experimental approach but only one work, G. Kaiser's (1878-1945) Von morgens bis mitternachts (From Morning to Midnight, 1916), achieved any success. The number of German plays one is likely to find regularly performed on the English stage now is relatively small in comparison to the presence of English works in German theatres.

Goethe's Faust or Schiller's Maria Stuart are occasionally done, but one is far more likely to see the plays Woyzek and Dantons Tod by Georg Buchner (1813-37). As in Germany, Buchner came to be valued only long after his premature death, but the vitality and continuing relevance of his plays and his justified reputation as an early forerunner of modern sensibility ensure continued interest in him. Frank Wedekind (1864-1918) has provided in his Fruhlings Erwachen (Spring's Awakening, 1801) a masterpiece which has triumphantly survived translation, but it was one of Wedekind's admirers, Brecht, who has had the most extensive and long-lasting influence on the theatre of the English-speaking world. His opposition to Hitler and the commitment to peace which informs all his mature work have made him more acceptable in Britain than in America where his undisguised communist sympathies have told against him. The style of his so-called Epic theatre, particularly in its rejection of naturalism and its use of music, songs and verse, has been widely imitated even where – perhaps especially where – it has been detached from its original political thrust. As clearly as any other writer Brecht shows the reciprocal forces at work in matters of cultural influence, for his Epic style received important impulses from Elizabethan theatre, especially Shakespeare. Whether his influence and reputation as a modern classic survive the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe remains to be seen.

As might be expected, it is the modern novelists who have reached the widest audiences. During the 10th century the figures of ➤ Walter Scott, ▷ William Thackeray and ▷ Charles Dickens exercised a considerable influence on the development of realist fiction in Germany, most notably on the work of Theodor Fontane. Thomas Mann (1875-1955) was closest to this tradition in his novel of the decline of a bourgeois family, Buddenbrooks (1901), and for many years was held in high esteem, but, perhaps because his later fiction took a rather different and more philosophical direction, his reputation has waned somewhat in recent years. Hermann Hesse (1877-1962), after a period of considerably popularity, has suffered a similar fate, but the fascination of the Czech Franz Kafka (1883-1924) is undiminished. All his writings are fables of alienation, and his name has become a byword for the bizarre and nightmarish. His unique vision is too personal for imitation, but it is hard to imagine how Joseph Heller's Catch 22 (1961) and Something Happened (1974) could have been written without Kafka. A very different kind of fantastic realism characterizes the work of Gunter Grass (b 1927), and, together with Henrich Böll (1917-1985), Grass stands out among the writers of the post-war generation as one whose work has spoken most immediately to his English-speaking contemporaries. An influence on the writing of ➤ Salman Rushdie is a plausible surmise: their artistic kinship is certain.

There can be little doubt that the profoundest influence on English literature and the literatures of many other countries in the 20th century stems not from the imaginative literature of Germany but from the philosophical. Probably this should not surprise us, since a philosophical tradition which goes back to ➤ Gottfried Leibniz (1646–1716) and Kant and from which emerged the towering figures of Georg Hegel, Arthur Schopenhauer and > Friedrich Nietzsche had already left its mark. In Karl Marx (1818-83) and ➤ Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), however, the German-speaking world produced two thinkers who, in contrast to Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889-1951) whose profound influence has largely been confined to specialist philosophy, have as decisively and permanently transformed the whole framework of terms within which we conceive society and the human mind, as Darwin and Einstein have transformed our understanding of the physical world. This is no less true for a writer like Vladimir Nabokov (1899–1977), who dismisses Freud as the Viennese witch-doctor, than for ▷ D. M. Thomas. For the British there is, of course, a special poignancy in this since both these radical thinkers were driven by political circumstances from their native countries and found refuge in Britain.

Goethe foresaw a time when, with the help of translation, national literatures would give way to a Weltliteratur. In the bookshops of Germany, where translations from English abound, one is inclined to feel that the day has arrived, but a visitor to a British bookshop in search of translations from the German is likely to reflect that here at least this consummation has still to come.

Ghose, Zulfikar (b 1935)

Novelist and poet. Ghose was born in Pakistan and educated at the University of Keele. During the 1960s he worked as cricket correspondent for the Observer before becoming a teacher in London and then Professor of English at the University of Texas. His trilogy, entitled The Incredible Brazilian and comprising The Native (1972), A Beautiful Empire (1975) and A Different World (1985), uses elements of > magic realism to portray the cultural history of Brazil through the reincarnations of a single character named Gregório. His other novels are: The Contradictions (1966); The Murder of Aziz Khan (1967); Crump's Terms (1975); The Texas Inheritance (1980, published under the name William Strang); Hulme's Investigations into the Bogart Script (1981); A New History of Torments (1982); Don Bueno (1983); Figures of Enchantment (1986); The Triple Mirror of the Self (1991). Short stories: (with > B.S. Johnson) Statement Against Corpses (1964). Poetry: The Loss of India (1964); Jets from Orange (1967); The Violet West (1972); A Memory of Asia (1984); Selected Poems (1991). He has also published critical works, and an autobiographical piece, Confessions of a Native-Alien (1965).

Ghosts (1890)

A play by ➤ Henrik Ibsen originally produced in Norwegian as Gengangere in 1881. One of the major plays of his ➤ realist period its early performances in London caused outrage and controversy. Its main character, the widowed Mrs Alving, has vigorously suppressed the truth concerning her profligate husband. However the truth comes back to haunt her in the form of her son Oswald who returns from Paris suffering from hereditary syphilis. The play tackles such taboo subjects as incest and euthanasia, and examines the dead conventions that smother the living society.

Giaour, The (1813)

A verse tale by > Lord Byron in tetrameter couplets (> metre) interspersed with quatrains. The word was used by the Turks as a general term for non-Muslims, especially Christians. The poem is about the love of a Turkish slave Leila for a giaour; her master causes her to be thrown into the sea, and her lover avenges her death.

> Orientalism.

Gibbon, Edward (1737-94)

One of the greatest English historians, author of ▷ The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776–88). His reputation rests almost entirely on this work, but his Memoirs (1796), put together from fragments after his death, are one of the most interesting biographies of the 18th century. In 1761 he published in French his Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature, translated into English in 1764; it was more successful abroad than at home. He was also a Member of Parliament, 1774–81.

Bib: Low, D. M., Edward Gibbon; Young, G. M., Gibbon; Sainte-Beuve, C. A., in Causeries

dy Lundi vol viii.

Gibbon, Lewis Grassic (1901-35)

Novelist. Lewis Grassic Gibbon is the pen-name of James Leslie Mitchell, a Scots writer whose most famous work, the trilogy of novels, A Scots Quair (Sunset Song, 1932, Cloud Howe, 1933, and Grey Granite, 1934) dramatizes working life in the early part of the 20th century in rural Scotland. Gibbon's work is characterized by his formally innovative combination of northeastern Scottish dialogue and speech-rhythms, mixed with a burning belief in a rural form of socialism and feminism. Gibbon also wrote seven other novels under his own name, collaborated with poet > Hugh MacDiarmid on Scottish Scene, or, The Intelligent Man's Guide to Albyn (1934), and, again under his own name, wrote three anthropological/archaeological texts. He died young, having produced a large body of wide-ranging work.

> Scottish literature in English.

Gibbons, Stella (1902-89)

Novelist. Gibbons' most famous work (perhaps more famous than its author), the novel Cold Comfort Farm (1932), was the first in a long series of astute, witty comedies of manners, a ▷ parody of both Lawrentian primitivism (▷ D. H. Lawrence) and rural fiction (popularized by writers such as Mary Webb, 1881–1927). It became a best-seller and has since been serialized for radio, and filmed for television. Gibbons also wrote short stories, poetry and many other novels; her works include The Mountain Beast and Other Poems (1930); The Untidy Gnome (1935); Roaring Tower and Other Short Stories (1937); Nightingalewood (1938); Christmas at Cold Comfort Farm and Other Stories (1940); Westwood (1946); Conference at Cold Comfort Farm (1949); Collected Poems (1951); The Shadow of a Sorcerer (1955); The Pink Front Door (1959); The Charmers (1965); The Woods in Winter (1970).

Gide, André (1869-1951)

French novelist. He developed an early preference for the sotie or récit (short prose piece) and in this form produced L'Immoraliste (1902), La Porte étroite (1909) and La Symphonie pastorale (1919). These are short, tightly-organized stories which exploit the characteristic weakness of first-person narration, in that their narratorprotagonists are without exception blind to the consequences of their words and actions (▷ narrator, unreliable). In all cases, this narrator is sharply distinguished from the author, who distances himself from his characters through irony (the title sotie denotes strong mockery). Les Caves du Vatican (1914) is a longer récit which develops the notion of the 'gratuitous act', an unmotivated and unpremediated act which would constitute an effect without a cause and novelistically represent an unpredictable element altering the course of the narration. The work also portrays the stifling, hidebound world of marriage, the family and religion, all objects of Gidean criticism. These concerns surface again in the only work which Gide called a novel, Les Faux-Monnayeurs, published in 1925. Its theme is moral and literary counterfeiting and the contrasting search for authenticity and openness (disponibilité) to experience. The experimental aspect of the novel is striking. Narrative orderliness and momentum are broken up by the plurality of angles of vision and the constant switching from one sub-plot to the next. Moreover, the author himself intervenes in the narrative to rupture any suspension of disbelief by declaring his own lack of control over characters and events. Above all, Gide makes crucial use of what he named the > mise en abyme technique, a procedure by which the novel debates its own problems. In Gide's novel, this technique is exemplified in the character Edouard. Edouard is a novelist whose diary, 'quoted' by Gide, records his difficulties in writing his own novel, itself called Les Faux-Monnayeurs. This self-consciousness, highlighting the literariness of literature, has proved influential in the subsequent development of the novel in France.

Gide also helped found the literary magazine La Nouvelle Revue française and certain of his own works first appeared in its pages (La Porte étroite, Les Caves du Vatican, Les Faux-Monnayeurs).

> French influence on English fiction.

Gielgud, Sir John (b 1904) English actor and director who first appeared on stage in 1921 at the Old Vic. He is most famous for his performances of leading roles in Shakespeare's plays, particularly during the 1930s and 40s. He began directing in 1932 with a production of Romeo and Juliet for the Oxford University Dramatic Society. His production of Hamlet at the New Theatre in 1934 ran for 155 performances and was a landmark in West End productions of Shakespeare. He has continued a distinguished acting career up to the present day. In 1991 he fulfilled his long-held ambition to put his performance of Prospero on film, in an innovative and experimental version of The Tempest by British director Peter Greenaway, Prospero's Books.

➤ Olivier, Laurence; Littlewood, Joan. Bib: Gielgud, J., Early Stages; Gielgud, J., Stage Directions; Hayman, R., John Gielgud.

Giffard, Anna Marcella
➤ Giffard, Henry.

Giffard, Henry (1694-1772)

Actor, manager. The date and place of his first stage performance are uncertain, but by 1720 at the latest he was acting at the ▷ Smock Alley Theatre in Dublin, where he remained for at least seven years, acting in a variety of young romantic lead roles. He married his second wife, Anna Marcella Lyddall (1707–77), the actress and singer, € 1729.

By 1731 Giffard and his wife had appeared at the ➤ Haymarket Theatre, but later that year he took over running ➤ Goodman's Fields Theatre, refurbishing it and engaging a number of new actors. He opened a new theatre, also known as Goodman's Fields, in 1733. In 1737 he took the script of a satiric play to ➤ Sir Robert Walpole, and this was used, in part, by the Government as a pretext for passing the Licensing Act (➤ Theatres). Lacking a patent, Giffard was forced out of business, although he subsequently staged some performances at the fringes of the law, including the first performance of ➤ The Winter's Tale for over a hundred years.

By 1740 Giffard had successfully petitioned for permission to re-open Goodman's Fields, both managing and acting at the theatre. His reputation later rested not so much on his acting talents, which were not always wholeheartedly received, as on his abilities as a manager. He was also remembered for his encouragement of other actors, not least > David Garrick, to whom he gave his first acting opportunity, in 1741.

Giffard, William (1756-1826)

Journalist. He began as a shoemaker's apprentice, and rose to be an influential writer and editor of the right-wing press. He edited The Anti-Jacobin (1797-8) to counteract opinion sympathetic to the ▷ French Revolution, and became editor of the famous Conservative ▷ Quarterly Review in 1800.

Gilbert, Ann (1782–1866)

Poet, reviewer, children's author, diarist and autobiographer. Gilbert's writing equalled that of her more famous sister, > Jane Taylor, and both were precocious children and prolific authors. Her first book of poems, Original Poems (1804-5), was immediately successful and led to her undertaking the editorship of The Eclectic Review. In this capacity she reviewed contemporary novels. After her marriage to Revd Joseph Gilbert in 1813, she moved to Sheffield and Nottingham and turned her literary skills to more political matters, writing against slavery (▶ Abolition literature), in favour of temperance, and offering general advice on government legislation. Gilbert had kept a diary from an early age and at 66 she began to transform some of the material into an > autobiography; it was never finished, but the extant material was published posthumously in 1874.

Gilbert, Sir William Schwenck (1836-1911) English dramatist most famous for his partnership with Sir Arthur Sullivan. Together they produced the famous Savoy operas, so called because they were produced at the Savov Theatre; Gilbert wrote the libretti and Sullivan composed the music. The partnership began with Thespis; or, The God Grown Old in 1871 and concluded with The Grand Duke (1896). The best known of these light operas are HMS Pinafore (1878), The Pirates of Penzance (1880), Iolanthe (1882), The Mikado (1885) and The Gondoliers (1889). Gilbert's plays are rarely performed now, although Engaged (1887) has received attention for its influence on ▶ Oscar Wilde's > The Importance of Being Earnest. Bib: Cox-Ife, W., Gilbert: Stage Director; Sutton, M., Gilbert.

Gildas (d 570)

A British monk, living in the west of England, whose work, De Excidio Britanniae (About the Fall of Britain), written about 547, provides the only contemporary account of 6th-century Britain. It was written as a polemical piece, aimed at provoking the reform of British ecclesiastics and leaders. Gildas provides a preface to his complaint in which he sketches the course of British history after the Roman withdrawal. No mention is made of ▷ Arthur in his narrative, but the British triumph against Saxon aggressors at Badon (a victory later attributed to Arthur) is noted. Gildas' narrative was later used by ▶ Bede and thus indirectly helped to shape the representation of the British past in all the major insular histories of the medieval period. ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth reworked parts of Gildas' text in his > Historia Regum Britanniae.

Gildon, Charles (1665–1724) English author and editor, he was an early epitome of a > hack, turning his hand to any literary endeavour that might earn him some money. His productions included > pamphlets, a collection of poems, dialogues, and other items entitled Miscellany (1692), a Life of the actor > Thomas Betterton (1710), and a revision of Langbaine's An Account of the Dramatic Poets (1696), as well as editions of works by ▷ Shakespeare and by ▷ Aphra Behn (1696). Numerous plays are attributed to Gildon himself, including The Roman Bride's Revenge (1696), Phaeton (1698), Love's Victim (1701), and The Patriot (1703); several of these involve revisions of earlier plays. He also on occasion acted as stage producer. Bib: Backscheider, P. (ed.), The Plays of Charles Gildon.

Gilfillan, George (1813-1878)

An enthusiastic and exuberant reviewer and critic who frequently wrote under the name 'Apollodorus'. He championed the work of > Philip James Bailey, Alexander Smith and ➤ Sydney Dobell, later satirized by ➤ William Aytoun as the ➤ 'Spasmodic' school of poetry. A Scots burgher minister in Dundee, he shared ➤ Carlyle's dogmatism and tendency to pontificate and his influence on early Victorian poetic taste was as powerful as Carlyle's, although their views on art differed significantly. He rapidly established a wide reputation with his Galleries of Literary Portraits (1845-54) and his articles in the Quarterly, the Eclectic, Tait's Magazine and Hogg's Instructor. His reputation waned, however, as a result of Aytoun's satiric portrait of him in Firmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy. His Letters and Journals were published in 1892. Bib: Nicoll, W. Robertson, Gilfillan's Literary

Gilfil's Love-Story, Mr
One of ➤ George Eliot's ➤ Scenes of Clerical Life.

Portraits; Buckley, J.H., The Victorian Temper.

Gilpin, William (1724–1804)

Theorist. Gilpin's work was very important in establishing the cult of the ▷ Picturesque, as well as in heralding certain themes valued by the ▷ Romantic poets. He based his ideas upon journeys he undertook to the most 'picturesque' parts of Britain, including the Lake District and the Scottish Highlands, and published his theories in Three Essays: On Picturesque Beauty; On Picturesque Travel; and On Sketching Landscapes (1792). His efforts were not universally praised, and he was satirized in the figure of Dr Syntax by ▷ Combe.

Gilroy, Beryl (b 1924) Novelist. Born and brought up in Guyana, Gilroy trained as a teacher and worked for UNICEF. In 1951 she moved to Britain where she studied at the universities of London and Sussex. She has worked as a journalist, teacher and head-teacher in London. Her novels are Frangipani House (1986), about the indignities suffered by an old and infirm woman in Guyana, Boy-Sandwich (1989) and Sunlight on Sweet Water (1994). She has also published fiction for children and Black Teacher (1970), which is autobiographical.

'Girl of the Period, The' (1868)

An essay by ➤ Eliza Lynn Linton, published in The Saturday Review. It caused much controversy, was sold worldwide and was described as 'an epoch-making essay'. The 'Girl of the Period' is depicted as a frivolous, extravagant creature 'who dyes her hair and paints her face . . . whose sole idea of life is fun' and who shows no respect for men, > marriage or motherhood. Linton laments this 'pitiable mistake and . . . grand national disaster' and calls for a return to a past ideal of womanhood. The essay does not touch upon issues central to women's lives in the 1860s such as higher > education, work, or > women's suffrage, but it caused a furore and sparked numerous imitations.

> 'Woman Question, The'.

Gissing, George Robert (1857-1903) Novelist; author of: Workers in the Dawn (1880); The Unclassed (1884); > Demos (1886); A Life's Morning (1888); The Nether World (1889); The Emancipated (1890); ➤ New Grub Street (1891); Born in Exile (1892); > The Odd Women (1893); The Town Traveller (1898); The Crown of Life (1899); Our Friend the Charlatan (1901); By the Ionian Sea (1901); The Private Papers of Henry Ryecfroft (1903). Posthumous: the historical novel Veranilda (1904) and Will Warburton (1905). Of these, much the best known is New Grub Street, a study of literary life in late 19th-century London. Gissing saw with deep foreboding the spread of a commercialized culture which would so oppress the disinterested artist and so encourage the charlatan that, in his view, national culture was bound to deteriorate, with concomitant effects on the quality of civilization as a whole. The partial fulfilment of his predictions has given this novel in particular a greatly revived prestige. His vision was serious and sombre, and he depicted the enclosed, deprived world of the poor of his time in Demos and The Nether World. Thyrza and Henry Ryecroft are other novels which are singled out from his work. He was deeply interested in > Charles Dickens and his study of that novelist (1898) is among the best on the subject; but he had also been affected by the austere, scrupulous artistry of the French 19th-century novelists > Flaubert and > Zola. His best work often has a strong autobiographical content, characteristic of some of his contemporaries, such as ➤ William Hale White and ➤ Samuel Butler ➤ Newspapers and periodicals.

620

Bib: Donnelly, M., Gissing, Grave Comedian;
Org, J., Gissing; Roberts, M., The Private Life of Henry Maitland (novel based on Gissing's life); Poole, A., Gissing in Context; Pollic, M., The Alien Art: A Critical Study George Gissing's Novels.

Gladstone, William Ewart (1809-98) One of the principal British statesmen of the 19th century and a leader, first of the Tories (Conservatives) and later, Prime Minister four times, of the Liberals. His strength lay in finance he was an advocate of ▷ free trade – and domestic reform; late in life he advocated and came near to bringing about self-government for Ireland (Irish Home Rule). His personality was impressive and his ardour and energy very great, but he lacked the intimate charm and subtle wit of his opponent ➤ Benjamin Disraeli, whom he fought with almost religious dedication. Their rivalry is often recalled as a golden age of English parliamentarianism by those who see public competition and conflict between individuals as the most productive form of political activity.

Gladstone was a man of deep culture, a classical scholar who published studies of ancient Greek literature. His reforms were important in removing abuses and improving justice and equality in the universities, the army, the > franchise, the right to form and maintain > trade unions, and recruitment to the military and civil services.

Glasse, Hannah (1708-70)

Writer, especially on housekeeping, she was at one time 'Habit Maker' to the Princess of Wales. Glasse prided herself on the plainness and simplicity of her writing style, so that the most ignorant servant would be able to understand it. Her works include The Compleat Confectioner (1742), The Art of Cookery Made Plain and Easy (1747), and The Servant's Directory, or House-keeper's Companion (1760). All of these were hugely popular. Four children's books are also attributed to her.

Glastonbury

A town in Somerset where there are the ruins of a great Benedictine abbey. In prehistoric times it was almost a lake island, being set in a group of hills surrounded by low-lying country; the highest of the hills, Glastonbury Tor, appears to have figured in early myths as a point of contact with, and entry to, the Otherworld. Thus the notion of Glastonbury as a spiritual centre seems to be of great antiquity.

Many myths and legends have been generated about Glastonbury Abbey. It was the site of an early Celtic Christian community from the 6th century, but it was reputed to be the site of the first Christian church in Britain, founded by Joseph of Arimathea, the rich man described in the Gospels who buried Christ in his own sepulchre. Joseph was reputed to have planted his staff at Glastonbury, and this miraculously became the Glastonbury thorn, a tree which flowers at Christmas. The discovery and excavation of the graves of ➤ King Arthur and ➤ Guinevere at Glastonbury in 1191 encouraged the identification of Glastonbury with the island of ➤ Avalon, and the connection between Arthurian history and Glastonbury was further developed in the Arthurian narratives much recount the history and quest of the Holy ▷ Grail, which was reputed to have been brought to Britain by Joseph of Arimathea. At the end of > Malory's > Morte D'Arthur, > Lancelot retires from the world to live as a hermit in the Glastonbury area. Bib: Treharne, R. F., The Glastonbury Legends.

Globe Theatre

The theatre used by the Lord ➤ Chamberlain's Men; ➤ Shakespeare's plays were performed there, he acted in it, and was one of the shareholders. It was built by > Richard Burbage in 1599 out of the materials of 'The Theatre' erected in 1576; the new site was at > Bankside on the south bank of the Thames in Southwark. It was built of wood, open in the centre, and the surrounding galleries ('this wooden O' – Prologue, \triangleright Henry V) were roofed with thatch. It is thought to have held about 3,000 spectators. From the roof flew a flag depicting Atlas carrying a globe with a Latin inscription equivalent to 'All the world's a stage' (> As You Like It II. vii. 138). The theatre was burnt down in 1613 during a performance of ▷ Henry VIII, rebuilt, and finally pulled down in 1644. Much of the information about the Globe comes from the contract for the Fortune Theatre (built in 1599), the structure of which is specified as resembling the Globe, except that the Fortune was square. A panoramic view of London dated 1616 gives a view of the Globe among other theatres. In the main, the structure of the Globe, like that of its contemporaries, derived from that of the typical inn-yard where plays were commonly performed when theatres were not available.

Under the inspired leadership of Sam Wannemaker and the auspices of the International Shakespeare Globe Centre, the Globe has risen again in Southwark, according to its original specifications and near to its old site. The original Globe's foundations have been discovered, but in the 1990s have been reconcealed within the foundations of a highrise office block. Wannemaker's Globe will be the first all-timber building licensed in London in the 20th century and will cater for international performances of Shakespeare, lectures and exhibitions.

> Theatres.

Bib: Orrell, J., The Quest for Shakespeare's Globe.

Gloriana

The ➤ Faerie Queene of ➤ Edmund Spenser's poem; she represents ➤ Elizabeth I.

Glorious Revolution

A name given to the removal by Parliament of ➤ King James II (1685–88) and the substitution of his daughter > Mary II and her husband ▶ William III in 1688. The reason for the quarrel between James and Parliament was not so much that James was a > Catholic as that he was using every means in his power to assert the superiority of royal power (in the name of his religion) over the power of Parliament. His policy united the whole nation against him, except for a very small minority of Catholics, and the success of Parliament finally settled the question of whether sovereign power lay with the king or with Parliament; this problem had been left unsolved when the period of republican rule (1640-60) had been succeeded by the Restoration of the monarchy. In 1688 the Revolution was a bloodless one, though there was subsequently some fighting in ▶ Ireland and Scotland. The consequences of the event were that the passionate religious and political disagreements which had so divided the nation since the beginning of the 17th century were greatly lessened, and a new temper of reasonable debate took their place; the change is typified by the Letters concerning Toleration (begun 1689) by the philosopher ➤ John Locke.

> Exclusion Bills.

Glover, Richard (1712-85)

Member of ▷ Parliament for Weymouth (1761-8), and author of epics and plays. His ▷ ballad 'Hosier's Ghost', which attacked the naval policy of the ▷ Walpole government, was printed in ▷ Thomas Percy's Reliques.

Glyndŵr, Owain (?1354-?1416)
A Welsh chieftain who rebelled against ➤ Henry IV of England, and for a time ruled most of ➤ Wales. He was eventually defeated by Henry's son, the future ➤ Henry V.

Glyndŵr is a character in Shakespeare's play

➤ Henry IV, Part I as an ally of the English rebel Hotspur. He is there presented as a boastful poet and mystic, such being reputed qualities of the Welsh.

Goblin Market and Other Poems (1862)
The first published collection of poems by ➤ Christina Rossetti. The title poem is a narrative concerning two sisters; Laura, who succumbs to the temptation to eat the luscious fruit of the rapacious goblin men which she pays for with a lock of her hair, and Lizzie, who saves her from the physical and psychological decline of unassuaged addiction by seeking out the goblins' fruit but refusing to consume it herself. Enraged by her resistance, the goblins press the fruit on to her body. When Laura eats and drinks the fruit from Lizzie it acts as an antidote, the goblins' power is defeated and she is cured. The poem is a rich blend of fantasy, allegory, fairytale and Victorian Christian morality, erotically suggestive and linguistically complex. It has generated much psychoanalytic and feminist criticism, being interpreted as a > lesbian fantasy, a female myth and a poem concerned with women's relationship to language. It is Rossetti's most famous work and a strong and sinister Victorian evocation of desire, fear and compulsion.

Other notable poems in the collection include the enigmatic and elusive 'Echo', 'Winter: My Secret', and 'A Triad', in which Rossetti criticizes the amatory possibilities available to women. The collection established Rossetti as a significant voice in Victorian poetry. Bib: Moers, E., Literary Women; Mermin, D., 'Heroic Sisterhood in Goblin Market', Victorian Poetry, 21 (1983), 107–18; Galligani Casey, J., 'The Potential of Sisterhood: Christina Rossetti's Goblin Market', Victorian Poetry, 29 (1991), 63–78; Leighton, A., Victorian Women Poets: Writing Against the Heart.

Godber, John (b 1956)

Dramatist and director. The son of a miner, Godber began writing short stories for Radio Sheffield at the age of sixteen, trained as a teacher and taught for five years, while doing postgraduate work in drama at the University of Leeds. He is most closely associated with the Hull Truck Theatre Co, of which he has been artistic director since 1984. His involvement with Hull Truck is an expression of his commitment to a 'genuinely serious popular theatre' and also to a theatre outside London.

Most of his plays are social comedies which take place in public arenas and are generally concerned with what Godber has called 'working class leisure activities'; Up 'N' Under (1984) and Cramp (1986) both take a sport as their central device. Intensely physical pieces of theatre, they draw heavily on caricature for effect as do Bouncers (1985) and Putting on the Ritz (1987), both of which are set in discos. Up 'N' Under uses rugby league as a means of exploring the contradictions of machismo and the energy and resources devoted to the game. It also becomes a powerful image of resources that have gone to waste in contemporary Britain (body building is used similarly in Cramp). Bouncers, similarly, adopts a fairly ambivalent stance towards its macho, working class characters. It has been produced on both the east and west coasts of the U.S.A., as well as in Australia, Germany, Belgium and Israel. Other plays include: On the Piste (1993) and April in Paris (1994)

Godwin, William (1756-1836)

Philosopher and novelist. His central belief was that reason was sufficient to guide the conduct, not merely of individuals but also of all society. His principal work was The Inquiry concerning Political Justice (1793). Man he believed to be innately good and, under guidance of reason, capable of living without laws or control. Punishments he declared (at a time when the English penal system was one of the severest in Europe) to be unjust; as were the accumulation of property and the institution of marriage. The Prime Minister, > William Pitt (the Younger), decided that the book was too expensive to be dangerous. Godwin's best-known novel came out in 1794: Caleb Williams was written to demonstrate the power for injustice accessible to the privileged classes. Godwin was a brave man, not merely with the pen; but his naivety as a thinker would have left him without influence if his opinions had not agreed so well with the more extreme currents of feeling provoked by the contemporary > French Revolution. As it was, he influenced a number of better minds, including, for a very short time, the poet > Coleridge and, for a much longer period, > Shelley, who became his son-in-law. Godwin's wife was ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft, an early propagandist for the rights of women and authoress of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792).

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (1749-1832) German poet; the greatest European man of letters of his time. His fame was due not only to the wide scope of his imaginative creation, but to the many-sidedness and massive independence of his personality. From 1770 to 1788 he was an inaugurator and leader of the passionate outbreak known in German as the Sturm und Drang - 'storm and stress'- movement, but from 1788 (after his visit to Italy) he represented to the world a balanced harmony inspired by the classicism he had found there. But he did not lose his sense that the spirit is free to find its own fulfilment according to its own principle of growth. At the same time, from 1775 he was prominent in the affairs of the German principality of Weimar (whose prince was his friend), concerning himself with practical sciences useful to the state, and thence with a serious study of botany and other natural and physical sciences to the point of making significant contributions to scientific thought. His commanding mind was admired in France. England, and Italy, with whose literatures Goethe was in touch; he corresponded with > Byron, and > Walter Scott translated his Goetz von Berlichingen, which dated from the romantic phase of Goethe's career.

Goethe is most famous for his double drama of > Faust, but other works that became famous in England include the romantic drama already mentioned; the epic Hermann and Dorothea; a study in Romantic sensibility The Sorrows of Young Werther; the novel Wilhelm Meister, and a large body of ▷ lyrical verse.

➤ German influence on English literature.

Gogol, Nikolai Vasilyevich (1809-52) Playwright, novelist and short story writer, Gogol was born in the Ukraine. He worked as a civil service clerk in St Petersburg, which he hated, but made notes for future use in the portrayal of characters. He was a brilliant but unbalanced man, suffering hallucinations and prone to religious extremism. At one stage he walked everywhere sideways, keeping his back to the wall for fear of being stabbed, and he had a pathological fear of eternal damnation. He admired Shakespeare, ➤ Henry Fielding and ➤ Laurence Sterne among others, and is thought to have greatly influenced Dostoevsky. His first collection of stories was Evenings at a Farmhouse Near Dikana (1831-2) which describe Ukranian country life. Taras Bulba (1834) has a Cossack tale as its title story, and Mirgorod and Arabeski followed in 1835. The play, The Government Inspector (1836) is a savage satire of civil servants and bureaucracy. His St Petersburg stories, including 'Nevsky Prospekt', 'Notes of a Madman' and 'The Portrait' (1835), 'The Nose' (1836) and 'The Greatcoat' (1842), have a surreal quality. The farce Marriage (1842) was successful. Dead Souls (1842), begun in Italy, combines satire, humour and brilliant characterization, but during increasing bouts of religious fervour, Gogol burnt the manuscript of the second part, along with further manuscripts. Selected Passages from Correspondance with Friends (1847), for which he was rebuked, was an attempt to convey his moral scruples. His work is remarkable for the power of his language and imagination.

Golden Age

> Ages, Golden, Silver, etc.

Golden Bowl, The (1904)

A novel by > Henry James. The theme is the relationship of four people: the American millionaire collector, Adam Verver; his daughter, Maggie; the Italian prince, Amerigo, whom Verver acquires as a husband for his daughter; and Charlotte Stant, whom Maggie acquires as a wife for her widowed father. To the grief of the father and the daughter Charlotte seduces the prince into becoming her lover; the story is about the defeat of Charlotte, and Maggie's recovery of the prince's affections.

The novel belongs to James' last phase, which some critics consider to be his best, and other consider to show an excessive obliquity of style. The language of the characters is charged with feeling and yet disciplined by their civilized restraint and their fear of degrading themselves and one another by damaging explicitness. It is a measure of their indirectness that the affair between the prince and Charlotte is never actually mentioned between the father and the daughter. Behind the conflict of personalities there is the theme of the clash between European and American kinds of values and consciousness; this theme is conspicuous in James' early novels, and he returned to it in his last period after a middle phase in which he was chiefly concerned with the European, and particularly the English, scene.

Golden Legend, The

A medieval collection of lives of the saints, sermons, religious commentaries, etc., begun in the 13th century. It was printed by the first English printer, > William Caxton.

Golden Notebook, The (1962)

Novel by Doris Lessing, an important > feminist text despite its author's reservations about such a categorization. The novel is a relatively early example of the multiple narratives, indeterminacy and paradox which characterize > post-modernist fiction. A series of realist episodes (entitled 'free women') from the lives of two women friends, Anna and Molly, are interspersed with excerpts from the four notebooks - red, yellow, blue and black - in which Anna records different aspects of her life and thought, including a novel that she is writing. The book culminates in a transformation of the self through traumatic mental breakdown, recorded in the final golden notebook: an important example of the feminist theme of mental disturbance as a reaction against social constraint or the oppression of a given feminine role. The conclusion of The Golden Notebook involves a > mise en abyme, as different narrative levels seem to contradict each other.

Golding, Arthur (?1536–1605)
Translator. Golding's chief work was an important translation of ▷ Ovid's Metamorphoses (1565–67) that was instrumental in promoting knowledge of Ovidian subjects and forms in England.

Golding, Sir William (1911-93)

Novelist. His novels are: Lord of the Flies (1954; filmed 1963); The Inheritors (1955); Pincher Martin (1956); The Spire (1964); The Pyramid (1967); Darkness Visible (1979); Rites of Passage (1980); The Paper Men (1984); Close Quarters (1987); Fire Down Below (1989). Sometime, Never (1956) and The Scorpion God (1971) are collections of novellas. He has also written a play, The Brass Butterfly (1958), and published two collections of essays, The Hot Gates (1965) and A Moving Target (1982).

No novelist who started his career since 1945 has achieved more prestige, and this was acquired very quickly on the publication of his first book, Lord of the Flies. Its fame has no doubt been in part due to its pessimistic vision of human nature as inherently violent, reflecting the mood of the post-war and post-Hitler years; it also epitomizes mid-20th-century disillusionment with 19th-century optimism about human nature. Golding's father (see 'The Ladder and the Tree' in The Hot Gates) was a schoolmaster with radical convictions in politics, a belief that religion is outmoded superstition, and a strong faith in science. Golding's own work is strongly, but not explicitly, religious, in the Puritan tradition which emphasizes Original Sin. In 'Fable' (The Hot Gates) he explains how his first novel arose from his insights in the last war: 'Anyone who moved through those years without understanding that man produces evil as a bee produces honey, must have been blind or wrong in the head.' The book is also meant to counteract what may be called 'the desert island myth' in English literature, deriving from ➤ Daniel Defoe's > Robinson Crusoe, and particularly evident in a famous book for boys, The Coral Island (1857) by R. M. Ballantyne. This myth nourished the belief that human beings in isolation from civilized restraints will sustain their humanity by innate virtues. Most of the boys in Lord of the Flies quickly degenerate into savages, and the process is made more horrifying by the convincing delineation of the characters: Golding, like his father, has been a schoolmaster. His later novels have shown variety of theme and treatment, but similar preoccupation with fundamental corruption and contradiction in human nature. They show, likewise, Golding's most conspicuous literary qualities: great inventiveness in realistic fantasy, and a disposition to use the novel form as fable. For instance, The Inheritors is > science fiction about the remote human past: the elimination of innocent Neanderthal Man by the arrival of rapacious Homo Sapiens - a new version of the myth of the Fall. Pincher Martin is a dramatization of this rapacity in an individual, and a spectacular example of fantasy presented within the conventions of realism. The Spire shows comparable ingenuity used quite differently: it describes the building of the spire of Salisbury Cathedral and dramatizes the conflict between faith and reason. Rites of Passage (which won the Booker Prize) employs a characteristic shift of perspective: the narrow viewpoint of the narrator, a snobbish young aristocrat on a voyage to Australia in the early 10th century, is undermined by his gradual understanding of the devastating experiences of an awkward but sincere clergyman. The story of the voyage is continued in Close Quarters and Fire Down Below and the trilogy was collected, with revisions, as To The Ends of the Earth (1991). Golding received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1983 and was knighted in 1988.

Bib: Gregor, I., and Kinkead-Weekes, M., William Golding: a Critical Study; Johnston, A., Of Earth and Darkness; Medcalf, S., William Golding.

Goldoni, Carlo (1707-93)

Italian dramatist, much influenced by ➤ Molière and the > commedia dell'arte, who in turn influenced the English stage. He wrote some 250 comedies, tragedies, tragi-comedies and opera libretti in French, Italian and his native Venetian dialect. He reformed the Italian theatre, modernizing both the language and the action of the drama, and increasingly reflecting middle and even lower-class values and taste, so as to bring the stage closer to its audience. He adapted the commedia dell'arte to make it more socially relevant, and contributed to the emerging opera buffa, a form of comic opera without spoken dialogue. Among Goldoni's most famous pieces are La Locandiera (The Mistress of the Inn), and I Due Gemelli Veneziani (The Venetian Twins), written between 1748-52, and Arlecchino. Servitore di Due Patroni (Harlequin, the Servant of Two Masters) (1753). In 1761 he became attached to the French court, where he stayed until the Revolution (> French Revolution). > Italian influence on English literature.

Goldsmith, Oliver (1730-74)

Dramatist, novelist, essayist, and poet. Born in Ireland, he studied at Trinity College, Dublin, but ran away to Cork after being disciplined by his tutor. He returned, however, and graduated in 1749. He applied for ordination, but was rejected, then was given 50 pounds to study for the law, but gambled it away. After this, he studied medicine at Edinburgh and at Leyden but it is unclear whether he obtained the medical degree to which he later laid claim. In 1756 he came to London, penniless, and supported himself with a variety of occupations, including messenger, teacher, apothecary's assistant, usher, and \triangleright hack writer for a periodical.

In 1758 he translated Marteilhe's Memoirs of a Protestant, Condemned to the Galleys of France for His Religion and in 1759 his Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe. His 'Chinese Letters', written for John Newbery's The Public Ledger (1760-1) were reissued in 1762 as > The Citizen of the World, a satiric view of England written from the supposed viewpoint of a Chinaman. His first real success as a writer was with the poem 'The Traveller'. published in 1764. A number of his works are now highly valued, including A Citizen of the World; his life of > Beau Nash (1762); his novel, > The Vicar of Wakefield; a poem, > The Deserted Village; and the plays > The Good Natur'd Man (1768), and ▷ She Stoops to Conquer (1773) written, like the plays of > Richard Brinsley Sheridan, in reaction to the sentiment of many plays of the period, and with the intention to revive the spirit of Restoration comedy. He wrote much else, including histories of England, Greece and Rome, and biographies of Voltaire, > Bolingbroke and > Parnell.

Goldsmith was a friend of ➤ David Garrick and ⊳ Samuel Johnson, and figures largely in > James Boswell's Life of Johnson (1791). Johnson praised his writing for its 'clarity and elegance', and later generations have repeatedly praised his literary 'charm', a quality made up of humour, modesty, vitality, and graceful lucidity. These he combined with the ➤ Augustan properties of balance and proportion. He died of a fever, deeply in debt, and the Literary Club (> Club, The) which he had helped to found in 1764 erected a monument to him in Westminster Abbey. Garrick wrote an ⊳ epitaph to comment on his greatness as an author and reputed failings in other areas: 'Here lies Nolly Goldsmith, for shortness called Noll, Who wrote like an angel, but talked like poor Poll'.

Bib: Forster, J., and Wardle, R. M. Lives; Balderston, K. B. (ed.), Letters; Ginger, J., The Notable Man; Danziger, M. K., Oliver Goldsmith and Richard Brinsley Sheridan; Swarbrick, A. (ed.), The Art of Oliver Goldsmith.

Goliardic

A descriptive term applied to a satirical and profane kind of Latin poetry, allegedly produced in the 12th and 13th centuries by a class of clerical writers known as goliards, named after a certain 'Golias' (whose own name derives perhaps from the Latin word for glutton 'gula'). The notion of such a company of poets seems to be a literary myth.

Goncourt, Edmond Louis Antonine Huot de (1822–96) and Jules Alfred Huot de (1830–70)

The brothers, novelists, historians and art critics, of an old Lorraine family, collected books, pictures, manuscripts and furnishings, collaborating on several books of history and art criticism. They wrote novels which are now not much read but helped make literary history, originating the 'roman documentaire' with its painstaking naturalistic detail, believing novelists should write 'history which might have happened'. After Jules' death, Edmond wrote some further novels and the famous Journal des Goncourt which portrayed literary life in Paris 1851-96. The Académie Goncourt was founded under the terms of Edmond's will; it awards the annual Prix Goncourt for imaginative prose. Germinie Lacerteux (1864) details the history of their maid, faithfully serving while living a life of vice and debauchery. Other novels include Soeur Philomène (1861) and Madam Gervaisais (1869). Non-fiction includes L'Art du dixhuitième siècle (1859-75) and Portraits intimes du dix-huitième siècle (1857). Novels written by Edmond alone include Les Frères Zemganno (1879), La Faustin (1882) and Chérie (1884).

Gondal

An imaginary world created by ➤ Emily and ➤ Anne Brontë around 1834 when they broke away from ➤ Charlotte and Branwell, who were engaged in the creation of ➤ Angria. None of the prose writings of Gondal survive, although many of Emily's poems take on the persona of a Gondal character such as Augusta Geraldine Almeda or Julius Brenzaida. Gondal continued to be a source of imaginative engagement for Emily and Anne as late as 1845, when Emily was twenty-seven and Anne twenty-five. Bib: Ratchord, F., Gondal's Queen.

Gooch, Elizabeth Sarah (b 1756) Novelist, poet and autobiographer. Elizabeth Gooch's most fascinating work is her. > autobiography, Life (1792), partly because of the difficulties she encountered and the sordid world she was forced to live in, but mainly because of the rapid-paced narrative and her penchant for vivid sensationalism. She was the daughter of a Portuguese Jewish father who died when she was three, and her stepfather never fully accepted her into his family. She was sent to school at Fountains Abbey where she entered into a romance, which was thwarted. Following this she was 'married off' to William Gooch who was more interested in her dowry than in showing her any real affection. It was not long before Gooch accused her of adultery and sent her to France, where she became a prostitute. The subsequent years saw a series of escapades in which she acted on stage, fled from debtors, disguised herself as a man so as to follow her lover into battle, and persistently tried to wring money out of her embarrassed family. By 1788 she was in prison, from where she wrote Appeal to the Public. Gooch's later life is obscure, but several novels and a biography of Thomas Bellamy, all written between 1795 and 1800, remain.

Good (1981)

D. C. P. Taylor's last play was notable for its willingness to confront the banality of evil in its study of its protagonist's gradual drift into Nazism through all the daily minor compromises, adjustments and accommodations which take him from being an emotional advocate of euthanasia in his fiction to advising on giving the Final Solution a caring façade. We can see the terrible seductive power of Nazism as something which offers the protagonist (given a fine performance by Alan Howard in the original RSC production) the possibility of a fixed position in a sea of moral uncertainties and doubts. The idea that public postures have the configuration of private derangements achieves a memorable form: throughout the play he is haunted by snatches of music, so that the discovery that the prisoners' band which greets him at Auschwitz is real represents his complete surrender to the inverted logic of the Third Reich.

Goodman's Fields Theatres

The first Goodman's Fields Theatre of which any details survive was opened by theatre manager and dramatist Thomas Odell (1691-1749) in Whitechapel in 1729, and lasted intermittently until 1751; another theatre by the same name was opened by ▶ Henry Giffard in Ayliff Street in 1733. Like several other theatres this was ordered to close in 1737 under the terms of the Licensing Act (▶ theatres), but continued performances at the fringe of the law until 1741, the year of ▶ David Garrick's professional debut at this venue as ▶ Richard III. The theatre became a warehouse, and burned down in 1802. The present building dates from 1812.

Good-Natur'd man, The (1768)

> Oliver Goldsmith's first play, a > satire on genteel or sentimental commedy (▷ sentiment) and contemporary theories of benevolence. Young Mr Honeywood, the eponymous goodnatured man, is so afraid of hurting or offending others that he entirely neglects his own interest. He runs himself into debt in order to treat his supposed friends, and even woos Miss Richland, whom he himself loves, on behalf of the vain and scoundrelly Jack Lofty, falsely believing him to be a man of honour. Honeywood's uncle, Sir William Honeywood, whose own good nature is far more discerning, vows to teach him a lesson, and arranges for bailiffs to arrest him. Miss Richland secretly pays his debts, and he is finally shamed into admitting the folly of his behaviour, while his uncle admonishes him to respect himself, for 'He who seeks only for applause from without, has all his happiness in another's keeping'.

In a related plot Miss Richland's guardian, Nicholas Croaker, wishes to force her and his son Leontine to marry. They are equally reluctant: Miss Richland loves Honeywood, while Leontine loves Olivia, whom he has brought to England masquerading as his long-departed sister as she in turn evades another odious guardian. They attempt to elope, but are discovered. Eventually all turns out well, and the various pairs of lovers are united.

The play was originally produced at > Covent Garden, with the part of Sir William being played by > Garrick. But at its first performance the bailiffs' scene was hissed by the audience as too 'low'. The scene was cut for a time, and the play became a success.

Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex

A tragic drama by ➤ Thomas Norton (1552–84) and ➤ Thomas Sackville. The story is taken from British legendary history; the immediate source is Grafton's Chronicle (1556) but this in turn derives from the 12th-century ➤ Historia Regum Britanniae (History of the Kings of Britain) by ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth. It is the first play to be written in ▷ blank verse, and is modelled on the tragedies of ▷ Seneca.

Gorboduc is a king of Britain. His reign has been a prosperous one, when he decides to retire from government and divide his kingdom between his two sons, Ferrex and Porrex. He carries out the division against the advice of his wisest councillor. Jealousy and distrust between the two brothers break into civil war, which ends in the death of both and a rising of the whole people, who slay Gorboduc and his queen. The, country is saved from final ruin only by Fergus, Duke of Albany, who, with the aid of other nobles, succeeds in restoring order under single sovereignty.

The drama has slight literary value of its own, but it has considerable historical significance. Sackville and Norton were eminent politicians who foresaw great dangers to the kingdom if ➤ Queen Elizabeth I should die without heirs. The play was first acted before the queen in 1562 and is plainly designed as a warning to her against leaving her kingdom exposed to disunity. The authors are thus using history (or legend, which was not clearly distinguished from history) as later and greater dramatists were to use it, notably > Shakespeare: that is to say, as a storehouse of political lessons that could be applied to the politics of their own time. The theme of the divided kingdom resembles one of the greatest of Shakespeare's tragedies, ➤ King Lear, which deals with the situation in far profounder terms. The Senecan model also anticipates later Elizabethan taste, and the use of blank verse was the starting-point for the rich development of the medium by ➤ Marlowe and Shakespeare. Apart from Seneca, a literary influence upon the writers is the collection of tragic tales > A Mirror for Magistrates (1559), to which Sackville made the most memorable contribution. This also used legend and history, recounted in a solemn style, to warn and edify contemporary courtiers and public men. The Senecan solemnity and formality of Gorboduc gave it peculiar dignity for the contemporary public, raising it above the (often much more lively) style of the familiar > interludes and comedies of the day, and giving it the requisite impressiveness to influence the queen. It is not known what she thought of it, but > Sir Philip Sidney excepted it from his general condemnation of the English drama of his day, and wrote in his Apologie for Poetrie: 'it is full of stately speeches, and well sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca's style, and as full of notable morality . . . ' However, he goes on to complain of its failure to observe the so-called > Aristotelian unities of space and time.

Gordimer, Nadine (b 1923) South African novelist and short-story writer. She has won an international reputation and numerous prizes, including the Booker Prize for The Conservationist (1974). Much of her work is concerned with the situation of white middle-class liberals in South Africa, privileged by a system to which they are opposed, the relations of the private self to the political, and the failure of liberal compromise. Her work has become progressively bleaker and more disillusioned. In A World of Strangers (1958) she uses the perspective of an outsider coming to South Africa, while The Conservationist is written from the viewpoint of a rich and conservative capitalist, and employs symbolic elements in its treatment of the struggle for the control of the land. In 1991 she won the Nobel Prize for literature. Her other novels are: The Lying Days (1953); Occasion for Loving (1963); The Late Bourgeois World (1966); A Guest of Honour (1970); Burger's Daughter (1979); July's People (1981); A Sport of Nature (1987); My Son's Story (1990); and None to Accompany Me (1994). Story collections include: Selected Stories (1975); Some Monday For Sure (1976); A Soldier's Embrace (1980); Town and Country Lovers (1980); Something Out There (1984); Jump (1991).

Bib: Heywood, C., Nadine Gordimer; Clingman, S., The Novels of Nadine Gordimer: History from the Inside.

Gordon riots

Riots in London in 1780, led by Lord George Gordon against a law passed in 1778 to relieve the condition of Roman > Catholics. The riots form the climax of > Charles Dickens' novel > Barnaby Rudge.

Gore, Catherine Grace Frances (1799-1861) Born Moody, the daughter of a wine merchant in East Retford, Nottinghamshire, Catherine Gore showed literary ability at an early age and was nicknamed 'the Poetess' by her peers. She wrote some 70 novels between 1824 and 1862, of the 'silver-fork school'; novels of fashionable and wealthy life. They include Theresa Marchmont or the Maid of Honour (1824), Manners of the Day, or Woman as the game (1830), which was praised by George IV, Mothers and Daughters (1830), Mrs Armytage: or Female Domination (1836), possibly her best, Cecil, or the Adventures of a Coxcomb (1841) and The Banker's Wife, or Court and City (1843), which was dedicated to Sir John Dean Paul, portrayed as a swindler, as he in fact turned out to be in 1855 when Gore lost £20,000. She also wrote poems, plays - The School for Coquettes (1831), Quid pro Quo or the Day of Dupes (1844) - and short stories, and composed music. Her writing is characterized by shrewd observation and perceptive insight, together with satire and invention, and gives an interesting portrait of life in a certain class and time.

Gosse, Sir Edmund (William) (1849–1928) Critic, biographer and poet. He is especially known for his > autobiography Father and Son (1907), one of the classic works for interpreting the Victorian age. He was born in London, the son of Philip H. Gosse, a distinguished zoologist and devout member of the Plymouth Brethren. Privately educated, he worked as a librarian, at the British Museum and later at the House of Lords, a translator and a lecturer at Cambridge University. A central figure in London literary life, he was friends with > Swinburne, > Robert Louis Stevenson, ➤ Thomas Hardy and ➤ Henry James. As a critic he was one of the first to introduce ➤ Ibsen to the English stage and translated two of his plays, Hedda Gabler (1891) and The Master Builder (with > William Archer, 1893). He wrote a number of critical studies of 17thcentury literature, a biography of Swinburne and a study of Ibsen.

Gosson, Stephen (1554-1624)

Preacher and pamphleteer. Stephen Gosson's chief claim to a measure of literary fame is due to his being the author of The Schoole of Abuse (1579), a > pamphlet attacking poetry and drama which is said to have occasioned ➤ Philip Sidney's ➤ An Apologie for Poetrie. Ironically, Gosson's career had begun as a dramatist, but he underwent a religious conversion and became a fierce Puritan critic of the drama. The Schoole of Abuse, if it has a somewhat nebulous relationship to the development of Sidney's critical text, nevertheless did call forth a response from > Thomas Lodge, who replied to Gosson with his A Reply to Stephen Gosson Touching Plays (1579). Gosson, in turn, replied to Lodge with his Plays Confuted in Five Actions (1582). This interchange, though it added little of substance to dramatic criticism, is itself part of the continuing English debate in the 16th and 17th centuries concerning the corrupting or otherwise influence of drama. Bib: Ringer, W. A., Stephen Gosson: A Biographical and Critical Study.

Gothic

A term for the style of architecture which dominated western Europe in the Middle Ages. Its main features were the pointed arch and the ribbed vault. In England, this period is divided into three: Early English (13th century), Decorated (14th) and Perpendicular (15th-16th). A fine example of the last is King's College Chapel, Cambridge.

➤ Gothic revival.

Gothic novels

A genre of novels dealing with tales of the macabre and supernatural, which reached a height of popularity in the 1790s. The term 'Gothic' originally implied 'medieval', or rather a fantasized version of what was seen to be medieval. Later, 'Gothic' came to cover all areas of the fantastic and supernatural, and the characteristics of the genre are graveyards and ghosts.

> Walpole's > The Castle of Otranto is generally seen as the earliest Gothic novel.
 > 'Monk' Lewis, > William Beckford and > Mrs Radcliffe are notable exploiters of the genre. The vogue for Gothic novels soon produced parodies; Thomas Love Peacock's
 > Nightmare Abbey and > Jane Austen's
 > Northanger Abbey are among the best examples.

In the 19th century, ➤ Mary Shelley and the ➤ Brontës show the influence of the tradition. Today, the hugely successful horror novels of Stephen King (and many others) may be said to represent an affectionate modification of the Gothic novel tradition.

Bib: Baldick, C., In Frankenstein's Shadow; Ellis, K.F., The Contested Castle: Gothic Novels and the Subversion of Domestic Ideology; Meade, T., The English Gothic Novel; Milbank, A., Daughters of the House.

Gothic revival

An architectural style now chiefly associated with the reign of Queen Victoria (1837-1901). However, a taste for Gothic had in fact started in the 18th century with > Horace Walpole's design of his home, Strawberry Hill (1747). The taste for Gothic spread between 1750 and 1830; it grew with the popularity of the sensationalism of the > Gothic novel. In the 18th century, the taste for Gothic tended to be fanciful and sensational rather than deeply serious, although it gained seriousness from such a publication as ➤ Thomas Percy's Reliques; the 19th-century > Romantic revival, especially the novels of > Walter Scott, produced a deeper and much more genuine feeling for the > Middle Ages. In poetry and fiction, ➤ Tennyson's revival of Arthurian legend in ➤ Idylls of the King, can be ascribed to a prevailing neo-Gothic appeal to the imagination. But in the 1870s, a reaction set in: neo-Gothic architectural styles were succeeded by a return to classicism, generally known as the new 'Queen Anne' style, though it was often much more eclectic and exuberant.

➤ Medieval literature.

Governesses

The governess was a familiar figure to Victorians, as she is to readers of \triangleright Jane Eyre and Agnes Grey today. Governesses were drawn from the ranks of the middle classes; from families whose economic circumstances demanded that their daughters seek employment, yet remain respectable. The range of professions deemed suitable for middle-class women narrowed during the early 19th century so that by the Victorian period governessing was virtually the only path open to them. Pay and conditions, however, were often poor, as the ➤ Brontë novels testify. In 1841 a Governesses' Benevolent Institution was founded to assist the unemployed and needy. It was increasingly recognized that the 'plight' of the governess was a social problem, and many periodical essavists addressed the issue during the 1840s. It was the governess's status as a middle-class woman that fired such concern: no similar attention was directed to workingclass women's conditions of employment. The preoccupation with the figure of the governess was crucially linked to the ideal of womanhood that she was supposed to embody and reproduce in her charges. The anomaly of her position was that at the same time as she ideally conformed to all the standards of middle-class femininity, she was competing for jobs in the marketplace and therefore threatened to undermine the ethos of separate spheres of activity for women and men upon which Victorian society depended. Practically as well as ideologically she was often in a difficult position - barely educated herself yet required to teach others. The need for governesses to be better informed led to a series of evening lectures held at King's College, London, in 1847. These fed directly into the campaign for higher education for women, and in 1848 Queen's College for women was founded in London.

▶ Hall, Anna Maria; Jameson, Anna; Education of Women; Deerbrook; Lady Audley's Secret; Shirley; Villette; Ruth.

Gower, John (?1330-1408)

Poet. Only a tentative outline can be established of Gower's life. His family had Yorkshire origins and Kent connections (Gower's language bears traces of Kentish influence and he bought lands there in 1378). A reference in one of his works suggests he had a training in law, a point confirmed by other documentary evidence. Gower seems to have been based in London for most of his life. By 1398, and perhaps for some time earlier, he was living in the priory of St Mary Overy (now Southwark Cathedral), where he was buried.

He wrote extensively in three languages, French, Latin and English. Before 1374 he composed his Cinkante Balades and some time between 1376 and 1378 he produced the Mirour de l'Omme, another French work, written in octosyllabic 12-line stanzas, tackling the subject of fallen man, his vices and virtues. His Latin poem, Vox Clamantis (The Voice of One Crying), composed c 1379-81, addresses the subject of political governance and, more specifically, the disturbances of the reign of Richard II (notably the ➤ Peasant's Revolt). In his major English poem, the ➤ Confessio Amantis, Gower turned from overtly political and satirical subjects to take a middle way, 'somwhat of lust, somwhat of lore', recounting the experiences of a lover's confession and instruction. But here too Gower's concern with the ethics of government of self and society is very evident. His anti-war sentiments are clearly expressed in his later English poem, addressed to > Henry IV, In Praise of Peace.

In the colophon added to the Confessio Amantis, Gower suggests that his major works should be seen as a triptych, as 'three books of instructive material'. His evident ambition to figure as a moral commentator and watchman of his times, and to be remembered as such, was fulfilled. His literary reputaton in the century following his death was high, and his name frequently coupled with that of ➤ Chaucer as a founding figure of the English poetic tradition. He is represented as a figure of old poetic authority in > Shakespeare's play > Pericles (which reworks the story of Apollonius of Tyre, drawn from Gower's Confessio Amantis). However, from the 18th century onwards, there seems to have been a decline in interest in his work and his literary reputation has only revived in recent years.

➤ Henry IV Bib: Fisher, J. H., John Gower: moral philosopher and friend of Chaucer; Macaulay, G. C. (ed.), The Works of John Gower, The English Works of John Gower.

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666) The spiritual ⊳ autobiography of ⊳ John Bunyan, author of ▷ The Pilgrim's Progress. The torments undergone by Christian in the latter book are substantially those of Bunyan in the earlier one. Bunyan had a similar spiritual awakening to Christian's, being aroused by a book; he suffers the terrible conviction of sin, like Christian; he believes himself to commit the sin of blasphemy as Christian thinks he does in the Valley of the shadow of Death; at last he achieves confidence in God's mercy. Much of the narrative is an account of painful mental conflict; but Bunyan never lost the sanity of perception into the fanaticism and mental morbidity of others, such as the old man who told him that he had certainly committed the sin against the Holy Ghost (for which there is no forgiveness). The book records how he developed that compassionate understanding of other men's spiritual conflicts which makes The Pilgrim's Progress the antecedent of the great English novels.

Graham, W. S. (William Sidney) (1918–86)
Poet. Graham was born in Scotland (▷ Scottish literature) into a working-class family and grew up on Clydeside where he trained and worked as an engineer. His early poetry was immediately associated with ▷ Dylan Thomas and the 'apocalyptic' poetry of the 1940s − Graham's first collection was characteristically energetic and vibrant. Much of his later life was spent around St Ives, in Cornwall, a situation that put him in contact with many of the important post-war British painters. Just as Cornwall's seascapes provided a rich source of metaphor and imagery for Graham's struggles with the opacity of language, so its equally craggy inhabitants fed his essentially Scottish wit, and later his talent for elegy. Along with David Gascoyne and ➤ George Barker, Graham wrote in a powerfully neo-Romantic style about problems of personal identity. Temporarily obscured from view by the achievements and tastes of the > Movement, their poetry is among the strongest in English this century. Graham's most celebrated volume is The Nightfishing (1955); other works include Malcolm Mooney's Land (1970), Collected Poems 1942-1977 (1979) and Implements in their Places (1977). Bib: Lopez, T., W. S. Graham.

Grahame, Kenneth (1859-1932)

Children's writer and essayist. Grahame is remembered for his animal fable The Wind in the Willows (1908), which was based on stories made up for his son and which, after receiving little attention when first published, subsequently became a classic of ▷ children's fiction. Previously Grahame had contributed to ▷ The Yellow Book and had published several works primarily concerned with childhood experience: Pagan Papers (1893), The Golden Age (1895) and Dream Days (1898). He was born in Edinburgh, went to school in Oxford and worked in the Bank of England until 1908 when he retired because of ill-health.

Grail

A mysterious, sacred object of quest in Arthurian narratives which is represented and interpreted in different ways, but always linked to a conception of completion and wholeness of some kind. The Old French word 'graal' means a serving dish or platter, and in > Chrétien de Troyes' romance of Perceval, the word is used of a richly beliewelled dish, carried by a maiden in the mysterious procession seen by > Perceval in the castle of the wounded > Fisher King. It transpires that this dish has life-giving and healing qualities, and the power to heal the wounded King and his Wasteland. Perceval, however, fails to release the healing power of the dish, because he fails to ask about the Grail. This dish seems to be related to the mysterious cauldrons which appear in Celtic legend and myth, which have the power to provide never-ending sources of nourishment.

➤ Robert de Boron's reworking of the Grail story (in the late 12th or early 13th century) gives an explicitly Christian interpretation to the key symbolic artefacts of the story, and provides the means of linking Arthurian history and Christian history. Here the Grail becomes the Holy Grail, and is identified with the chalice used by Christ at the Last Supper and later used by Joseph of Arimathea as the vessel to collect the blood from Christ's body at the Crucifixion. It is literally part of, and symbolically representative of, the Eucharist, a source of physical and spiritual food, and this material sign of transcendental life is kept by a series of Grail keepers, beginning with Joseph of Arimathea. In later developments of the Grail narrative, the Quest of the Holy Grail is the last and most marvellous adventure of > Arthur's court, to be achieved by the Christ-knight ➤ Galahad, and the narrative becomes the vehicle for a rigorous criticism of the material values of earthly > knighthood, and a celebration of a spiritual order of chivalry. Once the Grail quest has been achieved, neither the Grail knights nor the Grail itself return to Britain, and the future for Arthur's court and realm is only one of decline. The quest of the Holy Grail forms part of ➤ Malory's Morte D'Arthur, though in his version the criticism of the ethics and values of secular knighthood is somewhat modified. The Quest is treated rather less sympathetically by > Tennyson in his > Idylls of the King. > T. S. Eliot draws on the multifaceted qualities of the Grail and its different modes of representation in Arthurian narrative, in his poetic exploration of the state of human culture > The Waste Land. Bib: Lacey, Norris I. et al. (eds.), The Arthurian Encyclopaedia.

Grammatology

This term is used by the French philosopher > Jacques Derrida to denote 'a general science of writing'. As a scientific practice, its objective is to disturb the traditional hierarchical relationship between 'speech' and 'writing' where the latter is regarded as an instrument of the former. Derrida's 'science of writing' is an attempt to deconstruct (> Deconstruction) the metaphysical assumptions upon which the hierarchical relationship between speech and writing is based. He takes to the limit the Saussurean notion of the arbitrariness of the linguistic sign, arguing against a natural relationship between the spoken word and what it signifies.

Grand guignol

A term denoting an entertainment relying merely on sensational horror for its effect; after an old French puppet show.

Grand, Sarah (1854-1943)

Description Proved Provided Proved P

➤ The Heavenly Twins (1893), which was a sensational success. It attacked the sexual double standard in marriage, called for emancipation and protested against the immorality of the Contagious Diseases Act. She is said to have coined the term ➤ 'New Woman' in 1894. In 1897 her semi-autobiographical novel The Beth Book appeared. In 1898 she became President of the Tunbridge Wells branch of the National Union of ➤ Women's Suffrage Societies, and between 1922 and 1929 was mayoress of Bath. She died in Bath at the age of 88.

➤ Women's Movement.
Bib: Kersley, G., Darling Madame: a Portrait of Sarah Grand; Cunningham, G., The 'New Woman' and the Fiction of the 1890s; Showalter, E., A Literature of Their Own.

Grant, Anne (1755–1838)

Poet, historian and letter-writer. Anne Grant (née Macvicar) was born in Glasgow, spent her childhood and teenage years in America, and returned to Britain in 1768 when she married Revd James Grant and retired with him to the Scottish Highlands. Most of Grant's work contains > autobiographical elements, her Memoirs of an American Lady (1808) being the most clearly indebted to her own experiences of colonial life. Her Poems appeared in 1803 and focus on her observations of the Highland countryside and its society. Similar material emerged regularly in later works, such as The Highlanders (1808). There has been an attempt to reclaim Grant as an early feminist, though she herself attacked > Mary Wollstonecraft in 1794 for claiming that women had equal intellectual powers, asserting vehemently the conventional view that women were clearly inferior to men

> Scottish literature in English.

Granville-Barker, Harley (1877-1946) Actor, producer, director, dramatist, dramatic critic. He began as an actor in 1801, but he achieved fame as a director (1904-21). He favoured the modern drama of ⊳ Ibsen, Shaw and ▷ Galsworthy and did much to educate the public into accepting its often scandalizing themes drawn from contemporary social issues; in this he was much influenced by his close friendship with Shaw. However, his chief fame as a director was in his productions of > Shakespeare. The previous generation of Shakespeare production, dominated by ▶ Henry Irving, had relied on the personalities of star actors, and Irving was continuing a tradition which went back to the 18th century. Granville-Barker concentrated on the production of the whole work, transferring the emphasis from the leading roles on to the speech and action of the entire cast. His own plays were in the Ibsen-Shaw tradition; the best known are The Voysey Inheritance (1905), Waste (which was forbidden by the censor) (1907), and The Madras House (1910).

In 1923 he became editor of The Players' Shakespeare for which he wrote prefaces to individual plays. The series was discontinued, but the prefaces were published, and because they have Granville-Barker's unique stage experience as a basis, they now constitute the crown of his reputation. However he was also a lifelong publicist for the idea of a ▷ National Theatre, which was not to be established until 1976.

Bib: Purdom, C. B., Harley Granville-Barker, Man of the Theatre, Dramatist and Scholar; Salmon, E., Granville-Barker: A Secret Life; Kennedy, D., Granville-Barker and the Dream of Theatre.

Graves, Richard (1715-1804)

Novelist. Graves was the rector of Claverton and a well-known figure in Bath society. He is best remembered for his novel The Spiritual Quixote, or the Summer Rambles of Mr Geoffrey Wildgoose (1773), which recounts the comic journeys of a Methodist preacher. The figure of Wildgoose satirizes the Methodist George Whitefield (1717–70) whom Graves had met during their student days at Oxford. Bib: Hill, C. J., The Literary Career of Graves.

Graves, Robert (1895-1985)

Poet, critic, novelist. His poetry belongs to a distinctively English strain of lyrical verse which has been overshadowed by the more ambitious and more massive work of the Anglo-Irish ➤ W. B. Yeats and the American-born > T. S. Eliot. Earlier representatives of this kind of verse were ➤ Thomas Hardy, Edward Thomas and the War poets such as ➤ Wilfred Owen, ▷ Siegfried Sassoon and ▷ Isaac Rosenberg. The development of Graves' work was decisively affected by his experiences as an officer in World War I, and understanding of it is helped by a reading of Owen and Sassoon. Such poetry was partly a means of preserving sanity in the face of extreme horror, partly a desire to awaken in the reader a distrust of attitudes imposed on him by convention, or adopted by himself to help him preserve his own illusions. Graves published his first poems during World War I, but he is not primarily one of the War poets; he extended the vision aroused by the war into the postwar world of human relations, especially those between the sexes, and into the impulses to self-deceive and to escape the realities of inner experience, especially by choosing to dull its image. He always wrote > lyrics with skilful and precise rhythm and often poignant or pungent rhymes, and an austere yet lively, colloquial diction. A collected edition of his work was published in 1975.

As a critic he was at first a self-conscious

Department > modernist; A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1927), written with the poet Laura Riding, educated the public in new kinds of poetic expression by a pioneering critical interest in subtleties and ambiguities of language. His later criticism has been less influential; it includes The Common Asphodel (1949), The Crowning Privilege (1955).

Graves engaged extensively in historical and anthropological enquiry; this resulted in work on poetry and primitive religion, eg The White Goddess (1948), which aroused controversy but was taken up by some ▷ feminists in the 1960s and 70s, and in historical fiction of great popularity, eg I, Claudius and Claudius the God (1934). By far the most important of his prose works, however, is his ▷ autobiography recounting his experiences in World War I − Good-bye to All That (1929).

Bib: Seymour Smith, M., Robert Graves: His

Bib: Seymour Smith, M., Robert Graves: His Life and Work; Graves, R. P., Robert Graves.

Gray, Alasdair (b 1934)

Scottish novelist and short-story writer. Gray was educated at Glasgow Art School and works as an art teacher, painter and writer. His fiction is exuberant in style although often bleak in content, employing fantasy, myth, parable, allusion (certain of his texts include an index of plagiarisms), typographical effects, illustrations (by the author), arcane vocabulary, pseudo-historical texts and many other post-modernist devices. His work also has considerable political impact; for example Something Leather (1990), an erotic fantasy, also contains a biting satire on Glasgow's role as 1990 'European City of Culture'. He has been seen as a major figure of 'the new Glasgow writing', a movement involving such fiction writers as > James Kelman and > Janice Galloway, as well as poets such as Tom Leonard. His first novel, Lanark: A Life in Four Books (1981), takes its narrator from a bleak contemporary urban landscape (Glasgow is suggested but not identified) to an imaginary realm named 'unthank', while his most recent, Poor Things (1992), evokes late-Victorian Glasgow as a setting for the Frankenstein-like story of a doctor who tries to create his 'ideal woman' by a brain transplant. His other novels are: 1982, Janine (1984); The Fall of Kelvin Walker: A Fable of the Sixties (1985, adapted from a 1968 television play); McGrotty and Ludmilla: or, The Harbinger Report (1990); A History Maker (1994). Volumes of stories: The Comedy of the White Dog (1979); Unlikely Stories, Mostly (1983); Lean Tales (1985), with James Kelman and Agnes Owens; Ten Tales Tall and True (1993). Poetry: Old Negatives: Four Verse Sequences (1989). Autobiography: Self-Portrait (1988). He has also written plays and documentaries for radio and television and a work entitled Independence: Why Scots Should Rule Scotland (1992).

Gray, Thomas (1716-71)

Poet and prose-writer. The sole survivor of 12 children, Grav was born in Cornhill, London. His father, a scrivener, was mentally unbalanced and Gray was brought up by his mother, who sent him to Eton where he made friends with > Horace Walpole. He went on to Peterhouse, > Cambridge, and gained a high reputation for his > Latin poetry, though he failed to take a degree. In 1739 he embarked on a tour of the continent with Walpole, but in 1741 they quarrelled and Gray returned alone. He turned to the study of law, and began a tragedy Agrippina, which remained unfinished. The death of Richard West, a close friend from his Eton days, in 1742, precipitated a period of poetic activity, in which he produced his Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College (published 1747), Sonnet on the Death of Richard West and Ode to Adversity (published in Dodsley's Collections, 1748). Also in 1742 he began > Elegy written in a Country Churchyard, while staying with his mother and aunt at their retirement home in Stoke Poges. The poem was carefully revised over a long period and eventually appeared in 1751, achieving instant recognition as a masterpiece.

From 1742 Gray lived in Peterhouse and later Pembroke College, Cambridge, except for a period (1759-61) in London where he pursued his studies in the British Museum. Relations with Walpole were soon restored and it was the death of Walpole's cat which inspired Gray's delightful mock-heroic Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat (1748). The Odes by Mr Gray (1757), comprising his two Pindaric Odes, The Progress of Poesy and > The Bard, was the first book published by Walpole's Strawberry Hill press. In the same year he was offered the laureateship, but refused. In 1761 he wrote a number of poems reflecting a mixture of bookish scholarship and romantic primitivism, very characteristic of the period: The Fatal Sisters. An Ode, The Descent of Odin. An Ode (From the Norse-Tongue), The Triumphs of Owen. A Fragment (from the Welsh). They were published in 1768 in Dodsley's collected edition of his works, Poems by Mr Gray. In the same year Gray was appointed Professor of Modern History at Cambridge, though he never delivered a lecture. In 1769 he travelled in the Lake District and his Journal (1775), relates his reactions to its sublime scenery. His letters reveal a profoundly learned, but witty and entertaining personality.

Gray's reflective works, in particular the Elegy, are masterpieces of the hesitant, personal poetry of > sensibility. His odes, although not so successful, reflect the restless experimentalism of his period. It has been too easy to cast Gray either as a half-hearted > Augustan or a timid pre-romantic, both tendencies being encouraged by > William Wordsworth's dogmatic strictures on the language of his Sonnet on the Death of Mr West, and ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge's corrective follow-up in ▷ Biographia Literaria, Chapter XVIII. It is better to see him in his own right. His particular poetic strengths are an ease of personification and abstraction (shared by his contemporary Samuel Johnson (1709–84) and emulated by ▷ John Keats in his ▷ Odes), and a restrained but eloquent felicity of phrasing, which places some of his lines among the best-remembered in the language: 'where ignorance is bliss/ 'Tis folly to be wise'; 'And Melancholy mark'd him for her own.'

> Bard; Romanticism.

Bib: Johnson, S., in Lives of the Poets; Arnold M., in Essays in Criticism (2nd series); Ketton-Cremer, R. W., Thomas Gray: A Biography; Leavis, F. R., in Revaluation; Tillotson, G., in Augustan Studies; Powell Jones, W., Thomas Gray, Scholar; Starr, H. W. (ed.), Twentieth-Century Interpretations of Gray's Elegy.

Great Exhibition, The

Held in 1851, in Hyde Park in London, it was the first international exhibition of the products of industry and celebrated the peak of the British Industrial Revolution. It was regarded as a triumph for British prosperity and enlightenment, though by some critics, eg the philanthropist ▷ Lord Shaftesbury, as concealing the scandal of immense urban slums. Its principal building, the Crystal Palace, was a pioneer construction in the materials of glass and cast-iron. The architect was Joseph Paxton.

➤ Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

Great Expectations (1860-1)

A novel > Charles Dickens. Its title refers to expectations resulting from wealth anonymously donated to Philip Pirrip (shortened to Pip) who has been brought up in humble obscurity by his half-sister and her husband, the village blacksmith, Joe Gargery. His 'expectations' are to be made a > 'gentleman' - understood in social terms as holding privilege without responsibility. He supposes his money to be the gift of the rich and lonely Miss Havisham, who has in fact merely used him as an experimental victim on whom her ward, Estella, is to exert her charm with the aim of breaking his heart. Pip's great crisis comes when he discovers his real benefactor to be the convict Magwitch, whom he had helped in an attempted escape when he was a child. Magwitch, who had been made into a criminal by the callousness of society in his own childhood, has built up a fortune in Australia (to which he was deported) and has tried the experiment of 'making a gentleman' out of another child. His assumption is essentially that of society as a whole - that appearances, and the money that makes them, are what matters. Magwitch returns to England illegally to see the fruit of his ambition, and Pip has to decide whether he will be responsible for his unwanted benefactor or escape from him. His decision to protect Magwitch and help him to escape again produces a revolution in Pip's nature: instead of assuming privilege without responsibility he now undertakes responsibility without reward, since he will also divest himself of his money. 'Expectations' are important in other senses for other characters: Estella expects to become a rich lady dominating humiliated admirers, but she becomes enslaved to a brutal husband; Pip's friend, Herbert Pocket, dreams of becoming a powerful industrialist, but he has no capital until Pip (anonymously) provides it; Wopsle, the parish clerk in Pip's village, imagines himself a great actor and becomes a stage hack; Miss Havisham is surrounded by relatives whom she depises and who nonetheless live in expectation of legacies after her death; Miss Havisham herself, and Magwitch also, live for expectations (in Estella and Pip) which are frustrated - in these instances fortunately. In its largest implications, Great Expectations is concerned with the futility of a society in which individuals live by desires powered by illusion. This view of the novel gives emphasis to those characters who are free of illusion: the lawyer Jaggers who exerts power by his cynical expectation of human folly; his clerk, Wemmick, who divides his life sharply between the harshness demanded by his profession and the tenderness of his domestic affections; Joe Gargery and his second wife Biddy, survivors from an older social tradition, who remain content with their own naive wisdom of the heart. Dickens was persuaded by his friend → Bulwer-Lytton to change the end of the novel: in the first version Pip and Estella, older and wiser, meet again only to separate permanently; in the revised one, Dickens leaves it open to the reader to believe whether they will be permanently united, or not.

Greek literature

Until Greece was conquered by the Romans in 146BC, it was a country of small states, mixed racial stock and cultural origins from all round the eastern Mediterranean. These states attained a high level of self-conscious political and artistic culture, which later enriched the Roman Empire and was thence transmitted to medieval and modern Europe.

The beginnings of Greek literature cannot be dated but its first period ended about 500BC. The period contains ▷ Homer's epics, the ▷ Iliad and the ▷ Odyssey, and the poems of Hesiod. Homer's epics are the real starting-point of European imaginative literature; Hesiod's Theogony is one of the principal sources of our knowledge of the Greek religious system. In English literature since the 18th century, the term ▷ elegy has implied narrower limits of subject and treatment than it had for the Greeks and the Romans, but the Greek evolution of the elegy and the ▷ lyric in this period has shaped our ideas of the character and resources of the short poem. An important variety of the lyric (whose principal characteristic was originally that it was intended to have musical accompaniment) was the 'Pindaric ode', so called after its most famous practitioner, ▷ Pindar; this was much imitated by English poets from the 17th to 19th centuries.

The second period (500-300BC) is called the 'Attic Period' because it centred on the greatest of the Greek cities, Athens, capital of the state of Attica. The outstanding imaginative achievement of the Athenians was the creation of dramatic literature. The 'choral lyric', sung by choirs on religious occasions and especially on the festival of the wine-god Dionysus, was developed into a dialogue by Thespis in the 6th century. In the 5th century this was further developed into dramatic tragedy by three writers whose works have a fundamental influence on all our ideas of the theatre: > Aeschylus, > Sophocles and > Euripides. The primitive religion of the Greeks, based on the worship of the gods as the all-powerful forces of nature, was the origin of Greek > tragedy; it was also the origin of comedy, of which the greatest Greek writer was > Aristophanes. Athens, in this period, also developed Greek prose literature, in the works of the first of the historians, > Herodotus, in the immensely influential philosophies of ▶ Plato and ▶ Aristotle, and in political oratory, especially that of > Demosthenes.

Demosthenes achieved fame by his efforts to sustain the Greeks in their wars (357-338 BC) against Philip of Macedon, a state to the north of Greece. The war ended with the Macedonians making themselves the dominant power in Greece. They did not actually destroy the independence of the states, but the intensity and many-sidedness of Greek city life diminished. However, Philip's son ➤ Alexander the Great (ruled 336-323BC) took Greece culture with him in his rapid conquests round the eastern Mediterranean and as far east as north-west India. The result was the 'Hellenistic Period' lasting until the Roman conquest, after which it did not cease but went into a new phase. The culture of Greece now became a climate of civilization shared by many lands; it was no longer even centred in Greece but in the university city of Alexandria in Egypt. The price paid for this expansion was that without the sustenance of the vigorous Greek city life, the literature lost its force, depth and originality, though it retained its secondary qualities such as grace and sophistication. The best known imaginative works of this period are the > 'pastoral' poems by > Theocritus and others; they influenced the Roman poet > Virgil, and were extensively used as models by > Renaissance poets in the 16th and 17th centuries

In the Graeco-Roman period (146 BC- AD 500), the Greeks were the teachers and cultural allies of their conquerors, the Romans. > Latin literature written under Greek influence now excelled what continued to be written in Greek. Yet Renaissance Europe felt so much closer to the Romans than to the Greeks that it was the Greek writers of this period who influenced it more deeply than the earlier Greeks did. The historian and biographer > Plutarch, for instance, was widely read in England in the age of > Shakespeare, who used him as a sourcebook for his plays. The Greek romances, the best known of which is Daphnis and Chloe by Longus (2nd century AD), were imitated by 16th-century writers such as > Sir Philip Sidney in his ▶ Arcadia. To this period also belongs one of the most influential pieces of Greek literary criticism, the treatise On the Sublime by \triangleright Longinus.

In considering the influence of Greek literature on European, and in particular on English, literature, we have to distinguish between the influence of Greek philosophy and that of Greek imaginative writing. Plato and Aristotle had profound effects on Christian thought. Plato was made dominant by St Augustine of Hippo (4th-5th century), until > St Thomas Aquinas replaced his influence by that of Aristotle. In the 16th century, Plato again became most important, but now as a source of ⊳ humanist as well as of religious ideas. Aristotle remained dominant as the first philosopher of literature for three centuries, and together they are still regarded as the important starting-points of European philosophy. Greek imaginative writing, on the other hand, made its impression on European, and especially English, imaginative writing chiefly through its assimilation by Roman writers. It was not, for example, the unexcelled Greek dramatists who impressed themselves on the equally unexcelled English dramatists of the age of Shakespeare, but the comparatively inferior Roman ones, ⊳ Plautus in ⊳ comedy and ⊳ Seneca in tragedy. Only in the 30 years of the > Romantic Revival that followed the ➤ French Revolution did English writers (partly under ⊳ German influence) really discriminate between Greek and Roman literature, and value the Greeks more highly. Even then, such a poet as > Shelley valued Greek culture as sentiment rather than as a deep influence. For such as him, the Greeks stood for freedom of spirit and of intellect, whereas Latin culture was associated with the pre-revolutionary authoritarian 'old regime' to which he and others of his generation forgotten that Greek culture was based on household. Neither class was considered as capable of full humanity as free Greek males.

maintaining slaves and that their women were excluded from public life and restricted to the

The extraordinary privilege accorded to Greek were so much opposed. It must not be culture in western thought has often obscured these details.

➤ Classical education; Classical mythology; Latin literature; Pastoral, Classical; Platonism and Neo-Platonism.

Green, Henry (1905-73)

Pen-name of the novelist H. V. Yorke. His novels are: Blindness (1926); Living (1929); Party-Going (1939); Pack My Bag (1940); Caught (1943); Loving (1945); Back (1946); Concluding (1948); Nothing (1950); Doting (1952). Of these, possibly the most distinguished are: Living, with an industrial working-class setting; Loving, about servants in an anachronistic great house in Ireland during World War II; Concluding, set in the future, about an institution for educating women civil servants, and Party-Going, a novel in which the events have only a few hours' duration and take place in a fog-bound London railway station. His style is condensed and poetically expressive; events are caught in movement, with a cinematic use of flashbacks to bring the past into relationship with the present. In the autobiographical Pack my Bag he wrote: 'Prose should be a long intimacy between strangers with no direct appeal to what both may have known. It should slowly appeal to feelings unexpressed, it should in the end draw tears out of the stone.' Green is set aside from the > modernist interest in the rendering of consciousness by a belief that the novelist should not attempt to portray the inner depths of characters, but should use their spoken words to capture the opaque and shifting surface of social relations. The later novels show increasing reliance on dialogue, following the example of the novels of ➤ Ivy Compton-Burnett. Green also professed admiration for the work of the French writer, Céline. He wrote no novels in the last 20 years of his life.

Bib: Stokes, E., The Novels of Henry Green; Russell, J., Henry Green; Bassoft, B., Towards Loving; Sarraute, N., in The Age of Suspicion.

Green, Matthew (1696–1737)

Author of The Spleen (1737), a tetrameter (> metre) couplet poem advocating the simple life as a cure for boredom and 'splenetic' irritableness.

Green, Sarah (c 1790-1825)

Novelist and prose writer. Little is known about Sarah Green's personal life, but it is possible to trace through her novels a development from quiet docility to sharp feminist >> satire (>> Feminism). Her Mental Improvement for a Young Lady (1793) is a >> didactic text aimed at teaching her niece correct feminine behaviour which, unsurprisingly, amounts to being chaste and obedient. Interestingly, novels are forbidden reading for the well brought-up young lady. After this incursion into print,

The Private History of the Court of England (1808) comes as somewhat of a shock, since it describes the scandals of contemporary court life, especially the notorious affairs of the Prince of Wales, under the meagre > allegorical veil of a historical setting. The actress and novelist, ➤ Mary Robinson, who was one of the Prince's many mistresses, is depicted in the novel as an intelligent woman oppressed by a misogynistic husband. Green took up this last theme again in her novel Gretna Green Weddings, or The Nieces (1823) which attempts to show that the abuse of women is true villainy, rather than an acceptable, although repugnant, social trait. The other butt of her satiric wit was the romance, which she attacked ruthlessly in her criticism Romance Readers and Romance Writers (1810-11), and which she fictionalized in the hilarious Scotch Novel Reading, or Modern Quackery (1824). In this latter book a father tries to save his two daughters from mental instability which has been brought on by reading ➤ Byron and ➤ Sir Walter Scott. Their madness takes the form of attempting to live out fiction in their lives; the younger daughter who is obsessed with Scott is saved, but the Byronic daughter dies tragically.

Greenaway, Kate (1846-1901) Born in Hoxton, the daughter of a woodengraver, Greenaway began nature drawing as a child. She went to the Royal College and the Slade, and became a writer and illustrator of children's picture books in which she portrays an idealized world of sweetly pretty children in floral surroundings. She was encouraged by > John Ruskin, whom she met in 1882 and who lectured on her art at Oxford in 1883, praising its innocent view of childhood and in effect its lack of > realism. > George Eliot also admired her art. Greenaway liked the Pre-Raphaelites and disliked contemporaries such as James Whistler. A strong, though unorthodox, religious instinct is evident in her search for beauty and goodness. She rejected the > woman's movement, and enjoyed considerable commercial success, influencing design and children's dress. Her first success was Under the Window (1878), a collection of rhymes she wrote and illustrated. Her later work includes Marigold Garden (1885) and an illustrated edition of ➤ Robert Browning's > 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin'. She also wrote poetry, much of it still unpublished. Bib: Engen, R.K., Kate Greenaway; Holme, B., The Kate Greenaway Book.

Greene, Henry Graham (1904–91) Novelist. The son of a schoolmaster. He went to Balliol College, Oxford, and then became a journalist (1926–30) on The Times. He was converted to Catholicism in 1926. His first novel, The Man Within, appeared in 1929. It was followed by a steady succession of novels, of which the fourth, Stamboul Train (1932) made him well known. It was nonetheless one of the books he called 'entertainments', meaning that they were among his less serious works; this group also includes A Gun for Sale (1936), The Confidential Agent (1939), The Ministry of Fear (1943), and Our Man in Havana (1958). In 1934 he published It's a Battlefield, and in 1935 a volume of stories the title story of which, The Basement Room, was later adapted into the film, The Fallen Idol (1950). In 1935 came England Made Me. In the same year he travelled in Liberia, on which he based his travel book Journey Without Maps (1936). He then became film critic for the weekly journal > The Spectator (of which he was made literary editor in 1940). His next novel, Brighton Rock (1938) was the first in which there was clear evidence of Catholicism. In the same year he was commissioned to visit Mexico and report on the religious persecution there; the result was another travel book, The Lawless Roads (1939) and one of his most famous novels, The Power and the Glory (1940). During World War II he worked for the Foreign Office, and again visited West Africa. After the war he became a publisher. Later fiction: Nineteen Stories (1947; including eight in The Basement Room volume); The Heart of the Matter (1948); The Third Man (1950; also made into a film); The End of the Affair (1951); The Quiet American (1955); A Burnt-Out Case (1961); A Sense of Reality (four stories, 1963); The Comedians (1966); Travels with My Aunt (1969); A Sort of Life (1971); The Honorary Consul (1973); Lord Rochester's Monkey (1974); The Human Factor (1978); Dr Fischer of Geneva, or the Bomb Party (1980); Monsignior Quixote (1982); The Tenth Man (1985); The Captain and the Enemy (1988).

He has also written plays: The Living Room (1953); The Potting Shed (1957); The Complaisant Lover (1959); The Return of A. J. Raffles (1975), and books of critical essays, The Lost Childhood (1951) and The Pleasure Dome (film criticism, 1972). His Collected Essays were published in 1969 and his Collected Plays in 1985. His autobiographical works include A Sort of Life (1971), Ways of Escape (1981) and Getting to Know the General (1984).

Graham Greene's high reputation is partly due to his exploration of emotions that were particularly strong from the middle of the 20th century: the sense of guilt and frustration, impulses to violence and fear of it, pity, including self-pity. He had strong gifts for narrative and for the evocation of atmosphere, especially the atmosphere of squalid surroundings which convey deprivation and despair. His Catholicism counteracts the misery in his books by its implications of spiritual dignity remaining intact even amid degradation and abject suffering. Bib: Allott, K., and Farris, M., The Art of Graham Greene; Lodge, D., Graham Greene;

Pryce-Jones, D., Graham Greene; Sharrock, R., Saints, Sinners and Comedians: the Novels of Graham Greene; Smith, G., The Achievement of Graham Greene; Sherry, N., The Life of Graham Greene.

Greene, Robert (1558-92)

Dramatist and pamphleteer. He was one of the ▷ University Wits, having himself been at Cambridge. Four plays by Greene, apart from collaborations, have survived: Alphonsus, King of Aragon (?1587); ▷ Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1589); History of Orlando Furioso (acted 1592), The Scottish History of James IV (acted 1594). Of these the best known are the second and the fourth, and in them the melodious and fluent handling of the ▷ blank verse and the appealing portrayal of the heroines anticipate ▷ Shakespeare's romantic comedies of the 1590s.

Greene is more notable for his prose. This includes romances written in emulation of ► Lyly's ➤ Euphues and ➤ Sidney's ➤ Arcadia, including Pandosto, The Triumph of Time, from which Shakespeare derived > The Winter's Tale (1610). More distinctive and very lively reading are his 'cony-catching pamphlets' (ie booklets about criminal practices in the London underworld), A Notable Discovery of Cosenage (ie 'cozenage' or criminal fraud, 1591) and The Blacke Booke's Messenger (1591) - both excellent examples of Elizabethan popular prose. A semi-fictional ⊳ autobiography, Greene's Groatsworth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance (1592) is notorious for containing the earliest reference to Shakespeare as a dramatist and actor, though it is an oblique one. The object of the pamphlet is ostensibly a warning to three others of the University Wits - probably > Peele, > Marlowe and Nashe – to amend their lives. The allusion to Shakespeare - 'an upstart crow beautified with our feathers . . . in his owne conceyt the onely shake-scene in a countrey' - comes by way of a charge of plagiarism. Thirty-five prose works, most of them short, and many containing lyrics of great charm, are ascribed to Greene.

➤ Elizabethan novels.

Bib: Provost, R., Robert Greene et ses romans; Crupi, C. W., Robert Greene.

Greenwood, Walter (1903-74)

Novelist. Born in Salford, Greenwood worked as an office boy, cab driver and salesman (among other things) before the success of his first novel Love on the Dole (1933). Describing the misery, poverty and squalor of life in a northern town during the Depression, the book became a cause célèbre, even discussed in Parliament; it was dramatized in 1934 and made into a film in 1941. His other novels include: His Worship the Mayor (1934); Standing Room Only (1936);

The Secret Kingdom (1938); Down by the Sea (1951); and the autobiography There was a Time (1967).

Greer, Germaine (b 1939)

Feminist theorist and critic. Germaine Green is one of the most influential writers of her generation. Her groundbreaking feminist work of 1971, The Female Eunuch, was a brilliantly timed and characteristically outrageous critique of traditional images of femininity and women's role in Western society, as well as being a celebration of more radical female powers and talents hitherto suppressed and repressed. Greer is an incisive writer and considerable scholar, who nevertheless always exudes an intoxicating energy in her writing. She has had an enormously varied career, and is one of the foremost spokeswomen of British > feminism (although she was born in Australia and continues to explore this identity in her more autobiographical writings). Greer has held university lecturing posts (at Warwick University in the early 1970s, and more recently in Cambridge and the U.S.A.), has written for the underground press (the cult journal Oz in the late 1960s), has edited a collection of 17thcentury women's poetry (Kissing the Rod, 1988), has written on women's role in art history (The Obstacle Race, 1979), on fertility and maternity (Sex and Destiny, 1984), on Shakespeare (1986), and on the menopause (The Change, 1991). Bib: Plante, D., Three Difficult Women.

Gregory, Lady (Augusta) (1852–1932)
Promoter of Irish drama, she founded the Irish Literary Theatre, with ▷ W. B. Yeats and Edward Martyn in 1898. This became the Irish National Theatre Society in 1902 and led to the establishment of the ▷ Abbey Theatre in Dublin. She wrote several plays for it and collaborated with Yeats in The Pot of Broth and Cathleen ni Houlihan (both 1902). Of her own plays the best known are Spreading the News (1904), The Gaol Gate (1906), Hyacinth Halvey (1906), The Rising of the Moon (1907) and The Workhouse Ward (1908). She also translated Molière into Irish idiom in The Kiltartan Molière.

➤ Irish literature in English. Bib: Kohfeldt, M., Lady Gregory: The Woman behind the Irish Renaissance.

Grein, Jack Thomas (1862–1935)

Playwright, critic and manager who helped introduce the work of European playwrights to English audiences at the end of the 19th century. He founded the Independent Theatre Club in 1891, 'to give special performances of plays which have a literary and artistic rather than a commercial value'. The first production was

Ibsen's

Ghosts which met with a storm of abuse, and thereafter little of Ibsen's work was shown, although ▷ George Bernard Shaw's contribution to the controversy, Widowers' Houses, his first London production, was put on in 1892. Grein's dramatic criticism has been published in five volumes.

Bib: Orme, M., J. T. Grein: the Story of a

Greville, Sir Fulke, 1st Baron Brooke (1554-1628)

Poet, courtier, dramatist, > biographer. Almost all of Fulke Greville's poetic works were published after his death. They include a collection of ⊳ sonnets, religious and philosophical poems, and songs gathered under the title Caelicia, which appeared in the collection of his works published in 1633 as Certaine Learned and Elegant Works. A life-long friend of ⊳ Philip Sidney, Greville wrote a life of Sidney which was published in 1652 as 'A Dedication to Sir Philip Sidney' in Greville's history of the Elizabethan era. A further volume of his work was published much later in the 17th century when The Remains: Poems of Monarchy and Religion was issued in 1670. His two plays Alaham (written c 1600) and Mustapha (produced 1603-8) - though set in an exotic and remote world, are valuable attempts at dealing with the important contemporary issues of power and authority in the state. However, he also wrote a play now destroyed, Antony and Cleopatra (> Cleopatra). Greville was a member of the brilliant intellectual circle surrounding Sidney at court, and enjoyed considerable favour from both ▷ Elizabeth I and ▷ James I of England before his death in 1628 when he was murdered by an offended servant.

Bib: Rees, J. (cd.), Selected Writings; Rees, J., Fulke Greville, First Lord Brooke, 1554–1628: A Critical Biography; Gouws, J. (cd.), The Prose Works of Fulke Greville.

Grey, Lady Jane (1537-54)

Letter and prayer-writer as well as poet, the 'nine days' queen' of romantic legend and misty representation on canvas and celluloid is not often remembered for her small but impressive literary output. In life she became a pawn in the game of ⊳ Tudor monarchy, manipulated by both her father, the Duke of Suffolk, and her father-in-law, the powerful Duke of Northumberland. Lady Jane was proclaimed queen on 10 June 1553, but when ⊳ Mary Tudor entered London on 19 July, she and her husband were imprisoned in the Tower and beheaded six months later. Lady Jane was well educated and a staunch Protestant and her written work was, not surprisingly, preserved in > John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563). The impassioned spiritual conviction and the acute political awareness of Lady Jane's writing suggests that conventional portrayals of her as quiet and submissive may have more to do with feminine stereotypes than with her actual character.

Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

Griffith, Elizabeth (1727-93)

Dramatist, novelist, editor, and friend of the actresses ▷ Kitty Clive and ▷ Peg Woffington. Griffith was the daughter of the comedian and actor-manager Thomas Griffith, and probably born in Dublin. From 1749 to 1753 she worked as an actress at > Smock Alley in Dublin, and then at > Covent Garden until 1755. In 1757 she published, together with her husband Richard Griffith, A Series of Genuine Letters Between Henry and Frances purporting to tell the story of their own courtship. In 1764 the. couple effectively separated when she moved to London, having earlier returned to Ireland. However, their correspondence continued and was published in four more volumes between 1767 and 1770. Griffith wrote three > epistolary novels, The Delicate Distress (1769), The History of Lady Barton (1771) and The Story of Lady Juliana Harley (1776), as well as a Collection of Novels (1777) and Novellettes (1780), originally serialized in the Westminster Magazine. Her plays included The Double Mistake (1766), The School for Rakes (1769), A Wife in the Right (1772), and she translated numerous works from the French, notably some volumes of > Voltaire. Many of her works were noted for their politeness and decorum, overlaid with moral comment, but she also attacked women's unequal position in marriage and society.

Griffiths, Isabella (?1713-64)

Editor and probable reviewer for the Monthly Reviem, founded by her husband in 1749. She was a target for attacks by ▷ Goldsmith and ▷ Smollett for presuming to alter their work, when she edited it for the review. Her husband denied that she had written for his journal, but his testimony is thought unreliable. Bib: Todd, J. (ed.), A Dictionary of British and American Women Writers 1660–1800.

Griffiths, Trevor (b 1935)

British socialist playwright who began writing during the late 1960s. He has since written plays for television as well as the stage and collaborated with Warren Beatty on the script for the film Reds. His plays often dramatize a political debate between reformist and revolutionary standpoints. This is most obviously the case in Occupations (1970) and The Party (1973); it is also true of his comic work about club entertainers, Comedians (1975). He has expressed a preference for writing for television because of the wider audiences that can be reached than in the theatre. Bib: Poole, M. and Wyver, J., Powerplays: Trevor Griffiths in Television.

Grimm's Fairy Tales

German folk-tales collected by the brothers Jacob (1785–1863) and Wilhelm (1786–1859) Grimm, and published 1812–15. They first appeared in English in a volume illustrated by George Cruickshank and containing such stories as 'Snow White', 'Hansel and Gretel' and 'Rumpelstiltskin'. They were the first collectors to write down the stories just as they heard them, without attempting to improve them.

➤ Children's literature.

Grindal, Edmund (?1519-83)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Grindal was educated at Cambridge and, as a staunch Protestant and Calvinist, received the patronage of ➤ Nicholas Ridley, but had to leave England during the ➤ Catholic reign of ➤ Mary I. At the accession of ➤ Elizabeth I he returned and became Bishop of London in 1559 and, with Cecil's support (> Burghley), Archbishop of Canterbury in 1575. As such Grindal should have been one of the shaping forces of Elizabethan Protestantism, but he failed to live up to his early promise. There are several reasons for this: firstly, he had little firm purpose, which he mitigated with bouts of severity, as, for example, when he denounced John Stow as a Papist; and secondly, he could not accept Elizabeth's political alliances with Catholic nations, nor curb his own zeal for prophesying and for the open discussing of scriptures, practices of which the queen disapproved. He is, however, celebrated in the 'May' and 'July' > eclogues of > Spenser's > The Shepherd's Calendar (1579). Bib: Collinson, P., Archbishop Grindal, 1519-1583: the Struggle for a Reformed Church.

Grocyn, William (?1446-1519) English ▷ humanist, and one of the earliest propagators of the study of ancient Greek in England; taught at Oxford.

Grossmith, George (1847–1912) and Weedon (1853–1919)

The brothers were both involved with the theatre, coming from a theatrical family, friends of the Terrys and > Henry Irving. They are remembered, however, for The Diary of a Nobody (1852), initially serialized in > Punch, written by both brothers and illustrated by Weedon. The nobody in question, Mr Pooter, sensitive to the slightest humiliation, conveys the events and contemporary background detail in a life striving for gentility. The book was immediately successful, with a wide readership, and has remained popular.

> Diaries.

Grotowski, Jerzy (b 1933)

Polish director who established the Laboratory Theatre in Wroclaw in the early 1960s, where he developed a training process for actors which emphasized the importance of physical as well as mental skills. His rejection of the expensive paraphernalia of traditional theatre in favour of what he called 'poor theatre' which relies more exclusively on the actor, has been a great inspiration for the British ▷ fringe theatre. He has also been an important influence on the work of the British director ▷ Peter Brook. Bib: Grotowski, J., Towards a Poor Theatre.

Group of Noble Dames, A (1891)

A collection of ten short stories by ▷ Thomas Hardy, published initially in various periodicals from 1889–90 and collected together in 1891. A series of historical narratives set in mansions and castles in ▷ Wessex, many of the stories were inspired by John Huchins' History and Antiquities of the County of Dorset (1861–73) which Hardy read. The dominant themes are taken from Hardy's earlier work, especially love between a poor man and a lady, and sexual temptation. The stories were rewritten and bowdlerized in order to make them acceptable for volume publication.

> Historical novels.

Group Theatre

A private play society founded in 1933 and famous for its productions of the experimental poetic plays of ▷ Auden and ▷ Isherwood: The Dog Beneath the Skin (1936), The Ascent of F6 (1937) and On the Frontier (1939). Other notable productions include ▷ T. S. Eliot's Sweeney Agonistes (1935) and ▷ Stephen Spender's Trial of a Judge (1938). Most of its productions were directed by Rupert Doone. Group Theatre was active, apart from an interim during the war years, until 1953.

Bib: Medley, R., Drawn from Life: a Memoir of the 1930s Group Theatre; Sidnell, M. J., Dances of Death: the Group Theatre of London in the Thirties.

Grub Street

A street in London frequented in the 18th century by ⊳ hack writers. Hence 'Grubstreet' (adjective or noun) indicates literature or journalism of a low order. In the 19th century it was renamed Milton Street.

Grub Street Opera, The (1731)

Satiric entertainment by ▷ Henry Fielding, set in Wales and featuring songs using new words to popular melodies by ▷ Purcell and ▷ Handel, among others. In it the King and Prime Minister, ▷ Robert Walpole, are mocked in the characters of Sir Owen Apshinken (Welsh Ap = 'son of'; German Schinken = 'ham'), and the butler Robin ('robbing'). At the end the butler and staff all confess to having robbed the master's household over a long period. The play, following hard on the heels of the controversial Ballad Opera, was banned and never performed, but has recently been staged by a touring company for the first time. It is an attack on the aristocracy in general as well as the government, and is interesting in that it reverses earlier conventions whereby servants assist (or confuse) their masters' intrigues: here the rakish and foppish young squire Owen Apshinken conspires to frustrate his servants' amours, in hopes of seducing one of them, and the servants' affairs have an importance equalling or greater than those of their masters.

> Grub Street.

Grundy, Mrs

A symbol of narrow-minded, intolerant, out-of-date moral censoriousness. The symbol derives from a character in an otherwise forgotten play, Speed the Plough (1798) by Thomas Morton. Mrs Grundy herself never appears, but her neighbour, Mrs Ashfield, is constantly worried about what Mrs Grundy's opinion will be about this or that incident or piece of behaviour.

Grymeston, Elizabeth (1563-c 1602)

Essayist. A Catholic, Grymeston had a difficult life with family feuds, ill health and the death of eight of her nine children. She found time and energy, however, to write and her work was published posthumously as Miscelanea, Meditations and Memoratives (1604). On the basis of this work Grymeston has become known as the first woman essayist writing in English. Her work is somewhat learned, including numerous classical references and intricate metaphors.

Bib: Beilin, E. V., Redeeming Eve.

Guardian, The

It was started in 1821 as a weekly paper, then called The Manchester Guardian, becoming daily in 1855. As the leading Liberal publication outside London, it was edited from 1872 to 1929 by C. P. Scott. Its title was changed to The Guardian in 1959, and since 1961 it has been published from London. It is considered to be one of the more liberal papers of the 1980s and 1990s.

Guido de Columnis (or de Columpnis, or della Colonne)

A Sicilian writer, and a judge at Messina from 1257–80, whose translation of Benoît de Sainte-Maure's verse narrative of the Troy story into Latin prose (completed around 1287) became the most popular and authoritative version of Trojan history available in the medieval period. ▶ John Lydgate's Troy Book is one of the many vernacular translations of Guido's Historia Destructionis Trojae, as is the Middle English ▶ alliterative poem, ▶ The Destruction of Troy.

> Troy.

Guild ➤ Craft Guilds.

Guinevere

The wife of ⊳ King Arthur in Arthurian narratives. In > Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae she is from a Roman family. Mordred takes her for his lover when he usurps Arthur's throne, but the level of Guinevere's complicity in the betraval is not made clear. In later versions of Arthurian narrative, Guinevere's relationship with > Lancelot becomes the most developed aspect of her story. In ⊳ Chrétien de Troyes' romance, the Chevalier de la Charrette, Guinevere is abducted by King Meleagant and rescued by Lancelot, her lover. Her love affair with Lancelot is later linked into the cycles of Arthurian narrative, and represented as one of the factors contributing to the break-up of Arthur's court and reign (ironically the ➤ Round Table is part of her dowry). In ➤ Malory's Morte D'Arthur, the quality of the love shared by Lancelot and Guinevere is celebrated, at the same time as its destructive consequences are recounted: Guinevere, in the Morte D'Arthur 'is a true lover, and therefore she had a good end'. She dies in the convent at Amesbury.

Gulliver's Travels (1726)

A satirical fable by ➤ Jonathan Swift. It exploits the contemporary interest in accounts of voyages, eg William Dampier's New Voyage (1697). ➤ Daniel Defoe's fictional account of Robinson Crusoe's voyages had been published in 1719, and had achieved great popularity; this was partly due to Defoe's strictly factual presentation, such that his book could quite well pass for a true account. Swift has his hero, Lemuel Gulliver, recount his adventures with the same sober precision for the effect of accuracy, following, as does Defoe's Crusoe. the philosopher ⊳ John Locke in describing only the primary -ie objective, measurable qualities of his strange environments, and ignoring the secondary qualities of colour, beauty, etc., which are more subjective, less verifiable, and so more likely to arouse a reader's disbelief. Swift's intention in doing this was of course not to deceive his readers into supposing that Gulliver's fantastic adventures were true. but to make them realize the absurdity, and worse, of accepted human characteristics when they are looked at from an unfamiliar point of view. Thus in Part I, > Lilliput, Gulliver is wrecked on an island where human beings are little bigger than insects, and their selfimportance is clearly laughable, but in Part II, ▷ Brobdingnag, he is himself an insect in a land of giants, and made to feel his own pettiness. In Part III, contemporary scientists of the > Royal Society are held up for ridicule: science is shown to be futile unless it is applicable to human betterment – the science of Swift's day had not yet reached the stage of technology. Part IV is about the land of the ➤ Houyhnhms, where horses are endowed with reason but human beings are not; the point here is that the horses recognize that Gulliver has reason, unlike the ➤ Yahoos of the island which he so much resembles, but they succeed in demonstrating to him that human reason is woefully inadequate for the conduct of life because of the mischievousness of the human mind. Swift was, after all, a Christian, and believed that Man would destroy himself without divine aid.

Swift was such a good story-teller that his fable became popular for the sake of the narrative, and though it was in no ordinary sense a novel, his close attention to factual detail (the way in which, especially in Parts I and II, Gulliver is continuously under the pressure of his environment) takes a long stride in the advance of novelistic art.

➤ Lagado, Luggnagg.

Gunn, Neil M. (1891-1973)

Novelist, short-story writer, playwright and journalist. Born in Dunbeath, Caithness in the north of Scotland. After a brief period in his teens when he worked as a clerk in London, Gunn was for many years a Customs and Excise Officer in Scotland until becoming a full-time writer in 1937. He was involved in politics as a Scottish Nationalist. The Silver Darlings (1941) depicts the development of the herring industry in the early nineteenth century, following the Highland Clearances. It centres on the story of a young mother, Catrine, whose husband disappears at sea, and her son, Finn, who, despite his mother's fears, himself turns to the sea as a living and a way of life. Other novels include: The Grey Coast (1926); Morning Tide (1930); Butcher's Broom (1934); Highland River (1937); Young Art and Old Hector (1942); The Green Isle of the Great Deep (1944). The Atom of Delight (1956) is autobiographical. Bib: Hart, F. R. and Pick, J. B., Neil M. Gunn: A Highland Life; Gifford, D., Neil M. Gunn and Lewis Grassic Gibbon; McCulloch, M., The Novels of Neil M. Gunn: A Critical Study (1987).

Gunn, Thom (b 1020)

Poet. Educated at Cambridge and Stanford University in California, Gunn now lives in San Francisco, although he is of British origin. His work was first associated with the ➤ Movement, but gradually it drew away from comparison with ➤ Philip Larkin or ➤ Kingsley Amis through its growing violent energy in the 1960s, although formally his precise, clear style is still akin to 1950s poetry. Gunn's work in the U.S.A. has drawn him close to American beat poets in rhythm and subject matter, motorbikes and rock music, and images of nihilism. He has experimented with syllabic, ▷ iambic and with ▷ free verse forms. His publications include: Fighting Terms (1954); Poems (1954); The Sense of Movement (1957) (which won the Somerset Maugham award); Moly (1971); Jack Straw's Castle (1976); Selected Poems, 1950–1975 (1979); The Passages of Joy (1982); The Man with Night Sweats (1992); and Collected Poems (1993).

Gunning, Elizabeth (1769-1823)

Novelist and translator. Daughter of the > Augustan novelist Susannah Gunning and the cousin of > Charlotte Bury, the sensational nature of Elizabeth's family life led ➤ Walpole to entitle them the 'Gunningiad'. Elizabeth herself rejected the husband her father chose for her to pursue a relationship with a somewhat reluctant suitor. However, it was when she was accused of forging letters that her father disowned her and she was left dependent upon the bounty of her mother, which she also came close to losing. Her novels are reminiscent of her mother's writing, both following the traditions of sentiment and ⊳ melodrama, and concerning mainly aristocratic families who encounter strange and sensational events; examples of these include The Orphans of Snowdon (1797) and The Gipsy Countess (1799). Her most interesting work is Family Stories (1802), which purports to be a collection of magic tales for children, but which retells the traditional material from a darker and more adult perspective.

Gunpowder Plot (1605)

A conspiracy by a section of English Roman Catholics to destroy the Protestant government of ➤ James I by blowing up the Houses of Parliament at a time when the king and the members of the Houses of Lords and Commons were all in the building. The plot was inspired by the ▶ Jesuits and led by Robert Catesby, but undertaken by Guy Fawkes. The date was fixed for 5 November and the explosives were all laid, but the plot was betrayed and Fawkes was arrested on the threshold of the cellar on 4 November. This 'discovery' was somewhat stage-managed by the government, which was possibly deeply implicated in the gestation of the plot through the use of double-agents. ➤ Macbeth and ➤ Catiline both seem to allude to the incident. 5 November has since been celebrated annually with fireworks and bonfires on which Guy Fawkes is burnt in effigy. Bib: Dehuna, B., Jonson's Romish Plot.

Guy Mannering (1815)

A novel by \triangleright Sir Walter Scott. It is set in the south of Scotland near the English border during the 18th century. The plot concerns the attempt of a criminal lawyer, Glossin, to deprive Harry Bertram, the heir to the Scottish estate of Ellangowan, of his property. Bertram is kidnapped as a child by smugglers in Glossin's pay, and carried abroad. He returns to Scotland as a young man and recovers his estate with the help of a gipsy who lives on it, Meg Merrilies. Mannering is an English officer under whom Bertram has served in the army, and with whose daughter Julia he is in love. The novel is notable partly for its romantic scenepainting, and partly for the characterization which is markedly more vivid in the lower social orders – the ⊳ gipsies, the farmer Dandy Dinmont, the tutor Dominie Sampson - than in its ladies and gentlemen. There are also very good descriptions of Edinburgh.

Guy of Warwick

A very popular early 14th-century English romance, based on a 13th-century ➤ Anglo-Norman text. It recounts the story of Guy's ultimately successful attempts to prove himself as a knight and win the hand of Fenice, daughter of the Earl of Warwick. He leaves his wife to go on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and the narrative tells of his subsequent experiences in the guise of a pilgrim and his efforts, on his return to England, to help King Athelstan resist the Danish invaders (notably by fighting the giant Colbrand). It is only on his deathbed, having been nursed by Fenice, that the hermit, Guy, reveals his identity to his wife. There is a continuation which recounts the history of Guy's son Reinbrun. The combination of romance and saint's life story motifs in a semihistorical setting proved a popular and successful narrative formula. Many versions of the story survive, including one by ⊳ John Lydgate, and the story of Guy's fight with Colbrand is retold in ▶ Michael Drayton's Poly-Olbion. Guy's story is the subject of several 16th-century ballads and one 17th-century play. Bib: Barron, W. R. J., English Medieval Romance.

Gwynn (Gwyn, Guinn, Guin), Nell (Eleanor) (Ellen) (?1642-87)

Actress, dancer. One account of Gwynn's early years has her hawking herring in the streets of London, before she became an orange seller at the ▷ Bridges Street Theatre, under 'Orange Moll', in about 1663. By 1665 she had graduated to the stage, aided by the actor ▷ Charles Hart, who became the leading actor in the ▷ King's Company and reputedly Gwynn's lover.

Gwynn quickly gained a reputation as a brilliant comic actress and dancer, 'pretty witty Nell'. By 1667 she had become the mistress of Charles Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, and two years after that, one of the mistresses of King ▷ Charles II. She gave birth to a son, later the Duke of St Albans, in 1670. She resumed acting soon afterwards, but left the stage permanently in 1671, living in a house in Pall Mall provided for her by the king. She continued as an avid patron of the stage, bringing large parties to performances. She also gave away substantial sums to the poor, and used her influence to free some prisoners from gaol. Gwynn remained a favourite of the court circle, and of the people, despite many satiric or even venomous attacks on her. Bib. Howe, E., The First English Actresses; Wilson, J. H., All the King's Ladies: Actresses of the Restoration; Wilson, J. H., Nell Gwynn; Chesterton, C., Nell Gwynn; Bevan, B., Nell Gwynn.

Gynocriticism

A concept introduced by Elaine Showalter in her influential essay 'Towards a Feminist Poetic (1979). Gynocriticism focuses on 'the newly visible world of female culture'. Instead of concentrating on restrictive male images of women as in > feminist critique, gynocriticism concentrates on what is distinctive and creative about women's literary production. This might include the literary-historical relationships between women writers (a particular interest of Showalter's), the development of female sub-cultures and the dynamics of specifically female forms of creativity and ways of writing (> écriture féminine).

Bib: Showalter, E. (ed.), The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature and Theory. H

Hack

Abbreviated from 'hackney', as in hackney-carriage. Since about 1700 it has been a derogatory term for an author, implying that the author can be hired for little money, to go wherever the hirer pleases; hence, a bad writer, one without originality, later often used of a journalist. The term was also a slang word for a prostitute, meaning one who could be 'ridden' for a small sum.

Haggard, Sir H. (Henry) Rider (1856–1925) Son of a Norfolk squire, he spent several years in South Africa as a young man, writing books on its history and farming, but he is famous for his numerous adventure novels set in such exotic locations as Iceland, Mexico and ancient Egypt. They are characterized by gripping narrative and strange events, as well as evocative descriptions of landscape, wildlife and tribal society, particularly in Africa. He has had a world-wide readership and some of his stories have been filmed. King Solomon's Mines (1886) and She (1887) are the most famous novels. The Days of My Life: an Autobiography appeared in 1926.

Bib: Haggard, L. R., The Cloak that I Left; Ellis, P. B., H. Rider Haggard: A voice from the Infinite; Higgins, D. S., Rider Haggard: The Great Storyteller.

Hakluyt, Richard (?1553-1616)

Geographer. In 1589 and 1598 he published his Principal Navigations, Voyages and Discoveries of the English Nation, being a record of English explorations, which had lagged behind those of the French, Spanish, Portuguese and Dutch until the middle of the century, and then made prodigious progress with the nationalistic energy characteristic of England in the reign of ▶ Elizabeth I.

Bib: Parks, G. B., Richard Hakluyt and the English Voyages.

Halifax, George Savile, Marquess of Political prose writer. Savile received his peerage in 1668, but went over to the opposition in the 1670s. Nevertheless he remained loyal to ➤ Charles II during the exclusion crisis and became Lord Privy Seal in 1682. He wrote a number of political pamphlets as well as some unpublished characters and maxims. Halifax's most well-known work is the pamphlet, The Character of a Trimmer (1685).

Halkett, Lady Anne (1623–99) Devotional writer and autobiographer. Lady Anne had two unsuccessful romances before marrying Sir James Halkett in 1656, but this marriage was to last for only 14 years and, as a widow, she earned her own living by teaching and writing. Her religious meditations and ▷ autobiography ran to 50 volumes of manuscript material, but it is her life-story (edited in 1979 by J. Loftis as The Memoirs of Anne, Lady Halkett and Ann, Lady Fanshawe (▷ Ann Fanshawe)) that remains her most interesting work. Halkett's memoirs are practical, but carry an undercurrent of humour that allows for particularly feminine observations, as, for example, when she dresses the future James II in women's clothes to facilitate his escape in 1648.

➤ Scottish literature.

Bib: H. Wilcox in Cerasano, S. P. and Wynne-Davies, M. (eds.), Gloriana's Face.

Hall, Anna Maria (1800-81)

Fielding in Dublin she moved to England in 1815 and married Samuel Carter Hall in 1824, who managed her literary salon from their home. She befriended many young writers including ▷ Dinah Craik and ▷ Margaret Oliphant whilst publishing her own stories of Irish character and society, such as Sketches of Irish Character (1829) and Lights and Shadows of Irish Life (1838). She also produced three dramas, some children's stories, and fiction which dealt sympathetically with the peculiar problems of women's lives. These include Tales of Women's Trials (1835) and The Old

Governess (1858), which describes the miseries of the ⊳ governess profession. She helped to found the Governesses' Institute and the Home for Decayed Gentlewomen, which she

Irish novelist and journalist. Born Anna Maria supported with much of the profit from her writings, although she was unsympathetic to women's rights. She was awarded a Queen's Pension in 1868.

Irish literature in English; Women's Hall, Edward (?1498-1547)

Movement.

Chronicler; author of The Union of the Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York (1542; enlarged 1548, 1550). This tells of the bitter rivalries of the two branches of the House of Anjou (Plantagenets) from the death of the childless > Richard II in 1400, and the accession of ▶ Henry IV, first of the House of Lancaster, to the death of the last of the House of York, > Richard III, in 1485, and the accession of Henry Tudor as ➤ Henry VII. He idealizes Henry VII and ⊳ Henry VIII, partly because they reestablished dynastic harmony, and partly because, as a ▷ Protestant, Hall was strongly sympathetic to Henry VIII's reform of the Church. The Chronicle was one of > Shakespeare's two main source-books for his English history plays, the other being ➤ Holinshed.

> Histories and Chronicles.

Bib: Kingsford, C. L., English Historical Literature in the Fifteenth Century.

Hall, Joseph (1574-1656) → Satirist; 'character' (Characters, Theophrastian) writer, religious controversialist; bishop, 1627-47. He published his Virgidemiae (or Harvest of Rods, ie for chastisement) in 1507-8; he claimed to be the first English satirist, but > John Donne and > John Marston were writing at the same time, not to mention ➤ Edmund Spenser's Mother Hubberd's Tale. He may have considered himself more truly a satirist than his rivals inasmuch as he was stricter in following classical Latin models, notably Juvenal. Like Juvenal, he attacked what he saw as contemporary vices. His Characters of Virtues and Vices (1608) was likewise in classical tradition, this time modelled on the Greek Theophrastus, and was also intended for the moral improvement of the age. Bib: Davenport, A., The Poems of Joseph Hall; Huntley, F. L., Bishop Joseph Hall.

Hall, Marguerite Radclyffe (1883-1943) Novelist, poet and short-story writer. Her novel The Well of Loneliness (1928) is perhaps the most famous lesbian novel ever published; it concerns the lesbian relationship of a writer, who eventually loses her partner to a male rival, but, having acknowledged her own sexuality, is enabled to write a successful novel. The book was banned on first appearance, despite the support of writers such as ▷ Virginia Woolf and > E. M. Forster; it was republished in 1949. Born in Hampshire, England, Hall wrote poetry from an early age, and began to publish with Twixt Earth and Stars (1906), followed by A Sheaf of Verses (1908), in which she started to represent and explore her lesbianism in the poems 'The Scar' and 'Ode to Sappho'. She won the Prix Femina and the James Tait Black Memorial Prize for the novel Adam's Breed (1926), before the notoriety caused by The Well of Loneliness. Her other novels are: The Unlit Lamp (1924), about a destructive mother-daughter relationship; The Forge (1924); A Saturday Life (1925); The Master of the House (1932); The Sixth Beatitude (1936). Miss Ogilvy Finds Herself (1934) is a collection of stories.

➤ Feminism; Lesbian and Gay Writing. Bib: Dickson, L., Radclyffe Hall and the Well of Loneliness; Franks, C.S., Beyond the Well of Loneliness: The Fiction of Radclyffe Hall; Baker, M., Our Three Selves: A Life of Radcyffe Hall; Troutbridge, U.B., The Life and Death of Radclyffe Hall.

Hall, Sir Peter (b 1930)

British director whose first major production was ➤ Samuel Beckett's ➤ Waiting for Godot at the Arts Theatre in 1955. From 1956 he directed at Stratford-on-Avon and became director of the theatre from 1960, when it became the Royal Shakespeare Theatre (▷ Royal Shakespeare Company). In 1972 he replaced ▷ Laurence Olivier as director of the ▷ National Theatre, from which he retired in 1988 to establish his own company.

Bib: Hall, P., Peter Hall's Diaries: the Stories of a Dramatic Battle.

Hallam, Arthur Henry (1811–1833)
Poet and miscellaneous writer. The son of ➤ Henry Hallam, but better knówn as the friend of ➤ Tennyson and famously commemorated in that poet's ➤ In Memoriam (1833–50).

Hallam showed great promise as a scholar and was primarily influenced by the ➤ Romantic poets. His works were edited posthumously by his father as Remains in Verse and Prose of A.
H. Hallam (1834).

Hallam, Henry (1777–1859)
Historian. Henry Hallam was the father of ➤ Arthur Henry Hallam, whom ➤ Tennyson commemorated in ➤ In Memoriam (1833–50).

He is well known for his thorough and influential Constitutional History of England (1827) and his comprehensive An Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the Fifteenth, Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (1837–9), and he edited his son's works in Memoir of A. H. Hallam (1834).

Hamilton, Elizabeth (1758-1816) Essavist and satirist. Elizabeth Hamilton is known to have predicted her fate as 'one cheerful, pleased, old maid', and although she became ill during the last years of her life, this proved to be a very apt prophecy. Her many publications include Translation of the Letters of a Hindoo Rajah (1796), which is not a translation but a satire of contemporary British society through the eyes of the fictional character of the titular Indian Rajah, and Memoirs of Modern Philosophers (1800), which attacks contemporary society for its treatment of women, but simultaneously exposes the ludicrousness of women who believe they can alter anything, and in which she attacked contemporary philosophers as 'men who, without much knowledge, either moral or natural, entertain a high idea of their own superiority from having the temerity to reject whatever has the sanction of experience and common sense'. She also wrote on education and undertook historical character sketches. Bib: Butler, M., Jane Austen and the War of Ideas.

Hamilton, Lady Mary (1739–1816) Novelist, born in Edinburgh to Alexander Leslie, the fifth Earl of Leven and his wife Elizabeth. She was married twice: to Dr James Walker and, after his death, to Robert Hamilton. She spent most of her life in France, but wrote in English, although one of her works was translated into French. Her five novels are mostly in the → epistolary mode, and have → romantic plots but an earnest moral tone, including appeals for women's right to → education. They display considerable erudition, with a number of characters discussing the classics, science, and other serious topics, including architecture and contemporary literature.

Hamilton, Patrick (1904-1962)

Novelist and playwright. His trilogy Twenty Thousand Streets Under the Sky (1935), comprising The Midnight Bell (1929), The Siege of Pleasure (1932) and The Plains of Cement (1934), revolves around the lives of a prostitute, a barmaid and a waiter in London, and portrays a characteristically seedy world of streets and bars. He also wrote thrillers, both in the form of novels, such as Hangover Square (1941), and in the form of plays, most notably Rope (1929) (filmed by Hitchcock in 1948), and Gaslight (1939). His other novels include Craven House (1926) and The Slaves of Solitude (1947), both of which are set in London boarding-houses.

Hamlet (c 1601)

A ⊳ tragedy by ⊳ Shakespeare, written in about 1601. Three early versions of it exist: the imperfect > quarto of 1603, the superior quarto of 1604, and the version in the First Folio of 1623, which omits some of the material in the 1604 quarto, but also contains authentic passages not in that text. The story was a widespread legend in northern Europe. Shakespeare's immediate source is likely to have been Belleforest's Histoires Tragiques (1550), and Belleforest's own version came from a 13th-century Danish chronicler, Saxo Grammaticus. But Shakespeare also had another source: a play of the same name already existed and is thought to have been a lost play by > Thomas Kyd. It is referred to without mention of the author by ➤ Nashe in a letter accompanying ▷ Greene's Menaphon (1589), by > Henslowe in his Diary (1594) and by ➤ Lodge in Wit's Misery (1596). There are also parallels between Shakespeare's play and Kyd's ➤ Spanish Tragedy: both have ghosts and a play within the play; Kyd's tragedy is about a father seeking vengeance for his son, and Shakespeare's is about a son avenging his father. In both plays there are obstacles to the vengeance: in Kyd's play, the obstacle is a straightforward one, of how to bring retribution upon an offender who is so powerful as to be beyond the law; in Shakespeare it is so subtle that Hamlet's hesitations have been among the most discussed subjects in criticism.

Certain features of Shakespeare's play require special attention in assessing the play.

I The basic situation is that Hamlet's uncle Claudius, has married Hamlet's mother, Gertrude, only a month after the death of her husband, old Hamlet. Claudius has, moreover, ascended the throne ignoring the claim of his nephew and with the consent of the court. This thoroughly distasteful situation reflects badly not only on Claudius and Gertrude, but on the court as well, and it has already plunged Hamlet into disgust at the opening of the play. We need also to remember that marriage to a sister-in-law was of at least doubtful validity: it constituted > Henry VIII's legal ground for divorce from Katharine of Aragon.

2 It is only later that Hamlet learns from his father's ghost that old Hamlet was murdered by Claudius. The revelation does not lead directly to action, but to Hamlet feigning madness, and to the 'play within the play', before which Claudius, in the audience, betrays his guilt.

3 Claudius' self-betrayal, however, is incriminating only to Hamlet and his friend Horatio, who have already learned the facts. Either Hamlet mistrusts the Ghost, who may not have been truly the spirit of his father, or it is part of his vengeance to inform Claudius that his guilt is known. One of the beliefs about ghosts current in Shakespeare's time was that they were sometimes evil spirits assuming the disguise of dead men.

4 Hamlet's hostility extends not merely to Claudius, but to the whole court, in so far as they are or may be subservient to Claudius. Thus Hamlet behaves brutally to Ophelia (the girl he loves) because he suspects (although she is entirely innocent) that she is being used as a kind of decoy by Claudius and by her father,

5 Laertes, Ophelia's brother, is a contrast to Hamlet in being a straightforward revenger: he immediately seeks the death of Hamlet for causing the deaths of his father and sister. But his impetuosity puts him on the side of evil, for it causes him to connive with Claudius.

6 Claudius is an unusual villain for the drama of the time, for he is not seen to be evil on the stage; we know of his guilt indirectly. Even his conspiracy against Hamlet's life can be excused as action in self-defence.

These features of the play suggest that Shakespeare was exposing traditional beliefs about revenge as over-simplified. Revenge is difficult if we do not feel the guilty man to be guilty: 'One may smile, and smile and be a villain' (1. v. 108). Further, revenge does not solve evil, if evil lies in a complex situation: 'The time is out of joint; O cursed spite/That ever I was born to set it right' (V. i. 189–90). Finally, revenge itself may be morally wrong: what was the Ghost?

Hammett, Dashiell (1894–1961)

➤ Detective fiction.

Hampton, Christopher (b 1946)
British dramatist, a product of the ➤ Royal Court theatre where he was the first resident dramatist (1968-70), while also working there as literary manager. His much acclaimed adaptation, Les Liaisons Dangereuses (1985), performed by the ➤ Royal Shakespeare Company, is a dramatization of a novel by Choderlos de Laclos about sexual combat and power in France just prior to the revolution of 1789. This was rewritten by Hampton for the screenplay of Stephen Frears' very successful 1988 film, Dangerous Liaisons. Typically of Hampton, the play does not deal explicitly with politics, though it provides a witty and vivid insight into a world of decadence and ruthlessness on the brink of collapse. Other works include: Total Eclipse (1968); The Philanthropist (1970); Savages (1973); Treats (1976); Tales from the Vienna Woods (1977); Don Juan Comes Back From the War (1978); Tales from Hollywood (1983); and White Chameleon (1993). Hampton has been described as a modern classicist, not least for his translations of plays by ▷ Chekhov, ▷ Ibsen and ▷ Molière: Uncle Vanya (1971); Hedda Gabler (1971); A Doll's House (1971); The Wild Duck (1980); Ghosts (1983); Don Juan (1972); Tartuffe (1984).

Handel, George Frederick (1685–1759) Composer. Born in Germany, he was appointed chief musician to George, Elector of Hanover, who became George I of Britain (1714-27). Handel visited England in 1710 and settled there in 1712; he became a naturalized British citizen in 1726. He had studied in Italy and was deeply experienced in French music, but in many respects he was in harmony with the English tradition, whose last great master, > Henry Purcell, had died in 1695. Nonetheless, Handel at first had an uneven career in England. He first attempted to establish > opera in the Italian style; his opera Rinaldo was a success in 1711. Yet opera in the end reduced him to bankruptcy and he became the exponent of the art of oratorio, which he transformed from its original religious feeling and setting into a much more theatrical form. His first oratorio, Esther (1720), resembled the ▷ masques that had been popular in fashionable circles since early in the previous century. Semele, Susanna and Judas Maccabus, to mention a few of the 16 oratorios that followed, are choral dramas. His masterpiece was Messiah, first performed in Dublin in 1741. Handel established the oratorio as the most popular English musical form for the next two centuries. Others of his choral works included his choral settings for > John Dryden's poems, Ode on St Cecilia's Day and Alexander's Feast. Bib: Deutsch, O. E., Handel: A Documentary Biography.

Handlyng Synne

➤ Mannyng, Robert.

Hands, Elizabeth (fl 1785) Poet. A neglected writer of great skill and variety, Hands had to contend with contemporary prejudice against her class (she was a servant) as well as her sex. She was sharply aware of both social barriers, writing the ▷ satirical 'Ode on a Dishclout', and inverting conventional gender roles in her pastorals, where she makes the female nymphs sing in competition describing the beauty of their lovers, the male shepherds. Her most ambitious work, The Death of Amnon was published in 1789 and focuses upon incest and rape.

Bib: Landry, D., The Muses of Resistance.

Hanway, Mary Ann (c 1775-1815) Novelist. Little is known about Hanway's life, and she is memorable mainly for her ▶ Minerva novels. The plots of her works are predictable - beautiful, orphaned heroines discover their long-lost parents and marry happily - and the didacticism advocating unadulterated moral virtue is cloving and repetitive. But Hanway's figurative language, although unsophisticated, is passionate and ornate, and some of the passages describing physical details appear darkly obsessive. These preoccupations are coupled with an odd, but clearly stated, intention of writing so that her female readers could expunge their own emotional and bodily disorders through the process of reading. Apart from seeing novels as a form of therapy, Hanway had other ideas in advance of her time, attacking contemporary society for the way in which it treated black people, and perceiving that the education system was biased towards men.

➤ Psychoanalytical criticism. Bib: Schlueter, P. and J., An Encyclopedia of British Women Writers.

Harcourt, Mary (c 1750–1833) Diarist. Mary Harcourt married a commander in the British army, William Harcourt, in 1778, and travelled with him when he was on active duty. Her accounts of what she saw during these periods reflect the horrors of war, and show the small, and often neglected, acts of pity and heroism, as well as uncovering the political motivations behind the objectives. Her work was published by the Harcourt Papers in 1792–5.

Diaries; Nationalism.

Hard Times (1854)

A novel by ➤ Charles Dickens. It is the only one by him not at least partly set in London. The scene is an imaginary industrial town called Coketown. One of the main characters, Thomas Gradgrind, is based on the ➤ Utilitarian leader James Mill (1773–1836); as such he is an educationist who believes that education should be merely practical and hence factual, allowing no place for imagination or emotion. He marries his daughter Louisa to a ruthless manufacturer, Josiah Bounderby, who puts Gradgrind's philosophy into practice in that he has no place for humane feeling in the conduct of his business. Louisa accepts him in order to be in a position to help her brother Tom who becomes, under the influence of his upbringing, callous, unscrupulous and meanly calculating. Louisa is nearly seduced by a visiting politician, James Harthouse, who is cynically concerned only to find amusement in a place with no other charms. The opposition to this world of calculating selfishness is a travelling circus called 'the horse-riding' owned by Sleary. Sissy Jupe, a product of the circus and the human fellowship that it engenders, is found ineducable by Gradgrind, whose dependant she becomes, but she has the inner assurance required to face Harthouse and compel him to leave the town. Gradgrind's world falls apart when he discovers that he has ruined his daughter's happiness and turned his son into a criminal. A subplot concerns a working-man, Stephen Blackpool, a victim of the Gradgrind-Bounderby system, and of young Gradgrind's heartless criminality.

➤ Social Problem novel; Anti industrialism. Bib: Samuels, A., An Introduction to the Varieties of Criticism: Hard Times.

Hardwicke's Marriage Act (1753)

An Act of Parliament intended to regulate and clarify the forms of marriage. It arose because of a growing number of clandestine marriages, elopements and abductions of heiresses, as well as the ambiguities in what actually constituted a marriage owing to differences between the common law and ecclesiastical law, and contradictions within the laws themselves. The Act made it illegal to marry without a church service, required parental consent for the marriage of anyone under 21, defined times and places in which a marriage could take place in order to be legal, required all marriages to be entered into a church register, and transferred the control of marriage from the ecclesiastical to the secular courts. The Act was criticized by some for inhibiting the free expression of love among the young, and subjecting them to the tyranny of their elders. In fact parental attempts to control their children's choices in marriage were nothing new, and form the basis of the plots of many stage comedies of the Restoration and 18th century. Bib: Stone, L., The Family, Sex and Marriage in England 1500-1800; Alleman, G. S., Matrimonial

Hardy, Thomas (1840-1928)

Novelist and poet. Hardy was born in Higher Bockhampton, the son of a master mason and builder, Thomas Hardy senior, and his wife Jemima, who encouraged his early interest in literature. As a child he was immersed in country life, legend and folklore and became acquainted with the harshness of rural living, which contributed to his sympathy for country workers and animals. From 1856-62 he was apprenticed to a local architect and met the Dorsetshire dialect poet ➤ William Barnes, and the intellectual Horace Moule, who encouraged his intellectual aspirations and later introduced him to the theories of ➤ Charles Darwin: Hardy claimed that after reading Darwin he gave up his plan to become a country parson and he spent the rest of his life trying to reconcile the orthodox notion of a benevolent God with Darwin's theory of evolution through natural selection. At the same time he witnessed the growing, impoverishment of the south-west of England, an area which was to feature so strongly in his novels as ➤ Wessex. From 1862-7 he joined the architectural offices of Arthur Blomfield in London and published his first article 'How I built myself a House'. He also made an unsuccesful foray into poetry.

Law and the Materials of Restoration Comedy.

His first novel, The Poor Man and the Lady (1867), was rejected by ➤ George Meredith, a reader for Chapman and Hall, on the grounds that it was too socialistic. His first published novel was Desperate Remedies (1871), a ⊳ sensation novel in the style of ⊳ Wilkie Collins, and while writing it he met Emma Lavinia Gifford in St Juliot, Cornwall, where he had been sent by his employer to survey the mouldering parish church of which her father was the rector. They married in 1874 and though their relationship was extremely troubled Hardy wrote a flood of poems 'in expiation' on her death in 1912. These are collected in Satires of Circumstance, Lyrics and Reveries (1914), and remain amongst Hardy's finest literary works.

Between 1871 and 1898 Hardy wrote fourteen novels; three volumes of short stories: Wessex Tales (1888), A Group of Noble Dames (1891), and Life's Little Ironies (1894); and a volume of poetry, Wessex Poems (1898). His best known novels are the group he named his 'Novels of Character and Environment'. They include Description > Under the Greenwood Tree (1872); Description the Madding Crowd (1874); > The Return of the Native (1878); > The Mayor of Casterbridge (1886); > The Woodlanders (1887); > Tess of the d'Urbervilles (1891); > Jude the Obscure (1895). The remaining seven he classed as 'Romances and Fantasies' (> A Pair of Blue Eyes, 1873; The Trumpet Major, 1880; Two on a Tower, 1882; The Well-Beloved, 1897), and 'Novels of Ingenuity' (> Desperate Remedies, 1871: The Hand of Ethelberta, 1876; A Laodicean 1881). Many of these are the subject of serious critical re-evaluation, in particular the much underrated A Pair of Blue Eyes. His remaining works include: Poems of the Past and Present (1902); Time's Laughingstocks and Other Verses (1909); Late Lyrics and Earlier (1922); Human Shows, Far Phantasies, Songs and Trifles (1925) and the posthumous Winter Words in Various Moods and Metres (1928).

Hardy's poetry is as distinguished as his novels; indeed he regarded himself primarily as a poet. His diction is distinctive and he experimented constantly with form and stresses, and the singing rhythms subtly respond to the movement of his intense feelings; the consequent poignance and sincerity has brought him the admiration of poets ever since. His lyrics nearly always centre on incident, in a way that gives them dramatic sharpness. Hardy also wrote a three-part epic verse drama, The Dynasts (1903-8), and a verse drama about Tristram and Iseult, The Famous Tragedy of the Queen of Cornwall (1923). His work is continually under scrutiny by feminist scholars, some of the more discerning of whom have interrogated the crude simplification of his works as fatalist or pessimistic and exposed the criticism of social institutions that underpins his remarkable portrayals of women.

Bib: Gittings, R., Young Thomas Hardy, The Older Hardy; Millgate, M., Thomas Hardy: A Biography, Thomas Hardy: His Career as a Novelist; Seymour-Smith, M., Hardy; Morgan, R., Women and Sexuality in the Novels of Thomas Hardy; Boumelha, P., Thomas Hardy and Women; Widdowson, P., Hardy and History; Johnson, T., A Critical Introduction to the Poems of Thomas Hardy.

Hardyng, John (1378-c1465)

Compiler of the verse chronicle, covering the period from the foundation of Britain by Brutus to the year 1437, referred to as The Chronicle of John Hardyng. The early sections of the Chronicle draw material from the framework of British history established by ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth, but in Hardyng's version ⊳ King Arthur is actually crowned Emperor of Rome. The Chronicle seems to have been used by ➤ Malory for a few details of Arthurian history in his Morte D'Arthur. The interest in validating the claims of the kings of England to overlordship of Scotland, which is evident in the Chronicle, perhaps reflects one of the political motivations for its compilation. Bib: Gransden, A., Historical Writing in England, Vol. II.

Hare, David (b 1947)

Dramatist and screenwriter. Hare came to prominence in the 1970s as one of a breed of committed socialist writers who included of Leaving (1980) and Saigon – Year of the Cat (1983), which subtly modified traditional television techniques.

→ Howard Barker, Howard Brenton, → David Edgar, Snoo Wilson and → Trevor Griffiths. He founded Portable Theatre with the dramatist Tony Bicât in 1968 and Joint Stock with William Gaskill and Max Stafford-Clark in 1974. He has also been literary manager and resident dramatist at the Royal Court Theatre and one of the companies at the ➤ National Theatre. Hare has also carved out a singular niche in television with Licking Hitler (1978), Dreams

Hare has described himself in recent years as a 'commentator' on the ills of contemporary capitalism. Fanshen (1976), a documentary play about the Chinese Revolution, was a seminal play of the 1970s, popularising the Joint Stock rehearsal method. Unusually for Hare, the play concentrates on the processes of revolution rather than individual characters. His plays still reflect a highly charged political consciousness but recent work marks a return to a predominant interest in the topography of personal relationships. The Secret Rapture concentrates on the contrasting attitudes of two sisters to questions of morality and caring (it was filmed successfully in 1994); Racing Demon pursues similar spiritual themes in the context of modern attitudes to religious faith.

He has also written two other plays which link with Racing Demon to form a trilogy on religion, law (Murmuring Judges, 1991) and politics (The Absence of War), 1993). His films include: Wetherby, Paris by Night, Strapless, and The Secret Rapture.

Bib: Bull, J., New British Political Dramatists; Chambers, C. and Prior, M., Playwrights' Progress.

Harington, Sir John (1561-1612)

Poet, translator, courtier and brother to the well-respected literary patron, > Lucy Russell, Countess of Bedford, Harington's translation of ➤ Ludovico Ariosto's ➤ Orlando Furioso (published in 1591) was undertaken, so it is said, as a punishment exacted by ▷ Elizabeth I for his having translated part of the bawdy sections of that poem. Whatever the circumstances of its production, Harington's work established itself as one of the most important of Elizabethan translations. In addition to his work on Ariosto, Harington also wrote a humorous piece entitled A New Discourse of a Stale Subject, called the Metamorphosis of Ajax (1596). This work, with its punning title (Ajax = A 'Jakes' = a water closet) contains diagrams and instructions on the installation of a plumbing system. The queen suspected that the work contained a subtle allusion to the ➤ Earl of Leicester and banished Harington from court. During this banishment he put his hydraulic theories into practice, installing the first water closet in England at Richmond Palace. A tendency to overdo a joke is suggested by the publication, again in 1596, of An Anatomy of the Metamorphosed Ajax. Bib: Haughey, R., Harington of Stepney, Tudor Gentleman: His Life and Works.

Harley Manuscript

A rich anthology, principally of Middle English and Anglo-Norman poetry and prose (with some ecclesiastical texts in Latin), compiled probably near Ludlow, Shropshire, c 1340; now in the British Library (Harley 2253). The pieces are of considerable literary sophistication, and include a wide variety of genres and literary forms: > lyrics, a > romance, > fabliaux, historical poems, interludes, saints' lives, satires, biblical narratives and a guide to Holy Land pilgrimages. The texts seem to be consciously arranged to produce striking sacred/secular juxtapositions. The manuscript contains an outstanding collection of Middle English lyrics (generally referred to as 'The Harley Lyrics'), and half the extant corpus of Middle English secular lyrics (up to the end of the 14th century) are preserved in unique copies in it. Bib: Ker, N. R., Facsimile of BM. MS. Harley 2253; Brook, G. L. (ed.), The Harley Lyrics.

Harley, Robert, 1st Earl of Oxford (1661-1724)

Statesman and Parliamentarian, originally a Whig, who changed sides to favour the Tory cause. He became Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1710, and supervised the passage of the Treaty of Utrecht (> Spanish Succession, War of the). In 1714 he was dismissed from office and spent a period in the Tower of London. Forced into premature retirement, he spent the rest of his life befriending literary figures and collecting literary works. His collection was added to by his son Edward, 2nd Earl of Oxford (1689-1741), and was eventually sold to become part of the library of the British Museum, now the British Library, where it is still known as the Harleian Collection, or the Harleian Manuscripts. It contains a wide variety of items from the > Middle Ages onwards, including many that are rare or unique. Some tracts were edited by > Samuel Johnson and William Oldys (1696-1761), and published 1744-46 as the Harleian Miscellany.

Harrington, James (1611–77)
Political prose writer. Born in Upton to a declining noble family and educated at Oxford, Harrington became friendly with influential figures at court such as the Elector Palatine, and with Charles 1 himself. However, he was a supporter of the parliamentarian cause during the ▷ Civil War and was briefly imprisoned in the tower on the restoration of the monarchy. His political writings include The Commonwealth of Oceana (1656) and The Art of Lawgiving (1659).

Harris, Wilson (b 1921) Guyanese novelist and short-story writer. The landscape and history of Guyana play an important part in his work, which is concerned with such issues as the legacy of the colonial past and the destruction and recreation of individual and collective identity. His novels are visionary, experimental, antirealist explorations of consciousness, employing multiple and fragmentary narrative structures, and symbolic correspondences between inner and outer landscapes. The later novels use a wider range of geographical settings, including England, Mexico and South America. His volumes of short stories, The Sleepers of Roraima (1970) and The Age of the Rainmakers (1971) locate a redemptive power in Amerindian myth. His novels are: The Guyana Quartet: Palace of the Peacock (1960); The Far Journey of Oudu (1961); The Whole Armour (1962) and The Secret Ladder (1963); Heartland (1964); The Eye of the Scarecrow (1965); The Waiting Room (1967); Tutamari (1968); Ascent to Omai (1970); Black Marsden (1972); Companions of the Day and Night (1975); Da Silva da Silva's Cultivated Wilderness, and the Genesis of the Clowns (1977); The Tree of the Sun (1978); The Angel at the Gate (1982); a trilogy consisting of: Carnival (1985), The Infinite Rehearsal (1987) and The Far Banks of the River of Space (1990); Resurrection at Sorrow Hill (1993).

➤ Post-colonial fiction. Bib: Gilkes, M., Wilson Harris and the Caribbean Novel.

Harrison, Tony (b 1937) Poet. His early volumes, The Loiners (1970) and The School of Eloquence (1978), established his recurrent subject matter - becoming distanced through education from his working-class, northern upbringing. This intensely felt sense of loss and belonging was still being explored in V (1985). Other volumes of poetry include: Newcastle is Peru (1974); Bow Down (1974); Continuous (1082); and The Common Chorus (1992). He has also translated Aeschylus' Oresteia and French drama for the theatre; see Dramatic Verse 1973-1985 (1985). He has also begun to establish himself as a writer for the theatre with his brilliant Trackers of Oxyrhyneus (1988).

Harsnett, Samuel (1561-1631) Bishop of York and religious writer. Harsnett's church career was somewhat varied in that he wrote > satires against the Puritans and the Catholics (the latter, A Declaration of Egregious Popish Inpostures (1603), being the source for Edgar's spirit names in > King Lear), yet was himself charged with favouring Popery, which led to his resignation from the post of master at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. In practice he was a somewhat domineering churchman, too concerned with ceremonies to be popular. Strangely, he is best known today as the censor who failed to read > Sir John Hayward's The First Part of the Life and Raigne of King Henrie the IIII (1599) with its eulogistic dedication to ▷ Essex. Hayward was imprisoned for the offence this gave to > Elizabeth I, but Harsnett managed to convince the Attorney-General of his innocence.

Hart, Charles (?1630-83)

Actor, manager. He began his career as a boy actor, playing women's parts, at the ▷ Blackfriars Theatre. After the theatres were closed in 1642, he fought in the service of the king, and is said to have acted clandestinely in the late 1640s. Hart resumed acting openly, at the Red Bull Theatre, about the time of the Restoration, and in late 1660 he joined the ▷ King's Company under ▷ Thomas Killigrew, now performing primarily or wholly in men's roles. He is reputed to have been, during the 1660s, a lover of ▷ Nell Gwynn.

During his lifetime his reputation rested particularly on his abilities in tragic roles: he is said to have acted with great precision and concentration such that nothing could distract him from his performance; and to have been able to draw full houses. He was for a time the main rival of \triangleright Thomas Betterton, who imitated his style on at least one occasion.

Hartley, David (1705-57)

A philosopher best known for his theory of association of ideas, based on the thought of ➤ Sir Isaac Newton and of ➤ John Locke in the 17th century. In his Observations on Man (1749) Hartley denied that moral ideas were inborn in man, holding that they derived from associations of pleasure and pain with certain behaviour. The higher pleasures derive from the lower, and culminate in the love of God. This philosophy of mechanistic psychology was very influential in the first half of the 19th century, especially on the > Utilitarian school of thinkers. > Coleridge was at first strongly under Hartley's influence, but later rejected it, asserting that the human personality was active in its growth, not passive as Hartley's theory implied. > Wordsworth, however, based much of his feeling for ⊳ nature's creative influence on human personality on Hartley.

Hartley, L. P. (Leslie Poles) (1895-1972) Novelist. His novels and stories are: Night Fears (1924); Simonetta Perkins (1925); The Killing Bottle (1932); a trilogy - The Shrimp and the Anemone (1944), The Sixth Heaven (1946) and Eustace and Hilda (1947); The Travelling Grave (1948); The Boat (1949); My Fellow Devils (1951); The Go-Between (1953); The White Wand (1954) A Perfect Woman (1955); The Hireling (1957); Facial Justice (1960); Two for the River (1961); The Brickfield (1964); The Betraval (1966); Poor Clare (1968); The Love Adept (1968); My Sister's Keeper (1970); The Harness Room (1971); The Collections (1972); The Will and the Way (1973). His reputation rests chiefly on the trilogy (especially The Shrimp and the Anemone) and The Go-Between. These both contain very sensitive child studies, and relate the influence of childhood experiences on the development of the adult. Hartley wrote in the tradition of ▷ Henry James, whom he resembles in his presentation of delicate but crucial personal inter-relationships; the influence of ▷ Sigmund Freud intervened to give Hartley a different kind of psychological depth, more concerned with the recovery of the self buried in the forgotten experiences of the past than with the self buried under the false assumptions of society.

Bib: Bien, P., Hartley; Mulkeen, A., Wild Thyme, Winter Lightning.

Hartman, Geoffrey (b 1929)

American critic. Following early essays on ➤ Wordsworth, Hopkins, Rilke, Valéry and André Malraux, Hartman produced one of the most cogent and incisive critical books on Wordsworth to date, Wordsworth's Poetry, (1787-1814) (1964). His writing at this stage was essentially located in new criticism, with an admixture of phenomenology. Hartman's openness to continental European influences in the areas of philosophy and literary theory, combined with his continued engagement with English Romantic poetry, led him into a key role in the establishment of the 'Yale School' of > deconstruction. His books include Beyond Formalism: Literary Essays, 1958-70 (1970). The Fate of Reading and other Essays (1975), Criticism in the Wilderness (1980), Saving the Text; Literature, Derrida, Philosophy (1981) and Easy Pieces (1985).

Harvey, Gabriel (?1545-1630)

Man of letters and scholar; friend of ▷ Edmund Spenser, who presents Harvey as Hobbinol in ▷ The Shepherd's Calendar. Harvey argued vigorously for substituting Latin quantitative metres (based on length of syllables) for the English accentual rhythms which rely on accent. Otherwise he is chiefly known for his violent quarrels (especially with ▷ Thomas Nashe and ▷ Robert Greene), which caused his name to figure prominently in the ▷ pamphlets of the time. Bib: Stern, V. F., Gabriel Harvey: His Life, Marginalia and Library.

Harvey, Jane (1776-c 1841)

Poet and novelist. A northern writer, Harvey was born in Newcastle-upon-Tyne and often included sentimental descriptions of her home town and its impoverished inhabitants in her works, as for example in Poems on Various Subjects (1797), written in > Spenserian stanzas, and in the late Fugitive Pieces (1841). Otherwise, Harvey is mainly known as a > Minerva novelist, whose skill lies in ingenious plots and amusing characterizations.

Harvey, William (1578–1657) Physician and medical writer. Born in Folkestone and educated at Cambridge and Padua, he was admitted into the College of Physicians in 1604 and began practising at St Bartholomew's Hospital in 1609. He was Charles I's physician. His most famous work is De Mortu Cordis (1628) and presents an original treatise on the circulation of the blood.

Hastings, Michael (b 1938)

Dramatist. Hastings began his theatrical career as a trainee actor and writer at the ▶ Royal Court. Born in London, his first play, Don't Destroy Me (1956), an exploration of a Jewish household in Brixton, was produced when he was only eighteen and working as a tailor's apprentice. Lee Harvey Osmald (1966), produced at the Hampstead Theatre Club, is an example of what was known at the time as 'Theatre of Fact', a sort of documentary account of Oswald's life up to the point of Kennedy's assasination. Gloo Joo, a study of a West Indian's experience of London, was produced at the Hampstead Theatre Club and then went on to transfer to the West End.

Probably Hastings' most successful play, Tom and Viv (1984) pursues his concernwith the theatrical possibilities of biography in a study of the fraught marriage between

T. S. Eliot and his first wife, Vivienne Haigh-Wood. Vivienne ended her life in a mental hospital, and the play explores her mental fragility, her tortuous relationship with Eliot, and the contemporary British upper-class culture which produced Vivienne. The play is ultimately quite unsympathetic to Eliot and his role in their relationship. Tom and Viv was produced in America after a successful Royal Court run under the auspices of Joe Papp, and has been successfully filmed.

Hatton, Ann (1764-1838)

Novelist. Ann Hatton (née Kemble) was the sister of the acclaimed actress ➤ Sarah Siddons, but lacking her sister's looks and build - Ann had a squint and a limp - she was apprenticed to a mantua maker by her family. Bad luck or ill-judgement seemed to dog Ann: her first husband proved to be a bigamist, she was accidentally shot in the face while in a bath house (probably one of illrepute), and she chose to stage a suicide attempt in Westminster Abbey. However, in 1792 she married William Hatton and they began a new, and more successful, life in America, where she wrote several popular librettos. By 1806 she was once more in Britain and, having been widowed, began to write ➤ Minerva novels to make a living. Hatton took every ingredient of the > Gothic novel and reproduced it in faithful stereotype; she was, as a result, one of the most popular novelists on the Minerva lists. An early work, Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects (1783), shows that her style was both sentimental and Gothic, but also reveal a youthful promise that was never to be fulfilled.

Hatton, Sir Christopher (1540-91) Courtier. One of the many apocryphal stories about ➤ Elizabeth I concerns Sir Christopher Hatton; who, it is said, attained the queen's favour because she thought him an accomplished dancer. Certainly he promoted himself as ➤ Leicester's rival for the queen's affections and was to remain an ever-hopeful bachelor until his death. This role ensured him political preferment and several public posts: he was made a Gentleman Pensioner in 1564, became Lord Chancellor in 1587, and accepted the post of Chancellor of Oxford University in 1588. He was also given Ely Place in London, now the site of Hatton Garden. Like most of Elizabeth's favourites, Hatton was also interested in the arts; he was the patron of > Spenser and ➤ Churchyard, and wrote Act IV of Trancred and Gismund (c 1567), a tragic play based on a story by > Boccaccio. Bib: Williams, N., All the Queen's Men.

or williams, i.i., i.i. Energy inch

Hauptmann, Gerhart (1862–1946)
German dramatist and exponent of a 'naturalistic' style of writing in early plays like The Weavers (1892), a play based on factual events relating to social struggle and revolt in the Silesian weaving industry. Much of the play is written in the Silesian dialect. The Thieves' Comedy (1904) was shown by ▷ Harley Granville Barker as part of his Court Theatre repertory.
Bib: Sinden, M., Gerhart Hauptmann: The Prose Plays.

Havelok

A Middle English verse romance, composed towards the end of the 13th century. Two 12th century ➤ Anglo-Norman versions are extant: one in Geoffrei Gaimar's Estoire des Engleis; the other, the Lai d'Havelok, claims descent from a tale told by the Britons (> Breton Lays). The romance tells the story of Havelok, the dispossessed heir to the Danish throne, and of Goldborough, the dispossessed heir to her father's kingdom of England. Both suffer as children from the oppression of their respective guardians who have ambitions to establish their own royal dynasties. Havelok manages to escape from the murderous designs of his guardian, Goddard, through the help of Grim the fisherman. Havelok flees Denmark with Grim and his family, and lives with them in England at the place known as Grimsby. Havelok's marriage to Goldborough is arranged by her guardian, Godrich, as a social slight to the heir to the English throne. However, through the agency of a miraculous light which shines from Havelok's mouth, and the intervention of a divine voice, Goldborough learns that her husband is not a mere kitchen boy, but of royal descent. The narrative goes on to relate how Havelok recovers his heritage and that of Goldborough too.

Bib: Barron, W. R. J., English Medieval Romance.

Hawkins, Laetitia-Matilda (1759-1835) Novelist, autobiographer and travel writer. Hawkins' early years shadowed her creative output for most of her life. Her father was the > Augustan scholar John Hawkins, who produced one of the first histories of music as well as a life of Dr Johnson (1709-84). Johnson, who appointed Hawkins as his executor, found him difficult, and this is certainly the experience of his daughter who felt that her spirit had been broken by his incessant condemnation and criticism. Her first works were published anonymously, but she used her own name for The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline (1811) which was dedicated to > Harriet Bowdler. The narratives of her fictions often depict a repressed and self-deprecating heroine, who battles to assert herself over her male relatives. She produced a somewhat amorphous > autobiography with general comments, Anecdotes, Biographical Sketches and memoirs (1823), which was mocked by De Quincey. Her novels, however, were admired by ▷ Jane Austen. Her ⊳ travel writings remain in manuscript form.

Bib: Todd, J., Dictionary of British Women Writers.

Hayley, William (1745-1820)

Poet and biographer. Hayley was a popular poet, but was generally dismissed by other writers of the period, including ▷ Byron and ▷ Southey. He was befriended by ▷ Blake, however, who illustrated two of his works, Little Tom the Sailor (1800) and Ballads Founded on Anecdotes Relating to Animals (1805). Hayley also published the lives of several literary figures including ▷ Cowper and ▷ Milton.

▶ Ballad.

Haymarket Theatres

The first major theatre in the Haymarket was built in 1705 according to a design by the dramatist and architect ≥ John Vanbrugh and immediately occupied by ≥ Thomas Betterton and his company. Until Queen ≥ Anne's death in 1714 it was known as Her Majesty's Theatre or the Queen's Theatre, and then the King's Theatre, or simply the Haymarket. However, the theatre suffered financial problems since it proved too large for spoken drama, and in due course became the first English ≥ opera house, staging many of ≥ Handel's operas. After three theatres were destroyed on that site the present theatre, known as Her Majesty's, was built by Beerbohm Tree (1853–1917) in 1897.

In 1720 another theatre was erected in the Haymarket, which was known variously as the

New Theatre, Little Theatre, Little Haymarket, Little Theatre in the Hay or alternatively, the French Theatre in the Haymarket, because of its frequent use by French as well as Italian performers. Eventually, confusingly, it too became known just as the Haymarket. It stood until 1820 when the present Theatre Royal, Haymarket, was erected nearby.

A third theatre in the area was in a converted tennis court built in nearby James Street in 1634. The name Haymarket derives from an actual hay market which existed from 1664 to 1830.

Hays, Mary (1760-1843)

Radical writer. Hays was born into a family of Rational Dissenters and her early writings are concerned with religious matters; for example, in Cursory Remarks (1791) she attacks the prejudices of the established church. Then, in 1792 she met ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft and the main thrust of her writing became feminist (➤ Feminism). For example, in Appeal to the Men of Great Britain in Behalf of Women (1798; published anonymously), she wrote:

But for a woman to be obliged to humour the follies, the caprice, the vices of men of a very different stamp, and to be obliged to consider this as their duty; is perhaps as unfortunate a system of politics in morals, as ever was introduced for degrading the human species.

Hays also wrote advocating vocational training for women and demanding the right to independent economic means, and she attempted to redress the pro-male balance of historical evidence by writing Female Biography (1803) and Memoirs of Queens (1821). While respected in this capacity, Hays' fictional work was ridiculed by her contemporaries, for example by ▷ Coleridge and ▷ Elizabeth Hamilton, mainly because her novels are unrepentantly ▷ autobiographical. Memoirs of Emma Courtney (1796) is a particularly honest and sometimes disconcertingly personal account of a woman who fails to win the love of the man she desires (in real life, William Frend).

> Histories and Chronicles.

Bib: Moers, E., Literary Women; Todd, J., The Sign of Angelica.

Hayward, Sir John (?1564-1627)

Historian. Hayward was the author of several learned histories: Lives of the III Normans, Kings of England (1613), Life and Raigne of Edward the Sixt (1630), The Beginning of the Reign of Elizabeth (1636), and The First Part of the Life and Raigne of King Henrie IIII (1599), and it is for this last work that he is best known today. The history of Henry III contained a eulogistic dedication in Latin to the ▷ Earl of Essex, which severely angered ▷ Elizabeth I as it appeared to criticize her own rule, and Hayward was subsequently imprisoned.

> Harsnett, Samuel.

Haywood, Eliza (?1693-1756)

Haywood's literary career spanned some 30 years, from the publication of Love in Excess or The Fatal Enquiry (1719) to Jemmy and Jenny Jessamy (1753). Haywood was a prolific and highly successful writer: works known to be by her amount to almost 100 and she may also have published anonymously.

→ Delarivière Manley and → Aphra Behn, Haywood's literary reputation has been obscured by the notoriety of her personal life. ➤ Alexander Pope satirized her in > The Dunciad, as a 'Juno of majestic size. With cow-like udders, and with ox-like eyes', her sexual favours offered as the prize in a urinating contest. Yet Pope's vituperative attack, which has been regarded as evidence of misogyny, should be read in the context of the satire on literary > hacks; the rival contestants Curll and Chetwood are no less damningly portraved.

Haywood's novels were widely acclaimed, bringing her something of the status of a 'bestseller'. Their great diversity in tone and scope reflects a period of considerable change in novelistic fashions: the earliest works use > romantic names, while the later employ 'character' types such as Trueworth, Saving and Gaylord, and there is an increasing emphasis on the female experience and the heroine as central character.

Haywood was also a prolific journalist, founding, amongst other periodicals, > The Female Spectator, a women's equivalent to the periodicals of ▷ Addison and ▷ Steele. The articles generally deal with issues of social conduct and moral behaviour, and show an advanced attitude to sexual politics. Haywood also had a brief theatrical career in both writing and acting; her play, A Wife to Be Let (1724), was staged at Drury Lane with the author herself as a leading actress, and in the 1730s her frequent stage appearances included roles in > Arden of Faversham and The Opera of Operas (1733), her own operatic version of > Tom Thumb.

Hazlewood, Colin Henry (1823-75) A comedian on the Lincoln, York and western circuits, Hazlewood began his career as a dramatist in 1850 with a successful farce. He is chiefly remembered for his successful dramatization of ▷ M.E. Braddon's ▷ sensation novel > Lady Audley's Secret in 1863. Bib: Wolff, R.L., Sensational Victorian: The Life and Fiction of M.E. Braddon.

Hazlitt, William (1778-1830) Essayist and critic. He was the son of a ➤ Unitarian minister with strong radical views, and himself took the liberal side in politics throughout his life; though he wrote for many papers and periodicals, he is most associated with John and ▷ Leigh Hunt's radical weekly, > The Examiner. He was the early admirer and friend of ▷ Coleridge and ▷ Wordsworth (see one of his best essays, My First Acquaintance with Poets; 1823), and though he later resented what he considered their betrayal of the liberal cause, he continued to admire especially Wordsworth's early poetry for its integrity and disinterestedness, qualities which he exemplified in his own life. However, he did not share the simplifying, materialistic outlook of many of the radicals eg the > Utilitarians; his best work, The Spirit of the Age (1825) - studies of the leading minds of the time, including ▶ Bentham and Wordsworth – shows his feeling that rational theorists like the former were really remoter from reality, though they claimed to base all their thought on experience, than were the poets who gave form to their experience directly. This regard for whole truth shows in his most perceptive criticism, especially of ➤ Shakespeare (Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, 1817-18). Other critical works: Lectures on the English Poets (1818-19); English Comic Writers (1819); Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth (1820); Table Talk, or Original Essays on Men and Manners (1821-2).

Though nowadays best known for his criticism, Hazlitt has always had a larger public for his miscellaneous essays, such as On Going a Journey, Going to a Fight, etc. His graphic, terse, energetic style often gives this part of his work strong character.

➤ Essay.

Bib: Howe, P. P., Life; Baker, H., Life; Schneider, E., The Aesthetics of Hazlitt; Brinton, C., The Political Ideas of the English Romantics; Stephen, L., in Hours in a Library; Saintsbury, G., in Essays in English Literature.

H. D. (Hilda Doolittle) (1886-1961) Poet. H. D. was born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, educated at Bryn Mawr, where she was a contemporary of American poet Marianne Moore, and moved to Britain in 1911. She was an important figure in the > Imagist group, signing her first poems, published in Harriet Monroe's Poetry in 1913, 'H. D. Imagiste'. She was a close associate of ▷ Ezra Pound, to whom she was briefly engaged in 1907. The 'Hellenic hardness' of her work epitomized Imagism. She married fellow writer Richard Aldington in 1913, becoming part of the network sometimes known as the 'Other > Bloomsbury' which was dominated by D. H. Lawrence, who is characterized in H. D.'s novel Bid Me To Live (published 1960). From 1916 she coedited, with > T. S. Eliot, The Egoist, Dora Marsden's originally ▶ feminist journal which had published amongst other texts ▷ James Joyce's > Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man in serial form in 1914-15. In 1917 H. D. separated from Aldington, gave birth to her daughter Perdita, and began to travel with her friend > Bryher, with whom she spent much of the rest of her life. Her first collection, Sea Garden, was published in 1916, followed by Hymen (1921), Heliodora and Other Poems (1924), and Red Roses for Bronze (1929). The trilogy, The Walls Do Not Fall (1944-6) and Helen in Egypt (1961), perhaps H. D.'s most important works, have only recently received the critical attention they deserve. Her poetry is intense, difficult, and infused with her passion for classical Greek culture. Although primarily known as a poet, H. D. wrote novels, and having undergone psychoanalysis with ▶ Freud in Vienna 1933-4, published an account of the process. Tribute to Freud is important both as a poetic and visionary text and as a key text in debates about psychoanalysis and feminism. Bib: Duplessis, R. B., H. D. The Career of That Struggle; Buck, C., H. D. and Freud: Bisexuality and a Feminine Discourse.

Head, Bessie Emery (1937-86)

African novelist and short-story writer. Born in South Africa in a mental hospital, where her Scottish mother had been confined as a result of her relationship with her Zulu father, she was brought up by a foster family until the age of thirteen, then attended a mission school in Durban and trained as a teacher. She taught in South Africa, worked as a journalist for Drum magazine and became involved in African nationalist circles, but in 1963 went into exile in Botswana, where she worked, with other political refugees, in a village garden co-operative at Serowe, commemorated in her book Serowe: Village of the Rain Wind (1981), which is built around interviews. She took Botswanan citizenship in 1979. Her first three novels contain a considerable element of autobiography, most notably A Question of Power (1974), which is based directly on her own experience of mental breakdown, but also When Rain Clouds Gather (1969), about a Botswana agrarian community, and Maru (1971), which deals with racial prejudice through the story of an orphaned Masarwa woman, teaching in a Botswanan village where her people are regarded as outcasts. The Collector of Treasures and Other Botswana Village Tales (1977) is a volume of short stories, while A Bewitched Crossroad: An African Saga (1984) is a history of the Bamangwato tribe. Tales of Tenderness and Power, published posthumously in 1989, is a collection of stories, personal observations and legends, while A Woman Alone, published posthumously in 1990, consists of autobiographical fragments.

Bib: Vigne, R., (ed.), A Gesture of Belonging: Letters from Bessie Head 1965-1979; MacKenzie, C., Bessie Head: An Introduction; MacKenzie, C., and Clayton, C., Between the Lines: Interviews with Bessie Head; Abrahams, C., Bessie Head and Literature in South Africa.

Headlong Hall (1816)

A novel by > Thomas Love Peacock. It is his first and shows the main characteristics of his maturer work: witty, burlesque conversations and, innovatively, very little plot. The narrative is interspersed with attractive lyrics and songs. As in his other novels, the characters are caricatures of contemporary types.

Heaney, Seamus Justin (b 1939)

Poet. His early nature poetry, drawing on his upbringing as a farmer's son, is found in Death of a Naturalist (1966) and Door into the Dark (1969), and shows the influence of > Ted Hughes. The political situation in Northern Ireland begins to be explored in North (1975) and Field Work (1979), from the standpoint of Heaney's ➤ Catholic background. The strongly individualistic, meditative and solitary vein that marks the distance between his own outlook and that of sectarianism continues to be apparent in subsequent collections: Station Island (1984), The Haw Lantern (1987), and Seeing Things (1991). Other recent publications include: New Selected Poems 1966-87 (1990); The Cure at Trov (1990); and Seeing Things (1991).

Irish literature in English. Bib: Morrison, B., Seamus Heaney; Curtis, T. (ed.), The Art of Seamus Heaney; Corcoran, N., Seamus Heaney.

Heart of Darkness (1902)

A ⊳ novella by ⊳ Joseph Conrad. It is narrated by Marlow, an officer in the Merchant Navy who also appears in Conrad's other works ➤ Lord 7im, Youth and Chance. Sitting on board a ship anchored in the lower reaches of the River Thames, he tells a group of friends the story of his journey up the Congo River in Africa, in the employment of a Belgian trading company. This supposedly benevolent organization is in fact ruthlessly enslaving the Africans and stripping the area of ivory, and what Marlow sees on his arrival in Africa disgusts him. At the company's Central Station he hears much about Kurtz, their most successful agent, who is apparently lying ill at the Inner Station upriver. Marlow's attempts to set out to reach him are delayed by the machinations of the manager and other agents, who are jealous of Kurtz's success. When the steamer which Marlow is to captain is finally repaired, and the party sets off, Marlow experiences a powerful sense of dread as the boat carries them deeper into the jungle, but this is combined with a strong desire to meet Kurtz. After being attacked by natives from the bank, they reach the Inner Station, where an eccentric young Russian adventurer who idolizes Kurtz tells Marlow of his power over the local inhabitants, and the fluency and fascination of his ideas. But Kurtz's hut is surrounded by heads on poles, and it becomes apparent that, in addition to writing a report on the 'Suppression of Savage Customs', ending with the words 'exterminate all the brutes!', he has become compulsively addicted to unspecified barbaric practices, presumably involving human sacrifice. He has also acquired an African mistress. Marlow tries to get Kurtz away down river, but he dies, his last words being 'The horror! The horror!'. Back in Europe, Marlow tells Kurtz's fiancée that he died with her name on his lips.

The story has come to be regarded as a classic of 20th-century literature, and its ambiguity has made it the subject of numerous interpretations. It has also been critized by some, notably by the Nigerian novelist > Chinua Achebe, for containing racist assumptions.

Heart of Midlothian, The (1818)

A novel by > Sir Walter Scott. Midlothian is a county in Scotland in which Edinburgh, the Scottish capital, is situated. The title refers to the old Tolbooth prison in Edinburgh, so nicknamed. The central part of the story is Jeanie Deans' journey on foot to London in order to appeal to the Duke of Argyle - a Scottish nobleman high in royal favour - on behalf of her sister Effie who has been wrongfully charged with child murder. Argyle was a historical character, and the events are linked up with the attack on the Tolbooth - known as the Porteous Riot - which actually took place in 1736. As in other novels by Scott about 18th-century Scotland, the characterization is vigorous, eg of Madge Wildfire who has abducted the child whom Effie is supposed to have murdered, and Dumbiedikes, the silent suitor of Jeanie. It is often regarded as the best of Scott's novels.

Heath, Roy (b 1926)

Novelist. Heath was born in Guyana, and educated at the University of London. He worked as a clerk and then as a primary school teacher in London before being called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1964; since 1968 he has taught French and German in London. His novels combine realism and mythic patterns to portray Guyanese life in the 20th century, focusing in particular on stories of personal struggle and tragic family relations among the poor and lower middle class of Georgtown. For example his Georgetown Trilogy, comprising From the Heat of the Day (1979), One Generation (1981) and Genetha (1981), chronicles the life of a single family. His other novels are: A Man Came Home (1974); The Murderer (1978); Kwaku: or the Man Who Could Not Keep His Mouth Shut (1982); Orealla (1984); The Shadow Bride (1988). He has also published short stories, a play and an autobiographical work, Shadow Round the Moon: Caribbean Memoirs (1990).

Heavenly Twins, The (1893)

A novel by > Sarah Grand. The first half of this immensely successful book describes the lives of two twins, Angelica and Diavolo. As children they are both irrepressible, energetic and daring, but as they grow older they are forced to take different paths. Diavolo is given a good ⊳ education and finally leaves home for an army career, while Angelica follows a conventionally female path and becomes trapped in domestic routine. The second half of the book concentrates on two women, Edith and Evadne. Religious and naive, Edith unknowingly marries a syphilitic naval officer, and both she and her child contract the disease. After a period of mental degeneration, Edith dies. Evadne, who has studied anatomy, physiology and pathology, refuses to consummate her marriage after discovering that her husband has had a previous affair, and lives a sexless life. She is frustrated as a result and has a mental breakdown, but she recovers from this after the death of her husband and marries again. Like Grand's The Beth Book, the novel explicitly addresses sexual/political issues. The lives of the twins reflect the inequality of educational opportunity, while Edith and Evadne represent the 'old' and > 'New Woman' respectively. Despite Evadne's learning, however, she becomes trapped in a life of repression after promising her husband that she will not become active in the > women's movement.

Heber, Reginald (1783-1826)

Poet and religious writer. Heber's most famous works are probably the hymns 'Hark the Herald Angels Sing' and 'Holy, Holy, Holy' (Hymns, Written and Adapted to the Weekly Church Service, 1827), although he published several more extensive works including, Poems and Translations (1812) and The Lay of the Purple Falcon: a metrical romance (1847). In 1822 he was appointed Bishop of Calcutta, a role which inspired him to write Narrative of a Journey through India (1828).

▶ Hymns; Lay. Bib: Smith, G., Bishop Heber: Poet and Missionary.

Hedda Gabler (1890)

A play by Norwegian dramatist ➤ Henrik Ibsen which marks his development away from an expressly social and moralist mode of drama and towards a more psychological and symbolic style. The play questions the conventional ideology of womanhood through the portrayal of its central character − Hedda − who finds her potential for effective activity limited and instead is forced to exercise an emotional power over those who enter her orbit.

Hegemony

Originally used to denote political domination. In its more modern meaning and its use in literary criticism it has come to refer to that process of political control whereby the interests of a dominant class in society are shared by those subordinated to it. Hegemony depends upon the consent of subordinate classes to their social positions, but the constraints within which that consent operates, and the ways in which it is experienced, are determined by the dominant class. This concept also offers ways of understanding the different kinds of social and personal relationships represented in literary texts. Along with a number of other concepts, it opens the way for an analysis of the different forms of negotiation that take place within texts, and between text and reader, and serves to emphasize the social context of experience, > consciousness and human interaction.

Heir of Redclyffe, The (1853)

A novel by ▷ Charlotte Yonge, informed by the religious principles of the ▷ Oxford Movement and much admired by prominent literary figures of the day such as ▷ Tennyson, ▷ D. G. Rossetti and ▷ William Morris. The novel contrasts genuine and superficial goodness of character through the story of two cousins, Guy and Philip Morville. Guy appears brash, but is deeply generous and ultimately self-sacrificing, whereas Philip is greatly admired but undeserving of accolades. Philip's machinations almost succeed in thwarting Guy's marriage. Guy later nurses Philip through a fever, catches it himself and dies. Philip repents of his sins and inherits the ancient house of Redclyffe.

Hemans, Felicia Dorothea (née Browne) (1793-1835)

Poet. After being deserted by her army captain husband in 1818, Felicia Hemans turned to writing to support her family, living first in Wales and then in Dublin. She published many volumes of verse, including Translations from Camoens and other Poems (1818), Welsh Melodies (1822), Records of Women (1828) and Hymns on the Works of Nature (1833). Her combination of liberalism and piety made her very popular. Her best remembered poems today are Casabianca ('The boy stood on the burning deck') and The Homes of England ('The stately Homes of England, / How beautiful they stand!'). Bib: Hicock, K., Representations of Women: Nineteenth-century British Women's Poetry; Trinder, P. W., Mrs Hemans.

Heming, John (d 1630) and Condell, Henry (d 1627)
Acting colleagues of ⊳ Shakespeare and editors of the first edition of his collected plays, known as the First Folio, 1623.

Hendecasyllabic

A metrical term meaning a line of verse having 11 syllables; decasyllabic = 10 syllables.

Henrietta Maria, Queen (1609-99) Patron and dramatist. ➤ Charles I's queen had a significant impact upon the culture of the > Stuart court. As a French princess she had had the benefit of experiencing the greater freedom allowed women in France. For example, they were able to write private plays and ➤ masques, as well as to perform in them. As a British queen she encouraged the arts and was an ardent supporter of drama, but created a scandal when she attempted to compose her own plays and act on stage, albeit only within the confines of the court. It was probably the performances of the queen and her ladies-inwaiting in Walter Montague's The Shepherd's Paradise that caused William Prynne's attack against actresses in Histrio-mastix (1632). Henrietta Maria's Catholic upbringing also brought about censure from the increasingly Puritan country, and her influence on the court was seen to create a divide between the world of London nobility and the rest of the nation. Still, the religious air that invades the ▶ Platonic masgues of the > Caroline court imbue them with an ethereal and delicate quality lacking in the showy entertainments of ▷ James I's reign. Bib: Veevers, E., Images of Love and Religion.

Henry I (1100-35)

The third ➤ Norman king of England, fourth son of ➤ William I.

Henry II (1154-89)

King of England. Son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, Count of Anjou, and Matilda, daughter of Henry I. Henry II was thus the first king of the House of Anjou or > Plantagenet. By inheritance and marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine he acquired all western France from Normandy to the Spanish border. In England, he was an extremely efficient ruler, especially in organization of the law courts, but this brought him into his famous conflict with ➤ Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury. His relationship with his wife was largely hostile and later romancers made much of his love affair with ▶ Fair Rosamund Rosamund Clifford - eg > Samuel Daniel in his Complaint of Rosamond. During his reign the native rulers of Ireland began to be displaced by Anglo-Norman noble families, authorized by the fact that the Pope, Adrian IV, who was English, had granted Henry power over the whole of Ireland.

Henry III (1216-72)

King of England, fourth of the > Plantagenet line. His reign was much disturbed by internal conflict, especially the rebellion led by Simon de Montfort, who first secured the representation of the towns and the smaller landowners in the Great Council of the kingdom, from which > Parliament has developed.

Henry IV (1399-1413)

King of England. He was called ▷ Bolingbroke from the name of his birthplace. His father, > John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was a vounger son of ⊳ Edward III; his cousin > Richard II exiled Henry and confiscated his estates, in retaliation for which Henry succeeded in raising a rebellion and seizing the throne. Richard died mysteriously in prison. Henry thus became first of the three kings of the House of > Lancaster, really a junior branch of the > Plantagenet line. His reign was the subject of two plays by > Shakespeare, > Henry IV, Parts I and II.

Henry IV, Part I

A > history play by > Shakespeare, performed about 1597 and printed in a > quarto edition, 1598. The central character is Prince Hal, the king's son and later > Henry V. The king is grieved first by the opposition of some of his nobels led by the Percy family, notably Henry (Harry) Hotspur, son of the Earl of Northumberland, and secondly by the dissolute conduct of his own son, who wastes his life in taverns instead of emulating Hotspur in a career of military honour. Hal's tavern companion is > Sir John Falstaff, one of the greatest of Shakespeare's comic characters. The contrast between Hotspur and Falstaff is the prominent feature of the play: Hotspur lives only for honour, without relating it to social responsibility; Falstaff, only for pleasure, in equal indifference to social consequences. Hotspur is thus passionate but inhuman, and Falstaff all too human in his passions. At the end of the play, Hal kills Hotspur at the battle of Shrewsbury, but Falstaff manages to steal the credit for Hotspur's death. The play is close to the morality tradition in its feeling and structure, Hotspur and Falstaff standing for 'honour' and 'riot' respectively; both in their different ways are rebels, the first in political terms against the state, and the second in spiritual terms against reason. Shakespeare's main sources were the chronicles of > Hall and > Holinshed.

> Henry IV, Part II.

Henry IV, Part II

➤ Quarto edition 1600. A continuation of > Shakespeare's Henry IV, Part I, though independent in mood and dramatic structure. The Percy rebellion continues, though Hotspur is dead. A sick weariness is over the country, and the king is dying. Hal is still the central character, and again flanked by contrasting types: on the one side Falstaff, pleasure-loving still but now ageing and grasping for the power he expects when Hal becomes King Henry V; on the other side, the scrupulous and fearless Lord Chief Justice, who has faced his responsibilities so far as to send the Prince himself to prison for riot. However, when Hal becomes king at the end of the play, he unexpectedly upholds the Lord Chief Justice and dismisses Falstaff from favour. Again, the morality drama tradition is a strong influence: the just king upholds the principle of justice, and sets his face against riot and self-indulgence. Some of the best scenes are still comedy, though the mood of Part II is grimmer than that of Part I; the comedy is chiefly in Mistress Quickly's Boar's Head Tavern in London, and on the country estate of Justice Shallow. Shakespeare's sources were again the 16th-century chronicles of > Hall and ➤ Holinshed.

→ History plays;
→ Henry IV, Part I.

Henry V

A ➤ history play by ➤ Shakespeare performed in 1500; an imperfect version printed in 1600. It records the battle of Agincourt, Henry's great victory in France; this is the triumphal conclusion to the series that had so far dramatized national disaster: ▷ Richard II, ▷ Henry IV, Parts I and II. This play has been censured as too much a patriotic pageant with too little genuine dramatic interest. However, there is drama in the spectacle of a small national army, united in moral purpose under a Christian king, confronting a rich and massive array of selfishly disunited nobility. The disintegrative elements on the English side are still present in the traitors Scroop and Grey, and in > Falstaff's former cronies, Pistol, Bardolph and Nym. The union of the British Isles is forecast by the presence not only of the prominent Welsh officer, > Fluellen, but of Irish and Scottish officers as well, though Scotland was in fact an ally of France at the time. The play is indeed primarily a patriotic drama, but it is by no means an uncritical one. There is, for instance, the obvious element of conflict in Henry between his dual aspects as king and man, evident especially in his dialogue with Williams and his soliloquy in IV.i; modern critics (eg Traversi, Approach to Shakespeare) find many examples of irony at the expense of Henry in the play. It is interesting to note that Henry V has been filmed twice, each time with the director taking the eponymous lead: by Laurence Olivier (1907-89) in 1944, and by Kenneth Branagh in 1989.

Henry V (1413-22)

King of England, and second of the House of > Lancaster. His brief reign is memorable for his brilliant victory over the French at > Agincourt. By the Treaty of Troyes (1420) he was recognized as heir to the throne of France, his claim to which had been the cause of the war. His dissolute youth (➤ Shakespeare's ➤ Henry IV) was a popular legend but is probably unfounded, though he was on bad terms with his father. He modelled himself on ➤ King Arthur, the heroes of the ➤ Crusades and the ideal of the Christian monarchy (the French war, in English eyes, was a just one) and in English tradition he became a national hero.

> Hundred Years' War.

Henry VI (1422-61)

King of England, and last of the House of ➤ Lancaster. He was strongly religious but no man of action, and his reign was darkened by the ➤ Wars of the Roses and by the final defeat of England in the ➤ Hundred Years' War.

Henry VI, Parts I, II and III Three very early ⊳ history plays by > Shakespeare, perhaps written between 1590 and 1592. Parts II and III were published in 1594-5 under different titles, but Part I not until 1623; it was possibly written, or revised, after the other two. Together they make the first three parts of a tetralogy, ending with > Richard III, in which the spreading feuds, hatreds, crimes and vengeances finally concentrate all their force in the wickedness of one man. Part I: the defeat of the English in the Hundred Years' War, and the beginning of aristocratic feuds; Part II: the marriage of Henry to the vigorous Margaret of Anjou, Jack Cade's popular rebellion, and the opening of the civil Wars of the Roses; Part III: Henry's final defeat and murder at the hands of the York branch of the Plantagenets, Edward Early of March (Edward IV, 1461-83) and his brother Richard of Gloucester (Richard III, 1483-5). The Henry VI plays have vivid and poignant episodes but are inferior to the masterly Richard III. The 16th-century chroniclers ➤ Hall and ➤ Holinshed are the sources of the plays.

Henry VII (1485-1509)

King of England. He was the first of the House of ➤ Tudor, of Welsh origin and related to the House of Lancaster; he defeated ➤ Richard III, last of the House of York, at the battle of Bosworth (1485), with a mainly Welsh army. Henry connected his Welsh background with ➤ King Arthur, and gave this name to his eldest son (d 1502). He was a notably able ruler, and was later paralleled with ➤ Henry V as a restorer of national unity and order after civil war. At the end of ➤ Shakespeare's ➤ Richard III he makes an appearance as a national redeemer. ➤ Francis Bacon wrote a life of him (1622). Bib: Chrimes, S. B., Henry VII.

Henry VIII

A ▷ history play written (probably) by ▷ John Fletcher and ▷ Shakespeare in 1612–13. Its main episodes concern the divorce of Katharine of Aragon, the downfall of ▷ Cardinal Wolsey, and the triumph of ▷ Thomas Cranmer. The play ends with the triumphal christening of Henry's daughter, ▷ Princess Elizabeth, the future queen. In 1613 a performance of the play at the ▷ Globe Theatre caused the destruction of the building by fire.

Henry VIII (1509-47)

King of England. He was a powerful and talented man, entitled Defender of the Faith by the Pope for his ▷ pamphlet against ▷ Martin Luther, but he replaced Papal authority with his own by the Act of Supremacy, 1534, an act important for the subsequent development of national identity and sovereign independence. He is notorious for having had six wives, two of whom he executed and two divorced. His personal power was great but he generally exerted it through Parliament.

➤ Tudor, House of; Parr, Katherine. Bib: Smith, H. M., Henry VIII and the Reformation.

Henry, Prince of Wales (1594-1612) Patron. The brief, but enormously influential, period in which Henry governed his own household and cultivated his own cultural and political circles was seen by the > Jacobean court as a rebirth of the ➤ Elizabethan golden age. The disillusionment that developed after the immediate glow of > James I's coronation had faded, began to focus upon his son as a possible source of integrity, honour, cultural development and staunch ➤ Protestantism. Although the burden of expectation must have been great, Henry appeared to answer these demands. His early death (probably the earliest recorded case of typhoid) make it impossible to say how far he would have continued to extend his popularity, for it is easier to maintain an idealized value system from the margins of power than from the centralized role that kingship would have necessitated. Nevertheless, Henry cultivated those courtiers and writers who had been popular in Elizabeth's day, such as the ➤ Earl of Southampton and ➤ Michael Drayton. He is also known for his participation in two of > Jonson's > masques, Prince Henry's Barriers (1610) and Prince Oberon (1611). Bib: Strong, R., Henry, Prince of Wales, and England's Lost Renaissance.

Henryson, Robert (c 1425-?1500) Scottish poet. Little is known about Henryson's life: it appears that he was a master at the Benedictine abbey grammar school in Dunfermline and was evidently a well-educated man with a university training. He composed a number of short poems, mostly on devotional themes, but is best known for his short narrative poetry including a collection of 13 animal fables (the Morall Fabilis of Esope), and his continuation of the story of Crisevde (> The Testament of Cresseid). His characteristic style favours abbreviation rather than amplification and he specializes in saying much in a brief space. His collection of animal fables, drawn from the tradition of > Aesop's fables and from the corpus of stories about Reynard the Fox, explores the variety of ways in which animals can be read and interpreted according to human schemes of knowledge. Henryson's interest in problems of interpretation and understanding is evident too in the sophisticated rereadings he offers of > Chaucer's > Nun's Priest's Tale (in his version of the fable of the Cock and the Fox and its sequel), and > Troilus and Criseyde (in his Testament).

➤ Reynard the Fox. Bib: Fox, D. (ed.), The Poems of Robert Henryson; Gray, D., Robert Henryson.

Henslowe, Phillip (d 1616)

Theatre owner and builder. The ➤ Rose, the Hope, and the Fortune Theatres were all at least partly owned by him, and although an efficient businessman, he was also compassionate. His son-in-law was the famous actor ➤ Edward Alleyn of the ➤ Admiral's Men, whose finances he looked after. His Diary, 1592–1609, is a main source for the theatrical history of the age, but is not in itself very informative.

➤ Theatres.
Bib: Carson, N., A Companion to Henslowe's Diary.

Her Majesty's Theatre

➤ Haymarket Theatres.

Heraclitus (6th century BC)

Greek philosopher. He taught that the primary element is fire and that all being is, despite appearances, the process of 'becoming', by the harmonious interaction of opposites (hot, cold; dark, light; good, evil; etc.) 'The law of things is a law of Reason universal; but most men behave as though they had a wisdom of their own.' His mysticism and his sombre view of human nature caused him to be designated 'the dark philosopher'. > Gerard Manley Hopkins' poem 'That Nature is a Heraclitean fire . . . ' is an interesting example of the 19th-century's attempt to found its beliefs in classical antecedents.

▶ Elements, The Four.

Herbert, Edward, 1st Baron Herbert of Cherbury (1583–1648)

Poet, philosopher and diplomat. Edward Herbert (Lord Herbert of Cherbury) was elder brother of George Herbert. A friend of John Donne,

Ben Jonson and

Thomas Carew, and an ardent Royalist before the Civil War, Herbert's

major works were his > autobiographical The Life of Lord Herbert Written by Himself (published by Horace Walpole in 1765); his philosophical De Veritate (1624) and his volume of poems Occasional Verses (1665).

The Life, written when Herbert was in his 60s, recalls his earlier adventures as a younger man, prior to his return from Paris in 1624, where he had been ambassador. The De Veritate, which was of considerable influence in the 17th century, attempts to explore rationalist positions in the general field of religious experience. Herbert's own religious position was that of an orthodox Anglican, of a strongly anti-Calvinist persuasion. He is seen to be the father of Deism and a forerunner of the Enlightenment.

Although his poetry was not published until 1665, the major portion of his verses was written before 1631. His poetic contemporaries thus included both his brother and Donne, of whose verses Herbert's poetry is strongly reminiscent.

➤ Calvin, John.

Bib: Herbert, C. A., 'The Platonic Love Poetry of Lord Herbert of Cherbury', Ball State University Forum II; Hill, E. D., Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury.

Herbert, George (1593–1633)
Poet. Herbert shares, with ▷ John Donne, the distinction of being one of the most widely read of the 17th-century poets in modern times. Though he was not ordained as a priest until 1630, and though court connections ensured that the earlier part of his life was spent in cosmopolitan circles, all the extant poems are devotional in nature.

His poetry was first published posthumously, in 1633, when The Temple: Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations appeared under the auspices of his friend Nicholas Ferrar shortly after Herbert's death. The collection met with enormous approval, and was a considerable influence on ▶ Richard Crashaw, amongst others. The poems in The Temple are deceptively simple at first glance. Yet in his exploitation of the speaking voice, and in the complexity of the complete structure of the volume of poems, Herbert rivals Donne for a fierce logical presence in his verse. Of considerable importance to Herbert's poetic undertaking is his espousal of a direct form of poetic discourse - one that, in many respects, looks forward to the reformist projects of later 17th-century theoreticians of language.

Herbert's other major work was the prose manual A Priest to the Temple (1652), which is a form of conduct-guide for the ideal Anglican priest. ➤ Izaac Walton published a Life of Herbert in 1651.

Bib: Hutchinson, F. E. (ed.), The Works of George Herbert; Vendler, H., The Poetry of Herbert; Summers, J. H., George Herbert: His Religion and Art; Strier, R., Love Known: Theology and Experience in George Herbert's Poetry.

Herbert, Sir Henry (1595-1673)

➤ Master of the Revels, 1623–42. He belonged to the literary Herbert family, which included his brothers > Edward Herbert, > George Herbert and Thomas Herbert, as well ➤ William Herbert in whose house, Wilton, Sir Henry met > King James I and was awarded the post of Master of the Revels. Initially he seems to have been the deputy of Sir John Astley (who had succeeded > Sir George Buc in 1622), but by 1623 Herbert was in full control. His influence was considerable as he was a conscientious reader of all plays and made careful excisions, for example, of all blasphemous language. He resumed his post on the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, but had lost much of his fortune during the ▷ Interregnum and never fully recovered either his wealth or his position. Bib: Adams, J. Q., The Dramatic Records of Sir Henry Herbert.

Herbert, James (b 1943)

Britain's best-selling > horror novelist, Herbert rose to notoriety in the 1970s as a purveyor of unabashed visceral gore set in grimy, modern urban surroundings. His first novel The Rats (1974) was a huge paperback hit, earning Herbert the title 'King of the Nasties'; described by the author as a metaphor for urban collapse in which 'the rats are the establishment', the novel set new standards of gruesome violence for popular horror fiction. Although subsequent works such as The Fog, Lair and Domain have continued this penchant for dismemberment, Herbert has also explored more subtle territory; Fluke (1977) is a satirical reincarnation fantasy notable for its restrained tone, while Shrine (1983) takes a bold swipe at organized religion and fraudulent 'miracles'. Having worked as an advertising art director before turning to writing, Herbert is unique in retaining total control of his book covers, which he designs himself. Works include: The Survivor (1976); The Spear (1978); The Dark (1980); The Jonah (1981); Domain (1984); Moon (1985); The Magic Cottage (1987).

Herbert, Mary

➤ Sidney, Mary

Herbert, William (1580–1630)
Poet, dramatist and courtier, William Herbert, third Earl of Pembroke is one of the candidates for 'W.H.', the young man to whom ➤ Shakespeare's ➤ sonnets are dedicated. The grounds for this identification, apart from the initials, are Herbert's noble rank, his status as a well-known patron and the fact that the First Folio is partly dedicated to him. If Herbert is identified as the young man, then Mary Fitton his mistress could be linked to the dark lady of Shakespeare's work. When Herbert came to the court of > Elizabeth I, he first attempted to join her coterie of favourites, but was too melancholy and scholarly for this somewhat chivalric group. He then fell out of favour completely when he got Fitton, a lady-inwaiting pregnant and refused to marry her; he was later to have two illegitimate children by > Lady Mary Wroth. Herbert was imprisoned in the Fleet and never really gained acceptance at court until the accession of ➤ James I. A supporter of > Ralegh, he had interests in colonial investments. Herbert also wrote > masques and poetry, which were published in 1660. He was one of the wealthiest men in England and became an increasingly significant political figure, helping to overthrow the Earl of Somerset (whom he replaced as Lord Chamberlain) and to promote another royal favourite, > Buckingham. Later, however, he was central to the resistance to Buckingham's influence over James and their pro-Spanish policies. He was a major patron of the arts and literature, and was praised particularly for this by ⊳ Ben Jonson.

Hereward the Wake (1865)

A > historical novel by > Charles Kingsley written after he became Regius Professor of History at Cambridge and based on the story of a half-legendary Anglo-Saxon hero who held out against William the Conqueror until 1070 in the town of Ely. The fame of Hereward depends a good deal on Kingsley's novel which is a colourful but inadequate story of battle, disguise and witchcraft.

Hermeneutics

Used in literary criticism to denote the science of interpretation as opposed to commentary. Hermeneutics is concerned primarily with the question of determining meaning, and is based upon the presupposition of a transcendental notion of understanding, and a conception of truth as being in some sense beyond language. Hermeneutics also postulates that there is one truth, and is therefore opposed on principle to the notion of 'pluralism' that is associated with by deconstruction and materialist readings.

Hero and Leander

A poem left unfinished by ➤ Christopher Marlowe and completed by ➤ George Chapman (1598). Hero was a priestess of Aphrodite, and lived at Sestos on the European shore of the Hellespont. A youth called Leander, who loved her and lived at Abydos on the opposite shore, used to swim across to her at night, until he was drowned in a storm. Marlowe's poem is one of the finest narrative poems of this period.

Herod the Great

King of Judaea under the Romans in the time of Christ. According to the ▷ Bible (Matthew 2), in order to eliminate the infant Christ, he ordered the slaughter of all the young children in the village of Bethlehem. This made him the villain of the medieval > Mystery plays dealing with the subject. In these, he is always shown as an arrogant, boisterous, bullying character. Hence Hamlet's phrase 'it out-herods Herod' (> Hamlet III.ii), referring to acting in a violent and exaggerated manner.

Hefodotus (5th century BC) Greek historian. His main theme is the wars of the Persians against the Greeks and other nations

Heroic drama

Type of play popular during the period after the Restoration in Britain, with central characters of exalted stature, such as kings, queens and military generals, and a florid style of verse, usually rhymed > couplets. The plays were modelled on French > classical tragedies, especially those of ⊳ Corneille and ⊳ Racine, and often featured themes of conflict between the forces of love and honour. However, they were less careful of the > classical unities than their French models. > D'Avenant's > The Siege of Rhodes was one of the earliest plays to display features of heroic drama, and his dedication to an edition of 1663 discusses 'héroique Plays'. Robert Howard's > The Indian Queen (1664) helped to establish the type in Britain, and ▷ Dryden became one of its chief exponents, with plays including The Indian Emperor (1665), The Conquest of Granada (1665) and ➤ Aureng-Zebe (1675). ➤ Buckingham's satire of heroic plays, ➤ The Rehearsal, played a large part in bringing the form into disrepute, although > Congreve's > The Mourning Bride still displays some heroic features.

Heroic, Mock

A literary mode in which large and important events are juxtaposed with small and insignificant ones for a variety of comic, satirical or more profoundly ironic effects. In its narrow sense mock heroic is the product of the Augustan, neo-classical age. As the bourgeoisie wrested cultural hegemony from the aristocracy in the late 17th century, a new, more complex attitude to the ancient aristocratic ideals of honour and nobility developed. A new irony infused their literary expression in the ▷ classical forms of ⊳ epic and ⊳ tragedy. Epic retained the respect of the reading public, but it was too archaic and primitive to satisfy the modern imagination in its traditional form. > John Milton's ➤ Paradise Lost, the only significant literary epic in English (> Beowulf being an oral poem), has about it much of the complexity of the novel, and its more atavistic heroic elements (the war in heaven, the vision of future history) seem mechanical. In the generations following Milton, the major poets, ▷ John Dryden and ▷ Alexander Pope translated the ancient epics, but their own original work took the more complex form of mock epic.

Augustan mock heroic is a development from the conceit of the Tudor and > 'metaphysical' poets, and its imaginative appeal derives similarly from far-fetched and unexpected comparisons and parallels. At its most basic it can be simply > satirical. The poet contrasts a contemptible modern person or event with a respected heroic version. > Samuel Butler's > Hudibras works largely on this level, and there is a strong element of this kind of satire in John Dryden's > Mac Flecknoe. The respected touchstone need not be the classical epic, but can be any admired model from the past, or even the present. In > Absalom and Achitophel it is the Old Testament. In parts of the > Dunciad it is Milton and other 'classic' English poets such as ➤ Edmund Waller and ➤ Sir John Denham. In parts of the \triangleright Rape of the Lock it is the pomp of religious ritual.

Nor need the contrast imply a moral satire on the modern world, or indeed any satire at all. At the beginning of Absalom and Achitophel the comparison of Charles II with King David in the Book of Kings, achieves the difficult task of aggrandizing the 'merry monarch' while at the same time slyly acknowledging his libertinism. The comparison between Belinda's petticoathoops and Achilles' shield in The Rape of the Lock mocks the heroic model rather than the modern equivalent, emphasizing the delightful domestic security of Belinda's world, as against the primitive machismo of the ancient heroes. Often the comparison between familiar and modern on the one hand, and exotic and ancient on the other, arises from pure imaginative playfulness, as when Pope, through implied puns, compares the ceremony of preparing coffee in an English drawing-room (on 'japanned' tables), with an awesome religious ceremony in distant Japan: 'On shining Altars of Japan they raise/The silver Lamp; the fiery Spirits blaze' (Rape of the Lock III, ii. 107-8).

Although mock heroic is most closely associated with the age of Dryden, ⊳ Jonathan Swift and Pope, it is found in all periods. An early example is ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Nun's Priest's Tale in which the cock behaves like a prince, although he is merely the property of a poor widow. The 'most Lamentable Comedy' of Pyramus and Thisby, performed by Bottom and the 'mechanicals' in ▷ A Midsummer Night's Dream, is a particularly complex example. The low social status and eager enthusiasm of the actors contrasts not only with the stilted nobility of the characters they impersonate, but also with the unimaginative condescension of the 'audience' within the play. In the Victorian period, mock heroic can be seen in simple form in the endearing pomposity of ▷ Charles Dickens' Pickwick, and also in the more earnest social satire of such characters as Pecksniff and Dombey. In the 20th century the full complexity of 18th-century mock heroic is again achieved in ⊳ James Joyce's ⊳ Ulysses, whose carefully worked-out parallels with ➤ Homer's > Odyssey are designed to demonstrate the comic irrelevance to human existence of any pretension to order, hierarchy, or even meaning.

Herrick, Robert (1591-1674)

Poet. Robert Herrick's poetry was published in a collection entitled Hesperides (1648), which appeared together with a companion volume, His Noble Numbers. Numerous manuscript versions of his poetry circulated in the 17th century, but the vast majority of his verse is represented in the 1648 publication. As one of the few > Renaissance poets to gather his work into a single volume, it is important to look at Herrick's poetry as a self-consciously coherent pattern.

He has long been associated with the > Cavalier poets, although his writing is of a quite different kind. Indeed, Herrick's gently mocking tone shows up the ➤ Stuart utopianism as hollow dreams. Herrick's chief stylistic models were the epigrammatic Latin poetic styles to be discovered in the works of > Catullus and > Horace. His delight in the epigrammatic style contrasts with his other memorable poetic achievement - the creation of fantasies which combine > pastoral motifs with minutely observed details of nature. The poem that opens the 1648 collection ('The Argument of His Book') sets out his poetic manifesto, which is revealed to be one of nostalgic longing for a rural ideal, probably unobtainable.

Bib: Martin, L. C. (ed.), Robert Herrick's Poetical Works; Rollin, R. B. & Patrick, J. M. (eds.), Trust to Good Verses: Herrick Tercentenary Essays.

Hervey, Elizabeth (c 1748-c1820) Novelist. Hervey was the half-sister of ➤ William Beckford, who is thought to have had her in mind when he attacked > sentimental novels in Modern Novel Writing, although his attack could equally well be directed at ▷ Hannah More or ➤ Mary Robinson. Whatever the intention, Hervey appears to have been genuinely upset, partly because the accusation was not particularly just. Her works exhibit some of the plot characteristics of sentimental novels, for example in Louisa (1789), where the heroine is selflessly devoted to the illegitimate child of her betrothed, but her character sketches and descriptive passages are sharper and more selfconsciously witty than Beckford's summation suggests.

Hervey, John, Baron of Ickworth (1696-1743) Writer and politician. Son of the Earl of Bristol, whose title he inherited in 1723. In 1720 he married the maid of honour to the Princess of Wales, Molly Lepell, who was often mentioned in the letters and verses of ▶ Pope. He became MP for Bury, and supported ➤ Sir Robert Walpole. In 1730 he became Vice Chamberlain to George II. Later he was made Lord Privy Seal, and became a confidant of Queen Caroline. His Memoirs of the Reign of George the Second, not published until 1848, describes the events of the period with keen satire. Pope developed a fierce animosity toward Hervey, whom he made a target for his own satire. He resented Hervey's friendship with ➤ Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whom he himself admired, and despised Hervey's supposed 'feminine' behaviour, including taking extreme care with his diet because of ill-health, and using rouge to disguise his pallor. Pope lampooned him savagely him in the character of Sporus, in the Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot, and in > The Dunciad. As with Pope's other target, > Colley Cibber, the attacks were sufficient to damn him in the eyes of posterity, and even in his own time Hervey was ridiculed with another nickname used by Pope, 'Lord Fanny'.

Heteroglossia

A term introduced by the Russian theorist and critic > Mikhail Bakhtin to describe the plurality of social voices in a novel (though the term is now used of other genres). For Bakhtin, one of the great virtues of a novel is that it offers a destabilising multiplicity of voices and styles which are in ⊳ dialogical relationship with each other, and especially with the formal narrative voice. Heteroglossia, therefore, represents for Bakhtin a desirable and energetic plurality.

➤ Carnival; ➤ Polyphony. Bib: Bakhtin, M., The Dialogical Imagination; Dentith, S., Bakhtinian Thought.

Hexameter

A line of verse having six metrical feet. ▶ Metre.

Heyer, Georgette (1902-74)

Novelist. Georgette Heyer was a phenomenally prolific and popular writer of detective stories and historical romances, the latter populated with a mixture of fictional characters and real historical figures, and often set in the Regency period. Whilst her writing has traditionally been criticized for its predictably escapist plots, recent feminist work on romantic fiction has emphasized its interest as fantasy and the important role that her books play in many women's lives. Her works include: The Black Moth (1921); Simon the Coldheart (1925); The Barren Court (1930); The Convenient Marriage (1934); Regency Buck (1935); Royal Escape (1937); Beau Wyndham (1941); Arabella (1949);

Bath Tangle (1955); April Lady (1957); Freedom (1965); Lady of Quality (1972). Bib: Radway, J., Reading the Romance.

> Detective fiction; romantic fiction.

Heywood, John (?1497-?1580) Dramatist. He wrote highly entertaining short plays of the kind known as ≥ interludes, eg Play of the Weather (1533), A Play of Love (1534), and > The Four P's (1568). Bib: Johnson R. C., John Heywood.

Heywood, Thomas (?1574-1641) Dramatist, actor, poet, pamphleteer; Heywood was, by his own claims, immensely prolific. His field was especially the drama of sentiment with middle-class characters, and to this belong his best-known plays, > A Woman Killed with Kindness and The English Traveller. His > blank verse, though not great poetry, benefits by the influences of a great age, and though plain, sometimes achieves poignancy. His first play may have been The Four Prentices of London, obviously appealing to a citizen (as distinct from a court) audience by its combination of romance and idealization of the middle class. This was perhaps acted as early as 1592. His many plays include > The Fair Maid of the West; Edward II; The Wise Woman of Hogsdon. However, Heywood had a more pervasive role in the theatre of the day, which he believed should be for public enjoyment and not as an attempt at 'literature'. He wrote several civic > pageants, was a shareholder in Queen Anne's Men, and, most importantly, wrote a sharp defence of the theatre against Puritan condemnation, An Apology for Actors (pub. 1612).

Hill, Geoffrey (b 1932)

Bib: Boas, F. S., Thomas Heywood.

Poet. His first two volumes, For the Unfallen (1959) and King Log (1968), established the characteristics of his poetry: intense moral seriousness, intellectual complexity and a concern with mythical and historical subjects, most notably with the victims of war or persecution. Mercian Hymns (1971), a remarkable sequence of prose poems, added elements of humour and > autobiography; Tenebrae (1978) is dominated by the relation of divine and human love, while The Mystery of the Charity of Charles Peguy (1978) is a single extended meditation on the life of the French poet. Hill's work shows many continuities with the > Modernists, especially > T. S. Eliot, and testifies to the influence of a wide range of European and American thinkers and poets. His recent work includes: The Lords of Limit (1984); and Collected Poems (1985). Bib: Robinson, P. (ed.), Geoffrey Hill: Essays on his Work; Sherry, V., The Uncommon Tongue.

Hill, Susan (b 1942)

Novelist, short-story writer and radio dramatist. Since graduating from London University, she has worked as a literary journalist and broadcaster. Her novels are sensitive, formal and conventionally structured, and tend to explore loss, isolation and grief. In The Springtime of the Year (1974) recounts the gradual adjustment to bereavement of a young widow. She has written effectively of the experience of children (I'm The King of The Castle; 1970) and the elderly (Gentlemen and Ladies; 1968). Two of her novels deal with intense male friendships; these are The Bird of Night (1972) and, probably her best-known work, Strange Meeting (1971). The latter takes its title from a poem by ➤ Wilfred Owen, and is set in the trenches of Flanders during World War I. Other novels: The Enclosure (1961); Do Me A Favour (1963); A Change for the Better (1969); The Woman in Black: A Ghost Story (1983); Air and Angels (1991); The Mist in the Mirror (1992); and Mrs de Winter (1993), a sequel to Daphne du Maurier's Rebecca. Story collections are: The Albatross (1971); The Custodian (1972); A Bit of Singing and Dancing (1973).

Hilliard, Nicholas (c 1547-1619) Miniaturist. One of the most well-known artists of the Elizabethan court, Hilliard somehow managed to capture the self-fashioning golden age of this world with his sumptuous detail, delicate brush strokes and abundant use of > allegory and mythology. Even the size of the works contributes to the sense of the intimate and precocious coteries surrounding ➤ Elizabeth I. He was praised in verse by Donne and ▷ Constable, and he wrote his own work, the Art of Limning (1603), where he argues that painting is a suitable practice for a gentleman.

Bib: Murdoch, J. (ed.), The English Miniature; Strong, R., Nicholas Hilliard and The English Renaissance Miniature.

Hilton, Walter (d 1396)

Mystical writer. Hilton was an Augustine canon of Thurgarton, near Southwell, Nottinghamshire, and the author of The Scale of Perfection, an English prose work of spiritual instruction, addressed to a single anchoress, which bears some traces of the influence of the work of ▷ Richard Rolle and ▷ The Cloud of Unknowing. It is clear from the numbers of extant manuscripts of The Scale of Perfection that it was a relatively popular work, and it was printed by ➤ Wynkyn de Worde in 1494. Bib: Sitwell, G. (trans.) The Scale of Perfection.

Hind and the Panther, The (1687)

A didactic poem in heroic ➤ couplets by > John Dryden, written after his conversion to > Catholicism in 1685, and counterbalancing his earlier defence of the Church of England, > Religio Laici (1682). It takes the form of a perfunctory ⊳ allegory, in which the Hind

(the Church of Rome) and the Panther (the Church of England) debate at length the merits of their different beliefs.

> Prior, Matthew.

Hippocrates (5th-4th centuries BC) Greek physician - known as 'the father of medicine'. Reputed author of writings called the Hippocratic Collection, including the Hippocratic Oath whereby confidential information given to doctors is not to be disclosed. The theory of > humours is attributed to him.

Historia Regum Britanniae (History of the Kings of Britain)

Major work of ⊳ Geoffrey of Monmouth, completed around 1138, recounting the history of the kings of the island from its foundation by Brutus to the loss of British sovereignty in the reign of Cadwallader.

> Arthur, King.

Historical novel

A novel set in a well-defined historical context, generally before the author's own life (and therefore, in that sense at least, not based on the author's own experience, but on other sources, whether literary or historical). Historical novels often include versions of real events and persons and descriptions of social customs, clothing, buildings etc. to give an effect of verisimilitude. However, there are also more fantastical versions of the form, such as the > Gothic novel (often though not always historical). Contemporary best-selling historical romances, such as those of > Georgette Heyer, have a certain limited verisimilitude of detail, but a strong fantasy element as regards plot. An early example of the European historical novel is The Princess of Clèves by > Madame de La Fayette, while later distinguished practitioners of the form include > Balzac, > Tolstov, > Stendhal and the German novelist Thomas Mann. In Britain it was > Sir Walter Scott who established the popularity of the form, but there are examples by such novelists as ▷ Charles Dickens, ▷ George Eliot and ➤ Thomas Hardy and, more recently, ➤ William Golding and ➤ J.G. Farrell. There are also many historical novels by post-colonial writers about the colonial period, such as > Patrick White's Voss and > Chinua Achebe's Arrow of God. > Historiographic metafiction represents a distinctively > post-modernist version of the historical novel. Bib: Lukács, Georg, The Historical Novel.

Historicism

A general term used in a range of disciplines and frequently found in discussions of literary theory. The meaning of historicism is complicated by three distinct usages:

1 A method of interpretation which claims that literary texts can only be properly understood in their historical context. This is the neutral, even positive usage, and is widely found in literary studies.

2 The word is also used negatively to indicate what critics take to be the fallacy of this view. Opponents argue that, in reality, we can never understand the past accurately enough to sustain this ambition, and that historicists merely project their own wishes and interests onto the past.

3 An even more negative colouring is given in the third usage. This derives from the philosopher and political theorist Karl Popper who criticised political theories based upon supposed laws of history which imply the inevitability of certain forms of development. Examples of historicist theories in this sense are those of Marx and > Comte. Historicism has recently had a revival in the movement known as New Historicism. Bib: Hamilton, P., Historicism.

Histories and Chronicles

Histories and chronicles are important in the study of literature in two ways: as sources for imaginative material and as literature in their own right. However, with the exception of the > Venerable Bede, it was not until the 17th century that English historians began to achieve the status of major writers.

➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth (d 1154) is the most important amongst a number of medieval historians for originating two national myths in his > Historia Regum Britanniae; the myth that Brutus, (> Brut), great-grandson of Aeneas, was the founder of the British race, and the myth of ▶ King Arthur as the great defender of British Christianity. Both had importance in nourishing nascent English patriotism. When England became a centralized state under the > Tudor monarchs, > Henry VII chose the name Arthur for his eldest son. It was the main task of Tudor chroniclers both to heighten patriotism and to identify it with loyalty to the ruling family. This was the purpose of the Latin history of England by the Italian Polydore Vergil, in the service of Henry VII and > 'Henry VIII. More important was ► Edward Hall's The Union of the two Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York (1548), which showed the House of Tudor to be the saviour of the nation after the civil > Wars of the Roses in the 15th century. > Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland and Ireland (1578) was a compilation from various sources, including Geoffrey of Monmouth, and begins in ancient biblical times. The belief of the time was that history was useful as the means by which the present could learn from the past as a source of warnings, precepts and examples. The imaginative writers used the material of the chronicles in this spirit. Geoffrey of Monmouth, Hall and Holinshed were sources for many of the historical dramas of the reign of > Elizabeth including those of ➤ Shakespeare, and also for narrative poets such as those who contributed to A Mirror for Magistrates (1559), > Samuel Daniel (Civil Wars, 1595-1609) and ➤ Michael Drayton (The Barons' Wars, 1603). Much of this new interest in history arose from the > Renaissance transference of attention from heavenly destinies to earthly ones; thus the period 1500-1650 also produced the first eminent antiquarians, notably William Camden (1551-1623), and the first historical > biographies: > Thomas More's Richard III (written 1513), George Cavendish's life of ➤ Cardinal Wolsey (written shortly after the Cardinal's death but not published in full until 1667), > Francis Bacon's life of Henry VII (1622) and ➤ Lord Herbert's life of Henry VIII (1648).

The True Historical Narrative of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England by D Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, is the first major historical work to rank as distinguished literature in English. Clarendon began it in 1646 but it was not published until 1702-4. It is told from the point of view of an important participator in the events and is notable especially for its portraits of other participators. Clarendon was a royalist; his younger contemporary, Gilbert Burnet (1643-1715), told the story of the second half of the century from the opposing political viewpoint in his most important work, The History of My Own Time. Burnet was more of a professional historian than Clarendon (who was primarily a statesman who took to history partly in self-justification) and he initiated historical writing as a major branch of literary activity and scholarship. The distinguished historical writing of William Robertson (History of Scotland during the Reigns of Queen Mary and James VI, 1759, and Charles V, 1769), of David Hume the philosopher (History of Great Britain, pub. 1754-61) and the lighter histories of England by the novelist ➤ Tobias Smollett (1756) and by ▷ Oliver Goldsmith (1764) have been superseded by later work, but > Edward Gibbon's > Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776-88) is a work not only of history but of English literature and, in the quality of its outlook on civilization, an 18th-century monument.

The 18th century was the one in which antiquarian scholarship became thoroughly established; the antiquarians were interested by the nature of their studies in the detailed life of the past. ➤ Walter Scott was one of them and his historical novels, though very uneven in quality, are important as a new kind of history as well as a new kind of imaginative literature. It was his re-creation of the daily life of the past that was one of the influences upon ➤ Thomas Carlyle, whose historical works (the most notable of which is his French Revolution, 1837) are more imaginative than factual. ➤ T.B.

Macaulay was a better historian and not inferior as an imaginative writer; > Macaulay's History of England is the only historical work which comes near Gibbon's Decline and Fall in reputation, and Macaulay was responsible for the so-called 'Whig view of history' as steady progress in material welfare and political advance. Other eminent 19th-century English historians were J.A. Froude, who is, however, notorious for his prejudices in A History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Spanish Armada (1856-70), and J.R. Green whose Short History of the English People (1874) was for some time a popular classic owing to the breadth of Green's social sympathies. It was, however, in the 19th century that the controversy about history as an art or as a science developed, and other distinguished historians of the period tended to become comparatively specialized scholars without the breadth of appeal of such men as Gibbon and Macaulay. The latter's great-nephew, G.M. Trevelyan (1876-1962), continued the broader humane tradition of historical writing, as did Arnold Toynbee's A Study of History (1934-61). Recent theoretical developments have led to renewed questioning of the terms of historical knowledge: see for example the work of Hayden White.

> Tudor myth; Heritage culture.

Historiographic metafiction

Term coined by the critic Linda Hutcheon to refer to 'novels which are both intensely self-reflexive (that is, they allude to their own fictional status) and yet paradoxically also lay claim to historical events and personages' (A Poetics of Postmodernism: History, Theory, Fiction). Examples are The French Lieutenant's Woman by ▷ John Fowles, and Midnight's Children by ▷ Salman Rushdie.

History of England from the Accession of James II

The history by ▷ Thomas Macaulay (Vols. 1 & 2, 1848; 3 & 4, 1855; 5, 1861) is a thorough, detailed account of two reigns: > James II and > William III. It is unfinished and was originally intended to extend to the time of George I (1714-27) and further. The period covered is perhaps the most crucial for English political development. ▷ James II, a ▷ Catholic, tried to enforce his will in the Catholic interest against Parliament, which frustrated him and expelled him from the throne in the > Glorious Revolution of 1688. Parliament then summoned William from Holland to reign jointly with his wife, who was also James' daughter ▷ Mary II (1689-94). William was the champion of the > Protestant cause in Europe, and Mary was also Protestant.

Macaulay's politics were strongly in the Whig parliamentary tradition and his history is an ▶ epic of the triumph of the ideas which to him gave meaning to English history. Considered as history, the work is accordingly one-sided, much more a work of historical art than of historical science; it represents what historians have come to call 'the Whig interpretation of history'.

History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, The ▷ Rasselas, Princes of Abyssinia, The History of.

History of Sir Charles Grandison, The ▷ Sir Charles Grandison, The History of.

History plays (chronicle plays)

These are especially a phenomenon of the last two decades of the 16th century, when they may have accounted for more than one-fifth of the plays written in a very prolific period of the drama. The history play is distinct from what is ordinarily called historical drama, which is a phenomenon of the 19th and 20th centuries, and, like the historical novel of the same period, involves reconstructing another period of history in awareness of its differences in customs, habits, outlook, etc. Absence of 'scientific' history in the 16th century debarred dramatists from a 'historical' sense. On the other hand, they were familiar with the dramatization of biblical events relevant to the Fall and Redemption of Man in the religious mystery plays: in a similar way history was to them and their audiences a collection of tales about the past, many of which were relevant to contemporary national predicaments. Thus in the 16th century the English Church and state had cut loose from the Roman Catholic Church, and there was consequent interest in the reign of ➤ King John (1199-1216) when there had been a comparable quarrel between king and pope; in the reign of ➤ Elizabeth I men were alarmed at the possible consequences of the queen's dying without a direct heir, and this caused them to be interested in the reign of > Richard II, and so on. The morality plays also influenced the histories: until the 16th century, moralities had concerned themselves with the spiritual destinies of men in general, but the growth of national consciousness, the splintering off of national churches in the 16th century and the increased importance of the national ruler in deciding human destinies, all caused morality dramatists to extend their interest to politics and to draw on history for their subject matter. Thus > John Bale, supporter of Henry VIII in his emancipation of the English Church from Rome, wrote King John (?1547) to make his case for Henry's policy. The morality content of Bale's play gives it coherent structure, but the chronicles of the 1580s, eg The Famous Victories of Henry V (?1588), relied chiefly on the eventfulness of their episodes. It was > Marlowe (Edward II, ?1593) and > Shakespeare in his two great tetralogies (> Henry VI, Parts I, II and III and ▷ Richard III; ▷ Richard II, ▷ Henry IV, Parts I and II and \triangleright Henry V) and \triangleright King John, who gave psychological and intellectual substance to the history-play form. Marlowe did little more than bring his characters vividly to his audience, but Shakespeare brought deep insights to bear on the nature of political society and its problems. His two tetralogies have been called a great national dramatic epic covering the years 1377-1485; however, it is the second half of the period (from 1422 to 1485; the reigns of Henry VI, Edward IV and Richard III) which constitutes his earlier work (perhaps 1590-93) while the plays concerning the first half (Richard II, Henry IV, Henry V) are relatively mature work (perhaps 1596-99). King John (?1596) is between the tetralogies in regard to maturity of style.

It becomes difficult, in the maturer Shakespeare, to draw a clear line between history plays and tragedy. ▷ Julius Caesar follows the Greek historian ▷ Plutarch closely, but it is also a tragedy; and ▷ King Lear derives from the chronicler ▷ Holinshed as does ▷ Henry V, though the former is not history. The history plays and tragedies in fact merge into each other; both contain politics, and both present tragic catastrophe.

Hoban, Russell (b 1925)

American novelist who has lived in London since 1969. After serving in the US army during World War II, he worked as a magazine and advertising artist and an advertising copywriter before becoming a full-time writer in 1967. His best-known work is Ridley Walker (1980), set 2,000 years after a nuclear war and written in an invented argot combining elements of cockney and technical language. His other novels are: The Lion of Boaz-Jachim and Jachim-Boaz (1973); Kleinzeit (1974); Turtle Diary (1976); Pilgermann (1983); The Medusa Frequency (1987). He has also published much fiction and verse for children, a play and a television play. He won the Whitbread Award in 1974.

Hobbes, John Oliver (1867-1906)

➤ Pseudonym of Mrs Pearl (Mary Teresa)
Craigie who was born near Boston, Massachusetts and moved with her family to London as a baby. She was educated in Berkshire and Paris, read widely, and published her first stories at the age of nine. She began writing regular drama and art columns soon after her marriage to Reginald Walpole Craigie in 1887. Her first novel Some Emotions and A Moral (1892) established her reputation as a clever and caustic writer, and set a pattern for her subsequent fiction in its treatment of ill-matched marriages and disillusioned idealism. Her output spans ten novels, including: The Sinner's Comedy (1892), The Gods, Some Mortals and Lord Wickenham (1895), The Scheme For Saints (1897), Robert Orange (1899), an idealized fictional portrait of Disraeli, and The Serious Wooing (1901); several successful plays such as The Ambassador (1898); sketches and ≥ travel essays as well as essays on George Eliot (Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1901) and George Sand (1902). She was a figure in London's literary life and was admired by writers such as ➤ Thomas Hardy. She became President of the Society of Women Journalists in 1895 - the same year as her highly publicized divorce following the birth of her son, of whom she gained custody after a public trial. Paradoxically she was also a member of the Anti-Suffrage League (➤ Women's suffrage). She converted to ➤ Catholicism in 1892 and her last novel The Dream and the Business (1906) deals obliquely with the 'clever' woman's predicament.

➤ 'Woman Question, The'.
Bib: Maison, M., Life; Richards, J.M., Life.

Hobbes, Thomas (1588-1679)

Philosopher. Together with the writings of > Francis Bacon and > René Descartes, the political and philosophical theories of Thomas Hobbes dominated thought in late 17thcentury England. Yet, unlike Bacon's boundless optimism, Hobbes' philosophy appeared to be determined by an almost cynical view of human nature and society. In his great analysis of the individual and the individual's place in society, Leviathan (1651), Hobbes argued that human society was governed by two overwhelming individual concerns: fear (of death, other individuals, etc.) and the desire for power. For Hobbes society is organized according to these two principles, and can be rationally analysed as a 'mechanism' (an important Hobbesian concept) governed by these two concerns.

Leviathan itself emerged out of the turmoil of revolutionary upheaval in England during the Civil War, and the figure of the 'Leviathan'

the sovereign power, though not necessarily the monarch − expresses a desire for stable government. But in addition to Leviathan Hobbes published in various fields of philosophical and social enquiry. His interest in language and the uses of ▷ rhetoric was to be influential amongst post-Restoration thinkers. But it was his analysis of the mechanical laws (as he saw them) of production, distribution and exchange that was to be of profound importance in British economic and philosophical thought in the 18th century and later.

Hobbes' chief works include: The Elements of Law (written by 1640, but published ten years later); De Cive (1642, translated into English in 1651); De Corpore (1655, translated in 1656); and De Homine (1658). Hobbes also undertook an analysis of the causes of the English Civil War in composing Behemoth (1682), as well as critical work – in particular his Answer to > Sir William D'Avenant's Preface to Gondibert (1650).

Bib: Molesworth, Sir W. (ed.), The English Works of Thomas Hobbes (11 vols.); Mintz, S. I., The Hunting of Leviathan.

Hobbinol

> Harvey, Gabriel.

Hoby, Lady Margaret (1571-1633) Diarist. Although Lady Margaret's diary is important in generic terms in that it is the earliest diary written by an Englishwoman to have survived, its contents are repetitive and mundane. She dutifully recounts her morning prayers and the day-to-day running of a Renaissance household. Sometimes humorous juxtapostionings occur, but it is difficult to ascertain whether the irony is intentional. She was married three times before she was 30: to Walter Devereux, the brother of the ➤ Earl of Essex; to Thomas Sidney, the brother of ➤ Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke; and to Thomas Hoby, son of ⊳ Thomas Hoby and > Elizabeth Russell. Her diary was published this century: The Diary of Lady Hoby, ed. Dorothy M. Meads (1930).

Hoby, Sir Thomas (1530-66)

Translator. Primarily known for his ➤ translation of ➤ Castiglione's II Cortegiano as

The Courtier, which he wrote in Paris in 1552-3, but which was not published until 1561. It was an immediate success and influenced both young noblemen and women who attempted to emulate the idealized characters in the text, as well as late Elizabethan writers who portrayed similar courtly debate in their own works (➤ Spenser, ➤ Jonson and ➤ Shakespeare). Hoby was the first husband of ➤ Lady Elizabeth Russell, who was also an accomplished translator.

➤ Hoby, Lady Margaret. Bib: Crane, T. F., Italian Social Customs of the Sixteenth Century.

Hoccleve, Thomas (1368-1426)

Poet. Hoccleve worked as a clerk for the Office of the Privy Seal in Westminster from c 1387-1423. He suffered a mental breakdown in 1416. His poetry covers a range of courtly topics but has a distinctive interest in the self-presentation and literary representation of Hoccleve himself. His Letter of Cupid (1402) is an abridgement of a work by the French writer Christine de Pisan, in which the God of Love defends women against the slanders of men. Hoccleve's most famous work, the Regement of Princes (1405), is a contribution to the wellestablished tradition of treatises which offer guides to the right conduct of princes, through a mixture of moralizing advice and exemplary stories. In the text Hoccleve represents himself as a disciple of > Chaucer, whose literary skills he praises; he not only includes a verbal portrait of Chaucer but also a visual portrait of him: Hoccleve's interest in self-portraiture is evident in the Prologue to the Regement: rather than cultivating the notion of a fictional firstperson narrator (in the manner of Chaucer and > John Gower), he fictionalizes his own identity, and describes his life and work. This interest in self-presentation is seen again in La Male Regle de Thomas Hoccleve (1405), where the subject is his own bad conduct and dissolute life. In the Complaint (1421-2), an autobiographical frame is given to a collection of narrative and didactic material, in which he alludes to his earlier illness and describes his anxieties about composing the work which follows. Bib: Seymour, M. C. (ed.), Selections from Hoccleve.

Hofland, Barbara (1770-1844)

Poet and novelist. Hugely prolific northern writer, Hofland was widowed only two years after her marriage to Thomas Hoole and was forced to write in order to keep herself and her baby. Her first book, Poems (1805), was successful and, although she ran a boarding school in Harrogate, she continued publishing, moving from poetry to the more lucrative novel form. In 1808 she married the young, self-centred artist, Thomas Hofland, and was forced to provide for the family by writing at night, so as not to disturb his daytime creative activities. There is an interesting portrait of an egotistical artist in Hofland's > didactic text, Son of a Genius (1812). On the whole her work is lively and carefully presented, with some lighter touches in the later, more psychologically involved novels such as Katherine (1828).

Hogan, Desmond (b 1950)

Irish novelist, short-story writer and playwright. Born in County Galway and educated at University College Dublin, Hogan has worked as an actor, writer and teacher. His fiction, set in Ireland, has primarily been concerned with the tragic stories of vulnerable, isolated individuals though his most recent novel, A Farewell to Prague (1995), is a semi-autobiographical, fragmentary account of the travels of an Irishman in Europe and further afield, developing his explicitly autobiographic work, The Edge of the City: A Scrapbook 1976-91 (1993). Other novels: The Ikon Maker (1976); The Leaves on Grey (1980); A Curious Street (1984); A New Shirt (1986); A Link with the River (1989). Volumes of short stories: The Diamonds at the Bottom of the Sea (1979); Children of Lir: Stories of Ireland (1981); Stories (1982); The Mourning Thief (1987); Lebanon Lodge (1988). He has also written plays for the stage, for radio and for television.

Hogarth Press, The

Publishing house. Started by > Virginia Woolf and her husband Leonard, at their home, Hogarth House, Richmond, the Hogarth Press moved to Tavistock Square in 1924 and became an allied company of Chatto and Windus in 1947. John Lehmann became a partner in 1938. In the early years of its existence the press published work by, among others, Virginia Woolf, ▷ T. S. Eliot and ▷ Katherine Mansfield, as well as translations of the work of European novelists and poets.

Hogarth, William (1697-1764)

Painter. He excelled in the depiction of social life, especially the heartlessness of the richer classes permeated by social arrogance and commercial greed, with the consequent neglect of the poor. He painted sequences that followed a theme, a technique which is a pictorial equivalent of a stage drama: 'I wished to compose pictures on canvas, similar to representations on the stage; . . . I have endeavoured to treat my subjects as a dramatic writer; my picture is my stage, and men and women are my players . . . His art became extremely popular, because he made engravings of his oil paintings, and they were to be found on the walls of inns and cottages, not merely in great country houses. In his breadth of appeal and his > realism, he is in strong contrast to the fashionable portrait painters of the 18th century, > Joshua Reynolds and ▷ Gainsborough, and in the quality of his social indignation and his concern with unprivileged humanity he anticipates the poet-engraver > William Blake. Some of his series of what he called 'pictur'd Morals' are: A Harlot's Progress (1731); A Rake's Progress (1735); Marriage à la Mode (1743-5); The Four Stages of Cruelty, Beer Street and Gin Lane (1751) (2.2.3) and Election (1754-66).

Hogarth's literary connections were close.

> Jonathan Swift invokes him as natural collaborator in his own kind of savage > satire in his poem The Legion Club (1736), and his friendship with the novelists > Samuel Richardson and > Henry Fielding influenced the visual element which gives their novels an advantage over those of > Daniel Defoe. The ordinary people who enjoyed owning and interpreting his engravings, with their satirical edge, were the foundation of the market for later cheap serial fiction, with its engraved illustrations. The importance of the visual element in serials from Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers onwards owes a debt to Hogarth and his successors.

his successors.

Bib: Moore, R. E., Hogarth's Literary Relationships.

Hogg, James (1770–1835)

Poet and novelist. Hogg was nicknamed 'the Ettrick Shepherd' because he had been a shepherd in Ettrick Forest in southern Scotland until his poetic talent was discovered by > Sir Walter Scott. He is now best known for his powerful work of Calvinist guilt and ▷ Gothic supernaturalism, The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner (1824).

Bib: Groves, D., James Hogg: the Growth of a Writer.

Holbein, Hans, the younger (c 1487–1543) Painter. Born in Augsburg, Germany, Holbein came to England to the household of ▷ Sir Thomas More in 1526-8 on the recommendation of ➤ Erasmus, for whom he had illustrated Praise of Folly (1509). Several works of the More household remain, as well as sketches or paintings of ▷ Thomas Cromwell, ▷ Sir Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, ⊳ Earl of Surrey, as well as his most famous portrait of ➤ Henry VIII. Holbein's meticulous and naturalistic style was a dramatic innovation in England and heralded the end of medieval symbolic representations in favour of the greater individuality of ⊳ Renaissance art. Bib: Robert J., Holbein.

Holcroft, Thomas (1745-1809)

Dramatist, novelist, actor, translator, largely associated with the introduction of continental melodrama to the English stage. In 1770 Holcroft obtained a post as prompter in the Dublin theatre and this was followed by a period of acting with strolling companies in England, and in 1778 an engagement at the > Drury Lane Theatre, where his first play was performed. In 1780 his first novel, Alwyn or the Gentleman Comedian was published, drawing on his experiences as a strolling actor. His first comedy, Duplicity, was staged at ➤ Covent Garden in 1781. In 1784, on a visit to Paris, Holcroft was impressed by a production of Beaumarchais' Le Mariage de Figaro and, being unable to obtain a copy, he committed the entire play to memory. On his return, his translation was mounted at Covent Garden under the title The Follies of the Day. In 1792 Holcroft's most successful play, The Road to Ruin, was produced, again at Covent Garden.

An ardent supporter of the ▷ French Revolution, Holcroft became active on its behalf in England, and was imprisoned briefly for alleged treason. In 1799 he moved to Paris, where he lived for four years. In his absence his A Tale of Mystery, a translation from a play by Pixérécourt, was produced in London. He also published several translations of novels and wrote operas, afterpieces, and polemical essays. Bib: Rosenblum, J. (ed.), The Plays of Thomas Holcroft.

Holden, Molly (1927-81)

Poet. Born in Swindon and educated in London, Molly Holden's gentle and understated poetry is now beginning to receive greater attention, but being essentially at odds with more radical poetic trends, this rather fragile 'nature poetry' (which draws on the influences of ▷ Thomas Hardy and Edward Thomas) has hitherto brought it a limited readership. She has also written three novels for children. She was a long-term sufferer of multiplę sclerosis, of which she died in 1981. Her poetic works include: A Hill Like a Horse (1963); The Bright Cloud (1964); Make Me Grieve (1968); Air and Chill Earth (1971); The Country Over (1975); and the posthumous New and Selected Poems (1986).

Holdsworth, Annie (b1857-?1910) Novelist, feminist and editor. Born in Jamaica, Holdsworth's book Joanna Traill, Spinster (1894) addresses the ▷ New Woman theme of female independence. She was co-editor of The Woman's Signal. Her later novels include: The Years That the Locust Hath Eaten (1896) and The Gods Arrive (1897).

➤ Women's Movement.

Holford, Margaret (1761–1834) and Holford, Margaret (1778–1852)

Mother and daughter. The elder Holford was a poet, dramatist and novelist, while her daughter is known for her poetry and prose. Holford senior's novels have predictable plots which rely heavily on the contemporary vogue for sensationalism and exotic mystery. Her first novel, Fanny (1785), is dramatic and lively, ending with the reformation of the hero from rake into model husband. Her two plays, Neither's The Man (1798) and The Way to Win Her (1814), are more challenging; they recall Restoration comedy and advocate the superiority of female 'wit'. Holford junior turned her talents towards poetry and was heavily influenced by > Sir Walter Scott. Her published work, Wallace, or The Fight of Falkirk (1809) and Poems (1811) were very popular at the time, but they are too sentimental to be popular with a 20th-century readership. She also wrote a novel Warbeck of Wolfstein (1820), which was influenced by > Shelley.

➤ Gothic novels.

Holiday House (1839)

A novel for children by Scottish writer

Catherine Sinclair, which helped to develop a taste for books representing mischievous rather than moral children. Sinclair described her intentions thus: 'In these pages the author has endeavoured to paint that species of noisy, frolicsome, mischievous children, now almost extinct, wishing to preserve a sort of fabulous remembrance of days long past, when young people were like wild horses on the prairies, rather than well-broken hacks on the road.'

> Children's literature.

Holinshed, Raphael (d?1580) Chronicler: Chronicles of England, Scotland and Ireland (1578). The history of England was written by Holinshed himself but a vivid Description of England added to the history is by William Harrison. The history of Scotland is a translation of a Scottish work written in Latin − Scotorum historiae (1527) by Hector Boece − and the account of Ireland is by Richard Stanyhurst, Edward Campion and others. ▷ Shakespeare and other Elizabethan dramatists used the Chronicles as a principal source book for history plays; Shakespeare also used them for ▷ Macbeth, ▷ King Lear and ▷ Cymbeline.

> Histories and Chronicles.

Hollinghurst, Alan (b 1954)

Novelist. Educated at Magdalen College Oxford, Hollinghurst lectured at Oxford and at London University, was assistant editor of the Times Literary Supplement (1982–90) and poetry editor from 1990. The Swimming-Pool Library (1988) depicts both contemporary gay life in London and, through the researches carried out by the protagonist, who is commissioned to write a biography, the persecution of homosexual men in 1950s Britain. The Folding Star (1994), narrated by an English tutor in a Flemish city, is also much concerned with the relationship of art and life. Confidential Chats with Boys (1982) is a volume of verse. Hollinghurst has also translated Racine's Bajazet.

Holmes, Sherlock

> Detective fiction; Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan.

Holtby, Winifred (1898-1935)

Novelist and journalist. Winifred Holtby's short career was extremely prolific. She is best known as the writer of South Riding (1936), a study of life and rural politics in her native Yorkshire, but Holtby's career is much more varied than this suggests. She was a farmer's daughter whose first book of poetry was published when she was only 13 (My Garden and Other Poems). She then went on to study at Oxford (where she met and befriended > Vera Brittain), worked as a nurse in the First World War, and wrote the first full-length critical study of ⊳ Virginia Woolf (1932). She also lectured, and had a distinguished journalistic career (writing for, amongst others, the Manchester Guardian and the News Chronicle). Her other works include: Anderby Wold (1923); The Land of Green Ginger (1927); Poor Caroline (1931); Mandoa! Mandoa! (1933); Women and a Changing Civilisation (1934); Letters to a Friend (1937) Bib: Brittain, V., Testament of Friendship; Handley-Taylor, G., Winifred Holtby: A Concise and Selected Bibliography with Some Letters.

Holy War, The (1682)

An \triangleright allegory by \triangleright John Bunyan. Its subject is the fall and redemption of man. The city of Mansoul has fallen into the hands of Diabolus (the Devil) and has to be recaptured by Emmanuel (Jesus Christ), who besieges it.

Homer

Ancient Greek epic poet, author of the ▷ Iliad and the > Odyssey, basic works for > Greek literature. Ancient traditions exist about Homer, for instance that latterly he was blind and that seven cities claimed to be his birthplace, but nothing is conclusively known about him. Archaeological investigation has disclosed that the destruction of ➤ Troy, following the siege described in the Iliad, took place in the 12th century BC; linguistic, historical and literary analysis of the poems show them to date as artistic wholes from perhaps the 8th century BC. That they are artistic wholes is in fact the only evidence for the existence of Homer; efforts to show that they are compilations by a number of poets have proved unconvincing, though it is clear that Homer himself was using the work of other poets between the Trojan war and his own time. The critic > Matthew Arnold in his essay On Translating Homer (1861) says that Homer is rapid in movement, plain in diction, simple on ideas and noble in manner; and that the translation of three eminent English poets, > George Chapman (16th century), ➤ Alexander Pope and ➤ William Cowper (18th century), all fail in one or more of these qualities, however fine their verse is in other respects.

Homosexuality

Accorded a marginal place in literary representation and, when it has been shown, usually hedged about with implications of the exotic, the abnormal or at least the exceptional. According to Ronald Pearsall (The Worm in the Bud: The World of Victorian Sexuality) the term 'homosexual' was first used by a Hungarian physician named Benkert in 1869, and there was enormous interest in the phenomenon in the later years of the 19th century. Between 1898 and 1908 more than 1000 works on homosexuality were published. Homosexuality as a concept began to take shape in the 1880s in the work of John Addington Symonds (1840-93) and Richard von Krafft-Ebing, and in the research of Victorian sexologists such as ➤ Havelock Ellis. Legal prohibition at the time led to almost universal repression, except in the public school system where it appears to have thrived, if undercover. The editor William Stead declared in his Review of Reviews: 'Should everyone found guilty of Oscar Wilde's crime be imprisoned, there would be a very surprising emigration from Eton, Harrow, Rugby and Winchester to the jails of Pentonville and Holloway.' There were several attempts to make homosexuality respectable, including a number of books written by homosexuals advocating a change of terminology. Euphemisms such as 'homogenic love', 'contrasexuality', 'homoeroticism', 'similisexualism', 'sexual inversion', 'intersexuality' and 'the third sex' were all used as substitutes. Carl Heinrich Ulrich invented the term 'uranism' in the 1860s and exponents were known as 'urnings' and 'dionings'. The philosophical form 'uranismum' indicated the female soul in the male body and the term

'urning', used to describe homosexual activity, was noted by J.A. Symonds as appearing in a number of novels of the time. Until 1828 sodomy was punishable by death if the activity had been witnessed by another, and such was the repression and fear that blackmail, especially of public figures, and self-mutilation were common.

In the 1850s Fleet Street, Holborn and the Strand were favourite places for homosexual prostitutes, who were known in early and mid-Victorian times as 'margeries' and 'pooffs'; the act itself was referred to as 'backgammon'. Politicians suspected of homosexuality but tolerated nevertheless, as people in high office tended to be, included George Canning and > Disraeli. One celebrated homosexual was the painter and poet Simeon Solomon, a friend of > Algernon Swinburne. He eventually died in squalor in a workhouse in 1905. J.A. Symonds and ➤ Edmund Gosse were more discreet about their sexual preferences, and the affection of > Tennyson for Arthur Hallam, celebrated in > In Memoriam (1850) has been seen by some critics as evidence of adolescent homosexual anguish. After the 1885 Criminal Law Amendment Act the penalty for procuration was two years imprisonment with or without hard labour. It was this law that > Oscar Wilde fell foul of in 1895. His is perhaps the most famous example of the persecution of homosexuals at this time. Many historians follow the pioneering work of philosopher Michel Foucault (1926–84) in claiming that male homosexuality and the role of the male homosexual were 'invented', ie named and pathologized, in the 19th century in an attempt to distinguish between acceptable and abhorrent behaviour. For an account of sexual ambiguity in the literature of the late 19th century see Elaine Showalter's Sexual Anarchy.

Hood, Thomas (1799–1845)
Poet. His serious poetry shows strongly the influence of ➤ John Keats, but he is known chiefly for his comic and topical verse; the latter includes grim but haunting poems about contemporary social abuses, eg The Song of the Shirt (1843), a kind of poetic poster art which does not bear close examination but is extremely effective on first reading. In his comic verse, he was notorious for his puns which he used obtrusively but often wittily.

Bib: Jerrold, W., Life; Reid, J. C., A Critical Study.

Hook, Theodore Edward (1788–1841) Novelist, poet and dramatist. Hook is primarily remembered as a ▷ Silver-fork novelist; his works include Sayings and Doings (1824–8) and Gilbert Gurney (1836). He was intimately acquainted with the aristocratic world which he describes, and his books were often used as behavioural guides for those who wished to enter polite society. Their narratives and characters, however, lack distinction. Bib: Brightfield, M.F., Hook and His Novels.

Hooker, Jeremy (b 1941) Poet and critic. Born at Warsash, Hampshire, Jeremy Hooker was educated at Southampton University. He lectured in English at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, from 1965 to 1984, subsequently moving to Winchester, to Groningen in the Netherlands, and finally back to Frome in the West Country. His poetry explores, in a highly controlled and sometimes spare style, at once probing yet reticent, the historic and mythic associations of landscape, emphasising his attachment to place, both in his native Wessex and, in the middle period of his poetic development, in Wales, these seminal themes being elaborated upon in his collection of essays The Poetry of Place (1973). His other critical works are a monograph on John Cowper Powys in the Writers of Wales series (1973), David Jones: An Exploratory Study (1975) and John Comper Powys and David Jones: A Comparative Study (1979), together with a second collection of essays, on modern British and American poets, The Presence of the Past (1987). He also edited, with Gweno Lewis, the selected poems of Alun Lewis in 1981. His collections of poetry are The Elements (1972), Soliloquies of a Chalk Giant (1974), Landscape of the Daylight Moon (1978), Solent Shore (1978), Englishman's Road (1980), Itchen Water (1982), Master of the Leaping Figures (1987) and Their Silence a Language, which, with Lee Grandjean, explores the connections between poetry and sculpture (1993). His selected poems appeared under the title of A View from the Source in 1982. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales.

Hooker, Richard (?1553–1600) Theologian. His most significant work was Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1593–7). This was the first outstanding polemic expounding the > Church of England viewpoint, and its main purpose was to defend the Church against attacks by Protestant reformers. Such reformers (the Puritans) trusted only the ➤ Bible as authority on matters of religion, since only the Bible was acknowledged to be inspired by God. They criticized the Church of England for being too near the Roman Catholic Church in its organization (eg in its retention of the authority of bishops) and for resembling the Roman Church in its excessive reliance on other kinds of authority. Hooker considered that the Puritans were making major issues out of inessentials, and that their attacks were dangerous both socially and religiously, since the state was indissolubly bound up with the Church, and it was essential for both to adapt themselves to historical change and requirement, and to draw upon the law of nature as well as upon the Holy Scriptures for guidance. Law he regarded as inherent in created nature and as the same principle, whether seen in the aspect of natural order, social order or divine order. In this view of law, Hooker is essentially a conservative thinker, inheriting from the > Middle Ages the view of the universe as a system of related degrees ranging from God down to the four ⊳ elements of hot, cold, moist and dry as the basis of matter. Though conservative, the outlook was not reactionary; it was the most widely accepted assumption of the time, implicit in the imaginative literature, see eg the speech of Ulysses in ➤ Shakespeare's > Troilus and Cressida (I. iii. 75).

However, for all Hooker's conservatism, in the ▷ Civil War and post-Civil War period his works were widely read by radicals as well as by the more conservative-minded. Hooker's appeal to radicals was based on the posthumous publication, in 1648, of a further three books of his Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity − books whose authenticity has long been debated. What recommended Hooker to radicals was the role he assigned to consent in religion, and the fact that, in the later parts of the Laws, he offered no defence of divine-right episcopacy.

Bib: Keble, J. (ed.), The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Cargill-Thomson, W. D. J., Studies in the Reformation: Luther to Hooker.

Hope, Christopher (b 1944)

Novelist, short-story writer and poet. Born in South Africa of an Irish Catholic family and educated at the universities of Witwatersrand and Natal, he moved to Europe in 1975. He served in the South African navy in 1962 and has worked as an underwriter, in publishing, as a reviewer and as an English teacher in England. His first two novels, A Separate Development (1980, banned in South Africa) and Kruger's Alp (1984) both deal with apartheid, the second in allegorical terms. The Love Songs of Nathan J. Swirsky (1993) is a comic satire on small-town South African life. His fiction has a satirical edge and contains strong elements of the surreal and the bizarre as well as some sinister humour. His other novels include: The Hottentot Room (1986); My Chocolate Redeemer (1989); Serenity House (1992). Private Parts (1981) is a volume of short stories and Black Sman (1987) a > novella. His volumes of poetry include: Cape Drives (1974); In the Country of the Black Pig (1981); Englishmen (1985).

Hopkins, Gerard Manley (1844-89)

Poet. He was converted to Roman > Catholicism in 1866, and entered the Jesuit Order in 1868. He then gave up poetry, but resumed writing in 1875 with ▷ The Wreck of the Deutschland, his first important poem. So unusual were Hopkins' poems that they were not published in his own lifetime; after his death they passed to his friend, > Robert Bridges, who delayed their publication until 1918, and even then Hopkins' fame did not become widespread until the second edition of 1930. The date of his publication, the interest he shared with modern poets in the relationship between poetry and experience and his technical innovation and intense style, has caused him to be thought of as belonging more to the 20th century than to the 19th. His > 'sprung rhythm' is a technical term meaning the combination of the usual regularity of stress patterns with freely varying numbers of contrary to the practice that had predominated

in English poetry since ➤ Edmund Spenser

(?1552-99), which required a uniform pattern syllables in each line. This was not new, but was of syllabic counts, as of stresses. In Hopkins' poetry, the rhythm of the verse could more easily combine with the flow and varying emphasis of spoken language, so that the two kinds of expressiveness unite. A kindred sort of concentration is obtained by his practice – natural to the spoken language but uncommon in writing – of inventing compound words, especially adjectives, eg 'dappled-with-damson west' for a sunset, 'lovely-asunder starlight' for stars scattered over the sky.

➤ Keats.(1795–1821) was a strong influence upon him (as upon so many of the later Victorians) and Hopkins shared Keats' gift for evoking in words the physical response suitable to the thing they express. This was the more conspicuous in Hopkins because of his intense interest (for which he found support in the 13th-century philosopher Duns Scotus) in the qualities which give any object its individual reality, distinguishing it from other objects of the same class. For these qualities he invented the term 'inscape'. He also invented 'instress' for the force of these qualities on the mind. This intensity of response to the reality and beauty of objects was akin to the intensity of his feeling about the relationship between God and man.

All Hopkins' poetry is religious, and in quality recalls the early 17th-century devotional poets, John Donne (1572-1631) and George Herbert (1593-1633); in his 'terrible sonnets', for instance, Hopkins engages in direct dialogue with God as does Donne in his Holy Sonnets, or Herbert in a lyric such as The Collar. Thus Hopkins unites the rhythmical freedom of the Middle Ages, the religious intensity of the early 17th century, the response to nature of the early 19th, and he anticipated the 20th century in challenging conventional encumbrances in poetic form.

Bib: Gardner, W.A., Life; Hartman, G.H. (ed.), Hopkins; Bottrall, M. (ed.), Gerard Manley Hopkins: Poems; Bergonzi, B., Gerard Manley Hopkins: Roberts, G. (ed.), Gerard Manley Hopkins: The Critical Heritage; Oug, W.J., Hopkins, the Self and God; Weyland, N. (ed.), Immortal Diamond: Studies in Gerard Manley Hopkins.

Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus) (68-5 BC) Roman poet of the Augustan age. His work divides into three classes; his Satires, Odes and Epistles. The last includes the Ars Poetica or De Arte Poetica (Concerning the Art of Poetry) which became an important critical document for Europe – for England particularly in the 18th century. It emphasizes the importance of cultivating art in poetry; he lays down the principle that if you do not understand poetry it is better to leave it alone. Art means above all the cultivation of alert judgment: expression and form must be appropriate to theme; characterization and form must be consistent with the subject and with themselves; conciseness is a virtue in didacticism; adaptation of a writer is allowed but plagiarism is not; the poet must study to be wise as a man, and he must be his own severest critic; a just critic is a severe one. The age of ➤ Alexander Pope and ➤ Samuel Johnson took these principles to heart and they also liked Horace's cultivation of balance in prosperity between wealth and poverty: he had become the friend of the rich patron of letters, Maecenas, who had provided him with a small estate in the Sabine hills. The English Augustans' concern was to cultivate proportion and balance. Criticism and satire thus became important to them as correctives of inborn human tendencies, and they cultivated the congenial spirit of Horace as Horace himself had sought to practise the virtues of the Greeks. Thus Pope entitled one of his sequences of poems > Imitations of Horace.

Horn Childe → King Horn.

Horror fiction

Although horror fiction has undergone astonishing changes since the earliest ▷ 'Gothic' novels (▷ Horace Walpole's The Castle of Oranto, 1764, > M. G. Lewis' The Castle Spectre, 1798, ➤ Anne Radcliffe's The Mysteries of Adolpho, 1794 and The Monk, 1796) the themes of transgression with which the genre deals have remained largely unchanged. Returning obsessively to taboo subjects (death, sex, incest, decay, bodily corruption, psychosis) horror novels have been described both by critics and champions as an 'undergrowth of literature' whose function is to speak the unspeakable. In his critical work, Supernatural Horror in Literature, H. P. Lovecraft declares: 'The oldest and strongest emotion of mankind is fear, and the oldest and strongest kind of fear is of the unknown. These facts few psychologists will dispute, and their admittedness must establish for all time the genuineness and dignity of the weirdly horrible tales.' Sixty years later leading contemporary horror novelist > Stephen King writes: 'Horror appeals to us because it says, in a symbolic way, things we would be afraid to say . . . It offers us a chance to exercise (not exorcise) . . . emotions which society demands we keep closely in hand' (Danse Macabre, 1981). Similarly, British horror novelist ➤ Ramsey Campbell has described the genre as 'the branch of literature most often concerned with going too far. It is the least escapist form of fantasy. It shows us sights we would ordinarily look away from or reminds us of insights we might prefer not to admit we have.'

Whilst much early Gothic fiction is rooted in American literature (> Edgar Allan Poe is frequently cited as the godfather of modern Gothic), Britain has produced a number of key texts. > Bram Stoker's Dracula (1897) set the tone for future tales of vampirism, while Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1818) has become the genre's single most reworked (and indeed abused) text, both on page and later screen. Of the longevity of these horror icons David Punter writes: 'Frankenstein and Dracula are still granted fresh embodiments [because of both their own imagistic flexibility and . . . the essential continuity under capitalism of the anxieties about class and gender warfare from which they sprang.' The question of whether classic horror fiction alludes to contemporary rather than timeless fears has been of central import in recent years. Following a slump in the 1960s, horror fiction was revitalized in 1971 by the extraordinary success of William Peter Blatty's occult chiller The Exorcist. Described by the author as 'a 350 page thankyou note to the Jesuits' for his education, The Exorcist rekindled modern popular religious debate, but its success was attributed by some to a contemporary fear of adolescent rebellion which the novel appeared to reflect. In the wake of Blatty's success, American short-story writer Stephen King published his first novel Carrie, which also dealt with aggressive adolescence. In Britain, > James Herbert rapidly became the leading light of modern pulp horror fiction, producing viscerally gory tales set against a backdrop of modern urban decay. 'The rats are the establishment,' explained Herbert of the subtexts of his first best-seller The Rats. Although Herbert's later work became more discreet, he opened the flood-gates for a slew of writers specializing in sensationally violent fantasy; most notable is Shaun Hutson (Spawn, Slugs, Assassin), a connoisseur of outlandish mutilation with a recurrent sexual bent, while Guy N. Smith (Crabs, The Sucking Pit, Crabs on the Rampage) deserves mention for his prolific output. In the early 1980s, > Clive Barker and Ramsey Campbell rose to the forefront of the British 'new wave' of horror writers. Challenging the 'innate conservatisms and prejudices of the field'. Barker and Campbell forged a new brand of horror which sought to demystify taboo subjects rather than merely revel in them. In America, Stephen King's popularity remains unchallenged, but he is outstripped in terms of invention by Peter Straub, author of Ghost Story (1979), and with whom King collaborated on The Talisman (1984). Current upcoming authors include K. W. Jeter, Kim Newman, Thomas Ligotti, Michael Marshall Smith, Nicholas Royle, Ian R. MacLeod, D. F. Lewis and Joel Lane. Recent short-story collections are: Best New Horror (Steven Jones and Ramsey Campbell, eds.) and Dark Voices (edited by Sutton, D. and Jones, S.). Bib: King, S., Danse Macabre (1981); Newman, K., and Jones, S., Horror: 100 Best Books (1988); Sullivan, J., (ed.), The Penguin Encyclopaedia of Horror and the Supernatural.

Hosain, Attia (b 1913)

Novelist and short-story writer. She was born in Lucknow to an aristocratic family and educated at schools in Lucknow and at home (where she studied Arabic, Persian and Urdu). She moved to London when India was partitioned in 1947, working as a BBC presenter, an actress and a journalist. Phoenix Fled (1951) is a collection of short stories and Sunlight on a Broken Column (1961) a novel.

Hoskyns, John (1566-1638)

Poet and rhetorician. Hoskyns was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford, but was expelled from the latter for writing ▷ satire. He was an eloquent lawyer and, finally, MP for Hereford. His poetic writing and contribution to style was for a long time unrecognized; however, it is now apparent that ▷ Jonson used Hoskyns' Directions for Speech and Style (1599) in Timber, and that several poems written by Hoskyns have been misattributed to others, such as ▷ Donne. His poetry is often witty and down-to-earth, the shorter pieces being amongst the best.

Hospital, Janette Turner (b 1942) Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Australia and educated at the University of Queensland and at Queens University in Canada, Hospital settled in Canada in 1971 but has also lived in India, England and the USA. She has worked as a teacher, a librarian (at Harvard University), a writer-in-residence and a lecturer. The title of one of her volumes of short stories, Dislocations (1986), sums up a principal theme of her fiction, whether set in India, like The Ivory Swing (1982), or in Canada, like Borderline (1985), a novel of > post-modernist self-consciousness in which a couple's encounter with an illegal immigrant to Canada poses issues of commitment and responsibility. The Tiger in the Tiger Pit (1983) is a drama of family conflict set in the USA and Australia. Her other works are: Isobars (short stories, 1990); Charades (a novel, 1989); The Last Magician (1992).

Hospitallers of St John of Jerusalem (Knights of St John)

A military religious order associated with the Crusades. The Hospitallers were founded in 1099 to provide a hostel for pilgrims to Jerusalem. Driven from Jerusalem, they eventually settled in Malta in 1530. They had a branch in England which was suppressed in the 16th century. The modern British order was founded in the 19th century and exists for hospital work similar to that of the Red Cross.

Hotspur (Sir Henry Percy) (1364–1403) Eldest son of the first Earl of Northumberland.
➤ Shakespeare represented him in ➤ Henry IV, Part I, where he is shown as the generous, tempestuous warrior, devoted entirely to honour, but failing to relate it to any feeling for human good. He is thus, despite these qualities, a destructive force.

Hours, Book of Certain hours of the day, called the Canonical Hours, are set aside for prayers by the Catholic Church. A Book of Hours contained the prayers to be said at the appropriate times; medieval editions were often illustrated ('illuminated') with great art and at great expense. The evidence of their illustrations has allowed some stereotyped ideas about medieval life to be challenged; see The Medieval Woman. An Illuminated Book of Days (1985).

House of Fame

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ dream-vision poems, in octosyllabic couplets, usually dated to the years 1379-80, in which the narrator records the experience of a December dream which he deems worthy of record. The dream-vision mode is used to great effect in this text, which encompasses very different dream-scapes and explores important poetic-philosophic questions without being tied to providing explanations and answers. It is a speculative work.

Book I is taken up with a retelling of Virgil's Aeneid, depicted on the walls of the Dreamer's first dream-room, in the temple of Venus. ➤ Dido's unhappy experience is given particular prominence by the narrator, who seems more influenced by > Ovid's sympathetic treatment of her plight (in the Heroides) than by Virgil's representation of the incident. In Book II the narrator is given a trip to the heavens, courtesy of a Golden Eagle flown in from Dante's Divina Commedia. The dreamer, who is called 'Geoffrey' by the eagle, is given a chance to experience metaphysics at first hand, though his preference is for reading about the heavens in books, rather than travelling through them. The whole trip, it transpires, is a reward for the Dreamer's assiduous and bookish service to the God of Love. Book III concerns the Dreamer's visit to the aerial House of Fame (the final destination of all sounds and reports from Earth); his description of this precarious institution, its upholders, and his eyewitness report of the vagaries of Lady Fame's dispensation of her favours. From here the Dreamer is taken to the more volatile environment of the House of Rumour, a whirling house of twigs, in which he sees the generation of the stores which provide the raw material for the House of Fame. The text breaks off as a man of some authority appears on the scene. The poem provides an extremely deft exploration of the nature and scope of Chaucer's cultural heritage and the relationship between different kinds of artistic production, between the literary texts of the past and present.

Bib: Boitani, P. and Mann, Jill (ed.), The Cambridge Chaucer Companion.

Household Words

A weekly periodical edited by ➤ Charles Dickens from 1850 to 1859. It emulated the magazine tradition of > Blackwood's (started 1817) but aimed at a wider public. Among works published in it were Dickens' novel ▷ Hard Times and > Mrs Gaskell's > North and South. It was followed by ▷ All the Year Round.

> Reviews and periodicals.

Housman, A. E. (1859-1936)

A classical scholar who published two small volumes of ▷ lyrics of enormous popularity: The Shropshire Lad (1896) and Last Poems (1922). They are very pessimistic but have an immediate musical appeal, and several have in fact been set to music by a number of composers, eg Vaughan Williams. His lecture The Name and Nature of Poetry, in which he described poetic creation as an essentially physical experience, also achieved considerable fame in his own age.

Bib: Housman, L., AEH: Some Poems, Some Letters and a Personal Memoir; Richards, G.,

Housman 1879-1936; Watson, G. L., Housman: a divided life; Graves, R. P., A. E. Housman: the Scholar-Poet.

Houyhnhnms, The

The horses endowed with > reason in Part IV of ▷ Swift's ▷ Gulliver's Travels. The word imitates the whinnying of a horse. The enlightened horses are a purely reasonable aristocracy, inhabiting an island which also contains a race called ➤ Yahoos who, not endowed with reason, typify brutish and degraded behaviour, Gulliver's Houvhnhnm host recognizes that Gulliver is unlike the Yahoos in his possession of the faculty of reason, but proves to him that owing to his other qualities, which are Yahoo-like, he can only use his reason destructively.

Howards End (1910)

A novel by > E. M. Forster. The theme is the relationship between the Schlegel family (Margaret, Helen, and their brother Tibby) who live on an unearned income and are liberal, enlightened, and cultivated, and the Wilcoxes, who work in the commercial world which the Schlegels are inclined to despise. The Wilcoxes are snobbish, prejudiced, insensitive, and philistine; in fact they have much in common with the middle classes as described by Matthew Arnold in his critique of English culture – Culture and Anarchy (1869). Mrs Wilcox, however, who has bought her husband the old house, Howards End, belongs to the older, aristocratic continuity of English culture; never understood by her husband and children, on her death she bequeaths the house unexpectedly to Margaret Schlegel. Margaret comes into the inheritance at the end of the book, but only after she has married and subdued to her values Mrs Wilcox's former husband. Meanwhile Helen, moved by sympathy and indignation, has become pregnant by Leonard Bast, a poor bank-clerk who has been the victim of both the Schlegel and the Wilcox social illusions and mishandling. Bast dies after being beaten by one of the Wilcox sons, and Helen and her child come to live at Howards End with Margaret and Mr Wilcox. The house remains a tentative symbol of hope for the future of English society. The novel as a whole explores the impact of early ▷ feminist ideas, and > anti-industrialism. The Merchant Ivory film Howards End, with a screenplay by Ruth Prawer Jhabvala, was released to critical acclaim in 1992.

Hudibras (1663, 1664 and 1678)

A mock-heroic (▷ Heroic, Mock) ▷ satire in tetrameter couplets by ➤ Samuel Butler (1612-80). The Presbyterian Sir Hudibras and his Independent Squire Ralpho undergo various adventures designed to expose the hypocrisy of the Puritans, interspersed with satire on various scientific and intellectual follies. The poem's structure parodies the 16th-century → epic romances of → Ariosto and → Spenser, and the hero takes his name from a knight in Spenser's > Faerie Queene. In spirit it owes much to Cervantes' anti-romance satire > Don Quixote. The poem's politics pleased > Charles II, who gave Butler £300 and a pension of £,100 a year. Though the work fails to sustain narrative interest it establishes its own distinctive vein of rollicking farce and homespun philosophizing:

Honour is, like a widow, won With brisk attempt, and putting on; With ent'ring manfully and urging; Not slow approaches, like a virgin. (I. ii. 911-14)

Butler's loose tetrameters with their vigorous colloquial diction and crude rhymes became an established medium for broad satire, known as 'hudibrasticks'.

Hudibrastics

Term deriving from Hudibras (1663, 1664 and 1678), a mock-heroic > satire in tetrameter > couplets by Samuel Butler (1612-80). The Presbyterian Sir Hudibras, and his Independent Squire Ralpho, undergo various adventures designed to expose the hypocrisy of the Puritans, interspersed with satire on various scientific and intellectual follies.

▶ Heroic, mock.

Hughes, Richard (1900-76)

Novelist, dramatist and poet. He published four novels: A High Wind in Jamaica (1929); In Hazard (1938); The Fox in the Attic (1961) and The Wooden Shepherdess (1971). He was educated at Charterhouse School, and at Oxford University, where he met > W. B. Yeats, ▷ A. E. Coppard, ▷ T. E. Lawrence and ➤ Robert Graves. As an undergraduate he wrote a one-act play, The Sister's Tragedy, which was staged in 1922 and enthusiastically received, and a volume of poems entitled Gipsy Night (1922). In 1924 he wrote the first original radio play, Danger and a stage play, A Comedy of Good and Evil. Born in Surrey but of Welsh descent, he adopted Wales as his home, but travelled extensively around the world. His travels are reflected in his book of short stories, In the Lap of Atlas: Stories of Morocco (1979), as well as in his first two novels, which are set mainly at sea and are intense studies of moral issues in the context of human crisis. A High Wind in Jamaica, his best-known work, is the story of a group of children captured by pirates. It deals with violence, the relation of innocence and evil, and the fallibility of human justice, and takes an unsentimental view of childhood. In Hazard describes in great detail the events on board a cargo ship at sea during a hurricane, and has affinities with the work of > Joseph Conrad. After an administrative post in the Admiralty during World War II, Hughes worked as a book reviewer and teacher. His last two novels are part of a projected historical sequence entitled The Human Predicament, recounting the events leading up to World War II. Other publications include: The Man Born to be Hanged (1923) (stage play); A Moment of Time (1926) (short stories); The Spider's Palace (1931) and Don't Blame Me (1940) (short stories for children); Confessio Juvenis (1926) (collected poems). Bib: Thomas, P., Richard Hughes.

Hughes, Ted (b 1930)

One of the liveliest poets writing in Britain since 1945. His works include: The Hawk in the Rain (1957); Lupercal (1960); two volumes of verse for children - Meet My Folks (1961) and Earth Owl and Other Moon People (1963); Wodwo (1967); Crow (1970); Poems (1971); Eat Crow (1971); Prometheus on his Crag (1973); Spring Summer Autumn Winter (1974); Cavebirds (1975); Gaudete (1977); Remains of Elmet (1979); Moortown (1979); River (1983); Season Songs (1985); Flowers and Insects (1986); Shakespeare and the Goddess of Complete Being (1992); and Rain-charm for the Duchy and other Laureate Poems (1992). His rather violent poetry appeared when English verse was dominated by the poets of the > Movement (> Larkin); in contrast with these restrained, disillusioned, ironic and often urban poems, Hughes' work explored and celebrated violence and the life of the unconscious, and he was a key member of the 'new poetry' group (included in A. Alvarez's important anthology of that name published in 1962). Hughes is remarkable for his evocation of natural life, in particular of animals, presented as alien and opposed to the civilized human consciousness, and for that reason, as in the poetry and prose of > D. H. Lawrence, peculiarly close to sub-rational instinct in the self. Hughes married the poet ➤ Sylvia Plath in 1956. On the death of > John Betjeman in 1984 Hughes was made ➤ Poet Laureate. Bib: Sagar, K., The Art of Ted Hughes; Gifford, T. and Roberts, N., Ted Hughes: a Critical Study.

Hughes, Thomas (1822-96)

In his time a prominent public figure as a lawyer, leading Christian Socialist and Radical MP, Hughes is now remembered for his Tom Brown's Schooldays (1857), which launched a whole genre of boys' school tales. The novel records how Tom Brown triumphs over various schoolboy trials (including the archetypal bully, Flashman) finally to captain the school cricket team and become a solid citizen. The emphasis on sport is indicative of Hughes' affinity with the 'muscular Christianity' of ▷ Charles Kingsley.

While condemning bullying, the novel in many ways glorifies violence and is complacently sexist and chauvinistic. The book is also interesting for its first-hand (if fictionalized) account of ▷ Thomas Arnold's reform of the ▷ public school system at ▷ Rugby. The sequel, Tom Brown at Oxford (1861), is of interest for its evocation of the ▷ Oxford Movement.

➤ Lawrence, G.A.

Hugo, Victor(-Marie) (1802-85) French poet, playwright and novelist. Born in Besancon, he lived in Spain and Italy as a child, where his father, a General, followed Napoleon. Despite nostalgia for the Napoleonic age, Hugo was a confirmed democrat and was elected to the Assembly in 1848 and again in 1870. He lived in exile in the Channel Isles between 1851 and 1870 after the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon. As a young man he refused a military career in favour of literature; he gained favour through poetry and was made Chevalier de la Legion d'Honeur by 1825. He read and admired Chateaubriand, a proto-Romantic influence, and after the publication of his play Cromwell (1827) with its famous Preface, became a spearhead of the French Romantic movement. He married Adèle Foucher, and was much affected by the death of his daughter in 1845. He was made a peer and became an important figure, being buried with great ceremony in the Panthéon. His plays have lasted less well than the novels and poetry which are remarkable not for intellectual content so much as beauty, faith and feeling. Hugo's output was prolific: the plays include Hernani (1830) and Ruy Blas (1838); the novels Notre Dame de Paris (1831), the celebrated Les Misérables (1862), Les Travailleurs de la Mer (1866), L'Homme aui Rit (1869), His many collections of poems include Les Odes (1822), Odes et Ballades (1826), Les Orientales (1829), Les Feuilles d'Automne (1831), Les Chants du Crépuscule (1835), Les Voix Intérieures (1837), Les Rayons et les Ombres (1840), Les Châtiments (1853), Les Contemplations (1856) and La Légende des Siècles (1859, 1877, 1883).

French influence on English fiction.

Hulme, Keri (b 1947)

Novelist and short-story writer. Hulme was born in Christchurch and educated at Canterbury University, New Zealand. She has worked as a postwoman, television director and writer, as well as engaging in fishing and various forms of seasonal work on New Zealand's South Island, where she now lives in Okarito, Westland. Her family heritage includes not only Maori (the Kai Tahu tribe) but Scots and English. Maori cultural identity, language and history have been central to her work, together with environmental and feminist concerns. Her novel The Bone People (1983), which won the Booker Prize, is a mythic narrative of national regeneration based on Maori religious beliefs. Lost Possessions (1985) is a novella, Te Kaihul The Windeater (1986) a collection of short stories and The Silences Between [Moeraki Conversations] (1982) and Strands are volumes of poetry.

Hulme, Thomas Ernest (1883-1917) Poet and essayist. His attacks on 19th-century Romanticism and the verbosity that often expressed it were an important influence on the theory and practice of ⊳ Imagism as a poetry of concentration and verbal compression. His writings in support of a modern classicism that should be austere and authoritarian were also important for ▷ T. S. Eliot and ▷ Wyndham Lewis. His output as a poet was tiny: The Complete Poetical Works were published as an addendum to the Ripostes of > Ezra Pound in 1912, but his essays and > translations of writers like the French vitalist philosopher ⊳ Henri Bergson were of immense significance in the development of ⊳ modernism. See Speculations (ed. H. Read; 1924); Further Speculations (ed. S. Hynes; 1955).

Bib: Kermode, F., in Romantic Image; Roberts, M., T. E. Hulme.

Humanism

The word has two distinct uses: I the intellectually liberating movements in western Europe in the 15th and 16th centuries, associated with new attitudes to ancient Greek and Latin literature; 2 a modern movement for the advancement of humanity without reliance on supernatural religious beliefs.

I Humanism in its first sense had its beginnings in Italy as early as the 14th century, when its pioneer was the poet and scholar > Petrarch (1304-74), and reached its height (greatly stimulated by the recovery of lost manuscripts after the fall of Constantinople in 1453) throughout western Europe in the 16th century, when it first reached England. Its outstanding characteristic was a new kind of critical power. In the previous thousand years European civilization had above all been donated - even created - by the Church, which had put the literatures of the preceding Latin and Greek cultures to its own uses and had directed movements in thought and art through its authority over the religious orders and universities. The humanists began by criticizing and evaluating the Latin and Greek authors in the light of what they believed to be Roman and Greek standards of civilization. Some of the important consequences of humanism were these: the rediscovery of many ancient Greek and Latin works; the establishment of new standards in Greek and Latin scholarship; the assumption, which was to dominate English education until the present century, that a thorough basis in at least Latin literature was indispensable to the civilized man; the beginnings of what we nowadays regard as 'scientific thinking'; the introduction of the term Middle Ages for the period between the fall of the Roman Empire of the West (5th century AD) and the ➤ Renaissance, meaning by it a period of partial and inferior civilization. The most prominent of the European humanists was the Dutchman ➤ Erasmus, and the most prominent of the earlier English humanists was his friend > Sir Thomas More. The Church was not at first hostile to humanism; indeed such a Pope as Leo X (reigned 1513-21) was himself a humanist. When, in the second 30 years of the 16th century, the critical spirit became an increasingly aggressive weapon in the hands of the religious reformers - the Renaissance branching into the ➤ Reformation – the attitude of the Church hardened, and humanists in the later 16th century found themselves restricted by the religious quarrels of Protestants and Catholics, or obliged (like > Montaigne) to adopt a retiring and circumspect policy. In the 17th and 18th centuries, humanism hardened into neo-classicism.

2 Modern humanism assumes that man's command of scientific knowledge has rendered religion largely redundant. Its central principle is that 'man is the measure of all things', and elsewhere in Europe it is sometimes called 'hominism' (Lat. homo = man).

'Humanism' is also used as a general expression for any philosophy that proposes the full development of human potentiality. In this sense, 'Christian humanism', since the 16th century, has stood for the marriage of the humanist value attached to a conception of humanity based on reason with the Christian value based on Divine Revelation. An example of a Christian humanist movement is that of Cambridge ➤ Platonists in the 17th century. 'Liberal humanism' values the dignity of the individual and their inalienable right to justice, liberty, freedom of thought and the pursuit of happiness; its weakness lies in its concentration on the single subject and its failure to recognize the power of institutions in determining the conditions of life.

Bib: Kinney, A. F., Continental Humanist Poetics.

Hume, David (1711-76)

Philosopher. His first major work, Treatise of Human Nature (1739–40) did not arouse much interest. His Enquiry concerning Human Understanding (1748) and Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals (1751) are revisions and developments of the first work. His theory of knowledge was distinct from the theories of

John Locke and George Berkeley. Locke had said that ideas proceeded from sensations, ie from experience received through the senses, implying that we know mind only through matter; Berkeley that on the contrary we know matter only through our mental conceptions of it and that this proves the primacy of mind. Hume said that we cannot know of the existence of mind, except as a collective term covering memories, perceptions and ideas. He further argued that there was no necessity in the law of cause and effect, except in mathematics; what we call that law is inferred but not observed, a customary association confirmed by experience but with no provable necessity in it. Thus if Locke had seemed to validate science at the expense of religion and Berkeley the reverse, Hume seemed to drive at the roots of both. The graceful lucidity with which he expounded this extreme scepticism caused a wit to summarize his philosophy in the epigram: 'No mind! -It doesn't matter. No matter! - Never mind.' In his ethics, Hume held that virtue is what makes for happiness, both in ourselves and others, and that the two kinds of happiness are in accord with each other.

Hume also wrote the first systematic history of England, beginning, at first, with the reign of ▷ James I, when, as he considered with reasonable justice, the political differences of his own day had their start. His historical view is, however, marked by his political prejudices and, since he was a Scotsman, by his suspicion of English motives towards Scotland. His Essays Moral and Political (1741), and later volumes, contain acute comments on contemporary society. He differed from ▷ Rousseau by arguing against the long-established hypothesis that society is based on a 'social contract'. His economic writings were a stimulus to ▷ Adam Smith.

Bib: Mossner, E. C., The Life of Hume; Willey, B., The Eighteenth Century Background; Smith, N. K., The Philosophy of David Hume; Pears, D. F. (ed.), Hume: A Symposium.

Humour

The original meaning was 'liquid'. Ancient Greek and Latin medicine passed on to the ▶ Middle Ages the theory of four liquids (humours) in the human body: phlegm, blood, vellow bile or choler, and black bile or melancholy. Individual temperaments derived their quality from the predominance of one or other 'humour'; thus we still speak of 'phlegmatic' or very calm temperaments, 'sanguine' or ardent temperaments, 'choleric' or easily angered ones, and 'melancholy' or depressive temperaments. In the later 16th century a man's humour was his characteristic disposition, whether or not related to the original four physical humours. It could also have other meanings: his mania or obsession; his caprice or whim; his passing mood.

All these uses can be found in > Shakespeare and his contemporaries; eg in > Julius Caesar II.i., Portia begs her husband Brutus not to risk his health in the 'humours' (moistures) 'of the dank morning', but in the same scene Decius has declared that he can induce Caesar to go to the Capitol by giving 'his humour the true bent', ie by exploiting Caesar's disposition to superstition. In ➤ The Merchant of Venice IV.i, Shylock suggests that if an explanation is required for his preferring a pound of Antonio's flesh to 3,000 ducats, it should be put down to his caprice - 'Say it is my humour'; in > As You Like It IV.i, > Rosalind speaks of being in a 'holiday humour', ie in a gay mood.

678

> Ben Jonson in > Every Man in His Humour III.i, speaks of a humour as 'a monster bred in a man by self-love and affectation, and fed by folly', ie produced by egotism, encouraged by fashionable ostentation, and not restrained by good sense.

> Humours, Comedy of; Satire; Wit.

Humours, Comedy of

A form of drama especially associated with ▶ Ben Jonson. Starting from the traditional psychology that explained a temperament as the product of its physical constitution, Jonson treats > humour as the monstrous distortion of human nature by egotism and the selfregarding appetites, notably some form of greed. Partly timeless satire on human nature, the comedy of humours is also social satire since such personal extravagances are nourished by social tendencies: new prospects of wealth let loose unbounded lusts, as with Sir Epicure Mammon (in Jonson's ➤ The Alchemist); the rush of speculation on often fantastic 'projects' (ie financial enterprises requiring investment) encourages unlimited credulity in the foolish, eg Fitzdottrel in > The Devil is an Ass; the prevalence of avarice causes adventurers to overreach themselves in their contempt for their victims and in their own megalomania (Volpone and Mosca in ▷ Volpone). Jonson's world is a jungle of predators and victims, free from the restraint of religion, reason or respect for tradition. But the passions which Jonson exposes in their excess arise from human energies that are themselves fine and belong to that exhilaration in the scope for human fulfilment which is characteristic of the ➤ Renaissance. Jonson's more massive characters, though they condemn themselves by the exorbitance of their language, make speeches of great poetic splendour and force. The hyperbole of ➤ Christopher Marlowe in > Tamburlaine and > The Jew of Malta provides the tradition for Jonson's eloquence. Jonson's great comedies are Volpone and The Alchemist. The Devil is an Ass is nearly as fine, and ▷ Bartholomew Fair and ▷ Epicoene, or The Silent Woman are memorable. The mode was first established by ▷ Every Man in his Humour. > Sejanus is a satirical tragedy, with similarities to the great comedies.

Among Jonson's followers, ▷ Massinger (▷ A New Way to pay Old Debts, and ▷ The City Madam) and ▷ Middleton (▷ A Chaste Maid in Cheapside) are the best. ▶ Bakhtin, Mikhail.

Humphreys, Emýr (b 1919)

Novelist. Born at Prestatyn, Flintshire, but brought up in Trelawnyd, Emyr Humphreys was educated at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, where he read history, learnt Welsh, became a nationalist, and subsequently declared himself a conscientious objector, working first in agriculture in Pembrokeshire, later as a war relief worker in the Middle East, and afterwards in Italy. After his marriage, a brief teaching career was followed by another in BBC Wales as a drama producer, this leading to a lectureship in Drama at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, from which post he resigned in 1972 to devote himself full-time to writing. Emyr Humphreys' novels examine conscience through moral questioning within the context of realist novels, set generally in North Wales, with his characters drawn largely from the Welsh-speaking professional class, through which he impartially presents Nonconformity and refuses to indulge popular taste in novels that show concern for the future of society, in his vision of a Wales finally emerging from its betrayals. Emyr Humphreys has published a volume of short stories, Natives (1968), as well as four poetry collections, Ancestor Worship (1970), Landscapes (1976), The Kingdom of Brân (1979) and Pwyll a Rhiannon (1980). His novels, in chronological order, are as follows: The Little Kingdom (1946); The Voice of the Stranger (1949); A Change of Heart (1951); Hear and Forgive (1952); A Man's Estate (1955); The Italian Wife (1957); A Toy Epic (1958); The Gift (1963); Outside the House of Baal (1965); National Winner (1971); Flesh and Blood (1974); The Best of Friends (1978); The Anchor-Tree (1980); Jones (1984); Salt of the Earth (1985); An Absolute Hero (1986); Open Secret (1988); and Bonds of Attachment (1991). Important for understanding the themes in his novels, The Taliesin Tradition (1983) examines the development of Wales through its cultural, social and political history, especially its struggle to achieve and assert its national identity beside that of its more demographically powerful English neighbour. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Humphry Clinker, The Expedition of (1771) A ⊳ picaresque novel by ⊳ Tobias Smollett, written in letters. It describes a tour of England and Scotland made by Mr Matthew Bramble and his family party - his sister Tabitha, his nephew and niece Jerry and Lydia, and the maid Winifred Jenkins. Humphry Clinker is a coachman who joins the party on the way, turns out to be Mr Bramble's illegitimate son, and marries Winifred. Characterization is strongly marked but superficial, the chief object being to characterize the society of the time realistically and with an often coarse humour. This is usually held to be the most successful of Smollett's novels, and shows something of the humane sympathies of the 16th-century Spanish novelist Cervantes, whose Don Quixote Smollett had himself translated in 1755.

Hundred Years' War

The name given to the succession of wars between the kings of England and France between 1338 and 1453. The causes were partly territorial and partly economic. The territorial causes were especially bound up with the possession by the English kings of the large duchy of Aquitaine, first acquired through marriage by > Henry II of England; as the French kings grew stronger, they increasingly coveted this large slice out of their territory. The economic causes were connected with Flanders; the Flemish cloth manufacturing towns were the importers of English wool, but they owed political allegiance to the French king; it was largely to divert this allegiance that ➤ Edward III first laid claim to the French crown. To these causes may be added the restlessness of the English and French nobility, and the popularity of the war with them as a profitable and advantageous pursuit - it was the peasantry who were the main sufferers of the campaigns. Scotland was much of the time an ally of France, either sending troops to assist the French or fighting along her own border.

Militarily, the war was notable for the great importance of the infantry soldier, especially in the form of the English > yeoman archer. Hitherto the armoured knight on horseback had dominated the battlefield; the victory of the foot-soldiers at > Crécy, Poitiers (1356) and above all > Agincourt not only changed methods of warfare but looked forward to important social changes. The aristocracy were in future more dependent than hitherto on the support of the common people and this in turn implied a rise of national feeling.

The outstanding phases of the struggle

I The first phase under Edward III until the Treaty of Brétigny (1360) went strongly to the English advantage, though Edward renounced his claim to the French crown.

2 Under Defense When the English had another period of brilliant success and by the Treaty of Troyes (1420) Henry was recognized as heir to the French throne; his baby son was acknowledged king of France and England in 1422. Part of the English success was due to the assistance provided to Henry by the French Duke of Burgundy.

3 In the last phase, however, the English were completely defeated and driven from France except for the port of Calais, retained until 1558. This was the phase which has become memorable for the exploits of the French peasant patriot, ➤ Joan of Arc (Jeanne d'Arc), burned for heresy and sorcery at Rouen in 1431.

Hungry Forties, The

The decade 1840–50, so called because bad harvests caused serious food shortages, leading to mass agitation for abolition of the tax on imported corn (Anti-Corn Law League) and for a more democratic political system (the ▷ Chartist movement). It was in the years 1845–51 that the Irish famine took place: about 10 per cent of the population died from hunger and disease, and mass emigration ensued from those remaining.

➤ Corn Law, Repeal of the; Free Trade; Social Problem novel.

Hunt, Leigh (1784-1859)

Journalist and poet. With his brother John, he edited the boldly radical weekly periodical ▷ The Examiner until he gave up his share in it in 1821. His outspoken attack on the Prince Regent in 1813 brought two years' imprisonment for the brothers, but they continued to edit the journal in prison. He was joint editor with > Lord Byron of the short-lived quarterly, the Liberal, and he edited or had a hand in several other periodicals, doing much to publicize the work of both > John Keats and > Percy Bysshe Shelley. His essays, popular at the time, are mostly effusions on trivial topics, though his busy and active life makes his autobiography (1850) one of his most memorable works. Later in life he was caricatured as the genial sponger. Mr Skimpole, in Charles Dickens' Bleak House (1852-3).

The Hunt literary circle was nicknamed the 'Cockney School' by the critic John G. Lockhart, indicating a certain vulgarity. Hunt's own poetry does indeed display a facile cosiness of tone. However, its most prominent technical features: a cloving physicality of imagery, and double or triple rhymes with feminine endings, were enthusiastically adopted by his protégé, Keats. Keats' early poem 'I stood tiptoe upon a little hill' is dedicated to Hunt and closely imitates the manner of Hunt's best work, The Story of Rimini (1816), from which it borrows such vocabulary as 'blisses', 'tresses', 'bower', 'blushes'. The characteristic rhyme 'blisses'/'kisses' occurs in both poems, and other rhymes of Keats ('posy'/'rosy', 'flitting'/'quitting', 'ever wrestle'/'ever nestle') recall such rhymes as 'flushes', 'blushes', 'dissemble'/'in a tremble' in The Story of Rimini. Bib: Blunden, E., Leigh Hunt's Examiner Examined; Blunden, E., Life.

Hunter, Rachel (1754-1813)

Novelist. Hunter became a novelist in her 40s, and at the time her novels appeared to be somewhat self-conscious of their narrative form, and were mocked by ⊳ Jane Austen. Today, however, we might call them 'metafictional', that is, writing which deliberately questions the relationship between fiction and reality by drawing attention to its own status as a linguistic construct. For example, in Hunter's The Unexpected Legacy (1804) the Preface is written by an author who quotes an attack on novels by a friend; both characters are fictitious, although as they appear in the Preface the reader expects them to be real. Similarly, in Lady Maclairn, The Victim of Villainy (1806) the author is supposedly only the editor of the letters, and, adding to the complexity, she places herself within the novel as a character, ending up as a governess to the heroine's family. In addition to the adoption of multiple authorial voices, Hunter also lavers plot and time to create a complex interweaving of stories, each creating a different relationship between 'fiction' and 'reality'. Thematically, she seems to have been fascinated by the idea of mixed racial marriages; this is the concern of Lady Maclairn and her first published novel, Letitia, or The Castle without a Spectre (1801), the latter of which may also be classed as a ➤ Gothic novel.

Hutcheson, Francis (1694-1746)

Scottish philosopher, who started his own private academy of learning in Dublin, and later became professor of moral science and natural philosophy at Glasgow University. He built on ➤ Locke's distinction between sensation and reflection, and > Shaftesbury's idea of 'moral sense', to argue for an innate code of conduct and ethics that has nothing to do with reason. This, he maintained, is almost as powerful as the instict for self-preservation, and ensures that the performance of virtuous action is pleasurable. He defined the greatest virtue as that most in accord with the general good, coining the phrase 'the greatest happiness for the greatest numbers', which was taken up later by ➤ Bentham and other Utilitarians (▶ Utilitarianism). He also developed a theory of aesthetics, suggesting that the appreciation of beauty, like the moral code, proceeds from an inner sense, rather than from reason or learning. His major works include An Inquiry into the Original of Our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue (1725), An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of The Passions and Affections (1726) and, his most famous, A System of Moral Philosophy (published posthumously in 1755). He is considered as a pioneer of the 'Scottish School' of philosophy, influencing > Hume, > Adam Ferguson and, in a later generation, > Adam Smith, as well as the Benthamites. His ideas contributed to the growth of > sensibility. Bib: Blackstone, W. T., Hutcheson and Contemporary Ethical Theory; Bryson, G., Man and Society: The Scottish Inquiry of the Eighteenth Century; Fox, C. (ed.), Psychology and Literature in the Eighteenth Century.

Hutchinson, Lucy (1620-c 1675) Prolific writer. Lucy Hutchinson displayed her immense intelligence as a child (she could read perfectly by the time she was four) and excelled her brothers at scholarly activity. Although her family thought this would repel any future husband, it was her quiet learning that attracted John Hutchinson and their marriage, which lasted from 1638 until his death in 1664 was a deeply romantic one. As a Parliamentarian, her husband was imprisoned at the Restoration, and her ⊳ biography of him (Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson, pub. 1806) was partly written to ensure that their children knew about and admired his life. However, she was also aware of the similar work by the Royalist ➤ Margaret Cavendish. Lucy Hutchinson also translated ➤ Lucretius and Virgil, wrote several Christian tracts (she became a > Baptist in 1646), and an > autobiography.

> Translation.

Bib: Fraser, A., The Weaker Vessel.

Huxley, Aldous (1894-1963)

Novelist and essayist. His novels are 'novels of ideas', involving conversations which disclose viewpoints rather than establish characters, and having a polemical rather than an imaginative theme. An early practitioner of the form was > Thomas Love Peacock, and it is his novels that Huxley's earlier ones recall: Crome Yellow (1921); Antic Hay (1923); Those Barren Leaves (1925). Point Counter Point (1928) is his bestknown novel and is an attempt to convey a social image of the age with more imaginative depth and substance, but his polemical and inquisitorial mind was better suited to Brave New World (1932), in which a future society is presented so as to bring out the tendencies working in contemporary civilization and to show their disastrous consequences. Fastidious, abhorring what he saw to be the probable obliteration of human culture by 20th-century addiction to technology, but sceptical of religious solutions he was the grandson of the great 19thcentury agnostic biologist > Thomas Huxley he turned in the 1930s to eastern religions such as Buddhism for spiritual support. This is shown in Eyeless in Gaza (1936). This and his last books – Afier Many a Summer (1939), Ape and Essence (1948), Brave New World Revisited (1958) – return to the discursive form of his earlier work. His novels and his essays (Collected Edition; 1959) are all concerned with how to resist the debasement of 'mass culture' and to sustain the identity of the human spirit without the aid of faith in supernatural religion of the Christian kind.

Bib: Bowering, P., Aldous Huxley: Ferns, C. S., Aldous Huxley, Novelist; Woodcock, G., Dawn and the Darkest Hour.

Huxley, Thomas Henry (1825–95)
Biologist. He was a supporter of ▷ Darwin's theory of evolution and combined philosophical speculation with technical exposition. His many works, essays, lectures and articles included the influential publications: Man's Place in Nature (1863), The Physical Basis of Life (1868), Science and Culture (1881) and Science and Morals (1886). He held that scientific discoveries had neither given support to nor discredited religious faith, and he invented the term ▷ agnosticism for this attitude to religion.

Hymns

The word 'hymn' is of ancient Greek origin; it meant a song of praise to the gods. Such songs have been important in all the religions that have lain behind European culture; Latin hymns were composed and sung in the Christian churches from the earliest days of Christianity, and the Jewish hymns, or ➤ Psalms, are shared by the Jewish and the Christian religions.

The English hymn began its history in the religious > Reformation under > Edward VI when the abandonment of the Latin form of service produced the need for hymns in English. The Psalms were the obvious resource, but they had been translated into English prose. Accordingly, in 1549, the first or 'Old Version' of metrical Psalms was published; the authors were Sternhold and Hopkins. The most famous of this collection, and the only one now generally known, is the 'Old Hundredth' (Psalm 100): 'All people that on earth do dwell'. The Old Version of the metrical Psalms was replaced by the 'New Version' (1696) by Tate and Brady. From this book, two psalms are still familiar: 'Through all the changing scenes of life' and 'As pants the hart for cooling streams'.

The majority of hymns in English, however, were not metrical Psalms, but specially composed original poems. The great period of English hymn composition was the 17th and 18th centuries. However, it is necessary to distinguish between short religious poems which have been adopted as hymns, and poems which were composed as hymns. Some of the best religious poets of the 17th century, notably > Herbert and > Vaughan, produced work in the first group. But the first professional hymn writer (as distinct from the composers of the metrical Psalms) was the Anglican bishop, Thomas Ken (1637-1711). His best hymns, eg 'Awake my soul', and 'Glory to thee, my God, this night', are distinguished poetry.

It was however, the ▷ Dissenters – the ▷ Puritan movements excluded from the Church of England by the Act of Uniformity (1662) – and their ▷ Evangelical sympathizers within the Church of England, rather than the orthodox Anglicans, who were at first most active in hymn-writing. The Church of England had a set form of worship in the Book of Common Prayer; hymns (in addition to the prose versions of the Psalms) were allowed in this service, but no special provision was made for them. But the > Dissenting sects had no set form of worship; hymns for this reason alone were important to them. They were important also for three other reasons: Dissent was strong among classes in touch with traditions of > ballad and folksong; most forms of Dissenting faith demanded strong participation by the congregation in the act of worship; in the 17th century, Dissenters underwent persecution, and communal, militant hymn-singing encouraged their spirit of endurance. > John Bunyan included hymns in his > Pilgrim's Progress, written in prison; one of these - 'Who would true valour see' is famous. But the greatest of the dissenting hymn-writers is > Isaac Watts. His language combines the homeliness of the broadside ballads of the city streets with the dignity and musical cadence of biblical English. Charles Wesley, the brother of the Methodist leader > John Wesley, had greater versatility than Watts, and was very prolific; his best hymns are impressive though without the power of the best by Watts. Other notable 18th-century hymn-writers were > Reginald Heber, > Alice Flowerdew, John Newton (1725-1807) and ➤ William Cowper. All these had at least some of the force of common speech and spontaneous emotion in their hymns. Beside them, the hymns of the orthodox Anglican, > Joseph Addison, are cold, though dignified and sincere.

In the 19th century, partly under the influence of the > Oxford Movement, the Church of England reversed its policy of discouraging the use of hymns in its forms of worship. Hymnwriters became numerous; 220 Church of England hymn-books were published between 1800 and 1880, including the official compilation, Hymns Ancient and Modern (1861). It was an age in which strong religious feeling struggled with bitter doubt, often in the same mind; the struggle is exemplified in 'Lead kindly light' by Cardinal Newman. The 20th century has produced few hymns in comparison with the 19th, but there has been a small resurgence in the last 20 years with greater freedom of language and introduction of folk-song-like melodies.

Hypatia, or, New Foes with an Old Face (1853) An ▷ historical novel by ▷ Charles Kingsley, originally published in ▷ Fraser's Magazine 1852-53 and set in Alexandria in the 5th century AD.

Hyperbole

▶ Figures of Speech.

Hyperion

In Greek myth, a Titan, son of the sky god Uranus and the earth goddess Ge. He was one of the greatest of the Titans, and often identified with the sun, of whom in the original myth he was the father; the sun-god was Helios.

➤ Hyperion by Keats.

Hyperion (1820) The Fall of Hyperion (1856)

Two fragments of an epic poem in blank verse by > John Keats, written in 1818-19, the second (The Fall of Hyperion) unrevised. Keats' aim was to rival ⊳ John Milton's philosophical profundity by treating a theme of divine conflict. The Greek myth of the war of the Olympian Gods and the primal Titans is adapted to the aestheticist idea that 'first in beauty should be first in might'. Hyperion (published in 1820) opens with a magnificent scene in which Saturn, chief of the Titans, mourns his lost power, while Hyperion, the only Titan as yet unfallen, roams uneasily round his palace. Apollo, the destined Olympian successor to Hyperion is confronted by Mnemosyne who begins to initiate him into godhead. At this point the fragment breaks off, Keats' explanation being that it was too Miltonic: 'I prefer the native music . . . to Milton's cut by feet.' However it is difficult to imagine how the approaching beauty-contest between Hyperion and Apollo could have been related in terms of epic conflict without absurdity, or how the moral difficulties of the theme could have been overcome. It is indeed, the highly Miltonic passages concerning the suffering of the Titans which are the most poetically moving parts of the surviving fragment.

The Fall of Hyperion (not published until 1856) escapes from narrative problems into personal preoccupations, opening with a dream in which the poet finds himself undergoing a symbolic test of dedication in the temple of (Juno) Moneta, the Counsellor. After a powerful discussion of the nature of the poetic calling, containing some of Keats' most mature verse, the story is retold as before, in the same Miltonic manner, breaking off even earlier than the previous version, as the same narrative problems loomed ahead.

Iambic foot (Iamb, Iambus)

The classical verse foot of a short syllable followed by a long one, which in English is an unaccented syllable followed by an accented one. The > Alexandrine has six such feet.

Ibsen, Henrik (1828–1906)

Norwegian dramatist; his working life (1850-1900) began in a period when the literary quality of drama had fallen low everywhere in Europe, and perhaps lowest of all in Britain. By the end of the century Ibsen's example had revived interest in the drama everywhere and had profoundly influenced a number of other important dramatists, such as > Strindberg in Sweden, ➤ Chekhov in Russia, and ➤ Shaw in Britain. Ibsen began by writing romantic and historical dramas. Then, in self-imposed exile, he wrote his great poetic dramas, Brand (1866) and Peer Gynt (1867). About 10 years later he started on the prose dramas, the sequence of which continued to 1900. The first group of these treated social problems with startling boldness: Pillars of Society (1877); A Doll's House (1879); Ghosts (1881); An Enemy of the People (1882). After this, his work became increasingly psychological, anticipating the 20th century in the handling of inner conflicts, selfdeceptions, and frustrations: The Wild Duck (1884); Rosmersholm (1886); The Lady from the Sea (1888); Hedda Gabler (1890). Although these plays operated within > Naturalistic conventions, Ibsen developed dramatic strategies to show far more than simply surface processes, through the use of dramatic metaphors and symbolism. In the last group of plays the symbolism takes precedence over the realism: The Master Builder (1892); Little Eyolf (1894); John Gabriel Borkman (1896), and When We Dead Awaken (1000). It was the social realist phase which most influenced Shaw, and it was Shaw who was the most eloquent introducer of Ibsen's art to the British public, particularly in his book Quintessence of Ibsenism (1891). The English dramatic revival of 1800-1014 (as distinct from the Anglo-Irish one by ➤ Yeats and ⊳ Synge happening at the same time) thus consisted predominantly of realist plays dealing with social problems, by such writers as Shaw, > Galsworthy, > Granville-Barker. The psychological and symbolical phases of Ibsen's work have had, together with the writing of Chekhov and Strindberg, greater influence since 1920.

Bib: Bever, E., Ibsen: The Man and his Work (trans. Wells, M.); Mever, M., Henrik Ibsen: A Biography, 3 vols.; Williams, R., Drama from Ibsen to Brecht.

Idealism

In philosophy, any form of thought which finds reality not in the mind of the perceiver (the subject), nor in the thing experienced (the object) but in the idea in which they meet. In its earliest form idealism was developed by ➤ Socrates and his disciple ➤ Plato. Their influence was important in the 16th-century Europe of the ➤ Renaissance, eg on ➤ Edmund Spenser. A modern idealist, > F. H. Bradley, had as strong an influence on the poet > T.S. Eliot.

In ordinary usage, idealism means the ability to conceive perfection as a standard by which ordinary behaviour and achievement is to be judged. This view is really an inheritance from Plato, who believed that earthly realities were imperfect derivatives of heavenly perfections. To 'idealize' a thing or person is to present the image of what ought to be, rather than what experience knows in ordinary life. In imaginative art we have come to consider this as a fault, but to a 16th-century critic such as > Sir Philip Sidney poetry existed for just such a purpose. This is not, however, the kind of influence which Bradley had on Eliot; Bradley maintained that no reality existed outside the spirit, and he influenced Eliot towards interpreting the phenomena and dilemmas of his age in religious terms.

In modern critical theory idealism is associated with the anti-materialist impulse to denigrate history and social context. The meaning of this term is complicated by its history within the discipline of philosophy, and by its common usage as a description of human behaviour not susceptible to the 'realistic' impulses of selfinterest. The term is sometimes used in critical theory to denote the primacy of thought, and to indicate a particular kind of relationship between writer and text where it is a sequence of ideas that act as the deep structure for events and relationships.

Ideology

This term is defined by > Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (1800-95) in The German Ideology as 'false consciousness'. A further meaning, which Raymond Williams traces to the usage initiated by Napoleon Bonaparte, denotes a fanatical commitment to a particular set of ideas, and this has remained a dominant meaning in the sphere of modern right-wing politics, especially in relation to the question of dogmatism. The term has come to the fore again in the ⊳ post-structuralist Marxism of ➤ Louis Althusser, where it is distinguished from 'science'. Ideology here is defined as the means whereby, at the level of ideas, every social group produces and reproduces the conditions of its own existence. Althusser argues that 'Ideology is a "representation" of the imaginary relationship of individuals to their real conditions of existence' (Lenin and Philosophy; 1971). In order to ensure that political power remains the preserve of a dominant class, individual 'subjects' are assigned particular positions in society. A full range of social institutions, such as the Church, the family and the education system, are the means through which a particular hierarchy of values is disseminated. The point to emphasize, however, is that ideology disguises the real material relations between the different social classes, and this knowledge can only be retrieved through a theoretically aware analysis of the interrelationships that prevail within society at any one time. A ruling class sustains itself in power, partly by coercion (repressive apparatuses), but also by negotiation with other subordinate classes (> hegemony; Althusser's ideological state of apparatuses).

Social change occurs when the ideology of the dominant class is no longer able to contain the contradictions existing in real social relations. The function of literary texts in this process is complex. In one sense they reproduce ideology, but also they may offer a critique of it by 'distancing' themselves from the ideology with which they are historically implicated. Since all language is by definition 'ideological', insofar as it is motivated by particular sorts of social relationship, the language of a literary text can very often be implicated in an ideology of which it is not aware. The text's implication in ideology can only be excavated through a critical process which seeks to uncover the assumption upon which it is based. Bib: Althusser, L., For Marx; Thompson, J.B., Studies in The Theory of Ideology.

Idler, The

Essays contributed weekly by ▷ Samuel Johnson to the Universal Chronicle or Weekly Gazette from April 1758 to April 1760. As compared to his ▷ Rambler papers, they contain more humour, and more flexible treatment of the fictional characters such as ▷ Dick Minim, but they have the same kind of emotional force and moral gravity which distinguish Johnson as a periodical essayist.

Idylls of the King, The

A series of poems by ➤ Alfred Tennyson on episodes from the legends of King Arthur. The earliest and most famous fragment is the Morte D'Arthur (1842), but the series really begins in 1859 with Enid, Vivien, Elaine, Guinevere, followed by (1869) The Coming of Arthur, The Holy Grail, Pelleas and Ettare, The Passing of Arthur; (1871) The Lost Tournament; (1872) Gareth and Lynette; (1885) Balin and Balan. Enid was later divided into The Marriage of Geraint and Geraint and Enid. Morte D'Arthur was included in The Passing of Arthur. The whole series was intended to have a loose epic structure; single-minded virtue ideally conceived is gradually overcome by evil through the sinful passion of Lancelot and Arthur's wife, Guinevere. Extremely popular at the time, the Idylls have chiefly harmed Tennyson's reputation since. They were written under the influence of the ▷ Pre-Raphaelite movement with its romanticization of the Middle Ages. Later the poems struck readers as bodiless, with the life neither of the Middle Ages nor of 19th century. However, parts of the Idylls, notably Vivien with its powerful evocation of unleashed sexuality and Morte d'Arthur with its impotent image of kingship, have recently demanded a less complacent response.

➤ Medievalism.

Igraine (Igerne, Ygerna)

Mother of ▷ King Arthur. Igraine, the wife of Gorlois, the Duke of Cornwall, is desired by ▷ King Uther, whose pursuit of her triggers a war with Gorlois. Uther, however, gains access to ▷ Tintagel and to Igraine by means of ▷ Merlin's magical powers which allow Uther to take on the appearance of the Duke of Cornwall. Arthur is conceived as a result of this trick and Igraine becomes Uther's wife after her husband's death. In ▷ Malory's Morte D'Arthur, Igraine has three daughters by Gorlois, ▷ Morgause, Elaine and ▷ Morgan la Fay.

Iliad

An > epic by the ancient Greek poet > Homer. Its subject is the siege of ➤ Troy by an alliance of Greek states; the occasion of the war is the elopement of Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of the Greek state of Sparta, with Paris, a son of Priam, king of Troy. The poem is in 24 books; it begins with the Greeks already besieging Troy. In Book I the chief Greek hero Achilles, quarrels with the Greek commander-in-chief, Agamemnon, king of Argos and brother to Menelaus. Achilles withdraws from the fighting, and returns to it only in Book XIX after the killing of his friend Patroclus by the chief Trojan hero, Hector. Achilles kills Hector in XXII, and the poem ends with Hector's funeral in Troy. Hector is the principal hero of the epic, much of which is taken up with his exploits, as well as with those of other Greek and Trojan heroes and with the intervention of the gods on either side. There is much speculation about the date of the historical events and that of the poem respectively. Present opinion seems to be that the historical city of Troy fell early in the 12th century BC and that the poem was written about 300 years later. The surviving text dates from the 2nd century BC.

The Iliad has had an enormous influence on the literature of Europe. With Homer's ▷ Odyssey, it set the standard for epic poetry, which until the 19th century was considered the noblest poetic form. Its first successor was the ▷ Aeneid (1st century BC) by the Roman poet Virgil. The poem has been several times translated into English verse; the most notable versions are those by ▷ George Chapman (1611) and ▷ Alexander Pope (1720).

Imagism

A poetic movement founded by a group led by ▷ Ezra Pound in 1912; it published four anthologies – Des Imagistes, 1914; Some Imagists, 1915–16–17. The inspiration came from the ideas of ▷ T. E. Hulme (1886–1917) who was an anti-romantic, believing that words were being used by poets to obscure emotions instead of to clarify them. The kind of poet he had in mind was the Victorian ▷ Algernon Swinburne. The Imagist credo may be summarized as:

- I Use the language of common speech, but use it exactly.
- 2 Create new rhythms for new moods.
- 3 Allow complete freedom in subject.
- 4 Present an image, but avoid vagueness.
- 5 Produce poetry that is hard and clear.6 Concentration is the essence of poetry.

Pound was an American, though he was then living in England; Imagism was an Anglo-American movement, with an English periodical, The Egoist (started 1914), and an American one, Poetry (from 1912). Pound was himself the most distinguished of the Imagists, though he separated from the movement in 1914. Notable contributors to the anthologies included > D. H. Lawrence, > James Joyce and > H. D. The movement was more organized and distinct in its aims than most English literary movements.

> Vorticism.

Bib: Jones, P. (ed.), Imagist Poetry.

Imitation, Renaissance Theories of Renaissance, like medieval, theories of imitation were of considerable importance to writers and rhetoricians of the 16th and 17th centuries. However, imitation did not mean copying or plagiarism; nor was it suggestive of ▷ translation. Instead, imitation was the process by which Renaissance writers invested their own discourse with authority, aesthetic form and structure by assimilating texts from the ≥ classical past and incorporating them into their own work. A frequently used ➤ metaphor to describe the process is that of digestion. When ⊳ Ben Jonson, for example, sets out to describe an ideal of rural life and aristocratic benevolence in his poem 'To Penshurst', he not only evokes the Kentish countryside and the family who dwell at Penshurst, he organizes his description according to models found in his reading in Virgil, ➤ Juvenal, Martial (c AD 40-104) and other classical authors. Imitation is, in this sense, much more than allusion or reference. Rather, it is the means whereby the Renaissance writer could place his/her own work within a tradition of public or private utterance. Bib: Cave, T., The Cornucopian Text: Problems of Writing in the French Renaissance; Greenes, T. M., The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry.

Imitations of Horace (1733–78)
Adaptations by ➤ Alexander Pope of the ➤ satires and epistles of the Latin poet

> Horace, who had already served as a model for satire by > John Oldham, the > Earl of Rochester and ➤ Jonathan Swift. The aim of the imitation is not merely to translate, but to adapt the Roman model, elaborating the parallel between Augustan (➤ Caesar, Augustus) Rome and modern Britain. Sometimes the relation between original and imitation produces ➤ mockheroic irony as when Pope imitates Horace's verse epistle to Caesar Augustus. He addresses the stodgy Hanoverian George II (who had been christened Augustus), as though he were the great Emperor, and praises 'Your Arms, your Actions, your Repose . . .!' More usually Pope asserts a Horatian detachment from the vices of the city, and praises the self-sufficient retirement of the country gentleman: "Tis true, no Turbots dignify my boards,/ But gudgeons, flounders, what my Thames affords'. The Tiber becomes the Thames, Rome becomes London, and Horace's estate becomes Pope's house with its five acres at Twickenham. Despite, or perhaps because of, the Latin parallel these poems are among Pope's most intimate works.

Impersonality

A key idea in much > Modernist aesthetic theory and the criticism which stemmed from it. > T. S. Eliot, for example, in a famous essay 'Tradition and the Individual Talent' (1919), argued that writers need to surrender their personalities in writing significant works and that craftsmanship and tradition are more important than the individual. Much early 20th-century criticism (by for example, I. A. Richards, F. R. Leavis and the American New Critics) followed this line, often under the direct influence of Eliot and others with similar views. With various emphases, all held that critics should confine their attention to 'the words on the page' and should not consider, for example, the significance of a writer's life.

➤ Author; ➤ Intentional Fallacy.

Implied author

The notional possessor of the set of attitudes and beliefs implied by the totality of a text; distinguished from the 'real' or biographical author. The distinction is necessary because a text may imply a set of beliefs (and perhaps a personality) which the author does not, in life, possess, and because different texts by the same author often imply different values.

Implied reader

A term developed on analogy with the implied author and used especially in reader-response and reception theory. It refers to the sort of reader which a novel (or other text) seems to expect or demand; the implied reader often corresponds roughly to some actual group of readers, though it is also quite possible to have an implied reader who does not correspond even to a single actual reader. There are a range of related terms which differ in meaning to various degrees, including the ideal reader, the intended reader, the postulated reader and the inscribed reader.

Bib: Freund, E., The Return of the Reader: Reader-Response Criticism.

Importance of Being Earnest, The (1895) A comedy by \triangleright Oscar Wilde subtitled ATrivial Comedy for Serious People, and first performed in 1895. The title is a subtle play on the word 'earnest' which functions as a man's name - one which 'inspires absolute confidence' - and an indication of one of the most pervading characteristics of the era. It was > Thomas Carlyle who urged the Victorians to 'earnestness' in thought and deed and Wilde satirizes the condition mercilessly. The play contains sharp social observation delivered in apparently throwaway lines and covers such topics as the morals and marriages of the upper and lower classes, lady novelists and the early > feminist movement. It was Wilde's last and most enduring play.

In Memoriam A. H. H.

A sequence of poems by ➤ Alfred Tennyson inspired by the death of Arthur Henry Hallam, at twenty-two, in 1833. He was a brilliant young man of great promise and hopefulness; Tennyson a year or two older, had found in his friendship with Hallam a strong resource against his own disposition to despondency and scepticism. Hallam's death crystallized for him the difficulty of spiritual affirmation in an age of upheaval in established ideas. Science was already shaking traditional certainties and contributing to the feeling that the reality of nature itself was perpertual flux: there are echoes in In Memoriam of ➤ Lyell's Principles of Geology (1830–3).

The poem was written between 1833 and 1850 and is structurally loose or fragmented it was to be called 'Fragments of an Elegy'. It consists of 130 sections, each section being lyric in stanzas of four eight-syllable lines rhyming abba - a form used by Ben Jonson (1572-1637) in his elegy 'Though Beauty be The Mark of praise'. The sequence is a single poem arranged in three sections divided by Christmas Odes, and the whole concluded by a marriage-song for the wedding of Tennyson's sister; another sister, Emily, had been engaged to Hallam, Various moods of grief are expressed, and a reaching out to restored confidence and hope; in places Tennyson engages in debate between religion and science. Despite much disagreement about the work as a whole, In Memoriam is usually acknowledged to be Tennyson's finest ➤ Atheism; Agnosticism; Homosexuality.

achievement

Inchbald, Mrs Elizabeth (1753-1821)

Novelist, dramatist and actress. Among other plays she translated ▷ Kotzebue's Lovers' Voms from the German, and this is the play rehearsed in ▷ Jane Austen's Mansfield Park. This, and some of the other 19 plays she wrote or adapted, were popular successes: Jane Austen assumes knowledge of it by the reader. However, her best works are her two novels: A Simple Story (1791) and Nature and Art (1796).

Bib: Littlewood, S.R., Elizabeth Inchbald and her Circle.

Independent, The

A daily newspaper, founded in 1985 and aimed at a serious readership. As its name suggests, it aims for a relative independence of political viewpoint, which in practice means a centre position.

Indian Queen, The (1664)

Rhymed > heroic drama, the first such play to be staged in London, by Sir Robert Howard (1626-98) and ⊳ John Dryden. The Peruvian Montezuma, having defeated the Mexicans, is offered any object of his desire in reward by the Inca. He asks for the hand of Orazia, but is scornfully refused. In a rage, he joins the Mexicans and reverses the victory. The Mexican king's sister Zempoalla is in love with Montezuma, but when she realizes he loves Orazia, she tries to kill her rival. Traxalla, a general who loves Orazia, and who aspires to the throne of Mexico, steps in and threatens to kill Montezuma if Orazia dies. Eventually Zempoalla gives up hope of winning Montezuma's love, and orders the seizure and execution of Montezuma and Orazia, as well as the execution of the now imprisoned Inca, as blood sacrifices on the altar of the gods. Her plan fails, however, and at the end Montezuma is revealed as the son of the Mexican queen, and hence as heir to the throne. He kills Traxalla in a fight, Zempoalla stabs herself, the Inca is appeased by Montezuma's new status, and gives Orazia to him, and the play ends with a speech on the vagaries of fate. Throughout, the heroism of Montezuma is contrasted with Zempoalla's disdain for honour.

Indulgences

Medieval documents bearing the seal of the Pope or of a bishop and granting the recipient remission of punishment in the next world for sins committed in this. They were freely sold in the > Middle Ages by licensed 'Pardoners', and were an easy way for the Church (and also for the pardoners) to raise money. Reformers such as the Englishman > Wycliffe and the German > Luther were fiercely critical of them. > Chaucer made grim comedy of them (> Pardoner's Tale) and his contemporary Langland regarded them sceptically (▷ Piers Plowman, Passus VII).

Industrial Revolution, The

Normally understood as the succession of changes which transformed England from a predominantly rural and agricultural country into a predominantly urban and manufacturing one in the 18th and 19th centuries, and especially between 1750 and 1850. It was the first such revolution in the modern world.

England was already a great trading nation by the beginning of the 18th century, with much private capital ready for investment. Its oceanic position, which ensured easy access to overseas markets, coupled with the fact that its irregular indented coastline meant that most places were within reach of water transport, contributed to its rapid development. In addition Britain was relatively rich in natural resources such as water, salt, iron, clay and, above all, coal.

Not only was trade free to move throughout the British Isles but there was considerable freedom of movement between the social classes. English middle-class religious belief emphasized the individual conscience as the guide to conduct as well as the moral excellence of sober, industrious employment. These values encouraged self-reliance and enterprising initiative. Although those who belonged to the Nonconformist or Dissenting sects which rejected the Church of England were barred from political rights, and Parliament (controlled by the aristocracy) was far from truly representative, the political leaders of the country were extremely interested in commerce, which they were ready to participate in and profit from. The bent of the whole nation from the early 17th century had been increasingly practical and the steadily growing population provided a market which invited exploitation by various methods of improved production. Once the process started, it gathered its own momentum, which was increased by the existence of large supplies of convenient fuel in the country's coalfields. Agriculture also contributed to industrial growth: the landowners were zealous farmers and their improved methods of cultivation not only freed much labour which then became available for employment in the town factories, but increased the food supplies available for the towns. Finally, the 18th century (in contrast to the 17th) was a time of relative peace and stability in Britain, undisturbed by the wars in which her armies and money were engaged across the sea.

In the textile industry, already established since the 15th century as the principal industry, a number of machines were invented which increased production and reduced labour but were too large for the cottages where the processes had hitherto been carried out. They therefore had to be housed in ▷ factories and mills where large numbers of employees worked together. These machines were at first operated by water power. In the iron industry, the principal fuel used had been charcoal, the supply of which was becoming exhausted. However, improved methods of smelting by coal were discovered and ironmasters set up their blast furnaces in the neighbourhood of the coalfields of the north Midlands and north of England.

Most important of all, in 1769 James Watt patented an adaptation of his steam engine to the machines used in the textile industry; this consequently ceased to depend on water power and concentrated itself in the north of England to be near the coalfields. An important result was the immense expansion in the manufacture of cotton cloth. An extensive system of canals was constructed in the 18th century for the transport of goods and fuel, and the modern methods of road and bridge building were introduced, but the decisive advance in communications was the invention of the steam rail locomotive by George Stephenson (1814); by 1850 a railway system covered the country. The Industrial Revolution was a period of epic excitement, especially in the development of rail transport. It produced inventors and engineers, such as Isambard Kingdom Brunel (1806-59), who had to force their projects against established prejudice and ignorance. The other side of the epic story was the meteoric emergence of great financial speculators such as George Hudson (1800-71), the 'Railway King', who rose from being a York draper to controller of a third of the railway system, but whose career ended in disgrace. The social changes were unprecedently dramatic, in the rapid growth of the Midland and northern industrial towns and the opening of new opportunities for wealth for ambitious men from humble backgrounds. This heroic and extraordinary aspect of industrialism was a great motivating power in Victorian culture.

By 1850, Britain was the 'workshop of the world'; no other country was ready to compete with it in industrial production. The towns were the source of the country's wealth, though the landowners retained their social prestige and often became much richer by ownership of coalfields. The north of England became the most advanced region in Britain; its towns grew rapidly, unplanned and frequently characterized by ugliness and dirt. Economic motives often outran a sense of social conscience and the new urban proletariat worked and lived in evil conditions under employers who had often risen from poverty and had the ruthlessness which was the consequence of their own struggle. England was divided as never before; the industrial north from the agricultural south, the industrial working classes from their employers, and both from the long-established gentry, particularly of the south.

Many Victorian novels are eloquent testimony to the social conditions; the title of ▷ Elizabeth Gaskell's ▷ North and South, and the subtitle of ▷ Benjamin Disraeli's ▷ Sybil, or the Two Nations are evidence in themselves. Josiah Bounderby in ▷ Charles Dickens' ▷ Hard Times is a portrait of the unprincipled kind of industrial employer; Sir Leicester Dedlock and Rouncewell the ironmaster in ▷ Bleak House exemplify the old order's failure to understand the new. ▷ Charles Kingsley's ▷ Alton Locke: Tailor and Poet (1850), and Mrs Gaskell's ▷ Mary Barton drew attention to the wretched living and working conditions of the urban poor.

➤ Anti-industrialism; Hungry Forties, The; Chartist movement; Carlyle, Thomas; Child Labour; Smiles, Samuel; Social Problem novel.

Inferno, The

The first part of ▷ Dante's great poem, the > Divina Commedia, which describes the poet's journey through Hell, under the guidance of > Virgil, where he speaks to various former friends and enemies. Hell is conceived of as a conical funnel, reaching to the centre of the earth. Various categories of sinners are assigned to the nine graduated circles, where they receive appropriate punishments. The first circle is reserved for pre-Christian pagans who have not had the chance of knowing the true faith. Virgil belongs to these, whose only punishment is the hopeless desire for God. At the very bottom is Satan (Lucifer) himself, and from him Dante and Virgil pass through the earth to its opposite surface, where they arrive at the foot of the Mount of Purgatory (> Purgatorio).

Ingelow, Jean (1820-97)

Poet, novelist and writer of ▷ children's literature. Born near Boston, Lincolnshire she was educated at home and wrote poetry from a very young age. The family moved to London where, driven by financial need, Ingelow published A Rhyming Chronicle of Thoughts and Feelings (1850) following it a year later with Allerton and Dreux, the first of her five novels. She also wrote Off the Skelligs (1879), Fated to be Free (1875) and Sarah de Berenger (1879).

She joined a small literary group, 'The Portfolio', whose members included ➤ Adelaide Procter and ▷ Christina Rossetti, and contributed, under the > pseudonym 'Oris', to the evangelical Youth's Magazine which she also edited for a year. These contributions were published later in book form in Studies For Stories (1864), Stories Told to a Child (1865) and A Sister's Bye-Hours (1868). She achieved enormous success with her twenty-five books which included verse, children's stories and novels. Her second volume of Poems (1863) ran to thirty editions and included the much anthologized 'Divided', and 'The High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire, 1571', which established her reputation as a poet. Other popular poems include 'A Story of Doom' (1867) from the collection of the same name. Her most successful children's book was Mopsa the Fairy (1869).

Her literary acquaintances included
➤ Tennyson, Christina Rossetti, ▷ Jane and Ann Taylor and the poet and feminist essayist Dora Greenwell (1821–82). An edition of her poems was edited in 1908 by ▷ Alice Meynell. She has been described as 'A lost Pre-Raphaelite' unjustly excluded from literary history.

Bib: Anon., Some Recollections of Jean Ingelow (1901); Peters, M., Jean Ingelow, Victorian Poetess; Hickok, K., Representations of Women: 19th Century British Women's Poetry; Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Inkle and Yarico (Yariko)

Inkle was a young English trader of the 17th century who sailed from London to the West Indies. Landing on an island on the way, he and his companions were attacked by natives and all were massacred except Inkle himself, who was saved by the native girl Yarico. She hid him in a cave, cared for him, loved him, and became pregnant by him. When an English ship passed by, Inkle boarded it, taking Yarico with him. But later he sold her into slavery. These events were reported in England and their hold on people's imaginations was part of the growing appeal of the 'primitive' (> primitivism), which was linked to a more general criticism of established mores in society. Inkle's actions were seen by many as archetypal of the white man's perfidy towards other races, or even simply of man's betrayal of woman, while Yarico was portrayed variously as a type of ⊳ noble savage or a suffering heroine. The earliest account of their story is told by the traveller Ligon in 1657. It is elaborated by > Steele in The Spectator (13 March 1711). Thereafter the couple's history became the subject of literally dozens of poems, plays, novels, paintings, songs, and even ballets in England and throughout Europe. Bib: Price, L. M., Inkle and Yarico Album; Hazard, P., European Thought in the Eighteenth Century.

Innocence, Songs of ▷ Songs of Innocence and of Experience.

Instauratio Magna (The Great Renewal)
The title of the great philosophical work projected by ▷ Francis Bacon and left incomplete. According to Bacon's plan of 1620 it was to have consisted of six parts: I. A review of existing sciences; De Augmentis Scientiarum, Latin translation of ▷ The Advancement of Learning (1605). II. Outline of a new inductive method; ▷ Novum Organum (The New Instrument). This exists in a compressed form, unfinished. III. A Natural History to be used as a basis for inductive conclusions. The tract Parasceve (Preparative) and the Historia Ventorum (History of the Winds); Historia vitae et mortis (History of Life and Death); Sylva Sylvarum (Forest of Forests), a collection of facts and observations. IV. Examples of investigations by the new method, of which there remains only a small fragment, Filum Labyrinthi (The Thread of the Labyrinth). V. Hypotheses of Bacon's own, to be tested by inductive experiment, of which only a preface exists, though some other writings may have been intended to belong to it. VI. A synthesis of conclusions from the inductive method, none of which remains.

Intentional fallacy

A term coined by W. K. Wimsatt and Monroe C. Beardsley, two leading American New Critics. The intentional fallacy is the view (wrong in Wimsatt and Beardsley's view) that the understanding of a work of literature can usefully be directed by the authorial intentions that it is claimed motivated a particular work. There are many practical reasons why this procedure might be misleading. Sometimes a writer's intentions are now known; sometimes writers give contradictory statements about them; sometimes they change their minds; sometimes they give only partial answers; sometimes they are unconscious of some or all of their motives. But Wimsatt and Beardsley's main argument concerns the way in which an interest in authors' intentions directs attention away from the text itself towards extra-literary considerations. For them, following New Critical theory, criticism should be primarily - perhaps exclusively concerned with 'the words on the page'.

> Author.

Bib: Wimsatt, W., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry.

Interlude, Interludes

Interlude is a term of disputed origin, in use from the 13th century at least, for dramatic performances in general. It became the standard term for plays performed indoors, at the feasts of rich households or in the halls of ecclesiastical or educational institutions. It acquired a more specific meaning in the Renaissance when 'interludes' were short plays of a kind popular especially in the 16th century before the great flowering of Elizabethan drama. In general they were more secular than > Morality plays, still being performed, but Moralities and Interludes are not always clearly distinguishable, and indeed the term 'interlude' was applied to religious plays as early as the 14th century. Nonetheless there is no other convenient term for such slight works as > John Heywood's Play of the Weather (1533) in which an emissary of the gods tries to find out the ideal weather for humanity, only to discover that opinions hopelessly conflict. The function of such a play seems to have been entertainment after a banquet in a nobleman's hall or in a college, or during the intervals of business of a town council, etc. That it was a performance during intervals of business or other kinds of entertainment, or perhaps of long, serious plays to provide light relief, has been assumed from the usual meaning of 'interlude' in ordinary speech; however, the word has also been surmised to mean merely 'a play between' performers taking parts. One of the best known examples is the interlude of Pyramus and Thisbe played before Theseus and his court in the last act of > Shakespeare's > A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Interpellation

A term used by the Marxist philosopher

➤ Louis Althusser to describe the process by which ➤ ideologies present us with a version of our own subjectivity, which we are induced to (mis)recognize as our self or innate identity. The term is borrowed from the technical vocabulary of French government procedures, and should not be confused with 'interpolation', which means insertion. The concept of interpellation has been applied to literature; for example Catherine Belsey argues that 'classic realism constitutes an ideological practice in addressing itself to readers as subjects, interpellating them in order that they freely accept their subjectivity and their subjection' (Critical Practice).

Interpolation

A passage inserted into a text from elsewhere, usually without the permission of the author. For instance, it is claimed that some passages in Shakespeare or Marlowe were interpolated by actors, theatre managers or other jobbing writers because they are out of character with the work as a whole. The 'Hecate' scene in Macheth, and the knock-about comic parts of Doctor Faustus are examples.

Interpretive community

Interpretive communities are the validators of meanings in literary texts according to the American critic Stanley Fish. For Fish, literary meaning does not exist in literary texts like a treasure to be found. It is something realised by readers in the course of their reading. As such, therefore, there are no settled readings of literary works. Instead the literary community either rejects or endorses certain interpretations which then pass temporarily for the settled meaning. Interpretive communities can therefore be the sources of both change or conservation depending upon their composition. Meanwhile, it is likely that several different interpretive communities will exist at any one time each validating different forms of interpretation.

➤ Hermeneutics; Reader Response Criticism. Bib: Fish, S., Is There A Text In This Class?: The Authority of Interpretive Communities. Interregnum

The term used for the period 1649–60, between the execution of ▷ Charles I and the accession of his son Charles II – the Restoration. It is divided into the period 1649–53, when England was ruled by the House of Commons and a Council of State, and the period 1553–8 when ▷ Oliver Cromwell and for a brief time his son Richard were Protectors.

Intertexuality

A term first introduced into critical theory by the French ⊳ psychoanalytical writer Julia Kristeva (b 1941), relating specifically to the use she makes of the work of ▷ Mikhail Bakhtin. The concept of intertextuality implies that literary texts are composed of dialectically opposed utterances, and that it is the function of the critic to identify these different strands and to account for their oppositions within the text itself. Kristeva notes that Bakhtin's "dialogism" does not strive towards transcendence . . . but rather towards harmony, all the while implying an idea of rupture (of opposition and analogy) as a modality of transformation' (Desire and Language; trans. 1980). Similarly, no text can be entirely free of other texts. No work is written or read in isolation, it is located, in Kristeva's words, 'within the totality of previous . . . texts'. This is a second important aspect of intertextuality.

> Feminism.

Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood, Ode: (1807)

An ode by > William Wordsworth in stanzas of varying length. The first four stanzas were composed in 1802; the rest of the poem was completed in 1806, and the whole was published in 1807. The first part laments that nature no longer appears to the poet as it did in his youth: 'Apparelled in celestial light,' The glory and the freshness of a dream'. Wordsworth explains this in terms of the ➤ Platonic myth that the soul pre-exists the body in a perfect world of oneness with nature. At birth we come 'trailing clouds of glory . . . / From God, who is our home'. But soon 'Shades of the prisonhouse begin to close/ Upon the growing Boy'. The poem thus expresses a radical Romantic reversal of accepted values: dream is more real than waking, youth is the period of wisdom and true insight. As the poem progresses, the poet's confidence revives, and he asserts a continuing oneness with nature despite his age: 'To me the meanest flower that blows can give/ Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears'. The upbeat rhetoric is splendid, but many readers are left with the impression that Wordsworth is unnaturally forcing up his spirits towards the end of the poem, in a way which ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge is unable to do in his related work, > Dejection: An Ode.

Ireland

A brief sketch of the history of Ireland may be divided into phases:

1150-1600 - Period of Disorder

▶ Henry II was the first English king to be acknowledged sovereign of Ireland, but at no time before 1600 did the English succeed in establishing an efficient central government. In the 12th century Ireland consisted of warring Celtic kingdoms, with a Norse settlement along the east coast. The conquest was not undertaken by Henry but by his Anglo-Norman nobility, notably Richard Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke in alliance with the Irish king of Leinster. By 1500 Ireland was ruled by a mixed English and Irish aristocracy, the former regarded as English by the Irish and as Irish by the English. English law and speech were secure only in a narrow region known as the ➤ Pale, centred on the capital city of Dublin. The first real crisis in relations arose in the 16th century, when the Irish refused to receive the English Protestant ➤ Reformation. Fierce wars against Spanish armies which landed in Ireland with a view to invading England were followed by fierce suppression under > Elizabeth I, for instance under the governorship of Lord Grey de Wilton. The poet ▷ Edmund Spenser was appointed his secretary (1580) and given a grant of land in the province of Munster as part of a plan to settle the country with Protestant overlords; his castle was burnt down in 1598, a year before his death. Spenser's singularly stern view of Justice in ▷ The Fairie Queen (Artegall, Bk. V) is a reflection of his Irish experiences. By 1600 Ireland was a nation of mixed English and Celtic people, with an English-speaking aristocracy, and firm identification with the Roman Catholic faith. The Ulster rebellion (1595) gathered force, with Spanish aid, until in 1599 a large English army under the command of > Essex was sent to crush the revolt. The expedition was, however, a miserable failure and English losses were only recouped in 1602 under the command of Mountjoy. The problem as England saw it in the next two centuries was how to subdue the country to effective Protestant rule.

1600-1800 - Irish Protestant Ascendancy
The policy of settling Protestants in Ireland was notably successful in one of the four provinces under ▷ James I (1603-25) when Ulster became the Anglo-Scottish Protestant fortress which it has remained to this day. ▷ Oliver Cromwell was savage in subjection of Catholic Ireland to his authority, and by extensive confiscations increased the class of Protestant landlords. In the 18th century, penal laws further disabled Catholic landholders, refused political rights to Catholics, and barred them from most professions and from education. The only Irish university (founded by Elizabeth in 1591), Dublin, was a Protestant one. However, towards the end of the 18th century, partly owing to the Irish patriotism of Anglo-Irish Protestants (including the satirist ▷ Swift and the philosopher ▷ Berkeley), the penal laws were reduced in severity, and in 1782 an Irish constitution was promulgated, by which Irish Protestants were given political rights and limited powers in an Irish Parliament freed from ▷ Privy Council control. The experiment was a failure, and in 1801 Ireland was united politically and in all other respects with England and Scotland, Irish Protestants receiving for the first time representation in the English Parliament.

1801-1921 - The Union

The 19th century was the age of steady emancipation of Irish Catholics and mounting Irish patriotism. The population at the beginning of the century was four and a half million, fewer than one and a half million being of English or Scottish Protestant descent. The Anglo-Irish were the social leaders of the country: the Scots were a middle class of business men and farmers; the native Irish were largely peasants. In 1829 Catholic Emancipation removed all the important restrictions on Catholics, notably the political ones. Henceforward there was a growing party of Irish Catholics in the English House of Commons, in the last quarter of the century known as the Home Rule Party from its intention to win national independence for Ireland. In the middle of the century reform was concentrated on land matters; this was the more necessary for the misery of the Irish peasantry whose sufferings were increased by the severe famines of the 1840s, leading to deaths on a massive scale and to massive emigration to the U.S.A. In 1841 the population was over eight million, and it is now about three million; Ireland is thus one of the very few countries in the world whose population has actually diminished in the last 100 years. Attempts to obtain Home Rule through the English Parliament failed. A brief rebellion in 1916 was put down, but a severe one in 1919-21 resulted in independence within the Commonwealth. It was led by the Sinn Fein party, and the great bitterness of the fighting arose in part from their fanaticism and the brutality of the English auxiliary police (called 'Black and Tans' from their uniform) sent to suppress the rebels.

The Irish Free State

This state was formed in 1922 and included the three provinces of Munster, Leinster, Connaught, and three counties of Ulster. The remaining six counties of Ulster, being mainly Protestant and Anglo-Scottish in population, have separate status as Northern Ireland with representation in the English Parliament. The Irish Free State took the name of Eire (Ireland) in 1937, and is no longer a member of the Commonwealth. It is a republic with a president and two houses of parliament, the Dáil and the Seanad. The first official language is nominally Gaelic, but it is a minority language, since English has long been the majority language.

Ireland, Samuel William Henry (1777-1835) Forger and poet. Ireland is infamous for having written several plays which he claimed were by ➤ Shakespeare. The deception was uncovered in 1796 when ➤ Malone published An Enquiry into the Authenticity of Certain Papers Attributed to Shakespeare, Queen Elizabeth and Henry, Earl of Southampton, at which Ireland confessed. However, before this revelation Ireland's play Vortigern, supposed by ⊳ Kemble to be by Shakespeare, had been staged and generally disliked by the public. Ireland published several books of poems under his own name, including The Fisher Boy (1808), but his work was heavily derivative and unimaginative. Bib: Grebanier, B., The Great Shakespeare Forgery.

Irish literature in English

While the concept of 'Irish literature in English' appears to be self-explanatory, its form has always adopted a fluidity relative to the strategic political pressures that have acted upon it. Moreover, the status of the category as a critical construct suggests that it is near-impossible to separate the body of texts that now constitute it as a 'tradition' from the development of an indigenous Irish literary criticism capable of challenging the appropriating strategies of British and American critics. This suggests a certain caution. While there may appear to be dominant themes running through Irish literature that foreground the importance of identity, territory and community to a sense of Irish experience, we must be aware of the extent to which these criteria have shaped the canon in the first instance according to particular perceived absences within modern Irish society itself. Indeed, it is salutary to note that, despite those who insist on the foreclosure of Irish literature as a definable entity, discordant voices and hybrid texts continually disturb such totalization and demand an audience. Ultimately then the term Irish literature has never simply been just a category that unifies a disparate range of texts (although this is part of its purpose) but rather has operated within the educational and political institution as a means of privileging certain amenable critical criteria (particularly that of a writer's political and cultural 'identity') at the expense of others. If we can construct a narrative of Irish literature even a narrative of breakdown - it is always salutary then to keep in mind the Irish novelist ➤ Maria Edgeworth's despairing assertion that 'the truth is too strong for fiction, and on all sides pulls it asunder'.

692

With these preconditions we can begin such a narrative in 1171, the year of Ireland's conquest by > Henry II, and indeed until the latter years of the 19th century, the history of Irish literature in English is, largely speaking, part of the general development of English literature into a recognisable and self-validating canon. Since the Irish Literary Revival began in the 1880s, however, the existence and the memory of a literature in Ireland's original tongue, > Gaelic, has interacted with the country's adopted vernacular at every level: in the detail of syntax; in the choice – or rejection – of subject-matter; and in each writer's wrestle with a fractured and often betraved history.

Throughout the 18th and 19th centuries and into the 20th - writers from Anglo-Irish Ireland made a rich and vigorous contribution to English literature in its formative stages. → Jonathan Swift, → William Congreve, > Oliver Goldsmith, > Sheridan, > Oscar Wilde and ➤ George Bernard Shaw are among the better known. Although their writings were often not primarily concerned with the matter of Ireland or their authors' own Irishness, recent Irish critics have found in their work themes that are now recognized as beholden to a typically Irish experience of cultural dislocation. Those who did write of Ireland, like Dion Boucicault (1820-90), who is held by many to be the inventor of the 'stage Irishman', and ▷ Thomas Moore (1779–1852), the purveyor to the drawing-rooms of London of an Ireland sugared by sentiment and exile, capitalized on what looks with hindsight like caricature. All these writers of the Anglo-Irish Ascendancy, coming from their background of landed privilege, seemed to be unaware of the still surviving Gaelic tradition of native Irish literature, with its long ancestry and close connections with mainland Europe – a tradition eloquently evoked in Daniel Corkery's Hidden Ireland of 1924, and recently made available anew in Seán O'Tuma's and Thomas Kinsella's 1981 anthology An Duanaire: Poems of the Dispossessed.

Moreover, during this pre-Revival period only a handful of creative writers mirrored the growing interest that folklorists like T. Crofton Croker (1798-1849), travellers (again, many of them from Europe) and diarists were taking in Irish peasant life outside the 'Pale'. Edgeworth and William Carleton (1794-1869) stand almost alone in the seriousness with which they looked at their native land and its inhabitants. Edgeworth's Castle Rackrent (1800) and Carleton's Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry (1830-3) are isolated landmarks; and Carleton, an adopted member of Ascendancy culture who was born a Catholic peasant, has been read in recent years with renewed interest and recognition.

In the decades that followed the devastation of native Gaelic culture by the famine and mass emigration of the 1840s, a new sense of Ireland as an imagined nation began, paradoxically, to emerge. The poets and dramatists of the Literary Revival of the 1880s and 1890s regarded Standish O'Grady (1846–1928) as its prime mover. His two-volume history of Ireland The Heroic Period (1878) and Cuchullin and His Contemporaries (1880) - sent them back with a new authority to the ancient matter of Ireland. And it was on this material, and on a new attention to the distinctive English actually spoken in Ireland, that the renaissance of Irish letters was founded. Its chief authors - the most notable being > W. B. Yeats (1865–1939), > J. M. Synge (1871–1909) and ➤ Lady Gregory (1852-1932) - were still, to begin with, the sons and the daughters of the Ascendancy, but before long they were joined in this hegemonic activity by writers from the native and Catholic population. A common task was perceived.

The history of Irish literature in English is closely linked, then, to the political history of the nation that (except for the six counties in its north-east corner) won its independence from British rule in 1921, and declared its Republican status when leaving the Commonwealth in 1949. The first battle in the War of Independence had, after all, been led by a poet, Padraig Pearse (1879–1916), and inspired partially at least by his romantic ideas of blood-sacrifice:

All changed, changed utterly.
A terrible beauty is born.
(Yeats, 'Easter 1916')

Irish writers since the Revival have had to reconsider and redefine ideas of continuity and cultural identity that are quite different from those that face English writers in the post-colonial period, though there are affinities with the experience of the other Celtic nations of Britain – the Welsh and the Scots.

(> Scottish Literature; Welsh Literature in English)

In the hundred-odd years since the poet and translator Douglas Hyde (1860–1949) gave a lecture to the newly formed National Literary Society in Dublin entitled 'The Necessity of De-Anglicising Ireland' (1892), Irish writers have had continually to ask themselves and each other quite how, and to what extent, de-Anglicization is to be carried out – and who they are when they have done it. Questions of national identity cross over with questions of personal identity in this distinctive version of the 20th-century artist's problematic relation to society.

Ireland's writers began by looking to their country's heroic past and its idealized idea of the west, the non-anglicized land of saints, scholars and noble peasantry; but they also looked, from the very start, to the literatures of Europe, and cast a cold and realist eye at their own urban and rural present. > James Joyce (1882-1941) taught himself enough Norwegian as a schoolboy to write a letter to his hero, > Ibsen, who was already a profound influence on the playwrights of Dublin's > Abbey Theatre; George Egerton (Mary Dunne, 1859-1945) translated Knut Hamsun's Hunger and wrote about the 'New Woman' in her novel Keynotes (1893) before the old century ended. Kate O'Brien (1897-1974) and Maura Laverty (1907-66) found inspiration and objectivity by living for time in Spain, Ireland's old ally. For many Irish writers - Joyce, > Samuel Beckett (b 1906) and Francis Stuart (b 1902) are early examples, followed later to Paris by the poets Denis Devlin (1908-59) and Brian Coffey (b 1905) - this looking outside Ireland necessarily became a longer physical exile: the required distance from which to practise their art - or indeed to have it published and read. For during the first half-century of independence, the Irish state's narrow, inward-looking patriotism and the tight grip of a reactionary Catholic clerisy directly impoverished cultural life within Ireland: > censorship meant that most works of serious literature by Irish men and women were banned in their own country.

Those who stayed, returned, or at least kept a foothold in the place, were able to refine and multiply the means of reclaiming, repairing, or reinventing an Irish heritage. They worked from an intimate knowledge of place, like Patrick Kavanagh (1904-67), who immortalized his townland of Mucker in The Great Hunger (1942) and Tarry Flynn (1948); others, like Austin Clarke (1896-1974) and later Thomas Kinsella (b 1928), worked from a more scholarly knowledge of the Gaelic-language heritage than was available to the Revivalists. By the mid-20th century poets in particular were recognizing the impossibility of bridging the gap to the past, and were finding that the fractured state of Irish culture itself offered a fruitful area of exploration for the isolated and disillusioned artist/commentator. Flann O'Brien (Brian O'Nolan, 1911-66) created a comic and fantastic Gaelic/modernist world in his novel At Swim-Two-Birds (1939) as his response to this artistic dilemma.

It tended to be the novelists and short-story writers who recorded the day-to-day reality of life in the young state. > Sean O'Faolain (b 1900) and > Frank O'Connor (Michael O'Donovan, 1903-66) demonstrated, in their short stories of the Troubles and after, not just a consummate art, but a profound understanding of the why and the how of that wished-for 'de-Anglicization'. Written from the fringes, but courageously central in their concerns, the novels and short stories of the Aran Islander Liam O'Flaherty (1897-1984) are eloquent accounts of the dignity and constraints of life in the no-longer idealized rural west; and Patrick McGill's Children of the Dead End (1914) is a classic account of the reality of land-hunger and migratory labouring.

At home and abroad, then, Irish writers were grappling with the question of identity, and a body of remarkable writing was being assembled into a tradition of its own. But the achievements of three writers in particular placed a burden of success on subsequent generations. In poetry, the novel and drama, the work of Yeats, Joyce and Synge proved difficult to build on directly. Over the years a pattern can be discerned in which Ireland's vigorous - but even in the late 20th century essentially naturalistic - tradition of fiction has more in common with the elegiac and storytelling parts of Yeats' oeuvre than with Joyce's modernism. Conversely, poets have found in > Ulysses' concern with the here and now of life as it is lived - and lived in the city - a more usable language than Yeats' lovely rhetoric or Synge's Gaelic-shadowed experimentalism. It is, perhaps, in drama that writers have found least constraint from the work of their predecessors. Over the years > Sean O'Casey (1880-1964), Samuel Beckett (b 1906), ➤ Brendan Behan (1923-64), Brian Friel (b 1929), and Tom Murphy (b 1935) have each developed their own idiosyncratic dramatic structure and voice.

During this first century of a consciously Irish literature in English, Gaelic still often functioned as the linguistic bedrock of Irish writers. Whether through translations that are creative works in their own right, from Hyde's Love Songs of Connacht (1893) to Kinsella's The Tain (1969) and ⊳ Seamus Heaney's Sweeney Astray (1983), or by regarding all periods of Gaelic literature as a nourishing tradition alongside other literatures, Irish poets have constantly enriched their work in English. A few have decided to write only in Gaelic - two notable poets being Sean O Riordain (1917-77) and Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill (b 1952) - but such writers are nevertheless an essential part of the English-language writing scene, both in their professional friendships and in creative translation by their peers. One excellent poet, Michael Hartnett (b 1941), publicly dedicated himself in 1975 to writing wholly in Irish; he has recently reverted to writing in both languages.

One half-century into the new state, the resurgence of violent conflict in Northern Ireland in 1968 reoriented the literary map of the island northwards often, it should be noted, to the chagrin of writers from the Republic. While the essentially homogeneous and quotidian nature of the Southern state following partition led to a certain complacency and narrowness of literary ambition, the challenge of writing out of a bitterly divided society has created a distinct corpus of Northern Irish literature of astonishing intensity. This is not, of course, to suggest that there is a simple correlation between literary achievement and social breakdown but rather to note that the desire to find some response to the unprecedented horror of the violence during this period led to the creation of an enduring aesthetic stance out of often meagre resources. This has been most notable in the swift rise to pre-eminence of Northern Irish poetry in both Irish and British contexts, although with this we should note the continued influence of two earlier, and neglected, Ulster poets ➤ Louis MacNeice (1907-63) and John Hewitt (1907–87). The presence of the English critic and poet Philip Hobsbaum in Belfast in the mid-1960s led directly to the precocious publication of ➤ Seamus Heanev's Death of a Naturalist (1066), and with this was established a poetic voice of maturity and distinction which has become perhaps the most influential of all living Irish poets as the century draws to a close. Alongside Heaney, the poetry of Michael Longley (b 1939) and Derek Mahon (b 1941) is also worthy of mention, while in the generation that followed, the work of Ciaran Carson (b 1948), Tom Paulin (b 1950), and > Paul Muldoon (b 1951) now dominates the imaginative poetic terrain of Ireland as a whole.

With this activity, it is understandable that other forms of literary expression in Northern Ireland have tended to be neglected although with the recent work of two impressive young Belfast novelists, Glenn Patterson (b 1961) and Robert McLiam Wilson (b 1964), there are encouraging signs that this is being redressed. Indeed the novel form in Ireland, North and South, seems in very good health. With the emergence of the exciting ➤ Roddy Doyle (b 1958) and the continued mastery of the form displayed by John Banville (b 1945), the new social pluralism of the Republic is gaining a literary manifestation; one prefigured perhaps by the coruscating moral anger of the poet Paul Durcan (b 1944).

The North has produced one of the most exciting women poets of Ireland, Medbh McGuckian (b 1951); she, and Eavan Boland (b 1944) in the South, are the most visible of a new generation of women poets of real distinction. In the field of the novel, Irish women have managed, as women have in English generally, to make a substantial contribution; but the pressures of a conservative and patriarchal society have been less kind to women poets. As Irish women free themselves from the extremes of traditional roles, all the expected fields of women's writings are growing rapidly, and making strong connections with writing in England and the U.S.A. Particularly notable are > Edna O'Brien (b 1930), Julia O'Faolain (b 1932), Jennifer Johnston (b 1930) and the promising Deidre Madden (b 1961).

Finally, as the construction of Irish literature in English as a category is driven essentially by literary criticism, it would be inappropriate to give any account of its development without acknowledging the resurgent strength of indigenous Irish itself. Central to this is the monumental three-volume Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing (1991), compiled under the general editorship of Seamus Deane (b 1940). Although a controversial anthology, its existence gives Irish literature a strategic location in modern Ireland that enables a much-needed revision of the Irish literary past. Deane has been joined in this desire by such diverse critics as Edna Longley (b 1940), Terence Brown (b 1944), and John Wilson Foster (b 1944), and through their lively and often passionate debates we can perceive that Irish literature is finally getting the sympathetic, thorough, and context-specific criticism it has so long deserved.

Bib: Brown, T., Ireland's Literature; Cairns, D. and Richards, S., Writing Ireland: Colonialism, Nationalism and Culture; Deane, S. (Ed.), The Field Day Anthology of Irish Writing; Deane, S., A Short History of Irish Literature; Lloyd, D., Anomalous States: Irish Writing and the Post-Colonial Moment; Longley, E., The Living Stream: Literature and Revisionism in Ireland.

Irish literature in Gaelic

Most of this is medieval (1100-1550). Two main cycles of myth are distinguished; the Ulster series, centring on Conchobar and > Cuchulain; that of Leinster and Munster centring on Finn and Ossian (Oisin). Ulster Cycle: Cuchulain was a great warrior in the court of Conchobar king of Ulster. Other characters are Ailill and Medb (Maeve), king and queen of Connaught, against whom Cuchulain defended Ulster; Fergus, the exiled king of Ulster; Deidre, brought up to be the bride of Conchobar, who killed her lover Naoise. Such legends were versified in the Middle Ages, but are thought to have originated in pre-Christian times, ie before the 5th century AD. Leinster-Munster cycle: in their best form > ballads; after 1250 these exceeded the Ulster legends in popularity. The events are supposed to take place in the 3rd-5th centuries AD. Finn was a great warrior when Cormac was king of Ireland, and commanded a band called the Fenians. He was the father of the hero Ossian, who spent many years in a kind of fairyland, and was at last baptized as a Christian by St Patrick. Such myths were used by poets and dramatists of the Irish Nationalist movement in English, eg especially W. B. Yeats and ➤ J. M. Synge, between 1800 and 1010.

Irony

> Figures of Speech.

Irving, Sir Henry (1838-1905)

Actor. His original name was Brodribb, but he adopted the name of Irving when he gave up a commercial career for acting in 1856. For ten years he performed over 500 parts in provincial companies. He made his name in London in 1871 with the part of Mathias in the melodrama

The Bells by Leopold Lewis (adapted from Le Juif Polonais by Erckmann-Chatrian). This was at the Lyceum Theatre, which later became famous under his management. His reputation grew by his performance in a great variety of roles (including two in plays by the poet ▷ Tennyson, The Cup and Becket), especially Shakespearean ones: his performances of Hamlet and Shylock became legendary. Irving's style was strongly romantic and powerfully eloquent; he and Ellen Terry, with whom he was associated at the Lyceum from 1878 to 1902, gave English theatre its main distinction at the time.

Bib: Bingham, M., Henry Irving and the Victorian Theatre.

Iseult (Isoud, Ysolde, Ysoude)

➤ Tristan and Iseult.

Isherwood, Christopher (1904-86) Novelist and dramatist. Born in Cheshire and educated at Repton School and Cambridge and London universities. At preparatory school he met the poet W. H. Auden (1907-73), with whom he later collaborated on three plays, The Dog Beneath The Skin (1935), The Ascent of F6 (1936) and On The Frontier (1938). These are primarily political and psychological parables. Isherwood's first two novels, All The Conspirators (1928) and The Memorial (1932), employ > modernist styles and techniques. His experience of teaching English in Berlin from 1930 to 1933 is reflected in Mr Norris Changes Trains (1935) and Goodbye to Berlin (1939), which employ a more realistic mode. The latter is a series of linked tales recording the atmosphere and characters of a decadent Berlin in the last days of the Weimar Republic; the narrator is characterized by a certain passivity and detachment, summarized in his claim: 'I am a camera with its shutter open . . .' The section entitled 'Sally Bowles' was dramatized in 1951 as I Am A Camera and turned into a stage musical in 1968 as Cabaret. Isherwood visited China in 1933 with Auden, and together they wrote Journey to a War (1939). In 1939 they both emigrated to the USA, where Isherwood became naturalized in 1946. All his major work is written in the first person, and his American novels draw extensively on his own development as a theme. They are: Prater Violet (1945), The World in the Evening (1954), Down There On A Visit (1962), A Single Man (1964) and A Meeting By the River (1967). He also wrote numerous screenplays, and several autobiographical and travel pieces, including Lions and Shadows (1938), Christopher and his Kind (1976) and The Condor and the Cows: a South American Travel Diary (1950). He translated works relating to the mystical Hindu philosophy of Vendanta, a philosophy which is advocated in A Meeting By the River. Bib: King, F., Christopher Isherwood; Summers,

C. J., Christopher Isherwood; Bachards, D., and White, J.P., (eds.), Where Joy Resides: An Isherwood Reader.

Ishiguro, Kazuo (b 1954)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Nagasaki, Japan, he has lived in Britain since 1960, where he studied at the universities of Kent and East Anglia. He has worked as a grouse-beater at Balmoral Castle and as a community and social-worker in Scotland and London. He now lives in Guildford, Surrev. His work was included in Introduction 7: Stories by New Writers, 1981. His first two novels, A Pale View of Hills (1982) and An Artist of the Floating World (1986) explore post-war Japanese cultural displacement through the thoughts and memories of individuals: a Japanese woman living in England, stirred to retrospection by her daughter's suicide; a painter, once employed by the pre-war Imperial regime, living in a provincial Japanese town. In The Remains of the Day (1989), which won the Booker Prize, an English butler on a tour of Britain reassesses the lost opportunities of his life, dedicated to the service of an English aristocrat who had flirted with fascism. It was filmed by James Ivory in 1993. The Unconsoled (1995) picks up some of the same themes of loneliness and missed opportunity, but is more enigmatic, recounting a journey through an unidentifed country. His work has been widely praised for its delicacy of style and subtlety of psychological insight.

Isocrates (436-338 BC)

In ancient Greece, an Athenian orator who advocated a united Greece for war against the states of Asia. He advanced Greek prose style by the care he gave to his speeches.

Italian influence on English literature Italian literature first made an important contribution to English poetry in the work of ▷ Chaucer. His ▷ Troilus and Crisyede is principally a translation of Il Filostrato and ▷ The Canterbury Tales may have been modelled on Boccaccio's ▷ Decameron. Allusions to and parodies of ▷ Dante can, similarly, be found at several points in Chaucer's work, especially in ▷ The House of Fame. Chaucer met ▷ Petrarch, the third great Italian poet of the medieval period, when he went as an ambassador to Italy, and he translated one of his ▷ sonnets, again for inclusion in Troilus and Criseyde.

In the 16th century Petrarch eclipsed
Boccaccio and Dante in the minds of English writers. His sonnets were translated by ▷ Sir Thomas Wyatt and ▷ Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey in the 1520s and 1530s. In the 1580s, Petrarch's example helped create the fashion for sonnet-writing that produced ▷ Sir Philip Sidney's ▷ Astrophil and Stella, ▷ Edward

Spenser's ➤ Amoretti and ➤ Shakespeare's Sonnets, along with many other sonnet sequences. Petrarch's visionary poems, the Trionfi, were translated into English by Henry Parker, Lord Morley (Tryumphes of Fraunces Petrarcke (1553-6)) and into Scots by William Fowler (?1555-?) in 1587. Scottish interest in Italian literature culminated in the works of ➤ William Drummond of Hawthornden in the 17th century.

Spenser's most ambitious work, however,

➤ The Faerie Queen, drew much less on Petrarch than on the more recent Italian tradition of epic romance. ➤ Ariosto's ➤ Orlando Furioso and ➤ Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata (1581) suggested some of the incidents in Spenser's poem and its guileful mixture of earnestness and comedy. Similarly, Italian novelle (short prose fictions, often presented within a framing narrative as in Boccaccio's Decameron) were imitated in England in the Renaissance and provided sources for Shakespeare's ➤ Measure for Measure and ➤ Othello.

At this time, however, literary influence cannot be separated from the broader cultural importance of Italian thinking and the power of established images of Italy. \triangleright Castiglione's \triangleright I! Cortegiano (1528) became a handbook of elegant behaviour; ➤ Machiavelli's The Prince (1513) (designed to encourage Italian unity) offered types of deceitfulness and chicanery that were at once alluring and dreadful. Shakespeare's > Richard III and Marlowe's > The Jew of Malta are built around typically captivating and dastardly Machiavellian heroes. Partly because of Machiavelli and partly because of Italy's perceived cultural pre-eminence, Italian scenes and cities became glamorously corrupt. To the staunchly Protestant Elizabethan regime, moreover, Italy was the more dangerous for being the fountainhead of Roman Catholicism. In Shakespeare's \triangleright Cymbeline, for example, when Posthumus, the downright and honest British hero, travels to Rome, he proves all too vulnerable to the artful competitiveness and deceit of the Italians. ➤ Jacobean tragedies (such as > The Malcontent or > The Changeling) frequently use Italian settings in a similar way.

Italian models were of less importance to 17th-century English literature; ➤ Milton is the exception to this rule. He wrote several poems in Italian and drew on Dante and Tasso for > Paradise Lost. A widespread revival of interest in Italian literature began early in the 18th century (partly because Italian operas were so popular) and has continued until the present day. All the major medieval Italian writers were translated in the period; it became usual for educated people (particularly women) to learn Italian and read its literature; and interest gradually extended from the greats of the past to the writers of the present: in particular, the playwrights Carlo Goldoni (1707-93) and Vittorio Alfieri (1749-1803), the comic poet Casti (1724–1803) and lyric poets such as Metastasio (1698–1782).

This interest encouraged imitations and adaptations of Italian works: ▷ James Thomson's > The Castle of Indolence, for example, is directly influenced by Tasso; ➤ Wordsworth's Essay on Epitaphs (1810) was inspired, he said, by his reading of epitaphs by Gabriello Chiabrera (1552-1637); ▷ Byron's ▷ Don Juan is modelled on the mock-heroic romances of Ariosto and Luigi Pulci (1432-84); and > Sir Walter Scott's historical novels draw on the scenes and romanticism of Tasso and Matteo Boiardo (1434–94). Scott's example in turn influenced the most famous novel of the ⊳ Risorgimento, I Promessi sposi (1827) by Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873). Similarly, → Shelley and → Keats composed, in their final unfinished works, epics profoundly endebted to Dante's > Divina Commedia.

Dante continued to grow in importance during the 19th century both as a literary influence and a cultural icon. Ugo Foscolo (1778-1827), who after 1816 became an emigré living in London, successfully promoted Italian literature; > Tennyson's > In Memoriam was, Tennyson wrote, 'a kind of Divine Comedy' and is modelled on Petrarch's Canzoniere as well; > Dante Gabriel Rossetti translated Dante's early, autobiographical collection, La Vita Nuova (1292-3) plus a large number of previously obscure Italian poets in his Early Italian Poets (1861). Rossetti's original poetry, especially The Blessed Damozel (1850) and The House of Life (1881), is suffused with Dantean ideas and his paintings, like those by other members of the ➤ Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, repeatedly illustrate ecstatic moments from Dante's poetry.

Interest in Dante is an extension of interest in the medieval, pre-industrial past. Dante's poetry was attractive because it seemed not to distinguish between religious and sexual feelings. The fusion of the two was typical of a medieval world which the Pre-Raphaelites considered innocent, even pre-lapsarian. > John Ruskin, similarly, read the architecture of Renaissance Venice as the embodiment of an ideal society.

For ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning and > Robert Browning, the influence of Italy was less historical or literary than immediate and contemporary. The Risorgimento became for them, as for other English liberals, a cause and an ideal. Casa Guidi Windows (1851) by Elizabeth Barrett Browning is explicity concerned with events in Italy; Robert Browning's ➤ Men and Women and The Ring and the Book (1868-69) are more indirect but the poems' evocations of renaissance Italy continually suggest the mid-19th-century world. ➤ Romola by ➤ George Eliot recreates 15th-century Florence to similar effect. Likewise > Arthur Hugh Clough's Amours de Voyage (1858) finds a British visitor baffled by the collision on the streets of Rome between present-day mayhem and ancient grandeur. ▷ E. M. Forster's A Room with a View (1908) makes Italy more pastoral but nonetheless shows the English visitors confused by the contrast of present and past. Even Colin Dexter's urbane Inspector Morse experiences the same confusion when he visits Verona and uncovers a smuggling ring and a corrupt bureaucracy right beside the Roman coliseum where Verdi is being performed.

Forster's and Clough's perspective on Italy begins in the 18th century, as soon, that is, as British travellers began to visit Italy as part of the Grand Tour. Venice and Rome were cardinal examples of greatness gone to waste and, to patriotic visitors, of the decline that England. could or should avoid. > Joseph Addison's Letter from Italy (1701), > John Dyer's The Ruins of Rome (1740) and > Tobias Smollett's Travels through France and Italy (1766) are all good examples of this habit of mind. It become the stock in trade of romantic period travel writers such as J. C. Eustace (?1762-1815) in his A Classical Tour of Italy (1813) and Lady Sydney Morgan (?1783-1859) in her Italy (1821), both of which proved enduringly popular. It contributed to the effect of the Italian settings of many > Gothic novels. This way of thinking made Italy into a place where visitors could reflect on their cultural superiority and could observe the terrible consequences of decadence. Dickens in Dittle Dorrit, Clough and Forster all question the self-confidence that enabled visitors to use Italy in this way. > Henry James' novels, especially Roderick Hudson (1875), > The Portrait of a Lady and > The Wings of the Dove, often make the clash between England and Italy symptomatic of the conflict between America and Europe.

Department Note of the Victorian revival of Dante: Department Note of Dante: Department Note of the Victorian revival of Dante (in The Sacred Wood (1920) and the Selected Essays (1928)) aim to confirm Dante's status as the key poet of the European tradition; Department Dante's Department Note of Dante's epic as is Department Note of Dante Note of Dante and Showed in his essay 'Dante... Bruno... Vico... Joyce' (1929) how much Dames Joyce drew from Dante and from the Italian philosophers, Giordano Bruno (*1548-99) and Giambattista Vico (1668-1744).

Translations of Dante have multiplied and been attempted by several major poets, > Seamus Heaney and Robert Lowell (1917–77) most famously. The other great medieval and Renaissance originals of Italian literature have been neglected by comparison.

Meanwhile, modern Italian poetry has become highly-respected and increasingly influential. Giacomo Leopardi (1798-1837) has gained considerable recognition only in this century. The reputation of Eugenio Montale (1896-1981) was established in the nineteen-thirties and remains very high. He and his contemporaries Umberto Sabe (1883-1957) and Giuseppe Ungaretti (1888–1970) established the European importance of Italian twentieth-century poetry. Andrea Zanzotto (b 1921) and Franco Fortini (b 1917) are among the most significant of their many successors. Italian novelists have an international readership, particularly Italo Calvino (1923-85), Primo Levi (1919-87), and Umberto Eco (b 1932). Leonardo Sciascia (1921-91) and Natalia Ginzburg (b 1916) are also the focus of intense interest and admiration. Six Characters in Search of an Author (1921) by Luigi Pirandello (1867-1036) and Accidental Death of an Anarchist (1970) by Dario Fo (b 1926) have become standards of modern theatre. Bib: Brand, C. P., Italy and the English Romantics; Jack, R. D. S., The Italian Influence on Scottish Literature; Minta, S., Petrarch and Petrarchism: The English and French Traditions; Pite, R., The Circle of Our Vision: Dante's Presence in English Romantic Poetry; McDougal, S., Dante Among the Moderns.

Ivanhoe (1819)

A historical novel by ⊳ Sir Walter Scott. It is set in the reign of Richard I, who is one of the characters; the story concerns rivalry between the king and his wicked brother John (King, 1199-1216), and between Saxons and the ruling Norman aristocracy. Locksley (the legendary outlaw, Robin Hood) aids Richard against the rebellious Normans, and helps to bring about the union of the Saxon hero, Wilfred of Ivanhoe; and the heroine Rowena. It was the first novel by Scott to deal with an English (as distinct from a Scottish) subject, and was very popular in the 19th century. This popularity is partly due to its being one of the first attempts to write a novel about the Middle Ages with a genuine regard for history.

J

Jack and the Beanstalk

A well-known ▶ fairy tale based on a myth found all over the world. Jack exchanges his mother's cow for a hatful of beans. When thrown into the garden, the beans rapidly sprout stalks which reach above the clouds. Jack climbs one of the beanstalks and finds himself in a new land near the castle of a man-eating giant. Jack manages by cunning to steal the giant's wealth and when the giant pursues him down the stalk, he fells it so that the giant falls and breaks his neck.

Jack Wilton

➤ Nashe, Thomas.

Jacobean

Used to indicate the period of ⊳ James I (1603-25) and applied especially to the literature and style of architecture of his reign. In literature, it is most commonly a way of distinguishing the style of drama under James from the style that prevailed under > Elizabeth. Strictly, Elizabethan drama is experimental, expansive, sometimes ingenuous, in fairly close touch with medieval tradition but energetic with > Renaissance forces. It includes the work of the > University wits Christopher Marlowe, ➤ Thomas Kvd, > Robert Greene, > George Peele - and also early > Shakespeare. Jacobean drama is thought of as critical, sombre, disillusioned. It includes mature and late Shakespeare, > Ben Jonson, ▷ Cyril Tourneur, ▷ John Webster, ▷ Thomas Middleton, ▷ Francis Beaumont and ▷ John Fletcher. The Caroline period is associated with such figures as > Philip Massinger, > John Ford, and ▷ James Shirley. Courts were the centre of culture, and courts depended largely on the circumstances of monarchs: while the reign of Elizabeth was prosperous at home and (mainly) triumphant overseas, that of James saw increasing disagreement at home, and experience abroad was negative or even nationally humiliating. The reign of ➤ Charles I was yet more bitter in home dissensions but his court was one of distinction and refinement. The tone of the drama varied with these differences in national fortune and court conduct. However, the labelling of literary periods is always to some extent simplifying and even falsifying.

The Jacobean period was the first that was really rich in prose, with writers like ▷ Francis Bacon, ▷ John Donne and ▷ Lancelot Andrewes. Their work contrasts especially with Restoration prose, which sacrificed the poetic qualities of the Jacobean writing for the sake of grace and lucidity. Seventeenth-century literature.

Jacobin

Originally a name given to Dominican friars in France, because their first convent was in the Rue St Jacques in Paris. The name was transferred to a political society which rented a room in the convent in the first year of the French Revolution. The society developed into a highly organized political party, led by

Robespierre, who became practically dictator of France in 1793. The Jacobins were extreme in asserting the principle of equality and in their opposition to privilege. Later, when conservative reaction had set in, 'Jacobin' was used loosely for anyone with liberal political tendencies in England as well as in France.
The paper The Anti-Jacobin was founded to combat English liberal opinion in 1797.

Jacobite

From Jacobus, the Latin form of James.

> James II, of the House of > Stuart, was deposed in 1688 because, as a convert to > Catholicism, he was considered to be conspiring against the established Protestant religion and against Parliament. His supporters were called Jacobites and this name continued for the supporters of his Catholic son and grandsons.

After the crown passed to the House of (> George; Windsor, House of) Hanover, a German Protestant family, in 1714, British Jacobites conspired to restore the House of Stuart. The Jacobite Rebellions of 1715 and 1745 were the two most formidable attempts; both had principally Scottish support, partly because the Stuarts had originally been a Scottish royal family. The > 'Forty-five' rebellion quickly became a romantic legend chiefly because of the supposed gallantry and charm of its leader, Charles Edward Stuart, grandson of James II - 'Bonnie Prince Charlie' to his Scottish supporters and the 'Young Pretender' to his opponents. After the failure of the 'Forty-five' Jacobitism became increasingly a matter of sentiment which even persists to the present day, though the direct line of the Stuarts died out in 1807.

> Old Pretender, The.

Jacobson, Dan (b 1929)

Novelist, short-story writer and critic. Born in South Africa, he moved permanently to England in 1954, and is now Professor of English Literature at University College, London. His novels are: The Trap (1955); A Dance in the Sun (1956); The Price of Diamonds (1957); The Evidence of Love (1960); The Beginners (1966); The Rape of Tamar (1970); The Wonder Worker (1973); The Confessions of Joseph Baiz (1977); Hidden in the Heart (1991); The God Fearer (1992). His story collections include: A Long Way From London (1958); The Zulu and the Zeide (1959); Beggar My Neighbour (1964); Through the Wilderness (1968); A Way of Life (1971); Inklings: Selected Stories (1973). Up to and including The Beginners, the story of three generations of an immigrant Jewish family, the novels are set in South Africa, and are largely naturalistic in style. The Rape of Tamar, which inspired the play Yonadab by Peter Shaffer, is a more experimental work, much concerned with the ambiguities of narration. It has an old Testament setting, and a selfconscious, and highly characterized narrator. The Confessions of Joseph Baiz is the fictional autobiography of a man who can love only those whom he has betrayed, and is set in an imaginary totalitarian country, somewhat resembling South Africa. Recurrent concerns of Jacobson's novels and stories include power, religion, guilt and betrayal, and his work is characterized by its inventiveness and wit. His non-fiction includes: Time of Arrival and Other Essays (1967); The Story of the Stories: The Chosen People and its God (1982); Time and Time Again: Autobiographies (1985); Adult Pleasures: Essays on Writers and Readers (1988). The Electronic Elephant: A Southern African Fourney (1994).

Bib: Roberts, S., Dan Jacobson.

Jakobson, Roman (1896-1982)

Born in Moscow where he was educated. He worked in Czechoslovakia for almost 20 years, between 1920 and 1939, and after the German invasion he escaped to Scandinavia, before going to the U.S.A. where he taught in a number of universities, and became Professor of Russian Literature at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. During his formative years he was heavily influenced by a number of avante-garde movements in the Arts, but in his own work he laid specific emphasis upon the formulation of a 'poetics' which took into account the findings of structuralism, and the work of the Russian formalists. He was an active member of the Society for the Study of Poetic Language (OPOYAZ) which was founded in St Petersburg in 1916, and in 1926 he founded the Prague Linguistic Circle. His wife Krystyna Pomorska notes, in a recent collection of his writings, that poetry and visual art became for Jakobson the fundamental spheres for observing how verbal phenomena work and for studying how to approach them (Roman Jakobson, Language and Literature, 1987). Jakobson's work on the relationship between metaphor and metonymy (▶ Figures of speech) has been taken up and developed by a number of critics, with fruitful results for the understanding of Romantic poetry. The work of ⊳ Paul de Man, ⊳ Geoffrey Hartman, J. Hillis Miller and ➤ Harold Bloom is especially noteworthy.

Bib Hawkes, T., Structuralism and Semiotics; Jakobson, R., Language and Literature and Verbal Art, Verbal Sign, Verbal Time; Bennett, T., Formalism and Marxism; Erlich, V., Russian Formalism: History-Doctrine. James I, King of Scotland (1406–37) He was not actually crowned until 1424, owing to a long period of exile in England. His literary importance is his poetry; he is generally regarded as the author of ▷ The Kingis Quair, a love poem which may be autobiographical. It employs the 7-line stanza known as the ▷ rhyme-royal perhaps because of James' use of it, though he derived it from ▷ Chaucer.

James I of England and VI of Scotland A member of the Scottish House of ⊳ Stuart, he ruled over Scotland alone (1566-1603) and then over England as well (1603-25). He was the first sovereign ever to reign over the whole of the British Isles. His accession to the throne of England was due to the death without children of his cousin > Elizabeth I, last of the House of > Tudor. The literature and architecture of his era is known as ➤ Jacobean, a term transferred, especially in architecture, to the greater part of the 17th century. James was also an accomplished author in his own right. His works include Basilikon Doron (1599), an address to his son, > Prince Henry, on the rules of good government; True Law of Free Monarchies (1598), which argues that the monarch's power is absolute and God-given; and several theological treatises. Bib: Ashton, R., James I By His Contemporaries.

James II of England and VII of Scotland (1685-88)

King of Great Britain and Ireland. He was deposed because, as a Catholic, he was threatening the security of the > Church of England and at the same time weakening the power of Parliament. He was succeeded by his Protestant daughter > Mary II in conjunction with her Dutch husband, > William III.

> Jacobite; Glorious Revolution.

James IV (1590)

A romantic transvestite comedy by ▷ Robert Greene which dramatizes the loves of James IV and of his English wife Dorothea against whose life he conspires. The play's main action — which is the stuff of melodrama — is framed by the choric comments of Oberon and Bohan, a misanthropic Scot. In this respect Greene's practice accords with similar dramatic strategies adopted in ▷ Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, and it also anticipates the Chinese-box structure of ▷ A Midsummer Night's Dream and, to a lesser extent, ▷ Shakespeare's use of an induction in ▷ The Taming of the Shrew.

James, C.L.R. (1901-89)

Political activist, theorist, novelist, shortstory writer and journalist. Born in Trinidad and educated there at Queens Royal College secondary school, Port of Spain, he began his career in the 1920s as a professional cricket player, a school teacher and editor of the literary magazine Trinidad. During his long, active and eventful life he was for various periods cricket correspondent for the Manchester Guardian, editor of the Marxist journal Fight in London, a trade union organizer and Marxist activist in the USA, secretary of the West Indian Federal Labour Party in Trinidad, editor of The Nation (Port of Spain), a lecturer at various colleges and universities, a BBC cricket commentator and cricket columnist for Race Today. He was twice exiled to Britain: the first time in 1953, when the McCarthyite American government deported him because of his left-wing views, and the second time in the early 1960s when the leader of the Trinidadian Government (whose party James served as secretary and who had also once been his pupil) found his outspokeness threatening and forced him to leave. His political convictions were defined by Marxism and Pan-Africanism; in London in the 1930s he was associated with future African leaders Jomo Kenyata and Kwame Nkrumah. Pan-Africanism is explored in two of his political works: A History of Negro Revolt (1938), revised as A History of Pan-African Revolt (1969), and Nkrumah and the Ghanaian Revolution (1977). His response to Stalinism was to take a Trotskyist line: his book Mariners, Renegades and Castaways: The Story of Herman Melville and the World We Live In (1953) used a parallel with Melville's novel Moby Dick for a critique of Stalinism.

His own fiction writing began in the 1920s with short stories which, despite his own middleclass and British-influenced family background, were naturalistic (> naturalism) studies of the life of poor Trinidadians in the Port of Spain slums. His only novel, Minty Alley (1936), has a similar setting, examining the lives, relationships and hopes of the inhabitants of a Port of Spain boarding house. He published a large number of political and historical works, of which the most influential is The Black Jacobins: Toussaint L'Ouverture and the San Domingo Revolution (1938), an account of the slave revolt, led by L'Ouverture in Haiti in the 1790s and unique in the history of slavery in that it led to independence. He also wrote a play on this subject: Toussaint L'Ouverture, produced in London in 1936, revised as The Black Jacobins, and produced in Nigeria in 1967 (published in A Time and a Season: Eight Caribbean Plays, ed. E. Hill, 1976). His short stories are included in The Best Short Stories of 1928 (published by Cape) and in Island Voices (1970). He retained his enthusiasm for cricket and wrote several books on the game, notably Beyond the Boundary (1963), which examines the socio-political significance of cricket in both the West Indies and Britain. Other works include: The Life of Captain Cipriani: An Account of British Government in the West Indies (1932);

The Future in the Present: Selected Writings of C.L.R. James (1977); Spheres of Existence: Selected Writings (1981); At the Rendezvous of Victory: Selected Writings (1985).

Bib: Said, E., Culture and Imperialism.

James, George Payne Rainsford (1799–1860) Novelist and biographer. James was a diplomat and the historiographer of King William IV. He wrote numerous novels in the style of ➤ Walter Scott, as well as some useful historical material such as The Life of Edward the Black Prince (1836). His novels are predictable and often focus upon fearless and daring horsemen, for which he was justly ridiculed.

➤ Histories and Chronicles. Bib: Ellis, S.M., The Solitary Horseman: or the Life and Adventures of James.

James, Henry (1843-1916) Novelist. Born in New York; his father was an original writer on philosophy and theology, and his brother, William James, became one of the most distinguished philosophers and psychologists of his day. His education was divided between America and Europe. Europe drew him strongly, and he finally settled in Europe in 1875 after a series of long visits. He was naturalized British in 1915. Towards both continents, however, he had mixed emotions. As to America, he belonged to the eastern seaboard, New England, which had its own well-established traditions originating in English Puritanism, and he was out of sympathy with the American ardour for commercial enterprise and westward expansion. As to Europe, he was fascinated by the richness of its ancient societies and culture, but he brought an American, and especially a New England, eye to the corruption which such advanced development generated. The conflict was fruitful for his development as an artist, and it was not the only one; he was also aware of the contrast between the contemplativeness of his father's mind and the practical adventurousness characteristic of his brother's outlook and of Americans in general. And in his close study of the art of the novel, he felt the difference between the intense interest in form of the French tradition and the deeper moral interest to be found in the English tradition.

In the first period of his work, his theme is preponderantly the clash between the European and the American outlooks: Roderick Hudson (1875); The American (1877); The Europeans (1878); > Daisy Miller (1879); > The Portrait of a Lady (1881). To this period also belong two novels about American life: Washington Square (1881); The Bostonians (1886); and two restricted to English life, The Tragic Muse (1890); The Princess Casamassima (1886). His second period shows a much more concentrated and difficult style of treatment, and it concerns

English society only: The Spoils of Poynton and > What Maisie Knew (1897); The Awkward Age (1899). Between his first and second periods (1889-95) he experimented in drama; this was his least successful episode, but the experiment helped him to develop a dramatic technique in the writing of his novels. He wrote 12 plays in all. In his last period, the most intensive and subtle in style, James returned to the theme of the contrast of American and European values: > The Wings of the Dove (1902); > The Ambassadors (1903); > The Golden Bowl (1904). On his death he left unfinished The Ivory Tower and The Sense of the Past. Some of his best fiction is to be found among his short stories, and he was particularly fond of the > novella form - between a story and a usual novel in length; The Europeans and Washington Square come into this class, and so does his masterpiece of ambiguity, > The Turn of the Screw (1898).

In his criticism, James is important as the first distinguished writer in English to give the novel and its form concentrated critical attention. His essays have been collected under the title The House of Fiction (1957), edited by Leon Edel, who has also edited his letters (4 vols., 1974–84) and, with L.H. Powers, his notebooks (1987). James also wrote books of travel, the most notable of which is The American Scene (1907), and autobiographical pieces – A Small Boy and Others (1913); Notes of a Son and a Brother (1914) and Terminations (1917). (The last is also the title of a story published Bib: Edel, L., Henry James; Matthiessen, F. O., Henry James: The Major Phase; Anderson, Q., The American Henry James; Leavis, F. R., in The Great Tradition; Dupee, F. W., Henry James; Bewley, M., in The Complex Fate and in The Eccentric Design; Wilson, E., in The Triple Thinkers; Krook, D., The Ordeal of Consciousness in James; Gard, R. (ed.), James: The Critical Heritage; Tanner, T., Henry James; Berland, A., Culture and Conduct in the Novels of Henry James; Woolf, J., Henry James: The Major Novels; Poole, A., Henry James; Horne, P., Henry James and Revision.

James, P. D. (b 1920)

Writer of crime stories and ▷ detective fiction. P. D. James' skilful and subtle detective novels have made her into one of Britain's most popular writers, not simply for the dexterity with which she handles her suspense plots, but for the complex characterization and social context of her writing. Like the great women crime writers of the previous generation (▷ Agatha Christie, ▷ Dorothy L. Sayers, ▷ Margery Allingham and ▷ Ngaio Marsh), James has a central sleuth who figures in many of her novels ─ Adam Dalgleish of Scotland Yard, who first appeared in Cover Her Face (1962). Her other works include: A Mind to Murder (1963); Unnatural Causes (1967); An Unsuitable Job for a Woman (1972); The Black Tower (1975); Innocent Blood (1980); A Taste for Death (1986); Devices and Desires (1989); and Original Sin (1994).

Jameson, Anna Brownell (1794-1860) Essavist, travel writer, art historian, critic and biographer. Jameson is one of the most renowned Irish writers of her day, and she was friendly with many of her literary contemporaries, including ➤ Harriet Martineau, ➤ Mary Mitford, and Catherine Sedgwick, as well as the ➤ Victorian authors Elizabeth Barrett (1806-61) and Robert Browning (1812-89). Her work is known on two accounts: first for her book on Shakespeare's heroines, Characteristics of Women (1832), for which she read Samuel Johnson (1709-84), ➤ Hazlitt, ➤ Coleridge and ➤ Lamb. This book has recently been revived by ⊳ feminist criticism and seen more as a vindication of the imaginative and independent women of the early 19th century than as homage to a patriarch of English literature. However, Jameson herself reported that her writing would please only those women who were 'fair, pure-hearted, delicate-minded, and unclassical'. Secondly, Jameson was praised for her travel writings which include Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada (1838) and Pictures of the Social Life in Germany (1840). These are more lively and exciting than conventional ▷ travel literature and may be classified as ⊳ picaresque writing. Bib: Nestor, P., Female Friendships and Communities; Sherman, C., Women as Interpreters of the Visual Arts; Thomas, C., Love and Work Enough: The Life of Anna Jameson.

Jane Eyre (1847)

This best-known and most popular of the novels of ▶ Charlotte Brontë is in the form of a fictionalized > autobiography containing some authentic autobiographical information. The earlier and most generally admired part of the book details the experiences of the penniless and unattractive eponymous heroine, first in the household of her unfeeling aunt, Mrs Reed, and later at Lowood Asylum - a charitable school based on Cowan Bridge, which Charlotte and her sisters attended. Following this, Jane takes up the position of governess to the household of the Byronic Mr Rochester, to whom she becomes increasingly attracted, finally agreeing to marry him. Unbeknown to her, however, he has a mad wife, Bertha Mason, who is locked in the attic and who escapes the evening before the wedding and tears Jane's wedding veil before her eyes. In church the next day Rochester is exposed as a potential bigamist by his wife's brother. In the third section Jane flees, finding sanctuary with Mary, Diana and their brother St John Rivers – a cold and passionless clergyman who proposes marriage to her. Jane refuses him after a telepathic communication from Rochester because, unlike the passionate but morally flawed Rochester, Rivers does not love her. The fortuitous bequest of a legacy by an unknown uncle in Madeira reveals the hitherto unsuspected kinship between Jane and the Rivers family and, armed with a family and independent means, she returns to Rochester to discover that his house has burned down and that he has been blinded and maimed trying to save his wife. His equal at last, she marries him.

The novel is a mixture of \triangleright Romantic. ➤ Gothic and ➤ realist forms, a female Bildungsroman (a novel describing the youthful development of a central character, usually male) that challenged contemporary attitudes in its portrayal of a 'strong-minded' and desiring woman. Jane Eyre was the catalyst for feminist criticism of the 1980s, beginning with S. Gilbert and S. Gubar's The Madwoman in the Attic (1979), in which unstable female characters in texts written by women were seen as doubles of the sane heroine and products of the suppression of the feminine. Another rereading occurred several years earlier in Jean Rhys' The Wide Sargasso Sea (1966) which tells the story sympathetically from the perspective of the first Mrs Rochester and places the novel in the context of 19th-century colonialism. Bib: Chakravorty Spivak, G., 'Three Women's Texts and a Critique of Imperialism'; Nestor, P., Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre.

Jane Shore, The Tragedy of (1714)
Play by ▷ Nicholas Rowe, based on a historic character, who was mistress of Edward IV, and afterwards of Thomas Grey, first Marquis of Dorset. Rowe stated on the title page that the play was 'Written in Imitation of Shakespeare's Style'. It traces Jane's descent, from wealth and influence as Edward's mistress, to ignominy and destitution. At her lowest ebb, she is rescued by her husband. The play is numbered among the so-called ▷ 'she-tragedies' of Rowe, which focus on the central figure of a suffering woman, and depend largely on pathos for their effect. Jane's story became symbolic of the reversal of fortune.

Janet's Repentance
One of ➤ George Eliot's ➤ Scenes of Clerical Life.

Jefferies, Richard (1848–87)
Essayist and novelist. He wrote about the English countryside and its life and presented it plainly, without affection but with force. This has caused his reputation to rise in the 20th century, with its intensified interest in preserving natural surroundings and in understanding their environmental influence in society. He is well known for his volumes of essays: Gamekeeper at Home (1878); Wild Life in a Southern County (1879); Round About a Great Estate (1880); Wood Magic (1881); The Life of the Fields (1884). His novels are Greene Ferne Farm (1880); The Demy Morn (1884); Amaryllis at the Fair (1887); After London, or Wild England (1885). His best-known books are probably Bevis (1882), a children's story (> Children's literature), and his autobiography, The Story of my Heart (1883).

Regional Novel.
 Bib: Taylor, B., Richard Jefferies.

Jeffrey, Francis (1773–1850)

Critic and editor (1803–29) of the influential > Edinburgh Review which he helped to found in 1802. His poetic taste was conservative, and he was unsympathetic to the > Lake Poets, > Wordsworth and > Coleridge. However, in 1820 he judiciously encouraged > Keats for his > Endymion, which had been condemned by > Blackwoods and the > Quarterly. His weakness as a critic was not his conservatism but his susceptibility to verse of second-rate appeal such as that of Thomas Campbell and of Samuel Rogers.

As editor, Jeffrey gave the Edinburgh authority proportionate to its intellectual independence, and its sales reached nearly 14,000 in 1818 – a high figure at any time for a periodical of such intellectual seriousness. In politics, Jeffrey was a Whig and his journal was the mouthpiece of responsible Whig opinion.

His profession was the law, in which he excelled and was eventually made a judge.

Jeffreys, Judge

➤ Bloody Assizes; Sedgemoor, Battle of.

Jekyll and Hyde

> Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, The.

Jellicoe, Ann (b 1927)

One of few women to break into the theatre business as a writer and director during the 1950s and 60s. She was a ➤ Royal Court writer and a member of the Theatre Writers' Group organized there between 1958 and 1960, which also included > John Arden, > Edward Bond and > Arnold Wesker. Her early plays include The Sport of My Mad Mother (1958), about teddy-boy violence, and The Knack (1961), about sexual competition. The written text of both these plays only gives a slight impression of their effect in performance since she writes in a non-literary style with clear ideas for direction in mind. Later plays such as Shelley (1965) and The Giveaway (1969) are less unconventional. More recently she has become renowned for her productions of community plays in which she has drawn on the talents of large numbers of people from single communities, bringing together professionals and amateurs, adults and schoolchildren. An example of such work is Entertaining Strangers written by \triangleright David Edgar and originally performed in Dorset (later re-written by him for $a \triangleright$ National Theatre production in 1987).

Bib: Jellicoe, A., Community Plays: How to Put Them On.

Jennings, Elizabeth (b 1926)

Poet. Published her first collection, Poems, in 1953, and was initially associated with the > Movement, although the mystical quality of her work (Jennings is a > Catholic) makes this categorization problematic. She writes prolifically, generally using traditional verse techniques, but she has also experimented with > free verse. Jennings has spent much of her life living and working in Oxford. Her second book, A Way of Looking (1955), won her the Somerset Maugham Award, and her most important collections to date are: A Sense of the World (1958); Song for Birth and Death (1961); Recoveries (1964); The Mind Has Mountains (1966); Growing Points (1975); Moments of Grace (1979); Celebrations and Elegies (1982); and Familiar Spirits (1994). A Collected Works and a Selected Works appeared in 1967 and 1979 respectively.

Jerome, Jerome K. (1859-1927)

Novelist. Born in Walsall and brought up in the East End of London, where his father was an ironmonger, Jerome worked as an actor and journalist. His Three Men in a Boat (1889) is a comic > picaresque tale of a rowing holiday on the Thames, and its popular success encouraged Jerome to write a sequel, Three Men on the Bummel (1900), in which the characters are taken to Germany. Other works include the autobiographical Paul Kelver (1902) and the autobiography My Life and Times (1926).

Jesuit

A member of the Society of Jesus, a religious order founded by Ignatius Loyola, and approved by the Pope in 1540. The Jesuits were in the forefront of combating ▷ Protestantism. In the reign of ▷ Elizabeth I they led, or were reputed to lead, the various conspiracies against her on behalf of the Catholic claimant to the English throne, ▷ Mary Queen of Scots; they were therefore regarded as national as well as religious enemies. Their advanced training made them skilled debaters and subtle negotiators. Notable English Jesuits of the English Renaissance include ▷ Edmund Campion and ▷ Robert Southwell.

Jevon (Jevorn), Thomas (1652–88) Actor, dancer, singer, dramatist. Jevon started his career as a dancing master, and joined the ▷ Duke's Company, possibly before 1673. He had an irreverent sense of humour, and specialized in low comic parts. He was a favourite speaker of prologues and epilogues, and also wrote the highly successful The Devil of a Wife (1686), which was adapted several times in the 18th century.

Jew of Malta, The

A ⊳ blank-verse drama by ⊳ Christopher Marlowe, written and performed about 1590; published 1633. An actor impersonating the Italian political philosopher ➤ Machiavelli speaks the prologue and thereby sets the tone of the play, since to the English of Marlowe's time Machiavelli, who had sought to conduct politics amorally by scientific methods, was a godless monster. We thus expect a play dominated by evil. However, a comic tradition for the presentation of godless monsters had come down to Marlowe from the medieval mystery plays, which had presented such figures as Herod and Satan as grotesque caricatures, frightening but funny at the same time. So the Machiavellian central character, Barabas the Jew, boasting that his wealth has been acquired iniquitously, is made too impressive to be taken lightly and yet too extravagant to be taken soberly. His only philosophy is the art of gaining advantage. In the first half of the play he tries to outwit the Christians of Malta, who, scarcely less Machiavellian than himself, try to deprive him of his wealth. He eventually betrays the island to the Turks, and proceeds to try to outwit them, but he falls victim to his own plot. In a famous essay on Marlowe (Selected Essays), T. S. Eliot (1888-1965) described the play as an example of 'the farce of the old English humour, the terribly serious, even savage comic humour'; in his essay on ➤ Ben Jonson, Eliot points to The Jew of Malta as the forebear of Jonson's Comedy of ➤ Humours.

Jewsbury, Geraldine Endsor (1812-80) Novelist, critic and journalist born in Measham, Derbyshire, the fourth of six children. Her elder sister Maria, also a writer, cared for the family until her marriage when Geraldine took over, looking after her father until his death in 1840 and her brothers until her marriage in 1853. Fêted in social and intellectual circles her friends included > Charles Kingsley and his wife, the ➤ Rossettis, ➤ Ruskin and ➤ Huxley. Her first novel, Zoë, was published in 1845, and is one of the first Victorian novels to examine religious scepticism. It was followed by The Half-Sisters (1848) and Marian Withers (1851) both arguing strongly for changes in the upbringing of women. Jewsbsury moved to London to be close to her great friend > Jane Welsh Carlyle and, despite ill-health, she contributed articles and reviews to periodicals such as ➤ The Westminster Review and > The Athenaeum and was a reader for the publisher, Bentley's, influencing the choice of books selected for Mudie's Decirculating library. She wrote three further novels: Constance Herbert (1855), The Sorrows of Gentility (1856) and Right or Wrong (1856), as well as two stories for children. She was well known for her wit and conversation, and in 1892 A Selection from the Letters of Geraldine Jewsbury to Jane Welsh Carlyle was published (ed. Mrs A. Ireland). Both women had wanted their letters destroyed. Virginia Woolf wrote an article, 'Geraldine and Jane', for The Times Literary Supplement (28 February 1929) concerning the women's friendship.

➤ Women's Movement.
Bib: Howe, S., Geraldine Jewsbury.

Jewsbury, Maria Jane (1800-33)

Poet. The eldest sister of the ➤ Victorian novelist Geraldine Jewsbury, Maria suffered from general ill-health, although her early death was due to an attack of cholera she suffered in India. Her first published work, Phantasmagoria (1825), consists of poems and some prose sketches which attack contemporary literary tastes. She dedicated the book to ➤ Wordsworth, whose daughter, Dora, was one of her friends. Lays of Leisure Hours (1829) was dedicated to another acquaintance, ➤ Felicia Hemans, to whom she wrote: 'the ambition of writing a book, being praised publically and associating with authors, siezed me'.

➤ Lay.

Bib: Howe, S., Geraldine Jewsbury, Her Life and Errors.

Jhabvala, Ruth Prawar (b 1927)

Novelist, short-story writer, and writer of screenplays. She was born in Germany of Polish parents who came to England as refugees in the year of her birth. She studied at London University and in 1951 married the Indian architect C. S. H. Jhabvala. From 1951 to 1975 she lived in India, and since then has lived in New York. Many of her novels are based on her own ambiguous position in India as a European with an Indian family. They explore the tensions of contemporary Indian society. such as the conflict of ancient and modern ideas and the interaction of Westernized and non-Westernized Indians. They are based on witty but sympathetic observation of social manners, largely in domestic settings. Some of the sharpest satire is reserved for the naive and superficial enthusiasm of certain visiting Europeans, who are frequently exploited by a manipulative swami. Heat and Dust (1975) employs a double narrative consisting of the experiences of a contemporary English girl in India, and the love affair of her grandfather's first wife with an Indian prince in 1923. In Search of Love and Beauty (1983) reflects Jhabvala's change of home; it is a story of German Jewish emigrés in 1930s New York while Poet and Dancer (1993) links the lives of German and Indian New York emigrés. Her other novels are: To Whom She Will (1955); The Nature of Passion (1956); Esmond in India (1958); The Householder (1960); Get Ready For Battle (1962); A Backward Place (1965); A New Dominion (1972); In Search of Love and Beauty (1983); Three Continents (1988). Story collections are: Like Birds, Like Fishes (1963); A Stronger Climate (1968); An Experience of India (1971); How I Became A Holy Mother (1976); Out of India: Selected Stories (1987). She has written a number of screenplays, some of which are based on her own works, as part of a highly successful film-making team with James Ivory as director and Ismail Merchant as producer: The Householder (1963); Shakespeare Wallah (with Ivory; 1965); The Europeans (1979) (based on the novel by > Henry James); Quartet (1981) (based on the novel by > Jean Rhys); Heat and Dust (1983); The Bostonians (1984) (based on the > Henry James novel); A Room with a View (1986) and Howards End (1992) (based on the novels by > E. M. Forster). Bib: Sucher, L., The Fiction of Ruth Prawar Thabvala; Long, R. E., The Films of Merchant Ivory.

Joan of Arc (Jeanne d'Arc) (1412-31) A French national heroine for the leading part she played in turning the ➤ Hundred Years' War finally against the English invaders of France.

Politically the position was that ➤ Henry V of England had succeeded by the Treaty of Troyes (1420) in getting his son recognized as the next king of France in succession to Charles VI (1380-1422). His son was in fact proclaimed king of France in 1422 in Paris, but the English controlled only the north and east of France, and the French were still fighting, although Charles VI's son, Charles the Dauphin, had no appetite for war. The English, in alliance with the Burgundians, continued to win victories.

In 1429 Joan, daughter of a French farmer, came forward declaring that heavenly voices had directed her to relieve the city of Orleans, besieged by the English, and to lead the Dauphin to Rheims to be crowned King Charles VII. She carried out both promises and attempted to relieve Paris, which was in English hands. She was, however, taken prisoner by the Burgundians, who delivered her to the English. She was by this time regarded as a heaven-sent inspiration to the French, and the English were determined to discredit her; accordingly they secured that she was condemned for heresy by a Church court, and then burnt alive in Rouen. The war continued to go against them, however, and by 1453 they were driven from France. In 1456 the condemnation of Joan for heresy was annulled by the Church, and in 1920 she was declared a saint.

For some time the English continued to remember her as a witch and she is so represented in the early play by Shakespeare, \triangleright Henry VI, Part I, where she appears under her French nickname of 'La Pucelle' – the Maid. By far the most striking representation of her career in English is the play Saint Joan (1924) by \triangleright George Bernard Shaw.

Joceline, Elizabeth (1596-1622)

Tract-writer. Elizabeth Brooke was brought up by her maternal grandfather, Bishop Caderton, who was Master of Queens' College, Cambridge, and she was educated in religion, languages, history and art. She married Tourell Joceline in 1616, and died in childbirth six years later. While she was pregnant she wrote a book of moral and religious instruction for her unborn child, which is especially interesting in its genderspecific teachings. While being aware that a son would traditionally be the preferred sex, Joceline is careful to point out that a daughter will be equally welcome to her. Her touching account was published as The Mothers Legacie To Her Unborn Childe, with a preface by her husband, in 1624.

Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

John Halifax, Gentleman (1856) A highly successful novel by Dinah Mulloch Craik. The tale is narrated by Phineas Fletcher, a crippled man of sensitive character. He relates the story of John Halifax, who begins his working life as a tanner's apprentice, but rises in the world through his hard work, heroic deeds and good fortune. By the end of the novel he has married an heiress, bought property and a business, and is given the opportunity to run for Parliament. Phineas Fletcher, unable to pursue the material rewards of the world as a result of his physical disability, has been seen as symbolizing women's position in society. Phineas does not, however, revolt against his lot, but shows profound admiration for the achievements of Halifax.

John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster
Fourth son of ➤ Edward III. He derived the name 'Gaunt' from his birthplace, the town of Ghent in Flanders. By marrying the only daughter of the Duke of Lancaster he inherited the title and became the most powerful lord in England. He is chiefly remembered; I as the ancestor of the Lancastrian line of kings, beginning with his son ➤ Henry IV; 2 as the protector of the religious reformer ➤ John Wycliffe; 3 as a possible patron of the poet ➤ Geoffrey Chaucer, whose wife's sister he married; 4 for the representation of him by Shakespeare in ➤ Richard II.

➤ Lancaster, House of.

Johnson, B. S. (1933–73) Novelist, poet and dramatist. His novels were highly experimental, taking as their main subject his own life as a novelist and the nature of the novel. He employed a whole range of ⊳ postmodernist narrative devices for questioning the boundaries of fact and fiction. He claimed to write, not fiction, but 'truth in the form of a novel'. Travelling People (1963) uses a different viewpoint or narrative mode for each chapter, including a film scenario, letters and typographical effects. In Alberto Angelo (1964) the 'author' breaks into the narrative to discuss his own techniques, aims and sources. The Unfortunates (1969) is a loose-leaf novel of 27 sections, 25 of which can be read in any order. Johnson committed suicide at the age of 40, soon after completing See the Old Lady Decently (1975), which is based around the death of his mother in 1971, and incorporates family documents and photographs. His other novels are: Trawl (1966); House Mother Normal (1971); Christie Malry's Own Double Entry (1973). He also wrote plays, screenplays, television scripts and several collections of poems.

Johnson, Linton Kwesi (b 1952)

Poet and recording artist. Johnson was born in Jamaica and has lived in Britain since 1961; he read sociology at London University and was a Fellow at Warwick University. The most famous of the young Anglo-Jamaican poets to emerge since the mid-1970s (others include Benjamin Zephaniah and the older ≥ James Berry), influenced by reggae, dub and Rastafarian rhythms, his live performances and recordings with Virgin records have done much to open other forms of contemporary British poetry to a wide young audience. His three volumes of poetry have been extremely popular: Voice of the Living and the Dead (1974); Dead Beat An' Blood (1975); Inglan is a Bitch (1980).

➤ Post-colonial literature.

Johnson, Lionel (Pigot) (1867-1902) Poet and critic. Born in Kent, the son of an Irish army officer, he grew up in Wales and was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford where he enjoyed a distinguished academic career. After graduating he became a journalist contributing to the > Spectator, Academy, and ➤ Athenaeum among others. He displayed an enthusiasm for medieval thought (⊳ medievalism in Victorian literature), was a prominent member of the > Rhymers' Club, and was a close associate of ➤ W.B. Yeats. Johnson's volume Ireland and Other Poems (1897) was deeply influenced by his interest in the Irish literary revival (> Irish literature in English) and his own Irish ancestry, which he began to investigate in 1893. He was received into the Roman Catholic church in 1891. Other works, such as Poems (1895), bear the mark of > Walter Pater's ideas and Johnson's own classical learning. He also helped to edit the The Irish Home Reading Magazine in 1804. His influences can be traced to Yeats' early work, in particular The Wind Among the Reeds (1899) and he is named in 'In Memory of Major Robert Gregory' as a learned man who 'brooded upon sanctity'. His chief critical books include Postliminium (1911), a posthumous collection of literary essays, and a pioneering study of > Thomas Hardy (The Art of Thomas Hardy, 1894; 1923). He contributed to the ➤ Yellow Book and the Book of the Rhymers' Club. The characteristic fin-de-siècle remorse that informs his poetry was occasioned by his alcoholism and the poem 'The Dark Angel' is a philosophical account of his own ruined life. His Complete Poems (ed. I. Fletcher) appeared in 1853. Bib: Stanfoed, D. (ed.), Poets of the Nineties.

Johnson, Pamela Hansford (1912-81)

Novelist. Perhaps her best-known work is the trilogy composed of Too Dear for my Possessing (1940), An Avenue of Stone (1947) and A Summer to Decide (1949). These extend from the late 1920s to the late 1940s, and combine observation of events and society with the study of intricate relationships arising from the attractions for each other of unlike characters. The formal quality reflects the influence of > Marcel Proust, on whom Pamela Hansford Johnson composed a series of radio programmes, Six Proust Reconstructions (1958). Some of her later novels were more comic and satirical (eg, Who is Here?, 1962 Night and Silence, 1963; Cork Street, 1965 and Next to the Hatter's, 1965) but An Error of Judgement (1962) concerns the problem of apparently motiveless evil in modern society, and relates to her non-fictional investigation of the Moors Murder case, On Iniquity (1967). Pamela Hansford Johnson was married to the novelist > C. P. Snow. Her other novels are: The Survival of the Fittest (1968); The Honours Board (1970); The Holiday Friend (1972); The Good Listener (1975); The Good Husband (1978); A Bonfire (1981). Bib: Burgess, A., The Novel Now; Lindblad, I., Pamela Hansford Johnson.

Johnson, Samuel (1709-84)

Critic, poet, lexicographer, essayist. He was born at Lichfield to elderly parents, and his childhood was marred by ill health; a tubercular infection from his wetnurse affected both his sight and hearing, and his face was scarred by scrofula or the > 'King's Evil'. He was educated at Lichfield Grammar School, and in 1728 went up to Pembroke College, Oxford; his studies at the university were, however, cut short by poverty, and in 1729 he returned to Lichfield, affected by melancholy depression.

After a brief period as a schoolmaster at Market Bosworth, Johnson moved to Birmingham, where he contributed articles (now lost) to the Birmingham Journal. In 1735 he married Elizabeth Porter, a widow greatly his senior, and using her money attempted to start a school at Edial, near his home town. The school quickly failed, and in 1737 Johnson set off to London accompanied by one of his pupils, the actor > David Garrick. Lack of a university degree hindered him from pursuing a profession, and he determined to make a living by writing.

Edward Cave, the founder of \triangleright The Gentleman's Magazine, allowed him to contribute articles, and for many years Johnson lived by > hack writing. His Parliamentary Debates were published in this magazine, and were widely believed to be authentic. In 1738 the publication of his poem, London, revealed his literary abilities. But the project of compiling the > Dictionary of the English Language which was to occupy the next nine years testifies to Johnson's concern to produce saleable material. Lacking a patron, he approached ➤ Lord Chesterfield with the plan; the resulting snub is a notorious episode in the decline of the patronage system. In 1749, the poem > The Vanity of Human Wishes was published, and his play Irene staged by Garrick. In 1750 he began the twice-weekly periodical > The Rambler, to add to his income but also as a relief from the Dictionary work.

The death of his wife in 1752 returned Johnson to the melancholy depression he had suffered after leaving Oxford. However, he continued to contribute to periodicals, and in 1755 the Dictionary was published, bringing him wide acclaim which also included, by the intervention of friends, an honorary degree from Oxford. From 1758−60 he wrote the > Idler essays for the Universal Chronicle, and in 1759 > Rasselas was published. In 1762 a crown pension relieved some of the financial pressure, and the following year he met > James Boswell, who was to become his biographer.

In 1765 Johnson's spirits were much lifted as he made the acquaintance of the Thrales, and over the next few years he spent much time at their home in Streatham. In the same year, his edition of ➤ Shakespeare, for which he wrote a famous Preface, appeared.

Johnson's desire to travel was partly fulfilled by journeys made in his later years. In 1773 he and Boswell made their > Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland (1775), and in 1774 Johnson went to Wales with the Thrale family. The following year he accompanied the Thrales to Paris, his only visit to the Continent.

In 1777 Johnson began work on ➤ The Lives of the Poets (1779–81), at the request of booksellers. In 1784, estranged from his friend Mrs Thrale by her remarriage, he died in his home in Bolt Court. He is buried in Westminster Abbev.

Bib: Boswell, J. (ed. Hill, G.B.; revised Powell, L.F.), The Life of Samuel Johnson; Bate, W.J., Samuel Johnson; Hardy, J.P., Samuel Johnson: A Critical Study.

Johnson, The Life of Samuel (1791)

→ Boswell, James.

Johnson's Dictionary

→ Dictionary of the English Language, A.

Jonathan Wild the Great, The Life of (1743) A satirical romance by ▷ Henry Fielding. His purpose was to ridicule 'greatness' by telling the story of a 'great' criminal in apparently admiring terms. The subject makes clear that the admiration is ironical, but the reader is reminded that eminent statesmen and other 'respectable' men of power – all those, in fact, who are normally regarded as great – commonly pursue their aims with as little scruple. Wild was a historical character who had been executed in 1725, and made the subject of a narrative by ▷ Defoe.

In Fielding's fictional satire, Wild begins his career by being baptized by ▷ Titus Oates – also a criminal character – and takes to a career of crime in childhood. He becomes the leader of a gang of thieves, among whom he keeps discipline by threatening them with denunciation, while himself avoiding incrimination. The vilest of his crimes is the systematic ruin of his former schoolfriend, the jeweller Heartfree, whom he nearly succeeds in having executed. In the end it is Wild who is executed, but he is sent to his death with the same ▷ mock-heroic impressiveness as has characterized Fielding's treatment of him throughout.

▶ Picaresque.

Jones, David Michael (1895-1974)

Poet and artist. His paintings, engravings and woodcuts are probably now better known than his writing, with the exception of In Parenthesis (1937), an account of his experiences in World War I that combines verse and prose. See also The Anathemata (1952), Jones' most important work, and Epoch and Artist (selected writings, 1959).

Jones, Glyn (1905-95)

Poet, short-story writer and novelist. Born in Merthyr Tydfil into a Welsh-speaking family, his education in the medium of English during his creatively formative years at Cyfarthfa Castle Grammar School constrained him into writing only in the English language, though later in his life he returned to the study of Welsh to become fluent in it, reading widely in its poetry and translating it into English. This more than subliminal cultural and linguistic influence shaped his work in a distinctive manner. His teaching career provided insights into the imagination of the young, encouraging him in the use of boy-narrators in his novels and short stories. His early literary influences were D. H. Lawrence, Gerard Manley Hopkins and later

Dylan Thomas, with whom he formed a close friendship, the Imagists and, most particularly, Welsh-language poetry. Thus Glyn Jones developed two tongues as a writer: one, rural, poetic and visionary, a timeless one describing the Welsh-speaking life of chapel and farm where his characters live close to nature; and the other, an Anglicized, more overtly comic one, involved in material problems, social status, possessions, money and education, of the twentieth-century industrialized valleys of South Wales, removed from the poetic into the satirical imagination. His short-story collections comprise: The Blue Bed (1937); The Water Music (1944); Selected Short Stories (1971); and Welsh Heirs (1977); his novels: The Valley, the City, the Village (1956); The Learning Lark (1960); and The Island of Apples (1965); his poetry: Poems (1939); The Dream of Jake Hopkins (1939); Selected Poems (1975); and Selected Poems, Fragments and Fictions (1988); and two seminal works of biography and literary criticism: The Dragon Has Two Tongues (1968); and Profiles (1980, with John Rowlands). A valedictory anthology of his best work, Goodbye, What Were You?, appeared in 1994, and at the time of writing Collected editions of his poetry and short stories are being edited by Meic Stephens and Tony Brown respectively, editions which, it is hoped, may help one of Wales' greatest writers of this century to the recognition he has so far failed to gain outside his native land.

Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles; Jones, G., The Dragon Has Two Tongues; Simpson, M., 'Assimilation and Synthesis: Glyn Jones as Anglo-Welsh Poet', Poetry Wales, XIX, 3, (1984), pp 72–89.

Jones, Gwyn (b 1907)

Novelist, short story writer, editor and scholar. Gwyn Jones was born in Blackwood, Monmouthshire, and was educated at Tredegar Grammar School and University College, Cardiff. He first taught in England before returning to Wales in 1935 as a lecturer in the English Department at University College, Cardiff. In 1939, conscious of the growing strength of Anglo-Welsh writing, he founded The Welsh Review, which nevertheless had to cease publication because of World War II, resuming in 1944 for a further four years. In 1940, Gwyn Jones became Professor of English at the University College of Wales, Abertyswyth, a position he held until 1964 when he returned to Cardiff to occupy the Chair of English until his retirement in 1975. His short story collections comprise The Buttercup Field (1945), The Still Waters (1948), Shepherd's Hey (1953), followed by Selected Short Stories (1974) and his editing of three collections of Welsh Short Stories in 1941, 1956 and the last, Twenty-Five Welsh Short Stories, co-editor Islwyn Ffowc Elis, 1971. He began his career as a novelist with the historical novel Richard Savage (1935), following this with Times Like These (1936), The Nine Days' Wonder (1937), Garland of Bays (1938), The Green Island, a novella (1946), The Flowers Beneath the Scythe (1952) and The Walk Home (1962), another historical novel. However, he is best known for his translation, with Thomas Jones, of The Mabinogion (1948-9) and for his seminal works on Viking exploration and conquest, Kings, Beasts and Heroes (1972) all of which made him world-famous. He also edited The Oxford Book of Welsh Verse in English (1977), produced a descriptive essay, A Prospect of Wales (1948) and collected, for children, Welsh Legends and Folk Tales (1955, 1979) and Scandinavian Legends and Folk Tales (1956). His most important lectures on Anglo-Welsh literature are The First Forty Years (1957) and the BBC Wales Annual Lecture, 1977, Being and Belonging, in which he traces the development of Welsh writing in English from Caradoc Evans as its 'first distinctive ancestral voice'. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Jones, Henry Arthur (1851-1929) Dramatist. He wrote some 60 plays, and is notable for beginning an English dramatic revival in the later years of the 19th century along with T. W. Robertson, > Arthur Pinero and ➤ Shaw. For instance Saints and Sinners (1884) was not only a dramatic success, but aroused controversy by discussing religious issues in a study of middle-class provincial life. Other plays of comparable note: The Middleman (1889) and Judah (1890). His lectures and essays on drama were collected in The Renascence of the English Drama (1895). Bib: Jones, A. D., Life; Archer, W., The Old Drama and the New; Cordell, R. A., Henry Arthur Jones and the Modern Drama.

Jones, Inigo (1573–1651) Architect and stage designer. He is sometimes called 'the English > Palladio' because he was strongly influenced by the Italian architect of that name, and he was in fact the first important classical (Palladian) architect in English architecture. Iones and his assistant John Webb brought classical ideas into the material and commercial worlds of London architecture and the ➤ Renaissance theatre. Outstanding buildings of his design include the Banqueting Hall in Whitehall and St Paul's church in Covent Garden, both in London. He also designed sets for ➤ masques, to which words were contributed by ➤ Ben Jonson, > Samuel Daniel and other poets among his contemporaries. Scenery and music were as important in the masque as poetry, and the fusion led to bitter rivalry between Jones and Jonson, who satirized him as In-and-In Medlay in The Tale of a Tub.

Bib: Orrell, J., The Theatres of Inigo Jones and John Webb; Simpson, P. and Bell, C. F., Designs by Inigo Jones for Masques and Plays at Court; Orgel, S. and Strong, R., Inigo Jones: The Theatre of the Stuart Masque.

Jones, Jack (1884-1970)

Novelist, Born in Merthyr Tydfil into a family of fifteen children, Jack Jones became, as his father had been, a miner. He later joined the army, fought in the Boer War and in World War I, became involved in post-war politics, shifting his allegiances from left to right, and then had a variety of jobs from navvy to cinema manager before he took up writing during a period of unemployment in 1928 when he was living in Cardiff. His novels exude narrative energy, humour, pathos, enlivened further by vivid scenes in which a host of bizarre characters appear, and show an understanding and sympathy with working-class life in Glamorgan's industrial valleys during the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, with detailed research into the historical backgrounds of his settings. His most successful novels are his earlier ones from the 1930s. His novels are: Black Parade (1935); Rhondda Roundabout (1934); Bidden to the Feast (1938), Off to Philadelphia in the Morning (1947); Some Trust in Chariots (1948); River out of Eden (1951); Lily of the Valley (1952); Lucky Lear (1952); Time and the Business (1953); Choral Symphony (1955); and Come, Night; End, Day! (1956). He also produced three volumes of autobiography: Unfinished Journey (1937); Me and Mine (1946); and Give me back my Heart (1950). Three plays: Land of my Fathers (1937); Rhondda Roundabout (1939); and Transatlantic Episode (1947); and a biography of David Lloyd George, The Man David (1944).

Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles; Jones, G., The Dragon Has Two Tongues.

Jones, Lewis (1897–1939)
Novelist. Born in Clydach Vale, Rhondda, Glamorgan, Lewis Jones became a miner at the age of 12, was married at 16, and later joined the Communist party to become a political activist, for which he was victimized, even being imprisoned for allegedly seditious public speeches. During his difficult and busy life he wrote two novels, Cwmardy (1937) and We Live! (1939), both authentic and powerful in their portrayal of the socio-economic and political situation in the South Wales Valleys between the Wars but also showing a sensitive insight into the stress-laden family relationships in this close-knit community.

Jones, Sally Roberts (b 1935)

Poet, short story writer and publisher. Born in London, but when she was thirteen the family moved to North Wales, where she was later educated at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, Having trained as a librarian in London, she returned in 1967 to Wales to take up a post as reference librarian at Port Talbot where she has since lived and where much of her poetry is set. Her work is informed by a steely sense of irony and by an ability to reveal the darker side of apparently mundane circumstances and events. Her collections of poetry are: Turning Away (1969); Strangers and Brothers (1977); The Forgotten Country (1977); and Relative Values (1985). She has also compiled a bibliography, Books of Welsh Interest (1977) and has provided a monograph on Allen Raine for the Writers of Wales series (1979). She has also recently produced a historical monograph, Dic Penderyn, the Man and the Martyr (1993) and has written extensively on local history in Essex, including a history of Romford, and on South Wales, especially Port Talbot. She founded the publishing business Alun Books in 1977.

Bib: Stephens, M., The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales.

Jones, Sir William (1746-94)

Translator. Jones occupied the post of high court judge at Calcutta for eleven years (1783–94) and during this period learned Sanskrit and embarked upon translating Indian literature into English. His most famous work of this period is Sacontala, or the Fatal Ring: an Indian Drama by Calidas (1779). Before Jones travelled to India, he had learned Arabic, translating several poems which were published as The Moullakat (1782). His works contributed to the fashion for oriental culture and he influenced ▶ Byron, ▶ Southey and ▶ Moore.

➤ Orientalism; Translation. Bib: Cannon, G.H., Oriental Jones: A Biography; Mukherjee, S.N., Jones: A Study In Eighteenth-century British Attitudes to India.

Jonson, Benjamin (1572-1637)

Dramatist and poet; always known as Ben Jonson. In drama, he was ▷ Shakespeare's most distinguished rival, but they differed greatly in gifts and achievement. Sixteen of his plays, not including ▷ masques, have survived; 14 comedies and two tragedies. Their merits vary greatly: his universally acknowledged masterpieces are the comedies ▷ Volpone (1605 or 1606) and ▷ The Alchemist (1610), to which some distinguished critics add the satirical tragedy ▷ Sejanus (1603). In the second rank of importance, the following are usually included: ▷ The Devil is an Ass (1616), of great satirical power but less dramatic concentration; ▷ Epicoene, or

The Silent Woman (1609) and > Bartholomew Fair (1614), slighter in content but vigorous entertainments; and ▷ Every Man in his Humour (1598), the first of the comedies of > humours with which his name is identified. Although all of Jonson's work contains passages of interest, his remaining plays have faults (such as excessive academicism, diffuseness of treatment or narrowness of satirical range) that usually restrict their interest to scholars. They are: Every Man out of his Humour (1599); Cynthia's Revels (1600); The Poetaster (1601); > Catiline (a tragedy, 1611); The Staple of News (1625); > The New Inn (1629); The Magnetic Lady (1632); The Tale of a Tub (1633); The Case is Altered (an early work, before he had discovered his characteristic comic medium; 1597). He left unfinished a > pastoral drama The Sad Shepherd.

Jonson was very much a man of his age and his personal life as well as his writing both display a series of contradictions. Society was undergoing radical changes; the unsettlement of accustomed moral values gave scope to extravagance and folly. He himself was a man of strong appetites and vitality, but he understood and deeply cared for the restraining and directing qualities of civilization. His conception of civilization derived partly from his typically > Renaissance admiration for ancient Roman culture, which he thoroughly assimilated through > Latin literature, and partly from the traditional virtues of English society, which economic and religious changes were challenging. He was thus a moral satirist who delighted in animal vitality and human aspiration, but who made it his business to chasten the > 'humours' (or, as we might say, 'manias') to which society was liable when it escaped the control of civilized discipline and reason. This made him a self-conscious artist in matters of literary form, and his plays, his prose miscellany (Timber: or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter, published 1640), and his conversations reported by the Scottish poet > Drummond, contain much critical comment on the virtues of poetic and dramatic discipline often at the expense of his contemporaries, including Shakespeare. At the same time he was a highly independent writer who showed no disposition to subject his work to the restriction of a code of rules.

In his non-dramatic poetry, Jonson produced a body of fine poetry which influenced the form of later > lyric verse. His poems have neither the emotional extravagance of the idealizing love poets of the age, nor the rough texture of a realist like > Donne; they combine the grace of manner of the former with the masculine strength of the latter, and fuse a vitality personal to Jonson with an intellectual control he learnt from Latin poets such as > Catullus. > Andrew Marvell was to learn from Jonson an incisiveness to temper the imaginative ingeniousness he learnt from Donne, and the school of ▷ Cavalier Poets of the reign of ▷ Charles I got from him much of their grace and poise.

Jonson had considerable importance as a personality who exercised influence by his talk. He was not born into the aristocratic circles of a poet like > Philip Sidney, but fashioned his career himself from bricklayer's son to proto-poet laureate. His proud and independent attitude to his noble patrons helped to enhance respect for the independence of the literary profession. His meetings and discussions with other poets at the Mermaid Tavern were commemorated by ➤ Francis Beaumont in Francis Beaumont to Ben Jonson and much later by John Keats (1795-1821) in Lines on the Mermaid Tavern (1818), and in his old age he had a school of disciples who called themselves 'the sons of Ben'. They included such poets as ➤ Thomas Carew and ➤ Robert Herrick. The 1616 ➤ Folio of his Works contained a carefully edited selfpresentation of his career to date, with two highly selective poetry sequences (Epigrams, The Forest), all the court masques but no civic commissions, and only those plays he wished to preserve. He was mocked for treating playbooks as serious literature, but this marks a watershed in the reception of dramatic texts in English, and set the precedent for the ➤ Shakespeare First Folio.

Bib: Knights, L. C., Drama and Society in the Age of Jonson; Eliot, T. S., in Selected Essays; Barish, J. A., on Jonson's dramatic prose and (ed.) critical essays; Partridge, E. B., The Broken Compass: A Study of the Major Comedies; Barton, A., Ben Jonson, Dramatist; Duncan, D., Ben Jonson and the Lucianic Tradition; Leggatt, A., Ben Jonson: His Vision and His Art; Miles, R., Ben Jonson: His Life and Work; Riggs, D., Ben Jonson: A Life; Evans, R., Ben Jonson and the Poetics of Patronage; Dutton, R., Ben Jonson: Authority and Criticism, Orgel, S., The Jonsonian

Masque.

Joseph Andrews (1742)

A novel by ➤ Henry Fielding. It was begun as a parody of ➤ Samuel Richardson's novel > Pamela. In Richardson's novel the heroine, Pamela Andrews, is a chaste servant girl who resists seduction by her master, Mr B, and eventually forces him to accept her in marriage. Fielding ridicules Richardson by opening his novel with an account of the resistance by Pamela's brother Joseph to seduction by his employer, the aunt of Mr B, whose name Fielding maliciously extends to Booby ("4" clumsy fool). Joseph is dismissed for his obstinate virtue, and sets out in search of his own sweetheart. On the journey he is befriended by his old acquaintance, a clergyman, Parson Adams. At this point Fielding seems to have changed the plan of his novel; Adams, instead of Joseph, becomes the central character on whom all the interest centres. With the change, the novel becomes something like an English \triangleright Don Quixote, since Adams is a learned but simple-hearted, single-minded Christian whose trust in the goodness of human nature leads him into constant embarrassments.

Joseph, Jenny (b 1932)

Poet and prose writer. Joseph has been writing since 1961 (her first publication was The Unlooked-for Season, a volume of poetry). In 1974 she won the Cholmondely award for Rose in the Afternoon. Other volumes include: The Thinking Heart (1978) and Beyond Descartes (1983). She also writes for children.

Josipovici, Gabriel (b 1940)

Novelist, short-story writer and critic. Born in France, educated in Cairo, Cheltenham and at Oxford University, Josipovici is a lecturer and (since 1984) Professor of English at the University of Sussex. His novels are ambiguous and experimental works of ⊳ post-modernist fiction, conveying a sense of fragmentation and uncertainty. The Inventory (1968), Words (1971) and The Echo Chamber (1980) are almost entirely in dialogue; The Present (1975) uses a present-tense narration and interweaves a number of stories; Migrations (1977) and The Air We Breathe (1981) are structured by the repetition of scenes and images. His other novels are: Conversations in Another Room (1984); Contre-Jour (1986); In the Fertile Land (1987); The Big Glass (1991); In a Hotel Garden (1993). Story collections are: Mobius the Stripper: Stories and Short Plays (1974); Four Stories (1977). Plays include: Evidence of Intimacy (1972); Echo (1975); Marathon (1977); A Moment (1979); Vergil Dying (broadcast 1979). Criticism includes: The World and the Book: A Study of Modern Fiction (1971); The Lessons of Modernism and Other Essays (1977); Writing and the Body (1982); The Book of God: A Response to the Bible (1988); Text and Voice: Essays 1981-1991 (1992). In 1990 he published Steps: Selected Fiction and Drama.

Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, The (1785)

Dames Boswell's account of the tour to the Hebrides which he made with Damuel Johnson in 1773 (cf. Dames Johnson in 1773 (cf. Dames Johnson's consideration of many topics, and the narrative, which he showed to Johnson, records Johnson's opinions and perorations on many matters. Boswell was partly motivated in undertaking the tour by the desire to show Johnson his homeland, but he also saw it as a good occasion to collect material for his Life of Samuel Johnson.

Journal of the Plague Year, A (1722)
Written by Daniel Defoe, the Journal purports to be the record of 'H. F.', a survivor of the plague in London of 1664-5. The initials have suggested to critics that Defoe's uncle, Henry Foe, may have provided some of the first-hand information.

The narrative tells of the spread of the plague, the suffering of the Londoners, and the attempts by the authorities to control the disease. Defoe incorporates statistical data, some of which is taken from official sources, to demonstrate the extent of the plague and its effects on the life of the capital. The 'factual' nature of the statistics stands in grim juxtaposition to the vivid recreation of death and disease, the inhabitants imprisoned in their own homes by danger and terror, and the mass burial sites and death-carts which became a familiar part of everyday existence.

Journalism

The distinction between journalism and literature is not always clear, and before the rise of the modern newspaper with its mass circulation in the second half of the 19th century, the two forms of writing were even more difficult to distinguish than they are today. The most superficial but also the most observable difference has always been that journalism puts immediacy of interest before permanency of interest, and easy readability before considered qualities of style. But of course what is written for the attention of the hour may prove to be of permanent value; a good example is > William Cobbett's > Rural Rides in his weekly Political Register in the early 19th century.

The > 'pamphlets' of writers such as > Thomas Nashe and Thomas Dekker in the 1500s, and those on the controversial religious matters of the day such as the Marprelate pamphlets, are no doubt the earliest work with the stamp of journalism in English. However, the profession began to take shape with the wider reading public and the regular periodicals of the early 18th century. In that period we can see that it was the attitude to writing that made the difference - at least on the surface between the journalist and the serious man of letters. Joseph Addison (1672-1719) considered himself a serious man of letters, whereas > Defoe, writing incessantly on matters of practical interest without concerning himself with subtleties and elegance of style, is more our idea of a journalist. The 18th century was inclined to disparage such writing as ▷ Grub Street, though this term included all kinds of inferior, merely imitative 'literature', that we would not accept as journalism. The trade of journalism taught Defoe the realism that went into his fiction. A good example of the combination of facts and fiction is his ▷ Journal of the Plague Year (1722) which is both a fine example of journalistic reporting (from other people's accounts) and a fine achievement in imaginative realism. (Such a combination has a post-modernist equivalent in the form of p faction, together with film and television dramatized documentaries.)

Defoe in the 18th century and Cobbett in the 19th century both assumed that the main function of their writing was to enlighten their readers. In the 1890s, however, the 'popular press' arose in which the desire to entertain was as strong as the desire to inform, and profitability was a major concern. The distinction between the serious and popular press is still current in the division between newspapers such as The Times and The Guardian and the tabloid press papers such as The Sun and The Mirror.

▶ Newspapers; Reviews and Periodicals.

Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, A (1775)

➤ Samuel Johnson's account of the tour which he and ➤ James Boswell made in 1773 (cf. ➤ Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides). The tour gave rise to Johnson's meditations on the life, culture and history of the Scottish people, as well as on the Scottish landscape. Its publication aroused the wrath of ➤ Macpherson, whose work ➤ Ossian Johnson rightly regarded as inauthentic.

Joyce, James (1882-1941)

Novelist. He was Irish, and born at a time when Irish ⊳ nationalism was moving into its most intensive phase. Joyce was born into a > Catholic family, was educated by the Jesuits, and seemed destined for the Catholic priesthood, yet he turned away from the priesthood, renounced Catholicism, and in 1904 left > Ireland to live and work abroad for the rest of his life. But although he took no part in the movement for Irish liberation, he did not renounce Ireland; the setting for all his fiction is the capital city (and his home town) of Dublin. This and his own family relationships were always his centres, and from them he drew increasingly ambitious imaginative conceptions which eventually extended to the whole history of European culture.

His first important work was a volume of stories; > Dubliners, published after long delay in 1914. The collection has artistic unity given to it by Joyce's intention 'to write a chapter of the moral history of my country . . . under four of its aspects: childhood, adolescence, maturity and public life'. The method combines an apparent objective realism with a subtle use of the symbolic and the mimesis of Dublin speech idiom and is based on Joyce's idea of ⊳ 'epiphanies' - experiences, often apparently trivial, presenting to the observer deep and true insights. His first novel, $\triangleright A$ Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916), is largely autobiographical and describes how, abandoning his religion and leaving his country, he discovered his artistic vocation. Its original method of narration causes the reader to share the hero's experience by having it presented to him with a verbal equipment which grows with the hero's development, from infancy to young manhood.

712

The next novel, ▷ Ulysses (1922), is still more original in the use of language. Its subject is apparently small – a single day in the life of three Dubliners – but Joyce's treatment of it makes it vast. The characters are made to correspond to the three main characters of Homer's Odyssey, and the 18 episodes are parallels to the episodes in that epic. The past is thus made to reflect forward on to the present, and the present back on to the past, revealing both with comic irony and endowing the apparently trivial present with tragic depth. In this book, modern man in the modern city is presented with unprecedented thoroughness and candour.

In his last book, > Finnegans Wake (1939), Jovce attempts an image of modern 'Everyman' with all the forces of his experiences released in other words it concerns one night of a character who, because he never fully wakes up, is not restricted by the inhibitions of normal daylight consciousness. To express this night consciousness Joyce uses a special dream language by which words are fused together to give instantaneous multiple allusiveness; the same technique had been used by the mid-19th-century children's writer Lewis Carroll in the poem called 'Jabberwocky' (Through the Looking-Glass; 1872). However, because Joyce wished to use the public-house keeper who is his hero as the representative of modern European man, he often fuses English words with those of other European languages, thus increasing the difficulty for the reader.

He published three volumes of poetry, which show his sense of poignant verbal beauty: Chamber Music (1907); Gas from a Burner (1912); Pomes Penyeach (1927). His Collected Poems appeared in 1936. His single play, Exiles (1918), is interesting chiefly for showing his admiration for the Norwegian dramatist > Ibsen. An early version of his Portrait of the Artist was published in 1944 (enlarged 1955) as Stephen Hero.

➤ Catholicism in English literature; Irish literature in English; Dedalus, Stephen.
Bib: Ellmann, R., James Joyce (biography);
Ulysses on the Liffey and The Consciousness of Joyce; Burgess, A., Joysprick; Peake, C. H., James Joyce: the Citizen and the Artist; Kenner, H., Joyce's Voices and Ulysses; Tindall, W. Y., A Reader's Guide to Finnegans Wake; Joyce, S., My Brother's Keeper; Levin, H., Joyce: a Critical Introduction; Budgen, F., James Joyce and the Making of Ulysses; Gilbert, S., James Joyce's Ulysses: a Study; Denning, R. H. (ed.), Joyce: The Critical Heritage; Connor, S., James Joyce.

Jude the Obscure (1895)

The last novel by ➤ Thomas Hardy. In Hardy's words the theme is the 'deadly war . . . between flesh and spirit' and 'the contrast between the ideal life a man wished to lead and the squalid real life he was fated to lead'. Jude Fawley is a village mason (like Hardy's father) who has intellectual aspirations. He is seduced into marriage by Arabella Donn; when she abandons him, he turns back to learning, but falls in love with Sue Bridehead, whose contradictory nature seeks freedom and vet frustrates her own desire. She runs away from her schoolmaster husband, Phillotson, who disgusts her, and joins with Jude in an illicit union. Their children die at the hands of Jude's only child by Arabella, who takes his own and their lives because he believes that he and they had no right to be born. Sue returns in remorse to Phillotson, while Jude is beguiled back by Arabella, who deserts him on his deathbed.

The setting and the four main characters are so representative that the novel is almost an allegory. Jude's native place is Marygreen, a run-down village which is a kind of emblem of decayed rural England. His ambition is to enter the University of Christminster, which is Oxford, but so named as a reminder by Hardy that the way of learning had once also been a goal of the spirit. Jude uproots himself from Marygreen but is unable to enter the university because of his social origins, though he lives in the town (where he meets Sue) and works there as a mason. Hardy's point is not so much the social one that the old universities of Oxford and Cambridge were all but closed to working men; he is more concerned to show that the decay of spiritual goals in the England of his day matches the decay of the countryside. Jude himself is a complete man - physically virile as well as spiritually aspiring; it is his very completeness which the modern world, both Marygreen and Christchurch, is unable to accept. Sue Bridehead represents the ➤ 'New Woman' of the day, emancipated in her own theory but not in body. Sue is all mind; Arabella all body, and Phillotson a kind of walking death - a man of the best intentions who is nonetheless helplessly destructive in consequence of his lack of both physical and spiritual vitality. The novel epitomizes Hardy's longing for spiritual values and his despair of them; its pessimism has a strong poetic quality, and after completing it he gave himself entirely to poetry. Like many of Hardy's novels, Jude the Obscure is set in the recent past - about twenty years before the time of writing. Publication of the book caused an uproar; after its hostile reception Hardy wrote no further novels.

➤ Censorship.

Julian and Maddalo (1818)

➤ Shelley's troubled and oblique narrative poem, set in Venice, concerning his relationship with ➤ Lord Byron. The poem analyses their differences of approach to religion, politics and ethics, through the characters of Julian (Shelley) described self-mockingly in the Preface as 'rather serious', and Count Maddalo (Byron) a more worldly and sceptical figure. A long portion of the poem is taken up with their meeting, or rather overhearing the tortured outpourings of, an unnamed 'Maniac', whose tale of losing his reason through a broken love relationship may be read as a standing rebuke to both Shelley's lofty > idealism, and Byron's cynical wit. Neither can offer a remedy for the intractable recurrence of human pain, though both, as poets, must articulate it; as Maddalo is made to remark, 'Most wretched men/ Are cradled into poetry by wrong,/ They learn in suffering what they teach in song'. Although Shelley was to be misrepresented by the > Victorians and critics early this century as the purely lyrical voice of Romantic ardour, both Julian and Maddalo and ➤ Epipsychidion (1821) are Romantic poems about the limits of Romanticism, filled with complex misgivings and self-interrogation.

Julian of Norwich (c 1343-after 1416) English mystic and recluse whose name derives from the church of St Julian of Norwich, to which her cell was attached. Her work, the Revelations of Divine Love, describing her 16 visionary experiences, is extant in two versions. The short version was written first, perhaps not long after her visionary experience; the longer text was composed after some 20 years of meditation and reflection on her visions. Little is known about her life apart from the few details which appear in the Revelations. Her visions came, in answer to her prayer, not long after she was 30. By the time ➤ Margery Kempe visited her (around 1413-15), Julian was established as a spiritual authority, and although she refers to herself as an unlearned woman (perhaps a reference to a lack of skills in Latin, rather than a lack of literate skills), Julian's work reveals a detailed knowledge of a wide range of scriptural and mystical texts and traditions. Her exploration of the notion of Jesus as Mother has attracted much interest. and her formulation of God's assurance to her that 'all shall be well . . . all manner of things shall be well' is one of the more famous passages Bib: Petroff, E. A. (ed.), Medieval Women's Visionary Literature; Wolters, C. (trans.), Revelations of Divine Love.

Julius Caesar (c 1599)

A historical tragedy by > Shakespeare based on the events of 44 BC, when Caesar was assassinated on suspicion of seeking to overthrow the Roman republic and make himself king. The conspiracy against him is led by Brutus, descendant of the Brutus who, according to legend, had first established the republic by throwing out the Tarquin line of kings in the 6th century. Brutus is a friend of Caesar, and his motive in organizing Caesar's assassination is his disinterested love of Rome; his chief associate, Cassius, on the other hand, is motivated by personal envy and resentment. The third outstanding character in the drama is Caesar's friend Mark Antony, who, after the assassination, treacherously but most successfully turns the Roman mob against Brutus and Cassius and drives them out of Rome. Acts IV and V show the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at the battle of Philippi (42 BC). Caesar himself plays a comparatively small part, although he is, alive and dead, the centre of the drama. The dramatic interest arises from the interplay between the characters of Brutus, Cassius and Antony, and from the conflicts in the mind of Brutus, who, as a good man, finds himself in the tragic dilemma of having to commit a horrible crime against a man he loves for the sake of the nation. Shakespeare based the events, with some interesting alterations, on ➤ Plutarch, whose Lives has been translated into English by > Thomas North (1579). The play dates from about 1599.

> Caesar, Gaius Julius.

Jung, Carl (1875-1961)

Swiss psychiatrist. He was part of the group surrounding ➤ Sigmund Freud between 1907 and 1913, but because of disagreements with Freud, he left to form his own school of 'Analytical Psychology'. Jung attributed less importance to the sexual, and saw the unconscious as containing, not only repressed material, but also undeveloped aspects of the personality, which he divided into thinking, feeling, sensuous and intuitive aspects. The personal unconscious he held to be the reverse of the persona, or outer self, and to perform a compensatory function. Futhermore, beneath the personal unconscious lay the racial and collective unconscious, the repository of the beliefs and myths of civilizations, which at the deepest level were all united. Jung termed the themes and symbols which emerged from this collective unconscious, archetypes, and Jungian therapy uses dream interpretation to connect the patient with the healing power of those archetypes. Jung saw the libido as a non-sexual life force, and neuroses as imbalances in the personality. He made a comparative study of the myths, religions and philosophies of many cultures, and his thought has a religious and mystical tenor. He is also the originator of the terms 'introvert', 'extrovert' and 'complex'. Many of his ideas and experiences are referred to in the autobiographical Memories, Dreams, Reflections (ed. Amelia Jaffé, translated 1963).

His influence on 20th-century literature results particularly from the importance he gave to myths and symbols as universal and creative modes of understanding. The creation or reworking, of myths is a feature of the work of writers such as ▷ James Joyce (▷ Ulysses, about which Jung wrote an essay, 'Ulysses: A Monologue', 1923), T. S. Eliot and ▷ David Jones.

➤ Psychoanalytical criticism. Bib: Jacobi, J., The Psychology of C.J. Jung.

Jungle Book, The (1894) and Second Jungle Book, The (1895)

Two sequences of ➤ short stories and poems by ➤ Rudyard Kipling concerning the boy Mowgli, who grows up in the jungle separated from the human community. He grows from dependency into dominance over the animals and eventually returns to his kind as a forest ranger. Humanity is portrayed as crude and unrestrained in comparison with the animals who exhibit a strong sense of social responsibility in accordance with the jungle law.

Junius

The pen-name of a political polemicist who published celebrated letters attacking the government of the day in the London newspaper Public Advertiser, (1769–72). The letters were fiercely satirical against the ministers of George III, and were notable for their unusual eloquence. The name 'Junius' was chosen from Lucius Junius Brutus, who, in legend, overthrew the Tarquin kings of Rome in the 6th century BC. Their style shows the influence of ▷ Swift and of the Latin historian ▷ Tacitus. The real author has long been a mystery, but is now generally considered to have been Sir Philip Francis (1740–1818), a politician of the Whig party who supported the rights and privileges of Parliament against what they considered to be dangerous encroachments by the king and his supporters.

Juvenal (Decimus Junius Juvenalis) (AD ? 60-?130)

Roman satirical poet. His sixteen satires describe the society of his time and denounce its vices. > Satire, as a literary form, is usually regarded as being a Roman invention, but Juvenal was the first of the Romans to associate it altogether with denunciation; his predecessor, ▷ Horace, had used it for ironic comment and discussion but was only intermittently denunciatory with the moral conviction associated with Juvenal. Like Horace, Juvenal had a strong influence on English poetry from 1590 until 1800; during these two centuries satire was increasingly practised, and Horace, Juvenal, or Horace's disciple Perseus were taken as models. Both ➤ Thomas Nashe and John Oldham (1653-83) have been described as 'the English Juvenal', but the most distinguished of his conscious followers is probably > Samuel Johnson in his two poems > London and The Vanity of Human Wishes, imitations of Juvenal's third and tenth satires respectively. It is interesting to compare these with Pope's > Imitations of Horace, which Johnson was emulating. The spirit of Juvenal is also strongly present in the satirical comedies of > Ben Jonson who used Juvenal in his satirical tragedy > Sejanus. > John Dryden translated Juvenal (1692).

Kailyard

A type of Scottish fiction which flourished in the last two decades of the nineteenth-century and presented a sentimental and idealized vision of small-town life: the term kailyard means a cabbage patch. ⊳ J. M. Barrie was a leading exponent in novels such as A Window in Thrums (1889); others were 'Ian Maclaren' (John Watson, 1850-1907) and S. R. Crockett (1860-1914). The reaction against Kailyard was inaugurated by the writer J. H. Miller, who first used the term in 1895. The main antikailvard novelists were George Douglas Brown, who described Kailyard fiction as 'sentimental slop' and is best known for The House with the Green Shutters (1901) and John MacDougall Hay, author of Gillespie (1914).

Kant, Immanuel (1724-1804)

German philosopher of Scottish descent. His most important works include: Critique of Pure Reason (1781 and 1787); Prolegomena to every future Metaphysic (1783); Foundation for the Metaphysic of Ethic (1785); Critique of Practical Reason (1788); Critique of Judgement (1790). He counteracted Leibnitzian rationalism and the scepticism of ⊳ David Hume by asserting the 'transcendence' of the human mind over time and space (hence 'transcendental philosophy'). Time and space are forms of our consciousness: we can know by appearances but we cannot know 'things in themselves'. On the other hand, it is in the nature of our consciousness to have inherent in it an awareness of design in nature, and of moral and aesthetic value under a Divine moral law. His philosophy, continued and modified by other German philosophers (Fichte, Schelling, Hegel), profoundly influenced the poet and philosopher ⊳ Coleridge; through Coleridge, it provided a line of thought which, in 19th-century England, rivalled the sceptical materialistically inclined tradition stemming from > Locke, Hume and > Bentham.

➤ German influence on English fiction.

Katherine Group

A term used by modern critics to refer to a group of early English religious works dating from the late 12th/early 13th century, which have affinities of language and style. The group of five religious texts is found in the Bodleian Library Oxford M S Bodley 34 and includes the lives of three heroic female saints (Seinte Katerine, after whom the group is named; Seinte Iuliene; Seinte Margerete), a vivid treatise recommending the benefits of living a chaste, religious life and pointing out the drawbacks of living the life of a married woman and mother (Hali Meidenhad), and an allegorical narrative on the 'safeguarding' of the soul (Sawles Warde). These five texts are all written in a rhythmical > alliterative style and are highly accomplished prose works. They have linguistic, stylistic and thematic affinities with the manual for anchoresses, the ▶ Ancrene Wisse, and seem particularly, though not exclusively, to cater for a specialized audience of religious women. Bib: Ker, N. R., Facsimile of MS Bodley 34; Millett, B. and Nogan-Brown J. (eds.), Medieval English Prose for Women.

Kauffman, Angelica (1741-1807)

Swiss artist, one of the most successful women in the history of art. Recognized as a prodigy in her childhood, she was also an accomplished musician, and was for a time uncertain whether to pursue a profession in music or art. Her dilemma is reflected in an allegorical self-portrait, painted in 1791. She came to England in 1766 and grew rich and famous during 15 years in this country. Kauffman was highly versatile, working in a range of media, including oils, mezzotint, etching, engraving, and designing for decorative paintings. She used a variety of subjects and styles although > neo-classicism is a recurring theme. She received commissions for many portraits, and her work gave rise to numerous imitations. Kauffman was married briefly in 1767 to a man who claimed to be a count, but turned out to be a bigamous impostor, marrying her only in order to remain in England, and then deserting her immediately. Thereafter, she lived a single life until 1781 when she married another artist. Together they left for the Continent, where she remained until her death.

Bib: Roworth, W. W., Angelica Kauffman, A Continental Artist in Georgian England.

Kavan, Anna (1901-68)

Novelist. Anna Kavan's writing belongs to the subjective tradition of feminism that would include the work of ▷ Virginia Woolf, ▷ Djuna Barnes and Anaïs Nin. Kavan's style is both drastically experimental and yet rooted in her personal experience. She was a heoin addict for most of her life and the frozen dystopia of her novel Ice (1967) offers a dual symbol of her psyche and her fears of social disintegration. Other important works include the poetic prose text Sleep Has His House (1948). Anna Kavan was found dead, holding a syringe, in London in 1968.

Kavanagh, Julia (1824-77)

Novelist. Born in Thurles and educated at home, Julia Kavanagh was the daughter of a writer who later claimed to have written her novels and that his own worst work (a novel called The Hobbies) was by her. She lived with her parents in France, until they separated in 1844, when she returned to England with her mother, whom she then supported by her writing. French character and way of life are reflected in her novels, and on the death of her mother she returned to France and lived in Nice until her death. Her first novel, The Montyon Prizes (1846) was very popular. The best known are perhaps Madeleine (1848), Nathalie (1850) and Adèle (1858). Her biographical sketches, French Women of Letters (1862) and English Women of Letters (1863), have been much praised. Her other publications include a volume of short stories, Forget-me-nots (1878).

Kay

Kay (Cai/Kei) is one of ▷ King Arthur's principal followers, along with ▷ Bedivere, in Welsh Arthurian narratives. In ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth's treatment of Arthurian history he has the role of chief steward of King Arthur's household, and is killed while fighting against the Romans. In later French and English Arthurian narratives, Kay becomes a more degenerate figure, assuming the role of a knight who is a slanderer and vain boaster. In ▷ Malory's Morte D'Arthur, Kay is the son of Sir Ector and thus Arthur's foster-brother.

Kay, Jackie (b 1961)

Poet and dramatist. Kay was brought up in Scotland and is a graduate of Stirling University. Chiaroscuro (1986), commissioned by Theatre of Black Women, is a delicate but powerful piece written in a mixture of forms (dreams, songs, poetry, naturalism) in which cultural histories, friendship, 'coming out' as a lesbian and the difficulties of communication in a largely white-dominated and heterosexual world are confronted and overcome. Chiaroscuro as the word itself implies, is about light and shade, variation and change.

Trice Over (1988) confirmed Kay's promise as a developing playwright whose black and lesbian perspective is only a starting point to further explorations.

Kean, Edmund (?1787-1833)

One of the greatest actors of the early 19th century. He was the illegitimate son of a hawker and itinerant actress, Anne Carey. He began acting as an infant, and trained at Drury Lane so vigorously, it is said, that he had to wear irons to prevent deformity. This disadvantage was aggravated by a later fall during a circus performance in which he broke both his legs. He remained small in stature, and the actress > Sarah Siddons once referred to him as 'a horrid little man'. He received some education through charity, at a school in Leicester Square, and again at a school in Soho, paid for by an aunt. Despite some early recognition as an actor, Kean long led a precarious existence, as strolling actor, singer, and tumbler, during which period he married Mary Chambers, an actress.

In 1814 Kean made his famous debut as Shylock (▷ Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice), discarding the traditional red wig and playing him as a violent and tragic figure, after which his career blossomed, bringing him fame and financial reward. He followed his first success with other triumphs as Macbeth, Othello, Iago, Richard III, Lear, Barabas in Christopher Marlowe's The Jew of Malta (c 1590) Jaffeir in Thomas Otway's Venice Preserv'd (1682) and Sir Giles Overreach in Philip Massinger's A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1625). He toured America and Canada, receiving tumultuous acclaim. Much of his personal behaviour attracted gossip and censure; he had numerous love affairs, and drank excessively. At one time he appears to have been locked up as a lunatic. In 1820 he broke down during a performance of Henry V, and apologized to the audience for losing his memory. His last performance was as Othello, with his son Charles as Iago, at Covent Garden and he died a few weeks later. The most famous judgment of Kean is > Coleridge's: 'To see him act, is like reading Shakespeare by flashes of lightning' Bib: Cornwall, B., Life of Edmund Kean (2 vols); Hawkins, F. W., Life of Edmund Kean (2 vols); Hillebrand, H. N., Edmund Kean; Fitzsimmons, R., Edmund Kean: Fire from Heaven.

Keane, Molly (b 1904)

Novelist and playwright. Born into an uppermiddle-class world of country life, Keane's witty novels are concerned with the narrow interests of the privileged and leisured Anglo-Irish community. Her career has had two phases: up to her mid-30s and then from the early 1980s onwards, punctuated by 20 years of non-production. Her works include: Taking Chances (1929); Conversation Piece (1932); Devoted Ladies (1934); The Rising Tide (1937); Spring Meeting: A Comedy in Three Acts (1938); Loving Without Tears (1951); Good Behaviour (1981) (which was shortlisted for the Booker Prize); and Time After Time (1983).

Keats, John (1795-1821)

Poet. The son of a livery-stable keeper in London, he was apprenticed to an apothecary, and for a time intended to be a surgeon, but abandoned this career in his determination to be a poet. He became the protégé of ➤ Leigh Hunt, and adopted many of the older man's attitudes and literary mannerisms, though he was never, like Hunt, politically active. Through Hunt he met ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley who helped him with the publication of Poems by John Keats (1817), which includes his exhilarating if callow statement of poetic ambition, Sleep and Poetry. The volume was not a success and Keats set himself to improve his art by writing a long poem in couplets - almost as a kind of technical exercise. Endymion appeared in 1818, and though its rambling allegory fails to sustain narrative interest and its poetry is of uneven quality, it performed its function in developing Keats' style and ideas. It was severely criticized in the \triangleright Quarterly Review and \triangleright Blackwood's Magazine, partly with justification and partly because of their opposition to Hunt's radicalism. Its first lines show in an early immature form the aesthetic creed which preoccupied Keats throughout his short career: 'A thing of beauty is a joy forever:/ Its loveliness increases'.

Early in 1818 Keats composed Isabella, a macabre Italian romance in > ottava rima, superficially similar to Hunt's work but with a sensuous complexity of Keat's own. In the same year he began work on ▷ Hyperion, a 'philosophical' poem in Miltonic > blank verse, which remained unfinished at his death. During much of 1818 Keats was nursing his brother Tom as he died of consumption, an experience which complicated his later expressions of faith in the permanence of beauty. Towards the end of 1818 he fell in love with Fanny Brawne, and from this point on his work shows a leap in emotional depth and maturity. > The Eve of St Agnes (1820), is a 'medieval' romance fragment in > Spenserian stanzas. In 1819 Keats wrote his > Odes, To Psyche, To a Nightingale, On a Grecian Urn, On Melancholy, On Indolence, To Autumn, and > Lamia, a narrative romance in pentameter couplets (> metre). On 3 February 1820 Keats began coughing blood, and at once realized its meaning: 'That drop of blood is my death warrant. I must die.' He had consumption and knew that he would soon follow his brother. It seems that he wrote nothing from this point onwards. He travelled to Italy in September 1820 with his friend Joseph Severn and died in Rome in February 1821, directing that the epitaph on his grave should read 'Here lies one whose name was writ in water.'

Keats felt that the deepest meaning of life lay in the apprehension of material beauty, and his works are the most important embodiment in poetry of the philosophy of Aestheticism. His mature poems confront the implications of this belief in a world of disease and decay, and their most characteristic effect is the evocation of poignant transience. He is remarkable also for his intelligent awareness of his own poetic development, which enabled him to reach maturity so early in his short career. His letters are among the finest in English, not only for their discussion of his aesthetic ideas ('negative capability', 'the chameleon poet') but also simply for their humanity, spontaneity and humour. Bib: Gittings, R., John Keats; Leavis, F. R., in Revaluation; Ridley, M. R., Keats' Craftmanship; Hill, J. S. (ed.), Keats: Narrative Poems. A Selection of Critical Essays; Fraser, G. S., Keats: Odes. A Selection of Critical Essays; Jones, J., John Keats' Dream of Truth; Ricks, C., Keats and Embarassment; Van Ghent, D., Keats: The Myth of the Hero; Hirst, W. S., John Keats; Allott, M., John Keats; Levinson,

M., Keat's Life of Allegory: The Origins of a Style.

Kelly, Isabella (c1758-1857)

Poet and novelist. Scottish author, whose first published work was a series of confessional poems and short satirical pieces, Collection of Poems and Fables (c 1704). However, she soon began writing ▷ Gothic novels for ▷ Minerva Press and these followed the conventional, but highly popular, pattern, containing ruined abbeys, ghosts, ancient manuscripts and illegitimate children. The Abbey of St Asaph (1795) is the most accessible to 20th-century readers.

➤ Autobiography; Scottish literature in English.

Bib: Summers, M., A Gothic Bibliography; Tompkins, J.M.S., The Popular Novel in England 1770–1800.

Kelman, James (b 1946)

Novelist, short-story writer and playwright. Kelman was born and educated in Glasgow, where he attended the University of Strathclyde. He has worked in various labouring and semiskilled jobs. He has been seen, along with ➤ Alasdair Gray, ➤ Janice Galloway and Tom Leonard, as contributing to 'the new Glasgow writing'. His fiction, like that of Gray, has its roots firmly in the urban landscape of Glasgow and combines a bleak view of contemporary culture and of human experience with linguistic exuberance and technical inventiveness, including the use of variable > focalization: his novels The Busconductor Hines (1984) and A Disaffection (1989) gain some of their ironic effects from the way in which they shift between internal focalization on the narrator (using a form of stream of consciousness) and a relatively detached reporting of events, whereas the latter technique is used throughout in A Chancer (1985). Volumes of short stories: An Old Pub Near the Angel (1973); Three Glasgow Writers (with Tom Leonard and Alex Hamilton, 1976); Short Tales from the Nightshift; Not Not While the Giro (1983); Lean Tales (with Alasdair Gray and Agnes Owens, 1985); Greyhound for Breakfast (1987); The Burn (1991). Plays: The Busker (1985); Le Rodeur (adapted from a play by Enzo Corman, 1988); In the Night (1988), Radio play: Hadie and Baird: The Lost Days (1978). He has won the Cheltenham Prize (1987) and the James Tait Black Memorial Prize (1990); How late it was, how late (1994), the interior monologue of a man who wakes up blind in a police cell, won the 1994 Booker Prize. Other works: Some Recent Attacks: Essays Cultural and Political (1992).

Kemble, Frances (Fanny) (1809–93) Actress, poet and ▷ autobiographer, born in London. She was the niece of actress Sarah Siddons and the daughter of actor-manager

Charles Kemble. In 1832 she left Britain to tour North America with her father, recording her experience in her Journal (1835). She married Pierce Mease Butler in 1834, but the relationship became problematic when Fanny realized that her husband was a slave-owner. She was horrified by a visit she made to his Georgia plantation in 1838, and became increasingly estranged from him. Eventually they separated in 1845 and were divorced in 1849. In 1863 she published Journal of a Residence on a Georgia Plantation, in which she attacks slavery, describes the living and working conditions of the people and decries her own unwitting involvement in the system. For the rest of her life she travelled between Europe and North America, writing and giving public readings. Her works include Poems (1844); Records of a Girlhood (1878); Records of Later Life (1882), and The Adventures of Mr John Timothy Homespun in Switzerland (1889). Colonialism.

Bib: Driver, L.S., Life, Marshall, D., Life, Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Kemble, John Philip (1757–1823) Actor, singer, manager, dramatist. Kemble was the son of the theatrical manager Roger Kemble and actress Sarah (née Ward). His sister became known as the actress ➤ Sarah Siddons, and six other siblings also went onto the stage.

In 1777 he began acting at Liverpool, and the following year his first play, Belisarius; or Injured Innocence was staged there. He began the first of many seasons at ▷ Drury Lane in 1783, where his roles included > Hamlet, → Richard III, Shylock, (
→ The Merchant of Venice) and ⊳ King John. Three of his sisters acted there during this time, and he played → Othello to Sarah Siddons' Desdemona in 1785. In 1788 he took over management of Drury Lane, whose patent was held by > Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and soon introduced elements of 'theatrical > realism' into his productions, such as providing what he considered authentic Roman costumes for some of ➤ Shakespeare's Roman plays.

After 1791 when Drury Lane was declared unsafe, Kemble moved his company to the King's Theatre in the ▷ Haymarket, ▷ Covent Garden and several provincial theatres. In 1816 the advent of ▷ Edmund Kean to the stage drew from Kemble much of the public respect and admiration he had enjoyed throughout his career and he retired the following year.

Throughout his life, Kemble was admired for his good looks, elegance, and charm, and respected for his forceful professional abilities as an actor and as a manager. He had a rigorous, classical approach to acting, excelling in parts, especially those of Shakespeare, to which a grand manner and style were suited. Like many of his period he had a prodigious memory enabling him to retain many long roles in his repertoire. He lacked the emotional range of David Garrick, and later Edmund Kean, and suffered from a tendency to drink to excess, which occasionally interfered with his ability to perform. Some 58 plays, most of them alterations, are attributed to his authorship. Bib: Baker, H., John Philip Kemble; Child, H., The Shakespearean Productions of John Philip Kemble; Donohue, J., Dramatic Character in the English Romantic Age; Joseph, B., The Tragic Actor; Kelly, L., The Kemble Era: John Philip, Sarah Siddons and the London Stage.

Kemp, William (fl.1593–1602)
A famous comic actor; contemporary with ➤ Shakespeare. He acted parts such as Peter, the comic servant of the Nurse in Shakespeare's ➤ Romeo and Juliet, and the muddle-headed constable Dogberry in ➤ Much Ado About Nothing, and excelled at jigs. His most famous exploit was dancing from London to Norwich (more than a hundred miles) for a bet. He and ➤ Richard Tarlton established a national reputation for themselves as comic actors, as

➤ Richard Burbage and ➤ Edward Alleyn did as tragic ones.
Bib: Wiles, D., Shakespeare's Clown.

Kempe, Margery (c. 1373-after 1438) A mystic, who lived in Norwich, and whose spiritual biography is the subject of the Book of Margery Kempe, which Margery claims to have dictated to an amanuensis. Unlike ⊳ Julian of Norwich, whom she consulted for spiritual advice at one stage, Margery was not a recluse but a married woman with 14 children who attempted to live a life devoted to Christ, and sought official Church recognition for her status as a spiritual woman, while continuing to live in the secular world. She experienced intense emotional visionary encounters with Christ, which have at times a strikingly homely quality, and the Book not only records these visions but also her travels in Europe and pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Her special spiritual trial, according to her book, is to be misrepresented and rejected by many of her clerical and lay peers. The recording of her spiritual life, despite severe difficulties and her own illiteracy, becomes a symbolic act in itself, representing both her claim to spiritual status and evidence of her special relationship with God. Bib: Petroff, E. (ed.), Medieval Women's Visionary Literature; Windeatt, B. (trans.), The Keneally, Thomas (b 1935) Novelist and playwright. Keneally was born in Sydney and educated at St Patrick's College, Strathfield, New South Wales. He studied law, trained for the Catholic priesthood, served in the Australian armed forces, and has worked as a school teacher and university lecturer in drama. His novels employ a wide range of genres and settings: his first novel, The Place at Whitton (1964) is a horror story; Blood Red, Sister Rose (1974) is a historical novel about Joan of Arc; Confederates (1979) is set during the American Civil War and Schindler's Ark (1982) during the Second World War. However, a number of his novels have specifically Australian themes, exploring relations between Europe and Australia and between whites and aborigines in Australia: The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith (1972) concerns a half-aborigine who, after experiencing racial hostility, turns to ritual killing, while Bring Larks and Heroes (1967) and The Playmaker (1987) are both set in the penal colony period in Australia. The second of these, about a group of convicts staging George Farquhar's Restoration satire of army life, The Recruiting Officer, has recently been adapted for the stage by Timberlake Wertenbaker as Our Country's Good. Keneally's other novels are: The Fear (1965, revised as By the Line); Three Cheers for the Paraclete (1968); The Survivor (1969); A Dutiful Daughter (1971): Gossip from the Forest (1975); Moses the Lawgiver (1975); Season in Purgatory (1976); Passenger (1979); The Cut-Rate Kingdom (1980); A Family Madness (1985); Towards Asmara (1989); Flying Hero Class (1991). His plays include: Halloran's Little Boat (1966); Childermass (1968); An Awful Rose (1972); Victim of the Aurora (1977); Bullie's House (1980); Woman of the Inner Sea (1992); Memoirs From a Young Republic (1993); Jacko (1994). He has also written plays and documentaries for television, film screenplays, books for children and non-fiction writing on Australia. He has acted in films, including the film of his own novel The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith. Bib: Quartermaine, P., Thomas Keneally.

Book of Margery Kempe.

Ketch, Jack (John) (d 1686)

A public executioner who made a name for himself in popular folklore, so that later executioners bore his name as a nickname. He was notorious for the clumsy brutality of his executions, which took place in public.

Keynotes and Discords (1893 and 1894)
Two volumes of ▷ short stories by ▷ George Egerton which explore female oppression as well as celebrating women's potential. Notable stories in Keynotes include 'Now Spring Has Come', which deals with the transitory nature of romance, 'The Spell of the White Elf' and 'A Cross Line'. The Discords collection is graver and darker, focusing on women's anger and describing the effects of women's emotional and economic dependence on men. In 'Gone Under' a woman's lover arranges to have their illegitimate child murdered by the midwife, in 'Wedlock' a women murders her three stepchildren because her husband has separated her from her own child. 'Virgin Soil' describes the lasting damage caused to a young girl by her lack of sex education. Egerton's writing is characterized by a use of symbolism influenced by dramatists ➤ Ibsen and August Strindberg (1849–1912).

> 'New Woman, The'; Irish literature in English.

Killigrew, Anne (c1660-1685)

English poet and painter. She was praised for her piety, and was greatly admired by her circle of aristocratic contemporaries. She was Maid of Honour to the Duchess of York. Poems by Mrs Anne Killigrew were published the year after her death.

> Finch, Anne, Countess of Winchilsea

Killigrew, Thomas (1612-83)

Dramatist, actor, manager. Born in London to Sir Robert Killigrew, he became a page of honour to ➤ Charles I, possibly from 1625. Killigrew wrote his first play, The Prisoners, in 1635 and in the following year he married Cecilia Crofts, a maid of honour to Queen Henrietta Maria, by whom he had at least one son, before she died in 1638. Killigrew remained loval to the king after the outbreak of the > Civil War, and was imprisoned for a time. He afterwards travelled as an exile on the Continent during the 1640s, serving first the Duke of York, later > James II, and then Prince Charles, later > Charles II. His exploits during that period are romanticized in his play Thomaso; Or, The Wanderer (published 1664).

After the Restoration he was granted one of the two royal patents to form a theatre company which became known as the ➤ King's Company. In 1667 Killigrew set up a > nursery to train voung actors in Hatton Garden, and in 1673 he became Master of the ➤ Revels, after the death of Sir Henry Herbert (1596-1673). This made him responsible for supervising theatrical entertainment and licensing theatres and he held the post for four years before resigning in favour of his son Charles. In 1682 the King's Company, having foundered for several seasons, was effectively absorbed by the > Duke's Company, but by then Killigrew had little to do with it. He was buried at ➤ Westminster Abbey, near his first wife and a sister.

Kilvert, Robert Francis (1840–79) Diarist. He was curate in the village

Diarist. He was curate in the village of Clyro, Radnorshire. His candour and responsiveness to people and environment make his ▶ diaries valuable records of rural environment in the mid-Victorian era. Selections were published in 1938–40, edited by William Plomer.

Kim (1901)

A novel by ➤ Rudyard Kipling. Kim, whose real name is Kimball O'Hara, is the orphan son of an Irish soldier in India, and he spends his childhood as a waif in the city of Lahore. He meets a Tibetan holy man in search of a mystical river, and accompanies him on his journey. Kim falls in with his father's old regiment, and is adopted by them, eventually becoming an agent of the British secret service under the guidance of an Indian, Hurree Babu. In spite of the ingenuousness of Kipling's British chauvinism, conspicuous in the later part of the book, the earlier part is an intimate and graphic picture of the humbler reaches of Indian life.

King and No King, A (1611)

A tense and melodramatic tragicomedy by Beaumont and Fletcher which explores and tests the limits of courtly and romantic psychology. In the play, the king, Arbuces, falls in love with his sister, but incest is averted since at the end of the play it is revealed that Arbuces is not the king and may love his supposed sister freely.

King, Henry (1592-1669)

Poet and Bishop of Chichester. King, himself the son of a bishop, was prebend of St Paul's until his appointment as Bishop of Chichester in 1642. A year later he was expelled from his bishopric by the > Puritans, but was reinstated after the Restoration. The major poetic influences on King were > John Donne (with whom he was friendly) and ➤ Ben Jonson. The majority of his poetry was published in 1657, when his Poems, Elegies, Paradoxes and Sonnets appeared. A large proportion of King's poetic output consisted of responses to public occasions, obituaries and ⊳ elegies: these included two separately published elegies on ▶ Charles I (1648 and 1649). Bib: Berman, R., Henry King and the Seventeenth

King Horn

Century.

One of the earliest extant English verse romances, dating from the first half of the 13th century, which has an earlier ⊳ Anglo-Norman analogue. The narrative recounts the story of Horn, dispossessed from his heritage, the kingdom of Sudene, by Saracen invaders; his experiences in Westernesse and Ireland which allow him to establish his identity as a knight of skill and valour; his eventual triumph over the wicked designs of his evil companion Fikenhild, who attempts to sabotage Horn's relationship with Rymenhild, daughter of the king of Westernesse; his recovery of the kingdom of Sudene and his eventual return there as king with Rymenhild as his queen. The principle of repetition with variation provides the key to the narrative structure of Horn, and Horn's voyages themselves, narrated in a formulaic way, function as section-markers for the narrative. The story of Horn's loss and recovery of identity is told in a highly stylized, paratactic mode which enhances the memorability of the narrative. Horn Childe is a later Middle English version of the Horn story (dating from the early 14th century and written in ▷ tail-rhyme verse), which has the same plot structure as King Horn but differs in many points of detail. The story of Horn evidently had a wide currency during and after the medieval period. There are many balladic versions of the story, and versions of the narrative are extant in other European vernaculars too. Bib: Barron, W. R. J., English Medieval Romance.

King John

A ⊳ history play (The Life and Death of King 70hn) by > Shakespeare, perhaps derived from the anonymous Troublesome Reign of King John, and written before the great history plays > Henry IV, Parts I and II, which first exhibit his genius in maturity. Anticipations of this maturity show themselves in the central character, Philip Faulconbridge, illegitimate son of the previous king, Richard I. The reign of the historical > King John (1199-1216) was very unsettled: in the play, the disturbance arises from John's having usurped the throne from his nephew Arthur, whose cause is taken up by the king of France, the Church, and his nobles. Philip, 'the bastard', is excluded by his illegitimacy from the privileges and status of the class into which he is born, and he at first enters the king's service in a spirit of cynicism, like that of Shakespeare's other > bastard, Edmund in > King Lear. By degrees he takes to heart the dangers to the nation of the disorderly passions among the great men, and he acquires a political conscience. He is presented substantially, and stands out from the relatively flat background of the rest of the characters. However the theme that has given the play most of such popularity as it possesses centres not on the Bastard but on the child Arthur, whose pathos persuades his gaoler Hubert to spare his life. Arthur later dies from a fall in an attempt to escape.

Historically, the best-known fact about the reign of John is Magna Carta, the Great Charter which the nobles and Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, forced the king to accept as a guarantee against tyrannical interference with the rights of the subject. Shakespeare does not mention this; it came into prominence for the national imagination only in the next reign, during the quarrels between King James I and his Parliaments.

King Lear (1605)

A tragedy by ➤ Shakespeare. The play survives in two substantially different source texts: the 'Pied Bull' ➤ quarto of 1608 and the folio edition (1623). The quarto edition contains some 300 lines which are missing from the folio, and the folio has 100 lines not in the earlier text. Most modern editions of the play conflate the two sources to make them yield a composite text which contains all the missing lines. This accommodating editorial policy has been challenged persuasively by one of the most exciting Shakespearean ventures of the second half of the 20th century, the publication of a radical edition of the complete works by Oxford University Press under the general editors Gary Taylor and Stanley Wells. Their conclusion, that Shakespeare revised and shortened King Lear for the folio edition, can no longer be ignored in critical discussions of the play.

The main plot of King Lear proceeds from the division of the kingdom of England and Lear's ill-judged rejection of his daughter Cordelia, who refuses to conform to her father's demand for a public expression of her love for him. The subplot traces the rise and fall of Edmund, the bastard and ruthless son of the Earl of Gloucester who, at Edmund's instigation, wrongfully persecutes his loyal and legitimate heir, Edgar. The double plot of the play widens its imaginative treatment of parents and alienated children and portrays a society fallen from the bias of nature, in which the old, though guilty, are more sinned against than sinning. The play offers an almost unmitigated, dark and apocalyptic vision of a universe in which good characters, particularly Cordelia, perish as well as bad ones like Goneril, Regan and Edmund. For this reason, and because Shakespeare's play contravenes poetic justice, Samuel Johnson (1709-84) preferred it in its mutilated, rewritten version by Nahum Tate (1681), which ended happily as a tragicomedy with the marriage of Edgar and Cordelia. Modern audiences have responded with empathy to the play's bleak vision.

Bib: Elton, W. R., King Lear and the Gods; Taylor, G. and Warren, M. (eds.), The Division of the Kingdoms: Shakespeare's Two Versions of King Lear.

King, Sophia (c 1782-?)

Novelist and poet. Sister to ➤ Charlotte Dacre and, like her, overawed by their powerful and infamous father, John King. Her > melodramatic novels centre upon repressed heroines and dark destructive fathers and lovers. Cordelia, or The Romance of Real Life (1799), published by > Minerva, has a daughter who devotes her life to her wicked father; The Fatal Spectre, or Unknown Warrior (1801) has a male protagonist who ruins his mistress and is discovered to be the devil; and The Adventures of Victor Allen (1805) has a hero who displays biting cruelty towards women, even though the psychological reasons for this are later uncovered. This latter work is seen to anticipate > Frankenstein. King described her writing as a place where, 'the fantastic imagination roves unshackled'.

Bib: Tompkins, J.M.S., The Popular Novel in England 1770–1800.

King, Stephen (b 1947)

American novelist. The biggest-selling horror novelist of all time, King began writing short stories for American magazines in 1966; his early work is collected in the anthology Nightshift (1978). His first novel Carrie (1975) tapped into the potent vein of paedophobia uncovered by William Peter Blatty's The Exorcist and was marketed as an 'Exorcist-style' work. Unlike the many contemporary plagiarists of Blatty's best-seller, however, King flourished and developed a uniquely popular personal style, using corrupted symbols of cosy suburban Americana to explore the taboos of modern life, blending elements of archaic Gothic with a new style of horrific realism. In Salem's Lot (1975), King transposed the traditional vampire tale to a modern setting, creating a blackly satirical modern nightmare reminiscent of Rosemary's Baby. Similarly, The Shining (1977) updated the theme of the haunted house, drawing heavily upon Shirley Jackson's The Haunting of Hill House. King's 1981 critical work Danse Macabre has become the textbook of modern popular horror fiction and films. In 1977, he adopted the pseudonym Richard Bachman to escape the demands of his growing reputation, under which he wrote a number of novels including The Running Man (1982) and Thinner (1984). Although the popularity of King's prolific output has continued to increase (he has sold over 80 million books) the quality of his writing has been inconsistent. In the early 1980s, King's creative juices dried, and his output (which he describes as 'the literary equivalent of a Big Mac') became tedious and formulaic. Ironically, this bout of artistic sterility gave birth to Misery (1987), perhaps King's finest novel, wherein a writer of pulp romances attempts to escape his money-making legacy and find creative fulfilment, only to be imprisoned (literally) by the stifling demands of his Number One Fan.

A few of King's novels and short stories have been successfully adapted for the screen by renowned directors: Brian de Palma (Carrie), Stanley Kubrick (The Shining), David Cronenberg (The Dead Zone) and Rob Reiner (Stand by Me, Misery); many more have been destroyed in translation (Children of the Corn, Firestarter, Graveyard Shift, Cujo, Christine). King currently lives in Maine. Works include: The Stand (1978); The Dead Zone (1979); Firestarter (1980); Cujo (1981); Different Seasons (1982); The Dark Tower (1982); Christine (1983); Cycle of the Werewolf (1983); Pet Sematary (1983); The Talisman (1984, with Peter Straub); The Eyes of the Dragon (1984); Skeleton Crew (1985); It (1986); The Dark Half (1989); Four Past Midnight (1990); Needful Things (1991). As

Richard Bachman: Rage (1977); The Long Walk (1979); The Running Man (1982); Thinner (1984).

King, William (1663-1712)

Author of satirical and burlesque works in both prose and verse, including (with Charles Boyle) Dialogues of the Dead (1699) and The Art of Cookery (1708), imitating Horace's Art of Poetry.

Kingis Quair

A narrative in ▷ rhyme royal, written c 1422, and attributed to ▷ James I of Scotland. The Kingis Quair (King's Book) is greatly indebted to the work of ▷ Chaucer, especially to the ▷ Knight's Tale. The narrative (some 1,379 lines long) recounts the experiences of a knight-prisoner who falls in love with a lady walking in the garden below his cell and in a dreamvision visits the realm of Venus, the palace of Minerva, and encounters Fortuna, and finally is assured that his suit for the lady will be successful.

➤ James I, King of Scotland. Bib: Norton-Smith, J. (ed.), The Kingis Quair:

King-maker, The

The nickname of Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick (1428–71). He was one of the most powerful English nobles during the civil wars known as the ▷ Wars of the Roses. In the early 1460s he was from time to time in a position to control the destinies of the rival claimants to the throne ¬ ▷ Henry VI (of the ▷ House of Lancaster) and ▷ Edward IV (of York).

King's Company, The

Acting company formed by ⊳ Sir Thomas Killigrew after the Restoration of ▷ Charles II. It performed from November 1660 at the former Gibbons' Tennis Court in > Vere Street, near > Lincoln's Inn Fields, which had been converted to a theatre. In May 1663 it moved to a purpose-built theatre at Bridges Street, > Drury Lane, also known as the Theatre Royal. In January 1672 that theatre was destroyed by fire and in March 1674, after a temporary sojourn at Lincoln's Inn Fields, the company moved to a new King's Theatre, or Theatre Royal, designed at Drury Lane by > Sir Christopher Wren. Here it remained until its union with the > Duke's Company to form the > United Company in 1682.

> Theatres.

King's Friends

George III tried to revive the power of monarchical government in England against the Whig aristocracy which, since the accession to the throne of the > House of Hanover in 1714, had controlled the country through Parliament. Since the institution of Parliament was too strong for the king to ignore it, he tried to carry out his purpose by securing (largely through various forms of bribery) a party to support his policies and ministers from within Parliament. These became known as the King's Friends or the New Tories.

King's Men, The

> Chamberlain's Men, The Lord.

King's Theatre

Drury Lane Theatres; Haymarket Theatres.

Kingsley, Charles (1819-75)

Novelist, clergyman, reformer. He belonged to a movement known as Christian Socialism, led by F.D. Maurice. He is now remembered chiefly for his children's book, ▷ The Water Babies (1863). His novels Yeast (1848) and ▷ Alton Locke (1850) are concerned with the theme of social injustice. ▷ Hypatia (1853), Westward Ho! (1855) and Hereward the Wake (1865) are ▷ historical novels. His retelling for the young of Greek myths, The Heroes (1856) is still well known.

Social problem novel, Children's literature; Lawrence, G.A.

Bib: Pope-Hennessy, U., Canon Charles Kingsley; Martin, R.B., The Dust of Combat: A Life of Kingsley; Thorp, M.F., Life; Barry, J.D., in Victorian Fiction (ed. L. Stevenson); Chitty, S., The Beast and the Monk: A Life of Charles Kingsley; Collom, S.B., Charles Kingsley: The Lion of Eversley.

Kingsley, Mary (1852–1931)

⊳ Malet, Lucas.

Kingsley, Mary (1862-1900)

➤ Travel writer and ➤ ethnologist. She was born in Islington, London, the daughter of Mary Bailey and George Henry Kingsley, and niece of the novelist ➤ Charles Kingsley. She is remembered today as an explorer of West Africa, having travelled widely in that area between 1893 and 1895. She recorded her experiences in Travels in West Africa, Congo Française, Corisco, and Cameroon (1897), in which she writes of the customs and traditions of peoples such as the Ajumba, Adooma and Fan, as well as describing natural environments in great detail. Two further works, The Story of West Africa (1899) and West African Studies (1899), are respectively historical and anthropological in focus. Kingsley died of enteric fever in Cape Town in 1900, during her third trip to Africa. She was celebrated as a great ethnologist; a society was founded in her name to promote the study of African peoples and culture.

> Colonialism.

Bib: Campbell, O., Mary Kingsley: A Victorian in the Jungle; Clair, C., 'Female Anger and African Politics: The Case of Two Victorian "Lady Travellers", Turn-of-the-Century Women 2, 1, Summer 1985.

Kipling, Rudyard (1865-1936)

Poet, short-story writer, novelist. He was born in India, educated in England, and returned to India at seventeen as a journalist. In 1889 he came to England to live.

Kipling's poetry is striking for his success in using, vividly and musically, popular forms of speech, sometimes in the ▷ Browning tradition of the ▷ dramatic monologue, eg McAndrew's Hymn, or in the ▷ ballad tradition, eg Barrack-Room Ballads (1892). He was also able to write poetry appropriate to public occasions and capable of stirring the feelings of a large public, eg his famous Recessional (1897). His poetry is generally simple in its components but, when it rises above the level of doggerel, strong in its impact. It needs to be read in selection: A Choice of Kipling's Verse (ed. T.S. Eliot) has a very good introductory essay.

Kipling's stories brought him fame, and, partly under French influence, he gave close attention to perfecting the art of the > short story. The volumes include: Plain Tales from the Hills (1887); Life's Handicap (1891); Many Inventions (1893); The Day's Work (1898); Traffics and Discoveries (1904); Actions and Reactions (1909); A Diversity of Creatures (1917); Debits and Credits (1926) and Limits and Renewals (1932). The early stories in particular show Kipling's capacity to feel with the humble (common soldiers, Indian peasants) and the suffering. But he admired action, power, and efficiency; this side of his character brought out much of the best and the worst in his writing. Some of his best stories show his enthusiasm for the triumphs of technology, and are about machines rather than people, eg in The Day's Work. On the other hand he was inclined to be crudely chauvinistic, and to show unpleasant arrogance towards peoples ruled by or hostile to Britain, though he also emphasized British responsibility for the welfare of the governed peoples. Yet again, he sometimes engaged in delicate if sentimental fantasy, as in They and The Brushwood Boy (1925); some of his later stories show a sensitive and sometimes morbid insight into abnormal states of mind, eg Mary Postgate (1917). The stories, like the poems, are best read in selection: A Choice of Kipling's Prose (ed. Somerset Maugham).

Kipling is not outstanding as a full-length novelist. His best novel is ▷ Kim (1901), based on his childhood in India; Stalky and Co (1899) is well known as a tale about an English public school, and is based on Kipling's own schooldays at the United Services College. The Light that Failed (1890) shows his more sensitive and sombre aspect. An autobiographical fragment, Something of Myself, was published in 1937.

Kipling's children's stories are minor classics of their kind: ▷ The Jungle Books (1894-5); Just

So Stories (1902); Puck of Pook's Hill (1906). Rewards and Fairies (1910) is less celebrated.

➤ Children's literature; Imperialism.

Bib: Birkenhead, Lord, Rudyard Kipling
(biography); Page, N., A Kipling Companion;
Carrington, C.E., Life; Dobree, B., Kipling;
Orwell, G., in Critical Essays; Wilson, E., in
The Wound and the Bow; Green, R.L. (ed.), Kipling: The Critical Heritage.

Kipps (1905)

A novel by > H. G. Wells. It describes the social rise of a shop-assistant through an unexpected legacy, his engagement to a vulgarly snobbish young lady who has hitherto been out of his reach, and his painful acquisition of the false standards and cares which are forced upon him. He escapes the marriage by marrying suddenly a girl of his own former class, but he only escapes his worries when he loses his money. The book contains acute social observation and comedy in the Dickens tradition, though Wells' style is quite his own.

Kit-Cat Club

Founded early in the 18th century by leading Whig men of letters and politicians (Whig and Tory); its members included ➤ Marlborough, ➤ Walpole, ➤ Steele, ➤ Addison, ➤ Congreve and ➤ Vanbrugh. It met at the house of a pastry-cook called Christopher Cat. Their portraits by ➤ Sir Godfrey Kneller hang in the National Portrait Gallery.

➤ Clubs.

Kneller, Sir Godfrey (1646–1723) Painter, born at Lübeck, who trained at Amsterdam under a pupil of Rembrandt, and came to England in 1675. He was made court painter in 1680, serving under successive monarchs including ➤ Charles II, ➤ James II, > William III, > Anne and George I. He painted hundreds of works, including portraits of nine sovereigns and many other members of the nobility, as well as leading writers, actors, actresses and politicians. His paintings are marked by a distinctive formality and grace, in a style that is easily recognizable. His best-known works are 42 portraits of members of the ➤ Whig ➤ Kit-Cat Club, known as the Kit-Cat series (1702-17). Knighted in 1692, Kneller was the first painter in England to be made a baronet, in 1715. In 1711 he founded Kneller's Academy, the first of its kind in England.

Knevet, Ralph (1600-71)

Poet. Knevet was attached in a clerical capacity to the Paston family in Norfolk from 1628 until 1637, and wrote numerous religious poems, heavily indebted to ▷ George Herbert. Similarly, his attempt at political ▷ allegory is confined to a 'continuation' of ▷ Spenser's ▷ The Faerie Queene, entitled A Supplement of the Faery Queene (1635). He also wrote a parodic ▷ masque, Rhodon and Iris (1631), for the florists' guild at Norwich. Other extanworks are: Stratiotikon, or a Discourse of Militarie Discipline (1628) and Funerall Elegies (1637). Bib: Charles, A. M. (ed.), The Shorter Poems of Ralph Knevett.

Knight, Frances Maria (fl1682–1724)
Actress whose career survived transitions of taste and her own aging, to remain on the stage for 35 years. She began as a child actress, playing the roles of young girls in plays of ▷ D'Urfey, ▷ Shadwell and ▷ Southerne, moving on to wives and mistresses in the 1690s and 1700s, and eventually to widows and at least one mother. She played heroines, coquettes and villainesses, and is said to have continued acting to the end of her life. Bib: Howe, E., The First English Actresses.

Knight of the Burning Pestle, The (1607) A comedy by ▷ Francis Beaumont. It mocks the London middle-class taste for extravagant romances in the Spanish tradition about the adventures of wandering knights ('knight-errantry'). It also parodies a contemporary play, The Four Prentices of London by ▷ Thomas Heywood, who flattered this taste. It seems to owe something to Cervantes' ▷ Don Quivote (Pt I, 1605), itself a parody of the Spanish romances; this, however, was not translated until 1612 (▷ Spanish influence on English literature).

The play at first purports to be called The London Merchant but a grocer and his wife, sitting in the audience, become worried that this may turn out to be a ▷ satire on London citizens. They are determined to have something to flatter their vanity, and force their apprentice, Ralph, up on to the stage to perform the role of a 'grocer errant'; he wears on his shield the sign of a burning pestle, ie an implement used by shopkeepers. The play of The London Merchant proceeds together with Ralph's Quixote-like adventures, and the grocer and his wife, still in the audience, interpose appreciative comments.

The comedy shows the great theatrical dexterity achieved by English dramatists at the height of the Shakespearean period. A main part of this dramatic skill is the intermingling of styles − song, comic rhyme, serious ▷ blank verse, and colloquial prose.

Knighthood

A term which covers a complex historical and cultural phenomenon, referring both to members of a social estate whose role and status evolved in different ways in medieval Europe, and to a more abstract ethos, a framework of values and a code for behaviour, which is promoted in various kinds of medieval and post-medieval artistic representations and social rituals (in manuals of chivalric activity, in rituals of state and Church, in visual media, etc.), but which is perhaps more honoured in the breach than in the observance by those who claim the title of 'Sir'.

Knighthood (or chivalry - the term more favoured by modern historians of culture) cannot be summed up in a few words because it is not a homogeneous phenomenon. It seems that the role of the knight, which was defined as a military function in the early medieval period (as an armed, mounted warrior who rendered military service in return for a fief), came by the 13th century to be a socially prestigious role to which members of the nobility aspired (the military function being rendered, it seems, by financial payment). Tracing the history of that evolution requires attention to the specific power structures in operation in different countries, in different regions, during this time: the role of the knight-figure in post-Conquest England (in which Anglo-Norman and Saxon institutions were intermeshed) is not the same as that of the knight in the regions of France. However, tracing the history of the institution of knighthood also requires attention to how the cultural concept of knighthood evolved, and how a body of material on knighthood, in theory and in practice, came about. The Church had an important part to play in this: necessarily, if knights are given a role to play as defenders of the faith (and the faithful), some examination of the codes and limits of justifiable martial action is required. But all kinds of secular literature too, from romances to classical histories and conduct books, played a part in cultivating the mythology of knighthood and developing the notion of chivalry as a transhistorical phenomenon which may encode the values of the social elite of different historical times.

Attempts to generalize about medieval chivalric literature may be as misleading as attempts to generalize about knighthood. Some of the chivalric narratives most familiar to modern English audiences, such as ➤ Gawain and the Green Knight or > Chaucer's > Knight's Tale, are far from simple manifestos promoting the interests of chivalric culture: these texts are as much concerned with exploring the tensions in the chivalric ethos as celebrating the panopoly of knightly adventure and its civilizing effects. The trio of Knight, Squire, Yeoman, as presented in the General Prologue of the > Canterbury Tales, provides both an image of the idealized structure of a feudal/chivalric hierarchy bound by notions of service, and embodies a recognition of the different models of chivalry, embodied in the single term. The Knight and the Squire represent different 'ages of Man' and different kinds of chivalric models: the crusading defender of the faith provides a contrast to the figure of the Squire, immersed in a world of courtly and amorous accomplishments and values. Chaucer's single foray into the world of Arthurian romance, > The Wife of Bath's Tale, clearly shows how definitions of the knighthood might be opposed: in this tale the definition of 'courtoisie' as a moral virtue, not a 'natural' attribute of class origin, voiced by the Old Woman in the narrative, is potentially at odds with the notion of knighthood as a quality of class, voiced by the central knightly protagonist who finds it difficult to accommodate marriage to a social inferior. Many of the anonymous Middle English romances are concerned with negotiating between these two different approaches to defining knighthood. Many of their central chivalric heroes serve an 'apprenticeship' in disguise, or are dispossessed in some way from their heritage, and thus demonstrate, finally, that their membership of a social elite is justified by birth and by the moral quality of their performance as in > King Horn or > Havelok.

Unravelling the interrelation between the literary theory and the social practice of chivalry is no simple matter. There is no doubt, for example, that Edward III's institution of the Order of the > Garter in 1348 was influenced by a model of chivalric life developed in Arthurian narratives, among others. But it is also the case that this tradition of Arthurian literature itself developed as a literary arena in which examinations of the theory and practice of the values of a social elite could take place. The chivalric world offered, and continues to offer, writers and artists an arena for the exploration of codes of behaviour and modes of social organization, even when the social and historical context of the artist's culture is far removed from the world of knights and ladies.

➤ Crusades, The.

Bib: Coss, P., The Knight in Medieval England.

Knights of the Shire

A term used in the 14th and 15th centuries for small landowners who elected representatives to Parliament. They were not necessarily knights in the usual sense of having had > knighthood conferred on them.

> Forty shilling freeholders.

Knight's Tale, The

One of ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales, which is a reworking of the Teseida by ➤ Boccaccio, and recounts the story of ➤ Palamon and Arcite's love for Emily, sister of Hippolyta (wife of Theseus, Duke of Athens). The two Theban knights fall in love with Emily while held as Theseus' prisoners and eventually compete for Emily in a public tournament in Athens. Although Arcite wins the tournament, he is subsequently thrown from his horse and dies. After an interval of many years, Theseus arranges the marriage of Palamon and Emily, prompted by the desire for a political alliance with Athens. The gods play an active part in the narrative, reflecting the powers and desires of the earthly characters, and partly shaping the lives of the earthly protagonists too. In Chaucer's version of the narrative, questions about how order can be achieved on a personal and political level are very much to the fore. A Chaucerian version of the story of Palamon and Arcite appears to pre-date the composition of the Canterbury Tales: in the prologue to the ▶ Legend of Good Women, composed around 1386-7, the story is mentioned as one of Chaucer's 'makyngs'. Chaucer also tackled the story of Arcite from a rather different angle in his unfinished work > Anelida and Arcite.

> Theseus.

Knox, John (1505-72)

Scottish religious reformer. More than anyone else, he was responsible for the conversion of Scotland from Catholic to Calvinist Christianity, and the eventual establishment of the national Presbyterian Church there. This brought him into conflict with > Mary Queen of Scots, but he was out of the country when rebellion forced her to abdicate in 1567 and seek the protection of ▷ Elizabeth I. His History of the Reformation of Religion within the realme of Scotland includes an account of his celebrated controversy with the queen. Knox's vehement antagonism towards the concept, as well as the actuality, of female sovereign power has recently been highlighted by ⊳ feminist critics. Bib: Ridley, J., John Knox.

Knox, Vicessimus (1752-1821)

English cleric and author, who became master of Tunbridge School in Kent. He wrote several volumes of sermons and theological and literary treatises, in a style noted for its elegance and correctness. Among them are Moral and Literary Essays (1777); Liberal Education; or a Practical Treatise on the Methods of Acquiring Useful and Polite Learning (1781); and Elegant Extracts in Prose and Verse (1789).

Koestler, Arthur (1905-83)

Novelist and philosopher. He was born in Hungary and educated at the University of Vienna. From 1932 to 1938 he was a member of the Communist Party (> Communism). He went to Spain as a correspondent during the Spanish Civil War, and was imprisoned by the Nationalists. Subsequently imprisoned in France during 1939–40, he joined the Foreign Legion before escaping to Britain in 1941. After World War II he became a British subject. From the 1930s to the 1950s his work was primarily concerned with political issues; his novel Darkness At Noon (1940) exposed Stalinist methods through the story of the imprisonment and execution of a former Bolshevik leader.

From the 1950s onwards his writings were more concerned with the philosophical implications of scientific discoveries. His non-fiction trilogy, The Sleepwalkers (1959), The Act of Creation (1964) and The Ghost in the Machine (1967) considered the effect of science on man's idea of himself, and defended the concept of mind. A persistent feature of his work was a sense of horror at the barbarities of 20th-century Europe. Koestler, who had advocated the right to euthanasia, and who was suffering from leukaemia and Parkinson's disease, committed suicide together with his third wife, Cynthia Jefferies, in 1983. His other novels are: The Gladiators (1939); Arrival and Departure (1943); Thieves in the Night (1946); The Age of Longing (1951); The Call Girls (1972). Autobiographical writings include: Arrow in the Blue (1952); The Invisible Writing (1954). Other prose writings include: The Yogi and the Commissar (1945); The Roots of Coincidence (1972). Bib: Hamilton, I., Koestler: A Biography; Pearson, S. A., Arthur Koestler.

Kogawa, Joy (b 1935)

Poet and novelist. During the second world war, Kogawa and her family were interned in a camp for Canadians of Japanese extraction and her work circles about the uneasy sense of identity such transculturalism produces. Indeed, her most well-known work, the novel Obasan (1981) discusses the internment of Japanese families in Canada and combines history, autobiography, fiction and political comment in a postmodern assessment of racial difference in Canada today.

Kotzebue, August Friedrich Ferdinand von (1761-1819)

German dramatist, who directed the theatre of Vienna, and wrote some 200 plays. Several of these were translated into English, including The Stranger, The Indians in England, Pizarro, and Benyowski. One of them, adapted by ▷ Elizabeth Inchbald as Lovers' Vows, features in ▷ Jane Austen's ▷ Mansfield Park. His work greatly influenced the development of ▷ melodrama on the Continent and in England.

Kristeva, Julia (b 1941)

French psychoanalyst, philosopher and linguistic theorist. Julia Kristeva was born and grew up in Bulgaria, and moved to Paris to study in 1966. She writes in French, and is now a naturalized French citizen, but she has often drawn on the language and psychology of exile in her work – in 1970 > Roland Barthes was one of the first theorists to respond enthusiastically to her work, calling her 'L'étrangère'. Kristeva's earlier work is more strongly concerned with semiotics and linguistic theory (Séméiotiké, 1969, outlines Kristeva's own brand of 'semanalysis'; see also Desire in Language: A Semiotic Approach to Literature and Art, 1980), and as her interest in psychoanalysis has burgeoned she has undertaken a series of studies of literature. poetics and abnormal psychology, and the relationship between language and the body (particularly Powers of Horror, 1982 Tales of Love, 1983, and Black Sun, 1980). Her long-term interest in symbolist and ➤ modernist writers continued to animate her work (Mallarmé and > Lautréamont are the subject of Revolution in Poetic Language, 1974, and Céline figures centrally in Powers of Horror), and she has also had a profound impact on the development of the so-called 'New French Feminist' movement (see essays and interviews with her in New French Feminisms, ed. E. Marks and I. de Courtivron, as well as Desire in Language About Chinese Women, trans. 1977). Kristeva is a long-term member of the editorial board of the radical journal > Tel Quel and is a practising psychoanalyst. Bib: Moi, T. (ed.), The Kristeva Reader, Lechte, J., Julia Kristeva; Moi, T., Sexual/ Textual Politics.

➤ Feminism; post-structuralism; psychoanalytic criticism; écriture féminine.

Kubla Khan: or, A Vision in a Dream: A Fragment (1816)

An ode by ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, written in 1797, when he was living in Somerset. Coleridge recorded that he fell asleep after reading a description in Purchas his Pilgrimage (1613) of the pleasure gardens constructed in Xanadu by the 13th-century Mongol king of China, Khan (king) Kublai. While he was asleep 'from two to three hundred lines' came to him, which upon waking he hastened to write down. However he was interrupted by 'a person on business from Porlock', and afterwards could recall nothing of the remainder, 'with the exception of some eight or ten scattered lines and images'. It is difficult to know how much of this account to believe. One element Coleridge suppresses is his addiction to opium, which is certainly relevant to the hallucinatory clarity of the poem's exotic images. Because of the oddness of Coleridge's account 'a visitor from Porlock' has become a byword for any kind of intriguing, possibly evasive, excuse.

Despite its designation 'A Fragment' the work is artistically complete. The first three sections rework phrases from the ➤ Jacobean travel book, to describe a strangely primal landscape. An awesome 'mighty fountain' forms the source of the 'sacred river' Alph, on the banks of which Kubla has built a 'stately pleasuredome' surrounded by orchards and gardens. After watering the garden the river continues its course, entering 'caverns measureless to man' and sinking 'in tumult to a lifeless ocean'. The clarity and primitiveness of these images gives the poem an archetypal resonance. The river can be seen as the river of life or creativity; the fountain symbolizes birth (of an individual, civilization, poetic inspiration), and the 'lifeless ocean' death or sterility. The dome stands for the precarious creative balance between. It is possible that the final fourth section of the poem, which seems to be a commentary upon the preceding lines, were 'the eight or ten lines or images' written after the departure of Coleridge's visitor, if he or she ever existed. The poem ends by imputing magical qualities to the poem itself and its bardic author: 'Weave a circle round him thrice,/ And close your eyes with holy dread,/ For he on honey-dew hath fed,/ And drunk the milk of Paradise.'

▶ Bard; Romanticism.

Kureishi, Hanif (b 1954)

Novelist, playwright and screenplay writer. Born in Kent and educated at King's College London, he was appointed Writer in Residence at the Royal Court Theatre in 1982 after winning the George Devine Award for his play Outskirts (1981). He has written two screenplays: My Beautiful Laundrette (filmed 1985) and Sammy and Rosie Get Laid (filmed 1987). He also wrote the screenplay for (and directed) the film London Kills Me (1991). His first novel, The Buddha of Suburbia (1989), is a comic, satirical story about growing up in south-east London, and was followed in 1995 by The Black Album.

Kyd, Thomas (1558-94)

Dramatist. He is associated with the group known as the ➤ University Wits. His only known and important contribution to the output of the group is ▷ The Spanish Tragedy (1587), extremely popular in its own time and the first important ⊳ revenge tragedy. He was probably also the author of a lost play on ➤ Hamlet, used by ➤ Shakespeare as the basis of his own; even without this, it is clear that Shakespeare developed the revenge theme from Kyd's first handling of it. Kyd's own starting-point was the tragedies of the Roman dramatist > Seneca, whose Ten Tragedies had been published in translation (1550-81). He was not interested in Senecan form, but in Seneca's mingling of dramatic horror and the stern restraints of ➤ Stoic philosophy, both of which were congenial to the Elizabethan age. Kyd's other surviving tragedies are only attributed to him and are much less important: Soliman and Perseda (?1588) and Cornelia (?1593), an adaptation of a Senecan tragedy by the French dramatist Robert Garnier.

Kyd was arrested in 1593 on suspicion of being involved in anti-immigrant incitement; the Socinian treatise on atheism was raised as an issue later and he implicated ▷ Christopher Marlowe by saying that the treatise really belonged to him. He was released after Marlowe's mysterious death in the same year, and seems to have died soon afterwards in poverty.

Bib: Murray, P. B., Thomas Kyd.

Kynaston, Edward (1643-1712)

Actor. Kynaston began his theatrical career in 1660 as a boy actor in women's roles when he was considered 'a Compleat Female Stage Beauty', by the prompter, John Downes.

Kynaston soon transferred to ▷ Killigrew's ▷ King's Company, acting first at the Red Bull Playhouse, and then at the ▷ Vere Street Theatre. He began playing men's parts in addition to women's, but with the full advent of women to the stage, and his own growing maturity, he took on men's roles exclusively.

Kynaston, Sir Francis (1587–1642) Poet and translator. While at Lincoln's Inn, Kynaston wrote several ➤ masques, and his verse romance, Leoline and Sydanis (1642), displays evidence of this early theatrical involvement. The poem follows the structure of a five-act play, similar to > Shakespeare's early comedies, and includes a complicated Renaissance masque set in an ancient Irish court. The language and style are reminiscent of > Spenser, showing quasi-medieval influences, and indeed, Kynaston translated ➤ Chaucer's > Troilus and Criseyde into Latin. He also opened an academy for the sons of the nobility called Museum Minervae, where he hoped to teach them a combination of languages, courtly skills and the sciences.

L

La Fayette, Marie-Madeleine Pioche de la Vergue, Comtesse de (1634–93)

French novelist, whose (anonymously published) third work, The Princess of Clèves (1678), represents an important early stage in the development of the European novel. As a prototype of the ➤ Bildungsroman and of the psychological novel, this story of an unhappy but faithful wife at the 16th-century court of Henri II of France marks the point at which the novel as such emerges in France as a form distinct from the romance. La Fayette was a member of a literary circle in Paris which included La Rochefoucauld, famous for his aphorisms.

La Guma, Alex (1925-85)

South African writer and political activist. He worked as a clerk, bookkeeper and factory hand and was a committee member of the Cape Town Communist Party until its banning in 1950. In 1956 he helped to organize the Freedom Charter and as a result was one of the 156 people accused in the Treason Trial. He began writing for New Age in 1960, was placed under house arrest in 1962 and, after the passing of the No Trial Act, was put in solitary confinement. He fled from South Africa in 1967, initially to Britain and then to Cuba, where he was African National Congress representative and where he died in 1985. His novels, set in the black townships and prisons of South Africa under the apartheid regime in the 1960s, are powerful works of protest, showing police violence on the streets and torture in prison, and emphasizing the development of political consciousness as necessary to any better future. The novels include: A Walk in the Night (1962); And A Threefold Cord (1964); The Stone Country (1967); In The Fog of the Season's End (1972); Time of the Butcherbird (1979).

Lacan, Jacques (1901-81)

French psychoanalyst whose re-readings of > Freud have become influential within the area of literary criticism. Lacan's The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis (trans. 1077), and his Ecrits: A Selection (trans. 1077). outline the nature of his revision of Freudian psychoanalytic method. A further selection of papers has appeared under the title of Feminine Sexuality (trans. 1982). It is to Lacan that we owe the critical terms 'imaginary' and 'symbolic order'. Similarly, it is to his investigation of the operations of the unconscious according to the model of language - 'the unconscious is structured like a language' - that we owe the notion of a 'split' human subject. For Lacan the 'imaginary' is associated with the pre-Oedipal and pre-linguistic relationship between mother and child (the 'mirror' stage) where there appears to be no discrepancy between identity and its outward reflection. This is succeeded by the entry of the infant into the 'symbolic order', with its rules and prohibitions centred around the figure of the father (the phallus). The 'desire of the mother' is then repressed by the child's entry into language and the 'symbolic order'. The desire for 'imaginary' unity is also repressed to form the unconscious, which the interaction between analyst and patient aims to unlock. Some of the fundamental divisions that Lacan has located in the 'subject' have proved highly adaptable for a range of ⊳ materialist literary criticisms, including (more controversially) > feminism. As a young man, Lacan was a member of the Surrealist group in Paris, whose activities restated in modern terms a number of key Romantic interests, for example in dreams, madness and the hidden workings of the mind, all topics that his theoretical works deal with in a style frequently as opaque and challenging as poetry.

Lacy, John (?1615-81)

Actor, dancer, choreographer, manager, dramatist, Lacy came to London in 1631, probably to join the Cockpit Theatre, and became a dancer, before his career was interrupted by the ➤ Interregnum. In 1660 he joined ➤ Killigrew's
➤ King's Company, acting first at ➤ Vere
Street Theatre, and soon acquired shares in the company's new building at ➤ Bridges Street, becoming a co-manager in 1663.

His first play, Sauny the Scot (1667), was a free adaptation of ▷ The Taming of the Shrew, written largely to provide a comic vehicle for himself in the part of Sauny, which became one of his major triumphs on stage. He wrote at least three other plays, all adaptations of earlier works.

His reputation was based primarily on his abilities as comedian, with a special talent for mimicry. He was the first to play ▷ Bayes in ▷ George Villiers' ▷ The Rehearsal, and became a favourite of ▷ Charles II.

Lady Audley's Secret (1862)

A novel of ▷ sensation by ▷ Mary Braddon. Abandoned by her husband, the heroine deserts her child, leaving it to the care of her father. She adopts a new identity and gains work as a ▷ governess, later accepting an offer of marriage from Sir Michael Audley and thereby becoming a bigamist. When her first husband returns, she attempts to murder him by pushing him down a well, but he survives and Lady Audley is discovered. She is sent to a lunatic asylum, having pleaded hereditary insanity.

The novel was a huge success and has been dramatized, filmed and adapted for television. Feminist critics have read the work as a subversive attack on domestic ideals and feminine stereotypes, and commented on Braddon's use of an angelic-looking blonde as a deviant woman.

➤ Hazlewood, Colin Henry.
Bib: Showalter, E., A Literature of Their Own.

Lady Bountiful

A character in > Farquhar's play > The Beaux' Stratagem. She is a rich country lady who devotes her time to helping her less fortunate neighbours. She has become a proverbial figure. Farquhar portrays her satirically.

Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928)

D. H. Lawrence's last novel. Constance Reid ('Connie') is the daughter of late-Victorian, highly cultured parents with advanced views. She marries Sir Clifford Chatterlev in 1017. when he is on leave from the army; soon afterwards he is wounded, and permanently crippled from the waist down. Connie finds herself half alive, as though she has not been fully awakened; her dissatisfaction, however, does not proceed merely from her husband's disability and sexual impotence, but from the impotence of civilization which the disability symbolizes. She turns to her husband's gamekeeper, Mellors, who fulfils her sexually and emotionally. For Lawrence, the sexual relationship was potentially the profoundest human relationship: to treat it lightly was to trivialize the whole human being, and to regard it with shame was to repress essential human energies. He saw that 'advanced' young people took the former attitude, and that the older generation took the latter; he regarded both attitudes as leading symptoms of decadence in our civilization. He did not suppose that the sexual relationship could in itself constitute a renewal of civilization, but he considered that such a renewal depended on the revitalization of relationships, and that this revitalization could never take place without the recovery of a true and healthy sexual morality. 'I want men and women to be able to think sex, fully, completely, honestly and cleanly.' (Apropos of Lady Chatterley's Lover, 1930).

This aim led Lawrence to use unprecedentedly explicit language in conveying the love affair between Connie and Mellors, and the novel thus acquired notoriety. In Britain, the full version was suppressed for immorality, but an expurgated version was published in 1928. An unabridged edition came out in Paris in 1929; the first British unabridged edition was published by Penguin Books in 1959. This led to an obscenity trial, the first test of the 1959 Obscene Publications Act, at which many distinguished authors and critics (including > E. M. Forster) testified in defence of the novel. The acquittal of Penguin had important consequences for subsequent publishing. Lawrence's defence of the novel, Apropos of ➤ Censorship and English literature.

Lady Chatterley's Lover, is one of his most important essays.

Lady Day

In the Church calendar, the feast of the Annunciation to the Virgin Mary, celebrating the prediction of the Birth of Christ by the Angel Gabriel (Luke 1). It is observed on 25 March, which is also a Quarter Day, ie it marks the end of the first quarter of the year on which bills, etc. have to be paid. In the ▷ Middle Ages there were other Lady Days commemorating other events in the life of the Virgin Mary.

'Lady of Shalott, The' (1832)

One of the best-known poems by > Alfred Tennyson. The story is an episode from the Arthurian legend of Sir Lancelot, and is to be found in Malory's Morte d'Arthur (1469/70) and in the 13th-century French romance Lancelot. Tennyson's poem is popular as an example of his extremely musical verse; it is also an example of his recurrent theme of withdrawal from deathly reality into a world of reverie. He expanded the story in his Lancelot and Elaine (1859), one of the > Idylls of the King.

Lady of the Lake

The name refers to an important role in Arthurian narratives, in origins perhaps that of an otherworldly enchantress, which may be filled by different women (including ▷ Morgan la Fav, Nimue/ Viviane). In > Malory's > Morte D'Arthur the Lady of the Lake provides Arthur with > Excalibur. The Lady seems to preside over a group of 'damsels of the Lake' who may take over the central role when necessary, as does the 'damsel' Nimue (or Viviane), the woman who entraps > Merlin, and becomes Lady of the Lake after Balin has beheaded the previous Lady. She is one of the company of women who appear, mysteriously, in a boat to take Arthur to ➤ Avalon. In the ➤ Vulgate version of the story of ➤ Lancelot, the 'Dame du Lac' steals Lancelot away as a child and rears him until he is ready to be knighted at Arthur's court.

Lady of the Lake, The (1810) A narrative poem by ➤ Sir Walter Scott set in the Scotland of James V (1513-42).

Lady Windermere's Fan (1892)

A play by Socar Wilde which brought him his first success in the theatre. Set in the aristocratic or upper-middle-class sections of society, it introduces many of the themes that were to characterize Wilde's later comedies: the struggle of the insiders to maintain their position and of the outsiders to break in. It also deals with the pressure placed on the individual to conform. The play centres around a fan belonging to Lady Windermere, who is revealed to be the daughter of the 'infamous' Mrs Erlynne: a woman who left her husband for a lover who subsequently abandoned her. Mrs Erlynne's attempt to break into the circle is doomed to failure. However, when Lady Windermere's fan is found in the house of the dandy Lord Darlington, Mrs Erlynne is able to save her daughter from social disgrace. The play was a huge success and was published in 1893.

Lagado

In > Swift's > Gulliver's Travels (Part III) capital of the island of Balnibarbi and its neighbouring flying island > Laputa.

Lake Poets

A term coined by ▷ Francis Jeffrey in the ▷ Edinburgh Review (October 1807) to describe ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, ▷ Robert Southey and ▷ William Wordsworth, who for a time lived in close association in the Lake District. The community of literary and social outlook in their earlier work made it natural to speak of them as a group, but in fact only Wordsworth was profoundly identified with the locality.

Lamarck, Jean-Baptiste (1744–1829)
French pioneer biologist who formulated an explanation of evolutionary change based on the supposition that physical and mental characteristics developed by an individual in response to changes in its environment were physically inherited by its offspring. His theory of evolution through the inheritance of acquired characteristics was highly influential throughout most of the 19th century, despite being usurped by ▷ Darwin's theory of evolution through natural selection. It formed the basis of much of ▷ Herbert Spencer's early thought.

Lamb; Lady Caroline (1785-1828) Novelist and poet. The only daughter of the 3rd Earl of Bessborough, she was taken to Italy at the age of three and brought up mostly in the care of a servant. Educated at Devonshire House School, she was then looked after by her maternal grandmother, Lady Spencer, who worried about her instability and 'eccentricities'. She married the statesman William Lamb (later the 2nd Viscount Melbourne), but in 1812, just after her marriage, became desperately infatuated with > Byron, of whom she wrote in her diary that he was 'mad, bad and dangerous to know'. After he broke with her, she became increasingly unstable and violent-tempered, and her husband sued for separation becoming temporarily reconciled, however, on the day fixed for the execution of the deed. Meeting Byron's funeral cortège seems to have hastened her disintegration and she ended up living with her father-in-law and only surviving son, an invalid. Her first novel, Glenarvon (1816), had a significant, though brief success, due no doubt to its portrayal of Byron and herself in a wild and romantic story. It was published anonymously, though she courted notoriety, being impulsive, vain and excitable to the point of insanity, as well as highly original. She wrote two further novels, Graham Hamilton (1822) and Ada Reis (1823), and poetry, some of which has been set to music.

Bib: Jenkins, E., Lady Caroline Lamb.

Lamb, Charles (1775-1834)

Essayist and critic. His best-known work is his two volumes of the ➤ Essays of Elia (1823 and 1833), in which he discourses about his life and times. His Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the Time of Shakespeare directed interest towards > Shakespeare's contemporaries, who had been somewhat neglected in the 18th century, although perhaps not so much ignored as Lamb thought. His friends included many writers of his time, and this fact gives a special interest to his letters. He collaborated with his sister ➤ Mary in adapting Shakespeare's plays into stories for children - Tales from Shakespeare (1807). His poems are unimportant but one or two, eg The Old Familiar Faces (1798) and the prose-poem, Dream Children, recur in anthologies. Lamb seems to have been a man of unusual charm and of gifts which he never allowed himself to display fully and energetically, perhaps because he was haunted by the fear of insanity, to which both he and his sister were subject. Bib: Lucas, E. V., Life; Tillyard, E. M. W. (ed.), Lamb's Criticism; Blunden, E., Charles Lamb and his Contemporaries; Cecil, D., A Portrait of Charles Lamb.

Lamb, Mary Ann (1764-1847) Sister to ➤ Charles Lamb and daughter of a lawyer, she was brought up in poor circumstances, helping her mother, who worked as a needlewoman. In 1796, overworked and stressed, she pursued her mother's apprentice round the room with a knife in a fit of irritation, and when her mother interposed she killed her. The verdict was one of insanity and she was given into the custody of her brother Charles who took charge of her, finding suitable accommodation for her during her periodic bouts of illness and maintaining a close and affectionate relationship. With Charles, she wrote Tales from Shakespeare (1807), designed to make ➤ Shakespeare's stories accessible to the young; The Adventures of Ulysses (1808), which was an attempt to do the same for ➤ Homer; and Mrs Leicester's School (1809), a collection of short stories.

Lamia (1820)

A poem in pentameter > couplets (> metre) by > John Keats, based on a story in Robert Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (1621-51). In ancient myth a lamia was a female demon, one of whose practices was to entice young men in order to devour them. In Keats' poem a serpent is transformed into a beautiful girl who fascinates a young Corinthian, Lycius. He takes her into his home and makes a bridal feast which is attended by the philosopher Apollonius. Apollonius recognizes the lamia and calls her by her true name, whereupon she vanishes and Lycius dies. The poem, with its rich, fluently enjambed couplets, is an ambiguous plea in favour of aestheticism and sensual escapism. Lamia should be the villain of the poem, but in fact it is Apollonius. The world to which she introduces the young Greek is one of ravishing beauty and magic, and the final triumph of philosophical truth is accompanied by the death of the imagination: 'Do not all charms fly/ At the mere touch of cold philosophy?"

Lammas

In Old English, 'loaf mass'; used formerly in the Church as a thanksgiving for harvest, or harvest festival, celebrated on 1 August. It was also (and in Scotland still is) a Quarter Day for the payment of bills, etc.

Lamming, George (b 1927)

Barbadian novelist. After teaching in Trinidad he moved to Britain in 1950. His novels are concerned with the West Indian identity, both individual and collective, and the aftermath of colonialism and slavery. The Emigrants (1954) is a bleak portraval of identity sought and lost among black emigrants to England in the 1950s; Season of Adventure (1960) represents the awakening to a new and more liberal consciousness of the daughter of a West Indian police officer; Water with Berries (1971) uses parallels with the colonial symbolism of > Shakespeare's The Tempest to represent the historical consequences of colonialism through the personal crises of three West Indian artists living in London. His other novels are: In the Castle of my Skin (1953); Of Age and Innocence (1958); Natives of my Person (1972); The Pleasures of Exile (1984). Bib: Paquet, S. P., The Novels of George Lamming.

Lampoon

A personal attack in the form of a verse ▷ satire, usually motivated by mere malevolence. It was common in the later 17th and 18th centuries. A well-known example is ▷ Dryden's attack on ▷ George Villiers, 2nd Duke of Buckingham, as Zimri in ▷ Absalom and Achitophel. Libel laws prevented the development of the genre.

Lancelot

One of the most famous of the knights of the ➤ Round Table and lover of Queen ➤ Guinevere. Although Lancelot has no place in > Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of Arthurian history (1138), by the end of the 12th century he was established as an important figure in vernacular Arthurian narratives. It is possible that an ▶ Anglo-Norman narrative about his life and adventures once existed (for it is used as the source of the late-12th century German narrative Lanzelet). But the earliest extant romance about Lancelot is > Chrétien de Troyes' Chévalier de la Charrete (c 1175), which recounts how Lancelot rescues Guinevere after her abduction by King Meleagant, as well as other episodes in Lancelot's chivalric career in her service. Chrétien does not provide many details of Lancelot's background but his profile is developed considerably in the 13thcentury prose Lancelot and in other sections of the > Vulgate cycle of romances (from which ▶ Malory draws much of his material for his ► Morte D'Arthur).

Lancelot is the son of King Ban of Benoic (in western France), who is carried away as a baby and brought up by the ➤ Lady of the Lake (hence his full name Lancelot du Lac), who eventually presents him to > Arthur's court. There he establishes himself, through many adventures, as a knight of superlative status. Though he is a faithful lover of Guinevere, he is induced by a trick to spend the night with Elaine, daughter of King ▶ Pelles, and > Galahad is conceived from their union. He fails to achieve the Quest of the Holy Grail because of his adulterous sin, though he pledges reform. His continuing affair with Guinevere is exploited by Mordred and his company to stir up the trouble in Arthur's court which leads, in part, to the downfall of the kingdom and the court. Lancelot's accidental killing of ➤ Gareth provides a further catalyst. He spends the last years of his life as a hermit (after he has taken his leave of the penitent Queen).

Lancelot is the emotional centre of Malory's reworking of Arthurian narrative, which substantially moderates the criticism he attracts in the > Grail Quest. Indeed, the whole, structure of Malory's narrative affirms Lancelot's superlative status: after he has returned from the Grail Quest and resumed his affair, he nevertheless achieves the miraculous healing of Sir Urry, a feat which can only be performed by 'the beste knyghte of the worlde'. Ector's lament for Lancelot is structured around a litany of the superlative qualities of this 'hede of al Crysten knyghtes'.

Landon, Letitia Elizabeth

▷ L.E.L.

Landor, Walter Savage (1775–1864)
Poet. Of upper-class background he was expelled from Oxford University for his intemperate radicalism, and lived for many years in Florence.

He wrote the > blank verse epic, Gebir (1798), the tragedy Count Julian (1812), and collections of verse: Hellenics (1847), Italics (1848), Heroic Idylls (1863). He was a fine classical scholar, producing a > Latin version of Gebir, and his imagination was essentially literary in its inspiration. He is now chiefly remembered for his prose Imaginary Conversations (1824, 1828, 1829) between such figures of the past as Dante and Beatrice, and Elizabeth and Mary Tudor. His. quarrelsome but generous personality was caricatured by Charles Dickens as Boythorn in Bleak House (1852−3).

Bib: Pinsky, R., Landor's Poetry.

Lanfranc (d 1089)

Archbishop of Canterbury, 1070-89, under ➤ William I, first of the Norman kings.

Lanfranc, an Italian by origin, corrected and reformed the English church, and yet helped the king to resist papal interference.

Langham Place Group, The ➤ Women's Movement.

Langhorne, John (1735-79)

Poet, private tutor, clergyman and Justice of the Peace. He wrote sermons, translated ➤ Plutarch and edited the poems of ➤ William Collins (1765). His own poems include exercises in the numerous genres current in the 18th century: topographical verse, animal fables, ➤ pastorals, ➤ elegies and didactic epistles. His most important work, The Country Justice (1774-7), in pentameter couplets (➤ metre), mixes didacticism and sentimental anecdote. Its satire on the Poor Laws imitates ➤ Oliver Goldsmith's ➤ The Deserted Village (1770).

Langland, William (?1330-?81)

Little is known for certain about the life of William Langland, author of ▷ Piers Plowman, other than what can be gleaned from his literary portrait, refracted through the fictional persona of the dreamer/narrator Will. From this, especially from a passage inserted into the C text of Piers Plowman (Passus 6), Langland seems to have been a cleric in minor orders, originally from the West Midlands area, who made a living by saving prayers for the dead. In one manuscript of the C text there is a biographical note which identifies him as the son of Stacy de Rokayle of Shipton-under-Wychwood, in Oxfordshire. Although some other alliterative poems have been attributed to him in the past, there is no evidence for his composition of any other poems than Piers Plowman, which seems to have been the work of a lifetime in its own right.

Langue

This term appears throughout > Ferdinand de Saussure's Course in General Linguistics (1915) to denote the system of signs which makes up any language structure. According to Saussure, individual utterances (parole) are constructed out of elements which have no existence 'prior to the linguistic system, but only conceptual and phonetic differences arising out of that system'. This observation is fundamental to ▷ Structuralism, which is concerned with the positioning of particular elements within a nonvariable structure. 'Langue' is the term used to denote the linguistic structure itself, that is the rules which lie behind particular linguistic events.

Lanyer, Aemilia (1569-1645)

Poet. Aemilia was the daughter of one musician, Baptista Bassani, and wife to another, Alfonso Lanyer, yet she seemed to have provided for herself through the system of > patronage, being mistress to Lord Hunsdon, > Shakespeare's patron, and later employed by Margaret Clifford, Countess of Cumberland, the mother of ➤ Lady Anne Clifford, Many of the details of her life come to us through the entries in > Simon Forman's casebook or diary, as Lanyer consulted - and probably slept with - this well-known Renaissance astrologer. In 1611 she published Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum (Hail God, King of the Jews) in an attempt to gain economic preferment. While the poem is introduced with the usual variety of panegyric verses (including one to the Countess of Cumberland), it also contains a proto-feminist prose address to women readers, a defence of Eve and other female characters in the biblical narrative, and the earliest known English country-house poem, about Cookham, the Cumberland residence. As such, Lanver may be read as innovative both in form and content, and as participating in the current debate about the vices and virtues of women (▷ Querelle des Femmes). It is also worth noting that, despite A. L. Rowse's protestations, there is no evidence to support the hypothesis that Lanyer was the dark lady of Shakespeare's sonnets (▷ Shakespeare – sonnets). Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women; Beilin, E. V., Redeeming Eve; Hannay, M. P., Silent But For The Word.

Laputa

In ▷ Jonathan Swift's ▷ Gulliver's Travels, the flying island in the ▷ satire against the ▷ natural philosophers of Part III.

Larkin, Philip (1922-85)

Poet. He was the most eminent of the group known as the 'New Lines' poets (from an anthology of that name, 1956 ed. by Robert Conquest) otherwise called the ▷ Movement. Many of them held posts in universities, and their work is characterized by thoughtfulness, irony, self-doubt and humility. These qualities are in accord with the imaginative temper of ▷ Thomas Hardy's poetry; Larkin, who greatly admired Hardy, has also been compared to ▷ W. H.

Auden, though his political conservatism and concern to proclaim the pathos and humour of everyday experience rather than address the 'academic' reader represent a turning away from the technical radicalism of writers like Auden and ➤ T. S. Eliot. Publications: The North Ship (1945); The Less Deceived (1955); The Whitsun Weddings (1964); High Windows (1974); Editor Oxford Book of Twentieth Century English Verse (1973). Larkin also wrote two novels, Jill (1946) and A Girl in Winter (1947); see also his book of essays Required Writing (1983). Larkin was also known for his passion for jazz music; see All What Jazz?: A Record Diary 1961-1968 (1970). Bib: Thwaite, A. (ed.), Larkin at Sixty; Motion,

A., Philip Larkin; Booth, J., Philip Larkin.

Last Chronicle of Barset, The (1867) The last of the > Barsetshire novels, about the politics of the imaginary cathedral town of Barchester, by ⊳ Anthony Trollope. It centres on one of Trollope's best characters the Reverend Josiah Crawley, the curate of Hogglestock. A poor, proud, isolated man with rigorous standards, he is accused of theft and persecuted by the arrogant Mrs Proudie, wife of the bishop. A minor theme is the engagement of Major Grantly to Mr Crawley's daughter, Grace, in defiance of the wishes of his father the Archdeacon. It is often considered to be the best of Trollope's novels.

Latimer, Hugh (?1490-1555) One of the chief English Protestant reformers. He was favoured by ➤ Henry VIII and supported the king's separation of the > Church of England from papal authority. However, he went further than Henry in his independence of thought, and in 1539 he resigned the bishopric of Worcester because he could not accept Henry's conservative statement of doctrine, the Act of Six Articles. Under the more Protestant regime of > Edward VI he became a very popular preacher, but in 1555 he was burnt alive as a heretic under the Catholic > Mary I. Among his memorable works is his letter to Henry VIII (1530) urging the free circulation of the > Bible in translation.

> Reformation.

Latin literature

Rome began as a small Italian city state, and grew to an empire that surrounded the Mediterranean and extended as far north as the borderland between England and Scotland. Politically, it established the framework out of which modern Europe grew. Culturally, in part by native force and in part by its assimilation and transmission of the older and richer culture of Greece, its literature became the basis of European values, and especially those values that arise from the individual's relationship to his society.

Between 300 and 100 BC, Rome began to produce literature, and at the same time, after its conquest of the rich Greek colonies in southern Italy, to expand its imaginative and intellectual vision and to increase and refine the expressiveness of the Latin language through the study of > Greek literature. Primitive Roman literature had been of two kinds: that of the recording and examination of public life and conduct in annals of eminent men and in oratory, and that of the distinctively Roman art of ⊳ satirical comedy. These centuries saw the production of the comic dramas of > Plautus and of > Terence. The orator and historian ➤ Cato the Censor upheld the virtues of Roman severity against Greek sophistication and luxury; the dominant figure, however, was the poet Ennius (239-169) who preserved a balance between Greek and Latin values by emulating > Homer in a patriotic epic in Latin idiom and Greek metre, the Annales.

The first half of the first century BC was the last great period of the Roman Republic. Active participation in politics was still one of the principal concerns of Roman aristocrats, and by this time Romans had studied and profited from lessons in depth and force of thinking from Greece. > Cicero was the great persuasive orator of public debate; such was the power of his eloquence that the period is often known as the Ciceronian age. > Julius Caesar's terse, practical account of his wars in Gaul and invasion of Britain shows a different kind of prose excellence, and the vividness of Sallust's histories of episodes in recent Roman history is different again. It was thus an age of prose, but it included one of the finest of all philosophical poems, the De Rerum Natura ('Concerning the Nature of Things') of > Lucretius, who expounded the thought of the Greek philosopher ➤ Epicurus. It included also the passionate leve poems of ▷ Catullus, who gave new vitality to Greek mythology.

Julius Caesar's great-nephew, ➤ Augustus Caesar, became the first Emperor in 27 BC, and he ruled till his death in AD 14. The Republic ended, and with it the kind of moral thought and eloquence which had made Cicero so famous. Roman literature, however, entered upon its most famous period - the Augustan Age. If the Empire had not quite reached its greatest extent, its power was nonetheless at its peak; the old traditions of austerity and energy were not yet extinct; civilization, wealth and sophistication had not yet overbalanced into decadence resulting from excessive luxury. Augustus himself was a patron of letters. In prose, the outstanding writer was the historian > Livy, but it was above all an age of poetry. The most famous of Roman poets, > Virgil, celebrated great traditions, looked back to by a stable society, in which active political participation had become difficult or unimportant. His contemporary, > Horace, celebrated the values of civilized private life. Tibullus, Propertius, and above all > Ovid were poets of pleasure appealing to the refined taste of an elegant society.

The last period of Roman literature lasted approximately a hundred years from the death of Augustus. The Emperors were bad, the idea of Rome was losing much of its force, society was showing symptoms of decadence. The best writers became more detached from and more critical of Roman society. In the philosophy and drama of ▷ Seneca, the heroic poetry of ▷ Lucan, the satire of Persius (34–62), the Greek philosophy of ▷ Stoicism seemed the strongest defence of human dignity against social oppression and distress. The most powerful work, however, was the savage satire of ▷ Juvenal and the sombre history of his time by ▷ Tacitus.

Literature in Latin did not of course end here, nor did it end with the Roman Empire in the 5th century AD. Latin became the language of the Roman Catholic Church, and therefore of the early medieval educated classes. It remained a living, growing language till its style was fixed by ▶ Renaissance scholars in the 16th century. Even in the 17th century, ▶ Francis Bacon wrote much of his philosophy in Latin, and ➤ Milton wrote Latin poetry. Classical Latin was read and admired in medieval England, but knowledge of it was incomplete and inaccurate; much of this knowledge was obtained (for instance, by ▷ Chaucer) from contemporary French and Italian writers whose traditions were closer to classical Latin. Virgil retained great prestige, and Terence was studied in the monasteries for the purity of his style. After 1500, the Renaissance caused English writers to study and emulate the classical writers. Writers modelled themselves on styles of classical prose: the terse manner of Seneca and Tacitus was imitated by Bacon, whereas the eloquent flow of Cicero was emulated by > Edmund Burke. More important than the study of styles was the way in which English writers again and again measured themselves against their own society by placing themselves in the position of Roman writers, and then assessed their society from a Roman standpoint. So, in the late 16th century > Donne modelled his elegies on those of Ovid, and a little later > Ben Jonson rewrote the lyrics of Catullus; in the 17th century Milton emulated Virgil as Virgil had once emulated Homer; in the 18th century > Pope took the standpoint of Horace, and ➤ Samuel Johnson adopted that of Juvenal.

➤ Classical education.

Laud, William (1573-1645)

Archbishop of Canterbury under ➤ Charles I. He firmly resisted the desire for further reform among the religious extremists, and even tried to impose religious uniformity upon Scotland. His rigour was partly responsible for the discontent that led to the outbreak of the ➤ Civil War in 1642. Parliament, which had already secured his imprisonment in 1641, ordered his execution in 1645.

Bib: Carlton, C., Archbishop William Laud.

Laurence, Margaret (1926-87) Canadian novelist and short-story writer. She wrote a series of novels and short stories centred on Manawaka, Manitoba, a fictional small town on the Canadian prairies: The Stone Angel (1964); A Jest of God (1966); The Fire Dwellers (1969); A Bird in the House (stories; 1970); The Diviners (1974). These works explore the social history of Canada, through the lives of several generations of women, dealing with themes such as the claustrophobia of small town life, the force of social inhibitions, the quest for identity and the importance of a sense of the past. Laurence's earlier work reflects the seven years which she spent in Somalia and Ghana between 1950 and 1957. A Tree For Poverty (1954) is a translation of Somali oral poetry and prose; This Side Fordan (1960) is a novel about racial tension in the Gold Coast (now Ghana); The Tomorrow Tamer (1963) is a collection of stories; The Prophet's Camel Bell (1963) is a travel narrative; Long Drums and Cannons: Nigerian Dramatists and Novelists 1952-66 (1968) is literary criticism.

➤ Post-colonial literature. Bib: Thomas, C., Laurence.

Lautréamont, Comte de (pseudonym of Isidore-Lucien Ducasse) (1846-70)
French writer of lyrical prose pieces which appeared under the title Les Chants de Maldoror in 1868, with a slightly expanded posthumous version in 1890. The hero, Maldoror, is a demonic figure and his world is one of delirium and nightmare interspersed with blasphemy and eroticism. The hallucinatory quality of this work attracted the interest of the Surrealists, who claimed Lautréamont as one of their own and promoted his work. Their interest has been carried forward into contemporary French criticism.

▶ French literature in England.

Lawes, Henry (1596-1662)

Composer. One of the most well-known English Renaissance composers after ▷ Dowland, Lawes is primarily of concern to literature students because of his close collaboration with several distinguished poets of his time. After being made a court musician to ▷ Charles I in 1631, he collaborated with ▷ Carew, ▷ Herrick, ▷ Lovelace, ▷ Suckling and ▷ Waller. But Lawes' most famous work was with ▷ Milton, for whom he composed musical accompaniments to ▷ Arcades and Comus, and he produced and acted in the latter performance. The success of Lawes' collaboration with the poets of his day resided partly in his belief that there was an indissoluble link between musical rhythms and the metrical patterns of spoken language. Bib: Evans, W. M., Henry Lawes: Musician and Friend of Poets.

Lawrence, D. H. (David Herbert) (1885–1930) Novelist, poet, critic. The son of a coalminer, he passed through University College, Nottingham, and for a time worked as a teacher. He eloped to Italy with Frieda Weekley, the German wife of a Nottingham professor, in 1912, and married her in 1914. His hatred of World War I, together with the German origins of his wife, caused them difficulties in 1914–18; after the war they travelled about the world, visiting especially Australia, Mexico and the U.S.A. Lawrence died of tuberculosis at Vence in France in 1930. His reputation has grown gradually, and he is likely always to remain a controversial figure.

Lawrence's life, art, criticism, poetry, and teaching were all so closely related that it is unusually difficult to distinguish one aspect of his achievement from all the others. Misunderstandings about his supposed obsession with sexuality and the needless legal action for obscenity in connection with two of his novels (> The Rainbow and > Lady Chatterley's Lover) initially distorted judgement of his work, but he is now firmly established as a major > modernist novelist. On the other hand, he has been the subject of irrelevant hero-worship which is equally distorting, and which he would have repudiated. He was a deeply religious though not a Christian - writer who believed that modern man is perverting his nature by the wilful divorce of his consciousness from his spontaneous feelings. He has been accused of social prejudice. It is true that he was keenly critical of society; but he was the first major English novelist to have truly workingclass origins, and this, together with his wide range of friendships with men and women of all classes, gave him unusual perceptiveness into the contradictions of English society. His attitude to women has been severely criticized (see K. Millett, Sexual Politics; 1970), as have the general political implications of his ideas (see J. Carey 'D. H. Lawrence's Doctrine' in S. Spender (ed.), D. H. Lawrence: Novelist, Poet, Prophet; 1973).

Novels: The White Peacock (1911); The Trespasser (1912); > Sons and Lovers (1913), an autobiographical novel, was his first distinguished work, and it was followed by what are generally regarded as his two masterpieces, > The Rainbow (1915) and > Women in Love (1921); The Lost Girl (1920); Aaron's Rod (1922); Kangaroo (1923) about Australia; The Plumed Serpent (1926) about Mexico; Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928), banned except for an expurgated edition until 1959. The unfinished Mr Noon was published in 1984. He also wrote several volumes of short stories and novellas which include much of his best fiction. Among the best known of these are St Mawr, The Daughters of the Vicar, The Horse Dealer's Daughter, The Captain's Doll, The Prussian Officer, The Virgin and the Gipsy.

One of Lawrence's most distinguishing features as an artist in fiction is his use of natural surroundings and animals realistically and yet symbolically, to express states of experience which elude direct description. This 'poetic' element in his fiction is reflected in much of his verse; some of this is in rhymed, metrical stanzas, but a great deal of it is free of verse conventions and close to the more condensed passages of his prose. Lawrence began writing poetry at the time when ▶ Imagism was seeking more concrete expression, and he contributed to Imagist anthologies. Some critics (eg A. Alvarez, The Shaping Spirit) are inclined to see his poetry as among the most important produced in the century, deserving to be set alongside the work of > T. S. Eliot and ➤ W. B. Yeats.

Lawrence's descriptive, didactic, and critical prose is also important. His psychological essays, Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (1921) and Fantasia of the Unconscious (1922) are imaginative, not scientific works, and contribute to the understanding of his creative mind. His descriptive volumes, Sea and Sardinia (1921), Morning in Mexico (1927), show his outstanding powers of presenting scenes with sensuous immediacy, and his characteristic concentration of all his interest - moral and social, as well as aesthetic - on to natural environment. The same concentration is to be seen in his critical and didactic writing; he brought moral, aesthetic, and social judgements into play together. Much of his best critical writing is contained in the posthumous volumes Phoenix I and II; the Study of Thomas Hardy is of particular importance for the understanding of Lawrence's own work. His letters are being published in seven volumes (vols 1-3, 1979-84).

Lawrence wrote eight plays including: The Widowing of Mrs Holroyd (1920); Touch and Go (1920); David (1927); A Collier's Friday Night (1965); The Daughter in Law (1967); The Fight for Barbara (1967). These have never received the attention accorded the rest of his work.

Bib: Leavis, F. R., D. H. Lawrence, Novelist; Lawrence, F., Not I, but the Wind; Hough, G. G., The Dark Sun; Kermode, F., Lawrence; Sagar, K., The Life of D. H. Lawrence; Macleod, S., Lawrence's Men and Women; Smith, A. (ed.), D. H. Lawrence and Women; Pinkney, T., D. H. Lawrence; Williams, Linda Ruth, Sex in the Head; Widdowson, Peter (ed.), D. H. Lawrence.

Lawrence, G.A. (George Alfred) (1827–76) Novelist. Lawrence's first novel was the enormously successful Guy Livingstone (1857), whose fighting, hunting, womanizing hero was the most extreme example of the glorification of masculinity common to a group of writers in the 1840s and 1850s sometimes known as the 'muscular' school (other novelists included ▷ Charles Kingsley and ▷ Thomas Hughes). Lawrence had attended ▷ Thomas Arnold's ▷ Rugby, and his portrayal of the school in Guy Livingstone is even more violent than that in Hughes' Tom Brown's Schooldays, published the same year. His subsequent novels were largely written in a similar vein, and include Maurice Derring (1864) and the nationalistic Brakespeare (1868), set in the Hundred Years' War.

> Historical novel.

Lawrence T. E. (Thomas Edward) (1888–1935)

Soldier and author, T. E. Lawrence is more popularly known as 'Lawrence of Arabia'. This title was inspired by his guerilla leadership activities in Arabia during World War I, of which he subsequently gave an epic and heroic account in the classic Seven Pillars of Wisdom (1926) – a shortened version of this book was later published as Revolt in the Desert (1927).

In many ways Lawrence epitomizes the image of the 'boy's own hero'; organizing in 1916 the Arab revolt against the Turks and developing imaginative and risky guerilla tactics, he was offered, but refused, both the Victoria Cross and a knighthood. After the war he went on to enlist in the ranks of the R.A.F. under two pseudonyms. His diaries for this period were published in 1955 as The Mint.

Lawrence was also something of an archaeologist and translator; in 1932 he published a translation of ▷ Homer's ▷ Odyssey. In 1962 the film director David Lean turned Lawrence's life and work with the Arab freedom movement into the cinema classic Lawrence of Arabia.

Lav

A term in use from the medieval period for a lyrical or narrative composition, especially one recited or sung to music. The 19th-century revival of interest in the Middle Ages stimulated a revival of the lay form, which may be exemplified in poems such as > Walter Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Lazamon

Composer of the Brut, a history of Britain from its foundation by Brutus to the establishment of Saxon control over the island in Middle English > alliterative verse, based on > Wace's Roman de Brut (completed 1155). Laʒamon's text is difficult to date precisely: it was composed some time between 1189 and 1275 (the date of the two extant manuscripts). Most of what is known about Laʒamon himself derives from the highly stylized prologue to the Brut, which introduces the writer as a priest, who lives at Arley Kings (in Worcestershire) and as which describes his process of composition (his search for books and his act of compilation from at least three sources).

The Brut is of great interest, not only because it contains the earliest account of Arthurian history in English (and its depiction of ➤ Arthur's reign is considerably amplified from the Roman de Brut), but because of its approach to the act of commemorating the past as a whole. It is composed in a style which echoes that of earlier English poetry and seems to have self-consciously archaic touches built into the text. Lazamon's work goes against the grain of most vernacular historical narrative, in so far as it appears to cultivate a sense of the 'pastness' of the history being related, through its use of a deliberately archaic style which enhances the memorability of the history itself. Some of the archaisms of vocabulary and the stylization of descriptive passages in the British Library Cotton Caligula A ix manuscript have been revised in the text contained in the Cotton Otho C xiii manuscript the difference between the two versions is not one of date but of literary style. The Brut's regional point of origin helps provide some context for this interesting literary experiment. Worcester is the centre of an area where the greatest continuity can be traced between pre- and post-Conquest literary traditions: the copying and studying of > Old English works seems to have been actively fostered there for some time after the Conquest. There are echoes of phrases and expressions drawn from Old English homilies (notably by ➤ Aelfric), written in rhythmical > alliterative prose, and these seem to have provided Lazamon with some of the resources for his creation of an archaistic literary medium.

➤ Round table. Bib: Brook, G. L., and Leslie, R. F., (eds.), Laʒamon's Brut; Brook, G. L. (ed.), Selections from Laʒamon's Brut.

Le Carré, John (David John Moore Cornwell)
(b 1931)

Le Carré is one of the most intriguing of Cold War novelists, managing to write challenging and sophisticated work for a popular audience. Le Carré's work is grim, bitter and unromantic, and his characters are brilliantly bleak psychological cases of individuals (often secret service workers) in morally compromised situations. His reputation was established with his third novel, The Spy Who Came In From The Cold in 1963, in which Le Carré's most famous character, George Smiley, appears. Although most of his works - including Call for the Dead (1961); The Looking-Glass War (1965); A Small Town in Germany (1968); Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy (1974); The Honorable Schoolboy (1977); Smiley's People (1980), The Perfect Spy (1986) and Our Game (1995) - are concerned with espionage, in The Naive and Sentimental Lover (1971) and The Little Drummer Girl (1983), he turned to the Middle East and explored the Palestinian situation. Le Carré's work is eminently filmable, and many of his works have been translated into feature films or television dramas. In 1990 a film was made of Le Carré's 'glasnost' novel The Russia House (1988); scripted by Tom Stoppard, it was the first Hollywood film to be made on location in the (former) Soviet Union.

Bib: Barley, Tony: Taking Sides: The Fiction

Bib: Barley, Tony: Taking Sides: The Fiction of John Le Carré.

Le Fanu, J. (Joseph) S. (Sheridan) (1814-73) Novelist and journalist. Born in Dublin of an old Huguenot family related by marriage to the family of the dramatist > Sheridan, he wrote poetry as a child, including a long Irish poem at the age of 14. After education by his father and tutors, he went to Trinity in 1833, writing for the Dublin University Magazine and in 1837 joining the staff. He later became editor and proprietor. In 1837 he published some Irish > ballads and in 1839 was called to the bar, although he did not practise, soon turning to journalism. He bought The Warden, Evening Packet and part of the Dublin Evening Mail, later amalgamating the three into the Evening Mail. In 1844 he married Susan Bennett and withdrew from society after her death in 1858, when he wrote most of his novels, many in bed, on scraps of paper. His writing is ingeniously plotted, shows an attraction to the supernatural and has been increasingly well received this century. The novels include The House by the Churchyard (1863), Wylder's Hand (1864), Uncle Silas (1864), Guy Deverell (1865), The Tenants of Malory (1867), A Lost Name (1868), The Wyvern Mystery (1869), Checkmate (1871), The Rose and the Key (1871) and Willing to Die (1873), which was finished a few days before his death. The short stories, In a Glass Darkly, appeared in 1872 and a collection of neglected stories, Madam Crowl's Ghost and Other Tales of Mystery, in 1923.

Leadbetter, Mary (1758-1826)

Poet and story-writer. Leadbetter was an Irish Quaker who wrote poetry and short prose pieces which pictured the country life she saw about her. Her writing is often ▷ didactic, for example, she wrote against slavery (▷ Abolition Literature) and class prejudice. ▷ Maria Edgeworth wrote the notes for her Cottage Dialogues Among the Irish Peasantry (1811).

> Irish literature in English.

Leapor, Mary (1722-1746)

English poet. She was from the labouring classes, and worked as a kitchen maid. She was able to write poetry with the support of a patron, Bridget Fremantle, and Poems upon Several Occassionns (1748, 1751) was first published after Leapor died of measles. It included the ironical 'Essay on Woman', commenting 'Hymen lifts his sceptered Rod, / and strikes her glories with a fatal nod.' Her verse often uses a figure called 'Mira' to explore the familial and sexual problems of women, and she strongly associates poetry with sleep and dream. In 'The Cruel Parent: a Dream' > Gothic elements interwine with labouring-class problems, including starvation. In 'a Verse Epistle to a Lady' she describes the working woman poet who 'rolls in treasures till the breaking day: . . . till the shrill clock impertinently rings,/ and the soft visions move their shining Wings'. She also wrote a blankverse tragedy, but died while its staging was being discussed. She left a library of only sixteen or seventeen volumes, including some ▶ Pope and ▶ Dryden.

> Collier, Mary; Little, Janet; Yearsley, Ann. Bib: Landry, D., The Muses of Resistance.

Lear, Edward (1812-88)

Comic poet. He wrote The Book of Nonsense (1846) and Nonsense Songs, Stories, and Botany (1870) for the grandchildren of the Earl of Derby. Like > Lewis Carroll, who wrote the Alice books for children, Lear's poems for children show remarkable freedom of fantasy; in consequence, the 20th century, with its new science of psychoanalysis, has seen in them unsuspected depths of interest. The poems combine grotesque comedy with haunting melancholy. He did much to popularize the limerick. He illustrated the poems himself with extremely witty line drawings. Lear was by profession a landscape painter, but his elaborate landscape paintings have much less distinction and interest than his drawings and sketches.

Nonsense literature; Children's literature. Bib: Davidson, A., Life; Noakes, V., Life; Sewell, E., The Field of Nonsense.

Leavis, Frank Raymond (1895-1978) Critic. From 1932 till 1953 he edited > Scrutiny, a literary review with high critical standards, and pervaded by his personality. It maintained that the values of a society in all its activities derive from its culture, and that central to British culture is English literature; that a literature can be sustained only by discriminating readers, and therefore by a body of highly trained critics working together especially in the collaborative circumstances of a university (Education and the University; 1943). The need for the testing of judgements by collaborative discussion is important in Leavis' view of criticism. Unfortunately, collaboration may become uncritical discipleship, and this was one of the two unfortunate consequences of the exceptional force of Leavis' personality. The other unfortunate consequence was the hostility which this force of personality aroused in many critics who were not among his collaborators and followers. He maintained that true critical discernment can be achieved only by a total response of mind - intellectual, imaginative and moral; thus a critical judgement reflects not only the work of literature being judged, but the worth of the personality that makes the judgement, so that Leavis' censure of critics with whom he strongly disagreed was sometimes extraordinarily vehement, as in his Two Cultures?: The Significance of C. P. Snow (1962). However this vehemence was a price he paid for his determination to sustain a living tradition of literature not only by assessing contemporary writers with the utmost rigour, but also by reassessing the writers of the past, distinguishing those he thought had a vital relevance for the modern sensibility from those that stand as mere monuments in academic museums. Such evaluative treatments caused him to be widely regarded as a destructive critic; his attack on the three-centuries-long prestige of ➤ Milton (Revaluation 1936 and The Common Pursuit 1952) gave particular offence.

Leavis' intense concern with the relationship between the kind of sensibility nourished by a literary culture and the quality of a society as a whole has a historical background that extends to the beginning of the 19th century. It first appears in ▷ Wordsworth's Preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1800), is to be felt in the writings of the 19th-century philosopher ▶ John Stuart Mill (see Mill on Bentham and Coleridge, ed. by Leavis, 1950), and is explicit in > Matthew Arnold's writings, especially Culture and Anarchy (1869). Later the theme is taken up by the novelists, eg in ➤ Gissing's > New Grub Street and, both in his novels and in his criticism, by D. H. Lawrence. The outstanding importance of novels in connection with the theme has caused Leavis to be foremost a critic of the novel; perhaps his most important single book is The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Jospeh Conrad (1948), but this should be read in conjunction with his books on Lawrence and (with Q. D. Leavis) on Dickens the Novelist (1971). Although still influential, Leavis must now be considered together with more contemporary literary theory, such as > post-structuralism which has tended to challenge radically and contradict vehemently his criticism.

Leavis, Q.D. (1906-81)

Literary critic, Q.D. Leavis was educated at Cambridge in the 1920s (she was a student of I.A. Richards), and became a central figure in what came to be known as 'Cambridge criticism', the 'traditional' form of moral criticism (as distinct from Richards' New criticism), which is more readily associated with her husband, ▷ F.R. Leavis. As one of the founders of the journal ▷ Secutiny and writer of the influential Fiction and the Reading Public (1932), Q.D. Leavis helped to establish English literature as a discipline in its own right and in the form it took from the 1930s onwards, Fiction and the Reading Public is primarily a sociological and psychological account of popular reading patterns, which consolidates her more fundamental celebration of great literary classics as the primary source of our culture's essential humane values. Leavis' work is thus often read as the direct descendant of the cultural criticism of Victorian critic > Matthew Arnold, but it is also important for a psychological dimension, and, in her essays, for a serious interest in the work of women writers, which is not generally seen as characteristic of her Scrutiny contemporaries. In tandem with bringing up a family, she also wrote Dickens the Novelist (1971) with her husband, and a wide range of essays, which are collected in three volumes as Collected Essays (1983).

Lee, Harriet (1757-1851)

Novelist and playwright. The sister of ⊳ Sophia Lee, with whom she wrote Canterbury Tales (twelve tales, two by Sophia, published 1797-1805). The tales cover conventional material: for example, one is a > Gothic romance and another offers a sensational account of the > French Revolution. One story, however, Kruitzer, The German's Tale (1801), depicts the suffering of a woman unable either to escape her weak husband, or to reform her evil, but Romantic son, and was acknowledged by Byron as the source of his Werner (1821). Lee's dramatic output achieved much less recognition. The New Peerage, or Our Eyes may Deceive Us (1787) and The Mysterious Marriage, or the Heirship of Roselva (1795-8) are unremarkable in their plots, and the characters are somewhat > flat and stereotyped. She was proposed to by ▶ Godwin, but turned him down. Bib: Punter, D., The Literature of Terror: A History of Gothic Fictions from 1765 to the Present Day; Rodgers, K., Feminism in Eighteenth-century England.

Lee, Nathaniel (?1653-92)

Dramatist. After an unsuccessful acting career Lee turned to writing plays. He became popular for his extravagant tragedies which included Nero (1674), Sophonisba (1675) and Gloriana (1676), and his The Rival Queens (1677) heralded a return to the use of blank verse for tragedy. His most serious play, > Lucius Funius Brutus, was considered too politically dangerous and was banned after only a few performances. Towards the end of his life Lee spent five years in > Bedlam and died after a drinking bout.

Lee, Sophia (1750-1824)

English novelist and dramatist, elder sister of ▶ Harriet Lee, and friend of ▶ Ann Radeliffe. Her historical fiction included The Recess, or a Tale of Other Times (1783–5), and she co-wrote Canterbury Tales for the Year 1797 with her sister.

Lee, Vernon (1856–1935)

➤ Pseudonym of essayist, novelist and short story writer Violet Paget. She was born near Boulogne, France, and travelled around Europe as a young girl, receiving her education from various ⊳ governesses. Lee's literary career was full of eccentric oscillations between fame and infamy. Her first major work was Studies of the 18th Century in Italy (1880), which was a great success, but her first novel (Miss Brown, 1884) damaged her reputation, as did the short story 'Lady Tal' (Vanitas, 1892), which contained an ill-considered and barely disguised portrait of novelist > Henry James. Thereafter she turned her attention to essays, and Genius Loci: Notes on Places (1899) was a success. During the First World War she wrote a pacifist trilogy, Satan the Waster (1920), which was generally condemned, although it was better received when re-issued in 1930. Lee left England to avoid the disapproval of her family and friends of her > lesbianism. In Paris she was a frequent visitor at Natalie Barney's (1876-1972) famous Rue Jacob salon. Other works by the prolific Lee include Gospels of Anarchy (1980), The Tower of Mirrors (1914), and two volumes of Supernatural Tales, published posthumously in 1955 and 1956.

Leech-Gatherer, The
Sometimes used as an alternative title for ➤ William Wordsworth's poem ➤ Resolution and Independence.

Legend of Good Women, The A story-collection composed by > Chaucer, probably not long after > Troilus and Criseyde, but revised some time later (the Prologue exists in two versions known as 'F' and 'G'). Dating the poem is difficult, but it seems to be Chaucer's earliest work using the decasyllabic couplet form, the staple of the > Canterbury Tales. The story-collection is framed by a ▷ dreamvision narrative in which Chaucer, as writer, is tried in a ⊳ pastoral court of love as a sinner against the God of Love. The intervention of a legendary good woman, Alceste, helps the poet/narrator, who promises to do penance for his literary misdeeds (one of which is having written about the infidelity of Crisevde) by writing a work composed of exemplary stories of good women who are true lovers. The work is to be a secular legend, in effect, not containing stories of the lives of those who have suffered for the Faith, but of those who have suffered for their love.

Although the Prologue suggests that the Legend is to be a large narrative project, only nine stories are extant (including those of Cleopatra, Thisbe, Dido, Hypsipyle and Medea, Lucrece, Ariadne, Philomela, Phyllis, Hypermestra). Narrating the stories themselves is an exercise in the art of abbreviation, for only cameo narratives are provided of their lives. But the art of abbreviation has a greater thematic point in some of the stories: it is only by abbreviating half of the story of Medea, for example, that she can be given a place in the company of good women. The construction of the dream-frame is influenced by the work of French love vision poets (especially ➤ Guillaume de Machaut) and the form of the stories themselves owes much to ➤ Ovid's Heroides. Although the collection has not always been very sympathetically received by modern readers, it seems to have been much read and admired in the 15th century.

Bib: Frank, R. W., Chaucer and the Legend of Good Women.

Lehmann, Rosamond (1901-90) Novelist and short-story writer. The poet and critic John Lehmann was her brother. Her novels depict the experience of educated and sensitive women, focusing in particular on infatuation, betrayal and the contrast between the relative safety of childhood and the disillusionment of adolescence and adulthood. They make considerable use of memories and impressions, rendered in a lyrical prose style. She was initially associated with > Virginia Woolf and > Elizabeth Bowen for her rendering of the consciousness of women, but her work is generally regarded as narrower in scope. Her novels are: Dusty Answer (1927); A Note in Music (1930); Invitation to the Waltz (1932); The Weather in the Streets (1936); The Ballad and the Source (1944); The Echoing Grove (1953); A Sea-Grape Tree (1976). Story collection: The Gipsy's Baby (1946). She also published an autobiography, The Swan in the Evening (1967).

Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm (1646-1716) German philosopher and mathematician, born in Leipzig, who became one of the leading representatives of the German > Enlightenment. His invention of the calculus about the same time as > Newton led to a dispute as to who can be called its originator. In 1676 Leibniz met ⊳ Spinoza, whose work had a considerable influence on him, along with that of ▷ Descartes and ➤ Hobbes. He persuaded Frederick I to found an Academy of Sciences in Berlin in 1700, of which he himself became the first president. Leibniz developed a theory of matter, outlined in his Theodicee (1710) and Monadologie (1714), as a finite series of indivisible particles which he called 'monads', each a concentration of energy, and each representing a microcosm of the universe. They belong to a hierarchy whose highest manifestation is God, and they move according to God's laws. Leibniz argued that God, being omnipotent and perfect, could only have created the best world possible, a view propounded by ▶ Pope in his ▶ Essay on Man as 'One truth is clear, Whatever IS, is Right', and satirized by ▷ Voltaire in Candide as 'all is for the best in this best of all possible worlds'.

Bib: Hazard, P., European Thought in the Eighteenth Century; Sambrook, J., The Eighteenth Century: The Intellectual and Cultural Context of English Literature 1700–1789.

Leicester, Robert Dudley, Earl of (?1531-88) One of the principal favourites of > Elizabeth I and for some time expected to become her husband. The Kenilworth Festivities were organized by Leicester in an attempt to woo the queen. This is also one example of his role as a major patron of the arts and literature in the Elizabethan period. He was also the uncle of > Sir Philip Sidney, killed at Zutphen during Leicester's campaign to assist the Netherlands in their resistance to Spain. Like his nephew Essex, he showed staunch Protestant leanings through his support of the Puritans in the Privy Council during the 1570s. Leicester had the brilliance which Elizabeth liked in her personal favourites, although for her statesmen she preferred more sober types such as Cecil (▷ Burghley) and ▷ Walsingham. Scandalous stories were rumoured about his relationships with women, and in particular about his early marriage with Amy Robsart.

➤ Essex, Robert Devereux, Earl of; Gascoigne, George.

Bib: Rosenberg, E., Leicester, Patron of Letters.

Leigh, Dorothy (c 1616)

Writer on motherhood. Leigh was a widow who chose to write a book of instruction for her three young sons and their future wives that was published as The Mother's Blessing (1616). The book consists of four parts: a dedication to ▷ Elizabeth of Bohemia asking, from the precarious position of a woman writer, for the queen's protection; a letter to her sons explaining her intentions; an allegorical poem about bees; and the main body of the advice, which covers personal behaviour and spiritual practice.

> Elizabeth Grymeston, Lady Elizabeth

Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), A Paradise of Women.

Leitmotif

➤ Motif

L.E.L., Letitia Elizabeth Landon (1802–38)
Poet and novelist. One of the most popular and prolific authors of her day, Landon published under the initials 'L.E.L.'. Her poetry was influenced by ⊳ French literature, rather than English, although she is clearly regarded as a ⊳ Romantic poet; collections include, The Fate of Adelaide (1821), The Improvisatrice (1824), The Troubadour (1825), and The Golden Violet (1827). Landon wrote of her own tendency towards sentiment:

Aware that to elevate I must first soften, and that if I wish to purify I must first touch,

I have ever endeavoured to bring forward grief, disappointment, the fallen leaf, the faded flower, the broken heart, and the early grave.

Her first novel, Romance and Reality, appeared in 1831; it is a personalized view of London society and includes thinly disguised portraits of the > Victorian novelist, Edward Bulwar-Lytton and his wife. This provided salacious information for contemporary readers, since Landon's name was linked romantically with Lytton's, as well as to the journalist William Maginn's, and when rumours of an abortion followed, her engagement with John Forster was broken off. Landon wrote of her own misfortunes:

Alas! that ever
Praise should have been what praise has been to me —
The opiate of the mind.

Landon eventually married George Maclean, the governor of Cape Coast Castle on the Gold Coast in 1838, but died four months after reaching Africa supposedly from an overdose of prussic acid. Bib: Aston, H., Letty Landon; Showalter, E., Bib: Aston, H., Letty Landon; Showalter, E., A Literature of Their Own.

Lely, Sir Peter (1618-80)

Painter, born in Germany to Dutch parents; his name was originally Pieter van der Faes. He studied in Haarlem, and came to England in 1641. Here he began by painting landscapes and historical and religious subjects, but then turned to portrait work, painting prolifically. He was employed first by ➤ Charles I, then by > Cromwell, and then as a court painter by ➤ Charles II, who knighted him in 1679. Among his best-known works are portraits of the monarchs and their families, including a double portrait of Charles I and his brother the Duke of York, which inspired ➤ Lovelace's 'See what a clouded Majesty . . .', as well as a series of Beauties of the court of Charles II, including one of > Nell Gwynn (now kept at Hampton Court). The 13 so-called 'Greenwich Portraits', of English admirals who fought in the second Dutch war, are also highly regarded today.

Lennox, Charlotte (?1727-1804)

Charlotte Lennox was probably born in America, and grew up in New York. From an early age she is known to have been in London trying, unsuccessfully, to make a career on the stage. In 1747 she published Poems on Several Occasions, and in 1750, the year in which her appearance on the stage is last reported, she brought out her first novel, The Life of Harriot Stuart.

Lennox's literary talent was enthusiastically supported by ➤ Samuel Johnson and ➤ Henry Fielding. In 1752 The Female Quixote established her name as a writer. The novel tells of a naïve heroine, Arabella, whose view of the world is foolishly filtered through the romances she reads. Lennox uses this framework to satirize sexual stereotypes and the social conventions of courtship.

Johnson's help in finding publishers for Lennox was probably partly motivated by his knowledge of her circumstances as well as her literary achievements. Her husband, Alexander, was a constant drain on the family's finances, and Lennox's writing provided their only support. She worked on translations and adaptations to supplement their income, and produced three volumes of ▷ Shakespeare's sources, with Johnson's encouragement. Her final novel Euphemia (1790) explores the position of women in marriage, reflecting her own experience with the spendthrift husband she eventually left.

Lesage, Alain-René (1668-1747)

French novelist and playwright. He wrote two important ▷ picaresque narratives, both set in Spain and offering a cynical but humorous view of human desires and motives: Gil Blas (1715-35), which influenced such novelists as ▷ Fielding and ▷ Smollett, and The Devil Upon Two Sticks (1707), in which the devil removes the roofs from the houses of Madrid to reveal the greed of the inhabitants. Lesage was a professional writer who produced a large number of comic plays.

Lesbian and Gay Writing

Many major literary figures throughout history have depicted same-sex relations and/or expressed sexual desire for members of the same sex: for example, > Plato, > Shakespeare, Thomas Mann, ▷ Marcel Proust, ▷ Oscar Wilde, ▷ E. M. Forster, ▷ Virginia Woolf, > Patrick White (to name only a few). The definitions accorded to such practices and feelings, and the extent to which they have been subject to oppression, have varied. In Ancient Greece male homosexuality was accepted within a particular framework: the teaching relationship between experienced men and boys is often depicted in the literature of the period in this way. However, criticism which has, until recently, ignored the homoerotic elements in > Renaissance literature, began to acknowledge the possibility of homosexual > discourses within hitherto heterosexual romanticized texts. The practice of cross-dressing in > Shakespeare's > comedies and the universal use of boyactors to play female roles have been recognized as ways in which sexuality and gender-roles were questioned and challenged. For example, ➤ Rosalind's final speech in ➤ As You Like It, where the boy-actor acknowledges his sex while still disguised as the heroine, opens out a whole range of sexual interpretations. In poetry, ▷ Marlowe's ▷ Hero and Leander focuses on the male protagonist as the centre of male erotic attention, while ▷ Katherine Philips' stated love for her female friends has led to her inclusion in the lesbian canon. There are also references to homosexuality in some Restoration poetry. For example, ▷ Rochester, in a 'Song' (1672–3), refers to 'a sweet, soft page [who] does the trick [sexual intercourse] worth forty wenches'. Some lines by ▷ Aphra Behn have been interpreted as having a homosexual content, notably her 'To the Fair Clarinda, Who Made Love to Me, imagin'd more than Woman' (1688).

It was not until the 19th century, however, that the term 'homosexual' emerged and the term 'heterosexual' followed it; the tragic case of Oscar Wilde focused a great deal of public attention (and prejudice) on male homosexuality. During most of the period during which the novel has flourished there has been widespread persecution and oppression of homosexual people and homophobia in many of the discourses of culture. Hence homosexuality has tended to be accorded a marginal place in literary representation, and when it has been shown, has usually been hedged about with implications of the exotic, the abnormal or at least the exceptional. When > Radclyffe Hall published her plea for the recognition and acceptance of lesbianism, The Well of Loneliness, (1928) - even though it had a sympathetic preface from the sexologist ➤ Havelock Ellis, testifying to its scientific accuracy - the book was condemned as obscene and banned. This is in line with official attempts to promote heterosexual activity within marriage as the healthy norm. In the 1950s and 1960s aversion therapy was used in an effort to impose or restore this norm in homosexuals - The Kinsey Reports on Sexual Behaviour in the Human Male (1948) and Female (1953), however, showed that what had been defined as deviant behaviour was far more widespread than had been believed, thus challenging the 'naturalness' of heterosexuality. Homosexual behaviour in certain circumstances defined as private was decriminalized, but not until ten years after the Wolfenden report recommended it. E.M. Forster's Maurice, which ends with the protagonist choosing a life of freedom rather than repression, was not published until 1971, after Forster's death. However, novelistic discussions of homosexuality tended to promote toleration. There have been important fictional presentations from outside England, for example by Jean Genet (Our Lady of the Flowers), William Burroughs (The Naked Lunch) and James Baldwin (Giovanni's Room). Recent scholarship has identified gay and lesbian communities as important centres of innovation; see Shari Benstock, Women of the Left Bank, an account of women writers in Paris in the early years of this century, which identifies a close connection between the writers' political experience as lesbians and their readiness to experiment with representation. Since the 1960s the active assertion of gay and lesbian rights and identifies in Europe and the USA have contributed to a rich and diverse field of fiction, including the work of such contemporary novelists as > Sara Maitland, Michelene Wandor, ▷ Alan Hollinghurst, ➤ Maureen Duffy and ➤ Jeanette Winterson. Bib: Dollimore, J., Sexual Dissidence: Augustine to Wilde, Freud to Foucault; Bristow, I., Sexual Sameness: Textual Differences in Lesbian and Gay Writing; Sedgwick, E., Epistemology of the Closet; Fuss, D., Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories; Meyers, J., Homosexuality and Literature 1890-1930; Jay, K. and Glasgow, J. (eds.), Lesbian Texts and Contexts: Radical Revisions.

Lesbianism

The Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885, amended to outlaw homosexual acts in private, referred only to men. Lesbianism has never been a crime in Britain. This was not due to a permissive or enlightened attitude on the part of the state, but because legislators were apparently at a loss to explain to Queen Victoria what homosexual acts existed between women, who were conventionally credited with little sexual awareness in middle-class circles. Male > homosexuality came to prominence through newspaper reports of court cases but, as Ronald Pearsall (see bibliography) has suggested, if male homosexuality was 'the love that dared not speak its name', female homosexuality could not speak its name because it was undefined. There was a conspiracy of silence or professed and outraged ignorance, concerning possible sexual activity between women. > Swinburn's Poems and Ballads (1866) violently condemned by John Morley in the ➤ Saturday Review because it contained poems such as 'Anactoria', in which Sappho reproaches a fickle female lover. Morley expressed relief that such poems 'will be unintelligible to a great many people, and so will the fevered folly of "Hermaphroditus", as well as much else that is nameless and abominable'. His greatest wish was that young women should remain in ignorance of the existence of such matters lest they became corrupted. Lesbianism was identified as a medical problem in Germany, but even there authors were unperceptive and inaccurate about the reality and potential of sexual love between women. Towards the end of the century passionate attachments between women were championed by the more radical New Women, a fact noted by Edward Carpenter in Love's-Coming-of-Age (1896). Carpenter discusses the use of the term 'urnings' (coined by the Austrian writer K.H. Ulrichs) to describe people born 'on the dividing line between the sexes... while belonging distinctly to one sex as far as their bodies were concerned they may be said to belong mentally and emotionally to the other'. Carpenter himself preferred the use of the term 'The Intermediate Sex'.

Close emotional and even physical friendships between women were sentimentalized, yet at the same time many women sought the emotional and spiritual closeness, and often the sexual satisfaction they missed in their marriages, in their friendships with other women. Novelists like ➤ George Meredith were charmed and completely unthreatened by powerful emotional relationships between women. In his > Diana of the Crossways (1885) the passionate but possibly asexual friendship between Antonia and Lady Emma Dunstane offers sustenance and a refuge from the dismal failure of Antonia's marriage. In > Charlotte Brontë's > Villette Lucy Snowe cures herself of her passion for Dr John by 'redirecting' it to Ginevra Fanshawe under the temporary licence offered by the part she is coerced into performing in the school play.

The writer and reformer Edith Simcox was passionately involved with a largely unresponsive > George Eliot who was the unwitting inspiration for much of Simcox's reforming zeal. Other such relationships that went beyond simple friendship include the attachment between ➤ Jane Welsh Carlyle and ▷ Geraldine Jewsbury, and Lillian Faderman (see bibliography) believes their love was reinforced by a 'mutual struggle to transcend the role allotted to Victorian women'. The heroines of ➤ Christina Rossetti's poem > 'Goblin Market' enjoy a close and sensuous relationship which went unremarked by the censors. The same is true of Cytherea Aldclyffe's passionate response to Cytherea Grave in ➤ Thomas Hardy's novel Desperate Remedies (1871). The term 'Boston Marriage' was commonly used in late 19th-century New England to describe a long-term monogamous relationship between two unmarried women. > Henry James' novel > The Bostonians (1885) is a largely unsympathetic study of such a relationship between Olive Chancellor and Verena Tarrant, although James himself had no prejudice against lesbianism, having viewed it at close range in the relationship between his sister Alice and Katharine Loring in Boston. Other women who formed close, passionate and supportive relationships with each other include the sensation novelist > Marie Corelli and Bertha Vyver and the poet ➤ Eliza Cook and Charlotte Cushman. Lesbianism is explicitly condemned in > Eliza Lynn Linton's The Rebel of the Family (1880).

➤ Field, Michael; Somerville and Ross. Bib: Pearsall, R., The Worm in the Bud: The World of Victorian Sexuality; Faderman, L., Surpassing the Love of Men; Cox, D.R. (ed.), Sexuality and Victorian Literature.

Lessing, Doris (b 1919)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Persia (now Iran) and brought up in Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), she settled in London in 1949. Her writing spans an exceptionally wide range of genres, settings and narrative techniques, but is unified by certain persistent concerns: the analysis of contemporary culture and of social process; a sense of 20th-century history as catastrophic and an attempt to link this to personal unhappiness; a mystical and sometimes utopian emphasis on higher states of consciousness; an intense anger at social injustice; an interest in radical revisions of the self and of personal and sexual relations.

Her first novel, The Grass is Singing (1950) is the story of a relationship between a white woman and a black man in Rhodesia, and was followed by the Children of Violence series, a Bildungsroman about a young Rhodesian girl in revolt against the establishment, ending in England with a vision of future chaos and a tentative hope for a utopian future. The series consists of: Martha Quest (1952); A Proper Marriage (1954); A Ripple from the Storm (1958); Landlocked (1965); The Four Gated City (1969). > The Golden Notebook (1962) exemplifies the element of ⊳ post-modernist experiment in Lessing's work, in its use of multiple narratives and its concern with fiction and the reconstruction of the self, but it also addresses social issues of the 1960s: the crisis in radical politics, women's liberation, the value of psychoanalysis. During the 1970s Lessing started to write > science fiction, and has remained a fierce exponent of its value as a literary form. Her series Canopus in Argus: Archives comprises: Shikasta (1979); The Marriages Between Zones Three, Four and Five (1980); The Sirian Experiments (1981) The Making of the Representative for Planet 8 (1982); Sentimental Agents (1983). These novels attempt to set human history and human relationships in the context of a battle between good and evil in the universe and an evolutionary quest for a higher state of being. Lessing has continued to show her inventiveness and flexibility with The Diary of Jane Somers (1984), a critique of society's treatment of the old, The Good Terrorist (1985), a study of the making of a terrorist, and The Fifth Child (1988), which uses elements of the horror story genre to explore problems in liberal ideals. Her other novels are: Briefing for a Descent into Hell (1971); The Summer Before Dark (1972); Memoirs of a Survivor (1974). Story collections include: This Was the Old Chief's Country (1951); Five: Short Novels (1953); The Habit of Loving (1957); A Man and Two Women (1963); African Stories (1964); Winter in July (1966); The Black Madonna (1966); The Story of a non-Marrying Man (1972).

Her other works include: Going Home (1957), a study of Southern Rhodesia; In Pursuit of the English (1960), a study of England in (1960), A Small Personal Voice: Essays, Reviews, Interviews (1974); African Laughter: Four Visits to Zimbabwe (1992); London Observed: Stories and Sketches (1992); Under My Skin (1994) is the first volume of an autobiography. The Making of the Representative for Planet 8 has been turned into an opera, with music by Philip Glass (1988).

Bib: Sage, L., Doris Lessing; Sprague, C., and Tiger, V. (eds.), Critical Essays on Doris Lessing; King, J., Doris Lessing; Sprague, C., Rereading Doris Lessing; Taylor, J. (ed.), Notebooks, Memoirs, Archives; Maslen, E., Doris Lessing.

Lesson of the Master, The (1892)

A story by > Henry James. Its theme is the barrier set up against the true artist by supposedly cultivated society, which can understand nothing about the artist's dedication and can therefore only hinder him by its unintelligent praise based on false standards.

> Short story.

Letter-writing

This is clearly an important branch of literature even when the interests of the letter is essentially historical (eg the ➤ Paston Letters) or ➤ biographical. Letters may also be, by intention or by consequence of genius, works of intrinsic literary value. For example, because of the restrictions imposed upon Renaissance women writers, their canon often exists in the form of letters rather than published works. See, for example, ➤ Ann Bacon's letters to her son ➤ Francis Bacon, Lady Margaret Cunningham, ➤ Lady Jane Grey and the correspondence between ➤ Joan and Maria Thynne.

The 18th century (the age of the epistolary novel) was more than any other period when letter-writing was cultivated as an art: see, above all, the letters of ⊳ Horace Walpole and those to his son by ➤ Lord Chesterfield - the former a record of events and the latter consisting of moral reflections. Earlier than the 18th century, postal services were not sufficiently organized to encourage regular letter-writing, and the art of familiar prose was inadequately cultivated; by the mid-10th century, communications had improved enough to make frequent and full letter-writing redundant. By then letters had intrinsic, literary interest chiefly by virtue of the writers' talent for literary expression in other modes of writing, added to the accident that they found letters a congenial means of communication.

In the first 30 years of the 19th century the Romantic habit of introspection resulted in a quantity of extremely interesting letters: those of ▷ Keats, ▷ Byron, ▷ Coleridge and ▷ Lamb are outstanding. Many 20th-century writers have had large collections of their letters published; ➤ Virginia Woolf and ➤ D. H. Lawrence wrote copious amounts, and ➤ Sylvia Plath's Letters Home (written to her mother) is a famous later anthology. ➤ Biography.

Levellers

An important political party during the period of the > Civil War and the Commonwealth. It first became prominent in 1647; the term was first found in a letter of November of that year, describing them as people who wanted to 'rayse a parity and community in the kingdom'. Mainly found among the soldiers and opposed to kingship, the Levellers feared the Parliamentary leaders were insufficiently firm. Two documents were composed by them, The Case of the Army Truly Stated and The Agreement of the People, asking for a dissolution of > Parliament and change in its future constitution. They were at odds with ➤ Oliver Cromwell, who suppressed the mutinies they engineered; Parliament declared other Leveller writings by John Liburne treasonable and in March 1649 their leaders were arrested. A public meeting in London in their support, and risings at Burford and Banbury were suppressed. Associated with them were the 'True Levellers' or 'Diggers' of April 1649, who took possession of some unoccupied ground at Oatlands in Surrey and began to cultivate it. The leaders, arrested and brought before Fairfax, denounced landowners.

➤ Civil wars; Cromwell, Oliver; Utopianism.

Lever, Charles James (1806–72)

Irish novelist. Famous in the 19th century for his vigorous comic novels about Irish country life and life in the army, eg Harry Lorrequer (1837), Charles O'Malley (1841), Tom Burke of Ours (1843). He was criticized for perpetuating the Englishman's comic notion of the Irish character – the 'stage Irishman' caricature – but > William Makepeace Thackeray, who was a friend of Lever and parodied him in Novels by Eminent Hands, declared (in A Box of Novels) that Lever was true to Irish nature in being superficially humorous but sad at heart.

➤ Irish literature in English. Bib: Stevenson, L., Dr Quicksilver: The Life of Charles Lever.

Levertov, Denise (b 1923)

Poet and prose writer. Levertov was born and grew up in Britain but has lived in the U.S.A. since 1948. Her first publication was The Double Image (1946), and her work was also included in Kenneth Rexroth's The New British Poets (1948). Her most recent work is published in Britain by Bloodaxe, and she also features in the important Bloodaxe Book of Contemporary Women Poets (1985). Her volumes of verse include: Collected Earlier Poems 1940–1960;

Poems 1960–1967; To Stay Alive (1971); Life in the Forest (1978); Candles in Babylon (1982); Selected Poems (1985); Oblique Prayers (1985). Her volumes of prose essays include: The Poet in the World (1973) and Light up the Cave (1982).

Leviathan (1651)

➤ Hobbes, Thomas.

Levy, Amy (1861-89)

lewish novelist and poet, the daughter of Lewis Levy and Isabelle Levin, she was born in Clapham, London, and was the first Jewish woman to attend Newnham College, Cambridge. While still a student, she published her first volume of poetry, Xantippe and Other Verse (1881). A Minor Poet and Other Verse appeared in 1884, and in 1888 The Romance of a Ship and Rueben Sachs, a novel describing the London Jewish community in which she grew up. Miss Meredith and A London Plane Tree and Other Verse, both published in 1889, mark the end of Levy's literary career. She killed herself in the same year. She was actively involved in ▶ feminist and radical debates as well as deeply concerned about the position of Jewish people in Europe.

➤ Women's Movement Bib: Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M, (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Lewes, George Henry (1817–78)

Philosopher and critic. He wrote on a wide variety of subjects but his most remembered work is his Life of Goethe (1855), researched with George Eliot's (1819-80) help. Other works include The Biographical History of Philosophy (1845-6), studies in biology such as Studies in Animal Life (1862), two novels, Ranthrope (1847) and Rose, Blanche and Violet (1848), critical essays on the novel and the theatre, and, his most important philosophical book, Problems of Life and Mind (1873-8), the last volume of which was completed by George Eliot after his death. He collaborated with > Thornton Leigh Hunt in founding the Leader and was first editor of the Fortnightly Review 1865-6. In 1854 he left his wife, who had had three sons by Hunt, and lived with Mary Ann Evans (George Eliot) until his death.

Bib: Ashton, R., G.H. Lewes; Kitchell, A. T., George Lewes and George Eliot.

Lewis, Alethea (1750-1827)

Novelist. A ▷ didactic writer whose works are thoughtful but often heavily moralistic and naive in style. Her novels include Plain Sense (1795) for ▷ Minerva, and the ▷ Gothic The Nuns of the Desert, or The Woodland Witches (1805). She also wrote a philosophical treatise under the pen-name

'Eugenia De Acton', Essays on the Art of Being Happy (1803).

Lewis, Alun (1915-44)

Poet and short story writer. Born at Cwmaman, near Aberdare, Glamorgan, educated at Cowbridge Grammar School, University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, where he read history, and subsequently at Manchester University, Alun Lewis taught at Lewis School, Pengam, Monmouthshire, from 1938 until 1940 when he enlisted in the Royal Engineers. In his only four years of public recognition as a writer during his entire war service, Alun Lewis published four books containing 95 poems and 25 stories. His short life was fraught with intellectual and emotional tensions through his being forced into early maturity through his involvement in the war. His poetry collections were Raiders' Dawn (1942) and the posthumously published Ha! Ha! Among the Trumpets (1945); his short stories, The Last Inspection (1942), with the remainder collected after his death in The Green Tree (1948) as well as an autobiographical volume entitled Letters from India (1946). A recent resurgence of interest in his work some forty years after his untimely death encouraged the publication of Letters to My Wife, ed. Gweno Lewis (1989), a Collected Stories, ed. Cary Archard (1991), and a Collected Poems, also ed. Cary Archard (1994). The enigmatic circumstances of his death in Burma, at first attributed to an accidental shooting, not it appears may have been suicide through an unhappy love affair despite his deep devotion to his wife Gweno. His premature death in these circumstances was a tragedy of largely unfulfilled promise.

Bib: Pikoulis, J., Alun Lewis – A Life; Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Lewis, C. S. (Clive Staples) (1898–1963) Novelist, critic, poet and writer on religion. Born in Belfast, Lewis served in France during World War I. From 1925 until 1954 he was a Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford and tutor in English, and from 1954 was Professor of Medieval and Renaissance Literature at Cambridge. His fiction reflects an interest in fantasy, myth and fairytale with an underlying Christian message. He wrote a ⊳ sciencefiction trilogy: Out of the Silent Planet (1938); Perelandra (1943) (as Voyage to Venus, 1953); That Hideous Strength (1945). The Lion, The Witch, and The Wardrobe (1950) was the first of seven fantasy stories for children. His popular theological works include: The Problem of Pain (1940); Miracles (1947) and The Screwtape Letters (1942), which takes the form of letters from an experienced devil to a novice devil. A Grief Observed (1961) is a powerful autobiographical work, an account of his grief at the death of his wife. He also wrote such classics of literary history as The Allegory of Love (1936) and A Preface to Paradise Lost (1942).

➤ Children's books.

Lewis, Matthew Gregory ('Monk') (1775–1818)

Writer whose sensational novel The Monk (1796) had such success in its day that he was nicknamed after it.

▶ Gothic novels.

Lewis, Percy Wyndham (1882-1957) Painter, novelist, critic and polemical journalist. Born in the USA, he came to England as a child and studied art at the Slade School in London and then in Paris. Before 1014 he was leader of the Vorticist movement in painting, which, drawing on the French Cubist movement and the Italian Futurist movement, advocated dynamic, semi-abstract representation of angular, precise and rhythmical forms. Lewis carried over this predilection for vigour and energy into literature, taking a boldly independent attitude to modern culture, rather like that of the poet Ezra Pound with whom he edited the review Blast (1914-15), and asserted the right and the power of the intellect to take command in the cultural crisis. He was opposed to domination by political ideology (though he wrote favourably of Hitler in 1931), by psychological cults and by the bureaucratic and welfare state; he made it his principal aim to expose the confusion of mind which he considered to be overwhelming 20thcentury man, and the hollowness of humanity which he believed to be the consequence of encroaching mechanization. He had something in common with his friend T. S. Eliot (see The Waste Land, for example) but never became a Christian; with > D. H. Lawrence whose mysticism he nevertheless despised; with > James Joyce, though he was strongly opposed to his subjective > stream of consciousness technique; with ⊳ F. R. Leavis and the other > Scrutiny critics, who, however, rejected him as brutally negative. He prided himself on his very distinctive style of expression, which is energetic and concentrates on presenting the externals of human nature with icy clarity.

His outstanding writings are probably his novels and stories: Tarr (1918); The Wild Body (stories; 1927); The Apes of God (1930 – a satire); Snooty Baronet (1932); The Revenge for Love (1937 – considered by some critics to be his best novel); The Vulgar Streak (1941); Rotting Hill (stories; 1951); Self Condemned (1954); and the four-part fable The Human Age – The Childermass (1928), Monstre Gai (1955), Malign Fiesta (1955) to have been completed by The Trial of Man which he did not live to finish.

His ideas are expounded in his philosophical work Time and Western Man (1927) and his autobiographics Blasting and Bombardiering (1937) and Rude Assignment (1950). He wrote notable literary criticism in The Lion and the Fox: the Role of Hero in the Plays of Shakespeare (1927), Men Without Art (1934) and The Writer and the Absolute (1952).

Bib: Grigson, G., A Master of Our Time; Kenner, H., Wyndham Lewis; Meyers, J., The Enemy; Materer, T., Wyndham Lewis: the Novelist; Meyers, J. (ed.), Wyndham Lewis: a Revaluation; Jameson, F., Fables of Aggression: Wyndham Lewis, the Modernist as Fascist; Symons, J. (ed.), The Essential Wyndham Lewis: An Introduction to His Work.

Lexis

A term in linguistics denoting the total vocabulary in a language. In literary studies, however, it refers to the language used in a writer's works or in a single individual work. In practice, the word tends to be used interchangeably with ⊳ diction.

Liberty, On (1859)

A political essay by ➤ John Stuart Mill, in which he discusses how far and in what ways the state is entitled to interfere with the liberty of individuals. He concludes that in general this interference should be restricted to the protection of other individuals, and of individuals collectively considered as society. Mill was mainly alarmed lest a new tyranny should arise from democratic majorities who might be indifferent to minority rights.

Licensing Act > Theatres.

Life and Death of Mr Badman, The (1680) > Badman, The Life and Death of Mr.

Life of Jonathan Wild the Great, The (1743) > Jonathan Wild the Great, The Life of.

Life of Samuel Johnson, The (1791) ➤ Boswell, James.

Lilliput

The island in Part I of ➤ Swift's ➤ Gulliver's Travels; the Lilliputians are diminutive in body, and their corresponding pettiness of mind is intended as satirical comment on the pettiness of contemporary English politics and society.

Lillo, George (1693-1739)

Dramatist. Lillo owned a jewellery shop in Moorgate Street, writing plays after hours, and contemporary descriptions of his character talk of him as a modest and moral man. His first piece, Silvia, or the Country Burial, a balladopera in the style of > The Beggar's Opera, was staged at ▷ Drury Lane in 1730, and in 1731 Lillo produced The Merchant, afterwards renamed > The London Merchant, or the History of George Barnwell, based on an old > ballad. The Merchant, with its focus on a middle-class character led astray by temptation, and the depiction of his suffering, distress, and eventual penitence and execution, helped to establish the so-called domestic or bourgeois tragedy on the English stage, and was also influential in Germany and France via ➤ Lessing and ➤ Diderot. Lillo's other plays include The Christian Hero (1734), Fatal Curiosity (1736), again based on an old ballad about a murder, and Arden of Feversham (1736), drawing, like its > Elizabethan predecessor, on an account by > Holinshed.

Lily, William (?1468-1522)

Scholar; a pioneer of Greek studies, and partauthor with Colet of a famous textbook on Latin that was still in use in the 19th century.

Limerick

A kind of comic verse > epigram which hardly ever varies from the following form:

There was a faith-healer of Deal who said, 'Although pain isn't real, If I sit on a pin And it punctures my skin I dislike what I fancy I feel!'

The form was popularized by the comic poet > Edward Lear, though he was not its inventor. Whatever the derivation of its name, it seems to have no traceable connection with the town and county of Limerick in Ireland.

Linacre, Thomas (?1460-1524)

Physician, and a pioneer in Greek and Latin scholarship. He was chiefly responsible for founding the College of Physicians in 1518, and translated into excellent Latin some of the works of the Greek physician Galen. He is, however, less famous for his literary work than for the nobility of his character and for his zeal in promoting the study of medicine at Oxford and Cambridge.

Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre

In March 1660 > Sir William D'Avenant began conversion of Lisle's Tennis Court, built between 1656 and 1657 at Lincoln's Inn Fields, in order to house the ➤ Duke's Company under his newly confirmed patent from the king. The resulting theatre introduced the proscenium, or framed stage, to the English theatre for the first time. But increasingly the building was felt to be too small, and in 1671 the company moved to ▶ Dorset Garden. It was occupied by various companies until, in 1714, it was refurbished in grand style by Edward Shepherd, with mirrors lining the interior walls, and reopened under the auspices of the actor-manager ➤ John Rich.

Lindsay (Lyndsay), Sir David (c 1490–1555)

Scottish poet, courtier to James IV and 'Usher' of the infant James V. He was entrusted with various overseas diplomatic missions and knighted in 1542. He is most famous for his satirical work, especially his verse ➤ morality play, Ane Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis (1540), which analyses the corruption of Church and State. His other works include 'The Dream' (1528), an allegorical lament on the mismanagement of the realm; The Complaynt and Testament of the Papyngo (Parrot) (1530), in which a parrot is used as the mouthpiece for advice to the king and warnings to courtiers; and his two-part narrative about a Scottish laird, the Historie of ane Nobil and Vailzeand Squyer, William Meldrum (1550).

Bib: Hamer, D. (ed.), Poetical Works; Kinsley, J. (ed.), A Satire of the Three Estates.

Linton, Eliza Lynn (1822-98)

Novelist, journalist and poet, born in Keswick, the sixth daughter and twelfth child of her mother, who died when Eliza was five months old. Self-taught, she rebelled against her conservative family background and moved at the age of twenty-three to a boarding house in London where she began a career as a journalist contributing to newspapers and periodicals such as > Dickens' > Household Words. She published two ▷ historical novels, Azeth the Egyptian (1846) and Anymone (1848), a radical attack on double sexual standards, Realities (1850), and wrote for the > Morning Chronicle (1848-51) before moving to Paris where she lived until 1854. In 1858 she married William Linton in order to look after his seven children. They separated in 1867. Her later fiction, in particular Sowing the Wind (1867) and The One Too Many (1894), displays an increasingly reactionary attitude towards the early feminist movement and this tendency is even more pronounced in her journalistic writings for the > Saturday Review. Her articles from 1866 to 1868 form a series of sensationalist attacks on the > 'New Woman', and those who campaigned for women's rights, which were reprinted in 1883 under the title of her most notorious essay > 'The Girl of the Period'.

Her other works include Ourselves: Essays on Women (1869), Rebel of the Family (1880), and The True History of Joshua Davidson, Christian and Communist (1872) which, alongside Under Which Lord (1879), attacks the hypocrisy of the church. Despite her intense attachments to other women she explicitly condemned >> lesbianism in The Rebel of the Family. Her > Autobiography of Christopher Kirkland (1885) records her own life through a masculine persona. She was close friends with ➤ Walter Savage Landor, ➤ Thomas Hardy, ➤ George and Agnes Lewes, ➤ George Eliot, the novelist and suffragist Beatrice Harraden (1864–1936) and Annie Hector, and she sold the house she inherited at Gad's Hill to Charles Dickens. She was made a member of the Society of Women Authors two years before her death and became the first woman to serve on its committee. Her own memoir My Literary Life appeared posthumously in 1899 and contains an acid attack on George Eliot.

➤ Women's Movement.

Bib: Anderson, N.F., Women Against Women in Victorian England: A Life of Eliza Linton;

Layard, G.S. (ed), Mrs Eliza Lynn Linton. Her Life, Letters and Opinions.

Literariness

The special quality of language use which differentiates from other kinds of writing according to the ▷ Russian Formalists. For them, it is not the content which distinguishes literary works, but the way they foreground their distinctive use of language. In particular, they deploy techniques of ▷ defamiliarization to mark themselves off from ordinary usage, a process ▷ Roman Jakobson famously described as 'organized violence committed on ordinary speech'.

Litotes

> Figures of Speech.

Little Dorrit (1855-7)

A novel by > Charles Dickens. It centres on the theme of imprisonment, both literal and symbolic. William Dorrit (with his children and his brother Frederick) has been so long in the Marshalsea Prison for debtors that he is known as 'the Father of the Marshalsea' a title that gives him a spurious social prestige. Arthur Clennam, who befriends him in the belief that the Dorrit family has been victimized by the commercial interests of his own family, is eventually confined in the same prison. But outside, the characters inhabit prisons without visible walls: William Dorrit inherits a fortune, and he and his family are constricted by social ambition under the gaolership of Mrs General who instructs them in fashionable ways; Mrs Clennam, Arthur's supposed mother, inhabits a gloomy house, confined to her chair and her bad conscience, under the gaolership of her servant Flintwinch who knows her guilty secrets; Merdle, the financier of reputedly enormous wealth, is the prisoner of his false position, and his gaolers are his fashionable wife and his arrogant butler; the servant girl, Tattycoram, is at first the prisoner of the well-intentioned but misguided Mr and Mrs Meagles, and then escapes to the worse prison of Miss Wade, herself a prisoner of her self-inflicted loneliness. The nation is under the imprisoning control of a government department, the Circumlocution Office, which exists to gratify the interests of the enormous Barnacle family. Three characters stand out in independence of this conspiracy to confine and frustrate: Frederick Dorrit, who lives out an existence of passive misery by refusing to share (in or out of the Marshalsea) the self-deceptions of his brother William; Amy ('Little Dorrit') who consistently follows the compassion of her affections and the duties this imposes on her; and Daniel Doyce, the engineer whose enterprise is baffled by the Circumlocution Office but who perseveres in his vocation with humble and disinterested reverence for the demands that it makes on him. The self-interested Circumlocution. Office at the top of society is balanced by the inhabitants of Bleeding Heart Yard, people who are themselves prisoners of the exorbitant property owner, Casby, but who live in the freedom of their own equal and open-hearted society. The blackmailer Rigaud is a figure of menacing evil and a dramatic counterpart to Mrs Clennam's hypocrisy and pretence, which is at the heart of the imaginative scheme of the novel. Little Dorrit is often regarded as Dickens' finest work, both in dramatic impressiveness and in richness of psychological insight.

Little Gidding

A small religious community founded by the Anglican theologian Nicholas Ferrar (1592–1637) at a manor house in Huntingdonshire in 1625. It was dispersed, and the buildings destroyed, by Parliamentary soldiers at the end of the ▷ Civil War (1646). ▷ Charles I visited the community in 1633 and according to tradition he came again after his final defeat at the battle of Naseby (1645).

Little Theatre

➤ Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre.

Little Theatre in the Hay > Haymarket Theatres.

Little, Janet (1759-1813)

Scottish labouring-class poet who wrote in Gaelic and English. She did not have more than a 'common education' before becoming a domestic servant to Frances Wallace Dunlop of Dunlop, the patron of Scottish poet ▶ Robert Burns (1759-1796). She later married John Richmond. She went to work in the dairy at Loudoun Castle, and her employer showed some of her poetry to Burns. In 1792 The Poetical Works of Janet Little was issued. Incisively aware of-her own 'impudent' status as a poet, she refused to accept received pronunciation, and threaded her writing with changes in linguistic mode.

She wrote, 'But what is more surprising still, / A milkmaid must tak' up her quill; / An' she will write, shame fa' the rabble / That thinks to please with ilka bawble.' She continued to write after the publication of the book.

> Collier, Mary; Leapor, Mary; Yearsley, Ann.

Bib: Landry, D. The Muses of Resistance.

Littlewood, Joan (b 1914)

British director and founder of the Theatre Union in the 1930s with her husband Ewan MacColl. The company reformed after the war as Theatre Workshop, based firstly in Manchester and, from 1953, in East London at the Theatre Royal, Stratford East. Littlewood developed a method of working with actors which encouraged collaboration and improvisation. Her two most famous productions were > Brendan Behan's The Hostage and Oh, What a Lovely War, the latter accredited to Theatre Workshop, Charles Chilton and the members of the original cast. Her aim was to provide a 'fun palace' for working-class audiences, though commercial pressures meant that the company had to rely heavily on West End transfers for survival, which destroyed her attempts to create a genuine Bib: Goorney, H., The Theatre Workshop Story.

Lively, Penelope (b 1933)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Egypt, Lively was sent to boarding school in England in 1945 and was educated at St Anne's College Oxford. She has worked as a reviewer and BBC radio presenter. She writes elegant and perceptive novels about the moral dilemmas and intellectual development of middle-class characters, with a particular focus on the importance of the past and its reassessment for the understanding of the present. This concern is often presented through characters professionally preoccupied with the past, such as archaeologists, biographers and historians. Her novels are: The Road to Lichfield (1977); Treasures of Time (1979); Judgement Day (1980); Next to Nature, Art (1982); Perfect Happiness (1983); According to Mark (1984); Moon Tiger (1987); Passing On (1989); City of the Mind (1991); Cleopatra's Sister (1993). Volumes of short stories: Nothing Missing But the Samovar (1978); Corruption (1984); Pack of Cards: Stories 1978-1986 (1989). She has also written television plays, books for children and The Presence of the Past: An Introduction to Landscape History (1976). Oleander, Jacaranda: A Childhood Perceived (1994) is a memoir of her early years.

Lives of the Poets, The (1779–81)

By > Samuel Johnson; originally entitled

Prefaces biographical and critical to the Works of the English Poets. Johnson began work on the project at the request of a number of booksellers, who required essays on the poets which could be prefaced to editions of their works. The essays developed so successfully that it was decided to issue them in their own right. The essays are interesting both for their critical insight and because they embody the literary tastes of the time. They are idiosyncratic and prejudiced, but always lively; Johnson's bias against the > metaphysical poets in particular has been challenged by changing literary tastes.

Livy (Titus Livius) (59 BC-AD 17) Roman historian. He wrote the history of Rome in 142 books, 35 of which have survived, with summaries of most of the rest. His aims were partly to ensure that the achievements of 'the chiefest people of the world' should be remembered and partly to provide material for future political guidance.

> Latin literature.

Llangollen, The Ladies of

The 'Ladies of Llangollen' were Lady Eleanor Butler (1739-1829) and Sarah Ponsonby (1755-1831); they were close friends for ten years before pressure from their families -Butler was encouraged to become a nun and Ponsonby to accept the attentions of a male suitor - drove them to elope, and they set up house together at Plas Newydd in Llangollen. Their writings were published in The Hamwood Papers of the Ladies of Llangollen and Caroline Hamilton (1930), edited by G.H. Bell. It is clear from Butler's diary that they saw their retreat as a rural idyll which gave them the opportunity to study and appreciate ⊳ nature. As such, they belong to the ➤ Romantic tradition. > Wordsworth and > Anna Seward came to visit them at Plas Newydd, the former writing them a sonnet and the latter a poem called 'Llangollen Vale' (1795). Their house, an interesting example of the > Gothic Revival in architecture, may still be visited.

Llovd's

An association of shipowners and other business men concerned with shipping. Its activities are primarily the insurance of ships and cargoes, and the dissemination of shipping information. It arose from a > coffee-house kept by an Edward Lloyd in London early in the 18th century; this was frequented by merchants and insurers of ships who eventually formed their own association.

Lochhead, Liz (b 1947)

Scottish poet, dramatist, and performer. Her early poetry, with its wry observations on awry love affairs, street life and everyday folk, was full of playful, exact phrases. She has a painter's eye for local colour and situation, a wordsmith's ability to shape that perception into vital language, and underpinning all this a strong sense of how female sexuality influences actions and reactions within past history and modern society. Blood and Ice (1982), Lochhead's first serious attempt at playwriting, has undergone several changes since its first production but the main thrust of the piece is unchanged: the nature of female creativity. The plot concerns the hectic, febrile relationship between Byron and the Shelleys and the circumstances which led to \triangleright Mary Shelley penning Frankenstein.

Jock Tamson's Bairns (1990), a performance piece Lochhead created with the Communicado company (it involved music, dance and mime as well as spoken text) revealed just how closely she scans the Scottish psyche as well as her fellow man and woman. Subtitled 'The Last Burnt Supper', the project took the patriotic and macho myths surrounding Scotland's national hero-bard, Robert Burns, and used them to point up the underlying sadness and inadequacy of a race that celebrates the poet's drunkenness and womanising as much, if not more than, his poems and his politics. Other plays include: Dracula (1985) and Mary Queen of Scots Got Her Head Chopped Off (1987).

Locke, John (1632-1704)

Philosopher. He follows ➤ Thomas Hobbes in his sceptical ➤ rationalism, but he is the direct opposite of Hobbes in his optimistic view of human nature and in the moderation and flexibility of his social and political ideas. Hobbes was born in the year of the attempted invasion by the ➤ Armada and was painfully aware of the human propensity to violence from the decade of civil wars (1642-52); Locke's sympathies were identified with the moderation of the bloodless revolution of 1688 (➤ Glorious Revolution) and the climate of reasonableness which followed it.

In his two Treatises of Government (1690), Locke, like Hobbes, presupposes a state of nature preceding a social contract which was the basis of political society. But whereas Hobbes saw the state of nature as a state of war, Locke saw it as a peaceful condition in which the Law of Nature and of Reason was spontaneously observed; his idea of the social contract was not, as for Hobbes, that human existence was intolerable without it, but that it merely provided additional assurance that life and property would be respected. For Hobbes sovereignty had to be single and absolute, but for Locke it was merely a public service always responsible to society, which may at any time remove it. Similarly, in his Letters concerning Toleration (1689, 1690, 1692 and a fourth published posthumously) Locke, unlike Hobbes, held that the state has no right to interfere in religious matters and that oppression of religion by governments caused religion to spark civil violence.

Locke's advocacy of religious toleration was consistent with his sceptical attitude to faith and knowledge. Man must first discover what he can know before he persecutes others for publishing false beliefs, and this inquiry he conducts in his ➤ Essay concerning Human Understanding (1690). This shows man's capacity for knowledge to be distinctly limited, but the existence of God turns out to be a necessary hypothesis discoverable by reason. Christianity therefore is inherently reasonable (Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695) and faith by revelation is indispensable only because the use of reason is unavailable to the majority of mankind; 'nothing that is contrary to . . . reason has a right to be urged or assented to as a matter of faith' (Human Understanding, Bk. IV).

In his Thoughts on Education Locke extols reason at the expense of imagination and therefore (by implication) of the imaginative arts. When he applies his philosophy to politics or education, Locke is always guided by standards of practical utility, and in his abstract speculation he refrains from carrying his reasoning so far (as > David Hume seemed to do) that the logical basis for the conduct of practical life by the light of reason was undermined. His philosophy dominated the 18th century and is at the back of such 19th-century rationalist movements as > Utilitarianism. Bib: Cranston, M., Life; MacLean, K., John Locke and English Literature in the Eighteenth Century; Willey, B., The Seventeenth Century Background; English Moralists; James, D. G., The Life of Reason: Hobbes, Locke, Bolingbroke.

'Locksley Hall'

A poem by ➤ Alfred Tennyson, first published in Poems (1848). It contains the famous line 'Let the great world spin forever down the ringing grooves of change' which epitomizes the Victorian equation of change with progress. It was begun after an unhappy love affair between Tennyson and Rosa Baring and bears traces of misogyny. The poem is a ➤ dramatic monologue and its structure is unusual in that it is composed of trochaic couplets with eight stresses.

Lodge, David (b 1935)

Novelist and critic, born in London and educated at London University. Since 1976 he has been Professor of Modern English Literature at the University of Birmingham. His novels are: The Picturegoers (1960); Ginger, You're Barmy (1962); The British Museum is Falling Down (1965); Out of the Shelter (1970); Changing Places (1975); How Far Can You Go? (1980); Small World (1984); Nice Work (1988); Paradise News (1991); Therapy (1995). His earlier novels are views of English society in a light, realistic mode, but The British Museum is Falling Down introduces extensive use of parody and a farcical element. He is best known for Changing Places and Small World, inventive, humorous tales of academic life, full of jokes, puns, allusions, parodies and reflexive comments on the nature of narrative which reflect his interest in critical theory. They have affinities with the campus novels of ➤ Malcolm Bradbury. Out of the Shelter is a > Bildungsroman, and How Far Can You Go? explores the personal struggles of a group of Catholics from the 1950s to the 1970s, concentrating in particular on the issue of contraception. Criticism includes: Language of Fiction (1966); The Novelist at the Crossroads (1971); The Modes of Modern Writing (1977); Working With Structuralism (1981). Bib: Morace, R. A., The Dialogic Novels of Malcolm Bradbury and David Lodge.

Lodge, Thomas (1558-1625)

Poet and man of letters. He was one of the group now known as the ▷ University Wits — university scholars who used their learning to make a career as professional writers for the expanding reading public of the late 16th century. In many ways his career is representative of this new kind of Elizabethan professional writer.

He was the son of Sir Thomas Lodge, a Lord Mayor of London, and was educated at Merchant Taylors School and Trinity College, Oxford. He then became a student of law at Lincoln's Inn, London, in 1578. The law students of the Inns of Court in the reign of Elizabeth were a leading element of the literary public, and others besides Lodge found these law colleges a nursery for literary rather than legal talent. During the next 20 years he practised all the kinds of writing popular at the time. His first work (1580) was a > pamphlet entitled A Defence of Plays, written in answer to > Stephen Gosson's attack on theatrical literature, Schoole of Abuse (1580). Besides other pamphlets, he wrote prose romances interspersed with lyrics (eg Rosalynde, Euphues Golden Legacy, 1590, and A Marguerite of America, 1596), verse romances (eg Scilla's Metamorphosis, 1589, reissued as Glaucus and Scilla, 1610), a > sonnet sequence (Phillis, 1503), and a collection of epistles and > satires in imitation of the Roman poet ➤ Horace, A Fig for Momus (1595). He also wrote plays, or at least collaborated with playwrights, eg a chronicle play The Wounds of Civil War (printed 1594), and, probably with > Robert Greene, A Looking Glass for London and England (1594). Besides this writing activity, he joined two piratical expeditions against Spain, the first to the Canary Isles in 1588, and the second to Brazil in 1591. It was on the first that he wrote his most famous work, the romance Rosalynde, later used by Shakespeare as the story for > As You Like It, and on the second that he wrote A Marguerite of America. After 1596, when he published the penitential and satirical pamphlets (Wit's Misery and World's Madness), he became converted to Roman Catholicism and took to the study of medicine, receiving the degree of M. D. from Oxford University in 1603. His literary works during the remainder of his life were serious and chiefly translations (eg of Josephus (1602) and > Seneca (1614)), and religious and medical treatises.

Bib: Sisson, C. J., Lodge and Other Elizabethans.

Logocentrism

The Greek logos means word, but in philosophy it is also widely used to denote an ultimate truth, as in 'the Word of God'. Logocentrism is a key term in the thinking of ▷ Jacques Derrida and > deconstruction theory. It is used to designate the way thought systems are organized around fundamental assumptions about truth. These assumptions hold the meaning of the discourse together by claiming some essential ground whose validity and truth is incontestable. The most substantial example is, of course, belief in God, but another example might be a faith in the power of reason or science. In Derrida's view, Western philosophy has taken such central, usually ⊳ metaphysical presences for granted thus allowing what are merely conventional procedures for the expression of human reason and argument to appear natural and inevitable. One consequence of this has been that a certain kind of world view and mode of expression is stabilized by repressing alternative possibilities, including the possibility that we, and our habitual thought patterns, are in fact radically ▷ decentred. A particular concern of Derrida's is the Western privileging of speech over writing in which speech is held to be somehow more genuine or truthful, or to possess greater integrity, because it issues from a person's presence. However, for Derrida and other poststructural theorists, the authenticity of speech is illusory, not least because we always speak from the illusion that we possess a centred self. Meanwhile the advantage of writing is that, in the end, it suffers from no such delusion. Instead, read with due deconstructive attention, it can always be made to reveal the > differences (and différances), > aporia and structuring > absences in which deconstruction specialises.

Lollardism

Lollard was the name (of disputed origin) given to the English followers of ▷ John Wycliffe. Their movement was widespread by the end of the 14th and beginning of the 15th century, continuing down to the ▷ Reformation. The wealth of the Church and its readiness to take money from starving peasants was what Lollardism attacked, though nobles and country gentlemen were among its supporters. Their literature was widely circulated in spite of proscription. Lollards opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation and the use of art and artifice:

religious rituals and devotional practices. There were some Lollard martyrs at the beginning of the 15th century. In 1408 Convocation issued various decrees designed to control Lollard activities: a bishop's licence to preach would henceforth be necessary; preachers addressing the laity were not to rebuke the sins of the clergy; Lollard books and bibles were to be destroyed. Under > Henry V they endured further persecution and in 1418 preaching in the open air was banned. In 1428, however, they were said to be as numerous as ever. Lollardism did much to shape the English Reformation: subordination of clerical to lay jurisdiction, the reduction of Church possessions and making the ▷ Bible available to ordinary people in their own language were all Lollard goals.

➤ Utopianism.

Lollards

A term (originally abusive, deriving from the Dutch word 'lollaerd' or mumbler) used of the followers of the Wycliffite reform movement of the later 14th century onwards. The programme of the movement was aimed at reforming the materialistic corruption of the clergy, creating a ministry closer to the Gospel ideal and promoting greater access to vernacular versions of scriptural texts. The Lollards seem to have enjoyed the patronage of certain knights who appear to have sponsored a scriptorium where Lollard texts could be copied and corrected.

➤ Wycliffe, John.

Bib: Coleman, J., 1350–1400. Medieval Writers and Readers.

London (1738)

A poem by ▷ Samuel Johnson in heroic ▷ couplets, written in imitation of the Third Satire by ▷ Juvenal. In the spirit of Juvenal, Johnson satirizes (through the character of Thales) the degenerate sophistication, the social injustice, and the crime and licence of the socialled civilization of London. The style has Johnson's typical compression and force, and the ▷ satire is more impersonal than that of his chief predecessors, ▷ Dryden and ▷ Pope who followed the more relaxed and personal style of ▷ Horace. Juvenal is not imitated slavishly but interpreted with discernment and used as a criterion for emulation.

London Cuckolds, The (1681)

Comedy by > Ravenscroft. Three old citizens, Doodle, Dashwell and Wiseacre, are married to three young women: Arabella, Eugenia, and Peggy. Each of the men believes he has made the best choice, but the play shows how the women conspire to outwit their husbands, in order to carry on liaisons with their lovers. The atmosphere is one of farcical intrigue, with scenes of concealment, duplicity, and mistaken identity. Despite contemporary attacks on its supposed indecency, the play was staged each year on the Lord Mayor's Day until 1751. It was revived in 1979 at the Royal Court Theatre, and more recently, at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith.

752

London Magazine, The

Three periodicals of this name have existed: the first ran 1732–85; the second, 1820–29; and the third, founded in 1954, still exists. The second is the most famous. It was founded as the political opponent of the right-wing > Blackwood's Magazine, and its first editor, John Scott, was killed in a duel in consequence of the rivalry.

London Merchant, The, or The History of George Barnwell (1731)

Play by > George Lillo, thought to be the first tragedy to centre on a low-born hero and the affairs of ordinary people, and to be written predominantly in prose. In the Dedication Lillo announced a specific moral purpose, 'the exciting of the passions in order to the correcting of such of them as are criminal, either in their nature, or through their excess'. The action takes place in the reign of > Elizabeth I. The virtuous and inexperienced young apprentice George Barnwell is seduced and corrupted by the predatory, man-hating courtesan Millwood. She inveigles him into stealing money from his employer, Thorowgood, and then into murdering his kindly but wealthy uncle. His resulting despair causes her to fear for her own safety, so she casts him off and betrays him to the authorities. But her servants, revolted by the depths to which she has sunk, and repenting their own part in the process, in turn betray her. Millwood is condemned to death, along with her victim. In his last moments Barnwell is visited by his master's daughter, Maria, and discovers she has loved him all along.

Barnwell's descent into crime, torn by guilt and bouts of remorse, is treated with considerable sympathy and Lillo shows how hard it is for him, once he has become an outcast, to contemplate any alternative. Even Millwood is allowed some pointed comments about men's hypocrisy, the cruelty wrought by religious bigotry, and the injustices of society. But the final scenes in the prison cell of the now repentant Barnwell are laden with \triangleright sentiment.

The play, with its emphasis on Barnwell's suffering and distress, helped to establish the so-called domestic or bourgeois tragedy on the English stage. The London Merchant is dedicated to a wealthy merchant, Sir John Eyles, and comments on the usefulness of merchants to the nation.

The original production was a family affair, with the characters of Barnwell and Maria taken by > Theophilus Cibber and his wife, and the servant Lucy by Cibber's sister, > Charlotte Charke. ▷ Colley Cibber later supplied a silly, comic epilogue. The villainous Millwood was played by ▷ Charlotte Butler. The play was an enormous success, and remained popular for over a century. It also influenced ▷ Diderot and ▷ Lessing, and through them, via ▷ Kotzebue, the English stage once again.

Long Parliament, The

A parliament which was summoned by ➤ Charles I in 1640 and which continued until 1653, when it was dissolved by > Oliver Cromwell. It was this parliament that broke with the king and started the ▷ Civil War in 1642. In 1648 those of its members who were disposed to come to terms with the king were expelled by Colonel Pride ('Pride's Purge') and the remainder continued to sit under the nickname of 'the Rump'. After dissolving it, Cromwell called parliaments of his own but after his death in 1658 it reassembled and in 1660, the year of the Restoration of the monarchy, it dissolved itself to make way for a new parliament under the restored king, ➤ Charles II. His government did not recognize the legality of Cromwell's parliaments, so that in law the Long Parliament was considered to have sat continuously from 1640 to 1660.

Longinus, Dionysius Cassius (1st century AD) Greek critic. Most of his works have perished but he is the reputed author of the extremely influential treatise On the Sublime. This is about literary style, 'the Sublime', though the traditional rendering of the Greek title, is usually regarded as misleading. The author is concerned with the qualities of expression that make for true impressiveness, relates them to distinction of mind in the writer and discusses faults that arise from fallacious ideas of eloquence. The French critic, ▷ Boileau, made a famous translation of the treatise in 1674, and through him it influenced 18th-century English ideas on style.

Look Back in Anger (1956)

A play by > John Osborne, first performed at the > Royal Court theatre where it immediately made a major impact. The plot and dramatic structure are fairly conventional: Jimmy Porter, from a working-class background, lives in cramped conditions with his upper-middle-class wife Alison. Alison's friend persuades her to leave Jimmy only to fall for him herself. When Alison has a miscarriage her friend obligingly makes way for her to return to her former husband. The story and subsidiary characters are really a vehicle for Jimmy's tirades against the class-ridden nature of British society in the post-war period. For many amongst the original audiences Jimmy was a kind of modern Hamlet figure, even though a modern audience would be more likely to focus on the sexist manner in which he hectors and bullies his wife. Nonetheless, the fact is that the play captured a particular mood of disillusionment in the period and established the Royal Court as a venue for drama of social protest.

➤ Angry young men.

Lord Chamberlain's Men, The ➤ Chamberlain's Men. The Lord.

Lord 7im (1900)

A novel by > Joseph Conrad. It is narrated by Marlow, an officer in the Merchant Navy who also appears in Conrad's other works, > Heart of Darkness, Chance and Youth. The first 35 chapters we are to suppose recounted to companions after dinner; the rest is in the form of a letter and written narrative subsequently posted to one of these friends. Jim is a young sailor, the son of an English country parson, who dreams of being a hero. He becomes chief mate of the Patna, a decrepit ship with second rate officers, carrying pilgrims from Singapore to Jeddah. When the ship seems about to sink he loses his nerve and, at the last moment, jumps into a small boat with the other officers. When they reach land they discover that the Patna has stayed afloat and been towed to safety. The other officers disappear, but Jim stays to face disgrace at the official inquiry. He meets Marlow, to whom he tells his story and subsequently, persecuted by his sense of lost honour, Jim takes up humble employment as a water clerk in various Eastern ports (it is thus that Marlow introduces him to us at the start of the novel). Through the intervention of Marlow, Jim is sent by Stein, a benevolent trader, to a remote trading post in the jungle called Patusan. There, in alliance with a local chief called Doramin, who is Stein's friend. Iim defeats in battle the forces of Sherif Ali. a half-caste Arab bandit leader, and becomes a venerated figure. However, when a party of European adventurers led by the scoundrelly Gentlemen Brown appears in Patusan, the memory of his past dishonour fatally weakens Jim's resolve. He asks Doramin to let them go free, pledging his own life for their good behaviour. They massacre a party of the villagers, including Doramin's son, and Jim allows himself to be shot by Doramin, leaving behind Jewel, the local woman with whom he has been living, as a sad and lonely figure.

Lotos-Eaters, The

A poem by > Alfred Tennyson, first published in the 1833 volume, which contains much of his most distinguished work. Its subject is the ancient Greek myth of the lotophagi ('lotuseaters' - Tennyson used the Greek spelling, 'lotos') who occur in > Homer's Odyssey. Those who visit the land where the lotus fruit grows and eat some of it lose all desire to return home. The theme of Tennyson's poem is the temptation to reject the world of activity, change and stress, in favour of a trancelike existence measured only by the more languorous rhythms of nature. It is in the tradition of Edmund Spenser (1552-99) and the more luxuriant ➤ Keats: the rhythms have hypnotic music, and the imagery is strongly and unsettlingly sensuous. Tennyson's pre-Victorian poems may be viewed as an important part of the Romantic bequest to the later 19th century.

Love for Love (1695)

A comedy by ➤ William Congreve. The plot centres on an intrigue to frustrate an uncharitable father, Sir Sampson, who wishes to disinherit his extravagant elder son, Valentine, in favour of the younger brother, Ben, a hearty but ludicrous sailor. The intrigue is managed by Angelica, a rich and spirited girl in love with Valentine. A minor plot concerns Sir Sampson's attempt to marry Ben off to an equally awkward country girl, Miss Prue, the daughter of a superstitious astrologer, Foresight. The rustic embarrassment of Ben and Prue, neither of whom wants to marry the other, nicely contrasts with the wit and grace of Valentine and Angelica. The play succeeds particularly because of its skilful and witty prose dialogue.

Love Letters Between a Nobleman and His Sister (1684-87)

➤ Epistolary fiction by ➤ Aphra Behn, based on the story of the adulterous and quasi-incestuous elopement and affair of Lady Henrietta Berkeley and her brother-in-law, Forde, Lord Grey of Werke, but transposing the scene to France. The novel was originally published in three volumes from 1684 to 1687. Part one concentrates on the story of Sylvia and Philander, the second part follows Philander to Cologne, and the third part ends with the execution of the Duke of Monmouth after his attempt to depose ➤ James II.

Lovelace, Richard (1618-58)

Poet. One of the so-called 'Cavalier poets', Lovelace fought on behalf of the king during the > Civil War. The majority of his poetry was written before 1649, when his collection of poems entitled Lucasta appeared. Lucasta is prefaced with a commendatory poem by > Andrew Marvell, and his work might be thought of as anticipating themes expressed in Marvell's poetry - in particular the search for a form of disengagement from the world. It is not, however, with the more republican Marvell that Lovelace is associated, but with aristocratic codes of love and honour embraced by the literary and military circles in which Lovelace moved. Of special note are the series of 'bestiary poems' (eg 'The Snail' or 'The Grasshopper') which seem often to offer themselves as a form of disguised or encoded commentary on the political crisis of the period before the Civil War.

Bib: Wilkinson, C. H. (ed.), The Poems of Richard Lovelace; Weidhorn, M., Richard Lovelace.

Lovers' Vows (1798)

Play by ▷ Elizabeth Inchbald, adapted from Das Kind der Liebe by ▷ August von Kotzebue. Agatha has been seduced and abandoned by Baron Wildenhaim, who has married another woman. Agatha has given birth to a son, Frederic, but become separated from him. He finds her sunk in deep poverty, and learns about his birth for the first time. Eventually he persuades his father, now widowed and elderly, to marry his mother, and to allow his daughter Amelia to marry the man of her choice, instead of the wealthy man her father had chosen for her. The play is featured in ▷ Austen's ▷ Mansfield Park (1814).

Love's Labour's Lost (1594-5)

A comedy by > Shakespeare, published in a > quarto edition in 1598. It is a play for court taste, recalling the comedies of ➤ John Lyly; the plot is light and fantastic, and a pretext for dextrously witty dialogue and poetic flights of fancy. But the graceful artificiality is enriched by a freshness that arises from elements of rural life, both in imagery employed by the courtiers and in some of the characters. As in later comedies written by Shakespeare in the decade 1590-1600 (> A Midsummer Night's Dream, > As You Like It, > Twelfth Night), the witty courtiers end by making fools of themselves in their own way, much as the clowns and simple-minded pedants do - predictably in theirs.

The King of Navarre and three of his lords vow to shut themselves away from pleasure and ladies in order to devote themselves to study. They quickly find excuses to break the vow when the king is visited by the Princess of France and three of her ladies on an embassy. A subplot concerns a group of ludicrous characters - the proud but seedy Spaniard, Don Armado; the pedantic schoolmaster Holofernes; Sir Nathaniel, the country clergyman, and Costard the rustic who attempts to entertain the lords and ladies with a performance of the ≥ interlude of the > 'Nine Worthies'. The courting of the princess and her ladies by the king and his lords is abruptly ended by the announcement of the death of the princess's father. The play ends with the ladies imposing a year's ordeal on their suitors.

Some scholars have seen in the play a light satire on the ▷ School of Night.

Some of the characters are identified with living contemporaries, for instance Armado with ▷ Sir Walter Ralegh, who is said to have been one of the key members of the School.

Love's Last Shift (1696)

Comedy by ➤ Colley Cibber, often said to have set the stage for 18th-century > Reform Comedy. Loveless, having abandoned his wife Amanda and gone abroad, returns to England deeply in debt. She has inherited a fortune, and remained loyal to him. Amanda seduces him in disguise, then reveals her true identity. Shaken by remorse, Loveless embraces the 'chast Rapture of a Vertuous Love', and the two are reunited as a couple. The ending is said to have reduced the audience to tears, and the play was a great success. Sub-plots concern the courtships of Young Worthy and Narcissa, and of the Elder Worthy, a reformed rake and the teasing woman, Hillaria. > Sir John Vanbrugh's > The Relapse (1696) was written as a sequel and sardonic 'comment' on Cibber's play, showing that Loveless' reformation is only temporary. Cibber himself performed in both plays, as Sir Novelty Fashion, who later assumes the title of Lord Foppington.

Lowry, Malcolm (1909-57)

Novelist. He was educated in England, but spent most of his later life in Mexico, the United States, and British Columbia. His first novel, Ultramarine, was published in 1933. His reputation chiefly rests on his second and only other completed novel, Under the Volcano (1947). The central character, Geoffrey Firmin, is British Consul in a Mexican city situated under two volcanoes, just as in ancient times the Underworld, Tartarus, was supposed to be situated beneath the Sicilian volcano, Etna. Firmin is an alcoholic who has rejected the love of his wife and his friends and taken to drink as escape from the inhumanity of the modern world (the events take place in 1938) and his own sense of guilt and failure. The novel is highly allusive and symbolic, with metaphysical and mythical overtones, and the narrative is partly > stream of consciousness. It shows the influence of ▷ Joseph Conrad and ▷ James Joyce and it has been described as the most distinguished work of fiction produced by an English novelist since 1945. A number of works were published posthumously, including: two novels entitled Dark as the Grave Wherein My Friend is Laid (1968) and October Ferry to Gabriola (1970), which were put together from Lowry's drafts by his widow; Selected Poems (1962) and a volume of short stories, Hear Us, O Lord, from Heaven Thy Dwelling Place (1961). This Selected Letters have been edited by Harvey Breit and Margerie Bonner Lowry (1965).

Bib: Woodcock, G., Lowry: the Man and His Work; Day, D., Lowry, a Biography; Cross, R.

K., Malcolm Lowry: a Preface to His Fiction; Binns, R., Malcolm Lowry.

Lucan (Marcus Annaeus Lucanus) (AD 39–65) A Roman poet; author of the poem Pharsalia about the struggle for power between ▷ Julius Caesar and ▷ Pompey. ▷ Christopher Marlow translated the first book (1600). The translation by Rowe (1718) was greatly praised by ▷ Samuel Johnson. In ancient times Lucan was noted for his florid style, and for his gift for ▷ epigram.

Lucian (2nd century AD)

Greek satirist. He is especially known for his satirical dialogues and for his True History, an account of imaginary voyages which ▷ Jonathan Swift may have used as a model for his ▷ Gulliver's Travels.

Lucius Junius Brutus (1680)

Tragedy by ▷ Nathaniel Lee, based on the historic overthrow of Tarquin and establishment of a republic in Rome, using ▷ Livy as a major source. It contains strong libertarian and egalitarian speeches, as when Brutus accuses Tarquin of arbitrary rule (Act II) and looks forward to a time when 'no man shall offend because he's great' (Act V). Staged at a time of high political tension in England, with the Whigs pressing the ▷ Exclusion Bill, the play was considered too dangerous and was suppressed.

Lucky Chance, The (1686)

Comedy by ➤ Aphra Behn. The title plot concerns the fortunes of Julia, Lady Fulbank, married to an old man, Sir Cautious Fulbank, but in love with the poverty-stricken Gayman. She secretly conveys money to Gayman, and then visits him disguised as an old crone. Later Sir Cautious gambles with Gayman, and stakes a night with his wife as the prize. Gavman wins, and is brought to Julia's chamber, where he makes love to her in the guise of her husband. In the secondary plot, Bellmour, having killed a man in a duel, flees to Brussels, leaving behind his fiancée Leticia. In his absence Sir Feeble Fainwou'd, an old alderman whose name describes his condition, convinces Leticia that her lover is dead, and she agrees to marry Sir Feeble, but the wedding is forestalled when Bellmour returns, and manages to thwart his rival's plans. The play ends with Lady Fulbank announcing that she is leaving her husband, and both women being united with the men of their choice. In an extended and vivid speech, Lady Fulbank defends the right of women to love where they please, even if it means cuckolding their husbands. The play was successfully staged at Drury Lane, and formed the source of ➤ Hannah Cowley's School for Greybeards (1786). It was revived at the Royal Court Theatre in 1984.

Lucrece (Lucretia)

A Roman lady of outstanding virtue and beauty. She was the wife of Tarquinius Collatinus but Sextus, the son of Tarquin, king of Rome, tried to seduce her and, when she resisted, raped her. She told her father and her husband of the outrage and exacted an oath of vengeance from them, after which she killed herself. In consequence, a relative of her husband, Lucius Junius Brutus, led a rebellion against the > Tarquin monarchy and expelled them from the city. Lucrece was thus traditionally the occasion for the foundation of the ancient Roman Republic. The tale has been reworked many times, notably in a poem by ▷ Shakespeare, and in the play > Lucius Junius Brutus, by > Nathaniel Lee, because it poses questions about guilt and innocence that are of enduring concern.

Bib: Donaldson, I., The Rapes of Lucrece.

Lucretius (Titus Lucretius Carus) (1st century BC)

Roman poet; author of the great didactic poem De Rerum Natura ('Concerning the Nature of Things'). It outlines the philosophy of the Greek thinker > Epicurus, which is based in the atomic theory of Democritus. The poet seeks to expound that all reality is material. The gods exist but they also are material, though immortal, and they are not concerned with the affairs of men; the soul exists but it, too, is material and mortal like the body, dissolving into its original atoms after death. Lucretius is not, however, a cynical poet; he testifies to the beauty of the natural world and the poem opens with an eloquent invocation to Venus, the conception of whom is followed by ⊳ Edmund Spenser in ➤ Faerie Queene Bk. IV, x, stanza 44 onwards. Lucretius' love of the natural world and his reverence for reason caused him to be greatly admired during the ➤ Renaissance and the succeeding two centuries; parts of the poem were finely translated by ➤ Dryden and by Thomas Creech (1659-1700).

Lucretius is a late ▶ dramatic monologue by ▶ Tennyson, in which the poet philosopher expounds his dying vision of the world.

Lucy Poems

A group of five ▷ lyrics by ▷ William Wordsworth, composed between 1799 and 1801. There is no clear evidence that the figure of Lucy represents any actual person, though her ambiguity may be an expression of the poet's intense relationship with his sister ▷ Dorothy. In 'Strange fits of passion I have known' the lover approaches Lucy's cottage as the moon sinks behind it, and suddenly imagines, for no apparent reason, that she might be dead. In 'Three years she grew' Lucy is a child who has died young, and in 'A slumber did my spirit seal' the poet consoles himself with the idea that the dead Lucy is now part of inanimate nature, 'Rolled round in earth's diurnal course,/ With rocks, and stones, and trees'. The sublime, almost mystical, simplicity of style of these poems has incurred parody. The poem which begins 'She dwelt among the untrodden ways/ Beside the springs of Dove,/ A Maid whom there were none to praise/ And very few to love', was delightfully rewritten by Samuel Taylor Coleridge's son, ➤ Hartley, to apply to the poet himself: 'He lived amidst th'untrodden ways/ To Rydal Lake that lead;/ A bard whom there were none to praise,/ And very few to read'.

Luggnagg

A country in Part III of ➤ Swift's ➤ Gulliver's Travels. It is inhabited by the Struldbrugs who have immortality, and find it a curse.

Lumley, Lady Joanna (1537-76) Translator and dramatist. Lumley is interesting in that she is one of only three Renaissance Englishwomen to translate or compose complete dramas, the other two being > Elizabeth Cary and ➤ Mary Sidney. Like her cousin > Lady Jane Grey she was well educated, and had access to one of the finest libraries in England, owned by her father, Henry Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel. Her prose > translation of > Euripides' tragedy Iphigenia at Aulis was transcribed into a notebook, together with several Latin pieces (a modern edition was published in 1909, ed. Harold H. Child). The work is notable in several ways: it is the first known attempt to translate a Greek drama into English; it adopts a strongly pro-women stance and reveals the possible abuses of women within a patriarchal society; and, finally, it is all the more remarkable an achievement since she could only have been 15 or 16 when she undertook the translation. Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

Luther, Martin (1483-1546) German religious reformer, and the chief figure in the European movement known as the ➤ Reformation. The beginning of this is often dated from 1517, when Luther fixed on the church door at Wittenberg his 95 'Theses' against the sale of 'indulgences'; a consequence of this was his condemnation by the Pope at the Diet of Worms (1521).

Luther's influence on the English Reformation is a matter of dispute. Before he separated the English church from the authority of the Pope, ➤ Henry VIII wrote a treatise against Luther, for which the Pope awarded him the title Defender of the Faith (Fidei Defensor), still used by English monarchs. Lutheran influences were felt by humanists such as John Colet and ➤ Sir Thomas More, and inspired ➤ William Tyndale's translation of the ➤ Bible, the first of several in the 16th century. They certainly operated on the doctrines represented by the second Prayer Book, introduced by ➤ Archbishop Cranmer under ➤ Edward VI. However, reformist influences had been current in England since > John Wycliffe in the 14th century.

Bib: Brecht, M., Martin Luther.

Lyall, Edna (1857-1903)

▶ Pseudonym of novelist Ada Allen Bayly. She was born in Brighton, Sussex, and after the deaths of both her parents moved to her uncle's home in Caterham. Lyall supported women's suffrage, was a committed Liberal and involved herself in charitable and social work. Her novels reflect her Christian religious views, but are more than simple moral tracts. With her second work, Donavan (1882), she became an extremely popular writer and her subsequent works ran to numerous editions. We Two (1884) and Hope the Hermit (1898) were especially successful. Other works include Doreen (1894), in which she supported the movement for Irish Home Rule, and her last novel The Hinderers (1902), which protested against the Boer War.

Bib: Escreet, J.M., Life; Payne, G.A., Life.

Lycidas (1637)

A ⊳ pastoral ⊳ elegy by ⊳ John Milton, written in 1637. It is in the form of a monody, ie modelled on the ⊳ odes sung by a single actor in ancient Greek ⊳ tragedy. Line lengths vary between three and five feet, and the rhymes follow no regular pattern, but the mournful, majestic sonority is consistently sustained. Milton is lamenting the death of his college friend Edward King, a gifted young man who was drowned at sea, but it is not a poem of personal loss. The theme is the tragic loss of promise: King is seen as a young man of talent and serious endeavour in an age whose spiritual laxity requires the reforming zeal of such a spirit. Greek pastoral imagery is used - gods, muses, nymphs, including Camus, invented for the occasion as the god of the river that flows through Cambridge where Milton and King had studied. More important, however, is the pastoralism of the ➤ Bible: King was a good shepherd; the clergy are spiritual shepherds by their function, but mostly bad ones.

Lydgate, John (c 1370-1449/50)

A prolific 15th-century writer who seems to have enjoyed a higher contemporary literary reputation than he does now. He was born in Lydgate, Suffolk, and entered the famous and well-endowed monastery of Bury St Edmunds c 1385. He successfully aspired to noble and royal patronage, and his vast literary output provides a cultural 'barometer' of his time. He translated a number of key texts on classical, historical and moralizing subjects, including his monumental Troy Book (composed over 8 years, 1412-20), which is a translation of ▶ Guido de Columnis' Troy story; the Siege of Thebes (1420-2), which he presents as a contribution to the > Canterbury Tales; the Pilgrimage of the Life of Man (1426-30); and the Fall of Princes (1431-8), which is a translation of a French version of ➤ Boccaccio's compilation of tragedies (De Casibus Virorum Illustrium). He also composed > dream-vision poems (including the Temple of Glass, modelled on Chaucer's House of Fame), large numbers of lyric poems and a selection of dramatic pieces (including Mummings), designed for performance on various ceremonial occasions or to mark court festivities. His development of a Latinate, aureate poetic register influenced the style of court poetry in the 15th century.

Lydgate styled himself as a follower of Chaucer, and his reputation as a leading man of letters was evidently established during and after his lifetime: from the later 15th century onwards, his name is coupled with that of Chaucer's as a founding figure of the English literary tradition. Although his enormous output finds less favour with modern readers, he is undoubtedly a writer of monumental dimensions, who assimilated some of the important, authoritative narratives of medieval European court culture and made them available to a prestigious English audience. The scale of his work is daunting, but that is also his strength.

Bib: Norton-Smith, J. (ed.), Poems; Pearsall, D., John Lydgate.

Lyell, Sir Charles (1797-1875)

Geologist. His principal work, The Principles of Geology (1830–33) revolutionized ideas about the age of the earth, and was a challenge to current theological thinking as ▷ Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) was to be. He also contributed the idea of change as continuous and ceaseless instead of sudden, intermittent and catastrophic, which had been the prevailing view. This added to the sense of flux and instability which haunted such contemporary imaginative writers as ▷ Matthew Arnold and Tennyson, whose In Memorium

Lyly, John (1554-1606)

Poet, writer of romances, dramatist. He was a popular writer for the cultivated society of court and university circles.

(1850) shows traces of Lyell's influence.

His prose romances, > Euphues, or the Anatomy of Wit (1578) and Euphues and his England (1580), contain little story and are mainly pretexts for sophisticated discussion of contemporary manners and modes in a style whose graceful ornateness is really an end in itself. Its artificiality, now regarded as its fault, was at the time regarded as a virtue of high cultivation. It was much imitated in the last 20 years of the 16th century, and it was also parodied, eg by ▷ Shakespeare in his early comedies and, through ▷ Falstaff, here and there in ▷ Henry IV, Part I.

Lyly's comedies are in the same elaborately sophisticated style, and are in fact the first socially sophisticated comedies in English. The plays were performed by boy-actors in private theatres; they were not intended for the socially mixed audiences of public theatres such as the ▶ Globe. The Woman in the Moon (before 1584) was the only one of these in verse. He followed it with prose plays interspersed with graceful lyrics: Sapho and Phao (1584); Alexander and Campaspe (1584); > Gallathea (1585); Endimion (1588); Midas (1589); Mother Bombie (1594); and Love's Metamorphosis (published 1601). The best known of these are Alexander and Campaspe, Endimion and Mother Bombie. They have grace and wit, and were closer to popular taste than was Restoration comedy a century later. Lyly's writing was an adjunct to his search for preferment from his early patron, the Earl of Oxford, and from the queen; he was given hope of becoming Master of the ▷ Revels, but died a disappointed man.

> Theatres.

Bib: Hunter, G. K., John Lyly.

Lyonesse

A legendary country in Arthurian narratives which came to be identified with a tract of land extending westwards and southwards from Cornwall, now submerged under the sea, according to the legends. > Tristan is the son of the king of Lyonesse.

Lyric

In Ancient Greece the name given to verse sung to a lyre (from the Greek 'lurikos' - 'for the lyre'), whether as a solo performance or by a choir. In English usage, the term has had different associations in different historical literary periods. Elizabethan critics first used the term in England: > George Puttenham, for example, describes a lyric poet as someone who composes 'songs or ballads of pleasure to be sung with the voice, and to the harpe'. From the illustrative quotations in the O.E.D. (sv. lyric), it is clear that in later usage musical accompaniment was no longer considered essential to the definition of the form. In the 17th century lyric forms were widely used in poetry. Among the chief exponents were ➤ Shakespeare, Jonson, ▷ Herrick ▷ Lovelace, ▷ Marvell, > Herbert, > Milton and > Behn. Lyric poetry was less popular in the 18th century, but is found, for example, among the works of ▷ William Collins, and ▷ Thomas Gray.

> Blake contributed greatly to a revival of lyric poetry, which gathered pace in the 19th century.

It was in the 19th century that Ruskin offered a different definition of lyric poetry as 'the expression by the poet of his own feelings'; a definition which has the virtue of drawing attention to the personal and emotional focus of many lyric poems, but rather obscures any recognition of the highly stylized modes of mediating between personal experience and its public expression employed in lyric texts, which, like all literary conventions, may change over time. This definition owes a great deal to the personalization of the lyric in the Romantic period, eg > Keats' When I have fears that I may cease to be', and > Shelley's 'To a Skylark'.

In modern English, the term lyric has a very general range of reference: it may be used to cover most forms of short poetry, especially that which has a personal focus of some kind, or is non-narrative. But the very generality of its reference undermines its value as a critical term since it may refer to many different kinds of poetic genres and sub-genres (as modern collections of lyric poetry reveal). The term 'lyrics' now describes verbal arrangements for musical accompaniment. Bib: Lindley, D., Lyric.

Lyrical Ballads, with a Few other Poems (1798) A collection of poems by > William Wordsworth and ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, often seen as the starting point of the Romantic movement, the term 'lyrical ballad' indicating the combination of primitive simplicity (> ballad) and literary elevation (> lyric) at which Wordsworth in particular aimed. The volume first appeared anonymously in 1798. Most of the poems were by Wordsworth, Coleridge's contributions being The Rime of the > Ancient Mariner, The Foster Mother's Tale, To the Nightingale, and The Dungeon. The second edition (1800) appeared under Wordsworth's name only, and included the famous Preface and his poem > Michael. Coleridge's poem Love was added in place of Wordsworth's The Convict. In the third edition of 1802 the Preface was enlarged. The fourth and final edition appeared in 1805.

In Chapter XIV of his \triangleright Biographia Literaria, Coleridge describes how the collaboration came about. He and Wordsworth had been discussing 'two cardinal points of poetry, the power of exciting the sympathy of the reader by a faithful adherence to the truth of nature, and the power of giving the interest of novelty by the modifying colours of the imagination'. They projected a volume in which Coleridge should direct himself to characters 'supernatural' or at least romantic; yet so as to transfer from our inward nature a human interest . . . sufficient to procure . . . that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment, which constitutes poetic faith'. Wordsworth's object would be to 'excite a feeling analogous to the supernatural' for everyday things the beauty of which was normally concealed by the 'film of familiarity'.

Wordsworth's Preface (1800) is a poetic manifesto attacking the 'gaudiness and inane phraseology' of poets such as ▷ Thomas Gray, who attempt to separate the language of poetry as far as possible from that of real life. Wordsworth proposes instead to fit 'to metrical arrangement a selection of the real language of men in a state of vivid sensation'. 'Humble and rustic life' is the chosen subject 'because in that condition, the essential passions of the heart find a better soil in which they can attain their maturity, are less under restraint, and speak a plainer and more emphatic language'. It is important not to oversimplify Wordsworth's aims or practice here. His language in the volume does sometimes affect the flat plainness of prose (in The Thorn for example), and at other times he employs the sing-song metre and artless repetitions of the primitive ballad ('Her eves were fair, and very fair,/ - Her beauty made me glad'). Sometimes however, as in the non-ballad > blank verse poem Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey, the philosophical, literary vocabulary of earlier reflective verse is in evidence ('tranquil restoration', 'somewhat of a sad perplexity'). At first Coleridge felt entirely at one with Wordsworth's Preface, but later, in Biographia Literaria, Chapters XVII-XX, he subjected Wordsworth's theories of poetic language to incisive analysis.

Lyttelton, George, Lord (1709–73)
Politician and poet. Opponent of ▷ Sir Robert Walpole and for a time in 1756 Chancellor of the Exchequer. ▷ James Thomson apostrophizes him in ▷ The Seasons and he was a friend of ▷ Alexander Pope, ▷ Henry Fielding and ▷ William Shenstone. His own poems include
The Progress of Love (1732), Monody to the Memory of a Lady (1747), and Dialogues of The Dead (1760–5). He also published a History of Henry II (1767).

Lytton, Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer- (1st Baron Lytton) (1803-73) > Bulwer-Lytton, Edward.

M

Mabinogion

A collection of medieval Welsh tales, some from the 14th-century Red Book of Hergest. A mabinog was a bard's apprentice. 11 tales were translated by Lady Charlotte Guest (1838); four of these are versions of still older Celtic myths and are called the 'Four Branches of the Mabinogi'. These are the true Mabinogion. The others are old British tales of Roman times, British tales of > King Arthur, and later tales of medieval romance.

➤ Wales.

Mac Flecknoe, or a Satyr upon the True-Blew-Protestant Poet, T. S. (1682) A > mock-heroic satire by > John Dryden in > pentameter > couplets, written about 1678 and published in 1682. The poem attacks > Thomas Shadwell, who is designated as the successor, or 'son' of Flecknoe, a Catholic poet previously the butt of a satire by ➤ Andrew Marvell. Shadwell had replied to Dryden's attack on > Lord Shaftesbury in > The Medal, with The Medall of John Bayes, accusing the Laureate (hence > Bayes) of atheism. Dryden countered by attacking Shadwell in > Absalom and Achitophel, Part II, and in this poem. It is a masterpiece of high-spirited lampoon, in which Dryden mocks Shadwell by making Flecknoe eulogize his 'son's' literary ineptitude and corpulence: 'The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,/ But Shadwell never deviates into sense . . . Besides his goodly Fabrick fills the eye, / And seems design'd for thoughtless Majesty.' Its conclusion, in which two specialists in the new theatrical gimmicks of pantomime send 'the yet declaiming Bard' through a trapdoor, is purely farcical, and helps to make this one of the best comic poems in the language.

Macaulay, Catharine (1731-1701) English historian and Whig (> Whig and Tory) radical. In 1760 she married the physician George Macaulay, and in 1763 began to publish her long 'anti-Royalist' History of England from the Accession of James I to that of the Brunswick Line (1763-1783) (compare, for example, ➤ Mary Astell's Tory history). Her husband died in 1766, and she became ill, but went to France in 1777 and visited the US in 1784, staying with President ➤ George Washington (1732-1799). She was abused for her second marriage to the younger William Graham. She responded to philosopher > Thomas Hobbes and > Edmund Burke, and again took issue with Burke's > Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). Her Letters on Education (1790) influenced > Mary Wollstonecraft's > Vindication of the Rights of Woman. In the Letters (addressing 'Hortensia') she wrote, 'The situation and education of women . . . is precisely that which must necessarily tend to corrupt and debilitate both the powers of mind and body.'

➤ Essay to Revive the Antient Education of Gentlewomen, An.

Bib: Ferguson, M. (ed.), First Feminists.

Macaulay, Thomas Babington (1800-50) Historian, essavist, politician and poet. He was actively on the Whig side politically; that is to say, without being a radical reformer, he had strong faith in the virtue of British parliamentary institutions. He was, from the publication of his essay on the poet John Milton (1608-74) in 1825, a constant contributor to the main Whig periodical, the > Edinburgh Review, and his History of England (1848 and 1855) is strongly marked by his political convictions. He was trained as a lawyer and became an eloquent orator; his writing has corresponding qualities of persuasiveness and vividness. As a historian he was best at impressionistic reconstruction of the past, and the same gift served him in his biographical essays on writers John Bunyan (1628-88), Oliver Goldsmith (1730-74), Samuel Johnson (1709-84), Fanny Burney (1752-1840) and the younger William Pitt. He represented the most optimistic strain of feeling in mid-19th-century England - its faith in the march of progress.

Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome (1842) were an attempt to reconstruct legendary Roman history in a way that might resemble the lost ballad poetry of ancient Rome. Though not major poetry, they are very vigorous verse with the kind of appeal that is to be found in effective ballad poetry.

Macaulay was raised to the peerage in 1857.

> Macaulay's History of England.

Bib: Trevelyan, G.M., Life and Letters; Bryant, A., Macaulay; Firth, C., A Commentary on Macaulay's History of England; Trevelyan, G.M. in Clio: a Muse; Stephen, L., in Hours in a Library; Clive, J., Thomas Babington Macaulay: The Shaping of the Historian.

Macaulay's History of England from the Accession of James II

The history (Vols. 1 & 2, 1848; 3 & 4, 1855; 5, 1861) is a thorough, detailed account of two reigns: James II (1685-8) and William III (1689-1702). It is unfinished and was originally intended to extend to the time of George I (1714-27) and further. The period covered is perhaps the most crucial for English political development. James II, a > Catholic, tried to enforce his will in the Catholic interest against Parliament, which frustrated him and expelled him from the throne in the Revolution of 1688. Parliament then summoned William from Holland to reign jointly with his wife, who was also James' daughter, Mary II (1689-94). William was the champion of the Protestant cause in Europe, and Mary was also Protestant. Macaulay's politics were strongly in the Whig parliamentary tradition and his history is an epic of the triumph of the ideas which to him gave meaning to English history. Considered as history, the work is accordingly one-sided, much more a work of historical art than of historical science; it represents what historians have come to call 'the Whig interpretation of history'.

> Histories and Chronicles.

Macauley, Dame Rose (1881-1958) Novelist, poet, travel writer and critic. Born in England, she spent part of her childhood in Italy, but returned to England for her education at Oxford High School and Somerville College Oxford. She had early experience of loss: her brother was murdered and the poet Rupert Brooke, who was her friend, died in 1915 on his way to the front in the Dardanelles. During World War I she worked as a civil servant and began a long-term relationship with a married man (until his death in 1942), which caused her exile from the Anglican Church. In London from 1916 she attended a literary salon where she met such writers as W.B. Yeats, > Arnold Bennett, ➤ Aldous Huxley and ➤ Walter de la Mare. In the 1930s she became a close friend of ➤ Virginia Woolf. She wrote war fiction, including the autobiographical Non-Combatants and Others (1016) and Told By an Idiot (1023) and, later, And No Man's Wit (1940), set in civil war Spain; a historical novel, They Were Defeated (1932); satire, in Potterism (1920). During the 1940s she published no fiction, but returned to the novel with The World My Witness (1950) and The Towers of Trebizond (1956), the first about the after-effects of World War II, as seen in the mind of a young woman living in London, and the second a more humorous work about Islam and Anglicanism. Bib: Babington Smith, C. (ed.), Letters to a Friend (1961-62); Rose Macauley (1972); Kime Scott, B. (ed.), The Gender of Modernism.

Macbeth (1605-6)

A ➤ tragedy by ➤ Shakespeare; it probably dates from 1605–6, and was first printed in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's collected works, 1623.

The material for the tragedy comes from

Raphael Holinshed's Chronicle of Scottish History (1578). Macbeth was an historical king of Scotland who reigned approximately 1040–58.
He seems to have been a capable and beneficent sovereign in spite of his usurpation of the throne and sundry acts of cruelty, and Holinshed so records him. Shakespeare blackens his character, elevates his predecessor Duncan into a kind of saint, and makes a virtuous figure out of Macbeth's associate Banquo. Banquo was the legendary ancestor of James VI of Scotland, who ascended the English throne as ▶ James I in 1603. The relative idealization of Banquo, the prominence of witchcraft – a subject that was one of King James' hobbies – and other indications show that the play was written to appeal to the king's interest. They are all put to artistic purpose by Shakespeare, however, and enhance rather than deflect from his imaginative intention.

The tragedy is the conversion of a good man into a wholly evil one. Macbeth begins as the heroic warrior who defends Scotland against a triple enemy: the king of Norway has invaded Scotland in alliance with the open rebel Macdonwald and the secret rebel Cawdor. After his victory, Macbeth is confronted by a triple enemy assailing his own soul: the witches; his own evil desires; and his wife, who reinforces these desires. He first encounters the witches. who predict that he is to be king of Scotland, after being made Thane (Lord) of Cawdor. As Macbeth knows nothing of Cawdor's part in the rebellion and invasion, both prophecies are to him equally incredible. The second is, however, immediately confirmed by emissaries from Duncan, king of Scotland. Macbeth is now lord of Cawdor and finds himself haunted by thoughts of bloodthirsty ambition: he becomes his soul's own secret enemy. The witches and his own desire would not in the end have been sufficient to cause him to murder the king, but Lady Macbeth dedicates herself to reinforcing his ambition. Macbeth is thus brought to murder Duncan, though in a state of horror at the deed, and becomes king on the flight of Duncan's son Malcolm. After the murder, however, he becomes a hardened man, though a restless and desperate one; he proceeds to the murder of Banquo, whose children the witches have predicted will succeed him on the throne, and then degenerates into massacre and tyranny. The play exemplifies one of the beliefs of Shakespeare's time, that the soul of man is the pattern of the state, and that where evil breaks into the soul of a king it will extend over the state he rules.

Macbeth was written in Shakespeare's maturest period; together with Othello, ➤ King Lear, and ➤ Antony and Cleopatra, it is accounted one of his finest tragedies.

MacCaig, Norman (b 1910)
Poet. A Scottish writer, educated at Edinburgh University, and often compared to fellow Scot ➤ Hugh MacDiarmid, MacCaig uses mainly traditional poetic forms for his witty verse, although he has also been drawn towards ➤ free verse. His publications include: Far Cry (1943); Riding Lights (1955); A Common Gate (1960); Surroundings (1967); Selected Poems (1971); Tree of Strings (1977); The Equal Skies (1980); A World of Difference (1983); Voice-Over (1988).

➤ Scottish literature in English.

MacDiarmid, Hugh (Christopher Murray Grieve) (1892–1978)

Poet and critic. A Marxist, and a leading Scottish nationalist. His outstanding contribution has been the revival of the Lowland Scottish branch of English (once called Inglis, now for literary purposes, Lallans, and still the medium of speech) as a poetic medium. The language had a distinguished literary phase about 1500, and reached another peak in the work of Robert Burns in the 18th century, but thereafter was overwhelmed by southern English. In the earlier and greater period, Scots poetry was part of the wide European tradition; Burns' excellence drew from the surviving vigour of Lowland Scots culture. MacDiarmid's success arose from his ability to follow the example of Burns in far less promising conditions, and to resist southern English modes by his awareness of the wider context of Europe. His best-known poem in Lallans is A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle. He also wrote in southern English. Complete Poems 1920-1976, ed. M. Grieve and W. R. Aitken.

➤ Scottish literature in English. Bib: Glen, D., Hugh MacDiarmid and the Scottish Renaissance.

MacDonald, George (1824-1905) Novelist and children's author (▷ children's literature), his father was a weaver in rural Aberdeenshire, Educated at Aberdeen University, MacDonald worked as a tutor in London and later trained as a Congregational minister. He served the community at Arundel from 1850 to 1853, but was dismissed from his job for heresy, whereupon he turned to journalism and lecturing for a living. MacDonald also began to produce fairy stories which were deeply influenced by his theological training in their blending of elements of Christian ➤ symbolism and mysticism. He eventually settled in London in 1859 as Professor of English Literature at Bedford College. His first three novels, David Elginbrod (1863), Alec Forbes (1865) abd Robert Falconer (1868), were set in his native Aberdeenshire and are remarkable for their attack on Calvinsim. (> John Calvin). He is chiefly remembered for > allegorical fantasies such as Phantasies, A Faerie Romance for Men and Women (1858) and Lilith (1895) and, more so, for his children's books: At the Back of the North Wind (1871), and The Princess and the Goblin (1872) and The Princess and Curdie, which are allegories of good (personified by the miner's son Curdie) and evil (goblins and other misshapen figures). These have since become children's classics. He wrote over twenty novels, many of which merge theological argument with Scottish rural manners, and he is often regarded as a precursor of the 1890s 'Kailyard' school of novelists (> Scottish Literature in English). He also produced several volumes of verse. MacDonald was a close friend of Devis Carroll, and his children were the first to hear the story of Device in Wonderland. His influence can be traced in the work of Device G.K. Chesterton, Device C.S. Lewis and Device J.R.R. Tolkein.

Bib: Wolff, R.L., The Golden Key, A Study of the Fiction of George MacDonald; Collins, R.A. and Pearce, H.D. (eds.), The Scope of the Fantastic – Culture, Biography, Themes.

McEwan, Ian (b 1948)

Novelist and short-story writer. His first collection of stories, First Love, Last Rites (1975) gained immediate notoriety for its crotic, perverse and macabre concerns, which also figure in In Between the Sheets (1978). His first novel, The Cement Garden (1978) is a story of adolescent guilt, while The Comfort of Strangers (1981) is a dream-like narrative set in Venice and ending in violence. His recent work includes The Child in Time (1987); The Innocent (1990); and Black Dogs (1992). He has also written a television play, The Imitation Game (1981) and a screenplay, The Ploughman's Lunch (1983).

McGahern, John (b 1934)

Irish novelist and short-story writer. Educated at University College Dublin. After his second novel, The Dark (1965) was banned, he lost his job as a schoolteacher in Ireland and was obliged to move to London. He has been a Research Fellow at the University of Reading, a visiting professor in the USA and Northern Arts Fellow at Newcastle University. He now lives in Ireland and teaches at University College Galway. In one of his short stories a character makes television documentaries about 'the darker aspects of Irish life' and this might serve as a description of McGahern's own fiction, which explores family tensions, and minor, mundane tragedies of loss, alienation and unfulfilment in domestic Irish settings, using a language which is generally sparse and understated, but is illuminated by colloquial vividness and humour and sometimes modulates into lyricism. His other novels are: The Barracks (1963); The Leavetaking (1974); The Pornographer (1979); Amongst Women (1990). Volumes of short stories: Nightlines (1970); Getting Through (1978); High Ground (1985); The Collected Short Stories (1992).

McGrath, John (b 1935)

One of the foremost writers of the political fringe during the 1970s and 80s. In 1971 he founded the 7:84 company (the name is based on a statistic which revealed that 7 per cent of the population owned 84 per cent of the country's wealth). The company was divided into two, between Scotland and England, in 1973. One of McGrath's most successful works was the popular entertainment The Cheviot, the Stag and the Black, Black Oil (1973), written for 7:84 Scotland. In this he compared the plundering of Scottish oil assets with the Highland Clearances. He has consistently insisted on disassociating himself from the theatre establishment and once said he would 'rather have a bad night in Bootle' than write a play for the ▶ National Theatre. His radical ideas about the politics of entertainment are recorded in his book, A Good Night Out (1981). Other plays are: The Game's a Bogey (1974); Fish in the Sea (1977); Little Red Hen (1977); Yobbo Nowt (1978); Joe's Drum (1979); Blood Red Roses (1981); Smings and Roundabouts (1981).

Machaut, Guillaume de (c 1330-77)
French poet and musician. Machaut was a prolific and influential composer of lyric poems and songs, using and developing a number of poetic forms (eg ▷ ballade, ▷ rondeau). His narrative poetry includes several ▷ dreamvision poems, exploring problems of love and its literary representation, which influenced the form and structure of ▷ Chaucer's dreamvision poetry, especially the ▷ Book of the Duchess.

Bib: Wimsatt, J., Chaucer and the French Love Poets: the Literary background of the 'Book of the Duchess'; Windeatt, B. (trans.), Chaucer's Dream Poetry: Sources and Analogues.

Macheath

Central character in ➤ Gay's ➤ The Beggar's Opera. Macheath is a highwayman and sexual adventurer, who bigamously marries ➤ Polly Peachum and Lucy Lockit, at the same time conducting a series of other amours. Betrayed by one of his other women, he is sentenced to be hanged. He is reprieved at the last minute, when one of the players in the comedy demands a happy ending, and throws in his lot with Polly. The resolution is a ➤ satiric reversal of the contemporary dramatic vogue for administering poetic justice.

Machen, Arthur (1863-1947)

Novelist and short story writer. Born in Caerleon, Monmouthshire, Arthur Machen migrated to London to become a journalist. He is best known for his tales of the occult, influenced by his interest in Arthurian legend and Celtic and pre-Christian religions. This permeates much of his work, a section of his output appearing first in the London Evening News between 1910 and 1914. His short story collections comprise: The House of Souls (1906); The Shining Pyramid (1925); The Green Round (1933); The Cosy Room (1936); and The Children of the Pool (1936); a novella, The Great Return (1915); and his novels: The Hill of Dreams (1907); The Terror (1917); and The Secret Glory (1922). His autobiography appeared in two volumes, Far Off Things (1922) and Near and Far (1923).

Far (1923). Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Machiavelli, Nicolo di Bernardo dei (1469-1527)

Italian political theorist and historian. Machiavelli can be thought of as having two discrete existences. One is that of the Florentine diplomat, author of the comedy La Mandragola (1518) and of a series of important treatises on politics and statecraft: The Prince (1513), Art of War (1520) and The Discourses (1531). The other existence, however, is that which haunted the imagination of English writers in the 16th century and later, when Machiavelli's reputation as a cynical, cunning and diabolic figure emerges. In fact, Machiavelli's own works were very little known in England (other than by unreliable report) until a translation of The Prince appeared in 1640, though translations of his Art of War and portions of his historical works had been translated and published in 1560 and 1593 respectively. Nevertheless, it is this image of Machiavelli which became influential in England, as is evidenced by > Christopher Marlowe's creation of the stagefigure Machevill in his play > The Jew of Malta. We can perhaps best understand this image of the Italian thinker in England as the embodiment, or focus, of a network of anxieties experienced within the emergent Protestant state, and directed outwards on the threatening presence of continental (and Catholic) Europe. Bib: Gilmore, M. P. (ed.), Studies on Machiavelli.

McIlvanney, William (b 1936)

Novelist. Born in Kilmarnock in Scotland he attended Glasgow University and after teacher training college worked as a school teacher from 1959 until 1977, when he turned to writing full time. Docherty (1975) is the story of Tam Docherty, a miner of great strength, courage, integrity and political conviction. Within a close-knit working-class community he struggles against poverty, war and a harsh economic system in support of his family and friends and is worn down but never wholly defeated. Other novels: Remedy is None (1966); A Gift from Nessus (1968); Laidlaw (1977); The Papers of Tony Veitch (1983). The Longships in Harbour (1970) is a volume of poems and 'Growing up in the West' (in Memoirs of a Modern Scotland, 1970, ed. K. Miller) is an autobiographical essay.

Bib: Murray, I. and Tait, B. (eds), Ten Modern Scottish Novels.

Mackenzie, Compton (1883–1972) Novelist. Son of a British actor-manager and an American actress. A very prolific writer of great popularity; his best-known novels are probably Sinister Street (1913–14) and The Four Winds of Love – a sequence composed of The East Wind (1937), The South Wind (1937), The West Wind (1940), West to North (1940), The North Wind (1944-5). When he began writing, ➤ Henry James regarded him as one of the most promising of younger novelists, and ➤ Ford Madox Ford thought Sinister Street perhaps a work of genius. However, other critics have rarely given him extensive attention.

Bib: Dooley, D. T., Compton Mackenzie; Linklater, A., Compton Mackenzie: A Life.

Mackenzie, Henry (1745–1831)
Scottish novelist and magazine editor. His novel The Man of Feeling (1771) epitomized the 18th-century cult of ▷ sensibility. His second novel, The Man of the World (1773), has a villainous hero in contrast to the sensitive, benevolent and unworldly hero of his first book. He also published Julia de Roubigné (1777), which shows the influence of ▷ Richardson, and a play, The Prince of Tunis (1773).

McKerrow, R. B. (Ronald Brownlees) (1872–1940)

Editor and bibliographer who was co-founder of the Malone Society (1906), dedicated to the study and editing of early and often neglected English drama. He wrote the seminal An Introduction to Bibliography for Literary Students (1927). He was one of the driving forces behind the 'New Bibliography' and is the author of the important Prolegomena (1939) for an Oxford edition of > Shakespeare's works. This latter, which aimed at discovering an editorial methodology from ten selected texts, has proved an important milestone on the road to the new and revisionary Oxford University Press Shakespeare edited by Gary Taylor and Stanley Wells.

Macklin, Charles (1699-1797)

Actor, manager, singer, dancer, dramatist.
Macklin began employment as a scout at Trinity College Dublin, and came to London as a waiter before 1720. Some of his early stage performances were at ➤ Lincoln's Inn Fields, and in the next few years, he acted at ➤ Goodman's Fields Theatre, the ➤ Haymarket
Theatre and ➤ Drury Lane.

In 1741 he astonished audiences with a radical new interpretation of the role of Shylock in ➤ The Merchant of Venice, hitherto played for many years in low buffoonish style. Macklin presented him as a harsh, stern character, dressed 'authentically' with a red Venetian-style hat and red beard, and a long black gown. The response was repeated thunderous applause, such that he had to stop at the ends of several speeches to allow it to die away. His performance was recalled in detail by some spectators for decades afterwards. Its naturalism helped to render ▶ James Quin's elaborate and stylized methods obsolete, and set a precedent for the ultimately more successful actor, ➤ David Garrick, whom Macklin then began to sponsor and coach.

Subsequent years of Macklin's career were mainly divided between Dublin and London, but in 1773 he caused another sensation by creating a ▶ Macbeth in 'the old Caledonian habit', instead of the scarlet coat and wig worn, for example, by Garrick in the role. By the 1780s, Macklin's advanced age and failing health began to interfere seriously with his performances and he was finally forced to retire in 1789, after a career lasting nearly 70 years.

Macklin's achievements, and his reputation, have been somewhat obscured by those of his younger, more personable and physically more attractive contemporary, David Garrick, who perfected the acting style which Macklin initiated. Macklin trained a generation of actors and actresses in his methods, and he is credited with turning acting into a 'science', a tribute to the seriousness with which he took his profession, and to his imaginative abilities. His career was constantly interrupted by squabbles with other actors and managers, fuelled by his notorious temper.

Bib: Appleton, W., Charles Macklin an Actor's Life; Kirkman, J. T., Memoirs of the Life of Charles Macklin; Congreve, F., Authentic Memoirs of the Late Charles Macklin.

Macmillan's Magazine

It was founded in 1859 and published a variety of material, including pieces by ➤ Tennyson, ➤ Matthew Arnold, ➤ Henry James and ➤ Thomas Hardy. It folded in 1907.

MacNeice, Louis (1907-63)

English Poetry.

Poet. He was born in Northern Ireland, the son of an Anglican clergyman who became a bishop. During the 1930s he was associated by the reading public with a group of leftwing poets led by > W. H. Auden. They were certainly his friends, but, although he had socialist sympathies, he never committed himself politically; in politics, as in religion, he was ➤ agnostic. He excelled in witty, sensuous verse of rhythmical versatility and with a strong element of caustic pessimism. He also wrote criticism, notably The Poetry of W. B. Yeats (1941), numerous plays for radio, and translated the Agamemnon of Aeschylus (1936) and Goethe's Faust (1951). He collaborated with Auden in Letters from Iceland (1937). Collected Poems, ed. E. R. Dodds (1979). Bib: Fraser, G. S., in Vision and Rhetoric; Thwaite, A., Essays on Contemporary

Macpherson, James (1736–96)
The son of a farmer, educated in Aberdeen and at Edinburgh University. In 1760 he published 16 prose poems under the title Fragments of Ancient Poetry, Collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language. He attributed them to the 3rdcentury poet ▷ Ossian, an attribution which was accepted by most readers at the time, though some scholars were sceptical. After travelling in the Western Isles in 1760-61 at the expense of his supporters in Edinburgh, he published 'translations' of two complete epics by Ossian: Fingal (1762) and Temora (1763), which he claimed to have similarly 'collected'. The cloudy rhetoric and dramatic character simplification of Macpherson's prose-poetry caught the mood of the moment. > Thomas Grav was enraptured by 'the infinite beauty' of the Fragments, > William Blake was adulatory about them, and Macpherson's Ossian retained its popularity throughout the > Romantic period, particularly on the continent. > Goethe admired it; > Napoleon carried a copy of Macpherson on his campaigns and took it into exile with him to St Helena. > Samuel Johnson was amongst those who attacked the authenticity of Macpherson's sources, replying when asked if he believed that any modern man could have written such works: 'Yes Sir, many men, many women, and many children.' The indignant poet threatened him with physical violence. In later years Macpherson became a political journalist, wrote history with a Jacobite bias, and was elected MP for Camelford. After his death the Highland Society of Scotland undertook an inquiry into his work and in 1805 declared it to be an amalgam of freely adapted Irish ballads and original compositions by Macpherson himself.

▶ Percy, Thomas.

Madrigal

A poem composed to be sung, with or without instrumental accompaniment. It derived from the Italian 'canzone', and flourished in England especially between 1580 and 1630; one of its main practitioners is said to be >> William Byrd, although he himself did not consider his songs to be madrigals. It was sung chorally, and had three forms:

The Ayre. This had a melody composed for the top voice, which was accompanied by the other voices to the same melody.

2 The Ballet. This resembled the ayre, but was distinguished by its dance-like melody and refrain.

3 The Madrigal proper. This had different 'parts', ie melodies, for the individual voices, and was so composed that the melodies interwove. The parts were sometimes composed with the effect of dramatic contrast, eg by Thomas Weelkes (?1575–1623). Great attention was paid by composers to bringing out the meaning of the words, so that poets and musicians worked in close collaboration. Only ➤ Thomas Campion is known to have composed music for his own words, but others are believed to have done so. Ayres and madrigals are common in the plays of the period, and most of the poets wrote them.

Maeterlinck, Maurice (1862–1949)
Belgian ▷ symbolist dramatist, influential in the development of 'serious' drama at the end of the 19th century. His most famous work is Pelleas et Melisande, produced in London in 1898, and again in 1904 with Sarah Bernhardt as Pelleas and Mrs Patrick Campbell as Melisande. His plays were admired by the poet W.B. Yeats (1865–1939) and actor and dramatist Harvey Granville Barker (1877–1946); Aglavaine and Selysette was given six performances at the Court Theatre in 1904.
Bib: Knapp, B., Maurice Maeterlinck.

Magazine

Originally meaning 'storehouse', the word has also denoted, since the 18th century, a periodical containing miscellaneous material, eg the Gentleman's Magazine (founded 1731): 'a Monthly Collection to store up, as in a Magazine, the most remarkable pieces on the subjects above-mentioned' (from the introduction to the first number). In the 18th and early 19th century magazines only differed from other serious periodicals (eg the ➤ Edinburgh Review and the > Quarterly) in having greater variety of content and being open to imaginative writing. Distinguished magazines of this kind include > Blackwood's and the second > London Magazine (1820-29). Later in the 19th century, magazines became predominantly popular periodicals devoted principally to fiction. However, serious magazines still exist, eg the current London Magazine, the third to bear the name. Since World War II magazines have often been seen as synonymous with reading matter specifically directed at women; examples are Vogue, Cosmopolitan, and the feminist magazines Spare Rib and Everywoman. Whilst literary magazines have declined in popularity, one of the current best-selling magazines in Britain is the TV listings publication, Radio Times. See Wellesley Index to Periodicals.

Magic realism

A term applied in literature primarily to Latin American novelists such as ▷ Jorge Luis Borges (1899–1987), Gabriel García Márquez (b 1928) and Alejo Carpentier (b 1904), whose work combines a realistic manner with strong elements of the bizarre, supernatural and fantastic. This technique has influenced novelists such as ▷ John Fowles, ▷ Angela Carter and ▷ Salman Rushdie.

> Spanish influence on English fiction.

Magna Carta

The Great Charter which ➤ King John was forced by his barons to accept in 1215. It has long been popularly regarded as the foundation of English liberties, guaranteeing such rights as freedom from arbitrary imprisonment. However, 16th-century plays on King John, eg ➤ Shakespeare's, omit mention of the Charter, which came to have its modern symbolic importance only in consequence of the conflicts between kings and parliaments in the 17th century.

Mahon, Derek (b 1941)

Poet. Mahon was born in Belfast and educated at Dublin, and has lectured at the universities of Sussex and Ulster. Along with fellow poets James Simmons, ▶ Paul Muldoon, ▶ Seamus Heaney and Michael Longley, he is an important figure in the Northern Irish renaissance in contemporary poetry. See Night Crossing (1968); Beyond Howth (1970); Lives (1972); The Snow Party (1975); Light Music (1977); Poems 1962–1978 (1979); and Selected Poems (1991).

> Irish literature in English.

Maid Marian (1822)

➤ Thomas Love Peacock's parody of ➤ medieval romances (such as ➤ Scott's ➤ Ivanhoe, 1819) fashionable in the early 19th century. It contains very good songs in comic opera style.

Maids Tragedy, The (1610)

A play by ➤ Francis Beaumont and ➤ John Fletcher. It takes place in the town of Rhodes, and the story concerns the attempt of the king to conceal his relationship with his mistress, Evadne, by forcing one of his most loyal courtiers, Amintor, to marry her. Aspasia, the 'maid' of the tragedy, is the girl whom Amintor has to give up. Evadne's brother, Melantius, discovers the unhappy secret and compels his sister to murder the king; she then commits suicide on finding that Amintor will not forgive her.

The tragedy is generally considered to be Beaumont and Fletcher's masterpiece. It is typical of later ▷ Jacobean tragedy in relying for its effectiveness on individual scenes rather than on its totality, which is unconvincing. It is typical of Beaumont and Fletcher in the accomplished melody of its ▷ blank verse and the skill of its theatrical craftmanship.

Maitland, Sara (b 1950)

Novelist, short-story writer. She was educated at St Anne's College Oxford, and is a member of the Feminist Writers Group, a group of women writers who share socialist and feminist convictions. Another member is > Michèle Roberts, who shares with Maitland an interest in the relations of Christianity with feminism and women's sexuality, an interest reflected in Maitland's novel Virgin Territory (1984), about tension between lesbian love and Christianity. The group also includes Michelene Wandor (with whom Maitland co-wrote a post-modernist epistolary novel, Arky Types, 1987), > Zoë Fairbairns and Valerie Miner. They collectively produced a volume of short stories, interspersed with direct political statements and entitled Tales I Tell My Mother (1978); the stories were written individually but discussed and revised collectively. The blending of realism and fantasy which has emerged as an important feminist strategy (for example in the work of > Angela Carter) is apparent in Maitland's novel Three Times Table (1990), which explores the lives of three women in London but includes dragons as well as dialogue. Home Truths (1993) is a novel about family conflicts and memory lost and regained. Maitland's other works include her novel Daughter of Jerusalem (1978), Very Heaven: Looking Back at the Sixties (1988) and The Rushdie File (1989), edited with Lisa Appignanesi, Maitland joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1993.

Makin, Bathsua (1612-c 1680)

Educationalist and poet, Her poetry, Musa Virginea (1616), is a multilingual collection dedicated to various members of the royal family, but it is for her role as a teacher of women that Makin is best known. In the early 1640s she was appointed tutor to Princess Elizabeth, the sister of ➤ Charles II, and following the Restoration of the monarchy she opened a school at Tottenham High Cross and advertised it with the publication of An Essay to Revive the Antient Education of Gentlewomen (1673). Dedicated to the princesses Anne and Mary (somewhat inappropriately, since their father opposed the education of women), this treatise sets out the benefits of a scholarly education for women and cites numerous examples, including > Elizabeth I, ➤ Ann Bradstreet and ➤ Katherine Philips, to prove her argument. Oddly, Makin takes on a male persona in the book and is very careful to assert that schooling for girls will not make them equal with boys, but better wives. Rather than dismiss Makin as simply accepting the renewed repression of women in Restoration monarchist circles, it is important to realize that she was attempting to win custom for her school and was, within certain confines, offering women the education necessary for independent and fulfilled lives.

Bib: Hobby, E., Virtue of Necessity; Fraser, A., The Weaker Vessel.

Malaprop, Mrs

A character in ➤ Richard Brinsley Sheridan's comedy ➤ The Rivals. She is the aunt and guardian of the heroine, Lydia Languish. Her principal comic effect is her habit of misusing words; this has given rise to the term 'malapropism'.

Malcontent, The (1604)

A ⊳ tragicomedy by ⊳ John Marston, with additions by > John Webster. An intrigue engineered by the villainous Lord Mendoza has caused the deposition of Giovanni Altofronto, the noble Duke of Genoa, and substituted the weak Pietro Jacomo, who is married to Aurelia, daughter of the Duke of Florence. Altofronto, however, has returned to his own court in disguise as Malevole (the 'malcontent'). He is tolerated as a witty though sour court jester and commentator on the times and its corrupt manners. Meanwhile he awaits his chance for revenge and the recovery of his dukedom. Mendoza continues to conspire against the new duke, whose wife is Mendoza's mistress, and Malevole in turn conspires against Mendoza. In the end, Mendoza is exposed, and Pietro and Aurelia penitently resign the duchy back to the rightful duke.

The play is part ▷ satire and part ▷ revenge play, midway between ▷ Ben Jonson's comedies of ▷ humours (eg ▷ Volpone) and ▷ Tourneur's ▷ Revenger's Tragedy. The malcontent role of bitter commentator on society is a common one in ▷ Jacobean drama; ▷ Bosola in ▷ Webster's ▷ Duchess of Malfi is a well-known example, but ▷ Hamlet, Iago (in ▷ Othello) and Thersites in ▷ Troilus and Cressida all have some aspects of the malcontent in their parts. The essence of the role is that the malcontent is somehow frustrated from satisfying his ambitions or being accepted by the rest of society; such exclusion gives him the motives (morally acceptable or otherwise) and the detachment for his satire.

Malet, Lucas (1852-1931)

> Pseudonym of novelist Mary Kingsley, the daughter of novelist ➤ Charles Kingsley. The pseudonym was adopted to avoid capitalizing on the family's literary fame. Mrs Lorimer: A Sketch in Black and White (1882) was Malet's first novel, and she continued to write until her death, producing more than twenty works, including Colonel Enderby's Wife (1885); The Wages of Sin (1891); The Gateless Barrier (1900); The Far Horizon (1906); Deadham Hard (1919); The Survivors (1923) and The Dogs of Want (1924). Her style is prolix and often sentimental, her characterization and detail typically 19thrather than 20th-century, yet her contribution to literature was recognized when she was awarded a civic pension in 1930.

Malgonkar, Manohar (b 1913)

Indian novelist and short-story writer. Educated at Bombay University, he has been an officer in the Maratha Light Infantry, a big game hunter, a civil servant, a mine owner and a farmer, as well as standing for parliament. He is primarily a novelist of action and adventure, with a Conradian (> Joseph Conrad) stress on the stuggles of the individual; he uses Indian historical settings such as the Indian Munity, the last years of the Raj and the aftermath of Independence and Partition in 1947. His novels are: Distant Drum (1960); Combat of Shadows (1962); The Princes (1963); A Bend in the Ganges (1964); The Devil's Wind: Nana Saheb's Story (1972); Shalimar (1978); The Garland Keepers (1980); Bandicoot Run (1982). Volumes of short stories: A Toast in Warm Wine (1974); In Uniform (1975); Bombay Beware (1975); Rumble-Tumble (1972). He has also written biography, popular history and a screenplay. Bib: Naipaul, V.S., An Area of Darkness; Dayananda, J.Y., Manohar Malgonkar.

Mallarmé Stéphane

➤ Symbolism.

Mallet (Malloch), David (?1705–65)
Poet. On moving from ▷ Edinburgh to London he expunged the Scotticisms from his speech and changed his name from the Scottish Malloch to the English Mallet. He is remembered for his collaboration with ▷ James Thomson on the ▷ masque Alfred (1740), and also for his ▷ ballad William and Margaret (1724), which anticipates the ▷ Gothic fashion in popular taste, and was reprinted in ▷ Thomas Percy's Reliques under the title Margaret's Ghost.

Mallock, W. H. (William Hurrell) (1849–1923) A ▷ Catholic controversialist now best known for his satirical novel The New Republic (1877), portraying leading members of the Victorian intelligentsia, including John Ruskin, Matthew Arnold, Walter Pater and Thomas Huxley. He wrote a number of books on social questions against socialism. His Memoirs of Life and Literature was published in 1920.

Bib: Adams, A. B., The Novels of W. H. Mallock; Wolf, R. L., Gains and Losses: Novels of Faith and Doubt in Victorian England.

Malone, Edmund (1741-1812)

The greatest early editor of > Shakespeare's works, many of whose textual emendations and editorial principles are still widely used. His greatest work remains his posthumously published edition of the complete Shakespeare (1821) and his research on the order in which Shakespeare's plays were written. He was also the first to denounce the Shakespearean forgeries of William Henry Ireland (1775–1835), one of whose fake plays, Vortigern and Rowena, was performed as Shakespeare's at > Drury Lane.

➤ Shakespeare editions.

Malory, Thomas

Identifying which Thomas Malory produced the work known as the > Morte D'Arthur in around 1469/70 remains a controversial issue. Sir Thomas Malory of Newbold Revel (c 1446-71) is the most generally accepted candidate for the role. He was in the service of the Earl of Warwick in the French wars (c 1414), and by 1440 was established as a country gentleman, being knighted in 1442. After 1450 his public standing seems to have radically declined. His extensive spells in prison (on a range of charges including rape) after 1450 may have provided the opportunity for his literary labour. Although it is possible to recreate the public life of this Sir Thomas Malory, there is no documentation which sheds any light on his literary career. Bib: Lacy, N. et al. (ed.), The Arthurian Encyclopaedia; Riddy, F., Sir Thomas Malory.

Malthus, Thomas Robert (1766–1834) Economist; particularly famous for his Essay on Population (1798), which he reissued in an expanded and altered form in 1803. Its original title was: An Essay on the Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society, with Remarks on the Speculations of Mr Godwin, M. Condorcet, and other Writers.

The essence of his view was that social progress tends to be limited by the fact that population increases more rapidly than the means of subsistence, and always reaches the limits of subsistence, so that a substantial part of society is doomed to live beyond the margin of poverty. The 'natural checks' which prevent population increase from exceeding the means of subsistence are war, famine, and pestilence, to which he added human misery and vice. In the second edition he added a further possible check by 'moral restraint', ie late marriages and sexual continence. These arguments made a strong impression on public opinion; an important practical consequence of them was the replacement of the existing haphazard methods of poor relief by the harsh but reasoned and systematic ➤ Poor Law system of 1834.

Malthus' relentless and pitiless reasoning led to political economy becoming known as the ▷ 'dismal science'. His conclusions were contested by humanitarians, and later seemed belied by factors he did not foresee, such as cheap imports of food from newly exploited colonies like Canada. Since 1918 'Malthusian' theories of the dangers of over-population have revived.

Darwin, Charles Robert.

Man in Black, The

A character in the collection of essays by

Oliver Goldsmith entitled The Citizen of the World (1762). He is prodigiously generous, but his sensibility causes him to conceal this virtue by pretending to be mean.

Man of Law's Tale, The
One of ➤ Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, written in > rhyme royal, recounting the story of Constance, daughter of a Christian emperor, whose adventures are triggered by her marriage to the Sultan of Syria (who agrees to convert to the religion of his wife). Constance becomes the victim of a plot organized by the Sultan's mother, a confirmed pagan, and is cast adrift on the sea. She is providentially protected on her journey but becomes a victim of vet another plot by a pagan mother-in-law, after her conversion of, and marriage to, the King of Northumberland. After further ordeals she is eventually reunited with all members of her family in Rome. The basic narrative paradigm has analogues in other examples of pious romances which have a constant woman at their centre (notably the Middle English romance Emaré), and ➤ John Gower tells a version of the story of Constance in Book II of the ➤ Confessio Amantis. The tale is prefaced by a wry complaint from the Man of Law, who claims to have difficulty in finding a story to tell because Chaucer has told them all before.

Man of Mode, The: Or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676)

Third and last play by the Restoration dramatist, ⊳ Sir George Etherege, written in the > Comedy of Manners' style, and generally held to be his best. It concerns the amours of Dorimant, a rake whose character is probably based on that of the > Earl of Rochester. He pursues, and then rejects, first the infatuated Mrs Loveit and then her supposed friend, the weak and stupid Bellinda, who intrigues with him in secret. He ends up with the wealthy and beautiful Harriet, who has held out against his wiles until he has promised to marry her. A subplot concerns the wooing of Young Bellair and Emilia. The title derives from the foolish Sir Fopling Flutter, a minor figure who personifies slavery to fashion. Dorimant's chief charm is his acerbic wit; otherwise he is a portrait of a misogynist, who takes as much delight in hurting women as in seducing them. The play's tone is cynical rather than satirical, and the overall effect one of brilliance, but with a deeply disturbing note.

Manchester Guardian, The

It was started in 1821 as a weekly paper, becoming daily in 1855. As the leading Liberal publication outside London, it was edited from 1872 to 1929 by C. P. Scott. Its title was changed to The Guardian in 1959, and since 1961 it has been published from London. It is considered to be one of the more liberal or left-wing papers.

Manciple's Tale, The

One of > Chaucer's > Canterbury Tales, an animal fable which tells the story of the metamorphosis of a tell-tale crow (based primarily on > Ovid's Metamorphoses ii, though > John Gower also tells the story in the > Confessio Amantis). The Manciple recounts how Phoebus fosters a white crow whom he teaches to speak and through whom he learns of his wife's adultery. In his rage, Phoebus kills his wife, and then blames the crow for his action. He plucks out all its feathers, deprives it of the faculty of speech and throws the bird to the Devil: from that time onwards, the narrator explains, all crows are black. The Tale concludes with a moralizing rant about the need to keep 'mum' and never to pass on stories.

Mandeville, Bernard de (1670?-1733) Of Dutch birth, Mandeville made his career in London as a doctor. His satire in Hudibrastic (> Hudibras) > couplets The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves turn'd Honest (1705) was reissued with accompanying prose essays in 1714 as The Fable of the Bees; or Private Vices, Public Benefits. Mandeville followed through the economic implications of the new bourgeois individualistic ethic with enthusiastic gusto, arguing that the greatest social good was generated by allowing the individual the maximum freedom to pursue private self-interest. The hive thrives so long as this principle is respected: 'Thus every Part was full of Vice,/Yet the whole Mass a paradise'. But once the > Puritan moralist camp among the bees takes control, demand for luxuries and corrupt pleasures disappears, enterprise declines and the hive is ruined. The prose > essays defend public brothels, argue that without the wasteful luxury of the rich the poor would starve, and doubt the utility of Christian morality in the conduct of war. Mandeville delighted in driving uncomfortable wedges between the economic and religious components of the new bourgeois consensus, and, like a kind of conservative George Bernard Shaw he expounded unpalatable truths with unabashed vigour. His pungent intellectual honesty offended optimistic > Deists and pious Puritans alike, and it proved easier for writers such as the cleric William Law (1686–1761) to attack him as a scoffing blasphemer, than to answer his impressive logic.

Manfred (1817)

A dramatic poem in ▷ blank verse by ▷ Lord Byron, set in the Alps. It focuses on the typical Byronic hero, outcast from society and haunted by the guilt of unnamed crimes. Manfred conjures up the Spirits of earth and air, the Witch of the Alps, the Destinies and Nemesis, and beseeches them in vain for oblivion. He eventually dies absolved, however, saved from the clutches of the evil spirits who claim his soul by the intervention of Astarte, the spirit of the woman whom he had loved. The poem, reminiscent of ▷ Goethe's Faust, was very popular throughout the 19th century, Schumann and Tchaikovsky basing major musical compositions upon it. Byron himself referred to it in a letter as 'a sort of mad drama'.

Mankind

A ➤ morality play, dating from c 1465-70, seemingly designed for performance by a small professional or semi-professional group (the collection of money for performance is built into the play text). The plot recounts an exemplary incident in the life of its central character, Mankind, who allows himself to be distracted almost to damnation by a rowdy, bawdy trio (New-Guise, Now-a-Days, Nought) directed by the devil Titivellus (a demonic figure traditionally associated with loose speech). Mankind's repentance brings the aid of Mercy. The play draws attention to the pleasures and dangers of the dramatic medium itself, and toys with its own audience's commitment to dramatic distraction.

Bib: Eccles, M. (ed.), Macro Plays.

Manley, Delarivière (?1663-1724)

Playwright and novelist. Manley's unconventional lifestyle led to many scandalous strictures. She married her cousin John Manley at an early age, only to find he was already married, and on making this discovery left him, although she was pregnant and had no means of support. For some months she lived in the household of the Duchess of Cleveland, acting as secretary and companion, but left her patronage after rumours of an affair with the Duchess's son.

For some time she seems to have lived in the country, returning to London in 1696, when two of her plays were performed: The Lost Lover or the Jealous Husband and The Royal Mischief. At this time she became the mistress of John Tilly, the Warden of Fleet Prison.

In 1705 Manley's novel The Secret History of Queen Zarah appeared, and proved an enormous success. In its use of a mythical society to satirize contemporary English life, it set the pattern for her later roman à clef, The New Atalantis (1709). In 1711 Manley succeeded > Jonathan Swift as editor of > The Examiner, and in the course of her writing career produced many political pamphlets. In 1714 The Adventures of Rivella, apparently a fictionalized autobiography, appeared. Her final achievement was a series of novels, The Power of Love, published in 1720.

Manners, Comedy of

A form in which laughter is provoked by exaggerations of fashionable behaviour, absurdities in fashion itself, or departures from what is considered to be civilized normality of behaviour. Thus a comedy of manners can only arise in a highly developed society, in which there is a leisured class which not only has standards of politeness and good sense in human relationships but tends to give such standards first importance in social life. The ▷ Comedy of Humours of > Ben Jonson and his younger contemporaries dealt with fundamental human appetites, and was therefore concerned with much more than what was regarded as civilized behaviour by fashionable society, though that was often included in their purview. In the court of the French king Louis XIV in the second half of the 17th century, a highly civilized society held to a code of behaviour which was also a code of morals; the comedies of > Molière were the first true examples of the Comedy of Manners, and had profundity as well as surface brilliance. His comedy influenced dramatists in England. The Comedy of Manners in England is not so much a pure variety of drama, as a framework for plays with a witty, > satiric atmosphere, and social comment, which may also contain other elements, such as ▷ Spanish Intrigue, Humours, ▷ Reform, etc. The bestknown comedies of this type were written after the Restoration of ▶ Charles II in 1660. Many involve a critique of marriage, and re-assessment of relations between the sexes, and of women's role in society. The plays are often sexually explicit, contributing to a growing reaction against them in the 18th and 19th centuries when, as standards of polite and rational behaviour extended through society, and audiences became more heterogeneous. drama tended to become more middle class, and to show more propriety. ➤ Goldsmith and ▶ Richard Brinsley Sheridan reacted to what they considered excessive sentimentalism in the works of some of their contemporaries, and consciously revived the spirit of Comedy of Manners in their plays, though these were never as bawdy as those of any of their predecessors.

Manning, Olivia (1915-80)

Novelist and short-story writer. Her major work is The Balkan Trilogy set in Romania, Greece and Egypt during the early stages of World War II, and which consists of: The Great Fortune (1960); The Spoilt City (1962) and Friends and Heroes (1965). It is told primarily through the consciousness of a newly married Englishwoman, and builds up a strong sense of place and of history through the portraval of a wide range of characters and the accumulation of details of daily experience. The story is continued in The Levant Trilogy: The Danger Tree (1977); The Battle Lost and Won (1978); The Sum of Things (1980). Other novels: The Wind Changes (1937); Artist Among the Missing (1949); School for Love (1951); A Different Face (1953); The Doves of Venus (1955); The Rain Forest (1974). Story collections: Growing Up (1948); My Husband Cartwright (1956); A Romantic Hero (1967).

Mannyng, Robert (fl 1288–1338) Writer and chronicler. Robert Mannyng is one of the few Middle English writers to offer autobiographical details in their work. From the information he provides in the prologues of his two works, it seems Mannyng (a native of Bourne in Lincolnshire) entered the Gilbertine order at an early age, was sent to Cambridge and then began his translation (Handlyng Synne) of the ➤ Anglo-Norman Manuel de Pechiez in 1303. Some time later, at the Gilbertine house of Sixhills, he produced a chronicle history of England, which he finished in 1338. Handlyng Synne is a book of doctrinal instruction, describing and illustrating the Ten Commandments/ Seven Deadly Sins/ Sacrilege/ Seven Sacraments/ Shrift; it follows the model of its Anglo-Norman source but Mannyng adds new exemplary narratives which liven the text considerably. His expanded story of the 'Dancers of Colbeck' appears in the Sacrilege section Mannyng's Chronicle covers the foundation and history of Britain (following ➤ Wace's Roman de Brut with additions from ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth and ➤ Bede) and the history of England up to 1307 (following the Anglo-Norman Chronicle of Pierre de Langtoft). In both works he comments on the sources he uses, acknowledges his additions and remarks on the function of his translations into English. In the Chronicle he adds some interesting comments on the paucity of Arthurian material available in English and defends the historicity of ➤ King Arthur.

Bib: Sullens, Idelle (ed.), Handlyng Synne; Furnivall, F. J. (ed.), The Story of England by Robert Mannyng of Brunne.

Mansfield, Katherine (1888-1923) Short-story writer. Born (Kathleen Mansfield Beauchamp) in Wellington, New Zealand; married the critic > John Middleton Murry in 1913. Her story collections (several of which were published posthumously) are: In a German Pension (1911); Je Ne Parle Pas Français (1918); Bliss (1920); The Garden Party (1922); The Dove's Nest (1923); Something Childish (1924); The Aloe (1930); Collected Stories (1945). Her Journal (1927, enlarged edition 1934) and Letters (1928) were edited by Murry. The stories resemble in their form those of the Russian writer Chekhov, and
 James Joyce's
 Dubliners; they do not have a distinct plot with a definite beginning and ending and a self-sufficient action, conveying instead an impression of continuity with ordinary life, and depending for their unity on delicate balance of detail and feeling. She contributed to the development of the > stream of consciousness technique, and to the > modernist use of multiple viewpoints. Bib: Alpers, A., The Life of Katherine Mansfield; Hanson, C., and Gurr, A., Katherine Mansfield.

Mansfield Park (1814)
A novel by ▶ Jane Austen. The theme is the conflict between three different styles of moral feeling. The first is that of Sir Thomas Bertram, owner of Mansfield Park; it stands for a system of conservative, orderly principle, a tradition inherited from the 18th century, emphasizing stability and discounting the feelings. The second style of moral feeling is embodied in Fanny Price, Sir Thomas' niece whom he takes into his household because her parents are poor and their family too large; although she is timid, withdrawn and overawed by her new surroundings, she possesses a highly developed sensibility and capacity for affection both of which are foreign to the Bertrams, except to the younger son, Edmund, who to some degree appreciates her. The third style is represented by Henry and Mary Crawford, half-brother and half-sister to the wife of the village parson. They are rich, independent, attractive; they do not share Sir Thomas' cold theories, and they do possess Fanny's capacity for ardent feeling; on the other hand, they are without Sir Thomas' dedication to conscience and without Fanny's reverence for consistency of moral with affectionate and aesthetic sensibilities. The difference between the three styles of life becomes overt while Sir Thomas is absent in the West Indies; the Crawfords virtually take over Mansfield Park in order to rehearse, with the Bertram children and two guests, a performance of Kotzebue's Lovers' Vows. Henry Crawford is by this time conducting a flirtation with Maria Bertram, who is engaged to one of the guests, Mr Rushworth, and Mary Crawford is in love with Edmund; these relationships are in effect parodied in the play (popular in Jane Austen's time) so that the characters can perform on the stage what they desire to enact in real life. Fanny, knowing that Sir Thomas would disapprove of amateur acting, refuses to take part, but the situation is painful to her because she is secretly in love with Edmund herself. The rehearsals are stopped by Sir Thomas' sudden return, but a new crisis occurs in Fanny's life when Henry, awakened to the reality of her diffident charms, proposes marriage to her. She refuses him, much to Sir Thomas' uncomprehending disapproval, and is not in a position to explain to him the grounds of her refusal: that she disapproves of Henry morally and is in love with his son. She is exiled to her own family at Portsmouth, where disorder and strong emotion, often reduced to callous bad temper by poverty and overcrowding, are the rule. Henry is for a time constant, but he disgraces himself, the Bertrams and his sister by eloping with Maria after she has married. By degrees, both Sir Thomas and Edmund came to appreciate Fanny at her true value, and at the end of the novel she is to become Edmund's wife.

Of Jane Austen's completed works Mansfield Park is the most direct criticism of the Regency style of sensibility (represented by the Crawfords), with its tendency to reject continuity with the best elements of the past; at the same time the criticism is balanced by a recognition of the importance of the sensibility if morality is to receive true life from the feelings. It is also a bold challenge to the romantic style of fiction: Mary Crawford, antagonist to the heroine Fanny, is not only shown as friendly to her and in all but the deepest sense appreciative of her; she is also the possessor of genuine social attractions which Fanny lacks. The reader is made to like both her and her brother, and at the same time obliged to acknowledge Fanny's ultimate human superiority.

Margaret of Anjou (1430-82)

The queen of ➤ King Henry VI. Owing to the weakness of her husband, it was she who was the effective leader of the Lancastrian party in the > Wars of the Roses. As a woman with exceptional power and responsibilities, she became famous for her determined leadership, the ferocity with which she defended the rights of her husband and son, and her pitiless vengefulness. She is a prominent character in the three ▷ Henry VI plays by Shakespeare, and reappears in his > Richard III, IV, iv, where she joins with the Yorkist ladies in a common lament for the dead of both families. since Richard has now laid waste his own, as well as contributing to the destruction of the Lancastrians.

Marginality

A widely-used metaphor to describe social groups or cultural practices which are on the edges of the mainstream. In much modern thinking, marginality carries two implications, one negative, the other neutral or even positive. Negatively, to be marginalized means to be excluded or ignored as, for example, work by women or black writers has been in literary studies. But in the other sense widely used in ⊳ postmodern theory - it is argued that contemporary societies and contemporary cultures are in fact largely cultures of the margins in which there is no settled sense of the centre. Thus, for example, 'English Literature' can no longer be used as a collective term in a world in which English is a global language used by very diverse cultural groups, and in which we are powerfully conscious of diversities of region, ethnicity, class and gender. As a result, there can be no accepted canon of great works, only works which speak to diverse > interpretive communities. In 'the postmodern condition', inevitable marginality is a cause for some celebration because it guarantees diversity and plurality. Opponents of this idea, however, insist that this benign view underestimates the realities of power and disadvantage, while conservative critics deplore the relativism of this idea and the loss of settled, central values.

▶ Decentred.

Marian Withers (1851)

A novel by > Geraldine Jewsbury. Considered to be her best work of fiction, it is concerned with issues such as female > education and societal expectations of women. Set in Manchester, the narrative focuses on the life of Marian Withers, detailing her social background and describing her passage to maturity.

Mariana

A character in ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Measure for Measure; she was betrothed to Angelo, the deputy of the Duke of Vienna, and after being cast off by him she lives forsaken in 'the moated grange' until the Duke compels Angelo to marry her. She is the subject of one of the most famous poems by Alfred Tennyson (1809–02) – Mariana.

Marie de France (fl. c 1180)

One of the earliest known women writers of vernacular poetry, working in French, some time during the years 1160-1215, for, it seems, audiences in France and England (judging by the provenance of the extant manuscripts of her work). Little is known about her life: indeed the principal record of her existence derives from the signatures built into her work: her collection of Lais, her collection of Fables, and her version of Espurgatoire S. Patrice (St Patrick's Purgatory) all contain references to their composition by one 'Marie' who is, according to the epilogue of the Fables, from France. She was clearly an educated woman. acquainted with Latin and likely, therefore, to have had an ecclesiastical training of some kind. The image she develops in her work is of something of a cultural polymath, mediating between British/English/Latin culture of the past in the production of her poetry: she claims to have taken material for her Lais from British sources: claims to be translating her collection of Fables from an Old English work of ⊳ King Alfred; and translates her account of St Patrick's Purgatory from Latin. She remains something of a literary enigma, despite scholarly hypotheses about her life and her possible connection with the court of Henry II.

Bib: Burgess, G. and Busby, K. (trans.), The Lais of Marie de France; Wilson, K. (ed.), Medieval Women Writers.

Marina

A character in ▷ Pericles, Prince of Tyre, a play written wholly or in part by ▷ Shakespeare. She is the daughter of King Pericles, who loses her at sea and later recovers her (V. i) in a scene described by T. S. Eliot (1888–1965) as one of the most beautiful by Shakespeare. She is the subject of one of Eliot's Ariel Poems, Marina.

Marius the Epicurean (1885)

A philosophical novel by ➤ Walter Pater tracing the spiritual journey of a young Roman of the second century AD who moves from Epicureanism (the doctrine of the philosopher Epicurus, 342-270 BC, who is best known for his principle that pleasure is the beginning and end of life - although for him pleasure meant the acquisition of a mind at peace), through Stoicism (a philosophy founded in 4th-century-BC Greece which underlined the significance of the soul and advocated indifference to bodily suffering) and finally to the aesthetic pleasure of Christianity. However Marius remains faithful to his Epicurean philosophy to the end. The novel was enormously influential on Pater's contemporaries, as well as on later writers such as W.B. Yeats (1865-1939) as an analysis of aesthetic religiosity.

Markandaya, Kamala (b 1924)

Pen name of Kamala Durnauja, Indian novelist. Educated at Madras University, she has worked as a journalist, but is now a full-time writer and lives in London. Her novels are set in contemporary India; they deal with a range of subjects and settings, but tend to emphasize relationships and personal dilemmas, including the tension between Indian and European cultural influences. Her novels are: Nectar in a Sieve (1954); Some Inner Fury (1955); A Silence of Desire (1960); Possession (1963); A Handful of Rice (1966); The Coffer Dams (1969); The Nowhere Man (1973); Two Virgins: A Novel (1974); The Golden Honeycomb (1977); Pleasure City (1982).

Bib: Banerji, N., Kamala Markandaya: A Critical Study.

Marlatt, Daphne (b 1942)

Poet, critic and editor. Marlatt's hugely prolific output and her ability to span a range of Canadian literary interests makes her one of the most important women writers in Canada today. She is truly 'post-colonial' having been born in Australia and then lived in Malaysia and England before finally emigrating to Canada in 1951. Her early poetry, such as Rings (1971) and Steveston (1974), already reveals her commitment to innovative form with the fluency of the long line and her merging of prose and poetry, as well as her interest in the interconnected texture of place and language. In the 1980s she increasingly used her own experiences to combine a personal eroticism with a sharp political sentiment, as for example in Double Negative (1988; written with Betsy Warland) and Touch to My Tongue (1984).

772

Marlatt's ability to work across generic frontiers has led her to experiment with poetic prose, such as in Ana Historic (1988), and to evolve an editorial role in the influential and radical feminist journal Tessera.

Marlborough, John Churchill, Duke of (1650–1722)

Son of Winston Churchill, a minor country gentleman. At fifteen he became a page of honour to James, Duke of York, and in 1667 he received an officer's commission in the Guards. In 1672 he showed distinction in various sieges in the Netherlands, in a campaign in which the English were allied with the French against the Dutch, and in 1685 he was made a Baron and promoted to the rank of Major General. It was largely due to his efficiency that the Monmouth rebellion, against > James II (formerly the Duke of York) was defeated at the > Battle of Sedgemoor. When William of Orange landed in England in 1688, however, Marlborough deserted James, and thus facilitated the bloodless Revolution by which William became ➤ King William III (> Glorious Revolution). Churchill was made Duke of Marlborough on the accession of Queen > Anne in 1702, and his wife, Sarah, was the Queen's chief favourite. On the outbreak of the War of the > Spanish Succession in the same year, Marlborough commanded the armies of the allied states against France, and won victories at > Blenheim (1704), Ramillies (1706), Oudenarde (1708) and Malplaquet (1709). The country was tiring of the war, however, and the Queen was tiring of the Duchess. Marlborough was relieved of his command in 1711. In the meantime the great mansion of Blenheim Palace had been built for him in honour of his first and most remarkable victory in the war. The architect was ⊳ Sir John Vanbrugh.

Marlborough, Sarah Churchill, Duchess of (1660–1744)

Essayist, letter writer and Whig politician. She married John Churchill, son of Winston Churchill, in 1678. They had eight children, five of whom survived infancy. Sarah was a confidante of Princess Anne, later the queen (> Anne), and was able in 1702 to persuade her, despite strong opposition from the Tories, to continue the War of ➤ Spanish Succession, being conducted by Sarah's husband the Duke. Toward the end of Anne's reign, the Duke and Duchess fell out of favour, and lived abroad until they were able to regain positions with > George I. The Duchess survived her husband by 22 years, during which she wrote An Account of the Conduct of the Domager Duchess of Marlborough (1742), a volume of her Opinions (published posthumously in 1788), and a substantial correspondence. She variously befriended and antagonized many contemporary writers, including > Samuel Johnson, who attacked her, and ➤ Fielding, who defended her.

Marlowe, Christopher (1564–93)
Dramatist and poet. Son of a Canterbury shoemaker; educated at King's School, Canterbury, and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He most likely began writing plays on leaving Cambridge. Most of them eventually entered the repertoire of the Lord ➤ Admiral's Men, with ➤ Edward Alleyn taking leading roles such as Tamburlaine and Faustus. Marlowe probably became a government agent, and his mysterious death in a fight in a tavern at Deptford – nominally about who should pay the bill – may have had a political cause. When he died, he was under shadow of charges of atheism on the evidence of his fellow dramatist,

> Thomas Kvd.

His four major plays were written between 1585 and 1593; > Tamburlaine the Great, Parts I and II; > The Jew of Malta; The Tragical History of > Doctor Faustus; Edward II. Dido, Queen of Carthage (with > Nashe 1594) and The Massacre at Paris (1593) are attributed to him. His non-dramatic poetry is famous for the narrative > Hero and Leander, based on the Greek of Musaeus (5th century AD) and completed by ▷ Chapman, and the lyric The Passionate Shepherd. Little else has survived, apart from his translation of ➤ Ovid's Amores (printed 1596) and of The First Book of Lucan (printed 1600). It has been suggested, without evidence, that he had a share in the writing of a number of other plays, including > Shakespeare's > Henry VI, > Titus Andronicus, and > Richard III.

Marlowe was much the most innovative dramatic writer in the 16th century after Shakespeare, and much the most important influence upon Shakespeare. His importance is due to the energy with which he endowed the > blank-verse line, which in his hands developed an unprecedented suppleness and power. His plays have great intensity, but they show a genius that is > epic rather than dramatic - at least in Tamburlaine and Doctor Faustus, his acknowledged masterpieces; his best-constructed piece of theatre, Edward II, is also the least typical of his poetic genius. On the other hand the final scene of Doctor Faustus is one of the most intensely dramatic in English literature. In the musical handling and control of the ten-syllable line, he learned from ▷ Spenser and contributed to ▷ Milton as well as to Shakespeare.

> Faust.

Bib: Boas, F. S., Christopher Marlowe; Levin, H., The Overreacher, Steane, J. B., Marlowe: a critical study; Leech, C. (ed.), Essays on Marlowe; Eliot, T. S., in Selected Essays; Kelsall, M., Christopher Marlowe; Masington C. G., Christopher Marlowe's Tragic Vision; Robinson, J. H., Marlowe, Tamburlaine and Magic; Shepherd, S., Marlowe and the Politics of Elizabethan Theatre.

Marmion, A Tale of Flodden Field (1808)
An historical romance in tetrameter ▷ couplets (▷ metre) by ▷ Sir Walter Scott, set in 1513, the year of the catastrophic defeat of James IV of Scotland by the English. The story concerns the attempts of Lord Marmion to marry the rich Lady Clare, and to dispose of her lover by making false allegations of treason against him. Marmion is eventually killed in the battle and the lovers are reunited. The poem contains the famous lyrics 'Where shall the lover rest', and 'O, young Lochinvar is come out of the west'.

Marprelate, Martin

The pen-name for an anonymous author or authors of a series of > pamphlets that appeared 1588-00. They were written from a Presbyterian standpoint denving the validity of bishops, and they attacked the religious establishment, by which the Church was governed by crownappointed bishops. The bishops were satirized so vigorously in such expressive, popular prose that the authorities were alarmed into commissioning such gifted writers as ▷ Thomas Nashe, > John Lyly and > Robert Greene to reply to them. The leaders of the movement were arrested in 1593, and the government of ➤ Elizabeth I imposed severe restrictions on sermons and on the press. (Marprelate: mar = damage, ruin; prelate = bishop.)

Marriage

According to Laurence Stone, in England marriage only gradually acquired its function of regulating sexual chastity in wedlock; up to the 11th century polygamy and concubinage were widespread and divorce was casual. Even after that time divorce by natural consent followed by remarriage was still widely practised. In the 13th century, however, the Church developed its control, asserting the principles of monogamy, defining and outlawing incest, punishing fornication and adultery and ensuring the exclusion of > bastards from property inheritance. In 1439 weddings in church were declared a sacrament and after 1563 in the Roman Catholic Church the presence of a priest was required to make the contract valid. In this way, what had been a private contract between two families concerning property exchange - Claude Levi-Strauss was the first to point out in 1948 women's universal role in such transactions between men - became regulated. Ecclesiastical law always recognized the formal exchange of oral promises (spousals) between the parties as a legally binding contract; as the Church got more powerful it exerted greater control over the circumstances in which those promises were made. In 1604 the hours, place and conditions of church weddings were defined and restricted; notice and publicity (the calling of the banns) were required, as a guard against bigamy and other abuses. One effect of this was to create a demand for clergymen willing to perform weddings outside the specified conditions. In 1753 Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act was designed to close these loopholes: weddings had to be in church, duly registered and signed, verbal spousals would not be legally binding and marriages already contracted in breach of the 1604 conditions were declared invalid. Noone under 21 could marry without parental consent and there were heavy penalties for clergymen who defied these injunctions. The first significant Marriage Act of the Victorian period was the Marriage Act of 1836 which permitted legal wedding ceremonies to be held in Catholic or Protestant Dissenting churches. provided that the registrar was notified. Prior to this only a Church of England parson had the legal right to marry people. No one under the age of twenty-one could marry without parental consent and there were heavy penalties for clergymen who defied these injunctions. Divorce with the option of remarriage was not available except by private Act of Parliament, which only the rich could afford. For the poor the only substitutes for divorce were ritualized wife-sales (as in > Thomas Hardy's ➤ The Mayor of Casterbridge: the last recorded example was in 1887) or desertion. In 1857 the Matrimonial Causes Act introduced civil divorce for adultery; again only the rich could afford it and only men could petition for divorce. Wives were not permitted to divorce their husbands for adultery until 1923.

Before the Married Women's Property Acts of the late Victorian period a woman's property became her husband's on marriage. despite the wedding vow, in which the man promised to endow his wife with all his worldly goods. The review of the English marriage laws, which stated that a wife, her property, earnings and children were all in the power of her husband, was initiated in 1836 by > Caroline Norton, who separated from her husband after his unsuccessful petition for divorce on the grounds of her adultery with Lord Melbourne. Prevented from having access to her children she published a number of pamphlets condemning the marriage laws and in particular the obliteration of a woman's legal personality on becoming a wife. These coupled with the publicity surrounding her trial gave impetus to the first organized ▷ feminist effort to challenge the marriage laws and became one of the great women's rights campaigns of the Victorian period. Norton induced Thomas Talford to introduce the Infant Custody Act allowing women to sue for custody of children under seven and access to those under sixteen. It became law in 1839. The Infant Custody Act of 1886 made separated or divorced parents jointly responsible for their children; however, the children of parents living together were still under the control of the father.

In 1854 Barbara Leigh Smith, inspired by Norton's case and that of Anna Murphy Jameson, wrote A Brief Summary in Plain English of the Most Important Laws of England Concerning Women, which was a plea for married women's rights. She formed a small committee to draw up and circulate a petition to Parliament asking for the amendment of the laws of property affecting wives. This group was the core of the Langham Place Group (> Women's Movement). From the spring of 1856-7 the issues of married women's property and divorce law reform were inextricably linked, although proposals for divorce reform were issued quite independently of women's rights activists. Women had to wait until the 1870 Married Women's Property Act before their right to earn money and keep it for their own use was recognized by the law. However, in 1870 most middle-class women were unable to obtain remunerative occupations. After 1870 improvement in the status of married women was closely allied with the ▷ women's suffrage campaign, each hampering the progress of the other. A full Married Women's Property Law was not passed until 1882. This was the single most important change in the legal status of women in the Victorian period and allowed women to act as independent legal personages. It was fought for by women's rights campaigners such as ➤ Elizabeth Wolstenholme-Elmy and Ursula Bright.

Although men could divorce women from 1857, it was not until the 20th century, in 1923, that wives were permitted to divorce their husbands for adultery. In 1937 three additional grounds for divorce were introduced, cruelty, desertion and insanity. Further liberalization of the divorce laws took place in the 1960s: recognition of the concept of marital breakdown has allowed a less punitive and accusatory procedure.

▶ 'Woman Question, The'.

Bib: Shanley, M.L., Feminism, Marriage and the Law in Victorian England: 1850–1895; Holcombe, L., Wives and Property: Reform of the Married Women's Property Law in 19th Century England; Stone, L., Family, Sex and Marriage in England, 1500–1800.

Marriage à la Mode (?1671)
Play by ▷ John Dryden, sometimes described as a 'split-plot tragi-comedy', setting a serious unrhymed 'heroic' plot against a witty love plot. In the serious plot, Polydamas has usurped the throne of Sicily from the rightful prince, Leonidas, who is unaware of his rights. Leonidas is in love with Palmyra. She is courted by Argaleon, while he is loved by Argaleon's sister, Amalthea. The comic plot concerns the adulterous love between Rhodophil, a captain of the guards, and Melantha, 'an affected lady', and Rhodophil's wife Doralice and Palamede. Palamede is also a suitor to Melantha. The play's action essentially revolves round the complications arising from these situations, and has scenes of mistaken identities, including women disguised as men. A factor unifying the two plots is the theme of longing for the apparently unattainable. The play represents an attempt by Dryden to resist what he saw as the coarsening and cheapening of contemporary comedy. In his dedication he claimed to have preserved the 'Decencies of Behaviour', but this did not prevent him from inserting a number of very bawdy songs between some serious scenes.

Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The (c 1793) A composition mainly in poetic prose by ➤ William Blake. It was engraved, with designs woven into the text in the early 1790s, at the time he was working on > The Songs of Experience. The text consists of a series of symbolic, caustically humorous anecdotes, and terse aphorisms. Blake's thesis, influenced by the thought of the mystic ➤ Emanuel Swedenborg, is that the rationality of John Locke (1632-1704) and ▷ Sir Isaac Newton, and the piety of established hierarchical religion, are repressive and sterile. He thus presents Hell as a region of dangerous but vital energies, and Heaven, without them, as a lifeless, ➤ Deistic abstraction. The most famous section of the work is the 'Proverbs of Hell', 70 aphorisms asserting flux and creativity against the stasis and hierarchy of Heaven: 'The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom', 'The tygers of wrath are wiser than the horses of instruction', 'Sooner murder an infant in its cradle than nurse unacted desires.'

> Songs of Innocence and Experience.

Marryat, Florence (1838-99) Novelist, the daughter of ➤ Captain Frederick Marryat, author of Children of the New Forest (1847). Florence was educated by ≥ governesses and at sixteen married T. Ross Church, with whom she had eight children. A prolific writer of > sensation novels, her first work, Love's Conflict, was published in 1865. Between 1865 and 1899 she wrote over forty volumes, including works on spiritualism, such as There Is No Death (1891) and The Spirit World (1894). Marryat's novels are mostly melodramatic > romances with stereotypical characters who become involved in crimes of passion. They include Woman Against Woman (1865); Her Lord and Master (1871); A Crown of Shame (1888) and How Like a Woman (1892).

Marryat, Captain Frederick (1792–1848) Novelist. He was a Captain in the Royal Navy and his novels are chiefly about the sea. The best known of them are: Frank Mildmay (1829); Peter Simple (1834); Jacob Faithful (1834); Mr Midshipman Easy (1836). Japhet in Search of a Father (1836) is the story of a child of unknown parents who eventually achieves prosperity. Others of his books were intended for boys; the best known of these is Masterman Ready (1841). Marryat continued the 18th-century realistic tradition of narrative, the most famous examples of which are the novels of Tobias Smollett (1721–71). Marryat's other well-known novel, Children of the New Forest (1847), was one of the first > historical novels to be written for children.

➤ Realism; Children's literature.

Bib: Marryat, F., Life and Letters of Captain Marryat; Conrad, J., 'Tales of the Sea' in Notes on Life and Letters; Warner, O., Captain Marryat: a Rediscovery.

Marsh, Ngaio (1899-1982)

Detective novelist. Her works include: A Man Lay Dead (1934); Enter a Murderer (1935); Death in Ecstasy (1936); Death at the Bar (1940); Died in the Wool (1945); Opening Night (1951); Singing in the Shrouds (1958); Hand in Glove (1962); Black Beech and Honeydew (1965); A Clutch of Constables (1968); Tied up in Tinsel (1972); Last Ditch (1977); Photo Finish (1980). Ngaio Marsh is frequently bracketed with her three female detective-writing contemporaries (▷ Margery Allingham, ▷ Agatha Christie, Dorothy L. Sayers) who together comprise the formidable bed-rock of classic inter-war crime writing. Although she was born, educated and lived in New Zealand (her name is Maori), Marsh's novels are nevertheless often set in the English country house, or in the theatre, which she loved and dedicated much of her working life to: she was a successful director, and the action of her last novel (Light Thickens, 1982) takes place in the middle of a production of Macbeth. Marsh's 'serial detective' is Roderick Alleyn, a character of some complexity whose role is nevertheless always set out as a function of plot and narrative mystery, for Marsh the primary factors in detective writing.

Marshalsea

A prison in Southwark, London. It was opened in the 13th century as a prison for the Marshalsea Court, which dealt with cases involving a member of the royal household. After the Restoration it was kept for petty debtors. ▷ Dickens' father was imprisoned there for debt, and it is described in ▷ Little Darrit (1858). The prison was abolished in 1849.

Marston, John (?1575-1634)

Satirist and dramatist. His father was a lawyer. John Marston was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford; lectured in the Middle Temple (one of the Inns of Court); entered the Church in 1609. His writing life runs from 1598 to 1607. During this period he engaged in literary warfare with ▷ Ben Jonson ('the war of the theatres') who satirized Marston and ▷ Dekker in The Poetaster (1601) and elsewhere. The two men were, however, intermittently friends, and collaborated (with Chapman) in writing ▷ Eastward Hoe (1605), for which they were imprisoned for offending the king's Scottish friends.

In 1508 Marston published The Metamorphosis of Pygmalion's Image and, under the pen-name of W. Kinsayder, a collection of ⊳ satires entitled Scourge of Villainie. The satires are modelled on those of the Roman poet Persius. Their language is coarse and vigorous, and the violence and disgust they exhibit become a feature of Marston's dramatic writing. His plays are his most successful work, but they are very uneven. > Antonio and Mellida and Antonio's Revenge (1599 - Antonio) are ▷ revenge plays in the tradition of Kyd's > The Spanish Tragedy, and exhibit a mixture of > Stoic idealism and melodramatic sensationalism, with passages of intense poetry. > The Malcontent is a tragicomedy and usually considered to be Marston's most effective work; its satirical qualities and the role of the central character suggest comparisons with > Shakespeare's > Measure for Measure and > Hamlet. > The Dutch Courtesan (1605), The Parasitaster, or the Fawne (1606) and What You Will (1607) are comedies; Sophonisba, Wonder of Women (1605) and The Insatiate Countess (?1606) are tragedies.

It was Marston's lack of critical control and the bad taste of his extravagance which caused the satirical attacks on him by Jonson. His violent revulsion from sensuality and worldly vice inspired some of his best passages as well as his worst ones.

Bib: Ellis-Fermor, U. M., The Jacobean Drama; Caputi, A., John Marston, Satirist; Finkelpearl, P., John Marston of the Middle Temple.

Martian poetry

The name of the so-called 'Martian' school of poetry derives from the second collection of > Craig Raine, A Martian Sends a Postcard Home (1979). Everyday objects are described in an unusual, often highly striking manner, as if being seen for the first time by an alien visiting earth. The poet attempts to write from a position of innocence, radically outside of the society he or she observes, reading things from a position of exile, or as an anthropologist. The ordinary or commonsense world is twisted, often by an outrageous use of simile (> Figures of speech):

Rain is when the earth is television. It has the property of making colours darker. (Raine, 'A Martian Sends a Postcard Home')

Much contemporary poetry makes use of 776

'Martian eye' techniques, but the chief poets of the school are Raine and Christopher Reid (b 1949).

Martin Chuzzlewit, The Life and Adventures of (1843-4)

A novel by > Charles Dickens. The Chuzzlewit family includes old Martin, a rich man grown misanthropic owing to the selfishness and greed of the rest of his family; young Martin, his grandson, who begins with the family selfishness but is eventually purified by hardship and the good influence of his servant, Mark Tapley; Anthony, old Martin's avaricious brother, and Jonas, Anthony's son, who, by the end of the book, has become a figure of the blackest evil; Pecksniff, at first a trusted friend of old Martin, is one of Dickens' most effective hypocrites; Mrs Gamp, the disreputable nurse, is one of his most famous comic creations. The novel is divided rather sharply by the episode in which young Martin temporarily emigrates to America. This episode is a self-sufficient satire on American life; moreover, not only is young Martin's character radically changed by it but the story thereafter takes on a denser substance. Pecksniff, Jonas and the fraudulent financier Tigg Montague cease to be merely comic and become substantially evil. These changes mark the transition from the earlier Dickens, the comic entertainer, into the later Dickens, of sombre power. The novel is thus a transitional work but it is also, as his comic masterpiece, the climax of Dickens' first phase.

Martineau, Harriet (1802-76)

Critic, novelist, journalist, essayist and biographer. Born in Norwich, the sixth of eight children, her youth was marked by illness, poverty and morbidity and increasing deafness; her Huguenot parents insisted on educating the children to earn their own living, which became essential after their father went bankrupt in 1826. She supported herself initially by writing reviews for the Monthly Repository and by needlework. A devout ➤ Unitarian, she published Devotional Exercises for the Use of Young Persons in 1823, followed by Addresses with Prayers (1826). In 1830 she won all three prizes in a competition set by the Central Unitarian Association to write essays aimed at converting the Roman Catholics, Jews and Mahommedans. Between 1832 and 1834 she published a series of social reformist tales, Illustrations of Political Economy, influenced by the ideas of > J.S. Mill, > Jeremy Bentham, and David Ricardo (1772-1823). The tales were highly successful, as were her stories for 'Brougham's Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge', which sold some 10,000 copies. She became a literary celebrity, turning increasingly away from religion, and was consulted on social and economic matters by her friends including > Malthus and Sydney Smith; she suggested and managed > Thomas Carlyle's first course of lectures in 1837.

She travelled to North America in 1834, supporting the Abolitionists despite threats to herself, and published Society in America (1837) and A Retrospect of Western Travel (1838). A trip to Venice in 1839 was cut short by illness and from 1839-44 she was an invalid, but produced her first and best novel, Deerbrook, in 1839, an historical work which celebrates women's intellectual aspirations and bonds. The Hour and the Man (1840), on Toussaint l'Ouverture, and children's stories collected in The Playfellow (1841) followed. Life in the Sickroom appeared in 1843, followed by Letters on Mesmerism, an account of the treatment she claimed had cured her illness, in 1845. She settled in the Lake District in a house she designed and built herself, where she received William Wordsworth (1770–1850), ➤ Matthew Arnold, ➤ Charlotte Brontë, and ➤ George Eliot. She visited Palestine in 1845.

Other publications include numerous articles for the London Daily News and the ▷ Edinburgh Review, supporting divorce reform and attacking the Contagious Diseases Act (▷ Women's Movement); a radical History of the Thirty Years' Peace (1849–50), and the anti-theoretical Laws of Man's Social Nature and Development (1851). She was influenced by ▷ Comte, and her free translation, The Positivist Philosophy of Comte, appeared in 1853. Her Autobiography, begun in 1855, was eventually published in 1877. A staunch advocate of ▷ education for women, she also supported ▷ women's suffrage movements in England and the US movements in England and the US.

➤ Children's literature; Travel writing;

Feminism.

Bib: Miller, F., Life; Pichanick, V.K., Harriet Martineau: The Woman and Her Work; Webb, R.K., Harriet Martineau: A Radical Victorian.

Marvell, Andrew (1621-78)

Poet. He was educated at Hull Grammar School (where his father was master) and Trinity College, Cambridge. He travelled in Europe, and in 1650 became tutor to the daughter of Lord Fairfax, the ➤ Civil War Parliamentary general. In 1653 he became tutor to ➤ Cromwell's ward, and in 1657 ➤ John Milton's assistant in the foreign secretaryship. In 1659 he became Member of Parliament for Hull, which he continued to represent after the Restoration of the monarchy in 1660, apart from a period in which he was secretary to Lord Carlisle.

The main body of Marvell's ▷ lyric poetry is to be found in Miscellaneous Poems of 1681, which contains his best-known verse. He published, in addition to the lyric poetry for which he is famous, a number of satirical works and, in 1672–3, the curious amalgam of theological controversy and prose satire which is The Rehearsal Transprosed - the work for which he was most famous in the 17th century. But it is the lyric poetry that has attracted most modern critical attention. Of enduring fascination to modern criticism has been the question of the relation of Marvell's poems of the 1650s to the poet's own political sympathies. Is, for example, his celebration of the return of Cromwell from Ireland ('An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland') enlisting sympathy for Cromwell, or > Charles I? Or is it, as some modern critics have argued, simply disinterested? Similarly, to what extent does his poetry represent a struggle to escape out of the turmoil of civil war? More radically, does the poetry dramatize the impossibility of any such retreat?

Together with the poetry of ▷ John Donne and ▷ George Herbert, Marvell's poetry has come to be appreciated as some of the most important to have been written in the 17th century. But modern criticism has, itself, not been disinterested in championing Marvell's work. For ▷ F. R. Leavis, Marvell became an ideological touchstone, while for Marxist literary historians Marvell's work represents a continually fascinating test-case of the relationship between literature and history. Bib: Legouis, P. (ed.), The Poems and Letters of Andrew Marvell; Patterson, A., Marvell and the Civic Crown; Chernaik, W., The Poet's Time; Stocker, M., Apocalyptic Marvell.

Marx, Karl (1818-83)

Born in Trier of German-Jewish parentage, and attended university in Berlin and Bonn where he first encountered Hegelian dialectic. He met Friedrich Engels (1820-95) in Paris in 1844, and in 1848, the Year of Revolutions, they published The Communist Manifesto together. In that year Marx returned to Germany and took part in the unsuccessful revolution there before fleeing to Britain where he was to remain until his death in 1883. In 1867 he published Capital, the voluminous work for which he is best known. Marx is justly renowned for his adaptation of the Hegelian dialectic for a materialist account of social formations, which is based upon an analysis of the opposition between different social classes. He is, arguably, the most prolific thinker and social commentator of the 10th century whose work has had far-reaching effects on subsequent generations of scholars, philosophers, politicians and analysts of human culture. In the political ferment of the 1960s, and especially in France, his work has been subject to a series of extraordinarily productive re-readings, especially by philosophers such as > Louis Althusser which continue to affect the understanding of all aspects of cultural life. In Britain Marx's work is what lies behind a very powerful literary and historical tradition of commentary and analysis, and has informed much work in the areas of sociology, and the study of the mass media. Capital and a range of earlier texts, have come to form the basis of the materialist analysis of culture.

Marxism

Founded on the school of thought espoused by Karl Marx (1818–83).

Mary I (1553-58)

Oueen of England. She was the eldest child of > Henry VIII, who had used his divorce from her mother, Katharine of Aragon, as a pretext for taking the control of the English Church out of the hands of the Pope and into his own. Under her brother > Edward VI England had swung further into ▶ Protestantism but Mary restored the Roman Catholic religion of her mother. In 1554 she married the most fanatically Catholic sovereign in Europe, Philip II of Spain; this involved her in wars with France and the loss of the last English possession there - the town of Calais. Her reign, not bloodthirsty by comparison with that of Philip in his own dominions, was nonetheless severely repressive of Protestantism, and some 300 English Protestants were burnt alive, including > Cranmer and the eloquent Bishop Latimer. > John Foxe's Book of Martyrs (1563) consigned her memory to national hatred, and she has come down in school books as 'Bloody Mary'. Her sister and successor > Elizabeth I restored a moderate form of Protestantism.

➤ Tudor, House of. Bib: Loades D., Mary Tudor: A Life.

Mary II (1662-94)

Queen of Great Britain from 1689 to her death. She was the daughter of ▷ James II by his first wife, and was educated in Protestant doctrine, which she retained when her father became converted to ▷ Catholicism. She married William of Orange, ruler of the Netherlands, in 1677. When James was removed from the throne in the ▷ Glorious Revolution of 1688 Mary was summoned to rule the nation jointly with her husband, who assumed the throne as ▷ William III.

> Stuart, House of.

Mary Barton (1848)

The first novel by \triangleright Elizabeth Gaskell, subtitled A Tale of Manchester Life, and written to counteract her deep distress at the death of her infant son. The background to the story is Manchester during the \triangleright 'Hungry Forties', a decade during which working-class protest came to the attention of the middle classes. Mary Barton is the daughter of John Barton, a man employed by the Carson family as a mill hand and driven by desperation to join a militant \triangleright Chartist group which requires him to assassinate Harry Carson, one of the most unpopular employers. However, Jem Wilson becomes the principal suspect. Mary has been involved with Carson, lured by the appeal of his wealth, but is in danger of following her beloved Aunt Esther's inevitable descent into prostitution. Ultimately she saves working-class Jem from the death penalty and recognizes her real love for him. The novel provoked much hostility from Manchester mill owners and the Tory press, yet it has also been criticized by Marxist commentators for its naive treatment of class struggle and its sentimental ending. Recent feminist readings have emphasized the novel's critique of masculinist politics of confrontation, its exploration of the process of socialization and its call for an ethic of caring and nurturing in the community, which is seen to bind women and the working class. It was admired by ➤ Charles Dickens and ➤ Thomas Carlyle.

> Social Problem novel

Bib: Tillotson, K., Novels of the Eighteen-Forties; Williams, R., Culture and Society 1780–1950, Spencer, J., Elizabeth Gaskell; Stoneman, P., Elizabeth Gaskell; Homans, M., Bearing the Word; Nestor, P., Female Friendships and Community; Stoneman, P., Elizabeth Gaskell.

Mary Queen of Scots (1542-67)

Queen of Scotland. She was born a few days before the death of her father, James V. In 1548, when she was five years old, she was betrothed to Francis, heir to the French throne, and was sent to France. She returned to Scotland only after the death of her husband in 1560; she was Catholic, but in the meantime the Scottish Protestants had with English help overthrown the Catholic establishment in their country. Mary in consequence found herself opposed to her people, led by the reformer > John Knox. She was dangerously involved in English politics not only because she would be heir to the English throne should > Elizabeth of England die childless, but because in the eves of Catholics she was already legitimate Queen of England, since the Catholic Church did not recognize the legality of the marriage between Elizabeth's father, ▷ Henry VIII, and her mother. For diplomatic reasons, Mary married her cousin, Lord Darnley, a worthless young man who treated her abominably. In 1567 Darnley was murdered. The evidence for Mary's complicity in the murder is in the so-called 'casket letters', but their authenticity is uncertain. However, three months later she married his murderer, Lord Bothwell. Her subjects rebelled, and Mary was imprisoned but escaped and fled to England. Elizabeth gave her shelter, but the succession of plots against her on Mary's behalf eventually drove the English queen to authorize the Scottish queen's execution. Her son, already recognized as James VI in Scotland, became in 1603, on the death of Elizabeth, ▷ James I of England as well. Owing to her charm, beauty, intelligence and misfortune, Mary became a legend in Europe. The greatest imaginative work about her is the tragedy Maria Stuart by the German poet Schiller; in English literature she is the subject of a dramatic trilogy by ▶ Algernon Swinburne (1837–1909) and of ▶ Walter Scott's (1771–1832) novel, The Abbot (1820). Bib: Fraser, A., Mary Queen of Scots.

Masefield, John (1878-1967)

Poet and novelist. He went to sea in 1893, and published his first volume of poems, Salt-Water Ballads in 1902. He was a prolific poet; the first edition of his Collected Poems came out in 1923, and the collection increased steadily until 1964. His work has immediate appeal, and is strongest in narrative verse: The Everlasting Mercy (1911); The Widow in the Bye Street (1912); Dauber (1913); The Daffodil Fields (1913); Reynard the Fox (1919). He was chosen as Poet Laureate in 1930. His novels have romantic charm, eg Sard Harker (1924); Odtaa (1926). The Midnight Folk (1927) is a classic of children's literature.

➤ Children's books.

Bib: Babington Smith, C., John Masefield, a Life; Spark, M., John Masefield.

Masham, Damaris, Lady (1658-1708) > Rationalist theological writer, born in Cambridge where her father, the well-known philosopher Ralph Cudworth, taught. She herself studied philosophy and divinity with > John Locke, who described her as having one of the most learned and original minds of his day, and who moved in with her family when he became ill in 1691. She became involved in a theological discussion between Locke and the philosopher and theologian John Norris, and in 1696 published A Discourse Concerning the Love of God, where she argues that the development of the mind is an essential part of Christianity, rather than adjunct or even antithetical to it. She was also, along with ➤ Mary Astell, an early defender of women's education. In Occasional Thoughts in Reference to a Vertuous or Christian Life (1700) she urges women to learn, in spite of resistance from relatives fearful that this would alienate potential husbands. Although the path of knowledge is hard, she says, only an educated woman could teach true Christianity to her children. Bib: Reynolds, M., The Learned Lady in England 1650-1760; Todd, J., (ed.), A Dictionary of British and American Writers 1660-1800.

Mask of Anarchy, The (1832)
A poem by ▷ Percy Bysshe Shelley, written in 1819, after he had heard news of the ▷ 'Peterloo Massacre' in Manchester, when soldiers fired on a peaceful demonstration in favour of parliamentary reform. He sent the poem to > Leigh Hunt for publication in his radical periodical > The Examiner, but Hunt dared not print it at the time, and withheld publication until 1832. The poem was intended for popular reading, and Shelley used quatrains and five-line stanzas, similar to those of the popular > ballad. He identifies Anarchy with the lawless tyranny of the British government, and exhibits its leaders in a garish pageant of Anarchy's minions: 'I met Murder on the way - / He had a mask like Castlereagh - / Very smooth he looked, yet grim; / Seven bloodhounds followed him.' Shelley ends with a magnificent address to the 'Men of England. heirs of Glory', exhorting them to throw off their chains: 'Ye are many - they are few.' Its rough, angry style and passionate rhetoric give the poem a prophetic resonance which anticipates the Communist Manifesto of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (1848).

Mason, William (1725-97)

Poet and biographer. A minor poet, Mason was heavily influenced by his friend ▷ Gray, whose poems he edited with an appended ▷ biography, The Poems of Gray with Memoirs (1775). Mason's own works, Elfrida (1751) and Caractacus (1759) use ▷ Pindaric odes. He was also interested in the ▷ Picturesque, publishing a three volume poem on gardening called The English Garden (1771–81), which despite its uninspired poetry reveals an understanding of design and form. He had numerous friends in the literary world, including ▷ Walpole.

Masque

A form of dramatic entertainment which combined verse, music, dancing and scenic effect in about equal proportions. In England it flourished between 1580 and 1630, and was essentially an aristocratic style of entertainment, especially popular at the royal court. The performers were commonly professional actors, while the masquers themselves, who remained silent, were played by ladies and gentlemen of the court. The subject was often symbolic - a conflict between virtue and vice (as in ▶ John Milton's Comus) - or ceremonial, celebrating a great personage, eg Milton's > Arcades in honour of the Countess of Derby. The masque was often preceded by an anti-masque, the content of which was comic and often satirical; the anti-masque was always performed by professionals.

Masques were sophisticated entertainments for carefully selected audiences. They were in keeping with many forms of imaginative expression of the age, and may be regarded as a synthesis of them. First of all, the visual sense had been highly developed by the great ➤ Renaissance schools of painting and architecture in Italy and France, and a favourite activity of artists was to translate into visual terms the allegorical vision that the Renaissance had inherited from the > Middle Ages. This visual > allegory influenced the poets; much of the best of ▷ Edmund Spenser's > The Faerie Queene consists of brilliantly visualized allegorical scenes such as the House of Busirane (Book III, canto 12). Secondly, the age attached great importance to spectacles such as ▶ pageants (ie ceremonial processions), which often contained symbolic, masque-like features; a famous example (which still survives) was the annual Lord Mayor's Pageant in the City of London, for which the dramatist > George Peele was more than once employed as designer. Thirdly, masques appealed to the contemporary taste for imaginative extravagance, delighting in the fairy tales of English folklore and in classical mythology as well as in grand pageantry. Fourthly, the fantastical styles of many Elizabethan plays - attributable partly to popular taste and partly to the explorations of humanist scholars - made them either akin to masques (eg > Robert Greene's James IV, Peele's The Old Wives' Tale, > John Lyly's Mother Bombie), or capable of including masques as part of the dramatic ingredient. eg > Shakespeare's > Love's Labour's Lost and > The Tempest. Finally, it was an age of close musical and literary collaboration, and masques provided opportunities for musicians and poets to collaborate on a large scale, just as they already did on a small scale in the > madrigal.

Dramatists who were eminent for their composition of masques included ➤ George Chapman, ⊳ John Fletcher and ⊳ James Shirley, but the greatest of them - in his own estimation and probably that of others - was > Ben Jonson. He collaborated with the composer Alfonso Ferrabosco the younger, and the great architect > Inigo Jones; with the latter he had bitter quarrels as to which of them had artistic control of the production. Amongst Jonson's most celebrated masques are those performed under the authority of > Queen Anne: Masque of Blackness (1606), Masque of Beauty (1608) and Masque of Queens (1609). The most famous of all masques, however, is Milton's Comus, composed for the Earl of Bridgewater, whose children acted the main parts, when he was installed as Lord President of Wales. Part of the fame of Comus is due to its untypical quality of containing much larger speaking parts than most masques did; thus Milton allowed himself more poetic scope than was usual. For this reason, some critics prefer to call Comus a > pastoral drama, like Jonson's The Sad Shepherd (1637) and Fletcher's The Faithful Shepherdess (1610). However, pastoral dramas and masques had much in common; both were spectacular and symbolic rather than dramatic.

Though designed as a form of lavish court entertainment, it is true that, in the 1630s especially, the masque also played a significant political role in the culture of the court. It existed to legitimize, through spectacle and pageantry, the authority of the monarch and the central position of the court in the affairs of the nation. At the same time, however, the masque form is implicated in the cultural breakdown that preceded the > Civil War. Not only were masques extravagantly expensive to produce (as critics of the court pointed out), but they may also have served to suggest to the monarch and those around him that a harmony pertained in the affairs of the nation, and in the court's relationship to the world outside, when no such harmony in fact existed. Bib: Lindley, D. (ed.), The Court Masque; Orgel, S. and Strong, R., Inigo Jones: The Theatre of the Stuart Masque.

Massinger, Philip (1583-1640)

Dramatist. His father was in the service of the great Herbert family. He left Oxford University without a degree in 1607. He has been suspected of Catholic sympathies, largely on the strength of four plays: The Virgin Martyr (1620), > The Duke of Milan (1621), The Maid of Honour (1621), and The Renegado (1624). He collaborated extensively with other dramatists, especially > Fletcher, but 16 or 18 plays are attributed to him alone; of these, the two usually regarded as being of the most enduring value are the comedies, ▷ A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1625) and > The City Madam (1632). He himself regarded his tragedy > The Roman Actor (1626) as his masterpiece. The dates of these plays show them to belong to the last, or > Caroline, phase of what is commonly called Elizabethan drama because it started in the reign of ▷ Elizabeth I. Two plays by Massinger are central to our understanding of the > censorship of drama in the period: Sir John Von Olden Barnavelt (with > Fletcher, 1619) and Believe as you List, both of which survive in manuscript. The latter was only allowed a licence after changes to disguise contemporary applications. The comedies mentioned still show a lively influence from ➤ Ben Jonson; they deal with contemporary politics and theatre and detail the latest scandals of the time. On the other hand, Massinger's tragedies have been accused of a lack of that intensity which gave grandeur to the work not only of > Shakespeare but of > Chapman, ➤ Tourneur and ➤ Webster. Massinger's → blank verse is in the late Shakespeare tradition, but grown so flexible as almost to have lost its rhythms into prose. However, he handled his sustained periods skilfully and sometimes impressively, anticipating ▶ Milton.

Bib: Eliot, T. S., in Selected Essays; Knights, L. C., Drama and Society in the Age of Jonson; Dutton, R., Mastering the Revels:

The Regulation and Censorship of English Renaissance Drama.

Master Craftsman

In the ➤ Middle Ages, a full member of a ➤ Craft Guild and usually an employer of ➤ apprentices and journeymen. Originally every apprentice could theoretically hope to become 'a master' after a specified period of 'apprenticeship' or training and the production of a 'masterpiece' to prove his skill in the craft. By the 14th century, however, the master craftsmen of the guilds were already becoming a comparatively rich class of employers, which the apprentices could not hope to enter unless they themselves had money, or married the master's daughter. Most apprentices could by then only hope to become trained journeymen.

Master Humphrey's Clock

The title of what ▷ Charles Dickens intended to be an inclusive serial linking distinct tales □ ▷ The Old Curiosity Shop and ▷ Barnaby Rudge. Master Humphrey is the narrator of the early pages of the former, but Dickens abandoned the idea.

Master of Ballantrae: A Winter's Tale (1889) A novel by ▶ Robert Louis Stevenson set immediately after the Jacobite Rebellion of 1745, telling the story of the Marquis of Tullibardine. Stevenson intended it as 'a drama in a nutshell', a chronicle of domestic enmity.

➤ Historical novel.

Master of the Revels

➤ Revels, Master of the.

Materialism

The philosophical theory that only physical matter is real and that all phenomena and processes can be explained by reference to it. Related to this is the doctrine that political and social change is triggered by change in the material and economic basis of society.

→ Marx, Karl.

Mathias, Roland (b 1915)

Poet, editor and critic. Roland Mathias was born at Talybont-on-Usk, Breconshire, and was educated first in military schools in Germany where his father was an army chaplain and subsequently at Caterham School and at Jesus College, Oxford, where he read Modern History. After teaching in England he returned to Wales as headmaster of Pembroke Dock Grammar School in 1948. The following year, with Raymond Garlick, he founded Dock Leaves, later the Anglo-Welsh Review, and between 1961 and 1976 he was its editor, contributing a large number of poems, reviews, articles, and substantial editorials. In 1958 he moved on to headmasterships at Belper, Derby, and subsequently at King Edward VI School, Five Ways, Birmingham, a post from which he retired in 1969 so that he could devote all his time to writing, editing and lecturing on returning to his Welsh roots in Brecon. His poetry is highly personal, erudite in its allusiveness and notable for its vivid language, honesty and craftsmanship. His first collection was Break in Harvest (1946), followed by The Roses of Tretower (1952), The Flooded Valley (1960), Absalom in the Tree (1971) and Snipe's Castle (1979), his selected poems appearing in Burning Brambles (1983). With Raymond Garlick he was co-editor of the anthology Anglo-Welsh Poetry 1480-1980 (1984). Further studies of poets included that of Vernon Watkins in the Writers of Wales series (1974) and another, of John Cowper Powys, The Hollowed-Out Elder Stalk (1979), and he also edited a collection of essays on David Jones as writer and artist in 1976. Roland Mathias' prose works include a collection of his short stories, The Eleven Men of Eppynt (1956), and he has also been co-editor with Sam Adams in both a selection of short stories by Anglo-Welsh writers, The Shining Pyramid (1970), and in the collected monograph on his co-editor, Sam Adams, in the Writers of Wales series (1995). Another monograph, but a historical one, was his Whitsun Riot (1963). Indeed, the historical perspectives in his writing, allied to his impeccable scholarship, have done much to promote a critical awareness of, and to stimulate the development of Welsh writing in English. His finest critical work in that field, his essays in A Ride Through the Wood (1985), were followed by the more popularist Anglo-Welsh Literature: An Illustrated History (1987). Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Matura, Mustapha (b 1939)

Dramatist, Trinidad-born Matura settled in England in the 1960s, and eventually established himself as one of Britain's major (not to mention most prolific) black dramatists and co-founded the Black Theatre Cooperative with Charlie Hanson. Matura's early works were given exposure at the Royal Court and a variety of fringe venues often under the aegis of Roland Rees; his writing for television - particularly the series No Problem and Black Silk - helped widen his audience in the 1980s. His work has concentrated both on the black experience in Britain and on Trinidadian issues, with a recent development into versions of classics adapted to his own interests. The common thread that links both the Trinidadian and the British-set plays is Matura's interest in the contradictions that arise when people drawn from different social and racial groups interact.

Like many contemporary writers Matura is particularly interested in colonialism as a state of mind as well as a physical institution. Thus in Play Mas (1974) people of Indian and African descent work out power relations against the background of Carnival and of independence: in Independence (1979) different versions of independence are mobilised in contradiction; and in Meetings (1981) we see the tensions between old and new focused in a wealthy couple, one nostalgic for traditional cooking (and, by extension, a life rooted in the old values). the other enslaved to the values of American economic colonialism. Matura has a great gift for witty and revealing diologue which he put to particularly good use in his adaptations of the classics; The Playboy of the West Indies (1984) is an adaptation of > J. M. Synge's Playboy of the Western World, Trinidad Sisters (1988) is a particularly poignant relocation of > Chekhov's Three Sisters, as a statement of 'mother country' and its mental stranglehold.

Maturin, Charles Robert (1782-1824) Irish novelist and dramatist. Like > 'Monk' Lewis and ➤ Mrs Radcliffe he belonged to the school of writers who exploited the emotions of terror and love of mystery among readers in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. The Fatal Revenge, or The Family of Montorso (1807), The Wild Irish Boy (1808) and The Milesian Chief (1812) were ridiculed but admired for their power by ➤ Walter Scott. Scott and ➤ Byron secured the production of Maturin's tragedy Bertram in 1816, which was a great success. His other tragedies were less successful, and he returned to the novel. The best of his later novels is Melmoth the Wanderer (1820), to which the French novelist > Balzac wrote a sequel Melmoth réconcilé à l'église (1835).

> Irish literature in English.

Maud (1855)

One of the best-known poems by ➤ Alfred Tennyson. It is called 'A Monodrama', and is in fact an example of the ➤ dramatic monologue, a form particularly characteristic of Victorian poetry, especially in the work of ➤ Browning and Tennyson.

It is in three parts. Part I tells of the mysterious death of the narrator's father, who has been ruined by the contrivances of 'that old man, now lord of the broad estate and the Hall'. But the narrator gradually falls in love with the old lord's daughter, and here occurs the famous lyric 'Come into the garden, Maud'. The young lord, her brother, treats him with contempt, however, and Part II opens with their duel and the death of the brother. The narrator flies abroad, and falls into the depths of morbid despair. In Part III he recovers, and seeks salvation through the service of his country in war: the poem was written in the year in which the Crimean War broke out.

Maud exemplifies the versatility of Tennyson's craftsmanship by the variety of its metrical and stanzaic form, and the brilliant distinctness of his vision in some of the imagery. It contains bitter criticism of the temper of the age. The poem has been held to betray Tennyson's confusion about his age; criticizing it, yet swimming with its tide. Maud is a Gothic conflation of images of disease, mental aberration and sexual repression.

Maugham, (William) Somerset (1874-1965) Novelist, short-story writer and dramatist. Educated at King's School, Canterbury, and Heidelberg University; he then studied medicine in London. His first novel, Liza of Lambeth (1897) shows the influence of Zola, an example of the growing importance of French influence on English fiction at the end of the 19th century. His semi-autobiographical novel Of Human Bondage (1915) made his name. Other novels include: The Hero (1901); The Moon and Sixpence (1919); The Painted Veil (1925); The Casuarina Tree (1926); Cakes and Ale (1930). The professional accomplishment of his novels gave him a wide foreign public, and after 1930 his reputation abroad was greater than at home, though interest in him revived towards his 80th birthday. He celebrated his 80th year by the special republication of Cakes and Ale, a novel which satirizes the English propensity for admiring the 'Grand Old Men' among their writers. Some of his best fiction is in his short stories, in volumes such as The Trembling of a Leaf (1921), The Mixture as Before (1940). His twenty-two plays, mainly neatly constructed comedies, are entertaining and witty. They often tend to moralise, but, though set in the fashionable middle class to whom he was seeking to appeal, he by no means toes the establishment line. Indeed The Circle (1921) was booed for its 'immorality' at its premiere. Although his closet homosexuality does not figure in his plays, his unsatisfactory marriage may have influenced the criticism of the divorce laws found in Home and Beauty (1919) and the debate on economic and social sexism in The Constant Wife (1926).

In For Services Rendered (1932) his cynical wit is put aside to show the caustic effect of war on family life and in Sheppey (1933) he shows hostile public reaction to a barber who, on winning a lottery, attempts to use his winnings according to Christ's teaching. The Sacred Flame (1928) probably the best of his serious dramas, shows his greatest depth of feeling in a study of unrequited love, part of a murder story that offers a defence of euthanasia. Bib: Maugham, R., Somerset and All the Maughams; Morgan, T., Somerset Maugham; Brander, L., Somerset Maugham: A Guide.

May Day (1611)
A complex, multiple-plot comedy by ➤ George Chapman which skilfully interweaves a wealth of romance and native > pastoral motifs with stock characters from Plautine (> Plautus) and Terentian (> Terence) comedy. Unlike Chapman's tragedies, May Day is unimpeded by an overly inflated and abstract rhetoric.

Mayor, Flora M. (1872-1931)

Novelist and > short story writer who also wrote under the > pseudonym of Mary Stafford. The twin daughter of intellectual parents, and born into an Anglican clerical household that respected women's > education, Mayor was educated at Surbiton High School and Newnham. College, Cambridge. She initially pursued an acting career without parental consent. Mayor's first publication appeared during this period, a collection of short stories entitled Mrs Hammond's Children (1901). Mayor's career as an actress was terminated through illness, brought on by the sudden death of her fiancé in 1903. Mayor never married, and lived largely in the company of members of her family.

Mayor's writings champion the rights of middle-class unmarried women and widows at a time when the English spinster was regarded as a problem by political commentators and the > women's movement alike. Her first two novels take as their central theme different facets of spinsterhood, focusing particularly on psychological issues. In The Third Miss Symons (1913) Mayor explores the stereotype of the 'spurned' and unlikeable spinster in relation to a sensitive apprehension of the self-destructive effects of apparent social, sexual and emotional failure. The Rector's Daughter (1924) redresses the stereotype, detailing the complexity of the unconsummated but reciprocated passion between Mary Jocelyn and the neighbouring clergyman. The Squire's Daughter (1929) formulates an analysis of the disintegration of late-Victorian class boundaries, a concern which draws attention to Mayor's own conservative political beliefs. Mayor's novels are significant in their close examination of the inner life of women, and interestingly straddle late 19th- and early 20th-century gender ideologies. Mayor's only other publication is The Room Opposite and Other Tales of Mystery and Imagination (1935). Bib: Oldfield, S., Spinsters of this Parish; Williams, M., Six Women Novelists.

Mayor of Casterbridge, The (1886)
A novel by ➤ Thomas Hardy. Its hero is

A novel by > Thomas Hardy. Its hero is the country labourer, Michael Henchard. At the beginning of the book, when times are hard, he gets drunk at a fair and sells his wife and child (> marriage) to a sailor called Newson. He bitterly repents and renounces strong drink for twenty years. His wife returns after eighteen years, supposing Newson to be drowned, and by this time Henchard has prospered so far as to have become Mayor of Casterbridge (Dorchester). At the same time as her return Henchard takes on as his assistant in his business of corn-dealing a wandering Scotsman, Donald Farfrae. The rest of the novel is the story of the rivalry between Farfrae and Henchard. Farfrae is never deliberately his enemy, yet merely by virtue of living in the same town he deprives Henchard of everything, and the latter leaves the place at the end of the novel as poor as when he started, and far more wretched. Hardy seems to have intended a kind of Darwinian study of the survival of the fittest among human beings. Henchard is a monolithic character, who puts all his energy and passion into every relationship and activity; Farfrae has a flexible personality and is able to devote to every predicament exactly what it demands, without excess. Henchard's crowning sadness is the loss of the girl he has supposed to be his daughter but who is in fact Newson's; he loves her nonetheless, but Newson returns and claims her

Meaning and significance

A distinction made by the American theorist E. D. Hirsch. Hirsch argues that most literary works have a meaning which the ▷ author intended. But they also have a significance which readers experience in relation to these texts. This significance, for Hirsch, should be directly related to the meaning and not be merely idiosyncratic; that is, it represents for him the arena of legitimate interpretation in literary criticism. Some critics however object that literary works should be so tied to an ▷ author's intention (▷ Intentional Fallacy; Reader-Response Criticism; Text).

Bib: Hirsch, E. D., Validity in Interpretation.

Measure for Measure (1603-4)

A play by ▷ Shakespeare. It was probably written in 1603–4, and was first printed in the First Folio of 1623. Its plot derives from Promos and Cassandra (1578), the trańslation by ▷ George Whetstone of a tale by the Italian Cinthio. In the Folio it is grouped with the comedies, but modern critics are inclined to call it a ▷ problem play, a modern classification that includes ▷ Troilus and Cressida, ▷ All's Well that Ends Well, and sometimes ▷ Hamlet.

Vincentio, Duke of Vienna, is faced with the difficulty of enforcing severe laws against unchastity after they have fallen into disuse; he finds that the claims of justice and virtue conflict with those of mercy and compassion. He makes the experiment of pretending to leave the country so as to depute the task to Angelo, a man of austere life and rigid principle. In fact, the Duke remains on the scene, disguised as a friar, to watch the experiment. Angelo condemns Claudio to death for seducing his betrothed before marriage. Claudio's sister Isabella, a novitiate nun, comes to plead for her brother's life, urged on by Lucio, a man of loose life but a friend of Claudio's, Angelo is appalled to find that his lust is aroused for Isabella. His strict principle is transformed into brutal hypocrisy when he attempts to blackmail Isabella into surrendering herself in return for her brother's life. The disguised Duke induces her to pretend to consent, while he substitutes for her > Mariana, whom Angelo has coldheartedly discarded in spite of his engagement to her. Even after Isabella's apparent consent. Angelo orders Claudio's execution in order that no witness of his brutal conspiracy shall survive. Finally the Duke reveals himself, and exposes his deputy, but spares his life on the appeals of Isabella and Mariana.

It is necessary to remember the biblical text (Matthew 7:1) from which the title is taken: 'Judge not that ye be not judged. For with what judgement ye judge, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.' The three main problems that perplex critics are:

I The Duke is evidently intended to be a virtuous ruler, who even plays the role of God, the invisible witness of our most secret thoughts and actions. Viewed realistically, however, he escapes from his duty and then plays the role of a mean spy on Angelo's actions. The mistake here is to confuse the conventions of modern, realistic drama with the conventions of Shakespeare's drama. The latter saw character in terms of role, or social function, first, and in terms of individual psychology only second. Vincentio is a ruler as God is the Ruler; by taking on the role of the omnipresent witness who has ultimate power of judgement, he is extending his function, not escaping from it. Recently, connections between the Duke and ▶ James I, who also pursued pacifist policies, have been asserted, adding a historicist approach.

2 Isabella is presented as a virtuous woman, and yet she seems inexcusably callous in her refusal to put her brother's life before her own chastity. This is not a problem if we understand that Isabella's religious vocation is the meaning of life to her (I. iv); she has to be educated into seeing that virtue can never retain its value if it is segregated from life, just as law can never operate widely if it is isolated from knowledge of the human heart; this is Angelo's mistake.

3 Although the death penalty on Claudio is cruel, no one disputes that he has committed an offence, and yet later Angelo (by the contrivance of the Duke) is made to commit the same offence with Mariana, for which neither of them is held guilty. An answer to this is the difference between Claudio's and Angelo's actions. Claudio had offended against the law, but not against his betrothed, Juliet, whereas Angelo had previously offended against Mariana by renouncing his engagement to her, though not against the law. Morally, the play shows that Angelo's offence is the worse, and is in fact made good by his 'sin' of the Duke's contrivance.

784

For an adverse view of the play, see A. P. Rossiter in Angel with Horns; for favourable ones, see F. R. Leavis in The Common Pursuit and Wilson Knight in The Wheel of Fire; for a historical approach, see L. Marcus, Puzzling Shakespeare.

Bib: Hawkins, H., Measure for Measure.

Medall, The, A Satyre against Sedition (1682) A > satire in > heroic couplets by > John Dryden. The > Earl of Shaftesbury, leader of the Whig party which opposed the succession of the Catholic James, Duke of York, to the throne, had been acquitted on a charge of treason. Dryden found an ideal focus for his > mockheroic ridicule in the medal struck to celebrate the Whig victory, which shows Shaftesbury's head on the obverse, and on the reverse the sun rising over the Tower of London (where Shaftesbury had been imprisoned), with the legend Laetamur ('Let us rejoice').

Medieval, medievalism

The later 18th century saw a revival of interest in the art and literature of the > Middle Ages, as part of an incipient reaction against > Renaissance and > neo-classical ideals of symmetry and order. It coincided to a large degree with interest in the ▷ Gothic and the > primitive, and with a growing taste for the wilder forms of > nature. In politics there was a harking back to the ideas of Alfred the Great, whose balanced constitution, giving equal powers to the king, lords and commons, was seen as a model; many essays and plays refer to him. > Thomson's patriotic hymn 'Rule Britannia' was sung for the first time in a masque called Alfred (1740). Druids were idealized as early patriots in, for example, Thomson's Liberty, ➤ Collins' Ode to Liberty, and ➤ Grav's The Bard. The ancient British queen Boudicca, or Boadicea, was also held up as a symbol of courage and patriotism, as in > Cowper's Boadicea. Admiration for ancient ➤ Welsh, ➤ Irish and ➤ Scottish literature is also part of the medieval revival, as is revealed in the ➤ Ossian or Oisin saga. The quest for old English as well as Celtic literature resulted in such works as ➤ Thomas Percy's Reliques of English Poetry (1765), which was much admired by the > Romantic poets later on, and ➤ Thomas Warton's History of English Poetry (1774-89), which involved exploring hundreds of examples of medieval verse. The development of the >. Gothic novel, with its medieval associations and a renewed interest in Spenser, ▷ Shakespeare and ▷ Milton, who were thought to have drawn their inspiration from medieval romance, formed a part of the movement. Shakespeare became admired precisely for the 'crude' elements of speech and plot structure which had alienated earlier generations, particularly immediately after the Restoration, and elements of his plays which had been excised for a hundred years or more were gradually restored to the texts performed on stage. In the 19th century the ideas sown in the 18th developed into a full-blown extended movement.

The nostalgia for an idealized medieval period that animated several writers of the Victorian period had its roots in a profound dissatisfaction with and rejection of aspects of the society and culture of the time. Enthusiasm for things medieval was stimulated by the ➤ Oxford Movement's interest in the medieval background of the Church. For > Thomas Carlyle the 12th century was epitomized by everything he found missing in his own society: universal religious belief, a society based on community feeling rather than cash, electoral systems which resulted in the appointment of the best candidate, and a benevolent and uncorrupted dictatorship free from what he saw as the inefficiency of parliamentary democracy. His essay > Past and Present (1843) contains a finely realized study of the 12th-century Abbot Samson of Bury St Edmunds.

The poet > Elizabeth Barrett Browning disguises her analysis of contemporary sexual politics by placing the action of her > ballad 'The Romaunt of the Page' (1839) in a picturesque medieval setting. 'The Lay of the Brown Rosary' (1840) is also set in the medieval period as are many of ➤ Robert Browning's poems, such as 'The Statue and the Bust', which deals obliquely with the possessiveness, both in material and sexual terms, which he saw as characteristic of his age. ➤ Tennyson was likewise possessed by 'the Passion of the past' and reacted to the problem of producing 'contemporary poetry' by adapting ancient genres to the treatment of modern subjects. His poem 'Morte d'Arthur', based on Sir Thomas Malory's long prose romance of the same name written around 1469/70, uses a medieval form to examine contemporary issues such as the collapse of political, intellectual, and religious orthodoxy. Tennyson developed this project in his ambitious Arthurian epic ➤ The Idylls of the King. Malory's original text was reprinted at the end of the 19th century with illustrations by ➤ Aubrey Beardsley.

However, it was the ▷ Pre-Raphaelites − ▷ William Morris, ▷ Dante Gabriel Rossetti and ▷ John Ruskin − who raised nostalgia for the Middle Ages to a creed. They upheld the strong moral tone of Victorian art and believed in a medieval world (largely of their own invention) in which culture was serious, satisfying, and integrated into the fabric of society. 'Apart from the desire to produce beautiful things,' wrote Morris in 1894, 'the leading passion of my life has been and is hatred of modern civilization.' Much of Morris' early verse such as 'The Defence of Guinevere' has a medieval setting. At the same time he was dedicated to the revival of domestic crafts, in reaction to an increasingly mechanized age. The Pre-Raphaelites were also attracted to the ideals of courtly love (passionate yet unconsummated love which could take on a sacramental quality as the sublime experience) embodied in the Medieval period. The Aesthetes, influenced by > Pater, supplanted an idealized Middle Ages as a source of inspiration with an equally idealized Renaissance. Since the 19th century, however, Medievalism has dropped out of fashion.

Bib: Morris, K. L., The Image of the Middle Ages in Romantic and Victorian Literature; Chency, L.D.G. (ed.), Pre-Raphaelitism and Medievalism in the Arts.

Meiosis

> Figures of Speech.

Melibee, The Tale of

The second of ➤ Chaucer's own contributions to the ➤ Canterbury Tales, which follows the narrative of ➤ Sir Thopas rejected by the Host. This allegorical prose narrative concerns the counselling of the impetuous Melibeus, by his wise wife Dame Prudence. The treatise derives from a French source, itself a translation of an earlier 14th century Latin composition.

Melincourt, or Sir Oran Haut-ton (1817) A novel by ➤ Thomas Love Peacock. Sir Oran Haut-ton is an orang-outang of delightful manners and a good flute-player for whom the young philosopher, Mr Sylvan Forester, has bought the title of baronet and a seat in Parliament. 'Haut ton' is a French phrase then used in English for 'high tone', ie fashionable, refined, and aristocratic. Peacock is developing the idea of Lord Monboddo (1714-90), an early anthropologist, who describes such a creature in his books, as an example of 'the infantine state of our species'; Peacock's ape, however, compares favourably with the aristocracy. The book is a satire on the rightwing (Tory) establishment, and especially those writers who had once been Radicals but now favoured it: > Southey (Mr Feathernest); ➤ Wordsworth (Mr Paperstamp); ➤ Coleridge (Mr Mystic). Mr Vamp and Mr Killthedead are Tory reviewers, and Mr Fax may represent ➤ Malthus. Sylvan Forester may be the poet > Shelley; and Simon Sarcastic, Peacock himself.

Melodrama

The prefix 'melo-' derives from the Greek 'melos', music. Originally, melodrama was a play in which there was no singing but the dialogue had a musical accompaniment; the first example is said to be ➤ Rousseau's Pygmalion (1775). The musical accompaniment gradually ceased; the word came to denote romantic plays of extravagantly violent action, and it is now applied to sensational action without adequate motivation, in any work of fiction.

The word has also been used to denote popular ballad operas in which spoken dialogue is used extensively. This use, however, is much less common.

Melville, Lady Elizabeth Culross (c 1603)
Poet. Her poem, Ane Godly Dreame (1603), is a Calvinist account of the horrors of hell in store for all those except God's anointed. It is a first-person dream vision of a pilgrimage through smoking pits and damned souls, which combines strong imagery with graceful eightline stanzas. It belongs to the Scottish tradition of ▷ Presbyterian texts in which individual prophesying and personal interpretations of the ▷ Bible were increasingly encouraged.

> Calvin, John; Scottish literature in English. Bib: Greer, G. (ed.), Kissing the Rod.

Memoir novel

A novel which is presented as an autobiographical account but is in fact partly or wholly fictitious, such as ▷ Defoe's ▷ Moll Flanders (1722) or ▷ Charlotte Brontë's ▷ Jane Eyre (1847).

Memoirs of a Cavalier (1724)

A work of fiction by ▷ Daniel Defoe, but it was thought that the memoirs were possibly genuine. They describe the career of a professional soldier, Colonel Andrew Newport, born in 1608. He sees military service in Europe during the ▷ Thirty Years War, and then joins the English Royalist army in the ▷ Civil War.

Men and Women (1855)

A volume of poems by ▷ Robert Browning. It contained fifty pieces, nearly all ▷ dramatic monologues, a form in which a character soliloquizes about himself, his predicament or his relationship with another. The book contains much of Browning's best-known work, such as 'Any Wife to Any Husband', 'Andrea del Sarto', 'Fra Lippo Lippi'. In the Collected Works of 1868, the poems were dispersed, and only thirteen remained under the title Men and Women.

Menander (342-293 BC)

An Athenian comic poet whose plays were popular in the classical world and provided the characteristic matrix of ▷ New Comedy, which became the model for both ▷ Plautus and ▷ Terence. Menander is widely acknowledged by the Roman dramatists as their mentor, but it was not until the 20th century (1905) that substantial parts of manuscripts of his plays and one complete work (Dyskolos, 1955) were discovered. These confirmed the high regard in which Menander was held by his contemporaries.

Mephistopheles

An evil spirit whose name first occurs in the German Faustbuch (1587), a collection of tales about the necromancer ≥ Johann Faust. He is one of the seven great princes of hell. As Mephostophilis he is best known in English through Marlowe's ≥ Doctor Faustus (1592).

Mercantile system

A term used by the economist ➤ Adam Smith (Wealth of Nations, 1776) and later writers to denote the assumptions behind the practice of commerce from the later ➤ Middle Ages until the 18th century. In its extreme form, it identified wealth with money so that the main object of governments was to accumulate large stocks of precious metals. Smith advocated a contrary theory of ➤ free trade, which became the dominant policy by the middle of the 19th century.

Bib: Foucault, M., The Order of Things.

Mercer, David (1928-80)

British dramatist renowned for his television work as much as his stage plays, some of which have been performed by the ➤ Royal Shakespeare Company. He was one of the first to write serious plays for television dealing with the working class. Mercer's treatment of this subject has been accused of being excessively nostalgic and only his middle-class, not his working-class, characters are generally given any intellectual depth. Social alienation and madness are commonly the fate of those who move away from their class origins. Although he wrote from a Marxist perspective, there is little optimism about the modern world in his plays. Television plays include: The Generations (1961-3); Morgan, A Suitable Case for Treatment (1962); For Tea on Sunday (1963); In Two Minds (1967); On the Eve of Publication (1968); The Cellar and the Almond Tree (1970); Emma's Time (1970). Stage plays include: Ride a Cock Horse (1965); Belcher's Luck (1966); After Haggarty (1970); Duck Song (1974); Cousin Vladimir (1978); The Monster of Karlovy Vary (1979); Then and Now (1979).

Bib: Trussler, S. (ed.), New Theatre Voices of the Seventies.

Merchant of Venice, The (1596–7) A comedy by ▷ Shakespeare. It is dated by external evidence 1596–7. Its two outstanding incidents – the winning of a bride by undergoing a test, and the demanding of a pound of human flesh by the usurer – occur in a number of earlier narratives, but Shakespeare seems to have depended principally on a collection of Italian novels called Il Pecorone (The Blockhead) and the Gesta Romanorum (Tales of the Romans). Description Quarto edition, 1600; included in the First Folio (1623).

The play has a double plot.

- I An impoverished young Venetian, Bassanio, seeks to marry a wealthy heiress, Portia of Belmont. For the expense of the courtship he has to borrow 3,000 ducats from his friend, the merchant Antonio. When Bassanio and Portia meet, they fall in love at first sight, but before she can surrender herself, Bassanio has to pass the test of the caskets, ordained by her dead father. The test is to choose between a gold, a silver, and a lead casket; the right casket contains her portrait. He passes the test, but their rejoicing is interrupted by the arrival of a letter from Antonio.
- 2 Antonio's money is all invested in mercantile expeditions, so that to help Bassanio he has had to borrow from the Jewish usurer, Shylock. Shylock has made the strange stipulation that Antonio will have to surrender a pound of flesh in default of repayment. Antonio's letter now relates that his voyaging ships have all been lost, he is penniless, and will have to pay the pound of flesh. The two plots join in the trial scene of IV. i. The issue has come before a court of law at which Portia appears disguised as a young lawyer instructed to judge the case. She appeals to Shylock to show mercy, but when he insists on the letter of the law she lets him have it: he may take his pound of flesh, but there is no mention of blood in the bond; if he sheds any, the law of Venice is clear: his lands and goods are to become the property of the state. Antonio is saved, and Shylock has to undergo certain severe penalties, including compulsory conversion to Christianity. Act V concludes the play with light comedy and the lyrical union of several pairs of lovers.

Like others of Shakespeare's earlier comedies, the play is a mixture of courtly sophistication, light fantasy, and moving realism. The plot belongs to fable and fairy story, and the love affairs to the tradition of courtly romance. On the other hand, Shylock is a very powerful, sombre figure and brings a sharp criticism to bear on the otherwise glibly accepted value judgements of the court. His bond, however, is counterbalanced by Antonio's arrogant treatment of him and the eloquent irony with which Shylock protests against it. The trial scene is one of the elements of fable in the play: in real terms, Shylock is being treated with gross unjustice, but the real theme is the contrast between Mercy and the Law. It is the function of mere Law to be merciless; he who refuses mercy and insists on law must abide by the consequences.

Bib: Danson, L., The Harmonies of Merchant of Venice.

Merchant's Tale, The One of > Chaucer's > Canterbury Tales. Prompted by the Clerk's Tale of patient Griselda, the Merchant tells a contrasting story of married life, set in Italy, involving the tricking of an old jealous husband, January, by his young wife, May, and her lover, Damian (who is January's squire). The tale is built up from a mixture of different styles, registers, and generic conventions. It begins in a debate mode with a long discussion about the theory and practice of married life, which injects a tone of Christian idealism into the narrative; the relationship between May and Damian is described using the register of a courtly romance (although the two lovers hardly live up to romance role models); the characters' names give the narrative a semi-allegorical quality; the intervention of the classical gods in January's garden endows the action with an epic touch (since the gods function as a domestic deus ex machina); while the plot structure itself is basically that of a > fabliau. The climax of the tale comes when the old, now blind, knight January miraculously recovers his sight, only to see his wife making love with Damian in a pear tree. This climactic scene has many European analogues but none has the elaborate build-up

Mercia

One of the ancient > Anglo-Saxon kingdoms from the 6th to the 9th centuries. From the 10th century to the > Norman Conquest (1066) it was an earldom in the kingdom of England. It roughly corresponded to the modern Midlands.

which distinguishes Chaucer's version.

Meredith, George (1828-1909)

Novelist and poet. Born at Portsmouth, the son of a tailor and naval outfitter; his grandfather, Melchizedeck, had had the same business and is the basis of the character Old Mel in the novel Evan Harrington (1861). George Meredith was educated in Germany and his writings were influenced by ➤ Germans, especially the novelist Jean Paul Richter (1763–1825), who stimulated his conception of comedy. Meredith was even closer to ➤ French culture, especially the radical thinking of the 18th-century Philosophes. On his return to England he began to study law but soon took to journalism and serious literature.

He began by publishing verse: Poems (1851). In 1855 he published his eastern romance Shaving of Shagpat, and in 1857 a romance in German style, Farina, a Legend of Cologne. ➤ The Ordeal of Richard Feverel (1859) was his first real novel, followed by Evan Harrington, which is now regarded as one of his best. In 1862 he produced his most famous volume of poems, ➤ Modern Love. Other publications included:

Sandra Belloni (1864; originally called Emilia in England); Rhoda Fleming (1865); Vittoria (1867 - a sequel to Sandra); The Adventures of Harry Richmond (1871); Beauchamp's Career (1875 his own favourite); The Idea of Comedy (1877 - a critical essay, important for understanding his work); > The Egoist (1879 - one of his best known novels); The Tragic Comedians (1880); Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth (1883); Diana of the Crossways (1885 - the first of his novels to reach a wide public); Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life (1887); A Reading of Earth (1888 - verse); One of Our Conquerors (1891); The Empty Purse (1892 - a poem); Lord Ormont and his Aminta (1894); The Amazing Marriage (1895). His concluding works were all poetry: Odes in Contribution to the Song of French History (1898); A Reading of Life (1901); Last Poems (published in 1910 after his death). His unfinished novel, Celt and Saxon, was also published posthumously.

Meredith's reputation at present rests chiefly on his novels but, like > Thomas Hardy, he seems to have been a novelist who preferred poetry. His prose is poetic in its use of metaphor and ⊳ symbolism, and both his poetry and his prose are often expressed in concentrated and difficult language which invites comparison with > Robert Browning. The impulsiveness and ruggedness of his prose also recalls > Thomas Carlyle, whom Meredith resembled in his hostility to the mechanistic qualities of his age. Of all the Victorian novelists who ever had a major reputation, his has perhaps sunk the lowest in this century: both his prose and his poetry tend to be regarded as intolerably mannered and he is accused of fixing his attention on style as an end, instead of using it as a medium. Nonetheless, his intense interest in psychological exploration (again recalling Browning), his use of metaphor and symbol from the natural world to express states of mind and the freshness of some of his characters (especially women) were all original in his own time and keep him from being forgotten. Bib: Stevenson, L., Life; Lindsay, L., Life; Trevelyan, G.M., Poetry and Philosophy of George Meredith; Sassoon, S., Meredith; Sitwell. O., Novels of Meredith; Lees, F.N., in Pelican Guide 6: Dickens to Hardy; Cline, C.L., Letters; Woolf. V., in Common Reader; Williams, D., George Meredith: His Life and Lost Love.

Meres, Francis (1565–1647) Author of Pallados Tamia, Wit's Treasury (1598), a book of moral and critical reflections. One chapter is an account of English writers, and his comments are interesting for estimating their reputations at the time. Bib: Smith, G. G., Elizabethan Critical Essays.

Merlin

Prophet and enchanter who comes to play a central role in directing the early stages of Arthurian history. Merlin first appears in the guise of prophet of British history and magic worker in > Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of British history (completed c 1138). There, a whole book is devoted to his veiled predictions about the future shape of British history; he is also responsible for the removal of Stonehenge from Ireland to Britain, and he engineers ➤ King Arthur's conception by allowing > Uther to take on the guise of > Igraine's husband. His name, 'Merlinus', is an adaptation of 'Myrddyn', the bard who features in Welsh legendary narratives, and is credited with the prophecy of a future Celtic revival. So although Merlin first appears in Geoffrey's work, there are earlier precedents for his role. In Geoffrey of Monmouth's poetic account of the Vita Merlini (the Life of Merlin), completed c 1150, the seer is presented as a former battle leader who has gone mad after a great defeat, and lives as a man of the woods, endowed with prophetic insight. In > Robert de Boron's version of Arthurian narrative, which gives a pronounced Christian bias to the history, Merlin is conceived as part of the Devil's plot to oppose Christ; however, the goodness of his mother ensures that his magical powers are used for positive ends. He is credited with the founding of the > Round Table and with the arrangements for Arthur's fostering. In > Malory's Morte D'Arthur

Mermaid Tavern

A 16th-century tavern in London's Bread Street. According to legend the Bread Street, or Friday Night, Club was founded by ➤ Sir Walter Ralegh, and was one of the earliest English clubs and meeting-places of writers.

Merlin has a key role to play in setting up the Arthurian kingdom and mapping out the shape of later events but he is prevented from playing any further part in the history because he is entrapped in a rock by Nimue (or Viviane), after he has taught her his magical secrets.

Merry Wives of Windsor, The (1597) A comedy by > Shakespeare, probably written 1597 in connection with the celebrations of the > Garter Knights, to whose order the younger Lord Hunsdon, patron of Shakespeare's acting company, was elected that year; an imperfect edition came out in 1602 and a corrected version was published in the First Folio of 1623. The critic John Dennis (1657-1734) states that it was written at the request of > Queen Elizabeth I, who wanted a play about ➤ Sir John Falstaff in love. Falstaff had been a great popular success in the two ➤ Henry IV plays. It has also been suggested that Shakespeare was emulating the realistic comedy of ➤ Thomas Dekker (> Shoemaker's Holiday, 1600) and > Ben Jonson (> Every Man in his Humour, 1598; ➤ Every Man out of his Humour, 1599). The Merry Wives is the only play by Shakespeare to be written mainly in prose.

Falstaff makes love to two married women, the wives of Ford and Page; but the wives and their husbands finally expose him in Windsor Forest, after he has been beset by neighbours disguised as fairies. A subordinate plot concerns the wooing of Anne Page by three suitors, and how she and Fenton, the suitor she prefers, contrive their elopement.

Apart from Falstaff, other characters recur from the Henry IV and V plays: Nym, Pistol, Slender, Mistress Quickly. Falstaff in The Merry Wives bears little resemblance to the creation of the earlier plays.

Metafiction

This term is applied to fictional writing which questions the relationship between reality and fiction through deliberately and self-consciously drawing attention to its own status as a linguistic construct. Examples would include

- ▶ John Fowles' The French Lieutenant's Woman,
 ▶ Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children and
- Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children and Dan Jacobson's The Rape of Tamar.
- Historiographic metafiction.

Metalanguage

A term coined by the linguist L. Hjelmslev to describe a language which refers to another language rather than to non-linguistic objects, situations or events. In the words of ➤ Roland Barthes it is 'a second language in which one speaks about the first' (Mythologies). In this sense, metalanguage can be used as a means of reflecting on language itself.

> Metafiction.

Metamorphoses

Poems in Eatin by ▷ Ovid. They are a series of mythological tales whose common subject is miraculous transformation of shape, beginning with Chaos into Cosmos, ending with ▷ Julius Caesar into a star, and including such tales as Baucis and Philemon, the peasants who unawares gave hospitality to the gods, who granted them immortality as a pair of trees. They were popular in medieval Europe and afterwards, up till the 19th century, and have often been translated, in whole or in part, into English eg by ▷ Arthur Golding in the 16th century and by George Sandys in the 17th.

Metaphor

> Figures of Speech.

Metaphysical

A complex philosophical term used in some contemporary critical discourse as the opposite of materialism, usually with negative connotations. Metaphysical ideas are ideas which posit a level of reality or causation which is beyond the physical world. A belief in God would be an example of a metaphysical belief.

Metaphysical conceit

➤ Metaphysical Poets; Conceit.

Metaphysical Poets

The accepted designation of a succession of 17th-century poets, of whom the following are the principal names: > John Donne, > George Herbert, ▷ Richard Crashaw, ▷ Andrew Marvell, ▷ Henry Vaughan, ▷ Abraham Cowley. The term came to be applied to them in a special sense; that is to say, they were not so described because their subject was the relationship of spirit to matter or the ultimate nature of reality; this is true of > Lucretius, ➤ Milton and ➤ Dante, who have little else in common. It is true that some of them - Donne, Herbert, Vaughan and Crashaw especially - were metaphysical in this generally accepted sense, but the adjective is applied to them to indicate not merely subject matter, but qualities of expression in relation to subject matter.

Samuel Johnson (1709-84) was the first so to classify these poets: 'The metaphysical poets were men of learning, and to show their learning was their whole endeavour' (essay on Cowley in Lives of the Poets). The sentence shows that he is using the term disparagingly, and this disparagement had already been expressed by John Dryden (1631-1700): 'Donne affects the metaphysics not only in his satires but in his amorous verses . . . [he] perplexes the mind of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy' (Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of Satire, 1693). Dryden and Johnson were antagonistic to Donne and his followers because they valued above all the assurance, clarity, restraint and shapeliness of the major Augustan poets of ancient Rome. Critics and poets of the 20th century have on the other hand immensely admired Donne, Herbert and Marvell, but they still use 'Metaphysical' as the term under which to group them. H. J. C. Grierson (Introduction, Metaphysical Poetry: Donne to Butler) justifies it because it indicates 'the peculiar blend of passion and thought, feeling and ratiocination which is their greatest achievement.' However, they have also been labelled 'The Fantasticks' (an anthology edited by W. S. Scott) and L. B. Martz has suggested The Poetry of Meditation (the title of his book). The first of these alternative designations suggests a resemblance between the English poets and their so-called 'baroque' contemporaries in Italy (Marino), Spain (Góngora) and France (Théophile de Viau and Saint-Amant); the second emphasizes the difference - the greater balance and control among the English poets; it may be said that Crashaw, at one extreme, belongs more to the former, and Herbert, at the other extreme, is much better described as 'meditative'.

The distinctiveness of the Metaphysicals was their use of the so-called 'metaphysical \triangleright conceit' – ie paradoxical metaphor causing a shock to the mind by the unlikeness of the association, eg Donne's her pure and eloquent blood Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought, That one might almost say her body thought.

(Second Anniversary)

or Herbert's

Only a sweet and virtuous soul
Like season'd timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal
Then chiefly lives.
(Virtue)

In most respects, therefore the term is so broad, and embraces poetic styles and forms so disparate, that its use is nearly meaningless, being little more than an anthologist's convenience.

Bib: Smith, A. J., The Wit of Love.

Metonymy

➤ Figures of Speech.

Metre

From the Greek word meaning 'measure'. In poetry, metre is the measure of the rhythm of a line of verse, when the line is rhythmically systematic, ie can be divided into units of 'metrical feet'. The names for these feet all derive from ancient Greek verse. The commonest feet in use in English are as follows:

Iambus eg the words
'again', 'revenge', delight'.
'Iambics march from short to long.'

Trochee eg the words
'never', 'happy', 'heartless'.
'Trochee trips from long to short.'

Anapest eg the words
'entertain', 'supersede', 'engineer'.
'With a leap and a bound the swift anapaests throng.'

Spondee 'eg the words
'maintain', 'heartbreak', 'wineglass'
'Slow spondee stalks, strong foot...'

Dactyl eg the words
'melody', 'happiness', 'sorrowful'.
'...yet ill able

'Éver to come up with dactyl trisyllable.'

The illustrative lines are taken from > Coleridge's mnemonic rhyme 'Metrical Feet' (the dactyl example in particular being a joke).

It is important to remember three points when analysing ('scanning') English verse:

I Despite Coleridge's use of 'long' and 'short' for iambic and trochaic feet, these words are inappropriate to English metrical feet, which are composed of accented and unaccented syllables (two accented ones in the case of the spondee) irrespective of their length.

2 Except in the case of the iambus, it is unusual to find lines of verse composed entirely of the same foot; this is especially true of the spondee and the dactyl.

3 It is unwise to think of metre at all when reading a great deal of English verse. Old and Middle English ▷ alliterative verse was not metrical. ▷ Chaucer's is metrical, but not consistently so; his verse depends more on the natural rhythms of the English speaking voice. This is also true of ▷ Sir Thomas Wyatt in the early 16th century, of the mature dramatic verse of ▷ Shakespeare and his contemporaries, of ▷ John Donne, of ▷ Gerard Manley Hopkins in the 19th century, and of many 20th-century poets.

Verse lines have names according to the number of feet they contain; much the commonest English line is the iambic pentameter (five feet). The hexameter has six feet, and is called an ▷ Alexandrine when they are iambic. Other lengths: monometer = one foot; dimeter = two feet; trimeter = three feet; tetrameter = four feet; heptameter = seven feet; octameter = eight feet. Some minor 16th-century poets used lines of 14 syllables known as 'fourteeners'; a couplet consisting of a fourteener and an Alexandrine, first used by Wyatt, is known as the ▷ poulter's measure.

➤ Blank verse; Free verse; Ode; Sonnet.

Mew, Charlotte (1869-1928)

Poet and > short story writer, born in London to a genteel but oppressive middle-class family. Mew's life was overshadowed by the mental illness of two siblings and the death of her father, which was to leave her impoverished in her late twenties. Despite limited educational advantages she published her first poems and a short story, 'Passed', in the > Yellow Book' shortly before the public scandal of ➤ Oscar Wilde's arrest in 1895 left the magazine greatly discredited. She also published in The English Woman and The Egoist. Her work was well received by ➤ Thomas Hardy, John Masefield (1878-1967), publisher Harold Monro (1879-1932) and Walter de la Mare (1873-1956), whose combined influence secured her a civil list pension in 1923. She committed suicide in 1928 by drinking Lysol after the death of her closest sister, Anne. Because of its naturalistic form, her work is frequently linked with the early 20th-century Georgian school, despite her exclusion from representative anthologies of this poetic movement. However, her immunity from the stylistic innovations of modernism, as well as from the sexual and political freedoms of the 20th century, coupled with her thematic concerns with female selfrepression, lost childhood and the past has led critics to regard her as a late Victorian in spirit. She published only two volumes of poetry and her reputation rests on twentyeight poems, most of which were written before 1916. Her work is characterized by a complex use of the > dramatic monologue, in poems such as 'The Farmer's Bride', 'In Nunhead Cemetery', 'The Quiet House' and 'Madeleine in Church', to explore gender relations, frustrated and obsessive sexuality, loss and extreme psychological isolation. In the 1920s both Hardy and Virginia Woolf (1882-1941) regarded her as the greatest living woman poet.

Bib: Leighton, A., Victorian Women Poets: Writing Against the Heart; Fitzgerald, P., Charlotte Mew and Her Friends; Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology

of Victorian Women Poets.

Meynell, Alice (1847-1922)

Poet and essayist, born in Barnes, London, and educated at home by her father. She converted to > Catholicism in 1868, a faith shared by her concert-pianist mother. Her first volume of verse, Preludes, was published in 1875, attracting praise from > George Eliot and from the author and editor Wilfred Mevnell, whom she married in 1877. Further volumes followed, including Poems (1893); Other Poems (1896); Later Poems (1902); Poems on the War (1916) and Last Poems (1923). Meynell's lyrical and mystical poetry gained her a high reputation, particularly among writers, and after > Tennyson's death she was proposed as Poet Laureate. She had eight children, and supported the family by writing for periodicals and newspapers, including The National Observer and The Pall Mall Gazette. Her essays were collected under various titles, which include The Rhythm of Life (1893), The Colour of Life (1896) and The Spirit of Place (1899). She also wrote translations, produced editions and wrote biographies of Holman Hunt (1893) and ➤ Ruskin (1900). She was active in the > women's suffrage movement in the early years of the 20th century. Bib: Michalik, K., Meynell: Her Life and Works;

Badeni, J., Life; Leighton, A., and Reynolds, P. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Michael (1800)

A poem in ▷ blank verse by ▷ William Wordsworth concerning the austere life of a shepherd in the Lake District, whose only son Luke goes away to work in town, meets disgrace, and then disappears. The emptiness of Michael's life without his son is symbolized, in an image of characteristic simplicity, by the unbuilt sheepfold, whose first stone Luke had laid before his departure as a covenant between them. Michael spends the last seven years of his life brooding over it and leaves it still unfinished at his death.

▶ Lake Poets.

Microcosmographie

> Characters, Theophrastian.

Middlemarch, A Study of Provincial Life
(1871-2)

A novel by George Eliot, considered by many to be her finest work. It is set in the years immediately preceding the 1832 > Reform Bill, a time of unrest, agitation and intense political discussion, but its ideas are more relevent to the mid-Victorian period when it was written. The material was originally intended for two novels, one centred on Dorothea Brooke and the other a study of provincial life in the town of Middlemarch, based on Coventry. Unity is achieved by the fusion of the two senses of 'provincial': the geographical sense of 'situated outside the capital' and the cultural one of 'ignorant of the central current of ideas'. Dorothea, the daughter of a country gentleman, aspires to a life of high spiritual conduct; she is, however, isolated geographically, socially and intellectually, and she finds no scope for her ambitions. In consequence she is led to an infatuation with Mr Casaubon, an elderly parson-scholar whose life's work is the writing of his Key to all Mythologies, in which he expects to demonstrate the centrality of the Christian scriptures. Unfortunately his work is rendered futile by his ignorance of the leading (German) scholarship in his field, and his egoism and narrowness of human experience prevent him from appreciating the quality of Dorothea's ardour and potentiality. He dies having failed in his ambition.

The disillusionment and failure of their marriage runs parallel to that of Tertius Lydgate, a young doctor engaged in radical research, and the materialistic Rosamund Vincy. Unlike Casaubon, Lydgate is alert to the intellectual centre of his thought (Paris) and he has chosen to live in a provincial town only because he supposes that by so doing he can escape the social involvements and professional rivalries of the metropolis. Rosamund is the daughter of a Middlemarch manufacturer who has the typically provincial ambition to raise his family to the level of metropolitan fashion, and she is attracted to Lydgate only because he has aristocratic relations. She has no understanding of his intellectual promise and does nothing but frustrate it. Moreover, Lydgate's arrogance in viewing women as ornamental reflections of himself blinds him to Rosamund's real personality. Lydgate's career is virtually ruined when he becomes involved in a scandal concerning Bulstrode, a banker and bigoted > Dissenter.

Dorothea's vouthful desire is similarly thwarted, but at the end of the novel she seems to find happiness with Will Ladislaw, a young relative of her husband's who differs from the other characters by being essentially cosmopolitan in his background and outlook. Another centre of judgement is the Garth family, who acknowledge their provinciality and, by avoiding illusions, achieve balanced insights and clear directions for their energies in ways that are less provincial than those of their superiors. A minor character, but central to George Eliot's valuations, is the freethinking parson Farebrother, condemned to a life of self-sacrifice by external causes. He is neither bitter nor unctuous, and is also capable of great sympathy for others. Through the portrayal of these characters, and others such as Cadwallader, Chettam and Brooke, Eliot analyses the social and political upheavals of the early 19th century and exposes the sexual prejudice that permeated the society of the day. The limitations imposed upon women's lives are highlighted in the case of Dorothea, while the dangers of contemporary ideologies of femininity are explored in Rosamund. The detailed and thorough analysis of gender in the novel has not prevented some critics from arguing that at the heart of Eliot's vision is a conservatism that emphasizes the need for individuals to curb their own desires in the face of social duty.

> Realism.

Bib: Peck, J., (ed) Middlemarch: Casebook; Brady, K., George Eliot.

Middleton, Christopher (b 1926)

Poet, literary critic and translator. Middleton was born in Cornwall, educated at Cambridge and became a university lecturer in Germany, England and then America. He teaches German studies, and his work is influenced by German and French literature, although it is notoriously eclectic, drawing also on English > Victorian poets, > Dada and > Spanish poetry. Middleton's work is both technically precise and extremely difficult - it employs highly disruptive techniques, disturbing conventional syntax and rhythm and in this lies its obscurity. His texts include: Torse 3: Poems 1949-1961 (1962); Our Flowers & Nice Bones (1970); The Lonely Suppers of W. V. Balloon (1975); Pataxanadu (1976).

Middleton, Elizabeth (c 1637) Poet. Little is known about Elizabeth Middleton, although G. Greer in Kissing the Rod (1988) suggests that she might belong to the Myddleton family of Denbighshire and includes detailed genealogical material to that effect. We know of her existence through one extant devotional poem, 'The Death and passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ' (1637). It has 173 six-line stanzas which take the form of an oratorio, the biblical narrative event being followed by a passionate statement of one speaker's emotional response. Her imagery is simple, but strong, and her language is clearly influenced by other religious writers such as > Robert Southwell.

Middleton, Thomas (1580-1627)

Dramatist. Little is known about his life; he may have been a student of law in London and in the 1590s he was at Oxford University. Later he was often employed to write ➤ pageants to celebrate civic occasions, and in 1620 he was appointed city chronologer (historian).

His masterpieces were two tragedies: ➤ Women Beware Women (1614) and ▷ The Changeling (1622), with a subplot by > William Rowley. The latter play is one of the finest tragedies in English since ➤ Shakespeare. In his comedies he was one of the two notable successors to ➤ Ben Jonson, the other being ➤ Philip Massinger. His best are probably: A Trick to Catch the Old-one (1604), > The Roaring Girl (with > Dekker, 1606), and above all > A Chaste Maid in Cheapside (1611). These, like others of his comedies, are ➤ citizen comedies, ie about London middle-class life. like the comedies of Dekker, but presented with more substantial realism. > A Game at Chess (1624) was a political satire provoked by the king's failure to marry his son to a Spanish princess; its performance was stopped by the protest of the Spanish ambassador. The Witch, a > revenge play of uncertain date, may have influenced Shakespeare's ➤ Macbeth but was more probably influenced by it, and Middleton has been thought by some to have contributed Act III, Sc. v in Macbeth.

With Rowley, Middleton also wrote A Fair Quarrel (1614); The World Tost at Tennis (1620); The Spanish Gipsy (1623). Plays ascribed to Middleton alone: The Old Law (1599); Blurt, Master-Constable (1601-2); The Family of Love (1602); Michaelmas Term (1605); The Phoenix (1607); A Mad World, my Masters (1606); Your Five Gallants (?1607); > No Wit, No Help like a Woman's (?1613); Anything for a Quiet Life (?1617); More Dissemblers besides Women (before 1622); The Widow (uncertain date). Eleven of his > masques have survived. He also wrote some minor poetry and prose ➤ pamphlets. Bib: Bradbrook, M. C., Elizabethan Tragedy; Knights, L. C., Drama and Society in the Age of Jonson; Barker, R. H., Thomas Middleton; Heinemann, M., Puritanism and Theatre; Mulryne, J. R., Thomas Middleton.

Midsummer Night's Dream, A (1595) A comedy by Shakespeare. From internal evidence it has been dated about 1595; it was printed in 1600. The title refers to the fantastic quality of events, resembling a dream on Midsummer night, when fantastic dreams were supposed to be commonly experienced.

The characters are in four distinct groups. The background is the court of a character from Greek mythology, King Theseus of Athens, on the eve of his marriage to Hippolyta, queen of the Amazons. The four lovers whose confusions form the bulk of the action, Helena and Demetrius, Hermia and Lysander (as they are eventually paired), have classical names, but their story is a typical comedy of ▷ Renaissance romantic love, in which they are all victims of blind passion. The third group is made from the Athenian artisans whose names - ➤ Bottom, Ouince, Snout, Flute and Starveling - show them to be English types of Shakespeare's own day. They celebrate Theseus' wedding night (and that of the other lovers) by performing the interlude > 'Pyramus and Thisbe' - intended to be tragic but, as they carry it out, decidedly comic. The fourth group is the ⊳ fairies. In general (especially > Puck, or Robin Goodfellow) these are drawn from English folklore, but their king, > Oberon, comes from Huon de Bordeaux (a medieval French romance) and Titania from > Ovid's > Metamorphoses. Oberon, through Puck, confuses the lovers as they wander through the wood near Athens, and causes Titania to fall in love with Bottom, who, for the night, is given an ass's head. The fantasy is deftly contrived.

Mildmay, Grace (1552-1620)

Autobiographer. Despite an extremely strict upbringing, during which she was regularly beaten, Mildmay gained confidence in her writing and educational capabilities through her tutoring by a poor relation. At 15 she married Anthony Mildmay and later in life ran the large estates at Apethorpe. It was not until she became a grandmother that she attempted to record her life for the benefit of her daughter, Mary Fane, so that the younger woman could learn from the example of her mother. The > autobiographical diary focuses mainly upon the bringing up of children and how to educate the young, its ultimate end being a preparation for the eternal life in heaven. The work exists in manuscript at Northants public library, but extracts are published in 'An Elizabethan Gentlewoman', ed. R. Wiegall, in Quarterly Review (1911). Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

Mill, John Stuart (1806-73)

Writer on economics, politics, psychology, logic and ethics. He did not invent the word ➤ Utilitarian, but was the first to apply it to the reform movement started by his father's friend ➤ Jeremy Bentham and of which his father James Mill was one of the leaders.

The movement derived from 18th-century > rationalism, and the group was known as 'the philosophical radicals' because of the intellectual thoroughness with which they reasoned out their political and social standpoints. James Mill educated his son strenuously from a very early age but the education, wide as it was, ignored his son's imaginative and emotional needs. J.S. Mill describes in his Autobiography (1873) how this neglect produced in him a spiritual crisis when he was twenty-one, after he had already made a brilliant start to his career. He discovered that he was emotionally indifferent to the ends for which he was working. He recovered partly through his discovery of the poetry of > William Wordsworth and the crisis enabled him to develop a far more sympathetic and balanced outlook on human needs than had been possessed by his father or Bentham. Mill's personal development reflects the change from > Enlightenment rationalism to a renewed interest in feeling and emotion characteristic of the ➤ Romantics. His essays on Bentham and ⊳ Samuel Taylor Coleridge published in the ➤ Westminster Review in 1838 and 1840 respectively neatly epitomize this

After the passing of the 1832 ➤ Reform Bill, Mill worked to establish a radical party and harnessed the London and Westminster Review (which he owned from 1836–40) to this end.

Mill's literary and philosophical output was very large, and his essays and books were extremely influential. These included System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive (1843; 1930) and Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy (1844; 1949). This was followed in 1849 by his influential Principles of Political Economy; in which he discusses the growth and importance of the working class. Mill's life and career were deeply affected by his marriage in 1851 to Harriet Taylor, with whom he had enjoyed an intimate frienship during her first husband's lifetime. Together they produced one of Mill's most important works, The Subjection of Women (1859) which argued, amongst other things, for the extension of the franchise to women. Other works include On Liberty (1850) a liberal manifesto on the rights of the individual; Considerations on Representative Government (1860) and Utilitarianism (1863). In 1865 he was elected to Parliament for Westminster but was defeated in 1868. He died in Avignon.

Bib: Moller-Okin, S., Women in Western Political Thought; Packe, M. St J., Life; Hayek, F.A., J.S. Mill and Harriet Taylor: Their Correspondence and Subsequent Marriage; Hamburger, J., Intellectuals in Politics: J.S. Mill and the Philosophic Radicals.

Mill on the Floss, The (1860)

A novel by ➤ George Eliot, set in the Midlands. Its central characters are Maggie Tulliver and her brother Tom - children of the miller of Dorlcore Mill on the River Floss. She is headstrong, intelligent and richly imaginative beyond the understanding of her family - particularly that of Tom, a boy of limited intelligence and sympathies to whom she is devoted. The novel is divided into seven parts; the first three lead up to Mr Tulliver's bankruptcy and form a rich and comic study of English country life in the mid-19th century with deep insights into the psychology of the rural middle-class. The last three deal with the tragic love of Maggie for Philip Wakeham, the disabled son of the lawyer through whom Mr Tulliver has been ruined, the compromising of her reputation by the educated and agreeable Stephen Guest and her rejection by and alienation from her brother. In a > melodramatic denouement Maggie rescues Tom from the flooded mill and they are reconciled before they drown. Although much is left unresolved, it is a powerful novel, particularly in terms of Eliot's representation of Maggie's psychological turmoil. In the provincial environment in which she grows up Maggie is prevented from following her desires and is forced to internalize all her intellectual and spiritual energies. Many women, including ➤ Simone de Beauvoir (1908–86), have identified with Eliot's semi-autobiographical portrayal of Maggie.

Miller, Anne (1741–1781)

English poet, patron and travel writer. She held poetry evenings in her excessively expensive villa at Bath, during which poems would be thrown into an antique vase and then each taken out and read aloud. Some were published in Poetical Amusements at a Villa near Bath (1775–1781), and the preface emphasizes 'the Vase, and Sprigs of Bay and Myrtle alluded to in these poems are not emblematical, but real'. When > Fanny Burney visited her, she called her 'a round plump coarse-looking dame'. Miller also wrote Letters From Italy (1776–7).

> Seward, Anna

Miller, Jonathan (b 1934)

Director, performer, doctor. Jonathan Miller qualified as a doctor at Cambridge where he cowrote and performed in a legendary Footlights revue Beyond the Fringe (1960) with ▷ Alan Bennett, Peter Cook, and Dudley Moore. He has directed contemporary plays, many works from classical repertory, contemporary work, and opera. He was Artistic Director of the Old Vic in 1988–90. His book Subsequent Performances (1986) is a brilliantly sustained meditation on the theatrical production of the classics. Bib: Romain, M., A Profile of Jonathan Miller

Miller's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales.
Following the ▷ Knight's story about competing lovers, set in classical Athens, the Miller insists on 'quiting' this story with a tale of love rivalry set in Oxford. Double trickery is at the heart of this > fabliau. An old jealous husband, John, a carpenter, is deceived as a result of believing his lodger's prediction about the coming of a second flood, and gullibly accepting the chance offered to play the role of Noah. His lodger, the clerk Nicholas, thus plots a means of spending the night with the young Alison, John's wife. In the course of the evening, Alison spontaneously plays a trick on another of her admirers, Absolon, and gets him to kiss her 'nether eye'. Nicholas is branded with a ploughshare as a result of attempting to repeat the trick.

Milne, A. A. (Alan Alexander) (1882-1956) Novelist, dramatist, children's writer. He was for many years assistant editor of Punch, and he became widely popular as the author of light comedies and novels. His earliest play is Wurzel-Flummery (1917) and his best known Mr Pim Passes By (1919). However he achieved fame by four > children's books, centring on his son, Christopher Robin. Two of these are verse: When We Were Very Young (1924) and Now We Are Six (1927). The other two are prose stories, with Christopher Robin's teddy bear Winnie the Pooh as hero: Winnie the Pooh (1926); The House at Pooh Corner (1928). They have been translated into many languages; Winnie the Pooh, rather to its advantage, into Latin.

Milton, John (1608-74)

Poet and prose polemicist. Milton was born in London, the son of a scrivener and musician, and educated at St Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge. After leaving Cambridge in 1632, Milton lived for the next five years at his father's house in Horton. During this, his early poetic career, he wrote the companion pieces L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, two > masques, > Arcades and Comus, and the > elegy > Lycidas. From 1638 to 1639 Milton travelled abroad, chiefly in Italy. His Italian journey was to have a lasting influence on his later development, not least in the contact he established among Florentine intellectuals. But more than that, it reaffirmed his distaste - loathing even - for Roman > Catholicism, and focused his intense opposition to the Laudian (> Laud, William) regime in England.

Milton's continental journey was interrupted early in 1639 at Naples, where he claims to have first heard news of the political crisis in England. He was later to claim that he thought it 'base that I should travel abroad at my ease for the cultivation of my mind while my fellow citizens at home were fighting for liberty' (Defensio secunda). Returning to England, Milton embarked upon what has now come to be seen as the second phase of his career - that of a political prose writer and propagandist for the anti-Royalist cause in the English > Civil War. Between 1640 and 1655, Milton was to write little poetry. His energies and his sympathies were now to be engaged fully on the side of the republican forces in England - though he was not an uncritical supporter of the new experiment in government. From this period can be dated the series of great prose declarations dealing with political and religious questions – Of Reformation (1641), his attack on episcopacy in the Apology for Smeetymnuus (1642), his statement on personal liberty contained in The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643). These works were followed by ▷ Areopagitica (1644), Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), Eikonoklastes (1649), the two 'defences' of the English people (1651 and 1654), A Treatise of Civil Power (1659) and, almost at the moment when ➤ Charles II returned to England to reestablish the claims of monarchy, A Readie and Easie Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth (1660). The list of topics upon which Milton wrote in this period is bewildering, but running through all his prose writings is a stable belief that the English people have been chosen, by God, to perform a necessary political act - the establishment of a state based on principles of choice and, within certain bounds, freedom.

> Paradise Lost, Milton's great religious and political poem, was begun at some point in the mid-1650s - perhaps in the growing awareness that although there had been political choices in England, the wrong choice had been made. The poem was not published, however, until 1667, with a second (revised) edition appearing in 1674, shortly before Milton's death in November of that year. But the period after 1660 is usually recognized as the third and final phase of Milton's career. It is the period of the publication of > Paradise Regained and > Samson Agonistes. Though it has long been claimed that Milton's absorption in the task of writing these works marked an end to his career of political engagement, it is probably truer to say that these works signal a renewed, and possibly deeper, investigation of the themes which had occupied him for most of his life - the questions of political and religious liberty, the problems associated with choice and rule, and the problematic nature of government and obedience.

Bib: Carey, J. and Fowler, A. (eds.), The Complete Poems of John Milton; Wolfe, D. M. (ed.), Complete Prose Works of John Milton; Parker, W. R., Milton: A Biography; Hill, C., Milton and the English Revolution; Nyquist, M. and Ferguson, M. (eds.), Re-membering Milton.

Mimesis

In ➤ Plato's Republic 'mimesis' is used to designate 'imitation', but in a derogatory way. The term is given a rigorous, positive meaning in > Aristotle's Poetics where it is used to describe a process of selection and representation appropriate to tragedy: 'the imitation of an action'. Literary criticism from > Sir Philip Sidney onwards has wrestled with the problem of the imitative function of literary texts, but after structuralism with its questioning of the referential function of all language, the term has taken on a new and problematic dimension. Mimesis has frequently been associated with the term > 'Realism', and with the capacity of language to reflect reality. At particular historical moments, eg the Renaissance, or the present time, when reality itself appears to be in question, then the capacity of language to represent reality is brought to the fore. The issue becomes even more complex when we realize that 'reality' may be something other than our experience of it. The debate has been carried on most vigorously at a theoretical level in the exchanges earlier this century between the Hungarian critic Georg Lukács, and the dramatist Bertolt Brecht. The nub of the debate between these two Marxist thinkers (> Marx, Karl) was how best to represent 'the deeper causal complexes of society' (Brecht). Brecht rejected the view propounded by Lukács that the novel was the literary form which preeminently represented social process, arguing that realism was a major political, philosophical and practical issue and should not be dealt with by literature alone. Such a view rejected the metaphysical implications which lay behind the Aristotelian notion of mimesis, in favour of a more historical analysis which saw literature as part of the process of social change.

In > narratology, the distinction between mimesis (showing) and diegesis (telling) is considered under the heading of > mood. For example, if the speech of a fictional character is given in full, in quotation marks, this is considered mimetic, whereas a summary of what was said would be relatively diegetic. Bib: Auerbach, E., Mimesis; Genette, G., Narrative Discourse.

Minerva Press

Established in London in 1790 by William Lane, it combined a press with a ▷ circulating library, and published mainly women authors for a primarily female readership. It is often identified with ▷ Gothic and sentimental excess, and probably equates most closely to the Mills and Boon pulp novels published in the late 20th century. Yet the authors did produce some interesting work, and Minerva certainly provided the means for women to earn their living as authors.

Bib: Blakey, D., The Minerva Press 1790-1820.

Minim, Dick

A character in ➤ Samuel Johnson's ➤ Idler essays for the Weekly Gazette. Dick Minim is a > satirical representation of the kind of person who seeks a reputation for critical acumen by praising what is in fashion and sneering at what is unfamiliar.

Miracle plays

➤ Cycle plays.

Mirror for Magistrates, A (1559)

A collection of verse monologues spoken by characters in English history and legend. The collection was inspired by > John Lydgate's The Fall of Princes (1494), and written by William Baldwin, > George Ferrers and others, Nineteen verse monologues are spoken by historical figures from the reigns of ➤ Richard II to ➤ Edward IV, and in the main the intention of these verse accounts is to warn rulers and subjects against (respectively) tyranny and rebellion. After the first edition of 1559, numerous editions appeared throughout the 16th century and well into the 17th. With each edition, the work expanded, though the edition of 1563 (with contributions by > Thomas Sackville) is claimed to be, artistically, the most satisfactory. The edition of 1610 (the last, though there were reissues of 1610, 1620 and 1621) is the largest of what had become a series rather than a sequence of editions.

Though the Mirror was perhaps not an artistically distinguished enterprise, it nevertheless exerted a considerable thematic influence on the writing of history plays in the period, and on the conception of ▷ tragedy pursued by ▷ Elizabethan and ▷ Jacobean writers. It partakes, too, in that Elizabethan attempt at creating a sustained account of national history of which the work of ▷ Samuel Daniel, ▷ Michael Drayton and ▷ Edmund Spenser is also, in part, representative.

➤ Histories and Chronicles.
Bib: Campbell, L. B. (ed.), A Mirror for Magistrates.

Mise en abyme

The mise en abyme is a feature specially characteristic of the French > nouveau roman and of metafiction. It means a throwing into the abyss, and occurs when some element within the text mirrors the structure of the text as a whole, creating an interpretative 'abyss' as the part seems to contain the whole. A visual analogy would be a painting of a room, in which a copy of the same painting hangs on the wall. The device and the term were developed by the French novelist > André Gide, whose novel The Counterfeiters (1949) contains a clear example: a character who is writing a novel resembling The Counterfeiters.

Misrule, Lord of Title given to the master of revels for the 12 days of the Christmas festivities, which mark a licensed period of disorder and which may be celebrated in medieval noble and royal households.

▶ New Historicism.

Miss in Her Teens (1747)

A shortened (two-act) comedy by ➤ David Garrick, one of the first of its type (also known as 'petite pièce' or 'petite comédie'), adapted from D'Ancourt's La Parisienne, and staged as an 'afterpiece' at ▷ Covent Garden. The main plot concerns Captain Loveit's competition with his miserly father, Sir Simon Loveit, for the hand of the 16-year-old country girl and heiress, Biddy Bellair. She is also courted by two other suitors: a braggart and a fop. The Captain is assisted in his plans by the girl's own cunning and determination, and by two clever servants. A sub-plot concerns the rivalry between two of the servants for the attentions of a third. The Captain chases away the absurd rivals and confronts his father, who gives up his claim to Biddy voluntarily. The play has various patriotic elements referring to the contemporary War of the Austrian Succession: its last line, spoken by Biddy, is, 'Who fails in honour, will be false in love'. Garrick himself played the effeminate suitor, Fribble, who has some of the wittiest lines in the play; it was one of his most popular roles. The rest of the dialogue and the action are simple but very funny, and the piece was staged repeatedly.

Mistry, Rohinton (b 1952)

Indian novelist. Mistry was brought up in Bombay, and moved to Canada in 1975, where he studied at the University of Toronto and has since worked in a bank. His first work was Tales from Firozsha Baag (1987), a collection of short stories set in the middle-class Parsi suburbs of Bombay. His first novel, Such a Long Journey (1991), is the story of a Bombay family; it has an extravagant plot, vivid, often humorous characters and elements of ▷ magic realism.

Mitford, Mary Russell (1786-1855) Poet, dramatist, letter-writer, autobiographer and sketch-writer. Mary Mitford remained living with her parents in the country, supporting her family, especially her father who was laden with gambling debts, by her prolific writing. Her first publication, Miscellaneous Poems (1810), was well received and she was encouraged by ➤ Coleridge to continue writing. She produced several acclaimed and lucrative dramas, Julian (1823), Foscari (1826) and Rienzi (1828). Even more successful were her prose sketches of country life, in particular Our Village (1824-32). Her style was lucid and direct, and Mitford herself stated that she 'always wrote on the spot and at the moment and in nearly every instance with the closest and most resolute fidelity to the place and the people'. While rightly lauded for her work, Mitford felt isolated with her family in the country and entered into correspondence with some of the other well-known authors of her day; these included Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806-61), ➤ Felicia Hemans, ➤ Charles Lamb, ➤ Harriet Martineau, and ➤ Amelia Opie. Today it is these letters which provide the most valuable insight into Mitford's own life and work, as well as presenting us with a picture of the literary world at the beginning of the 19th century. More formal > autobiographical material may be found in her Recollections of a Literary Life, (1857).

Bib: Astin, M., Mary Russell Mitford; Edwards, P.D., Idyllic Realism from Mary Russell Mitford to Hardy.

Mo, Timothy (b 1953)

Novelist. Born in Hong Kong of an English mother and a Cantonese father and educated at St John's College, Oxford. He has worked as a journalist. His first novel was The Monkey King (1978), a lively story of family and business intrigue, set in Hong Kong and New Territories on the Chinese Mainland. Sour Sweet (1982) is the touching story of a Chinese family, firstgeneration immigrants in London, whose initial isolation is mitigated when they open a takeaway, leading to comic cross-cultural confusions, until the father accidentally becomes involved in the world of the Triad gangs in Soho (the subject of a parallel narrative in the novel). An Insular Possession (1986) blends history and fiction in its account of conflicts between Britain and China over the opium trade in the 1830s and 1840s, as does The Redundancy of Courage (1991), which concerns an initially uncommitted Chinese hotel-proprietor who becomes involved in the resistance movement, after the American-backed Indonesian invasion of East Timor in 1975. In 1995, Mo took the unusual step of publishing his latest novel, Brownout on Breadfruit Street, himself rather than putting it through a conventional publishing house.

➤ Post-colonial literature.

Mock epic

A form of ▷ satire practised with most success in English by ▷ Alexander Pope. The method is to employ the dignified expression associated with epic about subjects in themselves either trivial or base. Thus ▷ The Rape of the Lock describes a family quarrel provoked by a young man robbing a girl of a lock of her hair; it uses a dignity of style appropriate to the Rape of Helen which gave rise to Homer's ▷ Iliad, and applies it to the minute detail and obviously trivial scale of emotion appropriate to the slightness of the episode. In Pope's ▷ Dunciad the method is rather different, because here Pope is describing what is base rather than what is petty; the contrast is not, as with The Rappe, an ironic one between grandeur of treatment and pettiness of subject, but between the nobility of the style and the depth of meanness in the subject.

Another form of mock epic is the ➤ mock heroic poem, in which a bad man committing base deeds is described in epic style, without disguising the badness.

The mock epic is especially the product of the century 1660–1760, when admiration for Greck and Latin satire and epic was particularly high.

Epic.

Mock heroic

A literary mode in which large and important events are juxtaposed with small and insignificant ones for a variety of comic, > satirical or more profoundly ironic effects. In its narrow sense mock heroic is the product of the ▶ Augustan, > neo-classical age. As the bourgeoisie wrested cultural hegemony from the aristocracy in the late 17th century, a new, more complex attitude to the ancient aristocratic ideals of honour and nobility developed. A new irony (▶ figures of speech) infused their literary expression in the classical forms of ▷ epic and ▷ tragedy. Epic retained the respect of the reading public, but it was too archaic and primitive to satisfy the modern imagination in its traditional form. > John Milton's > Paradise Lost, the only significant literary epic in English (> Beowulf being an oral poem), has about it much of the complexity of the novel, and its more atavistic heroic elements (the war in heaven, the vision of future history) seem mechanical. In the generations following Milton the major poets, > John Dryden and > Alexander Pope, translated the ancient epics, but their own original work took the more complex form of mock epic.

Augustan mock heroic is a development from the conceit of the > Tudor and > 'metaphysical' poets, and its imaginative appeal derives similarly from far-fetched and unexpected comparisons and parallels. At its most basic it can be simply satirical. The poet contrasts a contemptible modern person or event with a respected heroic version. > Samuel Butler's > Hudibras works largely on this level, and there is a strong element of this kind of satire in Dryden's ➤ Mac Flecknoe. The respected touchstone need not be the classical epic, but can be any admired model from the past, or even the present. In > Absalom and Achitophel it is the Old Testament (> Bible). In parts of the Dunciad it is Milton and other 'classic' English poets such as ➤ Edmund Waller and > Sir John Denham. In parts of the > Rape of the Lock it is the pomp of religious ritual.

Nor need the contrast imply a moral satire on the modern world, or indeed any satire at all. At the beginning of Absalom and Achitophel the comparison of ▷ Charles II with ▷ King David in the Book of Kings achieves the difficult task of aggrandizing the 'merry monarch' while at the same time slyly acknowledging his libertinism. The comparison between Belinda's petticoathoops and Achilles' shield in The Rape of the Lock mocks the heroic model rather than the modern equivalent, emphasizing the delightful domestic security of Belinda's world, as against the primitive machismo of the ancient heroes. Often the comparison between familiar and modern on the one hand, and exotic and ancient on the other, arises from pure imaginative playfulness, as when Popc, through implied puns, compares the ceremony of preparing > coffee in an English drawing-room (on 'iapanned' tables), with an awesome religious ceremony in distant Japan: 'On shining Altars of Japan they raise/ The silver Lamp; the fiery Spirits blaze' (Rape of the Lock, III, II. 107-8).

Although mock heroic is most closely associated with the age of Dryden, ▷ Swift and Pope, it is found in all periods.

Mode of literary production

A term used to indicate the material circumstances in which literature is produced. For example, work written for the modern commodity market is produced under very different conditions, and with different results, from that produced for a wealthy patron in the seventeenth century or for a small, local community. However, the use of the term is sometimes extended beyond the economic level. For instance, in discussions of why authorship has been so difficult for women in earlier periods, feminist critics highlight not just the problems women experience in gaining access to publication but a range of other factors inhibiting to writing such as child-bearing and other family pressures, lack of education and cultural prejudice.

Bib: Eagleton, T., Criticism and Ideology; Woolf, V., A Room of One's Own.

Modern Love (1862)

A series of sixteen-line poems resembling sonnets, by ▷ George Meredith. The poems tell the story of the breakdown of a marriage ending in the suicide of the wife. The tone is strongly emotional and the attitude to the emotions is self-scrutinizing; in these ways Meredith's Modern Love suggests comparison with the ▷ dramatic monologues of ▷ Robert Browning and ▷ Alfred Tennyson, for example Browning's Any Wife to Any Husband and Tennyson's ▷ Maud.

Modernism

Twentieth-century English literature may be divided into two phases: modernism and → postmodernism. In both phases, changes in literary technique and subject matter are closely linked with comparable transformations in music, art and architecture. Modernism and postmodernism were also inspired by, and contributed to, social changes, and developments in philosophy, psychology, anthropology and science. Since the term 'modernism' was first used earlier in the 20th century, its meaning has developed and been revised. It is now agreed to mean the influential international movement in literature, drama, art, music and architecture which began in the latter years of the 19th century and flourished until at least the 1920s. Modernism was felt to be a reaction to > realism and > naturalism, undermining the representationalism (> mimesis) associated with those movements. In fiction the > stream of consciousness novel was a prime example of modernism. In critical terms, modernist writing challenged the approaches of students and critics alike and so contributed to the development later in the century of new approaches to literature and reading. Literary modernism in England started during the first decade of the century, but World War I played a major part in its development, contributing especially to the sense of radical newness, of the apocalyptic and of destruction and desolation. The prolonged and massive slaughter of the war put paid to the Victorian sense of progress. In poetry, it was > T. S. Eliot and > Ezra Pound who were the leading spirits of modernism, Eliot through his poetry and his criticism; Pound to some extent in his poetry, but even more through his role as man of letters, theorist, starter of movements and champion of artists and writers. Reacting against the ➤ Romantics, and against the conventions of Edwardian poetry, these writers introduced > free verse, fragmentary and innovative structures and allusive and eclectic modes of thought. The best-known example of these developments is Eliot's > The Waste Land (1922). Powerful accounts of the experience of war are found in the work of the > War poets, in particular > Isaac Rosenberg, > Wilfred Owen, > Siegfried Sassoon, > Edmund Blunden, Ivor Gurney and Charles Sorley, and later in David Jones' In Parenthesis (1937). Some of the War poets had also been associated with the > Georgian Poets, whose work appeared in Edward Marsh's five anthologies of 1912-22 and who, in technical terms, represented a relatively traditional strain in poetry. Three poets are best considered independently of movements (which are anyway somewhat arbitrary and temporary phenomena): > W. B. Yeats, > Thomas Hardy and > Gerard Manley Hopkins. Yeats, the greatest of modern Irish poets, followed a unique line of development, from the aestheticism of his early work to the eloquent symbolic power of his major poetry of the 1920s and 30s. Hardy, though born in 1840, did not publish his poetry until 1898 (it appeared in eight volumes between 1898 and 1928). His idiosyncratic diction and metrical experiment were to influence, among others, ➤ Philip Larkin. Hopkins had died in 1889, but his lyrical and visionary work had appeared only in anthologies prior to 1918. Other poets who published major work before 1930 included

➤ D. H. Lawrence, ➤ Robert Graves and the Scottish poets ➤ Hugh MacDiarmid and ➤ Edwin Muir.

In the novel the modernist period is dominated by six major figures: > Henry James, > Joseph Conrad, ⊳ James Joyce, ⊳ Virginia Woolf, D. H. Lawrence and D. E. M. Forster. Each made a distinctive contribution to the modernist transformation of fiction. James' work is notable for a fine moral sense, a complex style, and subtle studies of human consciousness (> The Ambassadors; 1903); Conrad's for narrative experiment, irony, sense of history and tragic moral vision (> Nostromo; 1904); Joyce's for linguistic exuberance, broad humanity and structural richness (> Ulysses; 1922); Woolf's for the representation of the texture of consciousness and for symbolic and poetic qualities (> To The Lighthouse; 1927); Lawrence's for the exploration of the unconscious and a unique and unrelenting vision of human nature and history (> The Rainbow; 1915); Forster's for a blend of liberalism with human insight and symbolic power (> A Passage to India; 1924). Other writers who made significant contributions to modernism include > Ford Madox Ford and > Dorothy Richardson. Alternative modes of fiction were the popular, realistic, relatively conventional works of ➤ Arnold Bennett and ➤ John Galsworthy, the > science fiction and social realism of > H. G. Wells, and the tragicomic satire of ➤ Evelyn Waugh, ➤ Wyndham Lewis and ⊳ Aldous Huxley.

In the theatre the early decades of the century were dominated by > George Bernard Shaw, who created a drama of ideas which questioned prevailing assumptions and expounded his socialist views. The concern with contemporary social and moral problems in Shaw's work reflected the influence of the Norwegian dramatist > Henrik Ibsen. In Ireland the > Abbey Theatre, Dublin, became the centre of an Irish dramatic revival. In the first decade of the century the theatre staged > J. M. Synge's poetic dramas of Irish peasant life, and in the 1920s the more naturalistic and overtly political tragicomedies of ➤ Sean O'Casey. In the 1930s, and again in the 1950s, > T. S. Eliot attempted to revive verse drama in English, while > W. H. Auden and > Christopher Isherwood co-operated on plays which, while mixing verse and prose, owed something to the early expressionist work of the German dramatist > Bertolt Brecht.

In the 1930s political concerns predominated in both fiction and poetry. A group of poets led by W. H. Auden employed the ideas of Marx and ➤ Freud and dealt directly with contemporary social issues such as unemployment, class conflict and the approach of war, as well as exploring psychological states. The main members of this group were ➤ Stephen Spender, ➤ Cecil Day-Lewis and ➤ Louis MacNeice. In the 1940s the Welsh poet ➤ Dylan Thomas achieved considerable popularity with his lyrical and rhetorical style of poetry. Novelists of importance who emerged during the 1930s and 40s included ➤ Graham Greene, ➤ George Orwell, Christopher Isherwood, ➤ Elizabeth Bowen, ➤ Jovee Cary and ➤ C. P. Snow.

Since 1945 two tendencies have been evident in English literature. One of these is identifiable with postmodernism considered as a phase of western culture, and is characterized by a continuing interest in experimental techniques, the influence of philosophy and literary theory (in particular ▷ existentialism, ▷ structuralism and > post-structuralism) and a creative interchange with continental, American, Latin American and other literatures. The second tendency is a reaction against aesthetic and philosophical radicalism in favour of the reassertion of more traditional modes: this tendency has an English and anti-cosmopolitan streak. This division does not necessarily entail a polarization into opposed camps; both tendencies are sometimes found in the work of the same writer.

The reassertion of traditional modes was especially evident in the 1950s. The group of poets who became known as the > Movement favoured clarity, irony, scepticism and a nononsense tone: these included ➤ Philip Larkin. Donald Davie and ➤ John Wain. Just as the Movement was a reaction against the influence of Symbolism, of Ezra Pound and of Yeats, so the modernist novel provoked a comparable reaction. The value of the realistic and satirical novel was reasserted by the work of the socalled > 'angry young men', (such as > John Osborne, > John Braine, > Alan Sillitoe and ➤ Kingslev Amis) who expressed a mood of alienation and revolt. Both these movements are, however, partly journalistic inventions, and of less importance than the individual bodies of work which emerged from them: Philip Larkin's sceptical, poignant and witty poetry; Kingsley Amis' entertaining and often acrimonious tales of English life. In the satirical and realistic vein, ➤ Angus Wilson is one of the most considerable post-war novelists, while ▶ Iris Murdoch, another writer who emerged in the 1950s, combines intricate tragicomic plots with philosophical and artistic concerns. Murdoch's sense of life as a battle of good and evil is shared by ▷ William Golding, ▷ Muriel Spark and ➤ Anthony Burgess; these writers blend elements of realistic narrative with postmodernist techniques such as intertextuality (sustained allusion to another literary work) and devices which draw attention to the contingency of narrative and its interpretation. In the novel, postmodernism has taken the form of a foregrounding of fictionality which undermines the mimetic illusion, or a multiplication of perspectives which emphasizes uncertainty and subjectivity. Such features are found particularly in the work of > John Fowles, > Lawrence Durrell, ▷ Bryan S. Johnson and ▷ Salman Rushdie, Rushdie also employs the mode of > magic realism, developed primarily by Latin American novelists like Gabriel García Márquez (b 1928). The prose writings of ⊳ Samuel Beckett have a Joycean linguistic playfulness, but their experimentalism is dominated by a relentless and progressive minimalism. Other notable areas of development in the post-war novel have been the feminist novel. ≥ science fiction, the fantasy novel, and > horror fiction.

During the 1960s a number of major poetic talents emerged: ➤ Ted Hughes, ➤ Sylvia Plath, ➤ Charles Tomlinson, ➤ Geoffrey Hill and ➤ Seamus Heaney. All of these poets except Heaney were included in the anthology The New Poetry (1962). In the polemical introduction, Al Alvarez championed the cause of poetry which, absorbing the implications of psychoanalysis and World War II, abandoned the gentility of the Movement. Hughes' poetry of extremity, physicality, anthropomorphism and the creation of myth rapidly gained him popularity and a place on the school syllabus. Plath, like Eliot and Pound, came to England from the U.S.A.; she is best known for her powerfully sensuous and symbolic explorations of disturbed states of mind, which associate her with fellow Americans such as Robert Lowell and John Berryman. Charles Tomlinson and Geoffrey Hill are poets with smaller, but devoted followings. Tomlinson is very much a cosmopolitan poet, influenced by American and continental models, and by the painting of Cézanne; his poems render the process and significance of visual perception with an unerring subtlety. Hill's work combines religious and historical subject matter and an almost overpowering sense of tradition with an intensely physical imagination and a postmodernist scepticism about the ability of language to engage with reality. Heaney's work, with its sensuous precision, its involvement with Irish political issues and its deeply personal yet highly accessible concerns, has made him one of the most popular and admired of contemporary poets, pre-eminent among a flourishing group of Ulster poets, including > Paul Muldoon, John Montague, ➤ Derek Mahon and Michael Longley.

The power of English drama to confront contemporary experience was revived in the 1950s by a new generation of dramatists who employed colloquial speech with an expressive and symbolic power which showed the influence of the leaders of modern European drama:

> Ibsen, > Strindberg, > Chekhov and Brecht. Foremost among them was Samuel Beckett, whose play Waiting for Godot (first published in Britain in 1955) initiated a new era with its existentialist preoccupations and anti-realist techniques. The > Theatre of the Absurd of Beckett and Eugene Ionesco influenced the work of another of this generation, ➤ Harold Pinter, whose plays explore the ambiguities and failures of everyday communication through terse, minimalist dialogue and significant silences. Blending realism and sinister fantasy, they suggest the fear and violence underlying mundane experience. The dramatists of the 1950s reacted against the upper-middle-class milieu of the work of ⊳ Noël Coward and > Terence Rattigan. In the work of > John Osborne and > Arnold Wesker this took the form of so-called 'kitchen-sink drama', which deals with working-class life and social conflict. Since 1950 it has been the drama, more than any other form of English literature, which has directly addressed public issues and exhibited political commitment, frequently of a radical nature. These features were evident in the 1950s and 60s in the work of Wesker, > John Arden and ▶ Edward Bond, and more recently in that of > Howard Brenton, > Howard Barker, > Trevor Griffiths and > David Edgar, Many of the dramatists mentioned here have been brought to public notice by the productions of the English Stage Company, whose home at the > Royal Court Theatre in London has been a centre for innovatory drama since 1956. Another important development has been the success of fringe theatre in exploiting the dramatic potential of small, open performing spaces. Feminist drama has flourished, prominent exponents being ▷ Ann Jellicoe, ▷ Nell Dunn, ▷ Shelagh Delaney and ➤ Carvl Churchill. Three of the most popular of contemporary dramatists are > Peter Shaffer, > Alan Ayckbourn and > Tom Stoppard. Shaffer's work has a wide range, embracing comedy, studies of obsession and creativity, and historical epic. Ayckbourn and Stoppard both make use of humour; Ayckbourn in farces of middle-class life, pervaded by a lurking desperation; Stoppard in witty, playful, parodic and allusive dramas which explore political and metaphysical issues.

Across the range of literary forms an increasingcontribution is being made by writers from India, Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the West Indies (> Post-colonial literature). A primary characteristic of postmodernism as an era is the diversity and rapid circulation of culture, evident not only in the multi-cultural nature of contemporary literature in English, but also in the success of fringe theatre and small poetry presses and in the sheer range of styles and modes of literature currently available to a large public. But theories of postmodernism also suggest that cultural artefacts function increasingly as commodities, and this emphasizes the extent to which such diversity is dependent upon economic forces and political decisionmaking, and in these respects the future of literature is highly unpredictable.

▶ Postmodernism; Deconstruction; Symbolism; Aestheticism.

Modernity

➤ Modernism

Modest Proposal, A (1729)

A ▷ satirical ▷ pamphlet by ▷ Jonathan Swift, written when he was Dean of St Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. The full title is A Modest Proposal for Preventing Children of Poor People from being a Burden to their Parents or the Country. Indignant at the extreme misery of the Irish poor under English government, Swift, in the guise of an economic 'projector', calmly recommends that it would be more humane to breed up their children as food for the rich. The pamphlet is an example of the controlled but extreme savagery of Swift's irony, and the fierceness of his humanitarianism.

Mohun, Michael (?1616-84)

Actor-manager. Mohun trained as a boy actor under Christopher Beeston (?1570–1638) at the Cockpit Theatre, in Drury Lane, and graduated to adult roles before the theatres closed in 1642. He joined the army on the royalist side during the ➤ Civil War, reaching the rank of major. Shortly after the theatres reopened, he became the leading actor of the newly formed ➤ King's Company under ➤ Killigrew. He created several roles in tragedy and comedy, and his Iago in ➤ Othello was especially admired.

Molesworth, Mary Louisa (1839-1921) Children's writer and novelist. Born Stewart, in Rotterdam where her father was a merchant. she was educated at home by her mother in Manchester where they moved in 1841. In 1861 she married Major Richard Molesworth, and first told stories to her own seven children. writing stories for and about them from a child's viewpoint, in which she portrayed a disciplined but loving world. In 1878 she separated from her husband, whose personality had been changed by a head wound sustained in the Crimean War, and from then on wrote to support her family. Using the pseudonym Ennis Graham, she wrote a large number of novels and stories. Her own childhood is described in The Carved Lions (1805) but perhaps the most famous and popular children's book is The Cuckoo Clock (1877). Others include The Tapestry Room (1879), Tell Me a Story (1875), Carrots (1876) and Two Little Waifs (1883).

➤ Children's books. Bib: Avery, G., Nineteenth-Century Children; Lancelyn Green, R., Tellers of Tales.

Molière (pseudonym of Jean Baptiste Poquelin) (1622–73) French dramatist. Born in the middle class, the son of an upholsterer, he became one of the most favoured playwrights at the court of Louis XIV. With one exception his plays are comedies, and a basic influence behind English comedy from 1660 to 1800. His Les Précieuses ridicules (1650), a satire upon an extremely fashionable, excessively sophisticated circle in contemporary Paris, marks the beginning of the > comedy of manners tradition in which the English dramatists > Etherege, > Wycherley, > Vanbrugh, > Congreve and > Sheridan all worked. He wrote over 30 plays, of which the best known are: Sganarelle (1660); l'Ecole des maris (The School for Husbands, 1661); L'Ecole des femmes (The School for Wives, 1662); Tartuffe (1664); Le Festin de Pierre (Don Juan, 1665); Le Misanthrope (The Misanthropist, 1666); Le Médecin malgré lui (The Reluctant Physician, 1666); L'Avare (The Miser, 1668); Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (The Middle-Class Nobleman, 1670); Les Femmes savantes (The Learned Women, 1672); Le Malade imaginaire (The Hypochondriac, 1673). His nearest equivalent on the English stage is William Congreve, but the only achievement in English literature comparable with Molière's kind of excellence is in the Augustan > satire of > Dryden (▷ Absalom and Achitophel) and ▷ Pope, and the novels of ⊳ Jane Austen.

Moll Flanders (1722)

A novel by > Daniel Defoe, and his most famous, after > Robinson Crusoe (1719). Its full title was The Fortunes and Misfortunes of the Famous Moll Flanders, and its substance is the adventures of an orphan girl from her early seduction through her various love affairs and her career of crime, to her transportation to Virginia and her final prosperity there. It is a realistic, episodic narrative with keen social and psychological perception in certain incidents. The book has no unifying structure, however, and none of the characters is fully established imaginatively. The conclusion is an example of Defoe's crude and superficial morality, > Puritan in its tradition, but much less profound and subtle than that of his predecessor > John Bunyan. The Puritanism has become simplified to commercialism, especially evident in Moll's final 'repentance'.

> Picaresque.

Monasteries and Monasticism

The practice of monasticism arose in the lands about the eastern Mediterranean in the early centuries of Christianity, and was inspired by the belief that the holy life could be lived only in isolation from the practical interests of worldly society. This early monasticism consisted of hermits each living in his own cell, and Irish monasticism of the 6th-8th centuries had similar characteristics. However, in the 6th century St Benedict founded in Italy the ⊳ Benedictine order which, during the ➤ Middle Ages, dominated western Europe including the British Isles, and had immense consequences for Western civilization; the monks lived in community, and followed a regular rule of life which included a great deal of practical activity. They were artists, architects, scholars and writers - especially historians, such as the Venerable > Bede, William of Malmesbury. and Matthew Paris (13th century); monasteries such as the Cathedral Priory at Canterbury were seats of learning which rivalled universities such as Paris and Oxford. Corporately, the monasteries were great landowners, and some of the abbots managed these estates with great constructive efficiency; an example is the 12thcentury Abbot Samson of Bury St Edmund, see ➤ Carlyle's fine study of him in Past and Present Bk II (1843). The Cistercian Order, a reformed version of the Benedictine, established their monasteries in the wilder places of England, and set up sheep farms. In medieval England the monasteries were the only source of poor relief, and they provided the only hospitals until the 14th century. Politically, the great abbots ranked with the Bishops in the Great Council of the realm; in the 12th and 13th centuries monks were the intelligentsia, owners of at least 10 percent of the national income, and the largest employers. monks were often us. When ➤ Henry VIII dissolved the monasteries (1536-9) the measure met with little resistance in the south-east, but it provoked the rebellion known as the ➤ Pilgrimage of Grace in the north.

There were no monasteries in Britain after the middle of the 16th century, but since the second half of the 19th century some have been re-established.

'Monk' Lewis (1775-1818)

Matthew Gregory Lewis, whose sensational novel The Monk (1796) had such success in its day that he was nicknamed after it.

➤ Gothic novels.

Monk's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. The Monk produces a collection of short verse narratives recounting the fall of individuals from high estates, spanning subjects as diverse as Adam and Ugolina of Pisa. The shape of the narratives corresponds to that of the 'de casibus' model of tragedies in which the falls of individuals are attributed either to moral weakness or to fortune, or to both, and is modelled on ➤ Boccaccio's collection of tragic exemplum in his De Casibus Virorum Illustrium (Concerning the Falls of Famous Men). The Monk does include a few examples of the fall of famous women too. His sequence is halted by the intervention of the Knight, who objects to the tone and subject of the Monk's contribution.

Monmouth, James Scott, Duke of (1649-85) An illegitimate son of ▷ Charles II. Charles had no legitimate son, and the heir to the throne was consequently James, Duke of York, his brother. James, however, was an open Catholic, and fear of Catholicism in England and Scotland was still very strong. Thus a movement arose in both countries to persuade Charles to exclude James from the succession, and to recognize Monmouth, who had been educated a Protestant. Exclusion Bills to secure this change were introduced into Parliament, where the Exclusionists were led by > Lord Shaftesbury. Charles, however, resisted the movement, and in 1681 a reaction of opinion in the country came to the support of the King and his brother. In 1685, Charles died, and James succeeded him as ➤ James II. Some of his more fanatical Protestant opponents, such as the Scottish Duke of Argyll, persuaded Monmouth to attempt rebellion. The Monmouth Rebellion was defeated at the single ➤ Battle of Sedgemoor (1685) and Monmouth himself was executed.

➤ Absalom and Achitophel; Bloody Assizes.

Monologic

▶ Bakhtin, Mikhail.

Mont Blanc (1816)

Poem by ➤ Shelley, inspired by the view from the Bridge of Arve in the valley at Chamouni, Switzerland. It was first printed at the end of his History of a Six Week's Tour (1817), in which the poet describes this work as 'composed under the immediate impression of the deep and powerful feelings excited by the objects it attempts to describe; and, as an undisciplined overflowing of the soul'. This emphasis on a subjective and emotional reaction to a turbulent landscape scene recalls the work of the firstgeneration ➤ Romantic poets ➤ Wordsworth and ➤ Coleridge, vividly present in the poem's evocation of the human mind, which 'renders and receives fast influencings,/ Holding an unremitting interchange/ With the clear universe of things around'. Equally important however is Mont Blanc's revisionary and antagonistic relationship to Coleridge's Hymn Before Sunrise in the Vale of Chamouni (1802), which describes the same landscape. Where Coleridge attributes the splendours of the scene to the workings of divinity, the atheist Shelley views the significance of landscape as produced by the human mind alone.

Montagu, Elizabeth (1720–1800) An eminent ▷ Bluestocking and famous ▷ epistolarist, Montagu's early intellectual abilities were widely remarked upon, and Samuel Johnson hailed her as 'Queen of the Blues'.

Montagu began to hold her formal receptions in the early 1750s, and she boasted to ▷ David Garrick that, whatever the social status of the guests, 'I never invite idiots'. Her patronage of young authors aided ▷ James Beattie and Richard Price.

In 1769 her Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakespeare, challenging ▷ Voltaire's theories, was widely admired, though Johnson perceived its critical failings.

Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley (1689-1762) Poet and letter-writer. In 1716-18 her husband was Ambassador to Constantinople, where she came across the practice of inoculation against smallpox, which she popularized in England. In 1716 the publisher Edmund Curll produced an unauthorized edition of her poems, from a manuscript which she had dropped in the street, under the title Court Poems by a Lady of Quality (the authorized edition of 1747 was entitled Town Eclogues). > Alexander Pope took her side against Curll but they later quarrelled for some reason, and she appears in Moral Essay II as Sappho in her 'dirty smock'. She lived in Italy during her later years and her lively and informative Letters were published in 1763-7.

Bib: Halsband, R., The Life of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu.

Montaigne, Michel de (1533-92)

French essayist, and inventor of the ▷ essay form. His life was lived partly at court, or performing the office of magistrate in the city of Bordeaux, and partly in retirement. During retirement, he wrote his Essais ('experiments'), the first two volumes of which were published in 1580, and the third in 1588. He was a scholar, well-read in ▷ humanist literature and in the works of the ancient Greeks and Romans. His favourite author was Plutarch.

The Essays seem to have been begun as commentaries on his reading, perhaps to assist his exceptionally bad memory. From this grew a desire to arrive at a complete image of man; as a means to this, he tried to develop a portrait of himself, since 'each man bears the complete stamp of the human condition'. The sentence shows the still-prevailing view of his time, that human beings followed general principles in the structure of their personalities - a view quite unlike the view that grew up in the 18th century and came to predominate in the 19th, that each individual is unique (see ▶ Rousseau). He recognized, however, the difficulties in arriving at conclusive ideas about human nature, and the essays are characterized by the scepticism with which he weighs contradictions and opposing views.

Montaigne was translated into English by John Florio in 1603. The essays had an extensive influence upon English literature and the Montaigne tradition of essay writing was taken up by Abraham Cowley (Essays in Verse and Prose, 1668), ⊳ Sir William Temple (Miscellanea, 1680, 1692, 1701) and, after the more formal period of the 18th century, ⊳ Charles Lamb's Essays of Elia (1823).

Montesquieu, Charles de Secondat de, Baron de la Brède et de (1689-1755) French philosopher and historian. He came to England in 1729, and studied English institutions and the ideas of English philosophers, including > John Locke. He argued that human history reflects a process, influenced by many factors including geography and climate, which in turn affect such factors as religion, culture and society. He identified and discussed three sorts of government, the republican, the monarchical and the despotic, and held up the English constitution as a model of freedom. These ideas, expounded in Considérations sur les causes de la grandeur et de la décadence des Romains (1734) and De l'esprit des lois (1748), had a considerable influence on English, Scottish and Continental thinkers.

French literature in England.

Montgomerie, Alexander (c 1545-98) Poet. Montgomerie was a > Scottish court official, man of action and writer; he was admired by > James II (James VI of Scotland) and was granted a pension in 1583. After having been suspected of involvement in a Catholic plot, he left Scotland in 1586 to travel in Europe. His most well-known work is The Cherrie and the Slae (1597), an > allegorical work contrasting the cherry's elevated and valued position with the sloe's lowly and despised growth. It is meant to be sung aloud. He also wrote > sonnets in which a > Petrarchan influence is clear. Flyting of Montgomery and Polwart (published posthumously in 1621), and a general output of ⊳ lyrics and songs. Bib: Jack, R. D. S., Alexander Montgomerie.

Montrose, James Graham, Marquess of (1612-50)

Scottish patriot, general and statesman. He was one of the most gifted of Charles I's supporters in and after the Civil War. After spasmodic but brilliant successes, he was caught by Parliament forces and executed. > Walter Scott's novel A Legend of Montrose (1819) concerns his career. John Buchan wrote a biography of him.

Mood

One of the five categories in which > Genette analyses narrative discourse, mood is described by him as 'the regulation of narrative information' through the control of 'distance' and 'perspective'. The analysis of mood in a novel therefore includes the question of ▶ focalization.

> Narratology.

Moodie, Susanna (1803-85)

The youngest of the literary Strickland sisters, born in Suffolk, England, Susanna Moodie lived near Southwold until her emigration to Canada in 1832. Her sisters, Agnes and Elizabeth, wrote Lives of the Queens of England and other biographies; her other sister, Catherine Parr Traill (1802-1899), wrote many natural history books. Moodie published early, contributing her stories, poems and sketches to various annuals. Susanna and Agnes collaborated on a poetry volume called Patriotic Songs (1830), and Susanna published her own Enthusiasm; and Other Poems in 1831, the same year she married John Wedderburn Dunbar Moodie. A year later the couple emigrated to Upper Canada (Ontario). In Flora Lyndsay; or, Passages in an Eventful Life (1854) Moodie offers a fictionalized version of the arduous journey, concluding with the trip up the St Lawrence River. Her best known works are Roughing it in the Bush; or, Life in Canada (1852) and Life in the Clearings Versus the Bush (1853), considered autobiographical but written using strong elements of fiction. Susanna Moodie as writer is effectively able to distance herself from Susanna Moodie as narrator. Both books detail the harshness of trying to wrest a living out of the uncleared wilderness. In essence, the Moodies were ill-equipped to deal with the demands of pioneer life, failed at farming, and moved to the town of Belleville in 1840, where Dunbar Moodie was appointed sheriff.

Despite her isolation, Susanna Moodie did not curtail her literary aspirations. She wrote serialized fiction for The Literary Garland, which was published in Montreal. In 1847 to 1848, the Moodies together edited The Victoria Magazine in Belleville. Susanna also wrote a number of sentimental novels, much less interesting than her Canadian material: Mark Hurdlestone; or, the Gold Worshipper (1853), Matrimonial Speculations (1854), Geoffrey Moncton; or, the Faithless Guardian (1855) and The World Before Them (1868). Although Moodie has been the recipient of much critical vitriol for her desire to warn potential settlers of what awaited them in Canada, her story is remarkable for its courageous endurance in the face of hardship. After her husband's death in 1869 she lived mostly with her family in Toronto. Bib: Dahl, E.H., 'Mid Forests Wild': A Study of the Concept of Wilderness in the Writings of Susanna Moodie, J.W.D. Moodie, Catherine Parr Traill and Samuel Strickland; Fowler, M., The Embroidered Tent: Five Gentlewomen in early Canada; Morris, A., The Gentle Pioneers: Five Nineteenth-Century Canadians; Murray, H., in A Mazing Space; Shields, C., Voice and Vision; Thomas, Clara, in The Clear Spirit.

Moonstone, The (1868)

A novel by Wilkie Collins. It is one of the earliest stories of detection and concerns the mysterious disappearance of a valuable diamond, formerly sacred to the Moon-god in one of the Indian temples. The novel is told in the first person by various participants in the events; it is plotted with skill, psychological ingenuity and a typically Victorian delight in characterization. Sergeant Cuff, the first detective in English fiction, appears in it.

▶ Detective fiction.

Moore, Brian (b 1921)

Novelist. Born in Belfast, Moore emigrated to Canada in 1948 and now lives in California. His Northern Irish Catholic upbringing provides the background for much of his work, which deals with themes of Irish migration, failure, guilt, isolation and loss of faith. His novels are characterized by narrative clarity and a sensitivity to the female point of view (notably his first and perhaps most famous novel, The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne, 1955). Black Robe (1985) reflects contemporary Ulster by describing the confrontation between the settlers and native Indians in 17th-century Canada. Other novels include: I Am Mary Dunne (1968); The Revolution Script (1971); Catholics (1972); The Great Victorian Collection (1975); The Doctor's Wife (1976); The Colour of Blood (a political and theological thriller, 1987); Lies of Silence (1990); No Other Life (1993); and The Statement (1995). Moore also writes detective fiction as Michael Bryan and Bernard Marrow. Bib: Dahlie, H., Brian Moore; Flood, J., Brian Moore.

Moore, G. E. (George Edward) (1873-1958) Philosopher. He lectured on philosophy at Cambridge from 1911 to 1925, when he became Professor. His principal book is Principia Ethica (1903); he also wrote Ethics (1912) and Philosophical Studies (1922). His philosophy was that of the 'New Realism', in opposition to the ≥ idealism of ≥ F. H. Bradley whose work was in the tradition of Hegel. Where the Idealists tended to a poetic conception of truth and ethics, rhetorically expressed and appealing to the emotions as much as to the reason, Moore appealed to the reason only, basing his arguments on common sense, and holding it to be the function of philosophy to clarify statements and arrive at fully intelligible definitions. At the same time, he argued that all experience is to be enjoyed, and that the richest possessions are aesthetic experience and personal friendship. He consequently had two kinds of influence, philosophical and literary. Philosophically, he was one of the starting points for ▷ Bertrand Russell and the Logical Positivists such as A. J. Ayer, but in literary circles he had considerable personal influence on the ▷ Bloomsbury Group, centred on the novelist ▷ Virginia Woolf and her husband Leonard. The Bloomsbury Group owed its cohesiveness to a cult of personal relations such as Moore advocated, and some of its members regarded the state of mind of perfect aesthetic appreciation as one of the aims of life. Bib: Schilpp, P. A., The Philosophy of Moore; Johnstone, J. K. The Bloomsbury Group.

Moore, George (1852-1933)

Irish novelist. He combined an > aestheticism in tune with the aesthetic movement at the end of the 19th century, and the Celtic revivalism that went with a part of it, with a > naturalism which showed the influence of late 19thcentury French literature, especially from the novelist Zola. His most famous novels are: A Mummer's Wife (1885); Esther Waters (1894); Evelyn Innes (1898); Sister Theresa (1901); The Brook Kerith (1916); Héloise and Abélard (1921). He was equally well known for his autobiographical studies: Confessions of a Young Man (1888); Avowals (1919, 1926); Hail and Farewell (1911-14) and Conversations in Ebury Street (1924). His carefully worked style was more admired in his own day than it is now.

➤ Celtic Twilight.

Bib: Korg, J., in Victorian Fiction (ed.

L. Stevenson); Brown, M. J., Moore: a Reconsideration; Sechler, R. P., George Moore:
'a Disciple of Walter Pater'; Yeats, W. B., in Dramatis Personae; Hough, G., in Image and Experience.

Moore, Thomas (1779-1852)

Born in Dublin, Moore studied law at the Middle Temple and became a popular drawingroom singer. Later he was for a time Admiralty Registrar in Bermuda. His early pseudonymous volume, The Poetical Works of the late Thomas Little Esq. (1801) was referred to by Lord Byron in English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809), and the two poets became close friends. Moore received many letters from Byron, though he shamefully expurgated them after Byron's death, and agreed to destroy the Memoirs which Byron had left to him. Moore's own writings range from lyric to satire, from prose romance to history and biography. The extremely popular Irish Melodies, which contain his most enduring work, appeared in ten parts between 1807 and 1835, and in 1813 he published a group of satires aimed at the Prince Regent, The Twopenny Post Bag. His long narrative peom in the Byronic mode, Lalla Rookh: An Oriental Romance (1817), achieved an international reputation, but in his next work The Fudge Family in Paris (1818) he returned to satire, aiming his shafts against the Englishman abroad. His Loves of the Angels (1823) became notorious for its eroticism. He also wrote a prose romance set in 3rd-century Egypt, The Epicurean (1827), a History of Ireland (1835–46), and biographies of Thomas Sheridan (1825), and (ironically in view of his destruction of his friend's own autobiographical work) of Byron (1830). Bib: White, T. de V., Tom Moore: The Irish Poet.

Moral Essays (1731-5)

Four epistles in heroic > couplets by > Alexander Pope, concerned with large ethical and philosophical issues. Epistle I elaborates a simplistic philosophy of 'the ruling passion' as an explanation of human psychology, and its poetic value lies in the occasional witty vignette of human folly, rather than in any profundity of thought. Epistle II, To a Lady, concerns the characters of women, and is addressed to Pope's close friend Martha Blount. Though the work has many memorable lines it is little more than a series of crudely sexist jibes at particular women, or at women in general: 'Nothing so true as what you once let fall, 'Most Women have no Characters at all'; 'ev'ry Woman is at heart a Rake'. Epistle III treats the right use of riches, and ends with an idealized portrait of John Kyrle, the 'Man of Ross', a celebrated philanthropist. Epistle IV, addressed to Lord Burlington, was the first to be published (1731) and is the most impressive. It again satirizes the wrong use of wealth, but focuses specifically on architecture, Burlington being an active promoter of the convenient decency of the Palladian style (> Andrea Palladio) as opposed to the largescale exuberance of ⊳ baroque, so much in vogue in absolutist France. Pope follows his patron also in advocating a 'natural' style of garden rather than the artificial geometricality of continental taste. The description of the discomfort of Timon's villa brilliantly satirizes such un-English grandiosity as Blenheim Palace or Castle Howard, both recently built by > Sir John Vanbrugh.

Morality plays

A term used by modern critics to distinguish plays expounding points of moral doctrine, extant from the 15th century, from other kinds of contemporary vernacular drama which commemorate the events of Christian history (such as the > cycle plays or saints' plays). The plots of morality plays are allegorical narratives of one kind or another; the human protagonists tend not to be individualized or given a historical identity. The scope of the plays may vary: whereas the > Castle of Perseverance dramatizes the epic story of 'Humankind's' life from birth to beyond the grave, and requires great dramatic resources, > Mankind focuses on an exemplary episode in Mankind's life, and seems designed as an itinerant production by a smaller acting group. Generally, however, the genre is associated with plays like Mankind, which can be performed in halls by smaller acting groups. Behind plays such as Castle of Perseverance, Mankind and > Everyman is a long tradition of Christian instruction and teaching: sermons addressed to lay audiences and manuals of instruction may employ similar devices of analysis and instruction to those dramatized in these morality plays, which endow abstract notions, concepts, processes, with a tangible form.

But this kind of drama is not confined to expounding points of religious doctrine. In the morality plays dating from the late 15th century (such as Henry Medwall's Fulgens and Lucres), or from the 16th century (such as John Rastall's Of Gentilness and Nobility), issues of social order (in these cases the relationship between social rank and moral virtue) come under scrutiny. The instructional impetus of this kind of drama can be used for secular as well as religious ends. This dramatic form has had more impact on the drama of the Renaissance than the > cycle plays, due to the flexibility of its form and the use of allegory for ethical and moral analysis.

Although the term 'morality' play is useful for locating a distinctive dramatic form which seems popular in the 15th and 16th centuries, it should not be regarded as a fixed and wholly distinctive dramatic genre. Allegorical personages appear in the cycle drama, and saints' plays too, and many plays confound rigid generic categories: > John Bale's play, King John (c 1536), for example, presents a historical narrative and an allegorical commentary on the action at the same time.

Bib: Cawley, A. C. et al., The Revels History of Drama in English: Vol. I Medieval Drama; Davenport, W. A., Fifieenth Century English Drama: the Early Moral plays and their Literary Relations.

Mordred

In the 10th century Annals of Wales (Annales Cambriae), a figure called Medraut is reported as having fought and fallen in a battle against

➤ King Arthur in 539. In → Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of British history, Mordred is Arthur's nephew, who usurps the throne and takes → Guinevere for his lover while Arthur is fighting against the Romans. In later developments of Arthurian narrative, Mordred is Arthur's illegitimate son, conceived through a brief, incestuous relationship with → Morgausc. He provokes trouble over the affair between → Lancelot and → Guinevere.

More, Hannah (1745–1833)
An eminent ▷ Bluestocking, More settled in London in 1774, where she became the friend of ▷ Garrick, ▷ Johnson, ▷ Burke, ▷ Richardson, ▷ Reynolds, ▷ Percy and ▷ Montagu. She was a conservative Christian feminist who opposed ▷ Mary Wollstonecraft on women's rights. Her tragedy Percy was produced by Garrick in 1777, and established both her literary reputation and her social status. A tragedy, The Fatal Falsehood, appeared in 1779.

➤ Horace Walpole became her great admirer, printing Bishop Bonner's Ghost at the Strawberry Hill press in 1789. In 1784 her earlier poem Bas Bleu was published.

More used her writing to express concern about social reform. Village Politics appeared in 1793, and the Cheap Respository Tracts of 1795–8 sold two million copies. Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great (1788) also ran into several editions. In 1809 More published Coelebs in Search of a Wife, a novel which, despite hostile reviews, proved an immense success. Her correspondence is lively and entertaining.

Bib: Jones, M. G., Hannah More.

More, Sir Thomas (St Thomas More) (1478–1535)

Scholar, thinker and statesman. He was the leading humanist of his day, and a friend of ➤ Erasmus. For some time he was a particular favourite of ➤ Henry VIII, who raised him to the Lord Chancellorship, the highest office in the state. However, More firmly refused to recognize the king's divorce from Queen Katharine and the ➤ Act of Supremacy (1534). For this the king executed him, and the Catholic Church canonized him exactly 400 years later.

More's History of King Richard III (1513) has been called the first masterpiece of ▷ history and ▷ biography in English, but his principal work, ▷ Utopia (1516), was in Latin, translated into English in 1551. While More's idealized characteristics have often been emphasized, recent criticism has detected a darker side to his writing, which may be seen in his intemperate tone, detailing of extreme forms of conduct, and biting irony. Famous as a ▷ patron of letters and arts, he invited the painter ▷ Holbein to England.

➤ Catholicism (Roman) in English literature; Roper, Margaret More.

Bib: Surtz, E. (ed.), Selected Works; Sylvester, R. S. and Harding, D. P. (eds.), The Life of Sir Thomas More; Hexter, J. H., More's Utopia: The Biography of an Idea, Greenblatt, S., Renaissance Self-fashioning; Martz, L. L., Thomas More: the Search for the Inner Man.

Morgan, Sydney (1776-1859)

Novelist. Lady Sydney Morgan (née Owenson) was a prolific Irish author, whose ▷ nationalist politics were reflected in her fictional recreations of Irish history and legend. Her novels, which include St Clair (1803) and the popular Wild Irish Girl (1806), did much to establish the idea of Ireland's past as fashionable and romantic both in her own country and in England. Moreover, she contributed to the Celtic revival of the mid-19th century. Her novel The Missionary (1811) influenced both > Byron and > Shelley.

➤ Macpherson, James; Ossian; Irish literature

n English

Bib: Spender, D and Todd, J., Anthology of British Women Writers; Stevenson, L., The Wild Irish Girl: the life of Sydney Owenson, Lady Morgan.

Morgan La Fay

In ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth's account of the life of ▶ Merlin, Morgan is introduced as a ➤ Lady of the Lake figure, who has magic powers and is in charge of nine women who live on ➤ Avalon and who receive ➤ King Arthur after he has been wounded. She is perhaps a literary form of a much older Celtic goddess. Her role becomes much more ambiguous in later versions of Arthurian narrative (including ➤ Malory's version), in which she both assists and obstructs the foundation of Arthurian society. She becomes identified as Arthur's half-sister, wife of Lucan and daughter of ▷ Igraine, and is portraved as a frustrated woman who uses her magical powers to ensnare men. But she continues to be one of the women who escort Arthur away to Avalon, after his last battle. In recent Arthurian fiction, Morgan has become a more complex figure; she has been used by some writers as the focus of feminine power and independence in the legends.

Morgause

Half-sister of ➤ King Arthur in Arthurian narratives (post ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of Arthurian history), who marries King Lot and is the mother of ➤ Gawain, Gaheris, Agravain and ➤ Gareth. She conceives ➤ Mordred as a result of a brief affair with Arthur (who is unaware of his familial connection with her), and she is killed by Gaheris when discovered in bed with Lamorak.

Morier, James Justin (1780-1849)

Travel writer and novelist. Morier was a diplomat stationed in Persia and his ▷ travel books, A Journey Through Persia (1812) and A Second Journey Through Persia (1818) describe his experiences while there. In 1817 he resigned his post and devoted himself to writing novels, including The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan (1824), a ▷ picaresque tale of an ordinary Persian artisan, which made an important contribution to the growing popularity of ▷ Orientalism.

Morning Chronicle

A London Whig ➤ newspaper founded in 1769; its contributors included Sheridan, ➤ Lamb, James Mill, ➤ John Stuart Mill, Dickens, and ➤ Thackeray. It came to an end in 1862.

Morning Herald, The

A London ➤ newspaper, 1780–1869. It had a large circulation, and published police cases, illustrated by the famous artist ➤ George Cruikshank, illustrator of Dickens' novel ➤ Oliver Twist.

Morning Post, The

A conservative but highly independent London newspaper, founded 1772, ceased 1936. Wordsworth, ➤ Coleridge and Southey contributed to it.

Morris, Sir Lewis (1833-1907)

The most famous ▷ Anglo-Welsh poet of his time, Sir Lewis Morris reached the height of his fame in the last twenty years of the 19th century and was second only to ▷ Tennyson in public acclaim. Indeed, Lewis was expected to succeed him as ▷ Poet Laureate.

Born in Carmarthen, South Wales, Morris' social class and education insulated him from the Welsh-speaking community of his home town. The Welsh language was, in fact, ruthlessly suppressed during his lifetime, due to Victorian government policy which ruled that the language was detrimental to the educational and moral progress of the Welsh people. However, Morris developed a keen interest in his Welsh ancestry and in Welsh traditions in his later years. He moved to Sherborne in Dorset at the age of seventeen before entering Jesus College, Oxford in 1851, where he took a double first. He went on to practise as a conveyancing counsel in London. Morris published his first three series of poems Songs of Two Worlds (1871, 1874, 1875) anonymously. A combination of graphic social comment and metrical virtuosity tempered with vague moralizing and naive anecdotalsim, his poetry was extremely well received. The Epic of Hades (1877), was enthusiastically reviewed by Oliver Wendell Holmes and The Times, and by 1896 the book had sold 40,000 copies. His popular > dramatic monologue, Gwen (1879), has much in common with his great friend Tennyson's ➤ Maud, and his sixth volume of poems, Songs Unsung (1883), was highly praised by ▷ Gladstone. Other volumes include Songs of Britain (1887), Songs Without Notes (1894) and Idylls and Lyrics (1896). Bib: Phillips, D., Writers of Wales: Sir Lewis Morris.

Morris, William (1834-96)

Poet, socialist thinker, designer and printer. He was one of the leading artists of his day, associated with, though not a member of, the society. It is as a designer of textiles and wallpapers that he is most admired today. His aim was to counteract the industrial squalor of Victorian England, and to correct the major social injustice by which the proletariat were cut off from beauty of any sort by the nature of their environment: 'I don't want art for a few, any more than education for a few, or freedom for a few.' Paradoxically his campaign against aesthetic barbarism went with rejection of the machine and insistence on handwork, which cut him off from the economic realities of his age.

▶ Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, which sought to recover the cultural unity of ▶ medieval

This withdrawal from social and political complexities is in keeping with his poetry, which expresses withdrawal into the romances of the Middle Ages (Defence of Guinevere, 1858; Earthly Paradise, 1868–70); into ancient Greek epic (Life and Death of Jason, 1867; translation of Virgil's Aeneid, 1875, and of Homer's Odyssey, 1887); and into Icelandic epic (Sigurd the Volsung, 1876). His verse (the majority of it translation) was voluminous, fluent, decorative and musical in the Spenserian tradition current in the Victorian period.

Nonetheless, his socialism was a reality. He was one of the founders of the Socialist League (1884) and edited its monthly periodical Commonweal, until in 1890 the anarchist wing of the movement drove him out. His News from Nowhere (1891 − previously contributed to Commonweal) is a prose ▷ 'utopia' describing England at a future date after the establishment of socialism. It is one of the most read of his works today. Another work of socialist inspiration, in mixed prose and verse, is A Dream of John Ball (1888).

Morris had some influence on the young ▶ W.B. Yeats (1865–1939), who remarked 'The dream-world of Morris was as much the antithesis of daily life as with other men of genius, but he was never conscious of the antithesis and so knew nothing of intellectual suffering' (Autobiographies, 1955).

Description of the Novement.

Dib: Henderson, P., Life, Mackail, J.W., Life; Hough, G., The Last Romantics; Jackson, H., Morris: Crafisman-Socialist: Thompson, E.P., Morris: Romantic to Revolutionary; Lewis, C.S., in Rehabilitations. Thompson, P., The Work of William Morris; Kirchoff, F., William Morris: The Construction of a Male Self: 1856−1872; Harvey, C., William Morris: Design and Enterprise in Victorian Culture.

Morrison, Arthur (1863–1945) Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Poplar, Morrison worked as a journalist, contributing tales of East End life to ▷ Macmillan's Magazine (published as Tales of Mean Streets, 1894). His subsequent novels A Child of the Jago (1896) and

The Hole in the Wall (1902) are also naturalistic accounts of slum life. Morrison also wrote → detective fiction (The Dorrington Deed Box, 1897, in the manner of ➤ Conan Doyle), and later became a distinguished Orientalist. A conservative but highly independent London newspaper, founded 1772, ceased 1936. Wordsworth, ➤ Coleridge and Southey contributed to it.

Morrison, Blake (b 1950)

Poet and critic. Morrison is a prominent figure in contemporary British poetry, perhaps more as a critic than a poet, and he has taught at London University and the Open University, as well as writing on poetry and fiction for The Observer and the Times Literary Supplement. He has published critical studies of ▷ the Movement and of ▷ Seamus Heaney, and is coeditor (with ▷ Andrew Motion) of The Penguin Book of Contemporary British Poetry (1982). His poetic works include Dark Glasses (1984) and The Ballad of the Yorkshire Ripper (1987).

Morte Arthur (stanzaic)

Stanzaic poem, dating from the mid/late 14th century, which recounts events from the later stages of Arthurian narrative, specifically those leading up to the break-up of the > Round Table. This narrative follows the framework of the 13th-century Old French Arthurian narratives in which the love affair between > Lancelot and > Guinevere, and the enmity between > Gawain and Lancelot are important catalysts in the destruction of Arthurian society, in addition to the treachery of Mordred. It was used by > Malory in the final books of his Morte D'Arthur.

➤ Arthur, King. Bib: Benson, L (ed.), King Arthur's Death.

Morte Arthure (alliterative)

> Alliterative poem, dating from c 1400, recounting events in the second half of ➤ King Arthur's career, from his campaign against Rome to his final battle against > Mordred, concluding with his death. The narrative follows the basic frame ultimately provided by > Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of Arthurian history but events are elaborated and a remarkable dream sequence is added (just before Arthur returns to fight Mordred) which features a vision of the > Nine Worthies, organized around Fortune's wheel. The dream, in effect, provides a meditation on the nature of the forces which shape Arthur's history. The Morte Arthure was used by ➤ Malory in Book 2 of his Morte D'Arthur Bib: Benson, L. (ed.), King Arthur's Death.

Morte D'Arthur

The Morte D'Arthur is the conventional title for a highly influential prose narrative, completed in 1469/70 by a Sir Thomas ▷ Malory, which recounts the foundation, history and destruction of ▷ King Arthur's court and the knights of the ➤ Round Table. Until 1934 Malory's narrative was known only through ➤ Caxton's edition (first printed in 1485) entitled the Morte D'Arthur, but the discovery of a manuscript version of the text in 1934, and its publication in 1947 as Malory's Works, revealed the extent of Caxton's editorial intervention. Whereas Caxton's text is divided into 21 books, the Works is composed of eight narratives (called 'Tales', or 'Books'), which are relatively selfcontained, but taken together form an overall history of Arthur's reign. The first recounts the founding of Arthur's kingdom and the Round Table: the second concerns Arthur's campaign for Rome; the third is devoted to the adventures of > Lancelot; the fourth is taken up with the romance of > Gareth; the fifth is predominantly concerned with a version of > Tristan's history; the sixth recounts the Quest of the Holy > Grail; the seventh relates the events which follow Lancelot's return to court and his love affair with ➤ Guinevere; the eighth recounts events leading up to the break-up of the Round Table and the end of all Arthur's knights. This organization into eight Tales/Books helps point up Malory's narrative strategy: he has not chosen to present events in a continuous narrative sequence, organized chronologically. Rather he has cultivated a looser structure that enables his reader to follow a number of narrative lines, which make up the sequence of Arthurian history.

Malory drew material for his work principally from the massive cycles of Arthurian narrative which had been compiled in France in the 13th century and in which accounts of the adventures at Arthur's court were organized in interlaced narrative forms (▷ Vulgate Cycle). Malory has abbreviated and reorganized this material, drawing out some of the narrative threads from the interlaced sequences, and reordering some of the adventures. His narrative is structured as an investigation into the meaning of the codes and ethos of that world. The institution of the Round Table is meant to introduce a civilizing code of behaviour to Arthur's kingdom, but the stories of the knights' adventures reveal the difficulty of working out a chivalric ethos in practice. The narrative explores and celebrates chivalric values, but it does not present a narrow moralizing account of Arthurian history, nor a simple explanation of why the brave new world of Arthur's court eventually collapses in such disarray. Malory's narrative is structured in such a way that no single chain of actions 'causes' the breakdown of the Round Table: the relationships between events and actions are more mysterious than in the Old French sources. Bib: Vinaver, E. (ed.), Malory: Works; Riddy, F., Sir Thomas Malory

Mother Hubberd's Tale, or Prosopopeia (c 1579) A verse > satire by > Edmund Spenser, in ten-syllable couplets, presented in the form of a fable; 'Prosopopeia' means 'endowing things or animals with personalities'. It was published with other poems in Complaints (1501) but written at about the same time as > The Shepherd's Calendar (1570). It was written at a time when > Elizabeth I seemed inclined to marry the Duke of Anjou, brother of Henry III of France. He was hated by the more convinced Protestants in England (of whom Spenser was one) because he was a Catholic and a member of the family responsible for the Massacre of St Bartholomew, 1572, in which French Protestants had been slaughtered. The fable tells how the ape and the fox steal the lion's crown while he sleeps. The ape is Anjou, and the fox is William Cecil, Lord Burghley, Spenser's enemy.

Mothers and Daughters: A Tale of the Year 1830 (1831)

A novel by > Catherine Gore, belonging to the 'silver-fork' school of fashionable fiction, like Gore's earlier work Women as They Are (1830). The central characters are Lady Maria Willingham and her two daughters, Claudia and Eleanor. The action revolves around the women's schemes for attracting aristocratic or wealthy men, and goes into great detail about the fashions of the day and the social milieu of the wealthy and privileged.

Motif

Generally, a recurrent, often well-known feature or idea occurring across a work or a number of literary works, for example the symbolic representations of life as a journey. When a pattern of such symbols or images are found in a work it is called a leitmotif. In some narrative theory (for example, the > Russian Formalist Boris Tomashevsky's essay 'Thematics'), motif has a more specialized sense pertaining to the units which make up a narrative, but this usage is not common.

Motion, Andrew (b 1952)

Poet and critic. Motion is a prolific writer, who has also worked as a lecturer in English (at the University of Hull), and has edited the Poetry Review. His publications include (poetry): The Pleasure Steamers (1978); Independence (1981); Secret Narratives (1983); Dangerous Play (1984) and Natural Causes (1987); and (criticism): The Poetry of Edward Thomas (1978) and Philip Larkin (1982). Motion has written the official biography of ▷ Larkin, who died in 1985.

Mourning Bride, The (1697)
Congreve's only play with a tragic action, though a happy ending, set in Granada. Almeria, Princess of Granada, has secretly married Alphonso, Prince of Valentia, when she was a captive in the Valencian palace. In battle the King of Valentia, Anselmo, dies, and Alphonso disappears and is presumed dead. While mourning at his tomb, Almeria is interrupted by the prisoner Osmyn, who turns out to be Alphonso in disguise. Meanwhile the captive queen Zara has fallen in love with 'Osmyn' but, failing to win him, plots to have him killed. Belatedly she tries to save him, but unknown to her, he escapes, and the tyrant King of Granada, Manuel, is mistakenly murdered in his place. Zara, finding his headless body, believes it to be that of Osmyn, takes poison and dies. Almeria is about to do the same when Alphonso enters. and the couple are reunited. The play ends with the assurance that 'blessings ever wait on virtuous deeds'. The Mourning Bride was hugely successful, and survived well into the 18th century. It contains two quotations which remain famous: 'Music has charms to soothe a savage breast' and 'Heav'n has no rage, like love to hatred turn'd,/Nor Hell a fury, like a woman scorn'd'.

Movement, The

One of the most important 'movements' in post-war British poetry, the Movement was really made into a coherent poetic body with the publication of three important anthologies: D. J. Enright's Poets of the 1950s (1955), Robert Conquest's New Lines and G. S. Frazer's Poetry Now (both 1956). As with any poetic school all of the prominent members of the Movement can ultimately be linked only through a tenuous range of connections, and indeed by 1957 its cohering impulse was dissolving. Some of its major figures are generally understood to be > Kingsley Amis, Conquest and Enright, Donald Davie, ➤ Thom Gunn, ➤ Elizabeth Jennings, ▷ Philip Larkin and ▷ John Wain. The work which is covered by this umbrella term is sardonic, lucid and self-consciously ironic. Opposed to the romantic and apocalyptic tone of much 1940s poetry, especially that of Dylan Thomas and DW. S. Graham, Movement poetry is meticulously crafted and witty, controlled and commonsensical, Bib: Morrison, B., The Movement.

Mphahlele, Es'kai (b 1919)

South African novelist, short-story writer and critic. He was educated at the University of South Africa in Pretoria and the University of Denver, USA. He worked as a clerk and as an English teacher in South Africa and was fiction editor of Drum magazine (1955–57) before leaving on an exit permit (which forbade re-entry to the country) in 1957; he was not to return for 20 years. In the 1960s he was director of African cultural programmes in Paris and in Nairobi, Kenya and then edited the journals Black Orpheus and Journal of New African Literature and the Arts in Ibadan, Nigeria. He held lecturing posts at universities in Nigeria, Kenya, Zambia and the USA before returning to South Africa in 1987, where he lectured at the University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg and became director of a community education project in Soweto. His early short stories, collected in Man Must Live (1947), portrayed life in the urban black ghettos of South Africa with a degree of humour; later stories, in The Living and Dead (1961) and In Corner B (1967), have a stronger element of protest. He has written two novels, The Wanderers (1971), a partly autobiographical account of South African intellectuals in exile, and Chirundu (1979), a political novel about a post-independence African state. His critical work The African Image (1962) was an early and influential account of African fiction and he also edited Modern African Stories (1964, with E. Komey) and African Writing Today (1967); Mphahlele has played an important role in developing and promoting African literature. His most recent work of fiction is the volume of short stories Renewal Time (1988). He has published two autobiographical works: Down Second Avenue (1959) and Afrika My Music: An Autobiography 1957-1983 (1984) as well as essays, books for children and works on education and creative writing; see The Unbroken Song: Selected Writing of Es'kai Mphahlele (1981). His letters have been published as Bury Me at the Crossroads: Selected Letters of Es'kai Mphahlele (1984).

Bib: Barnett, U. A., Es'kai Mphahlele; Manganyi, N. C., Exiles and Homecomings: A Biography of Es'kai Mphahlele.

Mrs Dalloway (1925)

A novel by ➤ Virginia Woolf. Set in London, it is the story of one day in the life of Clarissa Dalloway, the wife of Richard Dalloway, a Member of Parliament (the Dalloways appeared in Woolf's earlier novel, The Voyage Out). Clarissa spends the day preparing for a party she is to give that evening, a party which provides the culmination of the novel. The > stream of consciousness narrative represents the thoughts of Clarissa and a range of other characters with whom she is acquainted, or connected by chance occurrences of the day. Throughout the novel, memories of the past are blended with present sensations, and the narrative builds up a highly poetic evocation of the atmosphere of London and of the interaction of different lives. The principal characters, apart from the Dalloways, are: their daughter Elizabeth and her embittered and envious tutor, Miss Kilman; Peter Walsh, with whom Clarissa was in love during her youth; Sally Seton, Clarissa's girlhood friend, and Lady Bruton, a society hostess. In contrast to this group, whose lives are linked, are Septimus Warren Smith and his wife Rezia; Septimus is in a highly disturbed state after his experiences during World War I and the news of his suicide intrudes on Clarissa's party, brought by Sir William Bradshaw, a manipulative psychiatrist whom Septimus had consulted. The novel ends with the affirmation of life joined to an awareness of loss and death.

Much Ado about Nothing (1598) A comedy by ▷ Shakespeare. It was acted in 1508, and printed in 1600. The main plot is drawn from > Orlando Furioso (Bk V) and from a novel by Bandello. The scene is Messina, at the court of the governor, Leonato, who receives a visit from the Prince of Aragon, his evil-minded brother, Don John, and the Prince's friend, Claudio. The main plot concerns Claudio's indirect courtship of Hero, Leonato's daughter, the frustration of their marriage plans by Don John, who plants a slander on Hero, the eventual exposure of the slander, and the reconciliation. A subplot concerns the relationship between Benedick and Beatrice, who are famous in the court for their war of wits in which they declare mutual detestation; a plot is devised which enables each to recognize that their war is really a mask disguising their real love, and they acknowledge this to each other. The subplot joins the main plot when Beatrice tests Benedick's feelings for her by demanding that he challenge Claudio (his friend) to a duel for slandering Hero. The play is more famous for its subplot (and for ▷ Dogberry and Verges, the comic constables) than for its main plot, owing to the vividness of the characters in the former and the comparative colourlessness of those in the latter. However the comedy has more unity and impressiveness once the reader sees in it a strong current of satire. The court, like other > Renaissance courts, is an environment in which witticism is valued without regard to true feeling, disguise of some sort is normal, artifice has more prestige than nature, and carefully cultivated appearances take the place of reality. In such a world, it is natural that Claudio should be a superficial lover easily deceived by a stratagem and that a mere game played in mockery of Beatrice and Benedick should lead to their stumbling on the truth. Their moment of truth stands out with dramatic poignancy. Similarly, Dogberry's naïve stumbling over language is a contrast to the courtiers' artificial perversion of it.

Mudie, Charles Edward (1818–90)
Son of a bookseller, Mudie founded Mudie's Circulating Library, which loaned books to the public for a fee. Beginning in Bloomsbury, he expanded to Oxford Street, where the business ran for many years. Along with other ➤ circulating libraries, Mudie's exercised a noticeable moral ➤ censorship in the selection of books.

Muir, Edwin (1887–1959) Autobiographer, critic, poet, and novelist. He spent his childhood on a farm in the Orkney Islands, from which his father was compelled by economic hardship to move to Glasgow. For several years Muir struggled to earn his living in Glasgow as a clerk in various businesses; he became interested in socialism, and started writing. In 1919 he married, moved to London, and became a journalist. Thereafter, he travelled widely in Europe, and held a number of teaching posts. In 1940 he produced the first version of his autobiography, The Story and the Fable, expanded, revised and republished as Autobiography in 1954. The experiences of his own lifetime afforded him deep insight - social, cultural, spiritual. He had moved from a pre-industrial society in Orkney to 20th-century industrialism at its grimmest in Glasgow. He was deeply aware of the Scottish roots of his culture, and was liberated from their limitations partly through ▶ German literature and thought - ▷ Nietzsche, Heine, Hölderlin; in the 1930s he and his wife Willa translated Kafka. Experience of > psychoanalysis liberated the deeper levels of his imagination, and led him, through illumination about the relationship of man to his natural environment, to strong and unusually lucid religious feeling. His Autobiography is a modern classic.

His birthplace, Orkney, has had some measure of detachment from the history of the rest of Scotland, and it is partly this that enabled him to show some of the most penetrating perceptions about modern Scottish culture in Scottish Journey (1935) and Scott and Scotland (1936). His critical works include: Latitudes (1924); Transition (1926); The Structure of the Novel (1928); The Present Age (1939); Essays on Literature and Society (1949).

Poetry: First Poems (1925); Journeys and Places (1925); Chorus of the Newly Dead (1926); Variations on a Time Theme (1934); The Narrow Place (1943); The Voyage (1946); The Labyrinth (1949); Prometheus (1954); One Foot in Eden (1956); Collected Poems 1921–1958 (1960). He came to writing poetry late, through urgency of personal feeling rather than a professionally poetic concern with the medium. Nonetheless his later volumes embody some of his most moving insights, eg 'The Combat' from The Labyrinth.

His novels are: The Marionette (1927); The Three Brothers (1931); Poor Tom (1932). Biography: John Knox (1929).

→ Autobiography; Scottish literature in English.

Bib: Knight, R., Edwin Muir; an Introduction to His Work; Butter, E., Edwin Muir, Man and Poet.

Mulcaster, Richard (c 1530–1611) Educationalist. Mulcaster was the first headmaster of Merchant Taylors School, London, where he taught ⊳ Andrewes, ⊳ Kyd, ⊳ Lodge and ⊳ Spenser, and in 1596 he became the high master at St Paul's School. His views on education were humanist; he believed, for example, that girls should be educated to as high a standard as boys. Mulcaster wrote two books on education, Positions (1581) and The Elementarie (1582), and he also contributed ➤ masques, entertainments and commemorative verses to state and city occasions, such as the funeral orations on ➤ Elizabeth I in 1603. Bib: Elsky, M., Authorizing Words.

Muldoon, Paul (b 1951)

Poet. Born in County Armagh and educated at Queen's University, Belfast, Muldoon is one of the younger generation of poets to emerge from Northern Ireland in the last two decades (see also ➤ Seamus Heaney and ➤ Derek Mahon). His publications include: Names and Addresses (1978); New Weather (1973); Mules (1977) and Why Brownlee Left (1980). ➤ Irish literature in English.

Mummers' Plays/Mumming

Although many Mummers' plays survive from various parts of the country, all of the texts date from the 18th century or later. Characteristically they take the form of a fight between a Champion (often St George) and an Antagonist, who is killed but resurrected at the end through the agency of a Doctor. The plays often conclude with a Dance and the opportunity for a collection of money. Archetypal patterns are ritually enacted within these plays, though the texts as we have them may themselves be the product of folkloric revivals. Access to folk-drama and rituals of the past is necessarily difficult because by its very definition this kind of cultural activity does not depend on written records or texts. Information about medieval folk-drama is derived from the records of attempts by ecclesiastical authorities to ban, curb, or suppress it.

Mummings, as their name suggests, are dumb-shows, particularly masquerades and disguisings associated with the festivities of the New Year and Shrove-Tide. Again, though there are records of prohibitions on mummings from the early medieval period, the texts that survive from the 15th century are of mummings contrived as occasions of civic and aristocratic entertainment, such as those composed by John Lydgate (in which a dumb-show is accompanied by a verse commentary).

Bib: Brody, A., The English Mummers and their Plays.

Munda, Constantia (c 1617)

Polemical tract-writer in the debate about women. 'Constantia Munda' is a pseudonym for a female response to Joseph Swetnam's attack upon women (> Querelle des Femmes), which was published as The Worming of a Mad Dogge (1617). The treatise begins with a poem thanking her mother for setting an example of virtue and piety, and continues with a prose defence of women asserting them to be valued equally with men by God. It also accuses Swetnam of praising only masculine virtues and of classifying all women as the same when there are many different levels of moral virtue to be found.

➤ Sowernam, Ester; Speght, Rachel. Bib: Henderson, K. U. and McManus, B. F. (eds.), Half Humankind.

Munday, Anthony (1553-1633)

Poet, dramatist, translator and ⊳ pamphlet writer. Munday's somewhat prolific career is marked by a keen interest in narrative, but little imaginative skill in his use of language. Of his life outside the theatre we know little, and can only speculate about his being a boyactor and a double agent (moving between the Protestant state and Catholic insurgents). Of his many pamphlets, several are staunchly Protestant, and the contents of the others are general, appealing to popular rather than specific tastes. He also wrote poetry, some of which is included in > England's Helicon, and while employed as London's official poet (1592-1623), he composed several civic entertainments. However, Munday is better known for his dramatic collaborations and his > translations of prose romances. He was one of the revisers of > Sir Thomas More (c 1596) and collaborated with > Henry Chettle on two plays about Robin Hood, The Downfall of Robert, Earle of Huntington and The Death of Robert, Earle of Huntington (both 1598). Munday may now be seen as an important contributor to the ➤ Elizabethan novel through his translations of the prose romances Palladine of England (1588) and Amadis of Gaule (c 1590). He is satirized by > Jonson as Antonio Balladino in The Case is Altered.

Bib: Hayes, G. R., Anthony Munday's Romances of Chivalry; Turner, C., Anthony Munday: An Elizabethan Man of Letters.

Murdoch, Iris (b 1919)

Novelist and philosopher. Her novels are: Under the Net (1954); Flight from the Enchanter (1955); The Sandcastle (1957); The Bell (1958); Bruno's Dream (1960); A Severed Head (1961; dramatized 1963); An Unofficial Rose (1962); The Unicorn (1963); The Italian Girl (1964; dramatized 1967); The Red and the Green (1965); The Time of the Angels (1966); The Nice and the Good (1968); A Fairly Honourable Defeat (1970); An Accidental Man (1971); The Black Prince (1973); The Sacred and Profane Love Machine (1974); A Word Child (1975); Henry and Cato (1976); The Sea, The Sea (1978); Nuns and Soldiers (1980); The Philosopher's Pupil (1983); The Good Apprentice (1985); The Book and the Brotherhood (1987); A Message to the Planet (1989); and The Green Knight (1993).

Iris Murdoch is one of the most prolific and the most popular of serious contemporary novelists. Born in Dublin and educated at Somerville College Oxford and Newnham College Cambridge, she has lectured in philosophy. Her husband is the critic John Bayley. Her profession as a philosopher is reflected in many aspects of her fiction. She has written a study of the work of Jean-Paul Sartre (Sartre, Romantic Rationalist, 1953) and her interest in, and dissent from Sartre's > existentialism is evident in her first two novels, which treat existential issues of identity and freedom. These concerns have persisted in her work, but The Bell and The Time of the Angels introduce religious themes, while since The Nice and the Good many of her novels have directly addressed ethical questions. The Good Apprentice, for example, explores the idea of a character who, without explicit religious faith, sets out to be good. Although her works are novels of ideas, they combine this with exciting and sometimes macabre plots, elements of the grotesque and supernatural and touches of social comedy. They are highly structured, both by the use of symbolism, and by the patterning of shifting personal relationships.

Her plays include: The Three Arrows (1970); The Servants and the Snow (1973); Art and Eros (1980). Other works are: The Sovereignty of Good (1970); The Fire and the Sun: Why Plato Banished the Artists (1977); Acastos: Two Platonic Dialogues (1986); Metaphysics as a Guide to Morals (1992).

Bib: Conradi, P., Iris Murdoch: the Saint and the Artist; Johnson, D., Iris Murdoch; Todd, R., Iris Murdoch; Byatt, A.S., Degrees of Freedom: The Novels of Iris Murdoch.

Murphy, Arthur (1727-1805)

Dramatist. Murphy's prolific output includes tragedies, comedies and farces. He adapted the works of the French dramatists Molière and Voltaire (> French literature in England), and his own plays include the witty > satire, Three Weeks After Marriage (1764). Murphy is also known for writing biographies of Fielding (An Essay on the Life and Genius of Henry Fielding, 1762), Garrick (The Life of David Garrick, 1801), and his friend Dr Johnson (An Essay on the Life and Genius of Samuel Johnson, 1792).

Bib: Dunbar, H.H., The Dramatic Career of Murphy.

Murray, John (1778-1843)

Publisher. He founded the ▷ Quarterly Review in 1809, and published works by ▷ Lord Byron, ▷ Jane Austen and ▷ George Crabbe, among others. Alone among Byron's correspondents he refused to cooperate with the conspiracy to destroy the poet's Memoir and expurgate his letters after his death. Byron's correspondence with Murray thus provides our best insight into Byron's actual language in informal contexts. Murray's father (1745–93) and his son (1808–92), both named John, were also publishers of note.

Murry, John Middleton (1880-1057) Critic. His own struggles to achieve personal integration, his close relationship with > D. H. Lawrence, and his marriage to ➤ Katherine Mansfield, led him to write about a number of writers relating their personal lives to their art: Dostoevsky (1916), Keats and Shakespeare (1925), Studies in Keats (1930), William Blake (1933), Shakespeare (1936), Jonathan Swift (1954). He is perhaps best known for his controversial study of D. H. Lawrence, Son of Woman (1931) (> Catherine Carswell), and for The Problem of Style (1922). He was editor of the Athenaeum from 1919 to 1921, and published the work of a number of major writers, including > T. S. Eliot and ⊳ Virginia Woolf. Bib: Lea, F. A., The Life of John Middleton Murry.

Musgrave, Agnes (fl 1800)
Novelist. Almost nothing is known of Musgrave's life, but she was a best-selling ▷ Minerva novelist from 1705 to 1801. Intriguingly, her first work purports to be a history of the Musgrave family through the female line from ▷ medieval times to her own age; it is supposedly discovered and recounted by the author. Edmund of the Forest (1797), The Solemn Injunction (1798) and The Confession (1801) followed Musgrave's first novel, but they are all rather predictably sensational and quasi ▷ Gothic.

'Mutabilitie Cantos', The (1609) When the 1600 folio edition of ➤ Edmund Spenser's ➤ The Faerie Queene was published, two further cantos of the poem, and two stanzas of a fragmentary third canto, were printed. These, the putative cantos vi, vii, and a fragment of viii of Book VII of the poem, were described in the 1609 edition in the following way: 'TWO CANTOS of Mutabilitie: Which, both for Forme and Matter, appeare to be parcell of some following Booke of the FAERIE QUEENE under the legend of Constancie'. The precise relationship between these cantos and the main body of the poem has been a subject of dispute ever since their first appearance. The fragmentary nature of the material, together with the theme of the verses (not simply constancy, but a dispute between mutability or 'change' and nature) might, it has often been thought, provide a key to the interpretation of Spenser's complete project, The Faerie Queene. Whatever the theological or artistic nature of these final cantos, in reading them after the main body of the poem many modern readers have concluded that they are evidence for the resistance of Spenser's text to any form of 'closure'.

'My Last Duchess'
A poem by ➤ Robert Browning and one of his most powerful and successful ≥ dramatic monologues. It was first published in Dramatic Lyrics (1842). Ostensibly the poem describes an incident in the life of Alfonso II, Duke of Ferrara during the 16th century, but its interest lies mainly in the complex psychological portrait of the Duke that unfolds during its course. In an attempt to impress the envoy of a Count whose daughter he intends to marry with his knowledge of art and love of beautiful things, Alfonso draws back the curtain on a strikingly lifelike portrait of his first wife. As he describes her it becomes clear that he was jealously obsessed with the duchess and in order to possess her exclusively he arranged for her portrait to be painted and then for her murder.

Myers, Leopold Hamilton (1881-1944) Novelist. His father, F. W. H. Myers (1843-1901) was a characteristic product of the 19th-century > agnosticism so prominent among the educated classes; his reaction against it took the form of attempts to prove the existence of the soul by scientific experiment; he was one of the founders of the Society for Psychical Research. The son's concern with the spiritual life took the form of seeking answers to the question 'Why do men choose to live?'. His chief opponents in his pursuit of the answer were not scientific rationalists in the tradition of > T. H. Huxley, but aesthetes of the Bloomsbury tradition, who left moral experience to look after itself while they cultivated enjoyment of 'states of mind'. He also regarded the great influence on English writing of the French novelist, > Marcel Proust (1871-1922) as pernicious, because Proust likewise esteemed experience aesthetically and not morally. Myers considered that this led to the trivializing of life, and his novels dramatize the opposition between those who interpret experience through moral discrimination and those who vulgarize it by regarding it as a means to aesthetic experience only; from the latter evil arises. He regarded civilized society as corrupted by its moral indifference.

His first novel, The Orissers (1922) presents the issue in bare terms, but his principal work was the sequence of novels about 16th-century India, published together as The Near and the Far in 1943. Myers chose the remote setting of India under the Emperor Akbar because he wanted to escape from the secondary preoccupations of daily life in modern England, and to treat moral and spiritual issues with the large scope which the India of that date, with its multiplying religions and philosophies, afforded him. Evil is represented in the novel through Akbar's son Prince Daniyal, intelligent, artistic, but morally nihilistic, and rival of his merely stupid brother Salim for succession to the throne. Good is expressed through the character of the Guru (teacher) of the last section (The Pool of Vishnu): 'All communion', he says, 'is through the Centre. When the relation of man and man is not through the Centre it corrupts and destroys itself.' In his later years he became a ➤ Communist. He committed suicide in 1944. Other novels include: The Clio (1925); Strange Glory (1936).

➤ Bloomsbury Group. Bib: Bantock, G. H., L. H. Myers: A Critical Study.

Mysteries of Udolpho, The (1794) A novel by ➤ Mrs Ann Radcliffe. It achieved great fame in its own day, and is often cited as the typical > Gothic novel. It is mainly set in a sombre castle in the Apennine mountains in Italy. The atmosphere is of secret plots, concealed passages, abductions, and the supernatural. > Jane Austen satirized the taste for such sensational literature in ▷ Northanger Abbey.

Mystery plays ➤ Cycle plays.

Three modern uses of this term can be distinguished. The traditional meaning refers to the body of supernatural stories often either inspire works of literature or can be used as source material for them. In writing in English, those most commonly found are the Greek and Roman myths (> Classical mythology), though there is also a strong tradition which treats Christian stories as myths. The second, more modern usage relates to the development by the psychoanalyst Carl Jung. A third, contemporary usage follows that of the influential French critic > Roland Barthes' book Mythologies (1957). Barthes argued that modern media systems - films, television, advertising, popular writing and journalism - create and indulge myths about our world by investing ordinary behaviour with extra significance (for example, that steak, chips and red wine represent a quintessential Frenchness). Barthes' model, which is carefully explained in a concluding theoretical essay, but which is embodied in the inventive and witty short essays originally written for magazines which make up the body of the book, is now widely accepted. For him, modern mythologies propagate → ideology.

> Naturalization

Bib: Barthes, R., Mythologies.

Naden, Constance (1858–89)

Poet, painter and journalist. She was educated at the Birmingham Midland Institute and the Mason Science College where she studied the philosophy of ⊳ Herbert Spencer. She wrote articles for the Journal of Science and lectured on scientific subjects. > Darwinian theories of evolution also influenced her writing, which is distinctly > atheist but nevertheless humorous. Her pamphlet What is Religion? A Vindication of Freethought anticipates a time when religious values will be superseded by scientific ones. Poems such as 'Evolutional Erotics' dispense with notions of 'romantic love' in favour of more Darwinian methods of selection and others confront the difficult choice between love and work as it affects women. Her overriding themes, however, concern the challenge to religious faith posed by Darwinian evolutionary theories as in poems such as 'The New Orthodoxy' and 'Poet and Botanist'.

In 1887 she travelled to Palestine, Egypt and India and retained an active interest in the medical needs of Indian women. In this she was encouraged by pioneer female doctor Elizabeth Garrett Anderson, and she was a loyal supporter of the new Garrett Anderson hospital for women in London. Literary acquaintances included ▷ Michael Field and ▷ Edith Cooper. She died at the age of thirty-one, after a major operation, of an infection possibly contracted in India. She was mourned by both the scientific and the literary communinity, and was highly praised as a woman poet by ▷ Gladstone in the ▷ Spectator.

Bib: Leighton, A. and Reynolds, M., An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Naipaul, Shiva (1945-85)

Trinidadian novelist, travel writer and journalist. Born in Port of Spain, Trinidad, the brother of > V. S. Naipaul, he was educated at Queens Royal College, Trinidad, St Mary's College, Trinidad and at University College Oxford. His first two novels are both set among the Hindu community in Trinidad: Fireflies (1970) and The Chip-Chip Gatherers (1973), which won the Whitbread Award. A Hot Country (1983) is a study of English expatriates in a fictional South American country. North of South: An African Journey (1978) presents a critical view of East African societies, showing racism, corruption and inequality. Fourney to Nowhere: a New World Tragedy, first published as Black and White (1980), is about the 1978 Jonestown Massacre in Guyana, in which goo sect members committed suicide on the orders of their leader. Beyond the Dragon's Mouth: Stories and Pieces (1984) includes essays, stories and autobiographical fragments.

Naipaul, V. S. (Vidiahar Surajprasad) (b 1932)

Trinidadian novelist of Indian descent, Educated at Queens Royal College, Port of Spain, Trinidad, and Oxford University, he settled in England in 1050. His brother was the novelist ➤ Shiva Naipaul. V. S. Naipaul is the most admired of contemporary Caribbean novelists writing in English and has won many literary awards, including, in 1993, the first David Cohen British Literature Prize. His work is concerned with personal and political freedom. the function of the writer and the nature of sexuality, and is characterized by fastidiousness, clarity, subtlely, and a detached irony of tone. His earlier novels, The Mystic Masseur (1957), The Suffrage of Elvira (1958) and Miguel Street (1959) convey both the vitality and the desolation of Trinidadian life. The Mimic Men (1967) is a satirical examination of the economic power structure of an imaginary West Indian island. A House for Mr Biswas (1961), often regarded as his masterpiece, tells the tragicomic story of the search for independence and identity of a Brahmin Indian living in Trinidad. His other novels are: Companion (1963); In A Free State (1971); Guerillas (1975); A Bend in the River (1979); The Enigma of Arrival (1987); A Way in the World (1994). Naipaul has also produced essays, criticism, journalism, autobiography and travel writing, including: The Middle Passage (1962); An Area of Darkness (1964); A Congo Diary (1980); The Return of Eva Peron (1980); Among the Believers: An Islamic Journal (1981); India: A Million Mutinees Now (1981); Finding the Centre (1984). He was knighted in 1990. Bib: Hamner, R. D. (ed.), Critical Perspectives on V. S. Naipaul; Theroux, P., V. S. Naipaul: An Introduction to His Work.

Namjoshi, Suniti (b 1941)

Indian short-story writer and poet. Namjoshi was born in Bombay and educated at the University of Poona in India and at Missouri University, USA, and McGill University, Canada. Drawing on Indian legends, fables, poems and oral story-telling traditions, she has written feminist fables and versions of fairystories, a practice she shares with a number of English feminists such as ➤ Angela Carter. Prose works: Feminist Fables (1981); The Conversations of Cow (1985); Aditi and the One-Eyed Monkey (1986); The Blue Donkey Fables (1988); The Mothers of Maya Diip (1989). Her volumes of poetry include: The Jackass and the Lady (1980); The Authentic Lie (1982); Flesh and Paper (1986); Because of India (1989).

Napoleon I (Napoleon Bonaparte, originally Buonaparte, 1769-1821)

A Corsican whose unique career began in the > French Revolution, when he joined the French army defending the first French Republic against European alliances. His military successes brought him to dictatorship in 1799, with the title of First Consul, and in 1804 he became Emperor. His armies dominated the greater part of Europe until 1812, when his campaign against Russia failed. His final defeat at the hands of the British and the Prussians under ➤ Wellington and Blücher at ➤ Waterloo (1815) led to his exile on the Atlantic island of St Helena, where he died.

His unprecedented success aroused contrasted feelings amongst the British. For the great majority he was a nightmare figure; mothers used his name to frighten naughty children into discipline. To a man like > Wordsworth he was the tyrant who revealed the illusoriness of the ideals of universal freedom which the Revolution had seemed to express. For ➤ Byron and ➤ Shelley he was the first man in Europe to have risen to the summit of power by intrinsic merit and not at least partly through privilege; his downfall and the restoration of the traditional kinds of government that he had overthrown was for them a defeat of the new hopes for mankind. Byron described him memorably in > Child Harold Canto III, stanzas 36-44. > French literature in England.

Napoleon III (lived 1808-73)

The nephew of > Napoleon I. He became Emperor of the French in 1852, after previously being elected to the office of President of the second French Republic in 1848. His revival of the Napoleonic title caused him to take the title of Napoleon III, out of respect for his uncle's dead son who had in fact never succeeded to the title. He was without his uncle's genius in war and statecraft, but among the British the mere fact of his succession to power renewed fears of French aggression. His regime was overthrown by the Germans in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870, and he died in England.

Narayan, R. K. (Rasipuran Krishnaswami) (b 1006)

Indian novelist and short-story writer. His novels are: Swami and Friends (1935); The Bachelor of Arts (1937); The Dark Room (1938); The English Teacher (1945); Mr Sampath (1949); The Financial Expert (1952); Waiting for the Mahatma (1955); The Guide (1958); The Man Eater of Malgudi (1961); The Vendor of Sweets (1967); The Painter of Signs (1976); A Tiger for Malgudi (1983); and Talkative Man (1986). His novels are set in the imaginary southern Indian community of Malgudi, based on the town of Mysore, which he uses to epitomize Indian culture from the days of the Raj to the present. The early novels show the continuing influence of British culture, in particular on the education system, and contain elements of ⊳ autobiography. His work attains a new seriousness with The English Teacher, which is based on his own marriage and the early death of his wife. His mature work deals with spirituality and with human weakness, corruption, failure and lack of fulfilment in an ironic and sceptical manner, supported by the vivid realization of the life of the town. The Guide, the story of a con man who becomes a saint, is one of his outstanding works, while A Tiger for Malgudi represents an excursion into a fantasy mode; drawing on the Hindu doctrine of reincarnation, it has a tiger as its hero and narrator. Story collections are: Malgudi Days (1943); Dodu (1943); Cyclone (1944); An Astrologer's Day (1947); Lawley Road (1956); A House and Two Goats (1970); Old and New (1981); Malgudi Days (1982) (not the same as the 1943 volume); Under The Banyan Tree (1985). Narayan has also written travel literature, memoirs, essays and versions of the Indian epics The Ramayana and The Mahabharata.

Bib: Walsh, W., R. K. Narayan: a Critical Appreciation.

Narrating or narration/narration (French) Terms in ▷ narratology denoting the act of telling a story, which takes place in a ▷ narrative.

Narrative or text/récit (French) Terms denoting the objects of study in narrationy. The narrative informs the re-

¬ narratology. The narrative informs the reader of the story and implies the existence of the act of ¬ narrating.

Narratology

The systematic study of the structures, forms and modalities of narrative, including questions of temporal arrangement or tense (> order, > duration, > frequency), > mood (the manner of narration and point of view, including → focalization), and → voice (the identity and) relationship to the action of the > narrator and narratee). Early considerations of narratological questions are found in ➤ Henry James' Prefaces (1907-9) and > E.M. Forster's book > Aspects of the Novel (1927). Wayne Booth's The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961) inaugurated a more wide-ranging and systematic approach, while the influence of structuralism produced the rigorous analysis of categories of narrative typified by > Gérard Genette's Narrative Discourse (1980). There is a more accessible summary of this approach in Shlomith Rimmon-Kenan's Narrative Fiction: Contemporary Poetics (1983).

Narrator

A fictional person or consciousness who narrates all or part of a text. A narrator may be a character within a story, who then tells a story, such as Marlow in ▷ Conrad's ▷ Heart of Darkness; this is known as an intradiegetic narrator. Alternatively, a narrator may be extradiegetic, that is, outside the story that he or she narrates, like the narrator of ▷ Fielding's ▷ Tom Jones (who has a strong personality, but does not participate in the story as such), or like the largely impersonal and uncharacterized narrator of ➤ Henry James' ➤ The Ambassadors. Such extradiegetic narrators are different from the ➤ implied author since they may be unreliable narrators (➤ Narrator, unreliable).

Narrator, unreliable

A > narrator who cannot be relied upon to provide accurate information, so that the reader is obliged to try to deduce, from the possibly misleading account given by such a narrator, the true facts of the case. A narrator may be unreliable because of limited knowledge or understanding (eg the idiot Benjy in the first section of William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury), because of being in a disturbed state of mind (eg the governess, in one possible reading of > The Turn of the Screw by > Henry James), because of personal bias or dubious moral values (eg Dowell in > Ford Madox Ford's The Good Soldier), or out of sheer wilfulness (eg the narrator of > Peter Carev's Illywhacker). Unreliable narration tends to emphasize the subjective nature of truth and the technique often tends towards the implication that there is no such thing as an objective viewpoint.

Nashe, Thomas (1567-1601)

Pamphleteer, poet and playwright. He spent six years at St John's College, Cambridge, and is numbered among the > University Wits who made the decade 1500-1600 an unusually lively period in literature. Two features of this liveliness were > satire and prose romance (sometimes misleadingly called > 'the Elizabethan novel'). Nashe contributed to both: his best-known work, > The Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jack Wilton (1594), is one of the outstanding romances of the decade, and it includes some of his best satire, often in the form of a > parody of some of the contemporary styles of fine writing. Most of the rest of his satire was also in prose. Pierce Penniless, His Supplication to the Devil (1502) is a satire in the tradition of the allegorical > morality plays, an attack on the qualities that made for success in the London of his day, and a denunciation of them as new versions of the > Seven Deadly Sins; the method looks forward to ➤ Ben Jonson's comedy of humours (> Humours, Comedy of). His last work, Lenten Stuff (1599), is a comic extravaganza on Yarmouth, a fishing town, and the red herring. Other prose work includes his early ⊳ pamphlets attacking the Puritan side in the > Marprelate controversy amd vigorous disagreement with ⊳ Gabriel Harvey on literary and moral questions between 1593 and 1596. His Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1593) records his repentance for religious doubts.

Nashe escaped being sent to prison in 1597 for an attack on abuses in his play The Isle of Dogs, which has been lost. His co-author Jonson and the other actors were imprisoned – Nashe fled. The only play of his sole authorship which survives is Summer's Last Will and Testament (1592). This defends the traditional festivities of the countryside against Puritan condemnation of them, and at the same time attacks the useless extravagance of courtiers. It includes some very fine lyrics especially In Plague Time and Autumn.

Nashe is chiefly known as a prose-writer; his prose is notable for the abundance of its energy and its carnivalesque spirit, which compensate for the confusion of its organization. His gift for parody and the rapidity and vividness of his expression show that the greater coherence and lucidity which English prose was to achieve in the 17th century was not all gain. The freedom and zest of his comic writing owe something to earlier > Renaissance writers - the Italian poet and comedian > Pietro Aretino and the great French satirist > François Rabelais. However, recent criticism has suggested that there is a clear ideological centre to Nashe's works, and this revival of interest must be set alongside the idea of his writing being incoherent and uncontrolled.

Bib: McKerrow, R. B. (rev.), The Works of Thomas Nashe (5 vols); Hibbard, G. R., Nashe: A Critical Introduction; Hutson, L., Thomas Nashe in Context; Nicholl, C., A Cup of News.

National Theatre, The

The idea of a national theatre in London had existed since the 18th century. Serious efforts to create such an institution began early this century with the publication in 1903 of The National Theatre: A Scheme and Estimates, by > William Archer and ➤ Harley Granville-Barker. Enthusiastic lobbying of governments continued after World War I and by 1938 a fund of £150,000 had been raised. However, it was not until 1962 that a National Theatre Board was established. This body created a National Theatre company led by ⊳ Sir Laurence Olivier, which was based at the > Old Vic whilst a new theatre was built for it on the South Bank at Waterloo. This was finally completed in 1976; the theatre has three auditoria: the Lyttelton, Olivier and Cottesloe theatres, providing a proscenium stage, an open stage and a workshop studio. The first general director was > Sir Peter Hall, who was replaced by Richard Eyre in 1988. The company policy is to present a diverse repertoire, embracing classic, new and neglected plays from the whole of world drama and to give audiences a choice of at least six different productions at any one time. Bib: Elsom, J. and Tomalin, N., The History of the National Theatre.

Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne

→ White, Gilbert.

Natural Law

According to theologians ($eg \triangleright$ Richard Hooker), that part of the Divine Will that manifests itself in the order of the material world: distinguishable from but a piece with human and divine law. Modern scientists define it as the principles of uniformity discernible in the behaviour of phenomena, making such behaviour predictable. For the 18th century, the existence of Natural Law was important as the basis for > Natural Religion.

Natural Philosophy

In the 17th and 18th centuries, the study of physics and kindred sciences. Interest in Natural Philosophy became organized and heightened with the establishment in 1662 of the ➤ Royal Society, which took the whole of knowledge as its province. The natural philosophers included such eminent persons as ➤ Isaac Newton, the chemist Robert Boyle (1627-91), and the naturalist John Ray (1627-1705). They were religious men and made their religion accord with their science. However, in spite of the respect accorded to some of them, especially Newton, intellectuals in the period 1660-1730 tended to react against natural philosophy with angry contempt. They were provoked not so much by the fear of the injury such thought might do to religious faith - this was much more a 19th-century reaction - as by disgust at the triviality of much scientific inquiry, the technical fruits of which were slow to appear. The most notable satire was Swift's 'Laputa' in Part III of ➤ Gulliver's Travels. Other examples were Samuel Butler's Elephant in the Moon, some of the ➤ Spectator essays of Addison and Steele, and the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, published with the works of ▶ Pope in 1741, though the principal author seems to have been John Arbuthnot (1667-1735).

Natural Religion

A belief first taught by ▷ Lord Herbert of Cherbury; according to him, belief in God and right conduct are planted in human instincts. This Christian doctrine was the basis for deistic thought (▷ Deism) in the later 17th and 18th centuries, and contributed to the growth of religious toleration, though also to passivity of religious feeling and hence to indifference. Herbert's aim was to resolve the doubts arising out of the religious conflicts of his time – see eg ▷ Donne's Third Satire. For the reaction against Deism, see ▷ William Blake's propositions There is No Natural Religion (1788).

Naturalism

In literature, a school of thought especially associated with the novelist ▷ Emile Zola. It was a development of ▷ Realism. The Naturalists believed that imaginative literature (especially the novel) should be based on scientific knowledge, and that imaginative writers would be scientifically objective and exploratory in their approach to their work.

This means that environment should be exactly treated, and that character should be related to physiological heredity. Influential in France and Germany, the movement counts for little in Britain; the novelists ▷ George Gissing and ▷ Arnold Bennett show traces of its influence in the treatment of environment in relation to character.

Naturalization

A process, described in much structuralist and > post-structuralist theory, whereby cultural sign systems come to be taken for reality. The process occurs in, for example, journalism and other news media, and in realist forms of literary writing, all of which claim to represent 'the truth' often simply by virtue of their > conventionality or 'taken-for-grantedness'. As such they are vehicles for ▷ ideology. According to ▶ Roland Barthes, naturalized signs repress the fact that they are signs, and pretend to be real and true instead of artificial and constructed. It is here that they are most dangerous. Fears about the ideological contamination of 'realism' led Barthes and other post-structuralist thinkers to prefer writing in experimental or ≥ avant-garde modes which flaunts their constructedness and deliberate artificiality.

Myth;
 Realism
 Bib: Barthes, R., Mythologies.

Nature

The word is used throughout English literature with meanings that vary constantly according to period or to mode of expression, eg philosophic, religious or personal. This note is intended to guide the student by showing some of the basic approaches to the idea.

- 1 Creation and the Fall. Fundamental to all conceptions of Nature is traditional Christian doctrine. This influences English writers even when they are using a more or less agnostic or atheistic approach. The doctrine is that Nature is God's creation, but by the fall of man, symbolized by the story of ▶ Adam's disobedience in the book of Genesis, earthly nature is self-willed and destructive though not to the extent that the Divine Will and Order is obliterated in it.
- 2 All-embracing Nature. Nature is sometimes seen as the whole of reality so far as earthly experience goes. For instance, the opening 18 lines of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Prologue to the Canterbury Tales show Nature as the great reviver of life. This use of the word has a different kind of significance in the 18th century when scientific Reason has replaced the religious imagination as the familiar vehicle for the interpretation of reality. See 4 Nature and Truth.
- 3 Nature and God. In line with traditional Christian doctrine, Natural Law is linked to Human Law and Divine Law as a manifestation of the Divine Will, in such works as ➤ Hooker's Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1597). However, from the beginning of the 17th century, there was a new interest in the function of human reason as an instrument for the acquisition of knowledge independently of religious feeling. Men like > Ralegh (History of the World, 1614) and ▷ Bacon (▷ The Advancement of Learning) began to ask what, given that God was the Primary Cause of Nature, were the Secondary, or Immediate, Causes of natural phenomena. Newton's work on gravitation (Principia Mathematica, 1687) and Docke's DEssay Concerning Human Understanding seemed to solve the problem causing people to see God as the Divine Artificer whose Reason could be discerned in the government of even the smallest phenomena, as well as in the great original act of Creation.

4 Nature and Truth. Nature is in the 18th century Truth scientifically considered. 'To follow Nature' (eg in works of imaginative literature) may mean: (i) to present things and people (eg an imagined character) as they really are; (ii) to reveal truths that lie beneath appearances; (iii) to follow rational principles. It was the attempt to 'follow Nature' in these ways that constituted the main discipline of the novelists ▶ Defoe, ▶ Richardson, ▶ Fielding, ▶ Smollet.

5 Nature as Moral Paradox. The Christian conception of Nature as both God-created and spoilt by the fall of man led at various times to the problem that Nature is both good and evil. According to the medieval conception, maintained until the middle of the 17th century, human society was itself the outcome of the Divine Natural Order, so that it was by Natural Law that children should honour their parents, subjects their sovereigns, etc. On the other hand, the natural passions of men and beasts, unrestrained by reason, were the source of rapacity and ruin. Thus > Shakespeare's King Lear begins by relying on the former conception of Nature, but he is exposed to the reality of the latter.

19th-century natural science revived the feeling that Nature was essentially destructive, and hostile or at best indifferent to men; this is the 'Nature red in tooth and claw' image of ▷ Tennyson's ▷ In Memoriam, set against the idea of the love of God. The atheistic ▷ Thomas Hardy saw men as subjected to the irony of indifferent fates, and the natural environment as governed in the same way.

6 Nature for Man's Use. Implicit in Christian doctrine was the belief that Nature was created for man; that it was his birthright to exploit and use it. This begins with the conception of Nature as the Great Mother originating in pre-Christian times but pervasive in medieval verse and later, eg in much Elizabethan ▷ pastoral poetry. It took a more active significance when the 17th-and 18th-century 'Natural philosophers' from ➤ Bacon onwards sought methods by which man could increase his power over Nature; 18th-century poetry commonly shows Nature as beautiful when she is productive under the ingenuity of human exploitation.

7 Nature and Art. 'Art' in earlier contexts often includes technology, eg in Polixenes' remarks on cultivation to Perdita in The Winter's Tale IV. iii; here art is seen as itself a product of nature. But art was often set against nature in Shakespeare's time and afterwards, eg in Sidney's ➤ Apology for Poetry; 'Her (ie Nature's) world is brazen; the Poets only deliver a golden'; here the function of imaginative art seems to be the opposite of the 18th-century poets' and novelists' conception of 'truth to nature', but Sidney meant that poetry should improve on Nature, not falsify it; the creation must be ideal, but consistent with Nature.

8 Nature opposed to Court and City, 'Art', however, was not necessarily an improvement. The city and the court, in Shakespeare's time, were the centres of new financial forces generating intrigue and 'unnatural' (ie inhuman) behaviour. There was also a kind of pastoral made by idealizing the life of the great country houses, eg > Ben Jonson's > Penshurst and > Aemelia Lanier's Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum. In the 18th century poets like > James Thomson wrote about natural surroundings for their own sake, and sometimes included wild nature as their subject, but it was > Wordsworth who gave to wild nature its importance as the principal subject of what later came to be known as 'nature' poetry.

9 Nature in Communion with the Individual. Wordsworth was to some extent anticipated in the 18th century by such a poet as ➤ William Cowper, and his teacher was especially ➤ Jean-Jacques Rousseau. It was Wordsworth above all, however, who gave to Nature its modern most familiar sense – as the non-urban, preferably wild environment of man, to which the depths of his own nature always respond. Here he finds a communion which refreshes the loneliness of his spirit in a relationship which underlies and gives meaning to his human relationships.

> French literature in England.

Négritude

A literary movement begun amongst black writers from the French colonies in Paris in the 1930s, negritude was widely-influential among colonial and post-colonial writers in Africa and the Caribbean especially. Negritude emphasises the blackness of black writing and the need for such writers to return to indigenous black themes and culture. Its leading figures were the poets Aimé Césaire from Martinique (who coined the term) and Léopold Sédar Senghor from Senegal. Negritude ideas were particularly influential during the large-scale European de-colonization after World War Two and were championed in Europe by some leading dissident intellectuals like Jean-Paul Sartre. The journal Présence Africaine, founded in 1947, was a force in the propagation of négritude ideas, but they started to fall from favour in the 1960s when they were criticized for being too limited in political ambition and too European in intellectual and artistic orientation.

Nelson, Horatio, Viscount (1758–1805) English admiral, and a national hero. His naval successes against ➤ Napoleon culminated in the Battle of Trafalgar (1805) at which he lost his life in gaining victory over the combined French and Spanish fleets, thus saving England from French invasion. As an officer he was strongly independent and unconventional; one of the famous anecdotes about him tells how he put his telescope to his blind eve at the battle of Copenhagen in 1801 in order not to see his superior officer's signal ordering him to withdraw. Equally famous are the signal to his ships before Trafalgar: 'England expects every man to do his duty', and his dying words: 'Now I am satisfied; thank God I have done my duty.' His love affair with the beautiful Lady Hamilton was a notorious romance. In 1813 the poet ▷ Robert Southey published his life, one of the best known of English biographies.

Nennius

Welsh monk and reputed compiler of a 9th-century Historia Brittonum (History of the Britons), which provides an outline of British history, from the founding of the island by Brutus, used by ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth as a framework for his historical narrative. ▷ Arthur is mentioned as a British battle leader (not a king), who fights 12 battles, culminating in the battle of Badon, in which he fells 960 men at one charge.

> Arthur, King.

Neo-classicism

This term can be understood for the purposes of English literary culture in two senses: (1) the broad sense, which refers to the ▶ Renaissance of Classical culture and its influence on English literature down to the end of the 18th century. This influence operated mainly by the cultivation of Latin culture, and was mediated first by Italy and later by France. (2) The narrow sense of neo-classicism refers to a European artistic movement which originated in Germany and lasted approximately from 1750 until 1830.

In the first sense, neo-classical culture affected English literature in two phases:

In the 16th century England developed a fine school of classical scholars, of whom the best known was ▷ Thomas More. Through travellers and scholars such as ▷ Sir Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, ▷ Earl of Surrey, poetry and prose received strong influences from Italian writers such as ▷ Petrarch and French ones such as ➤ Ronsard who already belonged to the classic revival. A critic like > Sidney showed the influence of Italian critics who in turn were developing 'rules' out of classical writers for dramatic construction, etc. All these influences matured in the last decade of the 16th century but their effect was uneven; the greatest of the rising dramatists, ➤ Shakespeare, ignored the neo-classical rules for dramatic construction, whereas > Ben Jonson, his chief rival in the theatre by 1600. was deeply affected by classical principles and classical culture generally. > Pastoral poems, deriving from Italian influences and more directly from Virgil, were numerous from Spenser's > The Shepherd's Calendar (1579) onwards, and in the 1590s there was a widespread production of > Sonnets under the influence of Petrarch. Much of the classical influence was on the level of ornament, however, as it was in English architecture in the same period. Jonson was outstanding in his absorption of classical influence to a deep level, and it was deeper in his lyrical work than in his drama. He is, in fact, an important link with the next phase of English neo-classicism - that which began in 1660 and lasted throughout the 18th century.

2 The second phase was much influenced by contemporary French literature, which was marked by distinguished achievement. English culture was entering a relatively aristocratic period by reaction from the Republican decade of the 1650s; it was also undergoing an increasingly strong revulsion against religious and political passions such as produced the ➤ Civil War. The result was admiration for philosophy. reason, scepticism, > wit and refinement - all qualities conducive to neo-classic culture. Significantly this was also the first important period of English criticism. Yet thoroughly neoclassic critics like ➤ Thomas Rymer were the exception. The restlessness of English society. the increasing importance of the middle class, the difficulty of making such a large exception to neo-classical principles as Shakespeare, and the hostility the English literary tradition has always shown to authoritative doctrines, all help to explain the refusal of the leading critics, > Dryden and > Samuel Johnson, to adopt neo-classic theory unquestioningly. Nonetheless, such a figure as the French neoclassicist ➤ Boileau was deeply respected, and the best poets and essayists (though hardly the novelist) - > Addison, > Swift, > Pope, Johnson - all exhibited the neo-classic virtues of clarity, order, reason, wit and balance.

Neo-classicism in the narrow sense was the cultivation of Greek culture in opposition to Roman culture, and originated partly in the German movement to emancipate German culture from France. It can be said that whereas Renaissance classicism sought to emulate the culture of Rome, this 'New Humanism' sought inspiration in the originality of the Greeks. This difference enabled the new Neo-classicism to merge with Romanticism, whose progenitor was above all > Rousseau. In England, it is thus impossible to distinguish Neo-classic from Romantic writers in the period 1790-1830. It is clear, however, that > William Blake shows neo-classic inspiration in his graphic art, and that the poems by > Keats on classical themes (▷ Endymion and the two ▷ Hyperions) are in a romantic-classical style, very different from Augustan classicism of the previous century. Neo-classicism is more distinguishable in the architectural style known as ➤ Regency, and in the sculpture of an artist such as Flaxman (as well as in > costume), than in imaginative literature.

➤ Classic, Classics, Classical; Unities; French literature in England; Italian influence in English literature. Bib; Honour, H., Neo-classicism.

Neo-Platonism.

➤ Platonism.

Nesbit, Edith (1858-1924)

Nesbit was born in London and educated in France and Germany as well as England. Through her elder sister, Mary, she meet the ➤ Rossettis, ➤ Swinburne and ➤ William Morris, and published her first poem in The Sunday Magazine in 1876. She married the journalist Hubert Bland in 1880, and both became founder members of the ▶ Fabian Society in 1884. Hubert was a notorious womanizer, but Edith allowed his illegitimate offspring to live in the household along with her own four children (> H.G. Wells satirized the couple's unconventional lifestyle in his Experiment in Autobiography). Financial difficulties forced Nesbit to abandon poetry and write popular fiction and books for children - her first stories about the Bastable family appeared in 1898. Three 'Bastable' novels quickly followed: The Story of the Treasure Seekers (1899), The Wouldbegoods (1901) and The New Treasure Seekers (1904). Her blend of > realism and magic proved highly popular, and her other famous children's novels include Five Children and It (1902); The Phoenix and the Carpet (1904); The Railway Children (1906) and The Enchanted Castle (1907). Her other published work includes early collections of poetry, political verse such as Ballads and Lyrics of Socialism (1908), a study of childhood, Wings and the Child (1913) and several ghost stories. Her last novel, Lark, appeared in 1922.

➤ Children's literature. Bib: Moore, D.K., Life, Briggs, J., A Woman of Passion; Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

New Atlantis, The (1626)
A philosophical tale by ➤ Francis Bacon, in the tradition of ➤ Sir Thomas More's ➤ Utopia (1615). It was left unfinished at Bacon's death, and published in 1626. The title is an allusion to the mythical island described by ▶ Plato in his dialogue Timaeus. Bacon's island is called Bensalem (ie an analogous place to Salem or Jerusalem, the holy city) and its chief glory is its university, 'Solomon's House'. Unlike the English universities of Bacon's day, this is devoted to scientific research − 'the knowledge of causes, and secret motions of things; and the enlarging of the bounds of human empire, to the effecting of all things possible'. The boundless optimism of this Baconian ideal was to be reflected in the work of 17th-century science in general.

New Comedy

Unlike ➤ Aristophanes' Old Comedy, New Comedy as extant in the writings of ▷ Menander, ▶ Plautus and ▶ Terence does not address specific and topical issues so much as focus on general moral and imaginative motifs. Its formulae consist of stock characters such as the young rake, the wily servant (servus dolosus), the courtesan, the braggart soldier (miles gloriosus) and the irascible old man (senex). The plays are populated by lost children and siblings. The genre of New Comedy proved highly influential for English literature. It could more readily accommodate the ⊳ neo-classical Horatian moral stance that distinguishes much Elizabethan drama, and its generalized approach proved politically safe in a theatre where every play needed a licence for performance from the Lord Chamberlain's office.

New criticism

This term is given to a movement which developed in the late 1040s in the U.S.A., and which dedicated itself to opposing the kind of criticism that is associated with > Romanticism, and 19th-century realism. The 'practical criticism' of I. A. Richards was an influential stimulus to this movement in which emphasis was placed upon the selfcontained nature of the literary text. In the work of 'new' critics such as Cleanth Brooks. W. K. Wimsatt, John Crowe Ransom, Allen Tate, and R. P. Blackmur, concern with the 'intention' of the writer was replaced by close reading of particular texts, and depended upon the assumption that any literary work was self-contained. New criticism placed a particular emphasis upon poetry, and asserted that the individual poem 'must not mean but be3.

Although the methods of new criticism now seem insufficiently historical, the tradition of close reading is perpetuated in > Deconstruction (though hardly in a form which the 40s generation would have relished). Since its inception, English Literature as a university discipline has been marked by alternating fashions for either close reading or historicization.

New Grub Street (1891)

A novel by ➤ George Gissing. The title refers to Grub Street, which was inhabited in the 18th century by journalists of a low order, who wrote to gain a living without seriousness of intention or artistic standards. The living they earned was generally a mean one, but since 1875 the new periodicals and newspapers had found a way to achieve massive circulations by printing material which had an immediate appeal although its intrinsic quality was trivial or merely sensational. This commercialization of journalism had spread to the production of books. Gissing's novel is about the difficulties of the serious literary artist faced by successful competition from the now very well rewarded commercial writer without scruples, either moral or artistic. The serious writer in the book is Edwin Reardon (a self-portrait) and his successful competitor is Jasper Milvain. Commercial success is also illustrated by Whelpdale, editor of the magazine Chit-Chat (based on the actual magazine Titbits founded in 1881) which never publishes articles longer than two inches in length. At the other extreme is the novelist Biffen, who has the artistic fastidiousness of the French novelist > Flaubert and writes the same kind of book. Biffen and Reardon both end in failure but Gissing's novel was fairly popular, which perhaps argues against the extreme pessimism of his thesis.

➤ Newspapers.

New historicism

A theoretical movement which developed in America in the 1980s, partly as a reaction against the ahistorical approaches of New Criticism and the unselfconscious historicism of earlier critics. New historicism draws upon Marxist criticism in its emphasis upon political and social context and rejection of individual aspiration and universalism, but at the same time it insists that historical context can never be recovered objectively. New historicists do not assume that literature reflects reality and that these 'reflections' enable the reader to recover without distortion the past presented in the texts. Rather, they look for an interplay between text and society, which can never be presented neutrally. Moreover, readers must be aware of their own historical context: we read texts from the perspective of our own age and can never perfectly re-create history.

➤ Cultural materialism; Marx, Karl; Poetics. Bib: Greenblatt, S., Renaissance Self-fashioning; Howard, J. E. and O'Connor, M. F., Shakespeare Reproduced; Tennenhouse, L., Power on Display; Veeser, H. A., The New Historicism.

New Inn, The (1629)

A late play by > Ben Jonson which attempts to work native romance motifs into the fabric of a contemporary ▷ citizen comedy. More than any Jonson play, The New Inn has been the particular discovery of the 1970s, when several leading Jonson scholars championed its claim to being a masterpiece of mixed genre and a Jonsonian tribute to ▷ Shakespeare.

New Learning, The

Study of the Bible and the Greek classics in the original languages instead of through Latin versions (> Greek literature; classical education). This study in the 15th-16th centuries was an important influence in the > Renaissance and the > Reformation.

New Model Army, The

Formed by Parliament in 1645 towards the end of the ▷ Civil War between itself and ▷ King Charles I. The war had so far been indecisive owing to the amateurish soldiering on both sides. Parliament now ensured that its own army should be highly professional. The result was the decisive victory of Naseby in June 1645. The commander was Sir Thomas Fairfax, but its most gifted general was ▷ Oliver Cromwell, who between 1646 and 1660 made the English army one of the most formidable in Europe. Cromwell's special contribution was his highly trained force of cavalry, the Ironsides.

New Monthly Magazine

It started in 1814 and had editors of considerable literary note such as the poets Thomas Campbell (1777-1844) and Thomas Hood (1799-1845), the novelists > Harrison Ainsworth and > Bulwer-Lytton, and the essayist Theodore Hook. It gave considerable space to criticism. It closed in 1884.

New Philosophers, The ➤ Nouveaux Philosophes, Les.

New Science

The term 'New Science' or 'New Philosophy' is something of a catch-all phrase, but one which usually is used to suggest the revolution in scientific understanding in Europe generally in the 16th and 17th centuries. On the continent, the work of ⊳ Galileo in the field of astronomy and Andreas Vesalius (1514-64) in the area of human anatomy signalled a reassessment of the study of the natural world. In England the influence of > Francis Bacon in the area of scientific methodology was to be of considerable importance. English science in the 16th century, however, lagged behind the work that was taking place on the continent. But, with the publication of William Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood (1628), an age of remarkable scientific innovation began in the British Isles.

The influence on literature of the 'New Science' of the age is a much-debated topic.

Certainly poets such as ▷ John Donne and ▷ Henry Vaughan were aware of the changes taking place in the ordering and understanding of the natural world – and this awareness is reflected in their writings. Others, such as ▷ Abraham Cowley, were enthusiastic in promulgating ideas and experimental attitudes associated with new scientific methodology. ▷ Thomas Traherne, on the other hand, found himself in the paradoxical situation of being fascinated with the products of scientific enquiry while being deeply suspicious of the anti-fideistic tendency of much of the work that was undertaken.

Bib: Debus, A. G., Man and Nature in the Renaissance.

New Statesman and Society, The
The leading left-wing weekly periodical of the intelligentsia. It was founded in 1913; its Conservative counterpart is ▷ The Spectator.
In politics it has always followed a general line of ▷ Fabian socialism.

New Theatre, The

The present Albery Theatre in St Martin's Lane was known as the New Theatre from its opening in 1903 to 1973.

New Way to Pay Old Debts, A (1625) The best-known comedy by ▶ Philip Massinger. The main character is Sir Giles Overreach, a man of powerful energy and unlimited rapacity, who has no scruples in his schemes to increase his own wealth and social greatness. He is, however, outwitted by those very social superiors, Lord Lovell and Lady Allworth, whom he attempts to flatter and use; they take the side of the young people whom he tries to victimize, his nephew Wellborn and his daughter Margaret. Overreach thus 'overreaches' himself, in the manner of ⊳ Ben Jonson's characters, and he is in fact the last vigorous representative of the comedy of ⊳ humours tradition. The weakness of the play is that Overreach's opponents are colourless characters, so that the play is artistically unbalanced in Overreach's favour. Massinger's use of ⊳ blank verse is extremely flexible to the point sometimes of insipidity, although in the best passages it regains much of the concentrated force of Jonson himself. Overreach is based on a contemporary profiteer, Sir Giles Mompesson.

Newcastle, Duchess of ➤ Cavendish, Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle.

Newcomes, The (1853-5)
A novel by ▷ William Makepeace Thackeray; it was published in instalments. The characters are drawn from the middle and upper classes, and the book is a study of the vices and virtues of such mid-19th-century society. The vices are shown in the worldly cynicism of Lady Kew who seeks a fashionable marriage for her grand-daughter Ethel Newcome; in the mean snobbery of Ethel's brother Barnes, who frustrates her marriage with her cousin Clive Newcome; in the hypocrisy, intrigue and viciousness of Clive's eventual mother-in-law Mrs Mackenzie, and in the philistinism and arrogance of the social world as a whole. The virtues are less successfully presented. Clive Newcome's father, Colonel Newcome, is the honourable, single-minded soldier who loses his fortune and is subjected to the tyranny of Mrs Mackenzie. Thackeray was inclined to see decency as overwhelmed by materialism.

▶ Bohemian.

Bib: McMaster, R.D., Thackeray's Cultural Frame of Reference: Allusion in The Newcomes.

Newgate

In the Middle Ages, the principal west gate of the City of London. The gate-house was a prison from the 12th century, enlarged in the 15th century and burnt down in the ▷ Gordon Riots in 1780. Its destruction is described in ▷ Dickens' novel ▷ Barnaby Rudge. It was rebuilt and finally demolished in 1902, when the present Central Criminal Court (Old Bailey) was built on its site.

> Newgate novel.

Newgate novel

Strictly speaking, a novel in which the characters and/or elements of plot are taken from The Newgate Calendars, which were records of notorious crimes, named after Newgate Prison in London, and published at various dates between 1773 and 1826. Examples are Rookwood (1834) by > William Harrison Ainsworth and Paul Clifford (1830) by > Bulwer-Lytton. The term is applied more loosely to novels about criminals, such as > Oliver Twist (1837) by > Charles Dickens. Newgate novels provoked a furious debate in the 1830s and 40s, because they often showed some sympathy for criminals and suggested that social conditions contributed to crime. They were attacked as morally corrupting by some critics, including the novelist ⊳ Thackeray, who satirized the form in his novel > Barry Lyndon (1844).

Newman, John Henry (1801–90)
Writer on religion and education. From 1833 to 1842 he was one of the most influential and controversial leaders of the Church of England, but in 1845 he was received into the Roman ➤ Catholic Church. As a Catholic convert he was even more influential, and he was made a Cardinal in 1870.

His first period of activity (1833–42) was as leader of the Tractarian Movement – more or less identical with the ⊳ Oxford Movement, whose aim was to defend the Church of England against encroachments by the state on the one hand, and against adulteration of its doctrines by the Broad Church tendencies on the other. The Church of England was founded in the 16th century on a central position between the Catholicism of Rome and the whole-hearted > Protestantism of Martin Luther (1483-1546) and John Calvin (1509-1604). This had always been both its strength and its weakness; it was able to accommodate a variety of believers, but it was inclined to lose itself in vagueness and become subservient to the state. Newman's Tracts for the Times tried to secure a firm basis for Anglican doctrine and discipline, as against supporters of the Broad Church party (such as ➤ Thomas Arnold) who cared less for doctrine than for social ethics. Newman's tracts led him steadily towards Roman Catholicism. however, until his Tract XC went so far as to say that the Anglican 39 Articles - which all clergy had to accept - were not incompatible with essential Roman Catholic beliefs, but only with distortions and exaggerations of them.

As a Roman Catholic, Newman's first valuable literary work was The Scope and Nature of University Education (1852), a collection of lectures to the new Catholic University of Dublin, of which he became Rector in 1854. These were combined with further lectures delivered in 1859 to make The Idea of a University Defined (1873). His spiritual > autobiography, defending the sincerity of his Catholic beliefs against the accusations by the Broad Churchman, > Charles Kingsley, came out with the title ➤ Apologia Pro Vita Sua (Defence of his Life) in 1864. It was not only very persuasive in convincing the public of the genuineness of his faith; it was also an eloquent and lucid presentation of the nature of religious belief at a time when much religious thinking in English was muddled, superficial and entangled in irrelevant controversies with scientific > agnostics such as > T.H. Huxley. His Grammar of Assent (1870) was a more strictly philosophical account of religious belief.

Newman also wrote some minor poetry, including the famous hymn Lead Kindly Light, and the ▷ dramatic monologue The Dream of Gerontius, better known for the music set to it by Elgar. He also wrote two religious novels, Loss and Gain (1848) and Callista (1856).

As a writer he is famous for the lucidity and grace of his style. His wide influence, still very powerful, arose from his ability to understand the tragic extremity of the emotional and intellectual bewilderment of his contemporaries, while refusing to compromise his beliefs.

Bib: Harold, C.F., Newman: an Expository and Critical Study of his Mind, Thought and Art.

Newspapers

Periodicals resembling newspapers began in a small way in the reign of James I; in the decades of the Civil War and the Interregnum they increased in number owing to the need of either side to engage in propaganda. From 1695 press censorship was abandoned; newspapers and weekly periodicals began to flourish.

The first English daily, the Daily Courant, a mere news-sheet, began in 1702, but in the earlier part of the 18th century papers more nearly resembling what we now know as the weekly reviews were of greater importance, and leading writers conducted them, eg ➤ Defoe's The Review (thrice weekly - 1704-13); > Steele's Tatler (thrice weekly - started 1709); Steele and Joseph Addison's ➤ Spectator (daily - started 1711); and the > Examiner (started 1710), to which the chief contributor was > Jonathan Swift. > Samuel Johnson's > Rambler (1750) was of the same kind. Of these men, only Defoe resembled fairly closely what we nowadays regard as a journalist as distinct from a man of letters.

The first attempt to reach a mass circulation was made through this kind of periodical by William Cobbett with his Weekly Political Register (started 1802), and in 1808 Leigh Hunt's weekly Examiner, directed to a more educated public through with less remarkable literary merit, began to rival Cobbett's paper as a medium of radical comment and criticism.

Of daily papers founded in the 18th century, the > Morning Post (started 1772) survived until 1936, and The Times (started 1785) is today the daily with the greatest prestige, though it has a comparatively small circulation. Other important dailies with a shorter life were the Morning Chronicle (1769-1862), and the > Morning Herald (1780-1869). Both reached peak circulations of about 6,000. To reach the very large circulations of today, newspapers had to await the abolition of the stamp duty a tax on newspapers - in 1855. The Stamp Tax was started in 1712. It was a method of restricting circulations by raising the prices of newspapers. The government of the day resented criticism of its policies but did not dare revive the Licensing Act, the lapsing of which in 1695 was really the start of the British freedom of the press. The abolition of the tax, together with the advent of cheap paper and a nationwide potential public thanks to universal literacy, led to a new kind of newspaper at the end of the 19th century. Alfred and Harold Harmsworth, later Lord Northcliffe and Lord Rothermere, founded the Daily Mail in 1896; by 1901 it was selling a million copies. Other popular newspapers followed it with steadily increasing circulations.

Several unfortunate consequences have followed this development:

- I Much > journalism has degenerated into mere commerce, so that news is regarded as what is most saleable, ie what appeals most readily to the baser and more easily roused human appetites.
 - 2 Newspapers, in order to keep their prices down, have come to rely on advertising revenue, which is attracted chiefly to those with very large circulations so that some with smaller circulations have been eliminated.

3 The British newspapers have divided rather sharply into the serious ones with a large influence but a small circulation, and the popular ones or tabloids, which often achieve their large circulations by irresponsible appeals to the baser public tastes. Finally, modern newspapers, as great capitalistic enterprises, tend to be right-wing politically, so that leftwing opinion is under-represented in the daily press. However, British newspapers are jealous of their independence: they are quick to resist any tendency by the government to check their freedom of expression. Since the war, the Press Council has been established for the purpose of limiting the abuse of this freedom by, for instance, the infringement of personal privacy; however, its powers are limited to public rebuke, and it has no power to penalize or censor newspapers. In 1990 the Press Complaints Commission was established.

The 20th-century weekly reviews have seldom been able to compete with the daily papers in the size of their circulations. However, the strong tradition of weekly journalism inherited from the 18th and 19th centuries ensures that the 'weeklies' have large influence among the intelligentsia. The oldest of the influential weeklies is the Spectator which has no connection with Addison's periodical, but was founded in 1828. It is conservative and is counter-balanced by > The New Statesman and Society on the left. The most influential literary periodicals in Britain are The Times Literary Supplement. a weekly which is published by The Times newspaper and the London Review of Books, published every two weeks.

Newton, Sir Isaac (1642-1727)

Mathematician and natural philosopher. He entered Trinity College, ▷ Cambridge, in 1661, became a fellow of the college in 1667, and Professor of Mathematics in the university in 1669. He resigned the professorship in 1701; in 1703 he was made President of the ▷ Royal Society, and was re-elected annually until his death. Queen ▷ Anne knighted him in 1705.

His principal work was Philosophiae Naturalis Principia Mathematica (1687), written in Latin. By the application of mathematical calculation, it explained the force of gravity in its operation through the solar system. His book on Optics (1704) was less important, but it aroused new interest in vision and colour and influenced descriptive writing throughout the 18th century. His scientific and mathematical discoveries did not shake his religious convictions, which were very strong, and he also wrote on theology and biblical chronology. On the other hand, he did not understand and had no use for the imaginative faculty and, like ▶ Locke (whose ➤ Essay concerning Human Understanding was published in 1690) he dismissed poetry as an unimportant and irrelevant activity.

Despite this indifference to poetic literature, Newton's discoveries, combined as they were with his religious piety, had a great influence on 18th-century poets. He caused them to revere ➤ Reason in both Man and God, who, seen through Newton's writings, became the Divine Artist of the Universe. ➤ Pope's ➤ Essay on Man was a restatement of the traditional vision of the natural order newly shaped to accord with Newton's rational harmony, and it was Pope who composed for Newton the famous epitaph:

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night: God said, Let Newton be!' and all was Light.

The most famous poet of the natural scene in the 18th century, ▷ James Thomson, wrote his ▷ Seasons in accordance with Newtonian principles. In the revised ▷ Prelude (1850) ▷ Wordsworth wrote of the statue in Trinity College:

Of Newton with his prism and silent face, The marble index of a mind for ever Voyaging through strange seas of Thought, alone.

Wordsworth thus chooses to emphasize the mysteriousness of science, whereas Pope had emphasized its power to clarify mystery. Bib: Nicholson, M. H., Newton Demands the Muse.

Ngcobo, Lauretta (b 1932)

South African novelist and critic. Ngcobo now lives in Britain having escaped from South Africa during the 1960s, when she was threatened with arrest as a member of the Pan-African Congress. Her two novels are about black resistance to the apartheid regime and to white oppression in South Africa: Cross of Gold (1981) is about a revolutionary fighter, while And They Didn't Die (1990) is about a woman's struggle for life and autonomy. Ngcobo edited Let It Be Told (1987), a collection of essays by black women writers in Britain.

Ngugi wa Thiong'o (b 1938)

Kenyan novelist, short-story writer and playwright. Educated at the universities of Makere in Kenya and Leeds in Britain, Ngugi was a fierce critic of the Kenyan regime and campaigner for the rights of the rural poor in Kenya, and was held in solitary confinement after the performance of his play Ngaahika Ndeenda (written with Ngugi wa Mirii, translated as I Will Marry When I Want, 1982) and the publication of his novel Petals of Blood (1977), which attacks economic exploitation from a Marxist perspective. Ngugi has lived in exile since 1982. He published four novels in English, a fifth in both English and Kikuyu (the language of the people of the Kenyan highlands) and since 1982 has not written in English. Some of his work was published under the name James T. Ngugi. Weep Not, Child (1964) and The River Between (1965) were both written while the author was still a student; the first is the story of a boy growing up during the period of the Mau Mau rebellions, while the second is based around the symbolic separation of two villages and set during the rebellion of the 1920s; A Grain of Wheat (1967) portrays the time leading up to Independence. These novels combine realism with elements of the symbolic and of parable and explore collective values through the thoughts and experiences of individuals. Devil on the Cross (1982) represents a shift towards a more allegorical and fantastic mode, used for a direct polemical attack on bourgeois exploitation. The novel Matigari (1986) was translated into English in 1987. Plays: The Black Hermit (1962); This Time Tomorrow (1966); (with Micere Githae Mugo) The Trial of Dedan Kimathi (1976). Short stories: Secret Lives (1975). Other writings include: Homecomings: Essays on African and Caribbean Literature, Culture and Politics (1972); Writers in Politics: Essays (1981); Detained: A Writer's Prison Diary (1981); Barrel of a Pen: Resistance to Repression in Neo-Colonial Kenya (1983); Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature (1986).

Nicholas Nickleby (1838-9)

A novel by > Charles Dickens; like his other novels, it was first published in serial parts. Nicholas, his sister Kate and their mother are left penniless, and struggle for a living under the oppressive guardianship of Ralph Nickleby, an avaricious financier, the dead Mr Nickleby's brother. Morally, the tale is in black and white; Nicholas stands for ardent and youthful virtue, Ralph for meanness and cruelty. Nicholas is sent to teach at Dotheboys Hall, an iniquitous school run by Wackford Squeers to whom Nicholas gives a vigourous thrashing. Kate is apprenticed to Madame Mantalini, a dressmaker, where she is exposed to the vicious advances of Ralph's associate, Sir Mulberry Hawk. Nicholas beats him too. Ralph's evil intentions are eventually exposed by his eccentric but right-minded clerk, Newman Noggs, and the Nickleby family are befriended by the Cheeryble brothers. The novel is in Dickens' early, episodic and melodramatic style but many of the episodes are presented with great vividness and comedy. It was dramatized, with huge success, by the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1980.

▶ Education.

Nichols, Grace (b 1950)

Poet and novelist. Born in Guyana where she worked as a teacher, journalist and information assistant, and educated at the University of Guyana, Nichols came to live in Britain in 1977. Her publications include a biting attack on colonialism in i is a long memoried woman (1983) (which won the Commonwealth Poetry Prize), and the playfully ironic The Fat Black Woman's Poems (1984). Her first novel was Whole of a Morning Sky (1986), set in Guyana in the 1960s. She also writes ▷ children's books.

> Post-colonial fiction.

Nichols, John (1745-1826)

Historian. Nichols' antiquarian activities provided a useful source for literary activity; for example, his The Progresses and Public Processions of Queen Elizabeth (1788–1821) were used by > Scott in his novel Kenilworth. He also provided a fascinating account of the literary activity of his day in Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century (1812–16) and Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth century (1817–58; completed by his son). During his lifetime, however, Nichols was considered somewhat old-fashioned and his editorship of > The Gentleman's Magazine (1792–1826) led to it being dismissed by younger writers such as > Hazlitt.

> Histories and Chronicles.

Nichols, Peter (b 1927)

British dramatist whose first major success was with A Day in the Death of Joe Egg in 1967, a serious comedy about the struggles of a family with a spastic child. This was first seen at the Glasgow Citizen's Theatre and later transferred to London. In 1969 The National Health was produced at the ▷ National Theatre. Again Nichols used comedy to dramatize a serious subject, in this case terminal illness and undignified death. His more recent plays are: Passion Play (1980); Poppy, a musical, (1982); A Piece of My Mind (1986).

Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm (1844-1900) German philosopher. He challenged the concepts of 'the good, the true, and the beautiful' as, in their existing form of abstract values, a decadent system at the mercy of the common man's will to level distinctions of all kinds. Instead he developed a number of counter-models - the will to power, the doctrine of eternal recurrence, the importance of self-overcoming. Among his more famous works are writings on the philosopher Schopenhauer and the composer Wagner, whom he regarded as his own teachers: Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen ('Thoughts out of Season'; 1876); Die Fröhliche Wissenschaft ('The Joyful Wisdom'; 1882); Also sprach Zarathustra ('Thus spake Zarathustra'; 1891).

Critic Walter Kaufmann has argued for Nietzsche's position as one of the important progenitors of > existentialism, and he had a considerable influence on some of the major English writers in the first quarter of this century. His ideas inspired ➤ George Bernard Shaw in the latter's belief in the Superman-hero as the spearhead of progress, eg his conception of Joan of Arc in his play Saint Joan, and D. H. Lawrence wrote in Nietzsche's spirit in his affirmation of spontaneous living from deep sources of energy in the individual - human 'disquality' (see > Women in Love, ch. 8) as opposed to democratic egalitarianism, although Lawrence also criticized (his conception of) Nietzsche's notion of Will to Power. Nietzsche also had a strong influence on the development of > Freudian psychoanalysis, and this is indicative of the contradictory responses he has provoked in his readers: Lawrence was a vehement critic of Freud, and Freudian psychoanalysis is incompatible with existentialism, yet Nietzsche is said to have influenced all three. The Irish poet > W. B. Yeats also affirmed a natural aristocracy of the human spirit, and saw in Nietzsche a continuation of the message of the poet William Blake (1757-1827), who preached the transcendance of the human 'identity' over the 'self', which is defined and limited by the material environment. In recent criticism Nietzsche's work has been re-evaluated by > post-structuralist theory, especially with regard to his discussion of metaphor and metonymy and the privileging of a rhetorical reading of philosophical texts.

Nietzsche is also an important figure in the development of > deconstruction, and (although deeply critical of the whole notion of 'influence'), has strongly influenced the writing of Georges Bataille, > Michel Foucault and ▶ Jacques Derrida.

➤ German Influence on English Literature. Bib: Deleuze, G., Nietzsche and Philosophy; Descombes, V., Modern French Philosophy; Kaufmann, W., Nietzsche: Philosopher, Psychologist, Antichrist.

Night Thoughts on Life, Death, and Immortality

> Young, Edward.

Nightingale, Ode to a

▷ Odes, Keats'.

Nightmare Abbey (1818)

A novel by ➤ Thomas Love Peacock. It is a satire on the current taste for ➤ Gothic mystery and romantic despair. Mr Glowry and his son Scythrop own the Abbey; Scythrop is in love with two girls, like Peacock's friend, the poet ➤ Shelley. Mr Flosky is a satirical portrait of ➤ Coleridge in his aspect as a transcendental mystic, and Mr Cypress represents ➤ Byron's self-centredness. There are other characters of cheerful temperament to counteract the romantic sombreness of these. The plot is slight, but the comic fantasy is sustained by it and by the conversations, which are always the greater part of a Peacock novel.

Nine Worthies

The subject of literary, artistic and dramatic representation from the later medieval period onwards, the so-called 'Nine Worthies' is a group representing the best knights of all time, made up of three figures each from the periods of pagan, Old Testament and Christian history. Composition of the list, especially the Christian representatives, may vary somewhat but most of the versions found in England include Hector, ▷ Alexander, ▷ Julius Caesar, Joshua, David, Judas Maccabeus, ▷ King Arthur, > Charlemagne, Godfrey of Bouillon. The 'Nine Worthies' theme promotes the notion of chivalry as a transhistorical phenomenon and is part of the developing mythology of knighthood, in evidence throughout the medieval period (and after). The list of Nine Worthies is first recorded in an Old French Alexander narrative of the early 14th century, and a dramatized pageant of the 'Nine Worthies' is included in > Shakespeare's > Love's Labour's Lost.

Nineteenth Century, The

A monthly review founded in 1877 by J.T. Knowles, its first editor. It was renamed The Nineteenth Century and After in 1900, and The Twentieth Century in 1950. It was distinguished for bringing together leading antagonists of opposing views. Contributors included ▷ Ruskin, ▷ Gladstone, ▷ T.H. Huxley, ▷ Beatrice Webb, ▷ William Morris, ▷ 'Ouida' and ▷ Oscar Wilde.

Nineties' Poets

The group of poets centred around the ▶ Rhymer's Club in the 1890s, including ➤ Lionel Johnson, ➤ Ernest Dowson and > Arthur Symons. The Rhymer's Club met at the Cheshire Cheese tavern near Fleet Street, immortalized by W.B. Yeats (1865-1939) in The Trembling of the Veil and 'The Grey Rock,' and published two volumes of its members' verse in 1891 and 1894. Nineties poetry was part of the fin-de-siècle > Aesthetic movement. Strongly influenced by > French culture and particularly French > Symbolist poetry, it was also a development of the work and ideas of ▷ Algernon Swinburne, ▷ Walter Pater and the ▷ Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. The confessional and > decadent quality of their work, together with the incidence of untimely death in their lives, led Yeats to label them 'The Tragic Generation' in his Autobiographies. They were important in their influence on poets like Yeats and Ezra Pound (1885-1912). Much of their work was published in the journals > Yellow Book and The Savoy (which Symons edited).

Bib: Stanford, D., Poets of the Nineties; Thornton, R.K.R., Poetry of the 'Nineties.

Nisbet, Robert (b 1941)

Short story writer. Born at Haverfordwest, Pembrokeshire, educated at University College. Swansea, and at the University of Essex, subsequently becoming a teacher of English at Milford Haven, Robert Nisbet is the author of six collections of short stories, in chronological order as follows: Dreams and Dealings (1973); The Rainbow's End (1979); Sounds of the Town (1982); Stories of Sheepskin (1983); Downmarket (1988); and The Ladybird Room (1991). He has also edited two anthologies of stories, Dismays and Rainbows (1979) and Pieces of Eight (1982) and has published a collection of poetry, Pastoral (1983). His short stories evoke an inner life behind their details, thus celebrating the richness of the ordinary.

No Wit, No Help Like a Woman (1613)
A high-spirited comedy by ▷ Thomas Middleton which evolves on a complex double-plot level and reworks material from ▷ Ben Jonson's ▷ Epicoene and ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Twelfith Night. The play's heroine, Kate Low-water, a disguised married woman intent on recovering her lost fortune, is one of the most charismatic female characters in the drama of the period. The extent to which the play's idiom of mercenary ▷ citizen comedy becomes submerged in Shakespearean romance depends largely on Kate's magnetic personality.

Noble Savage, The ▷ Primitivism.

Noh plays

A kind of drama practised in Japan since the 15th century. It is highly formal, austere, and ritualistic, making a great part of its effect through ▷ symbolism. Its artistic economy and symbolism have greatly interested some Western writers in the 20th century − see the book, Noh, or Accomplishment by Fenollosa and ▷ Pound. The poet ▷ W. B. Yeats imitated the form in some of his experiments to revive the verse drama, eg At the Hawk's Well (1917).

Nokes, James (d 1696)

Actor. Nokes performed briefly at the Cockpit in Drury Lane, largely in women's roles, before joining the ▷ Duke's Company under ▷ William D'Avenant in 1660 as actor and shareholder. He usually played in low and crude comic roles, specializing as foolish old husbands, nurses, and fops.

Nominalism

One of the two main schools of late medieval philosophy, the other being > realism. The nominalists argued that terms naming things according to their kinds ('animal', 'vegetable', etc) and abstract terms ('beauty', 'goodness', etc) are merely names describing the qualities of things and do not refer to things that have reality in themselves. The realists argued that on the contrary such 'universals' alone have an ultimate reality and that the reality of individual objects depends upon them. The nominalist viewpoint is represented in modern philosophy by such thinkers as ➤ John Stuart Mill and other 'empiricist' philosophers who reason that reality can only be known by particular experience of it, and argue against any theory of implanted ideas such as the Deists believed in. In 20thcentury political philosophy, nominalism has been opposed to essentialism (which resembles realism by believing in transcendent universals); see Karl Popper, The Poverty of Historicism. Bib: Knowles, D., The Evolution of Medieval Thought.

Nonsense literature

This covers several kinds of literature, which have in common that they all in some way deliberately defy logic or common sense, or both. In English folk literature, many > nursery rhymes come into the category. The most important kind, however, is undoubtedly in > children's literature, especially the poems of Edward Lear and the Alice stories by Lewis Carroll, both of which are to be taken seriously as literature. Both writers are ▷ Victorian and this perhaps accounts for their imaginative depth; they wrote in a period of intense mental restlessness before the time of > Freud and thus they gave themselves wholly to their fantasies, undisturbed by the idea that they might be betraying secrets of their own nature. Modern writers, eg ▷ James Joyce in his ▷ Finnegans Wake, will as fearlessly reveal their depths, but it will not be to children. Another reason why nonsense literature reached its peak in the Victorian period is perhaps that this was almost the earliest period when intelligent minds considered that children were worth writing for merely in order to amuse them, and not to elevate their minds. Twentieth-century writers in plenty have thought children worth amusing but the child-public is now a recognized one, whereas Lear and Carroll wrote for a few young friends; they were thus as much concerned with their own interest and amusement as with that of their audience.

Norman Conquest, The ➤ Conquest, The (Norman).

Norris, Leslie (b 1921)
Poet and short story writer. Leslie Norris was born on a farm near Merthyr Tydfil, Glamorgan, and was educated (as was Glyn Jones) at Cyfarthfa Castle Grammar School in Merthyr, and afterwards at Coventry College of Education and Southampton University. His teaching career, as teacher, headmaster, college lecturer and Visiting Professor, has taken him to England and thence to the USA, though since 1074 he has earned his living as a full-time writer. The emotional base of his writing is his childhood experiences in Merthyr, then in its last phase of 'metropolitan' vitality, where in poems about boxers, horses, greyhounds, birds, and especially the colourful characters of the town, he responds to an integration of literary and physical life in that community which World War II was to terminate. Nevertheless. Leslie Norris is an exile at two removes - to England, where he lectured at Bognor Regis College of Education in West Sussex, and more recently to the University of Washington, Seattle and the Brigham Young University of Utah, though maintaining until recently a cottage in North Carmarthenshire to keep alive his Welsh roots. Thus it is not surprising that Welsh poetic influences, such as Vernon Watkins, and English ones, such as Edward Thomas and Andrew Young, the latter a close friend, merge in his poetry about natural life, birds, beasts and flowers, expressed often in formal, almost Georgian metric. A deep melancholy is more overtly discernable in his later work and adds poignancy to his reminiscences of childhood. His American experiences have made his poetry more diffuse and urbane, the emphasis being more descriptive, but his contact with Wales has not been diminished. His collections of poetry are: The Tongue of Beauty (1941); Poems (1944); The Lord Winter (1967); Finding Gold (1967); Ransoms (1970); Mountains Polecats Pheasants (1974); Islands off Maine (1977); Merlin and the Snake's Egg (1978 - poems for children); Water Voices (1980); and A Sea in the Desert (1989). His collected poems have been published in an American edition under the title of Walking the White Fields (1980) and his Selected Poems, in Britain, in 1986. A Collected volume is in course of preparation and includes many new poems which show exciting developments both in his poetic technique and in his thematic material. His prose works include two volumes of short stories, Sliding (1978) and The Girl from Cardigan (1988), and he also published a monograph on Glyn Jones in the Writers of Wales series in 1973.

Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

North and South (1854–5)
A novel by ▷ Elizabeth Gaskell, published serially in ▷ Charles Dickens' periodical ▷ Household Words. North and South explores the contrast between the rural south and the industrial north of England, as the heroine, Margaret Hale, moves from Hampshire to Lancashire. During a dispute between workers and employers, she encounters Mrs Thornton and her son John, an inflexible and unsympathetic manufacturer. Margaret finds Thornton's attitudes repellent at first, but gradually the couple move closer together and are finally united. Margaret comes to appreciate and respect both the mill owner and his workers, while Thornton, through Margaret's influence, adopts a more humane attitude towards his employees. Like Gaskell's > Mary Barton, North and South was an important > 'social problem' novel of the mid-Victorian period, but the work achieves an added richness through its exploration of religious doubt and its use of industrial unrest as a symbolic register of sexual awareness. Recent feminist critics have argued that it promotes the spread of maternal values outside the sphere of the home and into the commercial world.

North Briton, The

A radical political weekly, started in 1762 by → John Wilkes and → Charles Churchill. It opposed the government of → George III and his Prime Minister, the Scotsman Lord Bute, and was aimed particularly against Bute's journal The Briton, edited by the Scottish novelist → Tobias Smollett. After 45 issues it was suppressed.

North, Sir Thomas (?1535-?1601) Translator. He is especially known as the translator of > Plutarch's Lives of the ancient Greek and Roman heroes. The translation was from the French of Amyot, and was published in 1579. It was not close, but very clear and vigorous, and constituted one of the masterpieces of English prose. It was widely read in > Shakespeare's day, and was used by Shakespeare himself as the basis for his plays > Julius Caesar, > Antony and Cleopatra and > Coriolanus. Other translations by North were the Dial of Princes (from Reloj de Principes by Guevara) published in 1557, which set the fashion for ornate writing culminating in ➤ Lyly's > Euphues; and The Moral Philosophy of Doni (1570), an Italian collection of eastern fables. Bib: Cowley, C. H., The First English Translators of the Classics.

Northanger Abbey (1818)

A novel by ▷ Jane Austen. It was started in 1798 and incompletely revised when it was published (in 1818 after her death) with her last completed novel ▷ Persuasion.

The book is in part a satire on the sensational and sentimental literature of the time, particularly of the enormously popular > Mysteries of Udolpho by > Mrs Radcliffe. The heroine is an ingenuous young girl, Catherine Morland, who visits the fashionable resort of Bath and afterwards, with some friends she has made there, the country house of Northanger Abbey. She is healthy-minded and trusting but very suggestible; on the one hand she is entirely deceived by the worldly flattery of her scheming friend, Isabella Thorpe, who tries to marry Catherine's brother under the mistaken impression that he is very rich, and on the other hand she suspects (under the influence of Mrs Radcliffe's novel) that Northanger Abbey conceals terrible secrets. Its owner, General Tilney, is the father of the man she loves and is in fact almost as cold-hearted and inhumane as she suspects him of being, but in quite a different way; he has not, as she at first suspected, murdered his wife, but he turns Catherine out of the house at very short notice from purely mercenary motives. The theme of the book is partly the danger of confusing literature and life, a theme to which Jane Austen returns in Sense and Sensibility and ➤ Emma; it is also that life is as surprising and remorseless as the most romantic literature but in quite a different way.

> Roche, Regina Maria.

Northcliffe, Alfred Harmsworth, Viscount (1865–1922)

One of the principal founders of the 'popular press' with its very large circulation, and in particular of the Daily Mail (1896).

➤ Newspapers.

Norton, Caroline (1808-77)

Poet, novelist, dramatist and campaigner. She was the granddaughter of the dramatist Richard Sheridan (1751-1816), and married George Norton in 1827. The marriage was disastrous, and in 1836 her husband brought an action for adultery against Lord Melbourne, who had frequented Caroline Norton's literary salon. The divorce case collapsed for lack of evidence, but Norton's sexual reputation was severely damaged. She then began a long struggle to gain access to and custody of her children, publishing A Plain Letter to the Lord Chancellor on the Infant Custody Bill (1839) under the > pseudonym Pearce Stevenson. Her efforts resulted in a change in the law in 1839. She later campaigned for the property rights of divorced women in English Laws for Women in the 19th Century (1854). She cannot be described as a > feminist, however, since she believed in male superiority and sought legal change only on the basis that individual cases existed in which men had failed in their responsibilities. Norton's novels, which were admired in her day, include The Wife and Woman's Reward (1835); Stuart of Dunleath (1851); Lost and Saved (1863). Poetry includes The Sorrows of Rosalie (1829); The Undying One (1830) and The Dream (1840).

➤ Marriage. Bib: Ackland, A., Life: Perkins, J.G., Life.

Norton, Sir Thomas (1532-84) Poet and dramatist. A staunchly ➤ Protestant barrister, Norton participated in the questioning of Catholics during ➤ Elizabeth I's reign, as well as translating ➤ Calvin's Institutes (1561). He is best known to literature students, however, for his collaboration with ➤ Thomas Sackville in the composition of ➤ Gorboduc (1561), which is assumed to be the first 'English' ➤ tragedy. Written in ➤ blank verse, it was enormously influential. Norton's poetry was included in ➤ Tottel's Miscellany.

Nostromo (1904)

A novel by ➤ Joseph Conrad. The setting is an imaginary South American state called Costaguana, intended to be typical of that continent; all the events occur in or near Sulaco, capital city of the Occidental Province in Costaguana. At the beginning of the novel, Costaguana is ruled by a brutal and corrupt dictator after a short period of enlightened and liberal rule. The Occidental Province, however, remains a refuge of enlightenment and comparative prosperity, thanks partly to its geographical isolation from the rest of the country, and mainly to the existence of a large silver mine, run by an Englishman, Charles Gould, who secures the financial support of an American millionaire. In outline, the story is the history of how the Occidental Republic establishes its independence of the rest of the country, but at the same time loses the ideals which inspired it in the struggle.

Each of five main characters serves as a focus for a strand of narrative:

r Charles Gould (nicknamed 'King of Sulaco'), in his struggles to save the mine from ruin by the corrupt government, becomes the centre of the party of freedom and justice; but he becomes increasingly dehumanized by his preoccupations, and estranged from his wife, whose values of humaneness and compassion are betrayed, despite the eventual triumph of her husband's party.

2 Captain Mitchell, the Harbourmaster, is another Englishman; stupid, but honest and courageous, he is unable to see beneath the surface of events, and is used by Conrad to record these deceptive appearances.

3 Gian'Battista Fidanza, the Italian chief of the dockworkers, is universally known as 'Nostromo' ('Our Man'). He has a romantic pride in the devotion of his men, and in the knowledge that Mitchell, Gould, and their associates have complete confidence in his integrity. His spiritual downfall, unknown to any but himself, is due to his desire to preserve the appearance of integrity while yielding to secret dishonesty.

4 Martin Decoud is the journalist of the Sulacan revolution; he is totally French by education and culture, though not by descent. He is cynically entertained by the spectacle of Costaguaneran politics, but romantically attached to Antonia Avellanos, daughter of José, a Sulacan scholar and liberal politician. He dies of the physical isolation brought upon him by circumstances, since his highly cultivated consciousness is incapable of sustaining a sense of his own reality when the spectacle of events and the woman he loves are removed from him.

5 Dr Monygham is an Irishman, embittered by his self-contempt arising from his betrayal, under torture, of his political associates. His humanity is preserved by his devotion to Mrs Gould, who is for him the uncontaminated embodiment of what is good in human nature.

These are only the chief characters, and they do not exhaust the novel's large cast. They are united by the theme of individual isolation even in co-operation with one another, and by a discrete pattern of symbols, of which the chief is the silver of the mine. This operates at first as an instrument of liberation, and later as a force of corruption; all the time it is a symbol of the illusiveness of human idealism. The novel depicts the pervasive and debasing effects of 'material interests' (primarily the economic power of US business). The narrative structure is highly complex, and uses shifts of chronology and retrospective narration to combine a detailed account of 17 days of crisis with a sense of the broad sweep of historical events.

Nouveau roman (new novel)

A French literary movement originating in the late 1950s and associated principally with Nathalie Sarraute (b 1902), Claude Simon (b 1913), Michel Butor (b 1926), Robert Pinget (b 1919) and Alain Robbe-Grillet (b 1922). Their common concern was a challenge to narrative assumptions based on strictures of the orderly unfolding of plot and life-like characters moving in a recognizable universe. These assumptions, however widely held, suppose that literature is mimetic, that it imitates life. The nouveau roman set out to challenge the illusion of reference (that the novel 'refers' to life) insofar as reference is tied to representation. It held that the socalled naturalness of narrative was a set of artifices to which we had become accustomed and that narrative order and significance were an illusion fostered by the omniscient author. For the 'new' novelists, representation is not an a priori given; it is produced. Drawing on the work of ▷ André Gide and ▷ Marcel Proust, notably Gide's > mise en abyme technique, the nouveau roman will therefore expose its own means of production and raise the problem of its own narrative existence. Correspondingly, the role of the reader is also revised. He or she is called upon to co-author the text, to act not as a passive recipient of information, but as an active producer of meanings. Indeed, given the fragmentary or elliptical nature of nouveau roman narrative presentation, the reader's search for meaning is often thematized as an (impossible) attempt to solve an enigma (the nouveau roman frequently adopts the detective story format).

The impact of the nouveau roman was greatly magnified by the fact that the practice of novel writing was accompanied by thorough-going critical reflection on that practice. The novelists themselves were also heavily engaged in theory and frequently worked alongside professional academic theoreticians or were allied to magazines such as Tel Ouel. Of the original group of new novelists. Robbe-Grillet and Simon are still strong practitioners. While the mainstream of the English novel has been little affected, the techniques of the nouveau roman have influenced writers such as > Christine Brooke-Rose and > Brigid Brophy. In the 1970s there emerged the new new novel (nouveau nouveau roman). centring on the novelist and theorist Philippe Sollers (b 1936) and displaying many of the traits of ▷ deconstructive and ▷ post-structuralist principles.

Bib: Robbe-Grillet, A., Pour un Nouveau Roman.

Nouveaux Philosophes, Les

A title coined by the magazine Les Nouvelles littéraires in June 1976 to describe a group of writers among whom the most prominent are André Glucksmann (Les Maîtres penseurs, 1977; reviewed by Michel Foucault) and Bernard-Henri Lévy (La Barbarie à visage humain, 1977; L'Idéologie française, 1981). The group combined certain traits of Foucault and ▷ Jacques Lacan (often simplified and distorted) with right-wing views − hostility to Marxism, vague spiritual yearning and finding the source of all value in the individual. As a group, their influence was at its height in the late 1970s and is now played out (it was in any case media-promoted), but Glucksmann and Lévy are still well known.

Novel in verse

The novel in verse is not a recognized or clearly defined genre; most candidates for inclusion in this category belong to other, well-established genres: > The Odyssey is an epic; > Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (late 14th century) is an alliterative romance; Wordsworth's autobiographical magnum opus, The Prelude (1805), is a philosophical poem; Byron's > Don Juan (1819-24) is a mock-epic satire. The category is worth proposing only because it indicates a fruitful area of overlap between the novel and other genres, including some curiosities such as Amours de Voyage (1858) by Arthur Hugh Clough, which is a short > epistolary novel in verse. > David Jones' In Parenthesis, a sustained narrative about the First World War, is partly in verse and partly in prose that is so poetic it might be termed a prose poem; the poet Ezra Pound described his modernist sequence of poems, Hugh Selmyn Mauberley (1920), as 'an attempt to condense the [Henry] James novel'. There have been some remarkable recent achievements in this area: Omeros (1990), by the poet Derek Walcott, is a lyrical and poetic reworking of Homeric epic in a Caribbean context, but contains some richly novelistic description, characterization and episode. Love, Death and the Changing of the Seasons (1987), by the American poet Marilyn Hacker, is the story of a lesbian relationship, recounted with a witty intensity that places it in the tradition of the Renaissance sonnet sequence, whereas > Vikram Seth's The Golden Gate (1986), although written entirely in a variation of sonnet form, is essentially a novel: plot and character predominate, rather than linguistic artifice and meditation.

Novel of manners

This term is often used to designate a particular genre within 19th-century > realism exemplified in the work of such authors as Jane Austen (1775-1817), > Balzac, > Turgeney, ➤ Trollope, ➤ Thackeray and ➤ Henry James. The novels characteristically analyse the individual and the social by bringing together representatives of two different social groups in such a way as to highlight the other's behaviour code by contrast. The plot mechanism usually hinges on love relationships between these representatives (who may stand for town and country; north and south; the nouveau riche and the aristocracy or, in Henry James' case, the United States and Europe) and whether the differences in their code of manners can be resolved by marriage. The mode is therefore an excellent vehicle for dissecting the marital economy, relations between the sexes and the social determination of love. It was perceived by hostile critics, including the ▶ naturalist writers of 1870 onwards, as overly genteel. The US novelist Frank Norris characterized the style as 'the tragedy of the broken teacup'. This is a misapprehension however, as, in the hands of its major exponents, larger aspects of the human condition such as love, sex, class and war are not so much avoided as refracted through social behaviour codes in a subtle, heavily nuanced and psychologically complex fashion. The genre continued in the 20th century with novels such as E.M. Forster's A Passage to India (1924) and is negotiated in Virginia Woolf's To the Lighthouse (1927) and Mrs Dalloway (1925).

Novella

In modern usage the novella is a long short story or short novel, such as ▷ Joseph Conrad's ▷ Heart of Darkness (1902), or ▷ Henry James' The Aspern Papers (1888). The French term 'nouvelle' is sometimes used with the same meaning. The novella (Italian), or nouvelle (French), was also a Renaissance genre, a short prose narrative of the sort found in ▷ Boccaccio's ▷ Decameron, and was one of the forms out of which the novel developed.

Novum Organum (1620)

A philosophical treatise by Francis Bacon, the Novum Organum (New Instrument) was written in Latin and published in the > Instauratio Magna (1620) in an incomplete form. His aim was to describe a method of gaining power over nature through a complete and correctly founded system of knowledge. Knowledge must be acquired by experience and experiment, ie inductively. The obstacles to true knowledge are false assumptions, which Bacon calls 'Idols'. These are of four kinds: the Idols of the Tribe are common human weaknesses such as allowing the emotions to interfere with the reason; the Idols of the Cave are individual weaknesses arising from individual upbringing; Idols of the Market-place arise from erroneous uses of language, such as using names for nonexistent things, or for concepts which have been inadequately defined; Idols of the Theatre are caused by false philosophical principles and by incorrect reasoning. The object of speculative science must be to discover the true 'forms' of things, beginning with the forms of 'simple natures', ie the true manifestations of the most elemental phenomena such as heat and light. By inductive experiment certain axioms will be made of increasing generality and abstractness. Thus Bacon sought a method of recognizing what he called 'an alphabet of nature' so that a reliable language could be built up from it. The method of discovery proved too slow to be scientifically useful in the coming centuries, but his approach was a development from the too exclusively deductive methods of medieval thought towards the modern scientific combination of deduction and experiment.

N-Town Cycle

A collection of plays, recounting episodes from Christian history, formerly called the Ludus Conventriae Cycle because it was mistakenly linked to the town of Coventry. But unlike the other examples of cycles from the late medieval period in England (such as ➤ York, > Chester), this sequence of plays cannot be linked to any specific town. The Banns announce that it will be performed at 'n town'; which suggests the sequence was scripted to be performed at different towns, using a fixed stage setting, not pageant waggons. The text seems to have originated from the East Midlands area, but there are no records of its performance. The scholarly consensus currently is that this collection is a fifteenth-century compilation made up from parts of longer plays about the life of Mary and the Passion with additional pageants from an earlier sequence. Bib: Spector, S. (ed.), The N-Town Play.

Nuns and Nunneries

Monastic orders in the Middle Ages had female as well as male branches; most English nuns belonged to the ▷ Benedictine Order. They lived in 'nunneries', later increasingly known as 'convents', though originally a convent might house either sex. They were ruled by elected prioresses or abbesses. Until the 14th century nuns were usually from aristocratic families; among the lower classes it was generally possible for a woman to work; but in the upper classes, a nunnery was the only alternative to marriage. Before the ➤ Norman Conquest (1066) nunneries compared with monasteries as places of learning, but afterwards the nuns were seldom as learned, though they excelled in such accomplishments as embroidery. From the 14th century merchants' daughters as well as girls from noble families were increasingly admitted. Nunneries were sometimes used as places of confinement for girls who refused to marry the husbands of their parents' choice, etc. Manual work was neglected from the 13th century and conducted by lay servants, as in monasteries, but nunneries sometimes ran small schools for the children of well-to-do families. Nuns who wished to live a life dedicated to solitary meditation were called 'anchoresses'; such was the mystical writer > Juliana of Norwich.

Nun's Priest Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. The Nun's Priest, who is barely mentioned in the General Prologue, contributes a brilliant animal fable to the competition which greatly amplifies the traditional story of the cock who is captured by the fox, but who manages to escape by exploiting the fox's pride in his achievement. The story has analogues in ▷ Marie de France's collection of fables, and in the 13th-century beast epic, the Roman de Renart (▷ Reynard the Fox), but Chaucer's version is distinguished by its enormous build-up to the fox's assault.

Much of the early section of the Tale is taken up with an argument over the value of dreams between Chauntecleer, the cock, and his henconsort, Pertelote, which is prompted by the cock's dream of being attacked by a large red animal. Problems about how to extract meaning from dream narratives, raised in their debate, are relevant to the Tale as a whole, which ends with a challenge to the reader to extract the moral 'fruit' from this brilliantly inflated, mock-heroic animal fable.

Nurseries

Training establishments for actors and actresses in the Restoration period.

Nut-Brown Maid, The

A 15th-century anonymous poem, first printed in 1502. It is in 30 12-line stanzas, spoken by a young man and woman alternately, with the respective refrains 'Alone a banished man' and 'I love but you alone', and their debate focuses on the faithfulness of women. Although the woman believes her lover to be an outlaw, she remains true.

Nwapa, Flora (b 1931)

Nigerian novelist and short-story writer. Much of Nwapa's fiction is concerned with questions of isolation, support and autonomy, as they bear on women. Her novels are: Efuru (1966); Idu (1970); One is Enough (1981 – the title refers to husbands); Women Are Different (1986). Volumes of short stories: This Is Lagos (1986); Wives at War (1980).

Bib: James, A., In Their Own Voices: Interviews with African Women Writers.

0

Oates, Titus (1649-1705)

An English conspirator. He was the son of a Puritan preacher, and himself professed to stand for the defence of ➤ Protestantism against supposed Catholic dangers, but he was really a disreputable adventurer who used the religious passions of the time for his personal advantage. In 1678 he fabricated the Popish Plot, by which he pretended without factual basis to expose a Catholic conspiracy against the > Church of England. Popular suspicion of > Charles II, and the fact that the Queen and his brother James were avowed Roman Catholics, caused a national panic, and a large number of Catholics were put to death. His evidence was eventually proved false, and he was imprisoned. He is satirized under the name of Corah in Dryden's > Absalom and Achitophel.

Oberon

In Germanic myth, king of the elves, or fairies. A French 13th-century romance, Huon of Bordeaux, in which he occurs, was translated into English in 1534. From this ➤ Robert Greene introduced him into his romantic play ➤ James IV (1594), and ➤ Shakespeare into his comedy ➤ A Midsummer Night's Dream. He was used thereafter in a number of works, including a ➤ masque by ➤ Ben Jonson (in which ➤ Prince Henry is identified with Oberon) and the poem Nymphidia by ➤ Michael Drayton.

> Fairics.

Objective correlative

An expression first used by the critic and poet ➤ T. S. Eliot, in his essay on ➤ Shakespeare's play, Hamlet (1919). Eliot describes Shakespeare's play as an artistic failure because it 'is full of some stuff that the writer could not drag to life, contemplate, or manipulate into art'. He goes on: 'The only way of expressing emotion in the form of art is by finding an "objective correlative"; in other words, a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events which shall be the formula of that particular emotion; such that when the external facts . . . are given, the emotion is immediately evoked'. He then instances the sleep-walking scene in Macbeth as a successful 'objective correlative', and adds: 'The artistic "inevitability" lies in this complete adequacy of the external (ie the event on the stage is witnessed by the audience) to the emotion; and this is precisely what is deficient in Hamlet.'

Eliot's adverse judgement of Hamlet has not been widely accepted, but the term 'objective correlative' has passed into critical currency.

O'Brien, Edna (b 1932)

Novelist and short-story writer, born in County Clare, Ireland. Novels include: The Country Girls (1960); The Lonely Girl (1962) (as Girl With Green Eyes, 1964); Girls in Their Married Bliss (1964); August is a Wicked Month (1965); Casualties of Peace (1967); A Pagan Place (1970); Night (1972); Johnny I Hardly Knew You (1977); and The High Road (1988). Her novels are concerned primarily with women's experience of loss, guilt and self-division; they are characterized by a certain lyricism and nostalgia, combined with a detached humour which has become more bitter as her work has developed.

Her first three novels form a trilogy about the lives of two contrasted women, and use a realistic mode which is replaced by internal monologues in some of her later work. Her style is very effective in the short-story form: The Love Object (1968); A Scandalous Woman (1974); Mrs Reinhardt (1978); Returning (1982); A Fanatic Heart: Selected Stories (1984). She has also written plays, screenplays and T.V. plays.

O'Brien, Flann (1911-66)

Pseudonym of Brian Nolan, author of hilarious, learned, parodic, linguistically exuberant novels, which anticipate many features of ⊳ postmodernist metafiction: At Swim-Two-Birds (1939), which incorporates pastiche and parody of Irish folklore; An Béal Bocht (1941 in Gaelic, translated 1973 as The Poor Mouth); The Third Policeman (written 1940, published 1967). O'Brian was born in County Tyrone and educated at University College Dublin; he was a civil servant and also wrote a weekly satirical column in the Irish Times.

Observer, The

A ⊳ newspaper published only on Sundays, started in 1792. It is central in its politics, and aims to appeal to a liberal and left-wing readership. In 1993 it was bought by the daily newspaper The Guardian.

O'Casey, Sean (1880-1964)

Irish dramatist best known for his three plays about tenement life in Dublin around the time of Irish independence in 1921. These were first performed at the > Abbey Theatre: The Shadow of a Gunman (1923), Juno and the Paycock (1924) and The Plough and the Stars (1926). The last of these was greeted with a riot on its opening night. His next play, The Silver Tassie (1928), was an anti-heroic piece which experimented with expressionistic techniques. The play was rejected for performance at the Abbey by ▷ W. B. Yeats. After this O'Casey lived in England in self-imposed exile until his death. With The Star Turns Red (1940), Purple Dust (1940), Red Roses for Me (1943), Oak Leaves and Lavender (1947), Cock-a-Doodle Dandy (1949) and The Bishop's Bonfire (1961), he continued experimenting with nonnaturalistic theatrical devices. These later plays deserve greater recognition than they have been given to date.

➤ Irish literature in English. Bib: Kosok, H., O'Casey the Dramatist; Krause, D., Sean O'Casey: The Man and His Work.

Ockham (Occam), William of (?1300-?1349) Philosopher and Franciscan friar. He was one of the leaders of the Nominalist school of philosophy, according to which individual things were considered to be real, but the names for kinds and classes referred to qualities of individuals only, and not to independent realities. This prepared the way for the thought of > Francis Bacon which was in itself the starting point of modern scientific thinking, since Ockham's ideas implied building generalizations from the knowledge of individual objects instead of arguing from pre-established generalizations, as the more typically medieval Realists had reasoned.

The principle known as 'Ockham's Razor' lays down that 'entities' must not be unnecessarily invented, implying that abstractions must be somehow proved to have a necessary relationship with known realities. The principle makes for exact thinking, and also for scepticism. He went so far as to say that the existence of God could not be proved, though he did not mean by this that God did not exist.

➤ Nominalism: Realism.

O'Connor, Frank (pen-name of Michael O'Donovan) (1903-66)

Irish writer, especially famous for his short stories. He was born in Cork, received little education, and for some time worked as a librarian in Cork and Dublin. He was encouraged to write by the Irish poet AE (George Russell), and his publisher, Harold Macmillan (later the British Conservative Party leader) influenced him in deciding for a literary career. He participated in the Irish Rebellion after World War I. His first volume of short stories, Guests of the Nation, was published in 1931. Other volumes are: Bone of Contention (1936), Three Tales (1941), Crab Apple Jelly (1944), The Common Chord (1948), Traveller's Samples (1951), My Oedipus Complex (1963). His translation of poetry and legends from the Irish are also famous: A Golden Treasury of Irish Poetry (1967). He wrote two novels which have less repute than his short stories: The Saint and Mary Kate (1932) and Dutch Interior (1966). His critical works include one of the best studies of the art of the short story, The Lonely Voice, and a study of the novel, The Mirror in the Roadway. He also published two volumes of an uncompleted autobiography, An Only Child and My Father's Son. From 1952 he taught in an American university.

O'Connor's stories are remarkable for their insight, comedy, pathos and compassion. His field was the lower ranges of Irish society, which he understood profoundly, and which he universalized by his generous intelligence and sympathies in a way that recalls Chekhov's treatment of Russian life.

Bib: Sheehy, Maurice (ed.), Michael/ Frank.

Octavia

Half-sister of Octavius Caesar, who became the first Roman Emperor, ▷ Caesar Augustus (ruled 27 BC-AD 14) She married her brother's rival, Mark Antony, and occurs as a character in ▷ Shakespeare's tragedy Antony and Cleopatra and in ▷ Dryden's tragedy ▷ All For Love.

Odd Women, The (1893)

A novel by > George Gissing which deals with many of the issues found in the > 'New Woman' novels of the 1890s. Three 'odd' or 'surplus' women - spinsters - are left penniless by their improvident father, and the story concerns the limited choices each is forced to make. Monica Madden is pretty enough to marry for economic security rather than love, while her sisters Alice and Virginia become worn out and dispirited working in the only available jobs of teacher and ⊳ governess, supported by the vain belief that they will start a school one day. Rhoda Nunn and Mary Barfoot are placed in direct contrast to them. Energetic, resourceful and committed to women's independence and emancipation, they run a business school to train women for work in commerce. Their plans are disrupted by a mutual affection which grows up between Rhoda and Everard Barfoot, Mary's cousin, and Rhoda has to reconcile love with her desire for independence. Gissing's Rhoda foreshadows ➤ Thomas Hardy's Sue Bridehead in > Jude the Obscure.

➤ The Bostonians; Lesbianism; Women's Movement.

Ode

The Pindaric ode is modelled on the works of Pindar, a Greek poet of the 5th century BC, best known for his odes celebrating the victors at the Olympic games. These were accompanied by music and dance, and were disposed in a threefold pattern corresponding to the movements of the Greek dramatic chorus (strophe, antistrophe, epode). From the 17th century onwards English poets took Pindar as a model for lyric and declamatory verse expressive of high-wrought emotion. ➤ Thomas Gray's Progress of Poesy follows Pindar's stanza forms with scholarly exactness, but ▷ Abraham Cowley had earlier established the more usual 'irregular ode', which sanctions unpredictable variations in line-length, rhyme and ⊳ metre within each stanza. Early examples of this form are > John Dryden's Alexander's Feast and Ode to the Memory of Anne Killigrew. 'Pindarics' remained popular throughout the 18th century and became a natural vehicle for the new ▷ 'romantick' sensibility. Gray's use of them in ▷ The Bard and The Progress of Poesy, for all its scholarly meticulousness, is intended to sound bold and inspirational. The form remains essentially the same in such ▷ romantic works as ▷ William Wordsworth's ▷ Ode: Intimations of Immortality and ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge's ▷ Dejection, though by now it has lost its classical, 'Pindaric' associations, and is fully naturalized.

The Roman poet ➤ Horace imitated Pindar, but his odes employ unvarying stanza forms. The 'regular' Horatian ode was imitated by ➤ Andrew Marvell in his Horatian Ode upon Crommell's Return from Ireland, and by ➤ William Collins in How Sleep the Brave and To Simplicity. ➤ John Keats' Odes, with their long and complex, but regular stanzas, lie somewhere between the Pindaric and Horatian form.

Odes, Keats'

Description Descr

On a Grecian Urn and To a Nightingale are companion pieces, one concerned with Art, the other with Nature. Both urn and bird persuade the poet for a while that their beauty is permanent. The urn's message to Man is 'Beauty is truth, truth beauty', and the Nightingale seems an 'immortal bird', 'not born for death'. However the urn's comfort remains on its beautiful surface. Though a 'friend to man' it is a 'Cold Pastoral'. The beautiful figures depicted upon it, preserved from time by art, can never reachieve the trembling elusive life which they possessed when really alive. Their death and distance is paradoxically only accentuated by Keats' ecstatic, even hectic, celebration of its artistic immortality. Similarly, the nightingale's song, though unchanged through history, fades as the particular bird to which he is listening flies away, and Keats is returned to his 'sole self, admitting that 'the fancy cannot cheat so well/ As she is fam'd to do, deceiving elf'.

The Ode to Autumn contains no explicit philosophizing, and seems purely descriptive. It provides, however, an emotional answer to the problems of the previous odes. The images of the poem are beautiful precisely because the scene described is a transient moment in the flux of time. The poignant pleasure they give derives from their lack of permanence or stability: 'And gathering swallows twitter in the skies'. Keats is here expressing in his own way the paradox of the great prophet of > Romanticism, > William Blake: 'He who binds to himself a joy/ Does the winged life destroy;' But he who kisses the joy as it flies/ Lives in eternity's sun rise.'

Odyssey

An ▷ epic by the ancient Greek poet ▷ Homer. The hero, ▷ Odysseus King of Ithaca, is on his way home after the Trojan war, but he is blown off course and the return journey takes him ten years. The principal episodes of his voyage are as follows:

The land of the Lotus-Eaters. Those who eat of the lotus plant forget their homeland.

- 2 The land of the ▷ Cyclops. These are a race of one-eyed giants. Odysseus puts out the eye of the Cyclops Polyphemus, who is son of ▷ Poseidon, god of the sca; it is to punish him for this that Poseidon sends him wandering for ten years.
- 3 The Isle of Aeolus, king of the winds. Odysseus steals from him the bag in which the winds are contained, but his companions open it too soon, and the winds escape.
- 4 Telepylus, the city of the cannibal Laestrygonians. They destroy his fleet except one ship, in which he escapes.
- 5 The Isle of ➤ Circe. She transforms his men into swine, but with the aid of the god ➤ Hermes, he resists her enchantments, compels her to restore his men, and remains in the island as her lover for a year.
- 6 He visits the Underworld, ➤ Hades, to learn from the prophet ➤ Tiresias the way home. Tiresias warns him against harming the cattle of the sun-god, Helios.
- 7 He evades the enchanting songs of the ➤ Sirens, who try to lure him on to the rocks. 8 He passes through the strait of Scylla and 8 He passes through the strait of Scylla and Charybdis – a treacherous rock and a whirlpool.

- 9 He comes to the Island of Thrinacia (Sicily) where the cattle of Helios live, which the ghost of Tiresias has warned him not to harm, but overcome by hunger, his companions devour them.
- 10 In punishment, his ship is wrecked and all his men perish, but Odysseus reaches the island of the goddess ▷ Calypso, who keeps him prisoner for seven years as her lover. He eventually escapes, with the aid of the goddess ▷ Athene, and reaches the lands of the Phaeacians where Nausicaa and her father, the king of the country, befriend him. The narrative of all the above events comes to the reader through Odysseus, who tells them to the king. The king helps him back to Ithaca. There, with the help of his son Telemachus, he kills the suitors who have been pestering the chaste Penelope, his queen. The Odyssey has had a considerable influence upon the novel most notably ▷ Ulysses, by ▷ James Joyce.

Oedipus complex

In ▶ Freudian psychoanalysis Sophocles' story of Oedipus who killed his father and married his mother, is used as a model of the way in which human desires and feelings are structured during the passage from infancy to adulthood. The triangular relationship modelled on Sophocles' text can be used to explain relationships within the family which is the model of socialization available to the child. In order for successful socialization to occur, the child must emerge from the position of desiring an incestuous relationship with individual parents - for which in the case of the male, the penalty would be castration - and to transfer the affections for the mother on to another. The difficulties which this sometimes causes are illustrated in novels such as D. H. Lawrence's Dons and Lovers where Paul Morel is faced with having to transfer his affections for his mother onto other women. The Oedipus complex, and the model of triangulated desire upon which it is built, must be overcome in order for individual gendered human subjects to take their place in a world of which they are not the centre. This process of 'decentring' is explained by ▷ Jacques Lacan as an acceptance of the repression of desire imposed upon the subject by the father, an acceptance of a 'symbolic castration'. This raises a number of difficulties in the case of the gendered female subject who can never break free of the castration complex imposed upon her by a phallocentric ⊳ symbolic order. Basically the Oedipus complex is used to account for a particular hierarchy of relationships within the family unit. It is a process through which the male is expected to pass in order to reach mature adulthood, and it seeks to offer an explanation of the ways in which authority operates as a system of constraints and laws.

➤ Psychoanalytic criticism. Bib: Laplanche, J. and Pontalis, J. P., The Language of Psychoanalysis.

O'Faolain, Sean (b 1900)

Irish novelist and writer of short stories. He was born in Dublin and attended the National University of Ireland and Harvard University in the U.S.A. He participated in the Irish Rebellion following World War I, and later lived in England as a teacher. His novels include A Nest of Simple Folk (1933) and Bird Alone (1936). His first volume of stories, Midsummer Night Madness (1932), vividly reflects the atmosphere of the Irish disturbances. A collected edition of the stories was published in 1958, and in 1966 he published a further volume, The Heat of the Sun. Among his other writings are two biographies which are studies of Irish leaders, one on Daniel O'Connell entitled King of the Beggars (1938), and The Great O'Neill (1942). His critical work includes The Short Story (1948). His autobiography Vive Moi! appeared in 1965. He was made Director of the Arts Council of Ireland in 1957.

O'Flaherty, Liam (1897–1984) Irish novelist and writer of short

Irish novelist and writer of short stories. Born in the Aran Islands he was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but did not enter it. He fought in World War I, and settled in England in 1922. His first volume of stories, Spring Sowing, was published in 1926; it contains stories of Irish peasant life and wild nature. At his best, his stories have the intensity of fine lyric poetry, and he is peculiarly gifted at representing the exhilaration and poignancy of life directly exposed to natural forces. Other volumes of stories include: The Mountain Tavern (1929), The Wild Sman (1932), Two Lovely Beasts (1948). His novels include The Informer (1925 - made into a film in 1935) and the historical Famine (1937). His autobiography is entitled Shame the Devil (1934).

Og, king of Bashan

➤ Absalom and Achitophel.

Oisin

Also known as Ossian. In 1760-63, James Macpherson published a series of blank verse epics which he attributed to Ossian and claimed to have translated from the Gaelic. His version had an immense success and a wide influence; however, Macpherson was later proved not to have translated the poems, but to have synthesized them from a number of genuine Celtic legends, in which the hero Oisin occurs. Dr Johnson was among the earliest sceptics; when asked whether he thought any man 'of the modern age' could have written the poems, he replied: 'Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children.'

➤ W. B. Yeats wrote a narrative poem The Wanderings of Oisin (1889), the earliest of his attempts to create a new literature out of Celtic mythology. In the ancient legends Oisin bridged the gap between the heroic pagan age and Irish Christianity; his longevity was due to a long sojourn in Fairyland.

> Celtic Twilight; Irish Literature in English.

O'Keeffe, Adelaide (1776-1865)

Novelist and children's author. Daughter and amanuensis of the Irish dramatist ▷ John O'Keeffe, Adelaide would have certainly written down his most famous play, Wild Oats (1791), since she began copying for him when he became blind in 1788. O'Keeffe's father was the centre of her affections, and she wrote in order to sustain her family when he had to retire, penning a touching memoir to him after his death (published with his poems as O'Keeffe's Legacy to his Daughter, 1834). She is best known for her Original Poems for Infant Minds (1804–5), which although ▷ didactic, are also spiced with a certain sense of disrespectful fun. Her novels are far more adventurous works for an adult readership, and include Dudley (1819) and The Broken Sword (1854), which deal with the emotional problems besetting families and are both perceptive and gently humorous.

O'Keeffe, John (1747-1883)

Actor and dramatist, who wrote many popular comedies and comic operas in the late 18th century. O'Keeffe was drawn to the stage by reading the plays of George Farquhar (1678-1707) and he wrote his first play, The Gallant, at the age of 15, later obtaining a post as an actor. In 1773 he took up writing seriously, and his farce, Tony Lumpkin in Town, based on Oliver Goldsmith's (1730-74) She Stoops to Conquer, was staged in Dublin, and afterwards at the Haymarket Theatre in London. His Wild Oats, or the Strolling Gentleman (1791) was revived by the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1976, with great success, largely because of the magnificent acting vehicle provided in the character of Rover. This play would have been written down by his daughter, the novelist > Adelaide O'Keeffe, since John had become blind in 1788. O'Keeffe's autobiography was published in 1826.

Okri, Ben (b 1959)

Novelist and short-story writer, educated in Nigeria and at the University of Essex. During the 1980s he was poetry editor of West Africa magazine and worked for the BBC World Service 1984-5. The Famished Road (1991), which brought him widespread recognition, is narrated by a 'spirit child' and combines social realism with elements of the supernatural and of ➤ magic realism, producing a dream-like quality also found in many of his short stories, collected in Incidents at the Shrine (1986) and Stars of the New Curfew (1989). His other novels are: Flowers and Shadows (1980); The Landscape Within (1981); Songs of Enchantment (1993, sequel to The Famished Road); Astonishing the Gods (1905).

Old Bachelor, The (1693)

Comedy by Congreve. After being seduced and abandoned by Vainlove, Silvia sets out to marry, pretending to be sexually inexperienced. Heartwell, the aged and surly 'old bachelor' of the title, falls in love with Silvia, and marries her. He later discovers to his relief that the marriage is a sham, as the parson was only Vainlove's friend Bellmour in disguise. Afterwards Silvia traps Sir Joseph Wittol into a genuine marriage. Bellmour loves Belinda, but at first she keeps him at a distance, knowing him to be a rake: eventually they marry. In another intrigue, Bellmour is attracted to the uxorious Fondlewife's wife Laeticia, whom Vainlove has wooed, as he woos any pretty woman. In this instance Vainlove allows Bellmour to reap the fruit of his labours: Bellmour goes to Laeticia's house, disguised as a Puritan preacher, and seduces her in her husband's absence. Fondlewife returns, but the lovers convince him that she has remained chaste. Araminta, another woman whom Vainlove pursues, loves him but resists him. At last they seem near to marrying, but the ending of their plot-line remains ambiguous. The play is lively and entertaining, but cynical in tone.

Old Comedy > Aristophanes.

Old Curiosity Shop, The (1840-1)
A novel by ▷ Charles Dickens; it was serialized as part of ▷ Master Humphrey's Clock in 1840-1 (published in book form in 1841).

The Curiosity Shop (a shop which sells second-hand goods of ornamental or rarity value) is kept by the grandfather of little Nell, Trent. The old man has been impoverished by the extravagances of his son-in-law and those of Fred Trent, Nell's brother. He is forced to borrow money from Quilp, a grotesque and malevolent dwarf, who believes the old man to be a miser with a hidden store of wealth. Quilp gets possession of the shop, and Nell and her grandfather take to wandering about the countryside. Eventually Nell dies, too late to be saved by her grandfather's brother, who has returned from abroad and finds them after a long search. Quilp is drowned while attempting to escape arrest. Other characters include Sampson Brass, Quilp's unscrupulous lawyer, his sister Sally and 'the Marchioness', a child whom the Brasses keep as a servant in vile conditions.

The novel shows Dickens' extraordinary vitality of imagination and also exemplifies the vulgarity which was part of his vitality. This vulgarity tended to display itself in melodrama and in sentimentality, here exhibited in the characters of Quilp and Little Nell respectively. The death of Little Nell is often regarded as Dickens' most notorious sentimental indulgence.

Old English

The name is practically identical with Anglo-Saxon is denoting the language, literature and culture of the English before the Norman conquest of 1066, and also afterwards until it becomes fused (Middle English) in the 13th century with the insular Anglo-Norman; it was later occasionally used to differentiate the common people from the aristocracy of (supposedly) Anglo-Norman descent.

➤ English language; Saxons.

Old English Baron, The (1778)
Historical and ▷ Gothic ▷ romance by English writer ▷ Clara Reeve, first published as The Champion of Virtue: A Gothic Story (1777).

Sir Philip Harclay returns to England after serving ▷ Henry V, to discover that there have been strange deeds in the family of his friend, Lord Lovel, whose castle is now occupied by Lord Baron Fitz-Owen. A mystery begins to be unravelled around the well-bred but impoverished Edmund, and his banishment by an evil relative. Ultimately, the rightful claims of inheritance are asserted. In a preface, Reeve asserts that Gothic effects must 'be kept within certain limits of credibility'.

> Mysteries of Udolpho, The; Radcliffe, Ann

Old English literature

The four centuries preceding the Norman Conquest of 1066 were a period during which the Teutonic tribes who invaded Britain in the 5th century, after the fall of Roman dominion, achieved a level of organization capable first of resisting, then assimilating, the 8th-century invaders from Scandinavia. The conversion to Christianity of the Angles in the north and east of England, the Saxons in the south and the Jutes in Kent, partly by Irish, partly by Continental missionaries, led to the establishment of monasteries which became centres of learning and literate culture. Partly as a result of initiatives taken by ⊳ Alfred to cultivate the use of English as a literary medium (to compensate for the decline in Latin learning during the period of the Danish invasions), partly as a result of the pastoral impetus of the > Benedictine Revival, English achieved a status as a literary language surpassing that of any other European vernacular. By the 11th century a standard written form of English (West Saxon) was being cultivated as a medium for pastoral instruction, for literary culture, for the purposes of administration and record (although Latin remained the language of the highest cultural authority and scholarship). Old English literary culture may be roughly classified as follows:

I The Latin work of monastic scholars. Monastic, Latin culture occupied a central and crucial position within Anglo-Saxon, and European, culture as a whole. From this context, the Latin work of ▷ Bede, Alcuin, and Aldhelm deserves special recognition. Bede (673–735) was the foremost scholar of Anglo-Saxon culture and the most enduringly influential of this group. Alcuin (735–804) was the most famous Saxon scholar of his time, as a result of his important position in the court of the Emperor Charlemagne (from about 781) as an educational reformer and pioneer. His works cover a range of topics (historical, grammatical, and scientific) in Latin verse and prose. Aldhelm (640–709) was Abbot of Malmesbury and later Bishop of Sherbourne. His works include florid treatises in verse and prose in praise of virginity, and a treatise on metrics. His English poetry, apparently admired by Alfred, is lost.

2 Old English poetry. The bulk of this is preserved in just four manuscripts, dating from the second half of the 10th century (the socalled Junius ms, the Vercelli Book, the Exeter book and the ➤ Beowulf ms). The prosodic form of Old English poetry is > alliterative verse, and the extant poetic corpus is one of considerable formal sophistication. The blend of traditions and values from Germanic and Christian culture gives it a distinctive quality. The heroic narratives rework material from a historical-legendary Germanic past, preserved through the efforts of literate Saxon monks. Most of the material cannot be attributed to a single writer, nor dated with any degree of precision. A list of the subjects will give some idea of its range:

i Heroic narratives about the legendary-historical past (such as ▷ Beomulf, Deor, The Battle of Finnsburh, Waldere, Widsith).

ii Commemorative historical poems (The Battle of Brunanburh and the ▷ Battle of Maldon).

iii Poems on biblical and scriptural themes (retelling O.T. narratives such as Genesis A, Genesis B, Judith, Exodus; retelling N.T. events such as ▷ Cynewulf's Christ II or those contained in apocryphal gospels, such as Andreas; meditations on Christian iconography, such as the ▷ Dream of the Road, the Phoenix; hymns of praise, such as the famous, earliest extant example of O.E. poetry, ▷ Caedmon's 'hymn').

iv Lives of saints (such as Guthlac A and B, Juliana, Elene).

v Short elegies (complaints written from the stance of a first-person speaker on the hardships of separation and isolation of one kind or, another, such as The Wanderer, The Seafearer, The Wife's Lament).

vi Riddles and gnomic verse (the riddles, such as those collected in the Exeter Book, are characteristically in the voice of objects who pun on their identity, using clever metaphorical and metonymical twists).

3 Old English prose. There was a well-developed prose tradition in Old English, stimulated by the initiatives taken by Alfred to produce translations of those books 'most necessary for men to know': translations by Alfred, or attributed to the Alfredian school, include Gregory the Great's Pastoral Care, ▷ Bocthius' Consolation of Philosophy, Augustine's Soliloquies, ▷ Bede's Ecclesiastical History. Prose was used as the medium for homiletic instruction (most notably by ▷ Aelfric and Wulfstan, and in the Blicking Homilies), and for translations from the Old and New Testaments. Classical narratives, such as the story of Apollonius of Tyre and parts of the ▷ Alexander legend, also survive in vernacular prose translations. The ▷ Anglo-Saxon Chronicle illustrates the use of Old English prose as a medium of historical record, and there are also extant examples of laws, charters, wills, scientific and medical writings in O.E. prose.

A number of factors contributed to the demise of English as a prestige vernacular in the later 11th century. With the Conquest, the English administrative, ecclesiastical and social elite was replaced by Norman personnel. The effect was to confirm Latin as the language of official administration and record, and to encourage the use of Norman-French (> Anglo-Norman) as a vernacular of status. There seems to have been no attempt to prevent English being used in official contexts: it simply was no longer practical to do so in many cases. But Latin culture underwent an enormous renaissance from the late 11th century onwards, as did French culture from the mid-12th century, which influenced their use across Europe as cultural and literary mediums. The tradition of O.E. learning was kept up at some monastic centres through the 12th century, particularly at Worcester, but a standard written form of the language could no longer be maintained. The early written forms of English which survive from the 12th century reflect regional variations in usage and the enormous changes in the spoken forms of the language that had not permeated the standard written forms of O.E.. Thus the so-called Middle English period begins. The study of O.E. texts never entirely died out through the medieval period in England, but it increasingly became an area of antiquarian scholarship. The revival of substantial scholarly interest in Anglo-Saxon culture in the 16th century (reflected in the work of scholars such as ⊳ John Bale and ➤ Matthew Parker) was stimulated in part by religious-political issues, and the desire to find evidence of an autonomous national, ecclesiastical tradition in the pre-Norman era that could be used to refute Papal claims to ecclesiastical and spiritual authority. In the next century, Anglo-Saxon traditions and culture became a reference point for pro-Parliamentarians anxious to locate the roots of English political institutions firmly in the Saxon past. The subsequent history of Anglo-Saxon scholarship reflects a similarly complex merging of academic, political, national and racial interests.

➤ Alfred, King; Heptarchy.
Bib: Mitchell, B. and Robinson, F., A Guide to Old English; Shippey, T., Old English Verse; Swanton, M., English Literature before Chaucer.

Old Pretender, The

James Francis Edward Stuart (1688–1766), son of ▷ King James II who had been deposed for reasons connected with his ▷ Catholicism. He was a pretender to (ie he claimed) the British throne on the death of his half-sister Queen ▷ Anne in 1714, but his claim was rejected because like his father he was a Catholic. Instead, George of Hanover became king as ▷ George I. In 1715, James led a rebellion on his own behalf in ▷ Scotland, but this failed. His followers were called ▷ Jacobites from the Latin 'Jacobus' = James, and he was termed the 'Old' Pretender to distinguish him from his son, Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender, who attempted a similar Scottish rebellion in 1745.

Stuart, House of.

Old Vic Theatre. The

Situated in Waterloo Road, this is one of London's most famous theatres. Built in 1816–18, during the 19th century it drew on the local working-class population for its audiences, with productions of popular ▷ melodramas. In 1880 it was converted into a temperance amusement-hall. From 1881 to 1883 it was managed by the Shakespearean actor and director William Poel.

Oldcastle, Sir John (1378-1417)

Sir John Oldcastle became Lord Cobham and died a martyr for Wycliffite (▷ Wycliffe, John) heresy which rejected the doctrine of John) transubstantiation. There is cogent evidence to suggest that ▷ Falstaff in ▷ Henry IV was originally called Oldcastle, notwithstanding ▷ Shakespeare's explicit disclaimer of this in the 'Epilogue' to Henry IV, Part II. The complete works of Shakespeare edited by Gary Taylor and Stanley Wells retains (uniquely) Oldcastle for Falstaff in Henry IV, Part I, on the basis that the name was changed for reasons of political accommodation, not for aesthetic ones.

Oldfield, Anne (?1683-1730)

Actress. She served in a tavern where, according to tradition, her talents as an actress were recognized by the playwright ➤ George Farquhar, who heard her reciting some lines behind the bar. She was engaged at ➤ Drury Lane from 1699 where apart from a brief sojourn at the Queen's Theatre (➤ Haymarket Theatres), she remained to the end of her career. She gradually supplanted the previous leading actress, ➤ Anne Bracegirdle.

Throughout her career Oldfield preferred comic to tragic roles, excelling in the performance of coquettes and women of fashion such as Lady Betty Modish in ➤ Colley Cibber's The Careless Husband (1704).

Bib: Robins, E., The Palmy Days of Nance Oldfield, McIville, L., Stage Favourites of the Eighteenth Century.

Oldham, John (1653-83)

Poet. Some of his early poems were written under the influence of the ➤ Earl of Rochester, and his Ode, Suppos'd to be spoken by a Court-Hector at Breaking of the Dial in Privy-Garden, also known as A Satyr against Vertue, concerns one of Rochester's drunken exploits. His Satyrs upon the Jesuits, in heroic ▷ couplets (1681), ridicule ▷ Catholic superstition. He was a pioneer of the 'imitation' form, writing versions of poems by ▷ Horace, ▷ Juvenal and ▷ Boileau in urbane couplets, adapting the original to an English contemporary context. His Poems and Translations appeared in 1683. He died early from smallpox, and ▷ John Dryden wrote an elegy to his memory.

Bib: Zigerell, J., John Oldham.

Oliphant, Margaret (1828-97)

> Scottish novelist, biographer and critic, born in Wallyford, Midlothian; also known as M.O.W. She married her cousin Francis Oliphant in 1852, but in 1859 he died of consumption, leaving Margaret with two children and expecting a third. She supported her family (and that of her widowed brother and his three children) by writing prolifically, becoming the author of over 100 works. She wrote fiction, biography and reviews, her bestknown novels today being the ▷ Chronicles of Carlingford series (1863-76). Her first work, Passages in the Life of Mrs Margaret Maitland (1849) was well-received, and this was followed by the > historical novel Caleb Field (1851) and Merkland (1851). The Athelings (1857) was a huge success, and is the best of Oliphant's many domestic > romances. In 1862, her biography of Edward Irving appeared, and in 1863 the first of the Chronicles, Salem Chapel. The other four novels in the series were The Rector and the Doctor's Family (1863); The Perpetual Curate (1864); Miss Marjoribanks (1866) and Phoebe Junior (1876). Another group of books, Stories of the Seen and Unseen, dealt with matters of death and the soul, and include A Beleaguered City (1880) and A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen (1882). Also in 1882, her much admired Literary History of England appeared, and, in 1897-8, Annals of a Publishing House, which commemorated her long association with ▷ Blackwood's Magazine, to which she was a frequent contributor. Oliphant's best writing is sharply humorous and vivid in description, and she has been compared to ➤ George Eliot and ➤ Trollope, but the financial pressure to keep producing inevitably affected her work, not least since she was compelled to write scores of popular romances. Her posthumously published ≥ autobiography (1899) reveals the strain she was under, and records her struggle to meet financial obligations.

Bib: Coghill, H. (ed.), Margaret Oliphant: the Autobiography and Letters; Williams, M., A Critical Biography; Colby, V. and R., The Equivocal Virtue: Margaret Oliphant and the Victorian Literary Market Place; Cunningham, V., Everywhere Spoken Against: Dissent in the Victorian Novel.

Oliver Twist (1837-9)

A novel by ➤ Charles Dickens, published in instalments in 1837-9. Oliver is a child of unknown parents, born in a workhouse where he leads a miserable existence under the tyranny of Bumble, a beadle, ie a parish council official. He runs away to London and becomes mixed up in a gang of thieves led by Fagin and including the brutal burglar, Bill Sikes, Nancy his whore and a young pickpocket called the 'Artful Dodger'. He is temporarily rescued by the benevolent Mr Brownlow but a mysterious character called Monks, who has an interest in keeping Oliver's parentage a secret, induces the gang to kidnap him. He is finally rescued through the action of Nancy, who in consequence is brutally murdered by Sikes.

The novel shows the mixture of sentimentality and ▷ melodrama characteristic of early Dickens but in Bumble especially he exhibits keen social satire, and the London underworld is presented vividly. It was written at a time when a number of novelists (eg the ▷ 'Newgate School', especially ▷ Harrison Ainsworth) had written romances about crime, but Dickens dissociated it from these in the preface to the 3rd edition, and was realistic enough to startle the educated public into a new consciousness of the unprivileged and the criminal level of society, and to show how lack of compassion in the more privileged helped to make poverty a nursery of crime.

Olivier, Laurence (1907-89)

Actor and producer, knighted in 1947, and created a life peer in 1970. He established his reputation at the > Old Vic Theatre during the 1930s, especially with his performance of Hamlet in 1937. The range and success of his career on stage and in films mark him as the leading English actor of this century. In 1961 he was appointed director of the Chichester Festival Theatre and made the first director of the > National Theatre.

Bib: Gourlay, L. (ed.), Olivier; Olivier, L. Confessions of an Actor.

Olney Hymns (1779)

A collection of religious poems by the Rev. John Newton and > William Cowper, so called from the village of Olney where they lived.

Omai

Tahitian, brought to England with James Cook's second voyage in 1774, and shown around as the epitome of a 'noble savage' (> Primitivism), one of a series of such visitors including American Indians and Eskimos. His dignified bearing and conduct, as he moved in the highest English circles, were marvelled at and seemed to bear out theories of natural virtue, compared with the corruptions of civilization. A painting by ➤ Reynolds depicts him in a turban and flowing garment, standing erect, with his right hand outstretched, in the pose of a statesman or oriental prince. His visit is mentioned by several contemporaries, including ➤ Cowper, ➤ Johnson and ➤ Burney.

On Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History (1841)

Frequently abridged to On Heroes and Hero-Worship, this book by > Thomas Carlyle was cited by the liberal press of the time as evidence of his anti-democratic views. It is actually a study of the way in which the 'heroic' as a phenomenon evolves and changes throughout history. Originating as a series of lectures the book moves from the pagan god Odin through Italian poet Dante (1265-1321), religious leaders John Knox (1505-72) and Martin Luther (1483-1546), Scottish poet Robert Burns (1756-96), Critic Samuel Johnson (1709-84), thinker Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-78), the prophet Mahomet and others, ending with Napoleon Bonaparte (1769-1821), and discusses each man's ability to discern new truths which, for Carlyle, is characteristic of a true hero. True heroism is the ability to act on these 'truths', to modify them and to discover new ones that will supersede them. Carlyle's heroism therefore appears progressive in its capacity for perpetual renewal and in its Bib: Rosenberg, J.D., Carlyle and the Burden of History.

On Liberty (1859)

A political essay by ▷ John Stuart Mill, in which he discusses how far and in what ways the state is entitled to interfere with the liberty of individuals. He concludes that in general this interference should be restricted to the protection of other individuals, and of individuals collectively considered as society. Mill was mainly alarmed lest a new tyranny should arise from democratic majorities who might be indifferent to minority rights. The novelist ▷ Thomas Hardy numbered the essay among his 'cures for despair'.

Ondaatje, Michael (b 1943)

Novelist and poet, born in Sri Lanka (then Ceylon). At the age of eighteen he arrived in Canada, where he attended Bishop's University in Quebec, the University of Toronto and Queer's University, Kingston, Ontario. He taught at the University of Western Ontario (1967–71) and subsequently at York University in Toronto. His fiction has a strong element of technical experiment, combined with strong feeling and political concerns: Coming Through Slaughter (1976) uses a form of > faction, portraying the life of the jazz cornet player Buddy Bolden through a combination of narrative techniques, including transcripts of interviews, song lyrics, biographical summaries and subjective narration. Ondaatje has written a stage version of this novel. In the Skin of a Lion (1987) explores the lives of marginalized people in Canadian society using both mythic and metafictional devices. His most recent novel is: The English Patient (1992), which was joint winner of 1992's Booker Prize. His volumes of poetry include: The Dainty Monsters (1967); The Man With Seven Toes (1969); The Collected Works of Billy the Kid: Left Handed Poems (1970); Rat Felly (1973); Elimination Dance (1978); Secular Love (1984); The Cinnamon Peeler: Selected Poems (1989). He has also directed films and edited books of verse and stories. Running in the Family (1982) is autobiographical.

Bib: Solecki, S., (ed.), Spider Blues: Essays on Michael Ondaatje.

Onomatopoeia

The use of verbal sound to evoke the sound of what the word represents. Thus a cuckoo is a bird whose song resembles the two syllables of its name, which is therefore onomatopoeic.

Open and closed texts

➤ Closure; Readerly/Writerly

Open field system

That system of land use especially typical of medieval English agriculture. Land under cultivation was divided into strips, and distributed among the peasants of the village or manor. The strips were not surrounded by hedges or fences, so that good farmers suffered from the effects of the bad farming of their immediate neighbours. The system began to be replaced in the 16th century, when landowners preferred sheep-farming, and it was effectually abolished in the 18th century when, in the course of 'the agricultural revolution', the open fields were enclosed in larger arable units by the landlords.

> Enclosures.

Open University

The Open University was established in 1969, began teaching in 1971 and is now based at Milton Keynes. Its aim is to provide degree courses for those students who do not have formal qualifications, who are not of a standard, and who do not have the opportunity or the finance to enter for full-time university degrees. The courses are based at home and the teaching is done mainly through television and radio. Its popularity continues to increase.

Opera in England

Opera, in the sense of a staged drama in which the words and music are of equal importance, began in Italy at the end of the 16th century. It was an integral part of the ▶ Renaissance, arising out of the attempt to revive what were thought to be the performance practices of Greek drama. Subjects, therefore, were tragedies drawn from classical mythology and the words were set to a declamatory style of singing known as recitative. The first English opera was The Siege of Rhodes, with a libretto by ⊳ William D'Avenant and music (now lost) by Matthew Locke and others. It was first produced in 1642, at a time when the > Puritans had closed the theatres, and seems to have been an attempt to circumvent the ban on plays. The convention of recitative, however, does not seem to have been to the English taste, so that, apart from Blow's Venus and Adonis and ➤ Purcell's Dido and Aeneas, the main contribution of composers in the 17th century was in the genre now known as dramatic or semi-opera. After the theatres reopened in 1660, many plays were given with musical interludes, ▷ Shakespeare being adapted for this purpose by D'Avenant and Drvden. Two sets of ➤ Tempest music exist, one by Locke, the other sometimes thought to be by > Purcell. The Fairy Queen (1693), an adaptation of > A Midsummer Night's Dream, is Purcell's best-known work in this field.

In the 18th century Italian opera was imported, as well as the German composer, Handel, who wrote operas in the Italian style, but the fashion for such entertainment proved to be short-lived. ➤ Addison, amongst others, ridiculed the conventions of opera in the ➤ Spectator. Nor, despite its popularity at the time, did ➤ Gay's ➤ The Beggar's Opera (1728) lead to a significant tradition of ballad opera. The romantic operas that held the stage in the first half of the 19th century are, apart from Balfe's The Bohemian Girl, little known nowadays. More lasting fame, however, has attached to the comic operas written by ➤ Gilbert and Sullivan between 1875 and 1896.

Until the 20th century, London had a virtual monopoly of opera performances, the only touring company that lasted for any time being the Carl Rosa Opera Company. In recent years the establishment of regional companies who tour, as well as performing at their home base, has brought opera to a much wider public, although cuts in public subsidies are now threatening this expansion. Improved standards of production and a general policy of singing in English if possible have helped to make it a more popular art form. Two English composers in particular have enriched the repertoire: Benjamin Britten and Sir Michael Tippet. Britten tended to find inspiration in classic texts, as, for instance, in Deter Grimes (Decorge Crabbe), Billy Budd (Herman Melville), Decorge Crabbe), Billy Budd (Herman Melville), Decorge The Turn of the Screw (Decorge Henry James), A Midsummer Night's Dream (Decorge Shakespeare), Death in Venice (Thomas Mann), whereas Tippett writes his own, very individual, libretti. Of the younger composers, Harrison Birtwhistle has contributed a variety of dramatic pieces (including Punch and Judy, Down by the Greenwood Side, The Mask of Orpheus and Yan Tan Tethera) which are largely concerned with re-working myth, whilst Peter Maxwell Davies has written several chamber and children's operas, as well as the large-scale Taverner and Resurrection.

Opie, Amelia (1759-1853)

Novelist and poet. Opie began to participate in London society in 1794 and she soon became acquainted with and admired by the most radical members of the literary groups, in particular, ➤ Elizabeth Inchbald, ➤ William Godwin and ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft (whom Opie depicts in her novel, Adeline Mowbray, or The Mother and Daughter, 1804). Her other novels include, The Father and Daughter (1801), Valentine's Eve (1816) and Madelaine (1822); they are all sentimental novels set in unremarkable domestic circumstances and fully corroborate her own stated purpose in writing novels: 'I like to make people cry, indeed, if I do not do it, all my readers are disappointed'. Her ceaseless literary outpouring is of questionable quality, and this led to her being ⊳ satirized as Miss Poppyseed by ▶ Peacock in his novel Headlong Hall. She married the painter John Opie in 1798 (her maiden name was Alderson), but at his death in 1807 moved to Norwich where, in 1825, she became a Quaker, devoting herself to spiritual writing, e.g. Lays for the Dead (1833). Bib: James, A. H., Best Sellers of Jane Austen's Age; Menzies, J., Wilson and Lloyd, H., Amelia: The Tale of a Plain Friend.

Orange, House of; Orange Free State; Orangemen

The town of Orange in southern France was originally an independent principality. Philibert of Orange (1502-30) was rewarded by the Emperor Charles V (who ruled the Netherlands amongst his other territories) with large estates in the Netherlands for his help in statesmanship and war. The Princes of Orange thus became Dutch nobles, and later William 'the Silent' of Orange established the Dutch (Netherlands) Republic by defeating the armies of the territory's former ruler, Philip II of Spain. William's leadership, and the importance of the Orange family in the Netherlands, gave the House of Orange special eminence in the Republic, and successive members of it held the high office of Stadtholder. They twice married into the > Stuart family reigning in Britain: William II married Mary, daughter of > Charles I, and in 1677 their son, ▷ William III, married Mary (▷ Mary II), daughter of ▷ James II. William and Mary became joint sovereigns of Britain in 1689 after the expulsion of James II. After William III's death in 1702, the family continued to be pre-eminent in Dutch politics, and were kings of Holland (the Netherlands) from 1814. In the same year the Dutch colony in South Africa was ceded to Britain; in 1836 some of the Dutch colonists, fleeing from British sovereignty, set up the Orange Free State Republic to the north of the colony.

Throughout the 17th century the House of Orange was a champion of ⊳ Protestantism against the > Catholic powers, first of Spain and then of France; the religious conflict was also a fight for Dutch national survival, and from 1690-1700 it was in addition one for the survival of the British system of politics. The issue was then felt most keenly in > Ireland, where the northern province of Ulster was Protestant, and the southern three provinces were Catholic. Religious hostility between the north and the south continued throughout the 18th century, when it died down in most of Europe, and it is still a political issue at the present day. In 1795 'Orange Societies' were founded in Ulster, in memory of the great Protestant king William III, who had saved Ulster from being overrun by the Catholic south by defeating James II's army at the Battle of the Boyne (1690). Orangemen (ie members of these societies) are still an important political force in Northern Ireland, although the societies are nominally religious and not political.

Ordeal of Richard Feverel, The (1859) A novel by ➤ George Meredith. Sir Austin Feverel prides himself on the 'system' which he has devised for the upbringing and education of his motherless son, Richard; he is, however, a self-satisfied egotist who lacks disinterested understanding of his son's character. The 'system' breaks down in Richard's adolescence, when the boy falls in love with Lucy Desborough, a girl of lower social background than Sir Austin's ideal for his son's bride. They are secretly married but Sir Austin manages to separate them by egotistically exploiting Richard's love for him. Richard becomes involved with a beautiful woman of loose morals; he begins this new relationship with characteristically romantic and idealistic motives of redeeming her but he partly falls under her spell. Lord Mountfalcon, who is interested in permanently separating Lucy and Richard, is chiefly responsible for Richard's betrayal of her, and in remorse for his infidelity Richard fights a duel with him and is wounded. Lucy has meanwhile become reconciled with Sir Austin but the shock of the duel kills her. The novel - Meredith's first important one - exemplifies his combination of romantic intensity with psychological analysis.

Order

One of the five categories in which \triangleright Genette analyses narrative discourse, order is concerned with the relationship between the chronological order of fictional events and their order in the narrative (eg 'flashbacks'). Order, \triangleright duration and \triangleright frequency are matters of temporal arrangement or 'tense'; the other two categories are \triangleright mood and \triangleright voice.

➤ Narratology.

Orfeo, Sir

An early Middle English narrative, dating from the 13th century, which claims to be a reworking of a lay composed by British harpers (▷ Breton Lays). In Sir Orfeo, the classical story of ➤ Orpheus and Euridice is translated into a feudal/chivalric Celtic world in which Orfeo is a former British king whose court is at Winchester (which, the narrator explains, was formerly called Thrace). The Underworld of the classical story becomes an Otherworld, presided over by the King of the Fairies. Heurodis is eventually rescued by Orfeo, who enters the Otherworld disguised as a minstrel, and after an absence of many years from their kingdom, the couple return and resume their positions as king and queen. Bib: Barron, W. R. J., Medieval English Romance.

Organicism

A social theory entertained by a number of writers, especially in the 10th and early 20th centuries. Organicist theories picture society as developing like a natural organism in which each part is integrated functionally with the rest to compose the whole. As such, organic theories stress the mutual dependency of the various parts of society (for example rich and poor), but they can also have a conservative colouring because they imply that whatever is is natural and right, including inequalities. As such, organicist theories are often criticized by ⊳ Marxist critics (eg Terry Eagleton, Criticism and Ideology). Organicist theories were popular among conservatives during and after the > French Revolution (> Edmund Burke was a key thinker) but, as the argument developed, evolutionary theory complicated and enriched the picture, as in the work of > George Eliot. Radical organicists, such as > D. H. Lawrence, took the argument still further. For them, the individual is natural and healthy, but society and the state are unnatural and corrupting. Such thinkers opt instead for an organic primitivism, finding positives only in pre-industrial cultures. In literature there is also the important notion of organic > form developed by > S. T. Coleridge. Here it is argued that literary works are at their best when they grow like natural organisms following the flow of emotion and idea. This was a key idea of the ▶ Romantic movement.

Orgoglio

A character representing Arrogance in ➤ Edmund Spenser's ➤ Faerie Queene. He occurs in Book I. cantos vii and viii; he captures the ➤ Red Cross Knight and is slain by Prince Arthur (➤ Arthur, King). The name derives from the Italian for pride.

Oriana

A name sometimes used for ▷ Elizabeth I by Elizabethan poets. It comes from the 15th-century Spanish-Portuguese romance Amadis de Gaula, in which Oriana is a British princess beloved by the hero, Amadis.

> Spanish influence on English literature.

Orientalism

Narratives of the East, in verse and prose, were immensely popular in the 18th and 19th centuries, ranging in style and theme from the dry analytical wit of Samuel Johnson's Rasselas (1759) to the galloping romance of > Byron's 'Turkish Tales', > The Giaour (1813) or > The Corsair (1814). With their interest in lust, slavery, abduction and the exotic, the latter had a huge popular appeal related in part to the image of Lord Byron himself, variously portrayed in oils as rapaciously and broodingly > Gothic, or got up to fight in Albanian costume. That such hectic and flashy adventure-poetry says more about the > Romantic libido than about any real Oriental place seems to be confirmed by Captain Benwick in ➤ Jane Austen's novel > Persuasion (1818), whose interest in the starcrossed and storm-tossed leads Anne Elliot to remark, 'that she thought it was the misfortune of poetry, to be seldom safely enjoyed by those who enjoyed it completely'.

Less self-mythologizing than Byron, > Southey in The Curse of Kehama (1810), and ➤ Moore in Lalla Rookh (1817) make forays into similar territory, while in a more complex and indirect way > Coleridge's > Kubla Khan (1797) shows that the poetic associations of Oriental imagery might be paradisal and delicate, and not wholly to do with despotism and wildness. Many of the hallucinations and dream-visions recorded in ➤ Thomas De Quincey's > Confessions of an English Opium-Eater (1822) involve the Oriental, and the author's drug-induced conflation of different periods and cultures may typify a general British reaction to the non-occidental world as there to be pillaged for its images, whether by artists, explorers, or more obvious agents of imperialism. The drug makes De Quincey temporary victim, rather than oppressor: 'I fled from the wrath of Brama through all the forests of Asia: Vishnu hated me: Seeva laid wait for me. I came suddenly upon Isis and Osiris: I had done a deed, they said, which the ibis and the crocodile trembled at.'

Despised for its illiberal forms of government, explored and exploited, the Orient fell victim to a garish literary tradition, stretching from ▶ Beckford's Vathek (1786) to Sax Rohmer's devilish criminal genius, Dr Fu Manchu. Yet to Western eyes it remained the geographical and racial expression of what is Other; desirable, Edenic, malleable by the individual imagination. Bib: Barrell, J., The Infection of Thomas de Quincey: the Psycopathology of Imperialism; Said, E., Orientalism.

Origin of Species, The ➤ Darwin, Charles.

Orinda', The 'Matchless
➤ Philips, Katherine.

Orlando (1928)

A fantasy by ➤ Virginia Woolf in which the evolution of poetic genius is traced through the Sackville family and their country mansion of Knole from Thomas Sackville (1536-1608) to the poet Victoria Sackville-West (1892-1962). This is done through an immortal character Orlando, who changes sex from a man into a woman in the 17th century, after growing to male adulthood in Elizabethan times. She then discovers that life as a woman in the 18th and 10th centuries offers different and limited freedoms. The book is a parodic combination of historical novel and biographical fantasy which explores the themes of androgyny and women's creativity. It is thus perhaps the closest Woolf gets in her fiction to an exploration of the ideas she outlines in A Room of One's Own (1931) and Three Guineas (1938).

Orlando

The Italian form of the name Roland, hero of the Old French Chanson de Roland (Song of Roland). From the Italian 16th-century romantic epics by ▷ Ariosto, the name passed into English romance narratives, being used, for example, for the hero of ▷ Shakespeare's romantic drama ▷ As You Like It.

Orlando Furioso (1532)

A romance epic by the Italian poet

> Ludovico Ariosto. It is in the tradition of Italian developments of the legends centring on the French hero Roland, who in the reign of > Charlemagne (768-814) repelled the Muslim invasion of Europe. Ariosto invents fantastic episodes and complicated romantic intrigues and adventures. Orlando goes mad because his lady, Angelica, marries a Moorish youth, but he is cured in time to defeat Agramante, king of Africa, who has been besieging Paris. Many linked tales and episodes accompany this central theme, as is usual in the 16th-century romantic > epic, of which Ariosto is the master and > Edmund Spenser (> The Faerie Queene) one of his chief emulators.

Ormond, John (1923-90)

Poet and film-maker, born at Dunvant near Swansea, Ormond, though he read English and philosophy at University College, Swansea, nevertheless retained his early interest in painting throughout his life, his painterly eye influencing both his poetry and his film-making. Friendships with Dylan Thomas and Vernon Watkins drew him into poetry, his early work Indications (1943) being strongly influenced by the former. He joined the London staff of Picture Post in 1945 before returning to Swansea and eventually becoming a director and producer of documentary films for BBC Wales in 1957. His major poetry collections appeared much later after slow gestation and careful revision. These were Requiem and Celebration (1969), Definition of a Waterfall (1973), with a further selection of his work in Penguin Modern Poets 27 (1978) before additional new poems appeared in his Selected Poems (1987) which brought all his finest work together. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales; Jones, G. and Rowlands, J., Profiles.

Oroonoko, Or, The Royal Slave (1688) Novel by ➤ Aphra Behn. Oroonoko is an African prince, sold into slavery and transported to Surinam. He is separated from his beloved wife, Imoinda, who undergoes a similar fate to his own: they are re-united in Surinam. The novel is in two parts: the first tells of their lives at the court of Coromantien (now Nigeria), where Oroonoko clashes with his lustful grandfather the king, who wants Imoinda for himself, before they are parted and each one is sold to slavetraders. The second part tells of their meeting in Surinam, where Oroonoko has been given the name Caesar, of the abortive slave uprising which he leads, and of their eventual deaths. The novel is part romance, part exotic travel tale, part polemic, with a wealth of critical commentary about the hypocrisy and treachery of the white man, and his practice of Christianity, and of the corruption of colonial government - a theme Behn returned to in her play, The Widow Ranter, Or, Bacon's Rebellion in Virginia (1696). Oroonoko and Imoinda are 'noble savages' (> primitive, primitivism), whose virtue and beauty are extolled as being far superior to the qualities of the white people around them, and their sufferings are portrayed very movingly.

On the other hand, the argument is not against slavery as such, but against the presumptious and cruel treatment of the high-born by their social and moral inferiors. The novel is told by a first-person narrator, ostensibly Behn herself, who claimed to have witnessed the events in Surinam. For many years this was taken as an invention, with descriptive details about the colony being cribbed from other works. But recent scholarship accepts that Behn lived in Surinam, and based much of her narration on first-hand experience.

➤ Thomas Southerne's play Oroonoko (1695) is based on Behn's novel. Bib: Duffy, M., (ed.), Oroonoko and Other Stories,

Orphans

In mid-Victorian fiction, orphans frequently appear as central characters. In an age when the reading public responded to sentiment, the representation of orphans was sometimes used by writers as a catalyst for pathos. This was often the case with > Elizabeth Gaskell, for example, whose novel \triangleright Ruth creates sympathy for the > 'fallen woman' by stressing initially the heroine's lack of parental guidance. Alternatively the effects of disinheritance and exclusion were illustrated through an orphan, as > Emily Brontë demonstrates with Heathcliff in > Wuthering Heights. Authors seeking to challenge the conventions of society often created orphaned central characters in order to speak from a marginalized position, to view society from 'outside'. The heroine of > Charlotte Brontë's > 7ane Eyre is an example, although Jane, like many other fictional orphans, eventually discovers familial connections and financial support, thereby gaining both security and power. The necessary independence of orphans could also give rise to the theme of individualism and self-help which ran through the literature of the age, registering an unacknowledged complicity with the values of the middle classes. This paradoxical position is exemplified by the heroine of ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning's > Aurora Leigh, who both resists as a woman the constraints imposed upon her by society and simultaneously advocates the conservative ideology that has oppressed her.

> Professor, The.

Orton, Joe (1933-67)

British dramatist renowned for his black humour, witty and savage verbal dialogue in the tradition of Doscar Wilde, and iconoclastic attacks on social conventions. He was murdered by his homosexual partner when his career had barely begun. His first play, Entertaining Mr Sloane (1964), is a comedy about suburban sex. In this, as in his other plays, much of the humour is derived from the disparity between what characters say and what they actually mean or do. This was followed by two farces, Loot (1966) and What the Butler Saw (produced in 1969); the former about money, death and police corruption and the latter about sex and institutionalized corruption. Other plays are: The Ruffian on the Stair (staged 1966), The Erpingham Camp (staged 1967) and Funeral Games (staged 1970). In 1987 Stephen Frears directed a film adaptation (by Alan Bennett) of Lahr's biography of Orton, Prick Up Your Ears. Bib: Bigsby, C. W. W., Joe Orton; Lahr, J., Prick Up Your Ears; Shepherd, S., Because We're Queers.

Orwell, George (pseudonym of Eric Blair) (1903-50)

Novelist, journalist and critic. Born into a poor but proud middle-class family, he was sent to a private school, from where he won a scholarship to Eton. His snobbish upbringing, and the uneasiness he felt in living with boys richer than himself, gave him a distaste for middleclass values and, in relation to the working classes, a sense of guilt which was intensified by the large unemployment of the 1930s. He served in the Burma Police (1922-7), and then resigned from dislike of what he interpreted as ⊳ imperialist oppression – Burmese Days (1934). He then tried to appease his sense of social guilt by living for 18 months in the utmost destitution - Down and Out in London and Paris (1933). At the height of the economic > depression in the 1930s, he was commissioned by a left-wing publisher, Gollancz, to make a personal investigation of conditions in the north of England - The Road to Wigan Pier (1937). By the time of its publication, Orwell was fighting for the Republicans in Spain, where he was wounded in the throat - Homage to Catalonia (1938). He came to regard himself as an independent and democratic socialist. During World War II, he was rejected for the army on medical grounds, and worked for the Indian service of the B.B.C. In 1945 he published his masterpiece, the fable Animal Farm a satire on Stalinism. After the war he wrote his most famous work, 1984 (1949), a vision of a world ruled by dictatorships of the Stalinist style, taken to an extreme in which private life and private thought are all but eradicated by surveillance, propaganda, and the systematic perversion of language.

His other novels are: A Clergyman's Daughter (1935); Keep the Aspidistra Flying (1936); Coming Up For Air (1939). Among his best works are his social and literary critical essays: Inside the Whale (1940); The Lion and the Unicorn (1941 – subtitled Socialism and the English Genius); Critical Essays (1946); Shooting an Elephant (1950). Recurrent themes in his work are the effect of poverty on the spirit, the difficulty of reconciling public demands with private desires and conscience, and the danger of corrupted language. He was literary editor of Tribune 1943–5. His Collected Essays, Journalism and Letters were published in 1968 (ed. S. Orwell and I. Angus).

Bib: Woodcock, G., The Crystal Spirit; Williams, R., Ormell; Crick, B., George Ormell, a Life; Meyers, J., George Ormell: The Critical Heritage.

Osborne, Dorothy (1627-95)

Wife of ➤ Sir William Temple, statesman, diplomatist and author. Their marriage was delayed for seven years owing to the disapproval of her family, and her letters to him during a part of this time are famous social documents.

Osborne, John (1929-94)

Dramatist. He is widely thought of as the leader of the dramatic revival which started in the 1950s, through the great popular success of $\triangleright Look$ Back in Anger (1956), which found an infectious contemporary idiom for the frustration of the younger British generation since World War II, and for their rejection of the traditional values of 'the Establishment'. The play gave currency for a decade to the term > 'the angry young men'. His later plays include: The Entertainer (1957); Epitaph for George Dillon (1958); The World of Paul Slickey (1959); Luther (1961); The Blood of the Bambergs (1962); Under Plain Cover (1962); Inadmissible Evidence (1965); A Patriot for Me (1965); A Bond Honoured (1966); Time Present (1967); West of Suez (1972); A Sense of Detachment (1972); A Place Calling Itself Detachment (1972); The Picture of Dorian Gray (1973); Watch It Come Down (1975); The End of Me Old Cigar (1975); Déjà vu, a sequel to Anger (1992). For television: A Better Class of Person (1985); God Rot Tunbridge Wells (1985). Osborne published two volumes of autobiography: A Better Class of Person (1981) and Almost a Gentleman (1991). Bib: Allsop, K., The Angry Decade; Banham, M. Osborne; Trussler, S., The Plays of Osborne.

Osmond, Gilbert

A principal character in ➤ Henry James' novel, Portrait of a Lady; he is a poor, expatriate American dilettante living in Italy and secures in marriage the rich young heroine, Isabel Archer, whose life he then ruins by his moral triviality and cold-heartedness.

Ossian

James Macpherson (1736–96) was the author of a series of blank verse epics which he attributed to Ossian, son of Finn, and which he claimed to have translated from the Gaelic. There was considerable interest in ▷ primitivism in the 1760s, and works such as Fingal, an Ancient Epic Poem in Six Books (1762) and Temora (1763) caused a great sensation, particularly among patriotic Scots. Ossian's fame also spread to the European continent, where the poetry was read with enthusiasm by ▷ Napoleon I, and quoted by > Goethe in The Sorrows of Young Werther. > Samuel Johnson was among the earliest sceptics; when asked whether he thought any man 'of the modern age' could have written the poems, he replied: 'Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children.' Following Macpherson's death, an investigating committee concluded that the poetry was a collage of edited and newly-written material. Despite this exposure, > Matthew Arnold defended the poetry as late as 1866 for its 'vein of piercing regret and sadness'. In the ancient legends Oisin (Ossian) bridged the gap between the heroic pagan age and Irish Christianity; his longevity was due to an extended residence in Fairyland.

Othello (1604)

A ➤ tragedy by ➤ Shakespeare, first acted in 1604. It was based on an Italian tale in Hecatommithi by Giraldi Cinthio (1565; translated into French 1584).

The full title of the play is Othello, the Moor of Venice: the extended title emphasizes Othello's position as commander of Venetian forces against the Turks and his race, both clues to the understanding of his tragedy. Othello is highly valued by the Venetians for his military prowess, but he is not a member of Venetian society; he is first and last a soldier, a member of a military community, trusting and trusted by his brother officers. Consequently it is as astonishing to him when Desdemona, a conventional Venetian aristocratic girl, leaves her home to marry him, as it is outrageous to her indignant father, Brabantio. Venice urgently needs Othello to defend Cyprus against the Turks, so Brabantio is forced to accept the match; however he warns Othello that a girl who has behaved so unpredictably once may prove as unreliable a wife as she has been a daughter. Othello is in rapture; his bliss is the greater for its incredibility, so that he naïvely imagines himself transported into a heaven on earth. But his junior officer, Iago, has motives of resentment against him; the most concrete of these is that the Florentine, Cassio, has been promoted over his head. Moreover, he is himself a cynic who has a low opinion of human nature and of the scope for genuine happiness. Partly as a double revenge against Othello and Cassio, partly as a cynical game the object of which is to bring Othello down to his own level of reality, he contrives first to disgrace Cassio temporarily, and then to insinuate into Othello's mind the suspicion, mounting by degrees to certainty, that Cassio and Desdemona are conducting a secret love affair. In Othello's mind the circumstances make this affair more than plausible: he has the habit of trusting Iago as his confidential officer; Desdemona has come to him out of a foreign society; Cassio is the sort of man who would have been considered an eligible husband for her. Until their marriage, Othello had had a single-minded dedication to his military vocation. The marriage has enriched this dedication, since it was Desdemona's admiration for him as a soldier that attracted her to him, but he now finds that his jealousy has divided his single-mindedness and is destroying his integrity. Accordingly he murders her, in the belief that heavenly justice is on his side. Desdemona, however, has been presented as one of the most innocent of all Shakespeare's heroines, for whom adultery is unimaginable, and her innocent goodness has won the heart of her lady companion, Emilia, who is Iago's wife. Emilia, who has been ignorant of Iago's plot but has unintentionally assisted him in it, realizes his guilt and publicly exposes him; Othello, restored to his dignity, makes a final speech of self-assessment, and kills himself.

Othello follows > Hamlet in the sequence of Shakespeare's tragedies and is another masterpiece in the tradition of > revenge tragedy. It is psychologically much more lucid, though perhaps not a more sophisticated play, than Hamlet, and is one of the most eloquent of Shakespeare's dramas.

Ottava rima

An Italian stanza of 8 lines rhyming $a\ b\ a\ b\ a$ $b\ c\ c$. It was used by \triangleright Boccaccio in the 14th century. Pulci in the 15th century used it for the mock-heroic, ironic style with which the stanza is chiefly associated in English through \triangleright Byron's \triangleright Don Juan and his Vision of Judgement. In Don Juan, the form is frequently exploited for the possibilities it allows for playing off long syntactical units against the bathos (\triangleright Figures of speech) of the closing couplet:

What is the end of fame? 'tis but to fill A certain portion of uncertain paper:

Some liken it to climbing up a hill,
Whose summit, like all hills, is lost in vapour;
For this men write, speak, preach, and heroes kill,
And bards burn what they call their
'midnight taper',
To have, when the original is dust,
A name, a wretched picture, and worse bust.
(Canto I, CCXVIII)

Otterbourne, The Battle of A famous medieval > ballad

A famous medieval ▷ ballad about a battle fought in 1388 between the English and the Scots near the English castle of that name. The English commander was ▷ Henry Hotspur, Lord Percy, and the Scottish one, James Earl of Douglas. The ▷ Percy family and the Douglases were the chief rival familes on either side of the Scottish-English border in the later Middle Ages. The battle was a Scottish victory but Douglas was killed; Hotspur was taken prisoner. Another version of the battle is the ballad ▶ Chevy Chase.

The Hotspur of the ballad is the same as the character in ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Henry IV, Part I; the Douglas in that play is another member of that family, whom Hotspur had just taken prisoner in the battle of Homildon Hill (1402).

Otway, Thomas (1652-85)

Dramatist and poet. He made a single attempt as an actor, when ▷ Aphra Behn gave him an opportunity as the old King in her The Forc'd Marriage (1670). Paralysed with stage fright, he broke down, and the next night the part had to be given to another actor. Otway turned instead to writing, and had immediate success with his tragedy, Alcibiades (1675), in which ▷ Elizabeth Barry made her first appearance. Otway is said to have fallen in love with her at that time, though she did not reciprocate his feelings. Otway nevertheless wrote several of his finest parts for her.

Otway followed his first play with the rhymed tragedy Don Carlos (1676); adaptations of a comedy by ▷ Molière as The Cheats of Scapin (1676) and ▷ Racine's tragedy Titus and Berenice (1677); and another comedy, Friendship in Fashion (1678). In 1678 Otway went to Flanders as a soldier, and drew on his experiences for ▷ The Soldier's Fortune (1681) and its sequel, ▷ The Atheist (1684). His best-known and most admired plays are two blank-verse tragedies, The Orphan; Or, The Unhappy Marriage (1680), and ▷ Venice Preserv'd; Or A Plot Discovered (1682). Otway also wrote prologues and epilogues, and a few poems. He died in poverty.

Bib: Taylor, A. M., Next to Shakespeare; Ham, R. G., Otway and Lee; Summers, M. (ed.), The Complete Works of Thomas Otway; Ghosh, J. C. (ed.), The Complete Works of Thomas Otway.

Ouida (1839-1908)

The pseudonym of Marie Louise de la Ramée, 'Ouida' originates in a childish failure to say 'Louise'. She was born in Bury St Edmunds of an English mother and French father, was educated in local schools and then in Paris, where her father disappeared during the Paris Commune of 1871. From 1860 she lived mostly in Italy, an expensive and affected life with dogs and frequent hopeless infatuations. She had a high opinion of her own genius, writing 45 novels of an unreal fashionable world, rebelling against the moral tone of contemporary literature. Her powerful novels were very popular for a time, despite their extravagance and inaccuracies, and her ridiculous portrayals of men. However, she became less popular from 1890 and ultimately died in destitution in Viareggio. Her stories appeared in Bentley's Miscellany 1859-60. Her first success was Held in Bondage (1863) but Strathmore (1865) really established her reputation. Her other novels include Under Two Flags (1867), Folle-Farine (1871), Two Little Wooden Shoes (1874), A Village Commune (1881) dealing with peasant life, In Maremma (1882) and the animal stories, A Dog of Flanders (1872) and Bimbi, Stories for Children (1882).

Bib: Ffrench, Y., Ouida: A Study in Ostentation; Bigland, E., Ouida: The Passionate Victorian; Stirling, M., The Fine and the Wicked: The Life and Times of Ouida.

Our Mutual Friend (1864-5)

The last complete novel by ➤ Charles Dickens, published serially 1864-5. The principal plot starts from the will of a deceased refuse-collector, Old Harmon, who bequeaths his fortune to his son, John Harmon, on condition that he marries a certain girl, Bella Wilfer. Young Harmon wishes to discover what she is like before he discloses himself. He intends to adopt a disguise but his identity is obscured beyond his intention when circumstances point to his death by murder. Since he is believed dead, the father's property goes instead to Mr Boffin, old Harmon's foreman. Boffin adopts Bella, and young Harmon, disguising himself as John Rokesmith, becomes engaged as Boffin's secretary. Bella becomes spoilt by wealth and contemptuously rejects Rokesmith-Harmon as a lover; she is, however, reformed by Boffin, who pretends himself to undergo complete debasement of character through his accession of wealth and thus gives Bella, who has been devoted to him, a violent distaste for the evils of money. Rokesmith's true identity as young Harmon is at length brought to light. With this main plot goes a minor story of Silas Wegg's attempt to blackmail Boffin. In addition there is a parallel main plot concerning the rival lovers of Lizzie Hexam, daughter of a Thames boatman; one of her lovers is the aristocratic young barrister, Eugene Wrayburn, and the other the embittered schoolmaster of low social origins, Bradley Headstone. Headstone tries to murder Wrayburn and nearly succeeds, but he is drowned in a struggle with Rogue Riderhood, another waterman who is also a blackmailer. Wrayburn, physically wrecked, marries Lizzie for whom he at last comes to have a real need. The two main plots are linked through the waterside characters who are connected with young Harmon's supposed murder at the beginning of the book. The novel extends through the Wrayburn-Lizzie story into upper-middle-class circles which include the arrogant Podsnaps, the Veneerings who attempt to climb into wealthy society and fall out of it again, the fraudulent social adventurers Mr and Mrs Lammle, the mean and ruthless financier Fledgeby. Through Fledgeby on the one side and Lizzie on the other, the lower social circles include Riah, the benevolent Jew, and Jenny Wren, the bittersweet doll's dressmaker. The book is thus given an unusually wide variety of character and social environment, even for Dickens, and it is pervaded by a rich symbolism arising from the use made of the River Thames and the dust-heaps out of which the Harmon fortunes have been made. The motive of special social reform, more characteristic of early Dickens (eg > Oliver Tmist, 1838) is evident in the episode of Betty Higden, the poor woman who dies by the roadside sooner than enter a workhouse.

Overbury, Sir Thomas (1581–1613)
Essayist and poet; as a writer he is chiefly remembered as the author of one of the most widely read collections of 'Theophrastian' character sketches (▷ Characters, Theophrastian), published in 1614. ▷ John Webster, ▷ Thomas Dekker, ▷ John Donne, ▷ Cecily Bulstrode, ▷ Lady Frances Southwell and others made additions to subsequent issues of the collection between 1614 and 1622.

Overbury was also the victim of one of the most sensational murders in English history. He tried to oppose a love intrigue between > James I's royal favourite, Thomas Carr, Earl of Somerset, and the young Countess of Essex. The lovers conspired to have Overbury poisoned; the crime came to light, and the prosecution was conducted by > Francis Bacon. Carr and the Countess were convicted and disgraced, but their agents who actually administered the poison were hanged.

Overton, Richard (fl. 1631-64)

Religious prose writer. Little is known for certain about Overton, but it is probable that he was the son of a clergyman, joined a > Baptist community in the Netherlands in 1615-6 and matriculated from Cambridge in 1631. During the early 1640s he wrote a number of tracts against ➤ Laud, ➤ Catholicism and monopolies, following these with six anti-Presbyterian (> Presbyterianism) tracts and works supporting the > Levellers. His most well-known work is Mans Mortalitie (1644) which argues that the soul is not immortal between death and resurrection (> Hobbes and ➤ Milton also argue this). Overton's tone is a combination of satire and parody and links him closely in style to > Martin Marprelate. Bib: Pooley, R., English Prose of the Seventeenth Century, 1590-1700.

Ovid (Publius Ovidius Naso) (43 BC – AD 17) Roman poet, and the last of the greatest period of Latin poetry, the Augustan Age. He wrote for the sophisticated and elegant society of the capital of the Empire, but the immorality of his Ars Amatoria ('Art of Love') offended the Emperor > Augustus who (for this and some other more mysterious offence) exiled him to the Black Sea about AD 9. The works by which Ovid is principally known are: the Amores, love poems in what is called the 'elegiac' couplet; the Ars Amatoria; the Remedia Amoris, in which he tries to redeem himself for the offence he caused by the Ars Amatoria; the Heroides, in which he makes the heroines of myth give tongue to their misfortunes; the \triangleright Metamorphoses, a collection of tales about miraculous transformation of shape; the Fasti, a poetic account of the Roman calendar; and the Tristia, verse epistles lamenting his exile.

Ovid was one of the most read and influential poets in later centuries, in England this is especially true from the 16th to 18th centuries. his most popular work was the Metamorphoses; these were repeatedly imitated and translated, memorably by ⊳ Golding in the 16th century and by Sandys and Dryden in the 17th. > Shakespeare was called in 1598 'the English Ovid' because the source of his Venus and Adonis was the Metamorphoses and that of The Rape of Lucrece was the Fasti; moreover the quality of these two poems was felt to be Ovidian. > Marlowe translated Ovid's love elegies, and the freedom and vigour of his kind of love poem influenced > Donne in his Elegies. As early as the 14th century ▷ Chaucer got the tales in his > Legend of Good Women from the Heroides, and these poems set a tradition in 'Heroic Epistles' which began with > Drayton in the early 17th century and culminated in > Pope's Eloisa to Abelard. Ovid's influence is traceable repeatedly in the work of > Spenser and touched ➤ Milton. Thus he may be said to have affected, either in subject matter or in style, almost all the major poets from Chaucer to Pope, and his influence was equally extensive among lesser figures. The influence was not always deep, however, and it can be ascribed partly to his being the liveliest and most beguiling of the Roman poets who were regarded as the basis of a cultured understanding of literature.

▷ Elegy; Latin literature.

Owen, Robert (1771-1858)

Social reformer, and a leading socialist thinker in the early 19th century. He became part-owner of the New Lanark Cotton Mills in 1800, and found that its workers were living in the degraded and nearly desperate conditions common in the earlier phase of the ➤ Industrial Revolution. He set about improving their housing and working conditions, and established infant schools. His reforms were a success, but his expenditure on them caused resentment among his partners, and in 1813 he established a new firm, with > Ieremy Bentham as one of his partners. In the same year he published a volume of essays, A New View of Society, in which he sought to prove that the human character is entirely created by its environment. In 1817, in a report to the House of Commons, Owen pointed out that the existing social misery was caused by men competing unsuccessfully with machines, and he recommended the establishment of socialist working communities in the country; they were to vary from 500 to 3,000 in size, and were to be partly industrial. His views were received favourably by, among other people, the Duke of Kent, the father of Queen Victoria, but Owen spoilt his case with public opinion in general by mixing his proposals with anti-religious propaganda. Nonetheless two experiments were attempted in 1825, one in England and one in America; both failed in under two years. Owen now became the leader of a socialistsecular movement, through which he sought to replace the emphasis on political reform by emphasis on economic action. His influence led to the Grand National Consolidated Trades Union in 1833, but this also failed owing to bad organization. The word 'socialism' originated through discussions centred on the Association of all Classes of all Nations, which Owen founded in 1835. The only permanent success among Owen's experiments was his establishment of the Co-operative Movement, which nowadays is affiliated to the Labour Party.

Owen, Wilfred (1893-1918)

The best known of the so-called 'War poets' of World War I: Poems (1920). He served as an infantry officer, was awarded a decoration for bravery, and was killed a week before the armistice. Before the war he was already writing mildly sensuous poetry influenced by John Keats; for some time during the war he continued to write in this late-Romantic tradition. But he then adapted his technique so as to express the intensity of the suffering of the Western Front, deliberately introducing elements of discordance and harshness into his style especially by the use of 'para-rhyme', ie the repetition of consonants but changing the vowels, as in the words 'hall'-'hell'. The best known of his poems is Strange Meeting - a dream about an encounter with an enemy soldier who is, humanly, a friend, in surroundings which are both those of the war and of hell. Owen's poems were used by the composer Benjamin Britten in one of his major musical compositions, War Requiem.

➤ War poets.

Bib: Owen, H., Life; critical study by D. S. R. Welland; Hibberd, D., Owen the Poet.

Owl and the Nightingale, The

A Middle English anonymous debate poem, dating from the early 13th century. It is a sparkling, highly sophisticated piece in which the two birds take opposing views first on their respective arts of song-making, but then on a wide range of religious and moral issues. The natural song-making ability of the birds is used to represent the clash between different kinds of lyrical literary traditions; indeed the question of whether literature should be used as a medium of entertainment or instruction becomes part of the grounds of their quarrel. The author makes full use of the range of shifting symbolic and figural associations of owls and nightingales, and plays with the possibilities of their anthropomorphic and naturalistic representation. Neither of the two birds is a wholly positive or negative figure, neither is clearly right or wrong, though generally the nightingale takes the lighter role whereas the owl espouses a more solemn stance. Their dispute is not resolved: the narrative concludes with their departure to seek judgement from one Master Nicholas of Guildford. Bib: Stanley, E. G. (ed.), The Owl and the Nightingale.

Oxford Movement (Tractarian Movement) A religious movement within the > Church of England; it had its origin and main centre in Oxford and ran from 1833, when it began with a sermon by Keble until 1845 when its most eloquent leader, > John Newman, entered the Roman Catholic Church. Some of the leaders of the Church of England realized (especially after the Act of Catholic Emancipation, 1829) that the Church was by its constitution largely at the mercy of the state, and was in danger of becoming in essentials a department of the state. The Oxford Movement preached that the Church had its independent, spiritual status, was in direct descent from the medieval Catholic Church, and represented a 'middle way' between post-Reformation Catholicism and > Protestantism. The movement's propaganda was conducted through > tracts, many of them by John Newman, and culminated in Tract XC which asserted that the Thirty-Nine Articles, on which Anglican doctrine is based, are compatible with Roman Catholic doctrine. The tracts divided Anglican opinion severely, and Newman's secession to the Church of Rome, followed by the secession of other High Anglican clergy, brought the movement into discredit with the majority of Anglican opinion. Edward Pusey, Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, was the leader of the Oxford Movement, which was in consequence often called Pusevite. An indirect result of the movement was to focus attention on the medieval background of the Church, and to encourage that reification of the Middle Ages which emerged in much victorian literature, in the artistic movement known as Pre-Raphaelitism and in Victorian neo-Gothic architecture.

Oxymoron

> Figures of Speech.

Ozymandias (1818)

A witty sonnet by > Percy Bysshe Shelley concerning the vanity of human ambition. An ancient statue stands broken and isolated in the desert, its boastful inscription now carrying an ironically different meaning from that first intended: 'My name is Ozymandias, king of kings: Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!' The ancient Greek historian Diodorus Siculus (1st century BC) calls the tomb of the great Egyptian Pharoah Rameses II the tomb of Ozymandias.

Paean

In ancient Greece, a hymn of thanksgiving, obscurely linked with the god of health (or perhaps ➤ Apollo in one of his aspects), perhaps through the practice of chanting sacred healing spells.

Page, Louise (b 1955)

Dramatist. A graduate of Birmingham University's drama course (where she was taught by ▷ David Edgar), she has been writer-in-residence at the ▷ Royal Court, a Fellow in Drama and TV at Yorkshire Television, and associate Director at Theatre Calgary in Alberta, Canada.

Something of a minimalist and a writer of spare dialogue, her plays reflect a generation of women where feminism is assumed, if not overt. Her plays have ranged from the unpredictable and surreal time-warp of Salonika (1982) to the hermetic domesticity of Real Estate, and the large-scale and ambitious re-working of the old fairy tale Beauty and the Beast (1985). An early play, Tissue (1978), touches sensitively on the trauma of a young woman facing breast cancer whilst Golden Girls (1984), about women and sport, takes a leaf out of > Caryl Churchill's book in tackling women and ambition. Much of her reputation rests on Salonika with which she won the 1982 George Divine award at the age of twenty-four. Slaonika is a surrealistic account of the effect of World War I on a widow returning to the Grecian beach where her husband died sixty-five years earlier (he reappears during the course of the play), and on her elderly spinster daughter. Critics hailed it as 'haunting' and a remarkably mature piece of work on the themes of futility and the frictions of mother/daughter relationships. Her plays have been produced all over the world, in New Zealand, the U.S.A., Denmark, Greece, Australia, Norway.

Pageant

The word derives from the name of a kind of stage used in medieval > Mystery plays which moved in procession to prearranged positions in the town and exhibited scenes from the Bible dramatizing the fall of man and his redemption by Christ. In modern England, a pageant is a display, commonly in the form of a procession, celebrating a historical or legendary event, usually with patriotic significance. This sense of the word 'pageant' has a clear relationship with the Mystery plays, and illustrates a particular dramatic viewpoint. The Mysteries were dramatic inasmuch as they represented conflicts between good and evil, but the stories and their outcome were fully known to the audience, so that there was small place for the unexpected. The modern pageant is an undramatic spectacle, and such pageants existed in the 16th century, symbolizing non-biblical legends of patriotic significance like the story of > St George and the Dragon. Thus the traditions of the pageant are twofold: in one sense it is purely spectacle, but in another it may be a spectacle combined with the narrative of a conflict, which is dramatic only because the conflict is seen as symbolic of a permanent truth of human experience. The second sense of the pageant tradition is important for understanding Elizabethan ⊳ history plays, especially those of ▷ Shakespeare. Thus, in ▷ Henry IV, Part I the modern audience is inclined to see the drama as a conflict of the soul of Prince Hal, who on the one hand is faced with the temptations of self-indulgence through Falstaff, and on the other with the task of winning 'honour' from Hotspur. Yet the audience is misled by this approach, since in I.ii Prince Hal declares that he is in no danger of yielding to Falstaff, and his acquisition of honour is also foreknown through the historical fact of the battle of > Agincourt; Hal is thus not the hero of an inner moral and an outer physical conflict, at least in the sense that there is the smallest uncertainty in the audience's mind about the outcome. On the other hand, Falstaff and Hotspur - the self-indulgent favourite and the self-centred politician - are dangers to which any nation is everlastingly exposed. Thus the dramatic interest of the play is not Hal but the nation, and the play is essentially the reenactment of a conflict to which the nation is perpetually exposed - a dramatic pageant in the Mystery and ➤ Morality tradition. Pageants, even informal ones, continued to be important in the social life of communities: > Virginia Woolf's Between the Acts is based on one.

Pageant, and Other Poems, A (1881)
A collection of poems by ▷ Christina
Rossetti, including the sonnet sequence 'Monna Innominata' and the important poems 'The Thread of Life' and 'An Old World Thicket', in which Rossetti explores her poetic and religious identity. Other noteworthy lyrics include 'An Immurata Sister', spoken from the perspective of a nun who seeks release from worldly (and gender-specific) constraints, and 'A Life's Parallels', an enigmatic poem addressing the mystery of death.

Paine, Thomas (1737–1809)
Political author. The son a small farmer, his early career in England as an official ended in failure, and he sailed for America in 1774. In 1776 he published the republican pamphlet Common Sense, which set the colonists openly on the road to independence. After the start of the American War of Independence, he maintained the morale of the rebels with a series of pamphlets called The Crisis (1776–83). The opening sentence was 'These are the times that try men's souls' – words which became a battle-crv.

In 1787 he returned to Europe to carry on his fight for republican democracy. When ▷ Burke published his > Reflections on the Revolution in France in 1790, Paine replied with Part I of his ➤ Rights of Man (1791). The Government was making the preparations for his trial for treason in 1792 when the poet ⊳ William Blake got him out of the country to France, where the French revolutionary government had elected him a member of the republican Convention. In France he published his Age of Reason (1793) which defended a rational, abstract form of > deism against orthodox Christianity. This caused him to lose his popularity in England and in America. He also lost favour with the French for his injudicious criticisms, and for a time he was imprisoned, though he was later restored to his seat in the Convention. In 1802 he returned to America to find that he had lost his influence there and he died at his farm in New Rochelle in 1809. Ten years later the English radical > William Cobbett returned to England with Tom Paine's bones. For some time his works remained a text-book for English radicalism.

Bib: Wilson D.A., Paine and Cobbett: The Transatlantic Connection; Philip, M., Paine.

Pair of Blue Eyes, A (1873)

Thomas Hardy's third and much underrated novel, often unfairly overshadowed by ➤ Tess of the d'Urbervilles (1891) which, in many ways, it anticipates. Echoing the circumstances of Hardy's courtship of his first wife Emma Gifford it deals with the story, and consequences, of the abortive love affair and elopement of Elfride Swancourt, an isolated rector's daughter living in Endlestowe on the North Cornish coast, and a young architect from London, Stephen Smith. Stephen's lowly class origins are the reason for the Reverend Swancourt's opposition the marriage, and the couple elope on an impulse, only for Elfride to lose heart and return home on the next train. However, she has been seen in a compromising situation by Mrs Jethway who believes that Elfride's light-hearted flirtation with her son caused his death. Stephen goes off to India to make his fortune and promises to return to claim Elfride. As a result of her father's marriage to a wealthy widow, and her attempts at novel writing, Elfride meets and falls in love with the curiously fastidious Henry Knight and breaks off her engagement with Smith. Terrified that Knight might discover her previous relationship with Smith, Elfride is haunted by Mrs Jethway, who threatens to betray her. Finally confessing to the elopement she is immediately rejected by Knight whose cruel judgement of her leaves her heartbroken. Knight meets Smith, his former friend and protégé, and both men betray their love for Elfride hurrying down to Cornwall to reclaim her, unaware that the train on which they are travelling is also carrying Elfride's copse back to Endlestow. Her marriage to the wealthy Lord Luxellian has not prevented her decline and she has died in childbirth. ▶ Tennyson, ▶ Coventry Patmore and Marcel Proust (1871–1922) were wildly enthusiastic about the novel which is now the subject of critical re-evaluation. The scene on the Cliff Without a Name is one of Hardy's most magnificent depictions of man's relationship to an indifferent Nature, and is deeply influenced by evolutionary theory.

➤ Darwin, Charles.

Pakington, Dorothy, Lady (d 1679) Moralist, considered one of the most learned ladies of her time, she remained loyal to the > Church of England, and to the > Stuart cause throughout her life. A number of popular conduct books (> conduct literature) have sometimes been attributed to her, including The Whole Duty of Man (1658), The Gentleman's Calling (1660) and The Lady's Calling (1673), a textbook of virtue, modesty, and duty. But nowadays doubt has been thrown on her authorship of the first two works, which are believed to be by the cleric Richard Allestree, and he may have composed the third as well. Nevertheless, her influence was considerable in her day. Lady Pakington was part of a circle of educated and devout men and women, and before the Restoration she held in her home a sort of salon for those who shared her concerns. Bib: Reynolds, M., The Learned Lady in England and 1650-1760.

'Palace of Art, The' (1832)

Poem by ▷ Alfred Tennyson published in Poems (1832). It is an allegory of the aesthetic soul that vainly shrinks from the encroachment of 'uncertain shapes', the lengthening shadows of a dark reality. It is evidence in Tennyson of the struggle between a personal 'art for art's sake' philosophy and art linked to the interests of 19th-century society. It is a reaction to the anti-romantic bias of the Victorian period that produced a sociological aesthetic, and considers the question of whether art should function as an escape from or a means of considering broader cultural and intellectual problems. ▷ Aestheticism.

Palace of Pleasure, The

An anthology of tales translated from the Italian and Latin, compiled by William Painter (₹1540–94) and published 1566–7. Writers include Bandello, ➤ Boccaccio, Herodotus and Livy. It was used as a source book for plots by ➤ Elizabethan dramatists, including ➤ Shakespeare who drew on it, at least to some extent, for ➤ All's Well that Ends Well, and perhaps some other plays.

Palamon and Arcite

Rivals for the love of Emily in \triangleright Chaucer's \triangleright Knight's Tale, the first of the \triangleright Canterbury Tales, Shakespeare and Fletcher dramatised their story in The Two Noble Kinsmen. ▷ Dryden paraphrased Chaucer's tale as Palamon and Arcite, published in his Fables Ancient and Modern (1699).

Palindrome

> Figures of Speech.

Palinode

The withdrawal in a piece of writing of ideas or attitudes expressed in another by the same writer; or the expression in one work of ideas which are in direct opposition to those which the author has expressed in a previous one. As, for example, > Geoffrey Chaucer does in the Retraction at the end of > The Canterbury Tales, where he rejects his romances and love poetry:

my translacions and enditynges of worldly vanitees, the whiche I revoke in my retracciouns:/ as is the book of Troilus; the book also of Fame; the book of the XXV. Ladies; the book of the Duchesse; the book of Seint Valentynes day of the Parlement of Briddes; the tales of Caunterbury, thilke that sownen into synne;/ the book of the Leoun; and many another book, if they were in my remembrance, and many a song and many a leccherous lay, that Crist for his grete mercy foryeve me the synne.

Palladio, Andrea (1508-80)

Italian architect. Palladio's villas, public buildings and churches - built between 1540 and 1580, and to be found in Venice, Vicenza and the countryside around these two important Italian > Renaissance cities - were to have a lasting effect on English and American architectural styles. The first great English classical architect > Inigo Jones was strongly influenced by Palladian ideals of design. These ideals usually manifested in symmetrical fronts and applied half-columns topped by a pediment were themselves derived from Palladio's intense study of architectural styles to be found in the surviving antiquities of ancient Rome. Indeed, Palladio was himself the author of one of the earliest guidebooks to the city's remains when he published his Le Antichita di Roma in 1554. This work, together with his Quattro Libri dell' Architecttura (1570), served to publicize the classical forms of architecture that came to dominate design in the 17th and 18th centuries.

The 'Palladian' style expresses key Renaissance aesthetic ideas. Those ideas, which encompass proportion, harmony and balance, were to become of great importance during the 18th century when Palladio's designs, and studies of his works, were much in vogue.

Bib: Wittkower, R., Architectural Principles

in the Age of Humanism; Ackerman, J. S., Palladio.

Palliser Novels, The (1864-80)

A sequence of novels by ➤ Anthony Trollope which is composed of Can You Forgive Her? (1864–65), Phineas Finn (1867–9), The Eustace Diamonds (1871–3), Phineas Redux (1873–4), The Prime Minister (1875–6) and The Duke's Children (1879–80). Trollope described them as 'a series of semi-political tales'.

Pamela (1740-1)

Subtitled 'Virtue Rewarded', Pamela is an > epistolary novel by > Samuel Richardson.

The story of a young servant girl who evades her master's attempts at seduction, Richardson's novel was a great contemporary success, yet sophisticated readers were quick to see its ambiguous message. By her insistence on her country simplicity, Pamela persuades the squire to marry her; yet her self-conscious parade of 'artless' virtue suggests a level of sexual innuendo of which Richardson may or may not have been aware. > Henry Fielding's > Shamela and > Joseph Andrews parody this element of Pamela.

Pamphlet

Any short treatise published separately, usually without hard covers. It is usually polemical, ie written to defend or attack some body of ideas, especially religious or political ones. In the 16th century and especially towards the end of the reign of ⊳ Elizabeth I pamphleteering became a widespread literary industry, the beginning of journalism. > Thomas Nashe and > Thomas Dekker were amongst the most famous pamphleteers and the ➤ Marprelate controversy was the most famous of the 'pamphlet wars'. In the 17th century Milton was the most famous writer of pamphlets, and his > Areopagitica is his masterpiece. In the 18th century some of ➤ Swift's finest prose was in pamphlet form, eg > A Modest Proposal (1729), and ➤ Defoe was a prolific pamphleteer. The 18th century, however, saw the rise of the weekly periodicals, which reduced the need for the pamphlet form of literature.

▶ Journalism.

Pandosto, The Triumph of Time (1588)
A prose romance by ➤ Robert Greene, used by ➤ Shakespeare as the basis for his late play, ➤ The Winter's Tale.

Panjandrum

The word first occurs in a sentence devised by the actor-playwright Samuel Foote (1720-77) to test the memory of another actor-playwright, Charles Macklin (d 1797): '... and there were present the Picninnies, and the Joblillies, and the Garyulies, and the Grand Panjandrum himself, with the little round button on top.' The word came to be used for any pompous person, or for someone of supposed power.

Pankhurst, Sylvia (1882-1960)

Poet and political writer. Sylvia Pankhurst's extraordinary career as a political activist, first for women's suffrage and later in wider socialist causes (for women in London's East End, and for Ethiopian independence) has overshadowed her equally extraordinary writing. She produced strong biographical and historical accounts of the suffrage movement (for example, the definitive biography of her mother, the Life of Emmeline Pankhurst, 1935, and The Suffrage Movement, 1931), and published two volumes of passionate, radical poetry in her lifetime: Writ on a Cold Slate (1922) and a translation of the Romanian poems of M. Eminescu Poems (1931).

> Feminism.

Bib: Castle, B., Sylvia and Christabel Pankhurst (1987); Pankhurst, R. K. P. Sylvia Pankhurst: Artist and Crusader (1979); Romero, P. W. E., Sylvia Pankhurst: Portrait of a Radical (1987).

Pantagruel

A comic romance by ➤ François Rabelais, published in its first version in 1532. Pantagruel is the son of ➤ Gargantua.

Pantheism

A term used to cover a variety of religious and philosophical beliefs, which have in common that God is present in nature, and not separable from it in the sense in which a cause is separable from its effect, or a creator from his creation. Pantheism is implicit in doctrines derived from > Plato, eg in some of the neo-Platonists of the 16th century, and in some poetry inspired by the natural environment. Amongst English poets, the most famous example is > Wordsworth in his earlier phase (1797-1807), notably in the first two books of his 1805 version of > The Prelude. In his revised version of this autobiographical poem, Wordsworth tried to eliminate the pantheistic tendencies, since they are not in accordance with most forms of Christian doctrine.

Pantisocracy

The name given by ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge and ➤ Robert Southey to the ideal anarchistic society which preoccupied them in 1794-5 during the first phase of the ➤ French Revolution (from the Greek: pan = 'all', isos = 'the same', cratos = 'power'). They hoped to establish a community on the banks of the River Susquehanna in the United States in which motives of gain would be replaced by brotherly love. They were unable to raise money, however, their ideas changed, and they abandoned their plan.

Pantomime

Originally, in ancient Rome, a representation by masked actors, using gestures and dance, of religious or warlike episodes. One actor played many parts, male and female, with changes of mask and costumes. It was often accompanied by music. It was used for episodes in medieval religious drama, and as the 16th-century Italian > commedia dell'arte it became a form of popular drama that spread all over Europe together with a number of traditional characters such as Harlequin and the Clown. In the 18th century it established itself in England. Nowadays the children's pantomimes performed in Britain after Christmas are usually musical plays representing traditional folk-tales (Puss in Boots, Dick Whittington, etc.) in a vulgarized form, but sometimes introducing traditional characters from the commedia dell'arte. Certain conventions are peculiar to it: the hero of the story or 'principal boy' is always performed by an actress, and a comic character known as the 'pantomime dame' is performed by an actor, a gender-reversal which is a direct inheritance of the 'world-turned-upside down' > carnivalesque mode. Bib: Bukhtin, M., Rabelais and his World.

Paradigmatic

The terms paradigmatic and syntagmatic were used by the linguist Ferdinand de Saussure to indicate two axes for the understanding of language. The syntagmatic axis is controlled by the way units in any given language are combined sequentially. Specifically, this refers to the rules governing the combination of sounds (phonemes) to make meaningful sequences and therefore words, and, at higher levels, the grammatical and syntactical rules which structure the way words are put together in sentences. The paradigmatic axis, by contrast, is sometimes called the 'associative' axis. It refers (to stay at the level of words) to the network of associations connected to the actual word selected, that is, words which belong to the same class. The linguist is primarily interested in formal connections at the level of sound and structure (cat is associated with bat, fat, hat and so on), but such formal connections link with more nebulous levels of behaviour or cultural association which interest the literary critic (for example, cat is associated with mat and hence hearth and home). It is from the associative or paradigmatic axis, it is argued, that imagery and metaphor are derived and much of literature gains its energy thereby. The rules which shape syntagmatic and, especially, paradigmatic selection is of interest to structuralist literary critics. Bib: Lodge, D., The Modes of Modern Writing.

Paradise Lost (1667)

An ➤ epic poem by ➤ John Milton, first published in ten books in 1667, but reorganized and published in 12 books in a second edition of 1674. The composition of Paradise Lost was possibly begun in the mid-1650s, but the idea for an epic based on scriptural sources had, in all probability, occurred to Milton at least as early as 1640, when the four drafts of an outline > tragedy were composed. These drafts, contained in a Trinity College, Cambridge manuscript, indicate that in its original conception, Paradise Lost (or, to give the poem its draft title, Adam Unparadized) was to have been a sacred drama, rather than an epic. This hint at a dramatic origin, on the lines of classical Greek tragedy, helps to explain the undoubtedly dramatic qualities to be found in the poem - for example the soliloquizing habits of Satan, and the perepeteias, or discoveries, where new > ironies in the narrative are allowed to unfold.

The chief source of the poem is the > Bible, but the Bible as glossed and commented upon by the Patristic (early Christian) authorities, and by Protestant theologians. But also important to Milton's project were the classical writers -➤ Homer and ➤ Virgil – from whom Milton's conception of 'epic' was principally inherited. > Edmund Spenser's > The Faerie Queene was also vital to Milton's handling of language and imagery. To these principle sources can be added the epics of ➤ Ludovico Ariosto and > Torquato Tasso, > Ovid's Metamorphoses, the De rerum natura of > Lucretius, and the once popular, though now little read, La Semaine by > Guillaume de Saluste Du Bartas. Once these sources have been remarked upon, however, the possible progenitors of Milton's poem still remain numberless, since Paradise Lost draws upon the whole field of intellectual endeavour open to a classically trained European scholar in the 17th century.

For all that it is a poem rooted in Milton's literary experience, it is also a poem of, and for, its times. The poem's chief theme is rebellion - the rebellion of Satan and his followers against God, and the rebellion of Adam and Eve against divine law. Within this sacred context, Milton sets himself the task of justifying God's creational will to his 17th-century readers. But, in confronting questions such as choice, obedience and forms of government, Milton also raises the issues of freedom, social relationships and the quality and definition of power - whether almighty, satanic or human. We can thus understand the poem as confronting political questions that, in the moment of its composition and eventual publication following the English > Civil War and the Restoration of the monarchy, were of real urgency to both the republican Milton and his readers. This is not to say that, as some of Milton's commentators have claimed, the poem operates as a veiled > allegory of events in mid-17th-century England. But the issues faced by the protagonists in Paradise Lost are also issues that were at the heart of contemporary political debate. To entwine matters of theology and political theory was by no means a strange grafting to Milton's contemporaries. Religion and politics were inseparably twinned, and Paradise Lost confronts that conjunction at every point.

The history of the poem's critical reception since the date of its publication is itself a commentary on the history of English literary 'taste'. For all that 18th-century writers admired Milton's grand scheme, their admiration was tinged by a certain uneasiness. Both Joseph Addison (1672-1719) and Samuel Johnson (1709-84) felt that Milton's achievement was undoubtedly immense, but that it was also an achievement which could not and should not be replicated. For the poets of the Romantic period - William Blake (1757-1827), Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822), John Keats (1795-1821) and the William Wordsworth (1770-1850) of The Prelude - Paradise Lost was read as a significant text in the history of the individual's struggle to identify him or herself within the political and social sphere. But rather than understand the poem as a theological epic, they tended to read it as a text of human liberty, with Satan, rather than God, as the focus of the poem's meaning. In the 20th century, following the reevaluation in poetic taste prompted by W. B. Yeats (1865-1939), T. S. Eliot (1888-1965) and > F. R. Leavis, Paradise Lost was seen, once more, as a masterpiece of questionable stature. Was it, perhaps, removed from what Eliot and Leavis in particular cared to identify as the 'English tradition'? The debate initiated by Leavis and his followers was to be answered in a series of important accounts of the poem by ▷ C. S. Lewis, ▷ William Empson and Christopher Ricks. In the 1970s and 1980s attention has been refocussed, by Marxist and feminist critics especially, on what have long been unexamined aspects of the poem: its treatment of patriarchal authority and its relationship to the continuing historical debate on the intellectual culture of the revolutionary period. At the same time, Milton's themes of language and identity have rendered the poem a fruitful text for > psychoanalytical criticism. We might conclude, then, that whilst perhaps the greatest achievement of the English literary > Renaissance, Paradise Lost is also a text open to continuous re-reading and revision. Bib: Carey, J. and Fowler, A. (eds.) The Complete Poems of John Milton.

Paradise Regained (1671)

An \triangleright epic poem by \triangleright John Milton in four books, it was first published (together with Samson Agonistes) in 1671. Begun after the publication of \triangleright Paradise Lost in 1667, the poem can, in some sense, be thought of as a sequel to Paradise Lost. In particular, the poem's treatment of Christ, his resistance to temptation, and the redeeming nature of his ministry on earth, cast him in the theologically traditional role of the 'Second Adam' – a regenerative and redeeming force in the world.

Where Paradise Lost, however, was conceived of along lines inherited from classical epic, Paradise Regained is in the form of the 'brief epic' in the style of the book of Job. The chief subject matter of the poem is the temptation of Christ in the wilderness, described in the gospel of St Luke.

Paradiso

The third and final section of > Dante's great poem, the Divina Commedia. Dante has been led through the Inferno and the Purgatorio by the spirit of the Roman poet > Virgil. Now his guide is Beatrice, the woman who had inspired Dante's love. As the Inferno was divided into circles, so Paradise is divided into spheres: the sphere of the Moon, of Mercury, Venus, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, the Fixed Stars, and the Primum Mobile, or First Mover. Each sphere contains the kind of spirit the ancient Greek and Roman myths had caused to be associated with it: Mars, the Christian warriors and martyrs; Jupiter, the just rulers; Saturn, the holy contemplatives, etc. The spheres are in ascending order of merit, and culminate in Dante's remote, ecstatic vision of God Himself. In each, Dante has conversations on philosophical and spiritual matters with the men and women from history whom he conceives to have been assigned there.

> Inferno: Purgatorio.

Paradox

> Figures of Speech.

Pardoner's Prologue and Tale, The One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. As his contribution to the storytelling competition, the Pardoner offers an exposé of his standard preaching routine in theory and in practice. His performance may be compared to that of Faus Semblant (False Seeming) in the ➤ Roman de la Rose. His prologue outlines the range of techniques he employs to persuade his lay audiences to buy his (self-confessedly) worthless relics, and contains verbatim extracts from his routine. The theme of his performance as a whole is 'Radix malorum est cupiditas' ('covetousness is the root of all evil'), but the maxim is graphically illustrated in his tale of the three 'riotoures' who set out to kill Death (who has killed one of their companions). They meet a mysterious old man on their quest, who directs them to a spot where they might find Death, but when they arrive they simply find a pile of gold. As a result of their plotting to cheat each other out of their shares in the gold, all three are killed. Although the Pardoner has exposed his mercenary motives to the pilgrim audience, he ends his performance apparently with a serious attempt to sell them his relics. His invitation to the Host to have the first choice is violently and abusively rejected. The game limits have been transgressed and the Knight steps in to heal the breach so that the Canterbury Tales may continue.

Parker, Matthew (1504-75)

Became Archbishop of Canterbury on the accession of ▷ Elizabeth I, and was her main ally in her policy of keeping the ▷ Church of England on its unique midway course between the Roman Catholic Church and the more decidedly Protestant sects such as the Lutherans and Calvinists, represented in England by the Puritans. He was a notable scholar, and promoted the 'Bishop's Bible' (1568), which became the basis for the 'Authorized Version' of 1611.

➤ Bible in England; Reformation; Catholicism (Roman) in English literature.

Parlement of the Thre Ages, The

A 14th-century alliterative poem, recounting a > dream vision experience in which the narrator witnesses a debate between Youth, Middle Age, and Old Age. These figures describe the different occupations and preoccupations of the successive stages in a man's life (the focus is on masculine pursuits); the pursuit of courtly pleasures advocated by Youth, gives way to the materialistic concerns which obsess Middle Age, and finally the contemptus mundi views of Old Age are ushered in. Old Age eclipses the views of Youth and Middle Age, because for him any engagement in worldly pleasures or materialistic gains is vain and futile. There is a correlation between the different attitudes and interests of the figures and different kinds of literary traditions, so the narrative offers a summary view of a range of literary themes and subjects at the same time as it epitomises the stance of Youth, Middle Age and Old Age. Bib: Offord, M. Y. (ed.), The Parlement of the Thre Ages.

Parliament of Foulys, The

A ▷ dream-vision poem by ▷ Chaucer, in > rhyme royal, which concludes with an account of a bird parliament, held on St Valentine's Day, when the birds meet to decide their mates for the year. The poem begins with an account of the melancholic narrator's reading matter, > Cicero's Dream of Scipio, and then proceeds to recount a marvellous dream-experience in which the narrator is taken into a garden of love by Africanus, an important guide figure of the Dream of Scipio. Inside the garden, the narrator first explores Venus' temple and then moves on to witness the bird parliament, presided over by Dame Nature. Proceedings are delayed by a debate over which of three tercel eagles is the most fitting mate for a formel eagle. Representatives from the three bird estates offer their views, but the decision is finally given to the formel eagle herself, who defers making a choice for another year. The rest of the birds are then free to choose their partners and the dream ends with a bird song (a > roundel) welcoming Spring. The dreamer awakes and returns to his books, still hoping to learn something of value from them.

In just 699 lines, Chaucer explores the continuum of love and its literary expression, evoking the philosophical and ethical dimensions of love as a literary subject, yet keeping the tone of this tour de force light and comic, through using a slightly ineffectual narrator, and giving floor space to the down-to-earth views of geese and cuckoos on the subject. It is a poem which wittily negotiates quotations from > Dante and from ducks.

> Courtly Love. Bib: Brewer, D. S. (ed.), The Parliament of Foulys.

Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846–91)
Irish political leader. He entered Parliament in 1875, and led the Home Rule party in its fight for Irish self-government. He converted > Gladstone and the Liberal Party to the support of Home Rule, but was politically ruined by becoming involved in a scandal with the wife of Captain O'Shea in 1890. His success was the more remarkable because he was a > Protestant; the scandal finally turned the > Catholic Church in Ireland against him. His downfall caused a deep split among the Irish nationalists.

Parnell, Thomas (1679-1718) Member of the Tory (> Whig and Tory) clique associated with the ministry of Harley and > Bolingbroke and participant with > Jonathan Swift, > Alexander Pope, > John Gay and > John Arbuthnot, in the shortlived Scriblerus Club. He translated a comic ➤ epic then attributed to > Homer, Battle of the Frogs and Mice, into heroic > couplets (1717). He also composed moral and allegorical ⊳ fables including The Hermit, and the drearily sexist Hesiod: or, The Rise of Woman, 'A creature fond and changing, fair and vain,/ The creature woman, rises now to reign.' His versification has a facile elegance which was greatly valued at the time. In A Night-Piece on Death, first published in his posthumous Poems (1722), the characteristic tetrameter (> metre) couplet of 17th-century reflective poetry is smoothed out and polished, transforming religious intensity into conventional piety: 'There pass with melancholy State,/ By all the solemn Heaps of Fate,/ And think, as softly-sad thou tread/ Above the venerable Dead,/ Time was, like thee they Life possest,/ And Time shall be, that thou shalt Rest.' Later graveyard musings in the 1740s and 1750s add ▷ Gothic or ▷ sentimental elaborations to Parnell's model. Parnell's Essay on the Different Stiles of Poetry (1713) gives a rigid exposition of the ▷ Augustan doctrine of literary kinds.

Bib: Woodman, R., Thomas Parnell.

Parody

Parody consists of mocking a style of literary production through an exaggerated imitation. It is close to ▷ satire in its criticism of eccentricities, but it must always refer to literature or a way of writing, rather than satire's more open scope. For example, Cervantes' ▷ Don Quixote is a parody of chivalric romance and ▷ Shakespeare includes some parody of ▷ Lyly's ▷ Euphues in ▷ Much Ado about Nothing.

In the 18th century > Fielding's > 7oseph Andrews is partly a parody of > Richardson's > Pamela, and > Pope's > Rape of the Lock is a parody of grand > epic in the style of > Homer and ▷ Virgil. In the ▷ Romantic period an example of parody is ▷ James and ▷ Horatio Smith's ➤ Rejected Addresses (1812) which contains witty attacks against ➤ Wordsworth, > Coleridge, > Southey, > Byron, > Crabbe and ➤ Scott. It is difficult to draw a line between parody and ⊳ burlesque; the latter is more obviously comic in its style of imitation. For example, ➤ Stella Gibbons' Cold Comfort Farm uses parody (of the primitivism of writers such as D. H. Lawrence) as well as burlesque; less famous short examples of 20th-century parody can be found in The Faber Book of Parodies. Together with pastiche, parody has played a significant role in > post-modernist fiction.

Parole

In the work of ➤ Ferdinand de Saussure, the founder of Structuralism, this is usually translated as 'speech' or 'speech act'. It refers to a particular instance of speech. 'Parole' is to be distinguished from ➤ 'langue' (language) which is the linguistic system which underpins every utterance (parole). Speakers of a language (langue) avail themselves of parts of that system and reactiviate it each time they engage in speech (parole).

➤ Sign.

Paronomasia

> Figures of Speech.

Parr, Queen Katherine (1512–48)
Devotional writer. Last of ▷ Henry VIII's six wives, Katherine was widowed twice before she married the aging king. She immediately influenced the court towards a more contemplative and Protestant character, while initiating religious debate with Henry himself. Katherine was especially concerned with education and was a known protector and patron of the new Protestant universities; moreover, she personally directed the education of the future ▷ Edward VI and ▷ Elizabeth I. Her religious activities became somewhat radical and she was in danger of being executed over the ▷ Anne Askew affair, but being forewarned of the plot against her she skilfully manipulated the king into supporting her. Katherine Parr's two works are devotional in nature: Prayers and Medytacions (1545) and Lamentacion of a Sinner (1547).

Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

Parr, Susanna (c 1659)

Religious writer and autobiographer. Known for one work, Susanna's Apologie Against the Elders (1659), we may deduce that Susanna Parr was attacked by the elders of her Baptist church in Exeter when she left, and that they tried to have her excommunicated. She was angered by their attack and, rather than accept the more conventional female role of victim, decided to defend herself in print. Interestingly, she attributes the more radical position to the minister who opposed her, Lewis Stuckley, but even though she appears to position herself within the main body of Baptist beliefs, her views on the rights of women to speak in church are clearly not conventional. She uses biting irony to ridicule her attackers, but also includes detailed descriptions of church practices and contemporary theological arguments.

➤ Autobiography. Bib: Graham, E. et al. (eds.), Her Own Life.

Parson's Tale, The

The last of ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales. It is prefaced by a call from the Host for the Parson to complete the sequence with a 'fable'. Although the Parson rejects this request (indeed he rejects the value of literary fictions altogether), he offers instead a 'myrie tale in prose', which will complete the journey by showing the pilgrims the way to that 'parfit, glorious pilgrimmage that highte Jerusalem celestial'. What he presents is a treatise on the art of penance (drawn in fact from two well-known penitential handbooks of the 13th century), which includes a review of the ➤ Seven Deadly Sins and concludes with an emphatic call for repentance. Chaucer's 'Retraction' follows the Parson's treatise (in most manuscripts). In this the 'maker' takes leave of his book, and asks forgiveness for any literary sins he may have committed in his writing career. In concluding the Canterbury Tales in this way, Chaucer is both affirming the ultimate values propounded in The Parson's Tale (the Parson's call for repentance is followed by an act of repentance) and following a long tradition of literary endings in which writers distance themselves from the non-religious aspects of their work.

Pascal, Blaise (1623-62)

French religious philosopher and mathematician. In 1646 he became a devout adherent of the Jansenist movement which had its headquarters at the nunnery of Port-Royal near Paris. Jansenism (started by Cornelius Jansen, 1585-1638) maintained, like the Protestant predestinarians Predestination), that salvation through the love of God was possible only for those whom God pleased to love, ie an individual was predestined to salvation or to damnation; however it also emphasized the necessity of belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. The movement was strongly attacked by the > Jesuit order, and when its leading exponent, Antoine Arnauld, was being threatened with dismissal from his academic post, Pascal wrote Provincial Letters (1656) in his defence. This was his first important work, a masterpiece of lucid, ironical controversy; in particular, Pascal advocated moral austerity and criticized Jesuit libertinism. His Pensées ('Thoughts' pub. 1670) is his more famous work; it consists of notes for a book on religion intended to demonstrate the necessity of the religious life. Though fragmentary, the notes have great aphoristic power; with an intellect as powerful and a style as lucid as that of > Descartes, Pascal criticizes the earlier philosopher's notion of the supreme power of human reason, and shows the limitations of reason in dealing with ultimate mysteries.

Passage to India, A (1924)

A novel by > E. M. Forster. It had originally been planned ten years earlier, and its picture of India belongs partly to that period. The scene is the city of Chandrapore on the banks of the Ganges, and India is under British rule. The background characters consist mainly of the British officials and their wives, and the local Indian intelligentsia. The main characters are as follows: Aziz, a Muslim Indian doctor; Godbole, a Hindu professor; Fielding, the headmaster of the Government College; Ronald Heaslop, another of the British officials; and two visitors from Britain, Mrs Moore, the mother of Heaslop by her first marriage, and Adela Quested, who is engaged to him. Both women have strong liberal principles, and make friends easily with Fielding, the only liberal in the resident British colony. Fielding is also a friend of Aziz, and a colleague of Godbole. Aziz issues an impulsive invitation to the British visitors to visit the local Marabar Caves; these have a strong significance for the Hindus, although Godbole, when he is asked about them, is unable to explain it. The climax of the book occurs when this visit takes place. Heat, discomfort, and the caves themselves cause Mrs Moore and Adela to suffer traumatic experiences. Mrs Moore loses all her faith and idealism: Adela has an attack of hysteria which temporarily convinces her that Aziz has attempted to rape her. This supposed rape brings the already strained relations between the British and the Indians to a crisis, but the crisis is resolved (not without disgracing the more reactionary British officials) by Adela's return to sanity in the witness-box. Mrs Moore, although she is now selfish, hard and disillusioned, whereas before she had been generous, kind and idealistic, is in touch with a new kind of truthfulness which helps Adela's restoration. Only Mrs Moore and Godbole understand the true nature of Adela's experience in the caves, and they understand it from opposite, though complementary, points of view.

The novel has psychological, political, and religious dimensions. The Christianity, or the sceptical liberalism, of the more enlightened of the British is shown to be adequate for normal relationships and practical affairs, but they have become too shallow for the interpretation of deeper human experience; Aziz's Muslim faith is stronger, but it is more an aesthetic and cultural tradition than a binding spiritual faith. Godbole's Hinduism, on the other hand, is profound and intelligent, though it is no guide to the daily conduct of affairs. This religious dimension is presented by constant symbolism, ranging in character from unobtrusive (though often important) details, to the conspicuous and suggestive image of the caves themselves. A Passage to India is Forster's most ➤ modernist work and is usually regarded as his masterpiece.

Passionate Pilgrim (1599)
An anthology of poetry containing odes by ➤ Richard Barnfield (1564–1627) formerly attributed to ➤ Shakespeare.

Past and Present (1843)

An example of ➤ Thomas Carlyle's immensely influential social criticism in which the 'past' is epitomized by a medieval chronicle of the monastery of Bury St Edmunds, describing everyday life and recording the procedure for electing a new abbot. In this document Carlyle finds evidence of all that he saw as missing from Victorian society: spiritual power, organic community and personal responsibility. Carlyle used the fashion for ⊳ medievalism, current at the time, in order to make a diagnosis of the contemporary world. The 'present' was typified by a sensational news item which told of the murder of three children by their parents in order to defraud a burial society of £,3 8s due on the death of each child. Using classical allusions such as the myth of King Midas, and Dante's myth of Ugolino who was driven by starvation to eat his own children, Carlyle mounted an attack on industrial England, which had the power to make money but could only produce starvation. The present is also portrayed in the form of a morality play with representative characters such as Plugson of Undershot, an unscrupulous industrialist, and Pandarus Dogsdraught, a corrupt politician. ▷ Charles Dickens was to develop this technique in his own novels. ▷ Matthew Arnold was also influenced by the style of Past and Present which put a number of useful terms into currency such as 'mammonism', 'dilettantism', 'windbag', 'cash-nexus' and 'captains of industry'.

Paston Letters

The general name for a large collection of correspondence by, or to, members of the Paston family of Norfolk, dating from 1422-1509. The letters, written at times with great vigour, provide an interesting insight into the political and domestic life of this rising Norfolk family, during the turbulent reigns of Henry VI, Edward IV, and Richard III.

▶ Edward IV; Henry VI; Richard III. Bib: Davis, N. (ed.), The Paston Letters.

Pastoral

A form of literature originally developed by the ancient Greeks and Romans in the > idylls of the former (eg > Theocritus') and the \triangleright eclogues of the latter (eg \triangleright Virgil's). Ancient pastoral idealized the Greek state of > Arcadia which had a rustic population of shepherds and herdsmen. The ➤ Renaissance of the 16th century, deeply interested in the literature of the Greeks and Romans, revived the pastoral mode; the earliest forms of it date back in Italian literature to the 15th century, but it was the romance Arcadia (1504), by the Italian poet Sannazaro, which was particularly influential throughout Europe. The appeal of the pastoral kind of literature was partly to human wishfulness - the desire to conceive of circumstances in which the complexity of human problems could be reduced to its simplest elements: the shepherds and shepherdesses of pastoral are imaged as having no worries, and they live in an ideal climate with no serious physical calamities; love and death, and making songs and music about these experiences, are their only preoccupations. Another function of pastoral, however, was as a vehicle of moral and social criticism; the shepherds and shepherdesses sought the pleasures of nature and despised or were innocent of the corrupting luxury of courts and cities. Finally, pastoral presented a means of offering, allegorically, thinly disguised tributes of praise and flattery to real people whom the poet admired or wanted to please. The satirical, moral and eulogistic functions of Renaissance pastoral all tended to make it allegorical, since it was through ➤ allegory that the poet could most safely make his criticism felt, and could most eloquently convey his praise. Allegory also suited the ▶ neo-Platonic, idealizing cast of mind so characteristic of 16th-century writers. When we remember that the tradition of romantic love was one of the most ardently pursued inheritances from the Middle Ages, and that the circumstances of pastoral lent themselves to its expression, it is not surprising that the pastoral mode was so extensively cultivated in 16th-century Europe. To England it came late, by way of influences from France, Spain and Italy, but it lasted longer; it was especially pervasive in the last quarter of the 16th century, and continued till the mid-17th; there was a minor revival early in the 18th century.

The first important English pastoral poem is ➤ Edmund Spenser's ➤ The Shepherd's Calendar which consists of an ⊳ eclogue for each month of the year; the tone is morally didactic in some, satirical in others, and eulogistic of the queen in a third group. > Philip Sidney's > The Arcadia is a pastoral romance whose purpose is entertainment, but it idealizes the courtly virtues, as does Book VI of Spenser's > The Faerie Queene, about Sir Calidore, the Knight of Courtesy. > The University Wits, > Peele, > Lyly, > Greene and > Lodge, wrote pastoral dramas in verse and romances in prose, and one of the best pastoral works of the 1590s is Shakespeare's > As You Like It, based on Lodge's romance Rosalynde (1500). Shakespeare dramatized the pastoral mode, however, with a difference: the fanciful world of pastoral romance is contrasted with the world of common sense, and the fairyland pastoral country of shepherds and shepherdesses with Greek names is juxtaposed to the real English countryside and its commonplace peasants, so that his pastoral romance is also antipastoral. It was not unusual, however, to salt pastoral with elements from real country life - Spenser does it in The Shepherd's Calendar, and Shakespeare does it most skilfully in > The Winter's Tale IV. iii. More conventional pastoral dramas were > John Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess (1610) and ▶ Ben Jonson's The Sad Shepherd (1635). The artificiality of pastoral lent itself to the > masque form which combined music, poetry, dancing and the decor in equal proportions; Jonson, the master of masque, wrote a number of pastorals for it, but by far the most famous pastoral masque is > Milton's Comus.

Of the various forms of pastoral, the prose romance had the shortest life, and ended with the 16th century; the last pastoral drama was Elkanah Settle's Pastor Fido (1677). In non-dramatic poetry, pastoral lasted much longer. ▷ Michael Drayton is the next pastoral poet of note after Spenser with Idea: The Shepherd's Garland (1593) and Endimion and Phoebe (1595); ▷ Marlowe's famous pastoral lyric Come Live With Me was first printed in 1599, and pastoral lyric writers in the tradition of Spenser were numerous from 1590 up to 1650; they included Nicholas Breton (?1545-?1626), ▷ George Wither (1588-1667), ▷ William Browne (1591-1643), and above all ▷ Robert Herrick. However, the most famous poems in 17th-century pastoral are Milton's: ▷ L'Allegro and Il Penseroso and his ▷ elegy ▷ Lycidas. In the 18th century, ▷ Pope's early Pastorals (1709) were a small masterpiece influenced by Virgil, but his ▷ Windsor Forest (1713) is a more impressive work, using pastoral to extol the Peace of Utrecht (1713) which ended the long War of the Spanish Succession, and to celebrate peace, prosperity and civilization.

Classical pastoral has not been practised notably since the first half of the 18th century. However, ▷ William Empson (Some Versions of Pastoral, 1935) sometimes uses the term more widely than classical pastoral denotes. Even so, pastoral – even of the non-classical kind – is not synonymous with 'nature poetry' or poetry of country life: ▷ Wordsworth, ▷ Clare, ▷ Hardy, ▷ Blunden, and ▷ Heaney are not writers of pastoral in any usually accepted sense.

Bib: Patterson, A., Pastoral and Ideology; Chaudhuri, S., Renaissance Pastoral and its English Developments.

Pater, Walter Horatio (1839-94)

Scholar, essayist and critic. He was elected to a fellowship in Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1864. He was connected with the Pre-Raphaelite group, shared their idealistic worship of beauty and became an important influence in the cult of art which led to the ➤ Aesthetic Movement at the end of the century; > Oscar Wilde was among those profoundly affected by the Paterian sensibility. His most important work was Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873), a collection of essays on Italian painters and writers from the 14th to 16th centuries; the Conclusion to these essays, in which he advocates a fusion of psychic, moral and sensuous ecstasy, became a kind of manifesto of the aesthetic movement. His next most famous work is the philosophic romance Marius the Epicurean (1885). Other works: Imaginary Portraits (1887); Appreciations with an Essay on Style (1889); Plato and Platonism (1893); The Child in the House (1894); Greek Studies and Miscellaneous Studies (1895); an unfinished romance, Gaston de Latour (1896). Pater wrote with immense care for beauty of style, which became for him and end in itself. Bid: Levey, M., The Case of Walter Pater; Monsman, G., Walter Pater; Iser, W., Walter Pater: The Aesthetic Moment; Seiter, R. M. (ed.), Walter Pater: The Critical Heritage; Loesberg, J., Aestheticism and Deconstruction: Pater, Derrida and De Man; Brake, L., Walter Pater.

Pathetic fallacy

➤ Figures of Speech.

Patience

The conventional title given to a 14th-century > alliterative poem, found in the same manuscript as > Gawain and the Green Knight, > Cleanness and > Pearl, and so attributed to the > Gawain poet. This relatively short composition explores the active and passive meanings of patience, through a reworking of the story of the Old Testament prophet, > Jonah.

Bib: Anderson, J. J. (ed.), Patience.

Patmore, Coventry Kersey Dighton (1823-96)

Poet. He contributed to the ▶ Pre-Raphaelite periodical The Germ; in 1864 he became a > Catholic. The two books by which he is most remembered are ▷ The Angel in the House (comprising The Betrothed, 1854; The Espousals, 1856; Faithful for Ever, 1860; The Victories of Love, 1862) and The Unknown Eros (1877). The former is about his first marriage and celebrates married love; the latter, consisting of forty-two irregular odes, is on a similar theme but more mystical. Both poems are examples of the type of philosophy in verse characteristic of William Wordsworth's famous Prelude (1850). Patmore had independent ideas on poetic technique, and has been considered by some critics to bear resemblance to the 17thcentury Metaphysical poets. As much as for his own poetry, he is known today for being the friend and correspondent of the poet > Gerard Manley Hopkins, whose work, however, he seems not to have properly appreciated. Other works include: Amelia (1878), which was his own favourite among his poems; the critical essays English Metrical Law (1878); Principle in Art (1879); Religio Poetae (1893); the religious meditations Rod, Root and Flower (1895). Bib: Patmore, D., Life; Oliver, E.J., Life; Page, F., Patmore: a Study in Poetry; Reid, J.C., The Mind and Art of Coventry Patmore: Hopkins, G.M., (ed. Abbott, C.C.) Further Letters.

Patriarchy

A key term in > feminist theory, patriarchy literally means rule by the father and is hence taken as short-hand for any male-dominated society. As such, it is sometimes criticized for being too universalist a term because it neglects differences of, for example, race and social class in the experience of the oppression of women.

Patronage in literature

A system by which the king or a nobleman afforded protection and livelihood to an artist, in return for which the artist paid him special honour, or returned him service in the form of entertaining his household and his guests. The great period for this system was the 16th century, but patronage continued to be an important cultural and social institution until the end of the 18th century. In the ▷ Middle Ages the writer or scholar might work under the protection of a religious order, but already

> Chaucer was dependent on the patronage of > John of Gaunt. After the 18th century, through > circulating libraries and wide circulation of periodicals, writers could rely on support from the general public; but from the 16th to 18th centuries failure to secure a patron might mean oblivion, or at least starvation, as in the case of > Chatterton. In the 16th century patronage was a commonly found institution since noblemen and women still kept large households and it was assumed that these would include entertainers (such as a band of actors) and scholars who performed educational and secretarial functions. In this century actors ('players') who were not attached to some household were regarded as vagabonds liable to punishment or shutting up in houses of correction by the public authorities; by the end of the century, however, the > Lord Chamberlain's Men, the Lord Admiral's Men etc. were attached to their patrons only in name, and they performed in public theatres or at court. The Earl of Essex (patron of > Ben Jonson), the Earl of Southampton (patron of ▷ Shakespeare), and ▷ Sidney's sister, > Margaret Countess of Pembroke, were among the great patrons in the reign of ➤ Elizabeth I, but the most valuable patron was the sovereign. Disagreeable necessities of patronage were the flattering 'dedications' which commonly preceded works of literature, and poems written specially to honour or gratify the patron, such as > Donne's First and Second Anniversary commemorating the death of Elizabeth Drury, daughter of his patron Sir Robert Drury - though Donne's poems are evidence that such work was by no means necessarily bad or insincere. The status of men and women of letters steadily gained in esteem, moreover, freeing the writer of the necessity of servility, and Ben Jonson was one of the most vigorous in upholding its dignity and independence. Nonetheless, it tended to be true under Elizabeth and her successor, > James I, that writers were either 'gentlemen amateurs' like Sidney and ▷ Ralegh, able to work independently, or professional writers like Ionson and Shakespeare, for whom patronage was important, if not indispensable. By the 18th century, thanks largely to the increased reading public and the growth of periodicals like Addison's ➤ Spectator and Jonson's ➤ Rambler, patronage was obsolescent, and chiefly required when a writer of slender means, such as > Samuel Johnson, attempted a major task, such as his Dictionary. Johnson's famous letter to Lord Chesterfield is a classic example of rebuke to a neglectful patron. Political parties and leaders by this time provided extensive patronage, eg Harley and the Tories to ▷ Defoe. Many writers gained a livelihood through the system by which the universities and landlords inherited from the monasteries (dissolved in the 1530s) the right to appoint parish priests; one example among many is the poet ➤ Crabbe whose verse tale The Patron (Tales of 1812) illustrates the unhappy side of patronage. Bib: Brennan, M., Literary Patronage in the English Renaissance; Lytle, G. F. and Orgel, S., Patronage in the Renaissance; Rosenberg, E., Leicester, Patron of Letters.

Paul's, Children of St

A company of boy-actors, chosen from the choirboys of St Paul's Cathedral, who were very popular with audiences at the end of the 16th century. Their chief rivals among boy-actors were the Children of the Chapel Royal. Both were to some extent serious rivals of the adult actors (see ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Hamlet II. ii). The boy companies were used especially for ▷ pastoral plays, such as those of ▷ John Lyly and ▷ George Peele.

Payn, James (1830-98)

Novelist. Educated at Éton and Cambridge, Payn launched his literary career by contributing to ▷ Dicken's ▷ Household Words. His highly popular novels tapped into the vogue for the ▷ sensation novel of the 1860s and 1870s, melodramatically dealing with scheming relatives, disputes over wills and strange disappearances; of these, the best known are Lost Sir Massingberd (1864) and By Proxy (1878). Between 1883 and 1896 Payn edited the ▷ Cornhill Magazine.

Peacham, Henry (c 1576-1643)

Author and artist. Although Peacham was interested in writing, he may be seen as an example of the ideal 'Renaissance man' whose interests and skills covered a wide range of topics and fields, for he was also proficient at music, drawing and mathematics. It is perhaps no surprise that one of his most popular works, The Complete Gentleman (1622), is a manual for young ⊳ gentlemen on how to behave and on what scholarly accomplishments they should set out to achieve. He combined his own literary and artistic skills in Minerva Britanna (1612), an > emblem-book, and wrote a treatise on the practical skills of artistry, Graphice (1606). He was well connected at the court of ⊳ James I, being associated with ▷ Jonson and ▷ Byrd; however, his own aesthetic leanings brought him closer to ➤ Henry, Prince of Wales, the king's elder son. Peacham has left the only contemporary picture of a > Shakespeare play in performance, a scene from > Titus Andronicus.

Bib: Cawley, R. R., Henry Peacham: his contribution to English poetry.

Peacock, Thomas Love (1785–1866) Novelist and poet. After unsuccessful attempts in poetry and the theatre, he found his special form in the 'discussion novel': Headlong Hall (1816); > Melincourt (1817); > Nightmare Abbey (1818); > Maid Marian (1822); The Misfortunes of Elphin (1829); > Crotchet Castle (1831); Gryll Grange (1861). These consist almost entirely of conversation and have very little plot; the characters represent outlooks, ideas, and attitudes such as arouse Peacock's derision, and the prevailing tone is comic and satirical. The conversations are interspersed with songs, often of great charm, and hilarious and extravagent episodes. His sceptical essay The Four Ages of Poetry (1820) provoked > Shelley's famous Defence of Poetry (1821). Bib: Van Doren, C., Life; Priestley, J. B., Life; Able, A. H., Meredith and Peacock - A Study in Literary Influence; House, H., in All in Due Time; Brett-Smith, H. F. B. (ed.), Life and Works, Vol 1; Mayoux, J. J., Un Epicurien Anglais: Peacock; Jack, I., Chap VII in Oxford History of English Literature.

Peake, Mervyn (1911-68)

Novelist, dramatist, poet and painter. Peake was born in China, but his family returned to England in 1923, where he subsequently trained as an artist. He is best known for his trilogy Gormenghast, a fantasy epic set in a grotesque world, consisting of Titus Groan (1946), Gormenghast (1950) and Titus Alone (1959). In form it is a ▷ Bildungsroman with multiple subplots, and it is distinguished by a rich vocabulary and by the effects of Peake's strong visual imagination. Peake's work met a mixed critical reception, but gained a considerable cult following, aided by the increasing popularity of fantasy fiction associated with the work of ▷ J. R. R. Tolkien.

Bib: Batchelor, J., Mervyn Peake: A Biographical and Critical Exploration.

Pearl

A 14th-century > dream-vision poem attributed to the > Gawain poet, preserved in the same manuscript as > Gawain and the Green Knight, > Patience and > Cleanness. It draws on the diverse traditions behind this literary form (as a medium for analysing abstract concepts, secular and religious, as a medium for insight into higher truths) and literally incorporates a scriptural vision into the narrative: the vision of New Jerusalem in Revelation becomes part of the personal experience of the Dreamer in Pearl. This translation of material from the Bible to the personal experience of the Dreamer, the realization of a prospect of an afterlife, epitomizes the subject of the narrative as a whole, which explores how spiritual truths may be represented by necessarily imperfect material means.

The pearl is the central object of meditation in the poem, providing both the means and end of the dream-vision. The movement of the narrative is shaped by the process of revealing layers of meaning in the form of a pearl. It opens with the narrator lamenting the loss of his prize possession, a pearl. But as he meets his lost pearl in his dream, the relationship between the man and his pearl is reinterpreted as that between a father and a daughter who has died in infancy. Retrospectively, the garden spot where the dreamer lost his pearl, and fell asleep, takes on the aspect of a grave. But the Pearl-maiden in the dream tries to redefine their relationship again and to convince the Dreamer that she is not lost, rather she has found a much better setting in New Jerusalem. In a series of exchanges she tries to tutor the Dreamer out of his materialistic values. The Dreamer finally sees his Pearl as one of the 144,000 virgin companions of Christ in New Jerusalem, but breaks his visionary experience when he tries to get closer and join the maiden.

The poem is itself pearl-shaped: the opening line is reworked as the closing line and this overall linking structure is repeated in the organization of the stanzas into groups of five, which are linked by echoing first and last lines. Each stanza is structured by a combination of alliterative lines and an elaborate rhyme scheme. It is an exercise in formal artifice of the highest order, and suggests that poetry may serve the ends of spiritual vision, but some recognition of the limitations of art are also built into the poem's structure, for one of its 12 sections contains six not five stanzas. The poem appears to be constructed as a pearl with a flaw of the most self-conscious literary kind. Bib: Gordon, E. V. (ed.), Pearl.

Peasants' Revolt

A popular uprising in 1381, which attempted to force the reform of an outmoded manorial system. The immediate stimulus of the revolt was an attempt to levy a further poll tax (on every head of the population), but it is clear from the demands finally presented to ▷ Richard II that the grievances arose from injustices in the manorial system, and from the 1370s onwards there had been growing signs of unrest with the restrictions of villeinage (the system whereby a tenant held land in return for manorial services). → John Ball and → Wat Tyler were among the leaders of the protest movement which mobilized disaffected labourers and peasants in 1381. The protesters, gathered from the counties around London, finally entered the city (having had no answer to their demand to meet the king), and opened prisons and attacked the property of nobles and civic administrators. > John of Gaunt's palace of Savoy, in the Strand, was gutted, and the Archbishop of London and several councillors were later executed. Risings occurred outside London at the same time, notably in the eastern counties. Richard II met the protesters, discussed their grievances, and agreed to their demands to abolish villeinage, to allow labour services to be engaged on the basis of free contract, and to the right to rent land for 4d an acre. At a later meeting with the king, Wat Tyler was killed by the Lord Mayor of London. The promises made by the king were not honoured and subsequently the Chief Justice toured the disaffected areas dispensing severe punishments to those involved in the uprisings.

Bib: Hilton, R., The English Peasantry in the Later Middle Ages; McKisack, M., The Fourteenth Century.

Peel, Sir Robert (1788-1850)

British Prime Minister 1834-5 and 1841-56, responsible for repealing the > Corn Laws in 1846, thereby freeing imports. Earlier in his career he was persuaded by the rising crime statistics that legal reform should be coupled with better crime prevention. In 1829, as Home Secretary, he carried through the Metropolitan Police Act that was responsible for the first disciplined police force for the Greater London area. Blue-coated, with top hats and truncheons, Peel's police helped to protect London from the riots that occurred in Bristol and elsewhere during the ➤ Reform Bill agitation in the early 1830s. From this point on the police force was gradually established throughout the whole country. 'Bobby', meaning policeman, derives from his name.

Peele, George (1556-96)

Poet and dramatist and one of ➤ University Wits, Peele was educated at Christ's Hospital and Oxford University. His work comprised various forms of dramatic entertainment characteristic of the taste of the time. His best-known plays are the ⊳ pastoral play The Arraignment of Paris (?1584), acted by the Children of the Royal Chapel, and The Old Wives' Tale (1590), which is something like a dramatized folk-tale. He also wrote a biblical play, The Love of King David and Fair Bethsabe (1587), and patriotic > history plays, The Famous Chronicle of King Edward I (printed 1593) and The Battle of Alcazar with the Death of Captain Stukeley (?1588), and a number of other plays have been attributed to him. In 1585 and 1591 he designed ⊳ pageants for London's Lord Mayor's Show. As a precursor of > Shakespeare he has a similar importance to > Robert Greene; he helped to give greater smoothness and flexibility to the use of the > blank-verse line, and combined elements appealing to popular taste with qualities of courtly refinement. He can thus be regarded as a contributor to the rich variety of tone that is unique to the best Elizabethan drama. Bib: Prouty, C. T., Life and Works; Cheffaud, P. H., George Peele.

Pelagian

The adjective from Pelagius, the Latin name of an early British theologian (4th-5th century AD). He is associated with a doctrine ('the Pelagian heresy') held to be false by most branches of the Christian Church – that it is within human power to be good; this is contrary to the Christian doctrine of 'Original Sin', according to which human beings relying on their own efforts must inevitably sooner or later do wrong, since moral goodness depends on the aid of Divine Grace.

Pellam

A Grail-keeper in the Quest of the Holy → Grail narratives, the father of → Pelles and Pellinore, who is wounded by → Balin (with the Dolorous Stroke) but healed much later by his great-grandson → Galahad.

Pelleas, Sir

In ▷ Malory's version of Arthurian narrative Pelleas first appears in hopeless pursuit of Ettard. ▷ Gawain promises to assist Pelleas in his quest but becomes Ettard's lover himself. Pelleas is helped by Nimue's spell to recover from his love sickness and subsequently marries this ▷ Lady of the Lake.

Pelles, Sir

A ➤ Fisher King, Lord of Corbenic, descended from Joseph of Arimathea. Sir Pelles engineers the conception of ➤ Galahad, the knight who is to achieve the ➤ Grail Quest.

Pembroke, Countess of ➤ Sidney, Mary.

Pendennis, The History of

A novel by > William Makepeace Thackeray, published serially 1848-50. It is about worldly upper-class society in London and the fortunes of a young man, Arthur Pendennis, whose 'bad angels' are his cynical, materialistic uncle, Major Pendennis, and the pretty but selfish Blanche Amory whom he nearly marries. Blanche's father, an escaped convict who is thought to be dead but is in fact - as Major Pendennis knows still alive, haunts the book in the guise of Colonel Altamont. Arthur's 'good angels' are his widowed mother, Helen; Laura Bell, whom he eventually marries and whom his mother has adopted; and George Warrington, a friend with whom he shares rooms. The good influences are, however, less imaginatively presented than the bad ones, and the distinctiveness of the novel depends on its amusing portraval of the vulgarity, intrigue, and materialism of London society and the journalistic and literary world of Fleet Street.

Penkethman (Pinkethman), William (?-1725) Actor, singer, dancer, manager. Penkethman is believed to have begun acting in about 1692 with the ▷ United Company at ▷ Drury Lane where he remained for most of his career. Penkethman's forte as an actor was comedy, and he was often asked to speak prologues and epilogues. Much of his humour was conveyed through clowning and mobile facial expression, although he was accused, on numerous occasions, of over-acting, and ad-libbing to excess.

Pennington, Sarah, Lady (d1783)

Author. She married Sir Joseph Pennington, a gentleman of Yorkshire, in 1746, and separated from him in acrimonious circumstances twelve years later. Thereafter she drew on her own experiences in writing conduct-books (>> conduct literature), letters and >> epistolary fiction. These include An Unfortunate Mother's Advice to her Absent Daughters; in a Letter to Miss Pennington (1761), her most popular and successful work, Letters on Different Subjects (1766), and The Child's Conductor (1777).

Bib: Todd, J., (ed.), A Dictionary of British and American Women Writers 1660–1800.

Penseroso, Il (c 1631)

A poem by \triangleright John Milton, published in 1645 though composed c 1631. The poem is a companion piece to \triangleright L'Allegro. The title can be translated from the Italian as signifying the thoughtful or reflective individual. The poem celebrates the retired life of thought and contemplation.

Pentameter

In English verse, usually five iambic feet, ie with the stress coming on every second syllable. The line has been the commonest in use since \triangleright Chaucer, eg the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales:

He knew the taverns well in every town.

The commonest English uses of the iambic pentameter are in ▷ blank verse and in ▷ heroic couplets (as in the Prologue).

▶ Metre.

Pepys, Samuel (1633-1703)

Diarist. He was an industrious and highly efficient official in the Admiralty Office, and a man who had musical culture and persistent, if amateurish, scientific and literary interests. As secretary to his cousin, Edward Montagu, Earl of Sandwich, he was aboard the fleet which brought > Charles II back to England at the Restoration in 1660. His official position in the Admiralty gave him the confidence of the king's brother, James Duke of York, who was Lord High Admiral, and an opportunity for direct observation of court life. He was elected to Parliament and knew the world of politics, was a friend of a number of leading writers and musicians, and held distinguished appointments in the > City of London. He was thus centrally placed to observe his age, and with all his seriousness he was pleasure-loving and witty.

His diary (kept 1660–9) is a unique document not only because he brought to it these qualities and advantages (many of which were shared by his friend the diarist ▷ John Evelyn) but because he kept it for his eye alone, and consequently wrote with unusual candour and objectivity. To prevent his scrvants and family from prying into it, he used a kind of shorthand cypher, which was not interpreted until 1825, when part of the diary was first published. The first more or less complete edition was in 1896. Of all diaries in English, it has the greatest appeal to the general reader, as well as having outstanding value for the historian.

Diaries.

Bib: Lives by J. R. Tanner, A. Bryant, and J. H. Wilson. Letters edited by J. R. Tanner, A. Bryant, and J. H. Wilson. Marburg, C., Mr Pepys and Mr Evelyn; Latham, R. and Mathews, W., (eds.), Diary.

Perceval

One of the members of the court of ▷ King Arthur. There is some variation in the treatment of Perceval's adventures and achievements in the Arthurian narratives of medieval Europe: Perceval is the hero of the > Grail Quest before > Galahad takes over his role. The earliest extant Perceval narrative is that composed by > Chrétien de Troyes (left unfinished but the subject of later continuations). The basic story of Sir Perceval is that of a child of noble origin who is brought up outside a court context but becomes fascinated with chivalry (despite his mother's attempts to keep him away from the world of knights). He is gradually educated in the chivalric code through a series of blunders, caused by his literal-minded application of helpful advice about how to be a knight. One of his missed opportunities involves his failure to heal the > Fisher King because he does not ask any questions about the mysterious Grail procession at the Fisher King's castle. Perceval attempts to make up for this mistake by searching for the Grail castle, and is successful in some versions of his story. In Parzival, composed in the 13th century by Wolfram von Eschenbach, Parzival is the knight who finally achieves the mystical Grail quest. In > Malory's version, he becomes a companion of Galahad and dies as a hermit in Sarras after Galahad has achieved the Quest. The 14th-century Middle English romance Sir Perceval concentrates on Perceval's over-literal attempts to follow the advice of his mother and others, and exploits the comic possibilities of Perceval as a non-ideal hero.

Percy, Thomas (1729–1811) Clergyman and antiquarian; he became Bishop of Dromore in 1782. Along with ➤ James Macpherson, ▷ Horace Walpole and ▷ Thomas Gray, Percy was a pioneer of the literary exoticism which flourished in the later 18th century. In 1761 he published Hau Kiou Choaan, a translation of a Portuguese version of a Chinese romance, and in 1763 Five Pieces of Runic Poetry, translated from Latin versions of Old Icelandic texts. His most influential work, Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765), includes poems from a 17th-century manuscript now in the British Museum and known as 'The Percy Folio'. This manuscript contains many ballads of ancient origin which Percy edited according to 18th-century taste, adding also some modern compositions in the archaic style. Although his editorial approach was not that of a modern purist, the volume marks a significant phase in the revival of interest in early poetry, and exerted a strong influence on later poets such as > Thomas Chatterton, Sir Walter Scott, > William Wordsworth and > Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Bib: Davis, B. H., Thomas Percy.

Peregrine Pickle, The Adventures of (1751) A novel by > Tobias Smollett. The hero is an adventurer seeking his fortune in England and on the Continent. Its form is a succession of episodes without a uniting structure, depending for its interest on the vigour of depiction of the characters and incidents. It contains famous eccentric characters, especially the retired sailor and his associates, Commodore Trunnion, Lieutenant Hatchway, and Tom Pipes. The episodes give opportunity for much social and political satire, from English village life upwards, and show an awareness of social structure like that found in the novels of ▷ Henry Fielding. Trunnion and his circle were an inspiration to ➤ Laurence Sterne's Uncle Toby in ➤ Tristram Shandy.

Perfectibilism

The optimistic doctrine that individuals and society are capable of achieving perfection in living. The ▷ French Revolution, with its reliance on reason for the solution of all human problems, encouraged perfectibilism, and the philosopher ▷ William Godwin was an English example. ▷ Peacock, in ▷ Headlong Hall (1816), presents a humorous version of a perfectibilist in Mr Foster.

Performance

➤ Competence.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre (1608–9)
A play, acts III–V of which are considered to be by > Shakespeare; acts I–II are mainly or entirely by another writer. The play was published in 1609 in an untrustworthy edition, but it was not included in a collected edition of Shakespeare's works until (in the same version) the third Folio of 1664. The story is based on a well-known late classical romance, Apollonius of Tyre, used by John Gower in his 14th-century cycle of poems, \triangleright Confessio Amantis (Book VIII). Gower appears in the play to speak the chorus, but the play does not follow his version in all respects; another source book was Lawrence Twine's The Pattern of Painful Adventures, first published in 1576.

In the first two acts, the play has a very rambling structure, but from Act III it follows a pattern characteristic of Shakespeare's last four plays. Although in each of these the pattern is varied, they have in common a central relationship between a prince and his daughter - in this case Pericles and ➤ Marina. Pericles is separated from her and is led to believe that both she and her mother, Thaisa, are dead. By the end of the play, however, he recovers them both, and the recovery restores him to happiness and health. The scene (V. i) in which Marina, at first unrecognizing of and unrecognized by her father, restores him from his stupor of sorrow, is of remarkable beauty, and recalls the scene in ➤ King Lear (IV. vii) in which Cordelia restores her father.

Periodicals

> Reviews and Periodicals, Newspapers.

Perrault, Charles (1628-1703)

French author, known in England chiefly for his collection of fairy tales published in 1697, Histoires et Contes du Temps Passé (Stories and Tales from the Past) subtitled Contes de ma Mère l'Oie (Tales of Mother Goose). They were translated into English by Robert Samber (1729), and have remained the best known fairy tales among English children. They were retold by Perrault from popular sources, and are as follows: Sleeping Beauty; Red Riding Hood; Blue Beard; Puss in Boots; The Fairy; Cinderella; Riquet with the Tuft; Hop o' my Thumb. Several of them provide the themes for modern Christmas > pantomimes.

Personification

> Figures of Speech.

Persuasion (1818)

The last completed novel by ▷ Jane Austen; it was published, incompletely revised, in 1818, the year following her death. The theme is the coming together of the heroine, Anne Elliott, and the hero, Captain Wentworth, in spite of social obstacles, the selfishness and foolishness of her father (Sir Walter) and sisters, and the rival attraction of the more obviously seductive Musgrove sisters. Anne, before the novel begins, had already refused Wentworth on the counsel of Lady Russell, who stands in place of mother to her; Lady Russell had misunderstood Wentworth's character and feared his poverty. Anne's personality is diffident and humble but at the opening of the story she has begun to realize that the refusal was a mistake, likely to ruin her happiness. The renewal of Wentworth's love and his eventual marriage to Anne is a victory: their strong and distinctive but quiet and reticent qualities overcome the cruder and shallower social characteristics of their circumstances.

Peter Bell: A Tale (1819)
Peter Bell the Third (1939)

The first is a 'lyrical ballad' by ➤ William Wordsworth, written in 1798 but not published until 1819. Peter, a hard-hearted hawker of earthenware, finds an ass gazing down at its drowned master in the River Swale. He seeks out the man's widow, and on his journey is reformed by the spiritual influence of nature. The poem possesses that deliberate flatness which characterizes some of Wordsworth's most original early works.

most original early works.

> Percy Bysshe Shelley, in his Peter Bell the Third (1819; published 1839), having read a review of the poem, used its title (somewhat inappropriately) in a > satire on the older poet's descent into respectability and conservatism. As Shelley says in his Dedication: 'He was at first sublime, pathetic, impressive, profound; then dull; then prosy and dull; and now dull on so very dull! it is an ultra-legitimate dullness'

Peter Grimes

A tale in heroic couplets (> metre) by > George Crabbe, Letter XXII in the series composing The Borough (1810). Peter is the son of a poor fisherman who tries to bring him up kindly and religiously. However, the boy is violent and wilful, and causes the death of his father by illtreatment. He then lives a solitary life, distrusted and feared by the neighbourhood, with only a boy from an orphanage for company. He treats the boy brutally and finally causes his death, after which he misuses two other boys in the same way. The magistrates forbid him to employ any more pauper boys as apprentices, and his life becomes increasingly solitary, until he is found drifting distractedly along the desolate coast in his boat. As he dies he tells how he has been haunted by the ghosts of his dead father and the three boys, who never leave him, and ceaselessly condemn him to an eternity of lonely drifting. The poem is remarkable for its social realism and psychological power. It was made into an opera by Benjamin Britten (1945).

Peter Pan (1904)

A children's play by \triangleright J. M. Barrie, originally called Peter Pan, or the Boy who wouldn't grow up. It became, and remains, extremely popular for its whimsical charm and its ingenious use of some traditional features of children's romances, such as Red Indians, the pirate Captain Hook who lives in fear of a crocodile which has already consumed one of his hands, and the fairy Tinkerbell.

➤ Children's books.

Peterloo Massacre, The

At a political meeting advocating the reform of parliamentary elections at St Peter's Field, Manchester, in 1819, the magistrates took alarm and ordered soldiers to attack the crowd. A small number of people were killed, and a large number were injured. The event caused intense resentment against the government of the time, and was nicknamed 'Peterloo' in ironic reference to the Anglo-Prussian victory over Napoleon at ▷ Waterloo in 1815. It provoked > Shelley's fierce poem > The Masque of Anarchy. It was also one of the causes of the establishment of the Metropolitan Police Force by Robert Peel in 1829, so that there should be a possibility of keeping order among crowds without the use of soldiers and firearms.

▶ Reform Bills, Parliamentary.

Petition of Right

A demand leading to a law forced on ➤ King Charles I by Parliament in 1628; it ended imprisonment without trial, the raising of taxes without Parliamentary authorization, martial law (ie legal judgements enforced under military authority), and the billeting of troops in private houses as an indirect means of forcing political obedience. It was the first major clash between Charles and Parliament in the conflict that ended in the ➤ Civil War of 1642-6.

Petrarch (Francesco Petrarca) (1304–74) Italian poet and scholar. Petrarch's influence on English ➤ Renaissance poetry is incalculable. Petrarch's early years were spent in the Papal court at Avignon, but his life was one of constant movement – he described himself as peregrinus ubique, a wanderer everywhere. He travelled throughout Provence and Italy, living for eight years in Milan (1353–61), but visited in that time centres as far afield as Prague and Paris.

Travelling was to become a central metaphor in Petrarch's writing. The idea of the journey in his own life seemed to imitate great journeys of the past – those of the Apostles, St Augustine of Hippo (345−430), and the Homeric heroes. Life itself could be represented as a journey, or pilgrimage or, on occasion, a flight. This > metaphor of transience was to be one of the many 'Petrarchan' motifs that English poets were to assimilate with such delight (cf > Sir Thomas Wyatt's sonnet 'My galley charged with forgetfulness') Depic on Scipio Africanus), the Secretum (a self-analytical dialogue), and his collection of poetry, the Canzoniere. The Canzoniere (also known as the Rime or Rime sparse) contained, by the end of his life, some 366 poems in all, the majority of which deal with the poet's love for 'Laura' − the unobtainable ideal of womanhood − whom Petrarch claimed to have first seen in church on 6 April 1327. In addition to the Canzoniere, he composed imitations of Depuis Virgil's Eclogues and the six Trionfi (Triumphs) poems − the triumphs of Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time and Eternity.

Petrarch's chief works are his Africa (a Latin

The Trionfi and the Canzoniere, were medieval best-sellers. Both circulated widely in manuscript form before their first publication in 1470. The Trionfi were to have a huge influence upon all forms of Renaissance representation - poetry, painting, tapestry, medals, emblems, ⊳ pageants and theatre. At the same time, the introspective self-analysis, and the depiction of a female ideal who is both mistress and saint in the Canzoniere. were to influence European poets of the 16th and 17th centuries. The ⊳ sonnet sequences of ▷ Sir Philip Sidney, ▷ Samuel Daniel, > Michael Drayton and others, as well as the poetry, in an earlier period, of Sir Thomas Wyatt and ▶ Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, all took Petrarch as a startingpoint. Similarly the anti-Petrarchism of some of ➤ Shakespeare's sonnets or ➤ Donne's poetry, is, in its vigorous denial of Petrarchan modes, a tribute to the pervasive influence on the Renaissance sensibility of the Italian poet's work.

Bib: Durling, R. M., (ed.), Petrarch's Lyric Poems; Minta, S., Petrarch and Petrarchism.

Pfeiffer, Emily (1827-90)

Welsh poet and polemical writer, born in Montgomeryshire. Pfeiffer wrote ten volumes of poetry, including Gerard's Monument (1873); Poems (1876); Sonnets and Songs (1880); The Rhyme of the Lady of the Rock (1884) and Flowers of the Night (1889). Her work is informed by a Victorian ▶ feminist perspective, is sympathetic to marginalized women and addresses subjects such as ⊳ marriage, rape, > education, sexuality and work. Pfeiffer also wrote political essays including Flying Leaves from East and West (1885), written after a tour of Asia and America, and Women and Work (1887), where she protests against the limited vocational opportunities available to women. She died in 1890, leaving £,2000 for higher education for women, which was used to build accommodation for female students at University College, Cardiff.

➤ Welsh literature in English. Bib: Hickok, K., Representations of Women: 19th Century British Women's Poetry; Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Phallocentrism

This term is used generally to mean 'male-centred' and therefore overlaps with > androcentrism, but the strict meaning is 'centred on the phallus'. In this sense it is used by feminists to indicate the way power is invested in male symbolism and activity.

Philaster, or Love lies a-bleeding (1611) A romantic play by > Francis Beraumont and > John Fletcher; it was produced in 1611, and is in blank verse. It is the first in a style of > tragicomedy that became characteristic of the English theatre during the next 30 years. Of all Beaumont and Fletcher's collaborations, it is perhaps the most famous; it derives from the prose romances of chivalry popular in France and Spain, and to some extent (eg ➤ Philip Sidney's ➤ The Arcadia) in England. The plot is characteristic: Philaster is rightful king of Sicily, but his throne has been usurped by the king of Calabria, with whose daughter, Arethusa, he is in love. He keeps communication with her through his page, Bellario. Her father wants her to marry Pharamond of Spain, and to avoid this she reveals to him the love affair between Pharamond and Megra, a lady of her father's court. In revenge Megra makes out that Arethusa has been having an affair with Bellario, whom Philaster accordingly dismisses. It then turns out that Bellario is a girl disguised as a page for love of Philaster. This situation seems to be borrowed from > Shakespeare's > Twelfth Night, but Shakespeare combined poignant truth to natural feelings with the romantic extravagance of the plot. Beaumont and Fletcher's emotion is obviously 'poetic' but not convincing.

Philemon and Baucis

A tale by the Roman poet ▷ Ovid, from the eighth book of his ▷ Metamorphoses. They are an aged peasant couple and very poor, but they give hospitality to the gods Zeus and Hermes, disguised as travellers. In reward, their cottage is transformed into a temple, of which they are made priest and priestess; they are also permitted to die in the same hour, and after death they are transformed into trees with intertwining boughs. ▷ Dryden's version (1693) of Ovid's poem is one of his best ▷ translations; ▷ Swift also wrote a poem on the subject (1709).

Philips, Ambrose (1675?-1749)

Poet. Associate of ▷ Joseph Addison and ▷ Richard Steele, and member of the Whig clique which frequented ▷ Button's ▷ Coffeehouse. His ▷ couplet epistle, describing a snow scene addressed from Copenhagen to the ▷ Earl of Dorset, is a brilliantly evocative work, which was admired by ▷ Alexander Pope. His Pastorals (1700) were published in the same year as those of Pope, and the coincidence prompted a theoretical debate, which now seems quite arid, concerning the correct understanding of the form. Philips, it was felt, preserved the authentic rusticity of the ancient genre, while Pope polished it into a modern elegance. When the Buttonian > Thomas Tickell pointedly praised Philips' pastorals in The Guardian, Pope submitted an anonymous piece On Pastorals to the same journal, in which with straight-faced irony he prefers Philips' poems to his own. The irony was so fine that, as > Samuel Johnson relates, 'though Addison discovered it, Steele was deceived, and was afraid of displeasing Pope by publishing his paper'. Philips also edited a periodical (> reviews and periodicals), The Freethinker (1718-21), wrote several plays, Pindaric > odes, and poems addressed to children, whose archness led his contemporary Henry Carey to attack him in Namby-Pamby (1725), from which the epithet in current use derives.

Philips, John (1676-1709)

Poet and physician. A pioneer of poetry in Miltonic blank verse. The Splendid Shilling (1701), described by ▷ Joseph Addison as 'the finest burlesque poem in the British language' presents a rueful self-portrait of the down-atheel poet, without a shilling to his name. 'But I, whom griping penury surrounds,/ And Hunger, sure Attendant upon Want,/ With scanty Offals, and small acid Tiff/ (Wretched Repast!) my meagre Corps sustain:/ Then Solitary walk, or doze at home/ In Garret vile, and with a warming puff/ Regale chill'd Fingers'. The poet hides in a cupboard from a dun, then writes moody poems about disappointed love, and the work ends with an ⊳ epic simile comparing the splitting of his ageing breeches to a shipwreck in the Aegean. Philips' obvious delight in self-dramatization gives the poem permanent appeal. He also wrote a serious ⊳ epic, Blenheim (1705), but his most influential work was Cyder (1708), a Georgic poem in two books blending landscape description (often focused on Hereford, where he practised medicine), historical and philosophical reflection, and detailed advice on orchard-management. Its assured handling of blank verse, and its easy discursiveness of tone, were emulated and developed further by > James Thomson in his Seasons.

Philips, Katherine (1632-1664)

Welsh poet and dramatist working during the ▷ Interregnum (1649–1660), known as 'Orinda'. Her parents were ▷ Presbyterians, and in 1647 she married James Philips, a supporter of ▷ Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658). Katherine Philips herself was a Royalist, and her poems record the difference between her own views and those of her husband. She was fluent in several languages, and a prolific writer. Thus far, 116 poems, five verse > translations and translations of two plays comprise her canon. The performance of her translation of French dramatist > Pierre Corneille's Pompey in 1663 make her the first woman to have a play staged professionally in London. In 1651, her poems began to circulate in manuscript, and they were first published in 1651, prefixed to the poems of ⊳ Henry Vaughan and Thomas Cartwright. In 1664 an unauthorized edition of her poems was published, but an authorized edition appeared in 1667. Philips' 'Society of Friendship', a correspondence circle, seems to have begun in 1651 and lasted until 1666, and included Henry Vaughan, among others. Within the circle, each member was assigned a name from classical literature, and Philips was dubbed 'Matchless Orinda'. Her letters to Sir Charles Cotterell were published as Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus (1705). She also corresponded with > Dorothy Osborne. When she died of smallpox, her translation of Horace was unfinished. Philips was praised by her contemporaries as the ideal woman poet because of her modest choice of subjects (compare, for example, > Aphra Behn). The majority of her poetry is written for particular occasions or persons, and in many of them she transforms the conventional language of courtship and applies it to friendships between women: 'Our hearts are mutuall victims lay'd, / While they (such power in friendship ly's) / are Altars, Priests, and off rings made, / And each heart which thus kindly dy's / Grows deathless by the sacrifise.'

➤ Polwhele, Elizabeth Bib: Greer, G., et al., Kissing the Rod; Hobby, E., Virtue of Necessity.

Phillips, Caryl (b 1958)

Novelist, playwright, travel writer. Born in St Kitts, West Indies, brought up in Leeds, England, and educated at Oxford, he has been writer-in-residence at the Factory Community Centre, London, at the Literary Criterion Centre, Mysore, India and at the University of Stockholm, Sweden. Both Cambridge (1991) and Crossing the River (1993) consist of several narratives linked by the theme of slavery, and both are written in an imitation of 18th and 19th-century English. His other novels are: The Final Passage (1985); A State of Independence (1986); Higher Ground (1989). Plays: Strange Fruit (1981); Where There is Darkness (1982); The Shelter (1984); The Wasted Years (1985); Playing Away (1987). Travel writing: The European Tribe (1987).

Philosophes

➤ Encyclopaedists.

Phiz (Browne, Hablot Knight) (1815–82) Illustrator. He was the principal illustrator for the novels of ➤ Charles Dickens (especially David Copperfield, ▷ The Pickwick Papers, Dombey and Son, ▷ Martin Chuzzlewit,

> Bleak House). He also illustrated the works of other Victorian novelists, notably > Harrison Ainsworth and > Charles Lever.

Phoenix and the Turtle, The (1632-64)
A poem by ▷ Shakespeare included in an anthology Love's Martyr (1601) assembled by Robert Chester. The book includes other poems on the love and death of the phoenix and the turtle (turtle-dove); some of these are anonymous and others (including Shakespeare's, and verses by ▷ Ben Jonson, ▷ George Chapman and ▷ John Marston) are signed.

Shakespeare's poem consists of 13 quatrains followed by five triplets (stanzas of three lines) as a concluding 'threnos' (ie threnody, or song of lament). The phoenix represents Beauty, and the turtle, Truth; they are united by love; by their death, Reason (personified as the singer of the threnos) declares that the world has been deprived of real truth and real beauty:

Truth may seem, but cannot be; Beauty brag, but 'tis not she; Truth and beauty buried be.

Beauty and Truth, the poem says, have therefore no meaning separable from Love. The poem is idealist in the style of ▷ Renaissance ▷ Platonism, it is also metaphysical in its concepts, but not in the style of the ▷ Metaphysical Poets who owe their name to ways of thinking rather than to the concepts they invoke.

Physician's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. It is an exemplary narrative, set in the Roman past, recounting the history of Virginia, a beautiful young woman who is beheaded by her father Virginius. He chooses to murder his daughter, rather than allow her to be placed in the care of a corrupt and lascivious judge, Appius. The judge is later publically executed for his corruption of the law: Virginius is publically reprieved. Several other versions of this disturbing narrative were available to Chaucer (in ▷ John Gower's ▷ Confessio Amantis, in the > Roman de la Rose), but the version in the Physician's Tale is distinctive for its emphasis on the pathos of Virginia's murder, subversive of the apparent lesson of the narrative, which purports to show how sin has its rewards.

Picaresque

From the Spanish picaro, 'rogue' or 'cunning trickster'. The term is especially applied to a form of prose fiction originating in Spain in the 16th century, with such works as the anonymous Lazarille de Tormes (1553), and dealing with the adventures of such characters in loose episodic form, often involving a journey.

The first distinctive example in English is Thomas Nashe's The Unfortunate Traveller (1594). In the 18th century, examples include

Daniel Defoe's

Moll Flanders,

Henry Fielding's

Jonathan Wild and

Tobias

Smollett's The Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom. Other traditions combine with the picaresque: the mock romance in the tradition of Don Quixote, and the tradition of religious pilgrimage (cf.

The Pilgrim's Progress).

Bib: Sieber, H., The Picaresque.

Pickwick Papers, The (1836-7)

The first novel by ➤ Charles Dickens, published serially 1836-7. The story is the adventures of Mr Pickwick and his friends Tupman, Snodgrass and Winkle, who go on a journey of observation of men and manners on behalf of the Pickwick Club, of which Mr Pickwick is the founder and the chairman. The episodes are predominantly comic and Mr Pickwick seems at first to be intended as a mere figure of fun, destined always to be made a fool of owing to his extreme innocence of the ways of the world. Fairly early on, however, he acquires a servant, Sam Weller, Sam is the ideal servant; he is practical, good-humoured, resourceful and devoted. Pickwick now begins to be endowed with a new dignity; still very innocent, he is no longer a mere figure of fun, for he is also shown to have positive moral qualities, such as a determination to stand by the values of truth and justice. He becomes, in fact, a kind of 19th-century English middleclass Don Quixote with Sam Weller as a Sancho Panza, without any of the ridiculousness of Sancho, but with a great deal of comedy derived from his highly developed and typically Cockney sense of humour. At first there is a story but no plot; about half-way through, however, a semblance of a plot develops with Mrs Bardell's conspiracy to obtain £750 from Mr Pickwick for breach of promise of marriage. Assisted by a firm of unscrupulous lawyers, she is at first successful and Mr Pickwick goes to prison. This is the beginning of Dickens' constant preoccupation with prison and with the parasitic qualities of the legal profession. Various episodes illustrate the kinds of social viciousness which Dickens was to enjoy ridiculing or dramatizing - the cheerful roguery of Mr Jingle; the hypocrisy of the 'shepherd', Mr Stiggins; the demagogic Mr Potts in the parliamentary election at Eatanswill, etc. By contrast, Mr Wardle represents the opulent philanthropy and cordial 'religion of Christmas' which were also to figure in Dickens' novels to the end but especially in the earlier ones. In the outcome, Mr Pickwick and Sam Weller emerge as a kind of ideal alliance between the middle and working classes - complete sincerity and integrity in moral guidance on Pickwick's part, total devotion and most useful practical capacity on Weller's side.

Picture of Dorian Gray, The (1890)
A novel by ▷ Oscar Wilde which updates
▷ Goethe's ▷ Faust legend. Tempted by the selfish sybarite Henry Wotton, Dorian trades his soul for eternal youth and beauty while his portrait, painted by Basil Hallward, who appeals to the better side of his nature, bears the ravages of time and Dorian's decadent living. It was meant as an examination of the consequences of regarding sensual indulgence and moral indifference as aesthetic ends in themselves. Another version of the doppelgänger, it has much in common with ▷ Stevenson's
▷ The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde.
▷ Aestheticism.

Picturesque, The Cult of the

A term used in the late 18th and early 19th centuries to describe a certain kind of scenery, where cultivation was employed to produce artificially 'wild' nature. Landscape gardeners incorporated 'wildernesses' into their prospects, often with fake ruins suggesting the decay of classical civilization. The writer most identified with the 'picturesque' was William Gilpin (1724–1804), who wrote a series of illustrated picturesque tours. ▷ Jane Austen in ▷ Mansfield Park parodies the cult, and ▷ Thomas Love Peacock's Headlong Hall satirizes a contemporary dispute about its qualities.

'Pied Piper of Hamelin, The' (1845) A poem by > Robert Browning. It retells an ancient legend: a piper promises to rid the town of Hamelin in Germany of its plague of rats in return for a thousand guilders from the Council. The rats follow the music of his pipe as far as the river Weser, where they are drowned. The Council, however, refuse to pay the piper, whereupon he similarly plays the children out of town and into the side of a mountain which opens to receive them. The origin of the legend may be the Children's Crusade of 1212, when thousands of young people were persuaded to join an expedition to the Holy Land, and many of them perished on the journey.

Piers Plowman

Attributed to > William Langland, Piers Plowman is a major > alliterative narrative poem, composed in the later 14th century and extant in three versions, conventionally known as the A, B and C texts. It is now generally accepted that Langland is responsible for each of these versions, and it seems the composition of the poem must have occupied some 25 years of his life: the A text, consisting of a Prologue and 12 Passus (the 'steps' or divisions of the poem), dates from c 1367–70; the B text, which reworks and develops material from A and is about three times as long, dates from c 1377–9; the C text, a partial revision of B, dates from c 1385–6.

The ▶ dream-vision mode frees medieval poets from the conventional time and space limitations of other narrative genres, and facilitates literary speculations of all kinds. Langland uses these possibilities to the full in Piers Plowman, which is made up of a series of dream-vision sequences (ten in all in the B and C texts, two of which occur as dreams within dreams). The dreams of Will, the narrator, provide the medium for a wideranging investigation into the theory and practice of Christian conduct - in Christian society as a whole, and in the life of its individual members. The current corrupt state of clerical and ecclesiastical practice is an insistent topic of the text. The dreamscapes shift from overviews of a whole society (as seen in the 'field ful of folk' with which the poem opens) to a more introspective landscape (as when Will encounters other personified faculties such as Wit and Thought in later Passus) to a visionary experience of major events in Christian history (such as Will's vision of the Crucifixion and Resurrection sequence in the B and C texts). The context of Will's dreams shifts too in the course of the poem; he begins dreaming alone in the Malvern hills but after a later dream he wakes up to call his wife and daughter to church.

Through using the dream medium Langland is able to locate the events of his poem in different times as well as places: attention is focussed on the status quo of 14th-century English society (in the Prologue), on a projected future state of its reform, on the stages in the life of an individual member of that society (in the history of Will, the Dreamer/ narrator), on the history of the Church itself and on the place of the individual and society within the overarching framework of Christian history (Will witnesses a replaying of events leading up to, and following, the Crucifixion). In fact Langland progressively complicates the temporal dimension of the action in the B and C texts, so that individual, social and Christian history intermesh. By the end of the narrative, the end of the Dreamer's life approaches, as the institution of the Christian church itself seems set to crumble as the time of Antichrist draws near.

The poem does not however end with universal collapse, but with the Dreamer renewing his quest for Piers Plowman, the linking character of the narrative, who appears in different roles (as leader of social reform, as a model for the spiritual life), and who seems able to make the connections between the divisions the Dreamer sees all around him (between Christian theory and practice, between knowledge and understanding, between the different stages of Christian life, Do-wel, Do-bet, Do-best). In Piers Plomman the dream medium is used not only as a means of analysis and debate (as it is in many other dream-vision poems of his time) but also as a medium for experiences of insight and integration when manifold connections can be made, although not sustained.

The language of the Church and the Bible (Latin) is woven together with the language of the laity (English): the question of how the former should be translated into the latter creates one of the crisis points in the B text (Passus 7), when Piers Plowman and a priest debate how the text of a pardon should be interpreted. Partly the issues at stake in the poem come down to questions of semantics, as the Dreamer tries to find out what words mean, and is sometimes enlightened, but is often confused. The result is a text which pays extraordinary attention to the resources of verbal expression, and in which puns, metaphors and word-play of all kinds abound, as Langland explores ways of making the spiritual visible.

Over 50 manuscripts are extant, which suggests that Langland's work enjoyed considerable popularity in the 15th century among clerics and members of the educated middle classes. An edition of the B text was printed in 1550. George Puttenham's response to Langland's work (in the Art of English Poesy c 1589) suggests he read it less as 'poesy', more as social satire, and that view has tended to predominate in critical studies of Langland's work until very recently.

Bib: Alford, J. (ed.), A Companion to Piers Plowman; Pearsall, D. (ed.), Piers Plowman by William Langland: An Edition of the C text; Schmidt A. V. C. (ed.), William Langland: the Vision of Piers Plowman.

Pilgrimage of Grace, The

A rebellion provoked by the closing of the > monasteries in 1536. It arose in and was chiefly supported by the north of England, and this fact shows that it had a social and political basis as well as a religious one. The south of England was economically and socially much more advanced as well as more closely in touch with movements of religious reform on the continent of Europe; in consequence, monasteries were not only becoming redundant there in their social functions, but were to some extent actively resented. In the north of England they were more respected on religious grounds, and still served social functions of poor relief and large employment of labour. In addition to these causes directly related to monastic institutions, there were other social causes bound up with the resentment of the old landed nobility of the north for the newer nobility of the south, who were encouraged and advanced in public service by ⊳ King Henry VIII. The closing of the monasteries was a pretext for rebellion such as the northern nobility had been looking for. The rebellion was formidable, and the government, through its representative the Duke of Norfolk, had to come to terms; the terms, however, were not kept, and once the rebel army had dispersed, its leaders were executed.

Pilgrim's Progress, The

A prose ➤ allegory by ➤ John Bunyan. The Pilgrim's Progress from this World to that which is to come is in two parts: Part I (1678) tells of the religious conversion of Christian, and of his religious life – conceived as a pilgrimage – in this world, until he comes to the River of Death, and the Heavenly City which lies beyond it; Part II (1684) describes the subsequent conversion of his wife Christiana and their children, and their similar journey with a group of friends.

Both parts contain episodes which symbolize real life experiences: thus, Christian, soon after the way has been pointed out to him, falls into the ➤ Slough of Despond - a bog which represents the depression which overcomes the new convert when he has passed the stage of first enthusiasm; later he has to pass through phases of spiritual despair and terror, symbolized by the ⊳ Valleys of Humiliation and the Shadow of Death; he has to face the derision and anger of public opinion in the town of Vanity Fair, and so on. Christiana and the children have an easier time; perhaps Bunvan wished to show that God in his mercy shields the weaker pilgrims, or perhaps that public opinion is harsher to pioneers than to those that follow them.

The 'pioneer pilgrims' - Christian and his associates - belong to the Puritan sects, of one of which Bunyan was himself a member, who were undergoing persecution in the reign of Charles II, especially during the earlier years, when English society was in strong reaction against the previous Puritan regime of Oliver Cromwell. Yet The Pilgrim's Progress is much more than merely a dramatization of the Puritan spirit. By its allegorical content, it is related to the tradition of the allegorical sermon which, in village churches, survived the Reformation of the 16th century, and some of the adventures (Christian's fight with Apollyon, the Castle of Giant Despair, the character of Greatheart) are related in spirit to popular versions of medieval and 16th century romances, surviving in the > chapbooks. These aspects give it a close relation with popular traditions of culture to an extent unequalled by any other major literary work. Another element of popular culture shows in Bunyan's assimilation of the English translation of the > Bible, and this reminds us that for many households the Bible was the only book constantly read, and that during the next century Bunyan's allegory took its place beside it. Still more important than these links with the past is Bunyan's anticipation of the kind of vision of human nature which in the 18th and 19th centuries was to find its scope in the novel: his allegorized characters do not, as in past allegories, merely simplify human virtues and vices, but reveal how an individual destiny can be shaped by the predominance in a personality of an outstanding quality, good or bad; the adventures of the pilgrims are conditioned by the differences of these qualities. Thus, Christian and Faithful, fellow pilgrims, have radically different temperaments and correspondingly different experiences.

➤ Celestial City; City of Destruction; Doubting Castle; Vanity Fair.

Pilkington, Laetitia (c 1708-1750)

Irish poet and memoirist, born to parents of Dutch origin in Dublin. In 1725 she married the Reverend Matthew Pilkington and met satirist > Jonathan Swift and others. Swift helped Matthew Pilkington to a chaplaincy in London and when Mrs Pilkington followed she found that her husband was involved with an actress. In 1733 she returned alone to Dublin, already regarded as a woman of dubious character. In 1738 Pilkington divorced her for adultery. Pilkington did not supply much maintenance, and she and her children moved to London, where she tried to live by her writing. She began with the subject of masculine infidelity in The Statues: Or, the Trial of Constancy (1739) and accompanied writing with wild living. She found it hard to survive by her pen, and was imprisoned for debt, escaping to open a bookshop in St James'. She returned to Dublin in 1747, and began to publish her Memoirs featuring stories of Swift and > Samuel Richardson, some of which settled old scores.

Her other publications include: An Excursory View on the Present State of Things and Memoirs (1748–1754).

Pinckney, Eliza Lucas (C1722-1793) North American letter-writer. Born in Antigua, West Indies, and educated in England, she was the daughter of wealthy South Carolinan plantation owners. An astute and imaginative businesswoman, she managed the family plantations in the West Indies beginning in 1740. Her experiments to improve the cultivation of indigo were major contributions to that crop's importance in the West Indian and American South's economies. The Journal and Letters of Eliza Lucas details her life in the West Indies, her experiments with indigo, her attitudes towards ➤ marriage and her religious beliefs. After a life in which she continued her various agricultural experimentations and raised a family in South Carolina, she died in Philadelphia.

Pindar (5th century BC)

Greek poet. He is famous for his lyrical > odes, ie poems to be sung to the accompaniment of musical instruments and dancing. The odes had a strong religious tone and were designed for solemn occasions, including sporting celebrations. The fact that their composition was influenced by their musical and dance accompaniment gives the odes an appearance of irregularity. This, and the loftiness of their emotion, made them tempting models, from the 17th to 19th centuries, for English poets when they were writing on themes of deep emotional power and felt the need of an ample form which would allow them considerable licence in the treatment of the subject. Pindar's odes were not really as unsystematic as they seemed, however, and many English poems in 'Pindarics' have only a superficial resemblance to the kind of ode that Pindar wrote. Notable examples are Dryden's Alexander's Feast, and Ode to the Memory of Anne Killigrew.

Pindaric Ode ➤ Ode.

Pindarics

➤ Pindar.

Pinero, Sir Arthur Wing (1855-1934) Dramatist. His earliest plays were farces, but in 1889 The Profligate showed a great advance in seriousness over earlier plays in the century, when the English theatre had been practically bankrupt of contemporary drama of interest. At about this time, largely owing to the influence of ➤ Ibsen, drama was being revised radically in Europe, Pinero's The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893) was at the time of its production a conspicuous contribution to the new movement; it was translated into French. German and Italian, and attracted the leading European actress of the age, Eleonora Duse, Pinero followed this success with other plays which sustained his reputation in Britain at least, such as Trelawny of the 'Wells' (1898) and The Gay Lord Quex (1899). He was, in fact, a prolific writer, publishing thirty-nine plays between 1891 and 1930. His plays are now seldom produced and little studied: in wit and dramatic ingenuity he was soon excelled by ➤ George Bernard Shaw. Like Tom Robertson (1829-71) before him, his brilliance was like that of a candle in the dark; he was conspicuous in contrast to the dullness that preceded him. Bib: Dunkel, W.D., Life; Boas, F.S., From Richardson to Pinero; Lazenby, W., Pinero.

Pinter, Harold (b 1930)

British dramatist. Major works: The Room (1957); The Birthday Party (1958); The Dumb Waiter (1957); A Slight Ache (radio 1958, stage 1961); A Night Out (1960); The Caretaker (1960); The Homecoming (1964); Old Times (1971); No Man's Land (1975); Betrayal (1978); A Kind of Alaska (1982); Mountain Language (1988).

His distinctiveness among contemporary dramatists arises from his use of dialogue.

Words are used less for communication than for justification by the speaker's self to himself, and as weapons against others. He has been claimed as a British exponent of the Theatre of the Absurd, although his plays often begin from an ostensibly naturalistic context, which breaks down into a threatening, and sometimes surreal world. The plays are often structured around the intrusion of a menacing stranger into an apparently safe world, who then becomes a catalyst for the return of the repressed. The theatre critic Irving Wardle has termed Pinter's work the 'Comedy of Menace'. Pinter has said that his fascination with oblique communication was something that he learned as a Jew brought up in an anti-semitic area of London, where evasion was a means of survival.

Born in the East End, the son of a Jewish tailor, Pinter worked as an actor before turning to writing and still performs occasionally as well as directing. The first London production of a Pinter play was received with critical incomprehension, and was a commercial disaster. The Birthday Party, in which two menacing figures threaten the banality of a seaside boarding house, was variously described in the national papers as: 'half-gibberish', 'puzzling' a 'baffling mixture'. Consequently, The Dumb Waiter had its first performance in Hamburg, and it was not until The Caretaker in 1960 that Pinter was recognised as a major writer.

All the plays sound an enigma, the threat in them is all the more frightening for never being directly explained. Pinter's work has been interpreted in a host of different ways; among other theories, Freud and the Bible have been hauled in to account for their obscurity, but Pinter resolutely insists that the plays mean no more than they say: 'I can sum up none of my plays. I can describe none of them, except to say: That is what happened. That is what they said. That is what they did.'

Pinter is also a major film writer, whose credits include The Servant (1963), The Quiller Memorandum (1966), The Go-Between (1971), The French Lieutenant's Woman (1981) and The Handmaid's Tale (1990).

Piozzi, Hester Thrale

> Thrale, Hester Lynch.

Pitt (the Elder), William, Earl of Chatham (1708–78)

English politician. He led the government during the major part of the > Seven Years' War, during which the British won Canada from the French, and established themselves as the dominant political influence on the subcontinent of India. The successes of this war are usually attributed to Pitt's statesmanship.

Pitt (the Younger), William (1759-1806)
Politician. The son of ➤ William Pitt, Earl of Chatham. He led the government from 1783 to 1801, and again in the years 1804-6. He first became Prime Minister when he was only 24, at a time when ▷ George III's government had been deeply discredited by defeat in the > American War of Independence, brought to an end by the Peace of Versailles, 1783. Moreover, politics were thoroughly corrupted by various systems of bribery, and Parliament represented only the interests of various sections of the privileged classes. Pitt was as prudent a statesman as his father had been a dynamic one, and he was famous for his strict integrity. His first ministry was one of cautious reconstruction such as Britain needed for the long wars with France (War of the ▶ French Revolution, 1793-1801, and the ➤ Napoleonic War, 1803-15). Politically he was conservative 'Tory', but he was the first political leader to rely on public opinion as expressed in the electoral constituencies instead of on more or less bribed backing among Members of Parliament.

Pitter, Ruth (1897-1992)

Poet. Pitter's long writing career began with the publication of First Poems in 1920, and developed through traditional routes: her poetry is accessible, simple and anti- > modernistic. She has also written on gardening. In 1955 she became the first women to win the Queen's Gold Medal for Poetry. Her works include: Persephone in Hades (1931); A Mad Lady's Garland (1934); The Rude Potato (1941); On Cats (1947); Still By Choice (1966); Poems 1926–1966 and End of Drought (1975).

Bib: Gilbert, R., Four Living Poets; Russell, A. (ed.), Ruth Pitter: Homage to a Poet; Watkin, E. I. Poets and Mystics.

Pix, Mary (1666-1709)

Dramatist and novelist, one of the so-called 'Female Wits' satirized in a play of that name in 1696. Pix's first play, a heroic tragedy called Ibrahim, the Thirteenth Emperor of the Turks, was produced at Drury Lane in 1696, the same year as her novel, The Inhuman Cardinal, Or: Innocence Betrayed, and a comedy following > Aphra Behn, The Spanish Wives. Another comedy, The Innocent Mistress, was staged at Lincoln's Inn Fields in the following year. Later plays include The Deceiver Deceived (1697), The False Friend (1699), The Beau Defeated (1700), The Double Distress (1701); and The Conquest of Spain (1705); Pix wrote a dozen plays in all, of which the comedies are generally considered far superior to the tragedies. Bib: Steeves, E. L. (ed.), The Plays of Mary Bib: Steeves, E. L. (ed.), The Plays of Mary Pix and Catharine Trotter; Clark, C., Three Augustan Women Playwrights; Morgan, F. (ed.), The Female Wits.

Plain Dealer, The (1676)
Dark comedy by ➤ William Wycherley, based on ➤ Molière's Le Misanthrope. Manly, an 'honest' but dour sea captain, has put his trust in the duplicitous Vernish and brittle Olivia, to whom he has been betrothed. In his absence the two have secretly married, and she has appropriated the fortune that he had entrusted to her care. Manly returns from the Dutch Wars and, on learning of her marriage to an unknown man, determines to revenge himself on her by seducing her, with the help of his page. Also unknown to him, the page is a woman in disguise, Fidelia, who has loved him and gained employment with him in order to be near him. The 'youth' reluctantly agrees to address Olivia on Manly's behalf, but Olivia becomes attracted to Fidelia, and attempts to make love to her, in a scene recalling the one between Viola and Olivia in ➤ Shakespeare's > Twelfth Night. Manly overhears Olivia acknowledge that she deceived him deliberately. Later Vernish witnesses an assignation between the women and on discovering Fidelia's sex, attempts to rape her, but is interrupted. In the final scene, Fidelia is wounded in a skirmish, defending Manly from Vernish, who is revealed as Olivia's husband. Fidelia's true identity, and status as an heiress, are also made known, and she and Manly are united. A subplot involves the litigations of the Widow Blackacre and her doltish son Jerry. The play was considered by > Dryden to be Wycherley's best, and from it he derived the frequent appellation 'Manly Wycherley'. The play survived to the late 18th century, when it disappeared from the stage, but has been revived (several times) in the 20th century, including the 1988-9 production by the RSC.

Plantagenet (Anjou), House of A medieval royal family which reigned over England from 1154 until 1399; ➤ Henry II 1151-89; > Richard I 1189-99; > John I 1199-1216; > Henry III 1216-72; > Edward I 1272-1307; > Edward II 1307-27; > Edward III 1327-77; > Richard II 1377-99. The first of the line, Henry II, succeeded to the English throne through his mother, Mathilda, daughter of the last > Norman king, Henry I. Henry II's father was Geoffrey, Count of Anjou, a province in France; hence the family was known either as the House of Anjou or as Plantagenet, from the plant broom (in Latin, planta genista) which Geoffrey used to wear in his cap. The families of Lancaster and York, which ruled England successively in the 15th century, were junior branches of the Plantagenet family.

Plath, Sylvia (1932-63)

Poet and novelist. She was brought up in the U.S.A.; her father, who died when she was nine, was of Prussian origin and her mother Austrian. Her university education was at Smith College, Massachusetts, and Newnham College, Cambridge. She married the English poet ➤ Ted Hughes in 1956. For a time she taught at Smith College, but in 1959 she settled in England. In 1960 she published her first volume of poetry, The Colossus, and in 1963 her only novel, The Bell Jar, under the penname of Victoria Lucas. Her reputation was established on the posthumous publication of her book of poetry, Ariel (1965). This volume aroused more interest in Britain than any other since ➤ Dylan Thomas' Deaths and Entrances (1046). The poems combine bold imagery and original rhythms with strenuous artistic control; their themes concern states of mind in extremity. In a commentary recorded for the > British Council, she declared: 'One should be able to control and manipulate experiences, even the most terrifying . . . with an informed and intelligent mind.' Plath committed suicide in 1963. Other important posthumous publications are Crossing the Water (1971) and Winter Trees (1972); Plath also wrote a radio play, Three Women, broadcast in 1962. Collected Poems (ed. Ted Hughes: 1081); Letters Home (1078). Bib: Alvarez, A., in Beyond All This Fiddle and The Savage God; Uroff, M. D., Sylvia Plath and Ted Hughes; Rose, J., The Haunting of Sylvia Plath; The Art of Sylvia Plath: A Symposium (ed. Charles Newman) contains a bibliography.

Plato (? 428 – ? 348 BC)

Greek philosopher. He was a follower of the Athenian philosopher ➤ Socrates, and his dialogues represent conversations in which Socrates takes the lead. The most famous of these 'Socratic' dialogues are Protagoras, Gorgias, Phaedo, Symposium, > Republic, Phaedrus, Timaeus. His longest work, the Laws, does not include Socrates as a character. His central conception is that beyond the world of transient material phenomena lies another eternal world of ideal forms which the material world represents in the form of imitations. His figure for this in the Republic is that men in the material world are like people watching shadows moving on the wall of a cave; they see only these shadows and not the realities which cast the shadows. Plato is one of the two most influential philosophers in European thought, the other one being > Aristotle, who was at first his pupil.

> Platonism.

Platonic Love

A term that has come to possess three distinct, if related, senses: 1 A love between individuals which transcends sexual desire and attains spiritual heights. This is the most popularly understood sense of the term. 2 The complex doctrine of love which embraces sexuality, but which is directed towards an ideal end, to be found discussed in Plato's Symposium.

> John Donne's poem 'The Extasy' explores this form of love.

3 A reference to homosexual love (> Katherine Philips). This third sense is derived from the praise of homosexual love to be found in the Symposium.

Platonism and Neo-Platonism

The term 'Platonism' is applied to the school of thought derived immediately from the Greek philosopher ⊳ Plato. 'Neo-Platonism' names schools of thought that adapted his philosophy by adding to or modifying it. Two main periods of revival of Plato's thought are described as neo-Platonism: 1 that initiated by the pagan Plotinus (3rd century AD) in Rome, and at first a revival of Christianity, into which it was to some extent carried by St Augustine of Hippo (345-430) when he was converted; that which Marsilio Ficino initiated by his studies of Platonic philosophy in Florence (15th century). The 17th-century group known as the Cambridge Platonists (> Platonists, Cambridge) were true Platonists rather than Neo-Platonists.

I Plato taught that beyond the world of transient phenomena surrounding us is one of permanent and imperishable ideas, but he relied on logical reason for the development of his philosophy. Neo-Platonism added a religious aspect that depended on revelation; it derived this influence from other philosophies and from eastern religions. The elements that St Augustine transferred to Christianity remained dominant until the 13th century, when Platonic influence was succeeded by that of ➤ Aristotle. Sixteenth-century neo-Platonism in Italy revived the ancient neo-Platonist conception that the universe is peopled by many supernatural beings, and maintained that these existed in addition to the angels and devils allowed by Christian doctrine. It also taught that men, being essentially spirits, could, by the acquisition of wisdom and virtue, immensely increase their power and knowledge, and could control for their good and wise purposes the nonhuman supernatural spirits. Thus arose the idea of 'the Mage', or master of high magic: in ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ The Tempest, Prospero is such a neo-Platonic Mage, and Ariel is a spirit such as the neo-Platonists believed could be controlled and used. Neo-Platonism also influenced poetic conceptions, whereby the beloved lady of a sonnet sequence (eg > Sir Philip Sidney's ➤ Astrophil and Stella) was a sublime image of her ideal soul, and virtues (eg those allegorized by ➤ Edmund Spenser in > The Faerie Queene) could exist as ideal realities. In criticism, Sidney shows neo-Platonic influence in his conception that poetry should not merely represent but improve on nature, in accordance with the Platonic idea that the world of ordinary realities is an inferior imitation of the eternal idealities. This outlook emphasized the importance of the imagination as the faculty that could create ideal images and not merely imitate the general qualities common to classes of actual objects, in accordance with Aristotle's critical theory.

Platonists, The Cambridge

A group of thinkers at Cambridge University in the mid-17th century. Their aim was to combine reason with revealed religion, and to counteract the religiously destructive tendencies of the thought of ➤ René Descartes and ➤ Thomas Hobbes. Their concern with true religion was combined with a care for both clarity of thought and religious tolerance. Their chief representatives were Henry More (1614–87), Ralph Cudworth (1617–88), Benjamin Whichcote (1609–83) and John Smith (1618–52).

▶ Platonism and Neo-Platonism.
Bib: Patrides, C. A. (ed.), The Cambridge Platonists.

Plautus, Titus Maccius (? 254-184 BC) Roman comic dramatist. His comedies are based on situation and intrigue; they had a high reputation in his own time, but unlike the other outstanding Roman comedian, > Terence, he was ignored during the Middle Ages. In the 16th century his reputation revived, and his style of comedy was emulated throughout Western Europe. The play which is often called the first English comedy, Nicholas Udall's > Ralph Roister Doister, is based on Plautus' Miles Gloriosus ('The Boastful Soldier') and Shakespeare's ➤ Comedy of Errors on Plautus' Menaechmi, which, using a confusion between twins, may also have influenced Shakespeare's ➤ Twelfth Night. Again, Shakespeare's ➤ Taming of the Shrew may be partly based on Plautus' Mostellaria, and the last act of Ionson's > The Alchemist is also indebted to it. Certain of Plautus' comic characters, such as that of the boastful soldier as in Udall's play, started a tradition, exemplified by Captain Bobadill in Jonson's > Every Man in his Humour and Parolles in Shakespeare's ➤ All's Well that Ends Well. These are the most important examples, but traces, at least, of Plautus in the background of English plays can be found in other works of Ben Jonson, and in plays by ➤ Thomas Heywood, ▷ Dryden and ▷ Fielding.

Play on words

> Figures of Speech.

Playboy of the Western World, The (1907)
A play by ▷ John Millington Synge. The scene is a remote part of rural Ireland. The hero, Christy Mahon, arrives at a village inn in flight from the law, since he believes himself to have killed his tyrannical father. Instead of being handed over to the police or regarded with abhorrence, he is treated with admiration, and the innkeeper's daughter, Pegeen Mike, falls in love with him. He is at first a miserable youth with no belief in himself, but the universal admiration and Pegeen's love build up his confidence, until he behaves like a true hero. This fiction is destroyed momentarily when his father, who has merely been injured, suddenly appears on the scene. The assault on the father is then suddenly removed from fiction into fact, and the village, including Pegeen, turn against Christy. However, Christy turns into yet a third type of person; he defies the village, through sheer desperation at the idea of sinking back into subservience to his father, and makes his departure in the bullying style which has always been his father's character. The play is thus a mixture of ironic comedy, poetic tragedy, and exuberant farce.

The language is that of the superstitious Irish peasantry, musical and imaginative in its idiom, and though the dialogue is prose, it reaches an intensity that is unique in drama in the English language since the days of ▷ Shakespeare. Irish nationalist opinion was deeply angered by Synge's refusal to idealize the Irish character, and its early performances at ▷ W. B. Yeats' ▷ Abbey Theatre in Dublin caused riots.

> Irish literature in English.

Plays for Puritans (1901)

The title for a volume of three plays by ➤ George Bernard Shaw: The Devil's Disciple; ➤ Caesar and Cleopatra; Captain Brassbound's Conversion. Shaw was himself a declared ➤ Puritan in the sense that he shared the Puritan insistence on the importance above all of a sensitive conscience, but he was concerned that the public should be clear-thinking about it. Hence each of these plays treats the conscience and its workings from an original and ironic angle.

Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant (1898)
A collection of seven plays by ▷ George Bernard Shaw. The four 'pleasant' plays are comedies with serious themes (the character of the true soldier, what constitutes moral strength, the nature of greatness, etc.) but nothing likely to dismay or shock the conventional moral sense of the audiences of the day. These are: ▷ Arms and the Man, Candida, The Man of Destiny, You Never Can Tell. The three 'unpleasant' plays dealt with social topics (sexual morality and the ownership of slum property) such as were generally felt to be unsuitable for presentation in the theatre. These are: Widowers' Houses, The Philanderer, Mrs Warren's Profession.

Pléiade

The name given to the group of 16th-century poets led by > Ronsard and > Du Bellay, supposedly seven in total, although early mentions of poet comrades are far in excess of this number. Du Bellay's Deffence & Illustration de la langue francoyse (1549) sets out a credo common to the group as a whole: wholehearted promotion of the vernacular, imitation of the Ancients, rejection of medieval forms of ▷ lyric verse such as the ballade or rondeau, establishment of the 12-syllable ▷ alexandrine as the staple of French verse. Their cultivation of the ▷ sonnet stimulated the major English writers of the last decade of the 16th century such as ▷ Sidney, ▷ Spenser and ▷ Shakespeare.

Pleonasm

The use of unnecessary words in the expression of a meaning, eg in the phrase 'a deceitful fraud', 'deceitful' is pleonastic, since a fraud is by definition a kind of deceit.

Pliny

There were two Roman writers of this name. Pliny the elder (1st century AD) was the author of a famous Natural History, in which fantastic myths about animals are mixed up with some sound early science. His nephew, Pliny the younger, was the author of letters which are an interesting source of information on the ancient Roman world under the Emperor Trajan, especially about the treatment of Christians.

Plot (and Story) > Russian Formalism.

Plotinus

> Platonism and Neo-Platonism.

Plumptre, Anne (1760–1818) and Annabella (1761–1838)

Translators and novelists. The two Plumptre sisters were well educated and were prolific authors, usually in tandem, for most of their lives. They probably began by sending poems to periodicals, but the first certain works by them are two > Minerva novels. Anne wrote Antoinette (1796), the story of a beautiful and intelligent woman philosopher, while Annabella (commonly known as Bell) published Montgomery, or Scenes in Wales (1796). Shortly afterwards they began translating from German, Anne undertaking seven plays by Kotzebue and Bell, Iffland's play, The Foresters (1799) and Kotzebue's The Guardian Angel (1802). They then returned to novels, producing Bell's The Western Mail (1801) and Anne's Something New (1801). It was only in 1802, when Anne travelled to France to see the effects of the > French Revolution with ▶ Amelia Opie that the two sisters parted ways, Anne to commence writing > travel and > autobiographical works (Narrative, 1810, and History of Myself and My Friends, 1813), and Bell to concentrate on children's stories and domestic material (Stories for Children, 1804, and Domestic Management, or the Healthful Cookery Book, 1804). They collaborated once again just before Anne's death in 1818 writing the strange and fascinating collection, Tales of Wonder, of Humour, and of Sentiment.

Pluralism

A pluralist conception of literary criticism claims that the meanings of works are not fixed but are open to revision by multiple interpretative approaches which are not themselves to be hierarchically ranked. The idea of critical pluralism also implies that critics are free to borrow from many sources and should not be fixed by the protocols of any one critical method.

Plutarch (AD 46-? 120)

Greek biographer and moralist. He is chiefly famous for his 46 Parallel Lives in which he matches 23 famous men from Greek history with 23 famous Romans. The Lives were presented in an English version by > Sir Thomas North in 1579; North did not translate them from the original Greek but from the French version by Jacques Amyot. North's book was as popular and influential in England as Amyot's was in France; Plutarch's conception of the great and many sided man was in harmony with the 16thcentury conception of the public virtues and personal accomplishments that should go to make the full man and the perfect courtier. The Lives, in North's version, were used as a sourcebook by dramatists - notably by Shakespeare in > Julius Caesar, > Antony and Cleopatra and > Coriolanus. Plutarch also wrote a number of treatises on moral and physical subjects known as the Moralia - a precedent for the essays of > Bacon as well as the very different ones of the great French essayist, ▷ Montaigne.

➤ Translation.

Poel, William (1852-1934)

Actor, director and Shakespeare scholar. He founded the Elizabethan Stage Society in 1894. Poel's influential productions of the plays of Shakespeare and his contemporaries rejected the traditional techniques of stage realism dominant at the end of the 19th century. Characteristic of his productions was an attempt to recreate Elizabethan stage conditions by performing on a bare apron stage. He also pursued a policy, not always successfully, of restoring full uncut texts for production. Though it is now accepted that he overstressed the notion of the 'bare' Elizabethan stage, he was, with Harley Granville Barker (1877-1946), a great influence on the development of Shakespeare productions in this century.

➤ Old Vic Theatre. Bib: Speaight, R., William Poel and the Elizabethan Revival.

Poems (1844)

A collection of poetry by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, published after six years of invalidism during which Barrett (as she was then) focused her energies on poetic experiment. Poems (1844) is notable for its formal innovation (half-rhymes, metrical irregularity, compound words) and for the range of voices that surface in the collection. There is a mystical, opium-inspired voice in poems such as 'The House of Clouds' and 'A Vision of Poets'; a sentimental voice, found in the popular > ballads and in poems such as 'To Flush, My Dog'. A concern with social class is evident in 'The Cry of the Children', a strategically sentimental protest poem about the working conditions of children. 'A Drama of Exile' reviews the Fall 'with a peculiar reference to Eve's alloted grief', while 'L.E.L.'s Last Question' and the pair of sonnets 'A Desire' and 'A Recognition' are poetic tributes to Letitia Landon (1802-38) and ▷ George Sand respectively. The collection established Barrett as a major Victorian poet.

Poems by Currer, Ellis and Acton Bell (1846) The first published work by the ▷ Bronte sisters, which included poems by Charlotte (Currer), Emily (Ellis) and Anne (Acton). Charlotte organized the publication after 'discovering' Emily's poetry, which she considered 'not at all like the poetry women generally write'. The collection sold only two copies, but received a few favourable notices.

➤ Pseudonyms. Bib: Leighton, A., and Reynolds, M. (eds.), An Anthology of Victorian Women Poets.

Poet Laurate

The laurel, also known as the bay (Laurus nobilis), was sacred to Apollo, the god most associated with the arts. The Greeks honoured Olympic victors and triumphant generals, by crowning them with a wreath of laurel leaves. In the 15th century the universities of Oxford and Cambridge gave the title 'laureate', meaning worthy of laurels, to various poets including > John Skelton, and it was later given to court poets like > Ben Jonson. In 1668 the title gained its modern status when > John Dryden was granted a stipend as a member of the royal household charged with writing court odes and celebrating state occasions in verse. Since the time of Dryden the laureateship has been awarded to a few poets of lasting worth and to many of mediocre talent, chosen for reasons of fashion or political acceptability. The list is as follows: ➤ Thomas Shadwell, Nahum Tate, ➤ Nicholas Rowe, Laurence Eusden, > Colley Cibber, William Whitehead, ➤ Thomas Warton, Henry James Pye, ➤ Robert Southey, ▷ William Wordsworth, ▷ Alfred Tennyson, Alfred Austin, ➤ Robert Bridges, → John Masefield, → Cecil Day Lewis, → John Betjeman and ➤ Ted Hughes. Poets who were offered the laureateship but declined it include ➤ Thomas Gray, ➤ Sir Walter Scott, ➤ Samuel Rogers, ➤ William Morris and ➤ Philip Larkin. Wordsworth was the first Poet Laureate to make his acceptance of the office conditional on his not being obliged to honour official occasions with specially composed poems, though some later laureates have continued the practice, notably Tennyson, Betjeman and Hughes.

Poetics

A treatise on poetry by the Greek philosopher > Aristotle. He had already written a dialogue On the Poets, which has only survived in fragments, and a treatise on rhetoric; knowledge of both is to some extent assumed in the Poetics. The Poetics is considered to have been an unpublished work, resembling notes for lectures addressed to students rather than a full worked-up treatise for the general public, like the Rhetoric. This accounts for its fragmentary character. Thus Aristotle distinguishes Tragedy, Epic and Comedy as the chief kinds of poetry, but Comedy is practically omitted from fuller discussion. Lyric, though it is referred to, is not included among the chief kinds, either because Aristotle considered it to be part of music or because he considered it to be taken up into Tragedy. The main part of the work is therefore concerned with Tragedy and Epic the former more extensively than the latter. Aristotle's method is essentially descriptive rather than prescriptive; that is to say, he is more concerned with what had been done by acknowledged masters such as ➤ Homer and > Sophocles, than with what ought to be done according to so-called 'rules'.

Nonetheless, the Poetics became the most authoritatively influential of all critical works. Its dominance in European critical thought from the 16th to the 18th centuries was partly due to its influence on the most widely read of the Roman critics, > Horace, and partly because it was rediscovered at the end of the 15th century when the > Renaissance was at its height, and the spirit of the Greek and Latin writers was felt to be civilization itself. Critics such as the 16th-century Italian Scaliger took what are mere hints in Aristotle and erected them into important rules of art, such as the 'neo-Aristotelian' > unities of time and place. In England, the important critics, such as > Dryden and > Johnson, regarded Aristotle and neo-Aristotelianism with strong respect rather than total reverence, but the complete submission of minor critics such as ➤ Thomas Rymer is exemplified by his obtuse treatment of Shakespeare's Othello in the essay Short View of Tragedy (1692). Neo-Aristotelianism was set aside by the Romantics, who cultivated literary virtues which are different from Aristotelian shapeliness and order, but the influence of the Poetics is still evident in Wordsworth's Preface to the > Lyrical Ballads.

Today the Poetics remains one of the most outstanding works of European thought. Critics still use Aristotle's terminology in classifying poetic forms; his theory of art as imitation (different from > Plato's) is still the starting-point of much aesthetic discussion; such terms as 'harmatia', for the element in human nature which makes it vulnerable to tragedy, 'peripeteia' for the reversal of fortunes common in tragic narrative, and 'katharsis' for the effect of tragedy on the mind of the audience, have been useful for a long time. It continues to be widely studied as one of the earliest works of critical theory.

Poetics

In Aristotle's ➤ Poetics the rules of 'tragedy' are abstracted from a collection of specific instances to form a theoretical model. The function of 'poetics', therefore, has always been to organize formally details of poetic structures, and to this extent it is both prescriptive and descriptive. This Aristotelian usage persists, though in considerably extended form, in the titles of works of critical theory, such as Jonathan Culler's Structuralist Poetics (1975). The theoretical works also address the issue of an organized system of analytical methods, as well as aesthetics of artistic construction. More recently, for example in the work of > new historicist critics such as Stephen Greenblatt, the phrase 'cultural poetics' is used to designate an investigation into 'how the boundaries were marked between cultural practices understood to be art forms and other, contiguous, forms of expression' (Shakespearean Negotiations; 1988). Such investigations seek to explain how particular aspects of general cultural life are given artistic expression. Whereas Aristotle's Poetics can be said to have a > formalist bent. one of the ways in which the term has come to be used today locates the formal aspects of literary texts within a social context.

Point of view

Term often used in the analysis of ▷ narrative to refer to the perspectives from which the events are seen and narrated. Since these two may be different (the ▷ focal character may differ from the ▷ narrator), the term 'point of view' has been abandoned in more recent ▷ narratology, and its elements separated out into aspects of ▷ mood and ▷ voice.

Poliakoff, Stephen (b 1952)

Dramatist. Although he began writing plays in 1969 Poliakoff first came to prominence with Hitting Town and City Sugar (both 1975) as a result of the understated precision with which he evoked the sham comforts of anonymous shopping malls, fast-food outlets and motorway service areas, while exploring readily identifiable, unlikeable and deeply alienated characters. He is particularly effective in capturing the curious absence of real passion in people smothering in webs of superficiality, and the sense of conscious distress behind even the most glibly desperate exemplified by the radio DJ in City Sugar. The plays are notable for a strong sense of isolation and of communication replaced by half-hearted buzz-words and slogans. He conveys - rather surprisingly given his settings - an accurate sense of particular physical spaces, underlined by their actual emptiness: public spaces deserted at night; the enclosed but lonely world of the late-night radio phone-in; surveillance cameras and unseen observers render even his most aggressive characters exposed and vulnerable. Other plays include: Strawberry Fields (1977); Stronger Than The Sun (1977); Shout Across The River (1978); American Days (1979); The Summer Party (1980); Breaking The Silence (1984); Coming In To Land (1987); Playing with Trains (1989); and Sienna Red (1991).

Polidori, John (1796-1821)

