Preface

Any work which hopes to offer a stimulating and up-to-date guide to English literature cannot remain static, and the efforts involved in the production of the second edition to The Bloomsbury Guide to English Literature reflect the ways in which our understanding of authorship and text are developing. The canon is being expanded, both from within, through the discovery of writers and books from earlier periods, as well as from outside, as contemporary names are added to the list of established authors. For example, the works of a number of women writers from previous centuries are only just being reprinted even though the volumes were well-known during their own age: the proliferation in post-colonial studies has meant that numerous books which were written in English, but which have often been excluded from the canon, are now readily available; new poets, novelists and dramatists continually attract critical acclaim. This book sets out, therefore, to include the recent additions to English Literature, but it also covers conventional material, from well-known authors such as Shakespeare, Dickens, and Auden to popular titles like The Canterbury Tales, Middlemarch, and Look Back in Anger. Although the limitations of space have inevitably led to some exclusions, as a whole The Bloomsbury Guide to English Literature has attempted to achieve a balance between period, genre, author, text, context, tradition and innovation.

In my introduction to the first edition of The Bloomsbury Guide to English Literature I wrote that the guide had been 'a cumulative and democratic production' and these words are equally true of this, the second edition. Over the intervening six years the text has been gradually refined, updated and expanded by myself and, more especially, by all the contributors to this volume. In the process we have added material which represents an expansion of canonical material, for example Roger Pooley's essay on Renaissance Prose, as well as exploring fields of literature which are in the process of development today, such as Trevor Griffiths' entries on contemporary drama and Philip Shaw's essay on the relationship between critical theory and Romantic poetry. At the same time, much of the work has become collaborative, either in the sense of writing new material together, as in the case of Andrew Roberts' and my own essay on New Literatures in English, or in a process of mutual revision, as may be seen in Jane Thomas' and Linda Williams' reworking of the essay on Victorian poetry. As such, although I am writing this preface, the book as a whole must be recognised as the result of all those contributing to the essays and the alphabetical reference section, as well as to the thorough and imaginative editorial work undertaken at Bloomsbury.

The book remains divided into two parts: the first consists of a series of essays which follow a chronological order from the Middle Ages to the present day. Each period (with the exception of the first on Medieval literature) is subdivided into four parts, beginning with an overall view of the era and then moving on to a generic analysis of poetry, prose and drama. Much of this material is new, and the arrangement of the essays differs from that in the earlier edition. The second section of The Bloomsbury Guide to English Literature is made up of an alphabetical reference section which complements and expands upon the material found in the essays, and also incorporates several extended entries, such as English Language and Irish Literature in English. The existing entries have been updated and expanded, but, more importantly, there are over a thousand completely new topics included in this edition. Finally, the essays and A–Z entries are cross-referenced, ensuring that further areas of interest are readily accessible.

Medieval English literature

Lesley Johnson

A context for Medieval English literature

For trusteth wel, it is an impossible
That any clerk wol speke good of wyves,
But if it be of hooly seintes lyves,
Ne of noon oother womman never the mo.
Who peyntede the leon, tell me who?
By God! if wommen hadde writen stories,
As clerkes han withinne hie oratories,
They wolde han writen of men moore wikkednesse
Than al the marke of Adam may redresse.
(The Wife of Bath's Prologue, 688–696)

When > Chaucer's Wife of Bath recounts her marital experiences with the younger clerk, Jankyn, in her Prologue in the > Canterbury Tales, her story is focussed on how she confronts the intrusion of his bookish world into her private life. Jankyn, it appears, prefers the company of his book of 'wikked wyves', for him an authoritative source of reference and citation on the subject of marriage, to first-hand marital experience. In fact he substitutes one for the other and gives his wife daily readings from this book, a compilation of anti-matrimonial/anti-feminist writings from medieval and classical Latin sources. For the Wife, the stories reveal less about the experience of marriage and more about the power and prejudices of their (largely) male clerical authors, bound willingly or unwillingly to a celibate life. Her question about who wields the power of the pen is voiced through a quotation from one of > Aesop's fables: 'Who peyntede the leon, tel me who?' In this fable a man tries to use a painting of a man defeating a lion to prove that men are stronger than lions. His lion companion is less impressed with the value of the picture as evidence; the painting itself is a man-made production, and if lions could paint they would offer a different view. The Wife goes on to make a similar point about wives: if they had access to the means of textual representation and production, she points out, they would produce a different image of the 'other' sex. The general point raised by the Wife here, and encapsulated in the question of 'who peyntede the leon', is an important one and applicable to any kind of representation, textual or pictorial, from any period. The answers, though, are rarely as simple and clear-cut as those found in Aesop's fable.

If we were to extend the scope of the Wife's enquiry and consider in a more general way who had access to the means of textual representation in England in the medieval period as a whole, then the Wife's conclusions about those responsible for producing Jankyn's book would still point us in the right direction. Male clerics were the literate professionals of the time. The Christian Church as an institution controlled access to literate skills, just as, of course, it exerted a pervasive influence over all areas of intellectual activity. Literacy was the privilege of the relatively small percentage of the population who formed the ranks of the clergy, and was the privilege of some members of the civil and social élite in society too. Literate women were in the minority within both these social groupings or estates.

But such generalizations about who wielded the balance of pen-power are only useful in so far as they indicate in a rough and ready way the importance of male clerics as mediators of literary culture during the four centuries or so that are traditionally held to constitute the medieval period in England (1100-1500). This clear-cut picture needs to be qualified because not all the writers in medieval England were male clerics, nor was all the literature produced in England written in English. The case of the twelfth-century writer, Marie (conventionally referred to now as > Marie de France), illustrates both points. The literary signature of one 'Marie'. who was probably writing in England, is incorporated into the text of a collection of Lais, a collection of Fables and a religious narrative about St Patrick, all written in French. Evidently at least one woman did leave her mark on the literary culture of her time, although very little else is known about her. But if the fact that we can identify the work of a medieval woman writer is exceptional, the fact that Marie de France was writing, perhaps in England, in French, for audiences in France and England is not. The answers to the question about who is writing and reading in England would vary to some extent according to which language and which period is under consideration.

Latin, > Anglo-Norman French and English were the principal languages in use in England throughout these centuries but their respective domains of usage (as languages of public and religious ritual, law, record, of high-status culture, as vernaculars) varied considerably. Of these languages, Latin remained the language of the highest cultural authority, of the Church and Christian ritual, of academia, the preserve of the clergy. Yet as the domains of usage of the vernaculars expanded greatly in the 400-year period from 1100 to 1500, the clergy ceased to be the sole mediators of texts and textual traditions. Moreover, access to vernacular texts was not restricted to a reading public. Since textual reception was often a social, aural event rather than a private, silent experience, the question about who was reading texts needs to be reformulated as a question about who formed the audiences of literary works. Nor was access to the means of textual representation wholly restricted to the literate: a point strikingly illustrated by the Book of > Margery Kempe, which is the textual record of the spiritual life of a fourteenth-century English mystic who could neither read nor write, but who dictated her story. In fact to address the question of 'who was painting the lion' during this time in a more satisfactory way would involve a consideration of who would commission artefacts, the relationship of patrons to writers, and the different kinds of relationship between writers, their texts and their audiences. This is a highly satisfactor set of questions to which we have, at present, only a partial and fragmentary set of answers.

In the sections which follow some indication is given of the different contexts in which medieval English texts were produced and some sense too of the 'difference' of the literary culture itself. This 'difference' is part of the attraction of medieval literature for modern readers and, paradoxically, part of the modernity of medieval literary studies too. Since medieval literature resists being mapped out in terms applied to post-Renaissance literary culture, its study has received fresh impetus as those terms have been challenged over the last thirty years or so. Although the organization of this essay on medieval English literature will link up to the focus of subsequent essays in this volume (considering briefly medieval lyric, narrative and dramatic literary traditions), my emphasis throughout will be on the way in which Middle English text cannot be divided up into discrete literary categories and must be seen as part of a continuum of cultural activity that crosses apparent national, linguistic and literary divides. That spectrum of activity itself may be illustrated in the work of the more famous writers of fourteenth-century England. > John Gower's literary corpus, for example, uses the three languages of medieval England as its medium: his story collection in English, the > Confessio Amantis, is the final part of a literary triptych of which the first two parts are in French (Mirour de l'Omme) and Latin (Vox Clamantis). Geoffrey Chaucer's work does not literally cross linguistic divides in this way, but it does challenge any simple notions of separating out categories of literary and non-literary texts. The sheer variety of textual material included in the framework of the Canterbury Tales (spanning translations of classical stories, retellings of Christian legends, reworkings of Italian and Old French narratives, stories from 'olde gentil Britouns', performances of sermons and concluding with a prose treatise on penitence) illustrates the range of literary activity at this time and the diversity of the international cultural traditions from which it derives.

The purpose of this essay is not to offer a comprehensive survey, but to illustrate the range of that literary activity and to raise some questions about the term in which it is discussed. The anomalous position of this essay within the Bloomsbury Guide itself indicates some of the problems of fitting a discussion of medieval English literature into a wider context. The literary culture I will be considering neither began in 1100 nor ended in 1500, nor was it exclusively insular, although the emphasis, necessarily, will be texts produced during this time in England, in English.

Medieval English lyrics?

Karolles, wrastlinges, or somour games, Who so evre haunteth any swiche shames In cherche, other in cherche yerde, Of sacrilege, he may be aferd; Of entirludes, or singinge, Or tabur bete, or other pipinge – Alle swiche thing forboden es Whil the preste stondeth at messe. (Robert Mannyng, Handlyng Synne, 8, 991–8)

This general warning against secular diversions from religious observances prefaces a version of the story of the 'Dancers of Colbeck' in > Robert Mannyng's penitential guide Handlyng Synne. The story neatly illustrates the dire consequences of sacrilegious distractions, for it concerns a group of carollers who are cursed by their priest for disturbing Mass. As a result of the curse, the group find they cannot stop performing their carol in the churchyard until, having sung and danced for a whole year, they collapse at the end of their ordeal. If this story of the 'Dancers of Colbeck' allows us to glimpse the existence of a popular, secular tradition of song-making (and 'entirlude'-making too), it also illustrates the way in which we have access to that tradition only through clerical mediation of one kind or another. Snatches and fragments of English > lyrics which appear to belong to a popular tradition are preserved in sermons, chronicles and exemplary narratives, but for the most part the short poems and lyrics preserved in manuscripts are the product of learned and literary environments, and not the records of performances in churchyards. Yet that does not mean that the extant texts of poems and lyrics represent a homogeneous body of work. In fact, generalizations about their form and function are very difficult to make, such is the diversity of their range.

First, how do we recognize a medieval lyric text? Is it a literary category composed exclusively of texts designed to be sung to musical accompaniment? Or short, nonnarrative texts in verse, or poems with a predominantly personal focus on a secular or religious theme? All of these kinds of texts can be found in modern editions of medieval English lyrics. The diversity of these lyric collections partly reflects the very different ways in which the term lyric can be used now. However, the very act of extracting these short poems from their manuscript text may give the impression that the literary category of 'the medieval English lyric' is more homogeneous than it really is. Some of the earliest Middle English lyrics are religious lyrics embedded as quotations in Latin sermons or are preserved in various kinds of preaching manuals, and seem to have served the ends of preaching and teaching lay audiences (the sermons themselves being preached in English). Some lyrics are collected together in manuscripts which appear to be the medieval equivalents of modern 'literary anthologies' (such as the famous manuscript, now in the British Library, known as > Harley 2253). Others are squeezed as 'spacefillers' into manuscripts containing miscellaneous collections of material or preserved on scraps of parchment, and so survive for us with little indication of any contextual relations. Some musical notations are preserved, but by no means all, and it is not always clear exactly how a text is to be performed or received; in public or in private or perhaps in public and in private. This limpid twelve-line version of the Crucifixion has some of the features which would fit post-medieval definitions of lyric poetry; it is short, has an emotional focus and a first-person speaker:

Quanne hic se on rode (When I, Cross)
Jesu, mi lemman, (lover)
And besiden him stonden
Marie and Johan,
And his rig iswongen, (back scourged)
And his side istungen, (pierced)
For the luve of man,
Well ou hic to wepen, (ought)
And sinnes forleten, (abandon)
Yif hic of luve kan,
Yif hic of luve kan.

But this text is not so much offering an expression of a personal experience (to adapt > John Ruskin's nineteenth-century definition of a lyric), as providing a model exercise for one. The first seven lines deftly conjure up an emotive image of the Crucifixion, the last five reveal what should be the emotional response of any individual to this sight: the image is offered as a personal test of love (the logic is 'When...Then...If'). Several versions of this piece survive and one of them is preserved as a quotation in a thirteenth-century sermon text. The use of this poem in a sermon illustrates how medieval lyrics may be used to mediate between private experience and its public expression in different contexts, in different ways. In this case the poem is received, in public, for a performance in private, when the devotional exercise it sketches may be enacted. The sermon context explicitly links the poem to the clerical promotion of a devotional and empathetic kind of spirituality (and the poem itself is a translation of a Latin devotional exercise). This is a spiritual trend which is increasingly in evidence in Middle English religious literature from the twelfth century onwards, and for which the lyric form provided a particularly suitable medium of expression.

More religious lyrics survive in Middle English than secular lyrics: this is a phenomenon which, perhaps, reflects both the 'usefulness of lyrical texts as preaching and teaching devices and the predominance of Anglo-Norman as the medium for sophisticated secular culture for much of the medieval period in England. But it would be wrong to give the impression that the diverse range of Middle English lyric poems which survive can be divided into clear-cut sacred and secular categories. There is a considerable interaction between the language and the conventions of sacred and carnal love-lyrics, as even the short lyric (quoted above) suggests in its address to Iesus as a lover. Indeed, many of the Middle English poems on religious themes use a conventional language of loving drawn from a body of love poetry (a development of French literary culture of the eleventh and twelfth centuries) which celebrates the refined pleasures and pains of 'fin'amur' (> Courtly Love) between the sexes. The notions of using a language of carnal love as a way of expressing a spiritual relationship has a precedent in the exegetical convention of reading the Old Testament Song of Songs as an account of the relationship between Christ, the bridgegroom, and the Church, his bride. Using conventionalized models or refined earthly relationships to recommend (and explore) spiritual relationships is a key strategy employed in many kinds of medieval religious texts including lyrics.

What is interesting about this overlapping use of sacred and secular languages of desire is that conventionalized gender roles may be treated in rather less conventional ways in religious texts. Whereas (as might be expected) male first-person speakers predominate in the secular love lyrics, and women tend to figure more often as objects of desire rather than as desiring subjects, the gender roles in religious texts may be more fluid. Not all first-person religious love lyrics are marked as the expression of male speakers, and there are some examples of female subjects being presented as active lovers (albeit under paternal instruction). In the thirteenth-century 'Love Ron', for example, conventionally attributed to the Franciscan > Thomas of Hales, a young woman is given advice in the art of spiritual loving. Couched in the form of a verse epistle from a male advisor, the twenty-seven stanzas of this text offer advice to a religious woman on how to choose the best possible lover; the candidate for that role is never explicitly named by the speaker, but is clearly identifiable from his attributes as Christ himself. The self-conscious literary quality of this religious lyric is evident in its use of the art of loving for spiritual ends, and in the way it negotiates between the private and public nature of instruction it offers. It is both a personal and a public communication, addressed to a single woman and yet sent 'open and with-ute sel' (seal), so other women may have access to it; indeed the recipient is asked to pass it on to other maidens. The last stanza acknowledges the written and performative qualities of this text, as it is a letter for singing in moments of longing:

> Hwenne thu sittest in longynge, Drauh the forth this ilke writ; (Draw, same writing) Mid swete stephne thu hit singe, (voice) & do al so hit the bit. (it bids you)

The 'Love Ron' provides a literary distraction for spiritual instruction and it is one of a group of early English texts, including the > Ancrene Wisse, which are produced for, and addressed to, an audience of women who have chosen the religious life.

Our contact with medieval English literature necessarily depends on the vagaries of manuscript survival. This point is underlined by the fact that approximately half the extant texts of English secular lyrics are preserved in a single manuscript, Harley 2253, a literary anthology produced some time in the 1340s, in the Hereford area. But in this context, too, the interplay between sacred and secular literary registers is very clear; indeed some of the lyrics in the collection seem to have been physically arranged in a way which heightens the interplay between the sacred and secular poems. Thus a lyric on Christ's love for his people beginning 'Litel wot hit any man/ how love hym haveth i-bounde' is followed by one which begins in a similar way, 'Litel wot hit any man/ how derne love may stonde': the addition of the word 'derne' (secret) signals both a change of context and referent as this lyric becomes the complaint of a disappointed male lover. But the language of sacred and carnal desire may also be played off, self-consciously, within a single text, as is the case with 'The Fair Maid of Ribblesdale'. Here, the cumulative effect of a series of religious references is to both elevate and undercut a male speaker's fantasy about a desirable woman.

A range of speaking stances is found within the love lyrics of the Harley collection: there are complaints, petitions, descriptions of reported or imagined encounters in the voice of first-person (male) speakers, but there are dialogue forms too. A wooing game is played out in one lyric (conventionally entitled 'De Clerico et Puella' – 'About a Clerk and a Girl') between a clerical speaker who has a courtly repertoire of love-sick poses at his command and a young woman who has an equally adept command of deflationary replies. Yet the shorter poems in the collection do not merely address religious and secular emotional subjects: some encapsulate proverbial, monitory material (such as those warning of the last days); one is a poetic rendering of the parable of the vineyard while a couple address topical, contemporary issues and events (such as the corruption of the consistory courts or the death of > Edward I).

The sheer variety of material and poetic forms in the Harley collection raises questions about how they can best be presented to a modern audience. Not one of the Harley lyrics is attributed to a named poet, and in this respect they are typical of much Middle English literature in general, which is working within a literary tradition that is not concerned with the promotion of literary personalities as such. So if the texts cannot be arranged as the work of particular poets or 'makers', should they then be sorted out according to their material (as love lyrics, as historical and religious poems – as has been the case in past editions), or does the very juxtaposition of diverse poems in the manuscript itself have an interest? The case of the Harley lyrics also illustrates the limitation of approaching medieval English literature solely in terms of the literature written in English, because the collection includes many short poems written in Anglo-Norman; indeed one of the religious lyrics alternates lines in English and Anglo-Norman. If these poems are the product of a bilingual literary culture of some sophistication, then should they not be presented in that context? But the Harley manuscript does not only contain shorter poems in English and Anglo-Norman, but verse narratives too, some religious narratives in Anglo-Norman and Latin prose, and even a collection of recipes in English prose, which have evidently been squeezed on to a blank leaf (including recipes on such matters as how to make iron as hard as steel).

I suggested earlier that the Harley manuscript is a medieval equivalent of a modern literary anthology, but that may be an unhelpful analogy: it is not a book written for national distribution; it is written in one of the 'Englishes' of the time (there being as yet no written standard form of the language); it reflects a regional culture of some sophistication and linguistic plurality, but it is not presented as the work of any single 'maker' or group; its composition shows that poetic form could equally provide the medium for vernacular narrative as prose (a selection of the poetry in the manuscript could include the Middle English romance > King Horn). It is a collection which challenges some of the conventional ways in which modern texts may be organized and the terms in which they are discussed, as does that more famous book of medieval narrative poetry and prose, The Canterbury Tales.

(Thomas of Hales, 'Love Ron', 65-72)

The connections between the figures of Paris and Helen, Amadas and Idoine, Tristram and Iseult, Hector and Caesar, in the stanza of the 'Love Ron' quoted above is that these figures, drawn from different periods of the past, may illustrate the very transcience of all earthly achievements and pleasures. Presumably, though, the citation is effective because the stories of all these figures are still remembered and retold. It is useful to approach the rich narrative traditions of medieval England with some sense of the important generative story-areas, and > Thomas of Hales' roll-call of names indicates some of these primary narrative subjects drawn from the stories of > Troy, Rome, Gaul and Britain. The reference to Tristram and Iseult perhaps stands out here as being especially resonant of an important subject of medieval narrative (being part of the > Arthurian tradition) and of an important medieval narrative form (the so-called > romance) which deserve to be given special attention as an innovative part of medieval literary culture, and both subject and form will be discussed in due course. There is, however, some critical confusion over the meaning and use of the term 'romance', some of which may be avoided if the genre is aproached as part of a wider spectrum of narrative activity in which stories of Greece, Troy, Britain, and Gaul all have a place.

Translating and reworking Latin classical narratives (such as those of \triangleright Thebes, Troy, \triangleright Alexander the Great) in the vernacular is an important part of the literary activity of the medieval period. The same is true of English Renaissance literary culture; indeed, one important dimension of English literary cultre as a whole is its continual re-engagement with classical texts. But medieval modes of assimilating, transmitting and renewing classical culture may appear rather surprising to a modern audience whose reading habits have been shaped by the Renaissance and post-Renaissance literary \triangleright humanist tradition. The medieval versions of these classical stories themselves may be unfamiliar (the medieval Troy story, for example, tends to follow a chronological design, have a strong pro-Trojan slant and focus on Hector as the greatest hero of the war), but more disorientating still for modern readers of medieval 'classics' such as \triangleright Chaucer's \triangleright Knight's Tale, the alliterative \triangleright Destruction of Troy or Kyng Alisaunder is the way in which classical culture is filtered through feudal and chivalric lenses. Theseus, Hector and Alexander don the armour of the knight. In part, the assimilation of the key narratives of the classical past in the medieval period, the act of translating them into the vernacular (into French and Anglo-Norman from the twelfth century, into Middle English from the thirteenth century onwards), involved transforming some aspects of classical culture to reflect the dominant feudal/chivalric ideals of the 'present', and so to endow these ideals with the authority of the 'past'. Medieval narratives relating the Greek, Trojan and Roman past contributed substantially to the establishment of a mythology of chivalry which was developed through the medieval period and continued long after it.

The courtly patina given to medieval versions of the classics was not an unself-conscious action on the part of medieval writers. In Chaucer's Knight's Tale, for example, the narrator both suggests that a continuing chivalric ethos connects the world of classical Athens and that of contemporary England, but also draws attention to the potential incongruity involved in the act of representing this continuous chivalric culture. Such is the splendour of the tournament which Theseus organizes in Athens that every knight 'Were it in Engelond or elleswhere,/They wode, hir thankes, wilnen to be there' (2,113-4). But the narrator points up the anachronism of this depiction of the 'modern' chivalric world of classical Athens: when some of the knights in Athens set their sights on fashionable gear (Prussians shields!), the narrator wryly remarks on the fact that 'Ther is no newe gyse that it nas old'.

Of course not all aspects of the 'olde gyse' of classical pagan culture could be assimilated to the values and ethos of the Christian present: medieval writers were faced with great interpretative challenges when re-presenting narratives about the classical world (and material drawn from the world of classical learning). Highly elaborate strategies were evolved for reinterpreting pagan structures for contemporary audiences. The pagan framework of the Knight's Tale is part of the 'olde gyse' of the story, which no longer has any place in the 'newe', but it is not used as the occasion for Christian moralizing or denunciation (which is sometimes the case in other medieval versions of classical stories). Rather, the pagan gods in the Knight's Tale are made to function both as representatives of larger forces outside human control and government, and of those human desires and promptings which are potentially controllable by government on both a political and personal level. All the central characters of the narrative, Palamon, Arcite, Emily, Theseus, and Ageus too, have their counterparts in the pagan divinities, and these gods are interpreted as figuring abstracted human passions and powers of some kind. The gods are agents in the narrative and act on the central human figures, but they also provide a means of analysing the actions and desires of the characters themselves when faced with problems of self-government and, in the case of Theseus, the government of others.

The classical, chivalric world of the Knight's Tale provides an arena for exploring the interaction between the forces of individual human desire and those of the larger social, political and universal world of which they form a part. Some of the difficulties of putting into practice the conduct-book rules for knights and knight-princes are traced in this narrative, which illustrates the way in which the world of the pagan past may be used to explore, not merely to affirm and exemplify, codes of conduct.

Reworking the narratives of the past offered medieval writers considerable interpretative challenges and innovative possibilities: not only could traditional narratives be refracted through different kinds of generic frames in their retelling, but also new narrative subjects could be opened up within classical, historical frames. The story of \triangleright Troilus and Criseyde itself is a medieval 'invention', the story of \triangleright Palamon and Arcite in the Knight's Tale is another. In both \triangleright Troilus and Criseyde and the Knight's Tale, Chaucer used narratives taken from \triangleright Boccaccio to develop a new generic frame for treating classical histories, in which large-scale events were refracted through a microscosmic focus on pairs of lovers. But classical history was not the only prestigious subject for narrative development during the medieval centuries. There is, for example, a large number of Middle English narratives focussed around the activities of > Charlemagne and members of his illustrious court. In these narratives, largely derived from Old French versions, chivalry serves the ends of the Christian faith, and the opposition between pagan and Christian culture (with the transforming possibility of conversion rather than extinction) provides the basic narrative and metaphysical structure of these texts. But it is, perhaps, the opening up of a new history of Britain in the twelfth century that proves to be one of the most striking and productive areas for the creation of vernacular narrative traditions, in verse and later in prose, in the medieval period.

The appearance, some time around 1138, of ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth's ▷ Historia Regum Britannie (History of the Kings of Britain) made a significant contribution to opening up the subject of British history for narrative elaboration. This text recounts the sequence of British kings from the foundation of the kingdom of Britain by Brutus, the great-grandson of ▷ Aeneas, to the demise of British rule and the establishment of Saxon control over the island. The reign of ▷ King Arthur marks the high point of British history, for it is during this time that the island is reestablished as a unified Christian nation, and becomes a great international power and chivalric centre attracting knights from all over the world. Although Geoffrey of Monmouth was not the first to suggest that British society had classical roots, he was the first to depict the illustrious history of the island in such detail and, in fact, to represent British history in a way that explores some of the political, social and cultural ideals of the twelfth century itself.

Among Geoffrey of Monmouth's academic peers and predecessors, in the early decades of the twelfth century, there was a marked interest in recovering the history of England and in bridging the gap between the narrative history provided by > Bede (and the later Saxon chroniclers) and that of the twelfth-century present. Geoffrey of Monmouth's contribution to this historiographical movement was not to recover the history of Saxon and post-Conquest England but to 'recover' a marvellous prehistory. In developing his account of a relatively undocumented period of insular history, Geoffrey of Monmouth took the opportunity to comment on some aspects of the politics and values of his own, turbulent time. Establishing the political function of this act of historical fabrication (or for that matter the political function of the newly constructed histories of England) is not a simple matter, but, at the very least, a powerful argument for unified rule of the island may be drawn from Geoffrey of Monmouth's history, which is the first requirement if the English kingdom of the 'present' is to live up to the glorious achievements of its British 'past'.

Although the value of Monmouth's account (which considerably disrupted some of the established traditions of English historiography) was challenged by subsequent clerical historians, its influence was immense. Vernacular versions appeared from the mid-twelfth century onwards, and one of the earliest and most substantial verse narratives composed in Middle English, the thirteenth-century Brut composed by Laʒamon, is a reworking of the Monmouth tradition of British history. The way in which retelling the history of the island's past may offer a medium for investigating the cultural politics of its present may be seen in the Brut: this very act of retelling insular history in English, with its contrived archaic overtones, seems to be an assertion of a cultural continuity in a land which has 'i-gon from honde to honde', from Brutus' kin to 'Englisce men' and then to 'tha Frensca'.

But if Geoffrey of Monmouth gave Britain a new image and British history a new status, vernacular writers in France and England in the twelfth century opened up other areas of the British cultural heritage for formal literary treatment. The story of > Tristan and Iseult has no place in the design of Monmouth's parrative, which is oriented around regnal history, but it is part of the pre-Saxon British/Celtic narrative store which French writers such as Béroul. > Chrétien de Troves and > Marie de France drew on for the development of new literary subjects and from which they developed new narrative forms. It is very difficult for us, today, to recreate some sense of this ephemeral oral. Celtic tradition. However, the range of motifs, themes and subjects which Marie de France, in the late twelfth century, claims to derive from oral British traditions at least suggests that a figure like Arthur did not monopolize this tradition, and probably did not play a large part in it. Rather, vernacular writers from the mid-twelfth century onwards drew on story motifs from British/Celtic traditions to develop a corpus of parratives orientated around the chivalric > Golden Age of Arthur's court, which could be given a historical location too, thanks to Geoffrey of Monmouth's historiographical efforts. Arthurian narrative, like much British historiography itself, is essentially the product of the post-Conquest period.

What seems to happen is that for writers in medieval France and England, Britain becomes a literary landscape where different narrative traditions may be located and where, for example, a historically placed Christian society may encounter otherworldly, magical forces which reflect the remnants of non-Christian cultures. The fourteenth-century verse narrative \triangleright Sir Gawain and the Green Knight illustrates how brilliantly the narrative potential of the overlapping historical and literary landscapes of Britain may be played off against each other. The impression of Britain rising out of the ashes of Troy, which frames Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, offers a resonant image of the way in which new narrative areas are opened up during the period, as material from Celtic and other, hitherto, oral traditions was reworked in literary media and given formal literary status. Aeneas, Brutus, Gawain, and the Green Knight, unlikely as it may seem, form part of a narrative continuum.

I have avoided using the term 'romance' up to this point in favour of the more general term 'narrative'. Partly this is because the term 'romance', like that of 'lyric', has been used in so many different ways – both as a historically specific term and as a literary universal – that its discriminatory value is doubtful at times. The term 'romance' may still perform a useful critical function if, however, it is used of narratives structured in certain ways. Chivalric settings are an integral feature of medieval narratives on a wide range of subjects, with the result that the use of a chivalric/feudal setting, and the invocation of the attendant values of that milieu, are intrinsic, but not necessarily distinctive, features of 'romance'.

What is distinctive about the specific category of narratives that I would recognize as romances is that they are focussed around displaced (predominantly male) protagonists, whose social identity and status are treatened in a series of 'adventures', and who survive to reintegrate into society as members of an élite group. The structural pattern is essentially that of estrangement, risk and recovery, which is played out in a providentially ordered world in which all things shall be well, finally, for those who embody the values of the chivalric élite which are theirs by birth. The degree to which Christian providence is recognized explicitly as a controlling force in the fortunes of the protagonists is a variable factor, which is obviously related to the homiletic emphasis of the narrative as a whole.

The romances which are structured around the stories of displaced women, such as $Emar\acute{e}$, and the \gt Man of Lam's Tale of Constance, strongly promote the notion of a providentially controlled world in which a Christian god protects those who have faith and are constant in adversity. Emaré's adventures, as the narrator points out, are firmly under providential direction: when she is put out to sea, because she resists her father's incestuous advances, 'She was dryven into a lond/Thorow the grace of Goddes sond,/That all thyng may fulfylle'. The Amazons of the classical past have few descendants in the female protagonists of medieval romance, whose virtues are predominantly those of suffering and passivity.

While this abstracted romance paradigm may provide a useful starting point for considering the 60 or so extant examples of Middle English romances (such as > Guy of Warwick > Bevis of Hampton) which make up such an important part of the vernacular parrative corpus, it is also evident from this corpus that the basic structural paradigm may be developed and refined in various ways. The episodic structure of the form, built up around sequences of adventures, gives it considerable flexibility: sequences may easily be added and interwoven to create more complex narrative structures. Indeed, what is interesting about medieval romances is the way in which variables within and beyond that basic paradigm are played out in particular narratives: the way in which generic frames may be played off against each other: the way in which the form may be used to investigate, not merely affirm, ethical codes. When Guy of Warwick, for example, has earned himself a place in the social structure, and won his wife through his chivalric prowess, the framework of values in which the narrative is working shifts to that of a transcendental Christian ethos. The narrative goes on to chart his displacement from worldly pursuits in general and his actions, thereafter, are entirely in the service of the Christian faith; the genre of romance is contiguous, here, with that of the saint's life,

The possible dimensions of the romance world in general, and the world of Arthurian romance in particular, are well exemplified in the encyclopaedia of romance forms, in prose, which constitutes > Malory's > Morte D'Arthur. Here, a sequence of romance narratives is inset within a broader tragic-historic frame. The inset romances are structurally varied (some are longer and interlaced in more complex ways than others), and not all work within the same set of values. In the Quest of the Holy Grail, most notably, two different kinds of chivalric orders confront each other as a transcendent model of chivalric activity subverts the code of behaviour so carefully established through the adventures of the > Round Table knights. The series of adventures radiate out from Arthur's court and yet form part of a sequence, too, with some consequential impetus. The result is the construction of a vast narrative web, which charts the rise, consolidation and, ultimately, the fall of Arthurian society, and which defies any attempt to account for the downfall of Arthur's reign in terms of a single causal structure. In abbreviating and unlocking some of the complex strands of the larger French cycle which formed his principal source, Malory has made the relationship between actions and their consequences much more mysterious. In a world in which any individual has an imperfect knowledge of the circumstances in which she/he is operating, and lacks control over the consequences of their actions, the only measure of action becomes its adherence to a chivalric code of behaviour. But it is precisely the form and scope of that ethical code which are investigated in the epic sequence of Malory's Morte D'Arthur as a whole.

The spectrum of the uses (and perhaps abuses) of romance narratives and their engagement with other kinds of narrative genres (epic, saints' lives, \triangleright fabliau) is revealed in the romance collection incorporated in the Canterbury Tales. Alongside the epic-romance structure of the Knight's Tale set in classical Athens (which is set off against the fabliau imitation which follows), there is the embryonic romance-epic of the \triangleright Squire's Tale (situated in the marvellous east); the \triangleright Man of Law's homiletic

Tale of Constance (which moves between the world of Christian Rome and pagan societies in the east and west); Chaucer's burlesque tale of \triangleright Sir Thopas which, though nominally set in Flanders, takes the world of romance conventions and motifs as its subject and its setting; and finally the \triangleright Wife of Bath's Arthurian romance which provides a provocative analysis of sexual politics.

This Arthurian text opens with a teasing play on the idea of cultural continuity between present and past societies, which may provide both a point of return to the opening subject of this section and a point of transition to the next. The Wife begins her tale with a meditation on the relationship between the inhabitants of Britain in the 'olde dayes of King Artour' and now. The ⊳ fairies and elves who once filled the land, she suggests, have been both exorcized and replaced by the wandering friars, who like the fairies can now be found 'in every bussh or under every tree'. It is to the kind of literary material produced by these wandering friars and other clerics that I shall now turn

The opening strategy of the narrator of > Cursor Mundi, a versified history of the world from Creation to Doomsday, is to suggest that a person's literary tastes (whether for material heard or read) are a sign of their moral and spiritual quality. Reading or hearing the stories of Alexander, Troy, Arthur, etc. is not explicitly criticized by the narrator of the Cursor Mundi, but the implication of the opening section is that this monumental account of Christian history offers a morally and spiritually profitable alternative to spending time on 'Stories of diverse thinges', told in 'diverse manere', in 'diverse ryme'. The alternative fare offered by this narrative, which 'courses' over the history of the world (hence its name), is an account of the > Seven Ages of the World, from the first age of creation to the seventh age, which will be heralded by the coming of the 'Antichrist' and end with the Day of Judgement - the 'end' of Christian history as such. Material for this history, first compiled in English around 1300, is drawn not only from the Vulgate version of the scriptures but from supplementary material in apochryphal sources, from scriptural commentaries in Latin, biblical paraphrases, collections of saints' lives and manuals of Christian doctrine and instruction. A text such as the Cursor Mundi gives a literate lay audience access to a body of Christian texts and textual traditions which had been developed and consolidated within the monastic culture of the preceding centuries. It is both the product and a sign of the great pastoral movement which can be traced back to Anglo-Saxon England but which, particularly from the thirteenth century onwards, left an enormous corpus of religious instructional material in its wake.

A wide range of instructional material survives from the medieval period, addressed to different audiences and tackling different areas of Christian teaching: some texts provided the clergy with resources for lay instruction (through the medium of sermons) and guidance for pastoral care; other manuals apparently offered lay audiences direct instruction in how to cultivate their spiritual welfare by explaining the process of penitence (such as in Chaucer's > Parson's Tale) or by providing instruction in Christian history (such as the Cursor Mundi).

This body of Christian literature (or 'pastoralia') did not exist in a religious vacuum but engaged with the wider spectrum of literary activity of which it formed part and which it influenced in its turn. A dramatic illustration of this engagement can be taken from the Canterbury Tales, where figures such as the Friar, the Nun's Priest and the Pardoner deploy the tools of their trade in the construction of tales for a story-telling competition. Though teaching was not, of course, an activity open to medieval women, the Wife of Bath borrows sermonizing techniques to organize the story of her life and lend support to her stance as a secular apologist, thus earning the title of 'noble prechour' from the Pardoner. The Pardoner himself introduces his pilgrim audience to the rhetorical art of sermonizing as he demonstrates the range of linguistic, textual and performance skills that make up his professional routine. According to the Pardoner, lay audiences 'loven tales olde/ Swiche thynges kan they wel reporte and holde' – a point borne out by his own preaching practice and affirmed by the contents of contemporary story collections compiled for preaching purposes.

Such practices of mining all kinds of literary resources for spiritual ends (favoured by the mendicant orders) was not unanimously approved by all sectors of the clergy; indeed, for Chaucer's Parson, literary fictions and 'moralitee and vertuous mateere' are incompatible. His contribution to the Canterbury Tales – a prose treatise on the process of penitence – both formally closes the proceedings and actually stops the story-telling game. The Parson's contribution is appropriate, perhaps, for a literary excursion that is nearing the end of the road in all senses. Yet it is clear from considering the Parson's Tale within the wider context of the Canterbury collection that the modes and material of spiritual guidance are not necessarily incompatible with those of secular entertainment and instruction. The Parson's rejection of the value of fables and 'switch wreccednesse' represents one position within a wider spectrum of opinion on the value of certain kinds of religious literature in particular and fictionalizing activity in general.

The alliterative poems attributed to the > Gawain poet, composed some time in the late fourteenth century, offer a different view to that of Chaucer's Parson. The poems > Cleaness and > Patience are both structured in ways which reflect the influence of exegetical practices of reading and interpreting the Scriptures, and use those techniques to explore the interlocking nature of Christian virtues. But whereas Patience is focussed around the amplification and explication of a single Old Testament story (that of Jonah and the Whale), the narrative of Cleaness draws on more complex sermonizing techniques to investigate the lessons of Christian etiquette, through the retelling of the parable of the Wedding Feast and a further sequence of Old Testament stories. The juxtaposition of these two poems addressing the subject of Christian virtue with the brilliant reworking of Arthurian romance tradition, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, in the same manuscript, suggests that the story of Jonah and the adventures of Gawain do not necessarily belong to mutually exclusive contexts of either literary production or reception.

But it is perhaps the fourth poem in this manuscript. > Pearl, which illustrates a merging of Christian and courtly poetics in the most spectacular way. For here the poet uses the fictional frame of a > dream-vision poem as a way of approaching revelation: St John's vision of New Jerusalem in Revelations is incorporated into the final sections of this dream poem. The dream-vision genre traditionally offered medieval poets the licence to speculate and explore the interaction between inner and outer worlds in a fictional form. But what is remarkable about this poem is the sheer ambition of its attempt to represent the process by which an individual may come to terms with the prospect of a Christian afterlife, and literally realize and see the vision described by St John in the Bible. The occasion of the poem is one of extreme love-longing, figured in the male narrator's account of his mourning for his pearl. his most precious object which is described in terms which suggest it represents a female form. The movement of the spiritual 'aventure' which follows is measured by the narrator's ability to see the pearl in different ways, as its possible sphere of reference expands. That expansion is figured in the form of the poem itself, in the concatenating design of every stanza and the linking pattern of the stanzas as a whole, which embodies a pearl shape. The resources of poetic and linguistic artifice, and of Christian techniques for interpreting and explicating the Scriptures, are combined in this poetic narrative, which asserts, in its very form, that fictional making and poetic artifice may serve as a wholly fitting medium for 'virtuous mateere'.

The resources and traditions of Christian teaching and preaching, described above, provide the context for some of the important vernacular dramatic traditions of late medieval England. Most of the surviving evidence for dramatic performances relates to religious drama, and this extant material is generally categorized according to whether its subject is the macrocosmic sweep of Christian history (as found in the > cycle plays, sometimes referred to as 'mystery plays'), or the microcosmic history of an individual human soul (as found in the texts classed as > morality plays). Texts from the first category are the remains of a widespread tradition of Christian urban drama in which select episodes from the cycle of Christian history from Creation to Doomsday were played out in the streets of towns such as York, Chester and Wakefield, which provide the settings for three of the four play cycles which survive. The textual background to this kind of dramatic tradition is provided by works such as the > Cursor Mundi, in which a wide range of scriptural, apochryphal and instructional material is merged into a narrative of Christian history.

Considerable resources were required to make Christian history course through the streets of towns, and craft and religious guilds within the towns provided a key organizational structure for play productions. Enacting the play-cycles seems to have served both religious and civic functions: at the same time as the cycle plays celebrate the plan of Christian history, the resources and civic order of these large urban centres are evidently on display too. It is perhaps the community function of cycle drama that helps explain its survival. Performances of the cycles continued even when the religious climate became hostile to some of the doctrinal points they embodied, surviving well into the period traditionally demarcated as that of the 'Renaissance' in England: the last recorded performance of the Coventry plays were in 1579; those of Chester and York in 1569 and 1575, respectively.

If the cycle plays are an enactment of monumental Christian history, the morality plays can be seen as the dramatization of the inner history of a single soul. Whereas cycle drama sees its mundane setting as a prop in recreating a universal, cosmic playing area, the morality plays use dramatic space as an arena for mapping out the history of an inner life, or interior processes, which are less historically specific than typical and exemplary, as the names of their central characters (Everyman, Mankind, Humanum Genus) indicate. The register for morality plays such as the > Castle of Perseverance and > Everyman echoes that of the penitential manuals designed to provide Christians with a framework for diagnosing and correcting their inner spiritual states, and understanding the mechanics of temptation and sin. This is an analytical vocabulary built of components such as the > Seven Deadly Sins and their corresponding virtues, the World, the Flesh and the Devil. It was not the only register of psychological analysis available to medieval writers; an elaborate descriptive scheme had been developed around the process of falling in love (strongly influenced by > Ovid), and both of these psychological schemes (penitential and amorous) are an important element in the poetic narratives written in the dream-vision mode. But if dream-vision poetry offered a narrative space for the exploration and analysis of inner processes, the morality plays occupied this space in the dramatic tradition of late medieval England, embodying inner life and abstract modes of analysis in dramatic forms

Although the cycle drama/morality play division offers a starting point for discussing religious drama in English, not all vernacular drama can be neatly slotted into these two categories. The focal points and interests of their cycle drama and morality plays are not mutually exclusive. The so-called > 'N-Town' cycle, for example, combines the representation of Christian history with moral analysis, with the result that personified abstractions, such as 'Mors' (Death) or 'Contemplacio' (Contemplation), occupy the stage alongside figures from Christian history. Unlike the cycle drama of York, Chester and Wakefield, the N-Town sequence of plays seems not to have been designed for processional performance by guild members, and employs a much wider range of dramatic techniques for mediating the literal and symbolic narrative of Christian history.

Historical and moral perspectives could be combined in the 'Saints' Plays' of the period. Few examples of these plays survive, but the text of > Mary Magdalene provides an example of how the historical narrative of an individual life may be turned into exemplary drama: Mary's 'fall' into 'wantoness' is represented in this play by the infiltration of the 'Bad Angel' and 'Lady Lechery' into the castle of Maudelyn. The so-called 'Creed' plays and 'Pater-Noster' plays seem to have combined dramatization of moral analysis and episodes from Christian history, too, in dramatic performances which sought to affirm and explain the power of the Lord's Prayer and the Creed. No scripts of these plays survive, but their contents can be recreated partially from records of their performance in York, Beverly and Lincoln. Clearly our picture of medieval dramatic traditions is very much dependent on the vagaries of the evidence that has survived, and much has been lost.

The spectrum of dramatic activity in medieval England is broader than that represented by plays composed in English. A tradition of Latin Church drama (that is, of acting out parts of the liturgy at key times in the Church year), continues throughout the period, and sophisticated examples of Anglo-Norman religious drama (such as the play known as \triangleright Adam) survive from the twelfth century. Nor is the drama of medieval England wholly orientated around religious subjects, but as might be expected, far less evidence survives of secular play-making and performing than that of religious drama. Yet of the few English play texts to survive from before the fifteenth century, two of the earliest (the fragmentary account of a meeting between a clerk and a maiden and the text known as > Dame Sirith) are humorous and concerned with love problems and tricks.

Records of accounts from noble households suggest that the playing of interludes was an important form of medieval performance art, although little evidence survives of the form and nature of these plays. We have little more idea of the nature of the interlude performed by Jakke Travail in 1427 for > Henry VI than of the popular tradition of interlude-making mentioned by Robert Mannyng in his account of the 'Dancers of Colbeck'. It would be fair to say that a large part of the dramatic activity of medieval England is off the record – or only traceable indirectly through records of civic accounts, household accounts or ecclesiastical prohibitions of various kinds. But it is also fair to suggest that the boundaries between drama and other modes of literary reception were less absolute than now.

The dramatic quality of much medieval narrative, and the dramatic circumstances of its public mediation, undercut distinctions between drama and other literary media, between public and private reading experiences and performances. All kinds of vernacular narratives bear the formalized signals of performance texts ('Herkneth to me'). So the spectrum of medieval performance art is wide and may encompass sermons, readings, recitals, song-making, as well as more conventionally recognized forms of drama. When Chaucer's Pardoner describes his different voice modulations, gestures, props and text, which he deploys when preaching in parish churches, he is providing a script, and stage directions too, for one of the most common and popular forms of medieval performance art.

Chaucer, Gower and Langland

Fro he can jangle as a jaye, and japes telle, (chatter like a jay)

He schall be levede an lovede...

(Winner and Waster, 19-26)

The narrator of the mid-fourteenth-century > alliterative poem > Winner and Waster opens with a lament for a Golden Age when literary 'makers' had status and a duly appreciative audience. Now the decline of society, in all respects, is figured by the preference for entertainment by 'boys' who 'jangle', and this decline is the focus of the rest of the text, which investigates the effects of 'winning' and 'wasting' on social structures. This complaint is a conventional preliminary to the satire which follows.

Yet looking back on the literary activity in English which followed the production of Winner and Waster, it may seem that a Golden Age of 'making', far from passing, was just about to begin. The fourteenth century, and the second half of the fourteenth century in particular, is hailed as the time when the English literary landscape opened up; as the time when English became recognized and proven to be a language of literature; as the time when the notion of an English literary tradition was born. It is certainly true that there is a massive increase in the use of English as a literary language during this time, and that the status of English — and works produced in English — is firmly established by the end of the century through the work of writers such as ▶ William Langland, ▶ John Gower and, above all, Geoffrey Chaucer. However, this does not constitute a consolidated movement, still less a simple nationalistic endeavour. The distinctive qualities of the work of Chaucer, Langland and Gower, the traditional and innovatory features of their work, derive partly from the diversity of their literary context and their mediation between different models of literary production, between classical and Christian poetics.

By way of conclusion to an essay that has emphasized the plurality of Middle English literary culture, I will discuss some features of the great encyclopaedic narratives produced by Gower, Chaucer and Langland, and briefly consider the topicality of their work. Though, as we have seen, medieval writers often used stories from the past to investigate the values of the present, these three writers also make the contemporary world a subject of their narratives.

Shared concerns, dramatic techniques, narrative strategies, can be traced between the texts of the > Confessio Amantis, The Canterbury Tales and > Piers Plowman, although these hardly fall into neat critical patterns. What is striking initially is the way in which Gower, Chaucer and Langland all use penitential occasions, motifs and processes to structure their large-scale narrative compilations. The narrative of the Confessio Amantis is organized around a series of confessional and instructional exchanges between a lover (Amans) and a priest (Genius), who are both servants of the Goddess of Love. These exchanges provide the medium for both an encyclopaedic collection of (largely pagan) short stories, organized to illustrate the Seven Deadly Sins, and for a narrative synthesis of other kinds of book learning and lore. Not only does the Confessio Amantis contain a collection of classical and Old Testament narratives, but it incorporates sections on the histories of the world, of religion, of culture and instructional material on the governance of self and society. In some respects Gower's text has the quality of a later fourteenth-century manual of culture.

In Gower's earlier works in French and Latin, the narrator assumes the stance of a social prophet and his voice is that of social, ethical and political complaint. Here in the Confessio the narrative voice is refracted through that of the Lover and the Priest, and the high stance of Gower's earlier work gives way to a narrative that tries a 'middel weie', between mirth and morality, addressing ethical issues through focussing on the confession and instruction of a lover, a man committed to secular values. But penitential practices are completed both in theory and in practice in this narrative as the focus shifts at the end of the collection from secular ethics to transcendental concerns. The closing stages of the Confessio Amantis are marked by the revelation that the Lover is too old to be a follower of Venus, and the gap between his desires and capacities is healed when Cupid's arrow is pulled from his heart. Thus the penitential process of contrition, confession and healing is completed. The state of the Lover and the maker of the Confessio Amantis coincide at the end of the narrative: the healing of the lover marks the end of 'love-making' for the figure of the poet, who declares his days of literary composition on the subject of love are over too

Whereas John Gower uses a personal act of confession as the framework for his story collection, Chaucer makes a public pilgrimage the setting for his narrative drama. The pilgrimage to Canterbury becomes the arena for a tale-telling competition designed to pass the time en route. This was not Chaucer's first attempt at constructing a story collection. The occasion for the earlier story collection, the \triangleright Legend of Good Women, is an act of literary penance for sins against the God of Love, which has obvious parallels with the Confessio Amantis. Nor was Chaucer the first writer to use the idea of story-telling as a 'pastime' as a pretext for a framed narrative collection. Before Chaucer the Italian writer \triangleright Boccaccio had used a courtly retreat as the setting for a collection of 100 stories in the \triangleright Decameron. However,

Chaucer's choice of a pilgrimage setting allows for a much greater tonal and narrative range. Unlike Boccaccio, Chaucer does not keep within the bounds of a courtly literature tradition, but incorporates a wider panorama of compositional practices and narrative genres, and trades on the social variety of the pilgrim narrators. Diversity is the governing principle of the collection.

Unlike Gower, who uses a relatively stable narrative frame for his story collection, Chaucer makes the framework of the tales a variable factor too, as narratives are generated by different kinds of interaction between the pilgrims and their gamesmaster, the Host. The event is both organized according to certain rules and yet, at the same time, open to unexpected engagements and confrontations. The stories are refracted through a range of narrative voices which defeat any attempt to reconstitute a single, governing authorial stance from the collection. Thus the play between narrators and narrative is much greater than in Gower's Confessio Amantis and this ludic quality is one of the singular characteristics of Chaucer's story-collection. Whereas Gower treads a middle way between mirth and morality in the substance and organization of his story-collection, Chaucer conducts a more radical experiment into the morality of mirth at intervals in the Canterbury Tales. But this story competition takes place in a setting with moral and spiritual resonances too, and these are invoked at the close of the play by narratives.

The Canterbury Tales, though unfinished in parts, was clearly designed to end like the Confessio Amantis, with a radical shift of focus and a gesture that marks the end of earthly 'making' and fictionalizing. What begins as a literal and literary excursion ends, with the Parson's Tale, as an occasion for a spiritual journey, a 'parfit, glorious, pilgrymage' to 'Jerusalem celestial'. The time of the maker of the narrative coincides with that of the text itself: most manuscripts of the Canterbury Tales close with a leave-taking from the maker of the text in the form of a literary confession and retraction.

In theory and in practice, Chaucer's story-telling collection is a work in progress. Langland's > Piers Plowman is very much a poem in progress too, built around a dynamic principle of organization and surviving in at least three different stages of revision and reformulation. If the Confessio Amantis and the Canterbury Tales bear the signs of being the last works of their respective authors. Piers Plomman seems to have been Langland's first and last exercise in literary making. Langland's work is much more the product of a Christian, clerical milieu than that of Gower and Chaucer: the narrative has a pervasive macaronic quality, being suffused with Latin quotations, and the conduct of Christian life in all senses is its central concern. A single penitential action does not provide the setting for the narrative of Piers Plomman, but penitential processes and schemes are used to organize the action within the narrative. The first major section of the poem, for example, considers how a Christian society might collectively embark on a process of contrition, confession and pilgrimage. The action of the narrative as a whole might be seen as a pilgrimage of sorts, a spiritual 'chanson d'aventure' by the narrator/dreamer Will, which encompasses a record of a macrocosmic Christian journey through history. The dream framework of the narrative means that all action in the poem is potentially translatable as inner experience, just as all inner experience in the poem may become public history. Through using the dream-vision mode, Langland is able to merge temporal and spatial perspectives, and to combine the diachronic history of an individual human 'will', that of Will, the Dreamer, in his search for Piers Plowman.

Langland's work is not a narrative collection in any obvious sense like that of the Confessio Amantis and the Canterbury Tales. Yet it has encyclopaedic qualities and synthesizes an enormous tradition of Christian literature, of pastoralia. If Piers Plowman is encyclopaedic in its scope, its mode of organizing that body of knowledge is very different from that employed by John Gower for example. Langland is concerned not only with what there is to know, but what it is to know. So at the same time as Christian history and doctrine are represented in the narrative, the process of individual assimilation and internationalization of that teaching is considered too. The dream mode allows Langland to enquire into the relationship between instruction and understanding. Piers Plowman is not, then, a penitential manual, or a Christian handbook, but a poetic venture, committed to the value of fictionalizing as a way of exploring spiritual issues. Yet, in its various versions, Piers Plowman exposes the problem of articulating such issues within a fallible medium, through the work of fallible human makers

Piers Plomman, the Confessio Amantis and the Canterbury Tales all give the impression of having been produced 'in media via', 'in medias res', in the middle of times and traditions, under the shadow of endings which may make all literary labours irrelevant, if not damnable. All three works are given some kind of contemporary placement in late-fourteenth-century society and all three works hold a mirror up to their times, not in the sense of offering a mimesis of events, but in offering a critical assessment of their contemporary political, social and cultural context.

Although Langland opens the first dream-vision of Piers Plomman with a paradigmatic picture of Middle Earth, framed by the Tower of Truth and the Dungeon of Falsehood, the sense of a-temporality soon disappears as the contents of the 'fair feeld ful of folk' begin to materialize, and a complex picture emerges of contemporary social and political life. Langland cultivates a greater sense of his narrative unfolding at a particular time in the late fourteenth century than either Gower or Chaucer, and this increases the sense of the pressing urgency of the political and political-ecclesiastical issues addressed in the course of the dream-visions. Gower confronts the political and social issues of his day most directly in his earlier works in French and Latin. However, the Confessio Amantis, too, is framed by an extensive prologue and epilogue which places the story collection within a general framework of universal history, and with a specific historical context: the very specificity of Gower's address to his time is underlined by the changes made to parts of the opening and closing frame (notably in its address to > Richard II) as that political context changed.

In comparison to Gower and Langland, Chaucer is much more guarded in his allusions to the turbulent political and social events of his time, Indeed, the topicality of his work is much more orientated towards the world of contemporary European culture. His engagement with the court culture, not only of France, but of Italy too, is unparalleled among his contemporaries. Like Langland, Chaucer open his encyclopaedic work, the Canterbury Tales, with a Prologue which gives the storytelling event some sense of historical time and place. As the pilgrims are introduced, an impression is built up of a society in which traditional social bonds are being eroded by materialistic interests. But the pilgrims do not operate within their everyday context in the Canterbury Tales. Rather the pilgrims are cut loose from their mundane world to become prime movers in a literary event in which contemporary social and political issues are refracted through an investigation into how literary representations are produced and received. References to such contemporary events as the ▶ Peasants' Revolt or to the deposition of Richard II are rare in Chaucer's work; a concern with the politics of representation, of 'lion painting', is much more pervasive.

When the Elizabethan critic > George Puttenham came to consider the history of the Arte of English Poesie, he chose not to delve further back than the time of Edward III, and mentions only a small group of writers from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries as worthy of notice, including Chaucer, Gower, Langland, > Lydgate and > John Hardyng. For Puttenham these were not writers from a Golden Age of medieval literature, rather writers from a 'First Age' of a literary tradition which culminates, in his view, in the work of the court poets of his time. It is perhaps not surprising that Puttenham bestows the honorific title of poet on Chaucer, alone, of the writers from this first age. Some of the distinctive qualities of Chaucer's work (such as its poetic self-consciousness, its engagement with an international secular literary tradition) correspond to features of the secular, humanist literary tradition which Puttenham promotes as the tradition of English poetry. But this courtly tradition of literature is part of a much broader spectrum of literary activity: it is not the only literary tradition of the time. Puttenham's representation of the 'First Age' of English poetry reveals how the composition of literary history itself reflects the values of its writer and its time, even as the attempt is made to engage with those of another age. Literary history was is and continues to be a contingent construction. Since Puttenham wrote, John Hardyng, the fifteenth-century verse chronicler, no longer occupies a place in the high ground of medieval literary history alongside that of writers such as Chaucer and Langland. The > 'House of Fame', as Chaucer describes it, is built on a rock of partly melting ice.

In the course of the twentieth century, the study of medieval culture and the retrieval of its artefacts has expanded enormously, with the result that the medieval literary landscape has been opened up in different ways. Its features have been changed quite literally by the mapping out of wider areas of literary activity, as more medieval manuscripts have been edited and made accessible for a modern audience. But at the same time more questions have been raised about the ideological implications of these acts of retrieval, interpretation and cultural assimilation, Medieval literary studies have become the forum for debates about how texts from a half-alien literary culture may be read in a modern context. The engagement with medieval literary culture is a two-way process of critical enquiry and critical selfassessment. Reassessments are currently being made of the interplay between those texts traditionally identified as belonging to the category of 'medieval literature' and the wider spectrum of textual production of which they form a part. If medieval culture no longer speaks to modern audiences with a univocal voice, that is partly because of the greater critical sensitivity, now, to the way in which the tensions and contradictions in the dominant ideological constructions of the time are played out in the texts of the time. Although the Christian Church exerted a pervasive influence over all areas of medieval intellectual, social and political activity, that does not mean that the cultural artefacts which remain project anything like a homogeneous and unified world view. The Wife of Bath is not the only medieval figure to be interested in the politics of 'lion painting'.

My interest in this essay has not been in tracing the origin of an English tradition, so much as giving a broad impression of the range of sacred and secular literary 'making' in Middle English, and raising some questions about who was making it, and in what context. The medieval English tradition cannot be mapped out wholly in terms of individual writers, or in terms of works written just in the 'Englishes' of the time. It has a place within a literary continuum which includes works produced in Latin and French written in England, and on the continent too. This literary continuum does not end in 1500, although from this time on there is an enormous expansion in the productive and receptive contexts of English texts, as the media of page and stage are opened up.

Yet some striking lines of continuity are to be found in the relationship between the sophisticated narrative traditions of the medieval period and the dramatic traditions of the Renaissance. Not only was a great body of medieval narrative material made more readily available for private reading through printed editions, but it was also rendered more accessible through its transformation into dramatic form. Shakespeare's reworking of the medieval Troy stories is but one example of the way in which narratives formerly mediated through public and private readings become the subject of dramatic productions in the Renaissance. > Troilus and Cressida is a dramatic innovation which arises out of classical and medieval narrative traditions. Indeed, the homage to Chaucer at the beginning of the > Two Noble Kinsmen, or the appearance of Gower as a mediating figure in > Pericles, are only the most obvious signs of the deep-seated debt of Renaissance writers to medieval poets and 'makers' of the preceding centuries.

'By Any Other Name':

Understanding Renaissance Literature

Marion Wynne-Davies

Introduction

When Juliet calls upon Romeo to reject his surname so that they will no longer owe allegiance to the warring Montague and Capulet families, she explains her argument through the metaphor of a rose:

What's in a name? That which we call a rose By any other word would smell as sweet. (> Romeo and Juliet, II. ii. 43-4)

Juliet asserts that names are superfluities which may be discarded at will, since the substance of identity can never change - the material body of the rose will remain the same, whatever arrangement of letters or sounds we use to describe it. To a certain extent, Juliet's concerns prefigure the twentieth-century theory of semiotics, of which Ferdinand de Saussure was an important initiator. The difference between the two ideas - Juliet's simple poetic argument and de Saussure's complicated construction of a theory of language – lies in the character's insistence upon the material object and the theoretician's primary concern with the name. In other words, de Saussure pointed out that each name or 'sign' has two component parts: the sound or letters (signifier) and the concept or idea (signified). For Juliet we must take meaning a step further: to the 'referent', to the 'thing' which exists in the real world. What we are faced with as readers is the conflict between the name 'rose', which through previous cultural associations carries a romantic and beautiful signification, and the recognition of a practical argument about real objects - we must admit that if the same flower were called 'rhosyn' (Welsh for 'rose'), it would make no difference to the smell. But how do these arguments forward an understanding of what is meant by the name 'Renaissance'?

The word (and sound) 'Renaissance' is like any other signifier, a jumble of letters that may change to 'Rinascimento' in another language (Italian), or to 'renascence' when Matthew Arnold (1822–88) decided to alter the term to a more nationalistic form:

The great movement which goes by the name of the Renascence . . . I have ventured to give to the foreign word Renaissance an English form.

(Culture and Anarchy, 1869)

Indeed, the name in English does have a somewhat bastard origin in that it derives from the French verb 'renaître' (to be born again), and only began to be used commonly during the nineteenth century in scholarly tomes such as John Ruskin's The Stones of Venice (1851) and Walter Pater's Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873). However, the name gradually developed a coherent concept (signified), which was grounded upon its original meaning of a rebirth of classical learning after the 'dark ages' of medieval scholarship. This denigration of the ▶ Middle Ages is today recognized as erroneous; in order to fashion itself, each age tends to denigrate the previous period.

Nevertheless, that there was a difference cannot be questioned. Apart from the rebirth of knowledge, the Renaissance encompasses the valorizing of the individual, the centralization of power systems and the primacy of gold, as well as discoveries in the realms of science and the New World. In this manner, we can perceive that further signifiers reverberate about the central name; > humanism, neo-Platonism (> Platonism), alchemy, the prince and the courtier, are simply a few. Beyond this, pictorial signifiers emerge, images depicted in the most resplendent colours: the gold-clad figures of > Henry VIII and > Elizabeth I, the highly glazed paintings of Leonardo da Vinci, Michelangelo, Raphael and Titian, the statuesque characters from the literary works of > Shakespeare and > Milton, the figure of Columbus leaping ashore into a bright and vivid new world, and the rebellious > Galileo confronting the Inquisition with proof that the earth moves around the sun. The complex interrelationships between these words and images - and each individual reader will be able to provide additional information - combine in various permutations to weld signifiers and signifieds into the meaning of the 'Renaissance'.

This general indeterminacy and widespread application of the term 'Renaissance' has led some critics to reject it altogether. For example, > C. S. Lewis in his comprehensive English Literature in the Sixteenth Century (1954) complains that,

'The Renaissance' can hardly be defined except as 'an imaginary entity responsible for everything the speaker likes in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries'.

Moreover, if we take the European Renaissance as a whole into account, then we must extend the dates from the fourteenth-century Italian poet ▷ Petrarch, to midseventeenth-century English writers such as John Milton, ▷ Andrew Marvell and ▷ Katherine Philips. Despite Lewis' objections, however, it is both possible and necessary to draw certain margins. For example, we may accept that the Renaissance began in Italy and spread northwards and westwards, so that the English Renaissance occurred much later than the Italian. In England, we may use the commencement of the Tudor dynasty in 1495 and the end of the ▷ Interregnum in 1660 to limit the chronological extent of the Renaissance. This temporal enclosure exhibits a certain cultural and political uniformity; it begins with ▷ Henry VII's self-conscious attempts to create the court of a Renaissance prince with its panoply of entertainments and ▷ patronage, and ends with the Restoration of ▷ Charles II.

But what of Juliet's rose? For her, the names and ideas, which we so readily acknowledge, are meaningless. Instead, what is important is the material object, the referent. Juliet's understanding of the 'Renaissance' would not consist of discussing the word's etymology or of tracing the scholarly concepts which the letters imply, but would develop from discussion of the period itself, the cultural practices, the social and political events, the material circumstances of people's lives during that unique period. Although productive, we must also be aware that this approach can be unstable, since objective and timeless judgements of external reality cannot be achieved. If a text was produced in a period distant from our own, the instability is compounded. The rose is a case in point. The twentieth-century European image of a rose is most commonly the long, pointed, velvet-leafed hybrid tea, which was a development of nineteenth-century horticulture. The Renaissance rose had more in common with today's wild plants, being more globular in form and of trailing habit, with fewer petals and only two colours, red and white. The rose adopted by the Tudors as their emblem was the red version, the Rosa Gallica. Juliet's rose may be as equally romantic as those purchasable at Interflora today, but it was quite a different species. To understand the Renaissance, we too must combine historical investigation with a self-aware recognition of our own temporal distance.

Although the nineteenth century fixed the period's identity in scholarly terms, the name 'Renaissance' was probably first used by Giorgio Vasari in The Lives of the most excellent Italian Architects, Painters and Sculptors (1550 and 1568), where he argues that his contemporaries are not anonymous artisans like the painters of the previous period, but individualistic artists and creators. Vasari's understanding of the Renaissance subject lies at a substratum of the same seam excavated by the new historicist critic Stephen Greenblatt, with his focus upon 'self-fashioning'. Both highlight the marked increase of self-determination in Renaissance culture and society. Another twentieth-century commonplace of the Renaissance configuration, the concept of the rebirth of knowledge, was evident still earlier, when the Italian neo-Platonic philosopher Marsilio Ficino (1433–99) wrote:

This century, like a golden age, has restored to light the liberal arts . . . achieving what had been honoured among the ancients, but almost forgotten since.

It seems that Renaissance men and women carried convictions about their own age which remain current, and it is these areas of convergence that we must investigate. In the remainder of this essay I shall focus upon the rebirth of knowledge; the rise of individualism; political power and patronage; and the age of gold. However, this exploration is not intended to uncover a reflection of the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries in the writing of that time. Although referents are a necessary component of meaning, literary texts are not mimetic (> Mimesis), reproducing exactly an external reality. Nor are we able to receive the words and images without introducing our own twentieth-century interference. Instead, we must look for ways in which literature develops a dialogue with other > discourses of both periods. For example, while Ficino alerts us to the idea of the Renaissance as a golden age, he simultaneously appears to be participating in a dialogue in which that notion has been contradicted. Note: he does not write that it is a golden age, but like one. Finally, we must simultaneously be aware of our own historical and cultural positioning. As the new historicist critic Louis A. Montrose writes:

Integral to . . . historical criticism must be a realization and acknowledgement that our analyses and our understandings necessarily proceed from our own historically, socially and institutionally shaped vantage points; that the histories we reconstruct are the textual constructs of critics who are, ourselves, historical subjects.

('Professing the Renaissance: The Poetics and Politics of Culture', 1987)

For example, the popularity of feminist criticism in the late twentieth century has focused readers' attention upon female authors, and several books (this guide included) have attempted to redress the gender imbalance in our canon by making contemporary readers aware of the large number of Renaissance women writers who have been neglected since the mid-seventeenth century. The recovery of authors like > Lady Anne Clifford, > Lady Eleanor Davies and > Lady Elizabeth Cary is clearly an important historical contribution to our understanding of cultural productivity in the Renaissance. But at the same time we must not expect these women writers to have modern feminist values. > Rachel Speght might well defend women against Joseph Swetnam's attack in his Arraignment of Lewd, idle, forward, and unconstant women (1615; > Querelle des Femmes), but she also accepts women's inferiority to men, because they are the 'weaker vessel' (A Mouzell for Malastomus, 1617). Rather than condemn her out of hand, we should recognize that the increased number of women writers during the sixteenth century was partially a result of humanist edicts on education. For them, perhaps, the period was a 'naissance' and not a rebirth of knowledge.

П

Pleasure Reconciled to Virtue

The rebirth of classical learning in the English Renaissance combined a moral and civic education of the individual together with an inspirational delight derived from the ideal beauty of words and images. Classical texts were revived not simply for their scholarly merit, but because they were in themselves pleasurable to read. Under the influence of humanism, these works were quickly absorbed by national grammar and local public schools, so that by the mid-sixteenth century writers and officials had a solid grounding in the 'classics'. One of the major influences on Renaissance poetry was > Aristotle's Poetics, which emphasized the need for consistency; the unities of time and place may be found in Milton's > Samson Agonistes. > Homer and > Virgil were seen to be the originators of the epic tradition, each celebrating his own nation and nobility for posterity; here > Spenser's nationalistic epic dedicated to Elizabeth I, > The Faerie Queene, followed their example. > Seneca's drama was immensely influential upon > revenge tragedy through its emphasis upon Stoical dignity and individual responsibility. Finally, the neo-Platonists replaced Aristotelian logic with > Plato's rejection of the material world as transient and his belief in a higher, eternal realm in which opposites could be reconciled in an ideal and ultimate truth. This allowed writers such as > Sidney to accept the poetic imagination as a powerful and mystical force for wisdom and virtue, rather than as a series of false tales or dreams (> An Apologie for Poetrie, 1505). Similarly, it facilitated the acceptance of pagan gods and goddesses into the dominant Christian ideology; > Jonson relied upon classical material in much of his poetry and all of his ⊳ masques, yet it is not used to contradict conventional spiritual beliefs.

Indeed, the title of this section is taken from one of Ben Jonson's masques, Pleasure Reconciled to Virtue (1618), which marked Prince Charles' (> Charles I) first court performance. In it the prince plays the classical hero, Hercules, who is faced with a choice between a life of delight, or one of toil ultimately leading to glory. The symbolic figures of Pleasure and Virtue, recalling the > morality play tradition, appear on stage at the same time as Hercules, Mercury and Daedalus. A further idealized unification occurs when the two possible existences are seen to be reconcilable:

Grace, laughter and discourse may meet,
And yet the beauty not goless:
For what is noble should be sweet.

But not dissolved in wantonness.
(II. 270-3)

Political expediency made it essential that Jonson should offer the prince a delightful vista – immediately, in the courtly dances that followed the speeches, as well as a happy life in the prolonged future. However, the masque could also be used to teach both the prince and the court the value of virtue and hard work, and the last speech appears to emphasize moral endeavour:

There, there is Virtue's seat,
Strive to keep her your own;
'Tis only she can make you great,
Though place here make you known.

(II. 304–7)

Although the masque is a highly mannered court entertainment, Jonson's educative agenda and his use of the classics draw us back to the tenets of humanism mentioned briefly at the beginning of this section.

The contribution of humanism to a greater awareness of classical literature cannot be questioned, but this was not its only contribution to Renaissance culture. The central force of humanism, from the Platonist versions of the fifteenth-century Italians Ficino and Pico della Mirandola to the evangelical Christian interpretations of ▷ More and ▷ Erasmus, was the essential dignity of mankind. The key text was Pico's Oration on the Dignity of Man (1486), where he asserts that men are capable of self-determination, being able to choose freely between good and evil. In the Oration, Pico composes a speech given by God to man:

You shall fix the limits of your own nature according to the free choice in whose power I have placed you. We have made you neither mortal nor immortal, so that with freedom and honour you should be your own sculptor and maker, to fashion your form as you choose.

Within Christian humanism this emphasis upon self-determination was to lead finally to Erasmus' rejection of the > Lutheran theory of grace in his work On Free Will (1524), where he asserts that man is capable of choosing moral virtue for himself.

During the discussion of humanism I have consistently used the word 'man' or the masculine pronoun, when I could have reworked the phraseology into 'woman and man' or 'she and he'. However, while the humanists professed a belief in the importance of educating women to the same standard as men (in theory in Erasmus' The Abbot and the Learned Woman (1516) and in practice in the programme of studies in the More household), they were far from advocating sexual equality. Although it is essential to consider the impact of humanism upon both genders, it is at the same time important not to imbue fifteenth-century philosophers with late twentieth-century notions of political correctness. Moreover, the humanist focus upon the individual's ability to choose freely did not remain closeted within a philosophical, or even a religious, discourse. The construction of individual identity may be seen as basic to further aspects of Renaissance culture.

Ш

The Renaissance subject: symbolism to individualism

The relationship of the individual to his of her world underwent a radical change in the Renaissance. Seemingly, in every area of human existence there was a shift of perspective. No longer was the world linear and hierarchical, arranged neatly along the ascending rungs of a ladder, but sliced through in a horizontal cross-sectioning, allowing each component part an unprecedented degree of attention and autonomy. While the humanists focused upon the individual's spirit and intellect, parallel developments occurred in other areas: increased urbanization and freedom of the market allowed greater logistical and class mobility, and the discovery of the New World and the recognition of the earth's place in the solar system demanded that traditional religious theories about man's development be questioned. Perhaps the impact of this changing self-image may best be seen in the differences between medieval and Renaissance works of art. After all, as architecture has heralded the late twentieth-century discourse of post-modernism, so fine art appears to have encapsulated the vanguard of the Renaissance.

In medieval paintings figures are depicted in exact relation to their symbolic significance; so, in The Wilton Diptych (c 1400 at the National Gallery in London), for example, ▷ Richard II, as a worldly monarch, is smaller and less sumptuously arrayed than the holy figures of Saint John the Baptist, Saint Edward the Confessor and Saint Edmund who accompany him. In addition, the diptych's background makes no gesture towards naturalism; instead, its gold pattern confirms the wealth of its royal commissioner. Compare this ornate emblematic style with the meticulous secularization of ▷ Hans Holbein's pen-and-ink sketch of the More family (1527, at the Öffentliche Kunstsammlung in Basel). Here the figures are drawn in proportion to one another; their material positioning is of more importance than their relative status. Although the male heads of the household still sit centre-stage and the women stand or kneel about them, suggesting conventional gender hierarchies, these stances are simultaneously challenged by the varying gazes, foregroundings and exchanges of the family group. As Catherine Belsev writes in her article on the Holbein drawing:

There begins to be ... an alternative meaning for the family in the sixteenth century ... The home comes to be seen as a self-contained unit, a little world of retreat from the conflict of the market-place, and at the same time a seminary of good subjects, where the wife enters into partnership with her husband in the inculcation of love, courtesy and virtue in their children.

(Disrupting Sexual Difference, 1985)

Holbein's sketch represents the More family as a self-contained unit caught during one brief moment of activity, their books scattered upon the floor and the candle still alight upon the window-ledge. Each component of the work is given equal artistic care and imaginative value: who can judge between the delicate, inquisitive stare of Anne Cresacre and the solid triangular form of > Margaret Roper?

Literary discourses echoed those of fine art. In drama the symbolic figures of the virtues and vices were replaced by the lively secularized types of the > citizen comedies. Although the eponymous protagonist in Jonson's > Volpone clearly represents the cunning fox whose greed and megalomania ultimately lead to his downfall, the audience is encouraged to admire the dexterity with which he plays upon characters who themselves can hardly be said to exemplify moral virtue. We respond automatically when Volpone begs for our approval at the end of the play:

Now, though the Fox be punished by the laws, He yet doth hope there is no suffring due For any fact which he hath done 'gainst you, If there be, censure him; here he doubtful stands. If not, fare jovially, and clap your hands.

(V. vii, 153-7)

The 'laws' may exact a moral and secular punishment upon Volpone, but the audience redeems him with their applause, forgiving and condoning a contravention of didactic virtue because of the pleasure awarded them. The public theatre with its fee-paying audience enabled the dramatists to evade the necessity of pleasing a single patron, whether noble or clerical. Instead, they foregrounded the concerns of other classes, challenged the validity of the law, questioned the absolutes of established religion and subverted conventional gender roles. Examples of these may be seen, firstly in Arden of Faversham where the central characters are the burgher Thomas Arden and his wife, Alice. Secondly, in the mode of revenge tragedy which allowed for the enactment of personal vengeance against the tenets of society and the church when both failed to see justice done. Finally, at the end of Shakespeare's comedy \triangleright As You Like It, where the boy-actor playing Rosalind provokes homoerotic phobias when he/she offers to kiss the men in the audience:

If I were a woman I would kiss as many of you as had beards that pleas'd me, complexions that lik'd me, and breaths that I defied not; and, I am sure, as many as have good beards, or good faces, or sweet breaths, will, for my kind offer, when I make curtsy, bid me farewell.

(Epilogue)

The dynamic and vivid upsurgence of individualism, of a challenge to the dominant spiritual and secular ideologies, cannot but make the Renaissance appear like the paintings of Bruegel or Bosch, at once lively, comic, carnivalesque, grotesque and tortured.

Yet surely these elements of excess contradict the 'Renaissance' of classical rebirth discussed in Section II? A possible way of relating these opposite forces is provided by the theoretician > Mikhail Bakhtin, who explained how the Renaissance both welcomed classical aesthetics and retained the bodily allegiances of the medieval period:

The new historic sense that penetrates them gives these images a new meaning but keeps intact their traditional contents: copulation, pregnancy, birth, growth, old age, disintegration, dismemberment . . . they are contrary to the classic images of the finished, completed man, cleansed, as it were, of all the scoriae of birth and development.

(Rabelais and His World, 1965)

It is important to recognize that beliefs as disparate as classical idealism and grotesque superfluity – Michelangelo's David and Bosch's demons – could, and did, coexist in a perpetual dialogue with one another. But the nature of these uneasy relationships, these disquieting dialogues, needs to be examined more closely.

IV

The prince and the courtier: power and patronage

The previous two sections have identified several interconnecting and sometimes contradictory discourses. However, in combination they open up a further line of debate, in that both humanist learning and the growth of individualism would seem to eradicate the feudal class structures of the medieval period. Yet the Renaissance was not a period of democratic liberty or of a utopian classless society. Indeed, its autocratic princes demanded absolute authority, punishing transgressions with death, rather then responding with enlightened understanding. A case in point is Sir Thomas More, the philosopher discussed earlier. More might have been one of the leading exponents of humanism, but that did not prevent Henry VIII from executing him because he would not recognize the king's divorce from his first wife, Katharine of Aragon, nor acknowledge the Act of Supremacy. Nevertheless, while the relationships between a Renaissance ruler and his noble servants could undoubtedly be fraught, their mutual dependency cannot be denied. These negotiations between governor and governed are the focus of two influential Renaissance texts, > Machiavelli's The Prince (1513), and > Castiglione's The Courtier (1528).

The Prince is simply one of Machiavelli's treatises on statecraft, but it best encapsulates the complex notion of an autocratic ruler who simultaneously recognizes his duty to the people. The work was not translated into English until 1640, so that it was the idea of Machiavellian power – diabolical and cunning – which carried sway in England. In \triangleright Marlowe's tragedy \triangleright The Jew of Malta, the Prologue is spoken by Machevill, who counts 'religion but a foolish toy' (l. 14) and states that,

Might first made kings, and laws were then most sure When, like the Draco's, they were writ in blood.

The immense and unconditional power of the monarch is evidenced, with or without tacit criticism, throughout Renaissance literature. Examples range from Spenser's idealized vision of Elizabeth I in The Faerie Queene, to Shakespeare's treatment of corrupt rule and deposed monarchy in \triangleright Richard II, with whose eponymous protagonist the queen is said to have identified:

So her Majestie fell upon the reign of King Richard II, saying, 'I am Richard II, know ye not that?'

(William Lambarde, Memorandum, 1601)

Of all the English Renaissance monarchs, perhaps it was Elizabeth who most appreciated the fine line of conditional autocracy along which she must practise a skilful tracery. The queen's 'Golden Speech' to Parliament in 1601, when she repealed several unpopular monopolies, is remarkable for the way in which it reminds her subjects of a prince's God-given authority, while at the same time stressing their influence over her decisions:

For myself, I was never so much enticed with the name of a King or royal authority of a Queen, as delighted that God hath made me His instrument to maintain His truth and glory, and to defend this Kingdom (as I said) from peril, dishonour, tyranny, and oppression.

There will never Queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country, care for my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety, than myself. For it is my desire to live nor reign no longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had nor shall have any that will be more careful and loving.

(Elizabeth I in Women Writers of the Renaissance and Reformation, Power for Elizabeth is clearly the monarch's by right, but is exercised only with the compliance of his or her populace.

The negotiation of political power was similarly recognized by the Renaissance subject. In his book of instruction on the behaviour of the ideal nobleman and -woman, Castiglione writes that, the aim of the perfect Courtier . . . is so to win for himself, by the means of the accomplishments ascribed to him by these gentlemen, the favour and mind of the prince whom he serves that he may be able to tell him the truth about everything he needs to know, without fear or risk of displeasing him; and that when he sees the mind of his prince inclined to a wrong action, he may dare to oppose him and in a gentle manner avail himself of the favour acquired by his good accomplishments, so as to dissuade him of every evil intent and bring him to the path of virtue.

(The Courtier, Book Four, 5.)

Writers, like courtiers, often depended upon patronage, and they were called upon to create pleasure for their wealthy patrons, even as they attempted to inculcate certain moral lessons in them. As in Ben Jonson's masque discussed at the beginning of section II, the bitter pill of didacticism had to be sugar-coated with flattery. A mutual relationship existed, but it was hardly even-handed.

The age of gold

The gilded self-fashioning of the Renaissance monarch and the glorious swirl of centrifugal power in the Renaissance court cannot be better exemplified than in the meeting of Henry VIII and King Francis I of France at the > Field of Cloth of Gold in 1520. The sobriquet derived from the lavish decoration and ornamentation on the 'field' of chivalric combat, where the two kings jousted with the flower of English and French knighthood. The display was an affirmation of royal identity, a statement of personal worth, and above all, a powerful assertion of wealth. The acquisition, show and even attempted manufacture of gold provide the final glittering accoutrement of Renaissance culture. It may be seen in the neo-Platonic aspects of alchemy, in the carnivalesque power of the market-place, and in the political displays of princes and courtiers alike. Morever, it was gold that provoked the fiercest racial confrontations, from the stereotyping of Jews to the bloody massacres in the New World. Colonization was as much the product of economic enterprise as it was of the desire for discovery or of the need for glorification.

Shakespeare's play > The Merchant of Venice is a comedy, a romantic play with marriage at its conclusion, but the idealized action takes place in the > pastoral world of Belmont, while the remainder occurs in the city of Venice. The choice of setting was not random. Renaissance Venice was the market-place of the western world; its rich beauty, cosmopolitan splendour and naval superiority gave it a pre-eminence. At the hub of the mercantile republic stood the Rialto bridge; here, under the great wall map depicting Venice's major trading routes, the merchants sold goods and bought shares, Europe's busiest money market did business, and the government carefully guarded national interests. When Shylock cites Antonio's business ventures, his words evoke a goal for London's own mercantile classes:

he hath an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indes; I understand moreover upon the Rialto, he hath a third at Mexico, a fourth for England.

(I. iii, 16-18)

England was increasingly a nation dependent upon its seaborne trade and the strength of its navy, and Elizabeth's rule encouraged an international economic expansionism similar to that of the governorship of the Doge in Venice. Investments in foreign trade to Africa, the East and the New World were central to both the Venetian and English economies, and it is especially significant that in Shylock's speech the only European country given equal weight with Venice is England. But the play also allows Antonio's diverse investments to introduce a threatening aspect to the narrative, since when his ships fail to return to port, his life becomes forfeit to Shylock, the moneylender. Indeed, although Antonio's ventures ultimately prove successful, it is through no action of his but by a 'strange accident' which he is not allowed to know about (V. i. 273-8). Thus the play interacts with the dominant social valuation of economic growth to reveal both its successes and its moral inadequacies. After all, it is Shylock's equal estimation of his ducats and his daughter that is condemned most strongly in the play. But Shakespeare also propels the audience into a confrontation with racial stereotypes – the wicked Iew – that slides in easily alongside the play's questioning of nationalist expansionism. Gold, race and colonialism reverberate through the play without any satisfying outcome, their interactions with audience expectations as mutable as the earlier dialogues between classical rebirth and individualistic regeneration, and between the creation of an independent subject and the autocratic power of a prince.

VI

Conclusion

There are several ways of re-envisaging these Renaissance power relationships. It is possible to perceive the dominant political and religious groups as exerting absolute control, with any possible challenges being seen as futile and puny in comparison with the overwhelming might of the monarchy and the Church. Here we could cite the insurmountable feudal traditions facing humanism. Alternatively, we could stress the radical changes that did occur during the Renaissance: more women were educated and more published books than in the medieval period. We could, however, follow the new historicist trend, which portrays the radical subversion of some texts as ultimately contained and suppressed by official bodies. As Jonathan Dollimore writes:

Subversiveness may for example be apparent only, the dominant order not only containing it but, paradoxical as it may seem, actually producing it for its own ends.

(Political Shakespeare, Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfield, 1985)

What Dollimore suggests is that authority needs some form of challenge so that it may assert itself and thus retain its sense of an empowered identity. Thus the courtier's never-ending and always-failing attempts to curb the prince's power might be exactly what the monarchy requires to sustain itself. Elizabeth I's magnanimity was called into existence mainly because of her necessary response to Parliament's questioning of her absolute power. Or we could return to Bakhtin's notion of a perpetual dialogue, each discourse interacting with others, so that literature is affected by social forces as well as empowered to change that which it condemns. In The Merchant of Venice Shakespeare mirrors a nationalistic desire for mercantile wealth, while at the same time offering the audience an altered self-image in which gold is seen as less valuable than lead. Each interpretation may be substantiated textually and critically, leaving the reader with a sense of transience and mutability; relationships shift in perpetuity, at one minute offering harmonious homogeneity, at another radical marginality. It seems, then, that names may not be distilled to essence as easily as Juliet would wish.

This essay began with a conventional Shakespearean heroine. To conclude, I shall turn to his most unconventional female character – Katharina in > The Taming of the Shrew. The narrative and theme of this play turn upon the power relationship between men and women, more explicitly, between Katharina and Petruchio. During the 'taming' of his independent wife, Petruchio insists that she voluntarily accept his erroneous naming of the sun and moon. He does this to confirm overwhelmingly Katharina's total submission to his will. She responds with the tired resignation of the oppressed. Or does she?

Petruchio. Nay then you lie, it is the blessed sun.
Katharina. Then God be blessed, it is the blessed sun.
But sun it is not, when you say it is not,
And the moon changes even as your mind.
What you will have it named, even that it is,
And so it shall be so for Katharine.

(IV. v, 18–22)

Meaning appears to be controlled by the dominant party, in this case a husband, but any of the social and religious leaders already established as conventional in this essay could easily be substituted for Petruchio. Katharina's submission to the necessity of changing meaning according to the demands of hierarchy – 'what you will have it named, even that it is' – directly refutes Juliet's innocent 'What's in a name?' Therefore, determining a meaning for the 'Renaissance' becomes a question of locating the various powerful discourses that lay claim to the definition. Classicism, humanism, autonomy, patronage, monarchy, wealth and colonization each file their petitions of ownership, engaging in an unceasing bargaining process about meaning.

But is Katharina totally submissive? When she responds to Petruchio's continual metamorphoses of meaning she appears to agree that the moon will become the sun whenever he so decides: 'And the moon changes even as your mind'. Yet she too has learnt to exploit verbal ambiguity, and with more subtlety than her husband, for this same line also suggests that Petruchio's mind is as inconstant as the moon, in other words, that he is mad – a lunatic. Katharina ceases to be an object upon whom meaning is imposed; instead she is presented as an independent subject, quite capable of making meaning for herself. So, when searching for the meaning of a 'rose', the 'Renaissance' or of any sign or text, simply recall how Katharina tamed Petruchio – remember that while meaning may appear to be already established and unchallengeable, it is in fact open to perpetual reinterpretation.

Reading Renaissance poetry

Jonathan Sawday

The concealed poet

Is not this excuse for mere contraries

Equally strong? Cannot both sides say so?

That thou mayest rightly obey power, her bounds know;

Those passed her nature and name is changed; to be

Then humble to her is idolatry.

As streams are, power is:

(> John Donne, Satire 3, 98-103)

We might begin this discussion of ➤ Renaissance poetry with an account of poetry as secrecy. In 1589, ➤ George Puttenham published The Arte of English Poesie, a work that was to have considerable influence on Renaissance writers. When, in Book III of this theoretical treatise, Puttenham came to consider 'Ornament' in language, the ornaments which decorate his own prose are metaphors of secrecy and duplicity. Figurative language, in this account, is inseparably caught up in a web of deceit and (to use Puttenham's word) 'doubleness'. So, the writer is:

... occupied of purpose to deceive the ear and also the mind, drawing it from plainness and simplicity to a certain doubleness, whereby our talk is the more guileful and abusing ...

(III. ch. VII)

For Puttenham, such doubleness lay at the heart of the courtly aesthetic, and it is not difficult to understand how this awareness of poetic language as a concealing device could have a certain political efficacy. Puttenham continues:

And ye shall know that we dissemble, I mean speak otherwise than we think, in earnest as well as in sport, under covert and dark terms and in learned and apparent speeches, in short sentences and by long ambage and circumstance of words, and finally as well when we lie as when we tell the truth. To be short every speech wrested from his own natural signification to another not altogether so natural is a kind of dissimulation, because the words bear contrary countenance to the intent.

(III. ch. XVIII)

What Puttenham has observed here is crucial to our understanding of Renaissance writing. In trying to isolate the function of poetic language (an attempt whose result is not dissimilar to the discovery of 'defamiliarization' by the Russian > formalist critics of the early twentieth century), he has focused attention not simply on the latent 'ambiguity' of all linguistic transactions but also on the struggle which takes place in all discourse. That struggle he expresses through a series of oppositions: speaking/thinking, serious/unserious, dark/apparent, lies/truths.

In reading Renaissance texts, this sense of doubleness, this possibility of concealment, and this understanding of poetic discourse as encompassing contradiction and struggle must be kept in mind. For > Thomas Wyatt, courtier and diplomatic servant of > Henry VIII, doubleness is itself a theme of his writing. 'What 'vaileth truth?' he asks in one of his poems, concluding:

True meaning heart is had in disdain.

Against deceit and doubleness

What 'vaileth truth'

The opposition between truth and deceit here has implications for meaning itself. Wherein can 'meaning' lie if, as Puttenham was to observe some fifty years later, we 'speak otherwise than we think'? 'Meaning', too, becomes of significance in dealing with another of Puttenham's oppositions, that between what is 'dark' or concealed, and what is 'apparent' or open to interpretation. Wyatt's poem 'My galley charged with forgetfulness', itself a version of an earlier poem by Petrarch - 'Passa la nave mia colma d'obblio' (Rime CLXXXIX) - displays the problem for us:

My galley charged with forgetfulness
Thorough sharp seas in winter nights doth pass
'Tween rock and rock, and eke mine enemy alas,
That is my lord, steereth with cruelness,
And every oar a thought in readiness,
As though that death were light in such a case.
An endless wind doth tear the sail apace,
Of forced sighs and trusty fearfulness;
A rain of tears, a cloud of dark disdain
Hath done the wearied cords great hinderance,
Wreathed with error, and eke with ignorance.
The stars be hid that led me to this pain,
Drowned is reason that should me comfort,
And I remain despairing of the port.

(XXVIII)

Richard Tottel, the editor of the anthology in which this poem first appeared in published form in 1557, was in no doubt as to the meaning of the sonnet. 'The lover', he headed the poem, 'compareth his state to a shippe in perilous storme tossed on the sea' (> Tottel's Miscellany, sig. E3). Tottel is reminding the poem's sixteenth-century readers of the tradition of love poetry, stemming from Petrarch, which employs a conventional pattern of metaphors, images and formal metrical and rhythmical devices. Wyatt (together with > Surrey, as has been often noted) was instrumental in importing these conventions into English verse. So, the storm-tossed lover might appear as a familiar figure to the Renaissance reader (see, for example, > Edmund Spenser's > Amoretti 63, 'After long stormes and tempests' sad assay'). We might compare Wyatt's sonnet to the 'original' (though the very question of originality is a concept to which we shall have to return):

My ship full of forgetful cargo sails
Through rough seas at the midnight of a winter
Between Charybdis and the Scylla reef,
My master, no, my foe, is at the helm;

At each oar sits a quick and insane thought

That seems to scorn the storm and what it brings...

(trans. Mark Musa)

Who are Petrarch's 'master' and Wyatt's 'lord'? The god of love, perhaps, and thus the enemy of reason. Yet, in Wyatt's version of the poem the character of this figure undergoes significant alterations. Where Petrarch suggests a certain unsureness as to the true nature of the helmsman ('My master, no, my foe'), Wyatt is unequivocal: at the helm is 'my enemy, alas,' who, inevitably, is also 'my lord'. And where, in Petrarch, the image was that of a blind and unreasoning steersman, rushing the ship headlong through the storm, in Wyatt he is possessed of intent – steering 'with cruelness'.

Reading Wyatt's sonnet against Petrarch's 'original' (as opposed to reading it in the way in which Richard Tottel asked his sixteenth-century contemporaries to read it), we begin to sense that all is not quite as it appears. Once the 'code' located within conventional Petrarchan imagery has been identified, we might still feel that there is more than simply a generalized meditation on the pangs of despised love at work in the poem. At this point we might move away entirely from Petrarch and the overt conventions of sixteenth-century love poetry, to read the sonnet for what it might also be – a profoundly disturbing meditation, not on love, but on the very nature of existence within the > Tudor polity. Wyatt, a diplomat, a justice of the peace, marshal of Calais, ambassador to Spain and to France, M.P. for Kent, and vice-admiral of the Fleet, would appear to represent (and to have gained) all that was most glittering in the establishment of the society in which he found himself. Yet, at the head of that society was a monarch – Henry VIII – with whom conversation, in Stephen Greenblatt's memorable phrase, 'must have been like small talk with Stalin' (Renaissance Self-Fashioning, 1980).

The other side of Wyatt's double existence (and the double existence of so many Renaissance writers) is what is represented in his > sonnet 'My galley charged with forgetfulness'. That side – which involved, for Wyatt, imprisonment in 1534, further imprisonment and release on parole in 1536, the execution of his patron, > Thomas Cromwell, in July 1540, and a final period of imprisonment in the Tower in 1541 – is one that might be drawn from any twentieth-century catalogue of existence under the conditions of absolute power. It is the realization of this existence which sends us back to the sonnet and to those key phrases – 'forgetfulness', 'mine enemy . . my lord', 'cruelness', 'a thought in readiness', 'trusty fearfulness', 'wreathed with error', 'drowned is reason' – with a rather different sense of what this text may encode, and with an understanding, too, of the sonnet's ambiguous air of the sinister. To recall Puttenham again, we are in the presence of a text which possesses a certain 'doubleness'.

From writing to interpretation

For the poets of the \triangleright Elizabethan and early \triangleright Jacobean period, the contradictions involved in manoeuvring between the 'dark' and the 'apparent' produced, in turn, an awareness that the act of writing could itself be worth writing about. This self-conscious awareness of the writing process (which can be uncovered in the later parts of Petrarch's Rime) is the opening theme of \triangleright Sir Philip Sidney's \triangleright Astrophil and Stella (1591), and it was the status of writing, and the relationship within writing between meaning and truth, which was to fascinate the sonnet writers of the 1590s - > Samuel Daniel, > Michael Drayton, Edmund Spenser, > Thomas Lodge and > Shakespeare (to name but a very few). For Astrophil, in Sidney's sequence, the task is to uncover 'fit words' (I. 5) to 'entertaine' his female reader. But where are these words to be found? And once located, what process gives them utterance?

Thus great with child to speak, and helplesse in my throwes, Biting my trewand pen, beating my self for spite,
'Foole' said my Muse to me, 'looke in thy heart and write.'

This comic self-presentation of the poet conceals an important Renaissance theoretical problem associated with the act of writing. Sidney, here, abandons the conventional notion of male authorship 'begetting' his works upon the world (and we might recall the 'onlie begetter' of Shakespeare's sonnets here). Instead, writing is, once more, a struggle – a painful delivery rendering the author paradoxically helpless. At the same time, writing is a process by which that which was hidden within becomes manifest. and hence it entails an inward scrutiny, promoted by a voice ('my Muse') whose origin is also located within the writing self of the poet. But this inner search should not be understood as a quest for originality in the modern sense. What is at stake here is the Renaissance concept of > 'imitation', 'Imitation', as it was understood by the Renaissance writer, did not entail mere copying, but an assimilation of other voices into the unique voice of the individual poet. Writing, as ▶ Erasmus claimed in the Ciceronianus (1527), is therefore not an isolated utterance, but it is the product of other discourses, jostling in the mind. For the poet, working amidst these competing voices, the problem becomes one of establishing a position from which to speak, as Shakespeare's dramatic denial of other poetic voices in his sonnet 130, 'My mistress' eves are nothing like the sun', evidences. Here, a series of Petrarchan motifs are summoned up, only to be dismissed as not answering to the reality of the woman he addresses. The paradox is, of course, that the very gesture of denial serves to evoke the competing voices of those other poetic discourses.

If writing is a proposition which involves the poet in a search for an authority with which to speak, what of reading? To the modern reader, what may be striking about Renaissance poetry is its determination both to create the reader and to control his or her response to what is read. We might understand this desire to forestall the reader's licence to interpret (for this is what it amounts to) as being a manifestation of a literary culture which is at once enclosed (in a social sense) and also profoundly anxious as to the results of unlicensed interpretive power. The freedom to interpret, as Elizabeth's > Protestant divines were never tired of pointing out, could have unfortunate results. Protestant culture may, on the one hand, have championed the right to interpret scriptural texts when that interpretation seemed to support Protestant beliefs against the perceived threat of > Roman Catholic > Counter-Reformation, but that did not mean that the right to interpret should be invested in each and every reader. The > Thirty-nine Articles, passed under Elizabeth at the Convocation of 1562, might be thought of, within this context, as an attempt at controlling the interpretation of key doctrinal issues. What the articles set out to establish was 'consent touching true religion' and the 'avoiding of diversities of opinions'. Their end, in other words, was to create a homogeneous reader.

Interpretation was understood as involving the assumption of power over the text and the experience inscribed within that text. Is this, then, the key to understanding the Renaissance poet's constant anxiety as to the way in which his secular verse is to be understood? Are the Stellas, Delias, Dianas, Licias, Zephiras, Fidessas and Chlorises (the antique names of imagined or real readers to whom sonnet collections are addressed and whose names are inscribed in their titles) fierce interpretive presences before whom, in true Petrarchan style, the poet-writer trembled? Indeed they are. But herein lies another paradox of Renaissance writing. In > lyric poetry in particular, the relationship between the writer and the reader is above all sexual. But this sexual connection, though it involves (as we might expect) an active male author confronting a female reader (as the titles to countless sonnet sequences announce). does not position the female reader in a necessarily passive role, since she is not only a reader but an interpreter. As an interpreter she may be threatened, cajoled, persuaded, but never ignored. We can thus understand the female figure, within the dominant masculine codes of Renaissance writing, as one in whom there is invested a network of competing claims and counter-claims. She is the mainspring of the poet's invention, the object of sexual desire, the prize, the besieged fort, the source of religious or quasi-religious consolation or agony, and, most important of all, the reader and interpreter of his verses. So. Stella, in Sidney's Astrophil and Stella, is not only the object of Astrophil's verse (whilst his own sufferings and triumphs are the subject), she is also the final reader and interpreter of the verses laid before her. In Spenser's Amoretti (1505), the sequence of sonnets opens with an invocation of the reading-presence of his mistress, who is the final interpreter of what is to follow: 'Leaves, lines and rymes, seeke her to please alone, whom if ye please I care for other none' (I. 13-14).

'Politique Devotion'

It would be simple to dismiss this presence of the female reader as no more than a conventional trope of praise – a means of ensuring that the elaborate fiction of the intimacy of the lover's adoration of the beloved is sustained. Thus, the argument would continue, the true object of the sonnet-writer's fascination is himself, and the female subject is evoked only in order that she be marginalized. But to dismiss the importance attached to interpretation on the part of Renaissance poets is not only to dismiss the serious implications of interpretive power discerned by Elizabethan writers in general, but also to ignore the presence of the most important female interpreter of all – that of the queen herself.

It is almost impossible to over-estimate the awareness of late sixteenth-century poets of the abiding presence of the queen. The queen as head of state, head of the Church and ultimate source of patronage is a figure of real, not merely idealized, power. She is, moreover, a dominating presence in all forms of literary and artistic culture of the period. As such she is a protean figure, paradoxically subject herself to the transforming power of the very verses which sought to confirm her central position in the political hierarchy. But it is in the figure of the queen that the complete identification of aesthetic forms with political power is manifested. Her very name becomes an emblem of power, even whilst it is transformed, literally, through the devices of art:

E urope, the Earthes sweete Paradise:

L et all thy Kings that would be wise,

I n Politique Devotion:

S ail hither to observe her eyes,

A nd marke her heavenly motion.

B rave Princes of this civill Age,

E nter into this pilgrimage:

T his Saints tongue is an oracle,

H er eye hath made a Prince a Page,

A nd workes each day a Miracle.

R aise but your lookes to her, and see

E ven the true beames of Majestie,

G reat Princes, marke her duly;

I fall the world you do survey,

N o forehead spreades so bright a Ray,

A nd notes a Prince so truly.

These acrostic verses, written by \triangleright Sir John Davies and entitled 'To all the princes of Europe', form part of a sequence entitled Hymns of Astraea, published in 1599. Elizabeth is addressed as the goddess Astraea, a title bestowed upon her not only by Davies, but by other poets including Spenser and \triangleright George Peele. Astraea, associated with spring and with justice, is, in \triangleright Ovid's Metamorphoses (an important source of poetic mythologizing in the period), a symbol of the former \triangleright Golden Age when justice and prosperity ruled on earth, whilst in \triangleright Virgil she is associated with a future Golden Age. The Golden Ages of the future and of the past thus meet in the figure of Elizabeth in the present.

To say of these verses that they are sycophantic or contrived is to miss the fundamental connection between art and political power which the poets and the queen herself sought to preserve. We might take Davies' poem as itself emblematic of the queen's presence within art. Her name and title function as the springboard for the poet - the place from which the lines themselves originate. Through her name, she is embedded within the poem -a poem which sets out to admire her, as Davies puts it, with 'Politique Devotion'. Devotional politics, indeed, are precisely what the poem produces. But the poem memorializes the queen in more than one role. Passively, she is the object of pilgrimage and devotion, moving as does the constellation Virgo (an alternative, and of course immediately appropriate name for Elizabeth/Astraea) above and beyond the earth. As an object she is, within the poem's structure of images and language, the recipient and bestower of glances and gazings. Her eyes, in a Petrarchan conceit, must be observed, her motion marked, looks raised to her. But her own glances have within them political force, and the Petrarchan conceit is itself transformed in a movement of appreciation of political reality: 'Her eve hath made a Prince a Page'.

For Sir John Davies, lawyer and aspiring politician, later (in 1603) solicitor-general to Ireland, the conjunction between the forms of art and the realities of political power meet in the multiple personae of the queen. Similarly, for the contemporaries of Davies, and as Elizabeth's reign drew to its close, the queen's continuing presence becomes itself the subject of ever-more elaborate poetic and artistic device. In > Sir Walter Ralegh's poem of devotion 'The Book of the Ocean to Cynthia' (or 'The Ocean's Love to Cynthia'), a text of which only a fragment exists in manuscript form, the queen is Cynthia/Diana, goddess of the moon, hunting and chastity, whilst the poet is the ocean, subject to the moon's transforming power, a power which is absolute and, disturbingly, seemingly arbitrary:

She gave, she took, she wounded, she appeased.

('Ocean's Love', ll. 55-6)

What can we conclude from this assimilation within art of the realities of power? Reading the poetry of the late sixteenth century, we realize that at the very heart of the literary culture of the period lies the pervasive belief that art and the state must conspire together to affirm a vision of national identity. That it is a vision and not a reality is exemplified by the very urgency with which Renaissance writers pressed home the point that the country was a united whole. Late Elizabethan culture, rather than appearing 'monumental' (as it has been described) or as the product of a realized sense of national selfhood, begins to appear as a rather more anxious moment of history. That pressing need for unity - whether it be unity of religion, of social practices, of cultural forms, of political expression, or of interpretation (all of these being linked in any case) - like all such calls of national unity, indicates the awareness of what is potentially disuniting and positively disruptive. Within this context the 'monuments' of Renaissance culture, the poets of the late sixteenth century, begin to appear not only as poets but, at one and the same time, as ideologues of the first order. Their function was not only to adorn or beautify, but to affirm (sometimes, one feels, for the benefit of Elizabeth as well as her subjects) that the hierarchy was an established reality.

Nowhere is this awareness of the poetic text's power to sanction or authorize a sense of national selfhood more apparent than in what may appear, from the outside, to be the most monumental text of them all – Spenser's > The Faerie Queene. Indeed, it is as a monument that the poem is approached in the first instance. On the dedicatory page of the 1596 edition of the poem appears this inscriptive address:

TO THE MOST HIGH. MIGHTIE and MAGNIFICENT EMPRESSE, RENOW-MED FOR PIETIE, VER-TUE. AND ALL GRATIOUS GOVERNMENT ELIZABETH BY THE GRACE OF GOD QUEENE OF ENGLAND FRAUNCE AND IRELAND AND OF VIRGI-NIA. DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. HER MOST HUMBLE SERVAVNT EDMUND SPENSER DOTH IN ALL HU-MILITIE DEDI CATE. PRE-SENT AND CONSECRATE THESE HIS LABOURS TO LIVE WITH THE ETERNI-TIE OF HER

FAME

The queen and her titles are inscribed (together with the poet's name) in the form of a memorial urn whose function is to preserve and consecrate the text which is to follow. The queen's titles, held under God (the teaching of whose works she sanctions as head of His Church in her realm), are titles of monarchy over three nations, and sovereignty over a new entity – the colony of Virginia. The poem that follows (and which will also serve to memorialize the queen and the nation, the two being, once more, inseparable) is thus approached through an elaborate token of royal power.

The Faerie Queene is, however, not only a monument to Elizabeth, but a legendary history of the nation over which she governs. It is important, here, to be fully aware of the circumstances of its composition. When Spenser embarked upon the poem (some time prior to October 1579), he was shortly to gain the position of private secretary to Lord Grey, the newly appointed lord deputy of Ireland. Ireland was to be Spenser's home throughout the period of composition and publication of The Faerie Queene, and it was as a diligent servant to the government in Ireland that Spenser was to fashion his own career

The poem is, therefore, composed not close to the source of political patronage and power, but at the very margins of the Elizabethan polity. To Elizabethan authority, Ireland presented a continuing source of disruption. A Catholic and unruly nation (in the eves of Elizabeth's government), it was not until the Battle of Kinsale (1601), where a combined Irish and Spanish force was defeated by the English under Lord Mountioy, that the Protestant domination of the country was assured. Spenser, whose own colony of English settlers established on confiscated land was destroyed in 'Tyrone's Rebellion' (1508), was an active administrative cog in what is generally agreed to have been a brutalized (and brutalizing) regime. Indeed, Spenser was the author of two important 'policy documents' on Ireland written in the late 1500s. These works are important for what they tell us of the attitude of mind of Spenser and his contemporaries. Informing them is, above all, fear. Fear of the Irish, their alien religion, their customs, their language (which Spenser, though he lived in Ireland for nearly twenty years, never understood), and the threat which they represented to England, determines to a large extent his understanding of the country in which he found himself. They are, in short, documents of colonialism, some of the earliest we possess.

We can perceive this sense of threat, this awareness of an alien alternative to the 'civilizing' culture of the Protestant poet, at work throughout Spenser's text. In the poem we encounter an evocation of a brutal wilderness, a complex psychological state of 'otherness' which it is the task of Spenser's knights to banish from both the fantastic environment through which they move, and, more importantly, from themselves. This fear, or anxiety, which permeates the poem is, it is important to recognize, not simply a fear which can be dispelled through heroic endeavour. It is a fear, rather, of what is uncontrollable within the subject. If we need an analogy in more recent writing, then Joseph Conrad's Mr Kurtz in Heart of Darkness might serve. For Conrad's figure of colonial corruption, isolated from any 'civilized' values, it is the discovery that the darkness and horror lie within which is finally destructive of his own sense of integrated selfhood. So, in similar measure, with Spenser's knights. As they progress on their episodic forays into a world of alien values, their discovery of a struggle taking place within themselves is what the poem dramatizes. When, for example, at the climax of Book II (the legend of Guyon, or temperance), Guvon and his guide enter the 'Bower of Blisse' to confront a world of sensuous and artificial luxury (a world rich in images of frozen sexuality), their iconoclastic endeavour is simply to destroy the representations of sensuality with which they have been confronted. Yet they themselves are not untainted by what they encounter. Kurtz-like, they creep through the undergrowth to witness the strange rites from which they cannot draw their eyes. The object of their voyeuristic gaze is the enchantress Acrasia:

Her snowy brest was bare to readie spoyle

Of hungry eies, which n'ote therewith be fild,
And yet through langour of her late sweet toyle,
Few drops, more clear then Nectar, forth distild,
That like pure Orient perles adowne it trild,
And her faire eyes sweet smyling in delight,
Moystened their fierie beames, with which she thrild
Fraile harts, yet quenched not; like starry light
Which sparckling on the silent waves, does seeme more bright.

(II. xii. 78)

What, and who is Acrasia? Like the queen, she is the object of a male gaze which is fascinated by what it has alighted upon. Unlike the queen (at least overtly) a world of sensual delight is promised. Acrasia, perceived in a moment of sexual passivity, is offered as a dual object of desire. There to be consumed by 'hungry eies', thrilling 'fraile harts', she is also a place of danger and destruction. Just as Ireland, or Virginia, or America itself were represented as female figures in need of mastery, so Acrasia must be captured and her Bower destroyed by the stern masculine (and Protestant) rigour of Spenser's knights.

In externalizing this inward struggle, Spenser's poem is truly a Protestant epic. > Calvinism (the official doctrine of the Church of England under the Elizabethan 'settlement') served to draw attention to the adherent's inner state of mind and promoted a seemingly obsessive curiosity as to the inner health of the individual. But even once this awareness of the poem's Protestant roots has been grasped, we also need to be aware of it as a validating text. The Faerie Queene glances back to other epics (to > Tasso and to Virgil in particular) not out of conservatism, or a desire to emulate what previous cultures had produced, but to authorize the present, Spenser himself, in the course of a letter to Ralegh written in 1580, termed the poem a 'darke conceit' - a text which is both apparent and concealed and which might remind us, once more, of Puttenham – but he also described his own method as being that of 'a poet historical'. Within this context, Spenser's epic can be understood as part of an important Elizabethan project. That project entailed nothing less than the active creation in imaginative culture of the nation state as an understandable entity. Together with later texts such as Samuel Daniel's eight books of The Civil Wars (1609) and Michael Drayton's vast Poly-Olbion (1612-22), Spenser's epic looks back to the past (albeit in Spenser's case a legendary past) to uncover not only 'thinges forepast' but 'thinges to come'. The nation, in other words, must not only have its past created by its poets, but its future mapped out as well.

The deliberate creation of a mythopoeic past was to have enormous influence on the poets who followed Spenser. For one group in particular, the so-called 'Spenserian poets', Spenser's writing served as a model for their own attempts to creat a visionary sense of national and political identity. These writers, who include Michael Drayton, > William Browne and > Phineas Fletcher, discovered in Spenser's writing a readily adaptable means of expressing their own sense of both a mythical past and a wished-for future. The past which these poets created, however, was one governed by the forms and styles exploited by Spenser not only in The Faerie Queene, but in his autobiographical > Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595), and > The Shepherd's Calender (1579). What Renaissance readers uncovered in these poems was a world determined by the conventions, inherited from > classical and continental writers, of > pastoral. It is important to understand that 'pastoral' poetry did not represent simply an idealized retreat into a mythic world of shepherds, shepherdesses and arcadian delight. But it did signal another form of retreat, and one that was predominantly political. The adoption of pastoral personae, the evocation of a vanished 'golden age' became, for the poets of the early seventeenth century, a means of registering their own sense of isolation under the changed conditions of the early Jacobean period. The sense of poetry occupying a central position within the political culture has begun to fragment. Instead, a new kind of poetry begins to emerge – one that we might begin to term 'oppositional'.

Pastoral has been described as an omnipresent metaphor in Renaissance writing rather than a strict genre in its own right. As such it could be endlessly adaptable, but still provide a framework which both the poet and the reader could recognize. For the poets of the seventeenth century (up to and including > John Milton), pastoral forms allowed them a significant freedom. Phineas Fletcher's The Purple Island (written c 1614-15, but published in 1633), for example, indicates the adaptability of pastoral forms. This (to modern eyes) strangely incongruous poem – incongruous since its ostensible subject is the anatomized human body – indicates the uses to which pastoral could be put in the years after the death of Elizabeth and the accession of > James I. Fletcher's twelve-canto poem is narrated by a shepherd-poet named Thirsil. Thirsil's task, to which he had been elected by his fellow-shepherds, is to become their poetic spokesman. But what is to be his subject? What role is now allotted to poetry? What kind of audience must the poet create? The answer to these questions involves Thirsil in a literary search for a subject in what he calls 'these iron daies/(Hard daies)' which 'afford nor matter nor reward' for the poet. On the surface, the theme upon which he alights is profoundly apolitical - six cantos of his poem are spent in celebrating the dissected human body. Yet we should remember Puttenham's distinction between the 'dark' and the 'apparent'. For the human body, in Fletcher's poem, is the setting for war. Just as The Faerie Queene had dramatized the creation of an individual identity within an alien world of uncivilized values, so The Purple Island represents the struggle for the human subject to define itself within a religious and political sphere. The 'Island' of the poem can be understood as the individual (and it thus offers, through allegory, an answer to Donne's famous observation that 'No man is an island', for in Fletcher's alienated world everyone is an island) and, at the same time, the potentially saved island which is Protestant England. We can call this island potentially saved, since the poem's function is to serve as a warning to its readers that a state of continual armed vigilance against the encroaching forces of Catholic Europe has to be maintained. Poetry, in other words, has begun to stand outside the culture of the court, serving a different function - that of warning, rather than endorsing. It is also worth remarking, in this context, that the creation of the myth with which modern British readers are familiar, of Elizabethan culture as a 'golden age' of national unity to which subsequent generations are to look for political and national definition at moments of crisis, began almost before Elizabeth herself was in her grave.

Constructing identities

If national identity is an important theme in the poetry of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, what of individual identity? Here we might remember, once more, the figure of Acrasia from The Faerie Queene, Acrasia represents a dual object of desire promising both sexual delight and an abyss of destruction which culminates in the loss of masculine identity. For Spenser's contemporaries - those poets of the late sixteenth century who have been celebrated for their evocation of erotic love - the figure of Acrasia seems to return, though appropriately, always in different guises. The key to these texts is not their representation of unproblematic human sexual desire, but, rather, the possibility which they uncover of confusing the boundaries of sexual identity. Shakespeare's sonnets, first published in 1600, might come to mind in this context - poems whose fascinated, and playful, confusion of the boundaries of sexual identity have presented a disturbing problem for those critics and readers who prefer a more tidy, and sanitized, national poet. But Shakespeare was not alone in preferring the confusingly playful to the depressingly ordered. Both he and > Christopher Marlowe were to explore the question of sexual identity in the form of the 'brief epic', which, in the late sixteenth century, emerged as a genre in its own right. Shakespeare's > Venus and Adonis (1503), Marlowe's > Hero and Leander (1508), and the now largely unread Scilla's Metamorphosis (1580) by Thomas Lodge are usually cited as representative of this short-lived genre. Informed by the eroticism derived from the understanding of Ovidian poetry, these texts seem constantly to play with the possibility of a duality of identity. In Hero and Leander, the opposition between male and female - expressed in the opening opposition of the two cities which are the homes of the lovers - forms a boundary that it is not only Leander's task to cross, but the text's endeavour to confuse. Thus, Hero is at once the chaste devotee of the rites of Venus, and the tutor of the unskilled Leander. But she is also (and here we might remember Acrasia) both the voyeuristically sought-for object of sexual longing, displayed in a world of sensual (and violent) artifice, and the bestower of glances and gazes charged with erotic power. At the same moment, Leander too becomes the focus of erotic longing – an object of male sexual devotion:

> Some swore he was a maid in man's attire. For in his looks were all that men desire . . .

(I. 83-4)

This sense of confusion, which Shakespeare was to take continual delight in exploiting in the playhouse, is sustained throughout that portion of the poem written by Marlowe. But was a fascination with such sexual identities the sole preserve of the male poet? What of Renaissance women themselves?

We have seen that, in the poetry of the sixteenth century, the female presence can be discerned occupying an interpretive role, and as the focus for a conflicting series of messages based on poets' experiments with language, images and forms inherited from continental models, the most important of whom was Petrarch. But this fluid female presence is largely the creation of male poets. Women as patrons are, of course, familiar figures. Not only the queen, but others such as John Donne's patron ▶ Lucy Russell, Countess of Bedford, and (most famous of them all) > Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke, were celebrated by writers as diverse as Sir Philip Sidney, > Fulke Greville. > Thomas Nashe, Edmund Spenser, > Gabriel Harvey, Samuel Daniel, Michael Drayton, ⊳ John Davies of Hereford and ⊳ Ben Ionson. But the question of women's writing in the Renaissance period has increasingly become a subject of urgent debate. In England, the > humanist endeavour of the early sixteenth century promised women a theoretical access to education, but whether such liberal sentiments affected any but a tiny elite is doubtful. The figure of the woman reading in the Renaissance period is one that is, as we have seen, constantly evoked. The figure of the woman writing is another matter. Elizabeth herself was, of course, a poet and scholar of some distinction. So, too, in the earlier period, was Margaret More Roper. Mary Sidney and her niece > Mary Sidney Wroth (Lady Wroth) wrote not only poetry, but in the case of the latter, the first full-length work of fiction by an Englishwoman. But these were women whose access to the literary culture of the period was based on considerable fortune and political power in its own right. It is not until the turmoil of the revolutionary period of the 1640s and 1650s that a recognizably female presence begins to emerge to challenge the dominant voices of what is, by and large, an exclusively male preserve.

The question 'Did women have a Renaissance?' is an important one in this context. A powerful conclusion to this problem, on the part of contemporary feminist scholarship, is that not only was there no such thing as a 'Renaissance' for women, but that women's status and freedom actually declined in the period we are considering. Rather than looking for a female presence in the writing of the period, it is, with significant exceptions, more accurate to speak of a female absence. Absence, at a point when so much writing by men seems devoted to registering the continual presence of the female, alerts us to a further irony as we move from the period of Spenser into the very different world inhabited by the Jacobean and > Stuart poets of the seventeenth century. No poet could be said to be more alive to the possible presence of the female in his writing than John Donne, but then no poet so determinedly ensures that she remains so absent when compared to the true centre of his poetry – the fascinating object of contemplation that the poet's own self presents:

Thou at this midnight seest mee, and as soone
As that Sunne rises to mee, midnight's noone,
All the world growes transparent, and I see
Through all, both Church and State, in seeing thee;
And I discerne by favour of this light,
My selfe, the hardest object of the sight.

('Obsequies to the Lord Harrington', ll. 25–30)

Thus Donne, in a meditation addressed to the soul of his dead friend (and brother of his patron, Lucy, Countess of Bedford) Thomas Harrington. These lines, though they speak in a different vein from the more familiar voices heard in the \triangleright Songs and Sonnets or the Holy Sonnets, nevertheless alert us to a voice and a theme with which the reader of Donne's writing soon becomes familiar. Donne, at a moment of still quietness, contemplates the departed soul of his friend, and discovers . . . himself. The world and the poet, rendered transparent in the moment of meditation, merge together to present that 'hardest object' before the enquiring gaze of the imagination.

The urge to render things 'transparent', a desire to peer beyond surface representation, together with the triumphant discovery of the dramatic speaking voice in poetry, and the continual awareness of the poetic self as both the subject and object of his writing, combine to make Donne and Donne's poetry almost inseparable. But which Donne do we read? In an age of poetic self-creation. Donne seems to have been continuously alive to the possibility of re-creating versions of himself in his writing. Indeed. Donne's eight surviving portraits suggest an urge to record all of those different variants for the eye of posterity. Dramatically interjecting an image of himself before the reader's gaze, we must also be aware that this poetic Donne is in a state of almost continual flux and fluidity. 'Oh, to vex me, contrarves meet in one' he exclaims in his Holy Sonnet XIX, but the meeting of contraries was hardly a vexing possibility for the poet. In 'A valediction: of my name, in the window' Donne imagines himself to be metonymically reduced to a sign of his absence - his name. scratched in the glass of a window. But even that transparent reminder of Donne can be further reduced - the name itself is no more than a 'ruinous anatomy', waiting to be 'recompacted' at the moment of return to the mistress. In poem after poem, Donne signals his threatened absence from what is happening, imagining himself dead and waiting for dismemberment, or embarked upon a journey which leaves behind both mistress and a unified sense of selfhood, only to remind the reader that this unstable entity is, in its continuous instability, the most constant object in this poetic universe. The multiplicity of 'John Donnes' which first circulated in manuscript for the delight of his contemporaries, and which were, for the most part, first inscribed on the printed page only after his death in 1631 (itself, as > Izaac Walton records, an act of controlled self-presentation) constitute perhaps the most dramatic series of poetically shifting presences of the period.

The language of God

In remarking upon this shifting poetic awareness of a created sense of selfhood, I do not wish to imply that Donne's poetry can somehow be categorized as constantly breaking across a simple binary divide – the 'religious' Donne, for example, and the 'sensual' Donne. Sensual images and language are as much to the fore in his overtly religious poetry as religious images are constantly present in his secular verses. And this was true not only of Donne, but of many of those poets of the seventeenth century who wrote on religious themes. In the writings of ▷ Richard Crashaw, for example, sensuality and eroticism combine to present a religious aesthetic which still possesses the power, within the dominant Protestant culture of Anglo-American criticism, to shock and disturb.

On the surface, Donne's contemporary > George Herbert offers a rather different set of poetic values. Herbert's English poetry, all of which is devoted to religious themes, first appeared in printed form in 1633 (the same year that Donne's poetry was published) in a volume entitled The Temple. Reading Herbert's verses we appear to have left Puttenham's world of 'doubleness', the conjunction between the 'dark' and the 'apparent', behind. Yet has it entirely vanished to be replaced by the light of Baconian reason? Certainly, where in an earlier period the Renaissance poet delighted in uncovering a poetic language based on 'ornament', Herbert offers a manifesto for a different kind of poetry:

Who says that fictions only and false hair Become a verse? Is there in truth no beauty? Is all good structure in a winding stair? May no lines pass, except they do their duty

Not to a true, but a painted chair? ('Jordan I', ll. 1-5)

Fiction, falseness, a 'winding' structure (terms in which the contemporaries of Puttenham would have delighted) are here denied. What is offered as an alternative is 'truth' – a kind of poetry which will specifically transcend the > Platonist distinction between representation and object, figured in the opposition between a 'true' and a 'painted' chair.

Yet, reading the complete collection of poems contained in Herbert's The Temple (a collection which was to be of profound influence on Herbert's immediate contemporaries, especially Crashaw), we encounter an elaborate structure of metaphor and formal experiment. Take, for example, the careful 'patterning' of the collection as a whole. On the title-page of the 1633 edition we read a quotation from Psalms: 'In his temple doth every man speak of his honour', and as we move through the collection we become aware that, in an elaborate architectural conceit, we are indeed placed within a 'temple' where speech – the words of man to God and (more problematically) God to man – is dramatized. But 'speech' is not necessarily open to all. In the opening poem of the collection we read: 'All things are big with jest: nothing thats plain,/But may be wittie, if thou hast the vein' ('Perirrhanterium', ll. 239–40), a statement which not only appears to contradict that poetic manifesto quoted above, but alerts us to a playfully ironic awareness of the resources of interpretation. In other words, beyond the seemingly artless structure of Herbert's verse lies a dense web of poetic device.

However, Herbert's dualistic conception of language – where the seemingly 'plain' may yet conceal the riddlingly 'wittie' – was to echo throughout the later part of the seventeenth century and in contexts which, to modern eyes, seem curiously inappropriate. For example, long after Herbert's collection appeared, ▷ Thomas Hobbes was to argue for a reform of language in all areas of discourse, whilst in the 1660s ▷ the Royal Society was to promote language reform as one of its main objectives. Underpinnning those demands was a belief that it was possible to take control of the words we use, and to uncover the very nature of external reality which (so the argument ran) had been hitherto concealed in the metaphoric (▷ metaphor) labyrinths of poetry. The world, in other words, need no longer be understood as the product of a riddlingly (and fascinatingly) obscure God. Instead, what has been created is a God endowed not only with reason but (unlike Donne's God, and even on occasions, Milton's) reasonableness.

Retreat or engagement?

We do not, however, have to leap so far forward in time to uncover in poetry a desire to escape out of the world of brittle linguistic ornamentation. Ben Jonson, for example, in the celebration of aristocratic comfort which is depicted in his poem in praise of the Sidney family, 'To Penshurst' (published in 1616), calls for an aesthetic which is in direct contrast to that enshrined in the writings of an earlier generation. The house, Penshurst, which is the home of the family his poem celebrates, is not

... built to envious show

Of touch or marble, nor canst boast a row

Of polished pillars, or a roof of gold;

Thou hast no lantern whereof tales are told,

Or stair, or courts; but stand'st an ancient pile, And these grudged at, art reverenced the while.

What is enacted here is just that revolution in taste which Herbert, in a very different context, had called for. And yet, what are the virtues of Penshurst? Essentially they are the virtues of an emergent bourgeois existence. Penshurst is a place of fruitful production, which extends outwards from its walls to embrace the surrounding countryside and its inhabitants. But Penshurst also stands in stark distinction to other houses, and other kinds of social relations, hinted at in the poem as places less benign than that which is contemplated in these verses. At the same time, as the verses quoted indicate, Penshurst represents a different set of aesthetic values. Those values might be characterized as artful without artifice, avoiding of structural complexity, at ease (as the poets of Spenser's generation plainly were not) with the history that surrounds the house and its inhabitants. 'Polished pillars', 'a roof of gold', a 'lantern whereof tales are told', the architectural equivalent, in other words, of the world of ornament and allegory which sixteenth-century poets set out to evoke, has been banished, to be replaced by a house which is 'ancient' in its own right, no longer needing the mythographic enterprises of Elizabethan culture. It is as though the frenzied creation of a past has finally triumphed, and Jonson's house and its inhabitants can relax in a history which has been secured.

Of course, 'To Penshurst' represents an idealized understanding of society and social relations. It is not the case that Jonson has somehow thrown off, in one swift move, the burden of creating identities and histories which Renaissance poets felt. 'To Penshurst' is, in fact, a brilliantly successful deception. It is a performance which manages to unite the present with a past discovered in Jonson's enormous reading and imitation (in the Renaissance sense) of classical literature. As such the poem manages to suggest an assimilated sense of past and present working in harmonious unity. But that Penshurst the place may be unique, and may, in fact, stand in complete isolation from the society in which it seems to rest so securely is hinted at throughout the poem.

At the same time, 'To Penshurst' signalled for the poets who came after Jonson a moment of retreat. Nestling in the idealized Kent countryside, Jonson's creation of a secure bourgeois existence was to serve as a place of pilgrimage for poets who in other respects seem very different to all that Jonson appeared to stand for in the realm of aesthetics. What these poets were retreating from was, of course, the political and ideological fragmentation of the period of the English > Civil War. What they were retreating to (and whether such retreat was, in fact, possible) is open to question. On the surface, the poets of the late 1630s, 1640s and 1650s are searching for Jonson's idyll of Horatian retirement. Thus > Andrew Marvell, a poet of avowedly republican sympathies (at least at certain moments), seeks a retirement from a world that appears to have fallen apart. Only behind the walls of the garden of Nun Appleton (the home of the Fairfax family, celebrated in Marvell's 'Upon Appleton House', composed c 1651) can Marvell discover 'more decent Order tame'. But is this order real, or is it an illusion? Can the world, with all its pressing engagements, in reality be fenced in behind (or outside, depending on your point of view) a garden wall? In Marvell's 'An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland' - a poem which memorializes the return of the lord protector to England in May 1650 after his bloody campaign against the Irish - the restless figure of ⊳ Cromwell is imagined as being urged out of a moment of Horatian retreat into confrontation with political realities. The political reality with which it is Cromwell's task to engage is one in which the state, government, the nexus of social affiliations as a whole, would appear to have broken apart. What Marvell offers in his heroic depiction of Cromwell is an alternative and elemental figure of power – a refashioner not only of kingdoms and states, but of the very structures of thinking. It is an alternative, too (though Marvell could not have known it), to that other elemental image of power offered in the 1650s, the Leviathan of Thomas Hobbes. For Marvell, caught up in the turmoil of post-revolutionary thinking, any retreat into a world of disengagement is fraught with difficulties that cannot be negotiated. So, Marvell's figure of pastoral retreat – Damon the Mower – encounters in the fields not an idyll of rural innocence, but his own downfall:

While thus he threw his Elbow round,
Depopulating all the Ground,
And with his whistling Sythe, does cut
Each stroke between the Earth and Root,
The edged Stele by careless chance
Did into his own Ankle glance;
And there among the Grass fell down,
By his own sythe, the Mower mown.

('Damon the Mower', 11. 73–80)

It is not difficult to understand the self-mown mower as expressing a powerful (even if humorous) image of what seemed to many Englishmen to be the self-induced catastrophe of civil war. For Damon is a reflexive figure. He is both the victim of 'edged Stele' and the wielder of steel himself: an embodiment of death, lurking in the seemingly innocent fields, and one of death's victims.

The self-destructive double-figure of Damon can be met with again and again, in various guises, in the poetry of the Civil War period. But for other poets, other forms of retreat presented themselves. For the > Cavalier poets (a misleading term since the poets who are usually denoted in the phrase were neither artistically nor politically homogeneous, though they all shared a general sense of the ultimate value of the rule of kings rather than parliaments or, worse, people), pastoralism, sensuality, drink or the mind itself offered alternatives. Thus > Robert Herrick, in his volume of poetry entitled Hesperides (1648), evokes a world of minutely observed detail, which in its fetishistic attention to the elaborate codes of dress and food, offers a form of nostalgic sensuality to counter the breakdown in social structures. But was it possible to evade what Herrick himself in his opening poem of the collection ('The Argument of his Book') termed 'Times trans-shifting'?

For Herrick's close contemporary, ▷ Richard Lovelace, the heroic self-image of the soldier fleeing the 'nunnery' of the 'chaste breast and quiet mind' of his mistress to encounter a new 'faith' composed of 'a sword, a horse, a shield' ('To Lucasta, Going to the Wars'), breaks apart when confronted with his own form of the double-figure which Marvell's Damon seemed to represent. That figure appears most memorably in Lovelace's poem 'The Snail', a poem which, on the surface, appears to be no more than an exercise in contrived wit. Yet the poem's object of contemplation, the unlikely figure of the snail itself, is an ambiguously sinister figure — a confusion of geometric order, familial relationships, gender and questions of origin. If the snail is, as the poem claims at the opening, a 'Wise emblem of our pol'tic world', then this world is one which has become a 'deep riddle'. Fluidly mysterious, the world now conforms to no fixed model of social and political stability. By the end of the poem, the snail has dissolved into a jelly, its 'dark contemplation' of its own self no preservative against dissolution. In the directly political 'A Mock Song', Lovelace depicts the universe itself as dissolving, a response to the ultimate political cleavage of the 1640s, that which took place in Whitehall in the January of 1649:

Now the sun if unarmed,
And the moon by us charmed,
All the stars dissolved to a jelly;
Now the thighs of the crown
And the arms are lopped down,
And the body is all but a belly.

('A Mock Song', ll. 15–20)

Social dissolution, the collapse of the body politic, the transformation of an ordered world into an image of chaotic misrule – it is as if that uncivilized wilderness which Spenser and his contemporaries some fifty years earlier had struggled to keep at bay has intruded into the very heart of the culture in which Lovelace is writing.

'Recent liberty recovered'

To express the literary culture of the Civil War and post-Civil War years as a struggle against encroaching forms of social and political fragmentation is to understand the poets of the mid-seventeenth century as engaged in a desperate form of self-preservation. But to other writers (and Marvell comes to mind once more), working in an alternative political tradition – one that might be termed, broadly, republican – other problems seemed to emerge. What the short-lived experiment in a different form of government of the early 1650s represented was the possibility of engagement with a radically altered set of political co-ordinates. Within this new matrix, whose boundaries can be charted in the numberless ⊳ pamphlets and broadsheets of the period, in popular songs, ⊳ sermons, prophetic writings, political treatises and poems, and in the diaries and letters of ordinary men and women, we can locate the most dominant poetic figure of the seventeenth century – John Milton.

Milton's poetic career is one of linguistic and formal experiment. Almost no poet since Spenser had traversed with such skill such a range of possible genres – which included ⊳ masque, sonnet, ⊳ translation, ⊳ elegy, sacred drama, and, of course, ⊳ epic. But in understanding Milton's poetic achievement we also need to recognize the continual presence of Milton's political convictions – though that is not to say that those convictions, in themselves, were somehow set in rigid tablets of stone. But for Milton, read by his contemporaries as the prose defender of the great experiment in new forms of government, poetry and politics are inextricably interwoven.

At the centre of Milton's conception of political revolution stands his awareness that language is the key to ordering and understanding the world in which we live. What Milton's poetry represents, therefore, is a recognition that the language in which he is writing – indebted as it is to the language of prophecy and lyric encountered in the Old Testament, in the patristic authors, and in the classics – is one that has to be recaptured from the determining ideological structures of the moment. It is not, I think, coincidence that, at the very point when a strangely familiar (to modern ears) language of technology and utilitarian values is being demanded by the supporters of the Royal Society, \triangleright Paradise Lost (1667) should appear. We can glimpse the revolutionary nature of Milton's struggle on behalf of language in the 1668 preface to the poem, where Milton offers the following justification of his writing:

The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme, as that of Homer in Greek and Virgil in Latin, rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse... but the invention of a barbarous age... This neglect then of rhyme so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to vulgar readers, that it rather is to be esteemed an example set, the first in English, of recent liberty recovered to heroic poem...

This, it need hardly be said, is a revolutionary poetic manifesto. And in terming it revolutionary, I have in mind the notion of a cyclical movement. Poetic form and political engagement became linked in Milton's demand for 'a recent liberty recovered'. For both poetry and political expression now seem to exist in an age which is 'barbarous' to both.

Paradise Lost is, above all, the poem of recovered poetic liberty enacted in its very language, and, just as importantly, in what the poem has to say about language. For Adam, in the poem, is the discoverer of a language which not only identifies for himself his position within the world, but initiates his own quest for self-identity. Remembering his own creation, he recalls that without language he did not know 'who I was, or where, or from what cause' (VIII. 270–1). His response is speech, and in discovering speech, he discovers not only God but an identity and a world which can be named. Against this Frankenstein-like fable is set the negative language of a 'barbarous age' – the language of Babel and of Hell, linked, in the final moments of the poem, to a 'jangling noise of words unknown', which is the language given by God 'in derision' to the followers of Nimrod: the type of human oppression. The universal history lesson with which the poem closes endeavours to demonstrate that the transgression of human and divine law involves the denial of political equality:

... man over men He made not lord; such title to himself Reserving, human left from human free. (XII. 69–71)

The link between language and identity, which lies at the heart of the experience of both Adam and Eve in the poem, alerts us to Milton's other great theme of Paradise Lost and one with which it would be appropriate to end this account of Renaissance poetry. In terming Milton the poet of 'recovered poetic liberty', what we must also acknowledge is that Milton is, at the same time, at one with his contemporaries in seeking to establish a coherent identity for the human subject. Paradoxically, that search for a unified sense of selfhood – the discovery of an identity which has been secured – is dramatized not only in the memories of creation possessed by Adam and Eve and in gender distinction, but in the figure of Satan who claims an autonomous position in God's creation. 'Who saw/when this creation was?' Satan asks, before offering his own version of separate identity:

We know no time when we were not as now; Know none before us, self-begot, self-raised By our own quick'ning power... (V. 859-61)

of self-destruction found in the fields and meadows. We do not need, therefore, to place Satan in the simple role of grand adversary, or counter-hero. For Adam, Eve and Satan are bonded to one another in a triangular design which cannot be disrupted. Satan's spiritual home, from which he cannot be excluded by God (into which, indeed, God welcomes him), is neither Heaven, nor Hell, but, disturbingly, Eden. 'Et in Arcadia ego' − that motto of Renaissance mortality − is also Satan's motto, as the ever-perceptive Eve acknowledges in questioning what kind of freedom Eden can represent. And in ▷ Arcadia Satan undergoes the same tormented search for identity that the human figures strive to discover rooted in one another, as, in the most famous exit in English literature, they leave Eden and the poem together, hand in hand.

This account of poetry in the Renaissance period began with Puttenham's description of a 'certain doubleness' which seemed, to the Elizabethan critic, to haunt the language of poetry. It has ended with a description of the creation of a figure of division – Milton's Satan. Doubleness, division and duplicity have become almost the themes of this essay. But I do not want to suggest, in deploying this alliterative trio, that there exists therefore a homogeneity in the writing we have been discussing. What I would argue instead is that in the enormous richness and diversity of literary forms and experience which have reached us in the twentieth century from the early modern period, we perceive a culture which is neither monumental, nor the product of a mythic golden age of national experience. The lines from Donne's satire on religion quoted at the start of this essay suggest a more complex set of possibilities. What Donne, in these lines, seems to be contemplating is the problematic status of the individual's identity within the boundaries determined by the power relationships in society. The 'nature and name' of power in fact defines, for Donne and for so many other Renaissance writers, the nature of identity itself. But Donne continues:

... those blest flowers that dwell
At the rough streames calme head, thrive and do well,
But having left their roots, and themselves given
To the streames tyrannous rage, alas, are driven Through mills, and rockes, and woods, and at last, almost Consum'd in going, in the sea are lost:

(Satire 3, ll. 103-108)

Here is the Renaissance writer's dilemma. To obey, sometimes to celebrate, the nature and name of power is to risk that very loss of identity which so much of Renaissance poetry is designed to preserve.

Renaissance Prose

Roger Pooley

Much modern prose seeks anonymity, the 'prose like a window-pane' that George Orwell worked for. However, the rise of the virtuoso sentence in contemporary fiction may alert its readers to another possibility, that prose can draw on many of the resources and richness of language usually associated with poetry. Reading Renaissance prose is usually an encounter with just such a self-conscious stylishness; and this can be just as apparent in supposedly 'non-literary' modes like the sermon or the scientific report as it is in early prose fiction. Even so, there are limited pleasures in simply reading for the style, in the manner of those anthologies now out of fashion which would print short extracts from a variety of texts as if they were lyric poems. But how can one get into the really long works? This is an age of vast compendia and encyclopaedic aspirations – Burton's ⊳ Anatomy of Melancholy grew from three hundred and fifty thousand words in 1621 to over five hundred thousand in 1651. Most readers will have to respond to such exhaustiveness by dipping, using the index to find what Burton says about love melancholy, or lycanthropia, or stopping after the deft hundred-page introduction, where Burton establishes his satiric persona of Democritus Junior. A contemporary reader will recognise this kind of address to the reader from fiction, and the image of the theatre of the world from Shakespeare:

Gentle Reader, I presume thou wilt be very inquisitive to know what Anticke or Personate Actor this is, that so insolently intrudes upon this common Theatre, to the worlds view, arrogating another mans name, whence hee is, why he doth it, and what he hath to say?

Yet there are 'poetic' effects here, too, the alliteration of 'insolently intrudes', and the neat rhetorical triplet of whence, why and what. These are prose writers who shape their sentences, who hear what they write.

Prose style is not just a matter of taste, though, of responding to an age where 'artifice' was not something to be ashamed of. There are times when the choice of style in this period can be an index of other kinds of loyalties. There are sharp political and doctrinal divisions between Puritans and other religious writers from the 1590s onwards, and these are sometimes echoed in arguments about the appropriate style for religious discourse. The Puritan preachers like William Perkins and Richard Sibbes, who preached in Cambridge in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, were widely published, and sought a plain discourse that would get the new Reformation doctrines over to ordinary people in an 'affectionate' (emotional) way:

Thus are we by nature altogether rotten and polluted; speech, fine discourse, favour, and all other outward good parts, they can put no comeliness upon us. They are but on us as flowers stuck upon a dead carcase.

(Sibbes, The Christian Work, 1639)

This was often contrasted to the more learned and intricate 'high Anglican' style, sometimes misleadingly labelled 'Metaphysical', whose most famous, idiosyncratic exponent is Lancelot Andrewes, eventually Bishop of Winchester. Andrewes is at his best expounding the paradoxes of the great Christian festivals, the word made flesh at Christmas, the death and resurrection of God's son at Easter. He often took a word by word approach to the text he expounded, a text that was still quoted in Latin, even though he was one of the translators of the King James version of the Bible. Here he is on the multitude of angels praising God who appeared to the shepherds at Christmas:

When we heare of a multitude, we fear a confusion, But (you will observe), this multitude was multiduo militiae; no confused rout: No; but acies ordinata, a well ordered armie. There is order, in an armie: There is order, in a Queer [choir]: There is order among Angells: coordinate among themselves, subordinate to their head and leader. So, a multitude without confusion.

(Sermon 12 of the Nativitie, 1618)

This is intricate stuff, overlapping, step-by-step argument. The dense punctuation indicates how the words might be read out, with lots of pauses and emphases. The mixture of Latin and English makes this seem much stranger to us than it might to an educated English audience whose schooling was almost entirely Latin. It's still pretty uncompromising, though; the famous narrative bits of Andrewes, like the sentence Eliot lifts for the opening of 'The Journey of the Magi', are rare.

In view of this Puritan/Anglican contrast, it is odd that in the Restoration the positions are almost reversed. The Anglicans accused the Nonconformists (as we must call them by then) of excess, of metaphorical, passionate language which whips up the passions to rebellion; in 1669 Samuel Parker only half-jokingly proposed an Act of Parliament 'to abridge preachers the use of fulsome and luscious metaphors'. There are some specific theological and political reasons for this; Anglican theology after the Restoration stressed ethical behaviour, particularly obedience, and demoted the Reformation doctrines such as justification by faith, an inescapably metaphorical idea. The more general point is that prose style, in this period, can sometimes be regarded as the sign of allegiance to a particular political or religious point of view.

Latinity and Eloquence

For a long time, the study of Renaissance prose was influenced by a taxonomy based on Latin models of style – Cicero, Seneca and Tacitus. The distinctions were largely argued in terms of syntax, with the symmetries and lengthy subordinate clauses of the high Ciceronian style contrasted with the looser 'Senecan amble' and the more pointed, epigrammatic Tacitus. There are a number of problems with this when it comes to actual analysis; 'Senecan', particularly, is an impossibly loose description. However, two factors should stop us completely dismissing it. First is that every educated writer in the period was educated in Latin, and that Latin was the language of international scholarship. When > Bacon wanted to reach a European audience with his > Advancement of Learning (1605), he expanded it into the Latin De Augmentis Scientiarum (1623). Robert Burton complained that his bookseller wouldn't let him publish his Anatomy of Melancholy in Latin because it wouldn't sell:

It was not mine intent to prostitute my Muse in English or to divulge secreta Minervae, but to have exposed this more contract in Latin, if I could have got it printed. Any scurrile Pamphlet is welcome to our mercenary Stationers in English, they print all . . .

('Democritus to the Reader')

Burton's slipping in of Latin quotations, even here, is not just revenge for this affront to his international reputation; it is the small change of intellectual discourse. The extract also points to the rising commercial and popular success of English. There is a layer of popular pamphleteering throughout the period, but its importance increases as the literate market for amusement, learning and religious devotion increases.

It may be virtually impossible for modern readers to 'hear' the Latinity beneath Renaissance prose in English. It is nonetheless there, in well-turned epigrams, in extended syntactic units, and in choices of vocabulary. It is also there in rhetoric, the art of persuasion which formed the basis of every undergraduate's early years, and which pervades almost every Renaissance text, from Hamlet's soliloquies to Boyle's scientific essays.

At the level of organisation, rhetoric is to do with the laying out of an argument. The common Renaissance figure is of logic as a closed fist, rhetoric as an open hand. The contents page of Bacon's Advancement is one place to look for the strengths of such an approach, the sectioning and sub-sectioning of knowledge. Bacon's work is also a reminder of the way that anti-rhetoric is still firmly in the grip of rhetoric. His well-known attack on the excesses of the Renaissance rediscovery of classical Latinity is still observably in a sentence that would have been impossible without such a rediscovery:

This grew speedily to an excess; for men began to hunt more after words than matter; more after the choiceness of the phrase, and the round and clean composition of the sentence, and the sweet falling of the clauses, and the varying and illustration of their works with tropes and figures, than after the weight of matter, worth of subject, soundness of invention or depth of judgement.

The symmetry between abuses and proper uses of learning (four of each) is pointed, however. It takes longer to write 'the sweet falling of the clauses' than 'soundness of invention'; the implication is that unsound learning is wordier than the real thing.

Description Sidney's Apology for Poetry (posthumously published in 1590) is even more obviously constructed in the manner of the Renaissance oration, with a seven-point structure (an exordium, or introduction, a narration, or statement of the facts, a proposition, division of the facts, confirmation, refutation and a peroration or summary). Rhetoric also operates at the level of local effect, of tropes. Most of the popular, English introductions to rhetoric emphasise that side of rhetoric, following the example of the most famous and influential textbook, Erasmus' De Copia (literally, 'of fullness').

The popular rhetorics, like Wilson, also recognise that rhetoric is a public art, an instrument of political control. One reason for writing is to display to the Renaissance ruler one's ability to persuade ambassadors or subjects of the virtues of their position. The vernacular rhetorics, paradoxically, make this instrument of power available to all who can read English; though not overtly for democratic purposes. Rhetoric as a technique was also promulgated beyond the universities by the two main professions – lawyers and preachers. By the 1650s one did not have to have a degree to be able to clinch a point in an argument in the course of a sermon, say; though the scorn of the learned might still fall.

The English Bible and its Impact

Perhaps the greatest work of English Renaissance prose is better described as a work of English Reformation prose – the ⊳ Bible. Fixed for subsequent generations in 1611 as the King James version (or 'Authorised Version'), it has to be regarded as a collective effort of translation and revision over more than eighty years. However, if it were not for the courage and unusual talents of William Tyndale, whose version of the New Testament was first published, in Germany, in 1526, it would not be as distinctive as it is. Something like five-sixths of Tyndale's work survives in the King James' committees' revision.

Even at the time the Tyndale tradition of translation was regarded as 'translationese', translating word for word rather than idiom for idiom. Robert Boyle, for example, thought it underplayed the rhetoric strength of the original. The result, however, was not so much a crib as a whole series of new idioms. Tyndale himself argued that there was a good match between the biblical languages and English: 'and the properties of the Hebrew tongue agreeth a thousand times more with the English than with the Latin' – Latin being the language in which the Bible was available with the approval of the Catholic church.

The first impact the English Bible had was doctrinal rather than literary or idiomatic. The doctrines of Paul, like justification by faith and predestination, that became clear in the English translations, were of incalculable effect in shifting the focus of English politics as well as spirituality and subjectivity. If, for example, you believe that you have been predestined, either to heaven or hell, but you are not sure which, it becomes an urgent question to find out which. The key, according to Reformation practice, is self-examination. This is not entirely new in Christianity; the first autobiography in Europe is probably St Augustine's Confessions (397–8), in English The Book of Margery Kempe (d.c. 1440). However, the first explosion of prose autobiography in English dates from the mid-seventeenth century, when the Protestant emphasis on self-examination in the context of conversion (rather than the Catholic emphasis on a continuous regime of confession and penance) meets up with the need to tell one's story as a means of entrance into the separatist congregations which replaced the (temporarily) collapsed Church of England in the 1650s.

Dohn Bunyan's Derace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666) is the most notable of these. It is a conversion story rather than a life story, although it does tell us something of his early life. The details of his marriage, and of his service in the Parliamentary army, are tantalisingly brief, and ruthlessly selected for their relevance to his unfolding spiritual awakening. It goes through a pattern characteristic of many conversion stories of the period; after a dissolute youth, some early convictions of sin lead him to church, but only in a formal way. (This distinction between outward observance and inward reality is a key factor in the construction of the early modern self, in its Christian manifestation.) Then the Word strikes again, and the central section of the book describes with great psychological intensity the interior battle between the Biblical texts that would seem to condemn Bunyan, and those that would save him. The battle is complex − there isn't a single turning point, but a gradual process of assurance with frightening relapses. Bunyan's own style isn't biblical; it doesn't have the syntactic markers, for example the binary linking of sentences like St Paul's 'For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal' (Romans 7:14, Tyndale). However, the biblical texts have a special power for him – 'that Scripture fastened on my heart', 'this Scripture would strike me down, as dead', or 'that Scripture would seize upon my Soul.'

It was much later, from the mid-eighteenth century, when the Authorised Version began to be valued for its style as well as its doctrine. In this earlier period, the echo of the English Bible is most audible in those not educated in Latin, like Bunyan, and the radicals of the 1640s and 50s, like Richard Overton the Leveller, or Gerrard Winstanley the Digger, or the female prophets like Anna Trapnel. Most extraordinary of all is the so-called Ranter Abiezer Coppe, whose Fiery Flying Roll (1649) combines the persona of the prophet Ezekiel with revolutionary zeal:

This saith the Lord, I inform you, that I overturn, overturn, overturn. And as the Bishops, Charles, and the Lords, have had their turn, overturn, so your turn shall be next (ye surviving great ones) by what Name and Title soever dignified or distinguished, who ever you are, that oppose me, the Eternall God, who am UNIVERSALL Love, and whose service is perfect freedom, and pure Libertinisme.

With the Ranters, prophetic denunciation blends into a kind of ecstasy. Thomas Traherne, whose political instincts were quite different, achieved another impressively ecstatic, slightly heterodox devotion in his Centuries of Thanksgiving. Most of Traherne's work remained in manuscript until the twentieth century; and to a modern reader his recounting of childhood vision sounds more akin to Wordsworth than that of a Calvinist culture:

Had any man spoken of it, it had been the most easy thing in the world to have taught me, and to have made me believe, that Heaven and earth was God's house, and that He gave it me. That the sun was mine and that men were mine, and that cities and kingdoms were mine also; that earth was better than gold, and that water was, every drop of it, a precious jewel.

It's not Wordsworth, of course; it's less moralising, less brooding. It's still recognisably within the Reformation and Counter-Reformation disciplines of meditation, defined by Bishop Joseph Hall as 'a bending of the mind upon some spiritual object, through divers forms of discourse, until our thoughts come to an issue' (Art of Divine Meditation, 1627). It's also a particular effect of Renaissance prose, using the arts of rhetoric sentence construction to come to a climax where the copiousness of phrase echoes the benevolent creativity of God.

Political Prose

The growth of English political debate is remarkable in the seventeenth century. The student of literature could benefit from knowing more than the arguments around > Shakespeare and > Marvell, although those arguments – of the limits of monarchy and the virtues or republicanism – are central. Nor is it simply a question of history of ideas, of 'background'; it is a matter of attending to considerable creativity in great prose.

Most of the arguments in the period are conducted in the language of religion; the new secular politics associated with ▷ Machiavelli make little overt impact. Machiavelli's The Prince was not translated into English until 1640, even if the 'Machiavell' is a bogeyman in the drama from the 1590s. Machiavelli's acuteness was sometimes recognised – Francis Bacon said that he described how men act, rather than how they ought to act – but he had to be Christianised or rejected.

The most enduring form of political writing describes the imaginary community, or Utopia. > More's > Utopia (1516), which christens the term (a pun on 'no place' and 'good place' in Greek) was written in Latin, translated into English in 1551. While it has some literary affinities with the ideal community of Plato's Republic, and the communitarian if not exactly communist ideals of medieval monasticism, the discovery of the New World frames its discourse. Society outside the civilised west (fictional or real) is no longer necessarily 'barbarian', primitive, there to be feared or exploited - though it is all those things in our period. It might also be admirable, a world which has escaped the Fall. So More's guide, Raphael Hythlodaeus, uses their rational society, with wealth, work and power distributed rather than concentrated, as a means of criticising the Europe of his own day. Human nature has not changed, and the Utopians are still Machiavellian in their dealings with the outside world. Inside, society is regulated, rational, cultured. Things have been arranged so that self-interest and the public interest coincide; and in doing so, as J. C. Davis points out, More lays out the problem with Utopias. If morally good decisions are always sensible decisions, doesn't this destroy the humanity, the ethical identity, of the Utopians at the same time?

Subsequent Renaissance Utopias have been less influential, and less witty; but some are still worth looking at. > Francis Bacon's > New Atlantis (1627) contains little of the circumstantial detail that makes Utopia such an imaginative success, but it does contain, in Salomon's House, the kind of ideal community of scientific learning that Bacon wanted to see in England. Nor is it just an annex to Bacon's scientific writing; it celebrates a society without factions, and thus forms a rebuke to the court parties in England. Sir John Harrington's Oceana (1656) was published while the government of England was being remade after the execution of the King. The detail in his utopia is mathematical and organisational, perhaps to emphasise the scientific validity of his schemes. Workable government depends on a well-designed framework, one that designs out the impact of human imperfection. As with More, liberty is not high on his list - a reminder that the classical republicanism of the Civil War and Commonwealth period should not be confused with modern democracy, though it opened the way for it. After the Restoration, Margaret Cavendish reinvigorated the genre with her New World, called the Blazing World (1666), with its imaginary fantasy of a world created by a female monarch.

The Civil War and Commonwealth period produced an explosion of debate in print at all levels, from knockabout satire to serious proposals (sometimes in the same text). This is the period of the early newsbooks, which from 1641 to 1660 gave an account of events and their meaning from various political sides in small, eight or sixteen-page pamphlets. The very first, The Heads of Severall Proceedings in this Present Parliament, is a summary of the proceedings in Parliament, responding to the crisis in Ireland. The various sides of the dispute had their own papers: the royalists had Mercurius Aulicus and Mercurius Elencticus amongst others, Parliament had Mercurius Politicus, the Levellers had The Moderate. Much of what we recognise as modern journalism is there – opinion pieces, astrological predictions, 'detestable outrages', strange but true stories – along with ballad poetry, even whole issues in verse, which indicates continuities with a very different culture of disseminating news and ideas.

> Milton's political writings begin in 1641, too, with Of Reformation touching Church-Discipline in England, and the Causes that Hitherto have Hindered It. (Seventeenth-century title-pages often function as brief summaries). After Charles I's execution in 1649, he becomes virtually an official apologist for Cromwell's cause: The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649) had argued that it was lawful for a people to call a tyrant to account. The first and second 'Defences of the English People' (1651 and 1654) are written in Latin for a European readership. The word is overused about this period, but Milton is a genuinely revolutionary writer. In The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643) he attacks the tyrannic power of 'Custom' in domestic law; in Areopagitica (1644) he attacks the censorship; the attack on bishops and kings completes the republican set. Milton is not the most liberal or radical of the writers in the period, either; but the prose is certainly of more historical and artistic interest than an annex to, or diversion from, his poetry. It can be uniquely stirring:

He that can apprehend and consider vice with all other baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true warfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloister'd vertue, unexercis'd & unbreath'd, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather: that which purifies us is triall, and triall is by what is contrary.

(Areopagitica)

Milton's prose is best seen as part of a great and various debate in the midseventeenth century, in a period where many assumptions were called into question. The excitement of this can still be recaptured in the writings of the Levellers, Richard Overton, John Lilburne and William Walwyn particularly, and the Digger Gerrard Winstanley. The political movements were short-lived; the ideas re-emerged. In retrospect, though, the most profound rethinking of political authority from this period is in > Thomas Hobbes' > Leviathan (1651), the first great work of political philosophy in English. Hobbes' position may at first sight seem bleak, philosophically and artistically. He reckons that human life is determined by fear on the one hand and the desire for power on the other. His intellectual drives are similarly austere; he regarded geometric as the paradigmatic procedure, and language, rhetoric and metaphor particularly, as the means to absurdity and contention:

The light of humane minds is perspicuous words, but by exact definitions first snuffed, and purged from ambiguity; reason is the pace; increase of science, the way; and the benefit of mankind, the end.

Such was the rigour of Hobbes' approach that he transformed the whole level of debate. Nonetheless he was regarded as scandalously 'atheist' in his contention that civil society could hold together by contract, simply because of the fear of civil war, without any need for a theological justification like the Divine Right of Kings. Hobbes was more 'absolutist' in his analysis of the social contract than subsequent theorists, most notably Locke, whose Two Treatises of Government (1689) established the philosophical basis of the liberal 'Glorious Revolution'. Leviathan is also a more compelling read than the austere preconditions it lays down for discourse might imply ('There is nothing I distrust more than my Elocution', he wrote at the end of his masterwork). The famous Chapter 13, 'Of the Natural Condition of Mankind as concerning their Felicity and Misery' is the best example, but the whole work is based on persuasion through metaphor as much as logic. By comparison to the earlier formulations of his ideas, such as The Elements of Law, Leviathan is a blaze of rhetorical colour.

The Language of Science

Hobbes' commitment to a rigorous language purged of metaphor, even if he didn't achieve it, is often linked to the ambitions of a group he had a number of differences with, the Royal Society, founded in 1660. The Royal Society had some of the attributes of modern scientific organisation, the collective approach to knowledge according to agreed rules, a commitment to experiment rather than the authority of ancient texts, and a sense that progress could be made by accumulating facts and scientific laws. At the same time, most of their active members (Robert Boyle, John Wilkins and John Ray, for example) were at least as involved in theologicophilosophical discourse as in conducting and writing up experiments. Approaching this material simply as if it were the origins of modern science can distort its feel. It was amateur, in the best and worst sense. Nor did it supplant older ideas entirely. Boyle, Newton and Locke were exchanging alchemical secrets well into the Restoration.

The suspicion of metaphor, 'the close, naked natural way of speaking . . . bringing all things as near the mathematical plainness, as they can' (Thomas Sprat, 1667) is a key ambition of their writing. It fed the artificial language schemes of the Restoration, of which Wilkins' Essay towards Real Character and a Philosophical Language (1668) is the most spectacular and intricate attempt to produce a classificatory sign system which would not only describe but somehow be knowledge. So is the experimental narrative, the essay which describes the progress of an experiment as a story from hypothesis to conclusion. William Harvey's De Motu Cordis (1628, tr. 1653), on the circulation of the blood, anticipates it, but Boyle's accounts of his experiments with an air-pump, and Newton's reports on his optical experiments, define the genre.

Subsequent histories have tended to edit out the concern with the trivial and the amazing that occupied many of the early meetings. Left in, they show how Thomas Browne's Pseudodoxia Epidemica (1646), a fascinating compendium of popular errors, links Bacon's desire to discredit existing ignorance with the Royal Society's half-realised ambition to replace it with certain knowledge. Browne was a doctor, who had read Harvey. One might say the medical profession forms a kind of alternative source of 'modern science' in this period. Browne's Religio Medici (1643) is a confession of faith in a relaxed, intimate style, a reflection on God and Nature ('that universal and publike Manuscript'). Like the works of Boyle and other early scientists, it shows how scientific practice was motivated as much by a theological desire for understanding as by practical considerations. Browne may have been impatient of error, but he was tolerant and sceptical, and disarmingly aware of his own bias.

History

The chronicle histories of England and their adaptation by Shakespeare and his contemporaries show how much of an appetite for history the Elizabethans had. Not only was it a cover for debate about contemporary events, it showed how the country was still trying to define itself; and how the Tudors were establishing their version of events. Thomas More's History of King Richard III (1513) is an example of this, though it is also the first example of a biography in English influenced by the Humanist approach to history. The antiquarian movement was also an important methodological development. Nowadays, 'antiquarian' is a pejorative term for historians; the antiquarians of the sixteenth century, like Camden and Stowe, led the way in the critical use of sources. James I even closed down the College of Antiquaries for a while out of political suspicion.

John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1570, augmented and revised until 1641) is a vast historical compilation of Protestant martyr stories; indeed it is still popularly known as 'Foxe's Book of Martyrs'. Foxe, who was a Puritan forced into exile during the reign of Mary, created an alternative hagiography to that of the Catholic saints, but more importantly created an ideal of heroic suffering that inspired Milton and Bunyan, and helped to define much of British Protestant Christianity's sense of itself as a historical and spiritual entity. Like most historians of the period, Foxe was both author and editor, reporter and polemicist. There is something of the formulaic about all those trials and burnings and last words; though the repetition has its own mesmeric effect.

Sir Walter Ralegh's History of the World (1614) is also a sourcebook for Puritans; Cromwell and Milton admired it. Vast though it is (another individual encyclopaedia) the main text breaks off at 146 BC. Ralegh's earlier prose had addressed contemporary history in an anti-Spanish, pro-colonialist manner. Only in the Preface to the History of the World, with its swingeing attack on the 'merciless' Henry VIII in contrast to James I, does he hint at the dangerous practice of writing about recent events. For the most part, in the parade of English Kings in the Preface, and ancient monarchs in the body of the text, he emphasises history as a record of the judgements of God:

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politic subtlety, have these forenamed Kings, both strangers and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of God upon themselves . . .

In its way, Ralegh's History is as impressive as the historical tragedies of the period, much of whose sensibility he shares. God and great men make history; 'Eloquent, just and mighty Death', along with his historian spokesman, give the verdict.

History is what politicians write when they are out of power. Ralegh wrote his in the Tower of London. Bacon wrote his History of Henry VI after being dismissed from the Chancellorship. Although it is assembled from secondary sources, it is interesting as a study in power politics from an angle that owes more to Tacitus, Machiavelli and Guiccardini, not to mention his own experience, than providentialism. A similar hard-headedness, in more epigrammatic form, is available in his Essays, effectively the first English example of this new prose form. Closer to an eve-witness account is Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, not published until 1702-4, but begun in 1646 after the defeat of the Royalists. Clarendon, as Edward Hyde, had joined Charles I from a reforming, Parliamentary position, and he is able to see both sides of many questions. An old anthology of Clarendon reduced the History to a series of witty, judicious 'characters', which is true to one side of the text. Charles I, for example, was 'the worthiest gentleman, the best master, the best friend, the best husband and the best Christian, that the age in which he lived produced.' The beginning of the next sentence reminds us what was missing from the list: And if he were not the best king ... 'Similarly, even as Cromwell is being consigned to hell in the final verdict, he is exonerated from being a Machiavellian and a man of blood: 'He will be looked on by posterity as a brave bad man.' Clarendon's style of history has itself had a long and continuing posterity; the judicious verdict of the participant observer can be uniquely fascinating, and the partis pris can be recognised and allowed for.

Prose fiction

Renaissance prose fiction has only recently emerged from a subordinate position, as a sourcebook for the drama and a preface to 'the rise of the novel' in the eighteenth century. Between five and six hundred works of prose fiction were published before 1700. Some of them are romances, heroic and/or erotic, some are allegories, some are fictional versions of non-fiction genres like the deathbed or gallows confession, the life of the rogue, or travel stories. How do you tell if they are fiction rather than fact? The title 'the true story of . . .' is usually one sign; the apparatus of fictiveness mimics that of historicity.

⊳ Sir Philip Sidney's ⊳ Arcadia (1578, first published in a revised form in 1590) is the acme of the pastoral romance, which spawned a number of imitations and continuations, most notably ⊳ Mary Wroth's Urania (1621). The romance plot, set in ancient Greece, mixes defeated intentions and averted tragedy with disguise and doubling; the intricacies of the plot are matched by numerous opportunities for set speeches and poems. The attractions of a cultured, chivalrous aristocratic ideal − stylishness in love and in battle − are celebrated in the characteristic Elizabethan pastoral trope, where true virtue (which has to be inherited and apparent in action) is always able to shed its disguise at the final, reconciling moment.

The political and cultural complexities of Arcadia are never quite matched in the shorter romances of the period, of which ▷ Robert Greene's ▷ Pandosto (1588) and Menaphon (1589) and ▷ Thomas Lodge's Rosalynde (1590) and A Margarite of America (1596) are the most notable. ▷ Gascoigne's Adventures of Master F.J. (1573; revised and toned down 1575) uses a sophisticated battery of fictional devices, and describes a distinctively sexy and hypocritical style of 'courtly love'. In some ways it reverses romance; the virtuous sister Frances is less successful than the promiscuous tease Elinor, 'shrieking (but softly)' as she is seduced. The love debates in which F.J. takes part fail to bring him to his senses; only betrayal does that, and he takes his revenge in something close to rape.

> John Lyly's > Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit (1578) began the fashion for a moralising style based on a remarkable hyper-extension of antithesis. It's not uncritical; in fact the introduction of yet another sententious pairing when the sentence ought to be over suggests a gift of self-parody:

This young gallant of more wit than wealth, and yet of more wealth than wisdom, seeing himself inferior to none in pleasant conceits thought himself superior to all in honest conditions, in so much as he thought himself so apt in all things that he gave himself almost to nothing but practising of those things commonly which are incident to those fine wits: fine phrases, smooth quips, merry jaunts, jesting without mean and abusing mirth without measure.

One critical dilemma in reading Elizabethan prose is deciding what to do with its excess. Euphuism is a Humanist tale of the dangers of wit without wisdom, which values male friendship over love for a clever but deceitful woman. It is a virtuoso display of that greatest of humanist accomplishments, rhetoric, and an exposé of its limitations.

> Thomas Nashe, perhaps the most versatile and energetic of the Elizabethan stylists, learnt his trade as much from improvisatory satire of 'Martin Marprelate' (fl. 1588–90) that he was hired to attack as from the 'university wits' like Lyly (incidentally also an anti-Martin pamphleteer). Nashe's excess, though, mixes the verbal with the visceral. In > The Unfortunate Traveller (1594) his picaresque hero, Jack Wilton, travels sixteenth-century Europe watching how disease, battle and torture reduce bodies to their constituent parts. Moral indignation is most often reinforced by bathos, as the proud and pretentious in love and religion are brought down.

Romance proved remarkably resilient in the seventeenth century, despite the early translation of > Don Quixote, and its repertoire much expanded by translations from the French. The impact of this is clearest in the Restoration, where > Aphra Behn's > Love Letters between a Nobelman and his Sister (1684-7) combined contemporary allusion with a new, passionate sensationalism which her earlier translations only partially indebted to the French romances she had earlier translated.

A largely popular rather than learned tradition of religious fiction, employing allegory and dialogue, finds its most accomplished expression in Bunyan's > The Pilgrim's Progress (1678; Part Two, 1684), > The Life and Death of Mr Badman (1680), and > The Holy War (1682), Arthur Dent's The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven (1601) was a best seller, introducing theological and social ideas through dialogue; Richard Bernard's Isle of Man (1627), puts Sin on trial. Richard Overton, in The Araignment of Mr Persecution (1645), also uses the trial narrative, with a few hints from Foxe, to satirize the censorious Sir John Presbyter in the name of liberty of conscience. To this lively, often humorous tradition Bunyan adds his own intensity, in the first part a kind of heroic isolation, as Christian resists the blandishments of Mr Worldly Wiseman, Giant Despair, and the court of Vanity Fair, where everything exists to be sold. It's tempting to see Bunyan at a whole series of crossroads, of Puritanism and Nonconformist individualism, of popular fiction and emergent novel, of providential history and social realism. He is evidence of all these changes; but, like many of these early fiction writers, deserves to be read as more than representing a phase before the 'real' novel began.

Renaissance prose, then, often demands a disciplined attention to style, and a grasp of sometimes remote thought-forms; but it also offers tremendous examples of the beauties of sentence-form precisely attuned to logic, and some startling inventiveness that makes modern prose look po-faced and under-nourished.

Renaissance Drama

Susan Bruce

Introduction

Miranda:

O, wonder!

How many goodly creatures are there here!

How beauteous mankind is! O brave new world,

That has such people in 't!

That has such people in 't!

Prospero:

'Tis new to thee.

(Shakespeare, The Tempest, 5.1.181-4)

If Miranda's wondrous enthusiasm at the sight of fellow Europeans points to the sense of excitement and pleasure infusing much Renaissance drama, so too her father's sardonic negation of that optimism expresses a feeling recurrent in many Renaissance plays. Indeed, it is in its conflation of these two, irreconcilable, points of view that this brief extract from \triangleright William Shakespeare's \triangleright The Tempest (c. 1611) may serve as a suitable point from which to embark on a survey of English Renaissance drama. On the one hand, the pleasure and the sense of renewal and possibility expressed by the young Miranda finds its analogue in the resolution, promise and optimism which, superficially at least, inhabits the conclusion of many Renaissance comedies. The protagonists of \triangleright Ben Jonson's \triangleright Bartholomem Fair (1614), for example, leave the play to carry on their festivities in the home of Justice Overdo, the town's magistrate, and in Shakespeare's \triangleright A Midsummer Night's Dream (1595) the conclusion of the play points similarly to a happiness and a celebration beyond the confines of the text, as the fairy king, Oberon, speaks a blessing on the marriages of the play's protagonists. 'Now until the break of day,/ Through this house each fairy stray,' Oberon says:

To the best bride-bed will we, Which by us shall blessed be; And the issue there create Ever shall be fortunate.

So shall all the couples three Ever true in loving be; And the blots of Nature's hand Shall not in their issue stand.

For such characters, it would seem, all worlds are brave and new, peopled by many goodly creatures whose future promises more of their kind. Similarly, resolution, rebirth and the prospect of brave new worlds frequently find expression in the romances (of which The Tempest is one). Like The Tempest, for example, both $\triangleright Cymbeline$ (1609–10) and $\triangleright The Winter's Tale$ (1610–11) conclude with the reconciliation of long-divided families and the rediscovery of relations believed to be lost, or dead. A sense of miraculous rebirth underlines the ending of these plays: 'If this prove/ A vision of the island, one dear son/ Shall I lose twice,' says Alonso in The Tempest (5.1.175–6) as his lost son is revealed to him, and this 'most high miracle' finds its analogous moment in The Winter's Tale when the statue of Leontes' dead wife Hermione comes back to life, provoking from her husband the wondering expression that 'if this be magic, let it be an art/ Lawful as eating' (5.3.110-1). Similarly, in Cymbeline, the soothsayer's explanation of a hitherto-baffling prophecy points to rediscovery, resolution and the promise of a better future: 'The lofty cedar, royal Cymbeline,' the soothsayer explains, Personates thee and thy lopped branches point Thy two sons forth; who, by Belarius stolen, For many years thought dead, are now reviv'd To the majestic cedar join'd, whose issue Promises Britain peace and plenty.

Miranda's words, then, express a structure of feeling which resonates beyond the play in which she utters them, but so too does Prospero's cynical checking of her youthful, and perhaps naive, enthusiasm. If Miranda believes like Coriolanus that 'there is a world elsewhere,' (Shakespeare, > Coriolanus (1608?) 3.3.135) Prospero clearly does not, and his perspective, it might be argued, approximates more to the vision afforded by tragedy that it does to the (supposedly) fairy-tale perspective afforded by romance, or to the happy resolution of comedy. 'How weary, stale, flat and unprofitable/ Seem to me all the uses of this world,' 'laments Shakespeare's Hamlet (> Hamlet (c. 1601) 1.2.132-4). Not for him the pastoral conception of the world as a garden controlled and ordered by man in which, as Polixenes says in > The Winter's Tale,

We marry
A gentler scion to the wildest stock,
And make conceive a bark of baser kind
By bud of nobler race: this is an art
Which does mend nature, change it, rather, but
The art itself is nature'

For Hamlet, the world appears as quite a different garden, an 'unweeded' one, which art has deserted, 'That grows to seed; things rank and gross in nature/ Possess it merely' (1.2.135–7). For him, the world is an empty place, denuded of dignity and order, as it is for Edgar, at the end of Shakespeare's > King Lear (1605), whose world is equally hostile to the kind of transformative, youthful, perspective of a Miranda: 'The weight of this sad time we must obey;' that play concludes, 'Speak what we feel, not what we ought to say./ The oldest hath borne most: we that are young,/ Shall never see so much, nor live so long.' (5.3.322–5).

Both optimism and pessimism, then, both the sense that there is a world elsewhere and the conviction that there is not are sentiments which recur frequently in Renaissance drama. But to suggest, as I have perhaps implicitly done thus far, that such sentiments are neatly divided into two opposing genres, comedy and tragedy, is vastly to simplify the issue. To maintain, for example, that Shakespearean comedy progresses invariably to the resolution of the conflicts played out in the drama, ending in promise and the optimistic expectation of a renewed future is only one reading of that genre, and however convincing that interpretation may at first seem, what must also be accounted for are the places where such resolution is incomplete or unsatisfactory. Even in such essentially light-hearted dramas as A Midsummer Night's Dream and Shakespeare's \triangleright Twelfth Night (1599–1600) total closure remains elusive: Demetrius remains spellbound at the end of A Midsummer Night's Dream, for instance, whilst the 'notoriously abus'd' Malvolio exits from Twelfth Night expressing the desire to be 'reveng'd on the whole pack' of his fellow protagonists (5.1.376). And with the darker Shakespearean 'comedies,' such as \triangleright Measure For Measure (1603–4) and (despite its title) \triangleright All's Well That Ends Well (1602–3) the claim to comedic resolution is dubious indeed: those plays may deliver to their audiences the multiple marriages which are a generic convention of the endings of Shakespearean comedy, but they make it very difficult for an audience, to conclude that such marriages constitute an unambiguously happy ending, that all is indeed well which ends, so superficially, well. Other comedies end with the institutionalised chastening of their protagonists: in Jonson's \triangleright Volpone, for example, Volpone is banished to prison, to be cramped with irons until he is crippled, his accomplice Mosca is sent off to be whipped and then enslaved forever in the galleys, and the other participants in the drama similarly punished.

Renaissance comedy then, is frequently far less light-hearted and celebratory than it might at first seem. Similarly, if many tragedies seem to reflect Prospero's conviction that confidence in brave new worlds is grossly misguided, this observation must also acknowledge that many tragedies are far less essentially pessimistic, looking forward, not back, and ending with the restoration of a renewed and reempowered order. Thus Shakespeare's > Macbeth (1605-6), for example, concludes with Duncan conferring new honours on his thanes and kinsmen, calling home his exiled friends abroad, promising to perform the tasks requisite to the re-imposition of order 'in measure, time and place', and extending thanks 'to all at once and to each one/ Whom we invite to see us crown'd at Scone' (5.7.103-4). Similarly, in > Christopher Marlowe's Edward II (c. 1592), it is not the death of Edward with which the play concludes, but the stately, if brutal, reimposition of order on the accession of the King's son, > Edward III.

History plays, of course, tend to end with the accession of a new king, even when their titles describe them as tragedies (as in > Richard III (1593?), or when the accession of the new king is undermined by the knowledge of what is to come later, as in Shakespeare's > King Henry VI Part III (c. 1592). In this play the celebration of the new King, Edward, is, for the audience, circumscribed by the presence on stage of the self-confessedly evil Richard, Duke of Gloucester, whose Machiavellian machinations form the subject of Richard III. Yet the desirability of state order is in both cases emphasised by the reconstitution of power in the single figure of the crowned head: Richard III, for example, ends with the accession of > Henry VII, whose heirs, he promises, will 'enrich the time to come with smoothfac'd peace' (5.5.31). The re-establishment of order, however, is not confined to the ending of the history play: in Shakespeare's > Romeo and Juliet (1597), for example, the loss of the two protagonists becomes the occasion of the reconciliation of their respective families, as each erects a statue in memory of the other's lost child, whilst in Shakespeare's > Timon of Athens (1607) Alcibiades promises, in the closing lines of the play, to 'use the olive with [his] sword,/ Make war breed peace, make peace stint war' (5.4.81-2).

The Tempest, then, is not alone in vacillating between a sense of infinite optimism and a sense of the ease in which such optimism might be undermined, or overlaid, by less happy perceptions. And it might be argued, as indeed I shall, broadly speaking, be suggesting here, that both of these contradictory perceptions derive from the massive and interconnected changes taking place, in all fields, during the early modern period. On the one hand, the age is one of discovery. The new world to which Miranda unconsciously refers is one of many new cultures encountered by early modern Europeans: driven by the ever-increasing exigencies of trade, profit, and eventually colonialism, they looked ever more widely for new routes and cultures to trade with and to exploit, discovering in the process new continents and new races, and extending trade and competition with those they already knew. But geographical expansion was only one of the ways in which the Renaissance was a period of discovery: in astronomy, the discoveries of Nicholaus Copernicus, Johannes Kepler, Tycho Brahe and Galileo Galilei proved that the earth is not the centre of the universe, as older theories had had it; they also showed that the universe was a much greater and emptier place than had ever been thought before. Such discoveries were driven, in part, by the compelling desire to draw conclusions about the world from empirical observation of it which also characterises > Francis Bacon's inauguration, in the early seventeenth century, of a new methodology of scientific enquiry. Baconian science emphasised the centrality of experimentation and observation to our access to knowledge; it also laid out, explicitly, the claim that knowledge is power.

This scientific revolution, it may be observed, held much in common with the thinking of many of the early Protestant Reformers of the Church, as both attacked, implicitly or explicitly, older doctrines of order and hierarchy which had been central to the thinking of the old science and to established, Catholic, religion. Known as 'the Great Chain of Being,' this older doctrine is made explicit in Shakespeare's ➤ Troilus and Cressida (1601–2) when Ulysses argues that:

The heavens themselves, the planets, and this centre Observe degree, priority, and place, Institute, course, proportion, season, form, Office, and custom, in all line of order.

and asks:

How could communities,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities,
... The primogenity and due of birth,
Prerogative of age, crowns, sceptres, laurels,
But by degree stand in authentic place?

Such thinking had for centuries dominated religious, scientific and political conceptions of order, assigning a fixed and individual place in a cosmic hierarchy from God, down through the angels, man, women, and animal, to, finally, the most insignificant stone. But when Ulysses argues for its enduring truth, it is already under threat: Ulysses would not need to speak so fervently in its defence unless the view was already under attack, (as it indeed was,) from scientific, religious and, as we shall see in more depth later, political fronts.

It is no coincidence that one of the most explicit explorations of the truth or falsehood of the 'great chain of being' appears in Troilus and Cressida, for this play is, throughout, deeply concerned with philosophical questions about belief, and deeply sceptical of our ability to achieve secure answers to the questions that it raises. 'How do we know?' and 'on what authority can we believe?' were, as we have seen, questions raised with a compelling insistence in both religion and science; so too they inhabit the philosophical inquiry of the period, which xperienced the rise of a new kind of scepticism. The Essaies of Michel de Montaigne, published in 1580 and 1588, and translated into English by John Florio in 1603 brought a searching intelligence to bear on many issues which had not before even been formulated as questions, and also formulated the framework to his essays in terms of an inquiry into the nature of selfhood which was quite new: 'I desire therein,' he states in his preface to the reader, to be delineated in mine owne genuine, simple and ordinarie fashion, without contention, art, or study; for it is my selfe I pourtray. . . . If my fortune had beene to have lived among those nations, which yet are said to live under the sweet liberty of Natures first and uncorrupted lawes, I assure thee, I would most willingly have pourtrayed myselfe fully and naked. Thus gentle Reader my selfe am the groundeworke of my booke: It is then not reason thou shouldest employ thy time about so frivolous and vaine a Subject. (Montaigne, Essaies.)

And in the latter part of our period, > Rene Descartes' Meditations on First Philosophy inaugurated an even more profound and radical scepticism, as he methodically subjected each criterion for belief in his own existence to the process of reason, holding 'back [his] assent from opinions which are not completely certain' and finding in each of them some reason for doubt, implying (although not concluding) that the answer to the question about our own existence can only be found in the interiority of the self: 'cogito ergo sum' - 'I think, therefore I am'.

The scale and magnitude of change in the Renaissance was, then, hard to underestimate, and it is easy enough to imagine that whilst this may have initiated a sense of excitement – in the words of the narrator at the end of \triangleright Paradise Lost 'the world was all before them; (XII, 646) – it simultaneously, may have generated a perception of profound instability: the world may lie before Adam and Eve in Paradise Lost, but only as they are leaving behind the security and calm which was Eden. To discover that the universe is a vast emptiness, and that man cannot pretend to the centrality in it in which he hitherto believed is a destabilising notion indeed: 'the New philosophie,' as Donne famously put it, 'calls all in doubt'.

The various developments which I have briefly detailed here could all be (and have all been) argued to play a part in the growth of the tensions which reveal themselves in Renaissance drama. The drama of the period is overdetermined, the product of a multiplicity of social and political developments which interact with each other in complex ways which we cannot easily, if at all, separate out and quantify. One way of thinking this through, perhaps, is to remember that the conclusion of the English Renaissance is conventionally marked by the outbreak of the English revolution, a social conflagration the likes of which England had never before experienced. To enter into the causes of the English revolution is way beyond the scope of this essay; what needs to be recognised, however, is that the tensions which eventually explode in so large-scale a conflict are both manifold, and in existence many years before overt conflict actually erupts. In other words, although the Renaissance is in many ways a period of extraordinary, and manifold, expansion and discovery, it also directly precedes a time of gross social upheaval, the seeds of which it must also, however unconsciously, experience and express.

In his Modern Tragedy, the Marxist cultural critic Raymond Williams, whose thinking underlies that of the newer cultural materialist critics of the 1980s and 90s argues that important tragedy occurs in periods 'preceding the substantial breakdown and transformation of an important culture. Its conclusion,' Williams goes on to say, is the real tension between old and new: between received beliefs, embodied in institutions and responses, and newly and vividly experienced contradictions and possibilities.

(Modern Tragedy)

The English Renaissance, it is clear, constitutes such an age, poised on the verge of social disintegration, but in other senses relatively stable. And taking Williams' observation rather more liberally than he intended it, I am extending it here to encompass not just the tragedy of the Renaissance, but its drama in general, in which, I think one can see evidence both of the discoveries of the Renaissance and of its increasingly fragmentary sense of social cohesion. The remainder of this essay will attempt to touch upon some of the ways in which these various changes inhabit early modern drama: in it I shall try to raise, although not necessarily to answer, some of the many questions generated by this most fascinating period of English literature.

Trade and Expansion

'O my America, my new found land,' states > Donne in 'To His Mistris Going To Bed,' 'my kingdome, safeliest when with one man man'd'. America, discovered in 1492, had by the late sixteenth century already become a figure for the possibility of expansion and colonialism, and also, in very complex ways, for the figuring of colonialism in terms of gender, and vice versa. We see this aspect of early modern Europe most clearly, perhaps, in The Tempest which many recent critics, especially those influenced by the New Historicism, have read as a representation of what is commonly referred to as the 'colonial encounter'. In part, The Tempest depicts the relation between the exiled white magician Prospero, and the 'salvage and deformed slave' Caliban, whose name is probably an anagram of the word 'cannibal'. Although Caliban's race is uncertain (as indeed is the location of the island, situated variously in the middle of the Mediterranean and adjacent to Bermuda,) he is self-evidently of non-white origin, and much of the relationship between him and Prospero is predicated on their respective, and competing, claims to the island. Caliban lays claim to the island through his mother, and through a right conferred by prior occupancy: 'this island's mine, by Sycorax my mother,' he argues (1.1.331); his claim is countered by Prospero and Miranda, who implicitly invoke their own moral superiority in their characterisations of Caliban as a lying, brutish slave 'which any print of goodness will not take' (1.2.351).

Which of the two claims is finally endorsed by the play itself is not easy to determine. Both are, in different ways, of dubious validity, and the contest between white and black in the play is complicated by the simultaneous presence in the text of other characters whose political designs align with neither. If the lower class characters of Stephano and Trinculo are as unruly and rebellious as Caliban in their plan to overthrow the aristocratic Prospero, for example, they are also quite happy to consider exploiting their 'servant monster' ally Caliban by enslaving him and displaying him for profit in the fairs and marketplaces of Europe, where 'not a holiday-fool there but would give a piece of silver' to see him (2.2.28). Indeed, The Tempest, it could be argued, is a kind of marketplace of discourses, a place where different races and classes meet and compete with each other, testing their respective claims to wealth and to power.

Much the same could be said of > Marlowe's > The Jew of Malta (c. 1590), which situates its action on an island which is a pivotal point of a new intercontinental trade, in which, as a consequence, colonial and conquestatory desires are played out. The opening soliloguy of the Jew, Barabas, makes it clear that it is Malta's position at the crossroads of a new, intercontinental enterprise which makes the island so important: the goods in which he trades, he tells us, come from Persia, Greece, and Spain, Egypt, Alexandria, Arabia and India. For Barabas, Malta is the place where commodities like oils, wines, spice and silks can be refined into other commodities whose value increases in inverse proportion to the commodities' volume: oils are exchanged for money, money in turn exchanged for precious stones, a gradual progressive condensation of 'infinite riches in a little room' (1.1.37) (the epitome of which, perhaps, is Malta itself). For Barabas, such exchange seems to occur almost miraculously: the Moor and the Indian (from whom the most precious of this wealth originates) can 'pick [their] riches up' (1.1.20) as they lie on the ground, the earth a cornucopia of wealth which is there for the taking. Indeed the only labour to which Barabas refers in his speech is his own, as he complains about what a 'trouble 'tis to count' the 'paltry silverings' (1.1.5) in which he has been paid, claiming that he 'all his lifetime hath been tired,/ Wearing his fingers' ends with telling it (1.1.15-6).

Barabas, then, simultaneously emphasises the centrality of trade and profit to Malta (and to the play) and mystifies the origin of that profit in labour and exploitation (miners, for instance, don't get mentioned by Barabas, only the merchants who profit from the mines). Such mystification of the shadier moral underpinnings of this new drive for profit, this new hunger for wealth, is not entirely shared by the play itself, in which, as Machevil first of all makes clear, the seemingly miraculous profusion of wealth is underpinned by the less mystical (although still mystified) designs of Machiavellian 'policy'. Trade and its consequent riches, Marlowe seems to be implying here, are inextricably linked with the systematic manipulation of power. Thus although over the course of the play wealth and Malta are removed from the Jews and the Turks respectively, to rest, finally, in the hands of the victorious Christians, the audience are not permitted the easy justification of that victory with which Ferneze, the Christian governor, concludes the play. 'Let due praise be given/ Neither to fate, not fortune, but to heaven' says Ferneze (5.5.122-3) - but this appeal to the will of God, and to right, sits uneasily with the play's exposure of the Christians' manipulation of the Machiavellian 'policy' which they have utilised, more successfully than anyone else, in the struggle for supremacy over Malta, a 'policy' in which, as Machevil points out in the prologue, 'might' (and not right) makes kings. Marlowe himself, it should be added, would certainly not have been opposed to such designs, despite his exposure of the hypocrisy with which they were frequently covered up. He was a personal player in the expansionary enterprise, with considerable vested interests in the economics of international trade; his personal involvement here may also be apparent in the impressive colonial energy with which he endows his Tamburlaine, who conquers and consumes his world in > Tamburlaine the Great 1 & 2 (published 1590).

Race

But one need not look to the Orient to see the vast impact which trade and expansion had on the Renaissance imagination: its presence is also apparent in plays whose location lies much closer to home. It is no coincidence that comedies like Jonson's > Volpone (first acted 1605/6) and Shakespeare's > The Merchant of Venice (1596-7)

both take place in the city which was the gateway to many of the trade routes established by the Renaissance seafarer traders. Nor is it coincidental that the latter play, like The Jew of Malta, fuses its concern with profit with the representation of a rapacious Jew. For trade brings with it necessary contact with other races and cultures, both those which had for years existed within European societies, (such as the Jews) and those with whom the cultural encounter was relatively new, at least to England (the Moors, for example). And if in The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice Jews function as the Europeans' cultural other, with whom the Europeans must compete, and whom they must contain or expel, so too, in different ways, does the eponymous hero of Shakespeare's tragedy > Othello (1604), and his Moorish compatriots in other plays − the slave Ithamore in The Jew of Malta, Zanche in > John Webster's > The White Devil (1608−9), Aaron in Shakespeare's early Roman tragedy > Titus Andronicus (1594); the Egyptian Queen Cleopatra in Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra (1606−7); and, of course, the 'salvage and deformed slave' of uncertain but undoubtedly 'Other' origins, Caliban, in The Tempest.

As we have seen in our discussion of The Tempest, however, the finer points of Renaissance attitudes to race are far from easy to determine. On the one hand, it is undoubtedly the case that on almost every occasion (with the possible exceptions of Othello and Antony and Cleopatra) where the audience is offered a representation of a character who is not white, villainy and evil are never far away. Even in plays such as The Jew of Malta, where all races and religions are shown to be at ease with Machiavellian policy and designs of highly dubious value, the villainy of Barabas is intrinsically associated with his race in a way that that of the Christians is not; the same could be said of the Moor Aaron in Titus Andronicus, whose self-confessed project of evil is expressed by him in terms of the desire to 'have his soul black like his face' (3.1.205).

But on the other hand, large-scale slavery of African races by the English only began in England in 1618, and since slavery generated, as well as stemmed from, the perception that other races were sub-human it is arguable that racist attitudes in the Renaissance were far less entrenched than they were in later years: the easy assumption of continuous political 'progress', in other words, is one which should be treated with considerable caution. We would not have to look far in our own culture, for example, to find attitudes less liberal than those expressed in the Renaissance by people such as Montaigne, who argued in his essay 'Of the Cannibales' that in condemning other cultures we simply despise what we do not understand: 'there is nothing in that [cannibal] nation,' Montaigne argues, 'that is either barbarous or savage, unless men call that barbarism which is not common to them'. The advent of large-scale slavery brought with it an ideology of the black African as a commodity, an object to be bought and sold on the international market; consequently, it might be claimed, attitudes towards black individuals became more, and not less, racist. By the end of the eighteenth century, for example, > Coleridge found the thought of miscegenation in Othello so repellent that he denied that Shakespeare intended Othello to be black, claiming that 'it would be something monstrous to conceive this beautiful Venetian girl falling in love with a veritable negro'. And observations like this, it should be noted, continued well into the twentieth century, as Ridley's Arden edition of the play makes clear.

What of the play itself? On the one hand, attitudes similar to those of Coleridge are, undoubtedly, reflected also in the play of which he speaks. Othello himself seems progressively to internalise such attitudes in his own self-conception: at the beginning of the play he defines himself against the foreign and barbarous black Other, the 'Cannibals, that each other eat,/ The Anthropophagi, and men whose heads/ Do grow beneath their shoulders' (1.3.144-5); at the play's conclusion he seems to consider himself of a kind with those Other races to whom he had earlier opposed his own identity when he describes himself as a 'malignant and a turban'd Turk,' a 'circumcised dog' (5.2.355). And most obviously, Iago invokes a racist disgust at the thought of miscegenation very similar to that expressed by Coleridge when he rouses Brabantio with the words 'an old black ram/ Is tupping your white ewe' (1.1.88-9). But Iago's perceptions of the issue are not identical to the play's, nor, one would have thought, to its original audience's, for whom Iago is a 'hellish villain'. And whatever the answer to the old critical question of whether or not Othello and Desdemona have consummated their marriage, the play concludes with an instruction to the audience to look upon the 'tragic lodging of this bed' (5.2.364) - the marital bed, that is, one which the black and white bodies of Othello and Desdemona lie reconciled, finally, in death. Renaissance audiences, then, could at least countenance the idea that a black man might wed a white woman (and sleep with her), in a way that later audiences found very difficult to accept; the question of what vision the play itself has of the importance of race, or of what political attitudes the discourse of face in the early modern period actually denotes, remains one of great critical debate.

The City and Theatricality

The increasing interest in racial matters in the Renaissance is, then, a product at least in part of its increasing encounters with other cultures in its trade abroad. No less substantial a concern can be noted regarding trade at home. Thus comedies like Jonson's > Bartholomem Fair and > The Alchemist (1610) offer us, respectively, representations of an English country and an English city in which the ethos of the marketplace is both paramount and explicit (as the title of the former would lead us to expect). And the latter's setting can also point towards another development within Renaissance drama, most notable, perhaps, in Jonson, (see also his > The Devil is an Ass (1616) and co-authored > Eastward Hoe (1605) but also apparent in some of Shakespeare's plays: the Roman plays (Coriolanus (1608?), and ➤ Julius Caesar (c. 1599)) for instance; some history plays, like > Henry IV 1 & 2 (quarto editions 1598) and 1600 respectively); and in comedies like > The Merry Wives of Windsor (1597). Like Volpone and The Alchemist, albeit in different ways, these texts are set in the new world of the city, an urban setting which is worlds apart from the pastoral locations of comedies such as Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, and > As You Like It (c. 1599); romances like his > The Winter's Tale and (co-authored?) > Pericles (1608-9); tragicomedies like > John Fletcher's > The Faithful Shepherdess (1610); and tragedies like Francis Beaumont's and Fletcher's > The Maid's Tragedy (1610). Many of these, it is true, move between court and country - unlike, for example, many history plays, and many revenge and 'anti-revenge' tragedies (such as ⊳ Thomas Kyd's > The Spanish Tragedy (1587), > Cyril Tourneur's > The Atheist's Tragedy (1611) and > John Marston's satirical tragicomedy of revenge > The Malcontent (1604)), whose setting is entirely, or far more consistently, courtly. But courtly and pastoral locations differ greatly from the world of the city play, whose protagonists are often merchants, artisans, or other members of the lower classes, as in > Thomas Dekker's > The Shoemaker's Holiday (published 1600), > Thomas Heywood's The Four Prentices of London (1600), > Philip Massinger's > The City Madam (1632), ▶ Middleton's ▶ A Chaiste Maid in Cheapside (1613), and Sir Francis Beaumont's parody of citizen comedy, > The Knight of the Burning Pestle (1607). And all of these settings differ, again, from the world of the domestic tragedy, whose setting is the home, as we see for example in the anonymous ▷ Arden of Faversham (1592), and in ▷ Thomas Heywood's ▷ A Woman Killed With Kindness (1603).

City comedies are frequently characterised by an extraordinary energy and movement: characters bustle frenetically into, out of, and around the stage in a cacophonous and pleasurable medley of voices and action which reflects, perhaps, the brave new world of the urban environment. The development of that environment, indeed, is one of the most direct causatory material factors behind the hegemony of drama amongst the Renaissance literary arts, for unlike poetry and prose, (which, of course, also experienced an explosion in the Renaissance, partially as a result of the technological advance of the printing press), drama demands, and potentially gratifies, audiences of many people at once. The rise of the city guaranteed that there would be enough people in the same place to pay for the productions they consumed (the Globe theatre, for example, established in 1599, could play to audiences of almost 3,000, and was only one of several large theatres established in the period). Many plays, it is true, were still performed at Court. But the development of the city meant that the court was no longer the only, or even the dominant, form of patronage.

The exponential rise of the theatre can be read in the texts of the period in terms of the frequent, and self-conscious, theatricality with which characters and sentiments are represented, as dramatists draw similarities, or contrasts, between the world of the stage and the real world outside. Thus in one of his most famous speeches, Jacques in As You Like It declares that 'all the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players' (2.7.139-40); in The Tempest, in a speech in which the barriers between stage-world and real world seem to dissolve and disappear, Prospero speaks of 'the great globe itself' melting into nothing, leaving 'not a rack behind' (4.1.155-6); in Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, Revenge opens the play by referring self-consciously to his own role in it: 'Here we sit down to see the mystery, / And serve for Chorus in this tragedy' (Induction, 90-1); and concludes it with similarly self-referential theatricality: 'For here though death hath end their misery,/ I'll there begin their endless tragedy' (Chorus, 47-8). Plays within plays are a recurrent phenomenon in the texts: Hamlet, for example, arranges a production of a play called 'The Mousetrap' in order to 'catch the conscience of the king' (2.2.601); whilst A Midsummer Night's Dream concludes with the production of 'Pyramus and Thisbe' by the 'mechanicals,' (the artisanal actors who produce the play for their king), in a scene in which the comic ineptitude of the actors overlays what is in fact a profound meditation on the relation between art and reality and the phenomenon of theatrical experience. Indeed, the trope of the 'play within the play' can be extended so that, in a kind of infinite regress of theatricality, the entire play itself is embedded in another, as is for example the case with > The Taming of the Shrew (1503-4), where the main action of the play is, explicitly, a theatrical performance, performed before the beggar Christopher Sly, who has been abducted, drunk, from a tavern, and given to believe that he is Lord of a manor.

In The Taming of the Shrem, as in all of the Shakespearean examples of this phenomenon I have mentioned here, Shakespeare figures theatrical performance as analogous to dreaming. Hamlet refers to acting as 'a dream of passion' (2.2.546), thus drawing further similarities between the actors and himself, 'like John-a-dreams, unpregnant of my cause' (2.2.363); Sly tries desperately (and unsuccessfully) to separate out his 'real' experience from his dreams again' (Induction 2, 122); and in The Tempest and A Midsummer Night's Dream, the distinctions between waking and dreaming, reality and theatricality, are progressively collapsed until audiences, like actors, become ethereal and unreal: 'we are such stuff/As dreams are made on,' says Prospero, 'and our little life/Is rounded with a sleep' (4.1.156–8). This kind of lyrical, philosophical meditation on the relation between the theatrical and the real world, however, is only one of many ways in which playwrights utilise self-conscious theatricality to comment on the world: in Jonson's Bartholomem Fair, for example, in which (like The Taming of the Shrew,) the main action of the play is embedded in an induction which draws explicit attention to the fact that the play is a performance, as the stage-keeper, book-holder and scrivener enter to draw up a contract between author, players, and audience. 'Not for want of a prologue, but by way of a new one, I am sent out to you here,' says the Book-holder, with a scrivener, and certain articles drawn out in haste between our author, and you; which if you please to hear, and as they appear reasonable, to approve of, the play will follow presently:

(Induction, 58-62).

Jonson's satire here takes as its object not only his audience, but also other playwrights and himself. He figures himself in this introduction as being involved in an intensely competitive relation with his fellow playwrights (most notably, but not only, with Shakespeare, whose plays he represents as passé) and also as being obliged to enter into a contract with an audience whose judgement he essentially despises, but whose appreciation he is, nevertheless, obliged to gratify and solicit. In other words, he recognises the necessity of writing for this new audience of the riff-raff, instead of the crown: 'it is further agreed,' his 'contract' states, that every person here have his ... free will of censure, ... the author having now departed with his right: it shall be lawful for any man to judge his six pen'orth, his twelve pen'orth, so to his eighteenpence, two shillings, half a crown, to the value of his place: provided always his place get not above his wit.

But as he recognises that these are the new public he must please, he simultaneously chafes against having to pander to their uneducated and stupid judgement, implying that the rise of this new group of consumers of artistic production results in the prostitution of the playwright: 'if the puppets will please anybody,' he cynically promises, 'they shall be entreated to come in'.

In the Induction to Bartholomem Fair, then, Jonson represents the playwright as being no less immune to the temptation to prostitute his own talents in exchange for financial reward than are the many characters in his other dramas whom he satirises for the same reason. Wealth and the desire for it are frequently his targets, as for example, in Volpone, which opens with Volpone turning from the morning sun to apotheosize his gold, and proceeds along a plot line in which everyone is willing to sell their souls for Volpone's riches. Some are also willing to sell other people: Corvino agrees in this play to prostitute his wife for a chance of inheriting Volpone's wealth: in this new world of trade and exchange people (and perhaps especially women), become reified, turned into commodities who can be exchanged in a market of money and desires. Less easily recognisable consequences of this new economy and its contingent ideologies can also be noted in Renaissance drama. We might take, for example, the figure of the malcontent. Marston's play of that name is not quite representative of this figure, since the malcontent of The Malcontent is a deposed Duke, whereas the more familiar malcontent of early modern drama is generally of more uncertain social status, of a lower class than the other protagonists of the drama, like Bosola in Webster's \triangleright The Duchess of Malfi (1613) or Thersites in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida, and very often a bastard, like Edmund in Shakespeare's King Lear or his predecessor, Philip, in Shakespeare's \triangleright King John (1596–7).

Class and Gender: Bastards

It is not simply in the malcontent's dubious social status that he (for malcontents in Renaissance drama, like bastards, are almost always male) reflects a new kind of figure. Neither aristocrat nor peasant, he frequently expresses and justifies his claims and his grievances in a language that is very different from that of the aristocratic world in which he finds himself. This can best be exemplified, perhaps, in Edmund's diatribe against the injustice of the court. 'Thou, Nature, art my Goddess;' Edmund declares early on in King Lear, to thy law My services are bound. Wherefore should I Stand in the plague of custom, and permit The curiosity of nations to deprive me, For that I am some twelve or fourteen moonshines Lag of a brother? Why bastard? wherefore base? When my dimensions are as well compact, My mind as generous, and my shape as true As honest madam's issue? Why brand they us With base? with baseness? bastardy? base, base? Who in the lusty stealth of nature take More composition and fierce quality Than doth, within a dull, stale, tired bed Go to th' creating a whole tribe of fops, Go 'tween asleep and wake? Well then. Legitimate Edgar, I must have your land:

Edmund's words here express an ethic (or an ideology) vastly divergent from that which would underlie an aristocratic point of view. That older view of 'nature' and 'desert' (which finds its expression in the Great Chain of Being speech in Troilus and Cressida which I mentioned earlier in this essay) would imply that wealth, status and power are properly derived through birth, that one's intrinsic merit derives directly from one's place in society, which has been previously ordained by God. It is this view which is expressed, for example, in what is sometimes known as 'the romance convention of discovered parentage'; – the royal child, lost at birth and brought up by peasants who always know that she or he must be of higher social status because s/he is more sensitive/ courageous/ virtuous/ beautiful/ finer-limbed and so forth than the more run-of-the-mill (and lower class) specimen of a human being. A folkloric example of this convention might be 'Snow White,' a more literary one Perdita in The Winter's Tale. For Edmund, this view is the 'plague of custom,' to which his own ethic self-consciously opposes itself. He proposes instead a kind of meritocracy, where merit is afforded by what you make of yourself (an ideology, incidentally, far closer to our own), where status and power should derive from 'Nature,' and are not the manifestation of a divine order, and through which the baser born have as much moral legitimacy to rule as their social superiors.

It is, as I have already mentioned, no coincidence that the malcontent is so frequently a bastard. This, however, is not merely because his bastardy confers upon him an unstable social status, but also because class and gender conflicts in the plays of the period are very frequently expressed in terms of each other, as Edmund makes plain in his emphasis on the word that links both his social and sexual marginality, 'base'. The sexual product of an illicit social union, the bastard appears frequently in early modern drama, especially, but not only, in tragedy: a recent critical study has identified 71 bastards in the corpus of early modern drama. This is perhaps partially reflective of a real historical trend: the number of children born out of wedlock peaked at around 1600. But the bastard is also used to bring to the fore other social crises concerning the family and sexuality. In King Lear, for instance, Edmund functions to accentuate not only class, but also issues of the family. King Lear is organised around two incomplete families (both of which lack mothers, as do a substantial number of other families in Renaissance drama): Edmund and his brother Edgar, sons of Gloucester, whose story constitutes the subplot of the play, and King Lear and his three daughters, Cordelia, Goneril and Regan. Much of the play is thus concerned with issues of paternal authority; other forms of authority, most notably monarchical, are consistently intertwined in this play with issues of paternal power – the authority, or law, of the father. Thus in the opening scene, Lear's ill-conceived plan to divide his kingdom between his three daughters is indivisible from the love test that he sets for them, and the collapse of his regal authority set in motion by his ungovernable anger when his favourite daughter Cordelia fails this test.

Class and Gender: Fathers, daughters, sexuality and desire

It is also no coincidence that this love-test (and the division of the kingdom) occur in King Lear at the moment when Cordelia is about to leave the paternal home to marry and become a wife. In Lear's case, he seems unable to countenance the fact that from henceforth Cordelia's affections must be divided; she, on the other hand, insists on the necessity of this when she replies to his demands with the words,

You have begot me, bred me, lov'd me: I Return those duties back as are right fit,
Why have my sisters husbands, if they say,
They love you all? Haply when I shall wed,
That lord whose hand must take my plight shall carry
Half my love with him, half my care and duty:
Sure I shall never marry like my sisters, to love my father all.

Cordelia conceives of her relation to her father in terms of a system of duties and obligations; he, though he wants her to behave like a dutiful daughter, cannot accept that on the moment when she becomes a wife those duties must be divided between her father and her spouse. The transition from paternal home to that of one's spouse, then, is one which is fraught with enormous difficulties: the conflicts consequent on this rite-of-passage underlie, for example Othello, Middleton's > Women Beware Women (1614) and Middleton and Rowley's > The Changeling (1622) as well as > Cymbeline, and the Shakespearean comedies The Taming of the Shrew, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and > Much Ado About Nothing (1598).

Not all of these plays emphasise the father-daughter relation in their treatment of this familiar moment (in Women Beware Women, for example, Bianca has already been 'stolen' from the paternal home when the play begins). Nevertheless, paternal authority is so important that it can go on being invoked, especially in the contexts of the daughter's marriage, even when the father is no longer there. His influence can persist long after his physical self has disappeared: as Portia sardonically laments in The Merchant of Venice, 'so is the will of a living daughter curb'd by the will of a dead father' (1.2.23–5). And in The Duchess of Malfi, the duchess' brother Ferdinand appropriates the symbol of phallic paternal authority in his attempt to control his widowed sister's sexuality and prevent her from remarrying: 'this was my father's poniard,' he tells her, 'do you see,/ I'd be loath to see't look rusty, 'cause 'twas his' (1.2.253–4).

The attempt to control female sexuality, then, and the problems and dilemmas consequent on this attempt, appear ubiquitously in Renaissance drama. Ferdinand's is only one case, useful for us here because it highlights another frequent concern of Renaissance drama: the representation of illicit sexualities, as well as their frequent juxtaposition with instances of cross-class marriages. At one extreme, the right of women to control their married lives and, if they wish, initiate divorce is supported by Elizabeth Cary in The Tragedy of Mariam. On the other hand, in the case of Duchess of Malfi, both her brothers contest the woman's right to marry again, but whilst her elder brother, the Cardinal, is motivated by the Machiavellian desire to control state politics and inheritances, her younger brother Ferdinand's motivation is far less easy to discern. This latter play suggests, (always implicitly) that his disgust at the thought of his sister's remarriage stems from his own incestuous desire for his sister (it is hard to understand his frenetic fantasies about his sister's intercourse with 'strong-thigh'd bargemen' (2.5.43) as anything other than a warped obsession with his sister's sexuality). Incestuous desire appears elsewhere in Renaissance drama too: it is the subject of Women Beware Women, it may well underlie Hamlet's vexed and probably oedipal relation to his mother Gertrude, it lurks beneath the text in Beaumont and Fletcher's > A King and No King and is given its fullest, and arguably most sympathetic, treatment in > John Ford's > 'Tis Pity She's A Whore (1632). In this play, as in The Duchess of Malfi, sibling incest is thematically linked with crossclass marriage, as if each if the obverse of the other, incest perhaps operating as an excessively endogamous solution to a new, and to some very threatening, exogamous social development. As has been recently suggested, this fusion of social and sexual anxieties may find expression in the plays through the metaphor of blood. Thus in The Duchess of Malfi Ferdinand expresses his desires in terms of their capacity to 'purge infected blood, such blood as hers,' in response to his brother's question, 'Shall our blood? The royal blood of Aragon and Castile, Be thus attained? (2.5.21-22); in 'Tis Pity She's a Whore Giovanni, similarly, justifies his transgressive desires by arguing that he is 'bound' to his sister 'by the links of blood' (1.1.32).

Incestuous desire is not the only form of desire which is represented in the plays of the early modern period as radically destructive. The homoerotic passion of Marlowe's Edward II and the self-consuming passion of Antony and Cleopatra, for example, are represented as equally dangerous to the state, and to stability within the family; the same is also true of desire in ➤ Mary Sidney's The Tragedy of Antonie. In Middleton and Rowley's The Changeling, the fascinatingly complicated relationship between the 'heroine' Beatrice-Johanna and her servant De Flores is used as a vehicle for an examination of the dangers of desire. Beatrice-Johanna's reaction to De Flores is characterised first by repulsion (she 'does profess herself/ The cruellest enemy to my face in town,' says De Flores, and 'at no hand can abide the sight of me' (2.1.33−5)); then by disturbance, as she can 'scarce leave trembling of an hour after' seeing him (2.1.91); and finally by compulsion: 'I'm forced to love thee now', she says to him after having slept with him (5.1.47). These mysterious, and unexplained, turns in Beatrice-Johanna's feelings for De Flores may perhaps partially be explained by De Flores' name. Beatrice-Johanna seems both to fear and desire the moment when she loses her virginity, and it is perhaps this complex of feeling which underlies the representation of De Flores (the deflowerer).

One of the reasons that desire is potentially so dangerous, and the control of female sexuality so crucial, is of course a social one: if a man does not control the sexuality of 'his' women, he can never be sure that the children he produces are his own. The production of bastards can thus threaten the very foundation of early modern property distribution, primogeniture, whereby property is passed from father to his eldest son. But however important this, it cannot explain every aspect of the representation of the relations between men and women in early modern drama, which seems frequently to pit male characters against female in a kind of battle of the sexes, as for example in Shakespeare's > Love's Labours Lost (1594-5), and The Merchant of Venice, both of which end with the chastisement of the male characters by the female. In the latter play this chastisement is linked, in the plot, to the earlier trial scene, in which Portia, the heroine, sorts out the legal mess which her betrothed, Bassanio, has landed himself in, by disguising herself as a male judge. This transvesticism, or cross-dressing, in which women disguise themselves as men (for self-protection, as in Twelfth Night and As You Like It, or to effect some kind of action, as in The Merchant of Venice) is a recurrent trope of the plays of the period, appearing not only in the Shakespearean plays I have mentioned, but also in his > Two Gentlemen of Verona (1593-4), in > John Lyly's Gallathea (1585) and in Jonson's > Epicoene, or the Silent Woman (1609) and > The New Inn (1629), and Beaumont and Fletcher's > Philaster, or Love Lies a-Bleeding (1611).

The complexity and depths with which cross-dressing can be used were considerable. The practice self-evidently raises issues of theatrical disguise, but it also affords the dramatist enormous possibilities for an examination of the dynamics of desire. In Twelfth Night, for example, the Duke Orsino experiences some anxiety when he finds himself becoming overly attached to a person whom he believes to be a young man, and similar humour surrounds Olivia's infatuation with the same person, whom the audience know to be a woman. But the issue is complicated even further in these plays by the fact that in the Renaissance, female characters were played not by women, but by boys. Thus in The Taming of the Shrew, Shakespeare indulges in a self-consciously theatrical joke at Sly's expense when he has a page-boy, dressed as a woman, act as though he is Sly's wife, and in As You Like It, he takes the dramatic and comic possibilities of cross-dressing and boy actors to an extreme when he offers us a situation in which a boy plays a girl who plays a boy who plays a girl in a (false) marriage with her unknowing beloved. And in the epilogue to the play, Rosalind steps in and out of his/her stage role to address the audience directly, commenting as s/he does so both on dramatic convention, and on the way in which the audience's own desires and identifications are complicated by the play's use of cross-dressing and boy actors. 'It is not the fashion to see the lady the epilogue,' she says, but it is no more unhandsome than to see the lord the prologue. . . . I'll begin with the women. I charge you, O women, for the love you bear to men, to like as much of this play as please you. And I charge you, O men, for the love you bear to women – as I perceive by your simpering none of you hates them – that between you and the women the play may please. If I were a woman, I would kiss as many of you that had beards that pleased me, complexions that liked me, and breaths that I defied not. And I am sure, as many as have good beards, or good faces, or sweet breaths, will for my kind offer, when I make courtesy, bid me farewell.

Theology, Subjectivity and the Self

The cross-dressed heroine, then, can be used by the dramatist to examine profound (if generally comic) issues of social and sexual identity (one might look also, in this context, at Middleton's > The Roaring Girl (1606). And this brings us to our final broad topic of discussion in this essay, which is the nature of identity, of the self, in Renaissance drama, its connections with what has gone before, and the ways in which its representation is revised in the face of new, and challenging, beliefs about the world.

I have, throughout most of this essay, concentrated primarily on things which are, broadly speaking, new developments in the Renaissance. But I do not want, by doing this, to imply that there is no continuity with what has gone before, for this would not be true. In the early stages of the Renaissance, especially, dramatists took their poetic models from literature of earlier ages: early tragedies, for example, such as > Thomas Norton and > Thomas Sackville's Gordubuc (1561) and Jonson's Sejanus (1603) experimented with Senecan tragic form, and classical models are also apparent in plays such as ➤ Nicholas Udall's ➤ Ralph Roister Doister (1552), ➤ Thomas Preston's Cambyses (1569), > George Gascoigne's Supposes (1566), > George Whetstone's Promos and Cassandra (1578), and Lyly's Alexander and Campaspe (1584), Endymion (1588) and Midas (1589). > Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland and Ireland (1578) chronicled the lives of medieval kings, which formed the subject matter of Shakespeare's history plays, as well as for tragedies like Macbeth and King Lear, and the medieval philosophy of Roger Bacon was the subject of ⊳ Robert Greene's Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1589). And much Renaissance drama draws on beliefs which had a long historical precedent. The comedy of humours, for example, (whose most salient practitioner was Jonson – see his > Every Man in His Humour (1598) and > Every Man Out of His Humour (1599) draws upon a theory of psychology that had been current from classical times through the Middle Ages: however new the anarchic energy of Jonson's comedies are, he is working out of a theory of the self which had been around for centuries.

Do we, then, see any change in the representation of the self in the plays of the Renaissance period? Many commentators, from Jacob Burkhardt in 1860 to contemporary cultural materialist and new historicist critics (like Catherine Belsey and Stephen Greenblatt, for example), have, despite their differences with each other, argued that there is, and have claimed that the Renaissance sees the rise of a self which is recognisably modern, the precursor or origin of our own conception of human individuality. This is a view which is currently coming under attack from critics in other periods – from Medievalists, for example, who argue that many of the attributes of the self cited by Renaissance critics are recognisably present in earlier years, and conversely from Foucauldian critics, and critics of Romanticism, who variously claim that the important changes took place much later. In what follows, I'll try to elaborate some of the claims which have been made for the rise of this new subjectivity, always acknowledging, however, that the question is one which is far from decided.

Marlowe's > Doctor Faustus (1592?) is a text which is self-evidently concerned with the obsession with new knowledge which characterises so many aspects of the Renaissance: its eponymous protagonist comes to a sticky end as a result of his pact with Lucifer's servant Mephistophilis to relinquish his soul in return for unlimited knowledge. In this play we can identify, quite clearly, two contrasting views of the world. One invokes the medieval morality play, in which vices and virtues, personified, are clearly defined, and immediately recognisable: here in Doctor Faustus, those vices and virtues are reflected in the Good and Bad Angels who stand on either side of Faustus, whispering their respective advice in his ears. Good and Evil here are arranged as each others' opposites, just as Heaven and Hell are clearly both inverses of each other, and situatable in a distinct and stable place in space, the one above, the other below. With the representation of Mephistophilis, it is frequently argued, we have something completely different. His account of the world refuses the literalism of the good and bad angels; for Mephistophilis Heaven and Hell, for instance, are not locateable in a specific space, but situated within the soul. Thus in the following extract, Faustus' insistent demands as to where Heaven and Hell are, in physical space, are countered by Mephistophilis' equally insistent reply that this is a misconception of the concepts implied by those terms. 'First will I question with thee about hell,' says Faustus:

Tell me, where is the place that men call hell?
Meph. Under the heavens.
Faus. Ay, so are all things else, but whereabouts?
Meph. Within the bowels of these elements,
Where we are tortur'd and remain for ever.
Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscrib'd
In one self place, but where we are is hell,
And where hell is, there must we ever be;
And, to be short, when all the world dissolves
And every creature shall be purifd,
All places shall be hell that is not heaven.

Doctor Faustus does not resolve the questions that it raises about the 'truth' of these contradictory points of view. Dr Faustus is destroyed by devils at the end of the drama, dismembered and whisked off to a conventional Hell, full of literal fire and brimstone, existing very definitely below the earth. Yet Mephistophilis' claim that Hell is not physically locatable but carried within the soul lingers beyond the play's conclusion, undermining its adherence to the old theological order.

Mephistophilis is distanced from the Good and Bad angels with whom he appears not only by his refusal to accept their literalism about the world, but also by virtue of his interiority and depth; in Doctor Faustus, at least, the representation of this new way of conceiving of Heaven and Hell would appear to be linked with an emphasis on the complexity of the self. One of the dramatic devices through which this interiority is communicated to us is that of the soliloquy, which is used by Marlowe, but developed further by Shakespeare in plays such as Macbeth, Othello, Richard III and, most notably, Hamlet. Like the aside, the soliloguy can sometimes be used primarily, or ostensibly, to impart information about the plot, as it is for example at the beginning of Richard III, where Richard informs the audience of the depths of his Machiavellian scheming, or in Middleton's > The Revenger's Tragedy (1607), where the revenger Vindice uses his opening soliloquy to inform us of what has gone before. But the soliloquy to inform us of what has gone before. But the soliloquy can do something much more than merely transmit to the audience necessary information about the plot, information, which, after all, might be communicated in other ways (by a chorus of a chorus figure, for example, as it is in Romeo and Juliet and Pericles). In the soliloguy, we see the construction of a new kind of relation between audience and speaker, in which the inner workings of the speaker's mind are represented to the audience in a dramatic moment of extraordinary intimacy. This intimacy can be used to establish a kind of complicity or understanding between audience and speaker, as it is, for example, in Richard III, and, in quite a different way, in Twelfth Night, where Viola occasionally, and comically, laments the complexities of her situation to the audience. The soliloquy's main generic home, however, is tragedy, in which it is frequently used to present to the audience a self at once fragmented and torn, and intensely isolated from the world that surrounds him (for again, soliloquisers are almost always male). In Macbeth for example, Shakespeare uses the soliloguy as one means of representing Macbeth's increasingly isolated madness, and the confusion of his conscience as he considers the imminent murder of his king. In Act 2, for example, Macbeth apostrophises a dagger:

Is this a dagger which I see before me,
The handle toward my hand? — Come let me clutch thee:
I have thee not, and yet I see thee still.
Art thou not fatal vision, sensible
To feeling as of sight? Or art thou but
A dagger of the mind, a false creation
Proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain?
I see thee yet, in form as palpable
As this which I now draw . . .

At this point in the play, as later in the scene when the ghost of Macbeth's murdered friend Banquo arrives to take Macbeth's place at a banquet, directors of the play on stage, as well as critics writing about it on paper, must make an interpretative choice. Do the audience, like Macbeth, see the dagger, and/or the ghost of Banquo? Or is it Macbeth alone who 'sees' them? Are they messengers from another world? Or are they manifestations of Macbeth's troubled conscience? Ghosts, for example, appear in several plays of the early modern period. But they generally speak (thus making it clear to us, since we hear them too, that they own some reality beyond the imagination of the character who sees them). Banquo's does not, which affords the director the opportunity of playing the scene entirely from a perspective which emphasises the play's interest in the main character's state of mind, a recurrent interest of Macbeth, which returns, for instance, in the sleepwalking scene at the end of the play, when Lady Macbeth walks in her sleep, washing her hands in the attempt to remove from them the bloodstains she imagines they carry.

The play which saw the most sustained and extensive use of the soliloquy, however, was Shakespeare's Hamlet. Hamlet's tortured consciousness is represented to us in this play with extraordinary complexity, as he wrestles with the opposing ethics and moralities of an age in which no course of action offers itself as clear. His problem is in one sense that he cannot tell what to believe: whether suicide is a noble or ignoble course of action, for example; whether the 'questionable shape' of the ghost in the play is 'a spirit of health or goblin damn'd' (1.4.40); whether older paradigms or revenge and honour can still hold for one who, like him, is 'pigeon-liver'd' and lacks 'gall/ To make oppression bitter' (2.2.574). Packed with questions to which they can hope to offer no answers, Hamlet's soliloquies represent him alone in his confusion and his melancholy, isolated in his profound scepticism from everyone else who surrounds him. As he himself laments,

The time is out of joint, Oh cursed spite That ever I was born to set it right.

(1.5.196-7)

It is Hamlet's perception of his isolation not merely from others, but from his historical moment, that has, at least in part, lent him his stature as one of literature's most paradigmatic tragic heroes. And however 'subjective' his perception of his age, it can stand, perhaps, as an epigraph at least for many current views of the Renaissance: a time out of joint with itself and its history, an age fraught with conflict and contradiction, discovery and collapse, out of which appeared some of the most compellingly fascinating drama of England's literary history.

The Augustan Age in Perspective

Eva Simmons

The term > 'Augustan' (followed by 'England', 'age', 'era', and so on) has been applied variously, to the entire period 1660-1789 or to only parts of that time, sometimes very loosely indeed, and often without explanation. Historically, there have been repeated debates about when exactly the Augustan age occurred, what it was, or indeed whether such an age existed at all.

Lately new attention has been focused on changes in attitudes and styles of writing in the latter part of the supposed period, and on its relation to the previous and subsequent periods. Many elements more commonly associated with the Romantic (> Romanticism) period are already evident in numerous works from roughly the mid-18th century onwards. Some critics, such as René Wellek (Comparative Literature, I, 1949) and more recently Marilyn Butler (Romantics, Rebels, and Reactionaries: English Literature and its Background 1760-1830, 1981), have suggested that particular emphasis should be placed on these proto-romantic features, although others, such as Cleanth Brooks (Modern Poetry and the Tradition, 1939) and James Sambrook (The Eighteenth Century: The Intellectual and Cultural Context of English Literature 1700-1789, 1986), treat them simply as new directions in literature, rather than as ruptures of the past (and Sambrook dismisses the notion of 'Augustanism' entirely). One view places these works in a category of their own, labelled > 'Sentiment' or > 'Sensibility', while another fails to see any substantial change (see, for example, Norman Callan's 'Augustan Reflective Poetry', in Boris Ford (ed.), The New Pelican Guide to English Literature: From Dryden to Johnson, Vol. 4). But before these issues are discussed, it may be helpful to go back to the origins of the term 'Augustan', to understand how it came about, and what light it throws upon the times it purports to identify, as well as to consider its usefulness today.

The meaning of Augustanism

Broadly speaking, 'Augustan' has been used to signify times in which literature or, more accurately, literature in its relation to politics, supposedly resembled the literature and politics of ancient Rome under Augustan rule. Various English monarchs have been compared, in their own day and subsequently, with the Emperor > Caesar Augustus, while authors of their reigns have been compared with the classical writers of Augustus' time. According to one commonly expressed formula, English monarchs from Charles II onwards have been admired as bringers of peace after periods of war, and as sponsors of the arts, just as Augustus himself was supposed to have been - encouraging the arts to flourish in a new harmonious atmosphere. But even in Augustus' own reign, this view of him, which he encouraged, was questioned, and after his death it became even more controversial. Similarly, in the 18th century, questioning and disillusionment followed the earlier idealization of Augustus, initiating a reappraisal of contemporary rulers.

Dispute arose partly due to the ambiguous character of Augustus, who became sole ruler after the defeat of Antony and Cleopatra at Actium. Even before his accession, he had shared responsibility for killing thousands of citizens thought to threaten the power of the state, under a policy known as the 'proscription'. Yet he claimed afterwards to have restored the ancient freedom of the Republic (in the name of which Julius Caesar had been murdered) and his 41-year rule was peaceful; it was a period in which Rome expanded its colonial boundaries, while the city itself was remodelled, and literature flourished. For example > Virgil and > Horace (> Latin literature), both of whom were patronized by Augustus, represented the triumphs of the age and, not surprisingly, they both praised the ruler for his bounty.

However Rome's steep decline began immediately after Augustus' death in AD 14, with a series of corrupt, cruel and incompetent rulers including Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, and Domitian. Some classical historians, especially ➤ Tacitus, presented a deeply critical vision of Augustus as a tyrant who deceived his people into thinking they were free while bringing in autocracy and paving the way for an even worse form of tyranny. Subsequent writers became fascinated with trying to interpret what had happened in this critical period of Roman history: what was the 'meaning', so to speak, of Augustus' rule, and how did his deeds compare with those of their own rulers? He could be seen either as a model for emulation, or as the embodiment of a warning; the last of the 'good' rulers, and a bulwark against chaos, or among the first of the worst: behind him the Republic, after him decay. The process of enquiry had one overriding aim, namely, to improve understanding of the writers' own times, in order to draw moral conclusions and provide moral instruction. This might make it possible to imitate Augustus' triumphs, or avoid his mistakes, depending on the outcome of the investigation.

Augustus and Augustanism in the 17th and 18th centuries

The ▷ Renaissance renewed interest in Italy and its history throughout Europe and, during the 17th and 18th centuries, concern with Augustus' era was widespread. Because European culture was seen to derive substantially from the Roman (Latin still played an important part in literature), and Augustus' reign was so pivotal in the history of Rome, and because writers of Augustus' time were so much admired, the Emperor's life and actions were carefully studied. In England his era held a special fascination, because of the country's own recent turbulent experiences, which included two major revolutions, a period of Republican rule (under ▷ Cromwell), and repeated foreign wars. English translations of ▷ Tacitus at the end of the 16th century, and again at the end of the 17th, helped to stimulate debate.

Much early writing in England, as well as in other parts of Europe, considered Augustus as a model for just and peaceful rule. At the begining of the 17th century > James I encouraged comparisons of himself with the Roman, assisted by authors such as > Ben Jonson, who praised him as a successor of Augustus. But at the > Restoration the image of Augustus as healer and patron of the arts acquired a deeper resonance, at least in aristocratic circles. Charles II set the agenda himself, even more than his grandfather had done, in order to present himself as a symbol of Augustinian rule, almost Augustus re-incarnate. A series of triumphal arches recalling antique victories was built in what is now the City of London, and lavish entertainments were designed to celebrate his accession. Poets including > Dryden rose to the occasion: his Astraea Redux (1660) (> Astraea) greeted Charles' return, 'Oh Happy Age! Oh times like those alone / By Fate reserv'd for Great Augustus Throne! / When the joint growth of Armes and Arts foreshew / The World a Monarch, and that Monarch You'. And a poem by Alexander Huish actually reworks an Horatian Ode welcoming Augustus back after long wars:

Restore thy Country her lost light, good King; Thine own sweet face, which since like lovely Spring W'have hop't to see, the day hath merrier gone, The Sun hath brighter, better shone . . . Long mayst thou live, and make long holy-day,

Good King, unto thy Country . . .

Such towering hopes were not likely to be fulfilled, on earth at any rate, and disillusion soon set in, as was expressed in such poems as > Absalom and Achitophel (1681) and > Macflecknoe (1682). In Dryden's own version of the story of Antony and Cleopatra, > All for Love (1678), it has been argued, Charles is implicitly identified with Augustus' enemy Mark Antony, neglecting affairs of state in order to gratify his lusts, rather than with Augustus himself. Macflecknoe documents Dryden's ostensible despair at the lamentable state of letters in his time, just as > Pope's > The Dunciad (1728) was to do in the next generation. Each of these poems sets up mock monarchs of dullness to represent the supposed 'spirit of the Age', against which the poet rails, and which contrasts strongly with the heroic spirit heralded in the earlier poems. The demise of > heroic drama, noted in my essay 'Restoration and 18th-century drama' (see pp. 49–50) also charts the decline from confident admiration of the monarch, and the heroic values ostensibly associated with him, to disillusionment and scepticism. At the same time, the view of Augustus deteriorated.

The critic Howard Weinbrot (Augustus Caesar in 'Augustan' England, 1978) suggests this process went hand in hand with the rejection of absolutism and he argues that the term 'Augustan', as a description of the period, is therefore misleading. Augustus' name, increasingly synonymous with tyranny, became a weapon in contemporary debates about artistic, social and political conditions. For example, to Whigs, > James II was an Augustan tyrant, legitimately deposed by > William III, while James' descendants, the > Jacobite Pretenders (> Old Pretender, The), were seen as Augustan usurpers. But for some Tories the Augustan usurper was William himself, or else > George I or George II, and the Hanoverians were represented as the destroyers of liberty (Whig and Tory). The comparison with Augustus was not confined to monarchs. In the years 1726 to 1742, the Whig Prime Minister > Sir Robert Walpole was portrayed as an Augustan in the worst sense, and > Chesterfield, for example, likened the imposition of the Licensing Act of 1737 (> theatres) to the oppressions of Augustus. But Walpole's supporters used the same epithets against their political opponents.

There is a distinction, however, between the widespread negative, Tacitean view in the 18th century of Augustus as tyrant, and the literary or cultural idea of an 'Augustan age'. For those who condemned the reign of Augustus the problem remained, how to reconcile the dark view of the ruler himself with the unquestionably sublime capabilities of the Augustan poets, who had so willingly accepted his patronage? One argument held that their artistry alleviated the pains of dictatorship, making it more bearable, as well as more palatable. ▶ Shaftesbury wrote in 1710 that although Augustus was 'a Prince naturally cruel and barbarous', his poets 'were more to him than his Arms or military Virtue; and, more than Fortune herself, assisted him in his Greatness, and made his usurp'd Dominions so inchanting to the World, that it cou'd see without regret its Chains of Bondage firmly riveted'. Another ingenious solution was to see the ▶ Latin poets as intellectual and moral products of the Republic, since their minds had been formed under it, even though their highest achievements took place under a later tyranny. Blackwell, in his Memoirs of the Court of Augustus (1753 onwards) argues that 'what we loosely term the Stile of the Augustan Age was not formed under Augustus. It was formed under the Common-wealth, during the high struggles for Liberty'. In just such a way, he intimated, the celebrated poets ▷ Milton, ▷ Waller and ▷ Cowley, who published after the Restoration, were in fact shaped by the Commonwealth (▷ Interregnum) era in Britain. Blackwell suggested, moreover, that the Augustan poets may even have succeeded in modifying the tyrant's behaviour. Finally, even among those who abhorred the historic Augustus, there were those who, like ▷ Coleridge in the 19th century, saw the Republic itself as far from perfect, ruled by an oligarchy of senators, remote from ordinary people.

Thus the idea of Augustus and interest in his period survived despite political scepticism: somehow it was possible to hold in suspension two supposedly inimical ideas: of, on the one hand, Rome fallen under the sway of a despot and, on the other, a flowering of independent literature. In a similar vein, contrasts have been drawn between the high accomplishments of Renaissance Italy and the autocratic nature of many of her rulers; and, in modern times, between the literary achievements of Soviet Russians ('official' as well as dissident writers), and Stalinist oppression. Weinbrot gives some of Dryden's works as examples of his own anti-Augustanism, as well as generally representative of that attitude in the period. Yet the evidence regarding Dryden's and others' views, as Howard Erskine-Hill points out (The Augustan Idea in English Literature, 1983), is in fact very mixed. Some of the supposedly anti-Augustan writings cited by Weinbrot, such as Dryden's Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire (1693) and Pope's Epistle to Augustus (1737), display ambiguous attitudes towards Augustus which have been variously interpreted by critics, as Weinbrot himself acknowledges. Paradoxically, these works, written in classical traditions of learning and > satire, with their displays of wit, elegance and erudition, are precisely those which may best be said to embody the essence of 'Augustanism' in its literary sense.

As indicated above, several other countries, notably France and Italy, whose classicism antedated that of Britain, also assigned to themselves an 'Augustan' age. Moreover, the term 'Augustan' as an expression of hope for the coming reign, was actually applied in Britain from the 16th century, and revived repeatedly thereafter. But custom has determinedly related it to a period of English literature after the Restoration. As early as 1690 the Jacobite cleric Francis Atterbury questioned, rhetorically, whether 'in Charles II's reign English did not come to its full perfection; and whether it has not had its Augustan age as well as the Latin'. > Anne Finch, in A Tale of the Miser and the Poet. Written about the Year 1709, implied a similar view. Her poem refers nostalgically to Charles II's time, when the arts and learning were valued in their own right, and not for the money they could bring, and it ends with a plea for the revival of 'Augustean days . . . when wit shall please, and poets thrive'.

> Oliver Goldsmith, in An Account of the Augustan Age in England (1759) published in his briefly-lived periodical The Bee, identified a different time span for his 'Augustan Age':

Some have looked upon the writers in the times of Queen Elizabeth as the true standard for future imitation; others have descended to the reign of James I.; and others still lower, to that of Charles II. Were I to be permitted to offer an opinion upon this subject, I should readily give my vote for the reign of Queen Anne, or some years before that period. It was then that taste was united to genius . . . In that period of British glory, though no writer attracts our attention singly, yet, like stars lost in each other's [sic] brightness, they have cast such a lustre upon the age in which they lived that their minutest transactions will be attended to by posterity with a greater eagerness than the most important occurrences of even empires which have been transacted in greater obscurity . . .

Hopes for a new Augustan age were invoked repeatedly thereafter, notably in 1727 with the accession of George II, who conveniently carried 'Augustus' as one of his names, and again in 1760, when ▷ Hume questioned, somewhat whimsically, whether the accession of George III could also herald a new Augustan age. And Goldsmith who, writing in the third quarter of the century, as we have seen, thought the Augustan Age had coincided with the reign of Queen ▷ Anne, was himself designated an Augustan by ▷ Vicessimus Knox in 1778 and again by the Scottish essayist John Pinkerton in 1785.

However, the term 'Augustan' suggests not just a relationship between a monarch and the arts, but a standard and type of writing, or indeed a specific cultural identity. This involves ideas of ▷ taste and ▷ wit, aspired to by essayists, dramatists and poets. For example, Pope thought of himself as an Augustan, and Goldsmith sought to revive what he considered to be the flagging spirit of Augustanism. Didacticism is another recurring theme associated with the period, in secular as well as in religious writing. There is also an emphasis upon the powers of reason and scepticism, which may be seen in political and moral philosophy of the period, from ▷ Hobbes and ▷ Locke (▷ Social Contract) through to ▷ Berkeley and Hume. This was echoed by the growing involvement with science: ▷ Newton, for example, seemed to his contemporaries to represent a supreme example of what scientific reason could achieve; as Pope wrote, 'Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night: / God said, "Let Newton be!" and all was light'.

To these qualities may be added many others widely accepted over the years, although of course not all are present in any one author, or even at any one time. They include: order, strength, dignity, propriety, symmetry, balance, erudition, classical allusion (> classic, classics, classical; > classical education and English literature; > classical mythology), refinement, harmony, grace, polite manners, and spleen. Indeed, many of the most characteristic, as well as the most famous, post-Restoration works are infused by that quintessentially Augustan quality, a compound of invective and gloom. Essays, passages in plays, and poems in the prototype Augustan form, the heroic > couplet; often draw upon Horatian or Juvenalian (> Juvenal) satiric models, to rail against life, the universe or anything.

Gender proved one particularly fertile area for such vituperation. ➤ Rochester, for example, vilified women and marriage in heroic couplets, while women poets such as ➤ Lady Mary Chudleigh and ➤ Sarah Fyge Egerton used the form to similar purposes, but from a woman's standpoint, condemning men and marriage. Dryden and Pope also used the splenetic, satiric form to discourse on the supposedly lamentable state of literature, to condemn contemporary religion, society and the state, and for personal verbal assaults on their enemies. A bitter battle, largely conducted through verse written in classical forms, broke out between Pope and his allies on the one hand, and a group including the influential ➤ Lord John Hervey and his friend ➤ Lady Mary Wortley Montagu on the other. Pope attacked these two in a series of satiric poems, including ➤ The Dunciad. An anonymous author or authors, usually taken to include Lady Mary (though she herself denied responsibility), then hoisted him with his own petard. Verses Addressed to the Imitator of the First Satire of the Second Book of Horace (1733) retaliates against Pope in his kind of language:

Horace can laugh, is delicate, is clear;
You, only rail, or darkly sneer:
His Style is elegant, his Diction pure,
Whilst none thy crabbed Numbers can endure;
Hard as thy Heart, and as thy Birth obscure...

If none do yet return th'intended Blow,
You all your Safety to your Dullness owe;
But whilst that Armour thy poor Corps defends,
'Twill make thy Readers few, as are thy Friends . . .

(From The Works of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, 5 vols., (1803))

Classical forms other than satire, such as > epics, > pastorals, > epigrams, odes and panegyrics, were widely used throughout the period, as documented in Clare Brant's essay, 'Restoration and 18th century poetry' (see pp 13−26). Classical allusion is not, though, confined to poetry, it is also seen in drama (especially in the early part of the period) and non-dramatic prose, as well as in painting, sculpture, architecture, furniture design, landscape gardening, music and other fields of cultural endeavour.

Education, commercial writing, and the early novel

Classical practice in literature, as in the works mentioned earlier, was naturally accompanied by classical education in grammar schools (schools in England) and in universities. The knowledge of Latin, and some Greek, was considered fundamental to a good education. Writers in Augustan England looked to authors in both languages for models and inspiration. > Abraham Cowley, outlining A Proposition for the Advancement of Learning in 1661, prescribed a curriculum dominated by Latin authors including Varro, Cato, > Pliny, > Seneca, > Cicero, > Virgil, > Terence and > Plautus, and supplemented by the Greeks > Homer and > Aristotle. He also suggested that the study of classical poetry assisted other areas of study, making the process of enquiry more palatable: 'we conceive that one book ought to be compiled of all the scattered little parcels among the ancient poets that might serve for the advancement of natural science, and which would make no small or unuseful or unpleasant volume'.

Women were usually denied a formal education in the classics, but sometimes managed to obtain it for themselves. There are various accounts of intellectual women studying Latin and Greek on their own, sometimes in secret, or perhaps aided by a sympathetic male relative or friend. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, for example, taught herself Latin, encouraged by an uncle and by ▷ Bishop Burnet, while the Anglo-Saxon scholar ▷ Elizabeth Elstob was helped to learn her many languages by her brother. ▷ Lucy Hutchinson, who translated Virgil and ▷ Lucretius, was unusual in being highly educated at her father's expense.

But what one might call the 'high' literary tradition to which they belonged formed only one part, indeed perhaps the smaller part in numerical terms, of the writing of the Augustan age. For the 18th century was the first period in which literacy became really widespread, fuelling and feeding off the growing array of written material. In the mid-16th century only 20 per cent of men and 5 per cent of women could sign their names; these figures had increased by the mid-17th century to 30 per cent and 10 per cent respectively; by 1715 they were 45 per cent and 25 per cent; but by 1760, 60 per cent of men and 40 per cent of women were considered 'literate'. Even allowing for the possibility that some of those signing their names may have been able to do only that, for legal purposes for example, a steep rise in literacy is certainly indicated: J. A. Sharpe (Early Modern England: A Social History, 1987) draws on contemporary accounts to point out that reading was taught before writing, and so name-signing is probably quite a reasonable indicator of literacy.

These literacy figures point to an expansion in education for women, as well as for men. Although, as Sharpe has also noted, while the standard of education rose in general, the number in higher education and grammar schools declined. The latter, partly to combat this decrease, gradually leavened their classical diet with increasingly 'modern' and utilitarian fare. This aspect of the struggle between classicism and claims for the value of contemporary learning was satirized by ▷ Swift in ▷ The Battle of the Books (published 1704). The growing number of charity schools, and boarding schools for girls, also emphasized the useful and moral aspects of learning (rather than the classical), as well as the study of polite manners, although a few women, including ▷ Bathsua Makin and ▷ Mary Astell, set up schools offering more serious studies to members of their sex. There were also local and informal methods that had for long existed to enable some of the poor as well as their betters to learn to read, such as teaching in village schools, or in the home. Thus while the numbers of literate people accelerated, the proportion of those with a classical education declined.

Along with the new literacy went a new demand for reading matter, both 'high' and 'low'; this included philosophical treatises and essays; ▷ periodicals and journals such as the early 18th-century ▷ Examiner, ▷ Tatler, ▷ Spectator and ▷ Female Spectator, which offered a mixed fare of gossip, news, and opinion, in the way that ▷ newspapers were increasingly to do; books; popular stories and tales; editions of popular and classic plays; and of course poetry of all kinds. The idea of the literary market-place, as product and concomitant of the century's rapid rise in trade and commercial values, is explored in 'Market, morality and sentiment; non-dramatic prose 1660–1789', by Janet Barron and David Nokes (see pp. 27–38).

Working- and middle-class authors now achieved fame writing for readers from their own classes, as well as from the traditional upper-class readership. > Defoe, subsequently recognized as one of the earliest and most important contributors to what became the novel form, was from a poor tradesman's family, and changed his name to hide his humble origins. > Richardson, whose > Pamela (1740) was so successful that it went through four editions in the course of its first year, was the son of a joiner, and had received little education, certainly none of a classical kind. Even Pope, upholder of so many upper-class values, was the son of a linen-merchant, a fact which he took great pains to conceal. Insecurity about his social identity helps to explain his savage attacks on other authors forced to write for money, after he himself had risen from their ranks. Indeed, as Brean Hammond has shown (Pope, 1986), the continuing fight of the 'ancients' against the 'moderns', in the late 17th and early 18th centuries, was underpinned by class antagonism and class anxiety. Conservative aristocrats and their circle, many of them gentlemen-amateur authors and scholars, felt threatened by the rival new breed of professionals, whom they viewed contemptuously as low-born arrivistes.

Several poets of working-class origin were in fact taken up by aristocratic patrons; some examples are given by Clare Brant in her essay. On the whole, however, literary patronage declined, from the top downwards; the > Stuart monarchs, notably Charles II, had encouraged the literary arts, but their Hanoverian successors, though not without aesthetic taste, had little interest in English literature. For this reason, writers had to attract a wider readership in order to get their work published, necessitating and encouraging the development of the more popular styles already discussed. The loss of patronage was deplored by Goldsmith (The Present State of Polite Learning, 1759), but Pope prided himself, somewhat disingenuously, on his own literary independence:

... Verse, alas! your Majesty disdains;
And I'm not used to Panegyric strains;
The Zeal of Fools offends at any time.
But most of all, the Zeal of Fools in rhyme.
Besides a Fate attends on all I write,
That when I aim at praise, they say I bite ...

And when I flatter, let my dirty leaves
(Like Journals, Odes and such forgotten things
As Eusden, Philips, Settle, writ of Kings)
Clothe spice, line trunks, or fluttering in a row.
Befringe the rails of Bedlam and Soho.
(The First Epistle of the Second Book of Horace, to Augustus, 1737)

This new appeal to a popular audience was noticeable in printed texts, as it was in the theatre, and gave rise to the terms > 'hack' as a derogatory word for a popular writer, and > 'Grub Street', as a term for the area in which such writers met, either literally or figuratively. Indeed, taste in entertainment in general, and literature in particular, appears to have been spread across a wider social spectrum at this time, than at any other time in English history.

The 18th century has been referred to as the period which saw the birth of the consumer society, in the modern sense of the term. Books and periodicals helped to create and to satisfy the urge towards consumption, as market products in themselves, and by advertising and conveying news about the latest fashions and trends. As a result, the number of books published each year quadrupled during the course of the 18th century, even though their cost was high - a novel was priced between six and ten shillings. This, for much of the period, was roughly equivalent to a day's wages for a skilled craftsman, or a week's wages for a labourer. The prohibitive pricing was, however, circumvented by both the serialization of longer works and the establishment of > circulating libraries (operating in Bath from 1725, and in London from 1739). > Richard Brinsley Sheridan's romantic heroine Lydia Languish, in > The Rivals (1775), famously 'devours' books from a library in Bath (by now a fashionable city, rivalling London), with titles including The Tears of Sensibility (translated from the French Les Epreuves du sentiment in 1773), > Sterne's > A Sentimental Journey (1768), and > Smollett's > Peregrine Pickle (1751) and > Humphrey Clinker (1771). Moreover, she is devastated to find novels including The Remard of Constancy (1771, author unknown), The Fatal Connexion (by Mrs Fogerty, 1773), Mistakes of the Heart (translated from French in 1769) and The Delicate Distress (by Elizabeth Griffith, 1769) already lent out, and therefore unavailable to her. In the same play, however, the forthright and old-fashioned Sir Anthony Absolute condemns the libraries and their effects. He declares that 'a circulating library in a town is as an evergreen tree of diabolical knowledge! It blossoms throughout the year! - and depend on it, Mrs Malaprop, that they who are so fond of handling the leaves, will long for the fruit at last!'

As this episode suggests, during the course of our period women became increasingly involved with literature as readers and as theatre-goers. But they also increased their activities as authors in their own right. It is no accident, moreover, that women pioneered or helped to inaugurate new literary forms. Most of them being deprived of classical education, apart from a handful like Hutchinson and Montagu, they had perforce to welcome innovative techniques. Nevertheless, since many kinds of experience - notably sexual and political - were denied to most of them, women usually wrote in forms acceptable to polite society, under the weight of social pressure and moral convention. Those like > Aphra Behn, who wrote about sex in an almost 'masculine' (her word) voice were vilified, and eventually bowdlerized (> Thomas Bowdler) into oblivion. Women had therefore to find forms of expression which evaded conventional masculine ones in order to partake fully of literary life. For example, women from Behn and > Delarivière Manley onwards are largely credited with the development of sentimental and romantic themes in literature (and indeed of the novel form itself) – even though men such as Defoe, ⊳ Fielding and Richardson obviously made major contributions. Even in poetry, some of the characteristics we consider quintessentially romantic are already present in the poetry of > Anne Finch, who died in 1720.

The growth of the novel in the period has, however, been explained in other ways. Several commentators have shown how the reading and writing of romantic literature, and associated pursuits, such as the following of fashion, and the cultivation of courtship skills, helped to occupy the leisure time now increasingly available to the middle and even lower classes. On the other hand, Janet Todd (The Sign of Angellica, 1989) has noted that a number of women, such as > Laetitia Pilkington, wrote to support their children, or else used writing to supplement the living they earned in some other calling. This represented a considerable change, since some of the major women writers of the beginning of the period, among them > Philips, Behn, and Astell, had no children, and concentrated solely upon their writing. In this sense the novel developed partly out of the relationship between social circumstance and literary impulse.

As the period developed, the novel came to perform a complex and paradoxical role in people's lives. On the one hand, romantic plot-lines and sentimental expressions of emotion afforded endless opportunities for narrative variations of suspense and intrigue; on the other, they challenged and partly ameliorated the evaluation of woman as marriage commodity and drudge, as well as offering close studies of social nuance in contemporary settings. Paradoxically, such writing may also be seen as part of the continuing effort to socialize young people of both sexes, and to overcome any resistance to marriage. For young women particularly these works served constantly to inform, or to remind them of their proper roles as maidenly objects of affection, and then as wives and mothers, and to discourage them from having ambitions outside the marital realm. The softening of parental authority, which took place during the 17th and 18th centuries, was accompanied by a new sort of propaganda campaign - to romanticize and therefore to sweeten the pill of having to assume adult responsibilities. Themes of conflict with parents, as in Richardson's > Clarissa (1747-8), for example, map the struggles of young people to free themselves, and of their elders to retain control.

Young women also looked to novels for clues as to how to end their celibate state. Virtuous and happy heroines, as well as those seduced and abandoned, offered models of behaviour to imitate or avoid. Novels became 'how to' and/or 'how not to' guides to comportment (in affairs of the heart and other matters), which dramatized and humanized the advice offered in many > conduct and > advice books. Numerous plays of the period performed a similar function. In the last part of the century this advice acquired a fresh exigency, since women substantially outnumbered men; many would not marry at all, and others would marry only relatively late in life. By this time, however, a reaction against popular novels was well established; they were increasingly being attacked for their supposed impropriety or frivolity and absurdity and, in some quarters, blamed for creating dissatisfaction with life. They misled young women, it was suggested, into expecting life to be like a sentimental novel. For example, > Hester Chapone said that the reading of sentimental novels 'corrupts more female hearts than any other cause whatever', and another reviewer wrote that 'the youth of both sexes ... fondly imagine ... that everything must yield to the irresistible influence of all-conquering love: but upon mixing with the world, ... they find to their cost, that they have been miserably deceived . . .'. Some of the opposition was overtly class-based, part of a wider view that the education of working women would give them ideas above their station. But the social and literary historian Colin Campbell, in The Romantic Ethic and the Spirit of Modern Consumerism (1987), argues that the suffering and isolated heroine of so many novels in the 18th century anticipates the outcast hero of the 19th and he considers it likely that the reading of novels was a major factor in the break with traditionalism which occurred in the second half of the century.

New Directions

This brings us back to the question of how to define 'Augustan' and 'Romantic', and the shift from one to the other. This volume has followed a long-accepted practice in placing the demarcation line between the two periods, at the year of the > French Revolution. Some critics have opted for an even later division, at the turn of century (see, for example, the many books with '18th-century literature' in their titles); others for an earlier one, such as 1760 (for example, Marilyn Butler, in Romantics, Rebels and Reactionaries), or even 1740 (Arthur O. Lovejoy, 'On the Discrimination of Romanticisms', PMLA XXXIX, 1924). The question of where and how to separate periods of literature has always been problematic. One convention is to separate the 'romantic' from the 'classical' in the way of H. J. C. Grierson (Classical and Romantic, 1923), or T. E. Hulme (Speculations, 1924). But one needs only to think of the many classical influences on the revolutionaries, as well as on the Romantic writers (as in > Keats' Ode on a Grecian Urn (> odes, Keats'), 1819), or to look for the roots of > Byron's satiric poetry in the verses of > Samuel Butler, Dryden and Pope, to see the flaws in any simplistic separation. Another practice, as discussed earlier, has been to stress the continuity of ideas throughout the periods, and to argue against any sort of sharp break between one element and another.

There is a persistent view, however, shared by some of the Romantics themselves, that some kinds of change in literary taste and fashion did develop, or gathered pace, starting roughly in the middle of the 18th century, although they are not sufficient to place a clear division at that point. The mood is characterized partly by a new restlessness and searching, by a fascination with feelings, and by a sympathy with the disadvantaged in society, a general > humanitarianism. The long campaign for the abolition of slavery (> William Wilberforce), assisted by a famous legal judgment freeing slaves in England in 1772 (> slavery), is an expression of the latter. These phenomena are often referred to collectively as 'sentiment' and 'sensibility'.

Other developments include a taste for the 'primitive' (> primitivism) including the > medieval or > Gothic and Celtic, and in a delight with wildness in general, from natural landscapes (> nature) – especially inspiring or terrifying scenes such as high mountains or deep precipices – to the idea of the 'noble savage' or 'natural' man. Images of the noble savage had existed from at least the beginning of the period well before > Rousseau's famous celebration of the type. For example, Behn's > Oroonoko describes primitive people in glowing terms, while numerous > Inkle and Yarico narratives and stage plays celebrate the natural man's counterpart, the natural woman. But the idea of the natural man caught hold of the public imagination on a much larger scale in the second half of the 18th century. A succession of visitors to England from far-off countries, such as a South Sea islander called > Omai, seemed to bring the symbol to life. His stay in London is described by a number of writers including > Cowper, > Johnson and > Burney.

Finally, the transition towards Romanticism may be seen in the use of simple forms and styles, rather than the elaborate ones often admired in the earlier Augustan period; in a revival of a simpler notion of religion, including the development of Methodism from about 1739; in a love of the exotic, including the ⊳ oriental, which went along with a scepticism about the superiority of one's own society in relation to the societies of others (as in Johnson's > Rasselas, 1759, and Goldsmith's > The Citizen of the World, 1762); in a leaning toward morbidity and pessimism, including a fascination with darkness and death; and lastly, in soaring flights of fancy. Indeed although the period saw a classical revival, as Marilyn Butler points out (Romantics, Rebels and Reactionaries), this time the models were primitive Greece and Rome, rather than Periclean Athens or Augustan Rome. It was at this time also that the criticism of the Roman ruler Augustus gained a new impetus, as in the eloquent castigation by > Gibbon. Of course there were multiple overlaps among these categories: for example, in Omai and the characters of Oronoko were represented the exotic as well as the primitive, the Gothic novel offered both primitive and gloomy elements; and Gibbon's work, while being part of the classical revival, also incorporated religious scepticism, a questioning of received ideas and a pessimistic spirit.

One of the most characteristic aspects of Romanticism was the new feeling for the wild and awesome aspects of nature. This is quite different from the cultivated and domestic kind hymned by > Marvell, Dryden or Pope. It takes place in the context of a greater freedom to travel, enabling dramatic foreign scenes to become familiar to many more English people, but it also emanates from a gradual shift of the population from country-side to town. As people were driven off the land (> enclosures) and separated from their roots in nature and agriculture, and as agriculture itself became more mechanized, there arose a nostalgic and sentimental regard for cultivated nature, together with a new view of human existence in a natural setting. Realistic and sympathetic portraits of villagers and farm-labourers replaced the Virgilian pastoral figures that were commonplace in earlier Augustan writing. These trends are seen in the poetry of Goldsmith, > Crabbe, > Collins, > Thomas Warton, > Akenside and > Gray. Mid-18th century poems, such as > Young's > Night Thoughts (1746), may be seen to have inspired Romantic writers like > Wordsworth. The change is also seen in themes chosen for plays, and in stage design, as I have elaborated in 'Restoration and 18th century drama' (see pp. 42, 55-7). It is further evident in nondramatic prose, such as in the rapturous description of the Alps written by ⊳ Horace Walpole in a letter to Richard West in 1739 (> letter-writing), which prefigured descriptions of those mountains by > Mary Shelley; just as his > The Castle of Otranto (1764) was to form a basis for her > Frankenstein (1817).

Walpole's phenomenally popular 'Gothic story' represents a landmark, not only in its supernaturalism, and dwelling on the elements of horror and fear (in this it is to some extent a child of > Jacobean drama), but in other aspects, including its medievalism – which leads toward the Romantic and later > pre-Raphaelite preoccupation with that period. Its descriptions of dark, subterranean vaults and passages are counterparts to the romantic vistas of craggy heights and vaulting skies. But its clinging atmosphere of elemental gloom and imminent disaster set a pattern for Gothic novels in general, a new form of the Augustan age which rode the transitions in political and intellectual history to survive well into the next century with its key elements intact. Compare for example this passage from The Castle of Otranto:

A clap of thunder at that instant shook the castle to its foundations; the earth rocked, and the clank of more than mortal armour was heard behind. Frederic and Jerome thought the last day was at hand . . . (then) the walls of the castle behind Manfred were thrown down with a mighty force . . .

with the following from Mary Shelley's Frankenstein (1818):

As the night advanced, a fierce wind arose from the woods, and quickly dispersed the clouds that had loitered in the heavens: the blast tore along like a mighty avalanche, and produced a kind of insanity in my spirits that burst all bounds of reason and reflection . . .

There are important differences between the two, not least the shift to first-person narrative and introspection in the later piece, and the ghostly apparition, which subsequently appears heralded by nature's effects in the former. But they share a sense of nature as something wild, threatening and primitive, even as a participant in the action, influencing and commenting banefully upon it, like a Greek chorus. Once again, this is at a far remove from the early Augustan pastoral view of nature, as a carefully wrought > Golden Age setting for shepherds and shepherdesses to sport and court in. Jerome at another point in Walpole's story seeks out 'the gloomiest shades, as best suited to the pleasing melancholy that reigned in his mind', anticipating the darkly mournful hero-outcasts of Byron.

In ghostly scenes such as this one, Walpole purposefully invokes > Shakespeare. This is not merely a backward look, or an attempt to elevate his own material by dressing it in clothing of the Bard, but an announcement of a shift from a certain kind of > neo-classic critical theory to an alternative vision of nature and of art. Since the Restoration, Shakespeare had often been condemned for mixing crude comic elements with exalted ones, as well as for failing to observe the > Classical Unities; it was not until the transition from the Augustan to the Romantic periods that Shakespeare was revalued in a manner that would be familiar today. The impulse which in 1823 inspired ⊳ Edmund Kean to stage ⊳ King Lear with the tragic ending written by Shakespeare, for the first time since > Nahum Tate altered it to a happy ending in 1681, was not entirely the same as that which motivated Walpole's reference to Shakespeare. Both efforts, however, were part of the same wave of socalled 'Bardolatry' which arose in the second half of the 18th century, was highlighted by a Shakespeare Jubilee in 1767, and continued into the next century. Shakespeare's works were revalued, and became appreciated, precisely because of their alleged 'wildness' and irregularity, which earlier generations had rejected. Now they seemed in keeping with, or even to embody, the newly defined spirit of nature.

Walpole, in a letter to Mme du Deffand, informed her in language extraordinarily like that of the Romantics later, that he had written The Castle of Otranto, to give

'reign to my imagination; visions and passions choked me. I wrote it in spite of rules, critics, and philosophers'. He continued by informing her that he had composed the work 'for the future, when taste will be restored to the place now occupied by philosophy', and not for the present, 'which wants only cold reason'. In an epigraph attached to the second edition, he refers to the work as if to a new form. Yet the epigraph is itself a paraphrase of a passage from the Augustan 'Bible', Horace's De Arte Poetica ('On the Art of Poetry'), and his preface to the first edition draws attention to his use of pity and terror, those Aristotelian essentials so favoured by early Augustan dramatists, while the work itself mostly observes the rules of classical drama. A modern editor, W. S. Lewis, in his introduction to The Castle of Otranto (1964), describes Walpole's mission as 'to innovate', but he also adds that he wished 'to instruct, and to entertain'. These last two precepts encompass Horatian prescriptions which stand as twin Augustan ideals. Walpole himself refers to his Gothic tale as 'an attempt to blend . . . two kinds of romance, the ancient and the modern'. We might add that it links, inextricably, elements of both Augustanism and Romanticism.

Augustanism did not give way easily to the new Romantic sensibility; it survived late into the 18th century in, for example, the work of Goldsmith, who consciously and deliberately referred back to the Restoration period; in the work of Samuel Johnson, whose preoccupation with reason, 'reasonable' tone, orthodox classical standards of literature, and use of Augustan forms, allies him with writers of an earlier era (although his ▷ The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749), which was inspired by Juvenal's tenth satire, has a Romantic concern with futility and death); and Augustanism is even manifest, as we have seen, in some of the comic poetry of Byron - ▷ Don Juan (1819–24) and ▷ The Vision of Judgment (1821). Interestingly, the influence of the 18th century has been recognized even beyond Byron's time, for example in the poetry of ▷ Samuel Rogers, who outlived not only Byron but ▷ Wordsworth as well, and who continued to write in the Augustan style (J. R. Watson, 'Samuel Rogers: The Last Augustan', in Augustan Worlds, ed. Hilson, Jones, and Watson, 1978).

Conclusion

As we have seen, the idea of an Augustan age, in the sense of an era of high achievement informed by classicism and incorporating many classical models, has refused to die, and is still a convenient label for the period 1660–1789, even if incomplete as a definition and summation of all its accomplishments. Critics as eareful and diverse as Pat Rogers (The Augustan Vision, 1974), Howard Erskine-Hill (The Augustan Idea in English Literature) and Margaret Doody (The Daring Muse: Augustan Poetry Reconsidered, 1985) insist on the continuing usefulness of the term 'Augustan'; as Doody says, it is 'the term we have . . . the one that inspires recognition'. The French Revolution, with its cataclysmic impact on English thought, marked a break with the past, inspiring fresh radicalism, and then reaction. But the intellectual seeds for those developments, as well as the development of Romanticism itself, lie further back. Thus our idea of 'Augustan' perhaps needs modifying once and for all, to allow that there is no hard line between that period and the one that follows it. We should use the term as a convenient way of marking a time-block and of implying certain ideas, but not to suggest a rigidly enclosed phenomenon.

Restoration and 18th-century Poetry

Clare Brant

Literary history, culture, theory

The term 'Augustan' (> Augustanism) properly refers to those Roman poets who celebrated, sometimes ironically, the ideals and shortcomings of civic life under the emperor > Caesar Augustus. Though useful to suggest some public aspects of late > 17th- and early > 18th-century verse, it misrepresents the poetic diversity of the period as a whole. Nonetheless, it and other labels such as 'the Age of Reason' (> Rationalism) continue to be used to create an impression of poetry ruled by ideas of > classical correctness. 'Reason' is often compared unfavourably with 17th-century > metaphysical inventiveness or 19th-century romantic imagination: as Matthew Arnold famously remarked, 'Dryden and Pope are not classics of our poetry, they are classics of our prose'. In fact the poetry of the > Enlightenment is full of ideas and experiments: from early > wit to late > sensibility, poets tested the limits of learning and experience with passion and humour.

Poetic variety was assisted by the expansion of print culture. New outlets for poetry, such as > periodicals and > magazines, appeared alongside an increased number of printed books of poetry. Though poetry still circulated in aristocratic circles in manuscript and on the street in > pamphlets, > ballads and songs, it was this middle ground which came to support most poetry. Its early concentration in London – represented by > Grub Street, the symbolic locale of > hack writers – gave way to provincial centres and networks. > Thomas Gray in > Cambridge, > Anna Seward, 'the Swan of Lichfield', and > William Cowper in rural Buckinghamshire, lived out poetry's move away from metropolitan concerns after the mid-century. It is important to remember that poetry appeared not only in books but also on buildings, tombstones and statuary, on fans and picture frames, in satirical prints and engravings. It was sung, acted and posted with presents. It was a recognized form of argument: > Lady Mary Chudleigh's The Lady's Defence (1710) was one of many dialogues in verse. Poems turned up in novels: readers of > Samuel Richardson's > Clarissa in 1749, for instance, came across > Elizabeth Carter's much-admired Ode to Wisdom; and > Tobias Smollett included a poem by himself on Loch Lomond in > The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771). > Laetitia Pilkington published her poems in her memoirs in 1747. Mary Jones published her verse epistles with her prose correspondence in 1750. > Joseph Addison and > Sir Richard Steele used quotations from classical poets at the head of their periodical essays; and > Ann Radcliffe's epigraphs used English poets to set moods to chapters in her novels. > Samuel Johnson's Dictionary (1755) used quotations from English poets up to his own time to illustrate the meaning of words in contexts. Poetry was used in education to teach rhetoric, grammar and languages. This did not necessarily produce more talented poets, complained > Charles Gildon in 1721, for though schoolboys were made familiar with the poetry of > Homer, > Virgil and > Horace, this taught them only prosody or 'how to frame several sorts of verses in the Greek and Latin tongue, without giving them the least insight into the art of poetry it self, and therefore only qualifies them for meer versifiers'. Poetry was also connected to oratory: verse prologues and epilogues appealed to spectators to judge plays favourably. It was read aloud in small groups as well as silently by solitary readers. The look of poetry on the page, however, took on special importance in this period. It uses apostrophes to indicate precise rhythms: 'But with the odious smell and sight annoy'd / In haste she does th' offensive herd avoid' ('she' being the Muse, in > Swift's To Mr Congreve, 1693). Poems became typographically elaborate, though always elegantly laid out, with italics, capitals and underlinings. As Swift put it,

To Statesmen wou'd you give a Wipe, You print it in Italick Type. When Letters are in vulgar Shapes, 'Tis Ten to one the Wit escapes; But when in Capitals exprest, The dullest Reader smokes the Jest. (On Poetry: A Rhapsody, 1734.)

The increasing presence of poetry enlarged people's ideas about the genre. In 1712, when asked to describe 'the chief Qualifications of a good Poet', Sir Richard Steele replied 'a very well-bred Man', but barriers of class and gender varied across the period. The 1730s, for instance, saw working-class poets in vogue, with the success of > Stephen Duck's The Thresher's Labour (1735), which earned him a royal pension and a riposte from > Mary Collier in The Woman's Labour (1739), pointing out that working-class woman's life was exhausting in specific ways to which she, as a washerwoman, could testify. Duck's exchange of agricultural work for city patronage was not, however, happy, and he committed suicide. Later working-class writers such as > Ann Yearsley also struggled to survive patronage. To participate in high culture could require imitation of its forms: > as Mary Leapor put it, 'You see I'm learned, and I show't the more, / That none may wonder when they find me poor' (An Epistle to a Lady, 1748). Though working-class writers used > couplets ably enough, it was hard for them to challenge 'the Mob of Gentlemen who wrote with Ease', in ⊳ Pope's phrase. A beggar's daughter in Smollett's > Peregrine Pickle (1751) is passed off as a fine lady once she has learnt to recite 'choice sentences from Shakespeare, Otway and Pope'. Knowledge of poetry and the ability to join in games of allusion were marks of > taste which self-educated poets struggled to develop.

For women, class could offset some of the disadvantages of gender. > Katherine Philips and > Anne Finch were recognized talents. Though John Wilmot, Second Earl of > Rochester, asserted that 'Whore is scarce a more reproachful name / Than poetess', women wrote continuously. Most were, however, careful to frame their productions with modest disclaimers. Anna Williams' are typical: 'Censure may be content to spare the compositions of a woman, written for amusement, and published for necessity' (Miscellanies, 1766). Two factors helped women. One was recognition of poetry as diverse, connected to specific, plural, various occasions: titles such as 'Miscellanies' and 'Poems on Several Occasions' were widely used by men and women, and this hint towards poetry as miscellaneous allowed for mixed abilities or mixed success. Secondly, women compensated increasingly for a lack of classical forbears as more women published. During the 18th century women cited as illustrious models first > Aphra Behn and then, as a decorous private life became as much a requirement for women writers as talent, her more respectable predecessor > Katherine Philips, the 'matchless Orinda'. In the later 18th century, women also increasingly looked to > Shakespeare as an instance of how a poet with little Latin and less Greek could still have merit.

The dubious social status of some poetry meant that many 18th-century poems were published anonymously. But this was also a form of insurance against politically or personally motivated attack. As one anonymous writer lamented in 1779, Poets and Thieves the same attention meet, Their deaths are hawk'd about from Street to Street; And the same fate attends the wretches still, Who go up Helicon or Holborn-Hill.

Poetic stealing, or plagiarism, was one of the few forms of theft not to carry a capital charge in the 18th century, but poets policed each other vituperatively. Like Johnson's scholar, poets faced 'toil, envy, want, the patron and the jail'. John Philips' The Splendid Shilling (1701) was popular for its clever Miltonic > burlesque, but also for its play with cliches concerning poetic penury. Poets' prospects did change: where ▷ Milton was paid £ 10 for ▷ Paradise Lost, ▷ Dryden earned a comfortable £,1250 for his translation of > Virgil, and Pope's translation of > Homer made him financially independent. But such sums were exceptional. Swift, with his usual complicated irony, advised poets 'to hire out your Pen, to a Party, which will afford you both Pay and Protection'. Politically commissioned work mostly concealed its hired origins, but the value of public poetry was officially recognized in 1668 when John Dryden was appointed the first > Poet Laureate. For all that the public bought more poetry, poets still looked to patrons for support. As the Fourth Earl of Abingdon observed about a well-placed dedication, 'it sometimes happens, that the Name of the Patron supplies the want of every other merit, and preserves the work from oblivion.' But there were a number of scandals about poets who suffered destitution or rejection; in 1782 William Hayley hoped the nation would never again see 'A future CHATTERTON by poison dead, / An OTWAY fainting for a little bread.'

Poetry was agreed to be an important proof of national greatness. Poets earned their countries peacetime laurels, and artistic alliances and rivalries evolved across Europe, though not necessarily mirroring relationships between nation-states - English and > French writers, for instance, continued to read and appreciate each others' work even when their countries were at war. Writers, both English and French, attributed French regimentation to a lack of political liberty, while English social freedoms were supposed to be reflected in a less circumscribed literature. But poetic nationalism often involved informed comparisons with other countries' literature, of which travellers sought out specimens. Samples of foreign poetry were analysed both to reveal what themes if any were universal to poetry, and how particular national cultures treated them. > Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, for instance, in 1717 sent Alexander Pope a specimen of Turkish poetry, first in a literal translation and then in English style. She commented on both social and linguistic determinants of poetry: 'Neither do I think our English proper to express such violence of passion, which is very seldom felt amongst us; and we want those compound words which are very frequent and strong in the Turkish Language.' Readers were particularly informed about epic poems from Spain, Portugal, France and > Italy which, together with their knowledge of English > epic poetry, created a European inheritance to the classics. Paradoxically, epic was prized both as the most nationalistic (> Nationalism) genre, promoting the poet's tribe, and also as the least nationalistic, in that epic heroes usually travelled and created new countries. So Hildebrand Jacob attempted a British epic, Brutus, in which the Roman founds an English colony. On a smaller scale, Pope's > Windsor Forest (1713), a Tory celebration of the Peace of Utrecht, (> Spanish Succession, War of) turns local landscape into international scenery: 'The Time shall come, when free as Seas or Wind / Unbounded Thames shall flow for all Mankind'.

Like monarchs in this period, poets had to be secured against pretenders: versifiers, poetasters, scribblers, hacks and dunces. Correct technique was not enough in itself: Charles Gildon lamented that 'this is a Quality that gives the glorious Name of Poets to Fellows without Warmth, without Judgement, without Imagination' (1713). Literary theory used this aesthetic vocabulary consistently in the period. William Duff sums it up in a 1763 essay: 'If, on the one hand, Imagination bestows SENSIBILITY and REFINEMENT on Taste, so on the other, Taste imparts JUSTNESS and PRECISION to Imagination; while Genius is consummated by the proper union of both these faculties with that of Judgment'. Reason alone could not animate the process: 'a certain vital spirit must be infused; and in Poetry, this vital Spirit is INVENTION.' This term, from the Latin inventio, implies not just discovering existing forms and relations but, increasingly throughout the 18th century, thinking up new ones as well.

This distinctive combination of conservatism and passion helps to explain some parts of late 17th- and 18th-century poetic theory which are alien to a modern mind: deference to classical writers, insistence on imitating > nature, and adherence to rules in doing so. In fact, not all writers were fans of the classics. Pope declared his support for the ancients: 'the highest character for sense and learning has been obtained by those who have been most indebted to them. For to say truth, whatever is very good sense, must have been very good sense in all times.' But Percival Stockdale, despite being in all other respects Pope's warmest admirer, took the opposite view, complaining of 'dictators [who] pay no regard to what passes in life.' > Voltaire temperately suggested that 'The best modern Writers have mix'd the Taste of their Country, with that of the Ancients', but he also complicated moderate positions by upholding neo-classic systems in which French critics rather than classical poets provided guidance about rules.

Rules, according to Pope, were simply 'Nature methodiz'd'. Poetic theory constantly invoked nature, meaning not simply the visible world, but that principle which gives shape and structure to material and conceptual forms of life. Like the idea of 'human nature', it could cover a variety of behaviours, but this variety was not infinite. Nature as represented in texts was defined by the plausible. Poetry was like painting in that both arts represented something by copying it: for example, a portrait copied a person. But if the subject was an invented person, such as Hercules, then what was copied or imitated was the 'type' of a strong man. Poetry described things as they may be: 'whenever we speak of poetry as an imitation, we constantly call it an imitation of Nature', explained Alexander Gerard in 1780. Critics urged writers to follow nature, not to encourage slavish conformity, but to assist readers' recognition of subjects, and to make poetry as effective as other kinds of literature in offering instruction and entertainment.

Comparisons between the sister arts of 'voice and verse', as Milton called them, were common in this period. Archetypal musicians such as St Cecilia and King David interested poets from John Dryden to > Christopher Smart. Besides odes and lyrics which were originally sung forms, hymns and libretti linked poetry to music. Critics used musical ideas of harmony and painterly ideas of depiction to try to represent what poetry did, though as Samuel Johnson observed, 'criticism has not yet attained the certainty, and stability of science.' It was a common jibe in the late 17th and 18th centuries that critics were failed poets, though boundaries between criticism and poetry were considered to be legitimately blurred, as when poets, usually imitating Horace's De Arte Poetica, wrote verse criticism of the art of poetry. Abuse of critics was colourful: James Miller, for instance, described critics as 'Those Rats, which tear Books to Pieces, only to come at the Paste they are glewed with'. But Dryden's prefaces and essays, Addison's sympathetic papers on Milton in > The Spectator and Johnson's > Lives of the Poets successfully developed critical theory and biography as tools for reading poetry. Various factors helped to make the critic a more prestigious figure in the second half of the 18th century: the establishment and spread of respectable magazines which had consistent policies of reviewing; London highbrow society's new interest in serious public conversation about literature, along the lines of French salons; and the necessity of agreeing critical standards as literary production expanded in the provinces.

With criticism more securely established, the formation of a native poetic canon began: Shakespeare was established as the national genius, and Milton, > Spenser and Chaucer were promoted. The > metaphysical poet Donne was regarded by some as uncouth, but still sufficiently interesting to be 'rectified' in Pope's re-versification. Antiquarian interests became mainstream: in 1765 > Thomas Percy published his > Reliques, a large collection of old English ballads, and > Thomas Warton published his long History of English Poetry from the Close of the Eleventh to the Commencement of the Eighteenth Century (1779–81). Thus, throughout the 18th century, English poetry increasingly defined itself in relation to its own native history, as well as to classical inheritance.

The genres of poetry

Restoration and 18-century poetry used certain distinct genres. An > epigram was a short, witty poem, often involving censure or applause. It manifested brevity, beauty or sharpness, with Martial's epigrams providing a classical model. An > epitaph, a concise memorial poem, usually showed gravity, but could be jocular, like the pair of epitaphs by Pope and Lady Mary Wortley Montagu about two lovers struck by lightning. The form was challenging, since it required specific consideration of the dead person, something general on death, and all in a space short enough to be fitted onto a tombstone if need be. > Elegy was a broad genre, generally about death or the coyness or cruelty of a lover. Commiseration, reproach, sympathy or tenderness predominated, but it could also show passion and restraints on passion. Pope's An Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady (1717) illustrates sympathy with the griefs of people unknown to the poet, an attitude perfected in > Gray's > Elegy in a Country Churchyard (1751). Katherine Philips' On the death of my first and dearest childe (published 1667) is a moving example, and Elizabeth Boyd's On the Death of an Infant of five Days old (1733) is a powerful description of maternal grief: 'Oh! could the stern-souled sex but know the pain, / Or the soft mother's agonies sustain, / With tenderest love the obdurate heart would burn, / And the shocked father tear for tear return'. Particularly in the late 17th century, poets wrote elegies memorializing fellow poets - for example, ⊳ Anne Wharton's elegy on Rochester. > Pastoral, drawing on > Theocritus, Virgil and sometimes Spenser, represented the doings of shepherds or rural nymphs and swains. It strained for simplicity, a contradiction which often led it into artifice. Pope's Pastorals, written when he was 14, were thought to be formally perfect, though by 1776 one poet, writing anonymously, complained of 'the shoals of nonsense that has been eternally written of Delias and Damons, Chloes, Strephons, &c ... who can read such trash without disgust?' Related forms included > eclogues, uninterrupted by dialogue, and > georgics, poems of agricultural instruction. All these expressed interest in land which could covertly address issues of ownership and occupation through fantasy.

Poetic epistles like prose letters were able to address almost any person or subject and, again like prose letters, they were one of the most widely written forms of the late 17th and 18th centuries. Unfolding in the manner of conversation, smooth, easy and polite, they could be serious or ludicrous, satirical, heroic, descriptive, friendly or hostile. Many poets used > Ovid's Epistles as a starting point; others, such as Pope, favoured the Horatian epistle. Descriptive poetry usually involved meditative neoclassical forms rather than the more talkative Augustan modes listed above. Following Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, poets played on tactile and aural senses as well as the visual, as in > Anne Finch's study of nightfall, A Nocturnal Reverie. Prospect poetry organized hilltop views into narratives which used conventions comparable to those employed by landscape painters such as Claude, where the eye tracked between foreground and horizon in distinct patterns. Detail alternates with broader strokes in > John Dyer's Grongar Hill (1726), for example: 'How close and small the hedges lie! / What streaks of meadows cross the eye!' > Didactic writing made instruction palatable by concealing it in lively writing. Compendium poems, ranging over multiple aspects of a topic; were also popular, such as ▶ William Somervile's The Chase (1735), a poetical history of hunting. Philosophical enquiries and aesthetic analyses were often attempted: both were combined in > Mark Akenside's blank-verse celebration of The Pleasures of the Imagination (1744). Tales and > fables provided self-contained narratives, often with a disturbing twist, and allegorical discussions often involving animals or inanimates. Dryden's religious dialogue > The Hind and the Panther (1687) and > Gay's Fables (1727-38) brought out the form's playfulness. Extended > allegories were less common: one such was > James Thomson's dreamily sensual Spenserian imitation > The Castle of Indolence (1748), in which the Knight of Arts and Industry rescues Britain from indolence with the help of a bard. But allegorical devices such as personification (> figures of speech) were ubiquitous.

The large category of lyric covers odes and songs. Songs were widely written in the late 17th century, since their usual subjects of love and drinking suited much Restoration self-imaging. The French critic > Boileau decreed that 'Even in a Song there must be Art and Sense'; whether bawdy or sacred, songs expressed pleasure in sweetness and easy versification. Odes were ranked high in the generic hierarchy. As Boileau's The Art of Poetry (1683) put it, 'The Heart in Elegies forms the Discourse, / The Ode is bolder, and has greater force'. Commentators agreed that odes used disorder creatively; they were, as > George Villiers, the Duke of Buckingham, put it, 'the Muse's most unruly horse'. But in odes the imagination, often depicted as Pegasus, need not be reined in. The ⊳ Pindaric ode (⊳ Pindar) was particularly celebrated for 'its beautiful wanderings, and its happy returns to the subject' as Charles Gildon put it. Yet the mid- to late-18th century preference for the sublime ode - bold, irregular, elevated - drew attention to its challenges. As one practitioner, Thomas Cooke, put it in 1740, 'of all Sorts of Poetry, none has been so often attempted as the Ode, nor with less Success'. Odes were thought to have been sung and danced in ancient times, and it was this patterning of energy which gave them appeal. The ode's importance after the mid-18th century, when many poets preferred it to couplets, is because it expressed order differently, rather than allowing a triumph of passion over reason.

> Epic was more discussed than practised, at least until > James Macpherson's poetical prose fragments published in the 1760s, purporting to be by a third-century poet > Ossian. Epic's partly real, partly fictitious stories of illustrious actions performed by heroes was turned creatively into > mock heroic (Dryden's > Mac Flecknoe, 1682) and > mock epic (Pope's > The Rape of the Lock, 1712 and > The Dunciad, 1728). Satirical reversals of scale - in Coleridge's phrase, making the great little and the little great - pointed to communal or ideal scales of value from which the protagonists had departed. The workings of > satire were much discussed in this period. The ancients provided two models, Horace and > Juvenal, loosely equated with smiling and savage satire respectively. Dryden declared that 'The true end of Satyre is the amendment of Vices by Correction'. But was this end best achieved by mocking, deriding and bullying, or by teasing and humorously shaming? Poets tried out different methods of raillery and rage to discover how best for their ends 'sharpest thoughts in smoothest words' (Buckingham) might be conveyed. Not all satire was high-minded: much involved political feuding or personal abuse. Polite literature became acrimonious in satire, but the art of abuse highlighted the art of the poetry which couched it.

Poetry in context: 1660-1700

The Restoration of the monarchy in 1660 put > Charles II on the throne but restored few other institutions. Besides the religious and political upheavals of the > Civil War, commercial and technological innovations were changing English social life. The apparent revival of aristocratic court culture, until the > 'Glorious Revolution' of 1688, distracted from the insecurities and self-inventions of poems as variously theatrical as the verse plays which many poets were also writing for the newly re-opened theatres.

Civil War poetry had been necessarily populist, taking sides, marching down the street, arguing its case, abusing its opponents. Ballads and songs continued to structure much satire, most notably in the roughly rhymed tetrameter couplets of > Samuel Butler's > Hudibras, written in four parts between 1662 and 1684. This was immensely popular: the first part ran through nine editions in its first year. Mocking everything from epic to science, it was indiscriminately caustic about faction, whether religious or political:

> Both Parties joyn'd to do their best, To Damn the Publick Interest. And Hearded only in consults, To put by one anothers Bolts: T'outcant the Babylonian Labourers At all their Dialects of Jabberers, And tug at both ends of the Saw, To tear down Government and Law.

As in Swift's satire later, this is not high-minded but knowing. You cannot guess where it will turn next, though many of its tropes are recognizable from earlier traditions. For example, classical satirists attacked opponents for being misers or gluttons. Culpability was illustrated by deviance from a mean: thus hospitality could degenerate into prodigality or contract into parsimony, like Butler's Puritans who 'Quarrel with minc'd Pies and disparage / Their best and dearest friend, Plumporridge'. (Pope's miser and glutton in his Epistle to Bathurst continue this game.) Nor could you tell for how long such poems would go on: the ramble or survey continues until the poet has had enough. Similarly, Dryden's > Annus Mirabilis (1666) packs into its year of wonders the naval war with Holland and the Great Fire of London, but its pace is set by the compelling nature of the various spectacles it describes rather than by strict calendar time.

This sense of 'uncovering' is common to satire, epistles, tales and fables, popular genres of this period. Dryden's > The Medall (1682) uses the coin as an emblem of two-facedness as well as the medal struck by the Whigs to celebrate the acquittal of > Shaftesbury: 'So like the Man; so golden in the Sight / So base within, so counterfeit and light'. Dryden plays with conceits established by earlier ballads about heads stamped on crowns, crowned heads and coinage as an emblem of political fortunes. In > Absalom and Achitophel (1681-2) he goes on to use the known Biblical story of a plot against David to represent political treachery as the sinister Shaftesbury masterminds the Duke of Monmouth in a plot against Charles II. Forms of proper government are debated:

> What shall we think! Can People give away Both for themselves and Sons, their Native smay? Then are they left Defensless, to the Sword Of each unbounded Arbitrary Lord:

On the other hand

Nor is the Peoples Judgment always true: The most may err as grossly as the few, And faultless Kings run down, by Common Cry For Vice, Oppression and for Tyranny.

This competitive play of voices carries more instability than the syntactically more complicated antitheses favoured by 18th-century couplets. Though they look smoother in Dryden's verse, both sides are open to surprise, change and disruption.

Social and political restlessness are reflected in Restoration reinvention of genres as mock genres. Parody, irony and ⊳ burlesque were popular (⊳ figures of speech), though recognition of the matter being reformulated also ensured that orthodoxies lingered. Burlesque distinctively dissolved grand matters into bathetic (> figures of speech) effects, in for instance Charles Cotton's translation of the very popular French travesty of Virgil by Paul Scarron: 'Aeneas and his Wand'ring Mates, Were at that time, Angling for Sprats'. Banality was not wholly the enemy of wit, since it provided occasions for it, as in Dryden's satire of the poetic aspirations of Elkanah Settle and > Thomas Shadwell in Mac Flecknoe. Poets who claimed merit - incessantly troped as 'laurel' or 'bays' - used surprise to guard against boredom, even in mock genres where reversals could be predicted. Rochester was particularly deft at this game, as for example in his song 'Fair Chloris in a pigsty lay', where the nymph's location burlesques pastoral. Yet the poem turns out to be an account of Chloris masturbating: a surprise not just in its frankness but in the way that its image of female selfsufficiency reverses pastoral's obsessive articulation of abandoned lovers' complaints. The incompleteness of heterosexual love is burlesqued by autoeroticism, but it ends with a further surprise by restoring Chloris to pastoral purity, though with an ironic note - ironic about both pastoral and antipastoral - 'She's innocent and pleased'.

Pastoral was especially suited to rewriting since its conventions were static. Even where lovers leave one another, order is reimposed through formulaic laments about departure. But Restoration pastoral is peculiarly dynamic, partly because women used the genre to write about desire. In the 17th century, states of semi-undress were considered more exciting than nudity; the longings and couplings of nymphs and swains thinly veil those of men and women. Love is shown as arousal, exhaustion, rearousal; where bodies mingle, moods dissolve and evolve. For example, in Aphra Behn's On a Juniper-Tree, cut down to make Busks (1680), after a couple make love three times,

> ... Chloris reassum'd her fear, And chid the Swain, for having prest, What she alas wou'd not resist: Whilst he in whom Loves sacred flame Before and after was the same, Fondly implor'd she wou'd forget A fault, which he wou'd yet repeat.

The shifts between past and future, memory and desire, dizzily mimic the erotic exchange. Yet the lovers are constant: change is displaced onto the tree telling the story which (surprise) is no longer a tree but a pile of sticks for corsets and (surprise again) that transformation was anticipated at the start by the title.

Constant metamorphosis is the mark of late 17th-century poetry, as of Restoration drama, where women so often disguise themselves, as other women, even as men, usually in order to further some sexual aim. The reopening of theatres, and women's new cultural presence, created a new sense of the pleasures and threats of acting. Rochester's phrase, 'Love's theatre, the bed', points to a fascination in poetry with how sex expressed conscious performance (in every sense) rather than authenticity. This was, of course, convenient for libertines who could up and leave at any time on the grounds that no feeling was real, or if real, lasting. It is not, however, ennui which underlies Rochester's moving lyrics about transience - 'All my past life is mine noe more' - though some of his violent verse is hardly philosophical. One such poem, in which the speaker wishes to fuck out his mistress's eyes, is a mock-song, and hence could be seen to expose libertine excess by exaggerating or parodying it. But much male libertine poetry is straightforwardly anxious and violent: women are endlessly figured as towns to be attacked, besieged and conquered. In this troping of love as war, women fought back with strong mythological warriors such as Amazons or planetary deities, such as Diana, who looked down on men from a great height. Men might use the same myths as evidence of unfemininity or frigidity, but female heroism had the longer literary heritage. The popularity of poems by women about female friendship reflected not just actual supportive relations between women, but also a model of emotional constancy and trustworthiness, which misogynist poets consistently denied women showed in matters of love. Platonic love, sensual but apparently asexual, offered women an alternative to faithless heterosexual lovers, and furthermore showed women capable of reasoning philosophically. As 'Philophilippa' wrote in tribute to Katherine Philips' poems about female friendship, 'For there's requir'd (to do that Virtue right) / Courage, as much in Friendship as in Fight'.

Katherine Philips proved herself not only in contemporary, innovative, writing, but also through her display of more traditional skills. In fact she was one of many poets whose success was founded on translation - in her case, of ⊳ Corneille. Translation, another form of textual metamorphosis, gave proof of skill based on intellect. Hence it was especially helpful to women, since it allowed them to show intellectual skill which was then modestly diffused through their original's preexisting reputation. As the > Earl of Roscommon put it, 'And by improving what was writ before, Invention labours less, but Judgment more'. Before Dryden translated Virgil, according to Elizabeth Thomas, translators had 'his lofty Epick Rhymes / By murd'ring Pens debas'd, to doggerel Chimes'. Rewriting Ovid, > Boccaccio and Chaucer in Fables Ancient and Modern (1700), Dryden showed how English verse could revitalize old texts. The linguistic edge to his poetic talents was underlined by his admirers. Comparing Dryden (sprightly, energetic, various) to Pope (regular, harmonious, elevated), > James Beattie in 1776 stressed how Dryden's example transformed English:

In Dryden's more correct pieces, we meet with no affection of words of Latin or Greek etymology, no cumbersome pomp of epithets, no drawling circumlocutions, no idle glare of images, no blunderings round about a meaning: his English is pure and simple, nervous and clear, to a degree which Pope has never exceeded and not always equalled.

Dryden, in his use of English, showed how a poetry of restlessness could also be durable and elegant; he is said to have found it brick and left it marble.

Poetry in context: 1700-1740

Early 18th-century poetry has been most closely associated with the term 'Augustan': civilized, rational, decorous - except where wit allows it to be naughty - and with Alexander Pope as its chief exponent. There was a characteristic urbanity, not only the stability of civic architecture, but the rowdy flow of life on the streets, in for instance John Gay's Trivia; or, the Art of Walking the Streets of London (1716), which you might share with a Covent Garden prostitute.

> 'Tis she who nightly strolls with saunt'ring pace, No stubborn stays her yielding shape embrace; Beneath the lamp her tawdry ribbons glare, The new-scowered manteau, and the slattern air, High-draggled petticoats her travels show, And hollow cheeks with artful blushes glow; With flatt'ring sounds she sooths the cred'lous ear, 'My noble captain! charmer! love! my dear!

This interest in portraiture and types of speech was widespread in early 18th-century poetry. Material detail and social nuance created the illusion of spectatorship, in which the poet's observation appears easy. This stylistic representation of the ordinary made 18th-century poetry self-consciously literary in its appearance, even when its substance extended to low-life concerns. As Pope put it in his > Essay on Criticism (1711), 'True Wit is Nature to advantage dressed / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed'. This familiarity of poetic material and ideas also meant that poetry could become much less the prerogative of one class or gender.

Two poets from a slightly older generation showed how the commonplace could be used to reveal multiple meanings. John Philips' Georgic Cyder (1706) described the cultivation, manufacture and virtues of cider. It also investigated the apple's role in 'fallen states' from the theological to the drunken, as well as its political symbolism (through toasts) and association with art (through horticulture). The Art of Cooking (1708) by > William King did for food what Cyder did for drink, using a Horatian ideal of temperance to investigate questions of appetite and the nationalism of gastronomy.

This conjunction of material and mythological worlds is present in Pope's Windsor Forest, a Tory panegyric in which the Berkshire countryside becomes the heroic birthplace of national glory, and The Rape of the Lock, which was ostensibly written to reconcile the families of a young woman and of a man who had cut off one of her ringlets. This sparkling mock epic has a Miltonic machinery of sylphs, but these spirits fail to protect the heroine Belinda:

> Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight, Their fluid bodies half-dissolved in light, Loose to the wind their airy garments flew, Thin glittering textures of the filmy dew.

Pope's mock heroic is conventionally read as a critique of a society which confuses moral and material values, embodied in the heroine who may equally 'stain her honour or her new brocade'. Pope blames female sexuality for this confusion in his sumptuous celebration of the period's double standard over sexual behaviour. This not only excluded women from desires allowed to men, but expected them to be simultaneously innocent of sexuality, and on guard against it. Though Pope celebrates as well as condemns conspicuous consumption, he is also drawn to the shape-changing instabilities of materiality, as in the sylphs, for example. Interested in optics, Pope went to astronomy lectures: the science of seeing which exposed that what the eye could not see was kin to poetry, since poetry both discovered the appearances of the material world and fancifully depicted unreal worlds. Where the metaphysical poet Donne was interested in comparative miniaturization of tears and globes, and Byron was later poignantly to compare stars and drops of ink as differently durable, Pope was fascinated by the evanescence of cultural forms in an era of innovation, corruption and change: 'And now a Bubble bursts, and now a World'. It makes his poetry surprisingly anxious and elegiac below the surface of order. For Rochester, 'a nothingness the ancients knew' was at least comforting in its continuity; for Pope, the evolution of modernity threatened irreparable rupture from the past.

The transitions between great and little in mock heroic show up physical differences of scale which raise the question of scales by which to measure moral values. Satire involved some agreement between writer and reader as to which scales were best and how to establish them. Pope conservatively evokes terms such as 'good nature', 'good humour' or 'good sense' (often rhymed with contrasting 'offence' or 'pretence'), as if they were self-evident. This approach becomes facile in his ► Essay on Man (1733-4) - 'Whatever is, is Right' - as arguments for an ordered universe and the limits of reason are sustained largely by smooth versification. Optimism drains away in his later satires: the four ⊳ Moral Essays (1731-5) are addressed to exemplary figures whose virtues contrast with the follies and vices of contemporary individuals, historical figures and traditional types. In the > Imitations of Horace (1733-8), Pope updates Horace but despairs of a society at best anarchic and at worst vicious. Hope is slenderly located in the community of poet and reader, provided the latter is capable of 'good taste', an alliance tested again in Pope's 1743 expanded version of The Dunciad, a mock epic about Grub Street's alleged threat to culture. 'Satire's my Weapon, but I'm too discreet / To run a Muck, and tilt at all I meet': Pope appears to oppose mediocrity fearlessly. However, as > Colley Ciber, chief dunce in The Dunciad, pointed out with some dignity in his memoirs, not everyone shared Pope's definition of mediocrity. Moreover, although some writers mocked Pope for his small size, his spinal curvature and his > Catholicism, in order to attack his Tory politics, not all the opposition to him was ill-founded. Pope had a talent for countering insult with feud' the effects of which made his anxieties about popular culture even harder to allay. He could be peevish and misogynist as well as an exceptionally elegant writer.

Pope's prominence tends to eclipse other poets, even Tory satirists, such as the densely topical Jonathan Swift, or Samuel Johnson, whose > London (1738) and ▶ The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749) looked to Juvenal rather than Horace. Swift's Verses on the Death of Dr Swift (1739) were a Restoration-style joke, a mock elegy, but their mimicry of chat over cards expressed the 18th-century's interest in idiom, as well as its preoccupation with transcience. Swift's quatrains shaped irony more drily than couplets, but were used less. The couplet's compressions, comparisons and parallels suggested life as a process whose symmetries could only be provisionally stabilized. Like the ubiquitous use of irony, it suggested multiple meanings. The couplet's assurance was also useful for female and working-class poets. > Mary Collier, a gardener's daughter and admirer of Pope, used it to take issue with Pope's negative views on women: 'Yet, with ten thousand follies to her charge, / Unhappy woman's but a slave at large' (Essay on Woman, 1746).

A number of critics pointed to the contribution of women in extending culture, but women repeatedly used tropes of ⊳ slavery to describe their situation. As > Sarah Egerton put it in 1703, 'Say, tyrant Custom, why we must obey / The impositions of thy haughty sway?' As Stuarts were replaced by Hanoverian dynasts, women reflected on how they were unable to change their rulers. However, many more women were writing. One particularly popular form was the epistle, where the mutual status of correspondents offered women temporary equality, with men as well as with each other. Where 17th-century epistles foregrounded friendship, 18thcentury ones highlight writing as part of domestic activities. Johnson's gruff praise of Elizabeth Carter, that she could translate Epictetus and make a pudding, is acted out in women's poetry as they describe themselves 'scribbling' and running households. 'Often, from thoughts sublime as these, / I sink at once - and make a cheese', as Frances Seymour, Countess of Hertford, joked to her friend the Countess of Pomfret.

Some women achieved fame almost in spite of themselves. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, though aristocratically reluctant to publish, was known as a wit. Her satires, some in collaboration with > Lord John Hervey, prize subtlety: satire should 'like a polish'd Razor keen / Wound with a touch that's scarcely felt or seen'. Her Town Eclogues (1716) are thoughtful city pastorals, one of many generic mutations which followed from a quarrel between Pope and > Ambrose Philips about the proper scope of pastoral, Philips' argument that life-like rural speech or activities could modernize pastoral was playfully taken up by Gay in his Spenserian cycle The Shepherd's Week (1714). It also became a game in which pastoral was given oxymoronic (> figures of speech) locations such as the city or seaside.

High-cultural figurations of landscape were often consciously literary, but open to intellectual enquiries of all sorts. In his Miltonic > The Seasons (1726-30), > James Thomson drew together science, geography, history, philosophy and theology to celebrate and explore the natural world. Like Pope an admirer of > Newton, Thomson represents both science and poetry as tracing causes, describing effects and yielding beauty. Frost illustrates the process:

The nightly Sky And all her glowing Constellations, pour Their rigid Influence down: It freezes on Till Morn, late-rising, o'er the drooping World Lifts her pale Eye, unjoyous: then appears The various Labour of the silent Night, The pendant Isicle, the Frost-Work fair Where thousand Figures rise, the crusted Snow, Tho' white, made whiter by the fining North. (Winter, 1726)

For all this poem's enthusiastic natural richness, the personifications which crowd it show how early 18th-century poetry is continuously sociable.

Poetry in context: 1740-1790

The 1740s have been described as a decade of literary loneliness, though women writers, likely to have isolation imposed on them for writing, continued to quest for community. Poetry is still peopled, but with the deceased, including Pope, to whom many tributes were written after his death in 1744. Fashionable poems - ▶ Edward Young's > Night Thoughts (1742-5), > Robert Blair's The Grave (1743), Lord Lyttleton's Monody on the death of his wife (1747) - all involved mortality, a trend neatly parodied in William Whitehead's New Night Thoughts on Death (1747): 'Stop, insatiate worm! / I feel thy summons: - to my fellow-worms / Thou bidd'st me hasten! - I obey thy call, / For wherefore should I live?' Poems such as > Thomas Parnell's Night Piece on Death (1721) had earlier considered how death levelled the already low:

> Those Graves, with bending osier bound, That nameless heave the crumbled ground, Quick to the glancing thought disclose Where Toil and Poverty repose.

In Thomas Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard thought lingered on the same nameless people's resting place:

> Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, Their sober mishes never learn'd to stray; Along the cool sequester'd vale of life They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

Where previously poets picked out figures in crowds or sketched types, now they explored anonymity and rural community. As roads and canals improved, as travel and > travel writing increased, and as publishing moved out of London, poetry became provincial, regional, exotic - almost anything but metropolitan, though town life still provided poetry with bustle.

This remoteness could be geographical or historical: for instance, in the Persian Eclogues (1742) and odes of > William Collins, or Gray's odes The Progress of Poesy and > The Bard (1757), which follow Thomson's interest in Druids, and commemorate imagination in native archetypes (> Welsh literature in English). The idea of the bard appealed as an image of a community poet with power: as John Brown explained in 1763, 'the Poet, though no longer a Legislator, may still occasionally exert his salutory Power, by his Influence on the Passions of the Soul'. Edward I's massacre of Welsh bards was represented almost nostalgically, since his persecution proved that poetry could have power. The bards' Celtic domains also meant a move to the margins, where Englishness was contested – literally, in the ⊳ Jacobite Rebellion of 1745 and its aftermath. Northern material remained attractive in ballads, such as Jane Elliot's The Flowers of the Forest (1769), and Lady Anne Lindsay's Auld Robin Gray (1776). The distancing power of imagination itself was evoked by the controversy surrounding James MacPherson's epic fragments published under the name of ⊳ Ossian, and allegedly discovered centuries after they were written. If truly discovered, the fragments would acquire historical lustre; if invented, then what they revealed would be inauthentic. This view does not express a simple suspicion of the imagination, but it supports antiquarian effort against flashy inspiration.

The commodification of poetry, partly represented by Ossian, reflected ambiguities about poetry's commercial possibilities: for instance, the footnotes which Gray strewed round his bardic poems can be seen as making his material both more and less accessible to a general readership. Controversy raged as to whether Ossian was genuine: Johnson and some others were sceptical; yet some like John Brown argued that no modern poet could come up with 'the grand Simplicity of Imagery and Diction, the strong Draughts of rude Manners and uncultivated Scenes of Nature, which abound in all these Poems'. Similar controversy surrounded the poems of > Thomas Chatterton which he briefly passed off as the productions of a 15th-century monk, Thomas Rowley.

Bardic preoccupations gave way to more diverse regional interests, leading to experiments with dialect, best known in ⊳ Robert Burns' poems, as in the address to a mouse whose nest had been turned up by the plough: 'Wee, sleeket, cowran, tim'rous beastie, / O, what a panic's in thy breastie!' (1785). Dialect also featured in some of the poems of Susannah Blamire, 'the Muse of Cumberland', and in the unusual poem by 'Ophelia', Snaith Marsh. A Yorkshire Pastoral (1754). > Mary Leapor's Crumble Hall (1751) plays inventively with pastoral conventions; ⊳ Oliver Goldsmith's > The Deserted Village (1768) upholds them, despite addressing the effects of rural depopulation on 'Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain'. Many poets attempted to reconcile pieties with social problems, but with variable success, leading > George Crabbe to declare in The Village (1783) 'I paint the Cot, / As Truth will paint it, and as Bards will not'.

Much religious poetry of this period was not simply or sentimentally pious, but powerful, even violent. ▶ Christopher Smart's poems about the sacred bard, David, were admired for their elevated formality. His extraordinary Jubilate Agno (written 1759-61, but not published until 1939) brings together Biblical references and contemporary life in an idiolectic litany: 'Let Achsah rejoice with the Pigeon who is an antidote to malignity and will carry a letter. / For I bless God for the Postmaster General and all Conveyancers of letters under his care especially Allen and Sherlock.' More conventional liturgical pronouncements appeared in many hymns, which followed those of ⊳ Isaac Watts a little earlier in the period: for instance, 'Christians, awake, salute the happy morn' > (John Byrom), 'Rock of Ages, cleft for me' (Augustus Toplady), and 'God moves in a mysterious way' (William Cowper).

Where faith energized reason, reason also composed faith (visibly, in the quatrains of hymns.) Both were affected by the mid- to late- century's movement of > sensibility, though since poetry had always been assumed to involve feeling, sensibility affected it less than prose. William Cowper's > The Task (1785), written as therapy for periodic religious depression, brought the feeling mind and thinking heart together to form a poetic subjectivity which reflects on its world and narrates how that world relates to wider ones. Starting with a sofa, the poem turns expansively to books, people and the natural world, each of which contributes to poetic communication.

Fellow-feeling was promoted in a number of anti-slavery poems and in sympathy for various political struggles against tyranny. Such was Corsica by Anna Laetitia

Aikin (later > Barbauld) in 1773:

There yet remains a freedom, nobler far Than kings or senates can destroy or give; Beyond the proud oppressor's cruel grasp Seated secure; uninjured; undestroyed; Worthy of gods: the freedom of the mind.

The > American War of Independence attracted some interest - Anna Seward's Monody on the Unfortunate Major André (1781), lamenting the officer shot as a spy, was one of the poems which made its author prominent. The politics of > William Blake's poems The French Revolution (1791) and America (1793) were overtly radical, despite their prophetic modes, since this was less ambiguous and dialectical than his symbolism in > Songs of Innocence and Experience (1789; 1794).

With ideological tension increasing, moralist poets criticized mistaken sensibility: 'Tis not to mourn because a sparrow dies; To rave in artificial ecstasies', wrote > Hannah More in 1782. But frivolous poetry prospered as well as the sublime: as Richard Tickell complained in 1778, 'The reigning fashion in modern poesy is Sentimental Panegyric on Married Beauties. This appears in a thousand various Shapes; from Bouts Rhimées on the wou'd-be Sappho of Bath, up to Doggerel Epistles to the lovely Amoret'. Provincial centres and spas, such as Bath, Tunbridge Wells, Brighthelmstone (as Brighton was then called), Cheltenham and Scarborough, provided renewable audiences. One such collection declared 'The subject of the verses written at these places of public and polite resort is generally Love and the Charms of the Fair.' There were exceptions: Christopher Anstey's constantly reprinted New Bath Guide (1766) mixed satire and sentiment in its epistles: thus one admirer asked, 'How came you by such an extraordinary gift / Thus to blend in one poem both YORICK and SWIFT?'

After 1740, then, some poets turned satiric and lyric energies into provincial forms. Politeness concerned cultural community rather than manners. Other poets tested the limits of nature-based genres, such as pastoral or descriptive poetry, to pursue sublime quests, escapist ideals or a more representative, gritty relation between social practices and poetry. But urbanity did not disappear: even as poets explored new areas, they continued to believe in poetry as communicative.

Modern criticism has invested heavily in the idea of > Romanticism as a distinct literary era, and one whose aims and ideals are particularly associated with poetry. Late 20th-century criticism has taken a more flexible attitude perhaps to debates about dividing lines, arguing that there are multiple and sometimes competing ways of representing literary history. The map of women's poetry does not fit neatly onto that of men's. Likewise, categories of race and class, which are not necessarily the same across history, lead us to different views of literature. Historians are comfortable with the idea of a 'long 18th century', from 1660 to 1832, and the publication of > Wordsworth and > Coleridge's Lyrical Ballads in 1798 has at times been taken as the literary equivalent of the Great Reform Act in providing a convenient stagingpost. But critical interest in cultural differences within periods has complicated literary history, and its relation to historical and cultural interpretation. There are many histories and many cultures involved. War, for example, was not central to the experience of all writers, but continuous conflict formed part of the public domain, and hence the public domain of poetry, from the wars against the Dutch in the 1660s and 1670s to the Napoleonic wars of the 1800s. So too imperial expeditions (> imperialism), colonial ventures (> colonialism), Grand Tours and voyages of exploration widened the horizons of some and brought oppression to others. Both war and travel stimulated literature's reflections upon national identity and modernity. Poetry's ready identification with conventions made it hospitable to conservative thought, but its association with imagination also made it the vehicle of challenging and progressive ideas.

In place of an old, reductive story of a simple opposition between reason and imagination, where Romanticism heralds the victory of the latter, recent criticism suggests that Romanticism involves responses to ideological developments precipitated particularly by the French Revolution. Similarly significant changes, particularly in the arenas of politics, religion and the economy, can be seen to be taking place from the late 17th century on. Poetry was actively engaged in these cultural transformations throughout the 18th century. In helping to engineer a dynamic cooperation between reason and passion, as well as a recognition of how they could at times contradict one another, poetry expressed one of the chief characteristics of the Enlightenment.

Market, Morality and Sentiment: Non-dramatic Prose 1660–1789

Janet Barron and David Nokes

No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money
Samuel Johnson

Early prose and the origins of the novel

Secular, non-dramatic, writing in English dates back to the late 15th century and was already flourishing by the 16th. But its publication proliferated during the ▷ Civil War, when polemicists on both sides recognized the usefulness of widely distributed printed propaganda. Printing presses became cheap and relatively portable, and political ▷ pamphlets, ancestors of today's ▷ newspapers, multiplied. After the ▷ Restoration the presses continued to be used for religious and political propaganda, but also for a wide range of other secular writing, including ▷ broadsides, ▷ ballads, ▷ conduct books, books on cookery, and housewifery in general, and pamphlets on a vast range of topics, both serious and frivolous.

In addition, numerous fictional works were published, some of which look forward to the novel of the 18th century. Much ink has been spilled to determine the question of exactly where and how the novel began. As yet, no answer has emerged which seems universally acceptable. Some literary historians have looked back as far as Elizabethan writers of prose romance, such as Sidney, Nashe, Deloney, and Greene, for ancestors of the novel, or even referred to their stories as early novels. But more serious attention has been given to several post-Restoration works, including > Aphra Behn's > Love Letters Between a Nobleman and his Sister (1684-7), whose epistolary form (> epistolary novel) was widely taken up in the 18th century, by novelists including ▷ Richardson; and her ▷ Oroonoko (1688), whose first-person narrative, involving detailed accounts of the narrator-persona's own feelings in reaction to events, again anticipates many later works. Another important composition is > Congreve's Incognita: Or, Love and Duty Reconcil'd (1601) which, in its playful irony, resembles the novels of > Fielding. Congreve defined his own work as a novel, and in its Preface distinguished it from the earlier romance, arguing that novels, including his, 'are of a more familiar nature' than romances, and that 'Romances give more of wonder, novels more of delight'.

Most of the works described above were written for considerations other than financial gain. Some authors were inspired by passionate conviction, others by the desire to exert their influence through argument, others wrote for the sheer pleasure of the task, while others still were motivated by the simple authorial vanity of seeing the offsprings of their imagination bound up in folio or octavo volumes. A very few 17th-century writers, such as Behn, lived on the income from their writing. But it was the 18th century which really saw the emergence of the professional writer on a wide scale; the man or woman who wrote not as a genteel pastime, nor to flatter the self-esteem of a generous patron, but directly for money. For the first time, the spread of literacy, together with the emergence of commercial bookseller-publishers eager to feed the imaginations of an expanding reading public, made the trade of letters a viable, if not always lucrative, profession.

The literary market place

In the early years of the century most of the leading writers still relied more on institutional sinecures, or on a combination of public and private patronage, than on the literary market place for their support. ▷ Richard Steele was a Commissioner for stamps; William Congreve was nominally in charge of licensing hackney carriages; ▷ Daniel Defoe was a government spy; ▷ Jonathan Swift held the livings of two country parishes in Ireland; ▷ Joseph Addison was a career civil servant, finally achieving the position of Secretary of State.

Yet the qualifications required for entry to the professions excluded some authors who had to rely solely on the income from their writing. As a Catholic (\triangleright Catholicism), \triangleright Alexander Pope was unable to hold public office, though he made a virtue of his social exclusion by celebrating his Twickenham retreat as a symbol of independence. His accomplished marketing of the subscription editions of his translations of \triangleright Homer netted him an astonishing £10,000 (something in excess of £500,000 in today's terms). It was a commercial coup that other writers could only envy. By contrast, Swift was paid £200 for \triangleright Gulliver's Travels (1726), and \triangleright Oliver Goldsmith £60 for \triangleright The Vicar of Wakefield (1761–2).

In recent years critical interpretations of 18th-century literature have increasingly questioned the traditional image of the period as an 'age of reason' (> rationalism), a peaceful haven of political stability and classical values. Recent studies have revealed the commercial realities that lay behind the > classical façade of the 18th-century literary pantheon. By exploring the subculture of > Grub Street, and by focusing attention on the many previously neglected women writers of the period, modern scholarship has provided a new perspective on this fascinating era in literary history, reminding us of the valuable contributions made by those excluded from the clubs and > coffee-houses of the Augustan establishment.

Aphra Behn, debarred from the professions as a woman, attempted to attract state patronage by her political writings. The Ode on the Coronation would, she hoped, secure her a pension or a grace-and-favour house. But no money was forthcoming, and she turned instead to more lucrative markets for her talents in romantic fiction and theatrical comedies.

The career of > Samuel Johnson demonstrates the precariousness of the literary life. Forced by poverty to abandon his studies at Oxford University, he thereby relinquished all hopes of a career in the law or the Church. After an unsuccessful attempt at school-teaching, he arrived in London, virtually penniless, and began to support himself by his writings. Regular contributions to > The Gentleman's Magazine provided part of his income, yet his independent projects were also undertaken for commercial reasons. According to legend, > Rasselas (1759) was written rapidly to pay the expenses of his mother's funeral; Johnson encouraged such stories as proof of his independence.

In 1755, at the culmination of his labours on the Dictionary of the English Language, Johnson delivered a celebrated epistolary snub to his self-styled patron, the Earl of Chesterfield: 'Is not a patron, my lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water and when he has reached ground encumbers him with help?' His letter is a declaration of literary independence that signals the end of the era of the private patron. Ironically, it was the commercial project of the Dictionary which brought Johnson academic recognition, as Oxford awarded him the degree he had been unable to obtain by more conventional means. In 1762, the award of a Crown pension of £300 a year relieved Johnson of some of the drudgery of > hack work, though he was careful to insist that this was not a reward for political services, but a recognition of literary achievements.

Just before the start of the century, the lapsing of the Licensing Act in 1695 provided the opportunity for a massive expansion of the printing trade. Entrepreneurial publishers ranging from society figures like Jacob Tonson to Grub Street pirates like Edmund Curll played a vital, though sometimes unrecognized, part in shaping the literary culture of the 18th century. The 'Augustan Age' (> Augustanism)is often, and rightly, portrayed as a period when classical models and formal rules were of paramount literary importance; yet the commercial judgements of men like these were equally influential in promoting and developing the variety of 18th-century literature, with works ranging from translations of the classics to lurid > Newgate yarns.

It was a time when, according to Martin Scriblerus (▷ Scriblerus Club) (alias Pope), 'paper became so cheap and printers so numerous that a deluge of authors cover'd the land'. What is remarkable about the prose writings of the 18th century, when compared with those of earlier centuries, is their sheer diversity. The rise of the novel and the development of ▷ periodical journalism are only the two most obvious features of this expansion of the literary market. Fabulous adventures (▷ fable), travellers' tales (▷ travel literature), secret histories, spiritual lives, satires, ▷ sermons, ▷ pastorals and panegyrics and works of every conceivable style and tone, calculated to appeal to all ▷ tastes and pockets, rolled from the presses. The pages of Pope's ▷ Dunciad are filled with the names of forgotten Grub Street authors, such as Ned Ward, ▷ Eliza Haywood and ▷ Charles Gildon, many of whom eked out a precarious living in the kind of literary sweat-shops hilariously described by Henry Fielding in his play The Author's Farce (1730).

Establishment authors, like Pope and Swift, frequently deplored the promiscuous vitality of this new literary world, forseeing the death of civilized values in publishers' lists as the works of classical authors were outnumbered by the ephemeral products of those whom they dubbed the 'moderns' or 'dunces' (> The Battle of the Books). The novelists themselves often appeared embarrassed at their own imaginative freedom, prefacing their works with statements which sought to legitimize the seductive appeal of fiction by appealing to some external authority. In referring to his early novels as 'comic epics in prose' Fielding endeavoured to claim a niche for them in the traditional classical pantheon. > Defoe preferred to describe his tales as 'true histories', faking his fictions to read like facts, and filling in the broad sweeps of his adventure stories with minute circumstantial details. To Samuel Richardson, the only justification for fiction was its clear commitment to moral reform, and he presented his novels as exemplary parables in which vice is routed and virtue rewarded. Yet even the sternest critics of literary self-indulgence found the lure of fictional licence irresistible. Swift's > A Tale of a Tub (1704) is among other things a satire on the ephemerality of modern culture. 'I have remarked,' says the Tale's narrator, 'that nothing is so very tender as a modern piece of wit'. But, while affecting to deplore this cultural perishability, Swift revels in the world of literary ephemera, turning topical tit-bits into enduring metaphors (> figures of speech) for human vanity.

Thus to speak of 'the rise of the novel' in the early 18th century, as if assuming that by then the novel had attained a clear, recognizable identity, is somewhat misleading. There was no single literary genre which sprang fully formed to life with the publication of > Robinson Crusoe in 1719. Instead, a variety of contrasting fictional forms competed for attention, ranging from the vivid Grub Street pseudo-biographies (> biography) published in the down-market Applebee's Journal (1715–36), to witty anecdotal sketches of the > Coverley family presented in > The Spectator (1712); or from salacious secret histories, such as Delarivière Manley's The New Atalantis (1700) to satiric fantasies, such as Swift's Gulliver's Travels. As late as 1711 > The Tatler was still using the word 'novelist' to mean a newspaperman. In much the same way Johnson's Dictionary continued to define 'journal' as 'any paper published daily', whereas most of the periodicals so described were not in fact daily publications. In both cases it is clear that the regulatory constraints of etymology had little inhibiting influence on the dynamic growth of the genres themselves. For, despite the Augustan predilection for ⊳ neo-classical rules and critical categories, the novel, like > journalism, grew up happily innocent of prescriptive theories. Indeed, the emergence of the novel form in the early 18th century, which often appears an inevitable consequence of changing social conditions, can equally well be presented as the result of a series of felicitous accidents. Defoe was almost 60, and nearing the end of an indefatigably varied career during which he had tried his hand at innumerable forms of business enterprise (all failures) as well as journalism and espionage, when he published Robinson Crusoe. Fielding was a celebrated young playwright until > Sir Robert Walpole's introduction of stage censorship with the new Licensing Act of 1737 (> theatres) forced him to find an alternative outlet for his literary talents. Richardson was a successful printer, whose decision to turn author was partly inspired by a prudent desire to utilize the spare capacity of his press. This process of 'serendipity', a word coined by > Horace Walpole, continued throughout the century, and it was Walpole's own fortuitous success with his fantasy > The Castle of Otranto (1764) which inspired the later vogue for ⊳ Gothic fiction.

The career and reputation of Daniel Defoe offers some useful insights into one type of literary enterprise. The son of a Dissenting tallow-chandler, he was a lifelong bankrupt, a tireless entrepreneur and a prolific journalist whose collected works would fill several hundred volumes. For nine years, from 1704 to 1713 he wrote singlehandedly his thrice-weekly journal > The Review; for much of the same period he was also one of the government's leading spies, sending back secret reports from Edinburgh on the political manoeuvring surrounding the negotiations for the Act of ▶ Union between England and Scotland in 1707. Simultaneously, he was also striving to extricate himself from massive debts, and contriving to stay out of the hands of his many creditors. In both his business ventures and his journalism one finds the same spirit of brinkmanship, the same flirting with disaster. The energy and excitement of his writings co-exist with a kind of literary carelessness and an apparent impatience with more studied effects which led on occasions to disaster. His ironic pamphlet The Shortest Way with Dissenters (1702), which counterfeited the violent language of a High Church zealot, backfired badly when its irony was mistaken for incitement, and Defoe was sentenced to punishment at the pillory. More recently, critics have reassessed the apparent carelessness of Defoe's writing, finding in it the poker-face of a more accomplished literary gamesmanship. The 'failure' of The Shortest Way succeeded in exposing the covert menace of High Church policies in a way that more conventional irony (> figure of speech) could not have achieved. Similar subtleties may be detected in the 'mistakes' and contradictions which abound in Defoe's novels. Generations of readers have noted the glaring contradictions between what characters say in one part of a novel, and how they behave elsewhere. Well on in her narrative > Moll Flanders is seized by a sudden maternal instinct and delivers a sober lecture on the depravity of mothers who neglect or abandon their offspring. Yet by this stage she herself has happily abandoned innumerable children of her own without a word or a qualm. Her flair for criminality is accompanied by a constant moral patter as she alternately presents herself as a victim of circumstances and an agent of social education. The unconvincingness of her final 'repentance', which conveniently allows her to retire in comfort on her ill-gotten gains, has often appeared to undermine the novel's moral seriousness. Contradictions like these – and there are many other celebrated examples in all the novels – have often been taken as evidence of a slap-dash journeyman approach to the business of authorship. Yet the pattern of these contradictions, in which characters preach like > Puritan moralists yet act like ruthless opportunists, goes to the heart of Defoe's fiction. For all their concentration on mundane details, his novels are fantasies of survival, heroic adventures of social mobility in which individuals single-handedly confront and conquer a host of adverse circumstances. Despite the apparent crudity of their episodic narratives, Defoe's novels are animated by a quality more usually identified with a more self-consciously sophisticated form of fiction, in the characters of his unreliable narrators.

Likewise the unravelling of Jonathan Swift's ironies has been the key to the 20th-century reappraisal of his status as a writer. Earlier critics such as Thackeray viewed his writings as misanthropic and malign: 'A monster gibbering shrieks, and gnashing imprecations against mankind – tearing down all shreds of modesty, past all sense of manliness and shame; filthy in word, filthy in thought, furious, raging, obscene.'

Judgements like these derive from the tendency to identify Swift with the narrators of his satires, seeing in Gulliver's hysterical reaction to the \triangleright Yahoos a representation of Swift's supposed alienation from humanity. But Swift is the master of literary disguises, and his chosen narrators are utopians or fanatics, projectors or madmen whose plausible rhetoric of half-truths lead inexorably to such savage conclusions as the eating of babies or the abandonment of human society in favour of life in a stable. As a satirist, Swift aims primarily at the irrational \triangleright utopianism which founds its hopes of progress on a refusal to acknowledge the perversities and flaws of human nature itself. From \triangleright A Tale of a Tub (1704), with its ironic epigraph 'Written for the Universal Improvement of Mankind', to the Academy of Lagado in Gulliver's Travels, whose scientists are engaged in projects to produce sunbeams out of cucumbers, Swift ridicules the visionary enthusiasm which finds inspiration in the belchings of a fanatical preacher, and sublime wisdom in the neighing of a horse.

Born and educated in \triangleright Ireland, Swift took holy orders and became a clergyman in the Church of Ireland. Yet he spent most of Queen \triangleright Anne's reign in London, pursuing an alternative career as a political journalist. His \triangleright Examiner articles and his pamphlet The Conduct of the Allies (1711) provided a magisterial defence of the Tory government's policy for ending the war with France, and even today offer excellent models of the art of political journalism. Forced to return to his native land on the death of Queen Anne, Swift felt like a virtual exile, and it was several years before he could bring himself to relaunch his journalistic career with a series of powerful pamphlets deploring the miserable economic plight of Ireland. His most celebrated pamphlet, \triangleright A Modest Proposal (1729), ironically recommends that the people of Ireland should rear their children as food for the tables of their English landlords. The scheme has a savage logic; it is methodically costed, and the arguments are financially flawless. With its plausible phrases and deadpan tone, this satire is a brilliant indictment of a society in which economic exploitation has abnegated the natural ties of humanity and love.

While it is undoubtedly true that Swift's satires dwell on the darker side of human nature, his love of jokes, riddles and jeux d'esprit should not be forgotten. From his Bickerstaff Papers (1708–9) to his Directions to Servants (published posthumously in 1745), a spirit of mischievous and subversive anarchy runs through all his writings. In his most famous poem Verses on the Death of Dr Swift (1731), he provided his own obituary, declaring, among other things, that 'fair liberty was all his cry'. The liberty that Swift cherished was less political than intellectual and his satires offer a consistent challenge to our own reasoning powers to find a way through the maze of utopian delusions and political lies.

'The female wits'

At one point in her career, Delarivière Manley worked as Swift's assistant on The Examiner, taking over from him as editor in 1711. Manley was already notorious for salacious society scandals: The Secret History of Queen Zarah (1705), using the device of a fictional history to avoid prosecution, was an instant success, with its separately published key revealing the code names. In 1709 a further roman à clef, The New Atalantis, continued this combination of transparent allegory and sexual innuendo. The Whig ministry, worried by her revelations, issued a warrant for the arrest of printer, publisher and author, and Manley was required to name her informers. Exploiting the ambiguities of fictions-as-facts, she declared her only source was divine inspiration. Her reputation as an erotic scandalmonger contributed to the stereotype of the immoral female author. Pope's image of the Grub Street hacks and booksellers as literary whores and pimps takes on further implications in the light of Manley's own life; supplementing her income by a series of affairs, she eventually became the mistress of Alderman Barber, her publisher.

Women writers anxious to avoid such notoriety often published their works anonymously, or prefaced them with humble pleas that they were written in distress. And, though scandalous works sold well, novels which conformed to social mores were more widely acceptable as serious literary efforts. The decline of the patronge system made a clear distinction between the aristocratic lady writing as a graceful accomplishment, and the woman who went against the nature of her sex and engaged in disreputable trade.

Even writers with no literary ambitions tailored their products to the changing literary tastes. Eliza Haywood's early works were titillating confections, and Love in Excess (1719) was, with Robinson Crusoe and Gulliver's Travels, one of the three best-selling works before Samuel Richardson's > Pamela (1740–41). But by the 1740s and 1750s, Haywood took on a new tone of conventional conformity, and the 'women's novel' became increasingly associated with the values of hearth and home. It was a compromise which allowed the critic both to praise women for their delicate understanding, and to confine them to 'feminine' gentility which could be disparaged as frivolous.

Similar arguments were often advanced in condescending appraisal of some of the more chatty periodicals. Swift was in no doubt as to the main audience for > Addison's > Spectator when he remarked, 'let them fair-sex it to the world's end', and Eliza Haywood exploited this market with the launch of > The Female Spectator (1744–6). If anything, Addison seems rather to have relished than repudiated his paper's reputation as providing a genteel education of ladies. When he boasted of taking philosophy out of the schools and colleges, and into 'clubs and assemblies, tea tables and coffee-houses', he made explicit the intention to mingle morality and manners, philosophy and fashion, in an urbane and witty miscellany. And despite a tinge of polite condescension in the tone of its more lightweight contributions, The Spectator was remarkably successful in maintaining a style of well-mannered wit. There was, however, a serious side to this endeavour to promote the refined tone and rational debate of coffee-house society to a wider reading public. In the previous century, the Puritan moralist and the fashionable > Cavalier had stood on opposite sides in the > Civil War. Addison and Steele endeavoured to heal this breach, by putting a smile on the face of morality, and restraining the more licentious habits of town rakes and courtly roués. In the genial atmosphere of a fictitious Spectator club, the Whig merchant Sir Andrew Freeport and the Tory squire Sir Roger de Coverley could discuss their differences over a glass of port rather than settling them on the battlefield. One form of anti-social behaviour that Addison particularly deplored was the writing of satires, which he described as 'poisoned darts' that gave 'secret stabs to a man's reputation'. In The Spectator he promised he would never 'draw a faulty character which does not fit at least a thousand people, or publish a single paper that is not written in the spirit of benevolence, with love to mankind'.

However, it was the growing popularity of the novel rather than Addison's benevolent pieties which gradually killed off the vogue for satire in the middle years of the century. In broad terms, one might say that satire deals essentially with types, whereas the novel presents us with individuals. 18th-century satire is concerned less with the redemption of individual sinners than with the regulation of general standards of conduct. But the novel, particularly under the influence of Richardson, was more interested in questions of moral identity and the expression of individual consciousness. The distinction between the two genres is not always as clear-cut as this might imply. When in > Joseph Andrews (1742) Henry Fielding declares 'once for all, I describe not men but manners; not an individual, but a species', he writes as both satirist and novelist. In the preface to that book, he draws a distinction between comic fiction and satire, and like > Shamela (1741), the first ten chapters comprise a burlesque satire on Samuel Richardson's Pamela. It is only after this point in the novel that Fielding attempts to transform Joseph's chastity from an absurd parody of Pamela's much vaunted virtue into a mark of fidelity for his beloved Fanny. Similarly, > Jonathan Wild (1743), with its consistent ironic attacks on 'greatness', might be regarded more as an extended lampoon than as a novel. It is not until > Tom Jones (1749) that Fielding finally achieved his own distinctive form of comic fiction though that novel too contains many incidental satiric and parodic moments.

In Johnson's view there was as great a difference between the literary talents of Richardson and Fielding 'as between a man who knew how a watch was made, and a man who could tell the hour by looking on the dial plate'. Although the terms of the relative judgements have sometimes altered, the temptation to draw comparisons between the literary achievements of these two men has persisted ever since. As authors, they embody two rival traditions of the English novel, appearing as contending 'fathers' of the novel, each disputing the legitimacy of the other's offspring. From Fielding we derive the tradition of comic fiction, a style of writing that revels in its own vivacity and wit, offering its readers a rich and varied diet of social comedy, urbane irony and literary sophistication. From Richardson we derive the novel of moral introspection and psychological insight; his epistolary style offers a kind of fictional confessional dramatizing the dilemmas of individual moral choice.

The morality of Tom Jones is based on a simple antithetical contrast: natural instinct versus social hypocrisy, goodness of heart versus cunning of head. Part of the satisfaction of the book comes from the combination of the formal symmetry of its structure (> Coleridge referred to it as one of the three best plots ever written) with the apparent freedom and randomness of its > picaresque episodes. In the same way, Tom's artless and impulsive vitality is made acceptable by the artful manipulations of the narrator's tone.

Pamela, Richardson's inspired first-person narrative of a young servant girl's triumph over repeated attempts at seduction by her employer, was an immediate commercial success. 'If all the books in England were to be burnt, this book, next the Bible, ought to be preserved', enthused one reader. Nowadays its reputation is less secure. Modern readers are apt to side with Fielding in regarding its notorious subtitle, 'Virtue Rewarded', as evidence that Pamela is a model of policy rather than purity.

Richardson's next novel, > Clarissa (1747-8), is an undisputed literary masterpiece. Again using the epistolary form, Richardson interweaves four narrative voices to construct a novel of great psychological complexity. In its treatment of the contradictions between 'virtue' as reputation and virginity as an extension of moral integrity, Richardson highlights the social hypocrisies where the marriage market puts a high price on maidenhood. Anne Howe, Clarissa's friend, urges the conventional solution of marrying the seducer, but Clarissa follows the path of self-imposed martyrdom. The novel escapes any simplistic morality, reverberating beyond a reductive summary.

The distinction which Johnson drew between the novels of Fielding and those of Richardson, was reapplied by Richardson himself to the novels of ▷ Sarah Fielding, Henry Fielding's sister. Johnson and Richardson both encouraged Sarah Fielding to publish her work. Her best-known novel, The Adventures of David Simple (1744), provides a notable contrast to the male novelists' treatment of female characters. Where Pamela and Clarissa struggle with threatening seducers, Sarah Fielding's heroines wryly recognize sexual harassment as a part of the social structure.

It was the development of the > circulating libraries in the later decades of the century which provided the largest market for the mass of novelistic fiction. Many critics were alarmed by the proliferation of light romantic fiction which resulted from these cheaper sources of entertainment. 'This branch of the literary trade', one reviewer remarked, 'appears, now, to be almost entirely engrossed by women.' The naive country girl who has her head turned by these frothy fantasies became a stock figure of fictional stereotypes. From > Richard Brinsley Sheridan's Lydia Languish to > Jane Austen's Catherine Morland, the harmful effects on the uneducated ingenue were a favourite topic for literary parody. In > Charlotte Lennox's The Female Quixote (1752), the heroine, Arabella, turns from the sterner labours of her father's study to while away her hours with her mother's library, a collection of lengthy French romances which she mistakes for historical accounts. By creating an ironic distance between the heroine and the narrator, Lennox uses this familiar theme to make a social comment on women's education. > Fanny Burney's major novels also focus on the entry of the ingenue into a potentially corrupting society. > Evelina (1778) uses the epistolary narrative of a woman asking her male mentor for advice. Cecilia (1782), her most successful novel, shows an intelligent but naive girl tricked out of her inheritance by an exploitative friend's husband. In drawing attention to the dangers faced by the good-natured but ill-advised heroine Burney contributes to the social debate on the status of women, using the novel as an entertaining medium of discussion.

Sentiment and sensation

In the second half of the century two new styles of writing became suddenly fashionable and all but dominated the fiction market. The first of these was the > sentimental novel. 'What, in your opinion, is the meaning of the word sentimental, so much in vogue among the polite?' Lady Bradshaigh asked Richardson. 'I am frequently astonished to hear such a one is a sentimental man; we were a sentimental party; I have been taking a sentimental walk.' Some twenty years later the Methodist > John Wesley continued to protest against the word as a meaningless foreign neologism. 'Sentimental? What is that? It is not English; he might as well say Continental. It is not sense. It conveys no determinate idea.' Probably the most celebrated of sentimental novels was Henry Mackenzie's The Man of Feeling (1771) in which the tears of the hero, Harley, flow freely throughout the narrative. As a benevolent innocent with the most delicate > sensibility, Harley is constantly cheated, deceived and hurt by the more worldly figures he encounters; yet his sufferings carry with them a tendresse of pleasure; his humiliations discover the exquisite sensations of injured integrity. Towards the end of the novel his apparently unrequited love for Miss Watson results in his physical decline until, on his deathbed, she reveals her love for him and he dies of sheer happiness. A similar pattern of innocent suffering can be found in Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield (published 1766) which presents a parallel confrontation between naive benevolence and unscrupulous power. Goldsmith's vicar, Primrose, is a man who takes his 'consummate benevolence' to 'a romantic extreme'. With an authentically sentimental relish for the moral authority of suffering, Goldsmith dwells on the vicar's 'pleasing distress' at the repeated trials and tragedies heaped upon him by Thornhill, the malicious libertine squire.

Mackenzie's novel was an immediate best-seller. ➤ Burns wore out two copies of the work, calling it 'a book I prize next to the Bible'. Johnson was less impressed, commenting scornfully on 'the fashionable whine of sensibility'. In 1773 ➤ Mrs Barbauld offered a psychological justification for this type of fiction in her Inquiry into the kind of distress which exerts agreeable sensations, emphasizing the evocation of a sympathetic tenderness on the part of the reader. 'Tenderness,' she wrote, 'is, much more properly than sorrow, the spring of tears.'

For modern readers the best-known fictional example of the cult of sensibility is in fact a partial parody of the genre. > Laurence Sterne's > A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy (1768) exploits many features of the sentimental style, yet does so with a tone of ironic self-consciousness that constantly trembles on the brink of satire. Like Mackenzie's Man of Feeling whose face is bathed in tears while listening to another's tale of woe, Sterne's Yorick, hearing of the death of a monk to whom he had behaved uncharitably, 'bursts into a flood of tears'. But whereas Harley's tears are the sign of his refined sensibility, Yorick's tears are produced with a sudden and comic exaggeration. Yorick is a virtuoso of the nervous system, conjuring up both tears and blushes with a facility which testifies less to his goodness of heart than to his incorrigible instinct for self-dramatization. Sterne's masterpiece, > Tristram Shandy (1760-7), is another teasing work whose success transformed Sterne from an obscure Yorkshire clergyman into a leading literary celebrity, but whose eccentricities have divided critical opinion ever since. Johnson declared 'nothing odd will do long; Tristram Shandy did not last', but a formalist critic in our own century has asserted that 'Tristram Shandy is the most typical novel of world literature'.

'In a word, my work is digressive, and it is progressive too, – and at the same time', announces Tristram in the book's first volume. It is significant that he puts the word 'digressive' first. With its black and marbled pages, its flash-backs and interpolations, its asterisks, blanks and dashes, Tristram Shandy is a novel which denies any conventional notions of narrative development. The first four volumes take place while Tristram, the hero/narrator, is still in the womb, and the book ends before it begins. Yet this work, which seems to break all the rules, and which consistently demonstrates the inability of rules, plans, theories and systems to cope with the accidents and vagaries of human life, is nevertheless held together by a curious pseudo-logic of its own. This is the absurd determinism of the association of ideas, as expressed in > Locke's > Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690), which Tristram describes as 'a history-book of what passes in a man's own mind'. Each of Sterne's characters, Walter, Toby and Trim, is locked in his own private world of associations; their conversations present the collisions of words rather than the communication of thoughts; their actions are all bounded by accident.

Beside the inventiveness of Sterne, the more conventional comic skills of ▶ Tobias Smollett may seem stolid and predictable. Trained as a surgeon, Smollett published his first and some would say his best novel, > Roderick Random, in 1748, when he was still only 26. Like all Smollett's novels, this work is a robust picaresque, episodic in form, slapstick in humour and brisk in pace. Some of its best moments are autobiographical, drawing on Smollett's own experience as a ship's surgeon. His next novel, > Peregrine Pickle (1751), also has a nautical flavour, with its collection of old sea-dog characters such as Commodore Hawser Trunnion and the peglegged Lieutenant Hatchway. His final novel, > Humphry Clinker (1771), is epistolary in form though the tone owes more to Fielding than to Richardson. In it a group of assorted characters including the irascible old valetudinarian Matthew Bramble and a Methodist coachman Humphry Clinker (who turns out to be Bramble's son) make a grand tour of Britain from Bristol, Bath and London, to Edinburgh and the Highlands, presenting us with a broad panorama of 18th-century society. The idiomatic clashes of the different > letter-writing styles provide a constant > humorous tone, and the book is rich in comic misadventures, though the plot itself is highly derivative. As one recent critic has written, 'it is as though Tom Jones has given way to Baedeker.'

The other fictional form which enjoyed considerable popularity in the later decades of the century was the Gothic novel. In terms of the market place, the date at which the Richardsonian novel of moral instruction began to give way to the Gothic novel of crepuscular phantoms can be pinpointed with some accuracy. In 1777 > Clara Reeve published a novel called The Champion of Virtue, a title which clearly suggests a continuation of Richardsonian preoccupations. The following year, however, she reissued the same novel in a revised form and with a new title, The Old English Baron, A Gothic Story, evidently attempting to exploit the new trend in public tastes. However, the origins of the Gothic novel are usually traced back to Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto, a self-indulgent fantasy of fake ➤ medievalism which deliberately revels in its extravagant use of supernatural and 'marvellous' elements. One recent critic (Pat Rogers) has written: 'The Castle of Otranto is preposterous; its setting is Hollywood-medieval, a Ruritanian version of chivalric times. Its plot is frankly incredible, jumpily constructed and flatly recounted.' Yet much of the novel's overt implausibility is a calculated device to move away from the classical symmetries and rational morality of Augustan literature. Walpole was a fashionable dilettante whose spirit of whimsicality led him to create his 'little Gothic castle' at ⊳ Strawberry Hill, and also inspired this little Gothic tale. Like the young ill-fated poet ▶ Thomas Chatterton, who passed off his 'Rowley' poems as genuine medieval manuscripts, and the fraudulent > James Macpherson who claimed to be 'translating' his pastiche ▷ Celtic epic ▷ Ossian, Walpole at first maintained a pretence that The Castle of Otranto was an authentic medieval story. For all of these writers, medievalism was a kind of fancy-dress, enabling them to evade the sober responsibilities of neo-classical literary forms and indulge their imaginations in a world of supernatural fantasy. For the Gothic novel entailed a reversal or rejection of many classical values. Instead of Pope's cherished landscape of 'Nature methodiz'd' with its well-proportioned country houses and Palladian villas, the Gothic landscape consists of dark forests and ruined castles, with gloomy dungeons and secret labyrinthine passageways. In place of the daylight world of rational debate and urbane ironies, Gothic fiction presents a nightmare world of torture and fantasies, irrational fears, ancient curses and nameless threats.

Gothic fiction can be divided into two broad categories, the novel of terror and the novel of horror. Practitioners of the novel of terror, from Clara Reeve to > Ann Radcliffe, were interested in using the Gothic form as a means of exploring the psychology of fear. In her most famous novel, > The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794), Radcliffe described the effect of terror on the mind: 'A terror of this nature, as it occupies and expands the mind, and elevates it to a high expectation, is purely sublime, and leads us, by a kind of fascination, to seek even the object from which we appear to shrink.' Echoing here some of the sentiments in ▷ Burke's treatise On the Sublime and the Beautiful (1759), Radcliffe also demonstrates an affinity with > Wordsworth who, in The Prelude (1799-1805), describes how he 'grew up / Fostered alike by beauty and by fear'. In fact all of the apparently supernatural phenomena in Radcliffe's novels turn out to have perfectly rational, if somewhat contrived, explanations; the ghostly, diabolic presences that haunt her heroines are invariably products of illusionist trickery working on terrified imaginations. Unlike some other Gothic writers, Radcliffe has a perfect control of her plots, and part of the appeal of her novels lies in the ingenuity with which she supplies psychologically convincing explanations for the most apparently mysterious events. Nor is this merely a thriller-writer's gimmick. Radcliffe is interested in the gradations of intimidation and characteristically explores two related levels of fear. The abbeys, castles, dungeons and convents where her heroines find themselves are always reputedly cursed or haunted. Consequently when nocturnal apparitions occur, her heroines are thrown into the kind of superstitious dread satirized by Jane Austen in Northanger Abbey (published 1818). But typically, in the morning these imaginary terrors are replaced by a vet more insidious fear, as the heroines gradually realize that they are at the mercy not of ghosts and goblins, but of malevolent human beings. It is some indication of the popularity of Gothic fiction that Radcliffe earned f.500 for The Mysteries of Udolpho, whereas Jane Austen was paid only f 10 for her parody of the genre in Northanger Abbey.

A good example of the novel of horror is Matthew 'Monk' Lewis' The Monk (1796), which Byron described as representing 'the philtered ideas of a jaded voluptuary'. In this extravagant sadistic fantasy Lewis exploits all the charnel-house images that have since become the cliches of Hammer horror films. His heroine, Agnes, having been separated from her lover, is condemned to perpetual incarceration among rotting corpses in the vaults beneath her convent. With undisguised relish Lewis pictures bloated toads and slimy lizards crawling across her flesh and describes how, on waking, Agnes would often find 'my fingers ringed with the long worms which bred in the corrupted flesh of my infant'. The monk Ambrosio, the villain of the novel, crowns a career of vice by raping and killing Antonia, a 15-year-old girl, among these rotting bodies in the vault, having already murdered her mother Elvira. In order to escape the soldiers of the Inquisition, Ambrosio sells his soul to the Devil, who transports him to a mountain peak. There, before being hurled to his death, he is told that Elvira was in fact his mother, and Antonia his sister. Yet this conclusion is less a form of moral retribution, than a final gloating irony in this lurid sensationalist tale.

Loosely based on Arabian sources, ➤ William Beckford's Vathek (French edition 1782, English edition 1787) is another orgiastic tale of hedonism, sorcery and murder, that culminates in damnation. Although Beckford's work, like Lewis', is filled with a self-indulgent horror, this aspect of Gothic fiction also has its serious side. Throughout the Gothic literature of the late 18th and early 19th centuries, writers as diverse as Beckford, James Hogg (The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner, 1824) and Mary Shelley (Frankenstein, 1817) explored Faustian themes and Satanic images that represented the dark side of ⊳ Enlightenment thought.

Non-fictional prose

Modern critical tastes have tended to value fiction above other kinds of prose writing, but in the 18th century this was not always the case. Many of the century's most gifted prose stylists wrote not novels but ⊳ histories and ⊳ biographies, essays, travel books and letters. Apart from the fact that many novels were written in epistolary form and that several of Pope's satires were couched in the form of epistles, the familiar letter was itself a well-respected literary genre. Pope felt no more compunction about altering and polishing his personal correspondence for publication than he did about revising and changing his different versions of > The Rape of the Lock or > The Dunciad. For him, these letters were less autobiographical documents than parts of his literary oeuvre, to be edited and revised in the same way as any other work. Among the more notable letter-writers of the period were > Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Horace Walpole and the ➤ Earl of Chesterfield. Montagu's letters are witty, jaunty and civilized, with just an edge of malicious satire to give them bite. They reflect a life of rich variety; at the age of seven, Montagu was the infant favourite of the > Kit-Cat Club; during her marriage she travelled throughout Europe and Turkey, finally retiring to live in Italy. Her letters are full of perceptive comments on the customs of the countries she visits, always animated by a tone of self-deprecating irony. Thus to one correspondent she comments, 'this letter is as long and as dull as any of Richardson's!'.

Horace Walpole was a prolific and assiduous letter writer, of whom it has been said that he organized his life to suit the needs of his correspondence. Self-consciously arranging both the occasions and the recipients of each letter, Walpole constructed a correspondence which suggests a life devoted to the delivery of bon mots and an experience translated into a seamless sequence of anecdotes. The Earl of Chesterfield's letters have fared least well with later readers. Their complacent tone of worldly wisdom seems designed to recommend a life of superficial elegance at the expense of more serious or humane concerns. Yet Chesterfield's notions of civilized life derive from a tradition initiated by The Spectator and his constant stress upon politeness and the social graces offers a useful insight into a significant strand of 18th-century thought.

Among biographers, \triangleright James Boswell still holds pride of place. Although later scholars have revealed his \triangleright Life of Samuel Johnson (1791) to be full of distortions and omissions, its quality of animation, dramatizing Johnson's oracular wit and sober sentiments in a lively series of encounters and anecdotes, captures much of his relish for conversation, for disputation and for life. Boswell's own journals, though full of the vanity of self-display, stand alongside \triangleright Samuel Pepys' Diary and Swift's Journal to Stella as fascinating portraits of the day-to-day excitement of social life; all of these works weave together intimate private dramas with vivid representations of social and public issues.

Perhaps least often read now are the great works of Augustan scholarship:

> Edward Gibbon's > The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776-88), the philosophical writings of Locke and > Hume, Burke and > Adam Smith. All of these in their different ways share certain humanist assumptions that are common to the literature of the period. Although each pursued a separate discipline of study, these authors thought of their works not as specialist treatises for students, but as philosophical essays designed for the educated general reader. While never amateurish or condescending, they are works which, in both style and tone, assume the centrality of their concerns to be human culture as a whole. As such they are expressions of that Enlightenment spirit which sought to promote the pursuit of knowledge not in the sheltered confines of universities and colleges, but in the coffee-houses, clubs and country houses of a civilized society. Johnson gave memorable expression to such sentiments. At the conclusion of the preface to his Dictionary of the English Language he writes: 'It may gratify curiosity to inform it that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academic bowers, but amidst inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow.' The name of Johnson has recurred several times throughout this essay, and that is hardly surprising. No one better exemplifies the achievements and anxieties, the triumphs and tribulations of the professional writer of his day. Johnson turned the life of writing into a kind of moral struggle against bigotry and ignorance, against poverty, prejudice and pretensions. Some of his more celebrated utterances may appear dogmatic or prescriptive, but this is a false impression resulting in part from Boswell's creation of him as a man of maxims. In fact, the most enduring characteristic of Johnson's writing is its tolerance in the patient exploration of the complexities and fallibilities of human nature. In his > Lives of the Poets (1779-81) he combines balanced judgements with personal pronouncements, in assessing the writers of his own and the previous age. In Rasselas (1759) and in the > Vanity of Human Wishes (1749), he explores that 'hunger of the imagination' which both fuels the creative impulse, and leads to the inevitable insufficiency of human desires. In his Preface to Shakespeare (1765) (> Shakespeare criticism) he articulates literary axioms which lie at the heart of Augustan > humanism (and which, incidentally, help to explain his disparagement of Tristram Shandy): 'nothing can please many and please long, but just representations of general nature.'

Having begun this essay with Johnson's defence of writing for personal gain, it seems appropriate to end it with his definition of literature's public responsibilities. 'The only end of writing,' he declared, 'is to enable the readers better to enjoy life, or better to endure it.'

Introduction

The period begins with the re-opening of the theatres in 1660, after an interval of eighteen years, and in very different circumstances from before. Recent criticism has suggested that the Commonwealth Proclamation in the crisis year 1642, ordering the playhouses to be shut down, was not due merely to any > Puritan objections to the theatre as such, but because numerous plays in the preceding years had been openly critical of parliamentary as well as royal policies. Thus closing them was partly what we would now call an act of political repression. The intervening period saw some productions, mostly clandestine – although from time to time the companies attempted open performances, sometimes with severe repercussions.

In the 1650s > Sir William D'Avenant found a legal loophole which permitted the staging of musical performances, and he mounted, openly and successfully, four operas (> opera in England), including > The Siege of Rhodes (1656) and The Cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru (1658). These were effectively the first entertainments of their kind in England, although they drew on earlier > masques for some techniques. Despite the dearth of public performances, the taste for plays survived throughout the > Interregnum, which saw the publication of large numbers of plays, including dozens of new ones. Some of the readers of these were readily assimilated into the new audiences of the 1660s, and from then on playreading as well as theatre going became an increasingly popular pastime.

The period 1660-1800 is marked by innovation from its outset. The advent of women, both as actresses and as dramatists, had a profound impact on the staging of plays and the responses to them. The shape and layout of the theatres changed, together with the style of acting, and the nature of the audiences. New themes came into prominence in the plays, partly as a reaction to new social and political conditions and partly in response to the technical changes just mentioned. Within the period also, there were discernible shifts of topic, theme and style of acting. Nevertheless, the theatres continued to operate under varying degrees of > censorship. This encouraged the staging of plays expressing attitudes of loyalty to the reigning monarch and prevailing ethics, and meant that some plays considered politically or socially dangerous were suppressed. Censorship was applied most rigorously during periods of political tension, such as the Popish Plot (> Titus Oates) resulting in largescale persecutions of > Catholics and the > Exclusion crises of the 1680s when unsuccessful attempts were made in Parliament to exclude the Duke of York (later > James II) from the succession, and again in the 1730s, when satirical attacks on the Government contributed to the passing of the Licensing Act of 1737 (> theatres).

In the past, histories of the theatre and drama have tended to focus on so-called 'canonical' texts: those identified by generations of commentators as representing the best in their periods. In the 20th century the reinforcement of this pattern became known as the 'Leavisite' tradition, after the literary critic F. R. Leavis, who isolated certain 'great books' which he considered central to civilization. The implication has been that these and only these are worthy of serious study. But the approach has been challenged repeatedly. The Reverend Montague Summers issued new editions of plays by 'lesser' > Restoration dramatists, including > Aphra Behn and > Thomas Shadwell, in the first decades of this century, and Leslie Hotson's The Commonwealth and Restoration Stage (1928) broke new ground in research on the theatre of the > 17th century. More recently, writers including Robert D. Hume, Judith Milhous, Margot Heinemann, Martin Butler, Fidelis Morgan, Dale Spender and Janet Todd have contributed to a re-evaluation of many 'forgotten' dramatists and works, including many by women.

The theatres

Description > Charles II loved the theatre, and was from the beginning of his reign an enthusiastic patron of it, but when he officially re-opened the theatres, he sought to ensure political loyalty from that quarter by confirming existing monopolies to two trusted courtiers: Sir William d'Avenant and Desir Thomas Killigrew, as well as by re-establishing a system of censorship. The pattern of monopolies lasted, with interruptions, for most of the 18th century.

On confirmation of their patents, D'Avenant and Killigrew formed two companies, the > Duke's and > King's companies, respectively, and set about finding venues for their performances. For a brief period they used existing theatres which were reopened for the purpose, including a few dating back to Elizabethan (> Elizabeth I) times. In March 1660 D'Avenant began converting Lisle's Tennis Court at > Lincoln's Inn Fields. This introduced the proscenium, or framed stage, to the English theatre for the first time. But although he had extended the property, it was felt that it was still too small, and needed a substitute. D'Avenant died in 1668, and it fell to his widow, > Lady Mary D'Avenant, who had inherited the patent, to carry out the work. The new theatre, designed by > Christopher Wren, stood on the river front in Dorset Garden (> Dorset Garden Theatre), where it had access both by road and from the water by boat. The Duke's company moved here in 1671, still under Lady Mary's control, until she transferred it to her son Charles in 1673.

Killigrew meanwhile had moved his company to an old riding school in Bridges Street, Drury Lane, which he converted to a theatre – the first Theatre Royal (> Drury Lane Theatres). This opened in May 1663, and survived until 1672, when it was destroyed by fire. He then commissioned a new theatre, possibly also by Wren, on a site close by.

The acting area on the > Restoration stage included a deep forestage or apron stage, which projected beyond the proscenium into the pit, past the side boxes. Proscenium doors admitted the actors directly onto the forestage. Here the prologue and much of the dialogue were spoken, clearly audible, and the speakers clearly visible, to the surrounding audience, some of whom might even be seated on the stage itself. The proscenium arch contained a curtain or painted cloth that could be lowered or raised to reveal the interior stage, which had receding rows of painted flats and shutters in grooves on either side. These in turn could be closed or opened, adding further depths to the set or action. Numerous Restoration plays contain 'discovery scenes', indicating that the shutters are opened to reveal behind them other settings or actors, who might then perhaps move forward to join in action nearer the audience. The result was considerable versatility, including the option to change settings in full view of the audience, and with them mood and pace during scenes. Balconies above the stage were also used for some of the action. However there was no naturalistic illusion of landscapes or interiors in the modern sense, but rather a decking of the stage with images and objects to suggest various locations.

A characteristic feature of Restoration drama was its use of elaborate effects - such as cupids or other figures floating on 'clouds' above the stage – aided by mechanical devices. Lighting, for performances were staged mainly in the afternoon, was largely daylight, admitted through the windows, as well as candelabra hung from the centre of the proscenium, and footlights or 'floats' – literally candles, or wicks threaded through corks, floating on troughs of water or oil at the front. Rows of candles and oil lamps, placed in brackets and coloured by strips of stained glass or tinted silk, as well as hand-held candles, lanterns and torches, added light to acting areas further back. Snuffers stood by because of the constant threat of fire.

In addition to the patent theatres were Court theatres, including the Cockpit at Whitehall, and the Hall Theatre, built in 1665. Two > Inns of Court – the Inner Temple and the Middle Temple – put on plays, sometimes involving Duke's and King's Theatre actors, as part of their festivities. Musical performances took place in private homes and at Court. Several > 'nurseries', training grounds for younger performers, also existed briefly, and mounted their own productions. Killigrew set up one of them in 1667, at Hatton Garden; another was established by Lady D'Avenant after her husband's death, in the Barbican; she was involved in the running of a third at Bun Hill in Finsbury Fields, but this lasted only nine weeks. The nurseries were the butt of opposition from several quarters, but actors sometimes succeeded in 'graduating' from them into the patent companies. Finally, strolling players performed at fairs and other venues from time to time.

Playhouses also proliferated throughout the provinces, as well as in Scotland and Ireland. Today there are only three playhouses surviving from the 18th century (the earliest still remaining): the Theatres Royal in Richmond (Yorkshire), Bristol and Margate. Another Georgian theatre, the Theatre Royal at Bury St Edmunds (opened 1819), has the distinction of preserving its original proscenium to this day.

The most important theatres in this context were the two patent houses, and these carried on a fierce rivalry. From the first the Dorset Garden specialized in staging very elaborate performances, including many operas, while the Theatre Royal concentrated on plays. In 1682 matters came to a head with the failure of the King's Company, which was effectively absorbed into the Duke's to form the ▷ United Company. The United Company continued performances of spectacles at Dorset Garden and plays at Drury Lane.

Corruption and mismanagement led three of the principal actors, headed by ➤ Thomas Betterton, to secede in 1695, returning to Lincoln's Inn Fields, which they named the 'New Theatre'. In 1705 Betterton left for Her Majesty's Theatre, also known as the Queen's Theatre, Haymarket, or simply, the ➤ Haymarket, a newly opened playhouse designed by the dramatist and architect ➤ John Vanbrugh. The company was managed in turn by Vanbrugh and ➤ William Congreve. But the theatre suffered financial problems; it proved too large for spoken drama, and in due course became the first English opera house, staging many of ➤ Handel's operas. It was burnt down in 1789, and in 1791 a new theatre was built, known first as the King's and later the Queen's.

Theatre construction and alteration continued over the next two decades. In 1714, Lincoln's Inn Fields was refurbished in grand style by the architect and designer Edward Shepherd (1670–1747), with mirrors lining the interior walls, and then run by the actor-manager > John Rich - son of the late > Christopher Rich whose dishonesty and incompetence had contributed to the secession of the actors mentioned above. The theatre became known by different names: sometimes the New Theatre and sometimes the Little Theatre.

In 1720 a new theatre was erected by > John Potter in the Haymarket, almost opposite the Opera House. Confusingly, this was also known variously as the New Theatre, or Little Theatre in the Hay; or even as the French Theatre in the Haymarket. Scenery was still painted onto flats, and lighting was by overhead chandeliers with wax or tallow candles. As in the Restoration period, the curtain rose and fell only at the beginning and end of the play. The Licensing Act forced it to close down and it stood empty for ten years, whereupon it was taken over by the actor and dramatist ⊳ Samuel Foote. In 1766 it became a 'Theatre Royal'; it stood until 1820 when the present Theatre Royal, Haymarket, was erected nearby.

In 1732 Shepherd planned the first ➤ Covent Garden Theatre, or Theatre Royal, on the site of the present Royal Opera House, to which John Rich transferred. A contemporary print shows a proscenium with two doors surmounted by balconies, and behind it an inner frame. Another device apparently surviving from the Restoration period is the 'transparent scene': a translucent surface which could be lit from behind to produce special effects. On Rich's death in 1761, the theatre was taken over by his son-in-law, John Beard (?1716–91), who passed the patent to the dramatist ➤ George Colman the Elder, and three partners, in 1767. The theatre was substantially altered in 1784 and rebuilt in 1792, mainly to allow it to hold many more spectators. It was destroyed in a great fire in 1808. A new theatre was built on the same site the following year.

The 1730s saw increasing tensions between the government and the stage. Some in high places were concerned about the rapid and apparently unchecked rise in the number of playhouses, and disputes about who should exercise control were fuelled by a number of satirical performances openly criticizing the government. Notable among these were several by ▷ Henry Fielding, who eventually sided with ▷ Sir Robert Walpole's opposition. In 1737 Walpole, precariously clinging to dwindling power, succeeded in bringing in a Licensing Act which re-established a monopoly of theatrical entertainment. This was assigned to two playhouses: Covent Garden and Drury Lane, the latter managed by ▷ David Garrick from 1747. Not surprisingly, the Act was not entirely successful in limiting theatrical activity. For example, the actor-manager James Lacy (1696–1774) defied the law at intervals after its enactment. And the ▷ Goodman's Fields Theatre in Ayliffe Street, despite being ordered like the Haymarket to close in 1737, resumed performances using subterfuges to evade the law until 1742. Here it was that Garrick made his first appearance before London audiences.

Garrick's impact on the theatre was immense not only on methods of acting, but also on the physical conditions of performance. One innovation during his tenure as manager at Drury Lane was precipitated by a number of incidents in which audience rowdiness erupted literally onto the stage, seriously interfering with the performance. In 1763 Garrick announced an increase in the capacity of the auditorium, while prohibiting seating from the area around the stage whose presence had been allowed since the Restoration. The manager of Covent Garden, John Beard, quickly followed suit.

Further, in 1765 Garrick introduced stage lighting concealed from the audience, an effect used in ▷ Richard Brinsley Sheridan's ▷ The School for Scandal. He also used naturalistic cut-out scenery designed by ▷ De Loutherbourg, an Alsatian who had already made his name in Paris. In the later years of the century, the ▷ Gothic revival seen in other areas of literature and culture of the period was also reflected on stage in scenes displaying dark and rugged mountains, misty and mysterious lakes, or gloomy ruined castles in the Gothic style. Some of Garrick's changes were ultimately to contribute to an effect of added unreality, as well as a loss of contact between actors and audience.

The efforts to enlarge Drury Lane continued during and after Garrick's tenure. The theatre was extensively altered and expanded by the Adam brothers (> Robert Adam) in 1775. In the following year, upon Garrick's retirement, it was taken over by Sheridan, who rebuilt and extended it yet again in 1794, and remained in charge until its destruction by fire in 1809. The removal of spectators from the stage effectively widened the gulf between actors and audience. The last decades of the century saw an increase in the use of the curtain to separate scenes from one another, and doors were added to the side scenes for entrances and exits, ostensibly to aid naturalism. In due course they came to replace the proscenium doors altogether, and eventually the box set, and the limiting of acting to the area behind the proscenium completed the rift between actors and audience. Plays were performed in increasingly large theatres, entirely behind the proscenium frame, and the intimacy and immediacy of drama in earlier eras was lost.

The performers, their companies and their audiences

The period is highlighted by some of the great names of theatre tradition, including some individuals of extraordinary versatility, Thomas Betterton, > Charles Macklin, Samuel Foote, David Garrick and > John Philip Kemble, for example, not only acted in but also wrote plays (although some were merely adaptations of older plays), as well as managing their companies. > Richard Steele, in addition to contributing to and editing or co-editing at various times > The Tatler, > The Spectator, The Guardian, The Theatre (the first English theatrical journal) and other publications, was a theatre manager and also wrote several influential plays. > Colley Cibber was a manager as well as actor and dramatist, and in his memoirs made a serious contribution to theatre history. Sir John Vanbrugh designed theatres in addition to writing successful plays. Henry Fielding managed the Haymarket during the 1730s until its closure in 1737, after which he became a celebrated novelist; another dramatist, > George Colman the Elder, managed Covent Garden when the plays of > Oliver Goldsmith were first produced there, and took over the Haymarket later. Sheridan, as we have seen, became a manager as well as a dramatist of lasting reputation; > Susannah Centlivre started as an actress, before becoming one of the most successful dramatists of her generation. The actress > Kitty Clive also wrote several plays, including some that were quite successful, and > Charlotte Charke not only acted in dozens of roles, but wrote plays and managed companies as well. However, women dramatists, like other women writers, were subject to attack by men, as in the satire, The Female Wits (1696), and Three Hours After Marriage (1717) by > Pope, > Gay and > Arbuthnot, which mocks the Countess of Winchilsea (> Anne Finch) through the character of Phoebe Clinket. One character says of her that 'the poor girl has a procidence [prolapse] of the pineal gland, which has occasioned a rupture in her understanding . . . instead of puddings, she makes pastorals, or when she should be raising paste [pastry], is raising some ghost in a new tragedy'.

Other important figures on the Restoration stage include > Michael Mohun, > Edward Kynaston and > Charles Hart, all of whom had begun their careers as boy actors playing largely female roles, as well as > William Smith, William Mountfort (1664-92), > Elizabeth Barry, > Anne Bracegirdle, for whom several of Congreve's parts were written, and of course Ellen or > Nell Gwyn. She retired from the stage after she became Charles II's mistress, but remained its ardent patron and admirer. ▷ Susanna Cibber, ▷ Anne Oldfield, ▷ James Quin, ▷ Spranger Barry, ▷ Peg Woffington and ▷ Sarah Siddons are among major actors and actresses in the 18th century. Each era also had its noted comedians, including ▷ James Nokes and Thomas Jevon (or Jevorn, d1688) during the early Restoration period, and ▷ John Lacy, Thomas Doggett (1670–1721) and ▷ William Penkethman (or Pinkethman) later on.

The most important innovation at the beginning of the period is the introduction of actresses to the stage. Before the Restoration, women had acted occasionally: the casts of court masques included some female members of royalty, and a woman had acted in D'Avenant's > The Siege of Rhodes in 1656. But the general rule in England had been for men and boys to act the women's parts. However, on the Continent, actresses had already become commonplace, and Charles II during his years of exile had become accustomed to seeing them. In August 1660 he ordered D'Avenant and Killigrew to place women in all female roles, and his subsequent patent suggested that it was indeed improper to do otherwise.

From a modern standpoint, the insistence on having women play women's parts may be considered as a feminist act. However, there is ample evidence that many male contemporaries saw it chiefly as adding a prurient element to their enjoyment of the theatre, Charles' ostensible views notwithstanding. The diarist > John Evelyn (1620-1706) complained bitterly that 'Foul and undecent women now (and never till now) were permitted to appear and act ... inflaming several young noblemen and gallants . . .' More than 40 years later, > Sir Richard Steele, in quite a different frame of mind, remarked that a woman's presence was a great help to a dull production, so that 'When a poet flags in writing lusciously, a pretty girl can move lasciviously, and have the same good consequences for the author'. The dramatic motif of woman disguised as man, in order to further some - usually romantic - end, had in > Shakespeare's time relieved the burden on young actors struggling with womanish movements and vocal patterns. After the Restoration it became a means whereby actresses could put on breeches, and show off shapely ankles and calves. > Pepys commented that a woman acting in a man's role 'had the best legs that ever I saw, and I was very well pleased with it'. Many stage directions and lines in the plays, as well as the revealing dresses of the period, also contributed to an emphasis on the women's sexuality. On the other hand, wearing breeches made it possible, at least by the early 18th century, for a woman to experience briefly and without censure, freedom from cumbersome skirts in the manner of a man. Bernard de Mandeville, in The Fable of the Bees (1714), wrote that when a woman wore breeches 'Upon the Stage it is done without Reproach, and the most Vertuous Ladies will dispense with it in an Actress, tho' everybody has a full view of her Legs and Thighs; but if the same Woman, as soon as she has Petticoats on again, should show her Leg to a Man as high as her Knee, it would be a very immodest Action, and every Body will call her impudent for it'.

The position of the actress was ambiguous. That many actresses were kept by wealthy lovers, or performed individual sexual favours in return for gain, is undeniable. The acting profession was then, as later, a precarious one, and the temptation to reinforce their incomes in this way must have proved irresistible to many actresses. However, some dramatic historians, such as John Harold Wilson, have exaggerated the extent to which their function was synonymous with that of courtesan or even prostitute. Many actresses, including those known to be 'unchaste', also gained lasting reputations as artists; > Elizabeth Barry, for example, was said to be ruthlessly promiscuous, and was frequently condemned on this account. Yet she was much admired as both a comic and tragic actress, and as a tragedienne is reported to have performed with great dignity and pathos. It is important to note that male actors also occupied a paradoxical position during much of the period. They were considered to be relatively low down on the social scale (an Act of > James I had made them technically vagabonds). Pepys, visiting the actors at one theatre backstage, remarked that 'the clothes are very poore, and the actors but common fellows'. On the other hand, actors frequently enjoyed close associations with courtiers (including several dramatists), and, in many cases, the respect of other critical theatre-goers as well. Gradually during the 18th century the status of actors and actresses rose, boosted by Garrick's success and enjoyment of public esteem, as well as the growing popularity of the theatre and interest in the performers generally. But it is clear that for a long time there were conflicts in the attitudes towards all performers, and towards actresses particularly.

The actress > Katherine Corey claimed to be the first woman in her profession: she played the part of Desdemona in a production of > Othello in December 1660. Occasionally, as with Thomas Killigrew's The Parson's Wedding in 1664 and again for a time during the early 18th century, plays were performed by casts made up entirely of women. Some individual women became celebrated for playing particular male roles, notably Peg Woffington as Sir Harry Wildair in > Farquhar's > The Constant Couple (1699) and, less famously, Susanna Cibber as Macheath in Gay's > The Beggar's Opera. Colley Cibber's talented, versatile and quirky daughter Charlotte Charke, given from childhood to dressing in male attire, became as famous in her performances of men's roles as of women's. She acted the two in rapid succession, sometimes playing a man's part on one night and a woman's on the next, and occasionally, a man's and a woman's in different performances of the same play: for example she was both > Macheath and Polly Peachum in The Beggar's Opera. During a month and half of a single season in 1734 she acted about a dozen men's roles, including Macheath in Roman dress, George Barnwell in > Lillo's > The London Merchant, Townly in Vanbrugh's and Cibber's The Provok'd Husband, and gay Lothario in > Nicholas Rowe's The Fair Penitent. And once she played Sir Fopling Flutter, the part made famous by her father in > Sir George Etherege's > The Man of Mode.

Early in the 18th century the ratio of men to women in the acting profession was almost two to one. One company listed 20 men and 11 women in the first decade. At Lincoln's Inn Fields account books for the years 1724–25 bear the names 28 men and 16 women. Gradually the proportion of women rose, together with the total number of performers employed in the profession, as the number of theatres multiplied. The average for the years 1729 to 1747 was 74, and in a single season, 1729–30, over 250 named performers are listed in the bills.

As for the management structure, during the first years after the Restoration the acting profession was dominated, as already noted, by the two patent companies, which merged into the United Company in 1682. Each company had a core group of performers which shared what was left of the profits after running costs had been paid from general receipts. This group was headed by the largest shareholder, in effect the manager, and augmented by salaried 'hirelings' who might eventually become shareholders, as well as musicians, scene keepers and other non-acting personnel. In the 1690s control of the United Company passed to the unscrupulous Christopher Rich, a profiteer with little or no interest in performers or acting standards, precipitating the secession of Betterton, Barry and Bracegirdle already mentioned, to form another sharing company in 1695.

The double system of management, actor-manager on the one hand and proprietor-manager on the other, persisted into the 18th century: Rich in charge of Drury Lane, and Betterton of Lincoln's Inn Fields. After 1705 when Vanbrugh opened the Queen's Theatre in the Haymarket, companies and varieties of organization proliferated until the Licensing Act of 1737 restored the system of two patents. Meanwhile from 1705 opera, developing as an increasingly separate form of entertainment, had its own management structure.

The dominant figure on the stage during the Restoration and early 18th-century years was undoubtedly Thomas Betterton, both because of his reputation, and his ability. He was equally acclaimed in tragedies and comedies and played mostly leading roles with the Duke's Company, the United Company, and finally his own at Lincoln's Inn Fields. A contemporary portrait shows him as a stout man, quite unlike today's ideal of a romantic actor, but dignified and imposing in a silk robe wrapped and folded round his large body, a cravat loosely tied and the locks of a shiny wig flowing down his back. He excelled in Shakespearean parts, including Hamlet, Macbeth, Lear, Othello, Mercutio (Romeo and Juliet) and Sir Toby Belch (Twelfth Night), but also in contemporary ones such as Heartwell in Congreve's \triangleright The Old Bachelor. He married Mary Sanderson (or Saunderson), one of the first English actresses and the first to play a succession of Shakespeare's great female characters, including Lady Macbeth, Ophelia and Juliet. They often appeared opposite one another on the stage, setting a precedent to be followed by other couples, from the Mountforts, Cibbers and Bullocks onwards into the 20th century. Other family members also became involved, and the 18th century saw many great acting families and dynasties, including the Bullocks, Mills, Thurmonds, Penkethmans, Kembles and Booths. Early on children also began to feature prominently in stage productions: a Miss Willis, aged five, danced at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1704, and a ten-year-old girl played Cupid in a masque at Drury Lane later in the same year. In the third quarter of the century it became fashionable to have plays entirely acted by children. Acting became, and remained into the 20th century, a family business.

Acting styles during the Restoration era can be deduced from contemporary portraits, some written accounts, and largely from the manner of the plays themselves. For comedies it appears to have been more or less an extension of the comportment of gentlemen and women in society, that is, formal and deliberate, involving a large number of elaborate gestures and facial expressions in a curious mixture of flamboyance and decorum. The close links between the theatre and the court must have been reflected on stage, with actors and actresses modelling their performances in many plays on those of well-bred courtiers. The extremes of this style are frequently mocked, as in the characters of Monsieur de Paris, in William Wycherley's > The Gentleman Dancing Master (1672), and Lord Foppington in Vanbrugh's > The Relapse (1697). For tragedies the style remained solemn and declamatory, or 'theatrical . . . stiff and affected', according to a contemporary, possibly even involving chanting, until Macklin pioneered and Garrick perfected a more 'natural' approach. Betterton's method has been described as 'dignified, graceful, vet somewhat heavy and florid . . . interpreting admirably those interminable heroic generals who abound in that period of Restoration melodrama'.

Commentators on the period, such as John Harrington Smith, J. H. Wilson, Peter Holland and J. L. Styan, stress the intimate relationship between actors on stage and the audience, as shown in the many asides and direct addresses to the audience in the plays, delivered from the projecting apron. During the 18th century acting methods underwent a considerable alteration. In the first decades of the century > Quin, and others in his generation, continued in the style of Betterton and his contemporaries, but Macklin and then Garrick reacted to Quin's heavy formality, introducing what seemed to theatre goers to be greater naturalism and simplicity, accompanied by a subtle expression of voice, face and gesture. Quin was eventually forced to retire from what had been an outstanding career, including the roles of Othello, Lear and Falstaff. But alongside this change came an increasing emphasis on performing skills other than acting: dancing, singing, juggling and acrobatics.

The tendency toward greater naturalism, fuelled by the rise of ▷ Romanticism, encompassed a reappraisal of some traditional roles, particularly those of Shakespeare. The part of Shylock in ▷ The Merchant of Venice had long been played in a low, buffoonish style. In 1741 Macklin, later to become Garrick's great rival, appeared as a tragic and dignified, though still villainous, Shylock: 'the Jew that Shakespeare drew', in ▷ Alexander Pope's words. The impact was instant; the audience applauded so much that he had to pause after each speech to allow for the interruptions, and he became famous overnight. Changes in the depiction of Hamlet happened more gradually. From Shakespeare's time he had been portrayed as an heroic 'man of action'. But in the second or third quarter of the 18th century, actors including Richard Brinsley Sheridan's father Thomas and David Ross (1728–90) are believed to have begun the trend toward playing him as the irresolute, thoughtful, melancholy personality familiar to audiences in the 20th century.

Towards the end of the 18th century came another change, moving toward the florid acting styles of the 19th century, accompanied by a tendency to rant and shout. The enlargement of the theatres and shrinking of the apron now demanded that actors and actresses raise their voices and expand their gestures if they were to be heard and seen from the top gallery. The celebrated tragic actress > Sarah Siddons refused to comply, causing some criticism that she was no longer always audible. But the practice was consistent with her concept of dramatic integrity; she disdained to 'play to the gallery'. She was enormously respected as well as admired for her dignity and grace, the deep beauty of her voice, her consistent professionalism and her capacity to move audiences.

Along with changes in acting methods, came changes in the approach to dress. In 1759 > John Wilkes had pleaded for a return to the Roman tradition whereby actors always dressed 'according to the fashion of the country where their scene was laid'. In 1773 Macklin dressed his > Macbeth in tartan costumes, and played the title role with a Scottish accent. Garrick responded with a > King Lear in old English clothing. A famous portrait shows Peg Woffington in quasi-Elizabethan costume as Mistress Ford in > The Merry Wives of Windsor. And Siddons attempted to marry authenticity with dramatic propriety, wearing costumes not only true to their historical context but also to the genre employed: thus tragedy demanded heavy garments and simple, natural hairstyles and headgear, in contrast to some of the elaborate creations of her predecessors.

Yet at the same time as Garrick and others were attempting to instil verisimilitude into the trappings and substance of their performances of Shakespeare, they were busy rewriting many of the plays, including some scenes which had escaped onslaught from Restoration revisers. A famous example is Garrick's alteration of ▷ Hamlet in 1772, omitting 'scenes of low humour' (including the Grave Diggers' scene), 'improving' the character of Laertes, and altering the circumstances of the Queen's death. King Lear, given a happy ending by ▷ Nahum Tate in 1681, had been changed again by ▷ George Colman the Elder, although he retained much of Tate's action, including the happy ending, as did Garrick in his version. Audiences in the 18th century, like their predecessors in the 17th, could not bear to see such injustice as was done to Cordelia. ▷ Samuel Johnson wrote that Shakespeare's ending was intolerable. The philosopher ▷ David Hume said that 'An action, represented in tragedy, may be too bloody and atrocious . . The mere suffering of plaintive virtue, under the triumphant tyranny and oppression of vice, forms a disagreeable spectacle, and is carefully avoided by all masters of the drama.' Most plays were rewritten in one form or another, and several were used as sources for short pieces focusing on just a few characters, in the manner of the time. Garrick's Florizel and Perdita (1756) is derived from ▷ The Winter's Tale, for example; his The Fairies (1755) from ▷ A Midsummer Night's Dream; and Catherine and Petruchio (1756) from ▷ The Taming of the Shrew.

Throughout the period acting was a strenuous and demanding profession, not least because of the size of a company's repertory, with programmes sometimes changing from day to day. During the season of 1721-2 John Mills (d1736) probably performed in 60 of the 70 plays put on at Drury Lane, including major roles in Marlowe, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Vanbrugh, Congreve and Farquhar. > Robert Wilks acted at least 170 times, and Barton Booth in at least 35 roles, in addition to sharing in the company's management. Mary Porter (d1765) acted in 28 and Anne Oldfield in 26 roles in one season. Rehearsals in such circumstances were almost continuous, and inevitably scanty for any particular play. Furthermore, actors often had to double up, performing several roles in a single play and less frequently, during the 18th century, in plays in different theatres on a single night. Kitty Clive, for example, acted in Colley Cibber's The Lady's Last Stake at Drury Lane and > Henry Fielding's The Virgin Unmask'd at the New Theatre on the Bowling Green on the same evening in January 1747. These factors meant that the actors had to remember huge numbers of lines, which could sometimes lead to complaints about distortions of the text and inappropriate ad-libbing. But some actors took pride in their retentive abilities: Garrick had up to 96 varied roles in his personal repertory and > William Smith boasted that he could perform in any of 52 at a moment's notice.

Training facilities existed throughout the period. The Restoration nurseries have already been mentioned. In addition, senior actors and managers undertook to train the more junior recruits. In 1744 Macklin founded his own school to train actors according to his style of disciplined naturalism. Some performers in the period underwent long apprenticeships, but this did not guarantee that their careers would endure. Charlotte Charke is a prime example of an actress and dramatist who began with the best connections and hopes for her future, but ended up acting mostly in provincial theatres, or managing puppet shows, and living in terrible poverty. Income from acting was often uncertain as it depended largely on receipts. Salaried performers could not always be certain of being paid at all, and indeed payment was not made on days when there were no performances.

However, from the Restoration era onwards, leading performers could earn well: in 1694, Betterton received five pounds a week, plus a present of 50 guineas a year, and Barry received 50 shillings a week. In addition such actors, and later also some other theatre staff, were able to augment their incomes with the proceeds of 'benefits' staged on their behalf. (The profits from the third night of every production – if it survived that long – automatically belonged to the author.) The so-called 'Theatrical Fund', was established in 1765 as a form of insurance whereby a performer could claim from 30 to 65 pounds a year from retirement, or to provide a stipend for an actor's widow and surviving children on his death.

As to the audience, for many years after the Restoration it was far less heterogeneous than it had been in Shakespeare's time, containing a large number of upper-class men and women. Relatively high admission prices, ranging from one to four shillings, kept the poorest members of society away (in 1684 the average labourer's wage was only eight pence a day). But earlier views of the audience as almost exclusively aristocratic, by commentators such as Allardyce Nicoll, ⊳ John Wain and A. S. Bear, have now been discounted: at present it is thought that it included a cross-section of middle- and upper-class society, including some merchants and 'citizens'. During the Restoration period, these were frequently ridiculed and actually insulted in the plays, and theories vary as to how much they joined in laughing at themselves, refused to identify with the absurd characters on stage and laughed at 'other' citizens shown as bigoted and stupid, suffered in silence, fought back or simply staved away from plays known or presumed to be particularly offensive. A softening in dramatists' attitudes towards these classes beginning late in the 17th century, as well as the campaign to 'clean up' the stage, may represent an increasingly successful rearguard action of such individuals and/or changing social conditions. The economic strengthening and social 'legitimizing' of the bourgeois classes during the 18th century encouraged them to exercise their influence on the stage as on other cultural and social ventures. The expansion of the theatres, with the audiences gradually becoming more heterogeneous, coincided with a change in the manner of depicting the middle classes. Merchants and their families ceased to be mere objects of ridicule and were humanized into heroes and heroines, to be admired, criticized, pitied, laughed at or laughed with, according to the text.

Life in the theatre was marked by outbursts of violence during much of the period, to an extent that would seem incredible today. In 1669 Edward Kynaston was beaten up by ruffians hired by a rival, and in 1692 William Mountfort was murdered by Lord Mohun and his agents. Elizabeth Barry and > Elizabeth Bowtell, required to struggle in their roles of Roxana and Statira during a revival of > Nathaniel Lee's The Rival Queens (1677), came literally to blows, and the stabbing prescribed by the text became a real assault, with the dagger penetrating flesh. In 1735 Macklin killed a fellow-actor, Thomas Hallam, during a brawl in a green-room – the scene of frequent altercations among members of the acting profession.

Audiences were also often the source of strife. The disturbances caused by Restoration audiences are well known, but riots often took place in and outside theatres during the 18th century. These could cause substantial damage to theatres, and force closures and cancellations of runs by indigenous or visiting performers. In 1744 raised ticket prices at Drury Lane precipitated a riot there. Violent scenes occurred again in 1749, 1755, 1759, 1763, and 1789 over ticket prices and other matters. Competition to gain entry to particularly popular performances often degenerated into bloody fights, and political, religious and personal factions among the spectators also caused many outbursts, including clashes between supporters of rival performers. The riots of 1755, during performances of a ballet called The Chinese Festival, spread over several days. They ended with the theatre being torn apart and forced to close. The cause was 'patriotic' hostility to the French performers during a period of high tension with France, which erupted despite Garrick's efforts to pass many of the dancers off as Swiss. In the last years of the century, sentiments ran high over events associated with the > French Revolution; > Thomas Holcroft had to bring out some of his works anonymously, for fear of reaction because of his known links with > William Blake and > Tom Paine.

Apart from the complaints about violence, dramatists were frequently frustrated by their audiences' apparent indifference to their efforts. Some authors ensured applause by packing the audience with friends and even hired 'clapper-men', who would react with suitable enthusiasm to the play. But many plays and players attracted major followings, and some theatre goers were willing to pay large sums to attend particular performances of their choice. The actress > George Anne Bellamy reported that several individuals, including members of the nobility, were willing to pay 100 pounds each to see her perform on a single night, whose proceeds were for her benefit.

The dramatists and the plays

The earliest plays to be performed after the Restoration were, not surprisingly, revivals of plays from earlier periods including many written shortly before the > Civil War and many by Shakespeare. The latter were frequently revised to fit new notions of decorum, poetic justice, and/or French and other concepts of propriety, unity and symmetry, fostered by the ⊳ neo-classical revival. For example, an early revision of > The Tempest invents a character called Hippolytus, a man who has never seen a woman, to balance the character of Miranda, the woman who has never seen a man, other than her father. Just as, after the chaos of the preceding period, Restoration architects looked back to Greece and Rome for ideal models of order, symmetry, harmony and grace, so many Restoration dramatists looked to the > classics, either directly, or via French theorists and practitioners such as > Corneille and > Racine, for models, precepts and subject matter, in composing their plays, rapidly expanding a process begun earlier in the century. A complex body of neo-classical dramatic theory developed, much indebted to > Aristotle and > Horace. This stressed the importance of preserving unities of time, place and action (> Classical unities). Theorists also focused on Aristotle's views that > tragedy's chief task was to arouse pity (for the suffering protagonists) and fear, which the drama was to purge through a process called catharsis; and that dramatic action should imitate life, this process being defined as > mimesis.

From Horace dramatists borrowed the view that drama has twin functions: to instruct, and to give pleasure (entertain). They also adopted notions of decorum, that is, a dramatic construction which is appropriate to its subject and to a genteel audience, that excludes obscenity, or anything too distasteful or revolting ('Medea must not butcher her children in front of the audience') and that avoids an awkward mixing of genres. From these theories the neo-classicists derived their own notions of poetic justice; what could be more instructive, they argued, than to reward virtue and punish vice? Shakespeare was censured for his failure to administer poetic justice, as well as his supposed rough-hewn mingling of tragic and comic elements. One of > Dryden's chief criticisms of > Troilus and Cressida was that 'Cressida is false, and is not punished'. Shakespeare was seen as a flawed genius, who could only benefit from having his works 'improved' by the present generation. Many earlier plays, by Shakespeare and others, were re-written to sanitize or even excise some of the most salacious lines, by authors conscious of post-Puritan and bourgeois criticism of the drama, and concerned in this as in other matters to observe at least some trappings of decorum (> Thomas Bowdler).

It is important to note, however, that theory and practice often diverged, and English drama was never as strict in preserving the 'unities', for example, as was the French. Furthermore, tragedies frequently introduced scenes of the most ghastly horror onto the stage: a famous engraving of > Elkanah Settle's The Empress of Morocco (1673), staged at Dorset Garden, shows a backdrop with the bodies of several mutilated victims of torture, stripped and hanging on spikes and hooks upside down, while bones and dismembered bits of human remains litter the floor. > Delarivière

Manley (1663–1724), in The Royal Mischief (1696), shows a character shot from a cannon, his lover collecting his 'smoaking Relicks' and covering them with burning kisses. ▶ Aphra Behn, one of the foremost adaptors of older comedy, repeatedly defended herself against charges of immorality in her plays. Dryden was himself accused of impropriety; in words which look forward to much of later drama, he wrote, 'Tis charg'd upon me that I make debauch'd persons . . . my Protagonists, or the chief persons of the Drama; and that I make them happy in the conclusion of my Play; against the Law of Comedy, which is to reward virtue and punish vice . . . But, lest any man should think that I write this to make libertinism amiable . . . I must farther declare . . . that we make not vicious persons happy, but only as heaven makes sinners so: that is by reclaiming them first.'

Other elements admitted by neo-classicists to the drama included love and the idea of 'Admiration', that is, that a character or action should be admirable. Dryden argued that love itself was admirable. A natural consequence was the writing of plays about love and honour, and about conflicts between the two, in which the period abounded. The workings of neo-classicism, though it influenced some comedy of the period, are seen most clearly in the so-called heroic plays, as well as non-dramatic poetry, exemplified in Dryden's verses. Indeed Dryden explained that he 'modelled [his] heroic plays by the rules of an heroic poem'. Plays, such as Dryden's Tyrannic Love; or, the Royal Martyr (1669), The Conquest of Granada (1670) and ▶ Aureng-Zebe (1675), employed the rhymed heroic ▷ couplet as their medium, with what to modern tastes often seems a ridiculous effect. D'Avenant, with The Siege of Rhodes and other plays, Sir Robert Howard (1626–98), ▷ John Crowne, Elkanah Settle, ▷ Thomas Otway, Nathaniel Lee and ▷ John Banks all contributed to the repertoire of heroic plays as well.

A feature of such plays was their exotic settings. Elizabethan and > Jacobean tragedy was frequently set in Italy (partly because of its > Italian antecedents in the theatre) and to a lesser extent in Greece. After the Restoration the growing influence of foreign novels and plays placed in distant venues, as well as the growth of trading and other links with hitherto unknown places, contributed to a taste for plays set among Christians and Moors in Spain, Morocco and several countries of the Middle East, and even among the Chinese and the Indians of North and South America. Such settings became the norm for plays of this kind: the popular understanding of the term > 'oriental' (vague and undefined as that was), being almost synonymous with concepts of despotism, cruelty and luxury, made such settings ideal for plays involving spectacle, horror and scenes of high passion and intrigue, until writers such as > Dr. Johnson and > Goldsmith adopted more cosmopolitan attitudes to their distant fellow-beings.

The altered values and concerns of later generations have meant that today most Restoration tragedies are forgotten, and heroic dramas were mocked even in their own time, notably in Buckingham's (> George Villiers) > The Rehearsal (1671), which singles out D'Avenant and Dryden for satiric attack, with devastating wit. Dryden himself recognized the potential for ridicule when he had Nell Gwyn berate an actor who would have carried her 'dead' body off the stage at the end of Tyrannic Love, 'hold, are you mad? you damn'd confounded Dog,/I am to rise and speak the Epilogue', thus undercutting the seriousness of his own preceding action. The modern critic Anne Righter has suggested that Restoration tragedy is 'less serious' than contemporary comedy, even 'essentially frivolous' in its penchant for easy solutions and its intellectual emptiness. A few tragedies, however, would be worthy of more attention than they have been given in recent years, especially some of the political and history plays, such as Nathaniel Lee's > Lucius Junius Brutus (1680), and one or two tragedies of > Thomas Southerne. A fine, halfforgotten, blank-verse tragedy which focuses strongly on conflicts between love and honour is Thomas Otway's > Venice Preserv'd (1682). The play's urgent intensity, emphasis on character, chronicle of betrayals and mounting atmosphere of despair, link it with Jacobean tragedy. Tracing the failure of a rebellion against the Venetian senate, it has sometimes been viewed as predominantly Tory propaganda. But the manifest corruption of the authorities which Otway displays, and measure of (however qualified) sympathy which he allows the reluctant plotter Jaffeir, make it a more complex political statement. The play shows the moral turmoil which is produced when rulers are unjust, and that to preserve honour, let alone happiness, under them is impossible. But violent plots require violent plotters whose behaviour even toward their ostensible friends and allies is unpredictable, and whose success could presage a new era of chaos. The play may perhaps be read as > Hobbesian, in that it appears ultimately to discourage rebellion, but it offers no easy solutions, and its strongest message is that the onus is on rulers to do justice by their people. Performed during a time of unrest after the so-called 'Popish Plot', the play had topical relevance.

Not only tragedies have been forgotten. Amongst the hundreds of comedies written during the period, only a handful survive today, in the sense of being widely known and regularly performed. They are the work of no more than half a dozen dramatists, including Etherege, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, Farquhar, Dryden, and to a lesser extent Behn, although Dryden is chiefly remembered now for his poetry and non-dramatic prose. From the 18th century, the comedies of Goldsmith and > Sheridan are still well known; otherwise most drama, from the Jacobeans to the late 19th century, is virtually unknown today, even though the period encompasses literally hundreds of plays of immense diversity, including many that were highly successful and acclaimed in their own time. A strange paradox has arisen: many people today have heard of Betterton, Garrick and Sarah Siddons, but few ask what – apart from the handful of Restoration comedies and plays by Shakespeare – they performed.

The reasons for this are manifold: apart from the changes in taste already mentioned, some plays fell victim to circumstances outside their authors' control: for example > Thomas Shadwell, author of many fine comedies and > Poet Laureate after the > 'Glorious Revolution' of 1688, was pilloried by his arch-enemy Dryden who, unfortunately for Shadwell, gained the more lasting reputation. Shadwell's alleged ineptitude and dullness have been proclaimed over the years via the poem > MacFlecknoe and kept most people from investigating his work further. Colley Cibber, a tolerable and in his way innovative, if not brilliant, dramatist, experienced the same fate at the hands of Alexander Pope and > The Dunciad. Most so-called Restoration dramatists, and not a few that followed, suffered from the > Victorian obsession with virtue and propriety. It was not deemed seemly to read, let alone perform, many of the plays from preceding generations; Restoration comedies were vilified most of all. Aphra Behn was subjected to a violently anti-feminist backlash that took hold during her lifetime, mounted in the years following her death, and eventually developed into a concerted campaign to obliterate her memory altogether. > Sir Walter Scott, in a well-known anecdote, related that his grand-aunt returned some of Behn's novels which he had sent her at her own request, saying that she now felt ashamed to read a book which, 60 years before, she had heard read aloud in the best circles in London. Scott attributed the change to the gradual improvement of taste and sense of delicacy in the time leading up to his own. The publisher John Pearson was exconated when, in 1872, he published a collection of Behn's works, along with others by Restoration and early 18th-century dramatists including > Susannah Centlivre.

This represented the end of a long process of decline in the attitude toward women dramatists: Behn's first play The Forc'd Marriage, put on at the end of 1670, has a prologue celebrating its authorship by a woman, as a sort of novelty – though Behn was not the first English woman to have a play performed (that distinction may belong to the woman better known as a poet, > Katherine Philips. But opposition gathered during the 1670s, such that Behn soon felt obliged to defend herself in print, not only for the alleged bawdiness of her work, but for the mere fact that she as a woman dared to write at all. In an epilogue she asked rhetorically, 'What has poor Woman done, that she must be / Debar'd [sic] from Sense and sacred Poetry? . . . pray tell me then, / why Women should not write as well as Men.' She and many of her successors survived the mockery of male contemporaries, only to have their work eclipsed altogether by more narrow-minded subsequent generations. The number of women writing for the stage dwindled from about 1720, although a few prospered in each decade of the 18th century.

Behn, the first professional woman dramatist, was also among the most versatile dramatists of the era: she attempted, with varying degrees of success, virtually every genre for the stage, and portraved almost every comic and perhaps tragic type known in her period. In many ways her plays paralleled those of the significant male dramatists of her time: she excelled at comedy, portraying the intricacies of courtship and marriage with wit and finesse. She was at her best with farcical intrigue comedy, handling multiple and complex plots without ever losing the thread of any individual one. Underlying the humour, however, was a serious vein: unlike many of her male contemporaries, she appears to have sustained a faith in the powers of true romantic love, foreshadowing many dramatists of the next century. Moreover, again unlike many male writers, she viewed the problems of love and marriage from a woman's point of view, idealizing and at the same time satirizing the typical rake character of the period, but also showing the harm which his machinations could inflict on women who took him at face value. Several plays show a sympathetic understanding of the unchaste woman, including the courtesan, or the 'wronged woman' who has rashly forfeited her chastity in the pursuit of love. Ismena in Behn's The Amorous Prince (1671) reproaches a suitor, 'as most gallants are, / You're but pleased with what you have not; / And love a Mistress with great Passion, 'till you find / Yourself belov'd again, and then you hate her'. In plays including this one, Behn re-examines the concept of feminine 'virtue', defining it not as virginity like most of her contemporaries, but as something we would now call integrity. Her most sustained theme is the evils of the so-called 'forced marriage': the marriage imposed on unwilling young people by greedy and ambitious relatives. Virtue consists in remaining true to one's own desires, even if that means defying the older generation and, in the case of women, giving up one's virginity to a man truly loved.

Probably the most successful and able of Behn's immediate successors was Susannah Centlivre, two of whose 19 comedies, ▷ The Busie Bodie (1709) and ▷ The Wonder: A Woman Keeps a Secret (1714), remained among the four most frequently re-printed and performed of any, except for those of Shakespeare, until late in the 19th century. Like Behn she excelled at comedy with complex intrigue plots, displaying with vitality and style young people, in pursuit of their own romantic ends, outwitting others functioning as pillars of established authority. But unlike Behn, who was a high Tory, she championed Whigs and Whig interests in several plays and, again unlike Behn, she fervently opposed Catholicism, which she referred to as 'the Romish Yoke'. Furthermore, in keeping with her more fastidious times, the overt sexual element is omitted from her plays. Two of these, The Gamester (1705) and The Basset Table (1705), follow a contemporary convention in exposing current vice – in this case the fashionable one of gambling. She was also a fine craftswoman, creating superb acting roles, including five intended for the same actor in various disguises (> A Bold Strike for a Wife), which rendered several of her plays favourites of Garrick and Kitty Clive. Garrick chose her play The Wonder for the last performance of his career.

From the Restoration onwards, plays were heavily preoccupied with themes of courtship and marriage, treated in ways varying from high comedy including farce, to tragedy. Indeed the term 'Restoration Comedy' conjures up in people's minds scenes of witty courtship and flirtation, underpinned by conflict: the 'battle of the sexes' Many plays contain debates, implicit or explicit, about the value or otherwise of marriage as an institution, and discussions concerning the bases on which marriages should be contracted: whether for love or money; according to the choices of parents or lovers; between old and young ('January-May' matches); or lovers of similar age, and so forth. But these themes are not in any sense unique to the drama of the period. They permeate literature of many kinds, including a vast body of > pamphlet material which was digested by increasing numbers of middle-class readers.

The genre has roots in some misogynistic writing of the ➤ Middle Ages, in which marriage was denigrated precisely because it bound men closely to women – the descendants of the flawed Eve. However it was strongly fuelled by the ➤ Reformation, with the protagonists dividing along religious lines. Increasingly, the institution of marriage was defended by Protestant Reformers, who accused Catholics of attacking marriage and sanctioning immorality ('whoring') as an alternative, so men could satisfy their sexual needs without having to resort to wedlock. A Reformist priest, Thomas Becon, in his Boke of Matrimony (1563), attacks 'Masse and Monckery' and its alleged opposition to matrimony, which is, he says, a state 'holy blessed . . . although counted of the Papistes neuer so Seraphicall . . .'. Catholics did not on the whole attack marriage as such, but continued to value celibacy as the highest state for those who could attain it, stimulating further attacks from Protestants for their supposed hypocrisy.

In the 17th century the debate over marriage intensified, and at the same time became secularized, erupting through the hundreds of ▷ pamphlets also written by, and largely appealing to, members of the middle-classes. Marriage was contrasted to whoring as a way of life; many pamphlets also focused on characters of courtesans or prostitutes, drawing moral conclusions from tales of their prosperity or downfall. Religious attitudes continued to inform many of the pamphlets but, increasingly, pamphlets by women responded to those by men, especially to the satiric ones attacking women. Later, women such as the polemicist poet ▷ Sarah Fyge, ▷ Mary Astell and poet and essayist ▷ Lady Mary Chudleigh attacked marriage for its patriarchal enslavement of their sex.

Images of > slavery pervade both the pamphlets and the drama, with human and especially sexual relations seen in terms of the enslavement of one partner to another, or the enslavement of both to the oppressive conditions of marriage. The Civil War had heightened public concern with personal freedom, but growing censorship limited the parameters for discussion about the exercise of freedom in the political sphere. After the Restoration, the loosening of the strictures on individual sexual morality permitted a new outlet for debates about freedom, which took the form of a revived focus on the battle of the sexes. The growth of slavery in the New World also contributed to a widespread preoccupation with the metaphoric as well as literal manifestations of this institution.

Together, plays and pamphlets illustrate the debate about marriage and sexual relations in the 17th and 18th centuries. Indeed on one level, many plays may be seen as dramatized versions of a debate which constitutes a social correlative to the religiopolitical clash continuing in society, and exploding periodically into overt conflict. Examples are the 'Popish Plot' debacle beginning in 1678, the > 'Rye House Plot' a few years later, to assassinate Charles II, and Monmouth's Rebellion (Duke of Monmouth), culminating with the so-called 'Glorious Revolution'- although the latter phenomena had distinct and various ends in view. Several late 17th-century pamphlets express concern that, because of Catholic influence on society in general and the gentry in particular, marriage as an institution was declining. But the drama shows, on the whole, no such concern. In keeping with dramatic tradition, and the reality of most people's lives, dramatists assumed that most of their characters would marry. But the plays are increasingly preoccupied with the concept of love and/or marriage as slavery, for the man or the woman, depending on the point of view. The metaphoric treatment of these themes in comedies was paralleled by more literal uses in the serious plays, of situations in which individuals are enslaved to one another via imprisonment, although they are also sometimes 'slaves of love'. So-called 'proviso scenes' in which men and women spell out the terms on which they are prepared to submit to the restrictions of marriage, and make bargains to this effect, form the climaxes to some Restoration comedies, the most famous example being the scene between Millamant and Mirabell in Act IV of Congreve's > The Way of the World (1700). From 1670 onwards, after the first effective civil divorce, this too became a topic in some plays - seen as the only escape from an impossible union.

In the 1690s came a series of so-called 'marital discord plays', which followed more soberly in the footsteps of Behn. A major figure in this regard is the neglected dramatist, \triangleright Thomas Southerne, who borrowed heavily from Behn. In several of his plays he shows the appalling situation of the wife, tied to a philandering and cruel husband, 'this hard condition of a woman's fate', in the words of one of his women characters. Vanbrugh takes up the theme in \triangleright The Relapse (1697), written as a satiric sequel to Cibber's \triangleright Love's Last Shift (1696), which showed the husband repenting of his unkindness to his wife, and undergoing a reform.

Today the best-known plays of the Restoration and early 18th century periods are some of the so-called wit comedies or Comedies of ▷ Manners by Etherege, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh and Farquhar. The form has an antecedent in the wooing of ▷ Beatrice and Benedick in Shakespeare's ▷ Much Ado About Nothing. But after the Restoration, Dryden helped develop it with what some consider the first true 'Restoration Comedy', ▷ The Wild Gallant (1663), in which an impoverished gallant, Loveby, is secretly supplied with money by his mistress, Constance. She articulates the plight of the woman in the period, 'tied to hard unequal laws: The passion is the same in us, and yet we are debarred the freedom to express it'.

Some plays of Etherege and Wycherley illustrate more clearly the inequalities of men and women: in Etherege's > The Man of Mode (1676) women mistrust and betray one another. The heroine Harriet wins the appalling Dorimant away from the weak and stupid Bellinda and unscrupulous Loveit, but it is clear that her money forms a large part of her attraction in the match, making up for the ruin of his estate, and thus implicitly rescuing him from the slavery of poverty, although this is not stated in these terms. Margery Pinchwife, the title character in Wycherley's > The Country Wife (1675), is pathetic and misguided; her denigration comes because she has not learned to guard her true interests in the harsh world of the city. The pursuit of 'interest', both financial and general, is a frequent theme in plays from a period heavily influenced not only by commercial changes in society, but also the writings of the contemporary social commentators > Hobbes and François de la Rochefoucauld (1613-80), and the Greek philosopher > Epicurus as adumbrated by the Roman > Lucretius. Lucretius' works, translated and published during these years, contributed to a flirtation with 'atheism' by some Restoration writers and others. Denying the existence of an after-life implied, so it was thought, making the most of this one – even if that meant ignoring or downgrading the interests of others.

Many critics, such as Nicoll, J. H. Wilson, Bonamy Dobree and Clifford Leech, have attempted to organize Restoration comedies into categories, but this is a thankless task as there are so many overlaps between genres. For example, one frequently mentioned category is the Spanish Romance (> Spanish influence on English literature), such as Sir Samuel Tuke's The Adventures of Five Hours, commissioned by Charles II (1663), but in the prologue and preface to The Wild Gallant Dryden also acknowledges a Spanish origin. The so-called 'split-plot tragi-comedy', exemplified by Dryden's > Marriage à la Mode and Behn's The Widow Ranter (1689), is another, but here the comic plots have elements from various of the supposed categories. In Marriage à la Mode, for example, the lovers Palamede and Doralice exchange banter normally thought of as belonging to the 'comedy of wit', as they arrange a liaison. In another scene Leonidas is identified as the son to the usurper of Sicily, Polydamas, in lines that look forward to a great deal of 'exemplary' and 'sentimental' comedy. In yet another scene illicit meetings and mistaken identities parallel those of comedy of intrigue. Congreve's > The Double Dealer (1694), considered among the great comedies of wit because of its sparkling language, also contains many intrigue elements, as shown in its enormously complex and brilliantly managed plot. Shadwell wrote several comedies influenced by > Ben Jonson's theory of 'humours' (Comedy of > Humours), as suggested in the Dramatis Personae to The Sullen Lovers (1668), which lists characters including 'a morose melancholy man', 'a conceited poet' and 'a familiar loving coxcomb', and in Shadwell's own dedication to the play. But the work has 'witty' and intrigue elements as well. In fact there are often overlaps among intrigue comedy, wit comedy and farce.

Similar problems arise in discussing tragedies, which are sometimes divided into categories including heroic tragedy, horror tragedy - glorying in scenes of torture, such as The Empress of Morocco - and pathetic tragedies, including some of Lee and John Banks. But again, there are many overlaps between and among categories; for example, Behn's Abdelazar (1676) has both horror and 'heroic' elements. And there have been numerous debates about whether some of Lee's plays really were 'pathetic', and how, in any case, this term should be defined. Happier compromises than those referred to above have been achieved by such authors as Robert D. Hume in The Development of English Drama in the late Seventeenth Century and A. H. Scouten in The Revels History of Drama. Hume discusses plays according to period, although this too leaves something to be desired, because of the inevitable exceptions and overlaps. But he also discusses some individual plays according to the categories into which they supposedly fit, such as the 'French' Farce, ▷ 'Reform Comedy', 'Wit Comedy', 'Sex Comedy', 'City Intrigue Comedy', 'Augustan Intrigue Comedy' and so on. Scouten's categories are much broader ('New Drama', 'Political Plays against the Puritans', and 'Social Comedy', for example), and much of his discussion is according to author.

Behn was one of the earliest to exhibit tendencies toward what has been variously described as 'sentimental', 'exemplary', or 'reform' comedy, the 'comedy of sensibility', and more recently, 'humane comedy'. These are critics' sometimes crude attempts to define a transition between plays dominated by hard wit comic elements of the high Restoration period and the genres that followed. The terms have often been accompanied by a blanket condemnation of the new modes, as representing a loss of wit and humour without any compensatory gain. But as Shirley Strum Kenny (coiner of the term 'humane comedy') has suggested, some of the older drama had much in the way of cynicism and callousness to discredit it, and there were mitigating features of the new.

The change is attended by attacks on the stage – most famously by the Reverend > Jeremy Collier in a piece entitled A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, written in 1698. His tirade on the alleged loose morality and profane language of the plays was the more effective, if perhaps also more puzzling, because of his evident knowledge of the texts from reading, if not seeing them performed. But the movement toward reform had been started well before: a long vituperative poem by Robert Gould, Satyr Against the Playhouse, written in 1685 and published four years later, is said to have heralded the controversy. Finally, the change is linked with political developments: for example, the ascendancy of the Whigs after the Revolution of 1688, bringing with them a backlash against the supposed immorality and irreligion of the Tory dramatists. Writers such as > John Locke, whose works were widely distributed after the Revolution, had far more positive views of human nature than those of his predecessors Thomas Hobbes and Sir Robert Filmer (c1590-1653), whose ideas had strongly influenced many Tories. The loss of patronage by the Royal family was also an important factor: as stated above, Charles II was a keen patron of the theatre, and his cultured but wry, satiric personality had a substantial influence on its development during his reign. His brother James II, while less involved in the minutiae of play composition and performance, had also continued the tradition of patronage for the brief period of his reign.

In the 1690s and early 1700s plays began to emerge that were less overtly bawdy and had a more sympathetic and 'moral' attitude toward some of their leading characters and human nature in general. Vanbrugh and Farquhar, although often classed among, and sharing characteristics with, Restoration dramatists, also belong in many ways to this later era. For example, in Farquhar's > The Beaux' Stratagem (1707), Aimwell, under the guise of his wealthy brother, spends most of the play courting Dorinda for the sake of her fortune. But at the crucial moment he confesses his poverty, and releases her from her vows. At this she decides to marry him anyway, moved by his 'Matchless Honesty'. This is a far cry from Etherege or Wycherley.

A feature of these plays is their softened attitude to the country, which had been seen as a wasteland of ignorance and dullness by many satiric dramatists, though not by poets, of the Restoration. Many Restoration dramatists associated the country with settled property-based marriages, contrasting them to the 'freedom' of the town. But later dramatists and audiences came increasingly to accept the conventional forms of match-making, and with them, the country seat and its environment where so many wealthy and genteel families made their home. A stock motif of Restoration comedy is young lovers refusing to accept the partners of their parents' choice, and insisting instead upon making their own choices. In the 18th century, this is replaced typically by situations in which lovers think they are choosing for themselves, but unwittingly become attracted to partners who have in fact been intended for them by their elders all along. Thus at the end conflict is avoided, and the parents are vindicated, indeed revealed as sensible and far-sighted. The effect is an affirmation of the wisdom of the older generation, and by extension, of settled social forms and values. Rebellion against such parents is unjustified, since they have the true interests of the younger generation at heart. The forced marriage motif survives, however, in some plays, including Eliza Haywood's A Wife to be Lett (1723), and several plays by Centlivre.

Another common feature of plays of the period is the reform of a major protagonist. This is in keeping with the more optimistic view of human nature and aspirations espoused not only by Locke, but also by ▷ Shaftesbury and later ▷ David Hume, ▷ David Hartley, Pope and others. For many decades, plays exhibited gamblers, wife-beaters and others deemed guilty of wrongdoing repenting of their ways − though usually not until the last act. Colley Cibber's Love's Last Shift, in which the abandoned wife succeeds in reforming her errant and impoverished husband, is generally agreed to have been a key transitional play in this regard. The husband Loveless, struck by remorse, ends by celebrating the 'chast Rapture of a Vertuous Love'. Meanwhile in a secondary plot, an older man admonishes and successfully disciplines the coquette Hillaria.

Women are also shown repenting, notably by women dramatists including Susannah Centlivre and ➤ Mary Pix. The latter, whose The Spanish Wives (1696) had championed women's freedom somewhat in the style of Behn, though less racily, reforms the heroine of The Deceiver Deceived (1697) after one bout of adultery. The genre overlaps with the so-called 'exemplary drama' or 'drama of sensibility', epitomized by Steele's ➤ The Conscious Lovers (1722), in which the lovers of the title agonize over the propriety of all their actions. In the second half of the century, parallel with theories about the natural 'benevolence' of human nature, the so-called 'sentimental comedy', epitomized by Hugh Kelly's (1739–77) The False Delicacy (1768), developed. Also ➤ Richard Cumberland's ➤ The West Indian (1771) contains a number of elements typical of the genre, including the reform of a rake, vice exposed and outwitted, virtue rescued from distress and honourable simplicity triumphant.

Sheridan and Goldsmith reacted against what they saw as a surfeit of pathos and morality: they consciously attempted to revive the spirit of Restoration comedy with plays such as \triangleright She Stoops to Conquer (1773), \triangleright The Rivals (1775) and \triangleright The School for Scandal (1777). So successful were their efforts that many people not too well acquainted with the stage today believe them to belong to the earlier era. And yet in its more 'benign' atmosphere and softened attitude to country life, for example, as well as certain elements of the plot, She Stoops to Conquer, at least, belongs to a later period than true Restoration comedy, and has much more in common with Farquhar, let us say, than with dramatists like Etherege, Wycherley, Behn or Congreve.

Along with the changes in comedy came new types of serious drama, although heroic plays remained popular into the 18th century. New approaches to Shakespeare have already been referred to, providing in some cases greater authenticity and in others fresh distortions, until > Edmund Kean mounted full-scale restorations of Shakespeare's own texts in the 19th century. The later 18th century may be considered as a transitional period in this regard. > John Banks and others developed a variety of tragedy focusing on the sufferings of women, at a time when the numbers of women dramatists were growing, and pamphlets presenting the views and concerns of women were proliferating. Such plays of John Banks include Vertue Betray'd: or, Anna Bullen (1682), on Anne Boleyn; The Island Queens (1684), on > Mary Queen of Scots; and The Innocent Usurper (1694), on the execution of Lady Jane Grey. Congreve experimented with the form in the > The Mourning Bride (1697), and > Nicholas Rowe took it further with The Fair Penitent (1703), The Tragedy of > Jane Shore (1714) and The Tragedy of Lady Jane Grey (1715). There is a link between such plays and some of the comedies of Southerne, Cibber, Vanbrugh and Centlivre, which also focus on the sufferings of women, albeit in less sombre contexts.

Today Banks is usually considered a practitioner of so-called 'pathetic tragedy', encompassing elements of pathos, designed to move rather than thrill or shock the spectator, while Rowe's plays are known as ▷ 'she-tragedies'. But the two may be seen to overlap. Again negotiating with these, and developing gradually in the period, was the domestic or bourgeois tragedy, characterized by a focus on the lives of ordinary citizens, rather than the kings and queens of the heroic variety. A landmark of this genre is ▷ George Lillo's ▷ The London Merchant: or the History of George Barnwell (1730), which ends with Barnwell repenting of his crimes before being executed. However, as Allardyce Nicoll points out in A History of English Drama 1660–1900, the roots of bourgeois tragedy, like those of so many other 'new' forms, lie in the Restoration period − particularly with Otway.

> Burlesque plays and satires, fathered by George Villiers' The Rehearsal, became increasingly popular during the first decades of the 18th century. Among the most famous of these were Pope, Gay and Arbuthnot's resentful satire on contemporary women dramatists, Three Hours After Marriage (1717), and Fielding's > Tom Thumb (1730), reworked as The Tragedy of Tragedies (1731), again mocking heroic plays. Gay's > The Beggar's Opera (1728), technically a ballad-opera, is known to many today mainly as the source for > Brecht's The Threepenny Opera. This comedy of lowlife has antecedents in the 'rogue literature' of the 16th and 17th centuries, including some masques by Jonson. But its success was instantaneous: staged by > John Rich, himself a dramatist as well as actor-manager, it is said to have made 'Gay rich and Rich gay'. This and later plays, notably by Fielding, mounted a sustained satiric attack on Sir Robert Walpole, eventually leading, as we have seen, to the Licensing Act of 1737, whereby the latter was able to subdue his critics and control the stage with a much firmer hand. It resulted in Fielding and others abandoning the stage and contributed, indirectly, to the development of the novel in the 18th century, as Fielding and others now concentrated their efforts on this less rigorously controlled, and therefore less risky, form of endeavour.

A dramatic form that developed in the 17th century, but became much more popular in the 18th is the 'after-piece', a short pantomime or farce intended to be performed after a more serious play, so the audience would be sent home laughing. Increasingly, these entertainments were considered essential to attract audiences to the theatre and, as the demand grew, many earlier plays were re-written in lighter and much abbreviated form. Just as pamphlets on marriage, written in serious or bitingly satiric vein in the 17th century were increasingly reworked into light, frivolous pieces in the 18th, so full-length, skilfully made comedies and tragi-comedies were later turned into little afterpieces. Garrick altered Wycherley's > The Country Wife to The Country Girl (1766); a play by Betterton, The Amorous Widow (performed c1670) became a two-act farce, Barnaby Brittle (1782); Behn's The Revenge (1680), itself a sombre tragi-comic alteration of a savage satire by John Marston (?1575-1634), eventually became - via a comic and farcical adaptation by Christopher Bullock (1690-1722) called A Woman's Revenge (1715) - a droll, The Stroler's Pacquet (1742). 17th- and 18th-century dramatists were not on the whole concerned with problems of plagiarism, let alone > copyright. In addition, dancing, singing, acrobatics, juggling and other forms of non-dramatic entertainment - including performances by many visiting companies from the continent - frequently functioned as entr'actes or after-pieces, as well as being staged in their own right, or integrated into plays.

Late in the century the influence of German (> German Influence on English Literature) and, once again, French dramatists became important to the English stage (▷ French Literature in England), at a time when the work of German poets and philosophers, in particular, was having a growing impact on the English Romantic poets. Plays of ▷ Kotzebue and René-Charles Guilber Pixérécourt (1773–1844), for example, translated and reworked by ▷ Thomas Holcroft and ▷ Elizabeth Inchbald, became immensely popular. The translations were to include works known to us now as melodramas, at first literally containing music, from the turn of the century.

In the final years of the century, reaction against the supposed bawdiness of many plays, alluded to above, began to bite in earnest. Readers of ▷ Jane Austen may recall the horrified response of the older generation upon finding the young people in ▷ Mansfield Park engaged in an amateur performance of Inchbald's Lover's Vows. Restoration comedy, which had remained part of the repertory throughout most of the century, was attacked once again, in a period marked by the rise of the ▷ Evangelical Movement. Even ▷ Hannah Cowley's A School for Greybeards (1786), itself a 'refined' and 'cleaned-up' version of Behn's genuinely outspoken The Lucky Chance (1686), was considered shocking. The stage was set for Thomas Bowdler's edition of Shakespeare (1818), new plays in the 19th century that were even more overtly moral and religiously inspired than their predecessors of the 18th, and the disappearance of Restoration plays altogether, until the revivals of this century.

The Persistence of Romanticism

Introduction

'With what eyes these poets see nature!' > William Hazlitt's exclamatory and admiring verdict on meeting > William Wordsworth and > Samuel Taylor Coleridge, (and, as importantly, hearing them read their poetry aloud), encapsulates in precise and immediate terms the categories of pleasure and instruction through which 'these poets' entered and remain within the canon of English verse. The 'chaunt', the note of bardic exaltation which Hazlitt heard in Coleridge's voice in particular, sounded the liberation of poetry from the shackles of eighteenth-century convention. Henceforth, the tight couplets of Alexander Pope's verse, and his focus on 'What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed', would seem complacent and narrowly technical. The age of Pope and Samuel Johnson had been characterized by a self-doubting and frequently pessimistic retraction of artistic ambition, leaving satire as the only poetic channel for a relatively unfettered expression of energy. But now the ambition of poetry seemed limitless. The next thirty years would see the revival of > blank yerse, the > epic, the ode, borrowed forms such as the Italianate > terza rima and > ottava rima, as well as more or less freshly invented forms such as Coleridge's conversation poem. Indeed, a poem such as > Frost at Midnight, with its blend of philosophical complexity and everyday vocabulary, is emblematic of the confidence and range of English poetry in the period from 1708 to the deaths of Shellev and Byron in the early 1820s.

In his pathbreaking poem Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey, the closing meditation of the collection written in collaboration with Coleridge, > Lyrical Ballads (1798), Wordsworth wrote about landscape, and of its powers of healing and secular redemption through memory, in ways that paid more homage to both the workings of subjectivity and the features of Nature than the 'official', London-based poetry of the Augustan age would have thought either sane or desirable. Recreating a visit to the banks of the River Wye after a lapse of 'five summers', the poem's questing voice moves from description of 'mountain springs', 'lofty cliffs' and 'plots of cottage-ground' to more conceptualized sensations of being able to 'connect/ The landscape with the quiet of the sky', and hence connect it with the mind. This is done with what may strike readers of today as a perfectly musical and smooth modulation. (In a not dissimilar way, the landscape paintings of John Constable, once so radical and startling, now form a suburban cliché as mass-market prints.) But Wordsworth's poetry – at least in this early stage of his career – is above all a poetry of exploration and experiment, and even his most apparently premeditated disquisitions on the nature of identity are rarely without moments of surprised self-discovery and encounter:

These beauteous forms,
Through a long absence, have not been to me
As is a landscape to a blind man's eye:
But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din

Of towns and cities, I have owed to them, In hours of weariness, sensations sweet, Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart;

Gaining in both poignancy and potency from the lapse of years, the 'beauteous forms' of cliffs, woods and water become not so much ambiguous as multi-directional, existing not only in the outer world but 'in the blood', and 'along the heart', as if that organ had its own mysterious coastline. The novelty of these lines (and of many key poems by Wordsworth) lies in their proposition that the inner, personal world of bodily experience and subjective recollection matches the outer world in its complexity, beauty and depths. With this in mind, the statement by Hazlitt with which this essay begins can now be seen to be a formulation as much about 'eyes' as about 'Nature', as much about perception as landscape. This double focus animates Wordsworth's lines, and may indeed be a feature common to all Romantic poetry.

The shock of the new in Wordsworth's poetry may be hard to register in the 1990s, when nostalgia for an unspoiled rural England, and the commercialization of that sentiment by the heritage industry, have co-opted the poet, as Constable's painting has been co-opted. The nostalgic and conservative reading of a painting such as The Haywain (1821) views it as the faithful representation of a real and beautiful scene from England's rural past, of a kind which has had to be sacrificed to the advances of industrialization and urbanization, but which can still be visited by car at weekends, and which proposes certain values (moderation, calm, respect for continuity and ritual) which serve the interests of our political masters, particularly at a time of economic instability and underlying disquiet. This kind of interpretation of English landscape painting brings its own agenda to bear on the work, but it is not conjured out of thin air; any viewer of Constable's paintings, like all readers of Wordsworth, must respond to a rendering of Nature so vibrant as to be empathetic, deciding in consequence whether that empathy has materialist, metaphysical or social implications.

Sometimes what we see or read here are examples of what John Ruskin would term in Modern Painters (1834) the 'pathetic fallacy', the attribution of human feelings or aspects to non-human subjects. A painting of an English elm by Constable, done around 1821, is structured as if it were a portrait. An even more dramatic humanization of Nature can be found in the paintings of Caspar David Friedrich, or Johan Christian Claussen Dahl, about whose evocation of a birch tree in a storm the art critic Robert Rosenblum observed that 'branches almost appear to be the exposed nerves of a suffering creature'. Equally ecstatic and empathetic conjurations abound in Wordsworth's poetry, as in these famous lines from Book VI of > The Prelude:

The rocks that mutter'd close upon our ears, Black drizzling crags that spake by the wayside As if a voice were in them, the sick sight And giddy prospect of the raving stream, The unfettered clouds and region of the Heavens, Tumult and peace, the darkness and the light – Were all like workings of one mind, the features Of the same face, blossoms upon one tree; Characters of the great Apocalypse, The types and symbols of Eternity, Of first, and last, and midst, and without end.

The first wave of English Romantic poetry, and the northern European landscape painters, share a tendency to return or even relegate human figures to the sphere of Nature, whose wild storms, immeasurable vistas of sky and sea, ceaselessly changing effects of light and cloud, down to the most delicately microscopic intricacies of leaves or the colours of flowers, announce cosmic and possibly God-given mysteries beyond the constrictions – the lack of vision – permitted by religious orthodoxy. Yet notice how in the case of these lines from The Prelude, the pathetic fallacy, the attribution of human speech to the non-human 'rocks' and 'crags', undoes and reverses its own ambition of harmonization and the reintegration of humanity into Nature. It is, after all, only by the imposition of the utterly human and linguistic notion of signifying meaning through 'Characters', 'types' and 'symbols' that the wild and incoherent landscape seen by Wordsworth in the Alps can be made to cohere. The strong biblical echoes of the climactic 'first, and last, and midst, and without end' speak of what is infinitely larger than human comprehension, but do so using terms that are perfectly humanly recognizable, and so supply a satisfactory and resonant 'end' to what was alleged to be endless.

Similarly, Friedrich's Romantic evocations of the beauty or endlessness of Nature, Monk by the Sea (1809) for example, or Two Men Contemplating the Moon (1819), depict distinct consciousnesses, at least as firmly as they stage the re-entry of the human into the maternal embrace of Nature. To return John Constable's Haymain to this context is to divest it of late twentieth-century nostalgia, to turn it from commodified culture back into art, but then to see in it a contradiction, or at least a doubleness, that links it to both Friedrich and to Wordsworth. Constable's exploratory, conspicuous, and variously textured brushwork appeared shockingly modern - indeed, unfinished - in its time. It is precisely that quality that is most lost by mass reproduction, and that acts to separate both the painter and the viewer from any premature reinsertion of solitary human consciousness into the wider frame of Nature. Wordsworth had written in Tintern Abbey 'of all the mighty world/ Of eye, and ear, - both what they half create, / and what perceive; and Constable's brushwork reminds us likewise of the primacy of perception, and the degree to which reality is given significance by human creativity and attention, an attention that may, finally, be solitary. The larger and more idealistic projects of Romanticism co-exist with the risk that any form of search for a larger frame than the single consciousness may undo itself, unmasked as a consolatory strategy in a world that ultimately begs questions, but does not supply answers.

And so there is much in the poetry of the English Romantic movement that is new, and that has to be granted its unconventionality and even its built-in contradictions, if it is to be read with clarity after the lapse of almost two hundred years. Yet, if the poetry is shockingly new, it is important to note in passing certain ways in which Romanticism draws for its intellectual resources on a partial return to previous models and procedures. These are frequently not only non-Augustan, but anti-Augustan in spirit. For example, by combining the hypnotic and driving rhythms of the \triangleright ballad with luridly colourful imagery drawn from Gothic tales and his own more feverish imaginings, Coleridge took English poetry forward by taking it back. His early poem \triangleright The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798), like \triangleright Kubla Khan and \triangleright Christabel (both 1816), gained its novelty partly from a revivification of neglected and popular (that is, culturally low-grade) materials. Likewise, the rhetorical grandeur of Wordsworth's writing drew to some extent on the blank verse of \triangleright Milton's \triangleright Paradise Lost for its scope and intensity, leavening it with what Coleridge termed the 'divine chit-chat' of a less prophetic and more conversational poet, \triangleright William Cowper.

In order to fashion itself, each age tends to denigrate the previous period; this is as true of Renaissance impatience with the benighted Middle Ages, or modernist disdain for Victorian pieties, as of the Romantic reaction against the supposed limitations of the eighteenth century. However, there has never been a major period of English literature in which the availability of literary forms drawn partly from the past coincided with the furious energies of a revolutionary present to produce a poetry so suddenly bold in scope, and wide-ranging in style. Hazlitt's reaction to the new poetry of Wordsworth and Coleridge is therefore one of the Edenic moments in English poetry and criticism. Wordsworth's lines from Book X of The Prelude, 'Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,/ But to be young was very heaven', may likewise stand both for his recollection of reactions to the > French Revolution in its early, inspiring phase, and as a motto for the Romantic moment.

The term 'Romanticism' has a clear etymological proximity to the word 'romance', and, although there will be much in this Introduction and in the book as a whole to complicate and darken any too simple understanding of Romanticism as the literary expression of idealism, it is worth beginning by paying heed to one of this period's dominant tones, the revolutionary hope for a better world, articulated in a visionary poetry that asks us to look at the old world through new eyes.

H

Paradises Lost and Found

All the major poems of the Romantic period, from > William Blake's > The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (c 1790-93) to > Lord Byron's picaresque epic > Don Juan (1818-24), are concerned with the accessibility or otherwise of a paradise. However, the Romantic paradise is only rarely identifiable as the Christian heaven. To Wordsworth, the paradisal perception which poetry strives to investigate and hopefully revive is closely tied to an understanding of childhood as Edenic, but blurred and progressively less available to consciousness as time and decreasing energy take their toll. His Ode: Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood asks 'Whither is fled the visionary gleam?' Where is it now, the glory and the dream?' Such a privileging of the state of childhood runs quite contrary to eighteenth-century perceptions. It also diverges from, while using, Christian allegories and symbolism.

Wordsworth's relationship to Christianity appears to have been easy, in his own mind at least. Although his poetry constantly utilizes the vocabulary of redemption and the healing of the soul through submission to a higher force, it does so through a secular version of the Protestant tradition of introspection, with its plain but confessional rhetoric of self-transformation; the poet wrote cheerfully to a clergyman who had questioned his devotion to Christ that he felt no particular need for a redeemer.

It is clear that Coleridge, by contrast, strove in both his writing and his work as a lay preacher for an accommodation of his experience and his philosophical learning to orthodox Christianity, an accommodation severely undermined by the intellectual discoveries of his poetry, no less than by his opium addiction. The introduction of the deity into the phenomenology of poems such as Frost at Midnight (1798) and The Eolian Harp (1796) seems dutiful and superfluous; Coleridge's most vital perceptions are coloured by fear, guilt and nightmare. Poems such as The Ancient Mariner and Kubla Khan are so rich in symbolism as to repudiate any attempt to tie their meaning down to a single set of symbols. Coleridge's poetry is less successful when the poet is, paradoxically, most able to formulate his beliefs clearly. This was certainly noticed by > P.B. Shelley, whose poem > Mont Blanc is (among its other activities) a critique of the belief-system underpinning an earlier poem by Coleridge, Hymn Before Sun-Rise, in the Vale of Chamouni.

Both poems are set in the vicinity of Mont Blanc, and take as their subject the relationship between the awe-inspiring turbulence of the landscape, and the human mind, searching for clues to the organization and purpose of existence in a scene that seems to promise revelation while dwarfing the individual observer. In the case of Coleridge, exclamatory and strained rhetoric becomes the platform for a hierarchical and conventional, almost Sunday School, understanding of the mountainous earth reaching upward towards a deity in the sky:

Thou too again, stupendous mountain! thou
That as I raise my head, awhile bowed low
In adoration, upward from thy base
Slow travelling with dim eyes suffused with tears..
Great Hierarch! tell thou the silent sky,
And tell the stars, and tell yon rising sun
Earth, with her thousand voices, praises GOD.

By contrast, Shelley visits the same scene to produce, in Mont Blanc, a text as complex, volatile and dense with activity as the landscape itself. Shelley has none of the guilt and anxiety that pushed Coleridge into acquiescent piety. Instead, his poem is a subtle but extraordinarily self-possessed disquisition on the nature of the relationship between human perception and the 'universe of things around', which in a sense masters the landscape by using it to illustrate what are in effect a series of philosophical positions:

The everlasting universe of things
Flows through the mind, and rolls its rapid waves,
Now dark – now glittering – now reflecting gloom –
Now lending splendour, where from secret springs
The source of human thought its tribute brings
Of waters, – with a sound but half its own,
Such as a feeble brook will oft assume
In the wild woods, among the mountains lone,
Where waterfalls around it leap for ever,
Where woods and winds contend, and a vast river
Over its rocks ceaselessly bursts and raves.

Mind and landscape mirror and echo each other, bring each other significance, as in Wordsworth's phenomenology. But if Wordsworth was led to muse reflectively on what is felt in the blood and felt along the heart, Shelley presents perception as a maelstrom. The individual mind may be 'a feeble brook', but the collective unconscious, the 'One Mind' as it would be conjured in \triangleright Prometheus Unbound, is not only the equal of the external landscape, but what finally gives it significance. There is no God to Shelley, and the poem is atheist. (A more protracted analysis might show that even Shelley's most vehemently materialist writing is never without a mystical inflection; but it is never one that conforms to religious orthodoxy, \hat{a} la Coleridge.)

Yet Coleridge's strongest poetry is very far from reaching definite conclusions about the nature of existence, let alone firm religious belief. Doubly sub-titled 'A Vision in a Dream' and 'A Fragment', Kubla Khan is best read as a collage of delightful and unfathomable mysteries, in which the reader-interpreter can wander at will without ever reaching a conclusion. As with much of the engaging literary work from this period, open-endedness or multiple, even undecideable meaning, becomes an attraction and a virtue – perhaps even a form of realism, as the world after the French Revolution seemed less stable and more malleable than before.

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With malls and towers were girdled round:
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;
And here were forests ancient as the hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

The Orient in English literature (see > Orientalism) tends to have been viewed ambiguously as despotic and barbarous, and therefore simpler than the West, and yet intricate, appealing to the senses, a canvas on which desires repressed by occidental culture and morals could be luridly brought to life. Do the Khan's decrees issue therefore from an absolute power, used on this occasion for benign purposes related to art and the imagination? Is it significant that X stands at the end of the alphabet, A at the beginning, and K in the middle, when the poem appears to be concerned with the origins, ending and centre of life? Does the Khan's miniature world of walls and towers and gardens symbolize the compartments of the mind? (And if so, why 'twice five miles of fertile ground'? Does 'five' have occult significance?)

Although the poem is only fifty-four lines long, what follows this – already exceedingly complex – opening takes the text in too many labyrinthine directions to be susceptible of neat analysis, in an essay of this length at least. Coleridge did nothing to solve the poem's mysteries by adding an account of its composition in an opium-reverie, in 'a lonely farmhouse between Porlock and Linton' in the West Country, after reading a seventeenth-century travel volume, Purchas' Pilgrimage, and in particular these phrases: 'Here the Khan Kubla commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground were inclosed with a wall.' So, that might account for the twice five miles. Coleridge stated that he composed (mentally) a poem between 'two to three hundred lines' in length, of which the fragment we have is all that he could commit to paper before some nameless 'person from Porlock' distracted the poet with mundane business, driving the delicate imagining of gardens of oriental delight clean out of his head. Unfortunately for Coleridge, modern scholarship has uncovered more than one draft of the poem, and the narrative has been proved untrue in other respects.

The poem, however, is in itself concerned with the fugitive and slippery nature of truth and knowledge, the disappearance of hard fact in fiction and dream, the inability of the wandering mind to envision a paradise other than in glimpses. All that Coleridge's explanatory narrative proves, finally, is that he did not know what he had got hold of. His poem had (whether through opium or not hardly matters) written itself; and no recourse to church and scripture could possibly accommodate its sinuous, oneiric puzzles, walled gardens and blind alleys. Just as Wordsworth's project to reintegrate human life into the larger world of Nature foundered on the very agent of reintegration, perception, stressing the reality of a solitary consciousness, so in Coleridge's poem the dreams dissolve into the pathos and vulnerable isolation of the single mind, haunted by dissolving palaces. 'A damsel with a dulcimer/ In a vision once I saw': could the poet hear her song once more, he would construct the Khan's dream-dome and get back to the Garden, the oriental Eden of imagination released from moral stricture:

Could I revive within me
Her symphony and song,
To such a deep delight 'twould win me,
That with music loud and long,
I would build that dome in air,
That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
And all who heard should see them there,
And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
Weave a circle round him thrice,
And close your eyes with holy dread,
For he on honey-dew hath fed,
And drunk the milk of Paradise.

The final images convey great beauty in their figure of the Poet as the incarnation of capable imagination, a construction lent considerable pathos and in a sense undone by the tenses of these magnificent final lines: "twould, 'would', 'should'. They signify wistfulness, incapability, impotence. The vitality and effectiveness of the poem are complicated but far from diminished by the tragic shadow cast over its visions of paradise. This time it was Shelley's turn to tread the same ground, but produce a weaker poem than Coleridge. His 'West Wind' ode uses key Coleridgean terms such as 'dome', 'vaulted', 'burst' and 'towers', and seeks to elevate the prophetic figure of the Poet to an unprecedented degree, but lacks the emotional dimension which is brought to Kubla Khan precisely through its failure to complete the projects it initiated. It might be concluded that while the paradise motif is, in some form or other, a feature of all key Romantic poems, the shadows cast over its attainability are as much the poetry's final subject as its more positive, visionary and revolutionary elements. The explosion of creativity in English poetry at this period involves the articulation of dream, doubt and vertigo, at least as much as it does the expression of optimism and achievement.

It was Coleridge's mixed gift and curse to be able to best illuminate the workings of human psychology through the drama of his own self-estrangement and baulked creativity. If the most affecting moments in Coleridge's poetry are to do with glimpsing visionary paradises and psychological hells (see Christabel in particular), his experience of writing was frequently purgatorial, a career of procrastination, unworkable projects and a reliance on the verbatim incorporation of the work of others that amounts to plagiarism. (The fullest treatment of these matters is still Norman Fruman's Coleridge: The Damaged Archangel, 1972. For an authoritative examination of Romantic poetry in relation to religious frames of thought, see M.H. Abrams' Natural Supernaturalism, 1971.)

> Thomas De Quincey's conjurations of a visionary paradise are similarly unorthodox, and similarly conditioned by an unshakeable addiction to opium. As the author of > Confessions of an English Opium Eater (1821; revised 1856), De Quincey has become the most celebrated drug-user in the canon of English literature. In fact he drank the drug in the form of laudanum, a solution of opium in wine or brandy. It was hard to judge the dosage; editors who complained of the illegibility or absence of certain words in De Quincey's manuscripts were not alluding to his mental state, directly; laudanum spilled from the wine glass he would have by him while writing was sufficiently acidic to burn through the ink. The author of the Confessions knew Coleridge well, though their relationship soured as De Quincey's fortunes declined. Discussion of their shared addiction was circumspect, and coloured by self-delusion as well as incomplete knowledge; opium was commonly available in the nineteenth century as a panacea for a wide range of conditions, but its addictive properties were not properly understood. Curiously, and again like Coleridge, De Quincey defines his sense of self through the textuality of hallucination to a degree that suggests the author would have been a hypersensitive dreamer, had he never touched drugs. Texts and the life outside them chase each other at speed in the Romantic period, and it is impossible to establish whether De Quincey wrote a drug-induced literature, now called Romantic, or whether the literary influences he followed (being a devoted and early admirer of Wordsworth and Coleridge) would have pushed his writing in certain directions with or without the drug.

Either way, his conjurations of paradisal flights of imagination in Confessions of an English Opium Eater are apt to turn hellish in an instant. The book is indebted to religious structures of thought, but the debt is complex and ironic. The daily ritual of opium-taking may have opened the doors to memory and imagination, but it was also a sinful and debilitating indulgence. The Confessions, as the title immediately suggests, both echo, parody and exceed in intellectual complexity those narratives of conversion such as those produced by sects like the Clapham Saints, of which the writer's mother was a member: 'Thou hast the keys of Paradise,' intones De Quincey, 'oh, just, subtle, and mighty opium!' Darkly witty, pedantically scholarly, suddenly acute in its proto-Freudian intuition of the importance of dreams, as labyrinthine and sonorous as a seventeenth-century sermon, revised and yet interminable, De Quincey's most important book is as orchidaceously peculiar as it is vital. In its way a spiritual autobiography, it resembles The Prelude, and in the mixture of drug-related orientalia, the terrors of the night and the pathos of the dreamer, it may be read as a prose sibling to Coleridge's more adventurous poems. The quotation that follows is long, of necessity:

Many years ago, when I was looking over Piranesi's Antiquities of Rome, Mr Coleridge, who was standing by, described to me a set of plates by that artist, called his Dreams, and which record the scenery of his own visions during the delirium of a fever. Some of them (I describe only from memory of Mr Coleridge's account) represented vast Gothic halls: on the floor of which stood all sorts of engines and machinery, wheels, cables, pulleys, levers, catapults, &c, &c, expressive of enormous power put forth and resistance overcome. Creeping along the sides of the walls, you perceived a staircase; and upon it, groping his way upwards, was Piranesi himself: follow the stairs a little further, and you perceive it come to a sudden abrupt termination, without any balustrade, and allowing no step onwards to him who had reached the extremity, except into the depths below. Whatever is to become of poor Piranesi, you suppose, at least, that his labours must in some way terminate here. But raise your eyes, and behold a second flight of stairs still higher: on which again Piranesi is perceived, by this time standing on the very brink of the abyss. Again elevate your eye, and a still more aerial flight of stairs is beheld: and again is poor Piranesi busy on his aspiring labours: and so on, until the unfinished stairs and Piranesi both are lost in the upper gloom of the hall — With the same power of endless growth and self-reproduction did my architecture proceed in dreams. In the early stage of my malady, the splendours of my dreams were chiefly architectural: and I beheld such pomp of cities and palaces as was never yet beheld by the waking eye, unless in the clouds.

The central allusion is to the eighteenth-century engraver, Giovanni Battista Piranesi. The plates referred to as the 'Dreams' were in truth entitled 'Imaginary Prisons', and they show classical dungeons, rather than the distinctly Gothic architecture described by De Quincey. This is in the literary sense a heavily > Gothic passage, however: it resembles the currently fashionable puzzle-drawings and trompe l'oeil labyrinths of M.C. Escher, as the figure of poor Piranesi appears and reappears in constant aspiring labour, but it has none of the cool interest in mathematics and draughtsmanship that underpins Escher's eyecatching conundrums. The passage is full of self-directed pathos, and the figure of Piranesi is clearly intended to reflect on the figure of Coleridge, both standing finally as versions of De Quincey, trapped in his own mind between paradisal flights of aspiring imagination, and the Gothic 'malady' of his addiction to drugs and the fleeting dreams they bring. The mixture of orotundity, pathos, a sense of claustrophobic imprisonment coupled with sudden and dizzying release into the fantastic, is typical of his writing. But so is the psychological and analytical acuity: the Confessions is in many ways a theoretical work on the nature and importance of dreams.

De Quincey is a 'second generation' Romantic writer, who as a teenager had written an admiring letter to his hero, Wordsworth, and who in sense would always write within the parameters that the first generation had laid down. The next section will be concerned with the poets of the second generation, who variously prolonged, modified and questioned the tenets of Wordsworth and Coleridge.

Ш

The second generation

The importance of paradises lost and found runs through the major poetry of the three chief figures in what might be termed the second generation of Romantic poets, > John Keats, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and George Gordon, Lord Byron. Racking up phenomenal scores as a fornicator with both sexes in that earthly paradise, Venice, 'mad, bad, and dangerous to know' in the words of his equally wild ex-lover Lady Caroline Lamb, and the partial source for literary vampires from Polidori's Lord Ruthven to Stoker's Count Dracula, it was Byron whose conduct most publicly and flagrantly departed from Christian norms and ideals. Yet it is Byron whose poetic questionings of the beginnings and ends of human life are most apt to leave the door open to religious answers, though not to a religious faith. The rhetorical mode of Don Juan is of a predominantly comic scepticism, tinged with moments of sober doubt. His paradises tend to be exotic and geographical, such as the island in the poem of that name (a reworking of the story of Fletcher Christian's mutiny on 'The Bounty') or the far-flung locations of parts of Don Juan. (For a rereading of Byron's poetry that lays more stress on the proto-religious nature of his thinking, see Bernard Beatty's Don Juan, 1984.)

Byron was made famous by > Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812-18), a long and often sprawling poem in four Cantos, whose exotic locations and Hamlet-like musings on passion and mutability appealed by virtue of a turbulent self-centredness, characteristic of the time. As an image of alarm and fascination to the English imagination, the collective upheaval of the French Revolution had been replaced by the egotism and expansionist aims of > Napoleon Bonaparte. Byron, the only Romantic poet to have a first-hand knowledge of armed conflict, was half-drawn to a figure he saw as fated, as tragic, yet as mastering a world of hard political actualities and the struggle for power. The more floridly rhetorical and dandyish passages in Byron have served to conceal a more sober and historically analytical intelligence with a distinctively British (and rather eighteenth-century) respect for hard fact. The ideological conflicts of his age are expressed through Byron's writing and his conduct; a libertine who had his daughter educated in a convent, a Regency fop with a liking for physically dangerous escapades, an aristocrat who backed popular uprisings. Most paradoxical of all, although the persona of the writing is the most bluff and British of the Romantic poets, it is Byron who immersed himself in European politics and culture and who has had perhaps more influence on the course of European writing than any other English poet from > Shakespeare to the present day.

Byron's writing is inseparable from the figure of the man himself – or, rather, the man he invented as the Lord Byron he wished people to see. Darkly glamorous (if club-footed), exuding sexual magnetism (including an incestuous relationship with his half-sister Augusta), he was a product as well as a producer of literary genres: part Gothic, part neo-Augustan wit. Nothing in the world of Don Juan is safe from bathetic deflation, yet the hectic pace and love of the incongruous are tied to a sense of life's limitations and frailty:

I would to heaven that I were so much clay,
As I am blood, bone, marrow, passion, feeling —
Because at least the past were pass'd away
And for the future — (but I write this reeling,
Having got drunk exceedingly today,
So that I seem to stand upon the ceiling)
I say — the future is a serious matter —
And so — for God's sake — hock and soda-water!

Byron was the most doubtful of the Romantic poets as to the value of what the first generation had done. Canto Three of Childe Harold does (as Wordsworth indignantly complained) rely in part on a Wordsworthian view of Nature; but this was due to Shelley's (temporary) influence. Byron was sceptical about revolution, and about any kind of ecstasy beyond the momentary loss of self in sex. More heartfelt than Childe Harold's verdict on Wordsworthian landscape are these cutting lines from Don Juan:

And Wordsworth, in a rather long 'Excursion'
(I think the quarto holds five hundred pages)
Has given a sample from the vasty version
Of his new system to perplex the sages;
'Tis poetry – at least by his assertion,
And may appear so when the dog-star rages –

And he who understands it would be able To add a story to the tower of Babel.

This is wonderfully accomplished satire, however (deliberately) flip and callow; but it is also instructive, in a cautionary way. If we could go back in time, to interrogate Byron or Wordsworth, neither would understand the label 'Romantic'; the term stands for a historical-cum-critical mapping operation, that has more to do with the twentieth century than the highly individualistic standpoints from which these authors felt themselves to be writing at the time. But then individualism is the cardinal tenet of Romanticism.

Not so much famous as infamous, P.B. Shelley was Byron's friend but in many respects his antitype. Shelley prided himself on the observational accuracy of his poetry, be it in the meteorological aspect of his paean to revolution, Ode to the West Wind (1819), the domestic bric-à-brac of the urbane Letter to Maria Gisborne (1820), or the stormy landscape of Mont Blanc (1816). However, Shelley's preferred things are things on the move: wave-effects, clouds, dawn, things captured just as they are about to turn into something else:

Maidens and youths fling their wild arms in air As their feet twinkle; they recede, and now Bending within each other's atmosphere, Kindle invisibly, and as they glow Like moths by light attracted and repelled, Oft to their bright destruction come and go, Till like two clouds into one vale impelled, That shake the mountains when their lightnings mingle And die in rain - the fiery band which held Their natures, snaps - while the shock still may tingle; One falls and then another in the path Senseless - nor is the desolation single, Yet ere I can say where - the chariot hath Passed over them - nor other trace I find But as of foam after the ocean's wrath Is spent upon the desert shore . . . while the shock still may tingle (The Triumph of Life)

In one sense this is a delicate but mordant evocation of the basic human narrative of attraction, courtship, sexual union, down to the last sad stains of exchanged bodily fluids ('foam after the ocean's wrath/ Is spent') in the miniature death that follows sex . . . before the whole cycle starts up again. Shelley's is a world-weary yet compassionate summary of the most pleasant aspect of humanity's animal side; and, as always, the writing reflects on language itself and the capacities and limitations of poetry, which also allows a wild dance and copulation of verbal energies – leaving little more than spent foam behind. The Triumph of Life was Shelley's last, unfinished poem, and although its last line – "Then, what is life?" I said' – would stand as a motto for all his work, the earlier work is frequently more sanguine, and convinced of the rightness of political struggle along proto-socialist lines.

The genial Letter to Maria Gisborne attempts, as the poetry of Wordsworth often does, to offer an Edenic perception of things seen as if for the first time. However, the brilliant quirkiness and rapidity of movement in the verse are as distant from Wordsworth's meditative steadiness as they are from Byron's tolling rhetoric. Where Byron, typically, works from things out to a larger world-view, and Wordsworth sets self and landscape in a rolling phenomenological circularity, Shelley's world-view is more radically intellectualized and conceptual; things, in Shelley, are there to illustrate ideas. That may make him sound curiously eighteenth century, and a poem such as the Letter does put a quasi-Augustan urbanity and tact back into poetic circulation. In crucial respects, however, the relationship of image to idea in Shelley breaks new ground in English poetry, while utilizing in altered form the innovations of the first generation Romantics. Specifically, it is important to see that neither the 'things', the poetic images, nor the ideas they illustrate, are static. Language misses its mark, that of static representation, but in so doing generates new ideas: indeed, this is the theme of Epipsychidion (1821), consequently one of Shelley's most frantic yet intensely reasoned poems.

The poem is concerned with a beautiful teenage girl of the Shelleys' acquaintance, one Emilia Viviani, locked up in a convent by her parents while they sought out a suitable huband-to-be. Whatever the depths or shallows of the poet's affection for her, Emilia certainly made the ideal subject for a Shelley poem, bearing in her incarceration the related scars inflicted by church, class, gender, parents and marriage. Shelley loved to scandalize, and Epipsychidion contains some of his most acrid satire on the condition of wedlock. A reader might have expected it to contain a portrait of Emilia, but - and here the poem's central and more theoretical concerns come into view – the poem is partly about the failure of words to do their author's bidding. Words can describe, sketch, characterize, depict; do anything but actually be what they refer to. And yet the act of writing or speaking lets words develop their own life, on the page or in the mouth. Within the space of fifty lines, Emilia is called 'Seraph of Heaven', 'Sweet Benediction', a 'Moon', a 'Star', a 'Wonder', a 'Mirror', a 'Lute' and many other things, until the speaker concludes, 'I measure the world of fancies, seeking one like thee, / And find - alas! mine own infirmity.' Emilia's humanity dissolves under the impact of 'failed' language, until she becomes a part of it, and is resurrected as achieved metaphor:

> A Metaphor of Spring and Youth and Morning; A Vision like incarnate April, warning With smiles and tears, Frost the Anatomy Into his summer grave.

The mutability and uncontrollable fluidity of language has become a virtue. Nothing in Shelley comes nearer the concept of paradise than this, the condition of metaphor itself.

Shelley's is a deceptive and difficult poetry. Early editions of this poem were small – 100 copies or so – and he had few admirers outside the immediate circle of Byron, > Mary Shelley, and the other members of the 'Pisan Circle'. With the honourable exception of > Swinburne, poets of the next generation would fail to rise to the challenge of his work. His Victorian successors disliked Shelley's morals, ignored his politics, and wilfully misread his fiery lyricism as ardent but insubstantial. To Matthew Arnold, famously, Shelley was 'a beautiful and ineffectual angel, beating in the void his luminous wings in vain'. That unfortunate and prejudiced assessment was effectively perpetuated by T.S. Eliot and F.R. Leavis in the earlier part of this century. The poet's reputation would only rise again in the 1930s, when Shelley's atheism, pacifism, call for universal suffrage and free love found sympathetic ears in the Auden generation. The proto-socialist Shelley, with whom Paul Foot's book Red Shelley (1984) is concerned, shows through clearly in a poem such as \triangleright The Mask of Anarchy (1819), with its unique mixture of political allegory and the aggressive simplicity of cartoon.

A more comprehensive assessment of Shelley's achievements that takes account of his subtlety and range begins with the post-1945 generation of American critics – Earl Wasserman, M.H. Abrams – and reaches a kind of apotheosis in Shelley's adoption by the Yale Deconstructionists (> Jacques Derrida, > Paul de Man, > Harold Bloom, J. Hillis Miller and > Geoffrey Hartman) who took Shelley's The Triumph of Life, unfinished at the time of his death, as the catalyst for a collection of essays on the (by these critical lights) interconnected topics of absence, death and writing (Harold Bloom, ed., Deconstruction and Criticism, 1979). This book contains a remarkable essay by the late Paul de Man, whose writings on Romanticism, collected in Blindness and Insight (1983) and The Rhetoric of Romanticism (1984), are among the most incisive pieces of criticism on the subject to have appeared in recent years.

De Man's model of Romantic literary practice is set down in a crucial essay of 1969, 'The Rhetoric of Temporality' (collected in Blindness and Insight). All of his subsequent writing on poetry would make a modified return to the postulates of this essay. The argument, too subtle and full to be susceptible to paraphrase on this occasion, identifies symbolism with the Romantic urge towards idealism, and towards an organicist world-view. Wordsworth's drive to reintegrate the human self into Nature, or Coleridge's divinizing of poetic utterance, would be examples of this. Allegory, the expression in rhetoric of temporality, undercuts the symbol and undoes Romantic ambition. As death, loss, change, meaninglessness - summarized by the word 'temporality' - are unavoidable forces in human existence, so even the most idealist literary text will disclose them on the page in spite of its intentions. In Wordsworth's case, for example, it is precisely a form of idealism that deconstructs his leanings towards pantheism, the attempted immersion of the self into a wider, cosmic Self. A basic contradiction runs through Wordsworth's presentation of the self, and other selves. The urge to lose discrete identity in something larger is countered by a radical prioritization of the ego, and so, to return to the admiring exclamation of Hazlitt's with which this essay began, we can see that what appeared to be a statement about Nature and then seemed to be as much a statement about perception, may finally be an egotistical statement about one man's perceptions. The lines from the Tintern Abbey poem quoted earlier may similarly be seen to deconstruct their own phenomenology of integrated subject - object relations by a stress on the selfcentredness of experience. As de Man notes, 'Since the assertion of a radical priority of the subject over objective nature is not easily compatible with the poetic praxis of the Romantic poets, who all gave a great deal of importance to the presence of nature, a certain degree of confusion ensues.'

It will be clear that my own readings of Romantic texts are far from unfriendly to the kind of literary deconstruction that Paul de Man theorized and practised; the essay by Philip Shaw in this volume offers a more committed enquiry along de Manian lines. However, it may be worth taking issue with de Man's term 'confusion', perhaps suggesting that contradiction of meaning in Romantic texts may be a part of their conscious rather than unconscious activity. Deconstruction, like many schools of literary theory, produces its most startling results on texts which can be shown to be innocent of its approach; the nineteenth-century novel, for example. Problems arise with texts from two periods – the Romantic, and the contemporary. Contemporary literature may be written by the university-educated individual below a certain age, who may have studied literary theory, and be capable of meeting its approach forewarned and forearmed. Without suggesting that the English Romantic poets anticipated recent literary theory and braced themselves to meet it a couple of hundred years avant le lettre, it could still be argued that a strongly self-reflexive element in the poetry indicates that deconstruction might be viewed as a modern development of Romanticism, rather than as its anatomist.

The linguistic self-consciousness shown by > Keats, for example, is hardly less than that shown by the Yale Deconstructionists (and some of his puns are as bad as Derrida's). Of all the poets from the period covered by this guide, John Keats is the writer who registers with the most lyrical poignancy the discrepancy between a paradise glimpsed, and a paradise attained. The idealistic urge to break through the confining fabric of the everyday to reach a higher or an eternal realm recurs in his poetry at all levels. It operates in miniature in Keats' use of synaesthesia - that is, the expression of experience by one of the senses in the language of one or more of the others. Examples abound, and include such lines from > Hyperion as 'Let the rose glow intense and warm in the air', a relatively gentle conflation of the visual and the tactile. Conflation turns to deliberate confusion in these lines from Isabella, a poem that skirts the ludicrous in other respects: 'O turn thee to the very tale,' And taste the music of that vision pale'; here taste, sound and sight are pushed into a weird overlap. Keats is not above a feverish and discordant levity, as in the redundant puns that are scattered throughout the Ode on a Grecian Urn (> Odes, Keats'), or the mixture of an arch tone and rabidly Gothic material that we see elsewhere. (Readers searching for a rationale behind the oddities in Keats' poetry should consult Christopher Ricks, Keats and Embarrassment, 1984.) But something more purposeful seems to underpin even the strangest of his synaesthetic conjunctions; for, after all, if the reader is able to stretch and bend habitual ways of seeing in order to accommodate an intensified or novel sensation at the level of metaphor, he or she may be prepared to do so in other spheres of life. Unlike Shelley or Byron, Keats had no real interest in political theory beyond the general openness to radical and libertarian thought that was current among intellectuals of his time. His idealism is centred on not the external world but the world of the senses, and the degree to which experience may or may not empathize or give itself over to what is outside itself, and with what consequences. Some theoretical reflections on this propensity for extreme and creative self-abandon that marks out the 'chameleon poet' were set down in a letter by Keats, from which the phrase 'negative capability' has come to summarize this vital aspect of his practice as a poet:

... several things dovetailed in my mind, and at once it struck me, what quality went to form a Man of Achievment especially in Literature & which Shakespeare possessed so enormously – I mean Negative Capability, that is when man is capable of being in uncertainties, Mysteries, doubts, without any irritable reaching after fact and reason . . .

The poet should be prepared at all times to surrender to the instant of experience, without allowing the limitations of rationality or morality to get in the way of imaginative immersion in the instant. Here can be seen Keats' utter rejection of the precepts of Augustanism, and his leaning towards an art for art's sake, promoted after his death by Pre-Raphaelite and related spirits: Dante Gabriel Rossetti, or A.C. Swinburne. The association of ▷ Shakespeare with Negative Capability is very much in tune with a series of lectures on the English poets given by Hazlitt, at the Surrey Institution, at which Keats was a keen attender. He would certainly have heard Hazlitt say of Shakespeare that 'He was nothing in himself . . . He had only to think of anything in order to become that thing . . .'

Empathy is then a crucial factor in Keats' attempts to construct or find a paradise, as is clear from a brief survey of certain of the Odes. In the Ode on a Grecian Urn, the speaker is held by the propensity of art to keep in a frozen eternity what would otherwise die:

Fair youth beneath the trees, thou canst not leave
Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold lover, never, never canst thou kiss,
Though winning near the goal – yet do not grieve:
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

The melancholy paradox on which the poem turns is that while positive experiences held for eternity constitute paradise, negative experience held for eternity spells death: for example, the garlanded heifer about to be slaughtered, later in the poem, may spend eternity in that odd condition, and the 'little town', emptied of its inhabitants, will be silent 'for evermore'.

The urn is not the subject so much as the catalyst of the poem; it could not be 'shifted round', turned in the hand like the marble urn of the Ode on Indolence. Rather it is the trigger for a flight into Negative Capability, into which (to return to Keats' original definition) an 'irritable reaching after fact and reason' necessarily intrudes, puncturing the ideal with logic. Keats, regretfully, leaves the world of the urn to its 'Cold pastoral'. A 'friend to man', it is still non-human despite being a product of human creativity in an idealist mode: in the urn's frieze, nothing can die, whereas in the larger world over which mortality holds sway, death is everywhere; and yet paradoxically it is our knowledge of death that quickens a more intense appreciation of life. The poem's closing motto 'Beauty is truth, truth beauty', has been the recipient of an untoward amount of competitive excavation by critics, but we should remember that this is the urn talking. A poem from the mid-1970s, John Ashbery's Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror, exists in a Romantic tradition descending partly from Keats, and also concerns a work of art whose lessons for the living present are both profound and partial:

This is what the portrait says.

But there is in that gaze a combination

Of tenderness, amusement and regret, so powerful

In its restraint that one cannot look for long.

The secret is too plain. The pity of it smarts,

Makes hot tears spurt: that the soul is not a soul,

Has no secret, is small, and it fits

Its hollow perfectly: its room, our moment of attention.

As with Wordsworth and John Keats, the questing gaze that seeks in artwork or anything else outside the self an empathetic negation of the ego that might be the key to some larger understanding finds itself returned to itself. The Renaissance self-portrait by Parmigianino which triggers Ashbery's meditation has no reality outside 'our moment of attention', and art, it is conceded, proposes only consolatory strategies for dealing with the fight against time and mortality. Much has changed in the history of poetry between Keats' time and Ashbery's, but a certain transhistorical continuity, a persistence of Romanticism, suggests that the break between modernist and Romantic poetry is still not as great as the historical and epistemological rupture between Augustan verse and the activities of Wordsworth and Coleridge.

Where a negation of the ego in life may be fraught with problems, death may provide the ultimate abandonment of self to what is other. In Keats' Ode to a Nightingale, what might be termed death's analogue, death as a seductive narcotic causing loss of consciousness, is imaged in the speaker hearing the nightingale's song:

Darkling, I listen; and, for many a time
I have been half in love with easeful Death,
Called him soft names in many a mused rhyme,
To take into the air my quiet breath;
Now more than ever seems it rich to die,
To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
In such an ecstasy.

Here the very attention to natural detail which had characterized Wordsworth's poetry or the paintings of Friedrich and Constable is wilfully abandoned in preference to a condition of not-seeing, again a Negative Capability, a resting in uncertainties. Eventually the dream is broken and the poetic voice returned to earth, as if from a drug-experience: 'Was it a vision, or a waking dream?' Fled is that music . . . Do I wake or sleep?'

The speaker of the 'Nightingale' ode is left at last in a twilight zone, neither the realm of the everyday, nor quite the realm of the nightingale's song. Rather this is a borderline state of consciousness, arrived at by accident, but resembling what a later generation of writers, in the 1890s, would aim for on purpose; a state where, to excerpt from Arthur Symons' manifesto for a Decadent Movement in Literature (see > Nineties Poets), 'the unseen world is no longer a dream, and the visible world no longer a reality'. Suppose however that consciousness were to be trapped in a twilight zone which was as repetitively circular as that of the urn, as close to death as the world of the 'Nightingale' ode, and yet without any of the consolations of either poem? To depict a world where the unseen is no longer a dream and the visible no longer a reality, is exactly the world of one of Keats' most important poems, La Belle Dame sans Merci. The speaker of most of the poem's stanzas, the knight-at-arms, may be read not as a proponent but as a victim of Negative Capability:

O what can ail thee, knight-at-arms, Alone and palely loitering? The sedge has withered from the lake, And no birds sing.

II

O what can ail thee, knight-at-arms, So haggard and so woe-begone? The squirrel's granary is full, And the harvest's done.

III

I see a lily on thy brow, With anguish moist and fever-dew, And on thy cheeks a fading rose Fast withereth too.

IV

I met a lady in the meads, Full beautiful – a faery's child, Her hair was long, her foot was light, And her eyes were wild.

V

I made a garland for her head,
And bracelets too, and fragrant zone;
She looked at me as she did love,
And made sweet moan.

VI

I set her on my pacing steed,
And nothing else saw all day long,
For sidelong would she bend, and sing
A faery's song.

VII

She found me roots of relish sweet, And honey wild, and manna-dew, And sure in language strange she said – 'I love thee true'.

VIII

She took me to her elfin grot,
And there she wept and sighed full sore,
And there I shut her wild wild eyes
With kisses four.

IX

And there she lullèd me asleep

And there I dreamed – Ah! woe betide! –

The latest dream I ever dreamt On the cold hill side.

I saw pale kings and princes too,
Pale warriors, death-pale were they all;
They cried - 'La Belle Dame sans Merci
Thee hath in thral!!'

XI

I saw their starved lips in the gloam, With horrid warning gapèd wide, And I awoke and found me here, On the cold hill's side.

XII

And this is why I sojourn here
Alone and palely loitering,
Though the sedge is withered from the lake,
And no birds sing.
(La Belle Dame sans Merci. A Ballad)

Like a number of poems of this time – Shelley's > Ozymandias and Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, for example – La Belle Dame begins with a feint, the inclusion of a speaker who will not be the poem's real subject. The shared rationale for this might lie in stressing the depth of the gulf that can stretch between one human consciousness and another, with only language as the tightrope between; that, certainly, is the miserable lesson the knight has learned, or perhaps refuses to learn, but is still condemned to reiterate. He has been struck a devastating psychic blow, by being drawn up from the real world and, as it were, shot into paradise by an erotic obsession with a woman who may be a lamia, a vampire, a femme fatale, and therefore false. He is now trapped in a typically Keatsian twilight zone, alone and palely loitering, the onset of winter in the external world in effect an attribute of his wintry consciousness. Still half in love, he cannot go forward and resume his place in the real world; but he cannot go back, as paradise has turned into brutal awakening on the cold hill's side. Of all Keats' protagonists and voices, the knight in this poem is most a victim.

In a horrible and ironic sense, he is a victim of Negative Capability; he is compelled to rest in mysteries and uncertainties, and has no fact or reason for which to reach, irritably or otherwise. No reasons are given for La Belle Dame's conduct, and nothing we are told helps either the knight or the reader. Unlike Coleridge's Mariner, Keats' knight may leave the reader sadder, but no wiser. The view of the world implied by this text is darkly ironic, to say the least: we have freedom to act as individuals, but that may signify the chance to become ensnared. The experience of falling into the paradise of love is common – the hillside is littered with courtly predecessors to the knight – but each must travel through life alone, and none may truly help another. Peril lies in unexpected places. Perhaps the image of a knight is a fanciful externalization of exactly that state of consciousness; armed to the teeth, except against the one weapon that can penetrate armour, loss of self-possession. That abandonment of the self to empathy with the other, be it the lover or Nature, that began with Wordsworth and Coleridge, is here brought to its most vertiginous and ironic potential for danger, in the poetry of Keats.

IV

William Blake

That these matters did not entirely originate with Wordsworth and Coleridge, to be passed on to the second generation, is clear from an examination of the poems of William Blake, barely known in his own lifetime. To be sure, Blake's poetry is thoroughly perfused with Christian narrative and symbolism, but his revision of orthodox morality is as rigorously corrosive as the acid that he would apply to metal plates to fashion his engravings, while his liking for subversive epigrams and dialectical play runs as contrary to conventional reasoning as the skill in writing backward that Blake had to develop in order to incorporate his poetry onto the plates.

The early twentieth-century tendency to view Blake as an artist working in different media, literary and pictorial, undermines his intention to produce one multiform, prophetic art which would operate in the verbal and visual fields simultaneously. For example, the interplay of signification between the poems and the engravings in his > Songs of Innocence and of Experience (1789, 1794) is often complex and ironic. The lyric beginning 'Tyger, tyger, burning bright,/ In the forests of the night' is a common anthology piece, resonating for most readers with a sense of Romantic lyricism as celebrating the more frightening and beautiful forms of life and Nature; yet the accompanying picture of the Tyger shows a sheepish and oddly diffident little beast. A similar restlessness and deployment of reversed logic inhabits all of Blake's thought, from the shocking 'Proverbs of Hell' in > The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, such as 'Sooner murder an infant in its cradle than nurse unacted desires', to his snarling attacks on church and clergy, as in The Garden of Love from the Songs of Innocence and of Experience:

I went to the Garden of Love,
And saw what I never had seen:
A Chapel was built in the midst,
Where I used to play on the green.
And the gates of this Chapel were shut,
And 'Thou shalt not' writ over the door;
So I turn'd to the Garden of Love
That so many sweet flowers bore,
And I saw it was filled with graves,
And tomb-stones where flowers should be;
And Priests in black gowns were walking their rounds,
And binding with briars my joys & desires.

In this case, the thrust of Blake's argument is, by his standards, relatively direct. The lost paradise of The Garden of Love is an Edenic vision of happily promiscuous sexuality ('so many sweet flowers'), and the agents of repression are identified as the uniformed priesthood, 'walking their rounds' to police human desire. It is possible to argue not so much against this reading of the poem, as against the attitudes held by its speaker. Blake is a provocative poet, who wants the reader to argue back. It could be pointed out that no flowers last forever, and that the whole world is 'filled with graves': not even the most resolute libertarian can stave off mortality; and isn't it death that most forcefully binds our 'joys & desires', rather than the church, which does at least address itself to life-and-death matters? But in that case it might be pardonable to gather rosebuds, or 'sweet flowers', while ye may, and the case for a Romantic insurrection that pits natural desire against institutionalized repression asserts its paradisal energy once more. Such a revolving spectrum of argument is characteristic of Blake's restless engagement with ideology.

The generation of meaning in texts by Blake is generally less straightforward, however, and his investment in contrariety on principle results in lines as multidirectional as Wordsworth's, but so supercharged with possible significations as to become gnomic and opaque. The final lines of London are superbly resonant, but hard to pin down:

But most thro' midnight streets I hear How the youthful Harlot's curse Blasts the new born Infant's tear, And blights with plagues the Marriage hearse.

Are the effects of the prostitute's curse good or bad? Perhaps infected herself with a sexually transmitted 'plague', does she 'blast' her own child's chances of a future by passing on the disease; or is the blasting away of a tear a cleansing, symbolically bracing, even a revolutionary rousing of the underclass to political action? This last reading seems to be confirmed by the attitude to the priesthood shown in The Garden of Love. Here can be seen a paradox central to the operations of Romantic poetry from Blake to Shelley: the greater the scope of the poetry in terms of topic, the more distant its language from customary usage. (This was something that troubled Byron: the drift of linguistic experiment into solipsism was something he debated on the page and in person with Shelley, patronized in Keats, and diagnosed in Wordsworth and Coleridge, the butts of satire in Don Juan.) In the twentieth century, such tendentious obscurity and a multiplication of meaning as we find in Blake has alternately been thought pleasurable and intrinsic to poetic practice, and a sign of alienation or bad writing. T.S. Eliot undervalued Romantic poetry, preferring the allegedly more unified expressiveness of the ⊳ Elizabethan and ⊳ Jacobean periods. F.R. Leavis followed him in undervaluing Shelley, and indicted Blake for manifesting the estrangement of an auto-didact, cut off from the nurturing influence of a literary community. This echoes Eliot's nostalgia for an age when writing counted. However, Eliot's diagnosis of a 'dissociation of sensibility', a Fall from this organic community around the time of > Milton, is ironically itself a Romanticization of a historical change in the relationship between writer, audience, patronage and the means of production, which might be more accurately understood through materialist analysis of the period concerned, rather than idealized as an expression of being.

One revaluation of the Romantics begins in the 1940s, itself a period in which a form of Romanticism – dubbed the school of the 'New Apocalypse' – flourished briefly in the work of such British poets as David Gascoyne and George Barker. Critically, revaluation reached its apogee with the work of literary theorists such as Harold Bloom, Geoffrey Hartman and Paul de Man, whose writing from roughly 1960 to 1980 moves from New Criticism to deconstruction. This move, mediated by the impact of > psychoanalytical, > Marxist and > structuralist theory on American teaching of English literature, involved a shift from viewing the generation in a poem of multiple or undecideable meaning as intentional, to seeing it as an inevitable side-effect of linguistic expression. It may be that in the Fall from various versions of paradise conjured in Romantic poetry can be seen the imagistic expression of what is at root a linguistic Fall, the slippage of expression from intention, of signifier from signified. It may be that literary criticism has now caught up with Romantic poetry, by showing how language, like all human dream-forms, is condemned to make and break itself.

The persistence of Romanticism

An historically limited view of Romanticism would declare it to be a bounded movement, that began (with influences as diverse as the French Revolution and the German tale of terror) with the early poetry of Wordsworth and Coleridge, and concluded with the death of ⊳ Sir Walter Scott in 1832. By these lights, Victorian literature, with the burgeoning primacy of the novel, would be thought to move into a new era of ethical rather than egotistical writing, the question as to how we should live replacing the Romantic agony of who we are. The novels of > Iane Austen, with which this Introduction has not dealt, might therefore be seen as important precursors of what was to come, given their emphasis on marriage and social positioning, actualities rather than dreams and desires. And yet the Victorian period, from the frequently luscious and oneiric poetry of ⊳ Tennyson, Swinburne and the Pre-Raphaelites through to the Decadent poets of the 1800s, is replete with the kind of concerns that exercised Keats. The professions of artistic impersonality that accompany the seminal modernist works by T.S. Eliot, Wyndham Lewis and others by no means account for texts such as The Waste Land in their entirety; and the high modernist period was succeeded by literature of the 1930s, where dreams of a socialist utopia, as well as an interest in > Freud, maintain a line of descent from the writing of Shelley and his generation. The bardic lyricism of the 1940s, the bulk of modern American poetry, and the 1960s cult of the self all confirm the persistence of Romanticism. The literature of Romanticism was persistent in conjuring ways through which the articulate self could empathize with something or someone outside, and was as persistently driven back into ironies and paradoxes that questioned that intention, while providing some of the most recurrently engaging and vital writings of the last two hundred years. As readers and writers of the 1990s, we are still situated in important ways within the questions that body of writing has posed.

11 Death Strolls Between Letters: Romantic Poetry and Literary Theory

Philip Shaw

I

But where has art led us? To a time before the world, before the beginning. It has cast us out of our power to begin and to end; it has turned us towards the outside where there is no intimacy, no place to rest. It has led us into the infinite migration of error. For we seek art's essence, and it lies where the nontrue admits of nothing essential ... It ruins the origin by returning to it the errant immensity of directionless eternity.

(Maurice Blanchot, The Space of Literature, 1955)

What does it mean to speak 'before the beginning'; to be out of power; to be placed in exile; to have no truth beyond the sorrow of straying?

I will answer with a further question. Do we approach the 'essence' of art from the direction of literature or of philosophy? In this essay I will assume the necessity of both, not because the paths of literature and philosophy are indistinguishable – they are not, and we would be wrong to remove the distinctions that separate them – but because in the poetry of the Romantic period the two are often dangerously intertwined. The dream of Romanticism is a discourse that will encapsulate both. On the one hand, as > S.T. Coleridge puts it, we see the technical process of 'just distinction' belonging to philosophical method; on the other the 'spirit of unity' characteristic of the creative Imagination (> Biographia Literaria, 1817). What the 'synthetic' power of Imagination effects, however, is far removed from this dream. The clash of unity with distinction, 'of sameness, with difference, of the general with the concrete, the idea with the image', is not resolved in the Romantic enterprise. And Coleridge is painfully aware of this fault. His imagination reveals itself in the flawed words and stubborn sounds of the philosophically imperfect.

To think through literature, therefore, we run the risk of repeating a great Romantic error. But that, I would argue, is our fate; for in a sense we are still Romantics, still subjects of an epoch whose 'essence lies where the nontrue admits of nothing essential'. In this sense to repeat is to err; but it is also to remind ourselves that our authenticity has its origin in what is useless, indefinite and nontrue. The Romantic epoch is 'born', to adapt > Byron, 'from the knowledge of its own desert' (> Manfred, 1817). Here the key terms are wandering, anarchy and exile. In Romanticism, we encounter the world not as our home but as a nomadic labyrinth; a space that is truly infinite, without arche or telos, beginning or end. If truth depends on limits, on the assumption of foundations and of regulated and well-defined boundaries, then to think in this space is to commit thought to the inevitability of error. No wonder that Byron, in common with many Romantic poets, is derided for his lack of clarity, since to support this view one must cease to think in terms of the rational and the real. One must commit oneself to an event over which critical thought no longer has any control.

But from whence do we derive this rhetoric of ambiguity? In a highly influential essay, 'Literature and the Right to Death' (1949) (collected in The Gaze of Orpheus, 1981), Maurice Blanchot presents an analogy between literature and revolutionary action. What literature and revolution share, he argues, is a desire for the absolute: the absolute of history, the absolute of knowledge, the absolute of subjective experience – the ultimate expression of which is the absolute purity of annihilation. Literature and revolution therefore accomplish themselves in the 'freedom' of death. For Blanchot, this is the meaning of the > French Revolution. The subject is liberated from external bonds (the law of tutelage); critical thought is urged on by the giddiness of the event. The modern age begins.

Two impulses are born here: on the one hand the Kantian ideals of human progress and subjective autonomy (freedom from external control through the exercise of reason); on the other hand the eruption of systematic violence allied to the bloodlust of the emergent collective (freedom from reason itself, an act of pure will). The theatre of modern consciousness begins, so to speak, with the affirmation of a convulsive duality. It stages this dualism in the tensional relation between literature and philosophy. As reason finds its justification in the progressive impulse of revolution, artistic activity is confirmed in the liberation of terror. The task in this essay, therefore, will be to unleash the latent violence of the Romantic poem so that reason may be forced to a confrontation with a range of excluded others: the random, the aberrant, the mystical and the absurd.

If philosophy attempts to explain the world in terms of unity, cohesion and universals, Romantic poetry helps us to think the unthinkable. To do so, however, requires an act as irrational as the fall of a blade; a revolt that commits thought to the infinite migration of (t)error.

П

Whence that completed form of all completeness?

Whence came that high perfection of all sweetness?

(▷ Keats, ▷ Endymion, 1, 606-7, 1818)

Why a theory of Romanticism? On the back cover of The Literary Absolute: The Theory of Literature in German Romanticism (1988), the authors Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe and Jean-Luc Nancy make the following statement:

Romanticism is first of all a theory. And the invention of literature. More precisely, it constitutes the inaugural moment of literature as production of its own theory – and of theory that thinks itself as literature. With this gesture, it opens the critical age to which we still belong.

With the epoch of Romanticism we reach the stage where literature becomes the perpetual positing of its own question. Henceforth literature, ceaselessly deferred and dissembling, can never be perfected or closed in on itself: 'This is why Romanticism, which is actually a moment (the moment of its question) will always have been more than a mere "epoch", or else will never cease, right up to the present, to incomplete the epoch it inaugurated.' We are, as I have suggested, Romantics. Or rather we are not yet Romantic. For if the Romantic epoch is interminable and incomplete it can never reach the status of a 'thing'. It is more true to say that it is 'nothing'. Thus, in answer to the question what is the essence of art we might do better to reply that Romanticism, or literature, 'is that which has no essence, not even its own inessentiality'.

Because the answer to the question 'what is Romanticism' is endlessly deferred, Romantic texts through their very dispersion demonstrate the impossibility of essence – and thus of being itself. For, as the writers of The Literary Absolute would claim, an epoch that begins with theory is an epoch that founds itself on the loss of being: on the supplement or the perfection of the work of art rather than with the completed work of art.

In an important sense, therefore, the question of Romanticism continues to haunt criticism. Who, for example, would deny that a correlation exists between Romanticism and ▷ deconstruction? One has only to consult the enormous variety of works on Romantic topics published in the United States in the last twenty years to find confirmation of this. A canonical book such as Deconstruction and Criticism (1979), with contributions by some of the most eminent theorists of deconstruction ¬ ▷ Harold Bloom, ▷ Jacques Derrida, ▷ Geoffrey Hartman, ▷ Paul de Man and J. Hillis Miller ¬ makes the connection between Romantic loss and postmodern absence explicit by adopting ▷ Shelley's Triumph of Life (1822) as a common reading text. Not the least of their concerns in treating Shelley is the problematic relation between language, literature and thought. In Derrida's essay, 'Living on: Borderlines', the problem focuses on the concept of genre. Why does the poem overflow its limits? What is it that prevents the text from maintaining the rigorous determinations of authorship, historical specificity and generic type?

The 'answer', common to Hillis Miller and de Man, is that language is a radically unstable construct. It cannot help but 'deconstruct' the imposition of borders, whether these are conceived in terms of the identity of the author, the priority of voice over writing, or the specificity of genre. If deconstruction derives this notion from the study of Romantic texts it is because Romanticism tends to demonstrate its own apparent contradictions clearly. How, for example, does one classify a 'theoretical' text such as ➤ Wordsworth's Essay Upon Epitaphs (1810)? As speculative meditation, prose poem, text book, autobiography or elegy? The list is potentially endless. If, on the one hand, we seek its essence in a literary genre we are led to the place where the law of genre, to recall Blanchot, 'admits of nothing essential': the text is what it is only on the condition that it excludes all of the others. Unfortunately Wordsworth's essay is incapable of such exclusion. Like all Romantic writing - here let us include the unfinished epics of Byron, Keats and Shelley; the encyclopaedic 'projects': Schlegel's Fragments (1798-1800), Wordsworth's The Recluse, Coleridge's Biographia Literaria (1817) - the Essay Upon Epitaphs struggles between comprehension and fragmentation. It wants to say everything - to reflect on the 'truth', including the truth of its own production - but it remains a fragment and 'as yet', Schlegel argues, 'no genre exists that is fragmentary both in form and in content' (Athenaeum Fragments).

The key phrase here is 'as yet' for the sense of the unfulfilled present strikes at the very heart of the Romantic concept of genre. Rather than to the idea of an assemblage or union the work of Romanticism points to the undefined and the illimitable: 'something evermore about to be', as Wordsworth writes in \triangleright The Prelude (1805, 6, 542). To comprehend this fecundity, however, the energy of Romanticism must be directed toward the production of a 'literature . . . that would be a great, thoroughly connected and organized Whole, comprehending many worlds of art in its unity, and being at the same time a unitary work of art' (Schlegel, 'On the Combinatory Spirit', 1804). The Romantic work must be 'capable of containing its own reflection and of comprehending the theory of its "genre" (The Literary Absolute). Literature and criticism, in other words, must become one. This prescriptiveness and conditionality, however, ultimately disfigure this aim, for if the 'essence' of Romanticism is 'that it should forever be becoming and never be perfected' (Athenaeum Fragments) then the process of infinite self-generation is one that is perpetually in excess of the ability of the genre to reflect and unify. The essence of the Romantic genre is therefore radically unstable. On the one hand it is fragmentary and limitless: 'No theory can exhaust it, and only a divinatory criticism would dare to characterize its ideal'; on the other encyclopaedic and holistic: 'It embraces everything' (Athenaeum Fragments).

But how can the essence of something not comprise a particular manifestation in space and time, with the coincidence of form and content necessary for any self-relation? Moreover, if Romantic poetry is, in some sense, the genre of genres (see again Fragments) what does this tell us about the relationship between literature and identity? To understand the background to this thought it is necessary to re-examine the conceptual antimonies of Enlightenment philosophy, particularly within the work of > Immanuel Kant.

III

I feel I am; — I only know I am (> John Clare, I am, c 1845)

From Descartes to Hegel philosophers have created systems of thought predicated on the autonomous existence of the thinking subject: res cogitans. According to this view the only thing of which we can be certain is our own capacity to doubt; res cogitans is that which remains when all else has been dismissed: the body, the external world and God. But the consequence of this is isolation. Like the narrator in Clare's sonnet I am, or the spectre of Coleridge's This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison (1797) the subject is deprived of its connection with 'otherness'. It has lost Beauties and feelings, such as would have been Most sweet to my remembrance even when age Had dimmed mine eyes to blindness!

The Cartesian solution to this 'problem' is to insist that the subject's relationship with res extensa – with material space, or 'nature' – is constructed by and issues from the subject's relationship to itself. Henceforth, to quote Mark C. Taylor, 'modern philosophy becomes a philosophy of the subject. The locus of certainty and truth, subjectivity is the first principle from which everything arises and to which all must be reduced or returned' (Deconstruction in Context, 1986).

In the history of ideas, Descartes marks the shift from a theocentric world view to a humanist one. Humanism, however, does not imply the negation of God. For even as the conceptual significance of the divine suffers a displacement, its structural function is preserved, and possibly reinforced, by its relocation in consciousness. The subject, in other words, is God. And like God it possesses the ability to produce itself, to create a world and to exist alone. For Taylor, this last point is crucial. Since the subject 'relates only to what it constructs . . . What seems to be a relationship with otherness – be that other God, nature, objects, or subjects – always turns out to be an aspect of mediate self-relation that is necessary for self-consciousness'. There is, in other words, no 'other' that is not already an aspect of subjectivity. Nothing can appear to consciousness that does not confirm the subject's self-relation, constructive power and sovereign solitude.

The Cartesian subject therefore transforms the other into a mirror for itself. Like the figure of Dorothy in Wordsworth's > Tintern Abbey (1798), the other is present in the poem as the basis of the poet's capacity to sustain her as a mirror figure. Through catching in the sister's voice 'the language of my former heart', by reading 'my former pleasures in the shooting lights / Of thy wild eyes' (117–20), the identity of the creating subject is maintained over time. That of the sister, however, has been reduced to a creative foil; her difference has been incorporated within the circle of subjectivity's full knowledge of itself.

Discussions of Cartesian subjectivity lead, inevitably, towards a consideration of the status of knowledge. Given that in the distinguishing of the cogito a rift is driven between subject and object how are we to gain knowledge of anything that exists beyond the 'fact' of consciousness? If the other – which may be experienced in sensory phenomena, or felt as pleasure and pain – can never be present except as an aspect of mediated self-reflection how can we be said to have knowledge of the other? The problem is addressed by Kant in the Critique of Pure Reason (1781) (readers should again consult Taylor's excellent summary of the Kantian position in Deconstruction in Context). In brief, Kant argues that knowledge is the product of a marriage between reason and experience. The human subject makes sense of the raw data of sense experience by imposing a priori forms of intuition (eg the concepts of space and time) and categories of understanding (eg relations of cause and effect, unity and diversity and so on). In Kant's synthesizing of Cartesian and empiricist theories, to know is to exercise reason so that difference may be reduced to identity, the manifold to the one.

This still leaves unanswered the question of how the subject relates to otherness. If reason, as Kant claims, imposes form upon matter, does this not mean that subject and object, reason and nature, are ineluctably separate? That there was not, at some time, an original unity of theoretical and practical reason? A solution, of sorts, is offered in Kant's third Critique, the Critique of Judgement (1790). Here it is suggested that the unity of subjectivity and objectivity can be recovered in the practice and form of 'fine art'. The argument is based on the identification of two concepts of constructive activity: the work of natural organic engendering (standing for the object or other) and the work of artistic production (standing for the subject or consciousness). Kant therefore grants the art work a privileged status. If ordinary experience is random and chaotic, marked by fragmentation and loss, artistic experience is self-determining and unified, unaffected by external forces or governed by anything other than itself. Through the work of art or poiesy - art that is considered as 'pure' production, without use or purpose - the creating subject realizes its freedom from outside determination. Its 'finality', Kant writes, 'appears just as free from the constraint of arbitrary rules as if it were a product of mere nature'. In this way, subjectivity and objectivity - artistic activity and natural production - are related and come to completion within and through each other. Nature can only be realized through art; and art can only be realized through nature.

At this point it may be helpful to draw a further connection with Romantic verse. To take a previously cited example: in Coleridge's lime-tree bower 'the friends' who enable the poet to break out of his Cartesian isolation are both constructs of the mind and products of nature. The act of imaginative projection into the gaze of the other – 'to contemplate . . . the joys we cannot share' (67) – thus creates a reciprocal relation between subject and object, a reciprocity figured in the image of 'the solitary humble-bee' singing in the bean-flower (58–9). The solitary bee signifies the self-autonomy and constitutive labour of authentic subjectivity as well as the idealized union of natural and artistic forms of making.

This, at least, is how Coleridge (and Kant) might wish us to read the poem. And many critics have been willing to follow this tack. M.H. Abrams, for example, writes of the poetic strategy in which 'nature is made thought and thought nature both by their sustained interaction and seamless metaphorical continuity' ('Structure and Style in the Greater Romantic Lyric' in From Sensibility to Romanticism, 1965). Similarly, Earl Wasserman has cited Coleridge as the reconciler of 'the phenomenal world of understanding with the noumenal world of reason' ('The English Romantics, The Grounds of Knowledge' in Studies in Romanticism, 4). It is, however, equally arguable that in the act of synthesizing subject and object through the structures of art the poet has merely confirmed the 'natural' priority of the one over the other. As Paul de Man argues, commenting on Abrams and Wasserman in 'The Rhetoric of Temporality' (1969, collected in Blindness and Insight, 1983), the claim for a reconciliation of self and other in Coleridge is based on the assertion of 'affinity' or 'sympathy', terms which only make sense in the context of a relationship between subjects, not in the relationship between a subject and an object. An example of this effect occurs in the opening of > Frost at Midnight (1798):

the thin blue flame
Lies on my low-burnt fire, and quivers not;
Only that film, which fluttered on the grate,
Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
Methinks, its motion in this hush of nature
Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
Making it a companionable form,
[With which I can hold commune.]
[With which I can hold commune.] (13–19)

To escape the solitude and silence that 'vexes meditation' the poet must find an object in nature analogous to the movements of his own mind. The fluttering film provides this function. But the assertion of unity between mind and nature is not entirely convincing, as Coleridge's manuscript revisions make abundantly clear. From a reading of these revisions it could very well be argued that the concept of organic inter-communion is meaningless without the translation of objectivity into subjectivity. Coleridge himself seems uneasily aware of the sort of paradoxes that emerge from this process:

Idle thought!
But still the living spirit in our frame,
That loves not to behold a lifeless thing,
Transfuses into all its own delights,
Its own volition, sometimes with deep faith
And sometimes with fantastic playfullness.

(20–25; added in 1828)

Does the living spirit proceed from the self or from nature? If consciousness predominates then the relationship with otherness will turn out to be 'an intersubjective, interpersonal relationship that, in the last analysis, is a relationship of the subject toward itself'. Should, however, the subject fail to convert lifeless nature into an echo of infinity then consciousness is placed in bondage to the supremacy of the finite. The mind is a slave to external forms and thus to time. Whichever course is chosen, the supposed inter-communion of subject and object turns out to be a deceitful construct, a will-o'-the-wisp confirming consciousness in its mortal isolation.

If the link between subject and object is placed in jeopardy the fault can be traced to the dependence of speculative idealism on the structures of art. Despite Coleridge's insistence on the identity of art and nature – 'such as the life is, such the form' – the resemblance between them remains purely formal. It is possible for the work of art and the work of nature to coincide only because they have been made to partake of the same set of categories – and here the relationship is not one of subject and object, it is a relationship of signs. To put this again in Kantian terms: since, as Lacoue-Labarthe and Nancy argue, the work of auto-formation can only occur through art, the individual can only come to itself as artifax or, worse still, ars. Paradoxically then it is the very dependency on artistic form that effectuates the break between the bildende Kraft (creative force) of the artist and the archetype of natural organic production.

The fundamental insight of Romanticism, therefore, against Kant, is that artistic creativity predominates over the organic and the natural. Here, the subject is not transcendental, but becomes instead an effect of the art work. And in the work-of-art (to recall Blanchot) the process of auto-formation is one whereby consciousness both creates and becomes self-consciously aware of itself in creation. This, however, is a process of unfolding rather than control. Here we lose the notion of identity, of a Cartesian substratum underlying meaning. To exist in the act of writing is to commit thought to 'a non-transitive language whose task is not to speak of things . . . but to speak (itself) in letting (itself) speak, without however making itself the new object of this language without an object'. In terms, therefore, that directly anticipate the contemporary discourse of post-structuralism, the 'I' of Romanticism is one that effectively reveals and confronts its status as a linguistic 'effect'. In writing it is no longer the subject but language that speaks. The text ceaselessly unworks 'itself'.

Woe is me!
The winged words on which my soul would pierce
Into the heights of Love's rare Universe,
Are chains of lead around its flight of fire –
I pant, I sink, I tremble, I expire!
(Shelley, Epipsychidion, 587–91, 1821)

If the deconstruction of the subject seems alien to the official message of Romanticism – Paul de Man, for example, has been accused of the most formalistic 'misreading' of Romantic poetry – we have only to read the pronouncements of the Romantics themselves to correct this view. Schlegel, for instance, points out 'that words often understand themselves better than do those who use them' and that a certain ghost within writing will 'bring everything into confusion' ('On Incomprehensibility', 1800). Even Wordsworth, quite often miscast as the self-assured father figure of English Romanticism, seems distrustful of the claim for organicity:

Words are too awful an instrument for good and evil, to be trifled with; they hold above all other external powers a dominion over thoughts. If words be not . . . an incarnation of the thought, but only a clothing for it, then surely will they prove an ill gift; such a one as those possessed vestments, read of in the stories of superstitious times which had the power to consume and to alienate from his right mind the victim who put them on. Language, if it do not uphold, and feed, and leave in quiet, like the power of gravitation or the air we breathe, is a counter-spirit, unremittingly and noiselessly at work, to subvert, to lay waste, to vitiate, and to dissolve.

(Essays Upon Epitaphs. 3)

Wordsworthian ontology unfolds into an ethical imperative to maintain a rigorous defence against corruption. There is in this impassioned rhetoric a feeling that language will not incarnate thought, that the transparency of the word will turn into ghostly matter, revenging itself on the passive spirit of mind.

Romantic theory, then, in a prefiguring of modern thought, encounters language as a force from elsewhere. It becomes a 'counter-spirit' to the mastery of the self. In this connection, Wordsworth's thought is very close to that of Heidegger: 'Man acts as though he were the shaper and master of language, while in fact language remains the master of man. When this relation of dominance gets inverted, man hits upon strange manoeuvres. ('... Poetically Man Dwells ...', in Poetry, Language, Thought, 1971). In response to this inversion, Romanticism marshals a number of strategies, the most significant of which is the valorization of symbol.

For Coleridge, the symbol 'always partakes of the Reality which it renders intelligible; and while it enunciates the whole, abides itself as a living part in that Unity, of which it is the representative' (The Statesman's Manual, 1830). With the emphasis on the relationship between part and whole, the structure of symbol resembles that of synecdoche. The symbol, in other words, is always 'a living part' of the totality that it stands for. The vengeful revenant is returned to the silence of the tomb. But not even the organic coherence of synecdoche can escape the effects of the inversion that Heidegger relates. As Coleridge's The Eolian Harp (1796) illustrates, within the alien realm of poetry, the displacement of symbolic language occurs at precisely those moments where the unity of consciousness and community, part and whole, is most needed. Throughout the poem, language draws attention to its own status as an artificial construct. In lines 3-5, for example, the symbolic significance of the 'white-flower'd Jasmin' and 'broad-leav'd Myrtle' - natural objects that would unite reason and experience - is undercut by the following parenthesis: '(Meet emblems they of Innocence and Love!)' (lines 4-5; my emphasis). As Tilottama Rajan suggests ('Displacing Post-Structuralism: Romantic Studies After Paul de Man', Studies in Romanticism 24), by bracketing the moral qualities that are meant to subsist in the landscape, reminding us that the flowers are only 'emblems', the poem discredits the claims of the symbolic style to be the 'living educt of the imagination'. It becomes, like any other trope, a supplement to the actualization of the real. By foregrounding artificiality - the synaesthesia of lines 26-7; the formal, neo-classical conceit of 32-3 - The Eolian Harp suggests that the work of inter-communion has more to do with aesthetic tinkering than with natural engendering.

Strangely, however, it is through the work of the aesthetic that the poem is returned to what de Man refers to as 'an authentically temporal destiny' – though time, in this case, has nothing to do with what is normally associated with authenticity, the ability to coincide, to unify and to reflect on one's self; rather, time is that which leads the subject away from itself, putting it in a relation to pure anteriority, the outside of selfhood. A poem such as The Eolian Harp, therefore, works on two levels: first to convert the violence of time into the passivity of literary or mental space; secondly, to disrupt this space through the return of time.

In the first movement the temporality of nature is reduced to metaphors of stillness and silence. These metaphors reinforce the tendency of symbol to postulate states of organic inter-fusion:

and the world so hush'd! The stilly murmur of the distant Sea Tells us of silence.

The suspension of movement and duration at this point dissolves the 'I' into a state of oneiric repose. Consciousness slows down. The subject is spaced out. With the return to the meditation on the subject lute, however, the flaunting of artificiality translates the poem back onto the plain of time. The temporality that the second movement of poetry restates, therefore, is the temporality of tropes, a difference signified, in this case, in the shift from a symbolic to an allegorical mode of discourse.

According to Paul de Man, language is an > allegory of its own deconstruction. He bases this claim on the structuralist distinction between the synchronic and diachronic poles of language. According to this view, formulated by > Roman Jakobson, tropes such as symbol belong to the synchronic axis. Their structure is spatial in kind. Tropes such as allegory, on the other hand, partake of the diachronic axis. Their structure is durational and thus, in a sense, 'authentically temporal'. Before going further, it is worth quoting de Man's definition of these forms:

Whereas the symbol postulates the possibility of an identity or identification, allegory designates primarily a distance in relation to its own origin, and, renouncing the nostalgia and the desire to coincide, it establishes its language in the void of this temporal difference.

('The Rhetoric of Temporality')

Allegory in The Eolian Harp, whilst not explicitly presented as a theme of the poem, is nevertheless present in the necessarily temporal relationship that exists between signs. The symbol is no exception. Despite the appeal to organicity, the symbol, like any other sign, is able to recapture or reflect upon itself. To echo the philosophy of Merleau-Ponty, this turn of the symbol 'recuperates everything [art, nature and so on] except itself as an effort of recuperation, it clarifies everything except its own role' (from The Visible and the Invisible, 1968). Something, in other words, always escapes, translating the symbol back onto the plain of the diachronic, opening a gap in the text that no act of existential faith can close.

Therefore, by formulating the symbol in terms of synecdoche (part for whole), Coleridge has attempted to spatialize an essentially temporal experience. But more than this, he has attempted to exclude the time of the other. The other returns, however, in the final movement of the poem through the dialogical interference of Sara Coleridge, the wife to whom the poem has been addressed. Like Dorothy in Tintern Abbey, Sara can be seen as a rhetorical 'excess', an unrecuperable isotope that emerges from the failure of poetic language to realize itself. Her look of 'mild reproof' (49) subverts the poem's founding trope: the idea that the antimonies of art and nature, consciousness and the world, can be overcome through an appeal to visionary correspondence. Against the 'half-clos'd eye-lids' (36) of mental seeing, Sara's 'more serious eye' (49) is a timely reminder of corporeal limits. The darting look pierces the infinite gaze, and Coleridge is returned to the body, the mortal body in which we find our home or not at all.

Following from this, the closing address to God 'The Incomprehensible' (59) is perhaps the most moving and most pathetic statement of the entire Romantic movement. Having eschewed the symbol as a medium for self-determination, God is accepted, beyond signs, beyond temporality, as the unrepresentable horizon of a lost totality. God is what remains when all else has been closed. Faced with this knowledge, the poet's subjective freedom reverts to the pre-Enlightenment condition of tutelage, defined by Kant as 'man's inability to make use of his understanding without direction from another'.

From start to finish, therefore, the conversation poem is an allegorical disruption of the pursuit of knowledge. But Coleridge, like Kant, cannot escape his Cartesian inheritance: trapped within the cogito, the desired reciprocity of man and nature, self and other, turns out to be a chimera, an escape that confirms the fact of its own imprisonment. And it is one that must be repeated, like the 'rime' of the \triangleright Ancient Mariner, over and over again.

'violence from within'
(Wallace Stevens, 'The Noble Rider and the Sound of Words')

Within Western thought temporality is habitually excluded from the creation of systems. Time cannot be rationalized. Time is absolutely other. Given, then, that the subject through his or her relation to mortality is locked in time, how can we conceive of subjectivity as part of a system? Once again, to think the unthinkable we must look beyond philosophy toward the impure thought of poetry. Here, we may even 'see as a god sees' (Keats, The Fall of Hyperion, 1, 304, 1819), exchanging our mortal bodies for the immortality of mind.

But god-like vision comes at a price. To take the depth of things the self must not only pass beyond the bonds of temporality, it must also withstand the effects of human memory:

Without stay or prop
But my own weak mortality, I bore
The load of this eternal quietude
(The Fall of Hyperion, 1, 388–90)

In Keats' unfinished epic, the self undertakes a journey into the realm of the divine. One would therefore expect a rhetoric of self-empowerment. But Keats booby-traps the poem with pockets of irony. In the example of the lines quoted above, by juxtaposing the '1' of 'mortality' against the 'eternal quietude' of a god, we are forced to confront what is really at stake in the dream of transcendence. Since time escapes knowledge, and since the human subject is in a perpetual process of becoming, our knowledge of the world remains partial and incomplete. This is something that the Kantian thesis, with its spatializing of human thought, cannot accept. But it is also the source of its subversive potential. For if the art work is free and indeterminate, unbounded by conceptual certainty, how can we presuppose the integrity of self-consciousness? Evermore about to be, the temporality of artistic activity denies the stability of a transcendent '1'.

To see as a god sees, therefore, the subject must renounce its connection with process and change; it must, as Keats writes in the earlier \triangleright Hyperion (1819) 'Die into life' (3, 130). Only in this way can the subject attain the closure necessary for complete self-consciousness and total knowledge.

But if death closes, it does so on the condition that it closes all. For to live beyond death is a scandal that no philosophical system can bear. Philosophy, however, endeavours to preserve this fantasy by converting the absolute negativity of death into the positive reserve of a temporal dialectic. This idea is presented by Hegel in a famous passage from The Phenomenology of Spirit (1807). 'The life of the Spirit', he writes, 'is not the life that shrinks from death and keeps itself untouched by devastation, but rather the life that endures it and maintains itself in it. It wins its truth, only when, in utter dismemberment, it finds itself.' For Hegel, self-realization entails absolute knowledge. But this can only occur if the subject incorporates the knowledge of its own dissolution. Death, in other words, must be included as a structural element within the progressive unfolding of a temporal dialectic. To do this, however, requires an act of repression - for Hegelian thought cannot tolerate a negative that fails to preserve a kernel of positivity. Through the process of Aushebung (literally a raising and suspending), therefore, death is itself negated and turned into profit. In a direct allusion to the Christian myth of death and resurrection, the subject 'dies' only to be reconstituted as historically transcendent, omnipotent and omniscient. Nothing escapes this process. The random, the senseless, the stubbornly material - in Hegel's philosophy everything is assimilated into the economics of self-realization.

This includes the Kantian concept of art. What Hegel cannot accept in the Kantian thesis is an unforeseen reliance on the irrational and the incoherent. For Hegel, art is an insufficient ground for the realization of self-consciousness. Art can never be transparent in the way that pure thought requires. What occurs in the Romantic work is a form of death that cannot be converted into profit. It retains, so to speak, the force of an absolute negativity; a pure otherness that escapes the systematic totality of dialectical reason. To maintain its integrity, therefore, Hegel's philosophy must sublimate the radical imperfection of Romantic art. It must move beyond the instability of poetic representation to the pure reflection of conceptual thought. Hegelianism must, in short, pronounce the end of Romanticism.

VI

Death Strolls Between Letters (Jacques Derrida, 'Edmund Jabes and the Question of the Book', in Writing and Difference, 1978)

What happens, then, when Romantic poetry experiments with the radical negativity of death; with death considered as a literary absolute? The link between the work of the creative artist and the power of the negative may be more intimate than we might at first suppose. Take the example of The Prelude. For a vast majority of readers the key note of the poem is a heartfelt belief in the life

Of all things and the mighty unity in all which we behold, and feel, and are (13, 253-5)

Unity, blending, interchange; the 'filial bond' between man and nature – such is the dream of Romantic perfection. But against the grain of this assumption, Romantic writing inscribes a transgressive language: a rhetoric of failure, non-sense and irreducible absence. As Geoffrey Hartman comments, within this language 'the Imagination [which] usually . . . vitalizes and animates . . . stands closer to death than life' (Wordsworth's Poetry, 1965). Hence the Romantic interest in disaster; its thirst for annihilation - as in > Cowper's Castamay (1799), Shelley's Alastor (1817) and Byron's > Cain (1821), poems of despair, enervation and paradoxical pride which tease the borderline between self-affirmation and self-abnegation. The otherness of death, when it appears in these poems, is an event that cannot be accounted for, still less converted into profit. And not even Wordsworth can escape this force. When the imagination, rising 'like an unfather'd vapour' in Book 6 of The Prelude, releases the self from subjection to mortality, the assertion of a-temporality is made dependent on the dangerous equation of death as denial and death as possibility. At this moment, literature opens itself up 'to a time before the world, before the beginning'; to an 'outside where there is no intimacy, no place to rest' (Blanchot). This irreducible and unrepresentable 'past' opens a fissure in the text that makes presence - the assertion of the god-like, transcendent 'I' - impossible. Not even the restoration of time, through the punctual 'now' ('Halted, without a struggle to break through. "24" And now recovering', 530-1) can restore the integrity of self. 'Now' belongs to the space-time of literature, not of the world; it is an interruption that does not unify. Literary time announces the recommencement of the exodus away from self.

Perhaps this last point explains why Romantic writing continues to elicit our interest. The more philosophy struggles to attain a comprehensive view of the world, the greater the faithfulness of Romanticism to the call of the irrational and the absurd. Whether that call is heard in the cold pastoral of Keats' Ode to a Grecian Urn (1819), the warped lament of > Thomas Hood's Silence (1823), or in the sorrows of > Frankenstein's monster (1818), it speaks of what cannot be grasped except in fragmentary or unfinished form. But to cross the void, to forsake perfected truth for the sake of broken authenticity is a perilous, even impossible, task. In Keats, like Wordsworth, it leads to a space of pure difference; without beginning or end; without any purpose except the ceaseless affirmation of error:

No stir of life
Was in this shrouded vale, not so much air
As in the zoning of a summer's day
Robs not one light seed from the feather'd grass,
But where the dead leaf fell there did it rest:
A stream went voiceless by, still deaden'd more
By reason of the fallen divinity
Spreading more shade

(The Fall of Hyperion, 1, 309-16)

The difference between Keats and Wordsworth lies in their response to this void. With Keats' work, unlike The Prelude, the death of nature is welcomed as a source of negative inspiration. The poet draws a perverse energy from self-destroying enthralments. In the realm of Saturn, in a grotesque parody of Hegelian self-consciousness, everything comes to a productive halt. 'But where the dead leaf fell there did it rest'. A sense of immobility threatens to paralyse the poem. The subject dissolves into silence and shade. When, at last, time is restored, one would expect the syntheses of the Aufhebung: the subject 'dies' in order to be reborn on the altar of rational knowledge. But time in Keats' poem

... works a constant change, which happy death
Can put no end to; deathwards progressing
To no death

(1, 259-61)

Thus, rather than 'a-mortizing' death, Keats has made death immortal; a process to which there is no end and from which it is impossible to derive sense. Death has become useless, unworkable within any system of dialectical reason.

It is for this reason that the incompletion of the poem is so piquant and attractive. The shade of the fallen divinity is darkness in extremis. Thus, at the 'end', it is not the enlightenment of Apollo but the 'blank splendour' of Saturn's gaze that has most force. We are no longer faced with the desire for presence but the passivity of absence. The black hole of these eyes ('Half-closed, and visionless entire they seem'd"24" Of all external things') drains the enkindled gaze of the poet so that the dawning of the ephebe ('Knowledge enormous makes a God of me', Hyperion, 3, 113) is stymied, halted without a power to break through.

In the place of the dream of absolute knowledge, therefore, Keats has offered the birth of a more terrible beauty: the affirmation of death, not as mastery and endurance, but as 'Life's high meed' (Why did I laugh to-night, 14). In making this claim, Keats perhaps more so than any other Romantic poet points the way to a space purged of self-consciousness. As he writes in a famous letter: 'As to the poetical Character itself . . . it is not itself – it has no self – it is everything and nothing – it has no character . . . A poet is the most unpoetical of any thing in existence: because he has no Identity'. To achieve this destiny – the will to give up self – Keats utilizes the substitutions and displacements inherent in poetic language. With Keats, unlike say Wordsworth, Byron, Shelley or Coleridge, words are embraced as forces of dispersal. Here language coincides with that which does not coincide; it leads, in advance, to the détournement of all unity. The result is an achieved dearth of meaning; the opening of a positive void. The provocation of a time before history.

What these fragments unwittingly celebrate, therefore, is the 'power' of uselessness and failure: 'I have left "24" My strong identity, my real self' (Hyperion, I, II4). And in leaving the 'real self', the poet has escaped the utilitarian world of subject-making and self-mastery. Art, to paraphrase Blanchot, has deprived the writer of the power to say 'I' – the birth of Apollo will not take place – but it has enabled him to pronounce on the nature of the other. It has allowed him to accept his death.

Nothing, whether deed, word, thought, or text, ever happens in relation, positive or negative, to anything that precedes, follows, or exists elsewhere, but only as a random event whose power, like the power of death, is due to the randomness of its occurrence.

(Paul de Man, 'Shelley Disfigured', in Deconstruction and Criticism) only nomadic affirmation remains

(Maurice Blanchot, Le Pas au-delà, 1973).

How does Romanticism manifest itself in the present age? I have argued in this essay that Romanticism continues because of the Romantic fragment's affirmation of incompletion. We must understand, however, that the fragment does not affirm its lack of perfection in relation to a lost totality. Despite the perceived official message of Romantic poems, Romanticism is not, in essence, nostalgic. As Timothy Clark notes, whilst for Schlegel 'every part can be a whole' and conversely 'every whole can be a part', the truth of Romanticism does not reside in the recovery of an original unity or lost totality but in the moment of its interruption; the moment, that is, where the fragment 'maintains a singularity that both exceeds and resists subsumption, yet by this same token this singularity falls short of a determined identity and constitutes a lack in any putative totality.' What Romanticism affirms, therefore, is its ceaseless failure to present itself in a completed form. This is why Romanticism continues, right up to the present, to unwork the possibility that human knowledge may be articulated as a unified or total 'system'.

Where do we measure this effect in our time? One could trace it in any of the major avant-garde movements of this century: in Dada, Surrealism, Abstract Expressionism, postmodernism and so on – wherever the random or the aleatory speaks of a lack beyond the insistence of being. For the purpose of this essay I will focus on a prose fragment by the poet Paul Celan (1920-70) entitled 'Conversation in the Mountains' (1959). At the start of this text an unnamed Jew steps out of his hut to take an evening walk. The Jew, it emerges, is blind. As he shuffles along, tapping his stick on the stone, a first person stutters into life. The voice comes to us unannounced, babbling, as if from nowhere: 'Do you hear . . . here I am I, I am, I am here'. It could be the voice of the Jew, of the author, or of something entirely 'other', something at odds with the confidence and supreme virility of the eloquent 'I' - the authentic, integrated self of much Romantic literature. But whoever owns this voice and wherever it comes from, the ontological certainty of 'Here I am', the phrase with which Abraham responds to the call of God, is put into a position of extreme jeopardy. No one replies, night falls, and the voice stutters: 'I, I, I', broken and alone. Presently, another person approaches; it is the Jew's cousin, equally blind, equally uncertain. For a long time there is silence but 'it's just a pause, just a hiatus, an empty space'. At last the dialogue begins:

'You came from far away, came here . . .'
'So I did. I came. I came like you.'
'I know that.'

'You do know. You know what you see: The earth has folded up here, folded over once, then twice, then three times, and split open in the middle, and in the middle there is water, the water is green, the Green is white and the White comes from still further on high, comes from the glaciers, one could say, but shouldn't, that this is a language for the here and now, the Green with the White within, a language for neither you nor me – for I ask, for whom is it meant, this earth, for I say it is not meant for you or for me – a language to be sure, without I or Thou, merely He, merely It, do you understand, merely She and nothing more'.

In general terms, what this obscure and beautiful text acknowledges is the condition of its own belatedness. Without nostalgia and without pathos Celan draws attention to the persistence of a certain way of thinking, the presence/absence of an epistemology that might, for want of a better word, be called 'Romantic'. This is manifested in several ways. To begin with the mountainous landscape is haunted by the ghosts of Romantic agony: with Shelley's \triangleright Mont Blanc (1816); Wordsworth's Simplon Pass; Büchner's Lenz and Byron's \triangleright Manfred. But where, for example, in Lenz, the failure of the idealized unity of unity and difference, self and other, propels the 'I' into suffering and madness, here Celan manages to find a way of affirming that very failure in such a way that it is the voice of the overwhelming 'other' rather than of the isolated ego that has priority. By emphasizing 'babble' over eloquence, 'borrowed' language over original speech, the Green language of the 'here and now' over the White language of the timeless and transcendent, a 'Conversation in the Mountains' presents an ethical challenge to the ontological drama of Romanticism. Where Byron's > Childe Harold expresses a hopeless desire for ownership of the 'one word' (3, 97), the unnamed Jew speaks of a language 'without I or Thou'; in so doing he enables us to welcome difference: a difference between ascent and descent, origin and anarchy, activity and passivity, mastery and subjection.

For Celan, drawing on the unacknowledged insights of Romanticism, language cannot be owned, or grasped; it comes from elsewhere, like the power of death. And like death, to adapt the words of Emmanuel Levinas, the 'He', 'She' or 'It' of language 'announces an event over which the subject is not master, an event in relation to which the subject is no longer a subject' ('Time and the Other', 1987); yet only in relation to this can the subject come into being. To signify, therefore, one must begin with annihilation, with death. I say 'a flower', and magically the concept flower appears – separated or split from the material flower. In many ways Romantic poetry 'begins' by recording this original violence – the way in which language creates meaning by negating the internal essence of things. When Celan writes, however, we are moved by silence rather than by words, by what is not there rather than by what is. The breaks and pauses in his writing gesture towards a region saturated with nonsense – a non-sense which turns out, paradoxically, to be the radical sense of poetry. Here we cannot help but supply the relations that the random event of language would deny. Death inhabits language; it is we who signify.

'I could a tale unfold': Women, Romanticism and the Gothic

Alison Milbank

Until recently the prose fiction of the Romantic period – least of all the ▶ Gothic genre - would have scarcely merited a mention in a volume such as this. Poetry at the end of the eighteenth century was considered a higher form than prose, while the novel still had many years of struggle ahead before gaining equal intellectual respectability. In a letter to > Wordsworth concerning > Walter Scott's narrative poem > Marmion, Coleridge centres his criticism precisely in a perceived similarity to prose romances: it is a 'novel versified'. Marmion reminds him particularly of the Gothic, and he proceeds to classify the qualities of the latter form:

I amused myself a day or two ago in reading a Romance in Mrs Radcliffe's style with making out a scheme which was to serve for all Romances a priori; only varying the proportions. A baron or baroness, ignorant of their birth and in some dependent situation; castle on a Rock; a sepulchre - at some distance from the Rock - Deserted Rooms underground passages - Pictures - a Ghost, so believed - or a written record - blood in it - a wonderful Cutthroat, etc. etc.

Coleridge's reductive account of Gothic tropes makes them seem like a cumbersome set of stage machinery, and has the effect of distancing himself and his correspondent from the sort of literature described, even though many of the same motifs would find their way into mainstream Romantic verse, not least Coleridge's own productions. > Christabel (1816) is in essence a medieval romance, complete with baron, ancient castle, haunted dog, and a mysterious lady who claims to have been captured by strange warriors, and exerts seemingly magical powers, while the > Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798) would itself have an influence on later Gothic writing.

However, Coleridge's scheme does fit many a Gothic tale in which the same elements are continually re-articulated, and the pleasure of repetition is itself a quality of Gothic fiction. The form was already well-established by the turn of the century, the first 'modern' Gothic fable, > The Castle of Otranto by > Horace Walpole, having been published thirty-six years before. For, in contrast to the ordered neo-classicism of the earlier eighteenth century ran an equally strong strain of interest in the 'Gothic' feudal past, in graveyard melancholy, and in human passions and extreme emotional states. At first, Walpole's tale was indeed presented as an authentic medieval account, so that its supernatural machinery of a giant helmet and the rapacious lusts of the tyrannical owner of the Castle were seen as of a part with a less enlightened, though fascinating, age. When its contemporary authorship was revealed, Walpole still sought to cast an aura of distance and privilege about his tale by locating its origin in a dream. (> Mary Shelley was to do the same in relation to > Frankenstein, as Coleridge too with Kubla Khan, which remains unfinished because of the interruption to his opium-induced dreams by the importunate 'person from Porlock'.) Whereas Walpole - and later > William Beckford, author (in French) of the exotic Vathek: An Arabian Tale (1786) – were aristocrats with archeological interests and the money to realize their architectural and historical fantasies in Strawberry Hill's Gothic turrets and the excesses of Fonthill respectively, soon women writers began to essay 'Gothic' fables.

> Clara Reeve's The Champion of Virtue (1777), which was later revised as The Old English Baron, and went through many editions, was described by its author as 'the literary offspring of The Castle of Otranto'. However, quite deliberately, this novel eschews the spectacular supernatural effects of its fictional parent. Edmund, the true heir to the Baron Fitz-Owen's castle, does indeed evoke ghostly presences when he spends the night in a haunted room, but the visitants are his own parents, and, as in the case of Hamlet, the reader is at some liberty to interpret the haunting as an inner vision rather than an external apparition. An early specimen of the historical novel, Sophia Lee's The Recess: A Tale of Other Times (1783-5), charts the tragic adventures of two daughters of Mary Queen of Scots, to escape the jealous ire of Elizabeth I. The novel's historical setting and the subterranean dwelling of its sister heroines, who live immured in the underground chambers of a Tudor great house which had formerly been a convent, makes it as engendered, as it were, Gothically. As Chris Baldick's introduction to The Oxford Book of Gothic Tales indicates, it is the centrality of an ancient, ruinous house - imprisoning the protagonist and mediating the baleful presence of the past over all its inhabitants - which makes a novel or short story Gothic. The house in a tale like Edgar Allan Poe's 'The Fall of the House of Usher' is itself a protagonist.

So before the arrival of > Ann Radcliffe's first novel The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne in 1789, all the Gothic tropes that Coleridge lampooned were current and operating with different degrees of effectiveness. Radcliffe's novel already seems implicitly parodic of the genre it presents with its warring barons, plethora of captives, ambushes and secret passages, and a low-born young man who saves the life of a chief and marries the latter's sister after his nobility and heroism is finally established. Yet in the four novels which succeeded this first attempt, Radcliffe took the Gothic novel to new heights, and helped establish it as the most popular form of fiction until the 1820s.

Women writers of Gothic tended to turn away from interest in the guilty (male) tyrant and usurper towards his victims: in The Recess women become, as they were to remain, the central focus, so that Ellen Moers can describe the whole Gothic phenomenon as 'a device to send maidens on journeys'. At a time when the picaresque novel was becoming virtually extinct, the errant heroines of Sophia Lee – whose travels take them all over England, to the Continent and even to the Americas – seemed evidence of a new form, the episodic journey tale. The glamorous foreign locations were, however, merely changes of background to enable ever grosser treacheries and extreme dangers to assault the heroine. There is no attempt in The Recess to bring the settings to imaginative life as elements themselves in the story.

It was Ann Radcliffe who, in a series of novels published between 1789 (the year of the ➤ French Revolution) and 1797 (the year before Coleridge and Wordsworth's ➤ Lyrical Ballads), brought together these various elements of the Gothic, combining Lee's historicism and interest in enclosed spaces with Walpole's Otranto, with its castle and the central feud, and blending with these a strong emphasis on the natural landscape. Up to that time, in England, only the poet and novelist ➤ Charlotte Smith had employed extended natural description as a part of her fiction, though in her Emmeline, The Orphan of the Castle (1788) the sea-shore reveries of the eponymous heroine are but a small part of a conventional romance plot. In Radcliffe's tales, however, the landscape itself increasingly takes the part of an actor in the plot; indeed, ➤ Keats (who likened titles of two of his own poems to 'Mother Radcliffe's' style) commented on this feature in a letter recording an 1819 visit to a friend in Devon 'whence I intend to tip you the Damsel Radcliffe – I'll concern you, and grotto you, and Waterfall you, and wood you, and water you, and immense rock you, and tremendous sound you, and solitude you'. The nouns here become verbal in the same manner that the Radcliffe landscape precipitates human action. One typical example of this phenomenon occurs in A Sicilian Romance, when Madame de Menon, governess to the lost heroine, enjoys an evening stroll:

The evening was remarkably fine, and the romantic beauty of the surrounding scenery invited her to walk. She followed the windings of a stream, which was lost at some distance amongst luxuriant groves of chestnut. The rich colouring of evening glowed through the dark foliage, which spread a pensive gloom around, offered a scene congenial to the present temper of her mind, and she entered the shades. Her thoughts, affected by the surrounding objects, gradually sunk into a pleasing and complacent melancholy, and she was insensibly led on.

Giving herself up to the rhythms and impulses of the scene, Madame de Menon seems to sleep-walk as she is 'moved' in her emotions and the windings of the stream to find a solitary figure, who proves to be her lost pupil. Others who see the girl and violate the intentions and shapes of the landscape are continually misled. They fail to notice the beauty of nature, so are unable to be helped by her benign presence or 'read' her secrets.

The locations of Radcliffe's novels are (with the exception of her first, which is set in Scotland) in continental Europe, principally France, Switzerland and Italy. It is usual to argue that the reason for the foreign nature of her locations was the more exotic terrain, the prevalence of Catholicism and the likelihood of violence and political instability. All this may be true, but it is also clear that Radcliffe had read and absorbed > Rousseau's novels Emile, ou L'Education (1756) and Julie, ou la nouvelle Héloise (1760) with their depictions of the Alps and lakes, woodlands and pastoral retreats. Several of Radcliffe's novels describe the upbringing of her heroines away from the corruptions of urban upper-class life, where parents devote themselves to the education of their children in the arts and in the appreciation of nature. Rousseau's privileging of the 'natural' over the civilized, and his theories of childhood innocence were enormously influential all over Europe in the development of Romanticism. Wordsworth is often credited with bringing these ideas into the mainstream of English poetry, but Radcliffe before him, especially in The Romance of the Forest (1791) and The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794), explored the educational ideas, as well as the social vision of little quasi-familial groups in rural retreat that are found in Rousseau's two novels. The Romance of the Forest includes a Swiss pastor, La Luc, whose family dispense charity, nurse the sick of their village, and teach its children, taking their pleasure in rambling among the scenic wonders of their Alpine home. The landscape provides simultaneously secure protection from outside influences and imaginative and religious expansion through the aesthetic power of mountain scenery. Similarly, Udolpho opens with a description of Emily St Aubert's childhood home, La Vallée:

on the nearest banks of the Garonne, in the province of Gascony, stood, in the year 1584, the chateau of Monsieur St Aubert. From its mindows were seen the pastoral landscapes of Guienne and Gascony, stretching along the river, gay with luxuriant woods and vines and plantations of olives. To the south, the view was bounded by the majestic Pyrenées, whose summits veiled in clouds, or exhibiting awful forms, seen, and lost again, as the partial vapours rolled along were sometimes barren, and gleamed through the blue tinge of air, and sometimes frowned with forests of gloomy pine, that swept downward to their base. These tremendous precipices were contrasted by the soft green of the pastures and woods that hung upon their skirts; among whose flocks, and herds, and simple cottages, the eye, after having scaled the cliffs above, delight to repose. To the north, and to the east, the plains of Guienne and Languedoc were lost in the midst of distance; on the west Gascony was bounded by the waters of Biscay.

This protective environment of the heroine is as safely enclosed as the Garden of Eden itself, with its 'luxuriant' vegetation 'bounded' on the south by mountains, and on the west by 'the waters of Biscay'. Conversely, 'the eye' - which is the prime mover of the scene rather than the ambulant human - has its gaze extended into a seeming infinity to the north and east, in which direction the plains are 'lost in the mist of distance'. The Edenic motif continues in the precise historical dating of the narrative in 1584, the year of the renewal of the Catholic League, which aimed to defeat French Protestants under Henry of Navarre, the next heir to the throne, and also the time when Philip of Spain's 'Catholic Enterprise' to depose Elizabeth was becoming known in Britain. Navarre is within the Pyrenees, so that all the force of Protestant religious 'purity' is enclosed in this region of natural sublimity, while the River Garonne on which the Aubert chateau is built had been the site of an earlier battle in the same Wars of Religion. Moreover, Aubert, the heroine's surname, recalls that of Navarre's mother, Jeanne d'Albret, whose lands were in Gascony. So La Vallée holds its 'repose' precariously on the Huguenot frontier, at risk from Catholic invasion, as Adam and Eve were from the serpent's grateful incursion. This admixture of the historical religio-political with the stately procession of aesthetic contrasts of an ideal landscape gives a new intensity to picturesque landscape, and energizes its portrayal. Emily St Aubert, the novel's young heroine, is soon to leave this pastoral retreat for a journey among the Pyrenees to restore the health of her bereaved father, and then for further travel, after his death among the mountains, for the gaieties of Venice, a setting which Radcliffe uses as a lovely but mystifying place of absence and false sentiment, in contrast to the stark, awful heights of the Pyrenees. Venice causes the visitor to look down, not up, as to 'the lower world', to see narcissistic reflections in the waters, rather than a presence in nature that takes one beyond the self: 'a new heaven and trembling stars below the waves, with shadowy outlines of towers and porticos'.

The Venetian scenes of Udolpho, with their plangent music that so moved \triangleright Byron in > Childe Harold are, in the context of the novel's aesthetic and moral scheme, ominous. Venice's physical lowness, as well as its fairy-tale illusionism, makes it a place dangerous to the imagination. For although Radcliffe anticipates the place of the mental landscape and the concept of the sublime in Romantic poetry, she is far from sharing the latter's boundless trust in the imagination. The sublime in the poetry of Wordsworth becomes a moment of direct imaginitive and moral expansion; indeed, it is the imagination itself which is sublime, as it acts to break down categories, and to unite disparate elements. But in the eighteenth-century tradition which culminates in Radcliffe and finds its most cogent expression in > Edmund Burke's Essay on the Origin of the Sublime and Beautiful (1757), it is objects extraneous to the self that are sublime, such as great natural phenomena, mountains or cataracts, great poetry and art, architectural size and longevity, powerful heroes and, most of all, the Divine. The awful greatness of such as these overwhelms the viewer; first, the viewer is made aware of her own littleness, her subjection to forces beyond her own control, and only then, through this very negation, is a sense of imaginative access possible. So Ellena, the heroine of The Italian, who has been imprisoned in an Apennine convent by her aristocratic lover's powerful mother, has her prison both confirmed and yet transcended by the power of the view from her turret window:

Here, gazing upon the stupendous imagery around her, looking, as it were, beyond the awful veil which obscures the features of the Deity, and conceals him from the eyes of his creatures, dwelling as with a present God in the midst of his sublime works; with a mind thus elevated, how insignificant would appear to her the transactions, and the sufferings of this world.

She concludes that her enemy was therefore 'unable to chain her soul, or compel her to fear him, while he was destitute of virtue'.

The result of this aesthetic communion is not a quietist acceptance of destiny – all Radcliffe heroines show considerable fortitude, dignity and resourcefulness under hosts of murderous attacks. But the communion is the means by which the heroine is able to maintain a sense of her value as a person by, as it were, a mental dramatization of her actual life-threatening situation, which is projected into an imaginative agar or conflict, where the spectator's self-hood is almost annihilated, only to be re-established on a re-ordered footing as holding its place in God's providential order. 'Thus man, the giant who now held her in captivity, would shrink to the diminutiveness of a fairy,' thinks Ellena.

This trope of the entrapped woman fleeing the sexual or murderous attentions of a male attacker is one of the most potent devices of the Gothic genre, and survives right up to literature and film of the present day. Walpole uses it in Otranto, but the woman writers of the 1790s and after gave it a central focus. In one sense it is a universal story, and one, in the more realist setting of contemporary seduction that formed the matter of Samuel Richardson's novels Pamela (1740-1) and Clarissa (1747-8) as well as many novels of sensibility. Despite feeding from that tradition, the Gothic novel generally gives the predatory attacks an exotic architectural setting, so that the woman is pursued through the labyrinthine passages of the tyrant's castle, monastery, or actual prison. But just as Richardson is making a mainly bourgeois critique of aristocratic ethical codes of honour and shame, Radcliffe and her host of imitators filling the lists of the Minerva Press inevitably place their villains among the relics of a decayed aristocracy. Udolpho's Montoni is further and further confined to his own estates and castles as his only field of force (the Byronic hero owes his pride and sense of damnation to such figures, as they owe theirs to Milton's portraval of Satan in Paradise Lost). In charting the escape of women from confinement, the Gothic aligns itself to the Enlightenment project itself, though its potential political radicalism is tempered by the fact that the heroine and her associates generally go on to live a retired Emile-like existence in private life only; the public realm is eschewed for a pastoral retreat consisting of the polite arts and the social joys of the sublime.

This kind of 'female' Gothic is not necessarily to do with the gender of the author. > William Godwin writes an interesting version of 'female' Gothic in Caleb Williams, or Things as they Are (1794), in which the hero, having found evidence of his aristocratic master's crime, is pursued by agents of that noble but flawed Falkland the length and breadth of Britain. Finally brought to account for a supposed crime against Falkland, Caleb abandons attempts to assert his innocence in favour of a version of sublime discourse dramatizing his own destitution and the impossibility of escape; the hero finally triumphs. 'Male' Gothic writers include the Marquis de Sade, M.G. Lewis (> 'Monk' Lewis), > Charles Maturin, Francis Latham and the youthful > Shelley. Their works are characterized by a doomed and guilt-ridden hero, such as Ambrosio in Lewis' The Monk, who breaks endless taboos by committing murder, incest and fratricide (amongst other sensational things), in a careless desire for mastery and forbidden knowledge. Ambrosio is in some ways the archetypal 'male' Gothic hero, who assaults barriers to penetrate inwards, whether into bodies, locked chambers or castles, in contrast to the female protagonists of the Radcliffean mode who seek to move beyond the 'bounds', whether of room, castle, or limited subjection as women.

In > Mary Wollstonecraft's tale Maria: or, The Wrongs of Woman (1798) feminism and the 'female' Gothic form come together overtly in a contemporary setting, with the following opening:

Abodes of horror have frequently been described and castles, filled with spectres and chimeras conjured up by the magic spell of genius to harrow the soul, and absorb the wondering mind. But, formed of such stuff as dreams are made of, what are they to the mansion of despair, in one corner of which Maria sat, endeavouring to recall her scattered wits.

The 'mansion of despair' referred to is a lunatic asylum, where Maria has been incarcerated by her husband for pecuniary gain, separating her from her young children. The story quickly develops beyond the usual confinement-escape plot: Maria falls in love with a fellow inmate, with whom she elopes, and although the loves remained unfinished at Wollstonecraft's death, her notes indicate a subsequent disillusioned parting, regret and sad decline. This is far removed from the Radcliffean 'female' Gothic, and indeed none of the three women writers most closely associated with the Romantic poets - Wollstonecraft herself, > Dorothy Wordsworth and Mary Shelley - embraces the 'female' Gothic plot described above (Dorothy Wordsworth was in fact the recipient of the Coleridge letter mocking Radcliffe). Mary Shelley's powerful Frankenstein in particular declares its status as 'male' Gothic in its subtitle 'The Modern Prometheus', this mythological figure being the stealer of fire from the gods, and tied to a rock in eternal agonies, the archetypal damned hero of dark Romanticism. Frankenstein also transgresses the divine order in trying to create in his own image, and is explicitly associated with > Milton's Satan. The story is, of course, a powerful critique of the creation of a being without mothering, without any associates, no Eve for his Garden of Eden, nor friendly angels to advise.

The prevalence of Miltonic elements in Mary Shelley's Frankenstein is often attributed to the influence of her husband's reading of > Paradise Lost while she was writing her novel. There is, I believe, quite another reason why Milton's epic of the destruction of perfect human relations and the fall of nature provides a common source for Mary Shelley and for the hundreds of Gothic tales imitating Ann Radcliffe. In the late twentieth century, we may miss the radical elements in Milton's portrayal of sexual relations, being aware only of the hierarchy that makes Eve for Adam, while he is made for God - 'He for God only, she for God in him'. However, eighteenthcentury feminists, reading Milton in the context of a history of extreme misogyny, latched onto the dignity and intelligence of Milton's Eve; there were even editions of Paradise Lost that changed the line quoted above to 'He for God only, she for God and him' (my emphasis). In the context of this positive reading of Milton, the 'female' Gothic plot of entrapment of the heroine by a villain whose grandeur, pride and superhuman qualities mark him as a descendant of Milton's heroic Satan takes on a new resonance. It is a re-narrating of the scene of Eve's temptation by Satan in such a way that she is freed from guilt (because it is through no fault of her own that she is in his power), and also triumphs, she escaping her persecutor's clutches and he bringing him to justice. The scene in Radcliffe's Romance of the Forest in which Adeline is taken by the ruffians of a Marquis to his luxurious villa, where attempts on her virtue take the form of delicious fruits and ices, sweet music, delightful smells, the arts of poetry, oratory and the vanity of mirrors, parallels the wiles of the serpent tempting Eve to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge. Several references to the tempter of Milton's Comus point the moral.

The many references to the works of Milton, Shakespeare - which indeed exceed those of the later poet in frequency - and Collins, Thomson and other eighteenthcentury poets suggest the literary ambitions of the Gothic novel. At a time when Romantic poetry, notably the Lyrical Ballads, seeks to represent the rhythms of ordinary speech and the concerns of the countryman and peasant, the Gothic novel seeks a different, and elevated, poetic expression. Novels such as Radcliffe's and Charlotte Smith's contain many verses by their authors, put into the mouths of their characters, by which their heroines reach towards literary expression of their feelings of awe and delight. Tags from the English poets furthermore seek to situate Gothic writing in a specifically native tradition, which was only beginning to enjoy the status of 'classic' awarded primarily to Greek and Latin literature. Classical learning in this sense is denied most female Gothic writers, so they reach out to an alternative genealogy. Many Gothic tales were published in The Lady's Magazine, and despite its subtitle - Or, Entertaining Companion for the Fair Sex Appropriated Solely to their use and Enjoyment - which stressed entertainment, the frontispiece engraving showed a serious intent. It shows the Goddess of Wisdom, Minerva, pointing, with a lady in a well-stocked library reading The Lady's Magazine, towards a Pantheon, or 'Temple of Wisdom'. The publishing house that poured out most Gothic tales was also called The Minerva Press.

The quotation in the title of this chapter is from Act 1, Scene v of Shakespeare's Hamlet, and sounds a note of self-confidence in authorship when it heads Ann Radcliffe's A Sicilian Romance. Its context in the original play, however, gives it a darker meaning. The speaker is the ghost of Hamlet's father:

But that I am forbid
To tell the secrets of my prison-house
I could a tale unfold whose lightest word
Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
Make thy two eyes like stars start from their spheres,
Thy knotted and combined locks to part,
And each particular hair to stand on end
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine.

The most obvious effect of the Gothic novel is its ability to arouse fear and terror in its readers. Indeed, Joanna Baillie's play on the passion of fear, Orra (1815), concerns a girl who goes mad through giving herself up to superstitious terror, which has been fed by reading Gothic romances. In these tales, episodes of country rambling and delightful exploration of ruined abbeys which arouse elevated meditations are followed by terrifying discoveries of murdered corpses, or attacks by murderous monks. Although ghosts haunt the pages of the Gothic tale they are quite often explained away as natural phenomena. The view of critics like Coleridge (who renders the supernatural real in his own work) is that such a move to demystify shows a lack of confidence on behalf of Gothic authors, so that the whole plot collapses like a fairy palace into the air. This is, however, to miss the point of the terrific fears of the Gothic heroine, which are a form of testing. In > Northanger Abbey (1818), > Jane Austen's credulous heroine expects all the horrors of Udolpho to come true when she stays with the Tilneys in their ancient house; and she casts the General as a Montoni in wickedness, believing him to have murdered his former wife. Of course, he is nothing of the sort, and a great deal of comedy is extracted from Catherine's mistake. Yet, although her more exotic accusations are wrong, she is proved right in that Tilney is a tyrant − if a petty one − who unceremoniously throws her out of the house when he learns that she is not an heiress.

Northanger Abbey is a parody of a Gothic story, but in many ways it also possesses a true Gothic plot, in which the supernatural fear is removed only in order to reveal an actual bodily threat or deception. The castle around which ghostly sighs are expended in A Sicilian Romance, terrifying its inhabitants, is indeed haunted, but not by a spectre. Instead, its vaults contain the living person of the Marquis' first wife, who was immured there years before, so that he could remarry. The supernatural is demystified in order to reveal the unjust and demonic character of the Marquis, and of his order. There is an inherent feminism in the Gothic of the entrapped heroine, which is not to be found in the 'male' Gothic of Lewis and Maturin, in which the supernatural is an unquestioned reality. The heroines of 'female' Gothic learn to eschew the thrills of terror over dark passages and ghostly knocks in favour of religious awe and fear in the power of God's creation, to forego their fears of the seemingly sublime tyrant for the transposed power of the sublime. It is perhaps here that the form shows most clearly its critique of Romanticism. The heroines who become the true heirs of the tyrant's castle do not go on to inhabit their possession, but leave it to become even more ruined. There are moves today in post-structuralist literary criticism to deconstruct the claims of the Romantic poet to universality and harmony of vision and to elucidate instead an awareness of loss and the indeterminacy of meaning. This process is akin to the demystification of the sublime villain and his supernatural castle by the Gothic novel which acts to 'ruinate' his image. Perhaps we may even come to see the Gothic now not as some clumsy articulation of tropes that merely anticipates a glorious Romanticism, but rather see Romantic poetry itself, with its omnivorous claims and egotistical sublime, as merely a variation on the 'male' Gothic.

'The Babel din': 3 Theatre and European Romanticism

Edward Burns

The Romantic period seems like the last place one might look for drama, at least if what one is looking for are durable dramatic texts. As far as the literary history of English drama is concerned, the period is a kind of hiatus between the comedy of manners of the > Georgian stage and its revival in the > Victorian period in conjunction with a new realism and the importation from France of the well-made play. At the same time, theatricality is very much a part of Romanticism, as even our cultural stereotypes of the period reveal. We imagine Romantic poets in theatrical and cinematic clichés; we picture them, enjoying a flamboyant self-presentation, or we cosily enshrine their quietism. Poets of no other period are dramatic characters in this sense. Behind the clichés is an intuition of the importance of theatre to the period. Yet it is a paradoxical importance, in which a distrust of and revulsion from theatre is as important as a belief in the medium, and in which the results of the writers' worrying at, subverting, deconstructing the processes of theatrical communication can be seen as fully in other forms of writing as on the stage itself.

In Britain in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the theatre as an institution moves decisively from the position of cultural centrality it had occupied from the late Middle Ages onward. This is in sharp contrast to the role theatre played in the development of European Romanticism. The riot that took place at the first performance of Victor Hugo's Ernani is often seen as a pivotal moment in French culture, as a break away from classical tradition and the establishing triumph of Romantic form and feeling. The critic and philosopher Madame de Staël in Germania analyses the difference between northern and southern Europe in terms of opposing trends in drama, and, writing in the aftermath of the > French Revolution argues that the invention of a new form of tragedy is a necessary response to the historical moment. Germany saw a revolution in standards of theatrical production and design under the patronage of the provincial courts, and the transition from classicism was again played out on the stage - in the late classical works of ⊳ Goethe, in the historical plays of Schiller, and in the exploration of extremes of feeling and situation in the ironic tragedy of Kleist, and Buchner. Both in Germany and in Italy opera was the medium of politically engaged Romanticism and of the bourgeois Romanticism of private feeling - in the pathos of Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor or the popular and nationalist propaganda of Verdi's Nabucco, the political mythopoeia of Wagner's Ring, or the picturesque pathos of Weber's Der Freischütz. The development of theatre in Europe is very much a product of its direct engagement with political and social change. In European culture the idea of a 'theatre revolution' is by several degrees less absurd than in England.

In Britain in this period; theatre occupies a culturally marginal position, seemingly more escapist than engaged. Theatrical activity tended to the condition of pantomime, > Gothic melodrama or farce. One can see this in the case of a work like the German composer Weber's opera Oberon, where centrally Romantic concerns - the creation of Keatsian (> Keats) alternative worlds of fancy from the medieval, the oriental and the faery - has to be fitted to the mixed form of an English musical entertainment, as dictated by the taste of Madame Vestris' regime at Covent Garden, and realized in a libretto of spectacular numbers sketchily linked by Planché's doggerel rhyme. It is ironic then that the major aesthetic impulse towards European Romantic form in theatre and music came from English dramatic texts, largely through the rediscovery of the plays of > Shakespeare, seen as combining a powerful appeal to feeling, a broadly democratic (in the sense of non-aristocratic) representation of history, and an apparently 'natural' flexibility of form. British writers, writing for or about the theatre, are just as frustrated and exacerbated by the limits and problems of theatrical representation as they are excited by its possibilities. But the reasons for this are as much internal to the impulses and attitudes of English Romanticism as they are attributable to the contemporary state of theatrical practice. The second might as well be seen as a result of the first. To understand English Romantic theatre we should look first at the phenomenon of the antitheatrical, not as opposition to the theatre as an institution, from a political and religious point of view (like that of the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Puritans), but as a creative response that problematizes theatrical representation. British Romanticism turns theatre inside out, to find new theatrical forms, or to take over the formal and philosophical opportunities made visible in this process into other media.

Theatre and Anti-theatre

Charles Lamb gives the classic statement of the anti-theatrical position in his On the Tragedies of Shakespeare, considered with reference to their Fitness for Stage Representation (1812):

It may seem a paradox, but I cannot help being of opinion that the plays of Shakspeare [sic] are less calculated for performance on a stage, than those of almost any dramatist whatever. Their distinguishing excellence is a reason that they should be so. There is so much in them, which comes not under the province of acting, with which eye, and tone, and gesture, have nothing to do.

The glory of the scenic art is to personate passion; and the more coarse and palpable the passion is, the more hold upon the eyes and ears of the spectator the performer obviously possesses . . . The sublime images, the poetry alone, is that which is present to our minds in the reading.

So to see Lear acted, – to see an old man tottering about the stage with a walkingstick, turned out of doors by his daughters in a rainy night, has nothing in it but what is painful and disgusting. We want to take him into shelter and relieve him. That is all the feeling that the acting of Lear ever produced in me. But the Lear of Shakespeare cannot be acted.

For Lamb the problem is the contrast between the means the stage uses to communicate a feeling or an idea, and the immensity of that idea or the intensity of that feeling. As he says later of costume and scenery:

I remember the last time I saw Macbeth played, the discrepancy I felt at the changes of garment which he varied . . . if things must be represented, I see not what to find fault with in this. But in reading, what robe are we conscious of? Some dim images of royalty – a crown and sceptre, may float before our eyes, but who shall describe the fashion of it? . . . This is the inevitable consequence of imitating everything, to make all things natural. Whereas the reading of a tragedy is a fine abstraction.

'Dim images ... fine abstraction ...' Lamb values reading above theatrical spectatorship for its very freedom from the specific and the material.

A split response to theatre is typical of English Romanticism, an emotionally and intellectually irreconcilable split between the limitations of theatre as a material and social phenomenon, and the transcendant possibilities, the metaphysical sublimity or psychological intensity which can be produced by certain theatrical texts or the powers of certain performers. The first is often characterized in terms of its inadequacy to the second, and that inadequacy can be presented as grotesquely comic, pitiful, sinister, or in its way rather charming. The idea that the written is of a subtlety superior to the visual seems at first almost commonsensical to us, which suggests how influential Romantic anti-theatricalism is in British culture. But to a pre-Romantic spectator, these sentiments would seem maladroit or eccentric. To make a broad contrast to eighteenth-century perceptions of theatre, one might point to the moment in Henry Fielding's Tom Jones (1749) when Tom and his companion Partridge go to see Hamlet performed by David Garrick, the great actor who above all others raised the perceived aesthetic and social status of acting, but whose revered memory is also under attack in Lamb's polemic:

... Partridge was all attention, nor did he break silence till the entrance of the ghost; upon which he asked Jones, 'What man that was in the strange dress; something,' said he, 'like what I have seen in a picture. Sure it is not armour, is it?' Jones answered, 'That is the ghost.' To which Partridge replied with a smile, 'Persuade me to that, sir, if you can. Though I can't say I ever actually saw a ghost in my life, yet I am certain I should know one, if I saw him, better than that comes to. No, no sir, ghosts don't appear in such dresses as that neither.' In this mistake, which caused much laughter in the neighbourhood of Partridge, he was suffered to continue, 'till the scene between the ghost and Hamlet, when Partridge gave that credit to Mr Garrick, which he had denied to Jones, and fell into so violent a trembling, that his knees knocked against each other, Jones asked him what was the matter, and whether he was afraid of the warrior upon the stage? 'O la! sir,' said he, 'I perceive it is now what you told me ... but if that little man there upon the stage is not frightened, I never saw any man frightened in my life ...'

The difference between Lamb and Fielding is that the joke here is on Partridge, not on the actors. Here it is the inept, not the aesthetically super-sensitive spectator who can't find the necessary mind-set, the necessary ability to be simultaneously moved by a performance and to retain a sense of its medium. A more adept pre-Romantic spectator would be able to contain his or her participation in the imaginative transaction within an acceptance of the material facts of theatrical communication. Samuel Johnson gives the most cogent expression of the pre-Romantic perception of theatre in his Preface to The Plays of William Shakespeare (1765):

The truth is, that the spectators are always in their senses, and know, from the first act to the last, that the stage is only a stage, and that the players are only players. They come to hear a certain number of lines recited with just gesture and elegant modulation. The lines relate to some action, and an action must be in some place.

Within these terms, the disjunction between the means of representation and the thing represented is acceptable, non-problematic, and often exploited confidently for theatrical effect.

If Romantic writers worry at the validity of theatrical representation, they never do so in quite so crude a way as to simply reject the stage altogether. Hazlitt, Keats, and > De Quincey, to give just three examples, wrote powerfully of the impact on them of stage performances of Shakespeare. When Keats writes on the star Shakespearian actor > Edmund Kean (in 'Mr Kean', a review in The Champion, 21 December 1817), he celebrates just that importation of the body into performance through the written text, which for Lamb and others is disruptive of the seriousness of theatrical texts:

There is an indescribable gusto in the voice, by which we feel that the utterer is thinking of the past and the future while thinking of the instant. When he says in 'Othello' 'put up your bright swords for the dew will rust them,' we feel that his throat has commanded where swords were as thick as reeds. From eternal risk, he speaks as though his body were unassailable.

The actor's voice and presence here flesh out, literally, the written verse, in ways that parallel Keats' straining after a sense of the physical in his own writing. Hazlitt's response is not simply to an intensity of aesthetic effect and psychological insight as, when he writes of Coriolanus, to the immediate relevance of the politics of the plays to the public unrest of the times.

Shakespear [sic] has in this play shewn himself well versed in history and state-affairs. 'Coriolanus' is a store-house of political common-places. Any one who studies it may save himself the trouble of reading Burke's 'Reflections', or Paine's 'Rights of Man', or the debates in both Houses of Parliament since the French Revolution or our own. The arguments for or against aristocracy or democracy, on the privileges of the few and the claims of the many, on liberty and slavery, power and the abuse of it, peace and war, are here very ably handled . . .

For De Quincey, in 'On the Knocking on the Gate in Macbeth', from the > London Magazine of October 1823, the imaginative power of Macbeth allows us to share the world of the murderer, while Shakespeare's attention to the theatrical effect of the mundane ensures that the effect of the play lies in that conjunction of the imaginative and the material which, being at the heart of theatrical representation, is for Lamb the very reason for disowning the medium:

... when the deed is done, when the work of darkness is perfect, then the world of darkness passes away like a pageantry in the clouds: the knocking at the gate is heard; and it makes known audibly that the reaction has commenced; the human has made its reflux upon the fiendish; the pulses of life are beginning to beat again; and the reestablishment of the goings-on of the world in which we live, first makes us profoundly sensible of the awful parenthesis which had suspended them.

This access to heightened experience, in a kind of retreat from, and subsequent return to the real, can be a quintessentially Romantic pursuit of intense and even forbidden feeling, but its meaning can be reversed as pure escape. Lamb himself writes engagingly of the charms of stage comedy, though in ways that neutralize it as a social event, depriving it of any critical or political force:

I am glad for a season to take an airing beyond the diocese of the strict consciense,—not to live always in the precincts of the law-courts,—but now and then, for a dreamwhile or so, to imagine a world with no meddling restrictions—to get into recessess, whither the hunter cannot follow me... I come back to my cage and my restraint the fresher and more healthy for it.

('On the Artificial Comedy of the Last Century', 1822)

Theatre here has lost any power of its own, becoming instead the vehicle of a kind of pathos. Its flimsiness and evanescence are an appeal to the Romantic sensibility, through which it acquires a beauty and a meaning it does not in itself possess.

Spectacle and Meaning; Wordsworth at the Theatre

In his > autobiographical poem > The Prelude (1805), > Wordsworth tracks the growth of his own poetic powers against the itinerary of his life to the date of writing. His 'Residence in London', the subject of Book Seven, takes him through a progression of 'spectacles'; life itself is a random and confusing sort of theatre. His description of the city moves from the drama of London street life −

... the quick dance
Of colours, lights, and forms; the Babel din;
The endless stream of men, and moving things ...

- through 'raree shows', 'troops of wild beasts, birds and beasts/ of every nature', panoramas in paint or modelling

By scale exact, in model, wood or clay, From shading colours also borrowing help, Some miniature of famous spots and things . . .

to more established forms of theatre,

... where living men,
Music, and shifting pantomimic scenes,
Together joined their multifarious aid
To heighten the allurement. Need I fear
To mention by its name ...
Half rural Sadlers Wells?

Wordsworth leads us through this maze with constant injunctions to 'see' – so establishing the continuity of theatrical spectatorship with our response to the wider scope of London life; so setting us up, with him, as a wondering audience. The theatre itself is an enchanting concentration of instances of human ingenuity and credulity, and the end to which it points is a loving acknowledgement of the weakness of mankind, of our need for representations of the outside world, in 'imitations, fondly made in plain/ Confession of man's weakness and his loves'. As with Lamb, the inadequacy of theatre is its charm – more than charm in this case, as it points towards a human truth.

This then is one Romantic attitude to theatre – its flimsiness is a token of our own, and recuperable by the imagination as a symbol of transience, a kind of pathos. Wordworth offers examples which identify that pathos with the feminine:

... I am crossed

Here by rememberance of two figures, one
A rosy babe ... child as beautiful
As ever sate upon a mother's knee;
The other was that parent of that babe;
But on the mother's cheek the tints were false,
A painted bloom. 'Twas at a theatre
That I beheld this pair ...

This falseness and frailty of this 'fallen woman' has been brought to his mind by his memory of a play about another, but that was

... too holy theme for such a place, And doubtless treated with irreverence Albeit with their very best of skill, I mean, o distant friend! a story drawn From our own ground, – the Maid of Buttermere.

The theme may be too easily profaned in its shocking transposition from private contemplation to the public stage, but its place on that stage, and the train of thought that it sets on, is typical of one Romantic association - of the fragility and falseness of theatre, and the frailty of the feminine. One might think of the centrality of the fallen woman, Verdi's eponymous La Traviata, for example, or its source, Dumas' La Dame aux Camélias, to nineteenth-century opera and to the 'well-made play' of the French and English theatre of the mid- to late century; also of the nineteenth-century cult of the ballerina, a cult that depended on the dancer's use of her own athletic ability to transcend the body in the representation of the ethereal, while at the same time inevitably offering to the spectator the spectacle of her own physical vulnerability, and/or, in certain contexts, her sexual availability. There was an appalling death rate among the star teenage ballerinas of the Paris stage caused by the vulnerability of their gauze costumes to the gas used to light the theatres, a fact that increased their star status in a morbid overlap with the roles of sylphs, butterflies and willi into which their femininity was idealized. The frailty of theatrical illusion is also the frailty moral and physical, untrustworthy and desirable - of woman.

But this characterization of theatre can be elided with another; theatre can crystallize the troubled relation of sights to words, and thus can lead back to the problem of human knowledge. Wordsworth notes:

The champion, Jack the Giant-killer; Lo! He dons his coat of darkness; on the stage Walks, and achieves his wonders, from the eyes Of living mortal safe as is the moon 'Hid in her vacant interlunar cave'. Delusion bold! and faith must needs be coy; How is it wrought? His garb is black, the word 'Invisible' flames forth upon his chest.

Because it relies on both spectacle and words and because, more crucially, it opens up that cultural, post-Enlightenment, shift in which the relation between the two cannot be taken for granted, theatre can make available to the Romantic writer the mystery and problems of belief inherent in our relation to other beings and to the universe.

Jack jokily anticipates a moment later in the book which Wordsworth introduces with a metaphor linking London street-life back to the theatre:

Amid the moving pageant, 'twas my chance Abruptly to be smitten with the view Of a blind Beggar, who, with upright face, Stood, propped against a wall, upon his chest Wearing a written paper, to explain The story of the man, and who he was. My mind did at this spectacle turn round As with the might of waters, and it seemed To me that in this label was a type, Or emblem, of the utmost that we know, Both of ourselves and of the universe; And, on the shape of the unmoving man, His fixed face and sightless eyes, I looked, As if admonished from another world.

The blind man poses the problem of reading spectacle in a more serious context than does Jack. > Byron's Cain, in the play of the same name (1821), falls prey to Lucifer in his attempt to make sense of the received word in terms of his own visionary experience:

Thou speaks't to me of things which long have swum In visions through my thought: I never could Reconcile what I saw with what I heard.

Cain rebels against the restriction of 'the word' in that it can only tell him of a reality defined by God's law or the narrative of his father's fall. Lucifer operates in the gap between words and vision – the space of theatre, and of an ineluctable mystery. Poems in Wordsworth's > Lyrical Ballads (1798) turn on a similar problem of knowledge, opened up by the gap between what we see in human beings or on the landscape, and what we hear, read or say. Knowledge of the other may always be beyond our grasp. Here the sense of the failure of theatre is presented as the irreconcilable demands of word and spectacle, whose paradoxical conjunction can lead us to a more profound idea, that of the mystery that conditions our being in the world.

A third version of theatre, of spectacle given meaning in attention to its inevitable aesthetic failure, is animated at the end of the book in the description of Bartholomew Fair, the great annual summer fair that had been a London institution since the Middle Ages:

What a Hell
For eyes and ears! what anarchy and din
Barbarian and infernal, — 'tis a dream,
Monstrous in colour, motion, shape, sight, sound!

Wordsworth goes on to list:

... buffoons against buffoons Grimacing, writhing, screaming, – him who grinds The hurdy-gurdy, at the fiddle weaves, Rattles the salt-box, thumps the kettle-drum, And him who at the trumpet puffs his cheeks, The silver-collared negro with his timbrel, Equestrians, tumblers, women, girls, and boys, Blue breeched, pink-vested, and with towering plumes.

This chaos, to be contrasted with the orderly rural celebration that starts the next book, is an image of Hell. We can find similar ideas of violent and chaotic carnival in many Romantic artists. Theatre, spectacle, masquerade, all are potentially sinister, in that nothing, or some evil violent impulse, may lurk behind masks and role play. Theatre is the domain of the monstrous, in Goya, Ensor or Poe. Perhaps there is an intuition here of the closeness of carnival and revolution. Simon Sharma in his book Citizens points out that many activists in the French Revolution were theatre people. Revolution is in itself a theatrical act, in that it must convince, proselytize or terrify through acts that are witnessed and have been calculated for their emblematic concision and their powerful impact. Carlyle, in The French Revolution, presents events visually, in a flamboyantly decorative style that suggests a kind of phantasmagoria or violent pantomime, from which the English reader is protected by the Channel, as a kind of orchestra pit. More domestically, but just as subversively, theatre in > Jane Austen's > Mansfield Park (1814) provides the outlet for anti-social energies seen, however limited their scope to work, as disruptively libidinous.

So in these three instances, reading Wordsworth for what he shares with a wider Romantic culture, we encounter a perception of theatre in which a sense of the inadequacy of dramatic representation, the uncertain relation of material means to transcendent ends, can paradoxically be recouped by the Romantic imagination as a source of pathos and charm, of epistemological mystery, or as the threat of chaos and transgressive impulse.

Poets in the Theatre

For a while Byron was a member of the sub-committee of management of the > Drury Lane Theatre:

- the number of plays upon the shelves were about five hundred; ... the Scenes I had to go through! - the authors - and the authoresses - the Milliners - the wild Irishmen - the people from Brighton - from Blackwell - from Chatham - from Cheltenham - from Dublin - from Dundee - who came in upon me! - to all of whom it was proper to give a civil answer - and a hearing - and a reading - Mrs Glover's father an Irish dancing Master of Sixty years - called upon me to request to play 'Archer' - drest in silk-stockings on a frosty morning to show his legs - (which were certainly good & Irish for his age) - & had been still better - Miss Emma Somebody with a play entitled the 'Bandit of Bohemia' - or some such title or production - Mr O'Higgins - then resident at Richmond - with an Irish tragedy in which the unities could not fail to be observed for the protagonist was chained by the leg to a pillar during the chief part of the performance . . .

The Dickensian exuberance of this description – written in Byron's self-imposed exile – has something of Wordsworth's mixture of relish and distrust for the theatrical enterprise. It must be set against Byron's panic when he heard that one of his plays, the Venetian tragedy Marino Faliero (1821), was to be given a London performance:

I have nothing more at heart – (that is in literature) than to prevent this drama from going upon the Stage; – in short – rather than permit it – it must be suppressed altogether . . . What damned fools these speculating buffoons must be not to see that it is unfit for their Fair or their booth.

There is an aristocratic disdain here for the compromised business of theatrical production, masking a real fear of exposure to a judging audience (a fear that motivates Faliero, a victim of slander and its obsessive avenger, within the play). The incident highlights the paradoxical conjunction of theatricality and intense privacy in Byron's own self-presentation. Like Wordsworth's worries about theatre, it raises the immediate question – then why write plays? Why do the complete works of almost any nineteenth-century poet end with a sequence of obscure, largely unread, dramas?

One answer lies in the growing reverence for Shakespeare, and the rediscovery of his contemporaries, as shown in Lamb's Specimens of English Dramatic Poets, who lived about the time of Shakespeare (1808). The acting of Garrick and Macklin in the mideighteenth century, and Garrick's interest in visually powerful stagings, aiming at a maximum of emotional impact, helped to create a cult of Shakespeare as the great dramatist of character, of individuals forced to confront metaphysical and emotional extremes. Shakespeare becomes the writer to emulate, as a genius whose imaginative powers transcend the limits of individual selfhood. As Keats puts it in a famous letter of 1817, implicitly comparing himself to Shakespeare:

As to the poetical character itself (I mean that sort, of which, if I am anything, I am a member; that sort distinguished from the Wordsworthian, or egotistical sublime; which is a thing per se, and stands alone), it is not itself – it has no self – it has every thing and nothing – it has no character – it enjoys light and shade – it lives in gusto, be it foul or fair, high or low, rich or poor, mean or elevated, – it has as much delight in conceiving an Iago as an Imogen; what shocks the virtuous philosopher delights the chameleon poet.

But in emulating Shakespeare by employing dramatic form, Romantic writers tackle what they already perceive as the near-insoluble problem of imitating a supreme genius who managed to be the greatest poet and the greatest dramatist in one. Their aim becomes decisively unattainable – the aim of creating the art-work that combines both language and action at their highest intensity to create something which seems to transcend the material means of both. Keats achieves what he sees as the Shakespearian quality much more convincingly in his non-dramatic verse than in his plays King Stephen or Otho the Great.

It is ironic that an impetus to bardolatry that came from the theatre, particularly from Garrick, should then - as for Lamb - act towards the marginalization of theatre. But at the same time, the presence of powerful actors provided a major stimulus for writing. The Romantic theatre is a theatre of stars; Edmund Kean, William Charles Macready and ⊳ Sarah Siddons all stimulated writers like Hazlitt and Keats to vivid response and reaction. Performing in large, gaslit theatres, they promoted a style of playing in which plays are conceived of as a collection of individual roles, and in which those roles are thought of as a series of moments of high-impact emotion, developed through the actors' larger-than-life presence as the unfolding of an intense, if monolithic, character. The actors were stars in that their personal charisma became part of the material through which they created characters, and through which, in a broader sense, the human and the transcendent could be linked in an event whose transience was part of its Romantic meaning. Lamb writes dismissively of 'Mrs S's . . . thrilling tones' and '... impressive looks'. But for Hazlitt, in 'On Mrs Siddons' and in 'Mr Kemble's Retirement' (from A View of the London Stage, 1818), such personal attributes point to 'something above nature':

She raised Tragedy to the skies, or brought it down from thence . . . Power was seated on her brow, passion emanated from her breast as from a shrine. She was tragedy personified. She was the stateliest ornament of the public mind. She was not only the idol of the people, she not only hushed the tumultuous shouts of the pit in breathless expectation, and quenched the blaze of surrounding beauty in silent tears, but to the retired and lonely student, through long years of solitude, her face has shone as if an eye had appeared from heaven; her name has been as if a voice had opened the chambers of the human heart, or as if a trumpet had awakened the sleeping and the dead. To have seen Mrs Siddons, was an event in every one's life.

Hazlitt's praise of Kemble points to those qualities of Romantic acting which shaped a contemporary conception of Shakespeare, and which dictated the structure and emphasis of plays inevitably conceived as star vehicles:

His person was moulded to the character. The weight of sentiment which oppressed him was never suspended . . . So in Coriolanus, he exhibited the ruling passion with the same haughty dignity of demeanour, the same energy of will, and unbending strenness of temper throughout. He was swayed by a single impulse . . . in such characters, Mr Kemble had no occasion to call to his aid either the resources of invention, or the tricks of the art: his success depended on the increasing intensity with which he dwelt on a given feeling, or enforced a passion that resisted all interference or control.

Romantic writers wanted to tap this kind of power – > Shelley wrote > The Cenci (1819) for Eliza O'Neill, > Coleridge rewrote Osorio (1797), initially commissioned through Byron's agency as Remorse, after it was then rejected by > Sheridan; it was performed successfully at the Drury Lane Theatre in 1813. The actors inspire the creation of an intense, internalized, often deliberately obscure vein of feeling in the central character, whose unfolding and realization in action is the dynamic of the piece. Less happily, the hierarchies of the star system ensure that other figures are more sketchily and stereotypically conceived.

Whatever level of achievement is represented by these two plays – for The Cenci is perhaps the most theatrically powerful of English Romantic plays, and in Remorse Coleridge makes intriguing use of a scenic and narrative form that is romantic in the older sense (the sense in which Shakespeare's late plays are called romances) to track his psychological and ethical interests – the most impressive body of dramatic work was produced by a writer who stayed deliberately aloof from the two overwhelming influences of the genius of Shakespeare and the charisma of the Romantic actor. Byron marks a deliberate distance not only from the English stage of his time, but from Shakespeare and his contemporaries, 'the mad old English dramatists', whom he sees as equally inimical to the creation of an aesthetically satisfying and philosophically serious theatre. Instead his models are the Italian dramatist Alfieri, and, in the case of The Deformed Transformed (1824), Goethe's > Faust. But neo-classical English plays – Dryden's All For Love in the case of Sardanapalus (1821) and Otway's Venice Preserv'd in relation to Marino Faliero – allow him to place himself in an alternative tradition to the Shakespearean.

The most immediately striking feature of his dramatic oeuvre is the extreme energy, the voraciousness for subject matter, which shape a sequence varied in form but closely interlinked in essential concerns. Byron wrote most of the plays at Ravenna, between 1821 and 1823, in parallel to a spate of self-searching journal writing. An obsession with time, a fascination with the individual as defined against its passing, and his attempt to piece together some token against it, in fame or memory, is common to both. The protagonists of the drama are often presented as literally or figuratively 'on the brink', caught facing obliteration, but in that fact, in that moment, the more clearly defined as irreducibly individual. The two biblical plays, or 'Mysteries', show Byron at his most revolutionary in form and argument. Cain presents an archetypal Romantic protagonist, impelled by his dissatisfaction with the word of the father, the word of God as received by Adam; rejecting the patriarchal order that that imposes, he seeks knowledge in dialogue with Lucifer, and a flight into 'the abyss of space'. At the end, after his murder of Abel, his identity is marked ineradicably on him, 'the mark of Cain' which will protect him from human violence, but show him also as an outsider, condemned to wander the earth, exiled both by God and by the curse of his mother Eve. This individuating alienation, the expulsion not simply from society, but from 'natural' human relations, as represented here by a mother-child relationship, is repeated in other plays by Byron, and is visible too in figures like the 'Daemon' in > Mary Shelley's > Frankenstein (1817), or Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798). In Heaven and Earth (1822), Byron takes up the story of Cain's descendants, as rebels against and victims of the biblical word; Anah and Aholibamah are loved by rebel angels, who rescue them from the deluge by taking them to some other planet, to form an alternative world; but the play ends with Japhet, the son of Noah who also loves Anah, contemplating the flood that has swept away all other human life except for that contained within the Ark, which, as the curtain falls, sails towards him, offering unwanted rescue.

The confident apocalyptic vision of these plays is matched by the forging of a new dramatic language, a kind of beginning-of-the-world style, transparent, flexible, and carefully freed from the conventional pseudo-Shakespearian linguistic gestures that can bring so many other Romantic plays dangerously close to pastiche. The push of the play is towards the protagonist's discovery of a language through which he can confront his universe in his own terms, and free himself from those that build oppressive imaginative structures around him. The historical plays ground a similar conflict in 'the labyrinth of statecraft'; in The Two Foscari (1821), a doge of Venice is forced to preside over the torture and death of his son, and in Marino Faliero, another elderly doge is impelled by his inability to gain legal redress for a slander on his young wife to join a rebellion against the state of which he is nominally head, and is punished not only by death, but by the official obliteration of his memory. In both plays the male characters are rendered powerless within the apparent exercise of power, by their own inability to think outside the terms that power sets for them. By contrast, the women, Marina and Angiolina, respectively, like the women in the Mysteries, stand outside these structures, are fluid and active where the men are trapped, but end unable to resist the processes they oppose. Myrrha, in Sardanapalus, is another of the strong, centrally placed woman characters who distinguish Byron's plays from those of most English dramatists of any period. Sardanapalus himself refuses to engage with the historical role set down for him as Assyrian emperor, preferring to exist within the unchronicled life of drink, appetite and a freely-indulged bisexuality, but in his love for Myrrha, and in his out-facing of palace revolution, he shapes a historic role for himself in the lyrical act of a flamboyant Romantic suicide.

He mounts the pile
Now, Myrrha!
Myr. Art thou ready?
Sar. As the torch in thy grasp.

MYRRHA fires the pile.

Myr. 'Tis fired! I come.

(As MYRRHA springs forward to throw herself into the flames, the Curtain falls).

The unfinished Deformed Transformed runs ironic, magical variations on some of those themes, in its Faustian tale of a hunchback who is granted a beautiful heroic body by a dark stranger and transported by him to fulfil an historic role in the Bourbon siege of Rome. The sardonic, puppet-like style of the play, with its casually spectacular action and arch games of historic and sexual identity, make it a kind of cartoon-strip version of Byron's most personal concerns, an improvisation for which an infinite number of endings, and therefore none at all, can be projected.

In complete contrast to Byron's practice, Shelley in The Cenci works consciously from within a Shakespearean and > Jacobean tradition, seeking to combine this with the sacred sense of tragedy and taboo that informs his two favourite Greek plays, Sophocles' Antigone and Oedipus Tyrannos. The two lead roles, Beatrice Cenci and the Count her father - a Sadean figure whose infinite cruelty and capacity for evil is a perverse expression of his sense of himself as God's substitute within the patriarchal family - are conceived of in terms of the charisma and sustained emotionally intensity of the star Romantic actor. The subject - the Count's rape of his daughter and her parricidal revenge - again encapsulates an archetypal Romantic conflict, at the end of which Beatrice, proclaiming her innocence, becomes a radical image of idealistic revolution: 'what a world we make of it,' she says, 'the oppressor and the oppressed'. Though father-daughter incest was not representable on the London stage, the play (with Cain, the most frequently revived of the period) is crucially of the stage, in that Beatrice's appeal across time and through memory to the sympathy of an audience is close to what Shelley thinks tragedy is for, as he describes it in > A Defence of Poetry (1821). Sympathy both redeems the injustices of history, and improves its audiences in an extension of their capacity for pity and love. Shelley makes sympathetic and creative use of his Jacobean precedents - particularly Webster's The Duchess of Malfi and Shakespeare's Othello and Antony and Cleopatra - to create a tragic heroine whose victory is her remaking of herself into a kind of icon for future generations. To that extent the sense of the past that colours the verbal style is as much a part of the effect of the play as the questioning simplicity and freshness of Byron's language in Cain.

There was of course a vast amount of new writing for the Romantic stage coming from outside this group of major poets; but though our interest is inevitably focused on writers we know from their work in other genres, the context of their work can be supplied from elsewhere. Questions of power are paramount in the theatre of the period. > Walpole's pioneering play The Mysterious Mother (1768), like his Gothic novel > The Castle of Otranto, situates power witin the family, and uses a halfserious Gothic fiction to explore the Oedipal relation of family, power, and sexuality, within a flamboyantly visual theatrical mode. Milman's The Destruction of Jerusalem takes on historical and biblical themes in terms of an implicitly anti-semitic Christian providentialism. Both plays are Romantic in their investment in revolutionary change, and the polarity of the two - Walpole's investment in the subversion of the family, as opposed to Milman's in the expression of an epochal moment - represents interests that Byron and Shelley were able to combine, creating dramas where familial conflict and personal crises of identity are expressions of rifts and eruptions in a social and cosmic order perceived as patriarchal; in the strict biblical sense in the case of Byron's Mysteries, in Shelley's, in the creation of a > Renaissance world-view informed by his fascinated if atheistical interest in the structures of the Catholic church.

Wordsworth and Coleridge, like Shelley, create villainous protagonists who represent in some sense the opposite of their project for the play. In The Borderers (1797), Wordsworth centres the play on Rivers (Oswald in the 1842 revision), a character of mysterious motives, Iago-like in the terms of Coleridge's conception of Iago - a figure of 'motiveless malignancy'. Wordsworth's characters are borderers in a literal sense, living on the Anglo-Scottish borders, but they are 'borderers' in a figurative sense also. As an ex-Crusader, Oswald exists between the occidental, Christian world, and another more mysterious life. He impels the other characters towards liminal states of mind, a process that climaxes in his involving Mortimer/Marmaduke in the motiveless murder of a virtuous old man. Wordsworth denied that the play in general, and this character in particular, had anything to do with his sense of the French Revolution. It is nevertheless hard to escape a sense that new psychological and moral possibilities - particularly in relation to a perverse idealism or to an abstract villainy of self-convinced integrity - are made available to these dramatists by their own attempts to come to terms with the Revolution, the Terror, and the rise of > Napoleon.

Drama by Negatives: Closet drama and the Legacy of Experiment

The Borderers is structured deictically – that is, its scenes, dialogues and narrations point to, rather than enact, an event. It is thus more like the semi-dramatic form of sections of Lyrical Ballads than it is like The Cenci or Cain. It points to events in the past, or to psychological events whose relation to action one has simply to take for granted. Although this builds towards a compellingly original dramatic form, it also raises the same issue as Byron's worry about performances of Faliero. How far are these plays of the stage? The term 'closet drama' seems appropriate not only to Romantic plays, but to the form Shakespeare takes in Romantic reading. Coleridge is reported to have said in a lecture that:

He had seen Mrs Siddons as Lady, and Kemble as Macbeth – these might be the Macbeth's of the Kembles, but they were not the Macbeth's of Shakespear; he was therefore not grieved at the enormous size and monopoly of the theatres, which naturally produced many bad and but few good actors; and which drove Shakespear from the stage, to find his proper place, in the heart and in the closet . . .

In the 1805 version of The Prelude 'the imaginative power . . . slept' at the theatre despite Wordsworth's passionate response 'to the changes of the scene':

Passed not beyond the suburbs of the mind;
If aught there were of real grandeur here
'Twas only then when gross realities,
The incarnation of the spirits that moved
Amid the Poet's beauteous world, called forth
With that distinctness which a contrast gives
Or opposition, made me recognize
As by a glimpse, the things which I had shaped,

And yet not shaped, had seen and scarcely seen,
Had felt, and thought of in my solitude.

In the 1850 version that last line becomes:

When, having closed the mighty Shakespeare's page, I mused, and thought, and felt, in solitude.

This serves to clarify some very abstract reasoning, but at the same time it marks a displacement of the theatrical experience by the 'page', a decisive appropriation of Shakespeare for private 'musing'. Shakespeare's place for many of the Romantics is somewhere between stage and page, in private recitation. Wordsworth and his sister > Dorothy read Shakespeare aloud in their garden at Grasmere, and readings from Shakespeare are much more acceptable at Mansfield Park than a full-scale performance of > Mrs Inchbald's translation of Lovers' Vows (1798). The key Shakespeare texts are those that lend themselves to the solitary imagination. A Midsummer Night's Dream, Romeo and Juliet and Hamlet generate fantasies that colour decisively the visual arts and music of the period. All three plays are plays of fancy and introspection where the theatre, in A Midsummer Night's Dream and Hamlet especially, is as unstable an amalgam of the compelling and the inadequate as it is for the Romantics.

The term closet drama is more usefully applied to texts in dramatic form which none the less explore the unstageable, visionary imagination. In Byron's Manfred, the hero's solitary encounters with a spirit world, as well as the mysteries of his melancholic temperament and necromantic powers, invite us to visualize for ourselves, but baffle any attempt to fix our ideas in physical form. Byron thus exploits the halfpictorial conjuring of the imagination which Lamb found preferable to the materiality of the stage. The spirit voices are created as lyrical interventions, somehow outside the text, but not given any clear identity or placing. Shelley's Prometheus Bound again exploits the visionary potential of closet drama, with an aptness to an action that is essentially the action of language itself, in the shift from a tragic discourse to a language of love and liberty; the tragedy dissolves into an ideal action, as physical and mental suffering are transcended. But it would be a mistake to use this as a convenient category for plays that are simply unconventional in their theatrical demands. Even Byron's impossibly extravagant stage directions (like Wagner's) are theatrical, if in the perverse sense of the theatrically anti-theatrical, of theatre against itself. They are best seen as experimental, as attempts to remake theatre, to operate at its limits. Cain was admired and staged by Stanislavsky and Grotowski, The Cenci by Antonin Artaud; indeed these practitioners of the twentieth-century avant-garde can be seen to be the heirs of Romantic theatre. The push towards new forms in which theatre transcends itself, in which the material is somehow consumed in a spiritual or metaphysical force, is most powerfully developed in Artaud's The Theatre and Its Double, his manifesto for a 'theatre of cruelty':

In the anguished, catastrophic period we live in, we feel an urgent need for a theatre which events do not exceed, whose resonance is deep within us, dominating the instability of the times.

Our long habit of seeking diversion has made us forget the idea of a serious theatre, which, overturning all our preconceptions, inspires us with the fiery magnetism of its images and acts upon us like a spiritual therapeutics whose touch can never be forgotten.

Everything that acts is a cruelty. It is upon this idea of extreme action, pushed beyond all limits, that theatre must be rebuilt.

Keats, writing of Kean, and quoting Coleridge's formulation in Christabel (1816) of an hallucinatory exploration of sexual nightmare, celebrates the intensity of theatrical representation, its mysterious agency, its acting on its audience, in strikingly Artaudian term:

The spiritual is felt when the very letters and prints of charactered language show like the hieroglyphics of beauty; — the mysterious signs of an immortal freemasonry! 'A thing to dream of, not to tell!'

The tension between material means and transcendent ends that is at the core of Romantic theatre has a double outcome – on the one hand a struggle to achieve intensity by redefining the relation of word and image ('It is not a question of suppressing the spoken language,' Artaud writes, 'but of giving words approximately the importance they have in dreams'), and on the other an acknowledgement of the inadequacy of theatre, or rather of the gap between the semiotics it employs, in costume, set acting and so on, and the ideal – spiritual, political, sexual – to which it points. This gap can be expressed as nostalgia or charm, or it can be articulated more challengingly as camp, as a deliberate subversion of style and sexuality. In either case, the force of Romanticism is more intensely present in current theatrical experiment than the obscurity of many of the texts would suggest.

What then is the legacy of Romantic theatre? If we judge the validity of plays from the past in terms of their potential for revival on the modern stage, then a handful of these plays have proved their worth. The Cenci and Cain have each had several successful recent revivals, and a notable revival of Marino Faliero has confirmed the theatrical power of Byron's dramatic writing. But this is a limiting criterion. Tennyson and Browning, for example, wrote plays more professionally tailored for performance, but these scarcely work, as can even the most awkward of the earlier Romantic dramas, at the edge of Romantic aims and concerns. A work like Thomas Lovell Beddoes' Death's Jest Book (1825-48), a shapeless, self-generating fantasia on the themes of Jacobean drama, is much more compelling in its exploration of the twilit area between stage and page, word and vision, of the Gothic imagination in which the 'dead' text becomes 'live' fantasy. In terms of theatre, the main legacy of the Romantic period is the double-edged one of a split perception of theatre, as both transcendent and ludicrous, no longer to be taken for granted, but always an insistent question where spectacle problematizes the relation of language to perception. In terms of theatrical practice, we have the enshrinement of the actor, the star Shakespearean, whose cultural status validates the low standing of the profession as a whole. But we have also the idea, however inconsistently or implausibly realized, of a theatre that can be in some sense revolutionary. By putting the value of theatre in doubt, while simultaneously participating in a highly theatrical culture, British Romanticism forces a redefinition of the aims and means of theatre, and sows the seeds of the twentieth-century avant-garde.

14 The Construction of 'Victorianism'

Jane Thomas

Young, fair, trusted, beloved, new to business and to life, the sovereign of England commences a reign, that in the course of nature will last beyond the generations who hailed in the Reform Bill – the charter of new liberties – the transition to a new stage of British Culture.

So wrote > Edward Bulwer-Lytton in the > Westminster Review in 1840, less than three years after the eighteen-year-old Princess Alexandrina Victoria had been informed of the death of her uncle, > William IV, in the early hours of 20th June, 1837. The accession of Queen > Victoria was seen by many to mark a new stage in the history of the British nation, and the literature produced from the mid-1830s to the turn of the century has been indelibly stamped with her name. The term 'Victorian' functions as a convenient and historically bounded division of the cultural past, signifying the period between the decline of > Romanticism and the beginnings of the cultural renaissance known as modernism. However, an examination of the literature of this period reveals the haziness of these boundaries. Lines of descent can be traced from the concerns of the major Romantics through the poetry of the > 'Spasmodics', > Tennyson, the > Brontës, the > Brownings, the > Pre-Raphaelites, the ⊳ sensation novels of ⊳ Mary Braddon, ⊳ Mrs Henry Wood and > Rhoda Broughton, right up to the later novels of > Thomas Hardy. Likewise, the modernist concern with narrative experiment can be detected in novels such as Emily Brontë's > Wuthering Heights and Hardy's The Well-Beloved which appeared half a century later. At the same time the commonly agreed concerns of Victorianism predate Victoria and persist until World War I.

The adjective 'Victorian', denoting a variety of styles, manners and cultural forms 'typical' of a period which spans almost a century, was coined in 1875, and yet as countless critics have revealed, it is impossible to draw an objective and clear literary and cultural picture of an age that changed so rapidly that traditional certainties and ways of knowing were constantly under threat. The choice of the monarch's name as a means of labelling the period is significant. As literary historian Richard Stein has indicated it signifies an attempt to reduce a confusing and unstable world to a known and identifiable regularity (Victoria's Year). This essay seeks to chart that process whilst at the same time examining some of the ways in which Victorian literature of the period resists annexation.

In the early years of the 19th century, the British monarchy had seemed less than stable. By 1811, George III was acknowledged to be insane and his son became regent. For the next nine years he reigned as sovereign de facto, acceding to the throne on the death of his father in 1820. George IV, whose reign as king lasted less than ten years, systematically deprived the crown of any moral influence or credibility through his indolence, deviousness and profligate behaviour. He was succeeded by his brother, William IV, who died seven years later. Despite fathering ten illegitimate children by the Irish comedienne Dorothea Jordan, William was unable to produce a legitimate heir to the throne. His two daughters by Princess Adelaide of Saxe-Meningen died in infancy. His niece Princess Alexandrina Victoria, who was next in line for the throne, signified a distinct break with tradition – a new and auspicious beginning. Not only did the nation identify with her, it also elevated her into a monumental symbol of its own perceived greatness. The name Alexandrina was dropped in favour of the more anglicized and suitably exalted Victoria – instantly recognizable by her subjects as a shout of triumph. Victoria is derived from the noun 'victory', signifying supremacy or superiority.

Much was made of Victoria's youth, beauty, innocence and femininity, all of which contrasted strongly with her predecessors. England was enthralled, regarding her as a type of elder sister called upon to sacrifice her youth and desires in order to mother her recently orphaned family. Her situation began to resemble a best-selling sentimental novel of the time. On her death in 1901 ➤ Henry James wrote, 'We all feel a bit motherless today.'

As Victoria matured, married and established her own not inconsiderable empire of nine children she became increasingly a symbol of Britain's own development. Britain's energies became focused on consolidation, expansion and economic advance. It gained in confidence, in direction, in size and in complacency. By 1851, as Victoria entered a comfortable middle age, Britain was at the height of its wealth, power and influence. T. Frederick Ball, a contemporary historian, wrote in 1886 of Victoria's ability to inspire 'a loving loyalty that seemed to thrill all classes of the community'. The politician Daniel O'Connell (known in Ireland as 'The Liberator') is quoted as having made a thunderous declaration that, if it was necessary, he could get '500,000 brave Irishmen to defend the life, the honour, and the person of the beloved young lady by whom England's throne is now filled'. On a visit to Leeds Victoria reputedly felt as though she was entering a foreign country, so limited was her knowledge of the conditions of the industrial north of England. Nevertheless a quarter of a million people came to pay their respects to her and The Times reported, somewhat smugly, in 1858:

this democratic and strong-minded race, who spin and weave and forge under thick canopies of smoke – who know and care little about lords or squires or rectors, are capable, as we see, of the deepest and most heartfelt attachment to the Crown and the illustrious person who now wears it.

Not only was England consolidating its identity at home, it was also continuing to establish its presence abroad (> Imperialism). Hong Kong was acquired for the nation in 1839, to be swiftly followed by New Zealand (1840), Natal and Basutoland (1843, 1868) and, most importantly Sind (1843), the Punjab (1849) and Oudh (1856). In 1877 Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India and the middle classes could congratulate themselves not so much on the extent of the British Empire, but on the philanthropy of the English who were prepared to extend their civilizing influence to the more 'backward' nations. England under Victoria gained a perception of itself as an imperial power whose successful and often violent colonization of large parts of the globe was divinely inspired. In 1883 the historian J.R. Seeley attributed the expansion of the British Empire to 'the God who is revealed in history'. In addition, Britain had become a leading industrial nation. The > Great Exhibition of 1851, initiated by Prince > Albert, was, as critic David Morse has suggested, 'the moment when England definitively proclaimed and demonstrated her superiority over the rest of the world' (High Victorian Culture). It was also the moment when the sovereign, and the class whose interests and achievements were celebrated in the vast glass and iron conservatory, bonded together in a new and informal way. Queen Victoria visited the Crystal Palace on over forty occasions, joining with the patriotic middle classes, who also paid repeated visits, to 'positively wallow in the image of national greatness that the exhibition represented'. By 1875 the process of identification between sovereign and subjects was so complete that they were proud to adopt the self-referential adjective 'Victorian'. The Jubilee celebrations of 1887 and 1897 were an occasion to congratulate the Queen on her extended occupation of the English throne and for the English nation to congratulate itself on its achievements, as the then Poet Laureate Alfred Tennyson proclaimed in his official tribute 'On the Jubilee of Queen Victoria':

Fifty years of ever-broadening Commerce! Fifty years of ever-brightening Science! Fifty years of ever-widening Empire!

The term 'Victorian' became associated with confidence, direction, progress and identity, and as such functioned as a comforting amulet to ward off everything that threatened to undermine the security of the middle classes. In reality, the period of Victoria's reign was characterized by change and instability: the threat of revolution; the discrediting of old traditions; the usurpation of a God who could always be relied upon to sanction the deeds and words of the philanthropic and paternalistic, by an indifferent and mechanical natural process; the loosening of the chains of matrimony and the empowerment of women and the working classes: what ⊳ Thomas Carlyle referred to as 'a boundless grinding collision of the New with the Old' (> 'Signs of the Times', 1829). In the very year of Victoria's accession to the throne Carlyle published his > French Revolution (1837), with its dire warning to the upper classes that unless they provided a model of responsibility and sound leadership England would soon have a revolution of its own. In Chartism (1840) he drew attention to the pressures on the working classes of poverty, the ▷ Corn Laws, the ▷ Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834, laissez-faire economic policies and the cash nexus which, in his view, had resulted in the > Chartist Movement, itself a potential catalyst for the 'English Revolution'. George Richardson Porter, a social critic of the time, warned his readers against undue complacency and optimism when surveying the nation's industrial advances:

It must be owned that our multiple abodes of want, of wretchedness, and of crime – our town populations huddled together in ill-ventilated and undrained courts and cellars – our numerous workhouses filled to overflowing with the children of want – and our prisons (scarcely less numerous) overloaded with the votaries of crimes, do indeed but too sadly and too strongly attest that all is not as it should be with us as regards this most important branch of human progress.

(J.H. Buckley, The Victorian Temper)

 \triangleright Disraeli regarded England as essentially two nations, 'Rich and Poor' (\triangleright Sybil), and, like Carlyle, looked towards an enlightened aristocracy to provide the leadership and direction the nation so badly needed. \triangleright Dickens lamented in the \triangleright Quarterly Review for June 1839: 'The one half of mankind lives without knowledge of how the other half dies.' He believed that middle-class complacency and indifference to the plight of the poor was the result of ignorance, but this explanation wasn't sufficient for \triangleright Mrs Gaskell's John Barton (\triangleright Mary Barton), who was to be driven to murder by bereavement and frustration at the attitudes of those in charge:

'Don't think to come over me with the old tale, that the rich know nothing of the trials of the poor. I say, if they don't know, they ought to know. We are their slaves as long as we can work; we pile up their fortunes with the sweat of our brows; and yet we are to live as separate as if we were in two worlds; ay, as separate as Dives and Lazarus.'

Despite Mrs Gaskell's best endeavours, John Barton's anarchic and revengeful voice echoes in the reader's mind long after the concilatory cooing of Jem and Mary's infant son in their Canadian haven. Tennyson's patriotic Jubilee poem seeks to dispel the nation's anxieties concerning the present time by elevating Victoria as a symbol of unity and a guiding light and, in a somewhat unsubtle play on the origins of the Queen's name, transforming her into an image of triumph over peril and lurking threat:

Are there spectres moving in the darkness? Trust the Hand of Light will lead her people, Till the thunders pass, the spectres vanish, And the Light is Victor, and the darkness Dawns into the Jubilee of the Ages.

However, the narrator of > 'Locksley Hall' exposes the schizophrenia that underlies England's bellicose nationalism. In the midst of his self-indulgent rhetoric concerning the unworthiness of women he is valedictory on the subject of the docile, democratic masses: 'Slowly comes a hungry people, as a lion creeping nigher,/Glares at one that nods and winks behind a slowly-dying fire.' The fire, whose light and heat keep the sleeper safe from the spectres of the night, is going out. The amulet is in danger of losing its charm and its owner 'nods and winks' in a gesture of concilation perhaps, or maybe as prelude to a slumber from which he may never wake. Unhappy love destroys the narrator's optimism and peace of mind but his plight is an index of a larger social malaise. For him the 'Mother-Age' is neither comforting nor secure, but wracked by an unavoidable and violent storm. Although the upheavals are incomprehensible, Tennyson's narrator confronts them with a reckless and slightly hysterical cry which registers a sense of things spiralling out of control, 'Forward, forward let us range, /Let the great world spin forever down the ringing grooves of change.' The sentiment is repeated in a more measured tone in > 'The Lotos-Eaters' where the captain counsels courage to his crew helpless on a wild and stormy sea for 'This mounting wave will roll us shoreward soon'.

The foundations of society were already badly shaken before Victoria came to the throne. As early as 1831 ➤ Macaulay urged the House of Commons to 'Reform, that you may preserve, or else persist in a hopeless struggle against the spirit of the age'. In his essay of the same title, ➤ John Stuart Mill defines the 'Spirit of the Age' as one of transition 'in which worldly power must cease to be monopolized by the landed gentry'. The balance of power was shifting from the aristocracy to the middle classes and the weight of their economic prosperity fell heavily upon those whose labour helped produce it and who as yet had no parliamentary voice. Social commentators, politicians and intellectuals recognized the need for widespread changes in the status quo, a need that was emphasized by government reports of the 1830s and 1840s and by the Chartist Movement of 1837–48. Chartism, activated in the year of Victoria's accession to the throne, was largely working class in orientation and campaigned for democratic rights and improved wages and working conditions by means of mass demonstrations and, at times, mob violence. The reforms in ➤ education and the ➤ Reform Bills which enfranchised men in the industrial middle class in 1832, the urban working class in 1867 and the agricultural labourers in 1884 were designed to relieve the pressure of an increasingly militant proletariat. Much as she hated upheaval, Victoria was influenced by Carlyle's warning concerning an impending 'English Revolution' and alarmed at the sea of 'nasty faces' screaming for reform that swarmed around her carriage as she drove to open Parliament in 1867: her first state appearance since she was widowed in December 1861. In supporting the Reform Bill of 1867 Victoria sincerely believed that enfranchisement would make the nation even more favourable to a benevolent monarch. She recognized the potential of the monarchy to provide a point of stability, an icon for a society riven with tensions, carried along breathlessly in the wake of rapid industrial development and discovering the explosive potential of the unprecedented power of steam for the first time.

The situation in France was still unsettled enough for the British to take note. It seemed to dramatize in violent and shocking form the shifts in the balance of power that had been apparent in their own country for some time. Victoria and Albert were 'bourgeois' enough for the rising middle classes to claim them as their own, although, as Victoria's biographer Elizabeth Longford has shown, Albert's popularity waxed and waned throughout the period (Victoria I). Nevertheless Albert, the initiator of the Great Exhibition, was the driving force behind the distancing of the monarchy from the aristocracy. For Victoria, the aristocracy symbolized everything that was despicable and profligate, and she held them responsible for the wayward behaviour of Edward the Prince of Wales. Having wooed and won the middle classes she was keen to exercise her influence over the industrial working classes, or the 'lower classes' as she preferred to call them, and eclipse their differences and dissatisfactions with the regal splendour of her presence. However, there were those among Victoria's subjects who reacted strongly against the elevation of the monarchy as a panacea for all ills. In the course of her reign Victoria experienced no less than six attempts on her life. Empty and inadequate gestures though these were, they were sufficient indication that for some the monarchy was a false idol it was their duty to overthrow.

There were iconoclasts among the more moderate of her subjects also. As Richard Stein has indicated, 'Victorian society was forever subject to tensions which militated against complete spontaneity and singleness of purpose' (Victoria's Year), and the literature of the period, annexed by the term 'Victorian' by 1876, is riven with these tensions. Whilst Victoria's poets, novelists and social commentators are quick to defend the status quo - preferring modification to revolution - anarchy persistently haunts the margins of their texts, disrupting the stasis implied by the ubiquitous 'happy ending'. Elizabeth Gaskell's alarm at the centrality assumed by the revengeful figure of John Barton in her novel Mary Barton is indicated by her attempts to distract the reader with the reconciliation of Mary and Jem, and the even more unlikely understanding reached between the remorseful Barton and his victim's father. It is significant that Mary and Jem can find peace, prosperity and happiness not in England but in Canada. Charles Dickens, having raised the spectre of working class unrest and dramatized the gulf between employer and employee, undermines and demonizes supporters of the growing > trade union movement: they are a 'slack bridge' between masters and men. He leaves himself with no alternative but to wallow in sentiment and homespun wisdom with his moderate, decent, workingclass hero Stephen Blackpool, who gazes weakly at the stars from the bottom of his disused mineshaft, to utter with his dying breath the immortal words 'aw a muddle' (> Hard Times).

In 1830-33 > Charles Lyell published his Principles of Geology. The disasters he catalogued, including the wholesale extermination of species, as necessary antecedents to the earth's present state of repose, had a tremendous effect on his readers. For > Charles Darwin the book 'altered the whole tone of one's mind'. In > In Memoriam, A.H.H. (1850) Tennyson's narrator is unable to sustain the heady optimism embraced by the speaker of 'Locksley Hall'. Scientific knowledge brings not wisdom but despair as the individual self is threatened with extermination in the cause of the progress of the species. The strength of much of Tennyson's poetry lies in its insistent gesture towards the dissenting individual who refuses to be blinkered by the happy lie. In Memoriam is one of the most powerful poems of doubt and despair to be written during the period of Victoria's reign. It acknowledges the undermining of a concept of self predicated upon the notion of a beneficent and greater 'other' whether that 'other' be God, or perhaps, by implication, Monarch. Faced with the impact of science on religious belief, Tennyson's narrator mistrusts the very ground beneath him.

I falter where I firmly trod,
And falling with my weight of cares
Upon the great world's altar-stairs
That slope thro' darkness up to God,

I stretch lame hands of faith, and grope, And gather dust and chaff, and call To what I feel is Lord of all, And faintly trust the larger hope.

God's abdication was brought a stage nearer by the publication of Darwin's The Origin of Species (1859) and its vigorous defence by > Thomas Henry Huxley against Bishop Wilberforce the following year. Huxley's attack was directed not only against the bishop's attempts to 'smash Darwin' but also against the innate and threatened conservatism of those members of the Church who sought 'to discredit and crush humble seekers after truth'. The post-Darwinian world was in many ways profoundly pessimistic, and the writers of the period were torn between their conviction that the purpose of art was to educate and guide the newly enfranchised and newly literate classes beneath them, and their desire to use their talents to expose what was damnably wrong with the system.

Thomas Hardy has been accused of replacing a benevolent all-seeing God with a blind, mechanical and unreasoning 'It'. It was a charge that Hardy himself resolutely denied. He regarded his novels not as manifestos of pessimism but evidence of his own practical meliorist philosophy:

What are my books but one plea against 'man's inhumanity to man' – to woman – and to the lower animals? . . . Whatever may be the inherent good or evil of life, it is certain that men make it much worse than it need be. When we have got rid of a thousand remediable ills, it will be time enough to determine whether the ill that is irremediable outweighs the good.

(▷ William Archer, Real Conversations)

One of the thousand 'remediable ills' that is held up for analysis in Hardy's novels is the economic, social and sexual repression of women. It isn't 'Fate' that dogs Hardy's heroines to their graves, or into the arms of unsuitable mates, it is their economic dependence on men, their lack of social and political power and their adaptation, in the interests of survival, to the forms of feminity favoured not by Nature but by society. These forms are epitomized by > Coventry Patmore's > 'Angel in the House' or ⊳ Ruskin's 'queen' of the domestic garden: 'the centre of order, the balm of distress, and the mirror of beauty' (Sesame and Lilies, 1865). Once again Queen Victoria, with her selfless and very public devotion to Albert and her children, her apparent preference for the philanthropic rather than the more practical duties of state, which she preferred to leave to her husband, and her repugnance for the 'mad, wicked folly of Women's Rights', provided a model of domestic virtue which the middle-class woman was encouraged to imitate. However, by 1860 this model was already up for reconstruction. In 1866 John Stuart Mill presented an unsuccessful petition to Parliament which demanded the inclusion of women in what was to become the 1867 Reform Bill. Many women throughout the period challenged the Victorian feminine ideal and the ➤ Women's Movement of the second half of the 19th century was perhaps the most anarchic of all, for it threatened the very foundations of the domestic haven the Victorians constructed as a retreat from the vicissitudes of everyday life. Maria G. Grey writing in the > Fortnightly Review in 1879 points to the > 'Woman Question' as an issue which was to create tensions every bit as great as theories of the evolution of human beings and the democratization of the working classes:

Among the questions agitating men's minds in this age of transition between the old world of thought and faith and custom, so rapidly disappearing, and the new world scarcely yet visible in its rudiments beneath the tide of change and destruction, there are none that go deeper to the very roots of our social life than those touching the relations between the sexes, and the position assigned to women in the family and in the State. For centuries those relations had been considered fixed as the law of nature itself and too sacred to be touched by profane hands; but, of late years, they have shared the fate of other revered institutions and have become open questions, to be tried as freely as any others in the ruthless crucible of doubt and analysis.

Thomas Hardy, for one, had no doubts about the revolutionary potential of the > women's suffrage movement. In 1906, five years after Victoria's death, he wrote to Millicent Garrett Fawcett, a leading women's suffragist, outlining the reasons behind his support for the cause:

I have long been in favour of [it] . . . because I think the tendency of the woman's vote will be to break up the present pernicious conventions in respect of manners, customs, religion, illegitimacy, the stereotyped household (that it must be the unit of society), the father of a woman's child (that it is anybody's business but the woman's own, except in cases of disease or insanity), sport (that so-called educated men should be encouraged to harass, kill for pleasure feeble creatures by mean stratagems), slaughter houses (that they should be dark dens of cruelty) & other matters which I got into hot water for touching on many years ago.

During the last two decades of the century a reaction was setting in against the cosy certainties associated with the term 'Victorian'. Faith and pride in the Machine Age in the early decades of the century had its counterpart not only in the choleric finger-wagging of Carlyle or the unctuous reasoning of Dickens, but also in the nostalgia for a bygone, simpler pre-industrial age. The > medievalism of Carlyle's > Past and Present, Tennyson's > Idylls of the King and the work of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood reached its peak in the > utopianism of > William Morris. For Morris art and literature had a purely ornamental and practical function. Its purpose was to improve the existing environment and to compensate for the destruction by creeping industrialization of natural beauty and to replace the ugly utility of mass-produced goods with the lasting aesthetic pleasure of the hand-made artefact. From 1883 onwards Morris was studying and then preaching revolutionary Marxism. At the same time adherents of the > Aesthetic Movement sought to rise above rather than justify what they regarded as an increasingly sordid and vulgar middle-class value system. Writers like > George Moore and > Oscar Wilde welcomed the ridicule heaped upon them by satirists like > George Du Maurier in > Punch because it confirmed their deviation from the norm. Art was seen as an escape from rather than a means of airing intellectual conflict.

If the early years of the 19th century and the accession to the throne of England of a youthful queen encouraged a spirit of ardour and optimism, the closing decade, presided over by a fretful, dour and increasingly reclusive octagenarian, prompted a feeling of pessimism and a sense of apocalypse. Victorian England had already 'fallen prey' to the radicals, socialists and suffragettes, and conservative opinion turned its attentions to the changes threatening the British Empire. Victoria's status was elevated from Queen to Empress as she reached the height of her popularity. The façade of middle-class complacency at home gave way to jingoism: fervent support of England's imperial policy in Europe epitomized in > John Davidson's 'Song for the Twenty-fourth of May':

Sea-room, land-room, ours, my masters, ours, Hand in hand with destiny, and first among the Powers! Our boasted Ocean Empire, sirs, we boast of it again, Our Monarch, and our Rulers, and our Women, and our Men!

However, even the most jingoistic writers – ⊳ Kipling, William Henley (1849–1903), William Watson (1858–1935) and Henry Newbolt (1862–1938) – have been reassessed by present-day critics in such a way that the tensions and schisms in their work have become apparent.

The Decadents reacted against the optimism, buoyancy and smugness of 'Victorianism' with a languid weariness and despair. Arthur Symons' 'The Pause' (1897) picks up and develops into a dirge for the dying century the bass note of regret and confusion that surfaces periodically in the more conventional literature of the period:

Trouble has come upon us like a sudden cloud,
A sudden summer cloud with thunder in its wings.
There is an end for us of old familiar things
Now that this desolating voice has spoken aloud.

The Decadents opposed 'Victorian' manliness with effeminacy, earnestness with flippancy, philanthropy with self-indulgence and moral uprightness with sexual delinquency. Anarchy no longer merely haunts the borders of their texts, it takes a central role as the marginalized working-class Chartist of the > Social Problem novels gives way to the amoral aesthete, the criminally insane decadent and the 'unnatural' aristocratic foreigner epitomized by > Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray, Dracula. However, in defining themselves against 'Victorianism', the 'fin de siècle' writers were guilty of reducing the complexities of the literature and sensibility that had preceded theirs to a simplified set of clichés. It was this 'Victorianism', floated over the cracks and fissures of Victorian society and culture like a self-levelling compound, that persisted into the 20th century as 'a shield for the conservative and a target for the modernist' (J.H. Buckley, The Victorian Temper).

Until relatively recently, the construction of the canon of Victorian literature has sought to determine the meaning of texts in advance by relating them to a monolithic conception of 'Victorianism' designed to resolve rather than problematize its tensions. This has resulted in the exclusion of certain groups of people from representation and the devaluing of genres perceived as aberrant or peripheral to the concerns of the age. This is clearly the case with Victorian drama, dismissed as early as 1894 by one of the period's leading dramatists, > Henry Arthur Jones, as 'A Slough of Despond in the well-tilled field of English Literature'. Jones was referring specifically to > melodrama, which was the dominant genre of the age, and his opinion of the form has remained largely unchallenged. However, as Ian Clarke suggests in his essay 'Drama 1837-1901' (see page 13), the rejection of a large percentage of 19th-century drama as of little worth amounts to literary critical prejudice and trivializes one of the dominant forms of popular cultural entertainment. He argues for a reglossing of the term 'melodrama' to transform it from a pejorative into a purely descriptive term. Far from functioning as mere escapist entertainment, he argues, early domestic melodrama 'offered to newly urbanized working-class audiences valid images, however indirect, of their own alienated and disempowering experience as wage slaves'. Domestic melodrama also served to highlight gender inequities by showing women, and particularly working-class women, in a hostile world 'under almost constant threat of male violence'. In this way early Victorian melodrama can be seen to dramatize for a popular audience the concerns which were to animate the middle-class novel.

The novel was indisputably the dominant literary form of the age but yet again its sheer diversity is commonly overlooked by critics in their devotion to the rise of > realism. Whilst ample attention has been paid to major realists such as Dickens, > Thackeray, > Eliot, the Brontës, Hardy and Henry James the sensationalist writings of Mrs Braddon, Mrs Wood and Rhoda Broughton are commonly grouped together under the heading 'minor novelists'. As Gail Cunningham points out in her essay on 'The Victorian Novel' (see page 27), the single most popular novelist of the 1890s' was neither Hardy nor Thackeray nor even Henry James but ⊳ Marie Corelli, whose The Sorrows of Satan (1895) outsold any previous English novel. Throughout the Victorian period the novel was subject to a form of ⊳ censorship designed to isolate the predominantly female readership from exposure to sexual corruption. Novels which failed the test risked being blacklisted by the > circulating libraries, which could ruin a writer's reputation overnight. Sexuality had to be handled delicately or not at all. The > sensation novels of the 1860s, with their thinly disguised eroticism and stimulating if incredible plots, were written in reaction to the morally upright and sternly prosaic atmosphere of middle-class drawing rooms. They proved so popular that their authors (who were predominantly female) were comfortably able to support themselves, their husbands and families on the proceeds. Even the ⊳ historical novel and > romance were regarded as subversive by Ruskin, who counselled parents to keep them from their daughters for even 'the best romance becomes dangerous, if, by its excitement, it renders the ordinary course of life uninteresting, and increases the morbid thirst for useless acquaintance with scenes in which we shall never be called upon to act' (Sesame and Lillies). However, as Gail Cunningham demonstrates, it was the > 'New Woman' fiction of the 1890s that most effectively undermined the shrine of womanhood.

Linda Williams (see page 43) locates the strength of Victorian poetry in its acknowledgement of crisis: in particular the crisis of the relationship between the self and the material world. The poetry of the period can be seen to challenge the received wisdom of the middle classes that industrial development and technological and scientific advance served only to illustrate the supremacy of man. The myth of personal and national stability is consistently fractured by the work of Tennyson, ➤ Clough, ➤ Arnold, Anne Brontë and Hardy. At the same time women poets such as ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning and Emily Brontë were concerned to forge entirely new conceptions of the female self distinctly at odds with the 'Angel in the House'. As the century drew to a close the impulse toward consolidation and complacency was violently checked by the bloody and frequently blasphemous verse of ➤ Swinburne and others of the ➤ 'Fleshly School of Poetry' while the despair and bleakness of much of ➤ Hopkins and Hardy anticipates the apocalypse of World War I.

As we prepare to exit from our own calamitous century, the government and the popular media fondly invoke the 'Golden Age' of the Victorian period. However as this essay and those that follow demonstrate, we should regard the previous century not as the antithesis to our own but as its precursor. The Victorians are moderns, their conflicts are ours, and they deserve better of us than to be reduced to crass political slogans and television costume drama.

'Dusty answers': Loss and nostalgia in Victorian poetry

Ah, what a dusty answer gets the soul When hot for certainties in this our life! (Modern Love; George Meredith, 1862)

The poetry of the Victorians was written largely in a state of shock. From the shock of electricity to the 'shock of the new', currents of difficulty and doubt animate poetic history, fuelled by a crisis of faith and the instability of living in a rapidly growing and urbanizing society within which values were becoming increasingly unstable. This feeling of uncertainty is indulged by the Victorians through the notion that there was once a time, well into the past, when certainty existed. In \triangleright Tennyson's words, Victorian poetry is permeated with 'the quiet sense of something lost' (\triangleright In Memoriam A.H.H.).

Tennyson's long elegy, In Memoriam A.H.H. (1850), is perhaps the most famous poem of loss to be penned in the 19th century. Written almost as therapy over a long period, what is being mourned is not simply Arthur Hallam, the poet's greatest friend; rather his death is a pretext for an extended meditation on absence. What is lost is also a fixed personal identity, certainty of perception and judgement, and the idea of a benign or controlling divinity. \triangleright Matthew Arnold's elegiac lyric \triangleright Dover Beach (1867) sketches out this sense of loss:

The Sea of Faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled.
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar . . .

Reading Tennyson's intense lament alongside the passive melancholy of Arnold gives us two perspectives on how this loss, which is of course nothing new, is characterized in a particularly Victorian way. For Tennyson, trust in God must come despite the abysmal fact that,

Nature, red in tooth and claw With ravine, shrieked against his creed (In Memoriam A.H.H.)

So if Dover Beach is an elegy, who or what has died?

In many ways the most interesting poetry of the period since 1830 can be called 'death of God' poetry, after > Nietzsche's famous proclamation that 'God is dead'. In Easter Day, Naples 1849 > Arthur Clough writes, 'Ah! "some" did well to "doubt"!', in the midst of a text which repeats an > atheist incantation:

Christ is not risen, no, He lies and moulders low; Christ is not risen. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust;
As of the unjust, also of the just –
Christ is not risen.

Such a strong statement runs contrary to our cherished notion that the Victorians were a nation of devout church-goers, even if read in the context of the subsequent poem by Clough, 'Easter Day II' which affirms the opposite view. Despite the explosion in church-building which took place up to the 1850s, the Religious Census of 1851 showed that a large proportion of the population did not go to church. This feeling reaches a virulent pitch later in the century with > James Thomson's The City of Dreadful Night (1874), a poem which, in its compulsive repetition, is structured like a nightmare. City may be the nearest thing in English poetry to Rimbaud's Une Saison en enfer (1873), although its invectives against God bring it closer to Lautréamont (1846–70):

The vilest thing must be less than Thou
From whom it had its being, God and Lord!
... I vow
That not for all Thy power furled and unfurled, (...)
Would I assume the ignominious guilt
Of having made such men in such a world.
(The City of Dreadful Night)

Thomson's God is alive and actively malicious, but the God who withdraws with Arnold's Sea of Faith is conspicuous only by his absence. Tennyson wrote to fill the absences – 'if there was a blank space I would put in a poem' – and one such absence has been created by God's departure. In Memoriam thus confronts these absences as the grieving self confronts the Victorian 'Unreal city':

He is not here; but far away

The noise of life begins again,

And ghastly through the drizzling rain

On the bald street breaks the blank day.

As with Tennyson's > Maud (1855), In Memoriam shows a self so disrupted and infiltrated that it cannot affirm > Robert Browning's much quoted phrase, 'God's in his heaven - / All's right with the world' (Pippa Passes). This is turned inward, for if God does not exist, man cannot exist in his image, and so the self's solidity and its possibilities of self-conscious meaningful action are undermined. Two quotations, the first from In Memoriam (LIV), the second from the remarkable poem by John Clare (1793–1864), 'I Am' (1864), illustrate this:

... but what am I?
An infant crying in the night:
An infant crying for the light:
And with no language but a cry.
I am — yet what I am none cares or knows,
My friends forsake me like a memory lost;
I am the self-consumer of my woes,
They rise and vanish in oblivious host.

His 'not being here' renders the urbanized, brave new world of the mid-19th century, the world of cholera and of the Crimean war, all the more ghastly, bald and blank, a world which it seemed, for the most part, God had never visited at all.

In the wake of this appalling possibility, fragments of memory - In Memoriam is certainly a fragmented text - are shored up poetically against present fear and ruin,

... when the sensuous frame
Is racked with pangs that conquer trust;
And Time, a maniac scattering dust,
And Life, a fury slinging flame.
(In Memoriam A.H.H.)

The sense that history and technology were advancing out of all rational and moral control was acutely felt by poets, characterized by feelings of alienation from home. 'A wanderer is man from his birth' writes Arnold in 'The Future' (1852), and feelings of loss serve to fill the gap between the self and its long-gone place of safety. In Clare's 'I Am' the world is a 'vast shipwreck', and the 'nothingness of scorn and noise', the 'living sea of waking dreams' renders his loved ones even 'stranger than the rest'.

Anne Brontë laments to herself, 'Sad wanderer, weep those blissful times / That never may return!' ('The Bluebell'; 1840). We could turn to countless verses where this sentiment is repeated, culminating in Thomas Hardy's double vision of loss and dread right at the end of the century. An image is set up across a wide range of Victorian poems of a lost cherished past — an idyllic pre-industrial England, the innocence of childhood, a place where unproblematic faith was possible. But working in tandem with melancholic lament is the Victorian passion for more positive and elaborate retrospection.

The Victorians had a great talent for nostalgia. This means that their interpretation of the past was double-edged, countering present loss with rosily remembered bygone times. In the face of uncompromising industrial expansion and unprecedented urban squalor a sumptuous pseudo-medieval (> medievalism) world was erected, a counterimage of > Gothic grandeur activated by the prose celebrations of > John Ruskin and > Thomas Carlyle. The latter looked to the Middle Ages as a point of preindustrial authenticity where 'Antique devoutness, Antique veracity and heroism' were possible (> Past and Present, 1843); the former's celebration of the Gothic had a profound influence upon the architectural practice of the second half of the 19th century. > William Morris' championing of the Arts and Crafts Movement was vehemently anti-capitalist in favouring individual production and handiwork over the mass production of advanced technology. All these were impassioned moral responses to the feeling of contemporary spiritual alienation.

For > Elizabeth Barrett Browning, however, poetic nostalgia was tantamount to escapism; shirking the task of producing poetry which engaged with the moment, the nostalgic poet failed to discern 'character or glory in his times, / And trundle(d) back his soul five hundred years' (> Aurora Leigh). This poetic 'trundling-back' survives in the shadowy Arthurian world of, for example, Tennyson's > Idylls of the King (1859–72) and the archaic images of the > Pre-Raphaelite movement. Pieced into an evocative picture of traditional England, legend-spinning countered the squalid present by concentrating on a supposedly more authentic yesterday. This sentimental evocation of a mythical past acted, then, rather like what > Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) calls a 'Family Romance', only on a national scale; just as an individual might pretend he or she has more glorious and romantic origins than are in fact the case, so national culture is built upon the wishful creation of images of glorious and graceful past times. By positively forging a myth of the English idyll –

Oh, to be in England
Now that April's there
('Home Thoughts From Abroad'; Robert Browning, 1845)

- or of childhood, or of God in His Heaven - personal and national stability is consolidated rather than threatened. By forging an idyllic cultural memory (a sanitized past) which acts as a kind of screen memory, blocking off far more disturbing passages of individual or national history (the dirty materiality of the real past) Victorian verse contributed to glueing together a fracturing present. In the place of what ⊳ Chartist poet Gerald Massey (1828–1907) called the 'looming future', a blooming past is constructed.

One way of reading Victorian nostalgia is to assume that the strength of retrospection in a text is an index of the depth of crisis felt at the moment at which it was written. We do find frequent points where crisis is overtly acknowledged; loss in the present is as important a stated element in Victorian verse as the creation of the past. So it is wise to be as suspicious as possible when confronting these images, asking, as Anne Brontë does, why certain things have been remembered and valorized and not others:

Sweet memory, ever smile on me; Nature's chief beauties spring from thee.

In other words, one remembers what one desires to remember:

Is childhood then so all divine?
Or, memory, is the glory thine
That haloes thus the past?
('Memory'; 1846)

What is activated in poetic remembering is, then, highly selective, evading the squalid activity of the past.

'Behind the silken-folded mask': Other voices in the 'double-breasted Age'

There cast my anchors of desire

Deep in Unknown eternity,

Nor ever let my spirit tire

With looking for What is to Be.

('Anticipation', ▷ Emily Brontë; 1845)

In her suspicious reading of the tricks of memory Anne Brontë comes close to the cynicism of Gerald Massey, whose concern is to scrutinize the 'real present' and the social contexts of idyllic images. In the ironically titled 'All's Right with the World', he shows what occurs when the 'silken-folded mask' of sweet image-making slips,

... lo, Hell welters at our very feet!

The Poor are murdered body and soul, the Rich
In Pleasure's chalice melt their pearl of life!

Ay, all goes right, and merrily, with the world.

Perhaps this 'silken-folded mask' is the tapestry woven by Tennyson's ➤ The Lady of Shalott (1832), which contains scenes of the world she cannot see first hand but only as images in her mirror. Massey's verse asks suspicious questions about who has the power to write and myth-make, and who is excluded from the process of remembering — who says what the mirror reflects? More positively, we might look for other images beneath the mask, and listen to other poetic voices.

The canon has often concealed the tears in the 'silken-folded mask' of bourgeois writing. The poetry of the 19th century is, however, extraordinarily heterogeneous. Whilst modernists were able to dismiss Victorian verse as immobile and monolithic, the terms used to discuss it could be much simpler than those which are required to do justice to its plurality and diversity. In this section I wish to point to the cracks in the idea of a Victorian poetic monolith by showing the points at which different voices call from inside the marbling.

The variety of metrical and stanzaic forms in 19th-century writing confesses both technical restlessness and openness to development - Clough's verse in parts anticipates vers libre, Browning and Tennyson experimented widely with metre, and as we shall see > Gerard Manley Hopkins developed rhythmic forms which anticipate > modernism. Voices other than that of bourgeois Victorian propriety speak in the dialect poetry of > William Barnes, Thomas Hardy, and even Tennyson, in texts such as Thomas Hood's 'The Song of the Shirt' (1843) (the lament of a labouring woman - 'Would that its tone could reach the rich!'), and in the bizarre sexual delirium of > Algernon Swinburne and some writers of the fin de siècle. The > Nonsense verse of > Edward Lear and > Lewis Carroll plays with images from the Victorian unconscious, parodying normality to the point of absurdity, the effect of which is hilarious, provocative and disturbing. Carroll's 'The White Knight's Song' from Through the Looking Glass (1872), gives a world of capitalism-turned-upside-down by listing a series of utterly absurd ways of making money, a stream of words which 'trickled through my head, / Like water through a sieve'. The lament of manifest loss in Lear's 'The Dong with the Luminous Nose' (1871) parodies the grander losses of Tennyson and Arnold; 'Dong' is a melancholy pastiche, telling the story of the lost Jumbly Girl in the grandiose tones of the mock-epic:

But when the sun was low in the West,
The Dong arose and said; —
— 'What little sense I once possessed
Has quite gone out of my head!' —
And since that day he wanders still
By lake and forest, marsh and hill,
Singing — 'O somewhere, in valley or plain
'Might I find my Jumbly Girl again!
'For ever I'll seek by lake and shore
'Till I find my Jumbly Girl once more!'

Crucially, too, the mask slips when women take up their pens, especially when they are concerned in their writing, as was Elizabeth Barrett Browning, to inscribe literary history with visions which could not be countenanced by masculine masks. Her desire to 'catch / Upon the burning lava of a song / The full-veined, heaving, double-breasted Age' (Aurora Leigh) strongly contrasts with much Victorian poetry's listless return to any age but its own. Her adamant belief that poetry be relevant to its times and contemporary in its material builds up in Aurora Leigh into a plea for living verse, since dead images kill poems: 'death inherits death'.

The outstanding texts of this period are, not uncommonly, ways into fear, confrontations of, in Hardy's late-Victorian phrase, 'the growing gloom'. With the revolutionary year of 1848, a turbulent one for much of mainland Europe, vague uncertainties were turned into a radical sense of possibility. This was the year in which Clough published his remarkable The Bothie of Tober-Na-Vuolich, which interrogates class and sexual difference through the difficult problem of marriage across class barriers; in the face of a socially volatile moment, Clough asserted the necessity that poetry relate to and guide people in their urban experience. Cultural history registered the shocking dissolution of the solitary and integrated self posited by western rationality. In the British Museum Library Karl Marx was researching Das Kapital; 1848 had seen the publication of his and Engels' Communist Manifesto. It is helpful to read Victorian verse in relation to other forms of contemporary writing. Such poetry gathered itself together in the intellectual climate which also produced > Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species in 1850, and since the poets under discussion here never saw themselves as writing in splendid isolation from the intellectual revolutions precipitated by these texts, it would be unwise to treat poetic history as generated by a dynamic solely internal to itself.

In the > 'Hungry Forties' many of the young writers which modernism cast as Victorian dinosaurs were only just beginning to reach wide audiences and capitalize most effectively on their poetic energies. The fact that the romantic paradigm was no longer applicable to an acutely altered Britain gradually became a cause for celebration rather than lament. Against a fetishized past, poets countered with a strong vision of the present, even those whose work in other places both celebrates and laments what is in truth a pastiche of medieval England. Tennyson, for instance, also makes use of images of the past to displace > 'the woman question' into a space where it can be imaginatively explored. In 1847 he first published > The Princess, that extraordinary engagement with 'the woman question' which gives us an image, albeit set up only to be undermined, of strong women of formidable intellect. The certainties of sexual difference are challenged not only by the very existence of a militantly > feminist educational institution, but by the humour of the transvestite episode in which the heroes dress as women to infiltrate the enemy camp. Central to The Princess is the separatist University, which is both credible and credited only within a context radically different from Tennyson's own, hence his deployment of a vague medieval setting, further displaced by a variety of narrative layers. The Princess questions the notion that poetry springs from a singular, unified voice; it is 'A Medley', the construction of many voices, male and female, which together forge 'a sevenfold story'.

In 1855 (during the Crimean War), Tennyson published an even stranger long poem which engaged with the contemporary issues of mental aberration, sexual difference, and the war itself. This was Maud, subtitled 'A Monodrama', a self-undermining word since the 'one' who speaks this long complex poem is an extremely fragmented personality; he isn't 'one' – he isn't 'mono' – he speaks with many voices. The drama of the narrative is thus importantly also an effect of the dialogue between his own selves. For the speaker of Maud is 'Sick of a nameless fear'; disordered in his senses, he seems to speak from many positions at once. He is precipitated into paranoia, and the synaesthesia of the famous 'Come into the garden, Maud' passage, by an erotically intangible heroine who had 'fled on the roses and lain in the lilies of life'. Arnold's phrase 'the dialogue of the mind with itself' takes shape in this mad 'hero' who becomes a figure of the introspective poet, fleeing the foul fiend of horror or doubt: 'I will bury myself in myself' (Maud, Part II, 1 75). Tennyson wrote of his character, 'I took a man constitutionally diseased and dipt him into the circumstances of the time and took him out on fire'. Along with Tennyson's more narcotic lyrics, Maud shows how a poetry which explored the loss of the rational self could be articulated behind the Laureate mask, even as the mask of civic poetry was held anxiously in place. But Maud is also in part a comment upon the circumstances of the time, of modern and mental alienation: its landscape a metaphor for psychiatric derangement, as it was to become in such later poems as Thomson's City and > T.S. Eliot's > The Waste Land (1922).

Aurora Leigh had a readership as enormous as The Princess and Maud, and in content deals with the questions of gender and women's power which the Tennyson texts, as well as Clough's Bothie, all probe from different angles. Even Queen > Victoria read Aurora Leigh. Indeed, when the queen was faced with the task of choosing a new Poet Laureate in 1850, Elizabeth Barrett (as she then was) was a prime candidate. Stepping into > Wordsworth's shoes was indeed regarded as an awesome task for any of the young poets who were penning their most interesting work at this time. Whilst no woman has ever become the Poet Laureate, in the middle of a century characterized by such acute patriarchal oppression a woman was seriously considered for the position. She was, indeed, far more popular then than her husbandto-be, Robert Browning, appropriate to an age when women wrote poetry prolifically and were highly regarded by their contemporaries, and feminist criticism recently has shown her to be a literary figure worthy of stronger recognition than she has received since her death. Aurora Leigh explores the boundaries between biography and fiction, identifying poetic work as a unique space for making out a woman's relationship to language and creativity. As a feminist interrogation of female friendship and sexual relations it is courageous, 'life-blood' 'wrung ... / On every leaf ...' (Aurora Leigh, Bk 5, ll. 356-7). As an exploration of how literature creates the self, it deserves its place in a tradition of poets' own critical theories. As a long narrative poem it was indeed hugely popular, fulfilling its own prescription that poetry should not flinch from history, and should partly be the space where women can begin to write their own histories, the story behind the mask. Matthew Arnold wrote that, 'Poetry is at bottom a criticism of life', and Barrett Browning's verse exemplifies this, constructively engaging with rather than retreating from her 'double-breasted Age'. As Cora Kaplan points out in her 1978 introduction to the poem, Aurora Leigh is a > feminist bridge between two other overtly political publications, Casa Guidi Windows (1851) and Poems Before Congress (1860), forming a triptych which perhaps offers the strongest poetic analysis in English of the immediately post-1848 European situation.

As feminist criticism has shown, no mythical past could offer 19th-century women a positive image of themselves, so they set to writing it in their own way. The work of > Christina Rossetti presents an intriguing exception. Her 'criticism of life' is uniquely strong in its strange combination of morbidity, painful self-denial and simplicity. Rossetti is undoubtedly ruthlessly hard on herself: much of her work is charged with absence and denial, a will to oblivion and silence, which is repeatedly invoked in a style so sparse it seems to be actively wishing to negate itself. Indeed, the word 'silence' itself is often repeated. Her 'almost Paradise' is a return to absolute equilibrium and desirelessness. In 'Rest' (1862) she calls the earth to Lie close around her; leave no room for mirth With its harsh laughter, nor for sound of sighs. She hath no questions, she hath no replies, Hushed in and curtained with a blessed dearth Of all that irked her from the hour of birth; With stillness that is almost Paradise.

The voice of this poem can only afford to desire the absence of pain; for Rossetti positivity isn't full energy but simply the negation of the negative. Plenitude is, perhaps, asking too much. Is this an instance of woman learning to desire her lot, internalizing the Victorian charge that she 'suffer and be still'?

But when colours and positively charged desires giddily burst into this near-silence, that which 'irked her from the hour of her birth' is quite positively broken open and challenged. Rossetti's sparse verse soars to an unnatural high when suddenly rich detail emerges, the mixture of spartan naïve form with Pre-Raphaelite decorativeness invoking a strange intoxication of deprivation and excess. The rich erotic language of \triangleright Goblin Market (1862) pressed into a strict \triangleright ballad form, or the exultation of 'A Birthday' (1862), are both good examples of this:

Raise me a dais of silk and down;
Hang it with vair and purple dyes;
Carve it in doves and pomegranates,
And peacocks with a hundred eyes;
Work it in gold and silver grapes,
In leaves and silver fleurs-de-lys;
Because the birthday of my life
Is come, my love is come to me.

In its privations Rossetti's poetry has a simple beauty, but when it brims over with rich images its singularity and strength are striking.

A more overtly positive woman's poetic voice in the earlier Victorian period is that of ▷ Emily Brontë. Hers is 'No coward soul . . . , / No trembler in the world's storm-troubled sphere' ('No Coward Soul is Mine'; 1846). The quotation which forms the epigraph to this section is typical of her immediate positivity; she would be a poet of the present moment, evoking earth-bound epiphanies which celebrate the material world rather than striving for the transcendental. Significantly, her 'anchor of desire' is cast forward into 'What is to Be' rather than nostalgically backwards. Across her corpus a theory of human freedom is constructed which needs to be read in the context of her position as a woman writer. In 'The Old Stoic' (1841) she desires only 'a chainless soul', not a heavenly transformation – 'Leave me the heart that now I bear, / And give me liberty'. Freedom is more important than heaven, a sentiment which echoes Catherine Earnshaw's dream in chapter nine of ▷ Wuthering Heights (1847):

Give we the hills our equal prayer, Earth's breezy hills and heaven's blue sea; We ask for nothing further here But our own hearts and liberty. ('And like myself lone, wholly lone'; 1841)

Unlike the more passive mysticism of Rossetti, Brontë is anything but stoical, and her poetry's affirmation of the earth forms a strong critique of organized religion's promise of better things to come:

Let others seek its beams divine In cell and cloister drear But I have found a fairer shrine A happier worship here;

By dismal rites they win their bliss, By pennance, fasts and fear – I have one rite – a gentle kiss; One pennance – tender tears.

Flesh and the fin de siècle

Sexuality haunts Victorian poetry as an anxious desire, a force both attractive and repulsive, like the prostitute figure 'Jenny' (1870) in > Dante Gabriel Rossetti's poem of that name. The strict a/a/b/b rhyming scheme of 'Jenny' causes her name to assonate ironically with 'guinea'; she is a fallen goddess, whose access to the 'vile text' of sexual knowledge makes her the object of simultaneous desire and denigration. Jenny's image is distorted by what men desire of her:

Yet, Jenny, looking long at you, The woman almost fades from view, A cipher of man's changeless sum Of lust, past, present, and to come, Is left. A riddle that one shrinks To challenge from the scornful sphinx.

From > Coventry Patmore's eulogies to the safe delights of married love in The Angel in the House (1858), to > George Meredith's bitter sonnet sequence about estrangement and divorce, > Modern Love (1862), the Victorians were covertly obsessed with the question of sex. Ahead of Nietzsche's proclamation about God, Meredith declares 'the death of love' and digs its grave with his text (Modern Love, (i)).

Through the Victorians' treatment of or silence regarding sexuality we can discover much about what was considered the proper subject matter for poetry. In this section I want to talk briefly about how those norms and rules of propriety gradually broke down as the century closed and as writing itself opened. Tennyson's institutionalization as Poet Laureate caused him to consolidate gradually the shifting selves and voices of his earlier verse, and by the latter decades of the 19th century he had become quite firmly the spokesman of decorum over degeneracy. By the time of 'Locksley Hall Sixty Years After' (1886), subterranean rumbles were shifting the ground beneath Tennyson's feet, causing him to castigate vehemently the author's part in inviting a new dark age in which 'Chaos, Cosmos' are interchangeable, and freedom is only 'free to slay herself':

Authors — essayist, atheist, novelist, realist, rhymster, play your part, Paint the moral shame of nature with the living hues of Art. (...) Feed the budding rose of boyhood with the drainage of your sewer; Send the drain into the fountain lest the stream should issue pure. Set the maiden fancies wallowing in the troughs of Zolaism, — Forward, forward, ay and backward, downward into the abysm. Do your best to charm the worst, to lower the rising race of men; Have we risen from out the beast, then back into the beast again?

The force with which this sewer imagery is impressed upon us is arguably as blatant and shocking as the kind of literature it would repress; Tennyson is calling for a public health drive to counter poetic corruption as the notorious Contagious Diseases Acts of the 1860s sought to control prostitution. In its utter physical disgust this text reveals much about the bourgeois obsession with cleanliness ('next to Godliness') which ▷ psychoanalysis was beginning to encounter in its most extreme and mentally destructive forms: as Tennyson penned these words, Freud was working toward the publication, with Joseph Breuer (1842–1925), of Studies on Hysteria (1895), one of the founding texts of psychoanalysis. But however eloquently this poem speaks of Tennyson's own preoccupations, it is its role as a critical prescription which interests us here. For at stake in this is both the notion that 'dirty writing' messes up a literary tradition in the process of purifying itself, and also that such poetic 'foul passions' can have a profound effect on the moral welfare of the nation.

The > decadent writings of the later 19th century perversely took such a stance gloriously to heart, actually affirming these powers in an indulgence of the flesh as sin. The period of the 1860s and 1870s, the High Victorian period, was a period of consolidation both politically and poetically, and writing was generally on a grander, surer scale, although this consolidation uneasily co-existed with other tendencies. In the late 1880s and early 1890s Tennyson, Browning and Arnold died, and the emphases of poetry shifted. The artists of what > W.B. Yeats (1865–1939) called the 'Tragic Generation' - > Oscar Wilde, > Ernest Dowson, Lionel Johnson (1867–1902), ➤ Aubrey Beardsley and ➤ Arthur Symons (1865–1943) - developed an extreme form of aestheticism, strongly influenced by > Walter Pater's notorious epilogue to Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873). This group of bohemian poets formed > The Rhymers Club in the 1890s, and published their work in a body of journals which reflected their priorities: chiefly > The Yellow Book and The Savoy. As the century became more > utilitarian, adamantly scientific and technologically precise, poetry turned from the prescription of social relevance and made a virtue of the notion that it was brazenly gratuitous. Perversity, superficiality and hedonism were prioritized over the socially useful, profoundly spiritual and serious. ▷ Nineties poetry in particular embraced the idea of poetry as estranged from the real world. The earlier notion of poetry as 'a weapon of strife in the social conflict', or Arnold's celebration of the moral worth of poetry, were reversed by > aesthetic doctrine - as Wilde wrote, 'The man who could call a spade a spade should be compelled to use one'. Such a shift is, however, most significant in its challenging of the rules of poetic subject matter rather than in any formal innovations which decadent poets enacted. Their work is characteristically sinful rather than amoral, evil rather than atheist. Working within the structures of conventional morality fin de siècle writers were anti-Victorian Victorians in that they prioritized beauty over goodness, the aesthetic rather than the ethical, the body over the spirit.

This latter emphasis is what the poet, novelist and dramatist ➤ Robert Buchanan had called (in an essay on D.G. Rossetti) ➤ 'the Fleshly School of Poetry'. In the 1860s this 'school' was opened by Algernon Swinburne under the influence of the Marquis de Sade (1740–1814) and ➤ Charles Baudelaire, and bore its own bizarre progeny in the 1880s and 1890s. Certainly, the earlier obsessions of the Pre-Raphaelites had played an important role in the fin de siècle's spectacular materialization of certain lurid themes, particularly in the movement's representation of femmes fatales like Jenny or Swinburne's Dolores. Dante Gabriel Rossetti's verse often adorns his paintings of women so that the woman becomes a fusion of verbal description and detailed visual representation on a gigantic scale.

The painting/sonnet 'Astarte Syriaca' (1877) exemplifies this, representing a woman who combines Venus and Astarte, an embodiment of an ineffable higher knowledge and thus also, an image of Victorian woman worship. Rossetti's power to frame women within a certain range of images could, perhaps, be read alongside Browning's > 'My Last Duchess' (1842), the speaker of which gains power over the Duchess in the painted image of her. Together Jenny and Astarte Syriaca – woman as essentially 'Amulet, talisman, and oracle' – offer the double version of sexual fear and desire with which I began. Christina Rossetti's work supplements this masculine vision, stepping back even further than Browning from the female canvas and sharply disrupting her brother's images of essential femininity.

A more outrageous manifestation of textual fleshiness came, however, with the explosion of Algernon Swinburne on to the relatively conservative poetic scene in the mid-186os. Swinburne is known about now more for his dissolute lifestyle and sexual excesses. His bloodstained poetry is perhaps best known for its insistence on the themes of lust and violence, not all of which even the most crusading 20th-century writers on sexuality have thought to legitimize. As enfant terrible to High Victorian complacency, his early Dionysian work had an intoxicating effect on his young contemporaries.

The initial impact of Swinburne's poetry stemmed in part from his technical innovation, chiefly an obsessive use of alliteration. As he became a more established literary figure his technique was conservatively consolidated. Intoxicated incantations became simply rhythmically tedious, as Swinburne's outrageous and often blasphemous themes were battered into conventional iambic shapes just as the bodies of his subjects are, 'Trodden as grapes in the wine-press of lust' ('Laus Veneris'; 1 191; 1866): Thus, whilst bloodblotches are symptoms that his figures have been 'trampled' by desire, the purple effect of his writing contained in regular, conservative form signalled for later generations Swinburne's ultimate lack of poetic dynamism.

This late-Victorian prioritization of the body and the beautiful over moral and social worth may have been rebellious, challenging the moralizations of earlier politically engaged poets, but it certainly wasn't revolutionary; it may have broken the rules but it certainly didn't change the structure within which the rules worked. As well as working within a moral economy which still held matter and spirit to be diametrically opposed, the poets discussed so far were also working within a textual economy which held form and content to be separate dimensions of poetry. This, then, brings us on to another important aspect of late-Victorian writing, and in particular the poetry of those key transitional figures who were beginning to question the rules which dictated how a poem was written, just as the 'fleshly school' was questioning what a poem was written about.

The fruits of unbelief: Movements toward modernism

Much of the writing discussed so far is, in its versification and syntax at least, familiar – formally it conforms to what the reader is used to. Victorian poetry of this stylistically conventional type in part has trained our readerly sensibilities. This familiarity, however, breaks down in the more difficult verse of Robert Browning and Gerard Manley Hopkins, whose work looks forward to the formal obscurities and syntactical abnormalities of modernism.

Browning's verse is often convoluted and digressive. > Ezra Pound found Sordello (1840) unreadable, and > Jane Welsh Carlyle read the whole of it without discerning whether Sordello was a book, a man or a city. Browning is concerned to show how his verse is constructed, to leave in the traces of the psychological process he went through in writing it, to lay bare the association of ideas which lead to the final full stop. He foregrounds 'The grand Perhaps' ('Bishop Blougram's Apology', 1 190 from ▶ Men and Women; 1855) – the doubts and equivocations of writing and modernity - to such an extent that it takes on some kind of positive identity. In the words of 'Bishop Blougram's Apology', Browning's question concerns the uses of doubt and difficulty, 'how can we guard our unbelief, Make it bear fruit to us?' Thus he overtly shows the reader the 'perhapses' of poetry writing itself, the process he goes through in trying to get from 'a' to 'b' of a narrative; the fruit that this bears is a highly unusual and difficult type of poetry. He constantly interrupts himself, leaving trails of dots for us to follow as thoughts tail off and into other thoughts. The traces of the process of a poem's construction are left on show as evidence of how it is produced, but because we are used to these traces and half thoughts being edited out, his poems are difficult reading. What aims to be a realistic representation of the flow of mental processes reads as stilted, stuttering parenthesis. In an effort to mimic the patterns of common speech Browning's verse frequently slips from self to self without formal signal:

Ay, because the sea's the street there; 't is arched by ... what you call ... Shylock's bridge with houses on it, where they keep the carnival:

I was never out of England – it's as if I saw it all.

('A Toccata of Galuppi's', Men and Women)

So one modernist effect of reading Browning is that he causes us to confront the process through which relevant information is usually selected or omitted, through which different textual registers are signalled. In its obscurity Browning's verse takes on the otherwise thematic problem of a dissolving subject and turns it into a question of form and syntax.

Gerard Manley Hopkins is a Victorian poet in the sense that he wrote mainly from 1875 to 1889 but his work was not published until 1918. There is a certain historical appropriateness to this delay, since his difficulty, and his interest in the ▷ Metaphysical poets, is akin to the modernists who turned to the English ▷ Renaissance as part of 'the direct current of English poetry' (T.S. Eliot). 'Difficulty' becomes the catch-word of early 20th-century writing, a strategy for marking a distinction between modern writing and the 19th-century values of the reader-friendly text. Hopkins' contorted versification, syntactic twists, and dictive and rhythmic experimentation have confounded easy readings. His 'grand Perhaps' came at the point at which he started to 'doubt Tennyson', opening up another important emphasis of poetic modernism − its concern is to move away from the preciousness of 19th-century poetic diction to something more immediate, to the rhythms of common speech. It is paradoxical, then, that readers had become used to the strict versification of the Victorians, and to a specifically poetic vocabulary and range of images, and it is this faculty which has alienated them from modernism's attempt to deploy the language and images of the everyday. Hopkins' case is highlighted by his innovative rhythmic form − ▷ sprung rhythm − which was designed to bring into his verse the energies of ordinary speech. The syllabic stresses in his lines are syncopated, as they might be in a conversation. In 1877 he wrote to ▷ Robert Bridges,

Why do I employ sprung rhythm at all? Because it is the nearest to the rhythm of prose, that is the native and natural rhythm of speech, the least forced, the most rhetorical and emphatic of all possible rhythms, combining, as it seems to me, opposite and one wd. (sic) have thought, incompatible excellences, markedness of rhythm – that is rhythm's self – and naturalness of expression . . .

(21 August 1877)

His use of sprung rhythm is, however, one of the aspects of Hopkins' poetry which was considered most difficult, since difficulty is an indication of unfamiliarity.

In Hopkins' meticulous and characteristically Victorian visual powers, especially regarding the natural world, he prefigures > D.H. Lawrence (1885–1930); he is not a poet of generalization, repeating tiny detail rather than broadly gesturing. But like his later imitator, > Dylan Thomas (1914–53), words unroll and suggest each other uncontrollably:

... now, barbarous in beauty, the stooks rise
Around; up above, what wind-walks! what lovely behaviour
Of silk-sack clouds! has wilder, wilful-wavier
Meal-drift moulded ever and melted across skies?

('Hurrahing in Harvest', 1877)

There is an (arguably unchristian) exuberance, a vision of excess, in Hopkins' verse, and in his philosophy of 'instresses' and 'inscapes' his Jesuitism becomes almost pantheistic. In touching the inscape of a thing – an image, or complex of images, a natural object or experience – poetry claims access to a vision of that thing's essential existence. This existence is communicated to the individual through an energetic pulse or channel – the 'instress' – which is opened between object and perceiver, if she or he is 'ready'. For Hopkins, poetry exceeds meaning; it is in his impulse to commune with the 'isness' of things, to allow material language to touch the thing itself through a poetic experience of epiphany, that Hopkins' modernity lies.

Hopkins' temptation to visit the dark night of the soul (particularly in the 'sonnets of desolation' of 1884–5) brings his later poems of despair close in their painful intensity to Thomas Hardy's bleakest work. Like Hopkins, Hardy is also a poet known for his use of common language and diction, and is quite literally a fin de siècle poet in his uniquely pessimistic and Schopenhauerian stance on passing from the old century into the new. Hardy's hopelessness looks forward and backward; a poem such as 'The Darkling Thrush' (1900) is both a poem of loss and a poem of dread, 'greeting' the 20th century from a pivotal point which also implicitly glances backwards:

So little cause for carolings Of such ecstatic sound Was written on terrestrial things Afar or high around,
That I could think there trembled through
His happy good-night air
Some blessed Hope, whereof he knew
And I was unaware.

Hardy, then, writes at the end point of a process and a century in which the self is gradually and systematically estranged from the familiar. Time is no longer simply the dimension of loss, but also that which brings the 'darkening dankness / The yawning blankness' ('The Going') of the future ever closer. His foreboding about what Yeats called (in 'Coole Park and Ballylee, 1931') the 'darkening flood' indeed prefigures much of late Yeats' feelings about the 20th century.

Background: Authors, Readers and Publishers

Where the ▷ Restoration and ▷ Enlightenment periods were dominated in literary terms by drama and poetry, the 19th century was indisputably the age of the novel. When ▷ Anthony Trollope noted in 1870 'that novels are in the hands of us all; from the Prime Minister down to the last appointed scullery-maid' he was drawing attention both to the pervasive cultural and social importance of fiction and, implicitly, to the immense range of novels available to what was by then a mass reading public. Not only did the novel form produce a consistent stream of major practioners (of whom an uncontroversial listing would include ▷ Jane Austen, ▷ Charles Dickens, ▷ Charlotte and ▷ Emily Brontë, ▷ George Eliot and ▷ Thomas Hardy), it also gave expression to a huge variety of discourse from writers of less established reputation. Fiction in the 19th century could address every topic, enter every dispute, reflect every ideal of an age perceived by those who lived through it to be one of unprecedented rapid change. And, significantly, an extraordinary number and variety of 19th-century novels have currency in contemporary popular, as well as scholarly, reading habits.

This enduring popularity may in part be accounted for by the novel form itself. The novel is more immediately approachable than drama or poetry, and it addresses itself directly to 'life' without the intervening artistic medium of verse or dramatic form, and in a way which other literary genres do not. It tells stories, reworks the mundane materials of everyday life into something significant, and (most 19th-century readers would add) it teaches moral lessons. More interestingly, perhaps, it could be argued that the 19th-century novel is the first art form to deal explicitly and realistically with issues which speak directly to some of the central concerns of 20th-century consciousness.

The novels of this period sprang from a society undergoing a more massive upheaval under the influence of industrialization than in any previous era (> Industrial Revolution). Not only was the population shifting irrevocably from an agricultural to an urban base, with all the profound changes in social, working and family patterns that this entailed, there were also the dramatic visible changes resulting from technological invention which altered people's perceptions and their world. The railway boom of the 1840s did not merely effect the landscape; its more profound repercussions lay in revolutionizing expectations of speed, mobility and permanence. When in > Dombey and Son (1847-48) Dickens describes 'the first great shock of the earthquake' which the building of the railway brings, he is expressing a now familiar paradox inherent in such change: 'from the very core of all this dire disorder, [the railway] trailed smoothly away, upon its mighty course of civilisation and improvement'. The chaotic but human little community of Staggs's Gardens has been 'cut up root and branch' to make way for the 'crowds of people and mountains of goods' to be shifted by the railway: the individual and idiosyncratic have been sacrificed to the corporate and the homogeneous. > Thomas Carlyle's famous definition of this period as 'the Mechanical Age' focused the anxieties of many of his contemporaries about the relationship of the individual to society. 'Men are grown mechanical in head and in heart, as well as in hand,' wrote Carlyle, and the development and preservation of individuality within a society dominated by various kinds of mechanistic systems (moral, social, political, economic, even historical) formed a major theme of fiction throughout the century.

However, whereas Carlyle's mechanized individual is tacitly assumed to be a man, the novel of this period belongs in certain crucial respects to women. Not only were women the major consumers of fiction, forming as they did the majority of the readership throughout the century, they were also, to a degree never seen previously, producers as well. Women novelists take at least equal status with men both as generally acknowledged 'great writers' - four of the six major practioners listed above are women - and also as part of the huge array of novel writers who produce everything from minor masterpieces to worthless pot-boilers. In the first two decades of the century Jane Austen was writing novels of sophisticated irony and realism, while > Mary Shelley's > Frankenstein (1817) represented the peak of the Gothic romance form (> Gothic novel). Throughout the period writers like > Charlotte Yonge, > Elizabeth Gaskell, > Harriet Martineau, > Ouida and > Margaret Oliphant were producing novels ranging from serious social comment to wild sensationalism (novel of > sensation). And in the 1890s the single most popular novelist (though very far from the best) was another woman, Marie Corelli, whose The Sorrows of Satan (1895) sold more copies than any previous English novel. The subject matter of fiction, moreover, fell characteristically into a woman's sphere: even in novels whose thematic interests lie primarily elsewhere, the standard plot and setting are almost invariably domestic and family-orientated, with courtship and marriage providing a major part of the narrative thrust. As George Eliot pointed out, the novel form, more than any other, offered opportunities to women in a society which elsewhere constrained their every activity: 'No restrictions can shut women out from the materials of fiction, and there is no species of art which is so free from rigid requirements.' The 19th-century novel was the first art form in which women could take equal status with men.

For George Eliot, though, as for many others, the unusually dominant role of women as both producers and consumers of fiction was not an unequivocally good thing. Her comments are taken from an essay entitled > 'Silly Novels by Lady Novelists' in which she draws attention to the self-gratifying and unreal stereotypes which lady novelists offer to an uncritical female readership. In other respects, too, this female orientation had an unfortunate influence on the sphere of the English novel. The popular picture of the Victorian pater familias reading out suitable material to his devoted family was not far from the truth, and was felt by many practising novelists to be a major restriction on their art. The 'young person', made archetypal through Dickens's Miss Podsnap in > Our Mutual Friend (1864-5), placed a crippling constraint on the material thought proper for inclusion in the novel: 'The question about everything was, would it bring a blush into the cheek of the young person? And the convenience of the young person was, that, according to Mr Podsnap, she seemed liable to burst into blushes when there was no need at all.' As ⊳ Thackeray lamented in his preface to > Pendennis (1848-50): 'Since the author of Tom Jones was buried, no writer of fiction among us has been permitted to depict to his utmost power a MAN'; where > Henry Fielding was at liberty to portray a lovable male libertine, Thackeray and his contemporaries looked constantly over their shoulders for the blushes of the young person and the pursed lips of the symbolic guardian of morality, > Mrs Grundy. This provided a focus for impassioned debate throughout the century: where Trollope recorded complacently that 'no girl has risen from the reading pages less modest than she was before', other novelists, such as the popular ⊳ feminist writer of the 1890s ⊳ Mona Caird, chafed furiously against such artificial restraints: 'Mrs Grundy in black silk, with a sceptre in her hand, on the throne of the Ages, surrounded by an angel-choir of Young Persons! Is this to be the end of our democracy?'

Thus, for a large part of the 19th century the English novel was significantly limited by the necessity to conform to a moral code which aimed to protect a predominantly female readership from exposure to sexual corruption. Extreme circumspection was required in the depiction of any sort of sexual contact, whether in or outside marriage, often with ludicrous results. Charlotte Brontë's unusually frank account of ⊳ Jane Evre's passionate feelings for Mr Rochester and of his sexual history brought accusations of coarseness from several critics. The scene in Hardy's > Tess of the D'Urbervilles (1891) in which Angel Clare carries the milkmaids across a flooded lane had to be altered to expunge the image of a man lifting a personable young lady in his arms: in the serialized version, Clare had to be equipped with a wheelbarrow. And in broader terms, too, the novel upheld middle-class morality in matters of sexual conduct. Women were to be sexually pure, and morally superior to men; marriage was a sacred and indissoluble bond; women's individual emotional needs were to be subsumed in those of husband and family. Where a novel depicted deviation from these values, the appropriate moral lesson had to be firmly underlined, so that the 'fallen woman' who features in so much fiction of the period was invariably seen to be punished. > Mrs Henry Wood's melodramatic and bestselling tale of adultery, > East Lynne (1861), rammed home these lessons with almost sadistic relish, warning potential adulteresses that their fate 'will be found far worse than death' and proving the point with a story of startlingly ingenious retributive suffering. More commonly, the fallen woman was brought to a lonely death (like Lady Dedlock in > Bleak House) or banished (like > David Copperfield's Little Em'ly). Even in a work which pleaded for the moral rights of the fallen woman, such as Elizabeth Gaskell's > Ruth (1853), the ultimate redemption could be attained only through death.

This circumspection had a more profound and potentially damaging effect on the portraval of women in the 19th-century novel than it did on the representation of men. Thackeray was to some extent right to envy Fielding his Tom Jones, but he might have done better to regret his own inability to portray a > Moll Flanders. Ironically, it was Thackeray himself who, in > Vanity Fair (1847-8), encapsulated the Victorian double vision of women: the conventional ideal, destructively doting, clovingly sentimental, passive, long-suffering and ultimately parasitical persists, as in Becky Sharp he portrays a woman of wit and initiative; who uses her sexuality and intelligence to exploit a society richly deserving her machinations, but who must finally be condemned as a neglectful mother, adulteress and, possibly, a murderer. Charlotte Brontë's > Shirley (1849) explicitly attacks this male polarizing of supposed female attributes: 'Men are often under an illusion about women: they do not read them in a true light: they misapprehend them both for good and evil: their good woman is a queer thing, half doll, half angel; their bad woman always a fiend.' The bad woman, as we have seen, was habitually disposed of by death; but it was the good woman, half doll, half angel, who forms the common 20th-century conception of the typical Victorian heroine. Dickens' Agnes Wakefield, who in David Copperfield's image of her is 'forever pointing upward', is a typical role model for the sort of female perfection which is morally impeccable, spiritually uplifting and a well-earned reward for the world-weary hero. It was an ideal whose falsity was under constant attack throughout the period and which was largely discredited by the end of the century:

in > Havelock Ellis' phrase, the stereotyped woman was 'a cross between an angel and an idiot'.

How, then, did what now appears such a patently distorted view of women retain such hold in fictional conventions? We must not dismiss out of hand the notion that Victorian portrayals of women are more reflective of their repression in reality than we would care to believe. > George Gissing argued that women actually were intellectually and developmentally feebler than men, when in typically gloomy mood he stated that 'more than half the misery of life is due to the ignorance and childishness of women. The average woman pretty closely resembles...the average male idiot.' In a society which, for the greater part of the century, denied women access to higher education and the professions, encased them physically in whalebone and voluminous skirts, and imbued them with the notion that their highest function was to serve and inspire men, it is little wonder that the conformist woman of the time should appear to modern eyes an unacceptably compliant creature - or, as Edward Carpenter (1844-1929) more waspishly expressed it, 'a bundle of weak and flabby sentiments, combined with a wholly undeveloped brain'. However, there is ample evidence both from the numerous examples of independent and rebellious women of 19th-century history, and from the many original and individualized heroines of fiction, that the conventional ideal was not the whole reality. More pervasively influential on characterization, as well as on the form and content of novels, were the actual conditions under which most of them were published.

At the beginning of the 19th century, the majority of novels were published in three, or sometimes four, volumes and the 'three decker' retained its popularity until almost the end of the Victorian period. The standard cost of each volume of the novel was half a guinea, a stiff enough price for most middle-class readers, and beyond the means of the working class. However, for a subscription of one guinea a year, readers could borrow a volume at a time from one of the > circulating libraries, by far the most influential of which was > Charles Mudie's, opened in 1842. Mudie exercised an influence over the Victorian novel which amounted to a form of censorship, for he prided himself upon selecting his stock according to its suitability for family consumption. Just as Mudie's moral approval of an author, which could translate into mass buying of copies from the publisher and advance orders for future works, could launch a career in fiction, so his refusal to stock a novel of dubious morality might spell financial disaster. Few novelists could afford the risk of offending the circulating libraries and thus a form of guilty self-censorship constrained the creative freedom of most writers.

Alternatives to publication in three-volume form were initiated by the revival of the monthly serialization of Dickens' > Pickwick Papers in 1836. Novels published in this manner were issued as slim volumes appearing at the beginning of each month, continuing, as a rule, for nineteen numbers. Clearly this form of publication deeply influenced the form of works in a way largely obscured by their subsequent appearance in a single volume. Writers who wished their readers to continue buying their work over a long period had to end each issue with some cliffhanging incentive to purchase the next volume, and needed also to ensure the memorability of characters whose last appearance could have occurred several months earlier. This may in part account for what is now sometimes taken to be a melodramatic form of plotting and exaggeration in characterization on the part of such habitual practioners of the monthly serial as Dickens or Thackeray. On the other hand, publication in parts did allow a writer to adjust his or her work in response to readers' preferences: a popular character could boost sales (as Sam Weller did for Pickwick) and a narrative red herring could be expeditiously abandoned. As single-volume serialization gradually gave way to part publication in family and literary magazines, the questions of sales and censorship moved from the author's to the editor's domain. Hardy was one of the prime sufferers from editorial restraint in the initial serial publication of his novels, and he frequently had to wait for one-volume publication before he was able to present his work in the form intended. Both Dickens and Thackeray had experience of the business from both ends, the first as editorial instigator of the family weeklies \triangleright Household Words and \triangleright All the Year Round, the second as editor of the prestigious \triangleright Cornhill. Amongst major Victorian novelists, only the Brontes never published in any sort of serial form.

Development through the century

Given the wealth and variety of 19th-century fiction, as well as the inevitable historical shifts in critical judgements, it is hardly surprising to find widely diverging assessments of how the novel developed over the period. > George Saintsbury's A History of Nineteenth-century Literature, first published in 1896, gives almost as much space to > Maria Edgeworth as to Jane Austen and George Eliot, and treats > Walter Scott more fully than Dickens: Hardy receives no mention at all. F. R. Leavis' immensely influential The Great Tradition (1948) opens with the characteristically combative statement: 'The great English novelists are Jane Austen, George Eliot, > Henry James and > Joseph Conrad'; Charlotte Brontë is noted as having 'permanent interest of a minor kind', Dickens as being a 'great entertainer' who lacks 'sustained seriousness'. Leavis' judgements, based on a vaguely defined but insistently urged criterion of 'significant creative achievement', were of course challenged almost immediately by other critics, and both he and his wife and fellow critic Q. D. Leavis later admitted Dickens and Charlotte Brontë to their higher ranks. In more recent years, the whole notion of the canon has come under attack, perhaps most notably from feminist critics. Individual writers and sub-genres of the novels which would have been relegated to areas of minor interest by many mid-20th-century critics now attract serious study, and the reputations of many well-known novelists have notably shifted. Of those most highly regarded in the 19th century itself, Scott and ▶ George Meredith have suffered the most serious depression in critical interest; neither is now much read by the general public or widely taught on literature degree courses. Dickens, on the other hand, has been reclaimed from the realm of mere entertainer and praised as an incisive social critic of profound symbolic significance. And Hardy, ignored by Saintsbury and patronizingly dismissed by Leavis, now commands as wide a critical industry on both sides of the Atlantic as any 19th-century novelist.

There is no simple way of subdividing the mass of fictional material published during the period, nor, despite Leavis' claim for a great tradition, is there any single line of development which can easily be traced. Conventionally, the pre-Victorian period, where the major figures are Scott and Jane Austen, is seen as having a separate identity, which then gives way to the explosion of talent in the first decades of Victoria's reign, with the emergence of Dickens, Thackeray and the Brontës. The mid-Victorian novel can be seen as dominated by the later Dickens and George Eliot, and the late-19th century by Hardy. These periods will be dealt with separately in conjunction with the major authors within them. However, to identify the major practitioners of the form during the period is very far from finding a consistent train of development. While there is a sense in which James' novels can be seen as a more self-consciously artistic development of Jane Austen's fictional mode, there is no obvious way in which Hardy may be said to emerge from the same tradition. Charlotte Brontë, notoriously, found little to admire in Jane Austen, and Hardy recorded that he was unable to finish reading Wuthering Heights (1847). Arguably, the 19th century saw the emergence in the novel of a privileging of ▷ 'realism', both in the presentation of psychological depth of characterization and in the depiction of humankind's inevitable interrelation with the newly perceived complexities of social and historical contexts. There is also a clear change, in the Victorian period at least, in the material thought permissable for inclusion in the novel. The tyranny of the circulating libraries and the family magazines was gradually eroded to allow greater frankness in the fictional portrayal of sexuality. By the 1890s outspokenness on questions of sexual behaviour − particularly in women − had become to some extent fashionable, and a host of popular novels which examined such questions in an overtly polemical manner enjoyed a brief vogue. Even so, the violently antagonistic reception of Hardy's ▷ Jude the Obscure (1895), which saw the novel reviled in the press and burnt by a bishop, showed how severely limited this increased tolerance could be.

More importantly, an attempt to treat 19th-century fiction as a smoothly developing series of 'great writers' severely distorts the picture of the novel as it would have been viewed by both readers and authors during the period itself. It ignores too much of what was seriously offered and received by contemporary writers and readers, and which is now the subject of increasing critical interest, both as reflections of the 19th-century consciousness and as significant and legitimate variations on the novel form. Late-20th-century taste is perhaps more open to claims of romance and fantasy, or sympathetically interested in the overt wrestling with ideas, than was the case when Leavis made high moral seriousness and mastery of form his main criteria of excellence. Minor novelists, and the sub-genres in which they frequently wrote, are an essential and illuminating part of the 19th-century fictional scene.

Sub-genres of the novel

During the early decades of the 19th century most popular fiction grew out of the traditions of ⊳ romance and ⊳ Romanticism. The two terms are, of course, closely linked, but should be equated. A romance, in David Masson's definition of 1859, was 'a fictitious narrative...the interest of which turns upon marvellous and uncommon incidents', and the debate between romance and realism formed a continuous part of 19th-century thinking about the theory of fiction. The influence of the Romantic movement was most apparent in the late-18th-century Gothic novel, a form not lacking in marvellous and uncommon incidents, but which also played on the Romantic interest in the supernatural and in the dark and untapped areas of the human psyche. Jane Austen, writing novels of pragmatic realism during the height of the Romantic period, mercilessly satirized the implausibility of the Gothic through the credulous Catherine of > Northanger Abbey (1818), and neatly pinned down the possible self-indulgence of the Romantic sensibility in > Persuasion's Captain Brondon. > Thomas Love Peacock's spoof Gothic novel > Nightmare Abbey (1818), also lampooned the form as well as parodying the romantic excesses of some of that movement's major poets. But the Gothic was still kept vividly alive in Mary Shelley's Frankenstein published in the same year as Peacock's parody, and reappears, subtly transformed, in the works of Charlotte and Emily Brontë. It could also be argued that the > historical novel, first popularized by Scott, and continued less successfully in the works of, for example, > Harrison Ainsworth, owed much to the Romantic period and Gothic preoccupation with the past.

In many ways, though, it was romance rather than Romanticism which informed the main sub-genres of the first three decades of the 19th century. Writers of popular fiction were anxious to entertain their readers with dramatic incidents and to draw them imaginatively into worlds remote from their own. The historical novel could obviously offer limitless scope here, in terms of both high drama and (often ponderously academic) period detail. Where Ainsworth's novels catered to the contemporary taste for luridly reconstructed English history, one of the other popular practitioners of the form, > Edward Bulwer, mainly remembered now for The Last Days of Pompeii (1834), took the wider sweep of Western historical movements as his subject. His historical romances tend to focus on the closing of eras and may thus be seen as signifying contemporary unease in the face of change and instability. But his writings are too clogged with the fruits of meticulous historical research, and too stilted in the rendering of dialogue to have lasted well. However, forms of the historical novel continued to be practised throughout the century by major as well as minor writers. George Eliot ventured into historical fiction, not wholly successfully, in > Romola, as did Gissing in Veranilda (1904). And modern readers often overlook the fact that many familiar novels of the period announce themselves in their opening words as 'historical' while still being set in the 19th century: 'While the present century was in its teens...' (Vanity Fair); 'Thirty years ago, Marseilles lay burning in the sun...' (> Little Dorrit); 'One evening of late summer, before the nineteenth century had reached one-third of its span...' (> The Mayor of Casterbridge).

The historical novel could be both an escape from and a comment on the profound changes which were perceived to be occurring in the contemporary social order. Of less obvious relevance were the other popular sub-genres of the early 19th century, the ➤ Newgate novel and the ➤ silver-fork school. The Newgate novel played on morbid tastes for violence and death in ways which relate it to some extent to the Gothic, and in romanticizing its criminals it removed such socially disruptive elements safely into the realm of fantasy. The silver-fork school, on the other hand, displayed the sort of high society life to which increasingly prosperous members of the middle class might hope to aspire and which they could certainly be expected to envy. Novels of this class paraded details of the food, fashions and furniture of the rich and well-bred before a readership which could now begin to dream of emulating such manners. Writers of silver-fork fiction included > Benjamin Disraeli in his early novel Vivien Grey (1826), the now largely forgotten Theodore Hook (1788–1841), and > Catherine Gore. Both Dickens and Thackerav capture and to some degree satirize the mood of envious interest amongst the socially mobile on which these novels played - Thackeray in his portrayal of the nouveau riches Osborne and Sedly families in Vanity Fair, and Dickens, for example, in his parody 'The Lady Flabella' in > Nicholas Nickleby or with the Veneerings in Our Mutual Friend. Interestingly, both the Newgate and silverfork forms have counterparts in modern popular fiction in the bodice-ripping school of historical fiction (where sex replaces death as the focus) and the sex-and-shopping novel which caters for the emulative dreams of the upwardly mobile.

Of more immediate social relevance, however, as well as in general possessing more lasting literary merit, were the novels which addressed the 'condition of England' question. These works, also known as > 'social problem' novels arose out of the social and political upheavals which followed the > Reform Act of 1832. The 1830s and 1840s marked the beginning of a conscious effort both by Parliament and by social commentators to address the problems caused by the rapid industrialization of the preceding decades. The first Factory Act (> factories) and the > Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834 reflected the stirrings of governmental conscience and, from the other side, the rise of ⊳ Chartism marked the beginnings of concerted working-class demands for reform. The economic depression of the 1840s produced deprivation amongst the industrial workers of the north on a scale which could not be ignored, and Chartist riots and marches on Westminster made poverty and disaffection visibly threatening to the comparatively untouched middle-class southerner. It was Carlyle who first drew attention to the social effects of the Industrial Revolution in his essay > 'Signs of the Times' (1829) and who, in coining the phrase 'condition of England question' in Chartism (1839), provided a focus for what to many novelists of the early Victorian period seemed to be the central matter for fiction. Writers like Elizabeth Gaskell, Disraeli, > Charles Kingsley and the Dickens of > Hard Times (1854), addressed themselves directly to the question and produced novels which dealt realistically and sympathetically with the new problems of the industrialized working class.

Probably the major strength of the social problem novel lay in its educational rather than its polemical function. Written by and for the middle classes, these novels laid out with passionate clarity the plight of a section of the community of which most readers, for geographical and social reasons, were simply ignorant. The new cities of the north of England, where industrial workers were herded into hastily erected housing built round smoke-belching factories, were uncharted territory for large parts of the novel-reading public, and the divisive effects of such developments were repeatedly stressed by novelists. In giving his condition of England novel > Sybil (1845) the subtitle 'The Two Nations', Disraeli encapsulated his perception of a country tragically and dangerously split between rich and poor, and Elizabeth Gaskell's North and South (1854-5) explores the differences in values and living conditions between the two halves of the country. The vividly realistic descriptions of working-class life provided by many social problem novels were as educative to contemporary readers as to later social historians, and the pressing issues of Chartism, trade unions, strikes and master-worker relations receive sensitive if rarely revolutionary treatment in such novels as Gaskell's > Mary Barton (1848), Kingsley's ▶ Alton Locke (1850) and Disraeli's Sybil. Dickens' Hard Times, the only one of his novels to be set exclusively in the north of England, contrasts the mechanistic, and as he sees them, inhuman principles of > utilitarian philosophy with the personal and warm-hearted values of imaginative sympathy, and his handling of the question of solidarity amongst the factory hands is symptomatic of the ambivalence apparently inherent in the genre. His working-class protagonist, Stephen Blackpool, is a saintly victim, his union leader a blustering agitator and the men good-hearted innocents temporarily swayed into an unworthy form of protest against a system portrayed as patently wrong. Blackpool's repeated lament in the fact of bafflingly obvious injustice, "Tis all a muddle', sums up the helplessness of worker and novelist alike in the face of the enormity of the problem.

Indeed, the one major criticism of the genre, levelled by contemporaries as well as by modern critics, was that it proffered inadequate and often sentimental solutions to questions of great social and political complexity. As Thackeray put it, 'At the conclusion of these tales...there somehow arrives a misty reconciliation between the poor and the rich; a prophecy is uttered of better times for the one, and better manners in the other...and the characters make their bow, grinning, in a group, as they do at the end of a drama when the curtain falls.' This is largely true of the novels mentioned: the symbolic handshake between master and man at the end of North and South, Mary Barton's escape to Canada with her newly-wed husband, or Stephen Blackpool's martyrdom in the cause of truth and understanding - all substitute reconciliation at a personal level for long-term political solutions. However, there is no reason to expect novelists to be in possession of answers which escaped legislators, whereas in articulating and making imaginatively immediate the social problems of the time, writers of the condition of England novels not only provided a valuable information service but also produced works of significant realism and insight.

The social condition of a newly industrialized Britain was a preoccupation of novelists during the 1840s and 1850s. During the same period the spiritual condition of the country also became of pressing concern and novels dealing with religious questions formed another recognizable sub-genre which retained its currency to the end of the century. In some sense all 19th-century novels are 'religious' in so far as they are the product of a society in which Christian observance was the norm amongst the middle classes, and thus the oral and spiritual values of Christianity are necessarily either implicit or deliberately explored by all writers of fiction. However, the crisis of faith which arose in the middle decades of the 19th century predictably gave rise to works which set out to discuss the problems explicitly, in much the same way in which the condition of England novel articulated social and political questions. The three main influences on religious thought during this time were the > Oxford Movement of the 1830s and 1840s, which sought to restore High Church ideals within the Church of England, and culminated in > John Newman's defection to Roman > Catholicism in 1845; the new German biblical criticism, made first accessible to English readers with the publication of George Eliot's translation of Strauss's Leben Jesu in 1846; and, of course, the impact of ⊳ Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species (1859). Spiritual crises and ecclesiastical quarrellings form the subject of such novels as J. A. Froude's The Nemesis of Faith (1849), Disraeli's Lothair (1870) and > Mrs Humphry Ward's Robert Elsmere (1883), as well as being the basis of Trollope's Barsetshire novels and Margaret Oliphant's imitations of them, 'The Chronicles of Carlingford'.

Nineteenth-century consumers of fiction were thus very much more receptive to the exposition of ideas in fiction than are most modern readers, who tend to resent being preached at under the guise of fiction. Problem novels, or 'novels with a purpose', tackled issues of all kinds throughout the period. Again, the main beneficiaries of this discursive tendency were probably women, whose problems, lumped under the catch-all phrase 'the > woman question', were repeatedly examined. The fallen woman was, as mentioned above, a particularly popular subject, featuring as a dreadful warning in works such as East Lynne or as a repentant Magdalene figure in Ruth. Charlotte Yonge's The Clever Woman of the Family (1865) cautions young women against the temptations of the intellect as memorably as Mrs Henry Wood does against the lure of the flesh. And by the last decade of the century there had arisen a distinct class of novel, the ▶ 'New Woman fiction', which dealt with the current feminist questions of sex, marriage and work. > Grant Allen's succès de scandale, > The Woman Who Did (1895), marked the culmination of the genre, with its hyperbolic attack on the institution of marriage (a 'temple' where 'pitiable victims languish and die in...sickening vaults'). Nor was the problem novel exclusively the province of minor writers: almost all major novelists of the period deal with these ideas in some form or other, and in the 1890s, for example, George Gissing's > The Odd Woman (1893), Meredith's Lord Ormont and his Aminta (1894) and Hardy's Jude the Obscure (1895) were all taken by contemporary readers to be variations of the New Woman novel.

There is, then, continuous interaction in terms of themes, issues and genres, between different writers and between recognizable sub-groups of the novel and what is now regarded as mainstream fiction. The novelists of the period should be viewed within the artistic as well as the social and political context in which they worked.

The pre-Victorian period: Jane Austen

To select Jane Austen as the single major writer of this period is at once to make a critical judgement which would not always have been accepted. For later 19th-century readers and many earlier 20th-century ones, Walter Scott would have appeared probably the more influential figure. In initiating the historical romance he popularized a form which retained its appeal throughout the century and he was read with admiration by most subsequent 19th-century novelists. Charlotte Brontë, unsurprisingly, much preferred his romantic sweep to Jane Austen's tightly controlled realism, and Henry James praised his 'responding imagination before the human scene'. Interestingly, though, it was Scott himself who was one of the first to identify and appreciate Jane Austen's particular contribution to the development of the English novel at the time. In his review of $\triangleright Emma$ (1816) he discusses at length the limitations and diminishing returns of the predominating romance form, praising her novels for 'presenting to the reader, instead of the striking representation of an imaginary world, a correct and striking representation of that which is daily taking place around him'.

Jane Austen was herself, as is widely known, acutely conscious of the self-imposed restrictions of her range. When she wrote of the 'little bit (two inches wide) of ivory on which I work with so fine a brush as produces little effect after much labour', she was characteristically both self-deprecating about her limitations and astute about her strengths. As a realist in an age dominated by romance, her fine brush reworked the material of fiction into tones which set standards for the investigation of the individual within a closely observed social framework for later realists to emulate if they could. For a long time her reputation was somewhat distorted by 'Janeite' critics who praised her 'gentle' irony and indulgent humour, thus creating an impression of a softly female orientation within the safe sphere of domestic concerns, untroubling to the larger issues of life. Nothing could be further from the truth. Her irony, far from being gentle, is habitually savage in its condemnation of the foolish, hypocritical and self-deceiving; her humour is razor-sharp in its exposure of human weakness in a morally flawed society. Her heroines are set painful lessons in personal knowledge and moral self-discipline which entirely deny the possibilities of sentimental or coincidental resolve to which later Victorian novelists often have recourse. If, in keeping with the comic mode, they succeed finally in securing their desirable ends, it is not through a conventional coincidence of circumstance but because moral maturity secures an appropriate partnering. Nor is Jane Austen's world as prim and restricted as is sometimes unguardedly assumed. While never condoning sexual misdemeanour, her treatment of the subject owes more to hard-headed 18th-century worldliness than to Victorian repression. Where the Victorian female innocent is habitually seduced, abandoned and condemned to a lonely fate, Lydia Bennet (> Pride and Prejudice) bounces exuberantly into Wickham's bed with no thoughts in her head beyond immediate gratification, and after her hastily patched up marriage is received, if coolly, by her family.

Jane Austen's values, then, are more 18th-century than Victorian, more > classical than romantic. She portrays a society in which foolishness, hypocrisy and avarice abound, but where an agreed standard of moral principle may be assumed and where rationality may be invoked to counterbalance the disruptive lure of unbridled emotionalism. Her characters may suffer but they must also understand, and their understanding derives from a proper exercise of rational thought rather than from emotional or subconscious enlightenment. Through Marianne in > Sense and Sensibility (1811) she attacks the idea that feeling can be a reliable guide to conduct and in > Persuasion (1818) she satirizes, though with more sympathetic indulgence, romantic emotion. But perhaps no single factor marks Jane Austen off more distinctly from the Victorian novelists that followed her than her treatment of children. Amongst her heroines, only Fanny Price in > Mansfield Park (1814) is portrayed in childhood, and children in general figure merely as convenient plot devices or as social distractions. By contrast, the Victorian novelist frequently makes the child, often an orphan, and the process of growth to maturity a central thematic focus. After Jane Austen, the influence of Romantic thought on ideas about childhood, innocence, imagination and feeling is everywhere apparent.

The mid-nineteenth century: Dickens, Thackeray, and the Brontës

It is notable, then, that while biographers of Jane Austen find difficulty in giving dramatic interest to a life of largely uneventful calm, those of the great midcentury novelists have a wealth of misery, neglect and misunderstanding to relate in their subjects' early years. This has the obvious effect of producing corresponding autobiographical portrayals of children in the novels, but also tends to create a sense, in marked contrast to Austen, of the fictional protagonist as alienated from or at odds with society. In the early Victorian novel the depiction of society generally expands unrecognizably from Jane Austen's little bit of ivory to a consciously panoramic perspective in which the individual is likely to be embattled and forlorn. The figure of the innocent child, often lonely and neglected, becomes a powerful symbol of society's guilt; the > education and growth from childhood show the process of adjustment within a largely hostile social structure. While the Romantic movement discovered and articulated the moral potency of the child, it was the Victorian novel which produced the first sustained portrayals of children in literature.

Of the major novelists of the period, William Makepeace Thackeray is probably least directly concerned with children, though his best novel, Vanity Fair, does make use of significant incidents from the childhood of his protagonists in order to account for their subsequent development. Though often astute and original in his perception of his characters' psychology, his main strengths as a writer lay in his sharp eye for the particular kinds of human weakness thrown up by a newly complex society and his ability, in Vanity Fair as least, to bind all levels of the social structure into a comprehensive vision of moral and spiritual inadequacy. When Charlotte Brontë described him as 'the first social regenerator of the day', she was responding to qualities which were abundantly present in his early work but which faded notably in his later career. Vanity Fair, 'A Novel without a Hero', depicts English society in the years surrounding > Waterloo as itself a battleground where money and social standing are the criteria for success and where individuals rise and fall according to their skill in playing social games as amoral and arbitrary as the Stock Exchange on which fortunes are won and lost. Though Thackeray focuses his interest on the newly emerging middle classes, his picture of society extends upwards into the metropolitan aristocracy and the landed gentry, and downwards to the working classes and > Bohemia. What binds them all is the struggle for money and reputation in a cut-throat world where the clever can 'live well on nothing a year' and the weak go to the wall. It is mark of Thackeray's originality that the character who most successfully exploits the possibilities of this social struggle is a woman, the intelligent and cynical

Becky Sharp; and though he works hard to condemn her at the end of the novel, her wit and energy continue to contrast favourably with the vapid conventionality of other characters. The novel leaves a moral question mark over all its characters and in so doing forces its readers to engage actively in the process of questioning and judgement in a way calculated both to challenge and disturb.

Charles Dickens, Thackeray's more successful rival for the affections of the novelreading public, rarely leaves such moral openness, but develops more consistantly towards a bleak view of society in which monolithic institutions (money and commerce in Dombey and Son, the law in Bleak House, the civil service in Little Dorrit) are potentially crushing to the strongly realized goodness of individuals. It was Dickens more than any other Victorian novelist who exploited the possibilities of the child as symbol of innocence amidst corruption, and this is one major factor which has led to accusations of sentimentality in his works. A catalogue of his maltreated but morally reformative children - > Oliver Twist, David Copperfield, Paul and Florence Dombey, Jo the crossing sweeper, Little Nell, Sissy Jupe (from Hard Times), Little Dorrit (amongst many others) - suggests a preoccupation with the innocence of childhood which could add weight to such an accusation, and it is largely true that Dickens' children are exempt from the barbs of humorous exposure with which he mercilessly illuminates the grotesque flaws in most of his characters. But his best portrayals of childhood - those in which the child ceases to be a simple symbolic force – uniquely capture the guilts and fears as well as the pathetic helplessness of juvenile innocence.

Much modern criticism bases its praise for Dickens on a perception of the development in his later novels of a thematically coherent critique of his society which works through imagery and symbolism rather than through the creation of psychologically convincing characters. One can point, for example, to the recurrent images of imprisonment in Little Dorrit or to the sustained exploration of legal ramifications in Bleak House. Dickens' world is so richly animated, his descriptive powers so invigoratingly original as to invest the inanimate objects of his world with a vitality and significance often assumed to compensate for the lack of realism in the people which inhabit it. His women are prime targets for criticism here, since it is generally female characters who, for obvious reasons, carry the sometimes crippling weight of his moral approval. Dickens, while anatomizing the evils of his society with unique imaginative power, had a characteristically Victorian belief in the possibility of unsullied goodness and it is generally the heroines of his novels who provide examples of its morally regenerative force. Sissy Jupe in Hard Times works a change in the harshly utilitarian Gradgrind household 'by mere love and gratitude' and it is her 'wisdom of the Heart' which effectively counteracts the mechanistic values that the novel attacks. Her passive goodness and sweetly self-sacrificing nature exemplify the qualities often taken to be regrettably typical of Dicken's portrayal of women. However, it could also be argued that the 20th century's automatic suspicion of pure virtue blinds the modern reader to more subtle qualities in Dickens' heroines. His skill in depicting the psychological results of guilt and repression, often noted in his male characters, is present also in his portrayal of many of the women. For characters such as Florence Dombey, Esther Summerson or Little Dorrit 'becoming good' is a psychologically plausible reaction to rejection and alienation, though the modern critical eye has habitually been too prejudiced against the stereotype of the virtuous woman to note this.

Whatever may be reclaimed for Dickens' reputation in the portrayal of women, though, he can never hope to rival the Brontës in this area. > Anne Brontë, less talented and original than her sisters, still writes movingly and perceptively about the loneliness of the governess in > Agnes Grey (1847), and adds new dimensions to the depiction of marital misery in > The Tenant of Wildfell Hall (1848). Emily Brontë's only novel, Wuthering Heights, is generally recognized to transcend normal moral and spiritual expectations. Though Charlotte Brontë felt it necessary in her Preface to her sister's novel to apologize for what she felt 'must appear a rude and strange production', the novel is meticulously planned and structured. Its strangeness derives partly from its unaccustomed settings, more perhaps from its extremities of violence and passion, and the central portraval in Cathy and Heathcliff of a relationship which cannot be assimilated into any conventional framework or concept of character. That Emily Brontë was aware of the difficulties of this structure is shown by the care with which she draws her readers into the story through narrators of familiar social and psychological backgrounds; as their limitations are exposed, so their conventional judgements are progressively rejected and the reader is invited to accept an entirely unfamiliar scheme of values. At the end of the novel, Lockwood's inability to imagine 'unquiet slumbers for the sleepers in that quiet earth' seems more a reflection of his own limitations than an assurance that the grave will provide a final peace for the spirits of Cathy and Heathcliff.

However, the radical nature of Emily Brontë's vision makes her less influenced by social realities. Her main characters, being largely outside convention, make no direct comment upon it. Charlotte Brontë, on the other hand, working more within the bounds of recognizable society, produces original depictions of women which are overtly hostile to contemporary ideas. The autobiographical elements in her work create repeated images of women struggling against a world whose expectations they are unable and, indeed, unwilling to fulfil. > Jane Eyre, 'poor, plain and little', and Lucy Snow (in > Villette, 1853), wracked with the pain of unrequited love, obviously call upon Charlotte Brontë's own experiences. Her heroines all struggle in a world whose standards of female behaviour are alien to their own, and their achievements are wrenched painfully from the creation of a personal morality which is frequently at odds with the conventions of their society. Though Lucy Snow, who in Villette's slightly ambiguous ending is shown as independent mistress of her own school, may seem the most obvious candidate for modern feminist approval, it is really Jane Eyre who summarizes Brontë's sustained plea for a morality in which the heroine has the right and the duty to realize her individuality independent of expectations from more moral systems. Both Charlotte and Emily Brontë participate in the Romantic's championing of the unique individual, the first within, the second largely outside contemporary social realities. The poetic intensity of their writing, together with the patent influences of the Gothic and > Byronic traditions, make their works the most striking inheritors of Romanticism in the fiction of the period.

The mid-Victorian period: George Eliot

It is gratifying to reflect that the first intellectual amongst major English novelists was a woman. In an age when female education was largely limited to the acquisition of 'accomplishments', George Eliot could read French, Italian, German, Latin and Greek. Deeply involved in and influenced by the philosophical and scientific movements of the time, she lost her religious faith in early womanhood but retained a profound sense of moral imperatives in a secular context. In common with many of her counterparts, her interests focused on history and on modern attempts to arrive at systematic descriptions of social, religious and intellectual evolution. Her novels continually show her interest in the relationship between individual and historical change: as the individual is the product of social and historical forces, so society is formed and changed by the apparently inconsiderable lives of the individuals who compose it. Dorothea, who sets out at the beginning of \triangleright Middlemarch (1871–2) in the view of the narrator as a 'modern Saint Theresa', may be defeated in her youthful objectives of effecting visible or dramatic change in her society, but is convincingly displayed at the end as having an effect 'incalculably diffusive' on 'the growing good of the world'. The portrayal of the individual within a complex network of social and historical relationships forms a major part of George Eliot's fictional vision.

The past, and the extent to which Eliot's characters are determined by forces contained within it form a continual theme in her fiction. 'Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds,' she wrote in Adam Bede (1859), and her novels repeatedly display what in Middlemarch she described as 'the slow preparation of effects from one life on another'. Seeing her characters as largely determined by a meticulously charted individual past, and a socially and historically realized present, she nevertheless insists upon the stern exercise of personal responsibility in moral decision-making. Her characters or, more particularly, her narrators, are among the first in English fiction to be consistently portraved in the process of rigorous thought, whether about personal choices or larger intellectual systems. However, George Eliot as narrator remains firmly in control of both her structures and her readers' responses. When in Middlemarch she comments on the unknowable significance of future developments in individual lives - 'destiny stands by sarcastic with our dramatis personae folded in her hand' - she could have legitimately substituted herself for destiny. George Eliot's authorial voice, omniscient, magisterial and tolerant, constantly controls our reactions and, to some extent, raises her readers to a level close to her own lofty overview. When ⊳ Virginia Woolf described Middlemarch as 'one of the few English novels written for grown-up people', she was deftly defining the degree to which George Eliot's fiction makes demands of serious moral response in a readership which could previously have rested happily within the safe bounds of entertaining diversion.

Hardy and the late-nineteenth century

Some contemporary reviews of Thomas Hardy's early, anonymously published work speculated that it might be by George Eliot. Presumably they were misled by the superficial similarities in the portrayal of rural communities and perhaps by Hardy's youthful pretensions to a command of contemporary intellectual issues, imperfectly assimilated. Indeed, an ability to judge his readers' tolerance of progressive moral and intellectual views was a continuing, and to modern eyes endearing, quality of Hardy's fiction, deriving as it did from his unusual combination of a countryman's pragmatism with a self-educated intellectualism. As the creator of the semi-fictional world of Wessex, Hardy became the most significant regional novelist of the age and, with his unrivalled knowledge of the local customs and accents of his native land, was in better position than any other writer to chart the changes in agricultural communities under the various dramatic shocks of 10th-century change. Hardy has, moreover, an eye for nature which is at once entirely unsentimental and supremely observant. When in > A Pair of Blue Eyes (1873) Henry Knight clings desperately to a cliff with a fatal drop beneath him, Hardy notes that his torments are increased by the fact that rain driven against such an obstacle moves upwards not down: and, mechanically staring death in the face, Knight's eyes actually meet the fossilized gaze of a trilobite embedded for millions of years in the rock before him. The vulnerable human in his extremity meets the indifferent but infinitely varied forces of nature, yet has contact over a gap of several million years with a fellow creature who has similarly suffered the pangs of life and death.

Such an incident is typical of the way in which Hardy's immense imaginative range and habitual preoccupation with the ironies of time are given solidity by observation of the precisely natural. It is also characteristic in that Knight's eventual rescue is effected by an incident at once stimulating and shocking to Victorian sexual tastes. The novel's heroine, Elfride, strips herself of all her undergarments in order to make a rope and, clad merely in a 'diaphanous exterior robe', hauls him to safety. Throughout his career Hardy found himself embroiled in battles against the prudish sensibilities of his readership and, as his later novels began to engage more directly with contemporary questions of sexual morality, he was drawn, apparently protestingly, into fervent debates about women, sex and marriage. His views of the human condition, though, are more comprehensively tragic than would be suggested by confining him to immediate social criticism. Frequently accused of being irredeemably pessimistic, he described himself as a meliorist who portrayed the worst in order to point towards the better. But, despite the sharpness of their social criticism, there is little in his last novels - in Tess of the D'Urbervilles or Jude the Obscure - to suggest that possible future change could effectively alleviate what a recent biographer has termed his 'obstinate intonations of doomed morality'.

Hardy was in many senses the last of the great Victorian novelists. During the final years of the century it was his reputation, together with the more warily expressed admiration for Meredith, which dominated English fiction. Amongst other novelists, though, the debate about the relationship between romance and realism continued to be waged, with Gissing and ▷ George Moore as the prime realists vying with the exotic romances of, for example, ▷ Robert Louis Stevenson and ▷ H. Rider Haggard. The vitality of the novel form was undiminished both in its challenge to social and moral convention and in its sheer inventiveness in entertainment. In literary terms, though, it was Henry James, with his infinitely sophisticated narrative and Joseph Conrad's modernism, which pointed the way forwards into 20th-century developments of the novel as a form of art.

Drama in the 19th Century: 1837-1901

Ian Clarke

The drama of the 10th century has often been taken to represent a fallow period in literary and theatrical history. According to this view, between the Restoration dramatists of the late 16th and early 17th centuries there is nothing much of interest (apart from slight blips in the 18th century with John Gay, Richard Sheridan and Oliver Goldsmith) until the very end of the 10th century and the arrival of > Oscar Wilde and > George Bernard Shaw. The influential Pelican Guide to English Literature offers a typical example of this view of 10th-century drama and theatre: 'The theatrical world was rather a shabby one, dependent largely on poor and economical translations of bad plays . . . Only with the discovery of anti-Victorian zest by Oscar Wilde and by Shaw, under the influence of Butler and a partially understood Ibsen, does the drama recover a measure of linguistic vitality and social function.' The dismissal of 19th-century drama as unworthy of consideration is compounded by the fact that its dominant genre was > melodrama and that, according to a canonical literary view, this genre itself is of little worth. Thus M. H. Abrams in A Glossary of Literary Terms clearly establishes a hierarchy of genres that effectively sidelines much 19th-century drama: 'The 19th century in England produced few notable tragedies but many melodramas.' Abrams, as does the essay in the Pelican Guide, underpins the argument by subscribing to a literary critical concept of value which cannot accommodate the structures and forms of melodrama: 'The protagonists are pure as the driven snow and antagonists luridly evil, while credibility of both character and action is sacrificed for violent effect, in a drama contrived according to an emotional opportunism.' This view is, however, a distortion and misrepresentation of the actuality of 19th-century stage melodrama; it amounts to an uninformed literary critical prejudice.

Nor is it difficult to find this sort of point of view repeated in specifically theatrical dictionaries and companions. The following examples are taken from two of the most accessible and widely available of such works:

an extravagant drama making full use of all the possibilities inherent in music, lighting, and stage machinery for the artificial heightening of emotion) . . . drama of an unusually sensational type . . .

naive popular entertainment . . .

[plays] whose elements were highly coloured and larger than life – the noble outlaw, the wronged maiden, the cold-blooded villain . . .

[melodrama indicates] everything that fed the popular appetite for horror and mystery, violence and double-dealing, but always with virtue triumphant . . .

Again the generalizations misrepresent the actuality. In effect, these reference works are not descriptive of actual cultural forms and history; rather, these theatrical dictionaries codify what is fundamentally a literary critical prejudice.

The consignment of 100 years of dramatic writing and theatrical history to the dustbin obscures the sheer amount of theatrical activity and writing that took place in the 19th century. Evidence of the amount and indeed the growth of theatrical activity can easily be found in the handlists of plays appended to the individual volumes of Allardyce Nicoll's A History of English Drama 1660–1900. The handlist for the period 1800 to 1850 runs to 395 pages, and for the period 1850 to 1900 to 617 pages.

The growth in dramatic writing was matched, particularly in the second half of the century, by the building of new theatres and the rebuilding and extensive refurbishment of existing ones in provincial towns and cities as well as in London. Technological innovation was constantly put to use in theatres often dedicated to presenting the visually spectacular. Oil lighting began to be replaced by gas soon after the start of the century, and by its end many theatres had replaced or supplemented gas with electricity. The impulses of antiquarianism and literalism resulted in sets that accurately recreated settings for which scenic artists of reputation and merit painted huge backcloths to give the effect of three-dimensionality in a two-dimensional medium. The demand for lavish and often violent spectacle grew throughout the period. Consequently, stage machinery as well as lighting effects became increasingly ingenious and technically complex. By the turn of century the stage adaptation (1899) of Lew Wallace's novel Ben Hur staged the chariot race with real horses, and the sporting melodrama The Whip (1909) represented not just the running of the Derby but also a train crash. The developing film industry capitalized on the demand for spectacle, and film's ability to present even more elaborate (and seemingly more realistic) spectacles heralded the demise of spectacular stage melodrama in the early vears of the 20th century.

Throughout the whole of the 10th century the theatre represented one of the dominant forms of popular cultural entertainment. However, in the latter half of the century, actual legislation, campaigns for further legislative reform, and more general shifts in attitudes and perceptions pressured for a drama that was to have a higher cultural standing and for a mainstream theatre that was to acquire a greater social respectability. While at one level these developments represented a desire on the part of theatre managers, actors and dramatists to be taken and to take themselves more seriously, it also determined theatre-going as a class-defined social activity. From the 1860s onwards the fabric of auditoria (in the more expensive parts at least) of major provincial theatres as well as those of London's West End was designed as part of a social event, providing entertainment for a middleclass audience. The social status of the upper echelons of the acting profession rose throughout the latter half of the century to the extent that in 1895 > Henry Irving was made the first actor knight for services to the theatre. This newfound conventional social respectability determined not just the tone of theatregoing but also the concept of the function of theatre and the nature of the drama it presented.

There was a similar rise in the status of the dramatist. If, in the earlier part of the century, the actor was not generally accepted into polite society, so the dramatist was often viewed as a hack churning out unfortunate adaptations of continental European dramas and farces. By the end of the century, however, a dramatist could, partly as a result of the protection provided by recent copyright legislation, view her/his profession as serious and, indeed, potentially lucrative. In the 1890s dramatists such as > Henry Arthur Jones and > Arthur Wing Pinero issued well-produced editions of their plays to coincide with their premieres. George Bernard Shaw, on the other hand, published his plays when there was, in some cases, little or no chance of their production on the public stage. Both enterprises indicate a reading audience for play texts. The issuing of plays by reputable publishing houses meant that the drama could stand in their lists alongside volumes of novels, poetry, and essays. A point reiterated by Jones in his collected essays, The Renascence of the English Drama (1895), was that if the drama were to have any intellectual respectability, dramatists had to be seen as persons of letters and that their product could bear comparison with other literary forms. The intellectual respectability of the drama was further enhanced by the seriousness with which it was taken by late-19th-century commentators and critics such as > George Moore, > William Archer, > Henry James, A.B. Walkley, > J.T. Grein, and Shaw.

According to that classist point of view that links cultural and class formations so as to validate the former by the latter, the social problem drama of the end of the century (despite its indebtedness to earlier drama) is often still viewed as a huge advance on the supposedly unfortunate popular cultural melodramatic forms of the earlier part of the century. Nevertheless, seminal works – Michael R. Booth's English Melodrama, and Peter Brooks' The Melodramatic Imagination – have done much to shift the critical ground so that the term melodrama, and more importantly its adjectival form, can be used descriptively rather than pejoratively. The re-evaluation of melodrama has also been greatly assisted by the relatively recent emergence of theatre studies and cultural studies as distinct disciplines. Melodrama and the melodramatic can now be considered as an important and, indeed, central cultural form of the 19th century.

The first play in English specifically to identify itself as a melodrama (although in the French form mélodrame) was Thomas Holcroft's A Tale of Mystery (1802), an adaptation from the French of Guilbert de Pixérécourt's Coelina, ou l'Enfant de mystère (1800). The > Gothic elements of A Tale of Mystery - the creation of a sense of impending, foreboding doom; settings which included 'A Gothic Hall in the House of [the suitably foreign-sounding] Bonamo' and 'Wild mountainous country ... with pines and massy rocks' - were to become a mainstay of early English melodrama. Such elements would become even more elaborate and spectacular to include ruined castles, dungeons, ghosts, violent storms. A feature of A Tale of Mystery which would remain throughout the century is its use of music - 'Violent distracted music', 'Music of Terror', 'Music to express disorder' are specifically notated, along with many other precisely discriminated types of music, in the stage directions. Music underscores the action and emotional mood, and signifies character function. The use of music in part derives from French and German dramatic antecedents, and from current English theatrical practice. Often viewed as a regrettable consequence of the monopoly of the two patent theatres (Covent Garden and Drury Lane) on the so-called legitimate drama and the legal requirement for the so-called illegitimate drama to contain a certain number of songs and pieces of musical accompaniment, the function of music in melodrama should rather be seen as central and indispensable to the creative signifying practices of the genre. A modern analogy in a popular cultural form is the use of music and song in the soundtrack of a feature film.

The exoticism of Gothic melodrama dominated in the first two decades of the 19th century, but domestic melodrama with native English settings emerged towards the end of the 1820s and became increasingly prevalent. Even in other forms of melodrama – nautical, military, temperance, criminal – domestic elements are crucial. Domestic melodrama offered a construction of domestic ideology in its ideal form so as to provide judgemental systems encoding for the spectator approbation and disapprobation of characters, incidents, and situations. Thus those characters who uphold and protect the domestic ideal are to be approved of; those who threaten it are instantly figured as villains. This places at the centre of the drama the nuclear family, and occasionally the extended family, with its attendant bonds and obligations. Within this arena the dramatic impetus derives from negotiations and intersections of class and gender, wealth and justice, and, above all, power. Far from being escapist entertainment, in the earlier part of the 19th century domestic melodrama offered to newly urbanized working-class audiences valid images, however indirect, of their own alienated and disempowered experience as wage slaves.

In this context, a key figure in the melodrama became the hard-hearted, foreclosing landlord. His activities in turning families out of their homes into the street were represented unequivocally as violating the domestic ideal. The pathos created by the presence of lachrymose children and infirm old folk confirms his behaviour as all the more heinous. The conflict between the sanctity of the family unit and the landlord's actions is brought into direct play in Douglas Jerrold's Black-Ey'd Susan (1829) where Doggrass, who intends to evict black-eyed Susan of the title along with the aged and dying Dame Hatley, is not only Susan's landlord but her uncle. By unwaveringly demanding his arrears of rent he jettisons his familial obligations towards, as Susan reminds him, his 'brother's orphan child'. The contradiction between the familial relationship and the relationship between landlord and tenant is made explicit in the following exchange:

Susan. Uncle, the old woman is sick – I fear dangerously. Her spirit, weakened by late misfortune, flickers like a dying light – your sudden appearance might make all dark. Uncle – landlord! would you have murder on your soul?

Doggrass. Murder?

Susan. Yes; though such may not be the common word, hearts are daily crushed, spirits broken – whilst he who slays, destroys in safety.

Susan, whose character function of heroine earns her the support of the audience, leaves no doubt as to how the landlord's behaviour should be judged. Incidents centring on the attempted eviction form only a small part of the varied action of Black-Ey'd Susan; such incidents and associated issues are, however, much more dominant in the main action of Jerrold's The Rent-Day (1832). The problem of absentee landlords feeding their pleasures with the rents from their tenants is described thus: 'If the landlord lose at gaming, his tenants must suffer for't. The Squire plays a low card – issue a distress warrant! He throws deuce-ace – turn a family into the fields! 'Tis only awkward to lose hundreds on a card; but very rascally to be behind-hand with one's rent!' This speech is followed by advice given to the steward to pass on to the landlord:

When you write back to the Squire, you can tell him, by way of postscript, if he must feed the gaming-table, not to let it be with money, wrung, like blood, from the wretched. Just tell him, whilst he shuffles the cards, to remember the aching hearts of his distressed tenants. And when he rattles the dice, let him stop and think of the bailiff and tax-gatherer, knocking at the cottage doors of the poor.

The ethical and emotional structuring of melodrama creates patterns of sympathy for the oppressed rather than the oppressor and might thus be described as populist. It is the disempowered – whether by wealth, class, gender, lack of access to legal redress – who form the endorsed moral and ideological centre. Yet, in the speeches above from Black-Ey'd Susan and The Rent-Day, one can hear that the populism is capable of a significant radical edge.

The radicalism potentially strikes deep. A landlord in demanding his rent and in distraining and evicting if it is not received breaks no law. Yet the ethical structures of domestic melodrama condemn him. Melodrama, therefore, sets up a system of values which come into direct conflict with the actuality of the British legal system, and offers a direct challenge to the laws relating to landlord and tenant as well as those laws which protect the ownership of property. It can be argued that the radical thrust is emolliated by narratives which suggest that it is wicked individuals administrating the system rather than the system itself that is wrong. Thus in The Rent-Day the problems of absentee landlords and landlord/tenant relationships are resolved when Squire Grantley reforms, makes reparation and promises to be a good landlord in the future. However, an equally valid counter-argument is that narrative closures of that order are not universal, nor do they negate the articulation of radical sentiment earlier in individual plays. The repeated endorsement in play after play of melodrama's own ethical position in relation to landlords and tenants has a cumulative effect in the ideological work the drama does, and must suggest that the expression of populist radicalism spoke powerfully to the everyday experience and imaginative needs of the audiences.

The populist class consciousness of domestic melodrama sites the central focus of the class inequity in the figure of the wealthy landowner or squire. More often than not the squire not only has unfair advantages in terms of the power that wealth and class give him, but he is repeatedly an oppressor in gender terms. In ⊳ J.B. Buckstone's Luke the Labourer (1826), for instance, Luke may be the primary villain enacting vengeful plots against conventionally worthy Farmer Wakefield, but the Squire is a subsidiary villain who plans to abduct and take by force the virtue of Wakefield's daughter, Clara. The analogy within the nautical setting of Black-Ey'd Susan is the attempted rape of Susan by a naval officer. The character function of the squire figure also allows for further attacks on the administration of the legal system, for it is he who often represents justice locally. The Squire in Luke the Labourer is not only a potential kidnapper and rapist, he is also the local Justice of the Peace. His wrongful imprisonment of the woebegone comic man, Bobby Trott, elicits the following response from the comic woman, Jenny: 'I wish I were a queen or an emperor, for his sake: I'd see whether a Squire should not go in the cage as well as a poor man, when he deserved it'; but the Squire's escape to London where he will evade punishment offers evidence of significant corruption in the judicial system. Very different ideological work is being done here than that erroneous view of melodrama which assumes that there is 'an exact demonstration of poetic justice, in which earthly rewards and punishments are distributed in proportion to the deserts of the characters'.

Even more unrelenting in its attack on corruption in the judiciary is John Walker's industrial melodrama The Factory Lad (1832). Squire Westwood, the factory owner, dismisses most of his workforce after introducing steam-driven machinery, and is immediately figured in the play as the equivalent of the foreclosing landlord. It is also he who makes explicit whose interests the legal and judicial systems are designed to protect:

I must be on the alert, and keep my doors well fastened, and have, too, an armed force to welcome these desperadoes, if they should dare to violate the laws well framed to subject them to obedience . . . What have I to fear or dread? Is England's proud aristocracy to tremble when brawling fools mouth and question? No; the hangman shall be their answer.

Later in the play this exchange between the aptly named Justice Bias and Rushton, the incendiarist who destroys the factory and steam machinery, articulates the populist perception of the inequity of the law:

Bias. The law is open to you, is it not?

Rushton. No; I am poor.

Bias. And what of that? The law is made alike for rich and poor.

Rushton. Is it? Why, then, does it so often lock the poor man in jail, while the rich one goes free?

The Factory Lad is remarkable for the strength of its radical sentiment and has continued to be performed seriously for its content by theatre groups and companies with left-wing political sympathies.

The construction of gender, both male and female, is enormously varied and complex in 19th-century melodrama and is beyond the scope of the present essay. However, some account of the character function of the heroine – whether as wife or daughter - in domestic melodrama is necessary. In the wake of the second women's liberation movement, the passivity of so many heroine characters is to many modern readers/spectators not only excessive but also extremely irritating. Such a reaction is understandable, but fails to do justice to the ideological work that is being done by showing women in a hostile world under almost constant threat of male violence. The violence is often specifically sexual. Already mentioned are the attempted rapes in Black-Ey'd Susan and Luke the Labourer of Susan (wife) and Clara (daughter) by upper-class characters. In The Rent-Day similar unwanted attentions are paid to Rachel Heywood (wife) by Silver Jack, one of the criminal characters. The most common resolution of these threats derives from the typological pattern that isolated and vulnerable women are in need of male protection. Thus Susan is saved in the nick of time by her husband, and Clara by the unintended intervention of the comic man, Bobby Trott. Rachel, on the other hand, defends herself by tricking the attacker, she then protects herself by threatening to kill her assailant with a woodcutter's bill, and eventually makes her escape. The narrative develops when she overhears a plot to rob and possibly murder the Squire, whom she goes to warn. The drama consequently utilizes the narrative expectation that squires are seducers; when she is discovered in the Squire's rooms it is immediately assumed by her husband (on the prompting of the criminals) that the assignation was a sexual one. This leads to pathos-filled scenes where she is expelled by her husband from the family home and denied access to her children. It may be unwise to extrapolate from the narrative that Rachel is being punished for an 'unfeminine' lack of passivity but the implication may remain.

Notwithstanding, the narrative developments involving Rachel indicate the centrality of the heroine character, especially in her roles of wife and mother, to the construction of domestic ideology in its ideal form; moreover, that her virtue, in conventional terms, is essential to that construction and often carries its burden. The working-class woman, further disempowered by gender and physical strength, is represented as having the consciousness of her own virtue as her only power. The articulation of this is capable, however, of development into a powerful rhetoric instrumental in the judgemental systems of the drama; thus Susan in Black-Ey'd Susan berates Doggrass for his suggestion that she may not be faithful to her absent husband:

Sir, scorn has no word – contempt no voice to speak my loathing of your insinuations. Take, sir, all that is here; satisfy your avarice – but dare not indulge your malice at the cost of one, who has now nothing left her in her misery but the sweet consciousness of virtue.

Rachel's similar berating of Silver Jack can stand as axiomatic of the ethical structure of a melodramatic genre that places domestic ideology, and the heroine's vulnerability and virtue at its centre: 'He who would destroy a happy fireside, is vile and infamous; but he who insults its wretchedness, is base indeed.'

It would be wrong to assume that dramatic forms developed throughout the 19th century in clearly defined progressive movements; during the whole period aspects of the drama would appear and re-appear, would go through negotiations and renegotiations, would re-present significant modulations of conventions and signifying practices. Nevertheless, in the 1860s a number of dramas seem to abandon the populist radicalism of the earlier domestic melodrama in favour of the endorsement of an increasingly bourgeois ideological stance. > Tom Taylor's The Ticket-of-Leave Man (1863) is a case in point. The first act shows the heroine, May Edwards, in a hostile environment. Alone and friendless she busks with her guitar from table to table in the Bellevue Tea Gardens. Her presence causes a commotion for which she requires male assistance from the hero figure, and there are also linguistic pointers to the idea that her activity is akin to prostitution. By the second act, however, she has been able by her own efforts to set herself up in lower-middle-class domestic comfort in a rented room that is 'humbly but neatly furnished', decorated with flowers, and complete with canary. The ideological work done by the representation of isolated or independent women under threat which they are not in a position to counter has been replaced by the ideological imperative of the mid-19th-century concept of self-help. It is probably no coincidence that > Samuel Smiles' Self-Help (1859) was published some four years before The Ticket-of-Leave Man. In the play the character Gibson, whose wife has employed May, makes explicit in conversation with May the ways in which approbation is apportioned: 'You've showed that you deserve her [Mrs Gibson's] kindness. For fifty people ready to help there's not one worth helping - that's my conclusion. I was telling my wife so this morning, and she insisted that I should come and satisfy myself that she had helped one person at any rate who was able and willing to help herself.' Similarly, the radical critique of the legal and penal system is now abandoned. Robert Brierly, the wrongfully imprisoned hero, is not utilized to offer such a critique; rather, his imprisonment is offered as reformative. It rescues him from bad company, cures him of his incipient dipsomania, and provides him with skills which will be useful to him in future life. The play, in its treatment of the social prejudice against ex-convicts, is often claimed to be a forerunner of the sort of social problem drama represented by John Galsworthy's Justice (1910). But Brierly earns his reparation not by challenging social prejudice but by thwarting the criminal plans of the villains.

The 1860s also witnessed a growth of the representation of increasingly mundane > realism on stage. Thus in The Ticket-of-Leave Man there is a moment of playful metatheatricality; in a scene set in Gibson's bill-broking office, one of the characters looks about her at the stage set and specifically draws the audience's attention to the dressing of the stage: 'I did so want to see an office – a real one, you know. I've seen 'em set on the stage often but they ain't a bit like the real thing.' Plays by > T.W. Robertson such as Caste (1867) and Society (1865) staged under the Bancroft management also brought into prominence domestic realism so that they were termed 'cup-and-saucer' and 'milk-and-water' comedies on account of their representation of everyday realism. Robertson's, in comparison to other drama indicates the range of visual pleasures that the 19th-century stage afforded: from large-scale antiquarian literalism; to the spectacle of the chariot race or train crash; to the interest in the everyday.

Other notable plays during this part of the 19th century were adaptations from novels by women writers, including > Mary Braddon's > Lady Audley's Secret and > Ellen Wood's > East Lynne. > C.H. Hazlewood's stage adaptation (1863) of Lady Audley's Secret places the villainess centre stage. She is explicitly excoriated by the wronged husband. Yet the play also articulates the fact that the husband, George Talboys, was inadequate as a provider and insouciant in respect of his marital responsibilities. He leaves her in England while he goes to find his fortune in India. An unresolved point is whether he wrote to her during his period abroad. Believing herself to be abandoned, the question for Lady Audley is one of survival in a society which is represented as offering a worthwhile position for women only in relation to men. Thus Lady Audley publishes a false notice of her death in a newspaper and under an assumed name schemes to gain the affections and hand of the wealthy Sir Michael Audley. In the altercation with her erstwhile husband, Lady Audley defends herself as follows:

I tell you, not one letter reached my hands; I thought myself deserted, and determined to make reprisals on you; I changed my name; I entered the family of a gentleman as governess to his daughters; became the patient drudge for a miserable stipend, that I might carry my point – that point was to gain Sir Michael Audley's affections; I did so, I devoted all my energies, all my cunning, to that end! and now I have gained the summit of my ambition, do you think I will be cast down by you, George Talboys? No, I will conquer you or I will die!

In conventional terms, Lady Audley, despite her justification of her behaviour and her husband's explicit admission of his failure to fulfil his marital responsibilities, is punished for her actions. Indeed, this particular stage adaptation suggests that her madness at the end of the play is a result/cause of her 'unnatural' (for a woman that is) villainy. And yet, the popularity of this narrative in its various stage adaptations suggests that, despite the overall conventional moral frame, Lady Audley's behaviour in overcoming her disadvantages possibly offered for women spectators the fantasy of $a \triangleright utopian resolution$.

The stage adaptations of East Lynne were many. The one by T.A. Palmer (1874) contains the famous, but often misquoted lines: 'Oh, Willie, my child dead, dead, dead! and he never knew me, never called me mother.' Although conventionally moralistic in its treatment of the fate of the unfaithful wife, this version of East Lynne shows the protagonist, Lady Isabel, in a variety of roles which implicitly raise questions about the economic as well as moral position of women in society. Thus she first appears as the single woman economically dependent on her extended family; she then makes a marriage more for financial security than love, and becomes the economically dependent wife; believing her husband to be unfaithful, she leaves the family home and her children, and decamps with the villain of the piece. As a fallen woman she suffers the usual fate of the fictional kept mistress, and is discarded by her lover. Echoing interest surrounding recent divorce legislation (marriage and divorce), the play next offers Lady Isabel as divorcee. Facial disfigurement in a railway accident enables her to re-enter unrecognized the previous marital home as governess to her own children. She takes on the character function of saintly sinner/penitent; she atones and earns some reparation by maternal self-sacrifice in caring incognito for her dying child, tormented by the fact that she cannot claim the role of mother. Her ultimate expiation is through her own death brought on by her weakened state and the exertions of nursing her son.

Contemporary typological constructions of women on the stage, some of which figure in East Lynne, took a severe jolt with the stormy appearance of > Ibsen in the English theatre, as did the range of material considered acceptable for the stage. > A Doll's House was staged in 1889 and > Hedda Gabler and > Ghosts in 1891. It was the last play which particularly outraged the critics. Clement Scott in the Daily Telegraph was unstinting in his vituperation: it was for him 'an open drain; a loathsome sore unbandaged; a dirty act done publicly; a lazar-house with all its doors and windows open'. Now justly notorious, Scott was more vociferous than others, but his sense of outrage was shared by many. The shock waves were out of all proportion to the number of people who might have been 'contaminated' by exposure to Ibsen's play. The Royalty Theatre, where it played for one night under the auspices of the Independent Theatre Society, had a capacity of only 657. Ibsen's plays, though, with their open discussion of subjects hitherto taboo in the 19th-century English theatre and with their questioning of the traditional (and therefore supposedly natural) role of women, pricked deep-rooted late-19th-century anxieties of a general social and political disintegration.

In the 1890s Ibsen's work was presented by minority theatre ventures; it could not be accommodated to or by the commercial theatre at that time. But the commercial theatre necessarily felt the reverberations of Ibsen's intrusion on to the English stage. Shaw noted that a theatre manager 'must be very careful not to produce a play which will seem insipid and old-fashioned to playgoers who have seen The Wild Duck, even though they might have hissed it'. The two English commercial dramatists who seemed to take up the challenge offered to contemporary dramatic writing were Henry Arthur Jones and Arthur Wing Pinero. Jones had established his career writing strong melodramas such as Saints and Sinners (1884) and The Silver King (1882); Pinero his by writing a series of farces, including The Magistrate (1885) and Dandy Dick (1887). In 1893 Pinero produced a serious problem play, The Second Mrs Tanqueray. The chronology of the appearance of this play, following closely on Ibsen's turbulent entry on to the English stage, is, like Shaw's remark, misleading as well as instructive. The Second Mrs Tangueray, in its examination of the double standard of morality and the unfairness with which a woman with a past like Paula Tanqueray is treated by society, superficially seems to offer a compassionate treatment of weighty moral and social issues. The debt to Ibsen is, however, more apparent than real. The play shows not a direct Ibsenite influence (both Pinero and Jones were adamant in disclaimers of such influence), but reflects an extension of tone and subject matter to which Ibsen's presence contributed. The Second Mrs Tanqueray, like many other dramas of the period, is a compromise between the outspokenness of Ibsen, which audiences found objectionable, and the conventional realistic play to which they were accustomed.

The Second Mrs Tanqueray examines the misalliance between Aubrey Tanqueray, upper middle class and stolidly respectable, and Paula, who has previously had several liaisons in the demi-monde of Europe. Tanqueray may openly articulate a condemnation of the double standard of morality, but he also articulates the idea, endorsed by what the audience actually see of Paula's behaviour, that she is somehow irrevocably damaged by her previous irregular sexual behaviour:

There's hardly a subject you broach on which poor Paula hasn't some strange, outof-the-way thought to give utterance to; some curious, warped notion. They are not mere worldly thoughts – unless, good God! they belong to the little hellish world which our blackguardism has created: no, her ideas have too little calculation in them to be called worldly. But it makes it the more dreadful that such thoughts should be ready, spontaneous; that expressing them has become a perfectly natural process; that her words, acts even, have almost lost their proper significance for her, and seem beyond her control. Ah, the pain of listening to it all from the woman one loves, the woman one hoped to make happy and contented, who is really and truly a good woman, as it were, maimed!

The marriage inevitably ends in disaster. Yet the inevitability arises not from the psychological mismatch of husband and wife, nor from society's hostility to the misalliance, but from a coincidence in the plot introduced by Pinero in the last act. Tanqueray's daughter returns from Paris intending to be married to a man who turns out to be a former lover of Paula. Paula's suicide ends the play and resolves the problem. Pinero's use of techniques derived in part from French models (> French influence) of the well-made play mediates the experience of a universe dedicated to the preservation of dominant social and moral codes and the punishment of women who have transgressed them. Similarly, in Jones' Mrs Dane's Defence (1900), the attempt of the eponymous woman with a past to re-enter society is foiled by an apparently chance discovery in a topographical dictionary which exposes her true identity and past indiscretion. The aesthetic of the well-made play is in essence a function of this ideological imperative. What such plays offer is a passing flirtation with the daring and the mildly risqué, but one which is safely contained by an action that provides resolutions endorsing the validity of the orthodoxies supposedly under serious discussion. Ultimately, the society drama of Jones and Pinero requires the double standard as a kingpin in its endorsement of what is a more extensive conservative ideology and sexual politics.

Other plays raise different problems to be resolved. Pinero's The Notorious Mrs Ebbsmith (1895) posits whether a woman of socialist and feminist beliefs can put them into practice by openly keeping house with Lucas Cleeve, a politician of some public prominence; Jones' The Case of Rebellious Susan (1894) asks whether a woman can openly repay her husband's infidelity in its own kind and remain in society. Mrs Ebbsmith's unconventional beliefs are rendered invalid when what is represented as her 'natural femininity' reasserts itself and she becomes a theatrically more familiar figure - the fallen woman. Her transformation in the last act to penitent fallen woman intending to retire to a life of contemplation and prayer in the north of England is not just a sign that she now recognizes the error of her ways, but allows Cleeve to return to his promising political career. In The Case of Rebellious Susan, Susan Harabin abandons her rebellion and returns to a patently less than perfect marriage. Jones may well have claimed that 'My comedy isn't a comedy at all. It's a tragedy dressed up as comedy', but any apparent cynicism in the idea that her rebellion can be bought off by what the Bond Street Jewellers supply and her wealthy husband can afford is subsumed by the sense of relief that not just social mores but the very fabric of society have been preserved.

The plays of Oscar Wilde, particularly > Lady Windermere's Fan (1892), A Woman of No Importance (1893), and An Ideal Husband (1895), have, in their settings, thematic concerns and resolutions, clear affinities with the conventions of the social dramas of Jones and Pinero. Where Wilde's plays are acknowledged to differ is in the epigrammatic wit of their dialogue. The relationship between the plays' wit and their conventional theatricality creates a challenging juxtaposition. Wilde's epigrams, in their paradoxical style, logic and subject matter, undermine and subvert the assumed social hierarchies and ethical orthodoxies which are constructed in the settings and conventions of late-Victorian society drama. Similarly, his lack of concern to conceal the improbabilities and coincidences of his plotting strategies has the effect of exposing the conservative ideologies supported by the narratives of Iones and Pinero's plays: indeed, it is the very sophistication of their implementation of such strategies that tends to obscure the ideological work being done there. Wilde is often acknowledged as a satirist of social mores and a moral critic. Yet, in > The Importance of Being Earnest (1895) the famous scene where Lady Bracknell interviews Jack Worthing to test his eligibility as a suitor is not just a display of English eccentricity or a comedic parody of theatrical convention; more importantly it also exposes the heart of the power base of the class Lady Bracknell represents. The thematic concern of contemporary society drama, the threat of misalliance, is revealed through Lady Bracknell as an issue of political as well as social and moral consequence:

To be born, or at any rate bred, in a hand-bag, whether it has handles or not, seems to me to display a contempt for the ordinary decencies of family life that reminds one of the worst excesses of the French Revolution. And I presume you know what that unfortunate movement led to?

The political implications, which remain unstated in the work of Jones and Pinero, are here made explicit. The underlying anxiety is not of an undefined disintegration of social and moral values but is one specifically of class conflict and insurrection, of those things that, as Lady Bracknell acknowledges, might 'prove a serious danger to the upper classes . . . and lead to acts of violence in Grosvenor Square'.

The denouement of The Importance of Being Earnest, in keeping with the play's genre, re-establishes the previously disrupted social order: Jack really is Earnest and is of acceptable social position – his mother a Lady, his father a general. Yet the play equally suggests that this social settlement is as arbitrary and as absurd as when he was the foundling Jack Worthing and descended from hand luggage.

The society drama of the last decade of the 19th century set the stage for what would become the mainstream of English commercial theatre for at least the next 60 years. It implicitly proposed that subjects worthy or interesting enough for dramatic treatment were only to be found among members of the upper classes, and that the most appropriate way of mediating that experience would be through the conventions of realist staging. It also proposed that what would be most interesting about people from the upper classes would be their peccadilloes, most frequently their sexual peccadilloes.

The dramatist whose career begins in the 19th century but who takes English drama through to what is identifiably a 20th-century style is paradoxically Shaw. The paradox lies in the fact that, unlike progressive dramatists of the first decade of the new century such as John Galsworthy (1867–1933) and Harley Granville Barker (1877–1946) who eschewed what they considered to be outworn dramatic and theatrical conventions, Shaw was flamboyant in his declaration of indebtedness to earlier stage traditions: 'My stories are the old stories; my characters are the familiar harlequin and columbine, clown and pantaloon . . . my stage tricks and suspenses and thrills and jests are the ones in vogue when I was a boy.' Thus, despite the labelling of some of his work in his first volume of published plays as 'unpleasant'

(> Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant), Widomers' Houses (1892) and Mrs Warren's Profession (1902) owe as much to domestic melodrama and romantic comedy, and the commonplace representation of the woman with a past as they do to lbsen. Others of Shaw's plays are equally identifiable in their adaptation of the conventions of 19th-century commercial theatre: The Devil's Disciple (1899), melodrama as practised at the Adelphi; Caesar and Cleopatra (1907), large-scale historical drama; > Candida (1900), domestic drama; > Arms and the Man (1894), military melodrama; Man and Superman (1904), romantic comedy; You Never Can Tell (1899), farcical comedy. For traditional literary history Shaw's plays represent one of the moments where English drama once again gains recognition. The overriding irony is that Shaw's unashamed indebtedness to the vitality of 19th-century theatrical tradition represents an indication of what the canonical literary tradition has missed out on.

Writing from Modernism to Postmodernism

Linda Ruth Williams

They last a second, a minute, they come and go like a moving winking light; but they have impressed their mark, deposited some kind of sensation before they vanished . . . Secret stirrings that go unnoticed in the remote parts of the mind, the incalculable chaos of impressions, the delicate life of the imagination seen under the magnifying glass; the random progress of these thoughts and feelings; untrodden, trackless journeying of brain and heart, strange workings of the nerves, the whisper of the blood, the entreaty of the bone, all the unconscious life of the mind . . .

Who speaks here, in this quotation written in 1890? Is this the statement of a peculiarly poetic psychologist, outlining the territory with which an embryonic psychoanalysis is to concern itself? Are these the ravings of an eloquent madman, the patient or subject of the analysis itself? It may seem strange to begin a book on 20th-century writing in English with a statement in translation, written by a Norwegian writer (Knut Hamsun, in 'From the Unconscious Life of the Mind') in the late 19th century. Curiouser and curiouser, it doesn't appear to be a particularly 'literary' passage at all, but rather an ephemeral account of a mind subject to (what French poet Arthur Rimbaud embraced as) 'the systematic disordering of the senses', quoted perhaps as evidence in a psychoanalytic case history written up to demonstrate the processes of derangement.

If this does not seem to be a fitting subject for literature to encounter, then the image and interpretation of 20th-century writing which this book offers should challenge that notion, along with the idea that a century's writing begins with the beginning of a century. As this book will also show, with modern writing things seldom begin when or where they're supposed to begin; moreover the very notion of beginnings and endings becomes questionable with some of the century's most radical works (as > D.H. Lawrence writes, 'In the beginning - there never was any beginning'), which might loop back into themselves, Finnegan-like, beginning again in defiance of any final full stop. Indeed, > James Jovce's > Finnegans Wake actually does 'end' like this, the opening sentence being the completion of the final one, the final sentence thus turning the reader back to the start of the work again. With such challenging material in its scope, this book must offer an alternative set of boundaries and definitions which also show the origins of the century's important work in cultures and aesthetic centres quite other than that of mainland Britain, beginning, it seems, at any moment other than the turning of the year - 1900. For many, 20th-century literature begins in the mid- to late 10th century, particularly with the influence of French > Symbolism; for others, like > Virginia Woolf, 'in or about December 1910, human character changed', and with it forms of writing, and what is written, changed too.

This change – the 'shock of the new' – emphasized most starkly the power of difference, both in the sense of the mark of difference gouged into literary history by many of the writings discussed below (the difference of an innovative 'now' from a conventional 'then'), and in the sense of differences within texts and subjects explored and opened up by a range of modern visions: the self-divisions of the painfully alienated or exuberantly 'post-impressionist' subject (like Hamsun), or the sexual differences of new literary voices deliberately challenging taboos concerning what can be written or who it can be written by. The former is the 'private' division within, of a self which betrays its own self-differences, which displays in language the ways in which it is divided or different from itself; using the perception of this inner division creatively, modern writers thus set about making the 'self' into the intricate object of its own scrutiny. The latter realm of difference - we might call it the 'public' differences of 20th-century writing from previous periods - made possible most strikingly by modern writing might be, respectively, transgressive writers who were keen to challenge sexual censorship laws (like D.H. Lawrence), or women writers who seized upon ⊳ modernism as a formally revolutionary movement in writing. The space opened up for writers by the sense that now, artistically speaking, there is 'no map' (in the words of poet > H.D., quoted in my essay on poetry below) promoted forms of women's writing which fitted closer to women's different experiences. In Virginia Woolf's phrase (writing about novelist ⊳ Dorothy Richardson), what could (and should) at last be written was 'the psychological sentence of the feminine gender'. Less specifically, the writing project set out so energetically by novelists and critics such as Woolf shows modern writing to be driven by a democratic desire to listen to, use, and give voice to a variety of inner and outer selves and influences. Marking the difference between 'Modern Fiction' (the title of the essay from which this quotation comes) and older forms, she writes,

... there is no limit to the horizon, and ... nothing – no 'methods', no experiment, even of the wildest – is forbidden, but only falsity and pretense. 'The proper stuff of fiction' does not exist; everything is the proper stuff of fiction, every feeling, every thought; every quality of brain and spirit is drawn upon; no perception comes amiss. And if we could imagine the art of fiction come alive and standing in our midst, she would undoubtedly bid us break her and bully her, as well as honour and love her, for so her youth is renewed and her sovereignty assured.

This sense of use and abuse, of working with, whilst radically subverting and overthrowing, the power of traditions – the working material one has inherited – characterizes the image of 20th-century writing which this book conveys. It will be the work of this introduction to trace some of these innovative 'differences', by identifying in brief the clearest hallmarks of early and 'classic' modernism, before outlining the importance of > postmodernism as the primary late 20th-century movement, in order to give readers a simple frame upon which they can map their own readings of individual writers and texts, and a way into the specific discussions of > genre and theory which take place in the essays below.

Earlier in 'Modern Fiction' Woolf offers what is possibly a more familiar (because English) image of the modern obsession with the intricacies of the mind than Knut Hamsun's epigraph to this introduction. Whilst the essay is a response to James Joyce's > Ulysses, one of the most striking things a reader of modernist work who is used to the conventions of classic realist characterizations will notice is that modern characters constantly contradict themselves; they are guided more by irrational betrayals than by rational purposefulness, through plots in which nothing very much happens. Woolf celebrates this:

Look within and life, it seems, is very far from being 'like this'. Examine for a moment an ordinary mind on an ordinary day. The mind receives a myriad of impressions – trivial, fantastic, evanescent, or engraved with the sharpness of steel. From all sides they come, an incessant shower of innumerable atoms; and as they fall, as they shape themselves into the life of Monday or Tuesday, the accent falls differently from of old; the moment of importance came not here but there . . . Life is not a series of gig lamps symmetrically arranged; life is a luminous halo, a semi-transparent envelope surrounding us from the beginning of consciousness to the end.

It is this sense of the plenitude of possible images and experiences which any moment of life has the power to offer, a kaleidoscope of contradictions revealed by simply looking in a new way, which modernism most obviously explores. Woolf is careful to show that this complex, impressionistic, endlessly rewarding subject (the human subject) is there for everyone to explore, and find: the grand passions, cosmic paradoxes and psychological intricacies, which in previous literary eras were seen to be the preserve of the heroes of individualism, become democratized with modernism: 'the ordinary mind on an ordinary day' is precisely the proper subject of writing – and this is, indeed, exactly what Ulysses presents, one day in the life of Leopold Bloom, ordinary, if exemplary, Dublin citizen.

In his essay below, Andrew Roberts emphasizes the diverse roots of the modernist novel by situating 20th-century developments in the context of the influences of the mid-19th-century novel. What Woolf characterizes as the 'old' form, the 'symmetrically arranged' dictates of a > realism in which 'the accent falls differently', had to be challenged, and it is this challenge which characterizes other innovative forms of modern writing (not just the novel). In prose, the realist tradition deploying an omniscient narrator, forms of characterization which gloss over 'myriad impressions' in favour of more coherent behaviour patterns, and a sequential narrative structure which orders and forces chaotic reality into a neat chronology - was subverted by radical novelistic techniques which allowed and encouraged other forms of representation, or eschewed the notion of fiction as representation altogether. With modernism, narrators cease to be reliable, let alone all-seeing; but what they do choose to see they look at with a microscopic vision and a sense of relativity. As the essays in this book will show, the literature of this century is almost by definition recalcitrant, refusing rules of subject, coherence and accessibility in an incessant project of experimentation. Even the literature which doesn't do this, preferring to stick with the givens and known qualities of, say, classic realism in the novel or strict poetic versification, is paradoxically perverse in that it is forced in its conformity to older literary models to react against innovations. Rebellion is the rule, even if you want to be conventional.

Perhaps the 20th century is a century of black sheep, with the very few white ones becoming the odd ones out. Literary criticism often likes to portray the history of writing rather like a family tree, with paths of influence traced like paths of generational lineage, so that disagreements of subject matter or style, or formal rebellions against established modes of writing, are consequently read as family feuds or children's challenges to parental authority. If this is so, then in this century the family has become heterogeneous, obsessed with forging new paths in what is writable, formally (as with, say, Finnegans Wake) and morally (as with, say, D.H. Lawrence's sexually explicit > Lady Chatterley's Lover), thus losing sight of literary 'normality'. In an attenuated moment which modernism traces to the mid to late 19th century, high Victorian writing (classic realism in the novel, conventionally versified or narrative poetry, both issuing a general sense that writing is and should represent a shared social, material and spiritual reality) mutated into something quite other than itself. Modernist writing – formally self-referential, difficult, often obscure, obsessed with looking at itself in the mirror of itself – is in a sense the abnormal child of a literary parentage more wholesomely concerned with accessible 'content' – conventional linear plot structures and characters who, as D.H. Lawrence puts it, behave 'according to a pattern'. For Lawrence, the 'dead' novel of the past needs to be revived with a shot of spontaneity; characters need the injection of change, and changeability, and it is this which past work was seen as unable to incorporate. Characters, then, are like lovers:

If the one I love remains unchanged and unchanging, I shall cease to love her. It is only because she changes and startles me and defies my inertia, and is herself staggered in her inertia by my changing, that I can continue to love her. If she stayed put, I might as well love the pepper-pot.

('Why the Novel Matters')

Thus Lawrence and his diverse contemporaries set about wresting the novel from the inertia he describes, by producing characters who 'change and startle' their readers, who do not, as he famously wrote in a letter to Edward Garnett, conform to 'the old stable ego ... of the character', thus representing a more dynamic sense of subjectivity. Literature embraced the world of relativity and defied a literary past too firmly gripped by 'absolutes':

Once and for ever, let us have done with the ugly imperialism of any absolute. There is no absolute good, there is nothing absolutely right. All things flow and change, and even change is not absolute. The whole is a strange assembly of apparently incongruous parts, slipping past one another.

('Why the Novel Matters')

Although one strategy employed by many of the arguments and observations in this book is the setting up of modern writing against and in contrast to its past, the writers here do not presume to suggest that these images of the past - of realist fiction, or of Victorian poetry – are in fact right or accurate. It is not the aim of this present book to suggest that modernism's image of Victorianism is a true reflection of the previous century at all, but rather that many of the familiar images of Victorian writing which we might unthinkingly work with were set up for a variety of interesting reasons by modernist writers, deliberately through written polemics (such as > Ezra Pound's 'A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste'; > Imagism, discussed in my essay on poetry below) or used unconsciously and by implication, as necessary points of opposition. Victorian writing needed to be characterized as accessible, realist and psychologically coherent, so that disparate modernist writers interested in doing something quite different could have a firm point of disagreement with a past set up as a springboard into the future. I am not concerned here with challenging the early 20th-century image of the 19th century - it would be the job of one introducing readers to the complexities, the playfulness, the psychological paradoxes of Victorian writing to show how in reality it contradicts cherished modern illusions about Victorian certainty and coherence although it is true that any discussion of modern writing may gesture toward this implied image of the previous period. However, whatever can be demonstrated as the properties of modernism's ancestry, it is nevertheless true that the avant-garde, the experimental, the transgressive have dominated this century's important works, and consequently the 'family line' has become rather twisted. To both use and subvert the traditional language of literary inheritance, it could be said that 20th-century writing is the mutant child of the 19th century. Following the path of exemplary black sheep > Oscar Wilde, modernism and postmodernism have celebrated a freedom from the need to represent morally a shared image of reality:

The final revelation is that lying, the telling of beautiful untrue things, is the proper aim of art.

(The Decay of Lying)

The powerful perversity of this is important (and Wilde is a writer who takes perversity seriously): what is being heralded is the disruption of the realist relationship between a thing in the world and its literary representation. There need be no direct link between literature and life; indeed, the more that literature fantasizes, and cuts itself adrift from 'real events', the more 'literary' its final effect will be.

The impact of this active project to free writing from the need to represent a shared, ideal image of the world has been profound. Wilde's outrageous celebration of 'beautiful untrue things' sets the tone for a century in which what has decayed is not the art of fantasy but the more characteristically 'past' literary values which produced accessible stories, recognizable images of 'normal' reality and rational and integrated characters who move through a linear narrative with a sense of moral purpose. It's not just that there are no more happy endings, but that the endgame is often a preface, or a novel might end with a question which looks like a beginning, and so endings and beginnings cannot be found where you expect them to be, and nor can they be trusted to sit neatly in place. The reader of modern writing may often feel that she or he is being seduced into playing a game for which the rules are being written as the game proceeds. Novels can be plotless, plays can be written in which nothing happens, narrative poetry gives way to introspective or plainly nonsensical lyric poetry or 'free verse'. As Lawrence, again, has written, 'Never trust the artist, trust the tale. / As for the artist, he's usually a dribbling liar'. And since the writer here is himself an artist, this must be read as a literary version of that pop-philosophy paradox, the statement 'I am lying'. Who, in this century of perverse nonsense-speakers and rule-breakers, can we trust?

Perhaps all this at least accounts for some of the difficulty which many readers find in getting to grips with modern writing, but it also accounts for modern writing's playfulness and exuberant sense of fun. With Joyce's wordplays, > Beckett's puns, Surrealism's uncanny juxtapositions of images which betray playful and sick humour by turns, > Djuna Barnes' parodic, tragicomic jibes at sexual roles, the reader who braves the initial inaccessibility is offered the rewards of pleasure. It is also unfortunately true, however, that this century has seen a decline in popularity for many writing forms, and this is particularly the case with poetry, the avant-garde tendencies of modernism alienating the formerly large poetry-reading public. As John Drakakis outlines below in his essay on critical theory, dramatist > Bertolt Brecht (arguably the century's dramatic mentor) celebrates the estranging powers of literature on similar lines to those marked out by the critical school of Russian > Formalism, but the effect of this on readers and audiences has not been popular. 'Literariness', however, was not invented by the modernists, and modernism's consolidation or celebration of this formal self-consciousness has been famously traced back to the writings of many of this century's more eccentric, or else more untimely, literary ancestors. For instance, when Laurence Sterne draws a series of lines on the pages of Tristram Shandy (1760–67) as a comic visual representation of its narrative journey, one of the things that he is doing is making his readers conscious of the fact that they are reading a fiction, not a transparent or unmediated representation of a series of real events. The novel is a twisted and elaborate narrative of things which never existed, and Sterne's comic self-consciousness draws attention to the fact that the text is a text, a work of playful fiction which we should be prevented from 'losing ourselves' in. Amongst other things, modernism is the moment in literary history when this tendency becomes dominant. To put it crudely but clearly, form is all: as Beckett wrote about Joyce, 'His writing is not about something, it is that something itself'.

John Drakakis develops this below by showing how Brecht's Verfremdungseffekt (▷ alienation effect) is akin to this, in that it overtly portrays on the stage the fact that the play being performed is a work of artifice, rather than a simple representation of reality to which the audience can sacrifice its critical faculties. Brecht wanted to keep his audience sharp, self-aware and conscious of the processes through which the play is being constructed before its very eyes. This self-consciousness – also one of the hallmarks of modernist fiction – may have produced challenging works of invention, but it has not necessarily produced a pleasurable spectacle or read. Where the art of lying has perhaps stayed alive most obviously is in the popular forms of ▷ science fiction, fantasy and ▷ horror, in which a carnivalesque 'world turned upside down' is elaborated in a plenitude of directions. In a contemporary confirmation of Lawrence's point, horror writer ▷ Stephen King alchemically turns lying back into truth again when he argues that 'the primary duty of literature' is 'to tell us the truth about ourselves by telling us lies about people who never existed' (Danse Macabre).

If one thing is clear so far, it is that modern literature is knotted with paradoxes, with counter-intuitive 'truths'. This is the case even when we attempt to understand its provenance and first principles. However, this book is to some extent a work of literary history, and it is our job to trace a map of the century's literature, to give a fairly coherent range of intellectual co-ordinates as a rough guide to the literary century. The beginning of a century is not necessarily the century's literary beginning. It could, for instance, be argued that modernist writing actually began well into the century itself, and was engendered, was given its first breath, by war: English modernism emerged in its clearest form during the vast conflict of World War I, which gave the first kick to literary and artistic forms self-consciously characterizing themselves as 'modern' rather than 'Victorian'. It is strange that world-scale death can be understood as giving life to the creative arts. It is also strange that whilst the world was being torn in two by the divisive allegiances of the war, so modernism was becoming a cosmopolitan literary and artistic form, with its centres across Europe (and to some extent in America) staked out in defiance of enemy lines. This is not, however, to say that the arts propounded a spirit of creative harmony in a crazed world. For D.H. Lawrence, World War I intensified what Frank Kermode has called his 'apocalyptic vision'; though married to a German and physically prevented from travelling to Germany, Lawrence would at least applaud the conflict from the sidelines, not patriotically but because for him the war had the potential to sweep away the cobwebs of old worlds: 'We ought to be grateful to Germany that she still has the power to burst the bound hide of the cabbage' (Study of Thomas Hardy). On a different note, as philosopher and film theorist Paul Virilio has persuasively argued (in War and Cinema), the rise of cinema - this century's major new art form, which has had a profound and fascinating inter-relationship with literature - is intimately bound up with the development of military technology.

Another problem with definitions of this century's work in English lies in our understanding of the word 'English' itself. This book reflects the cosmopolitanism of early modernism and the multiculturalism of postmodernism in its liberal range of reference entries on writers and influences from other countries and languages. The essays also show how the century's key works were part of a wider philosophy of boundary-challenging, which has caused critics such as Marxist writer Georg Lukács to describe (particularly in Theory of the Novel) the modern sensibility as 'metaphysically homeless' or 'nomadic'. With the advent of modernism, literature written in English ceased to be anchored to the English landscape: Paris, Berlin, Munich, all were centres of English culture equal to London and Dublin. The battle against the primacy of an English literature rooted in a wholesome and parochial English landscape was not fought on the playing-fields of Eton, but in Berlin bars and Paris studios. This book aims to give readers a framework within which they can enjoy and understand writing this century, writing which the essays below align with the dominant but loose movements of modernism and postmodernism, and the recalcitrant writings which actively refuse to be categorized. Recent literature has had to work in a world of increased secularization and mass communications, and this too has contributed to a challenging of boundaries, both in terms of how we label (or value) works, and in terms of where those works originally situated themselves. If modernist 'wandering' promoted an inter-cultural sensibility which deployed the voices of a variety of disciplines and cultures, postmodernism radicalizes this in a rampant disregard for the integrity of the original forms it draws upon.

Late modernism and postmodernism

The initial sense of fragmentation produced by the modernistic challenge to the idea that literature written in a particular language had to be bound to a particular land or range of cultural givens was only the first step in a century-long movement. The rise of radical nationalist movements in Britain's colonial dependencies did much to change the literary map. The consequent decline of Britain's colonial hold over other parts of the world, the freer movement of people between cultures and particularly the explosion of mass communications have all made the world a smaller place. Air travel, even space travel, radio and satellite technology, computer languages — all have promoted contact between cultures and have subverted our previous sense of a specific cultural identity deriving from nationality. It is fitting that this technology should be the result of warfare; just as in military terms wars have raged in defence of national boundaries, so the two world wars have produced the means to subvert cultural boundaries.

It is the resultant sense of cultural collage which characterizes both modernism and postmodernism. If World War I prompted writers to range across the world, embracing Lukács' sense of cultural nomadism just as individual nations were closing down borders, so World War II signalled the further explosion of mass communications and the dawn of the nuclear age, and post-war literature responds to and works necessarily in the context of the resulting world-historic anxiety. What is now known as postmodernism, however, has emerged more recently for different historical and artistic reasons. The term 'postmodernism' covers a variety of disparate and often contradictory literary and cultural movements and impulses. The term itself suggests a reaction against modernism. This is only partially true, however; for many critics there are few differences between modern and postmodern writers, so much so that for some readers certain classic modernist texts exemplify, perhaps more than many postmodern ones, the postmodernist way of operating. > T.S. Eliot's > The Waste Land, for instance, deploys quotation and references from a vast collage of other texts, and one of its more unsettling qualities is the way that voices within it are at times subjectively unclear: it's hard to tell when one 'self' finishes speaking and another begins. This sense that boundaries are being constantly subverted in the poem, as subjects flow into each other or are uneasily juxtaposed, is a key postmodern motif, as well as a modern one.

However, there is a sense in which the fragmentary bits of the poem finally 'add up' to an organic conclusion, a final moment of unity and peace which causes the poem to turn back on itself, so that its early fragments are reworked and homogenized into the final whole. Postmodernism emerged at a chaotic but exhilarating time in history - the 1960s - to challenge this process of homogenization. By the 1960s, the radical impulses of modernism which I outlined above, which fought against the self-satisfaction of high Victorianism, had been appropriated by the established system, its fragmented possibilities assimilated into a great tradition of 'artistic genius' by the growing forces of Leavisite criticism (F.R. Leavis) and New Criticism. Crucially, the period from about 1930 onwards not only signalled the end of the most intensive modernist production, it was also the period in which English literature began to be studied more widely in its own right in the universities of Britain. The literature which had so excited the new young critics - who from the early 1930s onwards were establishing the terms of academic literary criticism - was to become fossilized as the final moment of cultural production worthy of study. T.S. Eliot was both one of the key poets to figure on the new syllabuses as eminently respectable, and also one of the critics who was writing the rules of the game. D.H. Lawrence had been a notorious figure for his radical and explicit descriptions of sexuality, but as a favourite of F.R. Leavis his work soon found a place as a key prop to the Leavisite canon which was to dominate the study of literature at both secondary and degree levels. In the 1960s, a new generation of writers and students reacted against the sanitization of the previously shocking forms of modernism, and sought other creative forms which were strong or bizarre enough to resist actively any re-evaluation in the wholesome, unifying terms of Leavis. The Waste Land may pass through an agonizing, disparate struggle, shoring fragments 'against my ruins', but it seems to conclude with all the loose ends neatly tied. Against this, in Marxist critic Fredric Jameson's terms, a composer such as John Cage offers a disharmony which cannot resolve itself into harmony. Cage's 'disconnection and fragmentation' is, for Jameson, 'related to the way we describe a text today as the production of discontinuous sentences without any larger unifying forms'. Thus The Waste Land, upon which critics have spent an inordinate amount of time demonstrating how its 'larger unifying forms' gather together its 'discontinuous sentences', is modernist, and that which deliberately sets out to disrupt or disayow those unities is postmodernist. Postmodernism thus takes the modernist rejection of sequential plots and develops an aesthetics of the instantaneous, of the unoriginal, of the plagiarized.

Like modernism, which had its manifesto, as I have indicated, in Pound's 'A Few Don'ts ...', postmodernism is often defined in negative terms: as Jameson again says, 'it isn't this, it isn't that, it isn't a whole series of things that modernism was'. Reaction against the previous moment has characterized its progress, but like modernism it also has positive qualities. Critics disagree on what these are exactly, however. For instance, the postmodern technique of showing how a thing works before you show what it is – display one's formal heart on one's sleeve, as it were – is for some also evident in modernist writing. As with modernism, postmodernism is an interdisciplinary form: it is a movement in art, sculpture, music, film and architecture just as much as in writing. Indeed, in as much as postmodernism is concerned with breaking down the boundaries between disciplines, an extreme postmodernist would disregard these distinguishing generic terms. Some modernist texts play out and play with the collapse of traditional distinctions between high and low culture in a way which has been seen to be politically radical: for instance, James Joyce's novels actively incorporate speech idioms from working-class life in Dublin, or credit dream-imagery and irrational motifs with as much value as rational representation and discourse. For postmodernism, this collapse is taken to be an absolute, so that even the distinction between high and low culture becomes meaningless. As Andrew Ross, quoting Dirk Hebdige, has written:

... postmodern can be used today to refer to:

the decor of a room, the design of a building, the diegesis of a film, the construction of a record, or a 'scratch' video, a TV commercial, or an arts documentary, or the 'intertextual' relations between them, the layout of a page in a fashion magazine or a critical journal . . . the attack on the 'metaphysics of presence' . . . the collective chagrin and morbid projections of a post-War generation of Baby Boomers confronting disillusioned middle age . . . a proliferation of surfaces, a new phase in commodity fetishism, a fascination for 'images', codes and styles . . . the 'implosion of meaning', the collapse of cultural hierarchies, the dread engendered by the threat of nuclear self-destruction, the decline of the University . . .

(Universal Abandon)

At its most extreme, postmodern writing is populated with a variety of voices, quoted or plagiarized from 'intertextual' sources to give a sense of difference and disruption, a deliberate disturbance of organic, unified representations of world or psyche, or a wider patchwork of borrowings from different genres and discourses. Postmodernism is parody and pastiche; if modernism actively makes links between disciplines, encouraging a cosmopolitanism of subject, a borrowing and connecting of ideas across an interdisciplinary network, then postmodernism transgresses this too, often flagrantly plagiarizing rather than playfully quoting and borrowing. Eliot may produce a careful collage of borrowed writings which are respectfully acknowledged, but for 1980s writer Kathy Acker past texts are there to be plundered wholesale, to the extent of copying out passages from Dickens and turning favourite authors into fictional characters to be manipulated by the whims of the plot.

However, it would be extremely misleading to offer an image of 20th-century writing as conforming to a single set of points or qualities, just as using the umbrella terms 'modernism' and 'postmodernism' to characterize all the significant works and literary movements of this century would be unhelpfully exclusive. ▶ Doris Lessing's The Golden Notebook is a good example of many of these techniques, although argument about where to situate it continues. It constantly draws attention to itself as a text; the heroine, Anna, is a novelist, and struggles with herself as creator in the production of five disparate notebooks which claim to 'represent' herself in various ways, but which also display themselves as material texts, and show the process of the construction of the novel as a whole. When we read each of the notebooks, which trace different aspects of Anna's past and present (such as her life in Africa or her involvement with the Commmunist Party or the 'life' of one of her characters, Ella), we are also simultaneously aware of the notebook as a material object, which has rested on a desk as the other narratives in the book have been played out. One of the notebooks disintegrates as Anna's psyche does under analysis, changing from a personal diary form to a 'diary' composed of newspaper cuttings which tell the story of national events, on a large and a trivial scale. The reader is invited to connect the historical narrative which this produces with the subjective narrative which Anna cannot speak, but the words themselves are just snippets and fragments, which display the processes through which they were edited and chosen.

The Golden Notebook does also, however, place itself within a realist tradition, because the five notebooks - black, red, yellow, blue and golden - are punctuated by sections (entitled 'Free Women') dealing much more conventionally with the events of Anna's life in the 'present' of the novel. This technique is also characteristic of the resurgence of accessible, realist post-war writing, which developed in parallel with the more popular poetry and drama of the period, discussed by myself and by Andrew Piasecki in the essays below. In fact, The Golden Notebook as a whole is best known as 'the Bible of the > Women's Movement', a proto-feminist novel and one of the major post-war texts to represent actively its heroine's personal struggle as a political one, and vice versa, thus working through the feminist dictum coined sometime later, 'The Personal is the Political'. However, this motto in itself – which was taken up by many women in the 1960s and the 1970s as a call to consciousness-raising - is in many ways a postmodernist statement. When the boundary between 'inside' and 'outside' breaks down, or when the interconnection of subjective state and material conditions is recognized in art in a particular way, the methods of postmodernism come into play.

As is clear from this brief survey, the word 'play' used in this and in many other senses continues to be operative. Many of the texts discussed in this book are characterized more by the aesthetic tendencies of modernism or postmodernism than by genuine allegiance to an '-ism': they play with categories, using or ignoring them. Few could be called fully paid-up members of either 'movement'. Indeed, a polemical attempt at resisting general or totalizing categories has often been at the heart of the works and movements discussed here. It might, for instance, be helpful in one way to erect a signpost and call James Joyce's Finnegans Wake a modernist novel, but doing so simultaneously creates a smokescreen which might prevent us from looking creatively at the ways in which it isn't a 'novel' in the conventional sense, or at the ways in which as a novel it actively challenges and breaks open the novel form. The obvious fact that Finnegans Wake largely resists categories - including the category 'modernist' - is one of the things which paradoxically makes it a modernist work. The same could be said of any work we might label modernist or postmodernist: to do either is to ignore or repress the ways that literary works do as much to disrupt creatively the categories critics want to fit them into as they do to sit still in those boxes. It is one of the qualities of both modernism and postmodernism to challenge totalizing labels per se.

The essays: interpretation and literary movements

Literary history, like family history, is a question of how you tell it. Modern perspectives on literature counter the traditional notion that critical judgements are made through an ideal process of evaluation and emotional response, both ostensibly disregarding the processes of power; as John Drakakis writes below, 'the history of literary criticism offers many varied ways of reading: . . . how you interpret texts depends upon who is "master".' Who decides the patterns of literary history, and what has made them decide that, are questions that need to be opened up by anyone hoping to set out a fresh image of the developments of 20th-century writing.

This book offers such an image in composite through its genre essays and references, but it does not claim to escape the responsibilities which come with offering another map of modern literature. All of the essays here are more or less chronological, and all to some extent stress the violence done across this century when new writers seek to overthrow the aesthetic priorities of the old, in ways which some critics have seen as analogous to family history. My essay on the chain of poetic movements, sparked off by the initial modernist revolt against Victorianism and ➤ Georgianism, perpetuates this sense that writers often work with a strong desire to rebel against prior movements. Just as relationships between the members of families are made real by the stories that people weave around themselves and each other, so critics narrate the links and lines between writers, and turn a disparate mass of texts written across a range of historical periods into an ostensibly coherent network of relationships. Whoever tells the story is thus able to privilege certain moments, to single out 'significant' texts, to create relationships persuasively as patterns. Criticism fills in the gaps, forges the links between writers and makes connections across the writing generations, connections which look like family relationships; it traces who has influenced whom, which writings echo, repeat, or defy past works, which texts 'behave' according to the current conventions, which texts 'misbehave' and become the celebrated black sheep. Pointing out resemblances, literary criticism remembers and explains the arguments, how new generations of writing come into being, and it looks at the need for texts to argue and fall out with each other, the necessity of disagreement, refutation and contradiction between texts of different periods, differences which make new writings possible.

This position is most famously articulated by Harold Bloom in The Anxiety of Influence, although his is perhaps most importantly a consolidation of a multitude of positions taken across literary history. When F.R. Leavis traces a 'Great Tradition' of English novelists, he is claiming them as part of an authentic literary lineage – an elite descendancy of influence. Raymond Williams countered the Leavis lineage with his own alternative Marxist tradition, whilst feminist critics Sandra Gilbert and Susan Gubar followed both Bloom and Virginia Woolf in tracing a tradition of women writers who 'think back through their literary mothers' (after Woolf's statement 'We think back through our mothers if we are women'). Criticism has thus organized literary history metaphorically. Because Western-style family structures in a sense prototypically mark out relationships between individuals with common characteristics, or who, from shared assumptions and influences, strive to individuate themselves from their origins, these family structures have become the dominant pattern critics have imposed upon our literary heritage. It is perhaps unfortunate that even the most radical critics still represent literary movements in terms of familial metaphors. Feminists who otherwise advocate a politics which would open to question all patriarchal structures, including that of the traditional family unit, have nevertheless created an alternative literary lineage which sees patterns of influence as running between older generations of writing 'mothers' and younger women writers who become literary 'daughters'. Whilst most feminist critics seem to want to stress the non-violent continuity of this matrilineage, male critics working since Harold Bloom sometimes use a Freudian model to stress the violence of development. Distinct movements are seen as rejections of and reactions against the past, so that all innovations are deemed to be the reactions of literary adolescence, the efforts of younger writers keen to move on to something new.

All this is to say that more recent writings, as the essays below demonstrate, freely deploy techniques from a wide range of cultures and genres in their urge to inscribe differences. But marking differences has worked in tandem with the apparently contrary action of breaking down boundaries. As John Drakakis discusses in his essay on critical theory below, interpretations are powerfully determined by material factors which will prioritize different issues for different readers. Drakakis' account of the main movements of critical theory this century is included here not simply to supplement the genre-based essays, but as an account in its own right of a body of 20th-century writing which has an increasingly high profile on English syllabuses, as part of the wider discipline of English studies. Indeed, it is becoming increasingly difficult to distinguish between critically 'knowing' fictional texts and new forms of theory which are self-consciously 'literary'.

This tendency to challenge boundaries has been expressed in different forms in different genres. Andrew Roberts highlights, for instance, the importance of the > stream of consciousness technique which enabled novelists to explore a more intense psychological 'realism' such as that suggested in my epigraphs by Woolf and by Hamsun. Modernism in this form disrupts the conventional discrepancy between inside and outside, in which a more or less coherent interior monologue is finally distinguishable from the 'externals' of social and material reality 'out there'. As I have begun to suggest here, and as Roberts develops below, modern writers show how in the psychological reality of character and narrator, subject and object are interrelated or, at extreme moments, indistinguishable. This sense of the interdependence of subject and object is also a primary concern for modern poets, which I discuss also in my essay on poetry. And, as Roberts argues, the rise of other powerful genres such as science fiction and fantasy writing has also problematized the notion of literature as directly representational. More recently, horror fiction, a late 20th-century version of the Gothic novel, has embraced the fantastic and the macabre possibilities of English prose, if not the linguistic pyrotechnics explored by modernists. In drama, a history of spectacular artistic and political experiment has unfolded despite the material circumstances of shameful underfunding, a factor which underpins Andrew Piasecki's history of the developments of British theatre. Experiment, and the forwardmovement which embraces differences in a variety of ways, clearly drive many of the literary forms with which this book concerns itself. In a century of work which is marked by a reluctance to stay still, even nostalgia or the counter-modernism of, say, the > Movement poets of the 1950s, has, ironically, been 'progressive'. Looking back in anger or in pastiche or assimilation of the past, writers have deployed nostalgia for lost forms in a way which has seldom been debilitating.

'Rule and Energy in View': The Poetry of Modernity

Linda Ruth Williams

'Less is more': Pound and Imagism

To mark the turn of the century as also a turning point in literature is a rather arbitrary gesture. English ➤ modernism established itself slowly, well behind the French precedent, and the first decade of the 20th century was dominated by the popular conservatism of ➤ Georgian poetry. People read and enjoyed the poetry of ➤ A. E. Housman, ➤ Rudyard Kipling and ➤ Thomas Hardy, and eagerly bought the Georgian anthologies as they appeared from 1912 onwards. Georgianism perhaps epitomizes the popular notion of English poetry — parochial, solid and unironic, celebrating English rural life, particularly the home counties variety. Its importance lies in the way it fed into the poetry of World War I — many Georgians are better known as ➤ War poets — which sharpened nostalgia into something that could 'draw blood', especially in the later years as the full horror became apparent.

In order to emphasize how shocking modernist poetry was after the technical familiarity of writing up to 1910, I want to focus upon the Imagist (> Imagism) movement which, whilst not offering the most powerful or famous texts of the modernist period, certainly exemplifies much of what modernist verse was trying to achieve against Victorianism. '(T)he first heave' of modernism was, in poet > Ezra Pound's words, 'to break the pentameter' ('Canto 81'). Pound was a great polemicist against what he called 'the crepuscular spirit in modern poetry' ('Revolt'). Certainly, much poetry of the late Victorian period was supremely 'crepuscular', languid, pale and dreamy, and in his early so-called ⊳ 'Celtic Twilight' period ⊳ W. B. Yeats was rather prone to this. He had begun his writing career as a writer of the Victorian fin de siècle, and ended it as a key figure of modernist anti-decadence. His early poems are infused with an elegiac quality and peopled with mythological and heroic figures from an 'old Ireland' of ephemeral, supernatural beauty. There is a haunting sense of the inaccessible, characteristic of much > Nineties poetry, which rejected earlier Victorians' building of 'brick and mortar inside the covers of a book' (Yeats, 'The Symbolism of Poetry'; 1900). This is Yeats the 'last romantic'.

But Yeats is also arguably the first modernist of poetry, his feeling of alienation from his time strengthening his later apocalyptic poems, which 'sing amid our uncertainty' ('Per Amica Silentia Lunae'; 1917). The cultural crisis of the early 20th century turned the task of re-thinking the limits and drives of language into one of almost world-historic importance for many poets, impatient that the untenable realist notion of a shared common experience between writer and reader be exposed. If Yeats' early work is marked by a bygone aesthetic, and is metrically and syntactically conventional, his later work — particularly that written from The Wild Swans at Coole (1919) until his death in 1939 — would strongly assert his modernity, and was undoubtedly urged towards this point by Pound's influence.

The movement which exploded on to the poetry scene in 1912, of which Pound was initially a key member, sought to counter sloppy diction and to free verse from too much emotion. Later in the war years Imagism developed into the multi-art form movement > Vorticism, with the publication of two polemical texts edited by poet and painter > Percy Wyndham Lewis, Blast (1914 and 1915). Vorticism was a movement which brought writing and visual art together in a futuristic celebration of energy and speed. The anti-romantic figures of the 'Great English Vortex' included Wyndham Lewis and Ezra Pound, plus artists David Bomberg (1890–1957), Henri Gaudier-Brzeska (1891–1915) and Jacob Epstein (1880–1959). Imagism in its purest form most aggressively countered Victorian versification, producing 'poetry that is hard and clear, never blurred or indefinite' (Preface to Some Imagist Poets 1915). Modernist poetry in this form intensifies and condenses; the poetry of modernity is written most strongly in the lyric form, rather than as narrative poems or epic novel-poems favoured by the Victorians. Imagism takes the emphasis on brevity to an extreme, its definitions being heavily reactive (just as its founders were politically reactionary), prescribing the new poetry negatively; in Pound's words modern poetry should be: 'Objective – no slither; direct – no excessive use of adjectives, no metaphors that won't permit examination . . . straight as the Greek!'

Imagism, then, rejected the use of loose simile and, like > Hopkins in a different sense, strove to evoke the 'isness' of things: to present reality in a naïvely unmediated sense, avoiding flaccid re-presentation. For the Imagist, brevity is the soul of poetry: 'less is more'. Condensation counters verbiage, and so lyric poetry is put on a strict diet; in Pound's words, it is 'de-suetized'.

Whirl up, sea –
Whirl your pointed pines,
Splash your great pines
On our rocks,
Hurl your green over us,
Cover us with pools of fir.
('Oread', H. D.)

This is a poem by > H. D. in its entirety; indeed, 'Oread' (1915) is often tendered as the exemplary Imagist poem, with the complex of sea, pines and nymph fusing as image. Pound had defined the image as 'that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time'; H. D.'s text pares down superfluity to a series of discrete, sparse phrases. What the poem 'is' is the relation between these phrases, how they build up into an image which does not come from individual key words or vague feelings but from the ways in which the component elements of the poem relate.

This can be clarified by looking at an even shorter Imagist poem of Pound's, 'In a Station of the Metro':

The apparition of these faces in the crowd; Petals on a wet, black bough.

It is perhaps hard today to recapture the feelings of shock which hit the first readers of these poems. It is no wonder that at this point in literary history poetry began to become perhaps the most unpopular of art forms. The difficulty of this text lies in its requirement that we simply accept it on its own terms, which brings it close to the oriental form of the haiku, much admired by Pound.

This text is also exemplary in its peculiar atmosphere and influences. In an effort to achieve delicate clarity, Imagist poetry deployed Japanese motifs, petals, hyacinth and lotus blossoms, and clear contours, and allowed itself to become emotional only in the dexterity with which these evoke feelings. Pound's 'Fan-piece, for her Imperial Lord' (1914) is as much about loss as any Victorian elegy, but is delicately rinsed free of heavy sentiment:

O fan of white silk, clear as frost on the grass-blade, You also are laid aside.

Understated, it is also impersonal, a key word at this point and reinforced by > T. S. Eliot's notion, in 'Tradition and the Individual Talent' (1919), that: 'Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion; it is not the expression of personality, but an escape from personality.' Thus an Imagist poem may be poignantly posed, but it should not slide into agonized self-reflections or sentiment.

Language speaking: Eliot and the linguistic crisis

Modernist poetry not only demanded intensity, however; crucially it challenged the prevalent philosophy of language with which it was traditionally assumed 19th-century verse worked. This philosophy posited language as a transparent medium through which an unproblematic and undistorted 'reality' is represented. For the modernist poet language is emphasized and foregrounded to such an extent that it becomes the most important 'point' of the poem. Poetry scrutinizes the form, the contours, the material of the mask of language. As \triangleright Samuel Beckett said of \triangleright James Joyce, 'His writing is not about something; it is that something itself.'

Modernist writing is agonizingly self-conscious, probing its own limits and restrictions, foregrounding itself as text, as the interface of many texts. The process of poetry-writing becomes the object of poetry, so that the way a text is constructed, how it connotes many possibilities of meaning and many voices, becomes that which the poem is about. We can, perhaps, see why ⊳ Browning was read with interest by many early 20th-century poets. Modernism foregrounds form over content, or rather, it opens up for questioning the whole economy of language through which form and content are established as distinct and separate textual dimensions. Pound's later work, especially his long sequence of > the Cantos, continually emphasizes its own materiality betraying its own material construction. Alongside their other project of historical synthesis, the Cantos expose language as dirty, desirous splashes of ink; echoes of other languages intrude, typographical errors aren't edited out. Sometimes words are 'chosen' not for reasons of sense or meaning but because of the pattern they make on the page, how they sound, or how other words have suggested them. Chinese characters are included, asserting to the uncomprehending eye language's typographic existence. Pound's occasional rantings can seem more like the operation of a multi-lingual machine than a rational mind, reading rather like one enormous ▶ Freudian slip. As with many of Gertrude Stein's (1874–1946) texts and Surrealist automatic writing, words seem to suggest other words because of unconscious drives which are operating on the poem.

All of this has a profound bearing on how the role of the poet and of the reader is understood. A form of writing in which writing itself is so prioritized has also to re-write our understanding of who is 'responsible for' poetry – of who ultimately can guarantee its meaning. Despite the authoritarian postures adopted by particular modernist writers, poetry may be read as acknowledging that the position of both writer and reader is relative, non-omniscient, constructed by the forces of language. Furthermore, this sense of fragmentation has permeated the possibilities of writing to such an extent that the resultant feeling is that all possibilities of unity have been lost. Modernist poetry, to use the words of ▷ Lewis Carroll's The Hunting of the Snark (1876), spurned 'merely conventional signs', navigating itself by a map which was: 'A perfect and absolute blank!' It thus affirms – against the desires of its writers, whose quest is still towards the lost home of stable selfhood and meaning – a problematization of the individual subject somewhat analogous to that enacted by Freudian ▷ psychoanalysis and Marxist political theory.

What these breaks in poetic consciousness and linguistic coherence were signalling was the chasm in personal and national identity which World War I brought to crisis point. The War poets, particularly > Siegfried Sassoon, > Wilfred Owen and > Isaac Rosenberg, represented this breakdown thematically, but through pre-war structures of versification and diction. Modernist poetry was more like a linguistic acting-out of the destruction of innocence which took place in the trenches.

Modernism is also identifiable as the point at which writing acknowledges that it doesn't originate purely within the soul of the author; the modernist text plagiarizes shamelessly, building itself up out of a patchwork of unacknowledged quotations from a variety of international cultural sources, fragments 'shored against my ruins' ('What the Thunder Said', from T. S. Eliot's > The Waste Land). This is its cosmopolitanism. The Waste Land, to the frustration of many an undergraduate reader, straddles eastern and western cultural history in a dazzling and maddening parade of name-dropping and references, which build up into a polemical lament for fallen culture. Geographically, modernism wasn't centred on one cultural-Imperial capital, but danced from London to Paris to Vienna to Berlin to New York to Dublin and back again. It cannot be situated, and this cultural uncertainty is, in The Waste Land at least, a symptom of decay:

What is the city over the mountains
Cracks and reforms and bursts in the violet air Falling towers
Jerusalem Athens Alexandria
Vienna London
Unreal

(The Waste Land, ll. 371-6)

Texts jump from 'home' to 'home', emphasizing how they are written 'intertextually' by a wide range of influences, and are a point at which an extraordinarily wide cultural memory is unlocked. Again, the Cantos are an extreme example of this in English poetry, as James Joyce's > Ulysses is in the modern novel. The wandering poet has become poet-as-exile.

Ezra Pound was an energetic figure, tirelessly championing the modern and collaborating with T. S. Eliot in the preparation of The Waste Land, which is dedicated to Pound. Eliot's work is painfully aware of this crisis of the self, and its challenge to 19th-century writing is enormous. For Eliot, the lyric poem is 'the voice of the poet talking to himself, or to nobody'. But the manner of his 'talking' is quite bizarre, and shocking to our 'realist' expectations. Eliot's verse plays with and parodies traditional structures, the same poem oscillating in its versification and rhythms. Sometimes it comes near to solidity and fixity of form, only to dissolve into a much more fluid formal structure deploying, in his own words, a 'contrast between fixity and flux', and 'unperceived evasion of monotony'. The Waste Land exemplifies this, being an extreme example of formal eclecticism and teasing, a startling series of lyric fragments which jump schizophrenically from the sublimity of dream language to the ridiculousness of pub language and interrogate each through the other.

The problem of who writes is, then, accentuated by Pound's collaboration in the final editorial processing of The Waste Land, which caused Eliot to write 'I am never sure that I can call my verse my own'. So just who or what the poet's 'I' is at this stage in literary history is a painful problem, and Eliot's verse highlights this in several aspects. Thematically it often evokes disturbed mental states; in 'Rhapsody on a Windy Night' (1917), for instance, clear perception is distorted, objective reality is twisted to the point of frightening hallucination. A street-lamp tells the 'hero' about women's eyes, twisted 'like a crooked pin', and 'A crowd of twisted things' closes in. When he eventually reaches home, its safety turns out to be 'The last twist of the knife'. The figure of modernity characteristically has no home, wandering nomadically in a world stripped of values, in a shifting reality which confounds fixity in mental states. Many of Eliot's early poems seem close to the knife-edge of madness. 'Morning at the Window' (1917) consists of only two stanzas, the second an ugly, twisted rewriting of the relatively rational first, in which 'I' sits at a window looking on the street. This then becomes an experience subject to 'brown waves of fog' which toss twisted faces and tear smiles from passers-by. The 'brown fog of a winter dawn' returns as the climactic condition of The Waste Land's 'Unreal City'.

For Eliot the problem of poetry feeds into the problem of culture and its role in (Christian) society. In 'The Use of Poetry' (1933) he asserts that poetry must be able to account for the sordid and the horrific, the thought that (from Pound's 'Hugh Selwyn Mauberley') 'Caliban casts out Ariel':

... the essential advantage for a poet is not to have a beautiful world with which to deal: it is to be able to see beneath both beauty and ugliness; to see the boredom, and the horror, and the glory.

The Waste Land scrutinizes the grand dualism of beauty and ugliness and finds, in the critic and poet I. A. Richards's words, modernity's 'persistent concern with sex', which is then used as the lens through which history is seen as the history of progressive wastage. Just as 'Mauberley' reads the heroes of Victorian culture as the path to modernity's crisis, so The Waste Land re-reads history as a sordid parade, witnessed by the bisexual Tiresias who shuffles across its stage, and which climaxes in a series of sordid liaisons. Tiresias, an 'old man with wrinkled dugs', witnesses and foretells the sterility of a heterosexual love. The double edges of Victorian discourse on sex indelibly mark and open up modernist writing. Indeed, pleasure occupies a very warped position in Eliot's corpus, a symptom of the need for a kind of communication and communion which he perceived was no longer possible. The desperate desire for, and the impossibility of, communication, is both a 'truth' of sexual relations and of modernist writing.

However unpalatably, Eliot foregrounded a politicization of writing which aestheticism had repressed in marking out Art for Art's sake against the political engagement of High Victorian writing. His statement, 'I am sojourning amongst the termites', in a letter to > Lytton Strachey, speaks eloquently of both the actual immersion of modern poetry in the most sordid aspects of social life, and the depth of his right-wing repulsion. Eliot's treatment of human beings in his poetry can be obsessively cruel and vindictive. Indeed, the extremely reactionary politics of Yeats, Pound and Eliot are problematic, and often make their work painful reading for reasons other than 'difficulty'. Yeats' advocacy of an integrated poetry as 'blood, imagination, intellect, running together' ('Discoveries'; 1906) was undoubtedly informed by the intolerant social pressures which also produced > D. H. Lawrence's 'blood conscious' reactionary politics, but it is equally symptomatic of a climate which made possible the more positive politicization of writing in the 1930s. As the 1920s closed, Eliot turned to high-church Anglicanism, and the emphasis in critical theory and poetic practice became that of unity rather than disintegration. For the Eliot of 'The Metaphysical Poets', modern poetry needed to heal the 'dissociation of sensibility' which occurred at the end of the 17th century, so that it could 'devour' the plethora of modern experience. In the 1930s this was interpreted as the need for a poetry which countered obscurity and unpopularity with the addressing of relevant social issues, or what > George Orwell called 'the invasion of literature by politics'.

And not before time: as the Western world spiralled towards economic breakdown, as unemployment rocketed, as Germany and Italy lurched into > fascism, poets recognized that lack of commitment was tantamount to support of the right. ▶ W. H. Auden's poems of the very late 1920s are concerned with psychic landscapes, but in the 1930s his poetry became explicitly politicized and sought again to bridge the gap between theory and praxis in the pursuit of relevance, donning once more the mantle of moral guide. 'Thirties poetry' generally refers to the more politically engaged poetry of Auden, > Stephen Spender, > Louis MacNeice and > C. Day-Lewis, the group of left-wing, psychoanalytically informed poets who met in the early 1930s at Oxford. The work of this 'school' is characterized by three collections, all edited by Michael Roberts: New Signatures (1932), New Country (1933) and the 1936 Faber Book of Modern Verse. Through these texts poetry can be seen to become more explicitly concerned not only with diagnosing the world historic disease, but with prescribing a cure. If modernist poetry is antihumanist, showing the human subject as already subverted by desire, the poets of the 1930s re-humanized the subject, as an effective agent of political action.

Poetry since World War II

Lay the coin on my tongue and I will sing of what the others never set eyes on. ('Desert Flowers', Keith Douglas; 1943)

H.D. and Douglas: seer and soldier

Although H.D. had begun publishing her intense verses when she was part of the Imagist group, her most important work was written during and after World War II. She wrote Trilogy (1944) whilst living through the London Blitz. The war had come home; never had British people been so subjected to its extremities of violence and terror as was the urban population in the Blitz. The poets of World War I were fighters at the front; those of World War II didn't have to go to war because the war came to them, and its violence marked texts as different as \triangleright Roy Fuller's A Lost Season (1944), T. S. Eliot's \triangleright Four Quartets (1935–42) and \triangleright Edith Sitwell's 'Still Falls the Rain' (1940). H.D.'s Trilogy opens with a ruined London laid out like a sacrifice, but its tone is positive. Only barriers, boundaries, proprieties are destroyed:

there, as here, ruin opens the tomb, the temple; enter, there as here, there are no doors . . .
ruin everywhere, yet as the fallen roof leaves the sealed room
open to the air,
so, through our desolation, thoughts stir, inspiration stalks us through gloom . . .

The Trilogy poems, like many of H.D.'s texts, draw on a wealth of female mythological and historic/heroic figures to spin together a text of new possibilities. H.D. turns destruction into a positive value: the last section of The Walls Do Not Fall describes the physical effects of the bombing, but turns debilitating doubt into a clear horizon of possibilities:

we know no rule of procedure,

we are voyagers, discoverers of the not-known the unrecorded;

we have no map;

possibly we will reach haven, heaven.

Pessimistic texts have abounded since 1942 when this was written, but H.D. chooses to turn doubt into a possibility of affirmation, to stress the fact that negatives have been blasted away. Indeed, this last quotation could also be a statement about women's writing, which, in its marginalization from the canon and the difficulties of its being written at all, also knows no rule, is unrecorded, and has no map. Many postwar women poets have actively used their exclusion from the English poetic tradition as a fresh breathing space.

One of the most famous poets of World War II is undoubtedly > Keith Douglas (1920–44) who was killed in Normandy, his corpus cut down but his influence disturbing writers in the post-war years. Anxious to make the right mark before it's too late, his perception is fired by the possibility of its termination, and in a clear, precise way is almost extra-sensory. On 'each side of the door of sleep' he finds a nightmare-scape in which sexual desire and unspeakable violence are inextricable. Sexuality comes into Douglas' poetry with cold images of death, corruption and violence. Rather like H.D.'s astonishment that the walls do not fall, Douglas finds an intensely positive desire in the midst of blasted desert and mindless military discipline. The murderer has 'a lover's face', and he is one of the kindly visitors who meant so well all winter but at last fell unaccountably to killing in the spring.

('These grasses, ancient enemies'; 1941)

The poetry is in the chilling, clear, simple diction. Words themselves are militarized; poetry has always been in various guises the object of poetry, but in Douglas' case it is viewed as the soldier views his victim. In 'Words' (1943) it is scrutinized, as if (in George MacBeth's words) seen 'through the sights of a rifle':

... I lie in wait for them. In what the hour or the minute invents, in a web formally meshed or inchoate these fritillaries are come upon, trapped ... The catch and the ways of catching are diverse.

Words are trapped by macabre war-scapes and dead faces:

... the pockmarked house ... whose insides war has dried out like gourds attract words

Trap and attraction are interchangeable words for Douglas; an image has already trapped its written description and all it needs is for the poet to close in for the kill.

Dylan Thomas and the Apocalypse

Certainly World War II was a watershed in British life, and in > Charles Causley's words, 'The signature of murder' (in 'I Saw a Shot Down Angel') is scrawled across the history of writing since the war. If certain experiences, cold and macabre for Douglas, actively attract words, we need to ask what manner of themes and experiences have words 'found desirable' in the post-war period.

Perhaps the most famous 'forties poet', Dylan Thomas, had produced much of his most interesting and characteristic work before 1940, yet his verve and style exemplify that of the so-called 'New Apocalypse', which was carried through into the dry, sardonic 1950s by Thomas' disciple, > W. S. Graham. 'Apocalypse' writing was unbridled, gloriously undisciplined and heavily emotional. In consequence one can see this moment in poetic history as pitted against Eliot's impersonality, H.D.'s spartan, hard verse, or the political engagement of 1930s poetry. It is important to acknowledge the power of this poetic movement before we can really understand the significance of the philosophies of the more famous and self-conscious movements of the 1950s and the 1960s, which were very much, in turn, established in reaction to the Apocalyptics. Thomas' verse is famous for its exuberance and verbal excesses. Like the later poet > Thom Gunn, Thomas often deploys syllabics to convey his sense of the natural world and himself in it rolling out of control. Fern Hill (1945) is perhaps typical; just as the 'I' who speaks it recalls roving and falling 'Down the rivers of the windfall light', the poem itself runs its 'heedless ways, / [Its] wishes raced through the house-high hay'; it seems to be driven, polemically and self-consciously, against the repression of formal disciplines, even though Thomas himself was in fact a meticulous and formally tight writer.

The apocalyptic poet would ostensibly free the riches, the thickness, of language from the boundaries of rationality. Thomas himself deploys bizarre juxtapositions to this end in his effort to conjure up unconscious powers; his incessant repetition connotes the power of unconscious rhythmicality when it doesn't simply irritate. In this he can perhaps be compared with Surrealist poets such as > David Gascoyne or the American poet Robert Bly (b 1926), Gascoyne being a figure who continues to represent a certain disturbing undercurrent in English poetry, whose writing analyses the relationship between language and the unconscious against the empirical grain of 1930s or 1950s poetry. Indeed, it could be said that Gascoyne is the unconscious of the English poetic establishment, repressed and marginalized for his peculiar obsessions and failure to fit neatly into the ironic moulds of the 1950s, or the passionate egotism of the 1940s and 1960s. In asserting, in a way different from the modernists, that there is nothing commonsensical about reality, he remains resolutely anti-empirical.

In Surrealism obscurity takes on new powers. Dylan Thomas is nothing if not repetitive and obscure, but the Surrealist project is rather different in emphasis from his. Surrealism resists rational explanation; images are peculiarly juxtaposed so as to disrupt common-sense understandings and analogies. Gascoyne's 'Very Image' (1936) gathers a strange exhibition of surreal juxtapositions together:

And all these images and many others are arranged like waxworks in model bird-cages about six inches high.

Why? Empiricism can do nothing with such incongruity; reading this requires not only a suspension of disbelief but a suspension of rationality – indeed, in 1936 the Surrealist poet Hugh Sykes Davies (b 1909) supplemented the word 'surreal' with the word 'surrational'. Working through every possible permutation of a statement, rearranging its order so as to unhinge sense and cause meaning to self-deconstruct is something which we also encounter constantly in, say, Samuel Beckett's novel Watt (1953). This technique is frequently used to explore the outer reaches of paranoia, and the disturbing meeting of mental illness and political repression, at which point, writes Hugh Sykes Davies, 'ANYTHING YOU SEE WILL BE USED AGAINST YOU' ('Poem'; 1938).

To return to Dylan Thomas; his repetitiveness is of a different order, and his relationship with language is both more wilfully erratic than that of Surrealist poetry, and more superficial. If Douglas renders his words corpses with his riflepen and his sniper's eye, Thomas consciously throws himself into them as into a fierce alien element. He wants words to seduce him; he wants to be possessed. In 'Especially When the October Wind' (1934) the fact that language has already inhabited the 'I' is particularly clear: his heart sheds 'syllabic blood' on hearing the raven speak; stick-trees and 'The wordy shapes of women' have a typographical significance; the 'rows' of children are 'star-gestured'. Beeches are 'vowelled', oaks have voices, the water speaks. From this plenitude of verbal nature and life-signs – 'The signal grass', 'the meadow's signs', 'the dark-vowelled birds' – Thomas reads his poem and re-writes it. Indeed, in reading he is also trying to liberate: poetic excess and sexual freedom are inextricable. Thus the incantatory element in Thomas is linked to an attempt to allow words to bleed into a plurality of significance, meanings and connotations, spinning off of their own volition. In the 1950s this verbal free-fall was denigrated as adolescent self-indulgence, and, indeed, on its own terms, there is something inescapably restrictive about Thomas' habit of repetition.

We can, perhaps, clarify one of the positions of 1940s poetry through a statement

Thomas made about his attitude to the image, in comparison with Pound's notion that an Imagist image is 'an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time':

I let . . . an image be 'made' emotionally in me and then apply to it what intellectual and critical forces I possess - let it breed another, let that image contradict the first, make, of the third image bred out of the other two together, a fourth contradictory image, and let them all, within my imposed formal limits, conflict . . .

(Fifty Modern British Poets, Michael Schmidt)

Such an errant fecundity had to end somewhere, and one ending was a fresh return to the hardness of a confined, complex Poundian image. The re-working of modernism, especially in its American form is, then, one important strand of contemporary poetry. But immediately on Thomas' heels came the ironic self-discipline of the > Movement.

'No Renaissances, please': the Movement and the 1950s

... the minipoet is basically safe. not well equipped for (but who would think of) leaving the highway, he is attuned to the temporary surface, balanced, reliable, yes, we have few regret for the archpoet, who either would not start or starting stopped; was temperamental wanted to show off, steamed up, was punctured . . . ('minipoet', Miles Burrows; 1966)

The poetry of the Movement was, par excellence, that of post-war Anglo-Saxon rationalism. Like the famous car of the late 1950s, small but perfectly formed, the Movement poet was repulsed by grand gestures and took on the mask of a 'minipoet', 'slim, inexpensive, easy to discard/nippy rather than resonant, unpretentious' (Miles Burrows). Introducing the Movement anthology of 1956, New Lines, Robert Conquest (b 1917) wrote: 'It ... like modern philosophy - is empirical in its attitude to all that comes'. Movement poetry resists 'agglomeration of unconscious commands'; banished at a stroke to the soupy > Romantic past are, it seems, all poetic forms which credit unconscious selves with the power to undermine conscious, commonsense control. It has often, then, been seen as the logical reaction to 1940s excesses. Movement poetry met excess with the wisdom of tradition. But which tradition? Certainly the work of 'the Georgians cultivating their gardens' (Stephen Spender); a stable tradition of homely, pre-modernist English writers such as Thomas Hardy and Wilfred Owen, whose descendants would include > John Betjeman. Conquest, again, celebrates 'rational structure and comprehensible language' in his choice of verse, as does > D. J. Enright both in his own humanistic, dry, anti-Romantic verse and in the poems he collected in the equally important Movement anthology of 1955, Poets of the 1950s. The Bible of the Movement was > Donald Davie's critical work of 1952, Purity of Diction in English Verse, which supported stylistic discipline and verbal austerity; words should be rationed and undue extravagance curbed. In Davie's work the obvious parallels between the 1950s and the 18th century become concrete, his role being that of the spokesperson of the anti-Bohemian poetic age when he wrote:

... there is no necessary connection between the poetic vocation on the one hand, and on the other exhibitionism, egoism, and licence.

(Purity of Diction in English Verse)

With the Movement English poetry again scaled itself down, and, clad in the hues of post-war Ealing movies, sardonically stated the primacy of the parochial and the provincial over the eclectic internationalism of modernism. > Philip Larkin exemplifies Movement poetry, in his deflationary, perfectly formed phrases, and in his almost xenophobic stance against other cultures and cultural forms:

... to me the whole of the ancient world, the whole of biblical and classical mythology means very little, and I think that using them today not only fills poems full of dead spots but dodges the writer's duty to be original.

('Four Conversations', The London Magazine)

Larkin's provincialism was adamantly rooted in his life in Hull, and his resistance to London's literary elite. The south-east's imperialization of other British cultures has since the 1960s found more energetic and positive forms in the growing importance of various regional poetic groups, from Northern Ireland, Newcastle, Scotland and Liverpool in particular. But the adamant Englishness of Larkin in the 1950s is another matter, and is itself beautifully deflated by the poet and critic > Charles Tomlinson:

Larkin's narrowness suits the English perfectly. They recognize their own abysmal urban landscapes, skilfully caught with just a whiff of English films c. 1950. The stepped-down vision of human possibilities (no Renaissances, please), the joke that hesitates just this side of nihilism, are national vices.

If these are vices, Larkin is an exemplary sinner, melancholically resigning himself to monochrome rather than confront the abyss. His poetic departure from the dominant romantic image of daring and heroism is beautifully epitomized by his poem 'Poetry of Departures' (1955). The 'audacious, purifying, / Elemental' movements of romantic action are parodied in implicit praise of safety, order and domestic banality which are for Larkin at least genuine:

> So to hear it said He walked out on the whole crowd Leaves me flushed and stirred, Like Then she undid her dress Or Take that you bastard; Surely I can, if he did? And that helps me stay Sober and industrious. But I'd go today Yes, swagger the nut-strewn roads, Crouch the fo'c'sle Stubbly with goodness, if It weren't so artificial . . .

Larkin, then, is an ironic conformist; his poetry seems to be always already middleaged. In 'Church Going' (1955) he responds to the divine by taking off his cycle-clips. Even in his passion for jazz music – he was an important jazz critic as well as poet – his stance is resolutely anti-40s, preferring traditional jazz – his patience ends where the fast pyrotechnics of be-bop begin. Sexual magic is regarded dispassionately:

... Why be out here?

But then, why be in there? Sex, yes, but what

Is sex? Surely, to think the lion's share

Of happiness is found by couples – sheer

Inaccuracy, as far as I'm concerned.

('Reasons for Attendance'; 1955)

Other sides of nihilism: Gunn, Hughes, Plath

He tells you in the sombrest notes,
If poets want to get their oats
The first step is to slit their throats.
The way to divide
The sheep of poetry from the goats
Is suicide.

(James Fenton)

Post-Movement writers strove to break the 'minipoet' mould by formulating a poetics of irrationality and violence, reacting against genteel statements of commonsense experience. This reaction took various forms, particularly towards confessional writing, expressionism, and a further working through of the modernist techniques and internationalism which had been abandoned by the Movement. Georgian moderation was scorned, in favour of more primal passions.

Poetry has had to meet the abysmal possibilities of violence opened up after 1945 in some form or other, one way being an overt thematic acknowledgement of the exponential accumulation of military hardware and the lengthening nuclear shadow of the Cold War years. The Movement had responded by consolidating safe images of a humane England for which the violations of tradition by modernists were simply interruptions or moments of forgetting. However, writing 'death of god' poetry becomes a new and darker practice after the Holocaust, Dresden and Hiroshima, events which necessarily violated the pre-war idyll of a safe and sunny England. A. Alvarez, in his seminal introduction to the anthology of 1962, The New Poetry, echoes the title of Freud's pathbreaking text on the theory of the death drive (published just after World War I), Beyond the Pleasure Principle, when he writes that the new poetry of the early 1960s goes 'Beyond the Gentility Principle'. Alvarez collected together writing which partly reacted against the sobriety of the Movement, took more risks, was more confessional, and again explored pathological states of mind. Poet-as-man-next-door had become poet-as-victim. Alvarez's prescription was taken up particularly in the intense and grotesque work of > Ted Hughes, > Sylvia Plath, ▶ Peter Redgrove, and American expressionists Robert Lowell (1917-77) and John Berryman (1914-72). Both Freud and Alvarez are observing modern forces of disintegration in developing their theories of psychic and poetic development. Alvarez writes:

Theologians would call these forces evil, psychologists, perhaps, libido. Either way, they are the forces of disintegration which destroy the old standards of civilization. Their public faces are those of two world wars, of the concentration camps, of genocide, and the threat of nuclear war.

(The New Poetry)

In the 1960s British poetry begins to affirm more strongly these disturbing aspects of the human psyche and its 20th-century productions.

Given the clear rational tone of much Movement work, and the at times passionate violence of much post-Movement poetry, one is tempted to superimpose the reaction from Movement to post-Movement on to the old Enlightenment/Romantic polarity, especially since Davie's overt championing of Augustan (> Augustanism) values. However, the simplicity of such an opposition would be challenged by the work of someone like > Thom Gunn, who uses elements from both poetic worlds. He is something of a bridging figure between the Movement poets, particularly Larkin, and the early 1960s poets, particularly Ted Hughes. On the surface, and from the point of view of his work in the 1960s, Gunn could not be further from Larkin, especially when he celebrates the heroes of rock and roll, the Hemingwayesque swaggerers, 'stubbly with goodness'. When Gunn's poetry crosses the Atlantic it goes on the road - 'On the Move' (1957), with an epigram from Marlon Brando and signed just 'California', is typical – and formally Gunn's work in the 1960s, lavish and energetic, took him towards more fluid forms and free verse. But in a couplet from his poem of 1955, 'To Yvor Winters', he anticipates this move from 'Rule' to 'Energy', and unfolds a Blakean umbrella across his corpus to cover both 1950s reason and 1960s passion - at its most effective, a 20th-century marriage of rational heaven and energetic hell:

> You keep both Rule and Energy in view, Much power in each, most in the balanced two.

What, then, of Energy? Ted Hughes is a writer known for his Romanticism, his evocations of violence and vitalistic cruelty. He is often a very disturbing writer, showing how the idyll of England reinvoked in the 1950s is already subverted or betrayed from within by the 'stirrings beyond sense' which ghost control and self-possession. 'Esther's tomcat' sleeps by day on the mat but by night 'Walks upon sleep . . . over the round world of men'; thrushes aren't safely part of an English country garden but are 'more coiled steel than living'; a skylark is 'shot through the crested head / With the command, Not die'. Hughes' verse draws strongly on mythological motifs and can seem over-written; breaking with the parochialism of the Movement, it unearths as well as savagery the sinister and harrowing visions of a volume such as Crow (1970).

Hughes' work serves as relief for several comparisons which could be made at this point. Conceptually it owes much to Freud and Lawrence, who meet at the point in his verse where it becomes clear that violence and human repression are inextricably part of the same mechanism, civilization engendering a more insidious violence bred of repression itself. But he is quite starkly not a liberationist writer like Dylan Thomas or Lawrence, as he bleakly emphasizes the closure or inevitability of this mechanism. Other authorial personae exist, of course, in his children's poetry, his critical essays, even in his efforts as Poet Laureate, where Hughes the painfully private poet becomes public property. As part of a new wave in poetry – confessional, naked, anguished – which looked back in anger at 1950s self-satisfaction, Hughes exemplified the savage twist which Alvarez celebrates, and in this is often compared with the work of Sylvia Plath, primarily because they were married until 1962 and worked closely together.

Hughes was also a strong champion of Keith Douglas, and marks of disintegration brought to consciousness by the war are foregrounded by their poetic relation. Finally, in his Romantic extravagance Hughes' work can be contrasted with that of those poets who picked up the loose ends of modernism.

These links coalesce at the point at which the 'I' of the poem or poet needs to be discussed. Again questions of the poet's identity and of his or her relationship to the text and its context, to writing as public or private are brought to the fore. One way into this problem is to look briefly at the work of > Charles Tomlinson, whose resistance to the influences of Thomas in the late 1940s made him turn to the precision of American modernism; he wrote 'here was a clear way of going to work, so that you could cut through this Freudian swamp and say something clearly'. The image of Pound and Eliot cutting through the Georgian 'swamp' and returning to the intellectual hardness of the Metaphysical poets has an uncanny echo in Tomlinson's practice; his 'I' is a problematic entity, rather like Eliot's. It is marginalized but, since something of a process of self-conscious depersonalization is being enacted, it takes centre-stage in its impersonality. His attempt to objectify the image, resisting Thomas' emotionalism and surreal obscurity, echoes the austerity of the Imagist project: in his own words he wants to give his images 'The hardness of crystals, the facets of cut glass'. The title of his 1960 volume Seeing is Believing emphasizes his attempt to bring together Movement empiricism with Imagism's valuation of visual clarity.

Compare, for instance, Tomlinson's 'Fox' with Hughes' 'Thought-Fox'. Tomlinson's animal is dead in the snow, it has a sharp correctness but in the shifting romantic blizzard gives up its own existence and becomes an image of the hill itself. Tomlinson has to work hard against the drive of his poem to slide into a chaos of white and crosswinds with his mind at the confused centre:

... the drift still mocked
my mind as if the whole fox-infested hill were the skull of a fox ...

The image of hill-as-skull crystalizes from the blinding blizzard of this text. Hughes' poem begins, however, with fox-as-text; where Tomlinson's fox-skull and hill are 'out there' and the poet's job is to respect and accord them this objective autonomy, Hughes' fox finds his quickness only inside the interior of the poem, the writing of which depends upon a poetic incorporation of the natural world. For Hughes there is no critical distance which gives the image outline; the fox is already inside the self, actually entering the human skull ('the dark hole of the head'), becoming subject to the desire of writing, so that the page can be printed. Similarly, Tomlinson's hawk in 'How still the Hawk' hangs purely 'out there', innocent in its distance from human interpretation, whereas Hughes' 'Hawk Roosting' famously signifies the sinister, cold egotism of the totalitarian personality – Hughes' hawk has a subjective existence, so that it speaks the poems from the point of view of a post-war 'I'. The stillness of the hawk's image is for Tomlinson, then, a challenge to objectivism, for Hughes a point of aberrant control in the maelstrom of modern cruelty, whilst for Dylan Thomas in 'Over Sir John's Hill' it signifies an emotionally intense poise:

Over Sir John's Hill

The hawk on fire hangs still;

In a hoisted cloud, at drop of dusk, he pulls to his claws.

The dialogue between these poems, then, serves to illustrate the familiar modern dichotomy in British poetry, that of the privileging of inside or outside. Is poetic writing an attempt to clarify as succinctly as possible the autonomous and the objective, or is it an act of poetic individuation and self-definition? The Romantic question – Coleridge's notion that poet and poem are indistinguishable – often recurs at this moment in poetic history as the dilemma between confessional, violent, personal writing and a post-war form of Imagism, like Tomlinson's, or like the precise and abrupt decompositional writing of > Christopher Middleton. Who, then, is the poet? Is he or she now dead, like other authors in the > post-structuralist world? And how does the fresh political engagement of the 1980s affect this question? The problem of the self and its relations to writing is intensified as personal subjectivity is viewed increasingly suspiciously in recent times. The question of objectivity, of the subjectivity of the poet and the status of his or her images, which clearly Tomlinson is engaging with, became a sharper problem in the 1980s and 1990s with the increased politicization of radical poetic writing, and, in another form, with the distorted perceptions of 'Martian eye' (> Martian poetry) writing. I shall return to this shortly.

Sylvia Plath is, like Keith Douglas, another untimely poet, who wrote four brilliant and disturbing slim volumes of poetry in the early 1960s, three of which were published well after her suicide in 1963. It is hard to read Plath's verse outside the enormous interest in her private life which has burgeoned since her death; in modern mythology she exemplifies the self-consciously tragic poetic genius-figure. The nature of her death also evokes a more disturbing myth, that of the woman writer wracked by neurosis and too weak in body to contain her talent. Whoever Plath was, there is no doubt that her work relentlessly pursues the question of the 'I', of poetry and madness, with all Douglas' desire of words for words. The 'late mouths' of 'Poppies in October' which 'cry open / In a forest of frost' cause her to ask 'O my God, what am I?'; to whom do the poppies come, like a macabre gift, suggesting bleeding in ambulances? There is warfare in her work, a sharp killer's eye and a grotesque but erotic drive. A bleeding, fizzing cut across her thumb is the result of an Indian scalping, a sabotage, a Kamikaze act, a symptom of masochism. The image of blood as the running of 'A million soldiers ..., / Redcoats, every one' ('Cut') is typically acute, almost humorous, but bites with paranoia as she then asks, 'Whose side are they on?' The sinister possibility that one's own flowing blood could be one's enemy speaks the psychological complexity of Plath's work, which never rests in the notion of anguish as 'authentic'. Cruel humour and ruthless self-suspicion undermine sincerity; arrogance and tragic self-glorification are deflated in 'Lady Lazarus', as suicide is paraded with the grotesque props of concentration camps:

Dying
Is an art, like everything else.
I do it exceptionally well.
I do it so it feels like hell.
I do it so it feels real.
I guess you could say I've a call.

Plath's 'reality' is not that of the every-day Movement, but that is not to say that her work can be marginalized as a depoliticized expression of private agonies; she was acutely aware of the political nature of writing for a woman, and insists on drawing parallels between her experience and disturbing political and historical reality. If she is a personal writer it is because, in the phrase coined by 1960s feminism, 'the personal is the political': 'Daddy' is as much about the powers of horror, opened up by postwar images of death camps and fascist obsession, as it is a text working through a daughter's ambivalent relationship with her father. As Plath said in an interview just before she died, poetry 'should be generally relevant, to such things as Hiroshima and Dachau'. Plath gazes straight at taboo, where a writer like > Peter Porter, in 'Annotations of Auschwitz' for instance, looks satirically sideways at it. Porter's 'Your Attention Please' casts a black-comic nuclear shadow, whilst reminding us of something we meet constantly in Plath's work: 'Death is the least we have to fear'. 'Lady Lazarus' comes back,

Out of the ash
I rise with my red hair
And I eat men like air.

'A dangerous weapon': contemporary poetry

I am neither internee nor informer; An inner émigré, grown long-haired And thoughtful; a wood-kerne Escaped from the massacre. ('Exposure', Seamus Heaney)

The crisis of writing and identity which is traced here as infecting British poetry has recently reached fever pitch. The problems of what constitutes a poem and of who the poet is have more recently become politicized into questions about what constitutes the British in 'British poetry'. Poets now, be they black, female or Irish, have felt themselves to be 'inner émigrés': as Guyanan-born poet John Agard (b 1949) writes 'I didn't graduate / I immigrate', ('Listen Mr Oxford Don', 1985). The phrase 'poetry in English' is compromised by other voices from Ireland, Scotland, regions of England, and the Commonwealth (> Post-colonial literature). From a traditional point of view it seems that English poetry is slowly undergoing an undignified deathprocess, that the incorporation of other voices into 'Eng. Lit.' constitutes the blowing into oblivion of a much-cherished friend. More energetically and optimistically we could say, rather, that what is gaining prominence is a kind of 'multiverse', a plurality of accents and experiences breaking open the poised egocentric tradition. From going 'Beyond the Gentility Principle' we reach the late 1980s with poet and critic Eric Mottram's assertion that the modern avant-garde constitutes 'A Treacherous Assault on British Poetry' (The New British Poetry; 1988). The critic Colin MacCabe writes, 'It is perhaps no longer appropriate to talk of English literature but of a literature in broken English':

If the members of the United Kingdom are all nominally British, it is instructive to recall that English as a language has been imposed, often by force, throughout the British Isles. And the peoples of those islands find that along with the imposed language they have acquired a literature to which their relationship is profoundly ambiguous — one need only think of Joyce or MacDiarmid to realise exactly how ambiguous.

(McCabe, 'Broken English', Futures for English, 1988)

This realization began to find some purchase in British poetry in the mid-1960s, although it is true that in a different way internationalist strains in modernist writing had already undermined the notion of a truly English culture. From the regional focus which constituted much poetic activity during the 1960s, to the broad cultural base of much radical poetry today, British writing now can be defined only as a space within which its vital differences are affirmed. It has many homes: Trinidad-born poet John Lyons now resides in Britain but has left a nomadic trail leading back to his 'Island Muse':

I come long years with my pen and island hauntings from where my navel string tree still grows.

Thus poetry split its focus into a thriving network of regional groups, in the Mordern Tower poets of Newcastle, who found their mentor in the rediscovered ⊳ Basil Bunting, and the new renaissance of poetry from Northern Ireland which has emerged as contemporaneous with the troubles, from poets such as ▷ Seamus Heaney, ▷ Paul Muldoon and ▶ Derek Mahon. The emphasis was resolutely anti-London and the cultural imperialism of the south-east. The famous 'Liverpool poets' of the early and mid-1960s - Adrian Henri (b 1932), Henry Graham (b 1930), Roger McGough (b 1937) and Brian Patten (b 1946), collected in the anthologies The Mersey Sound (1967) and New Volume (1983) – were a British version of American Beat poetry. All four had strong links with the world of pop music, and emphasized poetry as live performance, thus opening up their writing to a wide young audience. Like pop art, Mersey poetry uses the familiar images of throwaway culture in its quick-fire surreal humour, but the effect is ultimately naughty rather than revolutionary. Pop art and pop music found their way into poetry at this time as never before, and the link between rock and writing was kept bubbling underground in the late 1960s largely due to the ministrations of the poet and publisher Michael Horovitz (b 1935) - his magazine New Departures, founded in 1959, had long been the organ of the poetic underground, and his anthology Children of Albion (1969) exemplifies a late 1960s celebration of liberation politics and poetics, taking William Blake as mentor. Whilst it is true that much avant-garde writing in the 1960s and 1970s displays the preoccupations of the economically privileged young British middle classes, it also eventually encouraged a certain disrespect - against the gentility principle once more - which opened a space for the more multi-racial and working-class forms of punk, dub, reggae poetry, and New Wave performance in the late 1970s.

The regionalist movement was roughly contemporary with the establishment of a large number of small presses, through which more experimental and avant-garde work found a space outside the mainstream monolithic publishing houses, just as the high street bookshop's failure to sell marginalized writing urged poets into using local live outlets for their work. The small presses, often set up by poets themselves, have effectively countered the overwhelming influence of the major houses like Chatto & Windus and Faber & Faber − Faber in particular has long dominated poetry publication and in effect established the official canon of post-war and contemporary verse. Aesthetic valuation has seldom walked so nakedly in the profit margins. So the small presses have been vital in countering profitable orthodoxies: names such as ▷ Gael Turnbull's Migrant Press, Peterloo Poets, Stuart Montgomery's Fulcrum, Andrew Crozier's Ferry, Desmond Johnson's Akira and ▷ Ian Hamilton Finlay's Wild Hawthorn, in conjunction with small magazines like Stand, Poetry Information and Agenda, have over the years given younger and more experimental writers a space within which to work and have access to publishing facilities. In 1971 the champion of experimental and post-modernist work Eric Mottram was made editor of the Poetry Society's Poetry Reviem, an unprecedented move, as a result of which other forms of writing found a voice through the National Poetry Centre, until the scandalous dissolution of the editorial board by the > Arts Council in 1977.

It must be said, however, that these energies remain fired partly by the task of countering the familiar conservatism of the poetic establishment. Two of the larger publishing houses, Anvil Press and Carcanet Press, are indeed open to more obscure and challenging types of modern writing, but Carcanet's statement of its aesthetic policy when it was established in 1969 displays a continued cherishing of bourgeois 'reasonable' traditions. Something of this survived in the compilation of the much criticized 1982 anthology, The Penguin Book of Contemporary Poetry, edited by ▶ Blake Morrison (b 1950) and ▶ Andrew Motion (b 1952), which collected together a chic, sophisticated body of modern verse, challenging nothing, and punctuated for bizarre effect only by sideways glances from the 'Martian eyes' of ▶ Craig Raine and Christopher Reid.

The modernist question of homelessness has recently been rearticulated by women poets as a problem of one's tradition and one's literary home; women's writing continues to disrupt the smooth contours of the traditional mask. As a woman writer, where does one come from? > Denise Levertov's verse is unsettling in its sense of exile, echoing > Virginia Woolf's '... as a woman I have no country'. > Ruth Fainlight's work also knows no fixed identity; a multitude of feminine voices insinuate threats or coaxings from between its lines. Her poems are populated by female 'others' - Sibyls, forgotten sisters, 'Stone-Age' selves, Medusas, 'Sophia, Anima, Kali', 'Gloria', 'Lilith' or the faces in the mirror. They speak to free the texts 'from whomsoever's definition: / Jew, poet, woman'.

Levertov's verse protests strongly against the stench of war and her adoptive America's aggression. Like Douglas, it exults in moments lived as if at 'the last minute', intensified by the consciousness of ending. Death breathes across the still, awestruck poems, 'Living', 'Passage', '... That Passeth All Understanding', a finitude which concentrates; if her poetry is spiritual it is so because it exists in the shadow of oblivion:

The fire in leaf and grass so green it seems each summer the last summer ('Living')

a day of spring, a needle's eye space and time are passing through like a smathe of silk ('Passage')

The intense interest in women's writing since the 1960s has, then, been important both to the > women's movement and in opening up literature to a variety of other voices. Indeed, opening up the canon of contemporary poetry has occurred from inside poetry itself. Modernism's amalgamating energies, which brought many other languages and voices forth from the crevices and underbelly of the canon – its otherwise repressed voices – have been realized in a less authoritarian form since the 1960s. Almost as soon as a new contemporary canon could gather itself, it was eroded by a wave of work penned by black writers, women writers – a self-consciously politicized alternative. Canon challenging has, then, recently been more than an academic exercise, especially since poetry now is written from an acute awareness of the possibilities of academic incorporation and judgement.

MacCabe's punning phrase 'Broken English' suggests both a body terminally injured and broken open, ready for new growth – we are back, perhaps, with H.D.'s celebration of the destruction of restrictive models, which for John Agard again can be achieved armed only 'wit mih human breath / but human breath / is a dangerous weapon'. If the impetus of 1960s poetry was an urge to harmony, that of the 1980s is an affirmation of difference, as the teeming voices of other cultural forms (the language of reggae, for instance) breaks out from the broken body of 'Eng. Lit.':

I dont need no axe
to split/ up yu syntax
I dont need no hammer to mash/ up yu grammar
('Listen Mr Oxford Don', John Agard; 1985)

'Tradition' continues to be a problem, but one which contemporary poetry encounters through a strategy of incorporation. Two recent anthologies illustrate this extremely well. Denise Riley's Poets on Writing (1992) places poems by new young poets alongside short prose responses and observations concerning their writing history, their influences and motivations. The collection shows the diversity of poetic 'climates' which breathe in and out of the texts included (as Riley puts it, 'what there was in the air'). The anxiety about tradition which has engendered the violent reactions of the 20th century movements I have described here has to some extent been replaced by a writing spirit which casts the net of influence culturally wider and with a greater sense of critical scepticism regarding the question of influence per se. Thus poet and critic Geoffrey Ward (b 1954), citing a range of elements and images (such as the Fun House at Southport, early Auden, or the whole poetic climate of his early student life) which form some of the 'troubled' origins of a poem, writes,

Writing only ever takes place at some juncture; in relation, Poetry articulates the coincidence and/or contradiction where what's heard on the radio meets what happens in the street, where what you are reading questions what you are read as doing.

('Objects That Come Alive at Night', Poets on Writing, ed. Denise Riley, Macmillan 1992)

Similarly, Carol Rumens' New Women Poets (1991) stresses the eclecticism of her writers, their variety of dialects and enthusiastic formal innovation. Citing the poetry of Briar Wood (b 1958) and Jackie Kay (b 1951), Rumens writes:

What is new is the emergence of a kind of late twentieth-century urban dialect, a montage that reverberates with the noise, colour, slanginess, jargonizing and information-glut of daily life.

In presenting this final collage, I do not wish to suggest that the project of modern poetry is a return to representation, albeit the representation of a new range of cultural phenomena or experiences. But perhaps modern poetry, informed by the 'climate' of popular music, films or images, and theoretical perspectives on influence, is better able to articulate its response to a wider range of materials. In this sense modern poetry comes close to > postmodernism, although the term is more commonly used in relation to a range of other forms. The strategy of incorporation which I have described has, however, more clearly been deployed as a response to marginalization. Modern poetry uses its marginalization and the elements of literary crisis to form something which has not only a future but many futures, as many futures as there are cultural forms and languages to be incorporated. What is being affirmed, then, is a process of innoculation; the crisis passes as new forms of writing learn how to grow from that which formerly threatened and marginalized. The canon is being opened from within; to paraphrase Nietzsche, what doesn't kill poetry makes it stronger.

Culture and Consciousness: the 20th-century Novel in English

Andrew Michael Roberts

PART I - 1900 to 1930

Between 1900 and 1930 revolutionary developments took place in the English novel. These developments involved new subject matter, style and technique, and led ultimately to a radical rethinking of the relationship between fiction and reality. This era in the history of the novel, like the corresponding periods in the history of drama, poetry and other arts, is now widely known as > modernism. The roots of modernism are exceptionally diverse, the result of cross-fertilization between cultures, between art forms and between disciplines. Like most historical generalizations, however, the concept of modernism can generate exclusions and omissions. At one time there was a tendency for critics to neglect the role of women writers in modernism (with a few exceptions such as > Virginia Woolf); now, however, there is a greater (though not universal) awareness of the role played by such novelists as > Katherine Mansfield, Dorothy Richardson, ➤ May Sinclair, ➤ Rebecca West and ➤ Sylvia Townsend Warner. This in turn brings a wider conception of the nature and significance of modernism as a movement in the arts. However, it is also important to recognize the considerable body of fiction from this period for which the term modernism is not appropriate. This includes fiction in the realist mode such as the novels of > Arnold Bennett and > John Galsworthy as well as > H.G. Wells' comedies of lower-middle-class life. There was also a wide range of popular fictional genres which, without sharing the high cultural aspirations of modernist innovation, can be inventive, entertaining and revealing of early twentieth-century culture, such as the light comedies of > P.G. Wodehouse, the fantasies and detective stories of > G.K. Chesterton, writing for children by > Kenneth Grahame and > A.A. Milne, and H.G. Wells' > science fiction

Culture and reality: James, Conrad, Ford, West

> Joseph Conrad (1857–1924) and > Henry James (1843–1916), both of whom first published in the nineteenth century, are the earliest of the great modernist novelists writing in English. One form of cross-fertilization is evident at once, in that James was born an American and Conrad a Pole. Each chose to settle in England and to become an English subject and for each the collision of different cultures was an important theme. The relation of America to Europe is a central concern of James' fiction: in major novels such as > The Portrait of a Lady (1881) and > The Wings of the Dove (1902), as well as > novellas such as > Daisy Miller (1879), the moral consequences of the meeting of American innocence and enthusiasm with a sophisticated but corrupt European culture are explored by means of irony, a sustained attention to the nuances of individual consciousness, and a prose style of increasing subtlety and complexity. It was not only in theme that James was cosmopolitan; influences on his work include > Jane Austen > George Eliot, Nathaniel Hawthorne, > Balzac and Turgenev.

Conrad's life as a merchant seaman, and his upbringing in Poland and Russia, brought him into contact with a wide range of cultures. His prose style owes much to the influences of the nineteenth-century French writers Maupassant and > Flaubert, and in a number of his works he explores what was to become a major concern of the twentieth-century English novel: the experience of the European in Asia, Africa or South America. In > Heart of Darkness (1902) a supposedly enlightened colonial programme is revealed as ruthless commercial exploitation and a journey up the Congo becomes symbolic of an exploration of the darkness within man, the atrocities of history, the powerful forces of the unconscious, the mystery of evil. This work epitomizes many features of modernist fiction: the need to confront violence, nihilism and despair; the fascination with, but fear of, the unconscious; the centrality of a dramatized narrator who is not omniscient but rather himself searching for understanding; a symbolic richness which invites multiple interpretations. The last two of these features reflect the influence on modernism of the French Symbolist (> symbolism) inovement of the nineteenth century, one of whose exponents, Rémy de Gourmont, defined the writer's purpose as being 'to unveil to others the kind of world which he beholds in his own personal mirror'. Conrad's critique of the ideology of Empire also foreshadows the many later works of fiction which use colonial or post-colonial settings to explore the European mind through its contact with what is alien and with what is shared in other cultures, while protesting against bigotry and exploitation. Examples include > E. M. Forster's > A Passage to India (1924), > George Orwell's Burmese Days (1934), > Graham Greene's The Heart of the Matter (1948), and, more recently, the Indian novels of > Ruth Prawer Jhabvala.

But it is in their technique that James and Conrad are most revolutionary. While novelists such as Arnold Bennett (1867-1931) and John Galsworthy (1867-1933) continued to write in the accepted realist mode, using an omniscient narrator, a chronologically sequential narrative and the accumulation of details of social and public life, modernist novelists sought radical redefinitions of the real. One such redefinition is based on the view that, since the individual always perceives reality through his or her own consciousness, the contents and structure of consciousness represent the only accessible reality. A number of philosophical influences are relevant here. William James, the brother of Henry James, was an American psychologist and philosopher. In Essays in Radical Empiricism (1912) he elaborated the notion of a world of 'pure experience', all reality being described in terms of subjective human experience (James is also the originator of the term > 'stream of consciousness'). > Sigmund Freud (1856-1939), whose work began to be known in Britain around 1912, has had an enormous influence on modern literature, though less through direct application of his ideas than as a result of his contribution to the assumptions and preoccupations of modern Western society. One of his most potent ideas is also one of the simplest: that all mental phenomena have meaning. This assumption helped to validate new ways of structuring narrative based on dreams, fantasies, and chains of association. > Henri Bergson (1859-1941), the French philosopher of evolution, distinguished between scientific time (a mathematical, abstract, homogeneous medium) and 'real duration' (our direct experience of time as a flowing, irreversible succession of heterogeneous and concrete states). The former, he claimed, is essentially an illusion; it is our subjective experience of time which is 'real'.

The novel was a particularly suitable form for the exploration of such perceptions, because of the possibility of manipulating the reader's experience of time by means of disruption of narrative chronology, and the possibility of representing the nature of consciousness by describing events through the awareness of one or more characters.

In the opening chapters of Conrad's > Lord Jim (1900) a sense of foreboding is created so that the reader's expectation and interest are engaged, but at precisely the point of crisis, when an accident occurs to the ship on which Jim is first mate, the narrative jumps forward to the subsequent inquiry. Conrad thus deliberately frustrates the desire for plot satisfaction, diverting our interest from what happens, to the moral and philosophical significance of events. The narrative is structured as an investigation; an attempt, largely on the part of Marlow, who befriends Jim, to understand Jim's life. However, Marlow himself obtains much of his information at second hand, through accounts of events given to him by other characters, so that the effect is one of an enigmatic reality seen through a series of consciousnesses.

But it was Henry James above all who, in practice in his novels and in theory in his prefaces, developed the use of an observing consciousness whose viewpoint shapes the narrative. Here we need to distinguish between the narrator (the narrating 'voice' which, if it refers to itself, must do so in the first person) and the focal character or 'reflector' (the character whose point of view orients the narrative perspective). In Conrad's Heart of Darkness Marlow is both narrator and focal character, but the two are not identical since they represent Marlow at different points in his life. One of the subtle pleasures of the story is our sense of Marlow the narrator (middle-aged, sitting on a boat on the Thames) reflecting on and reassessing the experience of Marlow the focal character (younger, more idealistic, in the Congo). James' most favoured device is the restriction of the narrative focalization to a reflector who is not the narrator but is referred to in the third person, a prime example being Strether in > The Ambassadors (1903). Associated Jamesian techniques include a dominance of 'scene' (the highly detailed account of particular occasions) and long accounts of the nuances of the reflector's sense of events. These reflectors become centres of interest themselves. Viewing events through their eyes, we share the limitations of their knowledge and the distortions of their viewpoint, and this is realistic in the sense that our actual experience of life is always limited in this way; we do not have all the facts, nor access to the thoughts of others. We share in the progressive illumination of Marlow and Strether. Conrad and James inaugurated a form of realism which > Malcolm Bradbury (b 1932) has aptly described as 'not so much a substantiation of reality as a questing for it'.

These various manipulations of narrator and reflector are fruitful sources of irony, a primary characteristic of much modern fiction. Irony can be generated when the reader perceives more, or understands better, than the narrator and/or reflector, and can occur even when our perspective is technically limited to that of this character. James' novella The Aspern Papers (1888) is entirely first-person narration, but we gradually realize, through his own words and thoughts, the moral and emotional limitations of the narrator. A different form of irony is developed by Conrad in > The Secret Agent (1907) and > Under Western Eyes (1911): a pervasive irony of tone and event. The former is produced by a portrayal of human activity as largely futile and human nature as inherently given to self-deception and illusory beliefs. The latter occurs as characters' actions consistently go awry and produce the opposite effect to that intended. The result is a blend of black comedy with a satirical and tragic view of humanity, its pretensions, and its ideals.

A special case of the dramatized central consciousness is the unreliable narrator or reflector. One of the most fascinating examples of the unreliable narrator is Dowell in > Ford Madox Ford's novel The Good Soldier (1915). Our initial tendency to accept a first-person narrator as an accurate source of information is exploited so that the cruelty, deception and insanity lurking beneath the genteel surface of the lives of two couples emerges with a greater sense of shock. Dowell also reflects on the nature of story-telling and its relation to truth ('I don't know how it is best to put this thing down . . .') and this novel thus anticipates two recurrent features of the twentieth-century novel. The first is the use of narrators or reflectors who are unbalanced, malevolent, of limited understanding or otherwise in an abnormal state of mind. Examples include The Collector (1963) by ▷ John Fowles (parts 1 and 3), and The Spire (1964) by ▷ William Golding. The second feature is reflexive narrative, in which the nature and purpose of writing becomes a constant secondary theme, or even the primary interest of the work. Examples include ▷ Doris Lessing's The Golden Notebook (1962) and William Golding's Rites of Passage (1980).

Rebecca West had published a study of Henry James in 1916 and her first novel The Return of the Soldier, which followed two years later in 1918, has marked affinities with the work of James, Conrad and Ford. Like James, she uses the device of a narrator who is a sensitive, perceptive but not impartial observer: the story of Chris, a soldier who returns from the front during the First World War having lost his memory of the last fifteen years, is told by his cousin Jenny, whose account is coloured by her own adoration for Chris. Like Conrad in Heart of Darkness and other of his works, West employs a narrative within a narrative, but she introduces a distinctive form of displacement between the two narrative levels: in an inset account, Jenny narrates the story of Chris' first love (which she knows only at second hand) with an instability of pronoun (shifting from 'one' to 'they') which suggests her shifting emotional identifications. Like Ford's The Good Soldier, West's The Return of the Soldier uses the play of subjectivity and projection to study loss, alienation, jealousy and the subtleties of self-deception. However, West's novel ends in partial consolation rather than the desolation evoked by Ford. In The Return of the Soldier modernist narrative technique contributes to the celebration of an almost mystical power of nurturing which West sees in certain women.

History, Consciousness and Gender: Lawrence, Woolf, Richardson

The relationship of history and the novel may be formulated in two ways. On the one hand, we may regard history as an objective series of public events, and the novel as an art form which may represent, ignore or fictionalize them. On the other hand, we may regard history itself as a narrative, and its relation with the novel as more reciprocal, our sense of the nature and significance of narrative influencing our sense of historical pattern and meaning and vice versa. Modernism is sometimes accused of ignoring historical and social realities. But the sense of living in a period of historical crisis is an important aspect of much modernist fiction. The apocalyptic world view which the critic Frank Kermode has identified in the work of ⊳ D. H. Lawrence (1885-1930) is at once a reaction to accelerating social change and an expression of a mystical or prophetic view of the role of the artist, influenced by the Bible, and especially the Book of Revelation. > The Rainbow (1915) describes the life of three generations of the Brangwen family in the English Midlands, and > Women in Love (1921) (originally planned as part of the same work), continues the story of the third generation. In neither novel is there extensive reference to historical events in the conventional sense, though the effect on rural life of progressive industrialization is powerfully felt. Rather, what Lawrence writes is a history of the development of human consciousness and the unconscious life, in which the individual's relation with partner, family, work and the natural and man-made environment reflects large-scale cultural changes. The harmony achieved by Tom and Lydia, the first-generation couple living at Marsh Farm, is symbolized by the biblical image of the rainbow; by the end of The Rainbow, when Ursula, the modern woman, rejects marriage with Skrebensky, the representative of the mechanistic modern society, the rainbow can be only a tentative hope for a future regeneration. Just as James' novels seem to take place in a theatre of consciousness which is his unique discovery, so a considerable part of Lawrence's achievement is his development of a wholly new way of writing about human experience. The aspect of life to which he attends does not fit any of our normal categories; it cannot be summarized as the realm of the instinctual, nor of the unconscious, not of the physical, nor of the emotional, though it touches all of these. It reflects Lawrence's radically new sense of the nature of the self and his rejection of what he called 'the old stable ego of the character', and is realized by techniques of symbolism, the repetition of imagery, and the use of sustained passages of highly poetic yet often abstract language to describe the development of the individual. In Women in Love contemporary society is unequivocally rejected as mechanistic and destructive, and regeneration is located in personal relations of mystical intensity.

In its apocalyptic view Lawrence's work may be said to subordinate the contingency of history to a typological pattern: that is to say, a pattern of 'types' (events or persons), analogous to, and in many cases based upon, the events and persons of the Old Testament which foreshadow the dispensation of the New Testament. It is a feature of modernist narratives to order their material by symbol, pattern or metaphor rather than by the linear sequence of history. If the patterns to which history conforms are for Lawrence apocalyptic and typological, for Virginia Woolf (1882-1941) they are the patterns of art and of human sensibility. > To The Lighthouse (1927) was described by Leonard Woolf as a 'psychological poem', and this reflects the privileging of consciousness and the work of art as a made object over the chronological sequence of conventional fiction. The novel is in three sections, of which the first and third describe the life of a family in their holiday home in Scotland on two days, one before and one after the First World War. These sections use the stream of consciousness technique developed in the English novel by Woolf, > James Joyce (1882-1941) and ▶ Dorothy Richardson (1873-1957). So To The Lighthouse represents the thought sequences of the Ramsay family and their guests, moving freely in time and space. The middle section of the novel, entitled 'Time Passes', is concerned with the non-human, with change, with history and the ravages of time (the war takes place and several of the characters die; the house decays). An opposition is set up in the novel between, on the one hand, the destructive effect of history and of impersonal nature, and on the other the ordering power of art (represented by the painter, Lily Briscoe) and of human consciousness as a builder of social relationships (represented by Mrs Ramsay's drawing together of family and friends). The novel ends with Lily finishing her painting, completing a pattern in which the past and the dead are not lost, but reconciled in memory and in art. In so far as this painting is an analogue for the novel itself, history is mastered by art.

In Woolf's work the stream of consciousness technique moves towards a radical view of the nature of the self, which is of particular importance for ▷ feminist writing. In ▷ The Waves (1931) the lives of six characters are represented, and the close interaction of their consciousnesses is symbolically associated with a pattern of waves on the sea, separate yet part of a greater whole. From her first novel, The Voyage Out (1915), Woolf expressed a sense of the fluid nature of the self, its interdependence with the selves of others, and its relation to ▷ gender and class-based power structures. Feminists have increasingly seen the self as socially and politically constructed and have drawn inspiration from Woolf's moves towards ▷ deconstruction of the idea of immutable gender identity. Her interest in androgyny, her sense of the social protest which madness can represent and her satire on repressive psychiatric practices in ▷ Mrs Dalloway (1925) have also remained points of reference for feminist writers, although there is disagreement concerning her relationship to issues of class and privilege.

Woolf's > Orlando places ideas of androgyny in a historical context through the fantasy of a single character who lives many lives, some male and some female, over four centuries. Conversely, Lawrence's wish to essentialize gender differences becomes even stronger in his later works, notably The Plumed Serpent (1926) and 'The Woman who Rode Away' (1928), in which his earlier vision of apocalyptic regeneration is converted into the misogynist and fascistic worship of a ritualized male sexual power. A writer who has much in common with Woolf is Dorothy Richardson, whose autobiographical novel in thirteen volumes, Pilgrimage (1915-67), employs a lightly-punctuated and highly poetic stream of consciousness to reveal the mind of a young woman struggling in a society where 'history, literature, the way of stating records, reports, stories, the whole method of statement of things from the beginning . . . was on a false foundation'. She herself objected to the use of the stream metaphor for consciousness, preferring the organic stability suggested by the metaphor of a tree. The life of her heroine, Miriam Henderson, is a pilgrimage in search of an indefinable fulfilment, associated with the joy of perception itself. Woolf saw Richardson's prose style as 'the psychological sentence of the feminine gender' and Richardson herself argued that men and women used language differently. Both writers, together with such contemporaries as Katherine Mansfield, have been the focus of debate concerning the existence and nature of a style and use of language specific to women's writing; an > écriture féminine. In terms of content, much women's writing of this period emphasizes the significance to be found in the texture of experience: May Sinclair commented on the presence, in Pilgrimage, of a mysticism which could embrace mundane conversations and the eating of bread and butter. Sinclair's own > Bildungsroman, Mary Olivier: a Life (1919) and her novel The Life and Death of Harriet Frean (1922) each explore, through stream-ofconsciousness techniques, the development of a woman's mind and sensibility, in such a way that the details of ordinary life are informed by Sinclair's mystical, feminist and psychoanalytical interests.

Phases of modernism: Forster and Joyce

It is possible to distinguish an early phase of modernism, ending around the beginning of the First World War. In the first decade of the century James' three last great novels appeared, together with most of Conrad's major fiction and the first two novels of E. M. Forster (1879–1970), whose work is frequently regarded as containing both modernist and Victorian elements. In Forster's novel ▷ Howards End (1910) English society is seen as divided between the business world of action and the refined world of culture and the emotions, and a symbolic reconciliation is suggested by the marriage of the chief representatives of each group, and the inheritance of a house (the Howards End of the title), which stands for a threatened continuity in English life. The sense of threat and change is distinctively modernist, as is the location of renewal and reconciliation in the realm of the symbolic and the imagination. But Forster's social comedy, his narrative technique and his ▷ humanism associate him with more traditional strains in the English novel.

A Passage To India is at once more symbolic and less schematic than Howards End, and, appearing in 1924, belongs to the later post-war phase of modernism. While its satire on the arrogance and narrow-mindedness of British officials in India reflects the same belief in tolerance and liberalism as Forster's earlier work, the novel also explores at a deeper level the philosophical issues arising from the meeting of cultures. This is achieved in part through a symbolic evocation of the Indian landscape, and in particular the mysterious Marabar Caves, which call into question the identity and beliefs of several of the characters by their immitigable otherness. The novel ends with the voice of the landscape itself, on a note of ambivalent hope. While Forster made a contribution to both phases of modernism, the main figures of this postwar phase are Lawrence, Joyce and Woolf. Joyce's > Dubliners (1914) is a seminal influence on the modern > short story in English. He described his intention as that of writing 'a chapter in the moral history of my culture', using 'a style of scrupulous meanness'. Drawing on French influences, Joyce does indeed inaugurate in English the oblique, laconic short story, later developed by American writer Ernest Hemingway (1899-1961) and The New Yorker magazine. But the use of symbol, Joyce's mimicking of the diction and speech patterns of his Dublin characters, and his idea of the epiphany - a sudden spiritual manifestation in the ordinary - point to a more poetic and symbolic strain which culminates in the powerful yet ironic Romanticism of the last story in the collection, 'The Dead'.

> A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916) is comparable to Lawrence's > Sons and Lovers (1913) in its semi-autobiographical nature. In each the primary interest is in the psychological and intellectual development of a young man, with great concentration on the protagonist. This is most obvious in the Portrait, where the other characters remain shadowy and the language and structure of the novel seeks to render the contents of Stephen's mind, but it is important that in Sons and Lovers much of what we learn about the other characters is essentially their roles in Paul Morel's psychological economy. The protagonists of both novels seek independence, but whereas in Lawrence's work this is primarily emotional independence, in that of Joyce it is predominantly cultural and intellectual, involving Stephen's escape from the restrictions of Irish society and the Catholic Church.

Joyce's > Ulysses (1922) is a central text of modernism. A novel of over 600 pages concerned with one day in Dublin, it has an amazing richness of texture, combining mythical and literary allusions, parody and pastiche, punning and humour, with a powerful sense of the infinite complexity and subtlety of the individual's emotional and intellectual life. It is structured around a loose correspondence to the episodes of Homer's Odyssey, so that the juxtaposition of the ordinary with the heroic generates irony and wit while at the same time drawing on an archetypal level of experience comparable to that which the Swiss psychoanalyst > Carl Jung located in a collective unconscious. The symbolist aspiration to imitate musical form is evident in the use of repeated words, phrases and images as forms of leitmotif. The novel encountered virulent opposition at the time of publication, being banned in England until 1936 on grounds of obscenity. Its acceptance into the canon of major works of English literature, together with the successful defence of D. H. Lawrence's > Lady Chatterley's Lover at a 1960 obscenity trial, signalled the public endorsement of the principle that all areas of human experience could be valid subjects for the serious artist. It is in part for its combination of mundane details with a vast inclusiveness of reference that Ulysses is valued so highly.

The realist tradition: Bennett, Galsworthy, Wells

Despite the genuinely innovative and radical nature of modernist fiction, we should be wary of too schematic an opposition between modernists and traditionalists. We are inheritors of a distinction made by writers such as Woolf and Lawrence in order to define their artistic identity and literary programme. As Frank Kermode has pointed out, modernist programmes have the habit of claiming that they have to 'get out from under something', and Arnold Bennett, John Galsworthy and H. G. Wells were cast in the role of that 'something'. Wells himself participated in this process in his wellknown comment in a letter to Henry James (8 July 1915): 'To you literature like painting is an end, to me literature is a means, it has a use . . . I had rather be called a journalist than an artist.' Nevertheless, there are some affinities between the realists and the modernists in terms of influences and subject matter: Bennett was influenced by French and Russian novelists, and Wells, in his scientific romances, shows a strong sense of the apocalyptic and of the impact of war and technology on twentiethcentury society. These writers are also part of important continuities in English fiction. Wells' emphasis on ideas is continued by > Aldous Huxley (1894-1963) and George Orwell (1903-50) in the 1930s and 40s, while Bennett's regional settings in the Potteries district connect him with the regional realists of the 1950s. Wells, in works such as The War of the Worlds (1898) and The First Men in the Moon (1901), was also a pioneer of science fiction, one of the most fruitful of the popular genres in the twentieth-century novel.

Bennett's best work, such as The Old Wives' Tale (1908) and Riceyman Steps (1923), contains telling studies of ordinary lives, with a strong sense of the rich detail of society, and of the passing of time. The limitations of his style include a liability to give information too directly, to 'telling' rather than 'showing'. Like Bennett, Galsworthy was extremely popular and successful during his lifetime, with works such as > The Forsyte Saga (1906–21) which are primarily concerned with upper-class society. The most general criticism of his work is that his satire is often lacking in focus and rigour. Wells was an extremely versatile writer of fiction and journalism; his fiction included Dickensian social comedy such as The History of Mr Polly (1910) and studies of contemporary social issues such as Ann Veronica (1909), as well as his science fiction or scientific romances. George Orwell, who considered Wells' thinking to be outmoded by the 1940s, nevertheless asserted of his own generation that 'the minds of us all, and therefore the physical world, would be perceptibly different if Wells had never existed'.

1920s satire: Lewis, Huxley and Waugh

Alongside the modernist experimentation of the 1920s a vein of tragi-comic satire emerged in the English novel in the work of Aldous Huxley, > Wyndham Lewis (1882-1957) and > Evelyn Waugh (1903-66). These authors shared a sense of the absurdity of modern society, and one form which this takes in their novels is that of dehumanization and the dissolution of the self. Wyndham Lewis, an artist, philosopher and editor as well as a novelist, was a leading spirit of Vorticism, an anti-realist movement in art, based on jagged, rhythmical, mechanistic forms. Such principles are also reflected in the portrayal of character in Lewis' novels, such as Tarr (1918); he described men as comic because they were 'things, or physical bodies, behaving as persons'. Aldous Huxley's Crome Yellow (1921) is primarily a novel of ideas, similar in form to the novels of > Thomas Love Peacock (1785-1866), in which characters carry on debates in the setting of a country house. It is based on a somewhat schematic antithesis between men of thought and men of action. The protagonist, Dennis Stone, an example of the former who wants to be the latter, is a characteristic satirical anti-hero of the period, weak and ineffectual, but both types are portrayed as inadequate. The hero of Evelyn Waugh's first novel, Decline and Fall (1928), is described as a shadow; passively enduring a series of outrageous injustices and misfortunes, he ends up precisely where he started. The book describes itself as 'an account of the mysterious disappearance of Paul Pennyfeather'. Paul's adventures, however, bring him up against a large number of eccentrics, so that his shadowiness only serves to emphasize the egregious personalities which surround him.

These works contain images of the modern world as manic, mechanized and incomprehensible; they are essentially about the problem of how to live in a society which seems meaningless. The stance of the implied author (the author as manifest in the text) varies: Huxley tends to include some equivalent for himself in the novel, thereby making his own intellectual approach part of the object of his satire; Waugh is detached and invisible; Lewis is outraged, polemical and assertive. Drawing on the tradition of such European writers as Voltaire, > Gogol and > Swift, they represent a powerful alternative vision of the modern condition.

PART II - 1930 to 1950

In the 1930s and 40s political events were felt in English prose writing with a particular directness. The impact of the First World War and the associated social changes on the modernist novel tended to take place primarily at the level of the author's general world view, and to filter through into the content of the novel transformed by some principle of artistic shaping. From around 1930, however, there arose in many writers a sense that historical events were of such overwhelming importance in their implications for society that they demanded forms of writing which would attempt to represent, with as much immediacy as possible, the feel of contemporary experience, while also explicitly taking sides in a political or moral debate. In general terms, then, the period was one in which social or documentary realism reasserted itself; that form of realism which is concerned with an outward fidelity to the experience of the mass of individuals and an engagement with public issues. Such a generalization is, however, necessarily an oversimplification. Individual authors continued or commenced their literary careers, responding in a variety of ways to their own experiences, influences and interests as well as to the temper of the times. New works by Joyce and Woolf were still appearing during the early part of the period; Woolf's last novel was > Between The Acts (1941) while Joyce's final work, > Finnegans Wake, was published in 1939. > Ivy Compton-Burnett (1884–1969), whose first novel had appeared as early as 1911, elaborated further her vision of power, pain and obsession in wealthy families of late Victorian and early Edwardian England, rendered almost entirely through dialogue. Evelyn Waugh's novels of the 1930s, including the hilarious Scoop (1938), continued and developed the satirical vein begun with Decline and Fall. > Elizabeth Bowen (1899-1973), in novels such as The Heat of the Day (1949) and short stories such as 'Mysterious Kôr' (from The Demon Lover, 1945), combined an evocation of the atmosphere of wartime London with a Jamesian attention to the nuances of personal relations. > Samuel Beckett's unique exploration of man as an isolated being confronting existential despair began with his first novel, Murphy, in 1938, which had been preceded by a collection of Joycean stories, More Pricks than Kicks (1934).

Politics, social change and war: Orwell and Gibbon

In the public sphere the 1930s were dominated by two factors. The first was the economic depression which, from the collapse of the Wall Street Stock Market in 1929, began to cause widespread unemployment and poverty. The second was the rise of ▷ fascism in Europe: Hitler seized power in Germany in 1933; in Italy Mussolini had ruled since 1922; in 1932 Sir Oswald Mosley founded the British Union of Fascists. The most coherent ideological response to both these developments came from the left wing, so that during the 1930s a considerable number of British writers and intellectuals became socialists or communists. The Left Book Club, founded in 1936, provided a focus for this tendency. It is primarily from a left-wing perspective that modernism has been rejected or criticized, both in the 1930s and since. George Orwell, a socialist, though a very independent one, described the 1920s as 'a period of irresponsibility such as the world has never before seen'. Georg Lukács, the Hungarian Marxist critic (▷ Marx, Karl), writing in 1955 from a more dogmatic perspective, attacked modernism on the grounds that it treated man as a solitary and asocial being, thus denying the reality of history.

Orwell's own writings seek to bring home to readers the human consequences of the economic and political situation: the soul-destroying nature of poverty in Down and Out in London and Paris (1933) and The Road to Wigan Pier (1937), the miseries of war and the distortions of the press in Homage to Catalonia (1938) and the oppressions of British imperialism in Burmese Days (1934). The first three of these works blend reportage and autobiography with an element of the fictional, and in each many facts are given, ranging from the minute details of daily life in the trenches of the Spanish Civil War to the income and itemized expenditure of a Yorkshire miner in 1935. This might be seen as a return to the 'materialism' which Woolf objected to in the work of Galsworthy and Bennett, but it gains new force both from Orwell's passionate indignation, and from his imaginative realization of the influence of material conditions on human consciousness and society. However, his individualism and his sometimes sentimental portrayal of the working classes have been criticized by socialist thinkers such as > Raymond Williams.

Orwell's novel Coming Up For Air was published in 1939, on the eve of World War II, in the same year as a work by another writer of left-wing views, ▶ Christopher Isherwood's Goodbye to Berlin. In each there is a powerful sense of foreboding, of European civilization slipping into violence and chaos. The contrast of narrative techniques illustrates the range of 1030s realism. Goodbye to Berlin is a series of linked short episodes set in the decadent atmosphere of Berlin during the Nazi rise to power. The detached quality of the first-person narrator is defined on the first page: 'I am a camera with its shutter open, quite passive, recording, not thinking'; he says relatively little of his own feelings as he moves among a cast of largely manipulative, destructive or self-destructive characters. The narrator's very passivity and neutrality of stance come to epitomize the failure of the European mind to confront the rise of fascism. Orwell's narrator is George Bowling, a disillusioned insurance salesman approaching middle age who returns to the village of his childhood in an attempt to recapture something of what now seems to him to have been an idyllic Edwardian age. He is an egregiously personal dramatized narrator, who addresses the reader throughout in a conversational tone, masking a highly skilful rhetoric which persuades us to share his vision of an England of petty, narrow lives, a civilization of rubbish dumps and synthetic food, a people with fascist violence hanging over them, 'so terrified of the future that we're jumping straight into it like a rabbit diving down a boa constrictor's throat'. George's anticipation of 'the coloured shirts, the barbed wire, the rubber truncheons' looks forward to Orwell's post-war vision of totalitarianism 1984 (1949) and his political allegory Animal Farm (1945).

These post-war works reflect a general disillusionment with communism, resulting from the revelation of the Stalinist show trials, and the Nazi-Soviet pact of 1941. But during the 1930s many writers and intellectuals had become Marxists, and a considerable number fought for the Republicans in the Spanish Civil War. Many novels of the 1930s reflect this commitment, including > Rex Warner's allegory The Wild Goose Chase (1937), and Edward Upward's Journey to the Border (1938). Both these novels have propagandist Marxist conclusions; in Journey to the Border the protagonist's hallucinations and fantasies are associated with a decadent society, and at the end of the novel he decides to regain reality by joining the workers' movement. Thus by the end of the 1930s 'reality' has become for many a politically defined concept, a matter of class commitment rather than of the nuances of consciousness. The experience of working-class life is perhaps most powerfully expressed in the work of writers who grew up in working-class regional communities, such as Walter Greenwood who, in Love on the Dole (1933), uses dialect to convey social cohesion and social deprivation in northern England.

One of the major works of Scottish fiction during this period shares a number of the features of English writing of the 30s: a left-wing political perspective, a sense of the harsh injustices and conflicts arising from the class system, and a concern with the processes of social change, in particular the fragmentation of communities in the face of modernity and war. However, > Lewis Grassic Gibbon's trilogy of novels A Scots Quair (1932-34) is historical in setting, dealing with the period before, during and after the First World War, though it also makes an initial excursion into the early history of north-east Scotland. Written largely in Scots, a language closely related to, though distinct from, English (> Scottish literature in English), A Scots Quair combines a focus on the life of a female protagonist, Chris Guthrie, with portraits of changing rural and urban Scottish communities. The use of communal voices is a particularly original feature of the trilogy, though these are interspersed with passages focalised on Chris Guthrie which express a rich and sensitively evoked inner life. Another significant work of Scottish fiction is Neil M. Gunn's The Silver Darlings (1941), which looks further back in history, beginning with the Highland Clearances of the early nineteenth century and charting, in fictionalised form, the development of the communities involved in the herring industry of northern Scotland. Like Gibbon, Gunn reveals the life of a community through an individual and vice versa.

The inner and outer worlds: Greene and Lowry

The dangers of oversimplification inherent in an antithesis between a modernist concentration on the individual inner world, and a politically committed attention to social relations becomes evident when we consider the work of Graham Greene (1904–91). His early work of the 1930s, such as It's a Battlefield (1934) and Brighton Rock (1938) has a sense of the oppressive squalor of areas of modern urban life, a sense which is later translated into the more exotic settings of late colonialism; visions of seediness and corruption in such settings as Africa (The Heart of the Matter; 1948), Vietnam (The Quiet American; 1955) and South America (The Honorary Consul; 1973). He had a long-standing, if moderate, left-wing commitment, evident not only in his novels, with their critique of the Western role in the Third World, but also in his active friendship and support for those resisting the right-wing dictatorships of Central America, recounted in his memoir Getting to Know the General (1984). Yet characters such as the whisky priest of The Power and the Glory (1940) confront their moral choices in a condition of existential isolation and Greene himself associated his use of journeys (he was an inveterate traveller) with the methods of psychoanalysis (▷ psychoanalytical criticism); in the introduction to Journey Without Maps (1936) he explains that he sought to give general significance to his travels in Liberia by using 'memories, dreams and word-associations' to suggest a parallel, inner journey. From the time of Brighton Rock his ▷ Catholicism became more apparent. Though he did not regard himself as a 'Catholic novelist', his work is informed by a powerful sense of good and evil, and of the sinfulness of human nature, combined with a somewhat determinist tragic irony. In these respects, as well as in his use of extreme situations which test human morality and endurance, he has links to Conrad and Dostoevsky as precursors, and to the post-war English novelist William Golding (b 1911) as a successor. Many of Greene's novels are narrated in the third person in a detached, unemotive style which serves to highlight violence, tragedy, the sordid and the grotesque. This style has affinities with American writers of the 1920s such as Ernest Hemingway and John Dos Passos.

> Malcolm Lowry's Under the Volcano (1947), like Greene's best work, endows a tragic story of human failure with metaphysical overtones. Set in Mexico, where the presence of fascist elements anticipates the approaching world war, the story of the alcoholic British Consul Geoffrey Firmin achieves a wide resonance by means of symbol, an intricate metaphorical structure and a stream of consciousness technique in which the beautiful but sinister Mexican landscape becomes an equivalent for inner turmoil. This novel belongs to the high modernist tradition in its formal experimentation and literary allusiveness, as well as in its somewhat Laurentian apocalyptic vision of political and cultural crisis. D. H. Lawrence had also previously engaged with a revolutionary Mexico in his much earlier novel The Plumed Serpent (1923), in his short stories, and in his travel essays, Mornings in Mexico. In Under the Volcano, however, Firmin's story is associated with that of Doctor Faustus, who sold his soul to the devil, while Mexico is presented as an archetype both of paradise and of hell. Firmin's inebriation, self-destructiveness and guilt are attributed to contemporary civilization as a whole. The novel, intended as part of a trilogy which was never completed, owes much to Joyce's Ulysses in its shifts of consciousness, its concentration on one day, with extended flashbacks, and its intricate, allusive structure.

The complex interplay of modernist experiment and the impulse towards social realism and political commitment was to contribute to a remarkable diversity of modes in fiction of the post-war era.

PART III - 1950 to the present

There has been a tendency among critics to see the post-war English novel as lacking in power and scope compared to the great age of modernism, and essays on the subject frequently begin by acknowledging the lack of either a great genius of the novelist's art or a single dominant movement with techniques and themes which are felt as central to contemporary culture. Gilbert Phelps, for example, in his essay 'The Post-War English Novel' (New Pelican Guide to English Literature, 1983), asserts that 'the trend of the English novel since the war has, on the whole, been . . . a turning aside from the mainstream of European literature and a tendency to retreat into parochialism and defeatism' and from time to time articles appear in the book pages of national newspapers, lamenting the state of the novel or predicting its demise. Several points need to be made about such views. There is the obvious but important fact that both literary achievement and cultural significance are more readily detected in retrospect. Furthermore, contemporary critical theory has made us increasingly aware that this retrospective detecting involves an element of construction. A sense of literary history, of the significance of particular works and authors, and of the existence of a canon of recognized major or serious works is necessarily a matter of a subjective, value-loaded and culturally specific process of consensus. This is not to say that such judgements are arbitrary, but only that they represent a characteristically human activity of creating patterns of meaning, of ordering and valuing cultural productions according to certain sets of values and assumptions. Post-colonial and feminist critics have questioned many of the assumptions by which the canon has been established, while theorists of post-modernism have claimed that late twentiethcentury Western culture is marked by the displacement of value-laden hierarchies in favour of multiplicity, and the simultaneous availability of many forms, including imitation and pastiche of those of the past. It could therefore be argued that the diversity of contemporary fiction, by encouraging the reader to select from a huge range of available modes and styles, itself characterizes the prevailing Zeitgeist more effectively than could any dominant individual or group. The modernist claim to centrality depended, as we have seen, on a doctrine of experimentation and radical newness, according to which changes in novel technique accompanied changes in the nature of human experience. Works such as Joyce's Finnegans Wake (1939) pushed innovation along modernist lines close to the point where the coherence of the novel as a genre seemed in doubt. We have observed one form of reaction against modernism in the politically committed writings of the 1930s. Experimentation did not die out, but it increasingly came to seem one option among many, rather than an essential expression of the times. Furthermore, the shock to the idea of Western civilization administered by the Second World War, the death camps and the atomic bomb rendered the very idea of cultural centrality a dubious one. On the other hand, fictionality itself seemed an increasingly appropriate focus of attention in a culture where clear standards of truth and significance were felt to be elusive.

The awareness of fictionality

Samuel Beckett continued the Joycean line of experimentation, combining a fascination with words with an acute awareness of their limitations, and with a rich vein of parody, irony, imitation and pastiche. His vision is, however, a darker one, although humour is an essential aspect of it. In his trilogy of the 1950s, Molloy (1956), Malone Dies (1956) and The Unnamable (1959), isolated, aged and decrepit social outcasts of obscure identity narrate their own stories with a mixture of black humour and remorseless grimness. They are aware of themselves as story-tellers, making reference to the futility of this activity, yet continuing with the story in order to pass the time, as an act of defiance, or as an obsessive compulsion. As in Beckett's plays, there is a progressive minimalism, in which life is reduced to language, mundane and sordid physical details and the isolated human consciousness. In this respect his novels represent the ultimate breakdown of the classic realist novel, in which character is portrayed in a rich social context. In drawing attention to their own fictionality, and in playing games with language (including the game of teasing the critics by laying false clues) Beckett's narrators anticipate the contemporary fascination with the idea of fiction and of narration. This kind of metafiction is widely regarded as an aspect of > post-modernism, although such concerns are not, of course, the prerogative of the twentieth century, being prominent in, for example, > Laurence Sterne's > Tristram Shandy (1759-67) and Cervantes' > Don Quixote (1605-15). However, the current interest in this area reflects structuralist and > post-structuralist scepticism about the ability of language to refer to a non-linguistic reality, and the sense that fictionality is an attribute of forms of discourse other than fiction, such as history and the social sciences. This has generated an increasing interest in narrative as a model for the structuring both of culture and of individual experience. Indeed, the philosopher of post-modernism > Jean-Francois Lyotard argues for an abandonment of 'grand narratives' of history in favour of a multiplicity of small-scale narratives, while the pragmatist philosopher Richard Rorty has argued that the telling of stories is more effective than an appeal to reason as a way of overcoming prejudice and hatred.

A widespread form of self-awareness in post-modernist fiction is what the critic Linda Hutcheon terms historiographic metafiction: novels which 'are both intensely self-reflexive and yet paradoxically also lay claim to historical events and personages'. Contemporary novelists who explore this model include John Fowles (b 1926), whose book The French Lieutenant's Woman (1969) combines a pastiche of a Victorian novel with passages of social history and statistics about Victorian sexual habits. The author addresses the reader, discussing his own techniques and the reader's likely response, and later, appearing as a minor character, decides to abrogate his authorial power over his characters by providing two alternative endings, even going to the length of tossing a coin to decide their order. The effect is that of an intriguing, if scarcely subtle, consideration of issues of free will, determinism, power and meaning. Elements of fantasy and science-fiction are also prominent in the post-modern novel, further unsettling the boundaries of truth and fiction, text and reality. Doris Lessing's sequence of novels Canopus in Argus: Archives (1979-83) creates mythic narratives which are also moral allegories and which place the planet Earth and its people in a larger context of imaginary worlds. As the subtitle 'Archives' suggests, textuality is foregrounded: for example The Marriages of Zones Three, Four and Five (1980) is a fable about the complimentarity of the sexes, narrated by a Chronicler who, alongside his own narration, alludes to the traditional representation of the story among his people, thus drawing attention to the shaping of the shared discourses of a culture.

Alastair Gray, perhaps the most post-modernist of contemporary Scottish novelists in terms of technique, is an artist as well as a writer, and illustrates his own books, which combine fantasy, metafiction, typographical and graphic effects with satirical, ironic and humorous treatment of contemporary Scottish society and its history. His best-known work, Lanark, has elements of > magic realism in its combination of settings: the story of the eponymous hero (who has named himself after an area of Scotland) is partly set in Glasgow and partly in the grim and fantastical city of Unthank, a sort of Scottish urban version of hell, where the sun never shines. The novel thus combines a realist > bildungsroman about the frustrated and embittered youth of an aspiring artist with an account of his after-death experience which is placed somewhere between science-fiction, fantasy, Swiftian political satire (> Jonathan Swift) and a post-modern rewriting of > Dante's Inferno. The quirky, playful flavour of Gray's interweaving of the 'real', the textual and the imaginary is perhaps suggested by a road sign encountered by two characters crossing an 'intercalendrical zone' and which is reproduced, in a manner recalling Tristram Shandy, on a page of Chapter 33: it shows a left turn to New Cumbernauld (Cumbernauld is a real place near Glasgow; it is a 'new town', though not called 'New') and straight on for the imaginary cities of Imber and Unthank, via Chapter 37. The metafictional element becomes more obvious towards the end of the book, where the protagonist encounters the author, and we are provided with a hilarious 'index of plagiarisms', listing Gray's many allusions and borrowings.

Jeanette Winterson began her novel-writing career with a comparable mix of realism and fantasy, in the very popular Oranges are Not the Only Fruit (1985): a semi-autobiographical bildungsroman about a girl, brought up in a close-knit religious community in the north of England, who is rejected by that community because she is a lesbian. The story of her childhood and youth is interspersed with parodic fairy tales which parallel and comment on her experiences. These sections of the book could be naturalised as the fantasies of the protagonist, but Winterson's later work moved decisively away from realism: in novels such as Sexing the Cherry (1989). Here fantasy and magic dominate to the extent that we might see the novel as creating an alternative world, a view which would accord with the critic Brian McHale's conception of post-modernist fiction as 'ontological' (concerned with multiple worlds) where modernist fiction had been 'epistemological' (concerned with ways of knowing the world). There are elements of 'real' history in Winterson's novel, but with its fantastical, Gothic, carnivalesque, farcical juggling with time and place, gender and identity, it defies categorization as much as it defies summary, although showing clearly the influence of > Angela Carter.

Playing games with history and fiction can of course be dangerous and controversial, since the past is so crucial to our personal and collective identities, to political and ideological programmes and to ideas of justice, justification and retribution. Within the discourses of both history and fiction it has been the Holocaust which has most acutely focused these concerns. ▷ D.M. Thomas' novels, The White Hotel (1981) and Pictures at an Exhibition (1993), both appropriate documentary records of the appalling sufferings of Jews and others under the Nazis in order to construct narratives that blend historical events, literary allusions, erotic fantasies and pseudo-Freudian theories. Many readers have found this offensive, and while theoretical expositions in terms of post-modernist and post-structuralist conceptions are readily available to support Thomas' procedures, it is not clear that these adequately deal with the ethics of voyeuristic aestheticization of violence and suffering. Another novel which has engaged with the perception of the Holocaust is Time's Arrow (1991) by Martin Amis. Rather than allusion, intertextuality, parody, self-interpretation and the other common devices of post-modernist fiction, this novel uses the single device of describing a world which resembles ours except that time flows backward. Inverting rather than subverting the traditional structures of cause and effect, person and responsibility which make ethical judgements possible, it presents a mirror-image of human life which has moral force as well as imaginative power.

A rather different testing of the limits and nature of fiction is apparent in > B. S. Johnson's 1969 novel, The Unfortunates, which has twenty-seven loose-leaf sections of which twenty-five may be read in any order, the randomness of the resulting structure serving as a metaphor for the circling and shifting of the mind. Johnson saw 'truth' and 'fiction' as antithetical terms, and his last work, See the Old Lady Decently (1975), employs documents and photographs in an attempt to create a non-fictional novel. This aspiration is paralleled in the documentary style of Alan Burns (b 1929), some of whose novels are structured around news items or press-cuttings. A number of novelists have developed the modernist interest in multiple and unstable perspectives. These include Doris Lessing, and also > Lawrence Durrell (1912-90), who, in his sequence The Alexandria Quartet (1957-60) portrays an intricate series of relationships in a community by means of a diversity of narratives, including third-person and firstperson narratives, letters, journals and parts of an inset novel by a character. The reader's understanding of both character and event is subject to revision in the light of new information and perspectives, creating a work that has been described as 'a game of mirrors'.

In a sense, experimental novels are particularly dependent upon the traditional qualities of a good novel, such as plot interest and imaginative power in the realization of social context. In the absence of such qualities the reader is unlikely to overcome the difficulties of coming to terms with an unfamiliar form. A novelist who combines imaginative power with a wittily expressed examination of the nature of the fictional is > Dan Jacobson (b 1929). The Rape of Tamar (1970) is set in the time of the Old Testament King David, and narrated by Yonadab, who is intensely aware of the philosophical and moral dilemmas of his role as narrator. He has knowledge of our own time as well as that of the story, and shares with us his reflections on the resulting ironies. Thus the act of narrating is a source of interest throughout, generating insights into such issues as hypocrisy, self-deception, voyeurism, the function of art, the pleasures and vicissitudes of speaking, and the culturally specific nature of modes of interpretation. But these sophisticated intellectual concerns are matched and sustained by a powerful poetic evocation of the physical and cultural context, and above all by the sheer vitality of Yonadab's personality as he addresses us with engaging frankness in what he terms 'the simulacrum of time in which you and I have managed to meet'. Self-conscious narrative, which by various means draws attention to its own fictionality, serves to question the nature of reality, and of our understanding of it, and to highlight issues of freedom and control. It has therefore held a strong appeal for writers influenced by French > existentialist thought, including > Christine Brooke-Rose (b 1926) and > David Caute (b 1936). In the post-modernist anti-novel, practised by writers such as > Gabriel Josipovici (b 1940), structures based around repeated scenes or interwoven narratives create a radical uncertainty, and the world evoked by the text disintegrates in order to fulfil the author's aim of, in his own words, 'insisting that his book is a book and not the world' (from The World and the Book, a Study of Modern Fiction; 1971).

Morality and art

A feature of the work of several considerable post-war novelists is a renewed attempt to present a vision of the world as a battleground of forces of good and evil. William Golding has had outstanding success in the construction of moral fables, shaped by Christian archetypes of sin, guilt, purgation and the tentative but precious hope of redemption. His novels, of which the first was > Lord of the Flies (1954), show a powerful interest in the primitive and the physical, particularly in the examination of extreme conditions or states of consciousness in which human experience is stripped to moral and physical essentials. This description does not, however, do justice to the range of his settings and techniques. The Inheritors (1955) attempts to realize the mind and culture of Neanderthal man. This relatively idyllic and innocent culture is used to make us see our own nature (as represented by the arrival of homo sapiens) in a new and largely unflattering light. The Spire (1964) renders the tormented consciousness of a fanatical medieval cleric, while Rites of Passage (1980) uses pastiche and the ironies arising from a self-confident but mistaken narrator to portray the moral awakening of a gentleman traveller in the early nineteenth century. The limitation of Golding's work is its explicitness. The thrust of his moral vision and his mythic patterning can sometimes seem overbearing, though many readers will feel that this is a small price to pay for its power and authority.

In contrast to Golding's historical and cultural range, most of the novels of > Iris Murdoch (b 1919) are set in contemporary English middle-class society, but are informed by a range of philosophical concerns centring on moral responsibility, individual freedom, the nature of love, and the possibility of actively pursuing goodness. They combine a serious, and at times tragic, exploration of these concerns with exciting plots, and elements of the comic, supernatural, and fantastic. These features have been sustained through a prolific career since the appearance of her first novel Under the Net in 1954. Doubts about her work focus on a sense that characters are excessively manipulated in the interest of illustrating abstract ideas, and a dissatisfaction with her use of violence and accident as a plot device. Of her early novels, The Bell (1958) is notable for its complex symbolic structure. The moral significance of the lives of a group of characters, brought together in a rather bizarre religious community, is examined by a pattern of interaction centred around the symbol of a convent bell, but using also animal and water symbolism. The Sea, The Sea (1078), a Booker Prize-winner, and one of the most acclaimed of her works, is a typically dark comedy about obsession, guilt and egotism, but is remarkable for the richness of its symbols and characters. > A. S. Byatt (b 1936) shows the influence of Murdoch in her use of symbolic structures and her portrayal of the inter-relations of a large group of central characters. The latter feature is particularly evident in the opening books of a projected tetralogy: The Virgin in the Garden (1979) and Still Life (1985). Moral concerns are evident, but less explicit than in Murdoch's work, more attention being given to correspondences between experience and mythic or aesthetic patterns, and to the process of cultural change. Byatt's most popular work to date, the Booker Prize-winning Possession, is a cleverly interwoven pastiche of Victorian poetry, the lives of its writers, and the lives of a network of twentieth-century literary critics. The inter-relations of characters are thus wittily carried out across time, as the lives of Victorian poets intersect with those of their modern readers. The process, in Possession, whereby discovery of the past is crucial to the development of character and the reshaping of relationships in the present is paralleled in ⊳ Alan Hollinghurst's The Swimming Pool Library (1988). Here a young aristocrat, part of the gay scene in London in the early 1980s, is commissioned to write a biography. In so doing he discovers the involvement of his own grandfather in the persecution of gay men, a discovery which arouses in him a new sense of defiance and political commitment in the present. As in Possession, literary allusions (in this instance to writers such as Oscar Wilde and E. M. Forster) and the excitement of detective work are important elements in a gripping narrative. Byatt has returned to the Victorian period in the double narrative of Angels and Insects (1992).

In the work of ➤ Muriel Spark (b 1918), manipulation is less a risk for the author than an explicit theme and, as in Ford Madox Ford's The Good Soldier (1915), the manipulative aspects of the narrating activity are exploited as a source of irony in the rendering of patterns of social and psychological control. Thus in the novella The Driver's Seat (1970) the use of the present tense, and an entirely external focalization on one character (the narrative recounting events from her point of view, but with almost no revelation of her feelings, thoughts or intentions) creates a grim and enigmatic vision of a woman with a psychological compulsion and a violent destiny which seem fixed and unchangeable, yet not understood either by author or reader. In The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie (1961) humour is more in evidence, but dark shadows of fascism and personal betrayal, evoked particularly through prolepses (jumps forward to later events), lurk around the story of a teacher's charismatic influence on a group of pupils. Spark's Catholic sensibility emerges in her portrayal of diabolic figures, such as the charming, egregiously manipulative Dougal Douglas of The Ballad of Peckham Rye (1960).

While Spark is a convert to Catholicism, > Anthony Burgess (b 1917) has a Catholic background, and though not a practising member of the Church, acknowledges the importance of Catholic modes of thought in his work. A Clockwork Orange (1962) is concerned with the relation of evil and free will. The protagonist makes a deliberate choice of a life of horrifying violence and sadistic cruelty, and attempts by a futuristic authoritarian society to reform him by brainwashing can only destroy his human identity. The novel is notable for its use of an invented teenage patois, Nadsat, reflecting Burgess's enthusiasm for Joycean linguistic multiplicity and invention. Burgess has stated that he sees the duality of good and evil as the ultimate reality, and in Earthly Powers (1980) the history of the twentieth century is portrayed in terms of such a moral struggle, seen through the memories of the narrator, a homosexual writer. As in Murdoch's work, a strong sense of moral patterning underlies and unifies a complexity of events. In the novels of > Margaret Drabble (b 1939) moral concern is focused on social justice and the individual quest for identity, particularly on the part of women. Works such as The Ice Age (1977) reflect her admiration for Arnold Bennett in their realist portrayal of the state of contemporary British society.

Feminist writing

The question of what constitutes 'feminist' writing is a contentious issue, but what is certain is that novels concerned with women's experience represent a significant section of the contemporary fiction market, and make rich use of innovations in narrative technique and of a range of styles and genres. An important divide among feminist critics is between those, such as Elaine Showalter, who see the role of contemporary female writing as that of self-discovery, articulating the nature of women's personal experience within society and revealing structures of oppression, and those such as Toril Moi, who advocate rather the deconstruction of the idea of the unitary self, and the rejection of the male/female dichotomy in favour of some ideal of androgyny.

The project of articulating women's experience includes the rediscovery of the unrecorded or what has been omitted from the conventional histories and novels. Thus > Eva Figes (b 1932), in The Seven Ages (1986), writes a fictional chronicle of the lives of seven generations of women, from pre-history up to the present, concentrating on their struggles with poverty and violence, and their experience of childbirth and child-rearing. An associative, free-floating narrative style suggests a collective female consciousness, transcending the individual self and linking women to natural forces of generation. > Zoe Fairbairns' Stand We At Last (1983) also recounts the lives of successive generations of women, though with closer attention to the detailed historical context, while the Manawaka series of novels and stories by the Canadian writer > Margaret Laurence (1926-87) are narrated by women of various ages and generations in such a way as to explore simultaneously the social history of Canada and the dilemmas and achievements of women in the context of a prairie town. > Jean Rhys (1894-1979), in Wide Sargasso Sea (1966), writes a feminist complement to > Charlotte Brontë's > Jane Eyre, recounting the early life of the 'mad' first Mrs Rochester, from her childhood in the West Indies. Rhys gives consciousness to the character who, in the original novel, is an inarticulate symbolic location for a rejected violence of feeling. Madness is a recurrent theme of feminist writing, because, considered as a refusal to conform to an imposed social identity, it can become a potent symbol of revolt against oppression. Doris Lessing (b 1919) does not see herself as primarily a feminist writer, but her novel The Golden Notebook (1962) has become an important feminist text. It is built out of a skeleton narrative, entitled 'Free Women', plus four notebooks kept by Anna, one of the characters of 'Free Women'. This fragmentation reflects her fear of breakdown as she confronts political, literary and sexual problems as an independent woman, but in the fifth and final 'Golden Notebook' a new unity is achieved through a mental breakdown shared with a man, during which the collapse of divisions leads to 'formlessness with the end of fragmentation'. The Scottish novelist, Janice Galloway, uses interior monologue, dramatic dialogue and typographical effects to explore the mind of a woman suffering disturbance and alienation in The Trick is to Keep Breathing (1989). Her most recent novel, Foreign Parts (1995), explores a theme which is less dramatic than madness or breakdown but no less important to the feminist project of articulating the range of woman's experience: female friendship. This deceptively understated story about two women friends travelling together in France moves between the representation of thoughts or inner experience and more realist passages and gradually accumulates considerable power through its exploration of the subtle modulations of their relationship.

A number of writers, without adopting an overtly feminist standpoint, attend particularly to women's experience of isolation, betrayal, loss or guilt within the limitations imposed on their lives by social convention or male attitudes and behaviour. They include > Edna O'Brien (b 1932), whose popular and entertaining novels are concerned particularly with the vicissitudes of sexuality and passion, and > Anita Brookner (b 1928), who portrays the disillusionment of her sensitive female characters with an elegant, detached attention to the nuances of human relationships. In one sense these writers are the opposite of feminist, since their work could be held to accept as a premise the view that women seek self-fulfilment largely through relations with men. Yet in representing the tragedy or frustration which may result from such dependence, their novels raise crucial feminist issues, and are part of the context for the debate about the fictional portrayal of women.

> Fay Weldon (b 1931) recounts the lives of her women characters with a sort of desperate black humour. In works such as Down Among the Women (1971) and Praxis (1978), a constant shifting of relationships and roles suggests a terrifying instability of identity; both men and women move between the role of victim and victimizer, but the women are consistently the more disadvantaged, both socially and biologically. Both novels end by suggesting that a new breed of emancipated woman is emerging, but offer little convincing evidence for this hope, and Weldon's work has gradually tended towards disillusion, with an element of biological determinism. Women's sexuality, and sexual politics, have been central feminist concerns. In contrast to Weldon's cynical realism, Angela Carter (1940-92) approached these issues through fantasy, myth and symbol, reworking elements of fairytale in the stories of The Bloody Chamber (1979), and in her novel Nights at the Circus (1984) using post-modernist techniques: the disruption of narrative consistency and the blending of fiction and history. Carter's short story 'Black Venus' rewrites a piece of literary history from a feminist perspective, imaginatively exploring the life and thoughts of a Caribbean woman who became muse and mistress to the French poet Baudelaire. Through black humour and physicality the narrative resists the commodifying, voyeuristic and exoticising gaze of the male literary master. In a comparable way in ⊳ Emma Tennant's Tess, fantasy and dream can serve as forms of experience emancipated from rational modes of thought which are seen as essentially male, and Tennant's The Bad Sister (1978) employs a split between realist and fantasy modes to develop this opposition, while > Sara Maitland's Three Times Table (1990) explores the lives of three women in a mode which seems predominantly realist but which can find room for dragons in a London park. Radical perspectives on sexual relations are also a feature of the work of ➤ Maureen Duffy (b 1933), who explores particularly working-class and lesbian experience, and of novels by members of the Feminist Writers Group who share socialist as well as feminist commitment: including Sara Maitland and Michèle Roberts (both of whom are interested in the relations of religion and female sexuality) and Michelene Wandor, who co-wrote with Maitland Arky Types (1987), a post-modernist ➤ epistolary novel.

Realism, satire, social comedy

There is a continuing strain in the English novel which is concerned with the analysis of contemporary English culture by means of satire, humour, or irony, primarily within realistic modes. The satirical strain building on the earlier work of writers such as Waugh and Huxley, includes ▷ Angus Wilson (1913–91), whose novel, Anglo-Saxon Attitudes (1956), set in the late 1940s, is a portrait of academic and London life and the egotism and self-deception of a range of characters. These concerns, however, take on a broader historical and social resonance because of the novel's examination of the effect of the past on the present via the troubled personal life of an historian and the confusion arising out of an historical fraud committed in 1912. The Old Men at the Zoo (1961) continues the vein of satirical analysis, but moves into fantasy and allegory in its bizarre tale of the administration of the London Zoo during another war. Wilson is also a writer of short stories, which combine a sharp satirical edge with a considerable emotional charge in their exposure of cruelty, snobbishness and pretension.

During the 1950s a group of writers emerged whose work combined a realist portrayal of provincial communities with a strong sense of social injustice. Some of these writers became known by the label > 'angry young men'; they include > Alan Sillitoe (b 1928), > Stan Barstow (b 1928), > John Wain (b 1925), > John Braine (b 1922) and > David Storey (b 1933), and in their early novels the heroes are working-class, or in revolt against the demands of a middle-class background. Novels such as John Braine's Room at the Top (1957), John Wain's Hurry on Down (1953), Stan Barstow's A Kind of Loving (1960) and Alan Sillitoe's Saturday Night and Sunday Morning (1958) seemed to epitomize a post-war sense of futility, discontent and rebellion. Their subsequent careers have developed in various ways, as, for example, towards narrative innovation in the case of Storey, or to a reaction against radicalism in the case of Braine. They were brought up outside London, coming in most cases from working-class backgrounds, and their work continued the tradition of working-class regional writing found earlier in the novels of Walter Greenwood and Lewis Grassic Gibbon.

Of those originally seen as 'angry young men', it is perhaps > Kingsley Amis (b 1922) who has most successfully sustained his popular appeal over the succeeding decades. Unlike Angus Wilson, who, influenced by Virginia Woolf, used a range of interior monologues in his sixth novel No Laughing Matter (1967), Amis eschews modernist experiment, though working with a number of sub-genres, such as the ghost-story (The Green Man; 1969) and the fantasy of an alternative world (The Alteration; 1976). His novels are characterised by sharp wit, inventiveness, and a considerable animus against whatever Amis sees as bogus or blameworthy. Lucky Jim (1954), his very entertaining first novel, inaugurated the genre of the humorous campus novel, since developed by Malcolm Bradbury (b 1932) in Stepping Westward (1965) and The History Man (1975), and > David Lodge (b 1935) in Changing Places (1975) and Small World (1984). Amis specializes in dislikeable characters, with objectionable attitudes, such as the xenophobia of the protagonists of I Like It Here (1958) and One Fat Englishman (1963), or the misogyny of Stanley in Stanley and the Women (1984). While these attitudes are subjected to a degree of satirical censure, they are not altogether repudiated. Amis' position is now a conservative one, marked by a distrust of the cosmopolitan and the experimental.

The influence of Jane Austen is apparent in the work of > Barbara Pym (1913–80), which enjoyed a revival in the late 1970s, and consists of subtle and ironical studies of middle-class life, combining a shrewd humour with an uncompromising sense of the commonness of frustration, isolation and ennui. The delicacy of her work might be contrasted with the satirical shock-tactics of Martin Amis (b 1949) who employs black humour to portray human fears, obsessions and desires. Surprisingly, Amis (who is Kingsley Amis' son) claims to be influenced by Jane Austen too; he shares with Pym the use of humour of some sort to reveal human weakness, but they stand at opposite ends of a spectrum stretching from gentle irony to vigorous satire.

In London Fields (1989) Amis draws on modernist techniques: a Joycean linguistic richness, including London slang and the ambiguous moral consequences of a narrative which is focalised on characters about whose attitudes, feelings and behaviour the reader may feel doubt or even distaste. Comparable effects are achieved by > James Kelman and > Irvine Welsh, two Scottish writers who exemplify a strong movement in contemporary Scottish fiction towards powerful, grim but often humorous portrayals of the harsh and violent conditions of working-class urban life in Glasgow and Edinburgh. Welsh's Trainspotting introduces a wide range of characters linked by the hard drugs culture of Edinburgh. Using various focal characters and first-person narrators it draws the reader into a lifestyle which is both repulsive and compelling: illuminated by moments of compassion and humour and above all by the energy and vitality of language, the novel nevertheless conveys powerfully a sense of destructive waste. At times Welsh seems to be setting out to subvert the touristboard image of Scotland, as in a chapter entitled 'The First Day of the Edinburgh Festival', which culminates with a character fishing around for opium suppositaries in a blocked toilet in a Muirhouse betting shop. Another target would seem to be the myth and/or reality of the Scottish 'hard man'. This myth appears in potent form in the work of > William McIlvanney, notably in his novel Docherty, which portrays a Scottish mining community before and after the First World War. The central character, Tam Docherty is an heroic figure: a working class man, small in stature but of great strength, who seeks to retain his emotional and intellectual integrity and independence. He defends his family, his friends and his honourable principles with words and with force. Fistfights are a central feature of the novel and Tam's strength and skill in fighting are crucial to his character. The novel is a moving elegy for hopes and convictions largely destroyed by the war and by modern capitalism and in that sense continues elements of the work of > Grassic Gibbon. Yet McIlvanney might be accused of sentimentalising violence and the cult of the macho male. In Trainspotting Frank Begbie embodies all the worst features of this cult: totally selfish, randomly and wantonly brutal and an exploiter of all around him, his nickname 'Franco' hints at the fascist nature of male power; only a glimpse of his alcoholic father gives any hint of a redeeming explanation for his character. Welsh's critique of male power is developed in Marabou Stork Nightmares which centres on a brutal gang rape. As well as sequences of fantasy the novel uses internal monologue, and has this in common with Kelman's How Late it was, How Late (1994), which takes the form of an extended internal monologue by a Glasgow man who has become blind after being arrested when drunk. Kelman's rambling but gripping narrative focuses on the man's process of adjustment to his situation, on his battles with bureaucracy and officialdom and on class antagonism. The book is memorable for its rich verbal texture, with hints of black comedy and the surreal.

Multiculturalism and 'the New Internationalism'

This essay started by referring to the cross-fertilization of cultures as essential to the modernist movement at the beginning of the century. Since that time Britain's political and cultural relations with the rest of the world have changed radically. The British Empire has ended; two world wars have brought enormous social changes; technological developments have transformed the world economic system, and therefore the manner in which cultural artefacts are circulated. The diversity and plurality which have been noted as aspects of post-modern society have a particular value insofar as they promote an attention to the radical otherness of different cultures. There is thus a new, post-modern form of cross-fertilization taking place. The novel in English is now a world-wide form, with many of the finest new works of fiction emerging from post-colonial societies (> post-colonial writing). At the same time, the increasingly multi-cultural nature of British society as a result of immigration to Britain from former colonies since the 1950s, has prompted much fictional concern with issues of cultural identity within Britain.

Some of the contours of the theme of multicultural society and individual identity may be indicated by a comparison of three writers whose age and biography situate them differently in relation to it: > Samuel Selvon, > Joan Riley and > Hanif Kureishi. Selvon, born and brought up in Trinidad, where he worked as a journalist, came to London in the 1950s, a period of large-scale immigration from the Caribbean to Britain. In a series of comic and satirical novels centred on a character called Moses, Selvon explored through the use of humour the personal, political and cultural development of a black community in London: these include The Lonely Londoners (1956), The Housing Lark (1965) and Moses Ascending (1975). In Moses Ascending Selvon's protagonist, long settled in London, aspires to middle-class respectability and the status of a home-owner. This brings him into conflict with his friends in the radical Black Power movement but also provides Selvon with an opportunity for a hilarious example of 'writing black': the technique of subversion through parody of the ideology encoded in literary classics, in this case Robinson Crusoe. Moses takes on the role of patronising Crusoe to a white Englishman called Bob, who comes from the 'black country' (an area of the West Midlands of England) and becomes Moses' domestic help and 'Man Friday'. Many racist stereotypes are invoked and inverted: for example Moses reflects on how white people are dirty, while an American character thinks that 'these English are animals'. Selvon keeps us guessing as to where he stands on the issue of 'respectable' integration versus radical action, because both sides of the debate are seen in comic terms.

In contrast, Joan Riley's The Unbelonging (1985) is a harrowing and tragic story of Hyacinth, a Jamaican girl sent to London to live with a father she does not know. She suffers sexual abuse, cruelty, racism and rejection and at the end of the novel tries to return to her lost childhood Eden of Jamaica, only to find that she has become a 'foreigner' there too: she has lost one identity without really gaining another, and ends in a state of 'unbelonging'. Riley, who was born in Jamaica in 1958 and attended university in Britain, belongs to a later generation than Selvon and presents with particular force the double bind of racism and gender oppression: abused by her black father, Hyacinth initially finds little help in Britain, because of perceived and actual hostility or incomprehension from teachers and social workers.

This theme has also been powerfully explored by ▷ Buchi Emecheta, who came to Britain from Nigeria to join her husband in 1962, in her novel Gwendolen (1989). Other writers who, like Selvon, made the journey from the Caribbean to Britain as part of the large-scale immigration of the 1950s have recorded this cultural displacement and its consequences: they include ▷ V. S. Naipaul in The Enigma of Arrival (1987) and ▷ George Lamming in The Emigrants.

Hanif Kureishi was born and brought up in Kent and The Buddha of Suburbia addresses multiculturalism from its first sentences: 'My name is Karim Amir, and I am an Englishman born and bred, almost. I am often considered to be a funny kind of Englishman, a new breed as it were, having emerged from two old histories'. While the novel is not post-modernist in style, since it employs a realist mode, it represents powerfully and comically post-modern ideas of hybridity and fluidity of identity. Karim's sexuality is as ambiguous as his cultural identity and, while the novel has a sharp satirical edge, it also celebrates freedoms and transformations of the self, in its portrayal of the worlds of rock music, punk, fashion, new age mysticism, political activism and fringe theatre in seventies London. Identity as role-play is prominent: Karim gets on in the theatre by acting Indian parts (despite being brought up in the London suburbs); his father, a civil servant, adopts the persona of an eastern mystic. Acting, which becomes Karim's career, is in some ways an ideal metaphor for post-modern identity, because it is anti-essentialist: life as a series of roles formed by the intersection of discourses which name or interpellate (> interpellation) the individual.

A thematics of identity is combined with post-modern techniques of > magical realism and by historiographical metafiction in Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children (1981). Saleem Sinai, the protagonist and narrator of the novel, is one of 1001 children endowed with magical powers because they are born at the precise moment of India's independence in 1947. With witty and extravagant detail, the novel weaves together Saleem's life with the history of India and Pakistan as the personal and the public are subsumed in the rich instability of the narrative. Real historical events are included, but others are omitted or misplaced; Saleem admits to twisting history to suit his narrative while his listener or narratee, Padma, seeks unsuccessfully to drag him back from the digressions of oral narrative to the linear sequence of the realist novel. Rushdie is part of what Bruce King has termed 'the new internationalism' in British literature: novelists who 'write about their native lands or immigrant experience from within the mainstream of British literature' ('The New Internationalism', in The British and Irish Novel Since 1960, ed. James Acheson). King identifies, apart from Rushdie, > Shiva Naipaul, > Buchi Emecheta, > Timothy Mo and > Kazuo Ishiguro, representing a wide range of cultural influences: Naipaul, like his brother > V. S. Naipaul, writing as an Indian brought up in Trinidad; Emecheta from Nigeria; Mo, born in Hong Kong of a Chinese father and English mother and educated in Britain and Ishiguro, born in Japan but brought to Britain when he was 6. Ishiguro's first two novels, A Pale View of Hills (1982) and An Artist of the Floating World (1986) looked back to Japan after the Second World War, exploring personal and cultural conflicts in a subtle and understated style. The Remains of the Day (1989) carried over some of the same concerns to an English setting. It tells the story of a butler in a great English country house before and after the Second World War, gradually revealing how his habitual restraint, propriety and rigid adherence to his duty as he sees it have starved his life of warmth and feeling, so that he lost the chance of a relationship with a woman who came to the house as housekeeper and condemned himself to emotional isolation. Simultaneously a political narrative unfolds: the prewar master of the house was an English aristocrat who advocated appeasement of the Nazis and was disgraced when war broke out. Connections are made between the seemingly benevolent, paternalistic English aristocrat and the ruthless and supercilious Nazi leaders he entertains. The interweaving of the two stories, of the master and the butler, suggests with great subtlety how the class-based servility of the butler might have links with the passivity in the face of authority which allows fascism to develop.

Ishiguro's ability to bring a fresh perspective, informed by his interest in Japanese culture, to the study of the very English world of the country house, with its aristocracy and servants, might serve as an epitome of the way in which internationalism and multiculturalism have been rejuvenating forces, in intellectual, political and imaginative terms, within the contemporary novel in Britain. The debate which followed the publication of Salman Rushdie's novel > The Satanic Verses, and the denunciations and death-threats which the book evoked from some elements of Muslim society, demonstrated graphically the complexity of the issues raised by multiculturalism. Yet, whatever the ideological conflicts, much contemporary fiction which grapples with the multicultural nature of contemporary Britain can be seen as striving, against powerful repressive and reactionary forces, to promote understanding, openness and tolerance.

Conclusion

The field of contemporary fiction is large and expanding. This essay attempts to provide an introduction to twentieth-century fiction by examining some perspectives on the major work of the first half of the century, and by suggesting something of the range and variety of writing since 1950, in the hope that the reader will be encouraged to explore further. Traditional features of the novel, such as satire, the pleasure of narrative, the excitement of plot and the rendering of moral distinctions still find new and original exponents. Narrative experiment and the awareness of fictionality provide powerful means for exploring the particular philosophical preoccupations of our age, while genres such as science fiction, ▶ horror and the fantasy novel offer popular alternative modes of writing. At the same time both the language and the techniques of the novel are successfully adapted to various and changing cultures. The diversity of the contemporary novel in English is a sign of the vitality of the form and of the continuing ability of fiction to engage at many levels with both intellectual issues and cultural processes.

Drama in the Twentieth Century

Trevor R. Griffiths

A Tale of Two Traditions

For most of the nineteenth century, theatre in Britain was neither socially respectable nor intellectually challenging - but it was immensely popular. Melodrama, music hall, farce, and spectacular Shakespeare attracted a mass audience and fulfilled some of the social functions that were later to be the preserve of cinema and television. Although increasingly mimetically realistic settings had been developed throughout the century, in both contemporary and period stagings, the vast majority of theatrical entertainment was broadly escapist in both form and content. Although the old view that nineteenth century theatre flourished while drama languished is far too sweeping, relatively little nineteenth century drama has survived the immediate occasion of its creation. By the end of the century, theatre managers were engaged in a sustained effort to bring back the middle classes to the theatre, choosing to rely on a smaller but more moneyed audience at the expense of the popular audience of the earlier period. Paradoxically, this drive towards respectability led to both a deadly theatre of social affirmation and, because there were serious minded social reformers among the middle classes, to the beginnings of a theatre of dissent. This tradition of dissent has remained a significant factor in theatre throughout the twentieth century, making a major impact in the period immediately before the First World War under the aegis of > Shaw and > Granville Barker and in the drama of the period since 1956.

George Bernard Shaw's championing of his somewhat idiosyncratic version of Ibsen in The Quintessence of Ibsenism (1891) and in his own dramatic practice, together with Granville Barker's seasons at the > (Royal) Court Theatre (1904-7), were significant factors in creating an interrogative and oppositional form of theatre, associated politically and artistically with a broadly Fabian radicalism. It is precisely the drama that belongs to this tradition of intellectual and formal dissent which traditionally forms the focus of such studies as this. However, this theatre appealed only to a small class fraction who welcomed the intellectual and social challenge to prevailing norms associated with what we might now call fringe ventures. While this strand never completely died away, surfacing in many different forms over the next fifty years, it was to re-emerge most potently from the mid fifties, in a new apparently radical theatre, again centred on the Royal Court, and again associated with discontent with prevailing conditions, epitomised in the eponymous Anger of > Osborne's > Look Back in Anger (1956). This is the drama of Shaw and Granville Barker in the early years of the century, and of > Arnold Wesker, > Howard Brenton, > Caryl Churchill, and ▶ Trevor Griffiths in the last forty years.

The drama which is valued for its 'literary' qualities is, however, largely a minority product that caters for specialised tastes in a limited number of theatres. Although the nineteenth century mass audience for melodrama, farce and the music hall has melted away, the appeal of spectacular musical comedy, farce and comedy of manners, of a theatre inherently concerned with affirmation and social consolidation has remained a major factor in the theatrical repertory throughout the century. British drama has been painfully slow to react to European developments in theatrical and dramaturgical practice such as > Naturalism, > Expressionism, and > Epic Theatre. Mainstream theatre, the theatres in the West End of London and their counterparts throughout the country, has remained dominated by the staples of light comedy and farce, genteel melodrama in the form of the thriller, and the musical. Although the incidentals of this type of theatre may change over the years, with, for example, greater linguistic frankness about sexual matters, the use of (mainly female) nudity, and the exploitation of ever more spectacular machinery in the musicals which have dominated British theatre in the eighties, its basic strategies remain those of reinforcing its audience's self esteem by not challenging its preconceptions about the social status quo from which it benefits.

Sometimes, as in the work of > Somerset Maugham, > Noel Coward, > Terence Rattigan, > Joe Orton, and > Alan Ayckbourn, popular success (at least with middle class audiences) has accompanied theatrical invention and/or social criticism. At its best, as in a work like Ayckbourn's Woman in Mind (1985), this type of theatre can breach the cosy circle of self congratulation by an indirect assault on the values and assumptions of its audience, administering a shock to the audience in terms which Shaw would certainly have understood. Over the century, however, the commercial imperatives of the West End have more often resulted in bland creations aimed at 'pure entertainment' or a 'good night out' in which making an audience feel good about themselves has predominated over any possibility of challenging settled assumptions.

Discussions of twentieth century drama tend to concentrate on those new plays written between the 1890s and the time of writing, and this is no exception, but it is also important to bear in mind that theatre is much more than the sum of the plays written in a certain period, since it is the most social of arts, depending on not only the writer and the printer but actors, designers, directors, theatre buildings and the whole paraphernalia of theatre. Moreover the theatre sustains itself not just on new writing, but on the selected classics of the past, so that a new play may be sharing a theatrical season with Shakespeare, Greek tragedy, musicals and Molière. Analysing only those plays written within a particular period inevitably falsifies the sense of a theatrical repertory as it appeared to the theatregoers of the period. In London in early 1995, for example, a playgoer might have attended The Mousestrap, a new translation of The Women of Troy, Stoppard's > Arcadia, a Macbeth played by an all woman cast of five, Fever Pitch, a one man play about being a football fan, and Goldoni's Venetian Twins. In concentrating on new plays we must remember that this is only one aspect of the theatrical repertory.

Shaw and his Influence

By the beginning of the twentieth century, the work of a variety of small scale independent ventures had introduced London in particular to the work of such writers as Ibsen, Eugene Brieux and Gerhart Hauptmann. Serious drama was heavily influenced by the idea of the problem play, often centred on the figure of 'the woman with a past'. This reflected contemporary debates about the position of women which were to gain in strength as the campaign for women's suffrage became a major political issue in the time before the First World War period. Because of the double standard of sexual morality, it was possible to focus concern with 'the woman question' on the issue of sexual morality and the old melodramatic formula of 'the woman with a past' could be used by both conservative and radical dramatist to explore issues beyond the immediate plot line. > Oscar Wilde, > Henry Arthur Jones, and > Arthur Wing Pinero all exploited the formula but the wages of 'sin' for the transgressive women usually remained madness, death, or social ostracism. Shaw was, then, being particularly daring in Mrs Warren's Profession (printed 1898, but not licensed for public performance until 1925), in allowing his (high class) brothel keeper to continue to reap the benefits of her trade, even if no-one actually says what her profession is – it is written down.

Shaw was a conscious iconoclast and his talent for publicity and his longevity meant that he dominated the British theatre for much of the first half of the century. Although his advocacy did much to establish Ibsen and Naturalistic dramaturgy in the British theatre in the face of hostile, even hysterical, reactions to such plays as Ghosts, his own dramatic practice was eclectic and he did not favour Naturalistic methods in his own writing. Instead, he tended to use existing forms parasitically, as Trojan horses to smuggle his controversially socialist ideas into the minds of his audience. This can be a very effective strategy, but it also has its dangers since the form has a capacity for biting back and diluting the radical message, as practitioners as diverse as T. S. Eliot, with his mid-century attempts to use drawing room drama to convey Christian messages, and > Trevor Griffiths, with his 1970s attempts to use television genres to convey oppositional approaches, have found. In Shaw's case, > Arms and the Man (1894), for example, now looks suspiciously like the Ruritarian military comedy whose form it adopts. Similarly, the success of My Fair Lady (1955), the musical version of \triangleright Pygmalion (1913), is a fair indication of how readily the would-be radical can be subsumed, since it gives the play the happy ending that Shaw wriggles desperately not to give it in the final few minutes. Like the contemporary playwright ➤ David Hare, Shaw often uses female protagonists but like Hare he often has difficulty in producing them as viable motors for the dramatic action of the play. For such a prolific dramatist, Shaw was remarkably sceptical about the dramatic form and his tendency to leave the business of the play unfinished on stage, completing it in prose or in a preface, may be read either as a condemnation of contemporary theatrical practices or as a condemnation of his own dramaturgy. Man and Superman (1905), for example, is in some ways a fairly straightforward role reversal woman gets her man comedy, but it is blessed with a more or less self contained (and sometimes independently staged) central section 'Don Juan in Hell' which explicates the philosophy which underpins the rest of the play. Stage the play without 'Don Juan' and you miss out the philosophy; stage it with that section and the play becomes longer than many audiences will be willing to sit through. Like > Howard Barker, a much later practitioner of assaults on the audience's attention span and stamina, Shaw would claim to be honouring his audience by trusting them to make the mental effort required to appreciate what he is doing.

Shaw was championed by the actor-director-dramatist-Shakespearian scholar-translator, and campaigner for a national theatre Harley Granville Barker whose decision to virtually remove himself from active theatre work after the First World War may well have changed the history of British drama for the worse. In his seasons at the Royal Court in 1904–7 Barker ran a proto-national theatre with contemporary translations of Euripides alongside work by the new dramatists: Shaw, Barker himself, > Elizabeth Robins, and > John Galsworthy amongst them. Barker's own plays have been overshadowed by Shaw's and by his work as a Shakespearian scholar and director, but recent productions have shown that they combine trenchant social critiques with an innovative approach to dramaturgy, operating within broadly naturalistic conventions but refusing the kinds of easy closure that can be so limiting in some versions of that form. Galsworthy, in contrast, tended to adopt a rigorous, sometimes over-schematic, naturalistic form, concentrating on a particular social issue and treating it with almost photographic realism to the extent that he contrived one of the few examples of a play that actually changed legislation, as opposed to summing up or changing a public mood: in Justice (1909) the presentation of a prisoner in solitary confinement apparently persuaded the then Home Secretary, Winston Churchill, to change the law. Elizabeth Robins, a powerful actress and champion of > Ibsen, also wrote Votes for Women (1907), notable for its staging of a Trafalgar Square demonstration in favour of women's suffrage where the protagonists' personal concerns intersect with their public staging in the meeting. Although the pro-suffrage plays of such groups as the Actresses' Franchise League made little direct impact on the established theatre of the times, their work was a very effective early example of what would come to be called agitprop theatre. As well as monologues suited to political meetings and the music hall, anticipating the stand up comics of alternative comedy, the AFL often used such farce techniques as showing a world turned upside down by the application of supposedly logical (patriarchal) principles, but the AFL plays have outlived their immediate context and a play such as Inex Bensusan's The Apple, which is about sexual harassment in the workplace and about a father favouring his son over his daughters, remains a powerful example of its kind.

Irish, Scottish, Welsh, and Regional Theatre

The social and artistic radicalism of the period helped to plant the seeds of a national theatre in Ireland and of vigorous regional theatres in England and Scotland. In Ireland Annie Horniman's tea fortune helped to fund the creation of what became the Abbey Theatre Dublin. > W. B. Yeats and Lady Gregory played a major part in establishing the theatre, but their work, like J. M. Synge's, tended to draw on the past, the mythological, and the rural. Encouraged by Yeats, Synge developed a dramatic idiom inspired by the Irish peasantry. In his master piece, > The Playboy of the Western World (1907), he uses elements drawn from Irish, Greek, and Christian tradition to explore the difference between 'a gallous story and a dirty deed'. Christy Mahon, the playboy, wanders into a village whose inhabitants lionise him on the strength of him being a parricide but his father's arrival and apparent second death turns them against him. While the play is broadly comic with Christy emerging into a stronger new identity, the renewed isolation of Pegeen Mike, his new-found beloved, abandoned because she turned against him has a tragic penumbra which casts a shadow over the ending. While Synge's attempts to forge a new Irish English dramatic vernacular based on rural peasant speech, drew on the folk movement which was busily engaged in rediscovering (or reinventing) traditional culture across Europe, Yeats took his inspiration both from the Irish legends and from his understanding of the then fashionable Noh theatre to create chamber works of great poetic intensity aimed increasingly at an elite aristocratic audience. As a manager of the Abbey Yeats initially encouraged > Sean O'Casey who found his inspiration in the urban poor and in contemporary history. Although Yeats's rejection of O'Casey's The Silver Tassie(1928) led him to pursue a career outside Ireland, his best known works are the three plays which form the loosely grouped Dublin Trilogy: The Shadow of a Gunman (1923), Juno and the Paycock (1924) and The Plough and the Stars (1926). In these evocative tragi-comedies he develops a highly flexible dramatic mode in which quasi-naturalistic narrative is heavily inflected through the ironic counterpoint of music and songs, the use of stereotypical characters, and an inventive use of stage iconography into a version of epic theatre ideally suited to explore the birth traumas of an independent Ireland. O'Casey's self-exile marks the beginnings of a divorce between British and Irish drama, although, inevitably, relations between the two islands continue to be a significant factor in Irish drama which are memorably explored in the work of such contemporary writers as Brian Friel, Tom Murphy, Christina Reid, and Ann Devlin.

A dispute about the English funding of an Irish theatre led Annie Horniman to switch her support to Manchester, where she helped to sustain a lively regional tradition drawing on the local vernacular. The so-called Manchester School included such works as Stanley Houghton's Hindle Wakes (1912) and Harold Brighouse's Hobson's Choice (1915), works which like their metropolitan counterparts show independent women choosing not to accept the constraints of traditional female roles: Houghton's young mill girl refuses to marry the mill owner's son who has 'ruined' her by taking her away for a dirty weekend, Brighouse's Maggie chooses her husband in the face of parental opposition from her drunken patriarchal father.

Theatre in Britain has largely been dominated by London, with regional theatres tending to be treated as nurseries for future metropolitan stars, but ventures likes Annie Horniman's in Manchester helped to create a strong independent regional repertory movement, which has withstood many vicissitudes and contributed significantly to the theatrical life of the whole country. > Alan Ayckbourn is director of the theatre in Scarborough, > John Godber operates from Hull, and > Willy Russell and ▶ Alan Bleasdale are products of Liverpool. Scotland has been caught uneasily between the independent Irish model and the English regional model: for much of the century infrastructural problems limited opportunities for Scottish writers in Scotland so that, on the one hand, the talented Joe Corrie wrote mainly short plays for amateur companies and, on the other, > J. M. Barrie does not have a distinctively Scottish voice. In recent years, stimulated partly by the very existence of the Edinburgh Festival, there has been a significant growth in Scottish theatre and writers such as ▶ Liz Lochhead have been able to develop a British reputation without losing their Scottish voice. Unfortunately the same has yet to be true for Welsh drama, which continues to be dominated by the working-class boy made good stereotype of Emlyn Williams and Richard Burton, and the poetic excess of Dylan Thomas' Under Milk Wood (radio, 1954).

After the First World War

O'Casey's dispute with Yeats owed a great deal to Yeats' unhappiness with the Expressionist-influenced second act of The Silver Tassie in which O'Casey resorted to stylisation and liturgical parody in order to try to convey some of the horror of the First World War. Such attempts to deal directly with the soldier's experience of war were relatively rare, and tended to appear some time after the war. R. C. Sherriff's Journey's End, the definitive trench warfare play, for example was staged in 1928. Conversely, the immediate post-war period saw a brief rebirth of an image-clogged verse drama from such justly forgotten writers as James Elroy Flecker and Gordon Bottomley, in which the formal qualities of verse seem to have been used as an escapist defence against the chaos of war. Similarly, J. M. Barrie's wistful whimsical tinkering with the supernatural, in Mary Rose (1920) may be seen as another way of coping with the aftermath of mass destruction. Towards the end of his theatrical career, Somerset Maugham, whose reputation rests largely on high comedies of manners, also applied his incisive ironic stance to the waste of human potential associated with the First World War in the bitter but much misunderstood For Services Rendered (1932).

Social Comedy and Farce between the Wars

Most characteristic of the period, apart from the continued attraction of musical comedy and farce, was Noel Coward's brittle social drama of hedonistic nihilism. Although Coward now tends to be remembered largely as a performer and a writer of boulevard comedies this does not do justice to his original reputation or to savage and bleak insights that characterise his early comedies. Coward secured his early reputation as what was not then called an angry young man with The Vortex (1924) in which family pieties are savaged in a melange of adultery, dope taking and piano playing. There is a desperate quality about the social whirl of Coward's early plays that encapsulates the post-war loss of old certainties, in contrast to Ben Travers' technically effective developments of traditional farce at the Aldwych Theatre, where the restoration of order after mistakes and misunderstanding promises a safer world than Coward's. The characters, plots, wit and construction of his comedies place Coward securely in the line of the English tradition of a comedy of manners dealing with the sexual and other morals of a leisured social elite. In Private Lives (1930), his protagonists are a divorced couple whose renewed attraction to one another when they meet on their second honeymoons refuels their decision to flout social convention and their new marriage partners by running away together. The action of course reflects changes in social and legal structures, but the decision to choose self gratification in the face of social strictures also reflects a pragmatic post-war hedonism. Coward was a master of subtext, of revealing the unspoken beneath a patina of almost phatic dialogue, so that a line like 'very flat, Norfolk', can reveal the underlying sexual attraction of the protagonists in Private Lives. Coward's homosexuality, like Wilde's and Orton's, may have been a significant factor in enabling him to produce an analysis of the mask of polite society since, as Wilde found out to his cost, society allowed homosexuals only a very limited freedom and they transgressed at their peril.

T. S. Eliot and Verse Drama

Dramatic verse in Britain had been labouring under the negative influence of Shakespeare for some 300 years, unable to break away from the powerful but imperfectly understood verse of the Renaissance dramatist, but equally unable to create an effective modern dramatic verse as the efforts of successive generations of poets, including Flecker and Bottomley, had showed. Although > Naturalism had offered one way out of this dilemma by relocating the power of poetry in the theatre rather than in dramatic language, a trend which > Expressionism and other post-war artistic movements furthered, experiments with dramatic verse continued to draw on both the Shakespearian and post-Romantic imitations of Shakespeare as their models. More promising initially were the experiments of T. S. Eliot. In the fragments of Sweeney Agonistes (1926) Eliot had found a form, inflected through Expressionism and the rhythms of Jazz, that could have constituted a decisive break with the orotund vacuousness of post-Romantic imitations of Shakespeare, and which is highly reminiscent in tone of the early > Pinter. However, Eliot's growing religious convictions steered him into the religious pageant The Rock (1934) and then into the historical recreation of Murder in the Cathedral (1935) where the Canterbury cathedral setting and the medieval subject both made verse seem particularly appropriate. Eliot then tried to reach a mass audience by effecting a marriage between the conventional murder mystery of the West End and the sustaining power of Greek myth. A Family Reunion (1939) contains some of his best dramatic verse but the attempt to retell the Orestes story as a drawing room drama in verse finally defeats him. Although the Cocktail Party (1949) has its defenders, the subsequent pattern in Eliot's plays is one of the gradual attenuation of the verse until it is scarcely possible to detect it in the late An Elder Statesman (1958) which looks all too anachronistic when compared to the contemporary work of ▷ Samuel Beckett, ▷ Harold Pinter, ▷ John Arden and even ▷ John Osborne. Where Eliot failed to go, ▷ W. H. Auden and ▷ Christopher Isherwood took up the cudgels with their verse plays inspired at some remove by their contacts with Expressionism and the early work of Piscator and Brecht, but their work was largely confined to what we would now call 'fringe' venues.

Dramatists of the Thirties and Forties

Neither technical innovation nor dramaturgical invention marked the majority of the mainstream output of the interwar years, though there were some relatively minor changes in subject matter in response to the First World War and there were some experiments with non-naturalistic approaches. In the thirties > J. B. Priestley developed an interesting combination of socialist ideas and a dramatisation of alternative theories of time that marked a departure from some established norms. Although Priestley was to develop a convincing persona as the bluff realistic Northern conscience sent to castigate the effete south, his plays are thoughtful explorations of responsibility and causality, perhaps stretching contemporary audiences in some directions but always conscious of the probable limits of their elasticity. He used J. W. Dunne's and P. D. Ouspensky's fashionable alternative theories of time in such plays as Time and the Conways (1937), exploiting the gap between characters' aspirations and their outcomes to great ironic effect. Even when he did not use these theories of time overtly, he sometimes used historical settings to examine the origins of present events. In An Inspector Calls (1945), for example, he draws on some of the traditional apparatus of the detective thriller, a commercial staple in the hands of practitioners such as Edgar Wallace and Agatha Christie, to demand that its audience take social responsibility for each other in ways that its characters will not. Written during the Second World War, the play is set in the supposedly prelapsarian Edwardian period that is revealed both as a sham in itself and as the moment of origin of attitudes of social carelessness which have precipitated the war itself. Later generations of socialist writers would find themselves exploring precisely the period of the composition of this play in terms of their own search for the origins of their contemporary socio-political situation.

> Terence Rattigan, like Priestley, found some inspiration in the Edwardian period, in The Winslow Boy (1946), a dramatisation of a famous Edwardian court case. Whereas Priestley was an overtly didactic socialist writer, Rattigan made his initial impact with French Without Tears (1936), a light comedy of sexual awakening amidst funny foreigners. He was to develop into a craftsman of muted English understatement and the quiet desperations of middle class angst. Because of his concern not to offend the mythical 'Aunt Edna' whom he saw as a key element in his audience his reputation fell foul of the fifties generation, but his sympathetic treatment of a string of failed communicators and thwarted and ineffectual would be lovers (perhaps displacing his own homosexual torment onto more acceptable heterosexual targets) has led to a recent positive re-evaluation of his work.

The immediate post-war period saw little in the way of dramatic innovation: John Whiting, the most acclaimed writer of the period, never found a distinctive voice and Peter Ustinov, who was regarded at one point as a potential major dramatist, pursued other career paths. > Christopher Fry's image- and colour-saturated verse offered a brief alternative to the drabness of post-war austerity but the British theatre remained dominated by attenuated society comedy of the 'anyone for tennis?' school with, as Kenneth Tynan, the key theatre critic of the period, remarked the heroic substitution of Berkshire for Loamshire in the cause of realism. Probably the most significant development was the creation of the Arts Council, a continuation of the state's wartime involvement in funding the arts, which was to change the funding base of theatre and make it possible in due course for the spread of experimental work that was unlikely to be commercially viable.

Beckett, Osborne, Brecht

In the mid fifties three decisive events helped to reinvigorate the British theatre. First, chronologically, was the 1955 British premier of ▷ Samuel Beckett's ▷ Waiting for Godot a play written originally in French by an expatriate Irishman that served to remind its audience of the basics of theatricality by engaging and entertaining them while, famously, nothing happened, twice. Then came the opening of ⊳ John Osborne's > Look Back in Anger in May 1956; third was the first visit to Britain of the Berliner Ensemble later in 1956, which introduced British audiences to Brecht's own company. While the excitement and controversy generated by Osborne's play may have encouraged a new generation of writers to look to the theatre, Beckett and Brecht probably had a greater long term effect on British dramaturgy. They both insisted, albeit from very different viewpoints, that the stage was a stage, opening up the possibilities of a non-naturalistic stage and effectively challenging the fourth wall conventions of ⊳ Naturalism in ways which would liberate the imaginations of dramatists whether or not they shared the original authors' beliefs. In 1955 Godot seemed to be as minimal as theatre could be, but Beckett continued to test the frontiers of theatricality with works that pared plot, character, speech, and even the body itself to ever more attenuated depths. A typical example of this later work is Not I (1972) in which the protagonist is reduced to a mouth, isolated in time and space, compulsively filling a void with words designed to stave off self knowledge, while a virtually invisible 'Auditor' offers minimal gestures of help.

At the time the most controversial event was the première of Osborne's play, even if it was as Osborne himself remarked 'a rather formal old fashioned play'. Its setting, a one room flat in the Midlands with not a French window in sight, and its subject matter, a kind of sub-Strindbergian danse fatale for a male protagonist and what increasingly look like the dramatist's wish fulfilment fantasies in the guise of two unlikely women and a male friend, struck both friends and opponents as some kind of departure from accepted norms. The play, and its reception, suggested that theatre might now engage with a wider social spectrum, both in its topics and in the audiences it addressed, than it had previously. This new wave of dramatic writing was often referred to under the umbrella headings of 'kitchen sink' (in contradiction of French windows) and Angry Young Men. And at this stage they were almost exclusively young men.

Osborne's play was staged by the English Stage Company at the Royal Court, a theatre which resumed its earlier role as the home of new plays, a role it has continued to the present day, Osborne's energy and anger were initially mistaken for a form of socialism, but his forte turned out to be tortured heroes out of joint with their situations. His capacity for creating self-lacerating protagonists achieved its finest match between form and subject matter in Inadmissible Evidence (1964), where the protagonist's incipient nervous breakdown is reflected in the nightmarish population of the play where all clients merge into one and the stage picture becomes an embodiment of his hallucinatory isolation.

Brecht and Osborne each encouraged a sense of the theatre as an important public forum in ways that had not been the case since the early 1900s. It is some measure of how quickly the theatre changed that > Arnold Wesker's largely autobiographical trilogy (Chicken Soup with Barley, 1958, Roots, 1959, and I'm Talking About Jerusalem, 1960) achieved wide critical acclaim at the turn of the decade since it is set amongst East End Jewish socialists and Suffolk labourers, living in council flats and tied cottages and using their own vernaculars. Roots, offers an image of a woman learning to think for herself as Beattie Bryant emancipates herself both from the deadly roots of her upbringing and from her socialist boyfriend, which many critics have found straightforwardly emancipatory, though the insights of feminism have undoubtedly complicated our understanding of the portrait.

While Osborne and Wesker began writing within broadly naturalistic boundaries, Harold Pinter's series of what became called 'comedies of menace', in which mysterious characters and unexplained events combine to unsettle the spectator with a sense of a half grasped reality which remains elusively inscrutable, were initially greeted with almost complete critical incomprehension. Pinter, like Osborne, was an actor, and where Osborne always seems to be writing leading parts for himself, Pinter seems a much more Prufrockian writer, always offering a vision of life as it might seem to an attendant lord with a minor part, always at the periphery of half understood events. His earlier writing in particular seems like the quasi-naturalism of the thriller without its characteristic closure and disclosure. Although Pinter was seen as the least political of his immediate contemporaries because he did not deal with overtly political events, his interest in the structures of power and of patriarchy was fundamentally political and it was no real surprise when he began to explore more narrowly political issues in his later writings. Perhaps the most obviously 'political' dramatist to emerge in the late fifties was John Arden, who shares both Brecht's desire for a theatre of political engagement and his non-naturalistic approach to dramaturgy. However, despite the appearance of Serjeant Musgrave's Dance (1959) on some school syllabuses, the British theatre has never been particularly comfortable with Arden's spare, ballad-like writing: the plays have never attracted particularly large audiences; his overtly political subject matter has sometimes led to censorship difficulties, and he has not worked in British theatre since a dispute with the ➤ Royal Shakespeare Company over their staging of The Island of the Mighty in 1972. He has now found himself a more secure niche writing for radio with his partner Margaretta d'Arcy.

Theatre Workshop and the Epic Theatre

Doan Littlewood and Theatre Workshop played an important part in helping to demolish the old facades of British theatre by insisting on an approach to play making which, like Brecht's, was anti-naturalistic. Littlewood had been active in theatre since the 1930s with work derived from the traditions of the Workers Theatre Movement. The WTM had been far more theatrically and theoretically sophisticated than most professional theatre in Britain, gleaning an understanding of epic practices long before they reached the mainstream theatre as a result of its contacts with Workers' Theatres in other countries. Theatre Workshop was committed to ensemble production styles, to the reintegration of the writer into the theatrical process, and to the use of popular forms to engage the audience directly. In the late fifties, Littlewood developed Brendan Behan's The Ouare Fellow (1954) and The Hostage (1958) and ➤ Shelagh Delaney's A Taste of Honey (1958) into major works, through improvisation with the company. Theatre Workshop's commitment to ensemble playing and a permanent company could not be sustained in the face of occasional commercial success which led to the siphoning off of the company into West End runs and there was always something of an element of patronage in the established critics' attitudes to their work. This is perhaps typified in the fate of the last great Theatre Workshop success, Oh What a Lovely War (1963). This passionate account of the horrors of war gained some of its contemporary urgency from a sense that the world was once more on the brink of extinction in the wake of the Cuban Missile Crisis. But it also located war safely in history and in using an end of the pier pierrot show format ran the risk of its songs being recycled as harmless nostalgia rather than exercises in Brechtian alienation. The Theatre Workshop style with its lack of interest in traditional forms of socalled psychologically realistic characterisation, its apparently improvisational quality, its intercutting of styles and scenes, its use of songs, and its rediscovery of the value of montage played an important part in creating a wider theatrical environment more suited to an emerging desire to break away from the narrowly deterministic qualities of Naturalism. The increasing availability of Brecht's work also played a major part in creating a new sense of dramatic and theatrical possibility.

The End of Censorship

Theatrical censorship, which had been in operation in Britain in one form or another since 1737 had long been regarded by writers and critics as a significant factor in preventing the theatre from tackling serious subjects and writers such as Shaw and Granville Barker had fallen foul of the often arbitrary proscriptions of the censor. However, despite various outbreaks of agitation against censorship, the Lord Chamberlain's powers to pre-censor plays survived until the 1960s, partly because managers felt that pre-censorship offered them some protection against the possibility of prosecution. > Joe Orton, whose work fell foul of the censor in the early sixties, was another in the distinguished line of homosexual writers of comedy of manners, but he democratised the form to deal with a working class life of endemic police corruption, incest, buggery, casual promiscuity, murder, and general mayhem. The scandalised reactions which greeted his plays probably owed something to his extension of the traditional sexual and criminal pursuits of the aristocracy as represented in traditional comedies of manners and thrillers to their supposed social inferiors.

In 1968 pre-censorship was finally abolished in the wake of the Royal Court's championing of > Edward Bond, a challenging radical dramatist whose play Saved (1965), which includes a scene where a baby is stoned to death, had become a cause célèbre. Bond has been much concerned with the institutional and other violence of capitalist society and the ways in which the apparatuses of power justify their own violence by defining it as 'not violence' while condemning those who commit individual acts of violence. In the case of Saved he compared stoning the baby to the area bombing of civilians, but since the comparison isn't enforced through the dramaturgy the linkage remains more obscure than some of his defenders would wish. In late plays Bond developed away from the residual naturalism that still characterises his earliest work in favour of a spare elliptical parable-like style reminiscent of Brecht that allows him greater freedom to stage his analysis as well as the narrative from which the analysis emerges. Like Arden, Bond has become increasingly dissatisfied with the conditions of production in mainstream theatre and his newest work is seldom to be found on national stages.

Tom Stoppard and Peter Shaffer

If many writers of the period since 1956 can be regarded as pursuing an agenda informed by a desire for some kind of social change, others have focused on less overtly political themes. Bond's fortunes contrast sharply with those of, for example, ➤ Tom Stoppard and ➤ Peter Shaffer who have proved durably successful in offering mainstream audiences theatrically inventive and intellectually challenging, but not overly political, plays over three decades.

Shaffer has used theatrical resources successfully to enrich a series of commercially successful variants on the theme of man seeking his god: in The Royal Hunt of the Sun (1964) the invading Spaniard Pizzaro looks to the Inca Atahualpa for a meaning that can transcend the material world; in Equus (1973) a psychiatrist who attempts to treat the boy who has blinded six horses in a welter of confused religious and erotic passions is only too aware that his own safe version of normality lacks the passion that has fuelled the boy's craving for transcendence; in Amadeus (1979) the ordinary composer Salieri looks on aghast at Mozart's scatological genius. In each case Shaffer uses variants on twinning (his twin brother Anthony is a successful thriller writer) to explore the costs of breaking away from the mundane and in each case he uses the resources of the theatre to demonstrate the attraction of the world beyond the mundane.

Born in Czechoslovakia, Tom Stoppard, unlike many of his contemporaries, initially eschewed any kind of political identification, although he did develop a strong interest in the role of dissidents in Eastern Europe in his later work. His first success, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead (1966), with its off-centre approach to a topic mediated through an existing dramatic work or style, set the tone of his whole career. In this case (following W. S. Gilbert) he makes two attendant lords from > Hamlet the centre of his play, with the action of Shakespeare's play irrupting into the world of two characters who might have wandered in from Waiting for Godot. This method of collision between two discourses has remained central to his best work up to Arcadia (1993) in which he creates two sets of characters occupying the same room nearly two hundred years apart. Some of the modern characters are descendants of those who occupied the room at the beginning of the nineteenth century and Stoppard uses the contrasts between the two periods to muse on the nature of existence using chaos theory, the randomness of sexual attraction, landscape gardening and the nature of proof.

Description in Noises Off (1982), with a virtuoso dovetailing of backstage intrigues and onstage disasters as the audience sees alternating scenes from a third rate farce and the lives of the company performing it. Frayn's technical skill in this play is close to that of Alan Ayckbourn, who stands alone as the most commercially successful dramatist of the modern theatre.

The scale of Ayckbourn's success has tended to mask the satirical bite with which he anatomises the state of modern English middle-class morals. His apparently ordinary characters soon reveal themselves to be existing in states of near mental or physical collapse as they try to tackle their problems. Ayckbourn homes in relentlessly on the quiet hysterical anomie of suburban life through a concentration on the rituals and structures that sustain the facade of respectability, from Christmas parties to the local operatic society. He tackles big themes such as the breakdown of marriages or business corruption through the meticulous observation of social detail and through the manipulation of the limits of naturalism through devices such as showing the same action in several different plays set in different locations within the same house and garden (The Norman Conquests, 1973), or creating a play with a fixed beginning and ending with alternative central scenes (Sisterly Feelings, 1979). Ayckbourn's very success has tended to obscure his trenchant social criticism and led to him being undervalued in academic circles because of his subject matter and the audiences he addresses, but it is clear that he offers just as searching an anatomy of Britain, albeit a different section of it, as many of his more apparently political colleagues.

Fringe and Alternative Theatre

Stoppard's initial success came with the staging of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe which has played an important role in nurturing new writers and companies, to the point that 'fringe' has become a term used to describe many of the developments since the sixties. The growth in theatre writing and the creation of new theatre companies was also fuelled by the way of new theatre building in the late fifties and early sixties, partly as the result of civic redevelopment as with the Coventry Belgrade where Wesker was first staged, partly as the result of the expansion in Higher Education that involved not only the creation of new audiences for a new theatre but also the creation of new venues since most new universities created arts centres. The creation of new venues, new companies, and new audiences, together with a growth of subsidy fuelled an explosion of new writing in the late sixties and seventies which was only checked by changes in government policies after 1979. The writers who emerged towards the end of the 1960s tended to share an even greater emphasis on a politics of cultural dissent than had been the case with their immediate predecessors. This related in part to the opportunities presented for the dissemination of oppositional viewpoints through the emerging structures of alternative theatre and touring: many writers of the seventies and eighties gained significant experience with small scale touring groups such as 7:84, Joint Stock, Paines' Plough, Black Theatre Co-op, Temba, Foco Novo, Monstrous Regiment, Women's Theatre Group and Gay Sweatshop that provided high quality challenging theatrical experiences for audiences across Great Britain. > Howard Barker, > Howard Brenton, > Caryl Churchill, and > David Hare, for example, all worked with Joint Stock, although all have gone on to be staged by the > National Theatre or > Royal Shakespeare Company.

Hare's Joint Stock play Fanshen (1975), a dramatisation of William Hinton's book about the Chinese revolution, may seem to be a true heir to the epic theatre, but most of his work has been within a broadly naturalistic form and much concerned with the development of individuals within institutional frameworks. Joint Stock were one of most innovative groups of the seventies and Fanshen played a crucial role in their development: the play was developed through workshops which were a key element in most Joint Stock productions; each actor played many parts; and traditional naturalistic narrative and psychological realism gives way to the montage, banners, and direct address to the audience of an epic form.

In his other plays, Hare, unusually for a male dramatist, tends to concentrate on female protagonists, but they are too often sacrificial victims for him to be regarded unproblematically as a champion of the emancipation of women. Often, as in Plenty (1978) or The Secret Rapture (1988), it is a woman who carries the burden of trying to articulate a vision of the compassion that Hare is concerned with. However, this vision may be so socially deviant that she is unable to survive in the world as it is: Susan in Plenty retreats to a simplistic drugged recreation of the hopeful past; Isobel, the compassionate sister in The Secret Rapture, dies for her vision of caring.

Hare's instinctive naturalism combined with Howard Brenton's instinctive predilection for a more cartoon-like epic approach has produced two exuberant state of Britain plays: Brassneck (1973), about municipal corruption, and Pravda (1985), about the take-over of British media by an unscrupulous South African tycoon in the face of a supine Establishment, offered Jonsonian portraits of a nation's decay. Brenton has also consistently offered revisions of cultural heroes from Wesley (1970) and Scott of the Antarctic (1971) to Byron, Shelley, and Mary Shelley in Bloody Poetry (1984) and President Gorbachev in Moscow Gold (1990).

The State of the Nation

Plays anatomising the state of the nation have been a persistent strand in twentieth century British theatre from Shaw's Heartbreak House (1920), through Coward's less sceptical Cavalcade (1931) and This Happy Breed (1943), to Osborne's use of the music hall in The Entertainer (1957). In The Entertainer Osborne used the intercutting of scenes from a decaying music hall comedian's act to parallel his decaying offstage family life and by extention, the decay of the British empire. Alan Bennett's state of England play, Forty Years On (1968), was characteristic of much of his work in its mood of heavily ironic nostalgia. More recent examples include much of ▶ Peter Nichol's generally undervalued work, including the aptly titled The National Health (1969), which explored the discrepancy between soap opera hospital life and reality, and Poppy (1982) which used the traditional British genre of pantomime to investigate a little-known (to Britons) aspect of British imperial history in which Britain forced opium on the Chinese through military action.

> Trevor Griffiths found another apt dramatic metaphor to explore political issues through the situation of an elderly comic giving lessons to would-be stand-up comics in Comedians (1975): in the first act the audience are introduced to a range of conflicting views on the function of comedy, in the second, transformed into an audience watching the apprentices at a club, we experience many of the contradictions that were talked about earlier, in the third a debate about different functions of comedy widens into a debate about fundamental psychological and political issues. Griffiths, perhaps echoing Shaw in his commitment to adopting available forms to unfamiliar uses, has tended to use a developed version of Naturalism and often worked in television, in the hope of reaching a wider audience with his socialist ideas; his contemporary > David Edgar has argued the contrary view that the formal structures and tight control of television make it easier to make radical points in the theatre, although the audience must inevitably be smaller. Edgar has made bold attempts to tackle issues such as the attractions of far right politics (Destiny, 1976) and the history of post-war dissent, juxtaposing the politics of Britain with those of the Iron Curtain in the ironically titled Maydays (1983), but is probably best remembered for his epic two part adaptation of Nicholas Nickleby (1980).

> Howard Barker is another dramatist of fierce political interests whose uncompromising attitudes to what can be expected of audiences have led to some of the most visceral effective, but also (and sometimes in the same play) some of the most tediously obscure scenes in contemporary drama. Perhaps the most idiosyncratic voice, however, is that of > Tony Harrison, whose verse adaptations of Molière and Racine, and Greek and medieval plays combine extraordinary command of verse as a dramatic medium with a controversial socio-political outlook: in The Trackers of Oxyrhyncus (1988) a debate about high and low culture, the Apollonian and the Dionysiac was partly conveyed through clog dancing and an audience singalong in Ancient Greek.

Women. Writers Since 1968

With the growth of a new theatre and a new politics after 1968, there also came a new and larger wave of women writers. Whereas both \triangleright Shelagh Delaney and \triangleright Ann Jellicoe (who utilised a far freer form in The Knack, 1961, than most of her male contemporaries) had been relatively isolated in the late fifties, a greater number of women succeeded in getting more than one play staged. The leader of this new wave was \triangleright Pam Gems with a series of trenchant broadly feminist reappraisals of female icons, including Queen Christina (1977), Piaf (1978), and Camille (1984).

> Caryl Churchill has also established herself as one of the most effectively innovative dramatists of the period. Although her work might be seen as fitting within a socialist feminist agenda and she dealt with many of the topics that figured in much socialist and feminist drama in the seventies such as the witch crazes, seventeenth century millenarian sects, and issues of race, colonialism and gender identity, she developed new forms that appeared far more genuinely open-ended than the epic form as actually practised by Brecht. This has sometimes led to confusion about the stance of interrogative plays such as Top Girls (1982) in which she analysed the successful business woman who ignores her sister's (and her sisters') plight. Although much of the play is broadly naturalistic she starts with a surreal scene in which the successful career woman has invited some women from history to join her in a celebration. Perhaps most problematic was Serious Money (1987), a play about the London International Financial Futures Exchange: the exuberant vitality of the amoral characters and the free wheeling use of rhyming couplets tended to obscure the critiques, so much so that companies organised works outings to see the show which supposedly satirised them. Churchill has become increasing interested in working with choreographers and musicians in creating pieces that explore the boundaries of traditional theatre: The Skriker (1994) confused and invigorated audiences in equal measure with its extraordinarily allusive verse parable about the loss of a sense of the supernatural in modern society.

The English-domiciled Franco-American > Timberlake Wertenbaker is another writer with a developing sense of the possibilities of dramatic form. Her works tend to have a particular interest in the role of art in society, the nature of myth and stereotyping. Her greatest popular success has been Our Country's Good (1988) in which she explores the power of art to liberate through her retelling of the story of how some of the convicts in the first white colony in Australia staged Farquhar's The Recruiting Officer, although the positive message about the power of art in that play is somewhat undercut in the powerful companion piece The Love of the Nightingale (also 1988) which retells the myth of Philomel in powerful terms. The allusive Three Birds Alighting on a Field (1991) is another powerful exploration of the nature of art and specifically the body as a commodity.

Marginal Voices

As well as beginning a process of empowering women, the late sixties explosion of theatrical energy encouraged other previously unheard voices including those of ethnic minorities and homosexuals, although progress has been erratic and the hostile political climate of the eighties limited some of the gains that were made in the seventies. Black writers were championed by some of the small groups such as Foco Novo which staged plays by Tunde Ikoli, Alfred Fagon, and ▶ Mustapha Matura and by companies from within the black and Asian community such as Temba, Black Theatre Co-op, Talawa, and Tara but the funding base for black theatre remains narrow and its position is unfortunately well summed up in the geographical location of Talawa's base, the Cochrane Theatre, on the physical margins of London theatreland. Although Matura and Winsome Pinnock have been staged by the National Theatre, black writers have yet to be fully accepted by white audiences as more than a minority taste.

The situation with homosexual writers is perhaps slightly better since there is a long tradition of gay writers in mainstream theatre: Wilde, Coward, Rattigan, and Orton all have secure reputations. The fringe company Gay Sweatshop has played an important role, both in staging plays on gay themes and in addressing an audience across the nation, albeit on minuscule budgets. Martin Sherman's Bent (1977), a play about two gay men who fall in love in a Nazi concentration camp, has been the most successful British play about male homosexuality, enjoying both a West End run and a successful revival. Even so the arrival of two gay plays in the West End in 1994 caused a press scare about 'gay domination' of the theatre.

Overtly lesbian writing has generally been confined to fringe venues, with the exception of the work of > Sarah Daniels who has had some success with powerful polemic written from a radical feminist perspective. Masterpieces (1983) is an emotionally gripping attack on the corrosive effects of pornography and Neaptide (staged 1984), a modern reworking of the Demeter/Persephone, surfaced briefly at the National in its smallest auditorium.

The Thatcher Years

The 1980s saw considerable retrenchment in theatre companies committed to new writing, as funding was withdrawn from some of the more trenchantly oppositional companies under the Thatcher government. Its action in abolishing the Greater London Council, a great supporter of 'alternative' arts, left a gap which has not been filled, and the promulgation of anti-homosexual legislation (the notorious Clause 28) created an atmosphere of self censorship and fear in which some of the more innovative theatrical developments were left without funding. It was perhaps not entirely coincidental that companies with a strong commitment to new writing and to the word found themselves downgraded in favour of companies with a commitment to the classics or to the exploration of dance and physical theatre which, by virtue of their semiotic ambiguity were more difficult to criticise for their political content. Among the casualties of this period was the 7:84 company which had done invigorating populist socialist work in both England and Scotland, perhaps most notably with its founder > John McGrath's sometimes sentimental but highly effective critique of successive rapes of the Scottish Highlands, The Cheviot, the Stag, and the Black, Black Oil (1973) in which the popular Scottish entertainment form of the ceilidh had been exploited to telling effect to comment on the state of the nation.

Epilogue

The major upsurge in the volume and quality of dramatic writing after 1956 depended on a combination of economic, social, artistic, and theatrical factors. The building of new theatres, the growth of a theatre audience interested in more challenging plays, the excitement generated by Osborne and by new approaches to staging combined with the availability of subsidy to create a vibrant exploration of theatrical possibilities. In the nineties, much of the original excitement has gone, the electronic media once more pose a powerful challenge to live performance, musicals continue to dominate the West End and the structures to sustain new writing have been battered by withdrawal of subsidy and by economic downturns. Revivals and adaptations are the order of the day and the theatre of affirmation is in the ascendant over the theatre of dissent, but the Royal Court continues to play its central role in encouraging new writers, and many other venues do continue with a commitment to staging new plays. Without such a commitment, there would be no new classics for the theatre of the future to revive.

The Sudden Fortuitous Discovery of the 22 English Book: Post-colonial Writing

Andrew Michael Roberts and Marion Wynne-Davies

Introduction

The title of this essay is taken from an essay written by Homi Bhabha, who is one of the most perceptive and challenging critics of post-colonial literatures. In 'Signs Taken for Wonders' (Critical Inquiry, 1985) he calls our attention to a recurring scene in British colonial fiction where, in the middle of alien territory, the protagonist comes upon someone reading an English book:

It is the scenario, played out in the wild and wordless wastes of colonial India, Africa, the Caribbean, of the sudden fortuitous discovery of the English book.

Of course, Bhabha's phrase is laced with irony and we are quickly reminded that the English book is 'an insignia of colonial authority and a signifier of colonial desire', that is, it is part of the discourse of colonialism and equipped with political as well as cultural power. In this sense, the discovery of an English book is not fortuitous (in the sense of occurring by chance), but indicative of a structure of power, and nor, for the native inhabitants who had their own well-established languages and artistic discourses, can it be regarded as fortuitous in the sense of lucky. Indeed, it is only recently that some indigenous cultures, for example Maori, have been allowed some public literary acknowledgement, while others, such as the African languages of Ewe and Zulu, still have to struggle against the overwhelming domination of English as the language of professional publication. Thus, although the term 'post-colonial' is often used to encompass the literatures written in English of, amongst others, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, Singapore, Sri Lanka, India, some African countries and the Caribbean, these nations are far from being free from the sway of European influence even though formal political control has long-since ceased to exist. Rather, as Patrick Williams and Laura Chrisman suggest, 'post' may be accurate in a chronological sense, since the British Empire has indeed been dismantled, but this does not mean to say that we have 'fully transcended the colonial . . . we are not yet post-imperialist' (Colonial Discourse and Post-colonial Theory, 1993). The tensions endemic to this struggle for identity did not, therefore, cease with the dissolution of the colonial empires in the years immediately following the second world war, but continue today in the theoretical and literary works of post-colonial authors. Indeed, given that the history of colonialism has been a history of exploitation and appropriation by the West, in which the suppression or marginalization of non-European cultures and languages was a major tool of oppression, the relationship between these two elements within post-colonial theory is clearly politically sensitive and of key importance if post-colonial theorising is not to repeat the colonising mentality.

A good example of how the English canon is challenged, altered and reformed in post-colonial literature may be found in the responses to > Conrad's novel Heart of Darkness. This work provides one of the examples given by Bhabha of the 'fortuitous discovery of the English book' when Marlow, the central protagonist, finds support and succour, while travelling through the Congo, from his reading of Inquiry into some Points of Seamanship which, though 'not a very enthralling book', is described as 'honest . . . humble . . . luminous . . . an old and solid friendship'. The English book for Conrad thus becomes a form of national security, which, discovered at a moment of crisis, projects an imperialist order and stability onto the dark chaos of the colonial territory. In terms of post-colonial theory such ideological contexts are a direct challenge to indigenous cultures, and Heart of Darkness has become something of a cause célèbre since 1975, when Conrad was attacked as a racist by the Nigerian writer ⊳ Chinua Achebe. The ensuing debate has focused a number of the key issues of political interpretation. This is because Conrad's text uses modernist strategies of ambiguity and two-level narrative in a way that makes it difficult to identify the ideological position of the writer. Furthermore, the story combines explicit criticism of certain aspects of colonialism and racism (economic exploitation and cruelty) with the use of certain racist and colonialist clichés (Africa as a place of 'primitive' darkness, Africans as lower down the evolutionary scale). Achebe's criticism combined with his own novels, many of which study Nigerian society at various stages of its history, illustrates the fact that the double project of post-colonial criticism takes place both within the novel and through theoretical writings. Re-writing of both history and fiction plays an important role in post-colonialist literature. For example, ⊳ Ama Ata Aidoo's Our Sister Killjoy re-writes Heart of Darkness in oppositional form, from the point of view of an African woman, a subject position that implies a double heritage of oppression, by colonialism and by patriarchy.

As the above example illustrates, it is difficult to identify any text as wholly within a colonial or a post-colonial discourse, for as Conrad's modernist writing simultaneously asserts and questions its own colonialist ideologies, so Achebe depends upon the imperial text to demonstrate the otherness of his own indigenous writing, and so Aidoo shifts the lines of domination to encompass both racial and gender difference. Moreover, there are huge cultural and literary variations amongst those peoples who have suffered colonisation. There is an obvious difference of historical situation between what John Theime terms the 'disrupted Third World societies' of Africa and India and the 'transplanted New World societies' of Canada, Australia and New Zealand (> Post-colonial Literature), although, as Theime points out, the distinction has its limitations: the Aborigine, Maori and native Canadian peoples are 'disrupted' with the 'New World' societies of the latter group, while Caribbean societies are both disrupted and transplanted. To consider the literature of both types of society under the heading 'post-colonial' is not to imagine a homogeneity but to invoke a fascinating series of similarities, contrasts and tensions, as diverse historical and geographical circumstances inflect certain broad themes, such as marginalization (both literary and political) and a divided personal and cultural identity, together with strategies such as 'writing back' and narrative of re-imagined and re-told history.

It is precisely in this multiplicity, in this flux of cultural difference, that Homi Bhabha traces the origins of the subaltern's resistance to imperial domination and the cogent articulation of indigenous culture. Bhabha points out that colonial authority sustains itself by laying claim to a universal system of values, which it imposes upon the colonised nation; in literary terms therefore, it offers them the 'English book' as a symbol of this consensual identity. However, the only way to maintain this position of power is to assert superiority over, and to discriminate against, the dominated nation, thereby stressing difference rather than similarity. This 'doublethink' of collectivity and variance produces what Bhabha terms 'hybridity' which he goes on to define as, the sign of the productivity of colonial power, its shifting forces and its fixities; it is the name for the strategic reversal of the process of domination through disavowal (that is, the production of discriminatory identities that secure the 'pure' and original identity of authority).

In other words, the imperial authority demands that the oppressed nation accepts the Western European standard as the norm, but because it can achieve this control only through asserting its superiority, the colonised subject can never perfectly replicate the 'original'. Instead, any attempt at mimesis inevitably produces a hybrid culture which is both dominant and oppressed, both archetypal and mutated. The very act of colonisation therefore encodes within it the necessity of resistance, as Bhabha writes, Hybridity . . . unsettles the mimetic or narcissistic demands of colonial power but reimplicates its identifications in strategies of subversion that turn the gaze of the discriminated back upon the eye of power.

This is perhaps the most important development in post-colonial theory, for without this recognition of the possibilities of 'writing back', of turning the gaze, and of encoding a reciprocity/confrontation within the new literatures, 'post-colonialism' becomes merely another literary term, domesticised within the imperialist culture and divorced from the effective arena of political activity.

However, before moving on to an account of the varying new literatures in English, it is important to note that not all post-colonialist critics are as Utopian about the reemergence of the subaltern's voice as is Homi Bhabha. Another important contributor to this field of study, Gayatri Spivak, has suggested that, while worthy of praise, any attempt by Western academics to construct a voice for the repressed nations is a simplification which glosses over the problems, even the impossibility, of the creation of an independent subjectivity for the subaltern. What exists, therefore, at present is a, debate between those who insist on the possibility of an effective alignment of position with the subaltern and those who insist that this, paradoxically, may serve only to construct a refinement of the system it seeks to dismantle.

Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin, (The Post-colonial Studies Reader)

Perhaps a valid approach to the writing in English of the post-colonial nations is to aim for both an openness to the discourse of the subaltern, of the repressed peoples, and an awareness of the imperialist discourse which seeks, even now, to contain and mute those rearticulated words. In the following pages we hope to provide a brief introduction to post-colonial literature which frees these voices, albeit in a limited fashion. We have adopted divisions for the sake of clarity, but we are also aware of the dangers of totalisation inherent in such a structuring: the risk of constructing the whole around a centralising image – that of the 'English Book'. We would rather see this discussion of post-colonial literatures as an exploration which recognises both difference and connection.

II

Canada, New Zealand and Australia

The three literatures of Canada, Australia and New Zealand are often linked together as 'transplanted' forms of writing, and as countries where the English book has been readily transported with the colonisers. But in each case this is limiting classification, since Canada has its own native traditions, Australia has seen an emergence of Aborigine work and New Zealand has always had, if not always acknowledged, a very powerful Maori culture. Rather, they are a mixture of both 'transplanted' and 'disrupted'. Still, even within these broad divisions literary activity in each area has been distinctive both in the history of its development and its national characteristics.

Although the traditional songs and ritualistic drama of the native peoples, such as the Iroquois and the Inuit, can trace their roots to a much earlier period, the European (English/French) literary tradition in Canada did not begin until the early seventeenth century, although this was early in the history of North American colonisation. Robert Hayman's 'Quodlibets Lately Come Over From New Britaniola, Old Newfound-land' (1628) was probably the first book of original English verse to be written in North America and Marc Lescarbot's Le Théâtre de Neptune en la Nouvelle-France (1606) was the first play performed on the continent. The first English novel written in Canada, Frances Brooke's The History of Emily Montague (1769) came much later, but is more important in establishing national conventions, since it looks at the problems of colonisation and discusses the possibilities of cross-cultural exchange, rather than imperial domination. The establishment of a national 'voice' occurred however in poetry, where, after Canada became a nation in 1867, a group called the Confederation Poets emerged. Their primary theme was the Canadian landscape and their foremost writer was Archibald Lampman, whose Romantic sensibilities involved a powerful adherence to the specific natural environment of Canada. This reworking of European literary tradition into a form which answered the needs of the indigenous culture is exactly the kind of hybridisation Homi Bhabha writes about, and it continued to dominate Canadian literature into the twentieth century. For example, the tenets of modernism (both European and of the United States) may be traced in the poetry of E. J. Pratt, Dorothy Livesay and A. M. Klein, while the 'garrison mentality' which Northrop Frye identifies in the Canadian novel of the early twentieth century still exhibits an adherence to English cultural norms.

More potent forms of resistance have, however, emerged since the second world war. In drama the establishment of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) resulted in the first venue for original Canadian plays (3,500 were produced between 1939 and 1960), and playwrights have since moved from a nationalist stance (James Reaney and David French) to a more internationalist position (George Walker). The full impact of multiculturalism has been felt in Canadian poetry where the voices of the native Indians, the Anglophone/Francophone settlers and the more recent immigrants (such as those from the Caribbean and Asia) now have access to a state-funded publishing culture in which small magazines and presses abound. Finally, one of the most important sites of cultural resistance occured in the literary criticism of the novel. The best-known Canadian author is undoubtedly > Margaret Atwood and it was she who widened the national identity debate to include the United States. In her seminal text Survival: A thematic Guide to Canadian Literature (1972) she excavates the Canadian novel in order to uncover and to challenge the 'victim' position in Canadian colonial discourses. However, her creative writing similarly foregrounds questions of national identity and links these to the dynamics of sexual politics. Symbolic and surreal elements are evident in the first-person narratives of The Edible Woman (1969) and Surfacing (1972), which centre on the internal lives of their women narrators. In The Edible Woman feminist issues are dominant; the metaphor of eating illuminates the narrator's reaction against both consumerism and the egotistical emotional cannibalism of men. In Surfacing a journey to a remote cabin in a French-speaking part of Canada is combined with the metaphor of diving into the depths of the self (with the possibilities of drowning or resurfacing). These two elements focus questions of cultural as well as personal identity. Both novels reflect the resolution stated in the last chapter of Surfacing: 'This above all, to refuse to be a victim.'

Canadian literature has, therefore, acquired a canon of its own, and one which follows a path from the Anglophone voices of the colonial past to the multicultural literature of today. These two elements may be combined as in the works of the novelist > Margaret Laurence, who uses her fictional prairie town of Manawaka to chart Canadian social history, but who began writing in Ghana and who exemplifies a creative link between different post-colonial societies. A similar interchange may be seen in the writing of ⊳ Michael Ondaatje who came to Canada from Sri Lanka; his novel In the Skin of a Lion (1987) blends fiction and history to focus attention on marginalised elements within Canadian life, including both the remote rural communities and the situation of an urban multicultural working class. Ondaatje, however, represents another particularly Canadian characteristic in his challenging of traditional form; innovative narrative technique is a feature of Coming Through Slaughter (1979) which uses transcripts of interviews, song lyrics, biographical summaries and intensely imagined subjective narration to document the life of the jazz cornet player Buddy Bolden. A comparable inventiveness is found in the less tragic but equally compelling novel by ➤ Carol Shields, Mary Smann (1987). This story of academics and others seeking to rediscover the life and work of an (imaginary) little-known Canadian poet contains an element of mystery, built up through four narratives: each has a different focal character, while one consists partly of letters. The novel's conclusion takes the form of a film script (including camera directions). In the present, therefore, the use of heterogeneous forms and the presence of divergent voices gives contemporary Canadian literature a feeling of uneasy multiplicity: difference is both welcomed and feared and literary forms are used to imagine unity as well as to stage conflicts.

Resistance is equally a part of New Zealand's literature, but the element of confrontation arises very much from the margins and not from the dominant cultural discourse. Indeed, until the twentieth century New Zealand had little literature of its own and instead imported traditions wholesale from Europe. The poetry of the early settlers was mediocre and often melodramatic, while theatre came under attack from the strong Puritan tradition of the colony. Prose, while commencing a little earlier than the other two genres, is initially depressing in its rehearsal of colonialist attitudes: for example, the first indigenous novel, Henry Butler Stoney's Taranaki: A Tale of the War (1861) justifies the oppression of the Maori as necessary and inevitable. Gradually, however, a national literature began to establish itself at the beginning of the twentieth century: a colloquial voice emerged in the poetry of R. A. K. Mason, while the concept of national identity may be seen in the writing of A. R. D. Fairburn. However, the most dominant poets of the mid-century were Allen Curnow whose technical skill and complex irony quickly established him as an authoritative voice, and James K. Baxter who linked personal experience to mythic narratives. Both writers also contributed to the growth in New Zealand of serious drama in which the Anglophone traditions were angrily overturned. Although much New Zealand fiction in the first part of the twentieth century tended towards social realism and male orientation, there was a strong if (until recently) inadequately recognised tradition of feminist fiction, of women writing from the margins. Amongst these were Edith Searle Grossman, > Katherine Mansfield and Jane Mander.

However, it was not until the 1960s that a radical New Zealand literary culture emerged simultaneously in all genres. In poetry the publication of two anthologies, Recent Poetry in New Zealand (1965) and The Young New Zealand Poets (1973), introduced vibrant and diverse voices, making the work more accessible and allowing older poets, such as Curnow, to introduce fresh forms and complexities into their writing. In the field of drama, professional theatres were established and new writers challenged old conventions; these included Bruce Mason, who attacked the Puritanism of New Zealand culture, Mervyn Thompson who celebrated the working class voice, and Greg McGee, whose Foreskin's Lament (1981) became a byword for the country's anger at the state's conservatism. Finally, in the novel similar critical views of New Zealand society were expounded, the key text being Bill Pearson's Coal Flat (1963). The most exciting writer to emerge from this period was > Janet Frame, whose importance to the contemporary New Zealand novel is comparable to that of Atwood in Canada. Her three-volume autobiography, To the Is-Land 91983), An Angel at My Table (1984; filmed 1990) and The Envoy from Mirror City (1985), is closely related to her fiction which describes, with symbolic intensity and a linguistic inventiveness, experiences - such as those of isolation, medical incarceration, and self-creation and self-healing through fiction - which are features of her own life. But Frame, like the other women writers mentioned above, still sees herself as a marginalised voice, challenging tradition and convention. Indeed, this is true for her contemporaries; > Fleur Adcock's ironic poems, together with Anne French and Cilla McQueen's poetic undermining of patriarchal discourses have ensured that some of the best poetry in the 1980s has been written by women. Similar resistances are seen in Maori writing, particularly in the work of the poet and novelist > Keri Hulme, whose novel The Bone People (1983) reacts against the consequences of colonialism, social and ecological. In her poetry Hulme adapts the strong oral tradition of Maori culture, but it is on drama that the indigenous New Zealand culture has had most impact. Despite all the oppressive forces of colonialism the ritualised performances of the Maori race could not be repressed and, with the greater recognition of their political and cultural identities, the Maoris have reintroduced their dramatic performances into everyday life. Interestingly these dramas often encode a challenge to state policies, as in the performances by 'Maranga Mai' ('Wake Up!', 1981) which were directed against South Africa's rugby tour and the works which focus upon the continuing land disputes. New Zealand is perhaps unique in being equally divided between the 'transplanted' and the 'disrupted', and in being split between a puritanical conservatism and the powerful marginal voices of the Maoris and of feminism.

Austrialia, while being closer geographically to New Zealand, has also much in common with Canada, particularly in its literary representations of the vast hinterlands, in the strength of its colonial inheritance and in its ability to produce and assimilate the voices of resistance. Because Australia simply had a larger population earlier a strong literary culture was established there before occurring in New Zealand. The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries saw the development of the bush ballad, the early melodramas, and the formative novelistic accounts of life in the penal colony, the most famous example of the latter being Henry Savery's Quintus Servinton (1830–1).

By the twentieth century Australian writers were confident enough to produce works which were specifically nationalistic, such as Judith Wright's poetry and Louis Esson's plays, as well as more internationalist, such as A. D. Hope's verse. After the Second World War the focus shifted more decisively to specifically Austrialian experience. Ray Lawler's play, Summer of the Seventeenth Doll (1957) explored the transition from the bushman myth to the urban existence of a modern society, contributing to the emergence of a new Australian character, the 'ocker' who combines the brash and crude masculinity of the bushman with the verbal dexterity and sophistication of the city business man. In poetry, Bruce Dawe's populist colloquialism, Les A. Murray's championing of the rural worker, and John Tranter's exploration of the fragmentation of city life, reflected the ironic disillusionment felt by a nation coming to terms with radical change. Evidence of this estrangement may also be found in the novel. Patrick White, who is the most widely known post-war Australian novelist, draws upon the stark polarities of his nation's identity: the polite social milieu of suburban Sydney satirised by White with a dry wit, and the starkly primitive outback, which in Voss (1957) becomes a spiritual testing ground. The eponymous hero of this novel is a dedicated German explorer with a compulsive though enigmatic sense of his own destiny, who leads an expedition into the Australian interior. In the early part of the novel the narrator shifts freely between realistic observation of social mores and poetic evocation of characters' inner worlds of memory, anticipation and desire. This blend is characteristic of White's idiosyncratic style, which startles by its immediacy and tonal range. Voss's journey is also an inner journey and, as in the work of Conrad, the confrontation with a harsh and alien landscape is endowed with philosophical and spiritual resonance through the questioning of personal identity; external and internal landscapes function as multiple metaphors. White was both a social satirist and a visionary, and the authority of his work was recognised by the award of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1973.

More recently, the Australian novel has developed along more overtly post-colonial lines, as for example in the work of > Janette Turner Hospital, an Australian who moved to Canada, whose novel Borderline (1985) explores questions of involvement, privilege and detachment with a post-modernist as well as a post-colonial self-consciousness. Similarly, Peter Carey simultaneously attacks the colonial development of Australia in Oscar and Lucinda (1988) as well as introducing the historical pastiche technique of post-modernist fiction. In the theatre Stephen Sewell has introduced broader issues through his Marxist perspective and in poetry non-Anglophone voices, such as those of Asian immigrants, may now be heard. Australia resembles Canada in openness to cultural multiplicity, yet, ironically, the literary reworkings in English of different cultures being welcomed by both these post-colonial states are often being repressed and silenced in the authors' countries of origin.

III

The South Pacific, Singapore, Malaysia and Hong Kong

There has not been any considerable production of literature in English in the above countries and areas but their varying responses to the post-colonial experience through poetry, drama and the novel serve to highlight the interrelated contexts in which new literatures are undertaken. For example, the authors of the South Pacific islands lay claim to a specific discourse which includes the Maori and Aboriginal writers of New Zealand and Australia, Singapore and Malaysia have a different but binding relationship, and Hong Kong negotiates an arduous and complex route between English imperialism and Chinese communism.

Although there is little written record of indigenous South Pacific literary culture, especially in prose and drama, there is a diverse and strong oral tradition in poetry which has transmuted well into the English tongue. Indeed, poems are still used at official ceremonies and, while retaining a firm base in regional culture, are open to a variety of forms and rhythms. More recently the same enthusiasm has found its way into the theatre: in Papua New Guinea after the attainment of independence in 1975 nationalistic plays were produced in the National Theatre as well as by touring companies, and in Vanuatu the Vanuatu's Wan Smolbag Theatre ('One Small Bag' theatre) stages plays which often detail the harrowing experiences of the native inhabitants under colonial rule.

Singapore parallels the South Pacific islands with its interest in poetry and relative neglect of the novel. Since the country's full independence in 1965 (national independence in 1962 and a break with Malaysia in 1965), poetry in English has established itself as an important element in Singapore's literature. The poetry ranges from the confident and ironic tone of Edwin Thumboo, through Lee Tzu Pheng's dark lyricism, to Robert Yeo's search for a national identity. Yeo is also one of Singapore's leading dramatists producing plays which have a clear political topicality and which disregard the Anglocentric tone of earlier writers. The novel has, in comparison, had a slow start, the first fictional work in English being Catherine Lim's Little Ironies: Stories of Singapore (1978). Increasingly, however, the English-educated readership is demanding works which are written in English but relevant to their own national experiences, and a growing number of university graduates, including Colin Cheong and Ovidia Yu, have begun writing in English in order to satisfy this desire. This last point is perhaps the key to Singapore's considerable body of imaginative literature in English: the university provides the linguistic and literary background necessary for the development of a strong literary output, while the solid English language education in Singapore's schools supplies the book-purchasing public.

The situation is very different in Malaysia, Singapore's close neighbour. Initially, Malaysian independence (1957) produced a small but interesting body of literature in English; poets such as Ee Tiang Hong and dramatic organisations such as the Malaysian Arts Theatre Group mirrored the growing nationalism of the country and attempted to find an authentic voice for the Malaysian experience. However, after the ethnic riots of 1969 English became a very subservient part of Malaysian culture and almost ceased to be taught at schools and universities. Today, there are no Malays writing novels in English, there are no interesting younger poets and there is only one significant venue for English drama, the Five Arts Centre. Perhaps this will change as English gains recognition once more, but the deep-seated political antagonisms between Britain and Malaysia make this seem a long and difficult task.

Drastic political upheaval is also at the centre of Hong Kong's cultural identity, but rather than stifling the English book the rapid approach of the Chinese takeover in 1977 has inspired many authors to examine and define Hong Kong's identity. Although there has been little poetry or drama written in Hong Kong, its novel always attained an international readership as with Han Suyin's A Many-Splendoured Thing (1952) and Richard Mason's The World of Suzie Wong (1957). More recently, the most powerful writer to emerge has been > Timothy Mo, whose post-colonial novel An Insular Possession (1986) deals with the British annexation of Hong Kong.

The English book has had, then, a mixed reception in the South Pacific islands, Singapore, Malaysia and Hong Kong, for each nation has come to perceive, usually in conjunction with its independence or annexation, that literature cannot be divorced from political concerns and that when a post-colonial author chooses to write in English they encode an acceptance of Britain's imperial domination as well as an attempt to undermine it. Countries like Malaysia have attempted to expunge the language of colonialist control, while some writers, such as Hong Kong's Timothy Mo, make use of the size and economic strength of world publishing in English to gain an audience for work which articulates various forms of resistance or critique.

Sri Lanka, India and Pakistan

Each of the countries discussed in this section has a long tradition of literature in the indigenous tongues, for example Indian poetry may be traced back over thousands of years. The relevance of the English book to their national cultures is, therefore quite limited, but at the same time authors from Sri Lanka, India and Pakistan have made a considerable impact upon the international literary scene. For example, Sri Lanka's > Michael Ondaatje now lives in Canada and has won the coveted Booker Prize in Britain, India's > Salman Rushdie and > Rohinton Mistry emigrated to England and Canada respectively and are now highly acclaimed in their adopted countries, and Hanif Kureishi draws on a Pakistani inheritance despite being born in England. In this sense it becomes impossible to define national identity in any straightforward way, since within a post-colonial framework individuals are able to bridge difference, being simultaneously indigenous and alien, activating in themselves and in their writings a form of hybridity. Rather than only negotiating between the roles of imperial ruler and repressed subaltern as suggested by Bhabha, the concept of hybridity must be expanded to encompass the relationships between subalterns of different nations, opening out the possibility of transculturalism as well as multiculturalism.

When Sri Lanka became independent in 1948 a strong anti-English sentiment emerged resembling the experience of Malaysia, but instead of alienating contemporary authors from the English book, the policing of the language initiated a backlash and possibly the best literature to be written by native Lankans occurred in the second half of the twentieth century. One of the reasons for this seeming paradox was the influence of the department of English at the University of Ceylon, which inspired young writers and provided them with outlets for their talents through theatre groups and small literary magazines. As with Singapore, education proved a deciding factor in the continuation of English as an important cultural force, although class also plays a part in Lankan writing since the early authors were almost exclusively drawn from the upper ranks, the 'brown sahibs'. Sri Lanka's first leading novelist was probably Punyakante Wijenaike, whose ruling class origins led to a sense of alienation in her writing, as for example in Giraya (1971) where the central aristocratic family is shown to be corrupt and decadent. Wijenaike has now been superseded by Ediriwira Sarachchandra whose novel With the Begging Bowl (1986) challenges the notion of class alienation and introduces a more consensual voice into Lankan fiction. Drama in Sri Lanka is a more politicised genre than the novel with playwrights such as Nedra Vittachchi and Reggie Siriwardena favouring satire and social critiques. However, it is Lankan poetry that has excelled in its ability to relate traditional European forms and rhythms to indigenous traditions and local concerns. For example, Lakdasa Wikkramainka's poetic language draws upon an international array of voices, while Yasmine Gooneratne uses orthodox forms and Lankan content matter so as to create tension and fragmentation within her work. Gooneratne has left Sri Lanka and settled in Australia where she pursues the Lankan theme of alienation but this time from the position of the emigrant. Probably Sri Lanka's most widely known writer is Michael Ondaatje who also emigrated and has lived for many years in Canada: indeed, many Canadians would classify Ondaatje as a 'Canadian' author and not a 'Lankan' one.

India's strong and ancient traditions in poetry and drama have militated against many key developments in these genres in the English language, although writers such as Toru Dutt and Rabindranath Tagore, the latter of whom won the Nobel Prize for Literature for Gitanjali: Song Offerings (1912), demonstrate that Indian writers could excel in this area if they so wished. Indeed, more recently Anglo-Indian poets have revealed a multiplicity of talent; for example, P.Lal with his verbal dexterity, the contemporary Arun Kolatkar with his impressionistic political approach, and Monika Varma with her exposure of female confinement in Indian culture. Such versatility is not obvious in Anglo-Indian drama which appears to be written mainly for an elite readership rather than for public performance in the theatre.

In striking contrast the Indian novel in English has flourished alongside fiction written in Indian languages, perhaps because of a shared nineteenth-century origin, at a time when the need to explore the socio-economic conditions in India found a perfect medium in the novel genre. The early Anglo-Indian novel probably began with Bankim Chandra Chatterjee's Rajmohan's Wife (1864) and one of its finest exponents in this first period was Toru Dutt. The twentieth century saw the emergence of three major novelists, Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao and > R. K. Narayan, the first two of whom focus upon political concerns. This is not true of Narayan, but on the other hand he must be acknowledged as the foremost Anglo-Indian author of his day. Writing mainly about Hindu middle-class society, Narayan takes as his main theme the transformation of the self. In an unobtrusive, lucid style Narayan's writing attends to the details of places, objects and habits, and explores subtleties of feeling and consciousness. The result is a combination of comedy and sadness as his modest, anxious, often ineffectual but highly sympathetic protagonists strive to cope with the frustrations of daily life and the elusiveness of their ambitions and desires. Broader areas of social and cultural conflict are, however, not entirely absent: The Painter of Signs (1976), for example, juxtaposes Western and Indian conceptions of the role of women and sexual relations in an ironic tale about a sign painter, his aunt and an emancipated woman who is seeking to promote birth control. Similarly, although Narayan's fiction can be seen within the traditions of the European novel, it can also be read in terms of plot and character elements mirroring Hindu mythological narratives: The Man-Eater of Malgudi (1961), for example, has a protagonist named Natara, one of the avatars of the god Shiva.

In the contemporary Anglo-Indian novel ▷ Anita Desai is pre-eminent. Desai, whose father was Bengali and mother German, was educated in India, and her work, like that of Narayan, shows the influence of both Western modernism and Indian cultural traditionalism. For example, Clear Light of Day (1980) has epigraphs from ▷ T. S. Eliot and ▷ Emily Dickinson and its opening scene, set in a garden, has qualities reminiscent of the novels of ▷ Virginia Woolf, while indigenous Indian literary tradition (in the form of Urdu poetry) is evident in her novel In Custody (1984). Desai, however, is also concerned with the plight of women in India; in Fire on the Mountain (1977), set in the mountains of North India, she meditates on the unfulfilled lives of a group of women characters and their quests for various forms of peace, consolation or liberation. More explicitly political themes are found in the novels written in the 1980s by ⊳ Nayantara Sahgal, a member of the most prominent Indian political family. Plans for Departure (1986) and Mistaken Identity (1988) depict India in the 1910s and 1930s respectively, while Rich Like Us (1985) shows Sahgal's concern for human rights, using a narration from two perspectives to explore the causes and consequences of violence during the state of emergency declared by Indira Ghandi in the late 1970s. Sahgal's earlier novels, such as Storm in Chandigarh (1969), focused more on sexual politics, a concern which is central to the work of > Shashi Despande who, in That Long Silence (1988), portrays the tension for a married woman between a sense of responsibility and a need for autonomy, in a story that also explores the psychic consequences of an abortion. Another radical feminist author is Bharati Mukherjee, but while she remains committed to the exposure of the patriarchal and racist repression of Indian women she left her native Calcutta, and after living for a short time in Canada now resides in New York. Similarly, Rohinton Mistry, while continuing to write about the Indian experience of post-colonialism, now lives and works in Canada. Finally, however, to compound India's immersion within this contemporary transculturalism, the legacy of the British Raj has produced two European novelists writing in India about the Anglo-Indian experience. ⊳ Paul Scott's Raj Quartet (1966-75), a study of racial tension, corruption and violence at the time of Independence was made into a hugely popular television series, and > Ruth Prawar Jhabvala's novel Heat and Dust (1975) juxtaposes the 1920s and the 1970s in a parallel double narrative, a technique which Jhabvala (who is a highly successful screenplay writer) describes in filmic terms as 'splicing'. Revisiting the period of E. M. Forster's A Passage to India and reassessing many of its political and moral concerns, this novel represents one version of the rewriting of texts of the colonial period which has been a major technique of the post-colonial novel.

In comparison with India, Pakistan's output of literature written in English is small, although it too has a fair number of highly respected expatriate authors. One of the major factors in the difference between India and Pakistan is, of course, religion, for whereas India's Hindu conventions have always encouraged theatrical performance, Pakistan's Muslim traditions have all but obliterated drama as a viable genre. Another contrast may be seen in the countries' different poetic discourses, for whereas India embraces a multitude of themes, Pakistan's poets rely heavily upon the introverted voice and nature imagery, eschewing the somewhat dangerous area of political verse. However, it is in the novel form that Pakistan attains a unique and vibrant identity; for example, in the works of Ahmed Ali who established a strong sense of nationalism after Independence in 1947, and in the writing of > Zulfikar Ghose who uses landscape and location to explore the complementary and contradictory relationships between East and West. Ghose, however, now lives in the United States and writes from a position of alienation. Similarly, > Hanif Kureishi's and Tariq Ali's works are based upon Pakistani experience in England, which while fascinating in their exploration of two cultures, often portrayed as equally bigoted, are far removed from an indigenous Pakistan English language novel. Perhaps, then, through the ability of individual authors to achieve success on an international scale and to bridge the differences between different cultures, the nationalist voices are becoming muted. The potency of multinational publishing houses and the development of post-colonial studies in the universities have promoted the spread of post-colonial literatures but may risk blunting conflictual edges and diluting political resistance. However, even as we acknowledge the dangers of a seemingly harmonious multiculturalism, we should also recognise its value, a value highlighted by the fact that in many countries the economic and/or political conditions that allow such multiplicity do not exist.

Africa and the Caribbean

Both areas considered in this final section embrace wide variations in national cultures; for example, criticism of the governments in Uganda and South Africa must be recognised as very different since the former has concerned a black dictatorship and the latter the retention of white colonialist power via apartheid. Similarly, there are diverse cultures within the Caribbean group of nations, and writing which is produced within the Caribbean islands tends to have different perspectives from that which is undertaken by the Caribbean exiles in Britain. Yet all the national cultures which come under this heading have combined their strong oral traditions with European textual conventions often producing highly political writing and creating new hybrid forms which may lay claim to being representative of post-colonial literature.

In the countries of East Africa (Kenva, Tanzania and Uganda) there was little attempt to produce national literatures in English until the period of independence in the 1960s. Even after this period in the field of poetry there have been few significant poets writing in English, with perhaps the exception of Richard Ntiru in Uganda and Jared Angira in Kenya, and it was only in the late 1980s with the publication of two impressive anthologies, An Anthology of East African Poetry (1988) and Boundless Voices: Poems from Kenya (1988) that an international readership became aware of East African poetry and its striking ability to combine the local oral tradition and immediate political concerns with British literary references. This combination also characterises the region's theatrical output, in which the playwrights attempt to promote social change through a combination of European dramatic conventions, such as Theatre of the Absurd, and native performance traditions. For example, Francis Imbuga's Betrayal in the City (1976) offers harsh condemnation of the post-independence Kenyan government, and John Ruganda's The Floods (1980) is a sharply satirical attack on the Ugandan military dictatorship. For East African drama, therefore, political content, indigenous stylistic features and international techniques of radical theatre are harnessed together to condemn the inadequacies of the present government, rather than to explore the difficulties of a colonial past. The history of the novel in East Africa is founded, unlike the poetry and drama, very much in a colonial discourse; for example, one of the early East African novels is > Karen Blixen's Out of Africa (1964). This has led to a more complicated negotiation between the black author and the English book he or she wishes to write, since many writers in Africa, as in other parts of the post-colonial world, face a decision whether to publish in the language which is a legacy of foreign domination of their countries, or in an indigenous language, or both. For example, the Kenyan novelist > Ngugi wa Thiong'o, after publishing four widely acclaimed novels in English, published a fifth in the language of his people, Gikuyu, later translating it into English himself; since 1982 he has abandoned writing in English. Still, Ngugi must be considered the most important of the post-independence East African writers in English, and his chronicling of the modern history of Kenya stands as one of the major post-colonial reviews of an oppressed past and the difficulties of creating an independent national identity in the present. His first novel Weep Not, Child (1964) is the story of an adolescent boy at the time of the Mau Mau rebellions, while The River Between (1965) goes back in time to the first nationalist rebellion of the 1920s, representing divisions in Kenyan society through the symbolic separation of two villages, on either bank of a river. A Grain of Wheat (1967) presents Kenyan life in the troubled period leading up to independence through the lives of four friends, and Petals of Blood (1977) is a powerful, realistic, but also symbolically vivid attack on the economic exploitation of the peasants in the 1970s. Ngugi's mature fiction is explicitly informed by Marxist political analysis and after writing Petals of Blood he was imprisoned. His work embraces both the expression of a collective social awareness and the exploration of moral uncertainty through the gradual evolution of introspective characters. Perhaps Ngugi's imprisonment goes some way towards explaining why there have been so few pathbreaking East African writers, for the political and economic conditions in the region make the publishing market a somewhat precarious arena.

Before, however, turning to the even more difficult political situation that has faced writers in South Africa, we would like to look briefly at the writing of South Central Africa (Malawi, Zambia and Zimbabwe) and West Africa (The Gambia, Ghana, Nigeria and Sierra Leone). The novel form has flourished in Zimbabwe which has used prose as the medium for its exploration of a new national consciousness both in the individual and in the state. > Doris Lessing's work provided an early example of how the South Central African novel could be used to foreground racial inequality and the tensions endemic upon such imperial power structures, as for example in The Grass is Singing (1950). These concerns also appear in the works of Zimbabwe's two foremost black writers: Charles Mungoshi who portrays the harshness of colonial rule and who writes in both English and his native Shona, and Dambudzo Marachera who deals with his country's fragmented identity and the destabilisation of the postmodern world. If Zimbabwe is pre-eminent in the novel, then Malawi prevails in the field of poetry, with its incorporation of indigenous traditions and contemporary European and American conventions. For example, Steve Chimombo's poetry calls upon the oral tradition and Jack Mapanie's work, such as 'New Platform Dances', incorporates multiple elements of traditional Malawian culture.

West African poetry in English commenced, in common with many post-colonial cultures, with the nationalist struggles for independence after the second world war, and the most influential text of this formative period is generally accepted to be Gabriel Okara's Black Orpheus (1957). Okara introduced an intellectual style of poetry in which subject matter and a self-conscious stylistic approach were merged with imaginative intensity. His successors include > Wole Soyinka, Christopher Okigbo and > Kofi Awoonor; Soyinka's poetry, while utilising African mythology, simultaneously demonstrates an indebtedness to the European modernists, Okigbo's work encompasses the fragmentation of his own society as well as the general sense of alienation represented in international literatures, and Awoonor's verses draw directly upon Ewe songs and are perhaps some of the most authentic African poems written in English which are written and performed today. Other contemporary poets, such as Ama Ata Aidoo and > Ben Okri have followed suit using experimental forms and political themes to explore the West African writer's sense of exile, alienation and dissatisfaction with the governments past and present.

Drama in English, like the poetry, developed as an important literary form after the West African countries had gained their independence from Britain, yet even now there is very little produced since English is, at best, a second language for most people, ensuring that audiences while appreciative are also quite small in number. Moreover, although in terms of content the West African plays challenged colonialist rule and highlighted the horrors of a colonial past, there remained the paradox of presenting such material, on stage, to a black audience, in the language of the oppressors. Attempts have been made to overcome this contradiction by giving the characters dialogue in a local dialect and by introducing traditional African elements such as dance and song, but the incongruity remains, permeating the plays with tensions which are not always counterproductive. Indeed, West Africa has produced some of the finest playwrights of the late twentieth century, including Ama Ata Aidoo and Wole Soyinka (both are also poets and are mentioned above). Indeed, Soyinka was the first black person to win the Nobel Prize for Literature (1986) and has an international reputation.

What Soyinka is to the West African theatre, > Chinua Achebe is to the West African novel, although Soyinka and Aidoo are also important writers of prose. Along with > Amos Tutuola's The Palm-wine Drinkard (1952), Achebe's Things Fall Apart (1958) initiated the rapid growth of the African novel in English. Achebe's novels articulate the impact on Nigerian culture of white colonialism and its aftermath, from the first appearance of white missionaries in Things Fall Apart, to Lagos in the 1960s in A Man of the People (1966). Anthills of the Savannah (1987) updates this historical chronicle, showing injustice and resistance under the rule of a 1980s African military dictator. Writing in English, Achebe incorporates African proverbs and idioms in such a way as to make the cultural context vivid and compelling for both African and English readers. Characters such as Okonkwo (the village leader who is the principle character of Things Fall Apart) or Christopher Oriko (the Commissioner for Information who, in Anthills of the Savannah, compromises with, but eventually revolts against, the one-time friend who has become a dictator) achieve psychological complexity, and a considerable tragic status.

A number of West African writers employ, however, more radical techniques than are generally used by Achebe. For example, Our Sister Killjoy (1970) by the Ghanaian author Aidoo uses typographical effects (such as pages with a single word on them), interposed commentaries in verse, ironic interplay between the voices of character and narrator, and a mode of address to the reader which draws on oral storytelling. The novel confronts feminist issues as well as expressing resistance to European appropriation and assimilation of African culture and African people, symbolised in the transplant of an African man's heart into a white man's body. The symbol of the heart is also structurally important to the story, in which a woman who travels to the 'heart' of Europe and is subject to its sexual and material attractions, eventually rejects it in favour of her responsibility to her African homeland. This complex inversion/subversion of the Eurocentric myth of > Conrad's > Heart of Darkness illustrates the process of 'writing back' to the centre of the Empire, a process of resistance and reappropriation which works here through intertextuality. In addition, Aidoo's criticism of aspects of the work of male African writers (in particular their use of images and ideas of motherhood) places her in a strong feminist dynamic among writers who have portrayed the 'double yoke' of black women who suffer from both racism and sexism; a concern evident in works such as Flora Nwapa's Women are Different (1986) and Buchi Emecheta's Double Yoke (1983).

Although it would be inadequate to describe the existence of contemporary authors in East, South Central and West Africa as free from the restraints of colonialism, since much of their writing in fact reacts against the forces of imperialism, it is South Africa that has enshrined itself in world politics as the epitome of racism and as the final bastion of the colonial way of life, although that situation has now changed radically. Unlike the other national literatures discussed in this section of the essay, South Africa's literary history begins early in the nineteenth century with the hunter-explorer poems of Thomas Pringle (the 'father' of South African poetry in English), the European touring companies with their productions of the English 'classics' and, somewhat later, the colonial adventure narratives of novelists such as > H. Rider Haggard. Still, even in this formative period white writers, such as > Olive Schreiner in The Story of an African Farm (1983) undercut the traditional colonialist view of Africa as a seductive and mysterious land by showing the 'grey pigments' of the racist and sexist realities. In the next century poets such as William Plomer and > Roy Campbell used their journal Whiplash (founded in 1925) to attack the colonialist policies of the government, but following sharp condemnation of their attitudes both became exiles. Indeed, throughout the remainder of the twentieth century and especially after the foundation of the apartheid policy in 1948, white writers, such as Dan Jacobson and Bessie Head, challenged their government and were subsequently forced or encouraged to leave South Africa, although it is important to remember that this protest took place from a position of privilege not open to black authors. Even now, however, the two most well-known South African novelists, > Nadine Gordimer and > I. M. Coetzee, are non-black. The oppression of white rule in South Africa dominates the novels of Gordimer, but is addressed obliquely through its impact on private experience. Writing primarily about the white middle classes, she traces the decay resulting from their involvement in a brutal and segregated social system. Coetzee addresses similar concerns in Age of Iron (1990) where he combines allegory and realism in a grim picture of a violent confrontation between police and Africans and the agonised complicity of a liberal white woman.

Until the 1960s, however, black writers were not given adequate resources or recognition to access the kind of international renown built up by Gordimer and Coetzee. For example, the first novel in English to be written by a black person was Sol T. Plaatje's Mhudi, which although it was written in 1919 was not published until 1930. After the Sharpville massacre, the rise of the Black Consciousness Movement and the Soweto Revolt political writing by blacks in English became a powerful tool in the movement towards revolution and violent activism. At first the black authors wrote in English to shock the white reader into an appreciation of their situation, but after the mid 1970s the purpose behind the use of English had changed and was now intended to incite militancy within the disparate black South African groups and by the 1980s poetry was being used openly at political rallies to inspire those fighting for a democratic state. Drama was similarly used for political effect, combining the alienating techniques of modernist European theatre with the older African forms of song, dance and narrative recitation. The work being staged at radical venues such as the Market Theatre in Johannesburg, on university campuses and in the townships, was very different from that which was recognised by the state-controlled Performing Arts Council, and was often censored or banned. Since 1990, however, when Nelson Mandela and F. W. de Klerk began their dismantling of the apartheid system, the political situation in South Africa seems redeemable even if the economic and social legacies of imperialism still dominate. The 'English Book' of white colonial power has left a dark and indelible stain of injustice and oppression at the heart of the South African map.

The links between African and Caribbean cultures are, of course, a further testimony to the inhumanity of the colonial system, and black Caribbean writers keep returning to the traumas of transportation and slavery in their works, as for example in > George Lamming's novel Natives of My Person (1971), in Dennis Scott's play An Echo in the Bone (1985) and in Grace Nichols' poetry. Yet, while the literature of South Africa remains caught within the discourse of conflict, Caribbean writing has broken free from most of its old colonialist restraints and can now lay claim to being one of the most vibrant, exciting and imaginative of the post-colonial literatures. With the Carribean canon it is, in fact, difficult to know where to begin, but surely the most dominant figure in the region's literary output is > Derek Walcott, winner of the 1992 Nobel Prize for Literature. Walcott has dominated Caribbean poetry and drama for almost half a century, reworking European forms through a multicultural articulation of local experience. His epic book-length poem Omeros (1990) epitomises this achievement, engaging intertextually with a founding author of the Western European literary canon, Homer (Omeros is the Greek version of the name Homer). The heroes of The Odyssey are transmuted into fishermen on the Caribbean island of St Lucia: like Joyce in Ulysses, Walcott reworks symbols and events from Homer's classical epic in a seemingly more mundane context but invests that context with heroic resonance. The poem expresses powerfully the sense of loss arising from the displacement of slavery and the poem seeks some sense of healing through a magical journey to Africa. Walcott's stance is one of tolerance and reconciliation: there is a sympathetic portrait of a retired British soldier and the poet has commented that this man's genuine love for the island gives him the right to live there. This observation might even be taken as an oblique comment on Walcott's European readership, whose genuine love for his poetry would, on this interpretation, give them the right to inhabit it. The poetic evocations of the sights and sounds of the Caribbean are one of the many pleasures of this rich and complex work. Walcott has built upon a tradition of black Caribbean writing: in poetry the early and romanticised work of Horatio Nelson Huggins and the increased access to media production as in the BBC's radio programme Caribbean Voices gradually formed a Caribbean voice which resounded with political urgency and verbal immediacy, while in drama, > C. L. R. James' Toussaint L'ouverture (1936) and the small drama groups of the 1970s promoted rebellion and the struggle for an independent identity.

The Caribbean novel also played a part in the growth of a national literature, from Tom Redcam's early attempts to found an All-Jamaica Library, through V. S. Reid's New Day (1949) with its use of Jamaican Creole, to the works of > George Lamming, ▷ V. S. Naipaul, ▷ Jean Rhys and ▷ Wilson Harris. In this last group a more complex formulation of identity began to take place, for whereas Reid remained at home, subsequent writers left the Caribbean to settle in Britain and explored the personal and social consequences of this journey in their novels. To compound the complexity of this pattern of motion it is important to remember that the ancestors of many of these writers were brought to the West Indies from Africa as slaves, and that a return journey to the Caribbean was undertaken by several authors after experiencing deprivation and racism in Britain. It is hardly surprising therefore that the theme of journey, the sense of homelessness as a cultural condition, and a quest for a greater sense of belonging are found in much Caribbean fiction. Loss and alienation occur in > George Lamming's novel In the Castle of my Skin (1953) which is an autobiographical text written in the first person. It begins when the protagonist is nine with an evocation of a pre-war Barbados village dominated by the house of the white landlord and the ideology of 'little England'. A strong sense of community is implied, but also the presence of tension, violence and humiliation, and the style is poetic and symbolic; for example, a flood becomes an anticipation of chaos and disruption to come. The novel ends with the destruction of this community, with the protagonist's initiation into self-conscious black politics and his departure from the island; the concluding scene is his symbolic parting from the 'Pa' of the village - its oldest inhabitant and the emobodiment of its collective identity, who is about to be confined in an institution.

The best-known West Indian novelist is probably > V. S. Naipaul, who has written about the lives of Indian people in Trinidad, but has also published novels set in other parts of the world, such as England (The Mimic Men 1967), Mauritius (Guerrillas, 1975) and Africa (A Bend in the River, 1979). His early novels, such as The Mystic Masseur (1957), evoke the life of Trinidad with an elegant clarity which emphasises both its sordid aspects and its vitality. A House For Mr Bismas (1961) deals with the hero's search for independence combined with the capacity to love and accept responsibility. This search is articulated by the metaphor of the building of a house, a focus of self-respect and growth in the face of the displacement which is the aftermath of colonisation. The novel is a work of considerable scope in the comic realist tradition. Naipaul's ancestors came to the West Indies from India, and in that sense he represents one of the many cultural links between different parts of what was once the British Empire.

▶ Wilson Harris stands alongside Naipaul as an internationally acclaimed novelist, but his work is very different; rather than adopting European forms and a realistic perspective as does Naipaul, Harris' novels, especially the Guyana Quartet (Palace of the Peacock, 1960; The Far Journey of Oudin, 1961; The Whole Armour, 1962; and The Secret Ladder, 1963) break down narrative progression and character consistency and search for a non-realist world in which the human psyche is the only linking force. The challenge to conventional modes is common in Caribbean fiction, for example, ▶ Jean Rhys in Wide Sargasso Sea (1966) employs polyphony, and ▶ Merle Collins in Angel (1987) writes in overtly poetic language.

Much contemporary Caribbean literature shares this thread of unconventionality which allows the author to call attention to European literary traditions while at the same time undercutting them and offering a powerful and sustained expression of indigenous culture. Ritual is important in the plays of Jamaica's Dennis Scott, especially in An Echo in the Bone (1985), carnival recurs in several plays, such as Sylvia Wynter's Maskarade (1979), while stickfighting and calypso are also used to endow West Indian drama with a unique character. However, it is Caribbean poetry that has become the most highly regarded aspect of West Indian literature. We have already commented upon Walcott's supreme achievements, but he has stiff competition from other poets such as Edward Kamu Brathwaite, Jean Binta Breeze and Linton Kwesi Johnson. Brathwaite, unlike Walcott, eschews European forms and has attempted to articulate an alternative poetic tradition founded in the African voice. Breeze and Johnson both belong to a well-known and highly acclaimed group of writers, the 'Dub' poets; like Brathwaite's poems, Dub poetry has its roots in the old oral culture of the West Indies but links these rhythms and themes with the more contemporary ones of reggae and Rastafarianism. Dub is performance-orientated poetry, although it is also available in published form in Britain. Indeed, a lot of Caribbean literature has been written away from its originating environment, in Britain, America and Canada, where there is more likelihood of economic reward and international recognition.

Conclusion

In this essay we have attempted to provide an overview of some of the most exciting developments in post-colonial literature, as well as to indicate something of the colonial background and its impact in each of the nation states discussed. As we have indicated considerable tensions are invoked by those post-colonial writers who do chose to write in English, because of the involvement of the language in the colonial process. The historical role of this language, together with the history of its use and development in diverse cultures, may significantly inflect matters of genre, style, technique, form and diction, responding and contributing to the continuing evolution of the many 'Englishes' of the world. Politically and linguistically, then, 'postcolonial' designates an ambivalent, conflictual situation, in which the after effects of imperialism remain powerful and where 'post' implies a transformation rather than an absolute break; in this respect it is analogous to post-modernism. Indeed, even should the subaltern succeed in formulating strategies of resistance to the colonial discourse of the past, he or she is often ambushed by the new colonial forces of Western capitalism. The 'English book' therefore, whether used as a tool of cultural imperialism, an articulation of resistance, protest and critique or a commodity in the multinational publishing business, must remain an ambivalent institution for the postcolonial nations. While post-colonial literatures assert the right of these nations to articulate their own independent literary identities, at the same time, the glittering array of talent, the vibrant new forms, and the fascination of culturally diverse subject matter have injected a much-needed vitality into late twentieth-century English literature. If the term 'English book' is used to mean, not 'a book written by an English person', but 'a book written in English', there can be no question that the discovery of these new English books has been amazingly fortuitous for the British public and, we hope, for those reading this essay.

Abbey Theatre, Dublin

The home of the Irish National Theatre Society from 1904 until a fire destroyed the building in 1951. The rebuilt Abbey remains a significant force in contemporary Irish theatre. The Society, usually known by the name of its theatre, grew from a fusion of the Irish National Dramatic Company, led by the actor W. G. Fay, and the Irish Literary Theatre founded by the poet ➤ W. B. Yeats, his friend ➤ Lady Gregory and others. The time was propitious: there was an intense national feeling in Ireland and an accompanying literary revival; Europe was undergoing the awakening influences of ▷ Ibsen and > Strindberg; Yeats was a major poet with strong interest in the drama. Consequently the Abbey Theatre was a focus for creative energies which made it a unique institution in the history of the English-speaking theatre. However, the movement was neither the mere mouthpiece of Irish patriotism, nor just a vehicle for European fashions. Though Ibsen was a stimulus and dominated at least one of the Irish dramatists (Edward Martyn), its most outstanding contributor, > J. M. Synge, was in reaction against Ibsen, as was Yeats himself. Neither of them tolerated the prejudices of the more radical nationalists. Synge's masterpiece, > The Playboy of the Western World, caused a riot in the theatre when it was produced there in 1007. Yeats used verse of increasing vigour and austerity in a renewal of poetic drama that ranked the Abbey with the most interesting experimental theatres of the time in Europe - the Théâtre Libre in Paris and the Freie Bühne in Berlin. The heroic period of the Abbey Theatre ended with Synge's death and Yeats' retirement from its management in 1909; but under Lennox Robinson the Abbey remained a theatre of distinction. Its most notable playwright after that time was ⊳ Sean O'Casev.

Abelard, Peter (1079-1142)

Philosopher, scholar and author who taught at the University of Paris early in the 12th century. At the height of his fame he eloped with his pupil, Heloise, niece of one of the most powerful canons of Notre Dame. She bore their son Astrolabe and, to appease the anger of her uncle, Abelard proposed that they should be secretly married; open marriage was out of the question as it would obstruct Abelard's career in the Church. The marriage took place against Heloise's wishes, for she did not want her lover to risk his future prospects for her sake, and she refused to admit to it when challenged to do so. Heloise became a nun at Agenteuil and her uncle took his revenge on Abelard by causing him to be castrated. A correspondence, later famed, ensued between the separated couple. Abelard told the story of his love affair in his Historia Calamitatum. Abelard continued his career as a teacher but, at the instigation of Bernard of Clairvaux, he was eventually condemned for heresy (1141). Abelard died in 1141, Heloise in 1164. Their love affair became legendary and more recent literary treatments include Pope's poem Eloisa to Abelard (1717) and George Moore's novel Héloise and Abelard (1921). Helen Waddell has written a novelistic account of Abelard's life, Peter Abelard (1933). Bib: Radice, B. (ed.), The Letters of Abelard and Eloise.

Abergavenny, Frances Neville (?-d 1576)
Devotional writer. She wrote a collection of prayers which were originally intended for her daughter's personal use, but which were published in the first and fifth parts of Thomas Bentley's Momument of Matrones (1582). The prayers are written about essentially female experiences, such as childbirth. Frances Neville's writing is part of an expanding group of Renaissance women's writing which may be read both as an example of private devotion, as well as for its more general account of how women lived at that time.

Abolition literature

Literature directed towards the abolition of slavery. In Britain slave trading became a cause célèbre in 1788, was outlawed in 1807, and made a capital offence in 1824. While most people are aware of the anti-slavery writing in America, Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) being a prime example, similar literature in England is often neglected. The most important abolitionist in Britain during this period was > William Wilberforce. Amongst other writers the most notable to write abolitionist texts are > Mary Wollstonecraft, Elizabeth Benger, > Hannah More, > Henry Brougham, and > Susannah Watts.

> Prince, Mary.

Abrahams, Peter (b 1919)

Novelist. Born in South Africa, which he left in 1939. After two years working as a sailor he lived in England (1941-56) and in France (1948-50) before moving to Jamaica in 1956. He has worked as an editor, journalist and broadcaster. His novels are all set in Africa (with the exception of This Island Now, 1966, set in Jamaica), and are concerned with social and political issues, particularly racial oppression. Wild Conquest (1950) deals with the historical theme of the Great Trek. Dark Testament (1042) is a collection of stories. His other novels are: Song of the City (1945); Mine Boy (1946); The Path of Thunder (1948); A Wreath for Udomo (1956); A Night of Their Own (1965); The View from Coyaba (1985); Pressure Drop (1991); Revolution, No 9 (1992). His non-fiction includes: Return to Goli (1953); Tell Freedom: Memories of Africa (1954) and Jamaica: an Island Mosaic (1957).

Absalom and Achitophel (1681)

A > satire in heroic couplets by > John Dryden, allegorizing the political crisis of the last years of > Charles II in terms of the Old Testament story of King David and his rebellious son Absalom (2 Samuel 13-19) (> Bible). Charles had no legitimate son and his heir was his brother James, Duke of York, a Catholic (> Catholicism), whose succession was feared by many as a menace to the > Church of England and the liberty of Parliament. The Whigs, led by Anthony Ashley Cooper, the Earl of ➤ Shaftesbury, introduced a Bill excluding James from the throne and substituting Charles' illegitimate son, the > Duke of Monmouth. Dryden wrote his poem at the king's suggestion, in order to influence the public against the Whigs. His handling of the biblical story glamorized the king, by paralleling his licentiousness with that of the patriarch David, and represented the Whigs as anarchic enemies of God's anointed. Monmouth becomes Absalom, Shaftesbury becomes the evil tempter Achitophel, the Duke of Buckingham appears as Zimri, and > Titus Oates as Corah. Part II, which was published in 1682, is mainly by > Nahum Tate, but includes a vivid passage by Dryden (ll 412-509) satirizing the poets Settle and ▷ Shadwell under the names Doeg and Og.

Abse, Dannie (b 1923)

Poet. Abse was born in Cardiff, and trained as a doctor in Cardiff and London. His volumes of verse include: After Every Green Thing (1949); Tenants of the House (1957); A Small Desperation (1968); Selected Poems (1970); Way Out in the Centre (1981); Collected Poems, 1948–1976 (1977); Ask the Bloody Horse (1986); White Coat, Purple Coat: Poems 1948–1988 (1989); Remembrance of Crimes Past: Poems 1986–1989 (1990); and On the Evening Road (1994). He has also written novels, plays, and autobiographical material.

Absence

A term used in a variety of modern critical theories. The argument is that what is present in a text is, to a large extent, determined by features which are absent from immediate notice. For example, for ▷ psychoanalytic critics, what an author writes is determined not by what is immediately present to his or her consciousness, but by unconscious forces. However, it is in recent Marxist and ▷ deconstructionist theory that the idea has had the biggest impact. For the Marxists ▷ Louis Althusser and Pierre Macherey, a literary text is shaped by ideologies which the author often fails to understand or control. Thus, though literary texts allow us to see a pattern of ideological assumptions in reading and criticism, these often have no presence in the text itself. Althusser and Macherey note that this replicates a process experienced at a personal level where assumptions which profoundly shape a person's behaviour are often not recognised by the person who holds them. In this they were influenced by the work of the psychoanalyst > Jacques Lacan (> interpellation).

The term absence is also used by ➤ Jacques Derrida and his fellow deconstructionists to denote what is for them the normal, fundamental condition of writing. This is the absence of ultimate truths or grounds of belief. Deconstructionists hold that all writing covers over these absences with assumptions or illusions about stable, grounding presences like, for example, God or the invincibility of human reason. But it is the ultimate absence of these things which leads language into a series of > aporia and metaphorical > displacements and equivocations which try to conceal this. For deconstructionists writing is always shaped by absence and plunged, therefore, into a world of > difference. Bib: Macherey, P., A Theory of Literary

Achebe, Chinua (b 1930)

Nigerian novelist, poet and ➤ short-story writer. Born Albert Chinualumogu in Ogidi, East Central State, his mother tongue is Ibo, but he studied English from an early age and in 1953 graduated in English Literature from University College, Ibadan. He has worked in radio, publishing, journalism and as an academic, visiting universities in the U.S.A. In his five novels he has successfully incorporated African idioms and patterns of thought in a lucid English prose style. Things Fall Apart (1958), with its title drawn from > W. B. Yeats' poem 'The Second Coming', explores a principal African dilemma: the destruction of the indigenous culture by European influence. It concerns Okonkwo, a village leader whose inflexible adherence to tradition cannot withstand the influence of white missionaries. No Longer At Ease (1960) continues the theme of the conflict of African and European values, but in the urban context of Lagos in the 1950s. Arrow of God (1964) returns to tribal society, but at an earlier stage of colonialism, in the 1920s, while A Man of the People (1966) is again set in Lagos, with direct reference to the turbulent political events following Nigerian independence in 1960. His most recent novel, Anthills of the Savannah, was published in 1987. He has published two volumes of short stories, The Sacrificial Egg (1962) and Girls at War (1972) and two volumes of poetry: Beware Soul-Brother and Other Poems (1971) and Christmas in Biafra and Other Poems (1973). He also writes children's stories.

Ackroyd, Peter (b 1949)

Novelist, poet and critic. Born in London and educated at Cambridge University, he has been literary editor of the > Spectator and a reviewer of books, television and cinema for The Times and the Sunday Times. His first novel was The Great Fire of London (1982), followed by The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde (1983), which took the form of the fictional diaries of ➤ Wilde during his tragic last years in Paris, and won the Somerset Maugham award. Hawksmoor (1085) interweaves a police investigation in contemporary east London with a narrative set during the great plague of the 17th century, in which the architects Hawksmoor and Wren appear; the novel won both the Guardian Fiction Award and the Whitbread Prize for the best novel. Dan Lemo and the Limehouse Golem (1994). set in 1880s London, also involves historical characters in a mystery story and is written partly in dialogue. Chatterton (1987) is in part literary detective-story (in which it resembles > A.S. Byatt's Possession) and combines historical pastiche (also a notable feature of Hawksmoor) with black comedy and elements of the sentimental and grotesque. First Light (1989) stages a confrontation between science and magic through the story of an archaeological dig in Dorset; English Music (1992), is a novel about Englishness and artistic traditions and The House of Doctor Dee (1993) a supernatural story centred on a house in London and the past. Ackroyd has published three volumes of poetry: London Lickpenny (1973); Country Life (1978) and The Diversions of Purley (1987). His non-fiction includes: Notes for a New Culture: An Essay on Modernism (1976); Dressing Up: Transvestism and Drag: The History of an Obsession (1979); Ezra Pound and his World (1980); T.S. Eliot (1984) (which won the Whitbread Prize for biography); Dickens (1990).

Acrostic

A literary game in which the initial letters of the lines of a poem spell a word when read downwards in order.

Kind sister! aye, this third name says you are; Enchanted has it been the Lord knows where. And may it taste to you like good old wine, Take you to real happiness and give Sons, daughters and a home like honied hive.

The initial letters spell 'Keats'; and it is the third verse of an acrostic poem to Georgiana Augusta Keats, by her brother-in-law > John Keats. A double acrostic can also be read downwards with the last letters of each line.

Act

In drama: a division of a play; acts are sometimes subdivided into scenes. The ancient Greeks did not use divisions into acts; the practice was started by the Romans and the poet-critic ➤ Horace (1st century BC) in his Ars Poetica laid down the principle that the number of acts should be five. Since the renaissance of classical learning in the 16th century, most dramatists have used act divisions, and many have obeyed Horace's precepts. All ➤ Shakespeare's plays are divided into acts and scenes in modern editions, but it is certain that he did not write them in labelled scenes, and uncertain whether he thought in terms of acts; some of the first printed versions of his plays show act divisions and some do not. In the 17th century plays were divided into 5 acts as suggested by Horace, since then dramatists have used 3 acts.

Act of Settlement (1701)

An ➤ Act of Parliament excluding the heirs of the deposed Catholic monarch > James II, and all other Catholics (> Catholicism) from the throne. The Act supplemented the ➤ Bill of Rights of 1689, which in turn confirmed in law events of the > Glorious Revolution of 1688. The Act of Settlement conveyed the succession to the > Protestant German House of Hanover. It was passed following the death of ➤ Queen Anne's only surviving child, the Duke of Gloucester, in 1701, and in anticipation that she would die childless, as in fact she did. In this case the throne would revert to James I's granddaughter Sophia, the Electress of Hanover and nearest Protestant relation to the > Stuarts, and to her heirs, rather than to James II's Catholic son. Thus, the Act confirmed the concept of a constitutional monarchy, overriding the superior hereditary rights of James' son, who became known as the > Old Pretender. In addition, the Act stipulated that the monarch must belong to the > Church of England, that he or she must not leave the country without the permission of Parliament, nor involve the country in wars to defend the territories of foreign monarchs, nor appoint foreigners to Government posts. Furthermore, it provided for judges to receive fixed salaries, and prohibited their removal without the action of Parliament, except in the case of an offence proved in a court of law. These provisions assisted the separation of powers between the monarchy, Parliament and the judiciary, which > Locke had thought essential to liberty.

Acting, The profession of Acting began to achieve recognition as a profession in the reign of Elizabeth I. The important date is the building of The Theatre — the first theatre in England — by James Burbage in 1576. It was followed by many others in London, and theatres soon became big business. Previously, actors had performed where they could, especially in inn yards and the halls of palaces, mansions, and colleges. They continued to do so, but the existence of theatres gave them a base and (though they still required an official licence) independence such as they badly needed in order to win social recognition.

Until the mid-16th century acting was practised by many kinds of people: ordinary townsmen at festivals, wandering entertainers, boys and men from the choirs of the great churches, and members of the staffs of royal or aristocratic households. It was from these last that the professional actors emerged. They still wore the liveries - uniforms and badges of the great households, but the connection was now loose (good performers could transfer from one household to another) and was chiefly a means of procuring a licence to perform. This licence was essential because the City of London, around which dramatic activity concentrated, feared the theatre as providing centres of infection for the recurrent plague epidemics (which from time to time sent the companies away on tour) and disliked acting as a morally harmful and anomalous way of life. Moreover, the royal court, which favoured the stage, was nonetheless on guard against it as a potential source of sedition. Censorship and licensing, however, had the advantage of helping to distinguish the serious performers from the vulgar entertainers.

By the time of Elizabeth's death two great companies were dominant: the Lord Chamberlain's Men, for whom > Shakespeare wrote, and the Lord Admiral's Men, headed by the leading actor of the day, Edward Alleyn. Women did not perform; their parts were taken by boys who enlisted as apprentices. Companies of boy actors from the choirs of St Paul's and the Chapels Royal also had prestige (see Hamlet II.2), especially in the 1570s. The establishment of the profession owed most to the dramatists, but much to the energy of actor-managers and theatre proprietors such as Philip Henslowe, Edward Alleyn, James Burbage, and his son Richard.

Actresses were allowed to perform after the Restoration of the monarchy (1660). The status of the profession continued to rise, aided by the theatre's ceasing to be the entertainment of all classes and becoming a fashionable pleasure of the London West End. In the 18th century the genius and culture of David Garrick greatly enhanced the prestige of the profession. From his time on, there is a long roll of great acting names. The first actor to be knighted was \triangleright Henry Irving, Radical theatrical developments in the 20th century have challenged the traditional relationship between an actor and the audience, and the growth of improvised theatre has widened the actor's performance skills. ➤ Konstantin Stanislavsky's theories of acting, ➤ Antonin Artaud's ➤ Theatre of Cruelty and ➤ Bertolt Brecht's practice of Verfremdungseffekt (➤ alienation effect) have had a profound impact on the acting profession this century. More recently, actors have been seriously affected by the more material conditions of decline in public funding for theatres. ➤ Theatres; R.S.C.; Littlewood, Joan; Olivier, Laurence.

Adam Bede (1859)

A novel by > George Eliot. The setting is a village in the English Midlands and the events take place at the beginning of the 19th century. Adam Bede is the village carpenter, a young man of stern morals and great strength of character; he is in love with Hetty Sorrel, the vain and frivolous niece of a farmer, Martin Poyser. She is seduced by the village squire. Another principal character is the young and beautiful Dinah Morris, a Methodist preacher whom Adam marries after Hetty has been transported for the murder of her child. The novel belongs to the early phase of George Eliot's art when her principal subject was the rural civilization which had been the background of her youth; the fine parts of the novel are those scenes, such as the Povser household, which are directly concerned with this way of life.

Adam, Robert (1728-92)

Architect. His work is representative of the middle period of > Augustan taste, as the earlier period of it is expressed in the buildings of ➤ Christopher Wren and ➤ John Vanbrugh. The earlier period was bold and dramatic in its display of shapes and ornaments; the Adam period was graceful and delicate. He was a particularly fine interior designer and is famous for the designs of his ceilings and mantelpieces. His taste was much influenced by ancient Roman architecture in Italy, for instance the ruins of the town of Pompeii and the palace of the Emperor Diocletian (AD 245-313) at Spalato (Split). The last he used as the pattern for a fine urban development (demolished in 1936) overlooking the Thames in London; he carried it out with the help of his brother James, and thus called it the Adelphi from the Greek for 'brothers'. His work in London, like most good 18th-century architecture there, has been ruined or destroyed, but Edinburgh has preserved some of his best street architecture and a number of country houses survive, either designed throughout by him or ornamented in part. These include Harewood House (Yorkshire), Mersham-le-Hatch (Kent), Syon House (near London) and Kenwood (Hampstead, London).

Adams, Sarah Flower (1805-48)

Poet, journalist and author of the hymn 'Nearer My God to Thee'. A close friend of poet Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822), Adams continued to follow the ideals of > Romanticism in direct contrast to the new sociological aesthetic espoused by writers such as > Thomas Carlyle and > Charles Dickens. She is linked with the influential but eccentric and eventually discredited school of poets satirized by ➤ William Aytoun as the ➤ 'Spasmodics'. She is chiefly remembered for Vivia Perpetua (1841), a dramatic poem about the life and death of an early Christian martyr. An early champion of women's rights, she insisted on a 'no housekeeping' pact with her husband and, at the age of eighteen, broke the record for the ascent of Ben Lomond by a woman.

Adcock, Fleur (b 1934)

Poet and translator. Born and educated in New Zealand, Adcock has lived in Britain since 1963. Her volumes of poetry include: The Eye of the Hurricane (1964); Tigers (1967); High Tide in the Garden (1971); The Scenic Route (1974) and The Inner Harbour (1970). In 1982 she edited the Oxford Book of Contemporary New Zealand Poetry and the Faber Book of 20th Century Women's Poetry, and more recent works include The Incident Book (1986) and Time-Zones (1991). A volume of her Selected Poems appeared in 1983. She has also translated medieval Latin poetry and Greek poetry.

Addison, Joseph (1672–1719)

Poet, politician and essayist, Addison is now best known for his contributions to two periodicals, > The Tatler (founded by > Richard Steele) and > The Spectator (which he co-edited with Steele). The Tatler appeared three times a week in 1709-11, and The Spectator was issued daily, 1711-12 and 1714. The Tatler and The Spectator were designed as coffee-house periodicals, aiming to elevate the level of conversation by discussion of manners, morals, literature and philosophy. Addison claimed that they were enormously influential, as each printed copy could be passed around at least 20 people. The character of > Sir Roger de Coverley, a country gentleman, was largely created by Addison.

Addison's first literary success was a poem, The Campaign (1705), celebrating the victory of >> Blenheim the previous year. His classical tragedy Cato (1713) was also a contemporary success. In his political career, Addison was a Whig Member of Parliament, and, briefly, a Secretary of State.

Addresser/addressee

Terms used in language theory to denote the sender and receiver of verbal messages. In his influential essay 'Closing Statement: Linguistics and Poetics' (1960), > Roman Jakobson argues that to be effective, addresser and addressee must share a context, a code and a channel of communication.

Admiral's Men, The Lord

A company of Elizabethan actors under the protection of Lord Howard of Effingham, who became Lord Admiral in 1585. They are first heard of in 1574, and were at their height in the 1590s, when they were led by one of the two chief actors of the time, > Edward Alleyn, and when their only rivals were the > Lord Chamberlain's Men, who were led by the other, ➤ Richard Burbage. As Burbage was ➤ Shakespeare's leading actor, so Alleyn and the Admiral's Men were associated with > Christopher Marlowe. The chief financial management of the company was under Alleyn himself and his father-in-law, > Philip Henslowe, a financier. In the reign of > James I (1603-25) the company came under the patronage of his eldest son, Prince Henry; and on his death under that of James' son-in-law, the Elector of the Palatinate. The company came to an end in 1628.

Adonais (1821)

An elegy in ➤ Spenserian stanzas by ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley, mourning the death of ➤ John Keats, which had been attributed to a violent attack on Keats' poem > Endymion in the > Quarterly Review (1818). In his preface, Shelley compares the brutal insensitivity of the reviewer to that of the wild boar which killed the mythical Adonis - hence the poem's title. Shelley was not well acquainted with Keats and the inspiration of the poem is fundamentally literary. Based in part on the lament for Adonis by the Sicilian-Greek poet Bion (1st century BC), the poem is elaborately rhetorical. While Keats is depicted as a symbol of creativity in a hostile world, the poem is in many important respects about Shelley himself.

Advancement of Learning, The (1605)
A philosophical treatise by ▷ Francis Bacon published in 1605 in English, and expanded in a Latin version entitled De Augmentis Scientiarium published in 1623.

The purpose of the book is to suggest ways in which the pursuit of knowledge can be encouraged, and the methods of observation and recording of both natural and human phenomena improved. To this end, Bacon's work proposes nothing less than a taxonomy of all knowledge, a proposition strikingly familiar to that advanced by the French Encyclopaedists of the 16th century.

Perhaps the most influential aspect of The Advancement is the methodology that Bacon employs. In surveying all fields of knowledge Bacon offers a form of catalogue of existing fields of enquiry. This attempt at classification, whereby branches of knowledge are grouped together under common headings, relies on a system of particularization. In each subject considered, Bacon argues that the first step is the fresh observation of the detail of the phenomena. Once the detail, or particularities, had been assimilated it would become possible, through the process of induction, to assert the general propositions under which groups of phenomena could be considered. This method signalled both a break from what Bacon considered to be the traditional methods of enquiry (which involved deduction from generalized propositions) and the re-examination of observable phenomena through the process of experimentation.

As a theorist of scientific method (rather than as an experimenter in his own right) Bacon was to have considerable influence on the early founders of > The Royal Society, particularly in the area of language reform. On the question of language, and the idea of an appropriate language for scientific discourse, The Advancement of Learning is a key text. At the same time, the importance of language to Bacon's project necessitated an exploration of poetic language which was to be influential for poets of the later 17th century, in particular > Abraham Cowley.

Advice literature

A branch of writing related to > conduct literature, but less formal, in which the author offers advice on behaviour, often to a named individual such as a son or daughter. The form developed during the late 17th century, and became increasingly popular during the 18th, when it was most often directed towards the female sex, although there are notable exceptions, such as > Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his son and godson.

Debates about the status and nature of women altered advice literature in the 18th century. Women were still addressed as maids, wives or widows, but the debate about friendship in > marriage inevitably brought up the question of the education of women (> education): and this fed into debates on conduct. The changes in advice on conduct are subtle, and the literature continued to advise the woman to adapt herself to circumstances, and particularly to her husband. For example, a relatively conservative advice book, The Lady's New-Year's Gift: or, Advice to a Daughter by George Savile, Marquis of Halifax, concentrates on the need for a woman to adapt her feelings. He recommends 'wise use of everything [one] may dislike in a husband' to transform that which might breed 'aversion' to be 'very supportable'. But he hopes that his daughter gets 'a Wise Husband, one that by knowing how to be Master . . . will not let you feel the weight of it'. In Letters Moral and Entertaining (1729-33), > Elizabeth (Singer) Rowe has a character note the relationship between feelings and conduct when she says, 'I was sensible of the delusion and how easily vice betrays an unguarded mind.' ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft's (early) ➤ Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787) adds the perception that feelings and conduct are linked to the argument for education. She writes, 'in a comfortable situation a cultivated mind is necessary to render a woman contented; and in a miserable one it is her only consolation.'

The tradition of advice literature underlies many of the novels of the 18th and 19th centuries, among them those of > Samuel Richardson and > Jane Austen.

Aelfric (c 955-c 1010)

Scholar and great prose writer who was a monk of Winchester (under Bishop Aethelwold), and taught at Cerne Abbas (987–1002) before being made abbot of a new foundation at Eynsham, near Oxford. His works include two series of homilies, saints' lives, pastoral letters, translations from the Old Testament, and educational aids including a Latin grammar and a Latin textbook in dialogue form. The rhythmical prose style developed by Aelfric, above all in his Lives of Saints, shares some features of > alliterative verse, being patterned around two-stress phrases, often linked by alliteration. The status of his work is reflected in the number of manuscripts which survive (some from the 12th century). The scope of Aelfric's work and his pedagogical interests are a testimony of the cultural renaissance inspired by the Benedictine Reform movement of the tenth century; the status of his work is attested by the number of manuscripts which survive (some copied in the 12th century). Aeneas

Hero of the Latin epic > Aeneid by > Virgil. Traditions about him had existed long before Virgil's poem. He was the son of Anchises and the goddess > Aphrodite, and the son-inlaw of Priam, king of > Troy. In > Homer's Iliad (v) he is represented as the chief of the Trojans and one of the most formidable defenders of Troy against the Greeks. Other records stated that after the fall of Troy, he set out to seek a new kingdom with some of the surviving Trojans, and eventually settled in central Italy. By Virgil's time, the Romans were already worshipping Aeneas as the father of their race.

Aeneid

An ⊳ epic poem by the Roman poet ⊳ Virgil (70-19BC). The poem tells the story of > Aeneas, from his flight from > Troy during the confusion of its destruction by the Greeks to his establishment as king of the Latins in central Italy and his death in battle with the Etruscans. The poem thus begins at a point near where > Homer left off in the > Iliad, and its description of the wanderings of Aeneas is parallel to the description of the wanderings of Odysseus in Homer's > Odyssey. It is divided into 12 books, of which the second, fourth and sixth are the most famous: the second describes the destruction of Troy; the fourth gives the tragedy of Queen Dido of Carthage, who dies for love of Aeneas; the sixth shows his descent to the underworld and the prophetic visions of those who are to build the greatness of Rome.

Virgil wished to relate the Rome he knew, a settled and luxurious civilization which threatened to degenerate into complacent mediocrity, to her heroic past, and to inspire her with a sense of her great destiny in world history. The Aeneid is thus a central document for Roman culture, and inasmuch as Roman culture is the basis of the culture of Western Europe, it has remained a central document for European culture too.

The most notable English translations of the Aeneid are those by the Scottish poet ▷ Gavin Douglas (1553) and by > John Dryden (1697). Henry Howard, ➤ Earl of Surrey translated Books II and III into the earliest example of English blank verse.

Aeolian

From Aeolus, god of the winds in ancient Greek myth (> Classical Mythology). An Aeolian harp is a stringed instrument, placed across a window or outside a house, so that the wind causes the strings to vibrate and make music; an example may be seen at Dove Cottage in the Lake District. The poet > Samuel Taylor Coleridge possessed one; hence his poem The Eolian Harp (1795) and references to the instrument in Dejection (1802). For him, it symbolized his conception of the poet 'played upon' by Nature.

Aeolists

In > Swift's satire > A Tale of a Tub (1704), a fictional sect of believers in direct inspiration: 'The learned Aeolists maintain the original cause of all things to be wind. . .'. Swift's satire is an attack on all pretensions to truth not in accord with right reason or properly constituted authority, and the Aeolists, in Section VIII, are a kind of climax to the work. He associates them particularly with the > Dissenters, who based their religious faith on belief in direct intimations from the Holy Spirit to the individual soul; Jack, who represents > Presbyterianism in the Tale, is a leader of the sect.

Aeschylus (525-456 BC)

One of the great tragic poets of ancient Greece. Only seven of his 70 plays survive; of these the best known are Agamemnon, Choephori and Eumenides, making up the Oresteia trilogy. Aeschylus is the great starting point of all European tragedy. Shelley's masterpiece > Prometheus Unbound (1820) was written as a kind of sequel to Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound.

Aeson

A Greek composer of animal > fables of the 6th century BC. He probably did not write them down, but fables purporting to be his were collected by later classical writers, and they and imitations of them have had a wide popularity in European literature. The most notable Aesopian fable in English literature is Chaucer's ➤ Nun's Priest's Tale of the Cock and the Fox in the ▷ Canterbury Tales.

Aestheticism

A movement of the late 19th century, influenced by the Pre-Raphaelites and John Ruskin, but its immediate inspiration was the writings of the Oxford don Walter Pater. His two most influential books were Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873) and Marius the Epicurean (1885). These show him as a ritualistic moralist, laying emphasis on the value of ecstatic experience. Apart from Pater and his predecessors, the aesthetes owed much to the current French doctrine of 'L'Art pour l'Art' (Art for Art's Sake) but they retained, if sometimes not obviously, a typically English concern with moral values and issues. The outstanding aesthete was > Oscar Wilde (1865-1900), and a characteristic aesthetic product was his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891). As the movement lacked a programme, writers of very different characters were influenced by it: the naturalistic novelist > George Moore; the poet Lionel Johnson who was a Catholic convert; Swinburne, a main channel for the art for art's sake doctrine; > W. B. Yeats, the Celtic revivalist. A characteristic aestheticist periodical was > The Yellow Book (1894-7), so called because French novels, conventionally considered 'daring', were printed on yellow paper. Its main illustrator was ➤ Aubrey Beardsley, whose line drawings were notorious for their sensuality. The excesses and affectations of the movement's adherents were much ridiculed in ▶ Punch.

Aesthetics

In general terms, the philosophical investigation of beauty, particularly artistic beauty. It is a term not often used in current critical discourse, partly because it tends to be associated with the idea of art-for-art's-sake. The word acquired this colouring through its association with the late 19th-century movement > Aestheticism.

Affective fallacy, The

An influential phrase coined by the leading American New Critics W. K. Wimsatt and Monroe C. Beardsley in 1954. The affective fallacy is the belief that literature can be evaluated by assessing how it affects readers emotionally. Wimsatt and Beardsley rejected the importance of affective reactions because, they believed, these were too often contaminated by ignorance or inaccurate understanding. Instead, they believed, criticism should be based upon the analysis of so-called 'objective' features like the identification of irony and structure. Approaches to literature by way of readerresponse criticism, however, are more highly regarded today.

Ages, Golden, Silver, etc.

The Greek poet Hesiod (8th century BC), in Works and Days, writes of an ideal golden age in the past, comparable to the Garden of Eden; from this period, he considered that there had been a progressive decline through the silver, bronze, and heroic ages until his own time.

➤ Virgil, in his fourth Eclogue, writes of a child who is to restore the golden age. This has sometimes been interpreted as a prophecy of the birth of Christ. > Milton, in On the Morning of Christ's Nativity (1629), hopes that following Christ's birth, 'Time will run back and fetch the age of gold' (XIV. 135). The Restoration of ➤ Charles II led to suggestions that the golden age had been restored with his accession. But the image of the golden age remained a potent one, for poets, dramatists, historians, philosophers and others, among them ➤ Aphra Behn, whose ➤ pastoral poem The Golden Age (1684), is adapted from a translation of lines by the Italian poet Torquato Tasso (1544-95); and > Pope, who laments the loss of the golden age in > Essays on Criticism (line 478). The idea of a golden age is important in Utopian literature.

Agnes Grey (1847)

A semi-autobiographical novel by ➤ Anne Brontë which first appeared under the ➤ pseudonym Acton Bell. Agnes is a rector's daughter who joins the household of the Bloomfield family to work as a ➤ governess. The vivid portrayal of the spoilt children owes much to Brontë's experience with the Ingham family, for whom she worked in 1839. Similarly, the portrait of Rosalie, the flirtatious daughter of the Murray family, draws on Brontë's experience working for the Robinsons (1841–5). The novel departs from autobiography in its later chapters, as the gentle and modest Agnes is united with the kind curate, Mr Weston, by whom she has three children.

Agnosticism

The term was invented by the biologist Thomas Huxley in 1869 to express towards religious faith the attitude which is neither of belief nor of disbelief (> atheism). In his own words, 'I neither affirm nor deny the immortality of man. I see no reason for believing it, but on the other hand I have no means of disproving it.' Agnosticism was widespread among writers between 1850 and 1914; it arose from the scientific thought of the time, especially that of Huxley himself, and that of another biologist, > Charles Darwin.

Aguliar, Grace (1816-47)

Aguliar was born in Hackney, London, the eldest child of Spanish-Jewish parents. She is chiefly remembered today as a sentimental novelist and prose writer, although she was also a poet. She never married, and after her father's death she wrote for a profession, publishing several works on Judaism. The Spirit of Judaism (1842) was a controversial attack on the formalities of institutionalized religion, while Women of Israel (1845) and The Jewish Faith (1846) express a concern with the position of women within the faith. Her first novel, Home Influence (1847), was the only one to be published in her lifetime. Other novels include The Mother's Recompense (1851) and ▷ Woman's Friendship (1853).

Aidoo, Ama Ata (b 1942)

Ghanaian novelist, poet and playwright. Educated at the University of Ghana, she was for a time Secretary of Education for Ghana but has lived in Zimbabwe since 1983, where she has worked for the Ministry of Education and is chair of the Zimbabwe Women Writers Group. Her first novel, Our Sister Killjoy or Reflections from a Black-Eved Squint (1978), uses a range of narrative techniques, including interpolated poetic commentary, the ironic use of a range of narrative voices, typographical effects and elements drawn from oral narration. The story of a Ghanaian woman who travels to Europe to encounter both racism and the appeal of affluence, it is a critique of racism and sexism, and an appeal for Africans to commit themselves to the development of their own countries. Here, as elswhere in her work, Aidoo challenges the portrayal of African women and of 'mother Africa' in the work of male African novelists such as ➤ Kofi Awoonor. Changes: a Love Story (1991) is similarly technically inventive. Her plays are The Dilemma of a Ghost (1965) and Anowa (1970); No Sweetness Here (1970) is a collection of short stories and An Angry Letter in January (1992) is a volume of poems. She has also written a historical study of the Asante kingdom.

Aikin, Lucy (1781-1864)

Poet, biographer and children's author. Aikin lacked self-confidence as a creative writer, classifying herself as an editor or translator rather than as an author of original works. However, her Epistles on Women (1810) and Memoirs of the Court of Queen Elizabeth (1818) reveal that she was, respectively, a fine poet and adept political allegorist. She was acquainted with many other women authors of her age, and wrote a memoir of ▷ Joanna Baillie.

Ainsworth, William Harrison (1805–82)
Novelist. His best novels are historical: Jack Shepherd (1839), The Tower of London (1840),
Guy Fawkes (1841), Old St Paul's (1841), Windsor Castle (1843). He tended to idealize the heroic criminal, for example Dick Turpin in Rookwood (1834) and Jack Shepherd; this was a literary fashion in the 1830s and 1840s and censured by the ▷ Victorian novelist William Thackeray (1811–63) in his early reviews under the designation 'The Newgate School of novelists'. Ainsworth edited Bentley's Magazine

1840-2, Ainsworth's Magazine 1842-53 and New Monthly Magazine from 1853. Bib: Ellis, S. M., W. H. Ainsworth and his Friends; Worth, G. J., William Harrison Ainsworth.

Akenside, Mark (1721-70)

Poet. Son of a butcher in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and a physician by profession. He wrote the influential The Pleasures of Imagination (1744), a philosophical poem in Miltonic blank verse (▷ Milton, John). The assured reflective modulations of the poem influenced ▷ William Wordsworth's style in ▷ The Prelude, the subject matter of which − childhood impressions, the moral influence of landscape − is often the same. Akenside also wrote lyric poems and odes. Bib: Houpt, C. H., Mark Akenside: A Biographical and Critical Study.

Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (1819–61)
Husband (with the title of Prince Consort) of Queen ➤ Victoria. They were cousins. The Queen was devoted to him and the marriage was of considerable political importance; Albert did much to shape the Queen's ideas of her political duties as a constitutional monarch who could not interfere directly in politics but could nonetheless exert great personal influence.
➤ The Great Exhibition of 1851 was organized on his suggestion.

Unfortunately, his foreign origin caused his influence to be regarded with considerable suspicion in Britain. His death was a cause of immense grief to the Queen; it led to her retirement from public appearances between 1861 and the Jubilee of her reign in 1887.

Albion

The most ancient name for Britain, used in Greek by Ptolemy and in Latin by Pliny. The word possibly derived from Celtic, but it was associated by the Romans with the Latin albus = white, referring to the white cliffs of Dover. From the ▷ Middle Ages on it has often been used poetically to stand for Britain, notably by William Blake, one of the main influences on Michael Horowitz's key poetry anthology, Children of Albion (1970).

Alchemist, The (1610)

A comedy by ➤ Ben Jonson. The scene is a house in London during a visitation of the plague; its master, Lovewit, has taken refuge in the country, leaving his servant, Face, in charge. Face introduces two rogues: Subtle, a charlatan alchemist, and Dol Common, a whore. Together they collaborate in turning the house into a centre for the practice of alchemy in the expectation of attracting credulous clients who will believe that alchemical magic can bring them their heart's desire. Their expectations are realized, and their dupes are representative social types. Sir Epicure Mammon dreams of limitless luxury and the satisfaction of his lust; the Puritans, Ananias and Tribulation Wholesome, hope to enrich their sect; Drugger, a tobacco merchant, wants prosperity for his business; Dapper, a lawyer's clerk, seeks a spirit to guarantee him success in gambling; Kastril, a young country squire, desires a rich husband for his sister (Dame Pliant) and knowledge of the secret of fashionable quarrelling. Only Pertinax Surly, a friend of Mammon, sees the fraudulence of the enterprise, but Face and his colleagues manage to turn the clients against him and he is routed. Each of the clients has to be deceived by a separate technique, depending on his peculiar brand of social credulity, and this requires swift changes of role by the cheats, especially Subtle. They are equal to all emergencies until Lovewit suddenly returns - a crisis which only Face survives. He expels Subtle and Common, and then wins over his master, who admires his ingenuity and is satisfied with the plunder, which includes Dame Pliant. The play is one of Jonson's best; it has energetic wit and extraordinary theatrical ingenuity. Moreover the characterization has behind it the force of Jonson's conviction that human folly is limitless and can be cured only by exposure and castigation.

Aldington, Richard (1892-1962)

Poet, critic and novelist, and key member of the early ▷ modernist ▷ Imagist group of poets. He was married to the poet ⊳ Hilda Doolittle (H. D.) in 1913 (although they soon parted), and was a close friend of a number of central modernist figures, including > D. H. Lawrence and, later, ➤ Lawrence Durrell (their correspondence was published in 1981 as Literary Lifelines). Publications include: Images 1910-1915 (1915), Collected Poems (1928), Death of a Hero (1929) (a novel based upon his experiences of gas-attacks and shell-shock in the War), The Colonel's Daughter (1931) and All Men are Enemies (1933). Aldington was also an important biographer, author of D. H. Lawrence: Portrait of a Genius, But ... (1950) and Lawrence of Arabia: A Biographical Enquiry (1955).

Aldiss, Brian (b 1925)

➤ Science Fiction.

Alexander, Mrs (Annie Hector, née French) (1825–1902)

Novelist, born in Dublin, who published over 45 novels, most of which revolve around young heroines seeking to reconcile love and financial security. They include: Look Before You Leap (1865), Which Shall it Be (1866), The Wooing O't (1873), Her Dearest Foe (1876), The Freres (1882), The Admiral's Ward (1883). Kitty Costello (1904) is partly autobiographical. Because of her husband's ill health and relatively early death (in 1875), she supported herself and her family by her writing.

Alexander, Sir William, Earl of Stirling (1567-1640)

Poet, dramatist, statesman, colonialist. Alexander's chief literary work was a collection of sonnets entitled Aurora, published in 1603. In addition to the composition of dramatic works (The Tragedy of Darius appeared in 1603), he accepted positions as tutor to ▷ Prince Henry, and Secretary of State for Scotland under ▷ Charles I. Alexander was also an early enthusiast for the foundation of colonies. In 1624 he published a work entitled Encouragement to Colonies, which was followed, in 1630, by The Map and Description of New England.

Alexandrine

A 12-syllable line of verse, possibly owing its name to the French medieval work, the Roman d'Alexandre. It is common in French poetry particularly of the classical period but unusual in English, where the commonest line length is of ten syllables. ▷ Michael Drayton used it in his long poem Poly-Olbion (1613–22), but its most famous use is in the last line of the Spenserian stanza, invented by ▷ Edmund Spenser for his ▷ Faerie Queene, and it was this form that was revived by the Romantic poets. One of the best examples is from ▷ Keats' ▷ 'The Eve of St Agnes':

Anon his heart revives: her vespers done, Of all its wreathed pearls her hair she frees; Unclasps her warmed jewels one by one; Loosens her fragrant boddice; by degrees Her rich attire creeps rustling to her knees; Half-hidden, like a mermaid in sea-weed, Pensive awhile she dreams awake, and sees, In fancy, fair St Agnes in her bed, But dares not look behind, or all the charm is fled.

Alfred, King (848-99)

King of the West Saxons 871-99, famous for his eventually successful resistance to Viking threats to his realm and still more renowned for his institution of an educational programme to revive learning in his land and for his promotion of vernacular prose as an acceptable medium for the dissemination of Latin learning. The works credited to Alfred himself include translations of Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy, the Pastoral Care of Gregory the Great, and an important law code. His initiatives in the vernacular doubtless inspired others, but scholars no longer see any direct link between Alfred and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

Alienation effect

Term, 'Verfremdungseffekt', developed by the German dramatist ➤ Bertolt Brecht in his theatrical and theoretical writings. He demanded that his audiences should realize that they were not watching 'life' but a representation, and he urged that actor and audience alike should preserve a critical 'distance' from events on the stage.

▶ Defamiliarization.

All for Love, Or the World Well Lost (1678) Tragedy in blank verse by ⊳ John Dryden, based on ➤ Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, but modified in accordance with Dryden's concern for the principles of neo-classicism. Dryden concentrates on the last stage of Antony's career, after the Battle of Actium. Antony's general Ventidius, his wife Octavia, and his friend Dolabella, all plead with him to leave Cleopatra, and make peace with Caesar. Antony is on the point of complying, but then he is led to believe that Dolabella is his rival for Cleopatra's affections, and he rejects both Octavia and Cleopatra. The desertion of the Egyptian fleet, followed by a false report of Cleopatra's death, lead Antony to take his own life. He falls on his sword and dies in Cleopatra's arms, after which she kills herself with an asp. Dryden stages a meeting between Cleopatra and Octavia which does not take place in Shakespeare's version, and he softens some of Shakespeare's language. His play achieves economy, elegance, and fluency, but lacks the range of Shakespeare's. Nevertheless All for Love is a masterpiece of its kind, and generally considered to be Dryden's best play.

All the Year Round

A periodical published by ▷ Charles Dickens from 1859, in succession to > Household Words, until his death in 1870. Novels which appeared in it in instalments included Dickens' own $\triangleright A$ Tale of Two Cities and > Great Expectations, and The Woman in White and The Moonstone by ➤ Wilkie Collins.

Allegory

From the Greek, meaning 'speaker in other terms'. A way of representing thought and experience through images, by means of which (1) complex ideas may be simplified, or (2) abstract, spiritual, or mysterious ideas and experiences may be made immediate (but not necessarily simpler) by dramatization in fiction.

In both uses, allegory was most usual and natural as a medium of expression in the ➤ Middle Ages, ➤ Catholic doctrine prevailed as deeply as it did widely; even the physical structures of the universe and of man seemed to be living images of spiritual truth. The morality plays, notably > Everyman (15th century), were practical applications of this doctrine to ordinary experience. But the tendency to see experience in allegorical terms extended to secular literature, for example the romances of sexual love, such as > The Romance of the Rose (14th century) in part translated from the French by ▶ Chaucer. When Chaucer wrote a romance in which there was no overt allegory, eg > Troilus and Criseyde, the allegorical spirit was still implicit within it (see C. S. Lewis, Allegory of Love). Such implicit allegory extended into much ▶ Renaissance drama, eg Shakespeare's > Henry IV, Parts I and II.

In the Renaissance, however, explicit allegory, though still pervasive, was greatly complicated by the break-up of the dominant Catholic framework; various Christian doctrines competed with one another and with non-Christian ones such as ▷ neo-Platonism, and also with political theories. Thus in a work like Spenser's ➤ Faerie Queene religious, political and Platonic allegories are all employed, but intermittently and not with artistic coherence.

Since the 17th century deliberate and consistent allegory has continued to decline; yet the greatest of all English allegories, ▷ The Pilgrim's Progress by John Bunyan, is a 17th-century work. The paradox is explained by Bunyan's contact with the literature of the village sermon, which apparently continued to be conducted by a simple allegorical method with very little influence from the > Reformation. Moreover allegory has continued into modern times, partly as an indispensable habit of explanation, partly in a suppressed form (eg the names of characters in Dickens' novels), and partly as a resource in the expression of mysterious psychological experience incommunicable in direct terms; here allegory merges with ⊳ symbolism, from which, however, it needs to be distinguished. ▶ George Orwell's dystopian novel Animal Farm is an allegory of totalitarian society, and there has been a lively debate concerning the role of allegory centring on the work of ⊳ Paul de Man, who wrote Allegories of Reading (1979) and Blindness and Insight (1983) in discussion of the subject.

Allegro, L' (c 1631)

A poem by > John Milton, published in 1645 though composed c 1631. The poem is a companion piece to > Il Penseroso, and the title can be translated from the Italian as signifying the cheerful or happy individual. The poem's theme celebrates the active life of engagement with the world, as opposed to the reflective life depicted in Il Penseroso.

Allen, Charles Grant Blairfindie (1848-99) Novelist, born in Canada, brought up there and in the USA and educated at Oxford. He is best-known for The Woman Who Did (1895), a > New Woman novel in which the protagonist is opposed to marriage on principle, lives with the man she loves, but is left alone with a child after his death and meets a tragic end. In the 1870s he taught philosophy at the Government College in Jamaica, an experience which helped to promote his interest in questions of emancipation, a theme of many of his novels. A number of these have foreign settings, such as In All Shades (1886), set in Jamaica and The Tents of Shem (1891), an adventure story set in Algeria. He was influenced by the evolutionary theories of > Herbert Spencer. His first novel was a satire, entitled Philistia (1884), and he wrote in a range of genres, including the detective story (An African Millionaire, 1897).

Alleyn, Edward (1566-1626)

Son of an innkeeper, Alleyn rose to become one of the two foremost tragic actors of the great age of English drama. In 1586 he was performing for Lord Worcester's Men; in 1592 he married the stepdaughter of the financier > Philip Henslowe, and together they built up the prosperity of the > Lord Admiral's Men. In this company he was celebrated for his performances of > Christopher Marlowe's heroes: > Tamburlaine, Faustus (> Doctor Faustus) and Barabas. He became the main owner of the > Rose and the Fortune theatres, and a wealthy man by his speculation in land. He founded Dulwich College, to this day a leading public school. After the death of his first wife, he married the daughter of > John Donne, the poet and Dean of St Paul's. His acting was highly praised by contemporary dramatists and other writers - > Thomas Nashe, > Thomas Heywood, and ⊳ Ben Jonson among them and was likened to that of the Roman actor Roscius.

Allingham, Margery (1904-66)

Writer of ▷ detective fiction. One of the foremost women detective writers of the 20th century, Allingham's work is characteristic of the inter-war 'golden age' of detective fiction, along with the work of ▷ Agatha Christie, ▷ Ngaio Marsh and ▷ Dorothy L. Sayers. Like Christie's Poirot or Miss Marple, or Sayers' Lord Peter Wimsey, Allingham has a chief detective, Albert Campion (said to be modelled on Wimsey), who is however a rather enigmatic, mysterious character, working in a London full of atmosphere and populated by eccentrics. She began writing in the 1920s and continued until her death in 1966; her many novels include: The Crime at Black Dudley (1929); Look to the Lady (1931); Police at the Funeral (1931); Sweet Danger (1933); Dancers in Mourning (1937); The Fashion in Shrouds (1938); The Case Book of Mr Campion (1947); The Tiger in the Smoke (1952); The Mind Readers (1965).

Allingham, William (1824-89)

Poet, born in County Donegal, Ireland where he worked as a customs officer. He moved to Lymington in 1863 and became friends with > Tennyson. Between 1874 and 1879 he edited > Fraser's Magazine. In 1850 he published Poems which contains his best-known poem 'The Fairies' and the long poem 'The Music-Master', an idyll of young love set in an Irish village. Several volumes of poetry followed including Day and Night Songs (1854) and a verse novel of Irish life entitled Laurence Bloomfield: or Rich and Poor (1864), which is a plea for land reform and contains a moving account of the eviction of the population of a whole hamlet. His poetry was frequently illustrated by ➤ Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Arthur Hughes and Millais (1829-1896). His early poems are gathered together in the six-volume Collected Poems (1888-93) which contains some of his best work including 'The Dirty Old Man', 'George Levison, or, The School-fellows', 'The Wayside Well' and 'Wayconnell Tower'. A contemporary of George MacDonald and friends with > Thomas Carlyle, Rossetti and Leigh Hunt (1784–1859), his Diary (1907) is an invaluable record of Victorian ➤ Aesthetic life. In 1874 he married Helen Paterson, a talented water colourist and illustrator of books such as ➤ Hardy's ➤ Far from the Madding Crowd.

Alliterative revival

The term used to refer to a large group of poems, composed in > alliterative verse between the mid-14th and mid-15TH centuries, on a wide range of subjects (histories, romances, contemporary satires, > dream-visions), and employing a wide range of styles. The works of the ▶ Gawain poet and of ▶ William Langland form part of this group. Patterns of poetic and narrative techniques can be established between works using the alliterative verse mode, but it would be too simple to represent these texts as belonging to a single school or to explain the origins of the revival by a single causal model, as has been tried in the past. The production of narrative in alliterative verse seems to have been particularly concentrated in the west and north-west regions of England, though again the 'regional' quality of alliterative poetry, and its opposition to the forms employed in the court poetry of ▷ John Gower and ▷ Chaucer, has been overstressed in the past.

Bib: Lawton, D. (ed.), Middle English Alliterative Poetry and Its Literary Background.

Alliterative verse

The traditional verse form of the Germanic people in which pairs of two-stress phrases are bound together by alliteration. All > Old English poetry is written in this prosodic form: usually the stressed syllables of the first phrase (or half-line) and the first syllable of the second are linked by alliteration. Formalized patterns of expression are a characteristic feature of this prosodic mode. From the late Old English period onwards a wider variety of prosodic forms was in use, and the use of rhyme as a binding device for lines increases greatly in post-Conquest English poetry. Traditionally scholars have divided up the corpus of Old English poetry into that written in 'classic' alliterative form (in which a small number of variable stress patterns for phrases can be identified), and a later 'looser' alliterative verse form (in which there are more variable options in the alliterative and stress patterns of the phrases). The alliterative works of the early Middle English period are composed in this looser style which can accommodate rhyme patterns too (as illustrated in > La3amon's Brut). Conventional distinctions between prose and poetry are undermined by some texts composed in rhythmical, alliterating units. The style of ➤ Aelfric's Lives of Saints uses some of the techniques of alliterative verse, as do a number of later prose works on religious themes (the so-called Katherine Group of saints' lives and the > Ancrene Wisse), composed in the Worcestershire and Herefordshire areas in the late 12th and early 13th centuries. Discussions of the alliterative mode have been hampered by the desire of scholars to formulate a single model which might link classic Old English verse with the later looser traditions, and the increased use of a more disciplined verse medium in the 14th century, in the so-called ➤ Alliterative Revival. But the complex pattern of influences and associations has eluded simple explanatory models and increasingly the trend is to consider the alliterative mode as part of a continuum, as one of a number of forms available to post-Conquest writers in English, rather than as constituting a single poetic tradition. All's Well that Ends Well (1602-3)
A play by ➤ Shakespeare in which the heroine, Helena de Narbon, pursues Bertram, Count of Rousillon, whom she loves but who seeks to elude her. He is misled by a dishonourable young courtier, Parolles; she eventually ensnares him by a trick. The plot is taken from Painter's Palace of Pleasure (1566-7) but the play is difficult to date precisely owing to its mixture of styles. Sir Edmund Chambers dates it 1602-3. This agrees with the kind of difficulty with which it faces critics: uncertainty about Shakespeare's intention; the play seems to be a romantic comedy, but the treatment of the subject is often unromantic and the comedy is often harsh. Thus All's Well resembles other ▶ problem plays of Shakespeare written between 1600 and 1604: ▶ Hamlet, ▶ Measure for Measure, ▶ Troilus and Cressida.

Althusser, Louis (b 1918)

One of the most influential French > Marxist philosophers of the 1960s, whose work began to appear in English translation from 1965 onwards: For Marx (1965), Reading Capital (with Etienne Balibar; 1968), and Lenin and Philosophy (1971). Althusser's ideas have been influential in the area of cultural studies, where his particular brand of structural Marxism has led to a radical rethink of all social institutions, and the place of human subject within their structures. His essay 'Ideology and Ideological State Apparatuses' (Lenin and Philosophy) lays the foundation for a reconsideration of literature and its relationship to ⊳ ideology, and has far-reaching effects also in the area of media studies.

Alton Locke: Tailor and Poet (1850) A novel by > Charles Kingsley reflecting the social and political turbulence of the > 'Hungry Forties' and one of the > 'Social Problem' novels. Alton Locke, a shopkeeper's son, experiences the horrors of sweated labour during his apprenticeship to a tailor. Convinced of the need for social reform he joins the ➤ Chartist movement. His talent for poetry brings him into contact with Eleanor Staunton, her cousin Lillian. and Saunders Mackaye, a Scottish bookseller modelled loosely on ➤ Thomas Carlyle. At the request of Lillian and her wealthy father, Alton allows his revolutionary verse to be rendered innocuous before publication, thereby earning him the contempt of his Chartist comrades. Responding to their taunts he undertakes a mission that provokes a riot and earns him three years in prison. During that time his beloved Lillian marries someone else and it is Eleanor who nurses him back from typhus while explaining her own views on reform and the role of Christianity. Disillusioned by demagogy and violence, Alton becomes a Christian Socialist and dies on his way to the USA. Deeply flawed as a novel. Alton Locke did draw attention to the wretchedness of the lives of working people, suggesting Christian Socialism as a non-violent means of achieving reform. Its themes are echoed in > Barratt Browning's > Aurora Leigh, the title of which has the same initial letters.

Amazons

A race of female warriors occuring in ancient Greek legend, and said by the 5th-century historian Herodotus to live in Scythia, north of the Black Sea. The word is often used to describe aggressive women, women who are hostile to men or women in positions of power traditionally held by men. In the late 19th century the figure of the Amazon was chosen by feminists to represent women in their struggle for the vote and as an antidote to the ▷ 'Angel in the House'. She featured in novels, poetry and > utopian fiction such as Elizabeth Burgoyne Corbett's New Amazonia: A Foretaste of the Future (1889), which is set in the year 2472 and describes a utopian community established in Ireland, with a grant of £50 million, by 'surplus women' shipped there by the British Government. In the course of 600 years the women have grown two feet taller than the men and their waists, unrestricted by the corset, have 'thickened' to twenty-six inches. However, the success of Amazonia is predicated upon eugenics and 'compulsory self-extinction' of the old, deformed and rebellious. In 1888 > Thomas Hardy used the word 'Amazon' to describe a handsome 'interesting' female smoker he met while dining at the house of ⊳ Walter Pater. ➤ Arthur Wing Pinero wrote The Amazons: A Farcical Romance in Three Acts in 1895. ➤ Women's Movement.

Ambassadors, The (1903)

A novel by > Henry James. It belongs to his last period, during which he returned to his earlier theme of the interaction of the European and American character.

Lambert Strether, a conscientious, middleaged American, is engaged to the rich American widow, Mrs Newsome. She sends him over to Paris to bring back her son Chad to run the family business. He arrives to find Chad immersed in Parisian culture, and absorbed in a love affair with the Comtesse de Vionnet, a relationship which Strether mistakenly assumes is not a sexual one. Strether, instead of persuading Chad to return, finds his sensibilities released by the freedom and richness of Parisian life, and delays his own return. Chad's sister, Mrs Pocock, and her husband, Jim, are now sent over by Mrs Newsome. Strether urges upon Chad the duty of loyalty to the Comtesse, and Mrs Newsome breaks off her engagement to Strether. After discovering the true nature of Chad's relations with the Comtesse, Strether decides to go back, abandoning his friendship with the intelligent and sympathetic Maria Gostrey, an American expatriate. Chad, however, matron, full of rectitude and prejudice. Strether has the highly developed New England conscience (it is his conscience that forces him to return) and a hitherto starved imagination. He is the ▷ focal character of the narrative throughout, so that his progressive understanding and development is a rich source of interest and irony. The Pococks stand for American philistinism, without imagination or sensibility. Together with ▷ The Golden Bowl (1904) and ▷ The Wings of the Dove (1902), the novel shows James' art at its most highly wrought and difficult stage.

Mrs Newsome is an authoritarian American

Amelia (1751)

A novel by ▷ Henry Fielding. Unlike ▷ Joseph Andrews and ▷ Tom Jones, Amelia deals with married love, and was Fielding's own favourite, although it was fiercely attacked by ▷ Johnson and ▷ Richardson, among others.

Set against a background of squalor and poverty, the novel opens with the imprisonment of the innocent but careless husband Captain Booth. In prison Booth meets the courtesan Miss Matthews, an old admirer who invites him to share the clean cell she has been able to afford. Booth accepts, though feeling guilty about his virtuous wife Amelia, and the two characters exchange stories about their past lives.

An old friend Colonel Bath pays Booth's bail and takes Miss Matthews as his mistress. Once out of jail, Booth turns to a life of gambling while trying to curry favour with the great. An aristocratic acquaintance assures Amelia that Booth will get his commission and invites her to accompany him to a masquerade. But 'My Lord' is a rake plotting to seduce Amelia, with the connivance of Colonel Bath and the Booths' landlady, Mrs Ellison.

Just as Amelia is about to set out to the masquerade, a fellow lodger, Mrs Bennet warns her that 'My Lord' had ruined her own life and is now threatening to destroy Amelia's 'virtue'. After several complications the plot ends happily; the Booths are rescued by their good friend Dr Harrison, and Amelia discovers that her virtue is rewarded as she will inherit her mother's fortune.

American colonies

The original thirteen colonies settled by the English which formed the first states of the United States of America (> American Independence, The War of), were Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia. Their population grew from 340,000 in 1700 to 1,200,000 by 1760, and to 3,000,000 by 1776.

The early colonies are now represented on the American flag by the thirteen stripes, while states established afterwards are symbolized by the stars. American Independence, The War of (1775-83)

Also known as the American Revolution. Tensions between American settlers and their rulers in England had been building up since the 17th century: a major outbreak of hostilities, Bacon's Rebellion, had already taken place in Virginia in 1676. The intractability of George III in the later 18th century added more fuel to the fire, and conflict was precipitated by legislation favouring the London East India Company, at the expense of American shippers. Three cargoes of tea imported under the new regulations were thrown into Boston harbour by men disguised as Indians in 1773, an event described jocularly as the 'Boston Tea Party'. Fighting did not erupt until 1775, however, when the British Government attempted to arrest two American leaders at Lexington near Boston: the first shots were fired there by the British, and actual fighting broke out at Concord. On the 4th July 1776 the Congress of insurgent states issued 'The Declaration of Independence'. partly inspired by the writings of ➤ Thomas Paine, and which in turn contributed to the thinking behind the ▶ French Revolution. George Washington became commander-inchief of the insurgents. The Americans' cause was greatly helped when the French and Spanish declared war on Britain in 1777, and key defeats of the British took place along the Delaware at Trenton and Princeton (1776), Saratoga (1777) and Yorktown (1781), when the British surrendered. In 1783 peace was made in Paris and the 13 colonies (> American colonies) became a union of independent states, the United States of America. George Washington became the first US president, and a constitution was drawn up and ratified in 1788.

Amis, Sir Kingsley (b 1922)

Novelist and poet. Associated at first with the > 'angry young men' of the 1950s for his novels, and with the Movement for his poetry, he has long outgrown such labelling, achieving considerable popular success with a series of sharp, ironic novels notable for entertaining incident, vivid caricatures and the comic demolition of pretension. Lucky Jim (1954; filmed 1957) is a hugely enjoyable novel about a young English lecturer in a provincial university and his battles against the academic establishment and a range of comically infuriating characters. It is not really a subversive work; it ends with the hero being given a good job in London by a wealthy man as well as winning the best girl. Amis' later novels tend to be less good-humoured; the protagonist of One Fat Englishman (1963) retains some of Jim's methods, but is fully as unpleasant as his enemies. Although Amis has remained within the format of a well-crafted plot and largely conventional modes of narration, he has employed a wide range of genres such as the detective story (The Riverside Villas Murder; 1973), the spy-story (The Anti Death League; 1966) and the ghost-story (The Green Man; 1969). The Alteration (1976), one of his most inventive works, imagines a 20th-century society dominated by the Catholic Church.

Amis' other novels are: That Uncertain Feeling (1955); I Like It Here (1958); Take A Girl Like You (1960); The Egyptologists (1965); I Want It Now (1968); Colonel Sun (as Robert Markham; 1968); Girl, 20 (1971); Ending Up (1974); The Alteration (1976); Jake's Thing (1978); Russian Hide and Seek (1980); Stanley and the Women (1984); The Old Devils (1986); Difficulties With Girls (1988); The Russian Girl (1992); You Can't Do Both (1994). Story collections include: My Enemy's Enemy (1962); Dear Illusion (1972); The Darkwater Hall Mystery (1978); Collected Short Stories (1980). Poetry: Bright November (1947); A Frame of Mind (1953); A Case of Samples (1956); The Evans Country (1962); A Look Around The Estate: Poems 1957-1967 (1967); Collected Poems 1944-1979 (1979). Essays and criticism include: New Maps of Hell (on > science fiction; 1960); The James Bond Dossier (1965); What Became of Jane Austen? (1975); Rudyard Kipling and His World (1975). He has also published his Memoirs (1991). Amis was knighted in 1990.

Amis, Martin (b 1949)

Novelist. Son of > Kingsley Amis, he was educated at schools in Britain, Spain and the U.S.A., and at Oxford University. He has worked for the Times Literary Supplement, the New Statesman (as literary editor) and the Observer. His early novels are characterized by black humour, concern with the sordid, violent and absurd, and an apparent misogyny, features which he defends as satire. The Rachel Papers (1973) is an account of adolescence through flashbacks and memories; Dead Babies (1975) (paperback as Dark Secrets) is a tale of decadence and sadism; Success (1978) is closer to the hilarity of The Rachel Papers, while Other People (1981) is an experiment in ambiguity. With the linguistic wealth of London Fields (1989) and the experimental narrative technique of Time's Arrow (1991, shortlisted for the Booker Prize), Amis has emerged as a > postmodernist novelist of considerable versatility. The Information (1995) is a black comedy of literary competitiveness. Other works: Money (novel; 1984); The Moronic Inferno (essays; 1986); Einstein's Monsters (stories; 1987); Visiting Mrs Nabokov, and other excursions (1993).

Amoretti (1595)

A sequence of 80 sonnets by ➤ Edmund Spenser, first published, together with the wedding-song > Epithalamion, in 1595. The title of the sequence is derived from the term applied to Italian love songs which take the exploits of Cupid as their subject. Amoretti is unusual amongst the > sonnet sequences of the period in that it moves towards an evocation of sexual love within a Christian context, which has, as its end, the sacrament of marriage. Though much of the language and many of the ideas in the sequence are derived from > Petrarch, Spenser nevertheless developed the Petrarchan model in introducing a carefully organized structure to the work. Thus, the events described in Amoretti follow the course of the Christian year, while the work as a whole evokes the progress of the seasons. It has long been assumed that the sonnets were addressed to Spenser's second wife, Elizabeth Boyle, whom he married in 1594.

Amos Barton, The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. (1857)

The first of the three tales composing ▷ Scenes of Clerical Life (1858) by ▷ George Eliot.

Amphibology, Amphiboly

A sentence having two possible meanings owing to the ambiguity of its construction.

Amphibrach

In metre, a verse foot composed of a long syllable between two short ones, or an accented foot between two unaccented ones. It is rarely used in English verse.

Amphimacer

A verse foot deriving from Greek, also known as the cretic foot, it uses one short syllable between two long ones, as in the phrase 'going mad'. Rarely used in English verse, its pattern of one unstressed syllable between two stressed may be heard in > Blake's poem 'Spring': 'Sound the flute!/ Now it's mute;/ Birds delight/ Day and night.' Its opposite, amphibrach (one accented foot between two unaccented ones), is even more rare.

Ana,-ana

A collection of memorable quotations from a writer, or sayings by a famous person, or anecdotes about him, eg Shakespeariana, Johnsoniana. Usually a suffix at the end of a name, as in these examples.

Anacoluthon

> Figures of Speech.

Anacreontics

Any kind of melodious verse, lyrical, and concerned with love and wine. From the Greek poet Anacreon (6th–5th centuries BC).
➤ Byron called his friend ➤ Thomas Moore 'Anacreon Moore', because he translated the Odes of Anacreon into English.

Anacrusis

The use at the beginning of a line of verse of a syllable additional to the number required by the given metrical pattern, as in the 'and' used by > Thomas Campbell, in the second of these lines from 'Ye Mariners of England': 'The danger's troubled night depart/ And the star of peace return.'

Anapaest

A metrical foot having two short or unaccented syllables followed by a long or accented one. It is usually mixed with iambics. Originally a Greek marching beat, its use in English poetry frequently retains a martial resonance, as in this line from ▷ Byron's 'The Destruction of Sennacherib': 'And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea.'

Anatomy of Melancholy, The (1621-51) A treatise by ➤ Robert Burton (1577–1640) on a topic which was of enduring interest, in particular to Elizabethan and Jacobean playwrights. It was first published in 1621, but by the time the sixth (posthumous) edition of 1651 appeared, Burton had expanded the original book of approximately 860 pages by about one-third. Though its ostensible theme is an enquiry into the 'symptomes, prognostickes and severall cures' of the psychological disorder of melancholy, it is also a wide-ranging exposition of the role and function of the human being in the natural order of the universe (> humanism). Not the least of the work's concerns is the principle of ordering and classification itself, and it thus bears comparison to ▶ Francis Bacon's > Advancement of Learning and the work of later scientists associated with ▷ The Royal Society. But in its digressive and allusive pursuit of curious forms of knowledge, and in its stylistic delight in the piling up of quotation, modification and qualification, it stands as a work without any immediate precursors or later emulators.

➤ Humour.

Ancien Régime

A French phrase, commonly used in English, to signify the political and social order in France before the Revolution of 1789, and more loosely to indicate a former state of order.

> French Revolution.

Ancient Mariner, The Rime of the (1798)
A literary > ballad by > Samuel Taylor
Coleridge first published in > Lyrical Ballads.

The mariner kills a friendly albatross for no stated reason, and he and the crew of his ship are subjected to punishment by the Polar Spirit. The members of the crew die in agonies of thirst, while the mariner himself lives on in a state of 'life-in-death', until he 'unawares' blesses some water snakes and is absolved of his guilt. The dead albatross which the crew have hung round his neck falls into the sea, and the ship is magically driven to the mariner's home port where he is given absolution by a hermit. Thereafter he wanders the world, compulsively telling his story, and recommending a holy life in communion with all God's creatures. The story appears naively didactic: the mariner has sinned against the 'One Life' and has done penance for his sin. But the poem's moral scheme is deeply ambiguous. If the theme is one of Christian sin and redemption, it seems strange that the destinies of the mariner and the crew are determined by a game of dice played between Death and Life-in-Death. And it is unclear why the rest of the crew are punished so harshly. The mariner ends with an apparently orthodox and banal message of religious consolation: 'He prayeth best who loveth best/ All things both great and small. But this consolation is belied by his sinister unease, as he holds the wedding guest with his 'glittering eye', preventing him from attending the marriage ceremony, and leaving him 'A sadder and a wiser man'. The poem dramatizes Coleridge's sense of irredeemable guilt, and his inability at this time to find consolation in orthodox religion or in the pantheism of his friend > William Wordsworth.

Ancrene Riwle

➤ Ancrene Wisse.

Ancrene Wisse

Ancrene Wisse (A Guide for Anchoresses) is a devotional manual, composed in English in the West Midlands area c 1220, for the use (initially) of three sisters who had decided to become recluses. It seems to have been revised for a wider audience shortly afterwards and was read, recopied, readapted until the sixteenth century. Versions are extant also in French and Latin. The manual is entitled Ancrene Wisse in one manuscript copy: that of Ancrene Riwle is a modern invention. Sensitively and evocatively written, the Ancrene Wisse offers itself to its readers as an instructional and meditational aid. Two sections of the manual (I/VII) offer advice on how the anchoress should conduct her 'outer' life and these enclose six sections of guidance on her 'inner' spiritual conduct (II VII). The climactic section (VII) considers how the anchoress might direct her spiritual ardour and offers a memorable portrait of Christ as a wooing-knight. Bib: White, H. Andersen, Hans Christian (1805–75)
Danish author known in Britain almost entirely for ▷ fairy tales of his own composition, such as 'The Tinder Box', and 'The Princess and the Pea'. They began to appear in Denmark in 1835 and were translated into English first in 1846. Their poetic quality has been much imitated by English writers, eg ▷ Oscar Wilde. ▷ Children's Books.

'Andrea Del Sarto' (1855)

A dramatic monologue by > Robert Browning published in > Men and Women (1855) in which the painter admits and laments his devotion to his wife Lucrezia at the expense of his art. It was written shortly after his marriage to > Elizabeth Barrett.

Andreas Capellanus (fl 1175)

Author of De Arte Honeste Amandi (The Art of Honourable Loving), a manual of procedures in love. He claims to be a royal chaplain and is often said to have been attached to the court of Marie de Champagne at Troves, but there is no evidence for this. His text is addressed to a young man called Walter and is divided into three Books which tackle (i) the nature of love and how it may be attained, (ii) how love may be retained, and finally (iii) the rejection of secular love. The debt to > Ovid's work on the art of loving and the remedies for secular love is acknowledged by Andreas. The tone of the work is open to different interpretations and its divergent lines on the subject of secular love are apparent in its tripartite organization. The text seems to have been read and interpreted in very different ways by scholars and writers of subsequent centuries (as a criticism of secular love values, as a defence of ⊳ courtly love); indeed, the debate about how to read Andreas' text continues among 20th-century medievalists.

Andrewes, Lancelot (1555-1626)

A bishop and leader of the ▷ Church of England during the most formative century (1550–1650) of its thought. His ▷ sermons were famous in an age when preaching was a high art; their prose was vivid and condensed, and an important contribution to the development of English prose. He took part in the translation of the King James Bible. Andrewes is compared to ▷ John Donne, poet and Dean of St Paul's, whose prose comes near his own poetry. As an intellectual defender of the Anglican religious position, Andrewes was the successor of ▷ Richard Hooker; but whereas Hooker was mainly concerned to defend Anglicanism against the ▷ Puritans, Andrewes defended it against the Catholics. Both he and Hooker are representatives of Anglicanism as the via media between the two.

Androcentrism

Literally meaning 'male-centred', androcentrism is a term current in feminist theory to describe intellectual habits and assumptions which imply that men are the most significant agents in any process. The growth of Women's Studies can be seen as a response to androcentrism in intellectual enquiry.

> Phallocentrism.

Androgyny

A key term in some > feminist approaches to literature, androgyny signals a balance of supposed 'male' and 'female' qualities. The word is formed from the Greek andro (male) and gyn (female). The idea has a long history, but the ideal of androgynous writing and values was particularly important to > Virginia Woolf. Some recent feminist thinkers, however, criticise the idea because it does not sufficiently respect female difference.

Bib: Woolf, V., A Room of One's Own.

Anelida and Arcite

> Chaucer's poem of 354 lines, set like the > Knight's Tale in Thebes, and drawn from material in > Boccaccio's Teseida. The brief story of Queen Anelida's unhappy love experience with Arcite provides the preface to Anelida's epistolary complaint, addressed to her faithless lover (composed of 140 lines of varying and accomplished metrical patterns). The work is influenced by the form and format of > Ovid's Heroides and looks forward to Chaucer's collection of stories about wronged women in his Degend of Good Women.

'Angel in the House, The'

A term which has come to exemplify the Victorian middle-class ideal of submissive womanhood, used originally by ➤ Coventry Patmore in his domestic epic The Angel in the House (1854-62). ➤ Ruskin pays homage to this stereotype of feminine behaviour in his essay 'Of Queen's Gardens', printed in Sesame and Lillies (1865). The Victorian feminine ideal embodied purity and selflessness, strong moral and religious principles, coupled with a willingness to submit to the will of men. Woman's realm was the home, viewed as a sanctuary from the harsh public world of capitalist competition. The 'Angel in the House' provided spiritual succour as well as domestic comforts for the middle-class male, and cherished her maternal role. In Victorian literature, characters such as ➤ Dickens' Agnes Wickfield in ➤ David Copperfield represent such an ideal, but as the 19th century progressed a number of writers challenged the stereotype. Well-known texts such as ➤ Charlotte Brontë's ➤ Jane Eyre, > Elizabeth Barrett Browning's > Aurora Leigh and George Eliot's > Middlemarch and > The Mill on the Floss all present antiangelic heroines straining to be released from conventional domestic roles. The Angel in the House was nevertheless an extremely powerful idea, and the emphasis on English women's moral and spiritual superiority was crucial in the construction of national identity. In her famous work on women writers, A Room of One's Own (1929), Virginia Woolf (1882-1941) cites the import of the Angel in the House as a central impediment to early 20th-century women's attempts to write professionally.

Anger, Jane (fl. 1588)

Tract-writer. Pseudonym for the author of a proto-feminist pamphlet, Jane Anger, Her Protection for Women (1588-9). There is no indication as to the true identity of the writer. This work is a polemical contribution to the > Querelle des Femmes in which Anger attacks men for the way they slander women, and praises her own sex for their grace, wisdom and 'true fidelity'. It was uncommon for a woman to write for publication at this time, which perhaps explains the need to conceal her true name. However, Anger explicitly calls attention to the fact that women have been denied a public hearing and stresses that this unfair treatment has led to her own 'angry' response. Jane Anger's pamphlet is published in Half Humankind: Contexts and Texts of the Controversy about Women in England, 1540-1640, ed. K. U. Henderson and B. F. McManus (1985).

Angles

One of the three Germanic tribes (according to Bede) which invaded the Roman province of Britannia in the 5th century AD (the others being called the Saxons and the Jutes). English (derived from Angle) came to be the general term used for the Germanic language and the Germanic peoples who gained sovereignty over the central part of the island of Britain (ie England). See English language; Old English; Anglo-Saxon.

Anglo-Norman

The dialect of French used in the British Isles from the time of the Conquest onwards alongside Latin and English. There were four principal domains of usage of Anglo-Norman: as a spoken vernacular; as a language of legal, administrative and business record; as a language of instruction; as a language of literary culture. It ceased to be used in these various domains at different times in the medieval period in England. From the later 12th century it was no longer a true maternal language and became increasingly a second, acquired language of the social and administrative elite, yet it continued to be learnt and used as a prestige vernacular for a further two centuries. Its function as a language of instruction, as the medium for learning Latin, seems to have been eroded by the later 14th century; its use as a language of law continued into the 15th century; its use as a language of literary culture continued through the 14th century, alongside the increasing use of English in this capacity too. Anglo-Norman literature occupies a major place in the literary culture of medieval England and a large number of English literary works translate, or rework, material from Anglo-Norman texts. Bib: Legge, D., Anglo-Norman Literature and its Background; Short, I., 'On Bilingualism in Anglo-Norman England', Romance Philology, 33, 467-79.

Anglo-Saxon

The term which denotes the language, literature and culture of the English before the Norman Conquest of 1066 (though many scholars today use the term 'Old English' in preference). Some post-medieval writers occasionally use the term to differentiate the common people from the aristocracy of English (supposedly) Norman descent (eg. Disraeli in Coningshy and Sybil). See Angle; English language, Saxon.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle

A collective term for a corpus of annals, recording events of local and national significance, organized in a more systematic way during the reign of ⊳ Alfred. The annals, written in English, were kept up at a number of monastic centres and survive in seven manuscripts (which form four main versions). The subjects and length of entries in the chronicles vary considerably from version to version but collectively they provide a record of events from the beginning of the Christian era to 1154. The continuation of the chronicle for nearly 100 years after the Norman Conquest illustrates the way in which > Old English literary culture did not stop abruptly in 1066, yet the changing form of the language of the later entries in the chronicle also indicates the way in which a standard written form of English could no longer be maintained in post-Conquest literary culture. Angria

An imaginary kingdom created by Branwell and ➤ Charlotte Brontë in 1834, matched by ➤ Emily and ➤ Anne Brontë's imaginary world, > Gondal. The inspiration for Angria and Gondal came from a box of wooden soldiers given to Branwell by his father in 1826. All four children took part in the creation of a narrative that became known as the 'Glass Town Confederacy', Charlotte and Branwell went on to develop their Angrian tales, while Emily and Anne broke away to create Gondal. Charlotte's Angrian stories of 1837-9, 'Mina Laury', 'Henry Hastings' and 'Caroline Vernon', anticipate the themes of her mature novels. Bib: Ratchford, F., The Brontës' Web of Childhood.

Angry young men

A term which was loosely applied to novelists and dramatists of the 1950s who expressed a sense of dissatisfaction and revolt against established social mores. ▷ John Osborne's play Look Back In Anger (1956) epitomized the mood. Other authors of whom the term was used include ▷ John Braine, ▷ John Wain, ▷ Alan Sillitoe, and ▷ Kingsley Amis.

Anne (1665-1714)

Queen of England from 1702 until her death. Anne was the younger daughter of ⊳ James II by his first wife, Anne Hyde, and was educated in the > Protestant faith. When in 1672 her father became a > Catholic, she remained loval to the > Church of England. She joined the party of his enemy, the Protestant William of Orange (later > William III) when he landed in England in 1688, although she was later drawn into some of the intrigues on her father's behalf, and toward the end of her life favoured the succession of her Catholic half-brother (the ▶ Old Pretender). In 1683 she was married to Prince George of Denmark, to whom she remained devoted. Her reign was dominated by the War of the > Spanish Succession, which she inherited from William III and continued with encouragement from her confidante, the Duchess of ➤ Marlborough. She also presided over the > Act of Union with Scotland in 1707. During much of her reign the Whig party was in the ascendancy, but from 1710 the Tories took over, supported by the Queen. Between 1684 and 1700 she had 17 pregnancies, but several ended with miscarriages, and none of her children survived her. This precipitated a constitutional crisis, before the > Act of Settlement was confirmed, and the monarchy reverted to the House of Hanover upon her death.

Anne of Denmark, Queen of Great Britain (1574-1619)

Patron. ➤ King James I's consort is often attacked as being light-minded and pleasureloving. The latter is certainly true, but it is important to bear in mind that the courtly entertainments which she encouraged were not simply childlike amusements, but important pieces of political propaganda. These > masques allowed Anne to participate in the public sphere, an arena that would otherwise have been denied her by the misogynous king. Numerous arguments occurred between her and James over which ambassadors should be invited to the masques, which suggests the powerful diplomatic significance of these events. Her son ➤ Henry, Prince of Wales, similarly recognized the value of court shows. Moreover, Queen Anne's commissioning of masques allowed her a certain input into the contents of the pieces and her involvement is detailed by > Ben Jonson in his annotations and prefaces to various works. Annus Mirabilis (1667)

A poem by ▷ John Dryden dealing with the 'wonderful year' between the summer of 1665 and that of 1666, especially the sea battles against the Dutch, the ▷ Plague and the Great Fire of London. It is written in 'heroique stanzas', pentameter quatrains rhyming abab, which were felt at the time to possess an epic breadth and dignity lacking in the shorter-lined lyric metres of much 17th-century poetry. Its style is public and declamatory, the emphasis being on rapid narrative and imaginative gusto, and its epic hero is a collective one: the English people or London.

Anspach, Elizabeth, Princess of (1750-1828) Dramatist, poet and letter-writer. Elizabeth Berkeley's first marriage was to Lord Craven, during which period she challenged convention by publishing her own poetry and allowing her play The Miniature Picture (1780) to be staged at ➤ Drury Lane Theatre. Although ostracized by polite society, she was accepted by other writers, and her work was admired by > Horace Walpole who printed one of her early dramatic pieces, The Sleep-Walker (1778), and to whom she dedicated Modern Anecdote (1779). She was widowed in 1791 and embarked upon her second marriage, to Anspach, in the same year; after this, the remainder of her plays were acted privately. She is also known for a series of letters discussing her journeys to Russia and Constantinople (1785-6), which rival those of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (> Orientalism). Her Memoirs offer a lively account of the age, but hardly display the protofeminism (> Feminism) with which she is credited; for example, she writes that, 'whenever women are indulged with any freedom, they polish sooner than man'.

Anthology

A collection of short works in verse or prose, or selected passages from longer works, by various authors. Some anthologies lay claim to authority as representing the best written in a given period, eg the Oxford Books (of Sixteenth Century Verse, etc.) and others are standard examples of taste at the time of compiling, eg Palgrave's The Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language (1861). Others have had an important influence on taste, or on later literary development. Some examples of the most important poetry anthologies of the 20th century which have given shape to movements are the ➤ Georgian poetry anthologies which appeared between 1912 and 1922, A. Alvarez's The New Poetry (1962) and > D. J. Enright's > Movement collection, Poets of the 1950s.

Anthology, The Greek

A collection of poems begun by Meleager of Gadara (about 60 BC) and later expanded, especially by Constantius Cephalas (10th century AD), till it included selections from over 300 writers. Many of the pieces, which number over 4,500, are epigrams. The Anthology has been, from the 16th century onwards, an important source of information on Greek culture.

Anti-industrialism

A tradition of writing identified initially by the work of Raymond Williams in Culture and Society. 19th-century observers, the foremost of whom was Thomas Carlyle, identified a number of threats to what they saw as constructive social living brought by industrialism. The pressures of growing industrialism obliged the workforce into working in mechanical unison and consequently altered their sense of themselves. The emphasis of industrial capitalism on material production and material acquisition changed the conditions of life and sapped the individual's powers of resistance.

D. H. Lawrence was its most impassioned 20th-century opponent, and his work influenced the Romantic anti-industrialism of F. R. Leavis.

Antiquary, The (1816)

A novel by > Walter Scott, the third of his > 'Waverley Novels', set in Scotland in the 18th century. The main story is an ordinary romance. A young officer, Major Neville, falls in love with Isabella Wardour, whose father rejects him on account of his supposed illegitimacy. Neville follows the father and daughter to Scotland, where the three have sundry adventures; Neville saves their lives and rescues Sir Arthur Wardour from impending ruin. He also turns out to be the son and heir of a Scottish nobleman. Thus the objections to the union between Neville and Isabella are removed. The distinction of the novel arises from the subsidiary characters: Jonathan Oldbuck, a learned antiquarian scholar (like Scott himself), and Edie Ochiltree, a wandering beggar who epitomizes the feelings and traditions of the Lowland Scottish peasantry. Scott states in his preface that he agrees with > Wordsworth's opinion (expressed in the Preface to the > Lyrical Ballads) that the peasantry have an eloquence in expressing the basic and most universal passions which is lost to the educated classes.

Antony and Cleopatra (1606-7)

A tragedy by ➤ Shakespeare, probably written in 1606–7, and first printed in the First Folio edition of his collected plays in 1623. The source is ➤ Sir Thomas North's translation (1587 edition) of ➤ Plutarch's Lives.

Mark Antony, with Octavius Caesar and Lepidus, is one of the 'triumvirate' (43–31 BC) which rules Rome and its empire, and he is Rome's most famous living soldier. At the opening of the play, he is the lover of > Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, and, to the disgust of his officers, is neglecting Rome and his political and military duties. All the same, he cannot ignore Rome, and from time to time he reacts strongly against Cleopatra when he remembers his public position and his reputation. His strained relations with Octavius Caesar are temporarily mended when he marries Caesar's sister, Octavia, but he soon abandons her and returns to Cleopatra. Caesar is enraged, and is in any case anxious to secure sole power over the empire for himself. Open war breaks out between them, and Antony is defeated at the sea battle of Actium, largely owing to Cleopatra's attempt to participate personally in the campaign. After Antony's final defeat on land, he attempts to kill himself, and eventually dies of his wounds in the arms of Cleopatra, who has taken refuge in her 'monument'. This is a mausoleum which she had built so that she and Antony could lie together in death; it serves as a kind of miniature fortress. After Antony's death, she makes a bid for survival by pitting her wits against Caesar's. When she sees that she has failed, she takes her own life. The two death scenes, her own and Antony's, are amongst the most famous scenes in Shakespeare's work.

One of the ironies of the tragedy is that Cleopatra loves Antony just because he is a great Roman hero, and yet, in order to get full possession of him, she has to destroy this part of him. At a deeper level, Rome and Egypt are set in dramatic contrast: Rome stands for the political world, with its ruthless and calculating manoeuvring for power; Egypt stands for the heat and colour of passion, tending always to dissolution and corruption. The play belongs to Shakespeare's maturest period. As in his other 'Roman' plays, > Julius Caesar and > Coriolanus, Shakespeare shows an awareness of writing about the pre-Christian era, in which the hero represents the highest human type, instead of the saint.

John Dryden's (1631–1700) All for Love is also a tragedy about Antony and Cleopatra; a comparison of the two plays is instructive in showing the changes that came about in English verse in the intervening period.

Anxiety of influence

A term coined by the American critic > Harold Bloom to describe the relationship between writers and their famous forebears. For Bloom, writers are in competition with their great precursors and their work is haunted by anxiety about over-influence. Bloom's model is explicitly > Freudian, and the writer struggles against predecessors like the son struggles against the father in Freud's theory of the > Oedipus Complex. A strong writer (in Bloom's parlance) absorbs the influence of his or her precursors and becomes independent. A weak writer, however, succumbs to imitation or silence.

Aphasia

Generally used to designate language disorder. However, in literary criticism it has been given a more specific definition by the linguistician and supporter of the > Russian Formalist movement, ➤ Roman Jakobson. Jakobson begins with the observation that language functions through the selection and combination of its elements into units such as words and sentences. Combination is a term used to designate the process whereby a linguistic ➤ sign can generate meaning only through its relationship with other signs which provide a context for it. Selection permits the substitution of one element for another from the total number of elements that make up the linguistic code as a whole, and which both speaker (addresser) and listener (addressee) share. The addresser encodes a particular message, and the addressee decodes or interprets it. Any interference with either the selection or combination of linguistic units which form an utterance, such as an unusual use in a literary work, is designated as aphasia, and this disordering serves, by contrast, to reveal the ways in which language operates normally.

Apologia, Apology

In ordinary speech, apology has the sense of an expression of regret for offensive conduct, but as a literary term it commonly has the older meaning still conveyed by apologia: defence, eg > Sir Philip Sidney's > Apologie for Poetrie, or explanation, vindication, eg Cardinal Newman's Apologia pro Vita sua.

Apologia Pro Vita Sua (1864)

Originally entitled Apologia Pro Vita Sua: Being a Reply to a Pamphlet Entitled: 'What Then Does Dr Newman Mean?' this spiritual autobiography of > John Henry Newman was published in seven parts with an appendix between 21 April and 2 June 1864. It began as a reply to the militantly Protestant > Charles Kingsley with whom Newman had publicly quarrelled, but by the time of its publication in book form (1865) it had developed as an explanation or vindication of Newman's spiritual development, and helped to reduce anti-Catholic feeling. An example of the Victorian's enormous interest in > autobiography and the confessional mode of writing it encouraged, Newman's Apologia is also a primary historical source for the ➤ Oxford Movement.

Apologie for Poetrie, An (1595)

A critical essay by > Sir Philip Sidney, the Apologie appeared in 1595, when it was also published under the alternative title The Defence of Poesie. Though it has long been assumed that Sidney's treatise was designed to function as a reply to a > pamphlet by > Stephen Gosson entitled The Schoole of Abuse (1579), the Apologie undertakes to defend imaginative writing from more general objections than those propounded by Gosson. Instead, the Apologie undertakes to define the role of both the artist and the literary text in respect of the society and the competing forms of alternative discourses in which they operate and are read. To this end, the Apologie explores the classical concept of imaginative writing, arguing that the poet can be considered as a 'creator' or 'maker' rather than a sterile copier of forms located in the real world. The autonomy of the artist is guaranteed against the competing claims of philosophical and historical writing, and, at the same time, Sidney offers a refutation of \triangleright Plato's famous condemnation of poetry in his \triangleright Republic. The essay concludes with a survey of contemporary English writing.

The importance of Sidney's work is that it provides a clear statement of several important themes of Renaissance poetics. In particular, it deals at length with the idea of imitation and with the Platonic objection to poetry - that it is morally questionable, and that the poet is, in producing works of fiction, little better than a liar. In producing a range of arguments to deal with these two points, Sidney offers a synthesis of > humanistic arguments derived from his readings in the classics and in the works of continental critics. At the same time, the Apologie stands as an example of the > Renaissance use of the art of > rhetoric, which determines the work's careful structure. For all its rootedness in late 16th-century debates on poetics, Sidney's treatise was to become, in the 17th century and later, an important statement in its own right on the nature and value of poetic discourse.

Aporia

In Greek aporia means a tangled path blocking the way, but the term has often been used in a literary context to describe a logical problem or inability to settle to a course of action as, for example, in Hamlet's 'To be or not to be' speech. More recently, the term has been used by ▷ deconstructionist critics to refer to a point of contradiction or impasse in a work when the reader is left with inconsistent or unresolvable ideas. For deconstructionist critics, the aporia is inevitable in all writing and should not be seen as a mistake or blemish in the work.

Apprenticeship

A system of training undergone by youths entering on a trade or craft. The apprentice was indentured to a master in the craft, ie entered into a contract with him, to serve him in return for maintenance and instruction for seven years, usually between the ages of 16 and 23. The apprentice was a member of the master's household and the master was responsible for his behaviour before the law. Thus apprenticeship provided social control, as well as a form of education, and tended to maintain standards in manufacture and professional conduct. It also had the social advantage of mixing the classes and ensuring that the landed classes retained an interest in trade, for the smaller landed gentry commonly indentured their younger sons, who had no land to inherit, to master craftsmen, especially in London. Until the 18th century (when the gentry, grown richer, tended to despise trade) this mixture of classes, as well as their large numbers, made the London apprentices a formidable body of public opinion not only politically, but, for instance, in the Elizabethan theatre. Apprenticeship was systematized by law under the Statute of Artificers, 1563. It had its beginnings in the > Middle Ages. Usually women were not permitted to be apprenticed; in this way they were excluded from skilled paid work, although wives, daughters and sisters often helped in the work of their male relatives. Until the 17th century, apprenticeship was the only way to enter most trades and professions.

Italy) who produced a variety of treatises (for Christian missionaries, for the instruction of princes), commentaries on the work of Aristotle, but whose greatest (and unfinished) work, the Summa Theologica, attempted to harmonise the philosophy of Aristotle with Christian theology and came to be considered the most authoritative product of scholastic thinking. Arcades (c 1633)

A short ▷ masque by ▷ John Milton written c 1633. Like all masques, the title of the work indicates the occasion of its production: 'Part of an Entertainment presented to the countess dowager of Derby at Harefield by some noble persons of her family'. The work ─ an exercise in the ▷ pastoral ─ is so short that it hardly warrants the description of 'masque', being really little more than a dramatized form of brief tribute. Music for the work was composed by ▷ Henry Lawes, who was to write the music for Milton's more elaborate masque, ▷ Comus, when it was performed in 1634.

Arcadia

A mountainous district in Greece, with a pastoral economy, and in ancient times the centre of the worship of Pan. The country was idealized by ▷ Virgil in his Eclogues, and again in the Renaissance in ▷ pastoral works, notably in ▷ Sir Philip Sidney's ▷ Arcadia. By this time Arcadia was thought of purely as an ideal country of the imagination, uncorrupted by the sophistications of civilization.

Arcadia, The (1578 and 1590)

Sir Philip Sidney's ➤ pastoral romance The Arcadia exists in two distinct versions. The 'old' Arcadia was begun c 1578, and circulated widely in manuscript form before Sidney undertook to revise it in 1584 - a task interrupted by his death in 1586. This revised (though incomplete) version - the 'new' Arcadia was published in 1590. In 1593 Sidney's sister, Mary Herbert, Countess of Pembroke (> Mary Sidney), to whom the work had been dedicated, undertook to publish a composite version of the text, which combined the two versions in existence together with her own (substantial) emendations. Thus The Arcadia, which enjoyed enormous popularity in the 16th and for much of the 17th century, was a curious hybrid.

In its original version the work was a mixture of love and intrigue, but in its revised form, Sidney broadened the scope of his undertaking. The episodic narrative of lovers, derived from Sidney's reading in late Greek romance, was transformed into what Sidney termed 'an absolute heroical poem', the purpose of which, in accordance with the critical precepts that had been established in ▷ An Apologie for Poetrie, was to instil 'delightful teaching'. From the first appearance of the work, critical opinion has been divided as to its seriousness. Some of Sidney's contemporaries understood The Arcadia as a profound meditation on morals and politics. For other writers, in particular ▷ John Milton, the work was no more than an exercise in escapist fantasy.

Archaeology of knowledge

An influential method of investigation pioneered by the French philosopher and historian Michel Foucault in which the different > discourses of the leading disciplines which make up the knowledge system of a particular period are compared. The aim is to establish the common ground between them and thus establish the 'general horizon' (as Foucault terms it) of understanding. Those interested in such investigation assume that the fundamental assumptions which constitute the general horizon of knowledge change from epoch to epoch, and that knowledge in one period is organised differently from that in another. Hence it needs to be recovered as an archaeologist recovers information about 'lost' cultures. One implication of the archaeology of knowledge is that knowledge needs to be understood contextually, in a specific period, and not in the crude > Positivistic sense in that it progresses over time and can therefore be judged right or wrong by the standards of the future. For Foucault, the development of knowledge is jagged and discontinuous. What is also distinctive about Foucault's conception is his emphasis on the inseparability of knowledge from social and political power. For him, knowledge develops in intimate relation to the power systems of the day which can encourage some developments, but frustrate or interdict others.

Arden, Forest of

Formerly an extensive forest in the neighbourhood of Stratford. It gave its name to the important landed family of Arden;

Arden, John (b 1930)

Dramatist. Barnsley born, a student of architecture and, in his own words, 'a, product of English public schools and three years as a conscript in Scotland', Arden began writing plays at university. Considered one of the most influential political playwrights of his generation, Arden's output has been indelibly influenced by his meeting with Margaretta D'Arcy in 1955. Arden and D'Arcy have written many plays jointly and separately.

Most of Arden's major stage plays appeared in a ten-year period from the late 1950s to the late 1960s, ceasing abruptly after a famous if painful controversy over the RSC's handling of The Island of the Mighty (1972), when Arden declared he would never write again for the stage. Instead both his and to some extent D'Arcy's recent work has been more or less devoted to radio.

Although Serjeant Musgrave's Dance (1959) was not a popular success, it is now seen as one of the major plays of the period. Set in a bleak mining town in northern England in the 1880s, a small group of soldiers invade a village ostensibly on a recruitment drive. But the men are deserters, and their leader Serjeant Musgrave, who has become fanatically antiwar, is as terrifying in his religious zeal as the evil against which he inveighs: he demands the death of twenty-five local townspeople to match the death of a local boy who died in a colonial war and who was the trigger, in reprisal, for the death of five men. A male-oriented play, where women are seen either as whores (sexual and dangerous) or mothers (asexual and comforting), it seems hard in retrospect to see it as anything other than a passionately pacifist, anti-imperialist 'play.

Always a moralist, Arden's dissenting voice has increasingly swung away from the earlier anarchic detachment where there are no heroes (even the so-called pacifism of Serjeant Musgrave's Dance is hotly disputed by some commentators, who feel it is difficult to decide which side Arden's sympathies are on), through political activism to revolutionary socialism by the late 1970s. Others, however, argue that the seeds of Arden the revolutionary were implicit from the beginning, particularly in the fact that the plays were usually sparked off by historical and contemporary political events. Armstrong's Last Goodnight (1964), for example, though set in 16th-century Scotland, was inspired by the Congo War and intended as an analagous, moral parable on the subject of violence. Written in Lowland verse, it emerged as a rumbustious, sardonic study in realpolitik, opposing the urbane politician (Lindsay) with the highland rebel, Johnny Armstrong.

Arden, from the beginning, rejected naturalism and though his plays were about social, political and economic issues - small town corruption (The Workhouse Donkey, 1964), the welfare state (Live Like Pigs, 1958), violence and militarism (Serjeant Musgrave's Dance) - his use of bold, imagist techniques - epics, parables, sometimes grotesque comedy - and the fact that they have an obvious polemical intent, inevitably led to Arden being compared with ▷ Brecht, an influence he has always denied. Yet other observers, playing the influence game, detect a kinship with ▷ Ben Jonson and ▷ Aristophanes in such plays as The Workhouse Donkey. Arden / D'Arcy's work, with its increasingly anti-English, pro-Irish and community stance -The Hero Rises Up (1968) is an anti-heroic view of Nelson; The Ballygombeen Bequest (1972), an attack on absentee landlordism in Ireland; The Non-Stop Connolly Show (1975), a pro-Irish Republican epic which, according to Arden's biographer, Albert Hunt, should be regarded as a masterpiece - has come under increasing censorship. To the overall impoverishment of British theatre, their work remains outside the mainstream.

Arden's plays include: Soldier Soldier (1960); The Happy Haven (1960); The Business of Good Government (1960); Wet Fish (1962); The Workhouse Donkey (1963); Ironhand (1963); Ars Longa Vita Brevis (with Margaretta D'Arcy; 1964); Armstrong's Last Goodnight (1964); Lefthanded Liberty (1965); Friday's Hiding (1966); The Royal Pardon (1966); The Hero Rises Up (1968); The Ballygombeen Bequest (1972); The Island of the Mighty (1972); The Non-Stop Connolly Show (1975); Vandaleur's Folly (1978); The Little Gray Home in the West (1978); The Manchester Enthusiasts (1984).

Title of a > pamphlet, published on 28 November 1644, written by > John Milton. In June 1643 Parliament had passed an ordinance which attempted to license the press - in effect it was designed as a form of covert political > censorship that allowed officers of Parliament to search for, and confiscate, unlicensed books. Milton's Areopagitica was offered as a powerful statement on behalf of liberty of the press. In arguing for such liberty, Milton was aligning himself with radicals such as William Walwyn and Richard Overton, and entering a forceful plea for the free dissemination of information and ideas without which, in his opinion, it was impossible for individuals to make genuine political choices. In discussing this question of choice, Areopagitica can be thought of as being a precursor of one of the major themes of Milton's > Paradise Lost. The title itself implicitly compares the Parliament of England. to whom Milton was addressing his comments, to the Supreme Court of ancient Athens which met on the hill Areopagos, situated to the west of the Acropolis.

political, philosophical and literary concerns, such as the Peloponnesian war between Athens and Sparta (Lysistrata), or the rivalry between the Greek tragedians (The Frogs). His influence on English drama is reflected in ▷ Ben Jonson's comedies, particularly in ▷ Bartholomew Fair, although Jonson and his contemporaries are far more dependent on the formal and thematic properties of the ▷ New Comedy idiom of ▷ Plautus and ▷ Terence.

Aristotle (384-322 BC)

A Greek philosopher, born at Stageira, and so sometimes called the Stagirite. He was first a pupil of ▷ Plato, later developing his thought on principles opposed to those of his master. He was tutor to the young ▷ Alexander (the Great). His thought covered varied fields of knowledge, in most of which he has been influential. His best known works are his Ethics, Politics, and ▷ Poetics.

The difference between Aristotle and Plato has been described as follows: Plato makes us think in the first place of an ideal and supernatural world by turning our minds to ideal forms which are the truth in terms of which imperfect earthly things can be known and judged; Aristotle turns us towards the natural world where things are what they are, perfect or imperfect, so that knowledge comes through study and classification of them in the actual world. It can thus be seen that whilst Plato leads in the direction of mysticism, Aristotle leads towards science. Until the 13th century, Christian thought tended to be dominated by Plato, but medieval Christian thought, owing to the work of > Thomas Aquinas, found Aristotelianism more acceptable.

The Poetics is based on the study of imaginative literature in Greek from which Italian critics of the 16th century, and French dramatists and critics of the 17th century such as Corneille, ➤ Racine and ➤ Boileau constructed a system of rules. > Sidney knew Aristotle chiefly through the Italians, who had derived from Aristotle some rules not to be found in him notably the > unities of time and place: Dryden and ➤ Samuel Johnson, were respectful of and deeply influenced by French neo-Aristotelianism, but they refused to be bound by it, unlike some second-rank critics such as ➤ Thomas Rymer. The 19th century reacted strongly against the attitude, but in this century the elimination of the neo-Aristotelian superimpositions of the > Renaissance has revived interest in the discernment displayed in the Poetics.

Armada, The (Spanish), 1588

The fleet dispatched by Philip II of Spain to transport a Spanish army from Flanders to land in and conquer England. The attempt was deafeated by the English fleet under Lord

Howard of Effingham and his sea-captains, some of whom were already famous for other exploits, such as > Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher. It was written up as part of the nationalist myth of both countries involved and, in consequence, contrasting accounts of it are given in Spanish and English history. For Philip II of Spain it was a holy war against the heretical English who had abandoned Rome and recently put the Catholic > Mary Queen of Scots to death; under Franco the Armada was said to illustrate the Christian fortitude of Philip II and the need for stoicism in adversity. At the time the English represented it as a national triumph, a personal triumph for the queen and an inspiration for the whole people. It did have far-reaching cultural effects both for Europe and for the non-European world that Europe was about to expand into.

England was the most important country to have renounced papal authority; her defeat might have been disastrous to the Protestant side in its struggle against the Catholic powers, of which Spain was then the chief. Instead, the English victory meant a decisive check to the formidable (> Counter-Reformation) attempt of Catholicism to recover the northern countries of Europe. The English victory was a milestone in the shift of power from the Mediterranean region to the Atlantic powers of England, France and Holland, which henceforth increasingly led the European expansion over the globe.

Armah, Avi Kwei (b 1938)

Ghanaian novelist, educated at schools in Accra and Massachusetts and at Harvard and Columbia universities. He has worked as a translator, a television scriptwriter, an English teacher and an editor. His novels express nationalist feeling and a strong sense of anger, combined in The Beautyful Ones Are Not Yet Born (1968) and Fragments (1970) with elements of the comic, though the ironically-titled Why Are We So Blest? (1972) is a horrific and fragmented narrative of the sexual exploitation of an African man by a European woman and the violence that follows. He has drawn on Akan culture for organizing structures (generally cyclical): Fragments is shaped by its Akan chapter headings and The Healers (1978) uses the structure of Akan folk stories for an historical account of the fall of the Asante Empire; Two Thousand Seasons (1973) is also a historical novel. Arnold, Matthew (1822-88)

Poet, critic and educationalist, son of ➤ Thomas Arnold. Most of Arnold's verse was published by the time he was forty-five: The Strayed Reveller (1849); ➤ Empedocles on Etna (1852); Poems (1853); Poems, Second Series (1855); Merope, a Tragedy (1858); New Poems (1867). From these volumes, the best-known poems today are The Forsaken Merman (1849), Sohrab and Rustum (1853), a narrative in epic style; ➤ The Scholar Gypsy (1853), Thyrsis (1867) and the famous short lyric, ➤ 'Dover Beach' (1867 – perhaps written much earlier). His poetry is elegiac, meditative and melancholy; preoccupied with spiritual alienation and the loss of religious faith.

As Arnold began to abandon poetry writing, his essay and prose writing career took off; as a critic, he was strongly influential on early 20thcentury thought, and was a crucial figure in the development of English studies as a discipline in its own right. Mediated by the works of T.S. Eliot (1888-1965), I.A. Richards (1893-1979), Lionel Trilling, F.R. Leavis (1895-1978) and the literary critical review Scrutiny (published between 1932 and 1953), his cultural criticism forms a lynch-pin of traditional English criticism. This influence does not come from his studies of individual writers but from his studies of contemporary culture and of the relationship, actual and potential, of literature to industrial civilization. His best known critical works are > Essays in Criticism, First and Second Series, 1865 and 1888; On Translating Homer, 1861; and Culture and Anarchy, 1869.

Arnold's work as an inspector of schools and educationist was related to his most serious critical preoccupations, and the two worlds meet in such a work as ▷ Culture and Anarchy. His educational theories and absolute valuing of culture were pitted against the ▷ Utilitarianism of his historical moment. Arnold posited a system of humane education under the headship of an ideal, liberal state, as the means of ensuring the triumph of culture over social and spiritual anarchy.

Artaud, Antonin (1896-1948)

French actor, director and poet, associated with the Surrealist theatre and founder of the Théâtre Alfred Jarry. He developed an approach to theatre which he named ▷ 'Theatre of Cruelty'. In this he downgraded the written text in favour of a theatrical language based on ritualistic gesture, movement and sound. His aim was to release in the actor and spectator the primitive human forces ordinarily suppressed by social morality and convention. His theories are explained in his collection of essays entitled Le théâtre et son double. He has been a strong influence on French authors, particularly Camus and Genet, and on the English director ▶ Peter Brook. Bib: Esslin, M., Artaud; Hayman, R., Artaud and After.

Arthur, King

If there is a historical figure behind King Arthur, it may be that of a British chieftain, active some time in the 5th or 6th century, who resisted Saxon invaders after the Roman garrisons had abandoned Britain. Documentary evidence and archaeological data provide us with only a vague picture of the historical events of these centuries, and so the historical location of an Arthur figure continues to be a subject of great debate. ➤ Gildas, the 6th-century monastic chronicler, records an important British victory over the Saxons at Mount Badon, some time around 500, but there is no mention of Arthur in Gildas' narrative. However, in the 9th-century compilation, the Historia Brittonum (History of Britain), attributed to ➤ Nennius, Arthur is given responsibility for leading the British side to victory at the battle of Badon, although his role here and in the 11 other battles accredited to him is that of a chieftain or general, not a British king. A 10th-century compilation, the Annales Cambriae (Annals of Wales), credits Arthur with victory at the Battle of Badon in 518, and also records that in the battle of Camlan in 539, Arthur and 'Medreut' fell.

William of Malmesbury's remarks in his Gesta Regum Anglorum (Deeds of the Kings of the English) suggest that by 1125 much material had accreted around the figure of Arthur, some of it mere fable and lies according to William. Arthur is credited with great feats at the battle of Badon, but his family connection with Walwen (▷ Gawain) is mentioned later by William, who also comments on the legend that Arthur may yet return. Modern attempts to recreate some sense of early vernacular (Celtic)

Arthurian narratives and traditions are fraught with problems. Arthur does figure in early Welsh narratives, as an important chieftain, who in one case goes on an expedition to a Celtic otherworld to obtain a magic cauldron (in the poem known as the Spoils of Annwfu), but although this material may be circulating from an early date, the versions that survive are in manuscripts dating from the 13th century onwards. Important Celtic Arthurian narratives, for example, are preserved in the Black Book of Camarthen, c 1200; the White Book of Rhydderch, dating from the early 14th century; the Red Book of Hengest, dating from the late 14th century.

The writer responsible for putting King Arthur firmly on the map of British history was ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth who, in his ➤ Historia Regum Britanniae (History of the Kings of Britain), c 1138, provided a continuous account of the British kings from Brutus onwards and made the reign of King Arthur the high spot of this sequence. Under Arthur's rule, Britain regains its status as a unified Christian nation, and gains international power and prestige too. This version of British history, though challenged by some late-medieval historians, appears to have been generally accepted and became a standard feature of accounts of insular history. Notable vernacular versions of Geoffrey's narrative include those by ▷ Wace (in ▷ Anglo-Norman), ▷ La3amon and ▷ Robert Mannyng. and material from this chronicle tradition of Arthurian narrative forms the basis for the early 15th-century English poem, the alliterative Morte Arthure. For the development of the tradition of Arthurian romance, we have to turn to the activities of the 12th-century French and Anglo-Norman writers who developed a body of narratives focussed on the adventures of individual members of Arthur's court. Writers such as > Béroul, Thomas of Britain, > Marie de France and > Chrétien de Troyes, drew on Celtic story motifs to develop narratives which explored the interests and tensions of court culture and its ideals. Of these writers, Chrétien de Troyes deserves special attention: his sophisticated vernacular romances seem to have stimulated the creation of a much larger body of texts centred on the court of King Arthur, and some of his works were translated into other European vernaculars (Yvain, for example, is reworked in the early 14th-century Middle English verse narrative as Yvain and Gamain).

The 13th century sees the development of much longer, interlaced Arthurian narratives, which became organized into the so-called ➤ Vulgate and post-Vulgate cycles of Arthurian romance. A notable addition to the post-Chrétien narrative tradition of Arthurian material is the development of the quest of the Holy ➤ Grail into a narrative which celebrates transcendental Christian ideals and which provides the means for linking Arthurian history to scriptural history.

English translations and reworkings of French Arthurian romances date from the early 14th century onwards (Sir Tristrem, Arthour and Merlin, and ➤ Morte Arthur (stanzaic)), but the alliterative romance of ▷ Sir Gamain and the Green Knight, in which Arthurian chronicle and romance traditions are played off against each other, has no French precedent. > Thomas Malory provided English readers with a reworking of the massive Arthurian narrative cycle in the late 15th century (drawn largely from the Vulgate cycle) and his Works (or rather > Caxton's printed edition of Malory's text known as the ➤ Morte D'Arthur) provides the standard account of Arthurian narrative for later writers and reworkers of Arthurian topics and themes.

King Arthur thus became an important feature of the English literary and historical landscape, and Arthurian narrative was constantly open in the course of its development for appropriation as a means of expressing and exploring different kinds of political and cultural ideals. ➤ Spenser's epic, > The Faerie Queene, has the figure of Prince Arthur as its central protagonist, and later writers such as ▷ Ben Jonson, ▷ Milton and ▷ Dryden all planned major works on Arthurian topics (although only Dryden actually produced an Arthurian text, his dramatic opera King Arthur). The history of Arthurian narrative has periods of decline and revival, though the subject of Arthur always seems to have been available as a cultural reference point. Since the 19th century, a major revival of interest in all facets of Arthurian legend, history and culture has been under way. > Tennyson's composite work, ▷ The Idylls of the King, reaffirmed the importance of Arthurian narrative as an arena for exploring national, political and cultural values, and provided a major source of stimulation for the Pre-Raphaelite group of painters and writers. An enormous body of 20th-century Arthurian marrative is available to modern readers, including works by > T.S. Eliot, > John Masefield, Charles Williams, > David Jones, T.H. White and Marion Zimmer Bradley (who in The Mists of Avalon reworks Arthurian narrative from the perspective of its central female protagonists). Bib: Lacy, N. et al. Artifice, The (1722)

Play by ➤ Susannah Centlivre, her last, recently revived in London. The action actually incorporates several 'artifices' spread across four linked but separate plot lines: 1 Sir John Freeman, in love with Olivia, has been disinherited in favour of his younger brother Ned, who is also courting Olivia, and has been promised her hand in marriage by her father, Sir Philip Moneylove. 2 Ned has seduced an apparently poor Dutchwoman, Louisa, who has borne him a son. She comes to England to obtain justice, and tricks Ned into marrying her. Sir John is reunited with his fortune and with Olivia, and Louisa reveals herself as an heiress. 3 Old Mr Watchit is jealous of his young wife and locks her up when he goes out. But Ned contrives to gain access to her apartments, and to court her. By another trick she humiliates her husband, and he is forced to grant her more liberty. 4 The Widow Heedless, set upon marrying a lord, is wooed by the unscrupulous gambler, Tally, and also by the Ensign Fainwell, both in disguise. Fainwell exposes Tally, wins the Widow, and reveals his true identity. The play was originally criticized as designed 'to encourage adultery, to ridicule the clergy and to set women above the arbitrary power of their husbands. . .'.

Arts and Crafts Movement, The

An English aesthetic movement, belonging to the last thirty years of the 19th century, founded to combat the effects of growing industrialization on art and culture.

The > Industrial Revolution led to the mass production of decorative art leading to what many regarded as a deterioration in the standards of craftsmanship, and a vulgarization of style and public taste. In 1861 the poet and designer > William Morris established a firm of manufacturers and interior decorators, which included the architect Philip Webb (1831-1915) and the painters Ford Madox Brown (1821-93), Edward Burne-Jones (1833-98) and occasionally > Dante Gabriel Rossetti, who clung to the principles of medieval craftsmanship. They specialised in hand-crafted artefacts including metalwork, jewellery, wallpaper, textiles, furniture and books. The group also numbered among its members the mathematician Charles J. Faulkner and the engineer Peter Paul Marshall.

A generation of artists and designers, deeply influenced by Morris and the art critic > John Ruskin, became the leading lights of the Arts and Crafts Movement: people like the architect and designer Arthur Mackmurdo (1851−1942), the painter, draughtsman, designer and author of children's books Walter Crane (1854−1915), the art critic Lewis Day (1845−1910), the designers Selwyn Image (1849−1930) and Herbert Horne (1864−1916), the architect C. F. Annesley Voysey (1857−1941), and Charles R. Ashbee (1863−1942), writer and silversmith.

The popularity of the movement was established by the 1880s and the Century Guild, an organization for craftsmen, was established by Mackmurdo in 1882. Its object was 'to render all branches of art the sphere no longer of the tradesman, but of the artist'. The Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society was founded in 1888 and actively supported by Crane and Day. The same year saw the establishment of the Guild and School of Handicraft and the National Association for the Advancement of Art and its Application to Industry.

The Arts and Crafts movement was controversial in a number of ways. In addition to reviving the art of hand printing, the movement sought to dissolve the distinction between the fine and the decorative arts. Another and perhaps deeper controversy concerned the practicality, in a mass urban and industrialized society, of the work produced by the movement. It was also viewed by many as intellectually elitist and retrogressive: looking backwards to the medieval past rather than forwards to the future.

The movement gained even wider appeal in the 1890s both in Britain and abroad, becoming more experimental and prolific. Its aims, ideals and styles found an outlet in the Art Nouveau Movement: an ornamental style of art that flourished between 1890 and 1910.

Arts Council

This body began as the Council for the Encouragement of Music and Art in 1940, to promote theatrical and musical entertainment during World War II. It now provides funding for a great variety of arts projects, including regional and national theatres and touring companies, throughout Britain. Its purpose is 'to develop a greater knowledge, understanding, and practice of the Fine Arts, to increase their accessibility to the public, and to improve their standard of execution'. Although its distribution of funds has often been contentious, its existence helped the proliferation of theatre companies from the 1960s onwards.

As You Like It

A comedy by ➤ Shakespeare. Produced about 1599, and first printed in the folio of 1623. Its source is ➤ Thomas Lodge's romance, Rosalynde.

The story is romantic and ⊳ pastoral. A Duke, the father of the heroine, Rosalind, has been turned off his throne by his ruthless brother, the father of Rosalind's devoted friend. Celia. He has taken refuge with a few loval courtiers in the neighbouring > Forest of Arden. An orphan son, Orlando, is tyrannized by his wicked elder brother, Oliver. Orlando and Rosalind fall in love. Rosalind is banished from court, and goes to the forest in male disguise, calling herself Ganymede; Celia goes with her as Rosalind/Ganymede's sister, Aliena, and they are also accompanied by the court jester, Touchstone. Orlando follows them. He does not discover Rosalind's disguise, however, when, as Ganymede, she makes him 'play-act' courtship with her, episodes which are used by Shakespeare as light satires on the conventions of romantic love.

Another pair of lovers in the forest are the shepherd and shepherdess Silvius and Phebe, a couple who are drawn from the most artificial pastoral mode. Phebe (true to her convention) disdains Silvius, but falls embarrassingly in love with Rosalind (in her disguise) at first sight, and in spite of Rosalind's rudeness to her. Touchstone engages the affections of an unromantic and realistic village girl, Audrey, and thus frustrates her unromantic village lover, William. There is also Jaques, a fashionable and affected young man in the Elizabethan style, attached to the court of the exiled Duke. Rosalind, who is extremely plain-spoken except when she remembers that she is in love, exposes his affectations. In the end the couples are sorted out appropriately, and Rosalind's father regains his dukedom.

Shakespeare thus plays off real life against literary convention. The play is bright, satirical and romantic, all in one. Together with \triangleright Twelfth Night it is his best work in the style of romantic comedy.

Ascham, Roger (1515-68)

Humanist, educationalist, tutor to ▷ Elizabeth I and secretary to ▷ Mary I. In 1538 he was made Greek reader at St John's College, Cambridge, and later, in 1546, public orator of the university. His two major works are Toxophilus (1545) and The Schoolmaster (1570). The latter is an educational manual, addressed to the prospective tutors of the children of the social elite, which sets out the ▷ humanist ideal of creating the harmonious individual. His Toxophilus is a dialogue in praise of the sport of archery.

Ash Wednesday

I The first day of the religious season of Lent, a day of penitence when, in the Catholic Church, the penitents had their foreheads marked with ash.

2 Ash-Wednesday is the title of a sequence of poems (1930) by ➤ T. S. Eliot (1888–1965), marking poetically the conversion of the poet to Christianity.

Askew, Anne (1520-46)

Protestant martyr and writer of an autobiographical account of her spiritual beliefs. She was married in her early twenties to a Catholic squire, but was expelled from his household after becoming a Protestant. She resumed her maiden name and travelled to London where she came under the protection of ▷ Queen Katherine Parr. Askew was then arrested for heresy − she believed that the Mass was a religious metaphor − and tortured. It is likely that the Lord Chancellor and his fellow nobles wished to incriminate Katherine Parr to the ageing > King Henry VIII, thereby lessening her power and increasing their own. She refused to confess, however, or to incriminate any others, and was eventually burned at the stake. Her accounts were published as the First and Lattre examinacyon of Anne Askewe, latelye martyred in Smythfelde (1546–7). Her bravery later gained recognition in > John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563) and excerpts from her work may be found in The Paradise of Women, Writings by Englishwomen of the Renaissance, ed. Betty Travitsky.

Aspects of the Novel (1927)

A critical work on the novel by ▷ E.M. Forster, based on his Clark Lectures delivered in the University of Cambridge. Well known for its engaging conversational style, the book anticipates aspects of ▷ narratology in its consideration of point of view and ▷ flat and round characters, but is sharply distinguished from later narratology, as well as from the more earnest and prescriptive approach of ▷ Henry James' Prefaces, by Forster's jaunty scepticism about any pretensions to abstract rigour.

Astell, Mary (1666-1731) Sometimes claimed as 'the first English feminist', Mary Astell was a writer and intellectual, who published influential tracts on the duties and injustices of marriage, the most famous being > A Serious Proposal to the Ladies for the Advancement of Their True and Greatest Interest (1694), which appeared anonymously as the work of 'a Lover of Her Sex'. With the help of several patrons, most notably William Sancroft, the archbishop of Canterbury, Astell was able to live independently in London and make a career of writing. Her views on the equality of the sexes were, however, modified by her conservative politics and her religious commitment to the Anglican Church. A wife's status in relation to her husband was, she argued, in the nature of a voluntary contract, but: 'It may be any Man's Business and Duty to keep Hogs; he was not Made for this, but if he hires himself out to such an Employment, he ought conscientiously to perform it'. Bib: Perry, Ruth, The Celebrated Mary Astell.

Astrophil and Stella (1581-3)

A sequence of 108 ≥ sonnets and 11 songs written by ≥ Sir Philip Sidney and composed c 1581–3. The collection was first published (in a pirated edition) in 1591. While early texts give the title name as 'Astrophel', the modernized 'Astrophil' is almost certainly right.

The sonnets as a whole take the form of a series of poetic addresses from Astrophil (starlover) to Stella (star), though it is not difficult to pierce this fiction and associate Astrophil with Sidney himself and Stella with Penelope Devereux, daughter of the first ➤ Earl of Essex and sister to the second. The sequence should not, however, be taken as a simple disguised autobiographical record. Instead, the sonnets are an investigation of an obsession, a complex depiction of a psychological impasse. Adopting many of the conventions of > Petrarch's poetry, they catalogue not only the cumulative progress of a love affair, but raise important theoretical questions concerning the act of writing and recording a state of mind, whilst also questioning the conventions by which writer and reader are tied to one another. Though sonnet sequences were published before Sidney's collection appeared, Astrophil and Stella set the standard by which later sequences were to be judged.

Atalanta in Calydon (1865)

A verse drama by the poet ➤ Algernon Swinburne, structured like a Greek tragedy and re-telling the Greek myth of Meleager. Promised at his birth strength and good fortune by the Fates, Meleager is also warned that his life will only last as long as a stick burning in the fire. His mother Althaea removes the stick from the fire, extinguishes it and hides it. A great hunt is organized to kill a monstrous Calydonian boar sent by the goddess Artemis to punish King Oenus (Meleager's father) for his lack of reverence to her. Atalanta, the virgin huntress and one of Artemis' favourites, is one of the participants in the hunt and, when the boar is killed, the besotted Meleager grants her all the spoils. When his uncles object Meleager kills them. In revenge for the death of her brothers Althaea burns the stick that measures her son's life and kills him. In the poem Swinburne demonstrates his concern with family tensions and his impatience with orthodox religion. Several of the lyrics from the drama achieved fame outside their original context and Atalanta in Calydon is generally admired for its metrical versatility and emotional power.

Atheist, The: or The Second Part of the Soldier's Fortune (1684)

Play by ➤ Thomas Otway; his last. A comedy, with many intrigue elements. Porcia (played by ➤ Elizabeth Barry in the original version) is pursued by an unwanted suitor, her late husband's brother, who tries to force her to marry him. She approaches Beaugard (first played by ➤ Thomas Betterton) in masquerade, to take up her cause and, in effect, marry her instead, although she claims at first to hate him. Beaugard is also pursued by Lucretia, but he remains loyal to Porcia, whereupon Lucretia plots her revenge, disguising herself as a man in the process of attempting to mismate various characters. Meanwhile Courtine and Sylvia, lovers in ▷ The Soldier's Fortune, have now married, but the union is unhappy, and he abandons her. Various complications are resolved after an improbable last scene, where numerous characters mistake one another's identities in the dark. It is interesting that the men in the play are largely passive, while most of the action is initiated by women.

Atheist's Tragedy, The (1611)

The only extant tragedy confidently attributed to \triangleright Cyril Tourneur, formerly thought to be the author also of \triangleright The Revenger's Tragedy. The play dramatizes the evil plotting of D'Amville, the atheist, to advance his wealth through marital intrigue, and ends in a grotesque manner with the involuntary suicide of the villain and the safeguarding of true love.

Athenaeum, The

Founded in 1828, it was one of the most enlightened periodicals of the 19th century. It was honest and independent in literary criticism, and a leader of the movement to spread education among the working classes. In 1831 it reduced its price by half in order to reach this wider public, and in consequence increased its circulation six times. It was also very progressive in social reform. In 1921 it was incorporated in the Nation and Athenaeum, which in turn was merged in 1931 with the socialist weekly The New Statesman.

Atticus, T. Pomponius (109–32 BC)
Atticus was a correspondent of Cicero and learned in Greek literature. ▶ Alexander Pope refers to ▶ Joseph Addison under this name in lines which he originally sent as a reproach to the older man in a letter in about 1715. They were first published in 1722 after Addison's death, and appear in revised form in the Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot (1735).

Atwood, Margaret (b 1939)

Canadian novelist, poet and short-story writer. Born in Ottawa, she spent part of her early years in the wilds of northern Quebec, and her poetry makes considerable metaphorical use of the wilderness and its animals. Her first two novels are poetic accounts of the heroines' search for self-realization, and each has a dominant central metaphor: emotional cannibalism in The Edible Woman (1969) and drowning and surfacing in Surfacing (1972). Lady Oracle (1976) is a more comic and satirical work, portraying the limitations of middle-class Canadian life. Her poetry, which is unrhymed, shares many themes with her novels; The Journals of Susanna Moodie: Poems (1970) employs pioneering as a metaphor for contemporary feminist questioning of gender roles. Her more recent novels have broader social themes: Bodily Harm (1981) is a political satire set on a Caribbean island, while The Handmaid's Tale (1986) is a vision of a futuristic dystopia, influenced by > George Orwell's 1984. It focuses on the exploitation of women in a state ruled by religious fundamentalism, and the ambivalent, ironic conclusion promotes a complex sense of the novel's relevance to our own times. The novel Cat's Eye (1989) and the collection of short stories Wilderness Tips (1991) return to her Canadian background, evoking with acute irony the middle-class Canada of the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. Atwood's interest in Canadian nationalism and in feminism have made her an important figure in contemporary Canadian culture.

Other novels include: Life Before Man (1979) and The Robber Bride. Story collections: Dancing Girls (1977); Murder in the Dark (1984); Bluebeard's Egg (1986). Volumes of poetry include: Selected Poems (1976); Marsh, Hawk (1977); Two Headed Poems (1978); True Stories (1981); Notes Towards a Poem That Can Never Be Written (1981); Snake Poems (1983); Interlunar (1984). Criticism: Second Words: Selected Critical Prose (1982).

Aubrey, John (1626-97)

Biographer and antiquary. Aubrey was a man of endlessly fascinated speculation on every aspect of the world in which he found himself. Entirely without any form of method, he nevertheless produced (though never published) an invaluable record of people, events and happenings of the period in which he lived. Frequently the record of personalities preserved by Aubrey is highly untrustworthy in terms of its factual content, and yet his Brief Lives is still an important document not least because of its often penetrating assessment of his subjects' lives and works. If nothing else, Aubrey has preserved a critical running commentary on many of the figures from the 17th century whose works are read in the 20th century.

Auchinleck Manuscript

A famous literary anthology (now kept in the National Library of Scotland, Edinburgh, Advocates' MS 19.2.1), which was probably produced around 1330–40 in a London workshop. It contains a wide range of vernacular texts including an important collection of romances (such as \triangleright Bevis of Hampton, King Alisaunder, Richard the Lion-hear and Sir Tristrem).

Auden, W. H. (Wystan Hugh) (1907–73) Poet and dramatist. Born in York, Auden spent much of his childhood in Birmingham, but was educated at Gresham's School, Norfolk, a public school with liberal ideas about education, and at Oxford University. The landscape of the industrial Midlands influenced his work throughout his life. Auden began writing poetry at 15, and twice edited the journal Oxford Poetry when he went up to Oxford in 1925. As a student he became the central figure in the 1930s group of left-wing intellectuals, which included > Stephen Spender (who printed Auden's first collection of poems on a hand press), > Cecil Day-Lewis, > Louis MacNeice and ➤ Christopher Isherwood. His background was a middle-class intellectual one, which produced a sense of social responsibility and a strong didactic tendency in his poetry. He became a teacher and worked both in an English school and in English and American universities. He married Erika Mann, Thomas Mann's daughter and an anti-Nazi, in 1938, so that she could obtain British citizenship, although Auden was himself a homosexual. He emigrated to the U.S.A. in 1939, becoming an American citizen in 1946. In 1956 he became professor of poetry at Oxford, and died in Austria in 1973.

His first book, Poems (1930), was published during the great economic crisis which originated in the U.S.A. in 1929. This was followed by The Orators (1932), the 'charade' The Dance of Death (1933), Look, Stranger! (1936), Letters from Iceland (with MacNeice, 1937), Journey to a War (with Isherwood, 1939) and Another Time (1940). He also wrote plays, often with Isherwood: The Dog Beneath the Skin (with Isherwood; 1935); The Ascent of F6 (with Isherwood; 1936); On the Frontier (with Isherwood; 1938).

His verse is full of topical reference to the social and international crises of the time; it gives direct expression to the anxieties of the contemporary intelligentsia as perhaps no other writing has done. Auden was interested in verse technique, and influenced by an extensive range of writing, extending from the alliterative styles of Old and Middle English to > T. S. Eliot and the late work of > W. B. Yeats. Throughout his life he was interested in > Freud and psychoanalytic theory, and also absorbed Marxism, the work of Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard, and the 20thcentury German-American theologian Niebuhr. After 1940 he became increasingly committed to Anglo-Catholic Christianity.

After his emigration to America, Auden published a wide range of poetry in different forms: New Year Letter (1941), For the Time Being (1945), The Age of Anxiety (1948), Nones (1952), The Shield of Achilles (1955), Homage to Clio (1960). He also wrote criticism (The Enchafed Flood (1951), The Dyer's Hand (1963)), libretti for operas, and he edited a number of > anthologies. Towards the end of his life he became an isolated figure, in marked contrast with the first decade of his writing when he had seemed to be the voice of a generation although perhaps, in reality, only the generation of the younger middle class. Aureng-Zebe (1675)

Heroic play by > John Dryden, based on a contemporary account of the struggle between the four sons of Shah Jahan, the fifth Mogul emperor, for the succession to the throne. Dryden made several crucial changes to his source, notably to the character of Aureng-Zebe, who in Dryden's version remains loyal to his father, even though he is betrayed by him. This morality pays off in that at the end of the play he receives the crown legitimately. The character of Indamora, a captive queen whom Aureng-Zebe loves, was invented by Dryden. At the end they are united, with the blessings of the emperor who had pursued Indamora for himself.

Aurora Leigh (1857)

One of ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning's most important works, and a key text for Victorian debates about the ➤ 'Woman Question'.

Described by its author as a 'novel in verse', this 11,000-line poem is a semi-autobiographical account of the development of a female poet, exploring both the nature of sexual difference and the role of the woman writer.

Aurora is brought up in Italy until she is seventeen, then sent to England to live with an aunt. Educating herself in secret, she refuses a marriage proposal at twenty from her cousin Romney, who wishes her to abandon writing in favour of social reform. Alone and penniless on the death of her aunt, she establishes a reputation as a poet in London. Here she becomes involved with Lady Waldemar, who is in love with Romney and wishes to use Aurora to prevent him from marrying Marian Earle, a poor sempstress. Marian absconds to the continent before the marriage can take place, and Aurora finds her there with an illegitimate child, the product of a rape. The two women live happily together in Italy for some time until Aurora meets up with the now blinded and politically disillusioned Romney who acknowledges the importance of her work and whom she marries.

Although the narrative is indebted to other 19th-century texts such as ➤ Elizabeth Gaskell's > Ruth and > Charlotte Brontë's > Jane Eyre, as well as to Madame de Staël's (1766-1817) Corinne ou L'Italie (1807), it is important for its discussion of art, politics, poetic tradition and women's writing. Aurora Leigh contains the fullest exposition of issues surrounding female creativity in Victorian literature, despite its elitist political stance and demonstrable fear of the working class. In the year of its publication it ran to three editions and remained enormously popular, achieving seventeen editions by 1882. However, some Victorian parents refused to allow their daughters to read it, fearful of the model of female independence and autonomy it presented. In its themes it echoes > Kingsley's > Alton Locke.

Aurora Leigh was republished by The Women's Press in 1978.

Austen, Jane (1775-1817)

Novelist. Her novels in order of publication are as follows: Sense and Sensibility (1811), ▷ Pride and Prejudice (1813), ▷ Mansfield Park (1814), ▷ Emma (1816), ▷ Northanger Abbey and ▷ Persuasion (1818). The last two, published posthumously, are her first and last work respectively in order of composition. Fragments and early drafts include: Lady Susan (pub 1871), The Watsons (1871) and Sanditon, on which she was working when she died, published in 1925.

She restricted her material to a narrow range of society and events: a prosperous, middleclass circle in provincial surroundings. However, she treated this material with such subtlety of observation and depth of penetration that she is ranked among the most enduring English novelists. A French critic, Louis Cazamian, writes of her method that it is 'so classical, so delicately shaded . . . that we are strongly reminded of the great French analysts'. Her classicism arises from respect for the sane, clear-sighted judgement of the ➤ Augustan age that had preceded her, but its vitality is enhanced by the > Romanticism of her own period, so that her heroines acquire wisdom by a counter-balancing of the two. She brought the English novel, as an art form, to its maturity, and the wide range which that form covered later in the 19th century owed much to the imaginative assurance which she had given it.

Her life as a clergyman's daughter was outwardly uneventful but it is probably not true that this accounts for the absence of sensationalism in her novels; her circle of relatives and friends was such as could have given her a wide experience of contemporary society. The restriction of the subject matter of her fiction seems to have been dictated by artistic considerations. D. W. Harding's essay 'Regulated Hatred: An Aspect of the Work of Jane Austen' (Scrutiny, 1940) credits her with being a caustic satirist and critic of society. Bib: Austen-Leigh, J. Austin, Sarah (1793-1867)

Translator. Primarily important for facilitating access to French and German ➤ medieval literature during a period in which the influence of ⊳ Gothic literature was of primary importance. She published her translations in Lays of the Minnesingers (1825), with Edgar Taylor (▷ lay). She also translated: from German, Prince Puckler-Muskau's Tour in England, Ireland and France (1832), Characteristics of Goethe (1833) and Fragments from German Prose Writers (1841); and from French, several political and biographical works. Although committed to the education of women, she deemed it sensible to refrain from airing her feelings too strongly in her works. Nevertheless, she may have influenced J. S. Mill (1806-73) in his campaign for women's equality, as it was Austin who taught him the German language.

Author

This is a very uncomplicated term when used merely to designate the person who writes the text of a work. But modern critical thought has had reservations about highlighting the author's role too prominently when analysing literary works, mainly because an over-emphasis on the author tends to block other important considerations and reduce literary commentary to biographical speculation or mindless talk about 'genius'. A number of factors have influenced this suspicion.

1 ▷ Modernist thinkers, such as ▷ T. S. Eliot, ▷ James Joyce and the Russian ▷ Formalists, emphasised the craftsmanship and impersonality of writers rather than their genius. For them, writers manipulate language, tradition and convention in a skilled way rather than by possession of special inspiration or wisdom.

2 ➤ Psychoanalytic thinkers highlight the central role of unconscious forces in human creativity rather than those of the conscious personality of the author.

3 An influential strand of critical opinion stresses the unreliability of using the author's intentions as a benchmark for analysing literary texts for a variety of reasons (> Intentional Fallacy).

4 Related to this, is the view that literary texts are much too complex to be ascribed to single, personal causes: authors assume roles, for instance, they deploy ironies, set up dialogues and debates and create a plurality of voices rather than speak from a stable centre of belief or inspiration.

5 It is also argued that the emphasis on authors ignores the role of readers, and some critics stress the creativity of readers and the ways in which many literary works encourage them to use this (> Reader Response Criticism).

6 From a historical perspective, scholars are also unhappy that a concentration on the so-called 'timelessness' or universality of the author's genius ignores important socio-economic factors. Examples of such factors would be the role of publishers, patrons, theatre managers and the book-buying public in shaping a work for the market-place, as well as the political and > ideological contexts of a period. Such scholars also point out that the > Romantic idea of the genius is a 19th-century invention and, if applied to earlier periods, distorts our understanding of the social roles occupied by writers.

7 Finally, in recent times, > poststructuralist thinkers like > Michel Foucault and > Roland Barthes have pronounced, in Barthes' famous slogan, 'the death of the author'. For Foucault, a concentration on authors as individuals neglects their social role and the way they use the > discourse of their time. Foucault therefore writes about what he calls 'the author function' rather than individuals. Similarly, for Barthes, it is not authors that matter, but the > text produced. However, opponents of these ideas argue that the elimination of the author disregards the fact that literature is an act of human creativity and communication, and that the isolation of free-standing, impersonal text ignores the historical and cultural circumstances of its production.

Autobiography

The word came into English at the very end of the 18th century and by the 19th and 20th centuries the writing of the story of one's own life had become a common literary activity. However, the practice already had an ancient history, and English autobiography may be divided into three overlapping historical segments: 1 the spiritual confession; 2 the memoir; 3 the autobiographical novel.

1 The spiritual confession has as its basic type the Confessions of St Augustine of Hippo (345-430) who described his conversion to Christianity. Such records of the inner life existed in the English Middle Ages, eg the Book of Margery Kempe (15th century), but the great age for them was the 17th century, when the > Puritans, depending on the Word of God in the Bible and the inner light of their own consciences, made a practice of intensive selfexamination. By far the best known of these records is ➤ Bunyan's ➤ Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666). However, the greater freedom accorded to women under Puritan principles allowed several women to write spiritual autobiographies, including ➤ Margaret Fell and ➤ Alice Sutcliffe. It is characteristic of such works that they contain detailed accounts of the emotional life, but little factual description of events.

2 The memoir, on the other hand, of French derivation, originates largely in the 17th century and owes much to the practice of extensive letterwriting which then developed, eg the letters of Madame de Sévigné (1626-06). An unusual early example of this class is the autobiography of the musician Thomas Whythorne (1528-96), published in 1964 and entitled A Book of Songs and Sonetts.

One of the earliest and most interesting of such secular autobiographies written by a woman was that of ➤ Lady Anne Clifford, and this was followed by ➤ Margaret Cavendish's 'A True Relation of My Birth Breeding and Life' appended to Nature's Pictures (1657). An example from 18th-century England is the fragmentary Memoirs (pub 1796) by the historian ➤ Edward Gibbon. But the objective memoir and the subjective confessions came together in the Confessions of the French-Swiss > Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and this is the most prevalent form of the outstanding English autobiographies of the 19th century. The varieties of this form are extensive; they may be a record of emotional struggles and experiences, eg > The Confessions of an English Opium Eater by > Thomas de Quincey; > Sartor Resartus by > Thomas Carlyle. They may be essentially a history of the growth of ideas, convictions, and the strengthening of vocation, in the life of the writer, eg Autobiography (1873) by > John Stuart Mill; My Apprenticeship (1926) by ➤ Beatrice Webb; Apologia pro Vita Sua (1864) by > John Henry Newman. In any case, an autobiographical element becomes prominent in works which are not strictly autobiographies from the early 19th century on; eg > Wordsworth's Prelude, or Growth of a Poet's Mind (first version 1805); the periodical essays of > Charles Lamb in > Essays of Elia (1820-3) and > Coleridge's mixture of autobiography with philosophy and literary criticism in Biographia Literaria (1817). It may be said that from 1800 on it becomes the instinct of writers of many kinds to use autobiographical material, or to adopt from time to time an autobiographical standpoint. Indeed, a number of fictional works in the 18th century purport to be memoirs, or are in fact memoirs disguised as fiction, for example, Delarivière Manley's The Adventures of Rivella (1714).

3 Thus we come to the autobiographical novel, and while the form developed a formal identity in the 18th and 19th centuries, a prototype may be found in the mock-autobiographies of ▷ Elizabethan novels, such as ▷ Thomas Nashe's > Unfortunate Traveller (1594). In the Victorian period we have the novels of > Charlotte Brontë (> Jane Eyre, 1847, and > Villette, 1853), and Charles Dickens' > David Copperfield (1849-50); in addition the antifeminist writer ➤ Eliza Lynn Linton chose to portray her life using a male protagonist in > The Autobiography of Christopher Kirkland (1885) thereby enjoying a certain freedom to write about events which would have been denied her had she published it under her own name. ➤ Charles Darwin and ➤ Thomas Huxley both wrote autobiographies. This method of writing a novel really came into its own however, with ▷ Samuel Butler's ▷ Way of all Flesh (1903), which led to many successors in the 20th century, notably > James Joyce's > Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916), and D. H. Lawrence's Dons and Lovers (1913), both autobiographical discussions of the development of the artist. More recent examples are ➤ Margaret Atwood's Cat's Eye, (1989), ➤ Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar (1963), American writer Alice Walker's The Colour Purple and > Ieanette Winterson's Oranges are Not the Only Fruit. Finally, the links between identity, culture and politics have made the autobiographical novel an important form of ⊳ post-colonial and feminist fiction, eg ➤ George Lamming, In the Castle of My Skin (1953), > Bessie Head, A Question of Power (1973).

Autobiography of Christopher Kirkland, The (1885)

The autobiography of ➤ Eliza Lynn Linton, anti-feminist journalist and author of the sensational essay ➤ 'The Girl of the Period' (1868). Although the book accurately and frankly records Linton's life, it is written from the perspective of a male. One reason for this may have been that a male persona enabled Linton to write more freely about her own close female companions without attracting speculation or scandal (especially since she had explicitly condemned ➤ lesbianism in The Rebel of the Family, 1880). The book was not a commercial success.

Avalon

The 'Insula Avallonis' is mentioned in ➤ Geoffrey of Monmouth's ➤ History of the Kings of Britain as the place where Arthur's sword was forged, and as the place to which ➤ Arthur is taken after he has been fatally wounded. More information about Avalon is given in Geoffrey's poetic account of the Life of Merlin (Vita Merlini), where it is called 'the island of apples', said to be over the Western waters and the home of Morgan la Fay. In the course of the development of Arthurian legend, Avalon has been given different geographical settings; ➤ Glastonbury, in particular, has been strongly promoted from the late 12th century onwards as being Arthur's burial place and, hence, to be identified as Avalon itself.

Avant-garde

Originally referring to the most forward part of an advanced army, this French term was used for political movements, especially revolutionary ones, from the late 19th century. It has been applied to innovative developments in the arts in all fields from the early 20th century, particularly those using experimental techniques designed to challenge their audience with their innovation or difficulty. Something of the military and political origin of avantgarde is therefore retained in the aggressive stance of much avant-garde art. The term also indicates a certain social group, largely young, urban and cosmopolitan in outlook, in which such techniques are devised and encouraged.

Avon

The river of ▷ Shakespeare's birthplace, Stratford-on-Avon, from which he is called the 'Swan of Avon' by ▷ Ben Jonson in his poem To the Memory of Shakespeare. The word derives from Celtic afon = 'river'; three other rivers with the same name exist in England.

Awkward Age, The (1899)

A novel by ➤ Henry James. Nanda Brookenham is a young girl brought up in a smart but corrupt section of London society; her mother and her mother's circle are willing to carry on immoral intrigues so long as respectable appearances are scrupulously protected. Nanda is in love with Vanderbank, who, as she learns later, is her mother's lover, and she feels some affection for Mitchett, a young man of less charm than Vanderbank, but with an attractive simplicity of heart. Unlike the other members of her mother's circle, she is free and candid in her feelings and open in her conduct; this alarms Vanderbank and inhibits him from declaring his love for her. Her elderly friend, Mr Longdon, an admirer of her dead grandmother, gives Nanda a dowry to attract Vanderbank, but this only increases the latter's fastidious reluctance to declare himself. Meanwhile, the Duchess, Mrs Brookenham's friend and rival, conspires to capture Mitchett for her own daughter, Aggie, whose appearance of immaculate innocence immediately breaks down when it has served its purpose of qualifying her for the marriage market. Vanderbank's mixture of scrupulousness and timidity remains a permanent barrier between himself and Nanda. Mr Longdon adopts her, and they remain together in their love of truthful feeling, isolated from the sophisticated but essentially trivial society which has hitherto constituted Nanda's environment.

The novel is an example of James' interest in the survival of integrity in a materialistic society blinded by its own carefully cultivated artificiality.

Awoonor, Kofi (b 1935)

Ghanaian novelist and poet, educated at University College of Ghana, University College London and the State University of New York. He has worked as a university lecturer and professor in Ghana and the U.S.A., as a film director and for the Ghana Ministry of Information. He was imprisoned in Ghana during 1975-1976 for alleged subversion; in 1983 he was appointed as Ghana's ambassador to Brazil. His first novel, This Earth, My Brother (1971) consists of prose chapters, interspersed with poetic fragments; a dead girl, cousin of the novel's hero, is symbolically identified with the Ghanaian nation and with the figure of 'Manny Watta', a mythical water spirit. His other works include: Night of My Blood (1971); Ride Me Memory (1973); Guardians of the Sacred Wand (1974); The Breast of the Earth (1975); Come the Voyager at Last: A Tale of Return to Africa (1992). Ayekbourn, Alan (b 1939)

Until recently an underestimated dramatist whose plays have often been dismissed (or presented) as light entertainment for unthinking bourgeois audiences. He often writes about the middle classes in order to explore serious issues of modern life. Ayckbourn is now one of Britain's most commercially successful playwrights, with regular West End and repertory productions, frequent televisations, and commissions both as writer and director.

After starting his theatrical career as an actor and stage-manager with Donald Wolfit's company, he moved to Stephen Joseph's Studio Theatre Company in the early 1960s, where he began directing and writing with Joseph's encouragement. Many of his most successful plays began at Scarborough where he is Artistic Director of the Library Theatre. A superb theatrical craftsman, his plays are often constructed around a tour de force of staging: The Norman Conquests (1973) is a trilogy of plays, each of which stands on its own, and presents the same events from the garden, sitting room and dining room; How the Other Half Loves (1969), Absurd Person Singular (1972) and Bedroom Farce (1975) each present more than one household on stage simultaneously; Way Upstream (1082) launched a riverboat onto the ➤ National Theatre stage; Sisterly Feelings (1979) offers alternative versions for the central section of the play. His plays have their roots in the tradition of farce rather than in experimental theatre. He has stretched the boundaries of comedy and farce as his work has developed. Increasingly, the comings and goings of married couples are injected with a note of black comedy, and social groups are fraught with the suggestions of the darker arenas of human interchange. The social niceties of the tea party in Absent Friends are disrupted with the inability of the participants to cope with the idea of death, and in Just Between Ourselves (1976) and Woman in Mind (1985), what begins as a familiar comic theme of a sterile marriage transforms into tragedy as the wife descends into catatonia and breakdown.

Ayckbourn's success might be accounted for in that his work is challenging, but within strict limits; his subject matter has tended to be middle-class values and lifestyle under threat (but not too much), while his dramatic form plays with theatrical convention but is always firmly rooted in the familiar structures of farce and West-End comedy. His plays include: Relatively Speaking (1967); Absurd Person Singular (1972); The Norman Conquests (1973); Bedroom Farce (1975); Season's Greetings (1982); Way Upstream (1982); A Chorus of Disapproval (1984); Henceforward (1988). In 1993, French film director Alain Resnais brought Ayckbourn's play-sequence Intimate Exchanges to the screen as Smoking/No Smoking. Bib: Billington, M., Alan Ayckbourn.

Aytoun, William Edmondstoune (1818-65) Versatile Scottish satirist, poet and critic and contributor to ▷ Blackwood's Magazine. Provoked by the feverish ➤ Romanticism of much of the poetry of the early 1840s and by the enthusiasm of the critic > George Gilfillan, he coined the term > 'Spasmodic' to describe the work of ⊳ Sydney Dobell, ⊳ Philip James Bailey and Alexander Smith (1830-67). In May 1854, Aytoun instituted an elaborate hoax publishing an anonymous critical review of a forthcoming production of Firmilian, or the Student of Badajoz: A Spasmodic Tragedy by T. Percy Jones and a preface to the work by its imaginary author in Blackwood's Magazine. Firmilian eleverly burlesqued the excesses of Dobell and Smith to such an extent that they disappeared from the literary scene. Aytoun also wrote the Bon Gaultier Ballads (1855) with Theodore Martin, a series of parodies of poets such as ▷ Tennyson and ▷ Elizabeth Barrett Browning. His Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers (1849) and The Ballads of Scotland (1858) were very popular with their contemporary audience.

Bacon, Ann (1528-1610)

Translator. Famed for her translation from Latin into English of Bishop Jewel's Apology (1564), and for the letters she wrote to her sons, one of whom was > Francis Bacon, the Lord Chancellor. Ann Bacon was the daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke and was, with her sister Mildred (wife of William Cecil (▷ Burghley)), reputed to be amongst the most highly educated women of their age. She was a staunch Puritan and is said to have been one of > Edward VI's tutors. Her relationship with her own sons was very intense and she maintained a vigorous correspondence with both. Indeed, Francis Bacon left instructions in his will that he should be buried with his mother. Bib: Travitsky, B. (ed.), The Paradise of Women.

Bacon, Francis, 1st Baron Verulam and

Viscount St Albans (1561–1626)
Politician, philosopher and essayist, Francis Bacon rose to the rank of lord chancellor, before being dismissed from that office in the same year in which he attained it – 1621. Bacon's offence was, technically, his conviction for accepting bribes whilst a judge in chancery suits. The cause of his conviction, however, was the ascendency of political enemies he had made in the course of his ambitious career.

It is, however, as an essavist, and, more importantly, as one of the earliest theoreticians of scientific methodology for which Bacon was to become famous. A series of works - which included > The Advancement of Learning (1605) expanded into De Augmentis Scientiarum in 1623), De sapientia veterum (1609, translated as The Wisdom of the Ancients in 1619) and the incomplete > Novum Organum (1620) established his claims to philosophical and methodological pre-eminence amongst his contemporaries. The De Augmentis and the Novum Organum formed the first two parts of his enormous project, gathered under the title > Instauratio Magna, which remained unfinished but which proposed nothing less than a reordering of all fields of human enquiry. In addition Bacon wrote a history of the reign of > Henry VIII (published in 1622), a collection of anecdotal stories (1625) and a > utopian work, based on the new scientific endeavours of the age - > The New Atlantis (1626). His major philosophical works were written in addition to his contribution to the law and his Essays, which were first published in 1507 and issued in a final form (much expanded) in 1625.

Until recently, Bacon's reputation tended to rest on his Essays, which represent a series of terse observations in the style of Seneca rather than the more fluid meditations to be found in the writings of > Montaigne, who is credited with originating the essay as a distinctly modern form. More and more attention is, however, being paid to his theoretical work in the general area of scientific methodology and taxonomy. It was Bacon who was to be celebrated in the later 17th century as the true progenitor of the > 'New Science', not least because of his intense interest in the language of science, and in the forms of discourse appropriate to different rhetorical and methodological projects. As a scientist in the modern sense, his contribution to knowledge was negligible. But as the author of a series of 'manifestos' which set out to establish the basis for inductive or experimental philosophy, his influence on later generations of English philosophers was to be incalculable. The 'Baconian' method an adherence, that is, to the importance of observation and definition of the particular, rather than a delight in deduction from the general - was to be the legacy of his work and the basis for his reputation in later periods.

Bacon, Roger (1210/14-after 1291) Franciscan scholar, student at Paris and Oxford, and author of treatises on, for example, grammar, logic, physics, mathematics and modern philosophy. He was an acute and independent thinker, and one of the leading philosophers of the ⊳ Middle Ages. His originality in devoting himself to experimental methods caused him to be known in Paris as 'Doctor mirabilis' (Wonderful Doctor). He was a vociferous critic of what he saw as the inadequately based scholarship of his time and was placed in confinement at various stages in his career for his heretical propositions. In popular tradition he came to be regarded as a magician and the inventor of a brazen head that could speak. It is in such a role that he is represented in > Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1504), a romantic comedy by > Robert Greene.

Badman, The Life and Death of Mr (1680) A moral ▷ allegory by ▷ John Bunyan, author of ▷ The Pilgrim's Progress, and, apart from the more famous work, the only one of Bunyan's fictions to remain widely known. It is the biography of a wicked man told by Mr Wiseman, and contains vivid and dramatic detail. Its realism and its psychology make it one of the forerunners of the novel.

Baedeker, Karl (1801-59) The author of famous guide-books, which were carried on by his son. Their frequent mention in English 19th- and 20th-century fiction shows how indispensable they were to English middle- and upper-class tourists of the last 100 years, especially in visits to countries in which monuments and works of art are plentiful, such as Italy. He wrote in German but English editions were produced after his death, from 1861 onwards.

Bagehot was also the author of a number of critical essays, the best known of which is Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning or Pure, Ornate, and Grotesque Art in English Poetry (1864). Bailey, Philip James (1816–1902)

Poet. Earliest and most significant member of a school of poets satirized by critic ➤ William Aytoun as the ➤ Spasmodics. Born in Nottingham, he was educated at Glasgow University and called to the Bar in 1840: however, he practised only as a poet. In 1839 he achieved enormous popularity with a blank verse epic drama, Festus, based on Goethe's (1749-1882) Faust legend. Each subsequent edition was progressively enlarged until the final Festus (1880) had expanded to 52 scenes and 40,000 lines. Highly emotional and religiose, Festus sought to portray inspiration through irregularity of form and spontaneous composition. Other, more modest, works include The Angel World (1850) and The Mystic (1855). Bailey's reputation never recovered from Aytoun's brilliant parody of his style in Firmilian, or The Student of Badajoz: A Spasmodic Tragedy (1854). ➤ Gilfillan, George.

Friend of ▷ Sir Walter Scott and prolific author of plays based on the ▷ Shakespearean model (Plays of the Passions; 1798, 1802, 1812), five of which were acted. She also wrote poems in couplets, and lyrics on sentimental and patriotic themes (Fugitive Verses, 1790; Metrical Legends, 1821; Poetic Miscellanies, 1823).

Bainbridge, Beryl (b 1933) Novelist. Brought up near Liverpool, she worked as an actress before writing her first novel (though not the first to be published), Harriet Said (1972), which concerns two girls involved in a murder. Initially seen as a writer of macabre thrillers, she has gained an increasing following and has gradually attracted more serious critical attention. Her novels are characterized by black humour, economy of style and portraits of lower-middle-class manners with a strong element of the > Gothic and grotesque. The Bottle Factory Outing (1974) centres on the relationship of two women on an increasingly sinister works outing which leads to the death of one of them. Confused and sordid lives are observed in a detached and ironic manner. A Quiet Life (1976) is a partly ≥ autobiographical tale of family eccentricities and the tragic precariousness of love, while Winter Garden (1980) draws on a visit Bainbridge made to the Soviet Union to create a chilling though comic account of confusion and intrigue on a tour of that country. Other novels are: A Weekend with Claude (1967); Another Part of the Wood (1968); The Dressmaker (1973); Sweet William (1975); Injury Time (1977); Young Adolf (1978); Watson's Apology (1984); Filthy Lucre (1986); An Awfully Big Adventure (1989, which was released as a film in 1995, directed by Mike Newell).

Bakhtin, Mikhail (1895-1975)

Bakhtin's first major work was Problems in Dostoevsky's Poetics (1929), but his most famous work, Rabelais and His World, did not appear until 1965. Two books, Freudianism: a Marxist Critique (1927), and Marxism and the Philosophy of Language (1930) were published under the name of V. N. Volosinov, and a third, The Formal Method in Literary Scholarship (1928) appeared under the name of his colleague P. N. Medvedev. Bakhtin's concern throughout is to show how ⊳ ideology functions in the process of the production of the linguistic sign and to develop and identify the concept of 'dialogism' as it operates in literary texts. In Bakhtin's words 'In dialogue a person not only shows himself outwardly, but he becomes for the first time that which he is, not only for others but himself as well. To be means to communicate dialogically.' His work has in recent years enjoyed a revival, particularly among critics. Especially important is the way in which he theorizes and politicizes the concepts of festivity and ⊳ carnival. Also one of his concerns is to identify the dialectal relationship between those various 'texts' of which any one literary work is comprised. This notion of ▷ 'intertextuality' is currently used within areas such as ▶ feminism and → deconstruction. Much of Bakhtin's work was suppressed during his life-time and not published until after his death.

Bale, John (1495–1563) Bishop of Ossory, dramatist and literary historian.

A staunch Protestant, Bale came under the ▶ patronage of ▶ Thomas Cromwell and wrote several anti-Catholic (> Catholicism) plays before the downfall of his patron. Bale himself was imprisoned for treason by ➤ Mary I and released on a fine of £,300; he finally returned to Britain when > Elizabeth I came to the throne. He is best known for his play King John (c 1540), which is acknowledged to be the first drama to bridge the gap between the > morality plays of the medieval period and the history plays of the Renaissance, such as those of ▷ Shakespeare and ▷ Marlowe. The play combines moral analysis with historical representation. Bale also compiled the notes of John Leland, which led to an immensely useful index of 1,400 English writers. Bib: Blatt, T. B., The Plays of John Bale.

Balin

Balin le Savage and Balan are the two brothers who help ➤ King Arthur in his early struggles to establish power in the first book of ➤ Malory's Morte D'Arthur. Balin gives King Pellam the Dolorous Stroke which results in the creation of the Wasteland.

Ball, John (d 1381)

Priest and leader of the ➤ Peasants' Revolt (1381), and the subject of A Dream of John Ball by ➤ William Morris.

Ballad

Traditionally the ballad has been considered a folkloric verse narrative which has strong associations with communal dancing, and support for that link has been found in the derivation of the word 'ballad' itself (from the late Latin verb ballare – to dance). More recently scholars have viewed the association between ballads and dance forms rather more sceptically. Generally, the term is used of a narrative poem which uses an elliptical and highly stylized mode of narration, in which the technique of repetition with variation may play an important part. Often ballads contain repeated choral refrains but this is not a universal feature.

Ballad forms can be identified in early English texts: the brief narrative about Judas in the > Harley manuscript has been hailed as the earliest English example of the form. The socalled > Broadside ballads, sold in Elizabethan times, were narrative poems on a wide range of subjects printed on a single side of a broadsheet. From the 18th century onwards, collections of folk/'popular ballads' began to be made and the form was taken up by some of the most influential poets of the late 18th century as a folkloric form of expression. > Wordsworth's and ▷ Coleridge's collection of poems ▷ Lyrical Ballads (1798) does not contain many poems in ballad form (apart from the brilliant balladic composition ▷ The Ancient Mariner) but the function of the title seems to be to arouse associations of oral, non-literary poetic forms. In this collection, art is used to conceal art. ➤ Walter Scott produced many adaptations and imitations of traditional Scots ballads and published a collection of ballads entitled The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border. The great ballad collection of F. J. Child, English and Scottish Popular Ballads, was published at the end of the 19th century. Associated with oral tradition and song, ballads were a popular form for women poets in the 19th century, including Felicia Hemans (1793-1835), Letitia Landon (1802-38), ➤ Elizabeth Barrett Browning, ➤ Emily Brontë and ➤ Christina Rossetti, and they proved equally popular with readers. Victorian ballads often had a > medieval setting, such as Barrett Browning's 'The Romaunt of the Page' (1839) and 'The Lay of the Brown Rosary' (1840). Twentieth-century ballads include Miss Gee and Victor by > W. H. Auden, and works by ➤ Louis MacNeice and ▶ Rudyard Kipling. Arguably the clearest form in which the ballad has survived is in the work of the musicians and lyricists of the folk revival of the 1950s and 1960s; many of Bob Dylan's songs are ballads. Bib: Bold, A., The Ballad.

Ballad of Reading Gaol, The (1898)

A powerful poem by Doscar Wilde concerning the hanging of the murderer Charles Thomas Wooldridge during Wilde's own imprisonment in Reading Gaol for homosexual acts. In contrast to Wilde's earlier works it is less concerned with aesthetics than with the harshness of prison conditions and the Christian doctrine of forgiveness. It was his last work.

➤ Homosexuality.

Ballade

A lyrical form favoured by French court poets of the 14th century and first used in English by Chaucer (c 1340–1400). The ballade form requires three stanzas linked by a refrain and common rhymes repeated in the same order in each stanza. It was revived in the late 19th century by poets such as ➤ Swinburne and ➤ Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

Ballantyne, R.M. (1825-94)

Writer of adventure stories, aimed primarily at boys, the most famous being The Coral Island (1858), probably the most popular such work of the Victorian era. This story, in which a trio of boys is shipwrecked on a Pacific island, is implicitly a ▷ colonial fable, full of blood and masculine resourcefulness. Ballantyne's life was suitably adventurous: born in Edinburgh, he received little formal education but worked as a fur trader in northern Canada from the age of sixteen. This experience produced Hudson's Bay (1848) and The Young Fur Traders (1856).

After establishing himself as an author he continued to travel to research the background to his novels, which included: Martin Rattler, Or A Boy's Adventure in the Forests of Brazil (1858), Pirate City (1874), set in Algiers, and A Tale of the London Fire Brigade (1867).

Ballard, George (1706-55)

Writer, antiquarian, and historian, born at Campden in Gloucestershire. His mother was a midwife, and he was apprenticed to a women's clothing maker. Early in life he developed a reputation for learning, leading Lord Chedworth to provide him with a pension for life. Ballard collected books and documents, and drew up histories and genealogies of individuals, families and monuments. He was part of a circle of antiquaries, who collected and classified artifacts, books and manuscripts. He had a sister with literary interests, and this may have influenced composition of his bestknown work, the Memoirs of Several Ladies of Great Britain (1752), which contains biographies of 64 learned and literary women from the > Middle Ages to his own day. He wrote it, as he said in the preface, in order to remove 'the vulgar prejudice of the supposed incapacity of the female sex'. His work is considered a major source of information about educated women of the past, and has been extensively used by biographers and anthologists since the 18th century.

Bib: Perry, R. (ed.), Memoirs of Several Ladies of Great Britain.

Ballard, J.G. (James Graham) (b 1930) Novelist and short-story writer. Ballard is closely identified with the > science fiction genre, primarily because his more widely read novels and short stories, though essentially uncategorizable, fit most readily into the scifi/fantasy bracket. However, whilst his obsessions with mental decay, violence and its imagery, and the fragmentation of contemporary culture are filtered through the landscapes of more conventional fantasy writing, his allegiance with mainstream fantasy or science fiction is uneasy, and his later writing, particularly the Booker Prize shortlisted Empire of the Sun (1984), has moved nearer to realism, drawing upon Ballard's own childhood experiences. His works include: The Drowned World (1962); The Terminal Beach (1964); The Drought (1965); The Crystal World (1966); The Atrocity Exhibition (1970); Crash (1973); The Unlimited Dream Company (1979); Myths of the Near Future (1982); The Day of Creation (1987); The Kindness of Women (1991).

Balzac, Honoré de (1799–1850) French novelist. His La Comédie humaine is a panorama of French society from the ➤ Revolution to the July Monarchy (1830). It is bound together by the use of recurrent characters (Vautrin is one notable instance, Rastignac another) and recurrent motifs (notably the necessity of moral and social order contrasted with the pressures of the individual ego). Among the one hundred novels which Balzac completed, drafted or projected are Eugénie Grandet (1833), Illusions perdues (1837–43), La Cousine Bette (1846), Le Cousin Pons (1847), Le Père Goriot (1835), Splendeurs et misères des courtisanes (1847).

'French society was to be the historian'. Balzac wrote, 'I had only to be the scribe'. His ways of depicting French society are geographical, historical, political and even geological insofar as all social strata find a place. These different representations, taken individually or in combination, bring into play a dynamic explained in La Peau de chagrin (1831) as the produce of desire and power, with knowledge enlisted to restrain them. But such a restraint is rare or non-existent, and society in the Comédie humaine is driven by a restlessness which tends to exhaustion as it competes for the fulfilment of desire. Like society, character too is open to multiple descriptions, as a machine driven by abstracts (passion, ambition, penury, for instance) or as a representative of a human or social type. In that respect, character has a potential for expansion. It is always ready to merge into symbol (more than just the performance of symbolic actions) or be exaggerated into > melodrama. Indeed, melodrama is a central Balzacian ingredient and, just as characters are actors, buildings and places too are subject to mutation into a theatre or a scene in which the novelistic events unfold. In its liking for myth and melodrama, Balzac's social realism is correspondingly more than the accumulation of surface detail, since the detail acts as an indicator of underlying causes. In turn, understanding of these causes is open only to the novelist defined by his capacity for 'second sight', the capacity to perceive pattern as well as pattern destroyed. And it is considerations of this kind which distinguish Balzac from other ➤ feuilleton novelists such as Eugéne Sue (1804-57) and help account for his pervasive influence on 19th century fiction, particularly in England where Balzac shaped the already strong vein of social > realism. Banks, Isabella (1821-87)

Novelist, poet and journalist, born in Manchester, the daughter of a successful tradesman. She was sixteen years old when her poem 'A Dying Girl to Her Mother', was published in the Manchester Guardian. More of her work was published in Bradshaw's Three (1841–42), and her first collection of poems, Tvy Leaves, appeared in 1844. Banks then grew prolific, writing a series of novels set in the Manchester area, the best-known of which are The Manchester Man (1876), Caleb Booth's Clerk (1878) and Wooers and Winners: A Yorkshire Story (1880). Her novels were so rooted in her native environment that she was labelled the 'Lancashire Novelist'. They are mainly of historical interest today, seeming overloaded with detailed local description and lacking narrative pace.

Banks, John (b c 1650)

Dramatist. He trained as a lawyer, but turned to the stage in 1677, when the success of Nathaniel Lee's The Rival Queens led him to write The Rival Kings. Banks specialized in writing pathetic tragedies, featuring injured heroines. He was ahead of his time as the vogue for such plays, sometimes known as > She-Tragedies, did not really develop until the last decade of the century. He could not find a publisher for his The Innocent Usurper, or a theatre to perform it in, until 1693, ten years after it was written; it was then banned for political reasons. The Island Queens, concerning the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots (1684), also met with indifference until 1704, when it achieved success under the title, Albion's Queen. Other plays include The Unhappy Favourite (1681), about Elizabeth I and Essex; Virtue Betrayed (1682), on Anne Boleyn; and Cyrus the Great (1696), which had considerable success in performance at > Lincoln's Inn Fields, although its run was curtailed by the death of one its leading actors.

Bankside

The south bank of the Thames in London. It was famous in ▷ Shakespeare's day for its theatres. The City of London refused to allow public theatres within its bounds; hence famous theatres such as the ▷ Globe and the ▷ Rose had to be built in Southwark on Bankside. Today, the area south of the Thames, from Southwark to Waterloo, is once more a site for the arts, including the new ▷ Globe Theatre and the ▷ National Theatre, as well as film and music complexes.

Bannerman, Anne (1765-1829)

Poet. She lived in penurious circumstances and poor health in Edinburgh. Her first book, Poems (1800) contains ▷ odes and ▷ sonnets translated from Goethe (▷ German influence on English literature), while her second, Tales of Superstition and Chivalry (1802) uses the ▷ ballad form to tell ▷ Gothic tales of ghosts and prophets. Other themes include nostalgic and sentimental praise for Scotland and admiration for her contemporary ▷ Joanna Baillie.

Bannockburn (1314)

A battle in central Scotland, in which a Scottish army under Robert the Bruce defeated a large invading English force under ▷ Edward II. The battle decided Scottish independence until the two countries became united under a Scottish king (▷ James VI and I, 1603–25). As a heroic episode, it has had a force of inspiration for the Scots similar to the victory of ▷ Agincourt for the English.

Baptists

An important sect of Nonconformist Protestants; originally one of the three principal branches of English > Puritanism, the other two being the Independents (Congregationalists), and the > Presbyterians (Calvinists). Their especial doctrine is to maintain that the rite of baptism must be administered to adults, and not to infants. They began as an offshoot of the Independents in the first decade of the 17th century, and made rapid progress between 1640 and 1660 - the period of the ➤ Civil War and the > Interregnum, when the Puritans usurped the position of the > Church of England. One of the foremost exponents of the Baptist Church in the second half of the 17th century was > John Bunyan (1628-88).

Barbauld, Anna Laetitia (1743-1825) Poet, editor and writer of children's books. Her first book, Poems (1773), was an immediate success. It adopts an ▷ Augustan tone, imitating Samuel Johnson's (1709-84) attack on > Romantic literature. She became a friend of ⊳ Joanna Baillie who inspired her to turn to political writing, which resulted in the Abolitionist tract A Poetical Epistle to Mr Wilberforce, on the Rejection of the Bill for Abolishing the Slave Trade (1790) (▷ Abolition literature). Barbauld is rightly renowned for her fifty-volume editions of the works of English novelists (1810), for which she wrote an interesting preface on novel writing. Her The Female Speaker (1811), which provides selections of literature suitable as reading matter for young ladies, has generally been mocked, but she does include ➤ Coleridge's poem ➤ 'The Ancient Mariner' and refers to its 'queer, wizard-like quality'. She was also a prominent member of the > Bluestocking circle and a friend of ➤ Elizabeth Montagu. Bib: Moore, C.E., Fetter'd or Free? Barbour, John (c 1320-95)

Scottish poet; author of a long verse chronicle in eight-syllable couplets about the Scottish War of Indepedence – The Bruce (c 1375). It tells the story of the defeat of the English attempts to conquer Scotland (1296–1328), contains a celebrated account of ▷ Bannockburn and extols the principal hero of the War – Robert the Bruce, who ended his career as king of Scotland. Other works have been attributed to Barbour, including The Buik of Alexander, but evidence of his authorship has been disputed. Bib: McDiarmid, M. P. and Stevenson, J. A. (eds.), Barbour's Bruce, Scottish Text Society 12–13, 15.

Bard

A member of the privileged caste of poets among the ancient Celtic peoples, driven by the Romans and then the Anglo-Saxons into Wales and Ireland and, legend has it, exterminated in Wales by Edward I. The term became known to later English writers from references in Latin literature. Poets such as ▷ Shakespeare, ▷ John Milton and ▷ Alexander Pope refer to any serious poet as a 'bard'. In the 18th century, partly as a result of the growing antiquarian interest in ▷ druidism, the term came to designate a mysteriously or sacredly inspired poet, as in ▷ Thomas Gray's famous ▷ ode ▷ The Bard (1757).

Bard, The (1757)

One of ➤ Thomas Gray's two famous 'Pindaric Odes' (the other being 'The Progress of Poesy'). The last surviving Celtic ➤ bard stands on a mountain-top and calls down curses upon King Edward I and the English army, as they march below, prophesying the end of his royal house and its ultimate replacement by the (Welsh) house of Tudor. He concludes by throwing himself into the River Conway beneath. There is a stagey wildness about the work which irritated the ➤ Augustan author Samuel Johnson (1709–84), though its failure to 'promote any truth, moral or political' did not prevent it from being very popular at the time.

Barham, Richard (1788-1845)

Poet and miscellaneous prose writer. Barham is primarily known for one work: The Ingoldsby Legends: or Mirth and Marvels (three series collected in 1840). This collection of stories and poems was immensely successful at the time and continues to be read and valued today. The tales are often comic, but perhaps it is their > Gothic quality and sexual subtext which make them enjoyable as well as intriguing. Bib: Horne, R.H., A New Spirit of the Age.

Barker, Clive (b 1952)

Novelist, playwright, painter, screenwriter and director. Born, raised and educated in Liverpool, Barker wrote a number of plays (The Magician, The History of the Devil) before achieving fame as a leading light of Britain's 'new wave' of horror writers (> horror fiction), and in 1987, Hellraiser established Barker as a maverick directorial talent. He currently lives in Hollywood where he continues to write and direct. Barker's early short stories (collected in The Books of Blood Volumes 1 to 6, 1984-5) celebrate cultural multiplicity and sexual perversity, inverting the traditional conservatism of the horror genre. Describing himself as 'a proselytizer on behalf of horror', Barker has sought both on the page and screen to subvert concepts of 'monstrousness'. Most ambitiously, his lengthy novel Cabal (1088, filmed as Nightbreed 1990) posits a tribe of variegated shape-shifters in whose bizarre disfigurement the reader is encouraged to delight. Barker's later works (Weaveworld 1987, Imajica 1991) have eschewed the visceral revelry which characterized his short stories and explored the worlds of mythology and fantasy. Despite his huge success as a writer/film-maker, Barker maintains that painting is his first love. Bib: Jones, S. (ed.), Shadows in Eden.

Barker, George Granville (1913–91)
Poet. His first collection, Thirty Preliminary Poems, was published in 1933, along with a novel, Alanna Autumnal. After that he kept up a steady output of visionary and ▷ autobiographical verse that includes Calamiterror (1937), Lament and Triumph (1940) and the two parts of The True Confession of George Barker (1950 and 1964). His most celebrated later volume is Anno Domini (1983).
Bib: Fraser, R. (ed.), Collected Poems.

Barker, Howard (b 1946)

One of a generation of British dramatists deeply concerned with political and social issues, Barker has never received the degree of critical acclaim given to some of his contemporaries, probably because his interest in the psychology of capitalism and patriarchy leads him to deal in much of his work with the grotesque and the distorted, often in highly scatalogical language. His plays firmly eschew naturalism in favour of an incisive and theatrically inventive cartoonlike style which juxtaposes private desires with public postures and aims for psychological and sociopolitical truth rather than the texture of everyday life. He shares with ➤ John Gay and ▷ Brecht a crucial perception of the apparent identity of interest between criminal and politician and the inherent corruptions of capitalism. The 'criminal' strand in his work is well represented by, for example, Alpha Alpha (1972, a study of two brothers patterned on the Kray twins), Claw (1975) (in which the hero acts as procurer for the Home Secretary and Stripwell (1975), with its judge faced both with the criminal activities of his son and a man he sentenced returning for revenge.

Barker is a history graduate and many of his plays also pursue an interest in historical moments and their lessons for the present. Victory (1983), subtitled punningly 'Choices in Reaction', a fine example of this second strand, deals with the aftermath of the Restoration of Charles II, mixing historical and stereotypical characters in an extraordinary evocation of the collapse of the ideals of the Commonwealth. The play is notable for a brilliant explanation of the nature and contradictions of capitalism. The Castle (1985) is an extraordinary meditation on issues of gender, power, rational and emotional knowledge, war and peace, in which a returning Crusader confronts the peaceful community established by his wife in his absence. The battle lines, both medieval and contemporary, are drawn between creativity and destruction in confrontations and dialogue that are brilliantly imagined and draw to the full on Barker's ability to write with a poetic density of language, comic as well as tragic, which uses everyday idiom as much as architectural imagery to create an extraordinarily flexible language. Other plays include: That Good Between Us (1977); The Hang of the Gaol (1978); The Love of a Good Man (1978); No End of Blame (1981); A Passion in Six Days (1983); Crimes in Hot Countries (1983); The Power of the Dog (1984); Scenes From an Execution (radio, 1984; staged, 1989); The Castle (1985); Downchild (1985); Women Beware Women (reworking of > Middleton's play; 1986); The Possibilities (1988); The Last Supper (1988); The Bite of the Night (1988); Seven Lears (1989); The Europeans (1993).

Barker, Jane (fl 1688-1726)

Poet and novelist. She came from a ➤ Catholic Royalist family which remained loyal to the > Stuart monarchs during the > Civil War and to ▶ James II after the accession of ▶ William (III) and ➤ Mary. She spent most of her life in Lincolnshire. Her poetry is both political and personal, reflecting themes such as friendship and love; it includes Poetical Recreations (1688), and A Collection of Poems Referring to the Times published in 1700. Her novels include Love Intrigues (1713) and Exilius (1715). A collection, Entertaining Novels, was also published in 1715. Barker remained unmarried, a fact which she discussed in A Patchwork Screen for the Ladies (1723). She became popular, and some of her works ran to several editions.

Barnaby Rudge (1841)

A novel by ➤ Charles Dickens, published as part of ➤ Master Humphrey's Clock. The only other novel that he published in this proposed series was ➤ The Old Curiosity Shop; Dickens then abandoned it.

It is set in the 18th century and its central episodes are descriptions of the fierce anti ➤ Catholic disorders called 'the Gordon Riots', which terrorized London for several days in 1780.

These vivid scenes, and the characters directly concerned in the riots (such as the half-wit Barnaby Rudge, the locksmith Gabriel Varden and his apprentice Simon Tappertit), constitute the part of the book which is most memorable and most representative of Dickens' style. The main story is a romantic one about the love affair of Emma Haredale, whose father has been mysteriously murdered, and Edward Chester, the son of Sir John Chester, a suave villain who helps to instigate the Riots. Sir John and Emma's uncle, Geoffrey Haredale, a Catholic, are enemies, but they unite in opposition to the marriage of Edward and Emma. During the riots, Geoffrey Haredale's house is burnt down but Edward saves the lives of both Emma and her uncle, and thus wins his approval of the match. The murderer of Emma's father turns out to be the father of Barnaby.

Poet and dramatist. Barnes' life seems to have been as adventurous and dark as his dramatic writing; he fought alongside ➤ Essex in 1591 and was called before the Star Chamber when he tried to poison the recorder of Berwick (1598). Barnes came through both events unscathed and is known today chiefly for his lyrical > sonnet sequence Parthenophil and Parthenope (1593). Another collection of sonnets, A Divine Century of Spiritual Sonnets, appeared in 1595, and a prose work, Four Bookes of Offices, in 1606. Barnes' only surviving drama, The Devil's Charter (1607), is an anti-Catholic (> Catholicism) account of poisoning, magic, subterfuge and evil, which is thought to have been performed before ➤ James I. His patron was Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and as such Barnes is one of the contenders for the role of rival poet in ➤ Shakespeare's sonnets. Bib: Sisson, C. J., Thomas Lodge and Other Elizabethans.

Barnes, Djuna (1892-1982)

Novelist, poet and playwright, who was influential, but until recently little read. Barnes was born in America but lived, like many > modernist artists, in the European 'cities of modernism'. Her best-known and most reprinted work Nightwood (1936), a poetic novel championed by > T. S. Eliot (who wrote the introduction to the Faber edition), is a dark, at times surreal and deeply evocative account of decadence and transgression in Bohemian and expatriate circles in inter-war Paris and Berlin. Barnes wrote eloquently about lesbianism, both in this novel and in her other essays (particularly the Virago collection, I could never be lonely without a husband), and in her works of fiction, Ladies' Almanack celebrates lesbian sexuality in the form of a parody of a medieval calendar. Barnes also experimented in her drama, the earliest works being Three from the Earth, An Irish Triangle and Kurtzy from the Sea (1928); her last significant work was The Antiphon (1958), a surreal play in blank verse. Her first collection of poems was The Book of Repulsive Women (1915), and her first novel was Ryder (1929).

Barnes, Julian (b 1946)

Novelist. Born in Leicester and educated in London and Oxford, Barnes has worked as a lexicographer on the O.E.D. Supplement (1969-1972), and in journalism, writing for the New Statesman, The Sunday Times, The Observer, and as the notorious gossip columnist 'Edward Pygge' in the journal of modern literature, the New Review, which ran from 1974 to 1979 under poet and critic Ian Hamilton's editorship. Barnes' work is greatly influenced by French 19th-century novelist ➤ Gustave Flaubert, the ostensible subject of the playful and very successful 1984 novel Flaubert's Parrot, which was shortlisted for the 1985 Booker Prize and won the Geoffrey Faber Memorial Prize. Barnes' work is typically witty and parodic: A History of the World in 10 Chapters (1989), an example of > post-modernist historiographic metafiction, consists of a series of episodes, some comic, but with a satirical and even tragic edge. On the other hand The Porcupine (1992) is a realist political novel about the trial of a deposed Communist leader. Other novels: Metroland (1981); Before She Met Me (1982); Staring at the Sun (1986); Talking It Over (1991). Barnes also writes crime fiction, and under the pseudonym Dan Kavanagh published Duffy (1980); Fiddle City (1983) and Putting the Boot In (1985). In 1986 he won the E. M. Forster Award from the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Letters from London 1990–1995 (1995) is a collection of journalism.

Barnes, William (1801-86)

Poet. A clergyman from the West of England (▷ Wessex), Barnes' most important work is Poems of Rural Life, in the Dorset Dialect (1844), but he also wrote verse in 'Standard English'. A champion of Anglo-Saxon over the Latinate element in the English language, he greatly influenced fellow Dorsetman ▷ Thomas Hardy, who wrote the poem 'The Last Signal' (1886) on his death, and prefaced and edited an edition of his poetry in 1908.

Barnfield, Richard (1574-1627)

Poet. Barnfield wrote almost all his poetry before 1600, when he gave up writing to become a prosperous Shropshire landowner. Barnfield published three volumes of poetry, in 1594, 1595 and 1598. Of these volumes, The Affectionate Shepherd, Containing the Love of Daphnis for the Love of Gannymede, which appeared first, is an exercise in ⊳ pastoral. The second volume, entitled Cynthia, with Certain Sonnets and the Legend of Cassandra, claims to imitate ➤ Edmund Spenser's ➤ The Faerie Queene. The third and final collection contains > satire, pastoral elegy and a 'debate' entitled 'The Combat Between Conscience and Covetessnesse'. In this final collection can be found two poems by Barnfield ('If music and sweet poetrie agree' and 'As it fell upon a day') which were published in the anthology > Passionate Pilgrim (1599) and were not recognized as being the work of Barnfield. Barnum, Phineas Taylor (1810–91) A famous American showman who first made a success through the exhibition of 'George Washington's nurse', alleged to be 161 years old; he later made the American Museum, a collection of curiosities, one of the most popular shows in America. He started a circus in 1871, which, as Barnum and Bailey's in 1881, became the type and pattern of all later circuses in England and America, since he toured in both countries. The name of his famous elephant 'Jumbo' is synonymous with 'elephant' to this day.

Baroque

different meaning) to music, but now increasingly used in literary contexts also. It derives from the Italian word barocco meaning rough and unpolished, and was originally used to denote extravagance or excessiveness in the visual arts. Thence it came to designate the exuberant, florid architecture and painting characteristic of Europe during the period of absolute monarchies in the 17th and 18th centuries. The more restrained, constitutionalist climate of Britain prevented baroque architecture from taking firm hold, and the few examples (eg Castle Howard and Blenheim Palace, both by > Sir John Vanbrugh) date from shortly after the Restoration, when French taste was in the ascendant. English > neo-classicism, when it aimed at large-scale grandeur, tended to be more sober and austere, like > Sir Christopher Wren's St Paul's. In domestic contexts the greater economic and political power of the lesser aristocracy, and the rising merchant class in England, meant that the modest convenience of the Palladian style (> Andrea Palladio) was preferred to full-blown baroque. ➤ Alexander Pope's patron Lord Burlington was the most prominent advocate of the Palladian style and Pope wrote his fourth > Moral Essay, on the discomforts of baroque magnificence, under Burlington's influence.

In music the term denotes the new, more public, expressive and dramatic style, characterized by free recitative, and most typically seen in the new genre of opera, originating in the Italy of Monteverdi in the late 16th century. It is closely associated with the introduction of new, more expressive and louder instruments, ideal for public performance, such as the transverse flute, the violin and the harpsichord, which at this time began to supplant the softer recorder, viol and virginals, suitable to the intimate, often amateur, music-making of the > Renaissance. The term is now applied to all music between this time and the onset of the classicism of Havdn and Mozart in the later 18th century. The baroque style in music came to England late, and its first great English exponent is > Henry Purcell (1659-95), who wrote the first English opera, Dido and Aeneas (1689; libretto by > Nahum Tate).

The epithet 'baroque' has recently come to be used in literary contexts by analogy with its use in the other arts. Thus the extravagant Italianate conceits of the Catholic poet Richard Crashaw who ended his life in Rome, can be called 'baroque'. The florid, public quality of >> John Dryden's >> Annus Mirabilis, may also be termed 'baroque', with its innocent celebration of national pride and adulation of the monarch, the literary equivalent of the mural paintings of the Italian baroque artist Verrio, who worked in England, and whose English pupil, James Thornhill, decorated the Painted Hall at Greenwich early in the 18th century. Like >> Classical and >> Romantic the word has also developed a wider application beyond its strict historical period.

Barrie, Sir J. M. (James Matthew) (1869–1937)

Scottish playwright and novelist and the ninth of ten children. He had a very close relationship with his mother, Margaret Ogilvy, who was the eponymous heroine of his novel published in 1896 and who also appears as 'the little mother' in his autobiographical novel Sentimental Tommy (1896). Barrie attended Edinburgh University before working for the Nottingham Journal for two years, and then moved to London in 1885 to become a freelance writer. In his early writing he idealized childhood and expressed disenchantment with adult life. The sketches of Scottish life he published in various papers were collected into his first successful book Auld Licht Idylls (1888). His novel in the same vein, The Little Minister (1891), was a best-seller and was adapted for the stage in 1897. From this point on Barrie devoted himself to the theatre, producing two of his best plays Quality Street and The Admirable Crichton in London in 1902. His marriage to the actress Mary Ansell in 1894 was apparently unconsummated and in 1897 he became attached to Sylvia Llewellyn Davies, telling his first Peter Pan stories to her sons and publishing some of them in The Little White Bird (1902). The play Peter Pan, about a boy who refused to grow up, followed in 1904 and the story was published in Peter Pan and Wendy (1911). Other plays include What Every Woman Knows (1908), Dear Brutus (1917) and Mary Rose (1920), and some excellent one-act pieces. He was knighted in 1913.

Barry, Elizabeth (1658-1713)

The first well-known English actress, said to have been trained by the > Earl of Rochester, who boasted he could make an actress of her in six months; she became his mistress and later had a daughter by him.

She began by acting at the Dorset Garden Theatre, probably in 1675, but her career blossomed in 1679–80, with a series of tragic roles which earned her 'the Name of Famous Mrs Barry, both at Court and City'.

Throughout her career she was adored for her acting talents − being admired equally in comic and tragic roles − and sharply satirized for her alleged promiscuity: a contemporary commentary describes her as 'the finest Woman in the World upon the Stage, and the Ugliest Woman off't'. She played Lady Brute in the first production of ▷ The Provok'd Wife (1697), Mrs Marwood in the original ▷ The Way of the World (1700), and dozens of important roles in plays by contemporary and earlier authors, including many of ▷ Shakespeare's. Succeeding generations of actresses viewed her as an ideal to which they aspired.

Barry Lyndon (1852)

A novel by ▷ William Thackeray serialized in ▷ Fraser's Magazine in 1844 under the title The Luck of Barry Lyndon. Written in the style of Fielding, it is set in the 18th century and concerns a boastful Irish adventurer who unwittingly reveals the extent of his own villany. Interesting as an example of rogue literature, and for its sustained use of an unreliable narrator.

➤ Historical novel; Newgate novel.

Barry, Spranger (?1717-77)

Actor, manager. He was over six feet tall and noted for his striking good looks which, added to his natural acting ability, made him one of the leading actors in his generation and a great rival of ➤ David Garrick.

Born in Dublin, he made his early reputation in the Irish theatre, acting with Garrick. Barry came to London in 1746, where he performed indifferently, first as Othello and then as Macbeth. However his next role, as Castalio in > Thomas Otway's The Orphan, was highly acclaimed, and it became one of his most popular successes.

In 1747 ➤ Drury Lane, where he was acting, came under Garrick's management, and in the following season he and Garrick alternated as Hamlet and Macbeth, drawing large crowds. However, the growing rivalry between them caused Barry to leave for ➤ Covent Garden in 1750, after which a famous 'Romeo and Juliet War' ensued, with the two actors playing Romeo simultaneously at separate performances in the respective houses.

In 1756 Barry began ambitious plans for a theatre of his own in Crow Street, Dublin, which opened in 1758, but the theatre failed and was eventually taken over by a rival.

Barry returned to London and carried on an intermittent association with Garrick until 1774, when he left for Covent Garden, remaining there until his death.

Barsetshire

An imaginary English county invented by > Anthony Trollope for a series of novels, some of which centre on an imaginary town in it, the cathedral city of Barchester. It is a characteristic southern English setting. The novels are the best known of his works.

Titles: > The Warden, Barchester Towers, Doctor

Barstow, Stan (b 1928)

Novelist and short-story writer. His bestknown work is his first novel, A Kind of Loving (1960), a first-person, present-tense narrative of a young man forced to marry his pregnant girlfriend. Barstow came to prominence as one of a group of novelists from northern, workingclass backgrounds, including ▶ John Braine, > Alan Sillitoe and Keith Waterhouse. He has retained his commitment to the realist novel (> realism) with a regional setting and his suspicion of metropolitan and international culture. The Watcher on the Shore (1966) and The True Right End (1976) form a trilogy with A Kind of Loving. Other novels are: Ask Me Tomorrow (1962); Joby (1964); A Raging Calm (1968); A Brother's Tale (1980); Just You Wait and See (1986); B Movie (1987). Story collections include: The Desperadoes (1961); A Season with Eros (1971); A Casual Acquaintance (1976); The Glad Eye (1984).

Barthes, Roland (1915-80)

Probably the best known and most influential of all the Structuralist and Post-structuralist critics. In books such as Writing Degree Zero (1953), Mythologies (1957), and S/Z (1970), Barthes undertook to expose how language functioned, and its relationship with ▶ ideology. Moreover, he was also concerned to uncover the distinctions between literary texts which operated on the basis of a stable relationship between signifier and signified, and those for whom the act of signification (establishing meaning) itself was of primary importance. The terms he uses to distinguish between the two types of text are 'readerly' (lisible) and 'writerly' (scriptible). In later works, such as The Pleasure of the Text (1975), he went on to investigate the sources of pleasure which the text affords to the reader, and distinguished between 'the text of pleasure' which does not challenge the cultural assumptions of the reader and which is therefore comforting, and 'the text of bliss' where the reader experiences a 'jouissance' from the unsettling effect elicited from the text's representation of the crisis of language. In addition to offering penetrating analyses of literary texts, Barthes concerned himself with the structural analysis of all cultural representation, including topics such as advertising, film, photography, music and wrestling.

Bartholomew Fair (1614)

A vigorous prose comedy of London life by Ben Jonson. The scene is that of a famous fair held annually in Smithfield, London, from the 12th century till 1855. The cast includes traders, showmen, dupes, criminals, a gambler and a hypocritical Puritan – the best-known character, called Zeal-of-the-land Busy. It has very lively surface entertainment, and some of Jonson's characteristic force of satire; the vicious pursue their vices with eloquence but such extravagance they they overreach themselves, and not only produce their own doom but bring ridicule on their own heads by self-caricature.

> Humours, Comedy of; Bakhtin, Mikhail.

Bartlett, Neil (b 1959)

Dramatist, director, actor. A determinedly anti-establishment figure, despite his first in English from Magdalen College, Oxford and a directors' traineeship at the Bristol Old Vic, much of his work has been in collaboration with friends, designer Robin Whitemore and Nicolas Bloomfield, Leah Hausman, and Simon Mellor with whom he set up his own company, Gloria, in 1988 – fulfilling a promise Bartlett had made to himself in drama school to retain autonomy over his own creativity. He has, nonetheless, also won plaudits for dazzling translations of Racine and Molière. As a director, he was responsible for the Théâtre de Complicité's More Bigger Snacks Now, and Annie Griffin's equally mould-breaking solo shows, Blackbeard the Pirate and Almost Persuaded. Antibody (1983) was one of the first plays to deal with AIDS in Britain, but Dressing Up (1983) began his highly flamboyant explorations into drag, followed, after Pornography (1985), with A Vision of Love Revealed in Sleep (1986) and Sarrasine (1990). Both spectacles featured performer Bette Bourne in ways which fused high art with low camp, and made points about the importance of the living presence of the performer, the nature of artifice and reality and the politics of gay persecution.

Bartlett's visual theatre uses text, image and music in contrapuntal abundance – satirising itself even at its most outrageous, and delighting in the contradiction. His homage to Oscar Wilde, Who Was That Man? and his contemporary account of gay life, Ready to Catch Him Should He Fall, have both been warmly received.

Base and superstructure

A key term in the cultural theory of > Marx and Engels who conceptualized the function of culture in terms of this metaphor. They pictured society as being like a building in which the superstructure – culture – is dependent upon the base or foundations which support it, namely the economy. In Marxist theory, just as the economy is controlled by ruling interests, so culture – conceived in the widest terms to include, for example, art, religion, political institutions and sport – is similarly controlled. The function of culture in this theory is to ensure the co-operation of the majority and their consent to the status quo. Culture therefore is a vehicle for ideology.

There are a number of difficulties with this idea. One common objection is that it is reductionist; in other words, it reduces complex cultural activity to over-simple causes and functions. Another is that it overlooks cultural diversity, including the fact that cultural activity can often oppose the status quo. A third objection is that the model implies that cultural activity is, in a heavy sense, imposed on people rather than emerging from their genuine interests and pleasures. Nonetheless, the base/superstructure model does point to important economic and political realities in cultural activity which are sometimes forgotten. Basset, Mary (c 1522-72)

A translator of religious material, Basset came from the learned More family. Her mother was > Margaret Roper, herself an accomplished translator, and her grandfather was > Sir Thomas More, whose History of the Passion she translated into English (1566). She also translated the first five books of Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History from Greek into English and presented it to Mary Tudor (> Mary I), in return for which she obtained a position at court.

Bastard

A bastard is born out of wedlock, ie has no legal parents; in law, he is filius nullius = the son of no one. When land, and with it, status, were derived from the legal father, the bastard could inherit nothing by his own right. In early medieval times an exception was sometimes made for bastards in ruling families; thus William I of England (1266-87) took the appellation William the Bastard. But in general a bastard was by law something of a social outcast. Hence Edmund in ➤ Shakespeare's ➤ King Lear (1.ii) 'Why brand they us/With base? with baseness? bastardy? base, base?' However, a bastard could in exceptional circumstances acquire a position in society, acquiring land, marrying legally and bequeathing his property - all depended on his natural worth, abilities and energies. This is more apparent in the bastard Philip of Shakespeare's > King John than in Edmund.

Battle of Maldon

An Old English commemorative poem, written in imitation of the heroic epics of past

Germanic tradition, recounting an incident in the Scandinavian raids against England in 993 at Maldon, Essex. The late-10th-century poem recounts Ealdorman Byrhtnoth's heroic, and disastrous, attempts to oppose the Viking raiders. The text survives in an 18th-century transcript, made before the manuscript version was destroyed in a fire.

Battle of the Books, The (1697, published 1704) (A Full and True Account of the Battel Fought last Friday', Between the Ancient and the Modern Books in St James' Library). A prose satire by ▶ Jonathan Swift, written while he was staying with ▶ Sir William Temple. Temple's essay on 'Ancient and Modern Learning', with its praise of the Epistles of Phalaris, had been attacked by the critics Wotton and ▶ Richard Bentley, the latter proving that the Epistles were false. Swift's Battle of the Books satirizes the whole dispute, parodying the scholars' concern with minutiae. The ancients (ie the classical writers) are given the stronger claims, but overall the satire leaves the issue undecided.

Baudelaire, Charles (1821-67)

French poet. His best known work, Les Fleurs du mal (1857), points the way out of ⊳ Romanticism towards modernism. Formally, it draws on the tradition of > sonnet and song which Baudelaire inherited from the Renaissance. Conceptually, it springs from the perception of 'two simultaneous feelings: the horror of life and the ecstasy of life', periods of heightened sensitivity and sensibility alternating with the monotony of existence without meaning. Baudelaire's work is rich in suggestion, allowing sensation to transfuse the object as though the object were the source of the sensation rather than the occasion for it; and equally powerful value is bestowed upon the metaphorical expression of sense-experience. When the poet uncovers, invested with desire, an exotic and erotic universe in a woman's hair ('La Chevelure'), this moment is also an uncovering of the possible resonances which the hair triggers in the poet. The contrasting condition of 'Ennui' is a state of torpor which saps intellectual and emotional vigour and induces creative sterility. Everyday objects are here commonly used to embody feelings of failure, dejection, horror and despair. The book's five sections explore these twin conditions, in art and love (Spleen et Idéal), in city life (Tableaux Parisiens), in stimulants (Le Vin), in perversity (Fleurs du mal) and in metaphysical rebellion (La Révolte), ending (in the poem 'Le Voyage') with man's vearning unsatisfied but finding in death a new journey of discovery.

Baudelaire also wrote fine music and art criticism (he championed Wagner and Delacroix); his translations of Edgar Allan Poe (1809-49) helped confirm, in France, interest in tales of the fantastic; and he was the first to investigate extensively the new genre of prose poetry. In England, his influence has been constant, though at the outset it raised moral controversy. Reviewing Les Fleurs du mal in the > Spectator of 1862, > Swinburne responded to the sensualism of Baudelaire, and this version of Baudelaire was handed on to the late 19th-century 'decadent' poets, including > Ernest Dowson and, later, > Arthur Symons, who alternately regarded Baudelaire as deliciously decadent and frankly satanic. T.S. Eliot (1888–1965) 'rescued' Baudelaire and identified the French poet's sense of sin with 'Sin in the permanent Christian sense', even though Baudelaire himself in a letter to Swinburne warned against easy moral readings of his work.

> French influence on Victorian literature.

Bawden, Nina (b 1925)

Novelist, reviewer and writer for children. Nina Bawden is best known for her award-winning novels for children, particularly Carrie's War (1973) and The Peppermint Pig (1975). For Bawden, childhood and adolescence are times of frustration, difficulty and excitement, and her writing is both > realist (ie not fantasy writing for children) and realistic – stories of children's perceptions of adult situations. Bawden also writes novels for adults, notably A Woman of My Age (1967), Familiar Passions (1979) and The Ice-House (1983).

Baxter, Richard (1615-91)

Theologian, religious writer and autobiographer. Baxter was one of the dominating figures in the period of the English > Civil War. A chaplain to ➤ Oliver Cromwell's army, Baxter served after the Restoration as chaplain to > Charles II, but he soon fell out with the king on religio-political grounds. Though an initial supporter of the Parliamentarian cause in the Civil War, Baxter's experiences in the New Model Army, in particular his exposure to the thinking of the ➤ Levellers, Seekers, ➤ Quakers and Behmenists, led him to adopt rather more conservative postures. In the 1650s his position changed once more and he emerged as a strong supporter of the Protectorate, dedicating his Key for Catholics (1650) to Richard Cromwell. Baxter's stance on religious issues has been defined as one of the earliest examples of ecumenicism or, as he put it in his A Third Defence of the Cause of Peace (1681): 'You could not have truelier called me than an Episcopal - Presbyterian - Independent.' A prolific writer, Baxter composed over 100 works on religious topics, including The Saints Everlasting Rest (1650) and Call to the Unconverted (1657). His major work, however, has come to be recognized as his spiritual autobiography, Reliquiae Baxterianae (1696). This 800-page folio volume is one of the most important of 17th-century > autobiographies.

Bayes

The name of a character in The Rehearsal, a play by the Duke of Buckingham (▷ Villiers, George) and others, printed in 1672. Bays, or laurels, compose the wreaths with which poets are crowned, and the character was meant as a satire on ▷ Sir William D'Avenant, and also on ▷ John Dryden, who was later created official ▷ Poet Laureate. ▷ Alexander Pope used the same name, in the form Bays, for the Poet Laureate, ▷ Colley Cibber, in The New Dunciad (1742), and in the 1743 version of ▷ The Dunciad, which has Cibber as hero.

Bear-baiting, Bull-baiting

In the ➤ Middle Ages and the 16th century a popular pastime, in which a bull or a bear was tied to a stake and then attacked by bulldogs or mastiffs. Bull-baiting continued longer and these 'sports' were only made illegal in 1835. In Elizabethan times, bear-baiting was an alternative amusement to drama; 'bear gardens' (notably the Paris Garden) were situated in the same region as the theatres - Southwark, on the south bank of the Thames. The theatres themselves were used for the purpose. It is possible that the bear which appears in > Shakespeare's > The Winter's Tale could have come from one of the Southwark bear gardens. Earlier in the century, ▷ Erasmus speaks of herds of bears being kept in the country to supply the bear gardens. The Puritans disliked the meetings as scenes likely to lead to disorder, and condemned bear-baiting alongside theatrical performances.

Beardsley, Aubrey (Vincent) (1872–98)
The leading illustrator of the 1890s and, after ➤ Oscar Wilde, the dominant figure in the ➤ Aesthetic movement of the period. He became famous for his stunning black and white illustrations to works by Wilde and ➤ Ernest Dowson (➤ Nineties' Poets). His styles were widely imitated and he was responsible for a new simplicity and directness in the art of illustrating. The flowing lines and sumptuous compositions of his drawings expressed what was considered most bold and daring in the Aesthetic movement. He was largely self-taught except for a brief spell attending evening classes at the Westminster School of Art which the artist Sir Edward Burne Jones encouraged him to attend in 1891. Two years later he was commissioned to illustrate a new edition of Sir Thomas Malory's medieval romance, ▷ Morte D'Arthur, (1469/70), and in 1894 he became art editor of the ▷ Yellow Book, designing the first four covers himself. These together with his illustrations for Wilde's ▷ Salome gained him widespread notoriety.

His art was influenced by the elegant, curvilinear style of the Art Nouveau movement and the bold designs of Japanese woodcuts. Added to this was the sensuality of his drawings of women coupled with an erotic morbidity which shocked his critics. His illustrations to Aristophanes' Lysistrata (1896) were even more graphic. Despite his distance from Wilde, Beardsley was dismissed from The Yellow Book when the scandal surrounding Wilde's homosexuality broke in 1895. He joined the staff of The Savoy magazine as its principal illustrator and during the last two years of his life he illustrated Alexander Pope's Rape of the Lock (1896) and Johnson's Volpone (1898), wrote a number of poems and part of a romantic novel, Under the Hill. It was privately printed in an unexpurgated version under the title The Story of Venus and Tannhauser in 1907. In 1896 the tuberculosis that had dogged his childhood flared up again and he became an invalid. A year later he converted to ➤ Catholicism and moved to France, where he died at the age of twenty-five.

Beatrice and Benedick

Two characters in ▷ Shakespeare's comedy ▷ Much Ado About Nothing. They hate each other and engage in witty exchanges of repartee. The hatred is only apparent, however, and they are brought together in love by a trick. Their witty interchanges may owe more to the convention of courtly discourse (▷ Euphues) than to a naturalistic portrayal of character.

Beatrice-Joanna

The deeply divided female protagonist of Middleton's and

Rowley's tragedy

The Changeling, whose refusal to marry her father's choice of a husband leads to murder and ultimately delivers her into the arms of the repellent De Flores. The combination of sexual desire and madness in Beatrice's character allows for interesting interpretations from feminist and

Beattie, James (1735-1803)

Schoolteacher and later Professor of Philosophy at Aberdeen University. His pseudo-medieval poem in Spenserian stanzas, The Minstrel: or the Progress of Genius (1771–4), popularized the mystique of the poet as solitary figure, growing to maturity amid sublime scenery. He also wrote a prose Essay on Truth, attacking the scepticism of the philosopher ▷ David Hume from a position of orthodox piety.

Beau (Brummel, Nash)

'Beau' is a French word which came into use in the 18th century for an elegant young man, especially as suitor to a lady. The word also prefixed the names of certain famous men of fashion and elegance, notably Beau Nash (1674–1762), the famous Master of Ceremonies at Bath, and Beau Brummel (1778–1840), friend of George IV in his ➤ Regency days (1810–20) and leader of London fashion.

Beau Tibbs

Character in ➤ Oliver Goldsmith's ➤ A Citizen of the World. He boasts of familiarity with the rich and famous, but in reality is poor and obscure.

Beauclerc, Amelia (c 1810-20)

Novelist. Little is known of Amelia Beauclerc's life and her novels have occasionally been wrongly ascribed to another author. Of her eight novels, Alinda, or The Child of Mystery (1812) is notable for its carefully balanced scenes of transvestism and homoerotic encounters between women. Although her female characters often triumph over difficulties encountered in their dealings with men it would however be wrong to endow too radical or feminist a note to Beauclerc's writing, since much of her work is conventional and uninspired, as for example her ▷ Gothic novel, Husband Hunters (1816).

Beaumont, Francis (1584-1616)

Dramatic poet and collaborator with ▶ John Fletcher. They wrote comedies (eg The Coxcomb); tragedies (eg The Maid's Tragedy); romantic dramas (eg A King and No King and ➤ Philaster). Fletcher also collaborated with other writers ➤ Shakespeare, ➤ Massinger – and wrote plays on his own, but the general superiority of those he wrote with Beaumont has suggested to modern critics that Beaumont may have been the more talented partner. Their plays were immensely popular in the 17th century, and having undergone a decline are now being reintroduced into the theatrical canon. The tragicomedies (Philaster and The Maid's Tragedy) have been critically reassessed, revealing that the move towards self-destruction and anticlimax at the end of the plays represents a reluctance to contemplate a world in which all humanity has been lost.

Beauty and the Beast

A fairy story, best known in the French version of Madame de Villeneuve (1744). The theme is that of a young girl who learns to love a monster who holds her in his power; her freely given love transforms him into a young prince. Before she can go through this experience, however, she has to surrender her safe, tender relationship with the father who dotes on her.

Beauvoir, Simone de

➤ De Beauvoir, Simone

Beaux' Stratagem, The (1707)

Play by > George Farquhar, one of his most successful and popular. Aimwell and Archer, two impoverished gentlemen, come to Lichfield in the guise of master and servant. They go in search of a rich wife for Aimwell, intending to split the proceeds. Aimwell courts Dorinda, daughter of Charles and Lady Bountiful. Archer carries on a flirtation with the landlord's daughter, Cherry, while at the same time, in a separate intrigue, he pursues the unhappily married Mrs Sullen, Aimwell wins Dorinda, but in a fit of honesty, admits his deception. He gives all the money he has gained from the match to Archer, who however remains single. Late in the action, Aimwell finds he has inherited a title and estate, and all ends well for him and his bride to be. The play is vigorous and at times wildly funny, with a partly unconventional ending. Its atmosphere derives largely from Restoration comedy, but several plot factors link it with the more 'moral' plays of the later 18th century. The play contains a number of incisive comments about women's position in society, particularly in the lines and character of Mrs Sullen.

Becket, St Thomas (?1118-70)

A priest who served > Henry II in various offices, culminating in the highest - that of Lord Chancellor. The period was one of constant disputes between Church and Crown over spheres of power, specially in the courts of justice. When Becket reluctantly became Archbishop in 1162, he became a champion of the very rights of the Church that Henry was trying to curtail. He was exiled on the continent for seven years but, after a brief reconciliation with Henry on his return, he was killed in Canterbury Cathedral on 29 December 1170, on the orders of the King. Henry later claimed that his instructions had been misinterpreted, but he did penance for the assassination. Becket was canonized in 1173 and his shrine at Canterbury became one of the great centres of European pilgrimage, and was the destination of the pilgrims in ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Canterbury Tales. A large number of medieval versions of the life of St Thomas survive and his martyrdom is the subject of > T. S. Eliot's play Murder in the Cathedral (1935).

Beckett, Samuel (1906-89)

Dramatist and novelist. Born in Dublin, he was educated at Trinity College. He became a lecturer in English at the École Normale Supérieure in Paris (1928–30) and was then a lecturer in French at Trinity College. From 1932 he lived chiefly in France, and wrote in both French and English. In Paris he became the friend and associate of the expatriate Irish novelist ▷ James Joyce (1882–1941), whose ▷ 'stream of consciousness' subjective method of narrative strongly influenced Beckett's own novels; another important influence upon him was the French novelist ▷ Marcel Proust (1871–1922).

Beckett is one of the most singular and original writers to appear in English, or possibly in French, since 1945. Like Joyce an Irish expatriate, he belongs to both Ireland and to Europe; his characters are commonly Irish, and his background the desolation of European culture. In both narrative and drama (it is in the second that his achievement is perhaps the more remarkable) his method was to create art out of increasingly simplified material, reducing his images of humanity to the sparest elements. His particular view of life's absurdity is often expressed through striking theatrical images which reveal a vision of life which is both bleak and grotesquely comic. Thus, in Happy Days Winnie appears on stage buried up to her waist in a mound of earth; in Not I the audience sees only a mouth on stage struggling to deliver a monologue of reminiscences; and in Endgame two elderly characters, Nagg and Nell, are placed in dustbins throughout the play. In so far as he is related to an English literary tradition, it is to the generation between the wars of 1914-18 and 1939-45 when, most notably in the work of James Joyce, communication with an audience was often secondary to experiments in the medium of language. His novels have accordingly had little influence on English fiction. His plays, on the other hand, especially Waiting for Godot and the plays for radio, have shown new possibilities in the handling of dialogue, by which speech is used less for communication than for the expression of minds that feel themselves in isolation, or on the point of sinking into it. Such use of dialogue perhaps had its beginnings in the late 19thcentury dramatists, the Russian ➤ Chekhov and the Belgian Maeterlinck, and has superficial parallels with the work of the contemporary English dramatist, > Harold Pinter.

Poems include: Whoroscope (1930); Echo's Bones (1935).

Beddoes, Thomas Lovell (1803-49) Poet and dramatist. Nephew of the novelist ➤ Maria Edgeworth, and son of a physician, Thomas Beddoes. He spent most of his adult life in Germany and Switzerland, repeatedly in trouble for his revolutionary ideas. His first published work was a collection of tales in verse, The Improvisatore (1821). He shared the Romantic interest in the > Jacobean dramatists, and sought to revive drama in their spirit with The Bride's Tragedy (1822). He continued to revise his second play, Death's Fest-Book until his death, and it was published posthumously in 1850, as were his Collected Poems (1851). Despite occasional intensities his plays are unexciting dramatically, and his reputation rests chiefly on his lyric verse in the tradition of ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley, such as Dream Pedlary. Beddoes died by suicide. Bib: Thompson, I. R., Thomas Lovell Beddoes.

In ▷ Geoffrey of Monmouth's version of Arthurian history, he is one of ▷ Arthur's principal knights, his cupbearer and governor of Normandy. He has a less prominent role in later French and English Arthurian texts but often he is portrayed as the last knight to remain with the wounded Arthur and who has the task of returning ▷ Excalibur to the Lake (as in ▷ Malory's Works).

Bedlam

A famous lunatic asylum. Originally it was a priory, founded in 1247, for members of the religious order of the Star of Bethlehem. Lunatics were admitted to it in the 14th century, and in 1547, after the dissolution of the monasteries, it was handed over to the City of London as a hospital for lunatics. The name became shortened to Bedlam, and a Bedlamite, Tom o'Bedlam, Bess o'Bedlam, became synonyms for lunatics; Bedlam itself, a synonym for lunatic asylum. In modern English, 'bedlam' is a scene of uproar and confusion.

Beer, Patricia (b 1924)

Poet. Beer was educated at Exeter and Oxford universities, has been a university teacher, and now writes full-time – she is also a novelist and critic. She grew up in Devon and her work draws strongly on West Country images. Her volumes of poetry include: The Loss of Magyar (1959); The Survivors (1963); The Estuary (1971); Driving West (1975); Selected Poems (1979); The Lie of the Land (1983).

Beerbohm, Max (1872-1956)

Essayist, cartoonist, writer of fiction. When he began his career Beerbohm belonged to the so-called 'decadent' generation of the aesthetic school in the 1890s (▷ Nineties' Poets); this included, W.B. Yeats (1865–1939) in his Celtic Twilight phase, > Oscar Wilde, > Aubrev Beardsley, and the poets Lionel Johnson (1867–1902) and ▶ Ernest Dowson. He showed his affiliation to this school by the playful fastidiousness of his wit, especially in his cartoons and parodies. A Christmas Garland (1912) contains parodies of contemporary writers including > H.G. Wells, Arnold Bennett (1867-1931), and Joseph Conrad (1857-1924). But it is in his cartoons that his satirical wit is displayed with most pungency and originality, eg Caricature of Twenty-five Gentlemen (1896), The Poet's Corner (1904), Rossetti and his Circle (1922). As a writer he was above all an essayist; he entitled his first slim volume with humorous impertinence The Works of Max Beerhohm (1896), to which he added More (1899), Yet Again (1909), And Even Now (1920). He also wrote stories (Seven Men; 1919), and he is probably now most read for his burlesque romance Zuleika Dobson (1911), about the visit of a dazzling beauty to the University of Oxford where she is responsible for a mass suicide among the students.

Beerbohm was educated at Charterhouse and Merton College, Oxford. He contributed to the ▷ Yellow Book, and in 1898 succeeded ▷ George Bernard Shaw as dramatic critic on the ▷ Saturday Review. From 1910 he lived in Italy, except during the two world wars. He was knighted in 1939. His personal and literary fastidiousness caused him to be known as 'the Incomparable Max', and as such poet Ezra Pound (1885–1972) commemorates him as 'Brennbaum the Impeccable' in section 8 of Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920).

Beeton, Mrs (1836-65)

The author of a book on cooking and household management, published serially in The Englishmoman's Domestic Magazine (1859–61). The book met the needs of the rapidly broadening Victorian middle class, which was strongly attached to the domestic virtues and satisfactions. It was soon regarded as an indispensable handbook.

Beggar's Opera, The (1728)

By the poet ➤ John Gay, a play with numerous songs to the music of folk tunes. It is the earliest and by far the most famous of the 'ballad operas', which were light entertainments as opposed to the serious Italian operas fashionable in England, and which dealt with life in low society. In part it was a political attack on the Prime Minister, Robert Walpole. The daughter of a receiver of stolen goods falls in love with Macheath, a highwayman who is imprisoned in Newgate, where the warder's daughter also falls for him and procures his escape. As a class of literature, The Beggar's Opera belongs to the mock heroic; another example from the time is ➤ Fielding's novel > Jonathan Wild the Great (1743), which is about a master criminal. The effect of such works was to make their appeal through the lawless zest for life of the characters, coupled with an ironic exposure of their baseness. The Beggar's Opera is a classic of the English stage, and its music has been reset by later composers such as Arthur Bliss and Benjamin Britten. It was adapted by the German dramatist Bertolt Brecht in Die Dreigroschenoper (The Threepenny Opera). The Beggar's Opera had an overture by the German musician Pepusch, also arranged from folk tunes.

Beggars, Sturdy

An expression used in the 16th century for the able-bodied poor who were unemployed and lived by begging. Unemployment was a serious social problem throughout the 16th century for a succession of causes. ➤ Henry VII (1485-1509) disbanded the private armies of the nobles; ➤ Henry VIII (1509-47) dissolved the monasteries, and threw into unemployment the numerous servants and craftsmen who had served them; the nobles enclosed extensive tracts of arable land for sheep-farming, which required less labour, or simply to surround their great houses with ornamental parks; prices rose, and periods of inflation sometimes made it impossible for poor men to support themselves without begging. The beggars were regarded as a serious social threat, since they often moved about in bands and took to robbery with violence. In the reign of ➤ Elizabeth I (1558-1603), the government made serious and fairly successful attempts to deal with the problem: they instituted a succession of > Poor Laws, culminating in the Great Poor Law of 1601, in accordance with which the aged, sick and crippled were given financial relief by the parishes, but the 'sturdy beggars' were forcibly set to work. Not all the 'sturdy beggars' were from the poorer classes; in an age of enthusiastic financial speculation, richer men were sometimes suddenly ruined, and forced to take to the roads. Behan, Brendan (1923-64)

Irish dramatist. His first play, The Quare Fellow, was staged in Dublin in 1954, but made its impact after it was adapted by ▷ Joan Littlewood's company, Theatre Workshop, in 1956. Behan spent time in borstal, and in prison as a political prisoner, and this influenced his play about a British soldier captured by the I.R.A., The Hostage (1958). His last play, Richard's Cork Leg, was unfinished. Many of his dramatic techniques drawing on popular traditions of entertainment, such as the use of song and dance and direct addresses to the audience, are typical of the style developed by Joan Littlewood's Theatre Workshop company.

Behn, Aphra (1640-1689)

Bib: O'Connor, U., Behan.

English poet, dramatist and writer of fiction, also known as 'Astrea'. Little is known of her early life; the earliest record we have is the anonymous 'The Life and Memoirs of Mrs Behn Written by One of the Fair Sex' which prefaced the first collection of her writings. She may have lived in Surinam, as she presented a feather costume for the play > The Indian Queen. She also worked as a royal spy in Holland (at the instigation of ⊳ Sir Thomas Killigrew), but was not paid, despite repeated pleas for money on her return in 1667. She may have been imprisoned for debt. She began to write for money, and has been singled out by critics since Virginia Woolf (see A Room of One's Own) as the first Englishwoman to earn her living by writing, though the precise meaning of this description is open to dispute. She wrote eighteen plays, of which The Forc'd Marriage was the first, produced at the Duke's Theatre in 1670. In the preface to The Dutch Lover (1673), she complains that 'the day 'twas acted first, there comes to me in the pit a long, lithe, phlegmatic, white, ill-favored, wretched fop . . . this thing, I tell you, opening that which serves it for a mouth, out issued such a noise as this to those that sat about it, that they were to expect a woeful play, God damn him, for it was a woman's.' Her best-known plays are currently > The Lucky Chance (1686) and > The Rover (1679). The Lucky Chance details the plight of young women married to rich, foolish old city men. In The Widow Ranter she dramatizes colonial America. In prose fiction she wrote ➤ Love Letters Between a Nobleman and His Sister (1684-7) and > Oroonoko, or the Royal Slave (c 1688), set in colonial Surinam. Her poems (famously) include 'The Disappointment', and she also wrote about desire in 'To the Fair Clarinda, Who Made Love to Me, imagin'd more than Woman': 'Fair lovely Maid, or if that Title be/Too weak, too Feminine for Nobler thee,/Permit a Name that more Approaches Truth: And let me call thee, Lovely Charming Youth./This last will justify my soft complaint; / . . . And without Blushes I the Youth persue,/When so much beauteous Woman is in view.'

As a woman writer Behn was attacked for her lewd language and daring themes, and her own unconventional lifestyle has tended to obscure criticism of her work by moral condemnation.

Her works are collected in: The Histories and Novels of the Late Ingenious Mrs Behn (1696). Bellamy, George Anne (?1731-88) Born at Fingal in Ireland on St George's Day, hence her Christian name, to the actress Mrs Bellamy and her lover, James O'Hara, second Baron of Tyrawley. She made her stage debut at Covent Garden, where her mother was engaged, in 1741, and in 1743 she played for the first time with ➤ David Garrick. In 1745 Bellamy and her mother performed at ➤ Smock Alley in Dublin, alongside Garrick and ⊳ Spranger Barry. She soon quarrelled with Garrick, and in 1748 was hired at ➤ Covent Garden, where she became one of the leading actresses. In 1740 she eloped with George Montgomery Metham to Yorkshire, giving birth to a son, George, later that year. Metham, however, reneged on a promise of marriage, and she returned to Covent Garden in 1750. Garrick determined to patch up his dispute with her and, in a famous episode, persuaded her to appear again at ▷ Drury Lane, playing Juliet to his Romeo, in competition with the Romeo and Juliet of Barry and > Susanna Cibber. The rival performances lasted 12 nights, until Covent Garden ended its run and Drurv Lane triumphed with a 13th. In 1767, now in failing health, Bellamy left the stage and moved in with the actor Henry Woodward. He died in 1777, and she afterwards lived largely off loans and gifts, pursued by creditors. During her years on the stage she played some 96 roles, excelling in those demanding pathos and grief, including Cordelia, Juliet, Calista in The Fair Penitent, Imoinda in Oroonoko, and Indiana in > The Conscious Lovers. Her autobiography, An Apology for the Life of George Anne Bellamy was published in 1785. Bib: Hartmann, C., Enchanting Bellamy.

Belles-lettres

A term used in the late 19th and early 20th centuries for 'fine writing', belles-lettres, or belletrist (the author of belles-lettres), or belletristic (the adjective), are all now used negatively or at best descriptively. The terms imply a privileged dilettantism and lack of intellectual rigour or seriousness of an old-fashioned kind.

Belloc, Hilaire (1870-1953)

A versatile writer (novelist, poet, essayist, biographer, historian) now especially remembered for his association with G.K. Chesterton (1874-1936) in Roman ➤ Catholic propaganda. The most important phase of his career was before 1914, when he was one of a generation of popular, vivid, witty propagandists; ➤ George Bernard Shaw, ➤ H.G. Wells, and Chesterton were his equals, and the first two (as > agnostic socialists) his opponents. With Chesterton, he maintained the doctrine of Distributism - an alternative scheme to socialism for equalizing property ownership. Among his best works is his earliest: The Path to Rome (1902), a discursive account of a journey through France, Switzerland and Northern Italy. He is now chiefly read for his light verse, eg Cautionary Tales (1907), A Bad Child's Book of Beasts (1896).

Etymologically, her name signifies both beauty and, through the association with Phoebe, the moon, chastity and hunting.

Bennett, Alan (b 1934)

Dramatist and actor. Bennett first attracted attention as a writer and performer in revue on the > Edinburgh Festival Fringe, especially with On the Fringe with Jonathan Miller, Dudley Moore and Peter Cook which had its long runs in London and New York. Forty Years On (1968) seemed to please everyone, a 'good night out' and a clever satire with songs which analyses Britain in the twentieth century via a revue put on by a boarding school (much of it began life as pastiches of literary and other styles). The Old Country (1977), a cerebral discussion of national identity through the image of a British defector living in the USSR, made more demands on audiences.

Enjoy (1980) manages to be illuminating about class values, town planners, the generation gap, sexual politics, and fashionable sociology in a play that continually surprises. Kafka's Dick (1986) in which Kafka, his parents and his publisher materialise in the suburban home of a would-be biographer, found appreciative audiences among > Royal Court literati but failed to transfer to the West End. The Madness of George III (1991) was successfully filmed in 1994.

Bennett is a very funny writer, adept at using the techniques of farce and music hall, especially in Habeas Corpus (1973), but, while he will find humour in the predicament of cancer patients, geriatrics, Jewish mothers, social workers' cases or homosexual spies, his characters are not butts for laughter. He has an uncannily accurate ear for the richness of real speech. His screenplays include the ▷ Orton biography Prick Up Your Ears (1986).

Bennett, Anna Maria (c.1750-1808) Novelist. Anna Bennett (she is sometimes mistakenly known as Agnes Bennett) was a Welsh writer about whose early life little is certain - mainly because she herself offered so many variations. However, in 1785 two verifiable events occurred: first the death of her lover and father to two of her children, Admiral Sir Thomas Pye, and secondly the publication of her first novel, Anna, or memoirs of a Welch Heiress, whose success made her economically independent. The novel's bawdy satire set the tone for her other five works, making her a ➤ Minerva best-selling author. Her most interesting work is The Beggar Girl and Her Benefactors (1797), which > S.T. Coleridge described a 'the best novel since Fielding'. She was influenced more by the ➤ Augustan writers Samuel Richardson (1689-1761) and Henry Fielding (1707-54) than by her contemporary ➤ Romantic authors whose ➤ Gothic writings she often mocked. As a result of these allegiances her popularity, not surprisingly, waned quite quickly, although she was much admired by > Scott as well as Coleridge.

Bennett, Arnold (1867-1931)

Novelist. His principal novels are: The Old Wives' Tale (1908); the Clayhanger trilogy Clayhanger (1910), Hilda Lessways (1911), and These Twain (1916) - all three reprinted as The Clayhanger Family (1925); Riceyman Steps (1923); The Grand Babylon Hotel (1902). His distinctive characteristics as a novelist are his regionalism and his > naturalism. His books mainly concern life in the industrial Five Towns of the north-west Midlands (the Potteries), the particular characteristics of which differentiate his fiction considered as an image of English society. Secondly, he was strongly influenced by the naturalism of French fiction-writers such as ➤ Zola and Maupassant. This led him to emphasize the influence of environment on character, and to build his artistic wholes by means of a pattern of mundane details. This importance that he attached to environment caused a reaction against his artistic methods on the part of novelists like > Virginia Woolf (see her essay 'Modern Fiction' in The Common Reader, First Series; 1925) and > D.H. Lawrence, who found Bennett too rigid in his notions of form and too passive in the face of environmental influence. Nonetheless, Bennett lacked the ruthlessness of the French naturalists, and softened his determination with a sentimentality that recalls > Dickens. Benoît de Sainte-Maure

A 12th-century French writer, patronized by ➤ Henry II, who produced a highly influential version of the story of the destruction of Troy (Le Roman de Troie) and a verse history of the Dukes of Normandy down to 1135. Benoît's Troy story, amplified from the pseudo-eyewitness accounts of the Trojan war attributed to ➤ Dares and Dictys, is a rationalized, chronologically ordered history. It presents an account of the first destruction of Troy as a preface to the story of the great Greek siege of Troy, triggered by the abduction of ➤ Helen. Benoît's version was itself translated into Latin in the 13th century by > Guido de Columnis, and this Latin translation superseded Benoît's text as the most popular authoritative medieval version of the Troy story. The story of ⊳ Troilus and Criseyde (or Briseida in Benoît's version) appears in Benoît's narrative in an embryonic form and seems largely to have been his invention, based on a few disconnected passages in Dares' text. ➤ Chaucer used Benoît's narrative, as well as > Boccaccio's version of the love story in ▶ Il Filostrato, in composing ▶ Troilus and Crisevde.

Bentham, Jeremy (1748-1832)

An extremely influential thinker, founder of the school of thought called > Utilitarianism. The basis of his thought was: 1 that human motives are governed by the pursuit of pleasure and avoidance of pain; 2 that the guiding rule for society should be the greatest happiness of the greatest number; 3 that the test of value for human laws and institutions should be no other than that of usefulness. These views he expounded in Fragment on Government (1776) and Introduction to Principles of Morals and Legislation (1780). His principal associates were James Mill (1773-1836) and John Stuart Mill (1806-73); collectively they were known as the Philosophical Radicals, and together they established a practical philosophy of reform of great consequence in 19th-century Britain. But their excessive rationalism frustrated sympathy and imagination in education and the relief of poverty. Bentham's thought derived from the sceptical 18th-century French 'philosophes' such as Helvetius and 18th-century English rationalists such as David Hartley (1705-57) and Joseph Priestley (1733-1804). It was, in fact, the outstanding line of continuity between 18th-century and 19th-century thinking.

Journalist and writer of detective fiction and light verse. E. C. Bentley's famous detective novel Trent's Last Case (1903), dedicated to his friend ▷ G. K. Chesterton, was originally written as an 'exposure of detective stories', but it was soon received as a classic of the genre (▷ detective fiction). In the same spirit, he published a brilliant parody of Dorothy L. Sayers, 'Greedy Night', in 1939. Bentley is also known as the originator of the humorous, aphoristic verse form 'cferihew' (from his middle name), which aims to capture the subject of the poem in two rhyming couplets, a well-known example being,

The art of Biography

Bentley worked as a journalist for The Daily News and The Daily Telegraph, and his other books include Trent's Own Case (1936), Trent Intervenes (1938) and Elephant's Work: An Enigma (1950).

Beowulf

The single extant text of this important > Old English heroic narrative was copied about the year 1000 but there are linguistic traces of an earlier written version dating from the 8th century in the text, and the story material may derive from earlier narratives still. It deals with key events in the life of a 6th-century warrior, Beowulf, from Geatland in south Sweden, who first kills the monster Grendel, which had been ravaging the great hall of Heorot, built by Hrothgar, king of the Danes. Beowulf, nephew of the king of the Geats, slays the monster by wrestling with it and wrenching out its arm. Grendel's mother then seeks vengeance by carrying off one of the Danish nobles, but Beowulf enters the mere beneath which she lives and skills her too. Beowulf returns home and in due course becomes king of the Geats. When he has reigned 50 years, his kingdom is invaded by a fiery dragon which he manages to kill with the aid of a young nobleman, Wiglaf, when all the rest of his followers have fled. However, he receives his own death wound in the fight and as he dies, he pronounces Wiglaf his successor. His body is burnt on a great funeral pyre and the dragon's treasure is buried with his ashes; 12 of his followers ride round the funeral mound celebrating his greatness. This narrative is interlaced with digressions on historical analogues to the action, and asides concerning retrospective and prospective events, which give the poem a dense and complex narrative texture.

Beppo: A Venetian Story (1818)

A poem in \triangleright ottava rima by \triangleright Lord Byron. During the Venetian carnival Laura and her cavaliere servente (lover) are confronted by her long-absent husband, Beppo, who has turned Turk after being shipwrecked. The three of them discuss matters amicably over coffee, and the men remain friends thereafter. The poem reflects Byron's own position at the time as cavaliere servente to Teresa Guiccioli. More importantly, both its form and ambiance make it an important precursor to \triangleright Don Juan.

Berger, John (b 1926)

Novelist, painter and art critic. His novels reflect both his Marxism (Marx, Karl), in their attention to the oppressive structures of society, and his interest in painting, in their vivid realization of sensual detail. A Painter of Our Time (1958), explores through the story of an émigré Hungarian painter, the role of the artist in a consumer society and the relationship of art to experience. His best-known fiction work is G (1972), in which authorial self-consciousness, openended, fragmentary narrative and documentary elements serve to resist the imposition of order on political events.

He has collaborated with the photographer Iean Mohr on a number of works which address political and social issues by combining various media and genres, including photographs, political and social analysis, poems and fictionalized case studies; these are Ways of Seeing (1972; which accompanied an important BBC Television series fronted by Berger); A Fortunate Man (1967); A Seventh Man (1981); Another Way of Telling (1982). Berger has also published two volumes of a trilogy entitled Into Their Labours; these are Pig Earth (1979), which comprises short stories and poems, and Once in Europa (1987). Other novels include: The Foot of Clive (1962); Corker's Freedom (1964). Drama: A Question of Geography (1987; with Nella Bielski); and To the Wedding (1995). Volumes of essays include: Permanent Red (1960); The White Bird (1985). Art criticism includes: The Success and Failure of Picasso (1965).

Bergson, Henri (1859-1941)

French philosopher. Bergson's work on time and consciousness had a great influence on 20th-century novelists, particularly modernist writers engaged in so-called > 'stream of consciousness' work such as ▷ James Joyce, Dorothy Richardson and ▷ Virginia Woolf. His text of 1889, which was published in English in 1910 as Time and Free Will: An Essay on the Immediate Data of Consciousness, was particularly important. Bergson is also known as one of the key theorists of vitalism, the belief that the material progress of the world is not underpinned by determining biological or physical mechanisms but by the movements of living energy; his theory of an essential élan vital or life force, which animates material progress through its constant process of change and becoming, was taken up by ⊳ George Bernard Shaw in his plays. Bergson was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1928, and was married to a cousin of French novelist > Marcel Proust, whose work he also greatly influenced. Berkeley, George (1685-1753)

Irish churchman and a philosopher in the tradition of ➤ Descartes and ➤ John Locke but the opponent of the latter. Locke had affirmed the independence of matter and mind; Berkeley held that the reality of anything depended on its being perceived by a conscious mind; thus mind (and spirit) had primacy over matter. Nature is the experience of consciousness, and the evidence of Universal Mind, or God. He considered that Locke's insistence on external matter and physical causes led to ▶ atheism; but his own lucid and precise prose is as much the vehicle of reason as Locke's. While Locke led towards scientific scepticism, Berkeley's faith, combined with reason, maintained the religious vision in an essentially rational century. His philosophy is expressed in A New Theory of Vision (1709), and in Principles of Human Knowledge (1710). His Dialogues of Alciphron (1732) are distinguished for their grace of style. Berkoff, Steven (b 1937)

Dramatist and actor. Berkoff is as widely known as a performer as he is a writer. He studied mime in Paris with the École Jacques Le Coq, an emphasis very evident in his performances and plays, which rely as much for their impact on movement as on language. After working in repertory theatre Berkoff went on to found the London Theatre Group, where he began to direct and develop adaptations from literature into theatre. Kafka and Edgar Allan Poe were favoured authors for this treatment, which often involved Expressionistic sets and acting style. Metamorphosis (1969) was the most successful of these productions. The London Theatre Group also developed a version of ➤ Aeschylus' Agamemnon, and Greek tragedy became an informing principle of Berkoff's own writing. His first original play was East (1075), which used a juxtaposition of street language with high tragedy and blank verse to produce a vitriolic and abrasive account of East End life. Greek (1979) employed the Oedipus myth to polemicise about mothers, marriage and women. West (1983) rewrote the Beowolf legend into a scabrous attack on the British upper classes and was (ironically) a great success in the West End.

Béroul (fl 1190)

Composer of a version of the ▷ Tristan story (in ▷ Anglo-Norman), of which 4,485 lines survive. The fragment begins with the scene in which King Mark spies on the lovers from the tree and breaks off before Tristan moves away to Britanny. Little is known about the author.

Berry, James (b 1924)

Poet. Berry comes from the West Indies, but has lived in Britain since 1948, a prolific writer and great promoter of multi-cultural education. Like that of younger poets > Linton Kwesi Johnson, Edward Kaman Brathwaite and Benjamin Zephaniah, his work draws strongly on West Indian vernacular and reggae rhythms, and his volumes of verse include Chain of Days and Lucy's Letters and Loving (1982). He has also edited the poetry volumes: Bluefoot Traveller: An Anthology of West Indian Poets of Britain (1976); News From Babylon (1984); and a collection from the 1983 Brixton festival, Dance to a Different Drum. Berry also writes widely for radio and television, short stories and children's books - his children's book, A Thief in the Village, won the Grand Prix Prize in 1987. In 1981 he was awarded the National Poetry Prize.

Berry, Mary (1763-1852)

Dramatist and philosophical prose writer. Mary Berry and her sister Agnes (1764–1852) were brought up by their grandmother and allowed to educate themselves. They were much admired by ➤ Horace Walpole who dedicated books to them and allowed Mary Berry to edit several of his manuscripts, although she published these editions under her father's name, rather than her own. Mary was also friendly with several contemporary female authors, including ➤ Harriet Martineau and ➤ Joanna Baillie; indeed, the latter wrote the epilogue and prologue for Berry's play, Fashionable Friends (1801). The sexual freedom condoned by this play, together with Mary's own rejection of marriage, suggests that in terms of gender politics she was somewhat radical (> Feminism). However, her history A Comparative View of the Social Life of England and France from the Restoration of Charles II (1828–31) reveals a more conservative attitude.

Besant, Walter (1836-1901)

Novelist, philanthropist and journalist, born in Portsea and educated at King's College, London and Christ's College, Cambridge. Many of his novels were set in east London; for example All Sorts and Conditions of Men (1882) is an idealistic story about an heiress and a cabinet maker who combined to bring about the dream of 'People's Palace of Delight' in the East End (a project which Besant contributed to in real life). His novel The Revolt of Man (1882) is an anti-feminist dystopia, part of the debate over the > New Woman.

Bestiaries

Compilations of descriptions of creatures (natural and fantastic), especially popular in the medieval period, in which a brief account of the habits and appearance of the creature is usually followed by allegorical interpretations of its significance, and the moral lessons it may provide. The most accessible example of a medieval bestiary is the 12th-century Latin bestiary, translated by T.H. White, A Book of Beasts (1954).

Best-sellers

A transformation of the means of production in the early years of the 19th century made it possible for a single text to be printed, advertised, distributed and sold in numbers hitherto inconceivable. Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers was the first work of fiction to exploit these new conditions. The financial return on this new mode of production was highly profitable, and a wide market for the commodity was opened up. In our own day the best-seller is associated not only with high sales, however, but also with quick ones. Though there is no agreement on the sales figures which define a text as a best-seller, national newspapers carry weekly charts, showing the titles which are selling most strongly in fiction and non-fiction. This may be seen as a form of advertisement, encouraging further sales of what has been guaranteed as an acceptable product by market success. Writing a best-seller may make a large sum of money for the author and some make it clear (Jeffrey Archer or Shirley Conran for instance) that they gear their fiction to the market with that intention. Recent moves, by publishers as well as authors, to aim writing and publication towards the best-seller lists inevitably threaten to narrow the range of what is published and to discourage publishers from taking chances with new authors and new kinds of writing.

Betham, Mary Matilda (1776-1852) Poet, diarist and artist. Mary Betham's family attempted to make her relinquish literary activity for the more socially acceptable activity of sewing, but she persevered, and in 1797 published her first book of poems, Elegies. This is hardly a sophisticated work, but marks her out as writing within a feminine tradition through, for example, her poetic indebtedness to ▷ Ann Radcliffe and the ➤ Ladies of Llangollen. Her attempt to lay claim to a genealogy of women writers continued in her finest work, the Lay of Marie de France (> lay), in which she takes on the voice of the > medieval writer who, it is supposed, tells her life-story through her poetry. The poem reveals the contemporary fashion for > Gothic narratives and descriptions, but is well-researched and finely done, avoiding some of the excesses of the Gothic novel. Betham was still having to fight against her family's prejudice, however, and in the 1820s they placed her in an institution for the mentally ill from which she wrote accusatory letters, as well as continuing her poetic output. Despite her family's censorious attitude, during her lifetime Betham was recognised as a fine poet, by > Coleridge for example, and continued to write until her death in 1852.

Betham-Edwards, Matilda (1836-1919) Novelist, essayist and ⊳ travel writer, born on a farm in Suffolk. Her mother died when she was twelve, after which Betham-Edwards educated herself, developing early an interest in France and the French. She began her first novel, The White House by the Sea, while still a teenager. Eventually published in 1857, it became an immediate success, reprinting continuously for the next forty years. The author went on to write more than thirty novels, of which Forestalled (1880) and Love and Marriage (1884) were her favourites. Her travel writing includes A Winter with the Swallows (1866) and Through Spain to the Sahara (1867), which record her trips with the ⊳ feminist ⊳ Barbara Bodichon. Betham-Edwards was a believer in women's equality and signed the 1866 petition for female suffrage. Her sympathy to socialist perspectives is evident in The Sylvesters (1871). In 1884, she published Six Life Studies of Famous Women, which included a biographical sketch of her aunt and godmother, Matilda Betham, who wrote poetry and diaries.

Betjeman, Sir John (1906–84) Poet and critic of architecture. His poetry is highly nostalgic and written in a style which has given it wide popularity: the 1958 Collected Poems was a best-seller. It is largely pastiche and parody, witty and anti-modernist in its form. His works include: Mount Zion (1931); Continual Dew (1937); Old Lights in New Chancels (1940); New Bats in Old Belfries (1945); A Few Late Chrysanthemums (1954); Summoned by Bells (autobiography in verse; 1960); The Best of Betjeman (ed. Guest; 1978); Uncollected Poems (1982). Betjeman was ▷ Poet Laureate from 1972-84. He was a forceful champion of ▷ Victorian architecture, and editor of the Shell Guides. He published some 20 books on architectural subjects.

Actress, one of those competing for the title of the first professional actress. She joined ▷ Sir William D'Avenant's company, probably in 1660 and her first known appearance was as lanthe in D'Avenant's revision of ▷ The Siege of Rhodes in 1661. In the same year she played Ophelia to ▷ Thomas Betterton's Hamlet, and in 1662 the two were married.

Her talents were varied: she played innocent young girls, coquettes, and forceful characters such as Lady Macbeth and the Duchess of Malfi, apparently with equal skill. In the late 1660s, she and her husband took the young actress > Anne Bracegirdle into their home, virtually adopting her as a daughter. Throughout her career she maintained a reputation for 'virtuous' living: > Cibber described her as leading 'an unblemish'd and sober life'. After her husband's death in 1710, she appears to have suffered some sort of mental breakdown, probably exacerbated by the poverty in which he left her. She was buried in Westminster Abbey, next to her husband. Bib: Howe, E., The First English Actresses.

Betterton, Thomas (1635-1710)

The greatest English actor of his generation, he probably began acting in the late 1650s. By 1661 he had joined the ➤ Duke's Company, in which he purchased a share and so was involved in theatrical finances as well as acting for most of his career.

As an actor, he succeeded from the beginning, making a particular impression as Hamlet, coached by > Sir William D'Avenant, who had seen it performed earlier by an actor under > Shakespeare's tutelage, and who had himself been taught by a pupil of Shakespeare's.

In 1662 Betterton was sent by ➤ Charles II to France, on the first of several missions to research the latest developments in French drama and opera, so as to bring new ideas to the English stage. Returning to England, he proceeded to build on his reputation with a succession of great roles, especially in Shakespeare. Betterton continued acting almost to his death, dying in great poverty. He is buried in Westminster Abbey.

Between the Acts (1941)

Description Noolf's last novel, published posthumously. The story concerns the staging of a pageant of English history in the grounds of a country house on the eve of World War Two. Miss La Trobe, who creates and organizes the performances, is, like Lily Briscoe in Description To The Lighthouse, a representative of the woman artist. Her pageant serves to explore issues of truth and illusion, art and reality, community and isolation, self-knowledge and deception; it briefly unites the lives of a disparate group of characters.

Bevis of Hampton

A popular metrical romance translated into English sometime in the late 13th/early 14th century. Earlier versions exist in French and ➤ Anglo-Norman. The story-type is one that is found in versions across Europe. Bevis' father has been murdered by his mother's lover, Sir Murdour. Bevis is sold as a slave and has many adventures — with his horse Arundel and his sword Morglay — before the happy ending with Bevis married to Josaine. The story was circulated in the ➤ chapbooks of the 16th century and is retold in ➤ Michael Drayton's Poly-Olbion.

Bible in England
The Bible falls into two parts.

I Old Testament

The first and larger part of the Bible, consisting of the sacred writings of the Jews. It concerns the peculiar, divinely ordained destiny of the Jewish race from earliest times, and it is considered by Christians to expound the divine promise which the New Testament fulfils not merely for the Jews but for the whole of mankind. The Old Testament is divided into books which are grouped by Jews into three main sections, as follows:

I The Torah ('Law', otherwise called the Pentateuch), consisting of five books as follows: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. They are called 'the five books of Moses'. The first two are narrative and descriptive, and move from the creation of the world to the escape of the Jews from slavery in Egypt. The remainder contain laws and discourses.

2 The Prophets. This section is divided into two in the Hebrew Bible: the 'Former Prophets', consisting of Joshua, Judges, the two books of Samuel and the two books of Kings; and the 'Latter Prophets', consisting of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets. The books of the Former Prophets tell the story of the establishment of the Jews in the kingdom of Israel, and their subsequent history. The Latter Prophets contain history together with prophetic discourses.

3 The Sacred Writings, or Hagiographa, which are divided into three sections: (i) the Poetical books, consisting of Psalms, Proverbs, Job; (ii) the five 'Rolls', which are read at special seasons in the Jewish year: Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther – of these Esther and Ruth are narratives; the other three are poetic meditations; (iii) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles, all consisting mainly of historical narrative.

2 New Testament

The second and shorter part of the Bible, containing the sacred books of the Christians. It is divided into books, on the pattern of the Old Testament, and dates as a whole collection from the end of the 2nd century AD. It is customary to divide the books into four groups.

1 The three Synoptic (ie 'summary narrative') Gospels of Saints Matthew, Mark and Luke, and the Acts of the Apostles. The Gospels are narratives about Jesus Christ, and Acts is the narrative of the missionary careers of the apostles (including St Paul) after Christ's death.

2 The Epistles (letters) of St Paul. The four shortest of these are addressed to individuals: two to Timothy, and one each to Titus and to Philemon. The remainder are addressed to various early Christian communities. These are the Epistles to the Romans, Galations, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, two to the Corinthians, and two to the Thessalonians. The Epistle to the Hebrews has been ascribed to Paul, but is nowadays considered to be by a disciple of his.

3 The Catholic Epistles, so called because they were directed to Christians generally. Two of these are ascribed to St Peter, and one each to James and Jude.

4 The Johannine writings, ascribed to the Apostle John. These are the Gospel of St John, distinguished from the Synoptic Gospels as probably not intended as a historical narrative, the Epistles of John, and the poetic, visionary narrative called the Apocalypse, or Revelation.

In the Middle Ages the only version of the Bible authorized by the Church was the > Vulgate, ie the translation into Latin by St Jerome, completed in 405. Partial translations were made into Old English before the 11th century. From the 14th century translations were made by reformers, who believed that men without Latin should have the means of seeking guidance from divine scripture without dependence on Church authority. The main translators were these: > Wycliffe (14th century); > Tyndale, and Coverdale (16th century).

The last-named was the producer of the Great Bible (also called ➤ Cranmer's Bible after the Archbishop of the time), but ➤ Henry VIII, concerned for his intermediate position between Catholics and Protestants, ended by restricting its use. Under the Catholic > Mary I (1553-8) English reformers produced the Geneva Bible abroad, with annotations suited to > Puritan > Calvinist opinion; and in 1568 the socalled Bishops' Bible was issued by the restored Anglicans to counteract Puritan influence. Finally, in 1611 the Authorized Version was produced with the approval of > James I (1603-25). For three centuries it was to be the only one in general use, and it is still the prevailing version. In the 19th century it was revised (Revised Version) and recently a new translation has been authorized and produced (New Testament 1961; Old Testament 1961; Old Testament Apocrypha 1970). A Catholic translation (the Douai Bible) was issued at about the same time as the Authorized Version.

In spite of various other translations. Catholic and Protestant, in the 19th and 20th centuries the Authorized Version is by far the most important for its literary and social influence. It was based on previous translations, especially that of Tyndale, so that the cast of its prose is characteristically more 16th than early 17th century in style. Nonetheless much of it is of supreme eloquence, eg the Book of 70b, and the last 15 chapters of Isaiah. It was for many people in the 17th and 18th centuries the only book that was constantly read, and it was familiar to all from its use in church and education. The musical cadence of Authorized Version prose can be often heard in the prose of English writers, whether or not professing Christians. It is conspicuous in John Bunyan's ➤ Pilgrim's Progress but it can also be heard in the prose of 20th century novelists > T. F. Powys, eg Mr Weston's Good Wine (1927).

Bidgood, Ruth (b 1922)

Poet. Born at Seven Sisters, near Neath, Glamorgan, Ruth Bidgood attended school at Port Talbot where her father was vicar, afterwards reading English at Oxford before serving as a coder with the war-time W.R.N.S. at Alexandria. After the war she worked for Chamber's Encyclopedia in London before returning to Wales to settle in the remote village of Abergwesyn near Llanwrtyd Wells, Breconshire, where she started to write poetry and historical articles on the history of Breconshire and Radnorshire. Her poetry is concerned with the people, the landscape and seasons of mid-Wales, the forces of nature being powerfully evoked, together with stories from local folk-lore. Her poetry collections are The Green Time (1972), Not Without Homage (1975), The Point of Miracle (1978) and Kindred (1992), this last volume combining a selection from her previous collections with one-third new poems.

Bildungsroman

A novel which describes the youthful development of the central character. Prominent examples in English include ▶ James Joyce's > A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1916), > Samuel Butler's > The Way of All Flesh (1902) and > D. H. Lawrence's > Sons and Lovers (1913). In the contemporary novel, the bildungsroman form has often been adopted by feminist writers, as a narrative of emancipation or growing consciousness. An example is ➤ Jeanette Winterson's Oranges are not the Only Fruit (1985).

Bill of Rights (1689)

I An Act passed by Parliament, according to which the powers of the king were restricted. In particular, he could no longer suspend laws without the consent of Parliament; nor could he dispense with laws in individual cases. The importance of the Act was less the specific ways in which royal power was limited than Parliament's implicit decision to take over the sovereignty of the government from the Crown. This Bill and the events that led up to it, the flight of > James II (1685-8) and his replacement by ⊳ William III and Mary II (the ➤ Glorious Revolution), were the real starting-points of 'constitutional monarchy' in England, ie a monarchy under which it is accepted by both Crown and people that the representatives of the people are the real sovereigns of the country. Because Britain does not have a written constitution, such historical traces as the Bill of Rights are the major signs of how power has been transferred and located. 2 The first ten Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, all adopted in 1791. Their guarantee of individual rights was an answer ro criticism of the Constitution, which had hindered its ratification.

Biographia Literaria (1817)

A miscellaneous work of > autobiography, philosophy, and literary criticism, by ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Its psychological approach to creativity, influenced by the German philosophers Schlegel and ➤ Kant, foreshadows the > Freudian concept of the unconscious, and its theory of imagination is central to the development of literary critical theory. The famous distinction between primary imagination, secondary imagination and fancy occurs in Chapter XIII. Primary imagination is seen as 'the living power and prime agent of all human perception'. Secondary imagination is the creative power to synthesize and re-express experience in new forms: 'It dissolves, diffuses, dissipates, in order to recreate; or where this process is rendered impossible, yet still, at all events, it struggles to idealize and to unify.' Fancy, on the other hand, simply juxtaposes memories and impressions and 'has no other counters to play with but fixities and definites'. Primary perception is thus not the mere passive holding of a mirror up to nature of classical literary theory, but involves an interaction between subjectivity and objective reality.

Much of the literary criticism in the book is devoted to detailed analysis and appreciation of > William Wordsworth's artifice, and to pointing out that his language is not simply, as he asserted in the Preface to the Lyrical Ballads, 'the real language of men', but a highly individual artistic construct of his own. The 'critical analysis' of poems by > Shakespeare and Wordsworth which occupies much of the second volume, displays a very modern sophistication in its treatment of metre and diction.

Biography

The chief source of inspiration for English biographers was the Greek, ▷ Plutarch (1st century AD), whose Parallel Lives of Greek and Roman great men was translated into English by ➤ Sir Thomas North in 1579 and was widely read. Biography had been practised before in England; there had been the lives of the saints in the Middle Ages, and in the 16th century Cavendish's life of the statesman ➤ Cardinal Wolsey had appeared. The regular practice of biography, however, starts with the 17th century, not merely owing to the influence of North's translation of Plutarch, but as part of the outward-turning, increasingly scientific interest in many kinds of people (not merely saints and rulers) which in the 18th century was to give rise to the novel. Biography is a branch of history, and the art of historical writing advanced with biography: Edward Hyde, > Earl of Clarendon, included fine biographical portraits in his history of the Great Rebellion, written between 1646 and 1670. Women writers of the period also excelled at biography: the royalist > Margaret Cavendish wrote a biography of her husband William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle; ➤ Lady Ann Fanshawe wrote an account of the life she and her husband led during the ▷ Interregnum as exiles; and > Lucy Hutchinson wrote a poignant record of the life and death of her Parliamentarian husband, Colonel John Hutchinson. ➤ Izaak Walton's lives of > John Donne (1640), Sir Henry Wotton (1651), ➤ Richard Hooker (1665), ➤ George Herbert (1670) and Bishop Sanderson (1678) are closer to our modern idea of biography, and they are landmarks, if not originals, in the form inasmuch as the subjects, though eminent men, were humble enough to lead ordinary lives in touch with usual experience.

In the 18th century the writing of biographies became habitual; and also biography, or autobiography, became a way of disguising pure fiction, eg in the novels of ➤ Defoe. ➤ Samuel Johnson was a master of biography in his ► Lives of the Poets (1779-81), most notably among which is his Life of Mr Richard Savage, previously published in 1744. The outstanding biography of the century, however, is the life of Johnson himself by > James Boswell, 1791, as an intimate and vivid account of a great man. > William Godwin wrote a biography of his wife > Mary Wollstonecraft, entitled Memoirs of the author of a Vindication of the Rights of Women (1798), which contributed to her notoriety.

In the Victorian period, the historian and social critic ➤ Thomas Carlyle regarded biography as a means of recounting 'the earthly pilgrimage of a man' (Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, 1838). He also regarded the history of the world as 'but the Biography of great men' (> On Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History). His edition of Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, with Elucidations (1845) is an attempt to portray history through the life of one of the men who helped to make it. Carlyle's sympathetic biography helped to establish Cromwell's stature. In 1851 Carlyle wrote a Life of John Sterling as a tribute to his 'brilliant, beautiful and cheerful friend' and followed it with a six-volumed History of Frederick the Great (1858-65) which took him twelve years to complete. Both of these books are good examples of Carlyle's tendency to 'whitewash' his subjects in the service of didacticism, in that they were designed to support his claim that Britain was in need of 'strong men' with heroic leadership qualities. Carlyle's own biography was written by his great friend the historian J. A. Froude who also edited Carlyle's Reminiscences (1881): a series of biographical sketches of famous contemporaries (such as the poets Wordsworth and Southey), and members of his own immediate family including his father, James Carlyle, and his wife, > Jane Welsh Carlyle. Other biographies of the Victorian period in which the author claims a vital relationship between him/herself and his/her subject include Thomas Moore's Letters and Journals of Lord Byron (1830), John Gibson Lockhart's Memoirs (1837-38), a biography of his father-in-law Sir Walter Scott, and ➤ Elizabeth Gaskell's study The Life of Charlotte Brontë (1857). In each of these cases the author had access to personal papers and information about the subject and frequently seasons the narrative with personal reminiscences.

Mrs Gaskell's life of ➤ Charlotte Brontë is characteristic of a trend among Victorian female novelists to write sympathetic and admiring lives of other women writers. A favourite subject was the French novelist ➤ George Sand. Jane Williams (1806–85), Julia Kavanagh (1824–77) and Gertrude Mayer (1839–1932) compiled surveys of women of letters, such as Williams' Literary Women of England (1861), or collections of articles on their lives. Anna Stoddart (1840–1911) wrote biographies of such varied individuals as the traveller Isabella Bird and Francis of Assisi (1903).

In contrast to the personal biography is the informative biography. This is less subjective and may be composed of a selection of events involving the subject, reported with as little interpretive comment as possible. David Masson's Life of Milton: Narrated in Connection with the Political, Ecclesiastical and Literary History of his Time (seven vols, 1859–94), or John G. Nicolay and John Hay's Abraham Lincoln: A History (ten vols, 1890) are good examples.

The 20th-century biographer Lytton Strachey regarded most biographies of the 19th century as dull monuments to the subject, whereas he considered biography to be an art form presenting the subject as a human being and showing him or her from unexpected angles. His best-known works include Eminent Victorians (1918) - short biographical studies of Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale and General Gordon - and Queen Victoria (1912). > Edmund Gosse wrote The Life of Algernon Charles Swinburne (1917) but his most famous work is the autobiographical Father and Son published anonymously in 1907 which sheds a personal and revealing light on the Victorian period. As such it is a classic example of the largely new form of autobiography for which the period is more outstanding.

The psychological approach and the revolutionary tone of biography had made it one of the fastest growth areas in publishing. Michael Holroyd, Victoria Glendinning and Richard Ellman are among the important biographers of the late 20th century. Biographies of women writers have played a major role in ▷ feminist analyses of the conditions and achievements of women's writing.

Bishop, Isabella Bird (1831–1904)

Travel writer. She was born in Boroughbridge, one of two daughters of Edward Bird, curate, and Dora Lawson, Sunday-school teacher. She began travelling abroad in 1854 with a visit to the United States. The Englishwoman in America (1856) was an immediate success, launching her career as a writer. Aspects of Religion in America (1859) was written during her second trip to North America; this was followed by The Hawaiian Archipelago: Six Months Among the Palm Groves, Coral Reefs and Volcanoes of the Sandwich Islands (1874).
In 1878 she left for Japan, returning in 1879 after travelling through Hong Kong, Saigon,

Singapore and Malaysia. Unbeaten Tracks in Fapan (1880) and The Golden Cheronese (1883) record these journeys. In 1880 she set out for the Middle East, continuing through India, Tibet, Central Asia and Persia, During this trip she organized the building of two hospitals in India, in memory of her father and sister. Journeys in Persia and Kurdistan was published in 1804, the year in which Bishop left Britain on a missionary trip to China. She sailed up the Yangtze River, rode 300 miles alone on a mule, and built three hospitals and an orphanage. Returning to London in 1897, she prepared Korea and Her Neighbours (1898), The Yangtze Valley and Beyond (1800) and Chinese Pictures (1900). Her final missionary trip was to Morocco in 1900-01. She was now severely weakened by the ill-health that had plagued her for many years, and she died of a tumour in 1904. She appears as a character in Caryl Churchill's (b 1938) play, Top Girls (1982). Black Death

An epidemic which struck England in 1348–9 and reduced the population by between one-third and one-half. The economic consequences were far-reaching, especially the shortage of labour. Landowners tended to change from arable to sheep-farming, which required less labour; peasants had better bargaining power and were in a position to commute their serfdom into paid labour; the social unrest which resulted from attempts by the landed classes to keep down wages, culminated in the ▷ Peasants' Revolt of 1381. ▷ Boccaccio provides a vivid picture of the ravages of the ▷ Black Death in Florence in the introductory sequence of his ▷ Decameron.

Black Friars (Blackfriars)

Dominican friars, called 'Black' in England owing to the colour of their robes. Their convent in London was dissolved by ➤ Henry VIII (1509-47), but the district has continued to bear their name. Part of the old convent was adapted into two distinct theatres, although they were in the same building. The first Blackfriars theatre was in the hands of boy actors - the Children of the Chapel - during the 1570s and 1580s. The second Blackfriars theatre was built by ⊳ James Burbage in 1596 and initially used by the Children of the Chapel, then by the King's Men. which the Lord ➤ Chamberlain's Company had become. It was a 'private' theatre with a more affluent and probably more educated kind of audience than frequented the public theatres such as the > Globe. The change of audience encouraged a change in the mode of drama. Never again would the theatre serve the whole society: its present status in this country as an entertainment for the relatively privileged is derived from the move from 'public' to 'private' theatres.

Black Prince, The (1330-76)

Edward, Prince of Wales, eldest son of ➤ Edward III. He was famous for his military exploits, especially his defeat of a French army at Poitiers, 1356; in consequence he became a national hero comparable to ➤ Henry V. His designation 'Black' seems to originate with 16th-century chroniclers; it probably refers to his reputation as a warrior. His son was ➤ Richard II.

· Blackmore, R.D. (Richard Dodderidge) (1825–1900)

Novelist and poet. Born in Berkshire, the son of a clergyman, Blackmore was educated at school in Tiverton, where he was head boy, and at Exeter College, Oxford. His mother had died when he was a baby and he spent much of his youth with an uncle in Glamorgan. A career as a barrister was cut short by epileptic fits and after an unsuccessful period as a schoolteacher, Blackmore built a house in Teddington where he lived a retired life, dividing his time between writing, and growing and selling fruit and flowers. He married Lucy Maguire in 1852; there were no children and after her death in 1888 he continued to mourn her and keep the house unchanged. He was a shy man, kind but self-centred and determined. He was fond of animals, especially dogs, and deeply absorbed in his gardening enterprise.

He published volumes of poetry, including translations of the 3rd-century Greek poet Theocritus and the Roman poet Virgil (70-19 BC). His fourteen novels include Lorna Doone (1869), which was rejected by eighteen publishers and is now his most famous novel, Cradock Nowell (1866), The Maid of Sker (1872), his first attempt at fiction only later finished, Alice Lorraine (1875) and Springhaven (1887). Lorna Doone is said to have done for Devonshire what Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) did for the Highlands and in general Blackmore's novels abound with carefully observed and detailed descriptions of locations, wildlife and the weather along with exciting incidents, all somewhat loosely structured.

Blackmore, Sir Richard (c 1655–1729) Poet and physician to ➤ Queen Anne. The dullness of his lengthy epic, Prince Arthur (1695) and The Creation: a philosophical poem demonstrating the existence and providence of God (1712) earned the ridicule of ➤ Alexander Pope in ➤ The Dunciad (Bk. II, 370ff). He also wrote a Satyre against Wit (1700).

Blackwell, Elizabeth (?1700-58) Naturalist, born in Aberdeen. She eloped to London with the Scottish physician and adventurer Alexander Blackwell, who was imprisoned for debt. In order to raise money, she published A Curious Herbal Containing Five Hundred Cuts of the Most Useful Plants Which are Now Used in the Practice of Physick in two volumes, in 1737 and 1739. The books consisted of pictures of plants, drawn, engraved and coloured by herself, with descriptions added in Latin by her husband. The herbal was approved by leading members of the College of Physicians, became immensely popular, and was later expanded into five volumes. Alexander Blackwell was executed in Sweden in 1747, allegedly for plotting against the government.

Blackwood's Magazine Founded in 1817 by the publisher William Blackwood as the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, it was particularly influential in the first 15 years of its existence. Like the > Quarterly it was intended as a Tory rival to the liberal > Edinburgh Review, but called itself a 'magazine' to indicate a lighter tone than that of the 'Reviews'. It attacked > Lord Byron, and > Percy Bysshe Shelley on political grounds, and was, like the Quarterly, particularly hostile to > John Keats, because of his association with the radical journalist > Leigh Hunt. Hunt, Keats, > Charles Lamb and > William Hazlitt were stigmatized as the 'Cockney School' of literature. Blackwood's Magazine began with a brilliant group of contributors, especially > Sir Walter Scott, John G. Lockhart (known because of his fierce criticism as 'the Scorpion'), > James Hogg, and John Wilson, who wrote under the pen-name of Christopher North. Between 1822 and 1835 the magazine ran a series of brilliant dialogues, Noctes Ambrosianae, Scottish clergyman and author of The Grave (1743), a ▷ blank-verse genre piece blending ▷ Gothic sinisterness, banal piety and a pseudo-Shakespearean sublimity, imitated from Hamlet. Its enjoyable imaginative gusto ensured that it retained its popularity throughout the century, and beyond.

Blake, William (1757–1827) Poet and artist. The self-educated son of a London hosier, Blake earned his living by engraving illustrations for books. His own poems are engraved rather than printed, and he wove into his text pictures which elaborated the poetic theme. His earliest poems, Poetical Sketches show the influence of earlier lyric writers and ➤ Macpherson's ➤ Ossianic writings. His next works, the > Songs of Innocence (1780), and > Songs of Experience (1704) are startlingly original. Intended, on one level, for children, they are simple but symbolically resonant lyrics 'Shewing the Two contrary States of the Human Soul'. In Innocence the world is unthreatening and without morality, and God is trusted implicitly. The Experience poems, which often parallel those of the earlier volume in setting or title, depict with fierce moral indignation, a fallen world of repression and religious hypocrisy. There is no simple relation of progression or superiority between the 'contrary states', and Blake makes no attempt to reconcile their contradictions. They remain in unresolved dialectical opposition to each other.

In later works Blake elaborates his revolutionary interpretation of Christian theology using invented characters representing psychological or spiritual forces. In Thel (etched c 1789), in rhythmical, unrhymed lines, usually of seven stresses, the protagonist, confronted with the interdependence of life and death, creation and destruction, flees back to the shadowy world of the unborn. Tiriel was written at about the same time. The French Revolution (1791), America (1793) and Visions of the Daughters of Albion (1793) show Blake's reaction to the American and French revolutions, which he saw as releasing the energies of humanity, so long repressed by the forces of absolutism, institutionalized religion and sexual inhibition. In > The Marriage of Heaven and Hell (etched c 1793) Blake expressed in a series of prophetic statements and 'Memorable Fancies', mainly in prose, his contempt for 18th-century rationalism and institutionalized religion.

Because his works remained virtually unknown and he developed no lasting relationship with an audience, his later prophecies became increasingly formless and obscure. He was also unwilling to be too explicit in case he should invite trouble from the authorities. The Book of Urizen (1794) focuses on the tyrannical figure of Urizen, ('your reason' or 'horizon'?) who symbolizes the inhibiting powers of control and restriction. Urizen is in constant war with Orc, a Satanic force of revolutionary energy. The Book of Ahania, The Book of Los (1795) and Vala (1797), subsequently rewritten as The Four Zoas (1804) develop similar themes with increasing intricacy and elusiveness. His last two prophetic books Milton (1804) and Jerusalem (1804) are often impenetrable, but include some striking passages. They show a new emphasis on Christian humility and self-sacrifice. In Milton he elaborates on his famous observation that > Milton was 'of the Devil's party without knowing it'. Milton is shown returning to earth in the form of Blake himself, in order to correct his earlier mistake. Blake is one of the most intellectually challenging of English poets, with a unique insight into the pieties and ideological deceptions of his time. Blank verse

Verse which is unrhymed, and composed of lines which normally contain ten syllables and have the stress on every second syllable, as in the classical ▷ iambic pentameter.

The first user of the iambic pentameter in English was ▷ Chaucer and he used it in rhyming couplets, eg The Prologue to ▷ The Canterbury Tales. The first user of blank verse was Henry Howard, ▷ Earl of Surrey (1517–47), who adopted it for a translation of the second and third books of ▷ Virgil's Aeneid in order to get closer to the effect of the metrically regular but unrhymed Latin ▷ hexameters. The effect in Surrey is that Chaucer's measure is being used but without rhyme:

They whisted all, with fixed face attent, When prince Aeneas from the royal seat Thus gan to speak.

The dramatist ➤ Christopher Marlowe (1564–93) first gave blank verse its distinctive quality. In his plays, he combined the rhythm of the verse with the normal rhythm and syntax of the sentence, so that the effect begins to be like natural speech expressed with unusual music:

Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscrib'd In one self place: for where we are is hell, And where hell is, there must we ever be... (Dr Faustus)

Blank verse as used by Marlowe was carried on by > Shakespeare, who employed it with steadily increasing flexibility and power. His contemporaries did the same, but in his immediate successors' work great freedoms are taken with the > metre, and the rhythm of the sentence begins to dominate over that of the line, so that the effect is of rhythmic paragraphs of speech.

The next phase is the epic use of blank verse by ➤ Milton in ➤ Paradise Lost (1667), who gave the weight of Latin syntax to the long sentences and accordingly moved away from speech rhythms. ➤ Wordsworth and ➤ Coleridge at the beginning of the 19th century lightened the Miltonic effect back towards colloquialism while retaining a quasi-Miltonic gravity in order to convey the pulse of sustained meditation. Examples include Wordsworth's Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey... (1798) and his epic of introspection ➤ The Prelude (1805; 1850). Twentieth-century poets such as ➤ Eliot and ➤ Pound derived from the ➤ Jacobean dramatists new free measures which cannot strictly be described as blank verse at all.

Bleak House (1852-3)

A novel by > Charles Dickens, published, like most of his novels, in monthly parts. It opens with an attack on the part of the legal system called the High Court of Chancery. The rest of the novel expands this opening into a dramatization, through a wide range of characters, of the various forms of parasitism that society lends itself to, and of the ways in which institutions (especially legal ones) falsify relationships and degrade human beings. Most of the story takes place in London. The telling of the story is shared by two contrasted narrators: the savagely sardonic but impersonal author who uses the present tense and the ingenuous, saccharine, unresentful girl, Esther Summerson, who is ignorant of her parentage, though she knows that she is illegitimate. She is adopted by a philanthropist, John Jarndyce, who also adopts two young orphan relatives, Richard Carstone and Ada Clare, who are 'wards in Chancery' (ie legally under the care of the Lord Chancellor) while the distribution of an estate to which they have claims is endlessly disputed in the Court of Chancery (the case of 'Jarndyce and Jarndyce'). Through Richard, Ada and Mrs Jarndyce, Esther becomes acquainted with a large number of characters, some of whom are also despairing participants in Chancery Suits, and others (such as Skimpole, the parasitic man of letters, Mrs Jellyby, a wellmeaning but incompetent philanthropist, and Turveydrop, the self-styled model of fashionable deportment) who live off society without giving anything substantial in return. Another focus in the novel is Sir Leicester Dedlock, a simpleminded but self-important land-owner, whose one redeeming feature is his devotion to his wife, the beautiful and silent Lady Dedlock. Lady Dedlock is in fact the mother of Esther Summerson, a fact known to the family lawyer, Tulkinghorn, who blackmails her. Her former lover, Captain Hawdon, is still alive, but lives in destitution and misery. His only friend is the crossing-sweeper, Io, who resembles Sir Leicester in that they are equally simpleminded and equally capable of one great love for another person. In social respects they are so differentiated, by the lack of any advantages in the one case and by excess of privilege in the other, that it is hard to think of them as belonging to the same species. A large number of other characters contribute to Dickens' panorama of society as mainly constituted by parasites and the victims of parasites. The theme is conveyed partly through the atmosphere of contrasted houses: Bleak House, which is in fact the cordial and life-giving home of Mr Jarndyce; Chesney Wold, the vast but empty mansion of Sir Leicester; Tom-all-alone's, the slum dwelling where Jo finds his sole refuge; the clean and orderly household of the retired soldier, Bagnet; the squalid one of the moneylender, Smallweed, and so forth. For the main characters, the story ends with the corruption of Richard Carstone, the death in despair of Lady Dedlock, the murder of Tulkinghorn and Esther's marriage to the young doctor, Woodcourt. The case of 'Jarndyce and Jarndyce' was based on an actual case centring on a Birmingham millionaire, William Jennings. The character of Skimpole is partly based on journalist and poet, Leigh Hunt, (1784-1859) and another character, Boythorn, on ➤ Walter

Bleasdale, Alan (b 1946)

Dramatist. A Merseyside writer who developed a strong reputation outside the West End, Alan Bleasdale is a gritty comic satirist who has reached his widest theatre audience with what is, paradoxically, his most earnest work: Are You Lonesome Tonight?, an overtly hagiographic musical about Elvis Preslev that aims to set the record straight about a musical legend Bleasdale thinks has been vilified. Set on the last day of the King's life, the musical is an unabashedly sentimental picture of a bloated talent looking back sardonically on his younger self, before he allowed himself to be mercilessly corrupted by managers, promoters and the press. Earlier stage plays of note include It's a Madhouse (1976), set in a psychiatric hospital in the northwest of England, and Having a Ball (1981), about four men awaiting surgery in a vasectomy clinic. On the Ledge (1993) is, literally, set on a window ledge. In addition, Bleasdale has written memorably for other media: Peter Smith's 1985 film No Surrender has a strong Bleasdale script about rival factions in a Liverpool nightclub where the tensions mirror those in Northern Ireland. His TV writing has also tapped the psychic pulse of Britain in Boys From the Blackstuff (a 1983 howl of rage against unemployment, set in Liverpool, that nonetheless caught a national feeling), The Monocled Mutineer (a 1986 parable of powerlessness in Thatcher's Britain) and GBH (1991) which wickedly satirised the battle for ascendency in Liverpool between the Labour Party and the Trotskyist Militant Tendency.

Blenheim (1704)

An important battle in the War of the ▷ Spanish Succession in which the forces of ▷ John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, and Prince Eugene of Savoy defeated the French forces of Louis XIV under Marshal Tallard, near the village of Blindheim (anglicized, Blenheim) in Bayaria.

Blessington, Marguerite, Countess of (1789–1849)

Journalist and novelist. Marguerite Blessington's life was characterized by brutality and hardship, and yet she was one of the most renowned literary hostesses of the day. She received no formal education and was sold by her father as a wife to Captain Maurice Farmer when she was fifteen, but ran away after only three months. She eventually found shelter with Charles, Earl of Blessington and, when her husband died in 1817, they married. This was the happiest period of Blessington's life and she travelled on the continent, becoming acquainted with some of the most renowned literary figures of her day. It is from this period that her witty and fast-moving work Conversations of Lord Byron (\triangleright Byron) comes, of whom she wrote just before she met him: 'Am I indeed in the same town with Byron? . . . I hope he may not be fat . . . for a fat poet is an anomaly in my opinion'. It was also at this time that she made an enduring friendship with > Count Alfred d'Orsay, for whom she acted as patron. She had no children by Blessington and this resulted in her rejection by his family when he died in 1829, after which she had to work hard in order to support herself, often undertaking hack journalism, although she also wrote several novels. In 1849 she was declared bankrupt and died penniless in Paris a month later.

Blind, Mathilde (1841-96)

Poet, biographer, translator and editor, who also wrote under the ▷ pseudonym Claude Lake. Born in Mannheim, Germany, she adopted the name of her stepfather, Karl Blind (a revolutionary who led the Baden revolt 1848–9). Educated by her mother and at schools in Belgium and England, she was politically committed from an early age. Her writings are eclectic: her first volume of Poems appeared in 1867, followed by Shelley: A Lecture in 1870. She edited a well-respected Selection from the Poems of P.B. Shelley (1872), translated Strauss's The Old Faith and the New (1873) and wrote a long poem based on a Scottish legend, The Prophecy of St Oran (1881). A biography of → George Eliot followed in 1883, then came a → romance, Tarantella (1884). Heather on Fire (1886) was a political protest against the clearances of the Scottish Highlands. Other works include the epic poem The Ascent of Man (1889), a translation of the Journal (1890) of Russian emigré Marie Bashkirtseff (1858–84) and four further volumes of poetry. Always committed to raising the status of women and improving their educational opportunities, Blind left her estate to Newnham, the Cambridge women's collège.

Blixen, Karen Christentze (née Dinesen) (1885-1962)

Danish novelist and short-story writer, who wrote mainly in English, using the pennames Isak Dinesen and Pierre Andrezel, Born in Rungsted, Denmark, she studied art in Copenhagen, Paris and Rome before marrying her cousin, Baron Bror Blixen-Finecke, in 1914, and settling in Kenya where they ran a coffee-plantation (work which Blixen continued after their divorce until 1931). Her novel Out of Africa (1937) is based on her experiences in Africa. A number of her short stories use elements of the fantastic, the symbolic, and the ➤ Gothic: the volumes include: Seven Gothic Tales (1934); Winter's Tales (1942); Angelic Avengers (1944); Last Tales (1957); Anecdotes of Destiny (1958); Shadows on the Grass (1960); Carnival: Entertainments and Posthumous Tales (1979). Bloom, Harold (b 1930)

One of the leading members of the so-called Yale school of literary criticism, along with the late ▷ Paul De Man, ▷ Geoffrey Hartman and J. Hillis Miller. In books such as The Anxiety of Influence (1973), A Map of Misreading

(1975), and Poetry and Repression (1976) Bloom seeks to offer a revisionary account of poetry, based especially on a > Freudian model of the relationship between the aspiring poet and his literary predecessors. In this way Bloom moves away from the tenets of American new criticism in his suggestion that all poetry seeks, but fails, to exclude 'precursor' texts, with which it enters into a struggle, both destructive and creative, in order to achieve its particular identity. Other books by Bloom relevant to a study of the Romantic period include: Shelley's My Mythmaking (1959), The Visionary Company (1961), Blake's Apocalypse (1963), The Ringers in the Tower (1971), Poetry and Repression (1976) and The Breaking of The Vessels (1982).

Bloomfield, Robert (1766-1823)

Poet. Bloomfield was a working-class writer who persevered in the face of great hardship, writing and publishing his poetry. His most famous work is The Farmer's Boy (1800), which traced the life of an orphan rustic through the natural cycle of the seasons (> nature). Although this book sold around 26,000 copies, the income was insufficient to live on and Bloomfield died in poverty.

Bloomsbury Group, The

An exclusive intellectual circle that centred on the house of the publisher, Leonard Woolf, and his wife, the novelist, > Virginia Woolf, in the district of London round the British Museum, known as Bloomsbury. It flourished notably in the 1920s, and included, besides the Woolfs, the economist John Maynard Keynes, the biographer ➤ Lytton Strachey, the art critics Roger Fry and Clive Bell, and the painters Vanessa Bell and Duncan Grant, as well as others. The group owed much to the Cambridge philosopher > G. E. Moore and the importance he attached to the value of friendship and aesthetic appreciation. The close relationships which resulted from this, in addition to the fastidiousness which arose from their critical attitude to the prevailing culture of English society, gave them an apparent exclusiveness which made them many enemies (> Catherine Carswell). Moore's influence also contributed to their scepticism about religious tradition and social and political conventions; they tended to be moderately leftwing and agnostic. They were innovators in art and represented an important section of the English avant-garde. Their more constructive opponents attacked them for excessive selfcentredness and an aestheticism which was too individualistic and self-regarding to be really creative in social terms.

Blower, Elizabeth (b 1763) Novelist, born in Worcester. She took to writing to help support her family. She wrote four novels, The Parsonage House (1780), Features from Life: or A Summer Visit (1780), George Bateman (1782) and Maria (1785). They display humour and satire, as well as vivid characterization. Blower has been described as a direct predecessor of ▷ Jane Austen.

Bluestocking

The 'Blue Stocking Ladies' were a group of intelligent, literary women in the mid 18th century who held evening receptions for serious conversation. As a setting for discussions in which both sexes were included, the evenings were a deliberate attempt to challenge the social stereotypes which confined intellectual debate to male gatherings and relegated the female sex to trivial topics. By bringing men and women together in this atmosphere, it was hoped that the 'polite' codes of gallantry could be disposed of. The chief hostesses included > Elizabeth Montagu, Elizabeth Carter, > Mary Delany and later, > Hannah More.

The name 'bluestocking' is thought to derive from the stockings of Benjamin Stillingfleet, who, too poor to buy evening dress, attended in his daytime blue worsteds. > Hannah More's poem Bas Bleu (1786) helped to establish the use of the term as referring to the society women, although Admiral Boscawen is traditionally credited with coining the collective noun.

Blunden, Edmund (1896-1974)

Poet and critic, and author of one of the most famous books about World War I, Undertones of War (1928). His lyrical poetry produced during and just after that war is drawn especially from the English countryside, and its sincerity redeemed for many readers what was becoming a hackneyed convention of 'nature poetry'. His poetry was first published in the 1914 ➤ Georgian Poetry anthology. His literary studies, have been important especially for the 'Romantic' period, eg Life of Shelley, Charles Lamb and his Contemporaries; and he played a great part in editing and raising the reputation of the nineteenth-century poet John Clare. His best-remembered book now is probably Cricket Country (1944).

Blyton, Enid (1897-1968)

Writer for children. Blyton is one of the most famous and maligned children's novelists of the 20th century. She was phenomenally prolific, beginning with The Enid Blyton Book of Fairies (1924), writing school stories and the Famous Five sequence in the 1940s and 1950s, the Noddy stories in the 1950s and 1960s, as well as adaptations of classical and Uncle Remus stories, and non-fiction for children. Blyton's works are severely chastised by contemporary critics both on educational grounds (her works do not tax their young readers, their vocabulary is limited, their characters thin, and their plots simple-minded) and on political grounds (her writing is sexist, racist and nostalgic for a pre-war middle-class idyll). Despite this her novels continue to sell and most are still in print. Other works include: Naughty Amelia-Jane (1939); The Naughtiest Girl in the School (1940); Five on a Treasure Island (1942); First Term at Malory Towers (1946); Noddy and His Car (1951) and Noddy in Toyland (1955). Boccaccio, Giovanni (?1313-75)

Italian humanist scholar and writer, born near Florence. His literary studies began in Naples, where he wrote his first works, but he later returned to Florence and was employed on diplomatic missions for the Florentine state. He publicly lectured on ▷ Dante's ▷ Divine Comedy, was a friend of ▷ Petrarch and the centre of a circle of humanist learning and literary activity. His works included a wide range of courtly narratives, a vernacular imitation of classical ▷ epic and a number of important encyclopaedic works in Latin which occupied the last years of his life.

Boccaccio's collection of brief tragic-narratives in Latin (De Casibus Virorum Illustrium) was reworked in English by ▷ Lydgate in the 15th century and provided much material for the Elizabethan compilation of short tragic-narratives, the ▷ Mirror for Magistrates. Tales from the Decameron were included in William Painter's anthology ▷ The Palace of Pleasure, and many Elizabethan dramatists, including ▷ Shakespeare, quarried plots from either Painter's collection or from the Decameron itself. Bodichon, Barbara Leigh Smith (1827-1891) > Feminist and polemicist, born in London, the illegitimate daughter of a > Unitarian minister and a milliner's apprentice. She enrolled in the Ladies' College in Bedford Square in 1849 and chose to study art. Later in life her drawings and paintings were widely exhibited and sold for substantial amounts. Bodichon is best-known today as an active campaigner in the fight for > women's suffrage and legal reform. A Brief Summary in Plain Language of the Most Important Laws Concerning Women (1854) was a highly influential pamphlet that brought attention to women's powerlessness and lack of legal rights. In Women and Work (1857), she argued that all professions should be available to women, and in her two pamphlets on suffrage, Reasons for the Enfranchisement of Women (1866) and Objections to the Enfranchisement of Women Considered (1866), she argued lucidly for female voting rights, substantiating her points with empirical evidence she had collected. Bodichon was also concerned with ▷ education, setting up a radical school and assisting Emily Davies in establishing Girton College, Cambridge. She left £10,000 to Girton at her death. She was involved in the editing and production of The Englishwoman's Journal and published her American Diary in 1872. In this work she protested against the injustice she had seen in the American South during a trip there in 1857–8, and drew parallels between the position of slaves and the position of women.

Boethius, Ancius Manlius Torquatus Severinus (475–524)

Philosopher, scholar and statesman, born in Rome and educated at Athens and Alexandria. He wrote textbooks on logic and music, and was made consul in 510. His illustrious political career, as advisor to the Ostrogothic Emperor Theodoric, ended when he was accused of treason, imprisoned and executed in 524. While imprisoned, Boethius composed his most famous and influential work, De Consolatione Philosophiae (The Consolation of Philosophy). In this work, a first-person narrator who is also imprisoned recounts how he is tutored by Lady Philosophy to review his predicament and to understand the events and values of his life within a universal scheme. The text, composed in alternating verse and prose sections, deals with complex issues such as the relationship between divine foreknowledge and individual free will and was one of the most influential philosophical works of the medieval period, being translated into ▷ Old English by ▷ Alfred and later by ▷ Chaucer. The influence of Boethius pervades Chaucer's narratives. Another English translation from the Elizabethan period has been attributed to ▷ Elizabeth I. Bib: Watts, V. Bohemian

Applied to artists and those who live a life supposedly dedicated to the spirit of the imaginative arts, it means living freely, refusing to observe social conventions, especially when they depend on mere habit, snobbery or fear of 'seeming different'. It often carries a slightly mocking tone and is rarely used now without irony. Literally, Bohemian means native to Bohemia, now the western part of Czechoslovakia. In the 15th century gipsies were supposed to have come from there; in the 16th century, French students were supposed to live like the gipsies and hence to be 'Bohemian'. The word was then introduced into English with this meaning by the novelist

> William Makepeace Thackeray. His novel

The Newcomers is one of the first studies in English of Bohemianism.

Twentieth-century avant-garde movements have often been regarded as loosely 'bohemian' (eg ▷ the Bloomsbury Group), and the term is still in currency, used to describe a range of counter-cultural attributes and aspirations.

Boileau, Nicolas (1636-1711) French critic and poet. The ⊳ Earl of Rochester's Satyre Against Reason and Mankind broadly follows his Eighth Satire. Through his Art Poetique (The Poetic Art) (1674), based on ▶ Horace's Ars Poetica, and his translation of the Greek treatise On the Sublime, attributed to ➤ Longinus, he fostered in French literature the ideals of classical urbanity and regularity of form. He influenced > John Dryden, who revised a translation of his Art Poetique, and ▷ Alexander Pope, whose ▷ Essay on Criticism was partly based on it, and whose > The Rape of the Lock owes something to the French poet's mock-epic, Le Lutrin, In the Romantic and Victorian periods Boileau's name became synonymous with stifling (and foreign) neo-classical decadence.

Bold Stroke for a Wife, A (1718) Play by ➤ Susannah Centlivre, the only one for which she claims to have used no sources but her own invention. Anne Lovely has four guardians, all of whom must give their consent before she can marry: Sir Philip Modelove, an 'old Beau', who cares only for French fashions, and loves operas, balls and masques; Periwinkle, a 'silly half-witted Fellow . . fond of everything antique and foreign', who dresses in the fashions of the previous century; Tradelove, a broker and cheat; and Obadiah Prim, a 'very rigid Quaker'. Colonel Fainwell is in love with Lovely, and sets out to win her by approaching each of the guardians in various disguises, and with various feigned schemes. One of his characters, Simon Pure, has given the phrase 'the real simon pure' to the English language. The means by which Fainwell succeeds in his plan forms the chief interest of the action. The play provides a wonderful vehicle for a versatile actor: three members of the Bullock family were in the original production, and many other renowned actors, including > John Philip Kemble and Charles Kemble (1775-1854), have played the part of Fainwell. A Bold Stroke for a Wife achieved great popularity and became a stock item in the English repertory, surviving until the last quarter of the 19th century. It was acted in command performances before George II and George III.

Bolingbroke, Henry (1367–1413) Duke of Hereford, son of John of Gaunt, who deposed his cousin, ▷ Richard II, to become King ▷ Henry IV.

Bolingbroke, Henry St John (1678–1751)
Tory politician, and writer chiefly on political matters. He favoured the ▷ Stuart (Jacobite) succession on the death of ▷ Queen Anne in 1714, and when the Whigs took power and the Hanoverian George I was declared king, he was impeached. He fled to the court of the Pretender in France, but in 1723 was pardoned and returned to England. He became a friend of ▷ Alexander Pope and his rationalist, Deist views strongly influenced the ▷ Essay on Man which is addressed to him. In 1749 he published The Idea of a Patriot King, which argued that the king's role should be as a national leader, above the corruption of politics.

Deism.

Bolt, Robert (b 1924-1994)

British dramatist and screenwriter whose first major success was with the > Chekhovian Flowering Cherry (1957). This was followed by A Man for All Seasons (1960), a play about the life of Sir Thomas More, which has some superficial resemblances to the style of ⊳ Brecht, such as the use of a common man figure who plays a variety of roles in the play. However, the audience is not encouraged to maintain a critical distance from the action in the manner of Brecht nor are the particular historical circumstances of More's life explored in any detail. Bolt is primarily concerned with More's conflict between his commitment to himself, to his own sense of integrity, and his commitment to society, a theme which is common in his work. Other plays include: The Tiger and the Horse (1960); Gentle Jack (1963); Vivat! Vivat Regina! (1970); State of Revolution (1977). Film scripts: Lawrence of Arabia (1962); Dr Zhivago (1965); A Man for All Seasons (1967); Ryan's Daughter (1970); Lady Caroline Lamb (1972); The Bounty (1984); The Mission (1986). Bond, Edward (b 1934)

Dramatist. Notorious for a scene in Saved (1965) in which a baby is stoned to death. Bond has consistently written from a Marxist perspective, and argues that the shock of such violent images is necessary to represent the violence that is done to people by capitalism.

Born in London, Bond left school at fourteen, worked in factories and offices, writing plays in his spare time, and sending them to the Royal Court. Saved, developed with the Writer's group at the Court, was instrumental in ridding British theatre of the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain. The theatre's attempt to stage the play under club conditions led to a prosecution which showed that such conditions did not offer any protection from censorship. In 1968, The Theatres Act abolished the powers of the Lord Chamberlain, and Saved and Narrow Road to the Deep North (1968) were toured throughout Europe under the auspices of the British Council.

Saved is a difficult play to watch; dealing with a community of young people in South London it charts their desperate and violent lives. Its first performance at the Royal Court provoked extreme, and extremely polarised, reactions. The Daily Telegraph critic reported 'cold disgust' and horror at the scene in which a group of men stone a baby to death (and was not alone in his reaction), while other critics and writers greeted the power of Bond's writing and imagery with acclaim. It is not only that scene which makes the play so harrowing; in one section, the baby wails unrelentingly while no one on stage responds to its cries, and the audience has to physically experience the frustration and apathy of the play's characters.

Many of Bond's plays offer radical rereadings of historical events, texts and figures that are commonly held as a source of national pride: Bingo (1973) confronts the dving and unheroic Shakespeare and ➤ Ben Jonson. The Fool (1975) is about the 'peasant poet' > John Clare. Bond has described his reworking of ➤ Shakespeare's King Lear in Lear (1972) as 'an attack on Stalinism, as seen as a danger to Western revolution, and on bourgeois culture as expressed in Shakespeare's Lear'. He has consistently spoken out for political causes; Black Mass (1970) was written for the Anti-Apartheid movement; Stone (1976) for Gav Sweatshop; Passion (1971) was commissioned by the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

In recent years he has insisted on directing his own new work, with the perhaps predictable result that his uniquely trenchant voice has been less widely heard. His works include: The Pope's Wedding (1962); Narrow Road to the Deep North (1968); Lear (1971); The Sea (1973); Bingo (1974); The Fool (1976); The Bundle and The Woman (both 1978); Restoration (1981); The War Plays (1985).

Bonhote, Elizabeth (1744-1818)

Novelist and poet. Bonhote was an unadventurous novelist and it was perhaps the very conservative nature of her narratives and themes which made her one of ▷ Minerva's best-selling authors. The settings are often rural and, in Bungay Castle (1796), historicized; in addition, there is always a strong ▷ didactic moral at the end of the tale. Her unquestioning acceptance of traditional and conventional values is emphasized in her collection of essays, The Parental Monitor (1788), which contains advice for her children. Interestingly, however, while she advocates that women should stay at home and look after their families, she encourages them to write and not to be diverted from literary pursuits.

Book of the Duchess

➤ Chaucer's dream poem, written in octosyllabic couplets, which commemorates Blanche of Lancaster, the first wife of ▶ John of Gaunt. The date of the poem is uncertain but it is one of Chaucer's early works and seems likely to have been composed some time between 1368 (the date of Blanche's dealt) and 1372. Chaucer drew on the work of contemporary French poets, especially > Jean Froissart and Guillaume de Machaut, for its material and form. The lovelorn narrator/dreamer relates how he falls asleep, having read the story of Ceyx and Alcyone as bedtime reading. He follows a hunting party in his dream-scape and, in the heart of a wood, meets a lovelorn knight, dressed in black, whom he finds lamenting the loss of his lady. In response to questions from the dreamer, the Black knight recounts the history of his courtship of his lady White, and is finally prompted to reveal, in plain terms, that she has died. At this point, the dreamer and the knight begin to move out of the wood towards the knight's castle; a bell strikes 12; the dreamer awakes, book in hand, vowing to preserve his dream experience in a literary form.

The name of the lady celebrated in the poem, 'White', obviously recalls that of Blanche of Lancaster, and various punning references are made in the text to John of Gaunt's position as Earl of Richmond and Duke of Lancaster. In the Prologue to Chaucer's > Legend of Good Women, this > dream-vision poem is listed among Chaucer's works as 'the Deeth of Blaunche the Duchesse'.

Booth, Barton (?1679-1733)

Actor, manager, poet: the leading tragic actor of his generation. Booth became interested in the theatre while performing in a play at Westminster School, and afterwards joined the profession. In 1709 he became the leading tragic actor at > Drury Lane, but in the following year, after a quarrel about the distribution of management duties in the company, he helped lead a break-in to the premises which turned into a violent affray. The dispute was revived in a different form in 1713, with Booth insisting on sharing in the company's management, a position he won only after action in court. In his new position of power he was able to take on major new roles including King Lear, Jaffeir in ➤ Thomas Otway's ➤ Venice Preserv'd and Timon of Athens.

An admirer of ➤ Thomas Betterton, Booth is said to have imitated him – lapsing, at worst, into a monotonous intoning style of delivery; he is reported to have lacked the capacity for humour in his performances. At his best he acted with great dignity and grace, while also possessing fiery qualities enabling him to perform such roles as Othello and Hotspur with passion.

Booth, Hester (?1690-1773)

Actress and dancer. Hester Booth (née Santlow) began her career as a dancer at ▷ Drury Lane in 1706, moving to the ▷ Queen's Theatre, Haymarket, in 1708. She began acting in the following year, with the role of Prue in ▷ Congreve's ▷ Love for Love. Thereafter she played a variety of comic and serious roles, major and lesser. She married ▷ Barton Booth in 1719 and left the stage around 1733, the year of her husband's death. Theatre-goers admired her more for her dancing than for her acting, commenting on its smoothness, and her interpretative abilities as a dancer.

Boothby, Frances (fl 1669)

English Restoration dramatist, whose tragicomedy Marcelia: or the Treacherous Friend (1670) was performed before ▷ Alpha Behn's plays – at the Theatre Royal, in 1669. It is her only known work. The plot concerns misapprehensions and deceits in love, initiated by the king's desire for a new lover, Opening, 'I'm hither come, but what d'ye think to say? / A Womans Pen presents you with a Play,' it goes on to make great play of leaving the stage, returning only to express great surprise that the audience is still there despite female authorship. The tragicomic denouement restores stability to the original relationships.

▶ Polwhele, Elizabeth.

Borges, Jorge Luis (1899-1986)

Argentinian short-story writer, poet and essayist, born in Buenos Aires and educated in Geneva. His paradoxical, metaphysical stories, which employ elements of the ▷ detective story, of ▷ science fiction, of fantasy and of philosphical speculation, helped to define the genre of ➤ magic realism, although this was not a term he himself favoured. Notable collections are: A Universal History of Infamy (1935), Fictions (1945), Labyrinths (1953) and Doctor Brodie's Report (1971). Such stories as 'The Library of Babel' (in Fictions), which imagines the universe as a vast library, amount to existential fables, while others, such as 'The Golden of Forking Paths' (in the same collection) are more like puzzles.

Borough

One of the synonyms of 'town', used specifically for a town'which has been incorporated and given privileges of limited self-government; also used until the 20th century for a town with the right to elect a Member of Parliament.

Most constituencies had remained unchanged since the > Middle Ages; in consequence, some towns had grown to great size with inadequate representation in Parliament, or none at all, while others were represented by more than one Member although they had sunk into insignificance or even, in a few cases, had ceased to exist. This meant great power for the landed aristocracy, and great deprivation of power for the large and growing middle class. Some boroughs ('towns' - but often mere villages) were called 'pocket boroughs' because they were virtually owned by one landlord, who had them 'in his pocket', ie caused them to elect the Members of his choice; others were called 'rotten boroughs' because few inhabitants possessed the right to vote, and they were easily and habitually bribed. The law of 1832 redistributed Members of Parliament so as to correspond to the great centres of population, but limited the franchise (right to vote) to those who possessed a level of income such as ensured that electors belonged at least to the middle class.

Borrow, George Henry (1803-81)

Born in Norfolk, Borrow was educated in Edinburgh and Norwich as his father, a recruiting officer in the militia, moved around. Borrow was articled to solicitors in Norfolk 1818-23, then when his father died he moved to London and worked for a publisher. He travelled in France, Germany, Russia, the East and Spain 1833-9, sending letters to the Morning Herald 1837-9, blazing a trail as effectively the first newspaper correspondent. In 1835 he published in St Petersburg Targum, translations from 30 different languages and dialects. In Russia and Spain he was an agent for the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1840 he married Mary Clarke, the widow of a naval officer he met in Spain, and bought an estate on Oulton Broad in Norfolk, in which he had already inherited a share. There he allowed gipsies to pitch tents and live, and became friends with them. His books are in part based on his life. The Bible in Spain (1834) and The Zincali or an account of the Gypsies in Spain (1841) owed as much of their success to public interest in Borrow the man as Borrow the writer. Lavengro followed in 1851, losing Borrow much of his popularity due to its strong 'anti-gentility' tone. The Romany Rye (1857) and Wild Wales (1862) continued the mixture of fact with fiction, vivid portraits and revelations of the personality of the writer. He died largely unknown and little read.

Bosola

Bostonians, The (1886)

A novel by Henry James serialized in The Century Magazine from 1885-6. It is a satirical study of the movement for female emancipation in New England. Basil Ransom, a young lawyer from the South up on business in Boston makes the acquaintance of his two cousins, Olive Chancellor, an ardent feminist, and her widowed sister, Mrs Lune, who is attracted to him. Olive introduces Basil to Miss Birdseye, an altruistic philanthopist, at a suffragette meeting where a beautiful young woman, Verena Tarrant, gives an inspired and arresting speech. Both Basil and Olive are immediately drawn to Verena. She is persuaded to share Olive's luxurious home and is groomed by Olive to become a leader of the > feminist cause and to give up all marital aspirations. However, Basil falls in love with Verena and attempts to remove her from Olive's influence, thereby causing a split between himself and his cousin. The death of Miss Birdseye robs Verena of confidence in her purpose and Basil's appearance at the first of her series of lectures causes her to lose her nerve. Forced to choose she rejects the bitterly disappointed Olive and accepts Basil's proposal of marriage. A brilliantly sustained and complex novel, many critics place it second only to > The Portrait of a Lady in James oeuvre.

Boswell, James (1740-95)

Best known for his biography of ➤ Samuel Johnson whom he met in 1763, Boswell was also a copious diarist. Eldest son of Alexander Boswell, Lord Auchinleck, Boswell studied law at Edinburgh, Glasgow and Utrecht, and reluctantly entered the legal profession.

From 1760 onwards, Boswell published many pamphlets, often anonymously. After meeting

Johnson, he travelled in Europe, where he met ➤ Rousseau and ➤ Voltaire. Rousseau fired him with enthusiasm for the cause of Corsican liberty, and he cultivated a lifelong friendship with General Paoli; in 1768 he published an Account of Corsica, which attracted considerable international recognition.

In 1769 Boswell, by now a Scottish advocate, married his cousin Margaret Montgomerie. But Boswell longed to be part of London literary culture, and made journeys to the capital as frequently as he could. Here he was elected a member of ▷ The Club, though his habit of 'scribbling' memoranda of conversations, with the aim of writing Johnson's Life, irritated some of its members.

In 1773, Boswell and Johnson made their tour of the Hebrides (see ▷ The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides). From 1777 to 1783 Boswell wrote a series of articles for the London Magazine under the pen-name of 'The Hypochondriack'. In 1782 he inherited the Scottish estate on his father's death, and his last meeting with Johnson was in 1784.

Boswell attempted, unsuccessfully, to make a career in politics, while working on the Life of Samuel Johnson, which appeared in 1791.

Bottom, Nick

A comic character in > Shakespeare's > A Midsummer Night's Dream. He is a weaver, and the most prominent of the 'Athenian artisans'.

Boucicault, Dion[ysus] (1820–96)

Dramatist and actor. Greatly admired as an actor in Britain and the U.S.A., Boucicault was a wideranging and prolific dramatist who wrote nearly 150 original plays and adaptations, operettas, pantomimes and melodramas (including sixteen plays in one year). The flood was aided by reworking to suit new audiences: The Streets of London and The Streets of Liverpool are almost identical to The Poor of New York (1857). Many of his plays offer opportunities for spectacle: the burning of a Mississippi steamer in The Octorron (1859) or, in Arrah-na-Pogue (1864), the whole scene sinking slowly as the hero climbs an ivy-clad turret to seize the villain and hurl him to his death. Though melodramas like The Vampire (1852) follow the pattern for the genre, his work shows careful construction and keen observation. The Octoroon was one of the first plays in which an American black slave was treated seriously and the social themes which often attracted him prefigured later dramas about the common people. His Irish plays, such as The Shaughraun (1874), provided fine vehicles for himself but, though he fought to establish copyright for dramatists in the U.S.A. and was the first to receive a royalty instead of a flat fee, he died an impoverished teacher of acting in New York. His plays are revived regularly in Ireland and a 1975 > RSC production of London Assurance, his 1841 society comedy, restored it to the modern repertory.

Bow Street

In London; Covent Garden Opera House is in Bow Street. The chief Magistrates' Court in London has been situated there since 1735, when it opened in the house of the first Bow Street Magistrate. His successor, the novelist ➤ Henry Fielding, was given a house in Bow Street separate from the court-house. Fielding was exceptionally successful as a Magistrate in ridding London of its crime. He and his brother established the Bow Street Runners, the predecessors of the Metropolitan Police.

Bowdler, Henrietta Maria (1753-1830) Religious writer and editor. Henrietta, or Harriet as she is better known, came from a literary family and was encouraged to write from an early age. Although her Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity (1801, > Sermons) were published anonymously they ran to almost fifty editions and so impressed the Bishop of London that he attempted to find out the identity of the author so as to offer 'him' a parish. Although Harriet can hardly be commended for her editorial activity, she has the singular honour of expurgating > Shakespeare's plays before her more famous brother, > Thomas Bowdler. Her most interesting fictional work is the novel, Pen Tamar, or The History of an Old Maid (1831) which is a curious combination of praise and harsh ridicule of women who have chosen not to marry. She may be linked with the ▷ Bluestockings and attacked Hester Piozzi (➤ Mrs Thrale) for marrying.

Bowdler, Thomas (1754-1825)

Famous for The Family Shakespeare, 1818; an edition in which 'those words and expressions are omitted which cannot with propriety be read aloud in a family'. He later published an edition of ▷ Gibbon's ▷ Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire similarly expurgated. From these we get the word 'bowdlerize' = to expurgate.

▶ Bowdler, Henrietta Maria; Shakespeare.

Bowen, Elizabeth (1899-1973)

Novelist and short-story writer. Born in Dublin and educated in England, she worked in a Dublin hospital during World War I, and for the Ministry of Information in London during World War II. Her novels are concerned with themes of innocence and sophistication, the effect of guilt and of the past on present relationships, and the damaging consequences of coldness and deceit. Her portrayal of the inner life of female characters and her symbolic use of atmosphere and environment show the influence of ⊳ Virginia Woolf, as does the structure of her first novel, The House in Paris (1935). Her treatment of childhood and youthful innocence owes something to the work of ➤ Henry James, especially in The Death of the Heart (1938), where Bowen narrates the story partly through the consciousness of a young girl. Bowen powerfully conveyed the atmosphere of World War II London during the Blitz, and the emotional dislocation resulting from the war, both in The Heat of the Day (1949) and in short stories such as 'In The Square' and 'Mysterious Kôr' (in The Demon Lover, 1945). Her other novels are: The Hotel (1927); The Last September (1929); A World of Love (1955); Eva Trout (1969). Other story collections include: The Cat Jumps (1934); Look at all those Roses (1941); A Day in the Dark (1965). Bowles, Caroline (1787–1854)

Poet and prose writer. Bowles was fortunate enough to have sufficient private income to enable her to devote her life to literature, and she initially consolidated this freedom by refusing to marry. Her poetry was published anonymously for over twenty years, sometimes in ▷ Blackwood's Magazine, where she was commonly known only as 'C'. Her poetic works consist of Ellen FitzArthur: a metrical tale (1820), The Widow's Tale (1820), Tales of the Factories (1833) and The Birthday (1836), and she is also well-known for her prose tales, Chapters on Churchyards (1829). The titles of these works reflect their sentimental nature, which gained her a reputation as a 'pathetic' writer. Her literary output ceased, however, in 1839 when she married > Robert Southey and simultaneously lost her annuity, which had been dependent upon her remaining single. Bowles and Southey had, however, built a strong friendship based on a twenty-year correspondence, and when he became seriously ill in 1839 she married him and acted as his nurse until he died in 1843.

Bowles, William Lisle (1762–1850)
Poet and clergyman; ultimately chaplain to the Prince Regent. His Sonnets (1789), sentimental effusions delivered in the person of 'the wanderer', were extremely popular, and revived interest in the sonnet form. > Samuel Taylor Coleridge and > Robert Southey were impressed by them. The preface to his edition of > Alexander Pope (1806) took its critical stance from his former teacher at Winchester, > Joseph Warton, and prompted Lord Byron's 'Letter on W. L. Bowles' Strictures on Pope' (1821).

Bowtell (Boutell, Bootell), Elizabeth (c 1650-97)

Actress. Born Elizabeth Ridley she joined the ➤ King's Company at ➤ Bridges Street Theatre about 1670, afterwards specializing in the playing of 'breeches' parts, although her most famous role was as Queen Statira in ➤ Nathaniel Lee's The Rival Queens (1677). During one performance a quarrel between her and ➤ Elizabeth Barry, who was appearing in the play as Roxana, degenerated into genuine violence on stage. The dispute arose over the possession of a prized prop (a veil). Required to stab Statira on stage, Barry as Roxana lunged at her with such force that she pierced her flesh 'about a Quarter of an Inch', according to a near contemporary. Bowtell retired in 1696.

Boys' Own Paper

A weekly magazine for boys, founded in 1879 and published by the Religious Tract Society. It ran until 1967, reached a circulation around 250,000 and published adventure stories, often with imperialist themes, as well as essays, letters, puzzles, and competitions.

Bracegirdle, Anne (1663-1748)

Actress, singer. She came into the Bettertons' (▷ Betterton, Thomas; ▷ Betterton, Mary) household as a sort of surrogate daughter in about 1688 and in that year she became a member of the > United Company, playing a succession of roles in contemporary plays, as well as speaking prologues and epilogues for many of them. In 1693 Bracegirdle acted in ➤ William Congreve's first play, ➤ The Old Bachelor. By the following year she had become a leading member of the United Company, but in 1695 she joined Betterton and Elizabeth Barry in seceding from the company to form a separate troupe at ➤ Lincoln's Inn Fields. There she played the first Angelica in Congreve's ➤ Love for Love, and in 1700 Millamant - a part written for her by Congreve - in > The Way of the World. Congreve was among a number of prominent men who courted or admired her from a distance.

Throughout her life Bracegirdle was celebrated for her supposed virtue, some of the comments being possibly ironic. She was lauded for her abilities in both comic and tragic acting modes, her style in the latter tending towards pathos, as well as for her beauty, charm, and generosity toward fellow-performers and those in need. She was buried at Westminster Abbey.

Bradbury, Malcolm (b 1932)

Novelist and critic. His novels include: Eating People is Wrong (1959); Stepping Westward (1965); The History Man (1975); Rates of Exchange (1983); and Cuts (1987). These are witty, satirical portraits of the four decades since 1950; the first three use university settings to epitomize the changing moral and political situation of western liberalism. He is often compared to > Kingsley Amis for his hilarious send-ups of academic habits and pretensions, but Bradbury also has a fascination with the idea of fictionality, which he sees as central to the contemporary understanding of reality. His works are therefore informed by current critical theory (a feature which they share with the novels of > David Lodge). Rates of Exchange draws on ▶ structuralist theories, has an eastern European setting, and a somewhat harsher tone than Bradbury's earlier work, in an attempt to register the atmosphere of the 1980s. The title of Cuts refers to both cuts in funding and film cutting, and the novel portrays Tory Britain in the mid 1980s through the story of a collision between an academic and a woman television executive. Bradbury has taught on the successful creative writing postgraduate course at the University of East Anglia, which has included among its graduates ▶ Ian McEwan and ▶ Kazuo Ishiguro.

Braddon, Mary Elizabeth (1835-1015) The daughter of a solicitor and privately educated, Braddon was the author of over 80 novels, twenty of which were written between 1861 and 1871, and was dubbed by her publisher the 'Queen of the Circulating Libraries'. She was born in London and brought up by her mother, who left her husband when Mary was three. In 1856 Braddon began writing in order to support the family, the impulse also behind her taking to the stage under the name Mary Seyton. She met the publisher John Maxwell, whose wife was in a asylum, in 1860 and lived with him until they were able to marry in 1874. Her writing helped to support the five children of Maxwell's first marriage and the six from their own liaison (one of whom died in infancy). Her fourth novel, > Lady Audley's Secret (1862), was first serialized in Robin Goodfellow and The Sixpenny Magazine, and was a sensational best-seller: a melodramatic. lurid tale of criminality and sexual passion which shocked readers by representing its deviant heroine as an angelic-looking blonde. > Margaret Oliphant described Braddon as 'the inventor of the fair-haired demon of modern fiction'. Other novels include Aurora Floyd (1863), The Doctor's Wife (1864), Henry Dunbar (1864), Ishmael (1884) and The Infidel (1900). In addition to prolific novel writing, Braddon also wrote nine plays and edited several London magazines including Belgravia (1866) and The Mistletoe Bough (1878-92).

Bradley, F.H. (Francis Herbert) (1846–1924) Brother of A.C. Bradley (1851–1935), the literary critic. He was himself an eminent philisopher, author of Ethical Studies (1876); Principles of Logic (1883); Appearances and Reality (1893), and Essay on Truth and Reality (1914). His position philosophically was an idealist one, and in this he has been opposed by most British philosophers ever since, beginning with G.E. Moore (1873–1958). Bradley, however, had a strong influence on T.S. Eliot (1888–1965), the poet and former philosophy student, whose early thesis on him was published in 1963.

Bradstreet, Anne (1612-72)

Poet. Bradstreet's poetic writings are noteworthy not only because she was a woman writing at a time when female authorship was actively discouraged, but also because she was one of the first poets, of either sex, to write in America. Hence, her work is included in collections of 17th-century women poets (Kissing the Rod, ed. G. Greer (1988)), as well as amongst 'The Poets of America' (The World Split Open, ed. L. Bernikow (1984)). She was born into the strongly Puritan Dudley family and for the first 18 years of her life lived in England. She received a thorough education, reading the works of ⊳ Edmund Spenser and ⊳ Sir Philip Sidney, and at 16 married Simon Bradstreet. The persecution of radical Puritanism determined Bradstreet's father, Thomas Dudley, to emigrate to the New World, where he, with many others of his sect, hoped to practise their religion freely. In March 1630 the family set sail on the Arbella and in June landed in Massachusetts. Like many of the settlers, the Dudleys and Bradstreets were dogged with ill health and economic hardship, and Anne herself probably suffered from tuberculosis. Yet in spite of bouts of sickness, having eight children, and several moves to increasingly remote settlements, she constantly wrote poetry. At first her work was > epic in nature, focusing upon political events such as the ➤ Civil War, or on spiritual concerns such as the Second Coming of Christ. The latter theme occurs in The Four Monarchies, which is loosely based upon > Sir Walter Ralegh's The History of the World. The Four Ages of Man is another 'quaternion' and follows Joshua Sylvester's translations of > Du Bartas. Both are included in The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung up in America (1650), which was published in London, without Bradstreet's knowledge, by her brother-in-law, John Woodbridge. After the death of her father and the birth of her last child (c 1652) Bradstreet's poems take on a more personal and contemplative tone, and these are the poems by which she is best known today. They are beautiful ➤ lyrics which address the problems of piety, marital love and parental duty; they also include accounts of actual events in her life. These later poems were published posthumously, together with a second edition of The Tenth Muse, as Several Poems (1678).

Braine, John (b 1922-1986)

Novelist. His most famous novels are Room at the Top (1957; filmed 1958) and Life at the Top (1962; filmed 1965). Both of these deal with the new kinds of social mobility and anxiety. characteristic of Britain since World War II, and led to him being thought of as one of the > 'angry young men' of the 1950s. Like the heroes of his novels, however, he has become progressively more conservative in his attitudes. Other novels are: The Vodi (1959); The Jealous God (1964); The Crying Game (1968); Stay with me till Morning (1970); The Queen of a Distant Country (1972); The Pious Agent (1975); Waiting For Sheila (1976); The Only Game in Town (1976); Finger of Fire (1977); One and Last Love (1981); The Two of Us (1984); These Golden Days (1985). > Realism.

Brandon, Katherine (1520-80)

Letter-writer. Katherine Brandon, Duchess of Suffolk is notable both for her own letters (which may be seen in the Public Record Office, London) and for her role as a patron. The letters are personal and colloquial, covering concerns of faith as well as the duties of parents to their children; she believed, for example, that young people should be allowed to marry for love. As part of ▷ Katherine Parr's Puritan circle she came under threat during the trial of ▷ Anne Askew, and she lived on the continent during Queen Mary's reign.

Brathwaite, E. R. (b 1912) Novelist and autobiographer. Born in Guyana, most of Brathwaite's writing is concerned with his working life in Britain in the 1950s and 1960s. His most successful work (which was turned into a popular film), To Sir, With Love (1959), is concerned with his experiences as a black teacher in London, and other semi-autobiographical novels have discussed his social work and time in the RAF. He is the author of: Paid Servant (1962); Reluctant Neighbours (1972); A Kind of Homecoming (1962) and A Choice of Straws (1967).

Bray, Anna Eliza (1790-1883) Novelist. Born in Newington, Surrey, she married the artist Charles Alfred Stothard in 1818. Her first published work, Letters Written During a Tour Through Normandy, Brittany and Other Parts of France appeared in 1820. This volume recorded travels with her husband, who died in an accident in 1821. Anna married the Rev. Edward Bray in 1822, and from 1826 to 1874 published fourteen novels, as well as historical biographies and descriptive sketches. In fiction, she favoured historical > romances set in the English countryside. These were extremely popular in their day, though some literary critics considered them out of date. She is best-known for her series of letters to Robert Southey, A Description of that Part of Devonshire Bordering on the Tamar and the Tary (1836). Subjects of her biographies include Handel (1857) and Joan of Arc (1874). She also wrote a non-fictional work for children, A Peep at the Pixies, or, Legends of the West (1854). > Children's literature; Travel writing.

Brecht, Bertolt (1898-1956)

One of the most significant theatre practitioners and theorists of the 20th century. His work has had a major influence on British drama since the late 1950s. Brecht's early plays were written shortly after World War I and were influenced by the Expressionist movement. From the mid-1920s he became interested in applying Marxist (Marx, Karl) ideas to plays and performance and developed his concept of > 'epic theatre'. The essential characteristic of 'epic', as Brecht used the term, was the creation of a critical distance (Verfremdungseffekt) bètween the audience and the performance on stage (and a similar critical distance between the actor/actress and the role he or she performed). The purpose of this was to prevent empathy and encourage audiences instead to reflect on the relationship between social conditions and human action, in such a way that they would recognize their power and agency in the process of history. Brecht was forced to leave his native Germany during the Nazi era and continued writing in exile in Europe and later

America. After World War II he returned to Germany and formed the Berliner Ensemble company in East Berlin, where he directed a number of his plays written in exile. The Berliner Ensemble first visited London in 1956 and performed three of Brecht's plays: Mother Courage and her Children, Drums and Trumpets and The Caucasian Chalk Circle. Other plays include: Baal (1918); Man is Man (1926); The Threepenny Opera (1928; with music by Kurt Weill); The Measures Taken (1930); St Joan of the Stockyards (1932); The Seven Deadly Sins (1933; with Kurt Weill); The Resistible Rise of Arturo Ui (1941); The Life of Galileo (1943); The Good Person of Szechwan (1943). Breeze, Jean Binta (b 1957)

Poet. Born in Jamaica, Jean Binta Breeze now lives and works in London, writing and performing live her vibrant form of dub poetry. Her works are collected in Riddym Ravings and Other Poems (1988), and in the collection of the new british poetry (ed. G. Allnutt et al.). See also Breeze's essay 'Can a Dub Poet be a Woman?' in Women: A Cultural Review (April 1990).

Brenton, Howard (b 1942)

British left-wing dramatist, strongly influenced by ▷ Brecht, who has worked with both ▷ fringe and mainstream theatre companies since the late 1960s. His iconoclastic plays have frequently caused controversy, particularly when they have been staged at major theatres. He began writing for the Combination, at Brighton, and The Portable Theatre, a touring company.

Recently he has worked at the ▷ National Theatre despite his having expressed doubts in the past about the value of such 'establishment' institutions. Major plays are: Magnificence, a ▷ Royal Court success in 1973; Brassneck (1973), a collaboration with ▷ David Hare; The Churchill Play (1974); Weapons of Happiness (1974); Epsom Downs (1977); Romains in Britain (1978); The Genius (1983); Bloody Poetry (1984); Pravda (1985), also a collaboration with David Hare; Greenland (1988).

Breton, André (1896-1966)

French poet, founder of Surrealism, which he launched in 1924 with the first Surrealist Manifesto. Prior to this, Breton had met both the poet Guillaume Apollinaire (during 1917–18) and ▷ Sigmund Freud (in 1921), both of whom provided inspiration for the movement. In 1919, he published his first collection of poems, Mont de piété, and in the same year he collaborated with Philippe Soupault on his first properly Surrealist text, Les Champs magnétiques, which preceded the official launch of Surrealism. Between 1919 and 1921, he participated in the Dadaist movement. although it was his initiative to hold in Paris the international congress which led to the breakup of Dada. Believing firmly in the radicalism of Surrealism, Breton resisted any attempt to make the movement subservient to an established political creed. In Légitime Défense (1926), he rejected any form of control, even Marxist control, of the psychic life and, by contrast with other members of the movement, this was to lead to his break with communism in 1935. After the war, Breton continued to campaign vigorously on behalf of Surrealist radicalism. He opposed Albert Camus' (1913-60) thesis, as expounded in L'Homme révolté (1952) that revolt has its limitations, and a year before his death organized a final Surrealist exhibition, L'Ecart absolu, which aimed to challenge the consumer society. Breton contributed to Surrealist writing not only by the three manifestoes (1924, 1930, 1934) and other polemical writing, but also by numerous collections of poetry and prose, the original editions of which were usually illustrated by leading artists connected with Surrealism. Breton Lays

A rather misleading term used by critics to refer to a group of Old French and Middle English verse narratives which claim to derive their story-material from a pre-Saxon, British literary tradition. It would be more accurate to call these texts British lays, rather than Breton lays, for the narratives claim descent from British, not specifically Breton, origins. > Marie de France, writing in the late 12th century for audiences, it seems, in England and France, claims to be the first writer to produce a collection of these verse narratives, and the first vernacular writer to mediate between the old, oral-poetic traditions of the Britons (which Marie suggests had musical accompaniments) and contemporary literary traditions. Some shared themes, settings and protagonists can be traced in her story-collection. Her lays characteristically focus around emotional crises of some kind; the events are often located in Britain or Brittany; and the action tends to involve some interplay between human and otherworldly forces and places. Yet the structural patterns of the narratives vary (and may coincide with those of > romances), so it is the claim to British origins which gives this group of narratives their identity, not their narrative structure. > Chaucer's > Franklin claims to present a British lay as his contribution to the ▷ Canterbury Tales.

Breton, Nicholas (?1545-?1626)

Poet, miscellanist, pamphleteer. Little is known of the life of Nicholas Breton - a curious irony in that he was one of the most prolific writers of the > Renaissance period. Still, we do know that he was the son of a wealthy London merchant, but that on his father's death his mother married > George Gascoigne, who quickly spent Breton's inheritance. Between 1575 and his death he published over 30 individual collections of verse, three prose fictions and at least 25 ⊳ pamphlets and miscellaneous works. From the evidence of the number of times certain of his works were reprinted (in particular his A Post with a Mad Packet of Letters, first published in 1602) there is the suggestion that, on occasions, he was able to secure an audience. Indeed, although he never received the court preferment he desired, he did obtain patronage from ➤ Mary Sidney. Bib: Robertson, J., Poems by Breton.

Bridges, Robert Seymour (1844-1930) Poet and dramatist. He was Poet Laureate from 1913-30. After medical training and work as a consultant at Great Ormond Street Children's Hospital, Bridges turned his energies fully to poetry in 1882. His first volume of verse was published in 1873, after which he wrote prolifically: his collected Poetical Works (1936), excluding eight dramas, are in six volumes. He was a fine > classical scholar and in his experiments with classical rhythms, was something of an innovator. His most ambitious work was the long, philosophical The Testament of Beauty, which appeared in five parts from 1927 to 1929. Other works include: Shorter Poems (1890); The Spirit of Man (1916) and New Verse (1925). He was the chief correspondent and literary executor of the poet > Gerard Manley Hopkins; the latter developed his poetic theories through their letters. A selection of Bridge's work, Poetry and Prose, has been edited by John Sparrow.

Bridges-Adams, William (1889–1965)
Director of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre in Stratford-on-Avon from 1919 to 1934, during which time he directed 29 of ▷ Shakespeare's plays. His productions were influenced by the work of ▷ Harley Granville Barker. Unlike his predecessor, Frank Benson, he did not act in his own productions and aimed for: 'The virtues of the Elizabethan theatre without its vices, and its freedom without its fetters: scenic splendour where helpful, but...the play to be given as written: the text unmutilated whether in the interests of the stage carpenter or the leading man.'

Bridie, James (1888-1951)

Pseudonym of Dr Osborne Henry Mavor. He was a successful playwright during the 1930s and 1940s and part-founder of the Citizen's Theatre in Glasgow. He wrote 42 plays, many of which were performed on the London stage. He was sometimes compared to ▷ George Bernard Shaw for his prolific output and range of subject matter. His best-known plays today are The Anatomist and Tobias and the Angel (both 1930), Jonah and the Whale (1932), A Sleeping Clergyman (1933), Colonel Wotherspoon (1934), The Black Eye (1935), Storm in a Teacup (1936), Mr Bolfry (1943), Dr. Angelus (1947) and Daphne Laureola (1949).

Brighton Rock (1938)

One of the best-known novels by > Graham Greene. Set in Brighton, it combines elements of the thriller with the moral and religious themes prominent in Greene's later work. The story of murder, innocence and corruption set in the criminal underworld is centred on Pinkie, a 17-year-old Catholic gangster obsessed with evil, whose murder of a journalist sets him on a path to damnation. He marries Rose a 16-year-old girl, in order to protect himself from the law but Ida, an acquaintance of the murdered man, pursues Pinkie, leading eventually to his death.

Brink, André (b 1935)

South African novelist, playwright and critic, educated at Potchefstroom and Rhodes universities in South Africa and at the Sorbonne in Paris. He teaches Afrikaans and Dutch literature and is now professor at Rhodes University. His novels are concerned with the history, sources and consequences of racism and apartheid in South Africa. Looking on Darkness (1974) and An Instant in the Wind (1976) are both stories about sexual relationships between people of different races, though the former is set in the 20th century and the latter in the 18th. A Chain of Voices (1982) uses multiple narrators to recount the story of a slave revolt in Cape Colony in the early 19th century and Rumours of Rain (1978) is about the Soweto riots of 1976. The Wall of the Plague (1984), set in France, establishes parallels between apartheid and the Great Plague of the 14th century in Europe. His other novels are: File on a Diplomat (1965); A Portrait of Woman as a Young Girl (1973); A Dry White Season (1979); An Act of Terror: A Novel (1991). Brink's novels have been published in both Afrikaans and English; he moves back and forth between the two languages in the process of writing. Several of his novels were intially banned in South Africa. He has three times won the CNA award (a South African literary prize). Mapmakers: Writing in a State of Siege (1983) is a collection of essays on politics and literature, and he has edited, with \triangleright J.M. Coetzee, A Land Apart: A South African Reader (1986).

British Academy

Founded in 1901 it was intended to complement the function of the Royal Society by representing 'literary science', which was defined as 'the sciences of language, history, philosophy and antiquities, and other subjects the study of which is based on scientific principles but which are not included under the term "natural sciences" It derived its authority from the backing of the Royal Society, the grant of a Royal Charter (1902) and the addition of bye-laws by Order in Council (1903). The British Academy elects its own Fellows, up to a total of 200: candidates have to be nominated by not fewer than three and not more than six existing Fellows. The British Academy publishes its Proceedings and certain lectures; research awards are annually made available for competition.

British Council

Established in 1934, it receives three-quarters of its funds, amounting to £,260 million pounds in 1987-8, from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Its brief is to promote an enduring understanding and appreciation of Britain overseas through cultural, technical and educational exchange. The Council has staff in over 80 countries and is responsible for the implementation of more than 30 cultural agreements with other countries. It has 116 libraries world-wide and its activities include the recruitment of teachers for posts overseas, fostering personal contacts between British and overseas academics, and the placing and welfare of overseas students in Britain. It is exceptionally powerful in determining how Britain represents itself abroad in that the Council decides what is to be presented overseas as 'the best of British arts and culture'. > Graham Greene, ➤ Lawrence Durrell and ➤ Olivia Manning in various novels offer a view of the early years of the Council's work.

Brittain, Vera (1893-1970)

Autobiographer, poet, novelist and journalist. Vera Brittain is best known for her autobiographical books, Testament of Youth (1933) and Testament of Experience (1957), the first detailing with great feeling her life as a nurse in France during World War I, and particularly the loss of her fiancé to the war itself, whilst the second recounts the period from 1925–1950, including an account of the therapeutic experience of writing the first book.

She is also something of a war poet, offering a perspective on the conflict not represented by those usually characterized as > War poets, in Poems of the War and After (1934). Her other novels and non-fiction writing include: The Dark Tide (1923); Account Rendered (1945); Born 1925 (1948); Lady into Woman: A History of Women from Victoria to Elizabeth II (1953); The Women at Oxford: A Fragment of History (1960).

Her friendship with fellow-novelist ➤ Winifred Holtby, whom she had met at Oxford after the war when the two were students, and with whom she set up house after the two graduated, was an important factor in her early life, and their friendship is represented in Selected Letters of Winifred Holtby and Vera Brittain (1960), and in Brittain's Testament of Friendship (1940), a memorial to Holtby written on her death. Brittain was also deeply committed to Labour Party politics (one of her children, Shirley Williams, became a prominent Labour, and then SDP, politician), and she was an important founder-member of CND, writing in support of the peace movement (see particularly The Rebel Passion: A Short History of Some Pioneer Peace-Makers (1964)). Broadside Ballads

Popular ➤ ballads, printed on folio sheets. They formed a cheap method of publishing songs on topical subjects. The term 'broadside' meant that only one side of the paper was printed. They were a means of issuing news items, political propaganda, religious controversy, travellers' tales, attacks on (or defences of) women, the last words of condemned criminals, and so on. Often decorated with wood-cut prints, they were a major source of information in the 16th and 17th centuries. The British Library possesses a unique collection of broadsides amongst the 'Thomason Tracts'.

Brome, Richard (1590-1653)

The author of two popular ➤ Caroline comedies, ➤ The City Wit (1629) and The Jovial Crew (1640). His work reflects the influence of ➤ John Fletcher, but is indebted particularly to ➤ Ben Jonson in whose service Brome spent some time, perhaps as Jonson's secretary.

Bromley, Eliza (d 1807)

Novelist. Interesting as an early colonialist writer whose childhood in the West Indies provided her with a genuine love for the climate and mysteries of the place, but at the same time she often presents a stereotypical and patronizing view of the indigenous Indians and negro slaves.

Her most noted work in this respect was Louisa and Augustus, An Authentic Story in a Series of Letters (1784), which was mocked by > Jane Austen in Love and Friendship.

Brontë, Anne (1820-49)

Novelist and poet, sister of ➤ Charlotte, ➤ Emily and Branwell Brontë. The youngest of the family, Anne was educated largely at home, though she briefly attended school at Roe Head in 1836-7. Very close to Emily as a child, together they invented the imaginary world of > Gondal, the setting for several poems and a prominent feature in their lives. Anne had more experience as a ≥ governess than either Charlotte or Emily, working for the Ingham family at Blake Hall in 1839 and 1841-5 for the Robinsons of Thorpe Green Hall. Branwell followed her there but was dismissed as a result of his obsession with Mrs Robinson, and Anne followed him home. > Agnes Grey (1847) is a semi-autobiographical novel based on her experiences as a governess. It was published under the > pseudonym Acton Bell, as were her poems in the 1846 collection, > Poems by Currer, Ellis and Acton Bell. Her second novel, > The Tenant of Wildfell Hall, was published in 1848. Her work is considered inferior to that of Emily and Charlotte, yet it often contains vivid and powerful descriptions. She died on a visit to Scarborough in May 1849 and was buried there.

Brontë, Charlotte (1816-55)

Novelist and poet; the third of five daughters of Patrick Brontë, a Yorkshire clergyman of Irish origin, and sister to ➤ Anne and ➤ Emily Brontë. After the death of their mother in 1821, the children (including Branwell, the only son) were looked after by Elizabeth Branwell, their aunt. Charlotte attended school at Cowan Bridge, where her elder sisters Maria and Elizabeth contracted the tuberculosis from which they died in 1825, and later at Roe Head (1831-2), returning to the latter as a teacher (1835-8). She was ⊳ governess to the Sidgwick family in 1839 and to the White family in 1841. In 1842 she went with Emily to Brussels to study languages, but had to return at the end of the year due to the death of her aunt. Charlotte returned to Brussels alone in 1843 and remained there a year, forming a deep attachment to her tutor M. Heger, who was fictionalized in both The Professor (1857) and ➤ Villette (1853). She wrote a great deal as a child, inventing with Branwell the imaginary world of ➤ Angria. In 1845, according to her own account, she 'discovered' Emily's poetry and included it in ➤ Poems by Currer, Ellis and Acton Bell (> pseudonyms of Charlotte, Emily and Anne Brontë), published in 1846. The book sold only two copies but Charlotte was undeterred. She wrote her first novel, > The Professor, in the same year (it was published posthumously in 1857), and her second novel, > Jane Eyre (1847), was an immediate success. In 1848 both Branwell and Emily died from tuberculosis, followed by Anne in 1849. Charlotte continued to write during this traumatic period, > Shirley appearing in 1849, followed by Villette, regarded by many as her most mature and accomplished novel. In 1850 she met > Elizabeth Gaskell who became a great friend and who wrote her biography (1857). She married A.B. Nicholls, her father's curate, in 1854 but died from tuberculosis a few months later, in the early stages of pregnancy. She was recognized as an extraordinarily powerful and talented writer in her day, though some critics accused her of being a 'strong-minded' woman and of writing 'coarse' novels. Brontë's bold depiction of the social and psychological situation of 19th-century women has generated much late-20th-century feminist commentary which focuses on the struggle of her heroines to preserve their independence of spirit in the face of overwhelmingly adverse circumstances. In addition the confined and restless imagery of her novels is often seen as representative of the anger of suppressed and misrepresented women.

Brontë, Emily (1818-48)

Novelist and poet, sister of > Charlotte, > Anne and Branwell Brontë, Emily lived most of her life in Haworth, Yorkshire. She briefly attended Cowan Bridge school (1824-5) and went to Roe Head in 1835, returning after a few months suffering from homesickness. A short period spent working as a ▷ governess at Law Hill and a brief excursion to Brussels with Charlotte in 1842 were the only other occasions on which she left home. With Anne, Emily created the imaginary world of > Gondal, and in many of her poems she adopts the personae of Gondal characters. Charlotte 'discovered' Emily's poetry in 1845, and > Poems by Currer, Ellis and Acton Bell appeared in 1846. Her poetry has been overshadowed by her only novel > Wuthering Heights (1847), but she wrote many complex and interesting lyrics exploring personal identity and the poet's relationship to language and to the natural landscape. 'Loud without the wind was roaring', 'Ah! why, because the dazzling sun' and 'I am the only being whose doom' are some of her finest poetic achievements. Other lyrics such as 'O Thy Bright Eyes Must Answer

Now' and 'I'll come when thou art saddest' represent a masculine muse figure with whom the poet establishes a dynamic relation.

Emily Brontë's originality and power were recognized when Wuthering Heights appeared, and she has been extensively discussed ever since. The novel is so devised that the story is told by several independent and varyingly unreliable narrators. It sets human passions (through the characters Heathcliff and Catherine Earnshaw) against society (represented by the households of Wuthering Heights and Thrushcross Grange) with extraordinary violence, while at the same time retaining a cool artistic control. This enables the reader to experience a highly intelligent criticism of society's implicit claim to absorb all the energies of the individual, who potentially is larger in spirit than society ever can be. Initially received as morbid and too violent, it has grown in critical stature, particularly with regard to its structure.

Brook, Peter (b 1925)

Director. Peter Brook is probably the most influential theatre director Britian has ever produced, though there was never a more international one, and much of his work has appeared outside his own country. Many of his productions have become legendary and his book The Empty Space (1968) rapidly became a set text for many theatre workers, with its crucial distinctions between 'rough' and 'holy' theatre. He has often been regarded as a theatrical guru, and by any standards he has been a key figure in exploring and developing the possibilities of drama in a career which spanned forty years of productions of theatre and opera, from the West End to Brooklyn to Persepolis to disused quarries in Australia to African villages that had never before seen a theatre company.

In 1946 he directed Love's Labour's Lost at Stratford, thus beginning a connection that lasted for more than twenty years. He also directed plays and operas in London and Paris. In 1962 he was appointed co-director (with > Peter Hall and Michel Saint-Denis) of the newly named ➤ Royal Shakespeare Company, and there throughout the sixties he developed a range of experimental and innovative work, including the setting-up with Charles Marowitz of a group to work on > Artaud's ideas. This culminated in the 'Theatre of Cruelty' season at LAMDA in 1964, which prepared the way for the exciting production of Peter Weiss's Marat/Sade (1966). In 1966 Brook devised with the RSC the controversial US, a bitter attack on American involvement in Vietnam and British government support for it, and his only overtly

'political' work. Kenneth Tyman was probably right to say that Brook's political sense was naïve. However, his 1970 production of A Midsummer Night's Dream is still among the most celebrated and discussed of Shakespearean productions. Staged on a bare white box set, it used acrobatics, juggling and magic tricks in a joyous response to the play's challenges.

In 1970 he left the British theatre and established an International Centre of Theatre Research in Paris to work out his ideas of a theatre laboratory along > Grotowski's lines. He gathered an international company of actors dedicated to his way of working, and proceeded to experiment with Kathakali dance techniques, circus skills, masks, and a general exploration of dramatic forms, in an attempt to work out an 'international theatre language' that would transcend Western theatrical conventions.

The culmination of his work at the Centre so far has been the dramatisation, with Jean-Claude Carrière, of the Hindu epic Mahabharata (1985) in a cycle of three plays lasting nearly ten hours, using a multi-racial cast, many of them old Brook hands. It was played originally in a quarry near Avignon, the main features of which have now been reproduced (at considerable expense) from Australia to Glasgow. His version of Oliver Sach's The Man Who... has toured widely since 1904).

Brooke, Charlotte (d 1793)

Irish translator and poet. She nursed her father, a dramatist, until he died in 1783. She contributed an anonymous ▷ translation to Historical Memoirs of Irish Bards (1786), and published Reliques of Irish Poetry (1788) by subscription. She also wrote a tragedy, Belisorius, which is lost. In her translation she is concerned with the difficulty of translating not only words and genre but cultural contexts. Introducing her translation of elegies she notes, 'in the original, they are simple and unlearned, but pathetic to a great degree, and this is a species of beauty in composition, extremely difficult to transcribe into any other language'.

Brooke, Frances (1724–1789)
Important as the author of the first Canadian novel, she was born Francis Moore in Claypole, England, grew up in Lincolnshire and Peterborough, and was educated at home. By 1748, she had moved to London and established herself as a woman of no small literary importance, with friends like ▷ Samuel Johnson, ▷ Anna Seward and ▷ Fanny Burney. She married the Reverend John Brooke in 1755, but enjoyed a measure of freedom to pursue her literary interests. Under the name

'Mary Singleton, Spinster,' she edited The Old Maid, a weekly periodical (1775-6). She tried to persuade actor/manager ➤ David Garrick to produce her blank verse tragedy Virginia, but he was unwilling to do so, and it was finally published in 1756, with other poems and translations. She also translated, from the French, Marie-Jeanne Riccoboni's Letters from Juliet, Lady Catesby, to her Friend, Lady Henrietta Campley in 1760. Meanwhile, her husband had left for Canada. After the appearance of her ⊳ epistolary novel, The History of Lady Julia Mandeville (1763), she went to join her husband, who was stationed in Quebec as military chaplain. This work, suitably concluding with the deaths of both central characters, enjoyed popular success. Frances Brooke's stay in Quebec (until 1768) informed The History of Emily Montague, which is popularly considered the first Canadian novel (1769). The book's major characters and correspondents, Edward Rivers and Arabella Fermor, describe in considerable detail political and social aspects of 18th-century Canada, with notable emphasis on the landscape, and on the relations between the English and the

After Frances Brooke's return to England, she translated Framéry's Memoirs of the Marquis de St Forlaix (published in 1770), and Millot's Elements of the History of England, from the Invasion of the Romans to the Reign of George the Second (published in 1771). There is critical debate about whether Frances Brooke is the author of the anonymous novel All's Right at Last; or, The History of Miss West (1774), although Lorraine McMullen's 1983 biography of Brooke supports the attribution. Brooke's next novel, The Excursion (1777), is about a heroine in London seeking success as a writer; David Garrick comes under direct attack for not supporting new work. From 1773 to 1778, Frances Brooke was involved, with actress Mary Ann Yates, in managing the Haymarket opera house. Three of her dramatic works were staged: The Siege of Sinope: A Tragedy, in 1781; Rosina and Marion, both comic operas, in 1783 and 1788. Her last novel, The History of Charles Mandeville (1790), was not published until after her death. She is buried in Sleaford, Lincolnshire, England.

Brooke, Henry (1703-83)

Novelist, poet and playwright. Brooke's novels The Fool of Quality (1765–70) and Juliet Grenville (1774) contributed to the late 18th-century fashion for ▷ sensibility. He also published a poem, Universal Beauty (1735), and a ▷ tragedy, Gustavus Vasa (1739).

Brooke, Rupert (1887–1915) A young poet of exceptional promise, who contributed to the > Georgian Poetry volumes, and who died of septicaemia in the Dardanelles during World War I without having taken part in the campaign. His almost legendary physical beauty and the idealistic quality of his work caused him to be represented as the hero of the first phase of the war. 'The Soldier' (1915) and 'The Old Vicarage, Granchester' (1912) are much-anthologized poems. Just as it had been patriotically revered, Brooke's work dramatically declined in public opinion as the horror of war was fully understood, although after World War II his slim and unfinished corpus gained more critical respect.

Brooke-Rose, Christine (b 1926)

Novelist and critic. Born in Geneva, of an English father and a Swiss/American mother, she is bilingual, and her best-known works are influenced by the French > nouveau roman of Alain Robbe-Grillet and Nathalie Sarraute. Out (1964) uses Robbe-Grillet's technique of exhaustive description of inanimate objects. In Such (1966) a scientist recalls his past during the three minutes taken to bring him back to consciousness after heart failure, while Thru (1975) is a multilingual, playful, Joycean novel, employing typographical patterns and self-referential discussion of its own narrative technique. More recently, Xorander (1986) is a work of > science fiction, exploring the possibilities of a computer-dominated society. Brooke-Rose lives in France, where until recently she was a professor at the University of Paris, and her resolute commitment to modernist (> Modernism) experimental techniques has led to her relative neglect by English-speaking readers.

Brookner, Anita (b 1928)

Novelist. Since her first novel, A Start In Life, was published in 1981 she has rapidly achieved popular success, confirmed by the award of the Booker Prize to her fourth novel, Hôtel Du Lac (1984). Her novels have an autobiographical element and somewhat similar heroines; sensitive, intelligent, but not glamorous, their search for love and fulfilment leads to disillusionment and betrayal by attractive but selfish men. Brookner's prose style is careful, elegant, lucid and mannered in a way somewhat reminiscent of > Henry James. She lectures and writes on the subject of art history.

Her other novels are: Providence (1982), Look At Me (1983); Family And Friends (1985); A Misalliance (1986); A Friend From England (1987); Latecomers (1988); Brief Lives (1990); A Closed Eye (1991); Fraud (1992); A Family Romance (1993); A Private View (1994); and Incidents in the Rue Langier (1995).

Brophy, Brigid (b 1929-95)

Novelist and critic. The daughter of the novelist

John Brophy, she won immediate acclaim with her first novel, Hackenfeller's Ape (1953), a fable about imprisonment, rationality and the instinctive life. During the 1960s she acquired a reputation as a polemical and aggressive writer, with controversial libertarian views on sex and > marriage. She campaigned for animal rights, defended > pornography, and, with ➤ Maureen Duffy, set up a writers' action group in the 1970s to campaign for Public Lending Right (the Public Lending Right Bill, which provides payments to authors out of a central fund on the basis of library lending, was passed in 1979). Her novels reflect her adherence to > Freudian ideas, and to the evolutionism of ➤ George Bernard Shaw. Flesh (1962) is a detached yet poetic study of sexual awakening; The Finishing Touch (1963), described as 'a lesbian fantasy', is stylistically inspired by the work of > Ronald Firbank; The Snow Ball (1964) is an artificial, baroque black comedy of seduction; In Transit (1969) uses a bizarre combination of styles and characters and is set in an airport. Her works of criticism include psychological studies of creative artists: Mozart the Dramatist (1964); In Black and White: A Portrait of Aubrey Beardsley (1968); Prancing Novelist (on Ronald Firbank; 1973); Beardsley and his World (1976). Her other works of nonfiction include: Black Ship to Hell (1962), a Freudian account of the nature of hate; Don't Never Forget (1966) and Baroque and Roll (1987), collections of her journalism on a wide range of subjects. Other novels include: The King of a Rainy Country (1956); Pussy Owl: Super Beast (1976); Palace Without Chairs (1978). The Adventures of God in His Search for the Black Girl (1973) is a series of fables. The Burglar (1968) is a play.

Brossard, Nicole (b 1943)

Poet and novelist. Brossard is one of the most important writers to emerge in late-twentiethcentury Canadian writing, combining, as she does, a sharp political agenda (feminism and lesbianism), an ability to shift between her native French and English which challenges preconceived ideas about Canadian linguistic divisions, and a radical approach to poetic structure and vocabulary. Her early writing was influenced by Modernism, but by the early 1980s she had combined the personal and political, the erotic and the poetic, in a manner similar to that of the French feminists, especially Hélène Cixous. Her works include: Amantes (1980), Sous la Langue/Under Tongue (1987), and the fiction/theory novel Le Desert Mauve (1987).

Brougham, Henry Peter, Lord (1778–1868) Lawyer, journalist, and slave-trade ▷ abolitionist. He defended Queen Caroline brilliantly in the divorce proceedings brought against her by George IV in 1820, and later became Lord Chancellor. He was one of the founders (1802) of the > Edinburgh Review and may have been the author of the satirical essay on > Lord Byron's Hours of Idleness which appeared in the Review in January 1808 and provoked Byron to write English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

Broughton, Rhoda (1840-1920)

Novelist, the daughter of Jane Bennet and clergyman Delves Broughton, Rhoda Broughton grew up in Staffordshire where she set many of her best-sellers. She began to write at the age of twenty-two, inspired by her admiration for > Anne Thackeray Ritchie, and was prolific and financially successful, producing novels of sexual intrigue and pathos, such as her first work Not Wisely But Too Well (1867), which was published serially with the help of her uncle > Sheridan Le Fanu, and Goodbye Sweetheart (1872). After moving to Headington, Oxford in 1802, she became well-known in literary and academic circles. Altogether she wrote twentyfour novels, mostly sensational > romances centring on 'strong-minded women', unhappy marriages and scandalous affairs, but featuring a new kind of tomboyish, plain-spoken heroine which helped to make her one of the best selling novelists of the Victorian period in spite of > Margaret Oliphant's indignant derision. Many of her novels are witty and malicious chronicles of 'county' life, and speak out against marriage and women's economic oppression. She was paid large amounts for copyright by her publisher, Bentley. Her works include > Cometh Up as a Flower (1867), Alas (1890) and Scylla or Charybdis?: A Novel (1895). Her last novel was A Fool in Her Folly (1920).

Brown, George Douglas (1896-1902) Novelist, sometimes known by the pen-name of George Douglas. Born in Ayrshire in Scotland and educated at Glasgow University and Balliol College, Oxford he is known for The House with the Green Shutters (1901), a harshly realist story of the rise and fall of a tyrannical smalltown businessman. It was acclaimed by ▷ J. B. Priestley, who described it as an 'East Wind' let into the 'cosy chamber' of ⊳ Kailyard fiction; Douglas himself argued that it was 'a greater compliment to Scotland, I think, than the sentimental slop of Barrie, and Crockett, and Maclaren'. Douglas also wrote short stories and children's fiction, and left various works unfinished at his early death.

Browne, Sir Thomas (1605-82) Physician and author. Sir Thomas Browne studied medicine at Montpellier, Padua and Leiden, and began practising medicine in 1633, before moving in 1637 to Norwich, where he was to spend the rest of his life. Browne's most influential work was ▷ Religio Medici (1642, reissued in an authorized edition in 1643), a title which can be translated as The Religion of a Physician. The conjunction between religious meditation and an enduring fascination with the observation of the most minute details of the physical world informs the Religio, which stands as both a determined act of creation of an authorial persona, and as a disquisition which attempts to reconcile scepticism and belief.

In some ways, Browne can be thought of as a Baconian in his adherence to the principles of observation, and his determination to refute ideas commonly entertained by the credulous. But his Baconianism is tempered by a vein of mysticism. The two tendencies in his thought are displayed in his later works – Pseudodoxica Epidemica, or Vulgar Errors (1646); Hydriotaphia, or Vurn Burial (1658); and > The Garden of Cyrus (1658).

Browne, William (1591-1643)

One of the 'Spenserian' poets, Browne wrote mainly > pastoral verse, and was tutor to the family of ➤ William Herbert. He contributed seven eclogues to The Shepherd's Pipe (1614), a work written in collaboration with ▷ George Wither. Browne also composed a ➤ masque, produced in 1614, entitled The Inner Temple Masque - a title which was changed to Ulysses and Circe when the work was staged again in 1615. In 1613 appeared the first part of Browne's Britannia's Pastorals, poetic accounts of familiar pastoral stories derived from Browne's reading in ➤ Edmund Spenser, ➤ Torquato Tasso and > John Fletcher, and placed within an English landscape, itself a reworking of Spenser's descriptions. Subsequent parts of the work were published in 1616 and (as a Percy Society edition) in 1852. In 1613, in collaboration with > Fulke Greville, Browne published Two Elegies, works commemorating the death of ➤ Henry, Prince of Wales. Bib: Grundy, J., The Spenserian Poets.

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett (1806–61)
Poet, the eldest child of Edward and Mary Moulton Barrett, her reputation as a major Victorian poet was established long before she met ➤ Robert Browning whom she married in 1846. An experimental writer, she wrote ➤ ballads, political odes, allegories, ➤ sonnets, poetic dramas and an epic, as well as publishing essays in literary criticism and translations of Greek poetry. She spent her childhood at Hope End in Herefordshire, reading widely and schooling herself in the ➤ classics. Her juvenilia includes The Battle of Marathon (published anonymously when she was only fourteen),

An Essay on Mind: With Other Poems (1826) and Prometheus Bound: and Miscellaneous Poems (1833) containing her translation of Aeschylus' (525-456 BC) tragedy. Her reputation was made with her first mature collection, 'The Cry of the Children', a famous plea to the social consciences of the Victorian middle classes. For six years, between 1838 and 1844, Barrett was confined as an invalid, though during this period she wrote extensively, culminating in > Poems (1844). In 1845 Robert Browning began a correspondence with her, and a year later she ran away from her tyrannical father in order to marry Browning in secret. The couple left immediately for Italy and based themselves in Florence for the rest of Barrett's life. Poems (1850) incorporates the celebrated sequence of love-lyrics > Sonnets from the Portuguese written during her courtship, including the famous and much-anthologized 'How do I love thee? Let me count the ways', and 'The Runaway Slave at Pilgrim's Point'. Elizabeth gave birth to a son, known as Pen, at the age of fortythree. In 1850 > The Athenaeum, to which Barrett Browning was a regular contributor, recommended her for the Poet Laureateship on the death of Wordsworth (1770-1850). Although the title went to ➤ Tennyson, the fact that a woman was considered at that time is indicative of Barrett Browning's reputation.

➤ Aurora Leigh (1857), an epic poem concerned with the making of a woman poet, is now considered one of Barrett Browning's major achievements. Other works include Casa Guidi Windows (1851) and Poems Before Congress (1860), which testify to her passionate championship of Italian independence, and a posthumously published collection, Last Poems (1862). The best edition of her work is The Complete Works of Elizabeth Barrett Browning (eds. C. Porter and H. Clarke).

Browning, Robert (1812-89)

Poet. The son of a clerk in the Bank of England, he married the poet Elizabeth Barrett in 1846 under dramatic circumstances, and lived with her until her death in 1861 in Italy. He spent the rest of his life in London.

From the first his poetry was exuberant, and he began as an ardent follower of Shelley (1792–1822); Pauline (1833); Paracelsus (1835); Strafford (a verse tragedy, 1837); Sordello (1840). Between 1841 and 1846 he published seven more plays, the dramatic poem Pippa Passes, the collection Dramatic Lyries (including > 'The Pied Piper'), and Dramatic Romances — all published together under the title Bells and Pomegranates. During his married life he produced Christmas-Eve and Easter-Day (1850) and, his best-known work, ▷ Men and Women (1855).

Nonetheless, public recognition only came with > Dramatis Personae (1864) and The Ring and the Book (1868–9). The latter was his most ambitious work and consists of 10 verse narratives, all dealing with the same crime, each from a distinct viewpoint. It was based on an actual trial, the record of which he discovered in Florence. The period 1850–70 was his best; the later work has endured less well: Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau (1871); Fifine at the Fair (1872); The Inn Album (1875); Pacchiarotto (1876); La Saisia (1878); Dramatic Idylls (1879–80); Ferishtah's Fancies (1884); Asolando (1889).

Browning was keenly aware that he was writing poetry in an age of science, of technology and of prose, particularly of prose fiction. He made poetry compete with prose in these conditions, and the curiosity and delight in detail that were part of his temperament fitted him to do so. Where other poets, notably ➤ Tennyson, wrote in a style that moved away from and above the preoccupations of daily living, Browning delighted in the idiom of ordinary speech and in the peculiarities of minds and objects. He was not the only practitioner of the ▷ dramatic monologue, but he is especially associated with it; he chose characters out of history or invented them in special predicaments, and made them think aloud so as to display their distinctive mentalities. He was not afraid of obscurity, and both his earlier and his later poems suffer from it (Sordello and Fifine), although Sordello is now increasingly recognized as one of his most extraordinary and important works, influencing, for example, Ezra Pound (1885-1972) in his conception of the Cantos. The influence of his monologues on Pound's and T.S. Eliot's (1888-1965) early poetry should also be noted.

Brownists

A ➤ Puritan religious sect founded by Robert Browne (1550?–1633?); from about 1640 they were known as Independents, and since the 18th century they have been Congregationalists. Their best-known doctrine is that on the evidence of the New Testament each religious congregation should be self-governing, so that there should be no over-riding Church, eg no government through bishops under a central figure such as the Pope or, in the Anglican system, the Crown.

Bruce, Robert the King of the Scots (1306-29) and hero of the Scottish War of Independence (1296-1328), during which he successfully resisted the efforts of ➤ Edward I and ➤ Edward II to conquer the country. Bruce's decisive victory was the ➤ Battle of Bannockburn (1314).

In about 1375 a Scottish poet ⊳ John Barbour wrote an epic poem describing the war, called The Bruce.

Brunton, Mary (1778-1818)

Novelist. She married Revd Alexander Brunton in 1798 and, although she had only a meagre education, they set about studying history and philosophy together. In 1811 she published anonymously her first novel Self-Control with a dedication to > Joanna Baillie. Brunton was particularly keen to show how ➤ Romantic stereotypes often acted to the detriment of women; for example, at the beginning of Self-Control she states that her purpose is: 'to shew the power of the religious principle in bestowing self-command: and to bear testimony against a maxim as immoral as indelicate, that a reformed rake makes the best husband'. She only completed one more work, Discipline (1814), before dying in childbirth, although she did leave an unfinished text, Emmeline. The novels focus upon the psychological development of central female characters, who are in some way made to rethink their presuppositions because of outside forces. The quality of her long-neglected novels has only recently been acknowledged, and it is now accepted that Self-Control influenced the work of > Jane

Bryan, Sir Francis (d 1550)

Poet and diplomat. Bryan was one of the few courtiers to maintain close and cordial relationships with ▶ Henry VIII and was chief mourner at the king's funeral. Perhaps this unusual fact may be accounted for by his readiness to acquiesce to any of his monarch's desires, however pernicious. For example, even though he was related to the Boleyn family, Bryan faked a quarrel with George Boleyn and aided the king to condemn Queen Anne Boleyn to death. For his services Bryan accepted a pension from Henry that had belonged to one of the men he had helped execute. These actions, together with his scarred appearance

(he had lost one eye while jousting) led to his being called 'the vicar of hell', a name ➤ John Milton refers to in ➤ Areopagitica. Bryan was also the Master of Entertainments at court, a friend of ➤ Sir Thomas Wyatt and a poet; his work was included in ▶ Tottel's Miscellany.

Bryden, Bill (b 1942)

Dramatist, director, film maker. Since the mid-sixties Bill Bryden has been assiduously involved in the making of drama either for stage or the screen, in Scotland and abroad. His reputation, now international, was secured when he started working away from his native land with such celebrated National productions as his promenade Mysteries.

Willie Rough (1972), deriving from his grandfather's experience, looked at issues of working-class life against the backdrop of shipyard politics between the wars. Benny Lynch (1974) was again about the aspirations and daily drudge-and-grudge of the working classes, represented by this 'bonniest o' fechters' who rose to fêted world status only to end. exploited and discarded, in the gutter.

These productions represented a conscious drive on Bryden's part to stamp the Lyceum company with a 'national' identity and to encourage new Scots writers to create for their nation's stage. Unfortunately, it was not the right moment for his vision. In 1981, he wrote and directed Civilians, a fond, anecdotal glimpse of 1940s Greenock life, for the (short-lived) Scottish Theatre Company and in 1985 he took up the post of Head of Drama Television with BBC Scotland since when works by Peter MacDougall, Ian Heggie, John Byrne and others have seen the far-reaching light of transmission.

Perhaps the work that epitomises Bryden's entrepreneurial strengths and oft-criticised weaknesses as a dramatist is The Ship (1990), a spectacularly staged celebration of Clyde shipbuilding in its last years of greatness. This venture turned a disused riverside engine shed into an ad hoc theatre. Thanks to designer William Dudley, the performing space was encompassed by the inner decks and shell of a liner-in-progress. The sheer persuasive showmanship of all this did much to offset the saccharine banalities of the script which reduced the hard men and hard times of post-war Clydeside to a series of ciphers and clichés.

Bryher (1894-1983)

Novelist. Bryher's historical novels, always published under the single name she legally took on (after one of the Scilly Isles) so as not to be identified with her influential industrialist father, are serious and meticulously researched works on the Greek and Roman Empires (particularly Roman Wall, 1954, Gate to the Sea, 1958, and The Coin of Carthage, 1963) and on the connections between early British history and contemporary life (The Fourteenth of October, 1951, The January Tale, 1966, and Beowulf, 1956). Bryher lived with the poet > H. D. (Hilda Doolittle) for much of her life, and wrote two autobiographies, The Heart of Artemis (1962) and The Days of Mars (1972). She also wrote literary criticism (a book, in 1918, on the poet Amy Lowell), and on film, setting up the film journal Close-Up. Bib: Hanscombe, G. and Smyers, V. L., Writing For Their Lives.

Buc, Sir George (d 1623)

➤ Master of the Revels, 1608–22. Educated at the Inns of Court, Buc pursued a political career under the auspices of ➤ Sir Francis Walsingham and Sir Robert Cecil. He was at the Cadiz expedition and later served as a Member of Parliament and an envoy. He is best remembered for his post as deputy master, and later Master of the Revels. Buc's influence on > Jacobean drama was cut short, however, when he became mentally unstable. Although most of his papers were destroyed in a fire, several works survive: a history of ⊳ Richard III, an ⊳ ecloque (Daphnis Polystephanos, 1604), and a treatise arguing that London should have a university in addition to those at Oxford and Cambridge (The Third Universitie of England, 1615).

Buchan, John, 1st Baron Tweedsmuir (1875 - 1940)

Novelist. Buchan was born in Scotland and educated at Glasgow and Oxford; he contributed to the > Yellow Book while still a student. He is best known for his adventure stories involving the character of Richard Hannay, notably The Thirty-nine Steps (1915), filmed by Hitchcock in 1935. Other novels include: Scholar Gypsies (1896); A Lost Lady (1899); The Half-Hearted (1900); Greenmantle (1916); Mr Steadfast (1918); Sick Heart River (1941). He had a distinguished political career and was Governor-General of Canada 1935-1940.

Buchanan, George (1506-82)

Scottish poet, classicist, educationalist. George Buchanan's life was a curious mixture of high scholarly endeavour and political intrigue. In this, he can be thought of as representing that ability, described by ➤ Thomas Browne, to live in 'divided and distinguished worlds'. As an educationalist and a classicist he was tutor to > Mary Queen of Scots and James VI (later > James I of England). His most illustrious pupil, however, was the French essayist > Montaigne, whom Buchanan taught after fleeing to Bordeaux to escape punishment for writing ➤ satires against the Franciscans. On returning to Scotland he helped prosecute his former pupil Mary Queen of Scots for high treason, and later, under James VI, he held high office in the Scottish government. The great majority of his works were written in Latin, and included love poems, > tragedies, legal works and a history of Scotland.

Buchanan, Robert (Williams) (1841-1901) Poet, novelist and playwright. Buchanan was born in Staffordshire and educated at Edinburgh University. He moved to London and published his first volume of poems Undertones in 1863, following it with Idylls and Legends of Inverburn (1865), London Poems (1866), Ballad Stories of the Affections (1866) and North Coast and Other Poems (1867). His work is centred on the Scottish peasantry, the rigours of northern life and, in London Poems, the mean and squalid nature of city life which is portrayed with some sympathy. In The Book of Orm (1870), Balder the Beautiful (1877) and The City of Dreams (1888) Buchanan displays his interest in the mystical and his affinity with the epic style favoured by the ➤ Spasmodic school. Saint Abe and His Seven Wives (1872) and White Rose and the Red describe life in the New World. In 1872 he published pseudonymously a pamphlet stigmatizing ➤ Swinburne and ➤ Dante Gabriel Rossetti as members of 'The Fleshly School of Poetry' because of their sensualism and lack of ethical awareness. Buchanan's plays were moderately successful and include Lady Clare (1883), Sophia (1886) an adaptation of Henry Fielding's (1707-54) Tom Jones, and The Charlatan (1894). Among his novels The Martyrdom of Madeleine is an attack on the French aestheticism of Théophile Gautier who had inspired the English Aesthetes.

Buckingham, Duke of ➤ Villiers, George, Duke of.

Buckingham, George Villiers, first Duke of (1592-1628)

Courtier and favourite of ➤ James I. After the death of his astute principal minister, Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, in 1612, the king turned for affection and advice to handsome young courtiers, the most prominent of whom was George Villiers. James' > homosexual fascination with Buckingham allowed the younger man considerable political influence, while the king lavished wealth upon his 'sweet Steenie'. As the king's power faded, however, Buckingham transferred his affections to > Prince Charles, the heir to the throne. When he acceded to the throne, Charles allowed Buckingham to lead him into a series of dangerous quarrels with Parliament and to almost complete dependence upon the Duke after the king's alienation from his wife, ➤ Henrietta Maria, in 1626. Buckingham's powerful influence over the British crown was brought to an abrupt end in 1628 when he was assassinated.

Buckstone, J.B. (John Baldwin) (1802-79) Actor, dramatist and theatre manager, he was born in London's East End and made his debut at the Surrey Theatre in 1823-4, establishing himself as a 'low comedian'. Between 1825 and 1850 he wrote over 100 dramatic pieces including farces, operettas and domestic melodrama his first, Luke the Labourer (1826), helped to establish the genre. Comedies such as The Wreck Ashore (1830), The Irish Lion (1838), Single Life (1839) and the sentimental The Green Bushes (1845) are enlivened by low-life comic characters and champion the virtues of manly fortitude and decency. Under his management the Haymarket Theatre became the home of comedy (1853-76), and played host to dramatists such as > Tom Taylor, Westland Marston and ➤ W.S. Gilbert.

Bulstrode, Cecily (1584-1609)

A writer of light prose ⊳ satires, which categorized women as good or bad solely in accordance with their ability to please men, often in a sexual manner. However, she was part of the small group of women who congregated about ➤ Queen Anne, many of whom were more supportive of their own sex, such as ➤ Lady Anne Clifford and ➤ Lady Frances Southwell. Bulstrode is named as the author of 'Newes of my Morning worke', which was published with other Theophrastian character sketches in the second edition of > Sir Thomas Overbury's The Wife (1614 and 1622). ➤ Ben Jonson wrote a scathing attack of her literary ability and sexual morality in 'An Epigram on the Court Pucell', but he, > Donne and ➤ Edward Herbert all wrote commendatory elegies for Bulstrode at her death. Bulwer-Lytton, Edward George Earle Lytton (1st Baron Lytton) (1803-73) Novelist. He was the son of General Bulwer and added his mother's surname of Lytton on inheriting her estate in 1843. He was educated at Trinity and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and was made a Baron in 1866. His novels were very famous in his lifetime, and their range is an indication of literary variety and changes in the Victorian period. His political outlook was radical when he was young; he was then a friend of the philosopher William Godwin (1756-1836), whose influence is evident in his early novels, Paul Clifford (1830) and Eugene Aram (1832). On the other hand, he was a member of fashionable society and his first success (Pelham, 1828) is closer to ➤ Benjamin Disraeli's political novels of high society, for example > Coningsby. Then in mid-career, under the influence of the strict Victorian moral code, he wrote domestic novels such as The Caxtons - A Family Picture (1848). He showed the influence of novelist Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832) on the Victorians in his ➤ historical novels such as The Last Days of Pompeii (1834), Rienzi (1835) and The Last of the Barons (1843), and the current ⊳ German influence in the didacticism of his early novels and in fantasies such as The Pilgrims of the Rhine (1834). Bulwer-Lytton was a friend of ➤ Charles Dickens (see the biography of Dickens by Jack Lindsay) and satirized ➤ Lord Tennyson in his poem The New Timon (1846). He wrote some successful plays - The Lady of Lyons (1838), Richelieu (1838) and Money (1840). Like Disraeli, he combined his literary with a political career, for which he was rewarded with a peerage as Baron Knebworth (his mother's estate) but in his case literature had priority. His work is now little respected (he is considered as neither sincere nor original) but he is interestingly representative of his period. Bib: Sadleir, M., Bulwer: A Panorama;

Bunting, Basil (1900-85)

Poet. Bunting's association with the poetry world began in the 1920s, but he did not achieve real recognition until the 1960s - the story of his rediscovery after years of obscurity is one of the legends of contemporary poetry. Bunting had been associated with > Ezra Pound and other > modernists in the 1930s, even to the extent that > W. B. Yeats called him one of Pound's 'savage disciples'. Redimiculum Matellarum was published in Milan in 1930, followed by Attis (1931), The Well of Lycopolis (1935), and, later, Poems in 1950, but the text which gave Bunting enormous recognition after many years of neglect in Britain was Briggflatts (1966). Undoubtedly Bunting's most important and challenging work, Briggflats is a long, intense, mystical synthesis of Northumbrian legend, > autobiography and mythology. Other works include: Collected Poems (1968). Bib: Davie, D., Under Briggflatts.

Bunyan, John (1628–88)

Born at Elstow, near Bedford, Bunyan was the son of a tinsmith, educated at the village school. Of Baptist sympathies, he fought in the Civil War, although little is known of his military activities. With the persecution of the Puritans which followed the Restoration of Charles II, Bunyan's non-conformist beliefs came under severe censure, and in 1660 he was arrested for preaching without a licence.

For most of the next twelve years Bunyan was imprisoned in Bedford jail, where he began to write. His spiritual autobiography, ▷ Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, appeared in 1666, and the first part of his major work, ▷ The Pilgrim's Progress was largely written during this period of imprisonment, though it is probable that Bunyan completed Part I during a second spell in jail in 1676; the full text, with the addition of Part II, was published in 1684. A spiritual allegory strongly in the Puritan tradition, it tells of the pilgrimage of Christian to reach the state of grace. Bunyan's other major works, ▷ The Life and Death of Mr Badman (1680) and ▷ The Holy War (1682) are also spiritual allegories.

Burgess, Anthony (b 1917-93)

Novelist and critic. Born John Anthony Burgess Wilson of a Roman Catholic Lancashire family, he was educated at Manchester University. After military service during World War II he worked as a schoolmaster in Oxfordshire, Malaya and Borneo. His experiences in Malaya inspired his Malayan Trilogy (1956-9), a rich portrait of the Malayan culture and people, employing words and expressions from Malay, Urdu, Arabic, Tamil and Chinese. A fascination with the textures of language and a ➤ Joycean inventiveness and multilingual playfulness have characterized much of Burgess's work. In 1959 Burgess returned to England with a brain tumour, expecting to survive only a year, yet in that year wrote five novels: The Doctor is Sick (1960), One Hand Clapping (1961), The Worm and the Ring (1961), The Wanting Seed (1962) and Inside Mr Enderby (1963). During the 1960s he worked as a music and drama critic, and produced plays, T.V. scripts, short stories and numerous book reviews. He also did a considerable amount of university teaching, and lived in Malta, Rome and Monaco. A Clockwork Orange (1962), filmed in 1971 by Stanley Kubrick, is an anti-utopian novel which quickly gained cult status, centring on a viciously disaffected protagonist who deliberately chooses evil, and who is brainwashed by penal techniques based on behaviourist psychology. Its most striking feature is the use of Nadsat, an invented teenage underworld slang largely based on Russian words and English colloquialisms. Nothing Like the Sun (1964) is a fictional account of > Shakespeare's love life, told as the parting lecture of a schoolmaster in the Far East, who progressively identifies himself with his subject. An impression of Elizabethan life is conveyed through descriptive detail and imitation of contemporary idiom. Earthly Powers (1980) is a large-scale consideration of the nature of evil, with extensive reference to 20th-century literary and political history. Other novels include 1985 (1978), The Piano Players (1986), Any Old Iron (1989), The Devil's Mode (1989) and Mozart and the Wolf Gang (1991). Non-fiction includes: The Novel Today (1963); Language Made Plain (1964); Ernest Hemingway and his World (1978); Flame into Being: the Life and Work of D. H. Lawrence (1985). Burke, Edmund (1729-97)

Statesman and political philosopher; described by the ➤ Victorian writer, Matthew Arnold (1822-88) as 'our greatest English prose-writer'. Born in Dublin, he pursued his political career in England, and was a Member of Parliament for much of his life. Although never attaining high office, his political status was considerable, due mainly to his formidable powers of oratory and polemical argument. His early work A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful (1756) marks a transition in aesthetic theory from the neoclassicism of the Restoration and ➤ Augustan writers John Dryden (1631-1700) and Alexander Pope (1688-1744). Influenced by Milton, it emphasizes the sense of awe inspired by both art and nature. His most celebrated work, ➤ Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), argues for the organic, evolutionary development of society, as opposed to the brutal surgery and doctrinaire theories of the French revolutionaries.

Burke's character reveals a number of paradoxes. His writings combine the cautious. pragmatic instincts of a conservative politician with a passionate rhetorical style. He regarded all forms of political innovation with suspicion, yet defended the cause of the American rebels in On Conciliation with the Colonies (1775). He attacked the corrupt practice of court patronage and the exploitative activities of the East India Company, yet retained for himself many benefits of the systems he deplored. Bib: S. Burlesque

A form of satirical comedy (not necessarily dramatic) which arouses laughter through mockery of a form usually dedicated to high seriousness. The word is from the Italian burla = 'ridicule'. One of the most well-known examples of burlesque is > Pope's > The Rape of the Lock where an elevated style is used to describe a trivial incident. Burlesque is similar to > parody, but parody depends on subtler and closer imitation of a particular work.

> Satire.

Burnet, Gilbert, Bishop (1643-1715) Whig cleric, who played an important part in the build-up to the > Glorious Revolution of 1688 and the accession of ➤ William III and Mary II. Born at Edinburgh, Burnet entered Marischal College, Aberdeen at the age of 10, studying first law and then divinity. In 1669 he became professor of divinity at Glasgow, but resigned in 1674 because of a dispute with his former patron, the Earl of Lauderdale. He settled in London, where he was made chaplain of the Rolls Chapel and later lecturer at St Clements. Burnet incurred the hostility of > Charles II, who took away his lectureship, and on the accession of > Iames II he left for the Continent. There he allied himself with William of Orange, whom he accompanied back to England as royal chaplain. He became Bishop of Salisbury in 1689. His History of the Reformation was published 1679–81 and 1714; his History of My Own Time (1724–34) remains a primary source of information about the period.

Burnet, Thomas (1635-1715)

English cleric, born at Croft in Yorkshire, became a pupil of Tillotson and Clerk of the Closet to ➤ William III, but had to resign in 1692 because of opposition incurred by his unorthodox Archaeologica Philosophica, which treats the Fall of Adam and Eve as an allegory. He influenced ➤ Addison, ➤ Young and ➤ Burke, and his Telluris Theoria Sacra (1680–89, translated into English 1684–9), was also an important source for ➤ Thomson's The Four Seasons.

Burnett, Frances Eliza (née Hodgson) (1849-1924)

Novelist. Burnett is known for her best-selling children's stories: Little Lord Fauntleroy (1886) about a boy living in New York who turns out to be the heir of an English aristocratic family, and The Secret Garden (1911). Burnett also wrote accomplished novels for adults: some, like Haworth's (1879), are set in an industrial environment in the north of England while others, like Through One Administration (1883), deal with American society.

Burney, Dr Charles (1726-1814)

Father of novelist ➤ Fanny Burney, Charles Burney was the friend of ➤ Samuel Johnson, the actor David Garrick and the painter Sir Joshua Reynolds. An organist and musical historian, he also wrote travelogues of France, Italy, Germany and the Low Countries – journeys he made to collect material for his History of Music (published 1776–89).

Burney, Fanny (Frances, Madame D'Arblay) (1752-1840)

Daughter of the musical historian Dr Charles Burney (1726–1814), Fanny grew up in the distinguished company of Dr Johnson (1709–84), > Sir Joshua Reynolds, Garrick and the > Bluestockings. In 1786 she was appointed as an attendant upon Queen Charlotte, wife of George III, and in 1793 she married a French exile, General D'Arblay. From 1802–12, interned by Napoleon, she and her husband lived in France.

Burney's major novels are ➤ Evelina (1778), Cecilia (1782) and Camilla (1796). Their common theme is the entry into society of a young girl, beautiful and intelligent but lacking experience of the world; during subsequent adventures the girl's character is moulded. Burney was a great admirer of Samuel Richardson (1689–1761), and his influence is apparent in her use, in her first novel, of the epistolary form. Burney was well aware, however, of the difficulties facing a woman novelist; for example, in her diary entry for 18 June 1778 she comments on the reception of her novel Evelina:

In a private confabulation which I had with my Aunt Anne, she told me a thousand things that had been said in its praise, and assured me they had not for a moment doubted that the work was a man's. I must own I suffered great difficulty in refraining from laughing...

Burney was also well known for her diaries and letters. Her Early Diary (1889) covers the years 1768–78, and contains many sketches of Johnson and Garrick; her Diary and Letters . . . 1778–1840 (published 1842–6) is a lively account of life at court. Amongst her admirers, ▷ Jane Austen shows Burney's influence.

Burney, Sarah (1772-1844)

Novelist. Overshadowed by her half-sister > Fanny Burney, Sarah was a successful novelist in her own right, earning her living mainly from her writing. Her life seems to have been conventional (for example she accepted jobs as a governess and paid companion), with the exception of a five year interlude as a young adult, during which she and her halfbrother left their respective homes (he was married) to live together. Sarah Burney's first novel Clarentine (1796), although published anonymously, received great acclaim, and a number of others followed, the most noteworthy being: Geraldine Fauconberg (1808), The Shipwreck and Country Neighbours (1816-20), and The Renunciation (1839). The novels focus upon the psychological reactions of their young heroines when confronted by some calamitous occurrence or mysterious revelation. Burns, Robert (1759-96)

Scottish poet. He was born in poverty, the son of a peasant or 'cottar', but nevertheless became well-read in the Bible, ▷ Shakespeare, 18th-century English poetry, and also learnt some French. His best work, in the Lowland Scots dialect, was precipitated by his reading of the poet Robert Fergusson (1750–74), and was written between 1785 and 1790, during most of which time he was working as a farmer, an occupation which undermined his health. He intended to emigrate to Jamaica with Mary Campbell, but she died in childbirth in 1787. In the same year his Poems Chiefly in the Scots Dialect were published in Kilmarnock, and made him famous. He moved to Edinburgh where a new edition of the volume appeared in the following year, and where he was lionized as a 'natural' genius. He was a hard drinker and womanizer, and two vears after Mary Campbell's death he took as his wife Jean Armour, who had already borne children by him. He leased a farm and secured preferment in the excise service in Dumfries, despite his earlier sympathies for the French and American Revolutions. He devoted himself to reworking Scottish songs, which appeared in James Johnson's The Scots Musical Museum (1793-1803) and George Thomson's Select Scottish Airs with Poetry, but he became further impoverished, and succumbed to persistent ill health.

Perhaps Burns' best-known poems are sentimental lyrics, such as Auld Lang Syne or love songs like Ae fond Kiss, Highland Mary, and 'O my love's like a red, red rose'. His Cotter's Saturday Night celebrates Scottish peasant life in Spenserian stanzas, and other poems express a keen sympathy with the downtrodden and oppressed. But it is his comic satires which are now considered his best work: To a Mouse; The Twa Dogs; Tam O'Shanter, The Jolly Beggars. It is significant that those poems which attack Calvinism and the hypocrisy of kirk elders, such as The Twa Herds and Holy Willie's Prayer, were omitted from the Kilmarnock Poems of 1786. Even during his lifetime Burns was beginning to be viewed as a kind of Scottish > Poet Laureate, with all the distortions which this inevitably involved. Over the past two centuries, this status, together with the patriotism of Burns Night, have served to promote a glamorized myth, at the expense of a true appreciation of Burns' poetry.

Burton, Robert (1577-1640)

Oxford scholar and author. Burton was born in Leicestershire, and in 1593 entered Brasenose College, Oxford, where he was to remain. Besides the anti-Catholic Latin comedy Philosophaster (acted in 1618), Burton's one major project was the publication of his > Anatomy of Melancholy, a project which occupied him for the majority of his life. Bury, Charlotte (1775-1861)

Poet, novelist and diarist. Charlotte Bury was a glittering success as a literary hostess in Edinburgh, but this masked her actual poverty and she wrote because she needed to, rather than for pleasure or through dedication. Her circle included > Sir Walter Scott, > Susan Ferrier and Matthew Lewis; indeed, she was said to be the model for the heroine in Lewis' novel The Monk (> 'Monk' Lewis). Her own writings include Poems on Several Occasions (1797), seventeen unremarkable novels, and the sensational Diary Illustrative of the Times of George IV (1838). It was this last work, based upon her experiences as lady-in-waiting to the Princess of Wales (1810-15), that made her name, combining as it did astute political observation with salacious scandal.

Busie Body, The (1709)

Play by ➤ Susannah Centlivre. Sir George Airy, a wealthy young man, is in love with Miranda, but her old guardian, Sir Francis Gripe, intends her for himself. Sir Francis' son, also George's friend, Charles, is in love with Isabinda, whose father Sir Jealous Traffick wants her to marry a Spaniard. Charles' suit is additionally hindered by his impoverishment: his father has tricked him out of his inheritance, while Miranda is being denied her inheritance by Gripe. Another of Gripe's wards, Marplot, does his best to help the lovers, but invariably adds complications because of his bungling naïveté. The action proceeds by means of a series of scenes of deception and intrigue, often frustrated by Marplot, Eventually, Charles disguises himself as the Spanish suitor and marries Isabinda under her father's nose; his fortune is restored by means of writings stolen from Sir Francis by Miranda, while Miranda herself is also united with her lover. The appeal of the well-meaning but witless Marplot helped to make the play so popular that in 1710 it was played simultaneously at both ▷ Covent Garden and ➤ Drury Lane, and it survived well into the 19th century. A sequel, Marplot in Lisbon, or, The Second Part of the Busic Body (1710), achieved less success.

Bussy d'Ambois, The Tragedy of (1604)
The best-known tragedy by ▷ George Chapman, which dramatizes the rise and fall of Bussy d'Ambois at the court of Henri III of France. The play's complex rhetoric reflects the philosophic, particularly neo-Platonic (▷ Platonism) bent of the author's mind and sometimes inhibits its imaginative flow.

Butler, Charlotte (fl 1673-95)

Popular Restoration actress and singer, from a well-to-do family that had fallen on hard times. She specialized in playing young girls, as well as acting in breeches parts (women disguised as men and wearing men's clothes). She was alleged to be highly promiscuous, and was as famous for her supposed list of lovers as for her comic talent and beautiful voice. Between 1675 and 1692 she played at least 19 roles. Butler, Samuel (1612-80)

Poet. The son of a Worcestershire farmer, he became the friend of ⊳ Thomas Hobbes and ➤ Sir William D'Avenant. His mock-heroic (▷ Heroic, mock) satire on ▷ Puritanism, ➤ Hudibras, employs deliberately roughand-ready tetrameter couplets, which were frequently imitated by later poets and became known as 'hudibrasticks'. Butler's other works were neglected and most of them, including the Theophrastian Characters and the satire on > The Royal Society, The Elephant in the Moon (it is actually a mouse trapped in the telescope), were not published until 1759, when his Genuine Remains appeared. Bib: Johnson, S., in Lives of the Poets; Jack, I., Augustan Satire.

Butler, Samuel (1835-1902)

Satirist, scientific writer, author of an autobiographical novel, > The Way of All Flesh (1903) in a form which became a model for a number of 20th-century writers. His satires > Erewhon (an anagram of Nowhere) and Erewhon Revisited (1872 and 1901) are antiutopias, ie instead of exhibiting an imaginary country with ideal customs and institutions in the manner of Sir Thomas More's > Utopia (1516), Butler describes a country where the faults of his own country are caricatured, in the tradition of Jonathan Swift's Lilliput (Gulliver's Travels, 1726). He attacks ecclesiastical and family institutions; in Erewhon, machines have to be abolished because their evolution threatens the human race - a blow at Darwinism.

His scientific work concerned ▷ Charles Darwin's theory of evolution, to which he was opposed because he considered that it left no room for mind in the universe; he favoured the theory of ▷ Lamarck (1744–1829) with its doctrine of the inheritability of acquired characteristics. His disagreements and his own theories are expounded in Life and Habit (1877), Evolution Old and New (1879), Unconscious Memory (1880) and Luck or Cunning? (1886).

The Way of All Flesh attacks the parental tyranny which Butler saw as the constant feature of Victorian family life (despite much evidence to the contrary); so close did he keep to his own experience that he could not bring himself to publish his book in his own lifetime.

➤ George Bernard Shaw admitted a great debt to Butler's evolutionary theories and to Butler's stand against mental muddle, selfdeception and false compromise in society. Writers as different from Butler and from each other as D.H. Lawrence (1885–1930) and James Joyce (1882–1941) wrote autobiographical novels after him in which the facts were often as close to their own experience.

Butts, Mary (1890-1937)

Novelist. Mary Butts' novels, such as Armed With Madness (1928) and Death of Felicity Taverner (1932), combine stylistic innovation and an interest in myth and magic characteristic of the period of High Modernism. Indeed, Marianne Moore, HD, and ▶ Ford Madox Ford championed her writing, and at one time her reputation rivalled that of ➤ Katherine Mansfield or ▷ Virginia Woolf. The greatgranddaughter of a patron of ➤ William Blake, Mary Butts grew up in Dorset, this period of her life being recorded in a vivid and poetic autobiography, The Crystal Cabinet (1937). Mary Butts spent the 1920s in the literary Bohemia of Paris, but returned in her last years to the south west of England.

Byatt, A. S. (Antonia Susan) (b 1936) Novelist, critic and reviewer. Born in Sheffield and educated at the universities of Cambridge and Oxford, she has worked as a teacher and lecturer in English. The novelist ➤ Margaret Drabble is her sister. Her novels are influenced by the work of ⊳ Proust and of ⊳ Iris Murdoch (Byatt has published two books on Murdoch), and combine a realistic portrayal of English manners with symbolic structures and a wide range of reference to history, myth and art. The Shadow of a Sun (1964) is a feminist ➤ Bildungsroman about a girl seeking to escape from a dominating novelist father, while The Game (1967), a story of the tragic rivalry between two sisters, has overtones of the Fall of Man. The Virgin in the Garden (1979) and Still Life (1985) are the first two volumes of a projected tetralogy, intended to trace the lives of a group of characters from the accession of Queen Elizabeth II in 1952 up to the 1980 Post-Impressionist Exhibition in London. Byatt's later style includes quotation, allusion, narrative prolepses (anticipations of later events) and metafictional reflections on novel writing. Story collection: Sugar (1987). Her 1990 novel Possession is an academic > detective story which splices the tale of two young scholars' researches into the love between a male and female poet in the 19th century with the story of the romance itself. It became a ➤ best-seller and won the Booker Prize in 1990. Angels and Insects (1992), which consists of two ⊳ novellas, also combines 19th-century settings with literary concerns. Passions of the Mind (1991) is a volume of essays and Unruly Times a study of Wordsworth and Coleridge. Other Fiction: The Matisse Stories (1993); The Djinn in the Nightingale's Eye: Five Fairy Stories (1994).

Byrd, William (1540-1623)

Composer. Most well-known of all Elizabethan composers, Byrd is chiefly remembered for two innovative collections, Psalmes, Sonets and Songs (1588) and Psalmes, Songs and Sonnets (1611). Although these are often considered to be > madrigals, they are not influenced to any great extent by these Italian imports, and Byrd was more indebted to the writing and composition of his youth. He wrote a vast amount of music, including both sacred pieces and vocal parts for secular performance. He was a pupil of Thomas Tallis, with whom he held a monopoly on music publishing from 1575, and he also held the post of Organist of the Chapel Royal. However, although Byrd conformed to the Protestant state religion, he was a recusant and was excommunicated in 1598 for his Catholic practices. He chose, therefore, to live outside London so as not to attract attention, and this must certainly have hindered his efforts to attain valuable political patronage.

Byrom, John (1692-1763)

Poet. Inventor of a system of shorthand, Fellow of the Royal Society and student of religious mysticism. His posthumous Miscellaneous Poems (1773) are notable for their colloquial ease and moderate eloquence of tone.

Byron, George Gordon, Lord (1788–1824) Poet. His childhood was dominated by a sternly > Calvinist mother, a nurse who sexually abused and beat him, and painful medical treatment for his club foot. His incestuous relationship with his half-sister, Augusta Leigh, developed into a close friendship. In compensation for his deformity he prided himself on his physical prowess, particularly in swimming. While at Harrow and Cambridge he gained a reputation for atheism, radicalism and loose-living, keeping a bear as a pet for a time. At the age of 19 he published a collection of unremarkable lyrics, Hours of Idleness (1807). English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, a vigorous but immature heroic couplet poem in imitation of Pope, followed in 1800.

He travelled across Europe to Greece in 1810, involving himself in self-consciously romantic adventures. He swam across the Hellespont like Leander in the Greek legend, and dressed in Albanian costume. He wrote in a letter, 'I smoke, and stare at mountains, and twirl my mustachios very independently.' After his return in 1811 he published Cantos I and II of > Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812), a moody, self-dramatizing poem in ▶ Spenserian stanzas. It was an immediate success and he followed it with several hastily-written verse tales: The Bride of Abydos (1813) and The Giaour (1813), mainly in tetrameter couplets, The Corsair (1814) and Lara (1814), in loose heroic couplets. Each focuses on the characteristic Byronic hero: glamorous, haunted by the guilt of mysterious crimes, which he seeks to forget in violent and dangerous adventure. Lionized in society and pursued by various women, Byron ended by marrying the naive and inexperienced Anne Isabella (Annabella) Milbanke. Her intention to reform him failed, and the marriage broke up shortly after she had given birth to a daughter.

Byron left England for the last time in 1816, and met up with ➤ Percy Bysshe Shelley and ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin in Switzerland. Claire Clairmont, Mary's half-sister, gave birth to a daughter by Byron, but she died in infancy. About this time he wrote Childe Harold Canto III (1816) which he called 'a fine indistinct piece of poetical desolation', also > The Prisoner of Chillon (1816), and the gloom-laden drama, ➤ Manfred (1817). He travelled to Italy where, after a period of sexual promiscuity with all kinds of women, he eventually fell in love with Teresa Guiccioli, the 19-year-old wife of an elderly Italian nobleman. His uncomfortable role of cavaliere servente or tolerated lover, is indirectly reflected in > Beppo (1818), his first poem in ottava rima, a form which he made peculiarly his own, employing its rattling rhymes and concluding couplet to superb effect. It is also used in > Don Juan (1819-24) and The Vision of Judgement (1822). He became restless, and after Shelley had drowned in 1822, he decided to throw himself into the cause of Greek independence.

As he had remarked in a letter of 1820:

When a man hath no freedom to fight for at home, Let him combat for that of his neighbours; Let him think of the glories of Greece and of Rome, And get knock'ed on the head for his labours. In Greece he suffered further frustrations, including a disappointed passion for a Greek youth, Loukas. He began to feel his age, and expressed this poignantly in the lyric 'On this Day I Complete my Thirty-Sixth Year'. He contracted malaria, was bled several times by his doctors, and died at Missolonghi in 1824.

Byron's popular romantic reputation, based on the first cantos of Childe Harold, Manfred and the verse tales, is important in literary historical terms. On the Continent Byron has been regarded as a significant philosopher of ➤ Romanticism. However, Byron himself was dismissive of his 'Byronic' exercises in 'poetical desolation'. He preferred the brilliant wit of Pope to what he called the 'wrong poetical system' of his Romantic contemporaries. The real value of his poetry lies in his evocation of past civilizations in the fourth canto of Childe

Harold, and in his brilliantly casual poems in ottava rima. Byron's letters are often more vivid than his verse. His > autobiographical journal was destroyed after his death, and many of his letters were expurgated before being published by his friend > Thomas Moore in 1830. However the correspondence with his publisher ➤ John Murray has survived intact, and shows the same vitality as the later poetry, but expressed in less inhibited language. Bib: Marchand, L. Cade, Jack (d 1450)

A leader of a popular rebellion in the counties immediately south of London in 1450, during the reign of ➤ Henry VI (1422-61). The rebellion had temporary success, but later grew disorganized, and Cade was killed.

Caedmon (fl 650-70)

The first English poet to be known by name. According to ➤ Bede, who provides an account of Caedmon's life in his Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum (History of the English Church and its People), Caedmon was a Yorkshire cowherd who had a mystical experience late in life and became an inspired vernacular poet. He joined the monastic community at Whitby, during the incumbency of Abbess Hild (657-80), and produced many English versifications of scriptural works. Various > Old English religious poems have been linked spuriously with Caedmon's name but the only extant text which can be attributed to Caedmon is the 'Hymn of Creation', quoted by Bede, and found in English versions in two manuscripts of Bede's text.

Caesar, Augustus (Gaius Julius Caesar Octavianus) (63 BC-AD 14)

Great-nephew of Julius Caesar, and his adopted son. He adopted the surname Caesar and was awarded the title of Augustus by the Roman Senate. He overcame the political enemies and assassins of his uncle, Julius, and after defeating his other rivals (notably Mark Antony), he achieved complete power and became first Emperor of Rome. > Horace, > Virgil, ➤ Ovid, Propertius, Tibullus and ➤ Livy were his contemporaries; in consequence, 'an > Augustan age' has become a term to describe a high peak of literary achievement in any culture, whenever such achievement shows similar qualities of elegance, restraint and eloquence. In these qualities, France in the 17th century and England in the 18th century consciously emulated the Augustan age of Rome.

Octavius Caesar, in ▷ Shakespeare's ▷ Antony and Cleopatra, is a portrait (based on ▷ Plutarch) of Augustus during his struggle with Antony.

Caesar, Gaius Julius (? 102–44 BC)
Roman general, statesman and writer. He conquered Gaul (ie modern France) and in 55 and 54 BC undertook two expeditions to Britain. He described these wars in De Bello Gallico, a work long and widely used in English education for instruction in Latin. His victories led to civil war against his chief political rival, Gneius Pompeius, generally known in English as Pompey, whom he defeated. He then became dictator in Rome, but he was assassinated by other patricians, led by Marcus Brutus, for overthrowing Roman republican institutions.

For the Middle Ages, Julius Caesar represented all that was great in Rome. His life was described by the Greek biographer ➤ Plutarch and this with Plutarch's other biographies was translated into English by ➤ Sir Thomas North. ➤ Shakespeare used it as the basis for his play ➤ Julius Caesar.

Caird, Mona (1858-1932)

Novelist, born on the Isle of Wight. She married J.A. Henryson in 1877 and lived in Hampstead from then until the end of her life. From 1883 to 1915 she wrote seven novels, as well as a nonfictional work, The Morality of Marriage and Other Essays (1897). She argued, both in this work and in her fiction, for marriage reform. Her novels focus on the oppression that women can suffer, vet Caird also creates bold heroines who defy society's expectations. Much of the fiction is polemical in tone, with long speeches calling for changes in attitude. Caird herself saw > marriage as a patriarchal system of exchange, and advocated equal rights to child custody, divorce, and proper > education for women. Her novels include The Wings of Azreal (1889), A Romance of the Moors (1891) and The Daughters of Danaus (1894). Her last work was Stones of Sacrifice (1915). In the 1890s, her work was considered > 'New Woman' fiction.

Calvin, John (1509-1604)

French religious reformer and author of the Institutes of the Christian Religion (1535). He settled in Geneva, which was to become, under his influence, an important centre of one of the most disciplined and militant branches of Protestantism.

Calvin's teachings were widely influential in England, Scotland, France and Switzerland in the 17th century and later. Out of the Institutes and his book on predestination (published in 1552) emerged the five chief points of Calvinism, namely its belief in: (1) 'predestination', which holds that God has determined in advance who shall be 'elected' to 'eternal life' and who shall be condemned to everlasting damnation; (2) 'particular redemption', or the choosing of a certain predetermined number of souls redeemed by Christ's death; (3) 'original sin', which holds that the infant enters the world in a state of sinfulness, carrying with it the burden of Adam's fall; (4) 'irresistible grace', which argues that those chosen to be of the 'elect' have no means of resisting that choice; and (5) the final perseverance or triumph of the 'elect'.

Taken with Calvin's views on church government and the relation between state and ecclesiastical power, Calvinism was to be of enormous influence on the ▷ Church of England in the 16th and 17th centuries. From the early 17th century onwards his doctrines became those of the established church. Calvin's Institutes became a recognized textbook in the universities, and it was not until the rise of Arminianism under ▷ Archbishop William Laud in the pre-Civil War (▷ Civil Wars) years that an effective opposition to Calvin's influence was mounted.

Cambridge School, The

An avant-garde grouping of poets that began in the mid 1960s around J. H. Prynne, and which has continued to the present day with John Wilkinson and others. The Cambridge School has often and incorrectly been taken as a satellite of Prynne's lexical versatility and difficulty. It might more accurately be read as an English reaction first to such American writers as Charles Olson, Edward Dorn and Robert Creeley (the Black Mountain School) and latterly as a development, part welcoming and part critical, in relation to the Language group of American poets. Its chief participants include John James, Andrew Crozier, Peter Riley, and in recent years Rod Mengham, Denise Riley and Geoff Ward.

Camden, William (1551-1623)

Historian and antiquary. Camden was educated at Oxford and was appointed headmaster of Westminster School in 1593, where ➤ Ben Jonson was one of his pupils. His main works are Britannia (1586; an enlarged sixth edition appeared in 1607) and Annales (1615 and 1625), both of which were translated from the original Latin into English between 1610 and 1635 (Britannia was translated by Philemon Holland in 1610). All were scrupulously researched for example, he made a tour of Britain while writing Britannia - and he is recognized as one of the first modern historians who demanded authenticity in his sources, rather than relying upon mythology (> Tudor myth). He founded a chair of history at Oxford in 1621 and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Campbell, Ramsey (b 1946)

Novelist and journalist. Born and raised in Liverpool, Campbell is a leading light of Britain's 'new wave' of horror writers, described by Robert Hadji as 'the finest living exponent of the British weird fiction tradition'. Has published pseudonymously under the names Carl Dreadstone and Jay Ramsay. Campbell was a young devotee of H. P. Lovecraft whose style he mimicked in his early short stories, collected in The Inhabitant of the Lake and Less Welcome Tenants (1964). Although his first novel The Doll Who Ate His Mother (1976) was a minor success, Campbell came of age with The Face That Must Die (1979, revised 1983) which presents a coherently grim portrait of the world through the eyes of a psychotic. His subsequent novels successfully transpose the terrors of writers such as Lovecraft, M. R. James, Robert Aickmen and Arthur Machen into starkly realistic situations of modern urban collapse. A fierce defender of the honourable tradition of horror fiction, Campbell describes himself as 'working against the innate prejudices and conservatisms of the field', using visceral horror to make people look again at things they may have taken for granted. Campbell has also edited a number of horror anthologies and critical works. Works include Demons by Daylight (1973); The Parasite aka To Wake The Dead (1980); Incarnate (1983); Obsession (1985); Scared Stiff (1987); Ancient Images (1989); The Count of Eleven (1991); and Waking Nightmares (1992).

Campbell, Roy (1902-57)

A South African poet, mainly resident in England, and well known in the 1930s for his opposition to the dominant left-wing school of poets led by ➤ Auden, ➤ Spender and > Day Lewis whom he satirized under the composite name of Macspaunday. Much of his best verse was satirical in heroic ≥ couplets, a form otherwise very rare in 20th-century English verse. He also wrote eloquent, clearcut lyrics. He was vigorous in all he wrote, but not distinctively original. Among his bestknown works are: The Flaming Terrapin (1924), exalting the instinctive, vital impulses in man; The Waygoose (1928), a satire on South African writers; Adamastor and Georgiad. Amongst his finest works is his translation of the poems of San Juan de la Cruz, St John of the Cross (1951). Collected Poems in 3 volumes, 1960.

Campbell, The Clan

A Scottish clan, headed by the Duke of Argyll, which in the 17th and 18th centuries was one of the most powerful clans in the Highlands. The heads of the clan became dukes in the 18th century; their ancient Gaelic title is Macallum Mhor – the 'Great Campbell'. It was steadfast under its chiefs in its support of the > Presbyterian Church and the > Protestant succession, and in this it was opposed to other leading Highland clans who tended to support the > Catholic House of > Stuart

Campbell, Thomas (1777-1844)

Author of the reflective poem The Pleasures of Hope (1799), which includes the well-known couplet: ''Tis distance lends enchantment to the view, ⁄ And robes the mountain in its azure hue' (II 7–8). He also wrote narrative poems such as Gertrude of Wyoming (1809) in ▷ Spenserian stanzas, and Theodoric (1824) in couplets.

Campion, Edmund (1540-81)

English Catholic. After becoming a fellow of St John's College, Oxford in 1557, Campion enjoyed the patronage of the Earl of Leicester before fleeing to Rome in 1572 as a suspected Catholic. In Rome he joined the ➤ Jesuit order in 1573, before being ordained a priest in 1578 and being chosen to return to England as a priest in 1580. In England he distributed anti-Protestant material (specifically the Decem Rationes in 1581) and was arrested, sent to the Tower, tortured and finally executed in 1581. His death was said to have been the cause of many former Protestants in England returning to Catholicism. He was the subject of a hagiographic biography, Evelyn Waugh's Edmund Campion.

Campion, Thomas (1567-1620)

English lyric poet and musician. He wrote and composed when the art of English song was at its height; the words do not exist merely as a pretext for the music, but are so composed that the music brings out their expressiveness. This led naturally to metrical experiment, and the resulting increase of rhythmic flexibility no doubt influenced the playwrights in the great range of expression which they achieved in ⊳ blank verse. Campion wrote ayres, > madrigals and > masques. Despite his fine command of the rhymed > lyric, he wrote an essay against the use of rhyme, Observations in the Art of English Poetry (1602). This provoked a reply in one of the more important Elizabethan critical essays, > Samuel Daniel's Defence of Ryme.

Campion's reputation suffered in the early part of this century due to the championing of Donne and 'metaphysical' poetry (▷ Metaphysical poets) by critics such as T. S. Eliot (1888-1965). But his reputation has always fluctuated considerably - his contemporaries ▶ Ben Jonson and Daniel both attacked him in print. The chief difference between a poet such as Campion and the styles developed by Donne is that Campion is concerned with the auditory effects of poetry rather than concentrating on the striking effects of images. However, recent materialist criticism has highlighted Campion's awareness of the changing political situation and has suggested that his poetry and masques are more critical of the court than the previous emphasis on oral play would suggest.

Candida (1898)

One of the Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant by P George Bernard Shaw. Its theme is the conflict between two views of life: the lofty, vague one of the poet Marchbanks, and the narrow but practical one of the Christian Socialist clergyman Morell. Both men are rivals for the love of Morell's wife, Candida.

Canning, George (1770-1827)

Politician and poet. Although Canning is chiefly known for his roles as foreign secretary (1822) and prime minister (1827), he was also a fine writer of speeches and a minor poet. He was the founder of and contributor to the short-lived anti-liberal paper The Anti-Jacobin (1797).

Canon

This introduces one of the most contentious areas of contemporary critical debate. In general terms, the canon refers to a body of writing sanctioned by authority and its origins are in church law. In literary studies the term is used in two senses. In the first sense it refers to works recognized to be authentically by a particular writer when there is doubt about authorship. However the term is now more commonly used to refer to a body of work by various writers which is declared to be of the highest or most significant quality. Often this is related to a particular national literature (as in the canon of English Literature) or a trans-national group such as 'The Western Canon'. The canon is contentious today for a number of reasons. First, what is often a conservative emphasis on national identity or traditional thought is seen to exclude certain minority groups (for example, black, women or gay writers) from the canon which is therefore said to fail to reflect the full diversity of the community. But more generally, the idea of the canon has also fallen into disfavour because recent criticism is unable to agree on reliable criteria - moral, political or aesthetic - for its selection. This makes any attempt to draw up a canon appear arbitrary and/or unjust. The dispute about the canon therefore touches some central problems in modern cultural debate, including the question of whether there can be purely aesthetic criteria of judgement about art works. A third and very substantial objection to the canon simply questions any need for it in a world which is increasingly relativistic in its ideas. This is the object of much ▷ postmodern theory.

Canon's Yeoman's Prologue and Tale, The One of > Chaucer's > Canterbury Tales. Its authenticity as a 'Chaucerian' work has been questioned because it is not included in the early Hengwrt manuscript of the Tales. The Prologue to the Tale recounts how the Canon's Yeoman meets up with the pilgrims en route for Canterbury and decides to leave his master, the Canon, and join the company. Although the Canon's Yeoman begins by praising his master, he decides to expose the fraudulence of his alchemical practices in particular and those of alchemy in general in his Tale. His description of the alchemical art of the Canon is followed by a story (not about his master, he insists) in which a canon tricks a priest out of £,40 by pretending to teach him the secret of making precious metals by alchemical means.

Canterbury Tales, The

A famed story-collection by ➤ Geoffrey Chaucer, begun sometime in the later 1380s. The General Prologue gives details of the occasion for the story-telling, relating how a group of pilgrims, bound for the shrine of ➤ St Thomas Becket at Canterbury, meet up at the ➤ Tabard Inn in Southwark. The pilgrims are introduced in a sequence of portraits which focus on the professional activities of the company (who number 31 in all). The material for these portraits derives partly from a long-standing literary tradition of social analysis and satire, but Chaucer enlarges the scope of the crosssection of society on the pilgrimage by including a broader range of bourgeois professionals in the group. The varied format and style of the descriptive cameos (in which details of dress, character or professional habits are mentioned seemingly at random) enhances the impression of the individuality of the pilgrims, who are introduced by a pilgrim-narrator whose stance is that of a reporter of events.

The list of portraits begins with that of the Knight, a representative of the higher levels of the social élite, who is travelling with his son, the Squire, and their Yeoman. The focus then shifts to the description of members of the clerical elite on the trip, including a Prioress, a Monk and a Friar. There is no clear-cut ordering principle in the sequence of portraits which follows (other than perhaps a broad downward movement through the social scale), describing a Merchant, a Clerk of Oxford, a Lawyer, a Franklin, a group of five Guild members, their wives and their Cook, a Shipman, a Physician, a Wife of Bath, a Parson and his brother, a Ploughman, a Miller, a Manciple, a Reeve and, finally, a Summoner and a Pardoner who pair up as travelling companions. The pilgrim-narrator himself is described in more detail at a later point on the journey. The General Prologue concludes with an account of how the Host of the Tabard Inn, Harry Bailey, devises a story-telling competition to take place on the round trip to Canterbury. The pilgrims agree to tell two stories each on the forward and return journeys; Harry Bailey plans to accompany the pilgrims, act as games-master and reward the pilgrim providing the best story with a meal on return to Southwark.

Diversity seems to be the organizing principle of the collection. The Canterbury Tales includes an extraordinarily wide range of material in verse (in rhymed decasyllabic couplets, > rhyme royal verse) and prose, covering a wide range of literary genres and forms: > romances, > fabliaux, an animal fable, saints' lives, exemplary narratives, a moral treatise, a prose treatise on the process of penitence (which concludes the game). The relationship between 'earnest' and 'game', between serious and playful literary material, is one of the running topics of debate within and between the tales.

Judging from the condition of the extant manuscript copies of the Canterbury Tales, the project outlined by Harry Bailey in the General Prologue was never completed by Chaucer. The Canterbury Tales has the status of a 'work in progress', comprising a series of fragmentary tale-telling sequences, some of which are linked by dramatic interactions between the pilgrims and Harry Bailey, some of which begin and end without any contextual framing, and some of which show signs of being linked to other tellers at an earlier stage in the process of compilation. However, the opening and closing sequences of the Tales are provided and from these it seems that the literary plan was designed to change en route from a round journey to a oneway trip. The last tale of the sequence, the Parson's prose treatise on penitence, signals not only the end of the journey to Canterbury, but also the end of story-telling altogether, and is followed in most manuscripts by Chaucer's literary Retraction.

None of the 82 manuscripts of the Tales was copied during Chaucer's lifetime, and variations in form, style and tale-teller linkage are apparent. Some of the variations seem to reflect the attempts of later scribes and editors to tidy up some of the loose ends of the storycollection and provide more cohesive links for the series of fragmentary sequences left by Chaucer. Modern editions of the Canterbury Tales are based on two important early-15thcentury manuscripts: the Ellesmere manuscript (E) and the Hengwrt manuscript (H). The form and arrangement of the text in E have provided the basis for the most accessible editions of the Tales (by F. N. Robinson, revised and updated by Larry Benson et al.). In E, 22 of the pilgrims mentioned in the Prologue produce a tale, beginning with the > Knight, followed by the ➤ Miller, the ➤ Reeve, the ➤ Cook, the ➤ Man of Law, the ➤ Wife of Bath, the > Friar, the > Summoner, the > Clerk, the > Merchant, the > Squire, the > Franklin, the > Physician, the > Pardoner, the > Shipman, the > Prioress, the pilgrim / narrator (who tells two tales), > Sir Thopas, which is rejected by the host, and > Melibeus, the > Monk, the > Nun's Priest, the > Second Nun, the > Canon's Yeoman (who joins the pilgrimage en route), the > Manciple and finally the > Parson. It is now generally accepted that the E text has been quite extensively edited by Chaucer's literary executors and represents a later, tidied-up version of the text represented in H, and more recently, the Hengwrt manuscript has been used as the basis for new editions of the Canterbury Tales (by N. Blake, by Paul Ruggiers and David Baker). The differences between the two versions are mainly in the ordering and linking of the tales: the E text has more connected sequences of stories and contains the ➤ Canon's Yeoman's Prologue and Tale, which is not in H.

Since its publication by Chaucer's literary executors, the Canterbury Tales has had an active 'afterlife'. Some new tales were added to the collection by 15th-century editors (notably > Gamelyn), an attempt was made to continue the narrative after the arrival at Canterbury (in the Tale of Beryn) and > John Lydgate, the prolific court writer of the 15th century, wrote himself into the literary event of the Tales in his work The Siege of Thebes, which opens with a description of Lydgate himself joining the pilgrimage and then contributing his Theban story to the competition. Translations of selected tales were made by ▷ Dryden and ▷ Pope. The attention given to the Canterbury Tales, in relation to the rest of the Chaucerian canon. has varied according to the critical temper and tastes of the time, but the enormous attention given by modern scholars and critics to the phenomenon of the Tales is only the most recent stage in the long history of their critical reception. The Canterbury Tales continues to be a work in progress.

Canto

Used in Italian literature as a division of a long poem, such as might be sung or chanted at one time (canto = song). The term has been borrowed for some long poems in English

> Pound, Ezra.

Cantos, The

Long poem by ➤ Ezra Pound, unfinished at his death. The English collected edition runs to 119

> cantos, and began publication with the first three cantos (later revised) in 1917. Loosely based on the 100 cantos of Dante's Divine Comedy, it attempts a panoramic, encyclopaedic survey of both western and oriental history, dwelling in particular on those rulers and thinkers who had exemplary significance for Pound: Confucius, Sigismondo Malatesta, Duke of Rimini, the early American presidents and Mussolini. Its main targets are usurious international finance and armament manufacturers. However, with the collapse of ⊳ fascism the later stages of the poem became successively more mystical and self-consciously exploratory, and it meditates on Pound's vision of the ideal rather than on the possibilities of its earthly realization. Canute (Cnut) (c 994-1035)

A Danish king of England with a well-documented historical reign, although he has assumed a sort of mythical status in English history. He is especially remembered for the story recorded by the 16th century chronicler ➤ Holinshed about his rebuke to his flatterers. When they declared him all-powerful, he sat down by the seashore and forbade the incoming tide to wet his royal feet. When nonetheless the waves came on, he demonstrated to his courtiers that a king had no more power over nature than an ordinary man.

Captain Singleton, Adventures of (1720)
A novel by ▷ Daniel Defoe. Like the heroes and heroines of Defoe's other novels, Singleton has at first no morality and takes to a life of wandering adventure; some of this takes place in Africa (which Defoe knew only from reading and hearsay). Later he becomes a pirate in the Indian Ocean and further east; finally he settles down in England, a respectable married man, converted to a religious life. The story is told in the first person.

Carew, Jan (b 1925)

Guyanese novelist, poet and playwright. He has worked as a writer, actor, lecturer (University of London extra-mural department), radio editor (BBC Overseas Service) and broadcaster. He is now a professor of English in the USA. His novels include: Black Midas (1958); The Wild Coast (1958); The Last Barbarian (1961); Moscow is Not My Mecca (1964). His plays include University of Hunger (1966) and Black Horse, Pale Rider (1970). Streets of Eternity (1952) and Sea Drums in My Blood (1981) are volumes of poetry, and he has also published books for children, television and radio plays and historical works.

Carew, Thomas (1594–1640) Poet. In the 1630s Carew was a member of the court of ▷ Charles I, and his association with the court and the group of poets moving either within or on the fringe of court circles in the pre-Civil War years, has led him to be grouped as one of the ▷ 'Cavalier' poets. His first important work was his elegy on the death of ▷ John Donne, which appeared in the first edition of Donne's poems in 1633. In 1634 his ▷ masque Coelum Britannicum was performed by the king and his gentlemen. His Poems were published in 1640 with further editions in 1642 and 1651.

Carew's poetry is remarkable for its combination of eroticism, wit and logical demonstration. His elegy on Donne, as well as representing a tribute to the dead poet, also offers itself as a critical statement in its own right, and is an important commentary on the type of verse which came to be known as > 'metaphysical'.

Carey, Mary (c 1610-80)

Poet and devotional writer. Carey began her spiritual life at the age of 18 when she recovered. from a serious illness, and began collecting together her meditations in verse and prose c 1653. Although these may be found in manuscript form at the Bodleian Library, Oxford, selections are published in Kissing the Rod, ed. G. Greer (1988). She was married twice, the second time to George Payler, a Parliamentarian paymaster whose occupation ensured that Carey was continually moving about the country from garrison to garrison. Her poems are dedicated to Payler and a number of her works, which are usually in the form of a dialogue, appear as conversations with him. She also includes exchanges with God and Satan, as well as the conventional dialogue poem between body and soul (▷ Andrew Marvell). Her tone is always modest and pious, although she often questions God as to why her babies were allowed to die. Bib: Blain, V. et al (eds.), The Feminist Companion to Literature in English.

Carey, Peter (b 1943)

Australian novelist and short-story writer. He has published two volumes of short stories: The Fat Man in History (1974) (in the U.K. as Exotic Pleasures, 1981) and War Crimes (1979). His first two novels were: Bliss (1981), a bleak black comedy of the Australian suburbs about a man who believes himself to be dead and in Hell; and Illywhacker (1985), which combines realist elements with an outrageously Department unreliable narrator, who announces on the first page that he is a 'terrible liar'. These were followed by: Oscar and Lucinda (1988), which won the Booker Prize, and The Tax Inspector (1991), a sinister and violent story about abuse within a family over several generations in a suburb of Sydney. Carey is often described as a fabulist, and has acknowledged the influence on his work of the magic realism of Gabriel García Márquez.

Carey, Rosa Nouchette (1840-1909) English novelist. The eighth child of a shipowner, she was born in Stratford-le-Bow, London, and educated at home and at the Ladies' Institute, St John's Wood. Her first published novel was Nellie's Memories (1868), a story she had originally told to her sister before transcribing it several years later. Carey was deeply religious and conservative, believing strongly that woman's role was domestic and maternal. This attitude is reflected in the numerous short stories she wrote for the Girls' Own Paper and in the thirty-nine novels she published between 1868 and 1909. Her works include Wee Wifie (1869); Not Like Other Girls (1884); The Sunny Side of the Hill (1908) and Barbara Heathcote's Trial (1909). She also produced a volume of ▷ biographies: Twelve Notable Good Women of the 19th Century (1899).

Carker, James

A character in Dickens' novel > Dombey and Son. He is a vicious character and one of Dickens' most successful depictions of villainy, and beautifully tied in with the development of the railways.

Carleton, Mary (?1633-1673)

English writer, born in Canterbury. She adapted the codes and conventions of scandalous chronicle to her own history. She was already married when she moved to London, claiming to be a German lady or princess. She soon married John Carleton, but when each discovered the other did not have the estate they pretended, he accused her of bigamy. A corpus of writings grew up, including The Case of Madam Mary Carleton and A True Account (both 1663), and An Historical Narrative of the German Princess.

Mary Carleton acted in a satire about her own story, called The German Princess. She was later convicted of theft and transported to Jamaica. She escaped, but was eventually caught and hanged.

Carlyle, Jane Welsh (1801–66)

Woman of letters and literary personality. Jane Baillie Welsh was born in Haddington, East Lothian, the daughter of a doctor who gave her a rigorous classical education from the age of five. At school she impressed her tutor Edward Irving with her character and intelligence, and he introduced her to the historian and critic > Thomas Carlyle in 1821. They married in 1826, and became the centre of an intellectual and literary circle. Her greatest friend was > Geraldine Jewsbury, and she knew such figures as > John Stuart Mill and > Harriet Taylor, ➤ Charles Dickens and ➤ Tennyson. She is celebrated as one of the greatest letterwriters in the English language, observant and caustic but generous and kind and a witty observer of social behaviour. Her subjects include travel, books, personalities and servants and her correspondence has been published in editions by J.A. Froude (1883); L. Huxley (1924) and T. Scudder (1931). Between 1834 and 1866, the Carlyles lived at Chevne Row, Chelsea, though they were often apart. Their relationship was fraught and difficult; some biographers have suggested that sexual impotence contributed to the marital stress. Nevertheless she was her husband's chief protector and critic. In the early 1860s Jane's health collapsed and she lived in fear of a mental breakdown, dying suddenly in 1866.

Carlyle, Thomas (1795-1881)

Scottish essayist, historian, philosopher. The term 'philosopher' is inapppropriate to him if it implies the use of the reason for the logical investigation of truth; his friend ➤ John Stuart Mill, who was a philosopher in this sense, called Carlyle a poet, meaning that he reached his conclusions by imaginative intuition. In his old age he became known as 'the sage of Chelsea'; this is the kind of admiration that he received in England between 1840 and his death. He hated spiritual mediocrity, mere contentment with material prosperity, moral lassitude and the surrender to scientific scepticism and analytic reasoning. All these he regarded as characteristic of British civilization in the mid-19th century. Part of their cause was the overwhelming technical advances resulting from the > Industrial Revolution; he also considered the immense popularity of the poet Byron (1788-1824) had helped to disintegrate spiritual wholeness because of the cynicism and pessimism of his poetry, and he distrusted equally the influence on the English mind of the coldly logical French philosophers. To counter Byron, he pointed to the spiritual health which he found in Goethe (1749-1832), and to counter the French he advocated the more emotional and intuitive 18th- and 19th-century German thinkers like Richter and Goethe.

Carlyle's influence derives even more, however, from his own character and the environment from which he sprang. His father had been a Scottish stonemason, with the moral energy and intellectual interests which comes partly from the influence of Scottish Calvinism (> Presbyterianism). This religious tradition in Scotland had much in common with 17th-century Puritanism which had left such a strong mark on the English character; the resemblance between the two traditions helps to account for the hold which Carlyle established on the English imagination. His own personality was strong and individualistic; this, combined with his intention of counteracting the abstract intellectual thought of writers like > Bentham, caused him to write in an eccentric prose style, distorting natural word order and using archaic language. His > Sartor Resartus ('Tailor Repatched', 1833-4) is a disguised spiritual ➤ autobiography in which he faces the tendencies to intellectual scepticism and spiritual denial in himself, and dedicates himself to a life of spiritual affirmation. He is unable to base this affirmative spirit on the traditional religious beliefs that had supported his father, so that he has to base it on his own will, his imaginative response to nature and the inspiration provided by the lives of great men.

History was for Carlyle the storehouse of example of these great men, his 'Heroes' - and it is in this spirit that we have to approach his historical works: > French Revolution (1837). > On Heroes, Hero-Worship and the Heroic in History (1841), Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches (1845) and Frederick II of Prussia (1858-65). In \triangleright 'Signs of the Times' (1829), Chartism (1839) and ➤ Past and Present (1843) he criticized the mechanistic philosophy which he saw underlying contemporary industrial society, and in Latter-Day Pamphlets (1850) he attacked the quasi-scientific treatment of social questions by the rationalist political economists. Shooting Niagara - and After?, written at the time of the Second Parliamentary Reform Bill in 1867, reflects his total disbelief in the efficacy of mere political reform.

As a historian, Carlyle wanted history to be related to the life of the ordinary human being; as a social thinker, his advocacy of the imaginative approach to man in society relates him to the thought of Coleridge, whom he knew through his friend John Sterling (Life of John Sterling, 1851), and also to his own disciple, > John Ruskin.

Carnival

The literal meaning of this term is the 'saying good-bye' to meat at the start of Lent.

Traditionally it was a period of feasting during the Christian calendar which reached its climax on Shrove Tuesday, and included many forms of festive inversion of normal behaviour, often comic and mocking of authority. To this extent it signifies a spontaneous eruption of those social forces shortly to be restrained by Lent. This sense of disruption of the norm has brought the term 'carnival' into the language of contemporary critical theory. > Mikhail Bakhtin first used the term to describe a form of festive language which threatens disruption and challenges the social order. The association of carnival with popular energies highlights the political tension between official ➤ ideology and potentially subversive energies. In contemporary critical theory, the carnivalesque points to the polyphonic nature of literary texts, identifying in them a series of different and frequently opposing 'voices'.

Carpenter, Edward (1844-1929)

Late-19th-century writer and socialist reformer associated with the > Arts and Crafts Movement and other forms of ⊳ anti-industrialism. An undergraduate at Cambridge University from 1864 he was ordained in 1869 but from 1874 onwards he reacted against the social and religious conventions of his time, abandoning the church to follow his idiosyncratic form of primitive Communism. He became a travelling lecturer and part of the newly founded university extension movement which was designed to serve those unable to attend universities. He was greatly influenced by the sensual and passionately democratic writings of US poet Walt Whitman (1819-92) and by the essayist Henry David Thoreau, an advocate of civil disobedience in the face of unjust laws. Whitman, in particular, changed the course of Carpenter's life and his long unrhymed poem Towards Democracy (1883; expanded 1905) owes much to Whitman's verse forms. The two met in 1877 during Carpenter's visit to the United States.

Carpenter's form of Communism was based more on social reform and a return to rural crafts than on political revolution, and he shared many of the concerns and enthusiasms of > John Ruskin and > William Morris. He expounded his ideas in a number of prose works including England's Ideal (1887), and Civilisation: its Cause and Cure (1889; expanded 1912). He supported a number of other causes, many of them controversial, including: women's rights, sexual reform and vegetarianism. His unconventional ideas on sexuality - in particular > homosexuality, which he openly advocated - brought him a number of admirers including the novelists E.M. Forster (1879–1970) and D.H. Lawrence (1885-1930). The psychologist and essayist > Havelock Ellis was deeply impressed with Carpenter's writings on relationships between the sexes – in particular Love's Coming of Age (1896) – and homosexuality – The Intermediate Sex (1908). These and his other writings on the relationship between art and life, such as Angel's Wings (1898) and The Art of Creation (1904), were widely read and translated bringing him many visitors to his small farm at Millthorpe, near Chesterfield, where he settled in 1883. He lived there with a succession of working-class acquaintances until 1922. His autobiography, My Days and Dreams, was published in 1916. Carr, J.L. (1912-95)

Novelist. Carr ran his own publishing company from his home in Kettering, Northamptonshire, England, producing also children's writing, reference works and anthologies of poetry. His novel A Month in the Country (1980) won the Guardian fiction prize and was adapted for television; its several strands of plot revolve around the uncovering of mysteries from the past, and it makes characteristic use of a firstperson narrative by an observing character. The Harpole Report (1972) is a satirical comedy about a modern primary school, which makes use of letters and journals as part of the narrative. His other novels are: A Day in Summer (1964); A Season in Sinji (1967); How Steeple Sinderby won the F.A. Cup (1975); The Battle of Pollock's Crossing (1985); What Hetty Did (1988); Harpole and Foxberrow, General Publishers (1992); The First Saturday in May (1993).

Carrington (1893-1932)

Carrington (who did not use her first name) was a central figure in the ▷ Bloomsbury Group, and the live-in companion of ▷ Lytton Strachey (whose homosexuality prevented her passion for him from being expressed in marriage or any sexual connection). She is best known for her letters and diaries (published as Carrington: Letters and Extracts from her Diaries, edited by David Garnett (1970)). Carrington studied art at the Slade School with many of the more well-known artists of the day, and was herself a gifted painter.

Carroll, Lewis (Charles Lutwidge Dodgson)
(1832-98)

Writer for children; author of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865) and Through the Looking-Glass (1872). By profession, a mathematics lecturer at Oxford University. The 'Alice' books describe the adventures of a child in dreams, and owe their distinctiveness to the combination of childlike naivety and an authentic dream atmosphere, so that events succeed and language is used with dream logic instead of daylight logic. Thus these two books mark an epoch in the history of dream literature; the dream state is not merely a pretext for fantasy, but is shown to follow its own laws. Consequently Carroll's two masterpieces have had as much appeal for adults as for children. Dodgson was also a master of ▷ 'nonsense' verse which shows the same characteristics; his most famous poem is The Hunting of the Snark (1876). His other book for children, Sylvie and Bruno (1889), is less memorable.

Carswell, Catherine (1879-1946)

Novelist and critic. Catherine Carswell was a member of the 'Other Bloomsbury' - the circle centred on > D. H. Lawrence which strove to distinguish itself from ➤ Virginia Woolf's more cerebral and self-consciously bohemian group (> Bloomsbury). One of the first favourable critics of Lawrence's > The Rainbow (her review of the book lost her her job at the Glasgow Herald in 1915), Carswell's famous The Savage Pilgrimage (1932) is a vindication of Lawrence against ⊳ John Middleton Murry's pseudo-Freudian attack on his former friend, Son of Woman (1931). Lawrence encouraged Carswell in her novelistic endeavours, including Open the Door (1920). The Camomile (1922). Her autobiography appeared posthumously in 1952 as Lying Awake.

Carter, Angela (1940-92)

Novelist and short-story writer. From her first novel, Shadow Dance (1066), her work was notable for a strain of surrealist ➤ Gothic fantasy, a fascination with the erotic and the violent, and a blending of comedy and horror. The Magic Toyshop (1967) is a > Freudian fairy-tale seen through the eyes of an orphaned 15-year-old girl, sent, with her brother and baby sister, to live in the claustrophobic and sinister home of her uncle, a sadistic toymaker. Her new family are examples of Carter's ability to create vivid Dickensian caricatures. After Several Perceptions (1968) her work became unequivocally Gothic and anti-realist, centring on the reworking of myth and fairytale, and the exploration of aggressive and sexual fantasies. Heroes and Villains (1969), The Infernal Desire Machines of Doctor Hoffman (1972) and The Passion of New Eve (1977) are bizarre and fantastic visions of imaginary worlds, projections of the 'subterranean areas behind everyday experience', with picaresque and pastiche elements. One of her collections of short stories, The Bloody Chamber (1979), is a feminist re-working of traditional European fairy-tales; one of these stories, 'The Company of Wolves', was filmed by Neil Jordan in 1984, with screenplay by Angela Carter. Her interest in the politics of sexuality is reflected in her non-fiction work The Sadeian Woman (1979), an analysis of the codes of ⊳ pornography. Her other novels are: Love (1971); Nights at the Circus (1984). Story collections are: Fireworks (1974); Black Venus (1985); Come Unto These Yellow Sands (1985) (radio plays). Her last novel was Wise Children (1991), a pastiche of family life in theatrical and vaudeville circles, and is perhaps Carter's most comic and accessible text, although overall her powerful work has been categorized as fantasy, > science fiction and anti-realist. Two posthumous colllections have appeared: Expletives Deleted: Selected Writings (1992), and American Ghosts and Old World Wonders (1993).

Carter, Elizabeth (1717-1806)

English correspondent, poet, linguist and ▶ Bluestocking. She lived with her father (who was a preacher at Canterbury cathedral) in Deal, Kent. He taught her Latin, Greek and Hebrew, and she also learned French, Italian, Spanish, German and some Arabic. Skilled also in music, mathematics and geography, she spent her life studying. She translated Epictetus, published a volume of poetry, made > translations from French and Italian, wrote for > Samuel Johnson's > The Rambler (March 1750-March 1752) and > The Gentleman's Magazine (to which Johnson also contributed). Her correspondence with ➤ Catherine Talbot and Elizabeth Montagu display a sharp critical intellect. She regarded ➤ Katherine Philips' poetry about friendship between women as 'very moral and sentimental'.

Cartland, Barbara (b 1901)

Romantic novelist. According to the Guinness Book of Records, Barbara Cartland holds the record as the most prolific living author. She has written over 300 books, including 27 in 1977 alone, and she has a deeply loyal, overwhelmingly female, readership. Her novels are remarkable for their sheer numbers and similarity of plot and theme: although she has written drama, biography and other non-fiction, she is known to many as the ▶ best-selling author of a conservative brand of romantic fiction which champions the escapist delights of marriage, monogamy and absolute sexual difference. Her heroines are nothing if not feminine, and Cartland's preference for pink is legendary. Whilst she could in no sense be deemed a feminist writer, she has been writing constantly since the 1920s (her first novel was published in 1925), and is something of a figurehead for older women in her fierce commitment to her writing career (despite her obvious wealth and connections to the British aristocracy, and despite the doctrine of her own books which suggests that a woman's identity should be found in her husband rather than in her own work), and in her active attitude to health and fitness (she has recently set up a successful health-food business, and in 1971 published her Health Food Cookery Book). Her books include: 7ig-Saw (1925); Touch the Stars (1935); Love is an Eagle (1951); Love Under Fire (1960); Men Are Wonderful (1973); A Shaft of Sunlight (1982); Tempted to Love (1983); and A Runaway Star (1987).

Cary, Anne (1615–1671)

Biographer. Anne Cary was one of the younger daughters of the prophetess ➤ Elizabeth Cary, whose ▷ biography she wrote. Anne and her three sisters escaped their father's Protestant household to live with their Catholic mother, and in time they too converted and became nuns. They also helped their two younger brothers to escape. It is most likely that Anne, later Dame Clementia, wrote the biography, although there is a slight possibility that it was another daughter, Mary, since both joined the Benedictine convent at Cambrai where the work was composed. The manuscript work remains with the nuns, but was published in 1861 as The Lady Falkland, her Life from a ms in the Imperial Archives at Lisle, ed. Richard Simpson.

➤ Catholicism.

Cary, Arthur Joyce Lunel (1888–1957)
Novelist. He was born in Northern Ireland, where there is a strong tradition of ▷ Protestantism; he was brought up against a background of devout Anglicanism, lost his faith, and later constructed an unorthodox but strongly ethical faith of his own along Protestant lines. He came late to the writing of novels. He studied as an art student in Edinburgh and Paris before going to Oxford University. In 1912-13 he fought, and served in the Red Cross, in the Balkan War. In 1913 he joined the Nigerian political service, fought against the Germans in West Africa in World War I, and returned to the political service after it. His first novel, Aissa Saved, appeared in 1932. His subsequent works were: An American Visitor (1933); The African Witch (1936); Castle Corner (1938); Mister Johnson (1939); Charley is my Darling (1940); A House of Children (1941); the trilogy Herself Surprised (1941), To Be a Pilgrim (1942) and The Horse's Mouth (1944); The Moonlight (1946); A Fearful Joy (1949); another trilogy, Prisoner of Grace (1952), Except the Lord (1953), and Not Honour More (1955); The Captive and the Free (1959). Spring Song (1960) is a collection of stories. He also produced three volumes of verse, Verse (1908), Marching Soldier (1945) and The Drunken Sailor (1947), and a number of political tracts - Power in Men (1939), The Case for African Freedom (1941; revised 1944), Process of Real Freedom (1943), and Britain and West Africa (1946).

In the first 30 years of the 20th century novelists tended to be open to foreign influences and experimental in expression; Cary was among the first distinguished novelists to return to English traditions and direct narrative, although he here and there uses the ≥ stream of consciousness technique of narration evolved by novelists of the 1920s, notably ➤ James Jovce. He is one of the most eclectic of modern novelists, both in method and in subject. In his comedy and his loose, vigorous narrative he has been compared to the 18th-century novelists > Smollett and > Defoe; in his characterization, to ▷ Dickens; in his attitude to human nature, to > D. H. Lawrence; in his concern with heroic morality, to ➤ Joseph Conrad; in his endeavour to present experience with immediacy, to ▷ Virginia Woolf and Joyce; in his interlocking of human destiny and social patterns he might be compared with ▶ George Eliot. His first three novels and Mister Johnson are products of his African experience; Charley is my Darling and A House of Children are novels of childhood, and his two trilogies - thought by some to be his major work - are attempts, in his words, to see 'English history, through English eyes, for the last 60 years'. Cary, Lady Elizabeth (1585–1639) Dramatist and translator. At 15 she was married to Henry Cary, Lord Falkland and until 1626 she tried to please her husband in all things, presenting herself as the ideal Renaissance woman – 'chaste, silent and obedient'. During this period she wrote her most well-known work,

The Tragedie of Mariam (pub. 1613), which is the first original drama in English written by an Englishwoman. Written in the ▷ Senecan mode, it recounts the story of King Herod's wife, Mariam, who is eventually executed on his orders, and the plot closely follows Cary's source text, Josephus' Antiquities. However, the female characters are subtly changed so that the central issue of the play becomes how an independent woman is caught between the public and political demands of queenship and her personal emotions. In the play it becomes impossible to balance these differing demands and tragedy inevitably ensues. Cary also wrote an unfinished play, The History of King Edward II (1627), which shows a major development in her skill at handling lengthy plot sequences and many diverse characters. This latter play was erroneously published under her husband's name in 1680. The crisis in Elizabeth Cary's own attempts to reconcile her public duty to her husband and her private religious convictions occurred in 1626 when she converted to > Catholicism. She became estranged from her husband, who removed their children from her care and reduced her to poverty, but she continued to write. Cary's major scholarly achievement at this time was the translation of the complete works of Jacques Davy, Cardinal Du Perron, which remained unpublished with the exception of Du Perron's reply to James I's attack on his works. This was issued in 1630 with a dedication to Henrietta Maria, in which she clearly takes pride in her female authorship. Few copies survive, as it was ordered to be burned. Later she became reconciled to her husband and was with him at his death in 1633. One of her daughters, probably > Anne Cary, wrote her biography.

'Cassandra' (1859)

A bitter and impassioned discourse on the role and position of women which concludes the second volume (entitled Practical Deducations) of Florence Nightingale's (> Crimean War) unpublished book Suggestions for Thought to Searchers after Religious Truth. The book was originally written in 1852, when Florence Nightingale was thirty-two years old and revised in 1859 after her visit to the Crimea. It was privately printed that year but, on the advice of > John Stuart Mill, it was not published. In the 1840s, before Nightingale became engaged in hospital work, she had rejected marriage and domesticity as incompatible with her own life plan, and 'Cassandra' is a sustained critique of the domestic life of the genteel woman, in particular its 'vacuity', its 'boredom' and its 'false sentiment'. It is reprinted in full in Ray Strachev, The Cause: a Short History of the Woman's Movement in Great Britain. Bib: Woodham-Smith, C., Florence Nightingale.

'Castaway, A' (1870)

A 600-line prose poem by ➤ Augusta Webster. The poem is concerned with the issue of prostitution and the ➤ 'fallen woman', and ranges widely in its exploration of the sexual ideology of 19th-century Britain. Unlike ➤ D.G. Rossetti's 'Jenny', published in the same year, Webster's poem speaks from the perspective of the fallen woman rather than that of the voyeuristic observer. '[T]he silly rules this silly world/makes about women' are decried by a speaker who is branded by society as a 'thing of shame and rottenness, the animal/that feeds men's lusts'.

Castiglione, Baldassare (1478–1529) Italian humanist and author of Il Cortegiano (1528), translated as The Courtier by > Sir Thomas Hoby in 1561. Il Cortegiano is based on Castiglione's years spent as a courtier at Urbino under Guidobaldo da Montefeltro, and takes the form of a debate on what features should be possessed by the perfect courtier. Those qualifications include: swordsmanship, nobility, military understanding, skill in virile sports (hunting, swimming, running and riding), dancing, grace, skill at repartee and telling of stories and anecdotes; the possession of the virtues of prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude; adaptability, literary knowledge, the ability to write prose and verse, musical proficiency, and the gift of charm.

The two important features of Castiglione's book, and the ones that were to become most influential in England in the ▷ Renaissance period, were his description of sprezzatura and his ▷ neo-Platonic conception of love and harmony. Sprezzatura implies an ease of manner, a suggestion that what has been done has been achieved effortlessly and without art. Qualities such as these were to play an important role in the definition of courtly behaviour in the late 16th century in England. The neo-Platonic elements (to be found in Book IV of the work) elevate beauty, together with human and divine love, into an ideal of harmony.

Castiglione was to be of enormous importance to contemporary readers of his work in introducing the idea that individuals can create an identity and a personality for themselves. It is this idea which lies, for example, at the heart of ▷ Edmund Spenser's The Faerie Queene, and in the poetry, in the earlier period, of ▷ Sir Thomas Wyatt.

Castle of Indolence, The (1748)

A poem in ▷ Spenserian stanzas by ▷ James Thomson. Its first canto deals with the 'pleasing land of drowsyhed' governed by the wizard Indolence. The poet himself ('a bard . . . more fat than bard beseems'), his friends ▷ James Ouin the actor. ➤ Lord Lyttelton, and others live a life of sensuous ease in Indolence's castle, until they become bloated and are thrown into a foul dungeon. The second canto depicts the progress of the Knight of Industry from the ancient world to Britain, where he creates the new order of 'social commerce' and imperial expansion, and ends by conquering Indolence and freeing his victims. The poem presents a fascinating mixture of whimsical irony and serious > 'Augustan' didacticism. Lord Lyttelton wrote the stanza describing Thomson himself (I, stanza 68) and the last four stanzas of Canto I were written by Thomson's friend ▶ John Armstrong.

Castle of Otranto, The (1764)

One of the first so-called ▷ Gothic novels, by ▷ Horace Walpole. The fantastic events are set in the Middle Ages, and the story is full of supernatural sensationalism. The story concerns an evil usurper, a fateful prophecy about his downfall, a mysterious prince disguised as a peasant, and his eventual marriage to the beautiful heroine whom the usurper had intended as his own bride.

Castle of Perseverance

A ⊳ morality play, dating from the first quarter of the 15th century which is both the longest example of this dramatic genre (3,649 lines) and the earliest to survive in a near-complete form. The play, which is written in an East Midlands dialect, is designed for a large-scale production, with 35 speaking parts. The single extant play text is unusual in that it contains a staging plan that suggests it should be played in the round, with the Castle of Perseverance at the centre and five scaffolds arranged around the perimeter of the circle. The action depicts the life of Humanum Genus (a figure who represents humankind in general), from birth to death, as he resists and succumbs to the forces of temptation to sin. The action continues after his death and a debate follows in Heaven about whether or not Humanum Genus should be admitted. The play concludes with the acceptance of Humananum Genus into Heaven

Of particular importance for the rights of Irish Roman Catholics, who, after they lost the Irish Parliament in 1800, bitterly resented their exclusion from Westminster.

> Catholicism (Roman) in English literature.

Catholicism (Roman) in English literature Until the ➤ Act of Supremacy (1534) by which ➤ King Henry VIII separated the English Church from Roman authority, and the more violent revolution in Scotland a little later, both countries had belonged to the European community of Catholic Christendom. This community was a genuine culture, allowing great unity of belief and feeling together with great variety of attitude. In the 16th century this community of cultures broke up, owing not only to the Protestant rebellions but also to the increase of national selfconsciousness, the influence of non-Christian currents (especially > Platonism), and the gradual release of various fields of activity political, commercial, philosophical - from religious doctrine. > The Counter-Reformation after the Catholic Council of Trent (1545-63), even more than the > Reformation, tended to define Roman Catholicism in contrast to Protestantism. Thus, although the dramatists and lyric poets in England from 1560 to 1640 show a plentiful survival of medieval assumptions about the nature of man and his place in the universe, in conflict with newer tendencies of thought and feeling, the Roman Catholic writer in the same period begins to show himself as something distinct from his non-Catholic colleagues. Two clear examples in the 17th century are the poet ➤ Richard Crashaw and the dramatist > Elizabeth Carv. > Milton's epic of the creation of the world, > Paradise

Lost, is in many ways highly traditional, but the feeling that inspires it is entirely post-Reformation. By the 18th century, however, religion of all kinds was becoming a mere department of life, no longer dictating ideas and emotions in all fields, even when sincerely believed; it is thus seldom easy to remember that the poet > Alexander Pope was a Roman Catholic. By the 19th century, writers of strong religious conviction were increasingly feeling themselves in a minority in an indifferent and even sceptical world. They therefore tended to impress their work once more with their faith, and this was especially true of the few Catholic writers, since Catholic faith was dogmatically so strongly defined, eg the poet > Gerard Manley Hopkins. The century also saw a revival of Anglo-Catholicism. From the time of the Reformation there had been a school of opinion which sought to remain as close to Roman Catholicism as Anglican independence allowed. This wing of the Church was important under > Charles I, but lost prestige until it was revived by the ➤ Oxford Movement. Since then it has remained important in the strength of its imprint on literature. Thus in the 20th century the Anglo-Catholicism of the poet > T. S. Eliot is as conspicuous as and more profound than the Roman Catholicism of the novelists ➤ Evelyn Waugh and ➤ Graham Greene. Amongst writers later in the 20th century, Catholicism is noticeable in the work of ➤ Anthony Burgess and ➤ David Lodge.

Catiline (1611)

A tragedy by ➤ Ben Jonson, about the attempt by Lucius Sergius Catilana to overthrow the government of the Republic of Rome in the 1st century BC. It is an example of Jonson's finest classical scholarship, and was, perhaps, one of the most admired plays in the scholarly and critical circles of the 17th century. Subsequently, Catiline has had a more chequered career: early 20th-century criticism suggested that Jonson's overt scholarship impeded the dramatic impact of the tragedy instead of enhancing it, as in the case of his other Roman tragedy, > Sejanus. However, late 20th-century rereadings of the play have perceived more value in the political material and in Jonson's ability to present subtle challenges to dominant authority.

Cato the Censor (239-149 BC)

Marcus Porcius Cato, an austere statesman of ancient Rome, famous for his hostility to unnecessary luxury imported from Greece and for his endeavours to maintain traditional Roman simplicity. He was the first important Latin prose writer and the first of the Roman historians. His most important work was Origines ('Origins') in which he described the history of Rome and the rise of other Italian states. Later in the Roman Empire, Cato's emphasis on discipline and austerity in private and public life was admired as an ideal from which the sophisticated Romans of the Empire had fallen away.

➤ Latin literature.

Catullus, Gaius Valerius (?84-54 BC) A Roman lyrical poet, famous especially for his Lesbia cycle of love poems. He was one of the Latin poets who had an extensive influence over English > lyric poets in the 16th and 17th centuries. For instance, > John Skelton's Book of Philip Sparrow (1503-7) echoes Catullus on Lesbia and the sparrow; ▶ Ben Jonson's Song to Celia is modelled on Catullus, and so is ➤ Andrew Marvell's To his Coy Mistress. Jonson, with his sensitive and profound Latin scholarship, was the most important English follower of Catullus and he transmitted the strength and delicacy of the Latin poet to the > 'Cavalier' lyricists and to Marvell. The most important period for Catullus' influence on English poetry was therefore 1600-50.

Causley, Charles (b 1917)

Poet. Causley is Cornish by birth, and his writing has been compared to his contemporary

> John Betjeman in its usage of traditional forms, and to the Spanish poet he admires, Federico Garcia Lorca (Spanish literature), in its usage of the ballad form. He draws his influences from pre-modernist poets, particularly > Victorian, > Georgian and World War I poets (Causley himself fought in World War II in the Royal Navy). His first publication was Hands to Dance (1951); this was followed by Union Street (1957); Underneath the Water (1967); Figure of Eight (1969); Figgie Hobbin (1970); Collected Poems (1975).

Caute, David (b 1936)

Novelist and dramatist. Caute is one of a group of English writers, including ➤ Andrew Sinclair and Julian Mitchell, interested in formal experiment, self-referential narrative strategies and the blending of > realism with elements of fantasy. He admires the work of ▶ Christine Brooke-Rose, and is strongly influenced by > Jean-Paul Sartre. The Confrontation is a trilogy consisting of a play, The Demonstration (produced 1969), a critical essay supposedly by one of the characters in the play, The Illusion (1970) and a novel, The Occupation (1971). The questioning of the borders of fiction with other discourses is sustained by the competing narrators and narrative strategies within The Occupation. Dr Orwell and Mr Blair (1994) is a fictional account of the writing of ➤ George Orwell's Animal Farm. Caute's works reflect his commitment to Marxism in their analysis of society and history, and his novel The Decline of the West (1966) has been criticized as being over-didactic. He has worked as a lecturer, and as literary and arts editor of the ➤ New Statesman. Later novels include News from Nowhere (1986) and The Women's Hour (1991).

Cavalier

A word, meaning 'horseman', which was used for the supporters of > Charles 1 in the > Civil War. It was first used as a term of reproach against them by their opponents, the supporters of Parliament (> Roundheads); in this sense it meant an arrogant and frivolous man of the court. Soon, however, it was accepted with pride by the Royalists themselves. It is a mistake, however, tó think of the Cavaliers merely as members of the court and of the aristocracy; many of the aristocracy supported Parliament and many of the Cavaliers were fairly modest country gentlemen who never came near the court. The Cavalier Parliament sat from 1661 to 1678 after the Restoration of ➤ Charles II and was so called because the king's supporters won most of the seats.

➤ Cavalier Poets.

Cavalier Poets

An unhelpful critical term used to encompass the group of poets associated with the court of ▷ Charles I (in particular ▷ Thomas Carew, ▷ Sir John Suckling and ▷ Richard Lovelace), often known as the ▷ Caroline poets. The term is suggestive of a homogeneity amongst this group of poets, and also contains a romanticized implication of their soldierly and martial prowess.

Cave, Jane (1757-1813)

Poet. A devout Anglican with Methodist inclinations, Cave constantly battled against the sense of duty which called her away from her poetry. She published her witty and fast-moving collection, Poems on Various Subjects (including an ▷ elegy on her maiden name) in 1783 and revised it in 1786 when she married Thomas Winscom, in an attempt to expunge any material in danger of being considered impious. While the 1786 version contains interesting material in relation to gender, as she focuses on the importance of marriage and motherhood, its tone is heavier and less spirited than the 1783 edition. In later editions she added some ▷ abolitionist writing.

Cavendish, Lady Jane (1621–69) and Lady Elizabeth (1626–63)

Poets and dramatists, devotional and autobiographical writers. The two sisters were the daughters of William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, and their stepmother was ▷ Margaret Cavendish, herself an acclaimed author. Although the writings of both women never attain scholarly heights or reveal any individualistic imagination, their work is bold, lively, sometimes satirical and often intimate. The first body of work was composed in unison during their occupation of Welbeck Castle in the > Civil War period; their father was absent, mother dead, and the house passed back and forth between Royalists and Parliamentarians. To occupy their time, and possibly as a future present for their father, they wrote Poems, Songs and a Pastoral (1643-5) - to which they added 'a Play' now in manuscript at the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Their linguistic and grammatical capabilities are virtually nonexistent, but the political ➤ allegory (including an unflattering portrait of their father's new wife, Margaret), the colloquial language and the proto-feminist theme (the two heroines train their suitors to desire equality with, and not domination over, their future wives) make this an important document. Excerpts are available in Kissing the Rod, ed. G. Greer (1988), and the play, The Concealed Fansyes, was published in 1931, ed. N. C. Starr. Both sisters married, Jane to Charles Chevne in 1654, and Elizabeth to John Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater. Both continued to write. What we know of Jane's work amounts to several letters and poems, but a large canon did exist and may still be traceable. Elizabeth's devotional writings and her > autobiography were collected by her husband after her death as 'True Coppies of Certaine Loose Papers Left by the Right Honorable ELIZABETH Countesse of BRIDGEWATER' (1663), which is deposited at the British Library. These writings are more sober than those written before their marriages, but still reveal an emotional and intellectual closeness between the women despite the changes in their lives. Cavendish, Margaret Duchess of Newcastle (1623-73) Prolific author. Margaret Cavendish wrote poetry, drama, natural philosophy, > biography, orations, letters, science fiction and > autobiography. She was both admired and ridiculed in her lifetime, but seems not to have cared much for either opinion. While appearing modest in her writings, she simultaneously reveals an overwhelming desire for earthly fame. A woman of contradictions and controversy, Cavendish began her life as a tongue-tied lady-in-waiting to > Henrietta Maria, and she followed the queen to exile in France. There she met her husband, William Cavendish (the father of > Jane and Elizabeth Cavendish by his first marriage), whose biography she was later to write. During the > Interregnum, Newcastle's estates were sequestered by Parliament and Margaret was forced to visit Britain in an attempt to raise finances. It was during this stay that she wrote her first book, Poems and Fancies (1653), which already showed signs of her later scientific interests; for example, there is a poem on the theory of atoms. After their return to Britain during the Restoration, Margaret continued to write in several genres, covering issues such as women's oppression. Though she was lavishly entertained by the ▶ Royal Society in 1667, it was never suggested that she be elected to a Fellowship. She also wrote an autobiography, A True Relation of My Birth Breeding and Life, which was published with Natures Pictures (1656). Despite the fact that she was considered eccentric her tombstone at Westminster Abbey provides a fitting epitaph; 'wise, witty and learned lady'.

Caxton, William (? 1422-91)

The first English printer. Caxton established his press in Westminster in 1477 (its first product was the Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers) and during the years 1477–91 printed more than 100 texts, including many of his own translations of French works. Of the works he printed, some of the most important include Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, ▷ House of Fame, ▷ Troilus and Criseyde and Thomas ▷ Malory's ▷ Morte D'Arthur (the latter appearing in an edited form when printed). Caxton's extensive translation work has earned him a place in the history of the development of English prose.

Before opening his press in Westminster, Caxton worked in the Low Countries for 30 years as an agent for the cloth trade (having been apprenticed in London) and became governor of the English merchant community in Bruges from 1465–9. It was in the Low Countries that he began his other career as a translator and printer (beginning with the Recuyell of the Historyes of Troyes, printed in Bruges in 1475) after Caxton had spent two years in Cologne learning the art of printing.

> Wynkyn de Worde took over the press after Caxton's death.

Celtic Twilight, The

Originally The Celtic Twilight was a book of short stories by the poet \triangleright W. B. Yeats, published in 1893. The book dealt with the widespread beliefs in magic and the supernatural which were current among Irish peasants. Since then, the term Celtic Twilight has been widely used to describe the idea that the Celts, especially in Ireland, preserve a mystical, imaginative, poetic vision which the practical and materialistic Anglo-Saxons (both in England and in southern Scotland) have lost. At the end of the 19th century and beginning of the 20th century Yeats and other Irish poets used this conception of the Celtic character as a weapon in the cause of Irish nationalism, and they cultivated ancient Irish legends about heroes such as ▷ Cuchulain and heroines such as Queen Deirdre so as to build up a distinctively Irish literary consciousness to replace the dominant English culture.

The Council for the Encouragement of Music and the Arts was founded in 1939, and financed by the Pilgrim Trust and the Board of Education, to provide entertainments on the home front and provide employment for artists during wartime. Its success strengthened the case for public subsidy for the theatre, and after World War II it became the ➤ Arts Council of Great Britain.

Cenci, The (1819)

A tragedy by ▷ Percy Bysshe Shelley which symbolically depicts the political oppression of his own day in terms of historical events which took place in 1599. Count Francesco Cenci, a Roman nobleman, conceives an incestuous passion for his daughter, Beatrice, and in desperation Beatrice, her brother Bernard, and her stepmother Lucretia conspire to kill the Count. They are discovered, tortured, condemned to death, and executed on the orders of the Pope. Like all the dramas of the ▷ Romantic poets, Shelley's play is an artificial, literary composition. Its ▷ blank verse is highly derivative of that of the ▷ Jacobean playwrights, particularly John Webster (1578–1632).

Censorship and English literature Systematic censorship has never been an important restriction on English writing except in times of war, but English writers have certainly not always been entirely free.

Until 1640 the monarch exercised undefined powers by the Royal Prerogative. Early in her reign, > Elizabeth I ordered dramatists not to meddle with politics, though this did not prevent Norton and ▷ Sackville's ▷ Gorboduc, with its warnings on national disorder. However, Ben Jonson, ▷ Chapman and ▷ Marston found themselves in prison for Eastward Hoe (1605) because it offended the Scots friends of > James I. In the reign of > Charles I the term Crop-ears was used for opponents of the king who lost their ears as a penalty for criticizing the political or religious authorities. Moreover, printing was monopolized by the > Stationers' Company, whose charter might be withdrawn by the Crown, so that the monopoly would cease.

In the ➤ Civil War, Parliament was in control of London, and issued an edict that the publication of any book had to be licensed, and it was during the ▷ Interregnum that censorship became most important. The edict provoked > John Milton's > Areopagitica, an appeal for freedom of expression. Its influence was not immediate; after the Restoration of the monarchy, Parliament issued a similar edict in the Licensing Act of 1663. The Act was only for a period, however, and in 1696 it was not renewed. The lapsing of the Licensing Act was the starting-point of British freedom of the press, except for emergency edicts in times of war in the 20th century, although in the early 19th century the government attempted a form of indirect censorship by imposing a tax on periodicals which restricted their sale amongst the poor. Nonetheless there are still laws extant which restrict freedom of political expression beyond certain limits.

Also serious are the English laws of libel and of obscene libel. The first exists to punish attacks on private reputation, and the second concerns the defence of sexual morals. The restrictions are serious restraints on opinion because they are vaguely defined, so that it is difficult for a publisher or writer to know when they are being infringed. Moreover, prohibition under obscenity law is frequently reversed, eg > D. H. Lawrence's ➤ The Rainbow was suppressed for obscenity, but by 1965 it was a prescribed text for study in schools. One of the most celebrated challenges to public morality was the test which Penguin Books' publication of D. H. Lawrence's ➤ Lady Chatterley's Lover gave to the 1959 Obscene Publications Act; the 1960 'Trial of Lady Chatterley' altered the way in which the Act could be interpreted, and after it the censorship of writing on sexual grounds became much more difficult. Organizations such as Mary Whitehouse's National Viewers and Listeners Association have thus channelled their pro-censorship energies into images of violence and sexual explicitness on television and in films. The 1984 Video Recordings Act in effect raised the British Board of Film Classification 'from an industrial advisory body to legally empowered censors' (Mandy Merck).

Censorship in the theatre has been a special case since the 18th century. Henry Fielding's comedies attacking the Prime Minister, Robert Walpole, led in 1737 to the restriction of London theatres to two 'patented' ones – Covent Garden and Drury Lane – and the Court official, the Lord Chamberlain, had to license plays. In 1843 the Theatres Act removed the restriction on the theatres and defined the Lord Chamberlain's powers to the restraint of indecency. The Lord Chamberlain's censorship came to an end in 1968.

Since 1979 there has been a gradual return to the censorship of literature and this has been extended to cover the media. The Official Secrets Act is in the process of being rewritten so as to prevent both former Crown servants from revealing information - especially in autobiographies - as well as the media from printing or broadcasting, sometimes in dramatic form, any of this material. A directive was issued in November 1988 to prevent the broadcasting of statements from people of named organizations; again this may have an effect on drama. Also in 1988, the government amended the 1986 Local Government Act to forbid any Local Authority promoting homosexuality through educational means, printed material or support of gay writers. The Broadcasting Standards Council was established in 1988 in order to monitor taste and decency in the media. Finally, a non-governmental form of censorship may be found in the effects of the concentration of ownership in publishing houses and the press, which severely limit the range of writing that is commercially encouraged.

Two organizations attempt to alert people to the extent and dangers of these new censorship laws: the Campaign for Press and Broadcasting Freedom and the Writers' Guild of Great Britain

Centlivre, Susannah (d 1723)

Actress, dramatist, essayist and poet, known in her time as 'the celebrated Mrs Centlivre'. She survived anti-feminist criticism to become the most prolific dramatist, and one of the most successful authors of either sex, of her day. Two of her comedies, ▷ The Busie Body (1709), and ▷ The Wonder: A Woman Keeps a Secret (1714), were among the four most frequently performed, apart from those of Shakespeare, in the late 19th century, and her ▷ A Bold Stroke for a Wife was popular for most of the 18th century. She excelled in writing intrigue comedy, somewhat in the style of ▷ Aphra Behn, but less sexually explicit, and in a softened tone.

Centlivre's origins are obscure, and her birth date has been placed variously between 1667 and 1680. Her plays suggest a knowledge of French acquired, according to contemporaries, from a tutor. One account has her masquerading as a youth and studying at Cambridge University, before coming to London as a strolling actress.

Still in her teens, Susannah married an armyofficer, Mr Carroll, who died soon afterwards, apparently in a duel. She began publishing poetry, as well as copies of her letters, genuine or otherwise, to > George Farquhar and others. Her first play, a cross between a tragedy and a tragi-comedy, called The Perjur'd Husband, appeared at ▷ Drury Lane in 1700. In 1707 she married Joseph Centlivre, the 'yeoman of the mouth' to Queen Anne, ie the Queen's master cook, but continued to write for most of her remaining life; her total output was 19 plays. The farcical The Busie Body immediately became part of the stock repertory, succeeding largely because of the engaging nature of the well-meaning but foolish character, Marplot. A sequel, Marplot in Lisbon (1710), was less well received. In other plays, such as The Gamester (1705) and The Basset Table (1705), Centlivre attacked the fashionable vices of gambling and card-playing. She was closely associated with many of the literary figures of the period, in addition to Farquhar, including > Richard Steele, William Burnaby, > Eliza Haywood, Delarivière Manley, Catherine Trotter, Nicholas Rowe ➤ Mary Pix, ➤ Colley Cibber, and the actress ➤ Anne Oldfield, who played leading roles in several of her plays. Her death came after a prolonged period of illhealth, and she was buried at St Paul's church, in Covent Garden.

Cervantes Saavedra, Miguel de (1547–1616) Spanish novelist and dramatist, author of ▷ Don Quixote (1605, 1616), a satirical romance which is widely regarded as one of the first European novels and which has had a great influence on European literature. Cervantes was born at Alcalà in Spain, was injured at the battle of Lepanto (1571), and spent five years as a prisoner in Algiers after being captured by pirates. Apart from his most famous book, he wrote a pastoral novel, La Galatea (1585), a collection of short stories, an adventure tale, Persiles and Sigismunda and a number of plays.

Chamberlain's Men, The Lord The more important of the two leading companies of actors in the reigns of > Elizabeth I and > James I, and the one to which > Shakespeare belonged as both actor and playwright. All companies of actors had to have licences in order to perform, and this meant they had to have the patronage of some leading nobleman, or be attached to the royal household. The Lord Chamberlain's Men seems to have been formed in 1504 by a regrouping of various companies depleted by a plague epidemic. Its patron was Lord Hunsdon who held the office of Lord Chamberlain at the royal court. After the accession of James I, the king himself became its patron, and the company was known as 'the King's Men'. It played at court, and at a number of theatres in London, but its most lasting homes were at the ➤ Globe on the south bank of the Thames, and at the ▷ Blackfriars on the north bank. No doubt it was the popularity of Shakespeare's plays, both at court and among the general public, which gave the company its commanding position, though the quality of ▷ Richard Burbage's acting must also have counted. Its rival was ▷ Edward Alleyn's ▷ Lord Admiral's Men.
The King's Men retained its supremacy among the acting companies until the closing of the theatres by Parliament in 1642.

> Acting, the Profession of.

Chambers, Sir Edmund (1866–1954) Scholar. The exceptional breadth and exactness of his work on English literature make his books indispensable reference works for students of English literature in the medieval and Elizabethan periods. His best-known works are: The Medieval Stage (1903); The Elizabethan Stage (1923), William Shakespeare (1930).

Chancellor, The Lord

The office of Lord Chancellor existed before the Norman Conquest (1066) and has always been one of the most important in the state, although its outstanding political importance diminished after the resignation of ▷ Sir Thomas More in 1532, owing to his disagreement with ➤ Henry VIII's religious policy. In the ➤ Middle Ages the Chancellor was the king's secretary and keeper of the seal which authorized public enactments. This closeness to the centre of power often meant that he was second only to the king himself. In the 14th century he took upon himself the task of hearing appeals from subjects who were unable to get justice through the Common Law Courts. He thus became the head of a new Court of Law, the > Court of Chancery, operating a new department of law, called the Law of Equity. The Lord Chancellor also presided over meetings of the Great Council of the Barons in medieval times, and he still presides over its historical descendant, the House of Lords, ie the Upper House of Parliament. As the House of Lords contains judges who meet as the highest court of judicial appeal in the country, the Lord Chancellor presides over this too, and in this capacity he is the head of the English judicial system. Finally, the Lord Chancellor is ex officio a member of every Cabinet and the nearest equivalent in England to a Minister of Justice.

Changeling, The (1622)

A poetic tragedy by ▷ Thomas Middleton and ▷ William Rowley. Rowley seems in fact to have been responsible for the comic subplot, the value of which is contested; the play is sometimes produced without it, since the connection between the two plots has in the past been considered loose. The main plot, by Middleton, concerns the murder by ▷ Beatrice-

Joanna of her prospective husband, Alonso de Piracquo, so that she can marry another man. To execute the murder she employs one of her admirers, the servant ▷ De Flores, a man who physically revolts her, as if by employing such a man she could herself remain free of the guilt and horror of the crime. Instead, De Flores insists that they are now partners and equals in the sin of bloodshed, and blackmails her into becoming his mistress. The play is one of the most imaginative and individualistic in English after > Shakespeare; it is written in sober, forceful > blank verse that is one of the finest late > Jacobean examples of this medium. The main plot is taken from God's Revenge against Murther by John Reynolds. The combination of death, sexual desire and madness makes The Changeling an important text for > psychoanalytical criticism.

Chapbooks

The name for a kind of cheap literature which flourished from the 16th to the 18th centuries, after which they were replaced by other forms. They were so called because they were sold by 'chapmen' or travelling dealers. Their contents consisted commonly of traditional romances retold, often from the French, in crude form: ▷ Bevis of Hampton, Guy of Warwick, Till Eulenspiegel, ▷ Doctor Faustus are examples. Some of them, such as Dick Whittington, about the poor boy who ends up as Lord Mayor of London, have survived as children's stories to the present day, and are often the theme of Christmas pantomimes.

Chapman, George (?1559-?1634)

Poet and dramatist. As a poet he is particularly famous for one of the best-known translations of Homer's Odyssey and Iliad. It is, however, a very free translation, expressing more of Chapman himself, as an Elizabethan intellectual with strong philosophical interests characteristic of his time, than of the spirit of the ancient Greek poet. He saw the epics as heroic exemplifications of moral greatness, in accordance with Stoic ethical categories much later than Homer. In his conception, the great man had strong passions but also strong pride which raised him above the corrupting influences of society; on the other hand, this passion and pride had to be tempered by philosophical fortitude and discipline if they were not to be self-destructive. The dramatic conflicts implied in this view of Homer dominate Chapman's tragedies (1603-31): The Tragedy of Bussy d'Ambois; The Conspiracy and Tragedy of Charles Duke of Byron; The Revenge of Bussy d'Ambois; and Caesar and Pompey. Of these the first is acknowledged to be the finest. All of them contain fine passages, and none is without fairly serious imperfections. Bussy is a magnificent portraval of the heroic man who dominates his morally mean environment but cannot control his passions; in The Revenge, Clermont, his brother, is a less successful example of the man of tempered passion and stoical calm. Chapman also wrote eight comedies, including $\triangleright May Day$, and he completed the narrative poem $\triangleright Hero \ and \ Leander$, left unfinished by \triangleright Christopher Marlowe.

Chapone, Hester (Mulso) (1727-1801) English poet, letter-writer and ▷ Bluestocking. She learned languages, music and later, French and Latin. In 1745 she published the poem 'To Peace. Written during the late Rebellion, 1745'. For ➤ Samuel Johnson's periodical > The Rambler (March 1750-March 1752) she wrote fictional epistles, and she also contributed to The Adventurer (1753). She had influence on and opinions about her contemporaries, among them ➤ Samuel Richardson - whom she admired – and Samuel Johnson, as well as ➤ Elizabeth Carter, ➤ Mary Wollstonecraft and ➤ Elizabeth Montagu. She married John Chapone in 1760 but he died within a year. She continued to write, producing Letters on the Improvement of the Mind (1773) dedicated to Montagu, Miscellanies in Verse and Prose (1775) and A Letter to a New-Married Lady (1777). Her works were published in six volumes in 1807.

Characters, Theophrastian

In the early 17th century a form of ▷ essay devoted to the description of human and social types grew up, and collections of such essays were known as 'Characters'. The origin of the fashion is in the brief sketches by one character of another in the comedies of the time and in the verse satires. The tone was always light and often satirical, the basic pattern deriving from the Characters of the ancient Greek writer ▷ Theophrastus (3rd century BC); hence the designation 'Theophrastian'.

The fashion continued, though it became less popular, throughout the 17th century and into the 18th. It was eventually superseded by the more elaborate and individualized studies and by the growth of the 18th-century novel.

'Charge of the Light Brigade, The'
A famous poem by Alfred, ▶ Lord Tennyson about the episode in the battle of Balaclava (1854) in the Crimean War, between the British and the French on one side and the Russians on the other. The charge was of great heroism, but was an act of folly based on a misunderstood order. Tennyson celebrates the heroism in vivid terms. Curiously enough his poem 'The Charge of the Heavy Brigade', about an incident in the same battle that was successful, is much less well known, although it has equal merit.

Charke, Charlotte (1713-60)

Actress, manager, puppeteer, dramatist, novelist. Youngest child of the actor, manager, and dramatist ➤ Colley Cibber and his wife, the former actress Katherine Shore (> Katherine Cibber). By the time she was four, Charlotte was expressing a preference for masculine clothing, which continued intermittently throughout her later eareer. In 1730 she married Richard Charke, a musician and actor employed at Drury Lane. She worked as an actress and dancer at Drury Lane and joined her brother > Theophilus Cibber and other performers in deserting to the > Haymarket Theatre in 1733. There she added more than a dozen male roles to her repertory of female ones, including > Macheath in > The Beggar's Opera, George Barnwell in > The London Merchant, and Lothario in The Fair Penitent. Later she acted Polly in The Beggar's Opera, and Millwood in The London Merchant. In 1736 Charke joined ➤ Henry Giffard's company at ➤ Lincoln's Inn Fields. From 1737 she managed a succession of businesses, including a puppet theatre. In 1745 she was married again, clandestinely, to John Sacheverell. He died soon afterwards, leaving her penniless, and her subsequent series of odd jobs in London and the provinces did nothing to alleviate her distresses. Estranged from her father for many years, she attempted unsuccessfully to heal the rift in 1755. Her memoirs, A Narrative of the Life of Mrs Charlotte Charke, were published in eight instalments, in 1755, and again posthumously, in 1775. Her published works also include a play, The Art of Management (1735), the novel The History of Henry Dumont, Esq., and Miss Charlotte Evelyn (1756), and two short novels, The Mercer; Or Fatal Extravagance (1755) and The Lover's Treat; Or Unnatural Hatred (1758). Charles, Duc d'Orléans (1394–1465)
Poet, and nephew of Charles VI of France, who was captured at the battle of ➤ Agincourt (1415) and spent 25 years as a prisoner in England. During this time he composed the ➤ ballades which form the collection known as the Livre de Prison. He is credited with large numbers of English translations of his French poems. On returning to France, he established his court at Blois, which became famous as a literary centre.

Charles I

King of Great Britain and Ireland (1625-49).

He had limited intellectual abilities, and the causes of religious and economic conflict were so strong during his reign that it ended in civil war, his defeat and his execution. Together with his wife, Henrietta Maria, he created around him a court of taste, refinement and distinction. His connoisseurship led to a fine collection of pictures, later dispersed by > Oliver Cromwell, who sold them to obtain international currency. His patronage of the Flemish artist Van Dyck resulted in some highly flattering portraits that have done the king much good with posterity. His personal qualities, his tragic end and his nobility in its endurance were the basis of a strong sentimental, sometimes even a religious, devotion to his memory. For example, there are churches dedicated to Charles the Martyr in a few places (eg Tunbridge Wells) in Britain.

Charles II

King of Great Britain and Ireland (1660–85). The Restoration of the monarchy brought him back from exile after the ▷ Interregnum following the execution of his father, ▷ Charles I, in 1649. Politically unscrupulous, he was nonetheless one of the most intelligent kings in English history. His court was a centre of culture and wit as well as of moral licentiousness. His lack of scruple enabled him to raise the monarchy to a new pitch of popularity, in spite of the growing strength of Parliament and its increasing independence of royal authority. His was the last royal court in England to be a centre of cultural vitality.

Chartist movement

A working-class political movement which flourished between 1837 and 1848. It arose because the Reform Bill of 1832 had reformed Parliament in favour of middle-class political rights but had left the working-class without them. The Chartists wanted Parliament to be closely responsible to the nation as a whole and to reform an electoral system according to which the poor were excluded from membership of Parliament and denied the right to vote others into membership by their lack of the necessary property qualification. Some regions were more heavily represented in Parliament than others and all voting was subject to bribery or intimidation because votes had to be declared publicly. Consequently they put forward their Charter containing Six Points: 1 votes for all males; 2 annually elected Parliaments (instead of general elections every seven years); 3 payment of Members of Parliament (so that poor men could have political careers); 4 secret voting (voting 'by ballot'); 5 abolition of the property qualification for candidates seeking election;

6 electoral districts equal in population. The movement seemed to be a complete failure, but all these points became law between 1860 and 1914 except the demand for annually elected parliaments. The Chartists attracted an ardent following but they were badly led. Allusions are made to them in those novels between 1840 and 1860 which were concerned with 'the Condition-of-the-People Question', eg > Sybil by > Benjamin Disraeli. This serious discussion of the social crisis of the second quarter of the 19th century was greatly stimulated by > Thomas Carlyle's essay Chartism (1839), one of his fiercest and most influential writings.

Chaste Maid in Cheapside, A (1613) A comedy by ➤ Thomas Middleton. It is one of the > 'citizen comedies' of the > Jacobean period, with a characteristic theme of a merchant (Yellowhammer) scheming against Sir Walter Whorehound, a dissolute landed gentleman, so as to secure marriage with his daughter and entry into the landowning class, while Whorehound in turn tries to marry off his mistress to Yellowhammer's son and thereby gain Yellowhammer's money. These intrigues of the gentry and the citizenry against each other were a common theme of the comedies of the time. The play makes mock of both classes, and has a characteristic robustness in the way in which it uses the social > satire at a deeper level than the merely topical relationships, so as to bring out basic types of human greed, vanity and lust, in the tradition of > Ben Jonson's 'comedy of humours'.

Chatterton, Thomas (1752-70)

Poet. Chatterton's father, a schoolmaster in Bristol, died before he was born, and he was educated at a charity school, then apprenticed to an attorney. He wrote precociously in all the genres of the day: mock-heroic couplets, > Hudibrastics, political satire imitative of Charles Churchill (1731-64) oriental eclogues in the manner of ➤ William Collins (1721-59) and elegiac poetry in the manner of > Thomas Gray. But his most original compositions were pseudo-medieval (➤ medieval literature) concoctions concerned with 15th-century Bristol. Influenced by the fashionable medievalism of ▶ James Macpherson, ▶ Thomas Percy, and > Horace Walpole, Chatterton claimed to have discovered lyric poems and a 'tragycal enterlude' by a 15th-century monk, Thomas Rowley, among the documents of the church of St Mary Redcliffe, where his uncle was sexton. The publisher Dodsley rejected the pieces, but they deceived Walpole for a time, and the poet was encouraged to move from Bristol to London. He published some non-medieval poems in journals under his own name, and a burletta (comic opera) by him was accepted for performance at Drury Lane. Then, at the age of 17, in a fit of despondency, he poisoned himself with arsenic.

It was not until seven years later that the Rowley poems were definitively unmasked by the Chaucerian scholar, Thomas Tyrrwhitt, Their language is an artificial amalgam of medieval, Elizabethan and contemporary elements, typical of the omnivorous eclecticism of the period. But occasionally, as in 'An Excelente Balade of Charitie', Chatterton succeeds in evoking a unique exotic world of his own. During the Romantic period Chatterton's reputation lost all associations with hackwork and only the 'medieval' lyrics were remembered. His early death took on a mythical quality, making him a symbol, even a stereotype, of youthful poetic genius neglected by a prosaic world. ▶ William Wordsworth referred to Chatterton as a 'marvellous Boy' in Resolution and Independence. > Samuel Taylor Coleridge wrote A Monody on the Death of Chatterton. > John Keats dedicated his > Endymion to his memory, and > Percy Bysshe Shelley compared him with Keats in ▷ Adonais. and Myth of Thomas Chatterton.

Chatwin, Bruce (1940-1989)

Novelist and travel writer. Chatwin was born in Sheffield and worked as an art consultant and journalist. His first publication, In Patagonia (1977), was a travel book and won the Hawthornden Prize; it was followed by The Songlines (1981). His novel On the Black Hill (1982) is about a rural community on the Welsh borders and the story is centred on two farmers who are identical twins. His other novels are The Viceroy and Ouidah (1980), Utz (1988), What Am I Doing Here (1990). Also: Nowhere is a Place: Travels in Patagonia (with Paul Theroux, 1992). A collection of his photographs and notebooks, edited by Francis Wyndham, was published in 1993.

Chaucer, Geoffrey (c 1340-1400) Influential poet of the 14th century who occupies a privileged place in the history of English literary traditions because his work has been continuously transcribed, published, read and commented upon since his death.

He was the son of a London vintner, John Chaucer (1312-68), and served in the court of ➤ Edward III's son Lionel (later Duke of Clarence). In 1359 he was taken prisoner while fighting in France with Edward III, and ransomed. His wife, Phillipa de Roet, whom he married perhaps in 1366, was the sister of > John of Gaunt's third wife, Katherine Swynford. Substantial records exist of Chaucer's career in royal service, as a member of the court and diplomat. He is first recorded as a member of the royal household in 1367 and he made several diplomatic journeys in France and Italy, which perhaps gave him the opportunity to gain access to the work of important 14th-century Italian writers (▷ Dante, ▷ Petrarch, ▷ Boccaccio). He was appointed controller of customs in the Port of London in 1374, was 'knight of the shire' of Kent in 1386 (ie, represented Kent in the House of Commons), and was appointed clerk of the king's works in 1389 and then deputy forester of the king's forest at Petherton in Somerset in 1391. He returned to London for the last years of his life and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His tomb, erected some time later (1555?) gives the date of his death as 25 October 1400.

The upward mobility of Chaucer's family is clear not only from the professional life of Chaucer himself but also from that of his son Thomas, who married into the nobility and became one of the richest men in England at the time. Thomas' daughter, Alice, married William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, and their grandson, John, Earl of Lincoln, was heir designate to the throne of ➤ Richard III. We may only speculate about the part Chaucer's literary activities played in advancing his social status and that of his family. Although more records survive of Chaucer's professional life than any other English writer of the time, the records do not contain any references to his literary labours. Thus dating Chaucer's literary works is an exercise in hypothesis and depends largely on information provided in Chaucer's own list of works, notably in the prologue to the > Legend of Good Women, and in the prologue to the ⊳ Man of Law's Tale.

Chaucer's literary work is notable for its range and diversity. It explores the possibilities of a number of different literary genres, and includes > dream-vision poems (the > Book of the Duchess, the > House of Fame, the > Parliament of Foulys, the > Legend of Good Women), a classical love-tragedy (> Troilus and Criseyde), story-collections (the Legend of Good Women, and the > Canterbury Tales, which itself encompasses a great range and variety of genres), as well as shorter lyrical texts, translations (of > Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy and probably the first part of the English translation of the > Roman de la Rose) and scientific treatises (on the Astrolabe, and the Equatorie of the Planets, which is now generally accepted as Chaucer's work).

A distinctive feature of Chaucer's literary work is that it engages not only with French and Latin literary traditions but also with the work of earlier and contemporary Italian writers (notably ➤ Boccaccio). His work became a reference point for later poets in English, and is frequently discussed in terms which suggest it played a founding role in the establishment of an English literary tradition − a point neatly underlined by the subsequent establishment of Poet's Corner in Westminster Abbey, around Chaucer's tomb.

Chekhov, Anton Pavlovich (1860-1904) Russian dramatist and short-story writer. In his last four plays (The Seagull, Uncle Vanya, Three Sisters, The Cherry Orchard) he evolved a dramatic form and idiom of dialogue which were highly original and had a great influence on 20th-century drama. His originality lay in his combination of faithfulness to the surface of life with poetic evocation of underlying experience. This he achieved partly by exploiting the character of human conversation when it seems to be engaged in communication, but is actually concerned with the incommunicable. This leads on to the non-communicating dialogue in the work of playwrights such as Beckett and Pinter, when the characters on the stage alternately baffle and enlighten the audience by the undercurrents implicit in their words. The realism of Chekhov's stories is similarly subtle and original; they have similar faithfulness to surface combined with delicate artistic pattern, giving significance to seeming irrelevance and slightness of incident. Chesterfield, Philip Dormer Stanhope, 4th Earl of (1694-1773)

Statesman, diplomat and man of letters. In his youth he made 'a grand tour' of Europe, and on his return was made a gentleman of the bedchamber to the Prince of Wales, later George II. He became a Whig member of parliament for St Germains in Cornwall in 1715, and for Lostwithiel in 1722. But in 1726 his father's death brought him his title, and he moved to the House of Lords. He also served as ambassador to The Hague, 1728-32, and as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1745-6. He became an opponent of ⊳ Sir Robert Walpole, and changed from a Whig to a Tory in consequence. Chesterfield moved in literary circles, as a friend of > Addison, > Pope, > Swift, > Gay, > Voltaire, > Montesquieu and others. But he antagonized ⊳ Samuel Johnson, who had vainly appealed to him for help in publishing his > Dictionary, When Chesterfield later praised the work, Johnson revenged himself with a disdainful letter, saying Chesterfield's support had been delayed so long, 'till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it . . . till I am known, and do not want it'. But Chesterfield is known chiefly through his copious correspondence, and particularly the letters which he wrote to his son and his godson, both named after him. In them he offered advice (▷ advice literature) based on his own worldly experience: how to dress, how to behave, and how to succeed in society. The emphasis was on acquiring a wide range of accomplishments without becoming too learned in any particular thing and, above all, to demonstrate good breeding. His son was also advised to make good connections in order to prosper. Chesterfield's letters have been criticized for passages which appeared to defend superficiality, or even to display a less than perfect concern with morality. But he was also considered a man of great wit, who wrote with agreeable style.

Chesterton, G. K. (Gilbert Keith) (1874-1936) An extremely versatile writer of essays, stories, novels, poems; Chesterton is best described as a polemicist, since polemics entered into everything he wrote, whether it was detective stories (the Father Brown series; 1911, 1914, 1926, 1927), fantasy (The Man who was Thursday, 1908), comic verse, or religious studies such as St Francis of Assisi (1923) or St Thomas Aguinas (1933). He wrote against life-denial, whether manifested in the denial of humanity in the Victorian political economy, or the sceptical withdrawal into > aestheticism of the 1890s. His basis of attack was a conviction that life is to be enjoyed with all the faculties; he also had the belief that such fullness of life required a religion large enough to comprehend all the spiritual and moral potentialities in man, and he found this religion in Roman Catholicism. He was not received into the Catholic Church until 1922, but from The Napoleon of Notting Hill (1904) – a fantasy about a war between London boroughs – he shows the romantic medievalism which for him was a large part of the appeal of Catholicism. The period of his greatest influence was probably between 1900 and 1914, when he belonged to a group of vigorous witty polemicists, including ➤ George Bernard Shaw, ▷ H. G. Wells, ▷ Hilaire Belloc. He was from the first an ally of the Catholic Belloc against the agnostic socialists, Wells and Shaw. He had in common with both his antagonists a genius for vivid particularity strongly reminiscent of the Victorian novelist Charles Dickens; with Shaw he shared a delight in witty and disturbing paradox, which he used as Shaw did, to startle his readers out of the acceptance of platitudes into genuine thinking. In spite of his homely, zestful humanity, one notices nowadays a journalistic superficiality about Chesterton's work, as though he felt that his audience demanded entertainment as the indispensable reward for receiving enlightenment, and this may account for the neglect of his work since his death.

Politically, with Belloc, he preached an alternative to socialism in Distributism, a vision of a society of small proprietors. His critical work perhaps survives better than his other work; it included studies of Browning (1903), Dickens (1906), Thackeray (1909), ▶ Chaucer (1932), and The Victorian Age in Literature (1913). He is otherwise perhaps best read in selection, for instance in Selected Stories (ed. K. Amis) and G. K. Chesterton: A Selection from his Non-fictional Prose (selected by W. H. Auden).

Chettle, Henry (1560-1607)

An Elizabethan playwright and printer who collaborated with a number of his contemporaries such as ▷ Drayton, and is the sole author of a ▷ revenge drama, Hoffman (1602). He is best remembered for printing ▷ Robert Greene's famous attack of ▷ Shakespeare and ▷ Marlowe, A Groatsworth of Wit (1595). He subsequently apologized to Shakespeare in his Kind-Heart's Dream, praising Shakespeare's 'uprightness of dealing' and his 'honesty'.

Chevalier of St George

'Chevalier' is French for 'horseman' and in medieval France was equivalent to knight. After the ▷ Glorious Revolution of 1688 and the ▷ Act of Settlement of 1701 excluding the ▷ Catholic members of the House of ▷ Stuart from the English throne, James Stuart, the son of ▷ James II, was known as the Chevalier of St George as a courtesy title; he was otherwise known as the ▷ Old Pretender (ie claimant to the throne) in distinction from his son, Charles Stuart, known both as the 'Young Pretender' and the 'Young Chevalier'.

Chevy Chase, The Ballad of

A famous English ▷ ballad, probably dating from the 15th century. It issues from the border wars which were intermittent between England and Scotland from the 14th to 16th centuries. Lord Douglas, head of the principal Scottish border family, attacks Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who has defied him by coming for a three days' hunt on the Scottish side of the border. Both Percy and Douglas are killed in the ensuing battle. The ballad has been well known since Bishop ▷ Percy published it in his Reliques in 1765, but, earlier, ▷ Joseph Addison had praised the poem in the ▷ Spectator as had ▷ Sir Philip Sidney in his Apologie.

Child labour

The use of children in agricultural labour was widespread, and not necessarily pernicious, up till the 19th century, but their use in factories and mines after 1800 and during the Industrial Revolution aroused widespread indignation and led to reform. The Factory Act of 1833 limited their working hours in ⊳ factories and in 1847 their hours were restricted to ten. In 1842 the Mines Act forbade the employment of women and of children under ten underground; this evil was very old, but had become much severer with the expansion of the coal industry in the 18th century after the invention of steam-powered machinery. An old abuse, too, was the employment of little boys to clean chimneys; the boys were made to climb inside the chimneys. Public indignation against the practice was aroused by > Charles Kingsley's ➤ Water Babies (1863), but it was only effectively prohibited in 1875. The Victorian age saw the abolition of the worst abuses of children, as well as the establishment of the first universal system of ⊳ education in England. Since 1939 it has been illegal to employ children under fifteen years old.

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (1812-18) A semi-autobiographical poem in ➤ Spenserian stanzas by > Lord Byron, describing the wanderings of a young man seeking escape from the ennui caused by over-indulgence at home. Cantos I and II (1812) describe his wanderings around the Mediterranean, ending with a lament for Greece enslaved by the Turks. The writing is sometimes very slapdash. Cantos III (1816) and IV (1818) are poetically superior, being less concerned with an affectation of solitude and mystery, and focusing on what really interested the poet: social activity and the stir of great events. In the third canto occurs the famous description of the interrupted ball in Brussels on the eve of the battle of Waterloo (stanzas xxi-xxv). In the fourth canto Byron abandons the fictional protagonist and writes in the first person, evoking the large reversals of history, as he contemplates the great Italian cities of Venice, Rome and Florence. The long meditation in the Coliseum at night, with its evocation of the dying gladiator, is very moving in a broad, rhetorical way. The poem was very popular at the time, not least for its 'Byronic' protagonist – self-regarding, proud and mysterious. Today, perhaps unfairly, it is less highly regarded than Byron's comic works in \triangleright ottava rima.

'Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came' One of the most famous poems by ▷ Robert Browning. He called it a 'Dramatic Romance' and it was published in > Men and Women, 1855. It describes a journey or 'quest' (in the tradition of medieval knightly romances) which has lasted so long that Roland is almost in despair. In the poem, he reaches his destination, the tower, which stands in the middle of a great wasteland full of the signs of death. The poem ends with his sounding his horn to signal his arrival. In spite of its sombreness, the poem has a vigour of style, characteristic of Browning, which communicates itself as the most important part of its otherwise cloudy meaning. Browning, too often associated with facile optimism, is the poet here of courage and energy in the face of desperate circumstances.

The title is a quotation from Shakespeare's King Lear (1605), where it may be an echo of a still older ballad.

Children in the Wood (Babes in the Wood)
A ballad (1593) well-known for its story, which is often retold in books of children's fairy tales (> Children's books). It concerns the plot of a wicked uncle to murder his little nephew and niece, whose property he means to seize. The hired murderers abandon the children in the forest, where they perish and the birds cover them over with leaves. The wicked uncle is then punished by God, with the loss of his son, his wealth and eventually his life.

Children's books

Until the 19th century, children were not regarded as beings with their own kind of experience and values, and therefore did not have books written specifically for their entertainment. The literature available to them included popular versions of old romances, such as ▷ Bevis of Hampton, and magical folk-tales, such as ▷ Jack the Giant-Killer, which appeared in ▷ chapbooks. Children also read such works as ▷ John Bunyan's ▷ Pilgrim's Progress, ▷ Daniel Defoe's ▷ Robinson Crusoe (1719), and Jonathan Swift's ▷ Gulliver's Travels (1726); > Perrault's collection of French > fairy-tales appeared in English as Mother Goose's Fairy Tales in 1729.

During the Romantic period it was recognized that childhood experience was a world of its own and, influenced, in many cases, by Rousseau's ideas on education, books began to be written especially to appeal to children. Such works as Thomas Day's Merton and Sandford (1783-9), Maria Edgeworth's Moral Tales (1801) and Mrs Sherwood's The Fairchild Family (1818) usually had a serious moral tone, but showed an understanding of a child's mind that was lacking from Anne and Jane Taylor's cautionary tales in verse (later to be parodied by > Hilaire Belloc in The Bad Child's Book of Beasts etc.).

It was not until the Victorian period that writers began extensively to try to please children, without attempting to improve them at the same time. ➤ Edward Lear's Book of Nonsense (1846) and ➤ Lewis Carroll's Alice books combine fantasy with humour. Romance and magic had a strong appeal to the Victorians, and fairy stories from all over the world were presented in versions for children. The collection of the brothers > Grimm had appeared in 1824 as German Popular Stories and ➤ Hans Christian Andersen's original compositions were translated into English in 1846. Andrew Lang's Fairy Books were published later in the century. Adventure stories for boys, such as > Captain Frederick Marryat's Masterman Ready (1841) and > Robert Louis Stevenson's > Treasure Island (1883) became a flourishing genre, but the tradition of moral improvement persisted in such books as ➤ Charles Kingsley's ➤ Water Babies (1863). Children's literature is a field to which women writers have made a notable contribution; in the latter half of the 19th century enduring classics were written by Mrs Molesworth (The Tapestry Room, 1879), Louisa May Alcott (Little Women, 1868), Anna Sewell (Black Beauty, 1877) and E. Nesbitt (The Story of the Treasure-Seekers, 1899, etc.).

Animals have loomed large in children's books. Beatrix Potter's Peter Rabbit appeared in 1902 (doing much to establish the book where text and illustrations were of equal importance), Kenneth Grahame's The Wind in the Willows in 1908, the first of Hugh Lofting's Dr Dolittle books in 1920, > A. A. Milne's Winnie the Pooh in 1926 and the first of Alison Uttley's Little Grey Rabbit books in 1929. Charges of anthropomorphism seem to have had little effect on the popularity of these books, and another writer whose lack of critical acclaim has hardly diminished her sales is Enid Blyton. Recently, allegations of racism and sexism have been laid against old favourites, and there have been efforts to bring children's literature into touch with 20th-century problems, such as single-parent families and racial prejudice. As well as writers (eg Noel Streatfield and Nina Bawden) who have concerned themselves with stories about everyday life, there have been others who have continued the tradition of magical fantasy. > Tolkien's The Hobbit, Philippa Pierce's Tom's Midnight Garden, > C. S. Lewis' Tales of Namia, Ursula Le Guin's stories about Earthsea and the work of Alan Garner all fall into this category. In a rather different field, Rosemary Sutcliff has won recognition for the careful research underlying her historical novels. Mention should also be made of Ladybird books, which, in addition to their fiction publications, have done much to introduce children to a wide variety of topics, from music to magnetism. Following Robert Louis Stevenson's A Child's Garden of Verses (1885), children's verse has been written by → Belloc, → De La Mare, → A. A. Milne, > Ted Hughes and Charles Causley.

Chippendale, Thomas (1718-79) A famous furniture designer, noted for the combination of elegance and solidity in his designs. His work was very much imitated so that 'Chippendale style' is the most familiar pattern of 18th-century furniture in England.

Cholmondeley, Mary (1859-1925) English novelist, born in Hodnet, Shropshire, the daughter of Emily Beaumont and the Rev. Hugh Cholmondeley. She never married and lived all her life with her family. Her first novel The Danvers Jewels was published in 1887. Charles Danvers (1889); Diana Tempest (1893) and The Devotee (1897) followed. These were popular, but it was > Red Pottage (1800) that brought Cholmondeley public recognition. Its satirical treatment of the clergy caused a minor scandal, with churchmen denouncing the book, while critics and journalists defended its humour and accuracy. None of Cholmondeley's six later novels was as successful. She faded from view, and published her last book, The Romance of His Life in 1921.

Chrétien de Troyes (fl 1170-90)

French writer of sophisticated and influential courtly narratives. Nothing certain is known of his life but he seems to have had the patronage of Marie, Countess of Champagne (1160-80), and then Phillip of Flanders (c 1180-90). Five of his Arthurian romances survive: Erec et Enide, Cligés, Yvain (later translated into Middle English and other European vernaculars), Le Chevalier de la Charrette (which centres on the experiences of > Lancelot and which seems to have been left unfinished by Chrétien), Perceval (Chrétien's Grail story which was left unfinished but was continued by later writers). In the prologue to Cligés, he claims to have written a number of other poems on Ovidian subjects, including an art of love, and a version of the ➤ Tristan story. ➤ Arthur, King.

Christabel (1816)

An unfinished narrative poem by ➤ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the first part written in 1797 and the second in 1800. The story derives from the popular folk-ballad tradition. Christabel, daughter of Sir Leoline, finds a distressed lady, Geraldine, in the woods and takes her back to the castle, unaware that she is really an enchantress. Though she discovers Geraldine's nature, Christabel is forced by a spell to keep silent before her father. There is a strange confusion of sympathies in the author's treatment of the relationship between the two women, and between them and Sir Leoline. The poem is in a metrically experimental form reminiscent of Anglo-Saxon alliterative metre, each line having four stresses but a varying number of syllables. Even in its fragmentary state it achieves a compulsively anxious, but at the same time exhilarating, effect.

Christie, Agatha (1890-1976)

> Detective fiction writer (who also wrote romantic novels as Mary Westmacott), Agatha Christie is one of the most well known, and certainly the most widely translated, of British writers this century. Her large range of intricate but formulaic novels gained her a vast readership, and they have been widely filmed, televised and staged (The Mousetrap, 1952, is the longestrunning stage play, still showing in London's West End). Even though she continued to write from the 1920s until her death, most of her work evidences a nostalgia for the pre-war England of the prosperous classes with which she is aptly identified, the setting for novels populated by abnormal, criminal psyches (crime is never, for Christie, socially justifiable) and brilliant, sexless sleuths (Hercule Poirot and Miss Marple being the most famous). Her books include: The Mysterious Affair at Styles: A Detective Story (1920); The Murder of Roger Ackroyd (1926); Murder on the Orient Express (1934); Death on the Nile (1937); Ten Little Niggers (1939), later published as Ten Little Indians; Sparkling Cyanide (1945); Ordeal by Innocence (1958) and Endless Night (1967). Christmas Carol, A (1843)

A story by ➤ Charles Dickens, about a miser, Scrooge, who is converted by a series of visions from a condition of mercantile avarice and misanthropy into an embodiment of the Christmas spirit, with its generosity and goodwill to humankind in general. It presents entertainingly Dickens' celebration of the virtues associated with Christmas (especially characteristic of his early work). He represented these virtues as the cure for the puritan narrowness of feeling and inhumanity of outlook which were the dark side of Victorian commerce. Compare the Christmas scenes in his > Pickmick Papers (1837) and the comments of Sleary in > Hard Times.

(1863); The Rector and the Doctor's Family (1863);
The Perpetual Curate (1864); Miss Marjoribanks
(1866) and Phoebe Junior (1876). The Chronicles were Oliphant's most popular works, focusing mainly on religious life in a country town. They show the influence of Walter Scott (1771–1832),

➤ Anthony Trollope and ➤ George Eliot, although like much of Oliphant's work, they appear somewhat hurriedly written.

Chudleigh, Lady Mary (1656-1710) English poet and polemicist. She replied to John Sprint's misogynist sermon The Bride-Woman's Counsellor. Although some modern critics think such extreme cases as Sprint's of the insistence on male superiority were read as a joke, Chudleigh replied seriously with The Ladies Defence, a verse defence of women, published in the second edition of her Poems on Several Occassions (1703). She also published a collection of Essays Upon Several Occassions (1710). She wrote The Ladies Defence for women, she says, 'out of the tender Regard I have for your Honour, joyn'd with a just Indignation to see you so unworthily us'd'. The poem borrows the character of Sir John Brute from > Vanbrugh's > The Provok'd Wife, a play dealing in the misfortunes of mismarriage. Sir John is suitably brutal, but the Parson more legalistically insidious, asserting that for women, 'Love and Respect, are, I must own, your due; / But not 'till there's Obedience paid by you.' Churchill, Caryl (b 1938)

Dramatist. After writing extensively for radio, which is traditionally more accommodating to female writers, and juggling the demands of her husband's career and childcare, Churchill moved into theatre in the early 1970s, writing intially as an individual but eventually learning different ways of working collectively as a result of her ventures with Monstrous Regiment and Joint Stock.

Churchill had tackled many of the fashionable themes of British political and feminist theatre in the 1070s, including witches (Vinegar Tom, 1976), terrorism (Objections to Sex and Violence), and seventeenth-century revolutionary sects (Light Shining in Buckinghamshire, 1976), as well as more unusual topics such as the nature of ideology and repression in the all male Softcops (1984), inspired by a reading of the French theorist ➤ Michel Foucault. Her work has been particularly associated with treatments of sexual politics, especially in Cloud Nine (1978, in which the links between patriarchy and colonialisation are mercilessly and wittily exposed) and Top Girls (1982), a study of a 'successful' career woman. She has always been keenly aware of the socio-political dimension of oppression, which affects men as well as women, as in Fen, her study of the quiet horrors of rural life. Churchill uses time shifts, uneven ageing (the characters in Cloud Nine are twentyfive years older in part two than they were in part one, but one hundred years has passed), cross race and cross gender casting, doubling, pastiche Victorian light verse and also rhyming couplets, as part of a strategy of upsetting and destabilising conventional assumptions about both drama and life itself.

Top Girls begins with a gathering of women from different periods and cultures to celebrate the promotion of Marlene, the central character, within the Top Girls employment agency. In the first scene Marlene is apparently emancipated from the traps and entanglements of family and children that have constrained the others but much of the rest of the play is concerned with destabilising this privileged position by trapping audiences into semi-agreement with her and then encouraging them to see her putative success in a far wider context in which she is just as much a victim of the system. The play is both enormously funny and chilling in its brilliantly observed presentations of the everyday contradictions of life. Churchill, like > Brecht, suggests that what we need is a new way of seeing if we are to understand and confront the pressures the characters in Top Girls fail to grasp. Some people interpreted Top Girls as a hymn in praise of its central character and the runaway success in Britain of her exposé of the financial markets, Serious Money (1987), owed much to its popularity with the very people it satirised, who flocked to see it both at the Royal Court and in the West End. Mad Forest (1990) is a fine treatment of Romania after the overthrow of the Ceausescu government.

Churchill has developed a strong interest in creating theatre with dancers and musicians. The Skriker (1994) is an extraordinary example of virtuoso dramatic writing coupled with music and dance in an exploration of the irrational and the need for something beyond the material world.

Churchill, Charles (1731-64)

Poet and political writer. A secret marriage, contracted at the age of 17, brought an end to his academic career at Cambridge. He entered the ministry, but after several years as a curate he separated from his wife and embarked on a literary and political career, associating himself with the political aspirations of ▷ John Wilkes. In 1763 he eloped with the 15-year-old daughter of a Westminster tradesman, but died suddenly in the following year at the age of 33.

There is a distinctive vigour to Churchill's use of the ▶ heroic couplet, though he lacks refinement or nuance. His subject matter in such poems as The Rosciad (1761) (by which he made his reputation), The Prophecy of Famine (1763), An Epistle to William Hogarth (1763) and The Author (1763) remains consistently public and ⊳ Augustan, at a time when other writers were turning to more intimate themes. He lacks the restraint and poise of ➤ Dryden and > Pope, however, and his spontaneity anticipates in tone the couplet satires of Byron. The Rosciad parades the theatrical figures of the day before a judgement panel consisting of ⊳ Shakespeare and ⊳ Ben Jonson, and they award the laurel, predictably, to > David Garrick. In other poems Churchill discusses contemporary politics and the nature of satire. He also wrote less successful works in hudibrastic tetrameters (> metre; > Hudibras), such as The Ghost (1762-63), in which he attacked ➤ Samuel Johnson. Bib: Smith, R. J., Charles Churchill.

Churchyard, Thomas (c 1520-1604) Poet. Churchvard's career combined a marginal position at court with a near-successful attempt at professional authorship, and although his work is not well known at the present time, he was acknowledged as important by the younger > Elizabethan poets such as > Spenser and ➤ Ralegh. Indeed, Spenser makes Churchyard 'Palemon' in his Colin Clout, characterized by his long career as a poet. Churchyard began his court associations as ▷ Surrey's page and then served in several battles on the continent; these exploits were later to form the basis of his Generall Rehearsall of Warres (1579). He wrote a considerable amount of panegyric poetry, probably in pursuit of a perpetually elusive preferment; for example, The Worthiness of Wales (1587) celebrates the mythic genealogy of the Tudor dynasty (> Tudor Myth). His poetry is included in ▷ Tottel's Miscellany (1557), while his most well received work, 'The Legend of Shore's Wife', appears in $\triangleright A$ Mirror For Magistrates (1563 edition). Cibber, Colley (1671–1757) Actor, manager, dramatist. His first known role was as a servant in Sir Anthony Love in 1690, while his first opportunity at a substantial role came in 1694 in ➤ William Congreve's ➤ The Double Dealer. In 1696 he wrote his first play, ➤ Love's Last Shift, often seen as a landmark in the transition from 'hard wit' Restoration comedy to the 'comedy of ➤ sensibility'. He himself played the first of many fop parts, Sir Novelty Fashion, which he had created for himself; he later played Lord Foppington in ➤ Sir John Vanbrugh's satiric sequel to the play, ➤ The Relapse (1696).

In 1730 Cibber was chosen, amid great controversy, as ▷ Poet Laureate. He retired from ▷ Drury Lane in 1733, afterwards writing an opera libretto, poems, essays, more plays, and his ▷ autobiography, An Apology for the Life of Colley Cibber (1740), still considered a primary source of information about the theatre in his time.

Throughout his life, Cibber excited controversy, involving himself in quarrels with several prominent men, notably the authors
> John Dennis and > Henry Fielding and, most damagingly, > Alexander Pope, with whom he kept up a running battle of insults for many years. His ironic misfortune was that Pope, as the better writer, gained a more lasting reputation, so that many students today know of Cibber only through Pope's harsh satires, and his real merit is forgotten.

On the other hand, he made many loyal friends, who praised his wit and good company, and remained loyal to him in extremity. His acting was celebrated and vilified by turns; he was said to be a marvellous comic, but often execrable in tragedy, which he refused to abandon.

Cibber, Katherine (1669-1734)

Singer, actress. Born Katherine Shore into a musical family, she studied voice and harpsichord with ▷ Henry Purcell. She married the actor ▷ Colley Cibber in 1693, much against her father's wishes, and with him had seven children, including the actress ▷ Charlotte Charke and actor-manager, ▷ Theophilus.

Katherine Cibber began acting at the ▷ Dorset Garden Theatre in the season of 1693-4, and appeared with the same company (the ▷ United Company) at ▷ Drury Lane in the following year. She specialized in romantic roles, often involving singing.

Cibber, Susanna Maria (1714-66)

Actress, singer, dramatist. Susanna Cibber was the daughter of Thomas Arne, an upholsterer. In 1732 she sang the title role in Carey and Lampe's Amelia at the > Haymarket Theatre, and two months later, she performed Galatea in > George Handel's Acis and Galatea. In 1734 she married the recently widowed ➤ Theophilus Cibber, with whom she had two children, although both of these died in infancy.

The marriage was a bitter failure: her husband's taste for frequenting brothels, and his general profligacy, meant that he was perpetually in debt, and he soon began to seize his wife's assets, including portions of her salary, as well as her wardrobe and personal effects, in order to satisfy his creditors.

In 1737 she began an affair with a family friend, William Sloper, egged on by her husband, who eventually forced her at gunpoint to spend the night with Sloper. This was part of Cibber's scheme to extract money from the wealthy Sloper, and in 1738 Cibber sued Sloper, but succeeded in winning only ten pounds in damages that year, and only five hundred of the ten thousand he was claiming at the end of another lawsuit in the following year.

In 1741, after a discreet absence, and the birth of her first child by Sloper, Susanna Cibber returned to the stage, both acting and singing with great success. She sang in Handel's Messiah, first in Dublin, and then at its London debut in ▶ Covent Garden.

Susanna Cibber seems to have been supremely gifted both as a singer and as an actress: she is said to have been Handel's favourite, and he wrote some of his best music expressly for her to perform; as an actress she played mostly in tragedy, eliciting conflicting reports as to the variety of her gestures and tones, but the general agreement was that she could wring tears out of the most hard-hearted audience. Her Juliet and Ophelia were particularly celebrated for their pathos. At her death > Drury Lane stayed closed in honour of its greatest actress. She is also known to have co-authored at least one play, The Oracle (1752). She was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Cibber, Theophilus (1703-58)

Actor, dancer, dramatist, manager, the fourth child of the actor-manager ➤ Colley Cibber, and the singer and dancer ➤ Katherine Cibber. Cibber was educated at Winchester College, but left at the age of 16 to join the ➤ Drury Lane Theatre, where his father was co-manager. Still in his teens, in addition to acting in a range of established plays, he was already writing or adapting other plays and appearing in them, including Henry VI (1723) and Apollo and Daphne (1723).

Despite his unscrupulousness as an individual (> Susanna Cibber), Cibber maintained his reputation as an actor during most of his life: he excelled as a comedian, specializing in the playing of fops, but was also compelling in broader roles, including that of Pistol, whose name he acquired as a nickname. Less successfully, he played some serious parts, largely ▷ Shakespeare, including Iago, Othello, Hamlet, and even (at the embarrassingly advanced age of 40) Romeo. As a manager he at times showed considerable common sense and expertise, but his career was blighted by his truculence which involved him in personal conflicts throughout his life. As an author he was undistinguished, his works showing that tendency, exhibited in other areas of his life, to prey upon the efforts of others. Bib: Mann, D. (ed.), The Plays of Theophilus and Susannah Cibber.

Cicero, Marcus Tullius (106-43 BC) Roman statesman, and writer on rhetoric, politics and philosophy. Politically he is famous for his vigorous resistance to the conspiracy of Catiline against the government of the Republic. This is the theme of ➤ Ben Jonson's tragedy > Catiline, of which Cicero is the hero. Cicero's mastery of eloquence in his various writings, and his prestige in ancient Rome, caused him to be much admired in the > Middle Ages and afterwards. Cicero's Somnium Scipionis (Dream of Scipio) influenced ➤ Chaucer's ➤ Parliament of Foulys, and in the 16th century the growing body of English prose writers, such as ➤ Roger Ascham, tended to take as a model either the rolling, musical sentences of Cicero or, by contrast, the terse pointed sentences of > Seneca.

In the 18th century Cicero, whose murder was condoned by ➤ Augustus, came to be seen as a martyr in the cause of liberty and the Roman Republic. A Life of Cicero by Conyers Middleton (1741) assisted this interpretation. ➤ Bolingbroke and ➤ Thomson praised Cicero, and ➤ Cumberland wrote a play about him in 1761.

Circulating libraries

Libraries in Britain from which books were borrowed by the (mostly female) reading public. The first circulating library started in 1740 and, as the institution spread, it helped to foster the growth of literacy by bringing expensive books within the reach of ordinary people. The most famous circulating libraries in 19th-century Britain were Mudie's (> Charles Mudie), W.H. Smith's and Boots. The three-volume or > 'triple-decker' novel of the 19th century was largely supported by these libraries, although rigorous > censorship was enforced.

Described by Bartholomew Fair (1614), Described by Bartholomew Fair (1614), Described by A Chaste Maid in Cheapside (1611), and Described by Philip Massinger's Described by Madam (1632). Citizen of the World, A (1760-62) A collection of letters about life in London by > Oliver Goldsmith, ostensibly the correspondence of a Chinese man living in the city, Lien Chi Altangi. It first appeared as Chinese Letters in John Newbery's The Public Ledger (1760-61). It features > The Man in Black and > Beau Tibbs, and was published under its present title in 1762. The letters comment on English customs and practices, the moral and ethical characteristics of English people, and on literature. Their fresh and naïve view of commonplace matters provides rich satire. The work's ironic view of the author's own culture links it with other sceptical works of the period, such as > Voltaire's Candide and > Johnson's > Rasselas. It also displays the late 18th-century fascination with matters oriental (> Orientalism).

City Heiress, The; Or, Sir Timothy Treatall (1682)

Play by ➤ Aphra Behn. Tom Wilding, a charming Tory rake, is pursuing the rich and beautiful widow, Lady Galliard. She is attracted to him but does not trust him. He is also conducting an intrigue with the young heiress, Charlot Get-all, as well as keeping a mistress, Diana. Wilding's friend, Sir Charles Merriwill, is also interested in Lady Galliard, and becomes Wilding's rival for her affections. Meanwhile Wilding has been disinherited by his uncle, the 'old seditious Knight' Sir Timothy Treatall. Wilding schemes with Diana to pass her off to his uncle as Charlot, and Sir Timothy marries the mistress, mistaking her for the heiress. In a tempestuous scene Lady Galliard agrees to sleep with Wilding, but regrets it immediately afterwards and rejects him, opting instead for Sir Charles. Wilding turns to the faithful Charlot for solace. Writings stolen from Sir Timothy by Wilding and friends prove the old man to have been involved in treasonable activities, and he is forced to desist from them, and even to make peace with his nephew. The play is one of several with a political bent by Behn, a lifelong staunch Tory herself. A large part of its interest derives from the psychological interplay between Wilding and Lady Galliard, but it contains some hugely farcical scenes, and keeps up an entertainingly rapid pace.

City Madam, The (1632)
A comedy by ➤ Philip Massinger. It is about a London merchant whose wife and daughters grow outrageously extravagant in their tastes. To teach them a lesson, the father, Sir John Frugal, temporarily retires from the world and leaves his affairs in the hands of his hypocritically humble brother, Luke. Once he has power in his hands, Luke throws off his pretence, becomes arrogant and harsh, and humiliates his nieces and sister-in-law. Like so many comedies of the age The City Madam ridicules the extravagance and pretentiousness of the new urban bourgeoisie.

City of Destruction, The

In ▷ Bunyan's ▷ Pilgrim's Progress the town from which the pilgrim, Christian, flees to the ▷ Celestial City, ie Heaven. The City of Destruction stands for the world divorced from spiritual values, doomed to the destruction that is to overcome all merely material creation.

City of Dreaming Spires
Oxford, from a description in ➤ Matthew Arnold's poem, Thyrsis (1867), an elegy for ➤ Arthur Hugh Clough.

City Wit, The (1629)

A fast-moving, intensely theatrical ▷ citizen comedy of manners by ▷ Richard Brome, in which the cash-nexus provides the driving force behind the plot. The play dramatizes the recovery of the fortunes and family ties of a resourceful young London prodigal, Crasy, assisted by his wily servant Jeremy.

Civil Wars, English and American England has had two recognized periods of Civil War:

The more important, in the 17th century, is also called the Great Rebellion. It was fought between the king (Charles I) and Parliament, and divided into the First Civil War (1642-6) ending with the parliamentary victory at Naseby (1645) and the capitulation of Oxford (1646), the royalist capital. The Second Civil War (1648-51) also ended with parliamentary victory, this time over the Scots, who had been the allies of Parliament in the First Civil War, but took the king's side in the Second. The issues were complicated; simplified, the economic interests of the urban middle classes coincided with their religious (> Puritan) ideology and conflicted with the traditional economic interests of the Crown, correspondingly allied with Anglican religious belief.

2 The other occurred in the 15th century and is usually known as the ➤ Wars of the Roses.

From outside England, it appears as if the fighting in Northern Ireland, becoming overt in 1968 and still continuing in 1989, constitutes a state of civil war.

The American Civil War, or War of Secession

(1861-5), was fought on the issue of whether the southern states of the United states had the right to secede from the Union and establish their independence. Their wish to do so arose from the northern opposition to the slave holding on which the southern landed economy was based.

Cixous, Hélène (b 1937)

French writer. Hélène Cixous' work has been most influential when it has actively attempted to challenge the categories of writing, and her work encompasses poetry and poetic prose, ⊳ feminist theory, philosophy and ⊳ psychoanalysis. She is a key player in the French feminist ▷ écriture féminine movement, and has written some 40 influential texts (only a few of which have been translated into English), beginning with her PhD thesis on ▶ James Joyce (published in English as The Exile of James Joyce or the Art of Replacement in 1972), and including The Newly Born Woman (with Catherine Clément), the seminal essay on women and writing 'The Laugh of the Medusa' ('Le Rire de la Meduse') (published in English in 1976), dramas and fiction (including > Portrait de Dora, Cixous' vindication of ▶ Freud's famous patient, the central figure in one of his most important case histories and latter-day feminist heroine), and literary-critical works (To Live the Orange is a celebration of the work of Brazilian writer Clarice Lispector). Cixous is Professor of Literature at the experimental University of Paris - VIII which she co-founded in 1968, and director of the Centre d'Études Féminine.

Clandestine Marriage, The (1766) Comedy by ➤ George Colman the Elder, and > David Garrick, inspired by the first plate in ➤ Hogarth's ➤ Marriage à la Mode series. The play concerns the secret marriage of Fanny Sterling to her father's clerk, Lovewell. Sir John Melvil, who had proposed to marry Fanny's affected older sister, instead falls in love with her, as does his uncle, the foppish Lord Ogleby. Eventually the complications are resolved, with the help of Lord Ogleby, who becomes an ally to the couple, and Fanny and Lovewell are able to disclose their marriage and find happiness. The play was a great success and it was revived frequently throughout the 19th century, and into the 20th.

Clanvowe, John (1341–91) Diplomat, writer, member of the king's household, who fought in the French wars and died on a pilgrimage, near Constantinople. He was associated with the so called 'Lollard Knights' (a group of intellectual knights with Lollard sympathies, apparently known to Chaucer), and was the author of a moralizing treatise, The Two Ways, and a deam-vision debate poem The Cuckoo and the Nightingale (which borrows lines from Knight's Tale).

Clare, John (1793-1864)

Poet. The son of a farm labourer in the Midlands, he was self-educated, early influences being the ➤ Bible and James Thomson's (1700–48) Seasons. He was unable to settle down or marry because of his poverty, and hoped that his verse might bring him security. His Poems, Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery, described as being by 'a Northamptonshire Peasant' appeared in 1820, and were a great success. In that year he married, and began work on The Village Minstrel, and Other Poems, which appeared in 1821. This volume disappointed his hopes, despite his attempts to adjust his fresh, spontaneous style to the vagaries of literary taste. He visited London several times and made the acquaintance of ⊳ Samuel Taylor Coleridge, > William Hazlitt and Charles Lamb. The Shepherd's Calendar was published in 1827, in a version much edited by his publisher, John Taylor. (The original version of the poem, as Clare submitted it to Taylor, was published in 1964.) Under the pressure of apparent literary failure, the demands of his growing family and grinding poverty, Clare became insane in 1837. He spent the remainder of his life in lunatic asylums, periodically imagining that he was Napoleon or ➤ Lord Byron. The works which he wrote during the period of his madness were not published until the 20th century.

Clare is remarkable for his interest in nature for its own sake, rather than, as is the case with most poets, as a key to some philosophical or aesthetic illumination. During his lifetime, and since, this quality has led to the criticism that his work is merely descriptive. In his best poems however, such description conveys, in itself, a celebration of the joy of the natural scene and the changing seasons. Moreover Clare, being a farm labourer, lacks the literary idealization of nature common in other poets. In his anguished poem 'I Am' he abandons description, laments the desertion of his friends, and longs for death.

Clarendon, Edward Hyde, Earl of (1609-74) Statesman and historian; author of The True Historical Narrative of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England about the ➤ Civil War, during which he had supported ➤ King Charles I. The published history combines two separate manuscripts: a history written 1646-8 while the events were fresh in the author's mind, and an ≥ autobiography written between 1668 and 1670, in exile and without the aid of documents. In consequence, Books I-VII are superior in accuracy to Books VIII-XV, with the exception of Book IX, which contains material written in 1646. Clarendon's history is a literary classic because of its series of portraits of the participants in the war. His book is a notable contribution to the rise of the arts of biography and autobiography in England in the 17th century and contributed to the development which in the 18th century produced the first English novels.

As a statesman, Hyde was at first a leading opponent of Charles I, but his strongly Anglican (▷ Church of England) faith led him to take the Royalist side shortly before the war. He became one of the king's chief advisers. He followed the royal court into exile, and was Lord Chancellor and ▷ Charles II's chief minister at the Restoration (1660). The king's brother, the future ▷ James II, married his daughter, so that he became grandfather of Queen ▷ Mary II and Queen ▷ Anne. He was made the scapegoat for the unpopularity of Charles II's government in its early years, however, and was driven into exile in 1667. He lived the remainder of his life in France.

Clarissa (1747-8)

An epistolary novel by > Samuel Richardson.
The central characters are Clarissa Harlowe,
Anna Howe, Lovelace and John Belford.
Clarissa's family wish her to marry the odious suitor, Solmes, a wealthy man whom she abhors. The marriage is proposed to elevate the Harlowes socially, yet in the motives of Clarissa's brother and sister there is also a disturbing undertone of sadistic sexuality. As she refuses to accept Solmes the family ostracize her within their home.

Lovelace, a handsome rake, is initially the suitor of the elder sister Arabella, but his real interest is in Clarissa. When the family ill treat her he poses as her deliverer and persuades her to escape with him to London, promising that he will restore her in the esteem of her relatives. But the apparently respectable house where they stay is in reality a brothel.

Lovelace's attempts at seducing Clarissa are unsuccessful, and he eventually resorts to drugging her and then rapes her. Through this theme Richardson explores the hypocrisy of a society which equates 'honour' with virginity.

Clarissa dies after the rape, not from shame but from a spiritual integrity which cannot be corrupted. In the self-martyrdom of the heroine, Richardson achieves a psychological complexity which transcends the limitations of the purported morality.

Clarke, Arthur C. (b 1917) Science-fiction writer, educated at King's College, University of London. He worked as an auditor, served in the RAF 1941-46 and since then has been a scientific editor, underwater explorer and photographer, company director and television and radio presenter, as well as writing numerous novels, short stories, books for children and works of popular science. He is a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society and has won many prizes for his work. His science fiction draws on his wide scientific knowledge, combining exciting narrative and philosophical concerns with detailed explanations of the imagined technology of the future. Many of his fictions involve narratives of exploration and discovery, carried out by romantic individualists. His best-known work remains 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968), the script of a hugely popular film which he subsequently turned into a novel. His other novels include: Prelude to Space (1951); The Sands of Mars (1951); Against the Fall of Night (1953); Earthlight (1955); A Fall of Moondust (1961); Rendezvous with Rama (1973); The Fountains of Paradise (1979); The Songs of Distant Earth (1986); The Ghost from the Grand Banks (1990). Among his many volumes of short stories are: The Nine Billion Names of God: The Best Short Stories of Arthur C. Clarke (1967) and Tales from Planet Earth (1989).

Clarke, Gillian (b 1937)

Poet. Born in Cardiff, Gillian Clarke read English at University College, Cardiff, and then worked with the BBC in London before returning to Cardiff in 1960. Many of her poems are concerned with the rhythms of the seasons, rural life and landscape. A smaller number, more prominent in her earlier work, are set in suburbia or reflect on her experiences as a mother, her poetic move towards nature being linked to her physical move to a Welsh long-house in the Dyfed countryside. Gillian Clarke was assistant editor of the Anglo-Welsh Review from 1971 to 1976 when she succeeded Roland Mathias as editor, an influential position which she held until 1984. Encouraged by Meic Stephens as editor of Poetry Wales, she began her published poetry collections with the Triskel pamphlet Snow on the Mountains (1971), this being followed by The Sundial (1978) and Letter from a Far Country (1982), and then, more recently, after her Selected Poems in 1985, Letting in the Rumour (1989) and The King of Britain's Daughter (1993).

Clarke, Marcus (1846-81)

Novelist. The son of a wealthy lawyer, Clarke emigrated to Australia in 1863, where he worked on a sheep station and then as a journalist. His first novel, Long Odds (1869), is an unremarkable ≥ sensation novel, but this was followed by His Natural Life (serialized 1870–2; published in a three-volume abridged form 1875), which, despite a convoluted plot concerning inheritances and impersonation, contains powerful accounts of convict life in 1840s Australia, and has become the most famous 19th-century Australian novel.

Clarke, Mary Cowden (1809-98)

Critic, novelist and poet, born in London. She was the daughter of composer Vincent Novello and Mary Sabilla Hehl, and was educated at home and in France. Her father's literary acquaintances included ➤ Keats (1795-1821), Leigh Hunt (1784-1859), and Charles Cowden Clarke, whom she married in 1828. In 1829 she began a project that was to occupy her for sixteen years. The Complete Concordance to Shakespeare was eventually published in 1845, and remained the standard concordance until the end of the 19th century. Other work on Shakespeare includes Shakespeare Proverbs (1848) and a collection of stories based on The Girlhood of Shakespeare's Heroines (1852). She also wrote several volumes of verse biographies of her father and her husband; an autobiography, My Long Life (1896); a series of novels and a collection of Short Stories in Metrical Prose (1873). She was the editor of the Musical Times from 1853-6.

Classic, Classics, Classical

These words are apt to cause confusion. The term 'classic' has been used to denote a work about whose value it is assumed there can be no argument, eg, Portrait of a Lady is a classic. The word particularly implies a changeless and immutable quality; it has sometimes been used to deny the need for reassessment, reinterpretation and change. Because only a few works can be classics, it may be argued that the term is synonymous with the best. This is not necessarily the case, especially with regard to changes in literary taste and a constantly moving canon of texts.

'Classics' is the study of ancient Greek and Latin literature. 'Classic' is used as an adjective as well as a noun, $eg \triangleright$ Henry James wrote many classic novels. 'Classical' is mainly used as the adjective for 'classics', eg classical scholarship.

Classical education and English literature Classical education is based on the study of the 'classics', ie the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, principally from ▷ Homer to the great Latin poets and prose writers (eg ▷ Virgil, ▷ Ovid, ▷ Cicero) of the 1st century BC − 1st century AD. Latin is more closely bound up with western history and culture, and is the easier language for English speakers to study; consequently it has been more widely used in schools than Greek, and it has been studied at earlier stages of education. Roman literary culture was, however, based on that of the Greeks.

Medieval Europe (Christendom) grew out of the ruins of the western Roman Empire; the Church, like the Empire, was still ruled from Rome; its philosophy was deeply influenced by the Greek philosophers and its language continued to be Latin. The Church controlled the universities and the classics were the basis of medieval university education, especially that part of it known as the 'Trivium' – grammar, rhetoric and logic. Nonetheless, many of the Greek and Roman writers were known principally through inferior versions of their texts and they were valued chiefly in so far as the Church could use them for its own purposes.

The movement known as the ➤ Renaissance started in Italy in the 14th century; it was, first of all, the enthusiastic rediscovery and collection by scholars of ancient classical texts, and the development of new and more accurate methods of studying them. It did not long remain merely a scholarly movement; the scholars influenced the writers and artists, and these in turn, in the 15th and 16th centuries, aroused enthusiasm in the upper classes of all western Europe. The Renaissance practice of studying the classics for their own sake and not under the direction of the Church, brought the discovery of a new principle of growth in literature and the other arts. Knowledge of the classics became a principle of discrimination: those who did not have it were by implication more primitive in their development and often from a lower social class.

The Renaissance first seriously affected England early in the 16th century. The pattern for classical education in the national public schools and the more local grammar schools was formed by such men as John Colet (?1467–1519), High Master of St Paul's School. ▷ Sir Thomas More, author of Utopia and Chancellor to ▷ Henry VIII, gave prestige to ▷ humanist values in the royal court. ▷ Erasmus visited England from Holland and made friends among these and other English humanists.

But ancient Greece, and Rome in its greatest days, were pagan; their values were social rather than religious. Thus there was the possibility of divided loyalty between the Rome that was the starting-point of so much European art, thought and politics, and the latter Rome that was the centre of the originally Hebrew and very unclassical religion of Christianity. The Roman Catholic Church in the 15th and early 16th centuries at first responded to the humanists favourably, even when they were critical of its traditions and practices. The thought and outlook of pagan Greece and Rome nevertheless did not agree well with the ancient Hebrew roots of Christianity as shown in the Old and New Testaments of the Bible. The 16th-century Protestant ➤ Reformation was partly the outcome of humanist criticism of the Church, but it was also a return to the Word of God as the Bible displayed it. Thus, from 1560 to 1660, much English imaginative writing has two aspects: the poets ➤ Edmund Spenser and ▷ John Milton, for example, have a Protestant aspect, which is biblical and Hebraic; and a classical aspect, strongly inspired by the classical Renaissance. The poet ➤ Ben Jonson is much more classical than Protestant, while ➤ George Herbert is strongly religious in the moderately Protestant, Anglican tradition, and despises the kind of subject matter (eg 'classical pastoral') which Ben Jonson accepted. Both, however, had an equally classical education.

Another division arose from the difference between native literary traditions, which continued in their non-classical character, and the classical qualities and standards which many writers felt should permeate and regulate the native tradition. This division did not correspond to religious differences: the most Latin of all English poets is the ▶ Puritan, John Milton. ▶ Shakespeare is well-known for his indifference to the classical 'trules' which critics like ▶ Sir Philip Sidney thought necessary to good drama, while his contemporary, Ben Jonson, favoured them, though not slavishly.

Classical and native traditions of literature rivalled and nourished each other until the middle of the 17th century, and so did Protestant biblical and secular classical philosophies of life. But after the Restoration in 1660, religious passions declined and sceptical rationalism began to take their place. Thus began the most classical period of English art and literature, the so-called Augustan age of the 18th century. Yet within their neo-classical horizon, the best English writers even of this period retained strong elements of native idiom; this is true of the poets, ▷ John Dryden and ▷ Alexander Pope, and of the prose writers ▷ Jonathan Swift and ▷ Samuel Johnson.

The ▶ French Revolution of 1789 was, at one level, the outcome of 18th century reason, criticism and scepticism, but it challenged the 18th-century classical qualities of order, intellectual proportion and balance, and the view of man as fulfilled only in a civilized structure of society. The English Romantic movement was partly an outcome of the French Revolution; it challenged many of the classical values, attaching more importance to the cultivation of the feelings of the individual than to the cultivation of the reason of man in society; it rediscovered the Middle Ages, which for three centuries has been despised as > 'gothic', ie barbarous. At the same time, that part of English society which had always been more biblical than classical in its culture - the commercial middle classes - was now stronger (thanks to the > Industrial Revolution) than it had ever been before. So we find the critic ➤ Matthew Arnold, in his Culture and Anarchy (1869), distinguishing between two categories of mind in contemporary society: the majority were the 'Hebraizers', who devoted themselves to the virtues of private conduct and practical achievement; the 'Hellenizers', like himself, valued contemplation, reason and critical discrimination. England, he considered, was becoming barbarous owing to the preponderance of the former over the latter.

Since Arnold, classical education has lost its long-held place in the centre of education. It has retained its privileged status but as education has become available to all, different skills, such as the study of English literature, have been developed as other disciplines.

Classical mythology

Ancient Greek mythology can be divided between the 'Divine Myths' and the 'Heroic Myths'.

The divine myths are known in differing versions from the works of various Greek poets, of whom the most notable are > Homer and Hesiod. Hesiod explained the origin of the world in terms of a marriage between Earth (Ge or Gaea) and Sky (Uranus). Their children were the 12 Titans: Oceanus, Crius, Iapetus, Theia, Rhea, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, Tethys, Themis, Cocus, Hyperion, and Cronos. Cronos overthrew his father, and he and Rhea (or Cybele) became the parents of the 'Olympian gods', so called from their association with the sacred Olympus. The Olympians, in their turn, overthrew Cronos and the other Titans.

The chief Olympians were Zeus and his queen Hera. The other gods and goddesses were the offspring of either, but as Zeus was usually at war with Hera, they were not the joint parents. They seem to have been seen as male and female aspects of the sky; their quarrels were the causes of bad weather and cosmic disturbances. The principal offspring of Zeus were Apollo, Artemis, Athene, Aphrodite (sometimes represented as a daughter of Uranus out of the sea), Dionysus, Hermes, and Ares. Zeus had three sisters, Hestia, Demeter (the corn goddess) and Hera (also his wife), and two brothers, Poseidon who ruled the sea, and Hades who ruled the underworld. In the 3rd century BC the Olympian gods were adopted by the Romans, who used the Latin names more commonly known to later European writers. Uranus, Apollo, and some others remained the same. Gaea became Tellus; Cronos = Saturn;

Zeus = Jupiter (or Jove); Hera = Juno; Athene = Minerva; Artemis = Diana; Hermes = Mercury; Ares = Mars; Hephaestus = Vulcan; Aphrodite = Venus (and her son Eros = Cupid); Demeter = Ceres; Poseidon = Neptune. There were numerous minor deities such as nymphs and satyrs in both Greek and Roman pantheons.

The Olympian deities mingled with men, and rivalled one another in deciding human destinies. They concerned themselves particularly with the destinies of the heroes, ie those men, sometimes partly divine by parentage, who were remarkable for the kinds of excellence which are especially valued in early societies, such as strength (Heracles), or cunning (Odysseus). Each region of Greece had its native heroes, though the greatest heroes were famous in legend all over Greece. The most famous of all was Heracles (in Latin, Hercules) who originated in Thebes. Other leading examples of the hero are: Theseus (Athens); Sisyphus and Bellerophon (Corinth); Perseus (Argolis); the Dioscuri, ie Castor and Pollux (Lanconia); Oedipus (Thebes); Achilles (Thessaly); Jason (Thessaly); Orpheus (Thrace). Like the Greek gods and goddesses, the Greek heroes were adopted by Roman legend, sometimes with a change of name. The minor hero of Greek legend, Aeneas, was raised to be the great ancestral hero of the Romans, and they had other heroes of their own, such as Romulus, the founder of Rome, and his brother Remus.

After the downfall of the Roman Empire of the West, classical deities and heroes achieved a kind of popular reality through the planets and zodiacal signs which are named after them, and which, according to astrologers, influence human fates. Thus in > Chaucer's > The Knight's Tale, Mars, Venus, Diana and Saturn occur, and owe their force in the poem as much to medieval astrology as to classical legend. Otherwise their survival has depended chiefly on their importance in the works of the classical poets, such as ➤ Homer, Hesiod, ➤ Virgil and > Ovid, who have meant so much to European culture. In Britain, important poets translated and thus helped to 'naturalize' the Greek and Latin poems; eg ➤ Gavin Douglas in the 16th century and ▷ Dryden in the 17th century translated Virgil's > Aeneid; > Chapman in the 16th century and > Pope in the 18th century translated Homer's epics. In the 16th and 17th centuries, poets used major and minor classical deities to adorn and elevate poems intended chiefly as gracious entertainment, and occasionally they added deities of their own invention.

While European culture was understood as a more or less distinct system of values, the poets used classical deities and heroes deliberately and objectively. In the 19th century, however, the deep disturbance of European beliefs and values caused European writers to use classical myth more subjectively, as symbols through which they tried to express their personal doubts, struggles, and beliefs. Thus John Keats in his unfinished epic ➤ Hyperion tried to emulate Milton's great Christian epic, ▷ Paradise Lost, but instead of Christian myth he used the war of the Olympian gods and the titans to embody his sense of the tragedy of human experience. > Tennyson wrote dramatic monologues in which personifications of Greek heroes (eg Ulysses, Tithonus, Tiresias in eponymous poems) recounted the experiences associated with them in classical (or, in the case of Ulysses, medieval) legend, in such a way as to express the emotional conflicts of a man from the Victorian age like Tennyson himself. In the 20th century, writers have used figures from the classical myths differently again; they are introduced to establish the continuity of the emotions and attitudes characteristic of modern men and women with emotions and attitudes of those from the past. It is thus that > T. S. Eliot uses Tiresias in his poem > The Waste Land, and James Joyce uses the Odvsseus myth in his novel > Ulysses. In a comparable way, modern psychologists have used the Greek myths as symbolic expressions of basic psychological conflicts in human beings in all periods. ➤ Freud's theory of the Oedipus complex is the most famous of these reinterpretations. > Odyssey; Iliad.

Classical unities

Criteria for drama based on those of ➤ Aristotle in his Poetics. He argued that dramatic action should be plausible, and therefore should take place in a single location, or locations close to one another, in the space of 24 hours, and should focus on a single storyline, rather than leaping from plot to plot. Many classical Greek tragedies observe these rules, known as the 'Three Unities' - of time, of place, and of action. They were popular in the early > Renaissance, especially in > French literature. However, under the influence of ⊳ Shakespeare the unities have been mainly disregarded, except in the 17th century when they were revived by ⊳ neo-classicists, and French dramatists such as ➤ Corneille and ➤ Racine were much affected by them. In England, > Thomas Rymer and ▷ John Dennis articulated neo-classical theories of tragedy which included homage to the classical unities. But most practising dramatists in England barely observed these rules. > Dryden's views on the subject were complex. In his congratulatory poem, To My Friend, the Author, addressed to the English dramatist Peter Motteux, he praised Motteux's tragi-comedy Beauty in Distress (1698) for its model adherence to the unities. However, in his Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668) and Heads of an Answer to Rymer (1677), he defended contemporary departures from neo-classical theory, including his own, on the grounds that the later plays had greater variety and interest than those of ancient times. He argued that 'although the Plays of the Ancients are more correctly Plotted, ours are more beautifully written'.

Cleanness

One of the four > alliterative poems dating from the second half of the 14th century, attributed to the > Gawain poet, and preserved along with > Pearl, > Patience and > Gawain and the Green Knight in a single manuscript, British Library Cotton Nero A. x. The poem's structure is influenced by contemporary sermonizing practices, in which a systematic exploration of a given theme would be made using a series of biblical narratives. In this case the narrator investigates the diverse meanings and spiritual resonances of 'cleanness' through a series of New Testament and Old Testament stories (the parable of the Wedding Feast, the story of the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, Belshazzar's Feast). The poem, which has no title in the manuscript, is sometimes referred to as Purity.

Cleland, John (1709-89)

Novelist and journalist, most famous for his novel Fanny Hill: Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure, published in two volumes in 1748 and 1749 and immediately suppressed as pornography. An unexpurgated edition of the book published in England in 1963 was seized by police and became the subject of a trial. Cleland also wrote Memoirs of a Coxcomb (1751) and several other novels and dramatic pieces.

Clerihew

A lightweight epigram, usually in four lines of varying length, so called after its inventor E. Clerihew Bentley. For example:

Alfred de Musset Called his cat 'pusset' His accent was affected – That was to be expected.

Clerk's Tale, The

One of ➤ Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. The Clerk begins his tale with a tribute to the Italian poet ➤ Petrarch who has provided him with his story of patient Griselda, who survives the trials and tortures imposed on her by her husband, the higher-born Walter, in his attempt to test the limits of her patience. The story seems to have had considerable appeal for medieval writers, and a number of other versions and analogues survive (including that of Petrarch's source, the hundredth tale of ▷ Boccaccio's ▷ Decameron). In producing his version of the story in the Clerk's Tale, Chaucer seems to play off the possibilities of interpreting this story as a spiritual allegory and as a literal history, and the resulting narrative has a disquieting effect. Through retelling the story of Griselda, the Clerk takes up and disproves the assertion made by the ▷ Wife of Bath in her Prologue (that clerics cannot speak well of wives), and the tale concludes with an 'envoy' considering the lessons of Griselda's story for the Wife of Bath and all her 'sect'.

Cliché

A word borrowed from the French, used to denote a phrase or idiom employed by habit instead of meaningfully, eg 'her skin was as white as snow'. It is a stock phrase, employed without thought and heard (or read) without visualization.

Clifford, Lady Anne (1590-1676)

One of the most accomplished and fascinating diarists of her age. Lady Anne Clifford was the only child of George Clifford, third Earl of Cumberland and Margaret Russell. However, on his death in 1605 it was discovered that her father had left the family estates to his nearest surviving male relative. Much of Lady Anne's life was devoted to regaining what she considered to be her rightful inheritance, even though both her husband and ➤ King James I opposed her demands. This marriage, to Richard Sackville, Earl of Dorset, was unhappy, but she fared little better in her second attempt at wedlock, to Philip Herbert, Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery; she was widowed for a second time in 1649. At last, in 1643, she gained possession of her lands and began systematically rebuilding and refurbishing each of her six castles. During the > Civil War she was a staunch supporter of the Royalist cause and continued to prove her strength of character by resisting a three-year siege by the Parliamentary forces. After 1653 she settled down to write her own and her family's history, and this work, Great Books, together with her diaries and letters, provides us with one of the most lively and dramatic > autobiographies by a Renaissance woman. Lady Anne was a learned woman who had been tutored by > Samuel Daniel and whose personal chaplain at Wilton had been ➤ George Herbert. She was celebrated in verse by ➤ Aemilia Lanyer. When she died at the age of 86 Lady Anne was a wealthy matriarch, for not only had she inherited her own estate, but she had also benefited from the rich jointures acquired at the deaths of her two detested husbands. Clinton, Lady Elizabeth, Countess of Lincoln (c 1574–1630)

Writer on motherhood. One of the earliest female exponents of breast-feeding. Lady Elizabeth had not fed any of her own 18 children herself, but regretted this later and wrote The Countess of Lincoln's Nursery (1622) confessing her mistake. The treatise advises all women, but especially the Countess's daughter-in-law, to breast-feed so that they might follow the 'Ordinance of God' and strengthen the mother-baby bond. This attitude should be seen not simply as an impassioned plea by a mother denied her 'natural' rights, but as part of a theoretical debate in which humanists and reformers advocated the necessity of breast-feeding (for example, ➤ Erasmus in 'The New Mother' [1523]). Moreover, ▷ Thomas Lodge's dedicatory poem reinforces the theoretical nature of the work.

Clive, Caroline (1801-73)

Novelist and poet. Born Caroline Meysey-Wigley, her father was an MP. She published her poems in 1840 (as 'V'), though more interest was aroused by her first (and anonymous) novel, Paul Ferroll (1855), whose hero murders his first wife and is able to keep his secret for eighteen years through a happy and prosperous second marriage. The novel entered into the wider debate about divorce (leading up to the 1857 Divorce Act), while the moral ambiguities arising from the author's apparent unwillingness to condemn her hero, combined with the novel's interest in secrecy, make Paul Ferroll an important forerunner of the ⊳ sensation novel of the 1860s. In the sequel, Why Paul Ferroll Killed His Wife (1860), Clive adopts a more conventionally moralistic tone.

Actress, singer, dramatist, and pamphlet-writer.
Kitty Clive (née Raftor) joined the ▷ Drury Lane Theatre in 1728 where she spent most of her career, and quickly became one of its leading comic actresses, as well as singing in operas, entr'actes, and afterpieces. Her first major success was as Polly in ▷ The Beggar's
Opera (1728), followed by roles in The Old
Debauchees (1732) and The Covent Carden
Tragedy (1732), written specially for her by

She herself wrote afterpieces, farces and a pamphlet, The Case of Mrs Clive (1743), which attacked the managements of Drury Lane and

Description > Covent Garden theatres. She was for many years a close friend of Description Horace Walpole. In 1769, she retired, and died 16 years later, after frequent bouts of illness. Her admirers praised her for her wit, intelligence, expressive features, and comic sense of timing. She was buried in Twickenham churchyard. Bib: Highfill, P. H. Jr., Burnim, K. A. and Langhans, E. Closure

A term used to refer to the way literary works or argument are concluded. In recent critical discussion a high value is placed on works which 'resist closure', that is works which leave the events described or issues raised open at the end of the work. This preference for openendedness is often seen as a legacy of the > Modernist movement. Though the term closure is usually used of whole narratives, it can also be used of any episode or part of a work. It is also used more abstractly to refer to the resolution by a critic of the treatment of the issues raised in a text. This is often referred to as 'interpretative closure', and again carries negative connotations at present because it implies closed or dogmatic attitudes.

Cloud of Unknowing, The

One of the most admired texts of the medieval English mystical tradition. This spiritual treatise was produced some time in the second half of the 14th century in the north-east Midlands area. The text, which explores the active and contemplative ways of living, is addressed to a young contemplative and is partly presented in dialogue form. The tutor counsels that it is only by experiencing the cloud of unknowing that God will be felt and seen. Several other spiritual treatises have been attributed to the author of The Cloud of Unknowing (who is otherwise unknown).

Clough, Arthur Hugh (1819-61) Poet. He was the son of a Liverpool cotton merchant, and was educated at ➤ Rugby School under ⊳ Thomas Arnold, and at Balliol College, Oxford. At Oxford he came for a time under the influence of ➤ Newman. afterwards a Roman > Catholic but at the time one or the leaders of the Anglican religious revival known as the ➤ Oxford Movement: later, when Clough was a senior member (Fellow) of Oriel College, he became a sceptic in religious belief. It was necessary (until 1871) to accept the doctrines of the Church of England in order to be a senior member of an Oxford College; thus Clough's religious doubts caused him to resign. He travelled in Europe, was for a short time principal of a students' hostel in London University (where no religious restrictions operated) and lectured in the USA. Finally (1853) he accepted a post under the government in the Education Office. He was the close friend and correspondent of the poet and critic > Matthew Arnold, who commemorated his death with the elegy Thyrsis (pub. 1867). Almost all of Clough's letters to Arnold have disappeared, but Arnold's letters to him (see Letters to Clough, ed. H.F. Lowry) are interesting for what they reveal of the minds of the two men. Both were religious doubters, and both were dismayed by the course of 19thcentury civilization. Arnold was desolated by the loss of his friend, and attributes his death to premature despair ('Too quick despairer, wherefore wilt thou go?').

Clough's long poems have a light, though scarcely serene, spirit. The best-known ones are the two verse novels, The Bothie of Toberna-Vuolich (1848) and Amours de Voyage (1849; pub. 1858), and the uncompleted dramatic dialogue Dipsychus (1850; pub. 1869). The first two are written in a metre unusual in English, the Latin hexameter. Dipsychus employs a wide variety of metres. The subject of the first poem is a young man of advanced intellectual opinions but emotional immaturity, and his love affair with a Scottish Highland peasant girl who has the emotional maturity that he lacks; published in the revolutionary year of 1848, it also explored ➤ Chartism and class differences. Amours is about a self-doubting man who loses the girl he loves through his inability to arrive at conclusions as to the truth of his own feelings. Dipsychus, 'the man in two minds', is a colloquy between a self-doubter and the spirit who haunts him, who admits to the name 'Mephistophilis' and vet is not certainly evil. The other poets of the age were as much afflicted by the torments of doubt as Clough was, but Clough differed from them in relating doubt to the conduct of ordinary daily life, and in his use of a kind of irony which is much more characteristic of 20th-century poets than it is of 19th-century ones. He has consequently attracted much more critical interest in the 20th century than he received in the past; see for example the claims made on his behalf in the Introduction to Tom Paulin's Faber Book of Political Verse (1986).

Her first published work, Essays on the Theory of Intuitive Morals, appeared anonymously in 1855. One reviewer described it as 'the work of a lofty and masculine mind'. Cobbé wrote prolifically on religious and moral issues and was deeply involved in social reform, advocating > women's suffrage and arguing that women were not contributing all that they might to society. Her works include Essays on the Pursuits of Women (1863); The Cities of the Past (1864); Italics (1864); Darwinism in Morals and Other Essays (1872); The Moral Aspects of Vivisection (1875); The Duties of Women (1881); The Scientific Spirit of the Age (1888) and an autobiography, Life of Frances Power Cobbe (1904).

Cobbett, William (1762-1835) Journalist and political leader of the working class, especially of the rural labourer. The son of a small farmer and self-educated, he remained identified with country pursuits and interests. The work by which he is especially known is > Rural Rides, an account of tours through England on horseback, written for the enlightenment of a working-class public, and published between 1820 and 1830 in his periodical > Political Register, which he edited from 1802 until his death. The Rides are famous for their racy, vigorous description of the countryside. His language is always clear, plain and lively; in an autobiographical fragment he declares that his first inspiration in the writing of prose was the work of Jonathan Swift (1667-1745), though he is completely without Swift's ironical suavity. His next most famous work is his Advice to Young Men (1829); his Grammar of the English Language (1818) is an outstanding guide to the writing of vigorous English.

Apart from the still appreciated vividness of his writings, Cobbett has remained a hero of forthright, independent political journalism. When he was in America (1792–1800) his Porcupine's Gazette and various pamphlets were in defence of Britain against the prejudices of the newly independent Americans; once back in England, he refused offers of government patronage, and though he started his Political Register in support of the Tories, then in power, in a few years he moved over to radical opposition, and spent two years in prison. In 1832 he was elected Member of Parliament in spite of his refusal to use the corrupt methods for influencing electors common at the time; in Parliament he went into opposition to the Whig government as an extreme left radical. He was excessively quarrelsome and prejudiced, but also exceedingly brave and eloquent in support of the cause of justice as, at any given time, he saw it.

Cobbold, Elizabeth (c 1764-1824) Cobbold was a northern poet, spending most of her life in Liverpool and Manchester. She began publishing when she was 19 with Poems on Various Subjects (1783), and followed this with Six Narrative Poems (1787). The poetry is bold and energetic, but the subject matter simply repeats the conventional interest in the mysterious and exotic. Her fascination with the sensational continued in her novel The Sword, or Father Bertrand's History of His Own Times (1791), a medieval romance which was published under her married name, Clarke. This first marriage lasted only six months, but she soon met John Cobbold, a wealthy Liverpool brewer, and married him in 1792. Her writing continued and she published several pieces of poetry including an ode on the Battle of Waterloo. Perhaps her most interesting work is The Mince Pye (1800), a satire of contemporary nationalistic feeling (> nationalism). In this later work the energies of her youthful poetry remain, but are directed with a sharp and intelligent wit.

Coetzee, John Michael (b 1940)

South African novelist, translator and critic. Educated at the University of Cape Town, where he has taught literature and linguistics since 1972, having previously worked in computing in England and held an academic job at the State University of New York. Since 1984 he has been Professor of General Literature at Cape Town, and has held visiting professorships at various universities in the USA. His fiction includes Dusklands (two novellas, 1974); In the Heart of the Country (1977; published in the USA as From the Heart of the Country); Waiting for the Barbarians (1980); Life and Times of Michael K (1983); Foe (1986); Age of Iron (1990). Together with the novelist \triangleright André Brink, he edited A Land Apart: A South African Reader (1986). His translations include: A Posthumous Confession, by Marcellus Emants (1976); The Expedition to the Baobab Tree, by Wilma Stockenstrom (1983). Critical writing: White Writing: On the Culture of Letters in South Africa (1988). His fiction frequently works through the selfconscious transformation of established genres, such as the 18th-century novel of travel and exploration (in Foe, which takes as its point of departure Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe). Coetzee's most persistent concern has been the impact on the self of colonial power-structures; many of his protagonists are compromised by their privileged position within such structures. Coffee and coffee-houses

Coffee was introduced into England from the east in the mid-17th century, and from the Restoration until the mid-18th century coffeehouses were fashionable public resorts in London. Certain coffee-houses became meeting places for supporters of particular political parties, or for the members of particular professions. Will's Coffee-house became the centre for men of letters; the Cocoa Tree Chocolate-house became the home of Tory politicians, while the Whigs went to St James' Coffee-house; ➤ Lloyd's became popular with merchants; and so forth. In the later 18th century more tea was imported, and as such luxuries were now distributed more widely, ordinary people took to drinking it in their homes. So the century of the flourishing coffee-house was succeeded by that of the domestic tea-party as the typically English social occasion. Some of the coffee-houses survived in other forms; thus Lloyd's became the central office in London for marine insurance, and White's became one of London's most fashionable ≥ clubs.

Coleridge, Hartley (1796-1849) Poet and miscellaneous author. Hartley was the disreputable son of ▶ Samuel Taylor Coleridge and is generally considered to have squandered his talents and artistic inheritance. His father wrote two poems about him: ➤ Frost at Midnight and The Nightingale. Hartley's own Songs and Sonnets (▷ sonnet) were published in 1833 to some acclaim, and his editions of the plays of Ford and Massinger, and Ascham's The Scholemaster (▷ Renaissance) are well thought-out. He spent the last part of his life in the Lake District and several of his personal effects may still be seen at Dove Cottage. Bib: Hartman, H., Hartley Coleridge: poet's son and poet.

Coleridge, Mary (1861–1907)
Poet, novelist and great-great niece of poet and critic Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834).
Born in London, she lived with her parents who played host to a number of distinguished literary figures including > Tennyson, > Browning, > Ruskin and > Fanny Kemble. In 1895 she taught at the Working Women's College. She wrote a number of novels including The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus (1893) and a historical > romance The King with Two Faces (1897). Her poetry, which she wrote continuously throughout her life, was admired by ➤ Robert Bridges but Coleridge herself was reluctant to publish it. She produced two volumes, Fancy's Following (1896) and Fancy's Guerdon (1897), both of which appeared under her ⊳ pseudonym 'Anodos'. After her death from appendicitis a collection of 200 poems was gleaned from her letters and notebooks by fellow poet Henry Newbolt (1862-1938) and published in 1907 (expanded 1954). Her themes are those of female friendship and spinsterly solidarity, love's elusiveness and the fragility of identity. Others briefly record psychic and dream states. Her most famous poem is 'The Other Side of the Mirror' which 20th-century feminist critics Sandra Gilbert and Susan Gubar regard as an examination of the monstrous alter-ego of the female (> Jane Eyre). Her other works include: a collection of short prose sketches, Non Sequiter (1900); three novels, The Fiery Dream (1901), The Shadow on the Wall (1904), The Lady on the Drawing Room Floor (1906), and a > biography of Holman Hunt (1008). Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (1772-1834) Poet and critic. Son of a Devon clergyman, he was educated in London and at Jesus College Cambridge. He left Cambridge to enlist in the Dragoons under the pseudonym Silas Tomkyn Comberbache, and although he returned after a matter of months he never completed his degree. His early religious leanings were towards Unitarianism. In 1794 he made the acquaintance of > Robert Southey, with whom, under the influence of the > French Revolution, he evolved a communistic scheme which they called > 'Pantisocracy', and together they wrote the tragedy, The Fall of Robespierre. In 1795 he married Sara Fricker, Southey marrying her sister. His Poems on Various Subjects were published in 1796, at about the time he met ➤ Wordsworth. The two poets became friends, and lived close to each other for a time in Somerset. > Kubla Khan and the first part of > Christabel were written in this period, though they were not published until later. The joint publication, ▷ Lyrical Ballads, which included Coleridge's ➤ The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, appeared in 1798. Coleridge expressed his loss of faith in the French Revolution in France, An Ode (1798).

In 1798-9 he travelled in Germany and came under the influence of the transcendental philosophy of Schlegel and ➤ Kant, which dominates his later theoretical writing. During 1800-4 he moved near to Wordsworth in Keswick, and fell unhappily in love with his sister-in-law, Sarah Hutchinson, a relationship referred to in > Dejection: An Ode (1802). Early in his life he had become reliant on opium and never succeeded in fully controlling the addiction. He began to give public lectures and became famous for his table talk. In 1809 he founded a periodical, The Friend, which was later published as a book (1818). In 1817 appeared ➤ Biographia Literaria, his autobiographical apologia and a landmark in literary theory and criticism. He quarrelled with Wordsworth in 1810, and in later life he lived in the homes of various benefactors, including the surgeon, James Gillman, who helped him to cope with his addiction. He became increasingly Tory in politics and Anglican in religion, developing an emotionalist conservatism in the tradition of Burke.

Coleridge's poetic output is small, diverse, but of great importance. His > 'conversation poems', such as Frost at Midnight (1798), This Lime-Tree Bower, My Prison (1800), continue and deepen the reflective tradition of Gray and Cowper, culminating in the poignant Dejection: An Ode (1802). On the other hand his major symbolic works, such as The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798), Kubla Khan (1816) and Christabel (1816), plumb new psychological and emotional depths, and can be seen to develop along similar lines as his famous theoretical definition of imagination in Biographia Literaria, Chapter XIII. His perspectives are consistently more intellectually alert than those of his friend Wordsworth, though the expression of his philosophical ideas is sometimes confused. His sympathetic but discriminating analysis of Wordsworth's work in Biographia Literaria is a model of unfussy analytical method. As both practitioner and theorist, Coleridge is central to ➤ Romanticism.

Describe De

Coleridge, Sara (1802–52) Writer, the daughter of poet and critic Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834). She educated herself, with the help of poet Robert Southey (1774-1843), acquiring six languages and a good knowledge of Classics and philosophy. Wordsworth described her as 'remarkably clever'. In 1822 she translated Dobrizhoffer's Latin Account of the Abipones and in 1825 the Memoirs of the Chevalier Bayard. She married her cousin, Henry Coleridge, in 1829, and lived in Hampstead, London, where she wrote Pretty Lessons in Verse for Good Children (1834) and the fantastical poem Phantasmion (1837). In 1843 Henry died, after which Coleridge devoted herself to organizing, editing and annotating her father's works, a task which she performed with great skill. She was greatly admired in London literary society, and her Memoir and Letters was published in 1873. Colin Clout

The name adopted by ➤ Edmund Spenser in his ➤ pastoral sequence ➤ The Shepherd's Calendar and his allegorical work Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1594), written to describe his visit to London and the court in 1589–91. The name became something of a code-word amongst the Spenserian poets, who, in emulation of Spenser, would refer to 'Colin' and adopt their own pastoral personae.

Collier, Jane (1710-1754/5)

English writer and social critic. She knew Latin and Greek, and numbered > Sarah Fielding among her friends, as well as > Samuel Richardson, whose > Clarissa she criticized. Anonymously, she published Essay on the Art of Ingeniously Tormenting (1753) - 'general instructions for plaguing all your acquaintence'. This demonstrates the power of satire and burlesque in pointing to the need for social change. For instance, she advises the tormenting of female servants; 'Always scold her, if she is the least undressed or dirty; and say you cannot bear such beasts about you. If she is clean and welldressed, tell her that you suppose she dresses out for the fellows.' In the next chapter she advises on the patroness's treatment of her humble female companion, noting, 'there is some difficulty in giving rules for tormenting a dependant, that shall differ from those laid down for plaging and teazing your servants, as the two stations differ so little in themselves.' With Sarah Fielding she wrote The Cry: a New Dramatic Fable (1754).

Collier, Jeremy (1650-1726)

Cleric and writer. Born at Stow-cum-Quy in Cambridgeshire, Collier was educated at Ipswich and Cambridge, and became rector of Ampton near Bury St Edmunds, and a lecturer at Gray's Inn. His life subsequently involved repeated conflicts with the authorities because of his unorthodox religious and political views and behaviour: he was imprisoned for his reply to > Bishop Burnet's Inquiry into the State of Affairs (1688), arrested on suspicion of Jacobitism (> Jacobite) 1692, and outlawed for giving absolution to two condemned political criminals in 1696. However, it was his A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698) which caused the most lasting furore, this time among dramatists against whom the attack was directed. A war of words ensued, with ➤ Congreve, ➤ Dryden and ➤ Vanbrugh among those responding to Collier, and he replying in turn. Although his stance was by no means unique in its day, he is credited with influencing the development of > sentimental drama. His onslaught was the more effective for the knowledge he displayed of dramatic texts, if not performances. He became a bishop in 1713. His works also include the Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary (1701-1721) and An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain from (1708-1714).

Collier, Mary (1679-after 1762)

English poet who worked as a rural labourer, washerwoman, brewer and later, housekeeper. She paid for the publication of The Woman's Labour (1739), and in the reprinted version of 1762 argued that she wrote it in reply to the labourer-poet > Stephen Duck's The Thresher's Labour. Her poem testifies to the drudgery of women's field labour: 'When night comes on, unto our home we go, / Our Corn we carry, and our Infant too; / Weary indeed! but 'tis not worth our while / Once to complain, or rest at every Stile; / We must make haste, for when we home are come, / We find again our Work but just begun.' Her poetry is a determined self-conscious articulation of the particular interlocking circumstances of gender and status. She later published, by subscription, Poems on Several Occasions (1762).

Collins, An

Devotional poet. Little is known about her life except that which is revealed in her one extant work, the ▷ autobiographical Divine Songs and Meditations (1653). It can therefore be assumed that she belonged to a reasonably well-off family, that she had suffered serious ill health since childhood and had, consequently, not been engaged in the usual female occupations or been able to have children. She was certainly antagonistic to the more radical forms of ▷ Puritanism, but it is disputed as to whether she was pro- or anti-Calvinist (see G. Greer (ed.), Kissing the Rod (1988) and E. Graham et al. (eds.), Her Own Life (1989)). Her poems are spiritual in nature, drawing upon biblical imagery and focusing upon the torments and respites of the Christian soul on earth.

Collins, Merle

Caribbean poet and novelist. Collins was born and educated in Grenada, where she worked as a teacher until the US invasion in 1983. She is now a lecturer at the University of North London. Her first novel was Angel (1987) and was followed by Rotten Pomerack (1992). Rain Darling (1990) is a collection of stories and she edited, with Rhonda Cobham, Watchers and Seekers: Creative Writing by Black Women in Britain (1987). As well as poems in anthologies, she has published a collection, Because the Dawn Breaks, Poems Dedicated to the Grenadian People (1985).

Collins, Wilkie (1824-89)

Novelist; one of the first ➤ detective novelists in English. His two famous novels are The Woman in White (1860), first published in > Household Words, a magazine edited by ➤ Charles Dickens, and ▷ The Moonstone (1868). These novels of > sensation established a pattern for English detective fiction. His mastery was especially over plot-construction in which he influenced Dickens. His characterization is less distinguished but in The Woman in White he excels in this, too, and in the creation of disturbing atmosphere. He collaborated with Dickens in a few stories in Household Words and in > All the Year Round: The Wreck of the Golden Mary, A Message from the Sea, No Thoroughfare. Collins' other novels include No Name (1862) and Armadale (1866), which has been praised for its > melodrama. Collins, William (1721-59)

Poet. The son of a hatter in Chichester, he published his Persian Eclogues in 1742 while he was still an undergraduate at Oxford. Their elegant exoticism and musical use of the pentameter couplet (> metre) made them popular, and they were reissued in 1757 as Oriental Eclogues. However his Odes on Several Descriptive and Allegorical Subjects (1746), which includes much of his best work, achieved little success at the time. The romantic Ode on the Popular Superstitions of the Highlands of Scotland Considered as a Subject of Poetry was written about 1749 but not published until 1788. In 1750 he suffered a mental breakdown and wrote no more verse before his death nine years later in Chichester. Collins' small output shows a fragile combination of exquisite classical control and intense lyricism. In such poems as Ode ('How sleep the Brave'), To Evening and The Passions he develops his own distinctive rococo idiom, involving the constant use of pretty personifications and classical abstraction, reminiscent of the friezes on Wedgewood pottery. His rhythms and tone are peculiarly original, and often quite haunting, though the influence of ▶ Thomas Gray, James Thomson and ▶ John Milton is often evident. Colman, George, the Elder (1732-94) Dramatist, essayist, theatre manager. He controlled first Covent Garden, and then the Haymarket Theatre and was responsible for staging the earliest productions of Oliver Goldsmith's (1730–74) plays, as well as writing dozens of plays, masques, and operas himself. He began writing poetry while still a pupil at Westminster School, and after receiving a degree at Oxford University and being called to the bar, he still retained his literary interests. Through his friendship with the actor David Garrick (1717-79), he became involved in the theatre, and eventually abandoned law as a career. In 1760 his first play, the farcical Polly Honeycombe, billed as 'a dramatic novel', was produced at ▷ Drury Lane. Six years later he collaborated with Garrick on > The Clandestine Marriage, his most successful work.

After inheriting a fortune from his mother, Colman purchased a major interest in the Covent Garden Theatre which came under his joint management in 1767. Among his ventures there were productions of Goldsmith's The Good-Natur'd Man, and She Stoops to Conquer. In 1776 Colman acquired the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, where in 1781 he successfully staged John Gay's (1685–1732) The Beggar's Opera (1728), with women cast as the men and vice versa.

Colman, George, the Younger (1762–1836) Dramatist, miscellany writer, and theatre manager. Son of ▷ George Colman, the elder. He was educated at Westminster School, and at Oxford, like his father. Again like his father, he was intended for the law, but preferred the stage, and had a musical farce, The Female Dramatist, produced at the Haymarket Theatre in 1782. In 1784 he underwent a clandestine marriage to the actress Clara Morris, of whom his father disapproved, and re-married her in open ceremony in 1788. In 1789, his father having been stricken with paralysis, and suffering from mental deterioration, he took over management of the Little Theatre in the Havmarket. He proved an effective manager, despite a penchant for personal extravagance which, among other factors, involved him in a series of quarrels and lawsuits. As a dramatist he was prolific, contributing more than 20 plays and musical entertainments, including several which became firm favourites, such as the comic opera, Inkle and Yarico (1787). In 1824 he was appointed Examiner of Plays, a title he retained to his death. He proved a fastidious censor, excising all supposedly blasphemous and indecent references, even though some of his own productions skirted close to the margins of propriety.

Colonel Jack (1722)

The History and Remarkable Life of Colonel Jacque, a novel by ▷ Daniel Defoe. Jack is abandoned by his parents, becomes a thief, a soldier, a slave on an American plantation, a planter, and eventually a rich and repentant man back in England. The sequence through crime, suffering and repentance, and from poverty to prosperity, is typical of Defoe's novels.

Colonialism

'Colonization' is normally understood to mean the process of annexation of a country or countries by an imperial power and the establishment of colonies or settlements fully or partly subject to that power. 'Colonialism' can therefore be glossed as the process by which those settlements are maintained in a subordinate relationship to that imperial power. The most aggressively colonial European countries were France, Portugal, Spain and Britain, and the areas most subject to colonization included the Indian sub-continent, Africa, Australasia, the Americas and the Caribbean.

Colonialism does not have to imply formal annexation, however. Colonial status involves the imposition of decisions by one people upon another, where the economy or political structure has been brought under the overwhelming influence of another country. Western colonialism was most active from 1450 to 1900. It began in the Renaissance with the voyages of discovery; the new territories were annexed for their material resources and for the scope they offered to missionary efforts to extend the power of the Church. By the 18th century, Britain had acquired control of India, Canada and other territories, and ranked as the greatest European colonial power. The loss of the colonies of North America in the > American War of Independence was a blow, but not a devastating one. Concern about the conditions of slaves in some of the colonies fuelled the anti-slavery movement (> William Wilberforce). One consequence of this movement was the renewed popularity of ⊳ Thomas Southerne's play > Oroonoko (1696), based on > Aphra Behn's novel of the same name, which featured a black slave as its hero. The last independent non-Western territories were parcelled out in 1900.

There was a strong tradition, founded on the imperialism myth of the Victorian era, of which > Thomas Carlyle, > Rudyard Kipling and ➤ Rider Haggard were the most famous exponents, that white intervention was made in the interests of the native inhabitants. Carlyle's essay 'An Occasional Discourse on the Nigger Question' (1849) claimed that the abolition of slavery in the British Empire in 1833 had led to the negroes becoming 'sluggards' and 'scoundrels'. In reality, freed slaves were refusing to work the plantations unless they were paid a decent wage. For Carlyle however, the negro was 'an idle Black gentleman, with his rum-bottle in his hand... breeches on his body, pumpkin at discretion, and the fruitfulest region of the earth going back to jungle around him'. His answer was to advocate the use of the whip to compel them back to work.

Carlyle's views alienated those more liberal Victorians such as > John Stuart Mill, and his isolation was made even more acute when he demonstrated his support for the controversial British colonial officer Governor John Edward Eyre (1815-1901). Eyre emigrated to Australia for reasons of health, where he became a sheep farmer and explored much of the continent. He served as a magistrate and protector of the Australian Aborigines and was later appointed Governor of New Zealand (1846-53). In 1853 he became Acting Governor of various of the Caribbean islands (1853-64) and permanent governor of Jamaica. Shortly after his appointment to Jamaica there was a black rebellion at Morant Bay (October 11, 1865). Eyre used extreme measures to crush the rebellion and also took excessive reprisals. In all there were over 400 executions. In the end Jamaica became a crown colony and Evre was recalled by the British government in 1866. Although he was commended for overcoming the revolt his methods were censured. Prominent British intellectuals of the time such as Mill. ➤ Herbert Spencer and ➤ Thomas Henry Huxley called for trial for murder. In addition to Carlyle, Eyre's supporters also included > John Ruskin and > Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Eyre was not indicted for murder and was also found innocent in a civil case brought against him by a Jamaican (> Jane Eyre).

Carlyle's friend and future biographer the novelist James Anthony Froude (1818–94) visited the Caribbean in 1886 and subsequently wrote *The English in the West Indies, or,*The Bow of Ulysses (1888) which strongly advocates government intervention to protect white settlers from being 'crowded out by the blacks'. Froude also supported Eyre, claiming he had been 'unworthily sacrificed to public clamour'. Another visitor to the West Indies was the novelist ▷ Charles Kingsley and his At Last: A Christmas in the West Indies (1871) is an enthusiastic account of the natural history of the West Indian colonies.

The colonization of Africa began in earnest in response to the demand for raw materials and markets caused by the > Industrial Revolution. The 'scramble for Africa' between the various European powers in 1884 led to the Berlin West Africa Conference (1884-5) which agreed on an orderly partitioning of the continent and in particular the territory of the Congo. Despite this, tensions were rife between the British, Dutch and French and, towards the end of the 19th century, the Germans. The British colonial effort was aided by the explorations of David Livingstone (1813-73) from 1841 until his death, and the Welsh explorer Henry Morton Stanley in the late 1870s. The British financier and empire builder Cecil Rhodes helped to maintain a colonial presence for Britain in Africa in the mid 1880s. Kingsley's niece, ➤ Mary Kingsley, travelled extensively in West Africa between 1893 and 1895 recording her experiences in a number of books on the subject.

By 1818, after the successful resolution of the Napoleonic wars had removed the French threat, Britain was the dominant European power in India. Under the Governor Generalship of the > Utilitarian Lord William Bentinck, who was instrumental in the suppression of sati (the sacrifice of Hindu widows on their husband's funeral pyres) and thagi (ritual murder and robbery by gangs), India was encouraged to absorb and adopt Western learning and culture through the medium of English and by 1857 Britain had established complete political control of the Indian sub-continent. However, in 1857 the Bengal army mutinied and what began as a military incident soon escalated into a fullscale popular revolt. Britain did not regain supremacy until 1859, threatening the fragile peace with vicious and often indiscriminate reprisals. The 60 years between the suppression of the mutiny and the end of the First World War saw both the rise of British imperial power in India, and nationalist agitation against it. It was characterized by British racial arrogance and often violent abuse of 'native' Indians. > Rudvard Kipling coined the phrase 'the white man's burden' to describe the duties incumbent upon British officials sent to serve in India. The British government of India became 'the world's largest imperial bureaucracy' (Encyclopaedia Britannica) and transfer of power was effected only after partition in 1947.

British colonization of Australia began in earnest in 1788 with the landing of 730 convicts and 250 free persons at Botany Bay in January of that year. By 1830 the number of convict settlers in the country had reached 58,000, a third of which were Irish rebelling against British colonial policy in Ireland. The Australian Marcus Clarke's novel For the Term of His Natural Life (1874) remains a vivid description of convict experience. Between 1829 and 1859 four of Australia's six states were established: Western Australia, South Australia, and the Northern and Southern portions of New South Wales. However, led by New South Wales all the colonies achieved self-government by 1856.

➤ Karl Marx wrote articles specifically about the colonization of Ireland by England and about the British Empire in India, stressing the link between capitalism and colonialism. This was followed in the early 20th century by the link of capital to imperialism and, in the 1950s to the present day on the unequal relations between countries and the emergence of multi-national capitalism.

The recognition of difference and the awareness of inequalities in economic terms mirrored the dissolution of empires, which began in 1947 as colonial countries gained independence. This sometimes occurred through warfare, as in Kenya and Algeria in the 1950s. While there are no formal 'empires' today, the relinquishing of control has been slow and Western influence on the third world in economic and political terms is still very strong.

Combe, William (1741-1823)

Humorist, prose writer and poet. Combe is associated with the cult of the ▷ Picturesque through his most well-known works. In 1790 he published The Devil Upon Two Sticks, a continuation of the French comic author Alain-René Lesage's Le Diable Boiteaux (1707). This is a witty picturesque narrative which predates the more sentimental > Romantic versions. Some time later, in 1809, he provided the poetry to accompany the comic illustrations of Thomas Rowlandson in the first of the 'Dr Syntax' series, which were crude parodies of the picturesque travel books of the day. They continued this collaboration through three works, finally collected as The Three Tours of Dr Syntax (1826). Syntax is a clergyman and a school teacher who is confronted with a series of strange and grotesque events which leave him open to ridicule. The character of Syntax was based on the author > William Gilpin.

Comedy of Errors, The (1592)

An early comedy and ➤ Shakespeare's shortest play, based on Plautus' Menaechmi. The elements of ⊳ farce and confusion in the original are enhanced in Shakespeare's taut play - it observes the neoclassical unities of time, place and action – by the addition of a second pair of twins, the Dromios, servants to the lost and separated Ephesian and Syracusan Antipholi. Shakespeare further departs from his source by foregrounding the marriage of Adriana and the Ephesian Antipholus with reference, imaginatively, to St Paul's view on marriage and sexual identity. The play is full of vitality and supersedes the reductive and mercenary view of society propounded in its classical source.

Cometh Up as a Flower (1867)

A novel of ▷ sensation by ▷ Rhoda Broughton. The heroine, Nell le Strange, is left as the head of a motherless household and delights in her father's affection. She is later attracted to a handsome guardsman, but he is already married and Nell has to accept a marriage of convenience to a rich old man, Sir Hugh. The novel is noteworthy for its description of Nell's revulsion, both at her aged husband and her situation as a 'bought' woman. She decides not to leave Sir Hugh after reading ▷ Mrs Henry Wood's ▷ East Lynne, and eventually dies of consumption.

Comic verse

In direct contrast to the tendency towards earnestness and social responsibility championed by > Thomas Carlyle, the Victorians also produced a large body of light literature including excellent comic verse, parodies and > nonsense. The Victorian's love of humour is perhaps best exemplified in > Punch magazine, founded in 1841, which claimed, despite its Radical politics, to be primarily a 'Guffawgraph'.

One of the most successful and gifted parodists was > William Aytoun whose The Book of Ballads: Edited by Bon Gaultier (1845), published jointly with Theodore Martin (1816-1909), satirizes the inflated sentiment of > Tennyson among others. However, Aytoun's most influential parody was his Firmilian, or the Student of Badajoz: A Spasmodic Tragedy by T. Percy Jones (1854) which helped to destroy the reputation of the > Spasmodic school of poets. The novelist ➤ Thackeray parodied the weaknesses of ⊳ Disraeli, ⊳ Bulwer-Lytton, ➤ Mrs Gore and many others in his Mr Punch's Prize Novelists (1847). Other parodies include C.S. Calverley's Verses and Translations (1862), W.S. Gilbert's Bab Ballads (1869), which contains a skit on Coleridge's The Ancient Mariner, and Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland (1865) and Through the Looking Glass (1872) which contain imitations of Tennyson and ➤ Southey. W.S. Gilbert's collaboration with Arthur Sullivan, which began in 1871, resulted in the Savov Operas which raised farce to a totally new level.

Nonsense verse was pioneered by ▷ Edward Lear, who borrowed the limerick form from an anonymous collection entitled Anecdotes of Fifteen Gentlemen (c 1821), and went on to popularize it. The tradition was continued by Carroll in such poems as 'The Hunting of the Snark' (1876) and Dreamland (1882). The Victorian age's talent for self-ridicule can be summed up in ▷ Swinburne's own Seven Against Sense (1880).

Comical Revenge, The: or, Love in a Tub (1664) Play by > Sir George Etherege, his first, with a complex and partly tedious series of plots in four different modes: 1 heroic, or mock-heroic, concerning love and honour, and including a duel, in rhymed couplets; 2 witty sparring courtship between Sir Frederick Frollick and the Widow; 3 gulling or trickery, of Sir Nicholas Cully, who is deceived into marrying a whore; 4 farce involving outright clowning, mainly by the absurd Dufoy and his associates. The title derives from the predicament of Dufoy, who has contracted venereal disease, and must sweat in a tub as part of the 'cure'.

Commedia dell'Arte

A kind of Italian comedy, developed in the 16th century, in which the plot was written but the dialogue was improvised by the actors. Certain characters regularly recurred in these plays, and by the 18th century they were adopted in England (by the way of France) and became a part of the English puppet shows (eg Punch and Judy) and of the pantomime tradition. Such characters, anglicized, include Harlequin, his mistress Columbine, Pantaloon, Punch.

Common metre

A four-line stanza with alternating four and three stresses and alternating rhymes. It is especially common in ▷ hymns, ▷ carols and ▷ ballads.

Common Prayer, The Book of

The first Book of Common Prayer was prepared under the supervision of ▷ Archbishop Cranmer and issued in 1549 to meet the needs of the > Church of England for services and prayers in the vernacular. It is of great importance as a work of literature, for Cranmer succeeded in combining the plainness and directness of English with the dignity and sonority of Latin. Prayer Book language became a familiar and formative influence in speech and writing second only in importance to the Bible itself. There were revisions in 1552 and 1559. The Prayer Book authorized in 1662 was substantially the 1559 revision. A fairly extensive revision was blocked by Parliament in 1928. There are now alternative forms of the various services in use.

Companies, joint-stock

Companies whose profits are distributed among the shareholders. They began in the 16th century and largely superseded the older 'regulated company' whose members traded each on his own account and combined only for common protection. The greatest of the regulated companies was the Merchant Adventurers, founded in the 15th century; the greatest of the joint-stock companies was the > East India Company founded in 1600: in the latter half of the 18th century the status of this changed from being a purely commercial concern to being an organ of imperial power, the effective sovereign power in Bengal.

Competence and performance

These terms, first proposed by the American linguist Noam Chomsky, are used in the study of language to refer to a speaker's overall competence to speak a language as distinct from his or her actual performance in it. The distinction is important to linguists because it allows them to analytically separate the way the system of a language operates from any individual usage. In this way it is similar to Ferdinand de Saussure's differentiation between > language and parole. For the individual language user, the competence/performance distinction is important because it helps explain how we can learn new pieces of language. Our competence in a language includes, often unconsciously, a knowledge of basic structural features which enable us to assimilate new material.

The competence/performance distinction has also been used by structuralist literary critics like Jonathan Culler with reference to our ability to interpret literary texts. Experienced readers of literature internalise the rules by which such texts operate (this is a reader's literary competence). They are therefore able to apply these when new work is presented to them (this is performance). Literary competence consists of a number of things, from a sophisticated capacity to read the language in which the texts are written, and a familiarity with the structures and conventions of literary works, to an array of more specialized cultural and literary knowledge which permits understanding and interpretation.

Complaint

A term used to refer to poems (in a variety of forms), usually in the voice of a first-person speaker, which lament the vicissitudes of life, especially the pangs of disappointed or unrequited love. Used by medieval French poets, it appears to have been employed first by ➤ Chaucer, who intercalated complaints within larger narrative contexts (eg in Dorigen's complaint in the ➤ Franklin's Tale) but who also produced a number of individual complaint poems. In Renaissance literature, ➤ Spenser's ➤ The Shepherd's Calendar provides a good example of the complaint, but afterwards the terms elegy or lament are more frequently used to signal complaint-type poetry.

Compleat Angler, The (1653) A discourse on the sport of fishing (in full, The Compleat Angler, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation) by > Izaak Walton, first published in 1653; its 5th edition has a continuation by Charles Cotton (1630-87) and came out in 1676. The book has been described as perhaps the only handbook of art and craft to rank as literature. This is because Walton combines his practical instruction with digressions about his personal tastes and opinions, and sets it in a direct, fresh description of the English countryside which may be contrasted with the artificial pastoralism that had hitherto been characteristic of natural description. The book has the form of a dialogue mainly between Piscator (Fisherman) and Venator (Hunter), which takes place on the banks of the River Lea near London. Cotton's continuation is transferred to the banks of the River Dove between Derbyshire and Staffordshire. Throughout the text, Walton also relates moral issues to the political events of his day and, while not strictly allegorical The Compleat Angler does include numerous social references.

Compton-Burnett, Ivy (1884-1969) Novelist. Her first novel, Dolores (1911) is distinguished from all her others by an approach to the method of novel-writing similar to that of the 10th century, in particular that of George Eliot, and a disposition to accept usual conceptions of moral retribution. From Pastors and Masters (1925) both the method and the moral vision change radically. The novels are narrated almost wholly through dialogue; the manner derives from Jane Austen, but with even less attempt to present visualized environments. In treating occurrences such as matricide, bigamy, betrayal and incest they show affinities with Greek tragic drama, while the novels of ⊳ Samuel Butler are another important influence. The period is always 1890-1914; the setting, a prosperous household of the period; the characters include some who are arrogant to the point of evil, and are able, without retribution, to dominate those who are selfless or weak; the plots are melodramatic but never break up the surface of respectability. The dialogue is epigrammatic and pungent, with the consequence that the novels are all exceptionally concentrated structures. The effect is commonly of sardonic comedy with tragic conclusion, although the comic side tends to

After 1925 the novels are as follows: Brothers and Sisters (1929); Men and Wives (1931); More Women than Men (1933); A House and its Head (1935); Daughters and Sons (1937); A Family and a Fortune (1939); Parents and Children (1941); Elders and Betters (1944); Manservant and Maidservant (1947); Two Worlds and Their Ways (1949); Darkness and Day (1951); The Present and the Past (1953); Mother and Son (1955); A Father and his Fate (1957); A Heritage and its History (1959); The Mighty and their Fall (1961); A God and His Gifts (1963); The Last and the First (1971). Few distinguished novelists have shown such uniformity of treatment and lack of development throughout their career. Probably A House and its Head and A Family and a Fortune are her two outstanding achievements. Comte, Auguste (1798–1857)
French philosopher. He sought to expound a scientifically based philosophy for human progress called Positivism, which deduced laws of development from the facts of history and excluded metaphysics and religion. His chief works were translated into English. In them he sought to establish a system that would be the scientific equivalent of the Catholic system of philosophy. In this he failed, but his work led to the modern science of sociology. In England, his chief disciple was Frederick Harrison (1831-1923). The character of his beliefs suited radically reformist and religiously sceptical English intellectuals; on the other hand, his systematization of ideas was alien to English habits of mind. His emphasis on the science of social phenomena, sociology, was intended to lay the foundations of a social and political system geared to the new age of industry. This, combined with his vision of an educational role for the priesthood, marks him as an antagonist to the dominant strains of thought in the Romantic period.

Comus (1634)

The name now given to the ⊳ masque written by ▶ John Milton and performed at Ludlow Castle in 1634. The work's original title was simply A Maske, presented at Ludlow Castle, 1634, before the Earl of Bridgewater, Lord President of Wales. This title stresses the important features of any masque - its occasional quality, and the names of those who either witnessed or took part in the masque. Music for the masque was composed by ➤ Henry Lawes and principal parts were taken by the children of the Earl of Bridgewater. The masque endeavours to demonstrate the triumph of virtue and chastity over luxury and sensual excess, although generations of readers and critics have found it easier to identify with the anti-hero Comus, rather than with the 'Lady' who opposes his arguments. Conceit

A conceit is a > metaphor or simile that initially appears improbable, but which forces the reader to acknowledge the comparison even though it is exceedingly far-fetched. The classic example comes from > John Donne's poem 'A Valediction: forbidding Mourning' where he compares himself and his mistress to 'stiff twin compasses'. Comparing two lovers to a mathematical instrument at first seems strange, but the aptness is derived from the fact that even when one partner (foot of the compasses/lover) moves away from the other, they are always joined together (at the hinge of the compasses/in their hearts). This intellectual delight in complicated parallels originates in the > Petrarchan influence upon > Elizabethan poetry and it became an important aspect of sonnets and of ⊳ metaphysical verse.

Condell, Henry (d 1627) > Heming, John.

Condensation

This term is used by ⊳ Freud in The Interpretation of Dreams (1900) to describe the compression and selection that takes place during the process of dreaming. When subjected to analysis the details of the dream can be shown to relate to a series of deeper, more extensive psychic connections. Freud distinguishes between the 'manifest content' of the dream, which is what is remembered, and the 'latent content' which can only be arrived at retrospectively through the analytical business of interpretation. Interpretation seeks to reverse the process of condensation and to investigate 'the relation between the manifest content of dreams and the latent dream-thoughts' and to trace out 'the processes by which the latter have been changed into the former' (The Interpretation of Dreams). The term has also become part of the language of critical theory. Applied to a literary text it was first used to afford a partial explanation of the energies which bring the text into existence, or to give an account of the unconscious motivations of represented 'characters'. More recently, the analogy between the interpretation of dreams and of texts has been used to suggest the impossibility of arriving at an original 'core' of meaning, prior to > displacement or condensation. Freud speaks of the dream's 'navel' - that knotted point of enigma which indicated that there is always something unresolved, unanalysed.

➤ Displacement; Psychoanalytical criticism.

Conduct literature

During the 16th and 17th centuries there was a proliferation of books on conduct for women, such as William Gouge's of Domesticall Duties. These prescribed the way in which a woman should behave in all circumstances and often gave very detailed guides to personal conduct, from sexual behaviour to appropriate reading.

> Advice literature; Epistolary novel

Confessio Amantis

A story-collection about love and related subjects, in octosyllabic couplets, written by > John Gower in the later 1380s. A confession of a lover (Amans) to Venus' priest (Genius) provides the occasion for the collection; the priest tells exemplary stories to help the lover analyse his own behaviour. Seven of the eight books of the Confessio Amantis are organized as illustrations of one of the > Seven Deadly Sins: Book VII is devoted to advice about the government of self and society. The framework and contents of Gower's work draw together traditions of courtly love literature and of religious treatises on the processes of penitence. The collection concludes with the healing of the lover as the penitential process is completed.

The stories themselves are drawn largely from ▷ Ovid, from medieval versions of the ▷ Troy story and from the Old Testament, but large amounts of bookish lore (such as the history of religion, the history of culture) are encompassed in the confessional frame, thus giving the work an encyclopaedic quality. There is some overlap between the stories in the Confessio Amantis and those retold in various contexts in > Chaucer's work (notably the stories of Florent, Ceyx and Alcione, Constance, Phoebus and the Crow, Pyramus and Thisbe), and the early version of the text contains complimentary references to Chaucer's work. Undoubtedly each writer knew and read the work of the other.

The Prologue and Epilogue of the Confessio Amantis place it in the context of universal and contemporary history. The narrator begins by suggesting that the work was commissioned by ▷ Richard II and concludes with remarks about its value for the English king and the English realm. Although the first version dates from the later 1380s, the opening and closing sections were revised to accommodate the changing political scene in England and the work was re-dedicated to Henry of Lancaster (later ▷ Henry IV). The Confessio Amantis was translated into Portuguese, probably in the late 14th century.

Confessions of an English Opium-Eater (1822: enlarged ed. 1856)

An ➤ autobiography, and the most famous work of ➤ Thomas De Quincey. Like ➤ Coleridge, De Quincey began taking opium to ease physical suffering, and eventually increased the dose until he became an addict. The book contains eloquent, prose-poetic accounts of his opium dreams and also graphic descriptions of his life of poverty in London. In the former aspect the prose evokes the high musical rhetoric of the 17th-century masters, such as ➤ John Milton; in the latter, it is typical of the 19th-century mode of transmitting intimate, minute personal experience, resembling the increasingly close-textured psychology of the novel. In his tenderness for and understanding of childhood suffering, De Quincey represents a development that was new in the history of literature, and which came to fruition in the Victorian novelists.

Congreve, William (1670–1729)
Dramatist and poet, born at Bardsey near Leeds, into a military family. He was educated at Kilkenny, and at Trinity College in Dublin, where he was a fellow-student of ➤ Jonathan Swift. In 1690 he entered the Middle Temple, but did not practise as a lawyer. Instead he began writing: his first published work was a novel, Incognita (1692), followed by three stage comedies: > The Old Bachelor (1693), > The Double Dealer (1694), > Love for Love (1695). Congreve's one tragedy, > The Mourning Bride, was written in 1697. Congreve was a particular target of the > Rev. Jeremy Collier's attack on the theatre, A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, in 1698, and he responded vehemently in his Amendments of Mr Collier's False and Imperfect Citations (1698). But the assault may have helped to discourage him from writing: his interest in the stage declined after the performance of his comedy, > The Way of the World, in 1700. This, despite its subsequent fame and lasting popularity, into our own time, was not at first a success. Congreve did not depend on the stage for his livelihood, although he retained his involvement in the management of ▷ Lincoln's Inn Fields Theatre until 1705, and managed the new Queen's Theatre in the > Haymarket together with ➤ Vanbrugh after that date. He accepted some government posts, and continued to write intermittently, composing a masque, The Judgment of Paris (1701); an operatic piece, Semele (1710), which provided part of the libretto for an oratorio by > Handel; a prose narrative, An Impossible Thing (1720); and several poems. He brought out an edition of Dryden's works in 1717. Congreve was an admirer of the actress > Anne Bracegirdle, for whom he wrote several of his best roles. His friends included ▷ Steele, ▷ Pope and > Swift. He went almost blind in his last years, and died following a coach accident at Bath. He is buried in Westminster Abbey. Congreve's comedies are distinguished by their verbal play and wit, in the Restoration ▷ comedy of manners mode. His art is satiric, and he created a number of memorable characters. Coningsby, or The New Generation (1844) A political novel by ➤ Benjamin Disraeli. By means of it, the rising politician, Disraeli, expresses his contempt for the lack of principle behind the contemporary Tory (right-wing) party, whose side he nonetheless took against the expediency and materialism of the Whigs and ➤ Utilitarians. Against them he advocates a revived, platonically idealized aristocracy with the interests of the people at heart and respected by them as their natural leaders. Such a new aristocrat is the hero of the novel, Coningsby, and he and his friends form a group comparable to the Young England group which Disraeli himself led in Parliament. Coningsby is the grandson of Lord Monmouth, type of the old, unprincipled, predatory aristocracy, whose inveterate enemy is the industrialist Millbank, representing the new and vital middle class. Coningsby falls in love with Millbank's daughter, is disinherited by his grandfather and eventually is elected to Parliament with Millbank's support. The novel is essentially one of propaganda of ideas, but written with great feeling, liveliness and intelligence. Lord Monmouth was based on the actual Lord Hertford, also used as the basis of Lord Steyne in > Thackeray's > Vanity Fair. Another excellently drawn character is the detestable Rigby, based on John Wilson Croker, politician and journalist, and author of the notoriously abusive review of Keats' Endymion.

Connotation and Denotation

The denotation of a word or phrase is its primary meaning, whereas the connotation is the range of associations it carries. The distinction is useful in analysing literary language because literature relies to heavily upon suggestion in, for instance, the use of imagery. Certain > Figures of Speech, such as metaphor and simile, also exploit connotation to the full. 'My love is like a red, red rose' relies upon the pleasant connotations of roses to create the compliment.

Conquest, The (Norman)

The conquest of England following the defeat of Harold by the ➤ Norman invading force led by ➤ William I at the Battle of Hastings in 1066.

Conrad, Joseph (1857-1924)

Novelist. His name in full was Józef Teodor Konrad Korzeniowski. He knew hardly any English when he was 20; yet before he was 40 he had completed his first English novel, Almayer's Folly (1895), and ten years later he had published one of the masterpieces of the novel in English: > Nostromo (1904). The background to Conrad as a novelist is complicated and important for understanding the richness of his art. I Early life. His father was a Polish patriot and man of letters, exiled from the Polish Ukraine by the Russian government, which then ruled it, for his political activity. His mother died when he was seven, and his father when he was 11, and his uncle subsequently became the main family influence in his life. 2 Life at sea. From the tales of sea life (in translation) by the English writer > Captain Marryat, the American Fenimore Cooper, and the Frenchman Victor Hugo, he became fascinated by the sea and joined the crew of a French ship in 1874, and of an English one in 1878. By 1884 he was a British subject and had qualified as a master (ship's captain). In his voyages Conrad had visited the Mediterranean, South American, the Far East, and Central Africa. 3 Writing life. He began writing in about 1886 with at least as good an acquaintance with French language and literature as English. He brought to the English novel an admiration for the French > realists, > Flaubert and Maupassant. He also had a knowledge of many peoples, and a profound feeling of the contrast between the tightly enclosed communities of ships' crews and the loose egocentric individualism characterizing land societies. In addition, he knew, from his childhood experience in Russian Poland and Russia itself, the tragic impingement of political pressures on personal life, in a way that was unusual in the West until after the outbreak of World War I in 1914. In his preoccupation with the exploration of moral issues he was in the English tradition.

His major work is represented by the novels > Lord Jim (1900), Nostromo, > The Secret Agent (1907) and Under Western Eyes (1911) and the novellas The Nigger of the Narcissus (1898); Youth (1902); > Heart of Darkness (1902); Typhoon (1903); and The Shadow Line (1917). Lord Jim and The Nigger of the Narcissus are concerned with honour, courage and solidarity, ideals for which the merchant service provided a framework. The Secret Agent and Under Western Eyes deal with political extremism, the contrast between eastern and western Europe, and human folly, cruelty, fear and betrayal. Nostromo, set in an imaginary South American state, shares some of the themes of the other work, but is notable for its sense of history and the power of economic forces. Heart of Darkness is famous for its ambiguous and resonant portraval of evil. Conrad's earlier novels, Almayer's Folly and An Outcast of the Islands (1896) have Far Eastern settings, and a less developed prose style. His later work includes Chance (1914), the first to bring him a big public; Victory (1915); The Arrow of Gold (1919); The Rescue (1920); The Rover (1923); and Suspense, which he was working on when he died. Conrad is one of the most important modern. English novelists, both for his concerns and for his techniques. He addressed issues which have come to seem central to the 20th-century mind: the problem of identity; the terror of the unknown within and without; the difficulty of finding a secure moral base; political violence and economic oppression; isolation and existential dread. His technical innovations were particularly in the use of narrators, the disruption of narrative chronology and the employment of a powerful irony of tone.

His other works are: a number of volumes of short stories and essays, including Tales of Unrest (1898) and Notes on Life and Letters (1921). The Mirror of the Sea (1906) and A Personal Record (1912) are autobiographical. Conrad co-operated with ▷ Ford Madox Ford in the writing of two novels: The Inheritors (1901) and Romance (1903). The first three volumes of his Collected Letters were published in 1983, 1986 and 1988.

Conran, Anthony (b 1931)

Poet, translator and critic. Tony Conran was born in India where his father was a railway engineer. Because of family connections with North Wales, he was educated at Colwyn Bay and at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, returning there in 1957 to become a research fellow and tutor in the English Department until retiring from this post in 1982. The discovery of Welsh literature was a crucial event in his literary career, since he learned the rules of cynghanedd and wrote poems which, though they were written in the English language, were nevertheless based on Welsh metres and also celebrated births, marriages and deaths, thus undertaking the function of the Welsh bardd gwlad. His first collection of poetry to be published was Formal Poems (1960) and, omitting numerous pamphlets, his most substantial later collections are Spirit Level (1974), Life Fund (1979) and Castles: Variations on an Original Theme (1993). His collected poems appeared in four volumes between 1965 and 1967 and subsequently as one volume entitled Poems 1951-67 in 1974. As a translator Tony Conran is best known for his Penguin Book of Welsh Verse (1967), an anthology that includes an important introduction in which he expounds his view of the poet's role in Welsh society. His volume of critical essays on Anglo-Welsh poetry, The Cost of Strangeness (1982) is one of the most perceptive and stimulating critical studies in this field.

Conscious Lovers, The (1722)

Play by ⊳ Sir Richard Steele, his last, adapted from > Terence's Andria, and sometimes considered as an archetype of ⊳ Augustan 'exemplary comedy', in contrast to Restoration 'wit comedy', and a landmark in the development of the later > 'sentimental comedy'. It is also seen as a vehicle for the expression of Whig attitudes and values, again in contrast to the Tory values espoused in much of Restoration comedy. Young Bevil thinks of himself as consistently virtuous, but this conflicts with his desires. He secretly supports the beautiful but impoverished Indiana, whom he also loves. However, in accordance with his father's wishes, he proposes marriage to Lucinda, while concealing the fact from Indiana. Lucinda is in turn loved by Bevil's friend Myrtle. On the wedding day Bevil regrets his commitment to Lucinda, and offers to help Myrtle to a match with her, describing it as an humanitarian act. In Act V Indiana is revealed as Lucinda's elder half-sister, and therefore heiress to half their father's fortune. She is united with Young Bevil, and Lucinda with Myrtle. The play's title derives from the thought and attention that Bevil Junior and Indiana give to their own emotions. Steele intended them to be admired, and the play as a whole to give moral guidance. But it generated a great controversy, with critics variously pointing to its supposed hypocrisy, its didacticism, and the seriousness of its tone.

Consciousness

In its most general sense consciousness is synonymous with 'awareness'. In a more specifically > Freudian context it is associated with the individual's perception of reality. For Freud, of course, the impression which an individual has of his or her experience is partial, since awareness is controlled by the processes of the unconscious, which are never recognized in their true form. More recently 'consciousness' has been associated with the > Enlightenment view of individualism, in which the individual is conceived of as being distinct from society, and is also held to be the centre and origin of meaning. Following from this, what distinguishes humanity is its alleged capacity for autonomy, and hence freedom of action. The > Romantic equivalent of this philosophical position is that literature is the expression of the pre-existent 'self' of the writer, and that the greatest literature is that which manifests the writer's consciousness most fully. These views of consciousness should further be distinguished from the > Marxist version, in which the self is 'produced' through 'material practices', by means of which social relations are generated. Theories of consciousness affect notions of the relationship between writer and reader, and it is in working out such relationships that the concept of 'consciousness' is important in current literary critical debate.

Constable, Henry (1562-1613)

Poet. Constable's early career appeared to promise him the fruits of preferment at ➤ Elizabeth I's court; he received the patronage of Walsingham and the Earl of Essex, and was the friend of ⊳ Sir Philip Sidney and Sir John Harington, as well as acquainted with two court ladies, > Mary Sidney and Penelope Rich (to both of whom he dedicated sonnets). However, in the late 1580s he converted to ➤ Catholicism and left the English court for France, where he was to reside until the accession of > James I in 1603. At first he was well received by the king, but on the discovery of incriminating letters he was imprisoned in the Tower in 1604. Constable was released the same year, but in 1610 he returned to the continent and died in Liège. He is mainly remembered for his sonnet sequence Diana (1592), which is spiritual in tone and stylistically influenced by > Ronsard. Bib: Grundy, J., The Poems of Henry Constable.

Constant Couple, The: Or, A Trip to the Jubilee (1699)

Comedy by George Farquhar. Angelica is in love with the rake, Sir Harry Wildair, who takes her for a whore. He finds himself in a position where he must marry her or fight; he decides matrimony is the bolder course, and marries her. In the secondary plot, Lurewell has become a coquette after being apparently abandoned by Colonel Standard. The situation is found to have been based on a misunderstanding, and the couple are reunited. The play was so well received that Farquhar followed it up with a sequel, Sir Harry Wildair (1701), which proved far less successful.

Contagious Diseases Acts

> Women's Movement, The.

Contemporary Review, The Journal, founded in 1866. Sir Percy Bunting was its most famous editor. It covered a variety of subjects and in 1955 incorporated ➤ The Fortnightly Review.

Contradiction

Used in literary criticism to identify the incoherences in a literary text. Derived from Hegel, Engels and ▷ Marx, contradiction, as applied to literature, implies that artistic representation is not the product of a unifying aesthetic impulse. Contradiction describes patterns of dominance and subordination and thus, in literary terms, points towards divisions within the work which challenge notions of aesthetic coherence.

Convention

Literary conventions are in many ways the building blocks of literary works. They are central to the organisation of literary form and establish the basis for communication between text and reader, performance and audience. They are usually traditional, and often highly stylised and 'unnatural' in so far as they do not correspond to forms of writing or behaviour outside literary texts. However, they are often so familiar that readers and audiences simply take them for granted. Examples include the fact that characters in Shakespeare talk in poetry and are not overheard during soliloquies, that pastoral writing is decorated with rural and classical motifs, that love is expressed in certain devotional and not sexual ways in medieval courtly literature, that villains twirl their moustaches in melodramas and that the telephone never rings unless it brings essential information to a modern plot. Conventions can either be matters of form (14 lines in a conventional sonnet, five acts in an Elizabethan play, 30 minutes in an episode of a soap opera) or matters of content, as in the ways in which certain things or people are habitually represented. In this case conventions can give home to prejudice and stereotyping. Literature, however, also makes use of the > defamiliarization of conventions. Defamiliarization occurs when conventions are defied or overturned and the reader or audience is made to think again.
