Polidori emerged from a literary background in Soho's Italian community, his father Gaetano having translated the complete works of ▷ Milton and ▷ Walpole's ▷ Castle of Otranto into Italian. He studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh, graduating at the age of 19: his dissertation, on such topics as somnambulism and mesmerism, showed an interest in the > Gothic as well as the medical. a combination that may have been peculiarly appropriate to his next spell of employment, as > Lord Byron's physician. Their relationship was volatile and short-lived. Polidori was however a crucial member of the 'Pisan Circle' whose shared enthusiasm for horror and the fantastic was to produce, most famously, > Mary Shelley's novel ▷ Frankenstein (1817). Scarcely known to modern readers, Polidori's short tale The Vambyre (1810) was hugely popular, and is the first text to fuse the hitherto disparate features of the vampire myth into a coherent literary whole. Bram Stoker's novel Dracula (1897) shows that the influence of Polidori's 'Lord Ruthven' was still powerful many decades later. Indeed, the presentation of Count Dracula in, for example, the Hammer films of the late 1950s and 1960s is closer to Polidori's version of the suavely aristocratic vampire than it is to the bewhiskered, Slavic ancient of Stoker's novel. It is possible to see the image of Lord Byron in Polidori's Lord Ruthven, and it was falsely assumed at the time of first publication that Byron was the author of The Vampyre. Its real author, troubled not only by debt but by brain damage sustained in a carriage accident, died (perhaps by his own hand) at the age of 25.

among the poor of rural England. In 1803, Cobbett was fined £500 for his criticism of the government's Irish policy, and in 1809 he was sent to prison for two years for his criticism of military punishments. Pollard, A. W. (1859-1944)

Influential bibliographer and ➤ Shakespearean scholar who is best known for his work on the Short-Title Catalogue of Books Printed in England . . . 1475–1640 (1926), which was revised by Katharine Pantzer and others in 1927 (Vol. II) and 1985 (Vol. I).

Polo, Marco (? 1254-? 1324)

Italian traveller. At a time when Europe was in almost total ignorance of the majority of Asia, he travelled from Venice across central Asia as far as China where he remained for 17 years. On his return to Italy after an absence of 24 years, he wrote an account of his journeys. This became very popular, particularly in the 16th century, when contacts with eastern Asia were renewed. The book was first translated into English in 1579.

Polwhele, Elizabeth (?1651–1691)
English Restoration dramatist. Polwhele seems to have written three plays, Elysium (now lost), the rhymed tragedy The Faythfull Virgins (manuscript), and the comedy The Frolicks, performed at the Duke's Theatre in 1671 (▷ Dorset Garden Theatre). The play features a rake, Rightwit, who is the father of illegitimate children, and Claribell, a witty heroine. With ▷ Katherine Philips and ▷ Frances Boothby, she was one of the women writing for the stage in the early Restoration period.

Polyphonic

➤ Bakhtin, Mikhail.

Polyphony

A term used by ➤ Mikhail Bakhtin which is broadly equivalent to ➤ dialogism. Literally, polyphony means 'many voiced' and Bakhtin regarded this as one of the most enriching features of the novel because it enables the dramatization of an open plurality of voices and perspectives.

➤ Heteroglossia; Univocal.

Polysemy

Literally, polysemy means 'many meanings' and refers to the ability of texts (or words) to carry multiple meanings at the same time.

For many modern commentators, polysemy is a defining characteristic of literary works as opposed to ➤ univocal works which offer only parsimonious or stereotyped meanings.

Pomfret, John (1667-1702)

Rector of Maulden in Bedfordshire and author of Poems on Several Occasions (1699), a collection of ➤ Pindaric ➤ odes, narrative poems, > pastorals, and epistles. His most important poem, The Choice (1700), treats the > Horatian theme of rural retirement with a bland cosiness which exactly hit the popular taste of the time. 'Near some fair Town I'd have a private Seat,/ Built uniform, not little nor too great'. He eschews aristocratic splendour in favour of comfortable amenity: 'I'd have a Clear and Competent Estate,/ That I might live Genteelly, but not Great', and advocates benevolent charity towards 'the Sons of Poverty'. The Choice presents an ideal of the private life to which both the aristocrat and the successful new bourgeois could subscribe, and it was immensely popular. > Samuel Johnson remarked in his > Lives of the Poets (1781): 'Perhaps no composition in our language has been oftener perused.'

Pope, Alexander (1688-1744)

Poet. The son of a Catholic linen-draper in London, born significantly in the year of the > 'Glorious Revolution' of 1688, which heralded the new era of optimism and national confidence reflected in much of his work. In childhood his father encouraged him to produce 'rhymes', insisting that they be perfect, and by his early teens he was already writing polished imitations of such diverse models as > Chaucer, > Edmund Spenser, > Edmund Waller and ➤ Abraham Cowley. His Pastorals (1709) established his reputation, followed by the > Essay on Criticism (1711), and > Windsor Forest (1713). The last line of this poem is virtually identical with the first line of his Pastorals, indicating an ➤ Augustan parallel with > Virgil, the last line of whose > Georgics is the same as the first line of his Eclogues. The > mock heroic > Rape of the Lock appeared in 1712, and in an enlarged form in 1714. The characteristic miniaturizing effect of Pope's use of mock heroic can be related to the fact that he was only 4 ft 6 ins high, and suffered from curvature of the spine.

During the early years of his career he had associated with ▷ Joseph Addison, the magisterial arbiter of the new moderate bourgeois taste. But Pope's volatile temperament and Tory (▷ Whig and Tory) leanings drew him towards the more heady intellectual circle of ▷ Jonathan Swift, ▷ John Gay and ▷ John Arbuthnot, with whom in 1713 he formed the ▷ Scriblerus Club, whose object was to 'ridicule all false tastes in learning'. In 1717 Pope produced a collected volume of Works, in which appeared ➤ Eloisa to Abelard and Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady, which shows a bold and unorthodox sympathy for a suicide.

Meanwhile he capitalized on his growing reputation by inviting subscriptions for a translation of ⊳ Homer's ⊳ Iliad, a new practice at the time. The work, published in instalments between 1715-20, served to make him financially secure. Several commentators remarked at the time on the failure of his brisk pentameter > couplets to capture the rugged grandeur of Homer's unrhymed hexameters (> metre), but most were happy to have an 'English Homer', adapted to contemporary taste. He followed up his success by an advertisement 'undertaking' a translation of the > Odyssey, which appeared in 1725-6. It leaked out, however, that much of the labour had been subcontracted to two minor poets, Elijah Fenton and William Broome, and for a time Pope was nicknamed 'the undertaker'. Unlike his original compositions, his Homer has not outlived its age. In 1725 he published an edition of the works of ➤ Shakespeare, based on textual comparisons between ⊳ Quarto and Folio versions, and is thus one of the earliest editors to apply the scholarly techniques previously reserved for ancient > classical literature to an English 'classic' (> Shakespeare editions.)

In > The Dunciad (1728), itself a parody of a scholarly edition, Pope attacked his literary enemies, including the Shakespeare scholar Lewis Theobald, who had corrected errors in his edition. In 1733-4 he turned away from translation and editing and the squabbles in which these had involved him, and published his philosophical poem ➤ An Essay on Man and the four > Moral Essays (1731-5). Between 1733 and 1737 he produced his ➤ Imitations of Horace, and in 1735 appeared the Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot which contains some of his most polished satire. In 1742 he produced the New Dunciad, a continuation of the earlier poem, and in 1743 this was added as Book Four to a new edition of The Dunciad, the hero being changed from Theobald to ➤ Colley Cibber, the > Poet Laureate.

Pope's last years were spent in a rented riverside house at Twickenham, where he played out his own version of ▷ Horatian retirement. Imitating a landed gentleman, he indulged in a mock heroic, miniaturized version of landscapegardening, designing a whimsically romantic 'grot' in a tunnel which linked the waterfront with his back garden. It was walled with shells and pieces of mirror, so as to reflect fragments of the river scene in the day, and after dark the light of a flickering lamp which was hung from the roof. Before his death he received the last sacrament, never having abandoned his Catholic religion, despite his ▷ Deist leanings and the double taxation which his ➤ recusancy incurred. He left his property to his lifelong friend Martha Blount.

All Pope's important poetry, with the exception of the Deist Universal Prayer (1738), is in heroic couplets, a form which he used with an idiosyncratic perfectionism, not attempted by any other poet of the period. He refined his own personal 'rules': on the exact positioning of the caesura, on the choice of diction and on perfection of rhymes (monosyllabic nouns or verbs containing long vowels are preferred). The reader's ear quickly adapts to this hyperregularity and thus any variation in tone or rhythm, or any deliberate 'irregularity' has an explicit precision of effect virtually unknown in other poets. This characteristic is found cloving by some readers. But, particularly in his more flexible, later verse, it creates one of the most expressive and versatile literary media in the English language. Pornography

This is generally understood to mean representations or literature which is intended to produce sexual excitement. There is, however, a considerable degree of dispute about pornography and it has become the subject of legal cases and public campaigns.

In the 17th and 18th centuries pornographic literature circulated widely. There is an overlap between true pornography, however, and a variety of so-called 'rogue literature', which depicted the pranks and schemes of low-life characters, such a beggars, thieves, prostitutes and pimps. The characters of the whore Lucetta and her pimp Sancho in ▷ Behn's ▷ The Rover, for example, are in this tradition. Some of the earliest pornography in England was imported from the Continent, and some was translated. A volume called Ragionamenti, by the Italian Petro Aretino (1492-1557), which included illustrations of sexual activity, circulated in England from the 16th century onwards under the title Aretin's Postures, or simply, Postures. For many years the name 'Aretin' was used as a byword for matters pornographic, both humorously and otherwise. Another Italian import was La Puttana errante, translated as The Wandering Whore. A common formula for pornographic literature is the purported account of a prostitute's life, or life in a brothel, including 'advice' given by one prostitute or bawd to another. Such a one is La Retorica delle Puttane ('The Whore's Rhetoric') by the dissident priest Ferrante Pallavicino, who was executed in 1644, two years after its publication. This work generated various translations and adaptations; a very good one was published in 1683.

> Pamphlets with titles such as The Fifteen Plagues of a Maidenhead, The Fifteen Comforts of Whoring, The Fifteen Comforts of Matrimony, etc., were published from the early 17th century onwards. These parody a religious original from the 15th century. Interestingly, much pornographic literature in England was associated in some way with religion, particularly the > Catholic faith, and this added to its frisson, and also provided ammunition to anti-Catholic forces. Another popular production was Venus dans le cloître ('Venus in the Cloister: or the Nun in Her Smock'), (1724), which earned a prosecution for its publisher, Edmund Curll. Dialogues in Latin called Satyra Sotadica, by Nicolas Chorier, appeared in 1660 and were translated into several other languages including English.

Pepys records in his diary for 13 January 1668 finding L'Ecole des Filles (published 1655) in a bookshop. On the 9th February he read it, 'in plain binding', because he was embarrassed to be seen with it. The book is mentioned again by Horner in Act I of Wycherley's ▶ The Country Wife, and in ▶ The London Cuckolds by ▶ Ravenscroft. But pornography also originated in Britain. A play, Sodom, often attributed to ▶ Rochester, circulated clandestinely in the 1680s. There are pornographic elements in a number of Rochester's poems, as well as in those of contemporaries including Wycherley and ▶ Behn.

In the 18th century pornography entered the novel. ➤ Cleland's Fanny Hill (1748 and 1749) was suppressed as pornography; this book was the subject of a trial after a revived edition was published in 1963. The works and activities of the Marquis de Sade attracted considerable attention, and scandal, in the later 18th and 19th centuries.

In the 20th century, the most notorious of the legal cases about pornography must be the trial concerning > D. H. Lawrence's > Lady Chatterley's Lover in 1960.

Generally speaking, today, on the right wing are those moralists who wish to police public standards and ban all sexual material, arguing that it depraves and corrupts. Some ▶ feminists also attack pornography at all levels, saying that it is male violence against women; they have particularly broad categories, including advertising; other feminists have sought to offer alternative erotic representations in literature, photography and art, which will be appealing to women. The liberal viewpoint, summed up by the Williams Committee of 1979, draws a distinction between public and private pornography, and if it is not hurting anyone will not interfere legally, though definitions of what is 'private' and what constitutes hurt remain contentious.

Porter, Endymion (1587-1649)

Poet and patron. No published writing survives, if it existed at all, but Endymion Porter was recognized as one of the influential figures in the cultural world of his day. He was known and respected by ▷ D'Avenant, ▷ Donne and ▷ Herrick, and would have been made a member of the proposed ▷ Royal Society. Some work has survived, a commemoration for D'Avenant, an epitaph for Donne, and several manuscript poems and letters to his wife. Although politically influential under the reign of ▷ Charles I (he was part of the ▷ Buckingham faction), during the ▷ Interregnum Porter and his Catholic wife were exiled and lived abroad in poverty.

Porter, Peter (b 1929)

Poet. Born in Brisbane, Australia, Porter has lived in Britain since 1951. His work is most famous as an acutely satirical, witty analysis of the decadence of post-war society, and was included in A. Alvarez' 1960 ▷ anthology The New Poetry. His work includes: Once Bitten, Twice Bitten (1961); Poems Ancient and Modern (1964); A Porter Folio (1969); The Last of England (1970); Living in a Calm Country (1976) and English Subtitles (1981).

Portrait of a Lady, The (1881)

A novel by ➤ Henry James. The heroine, Isabel Archer, is brought from the US to England by her aunt, Mrs Touchett, the wife of a retired American banker. Isabel has the candour and freedom conspicuous among American girls of the period; she also has beauty, intelligence, and a spirit of adventure and responsiveness to life. She refuses offers of marriage from both Lord Warburton, a 'prince' of the English aristocracy, and Caspar Goodwood, a 'prince' of American industry. In the meantime her cousin, Ralph Touchett, has fallen in love with her, but he is slowly dying of consumption and dare not become her suitor. Instead, he tries to play the 'fairy godmother' by persuading his father to leave her the money which would have been due to himself. His action has two unfortunate results: it awakens Isabel's New England Puritan conscience through the sense of responsibility which the possession of wealth entails, and it attracts the rapacious Madame Merle, whose guilty secret is that she is looking for a rich stepmother for her daughter by her former lover, Gilbert Osmond, Osmond (like Madame Merle herself) is an artistic but cold-blooded and totally self-centred expatriate American. Isabel in her humility is easily made to feel her own cultural inferiority to the exquisite exterior qualities of Osmond, whom she sees as the prince she has been looking for - a man deprived of noble potentialities by the unjust circumstance of his poverty. She marries him, only to discover his hollowness, and that her marriage is imprisonment in the ogre's castle.

The novel, sometimes regarded as James' masterpiece, shows his conception of the relationship of the US and European consciousnesses; the Americans have integrity, the will to live, and good will towards humanity, but they lack richness of tradition and are restricted by the limitations of the New England puritan inhibitions; the Europeans (especially some of the American expatriates) have rich cultural awareness but this commonly corrupts their integrity, and instead of good will they have immense rapacity. On the other hand the best kind of US expatriate (Ralph Touchett) combines the best of both worlds.

Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, A (1916) An autobiographical novel by ▶ James Joyce. The theme is the life of a middle-class Irish boy, > Stephen Dedalus, from his infancy in the strongly Catholic, intensely nationalistic environment of Dublin in the 1880s to his departure from Ireland some 20 years later. In his boyhood he sees his elders bitterly divided in consequence of the Church's rejection of Parnell, the nationalist leader, owing to the scandal of his private life. As he grows up he is repelled by the pettiness, treacheries and vindictiveness of Irish nationalism, and for a time is drawn towards the rich spirituality of the Catholic tradition. The Irish Catholic Church, however, also suffered from provincialism and narrowness, and a moment of revelation on the seashore shows him that the largeness of an artistic vocation will alone suffice for him to harmonize the spiritual and fleshly sides of his nature, and enable him to rise above the vulgarity of his environment; but the choice brings with it the decision to leave Ireland.

The originality of the novel consists in its presentation of the hero's experience from within his own consciousness. The language gradually expands from the fragmentary diction of an infant on the first page through the connected but limited range of expression characteristic of a schoolboy to the sophistication of a fully articulate university student.

Postmodernism

The break away from 19th-century values is often classified as > modernism and carries the connotations of transgression and rebellion. However, the last 30 years have seen a change in this attitude towards focusing upon a series of unresolvable philosophical and social debates, such as race, gender and class. Rather than challenging and destroying cultural definitions, as does modernism, postmodernism resists the very idea of boundaries. It regards distinctions as undesirable and even impossible, so that an almost > Utopian world, free from all constraints, becomes possible. Postmodernism remains a controversial term, but may be linked to a transformation of European culture at the end of World War II. This war produced the death camps and the atomic bomb, and thus generated a new sense of man's propensity to evil, of the destructive potential of scientific knowledge, and of the perils of political totalitarianism. The end of Empire and the post-war changes in the world economy and power-structure involved new relationships between Britain and other cultures.

It must be realized, though, that post-modernism has many interpretations and that no single definition is adequate. Different disciplines have participated in the postmodernist movement in varying ways, for example, in architecture traditional limits have become indistinguishable, so that what is commonly on the outside of a building is placed within, and vice versa. In literature, writers adopt a self-conscious ▶ intertextuality sometimes verging on pastiche, which denies the formal propriety of authorship and genre. In commercial terms postmodernism may be seen as part of the growth of consumer capitalism into a multi-national and technological identity.

Its all-embracing nature thus makes postmodernism as relevant to street events as to the avant-garde, and as such is one of the major focal points in the emergence of interdisciplinary and cultural studies.

Post-structuralism

At first glance, the term post-structuralism seems to imply that the post-structuralists came after the structuralists and that post-structuralism was the heir of structuralism. In practice, however, there is not a clear-cut division between structuralism and post-structuralism. Although the two have different focuses of interest and preoccupations, many of their concerns bind them together. Structuralism encompasses approaches to criticism which use linguistic models to enable critics to focus not on the inherent meaning of a work but on the structures which produce or generate meaning. Post-structuralism focuses on the ways in which the texts themselves subvert this enterprise; the structuralist emphasis on > difference as constructing relatively stable systems of meaning is displaced in post-structuralism by ➤ Derrida's concept of différance a French term which puns on the words for 'difference' and 'deferral', thus suggesting the endless displacement of unstable meaning along a chain of signifiers. Leading post-structuralists include ➤ Derrida, > Lacan, Gilles Deleuze, J. Hillis Miller and > Paul de Man.

Potter, Beatrix (1866-1943)

Writer for children. One of the most famous and widely translated writers of children's stories, Potter's anthropomorphic tales of animal adventures have been famously praised by > Graham Greene for their lack of sentimentality. Beginning with The Tale of Peter Rabbit (1901) (published and printed as well as, of course, illustrated - by Potter herself), her simple stories have become classics of > children's writing. Potter was also an accomplished naturalist, artist (illustrating all her own work), and (later) sheep farmer. Her numerous works hardly need listing; they include: The Tale of Squirrel Nutkin (1903); The Tailor of Gloucester (1903); The Tale of Jemima Puddle-Duck (1908); The Tale of Mr Tod (1912). See also The Journals of Beatrix Potter (1966) and Dear Ivy, Dear June: Letters from Beatrix Potter (1977).

Potter, John (?-1749)

Theatre proprietor, and craftsman. Potter entered the theatre in or after 1708, probably as a carpenter and/or scene painter. He erected a playhouse known as the French Theatre as well as the Little Theatre in the Hay, and eventually, the Haymarket Theatre (> Haymarket Theatres).

Poulter's Measure

A verse metre used by some 16th-century poets, it consisted of a 12-syllable line (> Alexandrine) alternating with a 14-syllable one. 'Poulter' = 'poulterer' – an allusion to variations in the number making up a dozen in the poultry trade. It was used by ➤ Thomas Wyatt, ➤ Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey and less distinguished poets.

Pound, Ezra (1885-1972)

sang in his song.

American poet. He came to Europe in 1907, and made London his home during the period 1908-20. His influence on English poetry during this period, especially on that of his fellow American, > T. S. Eliot, was very great. English poets had become insular, and they tended (with some exceptions) to occupy themselves with a marginal field of experience left over to them by the novelists, abstaining from the issues that were central to the destiny of their thoroughly industrialized society. They also restricted themselves to a limited diction, consecrated as 'poetic', with an obvious emotional appeal. The recent British poets who interested Pound were Robert Browning for his direct and 'unpoetic' address to the reader, and the Irish poet > W. B. Yeats, for his austere seriousness and energy. In his campaign to reform diction he became the leader of the > Imagist Movement, though he later abandoned it; this phase is illustrated by his Ripostes (1912) and Lustra (1916). It also drew him to Chinese poetry, from which he made excellent English verse, although his are not such accurate translations as those of his contemporary Arthur Waley.

In his campaign to free English poetry from insularity, Pound accepted the concept, which he shared with some other American writers (eg > Henry James and > T. S. Eliot), that European culture is a whole, not segmented into national cultures. Thus he offered fresh insights into ▷ French and ▷ Italian poetry back to the ➤ Middle Ages (see his critical essays, Make It New) and into the Latin classics. In his poetry he used the diction of everyday speech with a subtle ear for its rhythms. Like Eliot, he abandoned the logical continuity of prose in favour of a juxtaposition of ideas and images whose continuity appears through their psychological association. Also like Eliot, he used quotation frequently, thereby relating his treatment of his themes with the treatment accorded by past poets to similar themes, and thus illuminating the fundamental alterations in outlook and assumption brought about in the course of history. This technique of quotation is conspicuous in Eliot's poem ▷ The Waste Land, which Pound heavily revised. A comparable poem by Pound is Hugh Selmyn Mauberley (1920), which heralded his departure from Britain by offering an assessment of the state of culture there at the time. He moved to Paris, and in 1924 to Italy, where he became increasingly sympathetic to ▷ Fascism, partly in consequence of his strongly held and eccentric economic theories (see his ABC of Economics).

From this time onwards, his poetry output consisted almost entirely in working on his extended poem > the Cantos, which was not finished at his death. The Pisan Cantos (1948) are the most famous section, recording his incarceration in Pisa by the American forces at the end of World War II, while waiting to stand trial for treason. Found unfit to plead at his trial in 1948, he was committed to St Elizabeth's Hospital, Washington D.C., from where he was released in 1958, spending the rest of his life in Italy. Powell, Anthony (b 1905)

Novelist. He writes sophisticated comedy of upper-class life in England since 1920; his approach may be compared with the different treatment of the same society by ▷ Aldous Huxley, ▷ Evelyn Waugh, and by ▷ D. H. Lawrence in St Mawr. Early novels are: Afternoon Men (1931); Venusberg (1932); From A View to a Death (1933); Agents and Patients (1936); What's Become of Waring (1939).

In 1948 he produced a study of John Aubrey, the 17th-century anecdotal biographer, author of Brief Lives. He then began his major work which, it has been suggested, owes something to Aubrey as it clearly does to the sequence A la recherche du temps perdu by the French novelist ➤ Marcel Proust. Powell's sequence of novels is called A Dance to the Music of Time. The narrator, whose personality is kept in detachment but not eliminated, is an upperclass young man with whose life various circles of friends intertwine in a kind of dance, and in a way that is only conceivable in the upper levels of any society. The characters make a pattern of contrasts, the most serious and interesting being that of the man of distinction - Stringham - who evokes the high style of an Elizabethan courtier such as Ralegh, but who is in the wordly sense a failure, and Widmerpool, the man of grotesque and crude manners and feeling, who is yet a worldly success owing to his insensibility and the force of his ambition. A Dance to the Music of Time consists of: A Question of Upbringing (1951); A Buyer's Market (1952); The Acceptance World (1955); At Lady Molly's (1957); Casanova's Chinese Restaurant (1960); The Kindly Ones (1962); The Valley of Bones (1964); The Soldier's Art (1966); The Military Philosophers (1968); Books Do Furnish a Room (1971); Temporary Kings (1973); Hearing Secret Harmonies (1975). The sequence begins in 1921 at the narrator's public school; it ends after the war with the death of Widmerpool in circumstances of sinister pathos. Powell has followed up his novel sequence with a sequence of memoirs entitled To Keep the Ball Rolling: Infants of the Spring (1978); Messengers of Day (1978); Faces in My Time (1980); The Strangers All Are Gone (1982). Other novels: O, How the Wheel Becomes It! (1983); The Fisher King (1986).

Novelist, poet and essayist. Principal novels are: Wolf Solent (1929); A Glastonbury Romance (1932); Weymouth Sands (1934); Maiden Castle (1936); Owen Glendower (1940); Porius (1951).
Works of criticism and thought: Visions and Revisions (1915; revised 1935); Psychoanalysis and Morality (1923); The Religion of a Sceptic (1925); The Meaning of Culture (1929); In Defence of Sensuality (1930); The Art of Happiness (1935); The Pleasures of Literature (1938). One of his most famous books is his Autobiography (1934), developed from his contribution to the Confessions of Two Brothers (1916) written with Llewelyn Powys.

Like his brother, > T. F. Powys, his fiction is influenced by his background in the English West Country, but his prose is contrasted with his brother's by its expansiveness and diffuseness. His writing combines a strongly physical sensationalism with a fascination for the intangible and mysterious reaches of human experience. He is concerned with the transformation of ordinary life by a contemplative intensity which generates a mythical sense of the individual's relation to his natural environment. His work shows the influence of > Thomas Hardy, with whom he was acquainted, although Powys is more clearly identified with > modernist forms than Hardy. Powys, T. F. (Theodore Francis) (1875–1953) Novelist and short-story writer; brother of ➤ John Cowper Powys. His novels and fables are set in the rural south-west of England; the characters are presented with a simplicity and poetry resembling the style of the Old Testament of the > Bible, but the individuality of the expression is too distinct for the resemblance to be obvious, and the tone is naïve on the surface but sophisticated in its pagan, often cynical implications. At its best, eg in Mr Weston's Good Wine (1927) and Fables (1929), Powys' art rose to exquisite tragic poetry; at its worst it descended to brutality and cruelty. His fiction is a very late and unusual example in English of a writer using purely rural traditions and environment: the tragic pessimism, less humane and more sophisticated than ▷ Thomas Hardy's, is perhaps a reflection of the disappearing vitality of that way of life. Some other works: Mark Only (1924); Mr Tasker's Gods (1925); Kindness in a Corner (1930). Fables was republished as No Painted Plumage in 1934. Bib: Coombes, H., T. F. Practical criticism

A term coined by I. A. Richards in the 1920s to describe a critical method which concentrated on the close reading of texts rather than, for example, attention to biographical, historical or other contextual modes of interpretation. Practical criticism has probably been the most influential Anglo-American critical method of the twentieth century and formed the basis for much critical practice and literary education in both Britain and the United States for half a century. The aims of practical criticism were to train students in close reading skills which fully respected nuances of meaning and avoided 'stock responses'. The methods of practical criticism and close reading were well suited to short lyric poetry, but were less successful on longer or dramatic texts. Practical criticism, however, came increasingly to be criticized for the dogmatic outlook of many of its supporters, the prescriptiveness of its methods and the narrowness of the concerns it addressed. Bib: Richards, I. A., Practical Criticism.

Precious women, Précieuses, préciosité Translation of the French term Précieuses, applied to a group of literary women in the 17th century. The Précieuses were closely associated with the salon movement in the decade 1650 to 1660 and placed ever greater emphasis on refinement, or préciosité, in matters of social etiquette, literature and language in a bid to raise the status of women. Among the most notable were > Madeleine de Scudéry and the bourgeoises who frequented her Samedis or Saturday salons. The original sense of the term was positive, reaffirming that women were 'full of value', and designating such a woman as 'celle qui raffine sur le langage, qui sait quelque chose', ('a woman who uses refined language and knows something'). The Precious Women accordingly placed great value on women's independence from men and questioned the institution of > marriage. For their romanesque, or ⊳ romantic, ideas and linguistic excesses, they were much ridiculed by the dramatist > Molière and others. In his Dictionnaire des Précieuses ('Dictionary of the Precious Women', 1659), Somaize (b1639) distinguished three sorts of women in French society: those with 'no knowledge and no conversation' ('aucune connaissance, aucune conversation'); those who were just as ignorant but engaged readily in conversation ('aussi ignorantes, mais parlent avec promptitude'); and those who, using their exceptional beauty to distinguish themselves from the crowd, read all the novels and verse they could in a bid to learn how to speak well. In his dictionary, Antoine Furetière (1619-88) gives the following definition: 'The epithet Précieuse was formerly applied to exceptionally virtuous women, who were particularly knowledgeable about society and language. The word has been devalued by the excesses and affected manners of others, who have been called false Précieuses or ridiculous Précieuses, about whom a comedy has been written.' ('Précieuses est aussi une épithète qu'on a donné ci-devant à des filles de grande vertu, qui savoient bien le monde et la langue: mais parce que d'autres ont affecté et outré leurs manières, cela a décrié le mot, et on les a appelées fausses précieuses, ou précieuses ridicules, dont on a fait une comédie.') Prelude, or Growth of a Poet's Mind, The (1805: 1850)

A ⊳ blank verse ⊳ autobiographical poem by > William Wordsworth. The first version, in 13 books, was written between 1799 and 1805, but remained unpublished. Wordsworth continued to revise the poem at intervals throughout his life, and a version in 14 books appeared in 1850, after his death. With the encouragement of ⊳ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Wordsworth originally hoped to achieve a great philosophical poem (provisionally entitled The Recluse) 'on man, on nature, and on human life', to which The Prelude was intended as an introduction. Only one further part of the project, the vastly inferior > Excursion, was completed. In The Prelude Wordsworth takes stock of his experience and resources, and traces the events of his early life. Books I-II, which concern 'Childhood and School-Time' contain some of his best-known work, illustrating the interaction between his growing mind and nature, as he climbs up to a raven's nest, rows a boat out on to a lake at night, or skates under the stars. Later books concern his time at Cambridge, in London and in revolutionary France (> French Revolution). The heading of Book VIII sums up a constant theme: 'Love of Nature Leading to Love of Man'.

In a sense the work is a continuation of the > epic tradition in a bourgeois form, the heroic adventures of the aristocratic warrior hero being replaced by the inner adventures of the individual poet. This helps to explain the epic grandeur of the poem's tone and scope, though this is not always sustained in practice. The revisions in the 1850 version, though they frequently improve the phrasing and pace of the 1805 text, impose upon it a Christian orthodoxy which muffles the immediacy of Wordsworth's original idiosyncratic > pantheism.

Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood

A movement of painters and poets which began just before 1850; it was more important in painting than in poetry, but one of its leading members, > Dante Gabriel Rossetti, was equally famous in both arts. The essence of the movement was opposition to technical skill without inspiration. This made it anti-Victorian, inasmuch as industrial techniques (illustrated by the ➤ Great Exhibition of 1851) were producing vast quantities of work which were products of engineering. Technical skill without inspiration was deemed to be an aspect of the neo-classical art of the 18th century, against which the ▶ Romantics had already protested, and behind neo-classicism lay the 16th-century Renaissance of Greek and Roman art, and the paintings of the Italian artist Raphael (1483-1520), who had produced religious pictures of extraordinary perfection in technique but (in the opinion of the Pre-Raphaelites) with an almost cynical disregard of spiritual feeling. This tenderness of the spirit had existed in > medieval art; hence the Brotherhood, by no means hostile to highly polished technique, cultivated the artistic spirit of the Middle Ages. The principal painters of the Brotherhood were Rossetti, John Millais and Holman Hunt; its poets were Rossetti and his sister > Christina Rossetti, and, a little later, > William Morris.

The movement drew for its poetical inspiration on the ardour of the Romantic poet John Keats (1795-1821), who had also cultivated the Middle Ages, and it greatly revered the contemporary poet ➤ Alfred Tennyson, whose art owed much to Keats. But Pre-Raphaelitism was not merely an aesthetic movement; a great influence upon it was the work of the art critic > John Ruskin, who had a strong social conscience about the duty of art to society, and especially of the duty of redeeming the squalid life of the urban working classes. Less close to the movement, but still in harmony with it. was the poet critic > Matthew Arnold, with his attack on the philistinism of the middle classes and the barbarism of the upper classes. Finally, the ground of Pre-Raphaelitism had been prepared by the > Oxford Movement in the Church of England; this had rejected the interfering state, and by its cultivation of ritual in religious worship asserted that it had brought beauty back into religion.

However, Keats had not been dismayed by the world of his time so much as by the inevitability of desperate suffering as part of the human lot in every age. Arnold and Tennyson, in their poetry, were dismayed by the surface hideousness and the apparently irremediable injustices of their society. They had tended to write a 'poetry of withdrawal', creating an inner world of unassailable dreams (Tennyson) or a transcendent fortress of lofty feeling (Arnold). The Pre-Raphaelites followed this example. The poetry of D.G. Rossetti and of Morris is a 'literary' art, ie it depends on the proved poetic stimulus of a special 'poetic' language and imagery which was alien to the ordinary man of the age, and had no relationship to the economically productive genius of the age itself. (The intensely pious Christina Rossetti had a more authentic, religious inspiration, but even in her work the feeling is subjectively personal as compared to the work of a 17th-century religious poet such as George Herbert, 1593-1633, whom in some respects she resembled.) Thus, whatever the social consciences of Rossetti and Morris, they tended to take poetry to be an autonomous activity, largely independent of the political and social issues of the time. The poet > Algernon Swinburne had the courage to take this autonomy seriously; with him, 'art for art's sake' was born, and the aesthetic movement (▶ Aestheticism). The only poetry which was moving strongly in another direction was that of ➤ Gerard Manley Hopkins from 1865 to 1880, and he was regarded as unpublishable. Another poet, W.B. Yeats (1865-1939), owed much to the Pre-Raphaelites and especially to Morris, but the bitter realities of Irish politics made him, in the next century, one of the leaders of the reaction against the whole direction of art as the worship of Beauty. This reaction has lasted to the present day. The Pre-Raphaelites had their own periodical > The Germ; it first appeared in January 1850, and ran for only four numbers.

Presbyterianism

A ➤ Protestant doctrine of church organization devised by John Calvin (1509-1604) and other Reformers during the 16th-century Protestant Reformation. The word 'Presbyter' comes from a Greek word meaning 'elder', and Presbyterianism is a system of church government by councils of elders. It became dominant in Scotland under the leadership of John Knox (1505-72) and had wide support in England between about 1570 and 1648 when Oliver Cromwell (1500-1658) alienated the Presbyterian puritans and terminated the Presbyterian establishment because of their support for King Charles I. Briefly re-established after Cromwell's death it seceded extensively to ➤ Unitarianism during the 18th century. It was revived by Scottish settlers in England who began organizing their own congregations. In 1847 some Scottish and English Presbyterian congregations merged to form the United Presbyterian Church. The Presbyterian Church of England was formed in 1876 from a further amalgamation of the United Presbyterian Church and other such congregations. > Thomas Carlyle was raised in Scotland as strict Presbyterian within the Burgher sect (which attempted to cling to a belief in an extreme Protestant theocracy throughout Cromwell's governance). His parents intended him to become a minister in the Burgher church, but he renounced his calling in 1817. By 1820 the sect had ceased to exist as an independent body.

Pretender

> Old Pretender, The; Jacobite.

Pride and Prejudice (1813)

A novel by ➤ Jane Austen. Mr and Mrs Bennet belong to the minor gentry and live at Longbourne near London. Mr Bennet is witty and intelligent, and bored with his foolish wife. They have five daughters, whose marriage prospects are Mrs Bennet's chief interest in life, since the estate is 'entailed' - ie by the law of the period it will go on Mr Bennet's death to his nearest male relation, a sycophantic clergyman called Mr Collins. The main part of the story is concerned with the relationship between the witty and attractive Elizabeth Bennet and the haughty and fastidious Fitzwilliam Darcy, who at first considers her beneath his notice and later, on coming to the point of asking her to marry him, finds that she is resolutely prejudiced against him. His friend Charles Bingley is in love with the eldest daughter, Jane, but they are kept apart by the jealous snobbishness of his sisters and (at first) the fastidious disapproval of Darcy. Meanwhile, Elizabeth is subjected to an insolent offer of marriage by Mr Collins and the arrogant condescension of his patroness, Lady Catherine de Bourgh, Darcy's aunt. Those who regard the Bennet family as foolish and vulgar have their opinion justified when Lydia Bennet elopes with an irresponsible young officer, George Wickham. By this time, however, Darcy and Elizabeth have been chastened by finding in one another a fastidiousness and pride that equal their own and, despite the family scandal, they are united.

The novel has always been one of the most liked of Jane Austen's, and it contains excellent social comedy, but in some respects it stands apart. She herself said of it 'The work is rather too light, and bright, and sparkling; it wants to be stretched out here and there with a long chapter of sense.' Elizabeth Bennet was, however, her own favourite heroine.

Priestley, J. B. (John Boynton) (1894-1984) Dramatist and novelist. Priestley wrote fortyseven plays, an opera libretto, films, television and radio plays and twenty-eight novels quite apart from a much greater number of books of travel, political comment, literary biography, etc. Most of his plays are carefully plotted and mainly conventional in form, even allowing for the split, serial and circular theories of time which shape the three 'time plays': Dangerous Corner (1932), Time and the Conways (1937) and I Have Been Here Before (1937). More unconventional in breaking out of the domestic box set are: Johnson Over Jordan (1939), which follows its protagonist through the fourth dimension of immediate afterdeath; Music at Night (1938), which explores the thoughts and lives of the audience at a concert; They Came to a City (1942), which pictures a socialist utopia; and Desert Highway (1943), written for army actors, which shows a tank crew marooned in the desert with a flash-back to their prototypes in ancient times. Priestley was much more adventurous than most dramatists being performed on Shaftesbury Avenue at the time, but he quite consciously sought to work within the limits acceptable to contemporary society and behaviour and a presentation of ideas beyond the humour and narration of their surface. Their optimism now dates his more overtly political pieces, but Time and the Conways, the comedy When We are Married (1938) and An Inspector Calls (1945) are frequently revived. Bib: Evans, G. Priestley, Joseph (1733-1804)

A nonconformist minister, scientist and teacher. He was partly educated at a nonconformist academy at Daventry; such academies existed in the 18th century to give a university education to non-conformists, who for their religious views were not admitted to the recognized universities of Oxford and Cambridge. They were commonly more advanced scientifically than the real universities; Priestley eventually became the first chemist to isolate oxygen. In 1768 he published his Essay on the First Principles of Government, advocating 'the happiness of the majority' as the criterion by which government must be judged. This line of thought was developed by ▷ Jeremy Bentham and his 10th-century followers, the ➤ Utilitarians. Priestley's house in Birmingham was destroyed by the mob in 1791 owing to his well-known sympathy with the ▶ French Revolution, and in 1794 he emigrated to the United States.

Primitive, primitivism

From a literary viewpoint, the concept of primitivism revolves around the figure of the 'noble savage'. Descended from the classical notion of a > Golden Age, the concept gains most popularity and intellectual resonance in the 18th century, anticipated by the figure of Man Friday in Defoe's Defo Crusoe (1719) and ➤ Aphra Behn's novel > Oroonoko, or the History of the Royal Slave (1688), successfully adapted for the stage by > Thomas Southerne in 1695. Based partly on the author's experiences of Surinam, Behn's novel is one of the earliest examples of primitivism in imaginative literature, describing primitive people in 'the first state of innocence, before men knew how to sin': the whole primitivist tradition may be read as a varied series of laments for, and objections against, the myth of Genesis and the Fall of mankind. Primitivism expresses an optimistic belief in the essential goodness of human beings, corrupted and deformed by so-called civilization. The chief conduit for debate in this area was the philosopher ➤ Rousseau. His writings of the 1750s contrast the harmonious existence of primitive man in a 'state of nature' with the indolence, profligacy and selfish obsession with private property experienced by Europeans. Emile (1762) attempted to establish the principles of a new educational system, through which a child could develop rational independence of mind, while preserving a natural innocence, while the Social Contract of the same year argued for equality before the law, a more fair distribution of wealth, and a democratic subscription to the common good. While the resonance of these ideas for > the French Revolution is self-evident, their influence on > Romantic literature runs deep, persisting well beyond a point when the Revolution itself had been compromised by slaughter.

Primose, Diana (c 1630)

Poet. The only reference extant to this writer is on the title-page of her book A Chaine of Pearls (1630), ostensibly a panegyric to ➤ Elizabeth I. The queen, however, had been dead for 27 years and the poem is more likely an attack on ➤ Charles I, whose shortcomings are shown up by contrast with Elizabeth's virtues. Her narrative source is ➤ William Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth (1615; published in English in 1625), while the list of virtues are commonplace, such as chastity, temperance, justice and fortitude.

Primrose League

A Conservative political society founded in memory of ➤ Benjamin Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield, whose favourite flower was said to be the primrose. The society was founded in 1883 and achieved large membership; it was one of the earliest successful attempts at permanent organization of public opinion in support of a political party.

Prince, Mary (c 1788-c 1833)

Autobiographer. Mary Prince was a slave who, on being abandoned in London in 1831, was befriended by Susannah Moodie (one of the first Canadian women writers) who acted as her amanuensis, and by Thomas Pringe who campaigned for her emancipation. Her story was published in that year as part of the campaign, and makes for dispiriting, although compelling, reading. Prince was born in Bermuda in the household of a kindly family, but she was sold separately from her family when she was 11 and her new owners were savagely cruel to her. Over the next 18 years Prince was flogged, put to work at salt production (particularly harsh), and probably sexually abused. But by 1826 she was in Antigua, had converted to Methodism, had learned to read and had married Daniel Jones, a free man. Her owners appeared to have attempted to break this new sense of independence by taking her to London, but when that failed they simply threw her out on to the streets. Prince's narrative is part of a tradition of slave narratives which began at the beginning of the 18th century and were an important contribution to the political movement against slavery.

Princess, The (1850)

Poem by ➤ Alfred Tennyson, originally titled The Princess, A Medley (1847), enlarged and revised in 1850. Despite bad reviews, The Princess was immensely popular and sold well on publication. Like > Elizabeth Barrett Browning's ➤ Aurora Leigh, it was a key text in the so-called > 'woman question' debate, displaced on to a pseudo-medieval scene. The tale of Princess Ida, champion of women's rights who rejects > marriage and sets up a women-only university, is collectively told by a group of friends entertaining themselves. Ida was betrothed in infancy to the Prince, who narrates the tale of how he defies 'the inscription on the gate, LET NO MAN ENTER IN ON PAIN OF DEATH'. He and two friends dress as women and infiltrate the university. The men's identities are discovered by the women, and the university is attacked by the prince's father, who demands that they be released unharmed. In the ensuing battle between Ida's father and the Prince's, the three young men fall. Ida calls for the women to nurse them. and the women's university is turned into a hospital. When the Prince recovers he proposes a progressive marriage of equality to Ida, to which she yields:

My bride My wife, my life. O we will walk this world, Locked in all exercise of nobel end . . .

by ➤ Christina Rossetti, including the quest narrative 'The Prince's Progress', 'The Iniquity of the Fathers Upon the Children' (a narrative poem spoken from the perspective of an illegitimate child) and 'L.E.L.', a lyric dedicated to the poet Letitita Landon (1802−38). The simple diction and controlled poetic form which characterizes the collection reflects Rossetti's developing aesthetic of personal and artistic renunciation.

Prior, Matthew (1664-1721)

Poet and diplomat. The son of a joiner, Prior was educated under the patronage of the > Earl of Dorset. While an undergraduate at > Cambridge he collaborated with the Earl of Halifax on a parody of > John Dryden, The Hind and the Panther transvers'd to the Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse (1687), and in 1700 he celebrated the arrival of > William III from Holland in Carmen Saeculare. After a period as secretary to the ambassador at the Hague he allied himself to the Tory camp of > Harley and > Bolingbroke and was involved in secret negotiations with the French government over the Treaty of Utrecht (1713) (➤ Spanish succession, War of, which was nicknamed 'Matt's Peace' after him. When ➤ Queen Anne died in 1714 and the Tories fell from power he was impeached and imprisoned for two years. His Poems, published by his friends in 1718, helped to restore his fortunes. His best work is marked by an easygoing humour. Alma: or the Progress of the Mind, (1718), a long poem in loose Hudibrastics (> Hudibras), mocks the systematic philosophy of ➤ Aristotle and ➤ Descartes and elaborates the proposition, borrowed from > Montaigne's essay 'On Drunkenness', that the mind begins in youth in the toes, and rises by degrees until it reaches the head in old age. It is in his shorter, occasional poems that Prior achieves his most satisfying poetic effects. 'Jinny the Just' (published in 1907), an elegy for his housekeeper and mistress, employs an unheroic > metre of anapaestic triplets to characterize its uneducated subject, and to create a moving personal tribute:

Tread Soft on her grave, and do right to her honour Lett neither rude hand nor Ill tongue light upon her Do all the Small favours that now can be don her.

Other poems of importance are Solomon on the Vanity of the World (1718), in heroic \triangleright couplets; Henry and Emma (1707), a travesty of the old \triangleright ballad The Nut-Brown Maid; and Down-Hall, a Ballad (1723). Prior was a brilliant exponent of the epigram, a memorable example being 'A True Maid':

No, no; for my Virginity, When I lose that, says Rose, I'll dye: Behind the Elmes, last Night, cry'd Dick, Rose, were you not extreamly Sick?

Prioress's Tale, The

One of ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales, which derives from the popular tradition of devotional narratives celebrating the miraculous interventions of the Virgin Mary. It is an anti-Semitic story, set in Asia, which recounts how a young Christian boy is murdered by Jews as he walks through their quarter singing a Christian hymn. His body is discovered because he continues to sing the hymn, miraculously, even after his death. The narrative, written in ➤ rhyme royal, is narrated in an emotive and pathetic style.

Prisoner of Chillon, The (1816)
A poem by ▷ Lord Byron in tetrameter ▷ couplets (▷ metre) interspersed with quatrains. It is based on the story of François de Bonnivard (1496–1570), prior of the monastery of St Victor, near Geneva, who participated in a revolt against the Duke of Savoy and attempted to set up a republic in Geneva. He was imprisoned from 1530 to 1536 in the castle of Chillon. Byron's work is prefaced by a facile sonnet extolling Liberty as the 'Eternal Spirit of the chainless Mind!' The poem itself, however, contradicts this optimism, describing the slow pining away of the narrator's two brothers, and the disintegration of his own mind under the strain of solitude: 'It was at length the same to me,/ Fetter'd or fetterless to be,/ I learn'd to love despair.' The historical Bonnivard was given a pension after his release, and was married four times.

Pritchard, Hannah (1709-68)

Actress, singer. She joined > Theophilus Cibber and other performers who seceded from the company at > Drury Lane, and opened at the > Haymarket Theatre in 1733, only to return to Drury Lane in the following year. By now she was frequently cast in major roles, including Phaedra in ➤ Dryden's Amphitryon (1690), Isabella in > Sir Richard Steele's > The Conscious Lovers, and Dol Common in Jonson's > The Alchemist.

In 1740 Pritchard played Desdemona to > James Quin's > Othello, but her performance as Rosalind in > As You Like It from the end of that year is said finally to have established her as one of the leading actresses of her generation. She appeared as Nerissa in the production of > The Merchant of Venice in which > Charles Macklin revolutionized the portrayal of Shylock, and later acted in several plays with ⊳ Garrick.

In 1749 her popularity forced a change in the ending of ➤ Samuel Johnson's Mahomet and Irene, to the author's chagrin: she was to have been strangled on stage, but the audience would not have it, and the action was modified so that she was 'killed' away from their view instead. She was noted for the intelligence of her interpretations, her versatility, and her dedication to her profession. Bib: Vaughan, A., Born to Please: Hannah

Problem plays (of Shakespeare)

A term first used in the late 19th century by critics of ▶ Shakespeare to designate a group of his plays written between 1600 and 1604. These are: > Troilus and Cressida, > All's Well that End's Well and ➤ Measure for Measure. What makes these all 'problem plays' in the view of some critics is that it is difficult to discern the individual play's overall thematic direction. Troilus and Cressida is regarded as a problem because, while the Trojans are shown to be intrinsically nobler than the Greeks, they are also shown to be wrong, although the Greeks are not conclusively shown to be right in their outlook. Thus no positive value is preached by the play, nor does it seem to be light-hearted enough to be simply a comedy. All's Well, the slightest of the three, is a problem because the noble heroine uses means that nowadays we would despise to gain her lover, who does not, in any case, seem to be worth her trouble. The play is thus a 'romantic comedy', but one in which the romance has gone sour. Measure for Measure is a comedy which, in the opinion of some critics, is both too serious and too cynical in some of its characteristics to be successful either as a comedy or as a serious critique of society. Not every critic agrees that all these plays, or any of them, are really 'problematic'. Bib: Tillyard, E. M. W., Shakespeare's Problem Plays.

In 1853 she began to contribute poetry to ➤ Household Words and found an admirer in > Charles Dickens, who wrote a foreword to her Complete Works (1905). A collected twovolume edition, Legends and Lyrics (1858 and 1861) includes her most popular verse, much of which is sentimental. Procter was a dedicated feminist and helped to found the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women. The proceeds from Chaplet of Verses (1862) went to a homeless women's refuge. Procter also Poet, dramatist and biographer. Proctor, a lawyer, wrote under the pseudonym of 'Barry Cornwall'. His work, including Dramatic Scenes (1819) and Marcian Collona (1820), was very popular with the public, but generally dismissed by other poets, such as ▷ Keats and ▷ Shelley. He was, however, on friendly terms with ▷ Lamb, who had admired Dramatic Scenes, and Proctor undertook his biography, Charles Lamb: A Memoir (1866).

Professor, The (1857)

A novel by ➤ Charlotte Brontë, written in 1846 but not published until after the author's death. In many ways it is an early version of ➤ Villette, although it is not as sophisticated. The central character, William Crimsworth, is an ➤ orphan who leaves England to seek his fortune in Brussels. He falls in love with Frances Henri, an Anglo-Swiss pupil-teacher, and eventually marries her. Their relationship is analogous to that of Lucy Snowe and Paul Emmanuel in Villette, although it is not drawn with as much complexity.

Prometheus

In Greek myth, one of the Titans. In the war between the gods and the Titans, he remained neutral, and was still on terms with Zeus when the gods were victorious. He was, however, very cunning and skilful.

According to legend Zeus was angry at a deception practised on him by Prometheus and deprived mankind of fire. Prometheus, however, stole fire from the gods, and gave it to man. Zeus then tried to punish man by sending the first woman (Pandora) with her jar of misfortunes; Hope, however, was left to man when the misfortunes were released to plague humanity. Zeus now tried to drown the human race in a great flood, but again Prometheus came to the rescue. To punish Prometheus for repeatedly outwitting him,

Zeus had him bound to Mount Caucasus, and sent an eagle which gnawed incessantly at his liver. Prometheus, however, refused to ask pardon, and withheld a secret affecting Zeus' destiny. Eventually, Zeus allowed Heracles to free the Titan, who told the secret, and enabled Zeus to save himself. Prometheus was mortal, and on his death descended to the underworld. However, at the prayer of the centaur, Cheiron, he was eventually released, and permitted by Zeus to join the company of the gods. ▷ Shelley's lyrical drama ▷ Prometheus Unbound completes the Promethean trilogy by the Greek poet ▷ Aeschylus, and places the figure of Prometheus in a contemporary political context.

Prometheus Unbound (1820)

A 'lyrical drama in four acts' by ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley, written to correspond to the final lost play of the Promethean trilogy by the Greek poet, > Aeschylus. The demigod Prometheus, having stolen the secret of fire from the gods and given it to man, is punished by being chained to a rock and subjected to everlasting torture. Nevertheless, comforted by his mother, the Earth, and consoled by thoughts of his bride, Asia, the Spirit of Nature, he remains defiant against Jupiter, king of the gods. At the appointed hour Demogorgon, the primal lifeforce, defeats Jupiter, frees Prometheus, and an era of love dawns, in which all cruelty and oppression are banished: 'the man remains/ Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, but man/ Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless,/ Exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king/ Over himself'. The original Greek myth in which Zeus (Jupiter) and Prometheus are reconciled, is thus transformed into a political allegory of modern revolution. The style is elaborately abstract, and the play is to be read rather than acted. In his Preface the poet refers to his desire 'to familiarize the highly refined imagination of the more select classes of poetical readers with beautiful idealisms of moral excellence'. Despite its clovingly consistent elevation of tone, it is a strangely powerful work.

Protestant succession

The belief that the throne should not pass to a Roman Catholic. The arguments about the royal succession became bitter when ▷ Charles II was succeeded by his brother ▷ James II. James' Catholicism was only one reason for the ▷ Glorious Revolution of 1688 but the fear of a return of James or of later succession by other Catholics caused further controversy and led to the ▷ Act of Settlement of 1701 and later ▷ Acts which made it impossible for a Catholic to succeed to the throne.

> Protestantism.

Protestantism

A term used for all varieties of Christian belief which broke away from Roman Catholicism during the ➤ Reformation in the 16th century, or for religious communities not in agreement with Roman Catholicism but originating since the Reformation. It was first used in regard to those who protested against the Emperor Charles V's condemnation of the reformers in Germany at the Diet of Spires, 1529. Protestants in Britain include ➤ Anglicans, ➤ Presbyterians, ➤ Methodists and ➤ Baptists.

Prothalamion (1596)

A wedding song, written by ▷ Edmund Spenser and published in 1596. Prothalamion is roughly half the length of Spenser's other wedding song ¬ ▷ Epithalamion. The ode celebrates the double wedding of two sisters ¬ Lady Elizabeth and Lady Katherine Somerset in August 1596.

Proust, Marcel (1871-1922)

French writer. Early in his career, he was the author of critical works, Les Plaisirs et les jours (1896; translations from Ruskin), Pastiches et mélanges (1919) and two posthumously published works Contre Sainte-Beuve (1981), and the incomplete novel Jean Santeuil (1952). Proust is nonetheless known for one book, his major work, A la recherche du temps perdu. It runs to 3,000 printed pages and was originally published in eight parts between 1913 and 1927. The novel was first translated by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff under the title Remembrance of Things Past, but a recent and much improved version has been completed by Terence Kilmartin.

A la recherche is the story of an artistic vocation, the attempt to write a novel which is similar to (though not the same as) that which the reader has before him. The novel itself is full of artist-figures, and the narrator's own endeavours to perceive pattern in disorder and fragmentation centre crucially on a discovery, a discovery about time and memory. The attempt to resurrect and recapture time past through voluntary memory cannot but fail, for voluntary memory is sifted for its relevancies. The past can consequently only be reached by involuntary memory, itself triggered by the most apparently innocuous and circumstantial of objects: a madeleine dipped in tea, a starched napkin, an uneven paving-stone. These objects are associated with forgotten events in the past, and those instants when the bond between past and present is recovered and the past reborn are 'privileged moments' (moments privilégiés). The novel jettisons a unilinear plot, while the central focus for narration is restricted to that of Marcel (not to be confused with Proust himself); impressions and sensations are fed through his consciousness which evolves over time and constitutes a devolved, perceptuallylimited human subject. Proust's portrayal of social and above all sexual relations, moreover, intensify the sense of a self unable to know others, until the narrator realizes that only art gives access to others, since only in art is there the 'real residue' of the personality.

Proust's novel aroused two kinds of reactions. His minuteness in rendering human consciousness, for example, recalls both ⊳ Henry James and ➤ James Joyce. His perception that the insignificance of an incident at the time of experiencing it contrasts with the importance it may come to have in the memory anticipates ➤ Virginia Woolf. The design by which relationships amplify through a lifetime into a pattern evocative of musical composition was emulated by ➤ Anthony Powell in A Dance to the Music of Time. On the other hand other 20th-century novelists, such as > D. H. Lawrence and ▷ L. H. Myers, have rejected Proust on the grounds that his principles are merely aesthetic.

Proviso scene

Scene in a play showing bargaining between lovers, typically those featured in so-called ➤ Comedies of Manners, of the ➤ Restoration, wherein they set their terms before agreeing to be married. The most famous such scene is that between Millamant and Mirabell in ➤ William Congreve's ➤ The Way of the World (1700), in which they guarantee one another independence within marriage, before announcing their engagement (IV, 2).

Provok'd Wife, The (1697)

Play by ⊳ Sir John Vanbrugh. The drunken, boorish and misogynistic Sir John Brute, married but hating ➤ marriage, conducts a deliberate campaign to abuse and humiliate his wife and her niece Bellinda. In revenge, Lady Brute determines to cuckold him with the amorous Constant, who has been courting her for the past two years. In a parallel plot Heartfree, another misogynist, at first woos the affected Lady Fanciful, then falls in love, for the first time in his life, with Bellinda. A series of intrigues brings the pairs of lovers together in amorous assignations, although Lady Brute refrains from adultery with Constant. In the final scene Lady Fanciful attempts, but fails, to defame the reputations of both Bellinda and Heartfree, with whom she is now in love. Bellinda and Heartfree are united, while Sir John undergoes a supposed but unconvincing change of heart, and vows to be a better husband in future. The play's comedy barely sweetens its bitter comments on marriage, and especially the vulnerability of women in marriage. But it affirms the value of true love: Constant says, 'Though marriage be a lottery, in which there are wondrous many blanks, yet there is one inestimable lot in which the only heaven on earth is written'. Ironically however, he, the only admirer of women, apparently remains unmarried at the end, while the misogynists are matched.

Prynne, J. H. (Jeremy Halward) (b 1936) Poet. Prynne's poetry is densely allusive, complex, and includes terms and ideas drawn from the sciences and other discourses far removed from the conventional precincts of British poetry. He is a fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, and lectures in the English Faculty. His teaching as well as his poetry has been an important influence upon younger writers and academics. His books include: Brass (1971), The Oval Window (1983) and Not-You (1993).

Psalms, The

A book of the Old Testament composed of the sacred songs of the ancient Jewish religion. In ancient Hebrew, they were called 'Praisesongs', indicating the predominant function of the collection, though other functions − lament, meditation, imprecation etc. − were included. Authorship was traditionally attributed to ▶ King David, but it is evident that the psalms either date from after the Babylonian Captivity (6th century BC) or were re-edited then; in any case they originated at different periods.

In the 16th century under the inspiration of the > Protestant Reformation, the psalms were translated into English. There are two prose versions in official use in the > Church of England: that of the Authorized Version of the > Bible of 1611, and the older translation in the Book of ➤ Common Prayer dating from 1549. Both include some of the wellknown masterpieces of English prose of the ➤ Renaissance. In addition, there are the metrical and rhymed versions especially favoured by the more extreme Protestants. The so-called 'Old Version' by Sternhold and Hopkins was published in its complete form in 1562. Another version, principally the work of Francis Rouse, came into general use in Scotland in the mid 17th century, and in 1696 Nicholas Brady and ➤ Nahum Tate produced the so-called 'New Version'. More distinguished attempts to versify the prose psalms were made in the 16th century by ⊳ Sir Philip Sidney and his sister the > Countess of Pembroke; in the 17th, by George Sandys, > George Wither and > John Milton; in the 19th, by John Keble.

Pseudonyms

A 'pseudonym' or false name is mostly used by writers wishing to protect their identity and enjoy the freedom to express their ideas openly. As such pseudonyms are often used by writers in marginal positions, such as women and racial minorities. While this usage has occurred through many periods, as for example with Jane Anger's attack against men, the 19th century is the key period for the emergence of the pseudonym, especially during the 1840s when female novelists were becoming a recognizable professional group. The ▶ Brontë sisters first published under the androgynous pseudonyms Currer, Ellis and Acton Bell. Charlotte Brontë later admitted that 'a vague impression that authoresses are liable to be looked on with prejudice' had influenced the decision. > George Eliot pleaded with Charles Grav not to expose her identity after she published an article in the ➤ Westminster Review in 1855. 'The article appears to have produced a strong impression,' wrote Eliot, 'and that impression would be a little counteracted if the author were known to be a woman.' Other examples might include the French writer ➤ George Sand (who had an enormous influence on Eliot), > John Oliver Hobbes and > George Egerton: the pseudonyms of Aurora Dupin, Pearl Craigie and Mary Chavelita Dunne respectively, and > Augusta Webster, whose first volumes of poetry were published under the name Cecil Home. > Eliza Lvnn Linton chose to write her > autobiography under the name Christopher Kirkland. The collaborative poets Katherine Bradley and Edith Cooper wrote under the pseudonym > Michael Field and entreated > Robert Browning to guard the secret of their controversial dual authorship (which seemed to strike at the very notion of the sanctity of the writer), and most importantly their gender. 'We have many things to say that the world will not tolerate from a woman's lips,' declared Katherine Bradley. Edith Somerville and Violet Martin also wrote collaboratively, but their pseudonym, > Somerville and Ross, was designed only to protect their identities as women. At the same time the market for women's literature was a lucrative one and some male authors such as ➤ William Sharp (Fiona Macleod) were not above changing sex in name only - in order to exploit it. Women poets and novelists in the 19th century often favoured the use of enigmatic pseudonyms such as 'Speranza' (➤ Jane Wilde) and ➤ 'Ouida' (Marie Louise de la Ramée).

Many contributors to reviews and periodicals, such as the novelist ▷ Thackeray ('Charles James Yellowplush', 'Michael Angelo Titmarsh' and 'George Savage Fitz-Boodle'), disguised their names to conceal their ubiquity. At the same time the use of a nom de plume sometimes implied a second identity and allowed a writer to experiment with a variety of subject matter. ▷ Dickens published his first book ▷ Sketches by Boz using a pseudonym derived from his own infant attempts to pronounce the name 'Moses'.

In the 20th century pseudonyms have largely dropped from use unless for idiosyncratic purposes. Perhaps the most famous post-2nd-World-War use of the pseudonym was 'Pauline Réage' the author of The Story of O whose real name is Dominique Aury. The reason for this use was the pornographic (▷ pornography) nature of the text.

Psychoanalytical criticism

Psychoanalysis and literary criticism both seek to interpret their respective objects of enquiry, and both involve the analysis of language. In its early manifestations psychoanalytical criticism (eg Ernest Jones' Hamlet and Oedipus; 1949) sought to apply the methods of psychoanalysis to particular texts, in order to uncover their 'unconscious'. Jones' claim was to reveal the causes of Hamlet's behaviour beginning from the assumption that 'current response is always compounded partly of a response to the actual situation and partly of past responses to older situations that are unconsciously felt to be similar'. The French psychoanalyst ⊳ Jacques Lacan's re-reading of ⊳ Freud has sought to render problematical this relationship between patient and analyst, and, by implication, between text and reader. Lacan's description of the unconscious as being structured 'like a language' raises fundamental questions of the authoritative role usually ascribed to the literary critic. To this extent the 'unconscious' of the literary text is brought into confrontation with the unconscious of the critic.

Many of the terms taken from psychology which are associated with Lacan's reading of Freud have been incorporated into the language of literary criticism; for example, the decentred subject of psychoanalysis, ▷ condensation, ▷ displacement, the realm of 'imaginary', the symbolic order, all refer in some way to textual mechanisms.

Ptolemy (Claudius Ptolemaeus) (2nd century AD)

Astronomer, geographer and mathematician. He was a native of the Egyptian city of Alexandria, and may have been of Greek origin. His theory of the structure of the universe, according to which the planets, sun and stars all revolved round the earth, remained the accepted opinion until replaced by the theory of ▷ Copernicus in the 16th century and the observations of ▷ Galileo in the 17th. This is the Ptolemaic System summarized in the Almagest, his treatise on astronomy.

Punch

A weekly comic periodical, founded in 1841.

Thomas Hood (1799-1845) and ⊳ Thackeray were early members of its staff, and it employed a number of distinguished illustrators in the 19th century including Leech, Tenniel, Keene, and George Du Maurier (1834-96). From 1849 for a century it kept the same cover picture of Punch of the puppet-shows. It was at first a radical paper, but as it became more and more an upper-class 'institution', so in politics, tone and taste it began to represent an influential but increasingly narrow section of the upper middle class. It has published the work of many famous cartoonists, including, in recent years, Ronald Searle, Michael Heath, Bill Tidy and Gerald Scarfe. The magazine was closed in 1993.

Purbeck, Elizabeth and Jane (c 1789–1802) Novelists. The Purbeck sisters wrote collaborative novels which balanced romantic narratives with gentle social and political comment. History of Sir George Warrington, or The Political Quixote (1797) and Neville Castle (1802) show a certain sympathy for the ideals of equality and use characters from real life, such as ▷ Tom Paine, and historical backdrops, like the ▷ French Revolution, in order to test their protagonist's devotion to their political and philosophical commitments. The latter novel also provides interesting critical material on ▷ Fanny Burney, Henry Fielding (1707–54), ▷ Sophia Lee, and Samuel Richardson (1689–1761).

Purcell, Henry (1659-95)

Composer. His father and uncle held musical appointments at the Chapel Royal, and his father was also master of the choristers of > Westminster Abbey. He became a chorister in the Chapel Royal as a young boy, and as a young man was made 'composer in ordinary to the king' and organist at the Abbey. He composed some instrumental pieces, but is expecially famous for his choral compositions. Some of these were church music, eg the Te Deum and Jubilate (1694), which was the first English religious work to be scored for both strings and brass. His official appointments also caused him to set choral odes written for official occasions, such as the odes to St Cecilia. In addition, he collaborated with a number of Restoration dramatists in writing for the theatre, including a musical setting for a > masque in > Betterton's drama Diocletian and musical numbers in several dramas by > Dryden: Tyrannic Love (1687), Amphitryon (1690), King Arthur (1691). This work for the theatre included a musical version of ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ A Midsummer Night's Dream entitled The Fairy Queen (1693), and his opera Dido and Aeneas (1689), with a libretto by ⊳ Nahum Tate.

Purcell's career concluded the period of English music which had begun in the mid-16th century. In his youth one of his principal teachers had been the English composer John Blow, but he was also a close student of French and Italian musical development. As a composer he had great freedom of imagination and strong gifts for dramatic writing.

Purgatorio

The second book of the Divina Commedia by Dante. Having emerged from the Inferno, the poet, still accompanied by Virgil, follows a spiral up to the Mount of Purgatory, where the souls of the dead are purged of the stains of their sins as they await release into Heaven. They encounter various groups of repentant sinners on the seven circular ledges of the mountain, who suffer punishments and pain, but do so more willingly, knowing the suffering will pass in the end. On its summit is the Earthly Paradise where the poet meets Beatrice, who is to guide him through the spheres of Heaven.

> Inferno; Paradiso.

Puritanism

The term is used in a narrow sense of religious practice and attitudes, and in a broad sense of an ethical outlook which is much less easy to define.

I In its strict sense, 'Puritan' was applied to those Protestant reformers who rejected Queen Elizabeth's religious settlement of 1560. This settlement sought a middle way between Roman Catholicism and the extreme spirit of reform of > Geneva. The Puritans, influenced by Geneva, Zurich, and other continental centres, objected to the retention of bishops and to any appearance of what they regarded as superstition in church worship the wearing of vestments by the priests, and any kind of religious image. Apart from their united opposition to Roman Catholicism and their insistence on simplicity in religious forms, Puritans disagreed among themselves on questions of doctrine and church organization. The principal sects were: > Presbyterians, Independents (at first called ➤ Brownists, and later ➤ Congregationalists), ➤ Baptists, and (later) ▷ Quakers. They were strong in the towns, especially in London, and in the University of Cambridge, and socially they were widespread, and included members of the aristocracy and of the working classes, as well as the middle, commercial classes where they had their chief strength. Puritanism was very strong in the first half of the 17th century and reached its peak of power after the > Civil War of 1642-6 - a war which was ostensibly religious, although it was also political. Matters of church government were much involved with matters of state government, since Presbyterians and Independents, who believed in popular control of the church, were not likely to tolerate royal control of Parliament's political affairs. Puritanism was both religiously and politically supreme in the decade 1650-60, but on the Restoration of the monarchy Puritans were denied participation in the Church of England, and refused rights of free religious worship. The last was granted them by the Toleration Act of 1689, and during the 18th century both Puritanism and the official attitude to it were modified under the influence of Rationalism. Nonetheless, the ➤ Methodist movement of that century had many of the characteristics of the older Puritan sects. It was, moreover, only in 1829 that Nonconformists (as they were now called) were allowed to offer themselves as candidates for seats in Parliament, and only in 1871 did the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge cease to be the monopoly of the Church of England.

2 In the broader sense of a whole way of life, puritanism has always represented strict obedience to the dictates of conscience and strong emphasis on the virtue of self-denial. In this sense individuals can be described as 'puritan' whether or not they belong to one of the recognized Puritan sects, or even if they are atheists.

The word 'Puritan' is often thought to imply hostility to the arts, but this is not necessarily true. In the reign of ➤ Elizabeth I poets such as > Spenser and > Sidney combined a strong puritan moral tone (without any Puritan doctrine in the sectarian sense) with an intense delight in artistic form; in the 17th century > John Milton was an ardent Puritan, but his poetry is one of the climaxes of English > Renaissance art. However, it is true that the strict Puritans of the age of Shakespeare were commonly opponents of the art of the theatre; this was partly because the theatres were sometimes scenes of moral licentiousness and disorder, and partly because the strict puritan, in his intense love of truth, was very inclined to confuse fiction with lying. Thus in the later 17th century Bunyan was criticized by some of his Puritan comrades for writing fiction in his allegory, ▷ Pilgrim's Progress, and in the early 18th century > Defoe had to defend his > Robinson Crusoe against similar charges. Nonetheless, in the 18th and 19th centuries, Puritanism, or attitudes derived from it, did tend to encourage 'philistinism', or contempt for culture. This was because Puritanism had always encouraged an essentially practical attitude to worldly affairs, and when religion slackened as a driving force, the practical virtues came to be regarded as the principal, if not the only ones. Art, on the other hand, encourages the contemplative virtues, which the practical man of Puritan tradition was inclined to regard as unnecessary, therefore frivolous, and so, in a puritan sense, 'sinful'. There is continuity of development from Priestley, the 18th-century scientist and preacher, through the practical philosophy of ▷ Bentham, to James Mill, the ▷ Utilitarian leader, who was an atheist.

What is called the 'Puritan conscience', on the other hand, had an important influence on one kind of art form - the novel. Puritans believed that the good life could only be lived by 'the inner light' - the voice of God in the heart - and to discern this light it was necessary to conduct the most scrupulous selfenquiry. This produced the kind of spiritual autobiography that was common in the mid-17th century, and of which the best example is Bunyan's > Grace Abounding. Such selfknowledge had two important consequences: it increased interest in, and understanding of, the human heart in others as well as the self, and the first results of this are apparent in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; but it also encouraged a sense of the loneliness of the individual - a sense that was supported by the growing economic individualism of the later 17th century. These are important constituents of the novelist's vision, and when one adds to them the preoccupation with moral values with which puritanism is so bound up, and which are such a permanent feature of the English novel, it is possible to think that without Puritanism the novel form would never have developed indigenously in England.

The reputed author of The Art

The reputed author of The Arte of English Poesie (1589). The book is a thorough treatise on English poetic technique at the time, on the threshold of one of the great decades of English short poems. It discusses the various forms of metrical verse, discusses - without deciding between them - the rival merits of metrical and non-metrical forms and presents an enlightened review of English verse. With > Sidney's > Apologie for Poetrie, Puttenham's book is one of the two most important critical works of the Elizabethan period. It is more scholarly, if less eloquent than Sidney's essay, but like Sidney, Puttenham is trying to establish civilized standards for the composition of poetry, and is opposed to the 'vulgar', popular traditions of a poet such as Skelton.

Pym, Barbara (1913–80) Novelist. Educated at Oxford University, she served with the W.R.N.S. during World War II, and subsequently worked at the International African Institute in London. Between 1950 and 1961 she published six novels: there then followed 16 years during which she could not find a publisher. After praise from Lord David Cecil and the poet Philip Larkin in 1977 her work received renewed attention, and she published a further three novels. Since then her work has enjoyed considerable popularity. Her novels are sensitive, shrewd, ironical portraits of English middle-class life, with a particular focus on the lives of women; the social contexts are frequently academic and clerical. She is often said to write in the tradition of > Jane Austen. A further three novels were published posthumously. Her novels are: Some Tame Gazelle (1950); Excellent Women (1952); Jane and Prudence (1953); Less Than Angels (1955); A Glass of Blessings (1958); No Fond Return of Love (1961); Quartet in Autumn (1977); The Sweet Dove Died (1978); A Few Green Leaves (1980); An Unsuitable Attachment (1982); Crampton Hodnet (1985); An Academic Question (1986). Pyramus and Thisbe

The hero and heroine of a love story by the Roman poet > Ovid (> Metamorphoses iv). The lovers are forbidden marriage by their parents, but they exchange vows through a hole in the wall that separates their respective houses. They agree to meet outside Babylon at the tomb of Ninus, but Thisbe, who arrives first, is frightened by a lion and hides in a cave, the lion meanwhile covering her dropped veil with blood. When Pyramus arrives and finds the bloody veil, he supposes Thisbe to be dead, and kills himself; Thisbe follows his example. In Shakespeare's play > A Midsummer Night's Dream the artisans give a comically bungled performance of the tragedy before King Theseus of Athens.

Pythagoras (6th century BC)

Greek philosopher. He is important in the histories of religion, mathematics and astronomy. In religion he founded the Pythagorean brotherhood, which believed in the immortality of the soul and its migration into another body, perhaps that of an animal, after death; for this reason they practiced vegetarianism. In mathematics, he discovered the mathematical relations of musical intervals; he or his followers believed that the sun and the planets were divided by comparable intervals – hence the tradition of 'the music of the spheres' inaudible to earthly hearing. In geometry, he is credited with the theorem called after him, that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the other two sides. In astronomy, he discovered that day and night are caused by the revolution of the earth about its own axis.

Many legends grew up round Pythagoras, amongst others that he was of extraordinary beauty and had golden thighs. Historically, his ascetic philosophy, based on the belief that the body was the tomb of the soul and that denial of the flesh was the way to its final release, is considered to foreshadow > Platonism.

Quadrille

1 A game of cards which replaced > ombre in fashion about 1726, to be succeeded about 20 years later by whist.

2 A dance of French origin; it was first used in ballet, and then became popular in the ballroom. Introduced into England in the late 18th century.

Quadrivium and Trivium

In the medieval educational syllabus the 'seven liberal arts' were divided into the Trivium – grammar, rhetoric, logic – followed by the Quadrivium – arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, music.

Quakers

Originally a derisive name for the members of a religious society properly called the Society of Friends; the Friends are still known as Quakers, but the term has lost its contemptuous significance. The Society was founded by > George Fox, who began his preaching career in 1647. He preached that the truth came from an inner spiritual light, and declared that no special class of men (ie churches) should be set apart for religious purposes. This individualism at first attracted a number of mentally disturbed followers whose ecstasies are perhaps responsible for the nickname 'Quaker', though Fox himself declared that it was first used in 1650 because he taught his followers to 'Tremble at the Word of the Lord'. They held a view, unusual among > Puritans, that it was possible to gain complete victory over sin in this life. Such a doctrine, in addition to their refusal to accept those religious institutions that the other Puritans accepted, made them intensely unpopular for the first ten years of their existence. Later they became influential far beyond their numbers, which have remained comparatively few. Owing to the freedom of mind which is the essence of the movement, it is difficult to define their doctrine, which seems to vary greatly among individuals. On the other hand they are well known for a range of characteristic virtues: humanitarianism (they were amongst the first to protest against slavery - 1688); nonresistance to violence; respect for individuals regardless of race, sex, or religion; sobriety of conduct and tranquillity of mind. One of the most important of their early members was William Penn (1644-1718), the founder of the American colony of Pennsylvania. Like other Puritans, they were prominent in commerce, but took care to engage in activities that were not harmful; in consequence, Quaker names are particularly well known in connection with the manufacture of chocolate. However, in the 18th century their outstanding importance was in banking: their sober-mindedness and strictness of morality counteracted the speculative manias of the time, and did much to establish secure financial foundations for the rapid expansion of British trade.

Quarles, Francis (1592-1644) Poet, emblematist, pamphleteer, Francis Quarles was a prolific author, producing not only a number of verse collections, but also a play, biblical paraphrases, a romance and two remarkable > emblem-books: Emblems (1635) and Hieroglyphics of the Life of Man (1638). His earlier verse publications, such as A Feast for Worms (1620), Hadasa: or, The History of Queen Esther (1621) and Sion's Elegies (1624), were, in the main, adaptations of biblical themes. In the 1630s his attention was devoted to the production of his emblem-books and to occasional pieces. With the outbreak of the ▷ Civil War, Quarles published a series of anti-Puritan ➤ pamphlets. But it is for his emblematic work that Quarles is chiefly remembered; indeed, Emblems is said to have been the most popular book published in the 17th century.

The ➤ Renaissance debate about the virtues and vices of women ('the quarrel about women') was a continuation of a medieval argument which in literary terms may be dated from Jean de Meun's attack on women in his section of Roman de la Rose (c 1277) and Christine de Pisan's response, The Book of the City of Ladies (1405), in which she defends women. The 'woman question' became a focus of attention again in the late 16th and early 17th centuries, commencing with the publication of Joseph Swetnam's The Arraignment of Lewd, idle, froward, and unconstant women (1615). > Rachel Speght, who was primarily a devotional writer, challenged his arguments in a serious and theoretical manner, basing her own arguments upon God's, rather than man's, law. Two other women wrote more angry ripostes to Swetnam's vituperative outpourings: ➤ Constantia Munda and ➤ Ester Sowernam, who adopted pseudonyms to protect their reputation, and, one suspects, to ensure their physical safety in a society hardly renowned for its championing of women's rights. An earlier defence of women occurs in > Jane Anger's Jane Anger, Her Protection for Women

(1588-9).

A play by ➤ Catherine Gore, which won a £500 prize for an 'English comedy'. The plot concerns social climbing, class division, and the political machinations of county folk. Although it was admired by the judges of the competition, it was a box-office failure, unpopular with both audiences and critics. It was Gore's last play.

Quin, James (1693-1766)

Actor, manager, singer. Born in London, Quin was the product of a bigamous union between James and Elizabeth Quin, and the grandson of a former Lord Mayor of Dublin. After 1713 he began acting at the ➤ Smock Alley Theatre in Dublin, and by early 1715 he had reached the Drury Lane Theatre in London, where he later helped to manage the company. In 1746 and 1747 Quin acted with ⊳ Garrick at Covent Garden (▷ Covent Garden Theatres), and the two became friends despite their ostensible rivalry. But Garrick's light, naturalistic style made Quin's acting appear absurdly formal, pompous, and monotonous to many observers, and the older man gradually retired from the stage, to > Bath.

Quin was noted for his 'strong passions', including a violent temper, but also good humour and dignity. He was a friend of ▶ Pope and ▶ Swift, and was admired by ➤ Horace Walpole and the Prince of Wales (later ➤ George III). He held his own in parts ranging from > Othello, > Macbeth, > Richard III, ➤ Coriolanus, Comus, Bajazet in ➤ Rowe's Tamerlane, and Pierre in ➤ Thomas Otway's ➤ Venice Preserv'd, to his most celebrated role as Falstaff. Garrick's innovations hurt his reputation more substantially, perhaps, than that of any leading actor of the period, quite suddenly making him seem outmoded. But even at the end of his career, Garrick and other colleagues continued to respect him, and he was still able to draw large crowds. Bib: Taylor, A. M., Life of Mr James Quin, comedian.

Rabelais, François (?1495-1553)

French comic writer. He was successively a Franciscan friar, then Benedictine monk, before abandoning the religious life and turning to the study of medicine (he became a Bachelor of Medicine at Montpellier in 1535). He was protected by the powerful Du Bellay family in his censorship disputes with the Sorbonne. His famous works are all in prose, but difficult to classify because of their kaleidoscopic forms of narrative and plot. ▷ Pantagruel (1533) and ➤ Gargantua (1535) were later reversed in sequence, Gargantua being the father of Pantagruel. Ten years and more later come Tiers Livre (Third Book, 1545) and Quart Livre (Fourth Book, first version 1548, expanded version 1552). The authenticity of the Cinquiesme Livre (1564) remains disputed, though the opening section, L'Isle Sonnante ('Ringing Island'), was published separately in Rabelais' lifetime and is accepted by some as his work.

There is in Rabelais an exuberant command of linguistic mechanisms which underpin the entire range of comedy he deploys, from simple pun to obscenity, and slapstick and absurdity to invective and satire. Among English writers consciously indebted to Rabelais, Sir John Harington's Metamorphosis of Ajax and Anatomy follow his style, using coprological humour and mock encomia; the Elizabethan journalist > Thomas Nashe has much of Rabelais' vitality; Robert Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy has a comparable amplitude of language; and Samuel Butler's bitter attack on the Puritans (> Puritanism), the mock-epic Hudibras, is more than Rabelaisian in its bitter humour. Rabelais was notably translated by the Scotsman, Sir Thomas Urquhart (c 1611-60) (Books I-II, 1653; Book III, 1693), with continuations by Peter Motteux (1663-1718) (Books IV-V, 1603-04).

Racine, Jean (1693-99)

French dramatist. His principal sources of inspiration were either > classical (the larger group of his works, including Andromague (1667), Britannicus (1669), Bérénice (1670), Mithridate (1673), Iphigénie (1674) and Phèdre (1677)) or biblical (Athalie, (1690)). Racine examines the nexus of passion and power, and the distorting effect these invariably have upon the heroic values which his characters inherit or purport to represent. He delineates the moral and political blindness which can all too easily sway human judgement and conduct and he highlights with particular force the destructiveness of passion from which > tragedy will proceed. His dramas are tightly constructed according to classical criteria of the > unities and display a virtuoso command of the 12-syllable Alexandrine line combined with a strong sense of rhyme and rhythm and a lucid, economical style. Racine was admired in England by ▶ John Dryden

Radcliffe, Ann (1764-1823)

Novelist. She was one of the most famous of the writers of ▷ Gothic novels, which sought to gain their effect through mystery and the supernatural in a setting of grand scenic description. She was immensely popular in her own day for her four novels: The Sicilian Romance (1790) The Romance of the Forest (1791) ▷ The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794) and The Italian (1797). Udolpho is the best remembered, owing to ▷ satirization through an account of its effect on a young girl in ▷ Jane Austen's ▷ Northanger Abbey.

Rainbow, The (1915)

A novel by D. H. Lawrence. It is set in Lawrence's own background, the English Midlands; the subject is three generations of the Brangwen family extending from the middle of the last century to the early years of the present one.

The Brangwens are a family of farmers and have for generations lived on their own land which, as the novel begins, is near an encroaching industrial area. Tom Brangwen, the first of the main characters, is sent to a grammar school by his ambitious mother; the experience both frustrates him and arouses him. His awakened need for what is strange and mysterious attracts him to Lydia Lensky, an aristocratic but impoverished Polish exile, a widow, and the mother of a small daughter. They marry and although their marriage meets difficulties it becomes a happy one. Lydia and Tom remain ignorant of much in each other's nature, but Lydia finds confidence in Tom's established way of life, while he finds enlargement precisely in what, for him, is mysterious in his wife. Tom's stepdaughter, Anna, is attracted to his nephew, Will Brangwen, who has had an urban upbringing and has a strong artistic imagination and profound religious instincts. This marriage is more troubled but they are united in a passionate night-time sensuality. Their daughter, Ursula, belongs to the first generation of modern women: she sets out to be a teacher, and after an intense struggle in an inhuman English board school, she succeeds in affirming her independence. But her love affair with Skrebensky, a thoroughly Anglicized descendant of another Polish exile, ends in frustration. She inherits from her mother a capacity for passion which expresses her full nature, whereas his nature is divided between a dead conformity to society and a sensuality which is incapable of real passion. The relationship ends with Ursula pregnant, although in the novel's climactic scene, Ursula miscarries, but then finds reconciliation through the image of the rainbow.

The story of Ursula and her sister Gudrun is continued in > Women in Love, originally conceived as part of the same novel. The novel was for a time suppressed on grounds of immorality, seized and burnt in 1915 primarily for its representation of Ursula's lesbian affair with her schoolteacher. It is now regarded as one of Lawrence's greatest achievements.

Raine, Craig (b 1944)

Poet. His first two collections, The Onion, Memory (1978) and A Martian Sends a Postcard Home (1979), established a vogue for > 'Martian' poetry in this country. Rich (1984) shows him extending his work into areas such as prose > autobiography. He has also written an opera libretto and work for the theatre.

Raine, Kathleen (b 1908)

Poet and critic. Raine has been prolifically publishing poetry since the 1930s; in 1943 Stone and Flower: Poems 1935-43 appeared. In 1956 Collected Poems appeared, followed by The Hollow Hill (1964). The 1981 Collected Poems, 1935-80 gathered together much of her important work. Raine is also well known as a scholar of William Blake, and has also written on ➤ Yeats and Coleridge. Recent collections include: The Lost Country (1971); On A Deserted Shore (1973); The Oracle in the Heart (1980), and World Within a World (1982), as well as three volumes of her > autobiography. In 1991 she gave what she announced as her last public lecture, at Liverpool University.

Ralegh (Raleigh), Sir Walter (1552-1618) Poet, historian, courtier, explorer, colonist. The career of Sir Walter Ralegh has been taken as almost symbolic of the 'Renaissance ideal' of the complete individual - one who, with an easy grace, excels in all forms of endeavour. In addition to the pursuits listed above, for example, one might add: seaman, soldier, chemist, philosopher, theologian, even pioneer in naval medicine and dietetics, diplomat and (somewhat unsuccessful) politician. Ralegh's military experience included soldiering in France (1569) and Ireland (1580). While in Ireland Ralegh met ▷ Spenser, who approved of his slaughter of Spanish troops at Smerwick. As an explorer and colonist (➤ Colonialism) Ralegh was the driving force behind the project to found a colony on the eastern seaboard of the North American continent in 1585. The project was abandoned in 1586 and, after several unsuccessful expeditions, the patent for what had become the Virginia settlement lapsed to the Crown in 1603. In 1595, following a period of imprisonment in the Tower due to Elizabeth I's displeasure at his relationship with a member of her court, Ralegh led an expedition to South America - an enterprise which was to be repeated in a further unsuccessful expedition to the Orinoco in 1616. Ralegh's South American exploits were directed chiefly towards gaining treasure at the expense of the Spaniards, and it was as a member of the expeditions to Cadiz (1596) and the Azores (1597) that his military reputation in fighting the Spanish was established. With the accession of ▷ James I in 1603, however, Ralegh's brand of vigorous expansionism became unfavourable. With the exception of the Orinoco expedition, the period between 1603 and his execution in 1618 was spent in confinement in the Tower, to which he had been committed following his being found guilty of conspiring against the king in November 1603. His execution on the charge for which he had been sentenced in 1603, was in fact due to his pursuit of an anti-Spanish policy when such attitudes were no longer favourably perceived at court.

Ralegh's life was, in some measure, his greatest achievement, for it became one of the foundation stones of the myth of Elizabethan accomplishment. The fact that almost every project in which he was involved (exceptions being the Cadiz and Azores expeditions) failed was conveniently ignored. As a myth-maker, however, Ralegh was a potent force: not only his own life, but his earlier written works served to underline the Elizabethan self-image. In particular A Report of the Fight about the Azores (1591) and The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana (1596) can both be read as attempts at promoting an ideal of national endeavour. Ralegh's poetry also contributed to the romantic legend, tinged as it is with a melancholic awareness of the transitory nature of existence. Perhaps his most significant poetic achievement, though, is the fragmentary 'Ocean's Love to Cynthia' - a brooding, obscure and allusive text of loss and longing. A rather different proposition is his History of the World (1614), which, in its allinclusiveness, might stand as an apt commentary on its author. The History, though it draws veiled comparisons between the present and the past, concludes at the date 130 BC. It is yet another unfinished enterprise.

Ralph Roister Doister (1552)

A comedy by Nicholas Udall, printed in 1566, and written in about 1552. It is sometimes called 'the first English comedy', presumably because the earlier 'comic interludes' notably by > John Heywood (eg The Play of the Weather and The Four P's) were too slight to count, whereas Udall's play, which may have been written for the boys of Westminster School, is an adaptation of the Miles Gloriosus (The Boastful Soldier) by > Plautus. The basic situation is the same in both plays: vain but foolish and boastful soldier makes love to a respectable woman (Christian Custance in Udall's play), who is betrothed to a merchant, Gawin Goodluck, and Ralph is encouraged in his misguided enterprise by a mischievous associate, Matthew Merygreek. But the play has a kind of farcical humour which has more in common with the popular ▷ interludes and even the May Games of English country life, and it reads as a thoroughly native product. The rhymed verse is rather primitive, but the dialogue has realistic freshness. The comedy is an example of humanistic learning married to popular entertainment.

Rambler, The

A twice-weekly periodical produced by ▷ Samuel Johnson from March 1750 to March 1752. All except five were written by Johnson himself. The papers were in the tradition of ▷ The Tatler and ▷ The Spectator essays by ▷ Addison and ▷ Steele 40 years before. The essays cover a wide variety of subjects, including eastern tales, criticism and ▷ allegories. Johnson's moral seriousness in the work is indicated by the prayer that he wrote on its commencement. The Rambler was pirated and copied, evidence of its great popularity, and in Johnson's lifetime ran to ten reprintings.

Ramsay, Allan (1686-1758)

Edinburgh wig-maker and father of the portrait painter of the same name. He was a prolific poet in both English and Scots, using a variety of > metres, from intricate stanzas to pentameter and tetrameter > couplets. His marriage of Scottish and English literary traditions, together with his earthy realism of language and dramatic flair, laid down the foundations on which > Robert Fergusson and > Robert Burns were later to build.

Randolph, Thomas (1605-35)

Poet and dramatist. Randolph revealed his literary skills early on, writing poetry at the age of ten, and then becoming renowned for his Latin and English verses while a student at Cambridge. The plays do not live up to his early promise, however, and he is most successful at short satiric pieces. For example, although The Jealous Lovers (1632) was performed before > Charles I and > Henrietta Maria, it is an uninspired and glib romance. He is more skilful with country scenes: the > pastoral poems are beautifully lyrical and his pastoral play, Amyntas (1630), has some good rustic comedy pieces. Randolph's most interesting work, The Muse's Looking Glass, was written while he was still at university, although only published in 1638; it contains an actor who defeats a Puritan's anti-theatre arguments and it is gratifyingly > Jonsonian in tone.

Rape of the Lock, The (1712/1714) A ⊳ mock-heroic poem in ⊳ pentameter > couplets by > Alexander Pope. Its immediate stimulation was a quarrel between two families with whom Pope was acquainted, caused by Lord Petre cutting off a lock of Miss Arabella Fermor's hair. Pope hoped to place this act of sexual harrassment in a trivial light by his comic and burlesque treatment, which owes something to the example of ⊳ Nicolas Boileau's Le Lutrin (The Lectern, 1674), > a mock epic concerning an ecclesiastical quarrel over the placing of a lectern. However Pope only succeeded in giving further offence. The first published version (1712) comprised two cantos, but Pope continued to work on it after the immediate occasion had passed, and in 1714 it was issued in a much enlarged five-canto version, incorporating the epic machinery of the sylphs.

The work has been interpreted as a severe moral ⊳ satire. By describing this transient quarrel in the heroic language of > Homer's ➤ Iliad, Pope could be said to be ➤ ironically mocking the selfish vanity of fashionable society. However, the sensuous beauty of the verse and the elaborateness of the poem's imagery suggest that the young Pope was no Puritan moralist. The most vivid passages in the poem celebrate the new ease and amenity of the English middle class in its first confident phase of capitalist > imperialism. The heroine's exotic cosmetics and beauty aids, brought from the farthest corners of the earth by British ships, are described with delight. The sylphs, fanciful projections of the secular drawing room, are substituted for the awesome gods of the ancient Greeks (> Greek literature), and the primitive machismo of Hector and Achilles becomes the feminine 'armour' of stays and petticoats, or the elegant 'triumph' of a game of cards. Counterpointing this delight in social life is an elegiac lament over its transience, and the poem is at its most moving when it laments the imminent decay of Belinda's 'frail beauty', 'When those fair Suns shall sett, as sett they must,/ And all those Tresses shall be laid in Dust'.

Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, The History of (1759)

A prose work by \triangleright Samuel Johnson. Tradition has it that Johnson composed the work rapidly to pay for the cost of his mother's funeral. Its theme has often been compared by critics to that of Johnson's poem \triangleright The Vanity of Human Wishes.

The theme of Rasselas is 'the choice of life', a phrase which occurs repeatedly. The prince, son of the emperor of Abyssinia, is tired of the pleasant life in the 'happy valley' and, in the company of his sister Nekayah, her attendant Pekuah, and the philosopher Imlac, escapes to Egypt.

Imlae's advice demonstrates to the youth the transient nature of human happiness, a state which is in any case unobtainable. Imlac also voices Johnson's views on 'the business of a poet', which is to 'examine not the individual, but the species'. The poet should aim to be 'the interpreter of nature, and the legislator of mankind', not to 'number the streaks of the tulip'. Rasselas often parallels ▷ Voltaire's Candide, published in the same year, and when Johnson later read this work he commented on the similarities.

Rationalism

In philosophy, the belief that reason, rather than sensation, is the only certain guide to knowledge.

2 In religion, the practice of seeking explanations which satisfy reason for what had been accepted as supernatural.

Rattigan, Sir Terence (1911-77)

British dramatist whose first stage success was with the light comedy French Without Tears (1936). This was followed by such plays as Flare Path (1942), While the Sun Shines (1943), and Love in Idleness (1944), the last of these a modern treatment of Hamlet and Claudius. The Winslow Boy, a play about a father's struggle to defend his son on a charge of theft, won the Ellen Terry Award for the best play of the year in 1946. The Browning Version (which has recently been filmed for a second time, directed by Mike Figgis [1994]) received the same award in 1948. The Deep Blue Sea (1952), a piece about passion and suicide, might have been more interesting had Rattigan been able to deal openly, in the play, with his own tragic homosexual love which inspired him to write it. But English repression is a subject which he knew and wrote about well. Rattigan was well aware that his commercial success depended on the appeal of his plays to 'Aunt Edna', as he called the middle-brow members of his audience. His sound judgement of the market ensured continued success with Separate Tables (1055), Variations on a Theme (1058), Ross, a dramatization of the life of T. E. Lawrence (1960), A Bequest to the Nation (1970) and Cause Célèbre (1977).

Ravenscroft, Edward (?1650–97) Dramatist, popular mainly for his farces. A lawyer by training, he was a member of the Middle Temple in 1671, where he composed his first play, Mammamouchi, or the Citizen Turn'd Gentleman, based on ➤ Molière's play Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme; Ravenscroft used Molière as a source several more times. The Careless Lovers followed in 1673, and The Wrangling Lovers in 1676, again using French as well as Spanish sources. A play inspired by the ▷ Commedia dell'Arte, Scaramouch a Philosopher, Harlequin a Schoolboy, a Bravo, Merchant and Musician, and a play based on George Ruggle's 1615 Latin comedy, Ignoramus, or the English Lawyer, were produced in 1677, and Titus Andronicus, or the Rape of Lavinia, an alteration of the play by > Shakespeare, in 1678. His most celebrated play, > The London Cuckolds, another farce in the French manner, was staged in 1681. It became a tradition to perform this at both > Drury Lane and ➤ Covent Garden on the Lord Mayor's Day (9 November) every year; the play was revived in 1782 and again by the Royal Court Theatre in 1979. Ravenscroft's great rival, Dryden, referred to his works with contempt.

Raworth, Tom (b 1934)

Poet. His first books The Relation Ship (1967) and The Big Green Day (1968), show the emerging influence of post-war avant-garde American poetry on British writing. Internationalism has remained an important part of Raworth's life and work, and he has lived in, among other places, France, America and Mexico. He currently lives and works in Cambridge. His more recent books include: Writing (1982) and Eternal Sections (1993). Raworth's poetry is characterized by microscopic verbal precision, though the breaking apart of syntax and words themselves paradoxically works to multiply meaning.

Reade, Charles (1814-84)

The seventh of eleven children, Reade was born in Oxfordshire and educated largely at home; he excelled in sports and was self-motivated in study. In 1831 he went to Oxford and in 1843 was called to the Bar, but preferred music and the theatre. In 1845 he was made Dean of Arts at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he upset some members by wearing a green coat with brass buttons. In 1846 he tried medicine in Edinburgh, and in 1847 obtained a DCL and began to deal in violins. In 1851 he was made vice-president of his college, and began a long and prolific career as writer and dramatist. He met the actress Mrs Seymour in 1854 and they lived together until her death in 1879, after which he wrote little, turning to religion. He was a philanthropic man, helping the poor, distressed gentlefolk, lunatics, and waifs and strays; both impulsive and impatient, he was generous, boisterous and kept dogs, horses and other animals. He remained a theatre manager to 1882.

His writing career began with a stage version of Tobias Smollett's Peregrine Pickle (1751) in 1851. He co-wrote and produced Masks and Faces in 1852, turning it into the novel Peg Woffington the following year, when the 'reforming' novel about prisons, Christie Johnstone, also appeared. It is Never Too Late to Mend, in similar vein, followed in 1856, as well as the play Gold!; the novel was later dramatized and the play rewritten as the novel Foul Play (1869). He wrote short stories, pieces of journalism and plays at the same time. In 1858 he published The Autobiography of a Thief and Jack of all Trades, and in 1859 Love Me Little, Love Me Long. The Cloister and the Hearth was published in 1861. Hard Cash (1863) tackled the disgrace of lunatic asylums and in 1866 Griffith Gaunt triggered scandal and litigation by its frank attitude to sexual problems.

From this time on, Reade was a controversial and litigious figure. Put Yourself in His Place (1870) attacked enforced trade union membership; The Simpleton (1873) gave rise to a libel action and a quarrel with > Anthony Trollope. Other novels and plays include The Wandering Heir (1873) and A Woman Hater (1877). Reade was both famous and successful, being regarded as the natural successor to > Charles Dickens, and by > Henry James and ➤ Swinburne as superior to ➤ George Eliot. He commented on himself, 'I am a painstaking man, and I owe my success to it.' His writing is now considered overburdened with detail, > melodramatic and superficial in characterization. His most successful work was The Cloister and the Hearth. Reader response criticism

This term refers to a number of different schools of criticism which stress the central role of the reader in making literary meanings. The most influential of these schools are ▶ Reception theory, which originates in Germany, and the approach associated with the American critic Stanley Fish. Fish argues that literary texts do not conceal their meanings like treasure from readers, but offer what are in effect endless interpretative possibilities which are realised in the interaction between text and reader. What validates an interpretation therefore is not its ultimate 'rightness' or 'wrongness' but the verdict of the > interpretive community in which it is produced. Bib: Tompkins, Jane P. (ed.), Reader Response

Readerly and writerly texts

Criticism.

A distinction made by ➤ Roland Barthes to indicate the difference between forms of writing which are plural in their meanings and effects, which he calls 'writerly' texts (scriptible in French), and those geared towards the quick consumption of easy, narrow meanings which he calls readerly (lisible). Readerly writing indulges the simple, the conventional, the stereotypical and the expected and does not present a challenge. Writerly texts, on the other hand, make demands of their readers and force them to, in a sense, write their own text because this kind of writing gives little in terms of fixed or secure meaning. For this reason, Barthes considers them politically and psychologically liberating. Barthes identified this kind of writing with that of the ▷ avantgarde, and his followers have tended to reject works considered to be merely representational or ⊳ realistic.

Bib: Barthes, R., S/Z.

Realism

A term used in various senses, both in philosophy and in literary criticism. Three principal meanings, two of them philosophical and one literary, are particularly worth distinction.

1. In medieval philosphy, the realists were opposed to the ▷ nominalists. Realism here means that classes of things ('universals') have reality whereas individuals have not, or at least have less: eg individual birds take their reality from the classification 'bird'. The nominalists considered that only the individual bird has reality, and that the classification 'bird' in only a formulation in the mind.

2. Since the Middle Ages, realism has become opposed to ▷ idealism. Here realism means that reality exists apart from ideas about it in the mind, and idealism represents the view that we can know nothing that is not in our minds.

3. Realism was first used as a literary term in France, where it was applied to literary and visual forms which aim for the accurate reproduction of the world as it is. Literary realism emerged in the late 18th and 19th centuries concomitantly with the rise of the novel and coterminous with industrial capitalism. In general, it means the use of the imagination to represent things as common sense supposes them to be. It does not only apply to 19thcentury literature; Daniel Defoe (1660-1731) is commonly called a realist because of his factual description and narration. 10th-century realism in literature arose, however, from a reaction against 19th-century > Romanticism, and is related to > naturalism; for a discussion of late 20th-century critiques of realism as a vehicle of ideology, see Catherine Belsey, Critical Practice. > George Eliot's > Middlemarch (1871-2), with its carefully observed representation of the forces which structure society, is a notable example of English 19th-century realism. Many realist novelists chose to depict the lives and sufferings of the lower classes in texts that combine fiction with documentary. > Elizabeth Gaskell's > Mary Barton (1848) is a good example of this. Realism was often associated with the representation of immoral or transgressive behaviour, notably in the fiction of French 19th-century realist novelists such as > Balzac and > Flaubert, who defended themselves from charges of immorality by claiming fidelity to realism.

19th-century novels are often described, from a 20th-century perspective, as classic realist texts, a term devised by the film critic Colin McCabe in 1974 to describe Middlemarch. Classic realism, according to McCabe, who reverses the terms of Lukacs' socialist realist attack on modernism, works by a sleight of hand, to hide the constructedness of the world: the world of the novel is presented to the reader as if it were a direct mirroring or reflection of the real world, rather than an ideologically saturated interpretation of the real. The term most often used to describe the strategy of the realist text is transparency. The illusion of transparency created by realism is contrasted with modernist writing which supposedly foregrounds its textuality.

Naturalism is a late 19th-century form of realism, associated with the French novelist > Emile Zola. It emerged out of an attempt to marry literary and scientific discourses, and demanded a scientific and empirical objectivity from writers, whose novels were supposed to be laboratory experiments to show how character is determined by environment. In practice, naturalism remained focused on the world as external material appearance, and imposed a rigid set of normalizing causal narratives. > Thomas Hardy's > Tess of the d'Urbervilles (1891) and > Jude the Obscure (1895), > George Gissing's ➤ New Grub Street (1891) and > George Moore's > Esther Waters (1894) are all influenced by naturalism. It is important to distinguish between different forms of realism - for example, classic realism, naturalism, socialist realism - and to recognize that they pre-suppose different kinds of relationship between the literary text and the world.

Realism is also used in modern literature in opposition to what is regard as sentimentalism—the disposition to represent feelings (eg the various forms of love) as nicer than we know them to be; an illogical extension of this use of the term is sometimes to apply it to literature that represents experience as nastier than we know it to be. Finally, realism in literature is sometimes related to nominalism, ie the realist writer is he who represents individuals rather than types; in this sense, modern literary realism is the opposite of the realism of medieval philosophy.

Dominant 20th-century critiques of realism regard it as a naturalization of ideological positions, presenting them as if they were commonsense perceptions or views. Latterly it has been argued that the polarization of realism and modernism, and the rejection of realism, has been too absolute. More work is being done on the many varieties of realism, and work on reading and fantasy suggests that earlier views of how the classie realist text operated assumed too simplistic a model of reading practices and modes of reception.

Reception theory

This movement is associated pre-eminently with the German contemporary literary theorists Wolfgang Iser and Hans-Robert Jauss, and is often linked with reader-response criticism. Reception theory emphasizes the reader's consumption of the literary text over and above the question of the sum total of rhetorical devices which contribute to its structure as a piece of literature. The work of reception (Rezeptionästhetik) causes the reader constantly to rethink the canonical value of texts, since it involves noting the history of a text's reception as well as the current value which it may possess for the critic. Insofar as reception theory concerns itself with larger historical questions, it emphasizes histories of response which help to account for the reception of particular texts in the present. The approach to 'history' outlined here is pragmatic, and the emphasis is laid firmly on the matter of the interaction between text and reader and on the way cultural context is required to make sense of literature.

Recluse, The

▷ Excursion, The

Recruiting Officer, The (1706)

Comedy by George Farquhar. Captain Plume recruits men to the army by courting the women with whom they are in love, and his sergeant, Kite, poses as an astrologer to lure men into service. Sylvia, the daughter of Justice Ballance, loves Plume but has promised not to marry him without her father's consent. She disguises herself as a man and contrives to get herself arrested for scandalous conduct. She appears before her father, who hands her over to Plume as a recruit, and eventually the two are married. In a secondary plot, Captain Brazen seeks to marry the wealthy Melinda but is deceived into almost marrying her maid, while Melinda herself marries Mr Worthy.

The play draws on Farquhar's own experiences as a recruiting officer at Lichfield and Shrewsbury in 1705–6, and there is some amusing > satire on the law in the courtroom scenes. The play captures much of the spirit of the Restoration, but its > realism, rural setting (unlike the urban settings of most Restoration comedies), and broader humour, give it the hallmark of its later period.

Recusancy

A term used under ➤ Elizabeth I for refusal, usually by Roman Catholics, to attend religious worship in the ➤ Church of England. The recusancy law continued to exist until the Toleration Act (1689), which permitted freedom of worship.

Red Cross Knight, The

The central figure of Book I of ➤ Edmund Spenser's ➤ The Faerie Queene. He represents Holiness, the ➤ Church of England and St George, whose red cross on a white ground is the national emblem of England. His adventures are connected with two women: Una, the true religion from which he is separated, and ➤ Duessa, the Roman Catholic Church which beguiles him. He is eventually united to Una with the assistance of Prince Arthur (▷ Arthur, King), who rescues him from the House of Pride.

Red Pottage (1899)

A novel by > Mary Cholmondeley. It centres on the lives of two women, Hester Gresley and Rachel West. Hester is a writer who lives with her bigoted clergyman brother and his narrow-minded wife. Her efforts at literary achievement are defeated when her brother burns the only copy of her novel, claiming it is immoral. The story of Hester's friend, Rachel, is a more conventional ▶ romance. The novel caused a minor sensation, being simultaneously denounced by clergymen and celebrated as a brilliant satire by journalists. Recent feminist readings have emphasized the strength of the relationship between Hester and Rachel, and praised the novel's defence of women's friendship. Red Riding Hood, Little

A popular fairy tale, originally derived from the French version by ▷ Perrault, translated into English in 1729. The little girl is so called because of the red hood that she wears. A wolf meets her in the forest while she is on her way to her grandmother. Having discovered the purpose of her journey, he goes on ahead and eats the grandmother and takes her place in bed; when Red Riding Hood arrives he eats her as well. In modern versions, she and her grandmother are subsequently cut out of the wolf's stomach, alive and well, by her father, a woodcutter.

Redgrove, Peter (b 1932)

Poet and novelist. Redgrove is a profilic writer whose work straddles many forms - he has worked as a scientific journalist, and has written many novels, poems, plays (he won the Italia prize in 1981) and non-fiction (including The Wise Wound with poet Penelope Shuttle, with whom he lives in Cornwall). His poetic work was originally associated with that of the Group, the 'school' of post-Movement poets which included his contemporaries at Cambridge in the late 1950s, Ted Hughes and ⊳ Sylvia Plath. Redgrove is now also a lay psychoanalyst. His poetry publications include: The Collector (1960); The Force (1966); Sons of my Skin (1975); The Weddings at Nether Powers (1979); The Applebroadcast (1981); The Man Named East (1985); Poems 1954-1987 (1989); Dressed As For a Tarot Pack (1990); and The Laborators (1993). His fiction includes: In the Country of the Skin (1973); The Beekeepers (1980); The Cyclopean Mistress: Selected Short Fiction (1993); and, with Shuttle, The Terrors of Dr Treviley (1974). Both fiction and poetry are notable for powerful, dense images and a preoccupation with both physicality and spirituality. Reeve, Clara (1729-1807)

Novelist, poet and critic who wrote the well-known ▷ Gothic novel ▷ The Old English Baron (1778). The daughter of a rector from near Ipswich, one of eight children, who started writing in the 1750s. She translated Barclay's romance, Argenis, as The Phoenix (1772), and in The Progress of Romance (1785) her characters comment on romance in its different historical and geographical incarnations – a process which involves a discussion of women writers, including Hortensius' opinion that the dead ▷ Aphra Behn is too risqué – 'I shall not disturb her, or her works' – but a woman speaks up for ▷ Oroanoko.

Other publications included Original Poems on Several Occassions (1769), The Two Mentors (1780), The School For Widows (1791) and Plans of Education (1792).

Reeve's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales, it is told by the Reeve to 'quite' the Miller for the personal insult he perceives in the ▷ Miller's Tale about a cuckolded carpenter (the Reeve being a carpenter by trade). So the Reeve replies with a tale about a cuckolded Miller, set just outside Cambridge (whereas the Miller's Tale had been set in Oxford). This ▷ fabliau charts a battle of wits between a thieving miller and two northern clerks, students at Cambridge University. Neither side displays much intellectual vigour but the clerks manage to sleep with the Miller's wife and daughter in order to avenge the theft of their corn. The Miller emerges as the loser in the contest, although the clerks only narrowly escape from a physical battle with the Miller through the chance, and mistaken, intervention of the Miller's wife. Several analogues to this tale are extant in French and Italian (one in the ➤ Decameron) but Chaucer's version is distinctive for its detailed development of the setting of the story and for the number of verbal puns built into the text. Chaucer is one of the earliest writers to present a conscious imitation of another English dialect: the clerks in this tale are characterized by their use of northern English forms.

Referent

In the theory of language associated with Ferdinand de Saussure, the sign is divided into the signifier (the graphic mark or sound) and the signified (the mental concept attached to that sign or mark). The reference is the extra-linguistic reality to which the sign refers. The distinction between sign and referent is important because the sign is not created primarily by a naming process with reference to the real world, but by the internal dynamics of the structure of the language. As a result it is said to be 'arbitrary', or only attached to the referent by convention.

Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790) A political treatise by > Edmund Burke. Burke attacks the principles on which the > French Revolution was being conducted, denies that the English ➤ Glorious Revolution of 1688 was based on the same principles, and insists that a society is an organic growth like a tree, requiring the same kind of careful surgery in accordance with its principles of growth. The book was provoked by a > sermon in praise of the French Revolution, preached by a Nonconformist minister, Dr Price; Burke is in effect not merely attacking the French revolutionaries, but the reverence for abstract, rational, scientific > enlightenment which had increasingly transformed the 17th-century Puritans into the 18th-century rationalistic Dissenters or Nonconformists, and had found disciples among many others of the educated classes. The Reflections is a great work of conservative political philosophy, as well as a masterpiece of polemical prose. It represents the French Revolution as a turning-point in history: 'The age of chivalry is gone. That of sophisters, economists and calculators has succeeded; and the glory of Europe is extinguished for ever.'

Reform comedy

and promising to reform. The type became prominent toward the end of the 17th century, especially after > Colley Cibber's > Love's Last Shift (1696), in which the central figure of Loveless repents, after leading a debauched life and abandoning his wife, leaving his debts unpaid. Attacks on the supposed immorality and profanity of the stage by > Jeremy Collier and others encouraged the writing of more such plays. Other early exponents, besides Cibber, include > Steele, > Centlivre, Wilkinson, and > Pix. > Farguhar also incorporates some elements of the type in a few of his plays. Reform comedy became more prevalent during the 18th century, eventually overlapping with sentimental comedy, in which ▷ didactic considerations are paramount.

Reformation

An important religious movement in the 16th century; its aim was to protest in a variety of ways against the conduct of the Catholic church, which had hitherto remained undivided. The outcome was division: the Roman Catholics remained dominant in the countries bordering on the western Mediterranean and in south Germany; the new ➤ Protestant churches became supreme in northern Europe. The causes of the movement were political (the rise of the new nation-state); moral (resentment at the low example set by many of the clergy); and doctrinal (disagreement, stimulated by the new critical spirit of the ➤ Renaissance, over points of doctrine hitherto imposed by the authority of the Church).

The reformation in England proceeded in three phases.

1 > Henry VIII carried out the first in merely political terms. His desire to divorce Katharine of Aragon was merely a pretext; he himself sought complete control over the Church of England, and needed money; he resented the authority of the Pope in Rome and the internationalism of the monastic orders; he welcomed the opportunity to increase his wealth by confiscating their property. He declared himself Supreme Head of the Church of England by the > Act of Supremacy, supported by Parliament and passed by it in 1533; he dissolved the monasteries in 1536-39. On the other hand, his > Six Articles of 1539 tried to keep the Church fully Catholic on all points except that of papal sovereignty. As the support by Parliament showed, he had popular opinion behind him, at least in southern England; the English Church had long been restive against the sovereignty of the Pope, particularly when, in the 14th century, he had reigned from Avignon in France, the home of the national enemy.

2 The second phase, under his son

DED Edward VI, went further and aroused more national disagreement. The clergy were permitted to marry, and the Deok of Common Prayer included 42 articles of faith (later reduced to 39) which defined the doctrine of the Church of England in Protestant terms; there was extensive destruction of religious images in churches throughout the country. Henry's daughter Deok Mary I undertook a complete reaction back to Catholicism, but her persecution of the Protestants and her subservience to her husband, Philip II of Spain, the most fanatical of the Catholic sovereigns, confirmed the country in a Protestant direction.

3 Henry's remaining daughter ➤ Elizabeth I contrived religious settlement that was a compromise between the reforms of her father and those of her brother. The intention was to be inclusive: Catholics were not to be driven out of the Church of England if she could help it, and she wanted to keep as many of her Protestant subjects within it as possible. The result, however, was disunion: Catholics could not subscribe to the Church of England after the Pope had excommunicated the Queen in 1571, and the more extreme Protestants were constantly pressing for further reforms, especially in the structure of church government (they mostly wanted the abolition of rule through bishops) and in the conduct of worship, which they wanted in full austerity. These > Puritans, as they were called by their enemies, eventually established their own religious organizations, but not until after 1660. The vagueness of the Elizabethan settlement also gave rise to disagreement within the Church of England, and this has lasted until the present day: the High Church is the section which emphasizes the more Catholic interpretation of the settlement (ie more in keeping with Henry VIII's intentions), and the Low Church is the section which insists that the Church of England is essentially Protestant. This disagreement, however, has never disrupted the organization of the Church, which, under the headship of the sovereign, is still that of the Catholic church of medieval England.

The reformation in Scotland proceeded side by side with the Elizabethan phase in England, and helped to bring about a reconciliation of the two nations which had been hostile to each other for three centuries. The Scottish reformation, however, was extreme, under the leadership of ▷ John Knox, a disciple of the French reformer ▷ Calvin. The national Church of Scotland has remained Calvinist (▷ Presbyterian) to this day. Ireland remained Catholic, and in consequence suffered severe persecution by its English rulers in the 16th and 17th centuries. The only excuse for this tyranny was the real danger that Ireland might become a base for one of England's more powerful Catholic enemies - France or Spain.

Regency

In English history, the period 1811-20 when George, Prince of Wales, later George IV (1820-30), took the title of Prince Regent during the final illness of his father, George III (1760-1820). In British cultural history, the term is often applied to cover the first 20 years of the 19th century during which a certain style of taste in art and architecture prevailed. It was inspired by the taste of the first French Empire (> Napoleon I) which itself arose from French revolutionary cultivation of ancient Greece, especially the republic of Athens. Architecture was austerely classical (the 'Greek style'), and dress was similarly modelled on long, graceful lines suitable for men and women with slender figures.

In literature, the term covers the working life of the second generation of Romantic poets (▷ Byron, ▷ Shelley and ▷ Keats), the work of the essayists ▷ Lamb and ▷ Hazlitt, and that of the novelists ▷ Jane Austen and ▷ Walter Scott. The best work of the essentially Augustan poet ▷ Crabbe also comes into the Regency period. The word is applied, however, more to architecture, dress and furniture than to literature, the principal architects being John Nash (1752–1835) and John Soane (1753–1837), architect of the Bank of England.

Regional novel

A novel (often one of a series) which portrays the life of a specific region. For a novel to be termed regional, the specific characteristics of that region generally need to be a significant focus of attention in the text. Examples are the Potteries novels of ▷ Arnold Bennett (for example, Anna of the Five Towns, 1902) and the ▷ Wessex novels of ▷ Thomas Hardy (for example, The Return of the Native, 1878).

Register of language

A term used to indicate the type of language used in an utterance, for example something might be spoken or written in a formal or an informal register. Literary critics use the term when analyzing the style or tone of a piece of writing.

Rehearsal, The (1671)

Burlesque play attributed to George ➤ Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, satirizing the heroic ➤ tragedies of the day. ➤ Bayes (a name implying that he is ➤ Poet Laureate) takes two friends, Johnson and Smith, to see a rehearsal of his latest play, which concerns the struggle for the Kingdom of Brentford. Most of the action consists of scenes from the absurd play within a play, punctuated by the two spectators' incredulous, sardonic or contemptuous questions and comments, and Bayes' ridiculous explanations to them and instructions to the players. Finally, the two observers, and then the actors themselves, steal off before the play is finished, and the piece ends with Bayes vowing to revenge himself on 'the Town' for its ill-use of him and his plays. ➤ D'Avenant and ➤ Dryden are thought to have been the main targets of the satire; the figure of Drawcansir has been viewed as a parody of Almanzor in ➤ Dryden's The Conquest of Granada. His name became symbolic of blustering, bragging characters.

Rejected Addresses (1812)

When the ▷ Drury Lane theatre was rebuilt after having been destroyed by fire, the committee in charge, which included ▷ Lord Byron, advertised for an address to be recited at the reopening. None of those submitted was judged suitable, and Byron himself composed the lines which were actually delivered. Rejected Addresses, by ▷ James and ▷ Horace Smith, purports to include the unsuccessful submissions of all the major poets of the day. It contains often brilliant ▷ parodies of ▷ William Wordsworth, ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, ▷ Robert Southey, ▷ Lord Byron, ▷ George Crabbe and ▷ Sir Walter Scott, among others.

Relapse, The; Or, Virtue in Danger (1696) Play by ➤ Sir John Vanbrugh, written as a sequel to, and gentle satire on, ▷ Colley Cibber's > Love's Last Shift (1696), in which the central character stages a repentance which Vanbrugh found unbelievable. This did not prevent Cibber himself from acting the part of Lord Foppington in The Relapse with relish and to great acclaim. Loveless is now living quietly in the country with his faithful and virtuous wife Amanda, whom he had abandoned and then rejoined in Love's Last Shift. They return to the town for the winter season, whereupon he falls in love with Amanda's gaver cousin, Berinthia. Meanwhile, Worthy, an old flame of Amanda's, begins a new pursuit of her. Berinthia becomes an accomplice in his plan to seduce Amanda, so as to clear the path for her affair with Loveless. The affair is consummated, but Amanda summons her resources to resist Worthy's advances. A separate plot involves the impoverished Young Fashion's scheme to impersonate his older brother Lord Foppington, so as to marry the wealthy and lustful country girl, Miss Hoyden. At the end Worthy is shown unfulfilled and now in love with Amanda. while she achieves another uncertain reunion with her husband. The play's humour resides more in comic action than in witty dialogue, and there is a good deal of crude > farce. Amanda's sobre virtue is somewhat at odds with the rest of the play, while the consequences

Relativism

A philosophical theory, according to which beliefs and truths are neither universal nor timeless, but dependent upon the assumptions and situation of the individual or group that maintains them. A moderate form of relativism holds that an objective world exists, but that it must always be seen and interpreted differently by different persons. A more extreme form, adopted by \triangleright Nietzsche and sometimes termed perspectivism, holds that it is only perspectives which exist and that there is no objective reality, knowable or otherwise.

Religio Laici (1682)

A poem in heroic ▷ couplets by ▷ John Dryden, defending the tenets of the ▷ Church of England against the extremes of ▷ Deism and Roman ▷ Catholicism. It is frequently compared with ▷ The Hind and the Panther which Dryden published five years later after becoming a Catholic.

Religio Medici (1635)

(The Religion of a Physician.) A work of spiritual and autobiographical reflection by Sir Thomas Browne. It was written c 1635, and seems not to have been intended for publication but for circulation among the author's friends. After its publication without Browne's permission in 1642, however, an authorized text was issued in 1643 that was subsequently translated into Dutch, German, Latin and French. As a form of ⊳ autobiography, the work presents the image of a relaxed, sceptical, philosophic and endlessly self-intrigued author. Informed by a desire to reconcile religious belief with the kind of scepticism associated with the > 'New Science' of the mid-17th century, Browne's work became something of a best-seller. Stylistically, in its engaging enjoyment of digressive, curious and highly intellectualized speculation, the work can be compared to the poetry of ▷ John Donne or, later, > Henry Vaughan. But it also forms part of the trend towards sceptical enquiry that was to be fostered by ➤ Thomas Hobbes.

Reliques

➤ Thomas Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765) contains a mixture of genuine and ancient ballads, edited to conform to the tastes of the later 18th century, and contemporary offerings in an archaic style. Although Percy's approach to editing lacked stringency, it is important to distinguish his important labour of retrieval from the element of fakery and fantasy to be found in the ▷ Ossian poems of ▷ James Macpherson.

Renaissance in England, The

'Renaissance' (or 'Renascence') derives from Latin 'renascentia' = 'rebirth'. The word was first used by Italian scholars in the mid-16th century to express the rediscovery of ancient Roman and Greek culture, which was now studied for its own sake and not used merely to enhance the authority of the Church. Modern scholars are more inclined to use the term to express a great variety of interdependent changes which Europe underwent politically, economically and culturally between 1450 (although the starting-points were much earlier) and 1600. The religious outcome of these changes is expressed through the terms ➤ Reformation and ➤ Counter-Reformation, a sequence of events closely bound up with the Renaissance.

In England, the Renaissance is usually thought of as beginning with the accession of the House of ➤ Tudor to the throne in 1485. Politically, this marks the end of the period of civil war amongst the old feudal aristocracy (the Wars of the Roses) in the mid-15th century, and the establishment of something like a modern, efficient, centralized state; technically, the date is close to that of the introduction of printing into England – an invention without which the great cultural changes of the Renaissance could not have occurred. Culturally, the first important period in England was the reign of the second Tudor monarch, > Henry VIII. This was the period of the English ▶ humanists > More, > Grocyn, > Linacre and the poet ➤ Sir Thomas Wyatt.

Several distinctive features characterize the English Renaissance. The first is the lateness of its impact. Italian, French, German, Dutch and Spanish scholars had already worked on the ancient Greek and Latin writers, and had produced works of their own inspired by the classics; in consequence, English culture was revitalized not so much directly by the classics as by contemporary Europeans under the influence of the classics. > Castiglione's The Courtier, ➤ Machiavelli's The Prince, ➤ Ariosto's Orlando, were as important in the English Renaissance as > Virgil's > Aeneid or the plays of > Seneca, and it was characteristic that > North translated > Plutarch's Lives not from the original Greek but from a French version. Such an influx of foreign influences, both contemporary and ancient, might have overwhelmed the native English literary tradition but for two more distinctive features: England as an insular country followed a course of social and political history that was to a great extent independent of the course of history elsewhere in Europe, for example in the peculiarity of the English Reformation, and this assisted the country in preserving its cultural independence; and owing to the example of the works of the 14thcentury poet > Chaucer, the native literature was sufficiently vigorous and experienced in assimilating foreign influences without being subjected by them. A fourth characteristic of English Renaissance literature is that it is primarily artistic, rather than philosophical and scholarly, and a fifth is the coinciding of the Renaissance and the Reformation in England, in contrast to the rest of Europe, where the Reformation (or, in countries that remained Roman Catholic, the Counter- Reformation) succeeded the Renaissance.

The English Renaissance was largely literary, and achieved its finest expression in the so-called Elizabethan drama, which began to excel only in the last decade of the 16th century and reached its height in the first 15 years of the 17th; its finest exponents were > Christopher Marlowe, ▶ Ben Ionson and ▶ William Shakespeare. Non-dramatic poetry was also extremely rich, and reached its peak in the same period in the work of ⊳ Edmund Spenser, ⊳ Philip Sidney, Shakespeare and ⊳ John Donne, but it is typical of the lateness of the Renaissance in England that its most ambitious product, John Milton's > epic > Paradise Lost, was published as late as 1667. Native English prose shaped itself more slowly than poetry; More wrote his > Utopia in Latin, which was the vehicle of some other writers, including ➤ Francis Bacon (in much of his work), owing to its advantages (for international circulation) over English at a time when the latter was little learned in other countries. Nonetheless English prose developed with vigour in native English writers such as > Roger Ascham, Thomas North, > Richard Hooker, in the English works of Francis Bacon, and in the translators of the > Bible. Renault, Mary (1905-83)

Writer of popular historical novels. Renault was born and educated in England, working as a nurse during World War II, after which she emigrated with her life-long partner Julie Mullard to South Africa, where she was an active anti-apartheid campaigner until her death in Cape Town. Most of Renault's highly successful novels deal with the classical world. and, in their exploration of the transition from matriarchal social systems and religion to more modern partriarchy, they show the influence of > Robert Graves' The White Goddess. All of Renault's novels are distinguished by the meticulous research and accuracy of historical details which underpin them. Her best-known books are the Alexander trilogy (which covers the life of Alexander the Great: Fire from Heaven, 1970, The Persian Boy 1972, and Funeral Games 1981), and two novels narrated by Theseus (The King Must Die, 1958, and The Bull from the Sea, 1962). Her other works include: Purposes of Love (1939); The Charioteer (1953); The Last of the Wine (1956); The Mask of Apollo (1966); The Praise Singer (1978). Bib: Dick, B. F., The Hellenism of Mary Renault; Wolf, P., Mary Renault.

Republic, Plato's

A philosophical dialogue by the Greek philosopher > Plato. > Socrates discusses with his friends the nature of justice, and the conversation leads to an outline of the ideal state. Public life must exhibit the highest virtues of private life, and justice is achieved if the classes work together to contribute to society the virtues in which each excels. Democracy (the rule of the people), oligarchy (the rule of a small powerful group), and timocracy (the rule of men of property) are in turn rejected, in favour of aristocracy - the rule of the best, trained by an exacting system of education. The aristocrat will seek wisdom, whereas the man of action seeks honour, and the merchant gratifies his appetites. Wisdom is a direct apprehension of the good conceived as a system of ideal forms; Book VII contains the famous parable of men sitting with their backs to these forms (the only substantial reality) watching the shadows on the wall of the cavern - ie phenomena apprehended by the senses - and supposing these shadows to be the only reality. Book X contains Plato's notorious rejection of poetry: poets must be expelled, though with honour, because they frustrate the pursuit of true wisdom by extolling the illusory phenomena of this world, and weaken the mind by stimulating wasteful sympathy with the misfortunes of men.

Resolution and Independence (1807)

A poem by ➤ William Wordsworth, sometimes known as The Leech-Gatherer, composed in 1802, published in 1807, and subsequently revised. It uses a reduced version of ▶ Spenserian stanzas, rhyming ababbcc, the first six lines being pentameters and the last an Alexandrine (> metre). Travelling across the moor the poet finds that the freshness of nature fails to raise his spirits. He reflects on ▶ Thomas Chatterton and ▷ Robert Burns, and the 'despondency and madness' to which the poetic vocation seems to lead. In his reverie he encounters the portentous figure of 'a Man', 'in his extreme old age', standing 'Beside a pool bare to the eve of heaven'. At first he seems part of inanimate nature, like a 'huge stone', but when approached he explains that he earns 'an honest maintenance' by roaming from pond to pond collecting leeches (much in demand by doctors of the day for bloodletting). The man's equanimity dispels the poet's moodiness: 'I could have laughed myself to scorn to find/ In that decrepit Man so firm a mind'. Despite its elements of conventional piety, the poem is remarkable for its sense of awe and spiritual humility before a man who in social terms is of no account.

Return of the Native, The (1878) A novel by > Thomas Hardy. Its setting is Egdon Heath, a wild tract of country in Dorset, in the south-west of England. The atmosphere of the Heath prevails over the whole book; as an environment, it repels some characters and absorbs others; those who are absorbed achieve a sombre integration with it but those who are repelled and rebel suffer disaster. The central character - 'the Native' - is Clym Yeobright, a Paris diamond merchant who has returned to the Heath in revulsion from the futility of his urban life and occupation. He intends to become a schoolmaster and marries the restless, self-seeking Eustacia Vye who is unfaithful to him; her affair with the unscrupulous Damon Wildeve leads to the death of both. Other charactes include Thomasin Yeobright whom Wildeve marries, to her misfortune and the grief of Diggory Venn, the travelling sheepdyer (or 'reddleman') who represents a primitive sincerity and truthfulness, and Mrs Yeobright,

Clym's mother, whom Eustacia estranges from Heath and eventually a travelling preacher. The environment but it suffers from a weak conception of the central character, Clym.

Revenge tragedy

A kind of tragedy that was particularly popular during and just after the lifetime of ➤ Shakespeare, ie 1590–1620. The plot of such plays was commonly the murder by a person in power of a near relative, wife, or husband of the central character, who is then faced with the problem of how, or sometimes whether, to carry out revenge against a murderer who, because of his social importance, is out of reach of ordinary justice. The literary inspiration for this kind of play came from the plays of the Roman poet ▷ Seneca, whose Ten Tragedies were translated into English between 1559 and 1581. Seneca's plays would doubtless have been insufficient in themselves, however, to get going the great English series of revenge tragedies, if the theme had not been relevant to English society. This society was in a stage midway between primitive lawlessness, in which justice is beyond the reach of the weak and unprivileged, and the modern state, in which justice is impartial and police are numerous and efficient. The tradition that revenge for an injury to a member of his or her family was a duty for the individual was still widely maintained; against it, the state maintained that revenge not carried out as due punishment through a court of law was a crime, and the Church taught that it was a sin. On the other hand, the law was unreliable, though not helpless, against the powerful and the powerfully protected, and in the face of the religious prohibition the revenger might consider himself to be the instrument of Divine Vengeance.

This state of conflict in the Elizabethan conscience made for different styles of revenge play. The first of those offering straightforward treatment of the theme was > Thomas Kyd's > The Spanish Tragedy; Shakespeare's early > history plays > Henry VI, Parts I, II and III and > Richard III are revenge plays as well, and another early example by Shakespeare is his > Titus Andronicus. Later examples: > The Revenger's Tragedy by > Cyril Tourneur (or perhaps ➤ Thomas Middleton) and Thomas Middleton's > Women Beware Women, to mention only plays of distinction. Another style might be called the 'anti-revenge' drama, in which the hero is too enlightened to seek revenge examples are Tourneur's ➤ The Atheist's Tragedy and > Chapman's Revenge of Bussy d' Ambois, both about 1611. The finest of all tragedies of revenge, Shakespeare's > Hamlet, is between the two styles, inasmuch as the hero both accepts the obligation to revenge and has to fight against his revulsion from it. A third style might rather be called the tragedy of retribution, inasmuch as a crime is avenged but the drama is not centred on a specific avenger; such plays include ▷ Webster's ▷ The White Devil and > The Duchess of Malfi and Middleton's masterpiece > The Changeling. Revenge and retribution are of course akin, and the importance of revenge tragedy, apart from its intrinsic interest, is that it is the starting-point for the development of some of Shakespeare's greatest tragic themes, eg his > Othello and > Macbeth, though these are not usually placed in the same category. Revenger's Tragedy, The (1607)

A drama in ▷ blank verse attributed to ▷ Cyril Tourneur, although modern scholars incline increasingly to attribute it to ▷ Thomas Middleton. The scene is a dissolute ▷ Renaissance court in Italy. The sensual Duke has a vicious legitimate son, Lussurioso, by his first wife; the Duchess, his second wife, is in love with his illegitimate son, Spurio.

who uses his bastardy as a pretext for general sensual rapacity; her own sons, Ambitioso and Supervacuo, are consumed with envy, and she herself is totally without moral restraint. This evil family is not so much a group of characters in the ordinary, realistic sense as an array of allegorical representations of the fleshly vices; their Italianate names suggest their ⊳ allegories Lussurioso = Luxury, Spurio = Falseness, etc. They are predatory on one another, and the downfall of the whole family is plotted by Vindice (= Revenger), whose betrothed has been poisoned by the Duke; he is assisted by his brother Hippolito. Disguised, Vindice enters the service of Lussorioso, and pretends to procure his own sister, Castiza (= Chastity) as mistress for his master; he finds to his horror that their own mother is prepared to sell her for the price of becoming a court lady. Vindice carries out his revenge on the Duke in a scene of great emblematic ferocity, and eventually contrives the bloodthirsty destruction of the whole family. He himself, however, is sent to his death by the Duke's virtuous successor: a Revenger, in however just a cause, is a criminal too dangerous to leave alive.

The violence of the action is redeemed from crudity by the energy, compression and conviction of the language, and by the way in which Tourneur fuses three modes of feeling into original art. One of these is the tradition of medieval allegory, which was becoming diluted and abstract in much Renaissance poetry, but which in this play keeps its old power of condensing emotion into powerful images. Tourneur uses the allegorical form to substantiate Puritan detestation of sensual vice, which was the evil extreme of the Renaissance liberation of the physical appetites. At the same time, both these vices and Vindice's vindictiveness are expressed with an energy that is itself a rich manifestation of Renaissance feeling. In uniting these disparate resources, the play is one of the masterpieces of > Jacobean drama.

Review, The

A periodical, written by ▷ Daniel Defoe and published three times weekly from 1704 to 1713. It expressed Defoe's opinion on current political events, and also on literature and manners. Defoe has been called the inventor of the leading article, a feature of modern newspapers.

Reviews and Periodicals

The English periodical press arose gradually from the controversial religious and political pamphleteering of the late 16th and 17th centuries. It became established as a recognized institution early in the 18th century, and it was also in the 18th century that the review, which expresses opinion, became distinguished from the newspaper, which gives priority to information on current events. The great age for the periodical press was, however, 1800–1914; this was the period when the quarterlies and the monthlies had their widest influence, and the weeklies their largest circulation proportionately to the size of the reading public. Since 1914, the influence of the quarterlies and monthlies has declined; the weeklies have remained important, but they have had to compete on the one side with the tendency of newspapers to include a large amount of material originally restricted to reviews, and on the other with the medium of broadcasting.

Reynard the Fox

The hero of a cycle of animal fables or bestiaries, begun about 1200, and very popular during the Middle Ages. The animals stand for basic characteristics of human nature, especially as it betrays itself in social relationships. Reynard is the cunning self-seeking individualist who betrays everyone and preys on society, always escaping justice. ▷ Caxton published an English translation of a Flemish version of the tales in 1481, but there is no native version of the cycle in English. The most famous work in which Reynard makes an appearance is Chaucer's ▷ Nun's Priest's Tale, one of the Canterbury Tales.

Reynolds, G. W. M. (George William MacArthur) (1814-79)

Novelist and journalist. A political radical, Chartist sympathizer and republican, Reynolds built up a substantial niche for himself in publishing and the newspaper business by writing specifically for the growing urban workingclass readership: in 1846, he founded the penny weekly magazine Reynolds' Miscellany and in 1850 launched Reynold's Weekly Newspaper (which ran until 1967). One of the most successful purveyors of the so-called 'penny-dreadful' fiction (sensational stories issued in 1d serial form), he initiated the series The Mysteries of London (1846-50; based on Eugene Sue's Les Mystères de Paris, 1842-3), the Regency romance The Mysteries of the Court of London (1849-56), and various of the many > Dickens plagiarisms and continuations that poured out in the 1840s, including Pickwick Abroad (1839), Pickwick Married (1841) and Master Timothy's Book-Case (1842).

Reynolds, John Hamilton (1796–1852) Recipient of some of > John Keats' most important letters, and of the verse epistle To J. H. Reynolds Esq. He published several volumes of poetry, including The Garden of Florence and Other Poems (1821).

Reynolds, Sir Joshua (b1723-92) One of the leading portrait painters of the 18th century, the great age of English portrait painting. He was the first President of the > Royal Academy, and the author of Discourses, ie lectures, delivered to its students between 1760 and 1700, on the principles of art. The friend of > Samuel Johnson, he was a founder-member of the Literary Club of which Johnson was the centre. Reynolds was strongly representative of 18th-century aristocratic > taste, and in the opinion of > William Blake, writing about 1808, 'This man was Hired to Depress Art'. However, his Discourses were admired by the greatest 19th-century English art critic, > John Ruskin.

Rhetoric

Rhetoric in the medieval period was a formal skill of considerable importance. It was taken to mean the effective presentation of ideas with a set of rules or style, and was founded in the classical tradition of > Aristotle and > Cicero. It was taught in monastic schools as part of the trivium, Rhetoric, Logic and Grammar, which used as its basic text Geoffrey de Vinsauf's Poetria Nova (1200). Rhetoric not only formed patterns in which texts should be written, but it also governed how the works should be received and allocated them to particular categories, eg epic, debate or sermon. The system of rhetoric was paramount to the operation of literature in the medieval period.

Similarly, almost all of the practice or theory of writing in the > Renaissance period was touched by what became known as the 'Art of Rhetoric'. Rhetorical theory formed an important part of the educational syllabus at the universities, and almost every major writer of the 16th and 17th centuries would have undergone some training in rhetoric. Rhetoric was learned first through reading the classical text-books on rhetoric, in particular the works of Quintilian (especially the Institutio Oratore) and Cicero, Secondly, practical rhetorical exercises were performed by the student in which a particular topic was debated. In these debates, the student was expected to be able to organize an argument according to set formulae, producing examples with which to sustain the analysis which themselves would be derived from a suitable store of words, images, fables and metaphors discovered in reading classical texts.

But the production of arguments was only one part of the rhetoricians' skills. Rhetoric also involved the classification of language – in particular the classification and analysis of \triangleright figures of speech. Further, it was understood as an enabling tool by which \triangleright discourse could be reproduced. In essence, therefore, it offered a system for producing both speech and writing. This system can be considered under five distinct parts: 1 'invention', which signifies the discovery of arguments applicable to a given case; 2 'arrangement' or 'disposition', which governed the ordering of the arguments to be used; 3 'style' on the actual choice of words and units of expression; 4 the important area of 'memory', which helped the rhetorician develop skills in recalling the order and substance of the argument being deployed; 5 'delivery', which was applicable mainly to spoken discourse but which governed such details as the appropriate facial expressions or gestures which might be used.

Whilst rhetoric was understood as a way of facilitating the classification of the various parts of an argument it was also a powerful tool in the analysis of discourse and it can thus be understood as a form of literary criticism. It was, however, in its abiding influence on stylistic forms that it was of most importance to the Renaissance writer. Numerous textbooks on rhetoric were published throughout the 16th century in England. Perhaps the most important were: Leonard Cox, The Art or Craft of Rhetoric (1624); Richard Sherry, A Treatise of Schemes and Tropes (1550); Thomas Wilson, Art of Rhetoric (1553); Henry Peacham, The Garden of Eloquence (1577); and Abraham Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetoric (1584). But many other texts were written with the art of rhetoric either governing the structure or informing the language. ▷ Sir Philip Sidney's ▷ An Apologie for Poetrie, for example, is structured according to rhetorical principles of organization.

Recent developments in critical theory have sought to re-emphasize rhetoric as a form of critical practice, particularly in relation to the effects that any verbal construction may have on those to whom it is addressed. In this respect rhetoric is closely associated with some of the larger issues which surface in relation to the theory of 'discourse'. The recent emphasis upon the structure of discourse draws attention away from language as a means of classifying to one of examining the way discourses are constructed in order to achieve certain effects. Here the emphasis would be on the different ways in which particular figures are presented in language, and what that presentation may involve. This form of rhetorical analysis has been undertaken by > Jacques Derrida in volumes such as Of Grammatology (1974), by > Paul De Man in his Blindness and Insight (1971), by > Terry Eagleton in Criticism and Ideology (1976), and in a whole range of texts by > Michel Foucault.

Rhyme

> Figures of speech.

Rhyme Royal

> Chaucer seems to have been the first English poet to use the rhyme royal form in his narrative poetry but it is conventionally named after its use in the \triangleright Kingis Quair, attributed to \triangleright James 1 of Scotland. In rhyme royal, seven decasyllabic lines form a stanza, rhyming ababbcc. Chaucer's use of this form suggests that it was used for narrative subjects of a sophisticated courtly or devotional kind (the \triangleright Second Nun's Tale and \triangleright Troilus and Criseyde are both composed in rhyme royal). It became an extremely popular form in the 15th century for courtly poetry.

The following example of rhyme royal is taken from Troilus and Criseyde and describes the moment Troilus first sees his lady:

Withinne the temple he wente hym forth pleyinge, This Troilus, of every wight aboute, On this lady, and now on that, lokynge, Wher so she were of town or of withoute; And upon cas bifel that thorugh a route His eye percede, and so depe it wente, Til on Criseyde it smot, and ther it stente.

Rhymer's Club, The

Founded in 1891 at the Cheshire Cheese tavern near Fleet Street, it consisted of a group of poets including ▷ W.B. Yeats, ▷ Ernest Dowson, ▷ Lionel Johnson, ▷ John Davidson, Ernest Rhys, Richard Le Gallienne (1866–1947), ▷ Arthur Symons, ▷ Aubrey Beardsley and occasionally ▷ Oscar Wilde. Discussions centred on their own lyrics, which they read aloud, and poetry in general. They issued two anthologies (1892, 1894) of verse which exhibited many of the characteristics of the ▷ Decadent and ▷ Aesthetic movements.

Rhys, Jean (1894-1979)

Adopted name of novelist, born Jean Williams on the West Indian island of Dominica. Brought up speaking both English and the Dominican French dialect, she lived in Europe from the age of 16, moving between London, Vienna and Paris before finally settling in Devon. The Left Bank (1927), a series of sketches of Bohemian life in Paris, was followed by four novels which tell the stories of isolated, poor, victimized women, adrift in London or Paris, in a laconic, lucid style which combines the tragic and the absurd. These are: Postures (1928) (in the U.S.A. as Quartet; 1929); After Leaving Mr Mackenzie (1931); Voyage in the Dark (1934) and Good Morning Midnight (1939). After a considerable period of critical neglect, Wide Sargasso Sea (1966) reawakened widespread interest in her work, especially among > feminists. It recounts the early life of the first Mrs Rochester from ▷ Charlotte Brontë's ▷ Jane Eyre, rendering the alienation and suffering of an isolated consciousness with great power. Set mostly in the West Indies, it is richer in imagery and symbolism than her earlier work, combining lyricism and psychological insight with an exploration of political, racial and sexual oppression. She wrote two books of short stories: Tigers Are Better Looking (1968) and Sleep It Off Lady (1976). Quartet was made into a film (with a screenplay by > Ruth Prawer Jhabvala) by the director James Ivory in 1981. Bib: Stanley, T. F., Jean Rhys: A Critical Study; Carr, H., Jean Rhys; Howells, C. Rich, Christopher (1657-1714)

Theatre manager. Rich assumed full control of the ▷ United Company in 1693, but his mismanagement contributed to the defection of the leading actors, including ▷ Thomas Betterton, ▷ Elizabeth Barry, and ▷ Anne Bracegirdle, in 1695. Even so, he succeeded in building up an able company in their place, including the young ▷ Colley Cibber, William Bullock, Joe Haines, ▷ John and ▷ Susannah Verbruggen, ▷ Anne Oldfield and ▷ William Penkethman, as well as bringing in foreign performers as attractions.

In 1701 Rich weathered an attempt to oust him from control of ➤ Drury Lane, but he continued to invite conflict with both actors and dramatists, and in 1709 he was forced to close Drury Lane on an order from the Lord Chamberlain, after his attempt to deny his actors their full profits from benefit performances. Rich was not allowed to form a new company until 1714, but he died just six weeks before the scheduled opening.

Rich, John (1692-1761)

Actor, manager, dancer, dramatist, son of ▷ Christopher Rich. John inherited the largest share of the theatrical patent owned by his father, and took over the refurbished ▷ Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre opened by his father before his death in 1714. He soon began acting and dancing at the theatre, and built up its repertory of dance, variety, and pantomime programmes, for whose growing popularity he was largely responsible.

During the following years he gained a mixed reputation for, on the one hand, allegedly degrading the stage, and on the other hand, providing popular entertainment by talented performers in settings of great magnificence. He was also complimented for reviving the best of the old plays, and encouraging new authors. It was under his auspices that ▷ John Gay's ▷ The Beggar's Opera was first staged in 1728, making (according to a well-known quotation) 'Gay rich and Rich gay'. The profits from The Beggar's Opera helped finance a new theatre in Covent Garden on the site of the present Royal Opera House (▷ Covent Garden Theatres), which opened in 1732 with a cast headed by ▷ James Quin. A fierce rivalry developed between Covent Garden and ▷ Drury Lane under ▷ Garrick's management, highlighted in 1750-51, when the ▷ theatres staged Romeo and Juliet simultaneously. For decades after his death, theatres continued to honour Rich in tributes on stage, or by borrowing devices from his shows.

Richard I Coeur de Lion (Lionheart) (1189-99)

King of England. He spent most of his reign out of the country, engaged in various wars, especially the third ▷ Crusade. His exploits made him into a figure of romance and legend, and as such he appears in two very popular novels by ▷ Walter Scott: ▷ Ivanhoe and ▷ The Talisman (1825). He belonged to the House of ▷ Plantagenet (Anjou) and was the son of his predecessor ▷ Henry II and the brother of his successor, ▷ John.

Richard II (1377-99)

King of England, and last of the direct line in the ▷ House of Plantagenet (Anjou). He was the son of the ▷ Black Prince and the grandson of his predecessor, ▷ Edward III. His neglect of the war against France, his youthfulness (he came to the throne at the age of 11), and his capricious, inconsistent character all helped to make his reign appear to be a period of disorder; the throne was eventually usurped by his cousin, Henry Bolingbroke, who became first king of the House of Lancaster as ▷ Henry IV.

Richard II, King

An historical drama in ▷ blank verse by ▷ Shakespeare, based on the Chronicles of ▷ Holinshed. First performed in 1595, and published in a first ▷ quarto in 1597, it is the first of the second tetralogy of ▷ history plays by Shakespeare, the other three being ▷ Henry IV, Parts I and II and ▷ Henry V.

The theme of all four is kingship; > Richard II is treated as a king whose sacred claim to the throne is beyond doubt, but is tragically unaccompanied by any capacity to rule. The leading story is about his relationship with his cousin, Henry Bolingbroke (> Henry IV); he drives Henry (not altogether without justification) into exile, and then quite unlawfully confiscates Henry's land. Henry returns to England to defend his right, and receives so much support that he is driven to making himself king. Usurpers, however, were considered to be opposing God, since kings held the throne by God's authority, and so Henry does his best to persuade Richard to abdicate publicly. Richard does so, but he skilfully makes it clear to all the witnesses that his abdication is involuntary (IV. i), so that the public abdication only emphasizes, instead of relieves, Henry's guilt. Concerned as it is with the ritualistic aspect of monarchy - the ceremonies that are the signs of the sacredness of the office - the whole play has been observed by critics to have a ritualistic style in the formal patterning of much of the verse and the pageant-like ceremony of a number of the important scenes. Richard is imprisoned in the Tower, and is later assassinated; thus the effect of criminality in Henry's action in seizing the throne is confirmed.

Richard III (?1593)

An historical drama in > blank verse by ➤ Shakespeare based on ➤ Holinshed's Chronicles, and the last of Shakespeare's first historical tetralogy, the other plays being the three parts of > Henry VI. The > Henry VI plays are about the Wars of the Roses, and the accumulation of hatred, vengefulness and crime that those wars brought about. Richard III opens in the reign of Edward IV, Richard's brother, and shows the attempts of the king to induce his nobles to be reconciled. Fear and war-weariness make them comply, but Richard is still filled with ambition and coldblooded cruelty. In spite of his appearance he is a hunchback and has a withered arm he has a magnetic personality and manages to win friends to help him in his conspiracies. By consistent treachery and ruthlessness he acquires the throne, but is shortly after defeated and killed by Henry Tudor (> Henry VII), who is shown in the play to have right and divine aid on his side. Though totally evil, Richard is presented as a character of energy and wit, the source of much sardonic comedy. Dramatically he is in the tradition of both ➤ Machiavelli's The Prince - a treatise of evil for Englishmen of Shakespeare's day - and of Herod in the medieval mystery plays. The play is the masterpiece of the earliest group of Shakespeare's plays, ie those probably written before 1594.

Richard III (1483-85)

Last King of England in the House of York, which seized the throne from the ▷ House of Lancaster in 1461. The first of the short line was ▷ Edward IV (1461–83), Richard's brother; he was succeeded by his son, the boy king ▷ Edward VI, whose throne Richard usurped. He was himself defeated and killed at the Battle of Bosworth (1485) by Henry Tudor, who succeeded as ▷ Henry VII the first sovereign of the ▷ Tudor line. It was very much in the Tudor interest to blacken the character of Richard III, and 16th-century historians (Polydore Vergil, ➤ Thomas More, ➤ Holinshed) depict him as satanically evil. Modern historians have found it difficult to discover whether this account is just, and there have been some attempts to rehabilitate his character. One of the chief charges against him is the murder of his two nephews Edward V and Richard of York, the 'princes in the Tower'. That they were murdered is almost certain, but there is no proof that Richard was guilty.

Richards, Alun (b 1929)

Novelist, short story writer and playwright. Alun Richards was born in Pontypridd, Glamorgan, and was educated at Pontypridd Grammar School and then at Gwent College of Education and University College, Swansea. Drawing on his experiences as a probation officer, hospital patient for two years, sailor, and teacher for ten years in Cardiff before moving to Swansea in 1067 to devote his life to full-time writing, he rejects the portraval of a romanticized Welsh past of myth and anecdote and is concerned instead with the modern Wales of rugby, beauty queens, television, the language question and the industrial and spiritual decline in the South Wales Valleys. In an updated view of Valleys society, Alun Richards illumines social tensions, especially among the migratory professional classes, in subtle regional nuances between the Valleys and Cardiff, and also between Cardiff and London, in a delineation that is lively, sharply observed, deeply understanding and extremely funny. His novels are: The Elephant You Gave Me (1963); The Home Patch (1966); A Woman of Experience (1969); Home to an Empty House (1973); Ennal's Point (1977); and Barque Whisper (1979). His collections of short stories are: Dai Country (1974); and The Former Miss Merthyr Tydfil (1976); and he has edited The New Penguin Book of Welsh Short Stories (1993) as well as writing about Welsh rugby in A Touch of Glory (1980) and in his memoir of Carwyn James in 1984. His theatre plays, performed in England, include The Big Breaker, The Victuallers' Ball and The Snowdropper, and were later published in 1973 as Plays for Players, but he became wellknown for radio and television drama, for which he has adapted work by H. G. Wells, Somerset Maugham, Georges Simenon and Alun Lewis, as well as providing many of the scripts for the popular sea story series The Onedin Line. Bib: Stephens, M. Richards, I. A. (1893–1979) important insights was that we are inevitably influenced by some kind of 'poetry', even if it is only that of bad films and magazine covers, or advertisements. In Principles of Literary Criticism (1924) and Science and Poetry (1926) he discusses what kind of truth is the subjectmatter of poetry, the place of poetry in the context of the rest of life, and what is the nature of critical judgements of poetry. He worked to his conclusion on Benthamite (> Utilitarian) lines, of asking what is 'the use' of poetry, but his conclusion was not far from that of ➤ Matthew Arnold, that poetry's function in the modern world is that formerly provided by religion - to provide a 'touchstone' of value, and hence, if only indirectly, a guide to living (see Arnold's 'Study of Poetry', in ➤ Essays in Criticism 2nd Series, 1888). This view resembles the judgements of other writers of the 1920s and 30s, such as ➤ Pound, ➤ Wyndham Lewis, ➤ Eliot, ➤ Leavis, though each of them arrives at his judgement by a different approach. Richards' Practical Criticism (1929) is a teaching manual for the study of poetry with the aim of training students to judge poems presented anonymously, without being influenced by the author's reputation; its ideas have been extensively followed in English and American schools and universities. Much of his later work has been purely linguistic, eg Basic English and its Uses (1943). Other works: The Meaning of Meaning (with Ogden, 1923); Coleridge on Imagination (1934); The Philosophy of Rhetoric (1936); Speculative Instruments (1955); Goodbye Earth and other poems (1959); The Screens (1961).

Richardson, Dorothy (1873-1957) Novelist. Born in Abingdon, Berkshire, she worked as a governess from the age of 17, before moving to London where she became an intimate of > H. G. Wells and part of a circle of socialists and intellectuals. She took up journalism, and for the rest of her life earned a meagre living by this means, while dedicating herself to her long novel, Pilgrimage, which consists of the following volumes: Pointed Roofs (1915); Backwater (1916); Honeycomb (1917); The Tunnel (1919); Interim (1919); Deadlock (1921); Revolving Lights (1923); The Trap (1925); Oberland (1927); Dawn's Left Hand (1931); Clear Horizon (1935); Dimple Hill (1938); March Moonlight (1967). It is a semi-autobiographical work, recounting the life of the heroine, Miriam Henderson, through concentration on her continuous subjective experience of the present moment. It consists of Australia Felix (1917); The Way Home (1925); Ultima Thule (1929). Her work shows the influence of > Goethe and the German Romantic tradition. Her other novels are: Maurice Guest (1908); The Getting of Wisdom (1910); The Young Cosima (1939). Story collections include: The End of Childhood and Other Stories (1934). Richardson, Samuel (1689-1761)

Novelist. Richardson was the son of a furniture-maker, born near Derby, though most of his childhood was spent in London as the family returned to live there. Little is known of his education, though by the age of 13 he is known to have written love letters on behalf of his friends, an activity relevant for his later choice of the \triangleright epistolary genre.

In 1706 Richardson was apprenticed to a printer, and in 1715 became a freeman of the > Stationers' Company. In 1721 he began his own business, which proved successful for the rest of his life. In the same year he married the daughter of his former master. His wife died ten years later, and in the early 1730s he suffered the deaths of all the six children born to the marriage.

In 1733 he remarried, again to the daughter of a colleague, and four of their daughters survived. In the same year he published The Apprentice's Vade Mecum, a conduct guide to moral behaviour. In 1739 his own, deliberately moral, version of Aesop's Fables appeared.

The moral intention of his early works is evident in his fiction, though the creations of his imagination frequently escape any strict schemata. > Pamela, begun in the same year as Aesop's Fables appeared, started as a series of conduct guides or 'Familiar Letters', which his friends encouraged him to write. Richardson's professional life, meanwhile, was proving rewarding. In 1723 he had begun to print The True Briton, an influential Tory 9> Whig and Tory) journal, and in 1733 the House of Commons was using his presses. In 1742 he gained a lucrative contract as printer of the > Parliamentary Journals.

His social life was proving equally enjoyable. He particularly relished the company of young women, whom he referred to as his 'honorary daughters', and while writing \triangleright Clarissa (probably begun in 1744) he frequently asked them for their comments and teased them with speculations about the fate of his heroine. The first two volumes appeared in 1747 and were widely acclaimed; five more followed in 1748. The novel was praised, but readers were uneasy about its sexual elements, and its popularity proved less than that of Pamela.

About 1750 Richardson embarked on a new project, which was to be centred on the 'good man'. In 1752 ▶ Samuel Johnson read the draft manuscript of the work, ▶ The History of Sir Charles Grandison, and the novel appeared in seven volumes in 1753-4. Again, there was some doubt about the morality of the book, an ironic fate for a writer with Richardson's intentions.

In 1755 Richardson published a volume of selections from his three novels, in a form which he considered contained the essence of his writing; he was constantly concerned about the length of his fictions, and continually worked on revisions. His novels develop the be epistolary style to a great degree of psychological subtlety, and he has long been regarded as one of the chief founders of the English novel.

He helped Cranmer compile The Book of Common Prayer of 1549 and 1552, and thus contributed to one of the first English prose masterpieces. He became Bishop of London in 1549.

Rights of Man, The (1791-2)

➤ Thomas Paine's The Rights of Man is a political treatise in two parts, first published in 1791 and 1792 respectively. Part I is essentially a reaction to ▷ Edmund Burke's ▷ Reflections on the Revolution in France of 1790. Burke is attacked for indulging in dramatic writing at the expense of truth: 'Mr Burke should recollect that he is writing history, and not plays.' Part II makes a comparison between the new constitutions of France and America, and the hidebound British attachment to hereditary succession. Paine's progressive and egalitarian proposals were labelled seditious, and Paine, who had already escaped to France with the assistance of ▷ William Blake, was convicted of treason and sentenced to banishment.

Poet and theorist. Denise Riley was active in the nascent women's liberation movement of the late 1960s and early 1970s. She collaborated with the poet Wendy Mulford on the collection No Fee (1978): in the previous year, Mulford's avant-garde press, Street Editions, had published her collection of poetry, Marxism for Infants. Since that time Riley has made an important contribution to literary theory, feminism and poetry, often by allowing these categories to interfuse. For example, War in the Nursery (1983) was followed in 1985 by the Virago collection of poems Dry Air. The 1987 feminist analysis, Am I That Name?, was succeeded by her most wideranging and intense sequence of poems, Mop Mop Georgette (1994). A lecturer at Goldsmith's College, London, Riley is active in a variety of fields including creative and editorial writing.

Riley, Joan (b 1958)

Novelist. Born in Jamaica, and educated at the universities of Sussex and London, she teaches black history and culture and works for a drugs advisory agency. Her novels are: The Unbelonging (1985); Waiting in the Twilight (1987); Romance (1988). Her work is concerned with the hardships, and the search for a sense of meaning and identity, of people born in Jamaica and living in Britain.

Risorgimento

Italian for 'resurrection'. The name given to the movement for the unification of Italy in the mid-19th century, led by Victor Emmanuel, king of Sardinia, his Prime Minister Cavour, the agitator Mazzini, and the soldier Garibaldi. In 1847 Cavour founded a newspaper called 'Risorgimento'. The movement appealed to English sympathies, which were strongly liberal at that time; references to it are common in mid-19th-century literature.

Ritchie, Lady (Anne Thackeray) (1837–1919) Novelist, ▷ short story writer and essayist, the daughter of ▷ William Makepeace Thackeray and aunt of Virginia Woolf (1882–1941). Almost all the literary celebrities of the day were known to the family, including ▷ Dickens, ➤ Tennyson, ➤ Robert and ➤ Elizabeth (Barrett) Browning, ▷ Charlotte Brontë and ➤ George Eliot. Ritchie wrote five novels: The Story of Elizabeth (1863); The Village on the Cliff (1867); Old Kensington (1873); Miss Angel (1875) and Mrs Dymond (1885). Her nonfiction includes Toilers and Spinsters (1874), which called attention to the plight of single, unemployed women, and A Book of Sibyls (1883), a collection of essays on women writers. Other works include Records of Tennyson, Ruskin and Browning (1892), and Alfred Tennyson and his Friends (1893). The Letters of Anne Thackeray Ritchie was published in 1924. The character of Mrs Hilbery in Virginia Woolf's Night and Day is based on Ritchie, and she was well-known to the Bloomsbury Group.

Ritson, Joseph (1752-1803)

Editor and literary scholar. Joseph Ritson was an idiosyncratic scholar who suffered from ill health and who eventually went mad. He produced, however, important editions of early English poetry, including A Select Collection of English Songs (1783) and Ancient English Metrical Romances (1802). His demanding editorial standards led him to dismiss the works of \triangleright Warton and \triangleright Percy, but he remained a close and admiring friend of \triangleright Walter Scott. Rivals, The (1775)

A prose comedy by ➤ Richard Brinsley Sheridan. It is set in the fashionable city of Bath, and the plot concerns parents and guardians at cross purposes with their children. The central situation is that the young and > sentimental Lydia Languish, a great novel reader, prefers the idea of marrying a young, penniless officer to the possibility of a rich young heir as a husband. Captain Absolute is such an heir and genuinely in love with her, but to win her affections he disguises himself as the penniless Ensign Beverley. His father, Sir Anthony Absolute, a rich baronet, is determined to make an unromantic marriage of convenience between his son and Lydia, but the Captain dare not disclose his disguise and so seems to be disobeying his father's wishes. Mrs Malaprop, Lydia's guardian, is equally anxious for the worldly match and disapproves of Beverley, but at the same time she is making love by letter to the aggressive Irishman, Sir Lucius O'Trigger, who supposes that the letters come from Lydia, and is one of her suitors. An additional complication is that the so-called Beverley and Sir Lucius have as another rival an absurd young country squire, Bob Acres.

A sub-plot is another love affair between Julia Melville and the morbidly jealous Faulkland.

Sheridan's comedies – of which The Rivals is the first – are, like those of \triangleright Goldsmith at about the same time, above all a reaction against the sentimental tradition, and recall the wit and theatrical deftness of Restoration drama without its sexual explicitness.

Roaring Girl, The, or Moll Cut-Purse (1606) A buoyant and big-hearted comedy of gender ambiguity by ▷ Thomas Middleton, structured around the benevolent figure of Moll Cutpurse whose function in the play it is to smooth the course of true love. She is described by her detractors as a 'woman more than man, / Man more than woman,' and becomes the play's moral centre of reference. More than anything Middleton's Moll Cutpurse seems to be conceived of as a ▷ Jacobean ▷ citizen comedy version of ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Rosalind from ▷ As You Like It.

Rob Roy (1817)

A novel by ➤ Sir Walter Scott, giving a picture of Scotland just before the first > Iacobite rebellion of 1715. The plot concerns the rivalry in love of the cousins Francis and Rashleigh Osbaldistone for Diana Vernon. Rashleigh, the villain, is involved in Jacobite intrigue. Their adventures are interwoven with the fortunes of Rob Roy, a historical character whom Scott romanticizes. He is the chief of the Macgregor Clan in the Scottish Highlands, and a convicted outlaw who lives by plunder. In the novel he acts on the side of the hero, Francis, at Diana's earnest appeal. As usual in Scott's novels, the notable parts are those which concern Scottish common life, and such characters as Bailie Nicol Jarvie and Francis' servant Andrew Fairservice.

Robert de Boron

French writer, working in the late 12th/early 13th century, who substantially developed the early history of the > Grail (in his Roman de Graal/ Joseph d'Arimathie), giving it a Christian interpretation as the vessel used by Christ at the Last Supper and by Joseph of Arimathea to collect Christ's blood at the Crucifixion. He thus provided the means whereby Arthurian history could be seen as another key chapter in Christian history. Robert seems to have taken the Grail story further in his narratives of Merlin (of which only a fragment survives) and Perceval, which is not extant. Both verse narratives stimulated further reworkings and continuation. The 13th-century continuation of Merlin (known as the Suite de Merlin) provides the basis for ➤ Malory's version of the foundation of Arthur's court. The prose reworkings of Robert's work (the prose Joseph, the prose Merlin, and the so-called Didot Perceval) were used substantially in the later composition of the ➤ Vulgate Cycle.

Roberts, Emma (c 1793-1840) Poet and travel writer. Roberts' most interesting writing focuses on India where she travelled for three years after moving there with her married sister in 1828. On her return to London, she published her first book of poems, Oriental Scenes, Sketches and Tales (1832) and dedicated it to > L.E.L. with whom she had lived before travelling abroad. A prose work, Scenes and Characteristics of Hindostan, with Sketches of Anglo-Indian Society (1835), followed, and in both works Roberts shows herself to be an acute and impartial observer of injustice and cruelty. She attacked both Indian and English bigotry and intolerance, especially where women were the victims. In 1830 she returned to India and began editing The Bombay United Service Gazette. Two further travel books on India followed before her death in 1840.

Roberts, Michèle (b 1949)

Poet, short-story writer and novelist. Roberts is a prolific writer, has appeared widely on television, radio and in anthologies, and regularly gives readings of her work. She was very influential on the development and recognition of contemporary poetry in her capacity as poetry editor of the London listings magazine City Limits. Her recent publications include The Mirror of the Mother (1986), a volume of poetry, The Book of Mrs Noah (1987) and In the Red Kitchen (1990).

Robertson, T. W. (1820–71)
Dramatist. Plays include Society (1865), Ours (1866), Caste (1868). M. P. (1870). He is memorable chiefly for restoring to the drama some degree of relevance to contemporary social life at a time when contemporary plays had very little serious interest. His best-known play is the social comedy Caste.

Robins, Elizabeth (1862-1952)

Actress and novelist whose play Votes for Women was performed at the Court Theatre in 1907. In this she introduces an innovatory crowd scene of a suffragette rally at Trafalgar Square; the rest of the play is written within the conventions of society drama. She worked mainly in London and belonged to the group of Ibsenites encouraging the development of an English drama of ideas. She performed in the first productions of several of ▷ Ibsen's plays during the 1890s, including Pillars of Society (1889). A Doll's House and Hedda Gabler (both 1891).

Robinson Crusoe, The Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of (1719)

A novel by Daniel Defoe. The first part was based on the experiences of a sailor, ▷ Alexander Selkirk, who went ashore on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez in 1704, and remained there until he was rescued in 1709. Crusoe runs away to sea (as Selkirk had done) and after a number of adventures is wrecked on an uninhabited island, where he remains for 20 years. Defoe describes the industrious and methodical way in which he builds up a life for himself, how he is endangered by the periodic visits of a race of cannibals, how he tames one of them into an ideal servant, Man Friday. The island is eventually visited by a ship in the hands of mutinous sailors; he subdues the mutineers and rescues the officers, who take him back to England, leaving the repentant mutineers behind as a colony, together with some Spaniards whom he had previously rescued from the cannibals.

In The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, published in the same year, Crusoe revisits the colony and relates its fortunes; he also travels elsewhere, visits China, and returns to England across Siberia and Russia. The third part, The Serious Reflections of Robinson Crusoe (1720), consists of moral essays in which Defoe represents the book as an > allegory of his own life. This was partly a defence against the disapproval of his fellow Puritans who regarded fiction as hardly distinguishable from lies; on the other hand, Defoe's tale is certainly an image of the loneliness and arduousness of the life of individual economic enterprise which was becoming increasingly typical of society; Crusoe is made to say that he has been more lonely since his return to London than he ever was on his island.

Modern critics have noticed how Crusoe sees human beings merely in terms of their economic virtues. The book has always been praised for its detailed verisimilitude, which eaused it to be received at first as an authentic account; the descriptions are almost entirely in terms of what the philosopher > John Loeke had distinguished as the objectively discernible 'primary qualities' (> Essay concerning human understanding) as opposed to the subjectively experienced 'secondary qualities' (colour, beauty, ete.) which it is difficult to verify. The style of the writing is extremely plain, in keeping with the principles that Thomas Sprat had laid down for the > Royal Society in 1667 (History of the Royal Society): 'the language of Artisans, Countrymen, and Merchants'. That Crusoe appears much less religious than Defoe intends is also often remarked; on the other hand, if there is a principle of unity in the long, episodie narrative, it is the function of God as the basic Providence, subjecting chaos so that man may use his constructive virtues for the building of an orderly world.

Robinson, Henry Crabb (1775–1867)

where he met ▷ Goethe and Schiller. He was one of the first foreign ▷ newspaper correspondents, becoming foreign editor of The Times. In later life he practised as a barrister, and helped found the Athenaeum Club and on ▷ William Blake, ▷ William Wordsworth, ▷ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, ▷ Charles Lamb and ▷ William Hazlitt. They were partly published in 1869, and since then further selections have appeared.

Robinson, Mary (1758-1800)

Novelist, poet and aetress. Although Mary Robinson is now known for her ➤ Gothic novels, during her lifetime she was infamous for her affair with the Prince of Wales. He saw her act the role of Perdita in 1779 and fell in love with her. The relationship lasted just over a year, leaving Robinson the butt of erude satire and with the lasting nickname 'Perdita'. In 1783 she became paralysed from the waist down after a misearriage and from then on she was forced to earn her living by writing. Her poetry was never very original, picking up populist sentiment in relation to current events, such as the storming of the Bastille, and when her eollection Lyrical Tales (1800) was published, Wordsworth eonsidered changing the title of his own work. In eomparison her novels are sharp and witty, tinged with liberal sentiment; they include Vancenza (1792), Angelina (1795) and Hubert de Sevrac (1796). Roche, Regina Maria (1764–1845) Novelist. Prolific Irish novelist, Roche wrote sentimental tales about the injustices done to her various protagonists and their families.

The tone, however, was predietably ▷ Gothie, and she became one of the stalwarts of the ▷ Minerva Press. Her novels include The Vicar of Lansdowne, or Country Quarters (1789), The Children of the Abbey (1796) and Clermont (1798). This last work was satirized by ▷ Jane Austen in ▷ Northanger Abbey.

Rochester, John Wilmot, Second Earl of (1647-80)

Poet and libertine. His father had been ennobled by ▷ Charles II for his support during his exile and he enjoyed a privileged position at the Restoration court, being more than once banished (and later pardoned) for his unruly behaviour and verses. His reputation among his contemporaries can be gauged from the portrait of the elegant and witty Dorimant in > Sir George Etherege's > The Man of Mode (1676) which is based on the poet. He showed conspicuous courage in battle during seaengagements with the Dutch. Later, however, he was suspected of acting less honourably in having > John Dryden set upon in an alley, believing him to be the author of an anonymous satire in a poem by the Earl of Mulgrave. Roehester's motive for refusing to fight a duel with Mulgrave is unclear. It is unlikely to have been the simple lack of eourage which his enemies attributed to him at the time, though he did recommend cowardice in his poetry.

Rochester's combination of aristocracy and rigorous intellectual honesty set him at odds with the emergent bourgeois ethos of the time. He followed ➤ Hobbes and the ancient philosophers ➤ Lucretius and ➤ Seneca in consistent philosophical materialism. He was a Deist who believed that God, if He existed, could take no interest in petty human affairs, that there was no life after death and that the soul was merely a function of matter. His translation of lines from ➤ Seneca's Troades dismisses Hell and the afterlife as 'senselesse Storyes, idle Tales/Dreames, Whimseys, and noe more.'

Also he wrote freely about sexual intimacy, both in its pleasurable and disgusting aspects, flouting bourgeois prudery and linguistic eensorship. There is sometimes a trivial, unpleasant tone to his writing in this vein, for example in Signior Dildo and the Chloris lyrics. But his obscenity is more often psychologically profound and philosophically disturbing, as in A Ramble in St James' Park and The Imperfect Enjoyment. Moreover, as an aristocrat, he was contemptuous of the proprietorial sexism of the new bourgeoisie. His friend > Gilbert Burnet, later bishop of Salisbury, showed the orthodox attitude when he argued that Roehester's libertinism amounted to 'theft' by one man from another: 'men have a property in their wives and daughters, so that to defile the one, or corrupt the other, is an unjust and injurious thing'. In contrast, though Rochester could scarcely be called ▶ feminist, his ambiguous satire on the Earl of Mulgrave, A Very Heroical Epistle in Answer to Ephelia, shows an insight into what we would now call male chauvinism, which is most unusual for the period.

Rochester's Puritan mother and his friend Burnet refused access to his libertine friends as he lay dying of syphilis, and apparently persuaded him to turn to orthodox religion. After the poet's death Burnet published Some Passages of the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester (1680), and over the next, twoand-a-half centuries Rochester's poetry (much of it suppressed) was overshadowed by the edifying legend of the atheist's death-bed repentance. The argument over whether he 'really' repented as he lay in his syphilitic delirium is, however, irrelevant to his poetry, all of which is consistently ➤ materialist and libertine. The pious poems attributed to his last days are not by him and lack the quality of his genuine work.

His poetry is diverse, reflecting the social and cultural transitions of his time. He wrote some exquisite lyrics in the 'cavalier' tradition, including the movingly philosophical carpe diem poem 'All my past life is mine noe more' (sometimes called Love and Life). Much of his best work, however, is in the new medium of heroic > couplets, a form which he uses, in such poems as A Satyr against Reason and Mankind, Timon, and Tunbridge Wells, with a conversational ease and freedom much admired and imitated by later ➤ Augustans. His An Allusion to Horace, the Tenth Satyr of the First Book is the first example of the characteristically Augustan genre of the 'imitation', also adopted about this time by > John Oldham. Roderick Random, The Adventures of (1748) A novel by > Tobias Smollett. It is based on Smollett's own experience as a naval doctor at the siege of Cartagena in 1741; it is episodic in form, and vivid but somewhat brutal in manner. In the Preface, the author pays tribute to the comic genius of > Cervantes, author of > Don Quixote.

Rogers, Samuel (1763-1855)

Poet. The wealthy son of a banker from Stoke Newington, he wrote an Ode to Superstition (1786) and the popular reflective poem, The Pleasures of Memory (1792). Columbus, a fragment of an > epic, appeared in 1810, and a narrative poem, Jacqueline, was published together with > Lord Byron's Lara in 1814.

He was offered the ▶ Poet Laureateship on the death of > William Wordsworth in 1850, but declined. He has been referred to as 'the last ⊳ Augustan'.

Roland

Hero of the Old French chanson de geste, the Chanson de Roland, dating from the first half of the 12th century, an epic account of the battle between the rearguard of ➤ Charlemagne's army, led by his nephew Roland, and the large Saracen forces who ambush the rearguard in the valley of Roncevaux. The ambush is arranged with the treacherous connivance of Roland's stepfather, Ganelon. Roland takes up the challenge to fight against the odds and refuses to summon help from Charlemagne, as his companion, Oliver, advises. When many of the French side have been slaughtered, Roland finally summons Charlemagne's aid. The French king returns to find his rearguard massacred but goes on to rout the pagan army and avenge his nephew's death. The narrative is structured around a series of binary oppositions, the most obvious being that between the forces of the west and east, between righteous Christians and sinful pagans. Yet within that clear-cut antagonism, the heroic ethos of the narrative is made more complex, not only by Ganelon's perfidy, but by the juxtaposition of Roland and Oliver's response to the prospect of fighting against the odds: the necessary rashness which constitutes heroism is contrasted with a more pragmatic response to the prospect of a hopeless, if glorious, battle. The earliest extant copy of the text was copied in England (1125-50). Roland is the hero of ➤ Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and > Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. Bib: Savers, D. Rolle, Richard (1300-49)

One of the most prolific of the English mystical writers, who lived as a hermit in Yorkshire and became a spiritual advisor to a group of nuns at Hampole. He composed devotional works in Latin, and his English work includes a commentary of the Psalter, meditations on the Passion and a guide to the spiritual life, The Form of Living, written for a single recluse but circulated more widely. His prose style makes frequent use of alliteration. Although never canonized, he was widely regarded as a saint until the time of the Reformation. Bib: Allen, H. Roman à these/Tendenzroman

A novel which is dominated by its treatment of a particular issue (French 'these' = proposition, argument; German 'Tendenz' = tendency, trend). Frequently this involves an attack on a particular social injustice. The > social problem novels of the 1840s in England are examples of the roman à these.

Roman Actor, The (1626)

A bloody ▶ tragedy by ▶ Philip Massinger set at the time of the emperor Domitian. The play dramatizes Domitian's marriage to the resourceful Domitia, whose husband he has executed. During a play-within-the-play he kills the actor Paris with whom she has fallen in love, which leads to her conspiring against him and his assassination.

Roman de la Rose

An immensely influential French ▷ dreamvision narrative, composed during the 13th century. The first 4,058 lines of the poem were written by Guillaume de Lorris, c 1237; the remaining 17,622 lines were a later addition of Jean de Meun (le Clopinel), c 1277. The whole narrative is framed as an allegorical account of a love affair, reported as a dream-vision experience by the narrator/lover. Guillaume de Lorris' section provides an exemplary account of the protocol of loving, from the viewpoint of a male lover who courts the object of his desire, a beautiful Rosebud, in the garden of Love, presided over by Mirth. The love garden is the arena of courtly society itself; the dreamer, appropriately, is ushered in by Oiseuse (Leisure), for leisure is a necessary prerequisite for the refined courting which goes on in the garden, as is Richesse; Poverty and Old Age figure among the undesirable qualities kept out by the garden wall. The desired woman is represented as an object to be plucked, but aspects of her response to the lover's advances are represented in a series of personified figures (including Fair Welcoming, Shame and Danger) which surround the Rose, just as some aspects of the Lover, notably Reason, are figured in personified forms. Guillaume's poem ends, unfinished, with the lover in an impasse, having only kissed the Rose which now is protected in a castle by Jealousy. As it stands, the poem provides a manual of the art of > courtly loving in a narrative form, and this dreamscape and mode of working out love's protocol through an allegorical narrative were imitated and reworked in many courtly love poems in French, and in English too (including Chaucer's dream-vision poems).

Jean de Meun's continuation remains set within the garden but substantially expands the subject of the narrative, and its philosophical and moral dimensions. The expansion comes in the form of a new cast of personified figures (including a Friend, an Old Woman, Nature and Genius her priest) who step in to advise, and assist, or to educate the Lover. The precious and rarified atmosphere of the garden is subverted, as the Lover's desire is subjected to a rigorous appraisal by Reason (who assumes a far larger role in the action), and made into a much more pragmatic quest for satisfaction, through the intervention of the Friend and the Old Woman (who brings a temporal perspective to the action which Guillaume de Lorris deliberately excluded). Rather than being a delicate embodiment of love theory in practice, the narrative beomes an arena for large-scale debates about social organization in theory and in practice, including what part sexual desire has to play in society and how it is being abused. In the end the Lover gets the chance to pluck his Rose and the narrative concludes with a barely disguised description of a sexual assault. Jean de Meun's section of the poem provides a different kind of cultural handbook: it subverts the 'givens' in the structure of Guillaume's love garden and embarks on a broader, more intellectual and philosophical discussion, which considers different kinds of loving (including divine love), but it does so through dramatized debates and monologues. It provides an example of how the clash of opposing ideas can be given dramatic expression but not necessarily a resolution (a point which seems to have profoundly influenced the construction of much of Chaucer's narrative

The poem as a whole was immensely influential throughout the 14th, 15th and even the 16th centuries. It provoked controversy as well as literary imitation and was the subject of a public debate in France at the end of the 14th century in which Christine de Pisan was a leading figure (who objected to its misogynistic polemic and its blatant representation of a sexual attack). Chaucer translated the poem into English but his relationship to the extant Middle English translation (> The Romaunt of the Rose) is not clear. There are three extant fragments (two translating sections from Guillaume's section, the third an excerpt from Jean de Meun's) and most critics seem to accept that fragment A (covering the first 1,700 lines of the poem) is Chaucer's work. Roman feuilleton

A novel published in serial form in a newspaper.

Roman-à-clef

A novel which describes real people and events, but using invented names, so that it can be decoded using a key (French, 'clef'). Examples are ▷ Peacock's Nightmare Abbey (1818), which contains caricatures of Shelley, Byron and Coleridge, and ▷ Aldous Huxley's Point Counter Point, which includes characters based on ▷ Middleton Murry and ▷ D.H. Lawrence. Since novelists very frequently base their characters to some extent on real people, the boundaries of the form are not clearly defined, although some authors have actually published a key.

Romance

The term romance is derived from the Latin word romanice, meaning 'in the Romance language' and is used, somewhat confusingly, in a range of literary senses, of which at least five can usefully be distinguished, although they are historically related in various ways: I Medieval romances, such as• > Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, were verse narratives on courtly and chivalric subjects, in most cases based on legends and stories about the courts of King Arthur and the Emperor Charlemagne or classical tales of heroism. Many were translations or versions of French originals. Generically and historically distinct from the novel, they nevertheless, as extended fictional narratives, can be seen as one of its antecedents. Chivalric romance made a major contribution to the novel via > Don Quixote, partly a satire on the form.

2 Prose romances became common in English from the 15th century and flourished in the Elizabethan era; for example ▷ Thomas Lodge's Rosalynde, Euphues Golden Legacy (1590) and ▷ Mary Wroth's Urania. These tend to be notable for elegance of style, elaborate description and intellectual discussions rather than plot interest, but ▷ picaresque romances, such as ▷ Thomas Nashe's ▷ The Unfortunate Traveller have stronger links to the novel.

3 17th-century French romances, or romans de longue haleine (literally, 'romances of long breath'; ie sustained romances), such as ▷ Madeleine de Scudéry's ten-volume Artamène, or the Great Cyrus, were interminable episodic narratives of love and honour; they were part of the literary context out of which the French novel emerged (▷ Marie-Madeleine de La Fayette), and a form with which English novelists of the 18th century, such as ▷ Samuel Richardson and ▷ Clara Reeve, were given to contrasting with their own works.

4 The term romance has continued to be applied, regularly though not systematically, to novels involving fantastic or supernatural events, such as the ▷ Gothic novel, and to adventure novels, such as the historical romances of ▷ Sir Walter Scott, ▷ Robert Louis Stevenson's Kidnapped or the novel simply entitled Romance, by ▷ Joseph Conrad and ▷ Ford Madox Ford.

> H.G. Wells called his science fiction novels 'scientific romances', and science fiction is one of the contemporary inheritors of this tradition of writing.

5 In post-war fiction, romances, more often termed romantic fiction, are novels about love, sex and adventure, written for a mass market and in many cases aimed particularly at women readers. This form of writing has traditionally been given a low valuation by literary critics, but some feminist critics have sought to revise this (see Modleski, T., Loving with a Vengeance: Mass-Produced Fantasies for Women; Elam, D., Romancing the Postmodern).

> Romanticism.

Romances of Shakespeare

A term often used to express the character of four of the last plays by Shakespeare: > Pericles (1608-9); > Cymbeline (1609-10); > The Winter's Tale (1610-11); > The Tempest (1611).

The following are some of the qualities that distinguish these plays:

I Extravagance of incident. Shakespeare abandons the comparatively realistic presentation characteristic of his tragic period, 1604–8. Events are extraordinary, and in Pericles and The Winter's Tale they are widespread in place and time; in Pericles and Cymbeline they are loosely related in plot. In Cymbeline and The Winter's Tale there is no consistency of period, and classical history mingles with 16th-century social settings. In The Tempest Shakespeare makes a freer use of magic than in any of his other plays, but in its strict unity of time and place this play is otherwise in contrast to the other three plays of the group.

2 Although The Tempest is again here to some extent a contrast to the others, the group belongs to a category known as > 'tragicomedy'; that is to say Pericles, Cymbeline and The Winter's Tale each deepen into tragedy, which reaches a climax midway in the story, and then lighten towards a happy conclusion. The Tempest is different in that the tragedy has all taken place before the play has begun; the whole play is thus devoted to restoring happiness out of tragedy already accomplished.

3 In each play the theme concerns an ordeal undergone by the main character; in this respect, however, the plays show a progression. Pericles does no wrong; he is a passive sufferer, with no power of his own to relieve his suffering. Cymbeline commits errors, and the tragedy arises from them, but he is not called on to act in order that the errors shall be redeemed. In The Winter's Tale Leontes' error amounts to a terrible crime, and this has to be expiated by a long period of unremitting repentance. Prospero, in The Tempest, has committed no error beyond severing himself from his worldly responsibilities; he is a powerful and virtuous man who could wreak vengeance on his enemies but chooses instead to reconcile himself to them by acts of godlike mercy.

4 In the first three plays, the ordeal of the hero is characterized by the loss of his family, and in each of them it is a daughter who is chiefly instrumental in bringing about the reunion which constitutes the happy ending. The Tempest is again somewhat different from the others. Here father and daughter remain together, but they are both cast off from the rest of the world; it is again the daughter who is instrumental in the final reunion.

In the romances the imaginative emphasis is on reconciliation. Prospero's statement in The Tempest that 'the rarer action is/In virtue than in vengeance' epitomizes the distance Shakespeare has travelled since ➤ Hamlet and the other tragedies, all of which are to some extent reworked in the late plays.

Roman-fleuve

A sequence of novels in which some of the same characters reappear, and in which the plot of each novel continues or complements that of others in the sequence. Well-known examples are ➤ Balzac's The Human Comedy and ➤ Galsworthy's The Forsyte Saga (1922); the latter, since it is about a family, could also be termed a saga novel.

Romeo and Juliet (1597)

A romantic ▷ tragedy by ▷ Shakespeare. It was published in > quarto in a corrupt form in 1597, and in a better edition in 1599. The story is an old one; Shakespeare's version is based on the poem Romeus and Juliet (1562) by Arthur Brooke, itself based on a French version of an Italian tale by Bandello (1554). The story is of the romantic love of Romeo, belonging to the family of Montague, and Juliet, of the Capulet family, both living in the Italian city of Verona. The affair has to be kept secret owing to the bitter hostility of the two families, and only Juliet's nurse and Friar Laurence, who marries them, know of it. Even so the affair is not allowed to continue peacefully; Juliet's cousin Tybalt provokes an affray that leads not only to his own death but to that of Mercutio, friend of Romeo and relative of the Prince of Verona, with the result that Romeo is exiled from the city. Moreover, Juliet's father, in ignorance of his daughter's secret marriage, proposes to marry her off in haste to a young nobleman, Paris. To enable her to escape this, Friar Laurence gives Juliet a potion that sends her into a profound sleep and causes her family to suppose her dead; the Friar's design is that she shall be placed in the family burial vault, and that meanwhile a message is to be sent to Romeo directing him to come by night and steal her away. However, by an accident the message is not sent, and Romeo hears only of her death; he returns to Verona, but only to take poison and die by her side. A moment later, the effect of the potion wears off and Juliet recovers; she sees her lover dead beside her, and kills herself in turn.

The play is one of Shakespeare's early masterpieces, and is famous for its exquisite poetry and the dramatic excellence of some of its scenes (eg II. i where the lovers declare their love to each other in the 'balcony scene'), and of three of its characters, namely Juliet, her nurse, and Romeo's friend Mercutio. It is not, however, a tragedy in the sense in which we understand the term 'Shakespearian tragedy', in regard to the plays written after 1600. In these plays, tragedy is the outcome of the nature and situation of the central character (eg > Othello), whereas in Romeo and Juliet the unhappy ending is more the result of accident - notably the failure to send the message to Romeo. On the other hand, it is possible that the usual response to the play is more sentimental than Shakespeare intended: Brooke's poem is puritanical and reproves the lovers for their passion; Shakespeare presents them sympathetically, but there are signs eg the Friar's soliloquy opening II. iii - that he intended the passion to be regarded as a misfortune in itself. Whatever one's views on this, the excellence of the play arises above all from the actuality with which Shakespeare presents Juliet: the tradition of courtly romance is brought, as in ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Troilus and Criseyde, closely into relationship with real life.

Romola (1863)

A historical novel by ▷ George Eliot, serialized in > Cornhill Magazine (1862-3). It is set in late-15th-century Florence at the time of the predominance of the reforming monk > Savonarola. Romola is a high-minded girl who marries a self-indulgent and unscrupulous Greek, Tito Melma. Repelled by her husband and disillusioned by the course of Savonarola's career, she eventually finds her salvation in self-denial. In writing the novel, George Eliot was putting forward the principle that it is as important to actualize the society in which the characters move as to give reality to the characters themselves. The novel has been praised for the thoroughness of research which established the Florentine scene; on the other hand, by comparison with the later novels (▷ Middlemarch and ▷ Daniel Deronda) set in England, modern readers feel that medieval Florence did not touch the author in the sense that she participated imaginatively in its life, with the result that of all her novels, Romola is probably the least read.

Rondeau

A form of short poem originated in 16th-century France. It consisted of 13 eight- or ten-syllable lines, divided into stanzas of unequal length, with the addition of short refrains, and only two rhymes throughout. The form was little used in England until the late 19th century when a taste developed for the more artificial forms of short poem among poets like > Swinburne eg his Century of Roundels.

Rondel

A form of short poem similar to the rondeau, but consisting of 14 lines instead of 13, and with a somewhat different rhyme scheme. It was not much used in English until the end of the 19th century in the work of such poets as \triangleright Bridges, Dobson and Henley. It originated in France in the 14th century.

Roper, Margaret More (1505-44) Margaret Roper, the daughter of ➤ Thomas More, became renowned in England for her learning. As a member of More's household, her education was of great importance, indeed she was perhaps the intellectual star of what has been sometimes termed the 'School of More', which included More's children, wards, relatives and friends. In a letter written in 1521, > Erasmus records that it was the education and intellectual capacities of Margaret Roper that convinced him of the value of education for women in general. Indeed, Margaret Roper may well have formed the basis for Erasmus' sympathetic portrait of the learned woman in one of his Colloquies. Many of Margaret Roper's works are now lost, but what is known of her is derived mainly from the letters she and her father exchanged while he was in prison prior to his execution, and from her husband's account of More's life, which is also an account of his wife. Her major surviving published work is her > translation of Erasmus' commentary on The Lord's Prayer, which was published (though its translator was not acknowledged) as A Devout Treatise Upon the 'Pater Noster', probably in 1524. Her daughter, > Mary Basset, was also a learned translator. Bib: McCutcheon, E., 'Margaret More Roper: The Learned Woman in Tudor England', Women Writers of the Renaissance and Reformation (ed.)

Rosenberg, Isaac (1890-1918)

Poet. He was born in Bristol, and educated at an elementary school in London. He then became apprenticed to an engraver, and entered the Slade School of Art in 1911. He joined the army in 1915, serving as a private soldier, and was killed in action. He was the most original of all the 'War poets'. His work is full of rhythmic energy, less sombre than > Wilfred Owen's, and bolder in imagery. Owen reacted with indignation and compassion against the war; in the Preface to his poems he wrote: 'Above all I am not concerned with Poetry. My subject is War, and the pity of War. The Poetry is in the pity.' Rosenberg wrote in a letter (1916): 'I will not leave a corner of my consciousness covered up but saturate myself with the strange and extraordinary new conditions of this life, and it will all refine itself into poetry later on.' Works include: Night and Day (1912); Youth (1915); Poems (ed. G. Bottomley, with a Memoir by L. Binyon; 1922). Collected Poems (ed. G. Bottomley and D. Harding, 1937). Rosenberg's definitive Collected Works appeared in 1979.

Rosicrucianism

A system of philosophical and mystical beliefs professed by an organization known as the Ancient Mystic Order of Rosa Crucis (the 'red cross'). Its origins are obscure; it is first' mentioned in 1614. Part of its doctrine has consisted in the belief that the universe contains a hierarchy of spirits governing the various elements. > Pope, in his second version of > The Rape of the Lock, used this system for Satirical purposes; he needed for his mock epic a supernatural system comparable to the ancient Greek gods and goddesses of ▶ Homer's > Iliad, but adapted, as they would not be, to the pettiness of his theme. He used the Rosicrucian system because it provided spirits of all degrees of importance.

Ross, Mrs (fl 1811-25)

Novelist and writer of short stories. Published by ➤ Minerva among others, Mrs Ross is one of few prose writers to balance rationalism and ➤ Romanticism, 'sense and sensibility' as it were, and combine them with relatively direct descriptions of sexuality. Her plots and characters are ingenious and she clearly expects her readers fully to appreciate her novels' tough moral conclusions. Her work includes: The Cousins, or A Woman's Promise and A Lover's Vow (1811), The Balance of Comfort, or The Old Maid and Married Woman (1817), and The Woman of Genius (1821).

Rossetti, Christina (1830-94)

Poet, younger sister of ➤ Dante Gabriel and William Michael Rossetti. Her father, Gabriele, was an Italian patriot who came to England in 1824, her mother Frances Polidori was half-English and a former ⊳ governess. Italian influence, particularly that of Dante, is noticeable in much of Rossetti's work. She was educated largely at home, her first poetry being published privately when she was twelve. Five poems appeared under the ⊳ pseudonym Ellen Alleyne in the ➤ Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood's journal The Germ (1850). She broke off an engagement to the painter James Collinson when he joined the > Catholic Church in 1850, for she was a devout High Anglican, much influenced by the ▷ Oxford Movement. Although she was high-spirited as a child, she became increasingly reclusive and was plagued by illness, contracting Grave's disease in 1873.

Rossetti's best-known poem today is the sensual and complex ▷ 'Goblin Market', published with other poems in 1862. ▷ The Prince's Progress, and Other Poems appeared in 1866; > Sing Song, A Nursery Rhyme Book in 1872 and > A Pageant, and Other Poems in 1881. She also wrote religious prose works such as Seek and Find (1879); Called to be Saints (1881); and The Face of the Deep (1892). Her poetry often dwells on loss, renunciation and death, yet she is not limited to these subjects. The work ranges from fantasy verses to lyrics, → ballads, → nonsense poems, devotional verse and sonnets, including the 'Monna Innominata' series (1881). The 'simple surface' of the poetry often conceals the complications beneath: Rossetti's best work engages profoundly with epistemological, spiritual and psychic concerns. Her work has suffered from reductive interpretations, but she is increasingly being reconsidered as a major Victorian poet. Bib: Crump, R. Rossetti, Dante Gabriel (1828-82)

Poet and painter; the son of an Italian political refugee and a half-English mother. In 1848 he started the > Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood with a number of fellow-painters, but the inspiration of his painting, as of his poetry, was essentially literary. The poetry is a continuation of the English > Romantic movement, particularly the work of John Keats (1795-1821), inasmuch as its central impulse is the sensuous response to beauty. Another main inspiration for Rossetti and the Pre-Raphaelites was the direct appeal of detail in ▶ medieval painting. Rossetti also inherited, however, the feeling for the mysteriousness of the Middle Ages which both he and Keats shared with the taste for 'Gothic' which was an aspect of Romanticism at the beginning of the century. In addition, he inherited some of the feeling for > aestheticism in sanctity which had been part of the ➤ Oxford Movement in the Church of England during the 1830s and 40s. The triumph of English industrialism, with its admiration for technology, tended to disregard values which were not practical ones. Thus poets like Rossetti were tempted to use their poetry as a dream world of refuge from external squalor and commercial struggle and this led to a self-regarding nostalgia. This meant that fields of inspiration such as the Middle Ages and religion are not so much expressed in their own vitality as used as a defence against other, objectionable realities; Rossetti is accused of being 'religiose' rather than 'religious', and of having falsified the past. On the other hand, Rossetti's poetry, within these limitations, is sumptuous and melodious. He was at first much better known for his paintings, but his poem 'The Blessed Damozel' was published in the Pre-Raphaelite journal ▷ The Germ in 1850. Later came his translations from Dante, The Early Italian Poets (1861); Poems by D.G. Rossetti (1870); and Ballads and Sonnets (1881), including a sonnet sequence, The House of Life, which was expanded from a version in the 1870 volume, and is sometimes called his masterpiece.

Round Table, The

The Round Table is first mentioned in ➤ Wace's Roman de Brut (1155), where it is described briefly as a construction devised by ▷ King Arthur, to pre-empt rivalry for a place at the hall table among members of his fast-expanding entourage. ➤ La3amon amplifies the story of how a marvellous table was introduced to Arthur's hall: after a riot breaks out at one of Arthur's feasts, a witty Cornish woodworker devises a table which can be expanded to accommodate any number of guests (it is not specifically round). In later Arthurian narrative, the Round Table frequently provides a way of demarcating the elite members of Arthur's court (as the Knights of the Round Table) but the significance and size of the table itself may vary considerably: it is not a fixed artefact by any means.

In the Christianized version of the ▷ Grail legend (first formulated by ▷ Robert de Boron), the Round Table is invested with a mystical significance, as a successor to the earlier Holy Tables of the Last Supper and the Grail Table (of Joseph of Arimathea). Its round shape is symbolic of the universe, and one place at the Table is reserved only for the knight who will achieve the Grail quest (known as the 'Perilous Seat'). ▷ Merlin constructs this Table for ▷ Uther, who passes it on to ▷ Guinevere's father; Arthur receives it as part of Guinevere's dowry.

In ➤ Malory's version of Arthurian narrative, the Table (Guinevere's dowry) can accommodate up to 150 knights, and it becomes symbolic of the chivalric ethos itself, and Arthur outlines the rules for its members in the first tale of Malory's Morte D'Arthur. The import of its round shape is later explained by ➤ Perceval's Aunt in the course of the Grail Quest but it is not identified as a successor to the Grail Table, which is made of silver and found in ➤ Pelles' castle.

The Round Table still preserved at Winchester, though identified by ➤ John Hardyng in his Chronicle as the Round Table, is a manufactured relic: it was built some time around the mid-13th century and repainted sometime in the mid-16th century. It is largely responsible for the popular modern notion of the Round Table as one which has a strictly fixed number of places. It is, however, just one of the many shapes which the Round Table assumes in medieval Arthurian narratives.

Roundel

Description Chaucer seems to have been the first English poet to compose roundels in imitation of the French Description. Roundels have a varying number of lines (8–14), but use only two rhymes. The opening line recurs as the refrain. The bird song at the end of the Description. Parliament of Foulys is in the form of a roundel.

Roundheads

A name for Puritan supporters of the Parliamentary party in the ▷ Civil Wars of 1642-51. They were so called because they habitually cut their hair close to their heads, whereas the Royalists (▷ Cavaliers) wore their hair ornamentally long. This Cavalier habit was regarded by the Puritans as a symptom of worldliness. The word has been traced back to 1641, when a Cavalier officer was quoted as declaring that he would 'cut the throats of those round-headed dogs that bawled against bishops'. Earlier than this, a ▷ pamphlet against long hair was published under the title of 'The unloveliness of lovelocks'.

Rousseau, Jean-Jacques (1712-78) French-Swiss thinker. His chief works were: Discourse on the Influence of Learning and Art (1750), in which he argues that progress in these has not improved human morals; Discourse on Inequality (1754), in which society is considered to have spoilt the liberty and virtue natural to primitive peoples; a novel, The New Héloïse (1761), in which the return to primitive nature is considered in relation to the relationships of the sexes and the family; > The Social Contract (1761), a political treatise with the theme that the basis of society is artificial, not binding on individuals when society ceases to serve their interests; Emile (1762), advocating education through the evocation of the natural impulses and interests of the child, and the Confessions, an autobiography which was selfrevealing without precedent, published after his death.

Rousseau was immensely influential, not only in France but throughout Europe. His praise of nature and protests against society were significant contributions to the creation of a revolutionary state of mind, culminating in the > French Revolution of 1789. Education from nature, his conception of nature as a life-giving force, was of great importance in the background of Wordsworth, and through Wordsworth, of much of English 19th-century imaginative thinking, and linked with his devotion to nature was his equally influential reverence for childhood. As an autobiographer, Rousseau was one of the first to base the importance of individual experience on its uniqueness, not on its moral excellence or intellectual attainment. This was quite contrary to the characteristic 18th-century view, expressed in works like Samuel Johnson's ➤ Rasselas, in which the valuable experience was conceived to be only that which was true of and for humanity at large.

Rover, The (1679)

Comedy by ➤ Aphra Behn, reworked from ➤ Thomas Killigrew's play Thomaso (1663–4). The play concerns four cavaliers, exiled in the cause of the future > Charles II, and the women whom they meet during a sojourn in Naples. Penniless Willmore (the Rover) is accompanied by the English Colonel Belville, his friend Frederick, and an English country gentleman called Blunt. Hellena, a 'gay young woman design'd for a Nun', is determined to avoid her fate and find a husband, while her sister Florinda is equally determined to avoid marrying the man intended for her by her brother. She has fallen in love with Belville, while Hellena, attending a carnival in disguise with her sister and two other women, falls in love with Willmore. He, however, is attracted by the wealthy and beautiful courtesan Angelica Bianca, and determines to gain her services without payment. Hellena pursues him, at one time disguised as a boy, while he woos Angelica Bianca, whom he eventually manages to bed. No sooner has this happened than he loses interest in her, while she is now painfully in love with him. She plans to kill him, but at the last moment is interrupted, and then finds herself unable to pull the trigger. Willmore marries the wealthy and virtuous Hellena, while Florinda, after a series of incidents, is united with Belville. Frederick marries Florinda's and Hellena's kinswoman Valeria, and the foolish Blunt, after being deceived and robbed by the prostitute Lucetta, remains unattached. The play takes place at carnival time, and there are colourful scenes of dancing and singing, > wit and clowning. But the anguished character of Angelica Bianca adds a solemn note to the action, which also contains some ugly episodes, as when the enraged Blunt attempts to revenge himself for Lucetta's perfidy by raping Florinda. The other men join him, and only the appearance of Valeria saves her. The play achieved great success, and remained popular until late in the 18th century. It generated a sequel, The Rover, Part II, and some imitations, including → John Kemble's Love in Many Masks (1760).

Rowe, Elizabeth (Singer) (1674–1737) English poet and journalist from Somerset where her father had settled after being imprisoned for religious Nonconformity. Of Dissenting religious principles, she began to publish, and the Thynnes became her patrons (▶ Frances Seymour, Countess of Hertford). Her Poems on Several Occasions (1696) contains several different kinds of poetry. In her preface she writes that male writers have the traditions of writing, and try to 'Monopolize Sence too' so that not 'so much as Wit should be allowed us'. She sees such assertion as 'Violations of the liberties of Free-born English women' language which recalls the radical political associations of Nonconformist religion with the English ➤ Civil War (1642–6) and (1648–51). She married the writer Thomas Rowe (1710), and after his death in 1715 she lived in Frome, Somerset, working as a teacher. Religion became her topic in the Friendship in Death (1728) - letters from the dead to the living. More letters followed, Letters Moral and Entertaining (1729-33) and the verse History of Joseph (1736). ➤ Scott, Mary (Taylor)

Rowe, Nicholas (1674-1718)

Poet and dramatist, known today chiefly for his so-called > 'she-tragedies', in which the distresses of female victims are displayed, and for his edition of Shakespeare (> Shakespeare, editions). Rowe was initially a barrister in the Middle Temple, but gave this up for the > theatre when his father died leaving him an inheritance, in 1692. He became in due course a friend to ➤ Pope and ➤ Addison. Rowe's ▶ blank-verse tragedy The Ambitious Stepmother was staged successfully at ➤ Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1700, with ▷ Betterton, ▷ Barry and ▷ Bracegirdle in the cast. His Tamerlane (1702), a tragedy whose figures of Tamerlane and Bajazet were modelled on those of ➤ William III and Louis XIV, became a stock play. The Fair Penitent (1703), based on Massinger's The Fatal Dowry followed, to great acclaim. The heroine Calista, abandoned by the 'gallant, gay Lothario', and eventually committing suicide, drew enormous sympathy from audiences; she was played first by > Elizabeth Barry and later by > Sarah Siddons. The characters formed part of ➤ Richardson's inspiration in his writing of > Clarissa (1747-8). Rowe's edition of Shakespeare (1709; reissued in 1714) is often considered the first attempt to edit Shakespeare in the modern sense, dividing the plays into acts and scenes according to fixed principles, marking actors' entrances and exits, clarifying the texts, and supplying lists of characters. > The Tragedy of Jane Shore (1714), was written 'in Imitation of Shakespeare's Style', although as Odell and others have pointed out, many would barely discover Shakespeare among the lines. Both this and The Tragedy of Lady Jane Grey (1715), continued Rowe's tradition of suffering heroines. The former, like Tamerlane and The Fair Penitent, lasted into the 19th century, and all three became well-known in translation, in France. In 1715 Rowe became ➤ Poet Laureate.

He also collaborated with ▷ Thomas Heywood and ▷ John Webster, among others, on The Witch of Edmonton (1608). Rowson, Susanna Haswell (1762-1824) British/North American novelist, dramatist, poet and essayist. Born in Portsmouth, England, she was brought to North America at the age of five. Although she returned to England periodically thereafter, because of political persecution or economic need, she became one of North America's earliest and most popular novelists. Extraordinarily diverse in her literary talents, she published ten novels, including > Victoria (1786), Charlotte, a Tale of Truth (1791), Mentoria (1791), Rebecca (1792) and Lucy Temple: a Sequel to Charlotte Temple; a dozen plays, most notably Slaves in Algiers (1794); several collections of poetry, including A Trip to Parnassas (1788); and numerous other miscellanies, including textbooks and historical accounts of famous women. Her novels combined traditional > didactic seduction plots with a more > 'feminist' treatment of women's situation. Acknowledging the power of sexuality and the dangers of women's economic dependency (especially dependency on those who prove unreliable), Rowson's fiction shows links with the later 19th-century woman's novel formula.

She pursued various other careers during her life, including actress and songwriter; but, in addition to her literary career, her role as head of the Young Ladies' Academy was her most influential position. Intellectually demanding and yet warm and caring, she is cited in numerous private journals of the era as an excellent teacher. Although her life was one of constant financial hardship, it was also notable for her extraordinary literary productivity and attention to women's lives.

Roxana, or the Fortunate Mistress (1724)
A novel by ▷ Daniel Defoe presented as a fictional ▷ autobiography. 'Roxana', the daughter of French Protestant refugees, is deserted and left destitute by her first husband, and, with a taste for the finer things in life, sees prostitution as her only lucrative profession. A second marriage to a Dutch merchant leaves her widowed, but she climbs to a state of social importance by a series of increasingly grand affairs, one of which is hinted to be with the king. As in Defoe's Defoe's Pholl Flanders, the whore repents; but the penitence of Roxana is also ambiguous, and her thoughts are haunted by the illegitimate daughter whose death is on her conscience.

Roxburghe Club

Book Club. The Roxburghe was the first book club and took its name from John Ker, third Duke of Roxburghe (1740–1804), who had acquired a vast collection of antiquarian books. When his 1471 edition of ▷ Boccaccio was sold for £2,260, a phenomenal sum in those days, several book enthusiasts celebrated the event with a dinner during which the club was initiated. Its first president was Lord Spencer of Althorp and its first secretary was his librarian, ▷ Thomas Frognall Dibdin. The Roxburghe Club continues to this day, each member financing the production of an important and unjustly neglected work.

Royal Academy of Arts

Founded with the approval of King George III in 1768 'for the purpose of cultivating and improving the arts of painting, sculpture and architecture'. The first President (P.R.A.) was a portrait painter > Sir Joshua Reynolds. Angelica Kaufmann was a founding member, although women were not permitted to study in the life classes. An elected council of 40 Royal Academicians are entitled to place R.A. after their names, and a further number of associates bear the letters A.R.A. The Royal Academy runs schools of art to which women have been admitted since 1867 and holds an annual exhibition of about 1,000 works submitted to it and approved by it; the opening is an important social occasion. The Academy is further the manager of financial trusts on behalf of artists, and organizes exhibitions of foreign artists. Until the mid-19th century the Academy included distinguished artists amongst its number, such as the landscape painter, Turner, but for the last 100 years its policy has been conservative to the point of mediocrity, so that the livelier movements of English art have occurred without its patronage. Nonetheless, apart from the ➤ Royal Society, it is the only official institution in the arts to have achieved national prestige. It has occupied its present site, Burlington House, Piccadilly, London, since 1869.

Royal Court Theatre

A theatre of this name has existed in Sloane Square since 1871. The first outstanding period of its history was between 1904 and 1907 when, under the management of J. E. Vedrenne and > Harley Granville Barker, the work of new writers such as ▷ Shaw and ▷ Galsworthy was presented, as well as works by Euripides, ▶ Ibsen, Hauptmann and Maeterlinck. Since 1956, when > John Osborne's > Look Back In Anger was performed by George Devine's company, the English Stage Company, the theatre has consistently supported the work of new writers, helping to establish, amongst others, the reputations of John Osborne, > John Arden, ➤ Edward Bond, ➤ Christopher Hampton, > Carvl Churchill, Bill Gaskill, Peter Gill and Max Stafford-Clark. Royal Martyr, The Description > Charles I, so called by his supporters in consequence of his trial and execution by the revolutionary Parliament of 1649. Charles was devout, and the Description Charles was devout, and the Description of Parliament was also that of the Puritans, and entailed the temporary overthrow of the Description of England. Charles was consequently not only regarded as a martyr for the Anglican Church, but even by some as a saint, and a few churches exist dedicated to King Charles the Martyr.

The Royal Martyr is also the subtitle of a play otherwise called Tyrannic Love (1669) by Royal Shakespeare Company The resident company at the Royal Shakespeare Theatre (formerly the Memorial Theatre) in Stratford-upon-Avon since 1960. The first general director was ➤ Peter Hall who was replaced by Trevor Nunn in 1968. Recent directors for the company include Bill Alexander, John Barton, Terry Hands, Barry Kyle and Adrian Noble now the artistic director. Although the company mainly produces > Shakespeare's plays, there is a policy of showing the work of his contemporaries and encouraging new modern writers. The company now has a second theatre in Stratford, The Swan, which contains a scaled-down imitation of an Elizabethan stage; the Other Place is used for more overtly experimental work. It also has two theatres for large- and small-scale productions in the Barbican Centre in London. Royal Society, The

Founded with the authority of ▷ Charles II in 1662; its full name was 'The Royal Society of London for Promoting Natural Knowledge'. It grew out of a philosophical society started in 1645 and was composed of 'divers worthy persons, inquisitive into natural philosophy and other parts of human learning, and particularly of what hath been called the New Philosophy or Experimental Philosophy', in other words of men whose minds were moving in the way opened up by > Francis Bacon. The Society took the whole field of knowledge for exploration: one of its aims was to encourage the virtue of intellectual lucidity in the writing of prose, and Thomas Sprat, writing the History of the Royal Society in 1667, defined the standards which writers were to emulate. The Royal Society was thus central in the culture of its time; it was promoted not only by scientists such as the chemist Boyle, but by writers as well.

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, The Verses by Omar Khayyam, a Persian scholar and poet who died in 1123. He was an outstanding mathematician and astronomer, but is still more famous for his verse epigrams written in 'rubai', ie four lines, the first, second and fourth of which have the same rhyme while the third is usually rhymeless. The rubai had been invented for the epitomizing of subtle thoughts on Islamic belief, but Omar used them to satirize religious bigotry with a free-thinking irony. This has caused him to be referred to as 'the Voltaire of the East'.

The English poet ➤ Edward FitzGerald published a translation of the Rubaiyat in 1859 (75 verses); he enlarged this to 110 verses in a new edition in 1868, and issued other versions (101 verses) in 1872 and 1879. FitzGerald emphasizes the pleasure-loving aspect of the Persian poet, and the poem was extremely popular in Victorian England both for its musicality and for its expression of a liberated way of life which contrasted with the narrow and bigoted codes of mid-Victorian respectability. The poet Robert Graves (1895–1985) also published a translation of the Rubaiyat.

Rubens, Bernice (b 1927)

Novelist. Born in Cardiff into a talented musical family, and educated at University College, Cardiff, Bernice Rubens has lived in London for many years. A prolific novelist whose work is original and exciting, she has written 19 novels to date, in the following order: Set on Edge (1960); Madame Sousatzka (1962); Mate in Three (1966); The Elected Member (1969); Sunday Best (1971); Go Tell the Lemmings (1973); I Sent a Letter to My Love (1975); The Ponsonby Post (1977); A Five Year Sentence (1978); Spring Sonata (1979); Birds of Passage (1982); Brothers (1983); Our Father (1987); Set on Edge (1987); Kingdom Come (1989); A Solitary Grief (1991); Mother Russia (1992); Autobiopsy (1993); and Yesterday in the Back Lane (1995).

Rudkin, David (1936)

British dramatist whose first major play, Afore Night Come (1962) explored mysterious dark forces affecting apparently ordinary life in the modern British countryside. This, and later plays, have been performed by the > Royal Shakespeare Company. For some years Rudkin turned his back on the stage and worked for television, his two best-known plays during this time being Children Playing (1967) and Blodwen Home from Rachel's Wedding (1969). Cries from Casement as His Bones Are Brought to Dublin (1973) and Ashes (1975) marked his return to the stage with dramatizations of events in Northern Ireland (a subject often avoided by modern British dramatists). Rudkin is clear about the political purpose behind his work: 'I believe the dramatist's function in a society to be to transmute the idiosyncracies of personal life experience into metaphors of public, political value to mankind.' Other plays include: The Sons of Light (1977); The Triumph of Death (1981); a translation of Peer Gynt (1983); The Saxon Shore (1986).

Rugby School

One of the most famous of the English Public Schools. It was founded in 1567, but its importance begins with the headmastership of > Thomas Arnold (father of the poet and critic > Matthew Arnold) from 1828 to 1842. Hitherto, the ancient Public Schools had imparted education (chiefly in the Greek and Latin languages and literatures) but without any consistent moral instruction. Rugby became a pioneer of 'character-building', which came to be regarded as the most typical quality of the English 'public school tradition'. The virtues were supposed to be those of physical and moral discipline, leadership and fair-mindedness. A large number of public schools were founded in the second half of the 10th century, and they were modelled on Arnold's ideals. Since the large Empire of which Britain was the centre required an extensive class of administrators, these ideals were eminently useful in producing them. A once-popular novel, Tom Brown's Schooldays (1857) by Thomas Hughes, describes life at Rugby under Arnold.

Ruined Cottage, The, or The Story of Margaret (1814)

A poem in ▷ blank verse by ▷ William Wordsworth, written in 1797, and included in Book I of ▷ The Excursion (1814). It tells the poignant story of a woman whose husband is driven by grinding poverty to join the army. He never returns, and eventually grief and poverty take Margaret's life. Contemplating her cottage, now derelict and overgrown, the narrator is overcome by 'the impotence of grief', and reflects on:

That secret spirit of humanity
Which 'mid the calm oblivious tendencies Of nature, 'mid her plants, and weeds, and flowers,
And silent overgrowings, still survived.

'Runaway Slave at Pilgrim's Point, The' (1850)

A poem by ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning. The speaker of the poem is a black woman slave who relates how she was torn from her lover and then raped by a white slave-owner. She bears a child, whom she murders and buries in a forest. The rage, grief and pain of the woman is chillingly conveyed in the first person narrative. The speaker cannot bear to see 'the master's look' on the child's face, yet is driven to frenzied distraction after the murder. Reconciliation is offered for the mother and child only 'In the death-dark where we may kiss and agree'. Barrett Browning's impassioned protest against slavery made a considerable impact upon her contemporaries; it is still a powerful read.

Runnymede

The place on the south bank of the Thames, where the Barons forced ▷ King John to accept ▷ Magna Carta in 1215.

Rupert, Prince (Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Bavaria) (1619–82) Son of Frederick of the Palatinate and ➤ James I's daughter Elizabeth. Rupert was an able cavalry commander on the Royalist side in the ➤ Civil Wars, and after the Restoration, an enthusiastic supporter of the ➤ Royal Society.

Rural Rides (1820-30)

Reports of rural conditions by ▶ William Cobbett. He disapproved of certain remedies proposed by an official body to the Government for agricultural distress resulting from the Napoleonic War. He decided to make a number of tours on horseback in order to find out the facts for himself, and published his impressions in his journal, the > Political Register, between 1820 and 1830, when they were collected into book form. The essays are in vivid, direct prose, full of acute comments, lively incident, and strong if prejudiced argument. They are early examples of direct journalistic reporting and are raised to permanent value as literature by the energy of Cobbett's conviction and the simplicity and vigour of his prose, which he had modelled on the writings of Jonathan Swift (1667-1745).

Rushdie, Salman (b 1947) Novelist. Born in Bombay and educated at Cambridge University, his second novel, Midnight's Children (1981) won the Booker Prize and became a best-seller. It is a voluminous work, ranging in time from World War I to 1977, and combining a realistic portrayal of poverty and suffering with magic, fantasy, farce, symbolism and ▶ allegory in a manner which associates it with ▶ magic realism. Its many narrative strategies compete with, and undermine, each other, and serve to question the relation of history to fiction; in this respect Rushdie is a postmodernist writer. In particular, narrative multiplicity functions in his work as a form of resistance to the unitary nature of > imperialist ideology and political control. He is an inventive, self-conscious and versatile writer, with a flamboyant and indulgent style. His other novels are: Grimus (1975); Shame (1983), and > The Satanic Verses (1988) which aroused worldwide controversy and criticism from Muslims for its alleged blasphemy. Following the death sentence imposed upon Rushdie by the Ayatollah Khomeini, Rushdie went into hiding in 1989, and produced his children's book (> children's books), Haroun and the Sea of Dreams in 1990. Travel writing: The Jaguar Smile: A Nicaraguan Journey (1987).

Writer on art and on its relationship with society. His central inspiration was that great art is moral and the corollary that the working men of industrial England were spiritually impoverished. Like the ▷ Pre-Raphaelites (he was a patron of ▷ D.G. Rossetti, their leader), he found the contrast to the England of his day in the freedom of individual response to environment among the medieval artists, and he expressed this view in the famous chapter called 'The Nature of Gothic' in The Stones of Venice. In the field of design, Ruskin, like ▷ William Morris, advocated a return to handicrafts and to medieval conditions of production.

The latter part of his life was much concerned with attacks on the social philosophies of political economists, such as > John Stuart Mill, to whom he did less than justice, and in endeavours to awaken the working classes to the nature of their combined artistic and moral impoverishment. He wrote his artistic books in a style of elaborate but precise and delicate eloquence but his social gospel had more concentrated and direct fervour. His puritanical mother (he was an only child) had given him a concentrated education in the Bible and though his religious views as an adult were not explicit, his conception of art as fundamentally spiritual arose out of the intensity of his early religious training. Though a supporter of the Pre-Raphaelites, Ruskin did not lean like them towards 'art for art's sake' but towards 'art for the spiritual health of man'. In his campaign against the mediocre aspects of industrial culture, he was a disciple and admirer of ➤ Thomas Carlyle but he extended Carlyle's vision of greatness and has proved to be a writer of more permanent interest.

His principal works are: Modern Painters (1843-60) in which he champions Turner, one of the greatest of English painters and at the time one of the most controversial; The Seven Lamps of Architecture (1849) leading to The Stones of Venice (1851-3) in which he makes his discovery of 'the Nature of Gothic'; this took him towards problems about the nature of civilized society in The Political Economy of Art (1857), The Two Paths (1859) and, one of his most famous books, > Unto This Last (1862). Sesame and Lilies (1865), Ethics of the Dust (1866), The Crown of Wild Olive (1866) are essays in criticism on the age, and Fors Clavigera (1871-84) is composed of 96 letters to an educated artisan in which he shows himself distrustful of liberal democracy. Praeterita (1885–9) is one of the celebrated > autobiographies in English, although it is fragmentary and incomplete. Its most famous section is the first, in which Ruskin describes his unusual, in some ways unnatural, yet fertilizing childhood.

Russell, Bertrand Arthur William, Lord (1872–1970)

Philosopher. Russell's important work on mathematical philosophy and logic is one of the foundations of 20th-century Anglo-Saxon philosophy. His most influential texts are The Principles of Mathematics (1903); Principia Mathematica (1910-13, written in collaboration with his Cambridge tutor, A. N. Whitehead); The Problems of Philosophy (1912); his epistemological works Mysticism and Logic (1918), Analysis of Mind (1921) and Human Knowledge (1948); and the accessible History of Western Philosophy (1945). As this indicates, Russell's working life was long and illustrious; he was a fringe member of the ➤ Bloomsbury Group (writing on aesthetics, and a famous sparring-partner for D. H. Lawrence). Later in life Russell was a founder member of CND. He was married to writer > Dora Russell.

Russell, Dora (1894-1986)

Feminist writer and activist. Russell's dynamic campaigning life began during and after World War I when she became committed to pacifism and socialism, causes which continued to motivate her throughout her life. In 1921 she married philosopher > Bertrand Russell, and the two worked together on socialist causes, co-wrote The Prospects of Industrial Civilization (1923), and set up a progressive school at Petersfield, which Dora Russell continued to run when her husband left her in 1932. She was central in establishing a number of important issues at the heart of the British social and political agenda throughout her long career, including the Worker's Birth Control Group in the 1920s, the Women's Caravan for Peace and the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament in the late 1950s, and the National Council for Civil Liberties. Her publications include: Hypatia, or, Women and Knowledge (1925), The Right To Be Happy (1927), and In Defence of Children (1932), The Religion of the Machine Age (1983). A good collection of her work appeared in 1984 as The Dora Russell Reader: 57 Years of Writing and Journalism. Her autobiography has been published in three volumes as The Tamarisk Tree (1977-85).

Russell, Lady Elizabeth (1528–1609)
Translator, letter-writer and poet. Lady Russell was sister to ▷ Ann Bacon and wife to ▷ Sir Thomas Hoby, themselves both learned translators. After Hoby's death, she
the supervision of her Hoby children, and her ▷ translation of John Poynet's A Way of Reconciliation of a Good and Learned Man (1605) is dedicated to her daughter. She wrote verse epitaphs, some in Greek and Latin, for her family, and corresponded with Sir William Cecil (▷ Burghley).

Russell, Lucy, Countess of Bedford (d 1627)

Together with ➤ Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke and ➤ Mary Wroth (Lady Wroth), Lucy, Countess of Bedford was one of the most important patrons of poetry in the early 17th century. However, since her husband, Edward, third Earl of Bedford, came rarely to court (he had been exiled from court for his part in the ➤ Essex rebellion and later, in 1612, suffered partial paralysis from a fall), this role was based entirely upon her own talents and upon her Harington family connections – she was the sister of ▷ Sir John Harington. Herself a poet, she was also the patron of ▷ Ben Jonson, ▷ George Chapman, ▷ Samuel Daniel and ▷ Michael Drayton. Perhaps the poet who benefited most from her interest, however, was ▷ John Donne. Donne addressed seven of his verse letters (published in 1633) to the Countess, who was godmother to Donne's second daughter, Elizabeth.

Russell, Lady Rachel (1636-1723) Letter-writer. Married at 17 to Lord Vaughan she was widowed in 1665 and left rich by the death of her father, the Earl of Southampton, in 1667. In 1669 she married William Russell, a man three years younger, in a passionate love match which became a deeply happy marriage. But Russell, a zealous Protestant (> Protestantism) and Whig got involved with a group of people who discussed rising up against the king, > Charles II, and replacing him with his illegitimate son, the Duke of Monmouth, in a conspiracy known as the > Rye House Plot. Arrested and convicted on flimsy evidence of treason, Russell was beheaded in 1683. Throughout his arraignment and trial Lady Russell supported him, collecting evidence to defend him, standing next to him in the courtroom, and appealing to the king for clemency. After her husband's death she focused her attention on restoring his reputation (a task achieved when his attainder was reversed in 1689), and seeing to her children's marriages. She remained inconsolable for her husband's death, and achieved heroic stature among her contemporaries for her fidelity and fortitude. Her letters, describing her life in detail, were published in 1773 and 1817. Bib: Fraser, A., The Weaker Vessel.

Russell, Willy (b 1947)

Dramatist. One of the most often produced contemporary dramatists, Russell's work is closely linked with Liverpool (he was born in nearby Whiston) and the Everyman Theatre which mounted his first professional production and has commissioned other plays from him, including John, Paul, George, Ringo and...Bert (1974). This musical about the Beatles brought him national success. Educating Rita (1979), a two-hander about a middle-aged lecturer and a 'raw diamond' working-class woman student especially in its film version - put Russell on the international map. Russell himself left school at fifteen, returning to college years later because he had decided to become a teacher and a playwright, although the play probably owes as much to his regional background and time spent as a ladies' hairdresser. He is totally unpatronising about the working class, and his female characters are particularly vivid. In both Educating Rita and Shirley Valentine (1986) - a Liverpudlian monologue with marvellous jokes (but little feminist consciousness) - he makes use of minimal resources, but he is equally adept at handling large groups of characters. A good example is Stags and Hens (1978) (filmed as Dancing Thru' the Dark), in which bride and groom, each with their own friends on a last, prenuptial night out both choose the same club for their celebration. Loosely based on the old 'Corsican Brothers' story of twins brought up in different classes, Blood Brothers (1981; musical version 1983) is a deeply felt picture of different social backgrounds. Its middle-class characters are perhaps less convincing than the working-class, despite the parable-like nature of its overall construction. The songs are able to succeed outside the show, but they are an integral and necessary part adding to our understanding of the characters. A smash hit that offered a social document disguised as melodrama.

A school of literary criticism which flourished in the period leading up to the Russian Revolution of 1917 and for a brief time thereafter. It had strong connections with Futurism in both literature and the visual arts. There were two main groups: the Moscow Linguistic Circle (founded 1915) and the St Petersburg-based OPOJAZ (Society for the Study of Poetic Language) which began a year later. During Stalin's reign the movement was forced into retreat and several of its most able thinkers moved abroad, to Czechoslovakia first, where the Prague Linguistic Circle was founded, and then, in the late thirties, to Britain and the United States as the German invasion of Czechoslovakia threatened, Among Russian Formalism's most significant thinkers were ➤ Roman Jakobson, Victor Shklovsky, Boris Eichenbaum, Boris Tomashevsky and Yury Tynyanov.

The Russian Formalists analyzed literature not in terms of its content, but in terms of the way of organized language; that is, the Formalists defined > literariness as essentially a type of language use. Literary language, they believed, is used in a fundamentally different way to ordinary language. Literary language foregrounds the device, that is, language features which call attention to themselves specifically as language use rather than as mere bearers or a message. One crucial function of the device is bedefamiliarization, a term coined by Shklovsky to describe literature's power to make the conventional appear strange. For the Russian Formalists, literature roughens or impedes the ordinary flow of language to make the reader reconsider habitual perceptions. Russian Formalist work was therefore done on the functions of language features like rhyme and metaphor, but they also made a major original contribution to the study of narrative where the work of Tomashevsky was particularly important. His distinction between fabula or story (the bald events in chronological sequence) and syuzhet or plot (how those events are told in, for instance, a novel) has been widely adopted.

The Formalists are criticized for ignoring the significance of the content of the literature they analyzed (▷ Formalism), and of underestimating the importance of social context, but their work gave a powerful impetus to the much more socially-engaged work of ▷ Mikhail Bakhtin. It has also been very influential in the West after its rediscovery from the mid-1960s when it formed a component of the Structuralist approach to literature and influenced some recent forms of Marxist criticism.

Russian influence on English literature The international importance of Russian literature belongs chiefly to its achievements in the 19th century. Until the middle of the 19th century, the influence was chiefly from Britain upon Russia: Laurence Sterne, Walter Scott, Lord Byron and, later, Charles Dickens all made an important impression on Russian writers. Since about 1850, however, the balance of influence has been in the opposite direction, although Russian literature has chiefly been known in translation, which has limited extensive public knowledge to prose works, especially the novels. These have been widely read, especially in the famous translations by Constance Garnett, who translated Tolstoy, Dostoevski, Turgenev, ➤ Chekhov and Gogol in the decades before and after 1900.

Tolstoy and Turgeney were the first Russian novelists to receive wide acclaim in Britain and Tolstoy is still considered by many the supreme novelist. His reputation in Britain owed much to Matthew Arnold, whose essay in praise of Tolstoy appeared in 1887, and is included in Essays in Criticism, Second Series, 1888. His tribute is the more noticeable because he otherwise ignored novelists in his criticism, and it made its mark because he was the most influential critic of his day. However, other critics contributed their admiration for the Russians in the last quarter of the 19th century. This interest was awakened by the feeling that the Russians, besides the French, were the only nation to produce a range of major novelists comparable to those writing in English and that, unlike the French they shared with the British and Americans a moral concern with human nature in society. There was also the feeling that the Russian novelists went beyond the British and Americans, excelling in their rendering of religious experience, though the full force of this was not felt until Constance Garnett produced her translation of Dostoevski's Brothers Karamazov in 1912.

In America, interest in Russian writing seems to have gone deeper, because of a feeling that these two great continental nations shared comparable experiences in the disorderly variety of their rapid growth. It was not merely this, however that made the great Anglo-American novelist >> Henry James a lifelong admirer of Turgenev. Turgenev was already well known in England from the middle of the century when he became the friend of ➤ George Eliot. These two novelists were the predominant influences on James' own work. He admired both for the depth of their moral insights but he admired Turgenev for what he saw as his superior artistic strictness in handling the elusive novel form. Turgeney thus combined for James the virtues of the French novelists with those of the English novelist he most admired. Gilbert Phelps, in The Russian Novel in English Fiction (1956), traces Turgenev's influence in some of the detail of James' novels and suggests his further influence on George Gissing, George Moore, Arnold Bennett, > John Galsworthy and > Joseph Conrad. Conrad is the most doubtful instance of these writers showing the Russian influence; as a Pole, he felt antagonistic to Russia and he did not know Russian, and yet it is impossible not to think of both Turgenev and Dostoevski when reading > Under Western Eyes.

Chekhov's influence on the short story and on drama seems evident, although it may be that the distinctive development of the ▷ short story in English (for instance in ▷ James Joyce's ▷ Dubliners and in ▷ Katherine Mansfield) is as much an example of parallel development in the form as owing to Chekhov's initiation. In the drama, Chekhov's original handling of human speech as a medium has been developed in the works of ▷ Samuel Beckett and ▷ Harold Pinter.

The prestige of Russian literature in the mid-2oth century remains very high in Britain, especially Boris Pasternak's Doctor Zhivago (1957) and the works of Alexander Solzhenitsyn. What is admired is the rendering of human experience and suffering on an heroic scale, and the courage and vitality of literary productivity in the face of adverse and repressive conditions. In the 1980s, however, with the more liberal regime in Russia, more, frequently dissident, literature has become available to the west, for example the poetry of Irina Ratoslinskaya.

In late 1991 and early 1992, the Soviet Union began to break up as ➤ communism ceased to be a dominant and cohering political force in Eastern Europe. Writing in Russian will thus cease to be identified with the U.S.S.R in its old form.

Ruth (1853)

A novel by ➤ Elizabeth Gaskell. Ruth Hilton, an ➤ orphan, is seduced by wealthy and self-interested Mr Bellingham and abandoned after a brief affair. She is taken in by the Dissenting minister, Mr Benson, and his sister, and assumes the identity of Mrs Denbigh, a widow, so that she and her illegitimate son will be accepted in society. Ruth finds employment as a ⊳ governess to the Bradshaw family, and later re-encounters her seducer, who is now the local MP, re-named Mr Donne. He offers to marry her, but she refuses, having determined to seek redemption for her sin. Later, her true identity is discovered, and Mr Bradshaw casts her out (Donne is not known to be the seducer). After many futile attempts to find employment she offers her services as a sicknurse during a typhus epidemic, and through her devoted work becomes revered in the eyes of the community. Her last unselfish act is to nurse delirious Mr Donne through his fever, after which she catches typhoid and dies a martyr's death. The novel was burned by members of Gaskell's congregation and criticized both for its sympathetic treatment of the > 'fallen woman' and for its unrealistically saintly portrayal of Ruth, who is throughout a picture of innocence, humility and Christian submissiveness. Flawed as it is by religiosity and narrative contrivance. Ruth nevertheless reveals the ideological contradictions of Christian and Victorian attitudes towards women.

Rye House Plot (1683)

A plot led by the ▷ Ist Earl of Shaftesbury, the leader of the Whig Party, to kidnap ▷ Charles II and force him to summon a parliament. The plot was discovered, and the consequent discredit of the Whigs, together with Charles II's popularity, caused a public reaction against them, and enabled ▷ James II to succeed peacefully in 1685, in spite of his open Roman ▷ Catholicism.

Sackville, Thomas, first Earl of Dorset (1536–1608)

Poet, statesman, diplomat; created first Earl of Dorset in 1604. He contributed the Induction and the Complaint of Buckingham in the verse compilation ▷ Mirror for Magistrates; the Induction is the main basis for his fame as a poet. He also collaborated with Thomas Norton in writing the first ▷ tragedy in ▷ blank verse, ▷ Gorbaduc.

Sackville-West, Hon. Victoria Mary ('Vita') (1892-1962)

Poet, novelist, travel writer, gardener. Born at Knole, Kent, to one of the oldest families in England, she married Harold Nicolson and travelled with him during his diplomatic career before settling at Sissinghurst Castle, Kent in 1930, where she created an important garden, which still exists. From 1918 until 1921 her relationship with Violet Keppel (later Violet Trefusis) was of great importance in her life. In 1922 she met ➤ Virginia Woolf and began a correspondence, and a friendship that inspired Woolf's novel, > Orlando (1928). Her earlier novels were: Heritage (1919); The Dragon in Shallow Waters (1921); Challenge (1923); Grey Wethers (1923); Seducers in Ecuador (1924). Her next three novels were best-sellers: The Edwardians (1930); All Passion Spent (1931); Family History (1932). Thirty Clocks Strike the Hour (1932) was a collection of short stories, while her remaining four novels were: The Dark Island (1934); Grand Canyon (1942); The Easter Party (1953); No Signposts in the Sea (1962). Her fiction evokes a social world in realistic detail and, while largely traditional in form, explores themes such as duality within the gender identity of the individual and the assertion of women's rights. Her volumes of poetry were: Constantinople (1915); Poems of West and East (1917); Selected Poems (1941); Collected Poems (1933). The Land (1926), which belongs to the pastoral genre, Solitude (1938) and The Garden (1946) were all long poems. Her other works include a family history, entitled Knole and the Sackvilles (1922), travel books on Persia, gardening books and biography. Bib: Watson, S. R., V. Sade, Donatien Alphonse, Marquis de (1740-1814)

French novelist and poet. His belief that his destructive impulses were part of his nature, and yet uncontrollable, counterbalanced the doctrine of > Rousseau, according to whom man undistorted by social forces was naturally good. Sade's ideas profoundly influenced the dark side of > romanticism.

Saga

An old Norse word meaning 'oral story'. The sagas were a body of Norwegian and Icelandic prose epics (11th-13th centuries). However, the term has also come to refer to any large and long familial narrative such as ➤ Galsworthy's ➤ Forsyte Saga.

Sahgal, Nayantara (b 1927)

Indian novelist and journalist, born in Allahabad, Uttar Pradesh, India and educated at schools in India and at Wellesley College, Massachusetts, USA. She is a member of one of India's most powerful political families, the Nehrus, the niece of India's first prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, and daughter of a prominent politician and diplomat, Nehru's sister Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit. Her earliest writings were autobiographical, drawing on her experience of Indian politics before and after Independence: Prison and Chocolate Cake (1954); From Fear Set Free (1962). Most of Sahgal's earlier novels concern the lives of upper-middle-class women, with political events providing the context: A Time to be Happy (1958); This Time of Morning (1965); Storm in Chandigarh (1969); The Day in Shadow (1971); A Voice for Freedom (1977); A Situation in New Delhi (1977). Her later fiction is more explicitly focused on the political and historical: Rich Like Us (1985), which won the Sinclair Prize for fiction, shows concern for human rights issues in its portrayal of political violence during the state of emergency of the late 1970s. Plans for Departure (1985), which won the Commonwealth Prize for fiction (Eurasia category) is set in India during the period of World War I, with a Danish suffragette as protagonist, while Mistaken Identity (1988), about a woman who rejects a life in purdah, is set in the 1930s. Sahgal has also written historical and political non-fiction, including two books on Indira Ghandi and The Freedom Movement in India (1970). Bib: Krishna Rao, A.V., Nayantara Sahgal:

St Paul's Cathedral

The cathedral of the ▷ City of London, and its principal church. The old cathedral was burnt down in the Great Fire of London (1666) and the present one was built according to the design of ▷ Sir Christopher Wren. Until the 18th century not only the churchyard but the building itself was a public meeting-place for much besides Christian worship; news was exchanged there, servants were hired, and business was conducted. The central aisle was called Paul's Walk, and a Paul's Man was a term for one of its frequenters.

Saintsbury, George Edward Bateman (1845-1993)

Literary historian and critic. His works include: A Short History of French Literature (1882); A Short History of English Literature (1898); A History of Criticism (1900–04); A History of English Prosody (1906–21); The History of English Criticism (1911); A History of the French Novel (1917–19). He also wrote studies of Dryden, Walter Scott, and Matthew Arnold. His treatment of literary study was historical; that is to say, principles of evaluation or critical theory were for him secondary to coherent narration.

Saladin (1138-93)

Salatan of Egypt. His conquest of the Christian Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem (1187) provoked the Third Crusade under ▷ Richard I of England and Philip II of France, with whom he made a truce. He was famous for his fierce piety compounded with chivalrous generosity; in English history and legend these qualities are made to represent him as a suitable antagonist to Richard, himself a legend for his courage and chivalry. Their rivalry is the subject of ▷ Scott's novel The Talisman (1825). Historically, Saladin is important for halting the invasion of the East by the Christian West, and starting a countermovement against the West which lasted until the 17th century.

> Crusades.

Salisbury, Sir Thomas (d 1643)
Poet. Salisbury studied at Oxford and the Inner Temple, but then left London at the death of his father to look after his family estates. He later became a Member of Parliament for his local constituency, Denbigh. A staunch Royalist, he was imprisoned for supporting >> Charles I at Edge Hill. Although he was a prolific poet, all that remains is The History of Toseph (pub. 1646).

Salome (1891)

A play by ➤ Oscar Wilde centred on the destructive love of Salome for John the Baptist. It was written first in French and translated by Lord Alfred Douglas, whose edition appeared in 1893 illustrated by ➤ Aubrey Beardsley. Although the play went into rehearsal in 1893 it was banned by the Lord Chamberlain for representing a biblical subject, and was not performed in Britain until 1931. It was first staged in Paris in 1896 with Sarah Bernhardt in the leading role: by that time Wilde was in prison for 'homosexual acts'. Salome has been called the 'Goddess of Decadence', the symbolic incarnation of undying lust. Wilde imagined her dressed in green 'like a curious poisonous lizard', contrasting strongly with the yellow costumes of the other characters. New Women writers such as > George Egerton appropriated the image of Salome to represent sexual desire.

Samson Agonistes (1671)

A ▷ tragedy in ▷ blank verse by ▷ John Milton, published (with ▷ Paradise Regained) in 1671. It is an example of Milton's blended Puritan-biblical and ▷ Renaissance-classical inspiration; the subject is drawn from the Old Testament (Judges 16) and the form from the ancient Greek tragedies of ▷ Aeschylus and ▷ Sophocles.

Samson, the Jewish hero, has been betrayed by his Philistine wife Dalila (spelt Delilah in the Authorized Version of the ➤ Bible, where she is not his wife) to her people, who are the foes of the Jews. His hair, on which depended his exceptional God-given strength, has been cut off; he has been blinded and cast into prison in Gaza, where his hair is allowed to recover its former length and he is subjected to slavery by his enemies. The play opens while he is resting from his enormous labours and he is approached by a chorus of lamenting Jews. In his mood of extreme despair, he is visited by his father Manoa, who hopes to negotiate his release from the Philistines; Samson, however, has the moral strength to refuse Manoa's suggestions, on the grounds that his lot is a consequence of his own moral weakness in betraying the secret of his strength to his wife. His next visitor is Dalila herself, who seeks his forgiveness in return for alleviation of his sufferings; he replies, however, that if he cannot pardon himself, her crime is still more unpardonable. This double moral victory heartens him enough to enable him to frighten away his third visitor, the Philistine giant Harapha, who comes to mock at him. Next a messenger arrives with an order that he is to come before the Philistine lords in order to entertain them with feats of his strength. To the dismay of the chorus, he accepts the order, but we learn from a messenger that it is only to destroy the entire assembly (including himself) by rooting up the two pillars which support the roof of the building. The chorus is left to chant praise of the hero and of the wisdom of God, who sustains his people.

It has long been assumed that Samson Agonistes was written after Milton had finished > Paradise Lost (ie between 1667 and 1671). This traditional dating reinforces the connection between the blind and defeated hero of the work, and the blind and (ideologically) defeated figure of Milton after the Restoration. However, strong reasons have now been advanced for dating Milton's drama to a much earlier period of his career between 1647 and 1653. The two principle themes of modern criticism of the work have centred on the question of 'structure', and the question of whether the guiding spirit of the play is 'Hellenic', 'Hebraic' or 'Christian'. In essence, both of these questions address a problem that Samson Agonistes has long posed to readers – that interpretation of the work rests on locating it in relation to other texts (Greek tragedy or the Old Testament, for example) and to a specific historical moment.

Sand, George (1804-76)

French Romantic novelist and the best known French woman writer of the 10th century. Her influence on Victorian writers and the Victorian reading public was enormous and her work was a formative influence on the Victorian consciousness. Sand was born Aurore Dupin and brought up at her paternal grandmother's country property at Nohant. After a convent education in Paris she returned to Nohant where her independent spirit was encouraged. She read Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-78), Byron (1788-1824), Shakespeare and Vicomte de Chateaubriand (1768-1848), the greatest French writer of his generation and the father of French Romanticism. She married the baron Dudevant with whom she had two children, but in 1831 was living with a young writer Jules Sandeau whose surname she adapted as her pen-name. She subsequently enjoyed a stream of extra-marital affairs, the most famous of which were with the poet Alfred de Musset (1810-57), recorded in her novel Elle et Lui (1859), and with composers Franz Liszt (1811-86) and Frédéric Chopin (1810-49). She played an active role during the political upheavals of 1848, but disassociated herself from radical > feminist attempts to get her elected to the National Assembly, as she was a reformist rather than a revolutionary at heart. She enjoyed a period of bourgeois respectability towards the end of her life and died peacefully at Nohant in 1876.

The ▷ Athenaeum mentioned her work in February 1833 with a mixture of moral outrage and admiration and from that point on she was widely read and reviewed in England, and very much a talking point in middle-class drawing rooms. Her main impact was made with works written during the first twenty years of her career when her doctrines were avant garde and challenging. In works such as Indiana (1832), Valentine (1833), Léila (1833) and Jacques (1834) she described > marriage as 'one of the most barbaric institutions [society] has ever invented'. Her views were bold and outspoken, especially on the subject of relationships between the sexes and she was widely credited with having introduced passion as a major theme in the novel.

The 'second' phase of Sand's writing coincided with her increased enthusiasm for humanitarianism, socialism and Christianity. During this period she produced novels in which her desire to see humanity regenerate itself through a combination of social change and adherence to the teachings of Christ is very apparent. These include Spiridion (1838), Les Sept Cordes de la Lyre (1839), Consuelo (1842-3) and La Comtesse de Rudolstadt (1843-4). They were followed by a series of pastoral and/or socialist novels - La Mare au Diable (1846), La Péché de M. Antoine (1847), La Petite Fadette (1849), François le Champi (1850) and Les Maitres Sonneurs (1853) - for which their author is most famous, and which reveal her tendency to idealize working-class rural life. In the mid-1850s she produced her less successful novels and her twenty-volume > autobiography Histoire de ma Vie (trans. 1855).

➤ Matthew Arnold went on a pilgrimage to the middle of France in order to meet her and > Clough drew inspiration for a poem from her novel Jeanne. For > Jane Carlyle, > George Eliot, Geraldine Endsor, the ➤ Brontës, and > Elizabeth Barrett Browning, George Sand was the model of a dedicated professional writer who held her own with men, asking for no allowance to be made for her sex. Elizabeth Barret found her novels intense and liberating in their testimony to the irresistible power of human passion. The Brontës valued her resistance to received doctrines which forbade women equality, frankness and the right to a similar intensity of love to that enjoyed by men. ➤ Kingsley and ➤ Samuel Smiles also admired her work and ➤ George Lewes claimed she and Jane Austen (1775-1817) were the two touchstones for feminine literary greatness. Arnold and Clough identified with her idealism, her revolt against contemporary social norms, her delight in natural scenery and her faith in humanity. > Thomas Carlyle, however, coined the term 'George Sandism' to describe tolerance of immorality, romantic effusiveness, lack of common sense, high flown sentiments and an obsession with love. ➤ Thomas Hardy and > Henry James were deeply impressed with her work and James was singing her praises well into the 20th century.

Sandys, George (1578-1644)

Translator and travel writer. Son of the Archbishop of York, Sandys travelled extensively and published accounts of his journeys to Italy and the Near East in A Relation of a Journey (1615). He then moved to America as treasurer of the Virginia Company (1621) and began translating ▷ Ovid's ▷ Metamorphoses, the work for which he is best known. This text was published in 1626, with the first book of the ▷ Aeneid added at its reissue in 1632. He also translated Grotius' Christ's Passion; A Tragedy (1640) and rendered several parts of the ▷ Bible into verse. Sandys' Ovid was immensely influential on the Augustan writers (it had reached eight editions by 1690), and it was an important factor in establishing the heroic couplet as their preferred poetic metre.

Sanger, John (1816-89)

The founder of the most famous of the British travelling circuses. He began with a conjuring exhibition in Birmingham in 1845, and reached the height of his fame as a circus proprietor in the 1870s and 80s. In his later years he was known as Lord John Sanger, though he never received a peerage.

Sangreal
A name for the Holy ▷ Grail.

Sansculottes

The name for recruits from the poorer classes to the > French Revolutionary army. The word means 'without breeches' - kneebreeches being then the wear of all but the poorest. The sansculottes wore loose trousers or 'pantalons'.

Sansom, William (1912-76)

Short-story writer, novelist and travel writer. He served in the London Fire Brigade in World War II, an experience which gave rise to Fireman Flower (1944), a volume of short stories, which was the form in which he was most successful. His work covers a wide range of subject matter and styles, from documentary realism to macabre fantasy. In The Body (1949) the mental stability of the first-person narrator gradually disintegrates as a result of obsessive jealousy.

Sappho (Psappho) (7th–6th century BC) Greek poet from Lesbos. Daughter of Scamandronymus and Cleis, and sister of three brothers. At some time she visited Sicily. The many anecdotes about Sappho's life, drawn from her works and from comic dramas written about her, make accurate biography impossible. She may have had a daughter, Cleis, although Sappho refers to her with a word that may simply be a term of affection. The stories that she committed suicide for love of Phaon probably come from 4th–century BC comic drama.

Her work is the largest corpus written by an ancient Greek woman, although very fragmentary. It shows, in a variety of metres, Sappho as leader of a band of young girls in worship of the goddess of love Aphrodite. The Hymn to Aphrodite, in a metre called 'sapphic', after her, is an address to the goddess to aid her seduction of a young girl whom Sappho loves. It neatly employs traditional hymnic commonplaces to describe a female object of desire. A second fragment was preserved which evocatively describes the symptoms of one in love, as she watches the woman she loves beside her bridegroom. Sappho wrote many marriage songs and was famous for them in antiquity.

Other fragments include a description of the beauty of the woman Anactoria, a poem to her 'daughter' Cleis, good wishes to her brother as he sets out on a voyage, a narrative poem on the marriage of Hector and Andromache (> epic characters) and a poem for a girl, Lydia, who is compared to the moon outshining the stars.

Sappho occasionally used epic metaphors and images of war to describe love, and thus played an important part in the development of the theme of 'love as war' in later Latin elegiac poetry. This literary transference of male war imagery to female love poetry is one further sign of her literary ability. Another is the variety of metres employed in her lyric poetry. Her poetry was translated into Latin and imitated by Roman poets such as > Catullus and ➤ Horace in the 1st century BC. Antipater of Thescalonica (2nd century BC) includes her in his list of nine women poets, and another Greek ➤ epigram styles her 'the tenth Muse'. In the 17th and 18th centuries, a woman poet was somtimes referred to as 'Sappho'. A notable Sappho was ➤ Katherine Philips. Another was Madeleine de Scudéry.

Sargeson, Frank (b 1903)

New Zealand novelist, short-story writer and dramatist. His stories tend to deal with a small group of characters and to be narrated from within the consciousness of one of them, often a character with limited powers of selfexpression, like the narrator of the > novella That Summer (1946). His novels are more various in tone, but render the sense of a claustrophobic and somewhat Puritan New Zealand society by means of irony, comedy and a skilful rendering of idiom. His novels are: I Saw In My Dream (1949); I For One . . . (1954); Memoirs of a Peon (1965); The Hangover (1967); Joy of the Worm (1969); Sunset Village (1976). Sartor Resartus: The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh in Fraser's Magazine and published in book form in Boston, USA, in 1836 and in Britain in 1838. Carlyle was under the influence of the German ➤ Romantics, eg Jean Paul Richter. The title is Latin for 'the tailor re-patched': Carlyle offers the fable that human beliefs and institutions are like clothes and need renewing. Against the poet Byron's (1788-1824) attitude of doubt, isolation and suffering, Carlyle calls for the affirmativeness of the German poet > Goethe; heroic qualities such as sacrifice and devotion to duty must redeem the inner man and, through men, the directionless age in which Carlyle felt himself to be living - the age of flux and the decay of unquestioning religious faith. Besides the drive of > German influence, Carlyle felt the force of the old-fashioned Scottish Calvinism such as had animated his father. The three crucial chapters are 'The Everlasting No', 'Centre of Indifference' and 'The Everlasting Yea'. Despite the difficulty he had in getting the book published in Britain, it marks the beginning of his exposition of the creed of heroism, which made Carlyle an inspiring figure in commerce-dominated mid-19th-century Britain.

A disguised spiritual ➤ autobiography by ➤ Thomas Carlyle. It was serialized (1833–4)

Sartre, Jean-Paul (1905-80)

French writer. His areas of activity and influence covered philosophy, the novel, drama, literary criticism and political commitment. He was the major exponent of atheistic ⊳ existentialism in France and made an early impact with his novels La Nausée (1938) and Les Chemins de la liberté, a projected tetralogy of which only three volumes were published: L'Age de raison (1945), Le Sursis (1945) and La Mort dans l'âme (1949). In La Nausée, the central character, Roquentin, discovers that far from being central to the nature of things, man is metaphysically superfluous (de trop) in the universe. Les Chemins de la liberté are set at the outbreak of World War II and portray the urgent necessity of commitment, especially in the form of political action, to secure personal and collective freedom. The same themes run through Sartre's drama, which is more accessible than the fiction and has proved more enduringly popular (Les Mouches, 1943, a version of the Orestes story; Huis Clos, 1945; Les Mains sales, 1948). The philosophical background to existentialism was expounded in L'Etre et le néant (1943) and Critique de la raison dialectique (1960).

Satre also wrote a number of existentialistorientated biographies, of Baudelaire, of Jean Genet (1910–86) and of ▷ Flaubert. His volumes of Situations contain mainly essays on politics, literature and society and in 1945 he founded the important literary and political review, Les Temps modernes. In 1964 he published his autobiography, Les Mots, which seeks to expose the ideology of the autobiographical genre and views with irony his years of childhood under his grandfather Charles Schweitzer (Sartre was the cousin of Albert Schweitzer, (1875–1965). In the same year, Sartre was awarded and refused the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Sassoon, Siegfried (1886–1967)

Poet and autobiographer. His Memoirs of a Foxhunting Man (1928) and Memoirs of an Infantry Officer (1930) are accounts of his life as a country gentleman before World War I, and of his experiences during it. He also became famous for his savagely satirical poems written during his military service, his first and most famous volume of anti-war poems being Counter-attack (1918). He was a friend of Wilfred Owen, and influenced Owen's writing. The two volumes of memoirs were put together as The Complete Memoirs of George Sherston (1937), which includes an additional section, Sherston's Progress. His poems, including volumes published since World War I, are in a collected edition (1961).

Satanic Verses, The (1988)

Novel by ▷ Salman Rushdie which received mixed reviews on its publication in 1988. Controversy erupted when Muslims protested that the book was blasphemous. Copies were burned in Bradford and demonstrations took place there and elsewhere in Britain, Pakistan and the USA. In Iran mass demonstrations against the author, book and publisher caused international tension to rise. The Ayatollah Khomeini passed a death sentence on Rushdie, who went into hiding. The novel returned to the ▷ best-seller lists in the wake of the controversy, which raised many issues of freedom of speech and expression, and the freedom to publish.

Satire

A form of attack through mockery; it may exist in any literary medium, but is often regarded as a medium in itself. The origins of the word help to explain the manifestations of satire. It derives from the Latin 'satura' = a vessel filled with the earliest agricultural produce of the year, used in seasonal festivals to celebrate harvest; a secondary meaning is 'miscellany of entertainment', implying merry-making at such festivals, probably including verbal warfare. This primitive humour gave rise to a highly cultivated form of literary attack in the poetry of > Horace, Persius (1st century AD) and > Juvenal. Thus from ancient Roman culture two ideas of satire have come down to us: the first expresses a basic instinct for comedy through mockery in human beings, and was not invented by the Romans; the second is a self-conscious medium, implying standards of civilized and moral rightness in the mind of the poet and hence a desire on his or her part to instruct readers so as to reform their moral failings and absurdities. The two kinds of satire are inter-related, so that it is not possible to distinguish them sharply. Moreover, it is not easy to distinguish strict satire in either of its original forms from other kinds of comedy.

I Strict satire, ie satire emulating the Roman poets. This was one of the outcomes of > Renaissance cultivation of ancient Latin literature. Between 1590 and 1625 several poets wrote deliberate satires with Juvenal, Persius and Horace in mind; the most important of these were > Donne and > Ben Jonson, but > Joseph Hall claimed to be the first, and another was > Marston. The great age of the strict satire was the 18th century, notably in the work of ➤ Pope who emulated the relatively genial satire of Horace, and > Samuel Johnson, who emulated the sombre style of Juvenal. Satire of this sort makes its object of attack the social forms and corruptions of the time, and its distinctive medium is the 10-syllable rhymed couplet, perfected by Pope and used with different force by Johnson.

2 ➤ Comedy of Humours and ➤ Comedy of Manners. These are the most easily distinguishable forms of dramatic satire. The former is associated chiefly with Ben Jonson, and has its roots in the older > Morality drama, which was only intermittently satirical. The 'humours' in Jonson's conception are the obsessions and manias to which the nature of human beings invites them to abandon themselves; they have a close relation to the medieval ⊳ Seven Deadly Sins, such as lust, avarice and gluttony. The Comedy of Manners belongs to the period 1660-1800, and, especially, to the first 40 years of it. Its most notable exponents are > Congreve at the end of the 17th century and ➤ Sheridan at the end of the 18th. This comedy is less concerned with basic human dispositions and more with transient social ones; rational social behaviour is the standard in the mind of the dramatist. Both these forms of satire were taken over by novelists; the 18thcentury novelist ⊳ Fielding began as a writer of dramatic comedies of manners, but Dickens in the 19th century writes more distinctly in the tradition of the comedy of humours, with a strong addition of social stagnation. Satire in the theatre has, since the 1960s, been replaced by television satire, with radical programmes such as Beyond the Fringe and more recently, Spitting Image.

3 Satire of ▷ Parody and ▷ Irony. This includes the most skilful and powerful satire in the language; its most productive period is between 1660 and 1750. Parody at its most powerful implies the writer's complete respect for the serious form which he or she is using in a comic way; thus in this period (which included the very serious ▷ epic ▷ Paradise Lost) the prestige of the epic form was still high, and ▷ Dryden (▷ Absalom and Achitophel) and ▷ Pope (▷ The Rape of the Lock and ▷ The Dunciad) used their appreciation of epic to make ironic contrast between the grandeur of its style and pettiness, meanness and destructiveness of their chosen subject. The most notable practitioner in prose of ironic and parodic satire was ▷ Swift. Works such as ▷ A Modest Proposal and ▷ Gulliver's Travels aim to ambush the reader's expectations and to undermine complacency through shock, laughter and incongruity. Similarly ▷ Samuel Butler used the mode of romantic epic to attack the ▷ Puritans in ▷ Hudibras.

Irony does not necessarily use parody, but even when it does not, it operates in a similar way, by addressing the reader in terms which he has learnt to receive as acceptable at their face value, and then shocking him into recognition that something quite unacceptable is the real subject.

4 > Flytings, and other traditional forms. The Middle Ages took from its popular festivals a strong tradition of verbal combat (flytings) and sardonic criticism of the established social order. One aspect of this emerges in popular > ballads (especially in the printed form of broadsides which developed after the medieval period) and in the work of educated writers such as > Langland and > Chaucer - grimly in the former's > Piers Plowman, and genially in the latter's > Canterbury Tales. Dunbar was another eminent practitioner of flytings, eg his Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedy.

5 Novelistic satire. Much satire in novels from the 18th to the 20th century cannot be summed up under comedy of manners. The novels of > Peacock, for example, establish a tradition of comic discussions mocking at contemporary trends of thought; Peacock's example was partly followed by ➤ Meredith and ➤ Aldous Huxley. Another variant is the 'anti-utopia', using an imaginary country to satirize actual tendencies in contemporary Britain. The most notable examples of this are ➤ Erewhon by ➤ Samuel Butler and Brave New World by ➤ Aldous Huxley. Apart from these examples, it is difficult to find a novelist who does not use satire at least intermittently, usually as social comment. Eminent examples are: Fielding, ➤ Iane Austen. ➤ Thackeray, ➤ Dickens, ➤ Wells, ➤ Foster, and more recently ➤ Angus Wilson, ➤ Evelyn Waugh, ▶ George Orwell, and the 'campus novels' of ▷ Kingsley Amis and ▷ David Lodge.

Saturday Review

It was founded in 1855 and noted for the brilliance of its contributors and the severity of its criticism. Later it took a greater interest in literature and included contributions from ➤ Thomas Hardy, Max Beerbohm, Arthur Symons and ➤ H. G. Wells. George Bernard Shaw was dramatic critic from 1895 to 1898 and Agate from 1921 to 1923.

Saussure, Ferdinand de (1857–1913) Swiss linguist, generally regarded as the founder of Structuralism. Saussure's Course in General Linguistics, was published two years after his death, in 1915, and represents a reconstruction of three series of lectures which he gave at the University of Geneva during the years 1906-7, 1908-9, and 1910-11. It was Saussure who pioneered the distinction between ▷ 'langue' and 'parole', and who sought to define the operations of language according to the principles of combination and > difference. Although > deconstruction has done much to undermine the Structuralist base of Saussure's thinking, the concept of 'difference' as a determining principle in establishing meaning ('signification') remains one of the key concepts in modern critical theory. Moreover, Saussure's work provided the foundation for the methodological analysis of sign systems (semiotics), and the types of linguistic investigation which he undertook have been successfully appropriated by literary critics, as well as by social anthropologists such as Claude Lévi-Strauss (b 1908).

Savage, Richard (?1697-1743)

Poet. Savage claimed to be the illegitimate son of the Countess of Macclesfield, and spent his life in petulant complaint against her, and in cultivating wealthy patrons. He was accused of being ▷ Alexander Pope's spy at the time of the composition of ▷ The Dunciad, and after his death was the subject of an intimate ▷ biography by ▷ Samuel Johnson. His monologue in heroic ▷ couplets, The Bastard (1728) dramatizes his situation following the death sentence passed on him after he had killed a man in a brawl. It contains some vigorous lines:

Blest be the Bastard's birth! . . .
No sickly fruit of faint compliance he;
He! stampt in nature's mint of extasy!
He lives to build, not boast, a gen'rous race:
No tenth transmitter of a foolish face.

On the intervention of his friends he was pardoned and a long poem, The Wanderer, appeared in 1729. Savage also wrote satirical poems in couplets, including The Progress of a Divine (1735).

Savonarola, Fra Girolamo (1452-98)
In Italian history a Florentine monk who led a revolt against the worldly excesses of the ➤ Renaissance. His own reforms went to excess, and he was eventually condemned and executed as a heretic.

Saxons

The name of a Germanic people which invaded southern Britain from their homeland around the mouth of the Elbe in the 5th and 6th centuries, after the departure of the Roman occupying forces. They eventually shared what came to be known as England (Angle-land) with the Angles and the Jutes. Their principal kingdom was Wessex (ie West Saxons) in the south-west. Other Saxon kingdoms are commemorated in the names of modern English counties: Sussex (South Saxons); Middlesex (Middle Saxons, in London and to the immediate north of it); and Essex (East Saxons). ▶ Wessex itself has disappeared as a geographical name, except in the novels of ▶ Thomas Hardy.

➤ Anglo-Saxon.

Sayers, Dorothy L. (Leigh) (1893–1957)

Detective fiction.

Scenes of Clerical Life (1857)
Three tales by ▷ George Eliot, and her earliest work in fiction: The Sad Fortunes of the Rev.
Amos Barton; Mr Gilfil's Love-Story; and Janet's Repentance. The hero of each is a clergyman.
They were published first in ▷ Blackmood's Magazine in 1857 and collected as Scenes of Clerical Life in 1858.

'Scholar Gipsy, The'

A poem by > Matthew Arnold, first published in 1853. He took the subject from a legend reported by Joseph Glanvill in The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661). The Scholar of the legend renounced the anxiety of seeking a career through his scholarship, and took to wandering with the gipsies, dedicating himself to learning their lore. Arnold regards him as an immortal figure, and uses him as the type of a man who has happily escaped the anguish of the 19th-century intellectual's loss of faith and controlling convictions. The poem is not always considered to be Arnold's best, but it is one of his most famous, since it expresses the distress and doubt that is widely evident in mid-Victorian writing. It is written in twenty-five ten-line stanzas resembling those of John Keats' (1795-1821) Odes. It is like the Odes too in its sensuous evocation of natural surroundings, though Arnold's tone is often nostalgic and insular. In 1867 Arnold published a companion-piece to 'The Scholar Gipsy' entitled Thyrsis, an elegy to his friend ➤ Clough, who died in 1861.

School for Scandal, The

A comedy by ⊳ Richard Brinsley Sheridan, first produced in 1777. Two of the central characters are brothers: Charles Surface, whose character is open-hearted but reckless and extravagant, and Joseph Surface, a meanhearted hypocrite. The principal women are Lady Teazle, the young, gay wife of the elderly Sir Peter Teazle, and Maria, his ward, with whom Charles is in love and whom Joseph is trying to marry for her money, while he also makes love to Lady Teazle. Sir Oliver Surface, rich uncle to the two brothers, returns from India in disguise in order to spy on his nephews, thereby to discover their true characters. In the background, a group of scandal-lovers (Lady Sneerwell, Mrs Candour, Sir Benjamin Backbite) do their worst to damage as many reputations as possible. Sir Oliver satisfies himself, in scenes of extremely successful theatrical comedy, about which of his nephews truly deserves his affection: Charles marries Maria, and the deceitfulness of Joseph is exposed.

The comedy is Sheridan's masterpiece, and the last notable play in the tradition of the English ➤ Comedy of Manners until ➤ Oscar Wilde at the end of the 19th century.

School of Night

A term used to designate a circle of intellectuals that centred on ▷ Sir Walter Ralegh in the early 1590s. It derives from ▷ Shakespeare's play ▷ Love's Labour's Lost (IV. 3. 251-2). The courtier Berowne has just been praising the lady Rosaline who has a dark complexion: 'No face is fair that is not full so black', whereupon the king breaks in:

O paradox! Black is the badge of hell, The hue of dungeons and the School of Night.

'School of Night' has puzzled editors, who have variously amended it to 'scowl' and 'stole'. Some modern scholars, however (see especially the Cambridge Shakespeare edition and M. C. Bradbrook's The School of Night), consider that Shakespeare was alluding to Ralegh's dark complexion and to the reputation of himself and his circle for atheism. At about the time the play was written (1594–5), Ralegh, in disgrace at court, had retired to his country house and declared his preference for a life of study over the active and public life. The rival claims of the studious and retired and the active and public life is the theme of Love's Labour's Lost.

Ralegh's circle seems to have consisted of himself, the famous mathematician Thomas Harriot, the poets ▷ Christopher Marlowe and ▷ George Chapman, the Earls of Northumberland and Derby, and a few others. Marlowe and Harriot shared Ralegh's atheistic reputation, Chapman had highly developed philosophical interests, and Northumberland and Derby had esoteric interests in alchemy. Bib: Bradbrook, M. Schreiner, Olive (Emilie Albertina) (1855–1920)

Daughter of a ➤ Methodist missionary of German descent and an English mother, Olive Schreiner was born in Basutoland, in South Africa, the sixth of twelve children. Selfeducated, she became governess to a Boer family at the age of fifteen and began to write. She came to England in 1881 to seek a publisher and in 1884 met ➤ Havelock Ellis with whom she developed a close friendship. Ten years later she returned to South Africa and married the politician Samuel Cronwright who became her literary assistant and later literary executor. They took trips to England and travelled around Africa together. Her first and most acclaimed work is The Story of an African Farm (1883), which was published under the ▶ pseudonym Ralph Iron. Its unorthodox religious views and > feminist standpoint caused a considerable stir. She wrote most after her return to South Africa: Trooper Peter Halket of Mashonaland (1897), From Man to Man (1926) and Undine (1929), all with feminist themes, and short stories, Dreams (1891), Real Life (1893) and Stories, Dreams and Allegories (1920). She also wrote Woman and Labour (1911). See also: Letters (1924).

Schuurman (Schurman), Anna Maria van (1607–1678)

Prose writer and poet from the northern Netherlands. The daughter of a nobleman from Antwerp who settled with his family in Utrecht in 1615, she received an excellent education. In an era when the ▶ Renaissance adoration of women came into vogue, van Schuurman, with her considerable knowledge of languages and her artistry, attracted the attention of many people, including Queen Christina of Sweden, and ▶ René Descartes. She completed her theology studies in Utrecht, attending lectures in a small room adjacent to the classroom of the male students. Her Amica dissertatio inter Annam Mariam Schurmanniam et Andr. Rivetum de capacitate ingenii muliebris ad scientias (1638) (A Friendly Discourse Between Anna Maria Schurmann and A. Rivetus Concerning the Capacity of Women for Scholarly Pursuits) is a learned dialogue on the question of whether women are capable of studying the sciences and the arts. A Learned Maid, written in 1641, was translated into English by Clement Barksdale. She devoted herself to Calvinism, and later to Labadism. On her life and theological views she composed in Latin Eucleria (1684, Dutch translation Eucleria of uitkiezing van het beste deel, 1684) (Eucleria or Selection of the Best Part). Apart from poems and letters, she wrote Paelsteen van den tijt onzes levens (1639) (Boundary Stone of Our Lifetime), and a festive song on the occasion of the inauguration of the University of Utrecht.

Science Fiction

The term 'science fiction' was coined in the mid 19th century, though it was 'reinvented' and given wider currency in the late 1920s by the American magazine editor Hugo Gernsback, who pioneered the stories deriving from, preeminently, > H. G. Wells and Jules Verne. To Gernsback a science fiction story was 'a charming romance intermingled with scientific fact and prophetic vision' (editorial, Amazing Stories, 1926). Wells had called what would now be dubbed his science fiction 'scientific romances', and the relation between romance, particularly Gothic romance (> Gothic novels), and science fiction has often been remarked on by definers of the form. > Kingsley Amis in New Maps of Hell (1960), a work which did much to encourage serious critical attention to this branch of popular literature, allows for a broadening of the speculative base of science fiction through reference to sciences, or 'pseudo-sciences', like sociology, psychology, anthropology, theology and linguistics.

Darko Suvin (Metamorphoses of Science Fiction, 1979) remarks that 'cognition' would be a more appropriate word than science in defining this literary genre, and his emphasis on estrangement, or alienation, provides a useful direction for the discussion of science fiction in terms of recent critical theory, which has given new life to the Russian Formalist assertion that literature 'defamiliarizes' conventional assumptions. Science fiction, which is a product of and response to an era of rapid scientific and technological development, has often been concerned to promote new ways of seeing appropriate to, for example, the human consequences of industrialization, the implications of Darwinian (> Charles Darwin) evolutionary theory, Einstein's theory of relativity, and the second law of thermodynamics concerning the ultimate entropy of a closed system like the universe. Though the popularity of science fiction may result from the withdrawal of much modern mainstream fiction from traditional forms of storytelling, its concerns as speculative, defamiliarizing literature set it apart from the conventions of classic realism with its emphasis on, for example, characterization. Critics hostile to the science fiction genre have complained that its presentation of human character compared unfavourably with that of realist fiction, whereas others have argued that this represents a response to a world dehumanized by technology, or a radically different viewpoint for asking the question 'What constitutes the human?'

confrontation with the alien. Mary Shelley's text, in its repeated patterns of dualism, of attempted completion of incomplete individuals, suggests the possibility, dear to much recent science fiction, that Earth is the alien planet and 'otherness' is the repressed in the human psyche or in human society.

Frankenstein may be regarded as a significant root work of science fiction, but it is the scientific romances of > H. G. Wells which established the genre in the 1890s. Many of these share with Frankenstein an unsettling pessimism deriving from a perception of the destructive and alienating uses to which technological development might be put, while much American science fiction, at least in the period before World War II, suggested an optimistic faith in the possibilities of scientific and technological development, springing, perhaps, from a culture defining itself through reference to an expanding frontier. Wells established an influential British tradition of bleaker Darwinism, emanating from an imperial culture already in decline.

Wells' The Time Machine (1895) provides a model for a range of subsequent science fiction. It introduces, in almost comic pseudoscientific discourse, a technological means of travel through time; it facilitates sociological criticism and prediction through the use of utopian and dystopian discourses; it treats the theme of confrontation with the alien, of the last man on earth, of the entropic death of the world; it provides new contexts for old myths; and it defamiliarizes the cosy certitudes of the late Victorian male world in which it starts. The War of the Worlds (1898), repeatedly adapted and imitated in the 20th century, may be regarded as the genesis of the bulk of science fiction treatments of interplanetary war or invasion by the alien. Mr Blettsworthy on Rampole Island (1928), which employs the traditional device of the dream as a means of transport in place of a time-machine, involves an inversion of dream and reality of a kind familiar in a wide range of science fiction. The Shape of Things to Come (1933), widely known through the Alexander Korda film version, represents a more optimistic element in Wells' science fiction in that it suggests the possibility of redemption through an enlightened, technologically oriented élite; yet images of global disorder and collapse are, perhaps, most vividly projected in this text.

Mark Rose, in Alien Encounters: Anatomy of Science Fiction (1981), approaches the definition of science fiction through its phases of development. Thus the scientific romances of such as Wells transform earlier kinds of romance, like the Gothic, and fill a gap left by the predominance of realistic fiction. Later phases manifest a generic self-consciousness, in that science fiction texts come to be based on an explicit form. Rose provides the example of \triangleright C. S. Lewis, whose science fiction output is in part a response to the fiction of Wells. The settings of Lewis' space trilogy, Out of the Silent Planet (1943), Perelandra (1943) and That Hideous Strength (1945), are respectively Mars, Venus and Earth, but Lewis' preference for angels rather than space-ships as a means of interplanetary travel has led to some questioning of their status as science fiction. The trilogy evinces an attachment to supernatural Christianity rather than to science, in opposition to the element of pessimistic materialism in Wells; but some variant of such mysticism is not uncommon in the genre. For example, Lewis' near-contemporary, Olaf Stapledon, in works like Last and First Men (1930), Last Men in London (1932) and Star-Maker (1937), projected what he called 'myths' of future history on a scale that goes beyond Wells' scientific romances.

> Aldous Huxley acknowledged that his Brave New World (1932) started out as a parody of H. G. Wells' Men Like Gods, and it has become, in the words of Brian Aldiss (b 1925) (Billion Year Spree, 1973) 'arguably the Western World's most famous science fiction novel'. The status accorded this satirical dystopian text, like that enjoyed by the still controversial Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949) by ▷ George Orwell, may result from the fact that, in the context of the author's novel output outside the field of science fiction, it can be regarded as somehow 'mainstream' fiction. Both of these works have been regarded as more 'serious' than most science fiction, though this may be based on questionable assumptions about intrinsic literary merit.

A number of British writers were regular contributors to the pre-World War II American science fiction magazine which did much to create a persistent downmarket image for the genre in the popular imagination. The first magazine devoted entirely to science fiction was Hugo Gernsback's Amazing Stories (published from 1926), which made an effort to appear respectably scientific and educational in a market which often relied upon lurid presentation. It was followed by such titles as Science Wonder Stories, Wonder Stories and Astounding Stories in the late 1920s and early 1930s. Besides Wells, British contributors included John Russell Fearn, Eric Frank Russell and John Beynon Harris. Fearn, whose work appeared in Amazing Stories first in 1933, produced a staggering quantity of novels and short stories under no less than 25 pseudonyms as well as editing two British science fiction magazines. Russell, whose output was modest compared to Fearn's, began publishing in Astounding Stories in 1937 and went on to contribute to British magazines like Tales of Wonder and Fantasy. Harris is better known as John Wyndham, though he also wrote as John Beynon, J. B. Harris and Johnson Harris. He published short stories and novels from 1930 on, though his reputation rests on the novels he produced as John Wyndham from 1951, the year in which The Day of the Triffids was published.

'Exiles on Asperus' (in Wonder Stories Quarterly, 1933) by John Beynon Harris demonstrates how Wyndham was not temporarily drawn to the 'space-opera' conventions of the American magazines or to their attachment to science fiction 'gadget' stories. He was happier, and more successful, developing the Wellsian tradition of science fiction novels centring on an imagined disaster arising from the upsetting of the natural and social orders generally through the agency of technology. His catastrophe stories, including The Day of the Triffids, The Kraken Wakes (1953) and The Midwich Cuckoos (1957), belong to a class of British science fiction from Wells to the present, including New Wave science fiction which in some ways represented a reaction against Wyndham's formulae. The Day of the Triffids makes use of the traditional science fiction theme of the Last Man/Last Woman, a new Adam and Eve faced with the arduous complexities of an unfamiliar world. The treatment evokes a characteristically English romantic nostalgia, reminiscent of > Richard Jefferies' vision of the ruined capital in After London (1885). The remaking of a new world out of the scraps of the old in The Day of the Triffids also suggests a debt to > Daniel Defoe's > Robinson Crusoe (1719), but Wyndham's novel is predominantly Wellsian, though it retains a safe, genteel quality not so typical of Wells.

Arthur C. Clarke (b 1917), one of the most celebrated science fiction writers of the 20th century, combines meticulous attention to the scientific and technological aspects of the genre, in the tradition of Jules Verne, with a lyrically didactic commitment to the benign evolutionary potential of technology that owes much to the impact of Clarke's early reading of Stapledon. Both were powerfully expressed in Stanley Kubrick's film 2001 (1968), for which Clarke wrote the screenplay. The kind of wondering transcendence conveyed at the end of that film is characteristic of Clarke's work, encountered in, for example, one of his most popular novels, Childhood's End (1953); while The Deep Range (1957) develops into a lesson in respect for the non-human creatures of the earth as the prospect of contact with beings from other worlds approaches.

The first novel of Brian Aldiss, Non-Stop (1958), gave an indication of the exhilarating variety which has proved a feature of his subsequent fictional output. Hothouse (1962) and Greybeard (1964) treat the well-established theme of imagined catastrophe, but combine a playful abundance of exotic science fiction invention with romantic nostalgia. A Swiftian satirical mode characterizes The Dark Light Years (1964), while the alienating detachment of Report on Probability A (1968) draws the techniques of the French > Nouveau roman into the orbit of science fiction. Frankenstein Unbound (1973) and Moreau's Other Island (1980) reinvent seminal science fiction texts for a new context, while the abundance of Aldiss's Helliconia trilogy (1982−5) defies brief categorization. The epilogue to the third volume, Helliconia Winter (1985), a translated extract from ▷ Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, might be applied to Aldiss's oeuvre: 'Everything must pass through successive phases. Nothing remains forever what it was'.

Aldiss's commitment to science fiction, his urge to experiment and enjoy, and to extend the possibilities of the genre, gave him a respected place in the so-called New Wave science fiction writing associated with the magazine New Worlds under the editorship of Michael Moorcock (b 1939) from 1964. Until then New Worlds had been edited by E. J. Carnell, who was also responsible for Science Fantasy. Carnell's magazine published a wide range of British science fiction, including the work of such prolific authors as Kenneth Bulmer, who employed 15 pen-names in addition to his own name, and John Brunner, who began publishing science fiction at the age of 17. The scale of Brunner's output may have resulted in his work being critically underrated, though his dystopian novels Stand on Zanzibar (1968), The Jagged Orbit (1969) and The Sheep Look Up (1972) achieved critical acclaim. Like Brunner, Moorcock is a prolific author who started young: he was editing Tarzan Adventures at the age of 17. His 'sword and sorcery' fantasies embody the apocalyptic theme which runs through much of his later science fiction, in which he reconstructs the past as well as imagining the future; this kind of reconstruction may be seen as a way of deconstructing the present. Works like War Lord of the Air (1971) and The Land Leviathan (1974) present a past manufactured from a range of literary reference, to, for example, Verne, Wells and ▷ Joseph Conrad, and demonstrate Moorcock's attachment to the concept of the 'multiverse', which proposes a variety of separate realities which can sometimes interact. His fondness for series of novels and a modernist tendency to fragment his narratives are particularly evident in his Jerry Cornelius novels, including The Final Programme (1969), A Cure for Cancer (1971), The English Assassin (1972) and The Condition of Muzak (1977).

New Worlds under Moorcock represented a spirited reaction against the continuing influence of American pulp science fiction, and a number of American authors were attracted to its programme. But it was a British author, J. G. Ballard (b 1930), who was championed most consistently by the magazine. The Conradian tone of much of Ballard's science fiction contrasts with the racier products of some New Worlds writers, influenced by the current 'rock' culture; he has never been much interested in the traditional science fiction fare of space travel and the distant future, preferring to focus on something challengingly closer to the present, defamiliarizing the familiar earth into the alien planet, and insisting that the outward thrust of science fiction be matched by an inward journey. The estranging, detritusstrewn landscapes of much of his fiction indicate Ballard's fascination with surrealist art, though his Empire of the Sun (1983), a novel drawing on his boyhood experience of World War II in the Far East, reveals a source closer to home for his images of collapse and desolation. Ballard's catastrophe novels, like The Drowned World (1962), The Drought (1965) and The Crystal World (1966), bear some relation to the disaster stories of John Wyndham and John Christopher, though there is little in the way of romantic nostalgia in his treatment of 'biospheric' disasters. What might be seen as his post-imperial pessimism has not generally endeared Ballard to an American audience. His experimental 'condensed' novels, which first began appearing in New Worlds, were published together in The Atrocity Exhibition (1970) and, again, did not find favour in the U.S. The disturbing presentation of perverse urban nightmares in Crash! (1973), Concrete Island (1974) and High Rise (1975) bring the concept of the science fiction catastrophe even closer to our own time, as if the irreversible disaster had already occurred in our culture.

> Doris Lessing, who turned to science fiction in the early 1970s when her reputation as a mainstream novelist was already established, is also drawn towards visions of the decline and breakdown of society. The last volume of the 'Children of Violence' novels, The Four-Gated City (1969), ultimately projects into the future, but from the publication of Briefing for a Descent into Hell (1971) Lessing has shown a firm commitment to the exploratory, speculative potential of science fiction, with particular reference to questions of gender and the theme of spiritual awakening. The evocations of collapse and depletion in Lessing's science fiction, which, in the 1980s, turns to space fiction on the grand galactic scale, are set against the possibility of a utopian alternative, and its emphasis is more mystical than scientific. In Briefing and Memoirs the alternative might amount to no more than dreams; but in Shikasta (1979) utopian society is destroyed by a malign galactic empire, while in The Marriages between Zones Three, Four, and Five (1980) it is confirmed that the project of utopian evolutionary development, through, for example, the use of psychic powers, lies within the province of women.

A number of > Angela Carter's novels may be classed as science fiction, though, like Lessing, she tends not to focus primarily on science. Heroes and Villains (1970) is set in the familiar terrain of a post-catastrophe world and, using the structure of romantic fantasy, explores a variety of dualities, including fantasy/reality, beauty/barbarism, love/hate, male/female. Carter's particular skill, evident in The Infernal Desire Machines of Dr Hoffman (1972), The Passion of New Eve (1977) and Nights at the Circus (1983), lies in her exuberantly self-conscious, inventive storytelling in which romance, satire, horror and comedy interact exotically.

Ian Watson is also adept in exotic narrative, for example, Whores of Babylon (1988), but his reputation has been for intellectual, speculative brilliance. His texts, like Lessing's, have a tendency to the mystical and transcendent, and approach the possibility of such transcendence through the discourses of science, linguistics, mysticism and myth, as is impressively demonstrated by his first four novels: The Embedding (1973), The Jonah Kit (1976), The Martian Inca (1977) and Alien Embassy (1977).

Christopher Priest also built up during the 1970s a reputation as a thoughtful and inventive science fiction author through such works as Inverted World (1974) and A Dream of Wessex (1977).

Science fiction might be said to have begun with the work of a woman and, looked at one way, Mary Shelley's Frankenstein is a coded analysis of female experience. The women's movement of recent years, with a strong lead from the United States, has led to a powerful reaction against science fiction's traditional marginalization of women, and Lessing is not unique in turning to science fiction from a different novel tradition. Michèle Roberts, for example, adopts the dystopian mode in The Book of Mrs Noah (1973), while > Zoë Fairbairns uses science fiction's speculative resources to consider the issue of wages for housework in Benefits (1979). The Women's Press boasts a growing list of feminist science fiction, and one of the editors responsible for this, Sarah Lefanu, has written a study of feminism and science fiction, In the Chinks of the World Machine (1988). Commenting on the value of science fiction, Lefanu has said: 'It deals with the possibility of change, and allows the investigation of radical ideas.'

The more male-oriented, technological tradition of science fiction has been reinvigorated through the 1980s and into the 1990s by the writers of 'cyberpunk' fiction. The formative influence in establishing this subgenre is the American William Gibson, in whose Neuromancer (1984) the term 'cyberspace', now routinely used in writings on contemporary information technology, was coined. Fredric Jameson has called cyberpunk 'the supreme literary expression if not of postmodernism, then of late capitalism itself. His assertion is symptomatic of a convergence of the discourses of science fiction, of the kind of critical writing now loosely termed 'theory', and of technological discussion, particularly in fields related to the concept of virtual reality. This concept is as much the invention of the science fiction genre as of the information industry, and it is the ground on which the novels of Jeff Noon, preeminent among British writers of cyberpunk, are constructed. His Vurt (1993) and Pollen (1995), for all the appearance of novelty which has been claimed for cyberpunk, draw, like the work of Gibson, on long-standing traditions of science fiction and of related popular forms, like the hard-boiled detective story. Frankenstein's obsession with the ambiguous distinction between human and mechanical is, in new guises, fundamental to cyberpunk; and the works of William Burroughs, Philip K. Dick and J. G. Ballard cast long shadows into the fiction of such as Noon.

In the same period that has seen the rise of cyberpunk, the tradition of space opera has been kept alive in the prolific output of Ian M. Banks, the galactic expansiveness of whose plots contracts with cyberpunk's world of 'nonspace'. In works like The Player of Games (1988) and Against a Dark Background (1993) Banks elegantly recycles a wide range of science fiction conventions, sometimes with a parodic edge which recalls the witty and popular fictions of Douglas Adams and Terry Pratchett. The popularity of this parodic strain is some indication of how deeply embedded the narratives of science fiction have become in our culture, not just through literature, but also through other popular media influenced by and, in turn, influencing literary production.

Scotland

The northern kingdom of Great Britain. Geographically, racially, linguistically and culturally, it has two parts.

The northern and north-western half, known as the Highlands and the Islands, is Celtic in race, with a Norse admixture. The native language was originally the Celtic one called > Gaelic, but this is now spoken only by a small minority. Until the middle of the 18th century its social structure was of the semitribal clan system under hereditary chieftains. Its culture was chiefly oral and Gaelic-speaking. and much of it has been lost. The so-called Scottish national dress, of the kilt woven into chequered designs known as tartans, was peculiar to this region; it was forbidden after the second Jacobite rebellion of 1745, when the British government started its policy of colonizing the Highlands, but it was revived in the 19th century as a sentimental fashion for the upper classes and is now an extremely profitable export item. This region of Scotland, though extremely beautiful, has had a torn history; centuries of clan warfare were followed by a century and a half of economic neglect and depopulation, during which the small farms or 'crofts' were steadily replaced by 'grouse moors', preserved by rich landlords for hunting and shooting. In the 20th century the economy has to some extent revived, thanks to the tourist industry and efforts by successive governments to cultivate forests.

The southern and eastern half of the country is called the Lowlands, and contains all the important cities including the capital, Edinburgh, and the largest, Glasgow. These two cities are respectively at the east and west ends of the narrowest part of the country, and the plain between them is a rich coal-mining area. The Lowlands are geographically hilly, in spite of their name. Racially, the population is as Germanic in origin as that of most of England, and with small exceptions it has always been English-speaking. It has never been subjected to the clan system of the Highlands, although the great families along the border with England had, until the 17th century, an influence comparable to that of the clan chieftains of the Celtic north. Economically and politically, the Lowlands have always been the richer and more important part of the country. When we speak of Scottish culture, we are nearly always thinking of the literature of the Lowlands; this has had its distinctive tradition, but it has become increasingly absorbed into English culture since the 16th century.

Scott, Hugh Stowell (1862-1903) Writer of adventure > romances, which he published under the name 'Henry Seton Merriman'. Most of them have rapid, exciting plots and exotic settings, which Scott researched on his extensive travels. The son of a shipowner in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Scott abandoned a business career early on to pursue writing and travelling; it has been suggested that he worked for the British intelligence services, and some of his work is strongly pro- > imperialist. His novels include: The Slave of the Lamp (1892); With Edged Tools (1894); The Grey Lady (1895); In Kedar's Tents (1897); The Isle of Unrest (1900); Barlasch of the Guard (1902); The Last Hope (1904).

Scott, Mary (Taylor) (1752-1793) English poet. She lived in the same house as > Elizabeth Rowe in Somerset, and who knew > Anna Seward. She wrote in favour of women's > education. In The Female Advocate (designed as a sequel to John Duncombe's Feminiad) she praises past and contemporary women writers, saying of ➤ Sarah Fielding, "Twas Fielding's talent, with ingenious Art, / To trace the secret mazes of the Heart', and of ➤ Anne Killigrew, 'in thee . . . we find / The Poet's and the Painter's arts combin'd'. In the same text she reserves a special place for > Lady Mary Chudleigh, who had the courage to assert that women were naturally equal to men and to 'plead thy hapless injured sex's cause'. She married John Scott in 1788, when her mother died. In the same year she published The Messiah, and she also wrote hymns. Her son founded the Manchester Guardian.

> Astell, Mary; Williams, Helen Maria

Scott, Paul (1920-78)

Novelist. He served in India, Burma and Malaya during World War II and subsequently worked in publishing. His major achievement was The Raj Quartet, a tetralogy consisting of: The Jewel in the Crown (1966); The Day of the Scorpion (1968); The Towers of Silence (1971); A Division of the Spoils (1975). A portrait of Indian society at the time of Independence in 1947, it uses a range of narrative forms, including letters, journals, reports and memories. The story is built around the consequences of the rape of an English girl; consequences which serve to reveal corruption and racism in the Raj adminstration and the roots of the political unrest and intercommunal violence at the Partition of India. Scott was accorded little critical recognition until Staying On (1977), a gentle satire set after Independence, won the Booker Prize. His work is notable for its combination of complex narrative technique with historical accuracy. The Raj Quartet was televised as The Jewel in the Crown in 1984 and Staying On was adapted for television in 1981. Scott's earlier novels include The Birds of Paradise (1962).

Scott, Sarah (Robinson) (1732-1795) English novelist, writer of ▷ utopias and historian. She was the sister and correspondent of ➤ Elizabeth Montagu, the ➤ Bluestocking. She wrote for money after leaving her husband (whom she had married in 1751) and moved with Barbara Montagu to launch a female community at Bath Easton, where they taught poor children. They lived here from 1754 to 1756. Scott wrote six novels, but her wellknown Description of Millenium Hall (1762) uses this idea of a woman's community. This secular separatist community based around > rational virtues provided at least one answer to the unstable social and economic place of the unmarried or - particularly - separated woman. The novel opens with a man whose coach has broken down in Cornwall impressed by the rational yet pleasurable employments of the women. He first sees them engaged in their rational pursuits: 'in the bow [window] sat two ladies reading, with pen, ink and paper on a table before them, at which was a young girl translating out of the French.'

Other publications: The History of Cornelia (1750); A Journey Through Every Stage in Life (1754); Agreeable Ugliness, or the Triumph of the Graces (1754); Sir George Ellison (1766), and The Test of Filial Duty (1772).

Scott, Sir Walter (1771–1832) Scottish poet and novelist. The son of an Edinburgh lawyer, he was descended from famous families on the Scottish side of the border with England. This ancestry early attracted him to the drama and tragedy of Anglo-Scottish border history; he became an antiquarian, and a very Romantic one. His > Romanticism was stimulated further by reading the poetry of the contemporary Germans, Bürger and > Goethe; he hoped to do for the Scottish border what they had done for the German Middle Ages, and make its past live again in modern romance. A widespread taste was already developed for the Middle Ages and was manifesting itself in the > Gothic novel. He collaborated with the most famous of the Gothic novelists - > 'Monk' Lewis - in producing Tales of Wonder in 1801. A little later > S. T. Coleridge's poem > Christabel inspired him to write poems in the same metre, and between 1805 and 1815 he produced the succession of narrative poems which made him famous. He began to feel himself outdone as a narrative poet by > Byron, however, and from 1815 he devoted himself to the novels for which he is now better known. Publishing enterprises in which he had begun to involve himself in 1809 left him with a debt of f,130,000 to pay off, when the London publisher Constable went bankrupt. Scott was immensely proud, and determined to pay off the debt by his own literary efforts. By writing very prolifically for the rest of his life, he nearly succeeded; he was by then a very sick man, and his efforts are a legend of literary heroism.

Scott's most famous poems are The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805); > Marmion (1808), and > The Lady of the Lake (1810). The first two are from Anglo-Scottish border history and legend; the third is about the equally bitter enmity of Scottish Highlander for Scottish Lowlander. The readability of these poems makes it easy to account for their popularity, but the kind of interest they offer – the dramatization of the life of a whole society – was not such as Scott was able to work out in the verse-narrative medium.

His novels show a double interest: he was the first novelist in English to present characters as part of a society, and not merely against the background of a particular society, the nature of which is taken for granted; he was also the inventor of the true historical novel. His best work is contained in the Waverley novels and in the first three series of Tales of My Landlord: ➤ Waverley (1814), Guy Mannering (1815), The Antiquary (1816), Old Mortality (1816), Rob Roy (1817), > The Heart of Midlothian (1818), The Bride of Lammermoor and The Legend of Montrose (1819). All these concern 17th- and 18th-century Scotland, and the religious and dynastic struggles that shaped the nation as Scott knew it. From then onwards he was writing with excessive haste in order to pay off his debts, and he commonly chose English and medieval subjects, eg > Ivanhoe (1819), Kenilworth (about English Elizabethan times – 1821), Quentin Durward (1823) and some 16 others, only one of which, St Roman's Well (1823), was set in Scott's own time.

Not only was Scott's influence, both in Britain and Europe, very large in shaping literary taste, but he had an extensive influence in encouraging non-literary taste, such as that for wild landscape (especially of the Highlands) and more intelligent interest in the past. As a critic he was among the first to recognize the genius of > Jane Austen. In politics he was a staunch Conservative, and he helped to found the great Tory review, the > Quarterly, in 1809. Scottish Chaucerians

A rather over-generalized term, applied to a diverse group of Scottish poets of the 15th and 16th centuries (including > William Dunbar, > Robert Henryson, > Gavin Douglas, and James 1 of Scotland, author of the Kingis Quair), on the grounds that their work shows signs of Chaucerian influence.

Scottish literature in English

Despite its origins in Old English and in twelfth century Northern English, Scots (the language of lowland Scotland since the Middle Ages) can be seen as a language in its own right, rather than as simply a dialect of English, closely related as the two undoubtedly are. Both Scottish and English people generally regard the two speeches as markedly different, with the Scottish vernacular largely incomprehensible to most southerners; Scots has a range of features which is sufficiently copious to mark it out as something more than a dialect; it has been associated for most of its history with a distinctive political entity; it possesses a long and rich literary tradition of its own. Throughout its history, however, it has variously interacted with English, a language which has often exerted a powerful influence on Scottish speech and writing. These related languages, in fact, constitute two of Scotland's principal languages, Gaelic being the third.

The war of independence against England (1296–1328), prompted two early heroic poems.

▶ John Barbour's The Bruce (1375–8), an epic in 8-syllable couplets, was written at a time when Scottish political fortunes were low; its intention is to inspire the national spirit, less by rhetorical eloquence than by the facts of the heroic struggle. Blind Harry's Wallace (1476–78) was equally nationalistic. Both remained favourite reading amongst ordinary Scots until the 18th century. Very different in method and subject is The Kingis Quair (c 1424), perhaps by James I of Scotland, some of whose reign was spent in imprisonment in England: partly an account of James' love and marriage, it is also a dream-vision in the tradition of Boethius. In Scotland, the 15th century saw the beginning of a golden age, covering the careers of Robert Henryson, William Dunbar, Gavin Douglas, and David Lindsay - the 'makars'. The climax of this period was the reign of the exceptionally able James IV (1488-1513). Henryson's versions of The Fables of Aesop mix comic realism, satire and moral comment: his masterpiece is The Testament of Cresseid, a continuation of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Troilus and Criseyde, but with a tragic quality which is quite un-Chaucerian. Dunbar wrote in contrasting styles - the courtly and the colloquial; his finest work is perhaps the latter, notably, the Tretis of the Tua Mariit Wemen and the Wedoe (Treatise of the Two Married Women and the Widow). Douglas' finest work is his translation of Virgil's Aeneid, and Lindsay is best known for his Ane Pleasant Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis (c 1540), a political morality which is still regularly and successfully revived and which is perhaps even yet Scotland's greatest play.

Despite the religious Reformation and all the political troubles attendant on it from 1550 till the early 18th century, Scotland continued to produce poetry of value by such writers as Alexander Scott, Alexander Hume, Alexander Montgomerie and William Drummond of Hawthornden. The first three wrote within a tradition of 'art' poetry but continued to use vernacular Scots; Drummond is usually seen as reflecting in verse that shift towards increasing use of English by Scots (especially of the upper classes) consequent upon the move of the court to London in 1603, and also consequent upon the church use of English translations of the Bible after 1560 - no major translation of the Bible in Scots was available until that of the New Testament by W. L. Lorimer (1983). The poetic use of Scots, however, was kept alive in the 17th century by the reprinting of heroic and comic poems of the 15th and 16th centuries, and by a continuing tradition of writing new, often occasional, comic and satire verses such as the astonishingly popular and influential poem The Life and Death of Habbie Simson, the piper of Kilbarchan by Robert Sempill (c 1595-c1665) with its six-line stanza known to Ramsay and Burns as 'standard Habbie', and to us as 'the Burns stanza'. Equally important was the ballad and folksong tradition, strongly alive from the middle ages until the 20th century, and capable both of producing individual ballad texts of greatness and also of influencing novelists such as Scott, Hogg, Stevenson, Gibbon and Gunn.

Early in the 18th century, stimulated in part by Scotland's final loss of political independence with the Treaty of Union in 1707, there occurred a revival of antiquarian interest in Scotland's distinctive heritage. Collections of earlier poetry were compiled and published: ballads and folksongs, poems by the makars and by the 16th-century court poets, and poetry of the 17th century. Stimulated by this antiquarian activity, there was a major revival of new poetry by Scottish poets. > Allan Ramsay (1684–1758) was both anthologist and original poet, using both Scots and English. His most influential work was a Scottish pastoral play, The Gentle Shepherd, which like the works of Barbour and of Blind Harry became a favourite with ordinary Scottish readers for generations after Ramsay's death. The best of Ramsay, however, is in his poems of Edinburgh city life. A greater poet, though with a smaller body of poems as a result of his early death, was ➤ Robert Fergusson (1750-74). He, too, is particularly the author of poems reflecting life in Edinburgh during the Scottish Enlightenment - not merely his long poem surveying the city through twentyfour hours, Auld Reekie, but also a series of occasional poems describing and commenting upon the scenes and issues of the day. Some of his poems describe rural life, however, including The Farmer's Ingle, which was a model for one of Burn's best-known poems, The Cotter's Saturday Night. Fergusson's greatness lies in his ability to combine an ear for spoken Scots with the formal requirements of his verse. Like Burns after him, Fergusson was a master of Scots vernacular who wrote with a confident knowledge of the poetry of the great English Augustans.

➤ Robert Burns (1759–96) is perhaps the first internationally famous Scottish poet since the 16th century. He is the culmination of the major trends in 18th century vernacular verse, and is also the fountainhead of much that occurred, for good or ill, in Scottish literature for a century after his death. It is still possible to find the view being expressed that Burns was an instinctive master when he wrote in Scots, and the creator of lifeless verse when he wrote (as he regularly did) in English. In fact, Burns could be fallible when writing Scots verse, and could write impressively in English, as in the final section of The Cotter's Saturday Night. The tradition, begun in his own lifetime, that his palpable greatness was a mystery in view of his presumed lack of educational opportunity - that he was a 'heaven-taught ploughman', in fact - accords neither with what we know of his substantial education and reading, nor with the evident conscious artistry of his poems. Best known now for his love-songs and for the verse narrative Tam o' Shanter (a late and uncharacteristic piece), Burns was also the author of poems of many types, including a number of fine satires, often deriving from ecclesiastical disputes but at their best, as in Holy Willie's Prayer, transcending their narrow and unappealing origins to attain to a compelling, and entertaining, universality.

18th-century Scottish verse seems so dominated by the Ramsay-Fergusson-Burns triumvirate that it is easy to lose sight of the existence of much vigorous, if secondary, writing, from other users of Scots such as Alexander Ross, and from practitioners in English such as James Beattie and James Thomson. Hugely influential, also, was ▷ James MacPherson (1736–96), whose alleged translations of ancient Gaelic material aroused controversy even when they first appeared: viewed as reflections of an 18th-century cultural moment, some of their contemporary power and appeal can still be sensed.

Burns' example was a powerful one in colouring much 19th writing in prose and verse: not only did many lesser poets adopt too easily his most popular modes, in poems of sentimental love, or comic booziness, or commonplace sententiousness, but the association of quintessential Scottishness with rural life, naturally arising in a country transformed by the industrial explosion and population shifts of the 19th century, was given an extra confirmation by the popularity of his work. Yet, the long-held view that Scottish poetry between Burns and MacDiarmid is a sorry picture of embarrassing vapidity is increasingly difficult to sustain. While the major poems of Walter Scott have yet to undergo the modern re-evaluation from which his novels have benefited, James Hogg (1770-1835) and William Tennant (1784-1848) have re-emerged as individualist minor poets, and Byron himself is regularly claimed as an essentially Scottish poet. Much work remains to be done, not only in re-evaluating such poets as \triangleright James Thomson (1834–82), author of The City of Dreadful Night, and > John Davidson (1857-1909), but also in exploring the wealth of local and working-class poetry produced by a population for whom both the reading and writing of verse seem to have been frequent and favourite activities.

Important prose works in Scots exist from the 15th and 16th centuries, but prose proved to be far more susceptible than verse to erosion from English influence. While > John Knox's writing contains more Scottish features than is often assumed, it is true to say that most of the important prose works of the 17th and 18th centuries are in English. The peaks of this writing are in the works of Sir Thomas Urguhart of Cromarty (c 1611-1660), and of such Enlightenment luminaries as David Hume (1711-76) and Adam Smith (1723-90). Much vigorous writing, however, lies in works of historiography, and of memoir, and of controversial prose. > Boswell's > Life of Johnson (1791) and Lockhart's Life of Scott (1837-8), the two great classic biographies in English, were written by Scots. The writings of ➤ Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881) were amongst the most influential of the 19th century, and Hugh Miller (1802-56), perhaps the most gifted writer living and writing in Scotland during the 1840s and early 1850s, was a journalist, a local antiquarian, a scientist and an autobiographer.

Scotland had important novelists in the 18th century, but while Tobias Smollett (1721-71) is still read, at least to some extent, ▷ Henry Mackenzie (1771-1832), 'the Man of Feeling', is now regarded by most readers as an example of the unaccountable taste of a previous age. The Scottish novel, as a powerful and distinct fictional tradition, begins with Scott and his generation. > Walter Scott (1771-1832) remains Scotland's greatest novelist, but while his achievement is widely recognised, the very individual artistries of Hogg, especially in The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner, and of \triangleright John Galt (1779–1839), especially in Annals of the Parish, The Provost and The Entail, are still insufficiently realised by English-speaking readers. All three novelists use English narrative but each succeeds in writing, where appropriate, fine Scots speech which is both true to the language yet accessible to non-Scots. The necessity of being simultaneously true to the linguistic realities of Scotland, while retaining accessibility and appeal to non-Scots, has been a condition of writing facing most major Scottish novelists from Scott's time to the present. Some have realised, with Galt, that it is possible to write prose which is clearly Scottish while using few if any uniquely Scots words or expressions: rhythm, intonation and syntax can do the work alone. 19th-century Scottish fiction is increasingly being seen, not as a desert in which only > Robert Louis Stevenson (1850-94) can be discerned (as it was until recently), nor yet as the domain of a few other recently rediscovered worthy (if still secondary) authors such as ➤ Margaret Oliphant (1828-97) and ▷ George MacDonald (1824-1905), nor even as merely a one-way road to the sentimentality of the Kailyard writers ('Ian Maclaren', S. R. Crockett, J. M. Barrie). Rather, it is perceived as embodying the cross-currents, contradictions and selfexaminations of a small country coming to terms (at last) with its changed economic and political circumstances, and clinging to as much of its distinctiveness as it can.

The late-Victorian sentimentality of Kailyard fiction was vigorously countered by the grim and melodramatic realism of ▷ George Douglas Brown (in The House with the Green Shutters, 1901) and J. MacDougall Hay (in Gillespie, 1914). The 20th century has seen what is often described as the Scottish Renaissance, which suggests a revival in cultural production and political identity. There have been several phases in this rejuvenation of Scottish writing. The first, in the early part of this century, was associated with a growth in nationalistic settlement. In this period the work of C. M. Grieve (▷ Hugh MacDiarmid) (1892–1978) is most seminal. MacDiarmid's first major publications were two collections of modernistic lyrics (1925, 1926) in a Scots heavily enriched by words and phrases from a wide range of Scottish dialects and from earlier phases of the language. While clearly written in artificial literary Scots (to which the ancient term 'Lallans' was reapplied), the resulting poems are of great power and beauty. From more (mainly) short poems, MacDiarmid fashioned his most famous work, a long poem dealing with modern Scotland and with the human condition in general, A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle (1926). In the 1930s, MacDiarmid began to use English once more and to explore the poetic possibilities of other areas of specialised language, such as the geological terminology in his later masterpiece On a Raised Beach (written 1933). Varied and unequal as MacDiarmid's output was, he was successful in his aim of placing Scottish literature firmly in the European modernist movement.

Other important writers of the first phase include the poet and critic ➤ Edwin Muir (1887-1959), and the novelists James Leslie Mitchell (▶ Lewis Grassic Gibbon) (1901–35) and Neil M. Gunn (1891-1973). Writing poems mainly in English, Muir adopts a mythopoeic discourse; in his important critical work Scott and Scotland (1936) he dissociates himself from some of the theoretical assumptions underpinning MacDiarmid's 20th-century Renaissance enterprise. Gibbon's writing is perhaps the most deeply and intelligently political of a very politicised group of writers; nevertheless, he is remembered by many readers primarily for the powerfully elegaic treatment of Scottish rural life in Sunset Song (1932), the first part of his trilogy A Scots Quair (1932-4). Gunn writes of his native northern highlands in an impressive body of work in which the history and pain of Highland life in the 19th and 20th centuries become means for expressing his deeper insights into the psychology of human experience.

The second phase, in the 1940s and 1950s, produced poems such as Sydney Goodsir Smith (1915-75), Alexander Scott (1920-89) and Robert Garioch (1909-81), inspired by MacDiarmid's example to further establish the poetic use of Scots. Such writers saw themselves as continuing the programme of cultural nationalism which MacDiarmid had begun. In this period however poets also appeared whose poetic language is English. These include Norman MacCaig (b 1910) and George Mackay Brown (b 1921). Iain Crichton Smith (b 1928) must be grouped with these, although his writing in Gaelic (a language also enjoying a 20th-century poetic renaissance thanks to the MacDiarmid-like achievement of Sorley Maclean) is an equally important part of his life's work.

Emerging from this second phase, however, is the period which still broadly continues, a period in which nationalistic commitment is scarcely if at all stressed by many writers. The 'renaissance' has done its job. Scottish writers now, with a new self-confidence and ease, write about, and from, Scotland; 'Scotland' is no longer a quaint literary domain which must be presented to the world with awkward self-consciousness. This ease can be sensed in the work of such diverse poets as ➤ Douglas Dunn (b 1942), Don Patterson, Kathleen Jamie (b 1962) and Carol Ann Duffy (b 1955).

Important elements of MacDiarmid's programme are still visible, but the sense of the programmatic has gone. Thus the national and regional are still celebrated in novels by Robin Jenkins (b 1912) and Jessie Kesson (1915-95), while a powerful left-wing vision is still articulated by, for example, the playwright > John McGrath in The Cheviot, the Stag and the Black, Black Oil, and by such diverse novelists as ➤ William McIlvanney (b 1936), ➤ Alasdair Gray (b 1934) and > James Kelman (b 1946). These three writers, with others such as Agnes Owens (b 1926), Jeff Torrington and the poet Edwin Morgan (b 1920), form a distinctively Glasgow/West-Coast school of current Scottish writing; the best-known work emanating from this group is Gray's Lanark (1981). Edinburgh's answer is in the bleak but vital and comic treatments of the city's underside by Irvine Welsh, Kelman and Welsh, who along with poets such as Tom Leonard (b 1944) and W. N. Herbert (b 1961), embody a new willingness to use the Scots vernacular - not, however, the literary 'Lallans' of MacDiarmid and his disciples, but the rough, vigorous, inventive, rhythmic and often foul-mouthed language of urban working-class life.

MacDiarmid's commitment to high aesthetic ideals is echoed in the novels of > Muriel Spark (b 1918), perhaps the best-known, internationally, of 20th-century Scottish novelists. Women writers are often overlooked in brief accounts of Scottish literature, but the achievements of 18th-century poets such as Lady Nairne (1766-1845), of such bearers of folk-tradition as Anna Gordon (1747-1810) and Jeannie Robertson (1908-75), of 19th-century writers like the novelists Susan Ferrier (1782-1854) and Margaret Oliphant and the autobiographer Elizabeth Grant (1797-1885), of a host of earlier 20thcentury poets and novelists (Violet Jacob, Marion Angus, Helen Cruickshank, Nan Shepherd, Naomi Mitchison, Willa Muir among others) can perhaps be seen as prefiguring those of such important current writers as A. L. Kennedy (b 1965), > Janice Galloway (b 1956), Dilys Rose (b 1954), etc. Several women writers are distinguished practitioners of the short story, a genre of some importance in current Scottish

Scriblerus Club

Formed in 1713 by ➤ Alexander Pope, > Ionathan Swift, > Iohn Gay, > Thomas Parnell, > John Arbuthnot, and the Tory politician, Lord Oxford. The aim was to satirize 'false tastes' through the fictional memoirs of a conceited and arrogant 'modern' writer, Martinus Scriblerus. The club's members were scattered when the Tories fell from power after Queen > Anne's death in 1714. Only the first volume of the memoirs was completed, and this was published in Pope's works in 1741. However, the ideas initiated at this time saw fruit in various later works, in particular Pope's ➤ Dunciad, many of the notes of which are signed 'Scriblerus', and in the > satire on science and learning in the third book of Swift's > Gulliver's Travels.

Scrutiny

A literary critical review published in Cambridge from 1932 to 1953; its principal editor was > F. R. Leavis. Scrutiny was famous for its intellectual energy, the coherence of outlook among its contributors, and the urgency and purposefulness of its tone. This purposefulness was a response to a Leavisite analysis of the contemporary cultural scene which may be summarized as follows. The quality of Western (more particularly, British) civilization was deteriorating because of the influence upon it of commercial vulgarization. Such vulgarization could only end in the complete loss of those standards by which life in any organized society can be seen and felt to be valuable. The importance of a great literary tradition is that it constitutes a form of spiritual life that sustains high values and withstands vulgarization. However, such a tradition must itself be sustained by constant, sensitive and scrupulous critical activity carried on by alert and active intellects within the society. But the British literary tradition no longer possessed this kind of cultural leadership; the leading men of letters, on the contrary, with a few exceptions, regarded literature as an elegant pastime for a fashionable elite (such as the ▶ Bloomsbury Group) and they employed slack and inadequate standards in their judgements. Scrutiny, therefore, was intended to demonstrate the exacting standards which are required of criticism if a lively and effective literary tradition is to be sustained. The example to be followed was that of the recently defunct review, The Calendar of Modern Letters (1925-27) edited by Edgell Rickword.

The strongest part of Scrutiny's critical attack was directed towards literary education. It sought to counteract the kind of academic inertia which tends to the passive acceptance of some literary reputations and the equally passive neglect of other writers. This policy led to an extensive revaluation of the writers of the past. In regard to poetry, this revaluation took the direction already pursued by T. S. Eliot (Selected Essays, 1932); in regard to the novel, the dominant influences were those of F. R. Leavis himself, and his wife ▷ Q. D. Leavis. Scrutiny had a pervasive influence in Britain and the USA, especially among teachers at all levels of education. Scudéry, Madeleine de (1607-1701)

French writer of ⊳ epic novels, nouvelles (short fiction), letters and occasional verse, and a notable précieuse (> Precious Women). In her youth, she frequented the Chambre bleue, the salon of the Marquise de Rambouillet (1588-1665), with her brother, the dramatist and Academician Georges de Scudéry (1601-67). Madeleine lived with her brother in Paris and Marseilles until his marriage to Marie-Madeleine du Moncel de Martinval in 1654, writing a series of romansà-clef, set in exotic locations; the characters, though in disguise, could easily be identified from among their friends and acquaintances. Although mercilessly mocked by the writers Charles Sorel (c 1600-1674), Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet (1627-1704) and others, these novels were of great importance for raising the status of women and fiction.

Ibrahim, ou l'illustre Bassa (1641) contains one of the few theoretical prefaces to be written by a novelist in the 17th century. It seeks to give fiction ▷ classical antecedents, by aligning the novel with the epic poem and identifying history as the mainstay of vraisemblance (verisimilitude) in the novel. The success of this four-volume novel encouraged Madeleine de Scudéry to use wider canvases for her next two novels, Artamène, ou le Grand Cyrus (1649-1653, translated as Artamenes, or The Grand Cyrus, 1653-5), which contained a mise en abyme of the Hôtel de Rambouillet and her own samedis (Saturday salons) at the rue de Beauce in Paris, and Clélie, histoire romaine (1654-60, translated as Clelia: An excellent new romance, 1661). Both these novels also appeared under Georges de Scudéry's name, though there is a marked change of tone after their separation at the end of volume 2 of Clélie, which is the most > 'feminist' of Madeleine de Scudéry's writings and includes the celebrated 'Carte de Tendre', an allegorical map of love. Known as the 'incomparable > Sappho', Madeleine de Scudéry was noted for her intellect and learning even among the most respected scholars of her day, though her lack of Latin and Greek meant that she could not consult the many classical historians on whom she loosely based her fiction in the original. Despite the innumerable anachronisms in her novels, she may be regarded as the 'mother of the historical novel in France'. She also wrote

Les Femmes illustres, ou les Harangues héroiques (The Illustrious Women, or The Heroic Speeches), Célinte, nouvelle première (1661), Mathilde d'Aguilar (1667) and Célanire (1669), which includes La Promenade de Versailles.

In 1657, Mademoiselle de Scudéry received a pension from the superintedent of finances, Nicolas Fouquet (1615-80), to whom she remained a loval friend. Among her other benefactors were the First Minister, Mazarin (1602-61), Queen Christina of Sweden (1626-89) and Louis XIV (1638-1715), though she always had difficulty making ends meet. Madeleine de Scudéry was elected to the Academy of the Ricovrati in 1684 and is said to have been the first woman to have been considered for election to the French Academy. Her ugliness was frequently remarked upon. She admits to having received three proposals of marriage, but, in keeping with the theory of amitié tendre (loving friendship) developed in her novels, she refused even to marry the Academician Paul Pellisson (1624-93), who was devoted to her. A series of influential selections from the dialogues in her novels was published during the 1680s. Bib: Tallemant des Réaux, Historiettes: Aronson, N., Mademoiselle de Scudéry.

Scudéry, Marie-Madeleine du Moncel de Martinval (1627–1711)

French correspondent and co-author of a novel. She helped her husband, the dramatic poet Georges de Scudéry (1601-67), to write the novel Almahide, ou l'esclave reine (Almahida, or The Slave Queen, 1661-3 and is noted for her cultivated correspondence with, among others, the exiled writer Roger de Bussy-Rabutin (1618-93). The main theme of her letters is the value of friendship. She appears in Somaize's Dictionnaire des Précieuses (Dictionary of the Precious Women, 1659) under the pseudonym Sarraïde, as '[1]' une des plus grandes précieuses du royaume, ('one of the greatest précieuses of the realm') (> Precious Women). The memoirwriter Tallemant des Réaux (1619-1692) portravs her as a romantic woman yearning to work on a novel, and who married late in life under the mistaken illusion that Georges de Scudéry had written the great novels published under his name. Of her relationship with her husband, Tallemant writes: 'their marriage was made in their writings rather than in the normal way, for their mutual inclination was a question of the similarities in their style of writing which came before their wedding.' It was generally felt that her prose was better than his verse, and her letters have recently been reappraised.

Seasons, The (1726–30)
Four ▷ blank-verse poems by ▷ James Thomson. Winter was published in 1726, followed by Summer (1727), and Spring (1728). Autumn first appeared in the collected Seasons in 1730, which also contained a concluding Hymn on the Seasons. The work blends numerous strands: the > classical spirit of > Virgil's Pastorals and ▷ Georgics, a self-conscious sublimity which comes from > John Milton, and the topographical genre popularized by > Sir John Denham's > Cooper's Hill (1642) and ➤ Alexander Pope's ➤ Windsor Forest (1713). Thomson's blank verse is an extremely flexible and capacious medium, though always affecting a somewhat mechanical Miltonic dignity. On the one hand there are charming descriptions of the natural scene (> nature), such as the famous snow scenes in Winter, the nest-building passage in Spring, and the Summer thunderstorm. There are discussions of philosophy and morality, such as the condemnation of blood-sports in Autumn, and the expression of ▷ 'natural religion' in the concluding hymn. There are celebrations of British history, industry and commerce in Summer and Autumn, and ▷ sentimental vignettes of rural life, such as the man dying in the snow in Winter and Amelia struck by lightning as she is embraced by her astonished lover in Summer.

An important element is Thomson's scientific and practical approach to nature. In Summer he describes the beginning of the Newtonian universe, as the 'unwieldy planets' are 'launched along/ The illimitable void'. In Autumn he speculates on the migration of birds, and throughout the poems he is concerned to use a kind of poetic version of Linnaean taxonomy, stressing the generic qualities of animals and plants: 'plumy people' (birds) 'the finny drove' (fish) and 'woolly people' (sheep). Typically nature is seen as providing a livelihood to man. Despite their influence on later more > romantic 'nature poets', such as > Mark Akenside, ➤ William Collins, ➤ William Cowper, ➤ Thomas Gray and ➤ William Wordsworth, the Seasons in themselves are peculiarly smug and inert in their > Augustan optimism. Thomson's is a world in which, without a qualm, 'Man superior walks/ Amid the glad creation', where farm labourers are picturesque adjuncts of the landscape, and where British industry and commerce subject the world. Its ideal for living smacks of bourgeois self-congratulation:

An elegant sufficency, content, Retirement, rural quiet, friendship, books, Ease and alternate labour, useful life, Progressive virtue, and approving Heaven!

Second Nun's Tale, The
One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. A saint's life, written in ▷ rhyme royal, recounting the life and martyrdom of St Cecilia, a noble

Roman maiden, who publically affirms the power of the Christian faith and opposes the pagan practices of the Deputy, Almachius. Her husband and brother become martyrs for the faith but Cecilia defies Almachius' attempts to kill her by boiling her in a bath. Even when her throat is cut, Cecilia miraculously manages to continue preaching for three days before dying. Her testimony converts many to Christianity, both during her lifetime and afterwards. The story of her life follows the outline of her life in the > Golden Legend.

Secret Agent, The (1907)

A novel by ➤ Joseph Conrad. The subject is revolution and counter-revolution in western Europe; the scene is London; the 'secret agent' is Mr Verloc, of mixed nationality. He is employed by the embassy of an unnamed foreign power (Czarist Russia) to mix with anarchist conspirators who have taken refuge on British soil, and to report their activities. Between the embassy and the conspirators are the London police, represented by Chief Inspector Heat, whose work is to watch the anarchists but not to interfere with them until they commit crimes. The embassy wishes to force the British government and its police to suppress the anarchist colony, and uses Verloc to organize a bomb outrage (against Greenwich Observatory) so as to incriminate them. Verloc's seedy shop in Soho is a meeting place for the motley group of political fanatics, including Karl Yundt, a malevolent old terrorist, Ossipan, a scientific materialist who lives off women, Michaelis, a utopian Marxist, and the Professor, the most ruthless of the anarchists, who always carries with him a bomb to prevent arrest. The Professor is disquieted by the inability of the British masses to see politics in terms of violence; if violence were used by the government, the masses would believe that counter-violence was their only hope, and a revolutionary situation would exist in Britain. In addition to this political level, the novel has a psychological one: if either revolution or counter-revolution is to be accomplished successfully, the human instruments must be disinterested, but in fact both the revolutionaries and their opponents are dominated by self-regard. The only characters capable of full disinterest are those who are so wretched as to be incapable of reflecting on their own condition. Mrs Verloc's half-witted brother Stevie rises to one idea only: 'bad life for poor people'. He thus becomes the willing tool of Mr Verloc, who charges him with the task of placing the bomb. In the event, Stevie causes no damage to the Observatory but he is himself blown up. Mrs Verloc, who has married Mr Verloc solely to provide support for Stevie, though her husband supposes her entirely devoted to himself, murders him from rage and grief. She tries to flee the country with Ossipan and, when he deserts her, she throws herself overboard from a Channel ferry. In contrast to Winnie Verloc and Stevie, characters simplified by misery and elementary development, is the Assistant Commissioner of Police, who neither acts disinterestedly nor has any belief that he can, but lives by the awareness that self-knowledge is the only antidote to the poison of self-regard. He solves the mystery of the outrage, and thus frustrates the destructive folly of Mr Vladimir, the ambassador. The novel is distinguished by the use of a pervasive irony to expose the futility of political extremism, the strength of human illusions, and the suffering and chaos prevailing in a supposedly civilized society.

Sedgemoor, Battle of (1685)

The culmination of a rising of west-of-England Puritans against ➤ Charles II's openly Catholic brother ➤ James II. It was led by Charles' illegitimate son, the Duke of Monmouth. The battle was won by the government troops, and was followed by the ferocious punishment of the rebels by Judge Jeffreys in his notorious ➤ Bloody Assizes. Sedgemoor was the last battle fought on English (as distinct from British) soil.

Sejanus (1603)

A satirical tragedy by ▷ Ben Jonson. The central character is an historical figure, a favourite of the Roman emperor Tiberius (reigned AD 14-37). The play is a study of a man driven by extreme ambition; he first eliminates all his rivals to power in the Senate, and then, exploiting the emperor's love of luxurious indolence and inclination for retirement, he conspires to murder Tiberius' heirs in order to occupy the throne himself. Tiberius, however, is too cunning for him; he employs Macro, a new favourite, to bring about the downfall of the old, and Sejanus ends up being torn to pieces by the Roman mob, leaving Macro, equally ambitious and unscrupulous, in his former seat of power. The sensuality of Tiberius and his court, and the violence of the politicians, are contrasted with a group of grim commentators led by Arruntius, remnants of the old stoical (> Stoics) Romans whose austere virtues had made Rome great. Ben Jonson presents through Sejanus one of the > Renaissance 'men of power', glorying in the consciousness of unlimited resources, the pattern for whom is > Christopher Marlowe's > Tamburlaine. Sejanus is also the diabolical > Machiavellian politician, without conscience and capable of any crime, such as recurs in many ➤ Elizabethan and ➤ Jacobean dramas. Yet in his unbounded appetites, he is almost a grotesque figure, like the ludicrous sensualists in Jonson's great comedies, ▷ Volpone and > The Alchemist. The play may have been an attempt to rival > Shakespeare's > Julius Caesar of a few years before; it is much more learned in its use of ancient authors, and dramatically it is perhaps the more impressive work. The play was not liked at its first performance, and offended the Earl of Northampton; Jonson had to answer for it before the Privy Council.

Selden, John (1584–1654)

Historian and antiquary. Selden was educated at Oxford and the Inns of Court and became a Member of Parliament in 1623, in which capacity he voiced sharp criticism of the crown, withdrawing, however, before the execution of > Charles I. His main works include the History of Tithes (1618), which attacked the clergy and was suppressed, and Table Talk, which was gathered together by his secretary Richard Milward and published in 1689. Selden was also a friend of ⊳ Ben Jonson and > Michael Drayton; indeed, he provided the 'illustrations' or notes for the latter's Poly-Olbion (1612 and 1622). He was also admired by ▶ John Milton for his interest in historical facts and authenticity, rather than relying upon myth and popular custom.

Selkirk, Alexander (1676-1721)

A sailor, whose experiences on the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez, where he was landed at his own request and remained from 1704 to 1709, are the basis of the desert island part of ▶ Daniel Defoe's ▶ Robinson Crusoe.

Selvon, Sam (b 1923)

Novelist, playwright (radio and theatre), screenwriter and short-story writer. Born in Trinidad, he served in the Royal Naval Reserve in the Caribbean during World War II, worked as a journalist for the Trinidad Guardian from 1946 until 1950, and then moved to London, working for three years as a civil servant in the Indian High Commission and then as a freelance writer, particularly for B.B.C. drama. Since 1978 he has lived in Canada. His novels are: A Brighter Sun (1952); An Island is a World (1955); The Lonely Londoners (1956); Turn Again Tiger (1958); I Hear Thunder (1963); Housing Lark (1965); The Plains of Caroni (1969); Those Who Eat the Cascadura (1972); Moses Ascending (1975); Moses Migrating (1983). Ways of Sunlight (1958) is a collection of short stories. His work is set in Trinidad and London, and many of his novels are concerned with the experience of cultural displacement, racism and the economic hardship of those moving to Britain from the West Indies, an experience treated with wit, humour and affirmation of growing confidence and assertion, as well as with indignation. Similar themes, and some of the same characters, appear in Eldorado, West One, a sequence of seven one-act plays (written 1969; published 1988). He has also written many radio plays, and Switch (1977), a play for the theatre. He was co-author of the film Pressure (1978) and has published a prose collection, Foreday Morning: Selected Prose 1946–1986 (1989).

Semiology, Semiotics

The term 'semiology' was used in ▶ Ferdinand de Saussure's Course in General Linguistics (published 1915) to describe 'a science of signs', whose objective is 'to investigate the nature of signs and the laws governing them'. The more current term, semiotics, was associated originally with the American philosopher C. S. Peirce. Peirce's tripartite division of signs into 'icon' (a sign possessing a similarity to its object), symbol (a sign arbitrarily linked to the object), and 'index' (a sign physically associated with its object), has more recently been revised in Umberto Eco's A Theory of Semiotics (1976) where the emphasis throughout is upon the complex mechanisms and conventions which govern the production of signs.

Seneca, Lucius Annaeus (? 4 BC - AD 65) Roman philosopher and dramatist. He belonged to the ➤ Stoic school of philosophy, which taught that men should seek virtue, not happiness, and that they should be superior to the influences of pleasure and pain. As an orator, he was famous for the weight and terseness of his expression - the 'Senecan style'. He was tutor to the emperor > Nero during the latter's boyhood, but later was suspected of being involved in a conspiracy against him; Nero accordingly ordered him to end his life which he did with true stoical dignity. His nine tragedies were modelled on those of ➤ Aeschylus, ➤ Sophocles and > Euripides, but there is much doubt whether they were ever intended to be performed in a theatre; they seem to be designed for declamation to small circles. They contain no action, though the subjects are of blood-thirsty revenge. Their titles: Hercules Furens; Thyestes; Phoenissae; Phaedra (Hippolytus); Oedipus; Troades (Hecuba); Medea; Agamemnon; Hercules Oetaeus A tenth, Octavia, has proved to be by another author.

Neither as a philosopher nor as a dramatist was Seneca one of the most important figures of the ancient Mediterranean world, but he had great importance for the 16th-century > Renaissance in Europe, and particularly for English poetic drama between 1560 and 1620. This influence was of three kinds: 1 Seneca's dramas provided inspiration for Elizabethan > revenge tragedy or 'tragedy of blood'; 2 at a time of English literature when there was keen interest in modes of expression but no settled standards about them, Senecan style was one of the favourite modes, both inside and outside the drama; 3 at a time when inherited ideas about the ordering of society and the ethical systems that should control it were undergoing alarming transformations, Senecan stoicism had an appeal for thoughtful men that harmonized with Protestant strictness and individualism of conduct. The three influences were more related than might appear. The translator of Seneca's Ten Tragedies (1559-81) declares in his preface that their effect was 'to beat down sin', and Protestants were familiar with the vengefulness of Old Testament religion. Sensational drama could unite with serious social purpose, and thus mingle learned sober conceptions of drama (eg ▷ Gorboduc) with the demands of popular taste. Outside the drama, the terse sententiousness of Senecan style is best found in the Essays of ▶ Francis Bacon.

Senior, Olive (b 1943)

Jamaican short-story writer, novelist, poet and dramatist. She was born one of ten children of a poor family living in a rural part of Jamaica and brought up by a relative. She has worked as a Publications Officer at the University of West Indies Institute of Social and Economic Studies and as editor of Jamaica Journal. Senior has stressed her interest in orality, oral narrative and the sound of the speaking voice, and her short stories, collected in Summer Lightning (Commonwealth Writers Prize, 1987) and Arrival of the Snake Woman (1989), make rich and complex use of the variety of forms of spoken English in Jamaica to explore social and personal relations. Poetry: Talking of Trees (1985). Plays: Down the Road Again (1968). Other works: The Message is Change: A Perspective on the 1972 General Election; (1972); A-Z of Jamaican Heritage (1983); Working Miracles: Women's Lives in the English-Speaking Caribbean (1989). Sensation, Novel of

A genre that emerged in Britain from about 1860, influenced by Gothic literature and characterized by extravagant, passionate and sometimes horrific events. It is often considered the precursor of the modern thriller. Sensation novels were extremely popular with the reading public and formed a large part of the stock of > circulating libraries. Examples of the genre include > Mary Braddon's > Lady Audley's Secret (1862); ➤ Mrs Henry Wood's ➤ East Lynne (1861) and ➤ Rhoda Broughton's > Cometh Up as a Flower (1867). In A Literature of Their Own (1977), Elaine Showalter argues that sensation novels form a significant part of the tradition of 19th-century women's writing. Novelists such as Mary Braddon subverted the stereotype of the 'blonde angel'; others brought a wide range of suppressed female emotions to the surface of their texts and constructed powerful fantasies of escape and protest.

Sense and Sensibility (1811)

A novel by ➤ Jane Austen. A youthful version, Elinor and Marianne, has been lost. The revised novel was published in 1811.

The two heroines, Elinor and Marianne Dashwood, are fatherless sisters who live with their mother in comparative poverty, having been defrauded of more substantial income by their stepbrother, John Dashwood, and his arrogant and selfish wife. The title of the novel indicates the difference between the sisters: Elinor is practical and watches after the family affairs with sober good sense, and Marianne prides herself on the strength of her feelings and her contempt for material interests. Elinor is in love with a depressed and apparently dull young man, Edward Ferrars (brother of Mrs John Dashwood), while Marianne loves the handsome and glamorous John Willoughby. The superficial contrast between the sisters and their lovers is shown to be deceptive: Elinor's feelings are as deep as Marianne's but her sense of responsibility is greater and she keeps her sorrows to herself, whereas Marianne makes almost a virtue of the public exhibition of her grief, thus becoming a burden on her sister and her mother. In the end, the romantic-seeming Willoughby turns out to have given up Marianne from fear of losing a legacy, while the prosaic Edward gladly sacrifices the favour of a rich relative for the sake of marriage to Elinor.

Sensibility

The term 'sensibility', indicating the tendency to be easily and strongly affected by emotion, came into general use in the early 18th century. At this time writers and thinkers, such as the third > Earl of Shaftesbury, in reaction against the practical, materialist philosophy of ⊳ Hobbes, began to promote an idealistic, spiritual alternative, based on personal feeling. > Joseph Addison in 1711 defined modesty as 'an exquisite Sensibility', 'a kind of quick and delicate Feeling in the Soul'. By the middle of the 18th century the word 'sensibility' had grown in stature, indicating the capacity for compassion or altruism, and also the possession of good ▷ taste in the arts. ▷ Joseph Warton in 1756 declines to explain a subtle point since 'any reader of sensibility' will already have taken it. ➤ Laurence Sterne in his > Sentimental Journey (1768) eulogizes 'Dear Sensibility! source unexhausted of all that's precious in our joys or costly in our sorrows!'

The word remained fashionable in this sense in the early 19th century when ▷ Jane Austen used it in the title of her novel ▷ Sense and Sensibility (1811).

Recently some critics have begun to refer to the period from about the time of the death of ⊳ Alexander Pope in 1744 until the publication of ▷ Lyrical Ballads in 1798 as the 'Age of Sensibility'. This label is preferred to 'late Augustanism' or 'pre-> Romanticism', since it stresses the distinctive characteristics of the period rather than relating it by negative contrast to a different one. The poets of this time, > Thomas Grav, > William Collins and > William Cowper, share a distinctive emphasis on feeling as an end in itself, rather than as part of some larger philosophical scheme. This can be seen both in the resonant truisms of Grav's > Elegy and Eton College Ode, and in the descriptive delicacy of Collins' To Evening or Cowper's The Poplar-Field. Even the conservative > neo-classicist > Samuel Johnson shows something of this sensibility in the emotional intensity of his Christian stoicism.

However, the cultivation of sensibility also led to experiment and restlessness in poetic form. Emotional novelty was sought in exoticism and > medievalism. The oral > ballad was given respectability by > Thomas Percy's Reliques, while > James Macpherson, > Thomas Chatterton, and ➤ Thomas Warton all adopted various medieval, ▷ 'Gothic' tastes or literary forms. These developments in poetry were paralleled in the 'Gothic story', > The Castle of Otranto (1765) by > Horace Walpole. The new intensity of feeling took a less exotic form in the profuse sentiment of ➤ Samuel Richardson's novels, and also in the cult of sentimentalism promoted by Sterne's A Sentimental Journey and Henry Mackenzie's The Man of Feeling (1771). Sentiment or sensibility, novel of ➤ Sensibility.

Sentiment, sentimental

False, exaggerated or superficial feeling, where the focus is on the feeling itself or on the person experiencing the feeling, rather than on any object or person supposedly stimulating the feeling. In literature this often results in formulaic expressions of grief, sympathy or remorse. Examples in the 17th and 18th centuries are in some of the poems of ➤ Cowper and

- ▷ Gray, the novels of ▷ Richardson, especially ▷ Pamela, and in the plays of ▷ Cibber,
- > Steele, and > Cumberland.

Sentimental Journey through France and Italy, A (1768)

A narrative, part novel and part travel book, by ➤ Laurence Sterne (under the pseudonym of 'Mr Yorick' – the same of a character in Sterne's ➤ Tristram Shandy), based on his stay in France, 1762–4. It was intended to be longer, but Sterne died after the publication of the first two volumes in 1768.

Serious Proposal to the Ladies for the Advancement of Their True and Greatest Interest, A (1604)

Polemical essay by ➤ Mary Astell, arguing the case for women's > education, in a developing tradition of serious writing by and for women. A second part of the Serious Proposal was published in 1697. Astell prescribes learning to raise women's understanding, develop their self-esteem and give them what we would now call confidence in their own judgement, the better to live a Christian life. 'There is a sort of bravery and greatness of soul', she says, 'which does more truly ennoble us than the highest title, and it consists in living up to the dignity of our natures, scorning to do a mean, unbecoming thing . . .'. Astell proposes to set up a seminary or retreat for women, which she calls a 'religious retirement', for contemplation and study. Thus, she says, women would be equipped to 'see through and scorn those silly artifices which are used to ensnare and deceive them . . . (then) She would know, that not what others say, but what she herself does, is the true commendation and the only thing that exalts her'. The book was criticized by some who, like ➤ Bishop Burnet, interpreted it as merely advocating a type of convent. But it encouraged and influenced numerous women contemporaries, such as ➤ Lady Mary Chudleigh, ➤ Lady Damaris Masham and ➤ Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and contributed to a flood of treatises in women's defence.

Sermons

The word 'sermon' is used in English to denote a speech from a church pulpit for the edification of the audience, always in this context called a 'congregation'. The sermon considered as a means of communication had a central importance in English life until the 19th century, when universal literacy and the rise of the mass-circulation newspaper tended to eclipse it. At a popular level, it reached a larger audience than any other form of public communication. > Chaucer's Pardoner in the > Canterbury Tales demonstrates the power that a medieval preacher felt that he had over an ignorant and superstitious audience, but > The Pardoner's Tale is partly a satire about how the sermon could be abused. The sermon was a means of religious and governmental (eg Elizabethan Book of Homilies) propaganda. Doctrine, speculative philosophy, social criticism, and ethical problems of daily life were all within the sphere of the sermon, and interested all ranks of society in one way or another.

The sermons of > Hugh Latimer, who lived through the most dramatic phase of the English Reformation, are some of the earliest examples in English of vivid prose in the popular and spoken idiom. Three famous preachers of the golden age of Anglicanism in the first half of the 17th century have left sermons addressed to the Court or to other highly educated audiences. The best known of these is the poet > John Donne, who became Dean of St Paul's in 1621. His sermons have massive learning, but his style is richly personal and persuasive, with a depth of feeling comparable to that of his great religious verse. > Lancelot Andrewes was a subtle and elaborate analyst in language, and appealed more exclusively to the intellect, and ⊳ Jeremy Taylor was described by > Coleridge as the 'Spenser of prose' because of his command of musical cadence and linguistic flow.

The change that came over English in the middle of the century emphasized flexibility, control, and lucidity at the expense of poetic emotive power. It is heralded by John Wilkins' book on preaching, Ecclesiastes (1646), which teaches the virtue of strict method in organizing a sermon. The main Anglican preachers of the next hundred years, were Robert South (1634-1716), notable for his succinctness and > satire, Isaac Barrow (1630-77), whom > Charles II called 'the best scholar in England', John Tillotson (1630-94), famous for the elegance of his prose, and Joseph Butler (1692-1752), an acute thinker. The virtues of this kind of sermon, and the vices that it sought to combat, are tersely expressed by > Swift (whose own sermons are exemplars of the ideal) in his Letter to a Young Gentleman entered into Holy Orders (1721). The best of the > Puritan preachers followed a similar course in a more popular idiom, for instance, the Presbyterian Richard Baxter (1615-91) who declared 'The Plainest words are the profitablest oratory in the weightiest matters', and this is a criterion which ➤ Bunyan exemplifies at its noblest. The preaching by women began to be accepted in Puritan circles, and Priscilla Colton, a ➤ Quaker, wrote the first work defending women's rights to preach, To the Priests and People of England.

During the 18th century there was a tendency for sermons to lose touch with the common people. The sermons of William Paley (1743–1805) owed their fame to his talents as a teacher, but they show mediocrity of thought and tepidity of feeling. Those of the novelist ➤ Laurence Sterne (Sermons of Mr Yorick, 1760), of the poet ➤ George Crabbe and of the editor ➤ Henrietta Maria Bowdler have merit (especially Sterne's) as literary essays in ethics, but that is what they are, rather than spiritual discourses. It was left to those outside the Anglican tradition, ➤ John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, and George Whitefield (1714–70) to address themselves to the less educated.

In the 19th century there were still preachers of great influence, some on the popular level, such as the enormously popular ➤ Baptist clergyman, ➤ Charles Spurgeon. But ➤ J. H. Newman, the leader of the ➤ Oxford Movement who later became a Catholic and a cardinal, was perhaps the last preacher to be also a major literary figure. It was not merely the competition of the Press that displaced the sermon from its central influence in English life by the end of the 19th century, but the growth of agnosticism among the intelligentsia and the corresponding decline in the prestige of the pulpit.

Serres, Olivia (1772-1834)

Miscellaneous writer and artist. Olivia Serres claimed to be the daughter of the Duke of Cumberland by a secret marriage, and in 1822 published Statement to the English Nation setting out her evidence for this declaration. Nothing came of it, however, and she died penniless leaving a vast collection of manuscripts on numerous subjects. Her published work includes a collection of poems, Flights of Fancy (1805), which is ostensibly sentimental but often idiosyncratically radical. St Julian (1808) is also sentimental in tone, but interesting for its indebtedness to \triangleright Rousseau.

Seth, Vikram (b 1952)

Poet, novelist, travel writer. Born in Calcutta, India, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, Stanford University and Nanjing University, China, he was trained as an economist. His volumes of poetry are Mappings (1980); The Humble Administrator's Garden (1985); All You Who Sleep Tonight (1990). The Golden Gate (1986) is a witty and accomplished novel, written in a form of sonnet borrowed from Pushkin's Eugene Onegin, and portrays the Californian life-style through the story of the relationships of a group of young professionals. His epic novel A Suitable Boy (1993) won much popular acclaim. Seth has also published From Heaven Lake: Travels through Sinkiang and Tibet (1983).

Settle, Elkanah (1648–1724)

Restoration dramatist, at one time rivalling ➤ Dryden in popularity. His wrote a number of ➤ heroic dramas noted for their blood and bombast, of which the best known is The Empress of Morocco (1673). This was performed at court under the auspices of the ➤ Earl of Rochester, but earned the contempt of Dryden, ▷ Crowne, and > Shadwell; Dryden ridiculed it as a 'Rapsody of none-sense'. A bitter and personal war of words ensued, with Settle attacking plays of Dryden's, Dryden satirizing Settle as Doeg, 'whom God for Mankind's mirth has made', in > Absalom and Achitophel, and Settle replying with more counter-attacks. In 1691 Settle became official poet to the ➤ City of London. He took to writing > operas, such as The Fairy Queen (1692), which was set to music by > Purcell, The World in the Moon(1697), and The Virgin Prophetess (1701). Settle also wrote ▶ pageants, and comic scenes, known as drolls, for London's annual ➤ Bartholomew Fair. He died in poverty.

Seven Years' War (1756-63)

Frederick the Great of Prussia, in alliance with Great Britain and Hanover, fought an alliance of France, Austria and Russia. Frederick kept his dominions by the Treaty of Hubertusberg. The importance of the war for Britain was that it left her predominant in North America and in India (Treaty of Paris, 1763). An indirect consequence of this was that the American colonists, no longer afraid of conquest by the French, now felt free to resist the British policy of taxing them without allowing them representation in ▶ Parliament; this led to the ▶ American War of Independence (1775–83) and the establishment of the United States.

The Seven Years' War produced three war-leaders: in India, Robert Clive, victor of the battle of Plassey, 1757; in America, James Wolfe, captor of Quebec, 1759; and ➤ William Pitt the Elder, Earl of Chatham, the minister who controlled the strategy of the Franco-British struggle.

Seward, Anna (1742-1809)

English poet. Known as 'the Swan of Lichfield', she was born and brought up in the historic village of Eyam in Derbyshire, where her father was rector. In 1754 he became Canon of Lichfield, and Anna looked after him there in his old age. She began to write in her midthirties, attending ▷ Anne Miller's poetry evenings. Her elegies on ▷ David Garrick and Captain Cook brought her to public notice. Her novel Louisa was published in 1784, and she continued to publish verse, letters and poems in periodicals, including ▷ The Gentlemans Magazine. She was very well known in the 1780s, and a formidable (if ridiculed) figure throughout this and the next decade. Her Poems was published in 1810. She knew ▷ Helen Maria Williams, the Ladies of Llangollen, and ▷ Hester Lynch Thrale. ▷ Scott, Mary Bib: Lonsdale, R., Eighteenth Century Women Poets.

Sewell, Anna (1820-78)

Famous for the one book she wrote, Black Beauty (1877), whose success was largely posthumous. Sewell was paid only £20 for the book, which was published just before her death. The story, of a black mare's unhappy adventures, ending happily, has remained a children's classic.

Sewell, Elizabeth (1815-1906)

Novelist and polemical writer. She was born in Newport on the Isle of Wight and went to school in Bath until recalled home at the age of fifteen. She began to write partly to help the family finances, publishing her first work, Amy Herbert, in 1844. A keen supporter of the > Oxford Movement, her novels are deeply religious and moral, yet their focus on women's lives has aroused recent feminist interest. Works include: Laneton Parsonage (1846); Margaret Percival (1847); Katherine Ashton (1854); and Ursula (1858). Sewell also wrote devotional works, including Thoughts for Holy Week (1857) and A History of the Early Church (1861), as well as an Autobiography (1907). Bib: Foster, S., Victorian Women's Fiction:

Seymour, Frances, Countess of Hertford (1669-1754)

English poet, aristocratic patron and correspondent and editor of ➤ Elizabeth Singer Rowe. After her first marriage in 1715 to Algernon Seymour, she moved in court circles, and in 1723 became Lady of the Bedchamber to the Princess of Wales. In 1748 she became the Duchess of Somerset on her marriage to the Duke of Somerset. Her poems were published in anthologies. She was related to ➤ Ann Finch.

Shadwell, Thomas (?1642–92)
Dramatist and poet. Born in Norfolk. Shadwell was educated at Bury St Edmunds and at Cambridge and entered the Middle Temple in 1658. However, he decided on a literary career instead of the law. He travelled on the Continent, and married Ann Gibbs, an actress in the ▷ Duke's Company. Shadwell was a disciple of ▷ Ben Jonson and admirer of ▷ Molière, on whose play Les Facheux he based The Sullen Lovers (1668). Shadwell wrote 17 plays, of which the best known are Epsom Wells (1672), \triangleright The Virtuoso (1676), an engaging satire on the Royal Society, and The Squire of Alsatia (1688) (the latter refers to Whitefriars, a London district where those liable to arrest took sanctuary, and the play makes free use of the cant language of thieves and their associates).

A convinced Whig, unlike most of his leading contemporaries in the theatre, Shadwell incurred the fierce enmity of the Tory > John Dryden. At first the two men were on good terms, but they took opposite sides when ➤ Lord Shaftesbury clashed with > Charles II on the issue of the Protestant succession to the throne. Dryden attacked Shaftesbury in ➤ Absalom and Achitophel and The Medal: Shadwell retorted with The Medal of John Bayes: A Satire Against Folly and Knavery (1682). Dryden then stigmatized Shadwell in > Mac Flecknoe, Or A Satire on the True Blue Protestant Poet, T.S. (1682) as one who 'never deviates into sense', and as Og in the second part of Absalom and Achitophel. Shadwell attempted counter-attack in an adaptation of > Juvenal's tenth satire, but Dryden's proved the more lasting reputation, and Shadwell has retained an unfair image as a dull author. However, he had some revenge by superseding Dryden as ➤ Poet Laureate after the Protestant triumph in the > Glorious Revolution of 1688. A regular user of opium, Shadwell died suddenly, supposedly after an overdose. His daughter Anne became an actress, the celebrated > Anne Oldfield, and a son, Charles, became a dramatist.

Shaffer, Peter (b 1926)

British dramatist who has established his reputation with a number of major successes: The Royal Hunt of the Sun (1964); Black Comedy (1965); Equus (1973); Amadeus (1974) and Lettice and Lovage (1987). The first is a spectacular play about the Spanish conquest of Peru; the second a short farce; the third an exploration of the disturbed psyche of a violent youth who puts out the eyes of a horse; Amadeus looks at the court composer Antonio Salieri's jealousy (and possible murder) of Mozart; Lettice and Lovage is a comedy written especially for the actress Maggie Smith.

Shaftesbury, Lord (Anthony Ashley Cooper, 1st Earl of Shaftesbury, 1621-83)
Politician. He first took the side of the king in the ▷ Civil War of 1642-46, but changed sides because he considered that Royalist policy threatened the Protestant religion. He later became a parliamentary opponent of Description Charles II's chief ministers. Charles II, however, was Catholic in sympathy, and Shaftesbury again went into opposition in 1673. By the Exclusion Bills, he tried to exclude Charles' openly Catholic brother, James, Duke of York, from succession to the throne, advancing the claims of Charles' illegitimate son, the Duke of Monmouth, in James' place. The alliance of Shaftesbury and Monmouth is satirized in Dryden's Debasion and Achitophel, one of the best-known Desatirical poems in the English language. Charles II's statesmanship outwitted Shaftesbury, who fled to Holland and died in exile.

Shaftesbury, Lord (Anthony Ashley Cooper, 3rd Earl of Shaftesbury, 1671-1713) A moral philosopher, with great influence in the first half of the 18th century. His main beliefs are contained in his Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711; revised edition, 1713). He was a Deist (> Deism), a Churchman, and a > Platonic idealist. His optimistic philosophy was in direct opposition to that of > Thomas Hobbes, author of > Leviathan. He believed that men have 'natural affections' which are capable of going beyond self-interest. The cultivation of disinterested affection for others will produce virtue and the true social morality. His concept of these 'natural affections' seemed to make the supernatural elements of Christian doctrine unnecessary to the acquirement of true religion. On this ground he was opposed by Bishop Butler in his Analogy of True Religion (1736). On a purely theoretical level, Shaftesbury anticipated the beliefs about ▷ Nature of the poet ▷ William Wordsworth, and he encouraged the growing emphasis on ▷ sentiment and ▷ sensibility in criticism and poetry in the 18th century. Shaftesbury, Lord (Anthony Ashley Cooper, 7th Earl of Shaftesbury, 1801-85) Statesman and philanthropist. His politics were right wing, but he devoted his career to improving the condition of the working classes. It was largely owing to him that the Ten Hours Bill, restricting hours of work in ▶ factories, became law in 1847, and in the same decade his efforts led to improvement in the mines. After 1846, he gave his attention to the London slums; clearance of the squalid district of Seven Dials led to the building of Shaftesbury Avenue, called after him; the statue of Eros in Piccadilly Circus also commemorates him. Shaftesbury was an adherent of the religious revival known as the ➤ Evangelical Movement, working against the ▶ Utilitarian theories of the political economists (Adam Smith, > Jeremy Bentham, > Thomas Malthus) in the shaping of the industrial changes and urban expansion of the mid-19th century.

Shakespeare - criticism

As with any exceptionally popular author, different ages have appreciated different aspects of Shakespeare. In his own day, popular taste, according to ➤ Ben Jonson, particularly enjoyed > Titus Andronicus, now regarded as one of the least interesting of his plays. John Dryden (1631-1700) (Essay on Dramatic Poesy), picked out ➤ Richard II; Samuel Johnson (1709-84) (Preface to Shakespeare, 1765) admired the comedies. It is possible to understand these preferences: Titus is the most bloodthirsty of all the plays, and suited the more vulgar tastes of an age in which executions were popular spectacles. Dryden and Johnson both belonged to ⊳ neo-classical periods. Johnson, like Dryden, was troubled by the differences in Shakespeare's tragedies from the formalism of ancient Greek and 17th-century tragedy that the spirit of their period encouraged them to admire, and Johnson's warm humanity caused him to respond to the plays which displayed wide human appeal while their mode permitted some licence of form. Both Johnson and Dryden rose superior to the limitations of their period in according Shakespeare such greatness. The 19th-century inheritor of Johnson's mantle as the most perceptive critic of Shakespeare is S. T. Coleridge (1772-1834), whose seminal lectures on Shakespeare were inspired by German Romanticism. In his letters John Keats (1795-1821) offers some of the most enduringly valuable comments on Shakespeare's works before A. C. Bradley published Shakespearean Tragedy in 1904, which was to prove the most influential text on Shakespeare for two generations.

In the 20th century Wilson Knight (The Imperial Theme, The Crown of Life), Harley Granville-Barker (Preface to Shakespeare) and others such as D. A. Traversi (An Approach to Shakespeare) and H. C. Goddard (The Meaning of Shakespeare) have all contributed to our understanding of the plays and poetry. Shakespeare's education has been closely scrutinized by T. W. Baldwin in two volumes, Shakespeare's Smalle Latin and Lesse Greeke, and Geoffrey Bullough's eight volumes on Shakespeare's sources, Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare, are indispensable to Shakespearean critics. Increasingly the critical debate has been conducted in a number of specialized journals, particularly the long-established Shakespeare Jahrbuch, Shakespeare Survey, Shakespeare Studies, and Shakespeare Quarterly. A few books are outstanding in their focus on particular aspects of Shakespeare, such as C. L. Barber's influential essay on Shakespearean comedy and the rituals of English folklore and country customs, Shakespeare's Festive Comedy, and Northrop Fry's archetypal study of comedy and romance, A Natural Perspective. Howard Felperin's distinguished book on Shakespeare's last plays, Shakespearean Romance, and Janet Adelman's thought-provoking study of Antony and Cleopatra and its mythopoeic imagery in The Common Liar, both reflect the influence of Frye in their sober and formally predicated approaches.

Of a more radical bent is Jan Kott's famous essay on ▷ King Lear in 'King Lear, or Endgame' (1964), which argued the case for Shakespeare as our contemporary, with his finger imaginatively on the pulse of a dark, modern human predicament. On the same lines Peter Brook's famous production of ▷ A Midsummer Night's Dream in 1970 emancipated the play from its putative operatic and conformist frame and irretrievably altered our perception of it. By thus indicating the extent to which the theatre can influence interpretation of plays, Brook materially contributed to redirecting critical attention back to the stage.

Modern social and critical movements have made their impact felt in the field of Shakespeare studies: > deconstruction, in the guise of a creative disintegration of the texts' organic status, and > feminism provide the impetus for some of the most controversial writing on Shakespeare at the end of the 20th century, as do > 'cultural materialism', particularly > 'new historicism' and > psychoanalytical theory. New historicism in particular seems set to command a wide audience in the works of Stephen Greenblatt and Louis Montrose, whose work combines the scholarly scruples of the older tradition with an acute sceptical and self-critical awareness of the historical and epistemological contexts of literary criticism in society.

Shakespeare – history of textual study Apart from a scene sometimes ascribed to Shakespeare in the play ▷ Sir Thomas More (c 1596), none of Shakespeare's work has survived in manuscript. In his own lifetime, 18 of his plays were published in separate volumes (the ▷ Quartos), but this was probably without the author's permission, and therefore without his revisions and textual corrections. His non-dramatic poems, including the ▷ sonnets, were also published during his lifetime. After his death, his fellow actors Heming and Condell published his collected plays (except > Pericles) in the large, single volume known as the First Folio, and this was succeeded by the Second Folio (1632), and the Third (two editions) and Fourth in 1663, 1664 and 1685. The Second Folio regularized the division of the plays into Acts and Scenes, and the second issue of the Third added Pericles, as well as other plays certainly not by Shakespeare. In several important respects the Folio editions were unsatisfactory:

I The texts of some (though not all) of the smaller quarto volumes of the plays published during the poet's lifetime differed materially from the text of even the First Folio, which in turn differed from the later folios.

2 The First Folio arranged the plays according to their kinds (Comedies, Histories or Tragedies) and gave no indication of the order in which the plays were written.

3 There was no evidence that even the first editors had had access to the best manuscript texts, and there were evident errors in some passages, the fault of either the editors or their printers, and editors of the later Folios made alterations of their own. Consequently, there was plenty of work during the next two centuries for scholars to re-establish, as nearly as possible, Shakespeare's original text. Work also had to be done on the chronological order of the plays, discovery of the sources of their plots, philological investigations of linguistic peculiarities, and research into the conditions in which the plays were originally acted.

Two of the most eminent 18th-century writers published editions of the plays; these were Alexander Pope (in 1725 and 1728), and Samuel Johnson (in 1765). Neither, however, was a sound scholarly edition, though Johnson's was important for its critical Preface and annotations. Lewis Theobald (1688-1744) attacked Pope's poor scholarship in his Shakespeare Restored (1726), and published his own edition in 1734. He was the first enlightened editor, and did permanently useful work both in removing post-Shakespearean additions and alterations and in suggesting emendations of corrupt passages. After him came Steevens and Capell, who compared the original Quarto texts with the Folio ones, and ➤ Edmond Malone (1741-1812), the most eminent of the 18th-century Shakespeare scholars. In 1778 he made the first serious attempt to establish the chronological order of the plays, and in 1790 he brought out the best edition of them yet established.

Shakespearean scholarship in the 18th century was more the work of individuals than a collaborative enterprise. They saw many of the problems involved in estimating the relative values of the early texts, the possibilities of scholarly emendation of corrupt passages, and the necessity of eliminating the errors of unscholarly 17th- and 18th-century editors.

This work culminated in the publication of 'Variorum' editions of the plays, 1803-21. But the establishment of a really sound text required the study of wider subject-matter. Shakespeare's work had to be estimated as a whole so that his development could be understood; philological study of the state of the language in his time was needed; historical events had to be examined for their possible relevance; many sources for the plots remained to be discovered; theatrical conditions and the relationship of Shakespeare to dramatists contemporary with him needed exploration; even handwriting was important, for the detection of possible misprinting. All this was the work of the collaborative scholarship of the 10th century. It was carried out by German scholars, by the English Shakespeare Societies led by Halliwell and Furnivall, and by the universities.

In the later 18th century Shakespeare became an inspiration to the movement in Germany for the emancipation of German culture from its long subjection to French culture. A. W. Schlegel's remarkable translations (1797-1810) were fine enough to enable Germans to adopt Shakespeare as something like a national poet. German scholars such as Tieck, Ulrici, Gervinus and Franz adopted Shakespearean studies with thoroughness and enthusiasm. They stimulated the foundation of Shakespeare Societies in England, and in 1863-6 the Cambridge University Press was able to publish an edition of Shakespeare's works, which, in its revised form (1891-93), is substantially the text now generally in use.

There has been considerable editorial activity in the 20th century, and it was to be expected that the 'New Bibliography', spearheaded by ⊳ A. W. Pollard, ⊳ R. B. McKerrow and W. W. Greg would produce a major reconsideration of the Shakespearean text. In the end the fruit of their research, and particularly of McKerrow's brilliant Prolegomena for the Oxford Shakespeare (1939), needed to wait for nearly 40 years before they were put to use by the editors of the Oxford Shakespeare, Gary Taylor and Stanley Wells. In the meantime Charlton Hinman produced two seminal volumes on the collations of the extant Folios in The Printing and Proof-Reading of the First Folio, and incorporated his findings in The Norton Facsimile: The First Folio of Shakespeare, which remains a standard work of reference. All the major university and other presses turned their attention to re-editing Shakespeare in the late 1960s and early 1970s. At a time when Oxford University Press were printing two complete one-volume Shakespeares (one old spelling and another modern spelling) as well as a huge textual companion and the entire works in separate editions for the Oxford English Texts, Cambridge University Press published the first volume of Peter Blayney's exhaustive survey of the 'origins' of the First Quarto of > King Lear: The Texts of 'King Lear' and their Origins. Cambridge, Methuen (New Arden), Macmillan and Longman have pursued similar goals, updating and editing afresh Shakespeare's works, each bringing to the canon a different approach. Whereas most of the editions have followed basically conservative principles, most have embraced to a greater or lesser degree the Oxford view of the plays as primarily works for the theatre. Increasingly, Oxford's view of Shakespeare as a dramatist who regularly reshaped his plays in line with theatrical and aesthetic demands is gaining ground. The particular focus for this hypothesis has become the two-text (Quarto and Folio) King Lear, which most editors now agree reflects two different versions of the play. The same editorial principles are being applied to other texts reflecting similar source situations, such as ▷ Richard III, ▷ Hamlet and ▷ Othello. Among Oxford's most radical proposals are the printing of two versions of King Lear, the calling of > Falstaff > 'Oldcastle' in > Henry IV, Part I, as well as boldly recreating the text of ▷ Pericles.

The history of Shakespeare editing in Britain towards the end of the 20th century is ultimately one of the creative disintegration of the shibboleths of traditional editorial policy, even if all the changes proposed by contemporary scholars do not find favour with posterity.

Shakespeare - Sonnets

First published in 1600, but there is no clear evidence for when they were written. They are commonly thought to date from 1595-9; > Francis Meres in Palladis Tamia (1598) mentions that Shakespeare wrote ▶ sonnets. There are 154 sonnets; numbers 1-126 are addressed to a man (126 is in fact not a sonnet but a 12-line poem) and the remainder are addressed to a woman - the so-called 'dark lady of the sonnets', since it is made clear that she is dark in hair and complexion. There has been much speculation about the dedication: 'To the only begetter of these ensuing sonnets Mr. W. H. all happiness and that eternity promised by our everliving poet Wisheth the well-wishing adventurer in setting forth T. T.' 'T. T.' stands for Thomas Thorpe, the stationer (ie bookseller and publisher of the sonnets); speculation centres on what is meant by 'begetter' and who is meant by 'W. H.' W. H. may stand for the man (William Hughes?) who procured the manuscript of the sonnets for Thorpe, if that is what 'begetter' means. But if 'begetter' means 'inspirer', it has been conjectured that

W. H. may be the inverted initials of Henry Wriothesley, ▷ third Earl of Southampton, to whom Shakespeare had dedicated his ▷ Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, or they may stand for ▷ William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke or for someone else. Guesses have also been made as to the identity of the 'dark lady', who has been thought by some to be Mary Fitton, a maid of honour at court and mistress of William Herbert, or by A. L. Rowse to be ▷ Aemelia Lanyer. There is too little evidence for profitable conjecture on either subject.

Critics and scholars disagree about the extent to which the sonnets are autobiographical (and if so what they express), or whether they are 'literary exercises' without a personal theme. A middle view is that they are exploratory of personal relations in friendship and in love, and that some of them rehearse themes later dramatized in the plays - for instance 04 suggests the character of Angelo in > Measure for Measure, and the recurrent concern with the destructiveness of time seems to look forward to > Troilus and Cressida and the great tragedies. Since it is unknown whether the edition of 1609 is a reliable version, there is also some doubt whether the order of the sonnets in it is that intended by Shakespeare; most scholars see little reason to question it.

One of the most valuable recent editions of the Sonnets is Stephen Booth's, which uses the 1600 text, rightly accepting its ordering of the poetry as binding. Booth's edition compares the modern text with the > Quarto versions at each stage. But if his extensive notes are instructive, they also tend to be too comprehensive in their suggestions of infinite and ultimately meaningless ambiguities in the text. John Kerrigan's edition of The Sonnets and A Lover's Complaint provides a sensitive text, informative notes and does justice to the often neglected A Lover's Complaint. Kerrigan authoritatively attributes the poem to Shakespeare and offers the best commentary on it to date. Bib: Leishman, J. Shakespeare, William (1564–1616) – biography

Dramatist and poet. He was baptized on 26 April 1564; his birth is commemorated on 23 April, which happens also to be St George's Day, the festival of the patron saint of England. His father, John Shakespeare, was a Stratfordon-Avon merchant who dealt in gloves and probably other goods; his grandfather, Richard Shakespeare, was a yeoman, ie small farmer, and his mother, Mary Arden, was the daughter of a local farmer who belonged to the local noble family of Arden, after whom the forest to the north of Stratford was named. John Shakespeare's affairs prospered at first, and in 1568 he was appointed to the highest office in the town – High Bailiff, equivalent to Mayor. A grammar school existed in Stratford, and since it was free to the sons of burgesses, it is generally assumed that William attended it. If he did, he probably received a good education in the Latin language; there is evidence that the sons of Stratford merchants were, or could be, well read and well educated. He married Anne Hathaway in 1582, and they had three children: Suzanna, born 1583, and the twin son and daughter, Hamnet and Judith, born in 1585.

Thereafter Shakespeare's life is a blank, until we meet a reference to him in A Groatsworth of Wit (1592), an autobiographical pamphlet by the London playwright > Robert Greene, who accuses him of plagiarism. By 1592, therefore, Shakespeare was already successfully embarked as a dramatist in London, but there is no clear evidence of when he went there. From 1592 to 1594 the London theatres were closed owing to epidemics of plague, and Shakespeare seems to have used the opportunity to make a reputation for himself as a narrative poet; his > Venus and Adonis was published in 1593, and The Rape of Lucrece a year later. Both were dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, ➤ Earl of Southampton. He continued to prosper as a dramatist, and in the winter of 1504 was a leading member of the Lord > Chamberlain's Men, with whom he remained for the rest of his career. In 1596 his father acquired a coat of arms - the sign of a > gentleman - and in 1597 William bought New Place, the largest house in Stratford. There he probably established his father, who had been in financial difficulties since 1577. In 1592, John Shakespeare had been registered as a recusant (> Recusancy); this might mean that he was a Catholic, but may equally show that he was trying to escape arrest for debt.

In 1598, ▶ Francis Meres, in his literary commentary Palladis Tamia, Wit's Treasury, mentions Shakespeare as one of the leading writers of the time, lists 12 of his plays, and mentions his > sonnets as circulating privately; they were published in 1600. The Lord Chamberlain's Men opened the ➤ Globe Theatre in 1599, and Shakespeare became a shareholder in it. After the accession of > James I the company came under royal patronage. and was called the King's Men; this gave Shakespeare a status in the royal household. He is known to have been an actor as well as a playwright, but tradition associates him with small parts: Adam in ▷ As You Like It, and the Ghost in > Hamlet. He may have retired to New Place in Stratford in 1610, but he continued his connections with London, and purchased a house in > Blackfriars in 1613. In the same year, the Globe theatre was burnt down during a performance of the last play with which Shakespeare's name is associated.

➤ Henry VIII. His will is dated less than a month before his death. The fact that he left his 'second-best bed' to his wife is no evidence that he was on bad terms with her; the best one would naturally go with his main property to his elder daughter, who had married John Hall; his younger daughter, who had married Thomas Quiney, was also provided for, but his son, Hamnet, had died in childhood. His last direct descendant, Lady Barnard, died in 1670.

Owing to the fact that the subject-matter of > biography was restricted until mid-17th century to princes, statesmen and great soldiers, the documentary evidence of Shakespeare's life is, apart from the above facts, slight. His contemporaries > Christopher Marlowe and ▶ Ben Jonson are in some respects better documented because they involved themselves more with political events. Many legends and traditions have grown up about Shakespeare since near his own day, but they are untrustworthy. He was certainly one of the most successful English writers of his time; his income has been estimated at about £,200 a year, considerable earnings for those days. After the death of Marlowe in 1503, his greatest rival was Ben Jonson, who criticized his want of art (in Discoveries, 1640), admired his character, and paid a noble tribute to him in the prefatory poem to the First Folio collection of his plays (1623). Shakespeare's plays

Earliest publications. The first collected edition was the volume known as the First Folio (1623). This included all the plays now acknowledged to be by Shakespeare with the exception of Pericles. It also includes Henry VIII. Stationers (the profession then combining bookselling and publishing) were glad to bring out individual plays in > quarto editions in his lifetime, however, and since there was no law of copyright these were often 'pirated', ie published without the permission of the author. On the whole, Shakespeare's company (the Lord > Chamberlain's Men) did not want such publication, since printed editions enabled other acting companies to perform the plays in competition. Eighteen of Shakespeare's plays were published in this way, sometimes in more than one edition, and occasionally in editions that varied considerably. Since none of the plays has survived in the original manuscript, the task of modern editors is often to reconcile different quartos (where they exist) with each other, and any quartos that exist with corresponding versions in the First Folio. The following is a list of the separate editions of the plays, published while Shakespeare was alive or soon after his death, with dates of different editions where they substantially disagree with one another:

Titus Andronicus (1504) Henry VI, Part II (1594) Henry VI, Part III (1595) Richard II (1597, 1608) Richard III (1597) Romeo and Juliet (1597, 1599) Love's Labour's Lost (1598) Henry IV, Part I (1598) Henry IV, Part II (1600) Henry V (1600) A Midsummer Night's Dream (1600) The Merchant of Venice (1600) Much Ado About Nothing (1600) The Merry Wives of Windsor (1602) Hamlet (1603, 1604) King Lear (1608) Troilus and Cressida (1609) Pericles (1609) Othello (1622)

Order of composition. The First Folio does not print the plays in the order in which they were written. Scholars have had to work out their chronological order on three main kinds of evidence: 1 external evidence (eg records of production, publication); 2 internal evidence (eg allusions to contemporary events); 3 stylistic evidence. The following is an approximate chronological arrangement, though in some instances there is no certainty:

1590-91	Henry VI, Parts II and III
1591-92	Henry VI, Part I
1592-93	Richard III
	The Comedy of Errors
1593-94	Titus Andronicus
	The Taming of the Shrew
	Two Gentlemen of Verona
1594-95	Love's Labour's Lost
	Romeo and Juliet
1595-96	Richard II
	A Midsummer Night's Dream
1596-97	King John
	The Merchant of Venice
	The Merry Wives of Windsor
1597-98	Henry IV, Parts I and II
1598-99	Much Ado about Nothing
	Henry V
1599-1600	Julius Caesar
	As You Like It
	Twelfth Night
1600-I	Hamlet
	Measure for Measure
1601-2	Troilus and Cressida
1602-3	All's Well that Ends Well
1604-5	Othello
	King Lear
1605-6	Macbeth
1606-7	Antony and Cleopatra
1607-8	Coriolanus

Timon of Athens

1608-9	Pericles
1609-10	Cymbeline
1610-11	The Winter's Tale
1611-12	The Tempest

Shamela (1741)

An Apology for the life of Mrs Shamela Andrews, published pseudonymously by ▷ Henry Fielding, parodies ▷ Samuel Richardson's ▷ Pamela of the preceding year. The plot and characters are taken from Richardson's novel, yet the tone reveals what Fielding saw as Richardson's hypocritical morality, where virtue is rewarded by worldly wealth and status.

Sharp, William (1855-1905) Scottish novelist and poet, who published much of his better work in the 1890s under the name 'Fiona Macleod', supposedly his cousin, an alter ego whose real existence he always maintained (she appeared in Who's Who) and may even have believed in. The novels of Fiona Macleod are mystical, nostalgic tales of Celtic peasant life, such as Pharais: A Romance of the Isles (1894), The Mountain Lover (1895), The Sin Eater (1895) and Green Fire (1896). Sharp also wrote novels under his own name, including the epistolary novel A Fellowe and his Wife (1892), jointly authored with the US writer Blanche Willis Howard. After early, uncongenial work as a clerk, Sharp had begun his literary career in the 1880s as a journalist, and by writing commissioned biographies and poetry, but in the 1890s spent much of his time travelling. The dual personality provoked a nervous crisis in 1897.

Shaw, George Bernard (1856-1950) Dramatist, critic, social thinker. His family belonged to the Irish Protestant gentry. His father was an unsuccessful businessman; his mother was a musician of talent. Apart from the musical education he received from her, he was practically self-educated. He came to London in 1876, and set to work as a novelist. The novel proved not to be his medium, but his efforts in the form were an apprenticeship for dramatic writing in which he excelled. He wrote five novels in all: the best known are Cashel Byron's Profession (pub. 1885-6) and The Admirable Bashville (pub. 1901). In 1884 he joined the newly formed socialist > Fabian Society, of which he became a leading member; he edited Fabian Essays (1887) which was influential in forming socialist opinion in Britain. Between 1885 and 1898 he wrote much criticism for a number of papers; he was probably the most astute music and dramatic critic of his time.

His career as a dramatist began in 1892 and lasted substantially until 1939, though he wrote his last play when he was over 90. He was profoundly impressed by the work of the Norwegian dramatist > Henrik Ibsen, especially by Ibsen's plays of social criticism such as A Doll's House. In 1891 came his study The Quintessence of Ibsenism, and then he embarked on plays of social purpose on his own account. Shaw's art is, however, very different from Ibsen's; whereas for Ibsen the characters are always more important than the ideas in a play, and the characters engage in convincing talk, in Shaw's plays it is the ideas that really matter, and his characters don't talk - they make speeches. The speeches are composed in the operatic tradition of Mozart; Shaw once said that it was Mozart who taught him to write. As a dramatic critic and a student of Ibsen, he had learnt stagecraft thoroughly, and he knew how to achieve theatrical effect, to which his unique talent for wit, surprise, and paradox strongly contributed. In regard to ideas, he was concerned to shock his audiences out of their unthinking acceptance of social conventions, but he was careful (unlike Ibsen) never to scandalize them beyond their willingness to listen. Apart from socialism, his leading doctrine (derived partly from the French philosopher ➤ Bergson and partly from the German philosopher > Nietzsche) was his belief in the 'Life Force' - that the progress of humanity depends in every generation on the evolution of geniuses, who constitute the spearheads of advance but inevitably arouse the hostility of their contemporaries. He was the first dramatist to realize that the reading public for plays was now larger than the theatregoing public; accordingly he published his own plays with long prefaces, which are commonly as famous as the plays themselves, and with elaborate stage directions intended not only for stage producers but for readers accustomed to the kind of detail provided by novels.

His most famous plays are probably: Man and Superman (1903); Major Barbara (1905); Pygmalion (1912); Heartbreak House (1917); Back to Methuselah (1921); Saint Joan (1924). Other plays: in Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant (1898) - Widowers' Houses (first staged 1892); The Philanderer; Mrs Warren's Profession; Arms and the Man; Candida; The Man of Destiny; You Never Can Tell. In Plays for Puritans (1901) - The Devil's Disciple; Caesar and Cleopatra; Captain Brassbound's Conversion. Other plays before 1914; John Bull's Other Island; How He Lied to Her Husband; Press Cuttings; The Doctor's Dilemma; Getting Married; The Showing up of Blanco Posnet; Misalliance; Fanny's First Play; Androcles and the Lion; Overruled; Great Catherine. After 1918: The Apple Cart; In Good King Charles' Golden Days.

Among Shaw's extensive political writings are his attack on the British government, Common Sense about the War (1914), and The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism (1928).

The Shavian Playground.

A comedy by > Oliver Goldsmith, first acted in 1773. The basic comedy is that of a morbidly shy man misled into a situation in which he behaves in a way such as to horrify him when he awakes to the true circumstances. The young man is Marlow, sent by his father to court in marriage the daughter of his friend Hardcastle. Marlow loses his way, and is deceived into supposing the Hardcastle house to be an inn. In a gentleman's house he is horribly embarrassed, but in an inn he is at ease; he proceeds to behave off-handedly to old Hardcastle as to a landlord, and to make love to his daughter, as to a waiting maid. The arrival of his father clears up the situation, and the mistake turns out to Marlow's advantage. The play is one of Goldsmith's best works, and an example of the brief revival of the Comedy of ➤ Manners in the 1770s.

She Wou'd If She Cou'd (1668) Play by > Sir George Etherege, with a cynical and bawdy atmosphere. Two gallants, Courtall and Freeman, are out to seduce and ruin women, but fall in love with Gatty and Ariana in spite of themselves, and are united with them after several scenes of bantering flirtation. The character referred to in the title is Lady Cockwood who, being badly treated by her despicable husband, longs to cuckold him. Courtall and Freeman make sport with her, openly leading her on, but privately mocking and insulting her. The play is derogatory of > marriage, despite its endings in espousal, and heavy with race-course imagery, with women seen as horses for men to ride.

Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft (1797–1851)
The only daughter of feminist ➤ Mary
Wollstonecraft and radical philosopher
➤ William Godwin, her mother having died a few days after her birth. Her father remarried in 1801 but Mary found her stepmother unsympathetic and remained rather close to her father despite his cold manner. She idolized her own mother, and educated herself through contact with her father's intellectual circle and her own hard study. She met ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley in 1812 and on return from an extended visit to friends in 1814 became very close to him. He was in the midst of separating from his wife Harriet, and within a couple of months he and Mary left England together, marrying in 1816 after Harriet's suicide. They had a devoted but difficult relationship, only one of their children surviving childhood, Godwin pressing them for loans and Shelley's father Timothy making only a small allowance for the child, Percy. After Shelley's death in 182e Mary stayed a short while in Italy, then returned to London where she continued to write novels, produced an account of her travels with Percy in Europe and edited Shelley's poetry and prose, but proved too exhausted to write his biography, which she abandoned. > Frankenstein, or the Modern Prometheus (1817) was her first and most famous novel, apparently inspired by a dream. The Last Man (1826) has characters based on Shelley and ⊳ Byron, and Lodore (1835) contains much that is autobiographical. Mathilda (1819) and Valperga (1823) are among her other novels; Rambles in Germany and Italy (1844) was well received; she also published many short stories in annuals like The Keepsake. Her > diary, recently published as The Journals of Mary Shelley, provides a fascinating account of her life and her attitudes to writing.

Shelley, Percy Bysshe (1792-1822) Poet. He was born into an aristocratic family in Sussex, and was educated at Eton and Oxford, from which he was expelled in 1811 for circulating a pamphlet, The Necessity of Atheism. He eloped with and married Harriet Westbrook, who was then only 16, and whom he left after three years. He travelled abroad in 1814 with Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, daughter of the > feminist > Mary Wollstonecraft and the philosopher > William Godwin, whose extreme rationalism had attracted the young poet. At one point, in accordance with his idealistic notions of free love, Shelley proposed that both Harriet and Mary should live together with him. Accompanied by Mary's step-sister, Claire Clairmont, he and Mary travelled to Switzerland where they joined ➤ Lord Byron, with whom Shelley made a close friendship. Harriet drowned herself in the Serpentine in 1816 and Shelley married Mary, though he continued to develop intense platonic relationships with other women. They moved to Lerici in Italy and in 1822 he was drowned while sailing, in circumstances which suggested that he made no attempt to save himself.

Shelley's earliest writings, produced while he was at Eton and Oxford, are ➤ Gothic romances in the style of > 'Monk' Lewis. His first important poem was the atheistic Queen Mab (1813) in the tradition of the irregular ode. In 1816 appeared the > blank verse Alastor; or the Spirit of Solitude, in which an exquisitely sensitive young poet is drawn by a highly erotic vision, representing 'truth and virtue . . . And lofty hopes of divine liberty', across exotic eastern landscapes, only to die, disappointed. The Revolt of Islam (1817) in > Spenserian stanzas, preaches bloodless revolution, and has a similar beautiful youth as its protagonist. > Mont Blanc, published in the same year, is a less self-indulgent work, in which Shelley turns his intellectual scepticism on the conventional piety of such poems as > Samuel Taylor Coleridge's Hymn Before Sun-rise in the Vale of Chamouni (1802), which describes the same landscape. Where Coleridge attributes the sublime beauty of nature to a 'Great Hierarch', the atheist Shelley attributes it (like Coleridge himself in > Dejection: An Ode) to 'the human mind's imaginings'. In > Julian and Maddalo (written 1818, published 1824), he describes in irregularly rhyming > couplets a visit to a madhouse in Venice in the company of Byron, who appears in the guise of an Italian nobleman.

In 1819 Shelley published The Cenci, a play in the Elizabethan style, and composed the 'lyrical drama', > Prometheus Unbound (1820). He also wrote the Ode to the West Wind in which his abstract symbolism is, for once, brilliantly controlled, and makes the natural force of the wind into a convincing metaphor for political revolution. The news of the > 'Peterloo Massacre' in Manchester on August 16, 1819, prompted > The Mask of Anarchy (published 1832), a poem of superb rhetoric, calling upon the men of England to overthrow their oppressors. This was followed by To a Skylark (1820), the famous elegy on > John Keats, > Adonais (1821), The Witch of Atlas (published 1824), and another 'lyrical drama', Hellas (1822), inspired by the struggle for Greek independence from Turkey. He was working on The Triumph of Life when he died, a grimly garish dream-allegory in ▷ terza rima in which the poet contemplates the gory but awesome pageant of history, in company with the spirit of ⊳ Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Shelley's prose ➤ Defence of Poetry (written 1821; published 1840) was written in answer to The Four Ages of Poetry by his friend > Thomas Love Peacock, who argued that poetry was an obsolete art. Shelley retorts boldly that poets are 'the unacknowledged legislators of the world'.

Shelley can be an extremely irritating poet, particularly when congratulating himself on the exquisiteness of his own sensibility, or indulging in dreamy abstraction and elaborately theatrical symbolism. In his best work, however, he actually achieves the sublimity about which he talks so much, and when dealing with intellectual or political issues he can be eloquently lucid and incisive.

Shenstone, William (1714-63) Poet and landscape gardening (> Gardens and literature) enthusiast. He wrote The Schoolmistress (revised version 1742), a > Spenserian > burlesque, celebrating Sarah Lloyd, the schoolmistress of a village near Shenstone's family estate. The condescending > sentimentalism of this poem, and the facile lyricism of such works as A Pastoral Ballad, in anapaestic quatrains (Poems on Various Occasions, 1737), make Shenstone an important representative of the new post-⊳ Augustan > sensibility of the time. > Thomas Percy consulted him in the preparation of his Reliques, and he wrote several ➤ essays on landscape gardening. His estate at Leasowes near Halesowen, Staffordshire, because famous for its ingenious 'natural' effects.

Shepherd's Calendar, The (1579) A pastoral poem by ➤ Edmund Spenser in 12 parts, one for each month of the year, published in 1579. The series is written in the tradition of the ▷ 'eclogues' of ▷ Virgil, ie verse dialogues in a rural setting, with shepherds and shepherdesses with classical, French or (more frequently) English peasant names, eg ➤ Colin Clout (for Spenser himself) and Hobbinol (for his friend ➤ Gabriel Harvey). The intention is not that of 19th-century nature poetry to give a description of the countryside as it actually is at any particular time of the year, but to use the simplified conditions of an ideal rural setting as a standpoint for commenting on life, often that of the court. Four of the dialogues ('January', 'June', 'November' and 'December') are ▷ complaints, ie laments for such things as lost love ('January') or advancing age ('December'). Three of them are cheerful: 'March' in praise of love; 'April' in praise of ➤ Elizabeth I, and 'August', a shepherds' song competition, again in praise of love. 'February', 'May', 'July', 'September' and 'October' are 'moral' eclogues on such topics as respect for age ('February') or a Protestant attack on Roman Catholicism ('May'). The three main themes are love, poetry and religion. The verse is sophisticated and varied, owing much to the examples of Virgil and > Theocritus, and also to the French 16th-century pastoralist Clement Marot, but paying tribute to ➤ Chaucer as well and following the free rhythms of medieval English poetry. The poem set a fashion for pastoral in England, and inaugurated the great lyrical period of the last 20 years of the 16th century.

Sheraton, Thomas (1751-1806)

Next to Thomas Chippendale (1718–79) the most famous English furniture designer. His reputation, which began about 1790, was built up on his severe and graceful style; later, under the influence of French Empire furniture, his designs became much more elaborate. He had many imitators, and the name 'Sheraton' is usually associated with a general style rather than with the works of the original master.

Sheridan, Frances (1724-66) Novelist and dramatist, born in Dublin. Forbidden by her father to study, Sheridan was taught in secret by her brothers, and clandestinely went with them to the theatre. In 1746 she published a ➤ pamphlet supporting the actor-manager > Thomas Sheridan, in a dispute over his Dublin Playhouse, and they married in the following year. They had four children, one of whom was the future dramatist ▶ Richard Brinsley Sheridan. They moved to London in 1754. Frances Sheridan's bestknown work was the novel The Memoirs of Miss Sidney Biddulph, published anonymously in 1761, in three volumes. A two-volume sequel, Conclusion of the Memoirs of Miss Sidney Biddulph, followed in 1767. These were very well received, and were translated into French, by the Abbé de Prevost (author of Manon Lescaut). Incidents from the novel feature in Richard Brinsley Sheridan's > The School for Scandal. In 1763 Garrick staged, very successfully, Mrs Sheridan's comedy The Discovery, with himself and Thomas Sheridan in the cast. The draft of another comedy, A Journey to Bath, was rejected by Garrick, but eventually published in 1902. Her last work, The History of Nourjahad (published posthumously in 1767), a didactic story with an ⊳ oriental setting, was another success, translated into several languages, and staged as a musical play in 1813. courtship of his future wife, Elizabeth Linley, began with his carrying her off to a French nunnery to save her from the attentions of a suitor to whom she objected; he returned to fight two duels with his rival; in 1773 his secret marriage to her in France was publicly recognized. In 1776 he became principal director and, a little later, sole proprietor of the ➤ Drury Lane Theatre in London; it was twice burnt down and rebuilt during his proprietorship. He entered ➤ Parliament in 1780 and was famous for his oratory there; his opposition to the > American War of Independence caused the American Congress to offer him £20,000, which he refused. His most famous oratorical exploit was his impeachment of Warren Hastings in 1787. During the ➤ French Revolution he supported the Whig leader, Fox, in opposing military intervention against France. Later he held an independent position politically, but he was influential, partly owing to his friendship with the Prince Regent (later > George IV). He ended his life deeply in debt.

His memorable plays are ➤ The Rivals (1775), ➤ The School for Scandal (1777), and ➤ The Critic (1779); they show a reaction against the ➤ sentimental comedy which had dominated the English theatre for much of the 18th century, and the first two belong to a revival of the Comedy of ➤ Manners which had been dominant at the beginning of it. They are still appreciated for the freshness of their dialogue and the ingenuity of their comic situations. Other plays: St Patrick's Day (1775); The Duenna (a comic opera, 1775); A Trip to Scarborough (1777), an adaptation of ➤ Vanbrugh's ➤ Relapse (1696), and the tragedy Pizarro (1790).

Sheridan, Thomas (1719-88)

Actor-manager, teacher and author, born in Dublin. He was a godson of ▷ Swift, husband of ➤ Frances Sheridan, and father of ➤ Richard Brinsley Sheridan. His parents intended him to be a schoolmaster, but his preference for the stage was confirmed in 1743, with the success of his performance of ▷ Richard III. He became manager of the Theatre Royal in Dublin, to which he returned after a period acting at > Covent Garden in London. By then a theatre opened in Dublin by his rival, > Spranger Barry, reduced his audiences, and he moved to England with his family for good. He began a new career as a teacher and lecturer on elocution, travelling around the country to speak. His house became a gathering-point for literary figures, including > Samuel Johnson. But the two men quarrelled, and Johnson later described Sheridan as 'dull, naturally dull'.

Sheridan wrote extensively on grammar and language in general, as well as ▷ education and elocution. He published the Works of Swift, with Life in 18 volumes in 1784.

Sherman, Martin (b 1938)

Dramatist. Born in Philadelphia, and educated at Boston University, Sherman was resident playwright at Playwrights' Horizons in New York from 1976–77 before going to England where his Passing By was one of half a dozen plays in the 1975 lunchtime season of gay plays put on by Ed Berman at the Almost Free. Sherman is probably best known however for Bent (1977), a play about the Nazi persecution of homosexuals, one of the plays that arose out of Gay Sweatshop's production of As Time Goes By (1977) which looked at homosexual persecution in three different periods.

One of the early plays to show gays in a sympathetic and unsensationalistic light, Bent used two quite distinct styles: a first half of a Boys in the Band type bitchery and a second act set in Dachau with a Beckettian-type duologue between the central character, the tormented Max, and his lover, Horst. This may be partly due to the fact that though ostensibly set in the 1940s, the play is informed by and exudes a 1970s Gay Liberation consciousness and is therefore as much concerned with issues of changing personal politics as it is with historical perspective.

Bent subsequently turned up at the ➤ Royal Court and on Broadway with some star names - Ian McKellen and Tom Bell in Britain, Richard Gere and briefly Michael York on Broadway - and scored considerable success. It has gone on to be performed all over the world.

Sherwood, Mary Martha (1775-1851) Novelist, diarist, autobiographer, but mainly known as a children's author. Mary Sherwood began writing at seventeen in order to help fund the school in which she was a pupil (The Traditions was published by > Minerva in 1795), and she continued working on novels in order to support, first her parents and siblings, and later her husband and children. She married her cousin Henry Sherwood in 1805 and they went to India as missionaries. Her two most famous books are Little Henry and His Bearer (1815) and The Fairchild Family (1818; second and third parts were published in 1842 and 1847). This last book was immensely popular, partly because its overtly moralizing tone is neatly undercut with a delight in gruesome details and genuinely scary passages. In the later, > Victorian, editions these parts were considered too unpleasant for the young and were expurgated. From then on, the book declined in popularity.

She-tragedy

Type of pathetic > tragedy, related to > heroic tragedy, and popular in the last decade of the 17th century and in the early 18th, focusing on the distresses of exalted women characters. Women's sufferings form an important element in plays such as ▷ Cibber's ▷ Love's Last Shift, Vanbrugh's > The Provok'd Wife, and > Southerne's > The Wives Excuse. But the women in these plays are more ordinary than those in true she-tragedies. The form is exemplified in plays including > Banks' Virtue Betrayed (1682), on Anne Boleyn, and The Island Queens (1684), on the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, performed under the title Albion's Queen in 1704, > Mary Pix's Queen Catharine: or The Ruines of Love (1698), Motteux's Beauty in Distress (1698), and ▷ Nicholas Rowe's The Fair Penitent (1703), > The Tragedy of Jane Shore (1714), and The Tragedy of Lady Jane Grey (1715).

Shields, Carol (b 1935)

Novelist and short-story writer, born in America and educated at Hanover College. In 1957 she married a Canadian and settled in Canada, where she attended the University of Ottowa and wrote an MA dissertation on the nineteenth-century Canadian writer Susanna Mudie, published as Susanna Moodie: Voice and Vision (1976). Many of her novels are concerned with marriage, love and the details of domestic experience, including Small Ceremonies (1976), The Box Garden (1977), Happenstance (1980), A Fairly Conventional Woman (1982) and The Republic of Love (1992), the last of these with a suggestion of the magical. Mary Swann (1987) is a literary mystery story which uses a range of narrative forms: letters, diaries, poems, a film script; generically it is comparable to ▷ A. S. Byatt's Possession. Shields' work shows a fondness for enigmas with hinted solutions: the sender of a bizarre wedding present in The Republic of Love; the identity and motives of a literary thief in Mary Swann; The Stone Diaries (1993) is the story of a woman who 'just let her life happen to her' and includes photographs of her family (she is absent). Shields has also written a novel jointly with Blanche Howard. A Celibate Season (1991), and drama. She has lived in Vancouver, Toronto and Ottowa, and now lives in Winnipeg, Manitoba. Volumes of short stories: Various Miracles (1985); The Orange Fish (1989). Poetry: Others (1972); Intersect (1974).

Shinebourne, Janice (b 1947)

Novelist. Shinebourne was born in Guyana of Chinese and Indian ancestry, and educated at the University of Georgetown and in Britain, where she moved in the early 1970s. She has worked as a lecturer, editor and community worker. Her first novel, Timepiece (1986) is about the move from rural to urban Guyana and its effect on the consciousness of the young woman protagonist. Her second novel is The Last English Plantation (1989). She has also written short stories.

Ship Money

An ancient tax for providing ships to defend the country in time of war. ➤ Charles I revived it in 1634 in time of peace and without the consent of Parliament. His action caused great resentment, but 12 judges gave their verdict that it was legal. Nonetheless, repeated revivals of the tax aroused positive resistance, notably from John Hampden, and it was one of the contributory causes of the ➤ Civil War that broke out in 1642. In 1641 Parliament passed a law declaring Ship Money an illegal tax.

Shipman's Tale, The

One of ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales. This ➤ fabliau, set in Flanders, involves marital and financial trickery on the part of a wife and a monk, at the expense of the husband, a merchant. A series of bargains between different pairs of the three central protagonists makes up the plot sequence, which concludes with the wife offering sexual credit to her husband, in order to cover his lost loan to the monk. An analogue to the story is found in the ➤ Decameron (8.1) but Chaucer's version is distinctive for its detailed development of the mercantile backdrop to this story of a domestic economy.

Shirley (1849)

A novel by > Charlotte Brontë. It is set in Yorkshire at the time of the Napoleonic wars and is concerned, like several novels of the 1840s, with labour relations. Robert Gerard Moore is a half-English, half-Belgian mill owner who introduces the latest laboursaving machinery to the workplace, ignoring the protests of his employees. They turn against him and attempt to destroy the mill and to take his life. In an effort to raise funds Robert proposes to the spirited Shirley Keeldar, an heiress. She refuses him and eventually marries Robert's brother, Louis, a tutor in her family. Robert marries Caroline Helstone, his cousin. The novel protests against the limited opportunities available to women, demonstrated particularly in the life of Caroline, confined in her uncle's rectory and prohibited even from working as a > governess. In the character of Shirley, Brontë claimed she was drawing a portrait of her sister > Emily Brontë, 'had she been placed in health and prosperity'.

> Historical novel; 'Woman Question, The'; Social Problem novel.

Shirley, James (1596-1666)

Dramatist. He was one of the last dramatists of the great ➤ Elizabethan-▷ Jacobean-▷ Caroline period of English drama, a period which lasted from 1580 to 1640 and included the career of > Shakespeare. Shirley wrote fluent, graceful ▶ blank verse and is at his best in social comedy; in many ways he anticipated the Restoration writers of Comedies of ➤ Manners after 1660. His audience, as in Restoration comedy, was that of the elegant, refined court; it was not drawn from all social classes like the audiences for Shakespeare and ▶ Ben Jonson, so that his plays have a comparatively narrow, though sophisticated, range of interests. He wrote over 40 plays of which the best known are the tragedies The Traitor (1631); and the Cardinal (1641); and the comedies The Lady of Pleasure (1631) and Hyde Park (1632).

Shoemaker's Holiday, The

A comedy by ➤ Thomas Dekker, published in 1600. It is a ⊳ citizen comedy, ie designed to appeal to the taste and sentiment of the London merchant class, with a strong romantic flavour. The time of the story is mid-15th century, and the principal character is Simon Eyre, shoemaker and, at the end of the play, Lord Mayor of London. The story concerns the courtship by the young nobleman, Rowland Lacy, of Rose, the daughter of the existing Lord Mayor. The courtship is opposed both by his uncle, the Earl of Lincoln, and by Rose's father. Lacy disguises himself as a shoemaker, takes employment with Simon Eyre, and eventually, with the support of the king, they are successfully married. The play is mainly in prose, with blank verse interspersed; it has no profundity but its happy mood has kept it popular.

Short Story

This very early kind of fiction was first taken seriously in the 19th century as an independent literary form, making different demands on the writer and the reader from the demands of longer works of fiction such as the novel. Three writers originated this serious practice of the art of the short story: the American, Edgar Allan Poe (1809-49); the Frenchman, Poe's disciple, Guy de Maupassant (1850-93); and the Russian, ➤ Anton Chekhov. These writers evolved the qualities especially associated with the short story: close texture, unity of mood, suggestive idiom, economy of means. Such qualities associate the short story with the short poem, and we find that in English the verse story anticipated the prose story in works such as the tales of George Crabbe and Arthur Hugh Clough's Mari Magno (1862). However, no relationship can be established between the verse of such writers and the prose of ➤ Rudyard Kipling, with Maupassant behind him, or that of > Katherine Mansfield, who was strongly influenced by Anton Chekhov. These two wrote little else in prose except stories (Kipling wrote two novels), but the greatest masters of the short story form - > Henry James, > Joseph Conrad, > James Joyce, and > D. H. Lawrence - were predominantly novelists. Their stories were perhaps formed less by the example of the foreign writers mentioned than by the structure of their own novels. These had a less distinctly marked plot line than those of earlier novelists, and yet a closer coherence; chapters from them can be extracted showing many of the essential qualities of short stories (eg 'Rabbit' in Lawrence's > Women in Love, or the Christmas dinner in Joyce's > Portrait of the Artist) in spite of their relationship to their respective novels as wholes. It seems therefore that the best stories of these writers were by-products of their novels, which by their structure suggested the evolution of stories as separate entities.

It is difficult to make a clear distinction between the short story and the nouvelle (novella or long story); it is difficult also to say at what point a nouvelle stops short of being a novel; on the whole the nouvelle or 'long short story' seems to share with the short story as generally understood a unity of mood, which is not so likely to be found in a true novel, however short. All the masters of the short story who have been mentioned were also masters of the nouvelle, but not necessarily (eg Chekhov) of the novel form. The period 1880-1930 was the flowering time of the short story in English; besides the English writers already mentioned, it included the early and best work of > A. E. Coppard, who was one of the few English fiction-writers of any note (Katherine Mansfield being another) who have restricted themselves to the shortstory form. Later short-story writers have been numerous, but they have mostly practised the art as an alternative and often subsidiary form to that of the novel. In Ireland, where the art of the novel has scarcely taken root, the art of the short story has flourished more distinctively. It begins with the stories of ▷ George Moore (The Untilled Field, 1903), but the Irish tradition becomes really outstanding in the first books of Liam O'Flaherty (Spring Sowing, 1926), > Sean O'Faolain (Midsummer Night Madness, 1932), and > Frank O'Connor (Guests of the Nation, 1931). In his book on the art of the short story, The Lonely Voice (1964), O'Connor offers an explanation as to why the short story should be the more natural form of fiction for Irish literary culture.

Since O'Connor, William Trevor has continued the Irish connection with the short story. Other contemporary writers who excel at the form include ➤ Peter Carey, whose early stories are collected in Exotic Pleasures (1980) and ➤ Ian McEwan, whose collections First Love, Last Rites (1975) and In Between the Sheets (1977) attracted great critical attention. ➤ Angus Wilson, ➤ Muriel Spark, ➤ Nadine Gordimer, ➤ Margaret Atwood, ➤ Desmond Hogan and Shena Mackay have also used the genre to interesting effect.

Shorthouse, Joseph Henry (1834–1903)
Novelist, whose John Inglesant (1880), a historical and philosophical ▷ romance set in England and Italy during the 17th century, was initially rejected by publishers but later became a ▷ best-seller and acquired something of a cult following. Shorthouse was brought up as a Quaker but converted to the Church of England, and religious loyalties and conversion play a large part in the novel. Shorthouse worked in business despite poor health; his other literary works were relatively minor historical romances, such as The Countless Eve (1888) and two novels set in the present: Sir Percival (1886) and Blanche Lady Falaise (1891).

➤ Historical novel.

Shuttle, Penelope (b 1947)

Poet. Shuttle's forceful, strong verse has brought her considerable critical recognition, as has her 1978 book on feminine creativity and menstruation, The Wise Wound (written with her husband, > Peter Redgrove). Her works include: An Excusable Vengeance (1967); Wailing Monkey Embracing a Tree (1973); Photographs of Persephone (1974); The Dream (1975); Period (1976); Prognostica (1980); The Child Stealer (1983).

Siddons, Sarah (1755-1831)

Actress. The most celebrated woman on the stage in the 18th century. She was the eldest child of the actor-manager Roger Kemble and Sarah (née Ward), and was born into what became an important acting dynasty. Siddons began acting as a child, including the part of Ariel in a performance of the ▷ Dryden/▷ D'Avenant version of > The Tempest (1667), in which her future husband, William Siddons (1744-1808), played Hyppolito. She fought her parents' disapproval in order to marry him in 1773, and the couple continued acting in the provinces. ➤ Garrick engaged her for a season at ➤ Drury Lane, 1775-6, but her first appearances there were poorly received. Her fortunes turned during a visit to Manchester, and her reputation as an actress was consolidated at Bristol and at Bath. In 1782 she appeared again at Drury Lane, playing Isabella in Garrick's version of > Thomas Southerne's The Fatal Marriage. Her triumph was immediate, and she went on to play a succession of major roles with the company, including Belvidera in ▶ Otway's > Venice Preserv'd. It is said that people breakfasted near the theatre, so as to be first in the queue for tickets to see her, some coming from as far away as Newcastle, and prices rose to as much as a hundred guineas. Contemporaries commented on her beauty, stately dignity, and expressiveness, as well as her articulacy, so that not a word was lost. Her capacity to convey passion and grief was legendary. But she was sometimes criticized for her lack of variety, was poor in comic roles, and although she had many friends in high places, she had a reputation for being difficult to work with, and mean with money.

In 1785 Siddons played her most famous part, Lady Macbeth (> Macbeth), for the first time, later performing it on occasion by royal command. She added to her repertoire Cordelia (▷ King Lear), Cleopatra (▷ Antony and Cleopatra), Desdemona (> Othello), Rosalind in > As You Like It, other major > Shakespearian roles and many other roles, some written especially for her. Her career was interrupted only for brief intervals by the births of her seven children. In 1803 she followed her brother ▷ John Philip Kemble to ▷ Covent Garden. In old age she became fat and had to be helped out of a chair, the fact disguised by other actresses being similarly treated. Widowed in 1805, Siddons retired in 1812, afterwards appearing only at special benefits. Bib: Boaden, J., Memoirs of Mrs Siddons (2 vols);

Sidney, Mary, Countess of Pembroke (1561–1621)

Writer, translator and literary patron. Mary was born Mary Sidney, and was a member of the remarkable family which included ▷ Sir Philip Sidney, her eldest brother. Her early years were spent at Penshurst Place, in Kent (later to be celebrated in ➤ Ben Jonson's 'To Penshurst') and at Ludlow Castle, the setting for > John Milton's > masque Comus. In 1577 she married Henry Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, and took up residence in her husband's great estate of Wilton Place. Wilton was to become, in the words of > John Aubrey, ' . . . like a college, there were so many learned and ingenious persons. She was the greatest patroness of wit and learning of any lady in her time.' Amongst her protégés were ➤ Edmund Spenser, ➤ Sir Fulke Greville, > Thomas Nashe, > Gabriel Harvey, ▷ Samuel Daniel, ▷ Michael Drayton, > John Davies of Hereford, > Ben Jonson and ▶ John Donne.

So great was her influence on the writers of the late 16th century that it is easy to forget that she was an accomplished author and translator in her own right, and one, moreover, who used her own literary efforts as well as the reworkings of her brother's texts to advance her own Protestant and political causes. She revised and published an altered version of her brother's

Arcadia, completed his translations of the Psalms and translated the French Protestant thinker Philippe de Mornay's Discourse of Life and Death, Petrarch's Trionfo della Morte, and Robert Garnier's French neo-classical tragedy Marc Antoine.

Sidney, Sir Philip (1554-86)

Poet, courtier, soldier and statesman. A member of a distinguished noble family, he was a fine example of the > Renaissance ideal of aristocracy in his ability to excel in all that was regarded as fitting for a nobleman. He thus became a pattern for his age, as is shown by the numerous ⊳ elegies to him, including one by ➤ Edmund Spenser (Astrophel) and one by > James I of England. He was wounded at the battle of Zutphen in Flanders in characteristic circumstances, having discarded leg armour on finding that a comrade in arms had neglected to wear any; as he lay mortally wounded in the leg, he is reputed to have passed a cup of water to a dving soldier with the words, 'Thy need is greater than mine.'

Sidney's writings date mostly from the period 1580–83, when he was temporarily out of favour with ▷ Elizabeth I for political reasons, and was living with his sister ▷ Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke, at Wilton House near Salisbury; they were published after his death. Indeed, his work is permeated with political material and, as such, has become a focus of interest for ▷ cultural materialist and ▷ new historicist critics. His most famous poetry, the ▷ sonnet sequence ▷ Astrophil and Stella, was published in 1591, and inspired the numerous other sonnet sequences of the 1590s including ▷ Shakespeare's.

Apart from his sonnets, Sidney's poetic reputation rests on the verse interludes in ▶ The Arcadia, his prose romance, started in 1580 and published in 1590. His prose work also includes the most famous piece of Elizabethan criticism, ▶ An Apologie for Poetrie, published in 1595. A collaboration with his sister, the verse paraphrase of the Psalms, was not published until 1823. He also wrote two ▶ pastoral poems published in Davison's Poetical Rhapsody (1602) and partly translated from the French Du Plessis Mornay's A Work Concerning the Trueness of the Christian Religion (1587).

Siege of Rhodes, The (1656, revised in 1661) Opera-cum-⊳ heroic drama by ⊳ Sir William D'Avenant, thought to have been written originally as a play, with music added later in order to circumvent the Commonwealth (> Interregnum) law against purely dramatic entertainment, and gain the Government's permission to mount it at Rutland House. The performance helped pave the way for the reopening of the theatres, and for D'Avenant's own receipt of one of the monopoly patents as theatre manager. The action concerns the siege of Rhodes by Soleyman the Magnificent, and Duke Alphonso's unreasonable jealousy of his wife, the virtuous Ianthe, who eventually saves her husband and the island. D'Avenant said he wrote it partly to illustrate 'the Characters of Vertue in the shapes of Valor and Conjugal Love'. The staging as with the earlier court > masque was accompanied by lavish spectacle.

Sign

This is the term used by ▷ Ferdinand de Saussure in his Course in General Linguistics (1915) to refer to any linguistic unit through which meaning is produced. In Saussure's theory, the sign is the combination of two discrete elements, the signifier (form which signifies) and the signified (idea signified). In the phrase 'A rose by any other name would smell as sweet', the word 'rose' is the signified.

Signifier and signified are distinct aspects of the sign, but exist only within it. One important aspect of Saussure's definition of the sign is that any particular combination of signifier and signified is arbitrary. So a 'rose' could be called a 'chrysanthemum' or a 'telephone', but would still be as aromatic. Saussure's perceptions have been extremely influential in the development of ways of discussing the processes through which meaning is achieved.

'Signs of the Times' (1829)

A highly influential and analytical essay by the historian and social critic > Thomas Carlyle which originated as an anoymous article in the Edinburgh Review. In it Carlyle claims that the mechanical age and its reverence for moribund institutions has led to a lack of spirituality among men and women. Carlyle proposed heroic individualism as the solution to the problem. It was a specific attack on > Utilitarianism, which it condemned as a 'mechanical' rather than a 'dynamic' system of thought. The essay influenced a number of Victorian writers, in particular ➤ Charles Dickens, who dedicated his novel ➤ Hard Times (1854) to Carlyle. ➤ Anti-industrialism.

Silas Marner (1861)

A novel by ➤ George Eliot. Silas Marner is a weaver who has been driven out of his religious community as a result of a false charge of theft. He loses his religious faith and moves to a Midland village, Raveloe, where he re-establishes his trade, but maintains a selfimposed exile from the community. He lives only for money, hoarding his gold until it is stolen from his cottage by Dunstan Cass, son of the local squire. Dunstan then disappears, leaving Silas in despair. A transformation in Silas' life occurs following the mysterious arrival of a young child who finds her way into his cottage. Silas, initially, sees the child as a substitute for his lost wealth, and adopts her. But the relationship soon draws him from his miserly ways and he and the child, whom he calls Eppie, become devoted to one another. It is later revealed that Eppie is the daughter of Dunstan's brother, Godfrey, and Molly Farran, a working-class woman whom Godfrey had married, but refused publicly to acknowledge. Molly and her child had been forced to live in squalor and wretchedness, and Molly eventually dies, abandoned, in a ditch. When Eppie is almost grown up, Godfrey finally acknowledges his paternity, but Eppie refuses to leave the man who has cared for her. She refuses, also, to be seduced by Godfrey's wealth, and remains loval to the working-class values of her closest friends. In Silas Marner, Eliot is critical of the rigid system of patriarchal law and its associated ethics of individualism, and argues for an alternative morality based upon more malleable and socially responsible codes.

Sillitoe, Alan (b 1028)

Novelist and poet. The son of a labourer in a cycle factory, he left school at 14 to work in a similar factory. His birthplace was the Midlands town of Nottingham, near which D. H. Lawrence also grew up. Sillitoe, like Lawrence, writes from the standpoint of one whose origins are outside London and the middle classes, and he is the best known of a group of post-war novelists from similar backgrounds, including > Stan Barstow, > John Braine and ➤ David Storey. The influence of Lawrence on these writers is inevitably strong, and especially so in the case of Sillitoe, but he presents a narrow spirit of social rebellion from which Lawrence is free. At present, his fame rests chiefly on his first novel, Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (1958), which has been filmed. The novel's hero, Arthur Seaton, has become a type-figure of the post-1945 industrial, welfare state working man, born into an economic fabric against which his strong impulses rebel. More original and equally well known is the tale The Loneliness of the Long-Distance Runner (1959), a kind of fable of anarchic social rebellion. He has also written stories: The Ragman's Daughter (1963); Guzman Go Home (1968); Men Women and Children (1973); Down to the Bone (1976); The Second Chance (1980); and poems: The Rats (1960); A Falling Out of Love (1964); Snow on the North Side of Lucifer (1979); Sun before Departure: poems 1974 to 1982 (1984); Tides and Stone Walls (1986); and more novels: The General (1960), about the war in Malaya, in which Sillitoe served; Key to the Door (1961); The Death of William Posters (1965); A Tree on Fire (1967); A Start in Life (1970); Travels in Nihilon (1971); Raw Material (1972); The Flame of Life (1974); The Widower's Son (1976); The Storyteller (1979); Her Victory (1982); The Last Flying Boat (1983); Down From the Hill (1984); Life Goes On (1985); Out of the Whirlpool (a novella: 1087); Snowstop (1003). In 1078 he published three plays: This Foreign Field (1970), Pit Strike (1977), The Interview (1978).

'Silly Novels by Lady Novelists' (1856) An article by ➤ George Eliot, printed in the > Westminster Review. With scathing ridicule. Eliot attacks the unreality of many women's novels, criticizing their false portravals of character and sexual relationships, their romantic wish-fulfilment and ludicrous representations of female learning. Eliot argues that the effect of such 'Silly Novels' is to make female aspirations appear risible and to undermine female achievement. '[R]otten and trashy books' depreciate 'the sacredness of the writer's art' and obscure a genuine women's tradition. 'For there is a distinctive women's writing,' Eliot asserts, "a precious specialty", lying quite apart from masculine aptitude and experience.'

Silver-fork novels

A genre popular in Britain between 1825 and 1850. Typically, these novels concentrate on describing the lives of the wealthy, and feature glamorous heroines in search of love, marriage and luxury. A significant aspect of the genre is its focus on contemporary fashion; the novels often served as handbooks for the latest styles, explicitly naming particular London shops and dressmakers. Even at the time there was debate as to whether these novels unquestioningly praised the seemingly empty lives of their heroes and heroines (the term comes from 'silver-fork polisher', which means to compliment those wealthy enough to possess such cutlery), or whether they were in fact subtle satires revealing upperclass hypocrisy. These two aspects may seen to be represented by > William Hazlitt, who referred to silver-fork novelists as 'dandy writers' (The Examiner, 1827), and by the > Victorian novelist Edward Bulwer Lytton (1803-73) himself described as such an author, who defended his work as an exposé of the fashionable classes rather than an accolade to them. Other silver-fork novelists include: ➤ Marguerite Blessington, ➤ Charlotte Bury, > Susan Ferrier, > Catherine Gore, > Lady Caroline Lamb, > Frances Trollope. ➤ Henry VII, first king of the ➤ Tudor family; they declared Simnel to be Edward,

Earl of Warwick, whose father, George, Duke of Clarence, was the younger brother of

➤ Edward IV. The true Earl of Warwick

Simon Pure

Character in ▷ A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1718), the comedy by ▷ Susannah Centlivre, who is described in the list of Dramatis Personae as 'a Quaking Preacher'. He is impersonated by Colonel Fainwell, as part of the latter's plot to impress the guardians of Mrs Lovely, and gain their permission to marry her. The scene in which this occurs is interrupted by the arrival of Simon Pure himself, giving rise to the expression, 'the real Simon Pure', meaning the real, genuine, or authentic person or thing.

Simpson, N. F. (Norman Frederick) (b 1919)

British dramatist sometimes classified as an absurdist writer, although his work is strongly influenced by a bizarre and zany humour in the English tradition of Lewis Carroll and the Goon Show. He wrote several short plays before his more famous One Way Pendulum in 1959, in which 500 weighing machines are taught to sing the Hallelujah Chorus. This was followed by a spy comedy, The Cresta Run (1965). Although he is not considered a major dramatist his work helped the development of drama away from conservative conventions during the 1950s and early 60s.

Sinclair, Andrew (b 1935)

Novelist. Like ▷ David Caute, Sinclair is interested in ▷ postmodernist experimental narrative. Gog (1967), the epic journey through England of an alienated, semi-mythical character, blends realism and fantasy, and employs a variety of narrative forms, including critical essay, comic strip and film script. Sinclair's work has affinities with that of American writers such as Kurt Vonnegut. Other novels include: Magog (1972); A Patriot for Hire (1978).

Sinclair Catherine (1800-64)

Scottish novelist and writer of ▷ children's literature. She was born in Edinburgh and lived there, for most of her life, concerning herself with philanthropic work in the city. Her famous novel for children is ▷ Holiday House (1839), while her adult novels include Jane Bouverie or, Prosperity and Adversity (1846, reissued as Jane Bouverie or, Hom She Became an Old Maid, in 1855). Most of Sinclair's writings are moralistic and religious, and she published a tract in 1852, A Letter on the Principles of the Christian Faith.

Sinclair, May (1863-1946)

Novelist, poet and critic. She was brought up by her mother and educated largely at home, though she spent one year at Cheltenham Ladies College. Her novels include: The Divine Fire (1904); The Judgment of Eve (1907); The Helpmate (1907); Kitty Tailleur (1908); The Creators: A Comedy (1910); The Combined Maze (1913); The Three Sisters (1914); The Tree of Heaven (1917); Mary Olivier: a Life (1919); The Romantic (1920); Anne Severn and the Fieldings (1922); The Life and Death of Harriet Frean (1922); The Dark Night (1924); The Rector of Wyck (1925); Far End (1926); The Allinghams (1927); The History of Anthony Waring (1927). They reveal her interest in psychoanalysis, philosophy and feminist issues and her concern with problems of social and psychological repression faced by women; some, such as the > Bildungsroman, Mary Olivier and The Life and Death of Harriet Frean use > stream of consciousness narrative (a term which Sinclair herself applied to the work of ➤ Dorothy Richardson). Sinclair supported herself financially by writing reviews and translations; she published The Three Brontës (1912), a biography; Feminism (1912); two works on idealist philosophy, Defense of Idealism (1917) and The New Idealism (1922); and articles and reviews about the work of contemporary poets such as T.S. Eliot and Sing Song, A Nursery Rhyme Book (1872) A collection of ▷ nonsense verse and nursery rhymes by ▷ Christina Rossetti. Written for children, the poems explore the imaginative possibilities of language, emphasizing sound, repetition and word play. Sir Charles Grandison, The History of (1753-4) The last of the three novels presented through letters by ▶ Samuel Richardson. It is an attempt to present the type of the perfect gentleman, just as its predecessor, > Clarissa had represented the perfect woman. It prescribes the kind of behaviour which ⊳ Addison had preached in his periodical > The Spectator. However, it suffers much more than does Clarissa from the excessive idealization of its central character. The theme is right conduct in acute > sentimental and ethical dilemma; Grandison is in love with Harriet Byron (whom he rescues from the vicious Sir Hargrave Pollexfen), but has obligations to Clementina Porretta, member of a noble Italian family. Among other lessons, Sir Charles shows how a gentleman can avoid fighting a > duel without losing his honour. The book has some good minor characters, and is an interesting study in manners, though Richardson did not understand the Italian aristocracy of his period. As a psychological study, it is much inferior to Clarissa but it influenced the work of ▶ Jane Austen.

Sir Patrick Spens

An old Scottish ▷ ballad describing the loss at sea of a Scottish ship, its commander Sir Patrick and all the crew. It exists in several versions; in the shortest, the ship puts to sea in bad weather at the order of the king and Sir Patrick foresees the disaster − brought about, apparently, by royal vanity. In the longest version, the ship goes to Norway to bring back a princess possibly based on the Maid of Norway who died at sea in 1290, or possibly the Scandinavian queen of James VI (16th century); the Norwegian lords complain about the behaviour of the Scottish nobility, who leave suddenly, in bad weather, having taken offence. Both versions are fine examples of the art of the ballad, but the shortest exhibits that form at its most economical and dramatic.

Sir Thomas More (c 1596)

Although the play has been roughly dated to 1596, there is no actual record of production and it exists in manuscript in the British Library, London. It follows the story of ⊳ Sir Thomas More's life from his rise to favour in the court of ▶ Henry VIII to his friendship with > Erasmus, his political downfall, and his execution. It is interesting primarily to students of English literature because ➤ Shakespeare may have been one of the contributors to the play, together with > Henry Chettle, > Thomas Dekker, ➤ Thomas Heywood, and ➤ Anthony Munday. The manuscript contains additions and revisions, possibly in response to heavy > censorship of the original text by the Master of the Revels (> Revels, Master of the), and these may be as late as 1601.

Sir Thopas

> Thopas, Sir.

Sitwell, Edith (1887–1964), Sir Osbert (1892–1969), Sir Sacheverell (1897–1988) An eminent literary family, of whom Edith is best known as a poet, and her brothers (both of whom were also poets) as an autobiographer and a writer of travel books respectively.

Edith is the most celebrated of the three. Born of repressive and disapproving aristocratic parents, Edith's eccentric beauty and unconventionality set her apart. As an adolescent she encountered the work of Rimbaud, who influenced her greatly. Her first volume of poems was The Mother and Other Poems (1915). Her poetry is distinctive for her interest in elaborately contrived sound effects, experiments in rhythm, and startling imagery. Her sequence Façade (1923) is her most popular work; it was set to music by the composer William Walton. Osbert Sitwell indicates its character in his autobiography, Laughter in the Next Room: 'The idea of Façade first entered our minds as the result of certain technical experiments at which my sister had recently been working: experiments in obtaining through the medium of words the rhythm of dance measures such as waltzes, polkas, foxtrots. These exercises were often experimental enquiries into the effect on rhythm, on speed, and on colour of the use of rhymes, assonances, dissonances, placed outwardly, at different places in the line, in most elaborate patterns'. The tone of Façade is lighthearted or satirical. From The Sleeping Beauty (1924) a more romantic tone predominated, and in 1929 Gold Coast Customs opened her most ambitious phase of philosophic verse with majestic themes. These include Street Songs (1942), The Song of the Cold (1945) and The Shadow of Cain (1947). Her prose works and criticism include a biography of Alexander Pope (1930). From 1916 to 1921 she edited Wheels, a magazine which represented a resistance to the ▷ Georgian poets.

Six Articles

A law passed through Parliament on the authority of ➤ Henry VIII in 1539. Having removed the English Church from the authority of the Pope and abolished the ➤ monasteries, Henry was concerned to prove himself a true Catholic 'without the Pope'. He therefore ordained that the traditional doctrines should be reaffirmed, especially 'the real presence' of Christ in the bread and wine taken in Holy Communion. Protestants, by then numerous in southern England, disliked the law, which they called 'the whip with six strings'.

Skelton, John (c 1460-1529)

Poet; awarded the title of > 'poet laureate' by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge; tutor to Prince Henry, later > Henry VIII (1494-1502); ordained in 1498 and Rector of Diss from 1502. Skelton composed poetry in Latin but is most famous for his satirical English poetry, in which the corruption and corrupting influence of ➤ Cardinal Wolsev are frequent targets. He is a brilliant stylist, who seems to delight in the juxtaposition of learned and popular registers (often inserting Latin verses or tags into his work). He developed the 'skeltonic' verse form: lines containing 2/3 accented syllables which often alliterate, linked in couplets or sometimes longer rhyme runs of up to 14 lines. His work is highly self-conscious, playful, sometimes parodic, and reveals a wide acquaintance with the work of late 14th- and earlier 15th-century court poets. The Bowge of Court (1498) is a barely veiled attack on court corruption through a reworking of the 'ship of fools' convention.

His Phyllype Sparrow (c 1505) is in two parts: the first represents an attempt by a young convent girl to compose a fitting memorial for her dead sparrow, using the resources of classical and Christian culture, which includes a parodic bird Mass; the second is a lengthy praise poem outlining the attractions of Jane herself, and the fantasies she arouses in the speaker. The Tunnyng of Elinour Rummyng (c 1517) is an exercise in creating the female grotesque which describes the establishment and the female patrons of Elinour's ale house. Skelton's later satires, Speke Parrot, Colin Clout, Why Come Ye Nat to Court, (all written c 1521-2) attack Wolsey's abuse of power in particular, and state and ecclesiastical corruption in general. Indeed, recent criticism suggests that his early vocation as a priest constantly affects his literary work, but towards social criticism and not inward contemplation like later spiritual writers (eg ▷ George Herbert). The Garlande or Chapelet of Laurell, heavily indebted to ▷ Chaucer's House of Fame, is Skelton's witty projection of his place, as a poet laureate, in the Hall of Fame. He is also the author of a ▷ morality play, Magnyfycence (c 1515-16), which examines the dangers of materialistic corruption at court.

Slavery

Slavery grew during the 17th century, and people of colour entered England through the ports, especially Bristol, which was the centre of the slave trade. African slaves were taken to English colonies in the West Indies, where the slaves and the colonized native population might not share a language, so the new forms of English from these regions did not emerge as written discourses until after the 18th century. Writers from ➤ Aphra Behn to ➤ Hannah More wrote about slavery, and abolitionist activity began towards the end of the 18th century, by which time there was an active oral culture among slaves using song in African and English languages (see Sir Hans Sloane, A Voyage to the Islands Madera, Barbados, Nieves, S. Christophers and Jamaica, 1707). Women writers in the 17th and 18th centuries also had a keen awareness of slavery as a ▶ feminist issue. Many identified the condition of women in society, and particularly in > marriage, as one of slavery; eg > Sarah Fyge's, 'From the first dawn of life into the grave, / Poor Woman kind's in every state a slave'.

Sleath, Eleanor (c 1800)

Novelist. Sleath wrote six ▷ Gothic novels for ▷ Minerva. While mocked by ▷ Jane Austen for her unsophisticated style, Sleath's novels are packed full of all the usual Gothic ingredients (ghosts, castles, disguises and villainy), have fast-paced narratives, and are altogether enjoyable, mainly because they are so utterly unpretentious. Orphan of the Rhine (1798) and The Nocturnal Minstrel, or The Spirit of the Wood (1810) have historical settings and beautiful heroines who although crossed by fate and deceived by scoundrels triumph in the end. The Bristol Heiress, or The Errors of Education begins slowly and seems to be a satire of polite society, but quickly improves when the plot transfers to a strange, haunted castle in Cumberland.

Sleeping Beauty, The

A famous fairy story in the collection made by Charles Perrault, translated into English in 1729. A baby princess is doomed by a wicked fairy to prick herself on the finger and die, but a good fairy changes death into a hundred years' sleep, from which the princess is awakened by the kiss of a prince.

Slough of Despond

A boggy place in ➤ John Bunyan's allegory ➤ Pilgrim's Progress. Christian sinks into it immediately after taking flight from the ➤ City of Destruction. It signifies the period of depression into which a convert is liable to fall after the first enthusiasm of his conversion.

Smart, Christopher (1722-71)

Poet. He showed early poetic gifts, and received support from the aristocratic Vane family, on whose estates his father was a steward. He made a precarious living through his early poems, which followed the fashions of the time. His Poems on Several Occasions (1752) include The Hop-Garden, a > blank-verse > Georgic in the manner of > John Philips' Cyder, and a > satirical poem, The Hilliad appeared in 1753. In the 1750s he developed a religious mania which drove him to continuous prayer, and he was for a time locked up in an asylum (> Bedlam) where he developed the original poetic style for which he is now best known. After his release he published A Song to David (1763), an ecstatic poem in praise of David as author of the > Psalms. It is written in six-line stanzas rhyming aabccb, and owes something to the > biblically inspired poetry and hymns of such writers as ▷ Isaac Watts and ▷ Charles Wesley. Smart's work was ignored at the time and much of it, including Jubilate Agno, A Song from Bedlam, was not published until 1939. Bib: Ainsworth, E. G., and Noyes, C. E., Life.

Smart, Elizabeth (1913-1986)

Canadian novelist and poet. Smart is best known for By Grand Central Station I Sat Down and Wept (1945), a novel in an extravagant, highly poetic style influenced by the surrealist poetry of George Barker, with whom she had four children, though she never became one of his several wives. This relationship, begun when Smart wrote to Barker and continued over many years, is portrayed in the latter part of the novel. Smart moved to England in 1943, working as a journalist, an advertising copy-writer and literary editor of Queen. Her later works include two volumes of poetry, A Bonus (1977) and Eleven Poems (1982); an autobiographical prose piece, The Assumption of the Rogues and Rascals (1977); In the Meantime (1984), poems and prose pieces. Smectymnuus

A name under which five ▷ Presbyterian writers wrote against episcopacy – rule of the Church by bishops – in the 17th century. The name was suggested by the initial letters of the names of the writers: Stephen Marshall, Edward Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow. Their ▷ pamphlet was attacked by ▷ Bishop Joseph Hall, and was defended in two pamphlets by ▷ John Milton in 1641 and 1642. ▷ Samuel Butler, in his poetic satire Hudibras, written against the Puritans, calls the Presbyterians the 'Legion of Smec'.

Smiles, Samuel (1812-1904)

Journalist: philosopher of 'self-help'. Born at Haddington in Scotland, one of eleven children, his early life was a struggle, dominated by the vigour of his widowed mother. He graduated in medicine at Edinburgh University in 1832, and began practising as a doctor in his home village. Competition was severe however, and he exchanged medicine for journalism, becoming editor of the Leeds Times. He also became secretary to railway companies, and in this capacity he made acquaintance with George Stephenson (1781-1848), inventor of the steam railway engine. His Life of Stephenson was published in 1857, and was followed by the lives of other famous 10th-century engineers: James Brindley (1864); Boulton and Watt (1865); Telford (1867). But the book that made him famous was Self-Help (1859); it sold 20,000 copies in the first year and was translated into at least seventeen languages. He followed it by similar books, all demonstrating the worldly advantages of certain moral virtues: Character (1871); Thrift (1875); Duty (1880). The success of these books was due to their optimism, and to the simple, practical expression of his ideas. His international prestige is illustrated by his reception of the Order of St Sava from the King of Serbia in 1897. Smiles represents the vigorous and hopeful aspect of the Industrial Revolution, as it affected ordinary people, in contrast to the sceptical view of it taken by many other writers.

Smith, Adam (1723-90)

Political economist. His important work was An Enquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations - always referred to as The Wealth of Nations - published in 1776, at the outbreak of the rebellion of the colonists in America (> American colonies; American Independence, The War of) which he predicted, 'will be one of the foremost nations of the world'. The especial influence of this book comes from his discussion of the function of the state in the degree and kind of control it should exercise over the activities of society, and in particular, of trade. He concluded that the traditional ⊳ mercantile system (nowadays called 'protection') was based on a misunderstanding of the nature of wealth, and that nations prospered to the extent that governments allowed trade to remain freely competitive, unrestrained by taxes intended to protect the economy of a nation from competition from other nations. His opinions became increasingly influential and eventually dominant in British economics during the first half of the 19th century; his opposition to unnecessary interference by the government in trade and society became harmful in that it was interpreted by later governments as an excuse not to remedy social abuses arising from industrialism.

> Free trade.

Smith, Charlotte (1749-1806)

Poet, novelist and translator, born in London. She began writing for the Lady's Magazine when she was only 14. Married in 1764 or 1765 she had two pregnanicies before she was 17. Her Elegiac Sonnets (1784) was moderately successful, her first novel, Emmeline (1788), much more so, and this was followed by another nine novels, including Ethelinde (1789), Celestina (1791), The Old Manor House and The Wanderings of Warwick (both 1794), Montalbert (1795), Marchmont (1796), The Banished Man and The Young Philosopher (1798). The novels contain elements of ▷ satire, ▷ sentiment and the > Gothic, and were compared favourably with those of ➤ Fanny Burney, and ➤ Anne Radcliffe, whom she influenced. Smith was also sympathetic to the ▷ French Revolution and > American War of Independence, and comments on these in several of her works. She wrote a number of children's books, and made translations from the French.

Smith, Horatio (1779-1849)

Poet and novelist. Horatio Smith (also known as 'Horace') collaborated with his brother

> James Smith on > Rejected Addresses (1812) and Horace in London (1813), extremely popular imitations of > Horace's odes. Horatio went on to write historical romances in the style of > Scott, including Brambletye House (1826) and The Tor Hill (1846).

Smith, James (1775–1839)
Poet. James was the brother of \triangleright Horatio Smith, with whom he wrote \triangleright Rejected Addresses

(1812) and Horace in London (1813), odes in imitation of ▷ Horace.

Smith, Stevie (Florence Margaret) (1902–71) Poet and novelist. The 'unpoetic' life of Stevie Smith, who worked in an office and spent her life caring for her elderly aunt in a London suburb, is well known as the context for the production of her concise but anarchic poetry. Much of her work is animated by themes of sexual anxiety and an ambivalence towards Christianity which belies its popular image of comic whimsy. Of her novels, Novel on Yellow Paper (1936) is the most widely known. Several of her collections of witty, understated poems are accompanied by her own drawings. Works include: Collected Poems (1975); Me Again: Uncollected Writings (ed. Barbera, J. and McBrien, W.; 1983).

Smith, W. H. and Sons

A firm of newsagents, stationers, booksellers and (from 1860 until 1961) owners of a ▷ circulating library, the rival of Mudie's (▷ Mudie, Charles Edward). Founded in 1792 in a small newsvendor's shop in London, the firm flourished through its station bookstall concessions (the first at Euston in 1848) and its involvement in publishing. Like Mudie's, Smith's exercised some moral censorship over the material they sold (and still do). The two firms were rivals but combined to kill off the ▷ triple-decker novel in 1894. Unlike Mudie's, however, Smith's are still flourishing and in 1959 established the W.H. Smith Literary Award.

Smith, William (d 1696)

Actor. Smith joined the ▷ Duke's Company under ▷ Sir William D'Avenant in 1662, where he became one of its leading actors, and created many prestigious roles of the period, including Sir Fopling Flutter in ▷ Sir George Etherege's ▷ The Man of Mode, Pierre in ▷ Thomas Otway's ▷ Venice Preserv'd, a part written for him, and Willmore in ▷ Aphra Behn's ▷ The Rover (Parts 1 and 11). Tall and handsome, Smith was viewed by his contemporaries as a gentleman, of high moral reputation. He is said to have acted in both comedy and tragedy with dignity and flair.

Smock Alley Theatre, Dublin

This was important not only in its own right, but also to the London theatre as a venue for preview performances. In addition, many of the great names in the English theatre began their careers in Dublin, including ▷ Spranger Barry, ▷ Kitty Clive, Thomas Doggett (c1670–1721), ▷ George Farquhar, ▷ Charles Macklin, ▷ James Quin, ▷ Richard Brinsley Sheridan (whose father ▷ Thomas acted at Smock Alley for many years), ▷ Robert Wilks, and ▷ Peg Woffington. Others like ▷ David Garrick and ➤ Barton Booth acted in Dublin on various occasions.

Smollett, Tobias (George) (1721–71) Born near Dumbarton, the son of a Scots laird, Smollett studied at Glasgow University and was then apprenticed to a surgeon. In 1739 he moved to London, trying to stage his play The Regicide, but the attempt was unsuccessful, and he joined the navy as a surgeon's mate, sailing for the West Indies.

In 1744 Smollett returned to London and set up a medical practice in Downing Street, though he never made a living out of medicine. His first publication, a poem entitled The Tears of Scotland, appeared in 1746, and later that year he published a satire on London life, Advice. In 1747 a further satire, Reproof, appeared, and he wrote the novel The Adventures of ▷ Roderick Random, published to great acclaim in 1748. Further novels, which draw on his experiences in the navy and his continental travel, include The Adventures of ▷ Peregrine Pickle (1751) and The Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom (1753).

Smollett, now married and a father, struggled to support his family by editorial work, working on The Critical Reviem (1756-63) and publishing his translation of > Don Quixote in 1755. Finally, his Complete History of England proved a commercial success, and was followed by Continuation volumes. In 1760 Smollett began The British Magazine, where The Life and Adventures of Sir Lancelot Greaves was run as a serial; in the same year he was fined and imprisoned for a libellous article in the Critical Review.

Smollett had been suffering from ill health for several years, and in 1753 he began to show symptoms of consumption. In 1763 his daughter died, and he abandoned literary work to travel with his wife in Italy and France. On their return in 1765 he wrote the > epistolary work Travels through France and Italy, which drew from > Sterne the nickname 'Smelfungus'. His final major work was The Expedition of Humphry Clinker, published shortly before his death in 1771.

Snobs, The Book of (1848)
A collection of satirical sketches by the novelist ➤ William Makepeace Thackeray, first published in the periodical ➤ Punch in 1846-7 as The Snobs of England by one of themselves. The title is based on a Cambridge student paper, The Snob, to which he contributed as

Time of Hope (1949), The Masters (1951), The New Men (1954), Homecomings (1956); The Conscience of the Rich (1958); The Affair (1960); Corridors of Power (1964); The Sleep of Reason (1968); Last Things (1970).

He also played a large part in public affairs; he was created Baron (Life Peerage) in 1964, and served as a junior minister (Ministry of Technology) from 1964 till 1966. Trained as a scientist, he held strong views about the intellectual cleavage between men trained in the sciences and those trained in liberal studies in the modern world. His Rede Lecture at Cambridge, The Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution (1959), became famous, partly because it provoked an exceptionally ferocious retort from the critic F. R. Leavis. Other novels include: The Malcontents (1972); In Their Wisdom (1974). He was married to the writer ▶ Pamela Hansford Johnson. Bib: Cooper, W., C. P. Snow; Leavis, F. R., Two Cultures? Social Problem novel (Condition of England novel)

A type of novel which came to prominence in the 1840s (known as the > 'Hungry Forties' because of starvation among the urban working classes). These novels addressed the social and economic problems arising from the Industrial Revolution, including urban poverty, unemployment and industrial conflict, and attempted to promote reform. Notable examples are ➤ Mary Barton (1848) and ➤ North and South (1854-5) by ➤ Mrs Gaskell, ➤ Coningsby (1844) by ➤ Disraeli and ➤ Alton Locke (1950) by ▷ Charles Kingsley. The phrase 'condition of England' was coined by > Carlyle in his work Chartism (1839) (> Chartist movement). Bib: Winn, S.A. and Alexander, L.M. (eds.), The Slaughter-House of Mammon: An Anthology of Victorian Social Protest Literature.

Socrates (? 470-399 BC)

Greek philosopher. He taught entirely by word of mouth, the so-called 'Socratic method' being the discovery of the truth by putting appropriate questions. Because he wrote nothing, all information about him depends on the writing of two contemporaries - the historian > Xenophon (Memorabilia) and the philosopher > Plato, who stands in relation to Socrates somewhat as St Paul does to Jesus Christ, except that Plato was personally taught by Socrates. Plato puts his own ideas into the mouth of Socrates in his philosophical dialogues, and it is of course difficult to know just how much and in what ways he expanded the Socratic philosophy. This philosophy declared that the true end of philosophy was not to discover the nature of the world but the nature of goodness and how to lead the good life; related to this is the doctrine of Forms, according to which reality is seen as fundamentally spiritual, and the real in a person is their soul.

Socrates is said to have had a beautiful soul in an ugly body; he was married to a woman called Xanthippe. He fell out of favour with the ruling party of Athens, his native city, because he befriended enemies of the party; he was accordingly made to put himself to death by drinking hemlock.

Soldier's Fortune, The (1681)

Comedy by ➤ Thomas Otway. Beaugard and Lady Dunce have loved one another for seven years, but during his absence in France, she has been prevailed on by her family to marry Sir Davy Dunce. Aided by the unpleasant pander, Sir Jolly Jumble, the former lovers plot to cuckold Dunce, duping him into carrying their messages and even facilitating their adulterous liaison unwittingly. This intrigue is offset against the witty courtship of Sir Jolly's adopted daughter Sylvia and the impoverished Courtine. She quite literally snares him in a noose, in order to win him. In a comical > proviso scene, full of double entendre, he undertakes to farm her lands and keep other tenants away, unless he finds the property 'too common' already. The play is fast-moving, but rather episodic in structure. It is expressly royalist, but there are elements of social comment, as in the references to the poverty of the king's loyal soldiers and servants (> Charles II was notoriously bad at paying his debts to those whom he employed). A sequel, > The Atheist, appeared in 1684.

Some Reflections on Marriage (1700) Polemic by ➤ Mary Astell, attacking the contemporary conditions of ⊳ marriage; it was occasioned by reading about the forced marriage of the Duchess of Mazarin to a man she disliked, which led to the marriage's breakdown, and a series of extra-marital affairs, including one with > Charles II. Astell analyses the causes of the many unhappy unions in her day, identifying the unequal power relations between men and women, and men's contempt of women, as the major factors. These, she says, deprive women of a proper choice before marriage, and keep them as slaves or prisoners within it. Astell argues that too often the man's motive in marrying is to gain possession of a woman's estate, rather than love, and that tyranny in marriage ought not to be tolerated any more than despotism in a state. And echoing her own arguments in > A Serious Proposal to the Ladies Astell advocates education to strengthen women's capacity for judgment, and men's respect. She herself resolved the problem, however, by remaining single.

Somerville and Ross (Edith Anne Oenone Somerville, 1858–1949, and Violet Florence Martin, 1862–1915)

Collaborative novelists and second cousins, both of them belonging to the wealthy Anglo-Irish ascendancy. Edith Somerville grew up at the family seat in County Cork, and went on to study art in Düsseldorf, Paris and London, Violet Martin was born in West Galway. Somerville exhibited as an artist from 1920-38 but began her literary career in 1889, three years after meeting her cousin. Their first collaborative book was An Irish Cousin (1889), which charts the decline of the Irish land-owning classes. They were very successful and popular for their portrayal of the humour of the indigenous Irish at the expense of their landed masters. Their comic masterpiece, Some Experiences of an Irish RM (1908), details the experiences of a resident magistrate in Ireland in the form of a series of ⊳ short stories. This was followed by more tales of Irish life in A Patrick's Day Hunt (1902), All on the Irish Shore (1903) and Further Experiences of an Irish RM (1908). They also published > travel books including Through Connemara in a Governess Cart (1892) and In the Vine Country (1893), which described their travels in France. Beggars on Horseback (1895) recounts a riding tour of North Wales. Their novels include The Real Charlotte (1894), which overturns the stereotype of the 'good' and beautiful woman, The Silver Fox (1898) and Dan Russell the Fox (1911), which was the last collaboration before the death of Martin. Somerville continued to publish novels under their > pseudonym right up until 1938, believing that she retained a spirit connection with Martin. Somerville became the first female Master of Fox Hounds in 1903 and both women worked for the > women's suffrage cause in Ireland, although they distanced themselves from the militant activity and anti-Home Rule stance of the English suffragists. Towards the end of her life Somerville was awarded the Gregory Medal for her contribution to ▶ Irish literature.

Somerville, William (1675–1742) Author of The Chace (1735), a poem in > Miltonic > blank verse celebrating the various branches of hunting. He followed this in 1740 with Hobbinol, a > mock heroic piece set in rural Gloucestershire and a poem on hawking, Field Sports (1742).

Songs and Sonnets (Donne) (c 1633-5) A heading given to 55 love poems by ➤ John Donne. Though the poems themselves first appeared in the 1633 edition of Donne's Poems

(with the exception of 'Breake of Day' and 'The Expiration', which had been published earlier), the category of 'Songs and Sonnets' did not appear until the publication of the second edition of Donne's poetry in 1635. Despite the title, very few of the poems gathered under the heading are songs, or, in the technical sense, > sonnets. Modern editors have questioned the authorship of two of the poems attributed to Donne (though not published either in 1633 or 1635), these being 'The Token' and the poem known as 'Self-Love'. Again, some modern editors have felt the need to add to the category by transferring other poems of Donne's into the group. Various attempts at arranging the poems into a sequence according to their presumed date of composition have been made, but with little real success.

Songs and Sonnets (Tottel)

→ Tottel's Miscellany.

Songs of Innocence and Experience (1789-1794) Two collections of lyric poems by ➤ William Blake, engraved and illuminated by hand. The Songs of Innocence were completed in 1789, and the Songs of Experience were added in an enlarged edition in 1794. They were intended to be read by children, and although frequently profound and complex, are perfectly lucid and easy to comprehend. They present 'the Two Contrary States of the Human Soul', and are thus complementary, since in Blake's dialectical view 'Without Contraries is no progression'. The world of Innocence is without morality, repression or fear, and in Blake's dynamic interpretation of Christian mythology, 'unfallen'. Inevitably some of the Innocence poems, such as 'The Lamb' and 'A Cradle Song' seem sentimental and oversweet to the adult, 'fallen' reader, while others, such as 'Holy Thursday' and 'The Chimney Sweeper' can seem highly ironic in their trusting attitude towards corrupt parental and political authority. But irony is no part of Innocence, and the Experience counterparts to these poems are in no sense a debunking of the Innocence versions. However it must be admitted that the bitter social criticism and moral indignation of Experience produce more memorable verse (though again perhaps this is more the case for the adult reader than the child). 'The Tyger', 'The Clod and the Pebbles', and 'The Sick Rose' are the most concentrated symbolic poems in the language, remarkable for their combination of emotional complexity and intellectual clarity. It is characteristic of Blake's dialectical approach that the later poem 'To Tizrah', added to Experience in the 1801 edition, flatly contradicts the sexual libertarianism of the other poems in the Experience collection, depicting the freeing of the soul from its physical bonds.

Sonnet

A short poem of 14 lines, and a rhyme scheme restricted by one or other of a variety of principles. The most famous pattern is called the 'Petrarchan sonnet', from its masterly use by the Italian poet ➤ Petrarch. This divides naturally into an eight-line stanza (octave) rhyming abba abba, and a six-line stanza in which two or three rhymes may occur; the two stanzas provide also for contrast in attitude to the theme. The origin of the sonnet is unknown, but its earliest examples date from the 13th century in Europe, although it did not reach England until the 16th century. The immense popularity of the form perhaps derives from its combination of discipline, musicality and amplitude. The subject-matter is commonly love, but after the 16th century it becomes, at least in England, much more varied. The first writers of sonnets in England were ➤ Sir Thomas Wyatt, and ➤ Henry Howard Surrey; the popular anthology > Tottel's Miscellany (1559) made their experiments widely known. The first really fine sonnet sequence was > Sir Philip Sidney's > Astrophil and Stella. Its publication in 1591 set an eagerly followed fashion for its distinctively English form. This consisted of a single stanza of 14 lines concluding in a > couplet; it is thought that the comparative scarcity of rhyming words in the English language may be the explanation of the greater number of rhymes and freedom in the rhyming scheme in contrast to the Petrarchan form. The greatest of the succeeding sequences was undoubtedly > Shakespeare's (➤ Sonnets, Shakespeare's), but notable ones were produced by ⊳ Samuel Daniel, ⊳ Michael Drayton, and ➤ Edmund Spenser. The first sonnet sequence to be written in English by a woman was > Lady Mary Wroth's Panpuilia to Amphilanthus.

The sonnet form continued to be used after 1600, notably by ⊳ John Donne and ⊳ John Milton, but much less for amorous themes and more for religious ones (eg Donne's Holy Sonnets) or by Milton for expressions of other forms of personal experience (eg On his Blindness) or for political declamation (On the Late Massacre in Piedmont). Milton used the Petrarchan rhyme scheme, but he kept the English form of using a single stanza. From the mid-17th to mid-18th century the different style of thought and feeling suggested by the heroic couplet kept the sonnet out of use; the cult of sentiment by poets such as ⊳ Thomas Gray and ⊳ William Cowper then brought it back, but a real revival had to wait for the first 30 years of the 19th century in the work of the > 'romantics' - especially > William Wordsworth, who used it freely, > John Keats, who wrote few but some of them among his best short poems, and ▶ Percy Bysshe Shelley whose ▷ Ozymandias sonnet is one of the best of all his poems. The romantic poets tended to follow the Miltonic example both in form and subject-matter. After 1830, the form continued to be popular in the 19th century, notably in the work of ▷ Christina Rossetti, > Dante Gabriel Rossetti, > Elizabeth Barrett Browning (Sonnets from the Portuguese, 1847). > G. M. Hopkins experimented very boldly in the form, and produced some of his best work in what he claimed to be sonnets, though they are often scarcely recognizable as such. Though in the earlier part of the 20th century the sonnet form appeared to have lost favour, in the later part of this century there has been a revival of interest in the form. The most notable example of this re-awakening of interest is perhaps the two 'sonnet sequences' by John Berryman (1938-68) published in 1952 and 1967. Other important 20th century sonnet writers are > W. H. Auden and > Tony Harrison.

Sonnets from the Portuguese (1850)

A sequence of forty-four sonnets by ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning, written during her courtship with ➤ Robert Browning in 1845-6. In the course of the Sonnets Barrett Browning writes about love from a series of different perspectives, at times positioning her lover as a muse, at other times expressing her willingness to be his inspirational figure. She disrupts the conventions of amatory poetry in her treatment of the lovers' relationship, substituting a fluid and shifting relation for the gendered fixture characteristic of courtly love-poetry. The Sonnets were not originally intended for publication, and it was only on Robert Browning's insistence that they were included in Barrett Browning's Poems of 1850: Although they attracted little critical attention during the 19th century, they are now considered a major achievement.

Sons and Lovers (1913)

The first of ▷ D. H. Lawrence's major novels. It is based on his own early life in the Midlands coal-mining village of Eastwood (Nottinghamshire), on his relationship with his mother and father, and on those with his early women friends.

Eastwood is called Bestwood in the novel; the character who corresponds to Lawrence himself is Paul Morel. The strongest relationship is the close tie between Mrs Morel and Paul, who has two brothers and a sister. Mrs Morel comes of a proud, Dissenting middle-class family; though her family has been impoverished, she has an inherent aristocracy of temperament derived from her family tradition of high standards. The father, Walter Morel, a miner, is a contrast to his wife, both in his background (he is the grandson of a French refugee and an English barmaid) and in his easy-going, pleasure-loving, spontaneous temperament. The marriage is an unhappy one: Mrs Morel's strictness and truthfulness are outraged by her husband's slackness and deceitfulness. In the war between them, the children take the side of the mother.

The closeness between Mrs Morel and Paul develops after the death of her eldest son, William, and Paul's own serious illness. He goes to work in a Nottingham factory, but he has his mother's intellectual seriousness and artistic sensitivity, and has ambitions to become an artist. Mrs Morel invests in him all her pride of life and the hopes and passions that her marriage has disappointed. She finds a rival in Miriam Leivers, the shy and intensely serious daughter of a local farmer, and bitterly opposes her friendship with Paul. He is affected by his mother's opposition, and at the same time he resents what he considers to be Miriam's excessive spirituality and her emotional demands upon him, since he believes these to be a barrier to the sensual release for which he craves. He reacts against Miriam by engaging in a sensual love affair with Clara Dawes, a married woman who has quarrelled with her husband. This relationship is not opposed by Mrs Morel, since it is a physical one and does not compete with her own emotional possessiveness. Paul, on the other hand, finds that Clara affords him no more release than Miriam had done; he is unconsciously subjected, all the time, to his mother. The mother's protracted illness and death, and Paul's fight with Baxter Dawes, Clara's husband, are complementary climaxes of the novel. Both together constitute his release, although the death leaves him with a sense of complete dereliction: he has to face the choice of willing himself to live or surrendering to his own desire for death.

The book was early regarded as a vivid presentation of the working of the > Oedipus complex. Lawrence was not acquainted with > Freud's theories when he started work on the novel in 1910, but had come into contact with them before completing the final version in 1912. It is in its own right a major novel, but it certainly constitutes Lawrence's attempt to release himself from the problems of his own early development. He later declared that his study of his father had been unfair and onesided. Jessie Chambers, the woman on whom Miriam was based, wrote a study of Lawrence as a young man as a reply to her characterization as Miriam; this was published as D. H. Lawrence, A Personal Record by E. T. (1935).

Sophia (fl 1739-41)

English writer. Sophia was the name attached to two out of three essays on the relative merits of the sexes. Woman not Inferior to Man (1739) and Woman's Superior Excellence over Man (1740) are adaptations of publications by the French ex-Catholic cleric, François Poulain de la Barre, first translated into English in 1677. She wrote, 'surely the Women were created by Heaven for some better end than to labour in vain their whole life long.' The whole exchange took the same shape as the French when a reply to the first tract appeared, purporting to be by a man. Sophia refers to her attacker in Man Superior to Woman (1740) as 'one of those amphibious things between both, which I think they call a Wit'.

Sophists

In ancient Greece of the 5th century BC, professional educators, who claimed to train men for civic life, but not for any particular trade or profession. They differed from philosophers in that they professed to teach, whereas philosophers professed to know; it is the difference between victory by argument and discovery through argument. By degrees the Sophists fell into disrepute, and today the term 'sophistry' means an ingenious argument deliberately intended to mislead the audience.

Sophocles (495-406 BC)

One of the three foremost ancient Greek dramatists, the other two being ➤ Aeschylus and ➤ Euripides. He wrote about 100 dramas, of which only seven survive: Oedipus the King; Oedipus at Colonus; Antigone; Electra; Trachiniae; Ajax; Philoctetes. His poetic language shows more flexibility than that of Aeschylus - their relationship in this respect has been compared to that of > Shakespeare and > Marlowe and he used three actors on the stage instead of only two (not counting the Chorus). In his relationship to Euripides, he is quoted by > Aristotle as saying that he depicted men as they ought to be whereas Euripides depicted them as they were. The Irish poet ➤ W. B. Yeats made free English renderings of his Oedipus the King (1928) and Oedipus at Colonus (1934).

South Sea Bubble

The name given to a series of extensive speculations in 1720 involving the South Sea Company, founded in 1711. In 1720 individuals who had lent money to the government through the Bank of England were invited to exchange their claims for shares in the Company, which had a monopoly of trade with Spanish America and was very prosperous. This project led to irresponsible financial speculation in a number of dishonest companies, financial scandals in which ministers of the Crown were involved, and a major financial collapse in which thousands were ruined. The South Sea Company survived until the 19th century. Its headquarters, South Sea House, was for a time the place of employment of the essayist > Charles Lamb, and is the subject of one of his essays.

Southampton, Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of (1573-1625)

Chiefly famous as a > patron of letters, and particularly as a patron of ➤ Shakespeare. He was educated at St John's College, Cambridge from 1585 to 1589, where he made friends with the chief favourite of ▷ Elizabeth I, the > Earl of Essex, and was shown special favour by the queen herself. Shakespeare dedicated to him his poems > Venus and Adonis (1593) and (in terms of warm devotion) The Rape of Lucrece (1594). There has long been much speculation about whether the young man in the sonnets (> Shakespeare - Sonnets) is Southampton, and whether the initials of 'Mr W. H.' in the dedication ('To the Onlie Begetter of These Insuing Sonnets') stand for 'Henry Wriothesley' reversed. Southampton accompanied Essex on his two naval expeditions against Spain in 1596 (to Cadiz) and 1597 (to the Azores), and distinguished himself by his daring on the second of them. In 1598 he had to make a hasty marriage with Essex's cousin Elizabeth Vernon, and this angered the queen against him. He was later concerned in Essex's conspiracy against Elizabeth, and is thought to have arranged a special performance of Shakespeare's \triangleright Richard II on the eve of the rebellion. In 1601 he was sentenced to death; however the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment and when > James I acceded in 1603, Southampton returned to court. He died of a fever when serving, with his son, as a volunteer on the side of the Dutch in their war with Spain. Other writers with whom he was associated as patron included > John Florio, the translator of ▷ Montaigne, and ▷ Thomas Nashe, who dedicated ▷ The Unfortunate Traveller to him.

Southcott, Joanna (1750–1814)

A religious fanatic who attracted a following of about 100,000 early in the 19th century. She is particularly known for her scaled box, which she declared should be opened in the presence of the assembled bishops at a time of national crisis. It was opened in 1927, in the presence of only one bishop but was found to contain unimportant objects.

Southerne, Thomas (1659–1746) Dramatist. A Tory (Whig and Tory), Southerne wrote his first play, The Loyal Brother; Or, the Persian Prince (1682), to honour the Duke of York, later > James II, and satirize > Shaftesbury and the Whigs. Southerne found his path to an intended military career blocked because of his political sympathies, and he turned more seriously to writing plays. He became a friend of ➤ Dryden, whose tragedy, Cleomenes, he was asked to complete in 1692, and of ➤ Aphra Behn, whose work he used repeatedly for source material. His The Fatal Marriage; Or, the Innocent Adultery (1694) and Oroonoko (1695) are based on two of her novels, with added material from one of her plays, and several other works drew on plays attributed to her, or sources used by her. Southerne is identified with a wave of so-called 'marital discord comedies' of the 1690s (other writers include ➤ Vanbrugh and ➤ Farquhar) which focused on the problems of ▷ marriage, as much as on courtship. Southerne had a capacity for seeing difficulties from a woman's point of view; for example, his > The Wives Excuse: Or Cuckolds Make Themselves (1691) presents the dilemma of the woman trapped in an unhappy marriage to a shamelessly unfaithful husband, while she restrains herself from accepting the advances of another man.

Southey, Robert (1774-1843)

Poet and historian. He was a friend of ⊳ Samuel Taylor Coleridge (they married sisters) and also of > William Wordsworth. Southey shared their revolutionary ardour in the 1790s, but his opinions, like theirs, became conservative at about the turn of the century, and when the Tory > Quarterly Review was founded in 1809 he became one of its leading contributors. He was made ➤ Poet Laureate in 1813. In 1839 he married the poet ➤ Caroline Bowles with whom he had been friends for twenty years; she nursed him through his last years of illhealth. Southey wrote long heroic ➤ epics (Thalaba, 1801; Madoc, 1805; Roderick, 1814) which at the time were much admired. The best known of his shorter poems is The Battle of Blenheim. He wrote several historical works in prose, including The Life of Nelson (1813) and A History of the Peninsular War (1823-32). His change in political opinion, and in particular his position as Poet Laureate, drew the fire of the second generation of Romantic poets, and he lacked the poetic originality which partially redeemed Wordsworth and Coleridge in their eyes. In 1821 his poem > A Vision of Judgement, describing the admission of George III into heaven, provoked > Byron's > The Vision of Judgement, with its brilliant caricature of Southey as servile turncoat and bumbling hack: 'He had written much blank verse, and blanker prose,/ And more of both than anybody knows.' He also features as Mr Feathernest in ➤ Thomas Love Peacock's satirical novel ➤ Melincourt (1817).

Southwell, Lady Frances (c. 1615) Essay-writer. Lady Frances, like her friend ➤ Cecily Bulstrode, wrote Theophrastian character sketches which consisted of short satirical essays on exaggerated personality 'types'. Her 'Certain Edicts from a Parliament in Eutopia' were published with ▷ Sir Thomas Overbury's The Wife (1615) - Overbury was one of the foremost writers of such 'characters'. 'Certain Edicts' reveals a sharp appreciation for some of the artifices and mannerisms of the day, especially those adopted by women wishing to seem 'feminine' at the expense of their intelligence. Lady Frances was also central to the court world, being a favoured lady-inwaiting to > Queen Anne and a friend of > Lady Anne Clifford.

Southwell, Robert (?1561-95)

Poet and Roman Catholic priest. He worked in England as a member of the ▷ Jesuit order at a time when this was illegal; in 1592 he was arrested and tortured for evidence of other priests, which he did not disclose. He was executed after three years in prison, where he wrote some fine religious poems (St Peter's Complaint with Other Poems and Maconiae, 1505). His most famous poem is The Burning Babe. He also wrote a long poem, Fourfold Meditation of the Four Last Things (1606), and a number of religious tracts, one of which, Mary Magdalen's Tears, was imitated by ➤ Thomas Nashe in his Christ's Tears over Jerusalem. Sowernam, Ester (fl. 1617)

Tract-writer. One of the defenders of women in the > Querelle des Femmes, who answered the attacks in Joseph Swetnam's The Arraignment of Lewd, idle, froward, and unconstant women (1615). 'Sowernam' is a pseudonym that plays partly upon Swetnam's name, and partly upon one of his catch-phrases - 'every sweet hath his sowre' (meaning every good man has his wicked female counterpart). 'Ester' is taken from the fearless character in the > Bible who, to protect the Jews, hanged Haman, the man who attacked them. Her work, Ester Hath hanged Haman (1617), is written in a lively style and sets out to prove the nobility of women with erudition and humour. Today it is assumed that this anonymous author was female, since we are now aware that middleclass women could have had an education that would equip them with the classical and scholarly allusions evident in the text. Sowernam's defence should be compared with that of ➤ Rachel Speght's, since she herself draws parallels between the works, saying that

Soyinka, Wole (b 1934)

Nigerian playwright, novelist and poet, educated at the Government College, Ibadan and the University of Leeds. After his degree at Leeds, he worked as a reader for the Royal Court Theatre in London before returning to Nigeria in 1959, where he subsequently held various research and teaching posts in drama at the universities of Ibadan, Ife and Lagos as well as working for Nigerian radio and television. His account of this period is found in his book Ibadan: The Penkelemes Years: A Memoir 1946-65 (1994). He was imprisoned 1967-69 for alleged pro-Biafra activities, an experience recorded in his The Man Died: Prison Notes (1972). In 1975 he became Professor of Comparative Literature at the University of Ife. Sovinka is primarily a dramatist, his work ranging from the early comedy of village life, The Swamp Dwellers (1958), to The Road (1965), a Beckettian drama set in a Lagos 'motor park', and The Bacchae: A Communion Rite (1973), based on the classical tragedy by Euripides. Much of his drama uses mime, dance, myth and supernatural elements; for example, The Road involves characters, masks and ceremonies from the Yoruba Festival of the Dead. Other plays include: The Lion and the Jewel (1959); The Invention (1959); A Dance of the Forests (1960); The Jero Plays (1960 and 1968); Madmen and Specialists (1971); A Play of Giants (1984). Sovinka has also published two novels: The Interpreters (1965), which explores hopes for the future of Africa through the activities of a group of young Nigerian artists, and Season of Anomy (1973), a bleak portrayal of war, tyranny and poverty in post-colonial Africa, using > modernist techniques such as highly symbolic and figurative language and an open ending. Poetry: Idanre (1967); A Shuttle in the Crypt (1972); Mandela's Earth (1989). Soyinka has also published critical works such as Myth, Literature, and the African World (1976). In 1976 he became the first African to win the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Spanish Influence on English Literature Spanish literature, especially that of the so-called Golden Age of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (which paralleled in quality, but greatly exceeded in abundance of texts, the creativity of the Elizabethan and Jacobean ages in England), has provided many writers in English with plots, characters and themes.

This can be seen first of all in drama.

The most popular play of the Elizabethan age, Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy (c 1588), made full use of Spanish settings and attitudes, as did John Marston's Antonio and Mellida (1602) and Antonio's Revenge (1602). During James I's reign and for much of the seventeenth century, English playwrights such as Middleton, Beaumont, Rowley and Shirley adapted Spanish works. John Fletcher and Philip Massinger, for example, based their The Custome of the Countrey (c 1619)on Cervantes' novel Persiles y Sigismunda (1617) while Massinger's The Renegado (1624) combines material from Cervantes' Don Quixote (1605/15) and his play Los baños de Argel (1615). Some drew directly or indirectly on other Spanish plays, many of which are now lost. Visitors to Spain brought back news of the work of Lope de Vega (1562-1635), the author of 'capa y espada' (cape and sword) plays, and of Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600-81), who perfected the genre. Although it has proved impossible to trace the exact sources, it seems certain that Samuel Tuke's The Adventures of Five Hours (1663) and George Digby's Elvira, or The Worst Not Always True (1667) are direct adaptations of works by Calderón.

But it is probably in prose fiction that Spanish literature has had its most lasting influence. Both the picaresque tradition and ➤ Cervantes' ➤ Don Quixote were to play an essential role in the development of the English novel. Here the influence was mediated through early translations of key works. The seminal picaresque text, the anonymous Lazarillo de Tormes (1554), was translated into English by David Rowland in 1586 while Mateo Alemán's (1547-1615) Guzmán de Alfarache (1599/1604) was translated by James Mabbe in 1622 and published with introductory verses by Ben Jonson. Later in the seventeenth century, Captain John Stevens rendered Quevedo's Historia de la vida del Buscón (1626) as Pablo de Segovia, the Spanish Sharper, Meanwhile, in 1612, Thomas Shelton translated Part 1 of Cervantes' Don Quixote (1605) and followed it up with Part 2 (1615) in 1620. The hardworking Mabbe also translated Fernando de Rojas' (c. 1465-1541) early dialogue novel La Celestina (c 1499), calling it The Spanish Bawd (1631), and Cervantes' Novel as ejemplares (1613; Exemplarie Novells, trans. 1640).

The Spanish picaresque novels, first-person narratives which deal with the adventures of low-life characters and contain vividly realistic and satirical descriptions of contemporary life and social mores, appealed to generations of English writers. Their influence can be felt in some Restoration comedies, such as Farquhar's ▷ The Beaux' Stratagem (1707), and in many of the novels written in the eighteenth century: ▷ Defoe's ▷ Moll Flanders (1722), ▷ Smollett's The Adventures of Roderick Random (1748), The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751), and Fielding's ▷ Tom Jones (1749), to name just a few.

But it was Don Quixote which, more than any other single work, influenced the development of the novel, not just in England but throughout Europe. Thanks mainly to the Romantics, the nineteenth century took the knight to be a quasitragic figure, an idealist lost in an increasingly materialistic world. The seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, however, saw the tale of Don Quixote and his faithful squire Sancho Panza as an adventure story and a comic masterpiece which broke new ground as far as narrative techniques, irony and satire were concerned. As well as in Samuel Butler's mock-heroic poem Hudibras (1663), its influence can be felt in Fielding's Don Quixote in England (1734) and Joseph Andrews (1742) which was 'Written in Imitation of the Manner of Cervantes, Author of Don Quixote'. Smollett's The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves (1762) was a poor imitation of Don Quixote, while many of the situations and narrative devices in Sterne's ➤ Tristram Shandy (1760/67) grew out of the author's reading of Cervantes' novel. But the humour and sense of adventure continued to attract novelists well beyond the eighteenth century: echoes of Don Quixote can be found in Scott's Redgauntlet (1824), Dickens' > Pickwick Papers (1836/37), George Eliot's ➤ Daniel Deronda (1876) and Stevenson's > Treasure Island (1883). More recently, Graham Greene produced a modern reworking of the novel in Monsignor Quixote (1982) which, in its questioning of the nature of faith, also drew on the religious writings of Miguel de Unamuno (1864-1936).

In the nineteenth century, Spain was perceived throughout Europe as the Romantic country par excellence, a place which was exotic, picturesque and still rooted in age-old traditions. A typically Romantic interest in things Medieval led the poet Robert Southey to translate the chivalric romance Amadis de Gaula (1496/1508) in 1803 and, shortly after, to bring out his translation of three Medieval texts under the general title Chronicles of the Cid. His contemporary J. G. Lockhart published his carefully crafted versions of the popular Spanish Ballads in 1822. Two other Romantic poets showed their indebtedness to Spanish literature at this time. Just like the German Romantic theorists, Shelley 'rediscovered' the work of Calderón, learning Spanish in order to read his plays and partially translating his famous religious drama, El mágico prodigioso (The Wonder-Working Magician, 1634). Shelley also admired La cisma de Inglaterra (The Schism of England, perf. 1627), a play dealing with the same subject as Shakespeare's > Henry VIII. Byron worked on his ➤ Don Juan between 1818 and 1824, examining the life and loves of yet another Spanish literary archetype who had first appeared in Tirso de Molina's (1583-1648) El Burlador de Sevilla (c 1630).

The nineteenth century also saw the increased popularity of travel writing. George Borrow's The Bible in Spain (1843) and Richard Ford's Handbook for Travellers in Spain (1845) appealed to the Victorians' love of the exotic and the picturesque. The tradition of the travelogue which sets out to shed light on the Spanish character has continued into this century with Havelock Ellis' The Soul of Spain (1908), V. S. Pritchett's Marching Spain (1928) and The Spanish Temper (1954), Gerald Brenan's South from Granada (1957) and Laurie Lee's A Rose for Winter (1955) and As I Walked Out One Midsummer Morning (1969).

But it was the Spanish Civil War of 1936-39 which focused the attention of writers on Spain. For many, such as W. H. Auden and Stephen Spender who were involved in the war, the conflict became a testing-ground for their left-wing sympathies. Most of these writers were not influenced by individual Spanish authors but rather by the country and its tragic predicament. Out of the war came Hemingway's For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940) and George Orwell's powerful political study Homage to Catalonia (1938). Orwell's sense of disillusionment with the events in Spain probably had some bearing on the writing of his two anti-totalitarian novels, Animal Farm (1945) and Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949).

Nowadays, Spanish texts in English have become more readily available. The plays of Lope de Vega and Calderón and those of Federico García Lorca (1898–1936), especially Blood Wedding (1933) and The House of Bernarda Alba (1936), enjoy regular revivals in Britain. The works of the philosopher Jose Ortega y Gasset (1883–1955), in particular La deshumanización del arte (The Dehumanization of Art, 1925) and La rebelión de las masas (The Revolt of the Masses, 1929), continue to influence both art critics and political thinkers.

In recent years, it is Latin American literature which has had the most pronounced effect on English writing and on the reading public in Britain. Charles Tomlinson collaborated with the Mexican poet Octavio Paz (b 1941) on Renga: A Chain of Poems; British and North American critical theorists find the philosophical and metafictional short stories of the Argentinian Jorge Luis Borges (1899-1986), especially his Ficciones (Fictions, 1935-44), to be an essential reference point; and the novels of the Peruvian Mario Vargas Llosa (b 1936), the Cuban Guillermo Cabrera Infante (b 1929) - both of whom have spent time living in England - the Mexican Carlos Fuentes (b 1928) and the Chilean Isabel Allende (b 1942) are now internationally famous in English as well as Spanish. Their work, and especially that of the Colombian Gabriel García Márquez (b 1928) whose Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude, 1967) established the vogue of what has become known as 'magic realism', has influenced a number of novelists in English, most notably ▷ Salman Rushdie.

Spanish intrigue comedy

English comedy influenced by, or using as its source, a type of Spanish play known as the 'comedia de capa y espada' (comedy of cape and sword). The originals include works by Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600-81), Lope de Vega (1562-1635), and Tirso de Molina (1571-1648). The plays frequently turn on conflicts of love and honour and are dominated by busy intrigue plots involving problems of mistaken identity, duelling, and concealment. One of the first of this variety was Sir Samuel Tuke's The Adventures of Five Hours (1663), based on a play by Calderón, and commissioned by ➤ Charles II. Other elements of the type include rigid father, brothers and uncles attempting to force young relatives into unwelcome marriages, and high-spirited women active in determining their own fates. This helped to make the form popular with women dramatists, including ➤ Aphra Behn, Susannah Centlivre, and ➤ Mary Pix.

Spanish Succession, The War of (1702-13) A war fought to determine the succession of the Spanish throne, and ultimately the balance of power in Europe, after the death of Charles II of Spain. The French king ➤ Louis XIV supported the candidacy of his grandson Philip of Anjou. England, whose interests had changed since the accession of the Protestant ▶ William III in 1689, and which feared the expansion of French power, supported instead the claim of the Archduke Charles, son of the Holy Roman Emperor (➤ Holy Roman Empire) Leopold I. A third claimant was the Bavarian Prince Joseph Ferdinand. England formed the Grand Alliance with the Holy Roman Empire and the Netherlands, while Bavaria joined with France, Spain, Savoy and Portugal. The last two, however, quickly changed sides. England achieved a series of successes under the > Duke of Marlborough. England's involvement in the war ended with the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713-14. Philip's accession as Philip V was confirmed, but major transfers of territory in Canada, from France to Britain, were also part of the settlement.

Spanish Tragedy, The

A drama by ➤ Thomas Kyd, probably written around 1587. It is the earliest important ➤ revenge tragedy, and both by date and by influence it is one of the principal starting-points of the great age of ➤ Elizabethan drama. The plot has no known source and is presumably Kyd's invention. The scene is Spain, just after the Spanish-Portuguese war of 1580. Andrea, a Spanish nobleman, has been unchivalrously killed in a battle by Balthazar, a Portuguese prince, who in turn is captured by Lorenzo, nephew of the King of Spain, and Horatio, son of Hieronimo, Marshal of Spain. The ghost of Andrea and the spirit of Revenge sit above stage and watch the action throughout: Andrea is to witness how his death is to be avenged. This process is most intricate, and centres on Bel-imperia, Lorenzo's sister. She and Andrea have been fovers, and in consequence she detests Balthazar, who nonetheless seeks her in marriage with Lorenzo's support. She deliberately slights Balthazar by cultivating the affections of Horatio, who is in consequence murdered by Lorenzo and Balthazar, Hieronimo hitherto a background figure - discovers the identity of his son's murderers; half crazed with grief, he seeks justice, but his pleading is brushed aside by the king. He eventually secures it by contriving a play (within the play) in which the guilty parties suffer real deaths instead of simulated ones. Hieronimo then takes his own life after biting out his tongue. Thus Andrea (after displaying some impatience) watches how his own death is avenged. The audience sees how justice is brought about when it is left to mere human motives: not as Heaven would bring it, cleanly and economically, but wastefully and brutally, hatred breeding hatred, and callous contrivance countered by contrivance still more ruthless. Only Lorenzo can be described as an evil character - a Machiavellian schemer - the other characters are driven out of their natural virtue by vindictive bitterness. Hieronimo himself is momentarily checked by biblical authority 'Vindicta mihi': 'Justice is mine, saith the Lord' (Romans 12:19) - but he is driven on by the energy of his grief.

Kyd's poetry is undistinguished, but the play is theatrically so effective that it remained popular for a generation. In 1602 the play was expanded by some more effective verse, probably by ▷ Ben Jonson, whom the theatre manager ▷ Philip Henslowe paid for additions. However, these obscure rather than enhance

Kyd was certainly influenced by the plays of ➤ Seneca, for instance in his use of ➤ stichomythia and in the role of the ghost. Kyd's own influence was great, and can be seen in ➤ Hamlet. The dilemma of revenge, in one aspect seen to be a duty and in another an acknowledged sin, deeply preoccupied the Elizabethans. At the lowest level it was a pretext for the violence that appealed to them in the theatre – the 'tragedy of blood' – at a higher level it presented the problem of how it could be executed against evil-doers who were men of power or who were protected by such men, at a higher level still it was a natural vehicle for dramatizing the theme of the corrupted conscience, which both ➤ Renaissance and ➤ Reformation ideas brought to the forefront of social attention. The Spanish Tragedy was effective on all these planes.

Spark, Muriel (b 1918)

Before becoming a novelist, Spark was a poet (Collected Poems, 1967). Her first novel was The Comforters (1957), which she has described as 'a novel about writing a novel', ie an experiment in, and exploration of what it means to write fiction. At about the same time she became a convert to Roman Catholicism, and her novels since have tended to take a parabolic form (characteristic of other contemporary novelists, eg > Iris Murdoch, > William Golding) combining overt, often wittily satirical ⊳ realism with implications of an extra-realist, spiritual dimension. One of her best-known works is The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie (1961), the story of the influence over a group of schoolgirls of a progressive spinster schoolteacher in Edinburgh. It is characteristic of Spark's work in its combination of the comic and the sinister, and the skilful use of anticipations of later events. Her three ➤ novellas, The Public Image (1968); The Driver's Seat (1970) and Not to Disturb (1971) exemplify the economy, precision and hardness of her work; they invite little sympathy for their characters, but rather convey a strong sense of pattern and fate underlying an apparent contingency of events. Her other novels are: Robinson (1958); Memento Mori (1959); The Ballad of Peckham Rye (1960); The Bachelors (1960); The Girls of Slender Means (1963); The Mandelbaum Gate (1965); The Hothouse by the East River (1972); The Abbess of Crewe (1972); The Takeover (1976); Territorial Rights (1979); Loitering with Intent (1981); The Only Problem (1984); A Far Cry From Kensington (1988).

Other writings include a stage play Doctors of Philosophy (1962), radio plays collected in Voices at Play (1961), a further volume of poetry, Going Up to Sotheby's (1982) and short stories in Collected Stories I (1967); and The Stories of Murel Spark (1985). Her recent work includes Symposium (1986).

'Spasmodic' school of poetry

The 'Spasmodic' poets espoused a crude ➤ Romanticism which revered the poet as a divinely inspired being whose eccentricities should be humoured and encouraged, especially in the realm of accepted social conventions, and whose observations were projected through the lens of a melancholy solipsism. It was their bursts of ranting emotion, often ill-disguised as spontaneous feeling, that earned them their sobriquet. Pioneered by ➤ Philip James Bailey in his dramatic poem Festus (1839) and indulged by Alexander Smith (1830-67) in A Life Drama (1853), the style reached its height in ▷ Sydney Dobell's Balder (1854), the excesses of which led the literary critic and satirist > William Aytoun to coin the term 'Spasmodic' in his brilliant parody Firmilian, or The Student of Badajoz: A Spasmodic Tragedy by T. Percy Jones (1854). Firmilian mimicked the extravagant imagery of Smith and Dobell and burlesqued their plots, even managing a sideswipe at their champion, the critic > George Gilfillan. Others of the 'Spasmodic' school included John Stanyan Bigg (1826-65), Ebenezer Jones and Gerald Marston. It is possible to detect the influence of the 'Spasmodics' on > Emily Brontë, Elizabeth Barrett Browning and ➤ Tennyson. After Firmillian the 'Spasmodic' tragedy disappeared from serious verse and much of its energy may have been channelled into the ≥ sensation novels of the 1860s.

Spectator, The

The name of two periodicals, the first appearing daily (1711–12 and 1714), and the second a weekly founded in 1828 and still continuing. The earlier is the more famous of the two, owing to the contributions of its famous editors, Addison and Steele; it had an important influence on the manners and culture of the time. The later Spectator has also had a distinguished history, however; it began as a radical journal, but is now the leading intellectual weekly periodical of the right.

Speght, Rachel (c 1508-1630) Devotional and tract-writer. One of the respondents to Joseph Swetnam's attack on women (the other two being ➤ Constantia Munda and ➤ Ester Sowernam). Speght came from a learned family - her father edited ➤ Chaucer – and her ➤ pamphlet A Mouzell for Malastomus ('a muzzle for Black-Mouth'), published in 1617, is a serious and theoretical defence. It is divided into two sections, the first being a well-organized refutation of Swetnam's arguments, and the second a livelier and more wide-ranging disputation. To 20th-century readers Speght's hesitancy over asserting female virtues appears to defeat her own argument, and, indeed, she was accused of being irresolute by her contemporary, Sowernam. It is interesting to note, however, that Speght chose to write under her own name ('Sowernam' is a pseudonym) and that she was prepared to face any repercussions her open argument should incur. Primarily, Speght should be seen as a devotional writer and she is concerned with the plight and salvation of all humankind, rather than either sex in isolation. Her later work, the devotional poem Mortalities Memorandum (1621), is probably more representative of her true beliefs.

Spence, Elizabeth Isabella (1768–1832) Novelist and travel writer. Spence began writing for amusement, but when she was orphaned in 1786 she gradually began to use her writing as a means of support. Her early work consists of rather banal accounts of her travels within Britain and of the people she met, including Summer Excursions (1809; England and Wales) and Letters From the Highlands (1816; Scotland). The novels which followed attempted to retain the tone of > travel writing by mixing regional history and descriptions of local scenes with fictional characters and narrative, and include A Traveller's Tale of the Last Century (1819), Old Stories (1822) and How to be Rid of a Wife (1823).

Philosopher. He was representative of an important aspect of the Victorian period in his faith in evolutionary theory and his trust in scientific progress. He is most notably associated with the phrase 'Social Darwinism', which can be roughly glossed as extreme laissez-faire economics endowed with a supposed biological sanction. Basing his ideas on the evolutionary theories of the French scientist ➤ Lamarck (1744-1829), a forerunner of Darwin, Spencer concluded that everything was in the process of development, interaction, change, growth and progress. In this way, the laws of science, nature and evolution could only be beneficial. Spencer regarded society as an organism which was evolving from a simple primitive state to a complex heterogeneous form according to the designs of an unknown and unknowable absolute force. The same theory was applied to the development of knowledge from an undifferentiated mass into the various separate sciences. Spencer's scientific determinism was extremely popular in the latter half of the 19th century. He formulated his ideas independently of Darwin and was responsible for coining the phrase 'survival of the fittest' which he used as early as 1852. In that year Spencer heard ➤ Thomas Huxley's paper on oceanic hydrozoa and used some facts from it in his 'Theory of Population deduced from the General Law of Animal Fertility'. He also helped to put the word 'evolution' into common parlance in the 1850s. Some of his more influential books were Social Statics (1850), in which he developed his idea of progress as inevitable rather than accidental, and Education: Intellectual, Moral and Physical (1861) in which he claimed that science (including social science, psychology, economics, sociology and political theory) was the only discipline worth studying. The best-selling The Man Versus the State (1884) proclaimed the popular notion that individual freedom depended on the absence of all forms of interference including government intervention. In 1857 Spencer decided on a massive system of philosophy, beginning with the humble biological origins and ending with the highest ethical principles, that was to be his life's work. The ten volumes of his System of Synthetic Philosophy took him nearly forty years to produce and included First Principles (1862), and volumes on biology, psychology, morality and sociology. It was completed in 1896. At the height of his popularity he influenced ➤ George Eliot (with whom he was romantically linked for a time) who applied his Principles of Psychology to the detailed creation of her characters. The character of Casaubon in > Middlemarch is based on Spencer. Others he influenced included T.H. Huxley, ⊳ John Stuart Mill, and ▶ Beatrice Webb. Spender, Sir Stephen (1909-95)

Poet and critic. Son of a distinguished journalist, J. A. Spender, who was editor of the liberal Westminster Gazette. Educated at University College School, London, and University College, Oxford, where he became friendly with the poets > W. H. Auden, > C. Day-Lewis, and ➤ Louis MacNeice. The four, together with the novelist > Christopher Isherwood, formed an influential group of left-wing writers in the 1930s. Spender was a passionately political poet, working as a propagandist for the Republicans in the Spanish Civil War and, in The Destructive Element (1935), partly defending poetry's addressing of political subjects through a discussion of fellow poets ▶ W. B. Yeats and ▶ T. S. Eliot. As his career progressed Spender's political orientation changed; though briefly a member of the > Communist Party, in 1950 he contributed to the anti-Communist collection of essays, The God that Failed (ed. R. H. S. Crossman). His volumes of verse include Nine Entertainments (1928), Twenty Poems (1930), The Still Centre (1939), Ruins and Visions (1942). As a critic he wrote two studies of modern literature: The Destructive Element (1935) and The Creative Element (1953). His > autobiographical writings include World within World (1951). In 1953 he became co-editor of Encounter, a monthly review of culture and world affairs. In 1969 he published a study of student politics: The Year of the Young Rebels. In 1970 he became Professor of English Language and Literature at University College, London. Later works include Love-Hate Relations (1974), The Thirties and After (1978), a critical study of T. S. Eliot and Collected Poems 1928-85 (1985). Spender was also an important translator, particularly of > German literature, and collaborated with painter David Hockney in the 1982 account of their trip to China, China Diary. In 1988 he finally published his first novel, The Temple, the revised version of a novel concerning homosexuality first written more than 50 years previously.

Spens, Sir Patrick Sir Patrick Spens.

Spenser, Edmund (?1552-99)

Poet. Spenser's poetry, and in particular > The Faerie Queene, was possibly the single most influential body of writing to appear in the > Renaissance period in England. Throughout the 17th century his influence was immense, not least on > John Milton. In the 20th century, however, his reputation began to decline readers preferring the so-called > 'metaphysical' school of writing represented by ➤ John Donne. Yet, in recent years, there has been a revival of interest in Spenser, particularly among > 'new historicist' and > psychoanalytical critics for whom The Faerie Queene has become an endlessly fascinating text.

Spenser was born in London, but lived for most of his adult life in Ireland. He first visited Ireland in 1577, becoming in 1580 private secretary to Lord Grey, the newly appointed lord deputy of Ireland. From 1580 onwards Spenser's fortunes were connected with his progress through the ranks of the colonial administration of Ireland, and by 1588 Spenser had occupied the forfeited estate of the Earl of Desmond. The estate, at Kilcolman in County Cork, Spenser developed as a small 'colony' of six English householders and their families. Kilcolman was to be Spenser's home until 1598, when, in October of that year, the castle of Kilcolman was destroyed in the course of 'Tyrone's Rebellion'. Following the upheaval, Spenser returned to London for the last time, where he died, according to ➤ Ben Jonson, 'for lack of bread' in 1599.

Spenser's first published works were anonymous translations from ▶ Petrarch and the French poet ▷ du Bellay which appeared in a violently anti-Catholic collection in 1569. It was not, however, until the publication of > The Shepherd's Calendar (1579 with five editions by 1597) that Spenser's poetic reputation became established. In 1580 he published a correspondence with > Gabriel Harvey, an old friend from his Cambridge days, which set out his views on metrics and prosody. The correspondence is not, perhaps, of startling critical force. Further collections of poetry appeared in 1591, followed by his > sonnet sequence > Amoretti together with ▶ Epithalamion in a single volume in 1595. The

> autobiographical Colin Clout's Come Home

Again (1594) (> Colin Clout) was followed by the ▶ Platonic Fowre Hymnes of 1596 and his celebration of the marriage of the daughters of the Earl of Worcester, > Prothalamion, also in 1596. Spenser's major poetic work, The Faerie Queene, begun prior to 1579, appeared first in 1590 when the first three books of the poem were published. The second edition of Books I-III appeared together with Books IV-VI in 1596, and the final version (as we have it) of the poem after Spenser's death, when a folio edition including the 'Mutabilitie Cantos' was published in 1609.

In the late 16th century, Spenser was the dominating literary intellect of the period, and his reputation was sustained throughout the 18th century, reaching an apotheosis amongst the Romantic poets. To the modern reader he presents a complex set of problems and responses. As a 'source' for wide areas of Renaissance intellectual culture he has been continuously explicated and re-explicated, his texts being examined for their Platonist, numerological, Lucretian (> Lucretius) and Calvinist elements. But he is also a writer whose engagement with the creation of a national myth of identity was part of a vital Elizabethan project. Bib: Greenlaw, E. et al. Spenserian stanza

A verse form devised by ➤ Edmund Spenser for his poem > The Faerie Queene. It consists of eight ten-syllable lines, plus a ninth line of 12 syllables (> alexandrine), an iambic rhythm and a rhyme scheme as follows: a b a b b c b c c. Example from The Faerie Queene:

And as she looked about, she did behold, How over that same door was likewise writ, 'Be bold, be bold,' and everywhere 'Be bold', That much she mused, yet could not construe it By any riddling skill, or common wit. At last she spied at that room's upper end, Another iron door, on which was writ, 'Be not too bold'; whereto though she did bend Her earnest mind, yet wist not what it might intend.

(Book III, Canto xi, 54)

The stanza was used by Spenser's poetic disciples ➤ Giles and ➤ Phineas Fletcher early in the 17th century.

Spinoza, Baruch (1632-77)

Philosopher, theologian and mathematician, born in Amsterdam of a Portuguese Jewish family. He was excommunicated from the Jewish community because of his unorthodox beliefs and became a Christian. After an attempt was made to assassinate him, he left his home and earned a living grinding lenses for microscopes and telescopes. At the same time he became the leader of a philosophical circle. Building on the → rationalism of → Hobbes and → Descartes, Spinoza speculated that matter is eternal, and the universe is God. His > pantheistic belief that minds and bodies are both aspects of God resolves the Cartesian (> Descartes, René) dualism of mind and matter as inhabiting separate systems, the spiritual one ordered by God, the material one by secondary causes. Spinoza also suggested that everything happens according to a 'logical necessity' determined by God, which restricts the possibility of free will, except insofar as acting according to the will of God makes man free. Among his most famous works are the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (1670) and Tractatus Politicus (1677).

Spleen, The

1 Title of a Pindaric poem by ➤ Anne Finch, Countess of Winchilsea, published in 1713. She uses the term variously, sometimes to mean melancholy, and sometimes anger or ill-humour. In the poem she examines its place in history, then describes her personal struggle with recurring bouts of it, and finally discusses its manifestations in marriage, and in religious practice, which can result in religious melancholia.

2 Poem by ➤ Matthew Green, which uses a ➤ pastoral framework to celebrate rustic simplicity.

Spondee

In ancient Greek and Latin poetry, a unit of verse measure composed of two long syllables; in English verse, two accented syllables.

Words like 'maintain' and 'wineglass' in English may be spondees, just as

'again' is an iambus, and 'only' is a trochee. It is possible to find whole lines of verse in trochee (falling) rhythm, and usual to find lines in iambic (rising) rhythm, but whole lines in spondaic rhythm have to be artificially contrived, eg

Slow spon/dee stalks; / strong foot.

➤ Metre.

Spoonerism

Derived from the name of the Rev. W.A. Spooner (1844–1930) of New College, Oxford, who was reputed to have made such errors when speaking. The term describes the transposition of the initial letters of two or more words as in 'You have hissed the Mystery lectures' (OED). The technical term for this is metathesis.

Sprung rhythm

A term used by the poet ➤ Gerard Manley Hopkins to denote the method by which his verse is to be scanned. In his time most English verse was written in running rhythm, ie ▷ metres with regular stresses in the line:

Tonight the winds begin to rise

And roar from yonder dropping day

(▷ Tennyson - ▷ In Memoriam)

Hopkins wished to free English verse from this rhythm, so as to bring verse into closer accord with common speech, to emancipate rhythm from the linear unit, and to achieve a freer range of emphasis. His theory of sprung rhythm (contained in the Preface to his Poems) is complicated, perhaps because he felt he had to justify himself to rather academic metricists like his friend ➤ Robert Bridges. In fact he was reviving the rhythm of Old English alliterative verse (he cites > Langland's > Piers Plomman as being in sprung rhythm) and in folk poetry including many ballads and b nursery rhymes. In sprung rhythm the number of stresses in each line is regular, but they do not occur at regular intervals, nor do the lines have a uniform number of syllables. The rhythm also drives through the stanza, and is not basically linear. The following is an example:

Summer ends now; now, barbarous in beauty, the sticks rise

Around; up above, what wind-walks! what lovely behaviour

Of silk-sack clouds! has wilder, wilful wavier Meal-drift moulded ever and melted across skies? (Hopkins – Hurrahing in Harvest)

Spurgeon, Charles Haddon (1834–92) An extremely popular Baptist preacher, for whom the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Newington, London, was built to hold audiences of 6,000. His sermons were in the old Puritan tradition, with strong appeals to the emotions and the conscience, but also varied by a bold and unusual kind of humour. In doctrine he was thoroughly traditional, and eventually he left the Baptists because of his distrust of the new biblical criticism.

Squire

➤ Knighthood.

Squire's Tale, The

One of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. It is set in the exotic east and begins with an account of how Cambyuskan, King of Tartary, receives magic gifts on his birthday, including a magic ring for his daughter Canace. The ring allows her to understand the language of birds and through it she hears the sad lament of a female falcon who has been deserted by a faithless tercelet. The tale is unfinished but from the plot résumé given before it breaks off, it seems that the Squire was embarking on a romance of epic length, involving several major narrative lines in an interlaced structure (of the kind found later in the works of ➤ Boiardo, and ➤ Ariosto).

Both > Spenser and > Milton admired the tale, which is related in a highly self-conscious manner by its narrator. The Franklin follows on with praise for the Squire's contribution and there is no indication that the Franklin's response is designed to interrupt the Squire, although the Squire's Tale is left unfinished.

Stanislavsky, Konstantin (1863-1938)

Russian actor and director, and founder of the Moscow Art Theatre in 1898 with Nemirovich-Danchenko. He rejected the declamatory acting style of the Imperial Theatres and developed a rigorous actors' training which explored, among other things, character psychology and motivation. These ideas about acting can be studied in his published works: My Life in Art; An Actor Prepares; Building a Character; Creating a Role. The principle was that the actor should explore all aspects of the character, often through improvisation: his or her history, attitudes and way of behaving outside the frame and events of the play should be as much a part of the actor's knowledge as the lines and responses in the play. The aim was to accquire what Stanislavsky termed 'inner realism' to 'be' rather than to 'do' a character. His sytem is based on two main parts; inner and outer work of actors on themselves and the inner and outer work of the actor on the part.

Unfortunately, only part of Stanislavsky's theories was available in translation for many years and led to an over emphasis on the 'inner' element of the method. This accounts for some of the ways in which American interpretations of the Method differed from the Russian original. Stanislavsky's was the informing principle of Lee Strasberg's enormously influential Actors' Studio, which trained such diverse performers as Marilyn Monroe, Shelley Winters and Marlon Brando. Strasberg taught a method that put more emphasis on psychology and emotions than on the body and voice. Stanislavsky's methods still form the basis of much British and American drama school training and his Moscow Arts Theatre inspired the philosophies of many of the most important twentieth-century companies.

State funding

This is an important source of income for much of the 'arts' in Britain. Theatre, as for example the ▷ R.S.C, and ▷ opera, like the Royal Opera at Covent Garden, are subsidized by the state, while on a smaller scale local authorities provide grants for writers, bookshops and courses.

> Arts Council of Great Britain; Censorship.

Stationers

In modern English, sellers of writing materials. In the Middle Ages and until the mid-17th century, however, they were booksellers, and were so called from their practice of taking up stalls or 'stations' at suitable places in cathedral towns (eg against the walls of St Paul's Cathedral in London) and universities. In the 16th and early 17th centuries they not only sold books, but printed and published them as well. The absence of a law of ⊳ copyright (until 1709) made it lawful for stationers to publish author's manuscripts whenever and however they could procure them, without the authors' permission. This kind of unauthorized publishing is now called 'pirating'. 18 of Shakespeare's plays were possibly pirated before the publication of the first collected edition of his plays in the First Folio of 1623, and the fact has caused some difficulties to scholars; there is no assurance that their publication was authorized by the poet, that he had revised the plays for publication, or even that the stationer had procured a reliable version

The Stationers' Company was formed in 1557 by royal charter; by this charter, no one not a member was entitled to publish a book except by special privilege, and all stationers had to record the titles of books they published; the Company's record of books is thus an important source of information for the literary historian, and particularly valuable evidence in dating many Elizabethan plays. The Company gradually lost its publishing monopoly in the 17th century.

> Stationers' Register.

Stationers' Register

An important source of bibliographical information for the 16th and 17th centuries. In 1557 ➤ Mary I granted the Worshipful Company of ➤ Stationers and Papermakers of London the monopoly of printing. Under the charter granted to the company, all printers were enjoined to record the titles of any works intended for publication for the first time in a register. Once a title had been recorded, no other member of the company was allowed to publish the book. The Stationers' Register thus should include the titles of all books intended for publication between 1554 and 1709. In practice, however, the record is incomplete. First, records for the years 1571-6 have been lost. Secondly, titles were sometimes entered but the book never published. Thirdly, on occasion a book was published without being entered. Finally though titles were usually entered shortly before the actual publication of a book, there are cases where a period of years elapsed between the entering of a title and the final publication of a work. Nevertheless, the Stationers' Register is an important record of the English book trade in the period. Not least, it provides a valuable indication of what works were being considered for publication at a particular moment.

Stead, Christina (1902-83) Australian novelist. Educated at Sydney University Teachers' College, she moved to Europe in 1928, and to the U.S.A. in 1935, travelling with the American political economist William James Blake, whom she married in 1952. She worked as a Hollywood screenwriter before moving to England and, in 1968, returning to Australia. Many of her novels are concerned with the experience of women, and in particular the quest for love. They are notable for their stylistic power, richness of observation, and vivid characterization, and contain an element of the fantastic. Her first works were collections of stories: The Salzberg Tales and Seven Poor Men of Sydney, both published in 1934. Of her novels, House of All Nations (1938) reflects her left-wing views in its account of a glittering, amoral world of financial speculation, while The Man Who Loved Children (1940), a novel of American family life, shows an interest in the causes of genius. In For Love Alone (1944) a girl escapes to Australia in search of love and freedom.

▶ Post-colonial literature.

Steel, Mrs Flora Annie (1847-1929) Novelist. Brought up in London and Scotland, she married at twenty and lived for some twenty-one years in the Punjab, India, where her husband was a civil servant. She worked extensively for the health and education of Indian women, founding a school for Indian girls and working as a school inspector. She started writing after returning to England in 1889, and most of her fiction is set in India: On the Face of the Waters (1896), about the Indian mutiny; Wide Awake Stories (1884), tales set in the Punjab; Hosts of the Lord (1900), about Indian religions; and The Curse of Eve (1929), which advocates birth control. She was involved with the > women's suffrage movement and wrote an ▷ autobiography, The Garden of Fidelity (1929).

Steele, Sir Richard (1672-1729) Essavist and journalist. He was educated (with ➤ Addison) at Charterhouse School (▶ Carthusians) and at Oxford University. On graduation he entered the army. His prose treatise The Christian Hero (1701) attracted the favour of the king, > William III, but caused Steele the inconvenience of finding that he was expected to live up to his own precepts. This his pleasure-loving nature did not find convenient, and he redressed the balance by his comedy The Funeral (1701). He wrote other comedies: The Lying Lover (1703); The Tender Husband (1705), an imitation of ➤ Molière's Sicilienne; and ➤ The Conscious Lovers (1722). It is not, however, for his comedies that he is now read, but for a new kind of ⊳ periodical ⊳ essay of which he was practically the inventor, and which he published in ▷ The Tatler, started in 1700, and appearing three times weekly. Although since the lapsing of the Licensing Act (▷ theatres) in 1695 there was no active > censorship of political opinion, Steele found it safer to avoid politics, at least after the Tory party came to power in 1710, since he was a consistent Whig (Whig and Tory). His essays treated daily life, manners and behaviour, in a way calculated to educate middle-class readers and win the approval of people of virtue, and yet always to entertain them. These motives, and the kind of interest that his essays inspired, anticipate the character of later 18th-century novels, especially those of ⊳ Samuel Richardson. The Tatler was already a success when Joseph Addison started to collaborate with Steele, but they closed it down in 1711, and started the still more famous > Spectator (1711-12). The crisis of succession to the throne grew intense in 1713-14: the Whigs favoured the Protestant House of Hanover and a powerful Tory faction was ready to support ➤ Anne's half-brother James if he would turn Protestant, though other Tories remained loyal to the Act of 1701 in favour of Hanover. Steele was consequently attacked by the Tory journalist ⊳ Jonathan Swift, both for his conduct of his next paper, The Guardian (1713), and for his > pamphlet in favour of the Protestant succession, The Crisis (1714). In 1714 the Whigs returned to power and Steele's political fortunes revived; he was knighted in 1715, and received various official posts. In 1714 he produced his autobiographical Apology for Himself and his Writings; he also edited a number of other periodicals, all of them short-lived, and none with the fame of The Tatler and The Spectator: The Englishman, The Reader, Town Talk, Tea-Table, Chit Chat, Plebeian. The last, a political paper, led to a guarrel with Addison in 1718.

Stendhal (pseudonym of Henri Beyle) (1788–1842)

French writer, known for his novels Armance (1822), La Chartreuse de Parme (1839), Le Rouge et le Noir (1830) and Lucien Leuwen (unfinished and published posthumously in 1894). Considered the first of the French > realists, Stendhal is renowned for his exact depiction of milieu and for his close attention to psychological verisimilitude and motivation. However, his realism is neither a simple fidelity to detail nor does it underwrite the values and representations which aristocratic and bourgeois society make of themselves. Stendhal does depict the conflict of social verisimilitudes with narrative inventions which contravene such verisimilitudes; so the mainspring of Le Rouge et le Noir is the socially unacceptable love of the aristocratic Mathilde and the commoner Julien, while Armance raises the 'shocking' issue of ▶ homosexuality before its Byronic conclusion. On the author's side, irony is his means of refusing to endorse such values. Irony here is not a purely corrosive negativity. It discreetly raises the issue of the ethics of representation itself, moving outwards from the hero and society to ask whether the novel can hold together that encounter of social and individual forces it narrates.

Stendhal's interests were wide and he was the author of travel books, journalism and controversial literary pamphlets (Racine et Shakespeare, 1823 and 1825, in which he declared his support for the > Romantics). Three volumes of autobiographical writings were published after his death: his Journal (1888), La Vie de Henry Brulard (1890) and Souvenirs d'égotisme (1892).

> French influence on English literature.

Stephen, Sir Leslie (1832–1904)

Critic and biographer. He began his career as a tutor at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and university rules demanded that he should be in orders as an Anglican clergyman. His philosophical studies led him to the religious scepticism so frequent among intellectuals of the middle and later 19th century, and he renounced his orders in 1875. From 1866 he contributed critical essays to the > Cornhill Magazine and political ones for the Nation; he also wrote for the > Saturday Review and helped to found the Pall Mall Gazette (1865). In 1871 he became editor of the Cornhill; the eleven years of his editorship made it one of the most distinguished literary reviews of the later 19th century. His critical essays were published in book form in Hours in a Library (1874-9). He wrote philosophical essays, defining his agnostic position: Essays on Free Thinking and Plain Speaking (1873). He contributed a number of biographies to the English Men of Letters series: Johnson (1878); Pope (1880); Swift (1882); George Eliot (1902), and Hobbes (1904). His most distinguished work is firstly his editorship of the Dictionary of National Biography, started in 1882, to which he contributed many of the articles, and his book on The English Utilitarians (1900). His last book was English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century (1904).

Today, Stephen is one of the most respected among critics of the later 19th century; the rigour and sincerity of his thinking make him a link between the Victorians and 18th-century rationalist traditions of thought which continued into the 19th century in the ▷ Utilitarian school of thinkers. He has twice been used as the basis of character in the masterpieces of distinguished novelists: Vernon Whitford in ▷ The Egoist by ▷ Mercdith, and Mr Ramsay in To the Lighthouse (1927) by Virginia Woolf (1882–1941), his daughter by his second wife. His first wife had been a daughter of the novelist ▷ Thackeray.

Stephens, Meic (b 1938)

Poet and editor. Meic Stephens was born at Treforest, near Pontypridd, and was educated at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, and at the University of Rennes in Brittany. Initially teaching French at Ebbw Vale, he later settled in Merthyr Tydfil where he founded the Triskel Press and Poetry Wales, editing the magazine from 1965 to 1973. In 1967, he became the Literature Director of the Welsh Arts Council, a post he held for over twenty years. His early poems were published with those of Harri Webb and Peter Gruffydd in Triad (1963) and he also contributed a booklet, Exiles All (1973), to the Triskel Press series. Among his other work, Linguistic Minorities in Western Europe. (1976) examines the interaction between culture and politics in sixteen states, whereas in a contrasting context, in The Curate of Clyro (1983), he made a selection from the diary of Francis Kilvert. However, the main thrust of his work has been as an editor and as an anthologist, promoting other writers' work at the expense of his own. His greatest achievement has been his editing and compiling The Oxford Companion to the Literature of Wales (1986), published in both Welsh and English language editions, a work of intensive but entertaining scholarship. Among his considerable list of publications are three Anglo-Welsh poetry anthologies, The Lilting House (co-editor John Stuart Williams, 1969), Green House (co-editor Peter Finch, 1978), and The Bright Field (1991); two anthologies of poetry and prose, based on locality, A Cardiff Anthology (1987) and Rhondda Anthology (1993); The Welsh Language Today (1973), A Reader's Guide to Wales (1973), Artists in Wales (in three volumes, 1971, 1973, 1977), The Arts in Wales, 1950—1975 (1979) and the Writers of Wales series (co-editor, R. Brinley Jones, from 1970). More recently Meic Stephens has edited The Oxford Literary Guide to Great Britain and Ireland (1992) and he is at present preparing a revised and enlarged second edition of The Oxford Companion, as well as editing the posthumous Collected Poems volumes of both Glyn Jones and Harri Webb.

Sterne, Laurence (1713-68)

Sterne was born at Clonmel in Ireland, the son of an improvident army officer. After leaving Cambridge University he became an Anglican priest near York, where his great-grandfather had been Archbishop. His celebrated novel > The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy appeared in successive volumes from 1760 until 1767. Opinions have always been divided about the qualities of this book, although Sterne's reputation rests principally upon it. ▶ Samuel Johnson found it eccentric and shallow, declaring, 'Nothing odd will do long. Tristram Shandy did not last'; but in the 20th century the critic Viktor Schlovsky has argued that 'Tristram Shandy is the most typical novel of world literature.' > A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy, which demonstrates many of the same stylistic idiosyncracies, appeared in 1768, the last year of Sterne's life. His Journal to Eliza, published posthumously, is a curious, quasi-> autobiographical work that hovers uneasily between fact and fiction, > tragedy and farce. The same blend of seriousness and whimsicality is evident in Sterne's > sermons, he published under the name of one of the characters from Tristram Shandy as The Sermons of Mr Yorick. A contemporary review took offence at this jesting allusion. 'We have read of a Yorick likewise in an obscene romance,' it thundered. 'But are the solemn dictates of religion fit to be conveyed from the mouths of buffoons and ludicrous romancers?'

Sterne's characteristic blending of > sentimentality and farce, although distinctive in style, is not without precedent. His main literary influences can be found in ➤ Rabelais, Cervantes (1547–16), and ➤ Montaigne, although there are also debts to Burton's ➤ Anatomy of Melancholy (1621-51), > Locke's > Essay on Human Understanding, and > Swift's > Tale of a Tub. From Rabelais Sterne derived not only his bawdy humour, but also his fascination with exuberant word-play, his love of lists and puns, his delight in the sonorous malleability of words and his absurd parodies of learned debates. From Locke he borrowed and parodied the theory of the association of ideas, a theory which allows him to present each of his characters trapped in a private world of allusions. > Thackeray objected to the self-indulgence of Sterne's wit:

'He is always looking on my face, watching his effect, uncertain whether I think him an impostor or not; posture-making, coaxing and imploring me.' Yet it is precisely this fictional virtuousity that has recommended Sterne as a model to later writers keen to assert not only that all art is artifice, but that history and boiography too are merely varieties of elaborate fiction.

Stevenson, Anne (b 1933)

Poet. Stevenson was born in Britain, and now lives here, but was brought up and educated in the U.S.A. She has written critical texts as well as poetry, and has worked as a teacher. Her publications include: Living in America (1965); Travelling Behind Glass: Selected Poems (1974); Enough of Green (1977); Minute by Glass Minute (1982); The Fiction-makers (1985); Selected Poems (1986). Stevenson's biography of poet ▷ Sylvia Plath, Bitter Fame: A Life of Sylvia Plath, was published in 1989.

Stevenson, Robert Louis Balfour (1850-94) Novelist, essayist, poet. The son of an engineer, he intended to take up the same profession, for which he showed early talent, but bad health prevented this. Partly because of his health and partly for love of travel, he spent much of his life abroad and some of his best writing is in essays of travel, eg An Inland Voyage (1878) and Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes (1879). His most famous works, however, are the fantasy, so often used as an emblem of divided personality, > The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886) and his adventure story ➤ Treasure Island (1883). Still well known are his Scottish historical romances, in the tradition of Walter Scott (1771-1832): Kidnapped (1886), > The Master of Ballantrae (1889), and Catriona (1893); it has been said that Weir of Hermiston, also in this style but left unfinished, would have been his masterpiece. Other works of fiction: New Arabian Nights (1882); Prime Otto (1885); The Black Arrow (1888); The Wrong Box (1889); The Wrecker (1892); Island Nights Entertainments (1893); The Ebb Tide (1894); St Ives, also left unfinished at his death. Essays: Virginibus Puerisque (1881); Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882); Vailima Letters (1895). His A Child's Garden of Verses (1885) was for long considered a minor children's classic (> Children's literature), and he published other poetry in Underwoods (1887). Stevenson was strongly influenced by French ideas of literary style and to a lesser extent by > aestheticism. He has had a wide popular readership which has perhaps denied him critical attention: critics have detected a darker side to his writing beneath the swashbuckling, and dualism is a theme in evidence.

Stichomythia

A terse but artificial style of dramatic dialogue, used in disputes between two characters, each speaking in turn a single line of verse. It originated in ancient Greek tragedies; from them it passed to \triangleright Seneca whose influence caused it to be used by some of the early Elizabethans.

The following example of Stichomythia is taken from ▷ Kyd's ▷ The Spanish Tragedy and shows a love-dialogue between two of the characters in the play:

BEL-IMPERIA

Set forth thy foot to try the push of mine. HORATIO

But first my looks shall combat against thine. BEL-IMPERIA

Then ward thyself: I dart this kiss at thee. HORATIO

Thus I retort the dart thou threm'st at me.

Stoics

A school of philosophy founded by the Greek Zeno of Citium, in the 4th century AD. It later extended to Rome, where its leaders became Epictetus and ⊳ Seneca (both 1st century AD) and the Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius (2nd century AD). They reasoned that all being is material, and therefore the soul is, and so are the virtues. The soul, however, is an active principle which sustains the body, and proceeds from God; only the active principle has significance, and the wise person is therefore indifferent to material suffering and cares only for virtue governed by judgement which is in accordance with the principles of wisdom. Some of the ethical principles of Stoicism were in accordance with Christianity (which Marcus Aurelius nevertheless persecuted) and, abstracted from religious doctrine, they appealed to the > Renaissance ideal of the noble soul; hence the recurrence of Stoic attitudes in the drama of > Shakespeare and his contemporaries.

Stoker, Bram (1847-1912)

Irish novelist and ▷ short story writer, now remembered principally for the universally known, much parodied and frequently filmed ▷ Dracula (1897), which was influenced by ▷ J. S. Le Fanu's vampire novel Carmilla (1872). Stoker spent most of his career as secretary and business manager to the actor Henry Irving; he wrote many ▷ horror stories, other novels of the supernatural, such as The Lady of the Shroud (1909), and adventure novels such as The Snake's Pass (1890).

Stoppard, Tom (b 1937)

Czech-born British dramatist and something of an eclectic who has experimented with a variety of forms in his writing for stage and television. Characteristic of his plays is a heavy reliance on intellectual wit and allusion, which would appear to make his appeal rather esoteric, yet he is now established as a leading comic playwright. His work is always full of verbal fireworks, intellectual references and literary jokes. Most of his plays are constructed around elaborate conceits; Jumpers puts a philosophical discussion of logic together with a troupe of acrobats; Every Good Boy Deserves Favour has a full scale orchestra on stage in a play about Soviet dissidents; Hapgood relates the complexities of spying and double agents to nuclear physics. This method of highly improbable juxtaposition owes a lot to Surrealism, and, in After Magritte, Stoppard wrote a play around the elements of a Magritte painting (umbrellas, bowler hats, skies, etc) located in a suburban household. Arcadia juxtaposes chaos theory and literary detection in a compelling conjunction of verbal wit and intellectual games. His major works include: Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead (1966); The Real Inspector Hound (1968); Jumpers (1972); Travesties (1974); Dirty Linen (1976); Every Good Boy Deserves Favour (1977); Night and Day (1978); On the Razzle (1981); The Real Thing (1982); Rough Crossing (1985); Hapgood (1987); Arcadia (1993); Indian Ink (1995). Television plays include: Professional Foul (1977); Squaring the Circle (1984). Bib: Bigsby, C. W. E., Tom Stoppard; Hunter, 1., Tom Stoppard's Plays.

Storey, David (b 1933)

Novelist and dramatist. His novels include: This Sporting Life (1960); Flight into Camden (1961); Radcliffe (1963); Pasmore (1972); A Temporary Life (1973); Saville (1976); A Prodigal Child (1982); Present Times (1984).

Before he became a novelist and playwright Storey was an art student, and to pay for his studies in London he played at weekends in professional Rugby League football for a northern team. The son of a miner, Storey is one of a group of novelists who rose to prominence in the 1950s and 1960s, who have in common that their social viewpoint is outside the middle class and centred geographically outside London; they include > Alan Sillitoe, > John Braine and > Stan Barstow. Their obvious antecedent is > D. H. Lawrence. Storey is distinguished from his contemporaries with a similar background by the absence of social belligerence and an ability to reach across from a provincial-industrial world denuded of art to a world of highly cultivated sensibility without playing false to the social experience that shaped him. His first novel, which has been filmed, is about his background world, in which sport is the principal cultural force; the next two are in different ways more ambitious and less successful, but their faults are interesting as the price paid for their serious experimental boldness. Radcliffe modifies 1950 ▷ realism with elements of the Gothic, allegorical and fantastic, while retaining a concern with class and social mobility; Pasmore continues this development by linking social instability to a personal crisis of identity. His plays often explore class antagonism and social dislocation. In his play The Contractor (1969) the process of manual work is presented dramatically as the action centres on the construction of a huge marquee on stage. This bold if somewhat sentimental gesture about the worth of work originally made a strong impression. Yet Storey's plays tend to avoid simplistic idealization of the working class or indeed any kind of simple obvious 'meaning'. The > Chekhovian Home (1970) is set in a mental hospital, perhaps a metaphor for modern Britain, whose communication is painfully reserved. Much is hinted at but little is directly expressed. The later plays, Mother's Day (1976) and Sisters (1978) both have working-class settings and deal with what Storey termed the 'delusions, illusions and fantasies' of domestic life. Other plays include: The Restoration of Arnold Middleton (1966); In Celebration (1969); The Changing Room (1971); The Farm and Cromwell (both 1973): Life Class (1974); Early Days (1980). Stow, John (1515-1605)

Historian and antiquary. Stow's first interest was in literature rather than history, and he produced an edited version of ▷ Chaucer's poetry, The Workes of Geoffrey Chaucer (1561). His historical texts include the detailed and authoritative Chronicles of England (1580; later known as Annales) and A Survey of London, which is an invaluable account of the capital city during the Elizabethan period. He was suspected of ▷ recusancy and charged with owning Popish documents (Edmund Grindal),

Stow, Randolph (b 1935)

Australian novelist, born in Western Australia and educated at the University of Western Australia and the University of Sydney. He has worked as a storeman in an Anglican Mission, as an anthropologist in Papua New Guinea and as a lecturer in English at the universities of Leeds and Western Australia. In 1966 he moved to Britain, living in Suffolk and later in Essex. He won the Patrick White Award in 1979, and Stow's portrayal of a spiritual journey in To the Islands (1958), which is about the quest of an ageing Christian missionary for the aboriginal 'island of the dead', invites comparison with > Patrick White's Voss. His other novels are: A Haunted Land (1956); The Bystander (1957); Tourmaline (1963); The Merry-Go-Round in the Sea (1965); Visitants (1979); The Girl Green as Elderflower (1980); The Suburbs of Hell (1984). His volumes of poetry include: Act One (1957); Outrider: Poems 1956-1962 (1962); A Counterfeit Silence: Selected Poems (1969). He has also written opera libretti for the composer Peter Maxwell Davies (Eight Songs for a Mad King, 1969, and Miss Donnithorne's Maggot, 1974), edited Australian Poetry (1964), and written for children.

Strachey, (Giles) Lytton (1880-1932) Biographer. His best-known works are Eminent Victorians (1918) - short biographical studies of Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale and General Gordon - and Queen Victoria (1921). He also wrote Elizabeth and Essex (1928), and criticism: Landmarks in French Literature (1912) and Books and Characters (1922). Strachev regarded most biographies of the 19th century as dull monuments to the subject, whereas he considered biography to be an art form, presenting the subject as a human being and showing him or her from unexpected aspects. Strachey was a prominent member of the > Bloomsbury Group, living with diarist and painter ⊳ Carrington.

Strafford, Sir Thomas Wentworth, first Earl of (1593-1641)

Statesman, and one of ▷ Charles I's chief ministers. He began his career as an opponent of the king; as Member of Parliament for Yorkshire in 1625, he opposed the attempt of Charles' minister, The Earl of Buckingham, to raise taxes for war against Spain, and in 1627 he was imprisoned for refusing to contribute a forced loan to the king. His opposition to Charles was different in motive from that of other members; theirs was based on the desire to assert the power of Parliament, whereas Wentworth's motive was to secure efficient government. Consequently, when in 1628 Parliament asserted itself by forcing on the king the > Petition of Right, he changed sides. In 1632 Charles sent him to Ireland to reform the administration there. He was never consulted on English affairs until the major crisis brought about by the defeat of the royal troops by the Scots in 1639. Wentworth was then recalled, and made Earl of Strafford in 1640. Events, however, had gone so far that he could no longer help the king, and merely focused public hostility upon himself. Parliament condemned him to death by an Act of Attainder (ie a law effecting death of a subject without using the normal judicial process), and he was executed accordingly.

Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde, The (1886)

A novel by ➤ Robert Louis Stevenson which, along with ➤ Treasure Island, is probably his best known work. The story of Dr Jekyll, who discovers a drug that reduces him periodically to an embodiment of his purely evil impulses — Mr Hyde — is told to the reader through a series of disparate narratives. It has attracted much commentary in recent times, being read as a case study of male sexual hysteria, a fable of late 19th-century homosexual panic, a variant on the doppelgänger myth and a pre-Freudian study of ego and libido.

Stream of consciousness

A term which was used by William James in his Principles of Psychology but was first applied to literature in a 1918 review by May Sinclair of volumes of ➤ Dorothy Richardson's Pilgrimage. Since then it has been used for the narrative technique which attempts to render the consciousness of a character by representing as directly as possible the flow of feelings, thoughts and impressions. The term 'interior monologue' is also sometimes used. The classic exponents of the technique, apart from Richardson, are > Virginia Woolf, > James Joyce and the American novelist William Faulkner (1897-1962). Joyce attributed his initial discovery of the technique to his reading of the novel Les Lauriers sont coupés by the French novelist Edouard Dujardin.

Stretton, Hesba (Sarah) (1832–1911) Novelist and writer of > children's literature. She contributed to > Dickens' periodicals, Description > Household Words and Description All the Year Round, and had much work published by the Religious Tract Society. An Devangelical Christian, she wrote a large number of novels with religious messages, which were extremely popular. Jessica's First Prayer (1867) made her internationally famous and was translated into several languages. Her works include Little Meg's Children (1868), Alone in London (1869) and Pilgrim Street (1872).

Strindberg, August (1849–1912)

Swedish dramatist and novelist. His father, a shipping agent, married his servant who had been his mistress during his first marriage. The unpromising circumstances of this parentage, intensified by his bad relations with his father, were the beginnings of a psychologically tormented life for Strindberg; he was married and divorced three times, and had a mental breakdown in 1895-6, described in Inferno, one of several vivid autobiographical fragments. Intellectually he was immensely versatile: a student of Chinese, botany, chemistry, alchemy and painting. He had comparable literary versatility, and wrote radical journalism (1872-80), prose fiction (notably The Red Room, 1879), and his varied, original dramas. He is chiefly famous, at least outside Sweden, for the last. He wrote historical dramas (Master Olof, 1872; Saga of the Folkungs, Gustavus Vasa, Eric XVI, 1899) which show the influence of > Shakespeare's history plays; tragedies influenced by Zola's > Naturalism and the philosophy of ▷ Nietzsche; fantasies (Easter, 1900; Dream Play, 1902) under the influence of the Belgian dramatist, Maurice Maeterlinck (1862-1949); and, at the end of his career, highly symbolic dramas often called > 'expressionist', of which the best known is The Ghost Sonata (1907). Two partly autobiographical works, To Damascus (1898) and The Great Highway (1909-12) can also be termed 'expressionist'.

Strindberg's dramatic inspiration was to epitomize human experience as the experience of conflict, and he sought to dramatize this conflict at its deepest and most intense. This shows most clearly in his naturalist phase, especially the two plays by which he is best known in Britain: The Father (1887) and Miss Julie (1888). To these may be added the double play The Dance of Death (1901), a Naturalist tragedy verging towards the expressionist symbolism of his later work. One of his strongest preoccupations at the time was the theme of conflict in relationships between women and men, since he considered women to be undergoing a fundamental change in their nature in their struggle for emancipation. He was aware of the possibilities of dramatic experiment on stage and enhanced the visual aspect of his plays. In dialogue he was also experimental, though not with such decisive success as his Russian contemporary, ➤ Anton Chekhov.

Strophe

A Greek word meaning 'turn'. It is used as a term in Greek versification, for example, the > Pindaric Ode, for a passage which is sung and danced (or 'turned') by a chorus. When another passage succeeds it, to be danced and sung by another part of the chorus, this second passage is known as an 'antistrophe'. This is sometimes followed by a third part, the 'epode' when the chorus stood still, thus forming, altogether, a triadic passage. More generally, 'strophe' means a stanza or subdivision of a poem.

➤ Ode.

Structuralism

This influential school of criticism grew out of the ideas of ▷ Ferdinand de Saussure as they appeared in his Course in General Linguistics (1915). Saussure established the role of ▷ difference, the relationship between linguistic elements (signs), as the major determining principle in the establishment of meaning (signification). Thus structuralism encompasses approaches to criticism which use linguistic models to enable critics to focus not on the inherent meaning of a work, but on the structures which produce or generate that meaning or meanings.

As a critical method Saussure's insights were developed subsequently in a wide range of areas, from anthropology, especially by the social anthropologist Claude Levi-Strauss (b 1908), to language, in particular by the Russian ➤ Formalists such as ➤ Roman Jakobson and Tzetvan Todorov (b 1940). In addition, Saussure's insights into sign systems were applied to phenomena as varied as folk tales by the Russian critic Vladimir Propp and menus and traffic lights, in the work of the French critic ➤ Roland Barthes. ➤ Post-structuralism and ➤ deconstruction have developed from the basis of structuralism.

Structure of feeling

A term coined by Raymond Williams to denote the connections between various works in a given period or literary > genre. The term is deliberately oxymoronic, suggesting something both structurally > determined but also responsive to more nebulous feeling. In this way, though himself a socialist, Williams resisted the dogmatic emphasis on determination found in some Marxist accounts of culture. The term has the further advantage of uniting personal feeling with social structure, and Williams insisted that literature always presented human experience in a specific social context. In this way he tried to eliminate the abstraction of conventional coverage of 'background' or 'world-view'. Williams also insisted that the > form of a work was as important as its content in the expression of feeling and experience, and that, in their development, literary forms both enable and limit (i.e. structure) the expression of certain kinds of historically and socially specific feeling and experience.

Stuart (Stewart), House of

The family from which came the sovereigns of Scotland between 1371 and 1603, and the sovereigns of Scotland, England and Ireland between 1603 and 1714. The family originated in Brittany, from where they migrated to England in the 11th century and to Scotland in the 12th, where they acquired the surname 'Stuart' (variously spelt) by serving the kings of Scotland as Stewards. They came to the Scottish throne by intermarriage with the Bruce family, and the reigns until 1603 were as follows: Robert II (1371-90); Robert III (1390-1406); James I (1406-37); James II (1437-60); James III (1460-88); James IV (1488-1513); James V (1513-42); Mary (1542, deposed 1567); James VI (1567-1603). In 1603 ➤ Elizabeth I of England died childless, and James VI inherited the crown of England by virtue of his descent from Elizabeth's aunt Margaret, who had married James IV. James VI thus became also > James I of England, and ruled over the two countries until 1625. The succession during the ➤ Renaissance period continued as follows: Charles I (1625-49), after whom there was an ▶ Interregnum until 1660 when the monarchy was restored in his son. Charles II (1660-85).

Stubbes, Philip (?1555-?1611)

Puritan author of The Anatomie of Abuses (1583) who censured stage plays and wrote a strong and colourful prose. He may have been involved in the ▷ Martin Marprelate controversy, and was attacked in pamphlets by both ▷ John Lyly and ▷ Thomas Nashe. He is most valued now for his contribution to our understanding of the popular customs and festivals of the time.

Subjectivity

In its use in the language of literary criticism this concept is not to be confused with the notion of 'individual response' with which it has customarily been associated. ▶ Louis Althusser and ▶ Jacques Lacan develop the notion of human beings as 'subjects', that is points at which all of those social, cultural and psychic forces which contribute to the construction of the individual, come together. Implicit in the concept of the 'subject' is the idea of the grammatical positioning of the personal pronoun in a sentence: the 'I' being referred to as 'the subject of discourse'. Also, implicit in the concept of 'subjectivity' is the notion of 'subjection', which raises fundamental questions about the ways in which the behaviour of individual 'subjects' is conditioned by external forces. Within the boundaries of critical theory the 'subject' is never unified (except through the functioning of an ⊳ ideology which is designed to efface contradiction), but it, in reality split, or 'decentred'. This is part of a movement away from the kind of philosophical > humanism which would place the individual at the centre of attention. It would attribute to him or her an autonomy of action as well as an authority arising out of the suggestion that he or she is the origin and source of all meaning. 'Subjectivity' is an indispensable category of analysis for ⊳ feminism, ⊳ psychoanalytical criticism and for the various kinds of materialist analysis of texts.

Sublimation

This term is used in ▶ Freudian psychoanalysis to describe the process whereby activities which have their origins in the unconscious, and which can be traced to primal issues of sexuality, are diverted and surface in other areas of human endeavour, as something else. This concept is of particular use to literary criticism, not only because it can provide an explanation of the mechanisms of artistic creation itself, but because it assists in the analysis of literary representations of human motives and actions. Implicit in sublimation is the notion of an unconscious whose operations, distorted as desires, rise to the level of the conscious.

Subversion

This is a term usually associated with the sphere of political action, but applied to literary texts it points towards the relationship between a particular text, or even a part of a text, and what is generally regarded as the prevailing order. Individual texts are capable of challenging dominant orthodoxies (eg ▷ James Jovce's > Ulysses or > D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover), either at the level of literary form, or at the level of discernible content. Thus, they may be said to subvert expectations or dominant values. A more complex kind of subversion may take place within the boundaries of a particular text which otherwise would be accepted as conforming to prevailing values and attitudes. Where this happens, negotiation takes place (which can be analysed as part of the text's structure) whereby that which is dominant in the text seeks to contain and control those forces which could subvert it. Such a process is particularly evident in relation to sexual difference, where a potentially subversive 'femininity' is often seen to threaten the dominant masculine discourses which seek to contain it. Very often potentially subversive energies are only ever permitted to enter a text in marginalized forms, eg female promiscuity, as various forms of 'evil' all of which are shown to be a danger to the status quo. An acceptance of the judgements implied in these moral categories is usually a precondition of a reading which is complicit with its dominant discourses and structures. A more critical reading will seek to reinstate the text's 'subversive' elements in order to show precisely how certain values, and the literary structures which sustain them, are produced.

Suckling, Sir John (1609-41)

Poet and dramatist. Suckling has been grouped with the > 'Cavalier' poets associated with the Royalist cause during the ▷ Civil War. Closely associated with the court, his military career was marked by an ostentatious delight in the appearance rather than the reality of a campaign: he is said to have paid £,12,000 from his own pocket to have 100 cavalrymen decked out in striking uniforms for the war against the Scots in 1639. The king's army, of which Suckling and his troops were a part, were routed. Following the abortive attempt to rescue the king's favourite, the ➤ Earl of Strafford, from the Tower, Suckling, who took part in the plot, fled abroad, where he died, possibly committing suicide and probably in the autumn of 1641.

Although the author of four plays, the most successful of which was Aglaura (first produced in 1637 as a ▷ tragedy, and revised and produced as a comedy in 1638), Suckling's reputation rests on his short ▷ lyric poems, written in an anti-Petrarchan style and calculated to strike the pose of a cynical rake.

Suffragette Movement

Colloquial term for the Women's Suffrage Movement which pursued violent action to secure political rights for women before and during World War I. The suffrage movement has often been seen as the origin of the modern women's movement; it developed out of the campaigns led in the 1860s and 1870s by Josephine Butler against the notorious Contagious Diseases Acts. The origin of the Women's Suffrage Movement thus lies in the late 19th century. Specifically, the suffragettes wanted equal rights with men to have the vote (suffrage) in parliamentary elections and to be candidates for election. Among the famous leaders of the movement were Mrs Pankhurst and her two daughters, ⊳ Sylvia and Christabel. The movement ended in 1918 when votes were given to women at the age of 30; in 1928 they received equal rights with men.

Summoner's Tale, The

One of > Chaucer's > Canterbury Tales. It is delivered as a riposte to the > Friar's Tale, has a strong scatalogical emphasis and contains a devastating picture of the corrupt practices of Friar John, who uses his profession and professional skills to procure material comforts for himself and his colleagues. The basic plot follows a > fabliau structure, and recounts the gulling of Friar John by one of his lay clients, who appears to promise him a significant gift, but this turns out to be no more than sound and wind (and provides a fitting comment on the Friar's principal qualities). However, the Friar has promised to distribute the gift among his colleagues, and the tale closes with an investigation into how the offensive gift might be divided into 12: a squire of the local lord solves this difficult problem of 'arsmetrike' and thus completes the total humiliation of the Friar.

Supremacy, Acts of

- I The law passed through ➤ Parliament on the initiative of ➤ King Henry VIII in 1534; it established the King as Supreme Head of the Church in England, and thus displaced the sovereignty of the Pope. The Act was the immediate consequence of Henry's dispute with the Pope over his attempt to divorce his Queen, Catherine of Aragon; however, this immediate cause was insufficient by itself to bring about the break. Deeper causes include the growth of national feeling; longstanding resentment against some forms of papal taxation; distrust of Roman Catholic doctrine, first roused by > Wycliffe and now reawakened by the German reformer, > Luther; growing dislike of the international religious orders of monks and friars who were ultimately subject to the Pope. Nonetheless, Henry was a conservative in doctrine, and the act did not entail doctrinal reformation.
- 2 The similar law passed through Parliament on the initiative of ▷ Elizabeth I in 1559. Since the act of 1534, the English nation had undergone ▷ Protestant doctrinal ▷ reformation in the reign of ▷ Edward VI and had reverted to full Roman Catholicism under headship of the Pope in the reign of ▷ Mary I. In consequence Elizabeth's Act of Supremacy was deliberately vague, so as to gain the widest possible national support, from both Protestant and Roman Catholic sympathizers. Elizabeth abandoned the title 'Supreme Head' and adopted that of 'Supreme Governor'.

Surrealism

Inaugurated in Paris in 1924 by ➤ André Breton's first Surrealist Manifesto (two further manifestos were to follow in 1930 and 1934), its founding members included Louis Aragon (1897-1982), Robert Desnos (1900-45), Paul Eluard (1895–1952), Benjamin Péret (1899–1959) and Philippe Soupault (b 1897). The movement's ambition was a radical programme, extending beyond art and literature to embrace social and political reform. To advertise and propagate their aims, the Surrealists created a 'Bureau de recherches surréalistes' and a number of reviews: Littérature (1919), La Révolution surréaliste (1924), Le Surréalisme au service de la Révolution (1930) and Minotaure (1932). Purely with France, Surrealism's roots lay in Guillaume Apollinaire's (1880-1918) experiments with poem-objects and in the cubist poetry of Pierre Reverdy (1889-1960). More broadly, as the first Manifesto made clear, it was especially indebted to Freudian (> Freud) theories of dream and sought to overthrow rationalism in favour of unconscious mental states, so giving rise to an expanded sense of the psychic life. Such unconscious processes could best be liberated by activities such as 'automatic writing'. By this technique, a writer's faculty of conscious censorship is laid aside, allowing the chance encounter between two otherwise unrelated elements which might produce the surreal image and intimate the incursion of dream into reality.

Just as Surrealism travelled easily between forms of artistic production and ostensibly external forms such as psychology and philosophy, so its own artistic manifestations span poetry, prose and painting, though it is best known for and possibly most representatively manifested in the first and last of these. Max Ernst (1891–1976), René Magritte (1898–1967) and Joan Miró (1893-1983) helped establish the movement in art and Salvador Dali (1904-89) provided greater impetus still when he associated himself with Surealism in 1929; his dream-like work was plainly inspired by Freud, while his surreal objects such as the lobster-telephone amuse and shock our sense of the everyday propriety of such objects. Louis Aragon (1807-1982), the foremost of Surrealism's several communists (Eluard was another), made an early contribution with his Feu de joie (1920) and Le Mouvement perpétuel (1925) as well as major novels. However, Aragon's commitment to communism from 1027 onwards finally led to his break with Surrealism in 1932, even though Breton's Second Manifesto of 1930 had called for the harmonization of Freud and > Marx. World War II caused an hiatus in Surrealism's activities and despite the success of the various Surrealist Exhibitions (eg London, 1936; Paris 1938, 1947, 1959), by the 1950s the movement's force was to all intents and purposes spent.

The widespread influence of French Surrealism between the Wars gave rise to two corresponding movements, Belgian Surrealism and English Surrealism.

Surrey, Henry Howard, Earl of (?1517-47) Poet. He was the son of the Duke of Norfolk, the senior nobleman of England. Surrey and his father were both arrested by > Henry VIII on a ridiculous charge of high treason. Surrey was executed, Henry's last victim; his father, also condemned to death, survived Henry and was reprieved. In character Surrey was a man of the ▶ Renaissance, with the Renaissance conception of the courtier as the complete man in all worthy things - art, learning and action. His poetry was thus a cultivation of poetic ideals on the model of the poets of the Italian Renaissance, and he shares with his older contemporary ➤ Sir Thomas Wyatt the distinction of being the first poet to naturalize Renaissance poetic modes in English; their work was published by ➤ Tottel in his Miscellany of 1557. Like Wyatt, Surrey cultivated the > sonnet, and he was the first poet to use > blank verse, in his translation of > Virgil's Aeneid, Books 2 and 3. However, Surrey was respected for these contributions more by modern critics who have in the past pointed out that the merit of his poetry is much slighter than Wyatt's and that the flowering of the English short poem in the 1590s owed more to the sonnets of ➤ Sir Philip Sidney (➤ Astrophil and Stella) and to ▷ Edmund Spenser's pastorals (▷ The Shepherd's Calendar) than to the work of either Wyatt or Surrey. Surtees, Robert Smith (1805-64)

Novelist. In 1832 he helped to found the New Sporting Magazine, which he edited for five years and to which he contributed sketches collected in 1838 under the title of Jorrocks' Jaunts and Jollities. It was this book which suggested to the publishers, Chapman and Hall, the idea that > Charles Dickens might write a similar series of sketches about a Nimrod Club of amateur sportsmen. Dickens adapted this idea to the Pickwick Club and thus started ➤ The Pickwick Papers, issued in twenty parts in 1836-7 and published in book form in 1837. Surtees' most famous fox-hunting novel is probably Handley Cross (1843), still regarded as a minor classic. He published eight novels in all. Bib: Cooper, L., R.S. Sutcliffe, Alice (c 1633)
Poet. Alice Sutcliffe published only one work that we know of, Meditations of Man's Mortalitie

(1633); it includes several panegyric poems written by men praising the extraordinary skill of the author - extraordinary in that she is a woman. Two of these were written by ➤ Ben Jonson and ➤ George Wither, and these, together with her dedication to Katherine, Duchess of Buckingham, reveal Sutcliffe's court associations. Her husband, John Sutcliffe, was Groom of the royal chamber. The poems stand for themselves, however, regardless of any social connections, since they combine religious allusions with deeply passionate, grotesque and overtly physical language. Their admonition against sin and their warning of the Day of Judgement reside uneasily with a gothic sensuality. Bib: Greer, G. (ed.), Kissing the Rod.

Swedenborg, Emanuel (1688–1722) Swedish scientist, philosopher and theologian. The earlier part of his life was dedicated to the natural sciences, and his theories anticipate important discoveries in geology, cosmology, and especially in the physiology of the brain. Later he devoted himself to religion and had mystical experiences: his religious beliefs led to the founding of the New Jerusalem Church and the English Theosophical Society. According to Swedenborg's beliefs, God is Divine Man, whose essence is infinite love; there are correspondences between spiritual > nature and material nature, but the former is alive and the latter is dead; both in God, and in man and nature there are three degrees, those of love, wisdom and use, or end, cause and effect; by a love of each degree man comes into relation with them, and his end is to become the image of his Creator, God. Swedenborg's Heaven and Hell and True Christian Religion were translated into English in 1778 and 1781, and amongst his followers were the father of the poet > William Blake, and Blake's friend, the sculptor John Flaxman. Swedenborg's doctrines are the starting point of much of Blake's thinking. But Blake, who wrote comments on Swedenborg's doctrines, came to disagree with the philosopher in important respects.

Swift, Graham Colin (b 1949)
Novelist and short-story writer. Born in London and educated at the universities of Cambridge and York, he worked as a part-time teacher of English in London colleges from 1974 to 1983. Waterland (1983) reflects on the significance of historical knowledge and the influence of the environment on human identity, through the tragicomic story of several generations of a Fenland family, interspersed with material about the history and geography of the area. His other fiction is: The Sweet-Shop Owner (1980); Shuttlecock (1981); Learning to Swim and Other Stories (1982); Out of This World (1988); Ever After (1992).

Swift, Jonathan (1667-1745)

> Satirist. He was of an old English family, but his grandfather seems to have lost his fortune on the > Cavalier side in the > Civil Wars of the mid-17th century. The poet ➤ Dryden was his cousin. Swift was educated in Ireland, where he had the future playwright ➤ Congreve as a schoolfellow, and took his degree at Trinity College, Dublin. He began his working life as secretary to the statesman and writer ⊳ Sir William Temple in 1689, left him to take orders as a priest in the Church of England in 1694 (receiving a small ecclesiastical office in Ireland), and returned to remain in Temple's service until Temple's death in 1699. Throughout the reign of Queen > Anne (1702-14) he played a large part in the literary and the political life of London, though he was dividing his time between England and Ireland. He contributed some numbers to ➤ Addison's and ➤ Steele's journals > The Tatler and > The Spectator, and together with ⊳ Pope and ⊳ Arbuthnot founded the ➤ Scriblerus Club. Politically he at first served the Whig party, but in 1710 he changed over to the Tories, led by Edward Harley, Earl of Oxford, and the brilliant but unreliable ➤ Bolingbroke (Whig and Tory). He served the Tories by his > pamphlet The Conduct of the Allies (1711) advocating peace in the War of the > Spanish Succession, and by his conduct of the journal The Examiner (1710-11). His assistance was invaluable to the Tory party, who held power from 1711 until the death of the Queen; in 1713 Swift was rewarded by being made Dean of St Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, an office which he at first held as an absentee. By this time, however, the Queen was dying, and Harley and Bolingbroke, divided over the succession to the throne, were opponents: Bolingbroke offered Swift great rewards for his support, but Swift preferred to remain with Harley, who had lost power and for a time was even in danger of losing his life. In 1714 the Queen died, the Whigs returned to power, Bolingbroke fled, and ➤ George I came over from Germany as king. Swift left England for his Deanery in Ireland. At first he had few friends there, but between 1720 and 1730 he wrote a number of eloquent pamphlets in the interests of the oppressed Irish, and ended by achieving great popularity. The same decade saw the crisis of his relationships with the two women who loved him: Esther Johnson, the 'Stella' of his Journal to Stella, compiled 1710-13, and Esther Vanhomrigh, whom he called 'Vanessa'. The relationship with the latter was tragically concluded with her death in 1723; Stella died in 1728. Swift lived as a conscientious and efficient Dean almost to the end of his life, unselfishly disposing of most of his wealth for the poor, but he went out of his mind in 1742.

Swift wrote a great deal of prose, chiefly in the form of pamphlets, and not all of it is satire; The Conduct of the Allies is not, for instance, nor are his > sermons. However his great reputation rests principally on his prose satire, and he is especially admired for the very subtle and powerful form of his irony (> Figures of speech). The surface of his prose is limpidly clear and beguilingly placid, but his use of it is to enforce by close logic an impossible and often very shocking proposition, which is driven home with distinct and startling imagery. His position was that of a sincere Christian who advocates reason; he despised alike the emptiness of the Deists and the emotionalism of Puritans. He was at the same time a strong humanitarian, revolted by injustices leading to so much suffering. but despairing of the capacity of the human race to rid itself of its tendency to bestiality and heartlessness. Though a believer in reason (> rationalism), he despised the pedantry of so many scholars, and the irrelevances of the 'natural philosophers' in their pursuit of science. He has been censured on two grounds: first, the minor but undoubted one that his disgust at some aspects of human existence derived from his own morbidity, and secondly, the much more controversial one that his vision is in the end negative and destructive. His most famous works are as follows: > The Battle of the Books (written 1697, published 1704), a contribution to the dispute between the relative merits of the ancients and the moderns in literature; $\triangleright A$ Tale of a Tub (1704), a satire on 'corruption in religion and learning' and one of his masterpieces; Argument against Abolishing Christianity (1708), a satire on the irreligion of the time; > Drapier's Letters (1724), against the monopoly granted by the English government to William Wood to provide the Irish with a copper coinage; > Gulliver's Travels (1726); and > A Modest Proposal (1729), a most forceful exposure of the conditions of the Irish poor. Swift's poetry has only recently received the critical attention that it deserves. His most admired poem is Verses on the Death of Dr Swift (1731), a partly satirical piece in which he imagines public reaction to the news of his death, and then gives his own deliberately deceptive assessment of his life and achievements. Cadenus and Vanessa is an equally deceptive poem which purports to give an account of his love affair with Esther Vanhomrigh. It was published, at her request, after her death in 1723. ('Cadenus' is an anagram of 'Decanus' = Dean.) Bib: Ehrenpreis, I., Swift, The Man, His Works and The Age; Nokes, D., Jonathan Swift, A Hypocrite Reversed.

Swinburne, Algernon Charles (1837–1909) Poet and critic. His family background was aristocratic: his father was an admiral and his grandfather a baronet. He was educated at Eton and at Balliol College, Oxford. The style of his poetry is very distinctive, and his literary sympathies were wide. Swinburne led a dissolute, wild life (his predilection for flagellation is infamous), and produced poetry which shocked those who read it carefully, and intoxicated his youthful contemporaries, especially ➤ Thomas Hardy and the ▶ Pre-Raphaelites. He read eclectically, absorbing > classical literature, the Elizabethans, the US poet Walt Whitman, William Blake (1757-1827), the Marquis de Sade (1740-1814) and ▷ Baudelaire. In his first dramas The Queen Mother and Rosamond (1860), he was, like most English 19th-century verse dramatists, in the Elizabethan tradition, but his more famous ➤ Atalanta in Calydon (1865) as well as his much later Erectheus (1876) were in the style of the ancient Greek tragedy of Sophocles. The eroticism of his lyrics in Poems and Ballads (1866) owed something to the Latin poet Catullus, and more to Pre-Raphaelite poetry of his own day, chiefly that of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. In this book he is rebelling against the moral repressiveness of the dominant middle-class attitude to sex; in the Song of Italy (1867) and Songs before Sunrise (1871) he is siding with Italian political revolt against oppression, in the spirit of the French 19th-century poet Victor Hugo (1802-85). Chastelard (1865) and Bothwell (1874) are the first two plays, again in Elizabethan style, on Mary Queen of Scots, and were completed by Mary Stuart in 1881. A second series of Poems and Ballads in 1878 contains tributes to the contemporary French poets, Baudelaire and Théophile Gautier and translations of the medieval French poet François Villon. Songs of the Springtides and Studies in Song (1880) show the strong inspiration he drew from the sea, and the Arthurian legend Tristram of Lyonesse (1881) is a romance of the Middle Ages (> medievalism) comparable to those of ➤ William Morris and ➤ Alfred Tennyson, amongst other mid-Victorians. In Marino Falieri (1887) he produced a drama on a theme drawn from medieval Venice already used by the poet Byron (Marino Falieri, 1821); it was published with another drama, Locrine. His later works are: the dramas The Sisters (in prose, 1892) and Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards (1899); poems - Poems and Ballads, 3rd series (1889); Astrophel (1804), A Tale of Balen (1806), A Channel Passage (1904), The Duke of Gandia (1908).

Swinburne was thus a poet who drew on a wide range of influences and interests, and was prolific in output. Against the prejudices of his time, which declared that poets should be morally serviceable, he asserted the right to pursue the poetic vocation to express beauty, but this in itself isolated him from contemporary English culture, especially the novel, which emphasized the search for deeper moral experience.

Swinburne's influence was strong on his younger contemporaries of the > aesthetic movement.

In his criticism, Swinburne is notable for studies of dramatists who were contemporaries of Shakespeare as well as of Shakespeare himself: Study of Shakespeare (1880); The Age of Shakespeare (1990). He also wrote a study of William Blake (1868), A Note on Charlotte Brontë (1877), A Study of Victor Hugo (1886), amongst other criticism.

Swinburne also wrote novels, which are very little known; they have been praised by the distinguished US critic Edmund Wilson in The Bit between my Teeth. One of them, Love's Cross-Currents, was published in 1905. They show the influence of the Marquis de Sade. Sybil, or The Two Nations (1845) A novel by ➤ Benjamin Disraeli. The 'two nations' are the rich and the poor. The country is shown to be governed by the rich in the interests of the rich - ie the landlords and the employers. Sybil is the daughter of Gerard, a > Chartist leader; she is loved by an enlightened young aristocrat, Charles Egremont, vounger brother of an oppressive landlord, Lord Marney. Disraeli gives romantic historical background to his theme by causing Sybil to belong to the same family as the last abbot of Marney, whose lands Lord Marney's ancestors had seized at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII (1509-47). The poor nation is likewise identified with the Anglo-Saxons, despoiled of their land by the Norman conquerors of the 11th century. This novel, like ➤ Coningsby (1844), is part of Disraeli's campaign to renew the Tory party through the Young England movement by inspiring it with a true and disinterested ideology. The novel combines a rather comic element of operatic Romanticism with shrewd observation and social satire.

Sylvia's Lovers (1863)

An ▷ historical novel by ▷ Elizabeth Gaskell, set in the whaling port of Monkshaven during the Napoleonic wars. The plot revolves around the activities of press-gangs who capture men and force them to work on naval warships.

Daniel Robson, Sylvia's father, is hanged after leading an attack on the press-gang's headquarters. Her lover, Charley Kinraid, is seized by the gang, but he sends a note pledging his love and faithfulness via Sylvia's cousin, Philip Hepburn. Philip conceals the message as he loves Sylvia himself, and she later agrees to marry him, believing Charley to be dead. Years later Charley returns, Philip's treachery is revealed, and Sylvia swears lifelong enmity to her husband. The novel explores gender relations through the marriage of Sylvia and Philip and analyses the interaction of public and private events in its focus on aggression, revenge and rivalry.

Symbolic order

A psychoanalytical term now frequently used in literary criticism. 'Symbolic' in this context refers initially to the notion that language itself is comprised of symbols which stand for things. But, the French psychoanalyst ➤ Jacques Lacan observes that: 'It is the world of words that creates the world of things', and in so doing introduces an 'order' into what would otherwise be disparate units. That process of ordering is motivated by a series of impulses and desires which are not usually available to the conscious mind. Thus, the symbolic order is that order of representations through whose organization the child enters into language and the social order as a gendered human 'subject'. In the case of ▶ Freudian psychoanalysis each symbol refers back to an Oedipal stage (▶ Oedipus complex) which the infant passes through on the way to maturity. In Lacan, the 'unconscious' is said to be structured like a language, already a system of representations through which the individual gendered subject realizes his or her identity. In some respect all literary texts traverse the realm of the symbolic order in that they represent and articulate those images through which reality is grasped discursively.

Symbolism

A name primarily associated with a school of French poets writing in the second half of the 19th century. The movement grew out of the work of ⊳ Baudelaire (1821-67) and is above all associated with Paul Verlaine (1844-96), Arthur Rimbaud (1854-91) and ➤ Stephane Mallarmé (1842-98). In addition to Baudelaire, the American writer Edgar Allan Poe (1809-49) and the German music-dramatist Richard Wagner (1813-83) contributed to the shaping of Symbolism. It constituted a development from Romanticism inasmuch as it was poetry of the feelings as opposed to the reason, but it was a reaction against it inasmuch as it was more intellectual in its conception of the way poetry operates. This intellectualism did not imply that the content of poetry should be one of what is ordinarily called ideas: Mallarmé's affirmation was that 'Poetry is not made with ideas; it is made with words'. This looks forward to much 20th-century thought in all the arts, requiring that the artist should above all have respect for the medium in which he has chosen to work; it also anticipates > T. S. Eliot's praise of the English 17th-century ➤ Metaphysical poets that 'they were, at best, engaged in the task of trying to find the verbal equivalent for states of mind and feeling'. Since 'states of mind and feeling' are ultimately mysterious and elusive, the Symbolists emphasized the suggestiveness of poetic language, but though this emphasis on suggestiveness makes much of their poetry obscure, their care for the organization and operation of language kept it from vagueness, in the sense in which the poetry of their English contemporary, the late Romantic ➤ Algernon Swinburne, is very commonly vague. Swinburne is also much concerned with the poetic medium of words, but in such a way that his verse subdues the reader into a state of passive receptivity, whereas the French Symbolists evoke active participation; Swinburne relies for his effect on stimulating emotions already latent in the reader, whereas the Symbolists incite extension of these emotions. T. S. Eliot's essay on Swinburne (in Selected Essays) is a help in elucidating the distinction.

The French Symbolists are particularly important in English literature for their decisive influence on the two most important poets writing in English in the first half of the 20th century: T. S. Eliot and ▷ W. B. Yeats. Eliot's understanding of them was much the more intimate and profound, but A. Symons' The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) acted on them both.

Symons, Arthur (William) (1865-1945) Poet, critic and leading light of the ➤ Decadent movement in the 1890s. His friends included ➤ Ernest Dowson, ➤ Lionel Johnson and > Oscar Wilde, with whom he socialized at the > Rhymer's Club. He contributed to the > Yellow Book and became editor of > The Savoy in 1896. His volumes of poetry include Days and Nights (1889), Silhouettes (1892), London Nights (1895) and Images of Good and Evil (1899). He introduced > French > Symbolism to English readers in his influential study The Symbolist Movement in Literature (1899) and also translated Baudelaire's Les Fleurs Du Mal (originally published 1857) and Zola's L'Assommoir (originally published 1878). His other critical studies include An Introduction to the Study of Robert Browning (1886), William Blake (1907), Charles Baudelaire (1920) and Studies in Elizabethan Drama (1920). He particularly influenced the work of W.B. Yeats (1865-1939).

Synchronic

Adjective used by ▷ Ferdinand de Saussure to describe the analysis of the meaning of a ▷ sign in relation to the other current elements of the language system (▷ languae). Saussure juxtaposes the synchronic study of language with the diachronic study of language which looks at the historical development of language. This is one of the important polarities in Saussure's theories.

Synge, J. M. (John Millington) (1871–1909) Irish dramatist. He belonged to the Protestant Anglo-Irish segment of Irish society, but at the suggestion of ▷ W. B. Yeats in 1899, he devoted his career to interpreting Irish Celtic peasant life. From this proceeded his remarkable series of dramas which were the chief glory of the drama of the Irish literary renaissance, and of the ▷ Abbey Theatre in Dublin (under the direction of Yeats) through which this movement expressed itself. Part of the Irish dramatic endeavour was to revive poetic drama; Synge wrote in prose, but he exploited with great sensitivity the poetic suggestiveness of the rhythms, diction, and imagery of Irish peasant speech. At the same time he avoided the sentimentalities of late 19th-century romanticism and the falsifications which Irish nationalistic vanity required; the result was that his masterpiece, \triangleright The Playboy of the Western World (1907) was received with rage and uproar. His other plays are: The Shadow of the Glen (1903); Riders to the Sea (1904); The Well of the Saints (1905); The Tinker's Wedding (1907), and his last play – drawn unlike the others from Irish myth – Deirdre of the Sorrows, published in 1910 after his death.

Synge also wrote descriptions of Irish peasant life in The Aran Islands (1907), In Wicklow, and In County Kerry (both published 1910).

Tabard Inn

An inn on the south bank of the Thames, in the borough of Southwark. It was here that ➤ Chaucer's pilgrims assembled before setting out to Canterbury in the ➤ Canterbury Tales.

The inn was pulled down in 1875.

A tabard was a sleeveless coat worn by heralds and by knights over their armour. The coat was painted or embroidered with armorial bearings, ie the crest and emblems of the knight's family or the king whom the herald represented.

Tacitus, Cornelius (AD? 55 -? 120) Roman historian. He was eminent in Roman political and social life, and the son-in-law of Gnaeus Julius Agricola, the governor of Britain who effectively transformed the island into an orderly Roman province. His surviving works are the Dialogue on Orators, consisting of conversations about the decay of Roman education; the Life of Agricola, including an account of Britain under the rule of his father-inlaw; Germany, an account of the characteristics of the land and its people, contrasting their freedom and simplicity with the degeneracy of Rome; the Histories, a fragment of an account of the Roman Empire during the last 30 years of the 1st century; the Annals, a fragment of a history of the Empire in the first half of the century.

Tacitus was a contemporary of the satirical poet > Juvenal; together they represent the last significant phase of classical > Latin literature; both have a strong ethical concern with the condition of Roman civilization, and Tacitus reveres the austere virtues of the pre-imperial republic, though he accepts the Empire as a political necessity. His style is distinguished for its brevity, and his works were an outstanding constituent of English education from the 16th to 19th centuries.

Tail-Rhyme

A verse form used in a number of Middle English romances, which is structured around the repetition of a 'tail' line (often shorter than the rest), after at least two rhyming lines. In > Chaucer's > Sir Thopas, for example, the stanzas are built up from a pattern of six lines rhyming aabaab:

Sire Thopas wax a doghty swayn; Whit was his face as payndemayn, His lippes rede as rose; His rode is lyk scarlet in grayn, And I yow telle in good certayn He hadde a semely nose.

Talbot, Catherine (1721-70)

Poet, essayist and ▷ letter-writer, admired by contemporaries for her learning. Almost all her works were published posthumously, by her close friend > Elizabeth Carter, including her collection of essays Reflections on the Seven Days of the Week (1770), and by Carter's nephew Montagu Pennington, who brought out the Series of Letters between Mrs Elizabeth Carter and Miss Catherine Talbot and Talbot's Works, both in 1809.

Tale of a Tub, A (1704)

A prose satire by > Jonathan Swift. The title is the same as that of one of the last and least interesting comedies by ⊳ Ben Jonson, but Swift ironically explains it in his Preface as derived from the practice of sailors of tossing a tub to a whale in order to divert it from attacking the ship. The ship, Swift explains, is an image of the state, and the whale is ► Leviathan, ► Hobbes' political treatise, from which the > wits of the age drew their dangerous armament of scepticism and ▷ satire; he pretends that he has been employed to divert these attacks by his engaging nonsense. For the next edition (1710), Swift added An Apology, in which he discloses his true aim to satirize 'the numerous and gross corruptions in Religion and Learning'. The real meaning of the title is that Swift is beguiling readers so as to expose them the more effectively to the ferocity of irony (> Figures of speech). The central \triangleright fable of the Tale is the story of three brothers, Martin, Peter and Jack, who inherit three simple coats from their father, whose will enjoins that the coats must in no way be altered. Under the leadership of Peter, however, the brothers find it convenient to alter the coats beyond recognition to comply with fashion. Peter's authority eventually becomes so insanely domineering that Martin and Jack revolt against him; Martin tears off the ornaments on his coat, but stops before he altogether disfigures it; Jack, however, reduces his to a squalid rag. The fable is an ▷ allegory of the > Reformation: Peter represents the Church of Rome, Martin the Church of England, in which Swift was a priest, and Jack the extremer ⊳ Protestants, or ⊳ Dissenters; the coat is the Word of God as expressed in the New Testament (> Bible). Swift's main object of attack is Jack, since he regarded the Dissenters, with their claim to receipt of divine inspiration and their resistance to authority, as the principal threat to the rule of right reason, true religion, and fine civilization in his time. The fable is interspersed with digressions, satirizing the arrogance of those who set up their private intellects or privileged inspiration as guides to their fellow-men; by Section XI the digressions come together with the fable, and lack is declared to be the leader of the > Aeolists, who expound their doctrines through 'wind', from Aeolus, Greek god of the winds. The satire is essentially an attack on the 'windiness' that Swift discerned in the more pretentious philosophical and religious teaching of his time.

Tale of Two Cities, A (1859)

A novel by ➤ Charles Dickens. The cities are London and Paris, and the tale is a ➤ romance of the French Revolution (1789-94). The hero is a young French nobleman, Charles Darnay, who has renounced his status as nephew of the Marquis de St Evrémonde from hatred of the pre-revolutionary aristocratic oppression, exemplified by his uncle. He marries the daughter of Dr Manette, who at the beginning of the novel has just been released from the Paris prison of the Bastille, where he was confined eighteen years before by the secret influence of the Marquis. Darnay, owing to his aristocratic descent, nearly falls victim to the Terror (a period in the French Revolution when many people were executed without trial), but he is saved by the dissolute Englishman, Sydney Carton, who redeems himself by sacrificing his life for Darnay; this is made possible because Carton and Darnay exactly resemble each other, so that the former is able to substitute himself for the latter. The novel is notable for its scenes of revolutionary violence, for which Dickens was indebted to > Thomas Carlyle's History of the French Revolution (1837). The revolutionaries Monsieur and Madame Defarge, and the English body-snatcher Jerry Cruncher, who makes a living by stealing corpses and selling them for medical dissection, are memorable characters.

Taliesin

A Welsh poet of the 6th century AD whose Welsh name translates as 'bright brow'. Various poems are attributed to him, of which the tales of Urien and Owain (in the legends of ➤ King Arthur called Ryence and Yvain) may be genuine. Taliesin is a half-legendary figure. ➤ Thomas Love Peacock introduces him into his parody of Arthurian romance, The Misfortunes of Elphin (1829), and ➤ Tennyson includes him as one of the Knights of the Round Table in his ➤ Idylls of the King (1859–72).

Tam O'Shanter (1791)

A poem by ➤ Robert Burns in Lowland Scots dialect. Tam, a drunken farmer, riding home late at night, passes 'Aloway's old haunted Kirk' which he sees lighted up. He creeps nearer to find witches and warlocks dancing to the tune of the bagpipes played by Old Nick. He admires one of the prettiest of the witches and in his excitement cries out: 'Weel done, cutty-sark!' ('short-shirt'). The witches come rushing after him, but he is able to reach the middle of the bridge over the River Doon, beyond which they cannot follow him, though they wrench off his horse's tail. The work shows an effortless adaptation of the mock heroic (▷ heroic, mock) pentameter ▷ couplet to the vigorous and earthy Scots language.

Tamburlaine the Great, Parts I and II
Two dramas in ▷ blank verse by ▷ Christopher Marlowe, published in 1590. The subject is the Mariowe, published in 1590. The subject is the life of the 14th-century central Asian Timur, who by his conquests rose from obscurity to become one of the most powerful men in Asia. A life of Timur by Pedro Mazia was translated into English and published in 1571.

Part I is a drama of conquest. Tamburlaine is an obscure shepherd chieftain who defeats Mycetes, king of Persia, and subsequently the king's brother, Cosroe, as well. He is next victorious over Bajazet, Emperor of Turkey, and finally captures Damascus from the Soldan (Sultan) of Egypt. His victories are a triumph of immense natural energy and ruthlessness over equally cruel but weak and decadent civilizations. However, Tamburlaine's barbarity is not merely brutish - he worships the potentialities of the human mind, and he falls passionately in love with his bride, Zenocrate, the daughter of the Soldan. Tamburlaine is, in fact, a product of Marlowe's characteristically > Renaissance imagination, fascinated by the earthly magnificence available to men of imaginative power who have the energy of their convictions. The play is essentially non-moral; Tamburlaine is not judged, but presented as though he were a natural force.

Part II was probably written in consequence of the success of Part I, rather than foreseen as a sequel, though critics differ in their opinions about this. Tamburlaine is forced to face the truth that although he feels his energies to be inexhaustible, he cannot triumph over death—first that of Zenocrate, and then his own. This play is, therefore, a tragedy, that man feels himself to be infinite but is nonetheless mortal.

The plays are a most important advance in the use of blank verse as a medium of drama. Hitherto it had been used stiffly and unimaginatively; Marlowe, in these plays, made blank verse eloquent for the first time.

Taming of the Shrew, The

An early comedy by ▷ Shakespeare; probably written 1593-4, and first published in the First Folio of 1623. It may be partly a recasting of an anonymous play, The Taming of a Shrew (of uncertain date), and both are based on ▷ George Gascoigne's comedy Supposes (1566), itself a translation from the Italian of Ariosto's Suppositi (1509).

In a prologue of 'induction', a drunken tinker, Chistopher Sly, is subjected to a practical joke: a nobleman picks him up in his stupor, brings him to his mansion, and causes his servants to explain to him that he is himself a great lord who has for some time been out of his wits. The play is then performed by the nobleman's actors for Sly's benefit. The scene is Verona, and the plot concerns the successful attempts of a gentleman, Petruchio, to tame into obedience and love the wilful and ferocious Katharina, thought to be unmarriageable because of her shrewishness. A subplot concerns the courting of Katharina's sister, Bianca, by Lucentio (who is successful) and by Hortensio, who marries a widow instead. At a feast that concludes the play, Petruchio proves that he has, after all, the most affectionate and docile wife of the three. The play is essentially a comedy of situation, and may be regarded as one of several experiments in different kinds of comic form by Shakespeare in the years 1592-95. However, due to Katharina's complete submission in the closing scene, it has become problematic in 20th-century stage productions and for feminist criticism.

Duerelle des Femmes.

Tarlton, Richard (d 1588)

A famous comic actor, mentioned in 1583 as one of the Queen's Players, and a favourite clown of > Elizabeth I. He dressed as a rustic ('a clown' was originally a term for a simple-witted country peasant) and was gifted at composing the rough, comic kind of verse known as 'doggerel'; he popularized on the London stage the mixture of song and dance, something like light opera, called country jigs. He wrote a comedy, The Seven Deadly Sins, for the Queen's Players, and after his death a number of volumes of popular humour - not necessarily his - were published under the title of Tarlton's Jests. He was one of the first actors to become a national figure. He was probably an innkeeper before he became an actor.

Task, The (1785)

A long ➤ blank-verse poem by ➤ William Cowper, combining ➤ mock heroic with ➤ Georgic and ➤ sentimental elements. It begins in heavily ➤ Miltonic vein with an account of the history of Cowper's own sofa. Later passages concern the joys of rural retirement, gardening, the peculiarities of various local characters, and the moral and religious corruptions of the day, which are condemned at great length. The poem manages to achieve a distinctive and engaging tone, despite the miscellaneousness of its literary elements, and its simplicity of diction foreshadows that of ➤ William Wordsworth in ➤ Lyrical Ballads.

Tasso, Torquato (1544–95)
Italian poet. He continued the tradition of the romance ▷ epic, already made famous by ▷ Ludovico Ariosto's ▷ Orlando Furioso (1532), in his two major works, Rinaldo (1562) and Jerusalem Delivered (1581). Tasso's imagination was romantic but in his literary ideal he was > classical, and the thought of the second poem is elevated by the high seriousness of the Catholic > Counter-Reformation. His seriousness made his work very attractive to the English romance epic poet ➤ Edmund Spenser, whose very Protestant ▷ The Faerie Queene is also an attempt to rival Ariosto by a poem of similar form but imbued with strong religious feeling. Tasso's impress is strong on parts of The Faerie Queene, especially in its > Platonism. Jerusalem Delivered was finely translated by Sir Edward Fairfax and published under the title of Godfrey of Bulloigne or the Recovery of Jerusalem in 1600.

Tasso was locked up for insanity by Alphonso II, Prince of Ferrara, between 1579–86; subsequent legend attributed his imprisonment to a love affair with the Princess Leonara d'Este.

Taste

The 18th century saw the development of 'taste' as an ideal, accompanying the growth and spread of wealth among the middle and upper classes. Among the nouveaux-riches especially, good taste seemed to demonstrate good breeding, creating a distance between the person of good taste, and the class from which he or she might have come. Thus, by expressing taste, they could appear to overcome any deficiencies of birth.

Discussions of taste grew partly out of a philosophical concern to identify universal aesthetic criteria. Thinkers including ➤ Hutcheson and ➤ Hume believed in ideal standards of taste, although they did not agree about what these were. Addison, in > The Spectator in 1712, likened 'mental taste' to taste of the palate. He also defined taste as 'that faculty of the soul which discerns the beauties of an author with pleasure, and the imperfections with dislike', implying that beauties and imperfections existed in and of themselves, and taste was only a matter of being able to recognize them for what they were. Later in the century, however, more subjective criteria were applied, as when a reviewer in the > Gentleman's Magazine in 1767 commented that 'in questions of taste . . . everyone must determine for himself'.

Yardsticks of taste could be applied to almost any sphere of life that lends itself to consumption, including art and literature as well as goods. But a persistent view of 18th-century taste strongly associates it with new appetites for consumer durables, including fashionable houses, furniture, household effects, paintings, sculptures, clothes, jewellery and other possessions. A growing breed of professional designers, such as ➤ Robert Adam, ➤ Thomas Sheraton and ➤ Josiah Wedgwood, catered to such demands. Taste is also associated with codes of behaviour, such as gentility and displays of ➤ sensibility in order to demonstrate fine feeling. Good taste was thought by many to be a guide to character, so that fine taste in fashion and moral refinement went hand in hand. Tate Gallery, The

A public gallery for modern paintings and sculpture on the north bank of the Thames in London. It was established by a sugar-merchant, Sir Henry Tate, and opened in 1897. A 'Tate of the North' opened in Liverpool's Albert Dock in 1989; a 'Tate of the West', based on the work of the St Ives school of modern British painting, opened in Cornwall in 1993.

Tate, Nahum (1652-1715)

Educated in Dublin. He assisted ➤ John Dryden with the second part of ➤ Absalom and Achitophel, and wrote the libretto of ➤ Purcell's opera Dido and Aeneas (performed 1689). His metrical version of the psalms, written with Nicholas Brady, appeared in 1696, and his revised version of King Lear, with a happy ending, was that performed through most of the succeeding century. His Panacaea – a Poem on Tea appeared in 1700.

Tatler, The

A periodical published three times a week, between 1709 and 1711, by the ➤ Whig author and editor > Richard Steele. It contained → essays and → reviews on topical issues, including politics, entertainment, and fashionable gossip, at first supposedly emanating from the popular chocolate and > coffee-houses of the day. Most of these were written by Steele himself, others by > Joseph Addison. Steele borrowed from > Swift the name 'Isaac Bickerstaffe' as his editorial pseudonym, and became for a time the chronicler and even arbiter of > taste. Increasingly moral issues, such as the evils of drinking and of ▷ duelling, were discussed. In 1711 the Tatler was succeeded by ➤ The Spectator.

Taylor, C. P. (Cecil) (1929-81)

Dramatist. Born in Glasgow, but long time resident in the Northeast, Taylor wrote some fifty plays for virtually every type of theatre – from the local village to the West End, via community theatre, television and the > RSC. Much of his work, from his first play to his last, included music, and his wry imagination and capacity for what > Brecht called 'complex seeing' is exemplified in Ophelia (1977), which is Hamlet from Ophelia's viewpoint, or Withdrawal Symptoms (1978) which parallels its heroine's drug withdrawal treatment with the pangs of withdrawal from empire. > J. M. Barrie was the inspiration for Peter Pan Man (1979) and Peter Pan and Emily (1977) in which Peter Pan becomes involved with a Newcastle workingclass family. It is typical of the paradoxical nature of Taylor's career, and of the split in theatre-going audiences, that the majority of those who went to see Harry Secombe in the retitled The Plummer's Progress (1974, an adaptation of Carl Sternheim's Schippi) and the majority of those who went to see Good (1981) would have been extremely unlikely to recognise him as the author of both plays.

Taylor, Harriet (1807-58)

Writer, philosopher and poet and leading light of the early > feminist movement. Her friends included > Harriet Martineau, > Sarah Flower Adams and later > John Stuart Mill, whom she eventually married after an extended friendship. It was Taylor who influenced Mill's views on female emancipation and the political education of the working classes; all his work from 1840 onwards including The Principles of Political Economy (1848) and > On Liberty (1859) was written in collaboration with her. She is best remembered for her eloquent essay 'The Enfranchisment of Women' published in the > Westminister Review in 1851. Bib: Hayek, F.A., John Stuart Mill and Harriet Taylor.

Taylor, Jeremy (1613-67)

Clergyman and religious writer. He was one of the representatives of Anglicanism in its most flourishing period, and his career shows the vicissitudes of the > Church of England in the 17th century. The son of a barber, he was educated at a Cambridge grammar school and in the University of Cambridge. His talent for preaching attracted the favour of ➤ Archbishop Laud, to whom (and to ➤ King Charles I) he became chaplain. In 1645 he was captured by Parliamentary troops, and until 1660, while the Church of England was in abeyance, he was private chaplain to the Earl of Carbery. It was during this period that he wrote much of his best work. Later, he was made Bishop of Dromore in Ireland, where, contrary to his inclination, he was obliged to discipline clergy hostile to the Anglican establishment. He thus stands in contrast to his former patron, the authoritarian Archbishop Laud, and the change marks not merely a difference in personalities but the growth of the spirit of Anglican tolerance in the later 17th century. His A Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying (1646) was a plea for religious toleration; his other outstanding works were his The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living (1650) and The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying (1651).

Taylor, John (c 1580-1653) Poet and miscellanist. John Taylor was apprenticed, in early life, to a London waterman (ferryman). He enlisted in the Navy, making several voyages, and then returned to London to ply his trade as a waterman. Hence he became known as 'The Water Poet'. Taylor was an extraordinarily prolific writer. His large collected edition - All the Works of John Taylor the Water Poet (1630) - though it contains over 60 separate works, does not begin to represent his complete oeuvre. Almost any topic attracted his attention, and almost every topic did. He was famous for proposing preposterously difficult travel-projects, such as travelling from London to Edinburgh and back without spending any money, or rowing a paper boat. On the strength of these proposals, he would solicit subscriptions from the curious, who would then read his accounts of his difficulties and dangers. His death followed his last trip from London to Gravesend and back: a journey made all the more difficult by the fact of his being lame.

Bib: Notestein, W., Four Worthies.

Dramatist, editor and critic, Taylor was born in Sunderland the son of a self-educated farmer turned brewer. He attended Glasgow University and was made a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. He became a professor of English literature at University College, London from 1845-7 and also practised briefly as a barrister before taking up a position in the Health Department where he remained for twenty vears. From 1874 until his death in 1880 he was editor of ▶ Punch magazine. He was also an enthusiastic amateur actor. In addition he wrote 80 plays, leading articles for ⊳ newspapers such as ➤ The Morning Chronicle and The Daily News and was an art critic for The Times and The Graphic as well as contributing regularly to Punch. He was the resident dramatist at the Olympic Theatre (1853-60) and the Haymarket (1857-70). His dramatic styles included farce, pantomine, historical verse drama and comedy, but he excelled in ➤ melodramas such as Plot and Passion (with John Lang, 1853) and The Ticket-of-Leave Man (1863). His comic plays, including Masks and Faces (with ▷ Charles Reade, 1852), To Oblige Benson (1854), The Overland Route (1860) and New Men and Old Acres (with A.W. Dubourg, 1869), also contain a degree of social perception. In addition to tempering melodrama with ▷ realism, Taylor's The Ticket-of-Leave Man (1863) focuses on the rehabilitation of ex-criminals and presents an accurate picture of lower middle-class culture. Others, including Birth (1870), rework his favourite themes of class-prejudice and the conflict between industrialists and the landed aristocracy.

Tel Quel

A magazine, for many years the leading French avant-garde journal. Its name was taken from a work by Paul Valéry (1871-1945) and it was edited by Philippe Sollers (b 1936), novelist, theorist and husband of the feminist writer, Julia Kristeva. In political terms, the magazine's sympathies were Marxist-Leninist-Maoist. It welcomed the student demonstrations of May 1068 with an issue entitled 'The Revolution, here and now' and its programme for a French 'Cultural Revolution' was backed by figures such as the composer Pierre Boulez (b 1925) and the novelist and theoretician Jean Ricardou (b 1932). Tel Quel provided a forum for left-wing intellectuals and gave rise to the Tel Quel group. Their joint publication, Théorie d'ensemble (1968), contained inter alia > Jacques Derrida's essay 'La Différance', ➤ Michel Foucault's piece 'Distance, aspect, origine' (discussing Alain Robbe-Grillet and Sollers) and ➤ Roland Barthes' 'Drame, poème, roman' (on Sollers). Alongside its support for radical political and theoretical positions, the magazine did much to promote the cause of a literary counter-orthodoxy, represented by > Sade, > Lautréamont, George Bataille and Robbe-Grillet.

In the late 1970s, Tel Quel began to lose its radical impetus. Sollers renounced his theoretical persuasions, sympathised with the right-wing group, ▷ Les Nouveaux Philosophes, and embraced ▷ Catholicism. From 1982, the magazine changed its name to L'Infini and found itself a new publisher.

Tempest, The (1611)

A play by ▷ Shakespeare probably written in 1611, and regarded by some as the last completely by his own hand. The plot does not derive from any known principal source. The setting of the island with its aboriginal inhabitant Caliban, and the shipwreck with which the play opens, owe details to travel books of the time, especially a ▷ pamphlet by Sir George Somers (1609) about his voyage to and shipwreck on the Bermudas.

Prospero, Duke of Milan, with his daughter Miranda, has been expelled from his duchy, where he had avoided the task of government for the sake of devoting himself to secret learning, by his wicked brother, Antonio. At the opening of the play Prospero and Miranda have lived on a lonely island for many years, served by the brutish savage Caliban and the sprite Ariel. By his magic powers, Prospero contrives the shipwreck on the island of his enemies - his brother Antonio, Alonso, King of Naples, who had conspired with Antonio, Alonso's wicked brother Sebastian and a few courtiers. Also shipwrecked, but separated from the others, is Ferdinand, the virtuous son of Alonso; each believes the other to be drowned. The situation is such that Prospero, if he wishes, can use his supernatural powers to execute vengeance on his enemies; instead he uses it to bring about reconciliation and forgiveness. Ferdinand, after a brief trial in which he is subjected to austere labours, is united with Miranda. Alonso's company is also subjected to trials, but finally reunited with Ferdinand and reconciled to Prospero, who discloses himself. A subplot concerns the farcical attempt of Trinculo and Stephano, Alonso's servants, to rob Prospero of his instruments of magic, with the aid of Caliban

The play is the most symbolic of Sheakespeare's plays. Prospero is in the tradition of the > Platonic mage, who, according to one line of ➤ Renaissance thought, could achieve extraordinary power by uniting exceptional wisdom with exceptional virtue. Miranda unites the innocence of nature with the nobility of high breed; her union with Ferdinand and their restoration to a corrupt world symbolize the renewal of vital forces. Caliban, on the other hand, represents the unredeemably brutal side of nature, and also the inherently vicious propensities of the body: he can be forced to serve, but he cannot be elevated. The other characters represent degrees of redeemability: the 'good old lord' Gonzalo has always been virtuous though he has been made to serve evil ends; Alonso has done evil but is capable of repentance; Antonio and Sebastian do not repent and can only be intimidated; the rest are merely passive and, in Antonio's words, 'take suggestion as a cat laps milk'.

The Tempest is the last of the four plays sometimes called > romances, the others being > Pericles, > Cymbeline, > The Winter's Tale. An interesting feature of it is that while the other plays in the group are very loosely constructed in terms of time and place, The Tempest has the greatest unity in these respects of all Shakespeare's plays: the action is restricted to the island, and occupies only three hours.

Temple, Dorothy

> Osborne, Dorothy; Temple, Sir William.

Temple, Laura Sophia (1763-c 1820) Poet. A neglected writer whose work was admired at the time (for example, by > Coleridge) and whose poetry marks her out as central to the ➤ Romantic tradition. Three collections remain extant: Poems (1805), Lyric and Other Poems (1808) and The Siege of Zaragoza and Other Poems (1812). She and her husband became destitute towards 1820 and they appealed to the Royal Literary Fund for support, but nothing is known of them after this date. The request mentions another long poem in manuscript, but this has been lost. Temple used a wide range of forms, including > ballads, > sonnets, > lyrics, and the > dramatic monologue, and her subject matter was fittingly Romantic, in that she focused on ⊳ nature, temporality, and the power of poetry, with occasional excursions into ⊳ orientalism.

Temple, Sir William (1628-99)

Statesman, diplomatist, essayist. In English literature Temple is especially known as the patron of > Jonathan Swift, who lived at his house (Moor Park) as his secretary from 1689 to 1694, and again from 1696 till Temple's death. Temple's most famous > essay was his contribution to the controversy about the relative merits of ancient (ie Greek and Latin) and modern literature. Entitled Of Ancient and Modern Learning, it praised the Letters of Phalaris as a notable example of ancient work. Unfortunately the great scholar > Bentley exposed the Letters as a forgery. Temple's embarrassment provoked Swift to come to his aid with his first notable essay, > The Battle of the Books. Temple was a model of the cultivated aristocracy of his time, and his essays (chiefly on political matters) were regarded as setting standards for correctness and elegance of expression. His wife was > Dorothy Osborne and her letters (▷ A letter writing) to him before their marriage (in 1655) were first published in 1888; her position resembled that of ➤ Samuel Richardson's heroine in his novel > Clarissa, inasmuch as her parents were opposed to the marriage. Tenant of Wildfell Hall, The (1848)

Woodbridge.

A novel by ▷ Anne Brontë, first published under the ▷ pseudonym Acton Bell. The tenant of the title is Helen Graham, who has recently moved into the neighbourhood with her son, Arthur. The narrator, Gilbert Markham, falls in love with her, but is puzzled by her relationship with her landlord, Lawrence. Markham ignores the village rumours until he overhears Helen and Lawrence in intimate conversation, after which he assaults Lawrence. Helen reveals the story of her past in a lengthy journal which tells of her unfortunate marriage to Arthur Huntingdon, who, after a short period of happiness with Helen, slipped back into a life of drunkenness and infidelity. It is revealed that Helen has left Arthur to seek refuge with Lawrence, who is in fact her brother. She later returns to Arthur to nurse him through a fatal illness. After his death, Markham and Helen are able to pursue their relationship, and finally agree to marry. The novel was received as a morbid story, especially since it came from a woman's pen. Anne Brontë's comment in the Preface to the 1850 edition highlights the double standards imposed on women writers: 'I am at a loss to conceive how a man should permit himself to write anything that would be really disgraceful to a woman, or why a woman should be censured for writing anything that would be proper and becoming for a man.'

Tennant, Emma (b 1937)

Novelist. Her work combines a > feminist perspective with a > postmodernist use of allusion, parody, and fantasy, and in these respects has some affinity with that of ➤ Angela Carter. The Time of the Crack (1973) and The Last of the Country House Murders (1974) are both set in the future; the former is an apocalyptic satire, while the latter is a black comedy which parodies country house detective fiction. The Bad Sister (1978) satirizes the divisive effect upon women of social roles and expectations: the heroine finds herself inhabited by a demented other self, and the book itself is split between a prosaic account of contemporary society and a realm of dreams and fantasy. The expression of feminist revolt through a disturbed mental state has antecedents in The Golden Notebook by Doris Lessing, and in the work of ▷ Virginia Woolf. Tennant's other novels are: The Colour of Rain (1964); Hotel de Dream (1976); Wild Nights (1979); Alice Fell (1980); Queen of Stones (1982); Woman Beware Woman (1983); Black Marina (1985); The Adventures of Robina, by Herself (1986); The House of Hospitalities (1987).

Tennyson, Alfred (1809-92)

Poet, usually known, after he was made a baron in 1884, as Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Fourth of twelve children (two others of whom, Frederick and Charles, were also poets) of a Church of England clergyman. The family was long established among Lincolnshire landowners, but the poet's father had been disinherited by his grandfather, and Alfred's childhood and youth were spent in comparative poverty; he was partly educated by his father but later he went to Trinity College, Cambridge. Tennyson's family background does not conform to the 20thcentury ideal of the family in the 19th century. His father was a violent alcoholic rector, his mother was distressed and wretched, two of his brothers became insane and a third was also an alcoholic. Images of mental illness, doubt and conflict thus naturally fracture Tennyson's work, especially the most interesting and intense poems. His earliest work (Poems by Two Brothers, in which his brother collaborated) is unimportant, and he did not begin to win fame until the 1840s. Thereafter he achieved popularity unequalled by any other English poet in his own lifetime. In 1850 he was made Poet Laureate (in succession to William Wordsworth, 1770-1850) and in 1884 he was made a Baron - the only English poet ever to have been ennobled purely for his poetry. This popularity arose from two facts: he had, on the one hand, exquisite poetic skill; he was, on the other hand, in his mental and emotional outlook, very representative of his age. He had a characteristically Victorian insular patriotism; he was both exhilarated and disturbed, like so many of his contemporaries, by the social and industrial changes of the age, and he was distressed by the shaking of traditional religious beliefs by the scientists - in his youth, the geologist ➤ Charles Lyell (The Principles of Geology, 1830-33), and in his middle age, the biologist > Charles Darwin (The Origin of Species, 1859). He countered this threat from the intellect by an emotional, sometimes sentimental, idealism which was extremely acceptable to the middle-class reading public. His idiom was that of the > Romantics - Wordsworth, Shelley (1792-1822), and especially Keats (1795-1821) but his formal technique was as meticulous as that of the 18th century poets; the combination was both beguiling and reassuring. Physically and in his dress, he was imposing and romantic, and with this appearance he typified the poet for the nation.

The first three books of his sole authorship (1830, 1832, 1842) include much of what is now considered his best, most disturbing and challenging work - eg Mariana, > 'The Lady of Shalott', Ulysses, > Morte d'Arthur, > The Lotos-Eaters. In 1833 his great friend, Arthur Hallam, died, and the great grief of this loss produced the series of elegies which are usually considered to be his masterpiece > In Memoriam A.H.H., eventually published in 1850. Oucen Victoria declared that she valued it next to the Bible; however, it was the mixture of picturesque Romanticism and acceptable idealism in ➤ The Princess (1850) which greatly extended Tennyson's popularity with the general public. In 1852 he produced the most impressive of his public poems, Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, and in 1854, the most popular of English patriotic poems, the ➤ Charge of the Light Brigade. ➤ Maud (1854) is one of the most singular of his works, evoking mentally deranged states, and written at the time of the Crimean War.

Other works: his immensely popular cycle of tales, \triangleright Idylls of the King (1859–72); dialect poems, eg The Northern Farmer (1864); narrative, in the tradition of Wordsworth, \triangleright 'Enoch Arden' (1864); \triangleright ballads, notably The Revenge (1880), and a number of verse dramas, of which the most successful is Becket (1884).

Taste in the early 20th century on the whole turned against his poetry; the accusation of one of his earliest critics, > John Stuart Mill, (reviewing the 1832 volume) that Tennyson's poetry is deficient in power of thought anticipated modern opinion, which has been until recently, attuned to T.S. Eliot (1888-1965) and the 17th-century Metaphysical poets. It was still admitted that he had an extraordinary ear for cadence and rhythm, but it was implied that this virtue did not compensate for the mediocrity of his intelligence. However, this tribute to his 'fine ear' amounted to acknowledgement that Tennyson was a fine artist. His first three books and In Memoriam contain poems in which some of the deeper emotional conflicts of his time are beautifully articulated. In recent years readings of Victorian poetry have freed themselves from modernist valuations, and Tennyson's work has been re-read with interest for its strong acknowledgement and analysis of problematic areas of psychic and social existence; questions of mental health, the role of women, war and economic conditions.

Terence (Publius Terentius Afer), (? 190 – ? 150 BC)

Latin dramatist. His six comedies are adaptations of older Greek comedies, especially those of Menander (342-291 BC). They have been praised for the purity of their Latin and criticized for their deficiency of comic power. They were known, read and imitated throughout the Middle Ages and afterwards, eg his Heautontimorumenos (163) was adapted by ➤ Chapman into All Fools (1605), and his Andria (166) was adapted by Steele into The Conscious Lovers (1722). Other dramatists such as ➤ Ben Jonson used some of his themes and his comic devices such as the role of the crafty slave (eg in > Volpone). The time-act structure apparent in Terence's comedies eventually came to be the model for publication of plays in England, though it is debatable how much influence it ever had on their composition and production.

Terror, The (Reign of)

The period in the > French Revolution from June 1793 to July 1794 under the dictatorship of Robespierre, when many people were executed without trial merely because they were suspected of opposition to the Revolution. The term has since been applied to similar regimes in other periods and countries.

Terza rima

The pattern used by the Italian poet ▷ Dante in his long poem the ▷ Divine Comedy. Each line is of 11 syllables, the last syllable unaccented, and the rhyme scheme follows the pattern aba beb edc ded etc. Examples in English are rare, and consist of 10-syllable lines. One reason for the scarce use of terza rima in English is the paucity of rhyming words in the language, by comparison with Italian. The form was first used in English by ▷ Thomas Wyatt in his Satires and paraphrases of the ▷ Psalms, an example from which follows:

My Poyntz, I cannot frame my tune to feign, To cloak the truth for praise without desert Of them that list all vice for to retain. I cannot honour them that sets their part With Venus and Bacchus all their life long; Nor hold my peace of them, although I smart.

Sir Thomas Wyatt, 'Of the courtier's life, written to John Poyntz'.

In the ▷ Romantic period ▷ Shelley used the form with great success in his long poem The Triumph of Life, unfinished at his death in 1822.

Tess of the D'Urbervilles, A Pure Woman (1891) A novel by > Thomas Hardy. The heroine is Tess Durbeyfield, daughter of a poor westcountry peasant who learns that he may be a descendant of the aristocratic D'Urbervilles. The novel is about her tragic predicament between her brutal seducer, Alec Stoke D'Urberville, and her husband Angel Clare. Both Alec and Angel are intruders into Tess's environment; Alec (who has no proper title to his aristocratic surname) is the son of a northcountry businessman who has bought his way into the class of gentry; Angel is the son of a conventional clergyman and has dissociated himself from his background by acquiring vague liberal ideas. When Tess confesses to him her seduction, his old-fashioned prejudices overcome him and he casts her off, repenting when it is too late. Forsaken by her husband, Tess is faced by renewed assaults from Alec, whom she eventually murders. After a period of hiding with Angel, Tess is tried, condemned and executed for murder. The finest passages of the book are the episodes set in the peaceful environment of Talbothays Dairy Farm, where Tess meets Alec, and the grim surroundings of Flintcomb Ash, where she works when Angel has forsaken her. Tess is represented as the victim of cruel chance – an example of Hardy's belief that the world is governed by ironical fate – but as usual in his work it is the intruders who are the instruments of the destructive force.

Testament of Cresseid, The

A poem by ➤ Robert Henryson (late 15th century), which provides an ending to Criseyde's story. In ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Troilus and Criseyde, there is little account of Criseyde's life in the Greek camp, after her affair with Diomede has begun: the narrative focus in Book V is on ➤ Troilus' history and his end. However, the old narrator of Henryson's poem, who finds his pleasures in books, discovers another 'quair' (book) containing 'the fatall destenie/Of fair Cresseid, that endit wretchitlie' (61–2).

The contents of that 'quair' form the substance of Henryson's poem, which relates how Cresseid is abandoned by Diomede, is stricken with leprosy and has a final meeting with Troilus, in which neither wholly recognizes the other. Something about the leper's glance triggers a memory of Cresseid for Troilus (and he throws her a purse of money) but Cresseid does not discover the identity of her generous patron until he has left. She has time only to compose a testament (a will), leaving a ring to Troilus, before she dies.

The poem is a consummate exercise in the art of abbreviation: it is only 616 lines long and contains a collection of short poetic forms, being called a 'ballet' and encompassing a visionary sequence (in which the classical gods descend to judge Cresseid), two formal complaints and an epitaph. The significance of Cresseid's affliction with leprosy is open to a number of interpretations, and in the poem final endings and definitive judgements about Cresseid are juxtaposed with speculation and hearsay about her life and death. The Testament does not end Cresseid's life as a narrative subject. Although Henryson's poem disrupts rather than continues Chaucer's text, it was printed in the 1532 edition of Chaucer's work as if it formed the sixth book of Troilus and Criseyde: thus it was well known to subsequent readers of Chaucer's work, including > Shakespeare. > Troy.

Text

The word text is employed in several specific ways alongside a general, rather modish use to refer to pieces of literary writing and some other kinds of cultural production (e.g. 'filmic text').

1 It is used to refer expressly to the words on the page as distinct from any interpretation that might be given of them in processes of 'close reading' (> Practical Criticism).

2 In textual editing, it indicates a particular version of the work when there are textual variants.

3 Finally, in ▷ poststructuralist theory, particularly that of ▷ Roland Barthes, text is opposed to work. Barthes' distinction here is similar to the one he made between ▷ writerly and readerly. The writerly text is adventurous, plural, open, surprising and ▷ avant-garde; it is where ▷ écriture is to be found. The work, however, is closed (▷ closure), stereotyped, un-demanding and captive to mundane representations.

Thackeray, William Makepeace (1811-63) Novelist. He had a conventional upper-class education at a public school - Charterhouse and Cambridge University, which he left in 1830 without taking a degree. For the next sixteen years he worked as a comic illustrator and journalist, writing satirically humorous studies of London manners in The Yellowplush Correspondence (> Fraser's Magazine 1837-8), and Snob Papers (> Punch 1846-7) - later published as ➤ The Book of Snobs; parodies of the contemporary fashion for the criminalhero (Catherine, 1839, and ▷ Barry Lyndon, 1844); humorous travel books (The Paris Sketch-Book and The Irish Sketch-Book, 1840 and 1843), tales of humour and pathos (The Great Hoggarty Diamond, 1841).

His first major novel, ▶ Vanity Fair, came out in the year 1848 (it was published serially, as were most of his novels, and the date given is that of completion); it was a social panorama of the English upper-middle classes, satirizing their heartlessness and pretentiousness at the height of their prosperity; it was followed by novels in a similar field: > Pendennis (1850), and > The Newcomes (1853-5). > Henry Esmond (1852) is an historical novel set in the reign of Queen Anne (1702-14) and represents Thackeray's strong taste for the 18th century; The Virginians (1859) is its sequel in 18thcentury England and North America. The same taste for 18th-century England is expressed in his historical lectures, The Four Georges, published in 1860. In 1855 he published his comic-romantic > children's story, The Rose and the Ring. In 1860 he became editor of the famous > Cornhill Magazine, and contributed to it > The Adventures of Philip (1861-2), his essays Roundabout Papers and the novel, unfinished at his death, Denis Duval.

Thackeray was once considered the great counterpart to ▷ Charles Dickens in the mid-Victorian novel (the years 1850–70). Dickens conveyed a panorama of the lower half of society and Thackeray of the upper half; both were great humorists, with a strong bent for satire and a capacity for social indignation. Thackeray is now chiefly remembered for Vanity Fair. His imaginative intensity is seen to be less than that of Dickens and the sentimentality with which he counterbalanced his satire is the more conspicuous. Like Dickens, he opposed the > utilitarianism of his age by an appeal to spontaneous affection and he tried to counterbalance it by an appeal to 18thcentury proportion and elegance, but he also felt impulses of ▷ Romanticism, which in Dickens are far more uninhibited. Theatre of Cruelty

A style of theatre developing out of the work of ➤ Antonin Artaud, introduced to English audiences in 1964 by a 'Theatre of Cruelty' season at the LAMDA Theatre arranged by > Peter Brook and Charles Marowitz. These experiments were developed in Brook's productions of Peter Ulrich Weiss's Marat/Sade in 1964 and the improvised play US in 1966. Theatre of Cruelty aims to shock the audience out of its complacency and restricted conventional behaviour into an awareness of the primitive forces within human nature. To do this it requires a committedly non-rationalistic approach to acting. Bib: Artaud, A., The Theatre and its Double; Stvan, J. L., The Dark Comedy.

Theatre of the Absurd

A name given by the critic Martin Esslin to describe the work of a number of dramatists, including lonesco, Genet, ▷ Beckett and ▷ Pinter. These and other authors do not belong to any 'school' as such but their plays often have in common the sense that human existence is without meaning. The idea is reflected in the form as well as the content of the plays, by the rejection of logical construction, and the creation of meaningless speeches and silences. Such devices helped to develop new forms of theatre during the 1950s and 60s no longer reliant on outmoded dramatic conventions. Bib: Esslin, M., The Theatre of the Absurd.

Theatres

No special buildings were erected in England for dramatic performances until late in the 16th century. The earliest form of regular drama in England was the ▷ Mystery Plays, which began as interpolations in religious ritual in the churches. By the 15th century these plays were being performed at religious festivals in towns on movable stages or ▷ pageants, conveyed from point to point on wagons. In country districts at seasonal festivals such as ➤ May Day, primitive dramas of pagan origin – jigs, May games, Morris dances – were performed in the open air. The absence of theatres did not indicate scarcity of drama, but its wide pervasion of ordinary life.

Secular dramas of entertainment, such as we know today, grew up in the 16th century; they were performed in the courtvards of inns and in the great halls of country mansions, royal palaces, Oxford and Cambridge colleges, and the ≥ inns of court of London. The performers were professional actors who were usually incorporated in companies attached to noble or royal households, but by degrees this attachment became increasingly nominal, and actors required places where they could work independently and permanently. Hence the first playhouse, known as The Theatre, was erected by ⊳ James Burbage in Shoreditch outside the City of London, in 1576-7. It was followed by many others, including the ▶ Globe (1598) which is the most famous owing to its association with Shakespeare. None of these theatres survived the middle of the 17th century, but a contemporary sketch of one of them (The Swan) exists, and there is a detailed description in the contract for the Fortune (1600).

The designs owe nothing to those of ancient Greece and Rome (unlike contemporary Italian theatres) but seem to be based on a mixture of the typical inn-yard and the bear-pits, ie the arenas for fights between animals. The structures were usually of wood, and round or hexagonal, though they might be rectangular. The centre was an arena exposed to the open air, where the poorer spectators stood; the richer ones sat in galleries surrounding the arena. The stage was probably divided into two or three parts; the main ('apron') stage projected into the arena, so that spectators surrounded it on three sides. The wall at the back of this stage was flanked by doors for exits and entries, between which there was probably a rear stage, though the sketch of the Swan does not include this. Above the rear stage there was probably an upper stage (to represent eg a castle wall); above this again, possibly a musicians' gallery. A canopy may have extended partly across the apron stage. The projection of the apron stage upon which spectators sometimes actually sat shows that the theatre of Shakespeare's day was not adapted to convey illusion like the typical modern theatre; scenery was scarcely used, though 'props' (ie thrones, objects representing flowery banks, etc.) were brought on and off.

Such were the 'public theatres'; there were also 'private theatres' such as the Blackfriars which came into the hands of Shakespeare's company in 1608. Pictures or accounts of these do not survive, but they were roofed, probably used some kind of artificial lighting, and may have provided more opportunity for scenery.

Scenic spectacle was certainly not unknown or despised by Shakespeare's contemporaries; in the reign of ▷ James I there was a pronounced fashion for ▷ masques, an early form of opera, in which a poet such as ▷ Ben Jonson and a designer such as ▷ Inigo Jones collaborated.

It was only after the Restoration of the Monarchy in 1660 that the theatre began to assume its modern shape, with a proscenium arch dividing the audience from the stage, thus providing greater scope for scenery and illusion. One of the earliest English theatres of this style was ➤ Drury Lane, which had already been a theatre in the reign of James I and was rebuilt in 1662. From this time the theatre became the special entertainment for the middle and upper classes, largely cut off from the mass of the people, and it has, on the whole, remained that way. It was still, however, a place of influence, and in 1737 the government found it convenient to pass a Licensing Act which had the effect of restricting the theatres in London to three – the Haymarket opera house, Drury Lane and Covent Garden - until the act was repealed in 1843, though licences were issued for a few theatres in the provinces, at Bath, Bristol and Liverpool. The law greatly hindered the development of a creative drama in 18thcentury England, though it was a period of great actors and actresses.

The repeal of the Licensing Act in 1843 was followed by widespread building of theatres, but there was no live taste for intelligent new plays until > George Bernard Shaw, in the last decade of the 19th century, began to create one. In the 20th century there has been a sharp division between the commercial theatres which provide intellectually commonplace entertainment, and the theatres of the intelligentsia. Two companies of the latter kind have an official national status, > The Royal Shakespeare Company and the ▷ National Theatre. The Royal Shakespeare Company produces Shakespeare's and other dramatists' plays at Stratford-on-Avon and, formerly, at the Aldwych Theatre in London. Since 1982 the Royal Shakespeare Company have performed at their new base in the Barbican Centre near > St Pauls, where they are spaciously accommodated in a London home of their own, similar to that of the National Theatre which, after opening at the Old Vic Theatre in 1963 transferred to a new site on the South Bank in Waterloo in 1976-77. Under the guidance of Trevor Nunn and Sir Peter Hall respectively, the two national companies have inventively produced the English repertoire from Shakespeare and his contemporary dramatists to classical and modern European and American drama. They have increasingly benefited from funding by the Arts Council whose key role in freeing the British theatre since World War II from the shackles of economic success at the expense of art cannot be underestimated. To the extent that both the great companies have enjoyed a certain artistic franchise, the gap between them and the more radical theatrical groupings has narrowed.

Of these the English Stage Company, founded in 1955 and housed for years in the Royal Court Theatre in London, is the most important. It pioneered new modes of dramatic expression and encouraged new dramatists by giving them a space for their writings. John Osborne's Look Back in Anger (1956) was launched at the Royal Court and went on to become a milestone in the history of modern British drama. The 1960s saw the blossoming in London and in Britain of > fringe theatre which corresponded to the New York Off Broadway and Off-Off Broadway. It was associated with Americans such as Charles Marowitz and Jim Haynes, mostly working at different improvised venues in London. Their work, and that of many of the dramatists of the 1960s and 1970s, above all shows the influence of > Brecht and > Artaud. The theatrical scene in 1980s Britain was bleak, as resources were dwindling and funding bodies like the Arts Council were increasingly reluctant to underwrite commercially non-viable plays. The re-emergence in the metropolis of a new theatre of farce and social comedy is an indication that the age which was once hailed as that of the new radical Elizabethans is on the wane, as new norms of quietist conformism are endorsed in the theatre.

Thelwall, John (1764-1834)

Poet and essayist. Thelwall was a radical writer who published tracts and ▷ essays explaining his political views. His radicalism led to his arrest in 1794, but he was acquitted at the trial, and wrote about the experience in Poems Written in Close Confinement in the Tower and Newgate Upon a Charge of Treason (1795). Thelwall is also known for his acquaintance with ▷ Wordsworth and ▷ Coleridge whom he visited in the Lake District, having walked all the way from London.

Theocritus

A Greek poet of the 3rd century BC. Little is known about him, but his importance is that he originated > pastoral poetry in his 'idylls' short poems about shepherds and shepherdesses living in primitive simplicity in the rural parts of Sicily. He may have written these in the Egyptian city of Alexandria for urban readers; one of the characteristics of pastoral has been that it has expressed the town-dwellers' fantasy of the beauty of country surroundings, the simplicity of country living and the purity of country air. Theocritus was emulated by the Roman poet > Virgil, and both Theocritus and Virgil were taken as models by the 16thcentury > Renaissance poets in Western Europe, of whom the most notable English example is ➤ Edmund Spenser, and by poets in the 17th and 18th centuries including ➤ Behn, ➤ Pope and ➤ Thomson.

Theophrastus

A Greek philosopher, follower of ▷ Aristotle, of the 4th century BC. Amongst other writings, he composed a series of descriptions of moral types called Ethical Characters. These were the original pattern for the minor literary form of character-writing, widely practised in England in the early 17th century. The most notable example is John Earle's Microcosmography (1628). Other examples: ▷ Joseph Hall's Characters of Virtues and Vices (1608); ▷ Thomas Overbury's Characters (1614).

➤ Characters, Theophrastian.

Thespis (6th century BC)

A Greek poet of the 6th century BC; he is usually regarded as the originator of tragic drama. Choric songs were already sung at festivals; Thespis is said to have introduced an actor who engaged in dialogue with the leader of the chorus.

Thiong'o, Ngugi wa

Thirty Years' War

A European religious war, lasting from 1618 to 1648, between nearly all the Catholic and Protestant nations of Europe. It was fought principally in Germany, to the ruin of that country, and was concluded by the Peace of Westphalia. Britain was one of the few important countries that took hardly any part in it.

Thirty-nine Articles

The code of religious doctrine which all clergy of the ▷ Church of England have to accept. In 1553, 42 articles were laid down; these were reduced to 39 in 1571.

Thomas (fl c 1170)

Composer of an influential version of the Tristan story, which only survives in fragmentary form (totalling about 3,150 lines).

Little is known about the author, although modern scholars have suggested he was writing for the royal household of ▶ Henry II. The Middle English version of the Tristan story, Sir Tristrem, reworks material deriving from Thomas' poem.

Thomas Becket

➤ Becket, St Thomas.

Thomas, D. M. (Donald Michael) (b 1935) Novelist and poet. His best-known work is The White Hotel (1981), a fictional account of the life of one of ⊳ Freud's patients, making extensive use of fantasy. It also contains poetry and a pastiche of a case study by Freud. His other works include Ararat (1983); Swallow (1984); Selected Poems (1983); Flying in to Love (1992); and Eating Pavlova (1994).

Thomas, Dylan Marlais (1914-53) Poet. He was born in the Welsh town of Swansea; much of his work shows the impression on his early life of grim Welsh religious puritanism contrasting with the equally Welsh characteristic of strong emotion combined with his own sensuality. His 18 Poems (1934) and Twentyfive Poems (1936) bring together conflicting images in startling association, with pronounced and emotive verbal rhythms. The method has superficial resemblances to those of the 19thcentury poet ➤ Gerard Manley Hopkins and the 17th-century ➤ Metaphysicals, but it presents less access than they do for the analytical intellect. Thomas' theme is characteristically the relationship between the disorderliness of sexual impulses and the forces of growth in nature. The Map of Love (1939) is mixed prose and poetry; it includes one of his most remarkable poems, After the Funeral, in which the striking rhythm and images cohere round the figure of the woman for whose death the poem is an > elegy. Deaths and Entrances (1946) contains most of Thomas' most famous work. The poems show the impression made on him by World War II (during which he remained a civilian) in A Refusal to Mourn, a more overt use of religious emotion in The Conversation of Prayer, and delight in natural environment (eg Poem in October, Fern Hill). These poems are often less obscure than earlier ones, but the method remains a strong attack on the emotions, achieved by the shock of the imagery and the sweep of the rhythm.

Thomas also wrote prose works – notably the stories entitled Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog (1940) and the play Under Milk Wood (1954) published after his death. The prose has no obscurity and exhibits, as the poems do not, Thomas' strong humour. The play shows a mastery of the medium of drama for sound broadcasting which remains unexcelled.

Thomas' wide fame derives especially from three qualities: his unashamed appeal to latent emotionalism in the common reader, on whom he made a direct impact perhaps greater than that of other modern poets; his remarkable talent as a public reader of verse; his personality, which became a legend during his own lifetime, especially in America. On the other hand, his exuberance ran counter, before the war, to the intellectual fastidiousness of \triangleright T. S. Eliot and the emotional scepticism of \triangleright W. H. Auden, the two poets with the greatest prestige amongst the intelligentsia in England during the 1930s; again, he has been regarded with suspicion since 1945 by younger poets.

Thomas, Gwyn (1913-81)

Novelist, short-story writer and playwright. Born at Porth in the Rhondda Valley, the youngest of the twelve children of an unemployed miner, he won a scholarship to Oxford to read Modern Languages, subsequently continuing his Spanish studies at the University of Madrid. He gave up teaching as late as 1962 to become a full-time writer. Most of his work is set in a working-class ambience in the South Wales mining valleys in the first half of the twentieth century, during the social deprivation and unemployment of the 1930s. Paradoxically, despite the grimness and poverty of this background, his novels are outpourings of comic invention with plot less important than hilarious incident, character and language. Life is only made bearable by the wit with which he invests it, together with a farcical gigantism informed by compassion, thus creating a completely original literary milieu. His eleven published novels (two posthumously), comprise: The Dark Philosophers (1946); The Alone to the Alone (1947); All Things Betray Thee (1949); The World Cannot Hear You (1951); Now Lead Us Home (1952); A Frost on my Frolic (1953); The Stranger at my Side (1954); A Point of Order (1956); The Love Man (1958); and the posthumously published Sorrow For Thy Sons (1986) and The Thinker and the Thrush (1988). His collections of short stories are: Where did I put my Pity? (1946); Gazooka (1957); Ring Delirium 123 (1960); and The Lust Lobby (1971); a volume of Selected Short Stories (1984) was followed by a second posthumous collection, in the latter instance including hitherto uncollected material, in Meadow Prospect Revisited (1992). His six stage plays were: The Keep (1960); Loud Organs (1962); Fackie the Jumper (1963); Sap (1974); The Breakers (1976); and Testimonials (1979). He also wrote a great many talks, plays and features for radio and television, two volumes of essays, A Welsh Eye (1964) and A Hatful of Humours (1965), and an autobiography, A Few Selected Exits (1968). In his latter years, Gwyn Thomas, through his increasing amount of work for radio and television, became a media personality, an activity that reflected the ephemeral but provided a vehicle for his spontaneous wit though inevitably and regrettably diverted his creative energies away from the written word.

Thomas of Hales (fl 1250)

A Franciscan preacher, possibly from Hailes, Gloucestershire, who composed at least one Anglo-Norman sermon and is identified as the author of the poem known as the 'Love-Ron' (which survives in a single manuscript version, dating from the late 13th century). The 'Love-Ron' is a verse epistle, addressed ostensibly to a young religious woman who has requested spiritual advice. It offers a guide to the art of spiritual 'fin'amor' and recommends Christ as the best lover of all.

Thomas, Philip Edward (1878-1917) Poet and essayist. He was educated at St Paul's School and Lincoln College, Oxford, and was killed at the battle of Arras during World War I. He made his living by writing a long series of prose works, beginning with The Woodland Life (1897) and including > biography, criticism and essays on natural surroundings. The last are in a tradition that extends back through > Richard Jefferies, about whom Thomas wrote a critical assessment (1909), to the poetry of ➤ William Wordsworth. It was not until 1914 that Thomas began to write poetry, under the influence of the American poet Robert Frost, whom he first met the year before. His poems are continuous with his prose studies of nature, but it is by the poems rather than the prose that his reputation has grown since his death. English 'nature poetry' at its best has never been merely descriptive, but has concerned the power of the natural environment to elicit the purest human responses, not only to the environment but to elemental human relationships, including the relationship of the poet with himself. Thomas' poems show integrity of responsiveness and sensitivity to the language of his day; they are without the weakening nostalgia and sensibility which showed the decadence of the nature poetry tradition in some of his contemporaries. After his death, his poetic achievement was at first overshadowed by the reaction against the decadence of his contemporaries. ➤ Ezra Pound and ➤ T. S. Eliot led public taste away from the whole tradition, in both its good and its bad aspects, in which Thomas wrote. However, New Bearings in English Poetry (1932) by ⊳ F. R. Leavis contains an intelligent reassessment of his work. Since 1945, Thomas' austere honesty and delicacy of perception have caused his work to appeal strongly to English poets striving for the same virtues; with > Thomas Hardy, he is seen as representative of distinctly English sensibilities in contrast to the partly alien sensibilities of Pound and ▷ W. B. Yeats.

Thomas, R. S., (Ronald Stuart) (b 1913) Poet. Since his first volume, The Stones of the Field (1946), he has maintained a regular and substantial output, including Song at the Year's Turning (1955), Laboratories of the Spirit (1975) and Experimenting With an Amen (1986). He is best known as a recorder of the rigorous beauty of the Welsh landscape, and of the duress of farming-community life there and the religious sensibility that evolves in such a context. In 1936 Thomas was ordained as a Church of Wales clergyman. Selected Poems 1946–68 (1973), Later Poems: a Selection (1983), Selected Prose (revised ed. 1986).

Thompson, Francis (1859-1907)

Poet. He gave up the study of medicine in Manchester to seek his fortunes in London, where he nearly starved. He published his Poems in 1893. Thompson was a ➤ Catholic; the most famous of his poems (included in the above volume) was the intensely religious Hound of Heaven. Its bold, extravagant style recalls the work of the 17th-century Catholic poet ➤ Richard Crashaw (?1612-49), one of the English Metaphysicals. On the other hand, Thompson was more in the tradition of his immediate predecessors in his employment of sensuous, ornate > symbolism; in this he resembles the ➤ Pre-Raphaelites of the mid-19th century, and another Catholic poet - one of the first of his admirers - > Coventry Patmore. In this respect, a comparison of the Hound of Heaven with ▶ The Wreck of the Deutschland (1875) by yet another Catholic, > Gerard Manley Hopkins, is instructive; Hopkins shows equal emotional intensity with much more of the intellectual rigour of the 17th-century poets. Thompson's other volumes were Sister Songs (1895) and New Poems (1897). His prose work includes his Essays on Shelley (1909). Thomson, James (1700–48) Poet. Born in the Scottish border country, the son of a minister. He studied divinity at Edinburgh University, but in 1725 sought his fortune in London, where he became tutor in an aristocratic family. His poem Winter was published in 1726 and its success encouraged him to write poems on the other three seasons during the following years, the ➤ Seasons being completed in 1730. Thomson's artificially dignified ➤ Miltonic ➤ blank verse, and the miscellaneousness of his subject matter, struck the new bourgeois > taste exactly, and the Seasons were extremely popular. He possesses a facility, almost amounting to genius, for holding together in loose, artificial suspension all the characteristic elements of the popular culture of his day: ➤ Augustan patriotism, ➤ Classicism in diction and tone, ➤ Gothic excess, ⊳ sentimentalism. His most original passages elaborate ➤ Virgilian ➤ pastoral into a pleasantly self-indulgent enthusiasm for the natural scene. Rhetorical patriotism, of which he is the period's most unembarrassed exponent, features also in his next large-scale poem, Liberty (1735-6), and also in the ➤ masque Alfred, written and produced with ➤ David Mallet in 1740, which contains the song > Rule Britannia. Thomson also wrote ▷ tragedies, which were very successful at the time, but are now forgotten (Sophonisba, 1730; Agamemnon, 1738; Edward and Eleanora, 1739; Tancred and Sigismunda, 1745; Corolianus, 1749). His > Spenserian imitation, ➤ The Castle of Indolence (1748) is far more successful, eclectically combining ▷ mockheroic > burlesque, sensuous description, whimsical self-mockery, patriotism and didactic moralizing.

Thomson, James (1834-82)

Poet. He was the son of a sailor in the merchant navy, and of a deeply religious woman who belonged to one of the narrower ▶ Protestant sects. He was an army schoolmaster, 1850-62, during which period he had a tragic love affair, and made friends with Charles Bradlaugh, who became a well-known > atheist radical. Thomson is chiefly known for a long, sombre, atheistic poem, The City of Dreadful Night (1880), which expressed in the most uncompromising terms the darkest aspect of the loss of religious belief common among Victorian intellectuals. He was also capable of gaiety (Vane's Story and Other Poems, 1881). A Voice from the Nile and other Poems was published posthumously in 1884. He commonly wrote under the initials B.V. (Bysshe, from Percy Bysshe Shelley, and Vanolis, anagram for the German poet, Novalis). Bib: Dobell, B., The Laureate of Pessimism; Walker, E.B., James Thomson.

Thopas, Sir
One of ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales.
Chaucer's own contribution to the tale-telling competition is a burlesque ➤ tail-rhyme romance, which the Host stops after only 200 lines or so. Although nominally set in Flanders, the narrative is placed in the world of romance conventions and motifs itself, and its orientation is signalled by the cast list of romance heroes with whom Sir Thopas is compared in the second 'fitt' (a conventional name for the sectional division of a poetic narrative). Sir Thopas is built up from a series of anti-climaxes, both in terms of action and style. When the Host steps in to halt proceedings, Sir Thopas has neither found a fairy lover nor fought the giant who challenges him, and though he has contemplated the possibility of doing both, has actually achieved very little in the course of his furious ride across the meadows. For the Host, this tale with its 'drasty rymyng' is 'nat worth a toord'. Chaucer's own contribution to his own tale-telling contest is thus a brilliant anti-climax: it is the only tale of the whole collection which is rejected on aesthetic grounds.

He counters with a second tale, > Melibee, a prose moral treatise which could not be more different to Sir Thopas.

Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787) English writer ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft's earlier publication on ➤ education. She advocates the education of women both for material reasons — to enable them to obtain such work as is permitted to women, if they have need — and for spiritual and intellectual comfort.

Thrale, Hester Lynch (1741–1821) (later Hester Thrale Piozzi)

Born Hester Salusbury, she married Henry Thrale in 1763. Thrale was a wealthy brewer with political ambitions, and when in the following year they made the acquaintance of Samuel Johnson (1709-84), Johnson assisted Thrale by writing election addresses. The friendship between Johnson and Hester Thrale became very close, and at various times Johnson lived with the family in their home at Streatham. When Thrale died in 1781, Hester Thrale remarried. Gabriel Piozzi, her second husband, was an Italian musician, and her friends and family vociferously disapproved. The marriage ended the friendship with Johnson, who sent her an anguished letter on the subject.

Hester Thrale's biography of Johnson, Anecdotes of the late Samuel Johnson, was strongly contested by James Boswell (1740–05) when it appeared in 1786; his motives in challenging her account probably stem from literary rivalry. Hester Thrale was also an energetic letter writer, and Thraliana, a selection of anecdotes, poems, jests and journal entries, covers the period 1776–1809. Bib: Clifford, J. L., Hester Lynch Piozzi.

Thraliana

Journal of ➤ Hester Lynch Thrale, covering the years 1776–1809, and including many of her poems. They began as a set of six blank books presented to her by her husband Henry Thrale as an anniversary gift. The journal contains vivid and often humorous portraits and anecdotes concerning her many friends and acquaintances, including ➤ Samuel Johnson and her two husbands, as well as accounts of contemporary life and customs. Passages from it read like extracts from novels or plays. Johnson's other biographer ➤ Boswell admired but also disparaged her as a rival whom he feared.

literary figures, including ▷ John Dennis (Sir Tremendous), ▷ Colley Cibber (Plotwell), and the Countess of Winchilsea (▷ Anne Finch) (Phoebe Clinket). The play was at first a success, but its production occasioned a furious hostility between Gay and Cibber, and it was not revived for another 20 years.

Through the Looking-Glass and What Alice Found There

➤ Carroll, Lewis.

Thucydides (5th-4th centuries BC)
Greek historian of the ▷ Peloponnesian war.
It is one of the earliest historical works in European literature in its distinct care for accuracy. Nearly a quarter of the book however, is devoted to political speeches, including the great Funeral Oration by ▷ Pericles; these give an important insight into Greek attitudes to politics. Thucydides has been a principal text for English ▷ classical education.

Thynne, Joan (1558–1612) and Maria (c 1578–1611)

Letter-writers. Joan Thynne was the first mistress of Longleat and Maria was her daughter-in-law. Unfortunately, in personal terms, the two women were never reconciled to one another, but fortunately for present-day readers, they left a collection of dramatic, complex and intimate letters written over a period of 30 years (their correspondence is available in a modern version, edited by A. D. Wall). Joan is much cooler and more reticent, both to her daughter-in-law and her husband, but Maria ranges from conventional submissiveness to angry diatribe and writes tender, sometimes erotic, letters to her spouse.

Tickell, Thomas (1686–1740)

Member of the clique which frequented

➤ Button's Coffee-house and whose leader was ➤ Joseph Addison. He contributed to The Guardian and ▷ The Spectator. ▷ Alexander Pope suspected that Addison had attempted to spoil his success by inciting Tickell to publish his translation of the first book of ▷ The Iliad just before the appearance of Pope's translation of the first two books (1715). Tickell edited Addison's works after his death, his edition being prefaced by a moving ▷ elegy in heroic ▷ couplets (1721).

Tighe, Mary (1772-1810)

Poet. The life of Mary Tighe (née Blachford) accords with the archetypal biography constructed for the ➤ Romantic poet. Although she had a strict religious upbringing, she married her cousin (Henry Tighe), with whom she was passionately in love, against her mother's wishes, and they moved into the social and literary London scene. Her first book of poems, Psyche, or the Legend of Love (1805), was an > allegory in six cantos written in > Spenserian stanzas and depicting Psyche's experiences in Cupid's palace. In her preface she apologizes for her focus upon passion, but when the poem begins with its languorous exploration of space and emotion, no qualms surface to halt the steady sensuous flow of the poetry. Two other works exist, Mary, A Series of Reflections During 20 Years (1811) and an ⊳ autobiography, Selina, which is in manuscript form in the National Library of Ireland. Even as Psyche was published, Tighe knew she was suffering from consumption, and died when she was thirty-eight.

Tilney (Tylney), Edmund (d 1610) Master of the ➤ Revels, 1579-1608. Tilney was appointed to the post of Master of the Revels after his prose tract, A Briefe and Pleasant Discourse of Duties in Mariage called the Flower of Friendshippe (1568), which was dedicated to > Elizabeth I, was well received. Tilney's influence on court and public drama of the Elizabethan period was immense: he chose the works to be performed before the queen, and, more importantly, read every play composed for publication or public presentation that needed a licence. Thus, he was on familiar terms with ▶ Philip Henslowe and the other theatrical managers of the day, and he would have examined critically the manuscripts of a number of ➤ Shakespeare's plays in order to license them. At the accession of ▶ James I, Tilney seems to have given over many of his duties to ➤ Sir George Buc (possibly his nephew), and he retired fully in 1608.

Timber

A collection of commentary, paraphrase and ▷ translation by ▷ Ben Jonson, Timber was first published in the two-volume edition of Jonson's works that appeared after his death. As a record of Jonson's reading in the classics, it is invaluable. More than this, however, is the insight it provides into questions which inform Jonson's own aesthetic theories, in particular his use of > 'Imitation'.

Times, The

British newspaper. It was founded in 1785 as The Daily Universal Register, and took its present name in 1788. In the 19th century it took the lead in contriving new methods of collecting news (notably throught the employment of foreign correspondents), and its succession of distinguished editors and contributors gave it an outstanding status among British newspapers. Though always in private ownership, it has always claimed to be an independent newspaper rather than a party one. The literary style of one of its staff writers caused it to be nicknamed 'The Thunderer' in the 19th century; the novelist > Anthony Trollope consequently refers to it as The Jupiter in his novels, since this king of the gods was known as the Thunderer by the ancient Romans. The Times publishes The Times Literary Supplement and The Sunday Times weekly. Its outlook is traditional and often conservative in political terms. In 1981 it was bought by Rupert Murdoch's News Internatinoal Group, which also publishes the tabloid newspaper The Sun.

Timon

A rich citizen of Athens of the 5th century BC; he was celebrated for his hatred of mankind. He is referred to by a number of ancient Greek writers, including ▷ Aristophanes, and notably by ▷ Plutarch in his life of Mark Antony, and ▷ Lucian in his dialogue Misanthropos. ▷ Shakespeare (▷ Timon of Athens) makes him a rich, ostentatious philanthropist who becomes a misanthropist through disillusionment at men's ingratitude.

Timon of Athens (1607)

A tragedy by ➤ Shakespeare, written about 1607 and concerning ➤ Jacobean ➤ patronage and material power. The material is probably taken from ➤ Plutarch's life of Mark Antony (written 1st century AD), ➤ Lucian's dialogue Misanthropos (2nd century AD), and an anonymous play of Shakespeare's own day.

Timon is an Athenian nobleman who delights in the prodigal entertainment of his guests. In spite of his great wealth, he presently finds himself in debt; he is then outraged to discover that none of those to whom he has been so generous is prepared to help him. He invites his friends to one more banquet, but the steaming dishes, uncovered, contain only hot water; throwing the dishes and water at them, he drives his guests out of the house. In a frenzy of hatred, he then takes to a life of solitude in the wilderness, where he is visited by the cynical philosopher Apemantus, his devoted steward Flavius, the general Alcibiades, who is rebelling against the meanness of the Athenian government, and other characters from his past life of opulence. This part of the play consists of a series of dialogues that leave Timon resolute in his hatred of humanity, though he is obliged to make an exception of his disinterestedly loyal steward. The dialogue with Apemantus is the most striking. Apemantus has always forseen that Timon would be deceived by his friends, since he has a low opinion of human nature; Timon, however, retorts that Apemantus' cynicism is groundless except for the mean motive of jealousy, whereas he, Timon, has proved that humanity is inferior after testing it on the opposite hypothesis. Alcibiades is afflicted by the public meanness of the Athenian state, as Timon has been afflicted by private ingratitude; thus he regards Timon as an ally, though he cannot persuade him to join forces with the rebels. The rebellion of Alcibiades is successful, and when Timon dies, the Athenian rulers penitently acknowledge their ill-treatment of him.

Tintagel

In ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of British history, Tintagel features as the castle where ▷ King Arthur is conceived. In later Arthurian romances it is identified as the castle of King Mark, overlord of Cornwall and uncle to ▷ Tristan. Today there are remains of a medieval castle on the headland, but archaeological evidence suggests that there may have been a stronghold on the site in the late 5th century.

Tintern Abbey

One of the most famous remains of the medieval abbeys, dissolved by Henry VIII in 1536-39. It stands in a particularly beautiful natural setting, in the valley of the River Wye, near the border of England and Wales. The poet > William Wordsworth used this setting for one of the best known of his early poems, Lines Composed a Fem Miles Above Tintern Abbey (in > Lyrical Ballads), in which he meditates on the influence of natural surroundings on the formation of his mind.

Tintern Abbey, Lines Composed a Few Miles Above (1798)

A reflective poem in ▷ blank verse by ▷ William Wordsworth, not itself a lyrical ballad but one of the 'few other poems' included in ▷ Lyrical Ballads (1798). The poet returns to a spot on the river Wye visited five years earlier, and reflects upon the moral influence its beauty has exerted upon him in the meantime, inspiring 'little, nameless, unremembered, acts/ Of kindness and of love'. He goes on to describe himself as 'A worshipper of Nature', and this is his most ▷ pantheistic work.

Tiresias (Teiresias)

In Greek myth, a sage of Thebes whom the gods afflicted with blindness but then compensated with the gift of prophecy. In the most familiar form of the legend, he spent part of his life as a woman.

➤ Tennyson's poem Tiresias is one of those ➤ dramatic monologues which are now among the most admired of his poems; here, Tiresias speaks with the voice of the lonely, timeless sage. He also occurs in Part III of ➤ T. S. Eliot's poem ➤ The Waste Land; here he is more the impartial witness of the crises of the human mind, and is described in a note as 'the most important personage in the poem, uniting all the rest'.

'Tis Pity She's a Whore (1632)

Donn Ford's greatest Donn treats the passionate and incestuous love-affair between the siblings Giovanni and Annabella — and their relationship's inevitable progress towards destruction — with remarkable empathy and tact. When Annabella finds she is pregnant by her brother she marries a suitor, Soranzo, who discovers the truth about the child's paternity and conspires to revenge his own humiliation. The play concludes in a mass killing after a grotesque scene during which Giovanni enters with his sister's heart on the point of his dagger.

Tithonus

In Greek myth, the son of Laomedon, king of Troy. Such was his beauty that Eos (Aurora), goddess of the dawn, fell in love with him and made him her husband. She secured for him from Zeus the gift of immortal life, but forgot to require also immortal youth. ➤ Tennyson's poem Tithonus is a ➤ dramatic monologue representing Tithonus in the agony of his eternal old age.

Titus Andronicus (1594)

A tragedy by ▷ Shakespeare, published in 1594. The origin of the plot is not known; it may owe something to ▷ Ovid's Procne and Tereus, one of his ▷ Metamorphoses translated by Golding, 1565–7, and to ▷ Seneca's drama Thyestes, translated between 1559 and 1581. It is in any case a violent ▷ revenge tragedy of the kind that Shakespeare and his contemporaries derived from Seneca. The setting is imperial Rome; the plot concerns the revenge of Titus, a Roman general, for the atrocities committed by Tamora, the Queen of the Goths, against his family. She is aided by a villainous slave, Aaron the Moor. Much doubt has been expressed by scholars as to whether the play is entirely by Shakespeare, by Shakespeare in collaboration, or not by Shakespeare at all; the last opinion arises partly from the low esteem in which the play is usually held, although, according to > Ben Jonson, it was popular among the contemporary public. However, the play has been revived to great success in the late-20th century, and scholars now perceive the themes of gender, race and power to be key issues often dealt with by Shakespeare.

To the Lighthouse (1927)

A novel by ➤ Virginia Woolf. The setting is a house used for holidays by Mr and Mrs Ramsay. The household consists of themselves, their eight children, and a number of their friends, of whom the most important is the painter Lily Briscoe. The novel dispenses with plot and is organized into three parts, dominated by two symbols - the lighthouse out at sea, and Lily's painting of the house, with Mrs Ramsay sitting in the window with her son James. The parts are entitled 'The Window', 'Time Passes', and 'The Lighthouse'. The first part is dominated by Mrs Ramsay, who is intuitive, imaginative, and possesses a reassuring and vitalizing influence upon people and their emotions. The mysterious lighthouse flashing through the darkness is associated with her. In the interval represented by the second part of the novel, corresponding to the war years 1914-18, she dies, and the third part is dominated by Mr Ramsay who is intellectual, philosophical, and lonely. The lighthouse seen as a practical instrument, close at hand and by daylight, is associated with him. The middle section concerns the empty house, subject to the flux of time and its changes. Lily Briscoe, the artist, stands aloof from Mrs Ramsay's embracing influence and seeks to fix the constantly changing relationships of people and objects in a single composition; she completes the picture in the last sentence of the book, when the Ramsav son, James, achieves reconciliation with his father and with the lighthouse seen as fact. Mrs Ramsay, in her role as wife and mother, and Lily, single and an artist, represent alternative possibilities for a woman's way of life.

The story is told through the ▷ stream of consciousness technique – in the minds of the characters, especially James, Lily, and Mrs Ramsay. The novel, one of the most original of the many fictional experiments in the 1920s, is partly autobiographical, and based on Virginia Woolf's own family. Mr and Mrs Ramsay are her father and mother, Leslie Stephen and his second wife.

Toft, Eric John (b 1933)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born and brought up in Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent, in the Potteries district of the English Midlands, he was educated at Hanley High School and Magdalen College Oxford, and taught at Brighton College of Education. In a sequence of powerful realist novels, set primarily in the Potteries, he has created a story of change and development in English working-class life from 1917 to the present: The Bargees (1969); The Wedge (1972); The Underground Tree (1978); The Dew (1981). The House of the Arousing (1973), a volume of short stories, draws on the author's experience of travelling in Malaysia.

Toleration, Act of (1689)

Description Act of Parliament which granted freedom of worship to Dissenters, one of the first Acts passed by the Protestant monarchs Description William III and Description Mary II after their accession. It went some way to eliminating the discrimination against non-conformists of the years preceding, and the resentment this caused. Dissenters were still not allowed to hold official positions, but many of them succeeded in doing so without retribution. Catholics continued to be forbidden to vote or to hold office.

> Puritanism.

Tolkien, J. R. R. (John Ronald Reuel) (1892-1973)

Novelist, philologist and critic. From 1925 to 1945 he was Professor of Anglo-Saxon at Oxford University, and during the 1930s belonged to 'The Inklings', a literary society whose other members included ▷ C. S. Lewis. From 1945 to 1959 he was Merton Professor of English Language and Literature at Oxford. His large-scale fantasy of another world The Lord of the Rings (1954−6) has gained enormous popularity. His other novels are: The Hobbit (1937) and The Silmarillion (1977).

Tolpuddle Martyrs

In 1834 six farm labourers from Tolpuddle in Dorset were transported to Australia for swearing men into a trade union lodge. The men were respectable − five were Wesleyans − and were returned home after three years of the seven-year sentence. But the lack of Whig support revealed the limits of common interest between the middle and working classes. The event nourished the ▷ Chartist movement and the men were seen as martyrs to the cause of unskilled-labour trade unions.

Tolstoy, Count Leo Nikolaevitch (1828–1910) Russian novelist, dramatist and moral philosopher. What are usually considered his two greatest novels, War and Peace (1865–9) and Anna Karenina (1875–7), have a spaciousness, profundity and balance of sanity which have caused them to be used as a standard by which the achievements of other novelists can be measured. The scale of greatness is to be accounted for not only by the depth of Tolstoy's mind but by the breadth of his experience, which in turn owes something to Tolstov's position in Russian society and the critical phase of history through which Russia was passing during his lifetime. He belonged to the class of Russian landed gentry and was partly educated by French tutors, a fact which, taken with the sensitivity of the Russian intelligentsia to West European culture, gave him a broader understanding of the issues of civilization in his time than was characteristic of most Western novelists. Tolstoy frequented the intellectual and fashionable classes of Russian society, travelled abroad and spent the years 1851-7 in the Russian army, seeing service in the Crimean War against Britain, France and Turkey. Two other absorbing aspects of his experience were the problems of Russia's vast peasantry, emancipated from serfdom in 1861, and the prominence of religion in Russian life.

Tolstoy was early influenced by the thought of > Jean-Jacques Rousseau and this, combined with his own direct experience of peasant life, developed in him a strong faith in spontaneous, simple living in contrast to the sophisticated, fashionable, educated society which he also knew well. From 1876, disillusioned by worldliness and inspired by the example of the peasants, he thought increasingly about the religious interpretation of experience, but his thinking turned him away from the Russian Orthodox Church to a religion of his own, based on the words of Christ (in Matthew 5:30) 'that ve resist not evil'. Tolstoy's religion was thus pacifistic and on the side of self-abnegation; it did not admit the existence of life after death nor a personal God, his belief being that the kingdom of God is within man. He described his religion in What I believe in and A Short Exposition of the Gospels; a complete account of his conversion is given in A Confession (1879-82), and he also published stories inspired by his inner life at the time, The Memoirs of a Madman and The Death of Ivan Ilyich. In What is Art (1896), he expounded his doctrine that good art works by re-creating in the reader the fine emotions of the writer, bad art by similarly conveying the bad ones. Tolstoy's influence may be seen in the works of G.B. Shaw, > E.M. Forster and D.H. Lawrence.

Tom Brown's Schooldays ➤ Hughes, Thomas; ➤ Rugby School.

Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749) A novel by ➤ Henry Fielding. The central character begins life as a baby of unknown parentage (ie 'a foundling') who is discovered in the mansion of the enlightened landowner, Squire Allworthy. Allworthy adopts him, and he grows up a handsome and generous-hearted youth, whose weakness is his excess of animal spirits and inclination to fleshly lusts. He falls in love with Sophia Western, daughter of a neighbouring landowner, Squire Western, who is as gross, ignorant and self-willed as Allworthy is refined and enlightened. Western intends Sophia for Blifil, Allworthy's nephew, a mean and treacherouly hypocitical character, who is supported against Tom by two members of Allworthy's household, the pedantic chaplain Thwackum and the pretentious philosopher, Square, who counterbalance each other. They succeed in disgracing Tom, whom Allworthy is persuaded to disown. The central part of the novel describes his travels and amorous adventures in the company of a comic follower, Partridge. Sophia also leaves home, to escape from Blifil, and nearly falls victim to a plot by Lady Bellaston, with whom Tom has become amorously entangled, to place her in the power of Lord Fellamar. Tom is eventually identified as the son of Allworthy's sister; the plots against him are brought to light; he is received again by Allworthy, and marries Sophia.

The novel, like its predecessor by Fielding, > Foseph Andrews, is a 'comic > epic', offering a wide range of social types of the age, all of whom are presented as permanent human types rather than as unique individuals, as 19thcentury novelists would show them. Fielding's method is expository; he does not attempt to create illusions of characters with interior lives of their own, but expounds behaviour, with the aid of prefatory > essays to his chapters, always light-heartedly, but always with a view to exhibiting basic human motives as they have always existed, rather in the manner of the 17th-century Comedies of > Humours and of ➤ Manners. He owes much to ➤ Cervantes' comic romance > Don Quixote and to the studies of contemporary morals and manners by the painter ➤ William Hogarth. To some extent the book was written in rivalry to ⊳ Samuel Richardson's > Clarissa, a novel written in a tragic spirit and in a strenuous and idealistic moral tone. It was Fielding's tendency to 'correct' Richardson's idealism and partly self-deceiving moral rigour by reducing events to more usual human experience and interpreting this in the light of tolerant comedy instead of grand > tragedy; for instance, Lovelace, in Clarissa is a human fiend (though also an interesting psychological study) where Tom is merely a healthy young man whose licentiousness is bound up with his virtue of outgoing sympathy and generosity. Thus, Tom Jones is both one of the first important English novels, a new kind of imaginative work, and one that embodies highly traditional values.

Tom Thumb the Great (1730) ➤ Burlesque play by ➤ Fielding, expanded and performed as The Tragedy of Tragedies, or, The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great in 1731. The piece satirizes heroic ⊳ tragedy, somewhat in the manner of > The Rehearsal, but in ▷ blank verse rather than ▷ heroic couplets. In addition, the ▷ satire works entirely through the absurdity of the lines, and the device of having the tiny Tom Thumb as 'hero', without the benefit of commentary from sources outside the 'tragic' action. Fielding acknowledged his debt to ▷ Pope's The Art of Sinking in Poetry by attributing the play to 'Scriblerus Secundus'.

Tomlinson, Charles (b 1927)

Poet and literary critic. Tomlinson has been a university lecturer since 1956, and he also paints and translates. His work is precise and aspires to technical objectivity, influenced by both ➤ Donald Davie (who taught him at Cambridge and introduced Tomlinson's 1955 volume The Necklace), and by ➤ Imagists and American ➤ modernists, especially William Carlos Williams and Marianne Moore. He has experimented with ➤ free verse and rhythmic irregularities, and is constantly expanding his technical range. His later volumes include: The Way of a World (1969); The Shafi (1978); Selected Poems 1951–1974 (1978); The Flood (1981).

Tonks, Rosemary (b 1932)

Poet and novelist. Rosemary Tonks was a poet of considerable innovation and originality, until her conversion to fundamentalist Christianity stopped her writing career short in the early 1970s. Her work is cosmopolitan, often parodic, and European in its influences and themes, drawing particularly on the concerns of French ▷ Symbolism and Surrealism (▷ French literature in English). Her works include: Notes on Cafés and Bedrooms (1963); Opium Fogs (1963); Illiad of Broken Sentences (1967); Businessmen as Lovers (1969); her last published work was The Halt during the Chase (1972).

Torquemada, Tomas de (1420–98) A Dominican friar who was appointed in 1483 as the first Inquisitor-general to investigate religious heresies in Spain. His zeal has made him a symbol of cruelty in England.

Tottel's Miscellany (1557)

An influential ▷ anthology of verse published by Richard Tottel, a bookseller, and Nicholas Grimald, a translator and scholar. It was originally entitled Songs and Sonnets, and included the work of the ▷ Earl of Surrey and ▷ Sir Thomas Wyatt. Their poems, the first of any distinction in English to show characteristics of ▷ Renaissance style, had never before been printed, though they had circulated in manuscript, and the great popularity of the anthology helped to shape the short poem so much cultivated in the last 20 years of the century; their success led to the publication of many similar anthologies.

Tourneur, Cyril (?1575–1626) Dramatist. Not much is known of his life, except that he was employed abroad in military and diplomatic service, and died in Ireland on the return of the unsuccessful naval expedition under ▷ Buckingham to capture Cadiz. He is well known for two plays, one of which, ▷ The Revenger's Tragedy (1606–7), is regarded as one of the finest achievements of the period, and is attributed by most scholars to another dramatist, ▷ Thomas Middleton. The other, ▷ The Atheist's Tragedy (1611), an interesting anti-revenge play, is much less esteemed. The case for Tourneur being the author of the more admired of the two plays is partly based on the resemblance to an obscure religious poem by him, The Transformed Metamorphosis (1600). He also wrote a number of ▷ elegies.

Tract

An ⊳ essay or treatise, usually short but published singly and usually on a religious subject. The most famous in English are the Tracts for the Times (1833-41) by a group of devout Anglicans, Hurrell Froude, Pusey, Keble, and ➤ Newman. Their purpose was to increase the spiritual dignity and independence of the > Church of England by the revival of doctrines stressed in the 17th century but since then largely neglected, with the consequence, as the authors believed, that the Church was losing its spiritual identity and was exposing itself more and more to secular > utilitarianism and domination by the state. Newman's was the predominating spirit in the group; he started the series, and he wrote Tract XC, which caused scandal by emphasizing the closeness of the Anglican to the older Catholic tradition, and thus ended it.

Tradition

In literary studies, tradition or traditional is used in a number of ways. Generally, it refers to the established rather than the innovative or experimental and, depending on viewpoint, can carry connotations of being old-fashioned or settled and reliable. In another sense, it can also refer to a body of works or conventions which share significant features of technique or outlook handed down from the past and made use of in later work – for example, work produced in the Christian tradition, or the oral tradition, or the epic tradition. But there is also a more contentious usage in which tradition refers to a restricted body of works, often declared to be the tradition in the singular and then promoted exclusively as of supreme value. In this line of thought, the traditional is often identified with a small number of styles and tastes, or particular forms of writing, or works which favour particular beliefs. (An example is F. R. Leavis' book The Great Tradition which reduces British writers of fiction to a class of five.) Often, this usage is closely related to the idea of the canon and some objections to it are discussed in that entry.

Trafalgar, Battle of (1805)

The chief sea-battle of the war against ➤ Napoleon, in which the British fleet under

➤ Nelson defeated a joint French and Spanish fleet under Villeneuve. The victory made impossible an invasion of Britain by the French army, but Nelson was killed in the action.

Tragedy

Tragedy as it is understood in Western Europe has its origins in the Greek dramas by the Athenian dramatists ➤ Aeschylus, ➤ Sophocles and > Euripides, in the 6th-5th centuries BC. Essentially the spirit of this writing was that inevitable suffering overwhelms the characters, and yet the characters maintain their dignity in the face of this suffering, and prove their greatness (and the capacity of human beings for greatness) by doing so. Greek tragedy arose out of their religious interpretation of the nature of human destiny. When Christianity prevailed over Western Europe, a much more hopeful interpretation of human destiny dominated the thoughts of writers, and tragedy, in the Greek sense, became difficult to imagine and unnatural: if good men suffer in this world, they are rewarded in Heaven, and this is not tragic; wicked men who happen to suffer in this world may be damned in the next, but this is also not tragic because they are wicked. Hence medieval tragedy was on the whole reduced to the conception of the Wheel of Fortune that chance in this world is apt to take men from prosperity to misfortune, whatever their spiritual merits.

In the late 16th century the tragic vision of human experience was rediscovered by some English dramatists, notably by ➤ Marlowe and ➤ Shakespeare. Insofar as it had a literary ancestry, this was not the tragedy of the ancient Greeks, which was scarcely known, but the comparatively debased imitation of it by the Roman poet > Seneca, which helped to give rise to Elizabethan > Revenge Tragedy or 'Tragedy of Blood'. More interesting was the growth of conceptions of human destiny which did not usurp the Christian conception, but existed side by side with it, as an alternative, or perhaps rather as a complementary, vision. Although, as C. Belsey points out, 'human tragedy' more often than not means male, English, middle-class tragedy.

The first important English tragedy is Marlowe's ➤ Doctor Faustus in which the hero forgoes eternal happiness after death for the sake of earthly ecstasy; Marlowe sets in opposition the Christian doctrine of the soul and Renaissance delight in earthly experience. > Hamlet, in which Shakespeare for the first time makes the task of revenge a genuine moral dilemma, is perhaps the next. The best known achievements of English tragic drama are Shakespeare's five plays: > Othello, > Macbeth, ➤ King Lear, ➤ Anthony and Cleopatra and > Coriolanus. These cannot be summed up in a phrase, but they have in common that the hero's hope of some form of supreme earthly happiness collapses into terrible misery, brought about less by the hero's character than through the nature of earthly reality of which his character forms a part. Among Shakespeare's later contemporaries and his successors, several dramatists wrote distinguished plays in the tragic style eg > Middleton's > The Changeling and ➤ Webster's ➤ The Duchess of Malfi and ➤ The White Devil and ➤ Elizabeth Cary's Tragedy of Marian.

This period, from 1590 till about 1625, was the only one in English literature in which there were more than isolated examples of distinguished theatrical tragedy. The single important example of a work written in the Greek style is Milton's Samson Agonistes, but critics disagree as to whether it can be called truly dramatic. Numerous attempts were made to write tragedy in the Greek style, or in the neoclassical French style of ▷ Corneille and ➤ Racine, after 1660, but they lacked conviction; perhaps the best is > Dryden's All for Love. Various attempts were made by 10th-century poets to revive the Shakespearean mode of tragedy. Of these, Shelley's The Cenci is the only noteworthy example, but even that was only a minor success.

Some of the plays of ▷ Synge and ▷ Yeats were genuinely remarkable and original tragedies, but their scale is unambitious. However, in the 1960s the work of such dramatists as ▷ Pinter, ▷ Osborne and ▷ Arden has revived dramatic tragedy in a more recognizable form.

Dericles, Dericles, and Dericles, Dericles, Dericles, Dericles, and Dericles a tragic climax halfway through and then lightens towards a happy conclusion. Traherne, Thomas (c 1638-74)

Poet and religious writer. In the 17th century, the only works published by Traherne were three religious pieces, all of them in prose. In 1896, however, the Victorian editor A. B. Grosart discovered a collection of manuscripts in a London bookshop which he believed to be by ▶ Henry Vaughan. The manuscripts were identified as being those of Traherne, and comprised religious poems and the remarkable mystical prose work Centuries of Meditation. The latter constitutes a spiritual ≥ autobiography, tracing the author's progress towards 'felicity' (a key term for Traherne). Criticism of Traherne's poetry has in the 20th century concentrated on his affinity with > George Herbert, and on his visionary delineation of childlike experience. Understsood as a mystic and an intellectual conservative in comparison to the rationalism of 17th-century science, Traherne has been closely linked with the Cambridge ▶ Platonists - almost as though he were the poetic 'voice' of that group. Yet for all Traherne's concern with 'the inward eye', in fact his approach to language, his undoubted fascination with the possibilities of rational science (particularly as it had unfolded a new perspective in which to understand the human body) and his experimental verse forms make him one of the most remarkable of later 17th-century writers.

Traill, Catherine Parr (1802-99)

Novelist and botanist. One of the early pioneer writers of Canadian literature, together with her sister ➤ Susannah Moodie. Traill was born in London to the Strickland family, and only moved to Canada in 1832, at the same time as Moodie, to take up a land grant. Although the life was hard, Traill made every effort to make a home in the new world and her optimistic endeavours are described in The Backwoods of Canada (1836) which was written to encourage others to emigrate. Her work contrasts sharply with the patronizing and discontented tone of her sister's book, Roughing it in the Bush (1852) which chronicles the same period and events. Indeed, Traill's resolutely bright and cheerful approach was satirized by > Margaret Laurence in her novel The Diviners. In addition to her accounts of the early settlement of Canada, Traill is also known for her important contribution to the study of Canadian plant life.

Transference

This is the term used in ▶ Freudian psychoanalysis, along with others such as ▷ 'condensation' and ▷ 'displacement', to describe one of the mechanisms whereby unconscious desires enter into ≥ consciousness. It is given a more specific meaning in the relationship between analyst and patient (analysand) in psychoanalysis, as part of the process of removing those impediments to the recollection of repressed impulses on the part of the latter. Situations and emotions are relived during the treatment and these ultimately express the indestructibility of unconscious fantasies. In the structure of a literary work, repetitions of particular situations and events, and even the duplication of 'character', can be explained as kinds of transference of the 'unconscious fantasies' of the writer. In this way desires and feelings which in psychoanalysis occur in the life of the patient, are transferred onto the analyst/reader, producing a repetition or re-enactment of them. For example, in Shakespeare's ➤ Hamlet 'madness' is transferred from the hero onto Ophelia, and an analysis of that process situates the reader/spectator within a complex process of the construction of male/female subjectivity as a result. The issue can be complicated further if the writer 'Shakespeare' is taken to be the 'analysand' projecting unconscious desires and feelings through his 'characters' onto the 'analyst' (reader/spectator).

Transferred epithet > Figures of speech.

Transgression

As a term used in contemporary literary criticism, it is generally associated with the concept of 'subversion' insofar as it denotes the act of crossing accepted boundaries. Applied to literary texts it is usually taken to refer to any form of behaviour or representation which challenges the dominant values encoded within the text. A classic example of the process might be the introduction of the act of 'cross-dressing' in a number of ▶ Renaissance drama texts, and the resultant challenge which is posed to the issue of a stable sexual identity. Here, the practical constraints of the ➤ Elizabethan or ➤ Jacobean theatre, involving the impersonation of female roles by male actors, serve to highlight what in the world outside the theatre was becoming a controversial issue as the relative positions of men and women in 17th-century society underwent re-evaluation.

Translation

and participation in wider European traditions. Translation has always been the principal means of assimilating European literatures into the English idiom, and it was particularly important before the 18th century, when the main streams of European cultural life were flowing through other languages. The aim of translators was then less to make an accurate rendering than to make the substance of foreign work thoroughly intelligible to the English spirit; the character of the translation thus proceeded as much from the mind of the translator as from the mind of the original writer. If the translator had a strong personality, the translation often became a distinguished work of English literature in its own right. Translators with less individuality often produced work of historical importance because of its contemporary influence on English writing.

From the 14th to the 18th centuries, English writers were constantly absorbing the ancient and contemporary Mediterranean cultures of Europe, and worked on the literatures of France, ancient Rome, Italy, ancient Greece, and Spain. There is no distinct boundary between translation and adaptation; > Chaucer brought English poetry into accord with French and Italian poetry partly by freely adapting work in those languages. His outstanding work of translation is his version of Guillaume de Lorris' Roman de la Rose. French ceased to be the first language of the English upper classes in Chaucer's lifetime, but the English nobility continued to have strong ties with French aristocratic culture, and thus translations from French prose were in demand in the 15th and 16th centuries. > Caxton, the first English printer, published many English versions of French romances. The outstanding 15th-century work of English prose was > Malory's > Morte d'Arthur, which Caxton published, and which is partly a translation and partly an adaptation. The work of translation was an important influence on the development of a fluent English prose medium, and this is evident in the difference between Wycliff's 14th-century translation of the Latin Bible and ▷ Tyndale's version of the New Testament from the Greek (1515). Lord Berner's translation of > Froissart's Chronicles is another distinguished example of English prose development in the 15th and early 16th centuries.

Printing, the ➤ Renaissance, and the rise of new educated classes, all helped to expand translation in the 16th century, which was the first major period for translation of classical writers. These had been of central importance in the Middle Ages too (King Alfred and later Chaucer had translated ➤ Boethius' De Consolatione Philosophiae) but knowledge of them had now widened and standards of scholarship had advanced. The first important rendering in English of a great classical poem is that of ➤ Virgil's ➤ Aeneid by the Scots poet, ➤ Gavin

Douglas (1553). ➤ Chapman's Iliad (1611) and Odyssey (1615) are impressive, but have less intrinsic merit as English literature. ➤ Ovid had long been a favourite poet, and translations were made of his poems by ➤ Arthur Golding (1565-67) and ➤ Christopher Marlowe (pub 1597). But in the 17th and 18th centuries the best-known English version of Ovid was George Sandys' version of ➤ Metamorphoses, completed in 1626. Ovid had an extensive influence on poets, including > Shakespeare; > Seneca's influence on the poetic drama, both as a philosopher and as a dramatist, was equally conspicuous, and it was no doubt helped by the historically important but otherwise undistinguished Ten Tragedies, translated by various hands and published between 1550 and 1581. Among the most distinguished prose translators of ancient literature in this period was Philemon Holland, remembered especially for his version of ▷ Pliny's Natural History, which he published in 1601. The best known of all, especially for his value to Shakespeare but also for the quality of his writing, is > Thomas North, whose version (1579) of ▷ Plutarch's Lives was made not from the original Greek but from the French of Jacques Amyot. Several women also produced excellent translations in this period, perhaps because of a reluctance to face the censure inevitable upon the production of their own writing. These female translators include ➤ Ann Bacon; ➤ Mary Basset; ➤ Lady Elizabeth Cary; > Katherine Philips; and ➤ Margaret Tyler.

Translations from the contemporary European languages were also numerous in the 16th and early 17th centuries, and indicate the constant interest of English writers in foreign literatures. Sir John Harington translated ➤ Ariosto's > Orlando Furioso in 1591: > Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered was translated as Godfrey of Bulloigne or The Recovery of Jerusalem (1600); ➤ Castiglione's very influential ➤ Il Cortegiano was translated by Sir Thomas Hoby (1561). The best known of all these contemporary works is > John Florio's rendering of the > Essays of ➤ Montaigne, published in 1603. Part I of Cervantes' > Don Quixote was translated in 1612 before Part II was written; the whole work was three times translated in the 18th century, by Motteux (1712), Jarvis (1742) and > Smollett (1755). The first three books of > Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel were translated notably by Thomas Urquhart; two were published in 1653, and the third in 1694. The fourth and fifth books were added by Motteux in 1708.

Many of the translations made before 1660, especially those in prose, were marked by a superabundance of words, characteristic of much English writing in the 16th and 17th centuries; the originals tended to be amplified rather than closely rendered. After the Restoration in 1660, writers attached importance to discipline and control, and to emulating these virtues as they were exemplified in the old Latin poets and in contemporary French writers of verse and prose. In consequence, ▷ John Dryden accomplished some of his best work in translating Latin poetry, especially Ovid (eg ➤ Philemon and Baucis) and the Aeneid of Virgil, whose works he translated entire, completing them in 1697. ➤ Pope's translations of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, which appeared in 1720 and 1726, greatly enhanced his reputation, but despite the skill of the versification, they are obviously much further from the spirit of Homer than Dryden's renderings are from the Latin poets; the British Augustans were much closer in feeling to the Roman Augustans than they were to the ancient Greeks. As the century went on, writers became restless under Augustan restraints, and became interested in literatures that had hitherto been ignored or despised; > Thomas Gray imitated Icelandic and Celtic verse. Macpherson's versions of Gaelic legends, which he alleged to be by the legendary poet > Ossian, were more inventions and adaptations than translations, but they probably had a wider influence in other countries than any other English work going under the name of translation, with the exception of the English Bible. Sir William Jones (1746-94), the first important British Oriental scholar (> Orientalism) published in 1783 a version in English of the ancient Arabic poems called Moallakat, as well as other work from Persian and from Sanskrit.

Some of the more distinguished translations of the first 30 years of the 19th century, such as Cary's translation in ⊳ blank verse of Dante's Divine Comedy (1805–12), ▷ Coleridge's version of Schiller's Wallenstein (1800), and ➤ Shelley's fragments of ▷ Goethe and ▷ Calderón (▷ Spanish influence on English literature), show the new kinds of influence on the Romantic writers. After 1830, translation became a kind of net for hauling in exotic writings, and its field became very wide, eg > Fitzgerald's version of the Persian poem, The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (1859), ➤ Richard Burton's > Arabian Nights (1885-88), > William Morton's translation of the Icelandic Sagas (beginning in 1869), > Swinburne's versions of Villon, as well as many new versions of the ancient Greek and Latin authors. Two vices of the period were a tendency to make a foreign work express essentially English 19th-century sentiment (eg Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat), and to use peculiarities of style under the mistaken impression that because they gave strangeness to the work, therefore they gave the translation an air of authenticity - a fault which > Matthew Arnold criticizes in his fine essay On Translating Homer (1861). The really influential translations were more often of contemporary writers, such as those by Constance Garnett of the Russian novelists ➤ Tolstoy and ➤ Turgenev

(▷ Russian influence on English literature); William Archer's translations of ➤ Ibsen; and Scott Moncrieff's fine rendering of ➤ Proust's great novel under the title of Remembrance of Things Past. These works bring us into the 20th century, in which translation has been cultivated with a new sense of its importance and difficulties. Among the most eminent of modern translations are ➤ Ezra Pound's Cathay (from the Chinese) and his version of the Old English The Seafarer (1912), and Willa and > Edwin Muir's translations of Kafka (1930-49). In the 20th century translation has become more widespread, making texts in many languages readily available, and this has included critical as well as fictional works. However, while providing us with an international > best seller list, regularly including writers such as Umberto Eco (> Italian influence on English literature) and Gabriel Garcia Márquez (> Spanish influence on English literature), there is a danger that a new saleable canon will be created and more marginal texts will remain trapped by linguistic barriers. Trapnel, Anna (c 1622-c 1660)

Devotional and prophetic writer. Trapnel is one of the most well-known > Baptist and > Fifth Monarchist writers. She discovered her vocation in 1654, when she fell into an 11-day trance at the examination of Vavasor Powell, a fellow Fifth Monarchist. During this time she sang, chanted and spoke in tongues, and upon her recovery her prophecies were published in Strange and Wonderful Newes and The Cry of a Stone (both 1654). Her writings take the form of verse and prose prophecies, which also contain a fair amount of ⊳ autobiographical material, such as her being accused of witchcraft. Although Trapnel asserts that she is simply the mouthpiece of God, her prophecies, given in a dramatic, trance-like state, clearly satisfied her own desire to be the centre of attention. Her other two works, also published in 1654 (Report and Plea and A Legacy for Saints), carry a similar mixture of self-dramatization and Fifth Monarchist propaganda. Bib: Graham E. et al. Travel literature

This large branch of English literature may be conveniently discussed under these headings: 1 fantasy purporting to be fact; 2 factual accounts; 3 travel experiences regarded as material for art.

1 Literature of fantasy purporting to be fact. So long as extensive travel was rarely undertaken, it was possible for writers to present accounts of fantasy journeys and to pass them off as fact without much fear of being accused to lying. Thus a 14th-century French writer wrote the Travels of Sir John de Mandeville, which is a work of fiction or compilation from narratives by other travellers, but purporting to be an account of genuine journeys written by Mandeville himself: The work was translated into English in 1377, became extremely popular, and was long regarded as genuine. Long after the extravagances of the story were seen to be falsehoods, Mandeville, a purely fictional English knight, was thought to be the genuine author.

2 Literature of fact. By the second half of the 16th century, the great Portuguese, Spanish and Italian explorers had discovered the Americas and greatly extended knowledge of eastern Asia. Liars could still find large, credulous audiences, but the facts were marvellous enough to require no distortion. Writers also began to feel strong motives for publishing truthful accounts. Thus > Richard Hakluvt published his Principal Navigations, Voyages and Discoveries of the English Nation in 1589, partly for patriotic reasons. The English had been slow to start on exploratory enterprises, although by this time they were extremely active. Hakluyt, finding that the reputation of his nation stood low among foreigners in this field, wanted to demonstrate the reality of the English achievement, and at the same time to stimulate his fellow-countrymen to further endeavours. His book is really a compilation of accounts by English explorers; an enlarged edition came out in 1598, and a still further enlarged edition was published under the title of Hayluytus Posthumus, or Purchas his Pilgrims by Samuel Purchas in 1625. The accounts vary from those by accomplished writers like ➤ Sir Walter Raleigh to others by writers with little or no experience of writing; they constitute an anthology of early English descriptive writing in which the writers are concerned with the truthfulness of their accounts rather than with entertaining or deceiving the reader. Other examples of this new kind of honest and truthful handling of description language are Captain John Smith's history of the founding of the colony of Virginia, General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles (1624). The contrast between this newer, plainer style and the extravagant and whimsical style more characteristic of the ⊳ pamphleteers can be seen in accounts of travels in Europe by Thomas Coryate (?1577-1617), author of Coryate's Crudities, and Fynes Morison (1556-1630), author of Itinerary: Coryate is deliberately strange and fanciful, though an acute observer, but Morison is much more straightforward.

The steady growth of English overseas trade kept alive a taste for accounts of great voyages throughout the 17th and 18th centuries. At the end of the 17th century Captain William Dampier published three books which included the imaginations of > Defoe and > Swift: and Descriptions (1699), and Voyage to New Holland (1703). Dampier was an excellently direct and clear writer of his own books, but Lord George Anson's voyage round the world (1740–44) was written up from his journals by his chaplain, R. Waters, and depends on the singularly dramatic events for its force of interest. The last of these outstanding accounts of great voyages were the three undertaken by Captain James Cook, A Voyage Round Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope (1773), A Voyage Towards the South Pole and Round the World (1777), and A Voyage to the Pacific Ocean (1784).

New Voyage Round the World (1697), Voyages

3 Travel literature as material for art. Mungo Park's Travels in Central Africa preserves the plain, unaffected style of 18th-century travel literature, but with the discovery by Europeans of the coastlines of Australia and New Zealand, the main outlines of world geography became known to the West, and the interest both of explorers and their readers passed from accounts of great voyages, such as those undertaken by Captain James Cook, to the mysteries of the great undiscovered interiors of the continents. With this change in subject matter, a change also came over the style of travel literature. > Sir Richard Burton's book about India, Scinde or the Unhappy Valley (1851), and his later books about his exploration of East and Central Africa (First Footsteps in East Africa, 1856; The Lake Regions of Central Africa, 1860) bear the stamp of the author's personal feelings and reactions. Partly, no doubt, this arose from the new importance attached to authorial personality due to > Romanticism; also the contact with strange physical environments and peoples (in contrast to the emptiness and impersonality of the ocean) inevitably drew out authorial response. At all events, travel literature began to draw nearer to > autobiography. Not only 'darkest Africa', but the Arabian peninsular fascinated writers. Burton was one of the first Englishmen to visit the holy city of Mecca, and wrote an account of it in Pilgrimage to Al-Medinah and Mecca (1855). Later Charles Doughty tried to restore the vividness of 16thcentury language to 19th-century prose in his Arabia Deserta (1888), and T.E. Lawrence's Seven Pillars of Wisdom (1926) belongs to the same tradition of art made from travel in Arabia. ➤ George Borrow (1803-81) did not go so far for his material, but he went a stage further than these writers in combining travel literature and imaginative art, so that it is difficult to know whether or not to classify his books with the novel. They are full of personal encounters with individuals, chiefly among the common people; he was particularly interested in the gypsies (The Gypsies in Spain, 1841; Lavengro, 1851; Romany Rye, 1857) and he was talented at conveying the intimate texture of the life of a country (The Bible in Spain, 1843; Wild Wales, 1862). James Kingslake's account of his travels in the lands of the Eastern Mediterranean, Eothen (1844), and Lafcadio Hearne's Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan (1894) are two other examples of travel literature which owe their classic status as much to the author's art and personality as to their subject matter. Thus travel literature became a natural subsidiary form for the novelists; it is among the best writing of ▷ R.L. Stevenson.

Many 19th-century British women writers travelled abroad and recorded their experiences in published accounts. > Anna Eliza Bray (1790-1883) and ➤ Frances Power Cobbe (1882-1904) were tourists primarily, and travelled mainly within Europe. Others, including ▶ Frances Trollope (1780–1863), Anna Jameson (1794–1860), ➤ Harriet Martineau (1802–76) and ➤ Barbara Bodichon (1827-01) visited North America and wrote about their experiences in the 'New World'. Bodichon also travelled to the Sahara with ➤ Matilda Betham-Edwards (1836-1919), who published a record of the trip. Another group of women, including ➤ Isabella Bird Bishop and ➤ Mary Kingsley were genuine 'explorers'. Bishop journeyed through China, Japan and India; Kingsley in West Africa.

In the 20th century modernist travel writing may be seen in the works of ▷ D.H. Lawrence and ▷ Joseph Conrad, who, as a sailor, was a professional traveller during the first part of his adult life, and may be said to have completely assimilated the literature of travel into the art of the novel.

Increasing ease of travel since World War II has greatly increased the amount of travel writing. Eric Newby's A Short Walk in the Hindu Kush (1959) has become a classic. Other important contemporary travel writers include Bruce Chatwin (1940−89). In critical terms travel writing has increasingly been examined in relation to gender, ▷ colonialism and Imperialism.

Travers, Ben (1886-1980)

British dramatist famous for his 'Aldwych farces', performed at the Aldwych Theatre by casts which included Mary Brough, Robertson Hare, Ralph Lynn, and Tom Walls. The first of these was A Cuckoo in the Nest (1925), followed by several others including Rookery Nook (1926), Thark (1927) and Plunder (1928). At the age of 89 he wrote the 'sex comedy' The Bed Before Yesterday, which was first performed in 1975, by which time Travers was able to deal explicitly with matters which he had previously only written about implicitly. Treasure Island (1883)

A romance by the novelist ➤ Robert Louis Stevenson, perhaps his best known work. It is set in the 18th century and the plot concerns the search for hidden treasure buried in a desert island by an actual 18th-century pirate, Captain Kidd. The story contains the basic elements of a traditional English > romance - treasure, pirates, adventure, a desert island - and belongs to a line of desert island literature descending from Defoe's Robinson Crusoe (1710).

Treatise of Human Nature

➤ Locke, John.

Tree, Sir Herbert Beerbohm (1853-1917) English actor-manager famous for his productions at the Haymarket and Her Majesty's theatres, and for founding the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. Productions at the Haymarket included > Oscar Wilde's A Woman of No Importance (1893), Shakespeare's The Merry Wives of Windsor (1889) and Hamlet (1892). Most successful was an adaptation of a George Du Maurier novel, > Trilby (1895), the proceeds from which enabled him to build Her Majesty's. The repertoire at Her Majesty's was dominated by Shakespeare and historical verse drama. His Shakespeare productions were illustrative of the fashion of the period for spectacular 'romantic realism'. Detailed ostentatious sets, busy stage action and sometimes bizarre stage additions were all characteristic of these productions, disparagingly referred to by designer Gordon Craig as 'beautiful copies of Irving' (> Henry Irving). Tree combined the qualities of the showman and pioneer. The Shakespeare festivals at Her Majesty's from 1905 to 1913 matched those being given by actor-manager Frank Benson at Stratford. He also championed the cause of ▷ Ibsen, by running matinée performances of An Enemy of the People.

Tremain, Rose (b 1943)

Novelist, playwright and short-story writer. Educated at the Sorbonne and the University of East Anglia, she has worked as a teacher, assistant editor and researcher and since 1980 has been a full-time writer and part-time lecturer in creative writing. Her novels are in most cases unsentimental accounts of the loneliness and emotional relationships of ageing or unfulfilled characters: Sadler's Birthday (1976); Letter to Sister Benedicta (1978); The Cupboard (1981); The Swimming Pool Season (1985); Sacred Country (1992). Restoration (1989) is a historical novel, set in the Restoration period and narrated by the King's fool. Volumes of short stories: The Colonel's Daughter (1984); The Garden of the Villa Mollini (1987). Drama: Mother's Day (1980);

Yoga Class (1981); Temporary Shelter (1984); Evangelista's Fan (1994). She has also written books for children, a biography of Stalin and The Fight for Freedom for Women (1973).

Tressell, Robert (pseudonym of Robert Noonan) (? 1870–1911)

Novelist. Tressell worked as a painter and decorator, and is remembered for his posthumously published novel The Ragged Trousered Philanthropists (1918; first full edition 1955). A ▷ naturalistic account of a year in the life of a town's working men (in the decorating and undertaking businesses), the novel is a powerful attack on the greed of employers (the philanthropy in the title is an ironic reference to the exploited workers), and has become a classic of working-class and left-wing fiction. Bib: Alfred, D. (ed.), The Robert Tressell Lectures, 1981–88.

Tricoteuses

The 'knitters', from the French tricoter = to knit. A name given to the women who brought their knitting to the debates in political assemblies during the > French Revolution. In English fiction, Madame Defarge in Dicken's novel > A Tale of Two Cities knits the names of those who are to meet death by the guillotine into an endless scarf. A symbolic modern incarnation of the tricoteuses is found in > Conrad's > Heart of Darkness.

Trilby (1892)

Novel, written and illustrated by ▷ George du Maurier. It tells the story of Trilby O'Ferrall, an artists' model in Paris with whom all the art students fall in love. She comes under the mesmeric influence of Svengali, a German-Polish musician who makes her famous. His spell is so strong that when he dies she loses her voice, fails and dies herself. The novel enjoyed enormous popularity and was dramatized in 1895. Trilby's soft felt hat with an indented crown is the original 'trilby'.

Triolet

A graceful verse form of eight lines and two rhymes with a rhyme scheme abaaabab. It was invented in France in the 13th century, and was not used in England till the 17th century. Like other verse forms which have little merit beyond their gracefulness, it has seldom been used in English except by minor poets, and those chiefly of the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Triple-decker/three decker

A novel published in three volumes. This was the dominant form of fiction during the period from the 1820s until 1894, and the novels were distributed primarily via the ▷ circulating libraries, such as ▷ Mudie's.

Triplet

In verse, three lines rhyming together, occasionally used among ▷ couplets to introduce variety. A good example may be found in ▷ Dryden's ▷ MacFlecknoe; the '}' was often used to link the 3 lines:

Where unfledg'd Actors learn to laugh and cry, Where infant Punks their tender Voices try, And little Maximins the Gods defy.

Tripp, John (1927–86)

Poet. Born at Bargoed, Glamorgan, and brought up in Cardiff. After working as a journalist in London, Tripp returned to Wales in 1969, becoming the literary editor of Planet from 1973 to 1979. His main poetic themes are the history of Wales and the present condition of its people, its focal point his denunciation of the shoddy materialism that has severed the Welsh people's links with their past, so that his work often describes how the once great and famous have fallen on harder times. John Tripp refused to compromise his strong left-wing and pacifist convictions; often abrasive in his personal relationships through frustration with the national condition, he used a contemporary vocabulary and a vigorous style in his poetry, though he could stand back and cast a critical eye on himself as poet-observer, obliged to suffer suburban living but still capable of humour, anger and compassion. His collections of poetry are: Diesel to Yesterday (1966); The Loss of Ancestry (1969); The Province of Belief (1971); Bute Park (1971); The Inheritance File (1973); For King and Country (1980); and Passing Through (1984). A selection of his poetry appeared in the Penguin Modern Poets series (1979) and his Collected Poems 1958-1978 was published in 1978. Bib: Stephens, M. (Ed.), The Oxford Companion

Tristan and Iseult

There are many medieval and post-medieval versions of the tragic love affair between Tristan (Tristram/Tristrem) and Iseult (Iseut/Isolde/Isolt/Isode); however, if the lovers' tragedy is a fixed element in their history, details of why and how it happened are not. It seems likely that their love story has a source in early Celtic legendary narrative: Tristan seems to be a transfiguration of the 8th-century Pictish Prince Drust, and there are Irish analogues to the story of the erotic triangle which forms the basis of the Tristan and Iseult narrative. But there are no Celtic versions of the love story which pre-date the French versions, composed in the later 12th century.

In the mid-12th century Tristan is mentioned as an ideal lover in the lyrics of the ≥ troubadours, which suggests some version of his story was circulating at this time. Fragments of longer vernacular narratives about Tristan and Iseult are extant by ➤ Thomas (c 1175) and Deroul (c 1190). De Marie de France also included an episode from the lovers' history in her collection of Lais, and > Chrétien de Troyes claimed to have produced a version of the story too, though no trace of the text has survived (his romance, Cligés, contains many references to the affair between Tristan and Iseult). From the fragments by Thomas and Béroul, and from their subsequent reworkings (especially in early medieval German versions), some idea of the overall story-line may be established.

Tristan is the son of Rivalen and Blancheflor (the sister of King Mark of Cornwall). Blancheflor dies the day her son is born, and he is brought up as an orphan until he is old enough to go to Mark's court, where he kills the Irish champion, Morholt. Later he is given the task of finding a bride for Mark. Tristan travels to Ireland, is wounded in a fight against a dragon, and is nursed by the king of Ireland's daughter, Iseult. She manages to identify Tristan as the killer of her brother Morholt; however, she saves Tristan's life on condition that he rescue her from an unwanted marriage. Tristan takes Iseult back to be Mark's wife, but on the voyage to Cornwall they accidentally drink a love potion which had been designed for Iseult and her future husband, and so they fall passionately in love. Their love affair continues after Iseult's marriage to Mark (with the help of Iseult's maid), but rumours about their adultery finally reach Mark. Later, after the affair has been exposed, Tristan goes into exile in Brittany, and marries another Iseult (of the White Hands), although the marriage is never consummated. When, at a later stage, he is wounded by a poisonous weapon, he calls for Iseult of Ireland to come to heal him: if she consents, the ship which carries her is to have white sails; if not, her message is to be carried in a ship with black sails. Although Iseult comes to Tristan's aid, Iseult of the White Hands tells Tristan that a ship with black sails is approaching. At this news Tristan dies. Iseult, realizing she has come too late, dies of grief beside Tristan.

The status of the love potion (whether it is a permanent or temporary spell, whether it is a metaphor for their love, rather than a literal love potion) is a variable element in the love story. So too is the means by which the lovers are exposed and punished by Mark: in some versions the lovers are condemned, but Tristan manages to escape and rescue Iseult from a group of lepers to whom she has been given for their pleasure; in some versions Iseult survives a truth ordeal by swearing an equivocal oath, and the lovers subsequently run away to live together for a time in a forest. The story of frustrated and passionate love arouses very different ethical responses, too, from medieval poets and prose writers: Tristan and Iseult have an equivocal status as exemplary lovers, being famous and infamous, a subject for praise and blame. Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan (c 1210) provides one of the most celebratory versions of the story, which strongly affirms the metaphysical status of the bonds between these two lovers (and this, in turn, is the source for Wagner's opera of 1865, Tristan und Isolde).

The experience of Mark, Iseult and Tristan clearly offers a parallel to, and perhaps a prototype for, the other major erotic triangle of Arthurian romance involving ➤ King Arthur, > Guinevere, and > Lancelot. And in the later French prose versions of the Tristan story (dating from the 13th century), the friendship between Tristan and Lancelot is developed: in these versions, substantial accounts are added of Tristan's adventures as a Knight of the Round Table, and in these versions he is killed, finally, by King Mark himself. > Malory's long 'Book of Sir Tristram' is a reworking of the French prose Tristan (c 1225). The 13thcentury English verse romance, Sir Tristrem (in the ➤ Auchinleck manuscript), provides an incomplete reworking of Thomas' 12th-century Tristran.

➤ Tennyson, ➤ Matthew Arnold, and ➤ Swinburne are among the later poets to take Tristan and Iseult as their subjects, and of these, Tennyson presents the least sympathetic, and most critical interpretation of the lovers' experience.

Tristram Shandy, The Life and Opinions of (1760-7)

A novel by ➤ Laurence Sterne, published in successive volumes, I to IX from 1760 to 1767. Any attempt to paraphrase the 'plot' of this eccentric masterpiece would be doomed, like trying to net the wind. Sterne deliberately flaunts his freedom to tease and surprise the reader with his interruptions and digressions. 'If I thought you was able to form the least judgement or probable conjecture to yourself, of what was to come in the next page,' he writes, 'I would tear it out of my book.' Tristram, the nominal hero, plays little part in the action of the book, though as the authorial voice of the narrative his random associations determine its form. As a character he is not born until volume IV, and never gets beyond infancy. The bulk of the novel is taken up with the theories and hobby-horses of Tristram's father,

Walter Shandy, and his uncle Toby; these two brothers appear like comic caricatures of ➤ Locke's theory of the association of ideas. Each of them is trapped in his own private world of associations; for Walter these centre on his obsessions with noses and names; for Toby they are based on military science and his quest to determine the circumstances of the wound in the groin which he suffered at the seige of Namur. The other characters, Dr Slop, Corporal Trim, parson Yorick, Mrs Shandy and the Widow Wadman are swept up in the general associations − many of them sexual − of noses and wounds, breeches and ballistics.

'Shandy' is an old Yorkshire dialect word meaning crackbrained, odd or unconventional, and it suits this book perfectly. With its black and marbled pages, its flash-backs and interpolations, its asterisks, blanks and dashes, this novel defies any attempts to unscramble a straightforward narrative theme. The effect on the reader is to suggest that the conventional notion of a biographical narrative, with a distinct beginning, sequence of events and ending, is untrue to human experience which finds that beginnings do not really exist, and orderly sequences are frustrated by every kind of distraction. Tristram Shandy has been called 'the greatest shaggy-dog story in the language' and a > satiric > essay on human misunderstanding. It is a joyous, exuberant cock-and-bull story, in which the juggler Sterne shamelessly leads the reader by the nose on an endless quest for the elusive copula that links cause and effect, intention and achievement.

A play by ➤ Shakespeare, written 1601–2, and first printed in 1609. Its position in the first collected edition of Shakespeare's plays, the folio of 1623, is curious, inasmuch as it was placed by itself and not in one of the three groups of histories, tragedies and comedies. Shakespeare used as sources ➤ Caxton's Recuyell of the Histories of Troy (1474), translated from the French of Raoul le Febvre; ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Troilus and Criseyde, especially for Pandarus and the love story; ➤ Chapman's translation of the ➤ Iliad (for Thersites); and possibly ➤ Lydgate's Troy-book.

Troilus, son of King Priam of Troy, woos Cressida, with the help of her uncle, Pandarus. Meanwhile the war continues between the Trojans and the Greeks; the latter are doing badly, because their chief warrior, Achilles, is sulking in his tent. The subtle Ulysses contrives a plan to rouse Achilles by provoking his vanity; he chooses the brutishly stupid Ajax to fight the Trojan champion, Hector; the ruse is successful. A pact is made of an exchange of prisoners, and the Trojans consent to hand over Cressida, whose father has deserted to the Greeks; she and Troilus part, with many promises of fidelity, but she quickly becomes the mistress of the Greek Diomed, to the bewildered disillusionment of Troilus, who sees her in Diomed's arms during a truce. The end of the play is a chaos of fighting, in which all higher emotions are lost in a rage of murderous hatred, and Hector, the noblest character in the play, is treacherously murdered by Achilles.

What bewilders critics is the hopelessness of the play. Two of the finest episodes are debating scenes, during the first of which (I. iii) the Greeks discuss their failure in the cold light of reason; in the second (II. ii) the Trojans defy reason for the sake of emotional dedication to 'honour'. But the play shows that reason alone conduces to ignobility and treachery, while honour alone is defeated by the facts of human nature. The voice of truth seems to be the mocking one of the Greek clown Thersites, who despises everybody and respects nothing. A possible view is that the much-prized virtue of honour, so cultivated by > Renaissance courtiers, is an idealistic value, a literary growth in terms of which real life cannot be evaluated, whereas the 'reason' of politicians by itself destroys the value of living. This interpretation makes the play more an affair of light-hearted mockery than it is commonly taken to be; it is frequently interpreted as a grim and despairing > satire.

Troilus and Criseyde

Description Chaucer composed Troilus and Criseyde some time in the 1380s (before 1388). His contribution to the medieval Troy story was not to produce an English version of the history of Troy, from beginning to end (in the tradition of Benoît de Sainte-Maure and Description of Guido de Columnis), but to refract the Troy story through that of the relationship between Troilus ('little Troy') and Criseyde, organized as an epic love-tragedy, with a five-book division and elaborate apostrophes and a palinode. The siege of Troy and past Trojan and Greek history form a significant backdrop to, and determining influence on, the conduct and outcome of their affair.

The outline of Chaucer's narrative is taken from ▷ Boccaccio's ▷ Il Filostrato but in addition to developing the background to their story, Chaucer changes some aspects of the presentation of its key characters, not least in the role of the narrator himself, who no longer presents Troilus' experience as a cipher for his own but adopts the familiar 'ineffectual' Chaucerian role. Pandaro, the go-between figure in Boccaccio's version, is a cousin of Criseida and a peer of Troilus; in Chaucer's version, Pandarus is Criseyde's uncle and, though still a lover himself, plays the role of an avuncular confessor to Troilus. His engineering power is increased on a local domestic scale and his role as stage-manager of their affair is enhanced, but his controlling powers are markedly circumscribed at the same time: he may be on hand literally to help Troilus into bed with Criseyde but his resources diminish as the larger context of the siege intervenes in the lovers' lives. Criseyde is more vulnerable, naive and sensitive to the pressures around her than her counterpart in Boccaccio; there is no precedent for her presentation as a woman under siege within a siege. Troilus is a more bookish lover in Chaucer's version, who has a lyrical tradition of love sentiments at his command, and his songs and monologues in Book III celebrate his relationship with Criseyde in metaphysical terms. However, Chaucer is not presenting a Divine Comedy in this narrative but a pagan history, and one in which human love is subject to the forces of time and change.

The organization of the poem into five books reflects the progress of the love affair: the broad opening panorama of Book I gives Troilus and Criseyde a place in the wider history of Troy; the focus narrows in Books II and III, which chart the increasing self-involvement of the lovers as they create their own private world within Troy. Book IV marks the interruption of the historical world into their affairs, with the plan to exchange Criseyde; and the final Book sketches the 'changing' of Crisevde, her transferral to the Greek camp and engagement with Diomedes, Troilus' reluctant perception of her change, and his final change, as he ascends the spheres after his death and laughs at the behaviour of mortals, their loves and longings, on little earth. The book ends with its 'maker' committing it to the care of his peers 'Moral ➤ Gower', and 'philosophical Strode'.

Novelist. The unbusinesslike qualities of his father, a barrister who forsook the law and ruined himself in farming, caused his childhoodto be poverty-stricken, although his mother > Frances Trollope kept her family from the worst hardships by writing. Trollope himself was a prolific novelist, and though he worked seriously his Autobiography (1883) deeply offended the taste of the time by his frank statement that the writing of novels was a craft and a business, like making shoes, with nothing exalted or inspired about it. He was a strong admirer of the novels of > Thackeray and shared Thackeray's contempt for the commercial arrogance of the British upper-middle classes. On the other hand, unlike Thackeray, Trollope had also strong faith in the traditional virtues and values of the English gentry, and several of his novels are about how the gentry class opened its ranks (through marriage, and after a struggle) to the best elements of less-privileged classes. His first novel was published in 1847, but it was in 1855 that he published the first of his most famous series, the > Barsetshire novels - > The Warden. The series continued with Barchester Towers (1857); > Dr Thorne (1858); Framley Parsonage (1864); The Small House at Allington (1864); > The Last Chronicle of Barset (1867). It is in these books that he displays his very conservative values most winningly and convincingly; they present a world of very solidly portrayed church dignitaries and landed gentry and show a loving care for fully-rounded characterization. The world he shows with such conviction was perhaps already passing, and in presenting it Trollope does not forget the weaker side of its values nor the assaults and encroachments upon it of political adventurers and the more vulgar of the middle class. His later work became more political, for instance Phineas Finn (1869); > The Eustace Diamonds (1873); Phineas Redux (1874); The Way We Live Now (1875); The Prime Minister (1876); The Duke's Children (1880). Some critics consider that this group of his novels is unduly neglected; the setting is commonly London, which Trollope thought a source of evil, and the tone is more critical of society. The Way We Live Now reflects his disillusionments most strongly; it includes a powerful portrait of a fraudulent tycoon in Melmotte, and is not so much political as a devastating social study.

Trollope lost favour after his death, but regained strong popularity in the mid-20th century. This was because this period of insecurity and war made Trollope's world of traditional values seem very reassuring. Yet critics seldom allow him rank equal to his contemporary ▶ George Eliot; he does not even pretend to insight as deep, or tragic vision, though he is often subtle and fond of pathos. Trollope, Frances (1780-1863)

Born Frances Milton in Somerset, the daughter of a vicar, she married in 1809 and had six children, including the novelist > Anthony Trollope. She began writing when she was over fifty to support the family in the face of her husband's financial disasters and published in all some 114 books on > travel, and novels. Despite the financial success of her first book she worked extremely hard, from before dawn each day, writing and caring for her family. She visited North America for an extended period and lived in France, Austria and Italy (meeting the > Brownings, > Dickens and > Walter Landor) for a few years. Her writing owed its popularity perhaps to her scathing views of Americans, also to its exuberant quality and her rather coarse, humorous women. Domestic Manners of the Americans (1832) brought her fame and popularity; Paris and the Parisians (1835), Vienna and the Austrians (1838) and A Visit to Italy (1842) were also successful. Her novels include The Vicar of Wrexhill (1837), portraying a mixture of vice and religion, The Widow of Barnaby (1838) and The Life and Adventures of a Clever Woman (1854). Trotter (Cockburn), Catherine (1679-1749) English dramatist and, after her marriage to the Reverend Patrick Cockburn in 1708, writer of theological works. Until 1707 she was a Roman Catholic. She began publication very young with the ⊳ epistolary novel Olinda's Adventures or, The Amours of a Young Lady (1793), and her verse dramatization of ➤ Aphra Behn's story Agnes de Castro was acted at Drury Lane in 1695. The Fatal Friendship (1698) was her most admired play. She contributed to The Nine Muses (1700). In 'To Mrs Manley' on Delarivière Manley's play The Royal Mischief (1696) she wrote 'Th' Attempt was brave, how happy your success, / The Men with Shame our Sex with Pride confess.'

Her other publications include: The Unhappy Penitent (1701).

Troubadour and Minstrels

Court poet-composers of southern France (trouvères is the term for their northern French counterparts), who produced a sophisticated poetic corpus which reflected and promoted an emerging secular court culture in early medieval France. The troubadours are renowned for their love poetry, and their highly formalized descriptions of the experience of love and desire, often expressed in terms of a relationship of feudal service between the male speaker and his desired lady (> Courtly Love). But their work is far from homogeneous: it includes a wide variety of lyrical genres and sub-genres (laments, dawnsongs, > pastoral poems and debates), may be satirical (> Satire) as much as celebratory, and is always highly self-conscious about the literary nature of the experience it

Some of the early poet-composers (as opposed to jongleurs who performed the work of others) were from the ranks of the social elite: the earliest poet whose name and work has survived is that of Guilhelm IX, Duke of Acquitaine (fl 1071–1127), but although their milieu was undoubtably that of the court most troubadour poets were not aristocrats themselves but professionals who made their living from their art. Some work by women troubadours has survived too, though this has attracted less attention than that of their male counterparts.

The legendary status of some of the 12th-century poets in particular was promoted by the appearance in the 13th century of prose 'Lives' (Vidas), which provided idealized histories of the poets to match the substance of their poems. But the high status of these court poets also derives from their influence on later medieval writers, including ▷ Dante and ▷ Petrarch. Trov

Ancient capital city of the Troad, a region on the north-west coast of Asia Minor; strictly, the capital was Ilium (in Homer's ▷ Iliad) and Troy and Ilium have become alternative names for the same city. Troy is the subject of legends which began in ancient Greek times and were added to by the Romans, and further expanded by medieval writers in Western Europe. Somewhere behind the legends is a background of historical fact, but this is very obscure.

1 Historical background. Archaeologists and historians doubted whether a real city of Troy ever existed, until the German archaeologist Heinrich Schliemann discovered its remains near the modern Hissarlik, very near the traditional site. Subsequently, excavations uncovered nine cities in successive levels; the earliest (Trov I) dates from 3000-2500 BC, and the latest (Troy I) faded away in about the 5th century AD. Opinion has been divided about whether the Trojan war was fought against Troy 6, which in fact was destroyed by earthquake and fire about 1800 BC, or the rebuilt city known as Troy 7A, destroyed by similar causes in about 1200 - nearer the traditional date of the Trojan War in which the city is supposed to have been destroyed by the alliance of Greek princes.

2 Greek myths of the fonding of Troy. These recount a succession of mythical princes, the earliest being of divine or semi-divine origin: Teucer, Dardanus, Ericthoneus, and Tros - from whom the name of the country and its people originated. Tros' son Ilus was the founder of the city of Ilion (Ilium) or Troy. In the reign of Laomedon, son of Ilus, the walls of Troy were built by the ocean god Poseidon, to whom Laomedon refused the agreed reward; he was in punishment killed, together with most of his family, by the hero ➤ Heracles. One of his two surviving children was ⊳ Priam, who was king of Trov in the Trojan war and met his death after the capture of the city. Priam's children included:

→ Hector, the Trojan hero of Homer's Iliad;
 → Paris, whose elopement with → Helen was the cause of the war;
 → Cassandra, the sombre prophetess; and → Troilus, around whom legends were to be constructed in medieval times. Ilus' brother Assaracus was ancestor of another line of heroes who were to become more important in Roman and medieval European myth: this line of descent went through Capys, Anchises and Aeneas, who according to the Roman poet → Virgil was the ancestor of the Roman people.

3 Troy epic. The legendary Trojan war led to three epics: Homer's Iliad, about the siege; Homer's ▷ Odyssey about the wanderings of Odysseus after the siege; and Virgil's ▷ Aeneid, about the wanderings of Aeneas until he finds his destination in Italy. Homer's epics arise out of still more ancient legends, but their own date is uncertain, as, to some extent, is their authorship; scholars do not think that they can be later than the 7th century BC. Virgil's poem dates from the 1st century BC, and is a deliberate attempt to emulate Homer. The three poems are the pattern of a tradition of European ▷ epic ─ eg Milton's ▷ Paradise Lost.

4 Trojan myth in western Europe to AD 1500. The prestige of Homer and Virgil kept Trojan myth alive and growing in the Middle Ages of Europe, but these poets were not the only source of its growth. Two collections of writing, alleged to be records of the Trojan war, and to be by ▷ Dictys the Cretan and > Dares the Phrygian, are the source of new legends, including indirectly that of ➤ Troilus and Cressida. Virgil's view that the Romans were descendants of the Trojan Aeneas led to legends that other European nations have similar ancestry. For instance, The History of the Britons by the Welsh chronicler Nennius (8th-9th centuries) declares the ancestor of the British race to have been Brutus (> Brut), the great-grandson of Aeneas: this is repeated by the 12th-century > Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Tudor, House of

The name of a family that ruled over England and Wales from 1485 until 1603. The succession was as follows: ▷ Henry VII; his son, ▷ Henry VIII; Henry VIII's three children, ▷ Edward VI, ▷ Mary I and ▷ Elizabeth I. Elizabeth died childless, and the throne passed to the Scottish family of ▷ Stuart, one of whom (James IV) had married a daughter of Henry VII.

The Tudors were of Welsh origin; Henry VII was the grandson of Owen Tudor, who married a member of the Lancastrian branch of the royal Plantagenet family. Henry thus acquired the claim of the House of Lancaster to the English throne, which he won at the Battle of Bosworth, the concluding battle of the Wars of the Roses, where he defeated ➤ Richard III of the House of York.

The Tudor family was notable for its abilities. Henry VII was a cautious ruler. who reconstructed the government's finances. Henry VIII started the > Reformation in England by founding the > Church of England, and this became distinctively Protestant under the boy king Edward VI. Mary I was a Catholic, married Philip II of Spain, and reestablished Catholicism in England, but she died childless, and Protestantism was restored by her sister Elizabeth, possibly the most successful sovereign ever to sit on the English throne. The last ten years of Elizabeth's reign saw the beginnings of the literary flowering known as the 'Elizabethan age'. Her reign was also remarkable for victory over Spain and the beginnings of English overseas enterprise.

Tudor myth

A term used by historians to express the 16thcentury belief, encouraged by the royal House of > Tudor, that the Tudors were national saviours from the horrors of the Wars of the Roses and restorers of legendary national greatness. The first Tudor, > Henry VII, took the throne from > Richard III in 1485 by force of conquest, and since usurpation of a kingdom from its rightful king was a deadly sin, it was important for the Tudors to prove that they had not been guilty of it. Henry maintained that his was the rightful claim, but this was too clearly open to doubt; however, if Richard III was a proved tyrant, the usurpation was justified. Sixteenthcentury historians made it their business to blacken Richard's character, not only to please the Tudors, but in reflection of national relief that they had brought the civil wars to an end, with the consequence that Richard is the legendary evil man of English history. Such is the picture given by > Thomas More's Richard III (1513), > Edward Hall's Union of the Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York (1548), and > Holinshed's Chronicles (1578). The Tudors also encouraged the belief that, as a Welsh line of princes, they could trace themselves back to King > Arthur, the hero of the mythical British golden age. Henry VII called his eldest son Arthur, but he did not live to succeed to the throne. The impress of the Tudor myth is strong on > Shakespeare's > history plays.

Poet and translator. Turberville was secretary to ▷ Thomas Randolph, and during 1568–9 went with him on a political mission to Russia, where he met Ivan the Terrible. An account of this journey was reprinted by ▷ Hakluyt. He also knew ▷ Drummond, ▷ Gascoigne and ▷ Harington. Turberville is chiefly known for his translations of ▷ Ovid, early experiments with ▷ blank verse (Epitaphes, Epigrams, Songs

Turgenev, Ivan Sergeevich (1818-83) Novelist and dramatist. Born in Orel, central Russia, educated at Moscow and St Petersburg Universities and Berlin. After a brief spell in the civil service he devoted himself to literature. In 1852 he was imprisoned for a month for his article on the death of Ukrainian writer Gogol (1809-52), and was subsequently banished to his estate. He left Russia in 1861 and, apart from a few visits, remained in self-imposed exile, largely in Baden Baden and Paris, where he died, although he continued to write of Russia and his own class, which he perhaps sensed was doomed. The novels have something of an autumnal character. He fell in love with the singer Pauline Garcia Viardot who did not give him an easy life, and this is also reflected in the novels in the theme of a strong woman and rather weak man. He knew ▶ Flaubert. > George Sand and other French writers, and from 1847 visited England. He was widely read in English, admiring > Shakespeare greatly; he knew and valued ▶ Charles Dickens and > George Eliot, and was acquainted with ➤ William Thackeray, ➤ Anthony Trollope, > Thomas Carlyle, > Robert Browning, ➤ Alfred Tennyson, the ➤ Rossettis and others. He admired, met and influenced ▷ Henry James, and influenced many writers including → George Moore, Joseph Conrad (1857–1924) and Virginia Woolf. He published a little poetry in 1838 but his first published prose was A Hunter's Notes (1847-51). He wrote a series of novels illuminating social and political issues: Rudin (1856), A Nest of Gentlefolk (1859), On the Eve (1860), Fathers and Sons (1862), Smoke (1867) and Virgin Soil (1877). His short stories include 'Asya' (1858), 'First Love' (1860) and 'Torrents of Spring' (1870); his most famous and critically acclaimed play is A Month in the Country (1850).

Turn of the Screw, The (1898)
A novella by ▶ Henry James, published in The Two Magics. It is a ghost story, about a governess given sole charge of two children, Miles and Flora, in a country house named Bly. She comes to believe that she has to contend with the evil, ghostly influence of two dead servants, Peter Quint and Miss Jessell, over the children, who are ostensibly angelic but invisibly corrupted. Flora is taken away to London by the housekeeper, but Miles, when confronted by the governess with her belief, dies in her arms. The possibility that the governess is an hysteric who hallucinates the ghosts and herself manipulates the children provides a second layer of meaning. This layer is, however, absent in Benjamin Britten's opera of the same title. James' story, which he described as 'a trap for the unwary', is a masterpiece of ambiguity throughout.

Poet. Born in Edinburgh, Turnbull has long been a passionate champion of contemporary writing, especially visible since he set up the small but influential Migrant Press in the late 1950s. He has also been important in bringing ➤ Basil Bunting's work to prominence in Britain. His works include: A Trampoline, Poems 1952–1964 (1968); Scantlings (1970); A Gathering of Poems 1950–1980 (1983); and A Winter Journey (1987).

A famous English highwayman and thief, hanged at York for horse-stealing. He was greatly romanticized by the novelist ▶ Harrison Ainsworth in his novel Rookwood (1834), in which Turpin's famous ride from London to York on his mare, Black Bess, is described. The ride, like other romantic episodes told about him, is fictional.

Nigerian novelist. Tutuola was born in Abeokuta, Western Nigeria, where he was educated at an Anglican school. He served in the RAF in Lagos (1943-46) and later worked for the Nigerian Broadcasting Corporation. His first novel. The Palm-Wine Drinkard and His Dead Palm-Wine Tapster in the Dead's Town (1952), was one of the first Nigerian novels in English and received praise for its vivid and playful use of language. The patronizing tone of some early critical treatments of his work provoked hostility to it in Africa, but it was defended by ▶ Chinua Achebe in Morning Yet on Creation Day (1975). Twelfth Night, or What You Will (1599–1600) A comedy by ▷ Shakespeare, probably written 1599–1600 or possibly a little later. Its main source is a prose tale, Apolonius and Silla (1581)

by Barnabe Rich, an English version of an Italian tale by Cinthio (> Elizabethan Novels). The comic situations arising from confusion between twins come down from Menaechmi by the Roman playwright > Plautus; Shakespeare had already adapted this play into ▷ The Comedy of Errors. Two 16th-century Italian plays, Inganni (Deceits) and Gl'Ingannati (The Deceived) have also been suggested as possible sources. The setting is the court of Orsino, Duke of Illyria, and the house of the wealthy Countess Olivia, whom he is courting. He uses as a go-between his page Cesario, really a girl, Viola, disguised as a boy. The page has already fallen in love with Orsino, and expresses sentiments on love so elequently to Olivia that the Countess believes herself in love, but with the page, not with the Duke. Meanwhile, Viola's twin brother, Sebastian, turns up, wearing the same style of clothes that his sister has chosen to wear as Cesario; he has been rescued from shipwreck by a seacaptain, Antonio, who feels a deep affection for him. The possibility of confusion is clearly various and great, and every possible confusion occurs. A subplot centres on Olivia's drunken kinsman, Sir Toby Belch, and her conceited steward, Malvolio; Sir Toby takes revenge on Malvolio for an insult, and incidentally gets mixed up in the confusions occurring round Viola and Sebastian by playing a trick on his friend, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, who is also courting Olivia. Sir Toby's interference ends in a clearing-up of the confusions of identity, and a subsequent suitable pairing off of Orsino and Viola, Sebastian and Olivia.

The comedy can be regarded as being about different forms of love, or imagining oneself to have fallen in love, and though the plot is bewildering in summary, it is deftly worked out theatrically and beautifully balanced, with finely cadenced poetry and a more unifying theme than any earlier comedy by Shakespeare. The title, like ➤ A Midsummer Night's Dream and ➤ The Winter's Tale, indicates the sort of occasion for which the story is suitable: Twelfth Night was the last night of the Christmas festival and a time of licensed disorder presided over by a Lord of ➤ Misrule, such as Sir Toby Belch. Although this title has often been seen to have little to do with the thematic content of the play, recent criticism suggests that the sense of misrule may be seen in attempts to cross class barriers (Malvolio), success at so doing (Maria), and the general economic self-sufficiency of Feste (▷ New Historicism).

Two Gentlemen of Verona, The (1594) An early romantic comedy by ➤ Shakespeare, probably written about 1594.

Shakespeare's source seems to have been a Spanish tale, Montemayor's Diana. The plot is a double love-affair with complications: Proteus is in love with Julia, and Valentine with Silvia, but Proteus plays both Valentine and Julia false in his efforts to win Silvia. Julia follows Proteus, disguised as a page, while Valentine, by the contrivance of Proteus, has to flee and takes refuge as the captain of a band of robbers. Proteus in the end is confronted by both Valentine and Julia, and happiness is restored by his suitable repentance. In plot, poetry and characterization the play is clearly very immature, though it has a limpid charm. There is an element of low-life comedy in the role of Launce, servant to Proteus, accompanied by his dog. Julia's disguise and the sentiment of the play look forward to the much more interesting > Twelfth Night.

Two Noble Kinsmen, The
A play of romantic love chiefly by ▷ John Fletcher, perhaps in collaboration with ▷ Shakespeare. It was probably written in 1612-13, and was printed in 1634. The plot derives from ▷ Chaucer's Knight's Tale (▷ The

Tyler, Margaret (c 1578) Translator. Little is known of Margaret Tyler's life, the only biographical information coming from the dedicatory letter to her A Mirrour of Princely Deedes and Knighthood (1578), where she states that she belongs to the rich, ▷ Catholic Howard household. The preface to A Mirrour is important for students of women's history since it forthrightly states that women may write imaginative literature as well as men: 'my perswasion hath bene thus, that it is all one for a woman to pen a story, as for a man to addresse his story to a woman'. She also deals with the importance of female > patronage. Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

Tyndale, William (?1492–1536)
A translator of the Bible; his version was a principal basis for the Authorized Version of 1611. He was a convinced Protestant. His other works include: Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1528), Obedience of a Christian Man (1528), and Practice of Prelates (1530). These works influenced the forms that the extreme Protestantism of ➤ Puritanism took in England. In 1535, while on a visit to the Netherlands, he was arrested and later burned as a heretic

Tyrwhit, Elizabeth (c 1530–78)
Devotional writer. Lady-in-waiting to ➤ Katherine Parr, she belonged to the queen's circle of Puritan women and only narrowly escaped being arrested for her outspoken ➤ Protestantism. Her Morning and Evening Praiers, with divers Psalms, Himnes and Meditations (1574) were published in Thomas Bently's collection of works by pious women, The Monument of Matrones (1582). The work consists of several unimaginative verses and a series of prose meditations; overall Tyrwhit's concern is more with the plain presentation and interpretation of female piety and spiritual learning than with literary skill or finesse. She was governess to > Elizabeth I and the queen's own copy of Morning and Evening Praiers survives (in the British Library); it is bound with gold, has enamelled portraits of Solomon and Moses on the covers, and is furnished with rings to attach it to a woman's girdle.

Udall, Nicholas (1505-56)

Dramatist and translator. Udall began his career as a school master (most famously becoming headmaster at Eton College), but won favour at court in 1533 when he wrote ▷ masques for the coronation celebrations of Anne Boleyn. His work as a translator was encouraged by ▷ Katherine Parr for whom he translated ▷ Erasmus' version of the New Testament. Although a staunch Protestant he remained in favour at the accession of the Catholic ▷ Mary I. It was during this period that he wrote ▷ Ralph Roister Doister, the first English comedy.

Ulysses

A novel by ➤ James Joyce, and one of the key texts of > Modernism. It was first published in Paris in 1922, but was banned in England for its alleged obscenity until 1936. In a number of ways the book is an innovation in methods of presenting human experience through the novel form, and it is also the most ambitiously comprehensive attempt to do so, except perhaps for Joyce's next book, > Finnegans Wake (1939). It is an attempt to present a character more completely than ever before. The story shows in immense detail the life of a man during a single day of 24 hours. The man is Leopold Bloom, a Jew of Hungarian origin living in Dublin; the day is 16 June 1904. To do this requires a method of conveying the process of thinking; Joyce's method has become known as the > stream of consciousness technique, suggested to him by the work of a French novelist, Dujardin, and deployed by his contemporaries ➤ Dorothy Richardson and ➤ Virginia Woolf (➤ Henri Bergson). At the same time as seeking to create imaginatively 'a whole individual', Joyce seeks to make this individual representative, by setting him against the background of the oldest extended portrait of a man in European literature. He does this by making Bloom analogous with > Homer's Odysseus, and by dividing the book into episodes, each of which corresponds to one in the \triangleright Odyssey, though not in the same order. Jovce varies the technique of written expressions so as to make his language as close an analogy as possible to the modes of modern human experience. Thus in the fierce drunken episode 15 (Circe), the method is dramatic dialogue; in the fatigued anti-climax of 17 (Ithaca), the questionnaire is used; in the final episode 18 (Penelope), the stream of consciousness is used to the full, without punctuation.

No human experience is complete without relationship; Bloom is a lonely man, with numerous casual acquaintanceships. However, two deeper relationships dominate his story: there is the physical relationship with his wife, Molly, whose fidelity he more than mistrusts, and a spiritual affinity with > Stephen Dedalus, whom he does not meet till near the end, but who is a lonely young man unconsciously seeking a father, as Bloom is a lonely middle-aged man wanting a son. Molly is analogous to Penelope in the Odyssey and Stephen relates to Telemachus, the wife and son respectively of Odysseus.

In some respects Joyce is carrying the artistic devotion of the French novelists to an extreme: Ulysses is an elaborate formal construction of immense seriousness, showing a dedication to art for its own sake comparable to that of the novelist ▷ Flaubert; it is also a realistic exercise, carrying to extreme the ▷ Naturalism of ▷ Zola. It is also remarkable for its parodic comedy and ▷ carnivalesque sense of fun and its radical image of a 'world turned upside down', which is developed fully in Finnegans Wake. Finally, it is a vivid tribute to Joyce's Dublin, from which he had become self-exiled.

Under the Greenwood Tree (1872)
The first of the ▷ Wessex novels by ▷ Thomas Hardy. The story is a village love affair between a schoolmistress, Fancy Day, and Dick Dewy, son of a 'tranter' or carrier of goods. It includes the theme of the rivalry of the village orchestra, who have hitherto played the music in church services, with Fancy, who takes over from them by substituting the harmonium. The story is thus slight and idyllic compared to Hardy's later Wessex stories but it is written with delicacy and insight. The title is the first line of a song in Shakespeare's As You Like It.

➤ Lowry, Malcolm.

Under Western Eyes (1911)

A novel by ➤ Joseph Conrad. It is set in prerevolutionary Russia and in Switzerland, and is told through the character of the English language teacher, who witnesses many of the events in Switzerland, and reconstructs those in Russia from the notebooks of the central character, Kyrilo Sidorovitch Razumov. Razumov is the illegitimate son of a Russian nobleman, and has been brought up in the household of a Russian priest. He is given to understand that if he behaves well, his real father will assist him in his career; accordingly he is studious at the university, and keeps himself rigorously isolated from student politics. His enigmatic silence on political subjects, however, is misinterpreted by the radical students as signifying that he is a strongly committed supporter of revolutionary activity; thus, when one of them, Victor Haldin, commits a political assassination and takes refuge with him, Razumov tries to disembarrass himself by betraving Haldin to the police. The police, however, will not allow him to return to his solitary studies; instead they send him to Switzerland, ostensibly as a revolutionary emissary, but actually to spy on the Russian revolutionaries in exile there. He finds them to be a circle composed partly of flamboyant or brutal self-seekers, such as Peter Ivanovitch, Madame de S., and Nikitin (nicknamed Necator, the killer). But there are also idealists of complete integrity, including Victor Haldin's sister, Nathalie Haldin. Nathalie is a pupil and friend of the English language teacher, who thus becomes involved in the story. She welcomes Razumov as a revolutionary hero, and the friend of her brother, for whose death he has in fact been responsible. Razumov is tormented by his guilt, his love and admiration for Nathalie, his horror and contempt of the debased elements among the revolutionaries, and the seeming impossibility of recovering his integrity and living otherwise than by false appearance. Eventually he confesses the truth to Nathalie and to the revolutionaries, and is reduced to total deafness by two blows from Nikitin. Nathalie is appalled, but understands him. She has told her English friend: 'You belong to a people which has made a bargain with fate, and wouldn't like to be rude to it.' The Western (British and Swiss) attitude to politics and the individual is such that fateful choices such as the one forced on Razumov are not demanded. His drama 'under the Western eyes' of the English language teacher is the drama of a nation where the individual is not permitted to withdraw from political decision into private life. Razumov spends the rest of his days as a sick man in Russia, respected by the best of the revolutionary circle whom he has known in Switzerland, and cared for devotedly by one of them.

Underhill, Cave (1634-?1710)

Actor. Underhill joined John Rhodes' company before the Restoration, and afterwards became a member of the ▷ Duke's Company under ▷ Sir William D'Avenant, specializing in comic roles, including the eponymous Cutter, in ▷ Abraham Cowley's Cutter of Coleman Street, the first Gravedigger in ▷ Hamlet, and the Clown in ▷ Twelfth Night. Tall, with a large face, flat nose, and 'unwandering eye', coupled with an apparently stolid, stupid, or lugubrious manner, he is said to have inclined people to laugh, merely by looking at him.

of his Works in 1640–1. In the first edition of his works (1616) a collection of his poems had been given the title 'The Forest'.

Unfortunate Traveller, or the Life of Jack Wilton, The (1594)

A romance by > Thomas Nashe, published in 1504. Wilton begins as a page in the court of ▶ Henry VIII, and then travels through Europe as adventurer, soldier of fortune, and hanger-on of the poet Henry Howard, > Earl of Surrey. It is one of the first notable > picaresque tales in English. Among other historical figures, apart from Surrey, Wilton meets > Sir Thomas More, ➤ Erasmus and ➤ Pietro Aretino; he witnesses historical events, such as the struggle between the Anabaptists of Munster and the Emperor Charles V, and describes a plague in Rome. The book is extremely episodic, and lack himself has no consistent character. The narrative begins as a sequence of mischievous pranks in the manner of the popular 'jestbooks' of Nashe's time, and at the other extreme goes into brutally realistic descriptions of rape and of the plague in Rome. Nashe's story is remarkable for its creation of a self-conscious narrative voice, and in its awareness of its status as a text that is created by the activity of a reader. At the same time, its delight in the grotesque, and in a constantly re-iterated > discourse of bodily distortion and pain, serves to make the work one of the most vivid attempts at linguistic refashioning in the 16th century.

Uniformity, Acts of Laws passed by Parliament during and after the > Reformation to secure religious union in England. The first was that of 1549 (under > Edward VI) and the second and more important in 1559, under > Elizabeth I. Both required the common use in church worship of > The Book of Common Prayer. In 1662, under > Charles II, another Act of Uniformity insisted on its use by all clergy and schoolmasters, and marks the beginning of the dissenting sects as formally separate religious bodies, distinct from the > Church of England.

Union, Act of (1707)

Government Act by which > Scotland was united with England, and given representation at Westminster. The Act was imposed on Scotland as an English reaction, during a period of war with France (> Spanish Succession, War of), to continuing Scottish efforts to achieve greater independence from England, and to restore to the throne the deposed > James II, and then his descendants. The aim was to pacify Scotland, and prevent any possibility of an alliance between that partly Catholic nation and France. Under the legislation, the Scots were allowed to vote on all issues in both the House of Commons and the House of ▷ Lords, and in return they had to agree to the Hanoverian (▷ George; Windsor, House of) succession. Much bitterness was created by the loss of Scottish autonomy which the Act entailed.

Unionist

A name used by politicians from 1886 to express opposition to Home Rule for Ireland, ie a separate Parliament for that country. The word at first united Conservatives with a number of Liberals who resisted the Home Rule policy of their leader, ➤ Gladstone. Later 'Unionist' became synonymous with 'Conservative', and it is still used by members of that party, though it officially accepts the existence of the Irish Republic.

Unitarianism

A doctrine of religion that rejects the usual Christian doctrine of the Trinity, or three Persons in one God (the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost), in favour of a belief in the single person of God the Father. It originated in Britain in the 18th century and was in accord with the rationalistic approach to religion of that century. The first Unitarian church opened in London in 1774; many English > Presbyterians (in the 16th and 17th centuries one of the largest sects outside the Church of England) became Unitarians.

United Company, The

Acting company formed by the union of the ➤ King's Company with the ➤ Duke's Company in 1682. In effect the stronger Duke's Company absorbed what had been its rival for 21 years, because of the latter's ailing state. The United Company lasted until 1695, when its leading players, including > Thomas Betterton, ➤ Elizabeth Barry, and ➤ Anne Bracegirdle, defected, because of a dispute with the theatre management, and moved to the remodelled > Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre. Until that time the United Company occupied both the Theatre Royal at > Drury Lane and the > Dorset Garden Theatre, using the Theatre Royal mainly for plays and Dorset Garden for the larger spectacles and musical performances.

Unity Theatre

A left-wing amateur theatre group founded in London in 1936, with the aim of dramatizing current affairs such as the Spanish Civil War, the popular front against war and Fascism, and the problems of unemployment. The use of theatrical documentary and group composition was innovatory at the time. The company was influenced by European developments in the theatre, but more so by the Living Newspaper method developed in America, 'a method which makes a continual claim to observed truth, to verified fact, whilst at the same time ordering and shaping these facts dramatically so they are charged with emotion'. Notable productions were: Clifford Odets' Waiting for Lefty (1936); > Brecht's Señora Carrar's Rifles (1938); Busmen (1938), a collectively written piece; and ➤ Sean O'Casey's The Star Turns Red (1940). A left-wing amateur company of the same name was formed in Glasgow in 1941.

University Wits

A group of young men in the reign of > Elizabeth I who were educated at either Oxford or Cambridge Universities, and then embarked on careers as men of letters. Their names were > John Lyly, dramatist and writer of the kind of romance known as the > Elizabethan novel; > George Peele, dramatist; > Robert Greene, dramatist; > Thomas Lodge, who tried most of the branches of contemporary literature; > Thomas Nashe, novelist and pamphleteer; > Christopher Marlowe, dramatist. To these, the name of > Thomas Kvd is sometimes added, although he is not known to have attended a university. Lyly was a writer for court circles, but the others were representative of a new kind of writer (of which > Shakespeare was also an example) who sought his fortune with the general public. Most of them had some kind of influence on, or relationship with, Shakespeare: Lyly used the kind of sophisticated diction which Shakespeare partly emulated and partly parodied in > Love's Labour's Lost and elsewhere; Green wrote a mellifluous > blank verse that anticipates some qualities in the earlier verse of Shakespeare, and was the author of the 'novel' Pandosto, source of > The Winter's Tale; Lodge wrote Rosalynde, the source of > As You Like It; Marlowe was the architect of the dramatic blank-verse medium; Kvd possibly wrote the first version of > Hamlet.

Univocal

Having one clear meaning. A univocal text might be considered an opposite of a 'writerly' text (▷ Readerly and writerly texts). Such writing would discourage attention to ambiguity, ▷ polyphony or polysemy.

Unreliable narrator

A ➤ narrator who cannot be relied upon to provide accurate information, so that the reader is obliged to try to deduce, from the possibly misleading account given by such a narrator, the true facts of the case. A narrator may be unreliable because of limited knowledge or understanding (eg the idiot Benjy in the first section of William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury), because of being in a disturbed state of mind (eg the governess in one possible reading of ▷ The Turn of the Screw by ▷ Henry James), because of personal bias or dubious moral values (eg Dowell in ▷ Ford Madox Ford's The Good Soldier), or out of sheer wilfulness (eg the narrator of ▷ Peter Carey's Illywhacker). Unreliable narration tends to emphasize the subjective nature of truth and the technique often tends towards the implication that there is no such thing as an objective viewpoint.

Unsworth, Barry (b 1930)

Novelist. Unsworth was born in Durham and educated at Manchester University. He worked for several years for the British Council in Athens and Istanbul, and Greece and Turkey have often provided the settings for his fiction, which deals with the passions and moral ambiguities arising from the meetings of cultures and ideologies. His novels include: The Partnership (1966); The Hide (1970); Mooncranker's Gift (1974); The Big Day (1976); Pascali's Island (1980); The Rage of the Vulture (1982); Stone Virgin (1985); Sugar and Rum (1988). The Booker Prize winning Sacred Hunger (1992) is a sea-tale in the tradition of ⊳ Conrad and ⊳ Golding, recounting the vovage of an 18th-century slaver; its wealth of historical detail and strongly sustained narrative make for a powerful indictment of the slave trade, and, by implication, the exploitation engendered by an unfettered and amoral free market.

Unto This Last (1860-2)

Four essays on political economy by ➤ John Ruskin. They were intended to be part of a larger treatise, but their publication in the > Cornhill Magazine aroused so much hostility that the editor (> William Thackeray) discontinued them. The reason for the anger was that Ruskin (an art critic) was, as it seemed to the public, stepping out of his professional function in order to attack the predominant economic theory of trading relationships, which he was considered by the middle-class public unqualified to do. The middle classes were inclined to believe that the subject had been reduced to the clear elements of a science by the political economists and ▶ Utilitarian thinkers of the first half of the 19th century - men such as > Jeremy Bentham, David Ricardo, (1772-1823), ➤ Malthus, James Mill (1773-1836) and > John Stuart Mill. Ruskin pointed out that what was called 'political economy' was really 'commercial economy' and that it was untrue since it omitted facts of human nature, unjust since it unduly favoured the employing middle class and uncivilized since it omitted the cultural values that ought to underlie wealth. He found space to praise

▷ Charles Dickens' novel ▷ Hard Times, itself an attack on Utilitarianism. In spite of the hostility and scorn of Ruskin's contemporaries, much of his thinking in these essays has been accepted by later sociologists and economists. The Indian leader Mahatma Gandhi admitted a debt to Unto This Last, as did a number of the early leaders of the British Labour Party.

Upward, Edward (b 1903)

Novelist. He was educated at Repton School and Cambridge University with ▶ Christopher Isherwood, with whom he invented a fantasy world, Mortmere, a setting for bizarre and anarchic stories which survive only in Upward's The Railway Accident (1969). Journey to the Border (1938) reflects Upward's commitment to Marxism; it ends with the neurotic protagonist rejecting his fantasies in favour of the 'real world' of the Worker's Movement. In the Thirties (1962), which > Stephen Spender described as 'the most truthful picture of life in that decade', is the first part of a trilogy, The Spiral Ascent, which examines the conflict between private fulfilment and political activism. The trilogy concludes with The Rotten Elements (1969) and No Home But the Struggle (1977). Story collection: The Night Walk (1987).

Urn Burial, or Hydriotaphia (1658) A treatise by ▷ Sir Thomas Browne, published in 1658. Its starting-point is the discovery of ancient burial urns in Norfolk; this leads to an account of various ways of disposing of the dead, and meditations on death itself.

Uther Pendragon

King of Britain, father of ▷ King Arthur. In ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of British history, his title 'Pendragon' (lit. 'head of dragon') derives from his commissioning of two dragon banners, which commemorate the dragon-shaped portent which appeared to him at the moment of his father's death. ▷ Merlin is on hand to explain the significance of the dragon sign, which anticipates both Uther's and Arthur's great achievements.

Utilitarianism

A 19th-century political, economic and social doctrine which based all values on utility, ie the usefulness of anything, measured by the extent to which it promotes the material happiness of the greatest number of people. It is especially associated with ▷ Jeremy Bentham, at first a jurist concerned with legal reform and later a social philosopher. Followers of the movement are thus often called 'Benthamites' but Bentham's disciple ▷ John Stuart Mill used the term 'Utilitarians'. Owing to their habit of criticizing social concepts and institutions on strictly rational tests, the leaders of the movement were also known as Philosophical Radicals.

Utilitarianism dominated 19th-century social thinking, but it had all its roots in various forms of 18th-century rationalism. In moral philosophy David Hume (1711-76) had a strong influence on Bentham by his assumption that the supreme human virtue is benevolence, ie the disposition to increase the happiness of others. Psychologically, Bentham's principle that humans are governed by the impulses to seek pleasure and avoid pain derives from the associationism of David Hartley (1705-57). But Bentham and his associates believed that the virtue of benevolence, and human impulses towards pleasure, operate within social and economic laws which are scientifically demonstrable. Bentham accepted Adam Smith's reasoning in The Wealth of Nations (1776) that material prosperity is governed by economic laws of supply and demand, the beneficial operation of which is only hindered by governmental interference. ➤ Malthus, in his Essay on the Principle of Population (1798), maintained that it is mathematically demonstrable that population always tends to increase beyond the means of subsistence, and David Ricardo (1772-1823), a friend of Bentham's, applied Malthus' principle to wages, arguing that as the population increases wages will necessarily get lower, since the increase is more rapid than that of the wealth available to support the workers, Smith, Malthus and Ricardo were masters of what was called the science of political economy, and the inhuman fatalism with which they endowed it caused to be known as the ≥ dismal science. However, it was not dismal for the industrial middle class of employers, whose interests it suited; they were already 'utilitarians' by self-interest and thus willing converts to the theory.

Thus the operation of Utilitarianism in the 19th century was paradoxical. It liberated society from laws which were inefficient survivals from the past (the Elizabethan Poor Laws) but it replaced them by laws that often operated with cold inhumanity (eg the ➤ Poor Law of 1834). It reduced senseless government interference with society but its concern with efficiency encouraged a bureaucratic civil service. It liberated the employers but it was often unsympathetic to the interests of the employees. Its principle was benevolence but its faith in reason often made it indifferent to individual suffering. The inhumanity of the creed, and its indifference to cultural values unless they could be shown to be materially useful, caused it to be vigorously attacked by leading writers between 1830 and 1870, including ➤ Thomas Carlyle, > Charles Dickens, > John Ruskin and ➤ Matthew Arnold. But perhaps its sanest and most lucid critic was John Stuart Mill; though himself a Utilitarian to the end of life, he saw the philosophical limitations of the movement and exposed them in his essays in 1838 on Bentham and on ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834) whom he admired as the father of the opposing tendency of thought. Mill's essay Utilitarianism (1863) emphasized that some kinds of pleasure are better than others - a distinction Bentham failed to make and that the highest virtue in humanity is 'the desire to be in unity with our fellow creatures'. Mill was aware, as Bentham had not been, of the importance of the artistic imagination, in particular of poetry, in a civilization.

Our society is still in many ways utilitarian but as a systematic philosophy Utilitarianism did not outlast the 19th century. The last important figures connected with the movement are the philosophers > Herbert Spencer and > Leslie Stephen.

> Unto This Last.

Utopia (1516)

A political and philosophical treatise by ➤ Sir Thomas More, in the form of an account of an imaginary, newly discovered country. It was written in Latin, and translated into English (after More's death) in 1551; it had already been translated into French (1530), and such was the European fame of the book that Italian, Spanish and German versions also appeared.

The idea of a fictional country was no doubt stimulated by recent Italian, Portuguese, and Spanish exploration, and in particular by ➤ travel literature such as Amerigo Vespucci's account of his travels (1507). Philosophically, the book is a pure product of ▷ Renaissance ▷ humanisim, and like other products of that movement, it was inspired by the ancient Greek philosopher > Plato. The land of Utopia is the Platonic ideal of a country, only to be realized on the assumption that man is basically good. Private property is replaced by communal ownership; there is complete freedom of thought; war is regarded as abominable, and to be used only in the last resort, when it should be waged as effectively as possible, even, if necessary, by unscrupulous means. Earthly happiness is glorified; the good life is the life of mental and physical fulfilment, rather than the medieval Christian life of self-denial and asceticism, but the Utopians are humane and benevolent, not self-indulgent. There is perfect mutual respect, and women receive the same education as men.

Utopian fiction

More's ➤ Utopia introduced into the English language the word 'utopian' = 'imaginary and ideal', and started a succession of 'utopias' in English literature. The idea of inventing an imaginary country to be used as a 'model' by which to judge earthly societies did not, however, originate with More, but with his master the Greek philosopher > Plato, who did the same in his dialogues Timaeus and the Republic. Utopia's most notable successors in the 17th century were Bacon's unfinished New Atlantis (1626), in which science is offered as the solution for humanity, and James Harington's Oceana (1656), which put forward political ideas that were to have a powerful influence in America. In the 20th century, > H. G. Wells was, in his earlier days, a vigorous utopian: Anticipations (1901), A Modern Utopia (1905), and New Worlds for Old (1908). Just before Wells, ➤ William Morris' News from Nowhere (1890) is a noteworthy socialistic utopia.

However, from the 18th century, much utopian literature is satirical, intended to give warning of vicious tendencies of society rather than to exemplify ideals. An example of this is Bernard de Mandeville's (1670-1733) Fable of the Bees (1714), about the downfall of an ideal society through the viciousness of its inhabitants; and Swift's > Gulliver's Travels (1726) can be put in the same class. In the 10th century the best known examples are Samuel Butler's ➤ Erewhon (1872) and Erewhon Revisited (1901). In the 20th century, fears for the future of mankind have predominated over the optimism about inevitable progress which was more typical of the 19th century, and this has led to a new kind of utopian writing, portraying our own society set in the future, showing our fears realized. For this kind of work, the term 'dystopia' has been invented. The first striking example was > Aldous Huxley's Brave New World (1932), about the deadness of a civilization which has come to be dominated by scientific technology; > E. M. Forster's tale The Machine Stops has a similar theme, and both are written in reaction against H. G. Wells' optimism about technology. ➤ George Orwell's 1984 is a nightmare about 20th-century political totalitarianism, the grimmer, because Orwell brought the date of his anticipated society so close to the time of writing. A number of 20thcentury women writers have explored utopian and dystopian worlds as a means of satirizing or criticizing sexual relations in the modern world, or as a way of exploring new possibilities for gender relations and identities. ➤ Doris Lessing's science fiction explores utopianism, while Marge Piercy's Woman On The Edge of Time juxtaposes an ideal future with the grim present. American feminist writer Charlotte Perkins Gilman's Herland (1916) is perhaps the most famous feminist utopia, whilst ➤ Margaret Atwood's The Handmaid's Tale is a feminist dystopia.

Vagabonds and vagrants

Generally known today as 'tramps'; men and women who have no settled residence or work, but live by begging or 'casual labour', wandering from place to place, finding shelter where they can. The 16th century was a period when vagrancy was a critical problem, for special causes: the dissolution of the ▷ monasteries (1536-9) caused unemployment among monastic servants and tradesmen, and ≥ enclosures of land for sheep-farming and parks evicted peasants from their farms. Some of the vagabonds (also called 'rogues') were wandering entertainers, including actors ('players') unattached to noble households; some were pedlars (like Autolycus in > Shakespeare's > The Winter's Tale) with goods for sale; a special class were the gipsies who appeared in England early in the 16th century. Many, more or less inevitably, became part of the underworld of crime, for which a large slang language of 'cant' grew up: Abraham men = pretended lunatics (Mad Tom, in Shakespeare's > King Lear); 'hookers' or 'anglers' = thieves who extracted goods from houses with a hooked stick; 'rufflers' = highway robbers; 'priggers of prancers' = horse thieves. 'Prig' was at this time a common word for thief. This underworld was the subject of a class of popular literature known as 'rogue pamphlets', the most notable examples of which are ➤ Robert Greene's 'cony-catching' → pamphlets, 1501-2.

The government tried to deal with the problem of vagrancy by constructive legislation (eg the > Poor Law of 1601) and by severity – imprisonment, whipping, and, in the 17th century, branding. Bib: Beier, A. L., Masterless Men: The Vagrancy

Vanbrugh, Sir John (1664-1726)

Architect and dramatist, who designed Blenheim Palace for the Duke of ➤ Marlborough, the Queen's Theatre in the ➤ Haymarket, and (with Nicholas Hawksmoor) Castle Howard in Yorkshire. He also wrote several plays of distinction. The son of a London tradesman whose father was a ➤ Protestant refugee from Ghent, Vanbrugh became a captain under Marlborough, and was imprisoned from 1690 to 1692 in the Bastille, where he wrote parts of his play, ➤ The Provok'd Wife, eventually staged in 1697. His first performed play was ➤ The Relapse: Or Virtue in Danger (1696), ➤ a satiric response to ➤ Colley Cibber's ➤ Reform comedy, ➤ Love's Last Shift. He wrote several other lively comedies, mostly adaptations from the French, including The False Friend (1701), The Country House (1703), Squire Trelooby (1704), and The Confederacy (1705), performed by ➤ Thomas Betterton's company at the newly opened Queen's Theatre, which Vanbrugh managed for a time with ➤ William Congreve.

Vanbrugh was one of the dramatists singled out for attack by > Jeremy Collier in his A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698), to which he responded vigorously in A Short Vindication of the 'Relapse' and 'The Provok'd Wife' from Immorality and Profaneness in 1698. He was knighted and became Clarencieux king-of-arms in 1705, and was made comptroller of royal works in 1714. His last play, A Journey to London, was left unfinished at his death, and was completed by Cibber as The Provok'd Husband (1728). > Richard Brinsley Sheridan reworked The Relapse as A Trip to Scarborough (1777). The original version was revived in 1947 and again by the ➤ Royal Shakespeare Company in 1967. Bib: Whistler, L., Sir John Vanbrugh, Architect and Dramatist; Berkowitz, G. Vanessa ➤ Jonathan Swift's name for Esther Vanhomrigh who was in love with him between the years 1708 and 1723.

Vanity Fair (1874-8)

A satirical ▷ historical novel by ▷ William Thackeray published in monthly issues. The title, borrowed from John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678 and 1684), shows that Thackeray's subject matter is the worldly, materialistic society of his time. He shows his men of religion to be either hypocrites or deluded. ▷ Dissenters, the descendants of Bunyan, include old Osborne, the arrogant, sombre and unfeeling businessman; ▷ Evangelicalism is represented by the hypocritical Bute Crawley.

The novel is subtitled 'A Novel without a Hero' and there is in fact nothing heroic about the society that Thackeray presents. However, its heartlessness and snobbery are skilfully manipulated by the central character, Becky Sharp, an ingenious and vigorous adventuress of poor parentage. She begins her socially ambitious career with a friendship with Amelia Sedley, the soft-hearted, weakly sentimental heroine of the book. Becky tries to marry Jos Sedley, Amelia's brother, a foolish but rich 'nabob'. Frustrated in this, and reduced to being a > governess, she then makes love to the mean and avaricious Sir Pitt Crawley, but makes the mistake of marrying his second son, Rawdon, a gallant but ignorant and dissolute man who, despite his incapacity, is later made Governor of the unhealthy Coventry Islands. Her marriage does not prevent her from pursuing her social ambitions still further by becoming the mistress of the aristocratic and degenerate Lord Steyne. Her ambitions are eventually defeated but she manages to end up as a respected member of society.

Amelia Sedley first marries the worthless young officer, George Osborne, who is killed at the battle of Waterloo. The only fine human values are characterized by his friend, Dobbin, an English ▷ gentleman in the moral rather than the social sense, who eventually becomes Amelia's second husband. The novel is an impressive, if negative, landscape of upper-class society in the first half of the 19th century; its best parts are those that concentrate on Becky Sharp and are written with a keen, sardonic humour. The novel is commonly regarded as Thackeray's most successful work.

Vanity of Human Wishes, The (1749) An imitation of ➤ Juvenal's Tenth Satire in heroic ▷ couplets by ▷ Samuel Johnson. Where the tone of the imitations of ➤ Horace by other poets is detached and urbane, Johnson's poem affects the moral earnestness and ruggedness of Juvenal. The poet reflects upon the vanity of ambition as illustrated by the lives of various historical figures, including ➤ Cardinal Wolsey the statesman, a number of famous scholars, and the 'warrior' Charles XII of Sweden. The poem is remarkable for its sonorous authority of tone, exemplified by the famous first lines: 'Let observation with extensive view, / Survey mankind, from China to Peru'. It is packed with memorable generalizations, expressing a kind of Christian stoicism. All human activity ends in disappointment and all life ends in death: 'From Marlb'rough's eyes the streams of dotage flow. / And Swift expires a driv'ler and a show.' The universality of the poem can descend to mere platitude, and its unremittingly emphatic gloom risks lugubriousness. It has consequently been felt to embody a decadent, mechanically inauthentic Augustanism. In fact, it shows a morally hypersensitive poet taking refuge from despair in satisfyingly rhetorical pessimism and pious abjection: hence its surprisingly moving, personal intensity. It is as much a product of the age of ⊳ sensibility as a 'late Augustan' work.

Vaughan, Henry (1622-95)

Poet. Henry Vaughan, together with his brother Thomas Vaughan (1622-66) the alchemist and poet, was born at Newton-by-Usk in Wales. Vaughan's Welsh roots were to feature prominently in his writing. He termed himself 'The Silurist' after a local Welsh tribe termed the Silures by Tacitus, and his third published collection of poems was entitled Olor Iscanus (1651), which can be translated as 'The Swan of Usk', a reference to Vaughan's native river. In addition to Olor Iscanus, three collections of Vaughan's poetry appeared in his lifetime: Poems with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Englished (1646), Silex Scintillans (1650, revised ed. 1655), and Thalia Redivivia (1678).

Silex Scintillans perhaps provides a clue as to Vaughan's intellectual identity. The title means 'The Flashing Flint' - an image which was given emblematic significance on the titlepage of the collection where a hand, issuing from a cloud, is shown striking fire from a flintstone, fashioned in the shape of a heart. The image, which signifies a 'stony' heart surrendering flames of divine love when struck by God's spiritual force, suggests ➤ George Herbert's influence on Vaughan. But the image, with its conjunction of stone and fire suggestive of a religious awakening (a theme explored in the collection of poems as a whole), also alerts us to another side of Vaughan's writing. In 1655 Vaughan published a translation of an 'Hermetic' work entitled Hermetical Physick and in 1657 appeared his The Chymists Key. Hermeticism - the linking of alchemy, magic and science - might also be thought of as represented in the physical image of the flint flashing with fire. These two elements in Vaughan's intellectual life combine in his poetry in a way reminiscent of ⊳ Thomas Traherne's concern for expressing the physical and spiritual worlds.

Venice Preserv'd: or, A Plot Discovered (1682) ➤ Tragedy by ➤ Thomas Otway, his sixth and last, set in Venice, and based on an original work by Cesar Vischard, Abbé de Saint Real. Jaffeir, married to Belvidera, pleads with her father Priuli, a wealthy Venetian senator, to make peace with him. Priuli adamantly refuses; he is outraged because Jaffeir, having been made welcome in Priuli's house after saving Belvidera's life, 'stole' her from him, and married her secretly. Jaffeir's friend Pierre enters, and privately they commiserate over the tyranny of the Senate. Pierre's beloved Aquilina has been taken from him by the rich, elderly senator Antonio, and Pierre tells Jaffeir his property is being confiscated by Priuli, leaving him and his wife destitute. The two plot rebellion and revenge, but the conspiracy fails, and Jaffeir betrays Pierre, who is taken and condemned to death. But at the end Jaffeir repents, stabs Pierre to preserve him from a shameful death, then stabs himself. Belvidera is driven mad and dies. The tragedy was topical: the character of Antonio is a > satire on the > Earl of Shaftesbury, and the 'plot' referred to in the sub-title was related by many to the Popish plot' to murder ➤ Charles II and reinstate ➤ Catholicism, in which Shaftesbury played a large part. The play has been seen as transitional in the move toward the domestic ➤ tragedy of the 18th century.

Venus and Adonis (1593)

A narrative poem in six-lined stanzas by ➤ William Shakespeare. It is dedicated to Henry Wriothesley, ➤ Earl of Southampton. It is based on the Romano-Greek myth of the love of Venus, the goddess of sexual beauty, for the beautiful youth ➤ Adonis. The poem probably emulates the love poem ➤ Hero and Leander by ➤ Marlowe (completed by ➤ Chapman) and is Shakespeare's earliest published work. The poem reflects the extent to which Shakespeare was indebted to ➤ Ovid, particularly to the ➤ Metamorphoses.

Verbruggen, John (d c 1707)

Actor, singer, dancer, manager, dramatist. He joined the ➤ United Company in 1688, acting at first under the name of Alexander.

A handsome man, Verbruggen was often in trouble because of his fiery temperament: on one occasion he got into a brawl with the Duke of St Albans behind the scenes at ▷ Drury Lane, and afterwards apologized publicly for hitting and insulting the Duke. He created many important roles, including Loveless in ▷ Colley Cibber's ▷ Love's Last Shift and ▷ Sir John Vanbrugh's ▷ The Relapse; Constant in Vanbrugh's ▷ The Provok'd Wife; the King of Granada in ▷ William Congreve's ▷ The Mourning Bride, and Mirabel in his ▷ The Way of the World.

His wife was the actress ▷ Susanna Verbruggen.

Verbruggen, Susanna (?1667–1703)
Actress. Susanna Verbruggen (née Percival) acted at the Theatre Royal, and later at ▷ Dorset Garden, with the ▷ United Company, and in 1686 married the popular actor and dramatist William Mountfort (1664–92). By 1690 she was recorded as being one of the leading actresses of the company. Two years after Mountfort's death, she married the actor ▷ John Verbruggen, and died in childbirth.

Susanna Verbruggen excelled in comedy, was a superb mimic, and according to ➤ Cibber 'gave many heightening touches to Characters but coldly written, and often made an Author vain of his Work, that in it self had little merit.' She was famous for her special talents in men's parts, playing ➤ Bayes in ➤ George Villiers' ➤ The Rehearsal to great acclaim, and in the roles of hoydens and female fops. Cibber described her performance as Melantha in ➤ Dryden's ➤ Marriage à la Mode as '(containing) the most compleat System of Female Foppery, that could possibly be crowded into the tortur'd Form of a Fine Lady'.

Vere Street Theatre

One of the first venues used for stage performances after the Restoration, before the construction of purpose-built theatres, and, like > Lincoln's Inn Fields, it involved conversion of a former tennis court.

Verne, Jules (1828-1905)

French author of adventure stories and ▷ science fiction, notably Voyage to the Centre of the Earth (1864), Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea (1869) and Round the World in Eighty Days (1873).

Vers de société

A kind of poetry originating in France in the 17th century, distinguished by its content, and the treatment of it: light, graceful, witty comment on current manners. In England it was particularly characteristic of the early 18th century − much of the work of ▷ Prior, ▷ Gray and ▷ Swift. An example is Swift's A Soldier and a Scholar (1732).

Vicar of Bray, The

The title of an anonymous 18th-century song in which a parish priest boasts of having changed his views to fit every political and religious regime from the time of ▷ Charles I to that of ▷ George I. The figure may be based on Simon Aleyn, who actually belongs to an earlier period. He was vicar of Bray in Berkshire from about 1540 to 1588, and changed his religion several times to suit the policies of ▷ Henry VIII, ▷ Edward VI, ▷ Mary I, and ▷ Elizabeth I. 'Vicar of Bray' has become a byword for a time-server.

Vicar of Wakefield, The (1761-2)

A novel by ▷ Oliver Goldsmith written 1761–2 but not published until 1766. Dr Primrose, a good-natured and innocent vicar, lives in comfortable circumstances with his wife and six children. Then their life is overturned by a series of disasters, reducing them to poverty and disgrace; the vicar endures his troubles with sweetness and stoicism. Eventually, they are restored to prosperity by the friendship of a benefactor, Mr Burchill, who turns out to be Sir William Thornhill, whose nephew had originally caused their misfortunes. The novel has conventionally been interpreted as a simplistic moral ▷ fable, the chief virtue of which is its ▷ sentimentality. Recent critics however suggest an element of ▷ satiric irony (▷ Figures of speech), drawing parallels with Goldsmith's complex creations in other genres.

Vice, The

A 16th-century term for a type of tempter found in 16th-century ▷ interludes, used for the first time in ▷ John Heywood's Play of the Weather (1533), in which Merry-report is called the 'vice of the play'. The figure has precedents in the devil-tempters which appear in earlier medieval drama, and descendants in the individualized tempters in Elizabethan drama.

Victoria, Queen (1837-1901)

Born in 1819, Victoria came to the throne at the age of seventeen and was the longest reigning monarch in British history. In addition to reestablishing the prestige of the monarchy, she became a monumental symbol for the nation during the 60 years of the greatest power and influence Britain had ever known. The British Empire grew and was consolidated, with her as its figurehead. Her effectiveness as such was recognized by her Prime Minister ➤ Benjamin Disraeli when he induced her to adopt the title Empress of India in 1877. Victoria's jubilees of 1887 and 1897 were great national occasions, on which the sovereign was identified with the nation as never before since the reign of Elizabeth I (1558-1603). Victoria was also seen as an exemplary wife and mother, having nine children with her husband ⊳ Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, whom she married in 1840 and to whom she was devoted. When he died in 1861 she entered a period of mourning that was to end only with her death. She was responsible for setting a standard for the domestic virtues of rectitude of personal conduct and devotion to her husband and family, virtues greatly esteemed by the middle classes at a time when these classes dominated national life. Needless to say she was a life-long opponent of 'women's rights'.

Victoria was well-read; her diaries record her reading of ▷ the Brontës, ▷ Elizabeth Gaskell and ➤ George Eliot, as well as many male writers. She was especially fond of the works of ➤ Tennyson, who became her Poet Laureate in 1850. The Queen wrote scores of letters, which are published in five volumes edited by Roger Fulford, and accumulated over 100 volumes of diaries and journals. Selections from her journals (subsequently destroyed) along with some edited correspondence, have been published in three volumes edited by A.C. Benson and Viscount Esher (1907). The only writings published during her lifetime were Leaves from a Journal of Our Life in the Highlands (1848-61) (1868) and More Leaves (1883), in which she records her travels in Scotland. Villanelle form of courtly grace and sweet tunefulness by the French poet Passerat (d 1602). The form was not much used in England until the period 1880–1910, when a fashion developed – chiefly among minor poets – for all such graceful forms (the ballade, rondeau, triolet, etc.). It consists of five three-line stanzas and a final four-line one; the first and third lines of the first stanza recur, alternately, as refrains and make a concluding couplet to the last stanza.

Originally a rustic song; made into a regular

Villette (1853)

Novel by ➤ Charlotte Brontë. Like her earlier novel, > The Professor, Villette is based on the author's experiences in Brussels, where she worked as a teacher. The narrator, Lucy Snowe, loses her family and means of financial support early in the novel, and leaves for Villette (the name Brontë chose for Brussels) to find employment with Mme Beck, initially as a nursery > governess and later as a teacher in Mme Beck's school. Lucy's pupils are mostly vain, frivolous and shallow, unlike her in personality, but she succeeds in establishing authority. Much of the novel is devoted to the tempestuous relationship between Lucy and the professor M. Paul Emmanuel, Mme Beck's cousin. Ultimately M. Paul establishes Lucy in a school of her own before leaving on a business trip to the West Indies. The ending is ambiguous, for the reader is left to decide whether he returns to marry Lucy or is drowned on the way back to Belgium. The novel fuses Gothic elements with 19th-century ⊳ realism, and the narrative strategy is unusual for its time. Recent feminist criticism has focused on the instability of the narrator's discourse and the gaps, ellipses and psychological projections which appear in Villette's exploration of subjectivity. Villiers, George, 2nd Duke of Buckingham (1627-87)

Courtier and dramatist, son of the statesman, the 1st Duke of Buckingham, who had been a favourite of ▷ James I, and who was assassinated in 1628. Villiers, the 2nd Duke, accompanied > Charles I to Scotland during the > Civil War, and again into exile later. In 1657 he returned secretly to England, and married the daughter of Lord Fairfax, the parliamentary general who had charge of his confiscated estates. These were returned to him after the Restoration. He became one of > Charles II's 'cabal' of intimates, and wrote a number of plays, of which the burlesque > The Rehearsal is the best known. He was parodied by ➤ Dryden as Zimri in ➤ Absalom and Achitophel.

Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) Tract by English writer ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft. It follows her Vindication of the Rights of Man (1790). She returns to the question of women's > education (which she had addressed in > Thoughts on the Education of Daughters, 1787) to argue that uneducated girls are often 'cruelly left by their parents without any provision, and, of course, are dependent on not only the reason but the bounty of their brothers'. She speaks of such women as 'unable to work, and ashamed to beg'. Thus in Wollstonecraft's polemic, work and the ability to work are increasingly seen as important in terms of a woman's selfdefinition and survival in the world. This shifts the debate from the terrain of provision to one of rights, but it is coupled with a spiritual and psychological polemic - she wants women to 'acquire strength of mind and body' to combat their situation physically, but also to resist psychologically the categories constructed for them. She asks, 'Why are girls to be told that they resemble angels; but to sink them below women?' In the same work, Wollstonecraft expresses radical views on > marriage, including the view that seduction should be regarded as marriage (she was writing after ➤ Hardwicke's 1753 Marriage Act made it harder for women to sue for breach of promise) and that 'the man should be legally obliged to maintain the woman and her children, unless adultery, a natural divorcement, abrogated the law.'

Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro) (70-19 BC) Roman poet. He was born on a farm not far from Mantua in northern Italy, and is often referred to as 'the Mantuan'. He greatly esteemed the farming section of society to which he belonged, and valued the farming way of life. He was not, from the place of his origin, of Roman descent, but belonged to the first generation of Italians who felt a consciousness of nationhood, with Rome as their capital. By 40 BC he was in Rome, under the patronage of the wealthy Roman patrician (nobleman), Maecenas. He wrote the first work for which he is famous, the Eclogues or Bucolics (> Eclogue), between 42 and 37 BC; their title merely means short, selected pieces, but his intention was to praise the Italian countryside as the Greek poet > Theocritus had praised the countryside of Sicily. The ➤ Georgics (37-30 BC), written at the instigation of Maecenas to encourage a sense of the value of a stable and productive society, is devoted to the praise of the farming way of life. The > Aeneid written during the remainder of his life, is an ▶ epic about the travels of Aeneas the Trojan, and emulates Homer's > Odyssey. Its purpose is not merely this, but to relate the Romans to the great civilization of the Greeks. on which their own civilization was so much based, by making Aeneas the ancestor of the Roman nation. The Aeneid, with the epics of Homer, is one of the basic poems in the culture of Europe and is taken as a standard for what was, perhaps until the 19th century, regarded as the noblest form of literature.

Not even Homer exceeds Virgil in the extent of his influence and prestige in the 20 centuries of European culture. He did not, like all the Greek poets and many of the Roman ones, have to wait for the > Renaissance to 'discover' him, for he was esteemed in the Middle Ages, when, indeed, he became a legend. This was partly owing to his Fourth Eclogue which celebrated the birth of a child who was to restore the Golden Age (▷ Ages, Golden, Silver), a poem which in the Christian centuries was supposed to be a prophetic vision of the birth of Christ. He was thus regarded as more than merely a pagan poet, and > Dante chose him as his guide through Hell and Purgatory in his 13th-century Christian epic, the Divine Comedy (> Divina Commedia). In direct literary influence, he was, even more than Theocritus, the pattern for > pastoral poetry, and even more than Homer, for the epic, although he was himself a student of both.

Virgin Queen

A name for ▷ Elizabeth I of England, on account of the fact that she never married. The title enabled poets and other writers to associate her with Diana, the Roman goddess of chastity. The first English colony in America was called Virginia by ▷ Sir Walter Ralegh in her honour. The iconography associated with the public persona of Elizabeth is elaborate: see Frances Yates, Astraea: The Imperial Theme in the Sixteenth Century, and Roy Strong, Gloriana: the Portraits of Elizabeth I and The Cult of Elizabeth I.

Virtuoso, The (1676)

➤ Comedy by ➤ Shadwell, which satirizes contemporary scientific endeavour, and the efforts of the > Royal Society in particular. The virtuoso of the title, Sir Nicholas Gimcrack, conducts absurd experiments on respiration, for example, which mock researches carried out by the physicists Robert Boyle, Robert Hooke and other members of the ➤ Royal Society. In the same famous scene, Gimcrack demonstrates swimming upon a table, without the use of water, which he abhors and considers unnecessary to the purpose. The episode ridicules excessive reliance on scientific theory. There is also some serious romantic action involving two pairs of lovers: Longvil and Clarinda, and Bruce and Miranda, as well as scenes which involve the aged Lady Gimcrack's attempts to flirt with the young lovers. An historically interesting element is the besieging of Sir Nicholas' house by weavers, enraged by his purported invention of a mechanical loom.

Vision of Judgement, A (1821)

➤ Robert Southey's poem A Vision of Judgement,

which shows the soul of the dead king George III being received into heaven, provoked ➤ Lord Byron's comic masterpiece The Vision of Judgement. Byron's poem changes Southey's ponderous classical hexameters (> metre) into racy ≥ ottava rima stanzas, and reduces George's ascent into heaven to the familiar genre of a 'Saint Peter sat at the celestial gate' story. George arrives, 'an old man/ With an old soul, and both extremely blind' and has to wait at the gate while Satan and St Michael argue over his immortal destiny. Satan claims him, since despite his 'neutral virtues' he was the constant enemy of political liberty: 'The New World shook him off; the Old yet groans/ Beneath what he and his prepared, if not/ Completed'. The debate is interrupted by the arrival of the devil Asmodeus who, hovering over Skiddaw, has caught the > Poet Laureate scribbling away at 'some libel' (Southey's Vision) and snatched him up to heaven to give an account of himself. After offering to write both Michael's and Satan's biographies for a good profit ('Mine is a pen of all work'), Southey insists on reading his 'grand heroics' to the assembled throng, and in the ensuing desperate scramble to escape, King George slips into heaven unnoticed.

In his poem Byron finally achieved his ambition to rival his literary idol Alexander Pope (1688-1744), and the imaginative élan and iconoclastic inventiveness of the earlier poet's Dunciad are brilliantly emulated. Byron's ottava rima form, however, generates a freer, looser tone than Pope's > couplets, allowing for some touches of magnificent political rhetoric. Moreover, Byron's wittily blasphemous treatment of religion shows a characteristically > Romantic insight. Theology is converted into politics: the angels 'all are Tories', Peter is jealous of Paul as a parvenu, and Satan is compared to an impoverished Castilian nobleman, wary of the 'mushroom rich civilian', Michael, who has supplanted him. Though Southey's gauchely painstaking poem is now quite unread, Byron's parody remains one of the most imaginative comic works in the language.

Voice

One of the five categories in which ▷ Genette analyses narrative discourse, voice is concerned with the way in which the act of narrating is 'implicated in the narrative'; the study of voice in a novel therefore attends to the identity and nature of the ▷ narrator and the real or implied audience or narratees.

Volpone

A comedy in ⊳ blank verse by ⊳ Ben Jonson.

First acted in 1605 or 1606 and printed in 1607, it is often considered Jonson's masterpiece. The names of the principal characters signify their roles in the comedy: Volpone = fox; his servant Mosca = fly, since he is a parasite who tries to take advantage of the vicious natures of everyone; the lawyer Voltore = vulture, Corbaccio = crow, and Corvino = raven, because all three birds feed on dead bodies, and all three men hope to gain from Volpone's will when he dies. Volpone is well aware of this, and pretends to be very ill in order to extract gifts from his so-called friends; Corvino, a jealous husband, is even prepared to sacrifice his wife, the pure-hearted Celia. Mosca tries to outdo his master by blackmailing Corvino, and this leads Voltore the lawver to bring them both to judgement. A subplot concerns an absurd Englishman and his wife, Sir Politick and Lady Would-Be, who are on a visit to Venice (the scene of the play) and are ▶ satires on the contemporary English enthusiasm for financial speculation through fantastic 'projects'. The concentrated satire in the > morality tradition of the main plot rises to heights of great poetry: the play is not, as it first seems, a piece of savage cynicism, because the characters, especially Volpone, have a vivid zest for living which is morally condemned only because they carry it to the point of mania.

> Humours, Comedy of.

Voltaire (pseudonym of François Marie Arouet, 1694–1778)

French writer. He wrote prolifically, and in his own day was regarded as above all a poet and a philosopher, but his international fame rests more on his prose work - satirical essays and the ironical romance, Candide (1759). He is even better known as the pattern of humane intellectuals: he was the determined opponent of beliefs and institutions sanctified by tradition but really disguising the selfishness and inhumanity of privileged classes of society. His dictum 'Ecrasez I' Infâme' (Crush the Evil) is not, as it has often been thought to be, a slogan against religion as such, but against intolerance, superstition and unjustified privileges supported by religious institutions. He gained immense prestige all over Europe, and corresponded with Frederick II of Prussia and Catherine II of Russia. Candide was published at almost the same time as ▷ Rasselas by ▷ Samuel Johnson, and Johnson himself remarked on the extraordinary similarity of their themes, although there was no direct exchange of ideas between the two men. In general, Voltaire had strong sympathies with English trends of thought, and his long visit to England (1726-9) was an important episode in his development. In his Lettres sur les Anglais he used his English experiences as a basis for his attack on the French establishment. Correspondingly, Voltaire was admired in England and his influence is pervasive in English 18th-century writing.

Vorticism

Art movement which to some extent characterizes visual > modernism in Britain, as one of the few discrete and self-conscious avant-garde movements in the British art world. To some extent Vorticism resembles the more famous European movements of futurism, cubism and expressionism, both in its celebration of German aesthetics and the principles of energy, speed, visual violence and dynamism, and in its close relationship with the literary world, particularly with the primarily poetic movement ➤ Imagism. Vorticism was furiously anti-Romantic and anti-representational, with the Vorticist 'mental emotional impulse' (in > Percy Wyndham Lewis' famous words) 'let loose on a lot of blocks and lines', paralleling > Ezra Pound's uncompromising series of poetic rules which would 'break the pentameter' and produce a genuinely new form of writing; the artistic impulse was to unlock the dynamic energy at the heart of images and visual objects. Together, these creative ideas formed (again in Lewis' words) 'the Great English Vortex'. The Vorticists opposed the aesthetics of the > Bloomsbury Group, their less dynamic contemporaries whose arts-andcrafts movement-inspired works strove for visual harmony and integrity; the Rebel Arts Centre was the Vorticists' answer to Bloomsbury's Omega Workshops. The Vorticist magazinemanifesto, Blast, which ran to two famous issues in 1914 and 1915, has recently been republished. Key figures in the movement also include painters and sculptors William Roberts, David Bomberg, Edward Wadsworth, Jacob Epstein, and Henri Gaudier-Brzeska.

Vulgate Cycle

The conventional modern name for a 13th-century compilation of Arthurian prose narratives which collectively provide an encyclopaedic account of Arthurian history, quests and adventures, comprising the Lancelot en prose (which is nearly half the length of the cycle as a whole), the Queste del Saint Graal, the Morte (le roi) Artu, and two Arthurian pre-histories which recount the early history of the ▷ Grail, going back to its place in the Last Supper, the Estoire del Saint Graal, and the early history of ▷ Merlin and the foundation of ▷ Arthur's kingdom, the Estoire de Merlin.

A matrix of cross-references and prophecies gives cohesion to this massive narrative cycle, and allows access to the comprehensive scope of the material through any one of its parts. The cycle is sometimes called the 'Lancelot-Grail' cycle, or the 'Pseudo-Map cycle' (because parts are attributed to the 12th-century writer Walter Map).

Vulgate, The

From the Latin 'vulgatus' = 'made public or common'. The name of St Jerome's Latin version of the > Bible, completed in AD 405. For a long time it was the only authorized text for the Catholic Church. The > Protestants in the 16th century insisted on extending Jerome's principle of making the Word of God common to all, by translating it into other languages, a principle now accepted by the Catholic Church itself.

> Catholicism (Roman) in English literature.

Wace (c 1100-c 75)

Composer of one of the most influential vernacular versions of the history of Britain, the Roman de Brut (completed 1155), which is a close reworking of ⊳ Geoffrey of Monmouth's > Historia Regum Britanniae. In Wace's version, however, the sophisticated court environment over which > Arthur presides is particularly developed. The earliest record of Arthur's > Round Table appears in Wace's text too. What little is known about Wace derives largely from comments included in his other major work of vernacular history, the Roman de Rou (an unfinished verse history of the Dukes of Normandy). It seems that he was born in Jersey, had a clerical education, and was made canon of Bayeux by > Henry II. He aspired to court patronage, but he complains in the Rou of too little material support for his literary labours. The Roman de Brut was reworked in Middle English by ⊳ La3amon.

Wain, John (1925-94)

Novelist, poet and critic. Prose fiction: Hurry on Down (1953); Living in the Present (1955); The Contenders (1958); A Travelling Woman (1959); Nuncle and Other Stories (1962); The Young Visitors (1965); Death of the Hind Legs and Other Stories (1966); The Smaller Sky (1967); A Winter in the Hills (1970); The Life Guard (1971); The Pardoner's Tale (1978), Young Shoulders (1982). Criticism: Preliminary Essays (1957); Essays on Literature and Ideas (1963); The Living World of Shakespeare (1964). His first novel showed him to be a leading member of the school of novelists who concern themselves with the changed surface and social texture of the post-war world. His novels are distinguished by unusual narrative force and economy, and his criticism by the clarity and forthrightness of his judgements. As a poet, Wain's work has been associated with that of the ➤ Movement and with later 'movements' of the 1960s, publishing A Word Carved on a Sill (1956); Weep Before God (1961); Wildtrack (1965); and Feng (1975).

Waiting for Godot (1953)

A play by ▷ Samuel Beckett which could be categorized as a modern tragicomedy. The plot is utterly absurd, which is the point of the play, since it is implying that life itself is absurd (▷ Theatre of the Absurd). Two tramps, Estragon and Vladimir, wait for the mysterious Godot who never arrives. Their only visitors are Lucky and Pozzo, who are locked in a sadomasochistic bonding of master and servant from which there seems to be no escape. Despite its bleak view of life the play has great wit, drawing on the traditions of music hall and popular clowning. It was first performed in Britain in 1955 and is an undisputed landmark in British drama.

Wakefield Cycle

A ⊳ cycle of 32 plays (commonly referred to as the Towneley Cycle after an 18th-century owner of the manuscript), which was performed at Wakefield, Yorkshire in the 15th and 16th centuries, and which is indebted for some of its plays to an early form of the > York cycle. Parts of the cycle were rewritten and revised in a distinctive nine-line stanzaic form, and modern critics have discussed this revision as the work of a so-called 'Wakefield Master', a dramatist of considerable skill with an interest in the possibilities of black comedy. Six plays, including the 'Second Shepherd's play' are wholly in his distinctive stanzaic form, but traces of his influence can be seen in several other plays too. The cycle exists in a single manuscript copy, dating from the mid to late 15th century. Performance of the plays was prohibited in 1576.

Wales

A mountainous country to the west of England; it has been united to England politically since 1536, but it has preserved a national individuality and its native Celtic language. In 1989, 20% of Wales' population of 2.8 million spoke Welsh, but by 1995, this figure had increased to 21.5%. The geography of the country has always been a hindrance to its unity, and before the English conquest it tended to divide into separate northern and southern regions. Just before the ▷ Norman Conquest of England (1066), however, Gruffudd ap Llywelyn, a Welsh prince, succeeded in briefly uniting the country, and Wales in consequence seemed formidable enough for the first Norman king of England, ▷ William 1, to establish three strong earldoms for the defence of England along the Welsh frontier. These earldoms correspond to the former English counties of Hereford, Shropshire and Cheshire, long known as the Marches.

After his conquest of Wales, ➤ Edward I in 1301 gave his eldest son the title of Prince of Wales, a custom which has been followed by many English monarchs since then. However, until the 16th century, they did very little else to govern Wales. The Welsh have twice been influential in English history: once they rebelled with considerable success under ➤ Owain Glyndŵr against ➤ Henry IV (see ➤ Shakespeare's play Henry IV, Part I), and it was a mainly Welsh army that won the Battle of Bosworth (1485) and thus established on the English throne a dynasty of Welsh descent — the ➤ Tudors. The second king of this dynasty,

W

➤ Henry VIII, passed an Act of Union in 1536 which united Wales administratively with England. Since then, the most notable differences between the two countries have been in language and religion.

The ➤ Reformation made slower headway in Wales than in England, but it was effectively established by the end of the 16th century. In the 18th and 19th centuries, Methodism became very strong in Wales, to the extent that the Church of England was disestablished (ie it ceased to be the state Church) by a law passed in 1914. The Welsh Nonconformist churches are thus not 'nonconforming' in the English sense; the country is divided among a number of religious denominations (of which Anglicanism is only one), none of which have any official pre-eminence over the others. The Methodist churches in particular have done much to keep the Welsh language alive and vital. Education is conducted in the Welsh language, mainly in state schools in those regions where families are predominantly Welshspeaking: one or more subjects are taught in the medium of Welsh in 20% of primary and 16% of secondary schools, whereas Welsh is taught as a language in 80% of primary and 88% of secondary schools (these statistics relate only to the state system throughout Wales). The S4C television channel began transmitting late in 1982, its Welsh-language programmes being concentrated in peak-viewing times. The annual cultural festival of the National > Eisteddfod exists to keep literature in the Welsh language alive and healthy. The chief opponent of this nationalism is not English, but industrialism; the main industrial regions are in the south-east, around the capital city of Cardiff, and in the south, around the port of Swansea. In this area, once dominated by coal mining, where steel still plays an important though reduced role, light industries, especially electronics, (sometimes through Japanese and American investment) have relieved some of the problems of unemployment created by post-war pit closures. Historically, however, where there are large towns and urban ways of life, the essential rural and working-class characteristics of Welsh life have tended to anglicization.

Whereas, since 1350, the principal output of literature in ▷ Scotland and ▷ Ireland has been in English, though with Scottish and Irish national colouring, Welsh literature has chiefly been in the native Welsh language. It is thus scarcely possible to say that English literature has been distinctively modified by the literature of Wales, as can be said of the literatures of Scotland and Ireland. Occasionally a writer of English arises with a distinctively Welsh personality, and this is true of two 20th century poets, though they are of very different character: ▷ Dylan Thomas (1914–53) and ▷ R. S. Thomas (b 1913), the former rejecting Wales' language, religion and society, the latter embracing it, learning Welsh as his second language, becoming an Angliean priest, a convinced nationalist and a powerful upholder of Welsh cultural identity. Nor is it common for an English writer to learn Welsh so as to receive influence from Welsh literature, though this is to some extent true of > Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-89). Unfortunately the strength of Welsh literature is especially its poetry, and poetry is never fully translatable. Its best period was the Middle Ages. The majority of Arthurian legend (> Arthur) as we know it is of French, not Welsh, creation, but the oldest parts (eg the figure of ▷ Gawain) have their roots in Welsh myth.

Walford, Lucy (1845-1915)

Scottish novelist, born in Portobello, near Edinburgh. Her first work, Mr Smith: A part of His Life, was published in 1874, and resulted in Walford being presented to Decen Victoria, who had asked to meet the book's author. Walford went on to write more than thirty works, including Pauline (1877); Troublesome Daughters (1880); A Pinch of Bubble (1895); A Dream's Fulfilment (1902) and The Enlightenment of Olivia (1907). She also published two nonfictional works: Recollections of a Scottish Novelist (1910) and Memoirs of Victorian London (1912).

Wallace, Sir William (?1270-1305) A Scottish national hero of the Scottish War of Independence (1296-1328). He cleared most of the country of the English and then gained a major victory over them at the Battle of Stirling (1207), but he was defeated by > Edward I at Falkirk in 1298. Taken prisoner in 1305, he was brought to trial by the English as a traitor; he replied to this charge that he owed no allegiance to the English king and therefore could not be a traitor to him. He was executed. Wallace was one of the first patriots in a nationalistic sense in British history; he received comparatively little help from the Scottish nobility, who wanted to stand well with Edward. He is the subject of a long poem by Henry the Minstrel ('Blind Harry') written about 1461.

➤ Scotland.

Waller, Edmund (1606–87)
Poet. As with so many of his contemporaries, Waller's career reflects the vicissitudes of public life in the revolutionary period of the mid-17th century. As a member of Parliament prior to the ▷ Civil War, he opposed the bishops, but, on the outbreak of hostilities, he was on the Royalist side. In 1643 he was found guilty of plotting to surrender London to the Royalist armies, and was banished. In exile in Paris he became friendly with ▷ Thomas Hobbes, before returning to England (having secured permission) in 1651. On his return he wrote a 'Panegyric to my Lord Protector' (1655) addressed to ▷ Oliver Cromwell, but with the Restoration in 1660 Waller was fully restored to the king's favour, and proceeded to write a second panegyric, this time to ▷ Charles II.

Waller's chief verse collections were his Poems of 1645 (a second part being published in 1600) and his collection of religious verse, Divine Poems (1685). After 1660 he produced numerous occasional verses, including To the King, Upon His Majesty's Happy Return (1660) and To the Queen, Upon Her Majesty's Birthday (1663). But it is as a transitional figure that he has attracted critical comment. Waller's poetry can be seen as marking the transition from the 'witty' > conceits of poets such as > John Donne to the smoother > neoclassicism of 18th-century poetry. Indeed, John Dryden (1631-1700), ignoring figures such as ➤ Robert Herrick and ➤ Ben Jonson, claimed that if Waller had not written, 'none of us could write'

Walpole, Horace (1717-97)

Letter-writer, antiquarian, connoisseur. He was son of the powerful statesman ➤ Robert Walpole, and for a short time followed a political career, but he abandoned it, though he continued his interest in politics. His father's influence procured for him three sinecures (ie posts under the government which carried salaries though they required very little work) and these enabled him to pass his life as an assiduous spectactor and man of pleasure. He developed a strong taste for the ▶ Gothic style in all its forms, converting his house (Strawberry Hill, Twickenham, where he settled in 1747) into what he called 'a little Gothic castle', and writing the first of the ▷ Gothic novels, > The Castle of Otranto (1764). He is chiefly famous for his letters, however, and is regarded as one of the best correspondents in the best period of > letter-writing. Their main quality is their liveliness, humour, and vividness of observation.

Walpole, Sir Robert (1676–1745)

Statesman. He is sometimes called 'the first Prime Minister', meaning that he was the first statesman to hold chief power in the state and at the same time to base this power on the House of Commons. His practice of consulting his ministers in a private office or 'cabinet' and of insisting that they should comply with his policies or resign their posts has also caused him to be credited with the invention of the cabinet system of government. In both, he is a figure of importance in the history of the development of the British constitution. He held power continuously from 1721 to 1742, and was enabled to do so partly by his financial ability (he came to office at the time of the ➤ South Sea Bubble crisis), and partly by the incapacity of the German-born kings, ➤ George I (1714-27) and George II (1727-60), to manage English politics.

▶ Parliament.

Walsh, William (1663-1708)

Minor poet, called by ▷ John Dryden the best critic in the language. The youthful ▷ Alexander Pope was encouraged by his advice that 'though we had several great poets, we never had any one great poet that was correct; and he desired me to make that my study and aim'.

Walsingham, Sir Francis (?1530–90)
Statesman. Walsingham was educated at the Inns of Court and, as a ▷ Protestant, was forced to leave the country during the Catholic reign of ▷ Mary I. He returned under ▷ Elizabeth I and acted as the queen's principal secretary, as well as being an excellent foreign diplomat. He was, however, too blunt for Elizabeth and she never treated him with the respect he deserved, although she did knight him in 1577. He was the main force behind the execution of ▷ Mary Queen of Scots for her implication in the Babington plot. His letters and papers remain extant and are an invaluable source for the history of Elizabethan politics.

Walton, Izaac (1593-1683)

Biographer. Izaac Walton's popular reputation has rested on his ➤ The Compleat Angler (1653, with revised editions in 1658 and 1661) - ostensibly a fishing manual. The comprehensive nature of the work is, however, hinted at in its subtitle: The Contemplative Man's Recreation - an evocation of an idyllic, reflective, > pastoral nostalgia. As a biographer Walton was the author of a series of important 'lives' of 17th-century poets and divines. His Life of John Donne was published in 1658, and was followd by lives of ➤ Richard Hooker (1665), ➤ George Herbert (1670) and Robert Sanderson (1678). The Life of Sir Henry Wotton (> Henry Wotton) first appeared appended to a posthumous edition of Wotton's poetry in 1640 and was published separately in 1651. The two biographies of Donne and Herbert are the most renowned. Walton is concerned with recording his subjects' piously Anglican Christian virtue, but they are, nevertheless, important statements concerning the contemporary perception of these major writers and instances of a 17th-century art of hagiographic biography. Walwyn, William (1600-81)

Religious prose writer. Born into the gentry, Walwyn was apprenticed to a silk merchant in 1619 and had risen to become a member of the Merchant Adventurers by 1632. At first he supported a moderate Anglican cause (as in New Petition For Papists, 1641), but began to write pamphlets supporting the > Levellers in the late 1640s. He was arrested in 1649 when the Leveller movement was suppressed. Walwyn consistently upheld the liberty of conscience in all his works, most notably in The Compassionate Samaritan.

Wandor, Michelene (b 1940)

Dramatist, poet, fiction writer, critic and theoretician. Michelene Wandor's unique position is well summed up by Helene Keyssar: 'More than any single figure, Wandor is responsible for articulating and supporting the interaction of feminism, theatre, socialism and gay liberation in Britain.' Active in the reborn women's movement from its earliest days - The Day After Yesterday (1972) attacks the sexism of the Miss World contest, Care and Control (1977) is about the issue of lesbian mothers having custody of their children - Wandor has made significant contributions at both the theoretical and practical level, as one of the few theatre practitioners with a strong academic background. As editor of the first four volumes of the Methuen anthologies of Plays by Women, she made a significant body of women's dramatic writing available to those who were unable to see the plays in their first productions and in Understudies, Carry on Understudies and Look Back in Gender, she documented and analysed the undervalued contribution of women to the contemporary theatre, and the representation of women in the theatre.

A prolific radio dramatist, she has never achieved comparable critical success in the theatre, although Aurora Leigh (1979) is a fine adaptation of Elizabeth Barrett Browning's verse novel and deserves a wider audience.

War poets

A group of poets who served in the army in World War I, and made poetry out of the experience. The three who are most commonly thought of as 'war poets' are ▷ Wilfred Owen, ▷ Siegfried Sassoon and ▷ Isaac Rosenberg. ▷ Rupert Brooke, who wrote with feeling about the outbreak of war, died before he saw much action; his poetry does not in consequence reflect the shock and violence so evident in the work of the other three. ▷ Edward Thomas was killed in action, but little of his poetry is about the war. ▷ Edmund Blunden and ▷ Robert Graves both survived to write memorable prose works about the war, but their poetry was only indirectly affected by it.

The effect of the war on the verse of Owen, Sassoon and Rosenberg was to cause them to turn away from the rather tepid ➤ romanticism of much pre-war poetry, and to adapt their language to the new and terrible experiences. They thus played a significant part in the renewal of poetic language.

Warbeck, Perkin (1471-99)

The son of a poor citizen of Tournai in Flanders, he pretended to be Richard, Duke of York, one of Edward IV's two sons whom ▷ Richard III had imprisoned in the Tower of London, and whose fate was unknown. He was supported by a number of enemies of ▷ Henry VII, including Charles VIII of France and James IV of Scotland. Eventually he landed in the west of England in 1497, but was soon captured by Henry's troops and hanged. The dramatist ▷ John Ford wrote a moving play about him, Perkin Warbeck (1634).

Ward, Edward ('Ned') (1667–1731)
Tavern-keeper and ▷ Grub Street writer, specializing in doggerel verses and humorous sketches of London life. His prose work The London Spy (1698–1709) takes us on a tour of the sights of London, and is full of humorous anecdotes and eccentric characters. His Hudibras Redivivus was published 1705–7 (▷ Hudibras).

Ward, Mrs Humphrey (1851-1920) Novelist, born Mary Augusta Arnold, the granddaughter of ➤ Thomas Arnold. She was born in Tasmania but moved with her family back to England in 1856, where she was educated in private boarding schools. In 1872 she married Thomas Humphrey Ward, an Oxford don. She contributed to the Dictionary of Christian Biography in 1877, and in 1881 moved to London and wrote for The Times, Pall Mall Gazette and ➤ Macmillan's Magazine as well as publishing a children's story, Milly and Olly (1881). Her first novel for adults, and her most famous, was Robert Elsmere (1888). It is the story of a clergyman who loses his faith through a study of the 'higher criticism' of Bible texts (the novelist ➤ George Eliot lost her faith in the same way). The purport of the book is that the revitalization of Christianity requires more attention to the social obligations of the Church and the abandonment of its supernatural or at least its miraculous - constituents of belief. The novel was an immediate success, and she wrote twenty-four more, including: The History of David Grieve (1892); Marcella (1894); Sir George Tressady (1896); Helbeck of Bannisdale (1898); Lady Rose's Daughter (1903); The Marriage of William Ashe (1905);

Diana Mallory (1908); Delia Blanchflower (1915) and Cousin Philip (1919). Her novels deal principally with social and religious themes, often contrasting tradition with progress. She was a leading intellectual figure and an active philanthropist, yet although she campaigned for higher > education for women, she strongly opposed the ➤ women's suffrage movement. She generated support for an 'Appeal Against Female Suffrage', published in 1889, and became the first President of the Anti-Suffrage League in 1908. Like many Victorians, she believed that women should set a moral example, issuing firstly from the home. Ward was also known to be a severe critic of other women writers. Her > autobiography, A Writer's Recollections, was published in 1918.

Ward, Mary (1558-1645)

Religious writer and educationalist. Mary Ward's name has become associated with the history of female education. She set up a Catholic boarding school for girls at St Omer in the Netherlands (1600) and in 1630. under the auspices of ➤ Henrietta Maria, she returned to Britain, where she hoped to promote scholarly studies for young women. During the intervening years abroad, Mary Ward had frequently visited her home country on 'recruiting drives' for pupils, and such was her skill and that of her companions at evading arrest as Catholics that they were nicknamed the 'Galloping Girls'. Born into a recusant family, Ward eventually became a nun (1606) and established several religious communities in connection with her schools. Persecuted in Britain for her faith, on the continent she was attacked and even imprisoned for her radical views on the equality of women by the Catholic Church she gave her allegiance to. Her hopes for reform in Britain were crushed by the Civil War, and she died in a safe house outside York. Throughout her trials, which were made worse by ill health, Mary Ward retained her strong religious and educational convictions together with a seemingly indomitable sense of humour. These qualities come through in her writings and in her last recorded words, 'it matters not the who, but the what'. Extracts from her work may be found in M. C. Chambers, The Life of Mary Ward (1882-7).

Warden, The (1855)

A novel by > Anthony Trollope, the first to be a success with the public, and the first of his > Barsetshire series.

The theme of the novel is the two aspects of the problem of the reform of public abuses. It shows how an office which brings to its holder an income much in excess of his duties may nonetheless be conducted usefully and with integrity, so that to abolish the office may be an act of personal injustice although the abolition may be justifiable on public grounds.

The novel is set in the cathedral city of Barchester in Barsetshire. A clergyman, the Reverend Septimus Harding, is Warden of Hiram's Hospital, a long-established charitable institution for maintaining twelve poor old men in comfort. For this he draws an income which in the course of time has increased to £800 a year, although his actual duties are almost non-existent. However, he maintains with the old men affectionate relationships which are inestimable financially. The wardenship is attacked as a public abuse by John Bold, a Barchester surgeon, although Bold is in love with Harding's daughter Eleanor. Bold is opposed (on the wrong grounds) by the worldly churchman Archdeacon Grantly, who is Harding's son-in-law. Harding resigns his office as a matter of conscience, but the Bishop refuses to appoint a new Warden, and the old men of the Hospital lose the chief solace of their old age.

Warner, Marina (b 1946)

Novelist, critic and cultural historian, educated at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. Her novels are much concerned with history and its bearing on the present: In A Dark Wood (1977) is about a Jesuit who is writing a biography of a 17th-century missionary; in The Lost Father (1988) the narrator is writing a novel, set in Italy and based on her own family history. Other novels: The Skating Party (1982); Indigo, or Mapping the Waters (1992). Television play: Tell Me More (1991). Libretto: The Legs of the Queen of Sheba (1991). She has also written cultural criticism, studies of history and myth, biography and children's writing.

Warner, Rex (1905-86)

Novelist, poet and translator. He was educated at Oxford University, where he met ➤ W. H. Auden and ➤ Cecil Day-Lewis. His allegorical first novel, The Wild Goose Chase (1937), examines the political issues of the 1930s through a fantastic imaginary world and concludes with a ⊳ communist ▶ Utopia. The Professor (1938) and The Aerodrome (1941) are similarly concerned with political power, and the conflict of love and personal integrity with totalitarianism. Warner's work is frequently compared with that of Kafka, but also shows the influence of classical literature, of which he made many translations. He also wrote several historical novels, including The Young Caesar (1958) and Imperial Caesar (1958), which are written in the form of supposed autobiography.

Warner, Sylvia Townsend (1893-1978) Novelist, poet, short-story writer, musicologist and biographer. Born in Harrow, Middlesex, she worked in a munitions factory during World War I and in 1922 became one of the editors of the Oxford University Press Tudor Church Music. She lived in Dorset with the poet Valentine Ackland from 1932 until the latter's death in 1969; together they served as Red Cross Volunteers in Spain in 1930. Her novels are: Lolly Willowes; or, The Loving Huntsman (1926); Mr Fortune's Maggot (1927); The True Heart (1929); Summer Will Show (1936); After the Death of Don Juan (1938); The Corner That Held Them (1948); The Flint Anchor (1954). Her work is notable for its imaginative scope, including elements of the supernatural, mystical and historical and embracing fantasy, comedy and satire; the novels' settings include a South Sea Island, a medieval nunnery, the Paris of the 1848 revolution and the Essex marshes. She also published ten volumes of short stories, books on Somerset (1949) and on Jane Austen (1951), a biography of T. H. White (1967) and volumes of poetry, including: The Espalier (1925); Time Importuned (1928); Opus 7 (1931, a long narrative poem); Rainbow (1932); Whether a Dove or a Seagull (1933, with Valentine Ackland); Boxwood (1957); Two Poems (1945); King Duffus (1968); Azrael (1978); Twelve Poems (1980). Her Collected Poems were published in 1982, edited by Claire Harman, and her Letters in 1982, edited by William Maxwell.

Wars of the Roses, The

A name for the civil wars that were waged intermittently between the two branches of the ▷ Plantagenet family, the House of Lancaster and the House of York, between 1455 and 1485. The name derives from the emblems chosen by either side: the Lancastrians chose the red rose, and the Yorkists chose the white. The ▷ Tudor rose was a red and white emblem, to signify the reconciliation of the two sides by the marriage of Henry Tudor on the Lancastrian side (▷ Henry VII) with Elizabeth of York, daughter of ▷ Edward IV.

The immediate causes of the war were dynastic; the underlying ones were social.
➤ Richard II, the last Plantagenet king by direct succession, died without heirs, having lost his throne by usurpation to ➤ Henry IV, his cousin and the first king of the Lancastrian line, so called because Henry was the son of John Duke of Lancaster (➤ John of Gaunt).

There was always some doubt whether the descendants of another of Richard's uncles, Edmund Duke of York, had not a better claim to the throne, and the disagreement broke into open war in 1455 owing to the drop in Lancastrian prestige when England was at last defeated in the ➤ Hundred Years' War against France (1453). It is here that the social causes become important. In the first place, power in England was in the hands of a number of rich, self-interested and ambitious nobles, whose energies were now no longer taken up by the wars in France. They sought new outlets for their ambition by an attempt to dominate the government at home. Secondly, the ending of the French wars let loose upon England a mass of unemployed soldiers who urgently needed occupation. The interests of the majority of the common people were not deeply engaged, though the towns were disposed to be Yorkist and the rural areas to be Lancastrian. Consequently the Wars of the Roses were felt to be a profitless evil by the majority of the nation. The reign of > Elizabeth I was haunted by the fear that civil wars might recur because the queen (like Richard II) had no direct heirs.

The House of Tudor was correspondingly revered because it brought the wars to an end. An important social consequence was that the medieval nobility which was responsible for their outbreak was much weakened and discredited at the end of them. The Tudor sovereigns raised up their nobility from men of lesser family, from whom the aristocratic families of modern England, eg the Cecils and the Russells, commonly descended.

⊳ Shakespeare used the Wars of the Roses as the material for his first tetralogy of historical dramas, the three plays on ⊳ Henry VI and one on ⊳ Richard III. The first three are national tragedies of mounting conflict and destructive hatred; the last shows the evil which has afflicted the country concentrated in one king of diabolic proportions, with Henry Tudor presented in religious terms as the saviour of the people at the conclusion.

Warton, Joseph (1722-1800)

Critic and poet; headmaster of Winchester School and the brother of ▷ Thomas Warton. His Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope (vol. I, 1756; vol. II, 1782) distinguishes the 'true poet' from the mere 'man of wit' and is often seen as a 'pre-▷ Romantic' document, though Warton himself admired ▷ Alexander Pope and edited his works (1797).

Warton, Thomas (1728–90)

Professor of Poetry at Oxford (1757–67) and later (1785–90) ➤ Poet Laureate. His Poems (1777) include several ➤ sonnets, a form neglected in previous decades. His The Suicide: An Ode and Verses on Sir Joshua Reynolds' Painted Window, tov with 'romantick' excess and ➤ Gothic medievalism, without ever having the courage of their convictions, and his comic verse is perhaps more successful. He edited the humorous miscellany, The Oxford Sausage (1764). It is in his criticism, with its scholarly approach to early literature that his real importance lies. His Observations on the Fairie Queene of Spenser (1754) shows a sensitive historical perspective, and his History of English Poetry (1774-81), conveys his fascination with the ▷ 'Gothic' > Middle Ages more convincingly than the dilettantism of his poems. Breaking off at the death of > Elizabeth I, it complemented > Samuel Johnson's > Lives of the Poets, and despite their aesthetic differences the two men were on friendly terms. In 1785 he published an edition of ⊳ John Milton's early poems. Washington, George (1732-99)

Leader of the American rebel forces in the War of Independence (1775–83); president of the American convention, 1787; first President of the United States, 1789. He served in the British forces during the wars against the French and Indians in the 1750s and was a rich and efficient tobacco planter, but did not play a leading part in American politics until relationships with Britain became critical in the 1770s. He was however noted a 'a young man of an extraordinary and exalted character'. Washington's great-grandfather had emigrated from Britain in 1657.

Waste Land, The (1922)

A poem by > T. S. Eliot. It is 433 lines long, and is divided into five parts: I. The Burial of the Dead; II. A Game of Chess; III. The Fire Sermon; IV. Death by Water, V. What the Thunder Said. There is no logical continuity between the parts, or within each part except for the very short Part IV. The lines vary in length and rhythm and are usually unrhymed, but the poem is not written in > 'free verse'. The author contributed his own (often cryptic) explanatory notes.

The theme is the decay and fragmentation of Western culture, conceived in terms of the loss of natural fertility. Despite the absence of logical continuity, The Waste Land possesses artistic coherence brought about by four closely related methods.

I The use of symbols derived from two anthropologists: Jessie L. Weston (From Ritual to Romance) and ⊳ James Frazer (The Golden Bough). These books relate to ancient myths about the alternation of fertility and barrenness. Although study of them undoubtedly helps the reader to understand the poem, it is not entirely necessary; Eliot intended the symbols to be imaginatively convincing, by their own force, to a sufficiently responsive reader.

2 The juxtaposition of passages with contrasting rhythms, diction, and imagery to accomplish 'a music of ideas . . . arranged not that they must tell us something, but that their effects in us may combine into a coherent whole of feeling and attitude'. (See ≥ I. A. Richards. Compare Eliot in Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca: 'The poet who "thinks" is merely the poet who can express the emotional equivalent of thought.')

3 The use of past history in contrast to the present time, as a means of demonstrating the peculiarities of the present. This method is paralleled by ▷ James Joyce in ▷ Ulysses and

4 The use of literary quotation and parody in order to bring out the contrasts of past and present states of culture. At least 35 writers are quoted or parodied in The Waste Land.

The poem caused great controversy when it was published, and is often considered to mark the effective beginning of a distinctively 20th-century style of verse, although Eliot had already published verse in the new idiom with The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock (1915) and Gerontion (1920). The Waste Land is dedicated to Ezra Pound, whose extensive revisions of the poem can be seen in the facsimile of the original drafts edited by Valerie Eliot and published in 1971.

Water Babies, The (1863)

A moral fantasy for children, by ➤ Charles Kingsley, subtitled A Fairy Tale for a Landbaby. The little boy Tom is employed as a chimneysweep by the brutal Mr Grimes; he falls into the river, gets turned into a water baby and is carried down to the sea. He meets a number of fabulous creatures and undergoes ordeals which effect moral instruction. He emerges purified, on equal terms with Ellie, the little girl in whose house he once swept the chimneys. Grimes is sent away to a penance of sweeping out Etna. The book is partly an attack on the exploitation of child labour and on the brutalization of the poor, and partly a fable about their moral education. Some of the moralizing is offensive, socially and psychologically, to modern readers but the book remains a children's classic for the sake of the ingenuity of its fantasy.

Waterloo, Battle of (1815)

An army of British, Dutch, Belgians and Germans under the ▷ Duke of Wellington and the Prussian army under Blücher finally defeated a French army under ▷ Napoleon and thus ended the Napoleonic Wars (1803–15). Waterloo is a village in Belgium to the south of Brussels. Wellington's army took up its position in squares, which the French attacked unavailingly all day, until Blücher's army came to Wellington's assistance. Wellington's own comment on the battle was that 'it was a damn near thing', and Napoleon's defeat is partly attributable to his failing health. He surrendered to the British and was exiled for the remainder of his life to the island of St Helena. English history represents this as a victory for the English army: in Germany it is seen as an occasion retrieved by the Prussian force from defeat.

Watkins, Vernon (1906-67)

Poet. Born at Maesteg, Glamorgan, Watkins' father's occupation as bank manager necessitated several family moves before Swansea became their settled home in 1913. Vernon Watkins was sent away to an English public school education at Repton, after which he went up to Magdalene College, Cambridge, to read modern languages. Nevertheless, by that time he had already nurtured a powerful ambition to become a poet, in furtherance of which he wished to travel to Italy, abandoning his university course for what became an unfulfilled dream, parental opposition ensuring that his next move was to a Cardiff bank whose uncongenial surroundings precipitated a nervous breakdown. It was his illness that prompted a return to the St Helen's branch of the bank in Swansea where he remained for the rest of his life except for his military service in World War II. From the pagan influence of the Romantic poets he developed into a modern metaphysical whose insightsymbols from the Gower shoreline frequently surface in his work, in poetry that is always meticulously crafted, the most successful of which appeared before 1960. His considerable poetic output was initiated with Ballad of the Mari Llmyd (1941) and The Lamp and the Veil (1945), followed by an early Selected Poems (1948), The Lady and the Unicorn (1948), The North Sea (translations from Heine, 1051), The Death Bell (1954), Cypress and Acacia (1959) and Affinities, Fidelities (1968) appearing posthumously, though he himself had put this collection together just before his death. After his death, Uncollected Poems (1969), Selected Verse Translations (1977), The Breaking of the Wave (1979) and The Ballad of the Outer Dark (1979) were all assembled from a mass of unpublished material, with I That Was Born in Wales (1976) and Unity of the Stream (1978) being selections from his published works.

Watt, James (1736-1819)

of the steam engine, the principles of which (apart from ancient Greek experiments) had been discovered in the 17th century. Newcomen's improvements on existing models in 1705 enabled it to be put to practical use, but it was Watt in 1763 who made it commercially successful and one of the main instruments for the ➤ Industrial Revolution, the beginnings of which are sometimes dated from his time. Watt's engine made deep mining for coal possible when it was applied to pumping; it could be used for driving machines in factories, and it led in the 1820s to the invention of railway locomotives.

Watts, Isaac (1674-1748)

Poet and > hymn writer. He was minister of an Independent church in London until in 1712 ill health forced him into an early retirement in the household of the Whig merchant Sir Thomas Abney in Hertfordshire. His verse appeared in Horae Lyricae (1706), Hymns (1707), Divine Songs for Children (1715), Psalms of David (1719). Later in life he turned to prose tracts on theology. Much of his work is charged with a > Puritan dogmatism, but sometimes more literary instincts prevail. Watts experimented with > classical > metres, and wrote bold ➤ Pindaric ➤ odes and distinctive ▶ blank verse. Some of his hymns, for instance 'O God, our help in ages past' and 'When I survey the wondrous cross' are famous. His songs for children became a part of popular British culture, and form the basis of some of ➤ William Blake's ➤ Songs of Innocence and Experience.

Watts, Susanna (1768-1842)

Poet, prose writer and artist. ➤ Evangelical writer whose humble origins and powerful moral beliefs endowed her with an interesting character, which combined self-depreciation with the zeal of a crusader. Her poetry was generally well thought of, including Original Poems and Translations (1802) and the posthumous Hymns and Poems (1842). She settled in Leicester, and her Walk Through Leicester was published as a guide to the town in 1804; the City Library there still holds her original manuscript. Watts' fictional work always had a barely concealed > didactic purpose, from trying to help suffering animals (The Humming-Bird, 1824-5) to attacking the middle classes (The Wonderful Travels of Prince Fan-Feredin in the Country of Arcadia, 1828).

Waugh, Evelyn (1903-66)

Novelist. Born in London and educated at Hertford College Oxford, he worked for a while as an assistant schoolmaster, an experience which provided the basis for his first novel, Decline and Fall (1928). His satires of the late 1920s and 1930s up to and including Put Out More Flags (1942), present the modern world as anarchic and chaotic, and are a blend of farce and tragedy. His technique included the extensive use of dialogue, and rapid changes of scene. Many of the early novels recount the > picaresque and outrageous experiences of a naive central character, such as Paul Pennyfeather in Decline and Fall, and William Boot in Scoop (1938), a hilarious story of Western journalists in Africa. Waugh became a Catholic in 1930; this was initially reflected in his work only in a sense of the transience and emptiness of worldly concerns. But World War II, during which Waugh served with the Royal Marines in Crete and Yugoslavia changed the character of his work; it became more explicitly Catholic, serious to the point of sombreness, and more three-dimensional in his portrayal of his characters. The first novel to show these qualities was Brideshead Revisited (1945). In 1961 he completed his most considerable work, a trilogy about the war entitled Sword of Honour. Among others of his novels that have achieved fame are The Loved One (1948), a satire on American commercialism, extending to the commercialization of death, and The Ordeal of Gilbert Pinfold (1957), a pseudo-autobiographical caricature of a 50year-old Catholic novelist. His post-war work expresses a distaste for, and rejection of, modern civilization, and a pervasive sense of the vanity of human desires. All Waugh's work is marked by an exquisite sense of the ludicrous and a fine aptitude for exposing false attitudes. His comedy is closely dependent on the carefully calculated urbanity of his style. Other novels are: Vile Bodies (1930); Black Mischief (1932); A Handful of Dust (1934); Scott-King's Modern Europe (1947); Tactical Exercise (1954); Basil Seal Rides Again (1963). Story collections are: Mr Loveday's Little Outing (1936); Work Suspended (1949).

Waugh also wrote travel books, selections from which have been collected under the title When the Going Was Good (1946), and biographies of the 19th-century poet and painter D. G. Rossetti (1928), and of the 16th-century Catholic martyr, Edmund Campion (1935).

Waverley (1814)

The first of ▷ Sir Walter Scott's novels, subtitled 'Tis Sixty Years Since. The hero, Edward Waverley, is a young English officer who visits the Highlands of Scotland just before the ▷ Jacobite Rebellion of 1745. Here he falls in love with Flora, the Jacobite daughter of a Highland chieftain. He joins the Jacobite forces. When these are eventually defeated, Waverley is saved from execution by a senior English officer on the other side, whom he has saved in a battle. Waverley is the first historical novel of distinction in English literature, and Scott's vivid description of Scottish society and scenery caused it to be received with great enthusiasm.

Waves, The (1931)

A novel by ▷ Virginia Woolf. It is the story of six characters, each of whom tells his or her own story in monologue, and reflects images of the others in his or her own mind. The monologues occur in groups, at different stages of their lives, and each group is preceded by a passage describing a time of day, from dawn to nightfall. It is a poetic, lyrical and highly patterned work, and presents human existence as an organic process, uniting individuals like waves in the sea. The Waves is the climax of Virginia Woolf's experiments in fictional form. (▷ Modernism)

Way of All Flesh, The (1903)

A novel by ➤ Samuel Butler, written 1873-5 and published after his death, in 1903. It is one of the few purely satirical works of distinction of the Victorian period; the satire is directed against the Victorian cult of the family as the sacred and blessed nucleus of society, and (as so often in ➤ Charles Dickens) the refuge from the harshness of the world. The arrogant, self-righteous, intolerant and stupid kind of Victorian parent is exemplified in the clergyman Theobald Pontifex, father of Ernest Pontifex. Victorian authoritarianism and repressiveness is also attacked in Theobald, seen as a religious humbug, and in Dr Skinner, headmaster of the public school that Ernest attends. The first fifty chapters of the book are autobiographical; Butler even includes actual letters in the text. The narrative is not told through Ernest (Butler as a boy) but in the first person through his friend the middleaged Overton, who represents a more tolerant aspect of Butler; by this means, Butler conveys criticism of his intolerant younger self, in the person of Ernest. The book was much praised, especially by > G.B. Shaw.

> Autobiography.

Way of the World, The (1700)

A comedy by ▷ William Congreve, produced in 1700. The plot is a complicated succession of intrigues which surround the love affair between the sparkling young rake, Mirabell (a hero in the tradition of ▷ Etherege's Dorimant in ▷ The Man of Mode), and the urbane and witty heroine, Millamant. Mirabell's aim is to trick or persuade Millamant's aunt, Lady Wishfort, into consenting to their marriage; and his efforts include pretending to make love to Lady Wishfort herself. This intrigue is frustrated by Mrs Marwood, embittered against Mirabell because he has previously rejected her. Mirabell then attempts further intrigue, and this leads to counter-intrigues by Mrs Marwood in alliance with Mirabell's treacherous friend Fainall, who combines them with conspiracies against his wife, a former mistress of Mirabell's, and blackmail of Lady Wishfort. Mirabell finally succeeds in defeating his enemies and saving Lady Wishfort from the threats against her; in gratitude, she consents to his marriage to Millamant. The intrigues serve as a framework for theatrically very successful comic scenes and imaginatively witty dialogue. Millamant and Mirabell set out the conditions on which they agree to relinquish their freedom and submit to marriage, in a famous > Proviso scene (IV, vi). Millamant's charm and independence have made her role a star part for great actresses, and supply a main reason for the play's lasting reputation.

Webb, Beatrice (1858-1943)

Sociologist. She was the daughter of Richard Potter, a railway director and friend of the philosopher ➤ Herbert Spencer, who exercised a guiding influence over her education. Her mother was a product of the 19th-century > Utilitarian school of thought. She early developed a strong social conscience, which led her to choose as her career the almost unprecedented one of 'social investigator'. Victorian sensitiveness to social abuses was strong amongst the intelligentsia, but she realized that constructive action was hampered by lack of exact information: 'The primary task is to observe and dissect facts.' In order to do so, she took bold steps for a Victorian girl of the prosperous middle class, such as disguising herself as a working girl and taking employment under a tailor in the East End of London. She and her husband were among the early members of the ➤ Fabian Society, and among the founders of the Labour Party. Her autobiographies My Apprenticeship (1926) and Our Partnership (1948) are in the tradition of > John Stuart Mill's Autobiography (1873) in being essentially histories of the growth of opinions and ideas; My Apprenticeship, however, is very enlightening about social backgrounds in the 1880s, and a valuable addition to the Victorian novels, which, she said, were the only documents for the study of society available in her youth. She and her husband were among the founders of the weekly journal New Statesman, still a leading left-wing journal.

Webb, Harri (1920-94)

Poet, journalist, tèlevision script-writer, pamphleteer and public speaker. Born in Swansea of a Gower family related to the bardd gwlad Cyril Gwynne who was to influence him towards simple rhyming ballads (especially in his later work), Harri Webb read Romance Languages at Oxford. He subsequently became librarian at Dowlais and later at Mountain Ash. Formerly a member of the Welsh Republican movement, he edited its newspaper Welsh Republican from 1950 to 1957 and afterwards Plaid Cymru's English language newspaper The Welsh Nation from 1961 to 1964. In 1965 he assisted Meic Stephens in the launching of Poetry Wales, after which his poetry collections The Green Desert (1969) and A Crown for Branwen (1974) ranged through history and mythology to satirical political poems, this powerfully nationalist motivation providing the context for his later collections Rampage and Revel (1977) and Poems and Points (1983), all to be garnered - including a large number of previously unpublished poems - by Meic Stephens who is currently editing a Collected volume, Because much of Harri Webb's work gained greater impact and influence from his own public performance of it, his poetry had become an effective medium for a political message, thus effectively widening the scope of Anglo-Welsh poetry.

Webster, Augusta (1837-94)

Poet, dramatist and essavist, who also wrote under the > pseudonym Cecil Home. After marrying Thomas Webster at the age of twenty-six, she published her first collection of verse, Blanche Lisle and Other Poems (1860). A committed > feminist, much of her work focuses on female subjects. > Dramatic Studies (1866) includes poems about spinsterhood, > marriage and motherhood; > 'A Castaway' (1870) is concerned with prostitution; 'Circe' (1870) is a psychological portrait of the mythological figure; A Housewife's Opinions (1878) is a collection of essays on the lives of married women. Webster was at times criticized for her forthrightness and unabashed > realism, but she was also favourably compared to > Elizabeth Barrett Browning, ➤ Christina Rossetti and ➤ Jean Ingelow. Her unfinished sonnet sequence, Mother and Daughter (1895), was published posthumously, edited by William Michael Rossetti, Christina and ➤ Dante Gabriel's brother. Dramatic works include The Auspicious Day (1872); Disguises (1879) and In a Day (1882).

Webster, John (1578-1632)

English dramatist about whom little is known, although his father's life is well documented. He is the author of two of the most famous ▷ Jacobean tragedies, ▷ The White Devil (1612) and ▷ The Duches of Malfi (1613), and collaborated with ▷ Dekker, ▷ Fletcher, ▷ Ford and others on a number of plays. Webster excels in constructing richly metaphorical passages and iconographic scenes, but he is less satisfactory on form and in overall conception. His works have been accused of lacking moral fibre in their pursuit of grotesque and titillating images of death.

Wedgwood

The name of a firm of distinguished manufacturers of china. The founder of the firm, Josiah Wedgwood (1730-95), was the son of a potter of Burslem. He perfected an English style of pottery called cream ware, and later Queen's ware. He then developed a new style of ⊳ classical designs, inspired by contemporary interest in ancient Greek pottery and by the discovery of the Roman city of Pompeii in southern Italy. The most famous of the Wedgwood designers in this style was the friend of the poet ▷ William Blake, John Flaxman. The Wedgwood factory near Hanley is called Etruria; the firm continues in production at the present day. Josiah's son, Thomas Wedgwood (1771-1805), was a generous patron to the poet ▷ Coleridge.

Welch, Denton (Maurice Denton Welch) (1915-48)

Novelist and painter. Denton Welch wrote three novels, around sixty short stories and an extensive journal. Perhaps his most powerful writing is to be found in the novels Maiden Voyage (1943) and A Voice Through a Cloud (1950), in which a perfumed and acutely literary style combines with unusually exacting powers of observation. Welch had trained at the Goldsmith's School of Art as a painter, a career that was cut short at the age of twenty by a cycling accident from which he never fully recovered and which drove him inwards to meet the resources and anxieties of his own imagination. A sign of the revival of interest in Welch's writing is the biography Denton Welch: the making of a Writer by Michael De-la-Noy.

Weldon, Fay (b 1931)

Novelist, dramatist and television screenwriter. Her novels include: The Fat Woman's Joke (1967); Down Among the Women (1971); Female Friends (1975); Remember Me (1976); Words of Advice (1977); Praxis (1978); Little Sisters (1978); Puffball (1980); The President's Child (1982); The Life and Loves of a She-Devil (1983); The Shrapnel Academy (1986); The Rules of Life (1987); The Heart of the Country (1987); Leader of the Band (1988). Story collections are: Watching Me, Watching You (1981); Polaris (1985). The > feminism of her work is concentrated in the portrayal of the exploitation of women by men in domestic situations, and in relationships. Her tragicomic novels are powerful stories of pain, loss and betrayal, and their desperation is accentuated by the sense of a controlling social and biological pattern which negates the characters' attempts to make choices about their lives. The endings of her books, however, often hint at the emergence of a new and more liberated woman.

Well-Beloved, The (1897)

A novel by ➤ Thomas Hardy. It was originally published in serial form as The Pursuit of the Well-Beloved in the Illustrated London News in 1892 in place of > Tess of the d'Urbervilles, which Hardy withdrew from periodical publication in deference to the qualms of the newspaper syndicate Tillotson and Son. The story concerns the sculptor Jocelyn Pierston, the son of a wealthy stone merchant on the ancient Isle of Slingers (Portland), who spends his life in a wasted search for a woman who embodies his ideal. His search leads him to a fruitless courtship of Avice Caro, her daughter and, subsequently, her grand-daughter (both named Avice). Eventually, age and illness leave him disillusioned with his ideal and he marries his early love Marcia Bencomb, who by this time is also old and withered. In a letter to the Academy in March 1987, Hardy wrote that The Well-Beloved was 'a phantasmal narrative of the adventures of a Visionary Artist in pursuit of the unattainable perfect in female form.' Consistently classed as a 'minor' novel, The Well-Beloved is slowly gaining the critical attention it deserves, not least for its contribution to the debate on art, ▷ aesthetics and the role of women that characterized the fin-de-siècle.

Wellington, Arthur Wellesley, 1st Duke of (1769-1852)

General and statesman. By origin, of Anglo-Irish aristocracy. He joined the army in 1787, and between 1796 and 1805 he had a distinguished military career in India, where his eldest brother was Governor-General. Arthur Wellesley then returned to Britain. Between 1808 and 1814 he gained fame for his resistance to the French armies of ▶ Napoleon I on the Spanish Peninsula. He was created Duke in 1814. In 1815, with the Prussian general Blücher, he inflicted the final defeat on ➤ Napoleon at ➤ Waterloo.

He took part in the Congress of Vienna, which made the peace treaty with France, and his influence did much to prevent the partition of the country. Thereafter, his career was in British politics, where he was one of the principal leaders of the Tory (Whig or Tory) (Conservative) party. He gave way, however, over one issue, that of Catholic Emancipation (ie granting Catholics full political rights) because he understood its political inevitability; he was less clear-sighted about ⊳ Parliamentary reform, and was forced to resign in 1830. He again held ministerial posts, though not that of Prime Minister, in 1834, and 1841-6, under the leadership of Robert Peel. After his death, > Tennyson commemorated him with one of his best poems, his Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington. He was popularly known as 'the Iron Duke', and used proudly to call his London mansion at Hyde Park Corner, 'Number One, London'.

Wells, H. G. (Herbert George) (1866-1946) Novelist and journalist. He was brought up in the lower middle class, the son of a professional cricketer; in 1888 he took an excellent degree in science at London University. His social origins and his education explain much of his approach to life as a writer. The great novelist of the 19th-century lower middle classes is Dickens and some of H.G. Wells' best fiction is about the same field of society; novels such as Kipps (1905) and The History of Mr Polly (1910) are of this sort, and they have the kind of vigorous humour and sharp visualization that is characteristic of early Dickens. On the other hand, rising into the educated class at a time of rapid scientific and technical progress, he ignored the values of traditional culture and art, and became fascinated with the prospects that science offered, for good as well as for ill. This side of him produced a different kind of writing: Wells was one of the inventors of > science fiction. The Time Machine (1895), The Invisible Man (1897), The War of the Worlds (1898) and The First Men in the Moon (1901) are examples of his fantasies. But his social experience and his interest in technology also drew him to writing fictional-sociological studies in which he surveyed and analysed, often with the same Dickensian humour, the society of his time; Tono-Bungay (1908) is perhaps the best of these. Other examples are Ann Veronica (1909) about the problems connected with newly emancipated women, The New Machiavelli (1911) about socialist thinking -Wells had joined the ▶ Fabians in 1903 - and Mr Britling Sees It Through (1916) about World War I seen from the point of view of the 'Home Front'. But the interest in science also made him a ▷ utopian optimist, and this point of view caused him to write such didactic works as A Modern Utopia (1905) and New Worlds For Old (1908). There was always a great deal of naivety in Wells' optimism, and later in his life he paid the penalty by reacting into excessive gloom, in Mind at the End of its Tether (1945). He declared that The Open Conspiracy (1928) contained the essence of his philosophy. He was never a deep thinker, however; his work lives by the vitality of his humour and by the urgency with which he pressed his ideas. This urgency necessarily made him a popularizer, and his most notable work of popularization was The Outline of History (1920).

In some ways Wells resembles his contemporary, the dramatist > George Bernard Shaw; both were socialists, both felt the urgency to enlighten mankind as quickly as possible, and both cared more that their works should have immediate effect than that they should be works of art - Wells told the novelist ➤ Henry James that he would rather be called a journalist than an artist. Possibly the most penetrating remark on Wells was that addressed to him by the novelist Joseph Conrad (1857-1924): 'You don't really care for people, but you think they can be improved; I do, but I know they can't.' Bib: Mackenzie, N. and J., The Time Traveller: Life of H.G. Wells; Bergonzi, B., The Early H.G. Wells and H.G. Wells: Twentieth-Century Views; Parrinder, P. (ed.), H.G. Wells; the Critical Heritage.

Welsh, Irvine (b 1958)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Leith and brought up in Muirhouse, these two areas of Edinburgh feature prominently in his work. Leaving school at 16, he worked in various jobs, including training officer for Edinburgh District Council and took a degree in business administration. His first novel, Trainspotting (1993) attracted rapid acclaim and debate: written primarily in Scots urban working-class vernacular, it is a grim but comic narrative of the Edinburgh drugs scene, largely realist in style though interweaving various narrative voices. Marabou Stork Nightmares (1995) is more technically inventive, switching as it does between the memories and fantasies of a coma victim, but its core is again a macho world of football, drink, drugs and violence. The Acid House (1994) is a collection of short stories. Welsh now lives in Amsterdam.

Welsh literature in English

Writers' claims on Welsh ancestry vary enormously. Some even adopt Welshness as, for example, Raymond Garlick (b 1926), an Englishman who identified with Welsh political causes and became founder-editor of the literary magazine Dock Leaves (later The Anglo-Welsh Reviem, 1957–88) and a critic and poet firmly within the Welsh context. Thus poet and novelist Glyn Jones' criterion of Anglo-Welshness expressed in his critical work The Dragon Has Two Tongues as involvement in the Welsh situation - seems justifiable. So is ➤ George Herbert, brought up in the Marches (> Wales) and an influence on > Henry Vaughan, acceptable? Does > Gerard Manley Hopkins' three-year residence at St Beuno's seminary, during which he learnt Welsh, admit him? His assimilation of cynghanedd (> Welsh terms) into English poetry transmitted Welsh metric to Dylan Thomas who could not speak Welsh. For poet and critic Anthony Conran, W. H. Davies qualifies as Anglo-Welsh because his New Poems conforms to the thematic divisions of the bardd gwlad (> Welsh terms). Nevertheless, Conran concedes only two Anglo-Welsh poems to Edward Thomas, who is included on parentage, emotional attachment to Wales, and his belated influence on Anglo-Welsh poets. Richard Hughes and ▶ John Cowper Powys have received the accolade of critical studies in the Writers of Wales series through their eventually permanent residence in, and lifelong empathy for Wales. From Powys' Wessex came Jeremy Hooker (b 1941), whose 19 years in Wales made him a leading critic in the Anglo-Welsh field and temporarily changed his poetic direction. Thus a widely debatable area of Anglo-Welsh acceptability exists.

Historically, poetry is the dominant genre of Anglo-Welsh literature, prose a mainly 20thcentury growth. The poetic origins can be traced to the 15th century, but excepting George Herbert, Henry Vaughan and John Dyer, all the major work belongs to the present century. What is significant, to cite Anthony Conran, is the 'seepage' from Welsh-language culture into English. For example, the traditional function of the Welsh-language poet was to commemorate the society he lived in whether, as earlier, in 'praise poems' for princes or, later, the local community. In the last-named instance, the bardd gwlad's categories of poems included nature, love, beer, hunting songs, poems to individuals and moral poems. Some were in complex traditional metres, others in less exacting free metres, so form is an overriding concern. In serving his community, the Welsh poet is perceived as a craftsman, cultivating an objectivity that contrasts with English poetry from the > Romantic revival onwards and particularly that of contemporary confessional egocentricity. The formal preoccupations of Welsh-language poetry assimilated by Anglo-Welsh practitioners over four centuries revealed affinities by the early 20th century with the English ➤ Georgians' objective descriptions of nature, in birds, flowers, landscapes, and of people and their working lives in an essentially rural setting. The legacy of this is Anglo-Welsh poetry's perseverance with tighter forms and greater objectivity than English contemporary poetry. Welsh-speaking Anglo-Welsh poets such as Glyn Jones (1905-95), Harri Webb (1920-94) and Anthony Conran (b 1931) have translated Welsh-language poems into English, often following the Welsh metric of the originals, such as traethodl, cymydd, or englyn, sometimes including the internal rhymes and alliterations of cynghanedd, and the accretion of comparisons known as dyfalu (▷ Welsh terms). As Welsh metric poses almost insurmountable technical problems when grafted onto the English language, any assimilation through the centuries has been gradual, and it is more the common thematic inheritance that unites Welsh and Anglo-Welsh poetry and differentiates the latter from English poetry. However, the growth of Anglo-Welsh literature is a concomitant of the historical process that weakened the influence of the Welsh language.

Anglo-Norman settlements of the Marches and South Wales were followed by Henry I's 12th-century Flemish settlement of South Pembroke, subsequently augmented by English settlements in Gower and around Laugharne. Edwardian castles protected English merchants who were granted privileges within town walls, as at Caernarfon and Conwy. Itinerant drovers and weavers soon forged linguistic links with England. The establishment of the Tudor dynasty brought Welsh influence into England, though Henry VIII's Acts of Union insisted on Welsh office-holders' proficiency in English, eventually producing an anglicized squirearchy. Three centuries later, Victorian government policy further weakened the hold of the Welsh language by encouraging 'The Welsh Not', prohibiting Welsh-language conversation in schools. A piece of wood or slate with the letters 'WN' cut into it was hung round the neck of the last pupil caught speaking Welsh in class - whoever was left wearing it at the end of the school day would be punished. From the early 10th century, the increasing influx into the South Wales valleys not only drained the rural areas of the west and north but brought in labouring or technological expertise for pitsinking, blast furnace, canal, tramroad, railway and docks construction. The ultimate figure of English-speaking immigrants in the South Wales valleys accounted for at least 40% of the population, swamping the native Welsh speakers. The subsequent foundation of county schools from 1895 onwards provided secondary education in the medium of English. This explains why Glyn Jones, an early pupil at Merthyr's Cyfarthfa Castle Grammar School, though from a Welsh-speaking family, developed into an Anglo-Welsh writer. It was these socioeconomic pressures that helped to create the 'first flowering' of Anglo-Welsh literature.

Many young provincial writers departed for London between the wars to find publishers who encouraged them to adapt their work for the metropolitan market. Caradoc Evans (1878-1945), according to the 'first distinctive ancestral voice' of Anglo-Welsh writing, produced the first London-published bestseller. In My People (1915) and subsequent short-story collections, Caradoc Evans invented grotesqueries of character and speech for his Cardi peasantry whose lust, greed and hypocrisy established a false Welsh stereotype that amused Londoners but gave unmitigated and lasting offence to the Welsh-speaking literary establishment. Notwithstanding, Caradoc Evans' commercial success encouraged a vein of fantasy among the 'first flowering' of Anglo-Welsh writers, Rhys Davies, Glyn Jones and Dylan Thomas, continued in the post-war period by Gwyn Thomas. Moreover, the eccentric and grotesque provided a diversion from painfully harsh living conditions in decaying rural and unemployment-ravaged industrial communities. Beneath this surface, however, industrial realism encapsulates a political message - socialist in the 'first flowering', nationalist in the 'second flowering' in the 1960s. This idealism motivates an inevitably doomed nationalist military uprising in Glyn Jones' > novella, I Was Born in the Ystrad Valley, as early as 1937. Communist political activism inspires Lewis Jones' Cwmardy (1937) and We Live! (1939), Jack Jones paints panoramic historical canvases behind his family epics in Black Parade (1935) and Rhondda Roundabout (1934), whereas Gwyn Iones employs a briefer time-scale in Times Like These (1936) where he examines the social and familial crises precipitated by the General Strike. However, it was Richard Llewellyn's How Green Was My Valley (1939) which became the popular stereotype of the Valleys' industrial novel despite its inaccuracies and sentimentality, a far cry from Gwyn Thomas' rejected pre-war novel Sorrow For Thy Sons (eventually published in 1986, five years after his death). Gwyn Thomas' post-war hyperbolic wit, farcical situations and eccentric characters create a Valleys' world where laughter is the only antidote to poverty and unemployment. Meanwhile, short stories between the wars mediate between a poetic vision of Welshspeaking Wales, Lawrentian-influenced in Rhys Davies and Geraint Goodwin, and the realistic depiction of industrial communities, infused with wit and humour. Only one poet identifies with the industrial milieu: Idris Davies, despite a > Georgian vocabulary and the formal straitjacket of the > Housman quatrain, brings his strike-bound communities to life when he uses local vernacular speech and escapes into free verse.

The two most original poets to appear in the 1930s were very different from Idris Davies in theme and technique. David Jones achieved the critical recognition due to him as a major poet only in the 1980s, shortly after his death. In Parenthesis, for example, encapsulated his experiences in World War I but appeared only two years before World War II. His juxtaposition of prose passages with poetry, all loaded with mythopoeic reference, represented an exciting new poetic dimension, though it received scant notice at the time. Very different was the critical reception for Dylan Thomas, who alienated himself from the Welsh concept of communityserving poet and escaped from Swansea to literary London as early as possible to promote his self-advertising poetic image. Nevertheless, his indisputable success and originality gave fresh impetus to Anglo-Welsh writing which found a mouthpiece in Keidrych Rhys' literary magazine Wales, published in three intermittent series between 1937 and 1960, and in Gwyn Jones' more academically respectable Welsh Review published first in 1939 and then between 1944 and 1948. Unlike other Anglo-Welsh poets, Dylan Thomas flowered early because his poetry was self-created. Influenced by his work, some young poets published prematurely shortly after the war, including Leslie Norris and John Ormond, who then waited for 20 years for their individual, mature and successful voices to be heard. Inevitably, the war had limited publishing so that the tragically brief war-time appearance of Alun Lewis' work was all the more remarkable.

In post-war years, attempts to revive Wales and the Welsh Review were short-lived through lack of funds, though Dock Leaves (founded 1949) survived in Tenby, thanks to Raymond Garlick and Roland Mathias. Despite the growing reputation of Vernon Watkins (1906-67) as a poetic visionary, Dylan Thomas' untimely self-destruction left a void that was eventually filled by > R.S. Thomas (b 1913), whose major poetic status was rapidly endorsed by critics in England despite their disregard of most Anglo-Welsh literature. R.S. Thomas' concern for rural and urban poverty in Wales, reflected in his sympathy for the uncouth hill farmer, is revealed in firmly structured, emotionally restrained poems of arresting imagery. For him, nationalism would answer Wales' problems: God he listens for in answer to his own problems as priest-poet. Another major poet Emyr Humphreys (b 1919). Humphreys, of North Walian orientation, examines conscience among the Welsh-speaking professional class, and impartially presents Nonconformity, while never seeking to depart from his fictive high seriousness or to indulge popular taste.

Meic Stephens (b 1938) was the prime mover behind the 'second flowering' which gather momentum in the 1960s when nationalist ideas were superseding socialist politics. He founded Poetry Wales in 1965 with support from Harri Webb, thus providing a nationalist conscious poetic forum, fostering mutual interest between Wales' two languages, especially reinvigorating Anglo-Welsh poetry through John Ormond, Harri Webb, John Tripp, Raymond Garlick, Roland Mathias, Leslie Norris and Gillian Clarke.

In 1967 he became Literature Director of the newly constituted Welsh Arts Council whose financial support for writers and publishers gave tremendous impetus to Welsh and Anglo-Welsh writing. An unfortunate effect, however, was that London publishers and reviewers disregarded Anglo-Welsh writing when it developed independently from metropolitan influences, leading to a critical undervaluing that still persists in England. In 1968 Meic Stephens led a move to create the English section of Yr Academi Gymreig, originally a literary society founded for Welsh-language writers only, but from then on providing invaluable encouragement to Anglo-Welsh writers. Concluding an exciting decade, Ned Thomas launched Planet in 1970, a magazine whose political thrust was left-wing and nationalist, and which also published literary material.

Recently, an updated view of Valleys society has informed the short stories and novels of Alun Richards (b 1020) and Ron Berry (b 1920). Alun Richards illuminates social tensions among the migratory professional classes, nuances between the Valleys and Cardiff, and Cardiff and London. His sensitive ear for dialogue contributed to the effectiveness of his work for the theatre (published in Plays for Players, 1975) and television. Ron Berry has explored Valleys sexual mores with lively humour. Closely associated with the border country of his upbringing, Raymond Williams' novels present the tensions of nationalism. social mobility, working-class solidarity and conflicting loyalties, though the political and socio-economic dimensions of his critical oeuvre are more familiar. The novelists with Anglo-Welsh connections who have achieved the most recent critical acclaim are Bernice Rubens. Alice Thomas Ellis, Stuart Evans and Peter Thomas, a newcomer as a novelist extending Gwyn Thomas' hyperbolic vision.

Anglo-Welsh literature has produced no playwright to emulate Emlyn Williams (1905–88), though the recent emphasis has shifted from theatre via radio into television, as reflected in the careers of Gwyn Thomas, Alun Owen, Alun Richards and Elaine Morgan.

Although disappointment with the result of the referendum on devolution did not affect the republican nationalist views of some of the younger poets such as Nigel Jenkins and Mike Jenkins, a widening of poetic horizons has been taking place. Its trailblazer ▶ Dannie Abse (b 1932) has exploited a series of fruitful tensions in his work which reflect contrasting life-styles: Cardiff/London; Welsh/Jewish; poetry/medicine. His sympathy for oppressed minorities reveals a humanitarianism and compassion haunted by the horror of the Holocaust. His range of themes ensures his international, as well as Anglo-Welsh, status. Another poet who has broadened his Anglo-

Welsh context through exposure to the influence of American 'confessional' poets (such as Robert Lowell, > Sylvia Plath, John Berryman and Anne Sexton), thereby producing many transatlantic poems, is Tony Curtis (b 1946) whose recent work invokes historical perspectives through condemnation of war and nuclear weapons. Peter Finch (b 1947) has experimented with concrete and multilingual, occasionally almost surreal, poetry. John Davies, Steve Griffiths, Robert Minhinnick, Mike Jenkins, Nigel Jenkins, Duncan Bush, Sheenagh Pugh and Chris Meredith are all acutely conscious of their present social reality while rejecting traditional Welsh stereotyping. Moving towards English influences, Oliver Reynolds (b 1957) has embraced the > Martian 'new heartlessness'. his poetic incisiveness deriving also from ➤ W.H. Auden. Hilary Llewellyn-Williams' rural, mythopoeic vision owes something to Gillian Clarke and Ruth Bidgood in that it is personal, familial and rooted in the Welsh landscape, its inhabitants and their history.

With a higher concentration of writers in Wales than anywhere else in Britain, the vigorous growth of Anglo-Welsh literature is assured, particularly since, though it has retained its traditionally distinguishing characteristics, it has developed a more outward-looking stance. Happily, as this text proves, there are indications that the Anglo-Welsh literary movement may eventually receive its long overdue recognition from the English critical establishment. Welsh terms bardd gwlad Country poet or folk poet. There were instances of their skills being practised in the English language, as, for example, in Gower, which was predominantly English-speaking. traethodl Seven syllable lines with rhymed couplets, an accented syllable usually rhyming with an unaccented one.

cynghanedd Internal rhymes with alliteration in a fixed metrical pattern.

englyn The most common is a four-line stanza of ten, six, seven and seven syllables. There is a break, like a caesura, after the seventh syllable of the first line, and it is on this syllable that the rhyme usually occurs with the end syllable of the second, third and fourth lines. Thus each line rhymes with the others, though the first-line rhyme is internal. Most commonly occurring on the seventh syllable, it may occur on the eighth or ninth.

Wertenbaker, Timberlake

British resident Anglo-French-American dramatist. Although Timberlake Wertenbaker is American by birth, and French educated, her work has all been created within the British theatre. Her most successful plays, The Love of the Nightingale (1988) and Our Country's Good (1988) offer an exhilarating contrast in their treatment of theatrical techniques. Like > Carvl Churchill she has shown a persistent interest in how notions of normality and self are constructed and many of her plays contain a Faustian bargain in which knowledge is purchased at the expense of innocence. The Grace of Mary Traverse (1985), set in a picaresque eighteenth-century, is primarily an exploration of the possibilities for women when they step outside their own environment. Wertenbaker had already engaged with this topic in New Anatomies (1981), a sprawling, ambitious account of two rebellious women who broke the conventions of gender by dressing in male attire: the nineteenth-century explorer Isabelle Eberhardt and the music hall performer Vesta Tilley. Our Country's Good owed its success at the > Royal Court, in Australia and the West End, to its reaffirmation of the power of theatre to change lives and influence people for the better. The play, based on Thomas Keneally's novel The Playmaker, shows convicts from the First Fleet staging the first theatrical production in Australia, > Farguhars' The Recruiting Officer. The play uses familiar backstage situations to debate the aesthetics and politics of the theatre and the philosophy of punishment, and the original production used devices such as cross-casting, multiple doubling and onstage changes of identity to further the debate about the relationship between environmental and genetic influences on character and behaviour. The Love of the Nightingale is a powerful and spare reworking of the myth of Philomel and Procne, which includes a staging within the play of the Phaedra story and an enactment of Bacchic rituals. Its use of the theatre within its design relates dialectically to that in Our Country's Good, where the theatre is regarded in terms of its power to transform the performers, rather than its audience. Nightingale is much more concerned with the making of myths, the power of language, gender roles, and the role of fantasy in more negative terms. Here the power of theatre is questioned alongside a powerful exploration of the construction of male and female roles. With these two plays Wertenbaker established herself as one of Britain's most challenging and intellectually stimulating dramatists. In 1991, Three Birds

Wesker, Arnold (b 1932)

British dramatist, born in London's East End and son of a Russian Jewish tailor. After military service, he became a professional pastry cook, and then entered the London School of Film Technique. > John Osborne's > Look Back in Anger (1956) influenced him to concentrate on the theatre. In 1961, he became Director of Centre Forty-two, intended to break down such barriers to popular appreciation of the arts as commercialism and intellectual and social snobbery, or social fragmentation due to restricted ways of life and inarticulacy in the shaping of goals. These obstacles to communication in the mass of society are the subject matter of his plays which are pervaded by a search for cordial understanding and sympathy. The Wesker Trilogy, firmly set in an East End world of the Jewish family, uses a form of social realism to depict working-class life. Chicken Soup with Barley (1958) charts the experience of the Khans, a Jewish family in the East End over twenty years, beginning in 1936 with the threat of Moseley's Blackshirts, and ending with the 1956 Soviet invasion of Hungary. These events are experienced from within a domestic world; the play traces the decline of the family, a group of people who come to stand for the disillusion of the postwar generations, as their hopes for the future turn to a loss of faith. The play was enormously influential. Roots (1959) focuses on the sociopolitical enlightenment of its heroine. In the last play of the trilogy, I'm Talking about Jerusalem (1960), Wesker returns to the Khan family; the Jerusalem of the title represents the hopes for the future in the face of the failure of socialist idealism (a reference to the call 'Next year in Jerusalem!' of the Passover ritual). In Chips with Everything (1962) Wesker began to move away from a strictly naturalist form, and employed folk and popular song, a device he was to pursue in his later plays. Wesker's more recent work has tended to move away from the broad chronology and canvases of his earlier work. In Caritas (1981) he explores the phenomenon of a fourteenth-century woman anchorite (a religious mystic and recluse) who literally walls herself up in a cathedral wall. Annie Wobbler (1983) and Mothers (1982) take the form of dramatic monologue. His The Merchant (1977) is an intelligent reworking of > Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice from a Jewish viewpoint. Wesley, Charles (1707-88)

- > Hymn writer. Brother of the evangelist,
- > John Wesley, he was the poet of the ➤ Methodist movement. He wrote about 6,500 hymns of unequal merit. Some of them, such as 'Hark the Herald Angels Sing', 'Jesu, lover of my soul', and 'Love divine all Loves excelling' show genuine poetic feeling, and are well known.

Wesley, John (1703-91)

Evangelist and founder of the > Methodist religious movement. At Oxford, with his brother > Charles, he became the centre of a society which regulated the lives of its members; this led to their being described as 'Methodists'. He was at first a strict Anglican, conforming rigidly to > Church of England liturgies and doctrines, but on a voyage to America in 1735 he became deeply impressed by the purity and undogmatic spirit of fellow-passengers belonging to the German sect known as the Moravians. On his return to England, Wesley preached up and down Britain. Both the Church of England and the Dissenters who were heirs of the 17th-century Puritans had by now relatively little to offer to the minds of the simple people; reaction against the violent conflicts of the previous century had caused the clergy of all denominations to obscure the sense of religion as a power in individual lives. Wesley taught both that every man was naturally a sinner, and that the power of God was available to all for spiritual salvation. In this he followed the Arminian tradition of religious belief, instead of the belief in > Predestination more prevalent among the 17th-century Puritans. Wesley's direct challenge to the hearts and the wills of his hearers caused deep psychological disturbances, and the Methodists were despised by many for the hysteria and emotionalism of their meetings. Nonetheless, the influence of Wesley was extensive and profound, and bore fruit in other religious revivals in the 19th century. He was courteous and had a pleasant wit. When confronted by an arrogant opponent in a narrow street who declared 'I never make way for fools!', Wesley stood aside politely, replying: 'I always do.'

Wessex

The kingdom of the West Saxons from the 6th century till the reign of Alfred at the end of the 9th, after which it developed into the kingdom of England. The capital was the town of Winchester in Hampshire, and the area also included Dorset, Somerset, Wiltshire, and Berkshire. The name of Wessex was revived by the novelist and poet ➤ Thomas Hardy for his ➤ regional novels.

▶ Barnes, William.

West Indian, The (1771)

Comedy by ➤ Richard Cumberland. Belcour has been brought up in the West Indies; he is honest but unsophisticated. Arriving in London, he falls in love with Louisa, the daughter of the impoverished Captain Dudley, but is deceived into thinking her the mistress of Charles, who is in fact her brother. He makes advances to her as if she were a whore and she repels him with the classic phrase, 'Unhand me, sir!' Meanwhile, Charles loves his wealthy cousin Charlotte, but will not acknowledge the fact because of his own poverty. Belcour comes to the aid of Captain Dudley. Eventually Charles and Louisa are revealed as heirs, Belcour and Louisa become reconciled and are married, and Charles marries Charlotte. The play contains references to the workings of Providence in refusing to allow 'innocence to be oppressed', or cruelty and cunning to prosper; it has often been cited as an archetypal example of > sentimentality in the drama of the period.

West, Jane (1758-1852)

Poet, novelist and dramatist. A prolific author, whose restrained prose style and dry sense of humour brought admiration from ➤ Jane Austen and ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft. West's self-deprecating wit may be seen in her mocking self-description:

You said the author was a charmer, Self-taught, and married to a farmer; Who wrote all kinds of verse with ease, Made pies and puddings, frocks and cheese.

Her poetry and plays were published in 1791, but thereafter she concentrated upon novels. Her work includes material that is anti-sentimental (The Advantages of Education, or The History of Maria Williams, 1793), anti-radical (A Tale of the Times, 1799) and anti-feminist (Letters to a Young Lady, 1806). Her historical novels, The Loyalists (1812) and Alicia de Lacey (1814), are perhaps the most readable today.

West, Dame Rebecca (1892-1983)

Novelist, journalist, feminist writer and critic. Born Cecily Isabel Fairfield, she named herself Rebecca West at the age of 19, after the strong-willed and independent protagonist of Rosmersholm, a play by the Norwegian dramatist Ibsen. She was educated in Edinburgh and began her writing career with work for feminist and socialist journals such as The Freewoman and Clarion. She had a long affair with the novelist > H.G. Wells (after writing a highly critical review of his work) and had a son by him; in 1930 she married a banker. In 1916 she published a study of ⊳ Henry James and in 1918 her first novel, The Return of the Soldier, appeared. This uses ▷ modernist narrative techniques to explore the psychological and social nuances of the relationship between three women and a man who returns from World War I with memory loss. Much of her fiction is centred on the contemporary experience of women and emphasizes the special qualities of women as she sees them: Harriet Hume (1929); The Harsh Voice (1935); The Thinking Reed (1936); The Fountain Overflows (1956). She also deals with political issues, such as the suffrage movement in The Judge (1922) and the Russian Revolution in The Birds Fall Down (1966). A journey to Yugoslavia resulted in a travel diary, Black Flag and Grey Falcon: A Journey through Yugoslavia (1941), and she published The New Meaning of Treason (1949), based on her observation of the Nuremberg trials, McLuhan and the Future of Literature (1969) and a biography of St Augustine (1933). Westminster Review

It was founded in 1823 as a vehicle for the Benthamite (▷ Jeremy Bentham) otherwise known as the > Utilitarian school of thought, and at first kept severely to its principles. Its politics of ruthless, scientific institutional reform made it not only a strong opponent of the Tory Quarterly Review but put it well to the left of the > Edinburgh Review. It appealed to a narrower public, and tended, in the Utilitarian manner, to regard the arts with disdain. In 1836 it combined with the now livelier Utilitarian London Review and continued as the London and Westminster Review, under the editorship of the distinguished Utilitarian > John Stuart Mill. Mill wanted to broaden Utilitarian thinking, and writers who were not followers of the movement were brought in, such as ➤ Carlyle and the novelist ➤ George Eliot, who was assistant editor 1851-4. Later contributors varied as greatly as > Walter Pater, father of the > Aesthetic movement, and the positivist Frederic Harrison. It continued to advocate scientific progress, and by the end of the century it ceased to be literary.

Wharton, Anne (1659-1685)

English dramatist and poet, niece of John Wilmot, ▷ Earl of Rochester. In 1673 she was married to Thomas Wharton, later Whig politican, who ignored her. Some of her letters to him survive. When Rochester died, she became close to ▷ Bishop Gilbert Burnet, who was critical of her poetry. Her tragedy, Love's Martyr, or Witt Above Cropns was not acted, but is a political allegory of the > Exclusion Crisis. Her poetry circulated during her lifetime, but it only began to appear in print after her death. She paraphrased the letter from Penelope to Ulysses in Ovid's Heroides: 'Would Troy were glorious still, so I had you.'

Her other publications include: Poems by Several Hands (ed. ▷ Nahum Tate 1685); Idea of Christian Love (1688); A Collection of Poems (1693), and Whartonia (1727).

What Maisie Knew (1897)

A novel by > Henry James. Its theme is the survival of innocence in a world of adult corruption, the influence of adults on a child, and her influence on them.

Maisie Farange is a small girl whose parents have divorced each other with equal guilt on both sides. The parents are heartless and indifferent to their daughter, except as a weapon against each other and in their farcical, though not wholly vain, struggles to maintain acceptable social appearances. Maisie is passed from one to the other, and each employs a governess to take responsibility for her welfare. Both parents marry again, and eventually relinquish Maisie herself. By the end of the book Maisie finds herself torn between two prospective 'step-parents', each formerly married to her real parents, divorced from them, and about to marry each other, Maisie herself having been the occasion of their coming together. Her 'stepfather', Sir Claude, is charming and sweet-natured, but weak and self-indulgent; her 'stepmother', Mrs Beale, is genuinely fond of Maisie (as Sir Claude is) but is basically selfish and rapacious. In addition, the child has a simple-minded, plain and elderly governess, Mrs Wix, who is herself in love with Sir Claude, and devoted to Maisie. The affection of none of them, however, is single-minded, as hers is for each one of them. The pathos of the novel arises from the warm responsiveness, deep need, and pure integrity of Maisie, from whose point of view all the events are seen. Its irony arises from the way in which the child's need for and dependence on adult care and love is transformed into responsibility for the adults themselves, who become dependent on her decisions. In the end these decisions lead her to choose life alone with Mrs Wix, who naively hopes to imbue her with a 'moral sense', unaware that beside Maisie's innocence her own idea of a moral sense represents modified corruption.

Wheathill, Anne (c 1584)

Devotional writer. Little is known about Wheathill's life except that she was an unmarried gentlewoman at the time she composed her one known work, A Handfull of Holesome (though homelie) Hearbs Gathered Out of the Goodlie Garden of Gods Most Holie Word (1584). This text consists of 49 prayers arranged symbolically in accordance with the title; their concerns are conventional, for example how to avoid the sin of pride, how to evade the temptations of the devil, and prayers for faith and repentance. The book itself has an attractive title-page, but the contents are not exceptional.

Wheatley, Phillis (?1753-1784)

The first black poet in English. As a child she was sold as a slave to the Wheatley family in Boston, who treated her well and encouraged her inclination to write. Her Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, published in London in 1773, comprises derivative and conventional verses on ▷ didactic themes: 'Remember, Christians, Negroes, black as Cain,/May be refin'd, and join the angelic train.'

Whetstone, George (1550–87)
English poet and dramatist who is mostly remembered for the comedy Promos and Cassandra (1578), which ▷ Shakespeare used in Measure for Measure.

White, Antonia (1899-1980) Novelist and translator. She was intially named Eirene Botting, White being her mother's surname. Her parents were converts to Catholicism and she was sent to the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Roehampton; after she began writing her novel Frost in May (1933) at the age of 15 her father withdrew her from the school (telling her she had been expelled) and sent her to St Paul's School for Girls (where he was classics master). After doing some teaching and clerical work she attended drama school in 1919 and worked as an actress. She was married three times, two of the marriages being annulled; she experienced periods of mental disturbance (and spent nine months in an asylum) but also supported herself and her children for periods through work as a journalist and advertising copy-writer. She is best known for her four autobiographical novels: Frost in May; The Lost Traveller (1950); The Sugar House (1952); Beyond the Glass (1954). These depict her experiences at school and her subsequent mental disturbances as well as her continuing complex and ambivalent relationship with Catholicism. The Hound and the Falcon (1965) describes, in letter form, her reconversion to Catholicism. Her other writings include: Strangers (1954), a volume of short stories; Three in a Room (1957); Minka and Curdy and Living with Minka and Curdy (1970) about her much-loved cats. As Once in May (1983) includes stories, essays, poems, autobiographical fragments and parts of a sequel to her tetralogy of novels and was edited by her daughter Susan Chitty, who also published Now to My Mother: A Very Personal Memoir of Antonia White.

White Devil, The (1608-9)

A tragedy by > John Webster, published in 1612 with the subtitle Vittoria Corrombona, written in 1608-9. It is based on the story of the actual murder of Vittoria Accoromboni (1585) as told in William Painter's ➤ Palace of Pleasure, Vittoria is the wife of Camillo. The Duke of Brachiano. husband to Isabella, the sister of the Duke of Florence and of Cardinal Montecelso, falls in love with her and is assisted in winning her by her brother, Flamineo. Flamineo causes the death of Camillo, and Brachiano poisons his own wife. In Act III, Vittoria is on trial before Cardinal Montecelso for adultery and murder; she is proudly defiant, and condemned to confinement in a convent, where Brachiano continues to visit her, and whence he eventually steals her away and marries her. In Act V, Flamineo kills his brother, Marcello, who is upbraiding him for his wickedness, and their mother sings over her dead son the lovely dirge 'Call for the robin redbreast and the wren'. The Duke of Florence's hireling, Lodovico, avenges the death of Isabella by killing Flamineo and Vittoria. 'My soul, like to a ship in a black storm, is driven, I know not whither'; the spirit of the stormy play is expressed by this line spoken by the dying Vittoria. The play contains many passages of intense poetry, no virtuous characters among the outstanding ones, and a number of fine theatrical episodes which are difficult to perform because they are long drawn out. The unifying tone is of desperation produced by destructive and self-destroying passions.

White, Gilbert (1720-03)

Writer on natural history. He was born at Selborne, a village in Hampshire. After spending some years as a Fellow of Oriel College, > Oxford, he became a country curate, and spent the last nine years of his life in the village of his birth. His Natural History of Selborne (1789) is a record of the plant, animal and bird life there, inspired by genuine scientific curiosity and showing great delicacy and charm of expression. The book has been described as the first to raise natural history to the level of literature, and is the fruit of the development of 17th- and 18th-century natural science, partly initiated by the greatest of English naturalists, John Ray (1627-1705), author of The Wisdom of God Manifested in the Works of his Creation (1691), a scientist who shared ➤ Newton's intellectual curiosity and his religious awe at the spectacle of divine organization in the universe. Another tradition leading to White was the newly awakened ▷ sensibility for natural surroundings in the poetry of ▷ William Collins, ▷ Oliver Goldsmith and ▷ William Cowper. The poetic movement culminated in the 19th century in the work of ▷ Wordsworth and ▷ Clare.

White, Henry Kirke (1785–1806)
Poet. White came from a poor family but won a scholarship to Cambridge after being encouraged and helped by ▷ Southey. His first book of poetry, Clifton Grove (1803), showed great promise, but he died while still at university and Southey published his papers together with a small biography in The Remains of Kirke White (1807).

White, Patrick (1912-90)

Australian novelist, dramatist and poet. Born in London, educated in Australia, and at Cheltenham College and Cambridge University. He travelled widely in Europe and the U.S.A., served in the Royal Air Force during World War II, and then returned to live in Australia. His work combines an intense spirituality with social comedy and a distaste for human pretension and egotism. His first novel, The Happy Valley (1939), set in remote New South Wales, shows the influence of > Joyce, while The Living and the Dead (1941) is primarily a condemnation of English society of the 1920s and 1930s. White established his reputation with The Tree of Man (1955) and Voss (1957). Both concern man's confrontation with the inhuman forces of nature in Australia, the former through the struggles of a young farmer, the latter through the journey among the Aborigines of a mid-19th-century German explorer. White's last works of fiction were two collections, each containing three short pieces: Memoirs of Many in One (1986) and Three Uneasy Pieces (1988). His other novels are: The Aunt's Story (1948); Riders in the Chariot (1961); The Solid Mandala (1966); The Vivisector (1970); The Eye of the Storm (1973); A Fringe of Leaves (1976); The Twyborn Affair (1979). Drama includes: Return to Abyssinia (1947); Four Plays (1965) (The Ham Funeral, 1961; The Season at Sarsaparilla, 1962; A Cheery Soul, 1963; Night on Bald Mountain, 1964); Big Toys (1977); Signal Driver (1983). Story collections are: The Burnt Ones (1964); The Cockatoos (1974). Verse: The Ploughman and Other Poems (1935).

White, William Hale (1831–1913)
Novelist who used the ▷ pseudonym Mark Rutherford. His father was a ▷ Dissenter and intended his son to be a Dissenting clergyman. However, William White could not reconcile his ideas and the religious doctrines that he was required to believe, and instead he had a civil service career in the Admiralty. His three famous novels were The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford (1881), Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885) and The Revolution in Tanner's Lane (1887). The first two are > autobiographical and concerned with loss of faith. White makes Rutherford more outwardly unfortunate than he was himself, since he had a successful career both as a writer and as a civil servant; the reason seems to be that he makes his character represent not only his own loss of Christian faith but the sense of impoverishment that accompanied it. In his study of John Bunyan (1905), he makes the statement: 'Religion is dead when imagination deserts it.' White's own questioning of his belief started from reading William Wordsworth (1770-1850) in Lyrical Ballads (1798-1800) and the subsequent feeling that nature stirred him as 'the God of the Church' could not. As studies of spiritual loss and contention with it, the Mark Rutherford novels have wide human relevance. The third novel is concerned with radical movements in the early 19th century and shows White's political intelligence, which comes out directly in his pamphlet on the political franchise. His other novels are Miriam's Schooling (1890), Catherine Furze (1893) and Clara Hopgood (1896). Other works: Pages from a Journal and More Pages from a Journal (1900 and 1910); Last Pages (1915).

Whitgift, John (c 1530-1610) Archbishop of Canterbury. Whitgift rose to prominence at Cambridge University, where he was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity in 1567, and in the same year he became chaplain to ➤ Elizabeth I. He was Bishop of Worcester (1577-83) before being made Archbishop in 1583, after the death of ➤ Edmund Grindal. Whitgift's firm Anglican policy and his belief in conformity - he reversed his predecessor's policy of conciliation with the ▶ Puritan sects - brought him into close alliance with the queen, who appointed him to her Privy Council and insisted that he attend her at her deathbed. Subsequently, Whitgift was responsible for > James I's ready acceptance of the Anglican church at his accession in 1603. Whitgift's most well-known work is an attack against ➤ Presbyterianism, An Answere to a Certen Libel Intituled, An Admonition to the Parliament (1572).

Whiting, John (1917-63)

British damatist and actor. Although his plays are now rarely performed, he is important as a pioneer of serious drama during the immediate post-war period. Plays include: A Penny for a Song (1951), Saint's Day (1951), Marching Song (1954) and The Devils (1961), based on > Aldous Huxley's The Devils of Loundon. Both A Penny for a Song and The Devils were performed by the > Royal Shakespeare Company.

Whitney, Isabella (c 1567)

Poet. The first known professional woman poet writing in English, her two extant books, Copy of a Letter . . . (c 1567) and A Sweet Nosegay (1573), both contain moralizing poetry which is primarily secular in tone. Thematically, Whitney concentrates upon the constancy of women and the fickleness of men, using classical allusion to back up her light-hearted arguments and following the tradition of ▷ Ovid's Heroides. In A Sweet Nosegay she is indebted especially to Sir Hugh Platt's Flours of Philosophie whose maxims she translates into verse, although she also participates in the contemporary vogue for 'flower poetry', for example ➤ George Gascoigne's A Hundreth Sundrie Flowres. Her work also includes interesting material that is assumed to be > autobiographical and is useful as such, since little about Whitney's life is known. It is probable that she was the sister of Geoffrey Whitney, the author of A Choice of Emblemes (1586), and that she had several sisters in service in London to whom she dedicated poems. She clearly knew London intimately since her last poem, 'Wyll and Testament', consists of a mock bequest to all the streets and buildings of London; it is entirely secular in tone and is reminiscent of the travel pieces in > Thomas Nashe's > The Unfortunate Traveller (1594).

Whittington, Richard (d 1423)

A rich and famous Lord Mayor of London in 1397–8, 1406–7, and 1419–20. He made substantial loans of money to the kings → Henry IV and → Henry V, and used his wealth for public works, including a legacy for improving Newgate Prison. His almshouses for the poor are still maintained. According to popular legend, he was originally a poor orphan and became the ill-treated servant of a rich merchant. He ran away from London, with his cat, until he heard Bow bells calling him back:

Turn again, Dick Whittington, Lord Mayor of London. The legend is a popular subject of Christmas

Wickham, Anna (1884-1947)

Poet, Anna Wickham (pseudonym of Edith Harper) published her first volume of poetry in 1911 as Songs of John Oland (another of her pseudonyms), and whilst her writing career spanned the period of high ➤ modernism, her poetry is more characteristic of ➤ Edwardian and > Georgian styles (so much so that it appeared in two important collections of the 1930s, Edwardian Poetry and Neo-Georgian Poetry, 1937). She committed suicide in 1947. Her published works include: The Contemplative Quarry and the Man with a Hammer (1921); The Little Old House (1921); Thirty-Six New Poems (1936), and the 1984 Virago Press publication of The Writings of Anna Wickham: Free Woman and Poet (ed. Wide Sargasso Sea, The ➤ Rhys, Jean.

Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale, The Part of ▷ Chaucer's ▷ Canterbury Tales. The Wife of Bath contributes both the story of her life and an Arthurian (▷ Arthur, King) romance to the story-telling collection. Her Prologue, of some 856 lines, gives an account of her marital career, spanning five marriages, and borrows sermonizing techniques for its thematic organization, structure and mode of argument. The Wife's history outlines the economic laws of the marriage market: it is only after three marriages to old, but financially well-endowed men that the Wife has gained the economic independence to find more pleasing partners. She challenges some of the clerical attitudes to marriage both in theory (in her opening comments) and in practice (in her physical confrontation with her fifth husband Jankyn, the clerk, and his book, an anti-feminist compilation). The Arthurian narrative which follows is a version of the 'Loathly Lady' story (which has parallels in > Gower's > Confessio Amantis, and the Weddynge of Sir Gawen and Dame Ragnell), and offers an equally complex view of power relations between the sexes, but refracted through the lens of the romance genre.

Unlike the analogues, the Wife's story begins with a rape of a young woman by a knight. The female members of King Arthur's court agree to commute the knight's death sentence for the offence, if he can answer the question 'What do women most desire?'. The winning answer (sovereignty) is supplied by a mysterious old woman whom the knight meets on his quest. In return for saving the knight's life, the old woman demands that the knight should marry her. He does so, but she is transformed into a beautiful woman (after the knight has ceded sovereignty to her over the choice she offers him between a wife who is beautiful or one who is faithful), and they enjoy, according to the narrator, a happy harmonious life together. No explanation is offered for the mechanics of this transformation in the Wife's version of events (again, unlike the other analogues). The Wife's contribution provides a catalyst for further tales, a debating point for the pilgrims, and a subject of modern critical controversy. A debate between the Friar and the Summoner is provoked in the course of her tale, which continues after she has finished; she is referred to an authority on marriage in the > Merchant's Tale; and the clerk explicitly replies to her criticism of the clerical representation of secular women in his tale.

Wilberforce, William (1759–1833)
Philanthropist and politician. He devoted much of his life to the campaign to abolish the slave trade and ▷ slavery in overseas British territories. In 1807, the slave trade was made illegal, and so was slavery itself in the year of his death. He was leader of the ▷ Evangelical Movement, particularly of a group known as the Clapham Sect because it met in his house at Clapham.

Wild Gallant, The (1663)

Play by > John Dryden, which has been seen by some as the first Restoration Comedy of ▶ Manners. Constance, a rich heiress, is in love with the charming but penniless Loveby. She steals money from her father in order to supply her lover secretly; he, however, thinks it is a gift from the devil. He expresses his appreciation of the devil in a number of lines bordering on blasphemy. Eventually, by pretending to be pregnant Constance gains leave to wed the man of her choice, and marries Loveby. In a separate but linked plot Isabella, a witty and charming relative of Constance's, wants to marry a man with money and chooses the wealthy Timorous, to whom she is somewhat attracted, although she does not love him. She wins him by means of various intrigues and disguises, including passing herself off as Constance. The play has some farcical comic business: in one sequence Constance persuades the men in the play that they too are pregnant. There is also some > feminist comment, as when Constance complains that 'Women are tied to hard unequal laws: the passion is the same in us, and yet we are barred the freedom to express it'.

Wilde, Jane Francesca (1826–96) Irish writer, born in Wexford, the daughter of an archdeacon. In 1851, she married a surgeon, Sir William Wilde, and was widowed in 1871. She died in considerable poverty in London in the year her son, ▷ Oscar Wilde (1856–1900), was publicly tried and disgraced on grounds of ▷ homosexuality. Frequently using the ▷ pseudonym Speranza, she contributed regularly to The Nation, and published a collection, Poems, in 1864. Her writings about folklore and collections of Irish legends include: Driftwood from Scandinavia (1884), Ancient Legends of Ireland (1887) and Ancient Cures (1891). Her other books are Men, Women and Books (1891) and Social Studies (1893).

Wilde, Oscar Fingal O'Flahertie Wills (1856-1900)

Dramatist, poet, novelist and essayist. He was the son of an eminent Irish surgeon and ▷ Jane Francesca Wilde. At Oxford University his style of life became notorious; he was a disciple of > Pater, the Oxford father of > aestheticism, and he carried the doctrine as far as to conduct his life as an aesthetic disciple - a direct challenge to the prevailing outlook of the society of his time, which was inclined to regard overt aestheticism with suspicion or disdain. In 1888 Wilde produced a volume of children's fairy tales very much in the melancholy and poetic style of the Danish writer > Hans Christian Andersen - The Happy Prince. He followed this with two other volumes of stories, and then the novel, > The Picture of Dorian Grey (1891), whose hero is an embodiment of the aesthetic way of life. More commonly known were his comedies, > Lady Windermere's Fan (1892), A Woman of No Importance (1893), An Ideal Husband (1895), and above all the witty > Importance of Being Earnest (1895). The plays are apparently light-hearted, but they contain strong elements of serious feeling in their attack on a society whose code is intolerant, but whose intolerance is hypocritical. In 1895, by a libel action against the Marquis of Queensberry, he exposed himself to a countercharge of immoral > homosexual conduct, and spent two years in prison. In 1898 he published his ➤ Ballad of Reading Gaol about his prison experience, proving that he could write in the direct language of the > ballad tradition, as well as in the artificial style of his Collected Poems (1892). His De Profundis (1905) is an eloquent statement of his grief after his downfall, but modern critics are equally as impressed by the intelligence of his social essays, such as The Critic as Artist (1891) and The Soul of Man under Socialism (1891). The paradox of Wilde is that, while for his contemporaries he represented degeneracy and weakness, there is plenty of evidence that he was a brave man of remarkable strength of character who made an emphatic protest against the vulgarity of his age and yet, artistically, was himself subject to vulgarity of an opposite kind.

Wilkes, John (1727-97)

Journalist and politician. He was dissolute, and notorious for his membership of the scandalous Hell-Fire Club at Medmenham Abbey, with its motto 'Fay ce que voudras' = 'Do as you will'. Politically he was radical and courageous, and a popular hero. In 1762 he attacked ➤ George III's administration under Lord Bute in The North Briton, a periodical which countered The Briton edited by the novelist, > Tobias Smollett. As an MP, he was twice expelled from the House of Commons for libel, and in 1769 he was three times elected to ▶ Parliament by the county of Middlesex, the election each time being annulled. He was allowed to sit in 1774, in which year he was Lord Mayor of London. His character was such as to win the respect of > Dr Johnson, a man of opposite moral and political principles: 'Jack has great variety of talk, Jack is a scholar, Jack has the manners of a gentleman.' (Quoted in > Boswell's Life of Johnson.)

Wilkinson, John (b 1953)

Poet. Wilkinson's poetry aims to combine analytical traditions of thought, including the psychoanalytic, with a fierce commitment to the lyric as the fundamental mode for poetic expression. His poetic career began while he was a student reading English at Jesus College, Cambridge, and his early work shows the influence of ▷ J. H. Prynne, as for example in Useful Reforms (1976). More recent texts, such as the 1994 collection Flung Clear, are both more encyclopaedic in subject and more personal in tone.

Wilkinson, Sarah (?-c 1830)

Novelist. By Wilkinson's own account she published a novel, The Thatched Cottage, opened a school on the proceeds, and taught intermittently after that time. Her own novels, of which The Spectre of Lanmere Abbey (1820) is perhaps the best, include all the required ➤ Gothic ingredients and she was much influenced by ➤ Ann Radcliffe. However, Wilkinson was unable to take the ghosts, hauntings and other paraphernalia seriously and a mocking irony always undercuts, quite pleasurably, the overladen and exaggerated tone expected of the genre. Wilkinson is also known for her > chapbooks, which consist of condensed forms of popular works as well as simplified > translations of foreign literature.

She scrupulously acknowledged the authors of the works she treated in this manner (Henry Fielding, > 'Monk' Lewis, Ann Radcliffe and > Sir Walter Scott), but her own irrepressible ironic tone creates a witty self-consciousness.

Wilks, Robert (?1665-1732)

Actor, manager. Wilks made his first public appearance, as ▷ Othello, at the ▷ Smock Alley Theatre in Dublin in 1691, and in the following year he was employed as an actor by ▷ Christopher Rich in London. He became noted for his gentlemanly style of acting, and was the original Sir Harry Wildair, in his friend, ▷ George Farquhar's ▷ The Constant Couple.

Wilks became co-manager first of the

→ Drury Lane, in combination with several others including, at various times, Owen Swiney
(1675-1754), → Colley Cibber, Thomas Doggett
(c1670-1721), Richard Estcourt (1668-1712),

→ Sir Richard Steele, → Barton Booth, and

→ Anne Oldfield. He shared control for the rest of his career, while at the same time continuing to strengthen and build up his repertoire as a leading actor, succeeding more in comedies than in tragedies.

Throughout his life Wilks maintained a reputation for sobriety and conscientiousness. Cibber also speaks of his superb memory which, coupled with his diligence, meant that he was almost invariably word-perfect, in an age when ad-libbing on stage was common. However, he could be unduly exacting of others and at times quarrelsome. Wilks is generally credited with a large share of responsibility for Drury Lane's prosperity during the 1710s and 1720s.

William I (1066-87) the Conqueror As Duke of Normandy he came to power in 1035, and proved himself an effective soldier and ruler. In 1051, he may have received some sort of promise from > Edward the Confessor, his relative, that the English throne should pass to him, and Harold Earl of > Wessex promised his support in 1064. When, nonetheless, Harold himself succeeded Edward, William invaded England and defeated Harold near Hastings in Sussex, 1066. By 1070 he had reduced the whole country. William's government was remarkably thorough and efficient. There was an extensive redistribution of land, with the result that the ➤ Anglo-Saxon nobility were effectively dispossessed. At the same time, William so managed this redistribution that the royal authority could be more effectively maintained throughout the country than was usual in 11th-century western Europe.

William II (1087-1100)

King of England. His nickname William Rufus arose from the reddish colour of his complexion and hair. He continued the policy of his father, William I, but was much more unpopular owing to his wilful tyrannies. According to legend he was killed while hunting in the New Forest by an arrow shot by Walter Tirel.

William III (1689-1702)

Mary II until her death in 1694. As William of Orange, Stadtholder of Holland, he was leader of the European opposition to the power of Louis XIV, which also menaced Britain. His wife was the daughter of James II, deposed for his Catholicism and his threat to the liberty of Parliament. His reign was largely taken up with war against France. The political power of Parliament was further increased by his foreign preoccupations, and by the fact that, as a foreigner, he lacked experience of English political affairs.

William IV (1830-37)

He was brother of his predecessor, ➤ George IV, and uncle to his successor, ➤ Victoria. He was a well-meaning man of small ability, but the most popular member of a royal family which was otherwise very unpopular.

Williams, Helen Maria (1762-1827) English poet, novelist and correspondent. Brought up in Berwick-on-Tweed, she first published the verse romance Edwin and Eltruda, and Peru (1784) and sonnets in 1786. Her Poem on the Slave Trade (1788) was commented on by ➤ Mary Scott. After she settled in France she reworked > Jean Jacques Rousseau's Julie: ou, la nouvelle Héloise (1761) in Julia (1790). Her radical letters from France describing the Revolution (> French Revolution) were published in 1790. In France she lived with the divorced John Hurford Stone. She translated the popular bestseller Paul et Virginie - the text chosen for its apolitical status in case of raids. She writes, 'no danger could be more imminent than that of living under the very tyranny which I had the perilous honour of having been one of the first to deprecate and to proclaim.' She was lucky enough to get a passport to Switzerland, which resulted in A Tour in Switzerland (1798), Bib: Scheffler, J., The Wordsworth Circle, No.

Williams, Raymond (1921-87)

The most influential of all radical thinkers in Britain in the 20th century. Williams' work spans literary criticism, cultural studies, media studies, communications and politics, and he also wrote plays and novels. In Culture and Society 1780–1950 (1958) and The Long Revolution (1961) he laid the foundation for a wide-ranging analysis of modern cultural forms, and can justly be accredited with the foundation of cultural studies as an interdisciplinary field of enquiry. In books such as Modern Tragedy (1966) and Drama from Ibsen to Brecht (1968), which was a revision of his earlier Drama from Ibsen to Eliot (1952), he challenged accepted ways of evaluating drama and dramatic forms and in 1068 was a guiding spirit behind the New Left's Mayday Manifesto (1968). For Williams writing was always and primarily a social activity, deeply implicated in politics. Through books such as The Country and The City (1973), Marxism and Literature (1977), Politics and Letters (1979), Problems in Materialism and Culture (1980), Writing in Society, Towards 2000 (1983) and his John Clare's Selected Poetry and Prose (1986), he pursued these themes with an intellectual rigour which refused easy formulations. His was the intellectual force behind the current movement of cultural > materialism, the British equivalent of American > new historicism. His novels are now belatedly receiving the critical attention they have long deserved. They begin with Border Country (1960), Second Generation (1964), and The Fight for Manod (1979) in a partially autobiographical trilogy mainly set in Wales, showing a growing identification with the then newly emerging Welsh consciousness of nationhood, a theme continued in The Volunteers (1978) and in Loyalties (1985). At his death Raymond Williams left an unfinished historical trilogy People of the Black Mountains, of which the first and second volumes The Beginning (1989) and The Eggs of the Eagle (1990) were prepared for publication by his widow Joy and his daughter Merryn.

Named after its owner William Unwin, it was the haunt of such authors as ➤ John Dryden, ➤ William Wycherley, ➤ Joseph Addison and ➤ Alexander Pope. It became dominated by the older, mainly Tory (➤ Whig and Tory) set in the early years of the 18th century and ➤ Button's Coffee-house was set up as a fashionable rival, with a more Whiggish clientele.

Wilson, Angus (1913-91)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Durban, South Africa, Wilson was educated at Westminster School in London and at Merton College, Oxford. He worked for many years in the British Museum Reading Room, served in the Foreign Office during World War II, and, from 1963, taught English literature at the University of East Anglia. He was primarily a satirist (> satire), with a particularly sharp ear for the way in which hypocrisy, cruelty and smugness are betrayed in conversation.

His first published works were short stories, The Wrong Set (1949) and Such Darling Dodos (1950), depicting English middle-class life around the time of World War II. His early work was traditional in form, inspired by his respect for the 19th-century English novel and a reaction against the dominance of post-Jamesian (> Henry James) narrative techniques in the > modernist novel. Hemlock and After (1952), Anglo-Saxon Attitudes (1956) and The Middle Age of Mrs Eliot (1958) deal with such issues as responsibility, guilt and the problem of loneliness. The surface is satirical, and at times highly comic, but, as the protagonist of Anglo-Saxon Attitudes comments, 'the ludicrous was too often only a thin covering for the serious and the tragic'. The Old Men at the Zoo (1961) represented a considerable change of mode: it is a bizarre fable concerning personal and political commitment, set in the London Zoo at a time of international crisis. From this point on Wilson's work became more experimental: Late Call (1964) makes use of pastiche, while No Laughing Matter (1967) reflects the influence of > Virginia Woolf, employing multiple interior monologues, as well as parodic dramatic dialogue and stories by one of the characters. It has a broad historical and social sweep, setting the story of a family between 1912 and 1967 in the context of British society as a whole. Like Anglo-Saxon Attitudes and Late Call it traces personal and public concerns back to the period immediately before World War I. Setting the World on Fire (1980) was another new departure in form; it is a complex and highly patterned work in which the myth of Phaeton is re-enacted in modern London. His other novels are: As If By Magic (1973). Story collections: Death Dance (1969); Collected Stories (1987). Travel writing: Reflections in a Writer's Eye (1986). Critical works include: Émile Zola (1952); The World of Charles Dickens (1970); The Strange Ride of Rudyard Kipling (1977). Bib: Cox, C. B., The Free Spirit; Halio, J. L. Wilson, Colin (b 1931)

Novelist and critic. He is known primarily as the author of the ▷ existentialist work The Outsider (1956), which was much acclaimed at the time of its publication. He is the author of 15 novels, and over 50 works of non-fiction. His novels feature violence, sexuality and the idea of the outsider in society, and seek to acknowledge fictionality by using genres such as the detective story with a deliberate incongruity.

Wilson, Harriette (1786–1845) Autobiographer. Infamous for her racy ➤ autobiography, Memoirs (1825), in which she describes her life as a courtesan and her affairs with many of the leading figures of her day. She planned the book with her husband, William Henry Rochfort (whom she had married in 1823), as a form of blackmail and, indeed, when it was published it caused an immediate commotion amongst those mentioned (including Beau Brummel and the ▷ Duke of Wellington), as well as amongst the outraged upholders of morality. She followed this with two romans-à-clef which are immensely readable accounts of London life: Paris Lions and London Tigers (1825) and Clara Gazul (1830).

Wilson, John (1785-1854)

Scottish journalist, chiefly known under the pseudonym 'Christopher North' which he used when writing for \triangleright Blackwood's Magazine, for which he was the principal writer from 1817. He wrote very lively, semi-dramatic discussions called Noctes Ambrosianae which became famous. In 1820 he was elected to the professorship of moral philosophy in Edinburgh University. He had no special qualifications for the post, but was backed by \triangleright Walter Scott. Nonetheless he filled the post very effectively. He contributed much other journalism to Blackwood's, and was also a poet: The Isle of Palms (1812) and The City of the Plague (1816).

Wilson, Robert (d 1600)

Dramatist and actor. We know little of Wilson's life, except that he joined the acting companies of the Earl of Leicester's Men after 1572 and of Queen Elizabeth's Men after 1583; he is also known for his brilliant extemporizing during dramatic performances. His dramatic writing includes The Ladies of London (c 1581), The Three Lords and Ladies of London (c 1589), and The Cobbler's Prophecy (c 1594). Wilson's dramatic output represents the bridge between writing for the medieval ▷ morality tradition and for the ▷ Renaissance public theatres.

Wilson, Thomas (c 1525-81)

Theorist and politician. Thomas Wilson had a successful public career as well as writing one of the most important > Renaissance books on literary style, Arte of Rhetorique (1553 and 1560). An ardent supporter of > Elizabeth I, he was appointed as Privy Councillor (1572) and Secretary of State (1578), and was involved in the successful prosecution of the Duke of Norfolk and ➤ Mary Queen of Scots. He was also a confirmed > Protestant and spent most of ➤ Mary I's reign on the continent. His two most noted works are Arte and Rule of Reason (1551), the latter concerning itself with logic, rather than focusing on > rhetoric as his later writing does. Wilson's Arte gives a series of epistles and orations in different styles, some are meant to be copied, others are more akin to parodies, so that the whole text conforms to the Renaissance doctrine of both teaching and amusing – 'pleasure reconciled to virtue'. Bib: Medine, P., Thomas Wilson.

Wings of the Dove, The (1902)

A novel by > Henry James. The scene is principally London and Venice. Kate Croy and Merton Densher, a young journalist, are in love, but without the money to marry. Kate's rich aunt, Maud Lowder, takes into her circle Milly Theale, a lonely American girl of great singlemindedness, eagerness for life, and capacity for affection, and also a millionairess. Milly is travelling in Europe with Susan Stringham, an old friend of Mrs Lowder's. Mrs Stringham learns from Milly's doctor that the girl is suffering from a fatal illness, that her death cannot be long delayed, and that it can only be delayed at all if she achieves happiness. Mrs Stringham communicates this to Kate, who conceives a plot with a double purpose: Merton is to engage Milly's love, thus bringing her the happiness that she needs, and at the same time securing her money when she dies, so that Kate's own marriage to Merton can at last take place. Milly's love for Merton is very real; because of it, however, she refuses another suitor, Lord Mark, who knows Kate's plot and in revenge betrays it to Milly. She dies, broken-hearted, but she leaves Merton her money. Merton and Kate, however, find that they are for ever separated by the shadow of the dead Milly between them.

The story is an example of James' 'international theme': in this case, the openness and integrity which he saw as strengths of the American personality are opposed to the selfishness and deviousness which he saw as part of the decadent aspect of European culture. It is written in the condensed, allusive style which is characteristic also of \triangleright The Ambassadors and

> The Golden Bowl.

Winner and Waster

An > alliterative > dream-vision poem, composed in the mid to later 14th century, which investigates the relationship between the earning (winning) and dispending (wasting) forces in a society, by dramatizing a confrontation between the martial forces of Winner and Waster. The narrator describes how, in his dream, he sees the two sides in full martial array, drawn up before a king (whose emblems suggest he is ➤ Edward III). The two leaders from either side embark on a war of words, attacking the principles of the other and defending their own position, and present their respective cases for the judgement of the king (and thus defer physical combat). The debate is the vehicle for a wry assessment of various kinds of materialistic corruption in contemporary society, and of the injustices which result from the misuse of money. The last lines of the poem are missing so the king's judgement, if he offered one, is not known. It may have influenced the techniques of social satire developed by > Langland in > Piers Plowman, but Langland's poem takes the debate very much further.

Winter, John Strange (1856-1911) > Pseudonym of novelist Henrietta Palmer (she also wrote as Violet Whyte). She was born in York, the daughter of a rector who came from a military family. Winter's writings show the army influence, often describing the lives of wives and children of military heroes. The pseudonym was adopted on the advice of her publishers, who considered that works such as Cavalry Life (1881) and Regimental Legends (1883) would be more credible if thought to have been written by a man. Winter's most successful work was Bootle's Baby: A Story of the Scarlet Lancers (1885), which was serialized in the Graphic and adapted for the stage, playing at the Globe theatre in London in 1889. Other works include He Went for a Soldier (1890), A Soldier's Children (1892), and A Summer Jaunt (1889). Winter also founded the Golden Gates magazine in 1891, was President of the Writer's Club (1892) and President of the Society of Women Journalists (1901-3).

Winter's Tale, The (1610-11)

A play by ▷ Shakespeare; one of his ▷ romances, dated 1610-11, and based on ⊳ Robert Greene's Pandosto. Leontes, king of Sicilia, is married to Hermione, whom he deeply loves, and at the opening of the play is receiving a visit from Polixenes, king of Bohemia and the intimate friend of his childhood. Leontes becomes consumed by an insane jealousy, and is convinced that the child with which Hermione is pregnant has been fathered by Polixenes. He orders Camillo, a courtier, to poison Polixenes, but instead Camillo and Polixenes flee the country together. Leontes orders the trial of Hermione for adultery and, to appease his indignant courtiers, he sends to the oracle of Delphi in order to obtain what he believes will be confirmation of her guilt. The baby is born, but Leontes orders another courtier, Antigonus, to leave it in a desolate place to perish. At this point a succession of catastrophes is heaped on Leontes: he learns from the oracle that his wife is innocent, from Paulina, wife of Antigonus, that Hermione has died, and that his little son has also died, of grief at the suffering of his mother. The last scene of Act III shows Antigonus depositing the baby on the coast of Bohemia and her discovery by two shepherds. Thus far the play is tragic; Acts IV and V show recovery. The baby grows up into a beautiful girl, Perdita, who believes herself to be a shepherd's daughter. Florizel, son of Polixenes, courts her at the shepherds' sheep-shearing feast, but they have to flee to Sicilia to escape the anger of his father. Polixenes follows them, and at Leontes' court once more a great reconciliation takes place. Paulina discloses that Hermione is not dead, but has been kept in hiding until the return of Perdita, in accordance with the prediction of the oracle; in the last scene she is shown to Leontes as a statue of her supposedly dead self, but at the command of Paulina the statue gradually comes to life to the sound of music.

The summary shows that the play has no pretence to external realism; it is a fable about the destructiveness of the passions and the healing power of time. The symbolism is especially of the seasons: 'a winter's tale' is about deprivation, but the play ends in autumn, the season of recovered fulfilment, while the sheep-shearing scene (IV. 3) has springlike qualities, with Perdita reminding one of Persephone in her lines about the spring flowers. The ⊳ pastoral aspect of the play shows pastoralism in a new light - not as an escape from change and decay into day-dream, but as a phase of development which must be outgrown if capacity for growth is to be fulfilled. The process of growth implies desire, fear and possessiveness, which form the state of mind of the jealous Leontes at the beginning of the play when he finds that he has outgrown his pastorally innocent friendship with Polixenes. From this false development, he can recover only by repentance.

Winterson, Jeanette (b 1959)

Novelist. Winterson's works have been praised for their originality of subject matter and form. Her first novel, the autobiographical Oranges are not the only fruit (1985), is a witty account of her upbringing as the child of fundamentalist Christians and her development as a lesbian in a town in the north of England; it won the Whitbread Award for First Novel and was translated into an enormously popular television series. Her subsequent novels have been more experimental and formally complex; these are Boating for Beginners (1986); The Passion (which won the John Llewelyn Rhys Prize in 1987); Sexing the Cherry (1989); Written on the Body (1992); Art and Lies (1994) interweaves multiple voices to create an imaginary world.

Wit

This word has a number of distinct, though related, meanings. 1 The oldest meaning is identical with 'mind', as in > Wycliffe's 14thcentury translation of the Bible: 'Who knew the wit of the Lord?' (Romans 11:34). This use of 'wit' rarely occurs in the literature of the last hundred years. 2 Another long-established meaning is 'a faculty of the mind'. This is still in use today, as when we speak of someone having 'lost his wits', ie lost the use of his mental faculties. 3 A common meaning in the 17th and 18th centuries was the capacity to relate unlike ideas, as in Locke's definition: 'Wit lying in the assemblage of ideas, and putting these together with the quickness and variety wherein can be found any resemblance or congruity, thereby to make up pleasant pictures in the fancy' (Essay concerning Human Understanding, 1690). ➤ Cowley, in his poem Of Wit (1656), wrote 'In a true piece of wit all things must be. Yet all things there agree.'

Witches

People supposed to be in league with the devil, who gives them supernatural powers. The name 'witch' was sometimes used for both sexes, though those accused of being witches were usually women. They commonly had 'familiars' in the form of spirits disguised as animals of bad or sinister reputation – toads or cats of certain colours. To work their magic, witches uttered 'spells' of specially devised words, or they used objects ('charms') supposed to have magical properties; witches used to gather in small communities known as 'covens', and they assembled on one day of the year (a 'witches' Sabbath') to worship the Devil.

The common explanation of witchcraft is that, in Europe at least, it represents the long survival of pre-Christian pagan religions in which the gods were the embodiments of the powers of nature, usually in the forms of animals, often a goat, but in Britain commonly the bull, the dog, or the cat. More recently witchcraft, or the accusation of witchcraft, has been regarded as a 17th-century mechanism of social control, used to discourage women from living alone outside the authority of a male-dominated household.

That witchcraft was common in the Middle Ages is not surprising; it is at first sight surprising that it was conspicuous in the later 16th and early 17th centuries, and that not merely the ignorant and uneducated but some of the learned believed in it. ➤ James v1 of Scotland and 1 of England, who has been called 'the greatest scholar who ever sat on the English throne', was himself deeply interested in it and wrote a denunciation of it - his Daemonologie (1599). The pamphlet News from Scotland (1591) describes his conversion from scepticism to belief in it, and seems to have been used by ▷ Shakespeare in the portrayal of the witches in ▷ Macbeth. James later, however, moved to a more sceptical position again. The first law making witchcraft an offence punishable by death in England was passed in 1603 (though causing death by witchcraft had been so punishable since 1563) and it was not repealed until 1736. Sir Thomas Browne declares his firm belief in it in ➤ Religio Medici (1643); the last learned defence of the belief was Saducismus Triumphatus (1681) by the scholar and clergyman Joseph Glanville. The belief seems to have been particularly strong among > Puritans and in Puritan countries, for instance in Scotland, 17th-century New England, and England under the ➤ Long Parliament. Rare survivals of it have been found in 20th-century England. It has been suggested that the prevalence of the belief in the 17th century and among Puritans is that their superstitious impulses were no longer satisfied by the Catholic system of mysteries (miracles, lives of the saints, etc.) which they had expelled from their faith by its 'purification'.

▷ Dekker and ▷ Ford's Witches of Edmonton (1623) and ▷ Middleton's The Witch (1615).
▷ William Golding's The Spire (1964) deals with medieval pagan survival.

Wither, George (1588-1667)

Poet. Between 1612, when Wither's first publication appeared, and the poet's death in 1667, there were very few years that were not marked by the publication of at least one volume of verse or prose from this prolific author. Wither was possibly the most imprisoned writer in the history of English literature. In 1613 his > satiric work Abuses Stripped and Whipped earned him a period of imprisonment, a punishment he earned once more in 1621. when Wither's Motto appeared, and which was to befall him again in 1646 (on publication of his > pamphlet Justiarius Justificatus) and in 1660 (appearance of unpublished satire: Vox Vulgi: A Poem in Censure of Parliament). His later works were written in the belief that he was God's prophet. Of note, however, are several volumes of earlier verse, and his collection of emblems (> Emblem-books), which appeared in four volumes in 1635. Bib: Hunter, W. B., The English Spenserians.

Wives and Daughters (1864–6)
A novel by ▷ Mrs Gaskell, published serially in the ▷ Cornhill Magazine and not completed at her death. It is a study of two families, the Gibsons and the Hamleys, in a small country town and the relationships of the parents and the children in each. The central character is Molly Gibson, whose liberal, frank, sincere and deeply responsible nature is painfully tested by the marriage of her widowed father (a country doctor) to a silly, vain widow. The widow brings with her, however, her own daughter, Cynthia, a girl with her mother's outward charm but without her silliness and with feelings guided more by her discerning intelligence than by spontaneous loyalties. Cynthia at sixteen has become engaged to a coarse but astute man. Mr Preston, who is a local land-agent. The two girls become involved with the two sons of Mr Hamley, the local squire. The elder boy, Osborne, is superficially brilliant and charming, and much overestimated by his father. The younger son, Roger, has much less showy qualities but a deeper nature and eventually wins the academic success expected of but not achieved by the elder, who makes an unfortunate marriage, is cast off by the father and dies young. The novel thus brings out the differences between superficial and deep natures, and the perils that result from consequent false estimates of character, made even by the intelligent.

Wives Excuse, The: Or Cuckolds Make Themselves (1691)

Play by ➤ Thomas Southerne, identified with a wave of so-called 'marital discord comedies' of the 1690s by writers including > Vanbrugh and > Farquhar, which focused on the problems of > marriage, as much as on those of courtship. Southerne concentrated on showing up the sexual double standard and its effects on women. The Wives Excuse bleakly presents the dilemma of the woman trapped in an unhappy marriage to a man whose shameless infidelity goes unpunished, while she stands to lose her dignity, reputation, and remaining peace of mind if she succumbs to the advances of her would-be lover. Mrs Friendall wrestles with temptation in the form of the attractive but unscrupulous Lovemore, while Mr Friendall pursues an affair with Mrs Wittwoud. At the end, the couple agree to separate. Southerne implies that Mrs Friendall will eventually give in to Lovemore, only to be abandoned when he tires of her. The play was unsuccessful, but is now considered one of the great plays of the period, its polish and sophistication serving only to point up the hypocrisy underlying the situation which it portrays.

Wodehouse, (Sir) P. G. (Pelham Grenville) (1881-1975)

Writer of humorous short stories and novels. Born in Guildford, Surrey and educated at Dulwich College, London, he was brought up partly by aunts in England, since his father was a judge in Hong Kong. Known always as P. G. Wodehouse, his most famous creations were the good-natured but disaster-prone young man about town, Bertie Wooster, and his ever-resourceful 'gentleman's gentleman' (manservant), Jeeves, first introduced in The Man With Two Left Feet (1917). The Jeeves and Wooster books include: My Man Jeeves (1919); The Inimitable Jeeves (1923); Carry On Jeeves (1925); Right Ho, Jeeves (1934); The Code of the Woosters (1938); Jeeves in the Offing (1960); Stiff Upper Lip, Jeeves (1963). Wodehouse depicted a range of other comic characters, evoking a charming escapist myth of the upper-class England of the 1920s. He also wrote school stories such as Mike (1909), sentimental romances such as Love Among the Chickens (1906), song lyrics and works for the theatre and cinema. Despite a scandal when he broadcast from Germany during World War II, after having been captured, he remained immensely popular. He lived in Britain, France and the U.S.A., becoming an American citizen in 1945.

Woffington, Peg (Margaret) (?1714–60)
Actress. At the ▷ Smock Alley Theatre, Dublin, in 1740, she played the first of many performances as Sir Harry Wildair in ▷ George Farquhar's ▷ The Constant Couple. She repeated the role at ▷ Covent Garden and at ▷ Drury Lane, and became so celebrated in it that even ▷ Garrick could not equal her when he took on the same part.

The rest of her career from 1741 was spent largely at Drury Lane, but with further appearances at Covent Garden and in Dublin. She became the mistress of Garrick, and a theatrical rival of ▷ Kitty Clive, and ▷ George Anne Bellamy, whom she literally stabbed during a performance of Nathanial Lee's ▷ The Rival Queens, just as ▷ Elizabeth Barry had done to ▷ Elizabeth Bowtell more than half a century before.

Peg Woffington was described as the most beautiful woman to have appeared on the stage in her own day. She was said to be full of vitality, elegance, and > wit. During a career lasting over 30 years, she took on major roles in well over a hundred plays, sometimes acting different parts in the same play, at different periods in her life. She was especially famous for her talent in men's roles.

Wolcot, John (1738–1819)
Poet. After a career as a doctor in Jamaica and Cornwall, Wolcot accompanied the painter Opie to London, intent on a career in literature.
His poems, published under the pseudonym
Peter Pindar are crude if vigorous ⊳ satires

on respectable public figures and institutions: Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians (1782-5), The Lousiad (1785), Instructions to a Celebrated Laureat (1787). His Bozzy and Piozzi (1786) is a whimsical poem in which ▷ James Boswell and ▷ Hester Lynch Thrale are shown reminiscing about ▷ Samuel Johnson, who had died two years earlier.

Wolley (Woolley), Hannah (?1621–?1676) English writer on household management and > conduct, who was a servant and then married a headmaster (and others), and published a sequence of books on cooking, medicine and the household. She writes in The Cook's Guide (1664) that she has 'sent forth this book, to testific to the scandalous world that I do not altogether spend my time idly'.

Her other publications include: The Ladies Directory (1661); The Queen-Like Closet (1670), and The Ladies Delight (1672).

Wollstonecraft, Mary (1759–97)
Pamphleteer and novelist. Wollstonecraft is notable for her outspoken views on the role of women in society, and on the part played by ▷ education in woman's oppression. After running a school in London with her sister, she set out her ideas in the early pamphlet Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787). The following year her novel Mary developed this theme, together with a satirical perspective on the manners of the aristocracy, possibly based on her own experiences as governess with the family of Lord Kingsborough in Ireland.

Wollstonecraft's most famous work, ▷ A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) now stands as one of the major documents in the history of women's writing. Attacking the 'mistaken notions of female excellence' which she recognized in contemporary attitudes to 'femininity' and the cult of the ▷ sentimental, Wollstonecraft argued that women were not naturally submissive, but taught to be so, confined to 'smiling under the lash at which [they] dare not snarl'. Although widely caricatured by critics for her own 'immoral' life — an affair with Gilbert Imlay, and subsequent marriage with ▷ William Godwin

Subsequent marriage with D windard Godwin — Wollstonecraft's ideas are closely related to the moralist tradition of writing addressed to young women. Arguing that the true basis of D marriage must be not love but friendship, she continues the rational proposals outlined by the 17th-century pamphleteer D Mary Astell in such works as D A Serious Proposal to the Ladies. The most radical of her thoughts concern the treatment by society of unmarried mothers, whom she believed were worthy of the respect and support of their families and lovers. Her novel Maria: or, The Wrongs of Woman (1798) remained unfinished and was published posthumously, but develops the ideas of A Vindication in a more complex and experimental context. The philosophical tradition behind her writings is evident in A Vindication of the Rights of Man (1790), a reply to ▷ Burke, and in the dedication of Rights of Woman to Talleyrand.

Wolsey, Thomas (?1475-1530) Statesman and churchman. He was born of comparatively humble parents in Ipswich, but with the aid of various patrons he received rapid promotion in the Church. In 1507 he became chaplain to ▶ King Henry VII, who employed him on diplomatic affairs. In the next reign he was for 20 years practically the sole ruler of the country, having the full confidence of > Henry VIII. He became Bishop of Lincoln, Bishop of Tournai in France, Archbishop of York, Cardinal, within reach of becoming Pope. At home he was a firm and able administrator. His foreign policy was skilful, but his personal ambitions led to its ultimate failure. In his anxiety to become Pope, he sought the favour of Emperor Charles V and allowed him to become too powerful in Europe. Charles was nephew to Henry VIII's queen, Katharine of Aragon, whom in 1528 Henry wanted to divorce. Since Charles had Rome in his hands, the Pope could not consent, and in 1529 Wolsey lost the favour of the king; his downfall was the more complete because he had no other powerful supporters in the country. His life was written by a member of his household, George Cavendish, but it was not published until 1641. His downfall was dramatized by ▶ Fletcher and ▷ Shakespeare in ▷ Henry VIII. Wolstenholme-Elmy, Elizabeth (1834-1913) Essayist and poet, who also wrote under the pseudonyms E. Ellis, Ellis Ethelmer, and 'Ignota'. > Orphaned as a child and deprived of an adequate > education, she became an ardent > feminist and vigorous campaigner. She was Honorary Secretary to the Manchester ➤ Women's Suffrage Society (1865), Secretary to the Married Women's Property Committee (1867-82), a founding member of the Women's Franchise League (1899) and the founder of the Women's Emancipation Union (1891). She published a long feminist poem, ▷ Woman Free (1893); two sex education manuals (The Human Flower, 1894, and Baby Buds, 1895) and many pamphlets, including her last work, Woman's Franchise: The Need of the Hour (1907).

Woman Free (1893)
A long poem by ▷ Elizabeth Wolstenholme-Elmy, concerned with women's subordination. The poem attacks the 'brainless bondage' to which women are subjected in ➤ marriage, and protests against male sexual aggression, claiming that women must be 'Free from all uninvited touch of man'. The poem also contains many notes which supplement the author's ▶ feminist perspective. The author writes: 'Anyone who has looked a little below the surface of women's lives can testify to the general unrest and nervous exhaustion or malaise among them, although each would probably refer her suffering to some cause peculiar to herself and her circumstances, never dreaming that she was the victim of an evil that gnaws at the very heart of society, making almost every woman the heroine of a silent tragedy.'

Woman Killed with Kindness, A (1603)
A powerful domestic ▷ tragedy by ▷ Thomas Heywood, which explores the marriage, adultery and death of Anne Frankford, the wife of a gentle and upright man, who kills her with his 'kindness' by refusing her his and her children's company. The seduction of Anne by Frankford's friend Wendoll and the husband's subsequent discovery of the lovers are presented with great sympathy and understanding. The play's subplot is informed by a similar range of domestic detail and is not without tenderness.

'Woman Question, The'

From the 1830s onwards Victorian Britain was obsessively concerned with the 'Woman Question', as they called it. The arguments in this debate were complex and multivocal; the issue of woman's role in society was discussed in newspapers, magazines, and literary, philosophical, educational and medical journals; in Parliament, in church and in the home. No single cultural myth prevailed, and the idea of 'Woman', her 'mission', her 'sphere' and her 'influence' became a site of struggle where competing ideologies strove for dominance. Some commentators challenged the constraints placed upon middle-class women's lives and argued for greater vocational and educational opportunity; others argued passionately that women and men should operate in separate spheres of existence. Recent critical examination of the 'Woman Question' has explored the interrelationships between the Victorian preoccupation with history, national identity and Empire, and the widespread concern with the status and function of women (see Christina Crosby's The Ends of History, 1991). Numerous extracts from contemporary writings on the 'Woman Question' can be found in Helsinger et al. (eds.), The Woman Question: Society and Literature in Britain and America 1837-1883.

Woman Who Did, The (1895)

A novel by ▷ Grant Allen which openly engaged with the ▷ 'Woman Question' and the issue of 'free union'. It was attacked, along with ▷ Thomas Hardy's ▷ Jude the Obscure, by ▷ Margaret Oliphant for being 'anti-marriage'. The heroine of the novel, Herminia, is martyred in the cause of free union, a fact which was seen to militate against Allen's message of 'free love' and feminine emancipation. The book and its author were convincingly attacked by Millicent Garrett Fawcett in ▷ The Contemporary Review in 1895. Allen's novel, which was a best-seller in its time, was mercilessly parodied in The Woman Who Didn't by 'Victoria Crosse' and The Woman Who Wouldn't by 'Lucas Cleeve'.

Woman's Friendship (1853)

A novel by Grace Aguilar, concerned with the importance of female bonding. The central character, Florence, becomes friendly with Lady Ida Villiers, a woman whose social status is considerably higher than her own. Florence is warned by her 'mother' (who turns out to be a foster-parent) that this friendship cannot be mutual because Lady Villier's class position prohibits it. Later, Florence's true parentage is revealed, and after a period of estrangement from one another Florence and Lady Villiers are re-united in friendship. Aguilar writes at the end of the book that although female bonding is 'in general scorned and scoffed at . . . [it] may be the invisible means of strengthening in virtue'.

Women Beware Women (1614)

A baroque and vindictive ➤ tragedy of misdirected desire which ends in a bloodbath, by ➤ Thomas Middleton. Like ➤ The Changeling the play features a skilfully integrated subplot, which here dramatizes the incestuous love of Hippolito for his brother's daughter Isabella, whom he hopes to seduce with the help of her aunt. The most famous scene in the play concerns the seduction of Bianca by the Duke of Florence in a series of moves that parallel those of a game of chess played simultaneously between Bianca's mother-in-law and a corrupt go-between, Livia. Like > Webster's > The White Devil, Women Beware Women evinces a cynical and erotic awareness of the role of power and money in human relationships, and their ability to destroy even marriage.

Women in Love (1921)

A novel by \triangleright D. H. Lawrence. It continues the lives of the characters in \triangleright The Rainbow. Ursula Brangwen is a schoolteacher, and her sister Gudrun is an artist. The other two main characters are Gerald Crich, a mine-owner and manager, and Rupert Birkin, a schoolinspector. The main narrative is about the relationships of these four: the union of Rupert and Ursula after conflict, the union of Gerald and Gudrun ending in conflict and Gerald's death, the affinities and antagonisms between the sisters and between the men. The settings include Shortlands, the mansion of the mineowning Crich family; Breadalby, the mansion of Lady Hermione Roddice, a meeting-place of the leading intellectuals of the day; the Café Pompadour in London, a centre for artists; and a winter resort in the Austrian Tyrol. The theme is human relationships in the modern world, where intelligence has become the prisoner of self-consciousness, and spontaneous life-forces are perverted into violence, notably in Gerald, Hermione, and the German sculptor Loerke. Symbolic episodes centred on animals and other natural imagery are used to present those forces of the consciousness that lie outside rational articulation, and personal relationships are so investigated as to illuminate crucial aspects of modern culture: the life of industry, the life of art, the use and misuse of reason, and what is intimate considered as the nucleus of what is public.

Women's movement

The women's movement – under many names – is dedicated to the campaign for political and legal rights for women. It wishes to prevent the discrimination on the grounds of gender and is, generally, a movement for social change.

There is no single source, although the history of women's quest for equality is a long one. The Querelle des Femmes is the medieval period, ▷ Aphra Behn and ▷ Mary Astell in the 17th century, and ▷ Mary Wollstonecraft in the Romantic Age all furthered women's rights. In the Victorian period feminism became linked with other social movements such as anti-slavery campaigners, evangelical groups and ▷ Quakers. The suffragette movement (1860–1930) united women and this solidarity was to re-emerge in the radicalization of the 1960s.

Women's suffrage

The first National Association for Women's Suffrage was formed in Manchester in 1865, and in 1866 a petition of 1500 signatures was presented to ▷ J.S. Mill, whose essay 'On the Subjection of Women' had been published that year. Signatories of the petition included ▷ Barbara Bodichon, ▷ Harriet Martineau and ▷ Matilda Betham-Edwards. Mill presented a motion to Parliament to include female suffrage in the 1867 ▷ Reform Bill, but he was defeated by 196 votes against 73. Throughout the rest of the 19th century women continued to campaign for the vote. Societies were formed in London, Edinburgh, Birmingham and Bristol in the late 1860s, and the first Women's Suffrage Bill was presented to Parliament by Jacob Bright in 1870. The first reading was carried by 124 votes to 91, but the government then opposed the Bill, and on the second vote it was defeated by 220 to 94. Although hopes were running high when a new government (led by ➤ Disraeli) came to power in 1874, no significant change of policy occurred. In 1880 ➤ Gladstone succeeded as Prime Minister. and the first women-only demonstration was held in Manchester's Free Trade Hall. The next major event was the new Parliamentary Reform Bill of 1884 - a crushing defeat for the suffragists since Gladstone made it clear that he was inexorably opposed to the inclusion of women in the Bill. It was defeated by 271 to 135. Among the MPs who voted against the Bill were 104 Liberals who had pledged support.

In 1889 Mrs Humphry Ward led an 'Appeal Against Female Suffrage', stating that 'The political ignorance of women is irreparable and is imposed by nature.' Although Ward had many notable supporters, the tide of public opinion was slowly beginning to turn. Another Women's Suffrage Bill was presented in 1892, and was only defeated by twenty-three votes. In 1897 Millicent Fawcett became President of the new National Union of Women's Suffrage, and the campaign for the vote was boosted after the Boer War, which bridged the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries.

The first decade of the 20th century marked a shift towards violent action as a means to secure the vote. Among the leading figures of the movement was Emmeline Pankhurst (1858–1928), who campaigned with her daughters Christabel and Sylvia. The arrest of Christabel and the Irish trade unionist Annie Kenney during their protest at a Liberal Party meeting in 1905 marked the turning point in the movement's strategies and public profile. Emmeline Pankhurst was first arrested in 1908, and consistently thereafter.

The suffrage movement ended in 1918 when votes were granted to women at the age of thirty. In 1928 Parliament decreed that women should have equal voting rights with men.

Wonder, A Woman Keeps a Secret, The (1714) Comedy by ➤ Susannah Centlivre, partly based on ➤ Ravenscroft's The Wrangling Lovers (1677), and often considered her best play. It is set in Lisbon, where Don Felix, son of a Portuguese grandee, Don Lopez, wounds Antonio in a duel, after refusing to marry Antonio's sister. He goes into hiding, but secretly visits Donna Violante, a young woman intended for a nun, with whom he is in love, and who loves him. In the secondary plot, Don Lopez wants his daughter, Isabella, to marry the wealthy but foolish Don Guzman, and locks her into a room to await her suitor. She escapes into the arms of Colonel Britton, a Scotsman on his way back to England. He takes her to another house, which turns out to be Violante's, and asks for her to be cared for. Violante recognizes her and agrees to hide her and keep the secret. In fact she conceals not only Isabella, but Felix as well, and, further, hides Isabella from Felix. All the lovers are united at the end. The title is gently ironic for in the play's final triplet Felix remarks that Violante's steadfastness has shown 'That Man has no Advantage but the Name'. The Wonder was first produced at ➤ Drury Lane with ➤ Robert Wilks as Don Felix and > Anne Oldfield as Violante, to whom Centlivre paid tribute as being largely responsible for its success. But it was revived numerous times during the 18th and 19th centuries, notably with > Garrick as Felix, from 1756 onwards, and ➤ John Philip Kemble in the part afterwards. Garrick chose the play to end his theatrical career in 1776. It survived to 1897.

Wood, Mrs Henry (Ellen) (1814-87) Novelist, who also wrote under the ➤ pseudonym Johnny Ludlow. She was born in Worcester, the daughter of a manufacturer. Wood's early short stories appeared in the New Monthly Magazine and her first novel, Danesbury House, was published in 1860. Her second, > East Lynne: (1861), was hugely successful, selling over 2.5 million copies by 1900. The conservatism of this book is also apparent in the rest of Wood's oeuvre, with Mrs Halliburton's Troubles (1862) and A Life's Secret (1867) exhibiting extreme hostility to working-class activism. She was prolific, writing over thirty novels and 300 short stories, as well as editing a periodical, Argosy. Most of her works are novels of ▶ sensation underscored by a rigid Victorian morality. They include The Channings (1862); The Shadows of Ashlydyat (1863); Lady Adelaide's Oath (1867) and The Master of Greylands (1873). Her last work was Ashley and Other Stories (1897). A Life's Secret (1867) portrayed a negative side of trade unionism and caused her publisher's office to be mobbed by a hostile crowd. The Johnny Ludlow series of stories (1868-9) drew on local and family history from her early life, and lacked some of the melodramatic and sensational elements of many of her other novels.

human relationships are a kind of movement upwards, downwards and upwards again from the primitive rural base. The primitive peasant girl, Marty South, is in love with the young cider-maker, Giles Winterbourne, who is as simple in his background as she is herself but has great natural delicacy of feeling. Giles is himself in love with Grace Melbury, the daughter of a local timber merchant, who has had a 'lady's' education (> education of women). She has not been spoiled by this but her sensibilities have spoiled her for the primitive environment to which Giles belongs. Her parents marry her to the young doctor, Edred Fitzpiers, who, however, is enticed away by the great lady of the district, Felice Charmond. Grace takes refuge in the woods with Giles, who, though a sick man, abandons his cottage to her and lives in a hut nearby, where he dies. Grace and Marty South mourn together over his grave but Grace becomes reconciled to Fitzpiers and Marty is left to mourn alone. Neither Fitzpiers nor Mrs Charmond belongs to the rural background and their intrusion into it is disruptive of its values, embodied above all in Giles Winterbourne.

Woolf, Virginia (1882-1941)

Novelist and critic. She was the daughter of Leslie Stephen, the literary critic; after his death in 1904, the house in the Bloomsbury district of London which she shared with her sister Vanessa (later Vanessa Bell) became the centre of the > Bloomsbury Group of intellectuals, one of whom, the socialist thinker Leonard Woolf, she married in 1912. Together they established the > Hogarth Press which published much of the most memorable imaginative writing of the 1920s. She experienced recurrent bouts of mental illness and during one of these took her own life by drowning herself in the River Ouse, near her home at Rodmell, Sussex.

Her first two novels, The Voyage Out (1915) and Night and Day (1919), are basically > realist in their technique, but in the next four - Facob's Room (1922), > Mrs Dalloway (1925), > To the Lighthouse (1927) and ▷ The Waves (1931) - she became increasingly experimental and innovatory. Her attitude was formed by three influences: the negative one of dissatisfaction with the methods and outlook of the three novelists who, in the first 20 years of this century, dominated the contemporary public, > H.G. Wells, > Arnold Bennett, and > John Galsworthy (see Woolf's essay 'Mr Bennett and Mrs Brown', 1923); the outlook of the Bloomsbury circle, with their strong emphasis on the value of personal relations and the cultivation of the sensibility; the sense of tragedy in the 19th-century Russian novelists, > Tolstoy and Dostoevsky, and the dramatist and shortstory writer > Chekhov. She sought to develop a technique of expression which would capture the essence of the sensibility - the experiencing self – and to do this, she reduced the plot-andstory element of novel-writing as far as she could and developed a ▷ stream of consciousness narrative to render inner experience. The last two of the four experimental novels mentioned are usually considered to be her most successful achievements, especially To the Lighthouse. In her later novels, The Years (1937) and Between the Acts (1941), she again used a more customary technique, though with stress on symbolism and bringing out the slight incident as possibly that which is most revelatory. She is now generally regarded as one of the greatest of the ▷ modernist innovators, and is also an important focus for ▷ feminist debate.

> Orlando (1928) is a composite work, ostensibly a biography of a poet (a tribute to ➤ Vita Sackville-West), but in part a brilliantly vivid historical novel (though her subject was her contemporary) and in part literary criticism. Her more formal literary criticism was published in two volumes, The Common Reader (1925) and The Common Reader, 2nd Series (1932). In these she expressed her philosophy of creative writing (for instance in the essay 'Modern Fiction', 1925) and her response to the writers and writings of the past that most interested her. She had a partly fictional way of re-creating the personalities of past writers which is sensitive and vivid. In her social and political attitude she was feminist, ie she was much concerned with the rights of women and especially of women writers. This is one of the basic themes of Orlando but it comes out most clearly in A Room of One's Own (1931). Flush (1933) is another experiment in fictional biography (of > Elizabeth Barrett Browning's spaniel) and she wrote a straight biography of her friend the art critic Roger Fry (1940). Apart from The Common Reader, her volumes of essays and criticism include: Three Guineas (1938); The Death of the Moth (1942); The Captain's Death Bed (1950); Granite and Rainbow (1958). Her Collected Essays were published in 1966, her Letters between 1975 and 1980 and her diaries (The Diary of Virginia Woolf) between 1977 and 1984. Moments of Being (1976) is a selection of autobiographical writings. Her stories are collected in A Haunted House (1943). Wordsworth, Dorothy (1771–1855)
Diarist, letter-writer and poet. The sister of

of the few women writers acknowledged by traditional criticism. Although Dorothy grew up with distant relatives, in 1794 she rejoined her brother and lived with him, and later his wife and children, until her death. She devoted herself entirely to William's creative genius and even her own journal was written to 'give William pleasure by it'. Her descriptions of the friendship she and William shared with > Coleridge, of their long discussions and observations of nature, and of the daily routine and surroundings of Dove Cottage are valuable to literary historians. But because her own writing does not fall into a conventional literary classification, it has often been neglected by critics and biographers. Recently, however, she has been reclaimed by ⊳ feminist criticism which has pointed towards the parallels between her writing and her brother's, often making it impossible to tell who originated certain phrases, vocabulary and images.

Wordsworth, William (1770-1850) Poet. He was born in Cumberland, the son of a law-agent. His mother died when he was only eight, and when his father died five years later, he was sent to school at Hawkshead, where he led a life of solitary freedom among the fells. In 1787 he went to Cambridge, but more inspiring in their influence were his two visits to revolutionary France: the first in 1790, and the second, lasting a year, from November 1791. During the second visit his love affair with a surgeon's daughter, Annette Vallon, resulted in her pregnancy, and she gave birth to a daughter. Forced to leave Annette behind on his return Wordsworth underwent a period of turmoil, intensified when England went to war with France in 1793. The emotional trauma of this period in his life seems to have been displaced into the searching anxiety which underlies much of his early poetry. The love affair is not mentioned explicitly in his work but is recounted at one remove in the story of Vaudracour and Julia (written c 1804; published 1820).

Wordsworth's relatives intended him for the Church, but his religious views at this time tended towards an unorthodox > pantheism, evolved during his strangely lonely but happy childhood. Moreover, the writings of the extreme rationalist philosopher ➤ William Godwin influenced him still further against the possibility of a career in the Church of England. Fortunately in 1795 a friend left him a legacy sufficient to keep him independent, and he settled down in Somerset with his sister ➤ Dorothy, one of the most sustaining personal influences of his life. By 1797 he had made the friendship of ⊳ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who came to live nearby, and in 1798 the two poets collaborated in producing ➤ Lyrical Ballads. In 1799 William and Dorothy moved to Dove Cottage, Grasmere, and in 1802 Wordsworth married Mary Hutchinson. By this time, he was disillusioned with France, now under dictatorship, had abandoned Godwinism, and was beginning to turn back to orthodox religion. He also became more conservative in politics, to the disgust of younger men such as ▷ Byron and ▷ Shelley. The great decade of his poetry ran from 1797 to 1807. Thereafter it declined in quality while his reputation slowly grew. By 1830 his achievement was generally acknowledged, and in 1843 he was made ▷ Poet Laureate.

Wordsworth's first volumes (Descriptive Sketches, An Evening Walk, 1793) show the characteristic tone and diction of 18th-century topographical and nature poetry. They were followed by a tragedy, The Borderers (not published until 1842). The Lyrical Ballads collection marks a new departure however, in the uncompromising simplicity of much of its language, its concern with the poor and outcast, and its fusion of natural description with inward states of mind. These qualities have often caused the volume to be viewed as the starting point of the > Romantic Movement. The Preface to the 1800 edition of Lyrical Ballads also contained Wordsworth's attack on the 'gaudiness and inane phraseology' which he felt encumbered contemporary verse. With the encouragement of Coleridge, he planned a long philosophical poem to be called The Recluse, and in preparation for it, wrote > The Prelude. This was completed by 1805, but not published until 1850, and then in a revised form. In 1807 Wordsworth published Poems in Two Volumes, and in 1814 > The Excursion, the only part of The Recluse to be completed besides The Prelude. These were followed by The White Doe of Rylstone (1815); Peter Bell (1819); The River Duddon (1820); Ecclesiastical Sketches (1822); Sonnets (1838).

Wordsworth's greatness lies in his impressive, even stubborn authenticity of tone. Sometimes this is achieved through the use of primitive or simplistic literary form as in such lyrical ballads as We are Seven and The Thorn, and also the > Lucy poems. Sometimes Wordsworth develops the discursive > blank verse manner of the 18th-century > Georgic into an original, profoundly introspective vehicle for what ▷ John Keats called his 'egotistical sublime', as in The Prelude, > The Ruined Cottage and > Tintern Abbey. Frequently he succeeds in convincing the reader that subject matter which in other poets would be merely banal or even comic, is in fact of mysterious portentousness. This technique is particularly impressive in poems which treat the poor, the mad, the senile, members of humanity generally disregarded in earlier poetry. In these works his diction and tone brush aside the class-based doctrine of kinds, and the related conceptions of 'high' and 'low' language which dominate much 18thcentury verse. Such poems as Simon Lee, The Idiot Boy, and ➤ Resolution and Independence (1807) seem to challenge the reader's humanity, by their empathy with the wretched, the abject, and the poverty-stricken.

Another characteristically Romantic idea, that 'the child is father to the man', that vouth is essentially richer in wisdom and insight than age, is developed into a fullscale philosophy in the early books of The Prelude. It is significant however that the illustrative reminiscences of the poet's own youth are far more effective as poetry than the passages of explicit theorizing. The Ode: > Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood (1807) is often thought to show Wordsworth's uneasy recognition that his inspiration was leaving him. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that he wrote no good poetry after 1807, though his spiritual earnestness increasingly declines into orthodox piety, and his bold austerity of tone into mere banality.

Wotton, Sir Henry (1566-1639)

Poet and courtier. Wotton was educated at Oxford, where he became acquainted with > Donne, whose biography he wished to write (the task actually fell to > Izaak Walton, who also wrote a memoir of Wotton himself). At court Walton became attached to the > Essex faction and performed several intelligencegathering tasks for the earl. He was welcomed by ▶ James I at his accession, since Wotton had carried secret messages to James when he was king of Scotland. He was given a diplomatic role by the king, and, among other duties, was ambassador to Venice. Although well known, it is worth recording Wotton's definition of an ambassador as an honest man who has to lie when abroad for the sake of his country. In 1624 he became Provost of Eton. The only work to be published during his lifetime was The Elements of Architecture (1624), but his many poems were gathered together after his death, together with Walton's memoir, as Reliquiae Wottoniae (1651). The lyrical pieces are characterized by a searching for honest,

'Wreck of the Deutschland, The' A poem by ▷ Gerard Manley Hopkins, written in 1875, but not printed until the first editions of his collected poems (edited by ▷ Robert Bridges) was published in 1918, apart from a short extract in Bridges' anthology The Spirit of Men (1918). Hopkins had ceased writing poetry when he entered the Jesuit Order in 1868. He broke his silence in consequence of being deeply moved at the news of the loss of the ship Deutschland at the mouth of the Thames in the winter of 1875, and of the drowning of five German nuns, who were passengers and exiles on account of Bismarck's anti-Catholic legislation (the Falk Laws).

It is the first of Hopkins' important poems to be written in what he called > sprung rhythm, which he employed for most of his subsequent poetry; the lines have a regular count of rhythmic stresses but a varying count of syllables. This rhythm enabled Hopkins to combine the emphasis and syntax of the spoken language with the musical devices of the verse, and his use of it illustrates his statement that the language of poetry is 'that of current speech heightened'. The technique was very foreign to 19th-century ideas of poetic decorum, and explains why the poem was not published until much later: Hopkins offered it to the Jesuit journal The Month, but the editor declared that he dared not publish it.

Wren, Sir Christopher (1632-1723) Architect. He was also a distinguished mathematician and astronomer, a member of the circle which in 1662 became the ➤ Royal Society. He was in fact a representative of his age, which regarded the great cultural tradition of Europe as descending from ancient Rome and Greece and immensely valued the scope and power of the human reason. His masterpiece is > St Paul's Cathedral in London; even before the old Cathedral was burnt down in 1666, he proposed to remodel it 'after a good Roman manner' not following 'the > Gothic rudeness of the old design'. Wren's cathedral is an example of an English version of the ► classical style known as ► Baroque elsewhere in contemporary Europe. He also proposed a replanning of the City of London, in an arrangement of wide streets radiating from a central space, but difficulties in agreeing about property valuations with the existing landowners prevented this. He did, however, rebuild 52 London churches after the Great Fire of 1666, giving them towers and spires of ingeniously varied and graceful designs in white stone that stood out against the black dome of the cathedral - an effect now entirely ruined by the alteration of the skyline by commercial buildings. Wren also contributed fine buildings to ▷ Oxford and ▷ Cambridge.

Wroth, Mary (Lady Wroth) (?1586-?1652) The niece of ➤ Philip Sidney and ➤ Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke, Mary Wroth was a member of court, where she danced with ➤ Queen Anne in Ben Jonson's masque, The Masque of Blackness. Jonson was a particular admirer of her talents, dedicating his play ▷ The Alchemist to her and enthusiastically acclaiming her poetry. In 1614, following the death of her husband, Sir Robert Wroth, Mary Wroth was left with over £,20,000 in debts, which she undertook to pay off. Financial difficulties stalked her for most of her life, a factor which may have induced her to publish the first part of her work Urania in 1621. The second part of this work, together with a > pastoral > tragicomedy entitled Loves Victorie, circulated in manuscript. Urania is the first prose romance written in English by a woman. Soon after its publication it was withdrawn, because various passages touched upon court intrigues. Like Philip Sidney's ➤ Arcadia, Urania contains poetry, including a sequence of songs and > sonnets entitled Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, the title being derived from the names of the two protagonists of Urania. Wuthering Heights (1847)

Drama by Women.

A novel by > Emily Brontë, first published under the > pseudonym Ellis Bell. The story is narrated by two characters, Lockwood and Nelly Dean, who recount the tale of Heathcliff and his involvement with the Earnshaw and Linton families. The arrival of the foundling Heathcliff disrupts the lives of Catherine Earnshaw and her brother, Hindley. Catherine and Heathcliff develop an intense bond, but Heathcliff overhears her saying to Nelly Dean that marrying him would degrade her. He then leaves Wuthering Heights, returning three years later, by which time Catherine has married Edgar Linton. In revenge, Heathcliff marries Edgar's sister, Isabella, mistreating and brutalizing Hindley and his son, Hareton. Catherine dies shortly after giving birth to a daughter, Cathy. After Edgar's death, Cathy is lured to the Heights and subjected to Heathcliff's terrible will. At the end of the novel, Heathcliff dies and Cathy and Hareton are united. Wuthering Heights has generated an enormous body of criticism, and has always been recognized as a novel of great power and originality. Recent interpretations have focused on the complex narrative structure, the novel's treatment of temporarility, its transgression of conventional sexual and moral codes, and its intense examination of the nature of desire.

Wyatt, Sir Thomas (1503-42)

Poet, courtier, diplomat. Wyatt's life, with its changes in fortune, perfectly represents the uncertain conditions of existence in the court of ➤ Henry VIII. Imprisoned several times (once because he was suspected of being the lover of Anne Boleyn), he brought to his writing an awareness of continental European styles and manner to which his life as a diplomat exposed him. His best-known poems appeared in > Tottel's Miscellany (1557) together with poems by Henry Howard, > Earl of Surrey, though his first printed works were his translations and adaptations of the ▶ Psalms (1549). His complex, ambiguous lyrics, with their development of > Petrarchan motifs and images, are not only some of the earliest attempts at writing in a recognizably 'modern' (that is, non-medieval) style, but are important statements in their own right on the uncertain quality of life in the > Renaissance polity. Wycherley, William (1640-1716)

Dramatist of the Restoration period. Born at Clive near Shrewsbury, the son of a lawyer, and educated first in France, where he became a Catholic, and then at Oxford. He studied law at the Inner Temple, but preferred to write for the stage, and to mix in courtly literary circles, associating with such individuals as the ➤ Earl of Rochester, > Sir George Etherege, and Sir Charles Sedley (1639-1701). His first play, Love in a Wood; Or St James's Park (1671), is dedicated to one of > Charles II's mistresses, the Duchess of Cleveland, who later became his mistress as well. After this he served for a time in the fleet, and was present at a seabattle. His second play, ➤ The Gentleman Dancing Master (1672) is an adaptation of a play by Calderón, and written in the ➤ Spanish intrigue style.

It is for his last two plays that Wycherley is now best remembered: > The Country Wife (1675) and > The Plain Dealer (1676), in which his deep cynicism lends savagery to his wit. > Dryden praised the 'satire, strength and wit of Manly Wycherley', punning on the name of Manly, the chief character in The Plain Dealer, and Wycherley was often referred to in this way thereafter. In 1676 he stopped writing for the stage, and in 1679 married the Countess of Drogheda, a wealthy widow. She died in 1681, leaving him her fortune, but the bequest involved him in litigation, and he was reduced to poverty and imprisoned for debt for four years (1682-6). During this period he wrote Epistles to the King and Duke (1683). expressing his need. James II secured his release from prison, paid his debts, and awarded him a pension.

Wycliffe (or Wyclif), John (c 1320–84) Religious reformer and theologian who provided the academic inspiration for the church reform programme of the Lollards (sometimes called Wycliffites). Educated at Oxford, he became master of Balliol c 1360, but later left this academic environment to become rector at Lutterworth in 1374. Wycliffe's views were developed in a series of Latin treatises. In these he argued (amongst other things); against the doctrine of transubstantiation (in Wycliffe's view, material bread and wine remained after the consecration of the Host); that oral confession was not necessary for the truly contrite person; that the true Pope is the most righteous man on earth and not to be necessarily identified with the clerics who claim or compete for that title in Rome. Wycliffe attacked the power of the established clergy in many ways and explicitly rejected the ideals of monasticism and fraternalism. The Gospels were the most important source of Christian instruction for Wycliffe and he argued for their accessibility in the vernacular. He was responsible for inspiring the systematic vernacular translation of the > Bible into English (a text banned by Bishop Arundel in 1400), though it is unlikely that he ever played any part in the translation process itself (the combined work of a number of clerics and scholars) as has been commonly supposed. Although Wycliffe's views were banned by a church council in 1382 and his followers judged to be heretics in the early fifteenth century, his beliefs continued to attract interest and support and there is undoubtedly some continuity between early sixteenth-century Lollards and those open to the reformist ideas of Luther and Tyndale.

Ancient Greek (Athenian historian and philosopher, born about 430 BC. He was a disciple of ▷ Socrates, and greatly embittered against ▷ Athens, which had put his master to death. Because of this, although he had been an Athenian general, he left the city and served the ▷ Spartans.

His writings on Socrates, the Memorabilia and the Symposium, are the principal records we possess of Socrates besides those of ▷ Plato. Yearsley, Ann (1752-1806)

English poet, novelist and dramatist. Originally a milkwoman, she was taught to read and write by her brother. She married John Yearsley in 1774, and in 1784, when her family were living in terrible conditions, she showed her verses to > Hannah More, who arranged for the publication by subscription of Poems on Several Occasions (1785). However, More kept control of Yearsley's access to the proceeds, and in a later edition she complains of this. More's attitude seems to have been very patronizing Poems on Several Occasions carries a letter from her to Mrs Montagu, in which she discusses Yearsley's 'wild wood notes', and goes out of her way to mention that Yearsley's husband was 'honest and sober'. Eventually, Yearsley rejected More's attempts at intellectual control. She published Poems on Various Subjects (1787), including a poem (like More) on the > slave trade. Her play Earl Goodwin was acted and published, she wrote a novel, The Royal Captives (1795), and she ran a > circulating library. Her final publication was The Rural Lyre.

Yeats, W. B. (William Butler) (1865–1939) Anglo-Irish poet. He was of a Protestant family, a fact of importance in 19th-century Ireland where nationalism was so bound up with ➤ Catholicism. His father was an eminent painter. He spent his boyhood between school in London and his mother's native county of Sligo, a wild and beautiful county in northwestern Ireland which is a background to much of his poetry. His youth was passed during the upsurge of Irish political nationalism represented by the Home Rule movement led by Parnell. He shared the antagonism felt by English writers of ▷ Pre-Raphaelite background - notably William Morris - to the urban and industrial harshness and materialism of contemporary English culture. He sought a basis for resistance to it in Irish peasant folk traditions and ancient Celtic myth. His first work was on a theme from this mythology The Wanderings of Oisin (> Oisin). Yeats was indeed fortunate in having such a cultural basis at hand for his anti-materialistic poetry, while his English contemporaries had further to look. His career divides naturally into four phases:

1 1889-99. During this period he was a leading member of the ➤ Aesthetic Movement in London, an outcome of Pre-Raphaelitism, but especially indebted to the Oxford scholar, Walter Pater. In its revolt against ➤ Victorian materialism, it tended to Catholicism and to mysticism. Its meeting-place was the Rhymers' Club, and its public voice the ➤ Yellow Book. Yeats shared its mystical sympathies, which in his case brought together Celtic and Indian mythology; these come out in his works of the period: prose - > The Celtic Twilight (1803). The Secret Rose, The Tables of the Law, The Adoration of the Magi (1897); verse - Crossways (1889), The Rose (1893), The Wind Among the Reeds (1899); verse plays - The Countess Cathleen (1892) and The Land of Heart's Desire (1894).

2 1899-1909. Yeats, with the help of ➤ Lady Gregory, built up the Irish National Theatre, which found a home in the ➤ Abbey Theatre, Dublin. Until 1909, he was its manager, and he wrote plays for it, predominantly based on Irish myth. The period was disillusioning for him so far as his hopes for Irish culture went, but it was formative in his development as a major poet. He hoped to make the theatre the voice of a distinctively Irish modern culture. and at least he succeeded in creating one of the most interesting dramatic movements in contemporary Europe. In personal terms, the theatre business brought out new strength and realism in his character and in his writing; he was the first poet writing in English since the 17th century to seek intelligently and purposefully for an effective dramatic idiom and for new methods of dramatic production. His only volume of verse during these ten years was In the Seven Woods (1904); amongst his plays are Cathleen ni Houlihan (1902), The King's Threshold (1904), Deirdre (1907).

3 1910-18 - the Period of Transition. He had begun his career in the tradition of ▷ Spenser, ▷ Shelley and the Pre-Raphaelites, and he had always been interested in the mysticism of > Blake, but he now became one of the poets, including > Ezra Pound (whom he met at this time) and > T.S. Eliot, drawn to the intellectually more vigorous tradition associated with the 17th-century > Metaphysicals, especially > Donne. He was no longer a > romantic, at least in the decadent sense of a dreamer, but though his mood was harsher and he had lost some of his faith, he searched no less assiduously for symbols which could give meaning to history and life. At first he turned away from Ireland, but the Irish Rebellion of 1916 turned him back to the country which was after all the human context of his emotions. His books The Green Helmet (1910) and Responsibilities (1914) represent the new austerity of his poetry.

4 1919-39. It is in this period that Yeats grows into one of the most important poets of the 20th century, with the publication of The Wild Swans at Coole (1919), Michael Robartes and the Dancer (1921), The Tower (1928) and The Winding Stair (1933). This work is marked by strong rhythms, by stanza and rhyme patterns which enforce thought, by severe diction with few adjectives, and by a range of symbols each of which is a nucleus of meanings. The symbols are part of an elaborate theory of history (explained in the prose A Vision, 1925) derived from the Italian philosopher Vico (1668–1744) and the neo-Platonism of Plotinus (3rd century AD). Whatever the faultiness of the system considered apart from the poetry, it constituted for Yeats a mythology which he could use poetically to embody human experience widely and deeply. It is scarcely helpful to try to 'learn' this mythology in order to understand Yeats' poetry; it is elucidated by the poetry itself, if it is read in bulk. With these symbols (the tower, the moon, etc.) Yeats had a wide mythology of persons, some drawn from his own friends, some from history and myth, and some invented, eg Crazy Jane in Words for Music Perhaps. This, like A Woman Young and Old, A Full Moon in March (1935) and Last Poems (1936-39), has more bitterness and less richness than the previous volumes of this period. Years continued to write plays and to improve his dramatic idiom, partly under the influence of the Japanese > Noh drama; his best play is nearly his last - Purgatory (1939). After 1910, Yeats' prose is also distinguished, notably his Autobiographies (1915 and 1922), some of his critical essays, eg Per Amica Silentia Lunae (1918) and his essays on drama, Plays and Controversies (1923).

Yeoman

Originally the word probably meant 'countryman', but by the 14th century it was used for a peasant freeholder, ie a man below the class of gentry, but an independent owner of land, or at least 'a tenant at will', ie a man who owed rent for his land but who could abandon his tenancy when he pleased. Yeomen thus formed a class between the gentry and the hired labourers or serfs (who were few after the 14th century). The younger sons of yeomen would be landless, and commonly took service with the gentry, often bearing arms for them, like the Yeoman who follows the Squire in Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales. As a class they were substantial and independent; their skill as archers caused them to be invaluable to the 14th- and 15th-century kings (especially > Edward III and > Henry V) engaged in wars with the French, who relied on cavalry. The success of the yeoman archers at the battles of ➤ Crécy (1346), Poitiers (1356) and > Agincourt (1415) indeed brought about a military revolution; from the 15th century the cavalryman declined in importance and the importance of the infantryman increased.

The > Wars of the Roses and the policy of the > Tudor sovereigns reduced the power of the old nobility and encouraged the prosperity of the yeomen, who flourished throughout the 16th and 17th centuries, and often improved their condition so as to rise into the class of the gentry. In the 18th century the tide ran the other way; the richer landowners were anxious to enclose land into large farms, and to buy out the freeholding yeomen whose small farms stood in the way. This freeholding class thus declined, or joined the ranks of the tenant farmers under the big land-owners. Often they went to work in the rapidly growing industrial towns By the mid-19th century, the term 'yeoman' practically disappeared but it is now used for a nostalgic concept of the sturdy independent Englishman, full of common sense and natural patriotism.

The Yeomen of the Guard were established in 1485, and now guard the Tower of London; they are popularly known as Beefeaters. Yeomanry Regiments were regiments of volunteers who in peacetime trained as soldiers in their spare time; after 1920 they were known as the Territorials.

Yonge, Charlotte (1823-1901)

Editor, historian, biographer, translator and hugely successful novelist. She was born in Otterbourne, near Winchester, where she remained for the rest of her life, apart from visiting Paris briefly in 1869. In 1838 she came under the influence of John Keble and adopted the religious views associated with the > Oxford Movement, which influence all her writing. Her most famous novel, > The Heir of Redclyffe, was published in 1853. Other tales of contemporary life include Heartsease (1854); The Daisy Chain (1856); The Clever Woman of the Family (1865) and historical ≥ romances for children (The Prince and the Page, 1865, and The Dove in the Eagle's Nest, 1866). For forty years she edited the girls' magazine, The Monthly Packet.

Yonge was highly religious and conservative, opposed to ⊳ women's suffrage and socialism, and a great defender of traditional Victorian standards and morals. The message of The Clever Woman of the Family is that women should not pursue intellectual subjects, but accept their inferiority to men.

York Cycle, The

A ▷ cycle of plays on pageant waggons, at stations in the streets of York, on Corpus Christi day from the late 14th century until performances were suppressed in the late 16th century. The earliest record of the performance of plays on Corpus Christi day comes from York (1378), and if it was one of the oldest cycles, it seems also to have been one of the longest. There are 48 plays in the single extant manuscript of the cycle, but there are signs that texts of more plays in the cycle have not survived. The cycle underwent several revisions, and the work of some distinctive revisers (the 'York metrist', the 'York realist' have been identified by critics). Bib: Beadle, R. and King, P. Yorkshire Tragedy, A (1608)

A domestic ➤ tragedy published in 1608, and based on actual murders occurring in 1605. The play was ascribed to ➤ Shakespeare on its publication, but he is not now thought to have had any hand in it and > Middleton is now the leading candidate for authorship. It is a forceful work, in a tradition of domestic tragedy that is an important subordinate line of the drama of Shakespeare's time: > Arden of Faversham; Warning for Fair Women (Anon., 1599), and ➤ Thomas Heywood's ➤ A Woman Killed with Kindness (1603). They have in common that they deal with men and women of the middle classes (not, like the grand tragedy of the age, with the courts of princes), that they are realistic, and that they convey a strong moral warning.

Young, Edward (1683–1765)

Royal chaplain and later Rector of Welwyn in Hertfordshire. He wrote three tragedies which were successfully acted in ➤ Drury Lane, and a series of > didactic > satires: The Force of Religion (1714) in > couplets, and The Love of Fame (1725/18), The Vindication of Providence (1728) and Resignation (1762), all in ▷ Miltonic ▷ blank verse. His most important work, the melancholy and reflective poem The Complaint or > Night Thoughts on Life, Death and Immortality (1742-5), consisting of 10,000 lines of ⊳ blank verse, was considered by ⊳ Samuel Johnson to display 'the magnificence of vast extent and endless diversity', and became immensely popular both in Britain and on the continent. As their titles suggest, Young's poems are marked by a crushing orthodoxy of religious sentiment, and their turgid rhetorical dogmatism makes them very difficult to read today. Young's influential prose essay Conjectures on Original Composition (1759) focuses on the nature of artistic 'genius' and marks an important stage in the development of pre-> romantic literary theory. Yvain > naturalism. He believed that the biological sciences (notably the discoveries of > Darwin) had changed the conditions under which the human character should be presented and interpreted, and that in future the novelist should present his characters in relation to the influences of heredity and environment. This he carried out in the succession of novels about the Rougon and Macquart families (1871-93) including La Fortune des Rougon (1871), La Curée (1874), Le Ventre de Paris (1874), La Conquête de Plassans (1875), La Faute de l'Abbé Mouret (1875), Son Excellence Eugène Rougon (1876), L'Assommoir (1878), Nana (1880), Germinal (1885), La Terre (1888), La Débâcle (1892) and Docteur Pascal (1893). Zola's influence was healthy in England inasmuch as his doctrine counteracted an English prejudice against the ugly, the 'indecent' and the horrible in art. He had English imitators, eg > George Moore, and he influenced such realists as ➤ George Gissing and ➤ H.G. Wells.

One of the Knights of the > Round Table, the son of King Urien, who appears in early Welsh legendary narratives as Owein. His story is the central focus of > Chrétien de Troyes' 12th-century romance Yvain, which charts events by which Yvain wins, loses, and regains his chivalric identity. He wins a wife and a rich court as a result of his encounter with the Knight of the Fountain; but forfeits his wife and reputation when he fails to return, as promised, from more than a year away in the company of the Round Table. A period of madness ensues, but he gradually builds up a reputation through his adventures as the Knight of the Lion (so called because his companion and aide is a Lion). The Lady of the Fountain reluctantly accepts him back finally, largely as a result of the plotting of her maid. Chrétien's narrative forms the basis for the 14th-century Middle English romance, Yvain and Gawain.

Zola, Emile Edouard Charles Antoine (1840–1902)
